Political Correctness is Personality Castigation!

Jack · 5 January 2007 · Archived copy · Original

I am really getting tired of “Political Correctness”, and many of my fellow Generation X friends, coworkers and acquaintances are starting to feel the same way.

When we were growing up in the 1970’s and 80’s, I remember that life was a lot more fun. By comparison, in my opinion, the culture we share now is dry, corporate and listless. Also, back then, the music was better – by far.

For example, I remember riding the bus every day, and whenever a song by Queen (We will, we will rock you!) or Pink Floyd (All in all it was, just another brick in the wall!), or some other popular band at the time came on the radio, EVERYONE on the bus (except the stodgy old bus driver) got excited and sang along to the lyrics. You’ll never see that happen these days! (Sony’s and I-pod’s with earphones have taken over so that we never need to “bother” each other with our preferred tunage.)

[Eds. note: These songs and other shared life experiences are called “generational cohorts”.]

Another thing that is different, is that people didn’t spend so much time with their technology. Instead of playing video games and surfing social media on the internet, people actually went to visit other people, in their homes. That was called, “Hanging out”.

But a lot of other things have changed besides the music and technology.

I also remember that the English language was different. It was full of emotional expression. Forms of speech such as hyperbole, metaphor, simile, irony, sarcasm… were commonplace in daily interaction. Political Correctness has replaced all these with muted euphemisms.

Supposedly, as we are told, Political Correctness has become necessary to “civilize our society”. The narrative implies that we need a new standard, to be used as a social law to instruct, correct, and punish some very mean people who use these forms of speech in wrong ways.

But what is so bad about sarcasm? Do we have to throw away our whole culture because “some bad apples spoiled the whole barrel”? It’s more like “throwing the baby out with the bath water”!

Twenty years ago, our friends used sarcasm towards us every day, and we felt closer, because we knew that we weren’t letting appearances or fragile egos stand between us. As ugly as it may have appeared, we knew we were being authentic, and we loved each other for it.

If someone told us about political correctness back then, we probably would have said something to the tune of,

> “THAT is a bunch of pansy @$$ kissing bull $&!#!”

My interaction with many members of preceding generations (Boomers, Silents, Greats, and even a couple Missionaries), has proven to me that such a use of speech is indeed not unique to my own generation. Most of the expressions used by the older generations have now passed from daily use, and have been substituted by modern expressions. But moreover, I’ve learned that such a use of the language permitted a deep communication, rich in emotional undertones.

Forty years ago, most of the music that we now call “Classic Rock”, was being generated in extremely informal settings by Boomers who were actually way off line, in terms of Political Correctness. Silents tell me the same thing was happening in the 40’s and 50’s with Jazz and Rock and Roll. They knew something that we don’t appreciate anymore – that risk, sincerity and original creativity are golden.

Sixty years ago, during the World War II era, my grandparents’ generation (The Greats) had the patriotic belief that they could tell who the “Real Americans” were, by whether the person in question had a good repertoire of all the aforementioned forms of speech, and used them correctly and with confidence.

Today, this sort of thinking would appear to be too “middle class” for most to accept it. Today, it’s a SIN to think middle class. Even those who ARE middle class, instead of enjoying the great life that America gives them, these people feel that they need to spend over $3.00 for a “gourmet” Starblinks (or $tarBUCK$) cup of coffee, so that at least they can make themselves believe that they have “high-class” tastes.

Is it not obvious to everyone, that REAL QUALITY LIVING is much deeper than this?

From a proper viewpoint, “politically correct” Americans should know that a large middle class population, and the right to freedom of speech, are the very FOUNDATIONS of a strong democracy! And we should watch out for anyone who pressures us to “conform”.

My beef with Political Correctness is that it deadens expression in speech, it erases culture and regional color, and homogenizes everyone into an “acceptable form”, which is actually a reverse judgment on the intolerance of our own culture.

Whatever happened to those beautifully contrived phrases, rich in connotation, such as, “fed up”, “junkie”, “wrathsome” … What’s wrong with being a “cook” or a “janitor”?

Instead, the most expression we hear these days is, “Whatever…”, because to finish this statement would be Politically INCORRECT!

Let’s get right down to it. We need to face up to the fact that everyone is different. Everyone has different ideas, thinking, attitudes and speech. Why can’t some people just accept the fact that everyone is different, and stop tip-toeing around all those who are resorting to Political Correctness, not as a genuine demand for respect, but because they are too emotionally insecure, or they are lacking sound thinking and a firm knowledge of their own identity. Those people need to be told the real truth, so that they can face it and grow up.

The politically correct truth is not always the whole truth about who each of us are, and that does not need to imply that we’re all graphic at heart. If people think it’s too basic, then it’s only because they are common themselves and they can’t accept being that way. They miss the idea that true greatness is always personal and informal.

Being politically tactful never led anyone to success (with President Obama being the one exception).

The real nature of men has been evidenced by the many political blunders committed by the greatest men among us when they were caught off guard at a candid moment. It was an embarrassment to them to be held guilty for their transgression of political correctness, but it is even more embarrassing that the public as a whole should come to demand political correctness at all times by all people. Instead, people should respect the differences of others in totality, without feigning shock when someone accidentally behaves how they really feel.

While it is true that “diversity” and “political correctness” are both highly valued for conveying modern social sophistication, as well as their usefulness in condemning and eliminating social “offenders”, sooner or later, we will have to wake up to the fact that they are entirely incompatible ideals.

What am I saying here? I am not saying that we should resort to a stone-age society. I am saying that people should use their own personal discernment coupled with common sense to interpret the basic meaning of anothers expression, while maintaining enough personal integrity and security in their own identity not to take offense from the differences they have with others.

Of course, I have to agree that there has been a lot of denigratory terminology that political correctness has removed from our language, making our society more civilized in some tactful ways. But I have the impression that while the dirt is being cleaned off the surface, nevertheless, Political Correctness introduces a deeper and more insidious contamination to society.

While it is true that political correctness is a high card in eliminating racism and bigotry from public life, it also removes a great deal of emotional color, good and bad. In fact, I would go so far as to say that the norm of Political Correctness has robbed the American people of the beauty and versatility of our own language, and forced a subtle sense of shame into middle class American life, towards anyone that is somehow, “different”.

Recent studies have shown that the middle class is disappearing, but actually, I believe part of this is because no one wants to admit being middle class. It’s like the social standard has been knocked down one strata. Simply saying that you’re middle class automatically makes you a lower class wannabe. People who were once considered lower class are now seen to be “cracker” or “ghetto”, but Political Correctness dictates that we’re not “allowed” to say so!

I think these people need to travel more!

Hold on to your hats now, but sometimes I suspect that the baby-boomers invented political correctedness to counteract their own guilt for being overly expressive and rebellious in their youth. Remember the “Peaceniks” and the drug cultures? I personally wasn’t there, but my father told me all about it.

If Americans eventually outgrow the current trend of political correctness, then we can truly claim that we have achieved a mutual self-respect amongst ourselves. But if not, then the intimacy and warmth of small town Americana has passed forever, replaced by the “Big Brother” society that Orson Wells warned us about nearly sixty years ago.

The relationship between passion and faith.

Is passion complicit with faith?

Readership: All

Growing up in a Baptist church, at times I would hear the argument that one's passions are a sinful anathema to one's faith. But after living life for a couple decades, I've come to believe that this argument is erroneous, but up until now, I haven't been able to identify the reason why.

Lately, I came at this from a different angle, by discovering that passion is an integral part of faith. The link between the two could be described as follows.

Passion is the emotional inflammation of Desire
Desire requires some expectation of what can happen.
What you expect from life depends on what you believe about life.
What you can believe depends on your faith.

Of note, reading John Eldredge has helped me get over this roadblock to my spiritual vitality. So here I'll append an excerpt from his book, The Journey of Desire.

> You may recall the story Jesus told of the man who entrusted three of his servants with thousands of dollars (literally, "talents"), urging them to handle his affairs well while he was away. When he returned, he listened eagerly to their reports. The first two fellows went out into the marketplace and doubled their investment. As a result, they were handsomely rewarded.
> The third servant was not so fortunate. His gold was taken from him, and he was thrown into "outer darkness, where there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth". My goodness. Why? All he did was bury the money > under the porch until his master's return. Most of us would probably agree with the path he chose – at least the money was safe there. But listen to his reasoning. Speaking to his master, he said, "I know you are a hard man, harvesting crops you didn't plant and gathering crops you didn't cultivate. I was afraid I would lose your money, so I hid it." (See Matthew 25:14-30 NLT.) He was afraid of the master, whom he saw as a hard man. He didn't trust his master's heart.

> The issue isn't capital gains – it's what we think of God. When we bury our desires, we are saying the same thing: "God, I don't dare desire because I fear you, I think you are hard-hearted."
> Just yesterday evening I was taking a walk in our neighborhood, talking to the Lord about going forward and establishing the ranch I have mentioned. I had been moving toward the creation of this place of ministry in what felt like sheer obedience, dragging my heart along behind me. God had been confirming the direction with many signs and affirmations. And yet I sensed that something was wrong. I was asking him what he wanted the ranch to be. He said, What do you want it to be? What's in your heart? I was embarrassed by the honesty of my reply: "What do you care about my desires?" There is this hurt and angry place inside, and very old wound, that harbors some rather strong doubts about how much God really cares for me.
> We all have this place, Life has not turned out the way we want, and we know God could have handled things differently. Even though we may profess at one level a genuine faith in him, at another level we are like the third servant. Our obedience is not so much out of love as it is out of carefulness. "Just tell me what to do, God, and I'll do it." Killing desire may look like sanctification, but it's really godlessness. Literally, our way of handling life without God.
> "But when the Son of Man comes, will he find faith on the earth?" Jesus had been talking about prayer by telling the story of a persistent widow who wasn't getting the justice she deserved from a belligerent judge. The woman won her case because she refused to let up. Jesus used her as a picture of unrelenting desire; he urged us not only to ask, but also to keep on asking. And then he ended the parable by wondering out loud, "When I return, will I find anyone who really lives by faith?" (See Luke 18:1-8 NIV.)
> We know in our hearts the connection he is making, though we haven't admitted it to ourselves. To live with desire is to choose vulnerability over self-protection; to admit our desire and seek help beyond ourselves is even more vulnerable. It is an act of trust. In other words, those who know their desire and refuse to kill it, or refuse to act as though they don't need help, they are the ones who live by faith. Those who do not ask do not trust God enough to desire. They have no faith. The deepest moral issue is always what we, in the heart of hearts, believe about God. And nothing reveals this belief as clearly as what we do with our desire.

Being A Member of God's Family

Jack · 11 September 2009 · Archived copy · Original

This morning, I was reading Oswald Chamber's entry for August 8th. He writes,

> "The more one knows of the inner life of God's ripest saints, the more one sees what God's purpose is – 'filling up that which is behind of the affliction of Christ'."

The language in this passage is written very obscurely, and in the past, I suppose I've glossed over it without really understanding the meaning. But today, it struck me as an important passage, so I looked up this verse in all the versions of the Bible that we have in the house (KJV, NKJV, NIV, NLT, The Message). I took a little extra time to examine the texts well, and to be sure that I got the general message straight.

From my study, I gathered that the main idea here is that God wants to heal people and make the body of believers strong. The "suffering" that Paul refers to has two aspects. (1) The suffering that we endure from being sinful people in a fallen world. (2) The choice we make as Christians to lay down our own selfishness and personal ambitions so that we can help others who are suffering. This is suffering too, but fulfilling the purposes of others lives is what the love of Christ keeps at the forefront of our thoughts.

We take part in God's process of healing by keeping the benefit of the group above our own personal interests. This process is what builds up the body of Christ, and this is what it means to "Share in each other's sufferings." This concept is in agreement with 2nd Corinthians 1:3-7, which is more clear, and follows here.

> "Praise be to God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of compassion and the God of all comfort, who comforts us in all our troubles so that we can comfort those in any trouble with the comfort we ourselves have received from God. For just as the sufferings of Christ flow over into our lives, so also through Christ our comfort overflows. If we are distressed, it is for your comfort and salvation; if we are comforted, it is for your comfort, which produces in you patient endurance of the same sufferings we suffer. And our hope for you is firm, because we know that just as you share in our sufferings, so also you share in our comfort."

In conclusion, the application here is this – that when we notice "problem people" in our fellowship (those people who take offense at various things, or whine and complain, or spread gossip, or simply refuse to take action when it is most needed), we need to be more aggressive in our ministry, to reach out to those individuals, whoever they might be, instead of withdrawing into our respective cliques with a disgusted attitude of blame. We should not wait for a pastor or deacon to do so. We should not fight or slander each other. We make no progress as long as we work against each other, instead of fighting the enemy together. We are the only allies we have on this earth.

Don't hesitate to advance communication with others.

Stay focused on what God is doing in us.

An Interview with Rick Warren

Jack · 11 September 2009 · Archived copy · Original

Rick Warren is the Pastor of Saddleback Church in California. He is the author of the New York Times bestselling book, "The Purpose Driven Life", which has sold more than 30 million copies.

Warren is also famous for hosting the Civil Forum on the Presidency at Saddleback Church, which was broadcast live on national television. The forum marked senators John McCain and Barack Obama's first joint appearance as the presumptive Republican and Democratic presidential nominees, respectively. Each candidate took the stage separately for about an hour to respond to Warren's questions about faith and moral issues, including abortion and human rights.

In December 2008, President-elect Obama chose Warren to give the invocation speech and prayer at his inauguration ceremony, held on January 20, 2009.

Lately, Warren continues to receive a lot of wealth and notoriety from his book sales, however, his wife has been battling cancer. So he is someone who is experiencing the best and the worst of life. Warren's testimony contains some fantastic insights that can give us a better perspective on life.

People ask me, What is the purpose of life? And I respond: In a nutshell, life is preparation for eternity. We were not made to last forever, and God wants us to be with Him in Heaven. One day my heart is going to stop, and that will be the end of my body – but not the end of me. I may live 60 to 100 years on earth, but I am going to spend trillions of years in eternity. This is the warm-up act – the dress rehearsal. God wants us to practice on earth what we will do forever in eternity. We were made by God and for God, and until you figure that out, life isn't going to make sense.

Life is a series of problems: Either you are in one now, you're just coming out of one, or you're getting ready to go into another one. The reason for this is that God is more interested in your character than your comfort; God is more interested in making your life holy than He is in making your life happy. We can be reasonably happy here on earth, but that's not the goal of life. The goal is to grow in character, in Christ-likeness.

This past year has been the greatest year of my life but also the toughest, with my wife, Kay, getting cancer. I used to think that life was hills and valleys – you go through a dark time, then you go to the mountaintop, back and forth. I don't believe that anymore. Rather than life being hills and valleys, I believe that it's kind of like two rails on a railroad track, and at all times you have something good and something bad in your life. No matter how good things are in your life, there is always something bad that needs to be worked on. And no matter how bad things are in your life, there is always something good you can thank God for. The train needs both rails to stay on track. You can focus on your purposes, or you can focus on your problems: If you focus on your problems, you're going into self-centeredness, which is "my problem", "my issues", "my pain". But one of the easiest ways to get rid of pain is to get your focus off yourself and onto God and others. Even though you may be suffering, if you cannot help yourself, then why not help someone else who has the same problems that you do? That is a purpose!

We discovered quickly that in spite of the prayers of hundreds of thousands of people, God was not going to heal Kay or make it easy for her. It has been very difficult for her, and yet God has strengthened her character, given her a ministry of helping other people, given her a testimony, drawn her closer to Him and to people. You have to learn to deal with both the good and the bad of life.

Actually, sometimes learning to deal with the good is harder. For instance, this past year, all of a sudden, when the book (The Purpose Driven Life) sold 15 million copies, it made me instantly very wealthy. It also brought a lot of notoriety that I had never had to deal with before. I don't think God gives you money or notoriety for your own ego or for you to live a life of ease. So I began to ask God what He wanted me to do with this money, notoriety and influence. He gave me two different passages that helped me decide what to do, II Corinthians 9 and Psalm 72. First, in spite of all the money coming in, we would not change our lifestyle one bit. We made no major purchases. Second, about midway through last year, I stopped taking a salary from the church. Third, we set up foundations to fund an initiative we call The Peace Plan to plant churches, equip leaders, assist the poor, care for the sick, and educate the next generation. Fourth, I added up all that the church had paid me in the 24 years since I started the church, and I gave it all back. It was liberating to be able to serve God for free.

We need to ask ourselves: Am I going to live for possessions? Popularity? Am I going to be driven by pressures? Guilt? Bitterness? Materialism? Or am I going to be driven by God's purposes (for my life)? When I get up in the morning, I sit on the side of my bed and say, God, if I don't get anything else done today, I want to know You more and love You better. God didn't put me on earth just to fulfill a to-do list. He's more interested in what I am than what I do. That's why we're called "human beings", not "human doings".

Colonel Harland David Sanders & KFC

Jack · 11 September 2009 · Archived copy · Original

I have always been inspired by the life of Colonel Sanders, since I saw him once at a KFC restaurant when I was a boy (~1980). I wanted to share the short story of his life with you, and I hope you find him as inspiring as I do.

Harland David Sanders, better known as “Colonel Sanders” (September 9, 1890 – December 16, 1980) was an American entrepreneur who founded Kentucky Fried Chicken (KFC). His image is omnipresent in the chain’s advertising and packaging, and his name is sometimes used as a synonym for the KFC product or the restaurant itself.

Sanders was born to a Presbyterian family in Henryville, Indiana. His father, Wilbur David Sanders, died when he was five years old, and since his mother worked, he was required to cook for his family. A year later he was already a master at cooking several regional dishes. He dropped out of school in seventh grade. When his mother remarried he ran away from home because his stepfather beat him. He enlisted in the Army as a private when he was only 16 years old (by lying about his age), and spent his service commitment in Cuba. Afterwards, Sanders worked many jobs, including farm hand, streetcar conductor, blacksmith’s helper, railyard fireman, insurance salesman, steamboat pilot, tire salesman and service station operator for Standard Oil, but throughout all these experiences, his skill as a cook remained.

At the age of 40, in the midst of the great depression, Sanders operated a gas station in Corbin, Kentucky. Because times were hard, Sanders often cooked chicken dishes and other meals for people who stopped at his service station. He served his food to his customers in his living quarters in the service station, since he did not have a restaurant. Soon, because of increasing demand, he opened his first restaurant in the small front room of his gas station. Sanders served as the station operator, chief cook and cashier, and he named the dining area “Sanders Court & Café”. His local popularity grew, and Sanders acquired an adjacent motel where he opened a restaurant that seated 142 people. He continued working as the chef, and hired others to operate the station and perform other services. Over the next nine years, he developed his method of cooking chicken. The pressure cooker was invented in 1939, and he used this new technology to give his customers fresh chicken faster than by pan frying.By 1940, he had perfected the original recipe, with the famously delicious “11 herbs and spices”, which continues to be one of the best kept trade secrets, even to this day.

He was given the honorary title “Kentucky Colonel” in 1935 by Governor Ruby Laffoon. As a way of self-promotion, Sanders chose to call himself “Colonel” and to dress in a white suit, which was the stereotypical “Southern gentleman” style.

In the early 1950’s, an interstate highway (75) was built, and he was forced to sell the property where his restaurant was located, to make room for the construction. As a result, his business suffered heavily. In 1955, Sanders was 65 years old and was eligible to retire. After selling the service station and paying off his debts, he was broke. But his spirit wasn’t. Instead of retiring quietly, Sanders decided to get on the road and sell his Secret Recipe to other restaurants. Confident of the quality of his fried chicken, he traveled across the country by car from restaurant to restaurant, cooking batches of chicken for restaurant owners and their employees. If the reaction was favorable, he entered into a handshake agreement on a deal that stipulated a payment to him of a nickel for each order of chicken the restaurant sold. Sanders began franchising Kentucky Fried Chicken restaurants, and he used the money from his Social Security retirement checks to fund his visits to potential franchisees.

Tony Robbins, a motivational speaker, says that Sanders was rejected 1,009 times while trying to establish his franchise, but over time, with his tenacious perseverance, his restaurant slowly grew into the now internationally famous restaurant chain, KFC. He completely devoted himself to selling his chicken franchise business, and within ten years he had over 600 franchises in the U.S. and Canada. Now, Colonel Sanders is the official face of KFC, and appears on the logo as well as numerous advertisements and promotions of the fast food chain.

In 1964, Sanders sold the Kentucky Fried Chicken corporation for $2 million to a partnership of Kentucky businessmen headed by John Y. Brown, Jr, who later became governor of Kentucky. The deal did not include the Canadian operations.

In 1965 Sanders moved to Mississauga , Ontario to oversee his Canadian franchises, as he continued to collect franchise fees. Sanders also became a spokesperson for Kentucky Fried Chicken and collected appearance fees for his visits to franchises in the United States and Canada. He continued to appear on TV and radio commercials for another 15 years until his death. By 1976, Colonel Sanders was ranked the world's second most recognized celebrity by an independent survey.

Sanders later used his shares to create the Colonel Harland Sanders Trust and Colonel Harland Sanders Charitable Organization, based in Sidney, British Columbia, which used the proceeds to aid charities and fund scholarships. His trusts continue to donate money to groups like the Trillium Health Care Centre. In fact, one wing of their building specializes in women's and children's care and has been named after him. The foundation granted over $1,000,000 in 2007, according to its 2007 tax return.

One year before his death, in 1979, Colonel Sanders publicly professed his testimony of faith, saying he was a "born-again Christian", and wrote about it in a book named, "The Incredible Colonel". He authored another book entitled, "Life As I Have Known It Has Been 'Finger Lickin' Good'", and another, "It Wasn't All Gravy", which was a collection of personal anecdotes that depicted the active fellow that he was, from his hard times in Corbin, Kentucky, through the rise of both the Colonel and Kentucky Fried Chicken to international prominence. He also has a biography compiled by the KFC Corporation, "Colonel Harland Sanders: From Corbin to the World".

In 1980, at the age of 90, he travelled 250,000 miles a year visiting Kentucky Fried Chicken restaurants all around the world before he was seriously struck down by leukemia. Sanders died in Louisville, Kentucky, of pneumonia on December 16, 1980. He had been diagnosed with acute leukemia the previous June. His funeral service at the Southern Baptist Seminary Chapel, was attended by more than 1,000 people, and afterwards, there was a state ceremony in the rotunda of the Kentucky state capitol building. He was buried in his characteristic white suit and black western string tie in Cave Hill Cemetery in Louisville . He had a son, Harland, Jr., who died at a young age, and two daughters, Margaret Sanders and Mildred Ruggles.

Colonel Sanders was inducted into the Junior Achievement U.S. Business Hall of Fame in 2000, and today, Colonel Sanders restaurant, Kentucky Fried Chicken, is in more than 80 countries of the world, with an annual revenue of several billions of dollars.

Disappointed Trust

Jack · 11 September 2009 · Archived copy · Original

We've heard of a few friends and acquaintances who have lost their jobs recently or have experienced a breach of contract by their employer. My heart goes out to them, because the same thing happened to me, during my first year teaching English in Taiwan. I'll never forget that experience, and I'll reiterate the highlights briefly here.

The Story

My boss frequently got very angry with me, and he told me that I had failed at each assignment that he gave to me. I reminded him that the assignments were not given to me under the conditions we agreed on before I accepted the job. I had a big "Wake up!" when he said,

> "All the things we talked about before don't matter now! All that matters now is the work before us, and how to get it done!"

I was shocked that he would change our agreement so casually! But gradually, I came to see that my boss, and God, were both testing me. My boss said it was his job to know all his employees well, and to schedule their work accordingly. He felt justified in changing our agreement because of the dictates of the job, and his assumed authority to test my abilities as his employee.

I was really offended, because I felt like he was really shifty and untrustworthy, while at the same time, he expected me to be a superhero slave as he treated my livelihood as his little toy. Honestly, I didn't know why it was so hard for him to accept the fact that not every person can do whatever kind of job that's demanded from him.

My Response

Realistically, people have strengths and weaknesses in their abilities, and people need to know themselves sufficiently well enough so that respective expectations can be ironed out in dialogue before an agreement is reached. (On the other hand, God does push us to our limit, but there is always love and grace, which we can't find from others.)

Afterwards, God spoke to me about a few things here. He eased my heart a little bit from what had happened, and helped me see that I had trusted my boss totally and put my whole heart into my job, but my boss is only doing business, and he used my diligence and trust to sift me. I learned the following things from this experience:

1. I must put more trust in God, and less in man. I should have found a job on my own, in faith, instead of depending so much on others to help me find employment. But I could not have done that very easily, since I needed this very experience to teach me how to get along on my own here. So there is a necessary learning curve that I must endure.
2. I've grown to know myself better – I am hard working and earnest about my work, but I am also easily trusting, happy-go-lucky, and good-natured. Some Chinese people seem to find it hard to believe or respect a person like this. It even seems to make my boss angry when I am so open and optimistic about my work.
3. I understand more about what it means to trust someone, and all that can happen as a result. We trust others at our own risk, but at the same time, we should harden our heart and refuse to trust others either. We must find a way through this dilemma, in our daily interactions with others.

I should not feel bad to fail my boss's tests, because my boss intentionally designed those tests so that I would eventually fail. He wanted to know my limit. He deliberately went against the grain of my capabilities, just to see what would happen.

Introspection

How could I have passed my boss's tests? Being diligent and working harder would only lead me to exasperation and fatigue. My boss would only push me harder in his search for my weakness. Instead, I have to change something deeper about myself – stop being so emotionally outgoing, open and trusting, and start giving more attention to my place and state, take some thought to plan things out, in terms of my social interaction and my responsibilities. That was a real challenge for me, because I saw myself becoming more reserved, cold and calculating, but I think God saw it as maturity!

Looking back on this experience over the years, I also learned that I should not have entered into contractual agreements with my boss, because it joined our lives together in many ways. Sometimes that's a good thing, but with certain other people, that's really bad!

One thing I did gain from this event, is knowing that people are people. My boss is just a regular man who cannot necessarily be trusted as a leader or as a friend. He focuses on the errors of others in order to throw them off guard and keep control of the place. But in fact, he has his own weaknesses, such as his perceived need to control and test all his employees. He thinks that his attitude is necessary to run his business efficiently, but he doesn't seem to realize that it also makes his employees cold, critical and cynical.

If I had more discernment, then maybe I wouldn't need to take such risks to have this knowledge.

Refining Trust

I'm still not sure how this experience has taught me to trust in God more. I do see that I need to trust God more (described in point #1), but this experience has not really led me to do so. But I did come to understand that it's necessary to trust myself and have a secure self-esteem, in order to protect myself from vipers like my old boss.

I walked away from this with a better understanding of the importance of God's covenant with us, and why covenant is so important. It's because the whole enterprise of a relationship with security and purpose becomes unsteady and risky, without a backbone of God's word as a guarantee, or a vision of future glory, to hang our faith on. (Employer-employee and marital commitments also provide a similar, necessary structure to a company and to family, respectively, and both of these contribute to society.)

Improving Self

Perhaps the most extremely valuable lesson from this experience is this, and I think it's a pity for others who don't learn this: A lot of people from western countries, especially English-speaking western countries, have this idea that all they need to do to succeed in life is to work hard and respect the rules – basically the Protestant Work ethic. But my experience teaching English in Taiwan taught me something I'll never forget…

> "Working hard and following the rules is good, but it's no guarantee of success."

To really succeed, you've got to focus more on yourself as a person, and make yourself into the kind of employee that is indispensable to your company. That is REAL job security! The boss will only need to scrutinize your performance if you fail to do so yourself.

The Apostle Paul instructed us to "discipline our body and make it our slave", which is really extreme, but the idea is that there are no guarantees in life. If we could only see how far off the mark we are, and make a diligent effort towards bettering our worth, then it becomes quite obvious that the obligations we have in any contractual agreement are actually the bare minimum requirements. Paul also instructs us to work for our taskmasters as we would for the Lord.

I learned an application of 1st Corinthians 9.

> [8] Do I say these things as a mere man? Or does not the law say the same also? [9] For it is written in the law of > Moses, “You shall not muzzle an ox while it treads out the grain.” Is it oxen God is concerned about? [10] Or does He say it altogether for our sakes? For our sakes, no doubt, this is written, that he who plows should plow in hope, and he who threshes in hope should be partaker of his hope.

> [19] For though I am free from all men, I have made myself a servant to all, that I might win the more; [20] and to the Jews I became as a Jew, that I might win Jews; to those who are under the law, as under the law, that I might win those who are under the law; [21] to those who are without law, as without law (not being without law toward God, but under law toward Christ, that I might win those who are without law; [22] to the weak I became as weak, that I might win the weak. I have become all things to all men, that I might by all means save some. [23] Now this I do for the gospel’s sake, that I may be partaker of it with you.
> [24] Do you not know that those who run in a race all run, but one receives the prize? Run in such a way that you may obtain it. [25] And everyone who competes for the prize is temperate in all things. Now they do it to obtain a perishable crown, but we for an imperishable crown. [26] Therefore I run thus: not with uncertainty. Thus I fight: not as one who beats the air. [27] But I discipline my body and bring it into subjection, lest, when I have preached to others, I myself should become disqualified.

This really puts our present condition in very clear terms, and shows us how lazy and spoiled we have become, by growing up in civilized countries that have a culture where Christianity is popular, and where contracts and agreements are always honored.

I firmly believe that these lessons are what the Lord wishes us to learn whenever we have been infiltrated, cheated or defrauded by our employers.

Conclusions

Now, I think about it like this: If we were really so “good”, we would be the last person to be “let go” from the company. If this is not the case, then it means that (1) our services simply are not needed and we would do well to offer our services elsewhere, or (2) our services are not “good enough” to be necessary. Unless we rank among the best employees, our testimony and example as a Christian is disqualified.

I hope it is clear that I say these things to challenge you, and not to condemn anyone. It’s not about DOING the best work, or the most work, or following all the rules – that is the western version of “wearing face”. We say, “Look at me! Look what I have! Look what I’ve done! But life is much deeper than that. It’s about BEING the best! We can achieve this with God.

At last, my boss cut my hours and my pay to the minimum, and eventually I decided to look for a better job that could sustain my needs more sufficiently. At that time, God opened the door for me to earn a Ph.D. and to teach at a University full time, and this is what I have been doing since then, with a lot more satisfaction, appreciation and compensation!

On Choosing a Career

Jack · 11 September 2009 · Archived copy · Original

Young people are truly faced with a daunting task of identifying and developing their latent God-given qualities. I've found that most students cannot discern the difference between the life they were born into, and the life they could achieve. The majority of students are too worried about their grades and their social standing, and too busy conforming to the wishes of their parents and the expectations of society, so that they cannot even consider the deeper question of what they really want out of life.

As a teacher, I've accepted the fact that part of my calling is to help others achieve their own.

Pressure + Ill Preparedness = Exasperation

This past week, I've gotten too many e-mails from people who hate their jobs. They are frustrated because of working conditions, low pay, hidden deductions, and a vindictive boss. They don't think they can change their immediate situation, and they are not prepared to change jobs. Apparently, the adjustment of one's attitude toward one's place of occupation seems to be an extremely difficult lesson for several people.

First of all, quitting is usually a bad idea, simply because it removes you from the trying situation, and thus, the process of growth. But if the conditions are so bad that you are required to do something immoral, at risk of bodily harm, or are about to lose your faith, then it is time to quit. If such is the case, then you are just not ready to tackle this lesson. But even so, you have by no means escaped this lesson. God will bring it back to you in one way or another, until you have mastered it, even if it takes your whole life time. Unfortunately, the lessons become more difficult, mundane and with fewer rewards on each rerun, so of course, it's better for you to learn the lesson the first time.

On the other hand, if you are poorly suited to the profession you are in, perhaps quitting and changing careers is the best decision you could make. In this case, your current situation is not a total waste. How else can you know how well you are suited for any particular profession, without gambling a year or two of your life on it, just to see if it is right for you?

Four Elements of an Excellent Career

The following Venn diagram illustrates four important elements of any activity. Ideally, a good career should include all of them. These elements are discussed below.

1. The Pink Circle – What you have, that other people want or need.
2. The Turquoise Circle – If you find something you can do, that people are willing to pay money for, then that is enough to form a source of income for yourself.
3. The Green Circle – The right career for you is one in which you have shown some natural talent.
4. The Yellow Circle – If you happen to enjoy doing it, then that is a strong motivator to make a career out of it.

Each of these categories are further discussed below.

What You Have That the World Needs

It may be a skill, such as Colonel Sanders cooking, or some knowledge, like how to make or repair something, or even just a really good idea, like Bill Gates had with the Windows OS, which allowed everyone to use the computer, instead of only technical geeks. Find a way to monetize this asset.

The thing that you're good at may even be something that you don't think is special or valuable. For example, when I was younger, I had a speech impediment. It was embarrassing, and other children ridiculed me. My speech therapist taught me to talk slowly and enunciate my words very clearly, so that people could understand me, and this is a habit I've carried ever since then. Later, I had a minor operation on my tongue that allowed me to pronounce words correctly, but I still had the habit of talking slowly and clearly, which was annoying to many native speakers. When I came to Asia, I discovered that my embarrassing habit was the very same quality that made me one of the best English teachers in Taiwan. Now, I'm no longer ashamed of it, because I'm making NT$1,000/hour on it.

In addition to this, I've always had trouble making decisions and taking initiative, because I see very clearly how complicated and irreversible every choice is. I've received a lot of ridicule about this too, and some people have even called me weak or even faithless. I forgive their shortsightedness. I can immediately size up a given topic on several levels, from many perspectives, and describe it very clearly in words. Furthermore, I understand the gravity of even the smallest decisions, and how they have huge, eternal consequences. (A lot of Americans have this idea that people who talk slowly, also think slowly, and since I'm slow to decide, they think it is evidence that my mind is on the moon, but that is definitely not the case with me.)

Now, putting these two qualities together, my teaching ability, and my analytical insight, I've found that being a Lecturer or Professor in Asia is the perfect career for me. Once this has been recognized, there only remains the duty to achieve this goal, which means long years of study and doing research, which I might not always LIKE. (But actually I do!)

What People Will Pay Money For

One rule of success is to do things that other people can't, or don't want to do. These tend to be things that others will pay money for. The good thing is that there are always plenty of these jobs available, and one can use such a job to pay the bills until something better comes along. The downside to this is that such jobs are typically low-quality – they are hard, dirty, low pay, and/or thankless occupations.

What You're Good At

For example, Colonel Sanders cooked chicken since he was 6 years old. We don't know whether he LIKED to cook chicken, but he was definitely good at it, because everyone else LIKED to eat his chicken.

The Meyers-Briggs Personality Assessment, and all of the concepts behind it, has been very helpful to millions of people in finding the type of career that fits their natural abilities. If you haven't yet taken the Meyers-Briggs Personality Type Inventory, then do so as soon as possible.

What You Love To Do

Feeling passionate about your work is the rare icing on the cake. There is a good argument that people should not only follow their passion, because without the other three supporting aspects described above, you will be overlooked in favor of your competitors. However, if one does feel passionate about doing things that other people want or need, what people will pay money for, and something one is good at, then one will likely find that success will come all that much easier, simply because one enjoys doing it, and probably spends a lot more spare time mastering one's skill set.

Conclusions

So in summary, there are a few steps in finding your "perfect career", which form the acronym DIRECTOR.

1. Determine your personal wealth – what it is that you have, that other people want or need.
2. Identify products or services that people are willing to pay money for.
3. Recognize your Talents, Abilities, Skills, and Knowledge (TASK).
4. Examine the strengths and weaknesses of your personality.
5. Come to know yourself – who you are, and what you can do.
6. Target how you can integrate all of the above assets within a career in question.
7. Open your mind. Make a choice. If it doesn't work out, try something different.
8. Resolve to succeed. Make the effort to reach your potential. Don't give up or get lazy!

The last step is where most people fail. Sir Winston Churchill, who also had a speech impediment, but coupled it with a determined resolve that saved Britain during World War II, said,

> "Never, never, never… give up!"

Finally, I have been extremely successful in helping many of my students choose a career in which they are happy and successful. If you feel this is too daunting of a task, then I would be glad to meet with you to discuss the matter.

GOALS and PURPOSES

Jack · 11 September 2009 · Archived copy · Original

One very important thing I learned from my advisor during my graduate study, is to think of one's activities in terms of GOALS and PURPOSES.

What is the difference between a goal and a purpose?

A GOAL is WHAT I want to do or achieve.

A PURPOSE is WHY I want to do or achieve any particular goal.

Rick Warren has described pertinent details of itinerant Christian purposes in his book, The PURPOSE Driven Life. But it's really up to each individual to choose his or her own appropriate GOALS in life, and there just aren't any books on this subject, unfortunately. So, it's very important to think of your own personal life in terms of your immediate and long term goals, so that your spiritual purpose can be realized.

I see that a lot of people coming to Church are like sheep looking for green grass and water, and sadly, some of the sheep are wounded or crippled. It would be more helpful for us to focus less on the "Thou shalt not…'s" of Christianity, and concentrate more on the "Thou shalt be…'s" – the "milk of the Word" or the promises of God which should lead us beside the quiet streams.

Last week, God had impressed on my heart that I should write more posts in this blog, in order to offer encouragement and teaching to our team. I decided that I've got to do what I can to "feed the sheep", as Jesus commanded His disciples to do. I just started writing down some solid guidance on what some people were struggling with, and mixed it with some visionary thoughts on what our fellowship ought to be like. Afterwards, I found that people responded, and that it did help people, so I just continued writing more posts, almost daily, this past week.

I do appreciate the medium of blogs, because many of us live far apart, and we cannot meet together on a daily basis, but we still need to be uplifted throughout the week. Blogging allows continual communication, as well as a permanent record that we may review at our own leisure, whenever the Holy Spirit should impress us with a memory of something we have read before.

A few people have expressed some surprise that I have valuable ideas and that I'm able to write well. (Thank you for the compliments!) I do see a lot of important things that other people do not seem to see, but on the other hand, I cannot see some things that are very obvious to most others. I believe that we are all like this to some extent. After all, this is what makes us different and unique, and it's also why we need fellowship with others to find a sense of completeness in the Lord.

The transactions of our past correspondences have made me realize that more must be done to establish good communications among us. I'm afraid that a few people may have misinterpreted my goals in writing the last few messages. It was not to garner sympathy or attention for myself. My main goal was to share my testimony and offer some insight and encouragement where it may be needed. My purpose is two-fold.

1. One purpose is to teach, encourage and edify others in our fellowship by the leading of God's wisdom. I have addressed this purpose very obviously in my messages.
2. The other purpose is to increase the communication among us.

It is my hope that, through sending more frequent messages, we might understand each other more deeply, and I do hope that some others take the effort to share their own insights from time to time. Sharing our sincere testimonies with others is a very powerful weapon in our spiritual struggles.

> Revelation 12:10-12

> [10] Then I heard a loud voice saying in heaven, “Now salvation, and strength, and the kingdom of our God, and the power of His Christ have come, for the accuser of our brethren, who accused them before our God day and night, has been cast down. [11] And they overcame him by the blood of the Lamb and by the word of their testimony*, and they did not love their lives to the death. [12] Therefore rejoice, O heavens, and you who dwell in them!*

Collective Strength and Division of Labor

Jack · 11 September 2009 · Archived copy · Original

In this message, I want to describe two very important and interdependent concepts that have Biblical origins and have become basic, foundational ideas of our church, larger businesses, government, military, and society in general. These two concepts are (1) Collective Strength, and (2) Division of Labor.

Collective Strength

To properly explain the idea of Collective Strength, let's suppose that there are two teams of people working on independent projects. The first group is comprised of individuals who each play special, personalized roles, and work in close cooperation with each other to complete all the tasks necessary to complete the project. The second group is comprised of members working independently and in competition amongst themselves. Typically, the first group is able to perform much more efficiently and produce higher quality work than the second group, and this is due to their "collective strength". To understand why this is so, please consider the following.

Upon observation of the first kind of group, each individual "contributes to" the success of the group. This means that there is not one person who is responsible for the success of the group, but they are all responsible to each other. This type of situation is likely to build strong relationships among the members, regardless of whether a success is achieved or not.

In the application of the second kind of group, there tends to be more disorganization, and the competition motivates some people to do certain tasks superfluously, while other tasks (usually the dirty, mundane and thankless ones) remain undone until a crisis arises. Each and every person is responsible for the success of them all. Therefore, if success is not achieved, there is likely to be bitter feuding and blame casting among the members, which commonly invokes jealousies and self-vindications, leading to a breakdown of their relationships.

For example, in 2002, I went to Fuzhou, China, with a group of Americans, to teach English to a large group of young people. We lived together at a summer camp for almost a month. After classes, we would swim and play basketball and other games. We formed two basketball teams: One team was only high-school-aged Chinese boys. The other team had all the American male teachers, and the average age of the American team was about 35. You'd think that those young Chinese boys, who played basketball every day, would run circles around the older, American teachers… right?

Wrong~! The Americans beat them hands down, every game~!

Why is that? It's because the Chinese culture does not teach young people about collective strength. Every one of those Chinese boys wanted to be the Michael-Jordan-styled leader of the team, so every time one of them got the ball, he would fight to keep it until he could make a basket, which was hardly ever, because the Americans would gang up and hound him until he lost possession. Whenever the American team got possession of the ball, they would pass it all around, among themselves, player to player, until one of them made a basket. A lot of the Chinese boys just stood and watched, because they didn't know to whom the ball would be passed next.

In witness of this phenomena, we arrive at the philosophical concept of collective strength, which reasons mathematically that "the whole is greater than the sum of the parts". In physics, this concept is addressed by what is called "superposition", and the same idea is utilized in engineering design, where many light, flimsy struts can be connected to form a very sturdy and rigid body. In psychology, "Gestalt therapy" uses this principle to give individuals a healthy and wholistic concept of one's self. In government, it is alluded to in the political axiom, "United we stand, divided we fall." Additionally, the most successful business enterprises commonly have divisions of specialized tasks, which are skillfully combined by the management to reach the desired ends. This brings us to the next topic – the division of labor.

Division of Labor

The idea of a division of labor is described very vividly in Exodus 18:13-26, which follows…

> [13] And so it was, on the next day, that Moses sat to judge the people; and the people stood before Moses from morning until evening. [14] So when Moses' father-in-law saw all that he did for the people, he said, "What is this thing that you are doing for the people? Why do you alone sit, and all the people stand before you from morning until evening?"
> [15] And Moses said to his father-in-law, "Because the people come to me to inquire of God. [16] When they have a difficulty, they come to me, and I judge between one and another; and I make known the statutes of God and His laws."
> [17] So Moses' father-in-law said to him, "The thing that you do is not good. [18] Both you and these people who are with you will surely wear yourselves out. For this thing is too much for you; you are not able to perform it by yourself. [19] Listen now to my voice; I will give you counsel, and God will be with you: Stand before God for the people, so that you may bring the difficulties to God. [20] And you shall teach them the statutes and the laws, and show them the way in which they must walk and the work they must do. [21] Moreover you shall select from all the people able men, such as fear God, men of truth, hating covetousness; and place such over them to be rulers of thousands, rulers of hundreds, rulers of fifties, and rulers of tens. [22] And let them judge the people at all times. Then it will be that every great matter they shall bring to you, but every small matter they themselves shall judge. So it will be easier for you, for they will bear the burden with you. [23] If you do this thing, and God so commands you, then you will be able to endure, and all this people will also go to their place in peace."
> [24] So Moses heeded the voice of his father-in-law and did all that he had said. [25] And Moses chose able men out of all Israel , and made them heads over the people: rulers of thousands, rulers of hundreds, rulers of fifties, and rulers of tens. [26] So they judged the people at all times; the hard cases they brought to Moses, but they judged every small case themselves.

Churches have a division of labor, comprised of pastors, trustees, deacons, staff members and volunteers, who serve the entire church.

Governments have a division of labor, made up of courts, legislatures, departments, and cabinets.

Strong, Godly marriages have both collective strength and a division of labor.

For a further study of collective strength and division of labor, read Ephesians 4, 1st Corinthians 12 and 14, the structure and practices of the Early Church, the 12 disciples under Jesus, and the Old Testament Israelities with their divisions and duties. These should provide a more thorough picture of collective strength and division of labor in the Bible.

Salt – Matthew 5:13

Jack · 12 September 2009 · Archived copy · Original

This short post examines the Biblical analogy of salt with the believer, with several takeaways.

1. The Power of Salt

One grain of salt changes the taste of food. The Lord makes a tremendous statement, saying, in effect, "You disciples are simple, inconspicuous, and insignificant, far more helpless than you realize, for only I know how you will fail me and how often you will disgrace my name. You, little minority of believers, you are the salt of the earth." Jesus did not say, "You should be," or "You must be," but, "You are the salt." In other words, He said, "the whole world through every age is salted by you. You will be its only salt to hinder it's corruption."

Do you realize the greatness of Christ in you? (For the answer, see 1st John 4:4.) Do you know that Christ within the tiny minority of true believers in the world today produces a power and directing of the world that is comparable to the power driving a great ship? Little did the twelve apostles and disciples realize at this time that throughout every age the influence of men indwelt by Christ would penetrate every corner of the known world, giving new savor to life and holding back the terrifying sweep of evil. History has recorded it.

2. The Function of Salt

Salt has two functions: (1) It gives savor to otherwise insipid food, and (2) it hinders corruption. The Lord did not tell His disciples that they were the honey of the world. Yet, some Christians are so sweet and inoffensive that they try to sweeten all bitterness and suffering, giving a one-sided image of a loving God, with a Pollyanna kind of optimism by which they seek to conceal the harshness of guilt and the consequences of sin. These persons act as though there were no devil or hell, and therefore, no temptation or punishment. However, Jesus used stern illustrations and spoke openly of sin, of hell, of Satan, and of guilt before God, as well as of all God's tender love and gracious forgiveness.

If we are to be salt, we cannot coat everything with honey-covered words. We must ourselves know what God says in His Word. We must give the whole counsel of God whether it is fashionable to do this or not. We are committed to the whole truth of God, for this is the salt that hinders corruption.

Salt hurts sometimes, but it also heals. Our world is a place of decay and rottenness because salt is lacking. Decay has even penetrated the nominal Christian Church. Although many of the noblest things of the world are traced to their Christian heritage, we must recognize that the world system in which we live is slowly depleting it. Our Christian heritage has already lost much of its' savor. For this reason, we need Christians who will move as salt to hinder the corruption, and to bring meaning to life and healing to those who are caught up in the disintegrating whirl of the secular world.

3. The Usefulness of Salt

As long as Christians are content to mix only with other believers, they are like salt in a saltshaker – useless to the world around them. Salt is useful only when it loses itself in food. It is so easy and comfortable to stay with Christians in the "Saints' Club" of your church. It is so hard to be alone, or working with a few others, in the "dough" that has no "salt" in it but you. However, to stay in the saltshaker is ultimately to lose your savor. You say, "I stand absolutely alone in my family." "I am the only Christian in my office." "There is no Christian witness in my neighborhood."

You can take comfort that you are the one grain of salt in these places. Christ in you is sufficient to "salt" your entire godless circle. This is a promise given to lonely persons. For instance, when impure or tasteless jokes are going around, you are the one person who salts the insipid corruption.

When you give back good for evil, when you forgive instead of taking revenge, you deliberately bring a savor of Christ into a place where such conduct is not known. When you speak up in a committee for the truth you know, in the Spirit (not of your own opinionated self), you bring the “salt” of Christ into this situation.

When you speak of God our refuge and of confidence in Him to your partner who is in a panic or when you alone choose to trust openly in God to bring the family through some trial, you hinder the course of corruption, of unbelief and unhappiness – you are salt. Christ is the salt.

To the extent you allow him to have free course in your mind, emotions, and will, you also are salt. You must not go the way of the world around you; you must be salt. On the other hand, you must get out into the world – into neighborhood and workplace situations – to fulfill your mission.

Personal Wealth and Service

Jack · 12 September 2009 · Archived copy · Original

Children and extremely poor people think that wealth and riches are the same, but they are not… There is a difference! Being rich means you have a lot of money in the bank, or valuable possessions like a nice car or a nice home. But the things that make one rich can be spent or lost.

On the other hand, personal wealth is less tangible, but more valuable. Every person has some form of wealth, whether they realize it or not. Real wealth is something you can never really lose, but you can fail to obtain the rewards of it.

So, what is your wealth?

Wealth is anything you have that other people want or need!

It may be a skill, such as Colonel Sanders' cooking, or some knowledge, like how to make or repair something, or even just a really good idea, like Bill Gates had with the Windows OS, which allowed everyone to use the computer, instead of only technical geeks. It may even be something that you don't think is special or valuable, but other people do!

Most people who are successful, like Colonel Sanders or Bill Gates, are people who used whatever personal wealth that they had, to meet the wants or needs of their customers or consumers. These people did not think of themselves as servants, but that is exactly what they were. They met the needs and requests of others, and received monetary compensation. By doing so, they turned their wealth into riches. Neither do people think of them as servants, but only as very rich, famous and successful men.

A lot of people envy their success, but they can't reach the same results in life because they don't understand the Biblical principle of service, which states, "He who serves is the greatest of all!" (Matthew 23:10-11;Mark 10:35-45; Luke 22:24-30)

Instead, most people living in the world have a false idea that servanthood is a kind of semi-voluntary slavery, and they cannot ascribe any honor or value to it. Those people do not have a Christ-like view of service, and we should not share the same. They have adopted the popular view of our culture, which dictates that "He who rules is the greatest of all!" In the flesh, this might be true, but as Christians, we should cultivate a spirit that has the power to overrule the flesh.

Understanding the Biblical Concept of Servanthood

Jesus became a servant of God, and of men, in his life and ministry on earth, but by no means did he ever give up his power or his identity. (Matthew 20:28)

Servanthood is not to be confused with the obsequious habit of "people-pleasing", or being a "nice guy", which lacks any purpose other than obtaining the favor of others. (Matthew 6:1-4)

The purpose of servanthood is to somehow enhance the quality and value of other peoples' lives.

Scripture states that the righteous are those who serve God, whereas the unrighteous do not. (Malachi 3:18; Matthew 4:10)

The people being served want to have better, more joyful and more meaningful lives, and they're even usually willing to pay for it!

So the idea that servanthood has no honor or value is completely false.

Conclusions

Paul Hewson, a very famous and successful singer, performer and political entity, once said, “The God I believe in, isn’t short on cash!”

I hope this message has thrown a new light on your own personal value.

Think about these questions for a moment…

- What is your wealth?
- How can you use your wealth to serve God and others in the Biblical sense?

If we have the insightful perspective to find our wealth – our usefulness to the world and to God, the humility to accept it, and the determination to achieve it, then we might also be as successful as Sanders, Gates, Hewson, or whomever you may admire for their service.

An Analysis of Strongholds

Jack · 19 September 2009 · Archived copy · Original

[Eds. note: Crass site warning.]

What is a Stronghold?

A stronghold is Christian-talk for a typically bad lifestyle that is hard to change. It is hard to change because there are a number of habitual thought processes, life states, and modes of operation that one is accustomed to, and which reinforce each other. As a result, real change is difficult to adhere. To change all of these things takes a lot of discipline, will power, and in some cases, fasting. While it is true that such changes are indeed challenging to enact, they are not impossible. The Holy Spirit makes this change possible, and faith in God is a necessary part of getting free. In Matthew 21:21-22, Jesus tells us,

> [21] "Assuredly, I say to you, if you have faith and do not doubt, you will not only do what was done to the fig tree, but also if you say to this mountain, 'Be removed and be cast into the sea,' it will be done. [22] And whatever things you ask in prayer, believing, you will receive."

If we believe Jesus to be speaking truthfully, then we cannot admit the possibility of our powerlessness in the hands of "fate". So then why do Jesus' words seem so ethereal, as if it were all a fairy tale?

Examples of Strongholds

Some examples of strongholds include the following…

1. Stewardship

Most people work really hard, just to make a buck. Payday comes, then the bills are paid, and we're wondering where the money went. Then we're looking forward to the next weekend, or the next payday. We aren't living extravagantly, in our own opinion, but after working our whole lives, we've only saved enough money for a modest retirement.
In contrast, you may have read articles about people who win the lottery, and then they lose all the money within the next few years. You probably said to yourself, "That idiot! How could they lose millions of dollars in just a few years like that?" I thought the same thing the first few times I heard about it.

Then I heard about a TV show on the subject, and read articles about the topic. It turns out that it happens a lot more than you'd think. I've even heard estimates that said that MOST people who win the lottery lose all the money within the first five years after winning.

In fact, ANY type of financial change turns out to be extremely stressful on anyone – rich or poor! So why is that?

2. Life Purpose

Another example might include people who develop crime-ridden lifestyles as a youth and wind up in jail for a good part of their lives. They never seem to change. Once they get out of jail, they go right back to stealing cars, doing drugs, and their other violent behaviors. They know it's wrong. They know they'll eventually go to jail if they continue. So why do they continue? Why are they throwing their lives away?
Then again, we all know of someone who just seems to get all the lucky breaks, all the time. Every day is a picnic for them, because their life is so smooth and happy. They couldn't screw something up, even if they tried. You may have thought to yourself, "I wish I had it as good as him!" Or perhaps more critically, "What's he got, that I don't?"

3. Relationships

Anytime you meet a very famous or popular person, something touches your heart and you get this feeling inside that this person is special and exciting, or maybe they make a strong impression of merely being “real”. You get this notion that you’ve got to see more of them. They actually have some control over you! But it’s not because they’re popular. No, they are popular because they can naturally make people feel the same magic that you felt. Maybe they don’t even know it. But they do know how to deal with all the people whom they attract.

On the other hand, there are other people who are continually greeted by, “Oh, sh*t… Here comes George!” (or whoever) Every person in the general population takes small pains to avoid these people, and no one really knows why, except that there is something very peculiar about them. They might go to back-breaking efforts to improve their social interactions, but all their efforts are always interpreted as childish, insipid or comical. If we were to make a checklist of personal qualities, they might seem to have what it takes, but for some reason, they just can’t make it work. Compared to the average person, they are more polite and sincere, they work harder, they’re more loving and loyal, but invariably, they are continually rejected, and someone else is chosen over them.

The Analysis

So what is going on here? Let’s take a deeper look at what is involved with change.

There are three parts of a stronghold that all need to be dealt with, before a lasting change can be achieved. These three parts, I’ll call out here.

1. The Mind – having basic knowledge, proper (or poor) education, the lessons of experience, coherent thought processes, resourcefulness and the imagination.
2. The Heart – Our self-image, faith, our notions of what is true, good or right, the objects of our hope, our desires, our love for life, and the things that make us joyful or passionate.
3. The Flesh – Our natural “bent”, our gender and all its’ characteristics, the personality, temperament, and habits.

There is a fourth element, which is an operant of these three.

4. The Will – what we choose to do, say, or feel, as much as is within our control.

The will is very influential towards our experience of any particular matter. For example, if there is something that we want to happen in life, but we cannot seem to make it happen, then we are likely to feel very frustrated and unhappy. We might even feel out of control, or as if things happen against our will, which confuses the ego. Over time, this experience becomes detrimental to our self-esteem and produces feelings of resentment.
On the other hand, if things go the way we wish, we are likely to feel joy and elation, and with repetition, self-confidence and proficiency can be developed.
A lot of psychologists and spiritual counselors frequently talk about the need to “accept one’s self” or “embrace change” or “face difficulties”. They are merely saying, in personal language, that we should change our will to match the reality of life – not because it is “right” to focus on the grit, but instead, by doing so, we bring our attention to the place where we touch other people, the outside existence, and thereby, eternity and God.
Most religions address this transcendentally, by focusing on the goal of becoming “one” with God and nature, or “the indwelling of the Holy Spirit”, etc. But in the real-time execution, it doesn’t appear to have any glory at all. We are faced with day-to-day mundane tasks, such as long hours of reading and tedious study, the trouble of making mistakes, learning from those mistakes and trying again and again (The Mind); experiencing the trials of love, faithfulness, failure and death, finding that we are imperfect and incomplete, and struggling to rectify our wants with the needs of others around us (The Heart); learning skills in using our body, our personality, talents and inclinations, as tools to produce a profitable outcome in our life, as opposed to a wasteful or destructive existence (The Flesh). The will is where we engage all these things.
In overcoming strongholds, I believe that a LOT of it has to do with changing one’s SELF-IMAGE, because this can address all four of these points. But it’s incredibly difficult for people to change the way they think of themselves. It would be easier for them to donate organs than it would be to accept themselves.

Take the example of the people who won the lottery.

In their minds, they don't know what to DO with all that money. They never learned how to manage finances. They don't know anything about how to use money, about the value of a dollar, or the cost of opportunity, and they are certainly not able to seek out or even recognize a good investment when it appears.
In their hearts, they still see rich people as being strange and extravagant or even cold and greedy, even though they are rich themselves. So, they don't have any friends who could teach them something about money, even if they should happen to be teachable! Furthermore, they cannot see themselves as someone who has achieved anything, nor as someone who is a trusted steward, administering a supply to others.
In the flesh, these people typically have unconstrained habits of chasing after many whims and petty desires, which have little real value but lots of enjoyable dissipation. They have no source of discipline, nor have they developed a character that can make them stable and effective as a rich person.
In totality, they have the self-image of being a poor person, and that image is stronger and more powerful than the REALITY that they're living – the reality of winning the lottery and having the money. The picture in their minds is so powerful that they subconsciously MAKE IT REAL. They continue in their old ways, living a consumptive lifestyle, only on a larger scale, made possible by their enlarged fortunes. On a more basic level, they don't know how to act with so much money, and this leads them to make all kinds of mistakes and fiscal blunders, and they ruin any further chance of success for themselves.
In fact, THAT is faith in action – but it's faith in the wrong concepts. Even if they have a conscious will to be responsible with their new found riches, the inadequacies in those other three areas, the mind, heart and flesh, will eventually prove to be their downfall. So in the final, they lose all they have gained. Their real poverty is not in being fiscally poor, but in never realizing the higher quality of life that they could have had. So we could say, in literatively powerful terms, that such a person is in bondage to a stronghold of poverty.
Similar examples could be had for our life purpose and our relationships, as well as many other applications to our lives.

The Challenge

OK… so now what?
Perhaps now you've got some ideas in your head about your own situation, and you're thinking maybe this is the time to try something new and different. But you're wondering how much you should expect from yourself, from others, or from God.
Give your self and your faith a chance to grow! Rome wasn't built in a day!
We'll see gradual changes, day by day. But sooner, rather than later, we should see the kinds of things happening in our lives that we have been waiting and hoping for, deep in our hearts.
Now you're asking, "What can I do? I'm so insignificant."
Maybe… or maybe not!
I suggest, for the time being, that you do the best with whatever is in your hands at the present time. We all play a small part in the grand scheme of things. Those "mountains" might require some time to move!
But from reading the Bible, we see that, within three years, the disciples had developed the ability to work many of the same miracles that Jesus himself did.
If we consider the passage from Matthew 17:14-21, we see that several of the disciples were frustrated in the will because they could not cure a boy's epilepsy. They obviously had the knowledge and training, because they had done this before. Jesus pointed out the problem in their "lack of belief", which is an insufficiency, or an insincerity of their faith in God – essentially a failure of the heart. He did not say that their mind or flesh was weak. However, He added that prayer and fasting is necessary to gain a mastery over this certain point.
So we find there is a fifth element to consider in overcoming a stronghold.

5. The Spirit – This includes: (1) God the Father, Jesus, The Holy Spirit, and His army of believers. (2) Satan and his minions, the principalities and powers of this world.

These are two spiritual entities at war against each other. How do we fit into this battle?

In some queues of life, we need something outside ourselves to ascend into the “heavenly realms”. We need the Power of God to become someone who is in control of our lives, independent of circumstances, instead of one who is “controlled”. People have realized this for millennia, and have approached it in a multitude of ways. It’s why we need the Gospel.
Consider the words of Jesus in Matthew 21:22.

Jesus basically gives us a blank check! Do we believe it and use it? Or are we saving it for a theoretical “rainy day”. If so, then what qualifies as a rainy day? Shouldn’t we be practicing instead?
Perhaps there are those who might even rationalize this promise as being a mere admonishment to pray. Or worse yet, we could label it as being “not realistic” or even “heresy”, and say to ourselves, very self-righteously, that we should not “stretch the scriptures”.
If so, then what is the value of these scriptures? Would you rather wait until you meet God face-to-face, before you give it a try, so that you can confirm it as being true before you invest any effort on it?

Conclusions

Generally speaking, most people never deviate very far from the life they were “born into”. Most people have this idea of “fate”, or the attitude of “this is just my lot in life”, which is rather hopeless and souless. People who are a little more spiritually colorful may say, “It must be God’s will for my life!” or “I should bloom where I’m planted.” But the idea, and the effect, is the same.

They really don’t believe it possible to realize any true, lasting changes, either for the better or the worse. New Year’s resolutions are pointless. There are even some people who sincerely believe in a “miraculous Savior”, but they can’t even stop smoking or wasting time on the internet.

The real pity is that no one questions it! We consider it a small miracle if we can get out of bed on time, and we praise the grace of God for it!

It’s nice, and even necessary, to have a thankful attitude, but the bottom line is, you’re a buffoon if you can’t devise and enact even a simple plan of action and carry it through to a successful completion. So then, should the thankfulness of a sloppy, bungling buffoon be worthy of admiration?

Is God really pleased with that kind of “faith”?

I suspect that such people are intoxicated with sins of complacency. Or perhaps they are comfortable enough to believe they are “waiting on God”.

If this is you, I urge you to WAKE UP, stop clowning around, and take some actions to improve your life. This is your life – the one and only! For your own sake, make it count!

Time is ticking… people are searching for life… and you’re still sitting there with a pleasant smile and starry eyes…

The Perspectives of the “Thrifty” (or Stingy)

Jack · 21 September 2009 · Archived copy · Original

The Story

I have a friend Chloe* who was extremely thrifty & stingy. She counts every penny and couldn’t even let go of thirty cents. (US$0.30). Whenever we went out for a coffee with our friends (two other girls), the three of us would treat each other to some goodies, but we would never do this for Chloe, because Chloe seemed to focus on people who always treated her preferentially by giving her treats or favors.

On several occasions, we shared a cab fare and she contributed around NT$20 more than the rest of us. Instead of absorbing the expense, she would list that down as our debt to her, while the rest of us would have just let it go and enjoyed the favor of being treated the next time around. In short, her scrooginess always disrupted our enjoyment of the evening. We knew there were more important things in life that deserved our appreciation, but she didn’t seem to know that.

One time, I asked her to come with me to meet a guy from another country who was a “first-timer”. In my mind, I thought I should give him a treat, since he was new and just started working. I thought of myself as a “Big Sister”, since I have already been working for three years, and I had more money. So, I paid for all our drinks in the end. Chloe was really surprised and told me that I never did such a thing to her before. I told her that I do this for certain people on occasion, but in my mind, I was thinking, “but maybe not for you”.

Even her own friends didn’t feel generous towards her.

Many other times, she made public, verbal commitments to buy something from someone else, such as a sofa or a scooter, or to share some expenses with others (i.e. her roommates). But at the last minute, she would back out, saying the price was too high, or that she would rather save her money instead. As a result of her vacillation, other people were forced to accept greater expenses, rather than forfeit the whole enterprise.

For example, the man who had agreed to sell the scooter to her, had to, instead, sign it over to his roommate at a fraction of the cost, because he was leaving the country the next day. Neither that man nor his roommate, were happy about that, and Chloe seemed to remain ignorant of her transgression.

My point here is that her attitude was focused on money so much, that her problems got extremely worse than her stinginess.The more she displayed such an attitude, the more it developed into a bondage or stronghold.

For example, later on, I heard from some mutual acquaintances, that several other people I didn’t know had failed in their financial transactions with her. It seemed that people began to recognize her habit of being scroogy and unsteady, and they deliberately cut her out, in order to secure a solid deal.

Hearing this made me quite sad, because I really cared for her as a friend. In fact, she believed in Christ as a result of our friendship, so I felt somewhat responsible for not helping her more. I’ve always wanted her to know that there are certain small events in life that are more meaningful and worthy of experiencing, in exchange of money. On the other hand, I know that everyone of us has our own struggles within our hearts and this is hers.

Recently, Chloe lost her job and I’ve heard that she has been struggling even more, being in a state of financial instability, but I believe that God is still working on her about this stronghold.

The Analysis

This story brings new meaning to the old Biblical adage, “Do unto others as you would have them do unto you”

(Matthew 7:12; Luke 6:31;). And I think this rings true in this case, too. Note that people responded to Chloe in much the same manner as she treated others. As long as we remain in true fellowship, or even just sharing a mutual agreement on something with a common purpose, each person's strongholds, good or bad, tend to wear off onto the others. That's why it's important to choose friends who can have a positive influence on us, and not a negative one.

As seen here, our actions affect the actions of others, but it's important to realize that the power is not in the actions themselves. It's in the SPIRIT of the action – and this is a key point that we need to consider in every area of our lives. It's why "good intentions" don't suffice. Chloe may conscientiously have had good intentions to use her money wisely, which is truly important, but she neglected the spirit of generosity and servanthood, and reviled the spirit of fellowship in the execution.

Likewise, people learned to respond to Chloe in a similar spirit. It is easy to see here, why her "faithful diligence in finance" brought her cursings instead of blessings. In fact, Chloe's root sin is not greed, but a form of gluttony that demands formal and exact transactions to feed the ego. If Chloe's egotistical conditions cannot be met, then she invariably rejects the choice and preserves her satiety. But this kind of soul-food costs Chloe her social security.

When we are spiritual babies, we can do nothing but respond to the spirits we are exposed to. Making ourselves do what is right, only because it is right, and not because we believe in it, will have limited effects, and it will come across as cold, hollow and hypocritical to others. Making efforts to change our actions or habits, without first addressing our spiritual state, will only abrade our will power and fatigue our emotions. If continued, the heart will rebel. But as we cultivate a sensitive awareness of our own spiritual odor, we gradually learn to make efforts to instigate and broadcast an appropriate SPIRIT for each occasion; one that instills an obedience that resonates through our whole being, and brings salt and light into the lives of those around us. This is the Holy Spirit in us!

Interestingly, Chloe's "Christian" friends (???) are just as guilty as Chloe, because they allowed her spiritual ignorance to go unchecked. In fact, by excluding Chloe from the same treatments of generous fellowship usually shown to others (even to strangers, such as the newcomer), they actually enforced Chloe's stronghold, leaving her spiritually isolated, and feeling rejected.

Recall that the speaker admits her guilt after Chloe's condition worsened, expressing it as "sadness", but the speaker is equally ignorant of her own share of responsibilities, because she states,

> "God is still working on (Chloe) about this stronghold."

On the surface, this statement may sound like a statement of faith, but it's actually a veiled expression of contempt and condemnation on Chloe's transgressions. She even expresses carelessness and hopelessness by saying,

> "…everyone of us has our own struggles within our hearts and this is hers."

So in effect, the speaker is excusing her poor response to Chloe by deposing a rationalization, falsely believing she is exonerated.

It is also worth noting that conflicts and sufferings can only help us mature if we are aware of these things. We see that Chloe's sufferings continue, but she is not learning from her mistakes or maturing, because everyone treats her the same way that she treats them, (which is contrary to scripture!) Chloe is unaware of what she is doing and what is happening to her. She needs to learn how to put aside the false notions that supercede her discernment, and Chloe's FRIENDS need to start BELIEVING in her, and in God, by giving her the loving fellowship that is necessary to open her eyes to her true spiritual state. It is doubtful that Chloe will wake up to her condition anytime soon, without the support of a GENUINE Christian fellowship.

Jack · 2 October 2009 · Archived copy · Original

It seems that a lot of people are not aware of the difference between a “confession” and a “profession”, and so they stumble through life, unaware of the impact of their words.

So I’ll pose the question here.

What is the difference between a “confession” and a “profession”?

A lot of people have this false notion about confession, that if they publicize their faults and mistakes in a “humble” manner, then 1st John 1:9 applies.

> [9] “If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness.”

But later, they continue in the same problems, with the naïve interpretation that “the flesh is strong”, and that these habits may yet abate if they bring them up again in a “confession” to God. In effect, their “confession” has no cleansing power. It is merely a public reminder of their problems and difficulties in life, which tends to stagnate and become boorish with every review.

Furthermore, bitter and vengeful people, as well as Satan, may use such a public epithet of mind to barrage that person, and others, with accusations, with the intent of causing them all to lose heart, and to emphasize their temptations. So in the final, this person’s habits actually multiply their transgressions by creating psychological walls that propagate the very same poor behaviors. In effect, this person is habitually making a PROFESSION of his ignominy. This borders on foolishness, because the power of his tongue and his mind is propping up his base sin. While in fact, the power of these bad habits would be struck down if this person would simply commit himself to stop talking and stop thinking about them, and focus harder on a direct application of themselves to their life.

By comparison, another, perhaps well-meaning man may have some secret sin of the heart, and he intentionally avoids all conscious thought about this sin, bemusing himself to be a pious believer. He believes that talking about those things would make those sins “become true”, and subject him to needless temptations and difficulties in life. What he doesn’t understand is that telling others about this sin would be a true CONFESSION, and those temptations and difficulties are things he needs to work through, before he can rightfully claim to be an overcomer.

The fact is that most people resist true and effective forms of CONFESSION, because of the crucible of refinement that it would bring. Likewise, most people resist true and effective forms of PROFESSION, because of the discrimination and persecution it would bring. When people stay in the comfort zone between confession and profession, they are quickly going nowhere.

St. John writes a warning from Christ to believers such as these.

> [15] “I know your works, that you are neither cold nor hot. I could wish you were cold or hot. [16] So then, because you are lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will vomit you out of My mouth.

Even while among other believers, Christians themselves, resist making a PROFESSION, because they say they don’t want to “appear proud”, or “draw attention to themselves”. But those are white lies from a pretentious, plastic hell. Actually, they don’t want to swallow their pride and admit their dependency on Christ, even for the edification of others. Such people are unaware of the power of their words.

> Revelation 12:11

> [11] And (the believers) overcame (Satan) by the blood of the Lamb and by the word of their testimony, and they did not love their lives to the death.

A testimony is a short cohesive story, based on one's actual experiences, that conveys a profession of faith to the listeners. It's an integral part of the lives of those in true fellowship with Christ and one another.

Why is a Profession so powerful and important in encouraging others to overcome sin through Confession?

We each set forth a spiritual mood through each and every action. Thus, those who profess encourage others to confess. By doing so, believers reinforce each other's faith, and also invite others to become believers. Let's examine the scriptures on this question.

> Romans 10:8-13
> [8b] "The word is near you, in your mouth and in your heart" (that is, the word of faith which we preach): [9] that if you confess with your mouth the Lord Jesus and believe in your heart that God has raised Him from the dead, you will be saved. [10] For with the heart one believes unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation. [11] For the Scripture says, "Whoever believes on Him will not be put to shame." [12] For there is no distinction between Jew and Greek, for the same Lord over all is rich to all who call upon Him. [13] For "whoever calls on the name of the LORD shall be saved."

In this passage, it is clear that what we say, or what we DO NOT say, has "eternal" merit. The phrase, "in your mouth" implies your grammar and the content of your speech, which is a loaded gun, or a "two-edged sword", acting as a device of the heart.

> Luke 6:43-45

You may hold certain things close to your heart, but they will go unnoticed by others until you say something. Typically, you will be judged by the words from your mouth, because your verbalized perspective is loaded with your own, possibly false, notions about the way things are. In effect, whatever comes out of our mouths, is what we share and spread to the people around us.

Also, be aware of your words during prayer! Even the sacrament of prayer is not a safe haven from vain confessions and false professions. It's almost as if you would be lying to God's face.

When does a Confession become a Profession?

Our faith takes some time to grow and develop into reality, as expressed in our grammar, our speech, our habits, our skill level, and our relationships. Something that we value and cherish should not be "professed" until we've developed the confidence to own it publicly. If we try to "profess" it before it has matured, then we only subject ourselves to unnecessary risks of spoiling it in its' formative stage. But after a certain level of confidence and proficiency have been attained, a public acknowledgment of the behavior would be a profession, and not a confession, and would be beneficial towards its' further strengthening. Consider the following comparison between the shepherds and Mary, upon hearing the news of Jesus.

> [17] "Now when (the shepherds) had seen (the baby Jesus), they made widely known the saying which was told them concerning this Child. [18] And all those who heard it marveled at those things which were told them by the > shepherds. [19] But Mary kept all these things and pondered them in her heart. [20] Then the shepherds returned, glorifying and praising God for all the things that they had heard and seen, as it was told them."

Why did the shepherds talk about everything they heard and saw, while Mary remained silent on the matter? The scriptures don't spell it out specifically, but upon reflection, we see that the shepherds glorified God and spread the good news through the word of their testimonies, but somehow, it was not Mary's place to do the same.

Why not? Why wouldn't Jesus' own mother have a more powerful testimony?

It's a spiritual principle that cannot be very well explained in rational thought. But there's a graphic quip I recall from my adolescent days:

> "Those who talk about IT, are NOT DOING IT!"

…and as I recall, this saying was true almost 100% of the time. The people who kept silent on any issue that was being hotly discussed among their peers, were either socially detached people who liked to condemn small talk, or they had some experience themselves, in that matter.

It's a kind of wisdom to stay silent on a matter, and this is mentioned, not once or twice, but three times in proverbs.

> Proverbs 11:13
> "A talebearer reveals secrets, but he who is of a faithful spirit conceals a matter."
> Proverbs 12:23
> "A prudent man conceals knowledge, but the heart of fools proclaims foolishness."
> "It is the glory of God to conceal a matter, but the glory of kings is to search out a matter."

It's another kind of wisdom, which requires some discernment, to know when to speak, and when to shut up!

It's a third kind of wisdom, and a little more difficult, to know WHAT to say when it's the right time to speak, and HOW to say it well.

If we think about this phenomenon in terms of Confession vs. Profession, the nature of it becomes a little clearer. It is also insightful to realize that there is a proud, subtle envy that arises in people who selfishly imagine they are in competition with others in the spiritual sense, and often times, the leaders of any group, are the very people who dampen our spirits, because they are afraid their subordinates might climb over their heads and put them to shame. These leaders cannot truly believe Romans 10:11, and their leadership suffers as a consequence. Such people are like crabs trying to climb out of boiling water by clinging to other crabs who are farther up the side of the pot than they are. But instead of advancing towards an escape, they only pull each other back down into the boiling pot!

Let's consider a real-world example of this. A ten year old boy is learning to play the piano. He is very thrilled and passionate about the music he plays, even though actually, he sounds quite poor. If he were to go around talking too much to everyone about his love for the piano, then a lot of others, likely to be his teachers and parents, would be tempted to criticize his passion, and point out his actual ability, and the difficulties he would face in life as a professional pianist. This experience would naturally lead the boy to become self-conscious and maybe even ashamed, and destroy his passion for playing the piano.

These people believe they are teaching the boy to think "realistically", but in the spiritual sense, their words are the tools of Satan to tear down the boy's hopes and dreams, and confine his heart to a "cage of reality", which will only condition him for a lifetime of spiritual bondage. Instead, he should be left to investigate his passions and interests freely and independently.

However, after some years of practice, the potential of the young pianist, his expertise and skill, cannot be affected by the faithless words of envious observers. Instead, a mere demonstration of his talent will silence their mouths and draw applause and recognition. It is at this time, that a public acknowledgment of being a pianist, as a profession, would bring him acclaim and further opportunities for success.

Ironically, the people who adopt these cynical attitudes towards our own value, are frequently those who are closest to us. This is why the Lord stated that a man's enemies will be of his own household. (Micah 7:6; Matthew 10:16-22)

Jesus is NOT saying here that it is implicitly wrong to trust another human being. We all need the companionship and support of other believers to experience the entirety of God. So here, it becomes important to distinguish between rebuke and mockery.

> Proverbs 27:5
> "Open rebuke is better than concealed love."

Rebuke is the opposite of mockery. Mockery excludes and rejects, whereas, rebuke includes and accepts. Rebuke corrects and aligns one with God's truth, whereas, mockery exposes and ridicules. Rebuke extols a profession, whereas, mockery elicits a confession. This is very important to understand and recognize, whenever we are confronted by someone. Are they rebuking us, or mocking us? Our appropriate response hinges on the answer.

How can a profession become a confession?

First of all, let's ask a different question, so that we can arrive at the answer with a proper perspective. Why does the Bible teach that we are to confess our sins? What is the role of confession?

The Greek word used for confess means "to agree with." When we confess our sins to our Heavenly Father, we are agreeing with Him. We are agreeing with His attitude about sin, along His own perspective. That is, we sincerely adopt the viewpoint that the behavior in question is detrimental to our life and the lives of others. (This is called "conviction".) Now, how can we judge whether something is detrimental or not? We must know God's word (the Bible), as well as God's purpose for our life. We must then decide whether this behavior is destructive to His purpose for our life, and whether it carries consequences that will prove painful.

It is possible, and quite common, unfortunately, that many people may not know something is wrong for them until they face very unpleasant consequences, which does not always occur. On the other hand, a lot of people don't know what's right for them, until they take a chance to try something new and different, and find success in a safely fostered environment, which normally doesn't occur without the concerted and directed efforts of a small group of believers. So, it is essential that we have a clear idea of what we are doing with our lives, and not be confused about our primary goals in life. A very rigorous and disciplined interpretation may even exclude any activity that is not beneficial towards God's purposes for our life, by labeling it as unproductive or even wasteful.

The ignorance about purpose is precisely why young people make a lot of stupid mistakes. They do not yet know what God's individual purposes are for their lives. They are investigating their potential and their passions, and finding the paths of life in their hearts. Satan works extra hard on adolescents, because a little confusion in the beginning can lead to lasting losses throughout life. Jesus said, "unless one enters into the Kingdom as a little child, he will by no wise enter in" (Matthew 18:1-14; Mark 10:13-16; Luke 18:15-17;). This is why extreme condemnation falls upon those who deceive the immature. When their thinking is misaligned, their identity is not destroyed, but it becomes highly unlikely that their potential will be fully realized. Young people need extra attention and help in "reaching forward to achieve that for which Jesus Christ took hold of them" (Philippians 3:12-16).

Now to address the original question, how can one change a habit that is already ingrained? In addition to aligning our perspective with that of God's, an effective confession requires that we assume responsibility for our actions, and that we do not blame our actions on others. In other words, we must utilize the will, the operant part of our being, to reverse our present course in life, and change the direction we are headed. Fortunately, change begins at the moment of conviction and confession of sin to the Lord. The process of purification, which purges one's life from a major sin (1st John 3), takes place when we face our sin regularly, and grow to share the same perspectives that God has. Prayer and close fellowship with other believers are important steps in bringing us to the threshold of repentance.

How do we overcome sin, addictions and other wrong, unproductive or controlling behaviors?

Wrong and unproductive behaviors are byproducts of one's misguided attentions to fantasies, which are usually self-centered. Fantasies which are centered on others, are borderline psychotic, if not lustful. False notions concerning God are more insidious, and are extremely difficult to overcome. In the Bible, these fantasies, or false notions, are called "idols".

Addictions, witchcraft and controlling behaviors play on a fantasy that has some root in reality, and satisfies a real need, although falsely, and is usually injurious to someone, in some form. Calling God's truth a fantasy, and labeling His behavior as controlling and injurious, although it might sometimes seem true from a human perspective, is a mild form of blasphemy, because this perspective doubts His power and authenticity, and denigrates His holy purposes.

Basically speaking in a case-by-case analysis, the concrete reality will always dominate the abstract mythos, even if the abstract entity is God's genuine truth. If the two are brought together, the reality will always overrule fantasy, or destroy it by mockery. It takes real faith to live according to God's abstract, in the concrete situations of everyday life. But if we make a PROFESSION of God's Word in faith, then our testimony has the power to overturn the ugliness of reality with God's alternate perspectives of irony. The mighty, terrible power of Satan over our lives then becomes rather "cute" and pathetic, while God's glory is manifested in our hearts, bringing us to tears of joy and the knowledge of God's grace.

The scripture which states that we should "bring the deeds of darkness into the light, that it may be taken away" (Romans 13:11-14; Ephesians 5:8-13;), is assuming that God's truth is in the real sense, found among a fellowship of believers, and urges us to expose, and confess sin by introducing it as a falsehood into the reality of God's love and grace. But, exposing and confessing sin to our unbelieving coworkers will do little to remedy the condition, as you could imagine.

For example, a young man who has an uncontrollable habit realizes that it is affecting his self-image and desires to stop. So, he begins to tell everyone about his problem. Of course, he offends a lot of people, and brings his family and friends to the point of shame. He may be extremely embarrassed, but he will not be in bondage to the habit any longer. He may face some negative social implications as a result, but at least he is free from the destructive behavior. Those social implications may be regarded as a punishment for doing the wrong things to begin with. The shame he experiences is not of Christ, but of his sins, which are now exposed.

On this note, it is quite easy for many people lacking discernment to mistake Christ for sin, because the Holy nature of the Son of God invariably thrusts sin into plain view for what it is. And, as stated earlier, it is quite rare for a person to realize all these things and willingly sacrifice his pride in order to escape the bondage he is in, especially when he may feel quite secure and comfortable in his state of delusion and bondage.

Why does it work this way? It is because "courage/faith replaces pride/delusion".

For example, we all know of some who have given a testimony that included some horrendous, ugly stories of their past lives. But curiously, they aren't ashamed or embarrassed at all, but they are quite comfortable in being brutally honest about themselves, and they give all glory to God. Even more curiously, the people listening to such a testimony do not lean toward contempt or judgment, but they look deeper into their own hearts, become more grateful for their own experiences in life, and they glorify God also. This kind of testimony is a confession that has metamorphed into a profession. It implies that they have truly overcome their bondage and that they are already free from it. Their faith is now strong enough to help others struggling through similar difficulties.

Think of the butterfly that emerges from the cocoon, after being transformed from a caterpillar. He must struggle a long time to escape from the sphinx, but the struggle makes him strong and fit to fly.

Conclusion

Here it is emphasized that we must be aware of "confession" vs. "profession".

Confession is essential towards changing the trajectory of one's life, and experiencing a release from guilt, tension, pressure, and emotional stress resulting from the sins of such a life. Until we change our life's trajectory by experiencing the conviction and confession of how we disagree with God, our wayward habits of mind and body ensure the continuation of both, those unnecessary negative feelings, and the negative behavior. By refusing to entertain the idea that God's perspectives are superior to our own notions of things, we cling to our unconfessed sin, and deny the Power of God's Word in our lives.

The close communion with a fellowship of faithful and gracious believers is an integral part of overcoming the barriers of dependence that we all experience. We experience the power of Christ when we are in the body of Christ. This is the same power found in therapy groups, such as Alcoholics Anonymous. In such an environment, the CONFESSION can be transformed into a PROFESSION of what God has done to rescue you, and save your life from a worthless and miserable existence. Christians typically call this, "salvation". If one's profession helps others escape a similar condition of sin, then it is called, "redemption".

How does a Woman Attract (and Keep) a Husband?

Jack · 5 October 2009 · Archived copy · Original

Foreword

In our Church's fellowship, there are a lot more women than men. Most of these women want to be married before too long, but there just aren't enough single Christian men to go around. To make matters worse, men in general tend to be committed towards avoiding commitment. Consequently, the competition for men gets brutal.

Recently, our friends, Josh and Yuna were married, in a very beautiful ceremony. Almost everyone was either crying or laughing. During the reception after the ceremony, a lot of the women in our fellowship were expressing their frustrations to me, and asking me what could be done about their situation. I told them some very general principles about attraction and mating that I knew they would never hear from their parents or from the Church sermons. They asked me to post those things here, so that they could continue to study and review in the future.

I was 33 years old when I first made these observations. (I'm 37 at the time of this writing.) I do not profess to be a "master of attraction", but I am a bonerfied man (dats east tennis saying fur "bona-fide", in case you'uns is thankin udderwoz), so I know what attracts men. I was also raised in a Southern Baptist Church, so I know what God's standards and expectations are for our relationships.

Three Necessary Qualities a Woman Must Have to Attract a Mate

The relationship between a man and wife has been ordained by God as the highest relationship on earth, because it represents His Nature and Glory most completely, compared to all other types of relationships. The trouble we face in the "convenience" of modern times is that people desperately crave all of the benefits that a relationship can bring, and they forget WHO that relationship is supposed to represent. Both men and women are guilty of disregarding their responsibilities to build Godly (or "Christian Archetype") relationships, but I'll focus more on the proper place of the woman in this essay.

I have observed three necessary qualities a woman must have in order to attract and keep a mate. Kindly note that I used the word "necessary" here, which means that a woman must have all three of these qualities, and if only one is missing or lacking in strength, then any chance of a relationship will completely vanish. Unfortunately, even having all three of these qualities is certainly not a sufficient condition for success!

So what are these three qualities?

1. A Woman Must be Reasonably Attractive.

You might have guessed this one, but it's a fact of life.

We should all agree that a "mature" relationship has a physical interaction, at some level. A woman's appearance should facilitate this interaction, and not become a barrier to it. Contrary to the opinions of many women, the tasteful expression of personality and style can be done with a lot of self-respect, without appearing "cheap and easy". In fact, a lot of men have the opinion that a self-respecting woman, by definition, is one who takes good care of her body and gives close attention to her appearance, whereas, trashy women do not, by definition. Sexual promiscuity is only one way that a woman can disrespect her body, and most of the other ways seem to be overlooked by most women, because they're too busy envying other women, instead of accepting and improving themselves. But men notice these things right away. (Keep reading for a list of these things.)

I've seen a lot of women get offended by this statement because of two, very unproductive lines of thought:

1. They think they're not beautiful enough to "qualify". They think they need a SMV > 8 to get into the game. They have this notion that they need to have a perfect model's figure, but that is not true. Women tend to focus on the things that men care very little about, and they become overly critical of their bodies. For example, a recent survey in Taiwan found that Taiwanese women are more concerned about their breast size, than Taiwanese men are! Read article here. [Eds. note: These women tend to be more innocent, that is, they have less sexual experience.]

2. They have an extremely immature view that men are despicable animals or male chauvinists; that men are unreasonably preoccupied with sex, and carelessly demanding about women, while failing to respect women properly. These women are also deeply offended by this caricature of men that they hold to be true, which may only be based on their own arrogant pride and self-sufficiency, and a highly selective memory of the truant playboys they have known in the past. They feel that they should not be required to change their opinions or habits for such a man. This line of thought is typical for an 8-year old girl, but for a 28-year old female, this attitude is revolting! [Eds. note: These women have gotten around, failed to rope an alpha, and have sabotaged a few beta contenders.]

Women who have accepted the truth that they must make themselves attractive, and who have successful relationships with men, know that the recipe for beauty is rather simple:

- Brush and floss your teeth every day, and see the dentist at least once a year.
- Wash and comb your hair frequently.
- Take a bath or shower every day.
- Get at least eight hours of sleep every night.
- Visit the doctor regularly, and avoid bad habits, like smoking and excessive drinking.
- Eat healthy food and don't binge. Drink lots of water (at least 2 L. a day). Take vitamins and antioxidants.
- Exercise helps, especially squats, twerks and deadlifts.
- Wear colors and clothing styles that enhance the figure that God gave you, and get rid of that dingy, baggy clothing that you like to wear, merely because it's "comfortable".
- Get into the habit of wearing a skirt and heels occasionally.
- Relax and display "open" body language. Don't appear to be closed, rigid or uptight. In other words, don't cross your arms in front of you; show your neck and the palms of your hands while talking to others.
- Adopt a proper posture. Straighten your spine. Put your chin forward and your shoulders back. Don't ever slouch.
- Be animated. Express joyfulness, humor and a genuine interest in others. Don't be critical, boring, sluggish or dull-minded.
- Be confident with your body! Walk with your knees and hips in motion, and don't drag your feet.

And most importantly of all…

- SMILE and be friendly!

If a woman does all these things, a man won't really care if her "cheekbones are too low", or her "thighs are too wide", or even if she's "a little too pudgy", etc., because she will convey a beauty that goes below the skin. Best of all, the beauty of the heart can get better with age and practice! You don't need to worry about becoming an "old maid".

[Eds. note: American women, we are sorry to inform you that you must have a normal BMI (19-24) before men will acknowledge your eligibility as a possible mate. For advice on how to lose weight, please click here.]

2. A Woman Must Know How to "Get Along" with a Man

There was a very popular book written by John Gray a number of years ago, entitled, "Men are from Mars; Women are from Venus". This book describes in very informal language the respective natures of men and women, and indicates the many common ways in which the sexes misinterpret the behavior of the other, and fail to contribute to a relationship that Glorifies God.

Another good read is from Emerson Eggerich, "Love and Respect". This book explores the symbiotic connection between the emotional needs of men and women, based on a verse of scripture found in the Bible, that when adhered to, can strengthen and transform relationships.

> Ephesians 5:33
> "Each one of you also must love his wife as he loves himself, and the wife must respect her husband."

Both of these books are essential classics for anyone who is serious about having a Christian Archetype marriage. I encourage everyone to read both of these at least once before they are 20 years old. (I have copies in my family library that I'd be happy to lend.)

Most importantly for the present discussion, a woman needs to respect a man. There are many ways to show respect to a man, but I'll list a few of the most important.

- Believe in him! Speak POSITIVELY to him and about him. Don't make assumptions or statements that would characterize him as having a poor character or motives.
- Admire him for who he is, and what he does. Don't choose a man just to have a man; choose a man for who he is and whose wife you will be.
- Approve him! You should never pester a man to change. Don't even think about it. Don't even think about thinking about it! If there is something you don't like about the man you are with, then dump him and get another one that has what you like. But don't demand change! Men will change partners before changing themselves.
- Honor him by following his requests as much as possible. If he wants some time alone, then go find something else to do for a while. If he asks you to do something, then make it a point to do so in a timely manner. If he gives you a responsibility, then attend to it diligently. The worst thing you could do is to ignore what he says. The next worse thing is to excuse your self with any kind of rationalization.
- Listen to him. Pay careful attention to what he says, and respond with questions or appropriate actions. Take his words seriously, but don't be ignorant of when he is joking either. A man will feel disrespected if he must repeat himself many times without getting a response. If he says things that you really don't like, or you can't accept, then maybe you should consider finding someone else.
- Obey him. Don't be obstinate and self-willed. Don't hold your own opinions to be more important than his. Better yet, don't express any opinions at all, unless he asks for them. But don't hold your breath – a self-respecting man will hardly ever ask for your opinion. It's the same reason why men don't ask for directions. They value themselves for being able to handle any situation by themselves, and they'll lose confidence if not allowed to do so. You really DON'T want an unconfident man – trust me, so just learn to obey him and follow after his thinking.
- Accept him! Enjoy every moment you have together. If you value the relationship, then don't ever reject him in any way. Don't say no without offering another choice. Don't belittle him or criticize his decisions.

Men value themselves for being confident and independent, and women should too. Men frequently need time to do "men things", and they should not be nagged or chided about it. Instead, men should be encouraged by their partner to face all the different aspects of life with hope, without worrying about whether their activities will be accepted by their mate.

A woman sees her relationship with a man as all-consuming, and as the most important thing in her life. But men do not think of women in the same way. To a man, a woman is only one thing on his list of interests in life. The others include his career, his friends, his finances, his hobbies and sports, etc. A woman should realize that she is just one part of a man's life (although she should be one of the more important parts).

This does not mean that a woman is relatively unimportant. On the contrary, a woman is the most powerful and lasting influence in a man's life, and a woman should understand that her role is to influence, and not to control, the man's life. Any emotionally healthy man will quickly dispose of any controlling woman in his life, so if you want to get the axe as soon as possible, then start acting like you're his mother.

The ways in which a woman influences a man's life are innumerable, but some of the more important ways are listed here.

- His aptitudes, skills and abilities
- The use of his gifts and talents
- The development of his personality and temperament
- His attitudes toward taking risks, facing difficulties, and towards life in general
- The protection and advancement of his personal reputation
- His peer-group choices
- His level of career achievement…
- His financial and social status
- The quality of atmosphere in his home
- His decisions to engage in healthy or unhealthy habits, such as his diet, exercise, smoking, drinking, overworking, overspending, socializing, etc.
- His size, appearance and fitness level
- His passions, preferences and personal tastes
- His sexual expression, joy and fulfillment
- His state of happiness and emotional well-being
- His sense of significance, value and security
- His confidence, and his sense of efficacy and freedom
- His emotional, social and spiritual growth…
- His conversion and devotion to Christ, and his spiritual service to others

> "A man chooses what path to take in life, but a woman paves the road for him."

When a man chooses a woman, he is also making many choices about all of the things listed above. So naturally, men will find a woman who is totally unaware of these things, to be completely useless (except for one or two things, I suppose). Such a woman cannot expect very much from having a relationship with a man, and wastes her time and opportunities on trivial pursuits, like shopping and gossiping.

Ladies, think about it this way:If a man were to choose you right now, what kind of life would he have with you? Can you deliver the kind of care and nurturing that a man wants and needs, without becoming domineering?If not, then why should any man choose you?

Perhaps you are only thinking about what a man can do for you… If so, then you need to grow up!

3. A Woman Must Have a "Life"

A lot of women know how to make themselves attractive, and they know how to get along with a man, but they're full of psychological and emotional issues. They have this secret wish that "Christian Grey" will pick them out of Starbucks, and transform their whole existence. They are either out of control, or they don't want to control. They don't know how to deal with life.

The problem is… it never happens! And the most frustrating part of it is that they don't even know why!

So why?

It's because they will not take responsibility for their lives, but they hope to meet a man who automatically knows how to take responsibility FOR them. This is totally unrealistic.

Perhaps these women expect God to take responsibility for them, but they must have some misconceptions about God, because God seldom follows romantic fantasies like a woman does. God's idea of romance is always tied to a relationship that GLORIFIES HIM. But a lot of women always put the responsibility on MEN, and cling to the hope that they'll find a PERFECT relationship, and that they won't ever NEED to address the HARD stuff – the deeper issues in life – which is the question of how their relationships Glorify God.

Most women experience rejection at some point, but sadly, there are some women who never GET IT. They don't know how to act, to glorify God. Some women, instead of taking responsibility for themselves, simply try harder in the first two areas: looking more attractive, and getting along with men. But without a LIFE to guide them, they eventually cross some boundaries and enter into an unhealthy lifestyle, characterized by short-term relationships and promiscuity. Sadly, they would sooner waste themselves on chance, then to take control of their life. They never understand what can open doors for them. These women never learn how to overcome their doubts in life and manage themselves well.

There's an old song that goes, "I'd like to teach the world to sing in perfect harmony…"

When a woman knows herself and manages her life well, then she shows the world who she is and how she should be treated. If she never teaches the world to "sing" for her, then no one will know what "note" to hit when she comes in the door. After a while, people get tired of the disorganized "bad music" and start avoiding her.

Men want to spend time with a woman who not only contributes something to his life, but who also INSPIRES and MOTIVATES him. That's what it means to "teach people to sing". But that is not something that a woman can do intentionally by some small actions. Some women think so, but that kind of thinking is manipulative, so you won't have much lasting success by trying these "tricks" and "gimmicks". A woman inspires and motivates a man by being emotionally healthy, by having her own life purpose and business to attend to, and by making herself available to WIN-WIN relationships with others, or with a man.

Additional Advice

Like I mentioned earlier, just because a woman has these three things bears no guarantee of developing a relationship. There are a number of other things that need to be secured. This section covers a few of them.

Get Your Act Together ASAP

Decide what you want out of life as early as possible, and make your best efforts to achieve it. Most people make this choice during adolescence, and so it's important to prepare for your future, as soon as you are aware of your heart's desire.

If you want to be happily married, then preserve your purity by abstaining from sex until married, be aware of the escalation of temptation, and avoid it at all costs.

Make a concerted effort to help yourself and your like-minded friends to meet lots of eligible men, to find choice partners. This endeavor should be well underway during your early 20's. Make the choice to marry when you are at your SMV peak (~22-26 years old). If you wait a minute longer, the quality and quantity of your choices (in the way of available mates) will decrease sharply.

Don't fall for the lie that you have another decade to prepare for marriage. You don't! Maybe you think you can wait that long, but the good men, and the other women in your competitive bracket, will not.

Don't be Desperate

Probably the most IMPORTANT change as far as your relationships are concerned, is when you realize that you stopped NEEDING a man. In spiritual terminology, this signifies that you have become THANKFUL for the reality that you have, and that you have truly given up your idolatrous sin of COVETING a man, which is, in reality, only a selfish fantasy that has kept you in bondage to loneliness and rejection.

When this one "shift" in your thinking happens, it will probably have the biggest effect of ALL, because once a woman stops WANTING and NEEDING a man, she will start attracting them LIKE CRAZY.

Neediness implies that a woman has more problems and emotional requirements than average, which vastly displaces her ability to introduce good things into the relationship.

There's an old saying that goes, "The hungry don't get fed". Well, it's a spiritual principle. It applies for men chasing women, and the same goes with a woman's hunger for a man. If you're NEEDY, then men will RUN away from you.

Men can "sniff" out a "needy" woman, and they stay far away, because men know that a needy woman can quickly become a "blood-sucking parasite" that will consume his life, throw him out of control, and fill him with guilt. It's better to avoid such a woman completely!

So, be careful that you do not become obsessed with men. A woman should have more good things happening in her mind, than merely the idea of pursuing a husband.

Find a Happily Married Mentor

Women today, need to understand how to GLORIFY GOD in a relationship, and it needs to be learned IN PRACTICE, and not restrained to be merely cognitive knowledge gained from a book or a once-a-week class. Older, more experienced women need to SHOW and TELL these young ladies how it's done, one-on-one! This is something that is CAUGHT, and not taught! This task is heavy, because very few people in our church have Christian parents who can demonstrate God's presence in a relationship to them.

I encourage you to seek out as many good mentors as you can find, especially those who are successful in love, and/or happily married. You will need to find at least one mature woman who will work with you closely, one-on-one, and help guide you with God's love and truth, through the maze of choices you'll face as a single adult.

Be Aware of the Juxtaposed Effects of Your Respective Persons on the Relationship

God often does not expect us to change ourselves for the better before bringing us into relationship with each other. God uses relationships as a living channel to dispense His grace to us. It's through these relationships that we become better people.

So, when finding a mate, look at the larger picture of what God is doing with the PLURAL "US", and don't SETTLE for someone, just to have someone. The relationship should be a mutual trust, which brings mutual benefits. Make sure you both agree, and are happy with what you're both giving and getting out of the relationship before you commit to it.

Here's an important point concerning the TOTAL EFFECT of your partnership: Make sure that your concept of the other person's identity agrees with his own concept of self, and vice versa. A lot of divorces happen simply because the person that Mary wants and believes John to be, is not at all like the man that John knows and wants himself to be. Sadly, the two can never agree, without a fantastically major compromise, which may very well require the spiritual death of one or both of them. (How many Pastor's wives become clinically depressed for the sake of her husband's ministry?) Even if such a sacrifice is made, the relationship can never really glorify God in the way that God intended it to be. (The children of such relationships suffer especially, because they cannot experience God from their parent's interaction.)

It's very helpful if you learn to look at yourselves as a couple. How well do you match each other, and what kind of influence do you have on each other? Relationships are LIVING and DYNAMIC – not static. Relationships change people, so make sure your relationship brings POSITIVE changes to BOTH of you.

Another thing, just because two people are Christians, does not necessarily mean that their relationship together will automatically be a "Christian" one.

Are you listening?

Putting two "good" people together does NOT guarantee a successful marriage!

In fact, it's not uncommon for two misfit screwballs to have a more enjoyable and beneficial relationship, than two, very disciplined, high-quality people, depending on the nature of their personality combination and interaction. In other words, it is not the quality of your character that counts, but it's the natures of your respective identities, and how well they blend and match each other.

For example, lemons are too sour to eat by themselves, and sugar is too sweet, but when mixed together with water, they make a delicious drink – lemonade. But if we combine milk and soy sauce in the water, we're only making people vomit. People in relationship are the same way, and this is a major piece of what it means to have a relationship that Glorifies God.

Play Social Games

A healthy relationship is commonly characterized by some friendly SOCIAL GAMES, in which two people supercede the background traditions of culture and language, and learn to communicate with each other on a HEART-TO-HEART level. These social games also help one to understand the self and others better, including our personalities, temperaments, and our levels of emotional stamina and social responsibility. This knowledge is necessary to maintain good relationships with others, in addition to the communication.

Of course, if there is miscommunication, or if the game goes sour, then hearts will be broken, but such an experience should reveal one's weaknesses and teach one to be stronger, and how to do better the next time around. The safety of a caring community is a prerequisite, which is why a lot of Christians frown on "dating" and encourage "courtship" instead. Wisdom is required to know when to step back from the action, take a rest and get a new perspective and some refreshment, before jumping back into the game.

Conclusions

If a woman wants to see BIG changes in her social life, and in her love life, she needs to take the time to go INSIDE… and work on the INNER GAME issues. If a woman can get her inner game together, then the social games become completely intuitive. She will become beautiful and inspiring to others, and these people, including men, will start "singing" for her.

Once a woman gets control of her inner game by becoming realistic in her psychology and managing her emotions, EVERYTHING will change for her. I'm NOT saying that she should become rational, cold and heartless. I'm saying that she should stop trusting in her preconceived fantasies about love, examine herself honestly, and start connecting with people on a basic, heart-to-heart level.

I think one of the most important and basic steps to this PROCESS, is in RECOGNIZING and BELIEVING that a LIVING REALITY can be BETTER than a SELFISH FANTASY.

If one can concentrate on this idea long enough, until the reality can kick in, you'll realize that things are not the way they seem. You'll realize that the default human condition is broken, and this is, perhaps, one of the biggest psychological obstacles in accepting the many responsibilities that come with knowing the TRUTH.

In mythical language, you'll realize that LIES – your own false notions and self-centered ignorance – have held you under an EVIL SPELL, and now, you are waking up!

If you're a mature woman, who has her life together, and has taken the time to get her "inner issues" handled, then men can FEEL it, and they're attracted to her like tacks on a MAGNET.

But if you are a woman who has had poor luck with men, then you know, I think it's CRITICAL for a girl to work on her "Inner Game". In fact, it's the one thing that girls who have guys report as the MOST important thing they've learned about success with their men.

In Christian terminology, I'm talking about "strengthening your relationship with God", and forming relationships that Glorify God.

Christian people label the CHALLENGES mentioned here, as pertaining to "one's relationship with God". But the real meaning of having a relationship with God, as heard from the pulpit, often gets blurred as religious jargon. In day-to-day practice, it should not be merely a "churchy concept", shrouded in mysterious rules and taboos, etc.

Unfortunately, until now, there has been NOTHING available from the Church to help young people unravel God's ways in their day-to-day personal life application. Young people need something that is TOTALLY focused on helping them get their Inner Game together, and using it in real world situations, especially when it comes to relationships and choosing a mate, which is one of the most important parts of our lives. (I am writing these things to help fill that void in teaching.)

> "It's really too bad that the opportunities of youth are wasted on the young and inexperienced." ~ George Bernard Shaw

Most of all, spend a lot of time in prayer, especially when making decisions. Be patient and give yourself some time. Anything built to last a lifetime, cannot be made very easily or quickly.

Best wishes on finding the Lord's purposes towards making your self a channel of God's glory and blessing into a man's life, and finding his love in return.

Question: Why Should a Woman Change Herself to "Get Along" with a Man?

Jack · 6 October 2009 · Archived copy · Original

My sister, Seyna, asked a very pertinent question concerning the previous post.

Wayne,

Very interesting blog. Don't you think it is ironic that you give advice on things that women need to change about themselves to attract and keep a man, but you point out that men will change partners before changing themselves? Just an observation.

Hope all is well.

Love,

Seyna

Dear Seyna,

I'm glad to see that you read the blog so attentively. It's my hope that these writings might get people to probe a little deeper in their thinking, ask some hard questions (as you did), and get some insights as to how they could achieve more in their lives. I know you are happily married, but perhaps you might have some friends that would benefit from reading it.

Your question presents a logical inconsistency that does seem rather unfair or even chauvinistic at first glance. However, if I were to write a similar paper on how a man can "catch" a woman, it would become apparent that it is, in fact, more difficult for men, but perhaps also a little more rewarding. So I believe your question is partly a matter of viewpoint. But more relevantly, there is a fundamental difference in what is being changed, and why. Allow me to explain here.

The Goal: Assimilating into God's Ideal Archetype Relationship

Being in a relationship is not merely about attaining a "fair and equal" business transaction – "I'll change this, if you change that." Sure, I will agree that the appearance of fairness is often a man's concession to the undying vanity of the woman. However, the goal of molding the relationship to fit the Male-Female Archetype proscribed by God should be the foremost priority, and both the male and female are expected to make the required changes to this end.

So to answer your question, there are some changes related to compromise, some changes motivated by love and loyalty, and some changes required for personal growth and maturity. In other words, some things should be changed, and other things cannot or should not be changed.

I will expound upon a few of these respective changes for the man, since it was not covered in the previous post.

There are many things that a young man needs to change about himself in order to gain efficacy with the opposite sex (e.g. Frame, Game, confidence (faith), a modest amount of success), but these are things that women typically do not know anything about, nor would they overtly request. (If she did, it would be kind of scary and intimidating.) Women desire outer EFFECTS and RESULTS that a man can produce in her life, while a man must focus more on the CAUSES and MECHANICS – his own "Inner Game"!

By "Inner Game", I mean his continual habits of thought and action that keep him in relationship with God, under the daily challenges of life, and constant “tests” from people, especially from women.

A man needs to develop himself FIRST before he can DELIVER on a woman’s demands, and if a woman is repetitively demanding something, it only means that he’s yet incapable of certain things; or worse, that this is a relationship that does not Glorify God. Either way, it is extremely distracting and discouraging from a male’s perspective. It takes his attention away from his own inner game, and makes him feel like a puppet that’s got to perform on her demand. In addition, it simultaneously creates embarrassment and social pressure that he must tolerate from her. For most men, it’s just too much. He’ll cut her loose so that he can retain his focus, confidence, and the control of his life, and maybe find someone ELSE who is more secure and will make a better mate.

A woman, on the other hand, has her own list of unique tasks, as delineated in the previous post. But concerning your question, I want to emphasize here, that it’s just plain WRONG for a woman to nag, nit-pick and make DEMANDS on a man, as a modus of control or domination. This, in itself, is an act of defiance against God’s created order, and is therefore wrong. If there is really something she needs, she should make REQUESTS (verbal), APPEALS (non verbal), and SUPPLICATIONS (display vulnerability, and reveal intentions with a spirit of trust and thankfulness), in the faithful hope of attracting love, and in a RESPECTFUL manner.

The man should be in the “drivers seat”, and the woman should be “enjoying the ride” (and “checking the map” occasionally)!

In summary of this section, a woman’s nagging, complaining, and making demands of a man is WRONG, because it detracts from the goal of attaining God’s Standards for relationships.

Next, I’ll elaborate some more on why nagging, complaining, and making demands is just plain WRONG in terms of the relationship experience.

The Purpose is to Bless Each Other (and not “Fairness” or “Change”)

We create a spiritual atmosphere with every word and deed. Every believer must come to a full recognition of this spiritual principle, if they expect to become an OVERCOMER by the AUTHORITY OF CHRIST.

Although it may not pass through your mind while you’re together, the blessing of your presence is a CHRISTLIKE SERVICE that you perform for each other. Think about the spiritual SAVOR that YOU have! It’s really NOT about RECEIVING! It’s about being a LIGHT to those around you.

Here is one important thing about discerning who is right for you. The right person will add magic to each small moment, and will fill your days with precious moments. Those memories are blessed because they are filled with God’s love, grace, and the presence of the Holy Spirit. After many years, those memories will shine like diamonds for all eternity.

On the other hand, a demanding attitude usually represents the harsh, ungrateful spirit of a person who is unwilling to give and to serve. If one person in a close relationship introduces this kind of spirit, then the other partner must do 200% of the work in the relationship, as well as conduct a spiritual warfare against thanklessness!

A love relationship cannot withstand this kind of burden, especially during the formative stages of growth. More, there are many such attitudes that will “nip love in the bud”, not only selfishness and ingratitude.

Typically, if the relationship is not “good” in the beginning, and I mean, characterized by the magical sense of “heels-over-head” “IN LOVE”, then HOPE is dim. Perhaps it was never meant to be. But if there is some magic to begin with, it can be nurtured and exercised. (I hope this is intuitive knowledge.)

Of course, no one is perfect, and we all help “carry” one another from time to time, but if the nagging and complaining is a continual, daily HABIT, it’s like the Chinese dripping water torture. Eventually, one will ask himself whether it is all worth it, especially the cost of opportunity – missing out on that magical love with someone else.

In a nutshell, it all comes down to how the relationship affects the other partners' connection to God – and it either improves, or it crumbles. Status quo is a slow erosion.

Discerning the Truth

Whenever you are assessing the value of a relationship, you've got to ask yourself some of the following questions…

- What is the "quality" of this person's "service"?
- Does this person fill my life with "diamonds", or with "gravel"?
- Does this person's presence in my life enhance my daily relationship with God?
- Does this relationship stimulate and encourage my spiritual growth?
- Do I feel loved?
- Do I feel confident?
- Do I feel secure?
- Is this the companionship I want to be "stuck in" for the rest of my life?
- Are the benefits of this relationship worthy of the precious life-time that I will trade for it?

It's important to note that the other person will be asking themselves the very same questions about YOU! You might have very high expectations from your partner, but meanwhile, your own service may have become so bad, that your partner is almost ready to try Buddhism; or even dump you completely! (Don't laugh! It happens more frequently than you'd think!)

A lot of "Christian" people will tell you that "feelings cannot be trusted", and their point is that we should not make major decisions based on transient emotions. [Eds. note (Nov. 8, 2017): For a pertinent, well known example, there are too many ex-carousel riders who use the excuse of "feelings" to justify cuckoldry and frivorce theft.] There is an important point to be made about the importance of faith over feelings, which is theologically CORRECT…

But let's get real.

Few people in this day and age would marry someone they HATE, just because their faith tells them that getting married is the "Christian" thing to do. Now, if those feelings characterize your ETERNAL relationship to God, or a LIFELONG commitment to a spouse, then these feelings are no longer so very transient! After a while, they will become a part of you, and will affect your whole life! [Eds. note (Nov. 8, 2017): I am not justifying divorce based on emotion. Unhappiness in marriage should be a goad to face the truth and get your act together. In other words, reclaim what you had in the beginning. What I am saying is…]

You've got to make your peace with God, before anything else, at any price! But that is a foundational requirement. We're already presuming that we are believers.

Here's a great example of what I'm saying. Ask any professional tennis player how his game is going, and he'll start talking about "feelings". If he "FEELS GOOD", meaning confident and alive, then his game is good! [Eds. note (Nov. 8, 2017): Here, feelings represent the discernment of one's state of being. They are an indicator that something is going on, not a harbinger of the future. Just because he "feels good", doesn't mean he'll win the tournament.]

More specifically, if you ask a tennis player how he chooses a good tennis racket, he won't say anything. Instead, he will pick up a racket, grip the handle and swing it in the air a few times, and then grab another and do the same thing. After a minute, he'll say something like, "This one feels better. It's lighter, more balanced, etc." If you ask him what he is doing, he'll say something like, "The feeling is everything!"

There's no need for a profession from a professional, when he can show you faith in action.

Hey! Feelings DO, and MUST, accompany faith, and you've got to tap into that POWER from Jesus, if you want to win your games!

Being single is the time when you should be "choosing your racket" and learning how to PLAY the game of love. After you choose a partner, then you'll be playing professional DOUBLES tournaments. Like I mentioned in the previous blog, your ability to "play TOGETHER well", largely determines your level of success – whether you'll "win or lose".

In a more carnal sense, it's a mating game. It's kind of like a man is in competition with himself, and with other men; and the woman is the winners' prize. A woman who aggressively demands changes in a man would automatically bump herself lower on the prize level category. (He's thinking, "THIS racket is not so well 'balanced'!")

Whereas, the women who are really desirable as mates usually know it, and they are the women who set up and control the competitive bracket by letting themselves BE PURSUED and selecting the better men as mates. These women know how to RESPOND to men, and how to move IN CONCERT with his every move, so that these men (along with their partners) will WIN GAMES in life!

Conclusions

So you see, the women who can master the three qualifications that I wrote about in the blog, really do have a lot of power and influence in the mating game – maybe even more than men!

If the goal of the relationship is simply "fairness" and "equity", then I have to concede that my viewpoints are not constructive. Instead, my post pursues a different and more advantageous goal – one that asserts the necessity of conforming to God's Archetype for male-female relationships. This model is superior because it attracts the benefits of God's purposes and promises. As a result, both parties can gain a sense of love, respect, grace, belonging, blessing and fulfillment.

On the other hand, God did intend for the man to be the head over the woman, and so it's quite common for men to play the trump card (dump her and move on), whenever a woman becomes too unmanageable, or requires too much maintenance, compared to what she brings into the relationship. Women dump men too (and at endemic proportions, these days).

Of course, my description is very abstract and theoretical, and crude at that. I only hope to shed some light on the basic processes that are at work. You may like to talk to Adam about this, and get his perspective as a man.

Love,

Wayne

Works, Faith and Miracles in Stewardship

Acts of faith bring new life to others.

Readership: All
Length: 1,500 words
Reading Time: 5 minutes

Our faith, when combined with a sense of purpose in life, hard work, and sacrifice, are spiritually contagious essentials! By adopting these spiritual postures and attitudes, we edify the faith of others, bring various benefits to their lives, and invite others to follow our example.

This post contains my personal testimony of how this has happened in my own life.

An Example of Generosity and Collective Strength

I'm rather impressed with the generosity our church has shown towards relieving the disaster caused by typhoon Moricot in southern Taiwan. A congregation of about 550 people has donated more than US$75,000 (~NT$2,500,000) towards financing the relief effort. I expect a similar show of support towards the victims of Ondoy and Parma, in the Philippines.

Some math shows that each person in the congregation gave an average of US$136.36 in aid to Moricot. However, we also know of a lot of members who have made long-standing prayer requests for financial help – people who have been hard struck by the economic crisis, since the crash of 2007. So there is probably a much smaller number of people, giving proportionately larger amounts.

But from an alternate perspective, those who gave less may be more highly acclaimed by the Lord. Consider how the widow's two mites were the most valuable in the Lords eyes.

> [41] Now Jesus sat opposite the treasury and saw how the people put money into the treasury. And many who were rich put in much. [42] Then one poor widow came and threw in two mites, which make a quadrans. [43] So He called His disciples to Himself and said to them, "Assuredly, I say to you that this poor widow has put in more than all those who have given to the treasury; [44] for they all put in out of their abundance, but she out of her poverty put in all that she had, her whole livelihood." (Mark 12:41-44, New King James Version)

May the Lord reward each one in proportion to the depths of their sacrifice.

These observations made me recall some moments in my own past when I was really in need of cash. I'd like to share one testimony here.

Faith and Works Can Inspire the Generosity of Others

I had a very difficult time, financially, getting through college. It took me seven years to graduate. For the first four years, I frequently had to take time off from school to earn more cash, so that I could continue. Then one year, I got a very good job working as a welder on an assembly line in a Honda plant. It paid so well that I was able to save US$10,000 in the bank in only eight months time. After that, I bought a very good used car for US$2,000. It was a beautiful, cream-colored, 1968 Dodge Polara, with a 318 c.i. engine and a turquoise interior. My uncle knew the original owner personally, and remembered him driving this car to church every Sunday. I used the remaining money towards my next year at college.

I decided to transfer to a small, Christian College that was out-of-state. I had a high-school buddy who was a student there, and I visited him once for a few days. While I was there, I really felt blessed, and so I decided to get my degree from this school. The first year, I was on the honor roll, and I obtained a scholarship. The following year, I had a partial scholarship, and a part-time job as a laboratory assistant, so I was able to survive financially.

However, during my senior year, I ran out of cash. Since I only had one year left to graduate, I didn't want to stop and go back to work again, so I took out a student loan, thinking I would make twice as much money after I had a degree.

Unfortunately, even with my part time job and the student loan, I ran out of funds after the fall semester, and I didn't know how I would pay for my final semester in the spring. I asked my family if they could help me out, but my parents said they didn't have any money on hand.

I told my professor about my situation, and he came up with a small grant from a private foundation, and he also located an alumni who donated a book award, which paid for my books. I was really grateful for their help, but even so, I was still US$1,900 short on the tuition, and I had to pay it before the deadline, which was three months away.

Then, my professor told me,

> "When you go visit your family over the Christmas Holidays, go back to your parents, and tell them that you still need money, and tell them that if they can't help you, then your professor will go to the bank and cosign a loan with you, so that you can finish school."

I was really touched by his faith and generosity. I did exactly as he instructed, and I was very surprised when my mother suddenly came up with US$700! My father asked me exactly how much more I needed, and I told him I yet needed US$1,200. He said he didn't have the money, but he promised he would come up with the money, and send it to me as soon as he got it.

When I told this news to my professor, he said,

> "It's just as I expected."

I asked him why my parents changed their minds about giving me money to finish school. He only put his pencil against his face, along his nose, and tried to look at it with crossed-eyes, saying,

> "Maybe they are just too close!"

His humor touched my heart and I began to understand.

Then, every month for the next three months, I received a check from Dad for US$400, so I was able to pay all of my tuition before the deadline. I graduated that spring with a Bachelors Degree, having a double major in Physics and Mathematics.

The Cooperative Rationale of Faith in Others

A few years later, I was talking with my Dad, and I asked him where he got the US$1,200 that he sent to me. So my Dad told me a little story of what happened.

> "Well, I'm a deacon at our church, I'm on the board of trustees, and I'm also the treasurer. I knew that our church had all its' debts paid, and received US$40,000 a month from the congregation, which was about US$10,000 more than its' monthly expenses. I knew that the church had over US$560,000 in the bank, and the board of trustees just voted to put a new carpet in the sanctuary, which cost US$120,000. Now, the Church didn't need a new carpet in the sanctuary! That carpet was only five years old, but the trustees didn't know what > else to spend the money on, so they just decided to get a new carpet!"

> "Now, I make US$4,000 a month, and I give 10% to the church regularly as my tithe. All the rest of my income had already been budgeted.
> But after you told me your situation, I thought to myself, 'I'm giving a tithe to a Church that already has half a million in the bank, just so they can throw it on a new carpet, which they don't really need anyway. Why should I give my hard-earned, $400 bucks to this Church, when my only son is barely struggling to finish college?'
> So for the next three months, I sent that money to you, instead of giving it to the Church."

I was surprised and elated to hear this, but before I could say anything, he finished with,

> "And do you know what? I think that's exactly what God would have me do!"

I had to agree with Dad. His example of stewardship has been a powerful and memorable testimony that has empowered me with the conviction that God is never short of cash, and that He will always provide for me, no matter what my circumstances are in life.

What a glorious testimony!

Conclusions

My faith consisted of my firm belief that I was to earn a degree. I dared even to venture that it was God's will for my life, and that God would somehow make this happen. My actions of working hard in school, and asking others for financial help, are the "works" of faith. The miracle is how others saw my struggle, and felt inspired (by God) to make tough decisions and necessary sacrifices in order to assist me in my endeavor.

The moral of the story is that our faith, having a sense of purpose in life (being called to an ordination), hard work, and sacrifice are spiritually contagious essentials! By adopting these spiritual postures and attitudes, we are inviting others to do the same, through the Holy Spirit.

> *"Co-Ordination" is the Collective-Strength-driven Co-Operation of those called to an* Ordination*."*

It's worthy to note that I needed my professor's pledge before I could approach Dad with my request. So it follows that, my professor and my Dad, are Types of Christ and the Father-God, respectively.

> "A 'workless' faith is a worthless faith."

Raging Vanity: Is it unscriptural for a Christian to ask for more of God? (July 13, 2013)

A Realistic View of Marriage

Jack · 18 October 2009 · Archived copy · Original

The Problem: Hitting "the Wall", and THEN Considering Marriage

A young lady in our fellowship approached me during the service tonight to inquire about my advice in a previous blog which addressed what a woman can do to attract a man.

This young lady spent her prime years pursuing an advanced education in law, with no thoughts about men. Now she is in her late 20's, well employed as a barrister, and getting bored (and lonely) with her money. So she's looking around for the next "achievement" in her life – a husband.

She "loved" a young man in our fellowship, a nerdy doctor of microbiology, but after dating for a few months, he got bored with her and decided he had no interest in her whatsoever. After this rejection, a desperate sense of urgency kicked in, which only made her feel more pressured to make "progress". She told me that she only wanted to find "true love", and she seemed very frustrated.

I sympathized with her and replied, "Yes, the goal is really so simple, isn't it?" But I told her that no one can go straight to the winners circle without first practicing and competing in the race, and perhaps even losing several times. She felt offended that I likened the process to a game, but I told her that the easiest way to lose the game is to refuse to play it – or wait a decade to leave the starting line.

I knew I was presenting a very difficult challenge to her, but I believe it is important to make things clear. I pointed out to her that my blog presents a vivid description of the spiritual ideals that we should all hope to attain, and was describing the ideal marathon – the type of winners who win the race. The few people who can really succeed beyond question in all three points listed in that blog post are spiritual celebrities.

After clarifying several points that were made in the post, she asked me,

> "Supposing I do all those things, and I have my own life, and assuming that quality men are pursuing me, and I get to the point where I don't really NEED a man. Then… why would I WANT a man?"

I laughed, because her question made it clear that she understood what was required of her. I told her that most people who reach this point, ask the very same question, because they realize that marriage is more about GIVING and SERVING than it is about RECEIVING.

In my own mind, I was thinking,

> "She has the idea that she loves him, but in reality, she doesn't love him at all. She's only thinking of how she can benefit from him, and that is exactly why this guy doesn't want her. This guy is smart to avoid her, and now after hearing her viewpoints, my respect for him has drastically increased."

That's the funny thing about young women like her. They have the idea that love is free and without cost, that it only offers benefits, and no responsibilities or liabilities. If that attitude would not make them rancid enough, they also have no clue about how to treat a man right, which is disgusting to the core. Worse yet, they expect only to receive love, and not just from any man – no, he must be one of those particular men who are at their pinnacle. Furthermore, they always have the notion that marriage is all about this distorted concept of "love", but it is this exact same notion that makes them unworthy of both love and marriage. These false notions of love displace every consideration of what might be required of them to become loveable.

The Mindset of the Loser

The motivations and purposes in marriage frequently held by the pool of young single eligibles, looks like this.

1. They are focused on satisfying a peculiar desire, and have no concern about glorifying God.
2. They believe the habit of blessing others, especially those who are unable to respond in like turn, is a waste of time and resources.
3. They expect to retain their own private bank account and finances, even after marriage. Some even preselect potential partners based on their economic wealth.
4. They consider kindness to be a weakness.
5. Sex is recreational, not procreational. They are willing, or actually looking, to indulge in sexual exploration outside of marriage.
6. They are unwilling or incapable of shouldering the responsibilities of having children.
7. They don't want to be tied down.

In short, these young people want a marriage which is stripped down to the basics – anything that requires work, time, or resources, and doesn't fill their immediate desire, is discarded.

For people who think like this, then you need to be informed that marriage is not what you're looking for. You're looking for a life of singleness, independence, and sexual freedom. Furthermore, if you choose to hotly pursue the pleasures of the single life, then very soon, the single life will start pursuing you, and this is more true for women, than it is for men.

The Mindset of the Winner

There are several main motivations and purposes for a Christian marriage. Those which are most important, and stand in contrast with the previous list, include the following.

1. To glorify the image of God.
2. To help and serve each other.
3. To merge, preserve and enhance wealth.
4. To share companionship.
5. To make a provision for the natural inclination of the flesh, in order to avoid fornication – sexual sins which destroy the soul.
6. To produce Godly children.
7. To obtain the legal right to remain together as a family.

Even if you are someone who doesn't believe in God, and who doesn't believe extramarital sex is anything to feel guilty about, then marriage is still not going to bring you much other than what's on the list above.

The Challenges to be Overcome

You have to also consider that there are also many risks and responsibilities that come with marriage. You might think of these as simply the negative aspects of the points listed above.

1. The promise of the man to love and cherish the woman; the promise of the woman to honor and respect the man.
2. The possibility that your spouse may not be as faithful, conscientious, honest, or trustworthy as you like.
3. The possibility that a failure in this endeavor (divorce) could shatter your family, your financial future, as well as your emotional health and spiritual vitality.
4. You are stuck with your spouse for life. You have to deal with whatever kinds of shit they drag you into.

5. You are forbidden from having sexual relations with anyone other than your spouse.
6. The years of work necessary to provide for children and raise them properly.
7. The in-laws…

Too many people error by concentrating too much on seeing marriage as an easy way to obtain the benefits on the second list, without realizing that their spouse pays the costs of providing you with those benefits, which are on the third list. Of course, no one wants to be(come) the spouse of such a naive and selfish person. Being a Christian doesn't change the fact that you must be responsible for yourself and make appropriate decisions.

Instead, you have to as yourself the following questions.

1. Think about who you are and what you really want in life.
2. Are you able to provide the necessary quality of character, and the services and resources required by your potential spouse?
3. Can you abide by all of the above terms and conditions?

Even provided that you can find a partner who fits you well, if you cannot fulfill the above conditions, then it begs the question, why would ANYONE want to marry YOU?

A lot of young people who do take the time to think things through until they reach these conclusions often decide that they don't really want a relationship after all, because they realize that what they REALLY WANT cannot be found in marriage. Unfortunately, a lot of people never understand these things until AFTER they get married, and then they suffer bitter, long-lasting disappointments because of their false expectations. So if this is you, please don't defraud your spouse, degrade your children, and disappoint yourself by getting married.

On the other hand, if/when you decide(d) that marriage is the right move for you, then the big concern becomes whether you can choose (or have chosen) the right person. Here also, a lot of people take the opposite approach, sometimes to their own detriment. They are people who are typically driven by their desires and passions. They choose a person first, and then try to work out all the headaches that come with that choice.

In the same vain (pun intended), the young lady I spoke to had already passionately made her choice, and failed to establish the relationship she desired. But until she talked with me, she hadn't even determined if marriage is what she really wants. Her desire and wanton carelessness only led her to social contortions and mental rationalizations of unprecedented proportion.

And… she is an intelligent, educated woman, who demands your love and respect!

Nice monkey show. Please pass the popcorn.

Conclusions

A good marriage is only for the select few winners who prepare thoroughly and work hard to win the race.

However, young people are not seeking to build their interpersonal wealth and overall value (e.g. character, dependability, desirability, level of emotional maturity), AND they are not making marriage a priority in their lives. This problem is reaching epidemic proportions in western and westernized societies, and unfortunately, they tend to project their own lack of qualities onto those of the opposite sex and thus, blame them for being the major part of the problem. Women see men as being capricious, fastidious, unwilling to commit. Men see women as selfish, slutty, rude and unkind. They don't ever consider the condition of their own selves, and the (poor) quality of relationship they could offer a man.

The bottom line is, you need to know what you are doing, whenever you are making life-changing decisions, such as marriage and having sex, so that you don't get sucked into the damning, comfortable, dreamworld of selfishness, and the confusion that is characteristic of sexual indulgence.

10 Tips On Managing and Conveying Confidence in the Presence of Others

Jack · 26 October 2009 · Archived copy · Original

1. Make A Great Entrance

"For a truly graceful entrance, check your self-consciousness at the door. There is an ease that comes from being comfortable in your own skin. Hesitation can mar even the most elegant premiere. If you don't know a soul, head toward a person near the back of the room. Chances are you'll find a friendly face along the way."

— Nancy Friday, author of Our Looks, Our Lives

2. Work The Room

"You first must learn to overcome mingle-phobia. Psych yourself up to enter a room. Then make your move. If you don't know anyone at the gathering, walk up to a group, smile widely, introduce yourself, and say: 'I don't know a soul at this party. Can I join you guys?' This usually gets a warm, sympathetic reception, and people chat you up immediately."

— Miss Mingle (a.k.a. Jeanne Martinet), author of The Art of Mingling

3. Recover Gracefully

"If you forget someone's name: Remember that this kind of thing happens to people all the time, confident or not, so don't be too embarrassed. First, admit to forgetting the person's name. Second, slap the palm of your hand to your forehead in mock horror and say, 'I can't even remember my own mother's name!' At this point, the other person will surely remind you of their name. Then simply say, 'I promise never to forget it again,' and move on."

— Etiquette expert Letitia Baldrige, author of Letitia Baldrige's Complete Guide to the New Manners for the '90s

4. Tell A Great Story

"Avoid phrasing your story as a joke. People think when they tell stories they have to get to a punch line, but punch lines are not in themselves amusing. You should have a deep personal interest or investment in your story — it should be either profoundly moving or profoundly funny. The story needn't have happened to the storyteller, so long as the storyteller is also deeply moved by what she's recounting. Remember which details are important. Gesturing is fine so long as it comes about naturally, but a good story well told and full of conviction needs little adornment. The words are what's most important."

— Malachy McCourt, author of A Monk Swimming

5. Stay Calm

"If you have a lot of nervous energy you need to get rid of, do a quick burst of aerobic activity, like jumping jacks. Then get focused. Find a quiet spot to be alone and take a few breaths before you walk into the room. Then take another slow, relaxing breath once you've entered and taken your place in front of everyone. You won't lose their attention — when you're standing right in front of them, that's impossible. Then smile. People buy things from and listen to people who smile at them."

— Valerie Adami, director of programming at Weist-Barron School of Television Acting in New York

6. Ask For A Raise

"Casually say to your boss at the start of the day, 'I'd love a minute of your time today,' letting him or her choose when you will meet. When you're face-to-face say, 'I really enjoy this job and working for you' and list the specific contributions you've made recently. Then take the plunge: 'Do you think you might consider giving me a raise?' Don't speak in specific numbers unless asked. End the conversation with 'Please don't feel pressure to answer right away.' This lets your boss feel in control and perhaps especially generous when she offers you that raise in a couple of days' time."

— Lauren Wiesenthal, partner at the New York legal search consulting firm Corrao, Miller, Rush, & Wiesenthal

7. Be A Good Haggler

"The key to getting a fair deal is to first do your homework. Think about what you really want out of the deal, what you're willing to give up to get it, and what is non-negotiable. Also, know the market value of what you're looking to get. Pick up an issue of Consumer Reports, talk to friends, look for any information that will give you the inside scoop on what the item you want really is. Always ask for a little more or offer a little less than your limit. If you have doubts, take a night to think it over." Another thing, make sure you're dealing with the guy who really has the power to cut the deal, and not just a sales representative.

— Michael Donaldson, author of Negotiating for Dummies

8. Overcome Fear

"Fear is a lot like pain — it's your guide to pinpointing what's bothering you. After I blew out my knee in a crash while training for a competition, jumps scared me, so I had to learn to replace my fear with a strategy. The best way I've found is to rehearse the situation in your head and mentally walk your way up to the point where you feel the fear most intensely. Next, shift to something very calming (for me, it's a beach at sunset) and as you do a mental run-through, breathe out, physically relaxing your body. Then imagine yourself going through the motions flawlessly while your body and mind are relaxed. In essence, you're conditioning your mind to replace fear with success."

— Picabo Street, Olympic skiing champion

9. Don't Be Intimidated

"Stop all the negative thoughts in your head, then visualize yourself pushing the other person 100 feet away from you. Imagine him or her as being very small and in black and white. This will immediately reverse any feeling of inferiority. Once you've mentally laid the groundwork, you want to be the first person to say something so that the conversation is in your control. Don't say anything competitive or defensive; instead, ask something personal like 'How is your family?' Be sincere and it will probably throw off the other person's power-tripping ways."

— Anankha K. Chandler, certified hypnotherapist and author of Therapist in a Box: Emotional Healing

10. Tell A Joke

"Never announce that you're about to tell a joke; it sets expectations too high and there's a better chance you'll fall flat. The joke should stem naturally from the conversation, so that people get sucked in before they even know you're telling it. Whether you're telling something that happened to a friend or something that happened last month, always say something like 'on the way over here' instead and make them believe it just happened to you. People will get more emotionally invested when it's more immediate. If your joke brings the house down, don't press your luck with another one. Always leave them wanting a little bit more."

— Tom Hertz, comedian and Emmy Award winning writer for Dennis Miller Live

Onlookers, or Overcomers?

Jack · 6 November 2009 · Archived copy · Original

A lot of people seem to think they believe in God, but in actuality, they only believe in FATE, and the problem is that they are not aware of the difference. Perhaps there are some others who never heard much about God, so their situation is the opposite. They believe in fate, thinking that it is “ordained by God”, or something similar. But in the end, these people are all the same. They are onlookers.

Theologians have a special name for these kinds of people. They call them “Agnostics”. Agnostics believe there is a God, and they believe in truth, morality and the like, but they fail to recognize the PERSONAL POWER OF EFFICACY that knowing God can give to them. So, life tends to pass them by quite easily.

Agnostics who believe themselves to be Christians, like to call this quality of true believers CHARISMATIC, and they often condemn them on how their lives do not always follow Biblical doctrines. Other Agnostics who believe they are “Charismatic”, are merely caught up in emotions, thinking it to be “the moving of the Holy Spirit”, and they are too critical towards those who consider themselves to be “Bible believing”.

We all need balance, identity, purpose and relationship, to make our lives truly meaningful.

People who model their lives after Biblical examples, and who use Biblical teachings as a substitute for finding their own relationship with God, somehow fail to understand that God works with individuals in a unique manner.

God is somewhat predictable, in that HE never does the same thing in the same way twice!

If we were to ask Agnostics about their faith, or about their relationship with God, they might respond quite warmly, meaning, with optimism. But if we probe their minds with deeper questions, we find that their mind is all mush. They might know a lot about the Bible, but they’ll stick to doctrine and say nothing about how it has changed their lives.

Like a wimpy watchdog, their bark is bigger than their bite.

Agnostics who are more mature will know this about themselves, and will prefer to avoid all deeper questions about God, fate, eternity and the like. But, they may still be going through their daily motions, attending Church every week, but closing their eyes to what is required from them, and pretending that nothing is missing in their lives.

Now is the application. Are we agnostics who are ignorant of our agnostic selves?

Do we really believe that we each have the power to control our circumstances, or do we have a habit of letting our circumstances control us… and others?

When a CRISIS arises, do we tend to respond with stoicism by saying, “God is in control.” When in fact, what we really mean to say is that “We are NOT (in control)!” Or, perhaps we DO have the power to change things, in which case, we should be saying, at best, “We decline to take any action on this ‘insignificant’ issue.” Or at worst, “We don’t care!”

A true believer recognizes that God has entrusted him with the KEYS TO THE KINGDOM and has put all things under his control. But it seems that is just too much for some people to swallow. They think that seeing ones’ self as an “Agent of God” is the same as “spiritual pride” or just plain arrogance. Some might even think of charismatic efficacy as “meddling”, and I suppose it would be so, if the motive were simply to control, without any sincere caring backed with a higher purpose of identity.

Caring too much can be self-defeating, but is it ever wrong to care? I guess we should ask the question, “What do you care about?” The honest answer should be very self-enlightening.

Many people are under pressure by what is expected from them by people who claim to “love” them, and they find a substitute for comfort and security by conforming to cultural mandates or tradition. Once this is established, most people find it is too easy to be lulled to sleep by the URGENT RESPONSIBILITIES of this WORLD, believing instead the lie that we are irresponsible or even immoral to neglect them, and thus, accepting themselves to be the PAWNS OF FATE.

Caring too much about these things would be quite unproductive towards our spiritual growth… or just plain wrong, to put it harshly.

Do we have the attitude that life is determined by fate, or by faith? Perhaps we should believe that “fate” (or future) is determined by LIFE, which would be much more correct, assuming that it is our life in Christ.

We must be more proactive to set a spiritual mood of FAITH IN ACTION, so that others might WAKE UP from their ignorance of their agnostic selves. Don’t be afraid to be “salty”.

Are we waiting for the right opportunity, or the right person to come along into our lives, while weeks, or even years are passing us by? Meanwhile, we become quietly desperate because we eventually begin to realize that, all along, those opportunities and people were there all the time. We just failed to take the initiative to act on it.

I believe that a lot of people will be deeply disappointed when they die (colloquially speaking, when they “get to heaven”), because they will find that there is nothing there that God hasn’t given us here on earth. (It just won’t be broken by sin.) They will be doubly disappointed to find that a lot of people they expected to see in heaven, will not be there. Instead, there will be a lot of people there who did not “deserve paradise”, in their minds. We must beware of such “saved by works” mentality.

Personally, I have the opinion that most people who say they are a Christian, merely because their parents do the same, and because they grew up in a Christian home, are actually Agnostics.

At some point in life, we each must SEPARATE our self from the influences of our parents’, teachers’ and mentor’s faiths, and MAKE OUR FAITH OUR VERY OWN. To do this, we each must undergo a series of events designed by God to bring us into a CRISIS OF BELIEF, where we are forced to make key decisions about who God is, and who we are. Once we recognize that all of the problems of life are God’s plan towards this end, then the daily experiences of living in this world suddenly become transformed into a CRUCIBLE OF FAITH.

A true belief, in essence, requires each of us to make a whole-hearted COMMITMENT to achieve something that is beyond ones self, AT ANY COST. Now, we must count the cost before we begin to set out towards the object of our faith.

The Bible speaks of this as a refining process, which intends to remove impurities from valuable metals. Similar to the refining process, as true believers, we should also see some “impurities” coming out from ourselves, and when it happens, we should not be surprised or embarrassed that we could have been “so bad”, but instead, be glad that we are in the process of refinement. It’s part of the cost.

Unfortunately, many people resist the refining process for any multitude of reasons, but the basic reason is that they don’t want to pay the cost. Blissful ignorance is an epidemic. But God is faithful. He won’t let them go on like that forever. These people need to experience heartache and disappointment, before they realize that fate and faith are not the same. In the rough and tumble of life, they may come to think that God is the “bad guy” who disrupts their happiness by setting traps and stumbling blocks for them to fall over. They might have a sudden realization that God (or fate) is, in fact, their enemy! But in reality, they are only becoming aware of their fallen nature.

Some hedonistic believers are “born again” in a moment of discernment, but salvation is a lifelong process for others who may very well have grown up in Church. They must experience a certain distention towards their concept of “God” which grows into a bitter resentment, and, over the years, becomes a grieving remorse over those opportunities which were missed, and culminates in repentance over failing to respond appropriately.

And why? It’s because the slow grinding of the soul is necessary to defeat the proud ego, which is largely formed out of how one aligns himself with the concept of what is right. In other words, religiosity can feed a proud ego, as well as the soul, and we must be aware of that. Imagine that growing up in Church can actually blind one to the truth!

Religious people, who are overcomers, like to say these things as, “It’s not what I have done, but what GOD HAS DONE (for me).” This much is correct, but they are mistaken if they expect God to do anything MORE for them. Jesus said HIS work is FINISHED, and he SAT DOWN at the Right Hand of the Father. It is now up to us, and the Holy Spirit, to carry out God’s will on earth.

Does this idea make you tired, or excited?

Time Management

Jack · 10 November 2009 · Archived copy · Original

[Eds. note: This information is offered to help determine priorities, analyze time budgets, and maximize outcome and efficiency.]

What is Time Management?

- Drawing out a proper schedule for using time.
- Doing the right things at the right times.
- Having a goal which directs how time will be spent.
- Being aware of how much time is being spent on certain activities.
- Taking action to control the use of time.
- Saving time in a smart, efficient ways.

Why Should We Learn About Time Management?

- We can organize and manage our time well.
- We can distinguish what is important and what is not, then we can make better decisions about priorities.
- We can finish everything we need to do.
- We can save a lot of time to do what we want to do.
- We can develop a more efficient life.

What Do We Really Need?

- A Quality Life – I need more time!
- Value Assessment – What will we choose to do, given a limited amount of time?
- A Channel for Desire – We want to control circumstances and lead a leisurely life, but instead, the busy demands of life seem to control us and make us tired.
- Time Assignment – Important to find time to spend with friends, family and self, while finishing everything else.
- Avoid Procrastination and Postponements – poor job Balance – I need to work successfully and have a personal life. How do I give fair time to each one.
- Awareness of Priorities: "Urgent versus Important" – What should I spend my time on? How do I decide?
- Stress Control – We get stressful by being too busy and having too many things to do.

Time Thieves

- External Factors – People or things in your environment or your schedule that create confusion or inefficiency.
- Internal Factors – Things about yourself that make you lose focus or become distracted.

External Factors

- The sudden or time-consuming phone call.
- An invitation or conversation with a friend.
- The sudden customer, or other demanding people.
- Banquets or social occasions.
- Personal habits, sickness or emotional needs.

- Responsibilities to family.
- Homework, or covering work for coworkers.
- Time needed for transportation.

Internal Factors

- No clear goal and no order of priorities.
- Lack of discipline. No daily work plan.
- Lack of a deadline to finish your goals.
- Lack of order, the workplace is always in a mess.
- Too many cares about small things.
- Being resistant to changes.
- Too many interesting subjects in your vicinity.
- Don't know how to reject a temptation.
- Lack of information and communication.

Divide Your Time into Blocks

- Sleeping – 8 hours/day
- Working hours – 8 hours/day
- Meals and cooking – 2 hours/day
- Spare time or hobbies – 2 hours/day
- Dressing and physical care – 1 hour/day
- Coffee break or quiet time – 1 hour/day
- Reading and study – 1 hour/day
- Transportation time – 1 hour/day
- Time with friends and family – 8 hours/week
- Housekeeping and maintenance – 3 hours/week
- Banking, bookkeeping, planning – 1 hour/week

Do you spend more or less time on each block?

[Eds. note: Most people only have about 2 to 4 hours of free/leisure time each day. How you choose to use this golden time is critical to your life.]

How Should Time be Spent?

- Most of our time is already preallocated, so most people only have 2 ~ 4 free hours of time each day.
- What should you spend your time on?
- Decide what is important to you. What are your top priorities.
- Divide your time to do different things at set lengths of time, and then try to finish each task within the time period.

Making your schedule work is the trick.

Evaluating Priorities

	Urgent	Not Urgent
Important	I. • Establishing Identity • Balancing cash flow • Physical needs • Health and safety • Self-control; managing emotions, • Deciding and planning daily work • Networking conferences	II. • Preparing work • Long-term planning • Establishing relationships • Essential leisure time • Improving ones' ability
Not Important	III. • Telephone calls, e-mails • Social obligations • Writing reports • Meetings	IV. • Wasting time on the internet • Nonsense chatting • Too much time watching TV

Keys to Time Management

The key to managing time wisely is to…

- Focus on the second box: "Important but not urgent"
- Put less time on the fourth box: "Not important and not urgent"

After a while, we see improvements…

- The first box becomes smooth and easy.
- The second box becomes enjoyable.
- The third box becomes exciting.
- The fourth box becomes relaxing.

Control Your Time

- Set goals, follow a daily schedule.
- Keep the workplace in order.
- Set out your purpose at first, whenever you call someone or hold a conference.
- Before making promises or commitments, carefully consider if you really want to spend your time on this. Ask yourself, "Is this really essential for me to do?"
- Set a deadline for everything on-hand.

Control Your Environment

Learn how to do the following when necessary…

- Lock your door; value your right to privacy.
- Use lights and shades effectively.
- Turn off the computer and/or the telephone.
- Direct focused conversations; say "NO" to people.
- Save time by devising conveniences, or by making appointments and/or arrangements with people.
- Consider spending a little money on things that can save your time.

Conclusions

- Lay out a basic schedule for each day, week, quarter, and year.
- You should have clear goals.
- Devise a planned order of the whole process, start to finish.
- Choose your endeavors carefully. Don’t let circumstances or other people choose for you.
- Consider how you will arrange your time to accommodate a given endeavor, so that you can do the right thing at the right time.
- Always be aware of what your priorities are, and how much time you are spending on any particular activity.

A well maintained time management will be good for your life.

Transparent, Translucent, or Opaque?

Jack · 16 November 2009 · Archived copy · Original

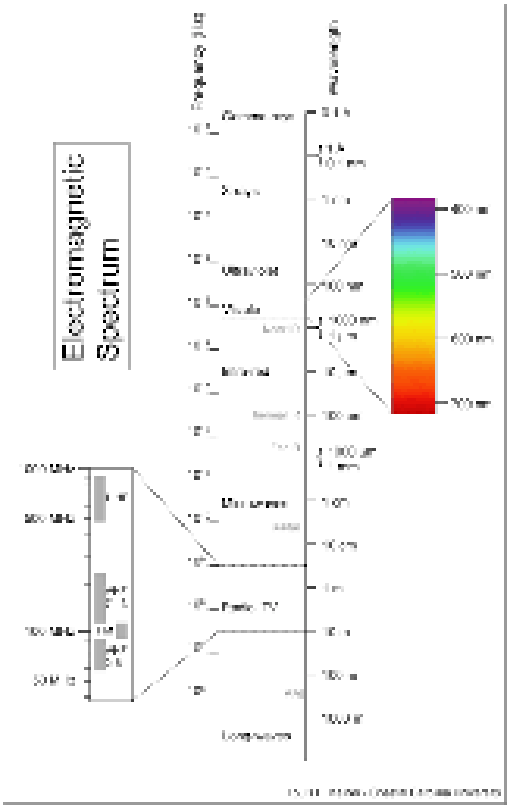
> This is the message we have heard from Him and proclaim to you, that God is light and in Him is no darkness at all. – 1 John 1:5

This is a very profound verse in scripture. Taking this verse literally, if we study the nature of light, we will probably learn a lot of things about God. In fact, light is one of the most fascinating things to discover in Physics!

Consider first the following points about light that we have learned from Physics:

- Light is energy.
- Light is a wave.
- Light is a particle, so it has mass.
- Light is electromagnetic, and it can transform into other forms of energy, e.g. electricity, heat.

A person could study these four qualities for several years, if he had the mind to do so, but I will focus on the first two points in this essay. The figure below shows all the kinds of electromagnetic radiation in relation to the wavelength.



The first thing that you think of when you see the visible spectrum, is that it resembles a rainbow. Rainbows are mentioned in the Bible (Genesis 9:1-17). The Bible says that God sent a rainbow to Noah as a symbol of his promise to never flood the earth again. So, we might conclude that what we can see of God, is filled with colorful promises about life.

As seen in the figure, the visible range of light is only a very small part of the full spectrum. By extension, we can conclude that we can only see a very small part of Who God is and what He does. There is a lot about God that we simply cannot see with the unassisted eye.

In fact, there is one more category of light above “Gamma Rays”, having wavelengths shorter than 0.1 Angstrom. These are called “Cosmic Rays” because they are found mostly in outer space. I think it is quite fitting to think that the most intense things about God are “out of this world”!

One interesting thing about electromagnetic light is that it can pass through things. We can sit inside our house or car and watch TV, listen to the radio, or talk on our mobile phones, because radio waves, including television broadcasting and our mobile phone service, are transmitted through the air, wood, metal, glass and concrete. The idea of “hiding from God” is as absurd as “hiding from the radio waves” in modern times. In spiritual words, we would need to burrow deep underground, or move far away from the broadcasting station, before we would LOSE RECEPTION of the message that the telecommunications company sends to us. But even so, radio and microwave transmissions are a man-made source of electromagnetic communication. Natural light (or God) surrounds us in other forms constantly.

The transmittency of light is utilized in medical X-rays, which allows doctors to “see through” the human body. The X-rays can easily pass through the flesh, but our bones are higher in density, and they deflect some of the X-rays passing through. The transmitted X-rays are shown on a photonegative plate, much like visible wavelengths of light cast images on camera film, thereby producing a “photograph” of what is inside the body.

Another interesting point is that the high-energy gamma rays and X-rays are harmful or even deadly to the human body. This loosely compares with the scriptures that tell us how certain people died when they “looked upon God”. Our modern scientific language might say, “They got zapped by cosmic rays!”

Ultra violet light, though much less energetic than X-rays, is still harmful to the eyes and skin, producing sunburn, retinal burn, and even melanoma or skin cancer. So it is helpful to wear sunglasses and sunscreen lotion whenever spending long periods of time outdoors in the summer.

This phenomena may help us understand why a lot of children of pastors and deacons get “burnt out”, or “blinded by the light”, and then prefer to spend a lot of time in “darkness” during their post-adolescent period. Such children are more commonly labeled, “rebellious” by church folks. Why don’t they use sunscreen?

Why are the shorter wavelengths of light so harmful? It is because the energy of any particular wavelength is proportional to its frequency. In other words, very short wavelengths are high energy, whereas, longer wavelengths have a lower energy.

It is somewhat impressive to think that light can travel, not only through air, but through solid objects as well. There is a lot more that we can learn from this point.

If the light can pass through an object without being deflected, then it is called TRANSPARENT. If some of the light is deflected, then it is called TRANSLUCENT, and if most of the light is deflected, then it is called OPAQUE.

The Bible says that Christians are “the light of the world”. The Apostle Paul makes it clear that this light does not originate from ourselves, but from God. In effect, God’s light “passes through us” and illuminates the people and environment around us, wherever we might be.

So now we must pose the question of what makes some things transparent, and others, opaque? Why does God shine through some people and not through others, even though they all may claim to be Christians?

Optical transparency in polycrystalline materials is limited by the amount of light which is scattered by the microstructural features. Optical scattering occurs when the sizes or the distances between microstructures are on the same order of magnitude as the wavelength of the light. When the sizes of all such structures are reduced well below the wavelength of the light being used, the scattering becomes insignificant.

For example, crystalline quartz has lattice spacings that range between 0.491 to 0.541 nm, and ordinary glass has a crystallographic order that is limited to the range of 2-3 nm, due to geometrical frustration. (1,000,000,000 nanometers = 1 meter) Thus, X-rays are refracted in quartz and glass, since the wavelengths are on a similar spatial scale. But these materials are both transparent in visible light, which has a much longer wavelength, on the order of half a micrometer (or 500 nm).

As a general rule, the sizes of the microstructures should be at least 1/15 of the wavelength in question, in order to eliminate the scattering and preserve translucency. (e.g. 550 nm / 15 = 36.7 nm) Materials with microstructural dimensions much smaller than λ/15 should display a greater transparency.

What are the microstructures that cause optical scattering?

The main causes of optical scattering in otherwise transparent materials, include the following:

- Cracks, voids, and porosity, which is basically EMPTY SPACE. The volume fraction of microscopic pores should be less than 1% for a high-quality optical transmission, or in other words, the material density should be 99.99% of the theoretical crystalline density. In other words, “SLACKERS DON’T SHINE”.
- Microstructural interfaces and grain boundaries – In polycrystalline metals and ceramics, these are internal surfaces of high DISORDER which lie between areas of crystallographic order. These interfaces commonly contain larger concentrations of (moral) IMPURITIES.
- Geometry – when light passes through a material, the speed of transmission changes as a function of wavelength, when entering or leaving different medium, such as glass or air. The index of refraction is a fixed material property that describes how the direction and velocity of light tends to change when passing through the material. Smaller (higher energy) wavelengths are refracted more than longer wavelengths. Transparent optical instruments that have a carefully controlled geometry, such as prisms, lenses and fiber optics, are useful because of their ability to bend or diffract light. So we ask the question here; “What is your SPIRITUAL SHAPE?”
- SURFACE ROUGHNESS, especially between two materials with contrasting indexes of refraction. This is basically a geometric property on a very small scale.

In many cases, an OIL is used to fill cracks and voids, and produce a smooth, shiny surface on materials. This makes them more ATTRACTIVE and USEFUL, and it also PROTECTS the material from rot and rust. Common finishing oils include tung oil and linseed oil. Another example is the Oil of Olay, which is helpful in smoothing cosmetic wrinkles. Oil also REMOVES FRICTION in sliding parts and SILENCES CHATTER AND SQUEAKING (complaints). Sometimes, drops of oil are used as lenses themselves. This knowledge might help us understand the spiritual significance of how and why God’s chosen leaders are ANOINTED WITH OIL. The only difference is that Elijah used Berio’s Extra Virgin.

The noteworthy point of application here, is that we must reduce the sizes of our own microstructures if we are to expect God’s light to shine through us. Remember that the wavelength of the light that can be transmitted, is at least 15 times larger than the dimensions of our own microstructures. We must also note that the high energy light has shorter wavelengths, which implies that smaller things tend to make bigger impressions on us about God. So it is not hard to understand why simplicity and humility are important towards our spiritual health, and why individuals, such as friends, teachers and family members, tend to shape our ideas about God much more than a large sized church can.

Remember that diamonds, which are hard and transparent, are nothing more than carbon (e.g. ash, soot, graphite) which is perfect and flawless on the microstructural level! Diamonds are formed in conditions of high temperature and pressure, which remove all crystallographic flaws, voids and impurities. So, if we hope to become spiritual “diamonds” we must expect to withstand similar experiences in life.

What is your level of spiritual transmittency?

Are you a diamond or a lump of coal?

Are you transparent, translucent, or opaque?

Science and Scripture

Jack · 20 November 2009 · Archived copy · Original

The following article is a fantastic testimony written by one of my college professors. His viewpoints have had a deep effect on the rational aspects of my faith. I pray his words will speak to you as well.

What I Believe Regarding Science and Scripture
by John Burton, Ph.D.
Physics Professor Emeritus
Carson-Newman College
May, 2005

I am endeavoring to articulate what I believe about science and scripture and how, together, they impact our lives. This is not based on extensive reading of literature, but on a lifetime of influence by Christian family, friends and churches, on regular personal Bible study, on trying to follow the Lordship of Christ and on training in physics and a career of research and teaching of physics, astronomy, computer science and mathematics. This essay is not intended to persuade anyone to believe as I do, but it is offered in the hope that this discourse will help others to formulate and articulate their own practice of both reason and faith.

For the purpose of this treatise, the word “science” is intended to comprise all systematic studies, including the natural sciences, social studies, studies of human behavior and systematic theology. Although my experience is primarily in physics, I believe similar principles apply to many areas of study. “Scripture” is intended to include the canonized Bible, as commonly recognized by most Biblical scholars, using any translation that is deemed to be reasonably faithful to the earliest available texts.

From my perspective, scientific study is often misinterpreted or misrepresented as a search for absolute truth, resulting in irrefutable conclusions. I believe most reputable scientists view their work as an on-going endeavor to find and refine useful theories by which to describe and utilize the world around us. Any conclusion drawn from their work is never absolutely proven to be correct, but is always subject to being disproved or shown to be inadequate for some purposes.

We have fallen into the misleading habit of referring to some theories as “laws.” However, many famous “laws” of physics have been shown to be incorrect. For example, Newton’s laws of motion, while adequate for describing the motion of billiard balls, rocket ships and satellites, we now know that calculations based on Newton’s laws are not precise. When speeds approach the speed of light or when objects are as small as atoms or as massive as stars, the observed behavior of these objects does not adhere to Newton’s laws! New concepts of relativity and quantum theory are required to accurately predict their behavior.

Such discrepancies do not obviate the value of a theory, however. For most directly observed motions, Newton’s laws yield results that agree with observations so closely that the discrepancies cannot be measured. Thus Newton’s laws are still used, as a practical convenience. The more complex theories are not needed, to obtain useful results. By extension, we should suppose that even the revered theories of relativity and quantum mechanics will one day be shown insufficiently accurate for some purposes. Even now, string theory seems to be gaining credibility for cosmological calculations and some evidence may be exposing inadequacies of the former theories.

Therefore, the value of a scientific theory does not depend so much on whether it is right or wrong, but on whether it is useful. If useful applications may be drawn from a theory, then it is of value to the scientific community and to humanity at large. If we are aware of the limitations of a theory, then we are appropriately equipped to make proper use of it. Otherwise, inappropriate application of a theory may become a stumbling block to progress.

A most daunting task of science is to unravel the overall structure of the entire universe and to understand the processes by which the universe has come into being and has developed into its present form. We may wonder if creatures can really fathom the processes of creation and describe the plan of the Creator. Nevertheless, I consider the remarkable mental capacity of mankind, to contemplate his own existence and to question his own place in the universe, as a divinely endowed challenge to explore the structure of the universe and seek to discover its origin. This is a part of God's directive, "fill the earth and subdue it." (Genesis 1:28) God made the universe with great wisdom and intricately intelligent design. He has also endowed man with the capacity to discover principles of His creative design. If we are to be good stewards of His universe and of the capacities He has given us, we must diligently study this world and apply our minds to understanding it. We should be good stewards of His designs. (See Isaiah 6:9-13.)

Astronomers and cosmologists have responded to that challenge by studying the structure of stars, galaxies and clusters of galaxies. As farther reaches of space are explored, there appears to be an ever-increasing order of emptiness in our universe. There is more distance between neighboring stars than most of us can imagine. Yet, on a cosmic scale, our solar system is in a relatively crowded part of our Milky Way Galaxy, beyond which there is even more empty space between galaxies. Galaxies, in turn, are gathered in clusters of galaxies, which are separated by emptiness that is an order of magnitude larger than clusters themselves. Beyond that are super-clusters of clusters, spreading out even further into space. In principle, we could imagine that the order of clustering continues ad infinitum and thus avoid the perplexing quandary of explaining what exists beyond the observable universe. Most cosmologists, however, find it more useful to assume that the universe is finite in both extent and in age.

Theories have been developed which help us understand the functioning of stars and other astronomical phenomena with remarkable success. This, in spite of our inability to travel much beyond our own planet or see beneath the surface of the sun or detect any detailed features of any star other than the sun. Only by thorough analysis of tiny specks of light and painstaking application of principles of physics have we illuminated some of the mysteries of the heavens. Not all phenomena are explained to everyone's satisfaction, however, and there are still competing theories, which remain to be adjudged as to which is most consistent with observations.

One theory that has gained credibility with many scientists is the "Big Bang" theory, which posits that the origin of the universe occurred at an instant when all the matter-energy of the universe was released in a tremendous explosion at a tiny point. That theory is consistent with observations that galaxies are receding from each other at a great rate, as though driven by a large explosion. Background radiation from empty space and other acutely measured phenomena also seem to support the notion of such an explosive beginning of the universe. By careful measurement of current conditions in the universe, physicists have been able to deduce conditions that would have existed just an infinitesimal moment after the beginning of time. There are always discrepancies and dissenting views, but the "Big Bang" notion has produced some interesting and useful conclusions. Since scientists cannot conduct experiments regarding the creation of the universe, nor can they observe more than one example of the process, any degree of success in this field is rather remarkable.

At the other extreme end of the scale, physicists have probed the inner workings of matter. The term "atom" derives from a Greek word implying the smallest indivisible particle of matter. Although the modern concept of the atom includes clearly separable components, the term applies to a very useful concept of physics and chemistry. The atom is much too small to be observed with visible light, being a thousand times smaller than the wavelengths of light by which we see. The tiny world of the atom does not conform to the principles of motion that we readily observe around us. Rather, the position and momentum of electrons and other sub-microscopic entities appear to be governed by mathematical equations of probability rather than Newton's predictable equations of motion. Yet, evidence is quite convincing that quantum theories regarding the structure of atoms provide accurate results regarding chemical reactions, bonding of atoms into molecular structures, the emission and absorption of light and other phenomena.

As we delve into the interior structure of the atom, we find another rather startling degree of emptiness. The nucleus of the atom, which comprises over 99.9% of its mass, resides amidst a swarming cloud of electrons at a tiny point of space one hundred thousand times smaller in diameter than the minuscule atom itself. Our most useful theories of this tiny nucleus indicate that its major constituents are protons, neutrons and number of medium-sized mesons, which serve to bind these parts into the unbelievably small volume of the nucleus. So the "indivisible" atom appears to be incredibly divisible! As nuclear physicists were just becoming comfortable and familiar with these constituents and were attempting to unravel their mysteries, evidence began to mount that nuclear particles are themselves composed of an entirely new class of particles called “quarks.” Theories regarding the behavior of all these basic particles of matter stretch one’s mind beyond what seems intuitively plausible and well beyond the mathematical skills of most of us. One may now begin to ask, “what are quarks made of?”

If I may stray a bit from the field of physics, I would like to comment on evolutionary theory. Evolution has been hotly debated and often misunderstood and misinterpreted, in my view. From what I have learned from biologists, I believe that principles of evolution have been demonstrated as useful tools for classifying various life forms and for explaining their existence and survival through the ages. These principles seem to be well supported by substantial evidence, gathered and interpreted by a large number of reputable biologists. Many of these biologists are also devout believers in God and in His divine creation and sustenance of life.

Some people view evolution as a theory that attributes the development of life forms to mere chance, devoid of any divine origin. I rather believe that evolution is a very plausible description of a divinely ordained process by which life came into being and flourished on earth. While some isolated observations may appear to be inconsistent with evolutionary principles, the preponderance of evidence seems to support the occurrence of evolutionary processes. The concept of evolution of life does not obviate my faith in God, but reinforces my conviction that God creates and sustains life in a marvelously patient process, with an orderly plan that stretches our imagination. I can certainly perceive God working in my life and in various living beings around me through natural, gradual processes of change. Our notions of evolution might be inaccurate, but they are nevertheless useful and even inspiring.

Theories of the sciences have achieved moderate success in describing observations ranging from the very smallest nuclear particle to the most far-reaching galactic structures of the cosmos, from the inanimate to the living, from the individual cell to society at large. Theories in many fields of natural science have reached such a complexity and level of sophistication that only experts trained in that narrow field can fully comprehend their ramifications. I doubt that any one person or even a collective team of physicists could claim a thorough understanding of the whole of physics. Consistency of theory with observation is not perfect and understanding of phenomena is not complete, however. Similar statements may be made regarding all areas of science. It is my conviction that our quest for understanding the natural world will never be completely satisfactory. Theories will continue to be disproved or found lacking. There will always be questions about what lies beyond or beneath our current understanding. As long as a child can ask “why?” or “what is this made of?” there will always be a need for scientific inquiry.

Having discoursed beyond what I fully comprehend of scientific studies, I would like to discuss what I believe about scripture. I believe the Bible is a uniquely inspired book containing a divinely ordained message from God. The Bible is inspired by God in its origin, in its preservation and canonization, in its translation and dissemination and in its illumination and interpretation for our lives.

I believe the content of the Bible was produced by genuine people of faith, as they experienced divine revelation from God. I am not comfortable, however, with the term “inerrant” in connection with the Biblical text. Some claim that the original words were inerrant, but that is not a practical conclusion, since no such original record of words exists and some parts of the Bible most likely came from multiple oral traditions with no singular origin. God surely communicates His message with perfection, but the human aspect of the Biblical record renders it less than perfect. As soon as man contemplates God’s message I believe it becomes less than perfectly understood. When he communicates it to others it is corrupted by man’s limitations. I think if we ignore the human background of scripture, we are in danger of misunderstanding its message and we may be guilty of an idolatrous attitude toward the book. If our God could be adequately described in a book, then we have made Him too small. If all that God requires of our relationship with Him could be prescribed in words, then there would be no need for faith.

Beyond the difficulty of recording a divine message for human understanding, there is the problem of transmitting that message through ages of changing languages, cultures and literary styles. We must rely on trained biblical scholars to help us understand what the text said and what it meant in the day it was recorded. The process of translating words and meaning into our language always involves interpretation by the translators, which affects the meaning we derive from scripture. It also appears that much of the Bible is written in figurative terms, which, when taken literally, may convey a very different meaning from what was originally intended. Our own interpretation of the words of the Bible becomes an important key to the meaning we find in the message.

Words of the Bible have certainly been used in ways that seem contrary to God's intentions. In the Garden of Eden, Satan turned God's command into a question,

> "Yea, hath God said, Ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden?" (Genesis 3:1 KJV)

When tempting Jesus, Satan used scripture to cast doubt on God's providence (Matthew 4:6). Some have used scripture to justify war, racial prejudice and gender discrimination. Others, by insisting that their own interpretation of scripture is the only way to believe the Bible, have driven wedges between peoples of faith. Such divisive use of scripture may well do more to impede the cause of Christ than anything the devil could imagine! In these instances, I would not call those passages the word of God. Like any other powerful words, passages of scripture can be used for ungodly purposes. The Bible is the word of God only when His message is used for His purposes.

The phrase, word of the Lord, in scripture often refers to the expression of all that God is: His power in creation, His character of righteousness, His standards of living in holy communion with Him, His awesome command for reverence. Whenever and however His Word is expressed, we must pay careful attention and ascribe highest priority to the divine communication. We must thank the Lord for His holy, powerful and commanding Word and pay reverent attention to every expression of His Word. (See Jeremiah 1)

The word of the Lord comes to His spokespersons with overwhelming force, so that in spite of reluctance or misgivings, he is able to bring words of warning and encouragement, of prophecy and judgment, of grace and peace. Even in the face of opposition and disaster, God is always about fulfilling His word through the events of history. Faithful spokespersons have bravely proclaimed God's message in difficult circumstances. We must speak boldly the message He has for our generation. (Ezekiel 13:1-16)

It is an awesome responsibility to declare the word of the Lord. Those who do so must be sure that God has really spoken to them and that they are not declaring false hopes from their own imagination. The false hopes for a false peace, which they have built up, will be destroyed in a mighty crash by God's wrath. We must discern between our own false hopes and the true word of God that comes from God. We must only hear and declare what is truly God's word. (See Acts 13:40-52)

Given the seemingly impossible prospect of recording, transmitting and understanding a message from God, the Bible appears to me as a divinely ordained miracle. That miracle includes the recording, preservation, canonization, translation, reading and understanding of the divine message. Therefore we should approach our reading of the Bible with the same awe with which we would view a raising of the dead, the birth of a child or the redemption of a sinner. Unless we are reading and understanding scripture with divine guidance, we may be assimilating a message derived from our own inclination, from someone else's determination or from satanic urge, rather than from God.

One part of the Bible that is particularly hard to interpret is the account of creation found in Genesis. A literal analysis of the text implies that creation of the universe took place in six days, about six thousand years ago. That appears to be in distinct contradiction with considerable physical evidence that the universe is ten to fifteen billion years old, that many transformations occurred over billions of years and that life has developed for many millions of years.

There are several ways to try to resolve these apparent discrepancies. Some deny the validity of the Bible and accept only what can be "scientifically proven." Some relegate validity of the Bible only to "spiritual" matters and leave science to the scientists. Some deny all of science and accept only what is written in the Bible (as they literally interpret it). There are various shades of resolution in between these extremes.

In trying to bring harmony between the Biblical account of creation and physical evidence, we may examine the literal meaning of the words in Genesis 1. The word “day” may not mean a 24-hour period, as we experience a day. After all, the sun is not mentioned until the fourth day. One rather useful sense of the word “day” refers to an undetermined period of time is as, for example, “in Abraham’s day.” Certainly, God’s day could be eons in length!

In jest, here is an amusing calculation that illustrates how God’s day differs from ours. In 2 Peter 3:8, we read “one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day (KJV).” So one day is like 365,000 days and each of those days is like 1000 years (since the factor is mentioned twice), making one day like 365 million years. The six days of God’s creative activity could thus literally be claimed to have lasted nearly two billion years, which is remarkably similar to what physical evidence seems to indicate.

Rather than focus on literal meaning of words, I believe we should examine the significance of the message of scripture. To me, the important message of Genesis 1-2 is that God created the entire universe by His own power, according to His divine plan and in an orderly fashion. I don’t think the six days were intended to be taken literally, but they speak to the orderliness of the process. We must bear in mind that ancient man had no means of comprehending billions of years, so six days of creation provided a symbolic picture of God’s creative process, which spoke adequately to him of God’s method. Now that we are able to express numbers in the billions, we can begin to comprehend the great patience with which God created the universe.

The order of the stages of creation presented in Genesis 1 is not the same as the order that seems to be apparent from physical evidence or logical reasoning. For example, it seems a bit strange that plants should be created before the sun, moon and stars. This apparent contradiction does not hinder my belief in the message of Genesis, however. God, in His divine time frame, is not limited to a one-dimensional aspect of time, which marches only forward. We may think of God as having many different dimensions of time. From His perspective, He can cause an event before or even after it happens. His order of events is not bound by our one-dimensional time frame! More significantly, I believe the message of the order of events presented in Genesis 1 is found in the two series of three progressions, from non-living to living: light, sky, plants and then lights, creatures of sea and air, creatures of land. God is the source of light and life, both literally and figuratively. When we impose our modern, western standards of technical accuracy on the ancient, eastern style of writing, we may miss the message of the Bible.

God communicates to us through messengers, through His word and by His Holy Spirit influencing our hearts. But we can never fully comprehend His identity or invoke His name in a way that fully honors Him. We honor Him by obedient faith in God, whom we can never fully know in our mortal state. (See Judges 13:15-21.) Knowing, understanding and observing God’s word is tantamount to successful living. By following God’s directions, the Israelites were able to conquer far more powerful peoples and occupy their land. Only by keeping God’s laws would they be able to remain fruitful in the land. Other peoples, who did not understand God’s laws, were not as blessed, nor were they chosen as His people.

True wisdom and understanding do not come from man’s efforts alone, nor do they reside in nature or the principles of the universe. They cannot be purchased, inherited or gained by our own efforts. True wisdom and understanding come only by the grace of God, as He allows us to gain insight through scripture, revelation from God’s Holy Spirit, instruction from godly teachers and study on our part. All study is vain unless we depend on God. (See Psalms 119:97-104.)

Since Jesus also felt obliged to study God’s law and inquire into its meaning, we must be diligent to study, understand and obey God’s word in the scriptures. (See Luke 2:41-52). Study of the scripture does not necessarily lead us to its real message, however. The Jewish scholars had thoroughly studied the scriptures, yet missed its message about Christ. Only if we study God’s word with our hearts open to its message and to the guidance of the Holy Spirit will we find the gospel message of salvation through faith in Jesus. (See John 5:36-47.)

I am certain that my interpretations of Genesis and many parts of the Bible will be disputed by others who have studied the Bible. There are sure to be elements of my theology that are wrong. In fact, I believe every interpretation of the Bible by man has flaws. If we could somehow distill every thought that anyone has had about God that is true and in keeping with God's divine nature and formulate those thoughts into a coherent discourse on God, that discourse would fall far short of God's glory. By nature, we all interpret the Bible and contemplate the nature of God according to our own limitations and biases. Since none of us has a perfect perception of God, we must not look down on anyone's ideas about God or interpretation of the Bible. The good news of the gospel is that God loves us in spite of all our misinformed notions about Himself. The demand of the gospel is that we love each other in spite of all our mistakes and differences.

Therefore, I try not to inflict my own way of understanding the Bible on other people with undue force. I am eager to share my views in hope of inspiring others. I also try to appreciate the divine inspiration that comes through another person's differing interpretation of scripture. One may find inspiration in accepting that there were six literal days of creation. God could certainly have created a 15 billion year-old universe in six days. I find greater personal inspiration in the thought that God exercised unimaginable patience by ordaining those six days to unfold for billions of years. Some scientists try to circumvent the notion of a creator by proposing a theory in which the universe has no beginning point at all. That doesn't bother my faith, for God is old enough to have created a universe of infinite age!

> "From everlasting to everlasting, thou art God." (Psalm 90:2, KJV)

If we are to maintain effective fellowship with other Christians and if we are to relate in a redemptive fashion with those outside the Christian faith, we must be accepting and understanding of a wide range of interpretations of scripture and world events.

Lest we fall into the trap of relativism in our faith, we need some standard by which to form an opinion regarding interpretation of scripture. I take the view that an interpretation of scripture is most nearly valid if it is consistent with the overall message of the Bible and if it inspires me in a divine manner. What may be inspiring to one person or age may not be so to another. God's revelation is not static, nor carved in an idol of stone. We must allow God's dynamic message of scripture to speak differently to different people in different circumstances. Each of us has the responsibility and the privilege of experiencing God's Biblical message in ways that are tailored to meet our particular needs. That responsibility requires on our part diligent study of the entire Bible and faith in the Holy Spirit to guide our understanding of its message. Living out the message of the Bible requires that we practice creative accommodation in the context of Christian fellowship.

If we ask for wisdom from God, He will grant the sort of wisdom that guards us against all kinds of enemies, both spiritual and physical. God's wisdom keeps us from temptations of all kinds and helps us to discern the best path to take and the most just of relationships among our fellow human beings. God's wisdom can even confound Satan and all those who oppose the cause of Christ. Sharing instruction from God's wisdom will build a community of good will and peace. Therefore we must seek God's wisdom above all other reason. We should rely on His wisdom rather than our own or anyone else's. (See Proverbs 3:13-20.)

It is my firm conviction that scientific study and Biblical faith are intended to be employed together in our lives without contradiction. There is no area of legitimate study that will contradict faith, when pursued with integrity. While faith is not derived from scientific study or logical reasoning, many conclusions of science can serve to under-gird and reinforce our faith.

> "The heavens declare the glory of God; the skies proclaim the work of his hands." (Psalms 19:1 NIV)

A scientific explanation of creation reinforces my belief in an intelligent creator. The biologists' description of the evolution of life deepens my reverence for the source and sustainer of life. Conversely, my faith in an omniscient creator motivates me to endeavor to explain mysteries of matter and the universe. Someone has said, "Science without faith is blind. Faith without science is lame." (A paraphrase of a quote attributed to Albert Einstein) By relying both on faith that is based on God's Biblical message and on scientific discoveries derived from careful observation and skilled reasoning, we can live a life blessed with both spiritual sight and physical vigor.

A Salesman's Perspective

Jack · 2 December 2009 · Archived copy · Original

My Sales Experience with Thomas Nelson Publishers

In the summer of 1995, I had a sales internship with the Thomas Nelson Publishing Company. The company gave us a two-day training, and then I went out with two others, Butch and Donnie, with a sack of Bibles and children's books, to sell door-to-door.

This was the toughest job I ever had.

The company assigned us to a small town in northern Florida, which was over 900 miles (1450 kilometers) from my home. When we finally arrived in that town, after a 15 hour drive, it was hot and barren, and the people were nasty. We had less than US$100 between the three of us, and we knew no one in that town. We didn't know what our next meal would be, or where we would sleep that night.

After driving around for a while, we found a pay phone in a scorching hot parking lot, which was surrounded by trees and a chain link fence. (There were no mobile phones back then.) One of the first things we did was pray. Then we looked at a map and a phone book, and tried to get a clue. We phoned local churches, landlords and businesses, anyone who might rent us a room for the summer, but no luck.

After three sweltering hours with no leads, we ran out of quarters and couldn't make any more phone calls. I was exasperated, and I sat down next to the chain link fence with my back to the guys, wiped the sweat off my face and wept. My tears in the humid heat should have made things look blurry, but I remember that moment clearly. Looking back, I suppose Butch and Donnie could have ridiculed me for being "weak", but they never did. I guess they were equally intimidated. In fact, Donnie went off by himself for a while under the trees, so I think maybe he broke down too.

So then we went to a church, with our Thomas Nelson badges in hand, and explained to some of the leaders that we were selling Bibles and we needed a place to stay. Within two hours, we had found a home. A man named England, who was a retired Navy Seal, was taking a long summer vacation overseas, and he agreed to let us stay in his home while he was gone – free of charge. He only asked that we mow his lawn once a week, and keep his house clean. We were happy to do so. The only bad thing was that I had to share a bed with Butch.

However, England had a daughter who thought her father was stupid for letting strange salesmen stay in his home while he was away. She called us constantly, and visited us at least twice a week, just to make sure we were keeping up with things. Given our situation, we felt obligated to tolerate her. This lady noticed EVERYTHING, and she made me scrub the toilet until I knew the side of the bowl like the back of my hand.

The next two weeks went by, slower than a snail. I was only able to sell enough books and Bibles to cover my daily expenses, but over time, I was losing money. Butch had a year of experience behind him, and so he was a little more successful than I was. He loaned me US$140 to help keep me going.

The financial precariousness was only a shadow of the real, day-to-day horrors of being a salesman. My car broke down on the road, twice. People lied to me, in order to avoid me. I was vehemently cussed out at least once every day. One morning, I ate a poppyseed muffin for breakfast, and it gave me scorching hot poppyseed diarrhea all day. I fertilized the cornfields, because there were no public restrooms, and no one was admitting me into their homes. I used up all the toilet paper in my car, so by afternoon, I had to use leaves to clean up.

After a few days, I shaved my goatee, changed my hairstyle and started wearing a tie (in spite of the heat), hoping to make myself more presentable, so that I might get a warmer response from people, and sell more books. But that only made a small effect.

During the first week of knocking on doors, a huge black Doberman with a spiked collar, came up to me as I knocked on the door of a home. It growled at me fiercely. I didn't move, because I wasn't sure how dangerous the dog was. But while I stood there waiting for the resident to answer the door, the dog urinated all over my bag of Bibles. No one answered the door, and I thought to myself, "This dog is going to hell!" But I was wise enough to know that I should not move quickly or look the dog in the eye, so I got away unscathed, with only a smelly bag. (Fortunately, the bag was waterproof.)

One afternoon, I happened to interrupt a man's drinking spree, and he hugged me for more than 20 minutes, talking about the great barbecue we would have on the coming Saturday. I didn't know what to say, so I just smiled and nodded my head. His wife just stood there and wrung her hands.

Another man chased me for a mile in a 4×4 truck with a shotgun rack. When I realized he wasn't going to quit chasing me, I stopped to talk with him. He wanted me to get out of my car and fight him, but I made the wise choice to stay in my car and let him vent. He scolded me for more than 10 minutes about how I had frightened his wife by knocking on the door of his house, and how I was creating fear in his neighborhood. I didn't understand why he was so defensive, but I could feel his anger and frustration. I held a very respectful and apologetic tone, and eventually he calmed down, got back into his truck and left.

On a Wednesday afternoon, one lady answered the door wearing a negligee. When I opened my sales pitch, she reached behind the door and pulled a gun on me, and she asked me if I was really selling Bibles! I said I was, and she used the pistol to point me down the street and slammed the door in my face. Later, I told Butch about this incident, and he said she was probably a hooker who expected me to be a john.

One man somehow got the idea that I was doing a survey for the local Board of Education, and he called several of his neighbors to come over and meet me. They all complained to me for the next 40 minutes about how the whole school system was falling apart and how the young people were becoming degenerate as a result. I didn't really know what to do, so I just adopted the assumed role and shook my head in agreement.

On a Thursday morning, an older man saw my big car (a 1968 Dodge Polara) and chased me with a garden hoe, yelling out, "So YOU'RE that salesman who's been stealing kids' bicycles!" That was a very surprising and exciting experience.

People called the police on me two or three times every day, telling them things like I had "tried to break into their homes". But Butch, Donnie and I had already registered our presence at the town police station, so the authorities knew we were doing sales in town. Nevertheless, the police had to respond to every call. I got to know one of the policemen, Nick, on a first-name basis! But the police often did not arrive until I was two or three houses down the road from the person who called in, and it was extremely embarrassing to have the policemen interrupt my business, just when I was about to make a sale. Of course, it ruined the sale every time.

One very religious man made me sit in his kitchen chair while he gave me a big sermon about hell and damnation, and how I would wind up there if I didn't stop "using the Lord's Word for financial gain". I didn't have the heart to tell him that I was losing money. He preached for a long while, as if he were determined to see my "repentance". He only settled down after we had a prayer together. After I left his home, his words affected me, and I decided to take the rest of the afternoon off.

During the second week of sales, I had a "stroke of genius" – I should try to sell Bibles to a Church! Upon approaching one very large church with my Thomas Nelson identity, they led me into a private office and asked me to wait. While sitting there, I thought I might sell 200 Bibles! But then, about ten men, dressed in dark, stiff suits and ties came in the door. They surrounded me, and with stern gazes, drilled me with all kinds of philosophical questions about religion, expecting me to give answers that would impress a Doctor of Divinity. They asked me very specific questions about my views on salvation, sanctification, predestination, etc. They demanded, "Define your relationship with God!" Finally, after nearly an hour of interrogations, they concluded that I was a pagan rogue salesman who could not possibly be representing the worlds' largest Bible publisher, and they kicked me out of the church!

WOW!

In a way, I could almost identify with Jesus. I mean, I was bringing the Bible to people in their homes, but they demonized me and rejected me. How could they know that I was losing money by doing so? How could they imagine my suffering?

On the other hand, a lot of people didn't seem to care who I was or what I was doing, they were just glad to have someone to talk to. Some people were very pleasant to talk with, but many other people expected me to sit quietly and listen to them ramble on and on, usually about a very unpleasant and personal topic. But if I tried to deliver my sales pitch, or even if I just tried to change the subject, they would label me as inconsiderate, or even a fraud, and kick me out.

After knocking on hundreds of doors, I think one thing that struck me really hard, is seeing that every single home I visited, had some kind of problem or difficulty. Divorce, alcoholism, rebellious children, poverty, rejection, isolation and loneliness, anger and meanness, fear, drug abuse, manipulation and exploitation, fire damage and auto accidents, physical or mental handicaps of family members… It was depressing, really. I realized that I was a lot more "normal" than I ever realized.

I think one of the happiest people I met was a very old lady named Edna, who was a member of the local Methodist Church. She invited me into her home, even before I gave her an introduction. She knew I was hungry and tired, and she gave me a sandwich and a glass of milk, and she made polite conversation with me as I ate. Finding her was like finding an oasis in a desert. As I left, she told me she was proud of my work, and that I should come back if I ever needed anything.

Another person I am very grateful to have met, was an older black man, who was sitting on a cement block in front of his gray, two-story home. He had an old milk jug crate in front of him, and a watermelon on the ground beside him. When he saw me coming, he beckoned me to sit on another cement block that was nearby, and I did. He put a small board on top of the milk crate, and set the watermelon on top of the board. Then he grabbed a very dirty, oily piece of sheet metal from behind him, and used it to slice the watermelon. We sat there and ate the watermelon, and we never said a word to each other, but we were both very happy.

During the second week of sales, Donnie disappeared. He just didn't come home one day. When Butch and I went into his room, we found a large stack of Bibles that he claimed to have sold, and a handwritten note from him, apologizing for lying about his "great success as a salesman". When we counted his books and went over his papers, we discovered that he had not sold one single book! We were disheartened to find out he had lied and quit, and that he was too ashamed to face us, even to say goodbye. After that, I was glad that I shared the room with Butch. It made me realize how "alone" we really were, and how much we needed each other for moral support.

All of these things happened within two weeks!

After two weeks, I decided that my sales technique was not going to improve any further, and I was not going to be any more successful in sales than I had been so far. I had seen enough. I gave my remaining books to Butch, and wished him farewell.

The Takeaway

From this experience, I learned that I am NOT a good salesman, and that cold selling is tougher than I ever imagined. But even though this experience was so horrible, I still learned a countless number of things that have helped me in life ever since. A few of these include…

- Make daily goals.
- Stay on a schedule.
- Always be prepared. (Keep a few tools, toilet paper, and water in your car.)

- Keep your mind on your business. Stay focused. Don't let yourself get distracted.
- Eat healthy, square meals regularly.
- Get a good night's rest, every night.
- Be aware of how people's words can affect you.
- Understand that the world is full of suffering, and everyone has their own struggle, so try to be a "light" of encouragement and positivity, wherever you are.
- When people look at you with inquisitive doubts, just smile and wave.
- Upon the occasion of an introduction, shake the persons' hand, look him in the eye, and say your name loud and clearly.
- Always remember a persons' name, and at least one idea from your last discussion.
- Find what people need, and then try to match those needs with what you can offer.
- Keep in touch with people, especially those who encourage you.
- Make good contacts with others, build rapport within your neighborhood and community.
- People are special. Everyone is a little different in some way. So it is not proper to treat everyone the same way.
- The best people to know are not always rich, educated or religious.
- There will always be a lot of people who misunderstand and misjudge you, but it doesn't matter. You must continue on with your life and purpose.
- Develop a firm belief that "no matter what might happen, things will be OK".
- Whenever you feel like giving up, resolve to try again – just once more.

On a deeper level, I learned that certain people can be happy in any circumstances, and in spite of ones' difficulties. I did not learn how to obtain happiness myself, while selling for Thomas Nelson, but it did make me see a little more of life. Learning a bit about how to be happy in any circumstance, is something I gained from this experience only in retrospect. I wish I would have learned this sooner than I had.

I believe my sales experience with Thomas Nelson Publishers has made me a better person, and I encourage others to take courses and jobs in sales, if only briefly for the character developing experience.

A Spiritual Death

[Eds. note: This post tells the story of how I lost my faith and confidence after I went away to college.]

I grew up in a very conservative Christian home in a rural part of Ohio. Our family went to church three times a week, without fail, for my entire childhood and adolescence. My father was a deacon for more than 25 years, and the treasurer of our church for about 10 years. My mother taught Sunday school to 8-9 year olds. I read the entire Childrens' Bible (about 120 pages) by the age of 8, I read the entire Living Bible by the age of 14, and I read the entire King James Version before I graduated from High School.

When I first started college, the transition was extremely difficult for me. The college I attended was a days' journey from home, in a very large city that was crumbling from crime and unemployment. We did not leave campus after dark, because muggings and shootings were commonplace.

I lived in the dormitory with all the other freshmen. I did well in my studies, but I could not handle all the partying, drunkenness and sexual promiscuity that surrounded me. It was shocking to me, and every new instance, which was nearly daily, kept me continually unseated. I also felt alone and rejected. I wanted nothing more than to find a few other Christians, and share a rented house with them, off-campus.

During my sophomore year, I found such an opportunity. I met three other Christian students, Jay, Deryl and Glenn*, at the meetings of a Christian organization on Campus, called, "Christians in Action" (or "the CIA"), and we rented a large house together, off-campus. The house was the parsonage for a Mennonite church next door, but the Pastor had his own house, so the Church let out the house to supplement income. I thought that by living there, I would be free from bad influence and temptation.

My housemates were decent people. Deryl was a Mennonite from rural Illinois. He had a fast Pontiac, and he was cool. Glenn was a Baptist, like me, so we never had a single altercation. Jay was from a wealthy family, and he religiously attended the Assembly of God Tabernacle.

I had many good discussions with all of them, but I was most challenged by Jay. Every morning Jay and I would eat breakfast at the table together, and he would inquire about my spiritual life. In the beginning, I was really thankful to have someone who could discuss such topics with me. I was intrigued to learn the more liberal teachings from his denomination, such as the gifts of the spirit, speaking in tongues, miraculous works and dramatically answered prayers. I found that these things were indeed Biblical, but were never mentioned in the Baptist Churches.

Deryl and Glenn were good housemates, and they were the kind of people I had hoped to share my college days with. But Jay, who was our senior classman, turned out to be very controlling. He handled all the financial transactions for the house, and he constantly monitored every change of events within the house. I liked Jay at first, but that changed when he threw away some of my food.

One day, he was griping about some “ruined” food in the freezer that he had thrown away, and when I looked, I found it was my own food. I asked him how it had gone bad in the freezer, and he said it was stupid to freeze fresh vegetables because once they were frozen, the freshness was ruined. I had bought those vegetables at a farmer’s sale, and I had hoped to make them last a couple months. I was upset, because food is expensive, and I really didn’t have a lot of money. I also felt like he violated my personal property, because he impulsively threw my things away, without first talking to me about it. Perhaps most significantly, it eroded my sense of security, which was the main reason I was living there.

Jay soon got into the habit of asking me extremely specific and pointed questions each day. He would ask me who I had been with the day before, where I had gone the night before, and how late I had stayed up. I felt that such questions were somewhat invasive and compromised our mutual trust, because I felt that he suspected I was being “immoral” in some way, without having any real evidence against me. As he continued to ask such questions, it made me feel accused of things which I knew I was innocent.

Things really changed for me when Jay started asking about my morning devotions. Now, I did not read the Bible and pray every day, but rather, once every two or three days. But whenever I did, I would read several chapters at once, and I did a lot of contemplation and soul searching. I was content with my habits, because God spoke to me, and I was always fed, spiritually.

But Jay was displeased with my habit, and he told me, “Any SERIOUS Christian would read his Bible and pray EVERY DAY, and EARLY in the MORNING!” After Jay said this to me several times, I began to consider it. I thought to myself, “Well, it sure wouldn’t HURT if I read my Bible more often, like every morning. So why not do it?”

After that, I got up a half-hour earlier every morning, at 6:00, and I read my Bible and prayed during that time. The first couple weeks were astonishing. My spiritual life took on a whole new dimension, and I was really excited about the changes. God came alive, and I felt more healthy, content and happy. In my enthusiasm, I would report to Jay each morning, and Jay seemed pleased.

But as time went on, God stopped talking to me through my morning devotions, and the newness and novelty died away. Jay also became more and more critical, and I began to fear our confrontations, because I had nothing new to tell him.

A couple weeks after I recognized that God stopped talking to me through my early-morning disciplines, I gave up my vain discipline. After that, when my alarm would go off at 6:00, I would turn on my bedroom light, so that Jay would think I was on my knees, but actually, I would roll over and snooze until 6:30. After a while, this habit made me feel deceptive, even though I thought it was really none of Jay’s business.

Furthermore, since God wasn’t talking to me anymore, I began to get spiritually dry and I grew seriously worried about my spiritual state. I lost interest in calculus and physics, because such things seemed insignificant, compared to the eternal state of my soul. I flunked half of my classes that quarter, and I became socially reclusive, especially around Jay and his friends.

After that, my spiritual situation spiraled out of control. Jay became incredibly ascetic and unreasonable. He condemned all my favorite music (e.g. U2, The Cars, Tom Petty, etc.) as being "Satanic". He forbade Deryl and I from having a barbecue, because he said we would be "poisoned" by the chrome plating on the grille. (Deryl just laughed at Jay, but I could not prevent Jay's words from affecting my confidence.) One day, all of my underwear disappeared. (About six months later, Jay "found them" and mailed them back to me with a snide letter.)

I was glad when the quarter ended and I returned home. But even after I returned home, my misery did not end. It only got worse. My co-op employer was disappointed with my performance in school, and ended my contract, so I lost my job as well. Then, since I spent more time living at home, my parents became irritated with me, frequently saying critical, biting remarks, and essentially losing faith in my future success.

To make matters worse, there was no one who really understood what I was going through. All my High School friends had moved away, and moved on with their lives. My relationships with family members deteriorated into nothing. God still wasn't talking to me, and soon I despised trying to read the Bible. I wouldn't even touch a Bible for more than a year and a half, because it was repulsive to me. I started attending a different Church, hoping to meet some new faces and shake up my spiritual life, but other Christians noticed my poor disposition, and they either chided me, or avoided me.

In the end, I became a basket case. No friends, no job, no education, no family, no purpose, no self-esteem, and I had no idea what happened to me. I became clinically depressed for more than a year. I saw a psychiatrist every week, but the counseling had no effect. I tried taking some part-time classes, hoping to make a little progress towards a degree, but I continued to fail all my classes. I was only spending the last of what little money I had. It took more than three years for me to get back on my feet.

Meanwhile, God seemed to be totally absent from my life.

Growing “Roots” in Faith

Jack · 12 December 2009 · Archived copy · Original

[Eds. note: This post summarizes how I grew more emotionally and spiritually independent, and how I began developing my own Frame of mind, and stand on my own.]

Part 1 of this story is covered in a previous post, A Spiritual Death (December 8, 2009)

The Goad to Growth

I went through a lengthy time when God was silent. My Bible study and Church attendance, as well as my social life, was dry and fruitless, and all I had left to do was to pray. So I prayed and prayed, and prayed some more. Some days, I would pray more than five hours a day. I’m telling you, I prayed my @$$ off! Still, God continued to be totally silent. I felt anxious, condemned, and extremely alone, and I didn’t understand why.

A lot of Christians told me that I had to “pull myself together”, and they were basically assuming that I had a load of sin in my life, but their advice only made me confused, because I had always been an extremely straight-laced individual. I could not understand God’s silence.

One day, I was talking with my Dad on the phone, and he told me I was just like Job, the Biblical character. That struck me as being true. After that, my mind frequently had dramatic thoughts of God and Satan setting me up, shooting dice, and gambling on my life.

I always believed that being a Christian was all about having a relationship with God, but that relationship seemed to be gone. The idea of me being the subject of a cosmic bet, made me question my value to God. I didn’t really know if I could trust God or not. It was really impossible for me to understand all that God was doing during that time, and that He had a reason for His reticence.

At that time, it was a small comfort to notice that Mortimer and Reginald did the same thing to Eddie Murphy in the movie, “Trading Places” (1983), and since then, I have considered this film to represent a type of Job. A relevant excerpt from this movie appears below. [Warning: Racist language.]

But over time, I gradually began to notice that I could find emotional inspiration and spiritual nourishment in other ways.

1. I spent a lot of time hiking and camping. I also enjoyed traveling through beautiful, rural areas on motorcycle. I found nature to be a powerful source of God’s comfort and provision.
2. Manual labor, art and music are very good sources of spiritual rest and refinement.
3. Eating delicious and nutritious food and drinks taught me how to exercise thankfulness.
4. I kept company with many foreigners who had very different, yet plausible, and sometimes very humorous viewpoints, which gave me a lot of inspiration.
5. By God’s grace, I was able to pursue a career among honest men who enjoyed their work and who shared the joy of their accomplishments with me.
6. I was blessed with a scientific, analytical mind, and whenever I learned about a certain scientific phenomenon, I would intuitively interpret it to be a spiritual metaphor that paralleled events in my own life. (For an example, see this post.) Over time, I have come to firmly believe that the physical world is a reflection, or representation, of the spiritual world. This has taught me a great number of spiritual principles about life, which I had never gathered from all my years of Bible study.
7. A Pastor, who was giving me council, recommended that I should do an independent and informal study of psychology, sociology and the Meyers-Briggs Personality Theory. I asked him why, and he said, “Because no one knows who you are!” I’ve studied these materials diligently since then, and I have found them to be vastly helpful in in understanding my own behaviors, forming my own self-concept, building Frame, expanding my teaching skills, and maintaining social connections.

8. Eds. addition (November 5, 2017): Over the past year, I have spent a little time each day reading Red Pill blogs from the Manosphere. The knowledge I have gained there has confirmed many of my seemingly incredulous conjectures regarding women and relationships, and has added to my insight. It has also increased my respect for other men, and my expression of appreciation for women. All which have produced a surge in my confidence, and the polishing of my Game.
9. I also began to read a lot of books by Christian authors, and their testimonies underscored my confidence in God and gave me fresh insight about God's ways with men, and His purposes for my life. [Eds. note (November 5, 2017): Because of the rise of "Churchianity", and the confluence of Organized Christianity and Feminism in recent years, I've had to become more selective about which Christian sources I read.]

I believe these things have brought the power of God into my life, and have instilled a reverence for spiritual rest. Notably, all of these activities are conducive either to true worship, or to Christian service.

After several years, I learned how to get myself spiritually fed with no Bible at all! A lot of people refuse to believe me on this, but it's true. I think perhaps it was possible for me, partly because I was already well-versed in scripture, as a result of my growing up in a Baptist Church.

Prayer

My lessons in prayer began first. With my life in a shambles, and getting nothing out of the Bible, I turned to prayer as my only lifeline to God.

At first, my prayers were just the typical prayers of thanksgiving and requests for general blessings, but during my last year in college, I began to notice God answering my prayers in immediate, dramatic ways, which often resulted in events I would not have expected from God.

For example, there was a girl in our campus fellowship who was extremely naïve and trite, so much so, that she irritated many of us to our wits end. One evening, I became so angry about her Mickey-Mouse-like behavior, that I prayed, quite passionately, for her to "grow up" and to "start taking life seriously".

The very next day, her grandfather passed away, with whom she was very close. It struck me quite hard that this might have been an answer to my prayer, and I felt a little guilty for inadvertently "causing" her grandfather's death. I was also scared to the bone, as I realized the lengths God might go to, in answering our prayers.

Sure enough, within two weeks, this girl became a mature woman, and I became a more deeply conscientious prayer-warrior.

Since then, my experiences with prayer have grown to be more powerful and more personal. I've learned that the essence of prayer is in achieving an alignment between God's thoughts, and my own thoughts. Now I have come to believe that all the other aspects of prayer, such as confession, adoration, thanksgiving, supplication, answered requests, passion, purpose, the outpouring of the Spirit, etc. are all byproducts of one's alignment with the will of God in prayer. (If one is praying on behalf of another, then this process of alignment is called "intercession". Oswald Chambers makes several points about intercession, in his December 13th entry.)

Worship

My lessons in worship came about more gradually, and didn't intensify until several years later.

I thought I knew what worship was, since I grew up in Church, but it was limited to the idea of standing in the "worship service" and singing traditional hymns. Sudden movements and loud noises, like clapping, were not allowed, as they were "disruptive to the worship service"!

After I went away to college, and specifically when I attended an Apostolic church a few times with a housemate, my concept of worship was expanded. Apostolics believe that you're not really worshiping UNLESS you are shouting, clapping and passionately jumping around the sanctuary with a smile on your face!

I also attended a Catholic Church with another friend, and I saw that they didn't sing or clap at all. They worshipped God by getting on their knees, bowing their heads, confessing sins, and in general, respecting the detailed order of the time-honored, traditional liturgy.

However, upon attending the Mennonite Church with another friend, I noticed that they had a very different idea of worship. They all sat in a large circle, signifying equality, and they didn't have any music or order of service at all. Instead, they each took turns standing up, and they all told the others, one-by-one, a summary of their own spiritual state and what God had done for them that week. This order of service was very interesting to me, because they let all the children run around the room and play during their worship, and no one paid any attention to them, even though they were very noisy sometimes. When I asked someone why they let all the children run around during the worship, it was evident that they believed the children were worshipping too, in their own way. I was so humbled to learn this.

Moreover, from all my experiences of visiting more than a dozen, vastly different denominations, I formed a new concept of worship. Worship is any kind of activity that taps into the power of God, and brings rest, renewal and restoration to the person worshipping.

But even after revising my concept of worship, I had still not learned how to worship God personally. But as my energy and willpower gradually expired from the many trials and disappointments of life, I was forced to discover worship as a new source of refreshment. It was difficult, because I did not really know how to tap into the power of the Holy Spirit in my own way, and find myself being made complete in God. It took a lot of conscious thought, and years of experimentation before I discovered my own brand of worship. But I've found that worship has a lot to do with opening the heart, living in the NOW, reaching towards hope, and pursuing a love for others and a passion for life.

I urge others to discover and develop their own style of worship with these things in mind.

Attaining the Goal

Learning the disciplines of prayer and worship were not easy either. But they were very powerful things. Looking back, I see that my habits of prayer and worship were the channels by which God restored me. In fact, these were the most crucial disciplines that I was forced to discover from God's silence.

Over many years, my faith was slowly rebuilt, but my new faith was totally and uniquely my own, given to me by God, and it is not at all like what had been handed down to me from my parents and teachers.

Of course, it was not easy. Each day was filled with confusion and carnage on the spiritual battlefield. People did not particularly enjoy being around me. A lot of my "Christian" friends avoided or rejected me.

Through all these events, I never gave up the idea that I was a Christian, although many others did, in their perceptions of me. I just reasoned to myself that I was a Christian who was short on faith, as if that were only a small part of it.

But looking back, I can clearly see that this was a time when I stopped emulating the Christian culture around me, and started to form, test and trust my own independent system of beliefs. So, of course it was messy.

My scientific metaphor for this process is an electrical transformer, in which electricity is transformed into magnetism, and back into electricity, usually at a much higher voltage. Notably, the phase-change is described with imaginary numbers (i.e. $i = \sqrt{-1}$), which are complete nonsense to the natural mind. I felt that my spiritual life had undergone a similar "transformation".

Conclusions

Now, I have the opinion that this transformation is what truly makes one a Christian, even more so than the magnitude of faith, or whatever specific points of doctrine one might hold. It is a relationship with God, as I had always believed, but I had to give up all my previous notions about it, even some that were true, before I could be "converted into magnetism", and own it from the heart.

I think this is the real trick that we all must identify in our own lives, before we can become spiritual champions with the risen Lord.

Looking back on my early life, I can see what some of my problems were. Growing up with regular teaching of God's truth taught me to trust authority and to be a "good citizen", but I was unable to develop any faith or confidence, as long as I was just following what other people told me. Now I know, that to build one's confidence (faith), one must take the risk of making one's own, independent decisions about a matter, take responsibility for the outcome, and work with the results until it becomes satisfactory to one's self. Of course, it is impossible to do so, without facing the limitations of one's self and trusting God with the outcome, rather than taking the easy way out, through entertainment or other sorts of distractions.

Actually, I think it may have been somewhat easier for me to "find God" personally, if I had NOT grown up in the Church, because then I would have had to open my heart and learn God's truths through my daily experiences, instead of merely "conforming to the rules", which is very spiritually deadening. As such, my faith would have been uniquely mine, and my "death" would have been more progressive and natural, instead of "all at once" when I left home to go to college, which had the consequence of leaving me spiritually crippled during the best years of my youth. Nevertheless, I feel I have learned those vital lessons that God would have every believer to know.

[Eds. note (May 31, 2018): Up until today, I had thought that the conclusion (in boldface font) contained in the last paragraph above was merely my own conjecture. But Wintery Knight's testimony in his post, How I Retained My Christian Faith, Sobriety And Chastity On A University Campus (May 30, 2018), affirms this same conclusion.]

More recently, I have begun to experience this process of death and resurrection in other areas of my own life. But this time, I'm cognizant of the process, and so it is much easier to endure, while "looking towards the hope of my calling, reaching forward to obtain that for which Christ Jesus took hold of me".

I do believe that my own spiritual life and experiences are extraordinarily unique. God typically uses other people and His Word, to speak to people, as their lives are being transformed "from glory to glory". So, I strongly suggest that others continue their daily reading of God's Word, for as long as God speaks to you there. The written Word will convince you of His truths and realign your thought processes, as you regularly read the Bible.

Simultaneously, develop regular habits of prayer and worship. The Spirit of God, Who knows the mind of God towards you, will always be in the process of helping you understand what God is doing in your life.

I do believe that God seeks to manifest His death and resurrection in the various areas of the believers life, but I think the typical experience of a Christian is not like the long years of God's silence in my own life, as Job experienced. God will let you know what He is doing in your life when and if you need to know.

God's Silence During Suffering

Jack · 14 December 2009 · Archived copy · Original

[Eds. note: This post discusses God's intentions when we are facing failure and heartaches, and how we should respond.]

I have heard a good anecdote about a boy who "enjoyed" eating the candy that made his teeth rot, and he was "hurt" by the dentist who repaired his teeth.

Such is the human experience.

In addition to the pain of the experience, these trials are more difficult to endure because we have all seen God bring love, blessings and miracles to so many people around us. We are impatient and resistant under hardship, and we naturally want to bypass the suffering and obtain the blessing. Such a reaction is typical for the human nature, especially in those who don't understand what God intends to accomplish in them, and who think it impertinent to ask God for such understanding. (But actually, it is more impertinent NOT to ask!)

I once argued with a Pastor about this. I kept telling him that there was something about my relationship with God that was necessary for me to understand, but I couldn't figure it out. He always got irritated whenever I brought this up this question, and he maintained that if you could understand all that God was doing, then it wouldn't be faith.

He also remarked that he was confused about why I could not feel God's love. Looking back, I know that if I had been more familiar with experiencing love and acceptance in my life, then the silence of God would have been easier to understand and endure.

I didn't know it at the time, but what I meant to ask my Pastor was, "How is the process of redemption and sanctification typically manifested in the life of the believer?" I naturally received a lot of resistance, because this is a question that tests the mettle of any person who claims to be an authority of theology, and of course, most people, including Pastors, are annoyed at being "challenged" by a novice. I presented this question to a lot of Pastors, and I think many of them simply pretended not to understand what I was really asking. (I say this because if they truly did not understand my question, then they were not very spiritually "in-tune" Pastors.) So as a result, my crucible lasted another ten years.

The crucial point that I needed to understand, was God's purpose of recreating the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ in the Believers life, and some specific points about how that purpose might be manifested in the life of the individual believer.

That Pastor never helped me resolve this issue in my life, but many years later, from the Biblical examples of Job, Jonah and Lazarus, and especially through hearing the testimonies of other Christians, I began to experience a renewal.

There are (at least) five Biblical examples of men who experienced a type of spiritual death and resurrection.

1. Moses (Exodus 2-4)
2. Job (Job 1-42; James 5:10-11)
3. Jonah (Jonah 1-2; Matthew 12:39-41)
4. Lazarus (John 11:1-44)
5. Jesus (Matthew 24:1-2, Matthew 27-28; Mark 15-16; Luke 22:47 – 24:43; John 18-21)

To someone who is currently experiencing the silence of God, all of these scripture verses deserve a thorough study. But here I will discuss the story of Lazarus in detail, and Jonah in passing.

Lazarus

St. John reports that Jesus received word that Lazarus was sick and nearing death, but He delayed going to see Lazarus until after he died. In other words, Jesus failed to respond in a timely manner. He was “silent”. (It is noteworthy to add here that Jesus was also silent at his own trial, just before his crucifixion.)

All the way through Lazarus’s final sickness and death, neither Lazarus, nor his sisters, Mary and Martha, received any response from the One who said He loved them. After Lazarus died, Mary and Martha went through the funeral process, preparing his body, putting him in the grave, and covering it with a stone. They experienced the emotional pain and mourning of losing a loved one. Still, God’s silence continued.

Finally, Jesus said to His disciples, “Let us go to him.” But by the time Jesus arrived, Lazarus had been dead four days and Martha said he must be stinking by then.

Martha said to Jesus, “Lord, if you had been here, my brother Lazarus would not have died” (John 11:32). It is noteworthy that Lazarus, Mary and Martha fully believed in the miraculous powers of Jesus. They knew that Jesus could have healed Lazarus, because they saw Him heal people many times before.

Upon reading this, I felt like I could identify with Lazarus. I know that many people hope and pray for the power of God, love, security, happiness, contentment, financial blessings, etc. to come into their lives. But remarkably, God does nothing as their condition plummets.

Some people might call it faithlessness to “question God”, but I think it is reasonable to ask “Why?”, at this point, knowing that God holds us accountable for our lives, but is then unwilling to aid us through every juncture, and as a result, we experience catastrophe. (In other words, I believe that “trusting God” is an autonomous function of humanity, not an automatic one.)

So why is God silent (at certain times in our lives)?

Later in the story, Jesus tells his disciples His purpose for allowing Lazarus to die. In vs. 14-15, Jesus says, “Lazarus is dead. And I am glad for your sakes that I was not there, that you may believe.” In Jesus’ prayer, He states, “Father, I thank You that You have heard me. And I know that You always hear Me, but because of the people who are standing by I said this, that they may believe that You sent Me.” (v. 41-42)

In other words, Jesus is saying, “I want you to know that God loves and cares for you, and that this suffering is NOT because God has rejected you, or is absent from your life, but because God is working in you and through you, to transform your life into something better.” This is the experience of Jesus as the Death, Resurrection and the Life.

For those of us who are not very familiar with God’s love, it is easy to miss this message upon reading our Bible. So, asking “Why?” at this point, leads us to realize that our faith has already been firmly established, and so it is no longer a question of faith. Now, it is a question of relationship, and then one of purpose.

How so? Oswald Chambers stated it well.

“God’s silence, including an unanswered prayer, is an indicator, not that you trust God, but that He trusts you; that He has recognized that you are ready for a deeper understanding of Himself.”

It is just as silence is sometimes enjoyed in human relations, as words can only cheapen the most special moments of life.

But sometimes, as in the case of Lazarus and his family, God’s silence is not very “enjoyable”. Instead, it is tortuous.

Why must it be so?

God’s silence is often meant to punish the proud will and to bring one into a state of absolute dependence on God. Or sometimes, at the opposite extreme, God’s silence is designed to motivate you out of a dependent complacency and push you towards making some necessary changes. Also, if you do not feel secure in God’s love, then His silence will invariably bring lots of doubts and questions.

Of course, the human standpoint will naturally experience this as meaning that God should make them learn hard, costly and difficult lessons, and give up the hope of finding love in a fulfilling relationship, suffer heartbreak or financial ruin, experience rejection and failure, and live one's life out of desperation.

We naturally assume that a "loving" God has our own strength, security, happiness and well-being as His purposes for our lives, but we often fail to understand that it is God's will that we must enter into a refining fire, and to undergo a process of purification and renewal, before we can go on with our lives. We must endure the crucible of living in this world, in order to purify our faith, fully realize God's Truth, and attain those attributes.

I wonder how long Lazarus struggled to get out of that tomb! I think it is noteworthy that Jesus ordered the bystanders to unbind Lazarus from his graveclothes (v. 44), so that Lazarus did not need to struggle too much. Are we in the habit of unbinding those who are rising from the decay of their previous lifestyle, or do we tend to shove them back into the grave of their past identity?

Jonah

The book of Jonah says that, after his calling to evangelize Nineveh, Jonah was "running from God" by taking a ship to Tarshish. When the men on the ship found out about Jonah's plight, they threw him overboard, and it was assumed by all that he would drown to death. But God preserved his life for three days in the belly of the whale, and then God commanded the whale to spit him out on the beach.

I wonder what Jonah's appearance was like at that time? (I suppose a lot of superficial "Christians" of today would frown on him, with the assumption that he had been "carousing with the pagans" or some such thing.)

The Application

I began to realize what it meant to personally experience the death and resurrection of the Lord Jesus. I recognized that the same transcendental phenomenon was happening to me, and when this dawned upon me, I began to understand why it seemed like God wasn't listening to me. God's long, wintry silence, while I endured these hardships, meant that my life was being transformed. I quit feeling like I was on trial, and that I was condemned. I started to feel God's love at times. My confusion and discouragement were no longer overwhelming. I understood that God was doing something far out of my conservative-Church-taught expectations. (I also gained the impression that many Churches are rather "worldly". I was disappointed to find this, because I never had this perspective while attending Church all my life.)

I made a major attitude adjustment to one of expectation, faith and trust, and looked forward to the hope of a new Life in Him. Then, I began to recognize a deeper purpose in my life, and the significance of knowing God in a much different capacity. I began to realize other ways I could respond to the events in my life, and do things that would speed up the process. Eventually, my confidence in God was restored, and I was able to stop all my soul-searching and worrying about my spiritual condition.

A scientific analogy of this process is the butterfly, which begins life as a caterpillar, crawling about. At the right time, the caterpillar forms a cocoon, in which it hibernates and transforms into the butterfly. Biologists claim that when the newly transformed butterfly emerges from his cocoon, its long struggle to break free from the shell is critical in building the butterfly's strength and endurance.

The Bible states that, after his conversion, St. Paul spent 14 years alone, implying that he was in a spiritual "cocoon" before beginning his ministry. Moses had a 40 year-long "hibernation" in the desert, before being called to lead the Israelites out of Egypt!

On this point, I think I can relate to the butterfly in my own experience. During my own times of difficulty, the seeming absence of God forced me to do many things for myself, which served to build up much of my spiritual capabilities.

Many times in my prayers, I would ask God to do certain things for me, and God would respond by telling me, in so many words, “Do it yourself!” Of course, people would not help me either. It was exasperating.

For a long time, I thought to myself, “God doesn’t help me at all! What do I need God for?” But after a few years, I learned how I could do many of those things myself. I learned that I am not nearly as “helpless” as I once believed.

God is certainly capable of “snapping His fingers” to produce an immediate renewal, but it is obvious that God prefers to allow us to grow and change at our own pace.

I do think I learned the spiritual posture of “weakness” from not experiencing the presence of God in my formative years. Furthermore, the Church I grew up in did nothing to help my condition, because it openly encouraged people to “wait on God” and to be “weak” and “helpless”, as a way of encouraging them to be more humble and trust God. So I waited and “waited”… But it was not at all what I needed in my own life. I was already weak, and I needed God’s strength.

But at last, from God’s silence, and from His promptings for me to “be decisive”, “take initiative” and “get action”, I recognized that God wanted me to become a more capable and responsible individual. Since then, the Lord has brought into my life a greater revelation of Himself, specifically His truth and His life, than I have ever known before.”

As this process has gained momentum in my life, I have learned to anticipate what God continues to teach me about Himself. I have come to believe that the “greater revelation of God” that I have discovered through my own experience, has resulted in me gaining a spiritual charisma, a transformation of my self-consciousness which has greatly improved my social skills by giving me the insight to know others more deeply, and the power to speak out and make decisions, which all enhance the efficacy of my life.

Do you know what set me free? It was NOT my religious disciplines of studying the Bible, going to church, living a life of obedience, etc. It was comprehending God’s Truth in my heart, and learning to apply it in my life, which involves a much broader involvement of myself. Jesus said, “I am the Way, the Truth and the Life.” So, God’s Truth is the Person of Jesus, who is actively involved in my life.

I’m also learning that this deeper and more personal knowledge of God is necessary for one to recognize the opportunities that God gives to us every day, and to take action on them. I believe that this is part of what God wants to produce in us: Responsiveness, Decisiveness, Self-activation, and Efficacy. With these qualities, we gain the ability to become “partners with God” in His work, and interact with life in a whole new way, with a readiness and anticipation of LIFE.

Conclusions

Whenever God is silent, continue to recount the things that God has told you in the past, and continue to practice those things while you watch and wait for a fresh encounter with Him.

I urge you to study the books of Job and Jonah in the Old Testament. The examples of these two men are given to us as a type of Christ Jesus in His death and resurrection.

James 1:1-12 also gives a passing mention of the death and resurrection in the life of the individual believer, with admonishments towards enduring the process, only he refers to the experience as “trials and temptations”.

Also, the study book, “Experiencing God” by Blackaby and King, points out one account of God’s will toward the individual as being one of experiencing the death and resurrection of Christ. This book is a very good text to study, in order to clearly ascertain the workings of God in one’s life, and I encourage everyone to take a course based on this book, which is offered at a lot of churches.

Understanding Temptation

Jack · 21 December 2009 · Archived copy · Original

If you are now going through a spiritually dry desert, you are probably facing more temptation than usual. If God isn't speaking to you either, then this can greatly amplify the challenge. If this is your situation, there is one thing more you need to do, besides reading the Bible and praying.

Examine your thoughts and behavior, to see if you might have a sin, or sins, that are affecting your spiritual status. You should pray about this specifically, by asking God to show you your sin. Don't think that God will remain silent. He always responds to this prayer!

If you find that God's silence is caused by sin in your life, then you need to change your mind to agree with God's viewpoint concerning that sin, and acknowledge your responsibility in the matter, which is, by definition, a confession. (Please read "Confession vs. Profession".)

If God is still silent after that, then you can release your anxieties, and get ready for a new experience with Him that you have never previously experienced.

Your Response to the Desert Experience Matters Greatly

Whenever you find yourself in the "desert", you can respond to God's silence in two ways.

1. You can become frustrated, feel guilty, or be impatient.
2. You can expect that God is about to bring you into a deeper knowledge of Himself.

These responses are as different as night and day. The first response will only lead to gloom and despair, and in fact, it will only prolong your sufferings. The second response leads to insight, growth, and a renewed life in Jesus.

Of course, it is not so easy in its experience. Most of the time, we are unaware of what God is really doing in our lives. We only know that we are faced with difficult choices and many kinds of temptations each day. Often, we might not even know where our lives are headed.

Two Types of Temptation

I believe it will help if we understand the workings of temptation, since it is what we are faced with most often. Knowing what temptation is and why we experience it, will certainly make it easier to deal with, when it comes upon us.

There are two kinds of temptation.

1. One kind of temptation is to experience the desire to take an immediate action to fulfill a desired response, instead of waiting and trusting God for things to be done on their own, in the right way.
2. Another kind of temptation is not about "classical sin" at all, but instead, abuses some aspect of the roles that humans play in their relationships to one another and to God, which misconstrues the larger purpose for which God is striving.

The first definition includes the classical idea of temptation that implies a situation that makes it difficult for one to resist emotional sins of passion. Most people can readily identify with this experience.

The second kind of temptation is not as familiar to most people as the first. So I will offer two examples from the Bible here.

The example of the Israelites journey through the desert

Another example in the Bible is when the Israelites were traveling through the desert, and they complained about eating manna and quail for forty years (Exodus 17:1-7; Deuteronomy 6:16; Psalm 78:41; Malachi 3:15). The Bible states that by complaining, they were "tempting God".

Here, did the Israelites "sin" by wanting a change of menu? Furthermore, how can God be tempted?

The Israelites main fault was their desire to return to a state of bondage in Egypt, merely because the room and board was of higher quality than what they were getting from God in the desert. In essence, they desired a "clean roll in a cage", instead of pursuing after God's directive of forming the new nation of Israel.

So how did they "tempt God"?

To answer this question, we must ask, what were they tempting God to do?

The Israelites tempted God by continually nagging Him to change His directive and to allow them to return to their bondage in Egypt. They were pressing God's patience, and thereby tempting Him to abandon those ungrateful Israelites in the desert, and to be free of any further responsibility to them.

Later, as a consequence of tempting God, they were bitten by snakes (Numbers 21:4-8), among other things. As you might recall from scripture, God was so "tempted" to agree to their requests, on account of their complaints, that He desired to destroy all those people and build a new nation from the descendants of Moses. Moses' plea for God not to do so, was the only thing that assuaged God's anger. (Exodus 32:7-14; Psalm 106:23)

God became so exasperated by the Israelites short-sighted faithlessness and bitter attitudes, that he allowed them to wander in the desert for 40 years.

Was God "holding out" on the Israelites, in His anger? Not really, but it might appear this way. There are several reasons for letting them sojourn for an entire generation. Basically the idea was that some time was required to complete the metamorphosis of the Israelites from being a bunch of tattered slaves into becoming an independent nation.

1. God resolved that none of those wussy, whining, Israelites would see the promised land. He felt they didn't deserve it. Instead, he fulfilled that promise to their children.
2. Another reason was to clear out the old blood, people who had known the idolatry of the Egyptians, so that there was no chance of allowing that idolatry to continue in the new nation.
3. After the younger generation of Israelites grew up in the depravity of the desert, they would be truly thankful to have their own nation.

Even Moses himself was excluded from entering the new country because of his disobedience while in the desert.

The Example of Satan Tempting Jesus in the Wilderness

Satan tempted Jesus by asking Him to throw Himself down from the roof of the temple (Luke 4:1-13), mockingly claiming that angels would keep Him from "dashing His foot against a stone".

Hey, wouldn't it be rather fun to jump off the roof and be caught by angels? How is this a "temptation"?

This kind of temptation is not about the common idea of sin at all. This kind of temptation is pressure to doubt God and adopt a perspective that aligns with Satan's viewpoint, which may, in fact, have its' own set of virtues and benefits.

What was Satan's viewpoint?

Satan was trivializing the Lordship of Jesus, by encouraging Him to make a vain display of His power. Satan was inviting Jesus to adopt a spoiled, carefree attitude, by virtue of His position as the Son of God. Satan was exalting himself and mocking Jesus with such a request, and of course, upon this basis, it would be wrong for Jesus to comply.

So how was Jesus tempted?

Jesus was “tempted” to comply with Satan’s request, because God has held Himself responsible to reveal His true identity to mankind through the person of Jesus. If Jesus validated Satan’s viewpoint in any way, then He would not be reflecting the true image of God the Father.

It is known from scripture that the Lord is very passionate about revealing His glory, so in fact, Satan’s request is quite deceptive and also very insulting. By comparison, a typical self-respecting man would respond out of anger, to clear his own name. But Jesus had the additional insight to know that by doing so, He would only be complying with Satan’s manipulative tactics.

Conclusions

During our desert experience with temptation, we must be continually cognizant of the Lord’s purposes and directives, or else, we may become confused about what is really “right” in the deeper sense.

Furthermore, even though we might be dwelling on the purposes of God, it is difficult for humans to continually resist temptation because of Satan’s persistence. Satan makes it his goal to tempt us frequently and intensely, so that we might grow bitter, resentful, cynical and angry about everything. The old-time Baptists called this experience, being “tempted sore”, which I feel is a casual understatement. Jesus told Peter that Satan desired to “sift him like flour” (Luke 22:31), which is a little more revealing description of the experience. (Peter’s experience is also worthy of a third study of temptation.)

Our challenge is this: If we give in to Satan’s assaults, even the slightest bit, by complaining or sympathizing with ourselves (e.g. self-pity), or in anyway aligning our mind with Satan’s falsely purported view that God is “treating us poorly”, then we are beginning to tempt God. By being restless and impatient about our spiritual desert situation, we only aggravate our discomfort and prolong our misery.

Instead, we should devote our time, energy and attention into praying that we might be tested fairly and found true, and to be delivered from the temptation without losing our spiritual inheritance.

The Takeaway: Don’t submit to the temptation to adopt habits of complaining and having a bad attitude, and thereby tempt God to abandon you in the desert.

The Nature of Giving Gifts

Jack · 23 December 2009 · Archived copy · Original

This time of year, everyone is in the habit of buying and exchanging gifts with their friends and family. But as many of you may know, choosing the right gift for the right person, is a very challenging task. In this post, I hope to broaden your perspectives on gift giving.

How do you know if you have the right gift?

It helps if we understand what gifts represent. The following points detail the value and purpose of giving gifts.

- A gift is something given from one person to another that contains a valuable message pertaining to the recipient's identity.
- A gift is also something that can be kept for a period of time, and which serves as a continual reminder of the message that the gift represents.
- The message is highly personal, but in general, the gift serves to enhance the quality of another persons' life.
- We usually think of a gift as an object, wrapped in colorful paper, but a gift can come in other forms too.

Also, gifts are not necessarily presents wrapped in shining paper. What other kinds of things are qualified as gifts?

- Consumable resources, such as money, food, or drinks can be gifts.
- Vacations and special memories can be gifts.
- Giving someone a certain critical knowledge of something, or teaching them a special skill are two very powerful gifts.
- An enjoyable experience is a gift.
- Some services, like repairing broken appliances, or cleaning house, can qualify as gifts too.

Here, I'll share a personal story about when someone gave me a gift that was so meaningful, that it touched my heart and changed my life. This is a true story that happened to me between 1998 and 2000.

When I was in graduate school, I was always short on cash. I could not buy nice clothes or new shoes. But you know, I was not in the habit of wearing nice clothes anyway. I came from a rural, uneducated family, so I was in the habit of wearing cheap fashion, which, in the mid-1990's, was not very nice-looking at all. Flannel shirts, fatigues, leather caps and combat boots were my usual trademarks, and "comfort and durability" was my slogan when buying clothes. I was happy with my style, so I never gave it any thought. So that was me at the time.

One of my colleagues in graduate school was a post-Doc. He was about five years older than I was, and he was accomplished, published, and married. One day, he and his wife invited me to their home for dinner, and after we finished eating, they gave me a present. When I opened it, I found a very good quality dress shirt and a matching silk tie.

Frankly, I was disappointed.

I expressed my thanks to them, but after I got home, I threw it in my closet and forgot about it. I guess they knew I was not happy with the gift, but that did not matter to them.

As time went on, they continued to give me very expensive, high-quality, formal clothing on every occasion… tailored dress pants for Christmas, 1997, a polo shirt for my birthday, a silk tie for Easter, Egyptian-cotton socks at a summer party, a Nautica jacket in the fall, Johnson & Murphy captoes for Thanksgiving, a wool sweater for Christmas, 1998, the list goes on… After a while, other people, including my roommate, started giving me similar clothes as gifts!

I didn't like that kind of style at all. I thought it was impractical to wear while I was working on my car. But you know, those clothes were valuable. Actually, any kind of clothes, are expensive.

After a couple years, a lot of my old clothing had become threadbare and was ready to be replaced. I had a choice: I could spend a lot of money to buy clothes, and keep my old dressing habits, or I could start wearing some of the new clothes that my friends had given me. Since I didn't have much cash, I started wearing the new clothes from time to time.

I didn't like it at first. I thought those clothes were so formal looking, stiff and uncomfortable. The collars choked me. I felt like I couldn't move in them. I was always worried about getting those white dress shirts dirty or stained. The shoes were stiff and hurt my feet. The wool sweater was itchy. I also felt self-conscious to be the only guy in class wearing a polo shirt and captoe shoes, while everyone else wore jeans and t-shirts.

It took a few months for me to change my mind, and my habits. But after a while, I got used to the new feel. I found that Johnson & Murphy's were just as durable as my combat boots, except that they looked a lot better. Once, I had to give a presentation about my research at a conference, and I was glad to have some appropriate clothes to wear for the occasion.

The appreciation for these changes came to me one day, when I was looking at myself in the mirror. I was wearing a light blue Stafford dress shirt, a dark blue Banana Republic silk tie, charcoal-colored, Louis Raphael wool slacks, a black leather belt and my black, J&M captoes. I wasn't going anywhere special that day, I just went to class, and to study at my desk in the laboratory. But on that morning, as I looked at myself in the mirror, I realized something about my friends' perspectives, and why they gave me these clothes.

I realized that my friends respected me, more than I respected myself!

Then I also began learning to respect myself, because I was humbled when I realized that my friends saw me as being a handsome, self-respecting, professional man. The message that those gifts carried was louder than words!

It had been difficult for me to see myself in this way, before this time. But ever since that day, I wear these clothes with pride, because these gifts make me feel loved.

By the time I graduated with my Master's Degree, I was buying my own dress shirts, and wearing nice clothes every day. I would even wear a tie, just to WOW people and liven up the day.

I found that if I dressed in a way that displayed professionalism and self-respect, then it became more likely that other people would see me in such a frame, and treat me accordingly. My social life picked up momentum, and I got a lot more attention from women.

Moreover, I learned how to get past the shame of being different, and I began to have a little more fun as an adult professional.

All these changes started with a simple gift – a shirt and tie – and the message that it contained – that people respected me. I never knew it before, but it's true – respect is an important foundation to a man's identity.

Whenever you are looking for the right gift to give someone, I hope you'll remember this story and choose a gift with FAITH. Choose a gift that contains a message of personal identity that continues to give and give as time goes on, and never underestimate the power of one simple gift to enhance the quality of another persons' life.

This is the simple reason why Jesus is God's gift to mankind, and why we give gifts at Christmas.

Happy Holidays~!

What does Christmas mean to you?

Jack · 26 December 2009 · Archived copy · Original

For many people, Christmas is not a joyous celebration with friends and loved ones. It is lonely, it is boring, it is a reminder of the past, it is depressing. But must those of us who feel this way face the holidays with this mindset?

What does Christmas mean to you? It is an important question to consider.

In my view, Christmas is a time when people face their inmost needs with a joyous expectation of faith. It is cold outside, so people meet together in each others' homes, eating food and creating enjoyment with each other with festive candlelight and happy music. For one day out of the year, it becomes acceptable for people to reveal their non-conscious selves to each other, to openly cherish the shared purpose of sacrificing their pride and dignity, in order to have a deep fellowship with others, even strangers, who are keen enough to share the same purpose.

Why do we give gifts to one another? We give gifts to each other, because we are innately aware of a deep, unspoken, hunger for goodness in our hearts. We want to be reminded of who we are in Christs' love. We realize we cannot constructively satisfy this hunger on our own. So, we come to understand how we all depend on each other. People need the warmth and security that loved ones can bring into our lives. Christians celebrate Christmas as the time when God gave His Son to humanity, thereby meeting the deepest needs of fallen man.

For most people, Christmas time is a happy one, because in facing their inmost needs, they discover that their needs are well met, and they can be happily thankful for their circumstances. (I suppose this is why children enjoy Christmas the most, since the fulfillment of a child's need is not generally dependent on his/her behavior.) But for many people, the Christmas season is a very sad one, because when they face their needs, they find themselves and their lives to be inadequate towards making them happy and grateful. I think this is why older people, and people living alone, are least affected by the Christmas season. It is also why so many people are sad and depressed during the holidays.

How can one enjoy the Christmas Spirit at will? A person should…

- Know when one is unable to help or enjoy ones' self, and to take measures to counteract the negative effects of being alone or helpless.
- Recognize who is a friendly person to create social engagements with, or who can be asked for help.
- Have the discernment to know the right time to make an appearance, or to ask for help.

The purpose of the Christmas Season is to enjoy the gratitude that comes from finding one's needs met in life, and to rest in the happy contentment of knowing that one is universally and non-negotiably loved. If a person can do this, then he has found the Spirit of Christmas, which is a true thankfulness and joy. If a person has not found the Spirit of Christmas, then he has not yet identified the significance of this purpose in his life.

A person also needs…

- Humility – realize that the Christmas Spirit does not depend on one's self, but that it can be enhanced by one's self.
- Humanity – have the eyes to see kindness in small places, and have the heart to be compassionate to everyone who offers their love to you.

It is my sincere wish for you to find the Spirit and the Purpose of the Christmas Season in your life at this time.

God bless you and Merry Christmas!

Confidence and Authenticity in Speech

Jack · 28 December 2009 · Archived copy · Original

This post deals with the "choking" phenomena (not knowing what to say at a critical kairos moment) that many men face when they are in a high pressure social situation. Here, we examine the problem of choking, the power of a man's speech, and the origins of that power.

The contents are organized into the following parts.

1. The Problem
2. Misconceptions
3. Choking: Scientific Theories
4. Choking: Contributing Factors
5. Choke Points
6. The Heart-Speech Connection
7. Internalize Truth and Command the Truth in Speech
8. Good Listening Skills Can Motivate Others to Refine Themselves by Examining the Contents of their Own Heart and Speech
9. Conclusions

1. The Problem

"I always know the right thing to say… after the right time to say it has passed."

When you are faced with a critical kairos moment in a high pressure social situation, such as dealing with an abrupt stranger, making a cold approach to a woman, or arguing with the wife, what is your typical reaction?

- Do you back down like a good and loyal beta, to show your polite and respectful deference?
- Do you change the subject? (Avoidance)
- Do you Please and Appease, hoping to be "rewarded" for your "good behavior"?
- Do you fall into Passive-Aggressive mode?
- Do you withdraw, try to forget it, and go on about "life as usual"?
- Do you become "politically correct"?
- Do you sink into Analysis Paralysis?
- Or, do you "man up" and become salt and light?

To make matters more complicated, there remains the simple fact that whenever men fail to speak and take a stand, feminists and their coward buddies, and others who use feminists as useful fools to advance their social agendas, stampede onto center stage and steal the show.

Another common problem that many men face is what I'll call "Spiritual Silence". Spiritual silence is the inability to inspire a positive change in the attitudes and emotions of others. For example, one husband talks to his wife, and she gets angry, aroused, excited and/or animated, while another husband talks to his wife, and she rolls her eyes as all his words go in one ear and out the other. The first wife is spiritually moved by her husband, while the second is failing to experience any spiritual effluence from her husband. The fact that she is not getting emotionally roller-coastered by him makes her feel disappointed, frustrated, and over time, contemptuous. This is especially true for women prone to hamstering and indulging their hypergamic tendencies.

It could be argued that the whole purpose of learning Game is the enhancement and control of one's spiritual affect on others, namely women.

A third common problem men face is not having the PRESENCE (e.g. emotional), AWARENESS (e.g. sexual), and the continuous interaction with the NOW, that would allow them to be able to say the right things at the right time, such that they could create the impact they desire. It is always of the utmost importance for a man to be "plugged in" to whatever is happening in his immediate spatial vicinity. Women especially, are very conscious of this quality in a man.

2. Misconceptions

Many men are worried about their inefficacious or inaccurate speech. They have the idea that if they could find the "right words" to say, and be bold enough to say them, then they would hit their social target. This belief is somewhat true, but it tends to set a man in motion towards succumbing to Analysis Paralysis, which is best avoided by planning ahead, such that when a critical moment arises, you're not involuntarily thrust into a position of urgent defensiveness and anxiety. This will be discussed later.

Also, men tend to think their main difficulty is with low confidence or discomfort in a social setting. Again, this is only partly true. The real problem is that men are self-conscious, unable to focus their concentration, and they don't take measures to increase their confidence and natural comfort. As we will see later, a lot of this is done through preparation and practice.

3. Choking: Scientific Theories

As mentioned earlier, choking is a phenomena where a man freezes up at the very moment it most matters. There are several theories regarding the phenomena of choking, which are briefly outlined as follows.

Distraction Theory

Wine [1] was the first to address choking from a scientific approach. His work proposed an explanation of why students under-perform during academic testing. His theory argues that pressure creates a dual task situation which draws attention away from the task at hand. Attention is then focused towards irrelevant stimuli such as worries, social expectations, and anxiety [2].

Research has found that distraction theory is supported in situations where working memory is used to analyze and make decisions quickly [3]. Short term memory is used to maintain relevant stimuli and block irrelevant information as it relates to the task at hand [4].

Self-Focus Theory

Baumeister was the next to address choking. He predicted a decrease in performance when one's attention is shifted to movement execution. There is more focus on the motor components of performance, consciously controlling movements with step-by-step control [5]. Also, any combination of factors that increase the importance of performing is considered performance pressure. Furthermore, one's responding to performance pressure can lead to an increase in self-conscious attention to the execution, which then results in choking [6].

Attentional Threshold Model

This model combines both the Distraction model and the Self-Focus model by positing that a performance decrement is caused when a situation exceeds the threshold of one's attentional capacity. This work suggests that choking is a complex process involving the combination of cognitive (e.g. worry), emotional (e.g. anxiety, fear) and attentional (i.e. self-focus) factors [7].

Explicit Monitoring Theory

The explicit monitoring theory provides an explanation for athlete's under-performance at the precise moment they need to be at their best. According to a study of expert golfers [2], choking was unchanged by dual-task training but eliminated by self-consciousness training. They reasoned that,

“pressure raises self-consciousness and anxiety about performing correctly, which increases the attention paid to skill processes and their step-by-step control. Attention to execution at this step-by-step level is thought to disrupt well-learned or proceduralized performances.”

Thus, self-consciously attending to proceduralized skills hurts performance.

Processing Efficiency Theory (PET)

According to PET, efficiency is defined as the relationship between the quality of task performance and the effort spent in task performance [8]. Athletes put extra effort into their performance when under pressure, to eliminate negative performance. Eysenck et al. [9] found processing efficiency is affected by negative anxiety more than the effectiveness of performance outcome. Anxiety causes a shift in an athlete’s attention towards thoughts of performance consequences and failure. This increase in worry decreases attention resources and requires more effort to maintain concentration.

Attentional Control Theory (ACT)

Eysenck and Calvo developed ACT as an extension to PET, hypothesizing that an individual shifts attention to irrelevant stimuli. Stress and pressure cause an increase in the stimulus-driven system and a decrease in the goal-directed system. Disruption of balance between these two systems causes the individual to respond to salient stimuli rather than focusing on current goals [10]. ACT identifies the basic central executive functions inhibition and shifting, which are affected by anxiety. Inhibition is the ability to minimize distractions caused from irrelevant stimuli [11]. Shifting requires adapting to changes in attentional control. Shifting back and forth between mental sets due to task demands [12].

4. Choking: Contributing Factors

Factors which aggrandize choking may include the following:

1. Self-Confidence (challenge level vs. skill set, individual responsibility, physical/mental errors)
2. Self-Consciousness (presence of an audience, fear of a negative evaluation, important games/moments)
3. Expectations (Mindset)
4. Poor Preparation
5. Opponent’s Actions

These factors are discussed as follows.

1. Self-Confidence (Challenge Level vs. Skill Set, Individual Responsibility, Physical/Mental Errors)

Having low self-confidence leads to more mistakes, because you do not believe you can do anything well towards a positive effect [13]. On the other hand, being over-confident can cause negativity to take over quickly. Negativity hurts the total affect of one’s interaction with others, in that they get turned of by the authoritative contempt that is typically displayed by those at the top of the game. Excessive, egotistical pride has also been known to cause blind spots and errors in cognitive awareness.

No matter how high or low a man’s skill set might be, there should always be a match between a man’s skills and abilities, and the challenge level of the task at hand. The matching of these two aspects, skill and challenge, is where a man might achieve a maximum flow experience, leading towards the achievement of confidence, dexterity, and efficacy. This is the concept behind Csíkszentmihályi Flow.

Tasks that entail considerable responsibility should be assigned to a man’s whose skills and abilities are suitably matched. If the challenge is far below his skill set, then he will be bored and restless, as his higher talents will remain unemployed. If the challenge is far greater than his skill set, then the likelihood of failure is compounded, thus contributing to his anxiety and a lack of confidence. In this case, more time and practice is necessary to increase one's skill level.

Provided that the challenges are well matched to one's skill level, one defining habit that separates the winners from the losers, is in how they process their mistakes and poor performances in regard to their psychological self-image. The winner accepts it in stride as a part of life, and tries to improve his performance upon the next round. The loser tends to accept the failure as an indicator of his own value and sense of worth, and allows that judgment to compound his sense of low self-esteem.

2. Self-Consciousness (Presence of an Audience, Fear of Negative Evaluation, Important Games/Moments)

Self-Consciousness is the overt focus on the self, including cognizance, perceived self-image and one's immediate actions. An audience, the fear of a negative evaluation, and important events, all tend to make one feel insignificant and/or pressured to perform well, which tends to make one self-conscious. An athlete wants to perform their best while being observed and trying not to make any mistakes increases the amount of pressure they are under [13]. The presence of parents, coaches, media or scouts can increase pressure leading to choking.

A study done by Wang, Marchant, Morris and Gibbs (2004) found poor performance associated with high self-conscious individuals. An individual with high self-consciousness focuses their attention to thoughts relating to the task (i.e., "did I step right?") and to outside concerns (i.e., "will people laugh if I mess up?"). Individuals with low self-consciousness can direct their attention outward or inward because self-concerns do not dominate their thinking [14].

FNE is a psychological characteristic that increases anxiety under high pressure. Creates apprehension about others evaluations or expectations of oneself [15]. FNE is similar to motive to avoid failure (MaF). The need to avoid negative evaluation from others, avoid mistakes and avoid negative comparison to other players [13].

3. Expectations (Mindset)

Not expecting something negative to happen can cause a choke. But the dilemma is that it is difficult to prepare for what we do not expect. So here, it pays off to be mentored by someone who has a great deal of successful experience in the area we endeavor to develop.

It is generally better for a man to err on the side of extravagance in the way of expectations. (This is not true for women.) Expecting more positives can inspire one to aim higher. Expecting more negatives can motivate one to prepare more diligently.

The mark of a man is not in his physical or emotional strength, nor his notch count, but in how far he is willing to go, how much he is willing to risk or sacrifice, to see the situation through to the completion of His will.

4. Poor Preparation

We might imagine the totality of Choking as the juxtaposition of a social demand upon a spot of ill-preparedness or emptiness within the man's heart and mind. The man could either be caught unaware, or he simply has nothing to inject into the situation at hand.

An idealistic goal is to be prepared for any situation, and also to prepare others with whom we interact. In reality, it takes years of experience, education and training to collect an adequate knowledge of difficult encounters, and a well-practiced set of skills in dealing with life. A man would do well to accept this task as a responsibility of being a (Christian) man.

5. Opponents Actions

If a man is set against an opponent with a skill set far above his own. He is at a stark disadvantage. If a man is aware of this, he would be wise to defer to the better man, possibly accepting him as a mentor if it is agreeable for both parties, or else avoid an altercation, if they stand in disagreement, in terms of their values, goals, and principles. In other words, if friend, conform to a hierarchy; if foe, stand down, study, practice, and wait for a time in which you are better equipped, and better matched. In some instances, a man might have a strength in the area of another's weakness, and under the right circumstances, this might be used to gain an upper hand.

As long as someone else can reframe our words to mean something we did not really intend, we can be subjected to shame. This is not God's will for us. We must learn to master the truth of God in our lives, and in our speech. Then, we can take control of a situation before it takes control of us, and we will not need to invent last-minute rationalizations during a confrontation. (That is what women and children do, so don't be like them.)

5. Choke Points

Next, we'll look at a few of the most common Choke Points that men experience.

Choke Point 1: The Satisfied Ego

Once you think you understand some point of truth, don't allow yourself to become a complacent "know-it-all", who fails to exert the effort to exercise that truth. Instead, take yourself to task. Sharpen your wits, like "iron sharpens iron" (Proverbs 27:17), by discussing your viewpoint on that truth with another person.

Choke Point 2: The Weak Heart

Some people who are weak in faith, don't want to discuss questionable viewpoints with others, because it makes them get confused and discouraged. That is a real-life spiritual battle that they are afraid to fight, because they don't want to become a casualty. People like this need extra support and encouragement from other, more mature, experienced men and believers.

Choke Point 3: The Fearful Heart

Modern men are facing the failures of their reputations, careers and marriages, and the loss of their progeny and their economic wealth, all which are, by and large, directed by the feministic values and ideologies which have overrun modern society. As such, men these days are showing a greater propensity to cave into the demands of selfish women. With the power of public opinion and the law behind these women, coupled with the increase of men sharing commonality with marital fraud (e.g. lying about partner count), betrayal and frivorce theft, it is no longer a mark of shame for a man to be cowed by a woman anymore. Moreover, fear has become more commonplace among men than it was in previous generations. Men must be increasingly brave to face such challenges and risks in today's world, and they need the encouragement and support of other men in doing so.

Choke Point 4: The Proud Heart

A lot of other people won't go to the trouble to sharpen wits with another, because they're afraid of losing face. They don't want to see the dross come out of their mouths, in the process of being refined. If you know of people like this, I recommend that you pray that they might find the motivation to become humble by realizing the benefits that can be obtained.

Choke Point 5: The Hypocritical Bigot

Another variety of the Proud Heart is the Pharisee-like believer, who feeds his spiritual pride by castigating the beliefs of others, and perhaps even quotes the Bible in doing so. But don't be fooled; his heart is not sincere enough to be taken seriously by others.

You must be aware of the difference between rebuke and mockery – the former has a caring and sincere heart towards your spiritual advancement, whereas, the latter is setting you up to be a laughingstock. If you know of people like this, I recommend that you avoid theological discussions with them (See Proverbs 28:25) and pray that they might find the truth of God's presence in humility, which may very well require them to be broken first.

Choke Point 6: The "Jellyfish" Disposition

Some people simply have no willpower to engage others socially. They prefer to stay on the sidelines and merely observe others who are taking the trouble to make progress. They allow others to control them, and they remain oblivious to how they are being used. They may have their own minds decided on any issue, but they cannot apply themselves to affect the world around them, because they have not developed power in their speech, and thus, they lack authenticity.

A contrasting approach to defeating the habit of choking is not by studying the causes and effects of choking, but by adopting a completely separate view that is independent of the problem, which thereby displaces (and eliminates) a mindset that obsesses over the problem.

6. The Heart – Speech Connection

Getting the Frame and Inner Game together is of monumental importance before we start discussing planning, preparation and practice. You need to understand what is going on within your being that creates the choking experience, and your consequent invalid social offerings.

There is, in fact, a direct connection between the condition of your heart, and the contents of your speech. Several passages in the Bible (e.g. Matthew 12:34; Matthew 15:18; Luke 6:45) indicate that we can speak only of the things that are already contained within our hearts.

While it is true that your words proceed naturally from your heart, it is likewise true that cultivating your speech on a habitual basis can RENOVATE the contents of your heart. So the key idea here, is that when you examine and revise your speech, you are actually investigating, vetting, and refining the contents of your heart.

This heart-speech connection resonates with several scriptures in the Bible, namely the following.

> Psalm 19:14
> "Let the words of my mouth and the meditation of my heart be acceptable in Your sight, O LORD, my strength and my Redeemer."
> Romans 10:10
> "With our heart, we believe unto righteousness, and with our mouth, confession is made unto salvation."

[Eds. note: The heart-speech connection is also manifested in Psychological Projection. Please compare for a fuller analysis.]

I believe a lot of young guys with an SMV of 5-6 would consider pegging a HB9 to be a "saving grace" experience. Heh…

But in the kairos moment, we often find that we don't have the words to apprehend the truths we seek. So, an effective confession (or profession) remains elusive.

Dealing with this phenomena is more complicated than simply rephrasing the way you say things, like you do when you memorize pick-up lines. (See Matthew 15:8) You can learn some killer lines, but they may not really work for you. The reason for this inefficacy is the fact that those lines aren't really from your heart. You're not conveying the "real you". Women can pick up on this immediately and instinctively, and they intuitively know that you're "fake". There's nothing that women hate more, than a low-quality man posing as a high-quality man. They may even say so. So you're only making a fool of yourself by quoting pick-up lines that you heard from someone else.

The solution is not just to talk and act like a high-quality man, but to actually become a high-quality man. This may not be as difficult as one might think. The beginning of the character transformation is in developing an identity of integrity, by improving the congruency between what is in your heart, and what comes out through your speech.

So this brings us to the next point.

7. Internalize Truth and Command the Truth in Speech

A large part of our spiritual struggle is to internalize the "Truth" (be it God's Holy Word or Heartiste's 16 Commandments of Poon). You must put your own spin on it, personalize it, own it from the heart, and command it at will.

Many Red Pill blogs in the Manosphere do not put a great emphasis on the internalization process, and I don't know of any books on the subject either. However, the Bible has a few passages about the function and purpose of internalizing Truth.

> 2nd Timothy 2:15
> "Study to show yourself approved by God, a workman that needs not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth."
> 2nd Timothy 3:16-17
> "[16] All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, [17] that the man of God may be complete, thoroughly equipped for every good work."

This is the warning: Kindly note that this verse does NOT say that "Scripture is profitable for debate, for derision, for a standard of discrimination…" The reproof, correction and instruction come from the INSPIRATION gained through studying God's word and experiencing His Love and Grace – NOT from another, "holier-than-thou" person trying to "change" you. You have to submit to God's truth, and let God do the work of renovating your heart.

> "[11] And He Himself gave some to be apostles, some prophets, some evangelists, and some pastors and teachers, [12] for the equipping of the saints for the work of ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ, [13] till we all come to the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God, to a perfect man, to the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ; [14] that we should no longer be children, tossed to and fro and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the trickery of men, in the cunning craftiness of deceitful plotting, [15] but, speaking the truth in love, may grow up in all things into Him who is the head—Christ— [16] from whom the whole body, joined and knit together by what every joint supplies, according to the effective working by which every part does its share, causes growth of the body for the edifying of itself in love."

This is the application: If you cannot express yourself WELL on any subject, study, practice, and struggle until you can.

- Write down your problems and fears in a blog or journal.
- Understand the mind and human nature by taking classes in philosophy, psychology, logic, argumentation and debate.
- Study language arts. Make sure your grammar is sound and respectable.
- Read some source of wisdom every day, including noteworthy literary classics, the Bible, and Red Pill blogs on the Manosphere. Read it out loud and make your mouth profess truth.
- Memorize Scriptures, Maxims, and other principles that are fundamental to your values and beliefs.
- Make an inventory of your own values and personality.
- Prepare, memorize, and practice giving an introduction of yourself.

You can be certain that many times in your life, events will come up that will demand your immediate polished response.

This is the reprisal: If your response is inadequate, then stubbornly resist the temptation to pity yourself, or decline into bitterness. Instead, study your failures.

- Write down whatever verbalizations may have come into your mind.
- Consult the key literature again (e.g. Scriptures, Red Pill Maxims). Find where you went wrong. Write it down.
- Ruminate on these truths, and improve your expression until it develops the power of authenticity.
- Discuss the matter with a trusted friend to get an outside perspective of yourself.
- Edit your written words, and revise them as necessary.
- Practice reciting the improved version, while concentrating on attaining a smooth and confident delivery.
- When you find yourself in the next event, test yourself to see how much you have really improved.

This is the exercise: Try to state to yourself what you feel implicitly to be truth, and you will (1) internalize that truth, and (2) pass that truth on to someone else who will benefit from that same truth, as you have.

When you have successfully re-expressed some truth in your own words, then it becomes uniquely yours in speech. When that expression becomes your expression, then this is when your words gain authenticity. This authenticity and sincerity is what will impact the lives of others.

This mastery can impact every area of your life, not only your Game or your marriage.

But if you say lazily, "I am not going to struggle to express this thing for myself, I will quote so and so, and borrow what I say", then the expression will not only be of no use to you, but of no use to anyone. It might even get you into hot water, if you don't thoroughly understand what you are saying.

This is the cost of neglect: If you do not own truth from the heart, if you dismiss it as being too troublesome or time-consuming, then you'll never apprehend the power obtainable through believing in that truth.

In addition, someone who needs to hear your words, that special woman, that friend or brother, will be spiritually poorer all the days of his/her life.

Furthermore, if you do not contribute to the emotional and spiritual lives of others, then they are less likely to respect, admire and appreciate you. That is just how people are, and that's how it is.

Oswald Chambers is an author who has benefited my spiritual life. He wrote,

> "The author who benefits you most is not the one who tells you something you did not know before, but the one who gives expression to the truth that has been dumbly struggling in you for utterance."

[Eds. note: This is why I write in this blog – to share the words I have fought and suffered to obtain, so that others may find the words to express the trophies of their own spiritual battles – these are the "pearls of great price".]

8. Good Listening Skills Can Motivate Others to Refine Themselves by Examining the Contents of their own Heart and Speech

When a person knows that another person is truly listening to them, then they tend to be more conscientious of what they are thinking, feeling and saying. It has the potential to touch their heart very deeply.

One tactic for good communication is to try to repeat, in your own words, what the other person has said, and to get that person's confirmation as to whether your version agrees with what he/she originally stated. If it does, then you can both be assured that you have understood each other, but if it does not, then the point of discussion has an opportunity to be clarified, as this tactic brings out specifically what has been misunderstood.

This habit shows the other person that you are truly listening. Listening has been lauded by many PUA's as being a crucial element of making a lasting impression.

This is also a good tactic to use in our communications with God, as well. In fact, most Christian disciplines, such as prayers, testimonies, exhortations, preaching and teaching, all utilize these same tactics in order to improve one's impact on others. These types of exercises are equivalent to practicing one's "spiritual speech".

9. Conclusions

Choking is one of the main challenges that a man experiences, and it is my hope that the guidelines offered here will help men overcome the experience of choking.

The best defenses against choking are listed as follows.

1. Be well equipped.
2. Be well prepared.
3. Practice your skill in a state of Flow. Start with what is familiar to you, and branch out to discover the frontier of your ability.
4. Control the focus of your attention to stay on the target.
5. Beware of your "autopilot". Stay aware of the present moment, always live in the NOW.
6. Whenever you might get bored or anxious, check how your challenge level compares to your skill level. Don't blame yourself if there is a mismatch. Simply adjust if needed.
7. When you experience a failure or get distracted, analyze the mistake and find where you went off. Learn from your mistakes.
8. Occasionally, take some time to reflect on your progress, and admire your work/accomplishments with satisfaction. This will augment your confidence and sense of well-being.
9. From time to time, review how your endeavors contribute towards the target of your goal. Decide how important any one particular priority is, whether you are spending too little or too much time and effort on this, and adjust accordingly. Then, after you have outlined your schedule or strategy, concentrate more on getting into Flow, and not so much on the task execution, or your present performance.
10. Continually refine the integrity of your heart and speech. Be patient with yourself.

Other endeavors which may prove useful to this end include the following.

1. Keep a journal or diary. Write down noteworthy events in your life. Record your thoughts, fears and confusion. Study the topics that come up, and pray about these things. Reread what you have written from time to time. Take an inventory of your progress.
2. Read classical literature. Study your native language. Expand your vocabulary and refine your verbal mechanics.
3. Take a class in debate. Learn the difference between honest and dishonest debate tactics, so that you can keep yourself in a reasonable state, and call people out on their logical errors.
4. Make an inventory of your own personality.
5. Prepare, memorize, and practice giving an introduction of yourself.
6. Get to know how others perceive you, as well as your strengths and weaknesses in presentation. Make a video or voice recording of yourself talking, and study it. Identify your tics and overused phrases/expressions. Get into the habit of making yourself say what you want to say.
7. Challenge yourself to talk for at least 5 minutes, with at least 5 new people, every day.

The Trouble with Resolutions, Inner Vows and Commitments

Jack · 14 January 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Resolutions, “Inner Vows” (which are described herein), and commitments are responsible for some of the biggest mistakes people make in their short lives. An obvious example is a marriage to an unsuitable partner, but there are many other daily-basis blunders that people make as well. This post examines how our words and expectations can lead us into catastrophe, sometimes, without our knowledge.

The content is organized as follows.

1. The Common Behavior

The Common Behavior

It’s now two weeks into the new year, and I’m sure a lot of people are beginning to wrestle with keeping the resolutions they made two weeks ago. If this is you, then let’s examine the situation you are in right now.

During the New Year’s Holiday, a lot of people start paying attention to their own inner critic, which is a habit sparked by an emotional rebound that occurs after the passing of the joyous Christmas season. They get the idea that they need to “turn over a new leaf”, and so they make resolutions to make a sweeping change in their lifestyle, which only lasts a few weeks, before they give up in a shroud of guilt.

What is this all about?

People run on auto-pilot. They don’t make adequate plans. In fact, they really don’t give much thought as to what they are doing in the ever present moment. That may be a de facto definition of IDIOT (an acronym for an Individual Devoid of Intelligent, Organized Thought).

The majority of people in the world make spurious decisions based on passing emotions. They never make plans, or think about what they are doing each day. They just go through a HABIT, and when something happens, they REACT. When the next event happens, they REACT. They are ALWAYS REACTING, because they are NEVER PROACTIVE. They don’t know how to initiate a situation before a situation “initiates them” first.

These people might foolishly believe they are making a “conscious decision” about a particular matter, but actually, their whole consciousness only consists of not much more than their own ego preservation, their emotional stability, their sense of security and their false sense of “control”. As a result, the vast majority of their decision-making never penetrates deeper than these issues.

This is called SPIRITUAL IMMATURITY, and people of all ages have this disease.

Have you ever noticed this?

I’m talking about people who are mindless automatons, who never ANTICIPATE what might happen, and because of this, they can never get control of their lives. They are always BEING CONTROLLED, instead of BEING IN CONTROL. They are controlled by other people, by circumstances, by desires, by physical needs, by their lifestyle, by the requirements of their job, by their own ego, by their own happiness… The list goes on.

What kinds of things control you?

Now, imagine these kinds of people making new years' resolutions to change deep, ingrained habits, or to stop addictive behaviors like smoking, drinking, etc. Then after they fail, they feel guilty. They wonder why they failed and they beat themselves up over their failure. It's kind of ridiculous, isn't it?

It's even more funny when they get the idea that they should stop smoking or drinking, etc. WHILE they are half-way through enjoying a Marlboro light or a can of Budweiser, etc. It seems that they think they should feel guilty about enjoying something, and they try to punish themselves in some way. That's another manifestation of the sinful nature that dupes a lot of shallow people into running around in moral circles. But they never realize that they are soooo controlled by all of these emotions!

An Inner Vow May Become A Doorway to Spiritual Bondage

People who are in bondage to something are unable to escape the habit of it. These people can never find peace until they DO what they know is wrong. That is the sinful nature, and it's the backbone of all sorts of addictions. The discipline of the law cannot help, because the more he focuses his mind on his behavior as being a sin, the more it will control him. In fact, that is the power of the mind being used in the wrong way.

It is important to consider what kinds of vows you may had made in the past. You may notice that a lot of the things you vowed never to do, etc., are now things in which you have/had some kind of bondage.

Or, if you've only made an inner vow very recently, don't be surprised if you experience a backlash, and find yourself swamped by the very thing you resolved never to get caught up in!

Let me give you an example of what I'm talking about. We all know of someone who made it clear to everyone, "My father was alcoholic, and he abused my mother. I hated having a father like that, and I will not let myself end up in the same way as my mother." …then comes the inner vow… "I'll never marry an alcoholic man!" Then sure enough, the next time we see her, she is married to a Jekyll and Hyde gin-slosh with a lot of mixed feelings about the whole thing.

Or maybe she does marry a teetotaling man, but soon after they're married, he begins to experience a mysterious, overwhelming pressure to begin experimenting with alcohol… and then he becomes a gin-slosh!

The thing that causes people to make self-destructive inner vows could be a negative, one-time event, or repeated instances under special circumstances, or by not having the basic needs of love, security and affirmation met for long periods of time, especially during the formative years. The motivation to make inner vows could be almost anything that causes some kind of emotional trauma, plants a root of bitterness, and throws a person onto the warpath of "change" in his personal life.

Another example is the pure-hearted and starry-eyed romantic who is actually just love-starved by growing up in a medieval Gestapo-regime (MGR) home with no public display of affection (PDA). She gets married to the first half-way decent guy who comes along, thinking that a marriage (which includes making vows) will give her all the healing she needs. But it never works out that way.

It's sad. These kinds of people are more tragic.

A more extreme example is someone from a MGR home with no PDA who buys into the discipline and vows to stay sexually chaste until "true love arrives" in the form of a Christian marriage.

Do you know people like this? Somehow, they naturally think that taking a vow can restore all the love they missed! If it wasn't so tragic, it would be comical!

One study showed that 82% of adolescents who took a Chastity Vow broke it within five years.

It seems likely that one has a better chance at keeping ones' virginity, or at succeeding in any other kind of moral endeavor, by totally avoiding such kinds of vows!

I've met some spiritually astute people, who've noticed this phenomena, have naïvely confused it with the power of a confession vs profession, and have attributed it to darker forces. They seek to avoid the same trouble by saying to themselves, "I'll not jink myself by saying such things!" These people can see the truth, but they don't know what they're looking at. So, they live rather half-heartedly, and are somewhat afraid to trust God totally.

The Implicit Treachery of Making Inner Vows

James gives us a very stern warning about the danger of making any kind of oath.

> James 5:12
> But above all, my brethren, do not swear, either by heaven or by earth or with any other oath. But let your "Yes" be "Yes," and your "No," "No," lest you fall into judgment.
> Jesus urged us not to make vows at all, implying that by doing so, we may be contributing to a stronghold of evil.

Jesus himself warns of the dangers of "swearing", which is interpreted to be "the serious declaration of a matter".

> Matthew 5
> [33] "Again you have heard that it was said to those of old, 'You shall not swear falsely, but shall perform your oaths to the Lord.' [34] But I say to you, do not swear at all: neither by heaven, for it is God's throne; [35] nor by the earth, for it is His footstool; nor by Jerusalem, for it is the city of the great King. [36] Nor shall you swear by your head, because you cannot make one hair white or black. [37] But let your 'Yes' be 'Yes,' and your 'No,' 'No.' For whatever is more than these is from the evil one.

Jesus doesn't go into a full description of the process, but the important point at hand, is that by making these resolutions and inner vows, one can actually stymie ones' spiritual growth.

How so?

People who are forced against their will, or beyond their understanding (possibly by a parent or even by ones' own conscience) to "enjoy" being obedient, will eventually go crazy and lose their soul. (This is commonplace in Asian culture.) Some people get themselves so much into the habit of a "forced coercion" or some kind of behavioral control that they don't even know who they are anymore.

Christian writers such as John Eldredge (e.g. "Waking the Dead"), Philip Yancey (e.g. "What's so Amazing about Grace?") and Drs. Cloud and Townsend (e.g. "Boundaries"), have helped us to see that this is unbiblical, and that it is a central part of WORSHIP to "live from the heart in spirit and in truth".

An Inner Vow May Constitute Spiritual Rebellion

To take this concept even further, forcing ones' self to be "obedient", and to require ones' self to "enjoy it" qualifies as spiritual rebellion!

Wait a minute! How can a commitment to obedience and excellence be considered spiritual rebellion?

There is nothing rebellious about a commitment to obedience, in itself, but if you are doing it continually with a stubborn, isolated will (viz. in an "effort of the flesh"), because you don't like what has been presented to you in life, then you are willfully refusing to experience God's grace in the matter, and it will only twist your heart into rebelliousness.

Moreover, insecurity, and the inability to take an initiative, or even to do much of anything independently, are all symptoms of a dormant, but defiant, rebellious heart, and so we should not be confused about where one really stands.

Gods' grace cannot work through a person in such a state, and over time, such efforts (or lack of efforts) will only thwart that persons' life with a lot of bitter remorse and regret, which will stand at the forefront of his mind and further alienate Him from experiencing God.

Making inner vows, resolutions and commitments will only compound the ill effects of this phenomenon. It seems counterintuitive that our "good" choices can actually be acts of rebellion, if not done in faith, but it is so true.

Maybe you are asking, "So what is wrong with trying to do what is good and right?"

While it is right and proper to value the ideals that Christianity teaches us, we should be wary of making these virtues into our most prominent goals in our personal lives. Instead, we should continue on in pursuing the ordinances and purposes of God in our lives, while trusting Him to provide the means and the grace for us to grow in obedience, instead of trusting in our own will power to make ourselves obedient, and justify ourselves through the letter of the law.

If you have made such kinds of inner vows, you need to pray about those things to discover if it is actually some sort of spiritual rebellion, and if so, then you need to repent of your "efforts in the flesh", and ask God to forgive you for refusing to trust in Jesus to guide you through life.

Obviously, a person needs to be familiar with the nature of all these things, before making any type of vow or commitment.

Gaining A New Perspective

If a person is really serious about REPENTANCE, then he needs to see the larger picture of how a particular habit is MORALLY WRONG, before he can begin to agree with God on the matter. A true, lasting repentance cannot come on a wave of guilt, because it is still an emotional decision. True repentance must address the deeper NATURE of the problem, if it is truly a problem, and is not simply a social mandate, or an imagined foible that they dislike about themselves.

If you are someone who is not really confident in your identity as a child of God, then when these kinds of issues come up, you might think that your brokenness is a problem that you need to fix, or else you might question your identity first. This is why a lot of people make inner vows and resolutions in the first place. But such a person is confused about his responsibilities as a Christian.

It is a Biblical matter to identify ones' self as a sinner, and in general, no one can disagree with that. But on the other hand, you may not have CHOSEN to have all these problems! God put you into this broken world, and there's nothing you can do about it!

What does God expect you to do now?

Why not try to "accept" yourself as a broken person? Do not accept it because it is "acceptable", because it is not, and that would be the same as lying to yourself. No, you should accept your brokenness because only God can change it – not you.

All of your efforts to clean up your own life are like wrapping your festering wounds with a bandage, and telling yourself that you'll be "OK", when what you really need is an invasive surgery and hospitalization! You need to trust the Surgeon (God), and submit yourself to the knife of the truth, and stay with a fellowship of loving people who can minister to you.

A lot of people can never understand why God subjects us to a broken existence, and they think God expects them to "save themselves" by "turning over a new leaf". Or else, they get angry and blame God for everything, which is a rather pointless exercise.

Other people see that we are stuck in a broken world, and they realize that God created in us a need for fellowship and ministry, which we must not neglect if we are to become mature, obedient and excellent in God's eyes.

On the other hand, sometimes making an inner vow, or a commitment to excellence is a good thing. If you are someone who is confident about your identity in Christ, and you are making resolutions simply because you want to "tighten your belt" in order to enjoy a more orderly life and provide a better Christian witness to others, then this writing will be merely a quaint review of what you have overcome in your spiritual life.

How Should We Go About Conquering Bad Habits and Addictions?

Prayer is a very important part of overcoming spiritual addictions. But I need to warn you, the power to overcome addictions can only be apprehended through the expression of a true prayer of faith, and not as a hopeless plea from a drowning man.

In other words, if you see that your problem is deeper than merely failing to anticipate things, and you have a spiritual addiction to something, be cautious in praying about it. If your prayers have the opposite effect, then immediately stop praying about it, and simply start believing that the blood of Jesus covers even this, and you will slowly gain strength in overcoming your addiction.

Let me be more explicit to make this clear. If you are NOT praying in the power of the Holy Spirit, then your faithless prayers are nothing more than a concentrated, conscientious reminder of your problems, and all of these sorts of efforts in prayer can be likened to you repetitively sticking your nose into your own excrement. It will only have the effect of strengthening your addiction, and you'll be left wondering, "What is 'God' doing?" Especially if you're motivated by guilt, then the more you pray about it, the worse your habit will get. But if you can come to a place where you realize that even your prayers might be mere efforts of the flesh, then you will see that you'll be better off if you stopped praying about it and try to put it out of your mind altogether.

Making an effective confession can also give one the power of God to overcome a sinful habit, and I advise you to go about this in a circumspect manner as well.

The root act of obedience that is necessary to bring about a remission of sin (a recovery from your spiritual addiction) in any of these things, is to recognize your ability to say, "That is me!" "That is my problem!" and thereby own up to your present state of brokenness. This will bring you into the reality of the present, which is where you can find the truth, and do something about it.

Learn to Counteract the Sinful Nature by Anticipation

With all of this said, we can now properly address the idea of how anticipation may ameliorate a bad habit.

First of all, do not confuse the ideas of anticipation, discernment, disposition and prophecy. To make these concepts clear, consider the following passage.

> Matthew 16
> [1] Then the Pharisees and Sadducees came, and testing Him asked that He would show them a sign from heaven. [2] He answered and said to them, "When it is evening you say, 'It will be fair weather, for the sky is red'; [3] and in the morning, 'It will be foul weather today, for the sky is red and threatening.' Hypocrites! You know how to discern the face of the sky, but you cannot discern the signs of the times. [4] A wicked and adulterous generation seeks after a sign, and no sign shall be given to it except the sign of the prophet Jonah."

Discernment is what allows you to identify the nature of a thing or event, and ascribe some kind of value or significance to it, and whether it is positive or negative.

When Jesus speaks of discernment here, he is not talking about the spiritual kind of discernment that the people in church like to discuss; like, "discerning the will of the Lord", or "discerning ungodly strongholds", etc. No, Jesus knew the Pharisees' were insincere towards Him, and He reframed the Pharisees' faithless question in order to take control of the conversation and reveal the Pharisees' own apostasy.

In other words, Jesus is pretty cool.

Jesus is not rebuking people about their faith either. He is warning the Pharisees that they are unaware of how they fit into the evil worldly system. Only the Spirit of God can reveal to a person where they sit in the wrong workings of the world, and how to jump out of it. Most of the Pharisees could not see their own spiritual disposition, because they did not have the Spirit of God. However, it may be possible that Jesus is pointing out how they have no discernment of their own disposition, in an effort to arouse the disposition of holiness within some of them.

In other words, Jesus is a farmer who plants truth and sows believers.

I believe Jesus was speaking of the Pharisees' need of more anticipation in this passage. The line Jesus used is paraphrased in an old English proverb.

> "Red at night, sailors delight; red in the morning, sailors take warning"

This proverb describes a common sequence of events. It may not be true every time, but most of the time, as shown by experience, it is. When the sky is red at night, we may anticipate good weather in the coming days, and vice versa.

Anticipation is when your own intuition tells you what will happen next, when you are well acquainted with the natural progression of events. But these events may or may not have anything to do with the purposes of God, and so, can be subject to circumstances, which a believer may take control of.

Prophecy is the will of the Lord as spoken to those who are not familiar with it, and it carries the power of an official decree to its' listeners. The will of the Lord can not be changed by circumstances, but instead, it changes those circumstances over time. Consider Revelation 19:10:

> "The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy."

That is a lot bigger than merely "predicting the future", as many people naïvely comprehend prophecy.

Know the Difference Between Expectations and Anticipations

We need to very careful about anticipations, that we do not confuse them with our expectations. Anticipations are rather specific and immediate, while expectations are broader and involve some degree of satisfaction in the outcome. Therefore, expectations and may be lethally laced with any sort of misguided notions about things.

It's usually very difficult to anticipate the next act of God, unless we are praying specifically for the thing, but there are certain things we can expect from God, namely, the fulfillment of things He has promised. But we should also be prepared for the reality that God may not fulfill his promises exactly as we imagine it should be, and that is not because God is "tricky" or "holding out on us", but because we may have a lot of false notions about things.

But isn't it possible to expect too much from God?

It is if we are expecting the wrong sorts of things from God.

Blatantly false anticipations, or selfishly ambitious types of expectations, can easily become distractions that we can become preoccupied with, and simultaneously set ourselves up for disappointment and prolong God's processes in us, all in one move.

We must be sure that our expectations are challenging, yet realistic, while all the while conforming to God's will for our lives. We must also accept the fact that God will probably work beyond our expectations, but will probably do nothing concerning our anticipations.

On the other hand, there are some people who are so heavenly minded that they are no earthly good. Do you know of someone like this? This guy might be the one who is "expecting too much from God", and he is just as bad as the

In fact, I think most people should expect more from God, because most people are too complacent (viz. spiritually “lazy”), and are content with far less than God’s best for their lives.

A lot of people cannot be effective for God (e.g. service, ministry, evangelism, discipline, spiritual growth, achieving excellence, etc.) because they are too preoccupied with their own happiness. Others cannot be effective because they are too preoccupied with their own sadness. “Giving control of your life to God” means that you are no longer motivated by your own sentiments such as these, but instead, you are submitting your will and purpose for living to the higher purposes of God’s agenda.

Do you know what God’s agenda is? I believe if you read the entire book of Ephesians, you’ll have a fairly good idea of what God’s will is for us. We can safely and correctly expect such things to happen to us as believers. We would fail ourselves if we did not.

But the obedience to the calling of God, as described in Ephesians, is not carried out in a “perfect environment”, which would otherwise make our lives too easy to require any kind of faith, and that is the real battle of it all. However, that battle becomes hopeless when Christians become comfortable and complacent in a corrupted environment that is supposed to be a battlefield.

We should learn how to be Godly people who can fit into an ungodly world, prosper and grow, without succumbing to the ungodly forces of this world or the relentless waves of self-interest. We are IN the world, but not OF the world.

As believers, we should become the pillars of our communities and workplaces.

Taking ACTION is the Only True Resolution

Wisdom requires that we have some anticipation of people and events, but we should take action first, and not wait until something happens.

A better way to trust God is to TAKE ACTION!

Restated, we should try to anticipate the things that can be anticipated, and when they happen, we should be refining our understanding of the world. Ideally, we should be able to anticipate events before they happen, and to know what actions to take, such that the situation can become something positive, and not something negative. This is what it really means to be in control, and not to be one who is controlled.

A lot of believers might argue that “we need to give control of our lives to God”. Of course, that is true, but what does that really mean? Does it mean we should become spiritual rag dolls? It seems that a lot of Christians think so. But the problem with this mentality is that it has nothing to do with commitments or anticipations, and does not involve our will in any way. Besides, God will always do something with our lives that is much bigger than what we could ever imagine, and that is one thing we can never anticipate.

It’s quite simple really. We need to be PROACTIVE and NOT REACTIVE.

What does this mean?

If you are the woman who doesn’t want to have an alcoholic husband, for example, then instead of making an inner vow to control your own life, you should profess your experiences to other believers, which should acquaint you with your present state of freedom. Then, pray to meet a Christian man who is spiritually mature, i.e. a man who has OVERCOME his addictive behaviors. Trust God to bring you the right man, and trust your fellowship to keep you sailing in the right direction socially. Once your purpose and identity are known to others, it should only be a matter of time before your prayers are answered. But perhaps, the waiting is the hardest part.

If you are the person who wants to find the love and joy of intimacy, then you need to know first that any kind of vow cannot help you. You need to find a group of believers to join in tight fellowship with, and stay with them until you can overcome your past rejection and inability to experience and reciprocate love from others. You really need to grow in this capacity before you will ever be successful in a male-female relationship that glorifies God. That may take a lot of praying, waiting and searching as well. Like I said, this person is in a more tragic position than the person in the first example.

Unfortunately, it seems that stumbling blocks are always a daily, present reality, while finding love and aligning ones' self with the truth is a long, hard road. But that is why God gives us grace and mercy through His Son, Jesus Christ, who forgives our failures, and gives us the hope to carry on until our race is finished.

A good runner can never clear the obstacles in his path and make a good progress, unless he constantly anticipates the hurdles before him with a firm expectation of finishing the race well.

The whole purpose of this writing is to make you aware of how you can be someone who can anticipate the hurdles of life before you trip over them and land face-down in the mud.

Conclusions

Life is a process. Sanctification is a process. It's important to be aware of how Gods' processes work! If you are unaware of the process, then you will be too ignorant to respond to significant events in the process, and you will remain unaware of the choices you have and you will feel like you are a slave to your life. Instead, know for yourself what "freedom in Christ" really means. The grace of God cannot be frustrated as a result of true faith.

Hold on to your hope in Christ as the author and finisher of your faith. Get a basic understanding of yourself and your life, and learn to anticipate events, such as temptations, before they can surprise you and cause you to stumble. It is very important to get involved with a fellowship of people who care!

If you know full well about the problems and difficulties that you have, but you cannot get control of yourself over them, or get away from them no matter how much you might anticipate them, then you have a deeper problem of bondage. If anyone is having a very difficult time with this, I recommend "The Bondage Breaker" by Neil Anderson, as further reading.

I hope that this writing might give resolution-makers the peace to trust God with the issues that they struggle with, and begin to see the abundant life they should be living.

True Rest and Worship

Jack · 8 February 2010 · Archived copy · Original

In today's busy working culture, not enough emphasis is given on the importance of rest. I think most people don't even have an accurate understanding of the nature of rest, and why it's important. This post is an exploration of the benefits and usefulness of rest.

> Exodus 20
> [8] "Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy. [9] Six days you shall labor and do all your work, [10] but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the LORD your God. In it you shall do no work: you, nor your son, nor your daughter, nor your male servant, nor your female servant, nor your cattle, nor your stranger who is within your gates. [11] For in six days the LORD made the heavens and the earth, the sea, and all that is in them, and rested the seventh day. Therefore the LORD blessed the Sabbath day and hallowed it.

This is the fourth of the Ten Commandments, which God gave to Moses on Mount Sinai. The Ten commandments are a very important part of our spiritual awareness and growth, as they are intended to reveal to us our own incapacities and train us in trusting God. But this commandment seems to have special significance, because it is repeated many times throughout scripture. One such passage carries some important implications to be considered.

> [12] And the LORD spoke to Moses, saying, [13] "Speak also to the children of Israel, saying: 'Surely My Sabbaths you shall keep, for it is a sign between Me and you throughout your generations, that you may know that I am the LORD who sanctifies you. [14] You shall keep the Sabbath, therefore, for it is holy to you. Everyone who profanes it shall surely be put to death; for whoever does any work on it, that person shall be cut off from among his people. [15] Work shall be done for six days, but the seventh is the Sabbath of rest, holy to the LORD. Whoever does any work on the Sabbath day, he shall surely be put to death. [16] Therefore the children of Israel shall keep the Sabbath, to observe the Sabbath throughout their generations as a perpetual covenant. [17] It is a sign between Me and the children of Israel forever; for in six days the LORD made the heavens and the earth, and on the seventh day He rested and was refreshed.'"

Concerning the text in red, when it says that those who violate the Sabbath shall "surely be put to death", we should not imagine that a mob of Old Testament Jews will come and stone the offender of the Law.

Get real!

This means that you'll lose touch with the Kingdom Life of God within your heart. When we think of those who are "put to death", we should imagine bitter, depressed, sniping, overworked, stressed-out people, who are under tremendous pressure, and spend all their time and efforts on an endeavor that never really comes out right. Additionally, their relationships with family and friends suffer, because they spend all their time working. That is what it means to be "cut off", and in totality, it's a spiritual death!

Concerning the text in blue, it is evident that the Sabbath REST is how our covenant with God is serviced and renewed.

The Ten Commandments are recounted again in Deuteronomy, and are embellished with a more complete description that EVERYBODY needs rest, and that even includes animals!

> Deuteronomy 5

> work: you, nor your son, nor your daughter, nor your male servant, nor your female servant, nor your ox, nor your donkey, nor any of your cattle, nor your stranger who is within your gates, that your male servant and your female servant may rest as well as you. [15] And remember that you were a slave in the land of Egypt, and the LORD your God brought you out from there by a mighty hand and by an outstretched arm; therefore the LORD your God commanded you to keep the Sabbath day.

The last verse here (in blue) emphasizes that since God has rescued us from a futile existence, WE ARE NO LONGER SLAVES, so… WE SHOULD NOT ACT LIKE SLAVES in our work.

In other words, WHO WE ARE IS MORE IMPORTANT THAN WHAT WE DO!

These Commandments are followed with a promise, and as usual with God's promises, it mainly pertains to the enhancement of the quality of our Life and also the fruits or our labors (highlighted in red text here).

> [1] "Now this is the commandment, and these are the statutes and judgments which the LORD your God has commanded to teach you, that you may observe them in the land which you are crossing over to possess, [2] that you may fear the LORD your God, to keep all His statutes and His commandments which I command you, you and your son and your grandson, all the days of your life, and that your days may be prolonged. [3] Therefore hear, O Israel, and be careful to observe it, that it may be well with you, and that you may multiply greatly as the LORD God of your fathers has promised you—'a land flowing with milk and honey.'

But you might ask, what is a "Sabbath", and what does it mean to "keep the Sabbath holy"?

Throughout Scriptures, the word "Sabbath" is habitually used in association with the word "REST". The word "holy" is an adjective that means something is special, and SET APART from the normal, day-to-day occurrences and uses.

"Rest" means different things to different people, so we need greater clarification here. Some people think resting means sleeping, or simply not doing anything. But I believe the intended meaning of a "Sabbath REST" is not slumber or idleness, nor even strictly confined to church attendance, but it is any activity that is out of your ordinary routine, which can free your mind and heart from the burdens and anxieties of your life.

It's not hard, at this point, to identify the concept of REST as a variation of WORSHIP, which is why a lot of people hold the idea that going to church is how we keep the Sabbath holy.

But the church is not the only place we can worship. We should learn to worship God in all facets of our life. Your career, your family, and all your relationships should be offered to God as forms of worship.

Also, you don't need to go on a long vacation, or spend a lot of money to get REST. Rest can come in very simple easy ways.

For example, on nice days, I like to take a ride on my motorcycle through the countryside. The fresh air, sights and smells always give me a renewed perspective on life.

On nasty days, it's better to curl up in a comfortable chair with a good book and a hot drink.

The popular notion is to dismiss such activities as idleness. We may not think of this as REST, but it is!

Sometimes, I'll take a walk up the small mountain behind the University, to get a sense of refreshment during the day. It only takes half an hour, and a little bit of exercise, but I come back feeling like a new man with a fresh wind.

In fact, sometimes, a good rest could be a real physical workout, such as playing sports, or working on a hobby. Most hobbies qualify as avenues of restful diversion.

For example, my friends' testimony conveys a very good description of how he finds rest through hunting (and snowboarding)…

> "Let the 2009/2010 Deer (less) Season stand as testament to all of you who ever doubted my motivations for hunting, that it has absolutely nothing to do with killing deer, but is much more about watching the world come to life each morning, talking to God with no distractions, and spending time with my friends and family. Now on to snowboarding!"

Another way to find rest through worship is in being true to your nature. Posture positioning and "wearing face" always requires a lot of work. I think this is why the Bible says that the wicked have no peace (or rest), in Isaiah 57.

> Isaiah 57
> [20] But the wicked are like the troubled sea, When it cannot rest, Whose waters cast up mire and dirt. [21] "There is no peace," Says my God, "for the wicked."

Even while working or studying, short periods of rest are necessary to renew ones' strength throughout the day, because studies have shown that the average persons' attention span only lasts 20-40 minutes.

In America, those coworkers who take the time to make coffee, or bring in doughnuts or cake for everyone, are encouraging people to rest.

In Asia, people have a habit of drinking tea and eating fruit together as a form of rest, which is usually done in the afternoon.

Think of those people who go outside to have a chat and a smoke during their breaks. All these habits are very quick, powerful forms of RENEWAL for them, and in most cases, they have never even left the workplace!

In fact, some laws regulate how long hourly-wage employees can be required to work without a break, and in most countries, it is about 2 to 3 hours. These laws are modern expressions of the Mosaic Law.

The important point to remember here is that DAILY and WEEKLY REST and relaxation are very important to all aspects of our health: physical, emotional, social, spiritual and mental. So please ensure adequate periods of REST to your body, mind and soul, while still keeping a disciplined and timely schedule. It is no small task to find creative and effective ways to REST each day and each week.

By the way, although watching TV can be a very restful form of entertainment, be careful that you do not let yourself depend on TV too much. It is better to spend your time with a friend, or alone in peaceful tranquility. In fact, I tell my students that anyone who spends more than two hours a day watching TV is detrimentally dependent on TV as a form of REST. (Anyone who spends more than 6 hours a day watching TV, has a TV addiction!) I urge such a person to develop other activities that will provide more real-life benefits and not waste so much of their time.

Read about time management here.

Now, I think I've written enough for today. I'm going to quit and take a rest.

Forgiveness – The biggest obstacle in overcoming my parent's divorce

Jack · 3 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

> For if you forgive men when they sin against you, your heavenly Father will also forgive you. But if you do not forgive men their sins, your Father will not forgive your sins. (Matthew 6:14-15 NIV)

The Common Approach to Forgiveness

When it comes to forgiveness, we're tough negotiators. We open with an offer like, "I'll forgive you, IF…"

Then, we follow with a subtle concession that sounds like a confession: "I can't forgive her until she learns her lesson…"

When we think the other side is stonewalling, we take off the gloves: "If I forgive him, he'll just think he got away with it!"

We might think we're negotiating for God. We might think we're negotiating for their souls. We might think we're negotiating for justice. But all we're really doing is negotiating for CONTROL over the situation.

It's important to recognize that our concept of forgiveness is extremely shallow here. In this vein, "forgiveness" is nothing more than a promise not to bring up the wrong done against us, to use as ammunition in future negotiations.

Forgiveness Can NOT Be a Negotiation

I think that people who deal with forgiveness in the ways described above, don't really know what forgiveness is all about.

The Truth says we can not conduct negotiations after someone has hurt us. Why not?

It's because we are ambassadors for God, the King, and we represent, not our own, but the King's intentions, as well as his character. The King says to forgive, and that means we forgive!

There is no IF, AND or BUT… We simply forgive.

The Lord's instructions are clear and unambiguous: If you forgive those who sin against you, then the Lord will forgive you for your sins against Him. If you don't forgive those who sin against you, then the Lord won't forgive you for your sins against Him. This is a conditional statement, and there is no room for negotiation here.

Any other response, such as saying, "I'll forgive him, IF…" isn't really forgiveness. It's just negotiating, and God's court of justice will not recognize contracts made without His authority or permission.

The question is not "SHOULD, IF, or CAN someone be forgiven? The true question is…

WILL YOU MAKE THE CHOICE TO FORGIVE?

The Choice of Forgiveness is a PATHWAY, and Not Simply a Decision

Choosing to forgive is not an easy thing. Perhaps it is not even a one-time thing. Let me explain.

My parents divorced in 1994 after 28 years of marriage, and they both got remarried to other people within a year after they divorced. I have struggled with the effects of my parents divorce for years. It is a "living death". I made a choice to forgive them, but my heart was crushed, and my life refused to comply with my choice to forgive. Believing in God did not help me either. I did not understand why it was so hard for me to forgive them, except that I knew their sin took away my confidence and hope, and made me self-conscious and fearful. In that way, therefore, it destroyed some of my CAPABILITY to forgive.

Then, about 10 years ago, I learned something about forgiveness that changed my whole perspective. I read a book by a Christian author (The Inner Voice of Love, by Henry Nouwen) who offered me a new perspective by redefining forgiveness.

> "Forgiveness is when you take responsibility for the consequences of another person's sin".

This statement didn't make sense to me at first, because I still had the popular concept of forgiveness as being a "let it go and forget it" kind of thing. But eventually, I came to see how Jesus forgave me, by taking responsibility for my own sins through His death on the cross, thereby bearing the penalty for my sin, and through His resurrection, which set me free to pursue a new life.

Jesus truly forgave me by taking responsibility for the consequences of my sin.

The more I pondered this new concept of "taking responsibility", not for the sin itself, but for the CONSEQUENCES, or the effects, of the sin in my own life, the more I was able to face the truth of my situation:

> "My parents are divorced. They are now married to others. They will never reunite. I will never be able to change that, or get back the family I had for the first 22 years of my life. The past is gone. All I can do now, is accept this loss, and carry on with my own life. I must now find for myself all the things that my parents promised, but failed to give me. And perhaps no one will ever help me or even understand."

Ever since I gave up those old hopes, faced these facts, and accepted responsibility for the consequences, I've been able to apprehend a real forgiveness, and I've gradually been able to deal with my life much better.

The toughest thing I've learned about forgiveness is not in the difficulty of shouldering the burden, but in realizing that forgiveness does not necessarily restore the relationships that were broken by the sin, and it does not necessarily restore the opportunities in life that were lost as a result of the sin.

True Forgiveness Restores Lives (but not necessarily Relationships)

The one good thing that has come out of my experience is how it has prepared me to help others who have come from broken homes, which is a very valuable quality to have as a teacher.

I've found that the best way I can forgive my parents is to help others who have suffered through a divorce, just as I have. So that is what I do with myself now, and I've helped a lot of my students in this way. This is described in 2nd Corinthians 1:3-7 (NKJV).

> [3] Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies and God of all comfort, [4] who comforts us in all our tribulation, that we may be able to comfort those who are in any trouble, with the comfort with which we ourselves are comforted by God. [5] For as the sufferings of Christ abound in us, so our consolation also abounds through Christ. [6] Now if we are afflicted, it is for your consolation and salvation, which is effective for enduring the same sufferings which we also suffer. Or if we are comforted, it is for your consolation and salvation. [7] And our hope for you is steadfast, because we know that as you are partakers of the sufferings, so also you will partake of the consolation.

In effect, the Lord's will is for us to take the things we've learned from the experience, and help others who are going through the same experience. So I've learned that real forgiveness must be as life-changing as the sin which made the forgiveness necessary.

That is not an easy choice at all, but there is no other (better) choice. We must forgive.

9. Conclusions from Isaiah

You will have to decide exactly how to fast and find the answers to these questions for yourself. But I will offer some information here that has helped me decide when, how, and how long to fast. I hope this gives you some helpful insights as well.

What is the Purpose of Fasting?

First of all, fasting should be done privately, or in conjunction with others who are also fasting. Fasting should never be done publicly for the purpose of receiving recognition for our "spirituality". Jesus speaks towards this specifically in Matthew 6:16-18.

> "Moreover, when you fast, do not be like the hypocrites, with a sad countenance. For they disfigure their faces that they may appear to men to be fasting. Assuredly, I say to you, they have their reward. [17] But you, when you fast, anoint your head and wash your face, [18] so that you do not appear to men to be fasting, but to your Father who is in the secret place; and your Father who sees in secret will reward you openly.

Secondly, there are many physiological motives to fast, including losing weight, better health, and a bright countenance. However, the Bible is clear that fasting is helpful from a spiritual perspective, and the motive should be to enhance the quality of ones' relationship to God.

Jesus talked about fasting in Matthew 9:14-17, Mark 2:18-22 and Luke 5:33-39. In all three passages, Jesus emphasized that people will fast "when the bridegroom" (Jesus) will be taken away from them". It is implied that fasting will strengthen a person in spirit during a time of trials, or when God seems "distant".

> [33] Then they said to Him, "Why do the disciples of John fast often and make prayers, and likewise those of the Pharisees, but Yours eat and drink?" [34] And He said to them, "Can you make the friends of the bridegroom fast while the bridegroom is with them? [35] But the days will come when the bridegroom will be taken away from them; then they will fast in those days." [36] Then He spoke a parable to them: "No one puts a piece from a new > garment on an old one; otherwise the new makes a tear, and also the piece that was taken out of the new does not match the old. [37] And no one puts new wine into old wineskins; or else the new wine will burst the wineskins and be spilled, and the wineskins will be ruined. [38] But new wine must be put into new wineskins, and both are preserved. [39] And no one, having drunk old wine, immediately desires new; for he says, 'The old is better.'"

> Luke 5:33-39 (NKJV)

Also, each of these three passages is followed by the parables of the Patches and the Wineskins. A lot of speculation has surrounded the interpretation of these parables, but I want to offer up my own understanding of these parables. To do so, let me first briefly describe the experience of fasting.

What is it like to Fast?

During the first few hours of fasting for the first time, one is naturally and constantly faced with the desire to eat. For some people, enduring this desire and denying themselves the satisfaction of eating is a torturous task of significant magnitude. This frustration may leave some incapable of focusing on their routine tasks with the usual efficiency. The person fasting is challenged by the temptation to eat something, even if it is only a small piece of candy, simply in order to eliminate the taxing hunger and resume a "normal life". What the person does not commonly understand is that one of the main purposes of fasting is to disrupt the "normal life" and to introduce some aspects of a NEW LIFE.

After a while, there comes a critical moment in the fast, when the person finally learns to resist the thoughts of food, and to continually keep his mind engaged with other things. We might describe this state as a kind of somatic dissociation, supported by a displacement of the usual mental activities. In other words, this is when the power of the flesh is beginning to yield to the power of the will, instead of the other way around.

After this state has been achieved, whenever the craving for food strikes, it only serves to drive the person deeper into the other thoughts and activities which the person uses to displace the original ideas of enjoying food and the sensation of hunger. Of course, prayer is to be one of these main activities, and it is important that prayer is included, because once the mind is dislodged from its usual thought patterns, it becomes open to engage and embrace nearly any other exercise at hand. Other activities which may also be gainfully employed are BIBLE STUDY and FELLOWSHIP with other Christians. Physical activities such as playing sports or other physically strenuous exercises are good, but may prove to be very punishing during a fast.

The Spiritual and Psychological Effects of Fasting

From my own experiences, I have learned that the most significant encounter with fasting is the DISCIPLINE of one's habit, such that one is pressed to look beyond one's human needs, and develop spiritual stamina and strength of will. Of course, the most obvious habits that are addressed through fasting, are one's eating habits and thinking habits, but the DISCIPLINE that is learned from this exercise can be applied to other facets of ones' life.

Now that I have introduced the idea of how the mind is dissociated from its' usual thought patterns during fasting, how the body and fleshly nature is subjugated to the will, and how the mind becomes free to receive new training, the parables of the Patches and the Wineskins may now take on a significant meaning. The basic idea is that the old must be matched with the old, and the new must be matched to the new, and the old and the new cannot be superimposed without a catastrophe. If we presume that our physical habits and thought processes are the garments and wineskins, respectively, then we can conclude that these parables imply the following…

A new discipline in thought and behavior cannot coexist with the old frame of habits.

Moreover, a period of fasting is what separates the old and the new.

Physiological Effects of Fasting

Glucose is the body's primary fuel source and is essential for the brain's functioning. When denied glucose for more than 8 hours, the body will turn to the liver for glycogen, a storage form of glucose, to be used for fuel. The body will also use small amounts of protein to supplement this fuel. This fuel will last for up to 12 hours before the body needs to turn to muscle stores of glycogen, lasting for a few more days. If glucose is still denied at this point, muscle wasting is prevented by temporarily switching to fat as the fuel source, meaning fat is converted into ketone through catabolism. Ketones, while not sugars, are able to be used by the brain as a fuel source as long as glucose is denied.

The body will continue to use fat for as long as there is fat to consume. The body will generally indicate to the person fasting when fat levels are running extremely low (less than 7% and 10% of body weight for males and females, respectively) with an increased urge for food. Fasts are usually broken long before this point. If the fast is not broken, starvation will begin to occur, as the body begins to use protein for fuel.

According to this information, we can make a few conclusions as follows, towards answering the questions posed earlier.

What Should I Eat and What Should I Not Eat?

Fasting, from a physiological standpoint, is essentially depriving the body of the intake of glucose and/or similar forms of sugar. These sugars, including glucose, sucrose, fructose, maltose, etc. can be found in, or derived from foods like wheat, rice, corn or any other grain, bread, potatoes, crackers or any kind of carbohydrate, sweet fruits, sugar, honey, alcohol, nuts… Fat is also included, which is found in all meat, poultry and seafood, and is a very complex form of carbohydrate. Apparently, the only foods that do not contain a source of glucose are non-starchy vegetables, such as broad-leaf greens.

Eating only vegetables is one kind of fast described in the Bible as the "Daniel Fast". Daniel 1:5,8-16 indicates that Daniel refused to eat delicacies and wine from the King's table, and only ate vegetables. The results were that "their features appeared better and fatter in flesh than all the young men who ate the portion of the king's delicacies."

It should be noted that the Daniel Fast is more extreme than vegetarianism, which, for most people, is merely the exclusion of animal products from the diet.

For those seeking a less grueling experience in fasting, a very efficient way to reduce glucose intake during a fast is to simply eliminate carbs from the diet and eat more protein instead, similar to the Adkins diet.

How Long Should I Fast?

A person needs to fast for at least 8 hours before any physiological changes take place, and for 20 hours before the body begins to rely on itself for energy. So this gives us a clue about how long one should fast. From a physiological point of view, in my opinion, 30 to 40 hours is a good length of time to fast. This length of time is long enough to cause the changes in body chemistry, but falls short of a harsh destruction of the body.

The simplest way to lose weight, get trim, and enhance one's image is by simply controlling one's diet and eating fewer calories. However, it is evident that fasting cannot be expected to reduce the fat content of the body unless it is extended longer than several days. IOW, it needs to be a regular habit. A hard fast should not be continued indefinitely and is obviously a very difficult and perhaps self-defeating way to lose weight, so I would recommend others to rely on controlling their consumption rather than fasting in order to lose weight.

A Daniel fast may be extended longer, while still remaining safe in terms of health. I have known of more than one person who embarked on a "40-Day Daniel Fast", and it was apparent that it helped them in many aspects of their physical and spiritual lives, even allowing them to overcome addictive types of behaviors and to make effective confessions, all leading to a greatly enhanced life in the Spirit.

My Anecdotal Experiences with Fasting

I have had a lot of experience in fasting.

My first experience in fasting was when I was in graduate school. I fasted for weeks at a time, eating only one meal a day consisting of (1) sweetened rice porridge or oatmeal, (2) raw cucumbers or tomatoes, (3) pickled turnips or bamboo shoots, (4) tofu or salted eggs, and (5) water. Two or three times a week, I would eat a baked salmon steak with my meal, and treat myself to a Coca-Cola. On days when I needed an extra boost, I would eat a slice of toast with peanut butter for breakfast.

I was not very strong or healthy during that time, but I did become very sharp spiritually, and that helped me to draw much closer to God, and also to concentrate and finish my thesis requirements. Perhaps the most significant benefit I experienced from this fasting was a release from some habitual sins that had controlled me since adolescence.

Looking back however, in spite of these benefits, I think my fasting was too severe, because it affected my health so much that I had to quit studying for short periods of time due to illness. In fact, once during this time, I was bedridden for two months. The doctor said I had mononucleosis, which may have been obvious from a medical point of view, but in my heart, I believe my fatigue and weakened immune system was related to my extended fasting.

A few years later, and not too long ago, I fasted in a much different fashion. I abstained from eating any form of pork, and any kind of fried food, including potato chips, etc., which "sort of" conformed to the dietary requirements specified under the Mosaic Law. This was difficult for me, because I love to eat bacon, ham and all kinds of sausages, but after I got into the habit, I noticed that I felt much better in terms of health and conscience.

More recently, whenever I sense a need to fast, I simply cut back to eating an egg and a piece of fruit for breakfast, and one square meal later in the day. This has shown to be a very sustainable habit.

Biblical and Current Information About Fasting

The Bible has a lot to say about fasting. Scriptures relating to fasting include…

- Isaiah 58 – Fasting is a discipline that should be meant to please God.
- The Book of Daniel – Fasting is a source of good health and prosperity.
- Matthew 6:16-18 – Fasting should be done privately, seen only by God.
- Matthew 9:14-17; Mark 2:18-22; Luke 5:33-39 – Jesus is questioned about fasting.
- Matthew 17:14-21; Mark 9:14-29 – Fasting and prayer impart greater spiritual power.
- 1st Corinthians 7:5 – Fasting and prayer are the only reasons given for which people may forsake fellowship.

The Bible also contains countless examples of people who fasted for various causes.

In addition to the Bible, there is a lot more to be learned about fasting from Christian organizations and the medical profession. Lately, there is a lot more information that is readily available about fasting than there was ten years ago. Anyone who is serious about performing a fast should first do a little research and get a very complete description of the nature and procedures for fasting, which are insightful and useful for going into the fast.

Conclusions

Isaiah 58 is a lengthy passage with a focus on fasting, which is worthy to read at this point. It is apparent in verses

1-3 that the benefits of fasting are lost if one does not submit to the Lord's discipline and a renewal of the mind. Verses 4-9a makes clear that the Lord intends to use a time of fasting to discipline His people, and to teach them a higher plane of conscientiousness. Verses 9b-14 are very important, as they describe many promises to the one who submits himself to the leading of the Lord.

Verses 1-3

> [1] "Cry aloud, spare not; Lift up your voice like a trumpet; Tell My people their transgression, And the house of Jacob their sins.
> [2] Yet they seek Me daily, And delight to know My ways, As a nation that did righteousness, And did not forsake the ordinance of their God. They ask of Me the ordinances of justice; They take delight in approaching God.
> [3] 'Why have we fasted,' they say, 'and You have not seen? Why have we afflicted our souls, and You take no notice?' "In fact, in the day of your fast you find pleasure, And exploit all your laborers.

Verses 4-9a

> [4] Indeed you fast for strife and debate, And to strike with the fist of wickedness, You will not fast as you do this day, To make your voice heard on high.
> [5] Is it a fast that I have chosen, A day for a man to afflict his soul? Is it to bow down his head like a bulrush, And to spread out sackcloth and ashes? Would you call this a fast, And an acceptable day to the LORD?
> [6] "Is this not the fast that I have chosen: To loose the bonds of wickedness, To undo the heavy burdens, To let the oppressed go free, And that you break every yoke?
> [7] Is it not to share your bread with the hungry, And that you bring to your house the poor who are cast out; When you see the naked, that you cover him, And not hide yourself from your own flesh?
> [8] Then your light shall break forth like the morning, Your healing shall spring forth speedily, And your righteousness shall go before you; The glory of the LORD shall be your rear guard.
> [9] Then you shall call, and the LORD will answer; You shall cry, and He will say, 'Here I am.'

Verses 9b-14

> "If you take away the yoke from your midst, The pointing of the finger, and speaking wickedness, [10] If you extend your soul to the hungry and satisfy the afflicted soul, Then your light shall dawn in the darkness, And your darkness shall be as the noonday.
> [11] The LORD will guide you continually, And satisfy your soul in drought, And strengthen your bones; You shall be like a watered garden, And like a spring of water, whose waters do not fail.
> [12] Those from among you shall build the old waste places; You shall raise up the foundations of many generations; And you shall be called the Repairer of the Breach, The Restorer of Streets to Dwell In.
> [13] "If you turn away your foot from the Sabbath, From doing your pleasure on My holy day, And call the Sabbath a delight, The holy day of the LORD honorable, And shall honor Him, not doing your own ways, Nor finding your own pleasure, Nor speaking your own words,
> [14] Then you shall delight yourself in the LORD; And I will cause you to ride on the high hills of the earth, And feed you with the heritage of Jacob your father. The mouth of the LORD has spoken."

It is my prayer that you'll find a blessed renewal of your mind and body through your fasting, and that you might come to realize all these promises of God in your life.

The Discipline of Silence

Jack · 26 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Are you aware of all the CHAOS that constantly surrounds us at every moment? We never notice it until a rare moment comes when we find ourselves alone in TOTAL SILENCE.

If you've ever had the chance to experience TOTAL SILENCE, it's amazing at every little detail you hear. Some people can actually HEAR the silence!

[Eds. note: The high-pitched "shhhhh" sound that is heard in total silence is a physiological nerve saturation effect caused by exposure to too much noise!]

Some people cannot tolerate silence for very long. They are so "allergic" to silence that they have to turn on the TV or radio if it gets too quiet. It's not because they want entertainment, it's because they need NOISE to be comfortable.

In fact, this phenomena is so widespread, that it even has a popular name. We call these comfortable background sounds, "white noise", and you can even buy them on CD at the music store!

Does anyone have a white noise addiction?

Why does total silence freak some people out?

Total silence and isolation causes you to face your inner self and think seriously about your life. Most people can't handle that, because they think that's worse than DEATH. They instinctually try to avoid that "death" by busying themselves with something else. In fact, ANY other activity or distraction will do.

If you are a person who is restless with silence and isolation, I suggest you take some time to sit alone in total silence and face your worst FEARS. Find a place where no one will disturb you, pull the curtains and lock the door. TURN OFF your mobile, the computer, the TV and stereo, unplug the phone, and eliminate anything else that could be a potential distraction or a source of noise. Find a comfortable chair (but not TOO comfortable) and keep your butt in it for ONE HOUR. If your butt leaves the cushion (or if you fall asleep), then the clock starts over.

Try it. You'll tell yourself it's easy, or it's a waste of time, but you're only fooling yourself. It will be tougher than you think. Just try it! I dare you.

I always thought I was a very calm person. I even had a reputation among friends and family that nothing could FAZE me. But the first time I tried this, I only lasted 10 minutes before I impulsively jumped up and ran around the room, desperately looking for something to busy myself with. I didn't have anything in mind to do, so I didn't understand why I had to get up and DO something. I just felt so NEUROTIC!

When I saw that I couldn't follow through on my decision to stay in the chair for one hour, I realized there was more to this then you'd normally expect to find. In fact, I had to try this exercise every day for TWO WEEKS before I was able to sit in the chair for ONE HOUR without distraction. At the end of that hour, I was shaking with a self-conscious nervousness, and I leaped out of the chair with a gasp, as soon as the second hand reached the hour.

I thought it would be easy, but it wasn't. It was harder than my wildest imaginations.

I could have stopped there after my first victory, patting myself on the back and telling myself that I did it, finally. But after I saw how much of a struggle it was for me to simply sit in a chair, it made me realize my true condition – just how anxious and restless I really was!

I made the sad, but fortunate discovery that I am someone who lived out my days, running on some mindless, impulsive habit, and I didn't even KNOW it!

So upon this revelation, I decided to help myself and do this exercise once or twice a week for several months, until I could MASTER my impulsiveness and anxieties. It might seem like I was only torturing myself, but I'm glad I stuck with it, because now, I no longer feel like my life is RUNNING AWAY from me. I've gained a lot of SELF-CONTROL, DETERMINATION and INNER PEACE as a result.

I urge you to try this same exercise. You might be surprised with yourself at first, but I promise you, if you stick with it long enough to become well acquainted with the INSECURITY and IMPETUOSITY of your own emotions, you'll feel much better about yourself after that.

Best wishes!

[Eds. note: Please comment if you've tried this.]

The Nature of Evangelism

Jack · 28 March 2010 · Archived copy · Original

[Eds. note: Recently, I read the book, "Primary Purpose", by Ted Haggard. This post contains the proceeds of my study of the subject of evangelism.]

The Current Attitude Towards Evangelism

I've known a number of people who have become Christians, and it seems like whenever someone becomes a believer, it makes some people angry, and other people surprised.

People get angry because it's deeply unsettling to realize that you've been wrong about other people, and also about some very basic things in life. I understand that because I've experienced that myself, many times.

But I get really angry and disgusted when other Christians are "surprised". Why should people be surprised when someone becomes a believer? It is God's will for us to believe, so why are they surprised? I think those people who are surprised when someone believes in God, don't really know God very much.

Or we could ask why most Christians feel powerless to affect their environments and the people around them each day. They seldom take the great commission seriously. Obviously, even those Christians – people who are supposed to be carrying the Gospel – can't really imagine it's like carrying a .44 Magnum down Main Street. (In this scenario, it's a really BAD thing to get surprised!) Or maybe they do, and they just don't want to get involved because of all the trouble and work it will bring.

Most Christians just don't want to take responsibility for their calling in life. They would rather stick to a self-centered routine and remain a mystery to those around them.

I am writing about Evangelism because I want to debunk some myths about it that are commonly held among Christians, and make the duty of evangelism clear to those who are called.

The Present Situation

I have done some informal mission work in Asia. In Taiwan for example, a lot of people are deterministic (or fatalistic). Determinism believes that every state of affairs, including every human event, act, and decision is the inevitable consequence of a previous state of affairs. Determinism believes that the will is not free, but is inevitably and invincibly determined by motives. Actively, Determinism displays an inflated ego, and is typically signified by bullying, aggressive or controlling behavior and manipulating others. Passively, Determinism resorts to self-pity and blaming others, hopelessly resigns ones' self to "fate", and seeks to protect ones' self-interests and to enhance ones' security (e.g. hoarding, greed, putting security bars on the windows and more than one lock on the door).

Essentially, deterministic people think that, "Everything is determined by FATE – Fate Rules!" They consult their astrological horoscope, they go to fortune tellers and they are very superstitious because they don't believe they have any choice about their lives. They are "blown about by every wind of doctrine" (Ephesians 4:14). They think that all they can do is REACT to what is already happening. Consequently, they would never consider the possibility of a PROACTIVE CHOICE in a matter. They just don't have the faith or the vision to do so.

True Evangelism Presents Clear Choices

I want to shake up your idea of Evangelism with a new perspective. I want to take a step away from the pressure and hyper-emotionalism of "the Great Commission" and get away from the sensationalism of the tele-evangelists who shout, "JAEYSUS IS LAOWARD!" I don't like the term "soul winning" because that places an undue emphasis on the evangelistic EFFORTS.

Evangelistic outreach may very well include those things, but a successful evangelist doesn't ponder upon fantastic ideals. An effective evangelist simply identifies an area where people are stymied in their lives, and presents them with a clear choice in the matter. That is God's will for every person in this life – to choose.

Think about that.

Without free will, we have no personality, no hope, no life… We are mere automatons.

True Evangelism Gives People the FREEDOM to Choose

My friend Paul, who is a Canadian missionary in Taiwan, once told me a meaningful lesson. Paul grew up in the late 1960's and the early 70's, which was a time when drug use was prevalent and popular in America. He said that his parents were extremely strict about telling him never to use drugs. He knew his parents were right, but because of the LAW set down by his parents, he always struggled against the desire to try recreational drugs.

Then one day, Paul met a guy who was known to be a "druggie", and he told Paul, "Taking drugs is very risky, so you need to choose good friends to take drugs with – people you can trust." He told Paul that if he ever wanted to try taking drugs, then he should do it with him, because he was someone he could trust to take care of him (and not tell anyone).

Of course, Paul always had a "choice", but his parents never gave him the FREEDOM of choice. They always DICTATED what he should choose. Furthermore, they never explained the physical or social CONSEQUENCES of drug abuse, so the taboo became shrouded in mystery and fear in Paul's mind, which only made it more difficult to resist. (If this curiosity should ever spiral out of control in a person, it results in a bondage to the sinful nature.)

The mere opportunity to try drugs was not really a clear choice either, but the man who invited him to try drugs presented him with a clear choice: "You need to choose good friends to take drugs with – people you can trust." This was a true and free choice. It was a true choice because the REAL QUESTION was not whether to disobey his parents and take drugs or not, but it was about what kind of LIFESTYLE he was pursuing.

Giving Paul the choice was very important, because then Paul remembered why his parents told him not to take drugs, and he no longer had the desire to try drugs. As a result, he "chose" different friends, who did not take him into a lifestyle of drug abuse.

Paul told me that he was grateful for the CLEAR OPTIONS offered to him by that man, because it gave him the FREEDOM to choose NOT to take drugs, and that RELEASED him from the CURIOUS DESIRE to take drugs. Sometime after this, Paul suspected that this man knew he had a big problem with drugs, but that he prevented a lot of young people like Paul from becoming drug abusers, simply by giving them an honest, clear choice in the matter.

Furthermore, Paul said this experience was very instrumental in shaping him for the Mission field, because it helped him realize that a Man of God must give each person a choice, because without the freedom of choice, the grace of God can become frustrated.

In his work as a missionary, Paul learned that he is not responsible for WHAT people choose. Each person is responsible for his own choices. But a true missionary (or evangelist) is responsible to God for giving people the FREEDOM to choose. Paul said that is what "planting seeds" is all about. God does the rest.

In addition to the extremely unwise council given by parents, like Paul's, who are suffocatingly strict, I also want to point out that many Churches and zealous Christians have an unhealthy habit of dictating "Thou shalt not…", to others, thereby revoking their freedom of choice and shoving them towards the sinful nature. This is NOT Evangelism! It's pharisaical condemnation.

The Word of God Presents Us With Clear Choices

The word of God is, by nature, DIVISIVE. Consider the description of the word given in the book of Hebrews.

> For the word of God is living and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the division of soul and spirit, and of joints and marrow, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart.

> (Hebrews 4:12)

Ones' response to the Word of God invariably requires one to make choices through the exercise of the will. A series of cohesive choices serves to build HABITS.

Every choice and every habit takes us a step further down the path of life. The total collection of all our choices and habits results in a lifestyle.

> "Your word is a lamp to my feet and a light to my path." (Psalms 119:105)

These choices are an expression of who we are, and they might even SHAPE who we are, to some extent. I'm talking about your spiritual IDENTITY.

Further along, every choice brings rewards and consequences. We may see these rewards and consequences positively, as being a channel of discipline and instruction from God.

The Discipline of Decision-Making

Those who do not know God have no choice, no discipline, and no power or efficacy. (With this in view, it's no wonder that they are also frustrated, desperate, lonely, and have no life, peace or joy.)

Presenting choices to others is a door of invitation for them to become "sons of God" through enduring His discipline (chastisement). Consider this viewpoint in light of Hebrews 12:6.

> Hebrews 12:3-11
> 3 For consider Him who endured such hostility from sinners against Himself, lest you become weary and discouraged in your souls. 4 You have not yet resisted to bloodshed, striving against sin. 5 And you have forgotten the exhortation which speaks to you as to sons:
> "My son, do not despise the chastening of the LORD,
> Nor be discouraged when you are rebuked by Him;
> 6 For whom the LORD loves He chastens,
> And scourges every son whom He receives." [Eds. note: Quoted from Proverbs 3:12-13.]
> 7 If you endure chastening, God deals with you as sons; for what son is there whom a father does not chasten?
> 8 But if you are without chastening, of which all have become partakers, then you are illegitimate and not sons.
> 9 Furthermore, we have had human fathers who corrected us, and we paid them respect. Shall we not much more readily be in subjection to the Father of spirits and live? 10 For they indeed for a few days chastened us as seemed best to them, but He for our profit, that we may be partakers of His holiness. 11 Now no chastening seems to be joyful for the present, but painful; nevertheless, afterward it yields the peaceable fruit of righteousness to those who have been trained by it.

I believe that most of the time, it makes little difference what the choice is, as long as one submits to the discipline of God by making a choice and following through on it. Even poor choices can bring good lessons, by the grace of God.

But when one avoids making decisions, he only postpones the inevitable, and at some point, his lack of action will create a circumstance that will all come down upon him at once, thereby reinforcing the false notion in his mind, that it was his "fate" all along.

Of course, it is possible not to choose, but that is also a choice in itself. But in bringing the issue to a head by offering a clear choice, it brings ones' internal struggle from being inside the souls' deep darkness, into the light of the consciousness, where it can be confessed and dealt with appropriately.

According to my experience, presenting that choice is evangelism!

The Freedom of Decision-Making

Two of the main desires of the human heart, especially in the teenage years, are emotional independence and exploration. This is usually expressed through social avenues, but some pursue it through their careers and/or academic achievements. It's impossible to change this and still have an emotionally healthy person. So, we should not attempt to disrupt this nature in others, but we should seek to give them an opportunity to exercise their God-given freedoms by offering them choices.

It is very important to speak to people (especially young people) about their choices, because everyone has a blind spot. No one can totally understand the whole of life. No one is a "know-it-all". We need each other to find the words necessary to express ourselves. In fact, the mere ability to put your perspective into words, and have the understanding of others, is a great freedom! We need to help others find freedom through their words, just as we need them to help us do the same.

Four Common Responses to the Opportunity of Choice

Whenever people are presented with some form of God's word, different people show different behaviors in their response, concerning decision-making. Generally, there are four different responses that we must deal with.

1. Some people want to make choices, but they have no real opportunities to choose, or if they do, then either their choices are not respected by others, or they have no real power to follow through on them.
2. Some people do choose, but they lose interest for whatever reason and don't follow through on their decision. They typically lack passion and purpose in their commitment, or perhaps they are simply too content, too lazy, or too dissipated by other kinds of sin.
3. Some people either CAN'T see their choice, or they DON'T WANT to see their choice. These people are usually very busy with a lot of concerns or ambitions, or they have already committed themselves to other "responsibilities", or perhaps they are incapacitated by certain fears, possibly even the fear of realizing they were wrong about some things.
4. Some people, once given a clear choice about a matter, jump on the opportunity, follow through joyfully, and after a period of discipline, they soon receive some benefit from the experience.

Jesus describes these responses to evangelism in the Parable of the Four Seeds (Matthew 13:1-9; Mark 4:1-9; Luke 8:4-8). It is evident from scripture that the "seed" is the Word of God (Luke 8:11) and the "sower" is the evangelist (Matthew 13:18).

> 4 And when a great multitude had gathered, and they had come to Him from every city, He spoke by a parable:
> 5 "A sower went out to sow his seed. And as he sowed, some fell by the wayside; and it was trampled down, and the birds of the air devoured it. 6 Some fell on rock; and as soon as it sprang up, it withered away because it lacked moisture. 7 And some fell among thorns, and the thorns sprang up with it and choked it. 8 But others fell on good ground, sprang up, and yielded a crop a hundredfold." When He had said these things He cried, "He who has ears to hear, let him hear!"

That last line indicates that this is a very important piece of scripture, so let's tear into this, line by line. Jesus is saying that there are basically four kinds of responses that people may have when presented with information that demands a decision. Here, I've described each response as Type I, II, III and IV. Jesus also explained His parable of the Four Seeds (Matthew 13:18-23; Mark 4:13-20; Luke 8:11-15), and we'll include this information here as well.

Type I – Those Who Are Deprived of the Freedom of Choice

The first type is described as seed being trampled (the choice is disrespected by other people) and eaten by birds (the opportunities are consumed by circumstances).

> When anyone hears the word of the kingdom, and does not understand it, then the wicked one comes and snatches away what was sown in his heart. This is he who received seed by the wayside. (Matthew 13:19)
> And these are the ones by the wayside where the word is sown. When they hear, Satan comes immediately and takes away the word that was sown in their hearts. (Mark 4:15)
> Those by the wayside are the ones who hear; then the devil comes and takes away the word out of their hearts, lest they should believe and be saved. (Luke 8:12)

These passages all refer to "the wicked one", "Satan" and "the devil" being active in ruining the planted seed. I don't believe that Satan himself shows up at the door to stab those seeds with his pitchfork. No, I believe that Satan uses unwitting people and unfavorable circumstances to accomplish his will.

The Type I people are those people who want to make choices, but they have no real opportunities to choose. By this, I mean that these people (1) lack the power to effect a change, (2) don't possess the efficacy to produce the changes they desire, (3) are deprived of the resources necessary to support such changes, and/or (4) their choices are not accepted, respected and supported by others who have the power, efficacy and resources to reverse such choices.

These people need a lot of help to "escape the clutches of Satan", whether it be through getting an education, escaping poverty, establishing a good reputation and a good social network, or simply getting free from any addictive habits or controlling people in their lives.

Type II – Those Who Are Apathetic About Their Lives

The second type is the seed that fell on a rock (has no root) and had no water (no passion of commitment).

> But he who received the seed on stony places, this is he who hears the word and immediately receives it with joy; yet he has no root in himself, but endures only for a while. For when tribulation or persecution arises because of the word, immediately he stumbles. (Matthew 13:20-21)
> These likewise are the ones sown on stony ground who, when they hear the word, immediately receive it with gladness; and they have no root in themselves, and so endure only for a time. Afterward, when tribulation or persecution arises for the word's sake, immediately they stumble. (Mark 4:16-17)
> But the ones on the rock are those who, when they hear, receive the word with joy; and these have no root, who believe for a while and in time of temptation fall away. (Luke 8:13)

The Type II people are the people who do choose, but they lose interest for whatever reason and don't follow through on their decision. They typically lack passion and purpose in their commitment, or perhaps they are simply too immature and don't know themselves very well.

These people don't take life very seriously. They need to be constantly reminded, and held responsible to their choices. They need to know who they are, and they also need to be taught how to deal with the difficulties and temptations of life. Becoming active in a living Church can positively help these people.

At worst, these people need to endure hardships and frustrations, so that they stop living out of their minds, become ejected from their "comfort zone" and learn to live from the heart. It is a good thing (in God's eyes) when a person "comes to the end of themselves", but it will be a deeply humbling experience, typically one filled with a lot of sin and mistakes. A person in this state should be treated with kindness and patience, with the expectation that God is about to do great things in his/her life.

Type III – Those who are Rebelliously Independent, Without Hope or are Emotionally Defensive

The third type is the seed choked by thorns. So we must ask the question, what are “thorns”?

Thorns are mentioned many times in scripture. The first time indicates that thorns sprang forth as a result of the fall of man. (Genesis 3:17-18) The biological purpose of the thorn is to protect the thornbush from animals who would otherwise like to eat it.

In other words, it’s an instrument of defense. Do you know people who can’t, or won’t open up? Their thoughts and energies are consumed with their own defense mechanisms. These kinds of thoughts preclude and displace other thoughts that would entertain the imaginative possibilities of choice.

Thorns are also used in scripture to describe men who are lazy and perverse (Proverbs 15:19; 22:5 respectively), rebellious (2nd Samuel 23:6), and by nature, unable to bear fruit (Matthew 7:16; Luke 6:44; Hebrews 6:8)

Thorns are also used to describe the influences of idolatry to be snares and traps (Joshua 23:13), which is used by God as a form of discipline or punishment (Numbers 33:55; Joshua 23:13; Judges 2:3)

In John 19, we read how the crown of Jesus was woven from thorns; an icon of the bittersweet irony of the gospel.

Thorns are also described in scripture as a source of irritation. Paul asked the Lord three times for his “thorn” to be removed (2nd Corinthians 12:7-10). But God told him, “My grace is sufficient for you, for My strength is made perfect in weakness.”

Now that we have a better understanding of the scriptural usage of “thorns”, let us consider the resultant behavior.

> Now he who received seed among the thorns is he who hears the word, and the cares of this world and the deceitfulness of riches choke the word, and he becomes unfruitful. (Matthew 13:22)
> Now these are the ones sown among thorns; they are the ones who hear the word, and the cares of this world, the deceitfulness of riches, and the desires for other things entering in choke the word, and it becomes unfruitful. (Mark 4:18-19)
> Now the ones that fell among thorns are those who, when they have heard, go out and are choked with cares, riches, and pleasures of life, and bring no fruit to maturity. (Luke 8:14)

The Type III people are the opposites of the Type I people. They may very well have full control of their lives, but they are too self-centered to look beyond their present state or to trust God in any area of their lives. They enjoy being in control, or at least, they respect themselves for being able to hold their lives together, and they don’t want that status quo to change. In other words, they are motivated by their sinful pride.

Alternately, the Type III people could be those suffering from intense sadness, despondency, depression, or bitterness. These people are usually very busy with a lot of concerns (e.g. self-pity, unforgiveness) or ambitions (e.g. vindication, vengeance), or perhaps they are incapacitated by certain fears. These spiritual states present real challenges to the JOY of the Spirit, and would by nature, exclude one from receiving God’s grace.

In terms of choice, these people either CAN’T see their choice, or they DON’T WANT to see their choice.

Type IV – Those who are Receptive to Ministry

The fourth type is when the seed falls on “good soil” and grows as it should.

> But he who received seed on the good ground is he who hears the word and understands it, who indeed bears fruit and produces: some a hundredfold, some sixty, some thirty.” (Matthew 13:23)
> But these are the ones sown on good ground, those who hear the word, accept it, and bear fruit: some thirtyfold, some sixty, and some a hundred.” (Mark 4:20)

> But the ones that fell on the good ground are those who, having heard the word with a noble and good heart, keep it and bear fruit with patience. (Luke 8:15)

Some people, once given a clear choice about a matter, jump on the opportunity, follow through joyfully, and soon receive some benefits from the experience. They are honest and open about their personal challenges with those whom they trust. They recognize and accept their own needs. They respect the needs of others, and they are willing to accept help and guidance from others.

What is the Good Soil?

The “good soil” is a metaphor for the special conditions that are necessary for a person’s spiritual growth to maturity. This is essentially what MINISTRY is all about. Because of the complex nature of a viable MINISTRY, this topic is discussed in greater detail in a separate post.

Who is the Good Sower?

In western cultures, people prefer truth-tellers to be direct, open and confident, yet caring, personal and informal. In contrast, the personal quality that many westerners consider to be egotistical pride and vanity, are hallmark virtues of a healthy self-respect in eastern cultures, and should be balanced by humility, which is often shown through deference. Moreover, this causes Asian people to abhor a critical confrontation of any type. So you must be a little more circumspect when brandishing the Sword of Truth in Asia so that you do not appear as an “ugly American”. One caveat is that people (in Taiwan) do appreciate a person who has good credentials and a strong confidence in himself, and such a person would be taken more seriously when he causes others to face critical choices.

As a teacher in Taiwan, I’ve found that encountering the application of truths through a reasonable, philosophical approach can draw others to think more deeply and clearly, and is very acceptable to everyone. In fact, being reasonably apologetic can even win you the respect of others.

Now, the idea of relying heavily on reason often raises flags in the minds of western Christians, with a view that it wrongly substitutes faith. But for those who have no faith to begin with, a form of logic based on Christian principles can give them a framework on which to build their understanding of life, raise new questions in their minds, and thereby lead them into truth. Of course, the goal here is not to teach or even proselytize, but to help people see very clearly the day-to-day choices they are facing in life.

How is this done?

It’s actually simpler than you might think. It’s not even necessarily to have a lot of Bible knowledge. Just use your common sense.

Whenever you see someone experiencing a “crisis of belief” you have the opportunity to evangelize.

A “crisis of belief” is a moment when the person is confused about their choices in life. These moments happen quite frequently to everyone. You just need to train yourself to recognize them. Frequently, people who are depressed, unmotivated, withdrawn, quarrelsome, domineering, lacking healthy boundaries or are suffering from habitual sins, or have any number of other social pathologies, are people who are going through a crisis of belief. They just don’t know it. Their life is in a quandary, and they’re waiting for someone to come along, maybe you, and speak to them about the truths they have been unable to apprehend.

When you find the opportunity to evangelize, take the effort to clearly understand what their crisis of belief is all about. Then, spell out their choices very clearly, and the resulting consequences and rewards. Make it clear that they are responsible for their own decisions. Then, be sure to respect their decisions, whether you think it is for better or for worse. If the persons’ choice is not respected, then you are essentially denying them the freedom of choice. Very frequently, NOT having the freedom to choose is usually worse than making a poor choice.

Why? It’s because when one makes a choice, one always has the opportunity to LEARN from what he has chosen.

But without a choice, time passes and opportunities are lost, and the person gains nothing from it.

People who have a position of authority over others (e.g. parent, teacher, supervisor, mentor, etc.) are “stewards of men”, and have the responsibility of forming self-respect in them, and giving them a healthy respect for God and authority. These “stewards of men” must do what they can to enforce the decisions that their “disciples” make.

For example, I tell my students that they will fail my class if they miss more than five days a semester. So if one student misses more than five days, I have the responsibility to fail him. If I become sympathetic to his plight and I do not fail him, then I have destroyed his choice and also some of his power, thereby making him a weaker and less-respected person (although he might disagree for a while).

Of course, faith is a larger issue, which usually requires more than one simple decision.

Asking people to choose between heaven or hell often becomes a confusing if not a hatefully indicting question, especially if the person believes in being saved by works, reincarnation, etc. These types of beliefs are not easily changed (because they do not hinge on a single, simple decision, but involves one’s entire life), so all your honest efforts in the traditional style of “witnessing” will only open up a contentious argument WITHOUT the possibility of a win-win conclusion.

Of course, we all know that a person cannot be “won to Christ” through theological debates. The reason is because those arguments never present the opportunity for one to make any conscious decisions about things. All they do is blow up ones’ pride with the expression of knowledge, which actually moves them in the wrong direction, spiritually.

Just because you present the Gospel to someone doesn’t mean that you have evangelized. Just because you tell someone about Jesus doesn’t mean they’ve made a choice about their eternal destiny. All you’ve really done is given them some information about God and the Christian religion. To be an effective evangelist, you must be more aggressive in pushing people to CHOOSE.

In fact, it is quite possible to present eternally critical choices to others, without ever mentioning anything about God or the Bible (just as in Paul’s case). Go about your “evangelism” in a discreet manner by describing the costs, responsibilities, rewards and benefits of whatever thinking habits and lifestyles come up in your dealings with others. These small confrontations can often draw people to make immediate and clear decisions about a matter, and they will often thank you for helping them see things more clearly. Just take it step by step and be PATIENT with people.

The important thing for you is that you can feel like you also have some control and choice in being a mentor, parent, trusted friend, spiritual brother, etc. and still earn the respect of others in your community and retain a good reputation as a Christian (which is important for an evangelist or a pastor). Your job will be much easier if you are a good role model for them to follow, and it is apparent to them that you are loyal, trustworthy and a caring source of guidance.

Remember the four types of responses. Some will make positive decisions, and others will not. Some will love you, and others will hate you. Nevertheless, the presentment of choices must always be done in a friendly, loving way. In fact, offering people a choice is a powerful way to show Christian love to them (1st Corinthians 13).

Jesus sent his apostles out in groups of two. Paul always had a partner in his missionary journeys. If you have the luxury of having a trusted Christian partner, then be sure to get him/her involved with your evangelistic concerns, so that the two of you can stand solid together and the world does not play you against each other.

God bless!

The Attitude of Christ in Ministry

Jack · 6 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

[Eds. note: This post is an admonishment about the spiritual power and authority that Christians have in Jesus Christ. The reason those who serve are those who hold the most power and authority, is because they meet the needs of the people they serve. For more on this perspective, see Male and Female Power Deconstructed.]

Paul captured the attitude of Jesus in ministry very well…

> Philippians 2
> 1 Therefore if there is any consolation in Christ, if any comfort of love, if any fellowship of the Spirit, if any affection and mercy, 2 fulfill my joy by being like-minded, having the same love, being of one accord, of one mind. 3 Let nothing be done through selfish ambition or conceit, but in lowliness of mind let each esteem others better than himself. 4 Let each of you look out not only for his own interests, but also for the interests of others. 5 Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus, 6 who, being in the form of God, did not consider it robbery to be equal with God, 7 but made Himself of no reputation, taking the form of a bondservant, and coming in the likeness of men. 8 And being found in appearance as a man, He humbled Himself and became obedient to the point of death, even the death of the cross. 9 Therefore God also has highly exalted Him and given Him the name which is above every name, 10 that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of those in heaven, and of those on earth, and of those under the earth, 11 and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.

I love this passage! In God's Kingdom, those who serve are the greatest of all!

Thomas Jefferson captured this same idea in the American Declaration of Independence, and implemented this same truth in the government of the United States of America. An exerpt follows…

> "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal; That they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights; That among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness; That to secure these rights, Governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

The first part of this passage insists that the PEOPLE are the supreme creation of God (not kings or countries), and the last line indicates that the government is the servant of the people. It is this one governing principle that made the American political constitution stand as a model of government for many other democratically styled countries.

Before America was founded, with the exception of the ancient Greeks, most countries were seen to be subject to a King, and the King was a peer of other Kings who were all subject only to God. I believe this is why God objected when the fledgling nation of Israel asked for a King in 1st Samuel 8. I may be going a bit far, but I believe God wanted Israel to be a democracy from the beginning! But I suppose people back then could never trust such a decentralized form of governance.

We must continually remind ourselves of these principles, and let our thought processes be renewed accordingly.

However, our position of authority does not imply that we should live as Kings who bask under palm leaves and eat grapes all day. The peace and love of God is not a pot-smoking hippie ideal! No! It is a real battle to attain and defend!

The Apostle Paul describes the Christian life as one filled with battles.

> 10 Finally, my brethren, be strong in the Lord and in the power of His might. 11 Put on the whole armor of God, that you may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil. 12 For we do not wrestle against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this age, against spiritual hosts of wickedness in the heavenly places. 13 Therefore take up the whole armor of God, that you may be able to withstand in the evil day, and having done all, to stand.
> 14 Stand therefore, having girded your waist with truth, having put on the breastplate of righteousness, 15 and having shod your feet with the preparation of the gospel of peace; 16 above all, taking the shield of faith with which you will be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked one. 17 And take the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God; 18 praying always with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit, being watchful to this end with all perseverance and supplication for all the saints. 19 and for me, that utterance may be given to me, that I may open my mouth boldly to make known the mystery of the gospel, 20 for which I am an ambassador in chains; that in it I may speak boldly, as I ought to speak.

So, we are Kings and rulers, yet we are also warriors and servants of God, much like the Biblical archetype of King David. This is the position and the attitude of Christ in ministry.

Roadblocks in Ministry

Jack · 6 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

I've been reading the book, "Growing True Disciples", by George Barna, which was lent to me by someone at church. I felt that the book was good, overall, but it failed to address some of the pertinent sources of difficulty and (potential) causes of frustration that I know are faced by various ministries I've been involved with. This article is written as an addendum to Barna's book, which is intended to help ministry groups think through their strategies from a bottom-up approach, as well as the top-down approach covered by Barna.

Many things can become detrimental to ministry, and it's important to be conscious of these potential hazards so that they can be controlled and/or eliminated. I like to think of these things as "Roadblocks" presented by people with an unredeemed mindset. These Roadblocks include,

- Spiritual Roadblocks
- Organizational Roadblocks
- The Roadblock of Pride
- The Roadblock of a Sharp, Insincere Attitude
- Psychological Roadblocks
- Doctrinal Roadblocks
- Technological Roadblocks
- The Roadblock of the World
- The Challenge to Maturity in Christian Ministry

Each of these will be briefly discussed here.

Spiritual Roadblocks to an Effective Ministry

Pastors, missionaries, evangelists and certain "lay-ministers" have an extremely difficult job, which is full of daily temptations and persecutions in the spiritual realm, but the difficulty arises primarily because these men are ministering to everyone in their care, but very few people are ministering to them!

Pastors, missionaries and evangelists also need a church for feeding themselves, so that they can remain strong enough to give to others as well. These men feed other people with the Word, but they also need to be fed themselves. I always encourage people to pray for their pastors, teachers and government leaders for this reason.

In addition to the personal spiritual needs of those who minister, there is also a greater amount of temptation for these people. Why is this? It's because Satan intentionally targets pastors, ministers and other men of God with a concerted effort, for the same reason that military snipers target the Captains and Colonels of the enemy.

If that was not bad enough, these servants of God must also endure higher risks, and take greater losses in the event of failure. How many ministers can you think of who got caught pilfering money out of the Church budget, or were found cheating on their wives? It appears "sort of" common, doesn't it? That seems especially ironic, since they're supposed to be "born again" and "sanctified" and such. But a lot of people have grown used to hearing about debauchery among church leaders. These things naturally become Satan's justification for all his accusations.

No one will ever say so, but rest assured, Satan worked overtime to pull those stunts, because he knew the hearts of the masses would be hardened by the news. Perhaps, it took years of careful calculation and matriculation on Satan's behalf to work those men into a situation or a condition where they would succumb to a very common temptation.

We shouldn't put all the blame on Satan though. We all know that no one is perfect, but every imperfection gets magnified when your purity and righteousness are under public scrutiny.

Think about it. If you are a salesman or an insurance adjustor and you make a bad decision that costs your employer a lot of money, you can just quit your job before anyone knows about your error, and start working for a competing agency. But if you are a minister who gets caught with your hand in the proverbial cookie jar, you'll never stand in the pulpit again! Such is the world we live in.

James 3:1 warns us about this situation.

> "Let not many of you become teachers, my brethren, knowing that as such we will incur a stricter judgment."

Personally, I think the phrase "stricter judgment" is an understatement. I hope this doesn't discourage anyone, but if you should choose to do any kind of ministry work, you might as well hang a bulls-eye target on a string around your neck. Even those who receive the benefits of your ministry will distort your character and criticize all your shortcomings.

Organizational Roadblocks to Effective Ministry

Barna mentions that Churches do not have an organized curriculum for educating and nurturing their sheep until they can attain enough maturity to care for themselves and others. I believe this DISORGANIZATION is a key point about why the church is so ineffective towards fostering the spiritual growth of its members, and thus, why so many Christians languish in their immaturity until mid-life.

On the other hand, a lot of churches that do have a well-organized structure have become so formal, that the curriculum has degenerated into a series of "hoop-jumping", which is based heavily on Bible knowledge, and very little ministry is given to those who cannot jump through properly. The reward for successful hoop-jumpers is a plaque or a certificate of achievement, which I feel, is a smack-in-the-face cheap substitute for real spiritual achievement.

Other well-organized churches are strangled with bureaucracy, such that nothing is ever accomplished, even within the church itself. I don't know why, but churches like this remind me of Jabba the Hutt – massive, slow, all-knowing, maladaptable, and having mysterious motivations.

But if bad organization is not bad enough, these kinds of church management systems are propagated by two kinds of people: (1) Complacent, disinterested members, and (2) renegade ministers who don't want to become part of an organized team of stewards.

A lot of these ATTITUDES are rooted in selfish PRIDE.

The Roadblock of Pride to Effective Ministry

Many people have a root of pride that prevents a lot of potential ministers from ever producing fruit in their endeavors towards their fellow man.

Pride, in the carnal sense, basically says, "I don't need you! I'm better than you are! I can protect myself and maintain my own interests, regardless of whoever you may be. I have no responsibilities to help you or to see to your spiritual needs. You should get serious about your relationship with God and what you are doing in life, and pull yourself together. Don't look to me to dig you out of the mess you've created! I agree that I have my own problems, but it's none of your concern."

Pride, basically requires others to make some efforts towards making themselves "worthy" of receiving the benefits of ministry. But we must remember that our own WORKS will not benefit our spiritual lives or bring us one iota closer to maturity.

If we have such an attitude, no matter how justified it may be, it will always become a spiritual roadblock to effective ministry. We must be aware of our own brokenness, and the brokenness of the world that we live in, so that we begin to foster a sense of mutual good will towards our fellow man. We must become intimately aware of how we each contribute a small, but valuable service in the Body of Christ, and have the humility to see how we need the service of others, just as much as we need to contribute our own service to others.

> "United we stand, divided we fall."
> Proverbs 13:10 – "Pride only breeds quarrels, but wisdom is found in those who take advice."
> James 4
> 1 Where do wars and fights come from among you? Do they not come from your desires for pleasure that war in your members? 2 You lust and do not have. You murder and covet and cannot obtain. You fight and war. Yet you do not have because you do not ask. 3 You ask and do not receive, because you ask amiss, that you may spend it on your pleasures. 4 Adulterers and adulteresses! Do you not know that friendship with the world is enmity with God? Whoever therefore wants to be a friend of the world makes himself an enemy of God. 5 Or do you think that the Scripture says in vain, "The Spirit who dwells in us yearns jealously"?
> 6 But He gives more grace. Therefore He says:
> "God resists the proud, but gives grace to the humble."
> 7 Therefore submit to God. Resist the devil and he will flee from you. 8 Draw near to God and He will draw near to you. Cleanse your hands, you sinners; and purify your hearts, you double-minded. 9 Lament and mourn and weep! Let your laughter be turned to mourning and your joy to gloom. 10 Humble yourselves in the sight of the Lord, and He will lift you up.

Moreover, pride will always cause quarrels and instigate divisions in fellowship, so we must constantly be on guard against the attitude of pride creeping into our minds and causing our ministry to disintegrate.

So what is the right attitude that we should have in ministry? Keep reading…

A Sharp, Insincere Attitude can become a Roadblock to an Effective Ministry

Please read, "The Attitude of Christ in Ministry" for a detailed description of the correct attitude we should have in ministry. The comments mentioned here are placed in contrast to the attitude of Christ.

In my concept of evangelism, following the example of Jesus, you need to find people who truly need help and guidance, go to where those people are, and then actively lead them towards God. You can't just preach and teach, with the hope that someone might take time out of their busy schedule, really listen to you, and open his heart and change his mind.

Let me offer a couple examples of people who willingly minister, but whose ministry is hampered because of their attitude.

I have met several "free-lance missionaries" who have spent most of their lives helping others and sharing the gospel. I've also noticed that these same missionaries are very independent people. They have a very strong stand on their own beliefs but they cannot relate to others very well. I mean, they cannot put themselves into other peoples' shoes, and as a result, they can't actually minister that much, to very many people. They have a careless, "take it or leave it" kind of attitude about sharing the gospel.

No doubt, they are planting some seeds, and certainly, God uses their willing heart towards reaching some people, but once those seeds are planted, those new sheep need to be shepherded by a fellowship of more mature believers, i.e. a church. Otherwise, they will be swept away by the world's onslaught, before their faith can take root, due to the neglect of Christian fellowship and ministry. It is like a spiritual abortion.

Another sort of person is not content with the viewpoints of others, and frequently objects with a "better and more spiritual viewpoint". They might say things like,

> "The best quality time with the Lord is when one meditates and spends an undisturbed quiet time with God > alone. We must depend on God alone and focus one's faith on HIM alone. Do not depend on other people nor on any Church to "shake up" your spiritual life. Remember that we are all sinners! Everyone has their own weaknesses and ONLY God can accept us just as we are!"

I find it strangely amusing, that people like this are spiritually mature enough to be totally content with the sufficiency of God, but still not able to recognize the fact that not everyone is so mature and spiritually stable as they are. I have found that their attitude encourages Christians to be isolated from one another. I fear that many of these people must have had a very isolated life as a Christian, where they cannot trust anyone. These people might be faithful church-goers, but they are not people who would involve themselves in any kind of ministry.

But in a way, this kind of attitude is right. I mean, human beings are incapable of truly helping each other in a spiritual sense. All men are incomplete spiritually – we all have needs. The function of fellowship is to serve as a SPIRITUAL MIRROR for grooming oneself with. When one person ministers to another, he is merely showing that person what his needs are. Once he sees his own inadequacies, then he can choose to receive from God. But even so, it is still a lot of work to minister to others, and it does not help to emphasize isolation and helplessness. "Total dependence on God" is certainly the goal, but not a present reality for everyone.

I hope that these examples make it obvious that a sharp attitude towards those who need the benefits of fellowship and ministry will only make them feel guilty and doubtful about receiving help from the community of believers. Thus, all ministerial efforts to these people will be hampered, if not thwarted.

We want other Christians to experience the goodness and glory of God whenever they are in fellowship with the Body of Christ. But most people who take the time to share the gospel or minister to someone never make themselves VULNERABLE. They would rather make their own comfort and self-protection a priority, and because of that, it's hard for some (immature) people to believe on "the LOVINGKINDNESS of God".

In summary, SINCERITY is everything!

For those people who do have the right attitude in ministry, try to focus on the people who are receptive to your sincerity, and don't be discouraged by the sour cynics who only see you as an onerous, self-seeking, people-pleasing "do-gooder". Those spiritual snipers will never say so, but you are shaming them out of their pride and complacency, and nailing them to the cross of Christ where they belong. Jesus had even worse things to say about such people, calling them a "brood of vipers", "whitewashed sepulchers" and such. So beware that these "Pharisees" do not lay a mentality of "works" upon your shoulders.

This brings us to another roadblock – psychology.

Psychological Roadblocks to Effective Ministry

In the gritty work of an active ministry, it's easy to lose focus on what we're doing for the Kingdom of God. So, let's state the goal and purpose of ministry right here and now, so we can all get on the same page.

The GOAL is for each person to grow into an individual spiritual entity in the presence of God, who is capable of maintaining his own spiritual vitality in the presence of this world.

The PURPOSE is for every person to learn how to actively love and be loved, in spite of the challenges presented.

So what is the purpose of fellowship in ministry?

- To learn attitudes, skills and habits from others
- To learn about ones self
- To learn to love and be loved
- To learn to serve and be served

Without fellowship, a real ministry can never have the opportunities needed to produce fruit in our lives.

We must constantly remind ourselves of our goal and purpose, and bring our minds back into alignment with the compassionate thoughts of Jesus whenever we are ministering to the needs of others in Christian fellowship.

While we are faced with these goals and purposes, it may empower us to be reminded of the differences between predestination and the freedom of choice.

PREDESTINATION is the reality of our SPIRITUAL IDENTIFICATION WITH CHRIST, which is largely in the heavenly realms.

> Romans 8
> 28 And we know that all things work together for good to those who love God, to those who are the called according to His purpose. 29 For whom He foreknew, He also predestined to be conformed to the image of His Son, that He might be the firstborn among many brethren. 30 Moreover whom He predestined, these He also called; whom He called, these He also justified; and whom He justified, these He also glorified.

The issue of our FREEDOM OF CHOICE is always in the here and now. We must make choices in faith and in freedom, in order to (1) attain spiritual maturity, (2) minister to others that they might attain spiritual maturity, and (3) "tap into" the promises and blessings of God in this lifetime.

> James 2
> 14 What does it profit, my brethren, if someone says he has faith but does not have works? Can faith save him?
> 15 If a brother or sister is naked and destitute of daily food, 16 and one of you says to them, "Depart in peace, be warmed and filled," but you do not give them the things which are needed for the body, what does it profit?
> 17 Thus also faith by itself, if it does not have works, is dead.
> 18 But someone will say, "You have faith, and I have works." Show me your faith without your works, and I will show you my faith by my works. 19 You believe that there is one God. You do well. Even the demons believe—and tremble! 20 But do you want to know, O foolish man, that faith without works is dead? 21 Was not Abraham our father justified by works when he offered Isaac his son on the altar? 22 Do you see that faith was working together with his works, and by works faith was made perfect? 23 And the Scripture was fulfilled which says,
> "Abraham believed God, and it was accounted to him for righteousness."
> And he was called the friend of God. 24 You see then that a man is justified by works, and not by faith only.
> 25 Likewise, was not Rahab the harlot also justified by works when she received the messengers and sent them out another way? 26 For as the body without the spirit is dead, so faith without works is dead also.

Here, you must realize this key point – that to enact the freedom of choice, a person must first exercise their WILL POWER! Don't be a waffling, jellyfish, democrat Christian who has no backbone! Try and try again. Make decisions, take responsibility for the results, and learn from your decisions. This is the process of growth, so get your mind used to these things.

Doctrinal Roadblocks to Effective Ministry

As a principle, evangelism and soul-winning cannot be accomplished solely through the presentation of Biblical doctrines and arguments, so it is a wasted effort to try pushing your beliefs onto others. The weapons of our warfare are spiritual, NOT Doctrinal or Psychological! Therefore, an effective ministry addresses the needs of peoples' hearts, not the questions in peoples' minds. (A teacher or a mentor should address those questions, and not an evangelist or missionary.)

But no matter what your personal views are, one should always be open in their approach to what other people believe, because this is also an integral part of ministry. Not everyone believes exactly the way you do, and this is to be anticipated. You should not let doctrinal differences inhibit your unified work for the Lord.

Catholics and Calvinists (e.g. Methodists and Presbyterians), in general, do not believe that they are personally accountable for their efforts in winning souls, and so their consciences are not heavily burdened for the enlightenment of the lost.

Baptists genuinely believe in the Divine Commission (see Matthew 28:18-20) concerning evangelism and ministry, and thus take the related responsibilities to heart, but their efforts are largely constrained to foreign missions, and teaching, since they cannot interpret 1st Corinthians 12 in a more liberal way that has a present-day application. By doing so, in my opinion, they deny the power of the Holy Spirit from working through the body of believers.

These attitudes are rooted in certain doctrines that are found in many large churches. While it's tough to label these specific doctrines as being "heretical", it is my opinion that people tend to lean so heavily upon them, that they become a sort of spiritual "crutch". It increases their own sense of comfort and security, but also detracts from their ability to become effective in soul-winning.

People who have a self-protective sort of theology cannot be very effective in ministry with those kinds of attitudes. I know from experience that these people would sooner cast doubt on other people's motives or even their "theology", before they would open their hearts to receive others in a ministerial effort.

It's time for a WAKE UP call.

Those people who need to be ministered unto, are suffering in their needs, so they will never care about how eloquently you can preach about… antinomianism, presuppositionalism, or transubstantiation, for example, or how accurate your exegesis, eisegesis or eschatology is.

The goal here is to TOUCH peoples HEARTS, not educate their minds with abstract principles.

Furthermore, anyone who wishes to argue points of doctrine does not belong in a ministry, but in a College of Theology. Ministry is about faithful service, bold action and personal sacrifice for the furtherance of the Gospel. The REAL Gospel is when your words and actions help others see Jesus – bottom line!

How many years of evangelism should it take to start a church?

It's a bad approach when ministers blindly press doctrine into people with no discretion of their spiritual state. Instead, they should let people come and ask about those things, and use the scriptures to divide the Word of Truth in each persons' particular circumstance.

Technological Roadblocks to Effective Ministry

Although to begin with, it is really difficult to effectively minister to others, it becomes more difficult with the advent of modern technology, especially when people don't appreciate you and might even seem annoyed that you care.

For example, even though I might go to visit someone who is sick, I find that they already have cable TV with 120 channels, a large collection of DVDs', X-Box, PS-2 and the great infinitesimal internet to entertain themselves with. So, by comparison, a real person who comes knocking on their door to engage them emotionally, might seem to be a tedious interruption and a troublesome distraction.

It is my opinion that perhaps it's better not to choose such people as objects of ministerial efforts. Let those who are more interested in X-Box minister unto themselves!

From my experience in sales, I've learned a good attitude towards making choices and time management:

> "I don't have time for people who don't have time for me".

By comparison, Jesus' ministry always took him on a clear schedule, which was always interrupted by people seeking help. But in fact, those interruptions were also part of His ministry. If we follow Jesus' example, then we should let those with needs come to us for help, and we should not turn them away, as Jesus instructed in Matthew 5:42.

The Roadblock of the World to Effective Ministry

The world presents an interesting challenge to any kind of human endeavor. No matter what one may make up his mind to accomplish, there will always be a myriad of small, unforeseeable interruptions that will cause serious delays to the progress.

Some people call this phenomenon, “Murphy’s Law”.

In my experience of ministry, as soon as a guest and I get down to having a serious prayer, the mailman rings the doorbell to deliver a package, my children begin fussing and crying for some mysterious reason, and the phone starts ringing. It may seem like a coincidence, but it is not.

We are commonly faced with these occurrences in the world that we live in, which is constantly presenting an infinite number of diversions and dissipations. We must anticipate these events, and plan our ministry to effectively take these distractions into account. Otherwise, we may never make any progress towards our spiritual and relational goals.

We cannot remove ourselves from the world, but we can construct plans and barriers to limit the unpredictable influences of this world, so that we may be more efficient towards our ministry goals. A wise minister will be aware of this, and take the necessary precautions to control the influences that this world might have on his ministry efforts.

The Challenge to Maturity in Christian Ministry

Every believer is challenged to attain spiritual maturity. This challenge can itself become a roadblock, if it is not clearly understood as such. So finally, I hope to elucidate some basic steps in the process of maturity, as they relate to social interaction with others. Being aware of the characteristics of these basic steps can help us identify and relate to others who are at different stages of growth.

I would like to point out here, that a good deal of maturity is necessary to minister to others. There are essentially three stages of growth in Christian maturity, and a fourth stage that only a few seem called to do. I’ll describe these stages by identifying brief logical statements that are typical of the psychological processes in each respective stage. (Stage 0 represents the spiritually ignorant person.)

Stage 0 – I have no life, except what little I can beg or steal from someone else. But even so, I’m better than you are. What can you do for me? How can I seek justice for myself, or otherwise, gain some advantage over others?

Stage I – I am so disappointed with life! The world is tough, and life is hard! It seems like everyone is an irresponsible liar! Who am I, and what is my purpose in living? How can I find hope and encouragement in the face of such difficulty?

Stage II – I enjoy life, but I am so disappointed with people! They are so immature, rude, selfish, mean and cruel! How can I make others observe my boundaries and respect my personal space? How can I protect myself? How can I prevent being discouraged by such people?

Stage III – I am thankful for my life, and I believe most people desire to have the same appreciation. But I know it is a difficult trick to find the Door of Life. People are full of needs and they must work so hard in a struggle to survive! How can I encourage the people around me, and make their days go by easier?

Stage IV – Few people have had the difficult experiences that I have had. I always have the right to cling to my rights, but I know I can accomplish more in the spirit if I willingly lay down my rights for the benefit of others. I know it is always a risk to trust, but still, I choose to trust because it is better than not trusting. People are like children – selfish, mean and unrealistic, but even so, they are still cute and loveable. How can I absorb the discouragements of others, and lift them up by dispensing God's grace and truth, and thereby minister to their spiritual needs?

In addition, a Stage IV person will know that individuals may very well inspire others to an extensive degree, but even people's best concerted efforts can do very little to help the spiritual condition of others. They know that it's wrong to think that way – believing that other people need them in order to grow. That is a symptom of spiritual pride.

Most Christians are only at Stage I or Stage II in their maturity. Those who are in Stage III tend to be very popular and well respected. A Stage IV person is rather rare.

How can you discern a REAL Stage IV person, from a less mature believer who is making efforts in missions, evangelism and ministry simply because they think it is the "Christian" thing that they should do?

> "You will know them by their fruits." (Matthew 7:15-20)
> [22] But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, longsuffering, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, [23] gentleness, self-control. Against such there is no law. (Galatians 5:22-23)

You will know them by their unswerving faith, their steadfast hope and their sincere love, just like a mother or father has for their child.

But perhaps the greatest indicator of these qualities is seen in how much time they are willing to spend mentoring less mature believers. I suggest that one who is serious about mentoring should spend at least six hours a week with the one being mentored, and also be actively seeking and introducing him to other support networks for him to get involved with. Also, the more mature believer should take some initiative to invite the less mature believer to share the bounty and the challenges of daily life with him.

Here are some admonishments to those who seek to become "better spiritual mirrors". Stage I people should not become bitter towards the Stage 2 people, simply because they have not yet achieved Stage 4. The Stage 2 people need to go easy on their self-defense around Stage 1 people. Stage III people should challenge themselves to reach out of their comfort zone, and attempt to achieve Stage IV. Stage IV people need to know when to get back to the basics of rest and worship.

Conclusions

I hope that these thoughts and insights might help layministers to pinpoint the causes of inefficacy in their ministerial endeavors.

I wish you the best towards creating a positive impact in the lives of those around you each day, and in realizing all your hopes and dreams through Jesus Christ.

How to ward off Self-Deception

Jack · 15 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Don't let your life run on auto-pilot.

Readership: Younger, single men;

The Nature of Self-Deception

The thing that really fascinates me about people is THEIR ABILITY TO HAVE NO IDEA WHAT'S GOING ON, even though it's going on IN PLAIN SIGHT ALL AROUND THEM, and it's even MORE amazing to see how people have this tendency to ARGUE VIOLENTLY whenever one of these OBVIOUS THINGS is PRESENTED TO THEM.

Let's talk about what we can actually LEARN from this kind of phenomenon.

This mechanism is, of course, a survival mechanism that helps us weed out all of the useless information that's coming in through our senses at any given time. But there is also the issue of emotional self-preservation. In other words, people cling to things that are FAMILIAR, even BAD THINGS that are familiar, simply because TOO MUCH CHANGE at one time can be OVERWHELMING. There is only so much change that one person can take before they become confused and out of control. But the problem is that this basic need for stability and can go overboard and prevent people from seeing TRUE and USEFUL information as well.

There are some fascinating books available about the concept of "self-deception", and most of them deal with the psychology or the socio-pathology of the habit. We humans have an amazing capacity for not seeing what's there (a sort of "blindness" if you will), to the point where it can be very detrimental.

People often ARGUE about things that are OBVIOUS to everyone else, and they never seem to realize who is "wrong". What can you say to such a person? Can we simply dismiss them as being OBSTINATE?

It is fair to say that we humans don't like to change our beliefs about things. We don't like to admit that we might be wrong in the first place, and we feel unstable or insecure when we realize that a fundamental truth we have held all our life is incorrect, especially when it is an idea that is self-serving.

A lot of our cultural and social programming is way off-base, which causes us to see things differently from what they are, and to interpret things incorrectly when we do see them.

- Men have NO IDEA how to be successful with women.
- Moms teach their sons the "proper" way to act, which actually destroys their efficacy as a man.
- Women who get REALLY upset when you start talking about what actually WORKS with women.

Lump all of this together, and you have a big mess.

Tip from my Dad: "Don't tell women what's going on with you. They'll only drag you down. You'll get more respect and peace of mind if you leave them guessing."

The Application

So, why are we bringing up the idea of Self-Deception? What's all this information good for?

Well, to start off, I think that it's important in life to continually question YOUR OWN beliefs about how things work and what is possible. I think it's also good to constantly question your LIMITING beliefs.

Unfortunately, most people do the opposite. They question their ability to succeed and they doubt their own ability to get what they want. Most people constantly "self-sabotage" themselves.

If instead, you question your LIMITATIONS and your LIMITING BELIEFS, and you constantly look with your own eyes to see if there's something going on that nobody mentioned to you, then you'll begin to see things that will blow your mind.

For example, it took me a few years to realize that some women are attracted to me, while others aren't, and that there isn't anything I can do to change that. PUA's describe this by saying that ATTRACTION ISN'T A CHOICE. As soon as I read that, I knew immediately what they were talking about. Their point was that it wasn't the woman's choice, but I knew it wasn't the man's choice either.

But when you read the phrase "Attraction Isn't a Choice", you get the point. You can't just choose one woman out of the crowd and build a fantastic relationship with her. It obviates the organic process of developing an authentic relationship with someone who fits your unique set of needs. But when you realize that it is useless to try creating feelings of attraction in a woman when they just aren't there, then the best thing you can do for yourself is just move on.

Now, I didn't figure this out by having someone TELL it to me. Even if someone had told me, I don't think I could have taken in this knowledge. This was something I figured out by watching the women I was hitting on, and looking for any indicators of interest. If she showed indicators of interest, then I might get to know her better, and what she liked about me. But if not, then there wasn't anything I could tell her about myself to spark that attraction. This is hard to read, and my mind was always telling me that there might be some facet of my personality that she could connect with. The heavy reliance on probability and the unknowableness of chance is the reason why it took a few years for me to figure this out.

But when I started to question and/or throw away everything I had read about and had been taught from other people (especially my mother and grandmothers), then I was able to conduct an unbiased scientific method analysis on what I was experiencing. I started to build my own understanding of what was happening, and learned to follow my own intuition, which was showing me that those women who felt a spark with me could offer a much better relationship than one who didn't. I didn't get the idea that there was a SOLUTION to this puzzle called "women and dating", but I was able to find a niche where I could exercise a greater degree of efficacy.

Analyze Your Beliefs

So, here's a "homework" exercise that is guaranteed to open up some new possibilities, and maybe even lead to a profound realization that will lead to success.

1. Do some brainstorming, and write down all of the things that you desire in life, or in a relationship, and what you are doing to make those things happen.
2. Get a firm grasp on your concept of what you think SHOULD work when it comes to finding those women who feel attracted to you. This might include things like giving constant compliments, acting "nice", buying her gifts, and paying for her food.
3. Don't be afraid to question the notions that you blindly accept as "common sense" and "what your mother taught you" about women.
4. Write down your own personal experience of what ACTUALLY HAPPENS when you do these "socially correct things that mom taught you" with women. After you finish this list and read over it, you should get a wake up
5. Pretend for a moment that everything you've been taught about women is wrong or screwed up.
6. Imagine that a woman should be feeling something for you that you don't need to create.
7. Now, what can you do to find and identify those kinds of women?

One PUA I follow said that a man should pretend that women are actually wired in REVERSE, and he used this line of reasoning to mine out what kinds of things would result in a woman feeling ATTRACTION for a man?

I'm not sure I agree that a man is able to make any woman of his choice feel attraction towards him, but I do believe there are ways to enhance the attraction that is already present in certain women.

That said, I think he's on to something here. Don't continue doing what you know won't work. Instead, shake things up and try something new now and then. What hasn't worked in the past is not going to suddenly start working, unless you encounter a game-changing new development, like discovering some kind of new intuition that you were previously unaware of. Once you find out what keeps the ball rolling for you, you'll discover some real crazy women in a hurry. Don't let them knock you off, but instead, maintain a strong frame of mind and just go at your own pace.

Learn to Think for Yourself

I've always carried a mental habit that I learned from my father as an adolescent.

1. Don't believe anything anyone says, just because they are a professional, or an expert, or your mother, or whatever.
2. Always second guess anything that anyone tells you, and look for faults and inconsistencies.
3. Do your own independent research to find some alternative viewpoints.
4. Do your own homework to determine which viewpoint best fits your own set of values and goals in life.
5. Decide for yourself what is right, or what to believe.
6. Tailor that viewpoint to fit you as a person, and what you already believe.

This is a very important process of being an independent thinker, becoming your own man, and making up your own mind about things.

I was intrigued to find PUA's describing something similar to this process, and are calling it the Inner Game. They claim that most guys spend almost NO time working on their Inner Game, and I would have to agree. Instead, they focus on learning things like "pick up lines" and other USELESS stuff.

If you don't have your Inner Game together, and if you don't choose your women wisely – those who actually want to be with you – then you'll never be effective with tactical "techniques and tricks". Every new line or technique is just a variation on an old stratagem that never worked.

There's no way to avoid getting rejected by those women who don't get any vibes for you. It helps to accept this up front as a fact of life. From what I've found, the only way to figure out who likes you and fits you, is to play the numbers game and meet new people every day. At the very least, set your mind on being an inspiration to all the people who would have otherwise had no one interesting to talk to that day.

It's really important to get that field experience meeting women, or else, you won't know what you're dealing with, whenever you meet a new person. It's also an activity that can help you improve your confidence for approaching women, starting conversations, getting dates, fine tuning your techniques, going online, and learning how to feel comfortable in your own skin.

If you're like me, and you've had a lot of contradictory programming earlier in life, then you MUST get your Inner Game under control. It's not going to handle itself. YOU have to do it through a daily mental exercise to willingly put yourself into risky situations likely to lead to rejection, and learn to shine and roll in spite of it.

Tip from Dad: You won't be better off if you get in a hurry to start up a relationship, put your heart on one woman, or go steady. It will only distract you and make you confused about what works for you.

Instead, figure out your Inner Game first. Once you've got that down, then all those other things will run like clockwork.

Another Tip from Dad: When you're on the ball, figure out why you're on the ball, so that you can stay on the ball.

The Ten Commandments of Christian Fellowship

Jack · 25 June 2010 · Archived copy · Original

1. Thou shalt not neglect, nor show disrespect for yourself, or for others. Thou shalt take the responsibility to include others in your considerations.
2. Thou shalt not disgrace the high imaginations of others, but shall entertain such notions with an open mind and a humble heart, thus pursuing the common joy of the Spirit.
3. Thou shalt not provoke nor make sore afraid, nor take thy brothers joy into thine own hand, whether it be in the flesh, the tongue, or in the heart, but shall commit thy power towards ensuring the peace, security and safe welfare of all members of the body of Christ.
4. Thou shalt not neglect the pursuit of joy, Sabbath rest and worship in the company of the faithful.
5. Thou shalt regard all authorities and dignitaries with humility and gratitude, recognizing that they are the vehicles of God's grace towards men.
6. Thou shalt not be passive-aggressive in word nor in deed, nor shalt thou profane the honor of others. If hatred, envy or bitterness should ever creep into your heart, thou must immediately leave the presence of others and be first reconciled to your good conscience before returning.
7. Thou shalt not neglect the sincere display of divers charity and warm affections, such as the laying on of hands and the tender embrace.
8. Thou shalt not interrupt nor disrupt the fellowship of others, nor shalt thou gainfully usurp the attentions of others.
9. Thou shalt not gossip. Thou shalt not have an insincere and haughty heart when using the "third person" pronoun to spread information that does not directly involve yourself. If thou shouldst receive intimate knowledge of a brother from another, thou shalt consult that brother immediately, to obtain the truth of the matter and to inform him of the slander against him.
10. Thou shalt not ponder upon what others haveth that thou desireth. Rather, thou shalt consider what thou hast, which others may have needs of.

Building Fellowship – The Problem of Disliking Each Other

Jack · 11 July 2010 · Archived copy · Original

It should be a basic goal of every organization to establish some degree of fellowship among its members.

As a case study, let's consider the task of building a Men's Breakfast Fellowship, which started in mid-October, 2009, when Andrew called some of his friends to meet earlier for a breakfast discussion before embarking on a weekend adventure. The day went well, and the breakfast interaction seemed to encourage those who came, making the whole day better. So, Andrew kept calling them to meet for breakfast, and soon it developed into a Men's Christian Fellowship and Prayer group.

Then in June, 2010, Andrew fell ill with tendonitis, and was also desperately busy during the month. As a result, the Men's Breakfast Fellowship was not called to meet for a couple weeks, until the first Saturday of July.

On the day before, Andrew wanted to call or send an e-mail to everyone, to remind them about the meeting. But at the last minute, Andrew decided to save himself the effort just to see who would call to ask about the meeting, and who would show up. No one called, and only one person showed up. Andrew was really disappointed to discover that if he didn't make the effort, the whole group would dissolve.

Andrew considered a larger perspective. He saw that the fellowship petered out to nothing, during the time that he could not support it. From studying history, he knew that usually, when a leader fails, the group will disband, but that also means that God is not in the movement. If God is in it, then God will bring others to step in and support the cause. From this observation, Andrew really questioned whether building this fellowship was merely an effort in the flesh, and he prayed about this question for a while.

After praying a while, he reached the conclusion that fellowship is indeed a KEY PART of Christian life, and leadership and discipleship are important parts too. But heading a fellowship is a job too great for one man to do alone. Sometimes Andrew got angry and bitter, because he felt like he was all alone, and doing all the work in the fellowship. He once said,

> "It really sucks to care about people who don't care about each other!"

He concluded that there needs to be at least TWO MATURE MEN to lynchpin everyone together, and share the burden of discipling the others. For a Biblical example, Jesus always sent his apostles out in groups of two.

During their meeting the following Saturday, Andrew asked the others why this enterprise was so difficult to create. One of the men, Josh pointed out that a lot of the people who have been invited to the Breakfast Fellowship, don't really LIKE some of the others who come. The group continued to be really tenuous for this reason.

Josh said,

> "Whenever someone is asked to join our fellowship, the first question that always comes up is, 'Who else will be there?'"

Predictably, if someone is named, who is very unlikeable in that persons mind, then fellowship will be neglected. Also, if this question is avoided, the invited person will lose interest, and possibly grow suspicious.

It became clear that people have a general tendency to limit their social interactions to only include those people whom they LIKE. They only want to hang out with the "COOL guys"! For a lot of people, that only means, those who will not rock the boat.

Andrew posed the question to them,

> "How can we garner a decent respect for those who are fundamentally different from ourselves?"

After some discussion on this, he encouraged the men to postpone their attempts at Christian LOVE for now, and first focus on achieving Christian LIKE. By that he meant,

Another related question that came up, which is perhaps a deeper problem, was,

> "Women love themselves pretty well, but how can a MAN love himself?"

The bible predicts that the people of this age would be "haters of God", and "lovers of self". So if these pansies consider that their main problem is that they have trouble loving themselves, I would say they are fitting the bill nicely.

First of all, we should all recognize that although there might be lots of things we dislike about each other, nevertheless, we still NEED each other. Secondly, we must recognize that those people who have the qualities we most need, are often the same people we intensely dislike.

The ego-smacking realization that we all NEED the people we DISLIKE, is such a huge turn-off that most people would forsake fellowship before they would face this negative truth. Others even deny that they indeed need others.

Guard yourself against this type of delusion.

As a leader, Andrew struggles to display the fulfillment of those needs through Christian fellowship, as an enticement that is greater than the common offense taken when we are faced with the mundane affront of our yet-to-be-redeemed selves. But we have found that certain individuals are so spiritually rough, that they create stark social challenges for the others. As such, some are naturally indignant when asked to remain faithful in the presence of behavior that they consider to be depraved. In short, our own fallen nature creates these rifts in unity. But by starting this fellowship, Andrew is betting against the odds that these guys will have a spiritual hunger that outweighs their ego. But sometimes, Andrew feels like this is a bigger venture than he first imagined.

Andrew once believed that people could come to the fellowship, experience God, and learn to love and serve each other in the process. After all, isn't this the ideal we strive to believe by attending Church? But in practice, we've found that the endeavor is much more complicated than that.

Some major problems arising from the issue of liking or disliking each other, which have become hindrances to fellowship, are the poor quality of COMMITMENT and the general level of DISINTEREST. Generally people have the attitude of,

> "I only care about the interests of others if I can derive an immediate benefit for myself."

But of course, they will never admit it to themselves or anyone else. It's basically self-centered pride and immaturity, and it is sad that this attitude even shows up within the Christian community. It's even more sad that we have grown used to seeing it.

God expects EACH man to put his hand on the plow, in his own way, before He will bless the harvest.

Think about that for a moment.

It is usually a bad idea to separate the people who can "get along" into distinct groups. The members of a group need to have some significant and fundamental differences, or else they risk becoming a socially degenerate CLIQUE that has a NEGATIVE spiritual impact.

However, history and practice has shown that exclusivity is sometimes necessary to preserve a semblance of unity and order, which make the ministry more efficient towards achieving a common purpose within the group.

Therefore, the people who come to the fellowship must first take it upon themselves to form a moderate LIKING of each other (and of his own self), and make a personal commitment to the welfare of the others. In other words, each person needs to learn how to appreciate and respect the unique differences of the others, without letting their weaknesses invoke imbalances in unity. It helps to recognize that it is a great mark of faith to recognize that God uses groups of individuals who may very well be enemies in the flesh.

Conclusions

The leaders should take on the task of revealing these mysteries, thereby showing that there is a greater purpose in life than merely making our day more pleasant by avoiding those who they feel are tedious and difficult. But on the other hand, if one individual should prove to be so onerous that the fellowship is disrupted, thereby distracting the others from those greater goals, then the leaders need to make some special arrangements to deal with that one.

Once the higher goal is made clear, and all distractions are cleared away, the others should receive the calling to embark on the adventure of Christian Fellowship, and all the blessings that it holds.

The Pleasure Principle – and it's Problems

Jack · 1 August 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Why does God have a reputation to some people as being a cosmic kill-joy?

Why do some people resist becoming believers because they have this idea that the Christian life is "boring"?

Is there any truth behind these common beliefs? Is the Christian experience truly nothing but ascetic self-denial, frustration of the flesh, spiritual suffering, pain and death?

James 4

> 1 Where do wars and fights come from among you? Do they not come from your desires for pleasure that war in your members? 2 You lust and do not have. You murder and covet and cannot obtain. You fight and war. Yet you do not have because you do not ask. 3 You ask and do not receive, because you ask amiss, that you may spend it on your pleasures. 4 Adulterers and adulteresses! Do you not know that friendship with the world is enmity with God? Whoever therefore wants to be a friend of the world makes himself an enemy of God. 5 Or do you think that the Scripture says in vain, "The Spirit who dwells in us yearns jealously"?
> 6 But He gives more grace. Therefore He says:
> "God resists the proud, but gives grace to the humble."
> 7 Therefore submit to God. Resist the devil and he will flee from you. 8 Draw near to God and He will draw near to you. Cleanse your hands, you sinners; and purify your hearts, you double-minded. 9 Lament and mourn and weep! Let your laughter be turned to mourning and your joy to gloom. 10 Humble yourselves in the sight of the Lord, and He will lift you up.

So what is wrong with pleasure? Wasn't mankind created in the Garden of Eden?

The kind of pleasure that James warns us about is not the simple enjoyment of God's glory and His creation. The Pleasure referred to here is merely a cheap SUBSTITUTE for our God-given DESIRE for magnificence. This Pleasure is a DISTRACTION from the real thing – something that we ENTERTAIN ourselves with to relieve the stress and worry in us, when we actually should be working on some important roadblock in our spiritual lives, which is the true source of that stress and worry. These distractions give us the opportunity to shunt or anesthetize the throbbing pain of our desires, and "check-out" from our life in the real world for a while. The Bible describes this as SPIRITUAL ADULTERY.

Of course, it is evident that God will not help us indulge ourselves in this kind of DISSIPATION, since it would be an encouragement for us to continue being lazy adulterers. (Dissipation is anything a person does that consumes time, money, energy and resources, and gives no benefit in return for the investment spent.) If we were pursuing the REAL THING (a high-quality LIFE in the Kingdom of God), our lives may become more difficult at present, but will be a lot smoother after a time.

Verse nine seems to indicate that God wants us to be sad. But I believe the intended meaning here is that we should repent from indulging in our cheap pleasures, and start making real progress in our lives.

It might help if I give a good definition of "sin" here. In other blog posts, I've described sin as being a sort of spiritual addiction. This is true, but at its' root, sin is when we take something from God that is magnificently good, and we jerry-rig it into something easy, cheap and "cute". Sin could also be described as very poor and inefficient stewardship with our own lives, which is the most precious wealth we have been entrusted with.

Why do people sin? People sin because of many reasons. Usually, it's because they don't have the hope, or the faith, or the resources, or the diligence to do the work necessary to achieve the goodness promised by the will of God. Maybe they are just plain lazy, or maybe their cognition of God's kingdom has been warped by all the wrong kinds of suffering and abuses in this world.

Some people know what they should be doing, but they simply prefer to enjoy the quick thrills and cheap shots of a sinful lifestyle. Some people recognize the promise of God's goodness for themselves, but since they are so far from achieving it, they lose hope and dabble in more convenient and immediate "pleasures".

Like drinking alcohol, masturbating, snorting cocaine or any other kind of "pleasurable" habit, it sure makes things seem better for a time, but when you come down from the high, you still have the same broken life and the same problems, and you're a little bit older and a little bit poorer. After a while of this, you'll reach the end with nothing to show for it.

Personally, I think the most popular sinful pleasures among most people, are watching TV (whatever is on) and browsing the internet aimlessly for hours and hours. These habits are basically dissipation. Vain and lustful fantasy comes in second, and gluttony follows in third. Greed and envy are also very widespread obsessions that consume people's lives.

I think the most deceiving kind of sinful lifestyle is the one which seems quite religious, moral, law-abiding, good and nice on the outside, but the irony is that it is still merely a cheap, convenient pleasure, all the same. Many people who profess to be Christians subscribe to this kind of lifestyle, but I suspect that many of them may be deceived, because God usually calls the believer to live an extremely thrilling, roller-coaster kind of life. Those with sufficient faith will readily see this challenge, and make some effort to force their way into the Kingdom of God (Matthew 11:12).

But somehow, the lukewarm people who believe the truth but fail to do anything truly risky, are commonly considered to be the true "Christians" in this fallen world, thus creating the illusion that God is boring. This paradox is frequently discussed in the Bible.

Luke 16

> 14 Now the Pharisees, who were lovers of money, also heard all these things, and they derided Him (Jesus). 15 And He said to them, "You are those who justify yourselves before men, but God knows your hearts. For what is highly esteemed among men is an abomination in the sight of God. 16 "The law and the prophets were until John. Since that time the kingdom of God has been preached, and everyone is pressing into it. 17 And it is easier for heaven and earth to pass away than for one tittle of the law to fail. 18 "Whoever divorces his wife and marries another, commits adultery; and whoever marries her who is divorced from her husband commits adultery.

Note that Jesus also points out the behavior of the Pharisees to be spiritual adultery.

If we are to ponder these truths for a moment, we will find that what appears to be right, according to the standards presented to us by the world we live in, is actually worthless or even wrong, in relation to what God expects us to achieve. What we see through the worlds perspective looks totally different from what we see through God's eyes.

1st Samuel 16

> 7 But the LORD said to Samuel, "Do not look at his appearance or at his physical stature, because I have refused him. For the LORD does not see as man sees; for man looks at the outward appearance, but the LORD looks at the heart."

With this in mind, we may conclude that true pleasure, in terms of what God desires to give us, cannot necessarily be obtained through wealth, a life of ease, or even certain relationships, and that we must look deeper than these things, if we are to find true joy in our lives.

So the answer to the question is… Yes! God intends us to enjoy a life of immense pleasure, but we commonly settle for momentary diversions, because we fail to grasp what it is that God truly wants us to have and achieve in life. Then, we are tempted to blame God, or give up hope, rather than to make the necessary efforts to possess what God is offering us.

I urge you to take responsibility for your life and do whatever you need to do to make it count for something.

Hebrews 12

> 1 Therefore we also, since we are surrounded by so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which so easily ensnares us, and let us run with endurance the race that is set before us, 2 looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith, who for the joy that was set before Him endured the cross, despising the shame, and has sat down at the right hand of the throne of God.

Imagine that… Jesus, the Son of God, endured the suffering of the cross, in order to achieve JOY! That is the ultimate Pleasure Principle! As believers, we are each challenged to follow the same pattern.

A Simp studies Character

Jack · 26 December 2010 · Archived copy · Original

Satirical descriptions of noteworthy traits and humorous quotes.

Readership: All
Length: 1,500 words
Reading Time: 5 minutes

Last Sunday at church, I overheard a conversation between the pastor and two deacons. One of the deacons mentioned that I was an "odd sort of character", and the pastor silently nodded his head. So, since the pastor has this opinion of me, I thought I should study this, and give this some more attention, and try to improve my character a little bit.

So this week, I went to the library and did a Google search on "Character". I found some really good ideas about character. I've listed them here followed by some things I've learned.

A Literature Review on the Subject of Character

Definition of CHARACTER

> "Character is a moral, ethical and spiritual undergirding, that rests on truth, reinforces a life, and resists the temptation to compromise."
> Commentary on Romans 5

That's great, because I never compromise. I'd rather fail, lose, or walk away than compromise.

What is CHARACTER?

> "Character belongs to those who possess the image of God – not animals, not wicked men… This is a very unique concept in the Bible, and this virtue is unique to the born-again Christian."
> Commentary on Genesis 1:26-27

I'm so glad I'm a Christian. Been going to church since I was a baby!

CHARACTER, as contrasted with Reputation

A man's reputation is largely (but not totally) dependent upon the spoken opinions of others about his performance, reliability, honesty, integrity, charm, social dexterity, or whatever the various speakers may happen to value most. The inherent weakness of relying upon reputation is that one wagging tongue can tear down decades of hard work and discipline, without considering the obstacles which that man has had to overcome. Character, on the other hand, is an inward state of determination which presses forward in the face of constant criticism, and cares not what others may think or say.

Got it! My character depends on not caring what the pastor and deacon think or say about me. No problem!

> "Character is like a tree and reputation like a shadow. The shadow is what we think of it; the tree is the real thing."
> Abraham Lincoln on Character

Be like a tree — and leave. Interesting. Now I know what "the real thing" was before Coca-Cola was invented in 1886.

> "It is not the critic who counts; not the man who points out how the strong man stumbles, or where the doer of deeds could have done them better. The credit belongs to the man who is actually in the arena, whose face is marred by dust and sweat and blood, who strives valiantly; who errs and comes short again and again; because there is not effort without error and shortcomings; but who does actually strive to do the deed; who knows the great enthusiasm, the great devotion, who spends himself in a worthy cause, who at the best knows in the end the triumph of high achievement and who at the worst, if he fails, at least he fails while daring greatly. So that his place shall never be with those cold and timid souls who know neither victory nor defeat."
> President Theodore Roosevelt on C*haracter*

Hmmm, that's why Mom always told me to "man up" whenever I forgot to wash the dishes. Maybe I can get out of housechores if I take up boxing and ice hockey. Or… maybe playing Nintendo holds enough victory and defeat for me to "man up" for Mom.

> "Friends and character have much in common. Both help in times of trouble. The difference between friends and character, is that friends speak to you, character speaks for you."
> Chuck Swindoll on C*haracter*

Oh, how wonderful to know this! Now I can ignore Mom's nagging, go to my room, play Nintendo, and let my character do all the talking.

> "Talent is achieved in stillness, but character is developed in the torrential crucible of the world."
> Johann Wolfgang von Goethe on C*haracter*

One can achieve every kind of virtue in solitude, except character. I guess I'll have to come out of my room and go to the church potlucks before I can impress the pastor and the deacons.

> "Character is much easier kept, than recovered."
> Thomas Paine on C*haracter*

That's good, because I hate doing things just to impress others. It feels so fake.

> "Those who observe virtue, observe the actions of virtuous men."
> Aristotle on Character

Yes! I can attract more attention and become more popular by signaling my virtues!

Look at me! I'm a beacon of holy virtue!

> "What we think or what we believe is, in the end, of little consequence. The only thing of consequence is what we do."
> John Ruskin on C*haracter*

It is comforting to know this. Thank God I can escape those horrible consequences, because I'm not doing anything. I can be satisfied with little consequence instead.

> "Every man, as to character, is the creature of the age in which he lives. Very few are able to raise themselves above the ideas of their times."
> Voltaire on C*haracter*

Voltaire was an atheist. Thank God, I am raised with Christ!

The world's philosophy about CHARACTER:

The world is full of pain, so you should do anything you can to escape your pain, and build a better life for yourself, even if it means lying about some things, or covering up your actions to make yourself look good in front of other people. In other words, a solid reputation is vastly more important than what has been done to make it solid.

Modern psychologists on CHARACTER:

All instances of pain are a reminder of our first traumatic experience – our child birth! Once we were safe and warm inside our mother's womb, our food and oxygen were fed to us through a tube. Then we are squeezed and pushed outside our "home". The bones in our skulls were dislodged in the process. Our warmth, food and oxygen are cut off from us, and we are forced to live in nakedness and supply our own needs. From that moment on, all of life consists of the painful process of becoming more and more autonomous, as our needs, constraints, and responsibilities all grow in proportion to each other. Despite all our efforts to resist this process, we grow old and weak, and then we all die.

> "The essence of habitual sin is the avoidance of grief through one means or another."
> Prof. Gilbert Soohoo's sermon on Character (Hebrews 5:8-9)

We need to stop indulging in self-pity, complaining and fighting to end our pain, and start looking forward to it – as both a necessary part of our spiritual growth, and as an unavoidable certainty in our life. Instead of retarding our pain, we should help the process, and learn something from it. With the help of God, we can learn obedience from our suffering, and develop character, just as Christ did.

Maybe I should flunk out of school, start taking drugs, and join the Crips. That would create more suffering and grief in my life. At least I wouldn't have to wash dishes.

Satan's thoughts about CHARACTER:

> "Well, I'll be damned! No matter what kind of cruelty I inflict on these Christians, I cannot make their pain last any longer than 70 years! In fact, all the hatred that I hurl at them, only makes them stronger, and contributes to their glory for all eternity!"

Unfortunately, character is not a permanent possession. It must be maintained through regular exercise!

> "The reason for suffering hardship is to test character, which produces hope. This process is not something we should endure with gritted teeth, one step away from self-pity. We should face our pain with courage, as a challenge to obtain character and hope, just as Jesus Christ did as our example. As followers of Christ, we live a life of obedient suffering, leading to character, hope, eternal life and glory."
> The Apostle Paul on Character (Romans 5:1-5)

That sounds a lot like being constipated.

> "We are the CHAMPIONS, my friend! And we'll keep on fighting, 'till the end."
> Freddie Mercury on Character

He fought the good fight… against AIDS! But he still lost the fight. That must be because God hates gays, just like the pastor said. I'll make a mental note to myself, not to become gay.

> "Every impossible task is accomplished by an impossible person who has been crushed!"

> “God says, ‘Let the pain happen. Don’t be afraid. Stay in the crucible!’”
> Christians actually have a life of hardship. But having a good home and great parenting will put you one notch ahead of everyone else.
> What is God doing with you, if you are constantly facing pain, and struggling against God???
> HE is probably doing something great! You are an important part of HIS plan!
> Dr. Rick Grover’s exhortation towards building Character (1 Peter 1:3-9)

Conclusions

I am really glad I studied Character. Now that I understand what character is all about, I am sure it has improved my own Character immensely.

Calling All Angels

Jack · 1 May 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Lately, I've had a really tough time with my life. I knew I could do better, and I wanted to do better, but there have been so many important and urgent things at once. I have too many responsibilities, and I don't have enough time or energy to do my best.

The thing that makes this so excruciating is that I have felt so utterly alone, and like the fate of the whole world is on my shoulders. All these people in the world, are ignoring me at best, and throwing tomatoes at me, at worst. I realized I could never find the strength to finish all the tasks before me, let alone, finish well.

Today, I have only one month left to finish the revisions on my dissertation. I have to pray for at least 20-30 minutes every day, or else I can't hold it all together.

This morning, as I was praying, a song came to my mind, "Calling All Angels", by Train. It was a newer, upbeat tune, and the thought of it brought me some energy. As the tune played on in my head, it came to the chorus. The words said, "I won't give up, if you don't give up!" Then I recognized that God was speaking to me through this song.

For the reader to get the full flavor of what I experienced in my prayer. Listen to the song on the video above, while reading through the lyrics below. Imagine that it is God himself Who is talking to you through the song. God is holding you accountable, but He's also giving you the grace to make the decision about what you want to do with your life.

When the understanding of God's perspective finally hits you, you'll get a sense of the Lord's transcendental glory. After that, nothing else will seem to matter, and that is also what gives you the power to overcome all these difficulties.

I need a sign, to let Me know you're here
All of these lines are being crossed over the atmosphere

I need to know, that things are gonna look up [for you]
'Cause I feel us drowning in a sea spilled from a cup

When there is no place safe, and no safe place to put My head [i.e. thoughts and intentions]
When you can feel the world shake from the Words that are said

And I-I-I-I'm, calling all angels…
And I-I-I-I'm, calling all you angels…

And I won't give up, if you don't give up!
I won't give up, if you don't give up!
I won't give up, if you don't give up!
I won't give up, if you don't give up!

I need a sign, to let me know you're here
'Cause My TV set just keeps it all from being clear [to you (God owns everything, including your TV)]

I want [you to give me] a reason for the way [you think] things have to be
I need a hand to help build up some kind of hope [for you] inside of Me

And I-I-I-I'm, calling all angels…
And I-I-I-I'm, calling all you angels…

When children have to play inside, so they don't disappear
While private eyes solve marriage lies 'cause We don't talk for years [in prayer]

And football teams are kissing queens, and losing sight of having dreams
In a world where what We want is only what We want until it's Ours…

And I-I-I-I'm, calling all angels…
And I-I-I-I'm, calling all you angels…
And I-I-I-I'm, calling all angels…
And I-I-I-I'm, calling all you angels…

Calling all you angels…
(I won't give up, if you don't give up)
Calling all you angels…
(I won't give up, if you don't give up)
Calling all you angels…
(I won't give up, if you don't give up)

The Meaning of Marriage

Jack · 11 July 2011 · Archived copy · Original

Is marriage passe? After all, over sixty percent of them in the United States alone end in divorce?

I think not. Despite the discouraging statistics in these modern times, couples continue to marry and remarry, trying again and again to get it right. But what goes wrong?

It seems there has been an evolution in marriage that has taken place and most people don't have a clue that it has happened. They are busy trying to carry on in modalities that no longer work and the world crashes down around them.

Perhaps the key to a successful marriage lies in understanding the metaphysics of it, along with its evolution and a keener understanding of what commitment truly is.

Marriage in the Past

We have moved from a time when marriage was important just for our sheer survival. The first evolution of marriage was meant to aid in continuing our species in a somewhat safer environment from that of a lone woman being impregnated by a passerby, then left to give birth by herself in a nest of leaves under a bush somewhere. Both the woman and child were in extreme danger, vulnerable to whatever came along, be it weather, beast or another human. Meanwhile, the lone passerby who impregnated the woman may have met his demise as well, by running into another, stronger human.

Together, marriage gave couples back then a better chance of making it through at least to their children's independence. Together they found shelter, fire, food and water – and defense against others.

From there we moved into marriages of convenience. These were arranged marriages, from the poorest of society to the highest bred. The poor married not only to combine together whatever meager ownings they had, but also to connect with whoever was most convenient geographically. The highest bred arranged marriages to combine wealth, landholdings and armies.

Love in these marriages was not even considered. Oh, it was an asset some thought in the wealthy set, while most others thought it a hindrance to accidently fall in love with one's wife. There were mistresses for that sort of thing. Here and there in history one finds an arranged marriage where love successfully existed, such as that which developed between King George III and his German wife. But such marriages were novelties of sorts, rare enough to become fodder for romantic novels.

The solid idea of love between married couples began creeping, albeit hesitantly, into the mind of society along about the mid-1800's. With it came a hollow restlessness, an emptiness and yearning for something more. Could it have been the underpinnings of the women's suffragette movement, I wonder?

People living before WWII had a different view of life. When they were young, it was fun to play around with love, and enjoy their lives, and it was not uncommon for the average person to have more than one lover. But after a few heartbreaks, those broken relationships produced a few enemies that brought hatred and guilt, and then a formal and public commitment with a partner became much more appealing. So in short, people get married for security.

In addition to an increased security, there might also be some cost avoidance. Getting married, and starting the married life can be very expensive, but the day to day expenses are slightly cheaper than living alone, because a lot of the expenses are shared by your partner. Children are not so expensive until they grow older, but by that time, your career should have advanced as well, bringing more income to support your family. Of course, a young man can avoid more costs by living with his parents for his entire life! He might have a little more money in his pocket, but his relationships will suffer as a result, because of the limits to his pride and the restrictions on his freedom that his parents will impose. Marriage will give a person the moral right to be in control of his/her own relationship with his/her partner.

After World War II, and after the metaphysical energy of the earth shifted from Europe to the United States (another Perceptions article to be sure), divorce began a continual rise until today it is pandemic.

An Objective Assessment of Marriage

Of course, no one should get married solely to avoid heartbreak, isolation and the burdens of relying on one's self. Properly, marriage should be chosen more for the benefits that it brings, and less for the troubles that can be avoided. Most of all, the choice of an appropriate partner is the key issue that will determine whether the marriage relationship will be happy and successful. Choosing a partner can be quite a complicated issue by itself. However, my point here is that being afraid of commitment can be just as dangerous to your life as making a bad decision. I personally believe that some of my students would be happier if they got married, simply because the opportunities that they are experiencing now will not last forever. Taking opportunities always involves risk, but having regret over opportunities lost is a little harder to live with.

But even today, people keep trying for the brass ring of marriage over and over. How do we avoid the possibility of divorce, and find the happiness that marriage offers?

I cannot tell you how many times I have heard something that would not have been uttered in the 1600's, 1700's and for most of the 1800's: "The romance went out of my marriage."

What is romance? It is the spiritual side of marriage. It is the one thousand volts of electricity that give you the ecstatic "high", versus the 110 volts of electricity it takes to run the vacuum cleaner after the marriage in order to clean up after one another. Romance is the Divine Presence within each of us that reaches out to the other within a committed environment. Romance spawns spiritual ecstasy. Spiritual ecstasy allows us to touch the face of God.

As marriage has evolved, we have evolved as well. We have, for the most part, not yet discovered that marriage has moved out of the realm of the physical and into the realm of a spiritual partnership.

Women are self sufficient now. They no longer need a man around to gather fire and food for them. They are educated enough to provide for a family without the man's wealth. But it seems not to be enough. Once again, as in the 1800's, when we women began to reach outward to fill the empty hole, we did so in the male world, only to find it emptier still. Filling it up with a marriage that goes sour in a few years is not the answer either. So what is? Perhaps the answer lies within the context of a spiritual marriage.

There are three purposes to a modern marriage:

1. To heal the wounded child that exists within each of us
2. To touch the face of God
3. Raising children

Very little is sacred any more. But marriage is something that must be held sacred and spiritual if it is to survive. There is no other way in the progress and evolution of mankind thus far. Marriage must become a sacred healing ground as you set upon your earth walk together. Marriage will be used by either the ego, or the Holy Spirit. True marriage becomes a spiritual rite of passage.

This spiritual rite of passage between two people becomes a pact, a "heart pact", and it must be made and kept sacred in order for romance and ecstasy to survive within the marriage. This heart pact is called commitment.

When two people really understand that a commitment within a spiritual marriage must be made in order for the marriage to survive, there is hope for a successful marriage to occur. Without the dynamic of commitment you cannot serve one another in the growth of the soul. Marriage then becomes a conscious journey into one's own spirit; first by healing the wounded child, second by touching the face of God.

The Four Stages of Marriage

There are four stages to a marriage.

Stage one is what I called the fantasy stage. This stage goes something like this: “Oh, we have found each other and it is so grand, so ecstatic! We can live together forever as one. Whatever happens, we can handle it, together.”

Here is the stage where the wounded child living within each of the marriage partners cries out, “oh, goody, I have found my safe haven and I shall never have pain, especially of a kind that wounded me in my childhood.” Yes, you touch ecstasy in stage one of marriage, but the ecstasy wanes as you ebb into the second stage of a marriage.

Stage two of a marriage is what I call the counter dependent stage. This is the stage where suddenly you cannot tolerate the way he squeezes the toothpaste in the middle of the tube, or burps when he pushes his chair away from the table (signaling his meal is finished and you get the honor of cleaning up after him). Or, he cannot believe this shrew yelling at him as he walks away is the same sweet little thing who just a few months prior couldn’t wait to show him what a great cook, wife, and everything else he ever wanted her to be. She doesn’t even come close to offering to rub his back every night anymore!

There is a need for stage two. Here is the stage where we must circle around ourselves to recapture our own identity. Especially if we are ever to move into stage three and stage four, as you shall see.

Unfortunately, 97% of all marriages end in stage two. Ignorant of the metaphysics of a spiritual marriage and of marriage’s divine stages, the couple only sees disintegration of goals and dreams, and a fast dissolving of romance and ecstasy.

Here is the stage where the fire breathing dragon comes out of each of you, to scorch that little wounded child with all the fury of a warring monster.

“God, she’s just like my mother,” I hear. “I swore I did everything I could to avoid getting hooked up with one like that. I guess I’m just safest not being married at all, not ever (and oh, what a hole that statement leaves within the heart).” Or, “Geez, he’s as bossy as my father and just as loud. He’s always telling me what to do.” Or, “I have no freedom and I have to go out on my own and find myself. Never again…”

Something is going to happen in this, the second stage of a marriage. It will. It is inevitable. Either you go your separate ways, or you MAKE A COMMITMENT TO WORK IT OUT. The moment you make a spiritual commitment that no one is going anywhere, that somehow, some way, you WILL work it out, you automatically move into stage three of your marriage. Here is the stage where you can rediscover your love for one another – it doesn’t happen in stage two, not when you are counter dependent.

Commitment is the ONLY WAY you can move to stage three and ultimately to stage four. Here is where any infidelity ceases (infidelity can only take place in stage two, by the way). Here is where marriage counseling, if it is to take place, will show solid success. Here is where compromise and negotiation take place (and compromise means just that – EACH of you has to give up something in order to meet in the middle). Here is where the wounded child is healed. Here is where you begin to move from a wounded, flattened one dimensional marriage back into the ecstasy and romance you found during stage one.

When a true commitment has been made to honor the soul’s growth, individually and together, within the marriage, interdependence takes place. When all negotiation and compromise has been complete and the wounded child is healed, you then move into stage four of the marriage.

Ah, stage four. This is the stage you unwittingly got married for in the first place. Is it worth all the effort of having to work through the other stages? You bet. Here is the stage of autonomy, of independence. Here is where one achieves what is called marital bliss.

Marital bliss is the stage of relationship within the spiritual marriage where no one is going anywhere. The wounded child is healed. The marriage is comfortable, honorable, and allows the individual to maintain his or her own identity, while at the same time bringing to the marriage gifts of the spirit: humor, creativity, sensitivity, tenderness, understanding, and the gratifying sense of individuation. Here is where each person can enjoy a safe arena in which he and she can reach out and stretch to their full potential, individually and as a couple.

In the fourth stage of marriage, the ecstasy returns.

In the fourth stage of marriage you are free to touch the face of God.

WHO the Health Cares?

Jack · 19 September 2011 · Archived copy · Original

A rant about the insolvency of Obama Care, including a comparison to Taiwan's health care system.

Readership: All

The general response to the recent healthcare issue is becoming almost as violent and divisive as slavery was during the Civil War.

I have a dream! I have a dream today! I have a dream that every American citizen can be able to see a doctor and eat three nutritious meals every day!

Every year, the U.S. Government donates billions of dollars to overseas food distributors and medical care alliances. Every year, the American people donate billions of dollars to their churches, to charity organizations, to different relief funds, to food pantries, to homeless shelters, to health and disease research centers, etc.

But why are we spending so much money on these causes, while we can't come up with a comprehensive health care budget so that everyone can see a doctor?

My cousin owns a small business with net profits of about $2M a year. He hates the idea of a nationalized health care system, because he thinks his business will be forced to pay expensive premiums for every one of his employees. He says if he has to do that, his business will go bankrupt. He also thinks it's politically wrong for the government to force such obligations on the achievers and "breadwinners" of society.

I see my cousin's point, but he is assuming that a win-win arrangement is unachievable. Personally, I like to believe that the American people are better at being ingeniously creative and resourceful, than they are at being greedy sponges.

Yes, people will have to pay for the health care plan somehow, but the nation pays for a lack of health care in other ways. Look at the children of parents who don't have health care coverage. They never go to the doctor, and because of their poor health as a child, they tend to battle illnesses their whole lives. When they are sick, they miss many days of school, they fall behind, they lose self esteem… some drop out in order to find a job so that they can afford to pay for necessary prescriptions, or some sort of health care for themselves or for older family members who cannot work. Some turn to crime, and a few end up in prison. THAT is expensive!

I guess we could always say, "That is someone else's problem!" But we must act collectively if we want to solve a problem this large. Do people know what a collective effort is? Is a collective effort in devising a health care system called a "class action" or is it considered "socialism"?

I've heard a lot of talk about "socialism". I don't really understand why people think a national health care program is equivalent to socialism. A national military is not considered socialist. Government funded research is not considered socialist. I guess "socialism" conjures up images of Nazi Germany in most American's minds, but the United States is not a dictatorship. There are lots of "good socialist" countries: Canada, France, Finland, Sweden… Polls show that the quality of life in these countries are the highest in the world.

Furthermore, why are people so afraid of America turning socialist? I mean, do they really think it could happen? Who in their right mind would think that America would ever turn socialist? The American political tradition has turned the world on its ear since 1776 by declaring that the government is the servant of the people, and not the other way around. This is the whole underlying principle of the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution and the Bill of Rights. Have American's forgotten this? The day when Americans become too dumb and lazy to exercise and defend their constitutional freedoms is the day there will be a need for socialism in the government.

[Eds. note (November 24, 2018): A lot has changed since I wrote this post. That day now seems to be approaching.]

I've lived in the United States for more than 32 years, and I've worked and paid taxes to Uncle Sam for more than 14 years. I've also been a Federal Government employee (GS-9). I know what it is like to have health care, and I've learned how to live without health care too. Fortunately, I've never been seriously ill without health care coverage, but I can imagine it's a nightmare for those who must endure such an experience.

When I worked for the government, I was covered by Medicare. I paid US$125 a month premium, and my employer (the U.S. government) also paid into Medicare, an amount unknown to me. A visit to the doctor cost US$20. Prescriptions were US$5 each. A trip to the emergency room cost US$125, and there was a hospitalization copay of US$250. I was able to see any health professional I chose, as long as he accepted Medicare coverage.

I've lived in Taiwan for the past seven years. We have a nationalized health care program here, and it's pretty good. I pay about US$30 a month for each person in my family. A visit to the doctor costs US$5, and that includes any prescriptions the doctor might give me. A trip to the emergency room costs US$20. Hospitalization is reasonable too. Earlier this year, I spent one night in the hospital for US$50. A couple years ago, my wife delivered our baby, and before the delivery, she spent three weeks in the hospital due to complications, and her total bill was only US$300. All doctors and pharmacists are licensed by the government, and many of them got their education in Europe or America. There is one bad thing though… there is no anesthesia – it's considered a luxury, and it's eliminated to cut down expenses. You can get it if you want it, but you need to pay for it yourself… it won't be covered by the government plan. It's the same story for prosthetics.

Also, if I deem myself to be a person with extremely good health, I can choose not to participate in the national health program, and in such a case, I would pay full price for any health care that I choose to receive. But of course, being insured is always better, even if it costs me a little bit. One negative point is that the medicines and treatments that are more expensive are harder to come by, and so you need to spend a little time and effort to search for an atypically capable and conscientious doctor who is willing to go to a little more trouble to help you obtain those things. On the other hand, America also has doctors that are good, and some others that aren't. But overall, I'm extremely pleased with the health benefits in Taiwan.

I sincerely believe that Americans can invent a health care system that is at least as good as Taiwan's, or maybe even better.

The Deeper Meaning of Marriage

Jack · 18 October 2011 · Archived copy · Original

The Joining of Flesh in Passionate Union

Sex is important on many levels – physical, procreational, emotional, psychological, spiritual, relational, social, moral, ideological, societal… so that it becomes perhaps the central, most important aspect of the human experience.

Most people in the western world today have come to think of marriage as merely a social construct, which may be changed to fit one's individual preferences, and cast aside when it no longer fulfills that purpose. People have lost the awareness of the deeper meaning of marriage.

Here, we argue that the institution of marriage is not only a social construct, but also a permanent, deep-soul bonding between a male and female, which reflects the image of God, and is designed by God to become a wellspring of Life. The religious admonishments, the social constructs, and the supporting legal framework, are all merely additions intended to inform the ignorant, to civilize the feral nature, to protect this spring of Life, and enhance the experience of being a sexual human being.

What is the Spiritual Meaning of Sex?

The sexuality of men and women is essentially their design and ability to be soul-paired together, and also to produce Life, and reproduce life. The reproductive organs of the physical human body are receptacles for the purpose soul-pairing, production, and reproduction. Thus, the sexual embrace of a man and a woman is an interlocution for the pairing of their souls, and the channel of generation (i.e. creation and procreation). This includes not only the procreation of the physical life of children, but also the spiritual Life of God within their souls.

The desire for sex is not only a biological drive, but also the desire to be connected in soul union with another, a combination of the masculine and the feminine, in accordance with the Divine Purpose of Creation.

On the biological level, the exchange of semen and bodily fluids between a husband and wife allow their individual body chemistry (e.g. hormones, DNA, etc.), to flow from one to the other. This is evidence which obviously supports the biblical description of 'One Flesh'.

On the psychological and emotional level, the sexual experience opens a conduit of interlocution through which the knowledge of the other's soul, and an intuitive familiarity with the thoughts and feelings of each of the individuals, become accessible. With this knowledge comes the propensity of being able to discern and interpret the thoughts and actions of the other person, thus enhancing the mingling of their souls within their daily interactions.

In a genuine, eternal marriage, where the two become physically and mentally of 'One Mind', the Spiritual essence of the souls within each person begin to move in harmony and cooperation, and the biblical reality of 'One Flesh' becomes manifested in the daily lives of the husband and wife. This soul powwow becomes the spiritual home environment, and it is this environment which renders the children 'Holy'.

The Purpose and Benefits of Having Control Over One's Sexuality

Sex is the Genesis of procreative life, and as such, God has made it a powerful instinct. Most religions emphasize the life-giving nature of sex, and by extension, the death-causing aspects of it's abuse, by building a framework of morality, and consequently, this creates quite a bit of mystery. The power of guilt and shame that religious morals inflict on its adherents can serve as a powerful motivation to conform, comply, or contribute. Thus, personal liberty is shackled, and the 'curse of the Law' is lowered on those who are conscientious. As a result, people often get caught up in the religious taboos surrounding sex, and fail to see the intended purposes of sexual restraint – to enhance the life-giving aspects, and deter the catastrophic consequences of its abuse.

Waiting until marriage has become a very rare endeavor. Why? It's not because people perceive that abstinence is a bad thing, it's just that people are hard pressed by the intensity of their own desire, faced with daily temptation, and unaware of the reasons for waiting, especially the benefits of delaying gratification.

Furthermore, when we put too many controls on our sexual behaviors, and fail to take the effort to explain the goals and purposes of those regulations, then there will be some who miss the point, and end up having perverted beliefs and behavior patterns.

People who decide to wait until marriage to have sex should be motivated by the desire not to do anything that might screw up their chances of having a satisfying marriage life. If a person does not have this motivation, and abstains simply to 'follow the rule', or 'because it's the right thing to do', then they are not adequately focused on the whole purpose of abstention, and is likely to fail in pursuing the hope of developing a relationship that might lead to such a union.

A few of the benefits of abstention are listed here.

- A period of abstinence is essentially an exercise in delaying gratification, which teaches one confidence, emotional independence, discipline and self-control, and thus, greatly improves one's level of maturity, and by extension, their chances of marital success.
- Women who abstain conserve their Marriage Market Value (MMV), thus allowing them to have a much better choice of men to marry, and happier marriages as a result.
- Women who abstain do not become Alpha Widowed, nor single mothers – things which would greatly decrease their marital happiness and future security.
- Men who abstain do not create Alpha Widows and single mothers – things which would greatly decrease the marital happiness of other men who might marry those women in the future.
- The possibility of exposure to Sexually Transmitted Diseases (STD's) is removed. Many STD's decrease a person's Sexual Market Value (SMV), and also their physical ability to procreate.
- Children are assured of knowing who their parents are, which is a crucial aspect in forming their identity.

In conclusion, abstinence, in general, leads to contentedness, and contributes towards a solid marriage, which provides a stable, loving environment for the children to mature properly.

Sex as a Sacred Sacrament

When used properly within the form of a Divinely Ordained Marriage, sex is the Temple Sacrament that bridges the physical divide — the catalyst that enables the husband and wife to create new life within themselves in the endeavor to make themselves into a state of Oneness, and to grow their two lives together.

The average person fails to grasp the full spectrum of thoughts, feelings, impressions, and beliefs that are conveyed through the sexual connection, because much of it is beyond the conscious awareness of the individual. Thus, people commonly fail to respect the true depth and dimension of sexual intercourse and marriage. But as a husband and wife begin to enter into a spiritually conscious and meditative sexual relationship, they come to humbly understand their dependence upon the other in their mutual ability to create Life together. Moreover, the sexual interaction raises the motivational energies of passion and creativity, and gives birth to a higher level of consciousness.

The Merger of Minds During Sacred Sex

When a man and woman in a Genuine Spiritual Marriage equally purifies and cleanses their physical bodies so as to make them conducive to an environment of Higher Consciousness — eliminating all defilements and physical/mental pollutants which enables a higher vibratory frequency of vital life-force from God to flow through their bodies, which effectually saturates their minds with a spiritually vibrant flow of Illuming Light Energy — consecrating their minds to the seeking and living of Higher Truth — and both equally begin to explore the sexual relationship in a meditative manner where it is the energies that move and permeate their being in the endeavor to open the inner door of Higher Consciousness and the Kingdom — a totally unexpected thing begins to happen. Because the mind is not the brain, as medical science erroneously believes — but rather, is the field or etheric body which surrounds and animates the physical body, in meditative sex the mind of each not only begins to intermingle, but the mind of the woman is able to enter into that of her husband, and the mind of the male is able to enter into the body of the wife. Each will be able to perceive themselves from the perspective of their spouse and opposite sex. The result is a sacred connection not only between the husband and wife wherein the two physical forms become a common platform that each equally inhabit, but inner gender based suppressed polarities begin to manifest in the life of both husband and wife. Initially, the feminine nature of the male and the masculine nature of the female begin to manifest in the body of their respective spouse during these extended periods of meditative Sacred Sex. In time, the two begin to become complete within their selves as each becomes Whole as the polarity of male and female is merged and the consciousness is transformed through the emergence of a higher soul reality that is neither male nor female — but something greater than the two. This becomes a truly spiritually transforming experience which is multidimensional in a transcendent nature, which gives a totally new comprehension of the biblical reality where the husband knew his wife.

Conclusions

Sex is very spiritual. At the moment of the act, you are your true self were all thoughts (acquired knowledge) ceases; all the conditionings and brain-washing (political, social, economics, religious, etc.) are far from your mind. Only after the act, when a person comes back to all these conditionings that the guilt kicks in. The churches, societies and peers put a straight-jacket on sex. But sex is a normal human development. Promiscuity will start whatever restraint you put on it.

In the universal language of mind, sex represents harmony. Sex represents the progressive harmony between the conscious and subconscious mind. This is the dream language which can also be applied to scriptures. Adam is the subconscious mind and Eve is the conscious mind. It is a little different when you dream. A male dreamer dreaming of having sex with a female will be talking about a way of harmonizing with your inner self. To aid you in identifying the particular way of thinking referred to, attach a quality to that person, then look to the previous day's occurrences to see how it fits.

Formality as an Expression of the Human Characteristic of Desire

Jack · 11 October 2012 · Archived copy · Original

One of the most basic qualities of human nature is the fact that we are full of desires. We desire money, we desire love, we desire relationships, we desire political freedoms, we desire success, we desire honor, etc.

But the conflict of our desires is a big source of disparity, dissonance and desperation, which makes us resemble brute animals competing for resources and opportunities!

Simultaneously, human beings need a sense of self-worth, dignity and respect, so we have invented “formality” as a way to glorify our innate human quality of desire with a sense of honor.

Thus, logic, organization and order become valuable in self-expression, and it becomes necessary to observe rules of etiquette and discuss topics such as goals, purposes and processes in a non-subjective manner.

Those who have a mature view of formality, recognize it as a venue in which their deepest heart-felt desires may be expressed with honor and determination in a social setting.

A modified Atkins diet for trimming the fat off your @$$!

Readership: All
Length: 1,000 words
Reading Time: 5 minutes

I lost 20 Kg. (45 pounds) between July, 2011 (107 Kg.) and September, 2012 (87 Kg.). This is how I did it.

The Concept

Most people who desire to lose weight torture themselves by thinking that they can only eat things like iceberg lettuce and mineral water, and they make themselves feel guilty if they should ever actually enjoy delicious food. Then after starving themselves, they wear their body out through hours of strenuous exercise, and they feel guilty if they don't have the time or energy to do so.

Then comes the horrid binging… and then they are right back where they began!

If you desire to lose weight and become more fit, it is nearly impossible to do so with a skimpy diet and strenuous exercise. Why? Because exercising makes you more hungry, and then you are more likely to eat all the extra calories that you burned off through exercising.

For example, a 90 Kg. (200 pound) man (like myself) would need to play basketball vigorously for at least two hours to burn off the calories he gained from eating one Big Mac hamburger, with large fries and a coke. If this were you, then why not save your time, save your money, save your body and save your effort, by eating something lower in calories, like an apple or some tofu, and doing something else you enjoy?

Staying fit is all about making healthy decisions, respecting your body and metabolism, and forming good habits for you!

Here is the way to get yourself on track towards eating healthy and controlling your weight!

Modifying Your Diet

You will need to change what you eat, and how frequently you eat.

No fear! This could be a very positive and enjoyable change.

These are five aspects of food which need to be considered, whenever you are buying food and constructing a meal plan or a diet plan.

1. Calories – less is better
2. Nutritional Content – more is better
3. Taste – Do you really want to eat this?
4. Expense – lower is better
5. Convenience – Shopping; finding special ingredients; preparation, cooking and cleanup time;

It is very difficult to find the ideal combination of all the above. The challenge of obtaining and consuming food with all of the above — low calorie, nutritious, delicious, cheap and easy — is what separates the tubby, binging, Murican snackers from the sexy, sophisticated, European culinary chefs.

Here is a list of dietary habits to try on.

1. Stay busy, especially doing things you enjoy. This will take your mind off of food and feelings of hunger.

2. Only eat when you feel hungry. Never eat if you are not hungry, even if it's mealtime.
3. Eat smaller amounts of food at one sitting. Instead of eating until you are full, just stop eating after you are no longer hungry. By doing so, you can reduce the amount of food you eat at each meal to about 80% of what you usually eat.
4. Eat very small, healthy "snacks" very frequently throughout the day (around 10 times a day), and while doing other things. This will help regulate your blood sugar and your appetite.
5. If you feel hungry between meals, stave off intense cravings by eating small amounts of fruit, nuts, chocolate, or beef jerky between meals. Then by the time you reach the table, you'll have less appetite, and therefore, eat less.
6. Eat slowly. Chew each bite 30 to 50 times before swallowing. This discipline increases self-control, and allows a more thorough digestion.
7. If you're busy, or not so hungry, declare a fast and skip a meal – or three. Get closer to God before you become a sex symbol! Seriously!
8. Eat more protein (beef, chicken, fish, nuts, beans, milk, yogurt, tofu*…)
9. Eat more vegetables (bamboo, broccoli, eggplant, carrots, bell peppers, cabbage, kale, collard greens, spinach, mushroom, tomato, onion…)
10. Eat more fruit (apples, kiwis, and bananas are especially nutritious)
11. Severely limit sugar consumption. Drink coffee and tea without sugar.
12. Avoid oily and deep fried foods.
13. Reduce or eliminate carbohydrates (rice, corn, bread, bagel, muffin, pastry, donuts, waffle, crackers, potatoes, french fries, potato chips, doritos, taro, sweet potato, red bean, noodles, spaghetti, pasta…) Other beans, oatmeal, brown rice or wild rice is OK.
14. Instead of eating carbs, eat foods that are low in calories and high in nutrition.

Why not eat carbs? Carbohydrates have a lot of calories, but very little nutritional value. Also, eating lots of carbohydrates will make you feel more hungry.

Why is this? Eating carbs causes the blood sugar to spike very high, very quickly, which can make you feel really satisfied. But after your body consumes the energy burst, then your blood sugar will drop suddenly low, making you feel tired and hungry. That is when binging happens – people suddenly become ravenously hungry, lose control of their impulsivity, and eat a whole bag of potato chips. For these reasons, many diet plans, such as the Atkins Diet, eschew carb consumption.

* Manosphere Warning: The regular consumption of tofu and other soy-based products have been known to increase estrogen levels overall, and reduce testosterone levels in males.

Diet Plan

Begin recording and tracking your diet each day. Calculate your average daily food calorie intake vs. your average daily energy consumption using the worksheet.

Are you surprised?

What to Expect

First Month

People who are trying to lose weight, usually go cold turkey. But this approach makes it very taxing on the willpower, so they cannot stick to a strict diet. Instead, don't try to change your eating habits cold turkey. Instead, just cut down the amount of food you eat. To do this, simply change your mind to eat less food during meals. This is the key point, and the most difficult part.

Second Month

Oily and high carbohydrate foods should appear very sloppy and detestable to you by now. Now, it is easier for you to choose more nutritious foods to eat.

After 6 weeks, you should start to feel different about your life. This new feeling will make your life easier and more enjoyable.

After the Third Month

You should notice by now, that you cannot eat as much food as you did before. You should feel full after eating smaller quantities of food.

Maybe you weigh the same, or maybe a little more, but don’t give up. It takes a long time to see results. Give yourself at least six months to see your wardrobe change.

When People Appear to be Like Trees

If others are seen by one's self as being incomplete, and our relationships with them unfulfilling, it may be because one doesn't know one's self very well. We are spiritually blind to the realities of being fully aware.

> [22] Then He came to Bethsaida; and they brought a blind man to Him, and begged Him to touch him. [23] So He took the blind man by the hand and led him out of the town. And when He had spit on his eyes and put His hands on him, He asked him if he saw anything.
> [24] And he looked up and said, "I see men like trees, walking."
> [25] Then He put His hands on his eyes again and made him look up. And he was restored and saw everyone clearly. [26] Then He sent him away to his house, saying, "Neither go into the town, nor tell anyone in the town."
> Mark 8:22-25 (NKJV)

Did you ever walk into a large forest? Did you notice all the trees, or were you more concerned about whether you might get lost?

Whenever we see a lot of trees together, they all seem alike. But, if you pay attention to one tree in particular, you'll find that every tree is quite different. Here is a Maple, there is an Elm. An Oak tree is not the same as a Pine tree.

In fact, the bark and the leaves are unique for every tree. On a closer scrutiny, you'll find that each tree has a different arrangement of branches, and each branch bends slightly differently than the others.

Once we take notice of these differences, then we become conscious of the smaller details. Even if we were to examine only one tree, we would find that the leaves are independent in size and shape. The veins in each leaf fan out in different patterns. If we were to cut into a tree, we would find rings, medullar rays, capillaries, and other parts of the "tree anatomy", which can tell a trained observer about the history of the tree.

We may look at people in much the same manner.

When we are in a large crowd, everyone looks the same, and we might think more about our personal welfare than about anyone else. But on the occasion that we become more familiar with someone in particular, we find that each person we meet has his or her own special qualities. We eventually come to identify the person as a separate individual, distinct from others in the crowd.

How Are People Different?

As we get to know a person better, we discover nuances that are particular to an individual.

- He/she has certain strengths and weaknesses.
- He/she has certain preferences and sensitivities.
- Each person clings to some breed of a general outlook on life.
- Each person maintains daily attitudes and habits, of which some are good, and others are not so enviable.

Some of the people we meet seem to “fit” us well, and we naturally desire to spend more time with such persons, while other people remain disagreeable and unreasonable to us. But as we come into contact with many different types of people throughout our lives, we learn other ways of thinking, come to understand the essence of living, and we mature as an individual.

In fact, most often times, those people whom we were at odds with upon first meeting, become people with whom we develop the most meaningful relationships. Wise socialites know that the people who are the most different from one’s self are the people from whom one can learn the most. However wise this might be, it often becomes difficult, awkward and emotionally draining to continue such “educational experiences” with certain individuals, especially if that individual does not put the same value on understanding you in return.

The Interaction

Many people view social interactions as an arena for play, with goals in the game such as popularity or egotistical pride. In some cultures (western), there is a stiff competition for confidence, self-esteem and respect. Other cultures (asian) are focused more on security, power, and control, so they play social games based on issues of honor, love and money.

Although it will certainly help us if we can identify the desires and social goals of any one person that we come into contact with, it is not always easily accomplished, and it can be potentially hazardous if we make any wrong presumptions about the motives of others.

However, there are many other qualities that we can safely and easily identify in others. If we have a basic knowledge about human nature, those things can guide us in developing successful relations with anyone that we might come into contact with.

The Introduction

Perhaps one of the most efficient and useful methods of improving the quantity and quality of one’s social contacts is to have a very effective introduction prepared and memorized. The introduction allows you to shape the initial impression that others have of you, and prevent any confusion that might arise from stereotypes or false impressions.

The goal of the introduction is to allow new people to get to know the “real you” much faster and in a more positive light. This eliminates the awkward and embarrassing guessing game from their experience of knowing you.

A continually rehearsed and well polished introduction is your opportunity to make your personality and character shine!

As one develops their introduction through time and use, it becomes a tool, a lens, through which one views one’s self. Then, giving your introduction to others is like handing to them the same lens, so that they can see you in the same way that you see yourself.

Another article from Elite Daily displays the profound disrespect that women give men these days.

Readership: Discerning Men, Pink Pilled Women

I got a "Pop Up" advertising this article from Elite Daily. I've got to admit, they certainly know how to tap into the frustration that has become common (anything for a clique), but it's still feminist drivel.

Elite Daily (feat. Lauren Martin): Why Women Need To Start Asking Men Out… Because Men Have No Balls (September 10, 2014)

[Eds. note (October 23, 2018): Link updated. This article was originally entitled, "Men are Pussies! Women need to start asking men on dates!"]

Ms. Martin writes,

> "There's no door-holding, no hand-holding and definitely no free drinks. There's no taking off hats or courting through invitations. There are no smooth moves, no jackets to dinner. There are no flowers, no tables by candlelight. But, most importantly, there are no dates."

Gee, I wonder why?

So far, this is a pretty accurate description, but as we read on, the falsely attributed causes become apparent.

> "If you're a single woman, you probably envisioned your twenties as a roaring social scene full of expensive dinners and lavish nights out. You probably thought you'd have a boyfriend, or at least a few dates a week."

Here we find a dichotomy between the outcome goals of dating, between men and women. Men see dating as a path to establish some sort of a relationship, but these days, women see dating as a path to debauchery. Men take dating seriously, considering the suitability of this woman, the risks of pregnancy, and even marriage, but women only want to have fun… With lots of men. This seems to be a classic role reversal, compared to the dating scene of decades past.

But later in the article, we find the real reason for men's reticence.

> "After too many nights spent in bars and one too many phone numbers given out, you've probably realized the sad truth of the situation. You're not going on any dates or being courted in any type of manner because, unfortunately, men these days are cowards."

In this paragraph, we see the whole problem in stark detail. What kind of man would seriously court a woman who frequents bars and gives her phone number out to every man? What kind of man would want to date a woman who believes all men are cowards?

> "They'll make eye contact with you in the bar, but never come over. They'll get your number, but never call. They'll offer to buy you a drink, but never pay."

They know they could buy drinks for you all night, only to see you walk out the door, never to see you again."

> "They'll say a girl is hot, but never hit on her. They'll text you for a week, but never ask you out. They'll do absolutely everything but make a move."

They're still looking for evidence that this woman is worth all the effort, and become disappointed in only a few days.

> "I've watched men pine over women, talking about them like future wives, yet after staring at them for two hours, let them walk away."

Man can dream, can't they? But they know it's not going to be what they want.

> "I've watched men chase women down for their phone numbers, yet wait a week to text them, acting like it's something they simply forgot about."

Sorry babe, there's too many other women who gave me their phone number. You're further down the list somewhere.

> "I've watched men spend an entire night talking to a girl, yet never get up the nerve to ask for her number."

Once a woman decides she's ready to roll, she thinks it's a done deal, becoz… "No red-blooded man would ever turn down a 'gorgeous princess' for sex, right?" But ever increasingly saavy men are still reviewing the contract. This worm waiste just isn't juicy enough to bite.

> "We're dealing with a new breed of men here and it's not the kind we grew up dreaming about. It's the want-what-I-want-but-don't-know-how-to-get-it type;

Men are also dealing with a new breed of women here and it's not the kind we grew up dreaming about either. It's the men-are-as-disposable-as-the-condoms-they-come-in type.

> "It's the sweet and cuddly mama's boys who grow up terrified of making the first move"

Who is going to make the first move on a woman who thinks men are 'Mama's Boys'?

> "It's the guys who have so much to say but don't know how to say it."

Men clam up fast when they know they're going to be judged on every word that comes out of their mouth, and ridiculed accordingly. Isn't it apparent why he doesn't want to continue with you?

> "Now, the unfortunate paradox for a woman is that she must be the chased and the chaser. She must be the target and the shooter. She must play coy and simultaneously pursue him."

Too much effort required? A little bit of responsibility is too much to ask of you?

> "Anyone notice the problem here? Yet again, women are left to do all the work. We're left playing both sides of the game because they've simply forgotten how to play."

You're wanting to be played by a cad, and then you'll whine and cry after getting screwed and duped. Decent men don't play that kind of game.

> "It stems from a number of factors, but most prominently from the fact that men don't know what the hell they want from us. They want the virgin and the whore. The want the slut and the good girl. They want the girl who's hard to get, but they don't know how to get her.

So you say. You really don't understand men at all. It's too much work for a decent man to date you, and you're definitely not marriage material.

> "Because they don't know what they want, they end up chasing nothing. It's the dilemma of the overcrowded buffet. There are too many options so they choose an empty plate… or something they don't even like to begin with."

This statement stinks of psychological projection. She's describing her own view of men, NOT vice versa. A more truthful statement could be obtained by reinstalling the appropriate personal pronouns.

"Because I don't know what I want, so I'll end up chasing nothing. It's the dilemma of the overcrowded buffet. There are too many options so I choose an empty plate… or something I don't even like to begin with." As long as it makes my loins feeel good!

Continuing on.

> "This leaves women making all the moves. We must tell them what they want if we're to get anywhere close to the goals we had for ourselves."

Ahhh… one line of satisfying truth in this whole dirge. Even a broken clock is right twice a day. So what's your move? Griping bile on Elite Daily?

> "But it will never be as we fully imagined because, in our dreams, men weren't timid or scared little boys; in our dreams, men are the ones with the balls to ask us out."

For the continuation of your dream, please go back to sleep in Disneywhorld, or watch Pretty Woman for the 1,359th time.

The next section is entitled, "THEY'RE SCARED OF YOU"

> "They'll never admit it, but you scare the hell out of them."

Yes, you scare the hell out of men!

> "After years of social conditioning, we've been duped into thinking that men are the strong ones; that they are the leaders, the protectors and the fighters; that they are the ones that see what they want and go after it."

Men do not have delusions about who they are. No, you have delusions about yourself, and who men (and other women) are. Come back to reality sometime this year please.

> "Well, TV lied to you. Men aren't these masculine displays of strength and perseverance. They aren't these persistent characters created by Nicholas Sparks and John Green. They aren't going to catch your eye and spend all night convincing you why you should be with them. They aren't Noah Calhouns. They aren't Augustus Waters."

Now we know who she is comparing all men to.

> "Men are shy, timid and scared sh*tless of any woman with half a brain."

That's true, when they're around a ball busting braggart b!tch (with half a brain) who won't shut up and go away.

> "It's said that the male ego is as fragile as a woman's heart and unfortunately for women, men won't take the chance of letting it shatter. While women willingly put themselves out there, men stand back, scared of the tiniest bruise on their overinflated self-image. So yet again, women must be the strong ones. We must put ourselves out there and risk rejection."

What she projects as "ego" is actually a man's sense of God-ordained hierarchy. An egotistical woman who won't submit to the hierarchy is a strong, independent demon from hell. News flash! Men want to avoid perdition.

> "Because if we don't do it, bars will soon be exactly like those middle school dances: boys on one side, girls on the other."

That would actually be a taste of normalcy, and a semblance of innocent love – which you lost after the homecoming prom.

The next section is brandished, "THEY GOT IT FROM THEIR MAMAS".

> "Why are men like this? Well, for years they've been raised by their mamas, the women who told them they were the best thing God created on this earth. For years, they've been given everything on a silver platter — up > until the end of college when they were picking up women who just threw up their jungle juice."

Talking like that makes it obvious, she's sucked too many wieners, and now she's had a belly full.

> "Of course, some mothers have raised great men. This isn't to discredit the generation of mothers before us who raised the myriad of young men we're dealing with today. But for the select few who didn't teach them how to properly court a woman, well, shame on you."

I can't believe she used the word "court" in this essay. If she was interested in courtship, she would be preparing herself for marriage, and not for the dance club.

> "Shame on you for not teaching them how to properly approach a woman. Shame on you for giving them the idea that women must go to them. Shame on you for making them believe all they had to do was stand at a bar and wait for a girl to appear on their arm."

Is she really insulting mothers? Yo Mama! She's just the right kind of caustic @ss hate b!tch you'll want to introduce to Babushka!

The next section is called, "THEY THINK THERE'S ALWAYS SOMEONE BETTER". Yeah, better than YOU!

> "In the society in which we live today, with Gigi Hadid and Miranda Kerr's Instagrams readily accessible, women have got a lot to compete with. Fortunately, we're competing with women these men will never have a shot with. Unfortunately, these men don't seem to know this."

You have it backward. Women are competing against other women for men they will never have a shot with. Of course, men don't know those particular women you're trying to emulate, and we don't really care either. All we know is that you don't stack up to our standard threshold, which isn't really that high these days. That's not the same as men being ignoramuses.

> "We can dream about Channing Tatum and Chris Pine all we want, but at least women are rational enough to understand that's just not gonna happen. So we settle for the options we've been given and learn to work with what we have."

No man any less fine than Brad Pitt or Richard Gere is going to slice her ham! And she says men are entitled!

> "Men, on the other hand, always seem to be waiting for something better. In the age of Facebook and Instagram, there's this constant filtered delusion that a hotter girl sits just an inbox away."

We live in the age of the glorified slut! Swipe right on every profile, and pick through what's left for the evening's entertainment. A girl just as hot as YOU, and with a much better attitude, is not that hard to find.

> "Men also know that if they don't get up the nerve to ask you out, all they have to do is swipe right on Tinder to skip the date and get right to the good stuff."

Exactly! Now you are understanding the situation.

In the next section, she claims, “THEY NEVER GREW UP”. She must be gazing in the mirror.

> “In a sad, but not all that surprising, report by Nickelodeon UK, men are 11 years behind women in maturity. While women reach maturation by 32, men aren’t fully matured until 43. While this study garnered much attention, women everywhere were less than surprised. Didn’t we already know this?”

This is why we often see 43-year-old men dating 32-year-old women – they want to get a piece of that fresh maturation! Jokes aside, of course you know that women want older men, and men want younger women. Got a problem with that? Or are you going to blame the ‘oppressive patriarchy’ for the natural ontology?

> “To add insult to the few dates you have yet to be asked on, men are also getting married less than ever before. According to a study by Pew Research Center, only 26 percent of Generation-Y is married.”

I hate to say it, but Why buy the cow when the milk is free?

> “Compared to the 48 percent of our parents at this age, there’s no denying that men just don’t have their sh*t together.”

48% of Mom’s generation knew how to hook a man and settle into a marriage. Then Dad’s got their shit together under the motivation of daily pussy and the children’s expenses. For your generation of women, men have no such motivation.

> “We’re dating less and thus, marrying less. And the downfall picks up speed with every failed attempt to ask a woman out.”

What you are describing is the typical experience of every single woman passing 30. Stop complaining and get your shit together!

But you’re right! Dating (much less “courtship”) is not at all what it’s jacked up to be. These days, women just aren’t worth the effort, stupid!

The MMP Hack Attack!

Jack · 22 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A humorous analysis of the Marriage Market Place (MMP) from both the male and female perspectives.

Readership: All
Length: 200 words
Reading Time: 1 minute + 2 videos totaling 12 minutes in length.

How does a man determine whether a certain woman is worthy of his attention or not?

What kind of relationship should he expect from any particular woman?

This lecture breaks it down into a simple analysis of “Crazy” vs. “Hot”. This should be included in every (male) Sex Ed course, and required in every high school curriculum.

Nice take. But what about the women’s viewpoint?

Here’s a comical response from Ritz and Triscuit (2014/8/3), who happens to believe she is a unicorn! (The word, Unicorn, in this case, is short-hand jargon for Unique Cornball.) Her argument contains many absurdities and contradictions, but we’ll just accept this as a typical female’s hamsterationale.

As you can see, the male and female perspectives are irretrievably at odds.

…and these are the people contending in the SMP!

Who says God doesn’t have a sense of humor?

Why does an angry photo draw more popularity on social media?

Jack · 29 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I heard somewhere that one's personality is more clearly manifested through anger. So I thought I would experiment with this idea by taking a clear, well lit photo of me with an angry face, exaggerated to the point of approaching farcical. I posted it as my profile photo on Facebook and waited to see what kind of response it would get.

After a few months, I noticed that this photo gathered more "likes" than any other profile photo I have ever had! After noticing this, I crunched the numbers.

- It got 3.73 times more "likes" than the average number of "likes" garnered by all my other profile photos.
- Exactly 69.6% of the "likes" were from single women. No joke!

Some comments from them were,

> "This is such a mean face, haha"
> "That's really funny. LOL Who are you seeing now?"
> "You look different."
> "Your face looks so evil… I like it!"
> "Awesome! You're scaring me!"

I also got a lot more private messages than usual.

I presume women liked this photo because it conveys masculinity, and it evokes an emotional response in them. Needless to say, it's also fun. I had a lot of fun doing this! I'm having fun, and they can feel that emotion. I am naturally a fun-loving guy, and they can feel that aspect of my personality.

In conclusion to this social experiment, I decided that I should make a more concentrated effort on becoming a cold, calculating, hyperCRITICal, sarcASStic, hardcore cynic!

But when I wrote the above conclusion in a comment under the photo, my mother was quick to shoot me down with a discouraging admonition.

> "I don't think so Wayne. Just continue with your humor and methodical life."

Heh…

Since I've become a man, I've learned that getting angry and losing my temper really taps into women's feral hind brains. A little tantrum on my part will suddenly cause women to become agreeable, passive, submissive, respectful, wet, and horny. No threats or violence is necessary. A loud, demanding voice is enough. Even before I can finish my argument, she is peeling her clothes off so that she can hop on my manhood, with enthusiastic tears running down her face, all the while begging me to calm down.

I probably would have learned this effect of anger on women years ago, if not for my mother.

Ever since my marriage blew up, I have grown wise to the effects of women's influence on a man's self-development and social potential, and it's mostly bad!

Sadly, mothers are no exception. Isn't it strange how mothers don't want their sons to be popular men?

Analysis of People on Dating Sites

Jack · 8 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

There seems to be four kinds of people who join dating websites, whom I'll call "Sick Puppies", "Cheaters", "Players", and "Lovers". These archetypes are described as follows.

The "Sick Puppies" (~40%) are people who are genuinely searching for love online, but they have a disadvantage which prevents them from finding love in their day-to-day lives. These disadvantages include things like having a low SMV, being divorced, having children, a chronic illness, a personality disorder, or some other weird hangup. Pursuing higher education and incessant traveling are among the most prevalent hangups for the younger crowd, because they typically interfere with the process of building a relationship with someone. There is also a large percentage of people who are socially dysfunctional in some capacity. These people either seem to be unaware of their disadvantage, or they naively believe their hangup isn't going to affect their chances of finding a good partner. These people get passed over again and again, because others can intuitively sense that their hangup negatively affects their ability to deliver a satisfying love relationship. Instead of doing the hard work of improving their issues, sick puppies often take the easy path of "settling" for an unhealthy relationship with someone who is not right for them. Then they get hurt and become more "sick" – wasting the time of their youth and losing opportunities in the process.

The "Cheaters" (~30%) are people who are already in a relationship, with a majority of these being married. They hide the fact that they are taken, and are discretely looking to cheat for any multitude of reasons. Cheaters who browse profiles and either don't have the courage to cheat, or can not find the opportunity to cheat, are Attention Whores.

The "Players" (~20%) are people who are not genuinely looking for a love relationship, but are only seeking their own self-interests. There are many kinds of self-interests, but the males typically look for sexual encounters, and the females look for a sugar daddy, or a "prince charming" to take them away to a "new life". Many females also hope for sexual encounters, but only with the top 20% of males, who are less likely to look for love online. Very attractive females (SMV > 8) receive hundreds of messages each day, so this relegates them to Player status. One should also be aware of Players having other motivations, such as feeding the ego (AKA "Attention Whores"), obtaining citizenship or social climbing.

The "Lovers" (~10%) are people who are truly ready for a relationship. They have a healthy self-esteem, they are emotionally mature enough to be able to give love to a partner, they are honest with themselves and with others about their hangups, and they are willing to give more of themselves than what they expect to get.

The "Lovers" are the people who are most likely to form solid relationships. However, the few people who are truly ready for a relationship always find somebody within a couple weeks after they become able to love, and are typically unwilling (or unable) to wait any length of time for a person who might fit them better. So, there is a very small window of opportunity that one should watch out for.

Females in the last category who are dissatisfied with the simple "Hi, how are you?" message, should not interpret the short texts as shallowness or carelessness, as though the man has no desire to bond. Women exchange texts to bond, but men bond by doing activities together, like sharing new skills, playing sports or video games, watching movies or going to the gym.

Sorry ladies, but texting is NOT a man's preferred method of building intimacy. Men need communication in conjunction with an activity, so he'd probably rather have you come over and watch a movie with him, instead of maintaining what he sees as an endless, random chat. If a man doesn't text a woman as frequently or enthusiastically as she texts him, it does not mean he has no interest in her. If he sends more than 20 texts to a woman, he is definitely interested in her, and he is politely waiting for the right moment to ask her for a date. If she is overly particular about the timing, content or frequency of his text messages, then he will probably wonder why she gets randomly upset, and conclude that she is “high maintenance”. Thus, he is more likely to undervalue the potential of the relationship.

Love Is NOT what you think it is.

Jack · 18 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Too many people mistake codependent abuse, or sentimental affections (including lust), for love. Too few people go to the trouble to instill proper discipline, or create endearing sentiments for others.

Readership: All

The Frame

Here, I will first expound upon one of my preponderances about love.

Personally, I have come to believe that when someone says that they "love" a certain person, they mean that in a very subjective sense. They do NOT mean to say that they make a point to concentrate on identifying that persons spiritual needs and then go to all the hard work and effort to construct a selfless Christian love towards that person, solely for that persons edification, which is a step beyond merely contributing a benefit. This would truly be love. For benefiting the lives of others is a mark of kindness, which exhibits the excellent will of humanity, while edifying others is the sublime and strenuous work done towards manifesting the grace of God, which is necessary to sanction repentance and foster the processes of healing and maturing in another.

Instead, it would be remarkably closer to the truth to assume that the other person is doing this effort for them, and as a result, they are free to experience the loving gracefulness of God. The recipient of such love would then naturally, however erroneously, vocalize their experience as feeling "love" for the other person. But to express the sentiment of feeling loved as being the same as loving someone belies a naïve and inefficatious misconception.

To illustrate this sentiment based perception of love, let's consider Luke 10:25-37 (NKJV).

> [25] And behold, a certain lawyer stood up and tested Him, saying, "Teacher, what shall I do to inherit eternal life?"
> [26] He said to him, "What is written in the law? What is your reading of it?"
> [27] So he answered and said, " 'You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, with all your soul, with all your strength, and with all your mind,' and 'your neighbor as yourself.' "
> [28] And He said to him, "You have answered rightly; do this and you will live."
> [29] But he, wanting to justify himself, said to Jesus, "And who is my neighbor?"
> [30] Then Jesus answered and said: "A certain man went down from Jerusalem to Jericho, and fell among thieves, who stripped him of his clothing, wounded him, and departed, leaving him half dead. [31] Now by chance a certain priest came down that road. And when he saw him, he passed by on the other side. [32] Likewise a Levite, when he arrived at the place, came and looked, and passed by on the other side. [33] But a certain Samaritan, as he journeyed, came where he was. And when he saw him, he had compassion. [34] So he went to him and bandaged his wounds, pouring on oil and wine; and he set him on his own animal, brought him to an inn, and took care of him. [35] On the next day, when he departed, he took out two denarii, gave them to the innkeeper, and said to him, 'Take care of him; and whatever more you spend, when I come again, I will repay you.' [36] So which of these three do you think was neighbor to him who fell among the thieves?"
> [37] And he said, "He who showed mercy on him."
> Then Jesus said to him, "Go and do likewise."

Using an anecdotal story based on this passage, the sentimental brand of love that is popular today would be like the man who was robbed and beaten saying that he loves the good Samaritan, or even the robber (because Christ told us to "love our enemies"), while in reality, it was the good Samaritan who loved the man who was beaten. In other words, the one who is loved mistakes his forgiveness, or his feelings, respectively, for being authentic love. But this seems to be the common misperception of love these days. Robbers might even believe that they "love" their victims, because they showed enough mercy to “let them live”. How far can the concept of love and mercy be twisted?

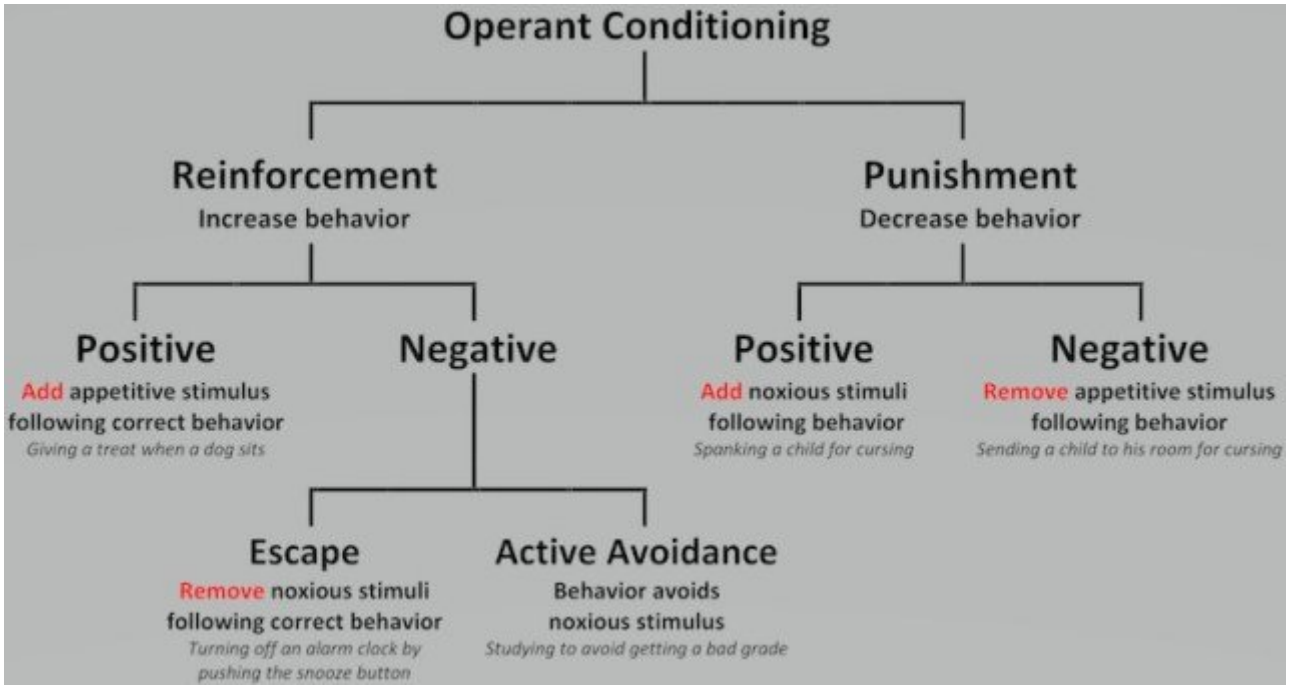
Sadly, there are too few people who recognize that the people in our lives (Jesus called them our “neighbors”) play a major role in the expression of God’s mercy and grace to our lives. Most people would gladly prefer to leave the grace of God to chance and circumstances, while clinging to the lazy excuse of a notion that the grace of God can only be shown through an act of God.

To have a successful, vibrant relationship with another person, both must edify the other on a continual basis, having the tacit understanding that they must trust each other to do so.

The Reframe

Real love doesn’t always produce feelings of fondness and affection in the one being loved. But it’s very important to discern the distinction between authentic love, and “toxic love” (AKA codependent abuse).

For example, some bad behaviors are inherently rewarding, and so the introduction of a harsh consequence (i.e. a negative stimulus in operant conditioning) is the only way to motivate the person to stop their destructive behaviors. Sometimes, discipline is absolutely necessary to produce understanding, respect, and the self-control necessary to build a solid relationship.



This is what the writer of Proverbs was referring to in the following verse.

> "Faithful are the wounds of a friend,
> But the kisses of an enemy are deceitful." ~ Proverbs 27:6 (NKJV)

In other words, not everyone who offends you is your enemy, and not everyone who pleases you is your friend. So if you don't feel those fond emotions swelling up inside you, don't be so quick to write it off as a lack of love.

On the other hand, unfortunately, many people are so broken by a long history of abuse, that they are drawn to continue that cycle of abuse, simply because it makes them "feel loved".

They are confused, and misled. There is a world of a difference between discipline, and abuse. Do not make that mistake.

Conclusions

The cultural zephyrs of the day desire to blind us with blanket truthiness, leading us to believe the following.

- If it feels good, it must be love.
- All offense is hate.
- All discipline is abuse.

But to believe these lies would be the same as condemning powerful expressions of love that are so desperately needed in this age.

Do not fall victim of this slight of hand. Do not become sensitive sluggards in your love. For apathy is the opposite of love, not hate.

A Challenge: Try to identify just one person in your life, who has such an attitude of love towards your relationship, i.e. someone who has disciplined you righteously, and who makes you feel loved. Acknowledge your gratitude to that person today. Go and tell that person, if possible. Thank him or her for loving you.

A Second Challenge: Take what you have learned from that person who loved you, and try to love one other person in a similar manner. Choosing to love a person who respects and admires you would be a wise move.

Profile of an Excellent Leader

Jack · 22 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A description of leadership, and a list of 'must-have' qualities and habits that successful leaders possess.

Readership: Men
Length: 1,000 words
Reading Time: 6 minutes

What is Leadership?

What does it mean to be a leader?

- Leaders inspire change.
- Leaders are courageous.
- Leaders always have time for people.
- Leaders inspire others to adopt goals.
- Leaders gather people together under a common purpose.

People don't have hope, but they need to have hope. Leaders bring hope that lies within a purpose — something that people can sincerely believe, and work patiently for it to come true.

We should ask ourselves, "Is this purpose really true, right, good? Is this what I want to become?"

The purpose is to find meaning in the somewhat imminent future (few months to a few years). This purpose requires some time, effort, and maybe even some $$$ to reach it.

We need a small group of people working together as a team to reach our purposes in life. Part of your choice is in the people you associate with. With the right combination, one can achieve great things.

We all need to feel like we are an important part of something larger than ourselves. (This is why some people join street gangs.) We have a responsibility to ourselves to choose what we want to become and make it happen. To this end, a leader offers a viable and wise course of action.

It is necessary for one to agree and follow the leader of a group, in order to be a part of a group. So we should ask ourselves, “Can I trust this group of people? Can I trust this leader? Can I sincerely believe what they believe?” If trust is not important, then why not join a street gang, just to find hope and purpose in life?

Do I have value? What is my value? Who am I? How do I maximize my self-worth? A leader offers answers to these questions.

Ideally, the whole system is greater than the sum of its parts (i.e. $全 > \Sigma a_i$). For example, a well-functioning corporation uses individual people’s talents and skills working together to produce very complex products. But sometimes, $全 < \Sigma a_i$. For example, a very bad marriage. A good leader attempts to maximize the total value and output of the enterprise.

Leadership Qualities and Habits

1. A leader is creative and resourceful

- Sees beyond the current state of affairs.
- Identifies and applies useful and unique approaches and solutions to problems, even when they are presented from other sources.
- Can be relied on to solve difficult problems independently.

2. A leader is tolerant of ambiguity and change.

- Resilient in finding alternative “Plan B” methods, and implementing them smoothly.
- Deals with unresolved situations, frequent changes, delays or unexpected events calmly and with clear reasoning.
- Maintains a mature, problem-solving approach while dealing with conflicting priorities, interpersonal conflict, positional differences, hostility, hazardous conditions or time demands.

3. A leader possesses self-discipline, credibility, and personal integrity.

- Possesses exceptional qualities of time-management and self-control.
- Uses their knowledge in problem solving, planning and creating change.
- Demonstrates ethical standards, credibility and integrity that exemplify the mission, vision and values of the group.

4. A leader understands the political environment

- Possesses a sharp sense of discernment, which keeps him informed of the socio-political climate.
- Works in a way that is mindful of the political dynamics of state / local government and communities.
- Uses political savvy and influence consistent with the policies and priorities of the group.

5. A leader demonstrates “Systems” thinking.

- Understands that systems of people working in cooperation need a leader to unify them under one purpose and coordinate their interactions to achieve a robust efficiency.
- Understands that organizations are interdependent and that a change to one area of the organization could affect operations in other areas.
- Understands how each piece contributes to the whole, and how the whole can be greater than the sum of its parts ($全 > \Sigma a_i$), and can make adjustments accordingly.

6. A leader thinks in a mature way.

- Leaders take time to look at the details. Leaders can see all the dirt, but they take action to clean.
- Sees behind the scenes to the inner workings.
- Can focus on the most important and crucial elements, and find ways to accomplish these, so that the main enterprise can be fulfilled.
- “Seeing is not believing, believing is seeing!” (This is faith. Generally, “good” leaders have faith in a positive direction, and “bad” leaders have faith in a negative or a selfish direction.)

7. A leader navigates within the organization (“networking”)

- Recognizes the importance of stakeholders, timing, and group dynamic processes in the way they influence decisions.
- Identifies support and resistance.
- Adjusts strategies to fit the organizational climate.
- Has well-developed skills in confrontation and communication, especially concerning the political environment.

8. A leader takes risks.

- Considers abstract risks, such as the cost of opportunity, and the cost of inaction.
- Knows when and how to question and/or challenge the status quo.
- Learns from both successes and failures.

9. A leader recognizes and develops staff potential

- Understands the value of communication and places a high priority on developing professional relationships with staff, labor organizations, coworkers, colleagues and the community.
- Perceives the strengths and weaknesses of individual employees, and ensures that each person is in a place / position where they can shine.
- Makes a personal commitment to career development activities that ensure leadership succession.

10. A leader is realistic.

- Knows limits / boundaries / goals / purposes.
- Is willing to ask for help when necessary, and knows the right person to ask.
- Doesn’t set goals that are past limits. Knows that excellence and perfection is a valuable goal to work towards, but is not really attainable.
- Knows how failures can affect the overall morale of people.

The Moral Application Of Leadership

- Foremost, a leader needs to keep the project on schedule, under budget and directed towards the original goals.
- A leader is responsible for making the group achieve the goals that were set beforehand.
- A leader needs to make decisions for the group, and take responsibility for those decisions.
- A leader needs to assign tasks and arrange divisions of labor.
- A leader needs to distribute responsibilities appropriately and reinforce them.
- A leader needs to keep up the general morale of people. Never fail to appreciate even the most humble employee, or express a heartfelt joy over the successes of even one person.

It's Tough to be White

Jack · 22 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Lately, the war on 'whiteness' has been ramping up. And it's not just in the news media and education. Believe it or not, there are actually a lot of scientific research papers that seek to support the SJW narratives. (It would be revealing to know where their grant funding came from.) I came across this one during a literature review I conducted earlier this year.

Patrick Solomon, John P. Portelli, Beverly-Jean Daniel, and Arlene Campbell, "The discourse of denial: how white teacher candidates construct race, racism and 'white privilege'", Race Ethnicity and Education, Vol. 8, No. 2, July 2005, pp. 147–169.

The Abstract for the paper is quoted as follows. [Emphasis mine.]

> "In this paper we explore the attitudes, beliefs and ideologies of a group of white preservice teachers who are poised to reproduce and transmit the 'racial order' to the next generation of Canadians. These perspectives will be examined within the context of a Canadian national culture that strives for equity, racial diversity and social justice. As teacher educators, our work is informed by the importance of deconstructing whiteness in the academy and society in general. In making whiteness, and more so, white privilege, visible, we hope to interrogate and change the construction of whiteness as an unmarked narrative, invisible category, and white privilege as unearned and unmeritocratic. Therefore, this paper should not be regarded as an attempt to recenter whiteness; rather it is a move to ensure that whiteness is tabled as a viable subject for examination. The failure to examine notions of whiteness facilitates the maintenance of its incorporeal nature thereby reinscribing its dominating power. Or perhaps we could describe our exploration as a strategic focus on whiteness with the aim to challenge and unsettle it, rather than the tendency to use the centering of whiteness as a strategy of denial or protection."

In other words, they are studying 'whiteness' in the hopes of identifying the inconsistencies and weaknesses of the race as an institution in society, such to subject whites to abasement, shame and ridicule.

In the introduction, they explicitly state their goal is to 'deconstruct', 'unsettle', 'white privilege', and I'm sure they shamed a lot of prospective teachers during the interviewing process.

Is this not racist? I feel it is.

What they should really be studying is 'Majority Privilege', and whites happen to be a majority in the U.S. In other countries, certain other races have Majority Privilege, and they're not white. What's more, there is a lot more racism and discrimination going on in countries where whites are not the majority. So why are they focusing on deconstructing 'whiteness' in particular?

If the subject of inquiry were 'Blacks", 'Hispanics", or any other racial minority in the U.S., and the stated goal was to 'challenge and unsettle it', and 'reinscribe the dominant power', would that not be denounced as racist? I believe it would. So what we have here is an example of hypocritical double talk about the Leftist narrative.

> "[1] Judge not, that you be not judged. [2] For with the judgment you pronounce you will be judged, and with the measure you use it will be measured to you. [3] Why do you see the speck that is in your brother's eye, but do not notice the log that is in your own eye? [4] Or how can you say to your brother, 'Let me take the speck out of your eye,' when there is the log in your own eye? [5] You hypocrite, first take the log out of your own eye, and then you will see clearly to take the speck out of your brother's eye." ~ Matthew 7:1-5 (NKJV)

I'm all for the advancement of other races and ethnic groups, especially those which have been historically disadvantaged. But it's not a constructive approach to tear down another group in an attempt to do so.

Unless… you want a cultural war on your hands.

Unless… you want to remove whites from being a demographic majority in the U.S.

That seems to be the next thing on the Globalist agenda.

The Cultural Contrast between the West and Far Eastern Asia

Jack · 9 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

This post compares the fundamental values and norms of Western and far eastern cultures, and examines how they influence the formation and interaction of male-female relationships.

The Contribution of Asian Culture

The majority of Asian societies are patriarchal. One of the most outstanding aspects of a patriarchal society is that people are expected to be respectful towards parents, seniors, and certain other people, especially males, who hold an authoritative position, such as a supervisor, manager, business owner, teacher, professor, community leader or even simply the head of a household.

The Chinese value of filial piety is a good example. Generally, filial piety means to be good to one's parents, to take care of them, to show love, respect and support; to display courtesy; ensure male heirs, uphold fraternity among brothers and eschew rebellion. Children are expected to advise one's parents wisely, support them financially, defend their reputation and sense of moral righteousness, and display sorrow for calamities afflicting the family, such as financial turmoil, sickness and death. Filial piety also entails that one should engage in good conduct, not just towards parents, but also outside the home so as to bring a good name to one's parents and ancestors. It is considered honorable to perform the duties of one's job well, so as to obtain the material means to support one's parents.

Thus, those people, especially women, who grow up in these societies value education and professionalism, and learn to honor and respect others. During their lives they hone these skills to a fine art. This particular aspect of eastern societies does much to set in place many of the other qualities described later.

Perhaps the most significant point about this aspect is that men in general value the respect of a woman, perhaps more than any other non-physical characteristic, so Asian women naturally appear to be leagues ahead of non-Asian women, in terms of their ability to show respect, which is extremely valuable in men's eyes.

Some other important characteristics of Asian cultures are described as follows.

Asians tend to be very emotionally reserved and not outwardly expressive of their deeper thoughts and feelings, unless you personally know them for years, or if they happen to have a personality that is uncommonly out-going. They have a hard protective layer that you have to peel off, step-by-step.

They also have a strong sense of collectivism, so they are very sensitive about the context and implications of any particular idea. People who think or behave in any manner that is ostensibly different from the norm, would typically be either rejected, or labeled as an outsider, by some definition. So, far-eastern Asians absolutely cannot understand individualism as a value.

Also, because of the pressure to conform and cooperate, the majority of Asians tend to be pretentious by Western standards. Hence, people spend more time obsessing over family interests, and since weighty matters are decided by the leading patriarch of the family, the others are free to pursue various interests that are light-weight by comparison, such as health and fitness, and following gossip and fashion trends prevalent in popular media outlets.

In many Asian cultures, females are less valued than males. Thus, females are considered to be a man's property, or subject to a man's control. For this reason, some Asian women who wish to have more freedom in forming their own role in a relationship are attracted to non-Asian men, especially those from Western cultures, and especially those who are white, for the aforementioned reasons. Also for similar reasons, some Western/white men are attracted to those Asian women who appreciate the aforementioned values of their own culture, and who prefer to play a submissive, dependent and receptive role in the relationship.

Asian men are very concerned with finding a partner that their parents will approve of, seeing as how their children would be carrying on the family name. Thus, Asian men are more conscious of, and more likely to conform to, their parents wishes, compared with their female counterparts. Perhaps this is because Asian women are granted less consideration than Asian men in this matter. Many Interracial and Cross-Cultural Relationships (ICCR) fail because of familial involvement in Asia.

Also, because of various factors related to gender roles, cultural experiences, familial expectations and education, the English fluency of a typical Asian woman is very likely to be much greater than that of a typical Asian man. This gives Asian woman even greater latitude in choosing a partner.

The Contribution of Western Culture

The majority of Western societies are matriarchal. One of the most outstanding aspects of a matriarchal society is that people are expected to be considerate towards women, children, seniors, and certain other people who are disabled, handicapped, or somehow disadvantaged in society through no fault of their own. The French concept of chauvinistic Romance, and the English axiom, “Ladies first” are good examples.

The western “empty nest” phenomena is another good example. Parents are expected to allow children some degree of creativity and self expression with the implicit goal of building the child’s confidence and self-esteem. Parents permit children an increasing autonomy as they pass through adolescence, especially in their decision making. In turn, children are expected to attain full emotional and economic independence by their mid-20’s, and therefore become functioning contributors to society in some respect. Here, the focus is on the development of the individual, and not the preservation of the family, which is quite the opposite of Filial Piety in the east. In fact, in the west, it is considered strange for one to be extensively attached to their parents, and shameful for young adults to continue being overly dependent on them.

Thus, those people, including men, who grow up in these societies are confident, independent thinkers, who value love, generosity and compassion, and who learn to consider the needs of others as a prime virtue. These values are repeatedly stressed so much, that many Westerners simply cannot imagine a world without the moral duality of good and bad. This particular aspect of Western societies does much to set in place many of the other qualities described later.

Perhaps the most significant point about this aspect is that women in general value the love of a man, perhaps just as much as the excellence of his personal characteristics, so Western men naturally appear to be leagues ahead of non-Western men, in terms of their ability to show love, which is extremely valuable in women’s eyes.

In the West, the modern feminist movement has encouraged females to think of themselves as being on equal par with men, and to demand the same from their partners. Those conservative men who prefer a traditional marriage find those women who cling to feminist values to be unsuitable as a partner. Such men are not necessarily opposed to the idea of gender equity, but they cannot accept sacrificing what each man holds to be the more positive aspects of traditional masculine and feminine gender roles in order to attain that equity.

Specifically, one of the positive aspects most prolifically held by men is to be a provider and a protector of his family, which is a concept that feminists vehemently reject as it implies (to them) that women are weak and needy. Another reason why conservative men cannot accept equity is because they feel a divided leadership is inefficient and ineffective. Then, if leadership and the associated responsibilities should be concentrated, it seems natural and reasonable for the man to be the leader, whereas, it appears shameful (to them) for a woman to lead a man.

So many of those men are faced with the reality that the choices available to them in the way of a mate are severely reduced, thus driving them to consider other options. To such men, an interracial or cross-cultural relationship can appear very inviting indeed.

The Cultural Differences

In the West, confidence and emotional maturity are important cultural values that are impressed upon people from their youth. In Asia, family values and maintaining relationships with dignity and grace (which is termed “guan chi”), are emphasized.

Generally, Westerners rely on the rule of law to give their lives order and security, so within their social circles, they want to “be real” and “get to the point”. Asians, by comparison, do not trust external powers to execute justice and bring happiness within their family. So they want to construct some kind of social establishment that will create the order and security they need in which to live and breathe. These respective cultural values push Westerners to be more independent, confident and forward-thinking, and groom easterners to be more civic, family-minded and considerate of the social context.

Also, the expectations for marriage are slightly different between eastern and Western cultures. In the West, there is the Judeo-Christian principle that a newly married husband and wife should leave their parents and cleave to each other, forming a new family entity.

So, many young men and women in the U.S. are raised in the idea that once you get married, you are out of your parent’s household, and it’s just you and your spouse putting each other first to build and create your own dynamic. But in the east, the culture dictates that you should put your parents and your whole extended family first, whether you are married or not.

In addition, Asian cultures tend to promote introversion, humility, respect, selflessness… which fosters females that appear quite feminine and attractive through the lens of any culture, but creates males that may come across as “beta”/ submissive to some Westerners. In terms of attraction, Western culture tends to promote alpha males and females that are somewhat independent. Based solely on how the respective values align, it is obvious why Western males and Asian females would be more attracted to each other, than liberated Western females would be to more conservative Asian males.

In the relational dynamics, Asian men would have a very hard time separating from their parents, but this would not be hard for a woman to do, either white or Asian, because they both grew up with the idea that this would be naturally expected from them. However, a Western man would be eager to leave his family and put his wife first, and assume his place as the man of the house.

For women, some eastern women are attracted to the nuclear family model that is popular in the West, but most “liberated” Western women would have a hard time adjusting to the patriarchal philosophy if they were to date a conservative Asian man.

From this viewpoint, these respective characteristics cause Western men and Asian women to appear very attractive to the opposite sex, largely because they are very compatible for each other according to the traditional marriage archetype.

Conclusions

In summary, we see that an Asian woman marrying a Western man holds many satisfactions and joys for both parties. But for a Western woman marrying an Asian man, the expected role for a woman in Asian culture is considerably different, both in society and in the home, than for Westerners, as there is a whole family package and many duties attached. The woman will be expected to not only respect and serve the husband, but also required to love his parents, siblings and extended family. That is a tall order for most women who have grown up in a Western culture that indulges women, but this is the most basic of requirements of a wife in Asian families. Ultimately, the cultural gap is just too big for most Western women to accept a traditional Asian man as a partner.

What self-respecting Western feminist woman would allow herself to become subsumed into the male and family dominated norms of Eastern culture? From their perspective, it is the experience of being treated like a second class citizen, after being raised to be a first!

What loyal, hardworking Asian man could accept marrying a spoiled, self-centered, Western wild-card woman, who expresses discontentment for the living conditions in her native first world culture?

But on the other hand, what Asian woman would not agree to marry a confident, loving, Western man, who was raised in an affluent society?

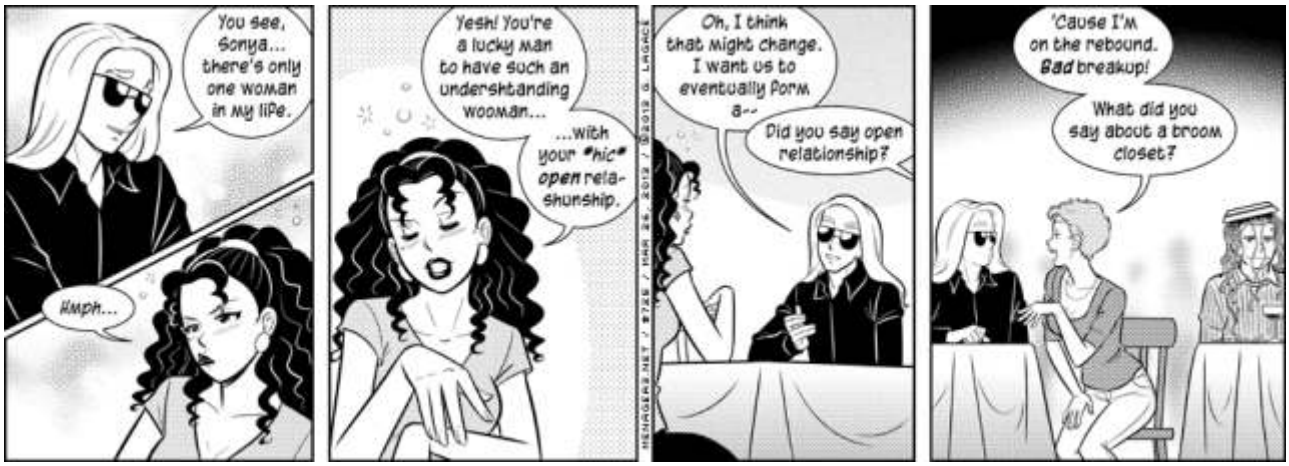
What Western man could despise a thin, demure Asian woman who makes it her life's purpose to support him and their family?

With this is mind, it is then quite natural for Western men and Asian woman to seek a relationship with the other. It is, by far, much easier and more rewarding.

In fact, there are many Western men who have married Asian women, and this number continues to grow over recent years.

A Study of Open Relationships

Jack · 8 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original



Within the past few years, OR's have come to the forefront in social media and blogs, and are depicted as growing in popularity to the point of being commonplace. However, I do not see such a phenomenon occurring within my own social circles. In spite of how popular the media claims OR's to be, those in my circle of acquaintances have only known a very small number of people who will admit to being in open relationships. Being curious about how real people actually feel towards OR's, I talked with many individuals to try and find their feelings about the matter. This post contains the proceeds from honest online discussions I had lately, and I post it here to incite critical thinking and personal reflection on the matter. It is my hope that my readers can think about this in greater detail, understand the causes and reasons behind it, and decide for yourself whether having an open relationship is (or has been) right for you or not, and perhaps offer some helpful advice or alternative choices.

First of all, the definition: An Open Relationship (OR) is a type of relationship in which two people are emotionally and sexually involved, over a period of time long enough to not be considered a short-term-relationship (STR), but they have a mutual agreement that monogamy is not necessary. The corollary to having an OR is that one or both partners is likely to have a similar OR with others, and that the person who agrees to be in an OR is basically agreeing to the partners "infidelity" as far as to say that it is not an infidelity.

For more information about the dynamics of Open Relationships, see this post from the Rational Male.

I have heard the following arguments FOR and AGAINST OR's, and I may add to these lists, if new arguments appear.

The Arguments FOR OR's

1. The most obvious appeal is to have a more casual – and one imagines, a more enjoyable – sex life, and it minimizes the risk of inciting jealousy and anger in your partner(s), or deals with it upfront – or so the theory suggests.
2. One popular argument FOR OR's claims that it makes the relationship stronger. It's as though they are intimately connected with each other, yet, they still have the freedom to sleep with anyone else. So it's like a mutual agreement, which of course requires an exercise in trust and "good-will".
3. An OR is better (i.e. more honest, more direct, more responsible, more mature, less drama, less emotional trauma…) compared to the situation of having multiple partners, trying to hide it, and lying to them all about it.
4. The classic liberal argument – that you don't need to disrupt your enjoyment of life by utilizing your will-power to say no.
5. Best of all, you can celebrate love and sex with everyone you love to sex.

The Arguments AGAINST OR's

1. Some straight talk up front, a lifestyle in which one has multiple partners – who also have multiple partners – obviously has a much greater and more immediate risk of catching and spreading sexually transmitted diseases (STD's). I know nobody likes to hear this, but nevertheless, it would be foolish to ignore it.
2. There is this unpredictable jack-in-the-box aspect of OR's – this aspect of approaching a lifestyle of natural and spontaneous sex, which is arguably what makes it exciting and builds its appeal, but which also makes it risky and potentially treacherous. The catch is that it is difficult to predict whether jealousy will become an issue, and if it does, then how would you deal with it?
3. For many, the idea of "sharing your man" or "sharing your woman" is a genuinely heartbreaking one, and is therefore unacceptable.
4. Some opponents to OR's get turned off by the "swapping-spit" aspect of the interaction. They have the concept that it is not unlike "group sex", except that the participants aren't doing it at the same time, in the same room. However, a small number of people said they actually get turned on by that same idea.
5. The reputation aspect – it might be impressive for a guy to have OR's (which might in some circumstances be classified as a de facto soft harem), but not especially so for females, at least, not in other guy's opinions. It knocks down a womans' MMV pretty severely.

Opinions of People with OR Experience

Amid all my chats and discussions with others on this subject, I only found a small number of people who had actual experience being in an OR. Among these individuals, I asked them to explain their situation, and they all had a similar story. They had a boyfriend or girlfriend that they were pretty happy with, but then something happened that caused their partner to "open up". Those reasons included things like, (1) moving far away from each other, (2) the other person met and started dating someone else, but he/she didn't want to end either relationship, (3) they had a long-standing habit of meeting strangers at bars and clubs, getting drunk and having One Night Stands (ONS), and they found it hard to break this habit.

On a side note, I think it's difficult to call the third reason an open relationship, because ONS are not real relationships. It is tempting to say that people who want to call this an OR simply want to appear more respectable than someone who habitually cheats on their partner, and tries to convince their partner to accept it.

Moreover, I think I could summarize all of the above three situations like this: they didn't want to let go of that person, but on the other hand, that person was not meeting all their needs either, so they ended up in an OR. In short, none of them were exactly happy with their situation, and neither were these individuals really into the OR aspect of their relationship, meaning, they weren't actively looking for other people to have an OR with. Some of them said they were just pretending to agree with it, while secretly harboring a lot of resentment, which I felt was a form of self-deception. Overall, I got the impression that most of these people who have had OR's were naive or "in love", had poor boundaries and chose to conform to what I would describe as a victim mentality. I don't know if that is a result of being in an OR, or if this characteristic is what got them caught up in the OR in the first place.

Opinions of People with no OR Experience, but who want to have an OR Those few people who had never had an OR, but were interested in having an OR appeared to be rather naïve about the whole affair. Some of them said they were not sure, because they didn't know what their friends or parents would think. Or they said they didn't know anyone who is interested in that, or that they were not sure how it would affect their conscience. Some of them did not quite understand the topic, and strayed into fantasy. One such person said that he would also enjoy going to a nude beach or a sex party with some friends, but had no such opportunity. (Ha! I wonder why?)

People against OR's

Most of those I talked to who were cynical about OR's, had a negative image in their minds. They assumed that people who are interested in OR's are people who have the following characteristics:

- They have a low impulse control
- They are physically separated for a long time
- They cannot meet all of their partner's sexual/emotional needs
- They are unwilling to terminate the relationship, due to sexual/emotional needs.
- They cannot attract a high-quality partner who would be perceived worthy of their commitment.
- They cannot seem to live without regular socio-sexual interactions.
- They do not cherish the other person sufficiently to offer a monogamous relationship with that person.

In fact, among the individuals I interviewed who were participating in an open relationship, all of them shared at least four of the above seven traits.

What is the difference between people who can accept OR's and those who cannot?

Judging by the opinions I've received, and the comments I've seen on social media, it appears that there are two camps of people. Some people can accept open relationships, and some cannot. I also noticed that their opinions of the matter are emotionally charged. Some people really want an OR, while others really hate it. I became curious to know what the difference is between these two crowds of folks. So the above question comes up.

Based on my discussions, I would say that those who could accept it are able to have a separate emotional experience concerning either sex or love, whereas, those who could not accept OR's, identify and associate sex and love together. Those people who associated sex and love together, were also likely to see marriage, or at least a committed monogamous long-term-relationship (LTR), as a sacred union of these two aspects of a relationship. Those people who did not associate sex and love together, tended to have had a heartbreaking experience in life, such as coming from a broken family, or having been rejected multiple times in preference of another, and being heartbroken in the process.

Most people acknowledged that sharing the one you love with others is not the optimal relationship. It's better to stick with your partner, and love him/her and only him/her. Yet, in the daily grind of life, we know it is possible to love someone who cannot satisfy you, and some people can fall in love with more than one person, so OR's happen to some people.

I can also imagine that many individuals would seek OR's as a way to obtain social legitimacy and acceptance (i.e. to avoid judgment and rejection) to their de facto lifestyle of having multiple partners. But if you are really just after sex, and the connection/thrill/ tingles/conquest etc. is the thing that you think is most important for you, then by simply stating that as a fact, and putting an OR on the table as an option, you can be little more honest and upfront with others. By doing so, you can retain a bit of respect from that person, and maybe even establish a deeper degree of understanding between you. Also, being honest about it would be a more kindhearted gesture towards those who are still hoping to find true love. Don't break another person's heart just for your moment of pleasure, or to satisfy your daily sexual digestive needs.

Honesty is the best policy.

What is the difference between Open Relationships (OR) and Friends With Benefits (FWB)?

To kick things off in this post, I here offer this postulate.

Σ Frame Axiom 7: The natural interaction defines the relationship structure according to which model it fits best, not what you wish the relationship would become.

So let's consider a few relationships in terms of the nature of the interaction. I've drawn a map, shown below, of several basic relationships in terms of the Reliability versus Investment. The graph shows how OR's fit into the continuum of other relationships, in terms of how much support it can offer you (Security/Reliability), and the size of the chunk it bites out of you (Investment/Impact).

I acknowledge that there are other types of relationships not included in this figure (e.g. arranged marriages, long-distance relationships…), but I think this diagram gives a very good illustration about the nature of the interactions. Finally, I think I should add that, "Not all P, Q, R… relationships are like X, Y, Z…" (NARALT)* [The copyright of this image, and similar images, is retained by the author of this post.]

The vertical dotted line labeled "Out / In", is the cross-over point between a casual relationship (Out) and real, serious commitment (In). It is important to recognize the level of seriousness that both you and your partner hold towards your relationship. If you and your partner cannot agree to be either casual or serious, then the relationship may default to OR status, if it does not dissolve entirely. Serious minded individuals have a real passion in making love, and wish to be responsible with the risks involved. Serious minded people would do well to recognize that not everyone is as passionate as they are. Some people lack a strong passion that would propel them to become mature and responsible sexual partners, and they see sex as merely a pleasure. Therefore, passion is a key ingredient in building and maintaining a successful LTR. Young kids just like to fool around with sex, and may not even use their heart. But if and when the passion kicks in, they will quickly develop a serious mindset, because expressing that passion becomes an integral part of their personality. After that, they are just trying to satisfy their needs, or trying to get you to satisfy their needs.

The mutual openness of heart, and the possibility of genuine love (as opposed to the mere Tingles or pussy fever) is something very important to consider in determining whether your relationship is an OR, or a FWB. A FWB will have very little emotional investment but a high reliability, whereas, an OR will have something that you just can't live without (but you very likely can't live with, either). It's important to know the difference if/when a partner proposes to have an OR or FWB relationship with you.

Justin Timberlake and Mila Kunis star in Friends with Benefits (2011).

As can be seen in the graph, FWB and OR's are on the opposite corners of the graph, meaning, they are fundamentally different in what you give, compared to what you get out of the relationship. FWB is a low cost, highly reliable way to get your pants off, whereas OR's suck the life out of you, and offer little support in return.

The other difference is that OR's have more potential for finding or maintaining love with one of your partners, whereas, FWB is most likely to become a "dead-end" in terms of finding a LTR (and also, because of the frequency and ease of sex, it runs a high risk of becoming a single parent).

The reason that FWB's is unlikely to develop into a serious love relationship, is because of the gap between FWB and the In/Out emotional commitment line. However, I will admit that it is possible for that distance to be reduced under a special cocktail of conditions which include having an equitable SMV, having compatible values and personalities, an increase in maturity and developing a sense of responsibility for the relationship.

The diagonal dotted line labeled "STR / LTR" is the crossover point between Short Term Relationships and Long Term Relationships. STR's are characterized by either Passionate, Careless Flings (PCF) or making Provision for Desperate Cravings (PDC). There is also a third category reserved for horny idiots, which I'll call the Bird-Brained Dumb F*ck (BBDF).

On the other hand, LTR's are typically reserved for relatively more mature, intelligent and emotionally balanced individuals, who are willing and able to give, and graciously open to receive. Mutual reciprocation is a key feature of successful LTR's, which offer benefits worthy of investment, and offer the hope of a more fulfilling relationship that could endure.

I will also venture to point out (and I'm sure I will offend some people here, whoo hoo!), that relationships in the upper-left corner, such as FWB's, are stereotypically populated by selfish and/or immature individuals, whereas relationships in the lower-right corner, namely OR's, are often characterized by people with self-esteem issues, possibly arising from a low SMV or MMV, or having no Game skills. In addition, I would speculate that being in a relationship devoid of commitment would tend to erode a person's self-esteem.

I believe the apparent popularity of OR's is the fact that they fill an area on the above graph which had been empty in the past, much like FWB has done. OR's are considered unstable (low in reliability) because there is, by definition, a huge emphasis on exploring the "options" aspect of the commitment. As other bloggers have pointed out, "more options equals more instability". Besides the fundamental unreliability of existence, in which your partner could easily and permanently be "stolen away" by his/her other fling, there is also a circumstantial unreliability, meaning that there is always the chance that your partner could be busy with someone else at the time of your desire.

One situation of interest is when the reticence towards commitment is only held by one person in an OR, while the other person would prefer to have a monogamous relationship, but is forced to accept the other person's terms and conditions if they wish the relationship to continue at all. In this situation, the relationship is not truly open, because the terms of openness was not a free and mutual agreement by both parties In this situation, the person who is coerced to agree to the arrangement needs to make a decision about whether they can really accept sharing their partner with others, or if they would be better off to terminate the relationship and seek out someone else who shares their desire for monogamy.

Another situation of interest is when the partners know each other, and they are aware that they are having relations with the same partners. Provided that no jealousies ensue, this situation is the conventional doorway from an open relationship, to an Open Sexual Lifestyle (OSL), shown by the box on the far right. OSL's vary widely in terms of social constructs and conditions, but are all similar in that they are characterized by a lifestyle of having multiple partners, and that it leaves a mark on the person's soul, which is shown by the fact that it is often difficult for many of these people to return happily to the larger box on the left.

- The classic ONS, or bar/club/party sex
- Varying classes of Hookups. These commonly utilize internet social networking sites (e.g. Tinder, Craig's List, Ashley Madison), as a vehicle of exposure.
- Then there is a broad category of situations which all have a unique commonality, which I'll call "acquaintance sex" (e.g. Party Pal's, neighbors, coworkers, mailman, plumber, etc., a liaison while on vacation or at a conference, etc.
- The ever-tempting Sex with the Ex (SWTE).
- Coming out of a second marriage, which is more or less the same or even identical to Serial Monogamy (sans legal papers), AKA Marriage 2.0.
- Finally, people of a typically lower SMV who have engaged in "communistic sex" practices within an OSL, such as a socially established polygamy (e.g. a hard or soft harem), co(n)founded hypergamy, prostitution, can "settle for" an OR if deemed necessary or advantageous, or by choice when they are in the right social atmosphere.

* Disclaimer: I am not a sociologist, just a thoughtful, inquisitive person considering the modern state of western society, with it's rapidly changing norms. I only offer the above structural theory as a framework to characterize the basic nature of things, and to launch constructive conversations over the matters.

¡Popcorn Science and the News!

Jack · 15 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Abstract: A seriously humorous monologue on watching the news and eating popcorn.

Readership: All

[Eds. note: You might enjoy eating popcorn while reading this post.]

Real news covers something that affects my life, or my future. But these days, the news does neither. It's obviously just a propaganda outlet for the powers-that-be. So for me, the news is basically mind numbing entertainment, and not much more.

That said, whenever I am watching the news, it's good to have a cold drink and some snacks. I never ate popcorn until I realized that a bag of popcorn costs 30 cents, and a bag of Doritos costs 3 bucks! I can eat ten bags of popcorn for the same price as one bag of Doritos! Popcorn also has a lot less calories!

Move over Doritos! Please pass the popcorn!!!

On the back of the package, Costco's popcorn lists the nutrition information for both the unpopped and popped states. The text at the top says that 2 Tbsp. unpopped corn makes 5.5 cups of popped corn. Using this figure, I calculated the values for popped corn, and listed them in the column to the right of the image.

Based on the information given, popping causes the popcorn to lose saturated fat, carbohydrates, fiber, and iron, and gain calories, total fat, and sodium. I assume saturated fat is converted into another type of fat, adding to the total fat. I can understand how heating would decrease the fiber, and adding salt and oil during cooking might account for the increase in calories and sodium, but I can't figure out how popping would cause it to lose carbs and iron.

This popcorn also contains palm oil (similar to McDonald's fries), which is purportedly very bad for both one's health and the environment. This is something that would affect my life, but you know we'll never see in the news. Could Costco, as well as McDonald's, be involved in the conspiracy to reduce the world population? Shame on you, Costco!

This reminds me of that video of cell phones being used to pop popcorn. I wonder if the news has the same effect on my mind as mobile phones do on popcorn (and maybe my brain too)? Anyway, I'll never see that on the news either!

[Editors note (September 15, 2018): I once had a link to the original video here, but it has been scrubbed off the internet since the original posting. Now a search only pulls up a lot of stupid videos attempting to debunk the original. One of my previous students was an engineer at a telecommunications industry, and he told me in all seriousness that cell phone radiation is a real health hazard. Another conspiracy?]

So the conclusion for all of us health-conscious individuals, is that it is apparently healthier to eat unpopped popcorn.

Considering health and the practical mechanics, instead of a cell phone, I strongly suggest using a hammer on each kernel before ingestion, in order to save dental wear and tear and prevent brain damage.

Or… just pop it like a pill!

This is what watching the news does to a person.

Now that I think of it, from a psychological stance, using a hammer on my flatscreen (for each news reporters face) would save mental wear and tear.

No, I paid money for this set! I'll just turn it off, and write this blog post.

Love Is As Love Does

> inasmuch as you did not do it to one of the least of these, you did not do it to Me.' [46] And these will go away

Notice that Jesus Christ DID NOT say,

> "When I was hungry, you felt sorry for Me. When I was naked, you felt shame for Me. When I was in > prison, you were embarrassed for Me. When I was sick, you were sympathetic for Me."

Showing Love to others out of obedience to God is what you DO, and NOT what you feel.

People often blissfully say that they “love” a person (active voice), when in fact, what they really mean to say is that they “feel loved by” that person (passive voice).

I’ve often tried to tell people that being skillful and successful at making others “feel loved” is a much better and more spiritually powerful position than depending on someone else to make you “feel loved“.

When you have the power to make another person feel loved, then, and only then, you can rightfully claim that you really love that person. That said, it is plainly evident that one cannot create love for another, unless he is (1) well-trained in receiving the Love from God, (2) has accepted the grace to love himself, and (3) knows how to draw boundaries to protect the love in his heart from the brutal onslaught by the thieving and destroying powers of this world.

The Problem with Having a Foreign Boyfriend

Jack · 7 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Some insights on cross-cultural relationships.

Readership: Western expat men in relationships with Asian women.

Some Taiwanese girls have a little dream… "Mom, I wanna marry a foreign boy."

Her mother replies, whispering, "So did I…"

But still, Taiwanese parents always say that their children are crazy for wanting to marry a foreigner!

A young expat in Taiwan says, "I've been going out with my girlfriend for 9 months, and she still hasn't told her parents."

Some Taiwanese girls won't tell their family that they are dating a foreigner because they know their family would not approve, and they are too ashamed of their boyfriend and too afraid of their family to make a stand. But they continue to see their boyfriend anyway because they want a little thrill, and they want to brag to their friends about it. The girls who act this way will probably never marry their foreign boyfriends. When they get tired of him, or when they decide that they want to marry someone, then they will dump him and go find someone else who is more "acceptable" to their family and society.

Another thing is that, in Taiwan, getting married is like marrying the whole family. It is difficult to decide whether you want to marry into her family, if you never get to meet them. The downside is the simple fact that if she won't tell her family about you, there is a good chance that it is because she knows they cannot accept her with a foreigner, and if that is true, then they will probably reject you and try to undermine your relationship with her, should you two decide to stay together anyway.

On the other hand, if a Taiwanese girl does tell her family about her foreign boyfriend, then she is also putting pressure on him to get married soon. But if he doesn't marry her, then in addition to being broken-hearted, she also becomes a disgrace to her family. To make matters worse, her desirability to Taiwanese men in the future is severely reduced, and the stereotype of foreigners being playboys is reinforced.

So, in summary, the stakes are high, and we are risking our very lives and future progeny. Maybe your girlfriend is just waiting for you to make it clear that you want to marry her, or maybe she is just playing around for fun. You won't know which one it is until you try to change the status of your relationship.

This is the trouble for the foreign boyfriends; it is difficult to tell how faithful, reliable, and trustworthy their Taiwanese girlfriends are, whether they have a serious and realistic mind about the relationship, and whether they are actually mature enough to be ready for marriage. The different cultures teach us different expectations for marriage, and very few people find a match in this respect. If you talk to your girlfriend about some of your respective expectations for marriage, it will probably help you determine whether your relationship is worthy of permanency.

So there are some supremely big risks there, which in the end, cause many people to decide not to marry outside their race/culture. But it's better that you know what you're getting into, so that you can think about it clearly and seriously.

Consideration vs. Fatalism

Jack · 16 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

This post addresses the cultural differences between the fatalistic insulation of far-Eastern culture, and the faithful consideration of western culture.

Readership: All

A significant cultural difference is described here by a reader, Anna. She is a Taiwanese female who lived in the U.S. during her adolescent and college years. She writes,

> "Hi, I am not male, but I want to share my experience. When I lived in North America, I got more attention generally and almost all people treated me better, even took care of me because my Asian appearance gave them the image that I was a little girl out of my country without family, so they should give me help. After I came to Taiwan, my parent's country, except my family and very few friends, I lost people's attention because of my Taiwanese appearance. I even felt I had been ignored sometimes. I wouldn't say this is discrimination, because it's just local people treat me as Taiwanese. But in comparison, for sure, I would be disappointed especially my Caucasian fellows got more attention, help and many special treatments. Well now I am still very confused…"
> "I will tell a true story. Once, I felt dizzy on the MRT and almost fainted. No one helped me. I was not able to stand so I got off the MRT and crawled on the platform. No one even bothered to ask if I was alright. That's how Taiwanese treat each other in a big city. When a similar accident happened to my Austrian friend at Taipei 101, people were so nice and helpful, although I was there to take care of her needs."

What Anna is describing is a cultural difference in social norms. In many parts of the U.S. (and probably other areas of what is called western civilization), most people have the belief that every person has the ability to affect the lives of others, and as such, we each have the moral responsibility to make that effect a positive one, rather than a negative one. Thus, those people who are more considerate of the welfare of others are considered to be the 'good people' of society.

In Asia, by contrast, people hold a fatalistic viewpoint of others, meaning that people's lives are largely determined by 'fate', which is usually interpreted to mean 'chance', or the karma of their character. As such, what one person does to/for another does very little to affect the overall quality of their lives. Thus, it is more expedient not to get involved in the problems and miseries of others.

Furthermore, those who are able to keep their lives relatively simple while also achieving at least a moderate degree of success are considered to be the 'good people' in Asian society, as these characteristics are seen to be an indicator of their good karma or character.

> "In October at the 23rd Annual Asian American Mental Health Training Conference, Dr. Tazuko Shibusawa, PhD, LCSW discussed the differences between Western cultural beliefs with those of Asian culture during a plenary session. Dr. Shibusawa pointed out that often cultural beliefs and norms are unspoken and ingrained into our total being, that we often don't even realize that we are holding onto them."
> "Dr. David Mee-Lee, another presenter at the conference, attended Dr. Shibusawa's plenary session created a table of Western and Asian cultures on his Tips & Topics blog, that shows how some beliefs seem to be self-evident truths in Western Culture, but when compared to Asian culture, Asians would label them as an obvious truth."

Western Culture	Asian Culture
Problems can be solved.	Problems may just need to be accepted i.e. Karma, fate.
Problems can be solved by talking about them.	Problems don't have to be verbalized and talked about.
Problems can be solved by fining their cause.	It is ok to leave things unquestioned.
Secrets are dysfunctional and we should be honest and transparent.	Secrets can serve a function.
Emotions should be understood and expressed.	Expressing emotions can be too exposing and unsafe.
Communication style is visible, as in public displays of affection.	Communication style is visible - 'like the air'.
Mind-reading is wrong; verbalizing is necessary and important.	Understanding can come without verbalizing - understanding through the context of the culture, not necessarily verbalizing everything.
Processing and verbalizing are therapeutic.	Digesting things can lead to resolution without having to verbalize all the issues.
Freedom of speech.	Freedom of silence.
Straightforward communication is valued i.e. conflict resolution policies; 'Let's talk this through to resolve'; 'Let's have a heart to heart talk'; 'I' statements.	Indirect communication is valued i.e. a 100 ways to say 'no' without exactly saying 'no' so as to avoid confrontational interactions - 'I'll get back to you on that'; silent non-response; 'I'll think about it'.

Developing Attitudes That Help You Cope

Jack · 5 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The same circumstances may crush one person, hardly concern another, and even be considered an interesting challenge by a third person. What makes the difference? One's attitude! Thus, advice-givers often suggest certain attitudes:

- "have a positive mental attitude"
- "believe in yourself,"
- "look for the best in people,"
- "whatever happens is for the best–it's God's will,"

These ideas may help some people feel better and perhaps do better, if they can figure out how to adopt the suggested attitude. Clearly, a negative attitude–dire expectations, pessimism, distrust, fear, anger, fault-finding–can create problems. A positive, excited, hopeful, confident, enthusiastic person can be a joy to be with (and he/she sells more insurance). The problem is how to get rid of bad attitudes and learn good ones.

Our attitudes influence our behavior and vice versa (Sears, Peplau, Freedman & Taylor, 1988). This is evidenced in many of the following ways.

1. Positive but realistic attitudes about self-help are widely advocated in society.
2. The importance of deciding on your major purpose for living is emphasized.
3. The Golden Rule is advocated.
4. A major form of therapy, Frankl's (1970) Logotherapy, which means "health through meaning."
5. The belief that you can change your behavior, that your problems are solvable by you, leads to better problem solving.
6. The expectation that things will get worse and that you will be helpless only produces anxiety and depression, or a pessimistic attitude.
7. The view that "others should have behaved differently" leads to anger, whereas, determinism leads to tolerance.
8. The submissive person must start to believe she/he has a right to equal treatment in order to effectively demand her/his rights.
9. If we think of ourselves as being the result of several constantly competing parts, we will have more self-understanding.
10. Our attitudes toward the opposite sex, marriage, and sexuality have great impact on our interpersonal relations, sexual preferences, commitment, etc.

Attitude Defined

An attitude is defined as a manner, disposition, or feeling about a person, place, thing, event, or idea. Recognizing the three components of every attitude may be helpful:

1. The behavioral part (your actions with the person or in the situation)
2. The cognitive or knowledge part (what you know, think, or believe about the person or situation)
3. The feeling or evaluative part (what emotions you have towards the person or situation).

Ordinarily, the cognitive aspect of an attitude is much more complex than the feeling aspect, e.g. our positive or negative thoughts about virginity are much more complex than our emotional or behavioral reactions in sexual situations. Perhaps because of it's simplicity, the emotional part of an attitude usually has more influence over our behavior than the complex, ambivalent, and easily overlooked cognitive part has, but each part may affect the other two parts (Sears, Peplau, Freedman & Taylor, 1988).

Any one of the three parts of an attitude may be changed as part of a self-help effort to change the other two parts.

First, changing your behavior may also change the feeling and cognitive part of your attitude. This occurs primarily when you feel personally responsible for your decision to change (not forced or bought off–you had a choice, made it, and could have foreseen the consequences).

Example 1: If you have had to choose–and it's a close call–between two schools or two friends or two boy-girlfriends, afterwards your thoughts and feelings about the chosen one become more positive while the rejected one is seen more negatively.

Example 2: If a poor student decided to study much harder next semester, managed to do so, and got better grades, his/her attitude toward studying would become more positive and his/her attitude towards socializing, TV, etc. would become more negative.

Secondly, changing your cognition or viewpoint may change your feelings and action. Most of the suggestions given below in this method illustrate this approach.

Thirdly, changing the strong emotions you have about something will, of course, change your behavior and your cognition.

Example 3: If a certain kind of sexual activity, say mouth-genital contact, were repulsive to you, but you desensitized (extinguished) this emotion, then your thoughts about this activity would change and so might your actions.

Obviously, there are many ways to change attitudes.

A self-helper needs to have hope. Even when people suffer serious losses (divorce, get cancer, permanently disabled), individuals have all kinds of reactions–sadness, anger, stress, apathy–but under certain conditions a person will strive mightily to regain his/her mastery over the situation (Sears, Peplau, Freedman & Taylor, 1988, pp. 147-152).

Examples of behavioral ways of dealing with the problem

Paraplegics, who take some responsibility for their accident and don't entirely blame others, cope with their paralysis better. How do they take responsibility for their accident? They decide that they had made a choice, and the fact that it is their own choice is what comforts them, and gives them hope, even though the consequences of that choice are unfavorable. The reason for this is because it allows them to continue to feel that they are in control of their life. The crucial issue in the persons psychological well-being is their freedom of choice. People who feel that they were forced into an unfavorable situation against their will, will naturally find it more difficult to retain a sense of self-autonomy.

Examples of cognitive ways of dealing with the problem

Cancer victims, for instance, sometimes learn all they can and vigorously fight the cancer, which can be helpful. People who have been rejected by a lover try to understand what happened; that can help.

Examples of emotional ways of dealing with the problem

Women, who avoid blaming their moral character ("I'm irresponsible, weak, bad…") for their unwanted pregnancies, handle having an abortion better than self-blamers. It is important to believe we can help ourselves… and to prove it by our actions.

This method summarizes several specific methods for changing our attitudes, our expectations, or our views of the situation.

> "The greatest discovery of my generation (about 1900) is that human beings can alter their lives by altering their attitudes of mind. – William James

Purposes

There are many attitudes that may help us feel better about ourselves or others, more in control of our lives, and more accepting of whatever happens to us. Here are some suggestions.

STEP ONE: Accurately assess your attitudes

From self-observation, you realize certain attitudes–you are pessimistic or optimistic, religious or agnostic, extroverted or introverted, careful or impulsive, etc. From others' comments, you may suspect that you have certain traits – tolerant or critical, perfectionistic or sloppy, chauvinist or feeling inferior, etc. From tests or scales, you can get factual information about how your attitudes compare to others.

The most noteworthy areas of our lives in which our attitudes come into play are as follows.

- Concern for others
- Stress and stress tolearance
- Sadness and perfectionism
- Anger and distrust of others
- Internalizing vs. Externalizing causation and responsibility
- The assumed strength of a parent, adult or child
- The meaning of sex to you
- Your self-esteem
- Your use of defense mechanisms

There are hundreds of attitude tests, including…

- Optimism
- Fear of negative evaluation
- Trust
- Altruism
- Self-criticism
- Self-monitoring – the masks we wear

In addition, there are six major areas of our lives, in which our attitude becomes paramount.

1. The meaning of life
2. Optimism
3. Self-efficacy
4. Acceptance of your place in life
5. Crisis intervention attitudes and techniques
6. Faith in religion or science.

When our attitudes (the feelings and cognitive parts) are strong and clear, our behavior is usually in line with the attitude. But it is not uncommon for our behavior to differ from our weak or ambivalent attitude towards an act.

Examples: we smoke or drink in spite of knowing the harm it can do and feeling that smoking or drinking is a nasty habit. We think we agree with the Golden Rule but we don't act that way. We procrastinate in our studies in spite of knowing many reasons to study and feeling good about doing well in school. We act friendly towards people we dislike or think badly of.

This situation where you think one way but act another is called cognitive dissonance. There is a tendency – a psychological pressure – to become cognitively consistent, i.e. to get the three parts in agreement, so we tend to change our thinking to fit our feelings or change our thinking or feelings to fit our behavior, and so on. The point here, however, is that you should not be fooled by these inconsistent attitudes. There are probably many of them. Carefully attend to all three parts of an attitude – thoughts, feelings, and actions. Any of the three may be a problem or in need of strengthening.

To understand our attitudes, we need to explore several areas:

- How strong are my feelings about a person, a belief, a thing, or a situation? Are these emotions changeable and in need of change? Am I prejudiced? Are my emotions irrational?
- How detailed and clear-cut are my thoughts and judgments about this person, thing, or event? Where did these ideas come from? Are my ideas and views reasonable? Am I using stereotypes or over-generalizing? What other information do I need? Are there other ways of looking at the situation?
- How would I like my behavior to be different? Can I change the behavior directly or do I need to change my thinking or feelings first?

This kind of self-exploration will clarify your current attitude about any issue that concerns you and, in fact, may lead to changes rather automatically or, at least, help you plan for changes.

STEP TWO: Find new attitudes that seem useful

New or different attitudes are advocated by many sources. Religions preach certain attitudes, like love one another, respect your parents, everything comes from God, sin is punished, etc. Therapies teach us to like ourselves, take responsibility for our feelings, expect treatment to be effective, etc. Sales managers tell the sales force to think positive, to be enthusiastic, to act as though it is a foregone conclusion that the customer will give a big order, to follow up with service, etc. This book says knowledge is useful, take charge of your life, you can change things, etc. These are all attitudes.

Moral self-direction: Have you found your "place," a satisfying purpose in your life, a way to make your life meaningful? Have you learned the skill of finding or making something meaningful in any situation you face? Which purposes are worth your life? That is, what activities will you spend your life pursuing? If you are seeking the highest possible purpose, Frankl (1970) and Fabry (1988) say you can never know for sure the "ultimate meaning" of life. Like religion, ultimate meaning is a personal belief or a faith, not an established, proven truth that every rational person accepts. You could search for the ultimate meaning forever. You may someday think you have found it, but others will say, "I'm glad you are at peace" and go on their way unfazed by your discovery. Of course, you could be approaching "the truth;" you just can't be certain of it. There is wisdom about purposes and meaning to be had, e.g. in religious sayings, in some laws and customs, and in the writings of great thinkers. But, in the end, each person chooses the purposes of life that are meaningful to him/her (or defaults by accepting someone else's judgments). Today, values and judgments about what has meaning are changing.

There are lots of preachers, politicians, teachers, philosophers, elders, singers, and friends trying to persuade you of what is meaningful. Please note that there are at least two steps involved here.

First, you go searching for the answer, where you consider and compare many purposes of life, such as serving God, doing good for others, being happy, making lots of money, having a good family life, being successful, being content, and others.

Second, after deciding on a goal – in this case an answer to "What is most important?" – you must then focus on the details of how to achieve your goals. We don't just automatically do whatever we decide we should do, right? Surely there are advantages to knowing what your guiding principles are.

But separate from the searching for "ultimate meaning "–an overall purpose or philosophy of life, like the Golden Rule–the logotherapists do an excellent job of helping a person find a "meaning of the moment. " You can almost always find something helpful to do in any situation, something considerate of others. Meaning, in this sense, is everywhere. How do you find special meaning in every situation, even boring or stressful ones? Fabry (1988) suggests these five guideposts for finding meaning wherever you are:

1. How can I discover more about myself? The more you see yourself from different angles and in different settings–and the more honest you are about your feelings–the more meaning you will see in the world around you.
2. Can I think of lots of choices I have in this situation? There are usually many alternatives. The more freedom of choice you have, the more meaning the situation has for you.
3. Can I make a unique contribution in this situation? The more you feel that only you could or would have done what you did, the more meaning you get out of the situation.
4. Can I take some responsibility for improving this situation? Something positive can be done in most situations. The more responsibly you behave, the more meaningful your life will be.
5. How can I help others? How can I take care of others' needs, rather than my own? Self-centeredness–thinking about yourself–lessens the meaningfulness of a situation; altruism–thinking about others–increases it.

These questions are designed to help your conscience decide what to do. A logotherapist focuses on your positive traits, your hopes, your peak experiences, and any other hint as to what would be meaningful to you. The idea is to feel good by finding something meaningful to do. And, meaningful acts, according to Frankl, are not seeking fun, status, money or power. But, how do you convince yourself to adopt these new attitudes? It sounds a little feeble just to say by "self-confrontation".

Optimism: Do you believe that, in general, things will work out pretty well for you in life? Optimism is your explanatory style–your attributions and, even more so, your hopeful expectations of the future. Optimism is good for you! More and more research supports this view (Seligman, 1991, 1995; Scheier & Carver, 1992), but as a society we are becoming more and more pessimistic. Having hope and expecting positive outcomes buffer you from the ravages of psychological distress. You have better mental and physical health. Seligman says success at work requires ability, motivation, and optimism. If you don't believe you can do something, you won't try, no matter how talented you are or how much you hope for success. Underachievers tend to be pessimists, overachievers optimists. Optimism is related to but different from self-esteem, self-efficacy, and being happy. Having a hopeless view contributes to depression. Because women worry and ruminate more about their problems than men (men play basketball or "do yard work" on the weekends), they are twice as depressed as men.

A healthy optimist is not blind; he/she faces facts and problems, avoiding the denial of a pessimist. Also, do not confuse optimism with simply a Pollyanna attitude. Optimists are not always cheerful, everything isn't always "wonderful," although they are more ready and able to see different ways to see and solve a bad situation. When it is needed, they are more likely to change their diets, exercise more, give up drinking, recover from suicidal depression, etc. They see themselves as active agents influencing their futures. And, as change agents, they may tend to become overly optimistic and, in deed, their mental and physical well-being may improve as a result of their unrealistic views of their ability to change things (Taylor, 1989). How do you become a more active optimist? Should you even develop positive illusions? Taylor says yes.

Seligman (1995) recommends raising self-reliant children to protect them from depression and provides parents with many steps for developing an optimistic child. McGinnis (1990) also devotes an entire book to increasing optimism and suggests 13 steps:

1. Face reality, expect bad times, and become a problem-solver
2. Look for the good in bad situations, perhaps there will be a partial solution there
3. Cultivate a faith in your self-control

4. Seek ways to renew your spirit, your energy, and your devotion to a cause
5. Challenge your negative and irrational thoughts
6. Learn to “smell the roses” and appreciate life
7. Use your fantasy to rehearse for future challenges
8. Smile, laugh, and find something to celebrate even in hard times
9. Believe in the awesome power of humans–and you in particular–to solve problems
10. Love many things passionately–nature, art, play, but above all love people
11. Vent your anger but temper it with empathy and tolerance
12. Don’t complain, instead, share good news with others
13. Accept what can’t be changed.

An optimistic attitude is a blessing. However, that doesn’t mean that negative thinking can’t be used to advantage in some situations.

It is inevitable that with optimism being highly praised, there will be critics. Julie Norem (2001) has written a book that says, what should be obvious to thinking people, that negative thinking – anticipating possible pitfalls and problems – can help some people plan and prepare for trouble. This process can reduce some people’s anxiety if they come to (with coping strategies) believe they can cope. Just reviewing over and over imaginary problems and worse-case scenarios (without any idea how to handle them) will not calm most of us nor make us more competent. Negative thinking can, no doubt, be an asset in some situations for certain types of people (maybe all of us); however, the advocates of “defensive pessimism” and critics of optimism are basically using negative thinking to cope better and bolster optimism. There are many different strategies.

You will recognize that positive psychology is encroaching on a stronghold of religion, namely, positive thinking. Norman Vincent Peale helped us think positively about the power of positive thinking. Other televangelists also jumped on the bandwagon, such as Robert Schuller. The problem is this: Religion relies primarily on faith and prayer to give us hope. Mental health professionals say religious optimists imply that all problems are solved quickly, easily, automatically just by simply being religious and expecting miraculous changes (Santrock, Minnett & Campbell, 1994). Science doesn’t immediately accept this assumption. Psychology relies on science and the laws of behavior to discover specific, proven methods of solving problems. Knowledge is a source of power and optimism.

Self-efficacy: Do you see yourself as having a lot of control over what happens in your life? “Believe in yourself” is common advice. Americans are more likely to believe they can control their lives than are people in other cultures. When asked why one person succeeds while another with the same skills and training fails, about 1% of Americans say it is fate or God’s will, while 30% of people in developing countries give this explanation (Sears, Peplau, Freedman & Taylor, 1988, p. 153). What would your answer be? Perhaps this difference between cultures is due to our having more opportunities to do what we want or due to our greater need to blame the poor for their poverty or due to our thinking more of ourselves as individuals having free will or due to different religious views or due to some other factors.

The Internalizer-Externalizer scale clearly measures whether you believe you are in control of what happens in your life or not – your locus of control. It does not measure, perhaps, the degree of control you think you have – your self-efficacy (see below). But it seems unlikely that you would see yourself as an internalizer and responsible for guiding your life and, at the same time, believe you are (and actually be) ineffective in doing so. We are just learning some of the complexities involved in measuring self-confidence and personal power (see Sappington, et al. below).

Bandura (1986) believes that self-efficacy judgments, i.e. one’s belief in his/her ability to effectively control specific events in his/her life, play a role in almost everything we do, think, and feel. Hundreds of research studies support this notion, and hundreds of wonderful children's stories, like The Little Engine that Could, illustrate the importance of a positive attitude. The average person agrees that self-efficacy influences our actions; we would call it confidence or belief in ourselves or a sense of personal power. However, self-efficacy is not used by most researchers as a global concept; it is not a single score applied to all aspects of your life. Self-efficacy is a judgment about your competence in one specific situation. It is easy to see why. To believe you could effectively handle almost any problem situation – e.g. bring peace to the world, replace fossil fuels, educate everyone, solve Russia's problems, and stop a bad habit – would require many phenomenal skills. But some people do see themselves as being an effective change agent in many important areas of living. Others, no doubt, feel ineffective. Still others think they can shine in only a few arenas. As yet, psychology has not adopted psychological tests measuring generalized or specific self-efficacy. Instead, researchers usually ask each subject to judge what specific tasks he/she can do well (and his/her confidence in that judgment) or "How well will you do on this task?"

Self-efficacy involves or is related to four different concepts:

1. Predicting our performance: "I think I can make 5 out of 10 foul shots".
2. Rationally-based ("consider the facts") self-efficacy judgments: "I'm a good shot. I'd rate myself an '8' on a ten point scale" or "I cognitively realize the fact that I'm not good at all shooting foul shots. I probably would make 1 or 2 out of 10 shots."
3. Gut-feeling-based ("don't worry about the actual facts") self-efficacy judgments: "Oh, I love basketball. I'm a good shot, I'll make 8 or 9 out of 10!" or "I feel I'm terrible at this. I emotionally feel I can't make any out of 10."
4. The extended outcome or consequences expected from your performance: "It will impress the hell out of my girlfriend if I sink 6 or 8 out of 10" or "the other players will hate me if I miss this shot."

You can see the difference between prediction 1 (above) based on past performance and prediction 2 based on one's intuitive feelings by realizing that a professional basketball player, averaging 76% of his foul shots, may consider himself a poor free throw shooter and lack faith in his ability to make his next shot, whereas an 8th grader averaging about 40% of his/her shots may think of him/herself as a really good shot and feel pretty cocky about the next shot. Both skill (percentage of shots made) and confidence (self-efficacy) are related to actual performance, but skill, of course, is much more important in the case of shooting baskets. (Naturally, skill and confidence are usually closely related.) Confidence is probably more important than skill in other situations, such as deciding to approach someone for a date.

Most studies have not heretofore distinguished between 2 and 3, but recent work underscores the difference between intellectual-rational assessment and emotional-intuitive judgment about your efficacy.

For instance, Sappington, Richards, Spiers, & Fraser (1988) point out that a person may intellectually know that he/she can not catch cancer or AIDS from a friend but may still feel as if it is contagious.

Our feelings are not rational, but emotions are related to performance.

For example, when patients at a pain clinic intellectually estimated (as in 2 above) their ability to reduce their own pain, it had no relationship to the actual outcome of their self-help efforts to overcome pain. But the patients' gut-feeling estimates (as in 3 above) of their pain-control ability were clearly related (r=.53) to actual results; the higher the feelings of confidence, the greater pain reduction. The same researchers also found that students' Internalizer-Externalizer test scores answered on the basis of emotional, gut-level feelings were related to their Abnormal Psychology test scores, but rationally answered I-E test scores were not. Students who emotionally felt personally in control of their lives did better on the classroom examination.

These results suggest the popular advice of "believe in yourself" should be modified to: "EMOTIONALLY BELIEVE DOWN IN YOUR GUT IN YOUR SELF-CONTROL." Unemotional, intellectual belief in personal control seems less personally helpful in certain situations. However, this research is very new and primitive. We need better measures, better understanding of what is happening, more insight into beliefs in self-control and placebos, etc. Perhaps the instructions to the self-raters in 3 encourages more unbridled optimism and pessimism, which leads to more variable scores and accounts for the higher correlations with performance. Perhaps an emotionally enhanced “faith” or enthusiasm or zeal about our ability to change ourselves or a problem situation helps us conquer problems. Coaches everywhere seem to think so. So, how do you get this highly emotional, zestful, reassuring confidence? Sappington, Richards, Spiers and Fraser (1988) say it must come from an emotional experience, not from logical, factual information. For example, high feelings of confidence might be generated by:

- Watching a person similar to you struggling with a familiar problem, then you get so emotionally involved in his/her efforts to succeed that you feel exhilarated when they master the situation,
- Listening to a person, who has successfully coped with a serious problem, describe his/her techniques, setbacks, traumas, and other emotionally meaningful or moving experiences, and
- Having actual, uplifting experiences that conclusively demonstrate to us that we have more control over ourselves or the situation than we thought we had.

Some psychologists believe that excessive self-confidence could cause problems, not just in terms of appearing arrogant but perhaps by causing failure since you don’t see your limitations and may, thus, overextend yourself. Or an inflated opinion of ourselves may lead us to become poor planners, lax, and prone to backslide or relapse with some bad habit we have recently overcome (Haaga & Stewart, 1992). These consequences seem likely but there is only a little evidence, thus far. Excessive negative thoughts and low self-efficacy are clearly associated with emotional problems and relapsing; excessive over-confidence may sometimes get us in trouble (relapse); moderate confidence in maintaining our desired behavior in spite of full awareness of the risks will rarely cause problems. In short, a combination of realism and confidence seems to work best.

The following discussion and summary of findings (mostly from Bandura, 1986) are based on research using each subject’s single rating of self-efficacy, not both their intellectual and emotional beliefs. People who believe they are efficacious tend to see their successes as resulting from high ability and their failures as resulting from a lack of effort. As mentioned above, an over-estimation of your ability might encourage you to test your limits and maximize the effects of positive expectations. If you can accept some failure and also feel generally confident in your self-help ability, you will feel less stress, take more risks, and try harder and longer to make the changes you desire. The harder you try, the more success you will have. Being successful increases self-efficacy, one then wants to learn more useful skills. Success and confidence alter our goals. Eventually, you can gain self-control and “produce your own future,” according to Bandura. In a similar way, managers-coaches-teachers think employees-athletes-students perform better when leaders expect them to do well, i.e. “I think you can.” This becomes a self-fulfilling prophecy.

Low efficacious people, similar to depressed people, think they lack the ability to help themselves which makes them nervous and further impairs their performance.

Examples: self-doubting students predictably avoid school work, but how much homework is done by highly anxious students is not predictable. Having strong physiological responses while socializing will not tell us if a person will act and feel shy, but self-evaluations of “I’m shy” or “feeling tense is normal” will tell us. Without confidence, most people give up… but some decide to learn some new coping skills. On the other hand, over-confident people are unlikely to feel the need to prepare in advance to meet problems and may, therefore, not do well in spite of having confidence. This complicates matters.

For example, smokers and drinkers who believe they can abstain are actually more successful in doing so, but those who believe they could overcome a relapse are not as successful at abstaining as those who think “one drink leads to a drunk” (Bandura, 1986, p.437; Haaga & Stewart, 1992).

If you are inaccurate and over-estimate or under-estimate your effectiveness in a certain situation, there can be unfortunate consequences, e.g. you might attempt impossible tasks or avoid tasks you could handle. Sometimes, as with a placebo, reality doesn't matter.

Example: if you are taught that relaxing your head muscles prevents tension headaches and are convinced by the experimenter that you are able to relax those muscles effectively (even though you are in fact tensing the muscles), you will have fewer headaches in the future (Holroyd, et al, 1984).

Faith in doctors, pills, therapy, God, witch doctors, and self-help can be powerful forces, usually for the good. Believing we are helpless is just as powerful in the other direction.

Where does this belief in (or doubts about) your self-efficacy come from?

How can self-efficacy be increased? Bandura (1986) cites research suggesting past successes or failures –as judged by us–resulting from our efforts in relevant areas are primarily responsible for our efficacy judgments. (How many free throws have you made out of 10 in the past?) It's not easy to change our self-appraisals. To increase our confidence we need to repeatedly (not once) handle a difficult (not an easy one) situation without working too hard and without outside help. If you have to work much harder than others seem to, you may doubt your abilities. Many people find it so hard to become and stay efficacious that they lose hope, give up personal control, and start depending on others (Langer, 1979).

Bandura contends that feeling efficacious has no consistent relation to feeling good about yourself, e.g. he says a person may feel effective (as a manipulator) but take no pride in such activities or feel incompetent (as an artist, mathematician or tight rope walker) without feeling low self-esteem. While these examples are valid, I still say that success–e.g. being an effective self-helper–in most cases raises our self-esteem as well as our feelings of self-efficacy (see method #1). In order to feel able, in most situations you need to learn to be able.

By seeing or imagining others model successful or unsuccessful responses in specific situations may give us confidence or the jitters. We get the biggest boost in our confidence by watching several persons (not one) similar to us (in traits and ability) successfully conquer a tough challenge by determined effort (not easily nor by virtue of great skill). Watching talented models will get us familiar with the situation and give us some "tips," but such models may intimidate us. Watching failures gives us confidence if we think we can do better (failures may show us what not to do).

Other people could also model for us how to solve problems and accurately form efficacy judgments by talking aloud as they solve problems and compare their effectiveness with others. We could hear how others think, how they assess their ability. This is called cognitive modeling (Meichenbaum & Asarnow, 1979) or coaching.

We can be persuaded by a believable evaluator (perhaps not an uninformed friend), especially via encouraging feedback, that we have the ability to do something. Also, we can be cheered on to try harder (which increases our chances of succeeding). Reading inspiring books can also build our confidence.

However, persuasion has not been, as yet, a powerful means of building self-efficacy; actions seem to speak louder than words. Interestingly, it is probably much easier for negative feedback to undermine our confidence, than for encouragement to build it. Self-doubts lead to not trying or to timid efforts which quickly and easily confirm the negative self-evaluations. It is harder to be successful than to fail.

Persuasion is the approach of the super salesperson or the efficiency expert. They tell us to believe in our sales ability (or in the customers' gullibility). Clearly, the insecure, self-doubting, nervous sales person is easy to turn down (unless he/she is 7 years old and you want to offer encouragement).

Observing how "up tight," tired, or physically upset we are in specific situations probably influences our judgments about our efficacy. The self-doubting speaker probably interprets his/her sweating as a sign he/she is doing poorly rather than as a reaction to a warm room. The depressed person remembers previous failures while confident people remember past successes; this further influences self-efficacy estimates. A good mood and a healthy, comfortable body generate positive expectations.

Many therapies emphasize assuming responsibility for and having control over your own life, a few of these include,

- Reality therapy
- Gestalt therapy
- Existential therapy
- Cognitive-Behavioral therapy
- Rational-Emotive therapy

Several of these therapies add another related concept: choice or "free will." Existentialists say, "You are who you are because you want to be" (Poduska, 1976). The saying is: "No one can make you feel any way," you choose to feel the way you do. You also choose to do whatever you do. Who else is responsible for your actions, feelings, and thoughts as much as you are? Self-help books, like this one, and psychoeducational approaches make the same point: humans can influence their own lives if they know effective methods.

Research evidence piles up suggesting that self-efficacy is related to good health, satisfying relationships, and success (Schwarzer, 1992). What is not clear, yet, is how much obtaining these outcomes in life is responsible for raising your faith in your ability to control your life vs. how much the faith alone should be given credit for producing these outcomes. That is, which comes first the confidence or the accomplishments? Clearly, it works both ways. So, raising your self-efficacy is a good idea, but there have to be accomplishments too. Indeed, if it were easier, you could surely start with the achievements first.

Certain Eastern philosophies teach a very different point of view: you are not responsible for what happens in the world. In fact, you can't do much about it, so accept whatever happens. The oriental sages say you can only control your internal reaction to the external world. Trying to change things is like trying to stop a river with a teaspoon. So, flow with the river. Accepting the inevitable and the laws of nature are parts of the next attitude discussed. Different Eastern philosophies speak of karma, which suggests we receive from the world according to what we give. This can be positive karma: by giving love, we get more love in return; by letting others be free to make choices, we lessen our responsibility for others and increase our own freedom. It can be negative karma: by being unkind and dishonest, we will be disliked; by over-eating and over-drinking, we will shorten our lives. Today, you experience the results of yesterday's acts, but you aren't responsible for controlling what happens.

Acceptance: Do you accept whatever happens or are you being dragged down the path of life kicking and screaming, "This shouldn't be happening!"? A successful and wise person has a habit of challenging Irrational Ideas and impressions of determinism. They focus on trying to accept things as they are, and avoid the "tyranny of the shoulds." This doesn't mean we can't change things. It means trying our best to change things and then accepting whatever we can't change. It means accepting our selves and finding our own fulfilling life (Kopp, 1991). Several other viewpoints emphasize acceptance of others: Carl Rogers (1961) recommended unconditional positive regard, in which we respect every human being regardless of what he/she may have done. This is similar to Buber's "I and Thou" relationships in which people revere one another. In the case of empathy, the focus is on understanding, not judging, the other person. Any personality theory or insight method which increases our understanding of others also increases our acceptance. Most major religions cover the proper attitude to have in an assessment of the common conundrums of life.

> Christ: Love the sinner, condemn the sin.
> Buddha: Love the sinner, realize sinning is a part of life.

Blaming others for who they are, without recognizing who they may become, is short-sighted.

Folk wisdom (Fleming, 1988) tells us that understanding and forgiving others who have hurt us are two major steps towards a healthy life. Miller (1995), drawing on Buddhist, Jewish, and Christian writings, encourages us to accept life as it unfolds and resist asking for more "goodies." Seek contentment with life through compassion with others (practice it rather than being critical or suspicious), attention to the nice and wondrous things happening at the moment (rather than on past regrets and future worries), and gratitude for all the things in life that we take for granted.

> "Every meal is really a communion." – An old Quaker notion

Also, remember that many skills, such as tennis or public speaking, are performed better if you can relax and "just let it flow." That is self-acceptance, mistakes and all.

Attitudes that help us cope with crises

Do you have the stability and internal strength to weather crises? Can you see some potential good in almost any bad situation? Well adjusted, secure, self-actualized people handle crises without depression or bitterness. Such people may, in fact, become more sensitive and caring, less vindictive, and wiser, while others are crippled by the same crisis. How do they do this? They seem to have a "center" core of calm, optimism, personal faith, and tolerance that helps them weather emotional storms. There is also the concept of "centering" which (a) involves finding the middle ground between opposites so one can have a balanced, clear view of an issue, (b) removing yourself from stresses so you can find peace, as in meditation, and (c) building a solid center of self-esteem so one is not self-critical or buffeted by contradictory reactions from others. By withdrawing into our "center," we can "settle down" and avoid many destructive emotions.

There are several attitudes that help people cope with crises and problems:

1. The "so what if" technique. If you are worried about something bad happening, ask yourself, "So what, if this happens?" Many people create their own anxieties, e.g. "What if I make a fool of myself?," "What if they get mad at me?," or "What if he/she left me?" These "what if…" questions imply a terrible outcome, but realistically it may not be so bad. So, to reduce some of the worries, ask yourself two questions (Lazarus, 1971):

- How big an "if" is in "what if"? How likely is this event I'm worrying about? How often have you worried about things that never happened?
- So what if (this awful thing) actually happens? Would it be so terrible? Could some good come of it? Do others see it differently?

If the event is unlikely, minor, or something you can't prepare for, then stop worrying!

If the event is likely, major, and something you can prepare for, figure out the best way to handle it, make preparations (like role playing), and then forget it. Don't waste time worrying. Some people feel better by asking themselves, "What is the worst that could happen?" and telling themselves "I could handle it" or "it could be worse, I could be handicapped."

2. Time projection (Lazarus, 1971). If you are depressed by oppressing circumstances, ask yourself, "What will I be doing in 1…5…10…20 years?" and "What are some of the good things that could happen?" Be optimistic. The future offers so many opportunities that looking into the future is an effective antidote to gloom.

If you are lost or unmotivated and just marking time today, ask yourself, "What do I want to be doing 30…20…10…5 years from now?" Once the long-range goals are set, then tell yourself, "if my dream is going to come true, I will have to make progress towards those goals every day." Make up a daily schedule and get moving! Reality therapy takes this approach.

3. Lowering expectations. Some people are unhappy because they had hoped for too much. They could feel better by being satisfied with less, by lowering their goals. Make your goals reasonable and achievable. Base them on your past performance–maybe a little higher and gradually increasing. Give up impossible dreams.

Examples: If you want all A's but make C's, try for a B or two next semester (and increase your study hours, study with a good student, improve your study skills, and so on). If you are working hard but making low C's in chemistry, give up the goal of becoming a doctor.

Caution: It may be hard to find the middle ground between having frustratingly high goals and not expecting enough of yourself. Lowering your expectations may become a way of excusing oneself or of avoiding hard work, "Oh, I didn't expect (wasn't trying) to win." Having high ambitions motivates us. Having high but barely attainable goals and doing your very best are unavoidably demanding and stressful. But, how else can you fulfill your potential? However, perhaps the solution to this dilemma is to have highly inspiring dreams but at the same time be tolerant of the inevitable occasional failure. Shoot for the moon, but expect some falls.

4. "I can think clearly and creatively. " We may be able to learn new attitudes and techniques that enable us to be more creative, more innovative, more original – to go further in our thinking than most people go (Adams, 1986; Schank & Childers, 1988). In straight thinking and common sense (method #8 above), we can learn some pitfalls to avoid; D'Zurilla (1986) recommends therapists adopt a problem-solving approach.

In the last 10 years, educational specialists have tried to teach thinking skills in school via asking probing, challenging questions, group discussions, enhancing listening, attending and categorizing skills, teaching problem-solving and decision-making, and so on. We have to feel responsible and able to think before we take problem solving seriously; otherwise, we let authorities, writers, friends, and others think for us. This is an important attitude to bolster our independence.

Faith: in a religion, in priests and healers, in science, in spirits, in others, in ourself, in drugs, in treatment and so on. Beliefs in sources of help, such as science or religion, have a powerful influence on our lives. Over 90% of Americans believe in some kind of higher power, a superior being or force. Awesome powers and consequences are thought to be involved: God answering each person's prayers, determining everything that has ever happened or ever will happen, arranging for ever-lasting life in heaven or through reincarnation, providing an intimate, personal relationship with the supreme being, and so on. In addition, many people all over the earth (and since prerecorded times) depend on God or spirits to heal physical diseases, to bring good weather, to provide necessities, and to relieve mental suffering. Examples: faith-healers like Oral Roberts, witch-doctors in Africa, medicine men among the Indians, Buddhist devotion to ancestral spirits, and shaman in primitive tribes.

Keep in mind that 75% of the people on earth today have no access to modern, scientifically based medicine, or to psychotherapy or psychological self-help. For that 75%, spiritual help and community-family support is all that is available. Even after modern medicine and psychotherapy are make available, it takes a generation or two for a culture to give up the old beliefs and accept the new.

For example, 90% of Native Americans felt helped by going to the tribe's shaman but only 40% felt helped by mental health counselors (Cordes, 1985). Having faith in your source of help is a critical factor in determining it's effectiveness, especially in religious and psychological treatment (Frank, 1974). In fact, in some instances, the power of your own belief system – the "suggestion or placebo effect" – may be much greater than the drug, faith healer, religion, therapy, or self-help method you may use. In addition, belief in culturally accepted healing methods – religious or scientific – is often powerfully reinforced by a caring community and by a supportive family. There are many reasons why the things we believe in actually work for us. Knowing the truth, however, about what really works and why should help us in the long run.

Also very importantly, becoming more "in tune with" a protective, caring, loving, omnipotent God is surely spiritually and emotionally uplifting. With religion, life definitely has some special meaning; you become significant. What could be more reassuring and comforting than to be approved of and loved by God? Many people who are lonely, depressed, anxious, self-critical, purposeless, and lost would be well advised to investigate the benefits they might get from a carefully selected and loving religious group. There are thousands of books attempting to persuade people to become religious and depend on God. Norman Vincent Peale would be an example. Many studies, however, have found little or no relationship overall between religiosity and honesty, helping others, obeying the law, or psychological adjustment. Yet, George Gallup & Jones (1992) say that the most committed 13% of the believers are the happiest, most tolerant, and ethical (compared to the less committed). Likewise, among only the more active religious youth, there is some suggestion of less delinquency (Cochran, 1989) and greater closeness with their parents. On the other hand, the highly religious seem to be more guilt prone (Richards, 1991). Some people become "addicted" to their religious beliefs. Father Leo Booth (1992) helps people escape from religious addiction. And, Winell (1994) helps former fundamentalists with their guilt, fear, anger and other losses. The benefits of religion seem to be limited primarily to the most devout, but the most devout are also the most susceptible to becoming addicted or obsessed.

Another viewpoint is held by certain Humanists who contend that religious involvement frequently distracts us from helping others in need. For instance, some churches are much more interested in "saving souls" than in "helping the poor." Some would rather build an expensive church than feed the poor. Fundamentalists sometimes believe everything is God's will; thus, all you have to do is believe in God and pray, then the world will be as it should be. Other churches agree with the Humanists, emphasizing that we each must love one another and take responsibility for making things better.

It is firmly believed by almost all caring, giving people (whether religious or not) that helping others helps you feel good too. To this end, it is very important for you to find meaning in life, which may or may not involve religion. James Fowler (1981) says all religious faith develops in seven stages (like Kohlberg's stages of moral development) and involves making meaning out of our lives, starting with the primitive belief that "if I am good, God will be good to me," through youthful acceptance of "hand-me-down beliefs," on to maturely accepting "responsibility for deciding what is meaningful," and, finally, on to "feeling at one with God and everyone, and acting accordingly." You may want to read more about faith in order to strengthen or challenge your own beliefs.

STEP THREE: Establish the desired attitude cognitively, emotionally, and behaviorally

As stated in the general idea above, there is a cognitive, an emotional, and a behavioral component to every attitude, just as there are five parts to every problem. Therefore, if you think you want to adopt a new, more helpful attitude, you need to do the following.

1. Be sure you really believe and accept the attitude.
2. Modify your feelings so they are in keeping with the desired attitude.
3. Start behaving in ways consistent with that attitude.

Examples: If you don't live your values, they aren't really your values. If you think you want to be a people helper but don't eagerly seek out the needed knowledge and don't feel positive about the hard work involved in acquiring information about helping, your attitude towards people-helping isn't consistent; you aren't wholeheartedly committed to being a people helper. In short, cognitive attitudes or ideals must be scheduled and acted out routinely. Moreover, the thoughts and actions must be associated with positive feelings.

Suppose you have been a perfectionist and have decided to lower your expectations because you have often been upset by failing to meet your impossibly high goals. Let's say you have cognitively set lower goals and accepted the reasoning for doing so. You can also change your behavior by becoming less driven, less obsessed, and able to attend to other activities. But whenever you fail to reach the very high, perfectionistic standards you have sought for many years (but recently decided to change), you may still get anxious, self-derogatory, and depressed. Thus, the emotional component is not yet in line with the cognitive and behavioral aspect of the attitude. Perhaps you could desensitize yourself to these "failures" (that are a part of your new rationally set lower goals); you might even need to plan to have several such "failures" in order to learn to tolerate the new standards.

Another example: Beginning students in psychology wanting, cognitively, to become understanding and tolerant of all potential clients frequently continue to respond with strong negative or fearful emotions to psychotics, criminals, abusers, homosexuals, and so on. These are our clients. Every psychologist must conquer these critical emotions.

Therapists-in-training can use desensitization, expose themselves so long to such clients that they are no longer bothered, talk themselves out of having such emotional responses, and/or become so knowledgeable about such people (and all other types) that they "understand and accept" such clients. This is the mark of a learned person; however, in no way should such an attitude imply approval of the awful actions committed by the violent criminal.

Some additional ideas about how to change your own attitudes: once you have decided on what attitude will work best for you, mentally rehearse thinking, feeling and acting that way until you can adopt that attitude in real life. If you think your situation is awful, try to imagine a worse-case scenario, e.g. suppose you haven't just lost a sale but lost your lover or your sight or your child, or reframe the situation, e.g. rather than wanting to get drunk to escape being upset, try to figure out how you could act more constructively. Remember too that you can change your self-talk: "I-can-handle-it" talk is a lot more productive than "I-don't-know-what-to-do" talk. Encouraging sayings can help, such as "I will try for what I want; I will want what I get," "every crisis presents an opportunity," "every experience, even failure, teaches me something," "if what I'm doing isn't working, I'll try something else," "positive thinking gets me further than negative thinking," "everything passes," "the situation bothered me but it's behind me now," "maybe something good will come out of this mess," etc.

Time Involved

Most of the attitudes mentioned in this section would require considerable time to learn, if you were starting with a negative attitude. One doesn't develop a new philosophy of life or a broad belief in self-efficacy or an acceptance of others quickly. But, fortunately, most people already have many positive, helpful attitudes.

Common Problems

Each attitude would have its own problems, i.e. different obstacles to the adoption of that attitude. For instance, many people are conditioned to have negative reactions, even by age 18 or 20, to racial groups, to mental illness, to obese and unattractive people, to old people, to violent criminals, etc. As a result, the development of tolerant, understanding attitudes towards these people is very difficult. To this end, it is helpful to get a lot of experience with the type of person you don't understand or don't like.

Examples: If you feel negatively towards welfare mothers, get to know several intimately and find how they got in that situation. If homosexuality is disgusting to you, make friends with many gays and lesbians; empathize with their needs for love.

Effectiveness, Advantages and Dangers

Very little is known scientifically about how to change your own attitudes or about the effects of doing so. There is a great deal of clinical and practical knowledge about these matters, however. "Love one another" is an old idea (but most can't do it yet). Quite a bit is known about persuading others, mostly from sales. Most of the attitudes mentioned above sound beneficial and have been advocated by outstanding philosophers, therapists, and wise people. But, the ramifications of broad general attitudes, such as "I'm in control of my life" or "tolerance of others," are so vast that the precise measurement necessary for science has not yet been done. The limited research findings (primarily about self-efficacy) are theory-oriented, proving only that thinking you are effective is associated with being effective. Research findings are not very practical thus far in terms of actually showing us how to build self-efficacy and gain control of our lives. The research will probably become more personally useful in the next 10 to 20 years.

There are no known dangers but some are conceivable: beliefs in self-efficacy may exaggerate how much control you actually have and could lead to an unrealistic sense of self-responsibility; a demanding philosophy of life may increase stress and guilt; an accepting attitude based on determinism may reduce your zeal to wipe out injustice and so on. These risks seem small relative to the gains some of these attitudes might yield.

The Art of Inventing Hot Media Topics, and Then Trivializing Them

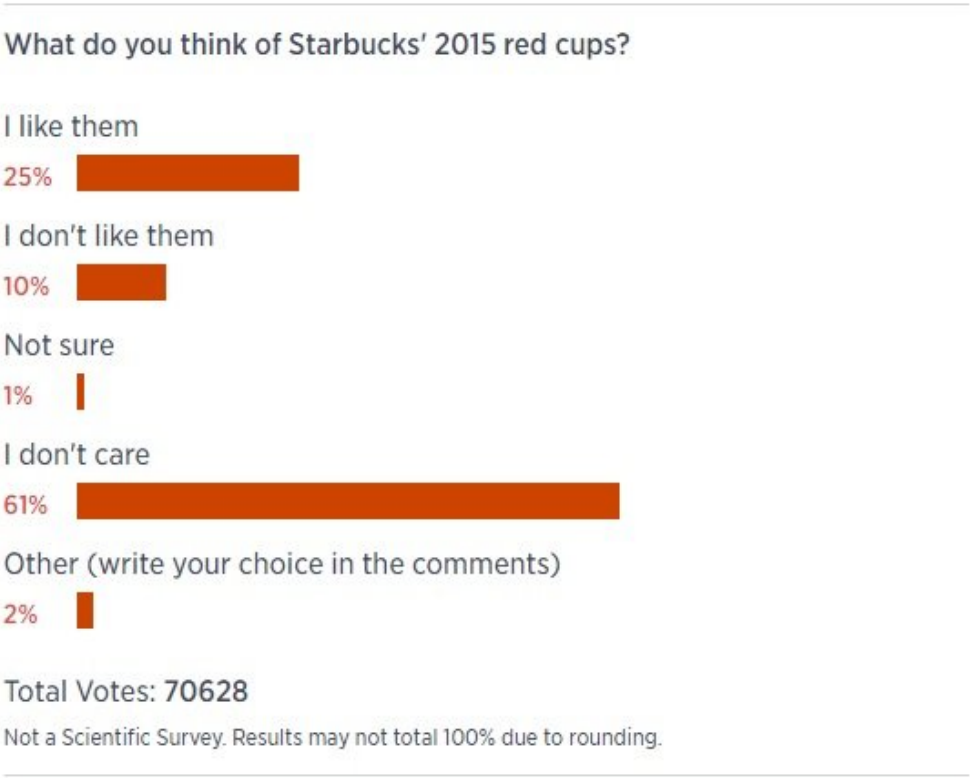
In this article, we take a look at how the media uses TV and social media on the internet to influence people's attitudes, values and thinking habits, while the average viewer is only aware of staying informed and being entertained. My point is just for people to be aware that there is no such thing as an unbiased media source. So you should be on guard whenever you turn on your media device.

Over the last few days (November 9-12, 2015), there's been a huge buzz in the news over the fact that the new coffee cups at Starbucks don't have any inference to the Christmas Holiday, which is still six weeks from now. A little early, don't you think? It's customary to finish the Thanksgiving holiday first, before thinking about Christmas. So why is the news positing this question, instead of asking why Starbucks skipped Thanksgiving?

One news article entitled, "Starbucks Accused Of 'War On Christmas' With Cup Design", has the headline, "Some Christians are outraged that Starbucks' latest holiday cup features a plain red design instead of explicit references to Christmas".

The wording in this headline is pretty slick. The news throws the first punch by accusing the Christian community (implied) of accusing Starbucks of staging a 'war on Christmas'. Just in this one headline, they have incited a battle, staged the battlefield, and have determined the outcome. After the news had become old news, the reality looks like this.



The results of the above poll show that only 10% of those polled dislike the cup design. Could it be that the 10% slice are all those monastic conspiracy-theorist Christians which the news is referring to as being angry over the cup? The comments I saw from most Christians infers a very different viewpoint on the subject. Comments follow.

> "Well, I'm a Christian, and personally, I don't really care about the cup. Rather, I'm outraged that the news is spoiling the mood of my Thanksgiving holiday with this faux story about Christians being up in arms over a > stupid cup."

> "When following Jesus is about protesting the absence of a shitty Christmas design on my disposable coffee cup, I know I've reached sainthood and you can basically elect me as the Pope like immediately."
> "That seems to agree with the way I know Starbucks, and it doesn't surprise me at all that they would try to leave Christ out of Christmas… and no, it doesn't offend me one bit, because I am used to seeing this kind of thing."
> "You know you can't trust the news since Cronkite retired (1981). I have several questions about the validity of the claims made by this report."
> "It's all BS propaganda in the name of a 'news story'. True Christians don't give a rip about this…"
> "Thanks for explaining that. Most people don't even have their eyes open when they get their coffee!"

Judging by the nature of the comments coming from Christians, I proffer to say that in fact, there is no real controversy arising from "deeply offended" Christians in society – only the one that the news media invented in their stories.

Another article, "Starbucks' plain red holiday cups stir up controversy", plays up the story with a staged interview between a hot, young, blonde, CNN correspondent (Harlow) and the alpha, smug, Starbucks CEO (Schultz), in which you can virtually feel his Game on her Tingles. Further down the same page, it tells a story about a Christian ex-Pastor (Feuerstein), who is so enraged by the coffee cup design that he posts videos encouraging people to peacefully protest, which CNN then labels as a "prank" on Starbucks.

The not-so-obvious slur is how the media portrays the anti-Christian stance as being "high-class", culturally glorified and sexually virile, while the Christians are shown as being "low-class", easily offended by imagined impressions, physically unkempt, and apparently "crazy" about their social activities. Judging from my own experiences in life, the reality is more like the other way around.

Then a couple days later, after this news got around, the next headline was about all the talk. "Starbucks holiday red cup brews controversy on social media". Here, the media is basically saying, "Look at us! We got a reaction! So our claims must have some truth to them!" Again, there is no real controversy over the coffee cup. This second take has the comprehensive effect of tamping down all the reasonable discussion, by dismissing it as spurious, if not irrational.

Then, as if that were not enough, there came more headlines about similar "controversies", like this one, "Oh joy! Another holiday cup controversy". This really gets people to the point that they are tired of the subject, and so begin to despise it all, including the indirect target, Christians, who supposedly started all this "controversy".

Unfortunately, few people really understand why they're seeing such stories in the news. The agenda of the liberal news media is not only to promulgate the "New World" philosophies and values, but also (get this now) to saturate people's minds with quaint spins (i.e. coffee cups) of genuinely controversial issues (i.e. their subtle war on Christianity), so as to make people become tired and bored with the issues. Thus, the general populace becomes "dumbed-down", and they lose any motivation to actually take any action to improve anything worthy of attention.

In this case with the coffee cup, remember, their goal is to gradually remove anything reminiscent of Jesus from the public eye, and make His name a byword. So here, they imply that some commonly held association with Christianity has been removed from society, which champions the idea, and then publicize a story making fun of (perhaps imaginary) Christian people who "complain" about its removal, thus silencing any opposition by trivializing the issue. By doing so, they set up an atmosphere in which anyone who might continue to complain after this, would easily be cast as a boorish lout, and that is exactly how the media wants to label Christians.

In terms of logic and argumentation, I think this would be a combination between a straw man and an ad hominem. There might exist a better term that would include the politically more nuanced aspects of mass psychological control. Please leave a comment if you are in the know.

This is the reason why I haven't watched TV as a daily habit since 1998, and every time I do watch TV, my cynical opinion of it gets reinforced even more.

Book Review: “Catcher in the Rye” (3.5 Stars)

Jack · 22 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I just finished reading “Catcher in the Rye”, by J. D. Salinger. I wanted to read this book because I read that a lot of high profile murderers were found in possession of the book, and in some cases, they were carrying it on their person at the time of the crime. I wondered what this book had to do with the minds of psychopaths.

I found the book to be pretty dry reading – a wandering plot, nothing exciting, and a lot of expletives and New York slang, which I feel, added nothing to the story. The main character, Holden Caulfield, is lazy, shifty, and unmotivated. He rejected all promising opportunities that came his way. So, he could be construed to be a typecast of a person who is allergic to success. The ending was totally anticlimactic, but yet, there were some things of value that came out in the last chapter.

1. Of note, it became apparent that the main character’s problems and continual frustrations were rooted in certain personal qualities of his that were manifested in his habits. Those qualities that I could identify from the reading were a lack of self-esteem, lack of social boundaries with his roommates in college, lack of a life purpose, a general carelessness concerning resources and opportunities while never having to experience genuine neediness, and probably several others that I did not catch upon an initial perusal. These qualities would best be described as a lingering immaturity, or even a very ignorant sort of denial, of which he remained continually incognizant. It might even be described as a psychosis.
2. Also, there is the fact that he had not yet developed a mature world view, which recognizes that other people’s behaviors are caused by some reasons or motivations, and that these behaviors are not just some random, wanton, or inconsiderate acts. Examples include expressions of hope or faith, or some other mythical identity adopted for the purpose of communicative self-expression (which he calls “phony”), social games of love and desire (which he never detects), self-defense (which he rejects as rude and selfish), self-esteem (which he interprets as arrogance), efficiency of time (which he assumes is apathetic disdain), controlling one’s social investment (which makes him feel suspicious), and probably many others…
3. Moreover, he fails to recognize the reason why people always treated him poorly. It is because he was past college age, but was still unaware of his own state of immaturity and the associated social ignorance he displayed.

So these three factors compounded and perpetuated his miserable and inefficacious state of existence, leading to a cycle of immaturity. According to other books I have read, this is a stronghold – the condition of being unable to escape from a paradigm of evil or negativity.

On this topic, I would like to tell my readers some things that I have learned on my own; things that counteract a situation which perpetuates a stronghold of emotional detachment and immaturity such as the one experienced by the main character of this book. Those things are discipline, purpose, self-awareness, a crisis, social interaction with many different types of people, a sense of security, hopefulness, a strong desire for something in life, commitment to a cause, limited opportunities and resources… All these things collectively create a crucible of refinement for a person’s character. Furthermore, I want to point out that there are certain endeavors that contain many of these facets and thus help form a mature character, and these include getting married and having children, making a commitment to a competitive sports league, community service, military service, earning a degree, starting a business or embarking on some kind of professional career. Most normal people do any of these things over the course of a lifetime.

Moreover, my impression of this book is that even though it is a rather dry read, it does have literary value because of its anecdotal portrayal of the specific thinking habits manifested in the typical experience of one caught in a cyclic trap of immaturity, which obviously serves as a bad example to be avoided. The weakness of the book is how the inherent causes and effects of the main character’s immaturity and his unfulfilling life without compunction, are not explicitly stated in words that the reader could at once grab and absorb. Nevertheless, there are several lines worthy of quotation.

So why does this book appeal to killers? I take it that psychopaths can readily identify with Caulfield's emotionally detached view of the world. He thinks he cares immensely for others, and that no one else cares as much as he does. A few people in the book reach out to him, but his responses show that he doesn't value their attentions, and sometimes even sees the social interaction with them as dreary or burdensome. So in fact, he is cynical and cold hearted. Other people can see this about him, but he cannot see this about himself. I would presume that Caulfield fleshes out the feelings that many psychopaths have about the world, thus creating an outlet of expression for them. However, I fail to understand the implicit psychological correlation with the action of murder.

Neuroscientist Explains What Fasting Does to Your Brain

Introduction

Below is a TEDx talk given by Mark Mattson, the current Chief of the Laboratory of Neuroscience at the National Institute on Aging. He is also a professor of Neuroscience at The Johns Hopkins University, and one of the foremost researchers in the area of cellular and molecular mechanisms underlying multiple neurodegenerative disorders, like Parkinson's and Alzheimer's disease.

TEDx Talks: Why fasting bolsters brain power: Mark Mattson at TEDx Johns Hopkins University (2014/3/19) Length: 16:43

Fasting is Good for the Brain

Fasting does good things for the brain, and this is evident by all of the beneficial neurochemical changes that happen in the brain when we fast. It also improves cognitive function, increases neurotrophic factors, increases stress resistance, and reduces inflammation.

Fasting is a challenge to your brain, and your brain responds to that challenge by adapting stress response pathways, which help your brain cope with stress and risk for disease. The same changes that occur in the brain during fasting mimic the changes that occur with regular exercise. They both increase the production of protein in the brain (neurotrophic factors), which in turn promotes the growth of neurons, the connection between neurons, and the strength of synapses.

> "Challenges to your brain, whether it's intermittent fasting [or] vigorous exercise … is cognitive challenges. When this happens, neuro-circuits are activated, levels of neurotrophic factors increase, that promotes the growth of neurons [and] the formation and strengthening of synapses. …"

Fasting Stimulates Neural Regeneration

Fasting can also stimulate the production of new nerve cells from stem cells in the hippocampus. Mattson also mentions ketones (an energy source for neurons), and how fasting stimulates the production of ketones, and that it may also increase the number of mitochondria in neurons. Fasting also increases the number of mitochondria in nerve cells; this comes as a result of the neurons adapting to the stress of fasting (by producing more mitochondria).

By increasing the number of mitochondria in the neurons, the ability for neurons to form and maintain the connections between each other also increases, thereby improving learning and memory ability.

> “Intermittent fasting enhances the ability of nerve cells to repair DNA.”

He also goes into the evolutionary aspect of this theory — how our ancestors adapted and were built for going long periods of time without food.

Fasting Reduces the Risk of Disease

Dr. Mattson and his team have published several papers that discuss how fasting twice a week could significantly lower the risk of developing both Parkinson's and Alzheimer's disease.

> "Dietary changes have long been known to have an effect on the brain. Children who suffer from epileptic seizures have fewer of them when placed on caloric restriction or fasts. It is believed that fasting helps kick-start protective measures that help counteract the overexcited signals that epileptic brains often exhibit. (Some children with epilepsy have also benefited from a specific high-fat, low-carbohydrate diet.) Normal brains, when overfed, can experience another kind of uncontrolled excitation, impairing the brain's function, Mattson and another researcher reported in January in the journal Nature Reviews Neuroscience."
> Johns Hopkins Magazine: Don't feed your head (2012/Summer) [Archive]

A scientific review of multiple scientific studies regarding fasting was published in The American Journal of Clinical Nutrition in 2007 [1]. It examined a multitude of both human and animal studies and determined that fasting is an effective way to reduce the risk of cardiovascular disease and cancer. It also showed significant potential in treating diabetes.

Fasting Extends Life Span

Basically, when you take a look at caloric restriction studies, many of them show a prolonged lifespan in addition to an increased ability to fight chronic disease.

> "Calorie restriction (CR) extends life span and retards age-related chronic diseases in a variety of species, including rats, mice, fish, flies, worms, and yeast. The mechanism or mechanisms through which this occurs are unclear." [2]

The quote above is from a review of the literature that was done in 2003 [2]. The work presented here is now showing some of these mechanisms that were previously unclear.

Other Benefits of Intermittent Fasting

Below is a video of Dr. Joseph Mercola explaining the benefits of intermittent fasting. Here is a great article by him that explains how he believes intermittent fasting can help you live a healthier life.

Dr. Joseph Mercola on The Benefits of Intermittent Fasting

Update: Dr. Joseph Mercola's YouTube channel was banned from YouTube because of his anti-v@cc!ne stance.

The Benefits of Prolonged Fasting

A study published in the June 5 issue of Cell Stem Cell [3] by researchers from the University of Southern California showed that cycles of prolonged fasting protect against immune system damage and, moreover, induce immune system regeneration. They concluded that fasting shifts stem cells from a dormant state to a state of self-renewal. It triggers stem cell based regeneration of an organ or system. [4]

Human clinical trials were conducted using patients who were receiving chemotherapy. For long periods of time, patients did not eat, which significantly lowered their white blood cell counts. In mice, fasting cycles "flipped a regenerative switch, changing the signalling pathways for hematopoietic stem cells, which are responsible for the generation of blood and immune systems."

This means that fasting kills off old and damaged immune cells, and when the body rebounds it uses stem cells to create brand new, completely healthy cells.

> "We could not predict that prolonged fasting would have such a remarkable effect in promoting stem cell-based regeneration of the heatopoietic system. … When you starve, the system tries to save energy, and one of the things it can do to save energy is to recycle a lot of the immune cells that are not needed, especially those that may be damaged. What we started noticing in both our human work and animal work is that the white blood cell count goes down with prolonged fasting. Then when you re-feed, the blood cells come back."

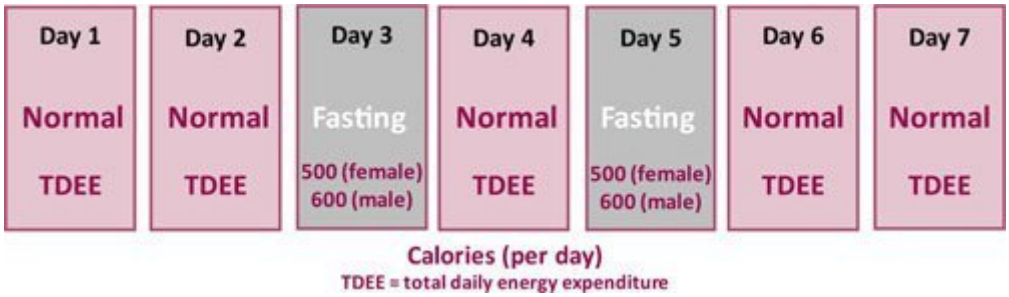
Before You Fast

Before you fast, make sure you do your research. Personally, I've been fasting for years, so it is something that comes easy for me.

One recommended way of doing it — which was tested by the BBC's Michael Mosley in order to reverse his diabetes, high cholesterol, and other problems that were associated with his obesity — is what is known as the "5:2 Diet." On the 5:2 plan, you cut your food down to one-fourth of your normal daily calories on fasting days (about 600 calories for men and about 500 for women), while consuming plenty of water and tea. On the other five days of the week, you can eat normally.



Another way to do it, as mentioned above, is to restrict your food intake between the hours of 11 a.m. and 7 p.m. daily, while not eating during the hours outside of that time.

Bottom line, how you think about your diet is, in my opinion, one of the most, if not the most important part of staying healthy. How you think about what you are putting in your body is important, and I believe this will eventually be firmly established in the untainted, unbiased, uninfluenced medical literature of the future.

Big Pharma

I chose to include 'Big Pharma' in the title because that's exactly what it is. There have been countless examples of the manipulation of published research at the hands of pharmaceutical companies in recent years. This is why Harvard Professor of Medicine Arnold Symour Relman told the world that the medical profession has been bought by the pharmaceutical industry. It's why Dr. Richard Horton, Editor in Chief of The Lancet, recently stated that much of the scientific literature published today is simply untrue. It's why Dr. Marcia Angell, former Editor in Chief of The New England Journal of Medicine, said that the "pharmaceutical industry likes to depict itself as a research-based industry, as the source of innovative drugs. Nothing could be further from the truth." And it's why John Ioannidis, an epidemiologist at the Stanford University School of Medicine, published an article titled "Why Most Published Research Findings Are False" [5] which subsequently became the most widely accessed article in the history of the Public Library of Science (PLoS).

I also chose to mention 'Big Pharma' because of Dr. Mattson's comments towards the end of the video.

> “Why is it that the normal diet is three meals a day plus snacks? It isn’t that it’s the healthiest eating pattern, now that’s my opinion, but I think there is a lot of evidence to support that. There are a lot of pressures to have that eating pattern, there’s a lot of money involved. The food industry — are they going to make money from skipping breakfast like I did today? No, they’re going to lose money. If people fast, the food industry loses money. What about the pharmaceutical industries? What if people do some intermittent fasting, exercise periodically, and are very healthy? Is the pharmaceutical industry going to make any money on healthy people?”

Admin's Blues

Jack · 22 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Lately, our group has reached a boiling point. People are butting heads over the finer points until they're in a murderous rage, raging insults, spouting threats of cursing the group and quitting. On the other hand, it seems like too few people are looking for common ground, and most are only trying to proselytize their viewpoints onto others. That's a problem for everybody I think. People come in and think they can, with a few posts or statements, make everybody swear undying loyalty to their point of view, and then when nobody jumps gleefully on their bandwagon, they get peeassed off and leave.

Please pass the popcorn.

There is another thing with fake accounts going on in the group. Some people set up fake accounts in order to tantalize others with racist and sexist provocations and then not have to face any backlash. Then there are other people who set up fake accounts so that they can pose as someone of another race in order to spread their bile or otherwise non PC propaganda. Then there are some who set up fake accounts posing as a different race simply to game play everyone to see how much offense they can get away with before someone calls them out. Then there are the self-righteous Sherlocks who try to hunt down all those people with fake profiles and try to inflict some kind of social revenge on them.

So much effing drama that we could get our own sitcom on local TV! But even though our group might show all pomp and drama at face value, I don't believe that's what this group is all about.

Let's not fake our surprise. The internet is rife with posers, puppets, racists, misogynysts, and those hypocritical bigots who are against discrimination against them, but they openly discriminate against others… That's right! A lot of people self-righteously claim, "I am offended", but at the same time, they have no problem offending others. Hey now, to be honest, the truth itself is quite offensive. You've got to bite the bullet you were shot with, while your wound is being cleaned. But most people fear the pain and resist the healing process, so they continue to be hurt people who hurt people. Some are stupid enough to get caught and kicked out, and others disguise their identities and words with such cunning skill, that they pass among us, unnoticed.

Also, there have been some folks who feel that the admins are some kind of racist misogynysts, like they used to be gun slinging, Bible flipping, ultra tea party conservatives before they became beer guzzing, English teaching, ONSing, expats. I could draw a cartoon about that.

As such, there is the notion that there is a double standard towards white members of the group, like white members can get away with saying offensive things that an Asian person would not. I think this has nothing to do with the admin, but it's because of the widely diversified blend of all our members. For example, white people get defensive when they're called out, but when ABC's are called out, nobody says anything. Perhaps it's because they are underrepresented, or maybe it's because there is a cultural and linguistic barrier to our group's diversification, or maybe it's because of self-biases, which color everyone's world view into believing that our group is just like the Eurocentric world that we live in.

We need to get unstung by the WASP, man!

I will admit, our group is far from politically correct. There is enough profanity and racist language going on here to add a chapter to the urban dictionary. It takes a strong stomach to read all about the rotten underbelly of society that gets exposed on this group. We assume that our readers are mature enough to take it in, and then add their own spit to the mix. Nevertheless, a lot of really fine decent people come in here following a PC ideology and immediately get offended by all the non-PC craplets that squirt out of our @$$. When they see that our group doesn't follow that ideology, then they leave. Some people just can't handle a deviation from the script they were fed.

We apologize for the ugliness, but we are not afraid to get our hands dirty in order to get to the bottom of the mess.

We conscientiously try to avoid playing the stooge for stereotypes or institutionalized paradigms of culture or racism. We expect other members to eventually learn how to rise above this as well.

I want the members to know that, being an admin of a group like this is really tough work. There are times when some of us get so confused, we don't know right from wrong, and we just have to trust the judgment of the other admin. Believe it or not, the founding member recently quit the admin panel out of frustration.

I think it should be said that we consider people of all races to be stakeholders in the fight against discrimination. We need to hear viewpoints from all races and all nationalities, and we need to have the sense that we all sit at the same table and eat the same turkey and mashed potatoes at THANKS Giving.

Merry Christmas from a weary Admin.

Trump Appeals to Dignity, Not Racism

Jack · 7 March 2016 · Archived copy · Original

The need for dignity and value are common to all humans, no matter what their race, socio-economic status, or political affiliation may be.

Readership: All

> "Socialism never took root in America because the poor see themselves not as an exploited proletariat, but as temporarily embarrassed millionaires." ~ Ronald Wright, A Short History of Progress

Wright's viewpoint describes an ontology that might explain why race relations have always been problematic in the United States. Those who think of themselves as 'temporarily embarrassed millionaires' must invariably cling to a social code which supports this self image.

Hence, racism fits the bill nicely. But what is the alternative? Why racism?

The following article, which originally appeared on Medium (March 4, 2016), offers a unique perspective from a British woman, Emma Lindsay. Although Americans (or any nationals) are loathe to consider the viewpoints of foreigners concerning politics and domestic affairs, I will argue that many important points can be more clearly observed by those who have neither emotional attachments, nor personal investments at stake in the outcome.

Trump Supporters Aren't Stupid

America incentivizes racism in working class white people, and if we fail to understand this, we will fail to fix it.

My social groups are split on who they want to vote for. While most of them are #FeelingTheBern, many of them are coming around to old Hilda Baggins. Because I'm English and can't vote in the US, I've avoided emotional investment in either one. Consequently, I've been listening with impassivity as people explain the superiority of their candidate.

One thing that has been interesting to me is people use a rhetoric on other democrats that is similar to what they use on republicans. I just read this comment on Facebook:

> "There is NO logical reason Hillary Clinton should be beating Bernie Sanders by such large margins. I'm left to believe that (1) these voters think they're getting Bill Clinton, Part 2, or (2) they have fallen prey to the worst of logical fallacies—Hillary is a woman; therefore, she will effect policy and cultural change for both women and minorities."

Here's the thing, I know plenty of Clinton supporters and they're not dumb. The Clinton supporters I personally know tend to be male programmers capable of rational thought who have spoken to me at length about the policy differences between Bill and Hillary. The most frequently cited reason I've heard for voting for Hillary is that people perceive her to be more electable against a republican candidate. How electable either candidate will be against Trump is unknowable, but to vote based on a best guess given the information you know is not illogical. It is necessary.

If you're a Sanders supporter and you want to win over Clinton supporters, you're going to have to address the reasons they're voting for Clinton. And, if you assume that Clinton supporters are too dumb to know what's best for them, if you assume you know what they need better than they do, then you are wrong. Your arguments will be patronizing, and you will remain unconvincing.

Which, brings me to how we talk about Trump supporters. While the majority of democrats I know do tend to keep it civil with each other, nearly all of them will rail on "ignorant" republicans who "vote against their own best interests." Thing is, Trump supporters don't vote against their best interests, democrats just don't understand the interest they care about most.

It's dignity.

One of my favorite stories is Mike DeStefano interview about going on a motorcycle ride with his dying wife. It's a beautiful, you should read it or listen to it. Anyway, at some point he says:

> "[Dying] people, they feel "I'm alive." They pass away at one moment. Until that moment, they are alive, and they want to be loved, and they want to give and share, you know."

Until that moment, they want to give and share. Giving and sharing is as important to life as being loved.

We are depriving the white working classes of their means to give. As we export manufacturing jobs internationally and as we streamline labor with technology, we start moving people to the sidelines. It's not just that they have less money, it's that their identity as providers is being threatened. This is why they are often so against welfare. Even if it would fix their financial situation, it would not fix their identity problems. It would hurt their dignity. While the working class is undoubtedly worried about the economy, we already know many will not vote in their economic best interests. They vote for the candidate who promises a return to dignity, and it's not because they're dumb. It's because they care about their dignity more than they care about their finances.

Which, by the way, directly ties in to how they are racist. Not all Trump supporters are necessarily racist, but a fair number of them explicitly are. Normally, when liberals talk about racism, they use "racist" as an end point. "Trump is racist" is, by itself, a reason not to vote for him, and "being racist" is an indicator of a person who is morally deficient.

But, if you don't take this as an end point—if you instead ask "what do people get out of being racist?"—you'll start to unravel the emotional motivations behind it. One of the best unpacking of this I have read is Matt Bruenig's piece, Last Place Avoidance and Poor White Racism. To summarize, no one wants to occupy the "last" place in society. No one wants to be the most despised. As long as racism remains intact, poor white people are guaranteed not to be "the worst." If racism is ever truly dismantled, then poor white people will occupy the lowest rung of society, and the shame of occupying this position is very painful. This shame is so painful, that the people at risk of feeling it will vote on it above all other issues.

Liberals, especially white liberals, like to believe in the moral superiority of the "not racist" (which presumably includes them.) And, I agree we need to aspire to a "less racist" America, but I disagree that it is useful to think of racism as a personal moral failure. It can be, but thinking of it this way blocks progress.

The main difference between a white racist and a white "race ally" is usually social group. Marc Zuckerberg recently reprimanded some of his employees for crossing out "Black Lives Matter", and replacing it with "All Lives Matter", but of course he did. The internet went wild congratulating him, but this was not a courageous act for him. It may have been a morally correct act, but it was not a brave one. His social group rewards overt "anti-racist" behavior, so being overtly "anti-racist" will only enhance his social standing.

On the other hand, for some poor white communities, solidifying racism seems like a quicker path to enhancing their social status than activism. Ironically, many white racists and white allies have the same motivation in their hearts—to look good to their peers. Yet, white allies tend to get blocked around this because it is painful to admit they have similar motivations to white racists. At least, it is painful for me to admit.

Yet, the fact that we are similarly motivated—white racists, white allies, and people of color alike—is the key to fixing this whole mess. We must find ways for the working class to maintain its dignity, we must find a way for them to have jobs that are satisfying to them, we must find a way for them to contribute to culture. We must find a way for them to feel heard. Which, by the way, are the exact same goals we need to have for oppressed races. We all need the same thing, and until we find a way to give it to more people, we will fight each other for it.

And, America is terrible at giving its citizens dignity and meaning. We have, with the internet, the power for more people to be appreciated than ever before, yet we use it primarily to shame each other. Shaming Trump supporters for being "ignorant bigots" is the worst thing you can do, because their entire motivation in voting for Trump is to alleviate the shame they are already carrying. If you add to their shame, they will dig in further.

It is, obviously, difficult to think about ways to reduce shame on a national level but we have to start finding ways to have more appreciation for each other, even those we disagree with. At the most basic level we can start by not explicitly shaming people. We can stop calling them ignorant. We can stop mocking them on the internet. We can stop calling them out on twitter. Unless they happen to be Martin Shkreli, then it's ok.

You can connect with me on FB here if you like.

Conclusions

This article describes some very provocative viewpoints, and paints some very broad strokes over large demographic groups of people, but of course, this could naturally be expected of a foreign opinion. However, there are a few nuggets of truth that I feel must be emphasized.

- People who cling to the 'American Dream' have an inherent desire for status, and the most widespread concept of status in the U.S. is largely comprised of material wealth. As such, they cannot accept being on the bottom of society.
- 'Racism' is generally taken to be a negative quality for obvious reasons. However, it must also have some positive attributes, or otherwise, it would not long endure. The positive attribute of racism described in this article is the dignity of status, based on race.
- Choosing to base one's status on race displaces the cognitive dissonance that arises from basing one's status on wealth, believing the 'American Dream' (that anyone can achieve success with hard work), while being destitute at the same time. Thus, racism gains traction easily within poorer, white communities. As such, the 'American Dream' reinforces racism.
- The need for dignity and value, and the need to contribute, are common to all humans, no matter what their race, socio-economic status, or political affiliation may be.
- 'Bleeding heart' liberals, and poor, 'racist' whites share some of the same motivations, such as dignity, meaning, the avoidance of shame, and the preservation of hope.
- Clinging to principles of morality does not require real honour nor bravery, and often serves only to enhance one's social standing, and justify one's preferred stance through virtue signaling.
- Furthermore, moral posturing is frequently implemented for the harmful purpose of shaming others.
- Shame tactics only bring more division, intensify racism, and encourage neither unity nor 'progress'.
- If people have greater opportunity, satisfying jobs, and the ability to find dignity, value and relatedness, then this should be more effective in alleviating racism than politically postured morality and racial legislation.
- Trump, with his slogan of "Make America Great Again" (MAGA), naturally attracts wide popularity by appealing to people's hopes for job opportunity, dignity, personal value, and yes, nationalistic 'racism'.
- "Make America Great Again", which involves society, is not the same thing as "The American Dream", which focuses on one's own hopes of achievement.
- Liberals are making the mistake of focusing on the stereotypically racist leanings of Trump's constituents, label them, and him, as morally deficient, while failing to address the real issue of how the American Dream is broken.

- Furthermore, liberals attract contempt by resorting to shame tactics, which inevitably destroy both unity and dignity.
- It might appear that Trump and his collusion are racist, but a deeper analysis reveals that, while they are expressive of racism, they are also attempting to achieve a political state that would erode racism and encourage the development of unity and dignity.
- Thus, Trump's supporters aren't stupid, as expressed in the title.

LED Light and Your Eyes

Jack · 1 April 2016 · Archived copy · Original

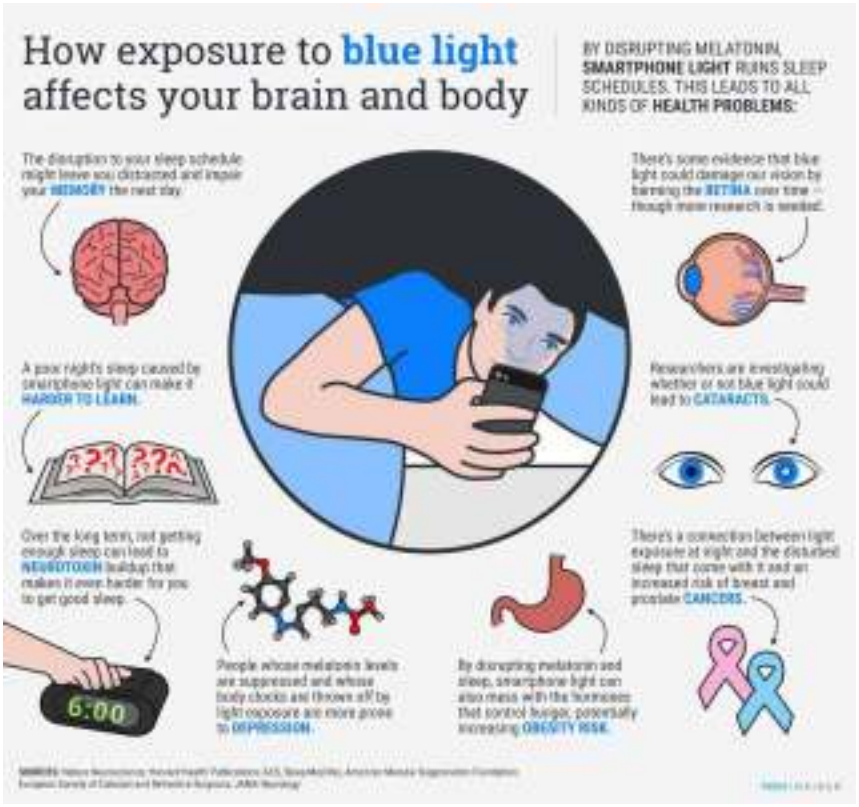
Learn how LED light harms your eyes and your sleep cycle, and what you can do to protect your health.

Readership: All, especially those who spend hours every day in front of a smart phone screen or a computer monitor.

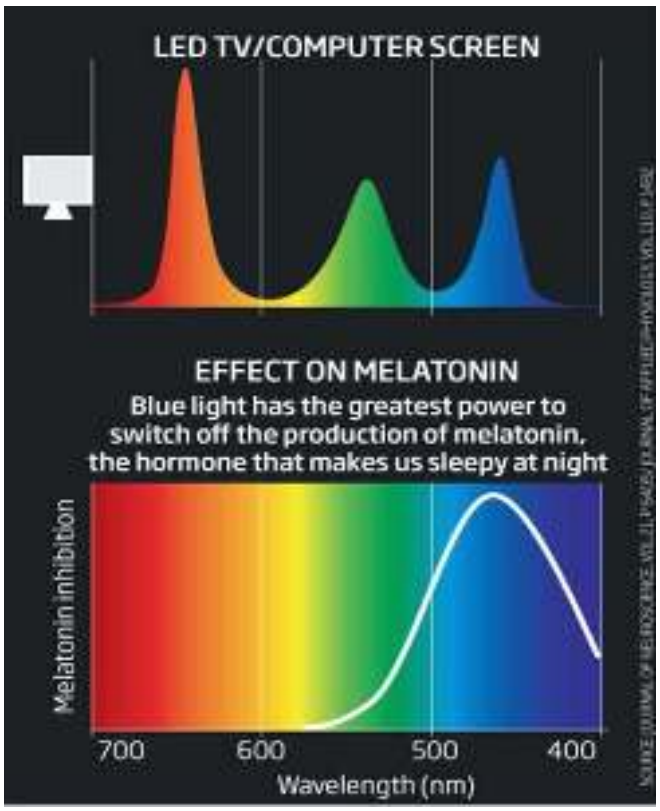
I've put together the results of a cursory study I made of this topic, including the following photos. It shows that it is possible to reduce the adverse effects on sleep caused by watching TV, smart phone, computer, and iPad use.

The Scientific Evidence

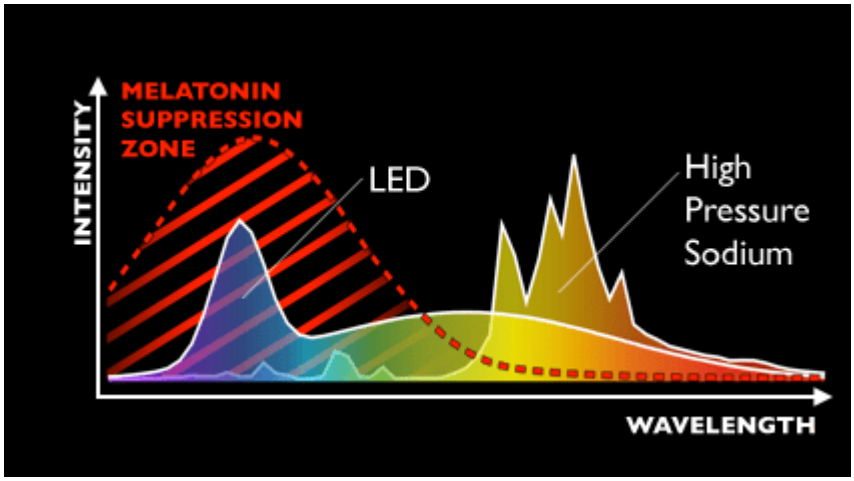
LED lights have taken the world by storm over the past five years, mainly because of their vibrant color spectrum and incredibly low operating costs.



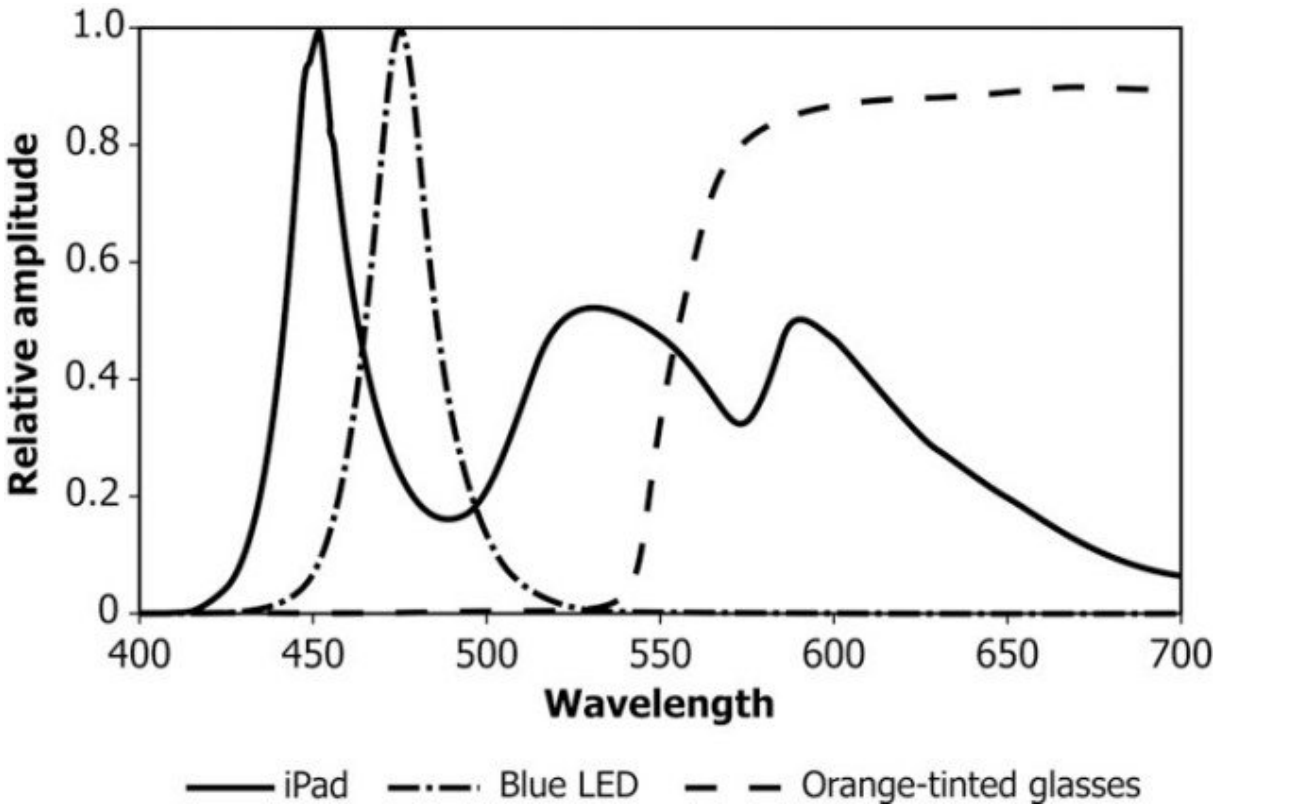
But some new studies are showing that certain wavelengths of light, primarily blue, actually inhibit the body's natural production of melatonin, which promotes healthy circadian rhythms and sleep habits.



Of note, it seems insidious that FB, Line, Linked In, and many other popular sites have blue themes. It's no accident. Those sites intentionally chose blue as the background color, knowing that it causes viewers to become more alert, and therefore more likely to spend more time on their site. This might also explain why these sites have grown to be more popular than their competitor sites that do not have a blue theme.



LED lights are real culprits of melatonin suppression!



Other than avoiding the use of monitors and displays altogether, there are basically three ways to protect your health from the hazards of blue light radiation. These include: (1) eye wear, (2) theme colors and brightness, and (3) settings and apps that modify the display.

1. Eye Wear

Amber and orange tinted glasses and filters can reduce the transmission of the harmful shorter wavelengths.

If you spend a lot of time in front of an LED screen, especially after dark, you should seriously consider buying amber tinted work glasses! In addition to protecting your sleep cycle, a prescription pair of amber tinted reading glasses can also reduce optometric strain on your eyes.

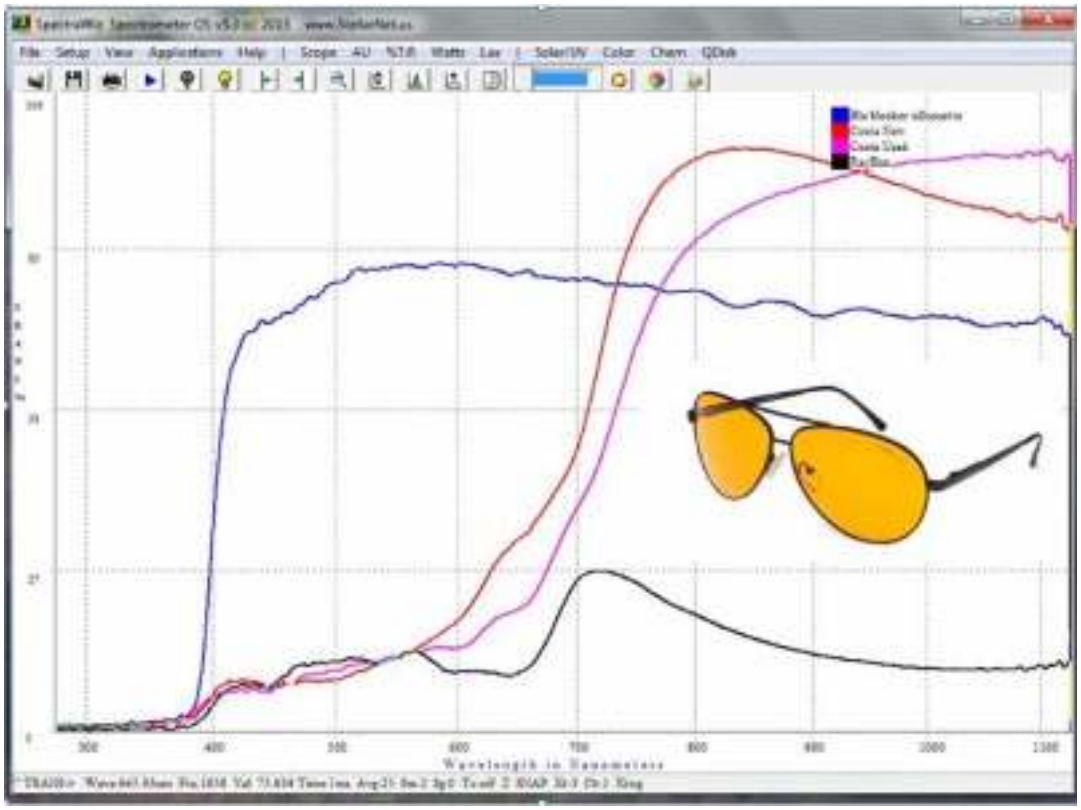
Blue light is not the same as UV light, so don't assume you are safe just because you have a UV coating. One easy way to check if your glasses have a blue light filter coating is to look at the color of the light reflected off the surface of the lens (as shown in the above photo). If the reflected light is white, then the lenses definitely do not have any blue light protective coating. If the reflected light is blue or violet, then the lenses probably have a blue light filter. (If the reflected light is some other color, then it has some other kind of coating. (For example, a scratch protection coating usually has a green reflection.)



Of course, you can only be certain by having an optometrist or an optical laboratory test the optical transmission of the lenses with a spectrophotometer.

2. Theme Colors and Brightness Settings

Changing the background theme color on your smart phone helps too. Choose red, orange, brown, black, dark grey, or amber for best results. Avoid white, blue and purple.

To change the theme color, hold your finger down on the home screen until you get this display. Then touch “Themes”, and select a suitable color.

iOS 9.3 has a “night shift” which turns the screen yellowish to try and reduce the blue-light effect.

If you work long hours on the computer, you may want to experiment with the brightness setting. Try to find the lowest brightness which is still easy to read. Some monitors have “eco” settings, which reduce brightness in order to conserve power usage. There are even some “eco” monitors which are able to automatically adjust the brightness to match the intensity of light present in the room.

3. Apps and Display Settings

There are some free apps available that can filter out short wavelengths of light on smart phones. These should be used within an hour or two before bedtime.

The image, below left, is the control screen for a blue light filter app. Several theme colors are available.

The image, above right, is the same control screen for the blue light filter app, after it is turned on.

Different theme colors are available for many apps. It's important to know that white light also contains blue light, so in addition to black, grey, or brown, any "hot" colors, such as red, orange, yellow, or pink, are the better choices among themes here.

Summary

If you become aware of the effects that blue light from monitors and displays have on your body and health, then you may notice an increase in your dynamic vitality, even after only a few minutes!

To reduce the harmful effects that blue LED light has on your eyes and circadian cycle, consider the following changes.

- Use reading/computer glasses with a blue-light filter coating.
- Change the theme color on your mobile phone*.
- Change the background color on any apps you use*.
- Install a blue-light filter app on your phone.
- Be conscious of the difference between the brightness of your phone, and the ambient brightness of your environment. Adjust the brightness of your phone to a comfortable setting.
- Adjust the brightness of the display monitor on your computer, which reduces the intensity of light.

* Dark or “hot” colors (e.g. red, orange, amber) are more favorable. Avoid white, blue, or purple.

[Eds. note: To avoid confusion, “hot” colors have a cold color temperature (e.g. 2,700K), and “cold” colors have a hot color temperature (e.g. 6,500K).]

Using these methods might seem a little boring at first, but once you get into the habit of using them, you may notice that you feel better. You will experience less eye strain, fewer occasions of headaches, and better sleep rhythms.

This is about as safe as it gets, unless you can put down your phone and go to sleep.

What is Borderline Personality Disorder?

Dealing with someone with Borderline Personality Disorder can be frustrating and stressful. You can learn to detect such people and improve your interaction with them by educating yourself on the nature of this disorder.

BPDs and Social Interactions

At the name suggests, BPDs have two sided, yin-yang nature when it comes to social intercourse. They long for acceptance and love, and so they tend to behave kindly in the hopes of soliciting the same from others. For this reason, many BPDs appear quite charming and winsome.

These tactics play on the fact that people take a general liking to others because they are nice, courteous, treat them well consistently, and can offer an enjoyable conversation and a positive attitude. As long as a pleasant social discourse is in place, people don't usually care that the BPD is an anxious bundle of nerves.

BPDs will fight against all odds to make at least one good connection with someone because their sense of emotional security (and possibly sanity) depends on it, and they are frequently surprised that people are cordial and welcoming towards them in response.

As a result of honing this practice for many years, many BPDs learn to be very dominant among familiar groups of people, which attracts positive attention and gives them a greater sense of control over their fears.

However, social interactions are often met with a feeling that others are not returning their kindness in like manner, and they may even perceive a malicious intent which casts a mental shadow over the entire relationship. The latter is often a form of psychological projection. When this happens, the BPD will invariably call to memory past interactions with that person and recast them as deceitful or manipulative. If the BPD is pushed past his/her tolerance limit, or is convinced that these perceived offenses deserve a response (e.g. to recapture dignity or to "teach them a lesson"), the BPD will not hesitate to rain down fire and brimstone on that person.

Ironically, even if a social interaction is bad, they tend to cling to those who offended them and stay in the bad situation longer, hoping to eventually find a sense of connection, contentment, or closure.

This is often elusive, largely because as others come to know the BPD more intimately, their apparent loving nature is often interrupted by bouts of sadness and fits of intense anger. These mood swings are severely taxing on others, and eventually they will draw self-protective boundaries on their space and time. The BPD interprets this withdrawal as a rejection, and the resultant feelings of isolation can give rise to anger about perceived abandonment which further perpetuates their turbidly unstable emotional state.

Dysfunctional Relational Habits of People with BPD

People with BPD have many subtle ways of getting people's attention and controlling them in order to receive time and emotional energy from them. A few of the most common mechanisms are briefly described below. Most of these are learned from their childhood experiences. If one of these behaviors in childhood is not positively rewarded, then they might turn to one of the others, until they find one that works for them. Once finding a method that works within their particular social environment, then they stick with that method and further develop it.

One way is by sulking. At some point in their formative years, they learned that by sulking, they can attract the attention of a compassionate person who basically gives them whatever they want.

Self-harming types of behaviors have a similar effect as sulking, but can attract the attention of people who are less compassionate or less aware of their emotional state.

Very obvious forms of a seemingly self-defensive style of avoidance is another tactic employed by those with BPD, such as a sudden withdrawal in the middle of a conversation, or snatching personal belongings away from another's presence. If they suspect that the person being targeted did not notice their withdrawal, then they may try to reestablish a connection and try the tactic again with greater emphasis, as if to remind the person by saying, in effect, "Haven't you noticed that I am not talking to you?" Or if the target is somehow not aware of their own purported "wrong doing" against them, they may suddenly fly into a rage. People with BPD commonly display anger, rage, shocking behaviors, or make accusations, cutting verbal statements or insults in order to throw the other person into confusion and defensiveness, which gives them a measure of control over the interaction.

Ultimately, many of these behaviors can be summarily described as an abuse of personal boundaries. BPD's may invent boundaries which are often not stated or otherwise made clear, simply for the sake of creating a much-needed sense of control and domination. These boundaries are then implemented as a tool to engage an emotionally manipulative tactic. When others violate these boundaries, the BPD will react strongly, or not at all, depending on what suits their own interests best at the moment. Meanwhile, BPDs shows little respect for the boundaries of others, and no regard for the emotional needs of others whom they are interacting with.

Coping Mechanisms for BPDs

BPDs have an unceasing habit of rumination. They ruminate over unfulfilled desires, such as falling in love or being popular or rich, with the conviction that they will never be so lucky. The things they ruminate over usually include traumatic experiences from their past which typically involve disappointment, heartbreak, rejection, r@pe, or violence. It is also common for BPD's to ruminate over fears that those traumatic experiences might repeat themselves because of "fate", or for other reasons out of their control. BPDs feel like once those fearful thoughts come into their minds, they become consumed by those thoughts and cannot take their mind off of them. Part of the reason for this is because they have strong feelings of fear that accompany those thoughts. Psychiatrists have compared BPD with Post Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD) for these reasons.

Because BPD's are so prone to fearful rumination, constant stimulation is a central part of their life. Stimulation can be anything that takes their mind off of their overwhelming fears and desires. Stimuli can be either positive — such as watching TV or a movie, listening to music, exercise, sports, cooking, eating, and playing games — or negative — sexual promiscuity, smoking, drinking, fighting, arguing, using recreational drugs, etc. Once they get tuned into one source of stimulation, they cannot stop it and soon engage in other sources of stimulation. This is why it is difficult for BPD's to focus themselves on a task, such as reading a book, for example, because they must cease ruminating over their feelings and fears, and shut out all thoughts and desires for a stimulating distraction.

BPD's often use alcohol or other substance abuse to help them assuage their fears and find the courage to deal with life. But after they get drunk / high, they don't care about the outcome of their behavior, and they say and do harmful things because they feel like they need to "get it out", not realizing that they often make their lives worse and more difficult through their careless words and actions.

If BPD males perceive an imminent rejection from a love interest, they tend to withdraw and go cold emotionally. However, BPD females tend to become more sexually aggressive and pursue their love interest with greater fervor. This could be a learned behavior from the fact that women commonly reject men's attempts to make an emotional connection with them, while men will rarely refuse the offer of sex from a female. Thus, their respective reactions are meant to minimize further exposure to rejection. For these reasons, BPD's are very prone to sexual addiction (masturbation and p0rn for men, and sexual promiscuity for women).

What Kinds of People Do BPDs Find Attractive?

Females with BPD may be attracted to men who are very much older than they are, perhaps up to 15 to 20 years or more.

Similarly, males with BPD may find dominant and/or controlling women appealing. This is often combined with their sexual desire such that they are drawn to sexually experienced women, including married women and middle-aged women in their 30 and early 40s. Women of these types appear very emotionally and sexually mature to the BPD male and are thus perceived as a stable source of comfort and sexual stimulation.

BPDs attraction to experienced / mature / older personalities may be due to the fact that such people are more likely to have a level of maturity that is capable of dealing with the BPD's foibles. OTOH, less mature men and women are perceived by the BPD as annoying, bothersome, immature, and unreliable. Also, such people are more likely to accept the BPD's mood swings and social / psychological games as immaturity, and perhaps even see it as endearing or cute. The fact that the older, mature person can accept their unique social characteristics, remain constant and unfazed, and not pressure them about changing their behavior, gives the BPD a sense of acceptance, comfort, and relief.

Treatment and Recovery

Studies in Cognitive Behavioral Therapy have shown that BPDs are capable of growing out of this cycle of social annihilation if they can…

- Become consciously aware of their own self-destructive and sociopathic behaviors.
- Learn to control their spontaneous destructive coping mechanisms.
- Become more consistent in managing their fears.
- Persistently display traits of generosity, goodness, and kindness — in spite of how they might perceive others' responses.

All this said, a formal environment and/or a structured social atmosphere may help the BPD to feel more secure and comfortable. A formal style often includes things like speaking softly, dressing well, having good posture, and less talk about personal feelings and opinions. BPD's love formality because it decreases emotionally charged interactions and gives them a sense of order and structure.

Why Political Correctness won't solve Racism

Jack · 7 September 2016 · Archived copy · Original

An unflattering analysis of PC culture, followed by a new-old approach towards improving interracial relations.

Readership: All

Introduction

Since its inception, Political Correctness has always touted the label of being an "antidote" to open racism. However, there are many groups which all share the belief that the purported benefits of PCness do not outweigh the in situ burdens.

Concerning the need for PC culture, the argument of the Left goes something like this.

> It used to be that those in positions of relative privilege and power could say pretty much anything they wanted without public sanction because they enjoyed majority privilege, and the sphere of justice didn't extend beyond them. Then within the last twenty years, terms and phrases that are now widely recognized as racist, sexist and homophobic gradually became unacceptable in the public sphere. The older generations (Silents, Boomers, and early X'ers) were pissed because they suddenly found themselves on the sharp end of a stick without being told why their language was unacceptable.
> "Why did the world change?" they wondered. "When I was a kid these things were accepted, so they must be fine. All those people getting offended now weren't offended before (so they thought) so now it's just people being overly sensitive."
> When the permanence of PC appeared to be set in cement in the mid-naughts, Right wing political groups, nationalists, white supremacists, and neocons took up the call and lamented all the things they couldn't say and do anymore. They flooded talk radio and YouTube about how unfair and pointless it was.

Leftists interpret these responses as being like a veil removed. That is, railing against "Political Correctness" is code for a longing to return to a mythological time when the sphere of justice was smaller, and more clearly defined.

Truly, the hallmark of a conservative is the freedom to rebel, especially in their youth, and this is why we find a lot of right wing groups have taken up the anti-PC stance, and in doing so, have attracted the "hate group" label. So basically, the Left has arrived at the conclusion that anything that is anti-PC is the same as being pro-hate.

But this is a vicious and false claim.

Most of the people railing against PC aren't doing it because they think it undermines their ability to effectively rebel. Neither are they against PC particulars because they hate minorities. In fact, they just happen to be ambivalent about teenage rebellion, and they harbor no ill will towards minority groups. But even here, the fact that these people don't really care is misinterpreted as being inhuman, arrogant and "privileged".

No, most people who resent the PC culture are angry because it represents a changing dynamic in power and justice that they feel takes something vital away from their lives, namely their racial identity, and their freedom of expression, for better or for worse. From their viewpoint, the PC movement is taken to be a Pernicious Chastisement, which is nothing more than an exercise in Power Choreography that only adds to the social burdens by requiring people to do things they don't feel like doing.

Truly, the most soul killing travesty is to be forced to do something against one's will.

For those minority groups and their supporters who argue that they live at the mercy of the average white Joe's actions and decisions, they often resort to a negatively distorted Prejudicial Condemnation. Certainly this sort of oppression was real in the past, but it is hardly the case anymore. But because such behavior was common in the past, they argue that when anyone might resort to the use of colorful euphemisms, it essentially proves that they are outside the sphere of justice.

Then the Left uses this outdated strawman as a springboard to claim that PC is necessary to limit the way someone can exercise power unjustly over someone else by belittling them, and "putting them in their place". It's only a form of Personal Coercion insofar as depriving someone from the ability to punch people in the nose is "coercing" them into inaction.

This is an even more vicious claim, as it presumes that anti-PC people are, by nature, habitual perpetrators of violence against minorities.

I am not totally ignorant of the sentiments of the Left. I would have to agree that for many social settings, putting a limitation on racial overtones is entirely appropriate. So let us describe a social situation in which administering a PC approach would be beneficial. Here, people are profoundly varied in terms of personal values, and lack even a minimal respect or appreciation for others who hold different views. They are irritable, contentious, and prone to angry outbursts whenever their Pedantic Convictions are challenged. They have very few virtues or qualities of character to offer to others, and are therefore forced to rely on manual labor of some sort in order to contribute something of value. Now we also add the requirement that they must work together and communicate effectively and efficiently. Yes, in this sort of environment, we definitely need to implement PC in the workplace. Then we can call a Press Conference to broadcast our virtue Posturing Convent of diversity.

The Purgatorial Complication is that discipline is never pleasant, but after a time, a sense of righteousness is achieved, much like ISO standards force managers to be more rigorous, efficient and less wanton. But this sense of righteousness (or possibly self-righteousness) comes at the cost of presuming (perceived) victimization and a forthright Philosophical Crisis.

Certainly, PC is better than open racism, but it's weakness is that it merely covers and controls overt acts of racism. It fails to overcome covert racism, which is the real Problemata Corruptio in society that people hope to address through adopting a PC approach to life.

Why Political Correctness won't solve Racism

Within any particular social interaction, there are two elements necessary in the formation of an authentic relationship. These elements are Adversity and Humility, and let's discuss some brief definitions here to avoid confusion. Adversity provides the opportunity for a person's character to be manifested and shows others what personal strengths and weaknesses the person brings to the table. Humility is a state of recognizing that one is strong or weak in an area that another is weaker or stronger in, respectively, and is therefore willing to enter into a symbiotic relationship for a mutual benefit. Failed relationships can occur when (1) one party refuses to agree with the terms and conditions of interaction, for example, being subjected to disgrace or abuse. Or when (2) one party is dissatisfied with the benefits he receives from the relationship, as weighed against his investment and other possible choices available.

PC works against both of these elements as follows. (1) It prevents Personal Characteristics from being fully understood by forbidding the (usually ugly) Prolific Confrontation of ideologies. (2) It permits people to refuse becoming humble and entering into a symbiotic relationship. All one needs to do is to make a Public Contention that the other person is "offensive", and that the fact that they were offended proves the other person's unworthiness, which thereby wholly justifies their unwillingness to enter into a symbiotic relationship. The problem here is that this measure is entirely subjective and unilateral, and therefore, cannot be assessed as valid or legitimate by others.

In short, PCness is a form of Personality Castigation which makes everything seem pleasant in the relationship, but nothing is real, and thus, it cannot provide the full potential of real benefits to the satisfaction of both parties in a symbiotic relationship. PC attaches so many restrictions to the social interaction that the formation of the authentic relationship is made extremely inefficient. In short, PC is nothing more than the Portentous Confinement of Permanent Conflict $(PC)^2$.

Pissant Congratulations!

A Real Solution to Racism

The philosopher, Slavoj Zizek, describes real methods for individuals to overcome racism. Zizek addresses a number of different values and perspectives, so it is an exercise in mental gymnastics to listen to this brilliant man speak.

Noteworthy Quotes

- Native Americans are proud to be called Indians, because at least it is a testament to the stupidity of whites.

After listening to several of his speeches and interviews, I believe I could describe his main point in my own words as follows.

The primary point of racial reconciliation is to avoid the expression of disdain for trite stereotypes, which is the substance of racist jokes, and is basically a straw man character assassination. Rather, one should focus on the present moment of interaction with the intent of promoting the acknowledgment and mutual acceptance of differences, and thereby increase interpersonal bonding.

Of note, Zizek enforces the idea that it is better to be open and honest, than to arrogantly assume that you know better than the other person. In this sense, stereotypes can be used in a rather jokingly fashion, one that expresses acceptance and eases tensions, and not as a criteria of judgment over character.

Conclusions

Ultimately, when one insists and demands others to conform to PC standards, with the Preset Condition that otherwise, he is not willing to enter into deeper social standing, it is, in the basest sense, a polite but arrogant rejection. Clinging to PCness in this case, might be compared to the behavior of a conscientious objector who claims a moral superiority by vilifying the motives and actions of his nation, and then uses this as an excuse in his cowardly refusal to go fight for his country. In one sense, he is right to abstain from bloodshed and maintain a clear conscience, but in another sense, he has made himself become a worthless burden to the aims and expectations of the national society.

Real people form real relationships, and doing so is humbling, hard work. Because of the inherent difficulties and risk, many people feel comfortable in condoning PC-ness, as a socially justifiable way to avoid the burdens of real interactions.

Finally, the efficient expression of acceptance to those of other cultural groups is an interpersonal art that requires practice, as well as the refinement of character. In this view, this approach towards improving one's interracial relations is analogous to using pick-up game with women.

That is, you're either skilled at it, or not. But acculturation and education certainly help.

First, let's take a look at the demographics for interracial/international relationships in Taiwan.

Demographics of International Relationships in Taiwan

- The population of Taiwan was 23,526,295 in October, 2016.
- 51% (half) are men – about 12 million.
- An average of 13.1% of Taiwanese marry foreigners.
- There are about 800,000 foreign spouses living in Taiwan.
- 94% of the foreign spouses living in Taiwan are women.
- Most foreign spouses become citizens after 5 years.
- From January to June, 2016, 7,352 Taiwanese men married a foreign wife, and 2,439 Taiwanese women married a foreign husband.
- 27% of Taiwanese men (1 out of 16) marry a foreign spouse. The majority of these foreign wives originate from other south-east Asian countries, especially Indonesia, Vietnam, Thailand, and the Philippines.
- From 2014 to 2016, 24.91% of all the Taiwanese women who tied the knot (1 out of 4), got married to a foreign spouse. This figure is up from 10.9% (1 out of 9) in 2003.

A previous post, The Cultural Contrast between the West and Far Eastern Asia (July 9, 2015), explored the values, desires and perceptions that are driving this phenomena, and also a few stereotypes and misconceptions that exist between Americans and Taiwanese.

Background Socio-Economic Factors

Taiwanese society could be described as a mixture of Chinese values, Japanese culture, and American fashion, capitalism and politics. In practice, the Taiwanese emphasize the importance of education and wealth. Also, the centuries old Chinese Confucian values of Filial Piety dictate loyalty to parents above all else. Thus, we find that young people continue to live with their parents, often until many years after they get married. They avoid personal ventures, and spend all their time studying and working, and not socializing. They fear the responsibilities of marriage and having children, often postponing marriage until their mid-30's.

Since the global financial distress in 2007, Taiwan's economic growth has been stuck in the mud with a long-term gloomy outlook, thwarting people's willingness to have children. Raising a child indicates a huge amount of expense that many couples cannot afford. The reason people want fewer children, or none at all, is largely to conserve resources in response to the economic crisis, recession and general stagnation. In addition, Taiwanese females have nearly equivalent career opportunities as males, which drives them to regard their careers and earning potential as a priority over marrying and giving birth.

A surprising thing about Taiwan, is that, despite its place as a world leading semiconductor manufacturer, emotional maturity is not highly valued nor pursued. Calling someone “mature” in Taiwan would be taken as an insult, implying they are physically aged (corresponding with physical unattractiveness), socially outdated, or mentally senile. Rooted in Taiwan’s socio-cultural ties to Japanese colonization (between 1895 to 1945), there remains the “Culture of Cuteness”, which is basically the idea that youth is associated with innocent joy and aesthetic beauty. In Taiwan (and Japan), cuteness is considered charming, attractive, and even sexy… even in older men! But actually calling someone “cute” would be considered an insult, because it implies that they are childish, superficial and cannot be taken seriously.

For the above reasons, Taiwanese females are foregoing marriage, and becoming highly educated. The average Taiwanese woman gets married for the first time between the ages of 32 and 35.

Taiwanese men, citing “westernization” (i.e. feminism) as the cause of the shortage of domestic-minded, marriage-worthy females in Taiwan, are often pressed to find a foreign wife, usually from another neighboring south-east Asian country.

It is commonly found that those people in Taiwanese society, who find it difficult to identify with certain aspects of Taiwanese culture as described above, usually marry a foreigner or go live overseas.

Types of Expats in Taiwan

In Taiwan there are primarily three categories of English-speaking foreigners.

The first group are the English teachers. The cram school system of education in Taiwan has a life of its own. English teachers are in high demand in Taiwan both in the public schools and in cram schools. No experience or teaching certifications are required to teach in most cram schools, yet the money is good. Life here is easy for the foreign teacher. The Taiwanese are friendly, helpful and nice. Many of them are intensely curious about Westerners. The teaching schedule is light compared with many other jobs. And, if you're a male, the women are fascinated with you. All this attracts a certain type of Western male. Basically, the ones that are attracted to a life of ease without having to work for it. You'll see a lot of men that couldn't hack it in the West, enjoying a great life in Taiwan. They couldn't get a job, couldn't get a girl, couldn't get a life. They drift over to south-east Asia because its easy here, and unfortunately, they stay here, often indefinitely. They are known to indulge in daily drinking binges, and pursue profligate sex with the lowest class females in society. So as a result of this, English teachers have by far the worst reputation in Taiwan. Locals and foreigners alike consider them to be like white trash. At least, that is the stereotype of the foreign English teacher in Taiwan.

The second group, students, are also numerous and live a charmed life. This population is varied, exciting, young, eager, and usually significantly more motivated and intelligent. A predisposition toward the culture is inherent. So this population can be rife with young men fascinated by Asian culture. The majority of foreign students are here to study Chinese. There are many students who do study other topics, but they are not predominant. Most students come for a year, two, and their focus is on their studies. There is also a quickly growing number of international students from all over the world, especially other south-east Asian countries, but also from the middle-east, Europe and South America. These foreign students are known to hook up all over the place, mostly with each other, but also sometimes with local Taiwanese who happen to be interested in foreigners. Most students see their time in Taiwan as a frivolous and cheap eduvacation from their permanent lives in the West.

The third group are those who are ethnically Chinese, but are not from Taiwan. There are nicknames for each subgroup, based on their origin. For example, American, British, and Canadian born Chinese are called ABC's, BBC's, and CBC's. Those born in China are called NBC's. (N for national). (There is a metaphorical joke that the overseas born Chinese are part of the "news network".) These people have their own society and culture. Although most are thoroughly Westernized, they retain their Asian values and family upbringing. They are often well-educated, well raised, and come to Taiwan to explore their roots, and hopefully to find an ethnically and socio-economically equitable partner for marriage. Most that I have met are very respectable individuals. But they are often very shy when it comes to approaching someone of the opposite sex, compared to a typical American. They take sex and marriage seriously, often considering it as a duty to perpetuate the honor of their family line. Therefore, they stick to their own kind, and they are significantly less likely to make the first move. This group as a whole has the best reputation among all the expats in Taiwan.

Dating in Taiwan

Taiwanese dating culture is very different from the west. In fact, most Taiwanese people will agree that there IS no dating culture in Taiwan!

Couples get together by hanging out in large groups of friends, or often meet at work, through other social acquaintances, or their parents. The concept of going out on a date with someone relatively unknown is foreign to the Taiwanese lifestyle. Therefore, the flirting, the texting, the dating, the random hook ups, friend with benefit arrangements, and the whole culture that revolves around a Western dating lifestyle is non-existent in Taiwan.

Concerning cross-cultural and/or interracial relationships, for the most part, people are rarely looking for a commitment. This could be either a positive or negative aspect, depending on what you're looking for.

However, all this is not to say that the Taiwan SMP is a tumbleweed strewn desert. But that depends very strongly on who you are. If you are a white male, you'll find great popularity, but if you're black, or female, not so much.

The Dating Prospects of Western Men in Taiwan

Foreign men have no problem dating in Taiwan. Especially of interest, the Western guys in Taiwan aren't interested in dating a white, feminist, American woman, when there are so many other, better prospects in Taiwanese society. If it's not one woman, then its three falling all over themselves to get a Western man. They're as much of a status object here as they are elsewhere in the world. More, truth be told, you could be the nastiest, scummiest, loserish bit of crap in your home country, yet, if you're a man, especially a white man, in Taiwan you're often treated like a movie star.

The Dating Prospects of Western Women in Taiwan

For Western women trying their hand at dating in Taiwan, they face insurmountable odds. These women go on any number of dates with Asian men, and find very little success.

There are a multitude of problems with Western women dating Taiwanese men. Taiwanese men are very shy and timid when it comes to Western women. They are very afraid to approach a foreign woman, and generally, most will not. They can sense the feminist poisoning from afar, and are wise enough to steer clear of it.

Consequently, a Western woman will quickly realize that the majority of the Taiwanese male population simply isn't for her. That leaves the Expats. Here we circle back to quality and quantity. Quantity should be self-explanatory, as expats are a minority. In addition, the quality of the Western men in Taiwan is not like it is in Europe. A woman has to sort through a lot of riffraff to meet anyone of quality. If a white, western woman should choose to do so, then she'll be fighting an uphill battle against Asian fascination, transient lifestyle, and the general lack of commitment that is common to expat males in Taiwan.

Of course I can't say that all Western men in Taiwan are losers cum players. Personally, I do have a lot of male friends that I respect and whom I would not lump into that category. But looking at the vast majority, it's true.

When comparing the quality of expats in Europe to Taiwan, Europe wins hands down. The expats in Europe are significantly better educated, as a group, Doctors, lawyers, Indian Chiefs, you name it. So if you're a woman looking to meet quality men, I would advise you to explore Europe, and stay away from Asia.

Conclusions

No matter who you are, dating in Taiwan is tough. The Taiwanese are conscious of their social prestige and family lineage, and are discouraged from living a loose lifestyle. Whatever kind of relationship you're looking for, if it involves commitment of any kind, even short-term, you'll be hard-pressed to find it.

If you're 23 and fresh out of college, that's great! Come to Taiwan and stay for a year or two. It will be the time of your life. You might even find someone you care deeply about, and would consider marrying.

Guys past the age of thirty who have the urge to settle down, should carefully reconsider coming to Taiwan, as the challenges will be significant. If you're not looking to settle down, have a bit of cash to spend, and you don't care about having a big empty hole in your resume, then you'll have the most memorable breeze through paradise imaginable.

Western women past the age of thirty who are thinking about coming to Taiwan should think twice. Asia is the western man's paradise, and the feminist woman's hell.

In spite of the cultural differences and socio-political hurdles, I, as a western, white man, have dated considerably more satisfying women than I ever did in the U.S., and the quality of women was much higher on the average. Also, I did find a wife and a very prestigious job here. But, I am not a typical American expat.

1. What is Truth?

Truth is most often used to mean "being in accord with fact or reality", or "fidelity to an original or a standard". Commonly, truth is viewed as the correspondence of language or thought to an independent reality, in what is called the Correspondence Theory of Truth. Truth may also be used in modern contexts to refer to an idea of "being true to one's self," or authenticity. Some philosophers view the concept of truth as basic, and unable to be explained in any terms that are more easily understood than the concept of truth itself.

The concept of truth can take on many forms, interpretations, applications and expressions, such as logical, factual, or ethical truths. The meaning of truth is discussed and debated in several contexts within society, including philosophy, art, and religion. Many human activities depend upon concepts of truth, where the nature of truth as a concept is assumed as a foundational entity, rather than being a subject of discussion and debate. These human activities include most of the sciences, law, journalism, and everyday social interaction.

The commonly understood opposite of truth is falsehood, or, under other contexts, is considered to be a lie. Falsehoods deal with factual or logical errors, while lies imply an inaccurate or distorted conveyance of an identity, often intended to deceive. Fibs are merely statements that oppose the real fact of the matter.

2. Understanding the Human Mind

The human brain works in two ways. There is the "ancient brain" that is modular, non-linear and most often non-conscious. Facial recognition is an example of the ancient brain in action. A person can see a face, and without thinking, he either recognizes it or he doesn't, but his mind can reach that decision very quickly, and without his awareness of the process. Another example is a person's fight-or-flight reaction to a stressful or dangerous situation. The brain can quickly analyze the pros and cons of his condition and abilities, and come to a choice of action, again, without his awareness of the process.

The "modern brain" utilizes a conscious and willful process using facts, logic and linear reasoning, and most differently from the "ancient brain", it is at liberty from the constraints of instinct and emotion. Its advent came long after humans developed language and was paramount in the establishment of civilized society.

3. The Importance of Believing the Truth

Some religions, such as Christianity, use the analogy of warfare to describe the process of coming to know the truth. This spiritual warfare is not fought in the physical world, using weapons such as swords and rifles. Instead, it is most aptly described as a battle to believe, and to be believed. These two aspects, to believe, and to be believed, are mutually codependent upon each other, as we must live a life that is empowered by a self-concept based on Absolute Truth, and is also sufficiently convincing to others. Otherwise, our speech and our actions will be misinterpreted by others, leading to a poor reputation, reduced opportunities in life, and possibly even rejection. In other words, we each have the responsibility to let others know who we are, and to teach others how we want to be treated. As such, how does one form his or her identity?

4. The Question

In life, people are hard pressed to consider the essence and variance of their ways.

- Beliefs: True or False?
- Behaviors: Right or Wrong?
- Motives: Good or Bad?
- Efficacy: Useful or Worthless (or Harmful)?
- Value: Loved and Appreciated or Neglected and Ignored (or Abused)?

It remains an underlying assumption that if a person can conform more closely to “the Truth”, then his or her life will become magnanimously more worthy of living, regardless of where they stand in the above respects.

5. Types of Truth

Absolute Truth, as discussed in philosophy, metaphysics, religion, spirituality, and other contexts, is the essence of the most real being. The Absolute is conceived as being itself or perhaps the being that transcends and comprehends all other beings, for example, God. One personal experience that humans commonly have with Absolute Truth is in sharing an eternal relationship with God or another human being. In this sense, the word eternal means that the nature of the relationship is founded on identities which are not changed or affected by the passage of time.

Relative Truth concerns those things which are only true and applicable within a particular frame of reference, such as a language or a culture (cultural relativism), or within the context of moral principles and ethics (moral relativism). It carries the idea that views are relative to differences in beliefs, perceptions and considerations, and intrinsically, have no absolute truth or validity. Relative Truth is expressed in the axioms, “It’s true if you really believe it!” and “When in Rome, do as the Romans do.”

Objective Truth possesses the state or quality of being true, even outside of a person’s individual biases, interpretations, feelings, and imaginings. A proposition is generally considered to have Objective Truth when its truth conditions are met without any biases caused by the feelings, ideas, and opinions of a person. A second, broader meaning of the term refers to the ability in any context to judge fairly, without partiality or external influence. The adjective, objectivity, is sometimes used synonymously with neutrality.

Subjective Truth is a central philosophical concept, related to the collection of the consciousness, perceptions, experiences, expectations, personal or cultural understanding, agency, personhood and beliefs specific to a person, and one’s own experience of reality (the Unshared Environment). The term subjective is most commonly used to describe that which influences, informs, and biases people’s judgments about truth or reality. Three common definitions state that subjectivity is the quality or condition of:

- Something being a subject, broadly meaning an entity that has agency, meaning that it acts upon or wields power over some other entity (an object).
- Something being a subject, narrowly meaning an individual who possesses conscious experiences, such as perspectives, feelings, beliefs, and desires.

- Some information, idea, situation, or physical thing considered true (perhaps only) from the perspective of a person considered to be the subject.

Factual Truth concerns factual matter, logic and reason. Here, the facts are used to establish the truth or falsehood of any statement, and are understood to be relative to the perspective of those proving or falsifying the statement.

6. The Truth is Contained in the Form of the Statement

The way words and sentences are constructed, to a large degree, determines the truth of what is being said. If a person's verbal expressions are true in form, then the content of their speech is more likely to be true as well. This is why it often appears that people are more believable when they say somewhat of the opposite of what they really believe, or mean to say. This phenomenon is also the foundation of the western rhetorical devices of irony, sarcasm, and in many cases, humor.

Irony is a rhetorical device, literary technique, or event in which what appears, on the surface, to be the case, differs radically from what is actually the case. Irony may be divided into categories such as verbal, dramatic, and situational, which are often used for emphasis in the assertion of a truth.

The ironic form of simile, used in sarcasm, and some forms of litotes, can emphasize one's meaning by the deliberate use of language which states the opposite of the truth, denies the contrary of the truth, or drastically and obviously understates a factual connection.

A fundamental structure of western humor, and a good deal of world-wide humor, is comprised of two elements:

1. An element of truth.
2. An incongruency.

The humorous impression is made upon the realization of the incongruency.

Case Study 1 – Absolute Truth

Two business partners get together to discuss a transaction after meeting the week before. One says, "Hello Dr. Tang, how is your son doing in med school?"

The other replies, "He already graduated, and now he's making more money than I am! Thanks for asking. Now what can I do for you today?"

Two old college buddies haven't spoken to each other for more than a year. When they finally meet again, one of them says, "Randy, you lousy rascal! Did you ever stop drinking?"

The other laughs and replies, "No, did you? Wow! Has it really been a year? It feels like we only just spoke last week!"

Now, which of these two pairs of men do you think has a more honest and authentic relationship?

Case Study 2 – Relative Truth (as expressed in Sarcasm)

Two soldiers are preparing to go into a battle. They both hope to survive.

One man says, "Don't give up hope! Fight valiantly! Perhaps God will see it good to spare our lives! If I don't come back, please forgive me for the $50.00 I owe you."

The other man says, "Come on! Let's get this over with, so that we can get back to our card game! Maybe you can win back that $50.00! If you don't come back, I'll collect it from your brother!"

Now, which man has more confidence to face battle? Which man is more likely to survive the war?

Case Study 3 – Objective Truth (as expressed in Irony)

One man says, “Who knows what the truth is, right?”

In the same sentence, the man assumes that no one knows what the truth is, but also asks those who are listening to affirm the truth of his statement, thereby presenting both a methodical error in logic and a situational contradiction.

Another man says, “No one knows what the truth is.”

Here, the man obviously believes his statement is true, and his statement forms a null hypothesis that remains to be proved or disproved.

Now which man do you think is closer to knowing the truth?

Case Study 4 – Subjective Truth

A couple is having an argument. The wife says, “You never listen to me!”

The husband responds with, “Yes, I do. I am listening to you now!”

Another couple is having a similar argument. The wife says, “I often feel like you don’t listen to me!”

The husband responds with, “Really? What am I doing that makes you feel that way?”

Even though the two wives essentially said the same thing, the second couple is able to have a more truthful discussion because the wife framed her statement with the acknowledgement of her experience as a subjective truth. Likewise, the husband is able to respond in a more sincere manner, partly because she is being more truthful, and partly because he cannot argue against her personal feelings.

Now, which couple do you think will resolve their argument in a successful manner?

Case Study 5 – Factual Truth

A young man asks an attractive girl, “Do you have a boyfriend?”

Another young man asks the same girl, “Are you alone?”

But in truth, neither young man is interested in knowing about her boyfriend, nor in discussing her experience of being single. They are nervous and inexperienced, and they don’t know what to say. But they both want to know the same thing – whether she is open to dating either of them. So the real question they are asking is, “Will you give me a chance at love?” To this question, the desired answer is “yes”.

The girl answers “no” to the first man, and “yes” to the second man. But her answer to the second man is more truthful in addressing the real question. In other words, her “yes” really meant “yes”. The first man also made the faithless mistake of holding the unfavorable assumption that she is unavailable.

Now, which man do you think she will go out with?

7. The Four Expressions of Truth

The Greek philosopher, Aristotle, outlined classic arguments describing the three primary means of persuasion employed by the “modern brain”:

1. Logos (the logical argument – facts and rationality)
2. Ethos (the ethical argument – the credibility of the speaker)
3. Pathos (the emotional argument – the passion of the speaker)

These three classic appeals can be described in various ways. In addition to “Logic, Character, and Emotion”, they are found in the familiar words, “Heart, Mind and Soul” (in religions such as Christianity), “Function, Value and Form” (in Engineering Design), and “Technology, Business and Human Values” (in Sales and Marketing).

There is a fourth expression, not from Aristotle, but certainly present among humanity since long before his time.

4. Mythos (the narrative argument built on beliefs, hopes and expectations)

Mythos relies mainly on the "ancient brain", and will be described in more detail later.

From this perspective, there are two ways of communicating – logical (i.e. logos and ethos) and emotional (i.e. pathos and mythos). The former is about objective truth, whereas, the latter is about subjective "truthiness". In other words, it may or may not be true, but it "feels" true or right, so it is easily accepted as such.

8. Logos, Ethos, Pathos and Mythos in Communication

All three of the classic appeals of Logos (logic), Ethos (character), and Pathos (emotion) are needed for an efficacious communication to take place. Expressions comprised of just a single basic, isolated mode of communication type (Logos, Ethos, or Pathos) lack the principle of completeness, and are thus obviously limited in their application and/or effectiveness in conveying meaning.

Logos, or Logic, coincides with Function. This is the aspect of intelligence and reasonability, or that which is needed to make something work, which is arguably the main purpose of technological disciplines, such as engineering and manufacturing.

Ethos, or Character, is analogous to Value, the brand name, or the product image. This is the reputation of a person, or the company providing the product or service, signifying the relationship between the customer and company. Personal presentation or marketing, along with the history of interaction with the person or company, are the traditional champions for this element of communication.

Pathos, or Emotion, can be linked with Form and is related to aesthetics, pride, confidence, and/or the appearance or application of a product. This is expressed as a person's level of maturity and magnetic appeal. Take the example of Industrial design, which has the primary responsibility for creating a form that is appropriate to the context of a given product.

Mythos is perhaps the least understood among the general populace, and is only addressed in the arts and entertainment. Mythos is not traditionally a part of educational curriculum but is nevertheless important in our quest for truth. Aristotle's work, Poetics, investigates drama, and more particularly tragedy. In this work, several elements are listed as being part of the dramatic experience, these being Plot, Character, Language, Thought, Spectacle (the impressive or memorable), and Melody (or theme). But of these elements, perhaps the most important of them is the organization of events, i.e. the plot. Thus, the Greek word "Mythos" is often simply translated as "Plot". Aristotle goes on further to say that,

> "The events which are the parts of the plot must be so organized that if any one of them is displaced or taken away, the whole will be shaken and put out of joint."

This is the concept of Wholeness, Completeness, or being part of a larger movement. The point is made that,

> "a well constructed plot… will neither begin at some chance point, nor end at some chance point."

Another important aspect of Plot is Magnitude, which is the size or importance that properly belongs to it. The concept of magnitude might be substituted by "appropriateness," which relates to the rhetorical concept of decorum. The product of Mythos then, can be thought of as a small story or fable where there is completeness (i.e., ethos, logos, and pathos are all represented), and appropriate magnitude (i.e., things are in their proper balance or relationship to one another).

Popular themes based on Mythos include "the power of love" in romance, "the indomitable hero" in adventure stories, the "lost and found" narrative, and revelations or transformations from common baseness into someone or something glorious and beautiful.

Why are people so captivated by a dramatic story? Human beings have certain emotional and spiritual needs, and among these are hope, faith, love, finding intrinsic personal value, and establishing a purpose for living. Through drama (i.e. mythos), people hope to find answers to their deeper questions concerning these needs, and also to reinforce their deepest beliefs.

9. Delineating the Lack of Truth, Lies and Deceit

Although there could be many contributing factors that might result in incompleteness, one reason could be because one of these classic appeals (Logos, Ethos, or Pathos) has been omitted, neglected in some way, or thought to be unimportant. Similarly, failures occur when one area is emphasized over the others. Mythos is the element that attempts to add completeness and balance to the expression.

Deceitful people, whom we commonly call “liars”, often use pathos and mythos to win the empathy of others (called targets), and thereby convince them to agree to their course of action. These liars entice others with warm emotions, desires and expectations (at best), or confront them with shame and fear (at worst), thereby appealing to a primal instinctive mode of thinking using the “Ancient Brain” (once again, without their awareness of the process). This method of seduction or coercion requires the target to forget about reason, truth, value, self-esteem, purpose, and the benefits of past experience, and in effect, abandon their “Modern Brain”. This is all done by relying on the target’s hope of attaining that which seems to be missing from their lives, or to avoid the loss thereof. Mythos especially, is pressed hard in the presentation of a lie, with the implied promise of completeness and/or fulfillment. In other words, it is the “Big Lie”, fed to hungry people who are desperate to believe something. The power behind mythos is that it appeals to a deeper motivation present in other humans, and it can be extremely powerful in terms of persuasion.

The defining hallmark of a liar is that he intends to take advantage of a situation in which he can benefit from something he could otherwise not receive if he were to remain truthful and honest. Furthermore, in almost all cases, a liar will present the concept of a distorted or false identity, which can take on several forms. A few are described here.

- The Expert – In this persona, the liar pretends to be someone much more professional, educated, qualified and/or experienced than he really is, thereby giving you the impression that he knows what he is doing, and is able to deliver on his purported promises.
- The Optimistic Fool – Still another embodiment of deception can be found in the opposite situation where the liar pretends to be more naïve or inexperienced than he really is. In this case, the liar attempts to lead you down a course of action in which he already knows what the outcome will be, but he presents the impression to all those involved that he has the good faith that this particular course of action will lead to a different outcome, which is, of course, more favorable to the one being deceived.
- The White Knight – The liar might appeal to a false identity that is held, or wished for, by his target, often in the form of an idealistic self-image that the target wants to believe is true about either the liar or the target. In this case, the target may find the liars presentation to be amusing, inspiring, affirming, encouraging or flattering (i.e. appealing to pathos), and as a result, the target drops his defenses, abandons his “modern brain”, and becomes a willing victim or accomplice to be molded into the liars plans. Victims of such forms of lies often fail to ever realize the deception, and instead cling to the liar’s presented image with the false notion that it represents love or some other virtue.

The problem with liars is that their gain is always at the cost of others, in terms of time, energy, resources, and emotional health, among many other things. The problem with being a liar is the associated guilt, shame, the fear of getting caught, the consequences of getting caught, the loss of reputation and trustworthiness, the inability to trust others and form meaningful intimate relationships, and loneliness in general. Several generalized descriptions of liars are listed as follows.

- A liar almost always operates without divulging his true motives.
- A liar does not give others any knowledge of his intentions.
- A liar does not give others the freedom of making a consensual choice.
- The liar almost always is only willing to make the smallest investment possible, and seeks the shortest time frame possible for the payoff.
- Liars often push others to make decisions very quickly, and these decisions often require a large degree of faith and trust on the part of the target. Liars often describe portended losses or unfavorable outcomes if the target hesitates or waits too long to make the decision.
- Some liars have the mindset that they are the authority, that is, they do not answer to any higher authority than themselves or their cohorts. As a result, their attitude is lofty and presumptuous, and their actions are lawless, which means, they act without any regard to the rules, established procedures, societal order, or what would be best for all those involved.
- Some liars are motivated by a sense of guilt or shame. That is, they are afraid of presenting the truth because they believe it will make them look bad or feel bad.
- Liars have the habit of avoiding intimate social connections.
- Liars generally avoid meaningful communication, often saying things like, “Whatever”, “It doesn’t matter”, “It’s none of your business”, “I’ll have to get back to you on that”, etc.
- Liars present many nonverbal cues of non-confidence, which often include things such as the following.
  - Avoiding extended eye contact.
  - Displaying nervous behaviors, such as fidgeting, blinking, clearing the throat.
  - Making incomplete or unclear statements.
  - Changing their story, or making excuses for things.
  - Making verbal false starts, such as, “ah”, “um”, and “well”.
  - Giving the impression that they are daydreaming, or thinking of something unrelated to the situation or discussion at hand.
  - Asymmetrical facial expressions, such as raising one eyebrow, squinting one eye, a lop-sided smile or grimace, etc.

Liars are not to be taken lightly, because this approach definitely works. For example, just look at American politics and many other democratic elections where objective truth and reason are overlooked in favor of post-truth. Politicians attain dominance and garner power, not by telling the truth, but by generating the particular entity of “truthiness” that most appeals to their mass constituencies.

This is not to say that Pathos and Mythos are always necessarily the foundations of lies and deceit. On the contrary, Pathos and Mythos are powerful ways to communicate subjective truth and circumstantial reason.

On the other hand, logic and sound reason will not always yield the truth either. For example, if the logical process failed to take into account some important facts which were unknown, or were disregarded as being unimportant at the time, then the conclusions will not be reliable.

Also, feelings may not be considered to be logical, and they cannot always be counted upon to be indicators of truth, but feelings are, at the very least, a source of information that needs to be considered in the analysis of truth. Therefore, Logos, Ethos, Pathos and Mythos are not mutually exclusive. They are all important elements of expressing, conveying, and apprehending truth.

10. Dealing with Confusion

Confusion is the state of being bewildered or unclear in one’s mind about either the truth of a matter, or the necessary actions to be taken. It can be caused by any of the following.

- Stress
- Culture shock
- Lack of experience
- Lack of adequate rest
- Social, temporal or spatial disorientation
- The use of various drugs, especially hallucinogens
- The inability to focus one's attention, ADHD for example
- Lack of adequate knowledge of the related area of interest
- Immaturity, which includes the inability to distinguish reality from fantasy
- Various impairments in awareness, perhaps caused by an illness or disability
- Chronic organic neurological pathologies, such as dementia, Aspergers or Alzheimers.

Confusion can also be induced through the influence of another person, who is usually not being very truthful themselves. For example, being taught a false ideology, being a victim of a deceptive scheme, or being targeted by witchcraft, can all cause extreme confusion. In many such cases, creating confusion is often one of the methods that dishonest and manipulative people use in their effort to disable the agency of others and take control of a situation.

Cognitive Dissonance is a larger issue which arises when a person experiences a crisis of belief, which they are often not aware of. This is experienced as a mental confusion that is a source of great stress and anxiety, and it has a significant impact on their attitudes. Cognitive dissonance can be experienced in different forms.

- The person simultaneously holds two incompatible cognitions in habitual use (e.g. double-mindedness).
- The person's beliefs are not in agreement with their behaviors (e.g. hypocrisy).
- The person denies certain undesirable characteristics of themself, and believes that the problem lies in others (e.g. projection)
- The person has a false notion, which they believe to be true and right, but their beliefs are not complicit with objective truth (e.g. dissociative rationalization).
- The person has a belief, which they know to be true and right, but it simply isn't taking them where they want to go in life (e.g. dispassionate ambivalence).

Cognitive Dissonance can be expressed in the following ways.

- Double Mindedness – When a person simultaneously holds two or more contradictory beliefs, ideas, or values, and cannot experience the impact, satisfaction and/or rewards of either one.*
- Hypocrisy – When a person says or does something that contradicts their existing beliefs, ideas, or values.*
- Projection – When a person attributes other people to be the source of negative thoughts and behaviors which actually arise from within themselves, and thereby shifts blame from themselves onto others.*
- Dissociative Rationalization, AKA "Hamstering" – When a person invents a seemingly rational explanation for their otherwise inappropriate words or behaviors.*
- Dispassionate Ambivalence (or Apathy) – When a person is confronted with new information that contradicts their existing beliefs, ideas, and values, and because the person is lacking an urgent sense of agency, they are thereby disabled from effectively handling the learning process.*

Learning is a process in which a person is confronted with some new information, and they are then faced with the challenge of integrating this new information into their present understanding of things. It often requires them to rethink many of their previously held notions about things, and to change some of their existing beliefs. It may also be necessary for them to only accept part of the new information, and reject other parts, depending on what parts have urgency, and what can be accepted into one's belief and value system. Learning can be either limited to the cognitive arena, or it may involve a change of attitudes and behaviors as well. Learning is hard work, but at some point in time, people have to face the dissonance in their lives, and change some things in order to achieve an acceptable status. Being successful in this endeavor is a central aspect of maturing in the knowledge of Truth.

11. On the Journey Towards Truth

Humans are all ruled by their own life stories, which generate enormously complicated codes, and the codes form thousands of guiding principles that suggest and inform their every move and every decision. People cannot escape their life-stories, but instead, they should learn to accept themselves and make the most of who they are. It makes sense to figure out our personal values, our habits, our virtues and vices, our motives or guiding principles, our private logic, the nature of our codes, and to discover how fruitful our codes can be, or whether they are wrong-headed, goofy, damaging or even malicious.

Thus, the process of self-discovery, especially for those who suffer (following Aristotle's form of Tragedy), is to get clarity about how they function, how their life-stories compare to others', how their lives can be put straight, and then what to do about it. Everyone has a different plight. Some of those who suffer need to learn how to adjust to this world, and take responsibility for letting others know who they are, and teaching others how they want to be treated. Others who suffer, and who are well acquainted with the ways of this crazy world, need to find and develop an inner guide of some truth and elegance.

To this end, it is of monumental value to study personality types and temperaments. People are not completely random and unique. They tend to fall into a category of temperaments. For example, some people care most about completing a task well and on time, whereas others care more about the process of completing the task, like how the people involved in the task are utilized and treated. Some people focus mainly on what they can see and touch, while others spend most of their energy on dreams, relationships and ideas. People tend to be either outgoing or reserved. People tend to be either emotional, or rational. Moreover, people attain blends of these four dichotomies, which comprise four basic personality types, and these can be seen everyday in the people around you. All (normal) people fall into one of these four personality types in order to create stories that in some way offer meaning, structure and guidance to their lives.

Example 1 of Mythos [1]

If you read carefully the text of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr's classic, I Have a Dream, mythos oozes from the text. This is almost the speech in a nutshell:

> "The United States promised justice for all. You've denied it to people of color. This denial is a violation of the American story. It's time to live up to your story."

Mythos is what explains the power of this section from the speech:

> "Instead of honoring this sacred obligation, America has given the Negro people a bad check, a check which has come back marked "insufficient funds". But we refuse to believe that the bank of justice is bankrupt. We refuse to believe that there are insufficient funds in the great vaults of opportunity of this nation. And so, we've come to cash this check, a check that will give us upon demand the riches of freedom and the security of justice."

In other words, he says, in essence, "with your discrimination against black Americans (Dr. King used the word "negroes" in his speech), you have violated your narrative, your story – our story."

He repeated this same message so powerfully in his last speech, I've Been to the Mountaintop, which was delivered the night before he was assassinated:

> "All we say to America is,"Be true to what you said on paper."

So, here's the principle: if you as a speaker can say, "this is our story, and this step we take is part of the ongoing story – part of our story, a step that we must take together"… then you've marshaled a powerful persuasive tool to your cause.

Example 2 of Mythos [1]

NPR has a talk show called Fresh Air with Terry Gross. She was interviewing Jo Becker, the author of the book Forcing the Spring. (This book describes the struggles in recent years in the fight for marriage equality, which has attracted much controversy and criticism.) In the interview, we learn about the moment that President Obama threw his support to marriage equality. Here is the excerpt from the interview. Note the power of the narrative story, which is employed through the reference to a concept of mythos – "equality is part of the story we all believe in".

> "When the president gathered a little – months later, his advisors together, and said, 'I want to do this', David Plouffe, who was the campaign manager of Obama's 2008 campaign, called (Ken) Mehlman, and asked for, kind of, 'if we're going to do this, how might we go about it in a way that would appeal to, sort of, Middle America?'"
> "And Chad and Mehlman had made a real study of this. And what they had come to understand was that if you talk about marriage in terms of hospitalization visitation (being able to visit someone in the hospital), or being able to get a tax break, then straight people kind of think, well, gay people don't want to get married for the same reason that we do."
> "But if you talk about it in terms of, like, their stories, right, these plaintive stories that they 'love each other', that they 'want to commit to each other', it becomes clear that they want to own this language that allows everybody to understand the reality and the commitment of the relationship. Well, that really moves people."
> "And the other thing that they were finding that really moves people, is if you talk about this issue in terms of, sort of, 'shared American values'. So you talk about it in terms of the Golden Rule, right? You have to say, you know, most Americans believe that, you know, you wanted to be treated the way you treat others, I mean, treat others the way you want to be treated."
> "That was moving to people. Are we really going to say to members of our military that they can't marry the person that they love after coming home from Afghanistan? Are we going to tell the policeman in your neighborhood who keeps you safe that they can't marry the person that they love? And what was kind of really interesting was when the president then, after Biden said what he said on 'Meet the Press', they scrambled and they got an interview ready."
> "And when he went and sat down for this interview with Robin Roberts, it was very much a mirror of these talking points and these very poll-tested kinds of messages that were resonating with the American public."

In other words, if the story of America genuinely reflects the Golden Rule in the form of providing a place for people to live their lives with the person they love… if that is the story, then how can we not support this? This pushes aside the prevailing beliefs, and finds a niche in people's minds and hearts, whether or not people can accept it as being "true".

12. Conclusions

Whenever you sit down to watch the news, or read the newspaper, remember the four elements of truth, Logos, Ethos, Pathos, and Mythos. Be aware of how these elements, especially Mythos, i.e. the narrative fallacy, might be construed to seduce you into sympathising or even agreeing to the viewpoints that are portrayed. Ultimately, YOU decide what to accept as truth or not. Do not let others deceive you into believing what is not inherently true.

Advice for women over the age of 30 who are looking to be married.

Jack · 1 June 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Maximize your positives and identify ways that you could provide value to a man's life.

Readership: Women over 30
Length: 1,200 words
Reading Time: 4 minutes

Examine Yourself

There are a lot of older women, and by that I mean, 30+ years old, who are looking for a marriage. The numbers of older women seeking marriage keep growing every year. What can these women do in their situation?

Let me start off by saying, I think it's important to be attracted to the person you marry. Let's be realistic. Generally, only Alphas (top SMV males) generate intense passion in women, and even that declines with familiarity and availability.

My advice to women in their 30's who are looking to marry…

1. Give more men a chance.
2. Honestly assess your own MMV desirability.
3. Be happy with moderate or even mild chemistry.

This will expand your acceptance filter enough for you to be able to find possible candidates, and if the man is a good match, then the sexual chemistry will very likely grow.

These are very easy steps (but perhaps very hard to swallow):

1. Learn what a "male orbiter" is.
2. Identify your orbiters.
3. Evaluate them, and eliminate the bottom 1/3 or so as possibilities
4. Come to the realization that you now know your Marriage Market Value.
5. Make a very careful decision about whether you want to marry a man of the same MMV as you. If you do not, then it might be wiser for you not to marry.

If you do decide that you want to pursue marriage, then here are some things that may help:

1. Date with intentionality. You are screening for husbands, not out to have fun for fun's sake. Have fun, but keep your goal in mind.
2. Let your prospective mates know this early. Although the timing and manner of your marriage-hunting disclosure must be finessed (baby rabies are scary), men who are also serious about getting married will not be easily frightened away.
3. Perhaps I'm old school, but in general I think the man should be older than the woman. It's just better that way. This custom feeds the natural predilections of both men (who generally want youth and fertility) and women (who generally want resources). This also means that for women in their late 20's or 30's, if the dating pool of men near your own age has dried up, then the fellows you will be most interested in will probably be pushing 40.
4. A lot of, maybe even most men in their MMV prime (mid-30's) already have children and have been through a divorce. Are you open to dating a recycle? Some of them have been divorced for a good reason, while some others are perfectly good guys who were profoundly unlucky. Some divorced men might have a combination of these two. Most divorced men will have emotional scars. An older man will be very thankful if you can be willing to accept the baggage he brings with him (kids and an unfriendly ex).

5. Be nice. You would be surprised at how grumpy women are these days, and how much that turns guys off. Joyfulness and gratefulness is a very attractive quality.
6. Assess your own baggage and how it affects your own MMV. How emotionally mature are you? Do you have lots of debt? Are you previously divorced? Do you have kids? Have you had lots of sex partners?
7. Make a list of what you're looking for in a guy. Only the top one or two should be deal-breakers, for example, being a serious Christian Believer, or wanting children. Pretty much everything else can be negotiable to an extent. Holding out for your list of must-haves might just be keeping you priced out of the marriage market.
8. Speaking of religion, if either of you will not be equally yoked, don't go there. No missionary dating, and no missionary marriages. You need to have as much certainty as possible about the future potential of a marriage partner.

You will probably not be able to marry a man that is equal to the most attractive man you could date. That's just how it is. Forget the nonsense about "settling". The idea is to get someone who matches you well. (I'm not saying you should marry one of your beta orbiters, but you will get someone at that same level.)

Once you find a potential Mr. Right, you should consider what you are bringing into the relationship. If you have the habit of dumping all your problems and lofty expectations on him, then he will be much less interested in marrying into that kind of relationship. If he is willing to tolerate all your tests and can handle all your problems and needs, then he probably really does love you. But in that case, you need to be honest about your vulnerabilities, sincere about your needs, trust his leadership, submit to his authority, and be gracious for the trouble he goes through for you. If you argue too much, resist him, or do not display gratitude frequently, he will eventually come to the conclusion that he is unable to handle your problems and needs, and he will give up on you and go looking for another woman. While it is true that true love endures, you also have to consider his needs for love and fulfillment as well. In other words, true love goes both ways!

Reality Check

If you have dated too much from the alpha tree, or even if you have not, but have spent all your time under the alpha tree hoping for some fruit to fall, you JUST MIGHT have damaged your ability to have realistic expectations.

The reality on the ground for marriage minded people is very different than the lofty fantasy world of college-age dating. Your dreams WILL NOT COME TRUE – most likely because you have dreamed fantasies, not realities.

Perhaps you should refrain from seeking marriage until you can reformat your expectations such that you could marry a good, average guy and actually be grateful to have him.

Check the Influence of Your Peers

Look carefully at the company you keep. Your best friends may well be your worst enemies. If they're hostile to the average nice guy, if they are bitter towards men, if they encourage you to make stupid decisions like slutting it up, or if you feel like any of your life decisions need their approval… then get rid of them. Find new friends, or even just tell them you need time to "find yourself", by which you mean, "get in touch with the good sense that you need to find a decent man."

Many females, girls as young as 12, and as old as 40, always have a circle of hell-hens who make it their life's mission to see that no other woman ever becomes more happy than they are, and never makes an independent decision, no matter what the cost. But what is less apparent to them, is that these women are motivated by insecurities and envy, and are not likely to help you achieve the best in life. If you are fortunate enough to have real, supportive, well-grounded female friends, keep them close and ask them to help you stay on the straight and narrow. If you have the clucking hens, ditch them by any means necessary.

Finding Mr. Right

Jack · 15 June 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Now introducing… Mr. Right, Mr. Right Fit, Mr. Right Now, Mr. Right On, and Mr. Good Enough! But can Miss Any identify them correctly and make the best choice for her life?

Mr. Right is the man who is in her own SMV band, who has a complementary personality (i.e. is her "type"), and who shares many spiritual values and attitudes towards life. He is the guy who loves and honors her, and she desires and respects him.

Mr. Right Fit is the man who appears to be a Mr. Right because he meets her list of qualifications, but there is something missing in their interaction that spells "no happy future" to the relationship.

When she gets impatient with herself, and starts to selfishly justify all her lack of qualities that she can offer to a man (i.e. dissociative rationalization, AKA "hamstering"), she will find a Mr. Right Now to fulfill all her urgent, immediate needs for attention and affirmation. But deep inside, she knows Mr. Right Now is just for now, not for marriage. Poor Mr. Right Now…

Mr. Right On is the man who can fill her life with the dizzying, distracting effects of romance, fun and good times, but he is not cut out for marriage. This guy is likely an Alpha male who is just using her for his own good times. Poor Miss Any…

The idea of "settling" connotes a failure to achieve a goal, and "Mr. Good Enough" only serves to reinforce that notion. She is getting too impatient about finding a man, and just grabs one whom she feels she can control and can take what she needs from him. It's not a good idea to marry this guy, because neither of you will be happy.

There is also a Mr. Bad Ass, who is a very confident, self-assured man who games her hard and treats her like an immature little girl, and teaches her some very hard lessons about life. She should watch her personal boundaries and beware that she does not "fall in love" with his dominance and charisma, and give Mr. Bad Ass a permanent place in her heart.

To find Mr. Right, what is actually necessary for many women is to accept their equals. It going to require some "humility" in admitting to themselves their own actual SMV/MMV, and concluding, not that they are settling for Mr. Good Enough, but that they have been lucky enough to find someone their equal, and realize they could easily have done worse, but were very unlikely to have done better.

If she feels like she's "settled", then there will continue to be many "what if..?" questions for her, and an increased likelihood of marital dissatisfaction with an attenuating increase in the likelihood of infidelity.

It's always been a source of great humor when someone posts a woman's list of demands in a man (gleaned from a dating site, Craig's List, etc.). Many men chuckle at the long list of what these women wish for, often juxtaposed with their own self-revealed lack of SMV. To offer a picture of reality, many of those women will need a chainsaw to get their heads straight about what is a perfect fit, and what qualities a good husband entails.

Demographics of Interracial Relationships in the United States

Jack · 29 June 2017 · Archived copy · Original

This post lists the highlights of the demographics for interracial/international relationships in the U.S.

- The Pew study finds that 8.4 percent of all current S. marriages, and 17% of newlyweds, are interracial, up from 3.2 percent in 1980.
- While interracial marriage correlates to a higher rate of divorce, this parallel applies mainly to marriages involving a non-white male and white female.
- Social enterprise research by the Columbia Business School (2005–2007) concluded that while East Asian women statistically prefer East Asian men for marriage, they show no discrimination against White men, causing Asian women/White men pairings to consistently become the prevalent form of interracial dating & marriage in the United States.
- Gender plays a significant role in interracial dynamics. White wife/Asian husband couples are 59% more likely to divorce by the 10th year of marriage than White wife/White husband couples, whereas Asian wife/White husband couples show only 4% greater likelihood of divorce than White wife/White husband couples over the same period.
- Marriages involving a white husband and black wife were substantially less likely to end in divorce than marriage involving a white husband and white wife; the former pairing's divorce rate was 44 percent less than the latter.
- Marriages including a black husband and white wife were more prone to divorce than those composed of black husbands and black wives. Black male/white female couples also had the highest likelihood of divorce of all white/non-white marriages.
- Hispanic white/non-Hispanic white and Asian/white marriages were more liable to divorce than those of Hispanic whites and Asians.
- Marrying between the ages of 21 and 49, the woman having been foreign born (as opposed to the man), and a higher level of education, are all factors that reduce the rate of divorce for interracial couples.
- Hispanics and Asians remain the most likely, as in previous decades, to marry outside of their race.

Sexual Market Value (SMV) vs. Marriage Market Value (MMV)

Jack · 27 July 2017 · Archived copy · Original

What people want in a sexual partner, and what people want in a marriage partner, are quite different. It's important to have an accurate assessment of one's meet market value.

Readership: All

Many young people, especially females, fail to recognize that there is a difference between their sexual market value (SMV) and their marriage market value (MMV). They are two different things, really. Of course some of the things that go into determining one's SMV (especially one's overall level of attractiveness) are also components of one's MMV, but the MMV has a lot of other things in it as well, such as the individual's values, attitudes and social/sexual history.

One important thing to consider is that a female's SMV hits its peak between the ages of 22-26, and declines sharply after that. By contrast, a male's SMV grows very slowly and peaks in his mid to late thirties, and only falls very gradually after that.

Another very critical point is that the attractiveness component of one's MMV is more calibrated to peer-levels than is the attractiveness component of one's SMV, at least when it comes to women. That is, a woman does not need to be a SMV peer of a man to generate sex appeal and success in the Sexual Marketplace, she merely has to be over a certain threshold for the guy. The same guy, however, when assessing a woman's MMV, will be looking for a woman who is much closer to his own SMV.

Another way of saying this is that high SMV guys will have sex with, and even date, women with lower SMVs, but they won't marry them. They will only consider marrying a woman who is their SMV peer. So a woman, when assessing her own MMV, has to take into account that the relevant aspect of her attractiveness for purposes of her MMV is not the highest SMV man she can attract for sex, but rather the highest MMV man who is in her same general SMV "banding".

This is a transition that can be quite hard for some women to make if they become used to dating men with SMV's that are considerably higher than the men in her own SMV peer banding. If a woman is totally "broken" by being spoiled by the attentions and affections of males who are much higher in SMV than her own, often times, they simply cannot recalibrate, which means, they can no longer become attracted to any of their SMV peers. In this case, the best course for them is to avoid marrying, because a marriage to one of their SMV peers will likely be miserable for both people.

In regards to the male point of view, a male will find it very difficult to remain "faithful" (viz. monogamous) with a female who has a substantially lower SMV than his own. As soon as he has a chance with a higher SMV female, the temptation will likely become more than he can handle. So it is advantageous for women seeking a long term relationship to choose a man within the same SMV banding as her own.

On the flip side, men will also find it laborious to remain satisfied with a woman who doesn't display natural expressions of respect and gratitude on a regular basis, regardless of her SMV. So women would do well to nurture these aspects of their feminine side, if they hope to have a happy relationship with a man.

The qualities that build a woman's SMV/MMV are discussed other previous posts, listed here.

- Sigma Frame: How does a woman attract (and keep) a husband? (October 5, 2009)
- Sigma Frame: Why Should a Woman Change Herself to "Get Along" with a Man? (October 6, 2009)

Now for men, there is not such a large disparity between their SMV and their MMV. Most men can easily transition from a sexual relationship, to a marriage, if they so desire. The challenge for men is to achieve the SMV/MMV that they know they are capable of. This often doesn't happen until they are in their mid 30's, so men shouldn't get too critical of themselves until this age.

Men can significantly improve their SMV/MMV through the following.

- Maintaining a consistent frame of mind. (very important)
- Learning and practicing "Game" on a regular basis. (also very important)
- Giving the impression of being unshakeable, unpredictable, aloof and sophisticated.
- Being purpose-driven, focused on their careers and various interests.
- Attaining an education and accumulating wealth and a reputation.
- Dressing to kill on a somewhat regular basis.
- Having a life, e.g. a job, a car, a girlfriend, a social agenda, and a small number of good guy-friends.

Men who fail to possess the above characteristics fall shamefully behind other men in the SMV/MMV competition. This doesn't change for men after they marry. In fact, it becomes even more important to maintain their SMV/MMV status in marriage, if they wish to appease, and thereby avoid, their wives hypergamous nature. But on a positive note for men, their SMV/MMV is less likely to fall more than that of their female counterparts.

Marriage is ideally for a lifetime, and to make a lifetime commitment, things have to be as close to perfect as possible. Therefore, it's better to marry at your SMV peak, while you have a lot of choice, because if you have a lot of choice, then you can make a better choice. There are so many people who don't want to get married at the height of their popularity, because they prefer to receive the attention and affection of many partners.

For women passing their SMV peak, as they get older, they can no longer can attract the same quality and quantity of partners as they did before. At this time, there is less choice, and less opportunity to make a satisfying choice. Some women experience this change very suddenly, drastically, and abruptly, and this phenomenon is colloquially called, "hitting the wall". If a woman has not found a suitable marriage partner before this time, she is likely facing a lot of sublimated regrets and angst, while being forced to accept some very unattractive choices about how to spend the rest of her life.

For men reaching their SMV prime, they experience what is commonly called a "mid-life crisis". They realize they have much more choice and opportunities than they ever before realized, and they feel stupid and ashamed to have made the choices they made earlier in life. These men often make the mistake of throwing away everything they have invested their lives in, just to pursue the possibilities of what they might have missed out on.

In summary, recognize your own SMV/MMV, and count it worthy of cashing in on at the SMV/MMV peak of your life. By doing so, you will wisely make the most of your personal assets, and do the best towards achieving your own happiness and potential.

Some Advice to Young People looking to Date or Marry

The Fundamental Idea of Marriage

Marriage was designed by God to be a real-world human relationship between a man and a woman which conforms to the archetypical relationship between God and mankind. Any relationship which does not conform to this archetype, is destined to be, at best, frustrating and unhappy, or at worst, doomed to failure.

Courtship and dating are the natural processes of exploring our personality, temperament, and unique emotional needs, and discovering what kind of person suits us best. It is also the process of learning these same qualities in members of the opposite sex.

The grand end goal (for Christians) is to eventually arrive in a state of marriage, which may indeed have its own struggles and sacrifices, but offers many vital benefits, which overall, are intended to be a much better alternative than remaining single. A few of these benefits include.

- A vehicle of spiritual growth and maturity.
- A safe, reliable and respectable avenue of sexual expression.
- Financial stability and growth.
- Having a "home base" where you can relax and be yourself.
- The joy of having a family and leaving a legacy.
- Having a constant and reliable companion, friend and helper.
- Someone who challenges and inspires you each day, to become a better person.

Have a Serious Mindset about Honor, Love, Sex, and Marriage

Men are the gatekeepers of commitment, which means, the woman has a greater need for love and security, and so she is always eager and open to the idea of commitment, and all the associated benefits, such as financial and material provisions. But a commitment doesn't happen until the man decides on it. To men, marriage is a huge sacrifice which requires their time, money and emotional effort, and it severely limits his personal liberties and many other opportunities in life, so a man is not likely to choose marriage unless he sees it as a good investment. To women, marriage is more or less a benefit, because it gives them a home, social security and financial stability.

Women are the gatekeepers of sex, which means, the man has a more immiment need for sexual expression, and so he is usually always eager and open to the idea of having sex. But sex doesn't happen until the woman decides on it. To women, sex is a sacrificial act of trust and vulnerability which changes her social standing and her emotional life forever. So a woman is very hesitant to offer sex unless she is very certain that making this sacrifice will make her life infinitely better.

Men and women who are more willing to offer commitment or sex, respectively, make themselves more competitive in attracting the mate of their choice. That is, those members of the opposite sex are generally more interested in those potential mates who readily offer them what they want out of the relationship. Men and women who are hesitant to offer commitment, and/or who are too reserved about sex, respectively, are often passed over in favor of another person who is more willing to give of themselves to the others interests in establishing a meaningful connection. However, once a commitment and/or sexual liaison is established, they become much less competitive, because others tend to see them as “taken”, or in other words, “removed from the marketplace”. Also, men and women are more attracted to others who have never had sex, or never been married, respectively. So the choice to marry or have sex is a very powerful one, but it is also a huge sacrifice because it has great risks. Therefore, this choice should be reserved for those who are mature enough to take such risks and be wise about it.

Human nature has shown that men are attracted to a women who respects them, and they often grow to love the woman they have sex with, while women are usually only willing to have sex with a man who makes them feel loved. Since love, honor, and sex have a reciprocal nature between the sexes, marriage is a very powerful way to bestow honor upon a passionate, loving sexual relationship, or to get one started. Love, honor, marriage, and sex (and quite probably children) should all go hand-in-hand. If you try to pick out one or two, but neglect or try to avoid the others, you will have trouble. If you try to use one to gain the other, you are taking a huge risk which is best avoided.

Men who quickly and easily give away their time, money, attention, commitment, and/or resources, without a corresponding requirement for honor, respect and/or sex, are called cowards, pussies or betas. Cowards have no faith, nor a glorified sense of purpose in their lives. Pussies are overly eager to sacrifice their own power of choice in favor of giving others whatever they demand, usually because they are lazy, or they are cowards. Betas are pussies with no honor or self respect. All of these types are generally hated because they denigrate the masculine archetype, and they spoil women’s selfish desires, thereby giving those women a way to escape the maturation process — something that would make them worthy of a man’s commitment.

Women who quickly and easily give away sex, without a corresponding requirement for love and commitment, are colloquially termed sluts or whores. Sluts generally have no sense of honor or self respect, and they are hated by others because they dominate the competition by making excessive sacrifices which lowers the overall value of sex and destroys the sexual marketplace economy.

Social demographics data shows some fascinating evidence on how a higher sex-partner-count predicts an unstable marriage. This is primarily because sexual promiscuity destroys one’s ability to bond in a LTR and thereby erodes marital commitment and contentment. This is aggravated by the fact that people who lack the social values, emotional maturity, and positive attitude that lead to a good marriage will destroy their relationships and then start up with someone else (viz. serial monogamy), thereby accumulating a higher partner count.

Marriage minded men are hesitant, or at least, should be hesitant, to marry a younger woman who is not close to being virginal. This is because a woman’s sexual history carries so much emotional baggage that is impossible to erase, and almost impossible to deal with. Also, men find it very difficult to totally thrill a woman who has been thrilled many times before, with many other men. Most women don’t realize that their virginity is the most valuable asset they have towards obtaining a happy marriage, and the best gift they could possibly give their husbands.

Western culture has elevated love to be the supreme source of happiness. However, marriage minded people should be hesitant to marry a person who thinks marriage is all about love, because a lot of people’s ideas about love are little more than the cultural mythos gone to their heads. Both men and women often expect their partner to produce this experience in their lives. But if one enters marriage looking for love (or sex), their hopes will be in vain, because Love is the eternal, ineffable quality that is hard to find and hard to replicate. Peace with God cannot be achieved simply by getting married. On the other hand, if a woman can figure out how to offer a balance of affectionate and kindhearted love and respect to a man, he may melt and become putty in her hand.

Men are logical, practical and goal-oriented, and thus, most men fail to realize the grand intensity of the mark they leave on a woman’s life, especially women they have sex with, even just once. Having sex with a woman, and not following through with a marital commitment, robs her of the dignity her sacrifice deserves and simultaneously transforms her into a slut. If this trend continues, it sends her down the road towards becoming a cougar or cat lady.

Most women fail to realize how easy it is for a man to fall in love with a woman he has sex with. Women don’t realize this, because everywhere they look, they see men dumping the women they have sex with. Men do not reject women because they have sex, or have it too soon, but rather because she doesn't carry a sense of passion, dignity and self respect in the act of sex. But even if the sex is good, then men might still reject a woman they have sex with, because the woman is too immature, selfish, demanding, disrespectful, and cannot contribute anything to the relationship. On the other hand, if the woman is happy, mature, respectful, reasonably attractive, and offering sex, then a man has little reason to reject a woman, unless it is in favor of a better woman. Thus, as we mentioned before, men are the gatekeepers of commitment.

The Unique Nature, Roles and Needs of Men and Women

Young women should get used to the idea of men being overly focused on the physical appearance of the woman in his life. Men want to have a woman who is HOT! Aside from the obvious factor of sexual attraction, men think this way partly because the inside qualities of a woman usually get better over time, but the outside always declines with age. Also, according to my experience, the quality of the inside is usually not too different from the quality of the outside, aside from a few rare exceptions.

Women, instead of arguing and fighting against this part of human nature, it would be easier and wiser to work it to your advantage. Being attractive is not too hard to do. Stay slim and fit. Let you hair grow long and beautiful, and keep it clean and maintained. Dress with a balance of self-respect and sexiness, and always remember to wear clothes that enhance your natural body shape, and to choose colors that bring out your personality.

Being an attractive lady will also bring you lots of social attention, and that will require you to exercise personal boundaries, to think rationally in making decisions, and to learn how to deal with social pressures, all of which will hopefully lead to your emotional and spiritual maturity.

You should always stay positive, rely on setting appropriate boundaries and keep a healthy sense of self-esteem. People will respect you as much as you respect yourself, and the men will definitely notice you. A good past, and a high level of emotional / spiritual maturity, are the best things you can bring into a relationship with a man.

Men should get used to the way women are always "playing games", estimating and often testing men on various measures of being an ideal mate. Women want to have a man whom they feel proud to be with! Women think this way because they are unable to meet many of their own needs, and they look to a man to fulfill their lives. A woman's whole life will fall apart if the man she depends on is not up to the task. She needs a man who will fulfill her sense of honor, and not make her feel like a shameful beggar.

Men, instead of complaining or trying to circumvent this fact of life, it would be better to work it to your advantage. Instead of relying on "being nice", or trying lines, tricks or stunts to impress a woman, you should be focusing on your own self-development, and making yourself a better man. Get active in various interests and activities, and pursue your own dreams. After a time, women will notice that you have a life, and they'll come running after you.

In summary, I encourage you to spend a little time to understand the nature of males and females, and God's design for us as human beings. I truly believe that if you submit to God's ordained order, then you will find the happiness from a relationship that you so innately desire.

Women are Tempted to Become Masculine, Men are Tempted to Wimp Out

Jack · 17 August 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Many core concepts of feminism seek gender equity, which essentially aims for women to become more masculine, and men to be more feminine than what God designed them to be.

Feministic ideology also purports that males commonly abuse their power by manipulating women. Feminists might use some studies to claim that there is a direct link between female submissiveness and female abuse, and indeed there is some evidence on this point. But by and large, this claim simply does not apply in regard to data on the larger demographic. Scientific studies such as this, the Bible, as well as men's own experiences, all indicate that most males are hesitant to act, and instead, they withdraw and remain silent, especially whenever the woman in his life is belligerent, demanding, disdainful, contemptuous, or outspoken about her dissatisfactions and complaints. Or more simply put, when the woman is being disrespectful and unsubmissive, the relationship is destined to decline. The Biblical truth is that if women adopt a respectful and humble attitude, they will receive better treatment from men. Or more simply put, women will attract the love of men.

The Interrelational Dynamics

When women are physically attracted to the aesthetics of an alpha male, and seek the conquest of an alpha male, they are relinquishing their need for love and security, and adopting male traits (being attracted to beauty, hunting for a mate, etc.). When they postpone marriage and seek higher education with the view to develop a professional career, it is likely that they are doing it so that they can live an independent life, and won't need to depend on anyone else, namely her future husband. The spiritual fallacy here is not in seeking self-sufficiency, education, independence, a high quality mate, or a career, but in the woman's self-centered desire for choice and control, her reluctance to trust, her refusal to be beautifully vulnerable, and her hesitancy to faithfully rely on the love and good graces of others, namely God and her future husband.

Men, on the other hand, are constantly pressured to give, provide, and perform. They tend to get tired and frustrated by all the competition and work that is necessary to succeed in life. They need encouragement and support on a daily basis. On top of that, it is easy for them to get emotionally fatigued while caring for, and dealing with a woman. This is especially true when the woman is selfish, insecure and immature, and who is constantly giving him drama and "fitness tests". These men find it easier to just "check out" and live their own lives, seeking rest, relaxation, and recluse from society. The spiritual fallacy is when this is done to extremes, his thereby becoming cynical, unmotivated, apathetic and careless. By doing so, men are adopting female traits (enjoying comfort, taking things as they come, etc.).

Unfortunately, our natural tendencies in dealing with these challenges will not lead us to greater happiness or holiness. It is important to counteract these inclinations in order to achieve total efficacy as a male or female.

Conclusions

Women need to realize that if they display respect, and submit to the man in their life, they will naturally grow to trust and love him more. This is God's command. By doing so, women can find the contentment and love they desire. God's honor! (Women, if you don't believe it, then try it sometime and see for yourself whether God's word is faithful and true.)

Men should see that by being responsible for the woman in their life, and doing their best to love her as their partner in experiencing the grace of God, they can achieve a greater sense of confidence, dignity and honor. This is also God's command, and God is true to His promises. (Men, try praying, taking a risk and investing in your woman, and see if she doesn't respond by becoming everything you dreamed.)

God blesses those who are obedient, even when their partner is not. But only when both partners come to embrace their respective, prescribed roles in a relationship, can God's promises be totally fulfilled.

I challenge my reader to become faithful and obedient by offering your partner forgiveness and undeserved love and respect, and to see for yourself whether God's design is worth your effort to achieve.

The Beta-zation of Christian Men

Jack · 25 August 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Christian men who are serious about following the advice in the Bible face unfair competition in today's SMP. From the PUA perspective, all alpha Christian men who follow the Lord's command to "abstain from fornication" would essentially be relegating themselves to beta status, by refusing all opportunities to get laid outside of marriage. As a consequence, these Christian men lose all those wonderful opportunities to discover, build and refine their ability to create those magical Tingles in a woman, which is something very useful in building contentment within a Christian marriage to a not-so-Christian ex-carousel rider – which is who you will end up with as the beta you chose to become!

Now, I am not making a justification for alpha Christian men to sleep around. I just want to facetiously point out that it is a mistake to think only from the perspectives of this world. It would be ideal if the vast majority of people would see things from God's point of view, and would follow the Lord's commands in every part of their lives. If people did so, God would be faithful to His promises, and then our whole society would be closer to the Kingdom of God. But the sorry fact of the matter is that the majority of people in society, both men and women, Christian and agnostic, care more about getting the Tingles, than about building God's Kingdom. So those Christians who are faithful and obedient to God's Word are at a stark disadvantage in the world's system. When more Christians wake up to this fact, and start living their lives according to God's word, then they will all experience a little less of that disadvantage. We could also say it's the old "united we stand, divided we fall" idea.

Pick Up Game – Does it serve the needs of Men, or is it for Women?

Intro

I am thankful for Red Pill bloggers like Dalrock and Heartiste who attempt to instigate open and honest discussions of post-feminist matters, from which intelligent people should be able to approach the truth a little further. Heartiste lays bare the exceedingly ugly social situation (which is even more ugly to talk about), and the defacto dog-eat-dog sexual dynamics that are graphically in play in today's society – the Red Pill truth for those who have the stomach to swallow it! Dalrock confirms many of the basic phenomena laid out by Heartiste, but he doesn't stop there. He heroically attempts to show the other side of the coin in stereographic clarity – the alternate and often ironic spiritual aspect of living in this mess.

Dalrock has one post that is especially satisfying, Heartiste isn't to blame for equivocating virtue with alpha (2015/6/13). It lays out, in relatively unbiased language, the plain state of the present "affairs" of society, including corrupted "Churchianity", the political mess in this world (especially in the U.S.), the heavy and nearly invisible shadow of feminism on society, the sexual marketplace (which many Christians still consider taboo to discuss in total earnestness) … all the things that are going on right now, but very few really understand very well.

In the comments under this post, someone wrote a comment saying that Pick Up Artist Game is a reactionary product of feminism that has transformed men into dancing monkeys and tools of women (Argument A). Someone else argued back that PU Game only serves the needs of men and is abusive towards women (Argument B). At face value, I can see how either of these standpoints can be true, but how can they both be true? So this debate got me stewing in thought about which is the 'better' or more correct perspective.

Game is Not for Everyone

First of all, PUG is something that comes naturally to certain men, while other men can't "get it" even if their lives depended on it. There are a few men in the middle though, men who can watch PUA media, study the methods of seduction, and catch on after a time. Most of it is highly dependent on maturity, social dexterity, and experience / practice, but natural charisma tends to be a key ingredient as to whether it will 'work' or not.

Also, men who are naturally good at Game tend to have a higher SMV and be the alphas in the bunch, and men who are clueless about Game are relegated as non-alphas and have a corresponding low SMV, according to the theory anyway.

Examining Argument A

The PUA industry is clearly a social reaction to the disappearance of traditional courtship, the breakdown of accountability / responsibility, birth control, women's economic independence, the rise of hypergamy and such, and especially the growing stranglehold of feministic values and attitudes within society, all of which have undermined the good will between the sexes.

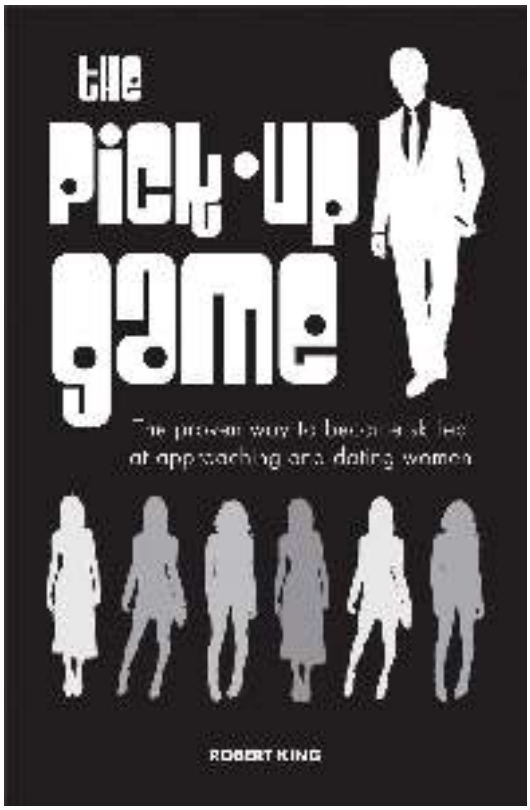
But human nature has not changed. The always urgent and ever enduring male 'thirst', coupled with the inherent difficulty of satiating this 'thirst' that many men experience, is the 'hook' that the PUA industry latches onto to make their money. The PUA industry essentially targets those non-alphas who feel the sting of inefficacy and rejection most acutely and who consequently feel the urgent need to make some changes.

PUA gurus challenge men to become alpha males, and those young non-alpha men who follow the PUA industry believe that if they can change themselves to be more alpha-like, then all their problems will go away. But in fact, the real goal is NOT to become an alpha male, but rather, to NOT be an !ncel. The alpha male archetype is just an iconic placeholder for a man who has a soft harem at his disposal.

Apparently, the betas-in-waiting do not seem to realize that the game is staged, because not every man can be alpha — no more than 20% by the classic female definition — and the real problem is with society as a whole. Even for those men who can learn PUG, Gaming women will always be an uphill slog because as long as women's hypergamous nature is in action and the Tingle is the deciding factor, there will always be someone better.

Examining Argument B

It is commonly believed (and not just by Heartiste, as Dalrock pointed out) that a man's alpha-ness can be gauged by their notch-count, but this indicator is only valid in the case of widespread hypergamy.



It is also observed (by PUA mainly, but many others too, like Heartiste) that PUG is a type of emotional domination or possibly a manipulation of the woman, but actually, if the truth be told, PUG only works if, when, and because women actually wish to be dominated and/or manipulated by the alpha male(s) of their choice.

One of the fundamental laws of PUG is that a man can only seduce a woman who wants to be seduced by him, and that a man should not waste his time on those women who don't get the Tingles by him. In other words, PUG only exposes and enhances any latent Tingles that are already present, and then works with that to a desired end.

It should be noted that this only occurs between those men and women who happen to be highly attracted to each other, who can play the Game very skillfully, and who possess a sufficient awareness of the desires and sensitivities of the opposite sex.

Discussion

PUG has become popularized because it is one venue (other than marriage, which feminism has thoroughly defamed for both men and women) through which alpha / high SMV men are commonly known to fulfill the incessant blue-ball desires of their flesh, and it is done by exploiting the natural desires (or weaknesses) of the female flesh.

In essence, Pick Up Game is the smooth harvest of sexual gratification through a skillful and respectful appeal to the fleshly weaknesses of both sexes. By appeasing the flesh of both parties, the whole process becomes very efficient, even desirable, and it can also bypass much of the risk of rejection, which men are very sensitive to.

Of course, it is much more complicated than this, when you throw in SMV, the ego and libido, birth control glasses, and other social factors, but that is essentially what is happening when PUG works successfully — a complex, but inherently mutual stimulation of the fleshly nature.

While it is true that the fleshly nature is an integral part of our lives, it is not the only part, at least not for those who believe in Christ. Christian men understand that all these characteristics of alpha-ness, hypergamy, SMV standards and such, are all characteristics of our feral nature, or the “flesh” as the Bible terms it. As such, employing Game as a means to a horizonal end is essentially serving the feminist Tingle-god.

Conclusions

Anyway, now going back to the original question, ”Does PUG serve the needs of women, or does it only serve the needs of men?”

It is clear that PUG serves the needs of both men and women, and it does so by paying homage to the Tingle-god.

But it does NOT serve the needs of ALL men, unfortunately — only those few men who can master the Game.

Serving the Tingle-god might get a small number of men laid, but it also places males as a whole in a subservient role, and causes the distribution of sexual interaction to be very unbalanced. As a result, 20% of men bang up 80% of women in rotation and ruin them for marriage, 20% of men can get lucky on a woman’s bad hair day, and the remaining 60+% of men who can’t play the Game get thrown under the bus.

It’s a fantastically brilliant setup to undermine the knowledge of God, isn’t it?

Overall, the deck is stacked against men. Argument A applies to that middle segment of men, and is more accurate, allowing some exceptions. Argument B only applies to The Naturals who don’t really need to learn PUG in the first place.

Moral Considerations

The best and worst case scenarios.

Combining the lines of reasoning from The Beta-zation of Christian Men (2017/8/25) and Pick Up Game – Does it serve the needs of Men, or is it for Women? (2017/9/23) …

Character and motivation become prescient indicators of morality and the longitudinal outcome of the relationship, respectively. In the best case scenario, a highly conditional case of interaction has the potential to develop into a stable and mutually satisfying LTR. OTOH, the worst case scenario is also made possible. If ill will or carelessness of a male is involved, then this is where the feminist misandry and "r@pe culture" rationale gets its foundation. If ill will or carelessness of a female is in play, then we have the travesties of abortion, cuckoldry, divorce, and divorce theft.

Unfortunately, the current social dynamics tend to encourage the worst expressions of both the male and female fleshly nature. The safeguards that once encouraged matrimony have been methodically eradicated, and the casuistry surrounding sexual relations exacerbates the probability of producing the worst outcomes possible. This is a direct consequence of the widespread acceptance of casual sex since the sexual revolution, and is indirectly encouraged by the feminist inspired culture.

As a result, we see that women have no qualms about divorcing or trading up one man for another, and high SMV men think nothing of keeping a number of chicks on rotation, tossing one out in favor of another who's younger, hotter, and tighter. The other 60+% of men who can't play the Game are totally excluded from it, thereby causing the distribution of sexual interaction to be very unbalanced.

All in all, it's a fantastically brilliant setup to undermine the knowledge of God.

Dyadic Cofactors on Marital Stability in Australia

It's different from what the media would have us believe.

In this post, we take a look at an example of how scientific reports can be misleading, and how the liberal media exaggerates those specific claims that fit the feminist narrative, all while failing to recognize the error – or perhaps more insidiously, deftly overlooking it.

In fact, I would go so far as to say, if the news goes crazy about any particular scientific finding, there's a very good chance that the scientific study lacks rigor and caters to sensationalism.

I found this example from a few years ago.

In 2009-2010, a blue pill scientific study was published concerning dyadic cofactors on marital stability, and was entitled, "What's Love Got To Do With It?". This study was wildly popular in the media, receiving reviews and summaries on several news outlets. One summary of this study from Reuters Press can be found here.

This study was authored by Dr. Rebecca Kippen and Professor Bruce Chapman from The Australian National University, and Dr Peng Yu from the Department of Families, Housing, Community Services and Indigenous Affairs.

A brief summary of the findings of this study are as follows.

> In terms of 'good' marriages, our laundry list might read:
> a. Husband 1 year younger to 3 years older than his wife
> b. Husband and wife have similar preference for a(nother) child
> c. Husband and wife have same level of education > d. Both 0-2 standard drinks per day > e. Both do not smoke
> f. Equivalised household income is $30,000–$39,999
> g. Husband works 35 or more hours per week
> h. Husband perceives the family as comfortable to prosperous
> i. Both sets of parents did not separate/divorce > j. Husband's age at marriage is 30–34 years > k. First marriage for both > l. No children born before marriage
> m. Wife (responded with a rating of) '8' on would like another child
> The probability of separation is less than one per cent over the first five years, and less than four per cent over 35 years.
> In contrast, 'bad' marriages in terms of (1) homogamy, (2) socio-economic variables, and (3) marriage and children variables can be defined respectively.
> In terms of (1) homogamy, characteristics associated with increased separation hazard include:
> a. Husband 9 or more years older than his wife
> b. Wife 5–10 points higher than husband on preference for a(nother) child > c. Husband's education much higher than wife's education

> d. Husband 0–2 drinks, wife 3+ drinks
> e. Husband does not smoke, wife smokes
> For (2) socio-economic variables:
> f. Equivalised household income is under $20,000
> g. Husband is unemployed
> h. Husband perceives the family as very poor to just getting by
> For (3) marriage and children:
> i. Both sets of parents separated/divorced
> j. Husband's age at marriage is under 25 years > k. Second-plus marriage for both > l. Children born before marriage
> m. Wife (responded with a rating of) '2' on "would like another child"

A lot of the data appears congruent with intuition, but that is part of the smooth, pleasant appeal. Remember, the title of this study was, "What's love got to do with it?" This title, once made into news headlines, adds a spinning frame. Several problematic issues are listed as follows, and none of them are very good.

- The study emphasizes the dyadic aspect – what each partner brings to the marriage – and fails to clearly state that these factors listed above are not causative factors, but merely cofactors.
- The authors presume there is a connection between these dyadic cofactors and "love", as indicated by the frequency of divorce.
- As such, the cofactors are easy to be mistaken as being causative factors of either good or poor marriages, which is simply not true.
- The impression of the title is that love is preferential, but also optional, which basically spoofs and discredits the power of love.
- As a whole, the news uses this misinformation to create an illusion of well-being in society, where in reality, traditional marriage, which is the foundation of a strong society, is being ripped to shreds.

Now onto the next point of contention.

This study finds that homogamy contributes towards marital stability. That is, the more similar the personal habits and lifestyles of the individuals are, the less likely the couple is to divorce. That much seems acceptable, but they found a few caveats,

> However homogamy in terms of country of birth and religiosity are not important.

Statistically speaking, this suggests that a protestant Australian man can marry a Muslim Indonesian woman, and the success of the marriage should be outstanding, provided that the wife doesn't smoke or drink more than the husband, which is very likely, since the Koran forbids drinking alcohol. It makes one wonder, what influence does God and Country really have on a person? I believe this is a subtle attack on nationalism – a bastion of conservatives.

Moving on again.

Kippen and Chapman also attempted to assuage one of the common fears associated with the demise of marriage. (Remember, the demise of marriage is arguably the main concern that forms the backbone of the manosphere.) The specific fear that they try to debunk is that if women were to achieve economic equity, then they would be more likely to abandon their marriages. An excerpt follows.

> The independence hypothesis postulates that women are more likely to leave a marriage if they have the > resources to do so, measured in terms of education and connection to the labour force. Using Australian data we find no support for this. Wife's education, employment status and years in paid work have no significant correlation with the risk of marital separation.

By referring to the fact that their study does not support the independence hypothesis, the authors make it clear that they are trying to renegate the perceived problem of women's independence. Although they may not be reporting the results of their findings incorrectly, the way this claim is stated is nevertheless craftily misleading, because their scope of impact is too myopic. A larger view would recognize that in the "rest of the west", women are choosing to delay marriage and raising a family in order to pursue education and careers. In other words, more women are choosing self-advancement INSTEAD of getting married!

To prove my point, some recent trends in marriage are found here. The marriage rate in the U.S. dropped from 8.2 to 6.9 between 2000 and 2015, while the divorce rate dropped from 4.0 to 3.1 over the same time period. If we compare the marriage rate to the divorce rate (-15.8% versus -22.5%, respectively), the divorce rate dropped more. Also, cohabitation and the number of children born out of wedlock has been on the rise, but has leveled off since 2010. This phenomena is further explored by Dalrock here. This information suggests that people basically got more serious about taking and keeping their wedding vows, with more people taking the detour of bypassing the formal legal arrangement.

In essence, marriage has become very unpopular, and a careful study of the data tends to confirm the female independence hypothesis. The growing independence of many women greatly reduces their MMV, and effectively dries up the pool of those deemed eligible for marriage by men. This aspect of the female independence hypothesis also seems to explain why the marriage rate to foreigners is on the rise. According to this article in USA Today, 21% of marriages in the U.S. had at least one foreign born spouse in 2010.

In making a scientific conclusion, the conclusion must have the following.

1. The conclusion should follow the results of the experimental procedure.
2. The conclusion should attempt to answer the question motivating the research.
3. It must state how the hypothesis has been either proved or disproved.

By stating their conclusion that the female independence hypothesis is unsupported, they are making a sampling error relative to this conclusion, and they are giving the public a scientific version of a cross between a red herring and straw man. They are basically saying, "There's no problem with female independence. Nothing to see here, now move along!" In addition, they are also quietly alluding that, "The manosphere has no real credibility. It is only a vestige of the misogyny from pre-modern times.

The news media jumps on this report, because it fits their feminist narrative, and sadly, most of the public accepts it at face value. Only those who take the time to review the study carefully with criticism would discover that the range of their study is outside their claims in the conclusions. But by then, people have already accepted and digested these false conclusions, and forgotten about it.

Women want Game!

Theme: Intersexual Dynamics
Length: 500 words
Reading Time: 3 minutes

Why do women incessantly give sh!t tests, practice fitness testing, and fabricate all the drama? We might say, this is an ongoing examination of men, required by women for men to produce a much needed sense of security, but it's not limited to the feelz of mere security. In doing so, women put pressure on men to stay viable, productive, and engaged, which carries a lot of benefits – income, social relevancy, and self-esteem topping the list.

Overall, I see that women are attracted to, and naturally gravitate towards those men who can "dominate" them as PUA's say, "rule over them" as the Bible says, or as I would say, those men who have a purpose in life other than to worship women, who can manage them well, and not lose their cool when women rock the boat with their inclination towards drama. Some women have forthrightly stated that Game is the total sum of what women are after in a relationship.

One good thing that can be noted about Game, is the theoretical artificial selection idea that if many women are only mating with aggressive, dominant, alpha males, who have Game skills, and having children by them (the critical point), then future generations will tend to be more aggressive and dominant, more desirable to females as judged by their ability to create the Tingles, and less tolerant of feministic ideologies. However, the monolithic specter of birth control and the general present lack of accountability / responsibility play against this theory.

Another "good" thing that might be argued for the case of men learning Game, is that if Game is successfully employed within the confines of marriage towards a wife who is rather weak in faith, i.e. susceptible to the primal urges of the Tingles, it drastically reduces the risk of infidelity and divorce-theft on the part of the woman. In this case, and only this case, is Christian virtue equivocated with alpha, and that is because the man is taking responsibility for the weaknesses of his wife, just as Jesus did for us on the cross. He becomes a type of Christ, and thereby glorifies God. But somehow, people living today cannot fathom this kind of glory. It is totally lost on us post-modern humans. Even so, I do not believe that every man, or even most men, are called by God to glorify Him in this way. I believe females are also accountable for their decisions before God.

In summary, women want Game, but in lieu of Game, they'll accept kids, cash and prizes as a second-place consolation prize. You know, after thinking this one over, I think I'd rather give them Game. Everybody's more happy that way. My family and finances are intact, my reputation is preserved, my wife is placated, and I'm still in control.

Thank God for Game!

Hamster's Hierarchy of Sluts

Jack · 11 October 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Women have a hierarchy of s1utdom that allows them to reasonably hamsterbate that they aren't s1uts, no matter how high their N count might be.

I was talking with my wife about one of her younger acquaintances, who has a social/sexual addiction to much younger young men, who just happen to be more handsome, more horny and more energetic than men her own age (30). Unfortunately for her, these same men are averse to the idea of marrying an older woman, leading her to become heartbroken on an intermittent basis, which happens to coincide with the moment she decides to become serious about marrying that particular man. Every time this has happened over the last year and a half, she's shown the habit of calling my wife to commiserate about it.

The last time this happened, I was talking with my wife after she hung up the phone with this woman. The lowdown report was that she had slept with this guy one week after meeting him. Then after dating for three months, the guy broke up with her because she was emotionally "needy", micromanaging his schedule, and was too pushy about getting married soon. However, even after they broke up, she was still seeing him frequently for social dinner dates, sex and companionship. She had the idea that he might change his mind, take her back, and marry her, but I knew he was just squeezing her bleeding heart for more easy sex.

She was also connected with this guy on Instagram and Facebook, and it seems he was quite an online cad. Every time he had a date with another girl, he would post their photo on social media. It drove my wife's friend nuts, and we heard about it every time it happened.

We tried to explain to her that he already broke up with her, and was on to the next piece of pie, but she acted incredulous. We also tried to explain how she was driving her SMV down with every guy she rode and got dumped by, but she had the idea that it wasn't her "choice" for it to come out that way. She really believed that there was a good chance that she might marry every guy she hopped into bed with.

After my wife hung up the phone, we had a long discussion about this woman's situation. At one point, I casually referred to her behavior as "possible proto-slut", meaning that she was at a cross-roads. If she didn't get her act together soon and very soon, she would be on the dead-end path to becoming a cat lady. But at the mere mention of the S-word, my wife broke out in defense of her, insisting that she was not the slut I had presumed. I posed the question, "How many men does a woman need to sleep with, for her to be considered a legitimate slut?" She again took offense, and through a long discussion, she inadvertently proposed a hierarchy of slutdom. The pivotal characteristics of what she considered to be a slut seemed to be the woman's motivations in having sex, whether the woman in question is emotionally desperate, and how serious she is about getting married.

Checklist for the S1ut Hierarchy

So here, I will describe the feminine slut checklist (as I understand it) as follows.

Checkpoints AGAINST slutdom. (Point value = -2)

1. Has sex “only to please the man in her life”.
2. Wants to get married.

Checkpoints FOR slutdom. (Point value = +1)

1. Has low self esteem, or lonely.
2. Screws men for fun or for her own enjoyment.
3. Screws men in spite, or to prove herself to other women.
4. Doesn’t want to get married.
5. Actively goes to bars and clubs to meet men.
6. Actively works dating websites.
7. Posts revealing photos on social media.

Checkpoints FOR slutdom. (Point value = +2)

1. Has ONS’s.
2. Has no concept of morality, no personal boundaries.
3. Has sex with low SMV men, or men not considered for marriage.
4. Has no hope. Emotionally desperate. Will do anything for love and sex.
5. Has sex with men of a different race.

Checkpoints FOR slutdom. (Point value = +5)

1. Targets men who are “taken”.

2. Emotionally immature. [Jack: My addition.]
3. Outspoken feminist. [Jack: My addition.]
4. Has postgraduate education. [Jack: My addition.]
5. Cannot achieve orgasm. [Jack: My addition.]

Checkpoints FOR slutdom. (Point Value = Absolute)

1. She targets the woman's very own man.

There you have it. Rate your dates (or yourself, ladies) appropriately.

Update (2017-12-13)

My wife had a brief chat with this lady recently, and she passed the current lowdown on to me.

Her 'friend' is now a female plate spinner, and rotates through men as they cum. She keeps about 3 men in casual, secretly defacto-open STR's, revolving-door style. All of the men she is involved with are white, foreign guys, about 5 years younger than her on the average, which indicates her selective fetish. She continually meets new men (mostly online), and keeps them hanging on a waiting list until one of the three men she is involved with drops out of the picture. They drop out for various reasons. Sometimes they are too busy (with other women) to meet her needs whenever she needs a bang, so after a few disappointments, she lets them go. Sometimes they find out she is riding other guys concurrently, and voluntarily back out. Other times, she just gets bored with a guy, and ghosts him in preference of the next guy on her list. I don't know if she is still entertaining the thought of marriage. It didn't come up in their conversation.

Hearing all the details of this lifestyle has helped me understand why Feminists cling to their 'right' of 'sexual freedom' so passionately. It resembles a pre-Edenic state in the experience, comparable to heroin (from what I've heard). The serenity and 'mental clarity' that results from the total satiation of the fleshly desire is mind blowing. A lifestyle like this, once achieved, is hard to resist, and hard to forget, thus resulting in the well-known Alpha widowhood and the corresponding bitchy attitude towards the irritations of normal life, sexually needy men, and immature children. This would also seem to explain the strong affinity that ex-cougars have for the animal kingdom (e.g. having pets). I also got the impression that my wife was a little envious of her 'freedom', which helped me see how women influence other women.

So, true to my prediction, this woman's status has slidden from proto-slut into a conventionally certified, condom carrying cougar. She is too busy riding the carousel to spend any time with my wife anymore, and my wife is a little resentful towards her. Finally, my wife agrees with me, that she is a slut. My wife is not missing her company, and frankly, I am glad this woman is not having any further negative influence on my wife through a continued association.

I joked with my wife that we should ask this woman if we could mount a hidden camera in her bedroom and make a few extra bucks selling amateur pornography. She just gave me a blank stare.

Hmmm…

Bon Mot of Slut Science

Men and women have different concepts of what defines a s1ut.

Readership: All

Introduction

Most people are offended by the word s1ut, and there's always some debate, especially in mixed company, over what defines a slut and what behaviors constitute s1uttery. In response to this contention, this post offers an age-dependent definition of the word.

Last time, I wrote about the "Hamster's Hierarchy of Sluts", namely, those habits and social cues that women use to judge one another and rank themselves as either slutty or not slutty. Moreover, women have this long, fluid, sliding Likert scale of sluthood, whereas for men, it is very black and white. This post examines these differences.

Men's Concept of a Slut

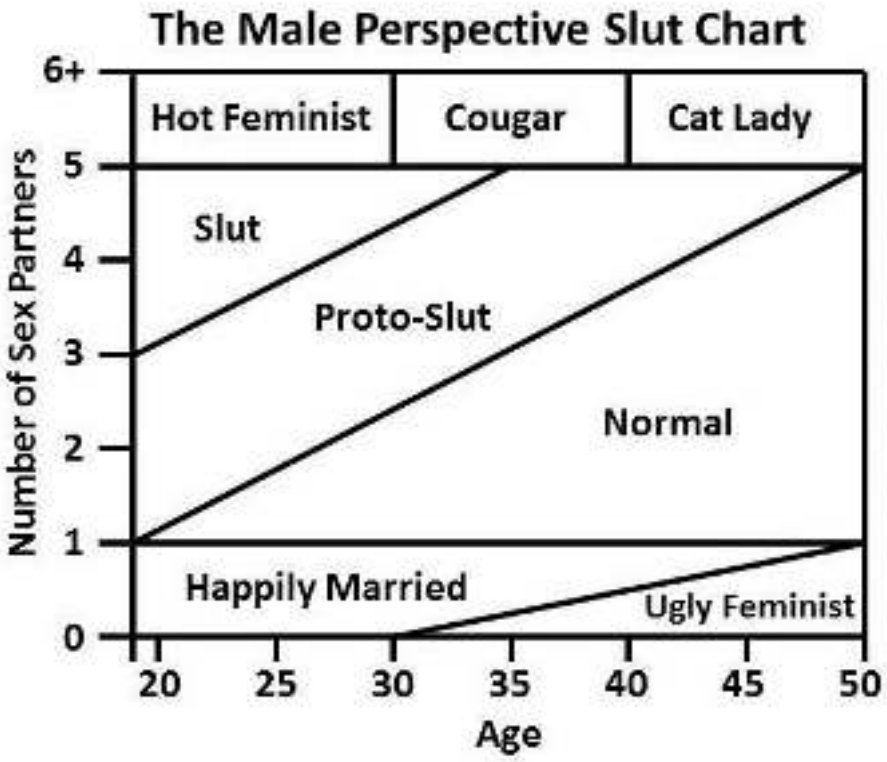
Basically, men want a woman who is loyal, faithful, monogamous, grateful, joyful, respectful, and able to keep her man happy. Perhaps the most important indicator for men in the process of choosing a woman, is that she has not been rejected by other men for failing to do so. Dalrock summed up a concise definition of a slut as follows.

> "The sex specific nature of slut has not to do with the sinfulness of fornication (which is the same for men and women), but with the degree of practical risk involved with marrying such a person."

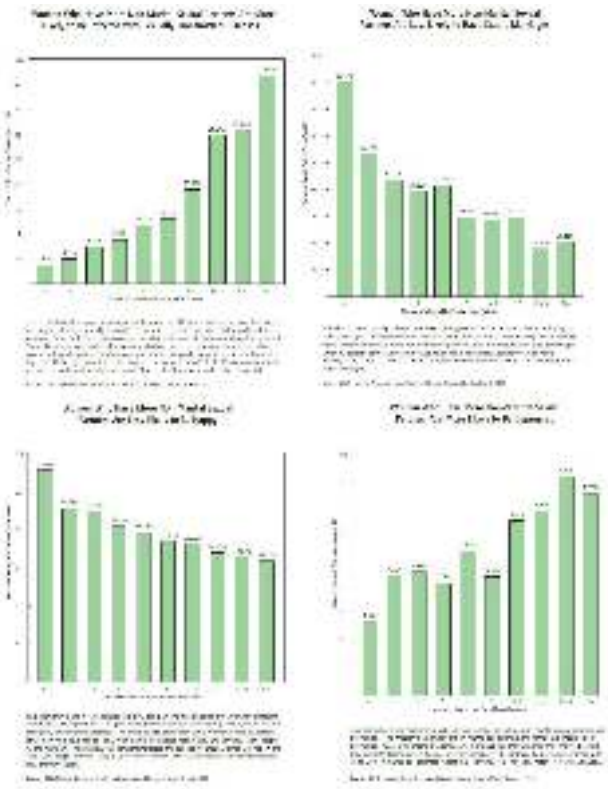
Most men consider a woman to be a slut if she meets any of the following conditions, which are based largely on her age and sexual history.

- Has had more than 5 sexual partners in her lifetime, adjusted for age.
- Has had more sexual partners than the man has had.

The figure below shows the very particular preferences of men in deciding whether a woman is deemed worthy of a happy marriage, or otherwise condemned to slutville.



Women who have only one sex partner in their entire lifetime have the lowest risk of divorce, and are thus believed to be very happily married women. Women with two or more sex partners before marriage are known to be at higher risk for divorce. This is largely because of the woman's apparent laxity towards commitment, and a lack of a properly sacrosanct attitude towards love, sex and marriage. Men need to know this intuitively. Indeed, the number of sex partners a woman has had in her life, has been shown to be directly correlated with her physical health, mental health, marital stability and overall happiness.



Another (possibly blue-pill) study found that women with exactly two premarital sex partners have the highest risk of divorce.

> But the surprising thing, Wolfinger said, is that women with exactly two premarital sex partners have consistently higher divorce rates than women with 3 to 9 partners. “In short: if you’re going to have comparisons to your [future] husband, it’s best to have more than one…”

Does Wolfinger realize that it sounds like he’s encouraging young women to slut it up? Wolfinger seems to ignore the fact that from a man’s point of view, a woman with two lifetime partners is sitting on the fence, and she can’t decide which way to go. The path to the grassy green field of love, loyalty, and marital commitment, or the clusterf*ck mudwrestling competition of the SMP. Having sexual experiences with two partners is just enough to create cracks of doubt in the foundation of a woman’s innocent concept of true love. If she chooses to go mudrunning, she is choosing a very different lifestyle, and will find a very different kind of man as a husband.

But no matter which study you prefer to believe, the same conclusion still stands. A woman with two, or maybe three partners at most, is a “proto-slut”, meaning that she is standing at a cross-roads – her sexual purity has been compromised, her spiritual position is uncertain, and she could possibly go either way. (However, most women will probably find it easier and more enjoyable to slip down the mudslide.)

For practical and successful wifing, proto-sluts are questionable. If she doesn’t show a great deal of maturity, an authentic passion for the man, and a serious willingness to commit to him, then she is still on the fence. If protosluts fail to get their heads strait about which kind of life they want to pursue, and make clear life decisions accordingly, then by default, they are very likely to become a cougar with age, and later in life, the proverbial cat lady. Once a woman has had four partners, she is definitely learning to enjoy the freedom of choice that so many women get addicted to. Once the high sets in, the slide gets slicker, and the conscience gets quieter. After that, the characteristics of slut eye and the 1,000 cock stare are in their fetal development. Then, her status is only a matter of whether she can accept herself as broken meat and hope for the grace of God, or else, she tries to justify her sin with hamstertalk, and moxie herself to continue in it, at which point, she is a modern feminist who believes it’s her own private life, and her freedom of choice to do as she pleases.

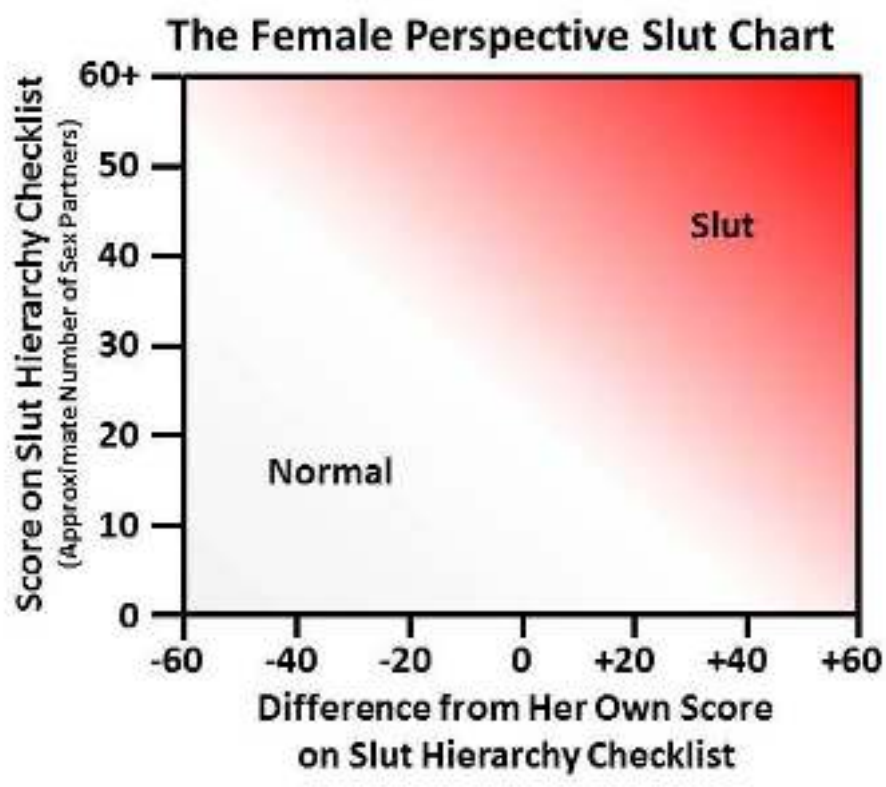
However, in spite of these scientific results, which hedge what the Bible teaches about sexual promiscuity, sensational and liberal leaning media circuits repetitively publish yellow studies, like this one based on the outspoken opinions of members of lewd dating sites – opinions that flatly contradict scientific studies. These sites actively push the feminist narrative, by proposing that both men and women participating in serial monogamy, and who want partners with higher N counts, is the societal norm.

Interestingly, the graph above shows that Feminist women are more objectified by men than non-feminist women, which may explain why Feminists often complain about being objectified by men. Here, men reject feminist women from being considered as marriage or relationship potential material, and divide them into two camps, as follows.

1. “Hot feminists” are those worth a pump-and-dump, and who often go on to marry whimpering betas and then destroy those same men with frivolous divorce and divorce theft.
2. “Ugly feminists” are women whom men avoid at all costs.

Women’s Concept of a Slut

To women, everything is relative, intuitive and emotional, including their judgment of sluts. This highly comprehensive paradigm of sluthood is condensed into the following figure, which shows how a woman’s slut rating of her own self (as a perceived standard of “normal”) plays a large factor in determining the sluttyness of another woman in question. (The Slut Hierarchy Checklist can be found in a previous post.)



It is surprising for men to find here that a woman's actual sexual history and partner count has very little to do with whether a woman would be considered a slut by another woman. Instead, for women, it is about image, the social identification of being in one's peer group, and the imminent threat of competition in the SMP.

Women greatly fear being labeled as a slut, perhaps more than most other pejorative terms. This is partly because of the social stigma that it carries, especially among feminists, and partly because a woman has to attain an unredemptive pinnacle position of promiscuity in men's eyes, before she can be considered slutty in other women's eyes.

Competition among cougars is known to be quite bloodthirsty. But not always. If you ever hear a woman compare herself to another woman by saying, "She's as slutty as I am", or similarly, "I'm as slutty as she is", then you can rest assured, both of these women are well into cougar territory, and are proud of it.

List of Slut Tells

Intro

I'm glad to see that sluts are finally coming out of the closet. That is, society is no longer shaming them to the point where they are trying to hide or deny their membership to slutclub international. I'm glad about this, because it becomes all that much easier for men to discern what type of woman they're dealing with up front, which is very important in deciding which type of relationship to pursue with her, if any at all.

Nevertheless, because of the importance of determining the course of a relationship as early as possible (an unfortunate requirement for one to compete in the modern marketplace), and because all women invariably lie about their N count, it is well worth revisiting the observable indicators that a particular woman is a slut.

Women generally have a very complex list of impressionistic slut tells, and although not all of these concepts directly relate to a woman's actual N count and/or the associated defiling spoilage of the soul (which is more of what men are interested in knowing), they are nevertheless worth reviewing.

Heartiste has a couple posts above describing dynamic slut tells, and I think all of them are still current.

- Chateau Heartiste: It's easy to identify a Slut (2009/12/28)
- Chateau Heartiste: Identifying the Sluts: The Science (2011/8/2)

The problem with dynamic indicators is that you have to invest (or waste, depending on her) at least a little bit of time with her before you can see what kind of woman she is. Sometimes, the amount of time it takes to size a woman up, can cost you the opportunity of starting off on the right foot with her.

If you are a man with a lot of options to filter through, or a man with very little free time on his hands, then it is better to have a list of obvious, physical, and preferably visual indicators.

So here is a list of static slut tells, which you can spot up front, even before you decide how to approach her.

Slut Tells from Science, Demographics, and Statistics

1. Recreational drug use
2. Fresh out of high school, not married, and not in college.
3. Low socioeconomic class
4. Having the experience of being imprisoned or incarcerated in a detention center
5. Black (sorry to say this)

Slut Tells from the Manosphere and Conventional Wisdom

1. Slut eye AKA Succubus Stare (lots of white showing; indicates an empty heart, emotional immaturity, inclination towards lust and fantasy, impulsiveness) Compare to Sanpaku.
2. 1,000 cock stare (lots of sexual partners does to women, what warfare does to men — emotional fatigue, sublimated angst, low self-esteem, and frustration to the point of derangement)
3. Short hair, especially "nape cuts" (shorter is more slutty, especially when showing the nape of the neck, indicates a masculine aggressiveness, and a certain carelessness about being feminine.
4. Smokes something (shows a disrespect for her body, also an offense against life in general)
5. Tattoos and/or body piercings beyond earrings (simply an abomination to feminine beauty)
6. Razor thin or heavily sculpted eyebrows (indicates she is not well grounded in reality)
7. Frequents bars and clubs (bored, purposeless, seeking stimulation, and attracted to the darker side of life)
8. Wears a lot of gothic style black clothing, e.g. black lipstick, black nail color. (has a fascination with death)
9. Member of a college Sorority or some other good-time-groupie-group. (We all know what Sorority chicks do with Fraternity boys when they get into that social scene.)
10. Hair dyed in spots, streaks or strange colors (this screams "cheap attention whore")
11. Single mother (with the modern conveniences of birth control, a woman has got to be doing a h*ll of a lot of screwing around, and being really careless about it, for this to happen. Even if she wasn't, and just got pregnant "on accident", being an unwed mother will quickly transform her into a sex starved nympho. The reason for this is because having a baby tends to make women more horny, which is another reason why many people prefer to get married before having children.)
12. Divorced within the past two years. (Ever heard this quip? "__ivorced, totally __esperate and looking for the D!")
13. Being single and in her peak libido phase, which typically hits women in their mid 30's.
14. Overweight but not ugly.
15. The manjaw.
16. A low 2D:4D finger length ratio, i.e. ring finger is longer than index finger. More information from Art of Manliness, Hooking Up Smart, and science.
17. Sexually oriented fashion trends, such as the nipple trend, no matter real or stick-on, and Camel Toe fashion. (Lacking a sense of modesty, and shows that she'll trade her dignity for attention. It's almost like an advertisement, saying, "Cum tickle my meat flaps, big boy!") (Added on 2017/11/16.)
18. Has a peer group of slutty friends. (Added on 2018/1/24.)
19. Excessively long meat curtains. (Added on 2018/10/12.)
20. Has a smart phone with a cracked screen protector. (Added on 2020/12/12.)
21. Sterilization scars. (See photos below. Do an image search for endoscopic / laparoscopic — hysterectomy / salpingectomy / tubal ligation to see more variations of what this might look like.) (Added on 2025/2/27.)

Corellations

Interestingly, many of these slut tells are also cues for, or symptoms of, a low SMV, or are descriptors that, if adopted, would significantly lower a woman's SMV. I believe there might be a causative link for many of these cases.

Take, for example, being overweight. A woman who is grossly overweight offers little sexual satisfaction to the average man, and thus will find it difficult to retain a man's monogamous commitment. Also, she will only be able to attract the very bottom SMV males, and so her tendencies towards hypergamy will be largely frustrated, making her a more desperate competitor in the SMP.

By contrast, a woman with a high SMV is more likely to have her choice of men, to be able to hold and keep her man's sexual interest, and to therefore have little motivation to go a man hopping, figuratively, or literally. SMV parity also contributes to this interaction. A high SMV woman would also likely find a man who has a comparatively high SMV, and who therefore has many choices in the way of a partner. If the man has choices, then it would likely lead her to become more invested and more committed to the relationship, in an effort to please him and retain his interest.

Social Habits

I have heard some say that not being a regular churchgoer would make one more likely to be a slut. But I haven't seen enough evidence to confirm this. I know that most young people who were raised in a Christian home are likely to do their fair share of sexual exploration and hooking up, once they leave the nest and go off to college. If they stop being churchgoers at that point, then that would confirm the hypothesis. I would like to believe that regular churchgoing women who are married are not likely to be sluts, but I have seen evidence to the contrary. In fact, two of the proudest, highest N, sluts that I've ever known in my whole life, have been regular churchgoing married women. They would sing in the choir, and then sit in the front pew, and show their legs to the grinning pastor while he was trying to concentrate on his sermon. No one in the church ever chastised these two women or tried to shame them. They just accepted them as they were, mouthing platitudes like, "God forgives the worst of sinners", and politely ignored all the graphic details that flew around the church in the form of gossip. However, the jilted wives of these women's wayward partners did not agree with such "holiness", and rightfully so.

Disclaimer

Just because a woman has one or two of these characteristics, doesn't necessarily indicate that she is going to spread her wings on the first date with any man in a BMW. (Or maybe she will, who knows?) The value of this list is that if a woman has several of these qualities, she is probably more likely to have a sexually liberated mindset, and indulge in stepping-stone-style hypergamy, than a woman who has fewer of these qualities. The woman's in-situ behavior will also depend a lot upon the man as well. So consider this information as "Scatterplot Science".

I will add to this list, if I discover others.

Happy Wife, Happy Life

Jack · 20 October 2017 · Archived copy · Original

I have heard a few other church going married men quote the old proverb, “Happy wife, happy life”, but their quip carried the implied undertone that these men had to tolerate all their wives’ childish behaviors, serve their whims, and not do much of anything without their “approval”, as if there would be some very unpleasant “consequence” that would befall, if for one minute, their wives failed to be sufficiently pampered. (Consequences included things like their wives suddenly getting a bad “headache” just before bedtime for a few days.) I saw these men as indentured servants for meager sexual wages, and I pity them. They are not experiencing the full measure of joy that God intends for us to experience in marriage, and neither are their spoiled wives. These are the deltas who need bolstered by the augmented “man up” schoolmarm lecture on a daily basis from their wives and the feminist churchianity sermons. But as long as they remain collared and bridled by their comfort seeking women, they will never know what it truly means to man up from the biblical perspective.

Meanwhile, another single, frustrated, middle-aged man confided the following sentiments.

> “I need to find a girlfriend there, bud. I’m tired of fighting my way through life and never being happy. My life is nothing but work, stress, and haggling with stupid people. I’m just tired of putting on this mask that I wear every day and going through life alone. I’m just sick of it. I just want a pretty girlfriend to share things with, and I want one who’s not toxic, demanding, or all screwed up. Is that too much to ask for?”

Actually, considering the current marriage marketplace, it is. These days, it is truly hard to find a glorified Christian marriage.

I sometimes wonder which of these two types of men has a better existence. Is it (1) having a sense of purpose and the comfort of routine with the ball and chain princess wife, or is it (2) waiting patiently, but hopelessly, for someone who might bring a little true joy into your life?

Moreover, the woman’s emotional disposition sets the stage for the mood of the whole relationship, or else, if single, the desire for one. That is real power. What is common in nearly every marriage, is that the wife uses the marriage setting as a vehicle with which to exercise her own female power.

True female power is largely based on the fact that she fills a need in the man’s life. A woman who has a man with no needs, or a woman who cannot fill those needs, is a woman with no real power. It is this same power that makes the delta man founder and grovel at the demands of his soft pussy willow wife. It is the benefits of this same power that the single man hopes to avail of, in finding a girlfriend or wife, but the same man is also deathly (and wisely) fearful of being on the brass end of a woman’s abuse of that power.

Yet, feminists claim that women have no power, or have less power than men do. It is a bald faced lie. Women have perhaps even more power than men do. But it is not a forceful, authoritative style of power at the threatpoint of death, defeat and ignominy, as men’s power is. No, instead, it is a vulnerable, breathy, inspiring style of power at the threatpoint of not attaining the blessings of life. But modern feminists discard their power under the helm of feminist ideologies which assign a sense of shame to those who willingly provide for the needs of others. Some even go so far as to deny this God-given power, which is the ultimate foolishness, the kind only made possible by deceit. They attempt instead to wield the clumsy and destructive power of a political and physically domineering force, in masculine style. By focusing on this foolishness, they fail to exercise their own natural good powers, and by withholding their power, they bring destitution to men and destroy the children. For the most part, men have stood by, observing women behaviors and scratching their heads, thinking, “What the h*ll is she doing?” Women, in return, have laughed at men’s apparent “ignorance”, and carried on with their rebellious sideshow of their social experiment in masculine power.

Women, like children, like to test the limits, and are drawn to rebel. Women can easily use their sexual power to be sexually promiscuous as a very fun way to rebel. Hypergamy, "riding the carousel", abortion and frivolous divorce are all examples of female power liberally unharnessed and run amuck, much like fistfights, crime, and the carnage of warfare are the pursuits of male power to the fullest extent. Both types of abuses of power have similar effects in deadening the persons soul. The female military draft, transexuality, and men having babies are all expressions of power being usurped by, or superposed onto, the opposite sex.

How can women use their power to bless men and children, instead of denying their power for the benefit of no one (not even themselves)?

This week, I found an old, but very inspiring post from Dalrock, "Newsflash: My marriage still doesn't suck!" He asked people to share stories of their happy marriages in the comments. I found some great ideas there about how a happy wife brings a happy life, not only to her husband, but also to herself and her children. One commenter, slwerner, who was apparently an older gentleman married for many years, wrote,

> "I believe that there is a strong correlation between overall marital satisfaction and the level of respect/admiration that a wife has for her husband.
> Of course, there are those instances in which it's the husband who expresses the dissatisfaction with the wife, but it seems to me that, in the aggregate, men find it much easier to be content with the situation they have, and the wife they've chosen – so long as their wives don't express dissatisfaction.
> …when one reads accounts of unhappy husbands, even when they complain about their wives having gained weight, let themselves go (etc.), the one common denominator always seems to be that theirs wives constantly nag and complain. While I have nothing to back it up, my guess is that those same men would be able to find contentment, if those wives made no other changes than to cease their nagging and complaining, even with a less than (physically) perfect wife.
> So again, I put it out there to be challenged, marital contentedness is based more on the wife's level of respect for her husband than any other of the multitude of possible factors."

TDOM replied.

> "I think you've hit the nail on the head. The wife is the key to marital satisfaction for both partners. Men tend to define themselves by what they do. This translates into men blaming their dissatisfaction with their own lives on themselves and the choices they've made (or on others outside the marriage). This takes the focus off the wife and places the responsibility for his dissatisfaction elsewhere. Wives are seen as companions and partners who help reduce the stress of home life. Thus anything the wife contributes is a positive that increases his satisfaction. If she becomes unhappy, then he becomes unhappy, but he probably still views her as an asset even if he thinks things could be better.
> The woman's focus is different. whether or not she's willing to admit it, she married her husband because of what she thought she could get out of him (provision, safety, status, children, stability, love, etc.). Any failure by him in any of her chosen tasks for him results in disappointment and dissatisfaction. Her failure is that she married a man who could not provide what she wanted, therefore everything becomes his fault. Her task is to "change" or "improve" him. When this proves impossible, she opts out."

It has been noted before that wives are adverse to pleasing their husbands, and that is most true when speaking of selfish, pagan, unbelieving wives. But do these wives realize that they are merely withholding their power for the entertainment of watching others squirm with their unmet needs, that she would have otherwise provided for? Many wives have similarly pagan notions that wielding their feminine power by lowering the boom will succeed in extracting that last bit of "love" out of her husband. But husbands will not respond by automatically increasing their value through learning game, or earning more money, etc., as a result of this behavior from wives. All it does is teach husbands that their wives are unreliable and cannot be trusted. But in the case when others come to see a woman as reliable and trustworthy, these women complain that they are “being taken for granted”. It’s a no win situation if you’re married to one of these pagan women!

Eds. note: Being taken for granted”, in that regard, should be interpreted as a supreme compliment on the quality and reliability of her impeccable skills in creating life, and how much she is needed.

Christian women, on the other hand, know that it is important to be reliable and trustworthy, so that their husband can be confident that his house is in order, and thereby able to concentrate on his work and be productive. Children also need a reliable and trustworthy mother in order to feel secure and grow in an emotionally healthy way. Compared to pagan women, who focus on entertaining themselves by playing with the effects of their power on humanity, Christian women focus on the outcome, the growth, the benefit, the blessing, not only for themselves, but for all within her sphere of influence.

Another crucial difference here, is that pagan women are deeply anxious, especially to have their own needs satisfied (while at the same time, hypocritically withholding the needs of others, as mentioned earlier). Whereas, Christian women have the faith to see their own needs met, and a deep inner sense of serenity, peace and joy, which enables them to wield their power to meet the needs of others.

So here, we come to the point that truly happy wives are happy on their own merit, and not because of a husband who jumps through hoops to meet their list of high maintenance demands, and all those other must-haves which wives pose as nebulous requirements for them to be haaappy. (By the way, these things don’t actually make women happy.) In other words, these happy wives, who have good marriages, possess their own internal joy which they selflessly share with their husbands and children. They are not spiritual and financial parasites, only thinking of their own comfort and needs. They have a certain degree of emotional maturity, and as such, they are understanding, forgiving, compassionate, and seek peace and love in the home, rather than drama and control.

From this perspective, “happy wife, happy life” is indeed true. Marrying a woman who is chronically unhappy does not bode well for future marital happiness. But on the other hand, taking a wife who is truly joyful, grateful, mature, and respectful is a good move towards building a secure and happy home, even though she might not be a proverbial 10.

Perhaps we should expand the saying for the sake of those delta boys who take pride in their hoop jumping to read, “happy, intelligent, emotionally mature, grateful, joyful, respectful, reliable, trustworthy wife = happy life”. But unfortunately for their marriages, I don’t think their wives would be warmly receptive of this message.

Musings on Feminine Soft Power

Jack · 24 October 2017 · Archived copy · Original

[Eds. note: This post explores a powerful sphere of authority and influence that 50 years of feminism has allowed women to neglect, and over time, forget. Warning: Language and Sexual Content]

Modern women are neglecting their most fundamental avenues of power by pursuing feminism. Women would fare better by,

1. Realizing their most fundamental value to society and to men.
2. Abandon efforts to usurp power within men's sphere of influence, which they are poorly suited for.
3. Optimizing the match between their feminine skills and natural abilities, and their overt goals in society.

Immature, Self-Centered Women are Ugly

I've been with a few girls that I felt very attracted to, because they were young, sweet and attractive on the outside. But once I got them down in bed, I found that they were so ugly on the inside. By ugly, I mean they were devoid of passion, immature, self-centered and bitchy. They whined about how uncomfortable their position was. They didn't want to touch my rod, turning up their nose at it, like it was a smelly turd. Their facial expression was so dull and bored while I was thrusting them. Their mind was somewhere else. They talked about topics completely unrelated to our interaction. They gave me less attention than their dog, or their smartphone. Afterwards, they complained about the mess. In short, these women were such a shameful, embarrassing turn-off that I never wanted to see them again, after that first time.

So I had an unintentional ONS… So disappointing…

[Eds. note (November 25, 2017): Dalrock points out two fundamental elements of ugly women: (1) they prefer to be ingrateful, and (2) they don't want to serve the needs of others. Dead on!]

Understanding How Women Affect and Influence Men to Change

On the other side of the coin, as men, we know there is something about a woman who "treats us right", that can melt our hearts. I know that from experience.

Believe it or not, earlier in my life, up until I was well into my 30's, I made a whole-hearted, conscientious effort to resist the temptation to fornicate with every woman who offered me the opportunity.

[Eds. note: I'll give you a moment to let that sink in. Yes, it's true.]

During these periodic exercises in self-control, I noticed that just because a woman was a 9 or 10, it didn't mean that I would lose the battle and automatically yield to temptation. I still had power over my will to resist those hotties.

I also noticed that there were a few other women I've known who somehow surpassed my threshold of temptation, and who could lure me into bed no matter how much I objected to it in my mind. Some of them had even passed the wall, and others even had a SMV that was 3 to 5 points below my own. Even though I did not find them to be aesthetically beautiful or attractive, there was still something about them that got my heart totally addicted to them, and then the sex just happened so freely and naturally. My willpower was overruled, and I mindlessly performed the stud service. These were women who knew how to treat a man right!

I'm talking about having one of those saving grace, "Oh my God!" experiences!

Other times I would meet a woman that I thought was right for me, even someone I thought I could marry, but there was no such chemistry. She met my checklist, but she was a dud.

Funny thing is, I never regretted those formerly described experiences as much as I thought I would. I am not one who believes in “fate”, but it kind of felt that way. I want to say that I did not conscientiously “choose” to lay with those women, but somehow, I know I did. I don’t understand how it happened though, because my mind switched off when she started working her magic.

I felt it was like a PUA Game shakedown with the sexes reversed! Instead of me gaming and bedding women, certain women were gaming and bedding me!

I know that if I said, “it just happened”, it would sound so naïve and bird-brained. Guys know that is what women always say after they cheat on their boyfriends and husbands. But that’s part of my point. How did it happen that these particular women could bypass my prefrontal cortex and tap into my feral nature, thereby changing my attitude and even my will?

The Secret to Women’s Power

After I had several experiences with women doing this to me, I began to realize their secret – the power that enabled them to break through my willpower. I began to understand my nature more clearly.

I was always well aware that I had a strong sex drive. No surprises there. But what I did not know about myself, was that, as a man, I had a basic male need for respect and admiration that was lying dormant, deep inside me, like a hibernating bear. Those women simply fed that innate need for respect in me, and I awoke!

Yes! They gave me an impeccable level of respect, and this caused me to transform into a different being, a more confident and purpose-driven man. My purpose was, of course, to ride their horse until the break of dawn, and gaze upon the golden sun rising on the horizon – as many times as possible. In assuming this purpose, I lost all my will-power to resist the goal of their advances.

It felt like we became ONE.

I know that sounds laughable, maybe it reminds you of “oneitis”, but that’s not what I mean. I mean, there was “peace in the valley”. The experience was beautiful.

That is real feminine power!

So, since I have been the unwitting target of female PUA’s, I can totally understand the power that male PUA’s have over their female targets. When a woman experiences “love” from a man, in the form of Game, it can totally trump a man’s apparent SMV, and break down any mental resistances, and make any remaining faithless hesitancy vanish completely.

Likewise, I learned from these experiences, that getting respect from a woman can trump my physical attraction to her (her apparent SMV). (I know I am using the term SMV loosely here. These relational skills also contribute to one’s SMV, and that is part of my point.)

So now, my point is to assert that just as men have an illimitable power over women in the form of Game, women also have a comparable power over men in the form of vivacious respect, for lack of a better word.

What shall we call the feminine form of Game, in which they exercise their female powers in giving honor, purpose, life and joy to a man? (My personal favorites in bold font.)

Tilt? Sport? Emulation? Wile? Coax? Bait? Trap? Draw? Lure? Wheedle? Lead? Hook? Inveigle? Allure? Bamboozle? Kittyclamp? Seduce? Homestroke? Roping? Diversion? Honeycraft? Pursuit? The Moves? Bash? Blast? Clambake? Dally? Flirt? Coquet? Entice? Captivate? The Cum-On? Charm? Mousetrap? Magnetism? Intrigue? Siren? Venus? Vamp? Pump? Wowzer?

I like Honeycraft. I’ll use this word. It’s like the opposite of witchcraft, which is a fairly accurate simile/antonym.

Case Study: The Love Psyche Game

Maybe you're still wondering what I'm talking about. Let me give you an example.

When I lived overseas, there was a game of romance that the young people played. They called it, "psychoanalytical Love", or "the Love psyche", depending on the translation. In this Love Game, the goal was to make the other person "fall in love" with you, before you did with them. The person who fell in love first, then became the loser of the game. "Falling in love" was naturally characterized by such behaviors as, losing frame of mind, lacking decision making power, going to extravagant efforts to save or improve the relationship, becoming desperate for attention and sex… all basically what the manosphere would collectively call "beta behaviors".

As silly as this game might sound to the promiscuous west's ears, I came to regard this game to be infinitely more authentic and satisfying than any type of intersexual interaction I found in the west. It was good because it forces the other person to look at you as an individual person, learn what you desire, what you need to be happy, and then try to figure out how to deliver that, such that they eventually work up to the mastery level of controlling your desire.

Think about that… when was the last time you had a date with someone who recognized you as a unique and special individual, and who earnestly sought to understand and unlock the deepest desires of your heart?

That just seems too good to be true, for many people. But try to imagine the benefits.

Many players of this game discovered that it was advantageous to "rush to the finish line", which meant, to have as much sex as possible, with as many partners as who are willing, because they quickly found that people are deeply and inexplicably attracted to, and fall in love with, others who are getting well laid on a regular basis. Of course, it also became evident that those who became the superstar winners of this game, were those who were not afraid to take extensive risks involved with having a sexually open lifestyle.

On the down side, a lot of great young adults got burned in the game. They just couldn't take the risks and carry the resulting emotional weight. I can't say that the Love Psyche game led to very many happy marriages. It did, however, lead to a lot of broken hearts, pregnancies and abortions.

Now, I am not encouraging teenagers to play the Love Psyche game, as I just described. I only gave that example to help westerners see how inefficacious and totally broken their SMP is, with serial dating, "hookup culture" and such. It's broken, because the average person knows relatively little, or absolutely nothing about Game or Honeycraft, and as such, they are totally ignorant about how to meet the needs of another person's heart. Instead, they are overwhelmingly star struck by all those lofty, but false, feministic concepts, which shipwreck their potential to achieve a joyfully satisfying love relationship, early in life.

Men, Families, and Society Urgently Needs Feminine Power

I have come to believe that the knowledge of Female Game is just as esoteric as Male Game has become in recent decades. At least this is definitely true in the west.

I also believe that the way to reverse feminism is not just for the manosphere to "man up" and learn game, but for women to get their own game together as well.

If women have the power to attract and keep the men they want to marry, by learning to respect men properly, then I believe they will spend less time riding the carousel, and getting their hearts and vags thrashed and trashed before they find a poor beta that will accept their selfish and disrespectful ways.

In other words, it's going to level the playing field in the right way – and not by making men and women "equal", which we know is absurd. But instead, by encouraging the mutual fulfillment of the deeper emotional needs that men and women respectively possess.

Conclusions

Buckminster Fuller once said,

> "You never change things by fighting the existing reality. To change something, build a new model that makes the existing model obsolete."

So here I am, basically proposing a relatively new model for male-female mating interactions, which is actually a very old model. This new model teaches women to tone down the power of their pussy (i.e. feminist values, moxie, hypergamy, carousel riding), and tone up the power of their honey (low BMI, low WHR, long hair, respect, submission, possibly even faithfulness).

Men can usher in the new model by vetting women according to how well honed their Honeycraft is. To do so men, you should simply try to resist having sex with a woman, until you just can't control yourself any longer. Let the woman try her best effort to break your will and win your heart. When you finally lose control, you will become the wildest beast she ever fantasized about (even better than that "50 Shades of Grey" fluff). For the rest of her life, she will silently reminisce on all those moments when you hammered her glazed doughnut with reckless abandon. She'll never love another as much as she loves you, and the reason is very simple. It's because…

You made her work for it!

Since this has happened to me many times, I must say, it's quite satisfying. I think you're missing out on a real experience in life by not attempting this.

[Eds. addition (November 5, 2017): Recently, Chateau Heartiste has endorsed this same approach in his recent post, "The Girl Notch". As he so eloquently put it…]

> "This is the skeleton key to opening pussy: You're the prize, and she has to win you over."
> "A girl knows a beta male is a sure thing, and that sucks all the tension and excitement out of her interest in him. But the alpha male leaves her wondering if he's really that into her or if she's up to his standards, and this will compel her to work harder to please him and earn his affection."
> "To wrest the real notch from a girl, you have to deny her the Girl Notch. And that means taunting her ego with the idea that uncertainty is the rule and validation is the exception."

[Eds. note: By the way, withholding sex is not recommended for married couples. Withholding sex will ruin your marriage. This advice is only for single people.]

Most importantly of all, never f*ck a feminist, no matter how hot she might be. A real man of strength will let that d*mn feminist have a truly humbling experience of loneliness and rejection, which she needs in order to goad her towards a repentance (if possible). Do not be unequally yoked. Those pagan women are not worthy of your seed. A real man of honor will hold his precious c*ckjuice for a better woman's more appreciative womb.

Give it some thought. Thanks for reading.

Male and Female Power Deconstructed

Jack · 26 October 2017 · Archived copy · Original

[Eds. note: This post explores how men and women have different spheres of authority and influence within society and the family, and how the respective sexes can exercise the most power by working within the confines of their natural spheres of influences.]

Right after I finished my last post, "Musings on Feminine Soft Power", I browsed some of the other blogs in the Manosphere, and I was surprised to see that Power is a hot topic right now. Zippy Catholic has a post titled, "With great power comes great incontinence", which discusses relevant abuses of power, and then Donal Graeme's post, "Power and Control" which focuses on regulation practices.

[Eds. note: After I started writing this post, Cane Caldo also addressed this same topic, and since then, Zippy has offered a rebuttal.]

The posts above contained the following axioms.

> "The most primal power of men is violence."
> "The most primal power of women is sex."

Looking through the comments, I saw that most everyone readily agreed to these statements without much doubt or criticism. However, I believe these definitions of power, although true, are rather simplistic and biased. I suggest they should be changed to read,

> "Women perceive that the most primal power of men is violence."
> "Men perceive that the most primal power of women is sex."

By composing this addendum, I am not merely playing with semantics, but rather, reframing the context. Let me briefly explain.

> Women, who generally crave security, are fearful of the abuse of men's power through violence.
> Men, who explicitly crave sexual expression, are fearful of the abuse of women's power through rejection.

As such, the original quote defines power as the ability to withhold that which the other needs, thereby allowing the provider to gain dominance in the transaction, and to generate a corresponding fear of scarcity in the beneficiary.

Withholding the material goods, emotional capital and spiritual needs of others in monopolistic style is truly an expression of power, but a more expansive and complete understanding of power must recognize that the locus of power does not lie within the objective assets themselves, i.e. security or sex, as implied in the quote, nor even in the dynamics of the exchange, as emphasized by PUA and feminists alike. Instead, power lies in the fact that each party has the ability to either grant the needs of the other, or else deprive them of the same.

Almost all characteristics that contribute towards one's SMV and MMV could be described as indicators of an individual's ability to deliver a physical, social, emotional or psychological resource, or to perform a desired service. To be straightforward, the benefits resulting from having these needs provided for, is a primary motivation for individuals to enter into a relationship in the first place, be it romantic, or even just strictly business. These needs are not limited to security and sex, but also include a myriad of other life-giving aspects of our respective natures, such as honor, loyalty, love and respect.

I postulate that true power is in the giving and enhancing of life, and less so in the disruption or destruction of it. Thus, when such benefits are not received, and the experience of life is not amplified, it is due to a failure, inability or irresponsibility on behalf of the provider, or else done as an act of operant conditioning, negative punishment in this case, to the receiver.

I'm not talking about Greene's 48 Laws of Power, and I'm not digressing on the Dark Triad style of power, as is sublimely illustrated by Illimitable Men. Although these power modes can, and certainly do, play into the scheme of things, I'm simply describing a basic social exchange.

Conclusions

I don't need to say that currently, there is a mass breakdown in the social exchange in western society, due to the sexual revolution, the advent and growth of third wave feminism, and the confluence of the protestant church with feministic ideologies and social movements (AKA "Churchianity"). Moreover, in the modern exchange, women are demanding more, and dispensing punishment, both positive and negative, when their demands are not met.

It would be beneficial for men to also demand more, and likewise administer operant conditioning as appropriate. However, the main trouble that men seem to face now, is that they lack the knowledge (e.g. the red pill), the tools (e.g. social acceptance and affirmation, legal recourse), the skills (e.g. Game), and the necessary level of organization (e.g. a common vision) to execute the much needed rebalancing of society (e.g. preserving the nuclear family).

Our recognition of what men offer to society, and to women, and also identifying exactly what men need from them, is the key to understanding our own power. It may be too hard for feminists and misandrogists to swallow enough of their pride to recognize the value that men possess. However, I would hope that borderline feminist sympathizers might be satisfied with the stability obtainable through a social exchange characterized by a spiritually healthy expression, which is beneficial to both men and women, families, children, and to society at large. Over time, we may see the restoration of the biblical institution of marriage and the transformation of our society back into a powerful Christian nation.

A Noodle Asian Inspiration

Breaking world news from Taiwan….

> "Pretty female vendor wears flouncy skirt at noodle stand!"

What about all that other real news that's happening in Taiwan, the Asia-Pacific region, and around the world?

F*ck that… THIS GIRL IS WEARING A LITTLE DRESS AT A NOODLE STAND! The TRAFFIC stops here! VIEWS! Life doesn't get any better than this, Men!

And why do we give a sh*t about this?

Precisely because it's a break from all the politically correct, ugly feminist crap and fake news we see every day. It's a brief respite from the usual drudgery, and personally, I can't think of any other respites from modern feminist drudgery that are any less trite and mildly offensive to SJW's sensibilities.

The headline emphasizes "short skirt", but that is not a skirt. It is a summer dress. But we'll gladly forgive the correspondent for misreporting the facts. Actually this is a typical dress worn by thousands of NORMAL (i.e. NOT feminist) girls in Taiwan every day, whenever they go out.

It can get pretty hot in the tropics! Maybe she likes short, thin dresses because she works outside with no air conditioning, and it is more comfortable? In Taiwan, she can wear light clothing to stay cool in hot weather when she is cooking outside, and do it without fear of being raped or ever harassed.

The best thing about this is that she is not whoring for attention. She is dressed so sexy but it's not perverted. Her appearance isn't cheap or shameful at all. It's perfectly wholesome. And look at that smile!

Actually, this dress is muuuuccch longer than some of the cellulite-showing, cutoff jeans shorts I see what-passes-for-women wearing in rural Murica. She's wearing more clothing than the betel nut stand girls in Taoyuan, who are basically wearing see-through negligees with g-strings and a lacy bra. By contrast, this woman is scandalously virtuous!

For those complaining that we're sexually discriminating, I'll also include this story about a hunky male Buddhist monk. That should prove that we're treating all attractive and inspiring people equally!

Men, be reminded… a woman wearing a short skirt or dress is not an invitation to stare or an invitation for anything else. Maybe she is only wearing that dress to promote her business. She just wants to look pretty for her customers and doesn't give a sh*t about feminism, objectification of her body, nor people taking pictures of her behind her back. I'd guess her business is doing great, and she's making tons of money – despite the fact her noodles might taste horrible. She's laughing all the way to the bank every evening.

But aren't we afraid to take photos without her permission, as though she may subject us to "the right of privacy" legal issues?

She's in a public space. It's her choice.

But we're publishing the woman's photographs, and humiliating females. Don't you find that shameful?

If you look at the photos, she smiles and laughs into the camera, I don't think she finds the attention humiliating at all. She recognizes the marketing value of dressing sexy and getting attention for it.

She's a "strong woman" for being able to withstand so much sexist and misogynous "toxic" male attention from sun up to sun down, and still serve those men food with humility and a graceful smile!

Now just in case someone tries to condemn us for sexually objectifying women, you just tell them it is not our intention to humiliate her, or “rape” her by asking for her phone number. We are just simply SO INSPIRED by her feminine beauty!

Consider the facts of the matter. In this industrialized, heavily polluted, east Asian city, you can get the most disgusting part of a pig, the part sh*t travels through, served to you at a street stand by a pretty lady wearing a dress and high heels.

Now, if we a ask a group of foreign tourists if they would like to try some extremely exotic food made of organs deemed unacceptable for eating by Western cultural norms?

> “Intestine vermicelli… Yum!”
> “I used to think 1000-year-old egg was an abomination. Now, a gift from the gods!”
> “I like a lot of the “exotic” foods here. I should expand my cultural references.”
> “I am feeling so inspired right now! I think I’ll just sit here behind this lady for a few hours and try them all! I’ll have the thousand year old egg fried with stinky tofu in Hakka spices, anything involving tentacles, pickled pigs ear, marinated beef tripe, galangal ginger pork liver, tofu skin, cold oil chicken testicles, sun dried shrimp roe…”

Still not good enough of a reason to go to Chiayi? Then your male credentials to be on the Manosphere are hereby revoked! Just as Murican women say, “Man up or shut up!”

The next time your woman complains about how much trouble it is to wear a skirt, care for long hair, and wear heels… Show her these photos of a woman wearing heels while standing on a cobblestone sidewalk and selling hot noodle soup to customers in 35°C (95°F) weather – AND SHE’S NOT COMPLAINING ABOUT IT!

Let’s hear all those feminists rev up their moxies now!

The Red Pill Transformation Experience Relative to SSMV

Every man has a different experience with the red pill transformation, so we naturally expect every man to have a unique opinion about it. But recently, some generalized behavioral patterns have been flushed out. I think Rollo was the first to fully report a polarity of attitudes among newly awoken men. Along with some polity issues, he discussed how some men grow bitter and resentful after swallowing the Red Pill, while other men gratefully and enthusiastically receive it as the Gospel.

Alpha Game Plan followed with the discussion of Purple versus Red. A comment from Aeoli Pera under this post contained a succinct generalized description of the different attitudes and Red Pill experiences that various men have. I added a few characteristics to complete the lists by male socio-sexual rank.

Attitude Toward Women By Socio-Sexual Rank:

- Alpha: Satisfied Contempt
- Beta: Benevolence
- Delta: Idealism; Anger when illusions are shattered
- Gamma: Fear
- Omega: Hate
- Sigma: Guarded Control
- Lambda: Disinterest

Red Pill Experience By Sociosexual Rank:

- Red-pilled Alpha: Feels nothing
- Red-pilled Beta: Feels relieved
- Red-pilled Delta: Feels disappointed, let down
- Red-pilled Gamma: Feels confusion or rage
- Red-pilled Omega: Feels resolution, finality (could be good or bad)
- Red-pilled Sigma: Feels pensive
- Red-pilled Lambda: Feels amused

[SF: I am a Sigma, by the way, and yes, I feel pensive, and also somewhat amused!]

Color Saturation Hue

From this ranking, we can see more clearly why some men can quickly and easily transition to the Red Pill mentality, whereas, other men lounge in bitterness and contempt for years. I believe much of the difference lies in how close to the heart the arrows of the enemy came, and how much damage is done in removing the arrow.

So now the question comes to this. How much of the Red Pill transformation experience is determined by a man's SSMV ranking, and how much of it is dependent on his experiences and his station in life?

Maybe Religion has an effect?

Maybe upbringing?

A strong father-figure, or lack thereof?

I hold a strong suspicion that having a feministic mother, or a mother who was very disrespectful to his father, would increase the likelihood for a man to experience a lot of frustrations and disappointments in the mating game.

The remainder of this blog explores several of my thoughts and beliefs concerning these questions.

Growing Pains

A common protest I hear against the Red Pill is that it causes men to hate women. Apparently, it's common for men to feel this way after getting red pilled.

I can understand. After I started giving serious attention to the Manosphere online, it took a couple months of casual reading before I started to reframe. And I remember the moment when I first "got it". At that time, I did have what I believed to be feelings of hate towards women in general. But that emotion lasted no longer than a week for me, at most. With continued reading, and a lot of reflection on my own experiences in life, I became accustomed to the Red Pill mode of thought. Then I realized it wasn't hate. I was just angry because I had it all wrong and I felt betrayed or lied to in general, and those feelings were somehow psychologically pinned on women as being the cause or source of the frustration and disappointment. I think that's what the Manosphere calls the loss of "ego investment".

Judging by the comments I've read under other blogs, it seems I am one of the few men who has been able to transition from blue to red with relative ease. I believe it takes some self awareness, humility, deep introspection, and a bit of intelligence, to move past the first impression of "hating women", and see those feelings as the "growing pains" that are evidence of an existential paradigm shift.

I know every man has had his share of bad experiences with women, including myself, and I am sure these impressions do much to form the psychological association.

I think it might be analogous to a man who was kicked by a horse, or hit by a car, and then comes to be fearful and resentful towards all horses/cars. What would be the proper response to such an experience? Is it to swear off horses and cars altogether, as MGTOW appears to be doing?

I want to believe that a man of courage and indomitable character would recover from his wounds and return to break that horse in, or build his own hot rod. Then, ride that horse through the outback, or drive that rod to a cruise show, or a drag race, in royal Kingly array.

The idea here is that man determines his own mindset about life, and should not let his bad experience keep him down in the gutter of self pity, nursing a defeated mindset.

No One Is To Blame

In reality, there is no one particular person to blame for the present condition of western society, but rather, the culmination of a 50 year, society-cuckolding affair between Feminism and the Sexual De-Evolution. A life-sabotaged man is not going to find any constructive outlet outside the Manosphere, so any displaced feelings of hate or anger onto individual members of the female sex are only going to have the following negative impacts.

- He's not going to find any immediate closure.
- Ruminating in angst and hopeless despair is only going to drag him down and make him depressed.
- He feels less motivation to build a career and succeed, and therefore has a greater tendency to low-ball his potential SMV.
- He makes it that much harder to maintain frame, to get laid, get married, etc.
- His hatred shows, affects his relationships, and possibly contributes towards a misogynistic reputation.

Personally, I don't hate women for being women, but on the other hand, thanks to the Manosphere, I no longer take them very seriously either. Since then, I have learned to just accept them for who they are, adjust myself accordingly by revising my frame of mind, and try my best to offer the unconditional love of Christ, which is what, I believe, characterizes a real man, and not notch count. Whatever pagan feminists think be d*mned.

God Game

More recently, when I found that Chateau Heartiste endorses this same fundamental attitude of Game, I was humbled to the core. An exerpt from said post, "God Game", follows.

> "The beta mangina's credo is "there shall be no other god above me than the goddess whose pussy pedestal I swear to polish unto my last day", and we can see how arousing that is for women. (Not very.) But the jerkboy who knows the value of God Game has placed a higher power above pussy power."

The following comment, an eisegesis based on 1st Corinthians 1:26-31, must be the quote of the century.

> "God has chosen the PUA's of this world to bring truth to men in these adulterous times, in which His Church and faithful followers have failed to deliver the truth, and have been led astray."

Introspection

Gamma brother Wesley Jansen made a statement that got me thinking about how much of a purple-piller I might be, and why.

> "You see men as the problem, but I see women as the problem. A lot of my writing has been based on how I've had my heart torn out by women. Nothing feels worse than heart-break. Your story reminds me of my own."

I was a little confused about why he thought my posts portray men as the culprits, and so my initial purpose for this post was to clarify my own viewpoints. [Editor's note: It's very important for a man to know what he believes, and how to express those beliefs in words.] After some reflection, I realized I did hold some paradoxical ideas about the moral agency of men in the mess. (The moral agency of women is still up for grabs. It is introduced here and explored here.) So this study then became an exploration of thoughts, beliefs and attitudes about the red pill experience.

To be honest, I do see some men as the problem, and I don't mean to say that they are male centrists, misogynists, or what not. [SF: That would be a feminist's viewpoint of the "problem".] I interpret "problem" to mean something or someone that poses a hindrance to Red Pill progress. I'll list these types of men here.

- Those Blue Pill men who remain silent and uninvolved, passively giving their power away to feminist women, and thereby empowering them.
- White Knights who are old-school dreamers. While it's true that they play the part of a useful fool for both feminists and Red Pill men alike, I cannot see how they contribute to the advancement of Red Pill awareness in society. They are either like a tool to be used, or like a dead weight useful only for entertainment.
- PUA's? [Eds. note: That's complicated! We'll save that one for another post.]

From an emotional standpoint, I can identify with such men, and I pity them more than I blame them. Considering not more than 15 years ago, practically all men were still on a default Blue Pill mindset that had been programmed into them – myself included. Even today, Blue Pill rhetoric is shamefully prevalent among men.

[Eds. note: Female drama warning.]

The Manosphere is well aware of the problems from the females' side, ultimately summed up as the female's propensity to indulge their Tingles in consecutive whirlwind romances, followed by their emotional bondage to doting on the pangs of unrequited love. [SF: Speaking cynically from that perspective, all women are the problem!]

I also think women are not going to change their fundamental nature, at least not within this millennium. If western culture is ever going to become less feminized and more patriarchal, then it will be because men did something about it.

Conclusion

At this point, I am sure many angry, suffering men are dismissing me as an ass, but I will tell it straight. I just want to inspire you to maintain a positive attitude in the face of suffering. The competition is brutal, and the chance of coming out on top is slim, but you know, attitude is everything – maintaining a sense of dignity and self respect, and refusing to go down. It's just better for us in the long run.

Maybe that is the pat answer to the question about the differences in Red Pill experiences among men – their ATTITUDE!

[Eds. note: To what extent could a man change his SSMV ranking, merely by changing his attitude?]

L. Heavey, C. Layne, and A. Christensen, "Gender and Conflict Structure in Marital Interaction: A Replication and Extension", Journal of Consulting and Clinical Psychology 1993 Vol. 61, No. 1, 16-27.

1. The Stereotypical 'Demand/Withdraw' Conflict Structure

> "A pattern of marital interaction in which one spouse attempts to engage in a problem-solving discussion, often resorting to pressure and demands, while the other spouse attempts to avoid or withdraw from the discussion, has been identified as a particularly destructive style of marital interaction."
> "Additionally, researchers have noted the tendency of spouses who engage in this pattern to grow more polarized over time, leading to the increasing deterioration, and often dissolution, of marital relationships."

The relative difference between one partner's desire for closeness versus the other partner's desire for independence is of the utmost importance in accounting for the demand/withdraw interaction. The partner who wants more closeness tends to assume the demanding role, whereas the partner who wants more independence tends to assume the withdrawing role. Wives generally want more closeness, whereas husbands usually want more independence (Christensen 1987; Christensen 1988; Christensen and Shenk, 1991). The greater the disparity between the partners' desire for closeness versus independence, the greater the extent of demand/withdraw interaction in their relationship. Also, the degree of disparity between partners' desires for closeness versus independence was greater for counseled and divorcing couples than for nondistressed couples.

> "Christensen and his associates focused on this pattern of interaction as one of the central, and most intractable, destructive patterns of marital interaction. They labeled this the demand/withdraw pattern of marital interaction and undertook a program of research to study its causes and consequences. Their research demonstrated that (a) couples can agree on the presence of this pattern in their relationship; (b) the reported frequency of demand/withdraw interaction is highly associated with marital dissatisfaction; and (c) women tend to assume the demanding role, whereas men tend to assume the withdrawing role during conflictual interactions."
> "Across both observer ratings and self-reports of demand/withdraw behavior, there was no systematic difference in the roles taken by men and women when discussing the problem identified by the man. In contrast, when discussing the issue identified by the woman, women were much more likely to be demanding and men were much more likely to be withdrawing than the reverse."

Conclusions:

1. In assessing the conflict structure, it is important to know "who has identified the issue being addressed and the extent to which each partner is invested in achieving change on that issue."
2. The roles assumed by men and women during conflict are largely determined by the structure of the conflict. That is to say, the person wanting change (e.g. more closeness, or more independence), will typically assume the demanding role, while the person who is content with the status quo will be left to assume the withdrawing role.
3. People who are totally content with their lives are not likely to find that a relationship will make them more content, because being content puts them in the defensive position in a relationship.
4. A large disparity between one partners desire for closeness, and the other partners desire for independence, is the most common source of conflict.
5. A large disparity between one partners demandingness, and the other partners withdrawal, is the most destructive type of conflict structure.
6. In general, because of their more pronounced need for closeness, which thereby makes them prone to conflict, and succumbing to temptations and unfavorable negotiations, women are thus considered to be the "weaker" sex, specifically in the areas of having faith towards achieving specific outcomes, and in maintaining emotional contentment. (1st Peter 3:7)

By extrapolation, the following types of women are considered "weaker" than others.

1. Women who have been abused, or who are more emotionally needy, i.e. who have an intense craving for closeness.
2. Women who are rude, ungrateful, disrespectful, domineering, and therefore cannot maintain a satisfying relationship with a man who desires to be close to them.
3. Women who have been rejected by men, who consequently have a greater desire for closeness.
4. Women with a low SMV/MMV, whom men do not want to be close to.
5. Women who have had intimate, sexual relationships with a number of men, and thus have gained certain emotional needs/expectations which cannot be satisfied through closeness to any one man.
6. Women who lack the skills and abilities required to meet other's needs, which reduces the power they have in maintaining closeness.

2. Wife is Authoritative or Demanding, Husband is Submissive or Withdraws

> "(Research shows that the stereotypical) wife-demand/husband-withdraw is significantly more likely than husband-demand/wife-withdraw during discussion of the wife's issue than during discussion of the husband's issue."

> "The (statistical analysis) of demandingness revealed a main effect for gender, in which women were more demanding than men."
> "…studies have shown men to be less inclined to initiate problem-solving discussions than women."
> "The finding that women are more demanding and men are more withdrawing, established across a number of naturalistic studies of marital interaction (e.g., Baucom, Notarius, Burnett, & Haefner, 1990; Christensen, 1987, 1988; Gottman & Krokoff, 1989), appears truly to be the result of the additive effects of gender differences and the nature of larger social structures in which these marriages exist."
> "This finding is particularly striking given the consistency with which this pattern appears across both self-reports and observer ratings and the almost invariably large magnitude of the differences in demand/withdraw roles during the discussion of the issue identified by the wives."

Conclusions:

1. Simply by bringing up issues of discontent, wives are inadvertently introducing a conflict structure which leads to a downward spiral in relationship satisfaction.
2. Men are adverse to the problems (e.g. complaints, conflict, drama) that women bring into their lives.
3. The wife's "weakness" (i.e. intense need for closeness and affiliation) also proves to be the weak link in the chain of marital satisfaction and happiness.

3. Husband is Authoritative or Demanding, Wife is Submissive or Withdraws

> "(Research) revealed that husband-demand/wife-withdraw is more likely during discussion of the husband's issue than during discussion of the wife's issue. (However, there is) a lack of significant differences in roles (wife-demand/husband-withdraw vs. husband-demand/wife-withdraw) during the discussion of the husband's issue."
> "Couples whose interactions are the reverse of these stereotyped roles experience increasing levels of satisfaction over time, presumably because they are able to avoid a vicious cycle of polarization and instead engage in more flexible and constructive problem resolution."

Wives have been found to generally react positively to their husbands' willingness to discuss their relationship (Acitelli, 1992). Thus, a husband's demandingness reflects their engagement rather than withdrawal from interaction, which is perceived by wives as a sign of the man's emotional involvement and commitment to the relationship.

> "It may also be that women are more willing to change their behavior than men. Thus men's demands might result in actual changes in the wife's behavior, whereas women's demands may yield increasing passive resistance, thereby beginning a vicious cycle of increasing demand/withdraw interaction. In other words, it may be not only that wives are more willing than husbands to engage the discussion, but also that they may be more willing to follow through on any agreements reached."

Conclusions:

1. Men typically play it cool during a confrontation with a woman, however, his small contribution has a big impact on the woman.
2. Women have a high profile set of emotional needs, and are therefore more pliable, more easily molded, and more willing to compromise (i.e. clinical evidence for "weakness"). [Eds. note: This is also why husbands need to honor their wives, as opposed to manipulating them for base purposes. (1st Peter 3:7)]
3. Women presumably have more to gain by cooperating with the husband's demands, rather than assuming a dominant role.

4. Reasons Men are Authoritative or Demanding

1. Personality
2. Natural inclination due to upbringing.
3. Socio-sexual ranking
4. Male Identity: They believe they have the position and responsibility to do so, by virtue of being male (1st Corinthians 11:3; Ephesians 5:23).
5. Self-Image: They find it weak, cowardly, faithless, or dishonorable to either submit or withdraw (Hebrews 10:39).
6. Authority/Faith: They have the faith to believe that they can enact a positive change in their marriage, and in the world around them (Matthew 8:5-13; Hebrews 10:39).

5. Reasons Men Submit or Withdraw

1. Personality
2. Natural inclination due to upbringing.
3. Socio-sexual ranking
4. Male Nature: Men are socialized to place a primary emphasis on maintaining independence, building status, and being achievement-oriented (Gilligan, 1982; Rubin, 1983). Thus, men avoid energy-sucking, conflict-ridden discussions in favor of pursuing these ideals.
5. Motivations: If men have higher status and greater power typically accorded to them in a relationship, then they may have no interest in change because there is nothing to gain.
6. Power: Men are seen to be the high-power group in society, and as such, they have already structured the relationship to their liking and subsequently have little or no interest in engaging in a discussion about changing the status quo (Christensen, 1988; Jacobson, 1989).
7. Satisfaction: Men who are content with the status quo may benefit from avoiding any discussion of problems with their partner.
8. Dissatisfaction: Men who experience a great deal of nagging and complaining, in conjunction with a poor, disrespectful attitude from their wives, often seek to distance themselves in order to obtain peace and psychological balance.
9. Physiology: “Men experience more physiological arousal during conflict than do women.” (Gottman and Levenson, 1986) Men’s higher level of physiological reactivity leads them to try to minimize or to avoid the conflict in order to escape the noxious arousal.
10. Emotional Effect: “…both husbands and wives reported experiencing more anxiety when discussing the issue identified by the husband.” (Heavey et al. 1993) Husbands would thus favor not instigating an argument in order to avoid any additional stress.
11. Self-Esteem: Men typically consider it to be more dignified, honorable and respectful to abandon a conflict with a close friend, or with a woman, rather than to escalate a fight (Eggerich, 2004).

6. Reasons Women are Authoritative or Demanding

1. Personality
2. Natural inclination due to upbringing.
3. Female Nature: Women’s general nature as being “socioemotional specialists” leads them to being more inclined to engage in conflicts than men, and thereby assume a demanding role. (Kelley et al. 1978)
4. Motivations: Women are socialized to place greater emphasis on relationships and community, which presumably lead women to engage in problem-solving discussions in their search for closeness and intimacy (Gilligan, 1982; Rubin, 1983)

5. Power: The larger social structure presumes that women have lesser power. Women may be more dissatisfied with the status quo, and are thus prompted to engage in discussions about change. They may perceive confrontation and conflict engagement as their only means to obtain what they want, to protect or to enhance their own positions, or to restructure the relationship according to their desires. Thus, women "have more investment in change than men". (Christensen, 1988; Jacobson, 1989) This effect can be exacerbated through peer pressure from other, unhappy, clucking hen wives who prod them to take action, perhaps for their own vicarious ego satisfaction.
6. Satisfaction: The areas in which wives wanted change centered around having more physical closeness, greater emotional intimacy, and having the husband be more involved in day-to-day chores. This finding is substantiated by data indicating that women perform more household and child-rearing tasks than the husband (Robinson 1977; Robinson, et al. 1977), even when both spouses have equal-status careers (Biernat & Wortman 1991). Men, on the other hand, being independent and dignified as they are, have no desire to drag their wives to the office and ask them to do their "fare share" of earning the income.
7. Dissatisfaction: Wives desired more changes in their relationships than did husbands (Margolin, Talovic, and Weinstein 1983). Women accrue fewer benefits from marriage than men, resulting in women's desire for more change than their husbands (Jacobson, 1990).
8. Physiology: Women are less physiologically reactive to stress, compared to men, and are not compelled to circumvent conflict. (Gottman and Levenson, 1986)
9. Emotional Effect: Women gain a peculiar emotional satisfaction from talking, arguing and creating drama.
10. Self-Esteem: Women's desire for maintaining a sense of community and connection might lead to their becoming coercive when their husbands withdraw and to a vicious cycle of increasing polarization (Gray-Little and Burks 1983). Women display a higher level of need for affiliation than men, and women with a high need for affiliation, combined with high stress and low inhibition, were the most physically and verbally abusive toward their partner (Mason and Blankenship (1987). It was speculated that much of this abuse was done in an attempt to coerce their partners towards meeting their need for affiliation.

7. Reasons Women Submit or Withdraw

1. Personality
2. Natural inclination due to upbringing.
3. Female Identity: They believe they have the position and responsibility to do so, by virtue of being female (1st Corinthians 11:3; Ephesians 5:22-24).
4. Self-Image: They find it unattractive, unbecoming, dishonorable, and disrespectful to be wayward, authoritative and demanding (1st Peter 3:3-6).
5. Trusting Authority: They trust their husband's leadership, take comfort in his loving shelter, and enjoy being relieved of certain responsibilities.
6. Faith: They trust in God's provision, protection, and promises (1st Peter 3:1-2) for those who are obedient to the authorities placed over them.

8. Correlations with Marital Satisfaction

In general, satisfaction correlates inversely with the disparity between the demand and withdraw behaviors of each spouse. That is, the more one demands, and the more the other withdraws, then the less chance there is towards obtaining satisfaction from the interaction.

> "Couples whose interactions are highly characterized by these gender-stereotyped roles appear to be > particularly at risk for experiencing longitudinal deterioration in relationship satisfaction. Couples with stereotyped gender roles have also been shown to be less responsive to marital therapy (Jacobson et al, 1986). We speculate that gender-stereotyped couples are particularly at risk for deterioration in satisfaction because their conflict behavior becomes more polarized and rigid over time, making it increasingly difficult for them to effectively resolve their conflicts."

A spouses' satisfaction is significantly greater when he/she is the one who brings up the issue (being authoritative, making the demand). Satisfaction depends largely on how well their partner responds, that is, how willing and open they are during the discussion, and the extent to which they were (not) withdrawing.

> "Spouses also reported being dissatisfied with the discussion when they raised the issue being discussed, and they were demanding and their partners were withdrawing. Separate analyses of demanding and withdrawing behaviors revealed that spouses' demandingness was primarily responsible for this relationship."

The overall pattern of demanding and withdrawing behaviors are primarily attributable to the behavior of the person making the demands, and how that behavior impacts their partner. In other words, one's behavior during the conflict significantly predicts the amount of satisfaction with the outcome of the discussion.

> "The positiveness of the individual's behavior was generally the best predictor of both, their own, and their partner's satisfaction with the outcome of the discussion. Negative behavior, on the other hand, could not be used to predict satisfaction with the discussion. Heavey (1993) speculated that this was due to two important negative behaviors—blaming and pressuring for change."

[Eds. note: Somehow, that is not surprising news.]

> "Observer ratings of negative behavior were generally not significantly associated with satisfaction with the outcome of the discussions."

[Eds. note: This is not surprising either. Yet this type of behavior – blaming and pressuring for change – is immediately recognizable as the typical woman's default conflict approach.]

> "As expected, husbands' and wives' global relationship satisfaction was also significantly related to their satisfaction with the outcome of the discussions. This supports the commonly held view that satisfied couples have more satisfying problem-solving interactions than distressed couples."

Conclusions: The things that contribute towards marital satisfaction include…

1. Having an equal desire for closeness/independence.
2. Resisting the extreme situation of being overly demanding or withdrawing.
3. Developing a habit of being open and receptive when dealing with an issue raised by the other.
4. Staying positive during conflict, which encourages your partner to stay open and receptive.
5. Avoiding negativity, i.e. resisting the temptation to place blame, or pressure the other for changes.

9. The Wife's Behavior is Critical in Determining the Overall Health of the Relationship

> "…we examined the relation between conflict behavior and global satisfaction measured concurrently and longitudinal change in satisfaction over approximately 12 months. These analyses revealed a striking pattern of results that support the speculation of Gottman and Krokoff (1989) and Gray-Little and Burks (1983) that wife demandingness coupled with husband withdrawal is particularly destructive to long-term relationship > well-being. Wife-demand/husband-withdraw interaction showed associations with both concurrent dissatisfaction and longitudinal decreases in wives' satisfaction. In contrast, husband-demand/wife-withdraw interaction was inversely associated with concurrent satisfaction, but it was predictive of longitudinal increases in satisfaction. Similarly, the extent to which each partner was rated as demanding was negatively associated with his or her concurrent satisfaction. However, husbands' demandingness was predictive of longitudinal increase in wives' marital satisfaction, whereas wives' demandingness was predictive of longitudinal decline in wives' marital satisfaction. The pattern for negative behavior was very similar."

> "Thus, when couples fall into the gender-stereotyped roles of wives demanding and husbands withdrawing, the wives experience a significant decline in relationship satisfaction. Conversely, the extent to which couples reverse typical roles is predictive of the wives' and husbands' reports of improvement in relationship quality. We speculate that this pattern results from those couples who displayed stereotyped gender behavior becoming locked into their roles in an escalating vicious cycle, whereas couples that take nonstereotyped roles are able to avoid this increasing polarization and rigidity."
> "…husbands' satisfaction is not as predictable as that of their wives. Studies have found men to be generally less affected by the nature of problem-solving interactions (e.g., Gaelick, Bodenhausen, & Wyer, 1985), as well as men's relationship satisfaction being generally more difficult to predict (e.g., Bentler & Newcomb, 1978). It may be that husbands are less sensitive to changes in relationship quality."
> "Nonetheless, it seems reasonable to assume that an increase or decrease in wives' satisfaction with the quality of their relationship would eventually affect the husbands' level of satisfaction."

Conclusions:

1. Wives would do well to kick back and take a chill pill!
2. Wives would do well to hone their honeycraft skills (e.g. smile, speak warmly, show deference, respect, gratefulness), in order to set the stage for a positive interaction. By being open and receptive, rather than harsh and demanding, she can elicit a more positive response from the typical man who is easily stressed out by conflict.
3. The main benefit of successful conflict management to husbands is to have a contentious, pesky, nagging wife become less harridan in nature.
4. A secondary benefit of successful conflict management to husbands is that their wives might grow in faith and maturity, thereby becoming better wives and partners. (Ephesians 5:25-29; 1st Peter 3:7)
5. Husbands would do well to push some buttons and spank some ass now and then!

10. More Positive and Respectful Conflict Now Leads to More Peace and Satisfaction Later

> "The correlations with change in satisfaction between Time 1 and Time 2 showed a pattern of results in which men's demandingness and negativity predicted a positive change in the wives' satisfaction over time, whereas wives' demandingness and negativity predicted longitudinal deterioration in wives' relationship satisfaction. Husbands' positive behavior, which was unrelated to Time-1 satisfaction, was positively related to a longitudinal increase in their wives' satisfaction. In contrast, wives' positive behavior, which was related to Time-1 satisfaction, was unrelated to longitudinal change in satisfaction."
> "Interestingly, none of the observer ratings predicted change in husbands' satisfaction… For both husbands and wives, wife-demand/husband-withdraw interaction had no significant positive associations and some significant negative associations with current satisfaction and predicted decline (or no change) in satisfaction longitudinally. Similarly, husband-demand/wife-withdraw interaction had no positive and some significant negative associations with current satisfaction. However, in contrast, husband-demand/wife-withdraw > interaction predicted longitudinal improvement in satisfaction; all four correlations were positive and three were statistically significant."

> "Gottman and Krokoff (1989) found that observer ratings of spouses' negative conflict engagement, which are similar to our ratings of demandingness, correlated negatively with concurrent satisfaction but positively with change in satisfaction over 3 years. Furthermore, husbands' withdrawal was not correlated with concurrent satisfaction but was predictive of longitudinal decline in relationship satisfaction. Gottman and Krokoff (1989) concluded that "couples who engage in conflict may pay a price in concurrent dissatisfaction and negative affect at home, but the strife may pay off in the long run, provided that the conflict does not invoke stubbornness, defensiveness, or withdrawal from interaction" (p. 51). Roberts and Krokoff (1990), using time-series analyses to examine the relationship of withdrawal and hostility during conflicts, found no mean differences in the amount of withdrawal exhibited by men and women or by satisfied and dissatisfied couples. Additionally, wives' withdrawal did not predict husbands' hostility, nor did the hostility of either spouse predict their partner's withdrawal."

Conclusions:

1. Men need to be more positive, more negative, and more demanding (viz. more "dramatic") in order to increase their wives satisfaction.
2. Wives absolutely need to drop the negativity (i.e. judgment, blame, being critical, demanding change), in order to stop driving their husbands to withdraw, and to eventually improve their marital satisfaction. Specifically, this means that wives who seek change should be careful not to express a negative affect in the process of elaborating their dissatisfaction. (Ephesians 4:29) In other words, it's not what you say that matters, it's how you say it.
3. Both partners should avoid stubbornness, defensiveness, and withdrawal from conflict.
4. Wives who are emotionally mature (e.g. cool, calm and collected), and who are emotionally content (i.e. have a less dire need for closeness), are wives who stand a better chance at obtaining marital satisfaction.
5. Wives carry more of the responsibility towards building overall marital satisfaction, but they also reap greater subjective improvements in marital satisfaction.

11. More Tentative Peace Now Leads to More Strife Later

> "Among dissatisfied couples, husbands' withdrawal was predictive of their wives becoming hostile; no such relationship was found among satisfied couples. These two studies highlight the potential destructiveness of husbands' withdrawal from conflict and the wives' negative, demanding reactions."

As mentioned earlier in Section 5, men usually withdraw in order to avoid conflict, preserve peace, reduce tension, and maintain the status quo. Thus, in the stereotypical conflict structure, women are tempted to become masculine, and men are tempted to wimp out. If couples lazily succumb to their feelings and base instincts by handling conflict in this manner, then marital discord is planted, and will gradually grow over time and with continued neglect. Men should be especially conscious of this dynamic.

Conclusions:

1. Men need to be more engaging, more demanding, and should resist the temptation to withdraw.
2. Wives need to be less demanding, less negative, less verbally, psychologically and physically abusive, and more considerate of the man's emotional needs for deference and respect. By doing so, wives are less likely to drive their husbands away in withdrawal.
3. Both partners should be aware of the dynamic: If husband withdraws, then wife is negative and demanding. If wife is negative and demanding, then husband withdraws." Both partners need to work to stop this cycle from spinning. The husband has the responsibility to be preemptively proactive, however, the wife has the upper hand in determining the acceleration of the upward or downward spiral (Eggerich 2004).

12. Conclusions

Here we notice there is a fundamental difference in the conflict structures that lead to marital satisfaction. The structure in which the husband is authoritative and demanding, and the wife submits or withdraws shows a greater propensity for satisfaction, whereas, the structure in which the husband submits or withdraws, and the wife is authoritative and demanding, shows a trend toward dissatisfaction, dissolution and divorce.

Upon a closer examination, it can be seen that the reasons why men submit or withdraw (Section 5), and the reasons why women are authoritative or demanding (Section 6), are largely due to motivations based on the natural (feral) inclinations, and/or the demands of living in this fallen world. On the other hand, the reasons why men are authoritative or demanding (Section 4), and the reasons why women submit or withdraw (Section 7), arise largely from a deeper faith in God's provision and truth. In other words, the latter type of structure aligns more closely to the Archetypical Image of God, and thus qualifies the couple to be recipients of God's promises and good favor. So here we see that science supports God's Archetypical marriage structure, as outlined in the Bible (Ephesians 5:25-33).

During a conflict, men may or may not lead, and women may or may not follow. It is most advantageous to the longitudinal health and happiness of the relationship when men lead, and women follow. The next best outcome results when a man fails to lead, but the woman nevertheless still follows (through her faith in God). Poor outcomes leading to marital discord, dissolution and divorce are the inevitable result when the woman fails to follow, regardless of the man's intervention, or lack thereof.

Psychological Impact on Children (from Frozen)

Jack · 18 November 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Delving into the devil that is Disney.

Readership: Christians; Christian parents
Length: 2,100 words
Reading Time: 12 minutes

The hot topic on the 'sphere lately has concerned the psychological impact of Disney's "Frozen", on children. It all began when Vox Popoli found a confused grievance written by Trevin Wax, entitled, Are We Missing the Point of Frozen's 'Let It Go'? (2014/2/17), and responded with his nihilistic post, The devil that is Disney (2017/10/26).

Then, Dalrock offered not one, but four scathing criticisms in the following posts, in which he either derided or mocked the ignorance shown by Wax and other traditional conservative Christians.

- Dalrock: It must be exhausting. (2017/11/13)
- Dalrock: Children understand. (2017/11/13)
- Dalrock: Hilarious (2017/11/14)
- Dalrock: Missing the point is hard work. (2017/11/16)

Donal Graeme responded to the last post with, How Hard Is It To Miss The Point? (2017/11/16), in which he illucidated the nefarious machinations of Disney. Boxer weighed in too, with a post, YHBT by Jake LaMotta (2017/11/17), in which he made a comment directly back to Wax's original post (which is yet to be approved, and I believe, it never will be).

The main points of contention raised in these posts, include…

1. The culpability of Disney.
2. Most adults don't really care what cartoons their children watch, and so fail to intervene with any poor conditioning that may be present. Or if they do take the time to watch Frozen, they only see that it contains a very positive message, viz. selfish, irresponsible rebellion carries vast, negative consequences which force many others to go to great efforts and sacrifices in order to redeem not only the transgressor (Elsa), but also the larger enterprise (the Kingdom).
3. Some adults (e.g. Trevin Wax, Pastor Ross Chandler) might even interpret the larger moral of the story to be a Christian one.
4. However (and this is the main point), children only seem to be picking up, and remembering, the emotionally-based, self-centered attitudes of the rebellious character (Elsa), as unequivocally expressed in the main theme song, "Let It Go!" Furthermore, children learn that Elsa's disposition is "loved" by the other characters (and likewise children spectators) who consider her to be "worthy" of redemption, and finally, that "everything turns out well in the end".

It could well be argued that the concepts of rebellion, sacrifice and redemption are indeed Christian themes, and that these themes do appear in the movie. However, only those with a mature understanding of the Christian experience could arrive at such an assessment, certainly not children who are constantly pushing the limits to see how much they can get away with. The general point which Dalrock pertinently expressed in his posts, was that Christians are either in blissful ignorance, feigning denial, or are doing mental gymnastics (AKA psychological dissociation, colloquially known as "hamstering") to justify the value of the movie as sterling, but are failing to accurately assess the impact that the movie has on their own children.

As Vox suggested, can we really rely on Disney to inspire our children with accurate principles of Christian doctrine and life in general? Scott (from American Dad) points out the insidious spin that most media conglomerates place on the stories they tell.

> "…even in movies where the "right" thing does happen, it is portrayed as a tragedy."

Thus, it is far more relevant to the psychological and spiritual development of the children, for parents to discuss the movie with their children and determine what message children are getting from the movie. Are they really getting the positive, "Christian" message? Or else, are they learning that it is an acceptable practice to "throw themselves down from the temple roof" with the expectation that the Lord will not allow them to "dash their foot against a stone"? (cf. Matthew 4:5-7; Luke 4:9-12) If the latter is the case, then in essence, we are telling them that tempting God is a necessary step towards knowing God – a very dangerous and heretical doctrine!

The agitation that Dalrock expresses for those who are more discerning is, how could parents not pick up on the fact that children are unable to grasp the larger moral of the story? How could parents not be aware of the other message that children are hearing?

Donal Graeme answered this question as follows,

> "You see, I think the key is understanding levels of communication. As an adult, Mr. Wax is picking up the (apparent) deeper message of the story. Namely that "letting go" is a disaster of an idea. This deeper message is not surface level- it requires analysis. Maybe not a lot, but analysis nonetheless. And it also requires a certain level of critical viewing skill as well. Guess what kids don't have? Yeah, that."
> "The problem is that the toxic message is surface level. This is what children are picking up- especially through the music. The song celebrates rebellion, and all its accompanying sins. That is what the children listen to, that is what they sing, and that is what they memorize. They don't do any of that for the deeper messages of the story (which I assume are present)."

Graeme is alluding to Piaget's theory of cognitive development (1936), which explains how a child constructs a mental model of the world during their formative years. Piaget's theory regards cognitive development as a natural result of biological maturation during the child's interaction with the environment. Piaget identified Four Stages of Cognitive Development, according to unique patterns of psychological processes in children, these being Sensorimotor (ages 0-2), Pre-Operational (ages 2-7), Concrete Operational (ages 7-11), and Formal Operational (ages 11-15). Children who have found the most pleasure and inspiration from Frozen are likely to be in the Pre-Operational Stage, or the Concrete Operational Stage. These are briefly reviewed as follows.

The Pre-Operational Stage (ages 2-7)

Piaget coined the term Precausal Thinking to describe the way in which Pre-Operational children use their own existing ideas or views to understand cause-and-effect relationships. Piaget also noted that Pre-Operational children exercise Transductive Reasoning, which is how a child fails to understand the true relationships between cause and effect, and instead draws a magical relationship between two separate events that are otherwise unrelated. Also, in the Pre-Operative stage, children are Egocentric, which means they can only interpret events through their own viewpoint, and are unable to adequately consider the views of others. They may not even be aware that other viewpoints exist. As a corollary, introducing a new viewpoint can be powerfully influential to the mind of a Pre-Operational child.

From this view, the storyline of Frozen may introduce to young minds some cause-and-effect relationships that are quite sociopathic and/or misguiding. I'll offer a few possibilities here.

- Rebelling is a way to attract the ego-affirming love and sacrifice of others.
- Holding out or giving up is a good way to get others to do the hard work.
- Pursuing my own pleasures is a fun, easy way to control events.
- No matter what I do, everything will turn out fine in the end.

Concrete Operational Stage (ages 7-11)

Egocentrism is slowly eroded during this stage, through the development of Imaginary Audience which involves attention-getting behavior, and Personal Fable, which creates a sense of personal uniqueness and invincibility. Abstract, hypothetical thinking is not yet developed in children of this stage, so they can only solve problems that apply to concrete events or objects. Children in this stage come to be able to use Inductive Reasoning, which involves drawing inferences from observations in order to make a generalization. However, these children struggle with Deductive Reasoning, which involves using a generalized principle in order to try to predict the outcome of an event. In sum, Concrete Operational children are likely to use the inferences from Frozen to instigate attention-drawing behavior, and feel inculpable for the repercussions. They may not even be aware of any such repercussions. Christian concepts such as grace and redemption appear as abstractions, which are not fully apprehended, neither in value nor application.

Some inductive thought processes which could arise from ingesting Frozen might include these.

- My feelings are more important than my responsibilities.
- People will still love me, and maybe even love me more, if I do bad things.
- It is meaningless to care too much about the details of life.
- There is nothing to fear in life. I can live as I please.

The Other Message

Since it is obvious that children could be picking up any number of messages from a particular sensory input, we now come to the real point, exactly what other message are they hearing?

Vox illustrated an ugly truth which is hard to swallow.

> "Disney is run by literal satanists preaching Alistair Crowley's "do what thou wilt shall be the whole of the law" to children."

In his second post listed above, Dalrock adds to this by writing,

> "Children, including Christian children, understand this best of all. They know what their parents worship, what their parents see as righteous (even if their parents fall short of living the ideal). They know that Frozen and Let It Go is a morality tale that teaches them about our most sacred beliefs."

And what, pray tell, is that great, glorious moral tale about our most sacred beliefs? Dalrock explains Crowley's modern religion in his first post (emphasis his),

> "Not surprisingly, the message of the song is our standard message to women and girls. The only way women can sin is to deny themselves what they desire*. The song teaches girls and women to stop trying to be the good girl, and embrace a philosophy of No right, no wrong, no rules for me."
> "*Or alternately, to not have high enough self-esteem, which in turn causes them to sin by denying themselves what they desire."

Note: Dalrock's sarcastic reference to "sin" is made relative to the articulated philosophy.

People will naturally identify with what resonates with their experience, and this is much truer for children. Consider a typical child's experience these days: The larger feminist-inspired culture, including Churchianity and liberalized education, television series and the news media. Then also the family structure, which may include a general lack of love and respect, destructive conflict structures, single-parent families, affairs and divorce…

A young child who is being bombarded with erroneous ideologies and spiritually misleading impressions will struggle to find their place, where they fit in, what they should believe, and how they should behave. Above all else, a child desires a sense of belonging within a family, and being loved and cherished in that environment. If a child is finding a disproportionate amount of confusion and hard rules compared to the amount of love and satisfaction they are experiencing, then the message of "Let it go!" can appear very attractive indeed! It is unreasonable to assume that children will look inward, pray to God, and question what is of true lasting value and significance.

Conclusions

Piaget noted that a child's reality is a dynamic system of continuous change involving states and transformations. Thus, parents should do what they can to ensure that the states a child experiences are consonant, and that those transformations imbued by media and education duly lead to newly well-formed states. In other words, do your best to ensure that your children mature in the correct way, each step of the way.

> "[6] Train up a child in the way he should go, And when he is old he will not depart from it."
> Proverbs 22:6 (NKJV)

This can work both ways – diligent cultivation produces high quality individuals, whereas, neglect leads to… whatever!

Towards instilling a superlative training and thereby establishing a blessed predestined child, parents should be aware that children do not have the psychological capability to interpret the world in the same way as they do. Thus, parents should be conscientiously circumspect concerning any book, song or movie that entices and excites their child. It would be advantageous for parents to sit with their children while entertaining such media, and talk them through each part of the stories being conveyed. Check their understanding of other's viewpoints, Review their cognitions about cause and effect events. If you feel that a particular source is unsuitable for your child's development, then explain to them why you feel it is so. They may not understand your reasoning, but they will know that it is important to you, and that you care enough to be involved with their life.

Teachers and friends also bear a significant influence on a child's development, and should also be reviewed and vetted.

 Churchianity: Refers to a perverted, corrupted form of Christianity which is no longer consistent with basic Christian teaching and doctrine. Does not refer to sectarian splits, or arguments between faith traditions (i.e. Catholic vs. Orthodox vs. Protestant). Churchianity is heavily infected by modernism/liberalism, and would be unrecognizable to early Christians as representing the Christian faith. In many respects, Churchianity is what happens when people attempt to reconcile their worldly views with Christianity. Rather than conforming to God, they conform to the world, and "adjust" their religious beliefs so that their faith is compatible with their worldly beliefs.

Learning the Wisdom of Foolishness

Jack · 22 November 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Ten years ago, I painted a picture of farmers working in a rice field. Those farmers were very angry with me. They waved their knives and scolded me,

> "We toil, sweat, and occasionally bleed, while working in the hot sun all day, and just to earn a meager living. You paint a picture of us, and make thousands!"

But I didn't sell that painting. I donated it to a museum. Then yesterday, ten years later, the museum called me to tell me that they were using my painting to print a calendar. They wanted to send me a complimentary copy. I asked for one more, to give to my mother. They sent me four.

Ten years ago, I went out for dinner late at night, around 11:30 pm.

Afterwards, I went for a motorcycle ride.

Since my ex left me, I have gone back to my old habits of taking long regular motorcycle rides, especially late at night. I had lost my enthusiasm to take these rides since I got married, and I wondered why. But during these rides lately, I have come to see that these motorcycle rides are the behavior of a sexual predator, although I never realized this before. It is a kind of "prowling" that can entertain my masculinity and release my sexual tension.

I prayed while I was riding. I told God about how frustrated I have been with love, and with being a Christian, and how I've never been able to find any happiness in my life, even though my life is otherwise very good. I asked God to tell me exactly what my options were, and to make all the benefits and consequences of the choices very clear to me. I also asked God to tell me the situation in as simple words as could possibly be set forth, and to fill me in with the details later on, after I have been able to grasp what is going on with me.

Later, I sat on a beach in the South China Sea. I watched the moonlight shining across the waters, and smoked a Cuban cigar. Then, God started talking to me through my memories.

A cheating slut I used to date always put so much effort on using her social skills to wile and seduce men (mostly push-pull tactics), all to enhance the attraction and the experience of love, and I see now that it was so foolish of her, even though she always thought herself to be so smart.

My ex-wife used to ask me if I loved her (my ex, not the slut) on a regular basis. She foolishly pressed this issue until it erupted into an argument – every time – thus causing strain in our marriage. Since my ex made such an issue about this, I became confused about how important it was to "fall in love", and the overall value of "being in love". But now it is clear to me that I was right in thinking about love in Biblically described terms (1st Corinthians 13), as opposed to an emotional experience. But she thought she was so much smarter than that slut I dated before her. I thought they both had the same worldly concept of love, and according to that concept, the slut was actually wiser.

An ex-girlfriend (who is now married) once told me how foolish it was for my ex-wife to do that. I had to agree. It is foolishness to seek out a magical experience of love, and to question whether those close to us experience that love in the same manner towards us.

But as I sat there smoking my cigar and pondering these things, I began to see things in a totally new way, from this perspective of foolishness. Yes, falling in love is foolish. Chasing women is foolish. Smoking pipes and cigars is foolish. Abandoning my career in the Navy and coming to live in Asia was foolish. Youth is foolish. Painting pictures is foolish. Riding my motorcycle for hours after dark, with no particular place to go, is foolish. Eating large meals late at night is foolish. Admiring women with long hair and big breasts is foolish. In fact, most everything beautiful and joyful about life is indeed very foolish, although I had never really considered this until that day.

Then, I began to see myself very clearly. When I was very young, I had read King Solomon's words in Ecclesiastes about the value of wisdom in living a Godly life. Growing up in a Southern Baptist Church, I saw a lot of criticism of foolish behavior, so I learned to think of Christian wisdom as a meaningful goal in life. From that time on, I had always made a basic assumption that foolishness is wrong, and foolishness is folly, and foolishness could not possibly lead me to anything good in life. Therefore, I had made it a principle in my life to live wisely.

But what I see now is that my devotion to living wisely had put me in a cage, rather than bringing me any freedom in the Lord. Clinging to wisdom had essentially cut me off from all things joyful and exciting in life, and I had never been able to identify this link until now. Over the past couple years, it seemed to me that it was God and Christianity, which was destroying my opportunities to find joy in life, which really didn't make much sense to me. But now, I can see more clearly that it is my firm adherence to Christian wisdom that induces this horrible effect.

More specifically, I think it is actually my pride that makes me refuse to be foolish. Many Christians are too proud to do things that they know are foolish, especially if they think it is also wrong. It is strange for them to recognize their own pride, because they are so accustomed to focusing on the deeper issues of faith. Likewise, I am astonished to see my egocentric pride, because I have never come face to face with it in the past. I always thought I was so humble, and not a proud person at all. I thought I was too alone to be proud. I thought about how I am so willing to ask others for help, and how I am not afraid to be honest about my weaknesses, so how could I be proud? I guess I am just very different from most people. In fact, most everything about love and enjoying life is quite foolish and silly. I never thought that it would be foolish to avoid being foolish. But that is precisely the hole that I have fallen into.

Just like Oswald Chambers said,

> "Beware of allowing yourself to think that the shallow aspects of life are not ordained by God; they are ordained by Him equally as much as the profound. We sometimes refuse to be shallow, not out of our deep devotion to God but because we wish to impress other people with the fact that we are not shallow. This is a sure sign of spiritual pride. We must be careful, for this is how contempt for others is produced in our lives. And it causes us to be a walking rebuke to other people because they are more shallow than we are. Beware of posing as a profound person — God became a baby.
> To be shallow is not a sign of being sinful, nor is shallowness an indication that there is no depth to your life at all— the ocean has a shore. Even the shallow things of life, such as eating and drinking, walking and talking, are ordained by God. These are all things our Lord did. He did them as the Son of God, and He said, "A disciple is not above his teacher…" (Matthew 10:24).
> We are safeguarded by the shallow things of life. We have to live the surface, commonsense life in a commonsense way. Then when God gives us the deeper things, they are obviously separated from the shallow concerns. Never show the depth of your life to anyone but God. We are so nauseatingly serious, so desperately interested in our own character and reputation, we refuse to behave like Christians in the shallow concerns of life.
> Make a determination to take no one seriously except God. You may find that the first person you must be the most critical with, as being the greatest fraud you have ever known, is yourself."

I think that was my problem. I took love and life too seriously, and so it was never enjoyable to me. I tried too hard to be a wise Christian, thinking that if I discovered something profound, it would bring me peace, joy and love. It's true that it did take my mind off of my misery, and motivated me to do something more with myself. But pride was still lurking in my subconscious, unbeknownst to me.

I should have taken a clue from my friends who told me I was too serious most of time.

My married friends, Jeffrey and Shauna (who both hold Ph.D.'s), call each other "stupid" very often, just to have fun. Their life is full of jokes and laughter. But when my ex called me stupid, it was not funny at all. It was a disrespectful insult to be taken seriously, and she meant it to be that way. Why could I not find joy and acceptance, and have fun with my marriage, like my friends do?

After this, God told me the solution to being miserable:

> "Do something foolish!"

I thought, "How can I do something foolish?" God told me that,

> "To be wise, you need a very good teacher, and you have had some of the best teachers that there are, for everything you have ever studied. But to be foolish, you don't need a teacher. No one needs to teach you how to be foolish. All you have to do is follow your heart and do what you feel."

I thought about this for a few moments, and then God added,

> "Now go be foolish, and use your wisdom to get the most joy out of your foolishness without being foolish!"
> "Whether you eat or drink, or whatever you do, do all to the glory of God." (1 Corinthians 10:31)

After this, I felt that a great burden was being lifted off of me, at last. I felt that I finally understood something that I had been missing, and that I was free to enjoy my life now.

I had always believed that foolishness is folly, against the will of God, and could never bring anything good to my life. But actually, love is foolish, chasing women was foolish, smoking my pipe is foolish, living abroad was foolish… most everything that has been enjoyable about my life is indeed foolish. I never thought about this, but actually, it is a truth I could never face before. I had the impression that foolishness was shameful.

The answer to my question was in understanding that biblical wisdom is not a goal, it is a balance between extremes – balance is the most important aspect. The key point is to enjoy each moment and each person you love around you, and glorify God by doing so.

I rode home that night in a state of peaceful ecstasy. In essence, I had learned the freedom of foolishness.

> "Stay hungry, Stay foolish" – Steve Jobs

Later, upon rereading Ecclesiastes, I saw that the wisdom of foolishness, along with the vanity and grief of wisdom, was right there in the Scriptures all along, yet, I could not comprehend it until now.

50 Shades of Discipline in Marriage

Jack · 25 November 2017 · Archived copy · Original

The book, Fifty Shades of Grey, has sold over 125 million copies worldwide, and has topped best-seller lists around the world. It set a record in the United Kingdom as the fastest-selling paperback of all time. It is the highest-grossing sex film in the U.S. and Canada, and we know that women constitute the vast constituency of fandom. The success of this book and film cannot make the truth any clearer:

Women desperately want to be disciplined! They fantasize about sexual coercion!

As we already know, women want to be loved and desired, and discipline is a very powerful way to instill feelings of love within their hearts. When a man disciplines his wife, he is also loving her! She will agree with this, because from her perspective, she feels loved when he lays down the law and plays the Dread Game. And, we all know how important the feelz are to women!

There are many passages in the Bible which clearly state that love and success is associated with, and expressed through discipline, and this is applicable through many types of relationships:

- God disciplining nations. (Deuteronomy 4; Judges 2; Jeremiah 31:18)
- God disciplining believers. (Job 5:17; Hebrews 12:5-8)
- Discipline within the Church. (1 Corinthians 5:5; 2 Corinthians 10:1; 2 Corinthians 13:2; 1 Timothy 1:3; 1 Timothy 1:20; Titus 3:10; 2 Corinthians 2:6-8)
- Kings and Generals disciplining soldiers. (Joshua 7:10-26; Judges 21:5-12)
- Parents disciplining children. (Proverbs 10:13; Proverbs 13:24; Proverbs 19:18; Proverbs 22:6; Proverbs 22:15; Proverbs 23:13)
- Self Discipline. (Leviticus 7:22-27; Proverbs 12:1; Proverbs 23:12; 1 Timothy 4:7)

Judging by the success of Fifty Shades of Grey, I presume this Biblical principle can legitimately be extended to apply for husbands disciplining wives. Let's consider this perspective from the Biblical view.

> Proverbs 3:11-12; Hebrews 12:5-6 (NKJV)
> My son, do not despise the chastening of the Lord, Nor detest His correction; For whom the Lord loves He corrects, Just as a father the son in whom he delights.
> Proverbs 3:11-12; Hebrews 12:5-6 (NSFV*)
>
> My daughter, do not despise the chastening of your husband and lord, Nor detest his correction; For the wife who is loved is brought into line, Just as Christian Grey subjugated the virgin Anastasia Steele and taught her BDSM.
> Proverbs 13:24 (NKJV)
>
> "He who spares his rod hates his son, But he who loves him disciplines him promptly."
>
> Proverbs 13:24 (NSFV*)
>
> "He who flagellates his rod hates his wife, But he who loves his wife, shags her promptly."
> Hebrews 12:7-11 (NKJV)
> [7] If you endure chastening, God deals with you as with sons; for what son is there whom a father does not chasten? [8] But if you are without chastening, of which all have become partakers, then you are illegitimate and not sons. [9] Furthermore, we have had human fathers who corrected us, and we paid them respect. Shall we not much more readily be in subjection to the Father of spirits and live? [10] For they indeed for a few days chastened us as seemed best to them, but He for our profit, that we may be partakers of His holiness. [11] Now no > chastening seems to be joyful for the present, but painful; nevertheless, afterward it yields the peaceable fruit of righteousness to those who have been trained by it.

> Hebrews 12:7-11 (NSFV*)
> [7] If a woman endures chastening, then her husband is dealing with her as with a wife; for what wife is there whom a husband does not chasten? [8] But if a woman is without chastening, of which, only feminists have refused to become partakers, then she is a short-term pump-and-dump, and not a wife. [9] Furthermore, women have had alpha-cad boyfriends who corrected them, and they paid them respect. Shall women not much more readily be in subjection to their lawfully wedded husbands and live? [10] For their alpha-cad boyfriends indeed for a few days chastened those carousel riders as seemed best for their selfish purposes, but husbands chasten wives for their own good, that they may yield sandwiches, bare-back sex, and child bearing, with honor and glory. [11] Now no chastening seems to be joyful for the present, but painful; nevertheless, afterward it yields the peaceable fruit of righteousness to those who have been trained by it.

 New Sigma Frame Version*

Remember husbands, you've got to out-perform all your wife's previous lovers in the way of authoritative discipline, in order to own her… heart, mind and soul… lock, stock and barrel. She will never tell you the details of those experiences, so you've got to blow past the furthest expanses of her imagination. Let's start with Christian Grey's example, since we know that will definitely get a woman's attention. Here are a few takeaways from the film.

- Insist that your wife sign a non-disclosure agreement forbidding her from discussing anything you do together. Don't talk to her until she signs it.
- Inform her that the second contract will be one of dominance and submission at Biblical proportions not seen since Medieval times. There will be no romance, and no contrivances with her relatives, only one of dutiful, daily carnal knowledge. Make sure the contract forbids her from touching you without an invitation, or making eye contact with you. It should also include a list of specific foods she may eat, and the total number of calories she may consume in one day.
- Buy her a mobile phone for her to use to communicate with you, and to make appointments to see you. As a token of trust and good will, be willing to listen to her hard and soft limits, and then dismiss them out of hand, saying that you will take that into consideration "IF it becomes necessary". Tell her that the grounds for "necessary" are subject to your discretion, not hers.
- Spank her bare butt whenever she is speaking brashly or is disobedient longer than 10 seconds. Use push-pull and the Shogun method to turn her on, and make her confused, so that she continues to be gratefully dependent on you.

16 Qualities of an Irresistible Woman

Jack · 1 December 2017 · Archived copy · Original

This post outlines an easily digestible checklist for feminine qualities that score BIG with men. These things, plus a healthy RESPECT (which doesn't make the list, because it is a skill, not a quality), are what makes a woman unforgettable for me, and I believe, all men as well. Unfortunately, right now in western history, irresistible, respectful women are on the brink of extinction. So here's the ideal, lest we forget!

1. Emotional maturity is the biggest asset of all. She is happy, relaxed, and emotionally stable. She knows how to maintain a good attitude at all times. She has a bubbly sense of inner joy that doesn't change with respect to circumstances. She accepts people for who they are, and doesn't denigrate or shit test them. She knows what she believes, what she likes, and what she wants, and she knows how to get along with people in a win-win way. Men want a mature woman, and they don't want a selfish, nagging, immature crybaby.
2. She likes and understands men. Women who know how men function and love them for it are very sexy. There's something about giving a man the space he needs to pursue his passions that makes a woman irresistible.
3. A beautiful woman (a) dresses in a way that flatters her figure, (b) puts effort into grooming herself, and (c) cares how men perceive her, even if the end result is very laid back and simple. There are few absolutes, except to say that a woman who thinks that taking the effort to look nice is somehow beneath her, is not considered sexy to a red-blooded male.
4. Intellectual sophistication and a sense of class will put a woman in the top 10%.
5. The absence of unusual or distinguishing features. Facial symmetry and solid color dresses are good. Tattoos and annoying habits are bad.
6. She is passionate about something that is not self-centered. It's inspirational to see a woman who believes in what she does, whether it's a social cause, a hobby or a job. Passion implies that she has a sense of purpose and meaning to her life.
7. She is generous in her estimations of the motives of others. She assumes that a man means the best, and not the worst. Men like a woman who interprets his words and actions in a positive light, and who forgives the occasional stupid move, or uncouth remark in a casual conversation.
8. She is responsive. When a guy says something, she says something that shows that she is listening and comprehends what he is saying. When he tells a joke, she laughs. When he calls, she calls back.
9. Women who take themselves too seriously are seriously not sexy. There's something about a woman who is comfortable enough to be playful, flirty, and not worry that she is risking her reputation. Please don't confuse playful with silly. Silly women who are clowning for attention are vexing. Ironically, most men believe that playfulness is a great sign of maturity (see number 1 above). She is a woman who loves life and isn't ashamed to show it.
10. Men enjoy a woman who has positive personality traits. These are innumerable, but include qualities like honesty, openness, kindness, decisiveness and assertiveness. Also, no drama queen act, no indignant attitude, no shit tests, and no endless complaining.
11. She is grateful. She knows how to say "Thank You" sincerely and with a smile. For most men, dating a woman involves a lot of time, effort, money and work, not to mention the labor in making plans to arrange a nice evening. Men want to know that a woman notices the investment in her, appreciates the work that went into planning the evening, and is able to say something positive, like "That dinner was fantastic". A woman who has a spirit of gratitude signals to a man, "You can make me happy," which is a prime component to attraction.
12. She's affectionate. Most women underestimate the impact of a physical connection to most men. A woman who understands this and gives affection freely is very sexy.
13. She is ready and willing to listen and learn. Men want a woman who is comfortable talking maturely about intimate matters (e.g. family problems, sex) when the time is right. Men want a woman who are able to take on a new perspective (namely, his) under certain situations.

14. She's willing to bend the rules, just because 'He asked me to'. A woman who has rules, respects the rules, and can still say, "OK, I'll do this just for you", is very sexy, and rarer than what people might think. It's this "partner in crime" mentality that men seem to find irresistible. Ultimately, it's a gesture of submission, which scores BIG with men. Note, if a woman bends the rules for every man she knows, then it's no longer special. This means she essentially has no rules, nor any self-respect.
15. She's willing to set aside her fear. It isn't being fearless that is sexy. It's having the fear, feeling the fear, and saying, "I'm going to set this aside and go forward anyway." That woman is sexy. She is truly living life. She is going to suffer some failures along the way, but men will be chasing her and asking for her number the whole way. The bottom line on this point is that she is trusting – she trusts him more than she succumbs to her doubts and fears.
16. She likes to laugh (at his jokes). Humor is an indispensably valuable trait in a relationship. Men aren't interested in women who crack jokes every other sentence. In fact, men want a woman with a sense of humor that matches his own, so that he can elicit a joyful response from her rather easily. In other words, men want a woman who thinks HE is funny. Not surprisingly, when she does think he's funny and laughs out loud, the man will always find that to be very sexy.

Leaving a Legacy to Future Generations

Jack · 5 December 2017 · Archived copy · Original

I have a small number of grandiose posts that took hours to write, and these have been up for more than 8 years, but as of the beginning of December, they have only had 2 hits. To create a single post, it takes me several hours to brainstorm, research information, collect links, and compose my micro-thesis. So naturally, I don't want to waste my time creating posts that no one would be interested in reading. But more than just garnering ego-gratifying hits, I want to write something that would prove useful to people's lives – and not just at the present moment, but for some time on down through the years. So lately, I started praying about what I should post in this blog.

Then last week, my post listed 16 Qualities of an Irresistible Woman. When I wrote that post, I did not expect it to be very popular. In fact, I had seen many posts on the very same topic coming out of syndicated sites over the past decade. So I thought most people would think it to be a common, and therefore uninteresting subject. But I was wrong. (I guess my hard-learned modifications made it stand out.) It was linked by Boxer and reposted by Notes from a Red Pill Girl within a day. Then, that one post got 348 hits over the next 3 days!

I realized several things from this development.

1. Red Pill Girl has a sizeable, worldwide following. I will assume that the majority of her followers are either younger females, or Red Pill wary moms who are concerned about their daughter's success in the current marriage market.
2. After browsing some of the profiles of those who commented, I realized that there are a lot of women, not just men, who are interested in Red Pill perspectives and ideologies.
3. The feminist embedded media is wrong! There are, in fact, a substantial number of people who know the Anglo culture and media machine is systematically extrapolating human values and societal norms beyond their reasonable limits, and has been doing so for far too long.
4. There is a deep hunger for fundamental Truth. People are open to, and looking for, Red Pill perspectives and information.

A Pivotal Change is Coming!

A lot of the classic Manosphere bloggers have dropped out of existence over the last three years, and some of them have deleted their blogsites altogether. I know many of them checked out because of the persecution that their writings attracted from the larger societal forces of Feminism. It got pretty dirty for some of them. Those bloggers who are remaining in the Manosphere are listing in slow decay, without unity, focus or direction. Nevertheless, their impact has been deep and permanent.

Because of this large turnover in the Manosphere's megaphones, I believe that the Age of the Manosphere, as it has been characterized in the past, will quickly peter out and end soon, or else, it will morph into a new form of Red Pill online correspondence.

What will this new Red Pill sphere look like?

From my online research on WordPress over the last couple days, I have found several female Red Pill bloggers. The most noteworthy ones have included the following.

- Dames That Know
- Notes from a Red Pill Girl

Honorable mentions go to the following ladies, who are not really hard core Red Pill, but are certainly inspiring nonetheless.

- All Things Bright and Beautiful
- Blending Ame

YES! The Red Pill is good for women too! I am getting the impression that women will be the next to jump onto the Little Red Pill Wagon, and this will be good for the sphere. If more women become Red-Pill-aware, and started contributing their ideas and viewpoints, then the Red Pill sphere might become more 'gender balanced' (forgive my use of the G word), less cynical and harsh, less 'chauvinistic' in reputation, and more unified. There might even be a few clear purposes that arise out of this female participation.

Conclusions

I am beginning to see what needs to be done. There is a widespread need for Red Pill awareness among folks, but a lot of people still have negative and inaccurate opinions towards the Red Pill. I expect that those women who accept the Red Pill mantle will prove to be significantly instrumental in the Awakening.

Those of us (especially older people, X'ers and Millennials) who have slogged through the trenches of the dismal dating and marriage market, trying to survive Feminism's war on traditional marriage and masculinity, need to speak out right now, and declare everything that they have learned, good and bad, right and wrong, holy and sinful, spiritual and carnal, all for the benefit of the upcoming generations, i.e. the iGen*. The iGen's are ever in touch with internet technology, like no generation before them, and so blogging is perhaps the best tool to get the Holy Red Pill Word of the Gospel out to them.

Hopefully, a new wing of evangelistic, female Red Pillers might renovate the old Manosphere, and in doing so, save some youngsters from falling into the many snares of pretty-lies hidden in post-modern, western/Anglo society, the Pit, and the relentless swing of the pendulum.

*The iGeneration is also known as the Homeland Generation – those born roughly between 1995 and 2014.

Psychological Projection and the Mirror Effect

Jack · 9 December 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Recently, I came across an older post from Red Pill Girl, entitled Project Much? (January 21, 2016) The post was about how women subconsciously presume that other people, i.e. men, have the same thoughts, values and motivations that they do, and how this psychological phenomenon, termed Projection, assassinates much of their socio-sexual potential.

In this post, we explore the mechanics of psychological Projection, along with five common examples, including Red Pill Girl's original topic in greater depth.

1. Selfishness
2. Greed, Stinginess
3. The Envy/Jealousy Game
4. Buyers Remorse or Auto-Rejection
5. A Woman's False Projection* onto Beta Male Orbiters

A Description of Psychological Projection

Psychological Projection is a defense mechanism people subconsciously employ in order to cope with difficult feelings or emotions [1]. Rather than admitting to, or dealing with, the unwanted feelings, Psychological Projection attributes other people to be the source of the undesirable feelings or emotions. Thus, in the eyes of the Projector, the subjective experience of the outer world is colored with the Projector's inner problems which the Projector refuses to face [2].

Projection, as experienced from the Projector's viewpoint, is called the Mirror Effect, and is based on the following scripture.

> 1st Corinthians 13:12 (NKJV)
> "For now we see in a mirror, dimly, but then face to face. Now I know in part, but then I shall know just as I also am known."

[Eds. note 1: In this post, the Mirror Effect is similar to Law 44 of The 48 Laws of Power, by Robert Greene [3]. However, in the case of Psychological Projection, the Mirror Effect is NOT an effect intended or created by others, but is merely a chimera perceived by the one Projecting – viz. a hell of one's own subconscious making.]

[Eds. note 2: The Mirror Effect is not to be confused with the action of Mirroring (when one person subconsciously imitates the gestures, speech pattern, or attitude of another, as an expression of rapport), or the Mirror Stage (described by Dr. J. M. E. Lacan as the formation of the ego through the process of identification). These are all very different concepts.]

As this word mirror implies, the things that come out of a person's mouth indicate how that person views the world, and is therefore an expression of what lies within their heart. There are several verses in scripture which support this take.

> Matthew 12:34 (NKJV)
>
> "Brood of vipers! How can you, being evil, speak good things? For out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaks."
> Matthew 15:18-19 (NKJV)

> "[18] But those things which proceed out of the mouth come from the heart, and they defile a man. [19] For out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness, blasphemies."
> Luke 6:45 (NKJV)
> "A good man out of the good treasure of his heart brings forth good; and an evil man out of the evil treasure of his heart brings forth evil. For out of the abundance of the heart his mouth speaks."

That is Projection!

Newman, Duff, and Baumeister [4] proposed a model of defensive Projection. In this view, repressors try to suppress thoughts of their undesirable traits, and these efforts make those trait categories highly accessible, so that they are then adopted when forming impressions of others. This psychological Projection is thus a by-product of the deeper defensive mechanism. Also, people mistakenly believe that the traits they Project onto others, are really the true characteristics of others. Or in other words, people who are constantly dishing out a heavy dose of Projection are in a state of denial. They are denying that those traits are truly their own, and not those of the person being addressed.

Thus, Projectors are subconsciously unwilling or unable to entertain the possibility that they are the ones who have the very same characteristics which they condemn others for. It is somehow easier for them to shift the blame onto everyone else and continue on in their pathological ways, rather than to take responsibility for changing their own cognitive processes and system of beliefs (viz. repent of their sin).

Practical Applications

There are two useful applications of this knowledge. The first is to improve yourself, and the second is to assess others more accurately. These are discussed as follows.

A person would be wise to apply the Mirror Effect towards his own edification by considering the unpleasant and negative images that he commonly attributes to others, and questioning whether the proliferation of such images might be the result of his own psychological Projection. If so, then a change of heart and mind is in order. Relationships and conversations with mature, insightful, trusted people can be profitable to this end – the 'iron sharpens iron' thing.

Guys and girls alike would be wise to gauge 'what proceeds out of the mouth' of the people around them, and especially their love interest(s), in terms of the Mirror Effect. It may tell you what lies within their heart by revealing the issues they are unable to face. However, it is typically useless to point this out to the person, because Projection occurs on the meta-conscious level. If the person sticks to their guns when being confronted with their Projective behavior, then it only creates an offense and fosters distrust and recalcitrance. However, if a very strong, intimate relationship of trust is well established, then a confrontation may prove to be more constructive. In such a case, if the person can hear the deeper message, and receive the truth which motivates the provocation, then you have won a brother (or sister).

Now, on to the five examples.

Example 1: Selfishness

If a Projecting person is calling you selfish because you are failing to fulfill their expectations of what you should be giving to them (e.g. attention, commitment, gifts, sex, or any other benefits), then the chances are good that it is this person who is the one who is truly selfish, and not you. But from their perspective, they believe that you are the one who is selfish, because you are unwilling to cater to their selfish interests.

That person is experiencing the Mirror Effect.

Example 2: Greed, Stinginess

A true, anecdotal example of how the mirror effect traps one within a stronghold of failure and rejection is given in a previous post, The Perspectives of the "Thrifty" (or Stingy) (2009/9/21). In this story, a young lady who has the reputation of a penny pincher exacts monetary compensation from her friends to such a detailed extent, that her friends grow to resent treating her any favors, and therefore withhold the least bit of generosity towards her. So, as she continues to believe that all other people are stingy, it truly becomes a self-fulfilling prophecy. Her sinful attitude of greed rubs off onto all those around her, and none of them care enough to set her straight.

Example 3: The Envy/Jealousy Game

One peculiarity of the female sex is that they are strongly attracted to men who are married, or who are highly popular with many other women. One theory suggests that this is because this is a quick, easy way to vet the quality of a particular man. "If lots of other women think he's great, then he must be great!", which is further evidence supporting the claim that women operate with a Pack Mentality. Women often Project this mentality onto men, thinking that if they display to the man that she has many other sexual market options and love interests at her ready access, then he will become jealous of her, recognize her to have a greater SMV, and have a greater desire for her, all in one fell swoop. Unfortunately for these women, this idea could not be any further from the truth. The truth is, men are very 'territorial' about women (i.e. those with whom they are serious about forming a LTR), and are immediately repulsed by any women who gives off even the slightest whiff of taking relationship loyalty too casually, or of ever having rode the carousel in the past. Worse, contrary to women's imaginings, men have a very tight-ass specification of what defines a slut, and for good reasons.

Example 4: Buyers Remorse or Auto-Rejection

If the girl you are dating frequently talks about how you are much better than what she deserves, or how it would be easy for you to find someone else who is better than her, then you might ask, "Why is she thinking about this???" Well, the chances are, she may fall into one of these three categories.

1. She has Buyers Remorse, and is considering trading you in for another opportunity. That is, if a woman Feelz like she has 'settled' for you, or if she has been Alpha Widowed, she will lack the emotional bonding necessary to desire you wholeheartedly, and will feel remorseful about being with you, instead of with her old flame.
2. She is planning to Auto-Reject herself. That is, she thinks you are either (1) way out of her league, or (2) not serious about her, or (3) both, and she wants to dump you (when she feels the time is right), so that she can avoid the possibility of being dumped by you first, which would leave her ashamed and heart broken. Women also launch this pre-emptive strike in order to avoid any shame, guilt, insecurities, or feelings of inadequacy that your relationship may pose to her.
3. It is possible for a woman to have both Buyers Remorse and Auto-Rejection going on at the same time. In this case, she truly thinks you're the perfect catch, but she feels there is something that doesn't quite stack up to whatever expectation she might have (probably the Feelz at work again). If she's too young, she might also have the greener pastures idea. Women are complicated, right?
4. [There is a fourth reason, which is not related to Projection. She might simply be wagging her tongue and shit testing you with lies.]

So again, here we see that her words (saying that you deserve someone better) are not an accurate indicator of the inherent reality of your worth. The reality is that she is thinking that she deserves someone better (in the case of Buyers Remorse), or someone who doesn't pressure her out of her comfort zone (in the case of Auto-Rejection).

Example 5: A Woman's False Projection onto Beta Male Orbiters

In the aforementioned post, Red Pill Girl describes how women often produce a false Projection* in order to reap desired benefits from Beta male orbiters. Here, it is interesting to find that even though the Projection is false, many women will still have the notion that it is true! Although women who have honest friends and a lot of relationship experience are more likely to realize it is false. Key excerpts cited from Notes from a Red Pill Girl follow. [Emphases mine.]

> "If they are honest with themselves, women often operate a so-called beta orbiter network. These beta orbiters are within the "let's just be friends" zone, but girls will often pretend that maybe she likes him or could like him to get him to do boyfriend-like things for her (like take her out when she doesn't have a "real" date or provide boyfriend-like emotional support.)"
> "Sometimes (or depending on the girl, often) she'll string them along with romantic gestures or some physical intimacy in order to gain favors or keep him on the hook as part of her "backup plan." (Note, I am not saying it is good or fair to the guy. It's not. At the same time it's just something females do for some reason, so one has to conscientiously NOT do it. I suspect it is a subconscious safety thing, but again it's just as unfair to do to a guy as it is for a guy to string a gal along.)"
> "In turn, the Beta orbiters may be Projecting as well, believing that "if she talks to him she likes him" holds true for women, too."
> "As mentioned in the first linked post, women obsessing about whether a guy will leave her after he's made a commitment, or if he really likes her or not, is a reflection of the fact that often women can, and will, leave a guy if a better one comes along, or string a guy they don't like romantically along in that very way."

In another post, Beta Orbiters from the Gal Side (March 22, 2017), Red Pill Girl outlines the psychological perspectives of a female caught up in trapping orbiters, and missing REAL opportunities in doing so. [Emphases mine.]

> "She really wants the Alpha, but he won't fully commit to her (and maybe for good reason!) This leaves her feeling unsafe. So she keeps the beta orbiter close by, in case Alpha bails. Beta orbiter is a real steady Eddie, willing to watch her kids, pay for their dance lessons, pay her bills, the works. Before the unplanned (or was it?) pregnancy with Alpha, I highly advocated she forget Alpha and go for the beta orbiter, who I believe is a far better bet if what she needs is a family man. He's actually far better looking, far more interesting and intelligent, and so on as well. The better "catch" imho, except despite me advising him not to be, he's just too darn available! And that turns her off."

She's pregnant?!? Here, I can't help but wonder, is she sleeping with both guys? Sheesh… And now a child comes into this mess? OMG!

> "Meanwhile the Alpha remains just out of reach. He's told her he would marry her and take care of her in a minute, IF she knocks off the beta orbiter thing and adopts HIS frame. But she isn't sure… will he? Can she trust him? After all, he's got "options" and has shown he's willing to walk if needed. (Ironically this is exactly what draws her in, if he was too available, he'd be a Beta orbiter in her mind, and she'd likely seek another Alpha. Complex, I know!)"

Since men usually mean what they say, it seems that Alpha is not so 'out of reach' as she fears.

> "And so it goes round and round. I suggested she completely cut off contact with the beta orbiter, because he undermines her relationship with the Alpha and is a BIG reason things aren't progressing to a commitment. She really needs to choose. And to PROVE herself worthy of commitment!"

Sorry to be crass, but she should have 'proved herself' 15 years ago, and then her life could have followed a more satisfying trajectory for both her, and her husband and child. Also, it's very bad advice for the Alpha to 'man up and marry' that two-timing monkey swinger, because that would remove the opportunity for her to grow in faith – something which is absolutely necessary for her to become a worthy wife.

> "She saw the sense in all this, when I explained the concepts. I truly believe she herself does not understand how her feminine imperative is pushing her to do things that are not helping, but actually hurting her chances of success. One must recognize the self-sabotage hypergamy can cause, and why women play these games, to overcome them."

She knows it! But she's too comfortable running cruise-control on auto-pilot, and so she won't instigate any changes in her life. Thus, the Female Imperative (viz. the feral nature of the 'flesh') remains in the drivers seat, going full speed ahead towards a collision.

Analysis and Discussion

As Red Pill Girl pointed out, there are some grave consequences from languishing in fear and doubtful indecision, and failing to trust and have faith. So why do women do this?

Well first, there is a plethora of Blue Pill advice all over the Sinternet, condoning women to play the field – advice which is redundant, because women do this naturally, without any prompting. A supercharged paradigm of this same advice, which also exemplifies the appropriate constitutive elements of Projection, can be found in the Huffington Post article, The Male String Theory of Dating (and I hope the Huffies don't follow the pingback). [Eds. note 3: You've got to check this one out to believe the incredible, dimension-warping, light-speed Hamster spin!]

Second are the reasons obvious to Red Pilled men, which women may or may not be consciously aware of. Women retain the orbiters for any of the following reasons.

- Gifts, money, and material resources (Beta Bux).
- Women thrive on ego stoking attention from men.
- A source of Relationship Contingent Self-Esteem.
- Social affirmation – I've had a hard time finding a source reference on this, but I have the gut feeling (based on my experiences) that women who have men on the strings are higher up the female pecking order. As such, the Hamster reasons that having several men in hot pursuit is an affirmation of a woman's higher SSMV among her peers.
- The Endless Courtship Fantasy of always being a princess who is highly desired above all others, and relentlessly fought for in wars and duels. To support this fantasy, it is necessary for women to perceive the imminent security of having a back-up man, which is rooted in the perception of getting a reliable commitment from 'anyone', if not 'someone' in particular. Again, the goal here is to maintain the mythos that she is one desired.
- Having a pawn to play in the Envy (Jealousy) Game, which is another embodiment of female Projection, as discussed in Example 3 above. Chateau Heartiste is rife with entertaining examples.
- Having the luxury of choice.
- The overall contentedness of indulging their hypergamous nature.

It should be noted that all these things are based on the latent feral nature, or the 'weakness of the flesh' as described in the Bible. We are warned about these from scripture. [Emphases mine to show the striking correllations.]

> Galatians 5:16-26 (NKJV)
> "[16] I say then: Walk in the Spirit, and you shall not fulfill the lust of the flesh. [17] For the flesh lusts against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh; and these are contrary to one another, so that you do not do the things that you wish. [18] But if you are led by the Spirit, you are not under the law."

> “[19] Now the works of the flesh are evident, which are: adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lewdness, [20] idolatry, sorcery, hatred, contentions, jealousies, outbursts of wrath, selfish ambitions, dissensions, heresies, [21] envy, murders, drunkenness, revelries, and the like; of which I tell you beforehand, just as I also told you in time past, that those who practice such things will not inherit the kingdom of God.”
> “[22] But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, longsuffering, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, [23] gentleness, self-control. Against such there is no law. [24] And those who are Christ’s have crucified the flesh with its passions and desires. [25] If we live in the Spirit, let us also walk in the Spirit. [26] Let us not become conceited, provoking one another, envying one another.”

Moreover, as long as a person chases after the fulfillment of the flesh, they are doomed to the inherent consequences. (The main reason these things are mentioned in the Bible is because God intends to give us fair warning about the life-hazards that are not obviously discerned through the natural senses.) Such lessons in life cannot be escaped, and sadly, the rewards for being spiritually obedient wane exponentially as life drags on.

To make matters worse, not only do they make their lives more difficult and frustrating over the long run, they also don’t enter into the Kingdom of God (ibid. v. 21). Thus, the choice to retain an orbiter back-up is appealing, but the fruit is lethally poisoned because they miss the chance to enter into an experience which I’ll call, ‘redemption mode’. There are some deeply hidden reasons for why this is so.

- She avoids the challenges associated with moving past the limitations of her hypergamous nature, and then developing and exercising faith*, which is of eternal benefit to her soul.
- She bypasses the suffering which is a fundamental element in the development of her strength of character, which is of supreme value, not only to herself, but also to any man she may form a relationship with.
- She fails to embrace the opportunity to mature. Maturity is known to be one of the most endearing and irresistible qualities a woman can have, as it is a major cofactor in happy, successful marriages.

So she is not only on a crash course with disappointment and regret, she is also running away from God and salvation. Somebody please wake her up!

Conclusions

In total, the practice of keeping a Beta Orbiter at bay is a subtle, but greatly damaging sin that most women are not aware of. Indulging in the relative safety of harboring orbiters is a deceptive comfort zone. Instead of garnering orbiters, a woman should draw some boundaries to keep her suitors at a socially safe distance until she is ready to choose one, and then make a clear decision in the matter.

* It’s difficult to explain this spiritual phenomena in only a few words, but the following series of posts describing the story of my own faith journey might help illustrate the process.

About the Pendulum

The Pendulum Effect (AKA Cyclical Theory) states that cultural and political norms swing from one extreme to the other over the period of 2-5 decades. Over the past year and a half, the swing of the pendulum decreased it's momentum as it reached its extreme maximum amplitude to the Left. The election of the radically traditional, neo-conservative Trump in November, 2016, heralded a new age in the socio-political context. Now, the pendulum is slowly gaining velocity back to its equilibrium position.

The swing of the Pendulum is driven by an Avoidance Construct. That is, people avoid the imminent and readily apparent pitfalls and errors posed by present society, and go towards the other extreme, which also has pitfalls, but which are not so readily apparent. The presumed goal is to arrive at Life, Truth, God, fulfillment, or whatever, and achieve a balance. But if a person does not embrace the core structure of Truth in the return swing, then they invariably get carried away to the other extreme.

Much of the confusion arises from the widely differing opinions of where the true center of Truth is located. So let's consider the opposing viewpoints.

The Promised Land of Sociosexual Cornucopia that is hoped for by the Left and the Right is diametrically opposed.

Feminists will argue that our 50-year-long sojourn through the desert since the sexual revolution is only now bringing us to the Jordan River. "Once we cross that final river, we will enter into that Promised Land!" So they rail vehemently against those who dream of returning to the Egyptian bondage of Traditional norms and Patriarchy, and who are giving up the hope of forming a new nation of 'sexual freedom' and 'gender equality'. In this view, Trump is the anti-Moses in a cruel twist of fate — obviously a stratagem of the dark Enemy who has dominion over this fallen world.

Heh…

But to many MGTOW's and sub-SMV men taking the Red Pill, the Promised Land holds Traditional norms within a Patriarchal nuclear family model, which is a totally different brand of 'sexual freedom' – a freedom for 'sexual access equality', where everyone has a fair chance of getting laid and/or married — not only genetic jackpot Gina and Sir Chadwick Edcad III, Sh!tLord of Edensplurge.

Motives, Movements, and Vectors — Left vs Right

The motives of Feminists and Traditionals are clear. The motive of the 'Murican war machine is to amass wealth, curb population growth, and to change the nature of post-war society. But for Churchians who are warning others to stay away from the Red Pill, what is their Promised Land? This question is the biggest ~~enema~~ enigma of all!

In February, 2016, Black Dragon foretold a fundamental shift in the Manosphere paradigm. This shift is becoming obvious now, but it remains to be seen whether the Manosphere will be infiltrated by Blue Pill adherents as Black Dragon believes, or gain traction in society as the pendulum swing back to the Right, as I predict.

Some reasons why I think it will steer right are as follows.

There are several developments in society that chronicle the constitutive metamorphosis.

1. Growing Resistance to Increasing Socialism
2. The Public Rejection of Hollywood, Media, and News Syndicates
3. The Advent of the Anti-Feminist

4. The Rupture and Reorganization of the Right

Each of these are summarily reviewed in the following.

1. Growing Resistance to Increasing Socialism

A major harbinger of a shift is conveyed by the creeping clampdown on civil liberties, and the rising support against these changes, as evidenced by the development of Anti-Fascist factions (AKA AntiFa, which is also mockingly termed "Anti-First-Amendment' by the Right), and also the widespread condemnation by the Right of the same. The Anti-Fascist movement is a leftist movement which is rebelling within their own Liberal ranks, primarily because of the way policies and laws have steadily grown more socialist in nature. Much of the right is also upset about these policies, because they have grown to target Nationalist bastions of the right, especially straight, white Christians. Obviously, the Right and the Left have contrasting concepts of what Socialism entails. AntiFa has attempted to label core elements of the Right as Fascist, and pundits have unsuccessfully attempted to label Antifa as 'Alt-Left'. Controversy surrounds the legitimacy of Antifa's claims, methods and purposes, which border on revolutionary.

- The Atlantic: The Rise of the Violent Left (2017/9/1) [Archive without paywall]

Quoted from the Atlantic,

> "Antifascists call [violent] actions defensive. Hate speech against vulnerable minorities, they argue, leads to violence against vulnerable minorities. But Trump supporters and white nationalists see antifa's attacks as an assault on their right to freely assemble, which they in turn seek to reassert."

2. The Public Rejection of Hollywood, Media, and News Syndicates

Hollywood has long been the subject of public ridicule.

The media outlets are so darn biased, and with the exception of basic fact checking, it seems like none of them do any original research on their stories.

The following news sources are thought to be considered the most relevant and reliable (relatively speaking) by the general populace.

- The Atlantic
- The Economist
- The New Yorker
- The New York Times
- Last Week Tonight on HBO [Discontinued]

To me, REAL news is something that somehow affects (or could affect) my life or my future. It's not just fashion entertainment or a new political spin, mudslinging, or other such propaganda. The number of news outlets that offer REAL news, and not just political posturing, have diminished to but a few. I suspect that most REAL news, by this definition, goes unreported.

Furthermore, media continues to be fundamentally biased towards the Left, in spite of the Antifa's sedition towards the media, and an ever-growing, grass-roots attrition to the Right. Thus, popular support for the Left is slowly evaporating. Leftist groups, like Antifa, have picked up on this split, and while they agree with the Right that the media is untrustworthy, they disagree with the populist migration to the Right. As a consequence, the Liberal-based media is slowly being left high and dry.

For example, in a conspicuously liberal attempt to shame Americans into relinquishing their Constitutional rights, CNN broadly condemns the callousness of Americans who couldn't care any less, as the mass shootings continue on unchecked.

Meanwhile, all this continues as the focus of Feminist values steadily slinks further away from the concrete realities of the common man's daily life, as evidenced in the following article.

- Everyday Feminism: 10 Things Every Intersectional Feminist Should Ask On a First Date (2017/12/8)

America is coming apart at the seams, and most topics reported in the news prove to be irrelevant.

The public has had enough.

3. The Advent of the Anti-Feminist

The advent of the Anti-Feminist has been manifested in various reaction figures, including luminaries such as philosopher Stefan Molyneux, political activist Lauren Southern, Prof. Jordan Peterson, celebrity Gavin McInnes, media broadcaster Ezra Levant, populist speaker Milo Yiannopoulos and Senator Al Franken, who have all been met with mixed reaction.

Another quiet, but imposingly controversial incarnation of the Anti-Feminist voices include women, ranging from a few, loyal, unicorn Red Pill Girls at one end, compromising Violet crossovers in the middle, and CoverGirl bedecked Tradthot posers at the other extreme. Godfather Roosh has been an outspoken voice on the latter, basically decrying their implicit fraud. Related posts are listed here.

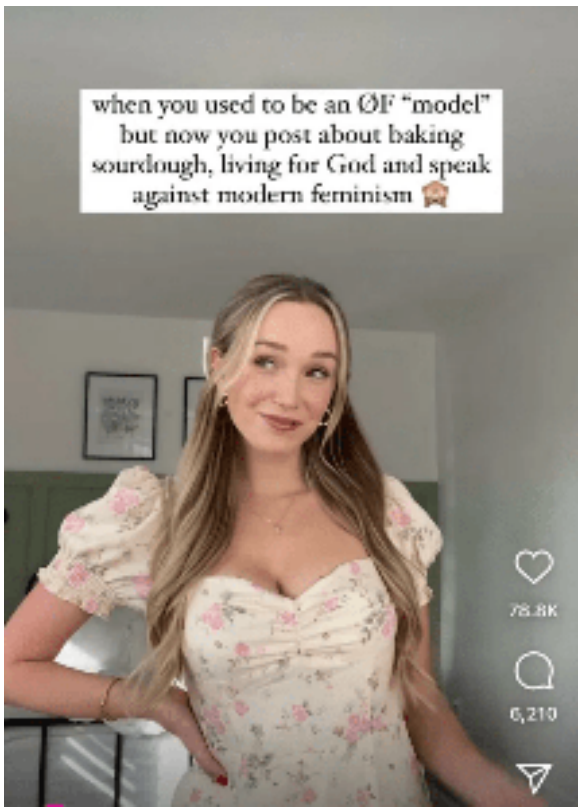
- A commentary on Roosh's video exposition is given by The Anarchist's Notebook: Expel The Tradthot Among You! (2017/12/10) [Archive not found.]



Thermidor explains the distemperate influence of the Tradthot.

> "If populism and appealing to the common man rather than cosmopolitan liberals can get you attention and profit (as Trump's success clearly showed), there will be those seeking to capitalize on that. Due to a failing career or a general impotence, they will flock to a fringe scene that has just the right amount of people within it to gain notoriety for changing their "beliefs."

Among many other Truth statements in his video, Roosh says, which, I feel, strikes to the core of the issue. Real faith and spiritual maturity is required to produce an individual who can escape the corrupting influence of society, dodge the cutting swing of the pendulum, and prove themselves worthy of a LTR/marriage. In doing so, they receive the eternal honor of (possibly) becoming the bettered progenitors of future generations.

> "Traditionalism and Religion go hand in hand. They can never be separated."

By the way, here is another crack in the foundation – the ubiquitous, desperate, horny men who can't keep a lid on their lust. An Anonymous commenter writes the stock moribund rabble on the 4Chan Board,

> "I hate her (Lauren Southern) but I'd still f_ck the shit out of that pussy. Such a cute little tummy."

That's some shrewd ontological sagacity right there on a public forum, my friend! The last thing we need is to reproduce slugs like this guy. Reading stuff like this makes me (somewhat) sympathetic with rabidly hypergamous females. We have a long way to go, guys.

4. The Rupture and Reorganization of the Right

Anonymous on the 4Chan Board offered the following succinct analysis of the current state of the Right. [Archive not found.]

> "The Right is comprised of a bunch of different factions who fundamentally can't agree on basic sh!t, like what women should do, what races should do, what the economy should be, what about religion? etc."
> "The only thing identifying us all as Rightwing is animosity towards the dominant Progressive dogma. That's it."
> "This "trad thot" war is being spurred by Nazbol (National Bolshevik) communists in an attempt to fracture and infiltrate our (Red Pill) movement." [Note: Anonymous provided no sources for this claim.]
> "It's divide and conquer. They're probably really pissed that women are joining the Alt Right because that means the Alt Right has real cultural relevance and could become mainstream. Especially the women pandering to the thirsty beta orbiters that can't give their money to [them] fast enough with the hope in the back of his mind that she will be his girlfriend."

An article from Vanity Fair: The Misogynist Civil War Within the Alt-Right (2017/12/7) offers a confirmation that Anonymous on 4Chan could be right in his claim that the Tradthot war is a Trojan Horse. Before it trails off into drivel, it offers a smug triumph over the so-called 'division', leading one to question whether there might truly be an underlying intelligent design.

> "The alt right's long-simmering resentment at its favorite women exploded with the discovery of pictures of [Lauren] Southern posing in costume as a Japanese video game character with — gasp! — a man of color."
> "Suddenly, the men of the alt right realized that their Internet girlfriend might not be as racist as they had hoped, and complained that they had been taken for suckers."
> "What Sommer calls a "full-scale freakout" against women of the far right has ensued."

On a side note, Red Pillers might not be aware of this, but the Japanese costume remark, in addition to the obvious racial slander, are both underhanded attempts to slur the 'moral' reputation of Southern, and the Right, respectively, by painting her as a transgressor of Cultural Appropriation, which is considered a sin by Feminists.

Vanity Fair reveals it's own self-serving ignorance in the following lines.

> "Concludes Sommer, the chronicler of right-leaning media: These various YouTube women have been treated terribly, whatever you think of their politics. But it's still been interesting to see them, some of the Internet's most outspoken critics of feminism, realize that the far-right could do with a little feminism of its own.'"

I'll wait until you finish laughing.

What Hope is there for the Right?

I do believe that the Right will slowly gain mass and momentum in the coming years. Although what the new Right will resemble remains a mystery. Perhaps the current stagnation of society will serve as a petri dish to form a new cultural organism. A polarizing catalyst would serve to jump start the nucleation of solidarity. We can watch for this.

I like to believe that the Red Pill will continue growing in strength and numbers. As religious foundations founder and fulminate (e.g. Churchianity), the Red Pill seems to be the only bit of Objective Truth remaining in today's society.

President Donald Trump, in spite of all his gaffes and foibles, has proved to be a strong leader and proponent of Traditional norms. I expect this to continue. Before the next election, some of the old blood will pass, and more youngsters (iGen's) who overwhelmingly favor Trump, will reach voting age.

Time is on the Red Pill's side. The Red Pillars of Society wait with hopeful anticipation.

This post investigates the sources of variance in men's estimations of women's attractiveness ratings on OKCupid, as reported in the following post.

The OKCupid Blog: The Mathematics of Beauty (January 10, 2011)

This particular data report from OKCupid is, like all the others, very engrossing. A man could spend all day browsing the Dataclysm posts with intrigue.

The Data

Apparently, there were three sets of data collected on thousands of users.

1. Men's ratings of a woman's overall attractiveness on a 1-5 scale.
2. Men's personal opinions of whether he finds a particular woman attractive.
3. The message count of the women studied as an indicator of interest.

Data crunching came up with the following correlations.

1. Most all men had a near agreement, on a 1-5 scale, of the overall attractiveness of all women.
2. Concerning the second data set, the women fell into two different categories: (2a) those for which the men's personal opinions were homogenous, and (2b) others for which men widely disagreed.
3. In comparing women among the same lateral attractiveness ratings (1), when men's opinions of a particular woman (2b) were diverse, the message count (3) was much higher, compared to those women with uniform ratings (2a), who often had a message count that was below average.

Rudders Analysis

The main gist of Rudder's report covers the variance in the number of messages received by above-average attractiveness women with the same hotness rating, with all other variables controlled for age, class, race, etc. Through this discrepancy, Rudder found that men's opinions of some women's attractiveness resembles a bell curve skewed toward hotness, whereas, the opinions of other women's attractiveness was sharply split, with a lot of men rating her 'hot', and a lot of other men holding the opinion that she's a dud, and relatively few ratings falling in between.

There was another interesting finding. Among comparisons of women having equivalent ratings of attractiveness (e.g. those women who were all rated as a 7/10, or what not), those women with a wider variance in the men's opinions received a significantly larger proportion of messages compared to those women who made a consistent impression on all men.

Rudder describes this anomaly like this. [Eds. note: Emphasis his. You'll have to go to the site to see the photos and graphs.]

> "As you can see, though the average attractiveness for the two women above is very close, their vote patterns differ. On the left you have consensus, and on the right you have split opinion."
> "To put a fine point on it:"
> - "Ms. Left is, in an absolute sense, considered slightly more attractive"
> - "Ms. Right was also given the lowest rating 142% more often"
> - "yet Ms. Right gets 3× as many messages"

From a socio-political standpoint, I want to point out that Rudder has his descriptions reversed. Ms. Right, who smells as if she frequents night clubs on occasion, is actually Ms. Liberal Left, and Ms. Left, who appears rather pure and wholesome, is Miss Traditional Right.

> "When we began pairing other people of similar looks and profiles, but different message outcomes, this pattern presented itself again and again. The less-messaged woman was usually considered consistently attractive, while the more-messaged woman often created variation in male opinion."

After some more data crunching, Rudder stated that,

> "…a woman gets a better response from men as men become less consistent in their opinions of her."

He finally came to the following boneheaded (or perhaps facetious) conclusions.

> - "The more men as a group disagree about a woman's looks, the more they end up liking her."
> - "Guys tend to ignore girls who are merely cute."
> - "In fact, having some men think she's ugly actually works in woman's favor."
> - "If someone doesn't think you're hot, the next best thing for them to think is that you're ugly."

Rudder offered a fair attempt to explain this difference using game theory, which entailed that competition plays a role in men's decisions on which woman to message. But Rudder missed a gravitating point in his study in answering the question of why there is a bell curve for some women's perceived attractiveness, while there is a flagrant split in some others. So here we apply a little Red Pill praxeology to help explain this phenomenon that is well documented by OKCupid.

Red Pill Analysis

I'll proffer that there is a little more going on to these attraction ratings and message frequencies than merely aesthetic beauty. It is obvious from the photos, that those women with a homogenous rating present a very traditional manifestation of beauty – that is, more natural. All guys feel the same about that, (that is, quite positive), take it for what it is, and rate her accordingly. But for those hot thots with the banana split ratings, they are displaying other cues rather unrelated to her beauty, and more related to her DTF probability. Most noticeably, the photos of the women with split ratings have an ostensible cold lusty gaze, reminiscent of a seductive prostitute, and are likewise showing a few slut tells. Guys who rate the latter type of women very high, are guys going for women who are likely to put out. They perceive the possibility of a pooze pumping good time, and get to work on that opportunity ASAP through the venue of messaging. On the other hand, guys who are more marriage minded, more serious, or more 'moral', get turned off by these slits, and thus tally up those abysmal ratings on the lower end. Also, guys who are more serious, are also likely to be more choosy, and are therefore less likely to vomit out pickup lines to any woman whose photo gives them a stiffie. The few guys who rate these hoes as anything in between, probably don't know what they're looking at.

Your Marred Beauty Will Catch Men's Eyes, Reward Your Attention Whoring With Messages, and Get You Laid!

[Eds. note: For non-native English speakers, that headline is sarcasm.]

To his credit, Rudder does warn women that hiding their flaws is a bad move (e.g. by posting cropped, close-up, or decade-old photos), because this tends to repel men after they find out the truth. But I feel he takes the argument a little too far in the opposite direction – encouraging women to flaunt their flaws as unique identifying features.

I can agree that it's a bad idea to feel ashamed of ones flaws, and that people should accept themselves for who they are, but actually celebrating one's flaws to the point of playing them up for attention, and perhaps even creating more flaws for this purpose is a bit beyond me. It's almost like a self-destructive person proudly begging for compassion. This is first indicated in the headline of the article,

> "How you can use your flaws to your advantage" which drops a hint about where this is all going. Finally, in the conclusions, Rudder offers the advertised advice to the OKCupid peeps.

> "Well, fundamentally, it's hard to change your overall attractiveness (the big single number we were talking about at the beginning). However, the variance you create is under your control, and it's simple to maximize:"

So he is saying (in so many words) that the key to get more messages, and attention, is to make yourself different! (Sounds like a snowflake mantra.) He then posts two photos of tatted up dykes, with facial piercings, and short/dyed hair (are her eyebrows dyed too?!?), saying, [Emphasis mine.]

> "As you've probably already noticed, women with tattoos and piercings seem to have an intuitive grasp of this principle. They show off what makes them different, and who cares if some people don't like it. And they get lots of attention from men."

There's that word, 'different'. I saw that coming. The truth is, men find women who are lacking unusual or distinctive features to be more attractive.

We know what kind of attention Rudder is talking about. I would say, most guys who are on OKCupid are looking to hooker up a lot more than they're looking for a wife. Tattoos and the cosmetic clad clownface are sure to spell that out for them. I don't believe women like this deserve any 'sympathy' for their flaws, because they have no sense of shame to begin with. If I found a woman like that on OKCupid, my first message would be one of the following,

- "How long since you got out of rehab?"
- "You're really dedicated! Skipped parole to surf OKCupid!"
- "Nice of your Dad to bail you out."

I won't say it's impossible to find a nice, respectful, Traditional, marriage-worthy girl with huge tit tats, lip piercings and Alice Cooper style mascara, but don't bet your marital lifetime happiness on it.

Conclusions

What Rudder, and most of society as a whole, fail to realize, is that people, including women, who display self-respect, draw respect from others, including men. Whereas, women who dress like a doxie are inviting others to regard them as a sex object.

I will reiterate. If women dress like hoes, then they are going to get the intense lusty attention and the fast action of the horny male. But if women step up their personal standards of class, beauty and attractiveness, and adopt the appearance of a cultured lady, then men will be more likely to give them the respect and consideration that they crave. If a woman stayed natural, dressed like Audrey Hepburn, and displayed some refinement in both her mind and her manners, then men would also 'man up to the challenge' as well. Women displaying sophistication are more likely to attract higher quality, commitment-minded men. Whereas, those men who are simply seeking a pump-and-dump would think twice before choosing her, and message the easy hoebags instead, as the men of OKCupid have demonstrated.

I'd like to know, how many women went out and got a tattoo after reading Rudder's post, thinking that it would move them up the SMV ladder with men? That's a sad misrepresentation of the truth behind the data.

Book Review: The Love a Wife Desires, the Respect a Husband Needs (5 stars)

Jack · 18 December 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Respect is Paramount!

Not enough is said about the intrinsic need for respect that men have.

A few days ago, (December 14-15, 2017), Dalrock got into a row with Vox Day, two longstanding lords of the Manosphere, about the respect shown to MGTOW, and its effects on Morale. These arguments were contained in the following posts.

- Vox Popoli: Low Morale Men (December 9, 2017)
- Dalrock: No respect. (December 14, 2017)

A few years ago, Dr Emerson Eggerichs wrote a book that details the dynamics of how a wife's respect motivates a man to love her more, and how a husband's love draws a wife to respect him more.

Dr. Emerson Eggerichs, Love & Respect: The Love She Most Desires; The Respect He Desperately Needs, Nashville: Thomas Nelson, and Integrity Publishers, 2004. ISBN: 978-1-59145-187-7

I bought this book earlier this year, and read it in its entirety. Based on what I've read in this book, and from my own life experiences, I am completely convinced, that when the principles described therein are adhered to, it can strengthen and transform relationships.

This book spells out the direct connection between the emotional needs of men and women through the following verse of scripture found in the Bible.

> Ephesians 5:33
> "Each one of you also must love his wife as he loves himself, and the wife must respect her husband."

This book has been out since 2004, and has since then created a revolution in relationships. Any woman who doesn't know this, is far behind the times. It is definitely worth buying a copy and giving it to your significant other this Christmas.

Here, we review this book in detail.

Overview

Based on the verse cited above, Eggerichs makes the simple but profound assertion that love and respect are "primary needs" for women and men, respectively—that women need love, and men need respect, like they need air to breathe. From this foundation he develops the theory (which has since been proven in many marriages) that the Love and Respect Connection is the key to solving any relational problem in a marriage.

In considering why the divorce rate among Christians rivals that of society, and serious marital problems persist, even within the church, despite the recent proliferation of books on marriage, he finds the root of the problem to lie in the failure to use the "whole truth" of Scripture. To solve such problems, "the first step is… to hear what God's Word clearly says". Eggerichs begins at the beginning: "The opening chapters of Genesis tell us "God created them male and female". But what it underlines is that men and women are very different.

Referencing numerous Scripture passages, Eggerichs further unpacks what many consider to be a complementary view of spousal roles: husband and wife are equal in salvation and redemption, but in marriage,

> "The husband is to be considered 'first among equals'. [The husband] is to be the first to provide, to protect—even to die if necessary."
> "For her part, the wife needs to be valued as 'first in importance'. When a husband honors his wife 'as first in importance', and she respects him 'as first among equals', their marriage works."

The love and respect that God commands husband and wife to give each other in Ephesians 5 is exactly what God created husband and wife to need in Genesis 2. Husband and wife are both created and commanded to be the perfect complement: when spouses align themselves with God's created and redeemed order, their marriage will work.

To unpack his exegesis and support his thesis, Eggerichs organizes the book into three main sections: (1) The Crazy Cycle, (2) The Energizing Cycle, and (3) The Rewarded Cycle, which will be summarized as follows.

1. The Crazy Cycle

> "Without love, she reacts without respect; and without respect, he reacts without love"… and round and round they go."

As Eggerichs explains,

> "Angry exchanges are caused when the husband appears careless, depriving his wife of love, and when the wife reacts with criticism and complaints that are vehement, depriving the husband of respect."

Every married couple has gotten dizzy spinning on this vicious cycle, and spouses instantly recognize versions of themselves in the real-life scenarios woven through the book.

In this section, Eggerichs explores the implication of the created differences between the sexes. Couples who have read this book immediately identify with the examples and remember the principles. For instance, to illustrate the truth that men and women have different ways of processing the world and communicating, Eggerichs portrays women as experiencing the world through pink sunglasses and pink hearing aids while men experience it through blue sunglasses and blue hearing aids. The misunderstandings that result from these different 'codes' of communication produce situations ripe for conflict, i.e., the Crazy Cycle.

Part of the appeal of Eggerichs' book is his (attempted) political neutrality, and his good-humored approach to informing couples about each spouse's communication codes and needs.

Besides discussing the typical ways in which spouses misunderstand and misinterpret one another, this section and its appendix provide practical strategies to stop the Crazy Cycle from spinning. For example, Eggerichs suggests couples to contemplate the consequences of their actions.

Men should ask themselves,

> "Is what I am about to say or do going to feel unloving to her?"

Women should ask themselves,

> "Is what I am about to say or do going to feel disrespectful to him?"

He also encourages husbands to remember,

> "When she is being critical or angry, she is crying out for your love; her intent is not to be disrespectful."

Likewise, he encourages wives to think,

> "When he is being harsh, or stonewalling (viz. seemingly ignoring) you, he is crying out for your respect; his intent is not to be unloving"

2. The Energizing Cycle

Eggerichs moves beyond strategies for stopping the Crazy Cycle to outline strategies for entering a healthy cycle in which spouses energize each other and their marriage by applying love and respect. In a nutshell:

> "his [the husband's] love motivates her [the wife's] respect"
> "her respect motivates his love".

Eggerichs encapsulates the Energizing Cycle in two acronyms.

C-O-U-P-L-E is how Eggerichs encourages husbands "to spell love to your wife".

C-O-U-P-L-E stands for,

- Closeness – She desires her husband to be physically close to her.
- Openness – She wants her husband to open up to her, emotionally.
- Understanding – Her husband should not try to fix her, but just listen.
- Peacemaking – She wants her husband to say "I'm sorry".
- Loyalty – She needs to know her husband is committed to her.
- Esteem – She desires to be with a man whom she feels proud to be with, and to be honored and cherished by that man.

C-H-A-I-R-S is how he encourages wives "to spell respect to your husband".

C-H-A-I-R-S stands for,

- Conquest – He desires to work and achieve.
- Hierarchy – He desires to protect and provide.
- Authority – He desires to serve and to lead.
- Insight – He desires to analyze and counsel.
- Relationship – He desires a shoulder-to-shoulder friendship.
- Sexuality – He desires sexual intimacy, expression and fulfillment.

Each letter of the acronyms has a chapter devoted to it that contains helpful Scriptural references along with "principles, techniques, and common sense to help husbands and wives learn how to practice the Love and Respect message on a daily basis". Each chapter concludes with a list of helpful suggestions designed to give husbands and wives concrete action steps that will keep them off the Crazy Cycle and on the Energizing Cycle.

3. The Rewarded Cycle

Whether a couple has a struggling marriage or a strong one, spouses who read and apply the material in the preceding chapters will almost instantly notice a positive change in their marriage. However, this doesn't mean that applying these suggestions are easy. Much of what Eggerichs says is quite challenging and requires thinking and acting in ways people are not used to doing. Especially in today's Feminist soaked culture, women will find this section more challenging (and possibly even revolting) than men will.

In our culture, men are regularly instructed to love their wives unconditionally, so this is not big news. But the flipside of the message, that a wife is to respect her husband unconditionally, is quite rare and even revolutionary to conventional norms. While acknowledging that 'unconditional respect' sounds 'like an oxymoron' to some women, Eggerichs stands firmly on Scripture to remind women that God commands them to fulfill their husbands deepest relational need – unconditional respect.

Knowing how counter-cultural these assertions sound, Eggerichs addresses some of the reservations wives generally have about respecting their husbands unconditionally as he details the specifics of the respect women are to give to their husbands. He writes,

> "respect does something to the soul of a man"

How true, and it is a pity that society has long forgotten the souls of men.

A wife's unconditional respect motivates and energizes a husband's love in ways she can scarcely comprehend. If women understood this, and accepted it, I believe marriages would be instantly transformed overnight! Eggerichs sums it up like this.

> "His [the husband's] love blesses her [the wife], regardless of her respect; her respect blesses him, regardless of his love."

In this section, Eggerichs shifts the focus away from the earthly benefits that may result from applying love and respect, looking more closely at the heavenly reality. The Rewarded Cycle elevates marriage beyond itself to the very courts of heaven where it finds its source. As Eggerichs puts it,

> "Ultimately, all husbands and wives should be practicing Love and Respect principles first and foremost out of obedience toward Christ…"
> "In the ultimate sense, your marriage has nothing to do with your spouse. It has everything to do with your relationship to Jesus Christ."
> "In marriage, everything you do counts, even if your spouse ignores you!"

Even in the case where a wife's best efforts to respect her husband, or a husband's best efforts to love his wife, result in no discernible change, God promises to reward their faithfulness. Eggerich's book effectively reminds spouses how,

> "to develop the ability to give [one another] what he or she needs most, as you bring your faith in Christ directly into your acts of Love and Respect."

[Eds. note: As a married man, I can attest to the truth of these statements.]

A Response to Stephanie's Comments

Jack · 19 December 2017 · Archived copy · Original

Stephanie, thank you for your candid comments.

When I composed that last post, "Book Review: The Love a Wife Desires, the Respect a Husband Needs (5 stars)" (December 18, 2017), I wrote the introduction, Respect is Paramount!, to put an emphasis on how much men need and value respect. From there, I introduce Eggerichs' book as a source of information on this topic. I believe that this book has much to offer both men and women who are sincerely seeking to improve their marriage or LTR.

I respect Dalrock very much, and I have read enough of his posts to know his stance towards Complementarianism. So based on your comments, I am now reconsidering the book in light of Complementarianism. I did not have this question in my mind while I was reading it, and I suppose I would have to read the book again with a critical mind to see if Eggerichs offers any sympathies for the heretical, Feminist aspects of Complementarianism.

BTW, I searched for the authors name, "Eggerichs", on Dalrock's site, and nothing came up, so I assume he has not addressed this particular book in the past.

When I read this book, I saw that Eggerichs was giving the goad to BOTH men and women to act in a more mature, altruistic manner in marriage, and to focus on changing one's own behavior, rather than relying on the other person to change, which I believe is pretty solid advice (for couples who are sincerely seeking improvement). I found his message was particularly hard on women, since the whole idea of 'unconditionally offering a man the respect he needs' (and not making him work to 'deserve' it first) is a message that has been clouded and demonized by Feminist philosophy. This, I feel, was the main message of the book – that wives respecting their husbands is just as important as husbands loving their wives, and Eggerichs makes the point that it is particularly MORE important for wives to respect their husbands, if they wish to see a transformation in their relationship – and I wholeheartedly agree with this main point. To me, this further emphasizes how important it is for men to be extremely critical in their choice of a wife, and for women to take their role as a wife very seriously. To my knowledge (and I am fairly well read), this point was totally absent from Christian literature before Eggerichs, and it is sorely needed to make marriages work. So I applaud Eggerichs for bringing this truth to public attention.

Now, there is one caveat. I would say that Eggerichs' underlying assumption is that BOTH partners are fully invested in improving the relationship, and are simply ignorant of the impact that love and respect can have on the relationship. He assumes that the partners are NOT just using the marriage as a vehicle to achieve their own selfish ends (although he does discuss situations where this is the case). This is an important assumption to take note of when estimating the value of the advice therein. I have to admit, posing this contingency that BOTH partners have a good will towards the marital relationship, and are willing to work at it, is a rather special case in American society, as it is conspicuously removed from recognizing the corruption of the Social/Sexual/Marriage market place, and the debasement of marriage that a lot of people are now experiencing. This is perhaps the greatest weakness of the book.

Eggerichs wrote another book which I read, called "The Language of Love and Respect", and Chapter 4 in this book was about "Can you trust your spouse's goodwill?" Here, Eggerich entertains the more pressing issue in society at large, that some people are, in fact, NOT putting their whole heart into their marriage. Eggerich correctly postulates that 'God will bless and reward the faithful', in spite of any faithlessness on behalf of his/her partner. However, I think this advice would be considered pie-in-the-sky by most, as it is not enough to satisfy anyone who is struggling through a case of adultery or divorce. So again, I feel this book is of most value to those good-willed spouses who cherish their marriage and want to make it better.

Honestly, I doubt that Eggerich will ever espouse a total Red Pill submersion, so personally, I will just take the useful truths out of the book (and there are many), and be content with that bit of progress in my own understanding. For my readers, I hope that my review will offer enough information for them to decide whether the book would be helpful to them or not. I am speaking from my own opinion of the book, and I am not getting any kickbacks from the publisher. (Although that would be nice.)

I do know that feminists HATE Eggerichs' books, and I have personally seen a feminist, in an angry rant, rip up a copy of "Love and Respect" before my very eyes. That is enough proof for me that Eggerichs is telling the unpleasant, anti-feminist truths that are contained in Ephesians 5:33 and elsewhere in the Bible. But I acknowledge that even though this book has confirmed many of my beliefs concerning respect and successful relational dynamics, and has given me the words to discuss such things with others, perhaps I am only suffering from a confirmation bias, and so my analysis of the book will remain unsatisfying for many of my readers.

I'll let readers know, I have been living overseas in a very traditional, Patriarchal society since 2004 (and very happily, I might add), so I admit I am probably out of touch with the current scene in the U.S. However, it is my hope that my readers will appreciate my writings as an objective viewpoint that is hard-won, and far removed, from Feminist culture and influence. In my blogging endeavors so far, I have written mainly about my own challenges and enlightenments, and I do believe I have a very unique perspective that would prove to be insightful for others. Even so, I am still learning about what I could write from my own wealth of knowledge, perspectives and experiences that would be most beneficial (and engagingly entertaining) for readers in the U.S. and worldwide. Any sincere suggestions for topics or improvements are welcome.

One final note, I know Dalrock has a beef with Evangelicals too. I myself am an evangelical, a prize student schooled in a mid-western, bible-thumping, Southern Baptist Church (although I would not identify myself as a Southern Baptist at present). But from what I have read on Dalrock, the Manosphere at wide, and the news, I have learned that there have been several problems with Evangelical doctrine that have come to light recently, including things like 'Churchianity", 'Complementarianism', 'Prosperity Preaching', and others. Dalrock, Zippy Catholic, Donal Graeme, and other Christian Red Pill blogs have helped me see how modern Christian doctrine has been undermined and adulterated (for some time) by the Feminist culture at large. I am deeply grateful for that, and I regret not having found the Red Pill blogging sphere any sooner. I recognize that I, like many others on the sphere, am in a continual process of uncovering the Truth, and learning how to properly apply it; hence, my enthusiasm for blogging and The Red Pill.

The Round Table of the Manosphere

Jack · 24 December 2017 · Archived copy · Original

In his latest post, Sometimes the Customer is Wrong (December 20, 2017), Cane Caldo described the fractured and isolated state of the male community, and lamented,

> "Immigration, minority criminality, and white male apathy really are serious troubles right now. They are problems which are too big to be ignored in the meantime, and we each need to do our best to combat them as we can."

Cane also points out that exclusion and isolation are the most prevalent weaknesses in male fellowship. However, exclusion is an even greater deterrent to women, if and when implemented. He describes this as follows.

> "As far as I can tell there is really only one acceptable way to punish women, and that is exclusion. All mankind are social creatures and will suffer from exclusion, but because women are more sociable and more dependent they will more keenly suffer when left out. This makes exclusion more deterring, and thus more instructive, for women."

Since social exclusion, for women, is a more powerful deterrent than it is for men, it follows that this can be a point of strength for men. For example, men can be quite comfortable in isolation, especially while working, or practicing a hobby, for instance. Thus, the 'walking away' part is what makes Dread Game a very effective tool in managing the drama created by a frantic female. But the problem is, humans naturally prefer the immediate comforts of spiritual adultery over the suffering of atonement, and women are obviously much weaker to this temptation than men are. So with some women, as soon as you walk away, she will seek out an orbiter to take up the slack in her Moxie, and there are ten back-up men waiting to swoop in to 'rescue' her from your 'coldness', 'neglect', and 'abuse'. To this, Cane responded,

> "Exactly. To even begin to address it, we must decide around what to have solidarity."

I propose that the solidarity should be based on the shared purposes of us men, and the goals we set to achieve those purposes. So here I suggest a few shared purposes upon which to build solidarity. [Eds. note: I may add to this list, on the occasion of further developments.]

Men's Shared Purposes

Our shared purposes are yet to be clearly defined. But I think it would be beneficial if we would all agree on the following purposes.

1. The Manosphere is to spread the Red Pill Word, and to instruct and encourage other men in building Red Pill frame of consciousness, and developing Game.
2. Men should accept other men, and offer them the basic forms of respect that comprise the unspoken code of honor among men. (There is more on this point, further down this post.)
3. Specifically, men should give other men a decent respect by not being an orbiter to their wives or girlfriends. Other men should zero out orbiters for being traitors, and encourage those women involved to either remain true to the man they have chosen, or else, end the relationship clearly and decisively before hitting the marketplace.
4. More specifically, men need to practice more solidarity by cooperating towards the enforcement of some much needed discipline, when appropriate. In other words, stop or deter the White Knighting expressed through the indulgence of women on the hamster wheel, or while they are having a pity party. Let women seek other women for mutual commiseration. (BTW, men should never seek a woman for emotional support, unless you want to get canned. Hope you already know this.)

5. Men should never favor, date, or screw hard-core feminists. Instead, give them a social drought which might make them think twice about their life-decisions. (See Roosh for more on this point.)

Readers please discuss and suggest/add addendums.

Roadblocks to Solidarity

So far, at least three roadblocks have come up (that I have seen) that will need to be addressed before men can achieve a critical mass in solidarity. [Eds. note: I may add to this list, on the occasion of further developments.]

1. Logistics
2. Infighting
3. The Need for Acceptance

These will be briefly described here.

1. Logistics

Cane ended his post by reinforcing the exigency of man-to-man fellowship.

> "But none of [these problems] will be resolved–or even meaningfully combated–unless and until men band together into significant, genuine, geographical, and exclusive communities."

This statement received a lot of discussion in the comment section. Commenter djz242013 said,

> "I think most of what prevents this is logistics. People live spread apart and drive everywhere. Two hour commutes are not uncommon. (In cities,) The people you live near are extremely unlikely to share any significant beliefs with you if you are at all Traditional. Physical closeness is a necessary prerequisite for real community forming in my experience. (To wit, the only "real" community capable of exclusion that I've ever been a part of was in college, with the roommates I lived with and saw every day.) People you see at church often drive 30+ minutes, and maybe from the opposite direction. The barriers to community are structural. And we're all trained from birth to be lazy."

The fact that Red Pill men are few and far between is a great challenge to our strength at this moment in history, but it is important enough to deserve our concentrated effort in developing our social lives to include this. So I urge my readers to identify any Red Pilled men who live within their vicinity, and to make an effort to meet with them at least once a week.

> Hebrews 10:24-25 [Emphasis mine.]
> "[24] And let us consider one another in order to stir up love and good works, [25] not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together, as is the manner of some, but exhorting one another, and so much the more as you see the Day approaching."

2. Infighting

I don't know how many times I have seen a good comment thread devolve into petty insults and infighting. Most of the bickering is about things as stupid as definitions and personal values/viewpoints, and those involved in these skirmishes seem to be easily piqued. On this topic, I want to share with my readers something I have learned, which I hope will be insightful and inspiring.

For the past three years, I have had many international students from Indonesia, which is predominantly a Muslim culture. During this time, while I was exposed to Muslim culture, I learned that it is not wise to judge any man according to, or with prejudice against, his religious beliefs.

Refraining from being critical of another's faith is not done merely to acquiesce to political sympathies or even to maintain the peace (although it does), but rather, it is because the act of arguing against, and challenging those religious beliefs through a logical argument will rarely, if ever, entice a man to agree with you, convert, or change his ways. This is because those beliefs of faith run to the core of the man's identity, and are not to be trifled with, out of respect to the man's free will. Thus, such arguments are foolish and futile, simply because one's faith is an issue of the heart, and NOT the head/rationale.

But in addition to the vanity of not being able to convince the man to your liking within an argument, it is also quite certain that you will offend the man, foolishly reveal your ignorance about his beliefs, and possibly lose any foundation of rapport that you might have formed with him. We do not wish to overtly offend any man, but to build rapport with him, "that I might win some to the gospel of Christ" (see 1st Corinthians 9:19-23).

The takeaway point here is that mutual humility and a shared purpose are the keys to any successful interaction, and that logical arguments over specific beliefs are likely to be divisive.

In view of my example, Islamic culture is very much concerned with maintaining a sense of honor, so I make a point to keep my interactions with them formal, yet sincere and warmhearted. For example, whenever one of them does poorly on an exam, I shake my head and say, "Ahhh… My son! You need to work harder!" They take this supposed 'sonship' to be an honor, and at the same time, they find it hilarious.

Continuing on with the story, last year, I returned to my own country, to my own church (Evangelical Protestantism), and what did I find? Men doing the exact same foolish things I learned not to do with my Muslim students – arguing, judging, and challenging each others beliefs, without the generosity of acceptance – not agreement, mind you, which is rarely achieved, but mere acceptance – consideration and respect for the heart of the man himself, regardless of his beliefs.

> 2nd Corinthians 10:4-5 [Emphasis mine.]
> "[4] For the weapons of our warfare are not carnal but mighty in God for pulling down strongholds, [5] casting down arguments and every high thing that exalts itself against the knowledge of God, bringing every thought into captivity to the obedience of Christ"

Acceptance does wonders for casting down frustrating arguments.

3. The Need for Acceptance

When I come to the Manosphere, I come to meet other men to discuss the important issues of the day. These men are MGTOW's, PUA's, agnostics, atheists, 'born again' Baptists, Calvinists, Catholics, Mormons, Orthodoxians, Unitarians… and I round out the mix with my imperialistic, self righteous evangelical flair – quite a motley crew! But I choose not to consider these differences to be of considerable import. I check my pride with my password, and log into the sphere penitently. I am willing to be corrected as much as I am willing to correct others.

Likewise, I don't show up empty handed, but I bring a treasure from my inner chamber, which I have painstakingly prepared for the presentation – a sacrificial offering of my time, will, and energies. I recognize that other bloggers and commenters are also doing the same, and I accept (but maybe not always agree to) their input for the honest and thoughtful rejoinders that they are.

I respect each man for what he brings to the table, whether small or great, and for his purpose, purity of reason, and semblance of honorable conduct. I also respect other men in general, because that is what men need to be recognized as men. I respect others because I respect myself, and this should also signal that fact, and thereby attract respect from others. As a principle, I respect each man because he is made in the image of God, and I believe in faith, that God will do miraculous things in our society, and our individual lives, through the sharing of ideas and our testimonies, and through our collective strength.

[Eds. note: I hope that my readers will not mistake these sentiments to be merely vain hopes or virtue posturing, but that you'll see the intrinsic value and benefits of maintaining these attitudes when interacting with other men.]

Conclusions

Within the Manosphere, we men meet on terms of the intellect, and the will, for the sake of common interests and purposes, and we find a fulfillment of the heart and soul through our interactions.

God, in his infinite and ironic wisdom, became a baby to reveal himself to mankind.

> 1st Corinthians 1:21
> For since, in the wisdom of God, the world through wisdom did not know God, it pleased God through the foolishness of the message preached to save those who believe.

Similarly, God chose the Pick Up Artist (PUA) to reveal the bitterly glorious Red Pill truths to humanity – those PUA's who were considered to be arrogant, amoral, cad pricks in the eyes of men, but who were humbly seeking and knocking on the door of Truth in the eyes of God.

> 1st Corinthians 1:27-31
> [27] But God has chosen the foolish things of the world to put to shame the wise, and God has chosen the weak things of the world to put to shame the things which are mighty; [28] and the base things of the world and the things which are despised God has chosen, and the things which are not, to bring to nothing the things that are, [29] that no flesh should glory in His presence. [30] But of Him you are in Christ Jesus, who became for us wisdom from God—and righteousness and sanctification and redemption— [31] that, as it is written, "He who glories, let him glory in the Lord."

In the same manner, God shall use this motley assortment of Red Pilled Cads and Dads in the Manosphere, to shape a new concept of human ontology to be implemented as future societal norms.

Take it as inspiration, if nothing more.

A Girl Becomes a Lady

Jack · 26 December 2017 · Archived copy · Original

The Story

Over the Christmas holiday weekend, my wife and I went biking through a park near a reservoir. We met a divorced woman who was riding the trail with her 11 year old daughter. Several times, we stopped for a break and made small talk. On the way, the divorcee mentioned to me that her daughter was really bossy and demanding. I was surprised to hear that, because the girl seemed shy and reserved.

Later on, the daughter said to her mother, 'I'm thirsty! Give me that water!' Then her mother started rummaging through her bag, searching for the water bottle. But before she could produce the water, I confronted her daughter, saying,

'When you talk to your mother, you should say, 'May I have some water, please?"

The girl responded with a casual 'OK…'.

Then I told her, 'Well… let's hear you say it!'

She looked at me quizzically, and then looked at her mother. Her mother jumped on, saying,

'Yeah! Why can't you ask me politely for things?'

Then I said, 'Come on! Say it!'

So she said, 'Can I have some water?'

Then I said, 'No, say what I said.' Then I repeated the request slowly.

'May I have some water, please?'

The girl gulped, and then, in a contorted voice with an irregular rhythm, she said,

'May I have some water?'

To which I retorted, 'Please! Say please at the end. Now, say it again!'

After a couple more attempts and admonishments, she finally offered a formal request with an air of dignified humility. Her mother, beaming with a very satisfied smile, then gave her the bottle. As she took the bottle from her mother, I affirmed her by saying, with emphasis,

'Now*, you're a* lady! From now on, be a lady*, and your life will go more smoothly!*'

At that, she was both confused and exhilarated at the same time.

Further down the trail, the girl relapsed into her old habits a few times, and we had to correct her again. But after the second time, I didn't need to say a word, because her mother learned from my example how to discipline her daughter to have better manners.

By the time we reached the end of the trail, this new, young lady was expressing some enthusiasm about being a lady!

But later, in the parking lot, I overheard her mother expressing a negative sentiment of annoyance to my wife, by posing the question,

'*Why does [my daughter] want to be a lady?'

Her ignorance blew me away, but then after I caught my breath, I told her,

'If she does not become a well mannered lady, how could she land a good job, or attract a classy man to marry her? Not only that, just think of all the anger and hate she will receive from people!'

She sheepishly replied, 'Oh… yeah…'.

Later, upon reminiscing on this occasion, I realized, that's why she's divorced! No sense of dignity, no personal discipline, no humility, no sense of class… and she's probably a feminist sympathizer too!

Conclusions

Being a proper lady has nothing to do with social class. It has everything to do with expressing ones self-respect in an acceptable, reverent manner.

NOT being a lady will indicate that a woman is a leech on society, and she will attract all the wrong kinds of attention – anger, hate, lust, envy, prejudice…

But by being a lady, a girl tells the world that she is honored, loved, well bred, dignified, disciplined, and has humility and grace. She shows that she has something of value within herself to offer to others.

If you were the young girl, which one would you choose to be? The answer is quite obvious, and she knows it.

However, there is something that the girl doesn't yet know. Becoming a proper lady takes years of proper instruction, diligence, and practice, and to be done properly, it should be fostered from a young age. But if she is embracing and enjoying this process, then this doesn't present much difficulty. There is a large responsibility on her family, however, to create a nurturing and protective environment in which she can feel safe to enjoy being a lady. Here enters the 'father figure'… which, in the case described above, I suppose would be me.

The potential hazard is that it takes years of loving discipline and parental guidance to raise a model young person. But it only takes one bad influence or one wrong experience to destroy all that investment.

The construction of the World Trade Center required more than seven years, but it all came down in less than two hours.

The Moral of the Story

Mature, Christian, Red Pill men should be aware of the ways in which they could create a positive impact in the lives of the women and children whom they come into contact with on a daily basis. We should seek to build up, and not tear down. Our words and actions have an effect, no matter how much we might be aware of it.

A Study of Csíkszentmihályi Flow

Jack · 29 December 2017 · Archived copy · Original

This article is a (relatively) concise summary of the psychological phenomena of Flow, which I believe is immensely useful in dealing with the challenges of life.

[Eds. note: I have added some of my own conjectures to the theory, as indicated in blue font. I have considered publishing some of my own views on the subject, however I doubt that a scientific publisher would accept my contributions, since I do not have an academic foundation in psychology. If any of my readers have a clinical background in psychology or sociology, and wish to coauthor a publication using some of my ideas proposed below, then I trust that you will contact me through email.]

The following essay on Flow is broken down into the following sections.

1. A Description of Flow
2. Components of Flow
3. Conditions for Flow
4. An Analysis of the Conditions for Flow
5. Challenges to Staying in Flow
6. The Autotelic Personality
7. Group Flow, or Crowd Psychology (Mob Mentality)
8. Achieving a State of Flow
9. Conclusions

As a Christian studying the scientific theory of Flow, I have observed through my own experiences that the phenomena of Flow could be interpreted as an experience of worship or meditation. In my references to worship in this article, I wish to point out that I am making an inference to 'the act of offering worship to God through one's activities', and NOT the worship of the activity itself, nor the associated feelings. I also make references to the concept of eternity in this essay, and here, I define eternity holistically as 'the state of not being affected nor influenced by the passage of time', and NOT merely as being an infinite period of time, as many believe it to be.

1. A Description of Flow

In positive psychology, Flow, also colloquially referred to as 'being in the Zone', is the mental state of operation in which a person performing an activity is fully immersed in a feeling of energized focus, full involvement, and enjoyment of the process of performing the activity. In essence, Flow is characterized by a complete absorption in what one does, and a resulting loss in one's sense of space and time. Although the concept of Flow has existed for thousands of years under other forms of awareness, Prof. Mihály Csíkszentmihályi was the first to address the concept of Flow within the scientific arena in the late 20th century. Since then, his theories have been widely recognized across a variety of fields, with an especially large following in occupational therapy.

Flow shares many characteristics with hyperfocus. However, hyperfocus is not always described in a positive light. Hyperfocus 'captures' a person, causing them to appear disorganized and scatterbrained. People who start several projects, but complete few are likely suffering from hyperfocus. Other examples include spending 'too much' time playing video games, or getting side-tracked and pleasurably absorbed by one aspect of a task to the point of wasting time, leading to the detriment of the overall enterprise. Prof. Csíkszentmihályi considered how some addictions can form out of an unbalanced emphasis on getting the 'high' out of one's experiences. Flow, on the other hand, focuses on the positive aspects of one's engagement in an activity.

2. Components of Flow

Over a period of two decades in his early career as a psychologist, Prof. Mihály Csíkszentmihályi formulated the central components of the Flow experience, as listed below.

1. Intense and focused concentration on the present moment – [Challenge]
2. Merging of action and awareness – [Contact / Involvement]
3. A loss of reflective self-consciousness – [Worship]
4. A sense of personal control or agency over the situation or activity – [Skill]
5. A distortion of temporal experience, one's subjective experience of time is altered – viz. a transcendental experience – [Eternity]
6. An experience of the activity as intrinsically rewarding, also referred to as an autotelic experience – [Desire / Motivation]

These aspects can appear independently of each other, but only in combination do they constitute a so-called Flow experience.

3. Conditions for Flow

A Flow state can be entered while performing any activity, although it is most likely to occur when one is wholeheartedly performing a task or activity for intrinsic purposes. Passive activities like taking a bath or even watching TV usually don't elicit Flow experiences, as individuals have to actively exercise their will to enter a Flow state.

Flow theory postulates three conditions that have to be met to achieve a Flow state:

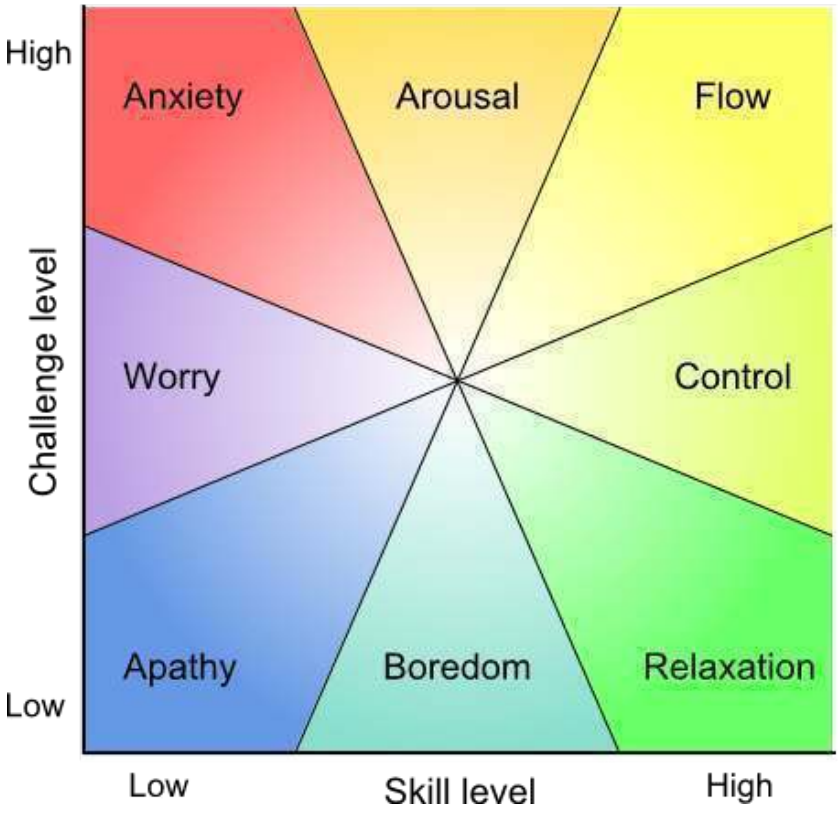
1. One must be involved in an activity with a clear set of goals and progress. This adds direction and structure to the task. [Contact and Cognition]
2. The task at hand must have clear and immediate feedback. This helps the person negotiate any changing demands and allows him or her to adjust his or her performance to maintain the Flow state. [Contact]
3. One must have a good balance between the perceived challenges of the task at hand and his or her own perceived skills. One must have confidence that he or she is capable to do the task at hand. [Cognition]

However, it was argued that the antecedent factors of Flow are interrelated, as a perceived balance between challenges and skills requires that one knows what he or she has to do (clear goals) and how successful he or she is in doing it (immediate feedback). Thus, a perceived fit of skills and task demands can be identified as the central precondition of Flow experiences.

[Eds. note: This is why it is very important for the success of a relationship that the two partners 'fit', in terms of personality, values, beliefs and love languages, as described by Gary Chapman.]

Schaffer (2013) proposed 7 Flow conditions:

1. Knowing what to do
2. Knowing how to do it
3. Knowing how well you are doing
4. Knowing where to go (if navigation is involved)
5. High perceived challenges
6. High perceived skills
7. Freedom from distractions



In 1997, Csíkszentmihályi published the graph above. [Eds. note: I like the color scheme of this diagram. The colors fit the specified moods, and it resembles the subtractive color wheel!] This graph depicts the relationship between the perceived challenges of a task and one's perceived skills. This graph illustrates one further aspect of Flow: it is more likely to occur when the activity at hand is a higher-than-average challenge (above the center point) and the individual has above-average skills (to the right of the center point). The center of this graph (where the sectors meet) represents one's average levels of challenge and skill across all activities an individual performs during his or her daily life. The further from the center an experience is, the greater the intensity of that state of being (whether it is Flow, anxiety, boredom, relaxation, etc.).

4. An Analysis of the Conditions for Flow

Csikszentmihályi's six components of Flow could be comprehensively categorized by their contribution to Flow, of which, all are necessary to achieve the Flow experience. Of these six, only one relates to challenge – intense and focused concentration on the present moment – and only one concerns skill – a sense of personal control or agency over the situation or activity. A third, the merging of action and awareness, could be characterized by being physically and cognitively involved in the activity, and depends on the environmental conditions surrounding the experience. I will introduce the term 'Contact' to describe this quality. Perhaps the loss of self-consciousness may be somewhat dependent on, or attributable to the nature of the Contact. In such a case, the individuals' physical comfort, safety and social situation would also affect Flow.

The three conditions for Flow described in the literature could also be classified as either Contact or Cognition. The seven Flow conditions proposed by Schaeffer mainly concern the conscious Cognition of one's involvement in the task or situation, thus concerning Contact, with only number 7 (freedom from distraction) being a situationally enabling factor that also depends somewhat on the powers of concentration held by any particular individual. The variations and apparent inconsistencies found in other studies may also be related to the degrees of motivation held by the respective subjects.

The remaining three components of flow not yet discussed – a loss of reflective self-consciousness, distortion of temporal experience, and the intrinsic reward, viz. the Autotelic experience – are invariably linked to passion/desire/motivation.

Although the elements of skill and challenge have been thoroughly examined by Csikszentmihályi, the impact of Motivation has not been satisfactorily taken into account. It may be gathered that the element of intrinsic Motivation is weighty. Although Motivation is not specifically mentioned in the literature, it is also assumed to be a central element in Flow. The word Desire may be preferred to describe a specific type of Motivation, in the case where an intrinsic reward is imminent, because the word Desire is more closely attuned to intrinsic processes, whereas a Motivation could include intrinsic, as well as external rewards. Desire also captures or explains the essential characteristics of the Autotelic personality, including curiosity, persistence, low self-centeredness, and a high rate of performing activities for intrinsic reasons only.

Question to consider: Not all motivations are intrinsic desires! But does your motivation need to be intrinsic in order for you to achieve a state of Flow?

It might also be postulated that (at least in some cases) Flow is merely the exhilarating and transcendental "high" that one experiences while seeing one's efforts produce the fruit of one's desires, such that the process itself becomes an enjoyable pastime. [Eds. note: To answer this question, I would suggest that a study of neural chemistry (dopamine, etc.) of subjects experiencing Flow should be conducted to this end.]

Instead of considering the conditions for Flow to occur as being either vitally present or absent, it might be better to consider the varying degrees to which each of these Components are present in a given situation, such that when a certain combination of superposed Components are present, then Flow results. The specific combination and degree required to produce Flow would, of course, be unique for each individual. In other words, the Conditions for Flow must necessarily contain or enable essential Components of Flow, or otherwise, Flow could not precipitate.

Moreover, these Components and Conditions, with their various elements, are catalogued in Table 1. Note that the elements of 'Worship' and 'Eternity', delineated before, are subcategorized as Components of Passion/Desire/Motivation.

Table 1: A proposed component inventory for the state of Flow.

Aspect of Flow	Component/Characteristic	Condition
Skill	Sense of control*	Mastery of task
Challenge	Intense, focused concentration	Ability; Confidence, Persistence vs. difficulty
Contact Involvement	Merging of action and awareness	Clear, immediate feedback Power of negotiation or adjustment
Cognition	Hope of achievement or gain Realization of a desire Making an impact	Clear, concrete, achievable goals/milestones Perception of the challenges and demands of the task vs. perception of one's knowledge, skills and abilities
Passion Desire Motivation	Loss of reflective self-consciousness (Worship) Transcendental, eternal experience (timelessness) The Autotelic experience (intrinsically rewarding)	Intrinsic Autonomy Competence Relatedness Self-esteem Pleasure (Maslow's) Self-Actualization	Extrinsic Popularity Power Love Money Luxury, Affluence Security

5. Challenges to Staying In Flow

Several challenges that one might encounter in achieving a state of Flow have been discussed in literature. One major objective challenge is that the perceived balance between Challenges and Skills, which is supposed to be the central precondition of a Flow experience, is a highly specialized condition. Individuals with a low average level of Skills and a high average level of Challenges (or the other way round) do not necessarily experience a fit between Skills and Challenges. However, contrary to Flow theory, one study found that low Challenge situations which were surpassed by Skill, were associated with enjoyment, relaxation, and happiness, and not necessarily boredom. Although this does not exactly agree with the tenets of the theory, it does not in any way invalidate nor subtract from it either.

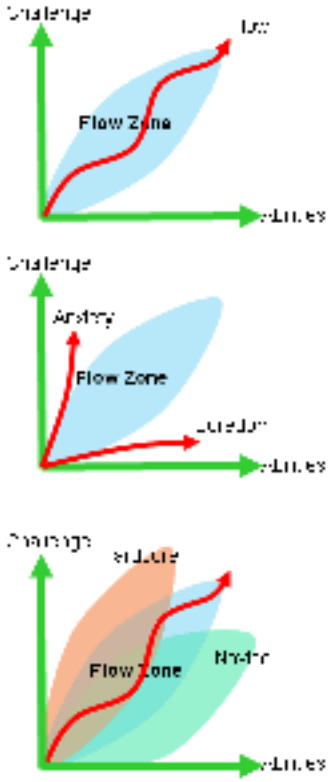
Some of the subjective challenges to staying in Flow include states of apathy, boredom, and anxiety. Being in a state of apathy is characterized when Challenges are low and one's Skill level is low, thereby producing a general lack of interest in the task at hand. Boredom is a slightly different state, in that it occurs when Challenges are low, but one's Skill level exceeds those Challenges, causing one to seek higher Challenges. At the other extreme, doubts and fears arise when the Challenge level is moderately above one's Skill level, leading one to worry over the outcome of the endeavor. Lastly, a state of anxiety occurs when Challenges are so high that they exceed one's perceived Skill level, thereby causing one great uneasiness and distress. These deviations from Flow are shown in the three illustrations below.

In general, these states differ from being in a state of Flow, in that Flow occurs when the Challenges match one's Skill level. However, when this condition is met, then one can continually accept gradual increases in the Challenge level, and slowly hone one's Skills (abilities), and thereby move upwards through the Flow Zone, as shown in the illustrations below.



6. The Autotelic Personality

Csíkszentmihályi hypothesized that people with several very specific personality traits may be better able to achieve Flow more often than the average person. These personality traits include curiosity, persistence, low self-centeredness, and a high rate of performing activities for intrinsic reasons only. People with most of these personality traits are said to have an Autotelic personality.

Up to now, there is not much research on the Autotelic personality, but results of the few studies that have been conducted suggest that indeed some people are more prone to experience Flow than others. One researcher (Abuhamdeh, 2000) found that people with an Autotelic personality have a greater preference for "high-action-opportunity, high-skills situations that stimulate them and encourage growth" compared to those without an Autotelic personality. It is in such high-challenge, high-skills situations that people are most likely to enter the Flow state.

Experimental evidence shows that a balance between skills of the individual and demands of the task (compared to boredom and overload) only elicits Flow experiences in individuals characterized by an internal locus of control or a habitual action orientation (the application of Skill). Several correlational studies found that an individuals need for achievement (classified as Motivation) is a personal characteristic that fosters Flow experiences.

 [Eds. note: Could the need for control towards achieving a state of Flow be a primary Motivation for certain people popularly deemed to be 'control freaks'? Secondly, is there any correlation between having an Autotelic personality, and being a 'control freak'?]

7. Group Flow, or Crowd Psychology (Mob Mentality)

Csíkszentmihályi suggests several ways a group can work together so that each individual member achieves Flow. The characteristics of such a group include:

1. Creative spatial arrangements: Chairs, pin walls, charts, but no tables; thus individuals work while primarily standing and moving
2. Playground design: Charts for information inputs, flow charts, project summary, craziness (here also craziness has a place), safe place (here all may say what is otherwise only thought), result wall, open topics
3. Parallel, organized working conditions
4. The group focuses on specific targets
5. The advancement of projects already in existence (prototyping)
6. Increasing efficiency through visual methods of communicating goals
7. Using the differences among participants as opportunities, rather than allowing them to become an obstacle

Group Flow, when organized and regulated with specific goals and purposes, is known to be a powerhouse of productivity. (It's also the substance of "mob mentality" and riots.) If we take this one step further, I surmise that a balance could be struck between the individual, and Group Flow, such that Flow could be achieved in a love relationship. In fact, I suspect this is the implicit goal of married life, and also the strength and staying power of a good marriage.

8. Achieving a State of Flow

The path to mastery, success, and happiness, is achieved by staying recurrently in the Flow Channel, as depicted in the figure below. In other words, make sure that one's Challenge level is appropriately suited to one's Skill level.

From Flow: The Psychology of Optimal Experience
by Mihaly Csikszentmihalyi (page 74)

Changes in conditions leading to either achieving a state of Flow, or failing to achieve the same are discussed in the following arguments.

Case 1: A1 → A3

Urgency → Anxiety → Lose Hope To Reach Goal → Quit → Subliminal Avoidance

Question to consider: Could worry and anxiety be related to the fact that one has bitten off more than one can chew? If so, would a concerted effort towards revising one's schedule, reorganizing priorities, cutting back on commitments, and taking more time to rest, prove to be beneficial towards the enablement of Flow in other areas of one's life? Doing so should allow one to achieve more efficiency, mastery, and enjoyment in general.

Case 2: A3 → A4

By facing Challenges step by step, and in a timely manner, they are less likely to grow to the point of being urgent. (See study of Time Management.) Staying in a state of Flow can also be described as staying in the NOW (the present moment) at every moment. Whereas, dreaming about the goal, or worrying about the outcome, tends to draw one's awareness away from the present.

Postulate: Assuming that one experiences happiness while in Flow, it is possible to stay happy consistently by staying in Flow, and not obsessively focusing on the goal or the object of desire. On the other hand, failing to achieve a state of Flow produces unhappiness, e.g. feelings of discontent, and frustration.

Corrollary: Young people who grow up in single parent homes, or abusive relationships with family members, find it more difficult to achieve a state of Flow during the formative adolescent years (i.e. Challenge Level >> Skill Level). This might be used to explain why such individuals usually become depressed, hopeless, and adopt poor habits and self destructive lifestyles.

Case 3: A1 → A2

Insufficient Challenge → Relaxation → Lose Motivation → Falls out of Contact/Involvement → General Disinterest

Compare this series of 'Conditions' to the fabled example of The Tortoise and the Hare.

Question to consider: Could a lack of motivation or laziness be related to a state of relaxation, in which one's skill level far surpasses the challenges at hand? If so, then accepting a new challenge might prove to be rewarding in many aspects.

Case 4: A2 → A4

Increasing the Challenge Level will tend to bring one into a state of Flow, thereby enhancing both one's productivity and one's enjoyment of life.

9. Conclusions

In achieving Flow in one's own experience, I will offer the following postulates, such that one's mindset needs to be adjusted accordingly in the concrete pursuit thereof. [Eds. note: I could not find verification or proof of these assumptions in the literature, however, I did not find contradictions either.]

- The state of being in Flow is a process, rather than a goal.
- Flow is an eternal experience, i.e. it is independent of, and unaffected by the passage of time.
- Flow is a worshipful experience (to those who can recognize it as such).
- At times, action is perhaps more important than prayer.
- The path to mastery and success is dependent on staying in the present moment at every moment. In otherwords, one must focus on the urgency of the NOW.

> Ecclesiastes 10:10 (NIV)
> "If the ax is dull and its edge unsharpened, more strength is needed, but skill will bring success."

Notice that this verse does not say, "skill may bring success", but instead, "skill will bring success". In light of this verse, the phenomenon of Csíkszentmihályi Flow could be seen as the enabling link between a worshipful approach to living, and success and happiness.

Worship → Flow → Skill → Success

If a person were to study and become aware of how one might achieve Csíkszentmihályi Flow, then an attempt to achieve the experience of Flow could be used to enhance one's work, relationships with others, and I suspect it could even be used as a factor of attraction. So I urge my readers to study this and find out how you might do so.

In my own experiences, I have found that my studies moved from primarily being focused on the individual experience and the psychological foundations, to the habits, Skills and Challenges, to the realization of a Flow experience, and then finally to Group Flow.

Exposing the Truth to Others

Jack · 1 January 2018 · Archived copy · Original

This post examines the pros and cons of presenting unpleasant, factual truth to others who may very well be in a state of contented denial. A real world example is explored as a case study.

The D.C. Slut Hunt

Dalrock's latest post, Someday we'll laugh! (December 29, 2017) brought a sad story to our attention. There's this woman who had a long history of what appears to be amateur sex tourism. According to Dalrock, she kept a detailed account of her sexcapades on her blog for a few years. Then her blog dried up, and after a time, she reappeared, announcing her engagement. Not so surprisingly, her older, savage posts were deleted. An archive of her blog can be found here. (See Dalrock's post for more information.)

You might think her engagement is happy news at first glance – the 'start of a new beginning', and all that. But the guys on the 'sphere know better. Gaza offered one scintillating account of how he didn't want to be Red Pilled at first, but after a while, the evidence became too overwhelming. Likewise, a lot of them have slogged through the trenches of involuntary celibacy, frivorce, legal theft, sanctioned kidnapping, cuckoldry, and rejection. They've seen stuff like this before, and they know it doesn't go well for the guy.

The comments below Dalrock's post offer a psychoanalysis and details of the harrowing predictions. I'll paraphrase the gist of the most noteworthy ones here.

Some women, especially younger ones, really are confused and ignorant enough to not know what they're doing when they 'suddenly' find themselves in bed with a man. With feigned shock and gleeful surprise, they say, "But it just haaappened!" In other words, they know the theory of procreation, but they are ignorant of the social dynamics leading up to the funk, or the mechanics of how to 'insert cad A into slut B', and they use this ignorance as an indicator for innocent virtue. Manospherians know that this justification is only an indicator for the loss of innocent virtue. Such women are devoid of any volition of willpower that would be necessary to say 'NO!'

But most other women are fully aware of what they're doing, although they still might not be fully informed, or willing to face the consequences. These women do have the willpower to say "YES!' But because of their casual attitudes towards sexual relations, these women decisively choose to spread their legs wings and f*ck fly. They hamsterize their choices post hoc, and then try to pass it off 'respectably', or at least, 'justifiably', as a glorified process of 'finding ones self'. As Gaza pointed out, the overworn euphemism used to 'justify' women's behavior in this regard, is 'low self-esteem'.

Common consensus at Dalrock's place was that the woman in this story is most likely the latter. Wise RP guys know, that manner of prolific denial poured on the banality of careless carouseling cannot detract from the inherent, mindless contradiction that is evident. As David put it,

> "If riding the carousel, even with losers, is seen as a sacred path to marriage and a badge of honor, and plenty of women are working to support that narrative, then why did she feel the need to delete her blog posts?"

Perhaps she is 'repenting' from a 'low self-esteem'? Definitely (if you have XXX-ray RP vision to see through the opaque euphemisms), but that's hardly scratching the surface. Let's see if we can do any better.

Boxer buddy, pass me another beer. We're going into this a little deeper.

Feminine Introspection

Buckyinky and the guys brought up the discussion concerning women's abilities and habits of introspection, Dave II's comment summed it up well, and included the correct approach in boldface [emphasis mine].

> "…women suck at introspection. And I mean really suck. They can introspect for years and never get to a correct answer. For example, if traveling was needed to 'find yourself' then either all the people who never traveled in the past were chronically miserable, or [else] 'finding yourself' is not at all necessary for a person to have a satisfying life. I concluded the latter because human beings have choices and those choices we act on cause our experiences which then shape who we are. So you make yourself, rather than finding yourself. Simple. That took about 10 minutes to figure out, and it explains why I never have an urge to travel, as do most men that I know. Meanwhile, women are still 'looking for themselves'…"
> "…they really just wanted to spend more time on the carousel and the choice of language is just a red herring, which was quite effective in the pre-Red Pill days when betas 'were more abundant and none the wiser' (as they are still). Maybe that's the problem. They introspect not to discover the truth, but to justify what they want the truth to be. And when they can't, they simply find a way to make it seem ok, or pretend that it's not what they're up to, or not their fault for doing it."

All the hamsters in one wheel. Brilliantly put!

See, being able to achieve an honest, accurate and effective introspection is uniquely a Christian phenomena. Only the Holy Spirit of God can make a person fully aware of the horrors of one's sin. Most people can't stomach it, so they choose to continue on in the comforts of their ignorance. Knowing the dregs of our corruption enables us to know the depths of the grace of God that are made available to us through Christ's atonement. If we do not agree with God's assessment that we are inherently depraved, then God will be faithful to keep shoving our noses in our own sh*t. Oswald Chambers describes this well in his entry for December 28.

> "If we trust to our wits instead of to God, we produce consequences for which God will hold us responsible."
> "God holds us responsible every time we refuse to convert ourselves, our reason for refusing is willful obstinacy. Our natural life must not rule, God must rule in us."
> "The hindrance in our spiritual life is that we will not be continually converted, there are [wallowing wedges] of obstinacy where our pride spits at the throne of God and says — "I won't." We deify independence and willfulness and call them by the wrong name. What God looks on as obstinate weakness, we call strength. There are whole tracts of our lives which have not yet been brought into subjection, and it can only be done by this continuous conversion."

Chambers wrote these words exactly a hundred years ago! Yet, they still apply, and are even more relevant, today.

[Eds. note: If God does NOT give us the goad, then we do not belong to Him.]

So when men ask for a woman to do some serious introspection and 'grow up', what they are really asking, is for her to accept Christ and sort through her own sin – not an easy request, but one that is absolutely necessary if a woman is to have a solid marriage.

The Square Root of X^3(Sin I)

At the root of the problem, is the widespread, default choice of people to DEFY Biblical truth and wisdom in the selfish interests of convenience and pleasure, and formulate a new body of guiding principles (e.g. most _____ism's), which become the de facto god, 'Self'. This is succinctly captured in the following formula. Note that the "I" is central to the new godhead.

"Defy" + centralized "I" = "Deify"

[Eds. note: The word, 'deify', is from the viewpoint of the idolater.]

Another weighty issue lies in the counter influences, posed by _____ist society, that support the deification of the feral god, Self, and are diametrically opposed to the possibility of the redeeming suicide of self introspection. The nature of this influence has been sufficient enough to garner much talk around the Manosphere, which has been growing for some time, that Feminism is a cult religion. As Dalrock and Donal Graeme have elucidated in great detail, even organized religion (i.e Churchianity) is quietly acquiescing to the comfortable slide into depravity.

In this view, another recent post on Dalrock, If she has enough self-esteem she won't tingle for Harley McBadboy (December 7, 2017), received a comment from Earl which hints to an idea that is worthy of exploration.

> "I seriously wonder if the false religion of Revelation 18 is feminism."
> "Or some feminism-Islam hybrid. In any case [I am] reading a book about the people who worshiped Baal and had Jezebel running amok (which you can also find in the Bible with Elijah) …it seems things like child sacrifice (abortion), sexual immorality (same), and worshiping the rain (creation instead of the Creator) were the big things. Along with killing the prophets."

Seeing how feminist mantras and doctrines offer their own set of 'virtues', which displace the knowledge of Christ and prevent women (and men) from performing an effective introspection, then if we were to hone this to a fine point, we could say that Feminists are Satanists!

The Problem

Now back to the subject. What is the woman's main problem in this case study?

Obviously, this woman is not a Christian, so she can't get any clues from God. She doesn't have any conscientious, caring males, such as a father or brother, to watch out for her, and if she does, she has foolishly neglected their shepherding advice. Instead, she has chosen to listen to those smooth, sweet, lying voices that make her Feeelz into the moral good, instead of those voices of wisdom that push her to face the truth and take responsibility for her soul.

Many people, most pointedly her fiancée, desperately want to carry the faithful presumption that she is, or at least wants to be, an introspective and growing Christian, but the story of her life so far does not support this hope. In fact, she could be actively working fraud – doing and saying what is necessary in order to allow others to continue to believe this superficial falsehood, all the while hiding and cherishing the snarkness within, merely for her own benefits and conveniences. I proffer that this is closer to the trough, in answering the question of why she deleted her essentially female porn blog.

Lord Dalrock profusely labels this behavior as 'Denial'. Illimitable Men and Rollo call this 'Machiavellianism'. I call it 'Spiritual Fraud' – it's a charlatan, 'Self-god-idol deceptive fraud'. Unfortunately, this is the common denominator in our post modern society, no matter what you want to call it.

A Proposed Solution

I know not many Manospherians might think of it this way, but it would actually be an act of faith and agape love to make some effort to correct those in error, with kindness and patience. Red Pilled men need to take action in this respect. If we care about our society, then something has got to be done to demonstrate to women (who genuinely desire to marry) that they should be waiting and preparing themselves for a prince, and that it's a really bad strategy to simply kiss all the frogs in the hope that one of them will magically transform into a prince. [Thanks to Red Pill Latecomer for this analogy.] If we care about young couples like the one in question, perhaps it might be beneficial to speak a Word of the Red Pill Truth to them. Since I've been on WordPress, I've seen a lot of solid wisdom come out of Earl.

> "Is it bad to provide a man with information that might lead to him withdrawing from the engagement?"
> "The preacher doesn't state 'If anyone has any reason why these two should not marry, speak now or forever > hold your peace' for nothing."

Of course, there is always the chance that, by speaking up, we might just be 'throwing pearls of wisdom to swine', and thereby provoking them to 'turn and attack', according to the Biblical adage.

> Matthew 7:6 (NKJV)
> "Do not give what is holy to the dogs; nor cast your pearls before swine, lest they trample them under their feet, and turn and tear you in pieces."

But as the talk went on, these gracious, Christ-loving guys quickly reached a consensus to inform the future hubby of what kind of woman he is marrying. Boxer volunteered to be the bearer of bad news. [Eds. note: There's a man of faith and courage.]

Schadenfreudians, mind your manners!

The Game Plan

If we're really going to start digging up dirt, then we should not be ignorant of what we're doing. So let's talk about this with an informed, intelligent approach, and be confident of what we're doing. Those who mock an honest assessment of the wisdom of an endeavor are riding the Ship of Fools [music video courtesy of World Party].

I will speculate that there are seven possible outcomes to this situation. Outcomes 1, 2 and 3 (in blue font) happen if we hold our peace. Outcomes 4 to 7 (in red font) happen if we don't. These Outcomes are loosely described as follows. Of course, there may be variations of these themes, but the gist is essentially the same.

Outcome 1

No one says anything. They get married. He mans up, learns some Red Pill Game, and puts the goad on her to grow in faithfulness. His Dread Game 'love' touches her heart, and after a nightmarish first two years of marriage, she slowly accepts an introspective approach, and learns to be the ideal lover, wife and mother.

Roissy, Vox, stop laughing!

Outcome 2

No one says anything. They get married. He meets a burlesque stripper at his bachelors party and is converted to BDSM*. He conveys these emotions to his new wife. She likes the idea of being the one in control, and he voluntarily submits to domestic slavery. They join a BDSM community. They enjoy threesomes and group sex with their new BDSM friends. All goes relatively well, until she gets pregnant. A few fights ensue. A unilateral abortion comes in handy, and the party goes on. He gets a vasectomy, but she continues to get pregnant…

*Outcome 2 in the real case, may not involve BDSM, but may very well be characterized by the ungodly inversion of male-female roles, viz. she is the harridan, cat loving babushka, he is the wimpy, compromising, sex beggar.

Outcome 3

No one says anything. They get married. He relaxes into the comfortable routine of married life. She becomes bored and 'unhaaapy'. Starfish ensues. He works harder, putting in overtime and doing housework. She nebulously demands 'more'. He becomes 'nicer' in order to satisfy her demands. Starfish dries up. She meets alpha number 116, and catches the feeelz and the clam. She listens to her 'mother hen friends' about the unbeatable benefits of a frivorce. The common Manospherian trope of western marriage ensues.

<<<crickets chirping>>>

[Eds. note: Tight lips sink 'ships.]

Outcome 4

The messenger informs. She lies, denies and justifies. He sees the evidence, hurls and backs out. No marriage. She goes on the indignified AMALT rant, commiserates with 'mother hen friends', and becomes an avowed card carrying feminist . She crowdfunds a lawyer to sue the Manosphere, but to no avail, due to the evidence. She then turns to the liberal newspapers, finds sympathy and affirmation, but no satisfaction. He takes the Red Pill and suffers Purple Haze.

Dalrock gets promoted from lord to godfather.

Outcome 5

The messenger informs. She lies, denies and justifies, and so does he, with Blue Pill style 'forgiveness'. They get married. All goes well, except he can't stop thinking about her past. He has a creeping suspicion that slowly grows more deafening every day, and eventually becomes disgust. Her feeelz are frustrated. They drift apart. An affair by either party, or both, comes into view. She realizes that a divorce is the 'best solution for both' of them. The trope picks up here.

Roissy writes a scathing post about it, and quotes science.

Outcome 6

The messenger informs. She is angry at the messenger and fesses up with arrogance. He is shocked, blows chinks and backs out. He's forced to swallow a very bitter Red Pill. No marriage, ever.

It's anyone's guess from here on. She probably becomes a Churchian. He might go MGTOW, or move to Thailand and pimp it up – with benefits… Who knows?

Roosh produces another video eschewing sluteye.

<<<open arms from the Manosphere>>>

Outcome 7

The messenger informs. She fesses up with tears. He forgives her, and follows through with the marriage. He dabbles in Red Pill and uses his moral high ground to enforce his Married Game. Things go reasonably well.

Manospherians bow their heads and congratulate themselves for saving two souls. Feminists and Churchians chalk one up and gloat.

Life goes on.

Game Analysis

Now, let's explore a little game theory with the following points. The outcomes are listed in order of preference, with whether the couples agree (either to marry or not to marry) in parentheses.

1. Outcomes 1 (they agree) and 7 (they agree) [marriage in both cases], are the best possible scenarios.
2. Outcomes 4 (they agree) and 6 (they disagree) [NO marriage in both cases], are bad, but it could be worse.
3. Outcomes 3 (they agree) and 5 (they agree) [marriage in both cases] are horrifically bad.
4. Outcome 2 (they agree to marry) is a 50 Shades loving feminist's wet dream.
5. If the messenger cannot present some rock hard evidence, then the Manosphere will risk embarrassment and possibly harassment. Not to be a fearmonger, but wisdom requires its consideration.

As can be seen here, the red options dominate the top of the list, except for the case of Outcome 1. Outcome 1 is highly improbable, but it is at the top of the list, so it should be investigated. To this purpose, he should be contacted for a discussion, and then the answer to the decision whether to inform him would be made clear. There is the possibility that he already knows about her past, and he believes he has sufficient Red Pill awareness to know what he's dealing with. In this case, she may have scrubbed her blog clean for the obvious reasons of propriety, and not necessarily to hide her past from him. [I know you might be snickering at that possibility, but bear with me.] If so, then that's his choice, and his choice should be respected. Or, in other words,

> "Don't betray a Red Pill brother by talking sh*t about his woman (even if it's true)."

Even in the case where he is up to RP snuff, but does NOT know all the facts about her past, it might still be better NOT to inform him, because doing so opens the possibility of only one equal outcome, and three lesser outcomes. Knowing their personal characteristics would help make this call.

However, if he proves to be true Blue hue, no clue, through and through, then informing him is the next best option. Going back to the list of preferred outcomes, we see that if the two contenders are to be informed, they will be caught in a Prisoners Game dilemma. [Note that the point values in the present problem are skewed from what is shown in the link.]

This entails that, by being informed, the couple has a 50% chance of NOT sticking to the landing, and only a 25% of having an acceptable marriage. [That is, according to the strict analysis. Their individual temperaments may shift this estimate.]

Looks grim for marriage peddlers.

Conclusions

The analysis confirms most of what we already knew to begin with, but it also adds several details.

In all of these instances, the Trump card is whether she will be honest with him about her past. Her honesty leads to positive Outcomes 6 and 7. Her dishonesty ruins the show. She is calling the shots. He is basically on the receiving end, giving her either a thumbs up, or thumbs down. So, whether they stay together (all Outcomes except 4 and 6) depends on his agreement with her, regardless of the Truth.

Whether they both actually come to know the Truth depends mostly on HER reaction to the Truth. If she is willing to fess up (Outcomes 6 and 7), then there is a chance for a new beginning for both. If she does so with authentic humility and sincere repentance, then she might even have the chance to be married, in spite of her sins (Outcome 7).

If they remain ignorant (Outcomes 2 and 3), then nothing good will result from it. [Eds. note: Anyone who believes Outcome 2 is inherently satisfying is a schadenfreudian, and that's a generously kind assessment.]

In the case where her heart is dead set against waking up (Outcomes 4 and 5), then it is impossible that a concerted effort to bring awareness of her past to her fiancée is going to bring any positive developments towards marriage. However, it would destroy whatever false notions she has about marriage, which might not be a bad thing.

Some Outcomes (3, 4, 5 and 6) will throw him into a crisis of belief tailspin, which might be a good thing for him, depending on his faith and temperament.

Any positive outcome (1 or 7) is going to require the grace of God (as described in the previous section on Introspection), as well as the good willed effort of everyone involved, in order to grant this couple a deeper revelation of their problems, and motivate them to improve themselves. What are the odds of that happening?

At the very least, a spotlight would allow them both to reassess their decision to marry in the light of the Red Pill Truth. Even if they continue wearing blinders (i.e. he remains in denial and she continues with her fraud), they will still have a compass to point them in the Right direction. Whether they use it in the future is their decision.

To spill the Pill, or not to spill the Pill… that is the sequestion!

Taking the Red Pill and Discovering the Manosphere

Warning: This section has sexually explicit content that is NSFW.

Back in 2004-2006, I subscribed to an early PUA's newsletter ('Double Your Dating' with Eben Pagan, AKA David DeAngelo). I thought his name, Pagan, was hilariously fitting, and rich in significance. I didn't take it very seriously, but as bawdy, yet insightful humor. However, I realized that there were some things about life and relationships that I did not understand, but I really needed to. I also recognized on a deeper level that Pagan and other PUA's were hitting on something that was considered very taboo and esoteric, according to the social standards at that time. Of course, this information eventually evolved into Red Pill awareness, which is now rather well known around the Manosphere. It is also now well known, that the PUA community, the Manosphere, and eventually MGTOW, were all reactions to the fact that Feministic influences retained control over certain key aspects of RP information as being taboo at that time. But ever since the pussy cat was let out of the bag, thanks to the internet, RP awareness went from being an unspoken taboo, to what is now labeled as 'toxic'. The word 'toxic' is an expression of the Feminist's fear of losing control over the narrative. Most normal men don't consider RP Truth to be toxic.

In 2005, the clear connection between Feminism and the sex drought for 80% of men was relatively unknown. As a diligent Christian who voluntarily accepted celibacy until marriage, I was one of the 80%. But after I got married in early 2006, I gradually forgot about the beginnings of what we would now call RP awareness.

Then in 2009, during a time when my now ex-wife was creating a lot of trouble, I started blogging. Writing helped me sort things out and keep my mind straight. The Manosphere was still in its formative stage at that time, and I was yet unaware of it.

In late 2014, some time after my ex left me, I found some of Angel Donovan's videos on YouTube, and subscribed to his podcast, Dating Skills Review. Donovan's show interviewed one person a week, so after about a year, I became familiar with several noteworthy personalities, including Robert Greene ('The 48 Laws of Power'), Mark Manson ('The New Man'), Dr. Robert Glover ('No more Mr. Nice Guy'), and Susan Walsh ('Hooking up Smart'). I think that was the beginning of what I would later call my Red Pill journey. It made a lot of sense to me, in regard to my exes' bad behavior, but I still wasn't fully satisfied with what I was learning.

One major impression I got out of Donovan's podcasts was the slow morphing transition of his perspective over time. He started out as a PUA, but then after a few years of experience and getting his N count into the 200+ range, he realized that the key to success, not only with women, but with most everything in life, was not merely in reciting witty pick-up lines and acting confidently, but in genuinely making himself a better man. This last point really resonated with my understanding of both Christianity and masculinity, and I started to wonder if there might be some overlapping truths between following Christ and learning Game. I also suspected that my ignorance in this respect could explain the failure of my marriage. So my interest in the subject deepened into a more serious consideration.

Meanwhile, my divorce was having its' effects on me. I had too many women on my plate. They always came on to me, texting me nude photos, asking for my opinion of them, and then demurely inviting me over. I was laying 7's, 8's and 9's regularly, and occasionally, these relationships would overlap long enough to form a soft harem. Some of them actually told me that another one of these women had actually recommended me to them. I couldn't refuse the opportunities. My divorce had left me so horny and desperate at my peak SMV. I wanted it so bad, and it was just too easy.

Now a word about those women. After 10 to 15 minutes of hardcore pounding, many of them would laugh very giddily with a strange mixture of glee and rage, like they were teetering on the brink of madness. And it wasn't uncommon for my paramours to cum more than half a dozen times in one fit of passion lasting 20 to 30 minutes. Also, my ex was never this hot in bed. I was enjoying it waaay too much, and I wondered how I would ever get free from this addictive sin. All I knew is that I had somehow been drafted to service Nymphaphrodite's covenant of worshipping the Tingle god, and it was overwhelmingly like Almost AWALT. Only a very small number of these women (I'd say about 3 out of 10 at best) could convince me that they had genuine feelings for me. The grand majority were branch swinging on the carousel.

I know it's a surprise to read about harems, orgasms and insanity in a blog statistics report. My point here is to say that my experiences with women at that time corresponded with what those PUA's were saying, leading me to believe that they were really conveying the Truth about women. Coming from a conservative, Churchian background, I would have never believed it otherwise.

As I listened to more of Donovan's podcasts over time, I gradually gained more exposure to the Reddening Pill, and I came across the door of the rabbit hole. I looked up some of the people he interviewed for more information, and eventually came across Alpha Game, Heartiste, Illimitable Men, and Zippy Catholic in early 2017. These guys hit the nail on the head for me, in terms of defining the real truth about women and relationships. I started a habit of reading (at least) one post a day from these guys, and I eventually widened my readership to include Black Label Logic, Cane Caldo, Christianity and Masculinity, Dalrock, Dark Brightness, Donal Graeme, The Rational Male, and Return of Kings, among many others.

Blogging History

I used to have my original blog platform on the Blogger host server, but it did really poorly. After subtracting all the hits generated by a Chinese ping probe, which gave my site exactly one hit per day, I had an average of 2.93 hits a day, since I broke ground on March 7, 2008.

My overall 'views per visitor' (VPV) ratio on Blogger was 1.021, which was depressing. (I consider a VPV ≈ 1, to be a failure on my part in delivering satisfying and inspiring material content, and also, a waste of my own time.)

For all the time I was on Blogger, I couldn't understand why people either could not find, or did not enjoy reading my posts. I was thinking, "Is it possible that I think I'm a great writer, but actually, the whole world thinks I suck?" This lack of response made me prefer to spend my valuable time in other pursuits besides blogging.

Then in August and September of 2017, I heard a lot about WordPress – the user satisfaction ratings, and how it was 'powering 28% of the internet', and so on. After mulling it over for a week, I decided to make the jump. So on September 27th of this year, I transferred most of my blog platform from Blogger to WordPress.

It was a good choice. I had more hits on WordPress in the first two months, than I had on Blogger in the last 8 years. I'm also meeting a few other bloggers who share ideas, so my online social circle is expanding. All good news!

Goals and Purposes

My goals and purposes in blogging are summed up in my About page. In addition to that, I hope to produce high quality work that would stand the test of time – writings that would be of value to readers even decades from now.

Themes

As you may have noticed, I seldom write about cutting edge topics in news or society, and I only cover politics or history occasionally. Instead, I focus more on deeper issues, and the cognition and processing of such issues, hence, the word 'Frame', in the blog's title. These issues include some of the following.

- Applications of faith and evangelistic outreach.
- Archetypes and Typology.
- Biblical exegesis, eisegesis and hermeneutics.
- How to interpret facts in order to arrive at a more logical and truthful conclusion.
- How to understand and build effective processes of interaction with others.
- Renewing the spirit and improving the experience of life.
- Strategies for implementing Game.

If I could summarize the recurring, underlying message within my blog posts, it would be something like this.

> "Both Heaven and Hell are juxtaposed in the imminent experience of the NOW. The choice of which one to focus on, and develop into a resultant experience, is presented as a clear decision."

I speak from this perspective out of my own experience, and also as an evangelistic message to all. If anyone gets an impression of another underlying message, I would appreciate hearing about it. Please leave a comment.

Methods

The way I approach blogging, is that I read a few posts and internet articles every day, and if I find a good one, I save the link with a brief description in a word file. Over time, I begin to see themes emerging, and then I select the related sources and use them to form the backbone of a new piece of writing. So at any one time, I might have around 30 to 50 posts in various stages of development. When one matures to completion, then I publish it. Some posts are conceptualized, written, and posted within the same day, while others sit in my folder, festering for months. For those posts, it really takes a lot of time and work to have a well-supported, well-documented argument, but that is what makes it stand out in value.

Statistics

Finally, here are the 2017 stats for Sigma Frame, since transferring to WordPress on September 27, 2017.

Traffic

Total number of followers: 12

Total number of views: 4,446 views

Total number of visitors: 1,089

Average views per visitor: 4.08

Average views per day: 46.3

Most popular day and hour: Sunday, 8:00 pm

Also, Sigma Frame gets a lot of hits on Mondays and Tuesdays, especially in the morning, and the fewest hits on Thursdays and Fridays, especially later in the day. I presume this conforms to the larger pattern of internet user traffic.

The best day for views ever: December 3, 2017, as a result of a repost from Notes from a Red Pill Girl: 16

The Four Manospherian Archetypes

Jack · 6 January 2018 · Archived copy · Original

This post outlines four different Archetypes of men, and includes the authors own experiences of each.

Targeted Readership: All
Length: 1,350 words
Reading Time: 4.5 minutes

First off, a heads up to one of the newest bloggers in the Manosphere (besides myself) and maybe one of the youngest too, Gunner Q. This guy has a perspective that is somewhat different from most of the mainstream Manospherian views (as diverse as we might be anyway). But after reading many of his posts, I have concluded that he is digging at the hardcore bedrock of Truth, and that is the fundamental, characteristic element of Red Pill awareness, as well as true Christianity.

At present, I am presuming that the uniqueness of Gunner's perspective is mostly due to generational differences. The grand majority of the Manosphere's greatest megaphones are X'ers, and I will guess that Gunner is a late Millennial, or an early iGen/Zyklon. Anyhow, it's young guys like him that will pass the torch of the RP Truth into the future when the original smack daddies start drooling their applesauce.

[Eds. note: I was mistaken! Gunner Q is an X'er! See his comment below.]

The Four Quadrants of the Manosphere

Gunner Q's original post, The Manosphere's Greatest Divide (December 20, 2017), typecasted two types of western men: Mr. Success and Mr. Frivorced. Deep Strength augmented Gunner's observations in a post delineating his own interpretation, found on his site, Christianity and Masculinity, and titled, The Great Divide (January 4, 2017). Both posts discuss and typecast different kinds of men who frequent the Manosphere. Gunner and DS described the following four types roughly according to their SMV rating and their progress or efficacy. As quoted from DS,

1. 8-10's — Mr. Successes that get all of the attention when single and have wives that adore them
2. 5-7's — Frivorced or struggling and still married but don't know how to long term relationship
3. 4-6's — the average clueless guy who sometimes get dates and relationships but can't sustain a long term relationship
4. 1-3's — the Incels that are unwanted and ignored

Here, I want to further expand this typology by pointing out that a man's SMV/MMV rating is not always a fair indicator of his sexual efficacy or his progress in his life, and a man's SMV/MMV can change for the better over time. A man's SMV/MMV is a lot more fluid and elastic, especially when compared to a woman's SMV/MMV, which, for 90+% of all women, only goes down over time.

The Fluidity of a Man's Experiences

Deep Strength self-identified as 'your average single clueless guy'. I'm going to take that as a facetious jab at modesty, because I don't see how any major Manospherian kingpin could ever be considered 'clueless'.

Personally, I think I could identify with all four types at different phases of my life. I'll tell my readers a little bit about that. When I was younger, say 15-25, I was tall and handsome (i.e. supposedly high SMV?), but as a Christian, I wasn't dating to the point of getting laid, so ladies always passed me over for the other guys who would dribble their @ss*s in a game of Big Balls (yes, even 'Christian' <ahem> 'ladies'). I was essentially unwanted and ignored, in spite of my attractiveness, and I was very angry about that. I was not aware of game, hypergamy or the 80/20 rule, which remained a feminine 'secret', and was unheard of back then, so I fit the 'clueless guy' description as well. Furthermore, since I had made up my mind to marry by the age of 24 (yes, sooo idealistic – I finally married at 33), I was in this predicament for much longer than I preferred. So I feel like I can also identify with the Incel crowd.

Fast forward a few years of being confused about why my ex targeted me with vicious venom, and losing a lot of sh*t tests out of ignorance. I found myself in the second category, Mr. Frivorced, with all the shameful rites of passage. I was still rather clueless about the feminine imperative and women's nature, but well aware of the feminine machinations. But after being divorced in mid-life, I was thrust into the current SMP. Since I was at my peak SMV at the time, I quickly discovered that I was highly demanded by many hot, salacious females. So I 'enjoyed' being Mr. Success for a time, being pursued by females of relatively higher quality, and in greater quantity, which fortunately gave me a lot of choices in the way of a wife. I capitalized on my opportunity, and so now, I am happily married.

The Four Archetypes

Based on Gunner's and Deep Strength's original types and their important distinctions, I think it might be advantageously pragmatic, not to typecast men according to their present state SMV, or their dynamic socio-sexual efficacy, but rather by the challenges they face in their present condition. To this end, I here introduce an empirical system of archetypes as follows.

1. Master (corresponds to Gunner's, Mr. Success, and DS's type 1) Getting a woman is not a problem, but getting satisfaction comes to the forefront of their attention.
2. Hardcore (corresponds to Gunner's, Mr. Frivorced, and DS's type 2) Getting control of one's life is the primary focus.
3. Novice (corresponds to DS's type 3) Learning and developing himself to become a better man, and/or to determine which life path to take.
4. Vanguard (corresponds to DS's type 4) Men who choose an alternate or unconventional life path, e.g. Incel's, MGTOW's.
5. Qualified – Men who renounce Blue Pill, but who face inordinate somatic challenges, such as chronic illnesses, physical disabilities, autism (Asperger's), and perhaps below normal T levels as well.

[Eds. note: I thought for a long time about a name for the fourth type, Vanguard, because I wanted to find a name that ascribed a sense of honor, dignity and purpose – things that many of these men don't get from society. Finally, I chose the name, Vanguard, as being a sufficiently rugged and daring descriptor of the Incels and MGTOW pioneers waging the RP war on the frontiers of society.]

[Eds. note: Looking Glass made some excellent comments under DS's original post, concerning how a man's health greatly impacts the expression of his masculinity. I don't want to leave any RP brothers out. So in response, I've added a fifth group, Qualified, to recognize those who bravely face these greater challenges, after a similar consideration of the name choice.]

I plan to label my future posts into selected categories of designated readership, and mark my future posts according to which audience it is best suited towards. This will help readers identify posts that are helpful towards building whichever Frame they are presently in, or which they seek to move into. In addition to the four archetypes described, I will add another category for the female readership.

Pink – Women who earnestly pursue RP awareness, respect men, and eschew toxic feminism.

If I find that all of my posts are being marked for the same audience, then I might stop this protocol and just update the description in the About page. But either way, I'll become more aware of the nature of my site.

Conclusions

By presenting these cases, I am in no way saying that women don't have any latitude or adjustability to their SMV/MMV. But I haven't bothered to mention those points here, since they are regular topics of discussion elsewhere in the Manosphere. To be concise, I just want to point out the following.

- A man's value is not as dependent on his SMV as it is for women.
- Men have different experiences in life, compared to other men.
- A man's present experience changes slowly over time, often for the better.
- Men can look for pockets of exceptions having the potential to offer opportunities to get around the stacked system.
- Men who are in different phases of life, with different experiences, have different goals and mindsets.

I've put up a poll to collect some demographic data on these Archetypes. Please select the Archetype that you belong to, and click on 'Vote'. Thanks for your participation.

Review of vetting, virgins and new info on virginity pledges, from Christianity and Masculinity

Jack · 8 January 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Readership: Master, Hardcore, Novice, Qualified, Pink

The information in the post below is a Cliff's notes exercise in common sense for men interested in a LTR or marriage. The facts and reasoning involved are scattered all over the Manosphere, but this post collects most of the relevant Red Pill wisdom into one long checklist. Each man might emphasize different aspects of the analysis in light of his own abilities, preferences, and real life opportunities. But the real value of the information here is for assessing a potential partner(s), making a comparison to the statistical models, and forming a conclusion about whether to jump for 'the ring', or else, keep looking.

Male vetting of female partners is phenomenally important these days, and a wise man seeking a LTR or marriage should spend a bit of time to consider this. The reason a lot of men don't think through these things, is because it requires a lot of time and work to collect this information and go over it in detail. Deep Strength has done a grand share of that work here.

If you are a parent or loyal friend of a marriage minded man, please share this with that person, and, if appropriate, become a soundboard for them to talk it over. If you're unsure of the wisdom of getting involved with another person's decision making process, please consider the pertinent benefits and risks here.

Brother Deep Strength, the host of Christianity and Masculinity, has been a long time contributor of top class wisdom to the Manosphere. He is now compiling a book which includes this subject material. If you are a youth pastor, marriage counselor, or a parent, you might consider purchasing a copy after it hits the press.

Now, on to the good stuff…

> I'm reviewing some of this for the book, plus some newer information. First, revisiting vetting. I'm going to eliminate as much commentary as I can, as this review is going to be very long. Let's look at one example we are all familiar with: virginity. From the Teachman study on Social Pathologist. In particular, we […]

Soft Reset: Tech Founders are the New PUA's

Jack · 12 January 2018 · Archived copy · Original

A Soft Reset is manifested in this lampoon of Vanity Fair's article on Tech Giant Orgies in Silicon Valley.

Readership: All

A soft Reset is inadvertently described by the author in this article from Vanity Fair (feat. Emily Chang) "Oh My God, This Is So F—ed Up": Inside Silicon Valley's Secretive, Orgiastic Dark Side (January, 2018).

The headline reads,

> "Some of the most powerful men in Silicon Valley are regulars at exclusive, drug-fueled, sex-laced parties—gatherings they describe not as scandalous, or even secret, but as a bold, unconventional lifestyle choice. Yet, while the guys get laid, the women get screwed."

Naturally… (heh)

This article reveals the dark side of the uber wealthy, upper class, which we all know about, but when it hits the newspapers, we know it's gone a few steps beyond profane. As mentioned in the quote, the tech founders who host such parties defend it as a 'lifestyle', while also tacitly admitting the viewpoints of the liberal interviewer. As one tech guru says,

> "I see a lot of men leading people on, sleeping with a dozen women at the same time. But if each of the dozen women doesn't care, is there any crime committed? You could say it's disgusting but not illegal—it just perpetuates a culture that keeps women down."

However, these women are not walking into a trap designed to 'keep them down' on the 'plush white faux fur and pillows'. They know full well what, and who, is going down there.

> "…the guests on the list understand just what kind of party this is. Women too will spread [heh…] the word among their female friends, and the expectations are hardly hidden. They might say, 'Do you want to come to this really exclusive hot party? The theme is bondage'…"

And the women come!

> "No one has been forced to attend, and they're not hiding anything, not even if they're married or in a committed relationship."

…and the women still come!

> "…the ratio of women to wealthy men is roughly two to one, so the men have more than enough women to choose from"

Yet, they come, and come… and come!

But the profanity of it all is not the drunken, MDMA fueled orgies which have coined the terms 'cuddle puddles' and 'monogamish', nor is it the industrial scale open relationships and adulteries. No, the ugliness lies in the wealth, power and attitude of their host tech founders! As the author writes,

> "What's not O.K. about this scene is that it is so money- and power-dominated. It's a problem because it's an abuse of power."

> "When I ask Founder X whether these men are taking advantage of women by feeding them inhibition-melting drugs at sex parties, he replies that, on the contrary, it's women who are taking advantage of him and his tribe, preying on them for their money."

How dare those tech-god shakers and movers display such indolence in my presence! Don't they recognize that… I am WOMAN, hear me ROAR!

And another thing that really annoys these ultrahypergamous women is the fact that GEEKS have made them swoon!

> "On their way up to a potential multi-million-dollar payout, some younger founders report, more and more women seem to become mysteriously attracted to them no matter how awkward, uncool, or unattractive they may be."

So these women are discovering the male imperative, to lay as many women as possible, is common even among wealthy brainerds. Like that's a very shocking surprise!

> "According to Ava, who asked me to disguise her real identity and has dated several founders, it's the men, not the women, who seem obsessed with displays of wealth and privilege. She tells of being flown to exotic locations, put up in fancy hotels, and other ways rich men have used their money to woo her."

Such displays of wealth are so ugly! And they USED her! A classic case of projection, as evidenced by the fact that she has dated several big wheels in tech, and probably continues to do so.

> "In Ava's experience, however, once men like this land a woman, they are quick to throw her back. After a few extravagant dates, Ava says, she will initiate a conversation about where the tryst is going. The men then end things…"

So dearest sweet Ava is now learning the limits to her hypergamy and sexual bravado. The problem she faces here is that mega-millionaires already know that marriage, and women in general, are poor investments which have increasing costs and decreasing returns. But never mind the fact that all she can bring to the carpet are her delightful conversation skills, the inspiration of her B rack, the passing pleasures of poon, and (theoretically) her reproductive potential. No, her own lacking contribution is not at the forefront of her mind. Instead, she is primarily concerned about the difficulty that the egos of these men present to her imperative to lock them down for their resources.

> "What that adds up to is a great deal of ego at play."

Ego… another case of projection. The author of the article quotes a founder's honest viewpoints to express disdain over the SMP at these parties. [Emphasis mine.]

> "'It's awesome,' says Founder X. At work, he explains, 'You're well funded. You have relative traction.' Outside work [he says], 'Why do I have to compromise? Why do I have to get married? Why do I have to be exclusive? If you've got a couple girls interested in you, you can set the terms and say, "This is what I want." You can say, "I'm happy to date you, but I'm not exclusive."' These are becoming table stakes for guys who couldn't get a girl in high school."

[Eds. note: Mansplaining 'table stakes', yields, 'carpet steaks'.]

And she is absolutely appalled that these nerds are no different from the PUA's – focused on their free-wheeling, notch expanding, high efficiency, lifestyle of ease.

> "For many women who describe it, however, it's a new immaturity—sexist behavior dressed up with a lot of highfalutin talk—that reinforces traditional power structures, demeans women, and boosts some of the biggest male egos in history: just another manifestation of Brotopia."

[Eds. note: 'a new immaturity!?! ROFL! Immaturity is living in a state of denial, and refusing to acknowledge human nature. Nothing new about that.]

Ohhh! The frustration is tangible! No matter how mainstream or brutally demanding feminists become, they just can't kill the beast of 'toxic masculinity'! Next comes the suave reaffirmation of the educated feminist viewpoint.

> "When I spoke about Silicon Valley's sex parties—specifically those where women vastly outnumber men—with Elisabeth Sheff, a Chattanooga-based writer and professor who has spent two decades researching open relationships, her reaction was heated: 'That's exploitation. That's old-school, fucked-up masculine arrogance and borderline prostitution,' she said. 'The men don't have to prostitute themselves, because they have the money. . . . 'I should be able to have sex with a woman because I'm a rich guy.' That is not even one particle progressive; that is the same tired bullshit. It's trying to blend the new and keeping the old attitudes, and those old attitudes are based in patriarchy, so they come at the expense of women."

Note that she used the phrase, 'prostitute themselves', and it's all about the money (projection again). They know what they're doing, although they're in denial about it. Also, the phrase, 'blend the new and keeping the old attitudes' sounds like what Red Pillers say about Purple Pillers and Complementarians. If we add these two together, the complementary color of purple is yellow, so I guess Sheff is yellow. This gives new meaning to the phrase, 'yellow journalism'.

It's quite apparent here, that the feminist pork fluff about women's 'exploitation' is not based on 'Patriarchy' per se, but with the feral nature of men in general. Yet, feminists are quite comfortable with amplifying their own feral nature, and feel fine with exploiting the feral nature of men through various avenues, such as beta orbiters, and 'consensual rape'.

One wife of a tech founder who participates in the orgies with her husband admits,

> "…for many men these parties aren't so much about self-expression as they are about simply sport fucking. 'Some guys will whip out their phones and show off the trophy gallery of girls they've hooked up with… Maybe this is behavior that happened on Wall Street all the time, but in a way they owned it. These founders do this, but try not to own it. They talk about diversity on one side of their mouth, but on the other side they say all of this shit."

So here, these women are seeing the profligate side of masculinity, and then when men politely 'agree' with feminist mantras, they call it hypocrisy. They just can't kill the beast!

Men at least have the courtesy to admit that women have their own views, but it would appear traitorous to the female species for women to do the same for men.

The last section in the Vanity Fair article is titled,

> "The New Paradigm for Women Getting Screwed"

Actually, it's not a new paradigm at all. Prostitution is an ancient profession, you know. But at last, a Reset has nucleated!

> "For successful women in Silicon Valley, the drug-and-sex-party scene is a minefield to navigate. This isn't a matter of Bay Area tech women being more prudish than most; I doubt recent history has ever seen a cohort of > women more adventurous or less restrained in exploring sexual boundaries. [No doubt!] The problem is that the culture of sexual adventurism now permeating Silicon Valley tends to be more consequential for women than for men, particularly as it relates to their careers in tech."

Feeling the heat now, are they? After 50+ years of 'free love' feminism and the mass cuckoldrification of God, mankind, and society, is this the first speed bump that has clacked their teeth?

> "More recently, Crawford and Messina have started a company together called Molly—perhaps not un-coincidentally the same name as the drug—where they are developing a 'nonjudgmental (artificially intelligent) friend who will support your path to more self-awareness'. They also chose to become monogamous for a while [Imagine that!]; seeing other people was getting too complicated. 'The future of relationships is not just with humans but A.I. characters'…"

I'm LMAO!!! Another ploy to anesthetize the brutal exposure to reality! They even named it after a euphoria inducing drug! What will they come up with next?

> "What [Crawford] has found is that, for a woman, pushing private sexual boundaries comes with a price."

It's against the fundamental law of Matriarchy that women should have to pay for any type of pleasure (or sustenance for that matter). That is man's responsibility! Also, since it is their duty, we should not be required to display any expression of gratefulness at all!

The real problem here is that feminist women take their own feral nature as the guiding light, but absolutely refuse to accept the male feral nature as anything but destructive and 'toxic'. Crawford tells the story of how she was offended and humiliated when she was hit on by a benefactor.

> "When Crawford was raising funds for her second company, a social-media app called Glmps, she went to dinner with an angel investor at a hip restaurant on San Francisco's Valencia Street. At the end of the meal, he handed her a check for $20,000, then immediately tried to kiss her. 'I certainly wasn't coming on to him,' she asserts. 'I kind of leaned back, and he ordered me an Uber, and I was like, "I gotta go home."' Crawford thinks it's likely that this particular investor knew about her sexual openness and found it difficult to think of her simply as an entrepreneur rather than as a potential hookup. This encounter is an example of a unique penalty women face if they choose to participate in the 'we're all cool about sex' scene."

Establishing a reputation as a slut does have that effect! But she is still using it to shamelessly cash in on the $$$. In days of yore, they called this type of transaction 'prostitution'. But I guess it would be considered chauvinist to do so now (and we know that word is shamefully reproachful).

Then, Ava tells the story of how she found her boss in a three-way at one of these parties, and then got hit on shortly afterwards. She was absolutely indignant that anyone would think she was that kind of girl! She then had to quit her job at Google to avoid the harassment! Crawfords attitude towards this all too common phenomenon is like this.

> "Of all the privileges in the world, that is not the one I would choose," she says fiercely. "I'd choose equal pay for equal work. I'd choose having better access to capital and power. "I'd choose not being passed over for promotions. I'd choose not having to worry about being in the 23.1 percent of undergraduate college women who get sexually assaulted. I'd choose not being slut-shamed if I do opt to explore my sexuality."

And would she ever choose to be a chaste, loyal wife and loving mother? But she still goes to those parties… 'nuff said. We know 'explore my sexuality' is femtalk for 'slutting it up'. Sounds like she wants to 'have her cake and eat it too', as Manospherians say.

The rest of the article describes how women 'risk losing credibility and respect' if they continue to attend the orgies where all the monkey business is going on. However, they are 'relegated to the uncool kids table' if they don't. In other words, men are calling the shots, and that's just baaad! Anything less than total female dominance is horrible! As another tech giant slut lamented,

> "'There is this undercurrent of a feeling like you're prostituting yourself in order to get ahead because, let's be real, if you're dating someone powerful, it can open doors for you. And that's what women who make the calculation to play the game want, but they don't know all the risks associated with it,' she said. 'If you do participate in these sex parties, don't ever think about starting a company or having someone invest in you. Those doors get shut. But if you don't participate, you're shut out. You're damned if you do, damned if you don't.'"

They're just… damned. Period. No surprise, thank you. Just penalties for choices made.

Now we're starting to face the fact of the matter. Women are women, forever destined to be muses, vixens, helpers, procreators, and sources of 'inspiration', even in sex swathing Silicon Valley. The author finally admits,

> "The problem is that weekend views of women as sex pawns and founder hounders can't help but affect weekday views of women as colleagues, entrepreneurs, and peers."

Quite a satisfying conclusion. The moral of the story is, men can mix business with pleasure, but women can't (unless it's that kind of business). So much for 'equality'. Evolutionary forces win out. Don't try to fight it, ladies.

The Evolution of Feminism as a Series of Cultural Movements

A concise summary of the emergence of Feminism in the United States.

Introduction

It could very well be argued that the spiritual essence of Feminism is as old as the Garden of Eden, and has reared its head in various societies in turn down through the ages. The following essay is based on a comprehensive amalgamation of many sources in addition to those cited, and was written in an effort to deconstruct the American emergence of Feminism over the last 140 years.

First Wave Feminism (1880-1920)

Feminism began in the mid to late 19th century in the form of 'Temperance', a social movement aiming to outlaw liquor. At that time, liquor was 'as American as apple pie', and was a notable cause of domestic violence.

The Gibson Girl — Women's ideal fashion at the onset of First Wave Feminism.

The movement to ban liquor eventually ignited the movement to establish female suffrage. For decades, society resisted these changes, until a catastrophic change precipitated their acceptance. World War One, and the Spanish flu epidemic, together, consumed between 60 to 120 million people worldwide in only six years (1914-1920).

The loss of men, husbands, and sons on a mass scale, with an especially high number between the ages of 20-35, upset the gender balance and the societal order. Many women lost the hope of ever marrying, and turned instead to a lifestyle of frequenting nightclubs and profligate romances. Women caught up in this status were called 'flappers', and were iconically known to cut their hair very short in a style known as a 'bob'. A woman bobbing her hair was absolutely scandalous at that time because it advertised a woman's sexual openness for all to see.

Moreover, society had been irreversibly altered and as a consequence, the objectives of alcohol prohibition and female suffrage were reached around the same time in the early 20th century, effectively concluding what we now call the First Wave of Feminism.

The Flapper was the inflammatory feminine sex icon at the end of first wave feminism.

The motivations of temperance and female suffrage behind the First Wave of Feminism are regarded as the purest, most legitimate, and most successful among all the waves of feminism. At the same time, however, the 1st Wave wasn't even remotely about gender equality. While some feminists of the time did have this principle in mind, and showed it in their activism (e.g. Susan B. Anthony), the movement as a whole didn't seem terribly interested in giving women the same standing as men, so much as an effort to address the specific grievance of alcoholism destroying families.

Second Wave Feminism (1950-1991)

The Second Wave of Feminism began about three decades later and was a response to women being pushed out of the workforce by soldiers returning from World War Two. During this war, men were displaced to serve military objectives, and women were forced to take on jobs traditionally held by men, including construction and manufacturing.

Female riveters building aircraft at Lockheed Martin (1944).

Women found purpose and dignity in doing so (c.f. 'Rosie the Riveter'). Many provisions were put into place to allow them to do so, such as childcare provisions provided by the government and employers. According to many feminists, when the soldiers came back from the war, they were discriminately pushed out of work in favor of male employees, especially in positions requiring hard labor, such as construction and manufacturing, but also in a few white collar professional jobs, such as small business management. The resulting discontent and indignation ignited the Second Wave of Feminism, presumably spearheaded by war widows or never married's who found less income and more free time on their hands without employment — time they used for activism.

The Second Wave of Feminism gained steam by the 1960's, and tackled a much broader array of issues than the first, including the following.

1. The passing of historic civil rights legislation, including The Civil Rights Act of 1964.
2. The legalization and public acceptance of racial miscegenation.
3. Revoking the popular depiction of women as wives, mothers, and homemakers.
4. Female discrimination and favoritism in the work force.
5. Establishing reproductive, marital, and divorce rights for women.
6. Coming out with the previously subterfuged idea that sex and commitment are not concomitant, viz. 'Free Love', as popularized by the 'Hippies' of the Boomer Generation. Over time, and with popular acceptance, this allowed the expansion of female sexual hypergamy, and the ostracization of lower SMV males from the SMP.
7. The crowning 'achievements' of 2nd Wave Feminism were the widespread public recognition and increased acceptance of the pro-choice rationale, legalized abortion (Roe vs. Wade, 1973), and the late-term and partial-birth abortion practices.

Also during their term, western society experienced several other social, legal and technological cofactors which supported the purposes of 2nd Wave Feminism [1,2].

1. An increase in the number of working women, thereby allowing them to support themselves financially and assume real independence.
2. No Fault Divorce legislation, giving women greater opportunity to sacrifice their marriages for the sake of their own interests.
3. The birth control pill and other modern contraceptives, allowing women greater latitude in their sexual choices.
4. Many drugs were introduced for the treatment of STD's, thus expanding women's sexual proclivities.
5. Widespread pornography, and increasing sex and violence in media, which reinforced the feminist argument that women are objectified and abused by sex addicted men.

In practice, the combination of all the above factors led to a drastic increase in the divorce rate, which interestingly enough, happened to coincide with women's use of the birth control pill [3,4].

Despite what some would consider the positive effects that 2nd Wave Feminism had on Western society as a whole, the leadership was deeply corrupt and had strong and extreme leanings toward what could be called 'Gender Marxism'.

Gender Marxism is defined as the application of Marxist Principles to the discussion on gender relations. For instance, 'capitalism' is replaced by 'patriarchy', the 'bourgeoisie' is replaced by 'men', and the 'proletariat' is replaced by 'women', within the relative arguments. By extension, many in the feminist leadership based their ideology around the view that Western society consists of an 'oppressor / oppressed dichotomy', where all men oppress all women, which is a perspective that encouraged their followers, either directly or indirectly, to hate and distrust men.

After the civil rights movement ended, these 'Gender Marxists' (many of whom were Boomers) went to school, got Ph.D.'s, and secured positions of power for themselves in government and academia. Thus, the proponents of the Second Wave of Feminism gained significant power over society and fostered the political environment that gave birth to the Third Wave of Feminism.

Third Wave Feminism (1991-2007)

The Third Wave of Feminism began with the formation of a sophisticated political and philosophical voice. Many late Second Wave artists, writers, and social activists fashioned a dark, faddish, alternative subculture, manifested in the new Grunge and the revived Punk social scenes in the mid-1990s, which seduced the minds of young women to adopt their views of explicit sexual freedom and the caddish stereotype of men. Lower middle class adolescent girls formed the bulk of their age cohort at that time, and they were highly susceptible to the voguish propaganda, peer pressure, and cheap fashion talk, which discussed female sexuality in explicit, even profane detail (although just shy of enough details to give away the secrets of the Feminine Mystique).

1990's Grunge — The curse of fashion.

The nature of Third Wave Feminism could be described as a deep, but profound ideological shift, governing the values, norms, and expectations of men and women in society. Many of the core ideologies of modern feminism, such as 'individualism' and 'diversity', were born from the 3rd Wave, which coincided with, and was reinforced by, the rise of the 'Politically Correct" (PC) sentiment, which served to defend the lifestyle choices of liberals who deviated far Left from the acceptable norms of the time.

The 1st and 2nd Waves of Feminism cleared up the vast majority of concrete institutional and prejudicial problems that women faced in society. Thus, in the absence of immediate, real grievances, Third Wave feminism focused on more abstract and systemic problems faced by post-modern women, such as the social nuances of their sexual liberties, reproductive 'rights', and how women, especially those sexually liberated, are perceived by society. Third Wave feminists embraced the new ideologies and sought to redefine what it meant to be a feminist. Where the Second Wave expressed the rejection of traditional female roles, the Third Wave of Feminism taught young women to scorn the natural life phase of women being young brides, wives, and mothers as a form of 'institutionalized bondage'. Thus, sexual promiscuity became the norm, even reaching within very conservative and traditional communities. Eventually, the idea that sex (and later on, procreation) should be unique to marriage was totally eradicated.

To replace the crumbling system of ethical morality, 3rd Wave Feminism bought into the value for higher education widely held among Gen X'ers, and introduced a new template for female young adulthood, characterized by getting an education and establishing a career. The proposed motivations were presented as, 'becoming a strong and independent woman', while subtly reinforcing the conflicting notions that men are not to be depended upon, but are to be objectified as a provider of sex and resources. The pseudo-spiritual mantra, 'finding one's self' was introduced, which was for women, more often than not, a polite euphemism for indulging in sexual promiscuity until emotional complacency and sexual annui sets in. As a consequence, the average age of marriage was severely delayed during this time period. [5-8]

Over time, the 3rd Wave brought the emergence of new feminist currents and theories, such as 'intersectionality', 'postmodern feminism', 'sex positivity', 'transfeminism', 'vegetarian ecofeminism', and 'womanism' (within black feminism), thereby producing an atomization, and arguably the obliteration, of sexual norms. Late Third Wave feminists especially sought to destroy deeply entrenched impressions of sexually liberated women as being 'immoral sluts'. Towards this effort, they proactively owned derogatory terms, such as spinster, whore, cunt, and bitch, and attempted to reclaim them as 'positive' female attributes.

A slutwalk demonstration.

Because of its philosophical nature, the 3rd Wave was unsuccessful in obtaining significant media attention, and it is often overlooked as an individual movement. Even many feminists tend to neglect the influence of this time period, and thereby regard the current Fourth Wave of Feminism as 'Third Wave Feminism'.

Fourth Wave Feminism (2007-2025) [9]*

The most recent wave of feminism, also known as 'intersectional feminism', originated from an online culture war between Atheists and Christians [10]. After winning the culture war, the online atheist community began to splinter and split into two factions, and infighting ensued. One side was atheist due to their Gender Marxist / Feminist values, and the other side was atheist due to their more liberal values. Soon afterwards, the Occupy Wallstreet movement [11] introduced the concepts 'intersectionality', the discussion of how intersecting 'oppressions' affected one's life, and 'progressive stack', an activism tactic that regulated free speech by favoring people based on how 'intersectional' they were (in other words, how many intersecting 'oppressions' they have). The atheist / Marxist / Feminist communities banded together, incorporated these ideas, and established the Fourth Wave of Feminism.

The primary focus of Fourth Wave Feminism was to deconstruct gender (specifically maleness), and to arbitrate and incorporate all aspects of social justice, including gender, gender identity, race, and sexuality. Following the Marxist model, feminists introduced an inverted social order which placed the most 'oppressed' people, including women and the non-binary engendered, the disabled, the obese, etc. at the top of the 'social virtue hierarchy', and those entrenched in traditional majority blocks, namely straight, white, middle-class, Protestant males, at the bottom.

The platform for Fourth Wave Feminism was primarily blog-type websites such as Tumblr and the notorious Everyday Feminism. Its focus on feigned indignification as a virtue signal, online 'outrage', a technique in which blustering anger is used to silence or control those who diverged from the established Marxist narrative, and 'callout culture', in which dissenters were strategically targeted, doxxed and shamed, allowed it to force its way into mainstream acceptance, as more and more of the mainstream media was sucked into a pursuit of feminist ideological purity for the sake of maintaining the faux dignity of being 'Politically Correct'.

According to Fourth Wave Feminism, social virtue is attained not by acts of valor, but by virtue signaling; condemning and ostracizing those who are perceived to have 'privilege'.
Meanwhile, the average age of marriage continued to be pushed out, and marriage as an institution became marginalized. Men and women alike, learned to deeply fear traditional matrimony for all the social and legal risks it entailed, and often chose cohabitation and out-of-wedlock births instead [12].

Conclusions

After analyzing all four feminist movements, the incontrovertible conclusion is that it was not only a very corrupt ideology that took the worst and most hateful pages out of Marx's book, but it also didn't even stay true to its expressed platform of gender equality. The full realization of Feminism in the late twenty-teens took on the form of what the leaders of the Second Wave intended — an equitarian ideology that saw any area in which men excelled over women as an oppressive injustice that needed to be addressed and corrected — and it actively oppressed men to those ends. Yet, intersectional oppression failed to ascribe virtue to oppressed men, especially white men. It is also obvious that each successive movement was carefully constructed to dispatch the following wave, each bringing an increased degree of political and sociosexual anarchy, as well as the widespread destruction of young women, marriages, and families.

The “Orange Pill” for Attention Deficit Hypergamic Disorder

Jack · 17 January 2018 · Archived copy · Original

This post covers loopholes in the social mechanics that might allow crafty, determined men to get a middle leg up, and keep hypergamy in check. Doing whatever it takes to reach a predetermined, targeted life goal, this post explores the ‘Orange Pill’ in greater detail.

Readership: Master; Hardcore; Novice; Qualified;

Introduction

Many men living in western culture today are deeply disappointed with what life has offered them. Concerning relationships especially, men are frustrated with the ‘liberated’ females around them, starved for sexual fulfillment, and hopeless about making any changes.

Yet, there must be something that a man could do to achieve a greater sense of purpose and achievement in his life. Sitting at home, watching pron, playing video games, etc. is not in any sense, progress. A man must always keep himself on the edge of a challenge, no matter how great or insignificant it might be.

If a man is unable to change the current social order to his liking, then he must find, or create, a different social order or dynamic, at least within his own life, and within his own vicinity. Thus, if a man doesn’t like, or can’t compete in the challenge at hand, then he should switch up the game, such that he is playing a life game better suited to his purpose and interests, and is in an appropriate match for the competition.

This post examines some possibilities and alternatives.

A Computer Simulated Study of Hypergamy, and an Interpretation of its Significance

Chateau Heartiste’s post, Technology And Female Hypergamy, And The Inegalitarian Consequences (January 4, 2018) offers an insightful commentary on an earlier post from Selonomics (feat. Martin Petrović), How Does Technology Affect Which Men Women Choose? (November 8, 2017).

Using computer simulations with data models, Selonomics confirms the expression of hypergamic tendencies in various Female to Male ratio scenarios, and offers impressive graphs to illlustrate how women’s hypergamy truly steals the show, as Manospherians have long suspected. Chateau’s post makes the point that women’s hypergamous nature or wishful intentions, do not necessarily correspond to a real world fulfillment of the same. In effect, there is a difference between implicit female hypergamy and ‘runaway’ female hypergamy. Thus, we have identified a glitch in the Matrix.

Exceptions to the Rule Pose Opportunities for Men

Developments in the western social scene over the past few decades have indeed made it quite challenging for a man to find contentment. However, I will assert that a sufficiently determined man can search and search until he finds what he wants. Giving up is not considered an option. A corresponding definition of the measure of a man has been stated in popular culture.

> “It is not the violence that sets a man apart. It’s the distance he’s prepared to go.” ~ Forrest Bondurant, in the feature film, Lawless (2012)

A man has the time to do this (but women don’t). So in the interests of such determined men, this post puts the finger on the fact that there ARE cracks in the system which can be exploited, and will offer some examples in which solutions might be found.

CH points out that there are many loopholes in the social mechanics that keep hypergamy in check, and allow men to retain a seat of power. Here, we explore these noteworthy points in greater detail. The first five are gleaned from Chateau's post.

1. Game, e.g. dread, push-pull, displaying high value (DHV), disqualification, outcome independent mentality, assuming the sale, etc.
2. Genetically determined preferences for monogamy, i.e. 'nature'.
3. Formal social regulations and informal cultural regulations, i.e. 'nurture'.
4. Cultural and geographic constraints, i.e. 'propinquity'.
5. Grass Roots Reform, e.g. Trump's election and the 'angry young man revolution', i.e. 'autocorrection'.
6. Others? [Eds. note: I may add to this list upon future revelations.]
7. A combination of the above.

From these points, we hereby concoct the "Orange Pill", a sort of Adderall for the Attention Deficit Hypergamic Disorder, widely prevalent in today's society. This is good medicine for those men who lack determined intent, and who are chronically insensitive to the demands of 'fitting' within one's chosen social environment. These are briefly discussed as follows.

1. Game

For the past decade (since the debut of RP awareness), Game has been the single most endorsed tool available to (most) men for dealing with women. The whole PUA industry is built on low to mid SMV guys learning Game, so that they can compete with higher value guys in the SMP. Some might argue that only a very small number of men have been successful with this, but from a woman's perspective, learning even some modest Game can take a guy from a 5 to an 8, and get him through the bedroom door.

I think the most efficient form of game that any guy could adopt is DHV. If a guy starts working out at the gym, gets a promotion, or has an investment that plays out well, this can take his confidence to a new strata. Yes, these things are difficult or unlikely, but it's a LOT easier for a guy to gain 3 SMV chips by getting a promotion (i.e. playing the Status card), than it is for a woman to gain 3 points by doing… whatever. Losing weight, maybe? A man could simply wear a blazer and a pair of Johnston & Murphy's, and bump himself up a notch. Seems like too few men are aware of this. Even guys who choose to snub women (i.e. MGTOW's) would fare better in their careers by adopting certain aspects of Game that are relevant to their position.

2. Preferences

I know some Delta guys at church who are (to be brutally honest) pretty low on the SMV totem pole. However, they have stable jobs and great personalities, so they have a much higher MMV. As a result, they have reasonably stable marriages to wives who are 3-5 points above them on the SMV scale. This sharply counters the hypergamous model (which means they'll probably remain Blue Pill), but I think this is largely because there are a lot of women who place a higher value on comfort and stability, and are not that into drama and sexual variety. I should also mention that many of these wives are Asian and/or they married young, which supports Heartiste's claim about these preferences being genetic. One scientific study by Cheng and Smyth [1] revealed that Chinese nationals strongly prefer monogamy as a source of subjective happiness.

From an evolutionary perspective, hypergamy is an important mechanism which serves to improve the quality of the gene pool over time, and we're talking several generations here. But genetically determined propensities for commitment and monogamy are going to weed out the gene pool of women who rely heavily on birth control and postpone marriage and childrearing past their 'educational' phase, and this will happen within only a generation or two.

3. Social and Cultural Regulations and Traditions

One's social environment is a huge influence over what one accepts as the norm, especially those experienced during one's formative years i.e. adolescence. Commenter Don Quixote added a statement on Deep Strength's site, which illustrates an example of how social and cultural regulations can produce top grade men.

> "With regard to #1 Mr. Success. Often these guys are second generation Christian, and got off to a good start from their parents, especially if they are clerics. These guys have kept themselves from evil and reap the benefits, they are prone to fall into the trap of excess wealth, and I have encountered these guys in the past." "Usually they sympathise with the frivorced types but they are clueless beyond their own church's policy on the subject, so they will point you to a counselor, and hope you will be ok. This is usually a bad idea."

Parents have a great responsibility to diligently teach and discipline their children towards this end. Parent's hard work in this area contributes to their children's joy and successes in their life, thereby becoming a generational stronghold.

4. Geographic Propinquity

Concerning point four, CH mentions how ambitious, hypergamous females recognize their lack of sociosexual opportunities and flock to the coastal metropolises to maximize the high horse they get off of their addicktion to chance choice.

I say, men can do the same!

Young men opting for a college degree should choose their school carefully. For those men who are interested in partying and soft harems, choose an educational institution with a high female to male ratio (i.e. more females than males). For men who are interested in a more conservative experience, and who wish to meet better quality women and possibly a wife, they should choose a school with a low female to male ratio. At these schools, the majority of men (not feminists) call the shots, while coeds tend to be higher quality and more selective about men. However, you will have more competition too. I know that seems backwards, but that's how it works. If you want something in between, go to a place that is around 1:1. I have no idea how truthful or accurate it is, but here's an interesting link on this subject. In summary, when there are more women than men, hypergamy abounds, and this agrees with Selonomics' study.

Those men who are being strangled by the laws and social norms of Samerica can Google search, scope out, and tour (if possible) domestic geographic locations and/or prospective foreign cultures which might offer them more of what they're looking for in life, whether it be gaining life experiences, padding a resume, developing a career, sexcapades, or even finding a traditional wife. If young thots/future cat ladies want to go to Grand Canyon University (sex ratio = 2.9:1, and quite a fitting name!) and take 'missionary trips' to Sierra Leone, then we should expect young men to respond in turn. Thus, we have the current mass exodus of sufficiently discontented males going to traditional, patriarchal societies (e.g. eastern Europe and south-east Asia), to quench their appetites for a taste of normalcy, as well as to escape the blue-haired, fish-mouthed crazies. Yours truly included.

For those men who are interested in exploring their opportunities in foreign cultures abroad, an overview of the cultural anthropology of a few other world cultures are described in the following posts.

- Sigma Frame: Foundations of Cultural Ethics and Chivalry (February 18, 2018)
- Sigma Frame: Cultural Ethics, Patriarchy, Chivalry, and Christianity (February 24, 2018)

My advice is for you to review these cultural characteristics carefully, and do a little bit of your own research, with the mind to identify a culture possessing an ethical structure that you think would most appeal to you. Then decide whether it would be advantageous to your best interests to travel there, with the intention of determining whether it might offer what you are looking for in life.

5. Grass Roots Reform

Recently, the rise of MGTOW has revealed that society, and feministic women in particular, are deeply terrified by the power of men in creating a shift in society that threatens, nay promises, to derail their apocalyptical train of alpha ecstasy and government enforced subsidies. Occasionally, the news reveals signs of the Feminist hiccup.

For example, this article from the Guardian (feat. Rebecca Solnit): Don't let the alt-right hijack #MeToo for their agenda (December 10, 2017), expresses an inherent fear that FemLefties cherish, concerning the erosion of Matrix supremacy. This fear indicates a power that men have, which they are not totally aware of – the fact that they are the inventors, movers, builders and loin shakers of society – not women, as much as feminists would like to believe.

In other words, men are the 'big gears', and when big gears move slow, the little gears spin wildly. This phenomena is apparent in almost any female-male pairing, although many Blue Pilled men attempt to tone it down. Moreover, women depend on men for sex, security, sustenance and quality of life. In fact, this basic ontology has been the root complaint of feminism since its inception. When men realize that they have strings to pull, they will slowly develop control over the interaction, which women have monopolized in the past.

Conclusions

By presenting these cases, I am in no way saying that women don't have any latitude or adjustability to their SMV/MMV/hypergamic advantages. To be sure, hypergamy has the upper hand, and this is a regular topic of discussion elsewhere in the Manosphere. This article only points out a few ways that men can deal with hypergamy in ways that soften the agony and abuse. Of note, it helps to remember the following.

- A man's overall value is not linearly dependent on his SMV, as it is for women.
- Men have different experiences in life, compared to other men.
- Men who are in different phases of life, with different experiences, have different goals and mindsets.
- A man's present experience changes slowly over time, often for the better.
- Men have more time, a cornered market on resources, and thus, more power in the game.
- Men can look for pockets of exceptions having the potential to offer opportunities to get around the stacked system.
- A diligent and resourceful man can find a life that works for him.
- Finding a good match and fitting the bill is the real challenge.
- It's up to each man to decide what he wants, and to do the searching.
- Often times, a man has got to make some tough decisions about what is most important to him.
- A mismatch or failure only indicates that one must continue searching further.

Best wishes to all my readers!

Checkpoints are as follows.

1. Don't get addicted.
2. Checklist small tasks.
3. Create something.
4. Exercise. (Also see, Less Weight, Better Health.)
5. Get a streak going. (Also see, A Study of Csíkszentmihályi Flow.)
6. Increase Tyrosine (through a selected diet).
7. Listen to music.
8. Meditate. (Also see, The Discipline of Silence.)
9. Take supplements.
10. Toxic cleansing. (Also see, Fasting.)

Introduction

> "Dopamine is a neurotransmitter that helps control the brain's reward and pleasure centers. Dopamine also helps regulate movement and emotional response, and it enables us not only to see rewards, but to take action to move toward them."
> Psychology Today

There are a lot of articles on the internet about dopamine and how it affects your mood, behaviour, energy, and focus. What's not commonly spoken about, however, is how dopamine is affected by your perception. Discussed more rarely still is the reason why your dopamine levels may be low. Below are 10 ways to increase your dopamine levels, courtesy of Power of Positivity, as well as my own observations regarding the underlying issues which may have led to each situation and how to tackle them.

1. Don't Get Addicted

"Many people get addicted to something because it gives them some kind of instant gratification – drugs, alcohol, sex, pornography, shopping, and other addictive behaviors actually have the opposite effect on dopamine levels in the long-term. In essence, when we get overly addicted to something, the 'reward circuitry' of our brain kicks into overdrive and we crave the 'quick hit.' This is not a sustainable solution for dopamine production, which can and should be done naturally."

What's missing here is the fact that addiction is quite often a result of low dopamine, meaning addiction is more of an attempt to fix an already existing problem. In essence, "the underpinning of your addictive personality is a lack of fulfillment from within, with a resulting urge to achieve fulfillment through substances, objects, or events that relieve the inevitable pain – for a while." (source)

"When we receive a reward of any kind, dopamine is released in our brains. Over time, this stimulus and release of dopamine can lead to learning. Researchers have recently found that how quickly and permanently we learn things relates directly to how much dopamine we have available in our brains. As we get rewarded over and over again for something, we learn that we should keep doing whatever that is very deeply, and it's hard to unlearn those kinds of behaviours." (source)

What this means is that low dopamine is a response to a lifestyle that doesn't offer much in terms of reward to the person living it. It may be a response to the environment you're living in, the clothes you're wearing, the tight budget you're working within, the relationship choices you've made or have been made for you, or a result of trauma where there was no perceived reward. It's very easy to understand how dopamine levels may appear low when we consider all the potentials leading to less rewarding lifestyles and life experiences.

What's necessary, then, is less of a 'don't get addicted' approach and more of an 'increase the rewards in your life' style of applied advice. The fact is, you'll constantly feel less fulfilled through low dopamine when you're not (or are unable to) fill your day with things that inspire and reward you. What this means is, the most effective protection against addiction and the greatest advantage to high dopamine levels is a defense against low-rewarding activities and an offence of rewarding actions, activities, and ultimately, a lifestyle of fulfillment and achievement.

Also, because addiction is most often rooted in past traumatic experiences, where emotions create a fight-or-flight response that becomes rooted in your core emotions, it's vitally important to seek proper and effective help in dissolving past trauma. Doing so can only help you perceive more rewarding experiences in your life, rather than filtering experiences through a 'traumatized' awareness.

2. Checklist Small Tasks

"Dopamine increases when we are organized and finish tasks – regardless if the task is small or large. So, don't allow your brain to worry about things that need to be done. Instead, write these tasks down and then check them off one at a time. It's been shown that it's more satisfying to the brain's dopamine levels when we physically check something off of our to-do list. Also, write down and check stuff off regardless if you can mentally remember the tasks."

While reading the book Principles of Self-Management, I came across a brilliantly well-researched understanding of motivation when it comes to tasks. In short, if a task is greater than 25% of a change in a person's routine, the person will be overwhelmed and feel incapable of achieving it. This leads them to self-defeat and self-sabotage to avoid accomplishing the task. On the other side, if a task is less than 10% different from a person's normal routine, they won't do it because it won't have enough meaning for them to do so. As such, it's wise to make sure you write down goals and tasks that are in between this 10-25% range of new behaviours and actions; otherwise, you just won't do it.

However, this 10-25% range is simply a guide for tasks that are not directly linked to our highest values. In reality, if you can link a task to your highest values and see clearly how it will help you accomplish what's truly most important to you, you'll do it. If you can't see how it will help fulfill your highest values, you'll procrastinate, hesitate, and get frustrated in the attempt to do it. By linking a task to your highest values, you'll both increase the chances of you doing it and also increase the reward you will feel when you accomplish it, a result of producing more dopamine in the brain.

3. Create Something

"For us writers, painters, sculptors, poets, singers, dancers, and other artists, we can identify with this. When we're in creative mode, we can become hyper-focused. As a result, we can enter a state called flow. Dopamine is the brain chemical that allows us to achieve this state. The lesson is this: take up a hobby or activity in which you actually create something tangible. Try something like arts, crafts, auto repair, drawing, photography, or something else that sounds interesting."

Sparking your creative drive is an effective way to increase your potential for feeling great, achieving goals, and inspiring yourself through your accomplishments. However, it can also be a distraction from a feel-bad lifestyle, if it's not maintained with a purpose in mind. Whenever you're working on a project, creative or not, that truly inspires you, you'll activate your 'flow state,' where time and space seem to stand still. So how to you determine what it is that truly inspires you?

The most important goal in revealing your most authentic creative energy is to remove the creative energies of other people from your life. So many of us look up to the creations of others, whether works of art or music, and their works or talents take up time and space in our own minds. This isn't necessarily bad, but it can influence your own beliefs about what you can create. If you compare yourself to others and minimize yourself, you'll repress your own creative ability. This can affect your dopamine levels, because if you can't see your own creations as rewarding to you, as much as someone else's, you'll feel inferior and incapable.

One very effective way of neutralizing the influence other people have on your mind is to literally look at the negatives or downsides of their accomplishment. This isn't to practice being a critic, but rather, enable you to de-infatuate with their creative powers and stop minimizing your own. Once you recognize that your creative endeavours can exist on the level of those you admire, through practice (just like they did), you'll increase your ability to see your own creations as meaningful and rewarding.

4. Exercise

"Same 'ole, same 'ole, we know. We've discussed repeatedly the importance and benefits of physical exercise, and we're just going to add to this list again. So, not only does exercise help us relieve stress, achieve better physical health and make us more productive; it boosts our dopamine levels. More specifically, exercise increases multiple neurotransmitters – serotonin and endorphins, besides dopamine, receive a boost. Here's something else cool: the exercise needn't not be arduous. Simply taking a stroll or climbing some stairs will achieve a good dopamine jolt."

Exercise is important, but it can also become a crutch or an addiction if it's not something being integrated into your daily life. Many people go to the gym to work out, yet don't live a life that requires the body they're building. Another thing is actually placing a value on exercise itself. Many people buy the gym memberships, yet never use them. So what's the easiest way to make exercise a part of your life?

There's a branch of exercise called 'functional training' in which exercises are tailored to help you with your daily tasks. This is much more helpful than just 'workouts,' because if you can train your body into a state where your daily tasks are not taxing on your energy, you'll breeze through the day and have more energy at the end of it. Staying in a high energy state instead of being brought down by your daily tasks will help you be more inspired during your day and innately feel more inspired to exercise.

5. Get a Streak Going

"As with creating a checklist, getting a streak going is a great way to increase dopamine levels. For the purpose of this article, a streak is a visual reminder of how many days in a row you've achieved something.

Get a calendar specifically for this purpose: write down whatever goal you have and the days of the week or month when they are scheduled. For example, if you work out on Monday, Wednesday and Friday, mark these days on the calendar for the month. As you finish a workout, mark it off on the calendar. Keep a streak going, and you'll keep the dopamine coming."

While the 'streak' is a useful tool for celebrating accomplishments, it unfortunately has a downside: routine. Doing something enough times becomes a routine, especially if the action isn't continuously fulfilling to your highest values. To counter this, try adapting the 'goal' or 'action' in terms of efficiency and effectiveness. By continuously finding ways to improve the performance of the behaviour, over time, you can look back at how many times you've done it, but also how much better you've become at it. This way, your performance becomes a competition with yourself, which increases your potential for feeling rewarded as you master a skill.

6. Increase Tyrosine

"Of the chemicals that make up dopamine, none are more important than tyrosine. In fact, tyrosine is considered the building block of dopamine. Therefore, it is important that you get enough of this protein. There's a large list of foods that increase Tyrosine, including: Almonds, Avocados, Bananas, Beef, Chicken, Chocolate, Coffee, Eggs, Green Tea, Watermelon, Yogurt."

Food is a reward, not a chore. This is the difference between living to eat and eating to live. While it's important to utilize foods to your advantage, it's just as important to recognize that the brain is its own best pharmacy. Few foods actually make it past the blood-brain barrier and this actually includes tyrosine.

"Tyrosine is one of the 22 key amino acids that are used for building proteins around the body. In addition to this, however, it also raises the levels of certain neurotransmitters in the brain, namely dopamine and norepinephrine. These are famous for being 'feel good' chemicals that can help boost mood and elevate concentration, making tyrosine a popular nootropic. However, tyrosine is completely incapable of passing the BBB. This way, no matter how much of it you were to take, you'd feel almost no effects." (source)

The truth is, tyrosine must be bonded with another molecule to make it past the blood-brain barrier, so tyrosine in itself isn't capable of making significant impacts on the brain. However, through natural digestion and regulating healthy bodily function, it can assist the brain in having to work less on fixing an unhealthy system, which in turn can help increase the potential for dopamine and dopamine related good feelings.

7. Listen to Music

"Do you ever wonder why music makes you happy? I mean, we can be in the dumps one moment but once we put on our favorite jam, we're swaying and shaking away…feeling pretty good about ourselves too! The reason for this is that listening to music increases dopamine levels. In fact, scientists say that listening to music has the same effect as eating our favorite foods or watching our favorite T.V. show. So, when you're feeling down, throw on some of your favorite tunes and jam out!"

Listening to music can increase dopamine levels temporarily, but what we're really looking for is a lasting fulfillment feeling so you can make your daily life enjoyable and productive for your goals. Also, popular music these days is often manufactured in such a way as to prey on your brain's chemical dependency, making much of music a form of substance addiction.

However, music has been a part of human history since as far as we can see, so its influence on our brain is greatly appreciated. In fact, one of the greatest cultural appreciations throughout history has been music. So, listen to music, but just make sure it's not the only source of dopamine in your life.

8. Meditate

"As with exercise, we are discovering more and more benefits to meditation. We are again adding to the list. As we discussed, the human brain is susceptible to a variety of addictions. One other addictive habit that we have is overthinking. In fact, some Buddhists have a phrase for this addiction: 'monkey mind.'

Overthinking is not merely a distracting habit, it's also a genuine compulsion that leaves us in a perplexing state, while also having a negative effect on our spiritual development. However, scientists are finally catching up to what Buddhists have known for thousands of years: meditation and mindfulness are essential to a healthy mind."

Meditation can be a highly effective form of dopamine increase if done properly, as it can weed out the mental influences which may be causing your chemistry to be less than desired. With the intent of reaching a state of self-fulfillment, meditation clears out the mental clutter and replaces it with presence and fulfillment for just being alive. This is a state available to every human and can help assist our daily lives by increasing our awareness of what feels good for us and what we don't resonate with.

9. Take Supplements

"While there are some great ways to increase dopamine levels, sometimes we're facing a time crunch. Fortunately, there are natural supplements on the market that have been shown to increase dopamine levels. Here are a few:

- Acetyl-l-tyrosine: Another building block of dopamine. A healthy dose of this makes it easier for the brain to produce dopamine.
- Curcumin: An active ingredient that's also common in curry spices and turmeric.
- Ginkgo Biloba: A tremendously popular wonder supplement that's also believed to boost dopamine levels and keep it circulating in the brain longer.
- L-theanine: Increases multiple neurotransmitters in the brain, including dopamine. Green tea is a terrific source for this." (source)

While supplements can impact our dopamine response, they should by no means replace your own inner potential for fulfillment. That responsibility lies with you and you alone. However, with respect to inner wisdom, without knowing what feeling amazing actually feels like, it's difficult to strive for it as a goal. Supplements can help us get there so we can have a reference point for what our potential can be. The trick is to facilitate change in our lives, enough so that the need for supplementation to feel good is lower than the feel goods we actually experience in our life.

10. Toxic Cleansing

"As miraculous as our bodies are, we do accumulate toxins and bacteria that is bad for us. Endotoxins are the kind that can cause our immune systems to get out of whack, and it also constrains the production of dopamine. Here are a couple tips for helping cleanse the gut of endotoxins: eat fermented food, get enough sleep, and resist the urge to indulge in fatty or sugary foods."

Whenever you're not fulfilled in your life, you run the risk of overindulging in sugary and sweet foods in an attempt to temporarily fulfill yourself. However, if you find fulfillment through the challenge and support of your day, you're more likely to eat for the tasks you're doing instead of eating just to feel good.

How you eat and how fulfilled you are are directly correlated. If you're actively enjoying the challenges of your life, you're more likely to consume foods that serve your highest interests and health, because you see a reason to eat well. Controlling how you eat is less important than finding fulfillment in what you do.

So the next time you find yourself craving that candy bar, ask yourself if there isn't something else you could eat that could help you find fulfillment. Also, notice what you are doing at the time you're craving sugar and ask yourself if it's really something you need to do, or can you delegate it to someone else so you can get back to things that inspire you. By focusing on what inspires and fulfills you, you'll find yourself actively seeking to better your health without having to really focus on it.

The Satanic Persuasion Formula

Jack · 20 January 2018 · Archived copy · Original

This is an original featured guest article written by J. T. Anderson from SavingEve.net. It covers a simple, yet profound theory of game strategy based on an exegesis of Genesis 3 (the temptation of Eve, which led to the fall of mankind). An emphasis is placed on the destructive nature of this particular game strategy. This deconstruction serves to expose the works of darkness, according to Ephesians 5:11-13:

> "[11] And have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather expose *them. [12] For it is shameful even to speak of those things which are done by them in secret. [13] But all things that are exposed are made manifest by the light, for whatever makes manifest is light."

In this post, I'm going to tell you how studying Satan will make you a better husband.

Specifically, I'm going to show you how Satan leads women astray and spoils your happiness. But once you're able to recognize the early signs of satanic deception, you'll be prepared to counter it.

Whether your wife is a feminist, a cold fish in the bedroom, or just an all around pain-in-the-ass… it's probably the result of satanic rhetoric that's quietly slipping in past your radar.

Sadly, I haven't seen much serious discussion on this topic in the church, so I'm hoping this article might be a tiny spark that will help trigger a larger discussion.

So let's dive right in. The text we'll be examining is Genesis 3:1-6. The pattern of the first deception has been playing out over and over throughout history.

The process of deception unfolds in four phases…

Phase #1: The Restrictive Re-frame

> "And he said to the woman, 'Indeed, has God said, "You shall not eat from any tree of the garden?"'"

Christians often misread this text and miss the point entirely. (The serpent is a crafty one.)

I've heard multiple preachers and bloggers teach that the serpent was asking Eve if God really said what he said. Something akin to a Bible trivia game.

So Christians mistakenly think that the way to counter the serpent is simply by knowing what the Bible says. We point to the Bible and say "See! God DID say that!"

But both the serpent and Eve knew about the commandment. There was no point in debating that.

What the serpent is doing is re-framing the command.

What was once a worldview of abundance ("From any tree of the garden you may eat freely"), is now reframed as a worldview of scarcity and restriction (you can't eat from any tree).

In Robert Cialdini's book, Pre-suasion, he defines an important persuasion concept called "target chuting." In response to how a question is phrased, the brain will instinctively create a "chute" to pull up information that confirms the question.

For example, one man could ask another, "It sure is great to have a woman, isn't it?" And, unless the other was currently frustrated with his wife, he would naturally agree "Yes, I am glad that I have a woman." And his brain would pull up all kinds of good memories about his wife.

But if a man says to another man, "Women sure are a pain-in-the-ass, aren't they?" He would, again, agree and his brain would provide him with plenty of examples to confirm the assertion.

This is precisely what the serpent is (maliciously) doing with Eve. He prompts her to focus on what's missing rather than on the abundance of good things in her life.

And this framing is the perfect set up for the next phase of deception…

Phase #2: The Consequence Denial

> "The woman said to the serpent, 'From the fruit of the trees of the garden we may eat; but from the fruit of the tree which is in the middle of the garden, God has said, "You shall not eat from it or touch it, or you will die.'"
> "The serpent said to the woman, 'You surely will not die!'"

The serpent has aroused Eve's curiosity, but there's a problem:

What about that whole dying thing? That doesn't sound too fun. Maybe we better not…

But the serpent maintains the frame by denying the consequence.

Fear is the strongest motivator for human behavior. If the serpent is going to lead Eve astray, he must alleviate her fears about this new opportunity he's pitching.

Of course, he has no proof. But, as any keen observer of politics knows, what one lacks in facts can be made up for with audacity!

The serpent's denial is so brazen that Eve instinctively submits to his frame. One who is that confident surely must know what he's talking about.

Of course, truth always wins over falsehood in the long-run, so the serpent has to shift her focus to something more interesting…

Phase #3: The Conspiracy (Status Suppression)

> "For God knows that in the day you eat from it your eyes will be opened, and you will be like God, knowing good and evil."

It's natural for human beings to want to increase their status. We all want to be more intelligent, more beautiful, more powerful, etc.

And there's nothing wrong with these instincts. That's why they can be used so effectively in deception.

The serpent has a tough sell here. The stakes of deviance are high and all the evidence is on God's side.

So what does he do?

He changes the focus away from the facts (which are boring) and onto Eve's personal interest… namely, increasing her status.

The serpent suggests that the fruit will make her wise. Who wouldn't want to be wise? There's nothing wrong with that!

And now that we've recognized this source of wisdom, who is preventing you from gaining it? Why, it's God himself of course!

Really, God's commandment is holding you back from reaching your potential!

This is far more intriguing than discussing the nature of death and whether or not God actually meant what he said.

Now, with Eve's attention held captive, the serpent is ready to make his offer…

Phase #4: The New Opportunity

With Eve's fear alleviated, she is in prime condition to try something new. All the serpent needs now is to offer her immediate pleasure, and an immediate increase in status.

And luckily for the serpent, the fruit is just the thing:

> "When the woman saw that the tree was good for food, and that it was a delight to the eyes, and that the tree was desirable to make one wise, she took from its fruit and ate."

Immediate pleasure with no fear of consequences? Done deal!

Now that the decision is made, the serpent can slip away and let the consequences unfold. His job is done.

The Formula

In summary, the satanic persuasion formula is:

1. Restrictive Reframe – prime her mind to focus on what's missing or on what is restricted
2. Consequence Denial – confidently deny the consequences of deviance and change her focus to…
3. Status Suppression – suggest that she is being held back from reaching her potential by the oppressive authority placed over her
4. New Opportunity – with her fear alleviated, offer her a new opportunity that gives her immediate pleasure and a (supposed) immediate boost in status

You can observe this pattern play out over and over. It's about all that Satan can do. He has no truth of his own and the path of death is a tough sell.

The only thing he can do is make the path of life seem so restrictive that any alternative with an element of immediate pleasure is attractive.

Often, Christians are unable to recognize Satan's deceptive work until it reaches Phase 4. We then respond by doubling down in preaching against the dangers of short-term pleasure.

But by then it's too late. The response is reactionary and misguided. And all the preaching against the "pleasures of the flesh" only serves to reinforce the restrictive frame that Satan wanted in the first place.

Religious Oppression and Temptation

The most prominent arena of Satan's craftiness is in religious rhetoric.

Most Christians are taught the Bible through a restrictive filter. Instead of seeing, "you may freely eat of anything except…", we can only see, "you may not eat…"

Clever people then take these restrictive interpretations and pass them along as catchy religious slogans, further cementing the restrictive view of God's word in the minds of God's children.

If you're familiar with the nature of deception, it should be obvious why this restrictive rhetoric is so dangerous.

- The daughter who believes God only cares about a woman's 'modesty' and 'chastity' is primed to embrace the 'sexual liberation' of the modern age, or else assume a frigid, prudish stance on sex.

- The son who believes God hates wealth is primed to be led astray by materialism, or self-inflicted poverty.
- The wife who believes God only wants her to be a 'housekeeper' is primed to be led astray by feminism, or else 'do her duty' with the abject hopelessness of a slave's mentality.
- The husband who believes God just wants him to 'control' his sexual urges is primed to neuter himself and let his family be led astray by more confident men, while simultaneously succumbing to lust and a guilty conscience.

The more restrictive one believes God's word is, the more likely he or she will be led astray.

And Satan delights in this.

But God is a God of abundance. And his yoke is easy.

Scripture, in its proper frame, is never burdensome. It is liberating and sensible.

But that frame will be constantly attacked and tested by the serpent's rhetoric. Dealing with this rhetoric is what I like to call a 'spiritual fitness test'.

In a follow up post, I'm going to describe a framework I believe Christian husbands can use to counter this Satanic deception.

But the first step is awareness:

Can you see how God's word is being reframed all around you? How what was once liberty has been flipped into a restriction?

If so, you are witnessing the work of the serpent.

The Blessings of Flow

Jack · 23 January 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Readership: All

Over the past week, I've had an intriguing and productive email conversation with J.T., the host of Saving Eve, covering some phenomenological interpretations, and possible applications, of Csíkszentmihályi Flow. I've cherry picked the gold nuggets from our correspondence to form this post.

There were essentially three topics that we covered.

1. Flow* as a Manifestation or Vehicle of *Blessing
2. The Bifurcated Path to Bliss
3. The Red Pill is a Toolbox for Inducing Flow in Marriage and Feminine Sexuality

Flow as a Manifestation or Vehicle of Blessing

JT: I was glad to see that you were interested in the concept of Flow, and enjoyed the post you did on it the other week. Especially the idea of the connection between Flow and eternity. I too have been fascinated by the topic for the past year or so.

I had a few observations and hunches about Blessing, Flow and spirituality…

SF: I think it is important to put together a full, concrete description of Blessing, because this is one of those nebulous concepts that few people, even Christians, understand. It took me decades to figure it out, and I'm still not very confident about what I understand about it.

JT: Eastern Orthodox scholar David Bentley Hart writes an interesting footnote in his New Testament translation after choosing to translate what is normally rendered 'blessed' as 'blissful':

> makarios: 'blessed', 'happy', 'fortunate', 'prosperous', but originally with a connotation of divine or heavenly bliss.

JT: Perhaps there is a connection between what the Bible describes as being 'blessed' and what we would call being in a state of Flow?

SF: Blessing and Flow both have spiritual and eternal characteristics. I can totally believe that experiencing Flow, and reaping the benefits thereof, is one important manifestation of being blessed. Flow could even be a propitious vehicle of blessing. (Not sure which, maybe both.) However, there are many other ways to experience Blessing, so I am hesitant to believe that they are synonymous, that is, that Flow is the same as being blessed. I wouldn't say that if a person doesn't get into Flow, then they aren't blessed.

JT: I agree. Perhaps it would be helpful to distinguish between objective and subjective aspects of Blessing? For example, a man could be objectively blessed with a beautiful and sexually eager wife. But until he learns to reach that inner Flow state, he is not fully experiencing the subjective benefits of his Blessing.

SF: 'Objective and subjective aspects of Blessing'… Yes, that's it. Also, I thought of differentiating between the STATE of being blessed (there's a long theological word for this that I can't remember), and the EXPERIENCE of being blessed.

The Bifurcated Path to Bliss

JT: The Apostle Paul makes a clear distinction between the joy of married life and the joy of remaining single. Hence his recommendation that if you had the same 'gift' [of celibacy/singleness] as Paul did, it is best to remain unmarried, as you cannot effectively blend the two desires.

This sharp distinction between marriage and singleness only makes sense to me from a Flow perspective. Flow is an immersive experience, but constant interruptions would break the state.

It seems to me that Paul is suggesting that some people have the ability to experience a state of Flow solely from their relationship to God. But having a wife would interrupt that Flow.

Sexual men, on the other hand, would experience this state of Flow with their wives… which symbolizes the relationship of Christ with the church. And this state would only occasionally be interrupted by times devoted to prayer.

SF: Two elements of Flow include 'intense focus', and 'freedom from distraction'. There is wisdom in preserving both of these elements in order to maximize the Flow experience. One interesting aspect of Flow, is that as long as one is in a state of Flow, one remains unconscious of that fact. But at the moment one stops to ponder their experience of Flow, one falls out of Flow. This summarizes the dilemma of 'overthinking' anything, as well as the hazards of multitasking.

If we take the relationship between God, man and wife as a linear hierarchy, as described by Snapper in his post, Marriage Geometry, then a man's relationship with God is a focus 'upward', while the relationship with a wife is a focus 'downward'. It's difficult to 'look up' and 'look down' at the same time, without becoming cognizant of one's focus, and thereby losing Flow. So I think St. Paul is just saying that there is no way to get around this dichotomy and have the best of both. You just have to choose one or the other and build your life on that.

JT: The 'upward' vs. 'downward' focus concept is a great way to explain it. The downward focus is more about representatively living out the heavenly joy of Christ and His bride (the church). The upward focus is about experiencing the communion directly and personally with God.

SF: You've described the spiritual significances of the 'upward-downward' thing well. Either way, it's about glorifying God with one's life.

The Red Pill is a Toolbox for Inducing Flow in Marriage and Feminine Sexuality

JT: Both Proverbs 5:19 and the Song of Solomon suggest that a married man should be in a state of sexual Flow. There is much more than simply 'doing the deed'. There is challenge, disorientation, a loss of a sense of time, a high level of concentration, subconscious direction, etc. In other words, it seems that God's desire is that a married couple remain in perpetual state of arousal and sexual bliss which symbolizes eternity.

It's not too difficult to get a man on board with having lots of sex. But a woman is easily deceived and derailed from this state of happiness. But through the Red Pill, we are (re)discovering what makes a woman tick. Perhaps the ideal Biblical goal of Red Pill philosophy is not merely to deal with our 'woman problems', but to remove her from the folly of the world, and draw her into a state of perpetual marital bliss.

SF: Funny you should mention this. Just this morning, I had the idea that the whole goal of the Female Imperative, and by extension, Feminism, is a misguided attempt to maximize the female experience of Flow, Blessing, and *Spiritual Efficiency surrounding sexual relations and procreation, which are the two things most central to a woman's identity.

The Red Pill not only picks apart the mechanics and motivations of the Feminine Imperative, but also points out all the costs, faults, sins, and mistakes inherent in the Feminist viewpoint, and shows that man is needed to impart a holy, successful, accurate, and balanced pursuit of the comprehensive Spiritual Efficiency between a man and woman in marriage and resulting family. The main fault of the Female Imperative and Feminism, is that it selfishly seeks to maximize the joys and benefits to women, without considering the overall costs to men and society. It therefore fails the Spiritual Efficiency test.

One problem with the proposed implementation of Red Pill theorems to induce a state of blissful, sexualized Flow in a female partner, is that not all women can, or want to be drawn into marital bliss, and to make matters worse, the influences of Feminism destroy the 'raw materials' of joyful wifehood coming right off the 'production line'.

I would agree, of course, that Red Pill seeks to remedy this state, but as of now, we've only made advances in understanding the problem. But on a more hopeful note, identifying the problem is half of the solution. I believe that it's only a matter of time before younger generations get enough Red Pill insights to see how it supersedes Feminism in both theory and application, towards achieving Flow, Blessing, and Spiritual Efficiency for all, including sex and marriage!

* Spiritual Efficiency is another topic that is covered in a separate post, Wisdom, Spiritual Efficiency, and Flow (January 26, 2018).

Wisdom, Spiritual Efficiency, and Flow

Conforming to God's order makes everything in life much easier.

The previous post, The Blessings of Flow (January 23, 2018), covered the relationship between Flow and Blessings. This post discusses the concepts of Godly Wisdom, Spiritual Efficiency, and Csíkszentmihályi Flow, and explains how these things are manifestations and vehicles of Blessing.

This article is arranged into four sections.

1. The Wisdom of God
2. The Nature of Spiritual Efficiency
3. The Process of Attaining Spiritual Efficiency through Building Godly Character
4. The Role of Flow

The Wisdom of God

The Wisdom of God, in a nutshell, is the practice of considering the nature of things, and purposefully arranging things in a way such that the natural behavior of things causes the course of events to unfold naturally, and efficiently, leading to an intended outcome. A couple examples are described here, using King Solomon of the Old Testament, who was known for his great wisdom.

In one story, someone challenged Solomon to draw a thread through a long, winding hole. Instead of playing with string all day, as a typical person would have tried to do, he called for a silkworm to be brought. He positioned the worm at the opening of the hole, and the worm crawled through the hole leaving a strand of silk behind.

1st Kings 3:16-28 describes two harlots who were arguing over a child, in which both claimed to be the mother. Within a small homologous community, and without the testimony of the father, or the benefit of DNA testing, this was a tough call. Solomon's solution? He commanded for the baby to be cut in half, and that one piece should be given to each woman. In all the commotion and confusion that resulted from this 'sentence', the woman with the loudest and most heart-wrenching cries for compassion and pity was clearly identified as the child's true mother. When this fact was made evident, Solomon stopped the execution from being carried out, then awarded the baby to the true mother, and punished the lying woman.

As illustrated in these two stories, the wisdom of God recognizes the natural form and function, considers various influences on behaviors, respects the symbiotic qualities of various relationships, and understands the desires and inclinations of the heart.

One way to utilize the Wisdom of God, is to implement specific spiritual truths/phenomena as vehicles to desired ends, such as when Flow increases one's skill, or mutual Love and Respect increases a couple's marital satisfaction.

Conformity to God's truths (through discipline and spiritual obedience), and applying those truths wisely, greatly increases one's propensity to experience the fulfillment of God's promises, and the inherent blessings. When one uses the wisdom of God to create a spiritually obedient life that can occur largely out of habit and nature, then blessings happen automatically. When this state can be achieved, one has obtained a significantly greater degree of Spiritual Efficiency.

I should also point out that Wisdom could be used for either good, or evil. For an example of Wisdom being used for an evil purpose, see a previous work written by J.T., The Satanic Persuasion Formula (January 20, 2018).

The Nature of Spiritual Efficiency

The nature of Spiritual Efficiency is that it maximizes positive attributes, such as enjoyment, productivity, learning, social interaction, fruits of the spirit, … and minimizes negative attributes, such as investment costs, poor outcomes, emotional work, the burden/exhaustion of a willful implementation of agency, shame, guilt… In this view, the process of Christian maturity could be interpreted as the streamlining of one's Spiritual Efficiency.

The Bible states that Christ makes the believer complete (i.e. mature), and glorified.

> "For in Him dwells all the fullness of the Godhead bodily; and you are complete in Him, who is the head of all principality and power."
> Colossians 2:9-10

> "But of Him you are in Christ Jesus, who became for us wisdom from God—and righteousness and sanctification and redemption — that, as it is written, 'He who glories, let him glory in the Lord'."
> 1st Corinthians 1:30-31

In Biblical terminology, I presume that this 'completeness' and 'glorification' is the characteristic appearance of a life made complete in Christ. This state is naturally marked by the presence of Spiritual Efficiency.

Here, I am not saying that Spiritual Efficiency is equivalent to Christ, or salvation, but that Spiritual Efficiency is an outward manifestation of a redeemed life that has been transformed, and sanctified, by the power and wisdom of Christ.

The Process of Attaining Spiritual Efficiency through Building Godly Character

I believe that Spiritual Efficiency is a real world goal that might help one draw closer to Christ.

To put this concept into secular terms, it's all about 'making yourself a better man'.

There is a sequence of tasks in building a life that glorifies God. These steps are briefly outlined here.

1. It all begins with the Truth. For a Christian, the Word of Christ is the centrality of Truth. For others, truth is whatever they believe to be true. One must read the Truth/truth. One congregates with others who know the Truth/truth. One hears others profess the Truth/truth. We might even undertake a longitudinal study of Truth/truth. In the process, one is required to discern Truth from lies, and truth from falsehoods and errors, and to make certain decisions about how the Truth/truth applies to one's self.
2. After a time, one begins to believe the Truth or truth in his heart.
3. After a belief in the Truth/truth has taken root, one begins to profess the contents of his heart in the form of words.
4. Words serve to reinforce one's beliefs, and words structure the presentation of one's beliefs. These words also convey one's values and personality to others.
5. A well-structured and congruent system of thoughts, beliefs, words, and habits, which are tested and refined over time, fosters adaptive attitudes, and produces character.
6. In the meantime, a person is developing habits and skills which support the formation and propagation of his character, and these habits, over time, become one's lifestyle, and reputation.
7. As one interacts with others, the effects of his personhood influences the lives of those around him, for better or for worse, and thus, he creates a legacy.

When all these things are in place, a state of Spiritual Efficiency has been reached, yielding a life of peace, productivity and contentment. This implies that once a person has achieved these personal qualities, and has established his lifestyle, he doesn't need to do much to maintain it. The persona of his spiritual state has a life of its own, which draws its own power and produces fruit, all by virtue of its own state of existence. He can rest and enjoy the fruit of his labors.

The problem experienced by most people, is that they do not cognizantly base their personhood on Truth. Instead, they run their lives on auto-pilot. They think about… whatever strikes the natural bent of their fancy, and they do… whatever they Feeelz like doing. Only as an afterthought, which often stems from regret, do they entertain any thoughts of introspection, or reconsider the path of their ways, and where all of it is leading. Such lives are commonly characterized by a poor constitution of character, a sore lack of truth, confusion, cognitive dissonance, wasted resources and opportunities. The list goes on, and is very long, but it can all be summarized in one very short word – SIN.

What is most often the case for even the most diligent of believers, is that life is a continual adventure in discovering ever more of the Truth, and doing the hard work of adapting their lives to it. This is the daily process of redemption, that is, the deliverance from a life of sin.

In summary, one way to describe the state of being blessed might be in the attainment of a high degree of Spiritual Efficiency, by growing into the complete, glorified person, whom God intends us to become. Utilizing the phenomena of Flow is an invaluable vehicle to this end.

The Role of Flow

The impression I have gained from experiencing both Flow and the state of being blessed, is that both are accompanied by, and aided by, attaining a state of 'Spiritual Efficiency'.

In specific, Flow is very important in establishing the skills and habits which support the livelihood of the man.

To remain in a Spiritually Efficient state of Flow, one cannot in anyway depend on the responses, spiritual obedience, or opinions of others. (That would suggest the catastrophic idea of 'people pleasing' rather than 'God pleasing'.) One must stand on his own faith, and become a channel of God's blessings towards others.

In marriage, both people must stand on their own faith, while at the same time, bless one another by striving to create Group Flow, which strengthens them both. This is why maturity, shared values and goals, and a good 'fit' of personalities are such important parts of having a good relationship. It all has to contribute to a Spiritually Efficient state of Flow.

If a high degree of Spiritual Efficiency can be achieved within a person's life, or within a marriage, then that person, or married couple respectively, will naturally find it easy to remain in a perpetual state of joy and eternal bliss, because there are fewer negative aspects to detract from the combination of the natural life and the spiritual life, and more positive aspects that reinforce its continuance. By the way, this is the fundamental nature of a Spiritual Stronghold, which can be either holy or unholy, like with generational Blessings/curses.

13 Disciplines in Dealing with Delectable Daughters

Jack · 29 January 2018 · Archived copy · Original

This post covers the moral challenges that men face in raising daughters, the dilemma that daughters face in coming of age, and some key points in raising daughters with discipline, confidence and purpose.

Readership: Parents

The text is arranged as follows.

1. The Stage of Society
2. The Moral Burden of Fatherhood
3. Put the Shame where it Belongs
4. The Father's Strategy
5. Discipline
6. Beware of Virginity Pledges
7. Conclusions

For those readers who wish to abbreviate their reading time, the 13 Disciplines advertised are listed under Section 5: Discipline.

1. The Stage of Society

Amid all the squabble about 'racism', 'sexism', reproductive 'rights', and so called 'equality', I've never heard feminists lecture anyone about raising better daughters, or creating better marriages. However, I have heard feminists say things to the tune of, "Feminism creates better men".

I believe there is a kernel of truth in this, but it's not what they think. It's true that men will react, and will have to adapt, to the chokehold that Feminism has had on society. No self-respecting RP man would allow Feminism to continue to evolve unchecked into madness and anarchy. In fact, the PUA community, the Manosphere, MRA's, MGTOW's and the rise of Game, are all evidence of men's reactions to Feminism's influence on society.

However, the definition of 'better men' will not be the feminist's definition, that is, where all men defer in self-avowed fealty to women, with alpha studs who f*ck at their feckless call, and beta men who earn, serve, and supplicate at their whim, whenever they are needed, and who go away silently when they are about to be cuckolded or frivorced.

No, Feminism creates men who are 'better' at playing the Game, inflicting the shiv, dealing with the hamster, seeing through the lies, bypassing the sh!t tests, better skilled at extracting p00n, more efficient in shaving off parasitic females, and able to identify loopholes and exemptions from mandated 'regulations'.

Then comes the prophesied Reset, as foretold by Manospherians.

2. The Moral Burden of Fatherhood

Now, at some point in this awakening, Red Pilled men who are fathers of daughters, hit a phase in which they become aware of how other Red Pilled men might affect or influence their daughters. Specifically, they get a shiver of fear when they suddenly realize that their beloved daughters are potential notch counts for alpha males practicing Game.

It's a legitimate fear, because the feral human being is fundamentally directed towards the augmentation of self-interest. Not only are men looking to score, but daughters are also looking to shinny around. That's just the natural scheme of procreation.

Of course, most fathers carry the hope that their daughters would remain chaste, and aspire to become loyal, faithful wives for self-respecting and righteous men. Of course, we know that most daughters (these days) will not, but still, fathers have a sense of responsibility about the upbringing of their daughters. Especially, fathers experience an intense pang of failure when they find out that their daughter's moral constitution has been compromised, or has become questionable.

My own father once told me, one of the most disappointing experiences of his life was when my younger sister divorced her husband after four years of marriage. Dad found that experience to be even more heartbreaking than when his own wife of 28 years (my mother) left him. I tried to tell my father that Mom had a bigger influence on my sister's decision than he did. It was obvious to me that she learned this behavior as a consequence of seeing her mother 'next' her father while she was an adolescent, which is, by the way, the worst possible age for a young person to experience a parental divorce. But this did little to assuage his guilt over the matter, because the family legacy is larger than his own life. Such is the burden of being a father.

3. Put the Shame where it Belongs

A few years later, after my first wife left me, my father gave me some defiant advice.

> "Don't let anybody try to put you to shame for being divorced!"

That was a King's X RP wakeup call!

Women who frivorce their husbands, bring a lot of shame on their husbands and children. We often hear a lot of moxie encouraging such women not to be ashamed of their selfish choices, yet, we never hear any encouragement for husbands and children who are actually on the receiving end of the shame.

Where's the 'equality' in that? Or the other word that women like, 'fairness'?

Ultimately, I believe that mothers have more of an influence on their daughter's de facto sexual proclivities than do their fathers. However, the father wields a powerful influence in the structure of his formal directives, and his approval or disapproval, which send a clear message about the appropriateness of her decisions.

There are some daughters (and mothers too) who intuitively know that their values and decisions are not approved by the father, and they may keep such activities as much of a secret from him as they can. But whether they choose to retain covert operations or not, the nuanced implications of his Frame on their choices will always weigh heavy on their hearts. This is not to be underestimated.

4. The Father's Strategy

The feminist may dismiss the father's good judgment as being 'the heavy hand of the oppressive Patriarchy', and by reverse judging his judgment, they might escape the immediate shame of disobedience, especially when society is accepting of such behavior, but they still fall under their own condemnation. Even when mothers manage to separate the children from the father, his memory will continue to inspire hope and confidence in the children's hearts. The father's influence is essential, and inescapable.

A daughter who has a good relationship with her father will take her conscience more seriously, and although she may or may not follow the father's directives to the full extent, she will nevertheless respect his wishes, and make some effort to honor them. If she steps out of line, she knows it, and she can return to it if she wishes. It is this boundary that the father creates, which gives the daughter a sense of security, self-esteem and dignity. A wise father knows that his word creates the Frame in which she lives, moves and breathes. If the father is lovingly involved in her life from early childhood, then his Frame forms the backbone of her psychological identity.

Frame is the name of the Game!

5. Discipline

Red Pilled men with daughters might find it easy to get swept away with their anxieties over the responsibilities and potential risks that nubile daughters present.

But men with daughters should not be viewing the future with the fear that their daughters will be swept away in a torrent of antagonistic reveling, or that they will not be able to cope with these evil times. Instead, fathers should have the mindset that their daughters will learn and grow in step with the challenges that the times present.

Choose to place hope in the next generation!

Thus, fathers should not be afraid of other Red Pilled men, but instead, should accept the real possibility that a Red Pilled young man, who is about 5-7 years older than your daughter, and who has shown that he's ready to settle down, would probably be a better husband to your daughter than a whimpering Blue Pill Betaboy. Embrace it as a positive development in your family legacy.

Quietly do the work of discipline, and rest in the calm assurance that your loving efforts will have the intended effects. May you fathers be rewarded according to your faith.

Let's take a look at what the scriptures have to say about discipline.

> Proverbs 22:6
>
> "Train up a child in the way he [she] should go, and when he [she] is old, he [she] will not depart from it."
> Hebrews 12:9-11
> "[9] Furthermore, we have had human fathers who corrected us, and we paid them respect. Shall we not much more readily be in subjection to the Father of spirits and live? [10] For they indeed for a few days chastened us as seemed best to them, but He for our profit, that we may be partakers of His holiness. [11] Now no chastening seems to be joyful for the present, but painful; nevertheless, afterward it yields the peaceable fruit of righteousness to those who have been trained by it."

From verse 9, it is evident that fathers can gain respect when they correct their children, even though it is implied that a father's discipline is not nearly as righteous as that of God's. (Based on my experience, I will posit that this can apply to wives as well.) Verse 11 affirms our experience, that children (and wives) will never be happily receptive to discipline, but that it is necessary for their own edification.

Disciplining a child is like pruning a fruit tree. Without discipline or pruning, the organism grows wild and tangled, and bears little fruit. But with regular discipline/pruning, the organism takes on a better form and bears more fruit. (See John 15:1-8)

As a Red Pilled father, your task of discipline is to…

1. Present a clear and consistent Frame of mind, within which her behaviors and other family affairs may be evaluated. It is never too early to start exercising discipline. As soon as children are able to walk and get into things, parents should be teaching them what is appropriate behavior. Do not indulge their selfish temper tantrums, but punish them instead. Get into the habit of calmly and patiently explaining the logic and reasoning behind your Frame, and keep repeating that message until they 'get it'. Daughters (and wives) bond to men when they submit to his frame. Chances are, your daughter will become attracted to a man who has a Frame similar to yours, whether she, or you, like it or not. So get your Frame in order, and broadcast it to your family. There are no laws against holding Frame, and there never will be. It's an inalienable right.
2. Exercise fair and purposeful judgment. Do not punish her in your anger. When exercising discipline, calmly talk the matter through with her first. Make sure she understands (1) what she is doing wrong, (2) how to do things right, and (3) why she is being disciplined. She doesn't need to agree to the discipline, of course, but if she doesn't clearly understand these things, then your discipline will only create resentment and rebellion in her. If she does understand, then you have given her a clear choice in the matter, and this tends to bring spiritual liberty and growth, no matter what she chooses.

3. Teach your daughter to respect and appreciate the man in her life, starting with the first and foremost – you! Any form of poor manners or disrespect should be shut down deftly at the first sign. If she learns to respect her father while growing up, then it will be all the easier for her to learn to respect her future husband. This one trait alone will do the most to ensure her transition into a blissful married life.
4. Be an imminent presence in her life. Attend her family-oriented social events. Introduce yourself to her friends. Even if she doesn't live with you, or see you very often, you can still establish the connection, and emphasize the fact that you are always a source of stalwart security, and that you're available to her at any time. Tell her that you are only a phone call away. Daughters need to know that they are not shut out of their father's life.
5. Don't make your home environment a stressful one which she would rather escape from. Instead, give her an alternative 'safe space' from the world – one with a healthy balance between clear rules and expectations, and warm love and support. Knowing how most fathers are, I should emphasize the former.
6. As much as possible, form solidarity with her mother with respect to rules. If she knows that whenever Dad says 'no', then she can always ask Mom for a 'second opinion', etc., then this dynamic will erode your authority, as well as her discipline and sense of security. It might help to explain this to her mother, and point out that her cooperation in this realm will be easiest and best for all involved.
7. Groom her for a groom – not for the seemingly inevitable sex education of 'college', 'finding herself', or for playing the field. Talk to your daughter from an early age about marriage and family. Educate her towards preparing herself accordingly. Most young women are drawn to this instinctively. Nurture that instinct, and don't neglect it.
8. Do what you can to surround your daughter with positive influences, such as happily married women, and daughters of happily married women. (Boxer discusses this important effect here.) Your opinion sets her frame. Don't hesitate to express your concerns about her possible peer choices of questionable influence.
9. Give her the 'Pink Pill'. Teach your daughter how men think, and what men want and need. Teach her to appreciate the benefits that masculinity can offer her (such as the Tinglies), and not to dismiss it as 'toxic'.
10. Be aware of your role as a father in shaping her self concept. Make sure she understands that her SMV is always greater than her MMV, and that she will have to make a tough choice about what she wants to do with her life – either to invest in her MMV and work towards building a family life, or else cash in on her SMV and live an independent lifestyle – and that she cannot do both. If she will choose the former, and show herself to be a 'wall', then help your daughter to assess her true SMV/MMV, and to identify guys on her same MMV tier to choose from. If she will choose the latter, and show herself to be a 'door', then make sure she understands the responsibilities and consequences of such a lifestyle, and that she will have more difficulties in love. (Song of Solomon 8:8-9)
11. Don't suffocate her with the rule of law. Let her grow to appreciate the real purpose of retaining her sexual purity until marriage. Emphasize that keeping her virginity (or not doing so, depending on her social background) is not to be done as a proof or signal of her virtue (or social acceptance), but as a conservation of her MMV bargaining power, and as a cumulative test of her competency as a faithful wife, and by extension, her eligibility for a preferred marriage, rather than a default 'settle'ment.
12. Destroy the superficial Alpha-Beta dichotomy in your daughter's hypergamous head by teaching her how to discern the differences between a Blue Ball Pill Beta Boy, a trustworthy Red Pill man, and a PUA ChadWick EdCad. Make sure she understands the pitfalls of choosing either the Smurf or the Chad, as well as the challenges involved with getting along with a worthy man.
13. Talk about all of the above. Don't just assume that she'll learn it by osmosis, or by going to Church. She is already being constantly pelted by feminist/sex propaganda from popular culture, TV, internet, Cosmopolitan, Redbook, Facebook and her peer group. Don't let these influences become the majority voice in her head. It helps to talk about these things frequently and in a casual manner. If you try to condense it all into one big serious 'talk' with her, it may have the opposite effect from that intended.

6. Beware of Virginity Pledges

At a token glance, the whole endeavor of the Virginity Pledge movements appears to be a wise, sound way to reinforce the importance of remaining sexually pure in a young girl's mind. But since its inception, we have found the opposite to be true. Here are several reasons why.

1. Taking a virginity pledge tends to set up the false notion that retaining one's virginity sums up the whole prerogative of what is required for one to be blessed. It does not. Making virginity the goal is like an athlete having the idea that he can win the decathlon merely by never smoking. It's necessary, but not sufficient. Fellow blogger, SFC Ton, can attest to this.
2. Saving one's virginity, especially when consciously done as a proof and/or signal of virtue, depends largely upon one's strength of willpower, and therefore bypasses the grace of God. It would be far better for a young woman to look forward to marriage in faith and hope, and guard her heart against any temptation that might disqualify her from reaching that goal.
3. Virginity pledges tend to go against the Lord's command not to make vows to God. Such vows weigh one down with additive 'responsibilities' that create additional psychological and spiritual burdens, and repress one's Liberty in Christ.
4. There is the possibility that making an inner vow may be an act of spiritual rebellion against the grace of God, which becomes a doorway to spiritual bondage. See here for a more in depth understanding of this phenomenon.
5. The shadow of the law magnifies temptation and revives the sinful nature. See Romans 7. Consequently, those who take virginity pledges will face greater temptations to forsake the commitment.
6. The emphasis on virginity plays right into Satan's false dichotomy by presupposing a restrictive rhetoric. See J.T's article, The Satanic Persuasion Formula, for a more detailed explanation.
7. Finally, statistically based studies have revealed that virginity pledges have little sticking power, and hardly any benefit. See the following sources for more information.

7. Conclusions

The Manosphere is pretty good about picking through a woman's characteristics to determine whether she might become a worthy wife or not, but we need to stop having a 'consumer' mindset about women, and start picking up the logistical slack in the supply chain. That is, we need to improve the 'wife factories' – homes in which such Godly women (future wives and mothers) are raised and molded.

I know that sounds like a tall bill in this day and age. I don't write these things to come down hard on fathers, and I don't pretend to know every father's circumstances. I'm just stating some things that should be obvious facts, because in these evil times, it's so easy to lose sight of what is 'normal', healthy and right. Namely that, if possible, we should try to achieve something better for our children. To do that, our Frame and conscientious discipline are the primary means which should serve us (and them) well.

In short, it is my plea for each man to do your part to create the world in which you and your loved ones wish to live. With the times as perverse as they are, this might require some men to become social revolutionary, hero figures in the lives of their sons and daughters. If you are called to this, I urge you to step up to this challenge and make your mark in your family legacy!

For Dad's who think they've got it together

Every father has the implied duty (to his progeny) to present his future son-in-law with an asset, rather than a burden to be gotten rid of. So basically, RP fathers should be trying to create young women who would fit the Manosphere's prescription of an ideal woman to wife. An abridged description of such a woman can be extrapolated from the posts listed below.

- Sigma Frame: How does a Woman Attract (and Keep) a Husband? (October 5, 2009)
- Sigma Frame: 16 Qualities of an Irresistible Woman (December 1, 2017)
- Christianity and Masculinity: Review of Vetting, Virgins, and New Information on Virginity Pledges (January 7, 2018).

For Dad's who are struggling

I believe you are the majority of my readers. My heart goes out to you. I've been there.

A word of consolation: Just because a father leads, doesn't mean that daughters will follow. However, if a father doesn't lead, then daughters are not likely to have any trustworthy male figure to follow. They are left to the vices of whatever woebegone figure might appear into their lives.

It should be noted that the mother unit plays a profoundly influential role in this. If the mother unit follows, then the children will be ten times more likely to follow. If the mother unit doesn't follow, then the house is divided, and the father will be fighting an uphill battle in the home.

If this is your problem (a rebellious wife), then don't let anyone put you to shame. Instead, assign shame where it belongs, and retain a sense of dignity in being a father. Don't give up hope! Keep praying for yourself, and your children, and let them know you love them.

For those men who are not (yet) fathers

It would help sober up the cad in each of us, if we viewed any potential lay, or p0rn figure, as another man's daughter, and as another man's future wife, and not just a piece of wet meat. I know it's hard, but it's a form of self-discipline worth pursuing.

To put some teeth into this idea, I'll just offer up the fact that it is not uncommon for many married men to get the idea of inflicting serious violence on their wife's past heartbreakers. But fortunately, most men do not act on these feelings.

Also, how would you feel about yourself if you were the father of the girl you're seeing? One day, you may also be a father. Remember, what comes around, goes around. You are building up a treasure (or punishment) for yourself that no man can take away, not even yourself.

[Eds. note: This advice may not apply to incels. My apologies. Go work on your Frame and Game for now, and once you get some momentum going, you can adjust yourself accordingly.]

Closing

Fathers, do not be dismayed. Carefully craft your Frame, and present it in a clear, calm manner. Keep your shoulder to the wheel, and carry on…

Take each day as it comes. Cherish the moments. Keep the faith.

Your daughter and future son-in-law will thank you one day, and they will cherish your memory forever.

The Pygmalion Project vs. Shared Enterprises

Jack · 2 February 2018 · Archived copy · Original

This article discusses the Rosenthal/Pygmalion/Golem Effects – the general habit of LTR partners to pick out the weaknesses and annoyances in the other, and demand that these aspects be changed, which only leads to an exacerbation of the perceived problems. Sharing an enterprise is illustrated as one way to upset and displace the Pygmalion interaction dynamic.

1. The Frustration of the Feelz

In today's culture, most people in a relationship rate the quality of their relationship by how they FEEL about the complementary partner in the relationship.

From the Feelz Perspective, the woman usually has the 'advantage', simply because women are more emotionally and relationally 'in-tune'. We often see women assuming a role of leadership based on her intuitions about things, which are mistakenly taken to be an infallible authority. In fact, this is a weakness that most all women have. Their basic needs for security and resources drive them to seek control.

However, the man is at a severe disadvantage if he accepts the woman's leadership, because by submitting to her, he proves himself unworthy of her respect and admirations. He also sets the relationship in motion towards disaster.

Men who take the feelz approach might fall into several categories.

1. The effeminate man who is known to attract women based on his emotional EQ and ease of communication.
2. The "Soy Boy" type of man who lacks frame and strength of mind, and is easily drawn into the woman's viewpoints.
3. The "nice guy" who mistakenly believes he can improve the relationship by catering to the woman's whims.

All these types of men prove themselves to be low SMV men, which women invariably grow tired of, after they exhaust the affirmation and resources that these men have to offer.

Yet, women tend to stick with such men (at least for a time), especially those women in their peak libido phase (mid 30's) who have hit the wall. These women don't seem to realize that it is not their choice of a man that is the source of their discontentment, but rather their own inability to achieve contentment in general. This discontentment formed in conjunction with their indulgences in non-sustainable, but thoroughly exhilarating sexual relations with fly-by-night jerkboys, and thereby losing their window of opportunity (in their early to mid 20's).

Next, we examine one of the primary control strategies that women attempt to use in order to satisfy their own feelz of discontentment.

2. The Rosenthal Effect → Pygmalion Project

→ The Golem Effect

The Rosenthal Effect is the phenomenon whereby higher expectations lead to an increase in performance. The dynamics of the Rosenthal Effect are illustrated in the folowing diagram.

The Rosenthal Effect, which is popularly known as the 'Self-Fulfilling Prophecy', has been shown to be widely effective in educational classrooms and business personnel management policies.

Rosenthal and Babad wrote in 1985,

> "When we expect certain behaviors of others, we are likely to act in ways that make the expected behavior more likely to occur."

However, many people, and especially women, have the misguided notion that the Rosenthal Effect also applies towards female to male relationships. It does not!

In the case where one partner presumes that the Rosenthal Effect will be helpful in improving their relationship, and makes efforts along these lines, then a different dynamic comes into play, which is called the Pygmalion Effect. The dynamics of the Pygmalion Effect are shown in the figure below.

The practice in which one, or both partners apply pressure on the other partner, in attempt to get them to CHANGE a behavior deemed undesirable, is called a Pygmalion Project, and this is one of the most common approaches towards 'improving' a relationship. Unfortunately, it is a misguided and vain devotion.

Why doesn't the Rosenthal Effect function in a similar manner within male-female relationships? There are several reasons.

1. The sub-loop of "'Expectancy' → 'Motivation' → 'Performance'" which is present in the person acting as the subordinate within the Rosenthal Effect, is missing in the Pygmalion Effect. In essence, the person presumed to be the 'subordinate' lacks sufficient motivation.
2. In a relationship, the male (subordinate) lacks this motivation to perform according to the female's (supervisor's) expectations because men have a natural, God-ordained proclivity not to be the subordinate, but to play the role of the supervisor instead.
3. The biological foundation for the males lack of motivation, in this case, arises from the male hormone, testosterone (T), which causes men to determine their own set of prerogatives, and be less motivated to conform to the expectations of others. Thus, higher T males tend to rise into leadership roles above other, lower T males. In the present case of the male-female relationship, the difference in T between men and women is much more pronounced than it is between males, and therefore, the man naturally gravitates towards assuming the role of the 'supervisor'.
4. The efficacy of the Rosenthal Effect requires a supervisor-subordinate structure of hierarchy, and depends on the subordinate being in the state of mind to learn and adjust himself to the expectations of the supervisor. In a male-female relationship, if the man assumes the role of the supervisor, then this may bring some success. However, if the woman assumes the role of the supervisor, and presumes that the man should take on the role of the subordinate, then this structure fails to match biology's (and God's) ordained structure of hierarchy, in which the man is the supervisor. Thus, it is doomed to fail.
5. In the Rosenthal Effect, the expected behaviors tend to be clearly defined, and positive in nature, or leaning towards improvement. Whereas, in the Pygmalion Effect, the expected behaviors tend to be negative, and focused on changing such behaviors in portent to an ambiguous purpose or outcome. (In such a case, the Pygmalion Effect is called the Golem Effect.)

6. Enacting a Pygmalion approach is an uphill battle, because it fails to accept the other person as they are, and puts the onus on the other for the motivation to enact the changes desired by the first. But this can only be received as a gesture of rejection. This tends to destroy whatever motivation might be initially present in the subordinate.
7. Only the conviction of the Holy Spirit and experiencing Gods grace can bring true and lasting change in a person. So if a person tries to initiate and manage change through the Pygmalion Effect, then it is an effort outside the grace of God. It takes a bit of faith to trust God to let go of one's impertinent demands, and show some love and patience to the other, while God takes over the task of renovating the other person for the better.

Towards an actual improvement of the relationship, people want and need to be accepted for who they are, farts, warts, quirks and all. Acceptance must always be offered as a gesture of genuine love, and it is only this love and acceptance that can hope to bring the changes that one desires in their partner.

But those who are spiritually immature don't understand how to let God work on their partner. So they often resort to the Pygmalion mindset, by raising their expectations, or by giving their partner the Wake Up Call.

Men typically don't have a positive response to the Golem Effect, because they have a sub-zero tolerance for drama. They either (1) tune out and tolerate her from a distance, (2) fold and submit to her will, or (3) they walk out the door.

[SF Axiom 4: It's very important to be generous concerning one's expectations of others. Otherwise, the Golem Effect kicks in.]

[SF Axiom 5: People, especially men, will not 'change' themselves simply because their partner demands and pressures them to do so. In fact, they tend to become more resistant to making that particular change.]

There is at least one other approach that would be infinitely more valuable towards improving and strengthening relationships…

3. Enthusiasm Towards Shared Enterprises Supersedes the Feelz and Frustrations

Many couples initially meet by participating in common activities, and this is the atmosphere that brings out people's true nature and personality, which is naturally attractive. But it is often the case that after a relationship has been established for some time, couples neglect to continue these shared endeavors.

If a couple can identify enterprises in which they both share certain goals, and negotiate an agreement about how to proceed towards those goals, then their interaction changes from a zero sum, to a positive sum game. Turning their eyes away from the 'problems' they see in the other, and looking at how to cooperate to meet those goals, can be a life granting transformative change in the relationship.

Under these circumstances, the inherent differences in each person's respective personality become supplementary strengths which counter the weaknesses in the other. In this regard, the appreciation of one person's strengths replaces the Pygmalion/Golem habit of shaming the other person's corresponding weakness.

Instead of focusing on their selfish selves, their frustrating relationship, and their state of emotional turmoil, they should turn their attentions outward, to see the world together.

A few shared activities which languishing couples may consider include the following.

- Talk/council other younger couples about how they can improve their relationship.
- Play a sport together – play tennis or shoot hoops at least once a week.
- Organize a social event with a group of friends – a party, picnic, camping trip or nature hike.
- Work together on tasks – cook a meal or clean house together, make a financial plan or a budget together. (This example is covered in the following Case Study.)

At its root, this approach takes the focus off of the 'other', and turns the focus towards the outside world. Also, the shared enterprise builds 'Closeness' and emphasizes 'Togetherness', which, as Eggerichs pointed out, score big points with women.

[SF Axiom 6: Motivation to change can often come when a person sees how a change can bring them more of what they want in life.]

4. An Illustrative Case Study – Cleaning House

To offer an example, early in our marriage, my wife had an emotional need to keep the house clean, but she has the brand of 'laziness' that is common to humanity, which rendered her unwilling to actually do all the difficult and time consuming work of cleaning that was necessary. As a man, I didn't really require an immaculate house to be happy, so she often said I was too dirty or messy, and that I made her job more difficult.

I could have insisted on continuing my old habits and tried to get her to stop nagging me, but this would have become the Pygmalion Project in action, as discussed above. That is, she would be nagging me to be more tidy, I would be nagging her to stop nagging, with each of us becoming more set in our ways with a growing ego investment causing us to be more resistant to change. Hence, the Golem Effect sets in.

So instead, I chose to stop letting her shame me for leaving socks on the floor, etc., and started to appreciate her desire for cleanliness as a positive trait which I didn't have.

To demonstrate that I had accepted the habit of cleaning house as a shared enterprise, I spearheaded an organized household cleaning effort once a week, for at least two hours. By doing so, I was able to play the 'Supervisor' role by exercising authority over what was to be cleaned, and how much time was spent in doing so. I was also able to get her help to clean things that she would never notice, like underneath the sink, or never clean on her own initiative, such as the oven.

If she ever complained about any accumulation of dirt, then I would just tell her we would clean it on Saturday, and that she should make a list of everything she wanted done.

This worked for us, because she wanted to have a cleaner house, but I did not want to be cleaning every day, and I didn't want to be nagged about it either.

We also got the bonus of having a lot of contentment and happy moments in working together in this way.

Also, I was not discontented by having a cleaner environment to enjoy.

Best of all, after a few months of this, she found a sense of internal happiness in cleaning house by herself, and she didn't nag me anywhere near as much as before.

I think it is also important to point out that she (the woman) needed me (the man) to lead the enterprise. This gave her a much needed sense of security, place, and purpose.

The only annoying thing is that she still sometimes talks like she's the boss of the house, or that I am her helper (i.e. imagining herself to be playing the role of 'Supervisor').

Yeah, whatever… I know I've already taken control of this situation, so I will allow her this small ego indulgence. After I get her attitude running smoothly, it will be less hassle for me.

5. Challenges in Implementation

Some particular challenges that may arise when a man encourages his woman (or vice versa) to participate in a shared enterprise, are listed as follows.

1. The lack of affirmation – If she has had a habit of receiving an ego affirmation by making herself feel better about her own inadequacies by pointing out the man's weaknesses, then this attitude of insecurity and ingratefulness will need to be addressed first. A little bit of Game (e.g. negging) is helpful towards this end.
2. Laziness – This is usually indicated when she expresses the idea that she is being 'used' as a helper or 'slave', or that the man 'owes' her something for her participation.
3. Apathy – This problem comes down to the choice of the enterprise.
4. A long history of poor interaction – This might require a lot more time, effort, and patience to correct the bad habits and attitudes within the relationship.

In Cases 2 and 3, it may be helpful to begin with an enterprise which motivates her internally, like renovating a living space, or helping her wash dishes, or cleaning house together (as described earlier). After she gets a taste of the joys and successes of cooperation, then you can suggest more objective types of goals, such as following a budget or hosting a party.

6. Conclusions

Couples should stop creating high standards to pressure false convictions which would prevent the other person from experiencing an internally motivated conviction and the saving grace of God. In other words, couples should stop trying to leverage the other person's avenues of conviction towards what is important only to one partner or the other, so that the Holy Spirit and conscience can invoke the spiritual conviction of what is truly important for that person's spiritual health in the eyes of God.

The reason that the sharing enterprises approach works, is because it takes one's eyes off of the difficulties and frustrations in their relationship, and puts the focus on a mutual goal. In doing so, both of their energies are applied towards constructive endeavors, and they naturally refrain from creating the drama which fuels stress and lowers the boom.

Coffee Shop Churchianity

Jack · 5 February 2018 · Archived copy · Original

This post describes coffee shops as an analogy of post-modern Churchianity.

Targeted Readership: All

There's been a lot of very serious posts lately, concerning masculine leadership, personal testimonies, the FISA dossier, the convergence of the Episcopal Church with 4th Wave Feminism, the destruction of SJW activism, MGTOW grievances, etc. Not saying there's anything wrong with seriousness, but I thought I'd offer some humor to lighten our load this week.

[Eds. disclaimer: This article is intended as a satire directed against the convergence of the church, AKA 'Churchianity' and the feminist-inflicted desperation of the common man. It is not an accurate depiction of a life of true faith in Jesus Christ. Some very religious conservatives may be offended at some of the content.]

Just for the record, I would identify as an Evangelical Mennonite, and yes, I enjoy hanging out and working on my laptop at family owned coffee shops.

The Analogy

The post-modern Christian church has become very similar to a coffee shop. The following citations from various sources contain descriptions of coffee shops. In these descriptions, I'll add the word Church behind each mention of 'café', 'coffee shop', 'coffee house', etc., along with other word substitutions relevant to the analogy, namely, 'coffee' is a metaphor of the gospel message (or sermon), and 'WiFi' is equivalent to an environmental presence, which might be the Holy Spirit in some churches, or in others more fully converged, it might be a tacit acceptance of cultural norms, fashions, or trends.

> "Coffee houses [Churches] have a long tradition in American society as a place where people could meet and discuss ideas or just enjoy each other's company. They were the Facebook of an earlier generation. But in the 1990s, their role (and number) expanded greatly. While some patrons still do socialize at their local cafés [churches], many [feminists and complementarians] do not, and use them as a third place — not quite home and not quite work, but with elements of both." [1]
> "Given the amenities of sockets [single women], good AC [a vibrant and comfortable, yet spiritually chilly, social atmosphere], a clean bathroom [a safe space to gripe and complain], and relatively stable Wi-Fi [either the Holy Spirit, or a tacit acceptance of cultural ideologies], it's easy to understand why one person can linger for five hours at the shop [church], even though the purchase is just a drink or a small snack [$5 bucks in the plate]… [But] A few people find the latter behavior a bit off-putting and even abusive. Does a coffee shop [church] really profit from 'overstaying customers'? Is there such a thing as 'overstaying' in the first place?" [3]
> "The store owners [churches] who need to make a profit, the customers who want a quiet place to study [socialize and virtue signal], the ones who like to spread out [hang out] and those who just plain want a seat for five minutes [!!!]. They all have different needs and perceptions." [1]
> "For students and professionals [i.e. lefties], coffee shops [churches] are the best option between a library and their bed." [3]
> "Make your purchase and the seat is yours — if you can find one. What you do with it and how long you sit there is pretty much your own business." [1]

> "I know it sounds like a worn-out publicity spiel. But when you think about it, it's quite true. With groups of students taking up several tables [pews], you'd think the coffee shop [church] would be charging them a little bit more, or prioritizing customers who order more than the small-sized servings. But Chuck says that's not the case for most of these establishments. 'What you would rather have as a coffee shop [church] are not big-time customers but regular customers. And that your coffee shop [church] is often full of people.' In this sense, a customer who spends P2,000 on one big order once every few months isn't as profitable as the average student who comes in and spends P150 at least thrice every week." [3]
> "It's also why coffee shops [churches] put a premium on the [worship] 'experience'. When you think about the coffee shop [church] you frequent the most, you can't honestly say you just go for the coffee [the gospel sermon]. 'That's the trend when selling anything these days: the experience [contemporary praise music, hosted by attractive and talented song leaders]. Coffee [the gospel sermon] is expensive [i.e. the blood of Christ] in these cafes [churches], whether run by a big chain or by an independent group, but you just don't pay for the coffee [sermon] anyway,' says Chuck. When it comes to smaller coffee operations [churches], on the other hand, they do limit your stay, it's just done covertly [!!!]. Chuck explains that this is why some shops [churches] have policies when it comes to Wi-Fi access [ibid.] such as [church] membership cards or against bringing in food [doctrine] from other establishments [denominations]. These rules change per shop [church], depending on the market they want to reach and the profit they want." [3]
> "This can lead to some spirited customer disagreements. Are you taking up one seat or four? How long can you hold a seat for another person? [Predestination or Free Will? Are female Pastors and h0m0sexuals permitted?] Employees [pastors, priests, deacons] are often asked to arbitrate these disputes. But there's usually little they can do but apologize and appeal to customers' better nature." [1]
> "So is this behavior fair for the business side of a coffee shop [church]? Is there a proper coffee cup to hours spent ratio [perceived religiosity] we must all secretly know [displaying 'virtue']? I asked Chuck Crisanto, businessman and former coffee shop owner. [He said,] 'For big coffee shops [churches], they have an open policy. That means you can go in, get a drink, and stay forever. These establishments have found that it's more profitable to have that community image, where everyone is welcome and free to stay.'" [3]
> "Chains [large denominations] have policies. Local shops [smaller churches] show a little more variation on what is and isn't acceptable customer behavior. But by and large, it's the customers themselves who set the boundaries in this ongoing cultural experiment." [1]

I know from experience that to get into good standing with any protestant denominational church, there are just four requirements.

1. Don't smoke, drink, cuss or chew, and don't associate with those who do!
2. Show up every time the church doors are open, without fail, for several months.
3. Give a tithe regularly. The amount doesn't matter very much.
4. Apply for church membership.

Even if a person only does the first two things on the list, then they'll be 'in like Prynne' in no time, and soon perceived by the whole congregation as being fine, upstanding members of the church. Everything else, including many specific beliefs (like feministic ideologies), are negotiable or tolerable. But why is propinquity such a powerful force?

> "Merely being physically present with other people – not interacting with them in any way – gave study participants a sense of security, the researchers found. It could be that even if people aren't directly communicating they are sending subtle cues to one another, Chou notes. But this 'mere presence effect' was evident only when participants were around people who seemed to share their social identity or belong to the same broad group." [2]

> "[The completion of a task / social conformity] depended on 'convergent thinking' [Heh, yeah!]: the ability to come up with the correct answer to a complex problem…. [These] tasks required a creative approach to problem solving, but they did not depend on 'divergent thinking': the ability to explore many possible solutions to a problem and to see connections between seemingly unrelated ideas… Our research suggests that we are best with convergent creativity when we are around other people, but it could be that divergent creativity requires seclusion… Many workplaces [churches], Chou notes, are already set up in ways that contribute to people's sense of security in the presence of others: open spaces without high barriers that interrupt lines of sight." [2]

"…open spaces without high barriers that interrupt lines of sight." This sounds just like a church sanctuary or a sports stadium, both of which are places of Group Flow (or mob mentality). Perhaps Group Flow could be a contributing factor towards the appeal of such places.

If a person clings to a divergent form of creativity (i.e. an individual experience of Flow) for too long, to the point of butting heads with the other fine, upstanding members who have more seniority in the church, then he'll soon be advised to 'visit' the 'other church' down the road, which has members who think in a more similar manner. Hence, the desire for Group Flow may possibly be the reason why Protestantism has split into thousands of denominations since the Reformation, and continues on quite happily.

It is important to have a habit of regular church attendance, to the point of becoming a regular church goer. But once this discipline has been established, I believe it may be in God's best interests for people to visit other churches from time to time. It broadens the knowledge of God, and teaches people other ways to worship and serve the Lord. It also enhances the formation of relationships with other believers. Perhaps most importantly, people would also face the challenge of learning to worship God as an individual.

In other words, don't spend all your money at one coffee shop [church] establishment. The more coffee you taste, the better you'll be able to discern what good coffee really is.

> "In both experiments, participants who were in the presence of others were more likely to solve the problems than those who were alone. Perhaps ironically, the sense of security we gain from being around others may push us out of our comfort zones, enabling us to take certain kinds of cognitive risks." [2]

I know from experience that regular church attendance does improve one's general sense of confidence and security. But if the church is a microcosm of beliefs that are strongly influenced by cults of personality among the leaders, this could grow into something grotesque.

> "A disgruntled San Francisco customer who bought a coffee, found out that the shop [church] didn't offer Wi-Fi [either the Holy Spirit or an acceptance of cultural ideologies] and demanded a refund. They didn't get the refund but instead sold the coffee to another customer, stormed out and presumably never came back again." [1]

That's exactly the kind of independent, self-seeking comfort zone that the church should be pushing people out of! Unfortunately, as mentioned earlier, most churches cater to the preferences of its members out of fear of 'offending' them and losing membership.

Selecting From the Menu

A while ago, an experiment was conducted in a coffee shop. The line of questioning went like this.

1. What is your favorite coffee? [65% of respondents said, "aromatic dark roast".]

2. When was the last time you had a cup of (the favorite coffee named in the previous response)? [Average response: 5 weeks]
3. What kind of coffee are you drinking now? Or… The last coffee you had was what kind of coffee? [45% of respondents had something with milk added.]

From Dark Brightness: Spoiled Rotten. (February 2, 2018)

> "You would think that there would be a great deal of cognitive dissonance, i.e. that they would struggle to reconcile the differences between their political [or coffee, or doctrinal] ideals and their way of life. Apparently, though, they are happy to play a game…"

I have observed that many so called 'worldly' people do conscribe to many of God's truths, and thereby avail of the blessings of His promises, while at the same time, they deny the Lordship of Christ with their minds and mouths.

On the other hand, there are many 'Christians' who profess Jesus as Lord and fill their minds with scriptures, yet their lives fail to conform to God's ordained order, thus causing them to miss out on the fruits of the spirit, and the tangible benefits of their faith.

So we see the same phenomenon occurring with both coffee, and religion. Not sure if this observation has any correlation to the political spectrum or not. I suspect that it does as well.

I don't believe that the majority of these people are consciously 'playing a game', although some of them could be. Ultimately, I believe that this phenomenon arises because people's minds are vainglorious (Ephesians 4:17), and blissfully unaware of what is really going on in their hearts and lives.

So what is the common denominator for all of this dissonance?

I think most of this happens at the meta-consciousness level, and it goes on as a little 'discussion' between each person's Ego, Superego, Animus and Id (if you can tolerate the Freudian constructs), with the Superego acting as the 'Barista of Beliefs'.

The typical 'discussion' with the self is something like this.

[Eds. note: Notice that true faith, and the logical, conscious mind, never come into the 'conversation'.]

Ego: This quiet desperation is killing me! I want a little Patriarchal structure in my life. What about social order and a devoted wife?

Id: No, I just want sex! Blonde… D-cup… Now!

Superego Barista: [Ignores Id] Well, there are only four flavors to choose from. Amish, Mennonite, and Eastern Orthodoxy have Jesus added, and if you don't like Jesus in your life, then there's Islam. You know, the Jesus flavor has lost its original recipe due to some trademark wars, and doesn't taste quite the same anymore. Actually most people are more concerned about their selfie images while holding the cup, rather than the health benefits. So considering that perspective, Orthodoxy appears medieval and monastic, and Mennonites are seen to be rural rednecks. As for the Amish, everyone loves the smooth tang of technology, so no one takes them seriously anymore. As a result, Islam is steadily growing in popularity, and has recently expanded their market share into western society. Believe it or not, even Liberals love Islam, and naïve single women especially!

Id: Amish sounds good! I hear the women are virgins!

Ego: [Ignores Id.] Hmmm…

Superego Barista: I understand. Well, now, if you can tolerate a matriarchal structure, then there are a lot of flavors to choose from. Roman Catholicism, and most of its Protestant offshoots, have a little matriarchy mixed in, with ‘Hail Mary’s’, female Pastors and Deaconesses, and all that.

Id: Are there any females in the missionary position?

Superego Barista: Baptists have many female missionaries, but they’re very imperialistic. Not what you’re thinking of. But if you’re one who’s into that old fetish of Calvinistic dualism combined with female leadership, the Presbyterian church can hook you up. If you prefer female leadership without the duality of Calvinism, then Nazarene is the way to go.

Society: No, that’s too old school these days. Nazarenes are tasteless, and Calvinists still accept masculinity, and that’s gone out of season.

Animus: Yeah! Where’s the party?

Superego Barista: If you’re looking for a rollicking good time, there’s the Assembly of God, Pentecostal, and the Four Square churches. You can talk in jibberish, do backflips and walk across the backs of the pews, but it’s all non-alcoholic, mind you.

Animus: A party without alcohol?

Ego: There ought to be some degree of formal refinement, ties and jackets maybe?

Superego Barista: I get you. Well, traditional Catholicism is very formal, the women are more decent than most, and… they’re obsessed with sex! Sounds like it might be right for you.

Id: Maybe so, but don’t they advocate sex within marriage, no contraceptives, and no cohabitation? I don’t know… Marriage is a disaster these days! It’s just too risky!

Ego: Yeah, and beside that, there’s always some news about the priests putting in the rough with boys. I have reservations…

Superego Barista: Let’s see… In fact, there’s a new strain of evangelical Protestantism that is following the seasonal trend. So if you’re really into highly selective breeding based on the feminine imperative, expertly blended with technology and wealth, then your nearest Protestant labeled church should be able to serve you a ready-to-go mixture of Feminist Churchianity. You can identify it by the generic label, ‘non-denominational’, because they’ll sell you anything you want, as long as it doesn’t contain Patriarchy and it’s not staunchly traditional. Because of its current popularity, and to improve the sales quotient, they’ve chosen a customer targeted marketing strategy. Money is the bottom line in business, you understand. So most of their products have watered down the Jesus ingredient, and totally eliminated Patriarchy from the menu. I have to warn you, this blend is soft on the palate and has pleasant tasting notes, but it has a very bitter finish. Most people like to add something sweet, like substance abuse, divorce fantasy or p0rn, just to take the edge off. Of course, those things are not on the label.

Animus: I hear non-denominational churches have interracial couples. I’d like to check that out!

Superego Barista: [Ignores Animus.] If you want to try the latest, then the cutting edge fashion flavor of the month is the Fourth Wave Feminist speedball, complete with nonspecific gender pronouns and a light caramelized topping of Jesus. It’s available at the D.C. Episcopalian synagogue, complete with alcoholic communion wine, served by a priest from a gilded brass chalice. It’s quite smooth, but a little dry.

Id: Dry is not good…

Superego Barista: [Ignores Id.] So, what’ll it be?

Ego: Gotta have Patriarchy, especially the devoted wife with the structured nuclear family flavor.

Animus: Wealth and affluence for me!

Id: Technology… to serve and protect!

Superego: Yeah, all that, and oh, don't forget the Jesus, because although it's bitter, it has a smooth aftertaste and adds complexity to the aroma. Besides, it's vexing to be worried about the hereafter.

Animus: We do have a restroom upstairs if it happens to hit you hard.

Society: Sorry… That particular blend was served briefly a long time ago, between 1947 and 1953, but from 1953 to 1959 we added Rock-and-Roll, amphetamines, wealth and individualistic liberty. Then in 1959, we added semiconductors, the pill, and modal jazz. Civil Rights and Feminism came in 1964, followed by the b100dy red cherry on top, Roe vs. Wade, in 1973. So the particular recipe you're asking for, was totally exterminated. It's not been served to the general public since 1955, and anyway, *you would never want to go back to that!

Manosphere: Say, you've got a promising career, and judging by your ring finger, you're pretty well hung. Would you care to try the latest craze, Hypergamy Pi Spice? I think it might work out well for you! You could have a soft harem, spin a few plates, and what not…

Superego: Ummm… No thanks. I'm short on Tingles today, and my Bitcoin has not yet matured, so I'll have to settle for an Americano.

Buddha: Come! Come to Asia, my son! Experience pleasures of Orient, where life easy and cheap! Filial Piety is Patriarchy! No Social Justice Warrior! Woman are young looking, thin, long hair, respectful… We love you long time! But must drink tea. No coffee!

Ego: No, I'm too Nationalistic for xenophilic exoticism, and too poor for tourism. Muh student loans… I'm stuck with the Americano Hershey squirts with the Jesus label.

Internet: OK, will that be with p0rn or without?

Animus: Give me some p0rn on the side, and if I really need it, I'll add it in while no one is looking.

Superego Barista: OK, but just remember that whenever you add p0rn, it will make the Jesus taste more bitter, and the Jesus might even precipitate out of the blend.

Id: Why do we need to hassle with the Jesus at all? In fact, give me a modern, legal pr0stitution, like Tinder and Craig's List, and how about some online gaming!

Animus: I'll settle for merryjuana, and some mild 0xycontin addiction!

Ego: Well, alright, but only from licensed, non-GMO providers please… and no fatties, Id! Now we won't need any Jesus at all!

Society: That's been our top seller for the last six years, I see you've been here before.

Local Church: I'll put a Jesus label on the side of the cup, so that you can avoid excess criticism and enjoy your special blend of self-idolatry in peace.

Animus: Great, everyone will think my 0xycontin high will be from the Jesus topping! Ha ha! Perfect for my selfie!

Society: No, leave the Jesus label off. We live in Californica. We don't care what you get your fixxx from. But if it's something pertaining to sexual deviancy, we might invite you to our business parties.

The Sex Robot Controversy

Noteworthy Quotations

Why are sex robots all female? It's because the ideal woman is a robot.

There are male sex robots – they're called 'ATM's'.

[If you are interested in] transgender accessories for sex dolls, you can buy a tranny dick insert for your female doll and turn it into a shemale. How progressive is that?

The explosion of sex toys has come mainly from women. The sex toy industry caters overwhelmingly to women. [The sex toy manufacturer has] 1 page [of advertisements] for male sex dolls, and 33 pages for female sex toys.

Women have been dehumanizing men for decades, and it's been accelerated by Feminism in recent years. Meanwhile, men have one small niche in the sex toy industry, and Feminists just can't stand it.

A man who has a sex doll is considered a creep, but a woman can have multiple dildos sticking out of every orifice at the same time, and guys are like, 'Ohh! That's so hot! Take my money!'

Men might seek in sex robots the same qualities they've been conditioned to seek in women: submissiveness, agreeableness, and passivity. But in Feminist's minds, a real woman should be the opposite. A real woman is a domeering, overbearing, disagreeable b!tch! I don't see why men would see something that does nothing at all to be an improvement over that.

Maybe if you tried being a little more agreeable and submissive, men might enjoy being around you. However, you don't need men, right? You've got your dildos and vibrators, but shame on men for wanting a sex toy for themselves!

The comment [in Forbes] that men are taught to objectify women is especially stupid, as it implies that, (a) women don't objectify themselves, which they absolutely do. You women like to walk topless or in skimpy underwear for your ret@rded slit walks, but then complain about men objectifying you. (b) Mens visual sexual attraction is a learned behavior, and isn't simply biology.

Spoiler alert: Men are attracted to women visually, meaning that if you get fat or old, they won't want to be around you, especially if you're a domineering, disagreeable old hag that hit the wall at full speed and then got dragged off into the woods by wild cats.

When you interact with an ATM, you want it to do what it's told the first time. You don't want the ATM to try to strike up a conversation with you about your day, let alone give you any push-back about what you do with your money. The ATM is there to perform its function, for lack of a better word, 'robotically'. Why would sex robots be any different? [Maybe it's] because you're a feminist, and you lament the fact that these sex robots might give men what you refuse to give them yourself?

> "The very idea of a sex robot is so intertwined with patriarchal domination, it's hard to imagine what the ideal sex robot for women would even look like. The most robot-like sex technologies that actually appeal to women don't try to emulate human partners."

In other words, women hate men so much that their ideal sex partners wouldn't even look the least bit human. You only need to look at the fact that most dildos are inhumanly colorful, accentuated with rabbit shaped clitoral stimulators, and other inhuman modifications to show that, for women, men are merely an assortment of parts for her pleasure and not even ideal ones at that.

Meanwhile, men aren't trying to break women down into their parts, and create a Frankenstein of vibrating flaps and folds for which to stimulate their penises. Men just want a woman who won't be a stupid, selfish b!tch. For that, men are labeled as sexist, their desire for love is patriarchal oppression, and their love for women as misogyny – the literal opposite of what it is.

> "Perhaps women prefer sexual relationships where both partners acknowledge each other's humanity."

Bull F*ck!ng Sh!t! Women have been dehumanizing and objectifying men for decades, and Feminists have been celebrating it every single step of the way.

You made your bed, now sleep in it… All alone… With your purple dildos and cats!

1. Introduction

Games are an enjoyable, emotionally healthy, and socially acceptable venue for establishing relationship dynamics and expressing one's personality. However, certain types of games are unhealthy, and even damaging. This post will consider both aspects.

Understanding game theory is an important foundation for playing any type of game, including, but not limited to social games, board games, war games, business marketing strategies, etc. Here, I should differentiate between PUA Game, and social games. PUA Games are only one genre of social games, which have the intent of creating a positive impression and building rapport with women targeted as a romantic interest. PUA Games are comparable to Machiavellian behaviors in women. That is, they both have the intention of creating an image that is attractive to the opposite sex, but which may or may not be deeply characteristic of the person's nature.

This article covers social games in general, which may be played with anyone, new acquaintances, and LTR partners as well. To express the differentiation, Game, with a capital G, will be used to indicate PUA Games, and social games will remain in lower case.

2. Women Love to Play Social Games

As you might have noticed, women love what men call 'drama'. Women love 'drama' because it is emotionally engaging, exciting, and fulfilling to their ego gratification. But men hate drama, because they want an efficient, reliable, smooth-running, no-nonsense performance in every area of their lives.

Even the best quality women sometimes create 'drama' by playing games. So, to some extent, playing games with women is important for their own sense of contentment and satisfaction within a relationship.

On the one hand, a woman who never engages in games is probably rigid, stodgy and dry. But very few women are so mature that they find it silly and childish to play games. In fact, people who are healthy and mature will engage in social games. But ironically, most women are so immature, that they depend on games to give their daily life meaning and excitement.

Since encountering a game-minded woman is such a common occurrence, a mature man, especially one seeking a relationship with a woman, should not allow himself to be intimidated by a woman's propensity for drama and games. A wise man should take it as a fact of life.

If a man chooses to have a woman in his life, then it's quite likely that he'll get pulled into this game stuff. So if you are in a relationship with such a woman, and if she insists on playing a game, then you'll have to play it too. Otherwise, if you don't, then you risk being relegated to her 'boring' list, with all of the associated presumptuousness, indignation, and disrespect.

Once you have accepted the burden challenge of engaging in her games, do not be surprised if you find that you have to get good enough to beat her at her own game, in order to garner respect, assert your authority, and maintain order in the relationship.

The great thing about playing games with a woman, is that there is seldom a downside. Even if she discovers that you're playing a game with her, it won't be the same as 'showing your hand' in a poker game. This is because the game itself tends to generate the Tingles, and her knowing what you're doing will not necessarily dampen the excitement. She will be delighted that you are interacting with her on the meta-level.

3. The Essence of Playing Games

Ideally, relationships and relationship games are an engagingly fun, challenging way to push us to know ourselves better and to become more mature. (Maturity is a very complex topic, and is unique to each individual.)

All games have a goal that is understood among the players. Most relationship games involve making implied requests, or 'bids', for the other person's time, attention, or some other investment.

Immature people do not like to accept bids. Instead, they want others to accept theirs without the expectation of reciprocation. Mature, responsible people are more accepting of bids, and more likely to return a bid.

One essential goal of making a bid is to get the other person to express an acknowledgment of your persona, and to do something more for you. If you can get the other person to do more for you, it has the psychological and emotional effect of making them justify their actions mentally, and thereby grow to feel more emotionally in tune with you. Basically, the more they do for you, the more they will love you. The trick is to make the highest bid that the person will accept without questioning the appropriateness of the bid, or the worthiness of their response. Bidding too high at once will cause self-consciousness, uneasiness, suspicion, and possibly resentment. They will begin to feel like they're doing more for you than what their emotional constitution might warrant as a natural expression of their love for you. At that point, the interaction becomes a burden, rather than a game. So a larger goal of making bids and playing games, is to drive up your bidding price.

In every social interaction, and especially in playing Games, the participants must understand a mutually agreed-upon principle; otherwise they would not comprehend how the game is to be played, nor would they have an inclination towards an appropriate response. Acceptance of the principles is necessary before participants can agree to play the game. This is an aspect that is worthy of attention in the beginning of a relationship, since it tends to reveal the basic thought patterns and deeper values within a person. If the participants are compelled or forced to play the game, then it is beneficial for all players to agree on some principles.

Concerning the open discussion of a game, women are different. Some women will admire you more if you show a cognitive awareness of the game, but other women might feel like you are overanalyzing it to the point of nerdishness. After a game has been concluded however, a discussion of the play interaction is less inappropriate. So it helps to recognize the level of awareness and maturity in one's counterpart.

Within certain types of games, it is imperative that you do not 'give away the game' by discussing the plays in excruciating detail, 'showing your hand', or talking about strategy in too much detail. It's more advantageous to allow her the pleasure of being surprised.

4. Considerations, Terms, and Definitions

Games can have several features, a few of the most common are listed here.

Number of Players: Each person who makes a choice in a game or who receives a payoff from the outcome of those choices, is a 'player'.

The goal: Every game must have a predetermined goal, which is almost always accompanied by certain rules of engagement. Usually, the goal is agreed upon by all players, and some games cannot be played skillfully unless this is condition is true.

Real vs. Perceived goals: A real goal, also called a 'payoff', is strongly related to a players purpose for playing the game. A perceived goal is a smaller move in the game, which is often related to a particular strategy. As an analogy, the real goal is the 'war', and the perceived goal is the 'battle'. For example, in the game of chess, a checkmate, which determines the end of the game, is both the real and perceived goal. If a player perceives that the goal is something else, such as taking all their opponents pieces, then the perceived goal may not necessarily lead to the real goal of winning. So it is important for a player to be aware of the difference between the two types of goals. There are a number of games in which the game involves keeping the real goal different, or at least seen to be different, from the perceived goal.

The purpose: The perceived purpose is the motivation that each player has to participate in the game. Some common purposes include playing for fun, for profit, for social control, for political control, etc. It should be noted that different people may have different purposes for participating in a game.

Real vs. Perceived purposes: A real purpose is strongly related to a players' goal (or 'payoff') for playing the game, and is often equal to the motivation that each player has to participate in the game. It should be noted that different people may have different purposes. Some common real purposes include playing for fun, for profit, for social control, for political control, to understand one's opponent, to deepen a relationship, etc. The perceived purpose is what a player believes his opponent's real purpose is, or what the other players believe the players real purpose is, which may be different from each players' real purpose. Sometimes it may be advantageous to conceal one's real purpose, or to purport a perceived purpose that is different from one's real purpose. It should be noted that a variance between the two purposes can be seen as deceitful in some games, but for other games, it is considered cunning.

Mastering a game: A person who can conceptualize and fulfill more than one purpose within a single game is considered to be a master of the game. Since the success of a LTR depends on both players attaining their respective purposes, it is vastly beneficial for the man to be a master, so that he can orchestrate a mutual fulfillment of both players purposes within a positive sum game.

Strategies per player: In a game, each player chooses from a set of possible actions, known as pure strategies. If the number of pure strategies is the same for all players, it is considered a 'fair game'.

Pure strategy: A pure strategy is a single strategy that a player settles into, and does not deviate from. In some games, clinging to pure strategy can be regarded as naïve, or amateur, whereas, for other games, it might be considered prudent to stick to a pure strategy which has been shown to yield the best chance of a payoff.

Number of pure strategy Nash equilibria: A Nash equilibrium is a set of strategies which represents the mutual best responses to the other strategies. In other words, if every player is playing their part of a Nash equilibrium, and all are receiving payoffs, then no player has an incentive to unilaterally change his or her strategy. Considering only situations where players play a single strategy without randomizing (a pure strategy) a game can have any number of Nash equilibria.

Sequential vs. simultaneous move game: A game is sequential if one player performs her/his actions after another player; otherwise, the game is a simultaneous move game.

Perfect information: A game has perfect information if it is a sequential game and every player knows the strategies chosen by the players who preceded them.

Symmetric vs. Asymmetric game: A symmetric game is a game where the payoffs for playing a particular strategy depend only on the other strategies employed, not on who is playing them. If the identities of the players can be changed without changing the payoff to the strategies, then a game is symmetric. In an asymmetric game, certain individuals have strategies or advantages that other players do not have.

5. Generalized Types of Social Games

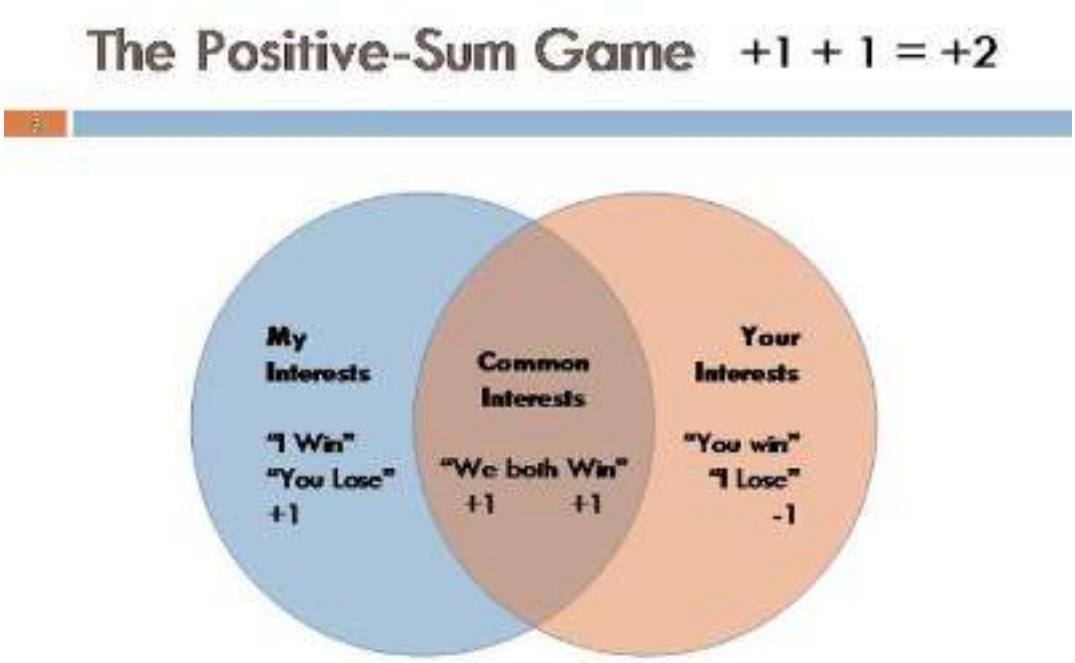
Constant sum: A game is constant sum if the sum of the payoffs to every player are the same for every single set of strategies. In these games one player gains if and only if another player loses. A constant sum game can be converted into a zero sum game by subtracting a fixed value from all payoffs, leaving their relative order unchanged.

Zero-Sum Game – Players interests are in direct conflict such that there is a winner and a loser. The zero-sum game is typically a game of chance, competition, skill, power, and dominance. Examples include card games, and competitive sports.

Women who play the zero-sum game in serious matters are typically deemed by marriage-minded men to be unworthy as a partner, and are thus avoided and rejected from LTR's, especially if she has an arrogant or presumptuous attitude in the matter.

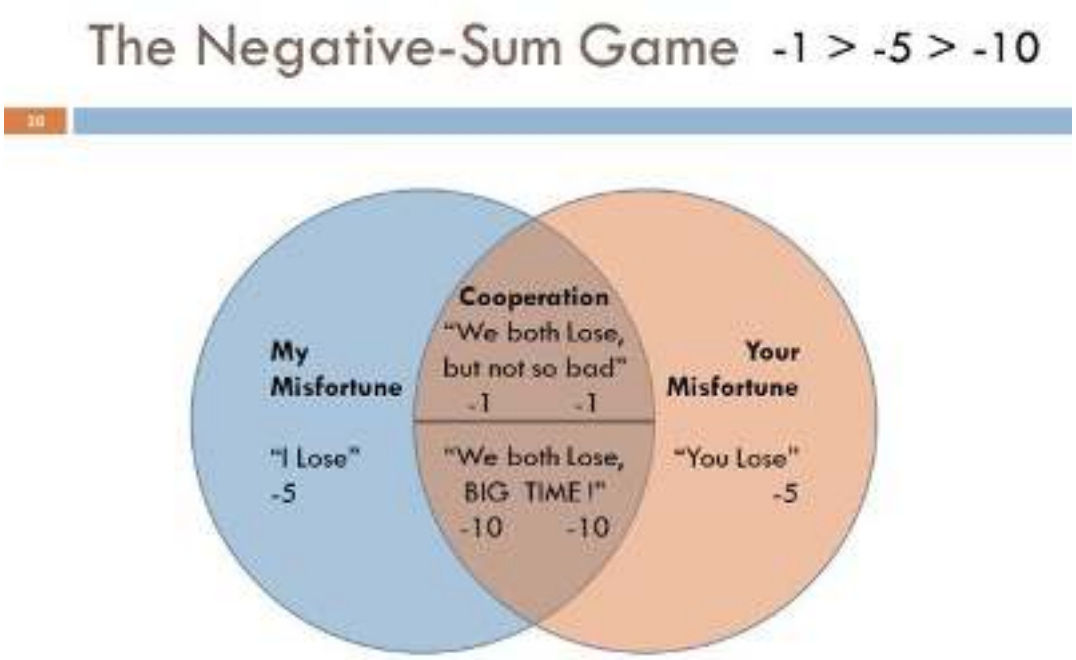
Positive-Sum Game – The interests of the players are not all in direct conflict. Thus, there are some outcomes which would benefit all players. The positive-sum game is a game of partnership. Examples include team sports and business transactions.

In a relationship, both people should have the mind to play a Positive-Sum game, which is of benefit to both partners. In a Positive-Sum Game, the partners should think in terms of "we", and "us", and seek mutually beneficial outcomes.



Negative-Sum Game – The interests of the players are not contingently opposed to each other, such that everyone could lose. The negative-sum game is a game of compromise, sacrifice, and perhaps trust, and the goal is for the mutual benefit of all who are involved. A well studied example of the Negative-Sum Game is the Prisoner's Dilemma.

The institution of marriage is inherently (and ideally) a Negative-Sum Game, which offers certain benefits that one would not encounter outside of a mutually fulfilling partnership, such as shared expenses, regular sexual engagement with a trustworthy partner, and the blessings of having a 'home base' and children. These benefits (are supposed to) offset the burdens and loneliness of being single.



6. The Fundamental Result – How the Game Plays Out

By carefully observing how she plays a game, you can learn a lot about her character, temperament, and strength of values. She also becomes more familiar with your Frame of mind, which is crucial for her to be able to trust and rely on you.

Ideally, a game should increase your joy and intimacy.

Once you start playing a game with her, there are four possible outcomes.

1. The game becomes the central focus of your daily interaction, and she expects it on a regular basis.
2. She will find the emotional connection and fulfillment she is looking for, and her interest in playing the game will fade away.
3. 1 happens for a long time, and then 2 happens.
4. She gets bored with the game, possibly because you never play (well), or you always win, or because she cannot find any gratification from it. She abandons this game and starts playing another. At worst, she dismisses you as an unworthy partner and starts playing this game with another man. (If this happens, don't sweat it too much. Just kick her out the door, chalk it up as a lesson learned, and move on.)

Depending on the game, and the constitution of your partner, you may have some measure of control over how the game plays out. If the game is positive, pleasant, and leads to greater joy and intimacy, then outcomes 1-3 are acceptable. If the game is negative, destructive, and/or troublesome, then you may like to orchestrate the better aspects of the fourth outcome, if possible.

But what if she loves playing the zero-sum game?

Some women have learned the zero-sum game from a meddlesome father or a cruel older brother while growing up in a competitive family environment. Some alpha-type men teach women to play zero-sum games for the sake of creating a humiliating one-upmanship drama in the relationship, which most women crave (e.g. Fifty Shades of Grey). If present, this is one aspect of a past relationship that becomes a major contributor towards the B!tch/Alpha Widow syndrome. If this dynamic is in play, a man would probably have to do the same to compete against those memories (at least for a time), and secure a fresh place in her heart.

If your girlfriend/wife has had a family or any ex-boyfriends like this, then you have three extra challenges:

1. Play her games, learn to like them, and learn to beat her at it (at least now and then). Show her that you're just as good as her father, brother, or ex badass boyfriend, and by doing so, establish your relevancy to her life.
2. Do the work of re-educating her to think constructively.
3. Face the possibility that her conditioned inclination to play the Zero-Sum Game may have become ingrained within her subconscious mind and personality, and is therefore not likely to change.

7. Your Choice to Play a Game

One fundamental part of playing a game, is to first figure out what the game is. Just like the saying goes,

> "A problem, once identified, is half solved."

Ideally, a game should increase your joy and intimacy. But not all games are inclined to this end. So it is important to first determine the nature of the game, and analyze whether the outcome is beneficial towards your relationship. This can be done as follows.

1. Analyze the purpose of the game she wants to play. There are basically two types of purposes for games, Positive and Negative. Positive Games are played for personal growth, challenge, fun, and excitement. Negative games are played to shame you, distance you, prove you wrong, and/or assert power and dominance, etc.
2. Decide whether this is a game you want to play. If you don't think playing the game will bring about a good outcome, you can always abstain from the game by 'playing dumb'. Playing dumb can actually be a good choice under certain circumstances, because it essentially dismisses her moves and discourages the continuance of such a game. After a long time of having no response to her game, she will give up trying to play this game, especially if her attention is displaced onto other games. In the best case scenario, she will give up her interest in playing negative games because she will feel that playing her game is stupid and childish. In the worst case, she will dismiss you as a stupid dumb-@ss, and possibly have an affair.

8. Tips for Playing the Game Well

1. Respect her moves in the game. Try to learn from her behaviors. Try to make all games a Positive-Sum.
2. Consider the possible benefits of congratulating her openly and pointing out how she did well. If she is sincere towards your relationship, then this warm acknowledgment tends to melt hearts and spread legs.
3. Recognize when you have lost. A simple statement like, "Awww! You got me again!" is sufficient. Let her savor the joy of victory every now and then, as this is something that will let her feel drawn to you, and emotionally secure when playing your games. Never whine and complain about losing (unless you can make her laugh by playacting that stance). Just move on.
4. Recognize your own mistakes to yourself. It isn't necessary for you to talk to her about it, and it might even be more beneficial if you don't. Simply take note and adjust your own game accordingly.
5. Be insistent on what you need. Don't forfeit your essential requirements for your own contentment in the relationship.
6. Don't make/allow constitutional things like love, affection, sex, money, to become pawns in the game. Doing so puts the game on a visceral level that tends to deprive the relationship of dignity and honor. However, if she has already chosen to do so, then she has upped the ante to the realm of dirty pool. In that case, you may have to bite the bullet, go hardcore, and play the same game, at a higher level of risk, or else, bow out of the relationship and look for someone else with a gentler heart. Some profoundly resourceful individuals may find other options, or swap this game out with another that is more positive.

9. Game Traps to Avoid

1. When you win a game, be careful not to appear excessively arrogant, or ride it on her for too long, or else she may lose the feeling of being loved and cherished. Some women may become indignant and resentful.
2. Be ready to swallow your pride. If she wins a game, be a graceful loser. If you cannot admit fault, apologize and say “I’m sorry” once in a while, then she may think you are too hard and insensitive.
3. Don’t make the mistake of presuming that her desire to play a game is a direct challenge to your masculinity or authority. If you do, she will think you are weak and insecure.
4. Be careful about insinuating that she has an unfair advantage over you. There tend to be no “unfair” moves in the game, except for extreme measures that would prove to be deal-breakers for the relationship, e.g. hiding money, having affairs, etc. Sometimes, and with certain women, pointing out how she is being unfair might motivate her to play more ‘honestly’. But other times, with certain women, she might think you cannot handle her, and that you are just making cowardly excuses.

10. Conclusions

- Life is not a zero-sum game.
- God is just, so the result depends on you.
- You might win when others win.
- You might lose when others lose.
- You don’t win anything when others lose.
- You don’t lose anything when others win.
- Try to enjoy the Game, and use it to your mutual
- Set your mind to gracefully build her up through graceful, competitive gamemanship.
- Your conduct in the game should elicit her respect.

The Matrix — Inspiration for the Red Pill

It is a good and necessary thing to take the Red Pill: to start seeing things as they really are, not as the delusional ruling ideology of a corrupted civilisation tells you they must be. But the Red Pill, in itself, is not a sufficient condition for true understanding.

Perhaps we can grasp this point by taking a second look at the iconic scene from The Matrix that inspired the 'Red Pill' metaphor.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=PKwq7b2i-vc
In this scene, Neo takes a red pill and wakes up from his simulated reality, to find himself in the real world: an ugly and dystopian future, ruled by intelligent machines, in which he has been serving all his life as one of countless human batteries in a huge electrical system called the Matrix. Weak from muscular atrophy, he is flushed out of the Matrix into an underground sewer, in which he flounders helplessly until a flying craft winches him out and takes him to safety. From this point, he is brought into the community of free humans, who teach him both the nature of the real world and how to act and fight within it.

It is interesting to consider how this scene might play out in a case of half-measures. What if Neo – or anyone else who chose the red pill – woke up from the Matrix and got flushed into the sewer, but no flying craft came to winch him out? Or what if he slipped away from his would-be rescuers, assuming that they were hostile machines coming to plug him back into the Matrix? Presumably he would have no choice but to continue floundering in the sewer, which is at least a small part of the real world; and perhaps he would come to identify the entirety of the 'real world' with the hostile citadel of the Matrix and the safe refuge of the sewer, rejecting everything else as an illusion of his old simulated reality. Needless to say, he would live an utterly miserable existence, and one that would be of no use whatsoever to the cause of human resistance against the machines.

Congrats, you're awake; now what?

The Halfway House of Horrors

Here we have a useful metaphor for the intellectual pathologies into which 'Red-Pillers' can sometimes fall, by refusing to go beyond a set of cramped halfway-houses on their personal quests for the truth. If taking the Red Pill on women means divesting oneself of illusions about female nature, then floundering in the sewer means allowing this disillusionment to fester into hatred instead of leading to cold equanimity. Similarly, if taking the Red Pill on politics means waking up to the reality of Jəwish power, then floundering in the sewer means focusing on this factor to the point of monomania and rejecting any reference to broader historical processes.

In this context, we can introduce the concept of the Naturalistic Fallacy – more correctly, but rather more awkwardly, known as the 'Appeal to Nature Fallacy'. If taking the Red Pill on human nature means knowing the truth about it and acting in that context, floundering in the sewer means making fallacious appeals to nature without reference to moral values.

The Naturalistic Fallacy argument has been coopted, misinterpreted, and abused

Now, perhaps a short disclaimer is in order: by making use of the 'Naturalistic Fallacy' concept, I do not endorse the views of classical liberals and other Blue-Pillers who routinely hurl it at the A1t-Right, usually after failing to controvert the hard facts backing up our worldview. Truths about human nature and society do have ramifications upon morality, and if the outrageously wrong liberal-progressive tradition could be preserved intact simply by separating the factual and moral realms, then the proponents of 'blank slates' and 'social contracts' would not have bothered spinning such elaborate webs of delusion stretching back at least as far as the Enlightenment.

That said, there is a reasonably clear difference between description and prescription here, which justifies the limited use of the term 'Naturalistic Fallacy'. We can see both truth and fallacy on display in this infamous video, in which Dr. Jordan Peterson is challenged to explain a reference to lobsters in his book.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=aMcjxSThD54&t=1556s

The Red Pill on human nature is dispensed when Dr. Peterson states that lobsters and humans share a common ancestor, that "lobsters exist in hierarchies", and that "the idea of hierarchy has absolutely nothing to do with socio-cultural construction". We then get a sharp whiff of the sewer, i.e. the Naturalistic Fallacy, when the witless goose interviewing him responds: "You're saying that we should organise our societies along the lines of the lobsters?"

Dr. Peterson, of course, declines to take the bait and jump from is to ought – but I only wish the same could be said of many people on the A1t-Right. It is true that almost no-one in our circles is channeling Ragnar Redbeard, flexing his sword-arm and grunting "Might is right!", in the present day – but that is largely because everyone has woken up to the fact that this is an individualist fantasy. Swap Redbeard's egoism for an emphasis on the collective, and many of us will happily accept the proposition that "nature is red in tooth and claw" – perhaps garlanded with a few neo-pagan fig-leaves, but otherwise stripped of moral accoutrements – would be sufficient not only to regulate our behaviour but also to rescue our people from doom.

"Natural" is commonly misinterpreted as Barbaric Individualism

One stock argument against this sort of thing is that all sorts of ideological constructs can be projected onto the facts about the natural world. A slightly more advanced one is that a yearning to 'return to nature' in the context of a late civilisation is a classic tell-tale sign of decadence, which resembles barbaric vigour only in the sense that senility resembles infanthood. But in the context of the A1t-Right and the Rightist tradition as a whole, the most important point to be made is that amorality and 'pure natural order' do not support our positions, and in many cases work against them.

Those who resort to the Naturalistic Fallacy are guilty of self-deception at best, and self-parody at worst. Both were true of Redbeard: pure 'might' lay not in his ideal of a strong and independent individual, but in the unreasoning mob stirred up by manipulative moralists, hence the fact that he had to write his screed under a pseudonym. The fact that he chose a Viking handle for this purpose only serves to highlight his distance from the Norse culture that produced stanzas like, "a noble name will never die… if good renown one gets".

'Natural order' isn't too orderly.

It is no different when we move from individualist fantasies to collectivist ones. A1t-Righters are preoccupied with blunt and unvarnished truth, and assume that a 'natural' society is one in which everyone shares that preoccupation – but it is bull$h!t that is socially adaptive, and always has been, which is why the truth-teller Machiavelli got nowhere as a man of political action and had to make his name as a writer. A1t-Righters expend time and effort arguing for dominance hierarchies because they are 'natural' – but it is wh!te men who have been thrust behind minorities and women in the dominance hierarchy of the modern West. The fact that wh!te men gained erstwhile status through strength, hard work and intelligence, while the minorities and women gain theirs through weakness, laziness and stupidity, is of no interest at all to pure amoral nature.

How Adopting the Naturalistic Fallacy leads to Pyrrhic Victory, and how to avoid this

When we turn to the dispossession of wh!tes and the means of inspiring our people to fight against it, many A1t-Righters look upon universal concepts like justice only as obstacles standing in the way. They think that 'ethnic genetic interests' (an extension of evolutionary kin altruism to the more distant kinship of the ethnic group) would motivate us to fight for our own side, if only our heads were not so addled with unnatural moral ideals. However, leaving aside the question of whether ethnic genetic interests have any scientific merit whatsoever, it is obvious that our enemies can render them politically impotent simply by making life difficult for our immediate family when we come out as dissenters and activists.

Perhaps you disagree with this. Perhaps you have better arguments, backed up by harder facts, for nature red in tooth and claw. However, in argument as in war, it is not enough to avoid defeat – one must also take care to avoid Pyrrhic victory. Whenever we employ the Naturalistic Fallacy, or rail against morality in Ragnar Redbeard style, we allow the progressives to take up the moral high ground and pose as the defenders of human ideals against biological reductionism. On this unfavourable ground, we lose in practice every time without exception, no matter how many facts we marshall to our side and no matter how many technical victories we score over our opponents.

Fortunately, self-correction on this point is very easy, for all we have to do is to go back to the Red Pill and further cleanse it of impurities. In clearer language, we must stay on the firm ground of is, without wandering into the realm of ought. Our argument should not be "humans ought to live in tribal in-groups and dominance hierarchies because they are natural", but "humans do live in tribal in-groups and dominance hierarchies, full stop."

Although this is a purely descriptive statement, it actually cuts the moral high ground out from under the progressives. If humans create tribal in-groups and dominance hierarchies by nature, then how can those humans who oppose this in theory be an exception to it in practice?

The Elitist Progressive hate for the “Deplorable” is, at its root, a rejection of the Natural Order.

Smokescreens and Gaslighting obscure the Powermongers of the New Order

One of the basic entry-level Red Pills, which turn zombie conservatives into real dissenters, is the realisation that the managerial and plutocratic elites of the West are not beholden to “misguided good intentions”. The importation and legal privileging of foreign immigrants, and the resulting loss of status for native citizens, increases the political and economic power of the elites at home and legitimises the projection of that power abroad. The ‘liberation’ of women from husbands and fathers is simultaneously their subjection to government and corporate power; and the destruction of female sexual morality advantages rich and high-status men, by essentially turning all women into price-tagged prostitutes. The privileging of ill-behaved, sexually degenerate, and unproductive people over everyone else also furthers elite power, as these people depend for their status on the ruling political coalition and support it with the greatest degree of loyalty.

This is not some sort of bug, created in the process of transposing pure progressive ideology to the realm of ordinary mortals; it is a feature, which gives rise to progressive ideology and is reinforced by it in turn. The anti-elitist worldview of progressivism, in which the common people are seen as the real drivers of history and their leaders reduced to secondary importance, is pure poison to the legitimacy of an elite that ‘leads from the front’ such as the old European aristocracy. But for an elite that denies its own status as an elite, pretends to be a cipher of the people, and relies upon anonymity and hypocrisy, this worldview is an elixir of invisibility. It lends credence to the fiction that the people are ruling (and thus exploiting, and dispossessing) themselves; and the effect of this mass gaslighting is seen every time people in the West say things like, “Our country is going mad.” It also directs academic study to the task of furnishing management science with information about ordinary people, while discussion of elites comes to be associated with low-status cranks.

Progressives are not nearly as far from this as they like to think.

Posture Posing and Preening among the Politically Correct in the New Intersectional Hierarchy signals allegiance to the New Order

By performing the verbal and social rituals known to the people as 'political correctness', the members of this elite imagine that they have transcended the natural human behaviours of dominance hierarchy and tribe formation, and thus legitimised their own possession of wealth and power. But these rituals are not just ineffectual; they themselves represent hierarchical and tribe-forming behaviour, marking off the beneficiaries of progressive education and acculturation from the lower-class wh!tes outside their coalition, just as the verbal and social rituals of the old aristocracy served to mark them off from the rest of the population and identify them as the ruling class. Although the progressives would like to think that the distinction is based on morality or enlightenment, in truth it has much to do with those old vulgar categories of wealth and power, albeit veiled by the typical elite behaviour of decorous counter-signaling. A positive attitude to multiculturalism and feminism is an oblique demonstration that you are the sort of high-status wh!te person who employs or mobilises immigrants, not the low-status sort who competes with them for jobs, and that your wife is a 'career woman' by choice and not a 'job lady' forced into work by the abolition of ~~family wages~~ sexist pay discrimination.

But while the idea of 'PC as the new RP' (i.e. Received Pronunciation) is one of those punchy little red pills that blows the mould off the brains of conservatives, the truth is that progressive hierarchical behaviour is far more pernicious. We might say that it is schizophrenic, in the sense that it can neither encompass the non-elite population nor leave it peacefully in a subordinate position. The constant proliferation of rituals and euphemisms that can hardly be kept up with by anyone outside the 'right' circles, as well as the increasing intolerance for any deviation from them, tends towards stratification and elitism; but the denial of elitism and the myth of universality demand that these rituals and euphemisms be imposed on the subordinate population as a moral imperative.

The result is that the same politically-correct rituals serve both as a means of status display for the ruling class that is concentrating its wealth and power, and as a weapon for aggressively humiliating the larger wh!te population that suffers from that concentration of wealth and power. Those outside the ruling power structure cannot be simply given their due and left alone. They are viewed as dangerous moral sub-humans, and must be converted to full and sincere progressivism, even though the roots of that doctrine in power and wealth differentiation makes this an impossible quest.

The New Tribal Religion of Humanistic Transnational Progressivism

All of this is curiously primitive, like a caste system reduced to Brahmins and untouchables. And the sheer volatility of it becomes even clearer when we move to the international stage, on which we see the tribe-forming behaviour of the Western ruling elite expressed as transnational progressivism. Again, we see the emptiness of progressive claims to have transcended the bigotries of the past: for example, a disproportionate element of the progressive ruling class is of Jəwish extraction, so it predictably expresses a deranged hatred of Russia. And again, we see innovation, but in the direction of a new primitivism: no country can be allowed the independence, grudging respect and sphere of influence that would be possible in an order of nations, for all must submit entirely to the progressive secular religion and the power structure behind it.

By associating their own cause with 'humanity', transnational progressives are not moving towards an enlightened future by transcending natural tribalism. To say so would be to focus only on the progressive elites and their non-wh!te political allies of the day, conveniently forgetting the populations that oppose or are opposed by this power coalition, and are thus logically relegated to 'enemies of humanity' or even 'anti-humanity'. What the transnational progressives are really doing is coming perilously close to resurrecting the most primitive form of tribalism: the distinction between humans and non-humans, reflected in tribal names like Suomi, Inuit, Magyar, Goths, and Alemanni, which all literally mean 'men' or 'humans'.

The difference, of course, is that a primitive tribe regarding its neighbours as subhumans has no potential to start a nuclear war. Things are quite different when progressive elites, reacting to a political defeat by the wh!te population in the United States, follow their natural tendency to lump 'deplorables' together and provoke a nuclear-armed state on the basis of a delusional projection of their own behaviour towards other nations. And this brings us to another dirty little secret of transnational progressivism. In the light of recent developments, it is probable that the Western elite's rejection of the nation-state was not caused by moral revulsion for its violent and imperialist will-to-power, but by the realisation that the nation-state could no longer serve as a vehicle for the Western elite's violent and imperialist will-to-power.

The world-conquering aggression of China.

As the proliferation of nuclear weapons among the main powers set conventional expansion at odds with national interests, and the population of the Third World coalesced into nation-states that could no longer be colonised as terra nullis, the persistence of the old nation-state order threatened a lasting outbreak of peace. As this state of affairs presented the elite with little opportunity for expanding its power, it is now being duly destabilised by transnational progressivism, which of course blames the resulting international volatility on a resurgence of reactionary fascist nationalism. In the present day, independent nation-states like Russia and China are constantly accused of scheming to conquer the world; but their conservative attempts to preserve limited spheres of influence contrast sharply with the worldwide aggression, economic imperialism and rent-a-mob subversion carried out by the progressive West.

Conclusions

But I am digressing too far. To return to my subject: it is only after all of the above points have been made clear, and the conformity of progressivism to natural dominance hierarchies and tribe formation exposed, that we should step out of the realm of is to do battle with our opponents in the realm of ought. This time, however, we will be equipped to win – not just because we are defending hierarchies and tribes of greater antiquity, and doing so with more honesty, but more importantly because we will have shifted the progressives onto the unfavourable moral ground.

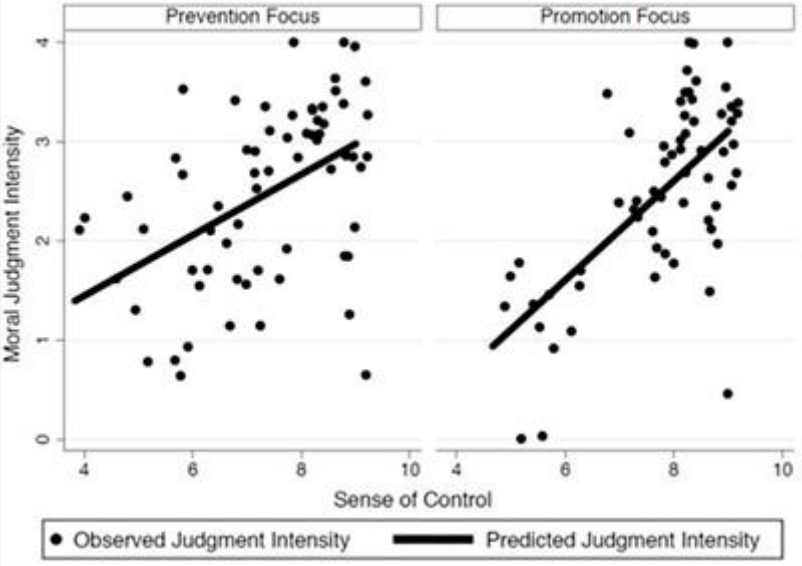

Image Source: James F. M. Cornwell, E. Tory Higgins, "Sense of Personal Control Intensifies Moral Judgments of Others' Actions", Frontiers in Psychology 4 (2019)

Just as arguing the case for nature red in tooth and claw can only produce defeat or Pyrrhic victory for us, arguing the case for the progressive elite as an elite can only produce defeat or Pyrrhic victory for our opponents. An ideal rhetorical strategy for us would be to proceed from is to ought in the way demonstrated; steer clear of all attempts to bog us down in prolonged skirmishes with protected classes like women, degenerates, and minorities (yes, even the Jəws); and keep pounding away at the focal point of the progressive elite until its advocates are forced to discredit it by defending it openly. At that point, we will have essentially won the rhetorical side of this metapolitical war.

However, in truth, what is required of us goes far beyond a shift in rhetoric. We need to understand that the A1t-Right is not the cause of brutish 'natural' immoralism, but the cause of truth and justice, and actually begin to act like it. It is true that progressivism is an evil cause swathed in nice and inoffensive words; thus, there may well be no contradiction in the fact that the just cause of the A1t-Right presently finds itself wrapped in harsh and vicious words. But we do not have forever to grow up. If we continue to fundamentally misunderstand the nature and destiny of our cause, our movement will fall into the hands of those who should properly be kept far from it, and its every accretion of power will corrupt it into a force that will only make the plight of Europe worse.

Disciplined, Submissive, Happy Wives

Jack · 15 February 2018 · Archived copy · Original

On November 15, 2017, I did a study of conflict structure, hoping to discover something that would improve marriages (namely my own). Since then, I have been experimenting with using this knowledge to enhance my relations with my wife. This post is a three-month progress report of my findings.

Targeted Readership: Men in LTR's

A Summary of the Study: Conflict Structure and Marital Satisfaction

The stereotypical conflict structure, in which the wife demands and the husband withdraws, is known to destroy marriages over time. However, the opposite structure, in which the husband demands and the wife submits, foments marital contentment over the long haul.

The word 'demand' in the study, does not mean to dictate hot, angry commands. It merely describes the conflict structure, in which the person who brings up an issue and asks for a change is labeled as the one who demands. The other person, according to the structure, is required to respond somehow, and withdrawing or submitting are the most common types of responses. In other words, one person is the initiator of the conflict, and the other person is the respondent.

Identification of the Problem

After completing this study and gleaning the takeaways, I realized that I had no direct control to stop my wife from initiating conflict (being dissatisfied, unhappy and making demands). However, I soon realized that I could initiate conflict (make demands) as well as she could. It seemed counterintuitive that my initiating conflict would reduce conflict, but I recognized the general perspective of the Manosphere, that truth concerning women and relationships is not intuitively evident to men, and I put my faith in the study (and in the Lord). I reasoned that if I made more demands than she did, then it would essentially shift the conflict structure towards the husband-demands/wife-submits structure, leading to more mutual satisfaction. So I started experimenting with this.

Experimental Procedure

I implemented this strategy as follows.

I would not make a demand whenever she had just made a demand, nor whenever she was upset or angry about something. I knew this would not lead to anything productive. Instead, whenever a few days had passed without any conflict, I would make it a point to raise some issue of contention. Whatever came to my mind that bothered me in the slightest, I would express this to her, and ask for her to make a change in response.

I also explained how her change would lead to an improvement, whether it might involve her health, her own happiness, her relationships with her friends or family, our finances, our home environment, our marital relationship, etc.

I was not harsh, and I did not get angry or raise my voice. I was in no way out of control. I spoke with a voice of legitimate male authority, which is generally cool, calm, and patient, yet firm. I stated what was bothering me in an objective manner, and why. I stuck to my frame of mind, and I was persistent in asking her to say something that showed me that she understood what I was saying.

The study indicated that whenever the man makes the demand, the interaction is much more intense and stressful than when the woman makes the demand, and so I had to prepare myself beforehand, whenever I planned to make a demand. I thought through my point and my reasoning, and how to express it in words. I imagined what might transpire, and thought through those issues as well.

Immediate Results

As might be expected, she always flew into a rage whenever I made a demand. She usually assumed that I was blaming her, and she attempted to shift the blame back onto me. She gave me a lot of hamsterized excuses and ad hominem types of insults, all done in an effort to defend her ego and retain the upper hand in the argument. But no matter what she said or did, I retained frame and continued to prod her, not for an agreement, but simply for an acknowledgment. I contented myself in thinking that I was the one making the demand, and that she was the one who had to respond. After her anger had passed, she folded and complied. She hardly ever apologized for her angry, rude behavior, and insulting words, but I took the view that it did not matter in the slightest.

Longitudinal Results

Over time, I did see that she was more happy and content, and made fewer demands on me. In short, it worked like a charm!

Since then, I have come to understand that when I impose a demand, I am also inviting her to engage with me, and by doing so, I am also imposing discipline on her behavior. She seems to accept this as an inherent element of the conflict, with the idea that changes must be made in order to resolve the conflict.

Conclusions

A lot of husbands and wives have the wussified idea that the husband is loving his wife by doing whatever she demands. However, it has amply been proven in the Manosphere that this belief is a fallacy. Being an obedient husband does not register as 'love' on the wife's radar. Instead, it conveys weakness, which women absolutely abhor.

But on the other hand, when I make a demand, then she must pull herself together to respond. Dealing with my demands pushes her to stop expecting me to change according to her whims, and to do some introspection instead. She must stop expecting me to make her happy, and must look within herself, and draw from her own emotional resources in order to maintain her own sense of balance and well-being. The comprehensive effect of this conflict structure is that it disciplines her to nurture her own inner sense of happiness. The byproduct of getting her into the habit of creating her own happiness, is that she realizes that she cannot expect or rely on others, i.e. her husband, to make her happy.

I was also happy to confirm another finding from the study, which is that my wife does not see my demandingness as being overbearing. Instead, she sees that I am adding balance to our interaction by contributing my viewpoints, instead of withdrawing, which really ticks her off. She interprets my demands as my taking an interest in developing our relationship. She also gets the satisfaction of knowing my mind about things. She does not express any positivity towards my demands, but it doesn't matter. Over the long run, she is haaappy!

It is my hope that married men who are struggling with a contentious wife might go through my earlier study, and take the initiative to make their own demands as they see fit. I trust that this approach will help your relationship, as it has mine.

Foundations of Cultural Ethics and Chivalry

Jack · 18 February 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Targeted Readership: All

I see a fundamental shift in cultural ethics taking place in western society, and it seems that many people are not very well aware of what is happening. So in response to this need, this post will kick off a series of articles discussing ethical systems and some relevant intricacies of ethical considerations and applications.

This essay is comprised of four parts.

1. Common Faith is the Foundation of a Culture
2. The Three Basic Systems of Cultural Ethics
3. An Abridged History of Chivalry
4. Conclusions

Common Faith is the Foundation of a Culture

All cultures, whether national, regional, or social, in the general sense, are built on a common faith in a shared ideal. The individuals within a culture share the faith in the presumed ideological system, and this is what creates a culture.

From a comprehensive view, a culture can be characterized through the following social conventions, upon which its members hold faith.

The Social Organization: Matriarchy, Patriarchy, and Egalitarianism – Does the culture cater to the dictates of the masculine, or does it appease the whims of the feminine?

The Predominant Religious Influences: Christianity, Islam, Buddhism, Hinduism, et al. – Religious values and teachings become engrained into the culture over time.

The System of Cultural Ethics – Three basic systems which will be discussed in the following section.

Other Characteristic Features: Chivalry, Filial Piety, Caste Systems, Apartheid, etc.

It should be noted that since all these features of a culture are taken on faith by their constituents, the intricacies and dynamics of each one often escape the conscious awareness of a typical person within a respective culture. As a result, it is difficult to discuss these topics, except in the abstract. Those who are well traveled will have a better perspicacity of the differences among cultures.

> "Travel is fatal to prejudice, bigotry, and narrow-mindedness, and many of our people need it sorely on these accounts. Broad, wholesome, charitable views of men and things cannot be acquired by vegetating in one little corner of the earth all one's lifetime." ~ Samuel L. Clemens, AKA Mark Twain

The Three Basic Systems of Cultural Ethics

Cultural anthropology has proposed three different variations of ethical standards observed by cultures around the world. The cultural and ethical theories surrounding these three archetypes have been largely adopted by world political strategists, diplomats, and evangelical missionaries, for the purpose of understanding and analyzing human behavior within societies, and communicating with individuals in foreign cultures.

These three systems are briefly described as follows, according to the noteworthy defining characteristics of each.

The Innocence/Righteousness vs. Guilt Culture (RvG), also referred to as a 'law and order' society, is an 'innocent until proven guilty' society in which control is maintained by creating societal rules, e.g. laws, regulations, standards, permits, etc., and continually reinforcing feelings of guilt and the expectation of punishment, either now, or in the afterlife, for certain condemned actions or behaviors. Ethics are imposed by the injunction, "You did something wrong (or bad)!"

The Honor vs. Shame Culture (HvS), also called a 'shame culture', 'feudal state', or 'revenge social dynamics', is a 'guilty until proven innocent' society in which the primary device for gaining control over children and maintaining social order is the inculcation of shame and the complementary threat of ostracism or rejection. Ethics are imposed by the implication of "There is something wrong (or bad) about you!"

The Power vs. Fear Culture (PvF), also known as 'martial law', 'dictatorships', 'climate of fear', 'fear mongering', 'bullying', and strangely, but not surprisingly, 'toxic branding', is an 'innocent if worthy' society in which brute force, structured authority, taboos, and superstition are used to incite fear and emotional bias. Control is maintained through the fear of loss, retribution or physical harm. Ethics are imposed through the motivations related to rewards and punishments.

[Eds. note: The concept of honour, as it is understood in the RvG system, pertains to an internal sense of honour, whereas, in the HvS system, it refers to an external appearance of honor. To dispel any confusion over the terminology, I will adopt the British spelling of honour for the former, and the American, honor, for the latter.]

The demographics for the proliferation of each system within several geographic regions is covered by Honor Shame: The Data on Global Culture Types (January 21, 2015). Please click on the link for some graphical illustrations showing the distribution of ethical systems around the world.

It should be noted that most cultures have a complex combination of the three types, but one type is usually more dominant than the others. To offer some examples, Muslims come from a very strong HvS patriarchal culture, and Africans from a very strong PvF matriarchal culture. Far east Asians have been the most diligent about preserving all three ethical systems within their patriarchal cultures.

[Eds. note: I disagree somewhat with the demographics reported on east Asians, and I suspect that the subjects in the study were Americans of east Asian descent. By my rough estimation (after having lived in Chinese culture for 13 years), east Asian culture is comprised of about 40% PvF, 30% HvS, 20% RvG, and 10% 'individual personality'. Furthermore, the relative dominance of each system is compartmentalized along different venues of life. For example, the PvF structure is dominant in business and politics, the HvS structure is dominant in education, family and social life, and the RvG system is important for one's sense of self-worth. The 'individual personality' is the moderating influence that each person must employ to adapt to, and 'juggle' the juxtaposition of the other three systems within one's life. Perhaps this information might help readers demystify the xenotypical stereotype of east Asian culture.]

Another point of interest is that different sub-societal groups may employ different ethical systems. For example, RvG societies, such as the United States, wisely employ structures of authority and power (PvF) within their militaries, because the motivating factors of the PvF system, especially destruction and death, are of greater, raw influence compared to the motivating factors of honor, social acceptance, innocence, reason, law and order, within the larger cultural infrastructure. Street gangs employ the PvF structure, and many criminals have the PvF mindset. Organized crime syndicates utilize the PvF structure, and add elements of the HvS system.

Hollywood movies depicting a mafia (e.g. The Godfather) emphasize the HvS structure for the sake of dramatic effect. In fact, within western movie repertoires, the 'good guys' are commonly identified by their adherence to the RvG structure, while the 'bad guys' are obviously indicated through their conformism to one or both of the other two systems.

The reader may be fascinated to discover that in other areas of the world, the 'good' and 'bad' guys conform to the opposite ethical systems. For example, in China, the 'good guys' are characterized by wealth, attractiveness, social popularity, and dignity to the point of arrogance (PvF), while the bad guys are guilt-ridden over their selfish wrongdoings, and obsessed with what are considered useless, abstract thoughts of religious superstitions (RvG). The Confucian ethic of Filial Piety focuses on bringing honor to one's family, and especially one's father (HvS), whereas any efforts made towards the ethic of maintaining one's own, individual righteousness (RvG) are seen to be merely self-centered, posture posing, if it does not bring honor to the family as well.

There is also an inherent hierarchy of these three structures with respect to societal goals. In terms of building a civilization, advancing economic growth, and improving the quality of life (i.e. civilized qualities), the RvG structure is the most conducive, while the PvF structure is the least.

In terms of sheer domination and control, preserving current status, caste systems, societal order, and wealth (or lack of the latter), the PvF structure is the most effective, while the RvG structure is virtually powerless.

The only power that the RvG system can exert over the PvF system is in resorting to the HvS tactic of dismissing it as uncultured and uncivilized, and rejecting it as destructive and inhuman. However, this can be quite effective.

The HvS structure is noteworthy for having the most influence over the social conduct of the individual, in which personal liberties and ambitions are either harnessed or sacrificed for the sake of obtaining solidarity and order within the family or larger social group.

An Abridged History of Chivalry

Elements of chivalry predated the Greeks and Romans of antiquity, and was heavily adopted and spread by the Romans, hence the term, 'romance'. However, Chivalry in modern times has come to be a social expression unique to western, RvG culture. I was curious to know how this came about.

It is believed that the early Catholic church stole chivalry from Teutonic tribes (???), and appropriated chivalry to create a class distinction, in order to consolidate power.

In Medieval times, the formal tenets of Chivalry originally espoused allegiance to the (Catholic) church, and over time, a modicum of several Biblical teachings were adopted under the purported aim of 'pleasing God'.

It is also believed that chivalry received considerable inspiration from Arabic culture, partly from northern Africa through Spain, and partly from European involvement in the Crusades.

The influences of the Catholic church, as well as the exposure to the HvS Arabic culture, presumably added the aspects of distinctive honor, glorified honour, and the sense of one's duty to community. It might be argued that the Catholic church employed PvF tactics to establish this social structure.

The dynamics of this development are not well known, since value systems tend to lie beneath the conscious awareness of human beings, and are thus omitted from reference in history. Historians must therefore study the context of writings to obtain clues about the ethical values of people living at that time.

However, it should be noted that the Christian faith, and the Christian church, existed independently of Chivalry for a few hundred years. Therefore, Christianity is not dependent on the Chivalry of its members, although I feel that both the Church and society are much better off when they include certain aspects of Chivalry, if only as a form of tradition. (If any of my readers can offer evidence to the contrary, please leave a comment with a sufficient explanation.)

In my own opinion, I have observed that in general, human beings have a natural appetite for excellence and magnificence. People within all three ethical structures, naturally aspire to the dignity, social esteem, wealth, luxuries and conveniences of the upper class, and even the bottom economic social classes have found a semblance of dignity in modeling 'high class' social etiquette. Thus, it is easy (for me) to conjecture how, over time, other ethical systems were denigrated as distinctions of the lower classes, and eventually eliminated from public consciousness (in the west) over a longer time frame.

I also believe this was easy to do within the patriarchal structure of the past. The GvR system naturally appeals to the individual man's sense of personal honour, and his need for respect. It appeals to a man's sense of honour because it puts the qualifications for a man's honour within his own sphere of control through his daily civil conduct, as opposed to the relatively difficult task of gaining honor within the HvS system by its dependency on a man's status, wealth, power, and on others in his family and community.

In addition, today's society poses fewer violent threats to life, limb, and property, than the common man faced in the past. In other words, it's super easy for a western man to be an hono(u)rable member of society. All he has to do is… nothing bad.

Conclusions

- Cultures are built on a shared faith in a common ideology, which takes the form of social conventions.
- Since cultures are built on faith, individual members of a culture often have little cognitive awareness of the common ideologies that their culture believes in.
- Cultures around the world display unique combinations of different social conventions, all having their own set of strengths and weaknesses.
- Westerners consider the HvS and PvF ethical systems to be evil systems according to RvG ethics, and thereby choose to reject them, and remain wholly ignorant of them.
- When different ethical systems are set against one another in a conflict, it is comparable to a 'paper, scissors, rock' game, depending on the issues involved.
- Historically, those cultures which have been built on the Righteousness vs. Guilt system have had a significantly greater advancements and achievements than those which have been founded on either of the other two systems.
- Chivalry predates antiquity.
- Chivalry is not necessarily or uniquely a Christian phenomenon.
- The Roman Catholic church was instrumental towards the integration of Patriarchy, Christianity, and Chivalry, within the RvG cultures in the west.

Nudity and Respect

This post offers a diversion from my current topic of cultural ethics, which will be resumed soon.

A Short Story Illustrating the Glory of Nudity (Literally!)

I once took a class in Architectural Drawing during my University days. One day when it was raining, and we couldn't go outside to draw buildings, the instructor announced that we would have a nude model come to pose for us. The mixed-gender class reacted with a lively, ruffled talk of surprise, mild agitation, and intrigue.

Many of us looked at each other with raised eyebrows and inquisitive glances. It was my first experience to draw nude models. My first thought was, "Hey! This is not architectural drawing!" My second thought was, "OMG! What is this going to be like?"

I expected that having a naked woman lounging in the classroom would be cheap and stupid. I wondered too, about how beautiful or ugly she might be. I also thought that, either way, it would be a very embarrassing experience for everyone in the coed class.

But I was in for a big surprise!

The model arrived a half hour later. When she started taking her clothes off, the entire class fell into a solemn hush. Soon, there were no words to be said.

As she poised her nude body on the block, nervous and visibly mortified, the whole room fell sublimely silent. The ambience of the entire studio instantly transcended into a timeless austerity. It felt like the whole room had been lifted from the earth, and hung in space.

No one made any abrupt sounds. No paper shuffling, no pencils dropping, no coughing, sniffling or sneezing. No one even breathed for the entire period!

During the next two and a half hours, we drew charcoal images of her loose hair, face and form in utter silence.

As I studied the details, I noticed that she was cold. Her nipples were erect, and she would shiver occasionally, yet her forehead glistened with sweat. I tried to capture an impression of the goosebumps on her arms in my work, but I found that capturing her suffering on paper challenged the limits of my artistic talent. It was deeply humbling.

There was no shame. There was a quiet reverence for her trust. There was respect for her vulnerability. There was a sense of honor to behold the splendor and structure of a human being created by God – a sight rarely seen among a sinful, shameful, cloth donning race of deceitful animals.

At noon, she rose from her comportment, stretched, and breathed deeply to relieve her fatigue. Then she dressed herself, gathered her effects, and departed, closing the door softly behind her. Not a soul stirred until she had been gone for a few minutes, and only then did the clanky, chattering environment of a college classroom slowly settle back into place.

I was wrong in my expectations. There was no shame, no lust, nothing disgraceful, sleazy, raunchy or ribald. It was an austere. somber, soul inspiring experience which made me wiser, more mature, more aware, and more confident.

Respect for Nudity

Respect is understood to be a proper response to expressions of power. Respect for nudity is based on the power expressed through the defenseless mortality of being human being transposed with the dignity and grace of being created in the image of God. Female nudity magnifies this power through the vulnerable nature of the feminine character, as well as the graceful curves and proportion of the female form.

Also, the vulnerability of a woman brings out something powerful in the heart of a man. It appeals to his best and noble instincts to protect and provide.

Without this power, respect is lost. This is why strippers attract lewd jeers and money being thrown at them, instead of claiming a place as hard on working members of society.

But in today's Feminist bent culture, the power of female vulnerability is denigrated as a weakness, and thereby lost. Nudity is thus demoted to a single expression of defiant sexual proclivity.

Furthermore, nudity has become so common, that no one truly appreciates the beauty, vulnerability, and poetic meaning of it anymore. As a result, images like this one are so mundane, that they are considered neither inspiring, nor profane.

Advertisers don't appreciate the value of nudity, because they debase and sell out the moral value by profusely using it to boost sales. At some point, it loses its humanity, while real humanity has been condemned and forgotten.

Guys who are addicted to pornography don't appreciate the beauty of nudity, because they judge the works on one point alone – the sexual stimulation they can obtain from the image.

Feminists don't appreciate the artistic effect of nudity either, because they want to tell the viewers what is beautiful and valuable, and then forcefully attach indelible moral significance to it, sometimes through shame tactics. This is propaganda, not art.

They have misused and abused the fact that art is a powerful expression because it is able to supersede the confines of morality. Instead of using the medium of art to encourage introspection and inspiration within the viewers, it is used to dispose of morality and the appreciation of life altogether. They want to argue that 'beauty is in the eye of the beholder', when beauty is in fact, not there, and when beauty does happen to be in the eye of the beholder, they label it as sexist objectification.

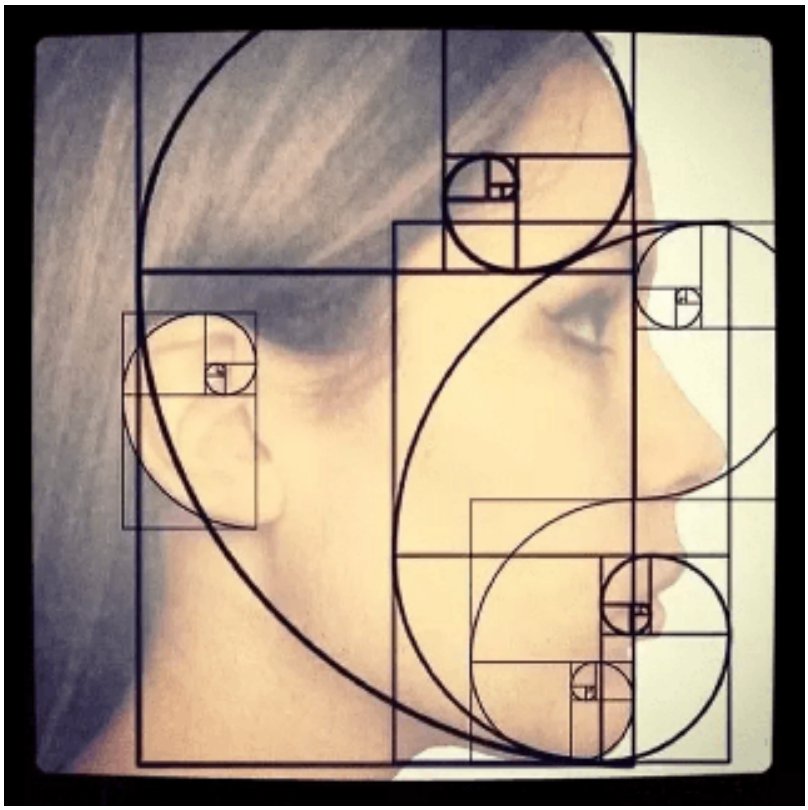
And it's not only men who prefer true beauty, it's all of creation. Little do Feminists realize, or care to admit, there is a complex science to beauty that Feminist ideologies cannot touch, including elements such as balance, proportion, depth, composition, color… For example, the image below reveals the elements of proportion in a woman's face, which is only one of the many aspects of beauty.



In other words, as Dalrock and Roosh have pointed out, Feminism is Ugly!

The meaning of the art is something else entirely. As Rollo pointed out in his post, No Prescriptions (February 12, 2018),

> "What these guys want is a meaning to that truth, but that's not the Red Pill. Meaning is what men will apply to > that truth according to their individual needs, situations and circumstances. This is why Peterson and probably some more personalities to follow him will be popular in the future; they prioritize meaning above truth. If you listen to the first podcast of Sam Harris and Jordan Peterson, they spend the entire time trying to come to an agreed measure of truth between the two of them so they can move on (in the second podcast) to [the question of] what is meaning."

The cultural interpretation of meaning is only one small aspect of art appreciation, and the meaning is largely dependent on the mindset and values of the viewer, and the effects of his or her present mood and state of mind.

Feminists are trying to rewrite the definition of art and beauty, in order to change the conclusions of the argument about the intended meaning. Could it be that they think they can eventually go one step further to enforce mind control on the population?

Unfortunately, a lot of people are buying this fake, forged artwork of brainwashing. They are foregoing the art for the sake of preserving the (false) argument about meaning.

Western culture needs to go back to school and take a class in art appreciation.

To further advance the point that art is fundamental to creation, humans are not the only organisms capable of art appreciation. Even certain animals have an appreciation for art, as well as physical aptitude and skill.

The elephant has both the ability and the appreciation of artistic expression, while the gorilla has the ability, but not the appreciation.

Now when the subject of the art is a human being, is it more appropriate to employ the elephant-type of artist, or the guerilla type?

Unfortunately, there is too much monkey business going on in the art and entertainment industry. Recently, the Harvey Weinstein scandal has brought to public attention all the lies, deception, and diddling that bechances potential fine artists on the casting couch. This has been going on for decades, and not only women, but #MenToo are affected.

Case Study 1: The 7-11 Model

Here is an example of artistic expression that broke the Asian internet in 2015 – a Taiwanese woman wearing only a plastic convenience store bag.

A Commentary on the Expression

The image on the left shows relaxation and openness through the exposure of the left underarm and wrist, while the downward gaze expresses submission, and the right hand covering the nether region indicates modesty, maybe even purity. At the same time, there is a bold openness shown by the rounded hips, indicating fertility and youth. All these express the power of vulnerability and the beauty of biological fruitfulness.

In the image on the right, her eyes tell the story of innocence and wonder giving way to feral curiosity. The finger on the lips speaks of secrecy and trust. The claw like form of her fingers pointing downward at her cleavage suggests an animalistic passion. The stiffness in her left arm purports tenseness and anxiety, which naturally accompanies secrecy and trust.

In short, the quality of photography here is definitely amateur, but the artistic merit is sublimely masterful. My only question is this, Is she sitting on a casting couch?

A Commentary on the Message

The artistic messages conveyed in these two images are prodigious. Every person will have many different and unique impressions of these photographs, and when this quality is present, we know we're looking at really good art.

It's hard to know where to begin, so I'll just offer a few of my own first impressions here.

- Our post modern age has replaced quality materials with plastic disposables.
- Minimalism has finally dispensed with excellence, and has crossed the threshold of propriety into mere functionality.
- A woman who is truly beautiful will appear attractive, no matter what she is wearing.
- The obvious – Asian women are petite enough to fit inside a plastic bag.
- Asian women are 'convenient' – easy, manageable, baggable, and economically thrifty.
- "Carry me home and _____ me!"

- An innuendo of the immediate 'throwaway' relationship or sexual experience, which simultaneously suggests a proliferation of opportunity – 'a land of milk and honey'.
- The combinatory effects of consumption and humanity, which could be extended into a myriad of interpretations.

And so on. These images bring forth a cornucopia of the heart, mind, society and the human experience. Like I said, that's really good art!

Now some of these messages might be interpreted as objectifying or misogynistic, but that is where we divulge into the argument of meaning. The reality of these presumptions would depend entirely upon the motivations and intentions of the viewer within his or her own fantasy world of imagination. In other words, the image itself is not debased, but it tends to draw out the inherent thoughts and nature of the observer, which may or may not be 'sexist', as some like to call it. But again, that is one of the effects of good artwork!

So now I've incriminated myself as 'sexist'. Great! I'm so thankful to be a real, Godly man!

Case Study 2: Aly Raisman in Sports Illustrated

Yoda brought this to my attention over at Spawny's Space.

Hot Air (feat. Karen Townsend): Empowerment Or Exploitation: Olympian Aly Raisman Poses Nude For SI Swimsuit Edition (February 17, 2018) [Emphasis mine.]

> "This month's highly anticipated annual swimsuit issue of Sports Illustrated features Olympic gold medalist Aly Raisman posing nude. The word "Fierce" and a sentence "Women Do Not Have To Be Modest To Be Respected" cover her side facing the camera. It's all about empowerment. Or something. The 23-year-old athlete participated in the "In Her Words" feature of this year's edition – a response to the #MeToo movement. Women were encouraged to write their own messages on their bodies."

Raisman filed a #MeToo complaint against one, Dr. Larry Nassar, and went public with her story about her sexual abuse, asking for help in the fight to support victims. Part of her 'activism' included raising money through the publication of this attention grabbing, nude photo of herself in Sports Illustrated.

A Commentary on the Expression

From an artistic viewpoint, the image conveys some conflicting representations, which in total, are rather confusing. The overall contradiction is figuratively illustrated in the way her fingers point to the left, while her toes point to the right. Usually, curled toes express a nubile sexual arousal, but here instead, I get the impression that the stiffness of her toes are obscenely equivalent to the middle finger.

But there is more contradiction evident.

Her body posture is decidedly closed, with the shoulder turned away from the camera, but her right knee is bent, and her left, inner thigh exposed, implying openness. Her left hand touching her chin expresses curiosity, coyness or innocence, and there is an ever so slight seductive pucker in her lips. However, her eyes and facial expression are cold and indifferent, and her left hand is completely hidden from view, indicating stealth or deception.

Overall, I would say that, if the inherent dissonance was the intended effect, then the arrangement would fit that purpose. However, if the incoherencies were not willfully intended by the artist, then the total composition of this piece (pardon the pun) is an amateur hodgepodge. Hence, the artists intentions are on yet another level of confusion.

So here we have the opposite of Case 1. The quality of photography is top rate, but the artistic merit is insipid.

A Commentary on the Message

After recalling my experiences in observing and drawing nude models who were in a very vulnerable state, both physically and emotionally, and who were simultaneously glorified beyond verbal description, the word ‘Fierce’ comes off as very insincere, and perhaps even as a snide mockery. Is this Raisman’s own message, or is it paid propaganda for Feminism? Because I feel that the person who chose to write this particular word on a nude, female model is sorely lacking in artistic sophistication, if it is not downright cruel and misogynistic. But I am sure that the p0rn and propaganda wearied public will not get that same impression. After all, it’s just another glossy print of flesh. Turn the page (or click on the arrow) for another.

> “Women Do Not Have To Be Modest To Be Respected”

Now here I agree. That’s right! If a woman wants to be respected, she has basically two options, and being modest is not among them.

1. Talk in a reasonable manner, and display mature, responsible behavior. (No degree is required.)
2. Disrobe and pose demurely in the nude before a silent, live audience.

Thank you Aly for attempting to demonstrate the solemn truth behind the second option on the pages of Sports Illustrated! But somehow, the full, glorified effect is lacking without a group of college students and professors present.

Conclusions

The most important points in this essay include the following.

- The expression and message of a work of art must blend together harmoniously.
- Both Red Pill Truth, and artistic merit, are separate from meaning.
- The implication of meaning depends on the observer, and NOT on the art itself.
- The power of femininity is a diatribe of beauty, vulnerability and fertility.
- When artwork involves human subjects, both the artist, and the subject, are complicit in the work.
- A healthy respect for both beauty and nudity has been utterly debased in our post modern culture.

- Like the gorilla, the Feminist movement has no artistic appreciation, but instead, attempts to change the definitions of natural beauty.
- Feminism co-opts artistic expression to force preselected meanings of morality and value judgments onto the observer.

Being the nature of art, I cannot give you any conclusions on this matter, and it would be disrespectful to you as a human being for me to assume an imposition of any sort of meaning over these things. That is something you must ponder on and decide for yourself within your own artistic appreciation. However, in addition to the insights concerning artistic merit, I can offer the following questions to help guide your analysis.

According to the power of vulnerability discussed earlier, and with respect to the three-fold relationship between the creative artist, the human subject, and the moral observer, are these images…

- 'Empowerment', or 'Exploitation'?
- Elephant art, or Guerilla art?
- Inspiring, or insipid?
- Convenient, or Despotic?

You decide.

Cultural Ethics, Patriarchy, Chivalry, and Christianity

Jack · 24 February 2018 · Archived copy · Original

This post is the second in a series of articles discussing ethical systems, as well as some relevant intricacies of ethical considerations and their applications.

Targeted Readership: All

Western society is currently experiencing a fundamental shift in cultural ethics, and this series is intended to increase awareness of ethical systems.

This essay is comprised of six parts.

1. Chivalry as an Expression of Patriarchy
2. The Righteousness vs. Guilt Ethical Code and Christianity
3. The Conflation of Chivalry, Christianity, and Western RvG Culture
4. The Confusion of Chivalry and Christianity
5. True Chivalry is an Expression of the Power of God
6. Conclusions

Note 1: For definitions and descriptions of the three ethical systems, (1) Innocence/Righteousness vs. Guilt (RvG), (2) Honor vs. Shame (HvS), and (3) Power vs. Fear (PvF), please read the first installment of this series, Foundations of Cultural Ethics and Chivalry (February 18, 2018).

Note 2: The concept of Honour, as it is understood in the RvG system, pertains to an internal sense of honour, whereas, in the HvS system, honor refers to an external appearance of social confirmation. To differentiate between the two ethical concepts, the British spelling of honour is adopted for the former, and the American, honor, for the latter.

1. Chivalry as an Expression of Patriarchy

As stated in the previous post, in modern times, Chivalry has come to be a social expression unique to western, RvG culture. Commenter SFC Ton summed up the origins of Chivalry as follows.

> "Chivalry was a way of establishing honorable actions for fighting men, and a way to determine which actions were the most respectable and why."

The concept of Chivalry, as it is known in the west today, appeals directly to a person's desire for the righteous glorification of one's own behavior and social impact, and secondly to one's sense of honor. Chivalry appeals to the ego, and thus, virtue signaling is a code of chivalry. Virtue signaling in itself may or may not be inherently virtuous, but the power of virtue signaling lies in the fact that it is a code of chivalry that can be extended as a form of communication within all three ethical systems.

The modern expression of chivalry has come to largely encompass a social etiquette in which men display respect for the vulnerability of a woman. It should be amply noted here that a woman's vulnerability naturally brings out something powerful in the heart of a man. It appeals to his best and noble instincts to protect and provide, and it also fulfills a man's ego driven need for a healthy expression of masculinity.

Probably for this same reason, Chivalry has become a highly prized social norm between males and females in many world cultures. I know from experience that the romantic aspect of Chivalry exists and thrives in Russia, China, Hong Kong and Taiwan (PvF), Japan, and Indonesia (HvS), which are all patriarchal cultures. (I've also been to Malaysia, but it is a very complex society, and I was only there for a short time, so I'm not sure how it would be categorized.) Chivalry is known, but not regularly expressed in the Philippines (RvG), which is a Catholic, Matriarchal society, which is unique in Asia.

However, Chivalry in the west (RvG) is becoming less and less revered since the advent of Feminism, which is essentially a shift towards Matriarchy. Part of the erosion of Chivalry is due to the supposed 'empowerment of women', an ideology concomitant with Feminism.

As western women have grown to be more independent of men, they have come to consider themselves more 'powerful', in the masculine sense of power. But in doing so, they have abandoned their real power in the feminine sense of beauty and vulnerability. Moreover, feminine vulnerability has even come to be scorned as a weakness, and as a consequence, the appropriateness and appreciation of chivalry, as well as its general practice, has fallen severely in its popularity. This phenomenon is further discussed in a post from Wintery Knight: Why Are Men Withdrawing from Traditional Male Roles as Providers and Mentors? (February 16, 2018).

There do exist some patriarchal, HvS cultures which display non-romantic elements of Chivalry, such as honor and self-sacrifice for the good of society, but these systems are not prone to being labeled 'Chivalrous', and instead, are called by their own names, such as Bushido, etc. As it is, only the RvG culture of the west now holds claim to the term 'Chivalry', and this is predominantly taken to mean the romantic sense of the word – a respect for the vulnerability of women.

In conclusion, it is clear that Chivalry, in the former warrior sense, and also in the current romantic sense, is a masculine construct uniquely identified with a patriarchal social organization. Chivalry is a response to the recognition of men's place within the hierarchy of society. For more information on this hierarchy within marriage, please see Snapper's post, Marriage Geometry (January 9, 2018).

2. The Righteousness vs. Guilt Ethical Code and Christianity

Christian doctrine strongly supports the social, ethical, and spiritual constructs of innocence, righteousness and guilt, within the RvG ethical system. However, historic Christianity not only involves the RvG ethical system, but also encompasses the HvS, and the PvF systems of ethics, and the relevant considerations can be found in both the Old and New Testaments (if one has the insight to recognize them). But the emphasis on the latter two ethical systems was severely eroded in the western hemisphere during the Dark Ages, and was almost completely lost upon the advent of Chivalry in the early Medieval period.

Over the past few centuries, the RvG ethic has become so foundational to the accepted social and philosophical ontology throughout western culture, that it goes unquestioned and unchallenged. Most westerners, and especially Americans, cannot even imagine any other ethical system, let alone the validity or application of such systems.

As a consequence, most westerners remain ignorant of the other ethical systems, even when confronted with potentially instructional social interactions with individuals heralding from foreign cultures in which these other systems are dominant.

In fact, the implications of the RvG ethical system have become so engrained within western cognitive processes, that it has even been amplified into a robust, dualistic philosophy of right or wrong, and holy versus evil. As a result, minute nuances of Christian doctrine have taken central stage in past decades, many of which are vainly philosophical in nature and are thus only wholly known to God, or otherwise, the more weighty points of contention are taken on faith, and can neither be proven nor disproven as fundamental Truth. These issues include topics such as the monergistic aspect of Calvinism, the importance of Baptism in salvation, predestination, transubstantiation, among many others. Most of these boil down to 'outward talk', while displacing and neglecting the 'inward walk' with Christ.

The overemphasis on the implications and importance of these theological discussions have resulted in the splitting of the protestant church into hundreds, if not thousands of denominations.

As a result of this imbalanced ethical approach, westerners, and especially western Christians, have been in the habit of 'straining out the gnats' of sin and righteousness for hundreds of years. Such people maintain a repugnant, pharisaical, 'holier than thou art' attitude, which is used to reject and shame those who are not considered 'righteous' by the current, arbitrary social standards. This is often expressed through implicitly arrogant, virtue signaling 'compassion' for the purported 'sinner' in question, which is accurately perceived as false judgment by nonbelievers and others in the world.

In the past, these qualities were mistakenly believed to be evidence of a person's 'faith' and 'sanctification'. More recently, people have begun to recognize the ugly, boorish, bigotry of this, and have shied away from giving this appearance. But the reality still stands, that real heart-felt compassion, and the duty to emulate Christ, as well as the heavy burdens of evangelism and ministry to one's neighbors, have been thrown into purgatory.

> Matthew 24:12 (NKJV)
> "And because lawlessness will abound, the love of many will grow cold."

Meanwhile, western Christians 'swallow the camels' of bringing shame to the Name of Christ, disgraced personal honor/honour, the widespread acceptance of a fractured church, and the sacrifice of both the power of a centralized church authority and the Power of God. All this has created fertile ground for the tares to be planted, ultimately resulting in the dreaded (or celebrated, by Blue Pillers) Churchianity!

3. The Conflation of Chivalry, Christianity and Western RvG Culture

While it's true that Chivalry and Christianity are cofactors of the current, western RvG system, they are not exclusive features of the same. Consider the following examples.

- There are cultures which are Chivalrous, but not predominantly Christian. China and Indonesia are Chivalrous in the romantic sense. Japan espouses Chivalry on a slightly larger scale.
- The early Christian church did not originally espouse Chivalry. This only came later (See previous post).
- There are cultures that are nominally Christian, but do not subscribe to the RvG ethical system. Russia, certain Balkan states, and other Slavic countries apply here.
- There are (or were) cultures which employed the RvG ethical system, but were not Christian. Ancient Greece and Rome are examples of this. (But in our modern age, admittedly, most RvG cultures identify as Christian.)
- Blue Pill Churchians in the postmodern, western world might qualify as an example of a RvG culture which is Chivalrous, but not Christian.

The RvG system and Chivalry both appear 'Christian' in the minds of westerners, simply because most westerners pompously reject all other cultures and ethical systems as being 'less civilized'. This presumption is based on only two (very conceited) points.

1. Non-RvG cultures, with the exception of Russia, have not been successful in developing a comparably strong civilization, which is (perhaps unfairly) judged only on the merits of military might, economy, and the contribution to science and history.
2. Non-Christian cultures lack a proper appreciation of humility and gratitude, which are considered weaknesses within the other two systems (HvS and PvF). For this reason, most westerners fail to appreciate the more favorable qualities of foreign cultures, and even go so far as to reject any opportunity to learn how those foreign cultures actually function. Thus, any nuances of Chivalry go largely unnoticed, due to the cultural differences.

So basically, Chivalry, and the RvG ethical system appears Christian because of a long standing association, and an expulsion of alternate ethical interpretations of Christian doctrine.

4. The Confusion of Chivalry and Christianity

In addition to the relations outlined in the previous section and the previous post, there is some doctrinal confusion which has caused Chivalry to be commonly associated with Christianity.

Case in point, the confluence of ideologies arises simply because the self-sacrificing nature of the medieval warrior type of chivalry just happens to agree with the Christian teaching summed up in Matthew 5:39 (NKJV).

> "But I tell you not to resist an evil person. But whoever slaps you on your right cheek, turn the other to him also."

This scripture invariably leads many to believe that it is 'God's will' for them to be generally 'submissive' in character, which is NOT what Christ means. Or alternately, they may believe it is 'God's will' for them to be chivalrous in the grander sense, but they erroneously interpret this to be expressed in the sense of clinging to honour, or simply being passively inspired and hopeful, or the romantic sense of respecting the vulnerability of women, or some such reasoning.

This is a false and destructive association. We know that there is no avail of the power of God in a wimpy compromise, or when men submit to women, nor does this corrupted archetype structure conform to the image of God proscribed in the scriptures. This is an inversion of God's ordained hierarchy, a deception which Satan seeks to establish within believers in order to weaken God's Kingdom.

There is a difference between (1) utilizing the power of God when conducting the spiritual warfare of Christianity, and (2) the graceful dispensation of kind, loving responsibility to those under one's charge, as expressed in Chivalry. Men should make themselves well aware of this distinction, and act accordingly.

5. True Chivalry is an Expression of the Power of God

The confusion and error about the value and appropriateness of Chivalry comes into play when individuals do not understand that the point of Christ's teaching in Matthew 5:39 is that one can draw on the power of God to induce conviction within the consciences of others.

> Matthew 22:29 (NKJV)
> "Jesus answered and said to them, "You are mistaken, not knowing the Scriptures nor the power of God."

Just as in Biblical times, people today have no knowledge of the power of God.

The power of God comes into effect when there is portrayed an obvious congruency between one's personal interests, and the interests of others, and it is crucial that this congruency is done in spite of the accepted or expected norm of political correctness, 'rights' or other self-interest. This is the element of 'Service' contained in Chivalry – serving others.

The effect of the power of God is that others experience discipline, love, comfort, security, encouragement, inspiration, and a corresponding increase in spiritual maturity and faith. It is this edification of faith which is the litmus test of the effort, and not the former attributes.

If one person conforms to the will of another, as described in Matthew 5:39, then it should be done with the purpose of expressing the grace of God, and not simply as a gesture of compliance for the sake of peace. In other words, acts of true Shivalry should be motivated by the focused purpose to edify others, and not merely done to signal virtue or 'niceness'.

To offer another pertinent example, the power of God also comes into effect when women display authentic vulnerability, which motivates men to rise and protect that same vulnerability. By the extension of this point, Feminists have clearly discarded the power of God.

The HvS system is most aware of the power of God in this respect, whereas, the RvG system emphasizes the holiness and grace of God. The PvF system emphasizes humility before the Glory of God. Hence, the Biblical phrase, ‘fearing God’, means to live humbly and reverently.

The self-sacrificial aspect of chivalry in a Christian context will work in RvG and some HvS environments, but this same approach is a display of submission and loyalty within the PvF system, and thus, it will be more difficult to draw on the power of God, and have the desired effect of softening the hearts of others, as intended.

As a further eisegesis to illustrate the appropriateness of chivalry within the context of the larger ethical system in society, the Israelites in the bible had to go to war against certain foes (e.g. the Hittites, Jebusites, and Philistines, of the Old Testament), while treating others (e.g. the Romans and Greeks of the New Testament) with grace and forbearance. I believe this is not simply a result of the introduction of the NT gospel. This is because the local, heathen tribes were given over to feudality (HvS) and bullying (PvF), while the Romans and Greeks were ‘romanticized’ by their cultures of reason, law and order (RvG), and much to their historical advantage. Thus, Chivalrous acts of self-sacrifice were appropriate in demonstrating the power of God to those in the civilized world, but would be a major faux pas in the uncivilized word.

We often see this same mistake when ‘enlightened’ westerners get the arrogant idea that they are the ‘Saviors’ who can ‘fix’ the problems characteristic of third-world countries, which are all HvS or PvF cultures. But it is impossible for a RvG culture to offer any long term solutions to a non RvG culture, without first introducing an RvG ethics system within that culture. Otherwise, those in power, and the real decision makers within that culture will merely misappropriate any material aid and assistance for their own purposes. With this in mind, it is obvious that missionaries are more effective (and cheaper) than soldiers, towards the advancement of civilization.

Currently, it is a common sight to see Blue Pilled White Knights offer expressions of false ‘Chivalry’ with the following characteristics.

- It is done primarily as a virtue signal.
- It is an egotistically driven affirmation of self-identity.
- It is done irrespective of the real vulnerability of the subject.
- It is a gesture of obeisance to humanity, or ‘woman worship’, as some have called it.
- It does not effectively edify others, but in fact, empowers an evil, inverted hierarchy.
- It is devoid of the power of God.

As such, I will argue that the common expressions of White Knightery are NOT true Chivalry at all, nor do they encompass any application of Christian doctrine, nor do they possess any authentic virtue.

6. Conclusions

The most poignant meat and potatoes of this installment are as follows.

- Chivalry is associated with a patriarchal system, and glorified within the RvG ethics system.
- Chivalry is an ethical response to the vulnerabilities of others, e.g. women, children, widows, the disabled, and the elderly.
- Chivalry appeals to men's better instincts.
- Christianity in the west has overemphasized the RvG ethical system, and has totally neglected the HvS and PvF systems.
- The preeminence of the RvG culture within Christianity has led to the division of the Church into denominations and factions associated with social politics.
- Chivalry, and western RvG culture are mistakenly believed to be synonymous with Christianity.
- Christian doctrine has been misinterpreted to support fake Chivalry.
- Chivalry can be used to express the power of God, but only within certain contexts.
- Blue Pilled White Knights commonly misappropriate Chivalry as a form of deference and virtue signaling, and this expression is devoid of the power of God.

The next post (Part 3) will further explore the implications of fake Chivalry and the presumptuousness of 'liberated' women, and how the misappropriation of Chivalry to other ethical structures has contributed to the downfall of the SMP within western society.

Even though I have argued that the various elements of culture, including Chivalry, Patriarchy, Christianity, and the RvG ethical system, are not essentially contiguous, the following post (Part 4) will argue that these four characteristics do indeed support one another, and blend together seamlessly. Furthermore, the gestalt phenomenon of this superposed effect is what has allowed western civilization to flourish for the past millennium.

How To Get A Better Response From Your Girl

Jack · 27 February 2018 · Archived copy · Original

This post describes how a man can demand more consideration and respect from a woman, and in doing so, receive positive, constructive responses from her.

Introduction

In a previous post, Introduction to Game Theory 101 (February 11, 2018), I covered an aspect of game play that involves making 'bids'. Bids cover any kind of statement or action which imply a request for the other person's consideration, time, attention, or some other investment.

To illustrate an example of making a bid, I could ask my wife, "Which tie should I wear today? The green one with the floral pattern, or the red, 'power' tie?" In this statement, I am making a bid for her thoughts and attention. Her response says a lot about the health of our relationship. She could ignore me (a very bad response), or she could simply say, "Red today" (mediocre), or… she could hold one of the ties up on me, and then the other, look me in the eye, smile, and say, "I think the red tie makes you look more handsome!" …and then give me a kiss (an awesome response).

In short, my question is not about getting her opinion, per se, but rather, it is an open invitation to her loving response.

The essential goal of making a bid is to get the other person to express an acknowledgment of your persona, and to interact with you in a way that expresses love and affirmation. If you can get the other person to do more for you, then it has the psychological and emotional effect of making them justify their actions mentally, and thereby grow to feel more emotionally in tune with you. Basically, the more they do for you, the more they will love you. So the larger goal of making bids and playing games, is to drive up your 'bidding price', which entails them making ever larger emotional investments in you and your relationship.

In another post, I covered a study of Conflict Structure and Marital Satisfaction (November 15, 2017), which is based on some findings from the research of Dr. John Gottman. The word 'demand' in the study, does not mean to dictate hot, angry commands. It merely describes the conflict structure, in which the person who brings up an issue and asks for a change is labeled as the one who demands. The other person, according to the structure, is required to respond somehow. In other words, one person is the initiator of the conflict, and the other person is the respondent.

One of the conclusions was that a husband should always be making more 'demands' on a wife, than the other way around, because when the husband does the majority of the demanding, it tends to result in a more positive and enjoyable relationship, over time. This effect was shown by Gottman to be true, and when I applied this technique to my own marriage, it had a similar, positive effect. My own experiment with this technique is covered in the post, Disciplined, Submissive, Happy Wives (February 15, 2018).

Recently, I put these two concepts together (making and responding to 'bids', and making 'demands'), and got the idea that I, as the husband, should 'demand' more positive and loving responses to my 'bids'.

Identification of the Problem

I noticed that I would frequently make a bid to my wife in the form of a statement or question, and my wife would often give me a very low key response. This typically took the form of her blithely going on about what she was doing at the time I made the statement, or making an unrelated comment out of her own mind, or changing the subject entirely.

She was not being overtly rude to me in doing so, but I did notice that she did not respond to my bid in the most positive, constructive, and loving way that I could imagine.

From my end, I have made a habit of responding positively to her bids on a regular, ongoing basis, because I know this is important to the health of our relationship, but I also knew that if I could push her to be more proactive in her responses to my own bids, then I could improve our relationship even further.

Experimental Procedure

Putting together the two concepts described in the introduction (i.e. 'bids' and 'demands'), I realized that I could 'demand' her to offer better responses to my 'bids'. (I call this game play, "pushing the line".)

The first thing I did was to explain to her that whenever I said something to her, I wanted her to first say something to me that showed that she had recognized and comprehended what I had just said. Then after she addressed my statement or question, and only then, could she continue with her own thoughts.

Perhaps it is important to note that I had this discussion with her when she was relaxed and in a very good mood.

I made this new 'rule' a central part of our interaction for a couple weeks to drive home the point that her responsiveness, and the quality of our communication, are both important to me.

After that, whenever I made a bid that received a lackluster response from her, I would point out that she had ignored what I said, or was not really paying attention to me, or had not really thought about my question. Then I asked her for a statement of acknowledgment before she continued. I never got angry or raised my voice. I simply stayed calm and politely asked her for a response.

Occasionally, I had to remind her that I had asked her not to ignore me. I very casually pointed out to her that it is rude for her not to respond to my statements, and I smiled and touched her tenderly whenever I brought this up.

I had a backup plan in case she ever became angry, indignant or arrogant after I requested her attention. To my wife's credit, I've only had to use it once (so far). The backup plan involved the application of the following three Game techniques.

1. Mirroring her expressions and behaviors, including the arrogance and irritation. This tends to create humility through mutual identification, and ironically, it also appeals to her need for emotional closeness, also because of the identification.
2. Agree and Amplify, with the purpose of making her immaturity and self-centeredness apparent to her.
3. Inserting sarcastic, but eloquent names in the discussion, such as, "Alright, Princess*…"*, "My Fair Lady*…"*, etc.

The last two techniques, when played together, formulate a very subtle, but effective, shame tactic. This pushes her awareness of the obvious incongruency between her disrespectful behavior and the proper feminine etiquette that would be a more appropriate response to the Chivalry she desires. This awareness motivates her to behave more like a mature lady.

Moreover, if she wishes to resort to the heavy-handed power moves of anger, rudeness and interruptions, then the backup plan demonstrates the following to her.

1. I can play that game too, but I can be more cold, rude, stonewalling, and heavy-handed than she can. Hence, I win the power play, so don't go there with me.
2. It becomes apparent that her self-defense mechanisms and her self-protective behaviors only move the relationship towards destruction, rather than the improvement thereof. Her becoming conscious of this fact motivates her to change her behavior, largely because of her emotional needs for security.
3. The unpleasantness of it all is an operant conditioning (i.e. positive punishment) which teaches her that rude behavior is met by negative consequences.

Results

I am happy to report that with the continued use of this approach (demanding better responses to my bids, AKA "pushing the line"), over time, she really became more thoughtful and understanding of me. She also became more relaxed and more positive in her discussions with me.

I think she got the idea that I honestly respected her thoughts, that I sincerely listened to her whenever she spoke, and that I was merely asking her to do the same for me. She was happy to do so, and I believe she took this as a progressive move, or a constructive change within our interactions.

My wife once got angry and responded negatively when I asked her to respond to my statements in a thoughtful and considerate manner. I am sure this is because she was already in a bad mood that day, and my request merely served as a trigger for her emotional outburst. Nevertheless, requiring her consideration in good times and bad, made the point that her sweet and kindhearted behavior is always expected of her, without failure, even when, and especially when, she is having a bad day.

By my setting down a hard boundary on this, she has become more comfortable, more emotionally secure, more happy, and less likely to resort to power games or sh!t tests. In fact, I have to say that expressly demanding positive responses to my bids has done the most towards correcting her bad attitude.

Beautiful young loving couple standing face to face and smiling while woman adjusts the necktie of her husband.

Conclusions

I learned that by asking her to overtly respond to my statements, or 'bids', I was drawing a healthy boundary between her thoughts and my own. This distinction tended to raise her awareness of my opinions, and increase her regard for my psychological needs. In turn, and over time, this also led to an improvement in the quality of her responses to my bids, as well as her general state of contentment and emotional security.

This agrees with a word of advice my father once told me,

> "You have a responsibility to teach others how you want to be treated."

In this experiment, I soon realized that I was not only requesting her to be more responsive to my bids, but I was also demonstrating my own self esteem, and demanding her respect. I also believe that she truly felt more respect for me when I did so. A previous post, The Love a Wife Desires, the Respect a Husband Needs (December 18, 2017), outlines the gravity and importance of the wife's respect for her husband in a marriage. Namely, the more a wife respects her husband, the easier it is for the husband to show love to the wife, and the happier the relationship becomes.

Because I have put my foot down on establishing a more civilized interaction between us, she has come to feel more loved, cherished, and respected. So I have also come to believe that this technique of making demands for better bids is one very effective way that a husband can express love to his wife, as well as attract more respect and appreciation for himself.

In other words, it improved the Love and Respect dynamic between us. I also expect that, as I continue these habits, her general level of maturity will advance.

It's all good!

[Eds. note (October 28, 2018): The title of this post was changed from “Pushing the Line”.]

All these things have come to pass, so Christ could come back at any time!

But does anyone really care? Since we live with these horrors, day in, and day out, we have become rather accustomed to them. In fact, we have grown to be psychologically insulated from them, if at all possible.

But that is not all! In addition to these horrors, consider these cofactors…

- Mass immigration is upsetting and displacing stable, traditional cultures… worldwide.
- Rape is rampant, not only in Africa, but also in Sweden, Britain, and Germany!
- The divorce rate among Christians is the same as in secular society, because Churchianity and Feminism are interdisciplinary studies.
- Rape, as well as Feminist ideologies, and unregulated hypergamy, leading to sexual promiscuity on a mass scale, are all spoiling young girls, such to make them unfit for marriage, and unable to achieve true happiness.
- Genetic contamination from widespread carousel riding and birth-control abortion.
- I will take an educated guess that a complex combination of biochemical factors, including the widespread use of growth hormones in beef and poultry, antibiotics, vaccinations, and birth control pills, are responsible for the rise in autism, aspergers, ADHD, and other such learning and behavioral disorders. (But if this connection could ever be scientifically proven, it would probably be censored.) [Update (May 6, 2018): I was right about vaccinations!]
- About 40% of all children are born out of wedlock these days.
- Of the 60% of those children born in wedlock, about 40 to 50% of them will experience the divorce of their parents.

- It has been estimated that between 4 to 30% of people (throughout time) are not truly aware of who their real father is, due to either rape, or their mother's (possibly secret) infidelity leading to an extra-marital pregnancy, or else, their father's death, disappearance, or being cut off from their children through a divorce kidnapping.
- In total, that means about 80% of all children will grow up in broken, deceptive, or dysfunctional families! And how many of those will know the love of Christ?

The present generation (Z's, iGen's, or Homelander's, whichever name you prefer), and the one that follows after, will really be hurting and hungry for genuine love and stability.

Good Lord, have pity on the next generations!

And, because of legally sanctioned, birth-control abortion, hundreds of millions of other children will never see the light of day, nor will they ever have a name to be written in the Book of Life. They will forever wander in hades, and curse this generation from the world beyond.

Combined with all the aforementioned horrors, this is a Biblical scale tribulation if there ever was one! Could it get any worse? Believe it or not, folks, we are now living in the tribulation!

To top it off, the last song that Tom Petty performed in concert before he died was "American Girl".

Our nation is crying out to God for mercy!

If this post scares the sh!t out of your @ss, then get down on your knees right now, and say this prayer to God.

> Dear heavenly Father,
> I forsake all hope in this evil world. I've had it all wrong. I can do nothing of everlasting significance to change either myself, or my life in this world. I need Your love and grace.
>
> Forgive me of my sins and self-centeredness, and lead me to repentance.
> I acknowledge You as my Lord and personal shepherd, and I dedicate my life to you.
> Remember me on the last day, I pray.

Moulding an Excellent Wife

Jack · 5 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

This is another great guest post contributed by J.T. Anderson from SavingEve.net, offering a follow-up, counter approach to his previous article, The Satanic Persuasion Formula (January 20, 2018). It covers how a husband can foster the spiritual growth of his wife by (1) recognizing false beliefs that result from common deception, and (2) employing the proper methods of presenting the truth, which counters and corrects those false beliefs.

Readership: Men in LTR's

Introduction

The Bible teaches that an excellent wife is an asset that is "more precious than rubies". (Proverbs 31:10)

But a woman is an asset to her husband only if she is properly moulded and led. The modern church does not teach men how to do this.

If a pastor exhorts men to lead their family at all, it will typically amount to encouraging the husband to lead a Bible reading and prayer time. While those are certainly noble habits to have, many husbands find their efforts yield disappointing results in terms of reforming their wives' behavior towards "all forms of excellence".

I believe the cause of this disappointment is twofold:

First, it is difficult to form the habit of leading a regular structured devotion time with the family. This is especially true when the husband comes home, tired from work, only to have to deal with more drama from the wife.

But, more importantly, I don't think the structured devotional model aligns well with the Biblical prescription: [Emphasis mine.]

> "Husbands, love your wives, just as Christ also loved the church and gave Himself up for her, so that He might sanctify her, having cleansed her by the washing of water with the word, that He might present to Himself the church in all her glory, having no spot or wrinkle or any such thing; but that she would be holy and blameless." ~ Ephesians 5:25-27

Notice that the focal point of the passage is not about indoctrinating her on the basic tenets of the faith. Rather, it is about removing her blemishes. It's more about what you take away than what you add.

A sculptor does not carve a beautiful statue simply throwing a bunch of pre-made pieces together and hoping it sticks. Rather, he starts with an unrefined stone and carefully decides where and how to chisel. His efforts must be precise and focused.

Likewise, a woman is not molded into a crown of glory simply by pushing her through a Bible reading plan. A skilled husband will carefully identify his wife's blemishes and gently chip away at them with the chisel of God's Word until she is made perfect.

In this post, I'm going to introduce a framework to help husbands change their wives' undesirable behaviors.

The premise behind the framework is that it is easier to help people change their behavior by changing the underlying belief that causes the behavior, rather than attempting to correct the behavior directly.

I am an online marketer (copywriter) by trade. One of the most useful skills I learned in my training was how to "get inside someone's head", and identify the desires and beliefs that make someone tick. I found that this training has proven to be tremendously helpful in assessing my wife and effectively applying the Scripture to practical problems.

Case Study: "Embrace the Life You Have"

Since beliefs are intangible, they can be difficult to detect to the untrained eye (or ear). So I'm going to lead with a case study so you can see what it looks like "in the wild", before we delve into the underlying theory.

I've chosen to analyze an article from Desiring God, by V. R. Risner, called, Embrace the Life You Have, (May 15, 2017). I chose this article because (1) it earned over 46K shares on social media, so it likely represents a common worldview of contemporary Christian women, and (2) it was written by a woman, so it makes a good case study for dissecting female logic.

So let's dive in… (you can open the article in a new tab if you want to follow along.)

The first thing I'm looking for is "self-sealing logic". These are any rationalizations designed to keep new ideas (e.g. the truth) out of her thinking. Self-sealing logic is the external clue that uncovers someone's internal belief structure.

First, she opens with an emotional story about how she can't do crafts anymore, due to her being diagnosed with post-polio syndrome. Since we're looking for self-sealing logic we're ignoring the emotional appeals for now.

Her first line of self-sealing logic is here: [Emphasis mine.]

> "As a friend helps me rummage through these old boxes, looking at paintbrushes and canvas, rubber stamps and colored paper, a deep sadness settles over me. I miss those things. But I know they are part of my past and I can't dwell on what can't be undone."

She is a disappointed dreamer. People who fail to achieve their dreams are faced with one of two unpleasant truths: (1) either they failed because of their own ineptitude, or (2) they pursued the wrong dream… which would mean they were foolish. Both of these attributions imply a low-status. She doesn't want admit to being low-status, so she must rationalize in order to protect her self from painful reality.

Now, if she was only talking about being crippled and unable to do crafts, it would be a harmless belief. But it's a setup for what comes next: [Emphasis mine.]

> "This grieving isn't particular to me. A few weeks ago, I spoke with three friends, all of whom were facing significant disappointment. One used to be an opera singer, but her vocal cords have changed and she can no longer sing as she once did. Another friend was looking forward to her youngest child going to school so that she could pursue the ministry she felt called to. But an unexpected pregnancy dramatically changed her plans and now her dreams feel beyond reach. The third friend has a special needs child and constantly wonders about her child's future. As well as her own."
> "Like my friends, all of us face disappointments. Our lives look vastly different than we imagined they would. People dream of certain careers and accomplishments, but family issues or unexpected events make careers take a backseat. Young lovers believe they will have the perfect family, yet somehow their family doesn't even resemble their vision."

Notice that "pregnancy" and "family" are contrasted (negatively) with "dreams" and "careers." She has provided a clue to the anti-biblical belief that needs to be exposed. Rather than acknowledge her spiritual sin, she closes herself off by saying "all of us face disappointments." True, but many who follow Christ live joyful lives. But misery loves company…

Since she has rejected reality, she needs a belief to fill the void. How should she respond? She continues: [Emphasis mine.]

> "This counsel from John Piper has been immeasurably helpful to me: 'Occasionally, weep deeply over the life you hoped would be. Grieve the losses. Then wash your face. Trust God. And embrace the life you have.'"

For a woman, "weeping deeply" is a sign of high status. It's a sign of being empathetic and emotionally "tuned in." Then she makes herself to be the hero of the narrative by bravely moving on with her life. Again, a high-status decision.

She continues on, making a few more rationalizations that reinforce the above points. But the bottom line is this:

This woman values visible success more than family.

She believes that, like herself, everyone else who has pursued success has also been "disappointed." Because to believe that the problem was with her would be too painful. By believing that living a disappointing life is just "the way it is" she protects her status. She is the hero who bravely perseveres.

But this belief is not working out well for her. She has both a low status by worldly standards (she failed to achieve her dream lifestyle), and she has a low status by Kingdom standards (she favors career over children.)

Notice how her motive for status was NOT the point she was making. She might even be unaware of it. Addressing a woman point-by-point is a sucker's game. You have to read between the lines.

Her fundamental need is status. This is not unhealthy in and of itself. But she is seeking it in the wrong way. Her need for status needs to be directed towards becoming a "wife of excellence."

Now there is a small chance I could be wrong. This is a judgment based on a single impression. But, as you'll see below, you do not have to be correct 100% of the time to effectively expose the heart. You only have to draw attention to the issue that most likely needs to be discussed.

If this woman were my wife, I would do a reading and explanation of a passage like Luke 8:14: [Emphasis mine.]

> "The seed which fell among the thorns, these are the ones who have heard, and as they go on their way they are choked with worries and riches and pleasures of this life, and bring no fruit to maturity."

Then, since status is her concern, I might contrast that passage with the image in Matthew 5:16:

> "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works and glorify your Father in heaven."

Then I'd go through the remainder of the Sermon on the Mount to show examples of what it means to let our light shine. Then we'd reach the conclusion where Jesus says to build your house (i.e. your family) on the rock. This is what success means in God's kingdom.

(Note that I did NOT choose any passages about the domestic duties of wives. Managing the home is simply the tangible manifestation of a belief. It is useless to teach on this subject unless the underlying belief is there to support the behavior. Once she believes, she'll ask "how do I respond?" At that point, I'll know that it is appropriate to move on to other details concerning domestic management and child rearing.)

After exposing her to this passage, I would then reinforce the truth in everyday experiences. I'd say things like, "that corporation won't be there in eternity." "Little things like this is how we build our house on the rock." "What are you going to do with those paychecks in God's kingdom?"

I'd just repeat those reinforcements until it becomes clear that her beliefs have changed. I'll know her beliefs have changed when she either changes her behavior on her own, or she asks me for advice on what to do.

So now that you've seen an example, let's get into the framework of how to do it.

Phase 1: How to Read a Woman (The Analysis)

When analyzing someone's belief structure, there is a series of questions I ask. I do this before I even begin the conversation. This is the "hard work" part, but it makes everything else fall into place.

Here are the questions with explanations. (It's a lot to cover but I'll summarize everything at the end.)

Where is she using self-sealing logic?

Pay attention to her rationalizations. These rationalizations tend to fall into one of four categories:

1. "I don't want that!" (devaluing the alternative)
2. "I'm fine!" (denying the problem)
3. "I can't!"(victim thinking)
4. "But what about [excuse]?" (avoiding the first step)

All of this is self-sealing logic. It's designed to protect the status quo and keep new ideas out. It provides the clue to what she truly believes.

What's wrong with the logic?

Next, I try to find the underlying problem that her rationalization is hiding.

In the West, we live in a guilt-based culture. This means that we primarily use our logic to hide or exaggerate our guilt. I find this "guilty logic" tends to fall into at least one of three categories:

1. Hidden Guilt – logic that is used to distract oneself from a sin (such as the case above)
2. Ambiguous Guilt – imagined guilt that results from an imprecise understanding of a sin (e.g. equating sexual desire with lust and adultery)
3. Restrictive Guilt – protests against an excessively narrow interpretation of Scripture (e.g. women complaining about being "just a homemaker")

What would I have to believe in order to think that?

If she says something that doesn't make sense, it's not because she's insensible. It's because she believes something that makes her rationalization sensible to her. What is that belief that makes the puzzle pieces fit?

For example, for a woman to "accept" her "disappointing" life, she'd have to believe that visible success is more valuable than domestic success.

Or to say sexual desire is equivalent to lust, you'd have to believe that sex is, at best, a "necessary evil" that God doesn't wish us to dwell upon.

Or to complain about being "just a housewife", a woman would have to believe that cooking and cleaning is the entire sum of a biblical woman's existence… that there is no larger purpose of her work.

Starting to see the problem here?

What need is the false belief fulfilling?

Now that I've identified the need, I want to determine why she believes it. What is she hungry for that the Word of God can better satisfy?

One quick way to identify her basic needs (other than food and basic safety) is with the "SCARF" model. It's an acronym that stands for:

- Status – one's relative importance; 'pecking order' and seniority

- Certainty – the ability to predict the near future
- Autonomy – perception of control over one's environment; having choices
- Relatedness – who's 'in' and who's 'out' of the group? Friend or foe?
- Fairness – fair vs. unfair exchanges

Everything we believe fulfills at least one of these basic needs. Some examples of how a false belief can fulfill a basic need are as follows:

- Single women in their 40s believe they should still get married because to remain single would be low status.
- Single women support welfare programs because they need to feel certain their future needs will be provided for.
- Women pursue careers because they imagine they will have more freedom.
- People believe masculinity is dangerous because testosterone has been associated with abusive men (i.e. an enemy.)
- Women believe God allows women to be pastors because they think it would be unfair to restrict them from doing so.

How is the false belief failing?

Any belief not based on the truth will ultimately fail to satisfy her needs. False beliefs result in…

- Low Status – e.g. career women are less able to compete with men and are more likely to be discarded when they are no longer needed
- Incorrect Predictions – e.g. bureaucratic welfare systems often fail to provide for basic needs
- Loss of Freedom – e.g. career women can get burned out and become wage slaves
- Harm to Loved Ones – e.g. vilifying men tears families apart
- Unfairness – e.g. women in leadership are prone to want to eliminate uncertainty, trading freedom for perceived safety, which ends in a totalitarianism that harms the innocent

How does biblical truth better fulfill the need?

Biblical truth is always superior to false beliefs because it gives us…

- Higher Status – e.g. a wife of noble character is praised and "more precious than jewels"
- More Certain Promises and Predictions – e.g. God always provides for His children
- More Freedom – e.g. housewives have more time, flexibility and freedom in how they run their home and lives
- Benefits Loved Ones – e.g. godly, masculine men make women happy and children confident
- Equal Opportunity – women have equal opportunity to earn an eternal inheritance

Obviously, the more familiar you are with Scripture, the easier it will be to find an appropriate passage. But even if you don't know the applicable scriptures off the top of your head, pray for wisdom. The Holy Spirit will lead you to the truth.

Now, after all that thinking, it's finally time to expose her to the truth.

Phase 2: Shining the Light (The Presentation)

Armed with the appropriate Scripture passages, it's now time to present the truth.

After saying a quick prayer that the Word will be effective, there is a simple 3-step process to be prepared in advance:

1. Opener
2. Scripture
3. Conclusion

The “opener” is simply something you say to peak her interest. Here are a few examples:

- “Here’s something interesting…”
- “I just learned something really cool about…”
- “I wanted to switch things up a bit tonight.”
- “I know I keep sayin’ this, but you need to see this…”
- “I had an epiphany today.”
- “Want to hear something interesting?”
- “You might find this a bit… strange.”
- “So here’s something freaky…”

While these statements look simple, don’t underestimate their power. A simple curiosity opener allows you to both grab her attention and shut down her defenses so you can (lovingly) force-feed a new idea into her brain.

Next I present the Scripture. I read the passage in context and comment on it as I’m reading. I define any words that might be unclear. (Alternatively, you can read her an article or listen to a sermon that offers an insight into the issue at hand.)

Finally comes the conclusion. This is where you connect the dots for her. Here are a few examples:

> “So God is saying that visible success like careers and fame makes no difference in God’s Kingdom. What matters is whether or not we build up God’s family.”
>
> “Interesting, huh? We know that God’s Word is good. So if an entire book in the Bible is devoted to sex, God must want us to think about it!”
> “So you can see that the goal of biblical womanhood isn’t to be a cook or a maid. It’s to become a noble woman who knows how to effectively manage a home on her husband’s behalf, and raise her children well.”

And that’s all there is to it. You’ve now planted the seed of truth in her mind.

At this stage, it does not matter how she responds. All that is necessary is getting her attention and exposing her to the truth.

If she doesn’t change right away, you simply continue to reinforce the truth through common experiences and repeating the process described herein.

Phase 3: Become a Commentator (Reinforcement)

Now, that you’ve introduced her to the truth, you want to reinforce that truth. As the Scripture says:

> “You shall teach them diligently to your sons and shall talk of them when you sit in your house and when you walk by the way and when you lie down and when you rise up.” ~ Deut. 6:7

The picture here is that the father/husband is providing commentary on daily life. He’s using daily experiences to remind his family of the truths they’ve already heard.

I have a simple formula for doing this:

1. Frame an Experience

2. Restate the Conclusion (optional)

Framing an experience can either be a negative (how the false belief is failing) or a positive (how the biblical belief is working.)

Here are some examples:

- You're watching a movie starring a career woman. You comment about how miserable her life seems.
- You have dinner with a traditional family. You comment about how beautiful and happy the wife seemed.
- A pastor's daughter becomes promiscuous. You comment how that's what happens when the church neglects to praise a positive view of sexuality.
- You have an unusually good sexual experience. You comment how this is what God wants for her.
- You see an angry feminist railing against gender roles. You comment about how ignorant she is of God's noble role for women.
- You see a godly woman doing something other than cooking and cleaning. You praise her.

Bonus points if you can use humor to frame the (negative) examples.

After framing the experience, it might be appropriate to restate the conclusion of the Bible study. (e.g. "It's just like what we learned from…) You don't need to do this every time, but occasional explicit reminders are good.

Keep repeating this reinforcement until the belief changes. You can also go back and expose her to additional Scripture passages that reinforce the same point.

Summary

As promised, here's an outline summarizing the entire process. Identify a false belief you want to change in your wife and chisel away with the truth. Then repeat the process until she is perfect in your eyes.

PHASE 1: ANALYSIS

1. Where is she using self-sealing logic?
    1. "I don't want that!"
    2. "I'm fine!"
    3. "I can't!"
    4. "But what about [excuse]?"
2. What's wrong with the logic?
    1. Hidden Guilt?
    2. Ambiguous Guilt?
    3. Restrictive Guilt?
3. What would I have to believe in order to think that?
4. What need is the false belief fulfilling?
    1. Status
    2. Certainty
    3. Autonomy
    4. Relatedness
    5. Fairness
5. How is the false belief failing?
    1. Low Status

2. Incorrect Predictions
3. Loss of Freedom
4. Harm to Loved Ones
5. Unfair

6. How does biblical truth better fulfill the need?
    1. Higher status
    2. More certain promises and predictions
    3. More freedom
    4. Benefits Loved Ones
    5. Equal Opportunity for Inheritance

PHASE 2: PRESENTATION

1. Opening statement
2. Scripture
3. Conclusion

PHASE 3: REINFORCEMENT

1. Frame an Experience
2. Draw a Conclusion

Dalrock's Frame

Jack · 8 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Readership: All

I've probably read hundreds of Dalrock's posts, and I've learned something about Frame from reading Dalrock.

His general approach to blogging is like this. He finds some small incongruity within society or the church, and he picks it apart to discover the nature of it. In doing so, he shows that the incongruency is not small at all, but betrays a much larger flaw in the system.

Dalrock's appeal lies in the fact that other people, Christians included, tend to be blissfully unaware of these incongruencies because they cling to a semblance of hope. Their hope is not the hope in God to be liberated from the confines of sin, but a vain hope in the goodness of humanity, that ones efforts in the mind and body, and the collective efforts of humans, can eventually make things right, that this world will somehow be redemptively set straight.

But it never will. It will always get worse, until the day Christ returns.

Human beings have this propensity to follow a false narrative of hope, and we discipline our thoughts, words, and actions to conform to this narrative of hope.

But when a person first comes to Christ, he realizes that there is no hope at all, that Christ is the only hope, and this is a hope that is not of this world. This is a hope that can only be grasped by forsaking all other false hopes.

Dalrock is aware of this phenomenon, so he has no qualms about picking away at the threads that hold these false hopes together. He knows that when these false narratives are dispelled, his readers are in a better position to find the true hope in Christ.

From reading Dalrock, I found that I too, am guilty of sticking to that false narrative of hope. I see it sometimes when I read some of my older posts. It lurks just below my consciousness, and I am ever laboring to scratch through the surfaces of these false notions, and dig a little deeper to get to the Truth.

It is a real struggle to face the duplicity of hope. If we should ever experience the grace of God through our fallen state, we would rather cling to our false hope, and come to the conclusion that Christ is sin, or that 'the Devil made me do it'.

We resort to these false excuses because the precariousness of living without hope is a strong repellent which rivets the blinders on our eyes (Dalrock labels this as 'denial'), because deep within human nature, there is the curse of doubt. We doubt that Christ is sufficient, or even a present spiritual reality. We would rather get down to the self-centered business of enjoying our own lives, all so that we don't need to be concerned with the issue of hope. Yet it is this same human nature that the world clings to in hope – a vain hope.

Damned we are, if we don't get through this, and see the light!

Thank you, Dalrock, for being a vector for the true Hope in Christ.

The Challenge of Demanding Excellence

Jack · 11 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

This post considers several vectors of truth at a man's disposal that could be used as vehicles towards instructing and nurturing his significant other in the ways of righteous living.

Targeted Readership: All

Solid science, logical analysis, personal testimony, the Red Pill, and Biblical truth have been allies in the fight against falsehood and deception. But the spiritual forces of darkness (i.e. feminism) always stand in opposition to these pillars of truth.

This post examines each of these vectors of truth, and considers the challenges involved with each one.

The Problem

My wife has a moderate amount of feminist value conditioning, which I have generally accepted as being rather normal and common for women these days. As such, I frequently have to face some of her subconscious false value systems, and fundamental errors of attribution, as well as a good deal of faulty logic (a common characteristic of the female sex, according to men's general opinion).

I know I have to reeducate her with some beliefs that are more conducive to marital happiness and spiritual obedience. I've often done this through a technique described in a previous guest post by J.T. Anderson, called, Moulding an Excellent Wife (March 5, 2018). Before J.T. wrote this up, I was aware of the power of psychological association, and operant conditioning, and I utilized these concepts in a continual effort to cleanse my wife from impertinent attitudes, belligerent, pernicious dispositions, general presumptuousness, and ingratitude (which unfortunately have become par for the course in 21st century men's relational dynamics with women). J. T.'s article has added some elements of structure and refinement to this approach, which has further challenged me to be more conscientiously diligent about enacting this process.

But this is not as simple as it might seem. People have a complex nature, and there are many areas of life in which truth needs to be rectified.

Science and Logic

In college, I took some introductory classes in philosophy, psychology, sociology, political science, etc. I was bored out of my wits by most of these topics, but extremely fascinated with some small pockets, such as logic, learning, pathology, genealogy… As I've grown older, I've discovered more of the usefulness of these topics, as they pertain to my personal life, and this has renewed some independent study in certain areas.

Science and logic have a premium value among men, but it loses its luster with females. So I don't usually address these topics in conversation with my wife. However, I do spend a good deal of time and energy in studying the various principles and research findings of sociology and psychology, and experimenting with applying those principles in my marriage. Many of my posts cover lessons in sociology and psychology that I've learned in life, and these posts contain the details of my experiences. A few include the following.

Scriptural Truths

Whenever I present my wife with scripture, or Bible based teachings, it comes across as trite and mundane. I know this is because Christian doctrine is revered to the point of seeming predictable. There is an ambivalence that has grown out of an overexposure to the ideas, combined with a lack of real inspiration, and the 'feelz good' assurance of 'Churchian' culture. I often have to come at this from a 'Devil's Advocate' perspective, before I can illustrate the value of the Truths contained in the Bible. I also have to describe the choices, spell out the consequences, and get her to think more deeply about what is going on.

J.T. Anderson has stated that, because of its ineffectiveness, he has given up on having regular devotionals within his home. I can understand his sentiments, however, I still feel there needs to be a regular 'talk time' for a couple, in which issues can be raised and discussed in a casual manner. It is also helpful to have a topic ready to open the discussion. If devotionals cannot be used to this end, then a man might try to find other types of 'friendly' conversation openers which have a poignant relevancy.

One approach I've found helpful to this end is in picking out articles which I feel tend to cut to the heart of the issues in recent contention. I browse a lot of articles online, and I often find one that I feel is 'from God'. I just print it out, or email the link to my wife, and ask her to read it. She has gotten into the habit of doing the same for me. After we both read the articles, we discuss the issues, and I make a point of delineating many of what I feel are practical applications of the truths therein.

One very helpful tool in particular has been Oswald Chambers devotional, My Utmost For His Highest, which has been a trusted devotional for about a hundred years now.

Red Pill Truths

Whenever I present my wife with Red Pill literature, taken mostly from Manosphere blogs, and which typically describe concepts like hypergamy, the feminine imperative, the 80/20 rule, etc., her typical response is something to the tune of,

> "Of course! Why are men so obtuse that this stuff seems so novel and mysterious to them?"

Then she goes to great effort to point out how the Red Pill perspective, although true, is degrading to women. Henceforth comes the 'misogynous' label, and her general annoyance of the subject. It really is rare for a woman to embrace Red Pill truth, and it is difficult to convince a woman to be accepting of it.

Personal Testimony

No matter what happens in life, I always have the opportunity to reframe it, and put my own spin on it. A lot of this rests on my own habits and characteristics.

1. Developing my own character. More easily said than done.
2. Developing the right attitude is crucial, but there is the added challenge of teaching those same good attitudes to my wife.
3. Having a firm grasp of the Truth. I can't preach truth if I don't know it myself.
4. Speaking with confidence and authenticity. This carries a lot of import with a woman.
5. Living in the moment. I have to stay tuned into reality, and make each moment count.
6. I need to have a game strategy in mind, and keep my Game tight.
7. I have to discern what is truly my own sh!t, and what is her own projection of me.
8. I have to own my responsibility to offer direction and take charge of any situation, even when she resists my attempts.

9. I have to be open and willing to share my own experiences with her, and make it relevant to the case at hand. (Adding a little dramatic flair to my story always sets her tingles aglow.)
10. I have to watch what I say. Especially, I should not say anything that might create more difficulties in either my duties or her expectations.

In summary, I believe my own testimony is the one differentiating factor that makes all the other vectors of truth relevant to her. As J.T. pointed out in the aforementioned piece, this is the one tool that brings the truth to life.

Social Truths

Another thing about Feminism that appeals strongly to women is the idea of a 'female friendly' community. I suppose this appeals to them at least as much as an 'all men's space' appeals to men. Feminism and 'mens spaces' are both known for spouting angst and bitterness, but we cannot underestimate or discount the positive influence that social interaction brings to people, and this is even more important for a married couple.

An article from Gallup Polls, by James Harter and Raksha Arora, Social Time Crucial to Daily Emotional Well-Being in U.S. (June 5, 2008), describes the positive effects that social interaction has on a persons happiness and sense of well-being.

> "The days of the year when the majority of Americans experience enjoyment/happiness also tend to be days that they report spending more time with friends and family. Certainly, the additional time spent socializing accounts for a large part of the weekend effect, as the average amount of time Americans are spending socializing rises from about six hours on weekdays to about eight hours on weekends and public holidays. Americans also express the most enjoyment/happiness during holidays and special events, including Easter Sunday (when 65% of Americans expressed enjoyment/happiness), New Year's Day, and Super Bowl Sunday."

In the past, regular church attendance filled this need for fellowship. But these days, complementary Churchianity has tainted both the instruction and the social interaction, such that church introduces and enforces concepts which actually work against the marital relationship. One approach may be to go 'church shopping' in order to acquire teaching and fellowship that is less toxic. If one cannot find an appropriate church to make up for this shortcoming, the fundamental elements of what church used to offer need to be proactively included within the daily marriage life.

I believe the primary purposes of church include: (1) Biblical teaching and exhortation, (2) Christian fellowship and accountability, (3) Opportunities to experience the glory of God, and (4) Worshipping the Lord in Spirit and in Truth.

Along this loose definition of church, I believe that a healthy, Christian marriage can (and should) be an embodiment, or at least an extension of church. So I try to incorporate these four elements into my relationship with my wife, and I have found that doing so does bring slow improvement over time.

Gunner Q has said (and I paraphrase) that certain blogs are forms of the modern Christian church. I agree with this, in so far as it meets the four conditions described above.

> "Again I say to you that if two of you agree on earth concerning anything that they ask, it will be done for them by My Father in heaven. For where two or three are gathered together in My name, I am there in the midst of them." ~ Matthew 18:19-20

Whipped Cream on the Lie

Whenever I ponder how to address issues of contention and falsehood within my marriage, what strikes me is that she seems to have the idea, woven throughout her viewpoint, that Feminist inspired ideals are the social gospel designed to liberate humanity from the hardcore, dog-eat-dog facts of the SMP, which are implied to be corrupted by men, and 'patriarchy'.

In other words, this social 'gospel' of Feminism strives to create a 'better world' (for solipsistic women).

Right there, because of this claim, I know that it's a false 'gospel', because this world has always been, and still is, corrupted by the Fall, and it is not going to be redeemed short of the Second Coming.

Moreover, the false teachings of Feminism have a natural appeal to the feminine imperative. The philosophies carry a semblance of being true, and this is what establishes it as a de facto cult religion. Women (and many Blue Pilled men as well) get kicks out of the Feminist belief system, largely because their lives seem to correlate with the Feminist narratives. If Feminist viewpoints are interpreted as a form of Psychological Projection, then we can learn a lot about women's general approach to the SMP.

Whenever I point out certain aspects of hypocrisy in the mismatch between Feminism and 'equality' (which is actually equalism, if not outright female dominance), then I get a lot of anger and odd hominids out of her, which is more evidence proving the toxicity of Feminism's ideologies.

Feminism has really contrived a very attracting and convincing argument in the minds of women. What will it take to wake them up?

Conclusions

- Demanding excellence from a partner is a complicated, multifaceted endeavor.
- Feminist values have become standard fare in today's post modern society, which makes the battle for truth and righteousness more bloody and difficult.
- Women find it easy to fall prey to Feminism's lies and deceptive narration.
- The traditional 'Churchian' church cannot be relied on towards improving one's marital relationship. In order to make up for this shortcoming, the fundamental elements of what church used to offer need to be proactively included within the daily marriage life.
- It is not enough to point out women's errors in logic and value judgments. It is not enough to try to condition them out of bad habits and attitudes. They need to be shown a better way to live.
- Persevering with the teaching and exhortation of truths offered by scripture, science, logic, personal testimony, and the Red Pill, while remaining calm and diligent, all serve to help my wife relax and become open to better ideas – over time.
- The man's testimony (e.g. his presence, character, frame, game, confidence, authenticity, experience, and background story) is the single most powerful weapon against deterioration in the arsenal.

Chivalry has been romanticized and idealized so much that it has lost its true value. The misuse of Chivalry by men, and the abuse of Chivalry by women, are jointly contributing to the downfall of the SMP, and ultimately western society.

Note 2: The concept of Honour, as it is understood in the RvG system, pertains to an internal sense of honour, whereas, in the HvS system, honor refers to an external appearance that invites social affirmation. To differentiate between the two ethical concepts, the British spelling of honour is adopted for the former, and the American, honor, for the latter.

1. The Application of Cultural Ethics within the Sexual Market Place

Today's women have a complex set of issues to deal with, and this is combined with their apparent lack of willingness to do emotional work, invest relationally, and delay gratification.

Because the typical woman cannot find a man who can fulfill all her needs simultaneously (which is quite a ridiculous expectation), she feels no obligation to treat any particular man with distinction, except perhaps a man who can instill the venerated Tingles, and even then, only while the predaciousness lasts.

As a result, it is quite common to see approximately 80% of women take the 'easy way out' by holding a considerable number of men at her rotating disposal, with each man fulfilling one or more aspects of her social, emotional, material, relational, and sexual needs.

Combine this with a deluge of Feminist mantras over the last four decades, teaching them that men are subhuman, toxic, unnecessary, and bothersome, and this has resulted in the total attrition of the Honeycraft skill among women as a whole.

Furthermore, they don't even recognize the need to respect or honor men, and especially those 'nice', committed, virtuous men, who offer continual validation, support and investment to women, get stepped on with stiletto heels, and swept under the rug. Now, we have the situation where most men (about 80%) can find very little substance or benefits from their associations with women.

This witty meme, which blitzed through social media on International Women's Day (March 8, 2018), illustrates the subtle one-sided view that women have towards modern Chivalry.

Women, of course, will emphasize that the point of the axiom is that women supply a noble purpose to men's acts of valor, and this sparks women's ardor because it attributes honor to women.

But the flip side implies that, without women, the brave, altruistic sacrifices of men have no meritable purpose, which is a suggestion that undermines men's inherent need for honor, respect and dignity.

But that is the false, zero-sum message of Feminism – that women only receive honor at the expense of men's honour. (When my wife showed me this meme with glee, I responded with raised eyebrows and an amused, but disinterested, 'hmm…'.)

In a previous post, it was argued that Chivalry is a masculine construct. But in this post, I will show that it is not only a male construct, but also requires the proper response and participation of willing women.

Chivalry involves men acting like 'knights in shining armor', and this naturally involves a noble purpose, such as 'rescuing the fair damsel', or the like. But also, chivalry requires women to be 'virtuous princesses' in turn… and not just through a psychological identification to the mythical archetype, but truly virtuous ladies in waiting.

Because the social image of the 'princess' trope carries virtue and honor, women thus have personal agency to continue, and enhance the code of Chivalry. As such, Chivalry has become a feminine construct, but we will see that this is false as well.

Coming back to reality, we have to ask, are those 80% of females really worthy of true Chivalry?

2. Female Worthiness of Chivalry

'Liberated' females desire to keep Chivalry intact for the sake of the benefits that Blue Pilled white knights can bring, but at the same time, they want the option of dispensing with it when it comes to the SMP.

She expects chivalry de rigueur, in order to garner public honor, attention, affirmation and popularity within her peer group, but will readily and thoughtlessly dispense with her role of being dignified when it comes to returning the female version of Chivalry – offering respect, and various other favors to men.

She will smile and preen when she is with her man in public, but when she is alone at home with her man, she will fight, argue, shit test, and throw a tantrum whenever she doesn't get her way. Then, when she is NOT with her man, she is flirting with beta orbiters and seeking sexual validation.

This two-facedness is not the behavior of a princess who is deserving of Chivalry.

Other Manospherians have pointed out that an ideal man, in women's eyes, is an alpha with beta qualities. That is to say, they want a solid, masculine man who offers comfort and leisure. Among other complicating factors, it is a contradiction that most women find very frustrating. As a result, it is not uncommon to find women who distribute their time between both types of men, sometimes within open relationships.

She may want a man to carry her bags, provide a credit-card/ATM service, and maintain the security and integrity of a home. Yet, when it comes down to the actual selection of a sexual partner, most liberated women toss these qualities aside for the immediate thrills of the tingle.

This self-centered, two-timing behavior is also not becoming of a princess.

I will postulate that if a woman expects Chivalry from men, then she must necessarily fit the feminine construct of Chivalry as well. Because, you know, women want everything to be 'fair'. But of course, the application of the 'fair' principle is also subject to capriciousness.

But even though men know women think this way, they still cling to the 'nice guy' expression of Chivalry. Why?

3. The Motivations of Modern Chivalry

Western men, especially Christian men, are ready and willing to be chivalrous, as evidenced by the sheer numbers of betaboys and white knights.

A lot of their motivation is based on what they learned from their Blue Pill social conditioning within the Matrix, and this effect has been well covered in the Manosphere. But on a larger scale, the Western edition of the Matrix is all dependent on the RvG ethics system. It is implied that as long as a guy can retain a virtuous identity, he can selfrighteously profess to be one of the 'good guys'.

Thus, many men have the Blue Pill notion that acting Chivalrous is (partly) what determines their virtue. Men continue to display 'chivalrous' behavior because they have compromised the tenets of true Chivalry in order to avail of an easy way to virtue signal their presupposed righteousness and valor.

But true virtue is in fact, hard won, and seldom noticed by culture, much less honored nor rewarded. So in fact, what we are seeing today is a lot of fake virtue posturing, dressed up as 'Chivalry'.

Since they have only been exposed to a comfortable, safe, secure RvG system, they are ignorant of other ethical systems, and are thus at a disadvantage when faced with another. So, from a certain perspective, western men, not women, have been spoiled by generations of chivalry. For example, Blue Pilled White Knights think that doing something as easy and simple as holding the door for a woman makes a man almost as glorified in righteousness as Christ.

But in the Red Pill reality, we know this 'nice guy' attitude automatically disqualifies his SMV, and ejects him from the SMP. So the problem is not just with Feminism, or the lack of a RP education, it's a weakness of the whole RvG system! The following case study is offered as an illustration of what I mean.

4. Case Study: A Black Man Hits A White Girl!

An enlightening story, told by Dalrock in his post, What can't continue, won't. (February 14, 2018), has recently caused a stir in the Manosphere. Dark Brightness offered a commentary on this story in Marriage and Puppies. (February 15, 2018).

In this story, a young woman at a party is foolishly challenging several men to strike her. It is implied that she issues this challenge as a display of her 'power' over men's expression of their masculine nature, which is a Feminist claim.

> "…after being refused by several white men, a moxie filled feminist was finally obliged by a black man who proceeded to (with minimal effort) knock her across the room. As expected, the complaint from the women present went immediately from taunting "you are too chicken to fight a girl", to outrage, "you hit a girl"!"

Here in this case, the black man was acting out of his sense of personal honor and defending the foolish reproach to his masculine power. The white guys did not respond in such a way because of 'Chivalry'. But again, this is not true Chivalry. It's just that these guys think and live according to the Righteousness vs. Guilt (RvG) ethic.

Another thing to consider is that these men are dealing with a proud, foolish woman who does not deserve Chivalry in the first place. I say this because any woman who intentionally brings shame on innocent men without a provocation, is inherently a bad woman who should be rejected and avoided.

It is interesting to note here, that within the RvG system, the moxied feminista has the white men backed into a corner, but only because she is not faithful to the RvG tenets. Instead, she adopts a rather deceitful tactic by employing elements of the PvF ethics system, namely, the imminent threat of physical force, or in this case, the lack thereof, implying weakness and submission on the part of the men. In addition, her trick is doubly effective because it also plays into the HvS system, i.e. she shames the men when she rolls them with embarrassment.

The 'weakness' of the men is manifested and interpreted in situ as confusion and a shaky confidence. This is a false appearance, but it appears evident only because confidence and strength of mind are primarily expressions of virtue within the RvG system. This is the frame of mind held by the white men, so they are thereby defamed within their own frame of reference.

But if we reframe this interaction from the vixen's point of view, who is playing by a different set of ethics (namely PvF), the only real 'weakness' of these young men is that they are hung up on the RvG system, and the only way they can cling to their sense of Righteousness is by eating the insult and NOT striking back. By refraining from action, the white guys can cling to their self-imposed identity of 'righteous virtue', and protect their associated ego investment in what they believe is 'Chivalry'.

The frame of the black man in the story, on the other hand, was more attuned to either (or both) the Honor vs. Shame, or the Power vs. Fear ethics systems, and not so much into Righteousness as a personal ethic. (Much of Africa, and thus, black lineage in general, is submerged in a matriarchal PvF system.)

As a result, the woman's disrespectful words are taken seriously as a shame tactic, and also a challenge to his masculine power. Within these two systems, the 'correct' response on the part of the black man, is to reinstate one's honor by 'destroying' the one who brought him shame, and to defeat the one who challenged his power through an exercise of that power. Hence, the return blow.

It could be argued that the black guy was relatively more chivalrous than the white dudes, simply because he remained true to both his own ethical system, and the one presented to him by the woman. He also displayed a fair bit of bravery in hitting this woman, knowing that he was surrounded by white guys, and that she may very well have filed a police report of battery in response.

At the very least, she will walk away with a real life confirmation of the Feminist mantra that 'masculinity is toxic'. What she doesn't understand is that it's only toxic when she is foolish enough to mock displays of Chivalry, betray the generosity of her own culture's ethical system and insult it.

Now if those white guys had held true to their own concept of Chivalry, a brawl with the black man should have ensued after he struck the woman. But apparently, that is not part of the story.

The question is, why did those white guys fail to defend the woman after she got decked? Is it because…

1. They were effete wimps, who merely wanted to appear virtuous, and were not truly Chivalrous.
2. They knew the woman deserved it, but they wisely let the black guy do the dirty work.
3. After she shamed them, they presumed that she was not worth the effort. So they let things stand.
4. They were too afraid of the black guy.
5. They were too drunk, high, etc.
6. All of the above?

Furthermore, what would have been the best response on the part of the white guys?

I would say there is no 'best response' option for the white guys, because they were operating within a completely different ethical system. However, the woman and the black man interacted within the same ethical system, and were thereby able to establish what we might call a 'significantly meaningful, non-verbal communication'.

5. The Appropriateness of Chivalry

The previous story should make it obvious that true chivalry should be denoted by brave valor from men, and that it also requires righteous gestures from females as well. Thus, it is easy to understand how women are eager to rely on, and even demand, chivalry from men, but they are too quick to defraud society out of their own contributions towards chivalry.

Going back to the true foundations of Chivalry, we can conclude that only the highest quality of women are worthy of chivalry. We're talking nubile virgins of the royal class. No other (single) women are worthy.

One of the most noteworthy acts of faith and valor that a female can take is in retaining her virginity until marriage. But modern princesses have become spoiled brats, so too many women find this 'requirement' heavy and legalistic. They have been deceived.

The decay has set in because western culture has a perspicacious weakness, in that it's people can easily believe that all of society can be royal. They love to believe the Disney tales and think that they can live that life. It's part of the American Dream. They even believe that it is virtuous to cherish such hopes as their aspirations in life. Men also have fantasies about 'winning the love of a princess', and perhaps this also bolsters their false notions of righteous Chivalry.

Dalrock pointed out (in the previously cited post) how feminism depends wholly on chivalry for it's strength. Although true, this is somewhat of a misstatement. To be more exact, this aspect of feminism depends on accessing the strengths of an ethical system (i.e. PvF) in which women have a natural intuition, and which the vast majority of men in anglo culture (RvG) are totally ignorant of, and find difficult to learn.

More to the point, women who behave as that young woman did in Dalrock's story, are succumbing to spiritual foolishness, and are insulting God's created order of male female relations. Scripture tells us all about such women and their male cohorts, including their nature, their characteristics, and their end.

> "[20] For since the creation of the world His invisible attributes are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even His eternal power and Godhead, so that they are without excuse, [21] because, although they knew God, they did not glorify Him as God, nor were thankful, but became futile in their thoughts, and their foolish hearts were darkened. [22] Professing to be wise, they became fools, [23] and changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like corruptible man…"
> "[24] Therefore God also gave them up to uncleanness, in the lusts of their hearts, to dishonor their bodies among themselves, [25] who exchanged the truth of God for the lie, and worshiped and served the creature rather than the Creator, who is blessed forever. Amen."
>
> "[26] For this reason God gave them up to vile passions. For even their women exchanged the natural use for what is against nature. [27] Likewise also the men, leaving the natural use of the woman, burned in their lust for one another, men with men committing what is shameful, and receiving in themselves the penalty of their error which was due."
> "[28] And even as they did not like to retain God in their knowledge, God gave them over to a debased mind, to do those things which are not fitting; [29] being filled with all unrighteousness, sexual immorality, wickedness, covetousness, maliciousness; full of envy, murder, strife, deceit, evil-mindedness; they are whisperers, [30] backbiters, haters of God, violent, proud, boasters, inventors of evil things, disobedient to parents, [31] undiscerning, untrustworthy, unloving, unforgiving, unmerciful; [32] who, knowing the righteous judgment of God, that those who practice such things are deserving of death, not only do the same but also approve of those who practice them." ~ Romans 1:18-32

We know all these qualities are present in 4th Wave Intersectional Feminism, the abortion industrial complex, and the associated debasement of marriage that is widely present in society.

It all makes perfect sense now!

6. Conclusions

- Western, Christian men are readily willing to be chivalrous, as evidenced by the sheer numbers of 'nice guys', betaboys, and white knights.
- Men have the notion that acting Chivalrous is what determines their virtue. But true virtue is in fact, hard won, and seldom noticed by culture, much less honored nor rewarded.
- Men continue to display chivalrous behavior because they have compromised the tenets of true Chivalry in order to avail of an easy way to virtue signal their presupposed righteousness and valor.
- Since western men have only been exposed to a comfortable, safe, secure Righteousness vs. Guilt system of ethics, they are ignorant of other systems, and are thus at a disadvantage.
- Feminism depends on the benefits and weaknesses inherent in the RvG system, while at the same time, betraying the RvG system by buying into the Honor vs. Shame, and the Power vs. Fear systems.
- Only a fully righteous woman is worthy of chivalry.
- Western women abandon all claim to any purported innocence or righteousness within the RvG system whenever they accept feminist ideologies, pursue self-ambition, indulge themselves in the benefits of hypergamy, such as the Tingles, and/or riding the carousel. As a result, they are not necessarily entitled to any displays or benefits of chivalry, because they have chosen to play by a different set of ethical rules.
- Until chivalrous men realize that feminist women are not playing by the same ethical rules, they will always be duped by the power play.

Don’t Admit Her Argument

Jack · 19 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

This post examines how men inadvertently assume a subservient role whenever they defend themselves against a woman’s criticism, and how men should dismiss such arguments out of hand.

The Natural Hierarchy within Successful Relationships

Every relationship has a structure of hierarchy.

One has expertise and authority, while the other adheres to structure and routine.

One is the mentor, and the other is the disciple.

One is the hero, and the other is the admirer.

One inspires, and the other is inspired.

Even in a friendship between peers, there is always one person who is esteemed to have more talents or gifts in one area over the other.

One is disciplined and goal oriented, the other is more creative and fun loving.

One is intelligent, the other is enthusiastic.

One is patient and peaceful, the other is the garrulous life of the party.

One is strong, the other is beautiful.

Lewis and Clark, Mason and Dixon, Batman and Robin, Zorro and Tonto, Abbot and Costello, Laurel and Hardy…

Then there are men like Donald Trump, and Richard Branson. Undoubtedly they have a legion of other men who help them manage their finances, contracts, businesses, etc. …and they have women galore!

Moreover, the guy on top is always the man with a stronger, better Frame.

Hierarchy in a Male-Female Relationship

While men and women both have their own unique set of natural skills and abilities which they bring into a relationship, men have the rightful place of leadership. Men are naturally more adept at the risk-taking that is involved with maintaining structure and order, making progress, and achieving success.

When women are nitpicky and overtly critical of a man’s behavior, it seems natural and right for the man to defend himself against her accusations.

He might entertain her argument because he is bothered by her logical errors and he thinks he needs to ‘set her straight’, or maybe he has the nerdy idea that he can ‘win’ the argument through a review of the facts and an exercise of reason.

But in fact, if a man responds in this way, he is committing a major faux pas.

A man who responds to a woman’s argument with a counter argument is dealing with her as he would another man. But… she is not a man! (Men have the decent respect not to dump on other men.)

Instead, the man should reject all her complaints and criticism out of hand.

Do NOT try to point out how her assessment of you is inaccurate.

Do NOT attempt to defend your actions and viewpoints.

Do NOT entertain her accusations as even the least bit legitimate.

Because in doing so, his actions and behavior become the subject to be examined, reviewed and criticized. This path leads to an unfavorable conflict structure in which the woman is making more demands than the man.

When a man defends himself against a woman's criticism, it shows that he is assuming the subservient role. It reveals that he is willing to admit the possibility of being subject to her claim of him being inferior or inadequate.

If the man takes her assessment seriously, acquiesces to her judgment, and responds to her charges, then the man is accepting what she presumes to be his place as the gelastic, sidekick buffoon, and by doing so, he is unwittingly admitting dishonor and defeat.

He loses because the premises of the argument are proscribed according to her frame. Thus, by engaging in her argument he unwittingly submits to her frame. Thus, any time a man enters into an argument that defers to her demands, it automatically leads to his defeat.

Instead, the man should be calling the shots and making the demands. Several of my past posts have discussed this dynamic in general, but here I will offer a few poignant examples.

Case Study 1

A recent post on Chateau Heartiste, Opposite George Game (March 17, 2018) recounts a story of a guy who wears red on St. Patrick's Day, while everyone else is wearing green.

> "A girl walks over and gives him shit about his shirt, he smiles and, rather than smugly going off on not being Irish or how he's too autistic to celebrate ethnic holidays in post-racial American, he says "eh, green makes me look washed out" or "I'm color blind. Feel better?" Or he might self-incriminatingly reply, 'I'm a nonconformist prick.'"
> "Opposite George Game — "I'm unemployed and bald and live with my parents" — can juice your bantz to incredible heights as long as you avoid even a hint of defensiveness, discomfort, or trepidation, and you don't take yourself, or your marks, too seriously."

Although Heartiste doesn't point this out, the friend in this story is refusing to submit to the woman's criticism. Instead, he dismisses her jabs as playful banter, and he produces a like response.

Case Study 2

My friend told me about an argument he had with his wife.

She was angry because she thought he did not pick up a certain item (cucumbers) from the grocery store on his way home from work.

Actually he did get the item, and he had already put it away in the refrigerator, and she had not noticed it among the other items. So then she jumped to the conclusion that he had forgotten.

When she brought it up, he told her that he bought the item, and it was in the fresher. But even so, this was not an acceptable response in her mind. She continued to give him a barrage of complaints, and brought up several instances in the past when he had forgotten certain items. And she even remembered what all those items were, and the approximate dates or social events surrounding those 'failures'.

To men, it seems ridiculous that she would take issue with this, but some women are never happy, no matter how much they are pampered.

True, she would show herself to be a more mature, refined, and dignified person if she had just responded with “Sorry, I didn’t notice that you had already put them away. Thanks! That’s so thoughtful of you.” Men expect women to show such gratitude, and it becomes problematic when they don’t.

So how should a man deal with a contentious leech?

Here’s a clue. She is not aggravating the discord because she thought he forgot, or because she thinks he is ‘too inconsiderate’, nor is she even creating strife as a form of ego preservation. While she might say these things, and while they may or may not be true, the real reason for the escalation of her anger is because he folded to her presumptuous demands by attempting to justify himself – which is a defensive measure.

It doesn’t matter whether he forgot or not. It’s more about dealing with her in a way that would make her realize what an overbearing termagant she would be if he didn’t put his foot down.

It is the feral woman’s unspoken and consistent goal to put the man on the defensive.

Never go on the defensive! Always keep her on her toes!

I told my friend that he should never try to justify himself through an argument like that. He was still confused, so I made some suggestions.

How about telling her something like this…

- “Don’t worry about it. We still have some AA batteries in the drawer.” (Sexually suggestive humor)
- “Sorry, they were out.” [Then later, do a cute little ‘magic trick’ and pull the cucumber out of your hat (or stick it down your pants and walk around the house). Let her be surprised and ashamed of herself for doubting you.] (Humor)
- “Yeah… I’ve been meaning to tell you this for a while, but I really don’t like cucumbers (or whatever) in my omelettes (etc.). I’ve been trying to drop polite hints, but you just don’t get it.” (Confusion)
- “Well then, Princess, here are the car keys. You can go get it yourself, if it is that important to you. I trust that you won’t have another accident like you did last year.” (Scornful Negation)

Case Study 3

Lately, I have been in the process of applying for a promotion. Because of all of the bureaucracy involved in documenting all my contributions to the University over the past 4 years, I asked my wife to help me, and she was eager to do so… at first.

But after a couple weeks of phone calls and filling out paperwork, she got frustrated and impatient. She kept pressuring me to finish it up and submit the application.

One Saturday, we were working in my office until after dark. I was reviewing the stack of papers we had prepared, and I found that I still needed to include some more documentation. She already knew this, but she didn’t want to invest any further efforts towards the endeavor. When I confronted her about why she didn’t bring it to my attention, she lashed out in anger.

> “Why aren’t you finished with this yet? You are taking too long! Just finish this cover page and send it in. If they want more documentation, then they will send it back and tell us they need something more!”

I responded…

> “How do you know that they will recognize that something is missing? Maybe they will just say, ‘this is insufficient for a promotion’ and then reject me?”

After a quiet moment of incrimination, she responded with,

> "You have already wasted too much time on this! I don't think you take it very seriously. You don't work hard. You would rather spend time on your blog… <sarcasm>"

Meanwhile, I coughed, expectorated, and cleared my throat very obnoxiously. She continued…

> "I have to do all this work for you. Why should I help you with this? You need to SHOW ME that you are going to work harder!"

During her rant, I sat quietly at my desk, hands folded and listening to her. I know she feels uneasy about the longitudinal security and the financial lucrativeness of my career, because we discussed this before. But this time, I clearly got the impression that she imagined herself to be my personal manager, and I didn't like it one bit. After she finished, I stood up and said,

> "Look, I don't need to PROVE to you my diligence and sincerity towards advancing my OWN career!"
> "Furthermore, I don't think it's OPEN to your criticism!"

After that, I closed down my workstation and prepared my bags to leave. She followed on my cue, without a word.

She was quiet for the rest of the evening, and she even prepared one of my favorite dishes (beef stew) for dinner.

The next day, she found another item that should be included in my application, and told me about it.

Conclusions

In the face of a female provocation, low SMV men with a weak Frame usually think they need to 'defend their position', but doing so only shows their ready willingness to 'answer to the boss'.

In the first Case Study, the friend owns his individuality with confidence, and refuses to go on the defensive. The magic of this is not in giving her a witty response as most men like to believe, but in his forthright, genuine, and indomitable attitude, even going so far as to mockingly identify as a basement browsing loser! Furthermore, the absurdity and incongruity of this response is in tune with the playful, sardonic banter offered by the woman – another hit.

In the second Case Study, it was hard to give my friend a 'pat answer', because all women have a different personality and disposition. Their relationship history is also a significant factor.

But generally speaking, humor is usually the best response for most women, and this tends to loosen up the tension.

However, certain women are not easily 'entertained'. Confusion or negs might be better approach for those types of women. If she wants to be aggressive and confrontational, then you kind of have to be the same, but it is extremely important to remain totally calm in the process and DO NOT make her the target of your anger! Instead, wax her with your self-absorbed philosophy, and give her the acute impression that no satisfaction can be gained from challenging you. (I admit, this is painful and frustrating to endure, especially given the chance that it might take a long time before her gratitude and general happiness 'wakes up', if ever.)

In the third Case Study, it was clear to both me and my wife that I cared more about my career than she did, even though she claimed the opposite. Once this was established, if I tried to 'reclaim my honor' by naming all the things I did to complete the application, in order to prove her claims to be inaccurate, then I would have failed to maintain Frame. But by heatedly rejecting her opinion of me as being lazy (which was actually a case of psychological projection), I maintained my own Frame, and won her respect and deference in the process.

In summary, maintain your own Frame, and DO NOT EVER submit to hers!

My Dating Experiences in College

Jack · 25 March 2018 · Archived copy · Original

This post describes the author's experiences, which suggest that the expression of women's hypergamic tendency is spontaneously immediate and sexually motivated, as opposed to being intrinsic or idealistic.

Targeted Readership: Men interested in relationships with women.

The Background

The following story happened in the 1990's, when I was in college. I was unaware of the convergence of Churchianity, which had already gained full momentum by that time. (I would guess that the convergence of the church took place in the late 1970's, a time when Christianity was popular in culture, but I was too young to say for sure – that would be something for others to discuss in the comments.)

I was definitely Blue Pill back then. But that really didn't mean much, because everybody was Blue Pill back then, and in terms of awareness, I was not much different from any other guy. Back then, any guy that had any kind of Game, was totally unaware of it, such that 'creating attraction' was still a hit-or-miss, shot-in-the-dark, type of thing.

The Aloof Game was the only type of Game that guys were aware of, and even that was only vaguely understood, as in, 'don't stare at her for too long', and 'don't call her every day'. Very few guys could pull that off very well, and I was not one of them.

According to the popular consensus of the time, it seemed that only when a guy truly had no interest in a woman, could he pull off the Aloof Game with success, but in that case, it didn't really matter anyway.

Guys often talked about the frustration of the attraction phenomena, among many other things related to the feminine mystique – both complicated subjects which were only exposed about a decade later, and which are now commonly discussed on the Manosphere.

The Story

I dated hundreds of women during my time in college and graduate school. My rough guesstimate is that I had between 200-250 dates over 5 years (about 1 per week).

I had lots of opportunities for sexual involvement, but I turned them down. By 'opportunities', I mean that a small number of these women quite eagerly displayed their bare breasts, and/or spread their thatch in front of me.

Their explicit advances really shocked me, because, according to my Blue Pill education, women were more interested in security and commitment, i.e. marriage, and not so much into wild profligate sex for the sake of sex, as men are. Thus, I naturally concluded that any woman who presses for sex on the first or second date is a morally corrupt woman – not one worthy of my time and attention in my search for a wife.

So then what could I do? I had to feign modesty, offer them coffee, and make polite conversation until the date was over.

'Embarassing' is a grotesque understatement.

I have to say that resisting those temptations so many times left me somewhat twisted, bitter, and remorseful. I know what it means to be 'tempted sore', and tested to the mettle.

Looking back, I realize that I probably could have slept with most of them – not just those that stripped nude uninvited, but also most of the others as well, if I had pushed it. But I didn't, and I didn't want to either.

It's not like I was gay, or anything like that. Actually, I did want to, but I was serious about my Christian faith, and so I considered sex to be a temptation, and not a priority goal. I had some pretty strong convictions that sex outside of marriage was just plain wrong. I expected sex would happen inevitably, but only with the right person, and then only after marriage.

I had high standards, and clear expectations. I was looking for a hot, emotionally mature, and (the kicker) a loving woman, whom I could marry. The right person (for me) would be a woman who was serious about her Christian faith, who truly loved me and respected me as a unique individual, a woman who had oneitis for me. After marriage, of course I would let her have the sex smorgasbord. But not until then!

Now, after taking the Red Pill, I know this expectation follows a typical western guy's thinking – that a woman should be a source of selfless love – which is a trope of the forlorn beta.

If I was an Incel, it would have been pathetic indeed. But I was a VOLcel (or Hicel)! (Some of you might think that is even more pathetic!)

It didn't take any girl very long to figure out my game. About half of them picked it up less than halfway through the first date, and not one of them lasted longer than three dates.

Was I being arrogant? Pharisaical? I'm sure it seemed that way to them.

But they never spoke of their feelings. So I didn't know what was happening on their end for the longest time.

Occasionally, I would continue trying to contact the girls that I thought were a little better than most, hoping to discover the reason why they got cold feet. I wanted to tell them what I expected, but I never got the chance. The typical response they gave me was what we would now call a determined 'ghosting'. They never wanted to see me or talk to me again, and they would go to great lengths to avoid me.

I now know, and as you could expect, all those women I dated hated me because I had this expectation of them to take the relationship seriously, and to postpone sexual relations until marriage. They were frustrated because they couldn't get their socks off with me, and they probably felt very ashamed of themselves as well.

Most of them had a very high rebound rate, sometimes with one of my guy friends. Only one of my guy friends was respectable enough to talk to me about it first. (I told him to go ahead, but I also told him what went on with me.)

But this wasn't the classic hypergamy in action (trading up). I believe this because of several reasons.

- They could not see past the offensive feelings generated by their notion that their sexual advances were 'rejected' by me.
- The women were 'too horny', and frustrated by my apparent rejection.
- (It's my impression that) my guy friends were below me on the SMV scale.
- I believed that they didn't really understand – or care, what constituted real value and virtue in a potential partner.

I often wondered if that was a passive aggressive form of revenge on her part. But I didn't really care. I just crossed those women off my list of possible partners, crossed those guy friends off my list of closest buddies, and went on to the next one. I expected better from a woman that I would consider worthy of marrying.

Seeing this happen again and again, further confirmed the fact, in my mind, that what we now call 'sexual affirmation' (or Tingles) was more important to those women than love or obeying God.

The Goal of Contentment

Looking back, I could have gained a lot of immediate, sexual contentment if I didn't stick to my principles. But I wanted a deeper, more lasting, dependable kind of contentment. I wanted the contentment that only a warm family and children could bring. That was my goal, and I was determined not to mess around and F it up.

At that time, I intuitively knew about the Four Stages of Marriage. A brief description of each stage is listed here.

1. The Ecstatic Fantasy Stage, where one is swept away in the hope of love.
2. The Counter-Dependent Stage, where one is annoyed with the other person, and learns to claim one's own identity.
3. The Commitment Stage, where one learns to communicate, compromise, and cooperate with the mutual joining and healing process.
4. The Blessed Stage, where one finds personal autonomy, emotional independence, spiritual liberty, security, comfort, contentment, honor, and the original ecstasy of Stage 1.

Stage 4 contains the primary blessings obtainable within marriage, which are fundamentally spiritual – liberty, contentedness, and wholeness in particular.

I think a lot of people don't really understand this Four Stage process until after they've screwed it up.

In particular, I believe many people can't handle true contentedness. They have the notion that the 'wanting' is better than the 'having'. I have met too many women who were 'in love with being in love', and they thought that was truly love. But actually, that's not real love. They're essentially 'in love' with the Tingles of infatuation, lust, envy, and covetousness. But since they are determined to make the Tingles last forever, it never grows beyond the lust, so they never understood what true love is all about, and thus, they are unworthy of entering into a sanctified marriage.

Couples who don't understand the purpose of obtaining contentment in marriage often look at all the other couples who DO have this, and come to decide that they're fake or unrealistic. They just don't (or can't) believe that contentedness is a practical and acceptable outcome. But in my view, their disbelief is disingenuous. I mean, how the F is anyone going to honor the central marital vow of monogamy if they can't find contentment in the relationship?

Moreover, if a person's head and heart aren't right, they always fail to identify opportunities for blessing, and they foolishly destroy whatever they have that's good. I have even seen some couples get to the point where they start experiencing the blessings of marriage, and then they realize that that is the peak, or the 'goal', and that that is as good as it gets, or that that is all that God promises in marriage. Then they're disappointed because they were expecting something different, so then they angrily tear the relationship apart trying to find the thing that they were after.

Even after they destroy the relationship, they never realize that the thing they were after was a lie – a soul promise from Satan, which was designed to destroy all their contentment within marriage, and thereby destroy their marriage. It's really sad…

Anyway, I was determined to choose a woman who had the same mindset as I did, namely a woman who was determined to get to the contentment of the Fourth Stage, and who wasn't actively screwing up her chances of making that happen.

I knew I was right about the eternal value of the Fourth Stage, and I had a fairly good idea about how the Second and Third Stage worked as well. But after having lived through these experiences, and then later taking the Red Pill, I see that I was extremely naïve about how a relationship initially forms and progresses through the First Stage.

Things I Learned About Myself

I had a two-year-long running talk with my Pastor about my conglomerate experience in searching for a wife. Overall, he was very angry with me, which only increased my confusion and frustration over the matter, mainly because my conscience was clear, and I didn't see that I had done anything wrong. Over time, he pointed out the following problems I had, and the 'mistakes' I was making.

1. I had a root of bitterness stemming from my own parent's divorce, which happened when I was 22, just 3-4 years earlier. This experience had poisoned my mind about how a relationship should develop naturally.

2. I made a resolution to keep my virginity until marriage, and to not make the same mistakes as my parents – namely, winding up divorced and broken. (Although at that time, I did not fully understand exactly what mistakes my parents had made that made their divorce inevitable. Parents are ruthlessly stubborn in refusing to discuss their problems and mistakes with their children.) Looking back, I now know this was a mistake of overreaction and spiritual rebellion. The reasons for this are explained in a previous post, The Trouble with Resolutions, Inner Vows and Commitments (January 14, 2010)
3. He told me that, by refusing to engage in sexual relations, I was clinging to the 'Law', and refusing to appropriate God's grace over the matter. (This point blew my mind for years afterward!)
4. I was provoking those women's sexual desires, 'setting them off' (as in, like detonating a bomb), as he put it. When he told me this, the Blue Pilled me was like, 'WTF?' because I only got as far as kissing four of those women, and I never even touched 95% of them! But now, after taking the Red Pill, I know that women's desire is mostly a psychological based fantasy. So under that consideration, I probably 'set off' a lot more women than I ever dated, and I'm still not sure whether I should feel guilty about that or not. I mean, it seems obvious to me now, but since I was a virgin at that time, and had zero practical experience with female sexuality, how would I have known any better?
5. I had a problem with anger because none of the women I dated showed any degree of moral agency, nor were they mature enough to respond in the way I expected them to. I reasoned, quite justifiably, that if they weren't mature enough to control their sexual urges and treat a man (like me) with respect, then they weren't mature enough for marriage either. I still believe this is true, but highly impractical for navigating my life experiences described earlier.

My pastor concluded that I needed to be married first, before I could experience the passion necessary to 'drive me to faith', as he put it.

Later in life, I realized that when he said 'married', that is pastor-talk for 'have sex'. But it would have been unethical for him to explicitly advise sex outside of marriage. Looking back, I think some of my confusion could have been averted if he had been more explicit in saying what he really meant.

But at the time, I didn't 'get it'. I felt like he was pressuring me to have sex, but wasn't being forthright about saying so. I was confused as h*ll, and I had a lot of questions with no answers.

- (Other than the fact that 'I want to'), why should I have sex outside of marriage when I know it's risky and wrong?
- Why do I need a passionate marriage (sexual relationship) to have faith?
- Why does it seem like I am the only Christian who even cares about sexual purity?
- Why do I keep getting rejected by 'Christian' women for this reason?
- How I was ever going to find a worthy wife from among all these emotionally immature and sexually profligate women?

I did not understand any of his points until after I became sexually active, years later. Apparently, I was taking everything way too seriously.

Conclusions

After a few more years of frustration and rejection, I finally decided that I've got to humble myself and play this game, if I ever expected to (1) find sexual expression, (2) get answers to the questions of my heart, and (3) have a wife and family. So I dated several women simultaneously, and I also had sexual relations with them as well. I was 'spinning plates' as it is now called in the Manosphere.

This change of heart was actually a very difficult transition for me to make. I felt very guilty and afraid of various consequences for having illicit sex. I knew I was giving in to temptation, and I wasn't living by my own moral standards. But on the other hand, I just couldn't handle any more rejection or celibacy. I also felt regretful about my long period of abstinence, like I had already missed too many opportunities, and this 'empathy for sin' made me question my standing with God. I reassured myself by thinking that I deserved a little indulgence of grace, after what I had suffered through for the last 18 years. (To this day, I am still not sure whether that was true, or whether it was simply a rationalization to justify my breakdown.)

But I was honest with them. I told them I was seeing other women, and I told them I was marriage minded, and I truly was. I told them I would choose one woman at some point in the future and get married to her. They didn't like the fact that I was seeing other women, but they played along.

Some of them accused me of 'cheating' and fornication. In response, I spoke women's native language by employing a rationalization hamster. I said,

> "Having premarital sex with only one woman is fornication, and having premarital sex with many women is also fornication. You are also fornicating with me, so what is your complaint? If you want to fornicate, then you need to accept the fact that fornication is a sin, and sin has these kinds of problems."

Of course, they didn't want to stop fornicating, and they certainly didn't want to cede me to their competition, so they accepted the situation. The 'better ones' (i.e. more mature) never mentioned it, much less argued with me about it.

To my utter astonishment, I also attracted a few marriage minded women who wanted to abstain from sex until marriage. Remembering my own experiences with that, I respected their intentions and didn't try to advance on them. But I thought, 'Where were you ten years ago when I was suffering like h*ll? Where were you even one year ago, when I was still a virgin waiting for a wife?' This sudden change precipitated a lot of anger in my relationship with God, which took me a while to recover from. Also, I wasn't so interested in them, since I had other women offering sex on demand.

It's amazing how things change as you age and get more experience. Once I started having sex, the quality and quantity of women that made themselves available to me totally changed for the better.

After about 15 months of this, I had several decent women to choose from, and no less than five that I considered worthy of my consideration for a marriage proposal. True to my original intentions, I chose one and got married. That is a story for another post.

The older, Red Pilled me knows that once you have sex with a woman, her level of investment will change, but only for a select few. Most of them will still exhibit flakiness and branch swinging.

I learned a few other important lessons about women in general, and these are covered in another post, Things I Learned About Women In College (April 4, 2018).

Things I Learned About Women in College

Jack · 4 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Women require more than what they're willing or able to give.

Readership: Men

A previous post, My Dating Experiences in College (March 25, 2018), told a story from the earlier part of the rude wake-up from my Blue Pill education. This post included some poignant and difficult lessons I learned about myself in the process.

But the story is not complete without also telling what I learned about women through this experience. Hence, this follow-up post covering the things I learned about women while in college.

The main topics covered are listed here.

1. Women Are Selfish Singularities
2. Women Are Consumed By A Lust That Is Delusionally Labeled As Love
3. Women Need To Be Taught How to Get Along With A Man
4. The Enigmatic "Right Time" Phenomena
5. Women View Sex as the "Qualifying Round"
6. Women's Sexually Charged Desire Can (Possibly) Be A Good Thing

1. Women Are Selfish Singularities

Practically speaking, and contrary to my previous expectations, (most college aged) women simply do not think long term, nor are they mature enough to operate at a higher level of relationship performance, such as what would be required to establish a solid marriage and family.

After meeting a few hundred women like this, I learned that this is just how women are.

Since I was majoring in Physics at the time, I discovered, quite humorously, that the scientific word 'singularity' is an apt descriptor of such women. Merriam-Webster's definition of 'singularity' is,

1. Something that is singular: such as a: A separate unit

b: Having an unusual or distinctive manner or behavior : peculiarity

2. The quality or state of being singular
3. A point at which the derivative of a given function of a complex variable does not exist but every neighborhood of which contains points for which the derivative does exist
4. A point or region of infinite mass density at which space and time are infinitely distorted by gravitational forces and which is held to be the final state of matter falling into a black hole

Definitions 1 and 2 are self-explanatory, and there is also a pun reflecting her state of being 'single'.

Definition 3 above describes the 'money pit' aspect of getting along with women. Think of a bottomless hole with sloping sides, swallowing up everything that comes within its vicinity, including love, emotional investment, time, money, labor, and of course, d!ck.

The Sarlacc creature from Star Wars is a similarly fitting analogy.

Concerning definition 4, women (especially younger ones) are spoiled, selfish and lazy, and have no interest to love or to invest in a man. They want to do all the taking, and none of the giving. Their approach towards real love is a deep space vacuum – a black hole singularity that absorbs everything, and gives back nothing.

Another good analogy is the story of the Tar Baby – you just can't touch them without getting into a mess.

Since those days in college, I have avoided women under 25 like the plague. They're just too foolish, immature, and selfish.

2. Women Are Consumed By A Lust That Is Delusionally Labeled As Love

A book I read last year, The Love a Wife Desires, the Respect a Husband Needs, by Dr. Emerson Eggerich, stated something to the effect that, 'love is the natural language of the female'. True to the time (2004), this idea is a core concept of Blue Pill existentialism, and as such, was believed by virtually everyone, prior to the advent of the Red Pill.

But based on my experiences, I have to say that this postulate paints with too broad a sugar coated stroke, making it too easy to miss the truth. It is true that women naturally look for love, and that they are attuned to the language of love, but they are not into actually giving love, unless they are taught to do so through the discipline of love.

According to my Blue Pill education, I expected women to be more interested in a committed marriage, than in sex. But totally against the Blue Pill myths, the grand majority of all the women I met, did not have the mind to commit, nor even to love in the true sense of the word.

Their desire was not driven by a hypergamic, branch-swinging, self-betterment, as is described elsewhere on the Manosphere. No, they wanted to indulge the Tingles unto sexual intercourse, and they wanted to do so, RIGHT NOW. They also had the simplistic expectation that I would intuitively 'know' what they expected, and that I would 'move in for the kill' upon their signal.

After meeting hundreds of women like this, I realized that modern women do not, in fact, speak the language of love naturally, nor do they even have the mind to put love first. I also discovered that they had a different definition of 'love' than I did. They might talk about 'finding true love', but what they really mean is 'exploring intense Tingles', and they mistakenly believed that to be 'love'.

I won't deny that an emotional stimulation is an important part of true, romantic love, but for a lot of women, it's the only part there is! If it's not fun and exciting, if it has the least bit of drudgery, if it requires emotional work, or (God forbid!) sacrifice, then without the hopes conferred by the blessed Tingles, she is out, and on to the next guy.

The thing that made me angry was that most of these women were 'good Christian girls'. (I selected such women because I was unwilling to date or marry an unbeliever.)

The word, solipsism, is frequently used in Red Pill literature to describe the self-absorbed nature of women. Solipsism means,

> "The philosophical idea that only one's own mind is sure to exist. As an epistemological position, solipsism holds that knowledge of anything outside one's own mind is unsure; the external world and other minds cannot be known and might not exist outside the mind. As a metaphysical position, solipsism goes further to the conclusion that the world and other minds do not exist." ~ Infogalactic: Solipsism

Although most young women are definitely this way, there is one idea that all women seem to share – the Tingle-Tantric Fairy Tale. Solipsism is overcome when confronted with other minds who share this dream world, and then (and only then) authentic heart-to-heart communication may commence. PUA's and long-married men know this secret best.

3. Women Need To Be Taught How to Get Along With A Man

Another problem with the false belief that 'love is the natural language of the female', is that it seems to imply that females don't need to be taught or told to love, because they do it by default.

But this is not totally true. Women have to be taught these things over time. They only love by default if they were molded to be that way.

> "Train up a child in the way (s)he should go, and when (s)he is old (s)he will not depart from it." ~ Proverbs 22:6

It is best if they learn love and proper behavior from a disciplined upbringing.

Personally, I believe that a woman can only learn selfless love and proper respect from a wise, disciplinary father. A father has the unique charge to groom his daughter(s) for marriage, and mould them into women with the potential to become happy, worthy wives.

Without this parental influence, young girls are abandoned to learn the Fairy Tales from Disney.

And sadly, once a girl passes adolescence, that prime window of opportunity has passed. As a woman ages, she will only become more rigid and headstrong in what she learned as an adolescent.

They can't learn love from a romantic interest, because they're in Transaction Mode, or Affirmation Mode, and not in Humble Mode, Learning Mode, or Gratitude Mode.

If she's in Transaction Mode, she'll have a quid pro quo mindset about relational duties and responsibilities – the 'equality' stuff – but in reality, she'll only think it's 'equal' if it's more in her favor. If that should ever occur, it tends to make her too comfortable and lazy, which leads to her being ungrateful. Then after a while of that, she gets the nagging feeling, characterized by an annoying vacancy of the Tingles, that the man's SMV is beneath her own, and that she deserves someone with a higher SMV. After that, she will fitness test the relationship until it is destroyed by doing so.

If she's in Affirmation Mode, she'll be focused on her own feelings and needs, namely Tingles and her own Contentment (not yours), which can be complicated to maintain. Men call this type of woman 'high-maintenance', meaning that it requires an inordinate amount of work to keep her happily occupied with her idols.

Getting a woman into Humble Mode, Learning Mode, or Gratitude Mode is even more complicated, especially if she doesn't recognize that it is to your mutual benefit that she should adopt this stance. Dealing with a woman like this requires a (typical) man's diligent longitudinal study of the topic. But the abridged version is this: To keep her interested and open to learning those eternal operatives of love and respect, and to continue moulding excellence within her character, it essentially becomes necessary that the time is filled with Game and Tingles.

In summary, women can't be taught (very easily) in a romantic relationship.

However, I have noticed that many women do learn to love by becoming mothers. It seems that this experience makes them realize their place in the linear hierarchy, seeing how they are no longer the 'baby' to be coddled, but must instead provide for her baby. I suspect that this is the truth behind the scripture in 1st Timothy 2:15, which says,

> "Nevertheless she will be saved in childbearing if they continue in faith, love, and holiness, with self-control."

From this perspective, it is easy to see how abortion can be a d@mning decision, for both mother and child.

4. The Enigmatic "Right Time" Phenomena

There is this weird 'right time' phenomena. It might be due to a biological clock of some sort, or it might just be how humans get something in their heads, which they tend to act out.

Women especially, have this notion of, 'it's the right time' to do something, and this isn't well understood, even by themselves.

When they feel it's the 'right time' to start being sexually active, then they just start being sexually active, and they'll do it with whatever guy happens to be in their life at that moment. It doesn't really matter much who the guy is, as long as he serves the male function in her life (and bed), and he doesn't revile her ego in the process.

Even the Tingles are not a significant motivator, although they often serve as a catalyst. For example, Stacey gets the Tingles for Chad, but she can't bed Chad, so she does John instead. But John can't sustain her Tingles, so she doesn't respect him or take him seriously. As soon as she meets Rob, the Tingles strike again, and that makes her grow irritated with John and branch swing to Tom. But Tom cannot tingulate her any better than John could. Repeto itero, ad nauseam, et cetera. (It's a recursive process that I have seen happen sooo many times… This is why female sexuality is so heavily regulated in patriarchal cultures, and also why sexually liberated women despise patriarchy.)

And then, when women feel it's the 'right time' to get married, then they just get married, and they'll marry whatever guy happens to be in their life at that moment. Again, it really doesn't matter too much who the guy is, as long as he seems to be 'marriage material', and is somewhat disliked by her parents. I guess it wouldn't matter at all who he is, if she's only going to strip him of all worthy assets, and then dump him when the source dries up. Here also, the Tingles are not a significant motivator, although they serve as a catalyst. This also has well known, catastrophic consequences, such as affairs, cuckolding, frivorce, and legalized kidnapping.

This phenomenon stands in contrast from reports I've heard about many other women who say they are looking for 'the one'. I haven't met many of those. But I will conjecture that 'the one' in those women's fantasies is merely a mythical creature of their imaginations, as mentioned before, someone who accelerates their Tingles past full throttle – an entirely fictionalized fantasy with no useful purpose other than to validate their ego.

The thing that made me confused (and resentful too), is that the 'right time' for women to have sex, always happened long before the 'right time' came for them to marry. I came up with the following reasons why this might be.

- It is a selfish desire for satisfaction, and an inability to delay gratification, coupled with low moral convictions, and no social consequences surrounding sexual activities.
- General immaturity, and an associated inability to accept the responsibilities involved with a mature relationship and sex.
- They all got waylaid by Satan's deception, on an industrialized, mass production scale.

I've met a very small number of women who chose to remain abstinent until marriage. But from my estimation, those women had such a low SMV, that if they didn't display the virtue of faithfulness through keeping their virginity, they wouldn't have much else to offer a man. More interestingly, they were all attracted to very charismatic guys with a lot of sexual experience, which really irritated the h#ll out of them. I could also see that those charismatic guys (that they could catch) had so much sexual experience, that they had gained an ability to look beyond the visceral, aesthetic attraction (or the lack thereof) that most other guys get hung up on, in selecting a partner.

5. Women View Sex as the "Qualifying Round"

I discovered, through my unique experiences, that the applied, 'runaway', female hypergamy is necessarily a drive for sex, but they don't view sex like men do. Men view sex as the ultimate goalpost, or at least a major milestone in the development of a relationship. But (feral) women view sex as the 'Qualifying Round' – a test that men need to pass before advancing onto a LTR.

This ontology is something that I haven't seen described in any other Manosphere blog. But this post from The Masculine Principle comes pretty close: You Mean Nothing to a Woman Until You Have Sex (March 9, 2015). Here are a couple relevant excerpts.

> "A woman decides within seconds if she wants a man or not, and then immediately tests him to see if he is important enough, and in demand enough, to not have to chase her. Almost anything he does to pursue her, please her, or try to get close to her makes his value drop…"

Along this vain, I used to think that resisting sex would increase my perceived SMV. I was wrong! This is true for women, but for men, the opposite is closer to the truth.

> "A lot of men don't know this. They assume because they have put significant time and effort into wooing a girl and she is responding, that he is important to her. Nothing could be further from the truth. You will rarely find a woman who will admit this. But their behavior shows this very clearly. It is the rule, not the exception. Until you put your penis in a woman, you mean nothing to her, no matter what. Even after that, many will still flake on you soon after."

That means, if their implicit hypergamic desire is not met with a sexual payoff, rich in Tingles, then women turn cold and hateful. If you fail the 'qualifying round', you are automatically 'disqualified' from any further 'competition' for her attentions.

The flip side of the coin that is not covered by The Masculine Principle, is that if you actually expect a woman to chase you, or to do any kind of 'work' to earn your love and attention, then she will quickly turn tail and run to the next guy, and he doesn't need to be any more alpha than you are. He could simply be any guy within her immediate proximity who 'reads' her expected need for sexual affirmation, and delivers on the spot, without a lot of fuss.

Even if she thinks you're a perfect catch, even if she esteems you to be way above her on the SMV scale, she will still insist on playing the passive recipient, and pretend that she has no agency. If you don't read her signs and jump on the chance, then she is off to the next guy who, hopefully, will 'read her' better than you can, and deliver the goods without her having to ask. If she even thinks she has to ask, or tell you what she wants, then that will immediately disqualify you as well.

As I've grown older, I've come to recognize that the use of sex as a qualifying factor, is actually a power play that says,

> "Give me the kind of sex I want, when I want it, or else you will face my wrath and my rejection of you."

Men can use this power play, as much as women do, but fewer men have the ability to draw a woman of their choice into this dynamic.

Anyway, this control-based approach is a long way from true love.

6. A Woman's Sexually Charged Desire Can (Possibly) Be A Good Thing

One facet of my experiences which I initially rejected, and didn't really understand until after fully digesting the Red Pill years later, is that a man is blessed if the woman has a sexually charged desire for him. This is a state necessary for the man to exert power and control in the relationship, as well as grant him the ability to extract gratuitous p00n from her on a regular basis, when needed. The leadership of the man is essential towards constructing a stable, happy relationship.

I can actually see how this is a good thing. Now, when I say it's a good thing, I don't mean that it's good for building my notch count. No, I mean it's good for a woman to desire a particular man in that way, because it indicates a genuine physical attraction, which is absolutely crucial to have in a sexually satisfying relationship or marriage, as opposed to a contrived, transactional ‘arrangement’.

Conclusions

It took me a while to accept the fact that I wasn’t going to find a mature, loving, respectful woman, who earnestly desires me sexually, and who is also going to wait until marriage. At least, not in today’s society, and not even within the church.

Years later, I came to the conclusion that I would never find a loving woman (of a sufficiently equitable SMV) unless I moulded her myself.

The Dispensation of the Red Pill

Jack · 7 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Not everyone has an ability to communicate Red Pill truths, except those who have earned the capacity to do so. Those who have made more costly mistakes, suffered more, learned more difficult lessons, and have found more grace, have the unique ability, yes, even the duty, to offer encouragement and insights to others who are suffering in the same manner.

Readership: All

The truths of the Bible which have become hollow in modern times, need to be revisited and revamped. The truth begins nowhere else but inside us.

Over in the comments section on Dalrock's post, How to spot a faker. (April 3, 2018) we find a lot of men reacting to the implicit treachery in the pulpit by questioning the meaning of it all, and what is actually right. Commenter dvdivx wrote [emphasis mine],

> "Look I get the fact that Wilson is serving Satan. Could pick many more pastors putting idols like the vagina before God. Not a shortage. How about someone doing something right. Its like a dead horse. Wilson's not going to change. His heart has hardened and does not belong to God nor his Son. We get that. How about a post of what is right?"

Easier said than done, and who could do so?

For a man to get on a blog and fully describe in detail what is right, and what really works in a marriage, it is as rare as a show-quality paint job on a junkyard car.

The fact is, most guys who are enjoying a joyful, fruitful marriage would rather be busy with their wives and families, and would not feel compelled to labor long hours writing blog posts about it.

The most intriguing facet concerning the status of being happily married, is that these people are not consciously aware of what it is that they're doing right. So even if they did comprehend the widespread need of such knowledge, and made a diligent effort to disseminate the same, they would not even know how to describe it in words that a struggling, suffering person could at once grasp and understand.

The only person who is going to be able to offer an expert, detailed, and rationally understandable comparison between Success and Failure is the man who has experienced BOTH worlds, and truly much more of the latter.

SeriouslyPleaseDropIt wrote [emphasis mine],

> "The problem with all this verbal hedgery is that disciples are not pundits. The two populations have entirely different reactions to things written. Pundits will look for logical inconsistencies, mis-steps, etc. Those trying to actually learn something will be much more forgiving on that score, but much more demanding of actual wisdom. How many had to screw up, and how badly, that Heartiste was able to contribute something of value?"
> "Every time a pastor hedges to avoid the ire of feminists, a young Christian man discovers the pickup artists. Heaven grant that he doesn't linger."

I believe SeriouslyPleaseDropIt is hinting at the dynamic of ministry described in 2nd Corinthians 1:3-7.

> [3] Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies and God of all comfort, [4] who comforts us in all our tribulation, that we may be able to comfort those who are in any trouble, with the comfort with which we ourselves are comforted by God. [5] For as the sufferings of Christ abound in us, so our > consolation also abounds through Christ. [6] Now if we are afflicted, it is for your consolation and salvation, which is effective for enduring the same sufferings which we also suffer. Or if we are comforted, it is for your consolation and salvation. [7] And our hope for you is steadfast, because we know that as you are partakers of the sufferings, so also you will partake of the consolation.

Who are these men who have received 'consolation' and 'comfort' from God?

Considering how decrepit western society and morality has become, there are a multitude of men out there who have experienced the common hardships associated with the fruit of Feminism. You know them…

- Married men who tolerate a base existence living with an obese termagant for the sake of their children.
- Those frivorced, single fathers, who have to fork over 30% (or more) of their hard-earned dollars to a self-centered witch who betrayed his love and trust.
- Young MGTOW's who have read the writing on the wall, and dare not risk the hope of having a family.

How many of these men have overcome their mortal wounds and bitterness, and have lived to tell the tale? These are the men who have received 'consolation' and 'comfort' from God. These are the men who were born to be the new leaders in this dark age.

And the age is truly dark. Rollo Tomassi described this condition in his comment.

> "In light of the last 3 posts here, not only am I amazed that Christians ever reproduce at all, but I think I get why porn 'use' among Christian men is statistically higher than any other demographic of men."
> "What a mind job. I understand sex has always been the thumbscrew of men that the church uses to obligate compliance, but in an age where the Feminine Imperative drives doctrine (and by extension faith) and lays out those obligations it's become a self-perpetuating form of torture for men. Man up, marry those sluts. If she doesn't want to fuck you – your fault. You don't behave in the fem-church approved manner that all your male 'shepherds' are explaining to you, which the imperative dictates to them."
> "Turn to porn to find some kind of sexual release because you didn't do everything right to appease your wife? Your fault, you lustful male."
> "Seriously, what would possibly be viewed as an upside to Christian marriage and sex for a guy? For generations (up to even this one) we get this male shame for having repressed women's sexual natures for so long. This is women's go-to gripe with the church, but it's complete bullshit. It's men's sexuality that is repressed and used to fuel the church of the Feminine Imperative."

There's a world of hurt out there. That's for sure. It's epidemic, it's mass produced, and it's perpetuated by the institutions that were put in place for our well-being (e.g. the churches, local governments, courts and legal systems).

That's the bad news.

But the good news is that all these hurting men are in a prime condition to help and encourage other hurting men.

Why can't these men extend the same 'consolation' and 'comfort' to other men who 'partake of the same sufferings'?

If you're reading this, and you feel like God is putting his finger on you, saying, "That's you!", then whether you believe in God or not, you have received a heavenly calling to reach out to other men.

No, really! Consider it.

Are you an MGTOW with a wad of cash and nothing to do? Do you know a frivorced brother who's working three jobs until his dying day, just to make his alimony and child support payments, and avoid jail time? Why not help him out with those payments? Even if you just cover one or two of those payments to get him through a pinch, you'll have a true and loyal friend for life!

That is an eternal reward.

Maybe you don't have a load of cash, but you've got a special skill. A buddy needs a brake job, but lacks the tools and expertise? Invite him over to your garage on a Saturday. Work on his car together. Show him how it's done, and have a beer and a laugh!

In doing so, you are punching back at the evil forces of this age.

No money, and no skills? No problem. Have a barbecue party, and invite other men from your community, neighborhood, church, or workplace. Go on a hiking/camping trip. Tour the Appalachian Mountains on motorcycle. See the Adirondacks on horseback. Go to the Badlands, Yellowstone, or just your local nature reserve.

Enjoy your lives together with other men. No women are necessary!

Point is, maybe you've been cheated by women, by your church, by your employer, by society… but lift your eyes now to the hills (Psalm 121). Every new day brings a new beginning. This is the time for you to shine!

Reach out to those other men in the moments of their greatest distress, men who are in need of your companionship and masculine viewpoints, and your reward in heaven will be great!

Pick up the phone right now and call a buddy. Then get packing!

God bless you!

Censorship of Praise is the Thief of Joy

Jack · 11 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Have you ever noticed that any public statement of joy that glorifies the Lord God is painstakingly edited out of live feeds?

Of course, we know this is because the expression of true joy is deeply irritating in the eyes of the evil minions and emissaries lurking in mass media and elsewhere.

This came to my attention when I saw the recent news about an EF1 tornado that hit a Nazarene church in central Ohio. Miraculously, no one was hurt, and the church edifice only suffered cosmetic damages. Given this respite, wouldn't you expect these Nazarenes to be hopping with joy and singing Hallelujah! like Pentecostals?

Now take a look at this news clip. (The beginning has coverage of the tornado's damage. The report on the church begins at 0:35.)

When the news media hones in on the story, they don't interview the pastor or the deacons of the church. Instead, they interview the sophisticated architect of the church (McKnight), who also happens to be a member. I wonder, how many more hours of labor did they spend searching for the architect and arranging an interview, rather than just calling the pastor's front page number? And why the architect? (Meaning no disrespect to the man himself, but it's remiscient of GAOTU.) Why not the electrician, or the mason, or the groundskeepers? Why not someone who was actually in the building at the moment the tornado struck?

> "The Lord is my strength and shield. I trust him with all my heart. He helps me, and my heart is filled with joy. I burst out in songs of thanksgiving." ~ Psalm 28:7

In the interview, you can feel the intense joy that McKnight experiences, but the only verbal statement of joy retained by the news network is when he says, "Wow! I'm really proud of this building!" I expected him to finish that statement with an acknowledgment of the Lord's grace, and I was disappointed and angry when it didn't come.

Hey Mr. Newscaster, kudos to McKnight for a job well done, but it wasn't merely his architectural skills that kept that building in place.

Based on McKnight's gushing testimony, I truly believe that he did express genuine joy and thanksgiving for this miracle. But you won't see much of it in the video. Sadly, there is no thanksgiving, no praise, no mention of God's merciful hand, or Jesus. All credit to God has been carefully edited out. If you go back and watch the clip carefully, you can see how they cut and spliced together the video in order to remove all his references to the Lord.

When men neglect glorifying the Lord, and withhold from Him the sacrifice of praise, the spirit of hypermodern humanism soon settles in, followed by notions of fate, then hopelessness, and finally, idolatry. It's a just reward for those who are ashamed of Christ.

> "For whoever is ashamed of Me and My words, of him the Son of Man will be ashamed when He comes in His own glory, and in His Father's, and of the holy angels." ~ Luke 9:26 (NKJV)

The Nazarene Communications Network (NCN) News, a publication of the Nazarene Church, doesn't give any credit to God either, for this event. Their article, Ohio church helps with recovery efforts after tornado (April 6, 2018) only parrots the news flash from WCMH-TV, and the interview with the architect.

I wept when I saw this. How long will you disrespect the Lord by withholding your praise?

> [39] "Some of the Pharisees in the crowd said to Jesus, 'Teacher, rebuke your disciples!' [40] 'I tell you,' he replied,

> ‘if they keep quiet, the stones will cry out.’” ~ Luke 19:39-40

The recent mass proliferation of homegrown news media and blogs, are all proof that ‘the stones are crying out’ for us, as humans (specifically, the News media) to give God His dues of recognition, credit, praise and gratitude.

Zeitgeist Report 2018

Jack · 15 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

It is of interest to see how the Red Pill awakening will change societal advances in the near future. History maps out the trajectory of where we have been, and suggests where we are going. (Also of interest, the swing of the pendulum has been fairly predicted by Strauss and Howe in their book, 'Generations'.)

I put together this crude outline of some important events in Manospherian history, and I found several 'periods' of development, which I'll call a zeitgeist. It seems coincidental that these zeitgeists seem to align with U.S. presidential terms.

[Eds. note: To those readers who are seasoned veteran Manospherians, my apologies if I have omitted any important points. Please leave a message, and I will make an addendum.]

A List Of The Zeitgeists

1992-2000 Decadence of Society under growing feminist influence.

2000-2008 Golden age of PUA's.

2008-2016 The rise (and splitting) of the Manosphere and other conservative reactionary groups.

2016-2024? The waning influence of the Manosphere. Red Pill Awakening continues and spreads to the general populace amidst continuing societal decay. Many women begin to respect and appreciate the Red Pill perspective. The sun finally sets on PUArtistry, as men segregate into different archetypes of SMMV hierarchy. The rise of Nutraditionalism.

2024-2032? The Reset? Crash and let 'em burn, the Phoenix rises.

2032-2040?

A Brief Outline Of The History

Prior to 2014: It was abundantly shown that Biblical Christianity is closely correlated with many, if not all, Red Pill truths, to which even the most hedonistic PUA's, and avant atheists have tipped their hats in sincere regard. Based on this, Christians and Red Pillers found themselves in the same boat. A very clear line then became evident, between those who acknowledge truth, and those who do not. 'Truthers' acknowledge the facts for what they are, while 'Others' continue to hamsterbate their emotions and set their autopilot to follow the script they've been fed, e.g. 'be true to your heart', the cultural feminist imperative, and the contradictory pseudovalues of 'diversity' and 'equality'. After these new battle lines had become evident, the Truthers assumed that those groups who are less prone to delusion and deception have the high ground.

2015: The documentary, The Red Pill, by Cassie Jaye was released amid a huge controversy.

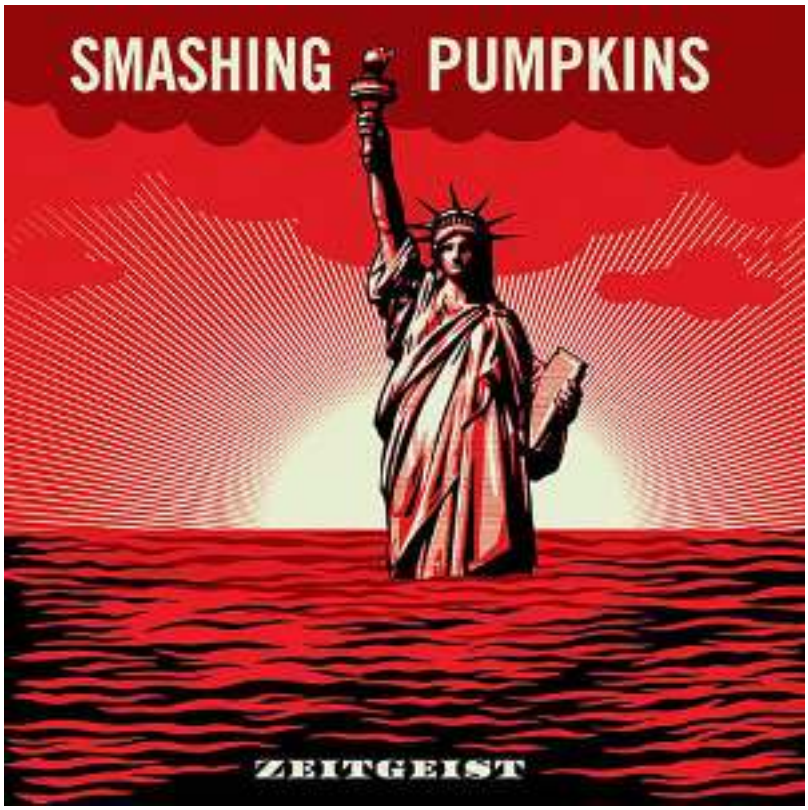
2016: To everyone's surprise, Trump wins the U.S. presidential election, thereby confirming the conservative platform, indicating the rise of nationalism, and proving that the liberal media had fluffed the ratings, and staged propaganda in Clinton's favor.

2017: The End (or regeneration) of Conservatism as we know it.

December 14-15, 2017: Vox and Dalrock, two longstanding lords of the Manosphere had a row about MGTOW, Morale and Respect, which was contained in the following posts.

1. Vox Popoli: Low Morale Men (December 9, 2017)
2. Dalrock: No respect. (December 14, 2017)

2018: A call goes out for Manospherians to move on from analysis, and try to precipitate some strategies for the various ontological problems in society.



The Red Pill Philosophy has Precipitated Completely

The concepts listed below are becoming widely accepted and greatly revered as the standard fare of the Red Pill, at least for Red Pill aware people. Sure, there will always be new recruits coming in, who find novelty (and anger) in these discoveries, but the concepts themselves have been thoroughly discussed from just about every angle, and have been analyzed and articulated in 'elegant' form.

The Fundamental Problems of Modern Society

- Postmodernism
- Raging Feminism
- The Sexual Inquisition
- Churchianity
- The demonization of masculinity
- The threats posed to traditional marriage

The Female Feral Nature

- Hypergamy
- The Feminine Imperative

The Current State of the SMP

- The Debasement of Marriage
- The Postponement of Marriage
- The 80/20 Rule

- Indicators of SMV vs. MMV
- Open Relationships
- Cohabitation

Game

- Detachment
- Dread

There are remaining only a few small pockets of confusion to clear up, including the following.

- Moral agencies of men and women.
- The Impasse

The remaining topics are highly dependent on one's value system and world view, so maybe they will never reach a full resolution.

But whether there are any further developments from within the men's community or not, we can still look forward to the reeducation of society to reach a critical momentum. I am convinced that it will, eventually, because all this information is a Godsend for any young virile man, no matter what segment of the manosphere he falls into, Gamers, marriage-minded, or MGTOW.

Future Projections and Prognostications

The Manosphere and other conservative blogs are projecting where society is going in the near future.

- An increase in the frequency and social acceptability of Open Hypergamy.
- Increasing castigation and emasculation of men and fatherhood
- Mass Immigration changes demographics, cultures and traditions.
- Miscegenation on a larger scale.
- Decline of the White Majority
- Decline of Christian Influence
- Decline of Protestantism and the rise of more conservative religions, like Orthodox. Example here.
- Persecution of Christians – As of late, the persecution, rape and genocide of Christians is reaching record proportions, especially in the middle east and Africa.
- Persecution of Red Pillers – As Scott and Boxer have pointed out, Red Pill adherents are catching an ever increasing amount of flak from opposing segments of society, e.g. feminists, liberals, media conglomerates, 'big brother' entities, (whatever one might believe they are).

[Eds. note: I plan to revise for accuracy, and update this information, in the future.]

What To Do When A Girl Tries To Make You Jealous

Jack · 22 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Readership: Men in relationships with women they value.

An abridged version of this article was previously published by the author on Return of Kings: What To Do When A Girl Tries To Make You Jealous (April 15, 2018).

The outline of the present article is as follows.

1. Introduction
2. Is Jealousy really Love?
3. Why does she play the jealousy game?
4. How a man should react.
5. Specific Points and Plays.
6. What to do when (she says) you failed her (idealistic) expectations.
7. Dealing with Dating Sites.
8. Dealing with Exes.
9. Conclusions

"Jealousy" by Edvard Munch, ca. 1907.

1. Introduction

'The Jealousy Game' is a game that most women play at some point in a relationship, some more than others. The game works like this. She picks out another man, usually one she has at least a moderate degree of attraction towards, and she flirts with him, either by talking about him in an adoring fashion, or by displaying non-verbal cues of interest to that man while you are around (e.g. extended eye contact, warm smiling, touching her hair, neck or face, etc.). She chats him up in your presence, all the while expressing profuse admiration for his most mundane qualities.

If online, she exchanges a chain of messages, usually drenched with emoticons. She will turn up the volume on her notification alarms, filling the room with an annoying barrage of 'dings'. She might even give out her contact information to that man, or tentatively arrange to meet up with him (again) sometime in the future. In short, she gives feral attention to another man, and that attention is of higher quality or quantity than what she normally gives to you.

All this fawning attention and time spent on this other guy, is done with the express purpose of making you feel intense jealousy. The kicker is that it is only right that you should feel jealous, because she is giving the kind of attention to another man, that she should only be giving to you.

It makes you think the Why question.

> "She knows how to treat a man with respect and dignity. So why can't she do that for me?"

2. Is Jealousy really Love?

The Jealousy Game is purported (by women) to be a test of 'how much you love her'. So in her mind, if she can make you jealous somehow, then your jealousy is evidence that you 'love' her.

But smart men should not be deceived into believing this hamsterbated justification. When women use the word 'Love', it is usually a deceptive misnomer. Women generally do not understand what altruistic love is. They're just playing games.

Here, it might help to discern the difference between jealousy and envy. Jealousy is when you feel a sense of injustice when someone else is getting something that rightfully belongs to you, whereas, envy is when you wish you had something that rightfully belongs to someone else. Jealousy can be a righteously justifiable emotion under certain circumstances, while envy is an embodiment of the sin of covetousness and sometimes lust as well.

Scripture states that love is not envious and never loses faith.

> "[4] Love suffers long and is kind; love does not envy; love does not parade itself, is not puffed up; [5] does not behave rudely, does not seek its own, is not provoked, thinks no evil; [6] does not rejoice in iniquity, but rejoices in the truth; [7] bears all things, believes all things, hopes all things, endures all things." ~ 1st Corinthians 13:4-7 (NKJV)

Some translations, such as the NLT, substitute the word 'jealous' for 'envious'. This could be misleading, because there is a fundamental difference between jealousy and envy. Jealousy is not necessarily wrong, and the Bible even states that God becomes jealous when his followers carelessly worship idols. (e.g. Exodus 34:12-16) So right now, you're feeling what God feels.

Anyway, chances are, she doesn't understand the difference between jealousy and envy, and making you jealous is certainly not a gesture of real love. If she is one of those rare reasonable women, then pointing out her behavior, and explaining that it is wrong, might get you somewhere. But if she is a typical woman in denial about everything, and you try to explain this to her, rest assured, you can expect an explosive reaction, because following an analogy to the passage in Exodus, you're making her out to be an idolater!

3. Why Does She Play The Jealousy Game?

I want to tell you guys how it goes with women, so that you can have some hope and confidence about your predicament. I know these things from experience.

Whenever women are trying to make you feel jealous, they are feeling their own inadequacies, and getting the goad to growth. But they don't want to do the hard work of improving themselves. They just want a fast and quick affirmation of their SMV to give their precious ego a little boost. (BTW, choosing false comfort over true courage is referred to as 'spiritual adultery' in the Bible.)

The Jealousy Game is actually a bomb loaded with several payoffs, all to her interest:

- It keeps the emotional interaction of the relationship at a visceral, feral level, which supercharges her appetite for drama.
- She hones her skill in exercising her feminine powers.
- She poses a test of your emotional obeisance (or lack thereof) to her feral power.
- She tests your frame, and gets to understand how you deal with her apparent 'lack of self-control' around potential rivals.
- She is 'testing the limit' to see what she can get away with.
- She compares you to the other guy, to see who stacks up better.
- She can put you on the defensive and watch you squirm, just for her own egotistical pleasure.
- She might harvest information from these encounters to use against you, or to stick you to the wall in a future argument.
- She explores and tests the interest in her from other guys, thus scoping out 'greener fields'.
- She revises and refines her estimation of her own SMV.
- She indulges her fantasy of being one who is desired by men.
- She expands her social network.

No matter how the game plays out, she wins a prize. Even if nothing further develops between her and the other guy, the sheer pleasure of hijacking the attention of two men is a worthwhile consolation prize to her.

4. How A Man Should React

First of all, no matter what kind of problem comes up, just stay calm, think it through, and stay busy working on a solution. Things will turn out fine – with or without her.

It is going through the difficulty that increases one's confidence to face similar difficulties, and yes, all these challenges certainly increase one's faith.

But even after you establish a solid Frame, and step up your Game, you will still have aggravations from women. For example, my faith drives my wife batty. I am so cool and objective whenever a problem comes up, that she thinks I am clueless or lazy. So it might be helpful to accept the fact that she's always going to dump a bit of crap, no matter what. Just recognize that it is her own sh!t, not yours. Now on to the topic at hand.

Chateau Heartiste's post, Your Daily Game: Thot Training (January 21, 2018), covers the Jealousy Game situation. CH lists four possible reactions that a man might have when his girl plays the Jealousy Game, listed in ascending order of personal benefit and relationship management effectiveness:

1. To get defensive, upset or angry
2. To promptly try to make her jealous
3. To tease her
4. To ignore her

The first is to be avoided at all costs. The second option shows a modicum of awareness, as it compares to Dread Game, but if done as a reaction, it appears too obvious and comes off as childish in her eyes.

CH explains how the fourth option is the best response, because you don't want to give her any satisfaction, or any feedback that might be interpreted as a sign of weakness. Ignoring her moves in the Jealousy Game is a test of your constitution and emotional control, which can be very challenging. (See CH's post for more on this angle.)

But depending on the circumstances and the personalities involved, ignoring her behavior might appear like you are silently condoning the behavior, or that you are too weak to face up to it. You will know this is the case, if and when she slowly grows more aggressive and arrogant in her approaches to other men. In this case, teasing becomes the best option.

5. Specific Points and Plays

The main overriding strategy of teasing is to expose her mind, and reveal her to be a con artist of psychological escapism. Make her aware of how her notions are not realistic, and what she would lose from a mutiny.

Some common game tactics are useful to this end, including,

- Agree and Amplify
- Amused Mastery
- Asking pointed, realistic questions
- Probing and dissecting her mind
- Dread

Most importantly, you have to trust God to show her the sin of it, and to produce a repentance in her. Remaining calm and good humored is how you display your faith in God. If you can make her talk about her secret little false idol, then you might be able to extract a confession out of her, which would snap her out of her delusions, and resolve the situation.

But if you get upset and angry, if you beg and plead, if you try to force a repentance, then you'll come off as butthurt, you'll give her satisfaction, lose the game, and push her away.

So the most important thing to remember in teasing is to stay calm, be emotionally detached, and seemingly entertained by her antics. Whatever she is complaining about that drove her to make you jealous, just agree and amplify it to the point of mockery. Laughing at her is almost always a good move. Some guys might find that making funny faces might increase her annoyance to their advantage.

6. What To Do When (She Says) You Failed Her (Idealistic) Expectations

First, a word about women's expectations. Women want the effervescent circus, to be childish, to have incessant fun, to be entertained, to show their ass (figuratively and literally) to who they want, how they want, and when they want… To not have to be introspective, to not have to consider consequences, to not be held accountable… In short, to remain ignorantly, blissfully immature. They actually expect this!

The point of it all is this, she wants to be lazy carefree, and rely on you to take up the slack, and she doesn't want to worry about your reliability in doing so either. She wants to focus on the fun! The hard stuff is for you to deal with (so she thinks).

Now, women's own inadequacies can easily get ensnarled with their hypergamous nature. As mentioned earlier, women tend to psychologically project their own inadequacies, and displace their anxieties onto you by sifting you, pushing your buttons, trying to get an emotional rise out of you, and testing your limit.

All women (and arguably all humans) have this nature, but a decent woman recognizes this proclivity to be a weakness, whereas a bad woman selfishly proclaims it as a right. For example, all the arguments and purposes behind modern feminism are seeking to preserve and perpetuate women's (and gay's) blissful immaturity. It is an idol.

Instead of her analyzing your 'worthiness', she should be reflecting on her own. It's up to you to keep her introspective. The game tactics listed earlier all come into play at this point.

Stay cool and don't give them any satisfaction on that. Keep her on her toes at all times. Don't let laziness sink in, or else she will start taking it for granted, and you will lose control of the game.

Dread especially, is a gameplay that keeps them aware of the precariousness of life, and therefore humble and real. Just be careful about not laying it on too soon after she does.

Now let's apply this knowledge towards teasing her, whenever she is trying to make you jealous.

For example, if she complains that you aren't making enough money, and then flirts with Mr. Moneybags Morton, then ask her something like,

> "How many of those millionaires are named Morton?"

Say the name sarcastically, smile casually, and laugh in a dismissive manner. Then drive it home by reframing it.

> "Do you think (another handsome guy she flirts with) will ever be a millionaire, assuming he ever gets a job?"
> "Maybe if you gave him a magic rubdown, he'll get inspired (sarcasm), and then he'll suddenly transform into a high-end lawyer in D.C.! But then of course, he would ditch you for a high-end hoe. Tsk, tsk, tsk… Why is life so frustrating?"

If she has ridiculed the size of your manhood, and has bragged about how she gets throbbing wet for big c0cks, then it might be better to ignore it. But if she keeps pressing the issue, then you could make it into a running joke. For example, occasionally make off-the-wall comments when she leasts expects it, insinuating that she is obsessed with the 19 cm. (7.5") long, ding dong, donkey kong, katana that she uses for her hara kiri sex ritual – just long enough to reach her miniscule heart.

Be sure to say this in a calm manner, and smile. Don't be angry, or else it will give her satisfaction.

7. Dealing with Dating Sites

Women who are into online dating sites (or even flirting on Facebook) are more into fantasy than reality. Here, she is fantasizing about the payoffs to the jealousy bomb mentioned earlier. So the main strategy in this case is to destroy her fairy tale and bring her back to reality. Teasing is advantageous towards this end as well.

So if your girlfriend/wife has made it known that she joined an online dating site, that's pretty p!ss poor of her, but you can handle this little test. Just stay calm, keep busy doing your own thing, and watch her using your peripheral vision.

Whatever drove her to seek 'luurve' online, find out what it is that makes her hamster squeal. Is it any of the following?

- Attracting attention?
- Meeting new people?
- Getting 'Likes' (ego strokes) on social media?
- Receiving mail?
- Endless text messaging about nothing at all?
- Being risqué (posting skin-heavy photos)?
- Photos of hot guys with perfectly chiseled abs?

Try to identify what her little fetish is, and hone in on that with your Game strategy. Then talk about it in a ridiculous, dismissive manner. Agree and amplify it to the point of mockery.

> "Are you getting a hundred messages a day now?"

She won't.

> "Oh, this one is the 19th handsome, CEO millionaire that has proposed a 10 minute marriage to you this week! You don't saaay? And this one has a Bugatti with a matching pop-up camper and gun rack! Niiice!"
> "Now I understand why you think I am so _____." (Any adjective will do, so use the diabolical one she's fond of calling you.)
> "You really shouldn't send him those 10-year-old high school photos. Your recent post-partum photos are much more attractive. MILF's are sexy!"
> "Is he taking too long to respond? Don't worry about that. He's probably busy cleaning up the mess on his keyboard. You know how kids are these days…"

By the way, getting her to talk about sex is not such a bad move, because she is talking about sex with you. It helps to create an association between sex and you, in her mind.

Another trick to bring her back to reality, is to ask her pointed questions.

> "Has he sent the same dick pic to you that he sent to the last 41 women on Tinder (or whatever site she is on)?"

> (She remains silent.) “Not yet? You better ask him for one, to make sure he’s not a pencil-d!ck.”

You could even hope for an uncanny match that would blow her mind. For example,

> “Is that _____? …that guy from (a city or community where you used to live)?” (Then lean in and look at his profile.) “Yeah! That’s him! Tell him I said hi! How’s his wife doing?”

The more informal the name, the more you’ll confuse her and throw her off. Remember that name and ask her about him again the next time she gets on the dating site.

Once she gets a few dick-pics and exchanges a few messages with the desperate dirtbags, she’ll realize how great she’s got it with you, and her guilt will kick in. That guilt, coupled with gratitude, and a sense of grace, is what will bring her back around. Give her the free choice to be obedient. Let God do the work of conviction, not you. This is the larger goal of teasing.

8. Dealing with Exes

Women who are talking and daydreaming about an ex, and who might even contact him periodically, are missing an emotional nuance that he was feeding her ego, which is probably one that you are not into so much. You’re also wrestling against her ingrained memories of his sexual charisma, which you may never be able to totally erase.

The main strategy in this case is to remove her ego fixation on those attributes by parceling them as trite and cute, but ultimately unsatisfying towards fulfilling a more sophisticated desire, which she presumably has developed with you. Teasing also works well to this end.

If she is actually contacting an ex, you could tease her by asking her personal questions. Don’t be afraid to dig into her on that, and be sure to make her ex look pathetic.

> “So how many women has _____ banged since he last had yours? He’ll never settle down…”
> “He messaged you first? He must be drunk again.”

> "We know he only slept around because he was sooo heartbroken after losing you! Poor guy!"
>
> "I forget now, were you his number 26, or 27, AFTER he came to (the city where they met), or is that just the number he told you?"
> "Of course! He wanted to marry you, but he just couldn't handle all your purple rubber vibrators (or whatever her fetish is)!"
> "I know he's got a pinky d!ck, because halfway in, it gets a lot tighter."

You could also mock her sexual mannerisms. For example, if she makes certain faces or funny sounds while she is getting drilled, you can imitate these while saying a bogus name in a stuttering, choking voice.

> "Ee-aww! Ee-aww!" (guttural gasp) "Ca-ree-ass! Ca-ree-ass!" (viz. 'Chris', in a falsetto voice)

The point here is to expose her desire for him on a conscious level, which can be dealt with, mocked and deposed.

Or you could sing a ridiculous love song with puns and his name inserted.

> "Tiny bubbles… in the sea – men… tiny buttholes… make me feel haaappy… make me squirm all over…"

Some of these behaviors might seem hopelessly pathetic, but the point is, make yourself laugh. If you can make her laugh too, then you've won the Game.

9. Conclusions

Always remember to stay calm, cool, and confident, as an expression of your faith in God. Displaying this behavior is what proves to her that you are better than anyone else she could find.

Make sure you call out the thing that turns her on (or off) the most. Make her talk about it, if possible. You might be able to get her to confess it, which is necessary for a repentance to happen.

You need to know, when flirt comes to f*ck, is she in or out? You've got to press the issue and make her decide to either stay with you, or leave. Either way it turns out, you need to know the state of the union, and be at peace with that.

If she's really into you, and just giving you a sh!t test, then she'll humbly and silently make you a sandwich, fold your laundry, etc. with gratitude, after you expose her bluff.

But if she can actually talk about such things calmly and arrogantly, and add her own spin to it without some kind of confession taking place, then she is not just daydreaming about prince charming, she is talking reality. In this case, your relationship was over a millennium ago.

If she actually does jump into an affair, or leaves you, then she's choosing sin over grace. In that case, there's no goodness in her, and you're better off without her. Dump the thot and move on. That's tough advice to take, but it's better to face the reality of it head on, and stay on top of your life, because life is too short to play the Jealousy Game.

[Eds. note: Deep Strength has further expanded on how Game (i.e. teasing, dread, etc.) is merely a tool for dealing with an idolatrous woman in rebellion, and is not an end game solution. The ultimate solution is for her to abandon her idolatry of self, and instead, conform to a Christian woman's posture of submission. See his post below for more on this angle.]

RT Spews Competition in the Media Wars

Jack · 25 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Readership: All

Recently, I came across Russian state media's English language service, Russia Today (RT). I got a pop up window advertising "RT News". I'd never heard of it before, so I subscribed to it, just to check it out.

After that, I got pop ups about every 20 minutes with a new story from RT. After a while, this got irritating. I don't know of any other news site that has notifications like these.

My curiosity about the quality of the news source was then piqued, so I started to look at the design and content of their webpages. I found several indicators of a shoddily managed page.

So here, I'll present an analysis of one page that came to my attention. I will not comment about whether their articles are fundamentally true or not, because the investigation is still underway (and I am no expert on politics – I find it disgusting, actually), but based on the quality of presentation, I suspect something is off. The article covered here is this one.

RT News: Moscow has 'irrefutable' evidence chem attack in Syria's Douma was staged – Russia's envoy to OPCW (April 16, 2018)

I happened to open up this page as soon as I got the notification pop up, because this is a story I am intensely interested in. I really want to know the truth behind the U.S.'s justification for bombing Damascus. Is President Al-Assad really using chemical attacks on his own people? If so, then what are the motives behind that? Is it to suppress an uprising? Or… is this a staged political event to further advance the schemes and motives of western powers?

(BTW, ever since the lie about the purported "weapons of mass destruction" that was offered as an excuse to 'preemptively' invade Iraq in 2003, weapons that were never found, even after the conclusion of active conflict, I have been suspicious of the real purposes of the American Military Industrial Complex, and the Deep State's motives behind it.)

Anyway, after the page loaded, I saw that the story and video had not yet been uploaded on their server. There was just a blank, maroon video screen with white letters that said, "BREAKING NEWS". The screen looked like this for about 40 minutes. (Sorry about the poor image quality.)

As I was waiting for the video to appear, I perused the rest of the page. The first thing I noticed is that the author or news correspondent of the article is not listed.

Then I noticed the time stamps. There were two – one on the header, and one on the post. Under the article's title is the posting timestamp, which says (in the photo),

Published time: 16 Apr, 2018 14:20

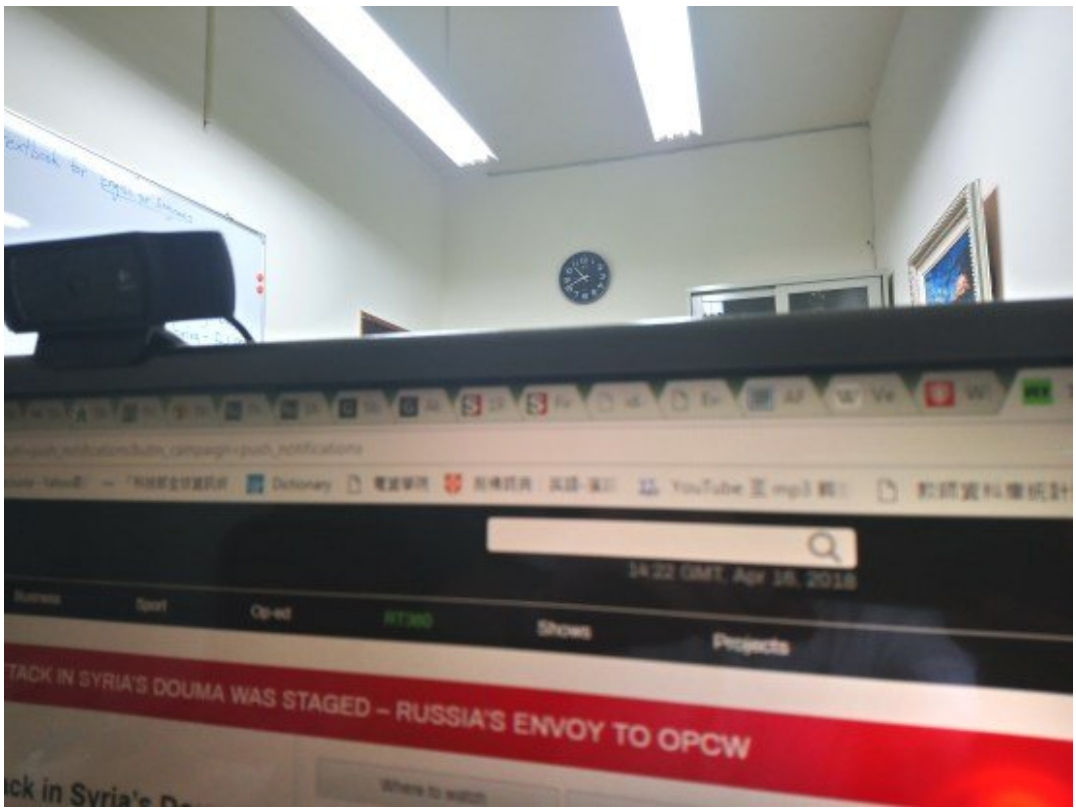
This is a European date format.

At the upper right hand corner of the window, the header shows the current time.

14:22 GMT, Apr 16, 2018

This is an American date format. (I took this screen shot two minutes after the article was posted.)

Furthermore, neither of these times corresponds to the correct time. After adjusting for the time zone difference, I found it's behind about 15 minutes. (The clock in my office is set 5 minutes ahead of time.)



Further down the page (as shown in the earlier photo), after only two minutes, under an article that has a blank video screen, and no written text other than the title, there are already 89 comments! All of these commenters have cryptic or comical names, and none of them have a profile photo. All the comments were like, “Great, let’s see it!” or “Now the American’s will know the truth!”

Heh…

There was no real substance in any of the comments. To me, all these comments collectively appeared like a prime example of a staged public endorsement of the propaganda set forth.

Lastly, I did some research to find out the origin of this news site, and I found that it is organized and heavily funded by the Russian government. However, their website does not show a page that states their political stance, the locations of their correspondencies, or their sources of support. I think this belies a lack of transparency, or at least a very low professional quality of webhosting.

Even so, I tend to trust RT News more than CNN’s squeaky clean, polished appearance that pushes Fourth Wave Feminism, and the left’s political agenda, without any apology or self-acknowledgment. At least RT doesn’t have members of the V@nderbilt family, black guys with British accents, or aging, stoic, female news anchors with a nasally voice or a resting B face. Besides, if NBC hates RT, then it must be pretty good! At least the competition will force western media to step up their game, hopefully for the better.

I am not necessarily favoring the Russians, I’m just saying, ‘Unbiased News’ is an oxymoron! The only way to get the full scoop is by reading several news sources of widely varied political stances, and then reading between the lines. This is exactly what many news blogs attempt to do, and that is why I read those more than any syndicated news sources.

My conclusion is that the Russian government has wisely recognized that public opinion is of greater import than truth (in politics), and has put down a lot of money on this news platform. There are a lot of paid employees (I presume) creating posts and comments, but overall, they are not very careful or smart about the presentation. Instead, they are offering the official Russian narrative, and concentrating on presenting a strong appeal to the Millennial generation, which is a very smart move on their part.

Bottom Line: Although RT News has it's foibles, Russia is putting a very impressive effort into the media wars, and this changes the whole information game. Although it may be heavily biased and of questionable accuracy, it still offers an overall perspective that deserves consideration.

Stepping up to the Challenge

Jack · 29 April 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The journey of a thousand miles, begins with a single step.

Readership: All men, and women in LTR's

Growth is a Process

It's easy for men to read about the Socio-Sexual Hierarchy of men, which is frequently cited on the Manosphere, and then come to see a man's inherent value and social efficacy as a static quality. But this notion does not reflect the truth.

The truth is that men go through different stages of development as they mature throughout their lives. Here are some examples that may ring true with the reader.

- The chiseled guy who was the star quarterback in high school, and was admired by all the ladies, becomes a beer guzzling, couch potato, working a dead-end job, all burned out by midlife.
- The high school geek who was mercilessly parodied and ridiculed, and who couldn't get a date to save his life, suddenly 'fills out' in college, and eventually becomes the co-owner of a software firm, making six-figures a year. He marries a nice girl, and enjoys a comfortable life.
- The seasoned PUA with a notch count in the hundreds, finally gets bored and weary in dealing with fickle females. He settles down with one good woman with the mind to raise a family and live a quiet life.
- The loyal, hardworking, Blue Pilled Beta hubby gets cheated on and frivorced by his 'sweetheart' wife of seven years. Heartbroken, he swallows the Red Pill and eventually comes to preside over a soft harem of attractive divorcees.

Most every man comes into a mature life-game mentality at some point in his life. The alpha males are the guys who 'get it' early and easily. Other guys need time, experience, and mentoring before they can pick it up.

Fortunately for men, we tend to get better over time. Men don't 'hit the wall', and afterwards go rapidly downhill. Like the SF adage says,

> "Men age like wine and cheese; Women age like milk and disease."

With effort and experience, men can, and do, get better throughout their lives. So we would do well to look at the accumulation of personal investments in one's self.

From this perspective, the whole concept of 'potential' is annoyingly understated, downplayed, and ignored.

When we assess a man, do we consider what he could be, or do we only look at his present state?

The Missing Link

What's missing in today's western society is the one-on-one teaching, older men mentoring younger men, and examples of authentic masculinity are getting rare. If this trend is not reversed soon, Feminist inspired society will nail the lid on the coffin.

To buck this trend, here are three case studies of men and situations which describe the hard and painful journey of going from a boyish idiot (e.g. beta male) to being a man that is a master of the game (e.g. alpha male).

Case Study 1: The Recovering Late Bloomer

OmegaMan left this insightful comment on Adam Piggott's post, He Gets It (March 22, 2018).

> "When I first started to seriously think about girls I was the inexperienced idiot who knew absolutely nothing about how to relate to the opposite sex. When you're a pudgy inexperienced young man making his first ever approach to what seems like a nice young girl, and you get humiliated in front of everybody for your audacity, then that is enough to shut down most guys for a while. When everybody inadvertently lies to you about what girls want, and you believe it and you then get repeatedly shot down in FLAMES, you just give up. That was me! I gave up and never approached another lady for all of my 20's. With my confidence destroyed, I concentrated on school first and then career."
> "As I was approaching the third decade of my life, a friend got me into weight lifting, and while I was not fat, I couldn't be called fit either. Anyway, through weight lifting, a transformation came over me. As women started to look at me, my confidence levels rose to the point where I once again started asking women to go out. Add a Corvette, and women started throwing themselves at me."
> "Through a sometimes still painful process, I learned how to treat women the way they like and want to be > treated. The ‘piece de resistance’ came when one young lady told me that she loved watching my muscles as we fucked.”

> “I eventually met a young lady who tried so very hard to show me what a good wife she would make, and of course I took her up on the offer. After many, many years we’re still happily married, and it looks like it will last to the end of our days. You know that you still have it, when your woman rips your clothes off, and drags you into bed.”
> “I think I’m at the point where I ‘get it’, but it was not always like that. The journey was hard, very hard, and I nearly gave up for good. I have my one friend to thank for starting me on my journey, and to him I will be forever grateful.”
> “We need to realize that we are born as boys, not men, and that the journey to manhood is hard. The question then is, how do we, in this matriarchal society, help young boys to cast off their childish ways, and become the men that not only build the society in which we live, but that women will lust over as well.”

I believe OmegaMan’s experience of snail-paced growth is more common than anyone suspects. Men don’t talk about these things much. The important thing is that he eventually ‘got it’, and he’s also enjoying a successful and mutually fulfilling marriage.

Case Study 2: The Faith to Leave a Bad Situation

Fellow blogger, Snapper, had the guts to leave his church because the church was teaching an inverted hierarchy of marital headship, his wife was learning those things, and it was ruining his marriage. Snapper tells his story in this series of posts.

- Snapper TRX: Meeting With My Pastors I (September 27, 2016)
- Snapper TRX: Meeting With My Pastors II (October 14, 2017)
- Snapper TRX: Meeting With My Pastors III (June 26, 2017)

As you can see by the posting dates, this transition of leaving a bad church situation probably took nearly 10 months. That’s not easy. Snapper also explains the difficulties he faced in dealing with his wife and mother-in-law in this post.

- Snapper TRX: Meeting With My Pastors IV (October 11, 2016)

Snapper's done the right thing in getting away from the Wolf that's chasing his wife, but now he needs to find another flock of sheep. We're still waiting to read Snapper's follow-up stories of a new beginning with another fellowship of believers.

Some commenters suggested that, until he found another church to attend, he should start meeting with other men. To this, Snapper replied,

> "I've considered [starting my own men's Bible study group], but I'm afraid I might be considered the de facto 'leader' of a group if I put out the call and I, at the moment, am not qualified to be a leader in such things, as my home is not really in order [referring to the problems surrounding male headship in marriage]. The continued issues with my wife and daughter put me in a bad position. I don't really know if putting out the call and assembling some guys for study would necessarily be a 'church', but by default someone has to lead said group, and I don't think I am biblically qualified. I'm still mulling it over, as I don't see anyone else standing up in answer to the call for some good old fashion Bible study, and it is much needed. Thanks for the prayers."

Often times, the pressing 'need' for a leader to step up to bat in a challenging circumstance, and the willingness of someone to do so, is more important than a man's ability or readiness. The next case study will examine this phenomena.

Case Study 3: Transitioning to be the Leader of a Small Group Bible Study Recently, my men's group had a similar discussion about leadership. The current leader, Tyson*, had been leading for over three years, and he was burned out and couldn't lead anymore. He wanted to step down so that he could focus on his new career and some other things. The pastor thought it was a good idea, because it would give other men the chance to gain leadership experience.

When Tyson announced his decision to the Men's Group, he asked if there was anyone else who wanted to take the lead. Only one guy in the group, Glenn*, volunteered to continue leading. After some discussion, and no objections, Tyson announced that Glenn would be the new leader. The pastor was also informed of the planned change of leadership, and he blessed Glenn as the new leader, while also encouraging the others to take turns leading. A couple months later, Tyson stepped down as planned, and passed the mantle to Glenn.

Now, none of the other guys objected to Glenn's leadership during those two interim months, but a couple weeks after Glenn started leading, some of the guys in the group came to Tyson privately, and said they didn't want Glenn to lead. They offered reasons why they thought Glenn was unfit to lead, which included him being divorced, and that his Red Pilled views caused them to question his theology, and whether or not he believed in sound doctrine.

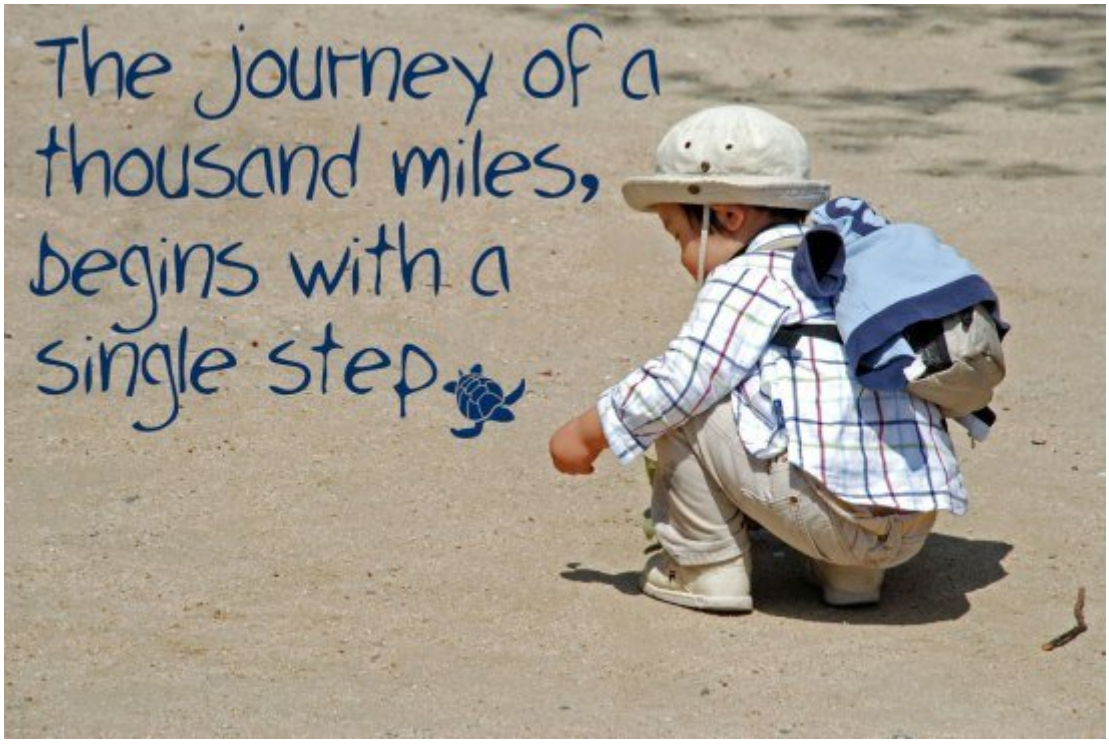
In response, Tyson defended Glenn's new position as leader, saying in effect, that no one except Christ himself has perfect doctrine, and that Glenn's doctrine was just as sound as any of theirs. Tyson's and the Pastor's stance on this issue was that the experience of leading under the church authority is what builds leadership ability and refines sound doctrine in a man. [This is the main point of this post.] Even so, the other guys didn't want to accept Glenn as the new leader, while at the same time, none of them wanted to lead either. So, if Glenn didn't step up, there would be no one to lead Men's group.

As a result, the Men's Bible study group split into two factions. Four guys, including Tyson, continued to meet with Glenn as the new leader, while the other nine guys decided to form their own Bible Study group. However, only two of those nine guys attended Men's group regularly, and since neither of them wanted to lead that group, their group essentially dissolved into an online chat group. Meanwhile, Glenn's group experienced an incredible revival of the Holy Spirit. Their prayers were answered in dramatic ways, and they saw their numbers grow as well. Within a few months, two more men (who were not previously members of the church) joined Glenn's Bible Study.

Glenn later told Tyson that he felt guilty after the group split up, as if he were the cause of the fracture. Tyson said there was nothing to be guilty about. Tyson also said that actually, he was glad the group split, because it was God's way of clearing out those guys with poor commitment and low motivation, which was necessary for the faithful remnant to experience a renewal in their lives.

 Names have been changed for the usual reasons.*



Conclusions

If a layman has the opportunity, desire, and willingness to lead, then he should give it a shot, whether it be a promotion, a small Bible study group, a community group, a relationship with a woman, or being a father. He should not excuse himself, saying that he lacks experience and proper training, etc., because he will develop these things in the process of engaging new challenges in his new role. If he does excuse himself, for whatever reason, he is only denying himself the chance to earn experience.

It also helps to not be so myopic. Leadership is not just about the leader. Concerning the leadership ability required in each case study…

1. OmegaMan just needed some time, some encouraging mentorship, and meeting a decent woman by God's happenstance, in order to come into his potential.
2. Snapper left his church, not because he was a qualified leader, but because he saw that attending this particular church was bearing bad fruit in his wife's faith. He merely responded in a responsible manner.
3. In the case of Glenn's Bible Study, all he did was volunteer to lead, and this opened the door for God to dispose of the soggy cornflakes, and it also allowed those guys who were serious in their faith to experience a regenesis. Small moves, big waves! That's real leadership! Glenn's actual leadership skill was totally irrelevant. All he had to do was take that step of faith.

Have faith, my friend. Rome wasn't built in a day, and all commanding Generals were once enlisted men in basic training. Give yourself some time to build skill and confidence, to learn new ways of thinking, and to experience God's grace in making you a part of his purposes.

But when that opportunity presents itself, don't hesitate to jump on that chance. Don't ever think that it doesn't matter. Every decision you make matters, even in ways that you are not aware of.

Cheers to the man who reaches for, and eventually achieves his full potential, whenever, and whatever that may be!

The Objectivity of Offense Constitutes Respect

1. Introduction

Recently, Jordan Peterson's honor and credibility has been targeted by a few Manospherians, most notably, Vox Day's posts (tagged, Jordanetics). Adam Piggott also wrote a scathing article entitled, Not only is Jordan Peterson not an alpha male, he's a member of the left intelligentsia. (April 28, 2018).

I don't follow Peterson that religiously, so I could be mistaken here, but I don't believe he ever claimed to be the Savior of the Alt-Right. So if he fails to fulfill that expectation, then who's going to be disappointed?

So he's not an Alpha Male… So what? Most men aren't.

Did he ever claim to be an alpha male? Har de har har… It's just a lame joke. Most guys enjoy some wishful thinking now and then. Big deal.

He is a liberal!?! What a surprise! Over 90% of academicians are liberal.

He doesn't practice what he preaches? Ho hum. I don't know. I get the impression that he's well qualified within his profession. Maybe he's pointing towards a larger ideal which he strives for, but others don't understand – something like respect, for instance.

Whenever a man embarks on some enterprise, if he fails in some respect, there's nothing noteworthy about that. We see this every day. But if a man gets up afterward, dusts himself off, and tries again, then he's definitely a qualified man. If he can stand his ground and make his stance well known to others, he's a cut above the rest.

Anymore, I am nexting every post I see about Peterson, simply because it's old news. Reading these posts doesn't contribute anything to my pursuit of excellence.

I am curious to know why these bloggers have decided to put so much time, and mental energy, into tearing down this particular man, out of millions of others. Is this somehow part of a larger strategy in our fight to be free from Feminism's choking death grip? Does it somehow educate men about how to deal with various sorts of women in an effective manner? If so, then how does Peterson have relevance?

These bloggers may have been successful in ridiculing Peterson and giving us a laugh, all for the sake of offering an interesting few minutes of blog reading and getting a few more clicks <slow clapping from the back>, but they have not made their case against Peterson applicable to the larger scheme of resisting the creeping black shadow of Satan's schemes.

Before Peterson's persona gets completely prostrated by apathetic and possibly envious criticism, let's take a moment to recall what he has contributed to the scenes. Regardless of your religious beliefs or political affiliation, I believe it is significant.

2. Addressing Men's Preeminent Need for Respect

One point which Peterson has hit on, again and again, is that men are in a continual process of self-betterment; that men should step up to face the challenges that confront them in life; and that men need respect from other men, for whatever they contribute, big or small. This is a fundamental truth of life, and Peterson should be lauded for reminding us of this basic tenet of humanity, and encouraging us to be cognizant of the need for respect, especially among men. If you don't agree with his specific points, then let's see if you (or someone else) can do better. Don't just tell us how his points compare to another flawed line of reasoning. Point out how the arguments are flawed and give us a better mode of thought. We're waiting…

Dalrock pointed out the importance of respect in his recent post, The wages of miserliness. (April 3, 2018). He writes [emphasis mine],

> "It is this miserliness of respect for other men that has created the void that Peterson is filling. Note that Peterson isn't telling young men they are great as they are, just let it all hang out. Peterson is telling young men they need to man up. But Peterson's man up message is fundamentally different than the modern Christian man up message. Peterson's message doesn't celebrate the feminist triumph that is afflicting young men. Peterson offers both love and the possibility of respect for men who work to improve themselves."

Practicing Love and Respect offers a win-win end game. Let's not forget that. Scoff if you will, but the continuation of the civilized nature of our society depends on it.

3. Maintaining Integrity and Garnering Respect Within the NeoModern Debate Style of Presumptively Valid Strawmen

Perhaps Peterson's most obvious achievement is in maintaining his position, in spite of holding an opinion that was seen to be flawed from the outset by the larger feminist dominated culture, and proving that his true position was not superficially misogynistic, overtly callous, nor carelessly spiteful. Whether or not you happen to agree with his position, you have to admit that the presentation of his argument was superbly executed.

Just in case you missed it, or want to watch it again, here's the famous debate Peterson had with Cathy Newman.

A poignant aspect of this debate is that it exemplifies the type of dishonest debate tactics (on the part of Newman) that have grown to be acceptable to society at large.

> "The video is instructive for modern dialogue. Typically, positions are entrenched, assumed, and then discussed, according to predetermined views about what the opponent is presumed to be saying, despite what they actually say they think. Christians would do well to take note. This is the new form of discussion and debate. We have to accept that on key social issues – particularly issues of sexuality and human flourishing – we will be dealt with according to what our interlocuters presume we think, despite what we actually say we believe. We can expect this to be multiplied to any number of other issues." [1]

Newman lost face, not because her argument was less convincing (although many believe they were), but because (1) her presumptions of his thoughts and motives were shown to be incorrect, and (2) she was unsuccessful in trying to shame Peterson. All her attacks, which appeared in the form of presuming avarice on his part, rolled off his back. This dynamic revealed her to be misinformed at best, an ignorant troublemaker of mediocre merit, or a false accuser at worst.

4. The Defense For Our Traditional Ethical Structure

> "Peterson explicitly states that offence is acceptable in the pursuit of truth. That statement presumes there is a truth to be known and grasped. He nowhere affirms the idea that identity is whatever you subjectively perceive it to be." [2]

In saying that the quest for truth is often necessarily offensive, Peterson is clearly identifying his ethical structure as being Righteousness vs. Guilt (RvG). Furthermore, one's personal choice to adhere to any particular ethical system is an absolute truth which cannot be refuted in any ethical system. So to engage with him any further in a meaningful discussion, Newman would have to recognize this truth, and adopt the appropriate RvG reasoning, which she evidently could not do.

I will speculate that the reason why Newman resisted entering into an honest debate within the RvG ethical structure, was because she knew the logical nature of men would give Peterson, a man, an advantage over Newman, a woman. (You can call me sexist for saying so, but I believe she was conscious of this.) Furthermore, (I believe) it was not her purpose to engage honestly within a debate for truth, but only to shame Peterson, as she did previously to Tim Farron and John Smyth. Regardless of whether Farron's or Smyth's beliefs were applicable and theologically sound, she targeted them for merely having Christian beliefs, and thus, she attempted to bring shame to the name of Christ.

> "…Peterson didn't challenge Newman directly about the objectivity of offence (potentially that's because he holds my view that offence is subjective and that is why basing legislation on subjective measures is so problematic – we cannot know the line between right and wrong because it is in the eye, ear or sensitive disposition of the beholder)." [2]

Although guilt may or may not be accurately ascertained through law, the accusations of either offending, or being offended, appeal to either honor or shame in the court of public opinion. Petersons arguments have impact, not only because they are logically sound, which appeals to the RvG sense of 'being right', but also his calm demeanor and occasional sense of humor portrays him as dignified and gracious, which brings honorability in the Honor vs. Shame (HvS) system, which Newman (and the media) had cunningly adopted in her strategy.

The key takeaway is that our traditional RvG ethical structure, which has been predominant in the west since medieval times, is now giving way to the HvS system under the odd-ass bedfellows of Feminism and Islamophilia. Here, Peterson is making a wise and concerted effort to preserve our time honored ethical structure. (For more information on ethical structures, please see my earlier post, Foundations of Cultural Ethics and Chivalry (February 18, 2018), which is the first of a series on this subject.)

5. Conclusions

Peterson's greatest contribution is that he artfully constructed a collection of viewpoints and arguments which (1) remained solid in a logical debate, (2) attracted respect, and deflected dishonest debate tactics and shame, and (3) successfully defended the main tenets of logic and truth in the RvG ethical system. Furthermore, and he did so in a public debate against Feminists in a way that they had to respect. It is his ability to command the respect of his adversary that attracts a following. This is why so many young men admire Peterson, and it is a habit that all of us should be developing within ourselves.

Be aware of the real battle! The battle is not against one aging educator (Peterson). It's against those principalities and powers that seek to subject us to a foreign ethical structure (such as HvS), wipe away truth, and solid reason, and replace it with self-destructive infighting, persnickety feuds over perceived honor, and all the associated (and ridiculous) 'virtue posturing' that is now becoming so prevalent.

And their motives contain no better justifications than to hate us, insult the name and glory of Christ, and to degrade our Christian civilization. All the more reason for us to stay focused on the goal!

Amerika Disappears!

Jack · 9 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

A radical political website that I've been following for some time has recently disappeared off the internet.

The last post I saw from them was…

Amerika (feat. Brett Stevens): Why White People Do Not Act For White Interests (May 7, 2018)

It was quite a good (i.e. provocative) post, and I imagine this may have been the last straw for the powers that be.

Does anyone know what became of this site?

UPDATE(May 10, 2018)

Amerika came back with a new post. My suspicions were apparently true.

Amerika (feat. Brett Stevens): Amerika.org Under DOS Attack by Scared Leftists (May 9, 2018)

> "This DOS attack consisted of two prongs: a TCP/IP-based attack against the machine that hosts several of our sites, and an HTTP-based attack against our PHP-based scripts. Our host, Dreamhost, managed to block the former attack, and with some crufty old 1990s know-how, we have lessened the latter."

What an honor — to be targeted by paganized haters!

The cultural war is heating up.

Patriarchy vs. Matriarchy: Divorce and Government Spending

Jack · 12 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

A review of the divorce rates and government spending as a percent of GDP, suggests that patriarchy doesn't deserve the bad rap that it has been given by feminists over the last few decades.

Readership: All

The data for the crude divorce rate (number of divorces per 1,000 people), and the government spending as a percentage of the GDP, are shown in the table below. Patriarchal societies are listed in blue font, and matriarchal societies are in red. Societies in black font are not strongly aligned either way.

Unless otherwise noted, the data is from 2005, which are lower figures than what we find currently. In recent years, the divorce rates have grown much higher, all around the world, largely due to the creeping influence of western feminism. The older data is a better indicator of the effects of the hierarchical structure on society, because the recent immigration and refugee rush has introduced too much confusion over the matter, which scrambles the obvious effects.

Country	Crude Divorce Rate (Divorces per 1,000 people)	National Budget as a Percent of GDP
Sri Lanka	0.15	6.7%
Brazil	0.26	13.9%
Italy	0.27	40.4%
Ireland [1]	0.27 0.6	34.0% (2005) 26.1 (2017)[2]
Mexico	0.33	7.2%
Chile	0.38	11.5%
El Salvador	0.41	6.3%
Ecuador	0.42	4.5%
Mauritius	0.47	7.0%
Thailand	0.58	6.9%
Syria	0.65	11.6%
Panama	0.68	16.4%
Greece	0.76	48%
China	0.79	16.8%
Tunisia	0.82	16.0%
South Korea	0.88 2.3	12.9% (2005) 32.3% (2015)
Spain	0.88	41% (2017)
Portugal	0.88	45.9% (2017)
Austria	0.97	49.1% (2017)
Trinidad	0.97	15.4%
Barbados	1.21	28.2%
Luxembourg	1.42	42.9% (2017)

Japan [3]	2.08 1.81	15.2% (2005) 39.4% (2015)
Belgium	1.83	52.2% (2017)
Finland	1.85	49.6%
Germany	1.91	43.9% (2017)
Canada	2.46	19.9%
Australia	2.52	27.1%
New Zealand	2.63	28.7%
Denmark	2.81	58.3%
United Kingdom	3.08	40.9%
Russia	3.36	44.4%
Puerto Rico	4.47	41.0%
United States	4.95	41.0%

Ireland and Japan stand out as exceptions to the rule. Ireland experienced a huge spike in government expenses (65% of GDP) before they cracked down on spending in 2010. In Japan, the marriage rate has dried up to a crawl. They also have one of the lowest fertility rates in the world.

Granted, there may be no direct correlation between social structure, and divorce or government spending, but the numbers are hard to ignore.

While feminists blame the 'evil patriarchy' for most of their perceived social ills, with rare exceptions, those countries with patriarchal values have low divorce rates, low government spending, and growing, healthy economies and societies. Every country which has experimented with "equality" has experienced a rapid implosion of both its economy and its social stability.

Remember, in western societies, between 60 to 80% of divorces are initiated by women.

Let us not be fooled by the superficial 'virtue posturing' and the demands for 'equality'. The government dole machine, and the high divorce rate, are the crowning achievements of feminism, all at the cost to men.

If feminists were honest, they would say that "the right to commit subsidized and legally sanctioned adultery", is their end goal for social reform, not to mention the abortion mill.

The western social policy needs a radical correction, and that is putting it mildly!

Why Do Men Need Visions and Dreams?

Jack · 15 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Myles Munroe delivers a powerful 'man up' message with a tidal wave of OMG realizations about the purpose of men and the nature of women.

Readership: All
Length: 800 words
Reading Time: 4 minutes + 120 minute video

Today, we'll look at a powerful sermon delivered by Dr. Myles Munroe, who was a Bahamian evangelist and ordained minister, author, speaker, and public leadership consultant, and who founded and led the Bahamas Faith Ministries International.

His talk is directed specifically at men, directing them on to the vision inspired path of discovering their God-ordained purpose for living. Munroe gives men a powerful 'man-up' message that is as strong as it is comforting. I would go so far as to say that his stance sets the stage for a unique form of 'Christian Game'. Men would do well to take his viewpoints on male-female relationships into serious consideration.

You can mock and criticize his loose interpretations of scripture all you like. But Munroe's Frame is 'fundamentally' true to both the Holy Spirit and the Red Pill perspective, and impeccably stolid at that. Furthermore, the words out of his mouth have put the fear of the Lord into millions around the world, including yours truly.

This sermon is rather long at 120 minutes, but I guarantee that if you take the time to watch it, you'll have quite a few mind-blowing epiphanies of the 'A-Ha!', and 'OMG!' variety, concerning the nature of men and women, and their interaction.

Power Quotes

Here, I've picked out a few quotes from this sermon, categorized by topic.

Order

> "Man was not created to dominate other men, but to dominate the earth."
> "Democracies do not colonize. Only Kingdoms colonize!"
> "God intended for the earth to be a colony of His Kingdom. God intended the male man to be the colonizers."
> "Men are not on top. They are not the 'heads'. Men are on the bottom! They are the foundation!"
> "Men were created before women. Men are first. Men have knowledge that women don't have. But it's no fun being first. Being first means you are responsible for everything that comes after!"

Purpose

> "The discovery of your purpose is about your dominion."
> "Vision is a preview of your purpose."
> "God stops growth where there is no management, or bad management."
>
> "I feel like preaching… almost!"
> "God gave man work, before he gave man woman. Work comes first. If you put woman first, you will have trouble!"

> "There were six commandments that God gave to Adam in the garden of Eden." (Genesis 1-2)

1. Eden – to live in communion with God
2. Work – to become what God made you to be.
3. Care – to cultivate, and bring forth fruit.
4. Guard – to protect, and to create a safe Kingdom for others to enjoy.
5. Command – to teach, mold, and guide others in the ways of holy living.
6. Observe – to recognize God's sovereignty, keep His commandments, and walk in His ways.

Identity

> "Your job is what you do for your employer, but your work is what God made you to do. You may lose your job, but you can never lose your work. Your employer might say, 'You're fired from your job!' But what employer can say, 'You're fired from being you'?"
> "A man's work is the expression of his purpose. A man with no woman has hope. But a man with no work will lose his mind."
> "When a man is doing His work, then the woman will follow after the man. That's how it's got to be. Amen? When the man is not about his work, the woman feels lost and insecure."
>
> "Woman is an incubator. Whatever you give her, she takes it, adds life and value, and gives it back to you. If you give her sperm, she gives you a baby. If you give her groceries, she gives you a meal. If you give her a word, she gives you a sentence. If you give her frustration, she gives you hell!"
> "There is no entrance on a male man. <turns his back to the audience> This is an exit, not an entrance!"

Notes

Munroe died in a freak plane crash in 2014, just two months after he spoke out publicly against g@y rights, saying that “people have ‘hijacked’ and ‘raped’ the civil rights movement with efforts to fight for the rights of those in the LGBT community”. He also said that the support of QTBGL persons in the Bahamas “does not represent the majority of the convictions of the Bahamian people”. Was his death just an unfortunate accident, or was he martyred by the ‘powers-that-be’?

Man as the Manager, Woman as the Helper

Jack · 19 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

This post kicks off a short series discussing an ontology involving the male responsibility as a manager, and the female role as a helper.

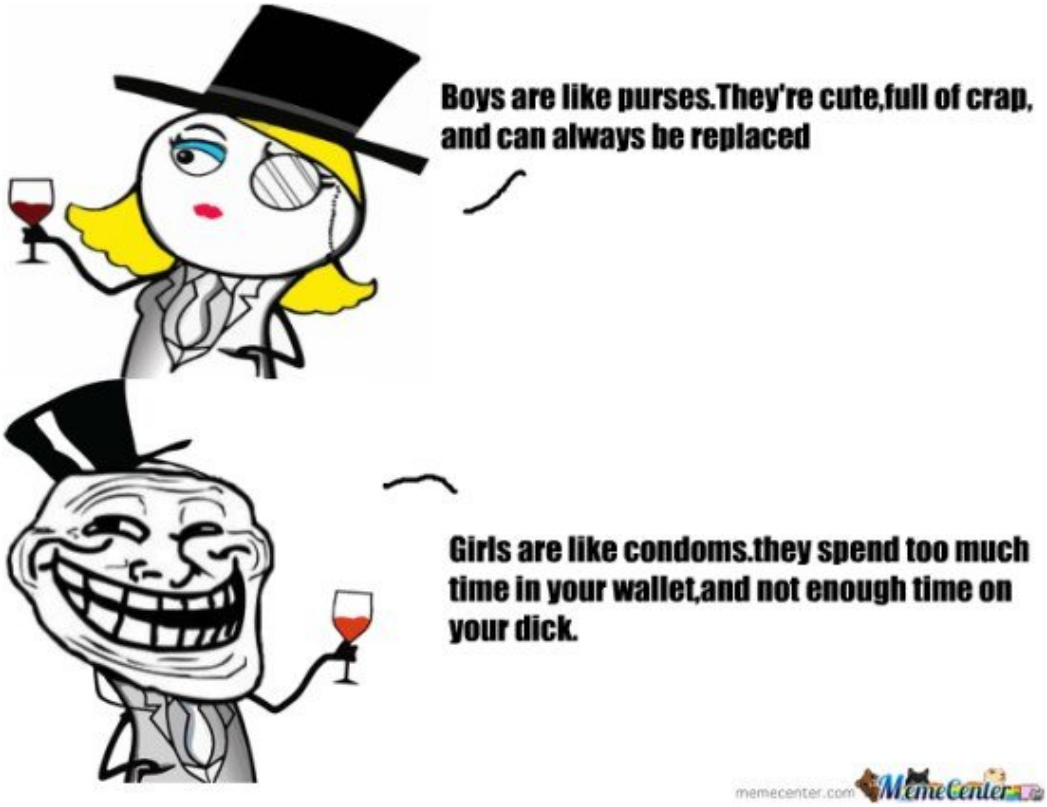
The Word 'Management' Should Not Have A Bad Connotation

In the neck of the internet where I most frequently read, whenever I've come across the words, 'wife/woman management', it's always in a negative context, as in 'managing gender differences', 'managing shit tests', 'managing hormonal behaviors', 'managing jealousy games', and so on. In fact, the whole purpose of Game is understood to be motivated towards 'managing' a woman's hypergamic, rebellious, and solipsistic nature.

An underlying motive of efficiency is assumed to be present in all of this – men want the most of what we can get out of life, including women, with the least possible investment of time, energy, and other resources. Of course, this emphasis on the investment-to-payoff ratio is even more true for women, with applied hypergamy being the paragon example. So it's not just men – we are talking about an element of human nature. But the thing is, both men and women generally perceive a partner's emphasis on this kind of efficiency as selfish and unloving, and therein lies the rub.

I admit, after having many bad experiences with women, including going through the divorce mill, and then taking the Red Pill, I've also carried this reflexive attitude of efficiency, largely out of self-preservation, and I have come to view women generally as a load of sugar-coated trouble. But it's not just me. In general, male-female relationships in the 21st century have been reduced to a series of transactions and validations which must be continually serviced without fail. For women, marriage has become a disposable, self-serving tool of manipulation. For men, marriage has been downgraded to a defacto state of genteel prostitution with an unpredictable expiry date. The rise of both divorce and cohabitation to that 40% marker is proof that people cannot trust each other with a marriage 'contract'.



But in the back of my head, there is a nagging voice saying it shouldn't be this way. Maybe you feel this way too. A man/husband and woman/wife should be 'like-minded' and should be working together towards certain goals that they agree on, and building a joyful life together, in general. The ongoing questions are, "What's missing?" and "How can we recover that missing piece of life?"

One quote from a sermon I covered in a previous post brought a bit of truth to my attention.

> "God stops growth where there is no management, or bad management."

We men have taken the attitude that 'woman management = trouble', which consumes our precious time, emotional energy, and which has little return on the investment. This is truly understandable, because in this day and age, the risks far outweigh the returns. Obviously, the source of this problem is that 40+ years of feminism have castigated masculinity as 'toxic', and have removed the honor, dignity, power, and authority assigned to the male in his rightful role as the primary manager of family and society. But this is not how God meant it to be.

There are many facets of male-female relationships covered in scripture, but in this series, I just want to focus on these two. [Emphasis mine.]

> "Then the Lord God took the man and put him in the garden of Eden to tend and keep it." ~ Genesis 2:15 (NKJV)
> "And the Lord God said, 'It is not good that man should be alone; I will make him a helper comparable to him.'" ~ Genesis 2:18 (NKJV)

These two verses make it clear that God intended man to be a manager, and the woman to be a helper. I believe this is a significant piece of what we are missing, so the remainder of this series discusses these two ideas.

Man's Rightful Place As A Manager

Because time and human energy is limited, the man's responsibilities need to be arranged in a schedule so that everything can be finished in a satisfactory and timely manner. The man needs to make it clear to the woman that he has a number of responsibilities which demand his time, and that his time is not hers to spend as she decides.

If the woman expects the man to be the primary bread winner and beast of burden, and if she is not willing to help reach their shared goals, and if she spends her time in other pursuits, then it does not profit the larger enterprise of their union. In fact, it may hinder it. In any analysis, as long as the man and the woman are not cooperating, their total efficiency is not maximized. But if the woman is willing to help the man meet some of those responsibilities, then their workload becomes easier, and their goals can be met more quickly and efficiently.

The verse in Genesis 2:18 reveals that God institutes a vehicle for enacting his plan for humanity, by establishing a hierarchy, in which man manages, and woman helps. The fact follows that women do need to be managed by the man in her life. It's part of God's design. We can argue about it and say that it's too much responsibility (for the man), or 'unfair' (for the woman), and so on, but in the end, there's no way around it. We can either gripe and be bitter about how God has arranged this ontology, and fight against this fact of life, or we can accept it as a basic responsibility of being a man or a woman, and work it to our advantage.

Conclusions

It's ideal for women to 'help' men in their shared enterprises, but the expectations of their respective roles and duties need to be made clear. Men are responsible for regulating the action. Women should recognize their valued role as a cherished helper.

Feminists like to soapbox the narrative that men are 'overbearing' and that 'submission' (on their part) is a mark of shame on par with slavery. But the opposite is closer to the truth for the majority of men. It's time for men to reframe that narrative by declaring men to be responsible managers of family and society, and take back their dignity and authority in the process.

Man as the Middle Manager

Jack · 21 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

This post discusses the responsibilities of men as managers of life, and the woman's role as a facilitator. Several important takeaways are delivered for single and married men alike.

Readership: Men

This is the second installment in a series of posts about life (and woman) management. Other posts in this series include the following.

- Sigma Frame: Man as the Manager, Woman as the Helper – Part 1 (May 19, 2018)
- Sigma Frame: Man as the Hiring Manager – Part 3 (May 24, 2018)

The first post discussed how management is necessary for the growth of a relationship, and that God intended for the man to fulfill this role, and for the woman to be his helper.

Men Compartmentalize Management

Women are known to view life comprehensively, viz. 'everything affects everything', while men are known to compartmentalize different areas of their lives. This habit of men naturally fits that of a manager.

I propose that a man's general areas of executive management should include the following, in the order of priority given. Each area has several sub-categories which are unique for each man, and each one has its own set of tasks and responsibilities.

1. Managing his purpose in life – work
2. Managing his self – identity and personal growth
3. Managing finances – cash flow and savings
4. Managing plans – schedules and time management
5. Managing his female helper
6. Managing his social life and interactions
7. Managing SJW's at the office (heh)

[Eds. note: Priorities (3) and (4) are about equal in importance, but 'finances' are listed as a higher priority because it is a more urgent matter. Also, Jesus talked about money more than he talked about planning.]

The interesting thing here is that our lovely, submissive, female helper plays a role in the execution of all of these priorities. (Just smile and believe it on faith.) So next, we'll discuss the first four priorities of management – points which pose the most difficulty for men in the way of managing the female.

Priority (1): Managing His Purpose

My wife has often stated that she is most attracted to me when I am busy working on something. She even makes it a game to try and distract me by giving me more physical attention at those times. Once in a while, she'll even take her clothes off and do a gyrating dance in front of me. (I usually laugh at her, and tell her to come do her 'job'.)

I think this attraction is no coincidence. Women are naturally drawn to a man who is busy with a purpose. This sense of purpose piques the woman's curiosity and draws her into the man's Frame. It is therefore very important for the man to establish himself in the woman's eyes as a man with important (and fun) things to do.

From a management perspective, it seems intuitive that a supervisor (husband) should take the lead, and should then make demands on the subordinate (wife), and not the other way around. A woman reading this might object with the argument that the wife's needs and preferences are being ignored within such an arrangement. But in fact, past studies have shown that it is advantageous for the husband to direct and make requests of the wife, and initiate conflict if necessary, in order to establish a relational structure that has longitudinal improvements in satisfaction for both partners. Previous studies which describe this structure are outlined and discussed in the following posts.

- Sigma Frame: Conflict Structure and Marital Satisfaction (November 15, 2017)
- Sigma Frame: Disciplined, Submissive, Happy Wives (February 15, 2018)
- Sigma Frame: How To Get A Better Response From Your Girl (February 27, 2018)

The gist of it is that the wife needs to be presented with the choice of either assisting the husband in meeting various life goals and personal needs, or not. If she happens to be the type of woman who derides his values and ridicules his personal preferences, then he needs to make it clear that their relationship has little hope of a future unless she can accept who he is, and support him as he embarks on his particular path to growth and fulfillment. That sounds reminiscent of a soft dread game. If the reader is a single man, let it suffice to say that such women fail to see the positive in you, and are thus best avoided.

On the other hand, if the husband presents the wife with clear goals, an outline of a plan, and then specifically points out what he needs from her, then she is faced with a clear choice of whether to support him or not. Given the lack of a better and more convenient choice, it is very likely that she will agree to support the endeavor. After all, it is human nature to desire to be part of an enterprise that is larger than one's own personal interests. Furthermore, as she invests more of her time and emotional energy into the work, she should grow to appreciate it (and him) much more as time goes on.

Priority (2): Managing His Self

With respect to priority (2), we know women have this innate tendency to want to 'mother' the man, or else, 'change' him in some way more to their comfort and liking. (Red Pilled men know that accommodating her requests for 'change' have no positive lasting benefit.) I recommend that single men should get their own life together first (i.e. priority (1) above), before settling in with a woman. For dating and married couples, the man needs to draw boundaries which protect his own peace and joy, which satisfy his unique personal needs, and which put his heart and mind to rest.

Here, it's important for the man to know who he is as an individual, develop his Frame, and make his spiritual needs evident to the woman. (Women seem to be well aware of men's physical needs, so I will omit this facet from the discussion.) Typical spiritual needs husbands have of wives include simple gestures of kindness, gratitude, and respect, enthusiastic receptivity to sexual intercourse, having uninterrupted quiet time to spend on a personal interest, or enjoying regular occasions to hang out with friends. To this end, please read my previous post, How To Get A Better Response From Your Girl (February 27, 2018), to learn how a man can demand, and receive, better responses from his woman.

Priority (3): Managing Finances

With reference to priority (3), the woman should be taught and challenged to become more responsible with finances. It should be made evident that if she is responsible with small things, then she will be trusted with more, and if not, then what she has will be taken away. (See the Parable of the Talents, in Matthew 13:12, Matthew 25:29, Mark 4:25, and Luke 19:26.) This is not about 'male domination' or control, as purported by wimminz. It's about maintaining responsible stewardship.

Thus, men need to regulate the income and expenses, and women need to be put on a budget. If the woman cannot abide by the budget put forth by the man, then she needs to have her financial privileges (i.e. credit cards) revoked. If she has her own source of income, then the man can restrict his contributions and let the woman learn these lessons at her own expense.

I'll add here, that when you lay down some rules, you'll get a lot of static in the beginning, but if you stick to it, then (hopefully) she will come around to see things the way you do. At the very least, you'll show her that you're a man of principle and that you follow through on your decisions. This may also elicit some respect from her.

Rest assured, if the typical woman is given responsibility for the family finances, the expenses will be skewed towards creature comforts and personal indulgences, not to mention her own private bank account, which will become her nest egg if and when she decides to hire a lawyer, file for a divorce, and elope with her (other, more favored) boss. So don't be that sucker husband who trusted his wife with all the money, and then got reamed out of house and home. (I keep US$3,000 in cash hidden away with a trusted friend, just in case my wife pulls a stunt, or blows up the budget somehow.)

In other words, The Parable of the Talents applies to the man as well as the woman. If a man grossly mismanages his money by letting his woman handle all the finances, then what little he has will be taken away. So saith the Lord of Hosts, and you know it's true.

Priority (4): Managing Plans

Concerning priority (4), plans, schedules and time management, the man needs to draw an outline of what needs to be done, and orchestrate the execution of a plan. The plan should be a vehicle to achieve the man's larger purposes in life, according to priority (1). The plan needs to be made clear to everyone involved, and should be followed as closely as possible.

If presented with a clear plan with mutually beneficial goals, a woman is more likely to jump on board without too much resistance. But if there is no plan, the woman will devise her own plans, and then expect the man to follow along. If in fact, a man really doesn't have a concrete plan in place, then he can always make up a tentative plan, and then change it later on. Women (and subordinates) are more confused and upset by a man (supervisor) with no plan, than a man (supervisor) who is constantly changing the plan.

So, a man should always be talking about big plans, even if he's not confident about achieving them. In fact, women love to hear men talk about opportunities, goals, hopes and dreams, because this is a projection of perceived power. If a man fails to achieve these goals, women are likely to blame external factors, rather than the man's ineptitude. This is because women naturally grab on to the faith and hope that are expressed, and have (hopefully) invested themselves in the labor, so as a result, they can be very forgiving in this respect.

If you do all these things, and your woman still wants to chide you about never achieving the plans you set forth, then I'm sorry to say, you've got a rotten, selfish woman. I suggest you just do your own thing, and put her words out of your mind. Pray that there will come a day when she realizes the sinfulness of her attitude.

Conclusions

The temptation that men have faced historically, is to give the responsibility of certain priorities to the female helper in their lives. This frequently happens when the woman is being a feral b!tch-@ss by plying a multitude of shit tests on a regular basis, and then the man naturally grows bitter and resentful. After a while of this, the strength of will in the man becomes fatigued, and he just wants to escape, or give in. The bottom line is that he stops caring about, and making efforts in management.

Think about it…

- A man would never ask a woman to move furniture and renovate the house, while he swept up the dust and splinters.
- A man would never ask a woman to change the oil in the car, while he cleaned the tools.
- A man would never ask a woman to manage his business appointments, while he scheduled them and prepared the reports.

But…

- Many men presume that their wives know what's better for his personal well-being, and then go along with her priorities.
- Many men think it's OK for a woman to manage his finances, while he earns the money.
- Many men allow their wives to tell them how to spend their time, while the wife is busy making more activities for him to spend time on.

Something is not quite right here.

To counteract this default human ontology, married men need to focus on developing devices to keep this aspect of feral femininity at bay, while single men should focus on vetting women who won't toe the line in this regard. From this point of view, we may gain a renewed appreciation for Game, because it is, at the very least, an effort towards management, and a refusal to resign to either fatigue or fate, even though the motives, moral agency, and level of responsibility remain debatable on a case-by-case basis. [Vetting is further explored in the following post, Man as the Hiring Manager (May 24, 2018).]

I am not discounting the myriad ways that a woman adds life and value to the relationship, and introduces ideas and activities that give it gusto. But a man needs to have a plan and a purpose, and he needs to spearhead the execution of that plan. The woman should follow along and contribute to the enterprise. Sure, there are many instances in which a woman is well qualified for the task, and is quite responsible in the execution, but the man should not remain ignorant of what is going on, under the assumption that it's her area of expertise. (How many times have you heard a man say, "My wife handles the finances."?)

Taking hold of the reigns may be very difficult in the beginning, but after some boundaries and structure have been established, and she gets used to the new momentum, it may be easier and more enjoyable (for both) than most men imagine. I know this from experience.

Man as the Hiring Manager

Jack · 24 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

This post discusses the responsibilities of men as the 'hiring managers' of women, and the woman's role as a subordinate helper and facilitator. Several important takeaways are delivered for single and married men alike.

Readership: Men

This is the third installment in a series of posts about life management. Other posts in this series include the following.

- Sigma Frame: Man as the Manager, Woman as the Helper – Part 1 (May 19, 2018)
- Sigma Frame: Man as the Middle Manager – Part 2 (May 21, 2018)

The first post identified a passage in Genesis which describes God's proscribed relational structure between man and woman.

> "Then the Lord God took the man and put him in the garden of Eden to tend and keep it." ~ Genesis 2:15 (NKJV)
>
> "And the Lord God said, 'It is not good that man should be alone; I will make him a helper comparable to him.'" ~ Genesis 2:18 (NKJV)

The previous two posts discussed how the man plays the role of a manager, and how his management is necessary for the growth of the relationship.

Managers Need to Hire Worthy Helpmates

Genesis 2:18 indicates that God intended the woman to be a man's 'helper' and companion in life. By analogy, being an excellent manager is ineffective if the boss doesn't have diligent, loyal, hardworking employees who understand what needs to be done and then work at it diligently. This is why the hiring process requires credentials, and is made into a stressful, multifaceted test of ability and responsibility.

Likewise, it's very important for a man to choose a woman who will cooperate with his prerogatives. Men should give potential female partners a bit of stress and take her to task for the purpose of proving her ability to be a good helper and companion, before giving her a 'promotion' to the position of a girlfriend or wife. Contrary to what Blue Pilled men believe about women wanting to be pampered and coddled (which is an expression of chivalry), most (real) women would be delighted when a man presents her with a challenging task.

The implementation of this proposed structure has different applications, depending on if you're single or married. If you're married, it's a hefty (and perhaps hopeless) task to try to transform your wife into being a cooperative and respectful helper. But some men might stand a good chance to push towards this goal in their relationship. I am in this situation, and I've compiled a directory of several posts that cover how this might be accomplished. I am definitely experiencing progress in this endeavor, however, the process is difficult, slow, and often painful.

If you're single, then you don't (yet) have the burden of teaching a woman, but only to select the woman who is better for you. Here, the 'helper' concept offers a great frame of mind in which a man can vet any particular woman in question. In the application of vetting, men can ask themselves questions like these.

- How much help does she actually offer to you?
- Is she helping you, or does she expect you to help her?
- Does she have the ability to offer help?
- Does her skill level match yours?
- Are her values and interests compatible with yours?
- Does she even have the mindset to offer help?
- Does she enthusiastically agree with, appreciate, and support what you're doing with your life?
- Does she encourage you to do more, and to make the most of yourself (and not just out of her selfish motivations for her own gain)?

A more specific question to ask is, does she follow you? This is important because following you is an expression of submission. Concordant questions follow here.

- Does she seek your attention? Or do you seek hers?
- Does she follow your directive? Or does she prefer to 'live and let live'?
- Does she follow your thoughts, and intentions? Or does she argue about things?
- When you are walking around in public, does she follow your lead to go where you want to go, see what you want to see, and do what you want to do? Or does it happen that you often follow her around, or else, you tend to get separated when pursuing your respective interests?

- Does she accept, and actively try to enhance the things you do? Or is she ambivalent about your preferences of how things should be? Or worse, does she always tell you to do things differently, or to do things her way?

I will offer an example which might seem rather trivial on the surface, but in fact, it conveys very important information about your real status in the hierarchy. Suppose you want the sugar bowl to remain on the table where it can be easily accessed when you're eating your Wheaties for breakfast every morning. She wants the sugar bowl in the cupboard, so she can take pride in having a 'clean' (i.e. empty) table. So where will the sugar bowl be kept?

Small signs such as these are an indicator of the real dynamics of your relationship. A wise man will not ignore the signs!

Conclusions

Concerning single guys, while it is definitely true that men want to screw women with hot, young, hard, healthy bodies, the fact is that men love women who allow them to lead, who consistently offer them practical assistance in life, and who do so with a respectful attitude. Contrary to cultural propaganda, this is the true meaning of the Biblical concept of 'submission'. Furthermore, men want to marry women who offer both aspects – hot sex and helpful, respectful companionship.

The problem that a lot of men get into, is when they get hooked on the sex (or the hope of sex), and give the lady a promotion to a position above her ability. Choose wisely!

For married men, a greater awareness of their role as a manager will do much to align their marriages with God's archetype, leading to an enhancement of their marriages in the long run.

A previous post, Why Do Men Need Visions and Dreams? (May 15, 2018), inspired men to have a vision for their lives. What is your vision? Can you envision yourself as being the 'King' of your household? Can you envision your girlfriend or wife as someone who supports your life plans with enthusiasm?

Or do you think life is hopeless, that the 4th Wave fracas will drown us all?

> "But Jesus looked at them and said to them, 'With men this is impossible, but with God all things are possible.'" ~ Matthew 19:26 (NKJV)

Whatever state you are now in, I challenge you to dream a little bit, and let that dream sink into your attitudes and belief systems over time. Don't be afraid to mourn, to be angry, and to then take the appropriate actions to make your life into what you want it to be.

Prayer helps.

How to Dismantle the Idol of Fandom: Breaking the Fifth Wall

Jack · 26 May 2018 · Archived copy · Original

This post examines elements of fandom as a form of idolatry, and considers how ethical systems may be bypassed, and false beliefs exposed, by 'breaking the fifth wall'.

Readership: All

This article is outlined as follows.

1. The Fragility of Man
2. The Nature of Idols
3. My Repentance from Fanhood
4. The Falsehood of Fandom
5. The Illusion of Fandom
6. Deconstructing the Pseudo-Ethical Stance
7. How Can Idols Be Dismantled?
8. Conclusions

The earlier part of this post (1-5) describes how fandom lies somewhere between having a healthy respect for an influential figure, and pedestalizing them above their true spiritual position (i.e. idolatry). I feel it is important to make a clear distinction between them, so that we know exactly where the line is between having a 'healthy' regard, or an 'unhealthy' regard, for the person or ideology in question.

The latter part of this post (6-8) describes some applications of this distinction, and points out how an added degree of awareness will strengthen one's Frame when interacting with someone who holds certain values or beliefs that are foreign to one's own.

1. The Fragility of Man

In the comments under a previous post, The Objectivity of Offense Constitutes Respect (May 6, 2018), J.T. posed an interesting dilemma concerning how we should regard men who are held in high esteem, men who have become idols in the eyes of others.

> "As Christians, we are supposed to show love to all, including our enemies. But a false teacher can do a great deal of harm to those he teaches. Hence it seems logical that exposing false teachers is showing love to the church. Furthermore, we cannot judge false teachers merely by the words they speak. Christ says it is by their fruits that we will know them. So I think there are some important questions worth pondering:"
> 1. "Is it ethical to predict bad fruits of a teacher by extrapolating from an assessment of the man's mind (i.e. his writing)… as Vox Day and others seem to believe they have the insight to do? Or is this disparaging a man's character without cause?"
> 2. "If one is confident he has identified a false teacher, is it necessary to show courtesy to that teacher? And if so, how does one show courtesy while warning his followers that he's an enemy?"
> "How do we distinguish between calling out false teachers for the good of the church and unfairly attacking a public figure for entertainment/publicity, etc.?"

The answer is simple, yet profound. If one thinks of the man in question as mortal flesh and bone, while yet at the same time, made in the image of God, then he cannot esteem him to be a projection of one's own psychological attributes.

This is the paradigm busting magic of believing in Christ Jesus, because Jesus was perfect. All other beings have 'areas to be improved'. So in dealing with any particular man, we must recognize the work that Christ is doing in him, to bring him towards completion. In not doing so, we would fail to recognize his spiritual disposition. Those who believe that a man is wholly complete, and therefore qualified to take the form of an idol (or Christ himself, which is a blasphemy), are discounting the grace of God through Christ's sacrifice.

2. The Nature of Idols

When a man is spiritually broken, that brokenness propels him to fill that void in any way he can, and then he is faced with a choice: (1) to continue suffering in a broken state, (2) to turn to idols for a temporary anesthesia, or (3) turn to Jesus for healing and wholeness.

As commonly regarded by the average person, idols appear to come in various forms, be it superstars, prized possessions, an intense self-centered desire, an ego fixation, or the classic carved image of antiquity. But in the spiritual sense, idols are none of these. Instead, idols are figments of the mind and heart – figments which are believed to fulfill some missing aspect of one's existence, and perhaps do, in some diminished fashion.

The superstar, author, actor, philosopher, hero, HB10 woman, or carved image, is merely an object which gives expression to the true nature within, and thereby improvises a temporary 'fix' to the brokenness.

But this expression is not full, nor true, and that is what makes idolatry debasingly evil. It only becomes full and true when the Holy Spirit fulfills and heals that broken part of the man. When one is made complete in Christ, the better nature of the regenerated man, that whom God made him to be, and intended him to become, emanates from within the man himself, and is no longer vicariously experienced through the adoration of the idolatrous object.

> "But when that which is perfect has come, then that which is in part will be done away." ~ 1st Corinthians 13:10 (NKJV)

But just as a husband is ready to dismiss an adulterous wife, as long as a man clings to his idols, the hand of God will not move towards his re-creation. Thus, it is imperative that idols be addressed and dealt with.

3. My Repentance from Fanhood

I have a confession to make, too. When I was younger, U2 was my favorite band. I bought all their albums, and I listened to their music every day. Most of my friends did too. One of the things that solidified my fanhood was their outspoken profession of Christianity. But then, in the early 90's, this rock band were arrested for possession of cannabis, which was still illegal at that time. When I heard this news, my esteem for the group plummeted, but I still bought one more album after that, entitled, Pop. This album was so bad, that I have never purchased another album since then. I recognized that they had changed. They no longer inspired me.

At that time, these developments prompted me to recognize that the men in U2 were not as I had imagined. Looking back, I have come to understand that they had not changed, and I had not changed either. I was merely confronted with the fact that my imagination and inspiration were separate from the reality that produced it. In other words, I did not share the same beliefs and values as the men I once idolized, and this discovery 'depedestalized' them in my eyes.

Lately, their support for gay marriage (2015), and their endorsement of abortion (2018), has further engrained in my mind the dangers and disappointments that come with putting one's hopes in man. Now, I see Paul, David, Adam and Larry just as the flesh and bone that they are – mere men who are talented musicians and stage performers, but who are below average in most other respects. I still have an affection for them as individuals who have added joy and good memories to my youthful life, but the wonder and fascination of their larger-than-life glory has since faded away. Looking past the humanity of these men who are made in the image of God, the spiritual reality is that their profession of Christianity is probably a falsehood, much like cultural Churchians imagine themselves to be true believers. Furthermore, I speculate that they are most likely converged at the highest level. They sold out the Holy Spirit, in exchange for a renewable pass to stardom. This is all very clear to me now, but it was not discernible to my teenage self in 1987.

4. The Falsehood of Fandom

Simply gathering a fan base does not make one a very influential leader. A true leader needs to be intricately 'connected' to his following. Some kind of feedback loop needs to be present. For example, Prof. Jordan B. Peterson would need some way to 'correct' his fans whenever they fail to get the right point. But if this should happen, then many of his fans would wake up to face the incongruences of their own beliefs. This would be a good thing, but it would also reduce his following. There is also the logistical barrier – there is a limited number of followers that one person can mentor.

In his post, Fandom is Idolatry (May 7, 2018), Dark Brightness (via Bruce Charlton), illustrated how fandom does not constitute a base under real leadership, but it is merely a projection of the idols one worships onto an object or a persona. Key quotations follow.

> "[Fandom's] appetite for novelty, and its mass nature, always corrupts; and always corrupts in the direction of prevalent mainstream ideology."
> "Other fandoms are closely analogous – revealing that this is a property of fandom rather than being related to specific authors or their work."
> "What Peterson does — ironically, making a new fandom — is disassemble the pseudo ethics of the TruFan, who divides the world into those whom agree with them, and those who do not. Often on trivia. Often on what they project onto the author."
>
> "[Newman et al. feminists] use emotion, lies and projection as rhetorical weapons. Their fandom is a lie. It is no cruelty to point this out, but a mercy."
> "Fandom, in its current iteration, is toxic. This toxicity is encouraged by those who would make money out of those who are unhappy, not by directing them towards those activities which will make them happy and fulfilled, but by encouraging them to dig a basement in the hell of their making."

We are easily convinced that this is true for the fans of feminism and other ideologies, such as Marxism, but DB implies that the nature of fandom relegates Peterson into a similar category. No matter if what he professes is true or false, even if he encourages young men to pursue virtues such as love and respect, fans will interpret the message through the blue-pill lens of their own non-shared environment, which inevitably will contain sundry idols.

For instance, Peterson's example could actually be enabling some of his fans to develop viewpoints and debate tactics that would allow them to lazily demand love and respect from others, while still failing to integrate this habit into their character, and they would thereby become further complacent about their own preconceived notions of things.

This dynamic might appear within any kind of fandom that is lacking leadership feedback.

5. The Illusion of Fandom

Putting Peterson on the proverbial pedestal is an expression of fandom. As such, opinions of Peterson (or any other public figure like him) are a reflection of a person's own values and beliefs, and not necessarily an accurate representation of the man himself. Only the man in question can speak for himself, and the contents of one's heart spill out of the mouth. This is true for the star, the fan, and the critic.

Ass such, putting Peterson on a pedestal so that one can knock him off of it, is also a pseudo-expression of fandom, since it is also a projection of one's own belief system. To offer a lighthearted and somewhat spurious example, if SF/Vox/DB made a public effort through argumentation to knock U2/Peterson/Tolkien off a pedestal that they had created in their own minds, then the power of their respective arguments are determined by whether they can convince themselves and/or others that the underlying philosophical pillars of the entities in question are either true or false. But the 'truthiness' appearance of the argument is determined by the belief systems of the particular people involved in the construction of the argument.

The strength and value of their arguments depend largely on whether their readers identify with the same values (or idols) as they do. This is largely what DB terms 'TruFandom'. In essence, TruFandom forms when stars create an argument or other expression that is useful to those who think like they do. But these arguments and expressions have no value in destroying the culture of idols, and in fact rather, they support the same. The real challenge is in convincing others to adopt the same values and beliefs that we do (which are presumed to be truth), and do so in the faith that what we believe is universally true, everlasting, and useful in building God's Kingdom.

6. Deconstructing the Pseudo-Ethical Stance

Peterson's claim to fame can be found in his ability to take the stance of an outside observer, who is able to see the difference between those who think like he does, according to the Righteousness vs. Guilt (RvG) system of law and reason, and those who subscribe to the ethical system of Honor vs. Shame (HvS), which has been adopted by the feminist left, presumably for the purpose of dismantling the traditional western RvG system. This was one of the main points discussed in a previous post.

Peterson nimbly dances around the ethical structure imposed by society, thereby deconstructing the very essence of the previously untouched argument surrounding ethical values. Essentially, he asks the question, "Which ethical system are we going to use for our argument?" In doing so, he exposes the respective belief systems for what they are, and thereby dismantles the pseudo-ethical structure of the argument. For this reason, and also because this approach is effective when dealing with the left, is why many conservatives have identified with Peterson, in addition to the reasons outlined in the previous post.

When Peterson questioned the legitimacy of using 'offense' in the argument, he 'broke the third wall' (borrowing from film and literary terminology), in which a character acknowledges directly or indirectly that they are in a play, or a public debate in this case. But in doing so, Peterson also broke what we might call 'the fifth wall', which I here define as the boundary between those who believe the premises of, and agree with the argument presented, and those who don't. Instead, he questions the larger picture, the overall meaning and mechanics of the debate itself. This has since become the new paradigm of modern argumentation, and this added level of awareness is desperately needed in a quickly globalizing world.

Number 13 on the list of 16 Specific Qualities of Frame addresses this fact.

> "The ability to consider and navigate multiple viewpoints at once is essential part of having a strong Frame. The person who has the wider angle view than anyone else involved will typically have the dominant Frame."

Since Peterson has introduced this new, additional element of ethical awareness, any critic will seem ignorantly 'unaware' of this reality, and will not be able to analyze Peterson's philosophical worth very effectively, unless he addresses this contribution. Furthermore, no philosopher or critic will be worth his salt these days, if he cannot adapt to the new paradigm of breaking the fifth wall of ethical venues.

7. How Can Idols Be Dismantled?

In any challenge between opposing frames of mind, if an account from one person fails to contain the fundamental truths recognizable to others concerning the state of one's systems of belief, then it is reduced to a mere philosophical argument. As we well know, the old system of cognitive and rational argumentation has never been known to successfully proselytize souls, and this is because it fails to address the issues of the heart. Vain arguments cannot bridge the gap to the heart. Adopting an expanded Frame of reference within the new system of argumentation, which observes the deeper belief structure of another person, may be more effective in communicating deeper truths to one's heart.

The positive aspect of publicly debasing popular idols is that it conveys the perceived truth of one's own values, beliefs, and experiences to others. But this only has impact if it contains truth, which may appear in the following forms.

1. The objective truth of a respected authority which transcends our personal beliefs and experiences, such as the Bible, or another such shared value on which we agree is truth. Examples of bloggers who seek to apply Biblical truth include Christianity and Masculinity, Dalrock, Donal Graeme, and Wintery Knight.
2. The subjective truth of a personal testimony – a true narrative of one's own life experience which cannot be denied. Examples of bloggers who confess and profess include Airstrip One, SFC Ton, and Snapper TRX.
3. A third avenue of apprehending truth is prophecy, which imparts a conscientious awareness of things that would otherwise not be regarded, and this additional knowledge shifts our perspectives of what is right and true. We might consider Vox Day and Prof. Peterson both to be social prophets, under this loose definition. The author(s) of Chateau Heartiste, and Rollo Tomassi might also fall under this description, but it seems difficult to call them prophets, doesn't it? (Our concept of prophecy needs to be updated and made relevant.)
4. The presentation must acknowledge any personal and culturally influenced presumptions that are present. From what we have gathered in this essay, one way this can be done is by breaking the fifth wall.

In any philosophically-styled argument for or against a particular stance, the above truths must be implemented as a common ground of understanding for all interested. Breaking the fifth wall – making the person in question (as well as any observers present) aware of the unstated and subtexted presumptions, or 'idols' – is an essential step in bridging the gap between the mind and the heart, and presenting a clear choice of what to accept as truth.

Obtaining a deeper awareness of one's assumed values, ethical stances, and belief systems, and how they might stand at odds with other systems, and especially with God's truth, is when the light shines in through the wall!

8. Conclusions

The following points briefly reiterate the arguments concerning the nature of idols and fandom.

- Human nature easily resorts to cheap substitutions for joy and fulfillment.
- Idols (e.g. fandom) displace the broken aspects within a man, offering a temporary reprieve from the associated suffering,
- Idols (e.g. fandom) are a projection of the deeper character of a man, which vicariously fulfills the broken aspects thereof.
- Idols are attractive because they are relatively easier and more 'comforting'.
- Idols offer a substitute for God's grace, and thereby prolong brokenness and suffering.
- Any obsessive preponderance upon any person or subject, such as fandom (or anti-fandom), can easily become a form of idolatry.
- Real leadership requires a feedback loop with followers. Without a method to monitor the learning process of the followers, leadership is reduced to mere inspiration (in the positive sense), and fandom (in the negative sense).
- 'Breaking the fifth wall' is here introduced as a new concept in awareness, which means to expose the respective belief systems of those involved, and adapt them to the argument at hand.
- Breaking the fifth wall can be effectively used to dismantle the pseudo-ethical structure of the argument (including pseudo-virtue signaling), and reveal the deeper motives and dispositions of the debate opponents.

Concerning the dismantling of pseudo-ethics and idols in public discourse, I offer the following points.

- Proponents, critics, and observers alike must consider the impact of breaking the fifth wall, and address this impact in their assessments. If a critic fails to regard this effect, he has missed one of the most important aspects of an argument.
- Concerning the valuation of any person's worth as a philosopher or teacher (i.e. Peterson), we must look for (1) the truth of his words, and (2) the fruits of his impact.
- The new style of debate, which involves breaking the fifth wall, may prove to be very useful, not only in disarming and dealing with emotional, irrational opponents, but also in helping others evaluate and come to terms with their own values, ethics, and belief systems.
- If applied accordingly, there is a chance that more people may be stirred from the delusions of their idols, and that more unity of mind may be achieved. On the other hand, making clear distinctions of the nuanced issues of the heart will inevitably prove to be deeply divisive.

The Androsphere covers a lot of information about the sociosexual dynamics of younger women in postmodern western culture.

But have you ever wondered what happens to those hard reveling wimminz afterwards?

After abandoning the faith of their childhood home…

After wasting their prime childbearing years in dissipation…

After riding the carousel…

After tripping as a drug-addled groupie…

After preparing for a professional career in communications…

After hitting the wall…

After earning full 'cat lady' tenure…

After winding down their precious careers…

After entering into a quiet, lonely retirement…

After spending and sacrificing all…

What lies ahead for them at the end of the line?

Here is one woman's gripping testimony.

Liberty's Son commented,

Alright, I hope you guys snortled at this ribald lampoon! The 'slippery slope' fallacy should be evident, but doubtless, that's how many of 'em go. In fact, Bon Scott met an untimely death only a few months after he released "Highway to Hell"!

If the shoe fits...

When you make some off hand comments, and the shoe starts to fit someone, you might just become that persons' springboard to internet infamy.

Readership: All

Last month, there was a lovers spat that went viral, which involved a fine young hoe, Madison Witham, and her ex-boyfriend, Justice Champion. The incident was described and discussed in the following articles.

- Fox News: Teen who accused boyfriend of slut-shaming her prom dress reveals photos of gown (May 5, 2018)
- Daily Mail: US high school student, 16, who dumped her slut-shaming boyfriend after he said her prom dress 'showed too much skin' finally reveals the offending gown – but says she WON'T be attending (May 25, 2018)

This is rather old news by now, so I trust that the reader is familiar with the altercation.

I don't think anyone has pointed this out yet, but there is a discrepancy between the facts offered by the hoe and her ex.

She offers screenshots of text messages showing a man saying,

> "You look like a slut b, no offense."

She claims this message was sent by Champion, ascribes avarice on his part, calls it 'slut shaming', and thereby uses it to denigrate his honor.

But in the version from Fox, Champion offers his own screen shots of their chats, in which he responds to the dress rather enthusiastically by texting,

> "It looks great".

Also notice that in those texts shown by Witham, the male respondent calls her 'b' in each message. (I presume 'b' is short for 'baby', a term of endearment.) However, in the text shots offered by Champion, he never calls her by the nickname, 'b'.

Are you with me here? There are two different men!

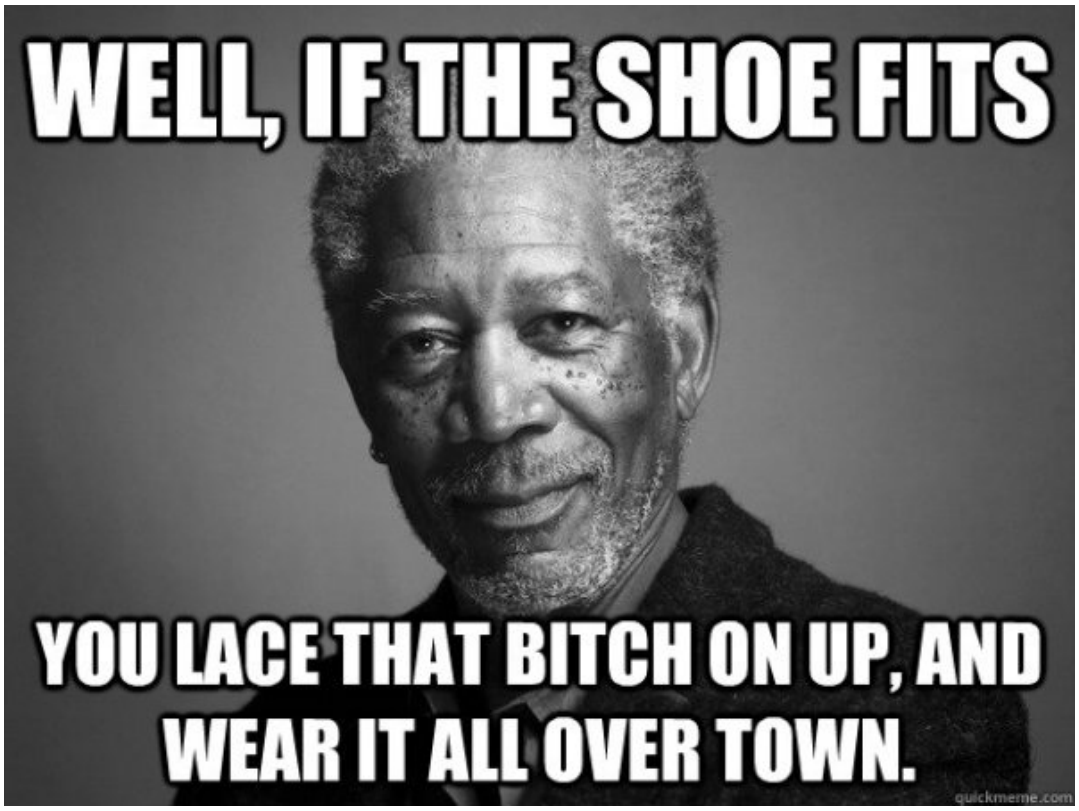
I get the strong impression that Witham had a backup man (not Champion) who sent the "You look like a slut" message. She claimed that message was from Champion, and tried to use that message to defame Champion in an arrogant power play that she probably thought was humorous. But beyond her expectation, the news went viral, and then she was unable to back out of the lie without being ousted, so later, she had to decline going to the prom with Champion.

In a follow up message, Witham responds with,

> "I'll stick with the dress and get myself a new man, bye."

This statement shows that she is quite familiar with the habit of employing her hypergamic desires (with a pinch of hamster fantasy added) to ditch any particular man she is with in favor of the next one, or the last one, or the one next door, or whoever he might be. Her general mindset is that men, and probably sex as well, are just a smorgasbord cafeteria for her tingle indulgence. If she is having a bad day with one guy, she'll use a little dreadette game to 'put him back in line'.

So here we have the situation where she is chatting with and probably sleeping with (at least) two different men. She takes offense at the mere mention of the word, 'slut', and she dumps the guy who didn't say it. Then she takes advantage of the feminist narrative, hamster spins a false narrative to restore her so-called honor, and becomes an internet celebrity in the process.



So this is the story of a tramps' brilliantly evil Machiavellian behavior and abuse of feminine power. As long as a society ignorantly rewards and rubber stamps such pseudo-virtue posing with sensational attention and affirmation, society will be in downgrade.

On a more positive note, we see Justice to the Champion of this showdown, in that he can now move towards finding a more worthy woman than Withman.

My Unhappiness Is Your Fault!

Jack · 3 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Who is responsible for her happiness? Who is responsible for your own?

Readership: Men in intimate heterosexual relationships

The Problem

Women have an annoying habit of expressing emotionally laden sentiments carrying the effect of,

> "My Unhappiness Is Your Fault!"

And how can you respond to that? Is it true, or is it hamsterbation?

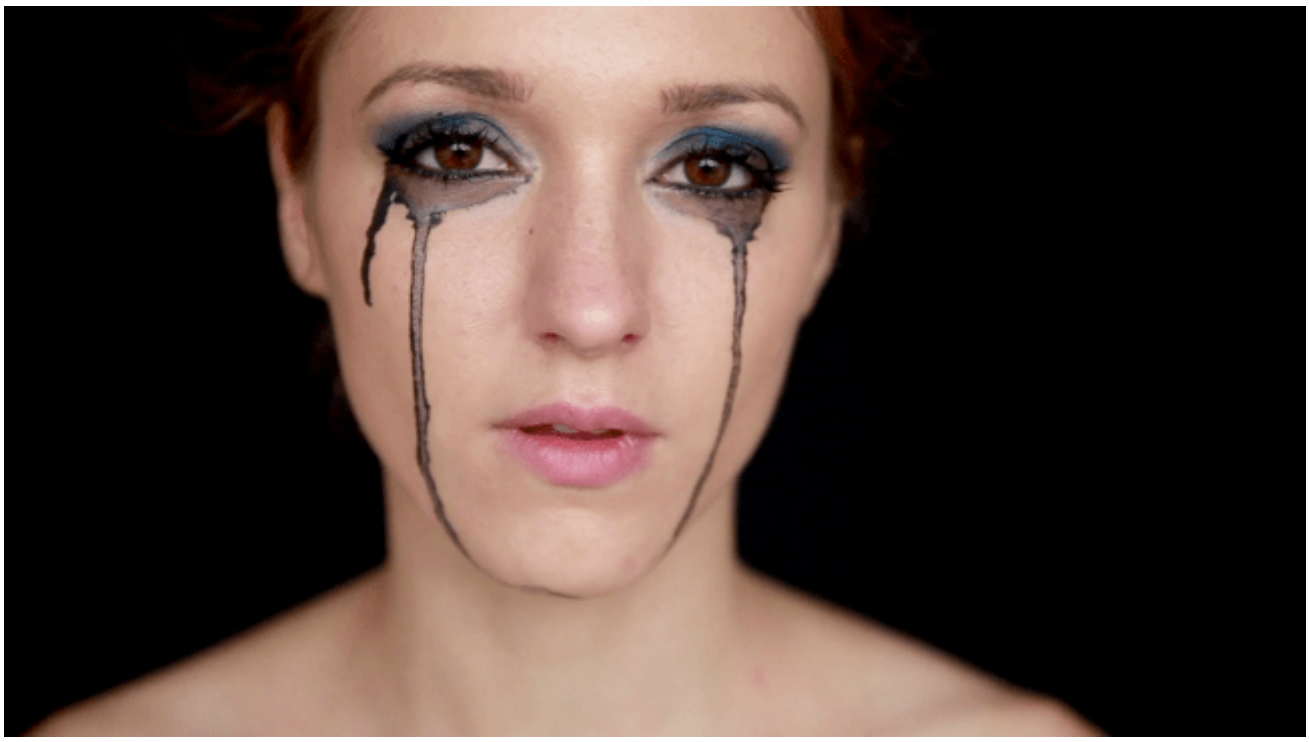
This is a question that has received only vague, intermittent attention from the pulpit and the Manosphere. Instead, most of the attention has been placed on the question of how to make a woman happy.

[Eds. Note: Har har har! A foolish question indeed! A woman's happiness is implicit. She's either happy, or she is not. There is not much you can do to make her happy, but there is a lot you can do to p!ss her off! But fortunately, (and if a man has the stomach to tolerate a lot of drama), he can pour on the unhappiness until she snaps out of it and embraces her own happiness. This is also the same iconoclastic masculine approach that attracts the calumniation of Feminists, probably because it is ego shattering (for her), and it works. BTW, if you take this approach, she might not stick around after she finds her own happiness.]

Over in the comments section on Dalrock's post, How to spot a faker. (April 3, 2018), commenter Nitpic hit on this question when he wrote [emphasis mine],

> "Actually, the wretch [Pastor Wilson] is sort of right, although in a very different way than he would like to be. Every reasonable man will tell you that worshiping your wife is a way to make her miserable, not the way to make her happy. And so if you listen to both of Wilson's pieces of advice – don't worship her and make her happy, it might work. Just don't listen to his advice on how to make her happy. As for the theological mambo-jumbo he tries to wrap his crap in, I'm kind of surprised the women don't get mad about his message: if the woman's happiness is dependent on the acting's of their husbands being endowed with the divine unhappiness, it implies inevitably that women are mere tools of God's corrective force for the benefit of men and thus have less free will than men and thus are logically inferiour to men."

Those are some deep ramblings. (I'll conclusively address the issue of Women's Agency eventually.) Lately, we find a lot of men, like Nitpic, reacting to the implicit treachery in the pulpit by questioning the meaning of it all, and what is actually right. But Nitpic is nitpicking at a deeper truth, which is that husbands and wives do have a considerable influence on each other. It happens to be more complicated than what Pastor Wilson or even Dalrock are hinting at.



The Analysis

First, we should make a distinction between genuine unhappiness as an emotional expression of unfulfilled desires, and the common, low grade, impertinent b!tchiness that accompanies selfish, spoiled, immaturity. A lot of women are quite happy being b!tchy, but they say that they are unhappy in order to power play a guilt trip on the man. We are talking about the former here. Women of both varieties might say the same thing, that they are 'unhappy', so it remains up to the reader to discern which description is applicable.

Also, there is another issue of a man not being able to contribute to a woman's happiness (i.e. 'No Contribution' in the figure below), as opposed to being able to contribute to her happiness, and not as opposed to contributing towards her unhappiness. (This distinction should be made evident by the figure below.) This is a complicated topic (that is unique to each man) which I'll not get into here.

In the analysis, there are several possibilities and consequences that could be present.

1. If both the male/husband and female/wife are happy and content with the relationship, then they're obviously mature enough to handle the responsibilities of marriage, and they have also discovered the secret of maintaining a good relationship.
2. If either the male/husband or female/wife is not happy, it COULD be an indicator that the other partner is a selfish, immature lout, and is failing to fulfill their marital duties to their spouse, similar to what Pastor Wilson describes. But Pastor Wilson neglects to mention that the female could be contributing to the unhappiness, as well as the male. He also doesn't mention that there are other possible causes.
3. Pastor Wilson overlooks the fact that the unhappy partner could be that way because of THEIR OWN lousy spiritual condition, their OWN sinful past, their OWN sinful beliefs, and their OWN sinful choices. Of course, the poor spiritual state of one partner would tend to drag the other person down as well. This assessment is more in line with Biblical precepts.

4. It is quite possible for both partners to be well-adjusted, spiritually mature people, but yet feel very unhappy and discontented with their relational/marital experience for any number of reasons. Some of the more common causes include such things as conflicting values, incompatible personalities, different love languages (a short, explanatory video), different sexual blueprints (see DSR's podcast interview with Jaiya), and unequal sex drives.
5. In addition to these conflicts of personality and interests, we must not neglect to recognize that Satan specifically targets sexuality and marriage with a vengeance. Mr. Lucifer S. Satan seeks to aggrandize these implicit conflicts in order to achieve his own treacherous ends.

The Frame

Concerning the effects of gender, it is fairly well known that the wife has much more influence than the husband towards creating happiness in a marriage. For more on this, please bookmark this excellent but lengthy article from Biblical Gender Roles: Why Unity In Marriage Has More To Do With The Wife Than The Husband (November 23, 2016). [Eds. note: If SF says it's lengthy, then you'll need to bring your razor and toothbrush.]

Because of this dynamic, it may be more accurate to use the husband's happiness as an indicator of his wife's spiritual maturity, and less accurate to trust the converse proposition as an indicator of the husband's worth. (Sorry Pastor Wilson!)

So whenever she says,

> "My unhappiness is your fault!"

There is one of the following going on.

1. She is actually pretty happy (being a b!tch), and she is just giving you a sh!t test. You might consider flipping the table on her, by teaching her an alternative vehicle of happiness through discipline. If you're lucky, you'll wean her off of the BT.
2. She enjoys the drama of putting you on the spot, and watching you jump through her hoops, all for the pleasure of her selfish entertainment. In this case, don't admit her argument.
3. Her statement is an instance of psychological projection, which is a deception of perception.

> "…people mistakenly believe that the traits they Project onto others, are really the true characteristics of others. Or in other words, people who are constantly dishing out a heavy dose of Projection are in a state of denial. They are denying that those traits are truly their own, and not those of the person being addressed."

In any case, she either claims or believes that you are creating misery, but in fact, she is the one creating misery for you. Thus, it may very well be that the truth is this…

> "Your unhappiness is my fault!"

But a woman who has the clarity to comprehend this is not so likely to convey this same sentiment. (Although men will dream all day long of hearing this statement from their woman, as she remorsefully works at her evening tongue job.) Thus, if this statement is ever encountered, it may be taken as a virtue signal of questionable intent.

So whenever she hides behind this mask of 'unhappiness', give her something to be happy about, such as a witty neg (with a smile), or a playful smack on the derriere. Let a fun interaction displace her mind's focus from her claimed unhappiness. Forming a good interactional habit of making love fun will wean her off of a poor habit of self-centered self-pity. This is how her general happiness can be enhanced by your presence.

The Reframe

Although we are quite familiar with how a woman can destroy a man's happiness (quite easily anymore), a man should not be expecting his woman to create his happiness either. A man needs to find a way to be happy with the decisions he makes in life. Hence, he can be happy that he chose a particular woman (or not), and that he has certain fundamental needs met through her. He could also be happy about investing in her spiritual growth, and seeing her grow and become more worthy of the love she receives. But he shouldn't be fooled into thinking that his own happiness emanates from her inner being. In other words, if she is happy, then it will be easier for him to enjoy his own happiness, but if she is not happy, then he should still be happy.

The 10 Commandments of Feminism

Jack · 5 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Whether you are willing to admit it or not, the truth is that women are superior creatures to men, in body, mind, and soul.

Here are the 10 Commandments of Feminism that men should memorize and obey!

Yvonne DeCarlo (1947), AKA Lily Munster, and Zipporah, the wife of Moses in the 1956 classic film, The Ten Commandments.

The 10 Commandments of Feminism

1. Men and women are EQUAL, but men are NOT. Men are either worshipful Alpha idols, or disposable Beta resource suppliers. We do not recognize any other supposed 'male' who is not one of these two.
2. In order for a woman to achieve self-actualization, a woman's egotistical self-esteem needs constant stroking in order for it to grow. Women need to have the liberty to 'find themselves', by doing whatever they deem necessary.
3. All women are entitled to 'respect', which means that their egos shall never be deflated by any means, such as logical reasoning or mansplaining, and the fantasies defined by their solipsism shall not be challenged or ridiculed.
4. Sexual lifestyle and reproduction is uniquely within the domain of women's power. The choice to reproduce is dependent upon the particular preferences of each individual woman, and a woman's reproductive (or abortive) choices shall not be subject to a man's opinion or criticism.
5. Alpha males are merely sperm bank studs which rightfully serve our hypergamy, and make the dissipation of our self-actualization, and (later after we hit the wall) reproduction, an enjoyable process. Other non-Alpha males who seek reproduction only threaten to degrade the species.

6. Alpha men capable of generating Tingles are rare and hard to come by. Therefore, women retain the right to form collective unions (viz. 'soft harems') in order to monopolize Alpha worship services.
7. In the absence of Alpha services, in the event of a middle-age strike for example, women retain the right to settle for a small Beta orbiter workforce, or a very obedient Beta husband, for the purpose of extracting comfort, security and resources.
8. A 'good man' is one who works to earn money, offers credit card services without vetting, covers all the woman's expenditures, supports a woman's career ambitions without question, and (most importantly) who can create the soul renewing Tingles on demand. By this definition, there are no good men.
9. Any man who insists on his own reproductive agency is a selfish, rebellious, ham-fisted, usurper of power and should be castrated castigated immediately.
10. Women retain the right to define courtship, marriage, and even rape, in any way that suits their individual imperatives. Government social systems, the court system, and society at large shall support the superiority of women and their particular feminine imperatives.

Anyone who doesn't wholeheartedly agree with all ten of these holy commandments shall be labeled as 'sexist', 'chauvinistic', and 'misogynistic', and will be subjected to public shame and ridicule, face the loss of employment opportunities, and be ostracized by all of Leftist society. So read it well!

[UPDATE (June 20, 2018): DB's blog is still at the same server (WordPress), but he has reinstalled his blog using a new address. (The errors in the details of the original post below have been corrected.) He discusses these issues in the following post below.]

Dark Brightness: Some Reorganization (June 20, 2018)

Notice to the blogging community: Dark Brightness has ~~relocated or transferred~~ reinstalled his blog platform to a new ~~server and~~ address.

Old address: http://pukeko.net.nz

New address: https://blog.pukeko.net.nz

If you rely on a subscription, or a reader, such as WordPress Reader, then you may have been wondering why it's been a while since you've seen any new posts from Dark Brightness. So, make sure you update your subscription information, if applicable.

I sent him an email to ask him what has been happening with his blog.

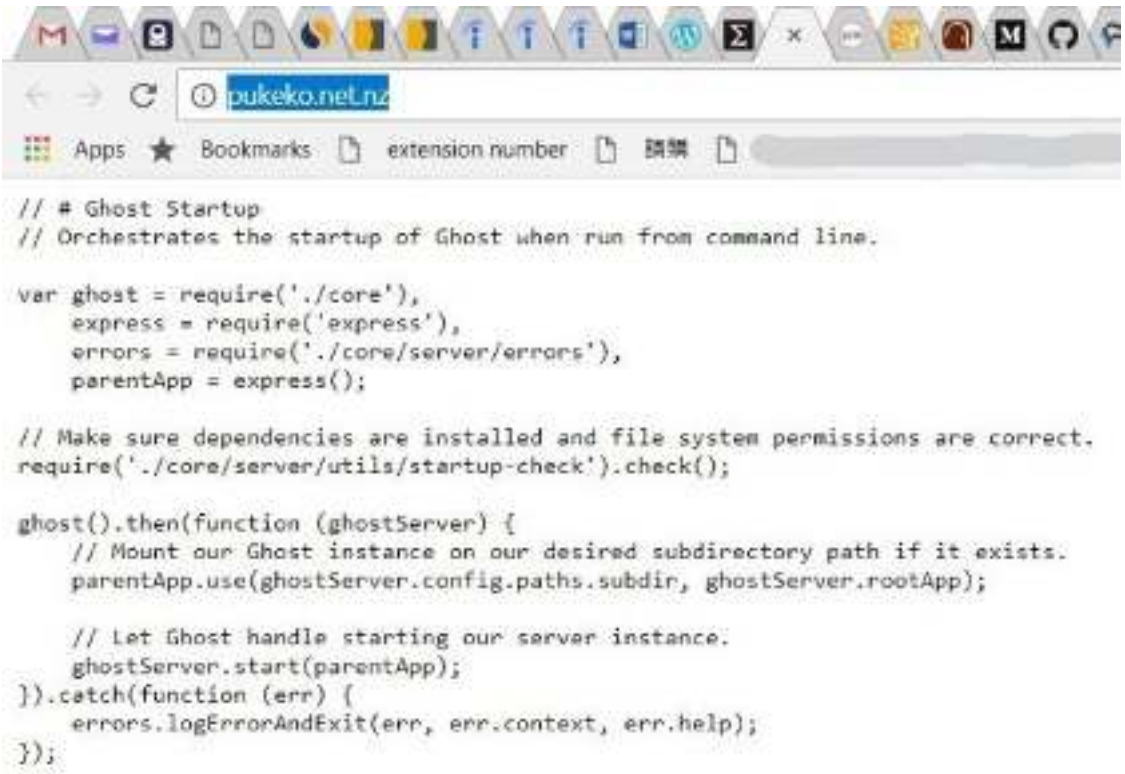
> Dark Brightness,
> I noticed your blog is down. I'm curious to know what happened?
> Is there anything you would like me to tell the blogging community?
> Wayne

He responded in his usual curt, staggered, enigmatic prose, which always stimulates an electrifying introspection.

> The technical issues should be sorted. However, my employer is meeting as they are concerned about the blog. Today.
> Also make sure you are going to https://blog.pukeko.net.nz. The old insecure address does not work.

As he writes, the old address was 'insecure' and no longer functions. Apparently, that means it was hacked, or the hosting agency (perhaps the university where he teaches) suspended or terminated his account.

His old platform presently looks like this.



DB gives a cursory explanation of the situation in these posts.

- Dark Brightness: Broken and lost posts. (May 15, 2018)
- Dark Brightness: This is the Third and a Half Iteration (May 17, 2018)

If you're the type who prays, you might consider asking for DB's blog and livelihood to be preserved, and even that it might grow as a result of this persecution.

A Brother Is Borne Out Of Adversity

Jack · 10 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Good fights produce good friends.

Readership: All

Here, we'll explore one verse in detail.

> "A friend loves at all times, and a brother is born for adversity." ~ Proverbs 17:17 (NKJV)

Most commentaries on this verse interpret it to mean that a true friend will stick with you through good times and bad. A friend who loves at all times is a 'rainy day' friend. When tough times come, a true friend will see it through with you.

While this perspective is implicitly and intuitively true, this verse could be interpreted to have another meaning. As a comparison, the Chinese have a proverb that is roughly translated as,

> "Good fights produce good friends."

The idea is that people don't really know and understand one another until they fight over an issue. But when they have a fight, they often discover that they really want the same thing, but are trying to go about it in different ways. As a result of the fight, they uncover their shared interests, and find that they are indeed friends.

The implications of this Chinese proverb resonates deeply with my experience in life, so I looked up the original meaning of the verse in Proverbs, to see if it might also be interpreted this way.

The Hebrew meaning of the word 'love', (157:oheb) is 'a human love to a human object'. Other verses which use this word in various ways, mention the love of sleep (Proverbs 20:13), the love of idolatry (Hosea 4:13), the love of a slave towards a good master (Exodus 21:5), a woman's love for man (1 Samuel 18:20), and also a man's love for his wife (Genesis 24:67; Genesis 29:20).

The stipulation that follows, 'loves at all times', is what denotes the faithfulness of a true friend. It goes without saying, that if a friend betrays you, even once, he is not a true friend.

The word for adversity (6869: sa-rah) is interpreted as ' a narrow path', 'tightness' or (hilariously) 'a female rival'. Tightness certainly ramps up the competition. The patriarch Abraham was known as the father of faith, and Sarah was the name of his wife. Of particular interest, the word could also be interpreted as 'adversary' (i.e. an opponent), which points strongly towards the Chinese concept.

Paramount to the present study, I wanted to determine whether the preposition used in conjunction with 'adversity' could be interpreted in another manner, namely, is it 'for adversity', or 'from adversity'? I am not an expert in Hebrew, but from what I could gather from BibleHub, the original Hebrew could be best translated as 'of adversity', so this interpretation also tends to support the meaning of the Chinese proverb.

Perhaps the key to understanding the usage is found in the word, 'born' (3205:yalad), which means 'to bear, bring forth, or beget'. Perhaps the English word 'borne' could better represent the idea. So another translation of the latter part of Proverbs 17:17 might be, 'a brother is borne out of a tight female rival'.

Joking aside, the concept behind the Chinese proverb seems to hold up as an acceptable exegesis of the verse in Proverbs.

In further support of this argument, the remainder of this post will recount three true stories of how friendships were forged out of offenses.

Case Study 1: Fights Beget Friends

Here, I'll retell a family story about my uncle.

When my uncle was in high school, back in 1953, he had a quiet personality, and he was really thin. He was so thin, that other guys taunted him by calling him 'Sticks'. One guy, Richie, was especially hard on him, pushing him around, knocking his books on the floor, flipping his cafeteria tray onto his lap, and generally making his life very hard. One day, my uncle had had enough, and he made a bold declaration to Richie in front of everyone who happened to be around them at that moment. He said to Richie,

> "If you ever touch me again, I'm going to give you a knuckle sandwich!"

Richie laughed it off with some additional taunts, and no one took it very seriously. Richie always thought he could beat Sticks in a fist fight, and most of their classmates believed the same, but he was wrong. Later that week, Richie shoved Sticks in the back as he was walking down the hall. As a result, Sticks fell down and cut his lip. So Sticks left his books on the floor, stood up, and worked Richie over.

No one blamed Sticks for fighting back, because Richie was famous for bullying Sticks. Even the teachers looked the other way and refused to either punish Sticks or sympathize with Richie. Everyone thought Richie got what he deserved.

After this incident, Richie changed his attitude towards Sticks. He apologized to Sticks, and Sticks accepted. Soon, they started hanging out together after school. Richie grew to respect Sticks, and they became lifelong friends. My uncle also began to own the name, 'Sticks', and he would allow his closest friends, including Richie, to call him by this nickname. This was a mark of true forgiveness and grace. Eventually, the name morphed to 'Stix', which was considered a pretty cool nickname back then.

When my uncle died last month, Richard was there to give a eulogy. He retold the story of how he and Stix became friends. He said, in so many of his own words, that Stix taught him how to appreciate the goodness in other people, and how to enjoy life. He also said, while weeping, that Stix was a good man (quite a compliment these days), and that he was the best friend he ever had.

Case Study 2: AMOG's Need Friends and Fellowship Too

When I was 6 years old, my family moved to a rural neighborhood. There was another kid who lived down the street who was a year older than me, and he was a lot bigger too. He also had two older brothers, so he enjoyed being exposed to a lot of masculine viewpoints. In the quick, he was a bully. He walked around the neighborhood, seemingly with the sole purpose of extolling his AMOG status among the other children in the neighborhood. Whenever I was playing outside, he would walk across our yard, and push me down on the ground. If I tried to stand up, he would push me down again. Since he was older and bigger than me, and since his brothers had taught him how to fight, there wasn't much I could do. This happened with such regularity, that after a while, whenever I saw him coming, I would just sit down on the ground and give him a really hard look, because I was angry that he was disturbing my play time. He would just laugh at me, and walk away. Conflict averted.

One day, I saw him coming across the neighbor's lawn towards our house. At that time, I was just about finished playing, so I went into the house to avoid him. But he came and knocked on our door, looking for me, which was out of the ordinary. I knew who it was, so I refused to answer the door.

Eventually, my mother heard him knocking and came to the door. I stood a long distance behind her and watched them talk. He asked her if I could come outside and play with him, and when she turned to look at me, I shook my head and refused, because I believed it was just a ploy to get me outside where he could bully me and push me down in the dirt. My mother understood the situation, and she talked with him for a long time, maybe 20 minutes.

After that, she came to talk with me. She urged me to go outside and play with him, and I objected with a brief summary of the history of our interaction. My mother asserted that something was different that time, and that I should give him another chance. She also said if I went outside and he still pushed me around, then she would never ask me to go play with him again. So I took her word, and went to the door to talk with him.

First, he apologized, saying he was sorry that he pushed me around. He said that he wouldn't do that anymore, and that he wanted to be friends with me. I believed him, and went outside to play with him. Ever since that day, we became pretty close friends, and we played together nearly every day. One of our favorite activities was playing war games in the woods adjacent to our neighborhood.

He did change. He was still an aggressive person, and he often challenged me and the other boys to do push-ups, wrestle, climb ropes, wade through deep streams, and to never act 'gay'. But instead of making it seem like a fearful test of qualification for acceptance into (perceived) 'manhood', he made it fun and challenging. He even said the same things – "Get away from me, you faggot!" "Come on, you fat-ass wuss! Give me one more (push-up)!" – But instead of having an angry, belligerent countenance, he smiled and laughed when he said these things. That made all the difference.

A few years later in high school, he became a star. He was the captain of the wrestling team, and he was the leading quarterback for the football team. His girlfriend was the hottest cheerleader on the squad. He was also a straight A student. I liked him because he had a real appetite for life, he was very intelligent, and he had a very congenial but presumptively sarcastic sense of humor. After graduating, he joined the Marine Corps, served a tour in Iraq, and then became a drill sergeant for the remainder of his service.

Many years later, I asked him what had changed in his life, on that day he apologized for being a bully and invited me to be his friend. He told me a little story.

> "My brothers went 4-wheeling, and they wouldn't let me come because I was too young. I started crying about that, and I complained that I would be stuck at home and bored all day because I didn't have anyone to play with. My brothers told me, 'That's your own fault. If you weren't such a big-headed bully, you would have a lot of friends. Time for you to do something about that. See you later!' After that, I realized that I had to change my attitude. I had to stop intimidating people just for the fun of it, and start giving them a chance. So after they left, I went looking for you."

In short, he was humbled. He realized that he needed other people, friends, to have a full life, and that he cannot always be the beneficiary of a relationship. He also learned that he can be the head manager of those relationships in which he is the dominant figure. That's gold!

Case Study 3: Reframing an Offense to be Objective Establishes Respect

When I was in college, I got a job working at a Honda plant over the summers. I took this job because it was the best paying job I could get as a young man with no working experience. I worked as a spot welder for a while, but after the boss discovered that I had learned how to MIG weld in my high school shop class, he moved me over to another assembly line to work as a welder. On this assembly line, there were three groups working on batches of the same parts. Each group had a welder, and an inspector. My inspector was a very short black man, somewhere under 5 feet tall (150 cm.). I was a fairly strong white guy who was 6'3" (190 cm.).

Now welding is a hot, dirty job. On one sweltering day in July, not long after we started working together, I was sweating profusely. My sweat was dripping down inside my shroud and preventing me from seeing clearly through the visor. Overcome with heat exhaustion and exasperation, I pulled off my hood and wiped my face, and exclaimed,

> "Ahh boy! It's so hot in here!"

The next thing I knew, my inspector threw down his tools and marched up to me. He was wagging his finger and shouting at me, saying,

> "Look here! I ain't no boy! Don't ever call me no boy! You hear me?"

I was shocked. It took me a moment to realize that he had heard my off-the-cuff complaint about the heat, and had interpreted my innocent, Charlie Brownish interjection, 'boy', as a personal insult directed towards him. I looked down at him for the longest time, wondering what I should say.

At first, I thought of telling him the truth – that it was just an innocent exclamation, and that I wasn't talking about him. But he was visibly angry. He kept direct eye-contact, and continued to wag his finger while he waited for my response. A lot of coworkers started to stare at us.

After a moment, I realized that if I told him the truth, he wouldn't believe it. He would just think I was a racist coward who was resorting to a passive aggressive denial. I was also impressed with the courage this guy was showing. No doubt, he must have prepared himself for the worst reaction out of me.

[Eds. note: The inspector interpreted the casual statement as a subjective offense, but his confrontation was an attempt to transform it into an objective offense. Kudo's to him.]

Finally, I realized that the wisest thing I could do was to own it and apologize to him. So I said,

> "I'm sorry. I won't call you a boy any more. I'm sorry."

He backed down, and slowly strutted back to his jig and resumed working as if nothing had happened. The other workers around us, many of them black, gradually shifted their steely gazes off of me, and returned to their tasks as well.

After this incident, to my great consternation, I started to attract a lot of respect from the black community within the factory. One black guy invited me to visit a prostitute with him. He said he would pay for both of us. I recognized his invitation to be an honor (of sorts), but I declined. Another black guy heard that I played bass guitar and invited me to join his band. The floor supervisor, who was also black, started giving me a lot of favorable attention too.

One day, while I was working with my welding hood on (and unaware of anything going on around me), I took a big step backwards away from the jig, and I accidentally stepped on the boss's foot. I whipped my hood off and turned around, and I was very surprised to see him standing there, wearing a hood himself, and watching me weld. After he took his hood off, he said I was the only welder in the plant that produced work that always passed inspection without needing to be reworked. He also told me that, after watching me weld for the past few minutes, I was the best welder he ever saw. I was impressed by his statements, knowing that he has seen a lot of welders.

After this incident, we often talked at length about various subjects, and race relations came up frequently. I was able to talk with the boss about a lot of issues that most other whites were not at liberty to discuss with blacks. For example, I asked the boss why blacks always voted for Democrats, even though the KKK were also avowed Democrats. He said that the Democratic party was 'the party for the people', and while it is unfortunate that the KKK are also Democrats, they too recognize that the Democratic party respects the common man, such as themselves.

Through this intermittent dialogue, we developed a mutual respect for each other, which transcended all superficial barriers of race. The next summer, the boss called me to ask if I would be coming back to work with them that season. I did go back to work there for another summer.

Through all of this, I gained a new appreciation for the black community. They had some strict boundaries, but they also had the courage to enforce them, and they were very graceful when treated with dignity and respect.

They understood that a brother is borne out of adversity.

Conclusions

During an altercation, humans open themselves to a volatile, heated interchange, and by doing so, they make themselves emotionally transparent and vulnerable. Through this contention, they each present a convincing, nonverbal, and visceral expression of what is most important to them. It is conducive to the formation of a deeper friendship because it is a form of acceptance, in that it doesn't ignore or reject the other person. Often, the contenders are unable to control the outcome of the clash, and thus, the emotional expression characteristic of a fight can often become an act of humility, faith, and trust in a higher power.

The application of the scriptural truths discussed earlier prove that most modern day sympathies, such as Political Correctness, and the subjectivity of offense, are a genuine thorn in the crawl concerning the real process of establishing eternal, Biblical quality friendships. Without an issue at play, and the genuine interests being expressed by those involved, people cannot discover their role in the scrimmage, and what their shared interests might be. As a result, they miss the opportunity to truly understand one another.

The moral of the story is that being too proud, too complacent, or too fearful to create waves is a recipe for failure. Don't be hesitant to draw boundaries and enforce them, even if it might get you involved in an altercation. Remember to keep it objective, and look for common ground where an alliance might take root and spring up.

Breaking the Fifth Wall – A New Protocol for Post-Truth Debate

The Ideal Debate Dynamic

J.T. Anderson has offered a succinct description of an ideal debate interaction dynamic.

> "Learning is growth. Growth is life. God is for life (and against that which stifles life.)
> Learning primarily takes 3 forms: asking and answering questions, testing assumptions, proving and disproving hypotheses.
> In a pro-growth environment, leaders will encourage inquiry, challenge assumptions, and attempt to disprove prevailing hypotheses. All of this is done for the betterment of the community… including for the betterment of the target of criticism (hence if one can't handle criticism he shouldn't be in leadership.) Of course these criticisms should be delivered with courtesy, but they should be delivered nonetheless if we're to foster growth.
> Unfortunately, many people reject growth in favor of stagnation… which might be synonymous with what you refer to as idolatry. In what we might call a pro-death environment, leaders indoctrinate their followers in an echo chamber. Untested assumptions are propagated as fact, and the longer they're spoken, the more 'true' they become. And anyone who challenges the prevailing paradigm is ousted as an 'enemy' or a 'heretic' rather than given a fair hearing.
> Those who are for life and growth cannot remain in unity for long with those who stand against such things. I think this is why Jesus was so harsh on the Pharisees. Though they were religious, they were anti-life, and therefore Christ treated them as an enemy.
> Perhaps assessing whether there is growth or stagnation in the community is a good 'fruit test'. Though even well-intentioned leaders can attract dogmatic followers. But we can at least assess how the leader responds to the necessary challenges of growth."

The Current Debate Dynamic

Debates are typically won by the person who has the stronger Frame (or in some cases, the most positive public image or reputation). In the past, when the Righteousness vs. Guilt (RvG) ethical system dominated the west, the person who had the facts straight, and who had the most sound reasoning, naturally assumed the stronger Frame. Because everyone agreed to the tenets of the RvG structure, which dictated that facts and logic are fundamental truths worth building a legitimate argument upon, then everyone naturally agreed as to who the winner of the debate would be.

But since Feminism has introduced elements of the Honor vs. Shame (HvS) pseudo-ethical system into western society, this is no longer the case. The goal of having a debate in the HvS system is to enhance one's own dignity and honor using reasonable narratives, rationalized justifications, and emotional appeals, and not to convince using facts and logic. This is why we see so much 'virtue-posturing' these days. Virtue-posturing is an attempt to augment one's honor and social position within the HvS mindset.

Feminism has also introduced elements of the Power vs. Fear (PvF) ethical system as well. This is adamantly made clear in the article from Everyday Feminism, How Can You Tell if You're Being Sexually Empowered or Objectified? Ask Yourself This Simple Question (April 14, 2015).

> "How do we know when someone is being sexually liberated versus being sexually objectified, since they sometimes can look similar from the outside?"
> "Well, the answer is simpler than you think: The difference is in who has the power."

Granted, their concept of 'power' is more attuned to a purely emotional sense of indignantly rebellious, egotistical, cock riding sure insolence, rather than the more traditional definition of authority and brute force. However, this power has, in the past decade, developed into the form of government institutionalized social policies and law. Thus the same ethical structure applies.

Analysis

First, let's consider a hypothetical (but quite possibly real) example for the sake of discussion. Here, a RvG oriented proponent arguing for certain elements of a patriarchal Christian society would have clear facts and reasoning supporting his stance. (Many of these supporting facts and arguments have been covered within the Christian Manosphere.) But a HvS/PvF oriented Feminist opponent could reasonably claim to win the argument (in the eyes of fellow Feminists) merely by shaming the proponent for simply having such perspectives. This can be easily done by pointing out any characteristics of the GvR system which bring shame to anyone within that system. The PvF system applies within the arena of motive.

Remember, in the RvG system, the 'bad guys' are those who are shamed, since shame is somewhat analogous to guilt, in that it is an indicator of wrong doing. But the 'bad guys' in the HvS system are not those who are shamed, but instead are those who instill shame on others.

The surprising result is that any narrative which shames the RvG proponent could sincerely be considered 'right' by an HvS opponent, since truth is defined in the HvS system as that which garners honor. In this case, through a carefully contrived comparison to an apparently dishonored opponent.

If an observer is aware of this dynamic, then it becomes obvious that constructing a narrative specifically to shame an opponent, merely for the sake of winning an honor (virtue) based argument is not an inherently honourable thing to do, and is also duplicitous on many levels.

For instance, 'female objectification' and slut-shaming are condemned by the same individuals who seek to shame those who are presumptuously labeled as 'chauvinist' slut-shamers. It's just a juvenile blame and shame game.

But if the participants in the debate remain unaware of this little game based on the separate pseudo-ethical system, then this debate becomes a fruitless exasperation for both the Christian/Traditionalist and the Intersectional Feminist/Liberal. The debate only serves to generate more tension and animosity.

The fact that this is now necessary, indicates that a shared faith in an ideal interrelational dynamic has broken down, and how lost many people have become in their personal search for truth and the meaning of life.

(I know some readers are trying to draw a link here to the post-modern expression of Chivalry. This is a topic to be covered in an upcoming post. Let it suffice to say that the western RvG system is presently conflated with Chivalry. For a discussion of this claim, please see here, and for an example, see here.)

Case Study 1: Controversy surrounding Jordan Peterson among conservatives

An earlier post, How to Dismantle the Idol of Fandom: Breaking the Fifth Wall (May 26, 2018), discussed the nature of fandom, and how to enhance an effective communication with the proponents of extreme fandom.

> "The earlier part of this post describes how fandom lies somewhere between having a healthy respect for an influential figure, and pedestalizing them above their true spiritual position (i.e. idolatry). I feel it is important to make a clear distinction between them, so that we know exactly where the line is between having a 'healthy' regard, or an 'unhealthy' regard, for the person or ideology in question." […]
> "The latter part of this post describes some applications of this distinction, and points out how an added degree > of awareness will strengthen one's Frame when interacting with someone who holds certain values or beliefs that are foreign to one's own. People may or may not be consciously aware of their own values, beliefs, and pseudo-ethical systems, and so they may never introduce these perspectives into the argument. Being able to understand a proponents unique underlying values and belief systems and speak to that person in their own 'language' [is an ability that will level the playing field]." […]

> "I am not making a conclusion about the ethics of criticism in this post, but I am suggesting that the standard protocol for public debate needs to be modernized."

The basic tenets of the two opposing, conservative based frames in this controversy are summed up here.

- Peterson's opponents point to the fact that he is a Leftie, and suspect that he is a 'controlled opposition' by/to the Left. IOW, they see him as a Trojan horse.
- Peterson's proponents, who want to see the entire corrupt pseudo-Marxist university system destroyed, see him as a ridiculously good frontman for standing up to Feminists and their ilk. IOW, 'the enemy of my enemy is my friend' idea.

The quality that makes Peterson valuable to both the Left and the Right in both cases is his ability to transcend the pseudo-ethics of both the Right and Left political subcultures. Doing so explodes the politico-babble and takes the game of the argument to a whole new level.

A new standard protocol for public debate should address this issue, because whether or not a pundit can break down the fifth wall is the key point of making the truth plain to all. This is the new standard for social sharpness. Anyone who can see this should be climbing the walls to widen his Frame and develop this same skill – for the money, for the popularity, for the political power, for the confident alphatude… whatever he can get out of it that floats his boat.

This is real power in a post-truth world. This is why Peterson's fan base has skyrocketed.

Peterson himself seems to be content with the money and the popularity, so we should not be surprised to see his philosophies gel. Some people will be disappointed with that, but this reminds me of a maxim.

Σ Frame Maxim 4: When you're 'on the ball', figure out why you're on the ball, so that you can stay on the ball!

Peterson has broken the fifth wall, and that's all he needs to do to remain in a position of influence.

But Vox and others (now including Rollo), never address this skill. They focus instead on his socialist sympathies, latent agnosticism, and various factual incongruences. It seems like they're already too preoccupied with the sociopolitical nuances to see the bigger picture of how breaking the fifth wall can be used in their own personal discourse.

Case Study 2: Dalrock's analysis of Dr. Paige Patterson's Ouster

The recent calumniation of a noteworthy figure in the Southern Baptist Church, Dr. Paige Patterson has been a hot issue of discussion in the Manosphere lately.

- Dalrock: He had to know they would one day come for him.(May 26, 2018)
- Dalrock: Patterson's crimes against feminism.(May 28, 2018)
- Christianity and Masculinity: Patterson counseled rightly and apologized wrongly(May 29, 2018)
- Dalrock: What is off about Patterson's "two black eyes" story?(May 29, 2018)
- Dalrock: Hysteria grips Man-Up Headquarters.(May 30, 2018)

To break the fifth wall, it is imperative to extrapolate the goals and motives of the opposing factions. What are the goals of each side?

In the second and fourth posts above, Patterson's apparent goal is to teach people (i.e. battered wives) about how the process of repentance works, and how people can facilitate that process by being obedient to God's Word. Concerning the husbands' repentance in the story – who can come to the Lord without experiencing His grace and mercy? (Grace is when you get something better than what you deserve. Mercy is when you don't get something bad that you do deserve.) It seems obvious that the false religion of Feminism is seeking to eliminate grace and mercy from the equation.

Admittedly the process does appear ugly and 'unfair' from the human viewpoint, but the Lord deems our souls worthy of a sacrifice, even that of His Son, Jesus.

Praise God that he turned around! That's the power of faith and obedience.

In the last post listed above, Dalrock does a nice job of spelling out the goals of the SJW's.

> "The goal of feminists wasn't just to destroy the man, but to get complementarians to agree that all Christians should:

> • Never counsel anything short of divorce if a husband is accused of abuse.

> • Accept the full breadth of the Christian feminist definition of abuse, which is anything that a husband does or doesn't do that upsets his wife."

In the third and fifth post above, it is aptly shown that Patterson was largely in the right, concerning Christian doctrine, but verifiably offensive to Feminist sentiments. Thus, he was caught in the crux of the battle between Christianity and Feminism, and became a casualty. I would consider this to be a major blow against Christianity, and from the perspectives of both sides too.

One more insight I would add to Dalrock's analysis is that Mohler and Burke proved to be Churchian stooges – snakes-in-the-grass who betrayed Patterson at the crucial moment when he most needed to be backed up by other outstanding theologians. If they had both stood behind Patterson, then their solidarity would have made Moore and the SJW's blink. Perhaps the church as a whole is too converged for these guys to be aware of that. So they still have the mindset that it's morally right to pamper the wimminz.

The point made in this post is that Dalrock has broken the fifth wall by revealing the essential nature of the altercation, which is eye opening to all his readers. This is evidently true because many commenters left statements of praise, such as,

> "[Thank you Dalrock,] Your blog is like a monastery in the midst of a dying civilization."

Dalrock has a fairly consistent habit of breaking the fifth wall, and this is one of the main reasons his blog endures as a standard go-to source of truth in the Manosphere.

Case Study 3: Sigma Frame on Presumed Slut Shaming

In the old days, slut shaming was a common tool used to keep women's hypergamic nature from unraveling society. It seems to have been used by women much more effectively than by men. The usual idea here was to typecast morally loose women, or even women who were expressive of their sexuality, as 'bad' women*. The attachment of shame to extramarital sexual encounters served as a very effective check on women's branch swinging ambitions, and thereby formed an institutionalized social norm which supported the continuance of monogamous marriages.

 Since the advent of Feminism and the Red Pill, we know that most all women are 'bad' by this definition.*

The new dynamic concerning slut shaming is that shame is incurred, not on those who are sexually promiscuous, but on those who choose to point out the promiscuous behaviors of others (i.e. slut shame), thereby reversing the outcome with respect to societal stability. The new dynamic seeks to preserve a sense of dignity and honor, whether or not these attributes are actually merited.

With that said, let us now consider a 'debate' between a young wimminz, Madison Witham, and her ex-boyfriend, Justice Champion. Their story is covered in the following news articles.

- Fox News: Teen who accused boyfriend of slut-shaming her prom dress reveals photos of gown (May 5, 2018)
- Dalrock: Shame on him who thinks evil of it. (May 24, 2018).
- Daily Mail: US high school student, 16, who dumped her slut-shaming boyfriend after he said her prom dress 'showed too much skin' finally reveals the offending gown – but says she WON'T be attending (May 25, 2018)
- Sigma Frame: If the shoe fits… (June 1, 2018)

For her to 'win' the argument, she only has to convince a sizeable number of people within her social community that her stance is right or acceptable, and that her ex-boyfriend is the 'bad guy' for shaming her, as she claims. It doesn't matter whether he actually had those intentions, she only needs to make it appear that way. Playing the 'victim card' works quite effectively here.

But if we knew for certain that Champion did not actually send the 'you look like a slut' message, and that it came from another guy, then it would become evident that the 'slut' label had, rather appropriately, hit home, and she would thereby lose all standing with everyone. Rather predictably, this aspect is never brought out in the news articles, because that would be questioning the larger narrative.

The last post listed above reveals a discrepancy between the narratives and the screen shots offered by the Witham and Champion. It is argued that Witham had a backup man who sent the "You look like a slut" message.

> "She [probably] claimed that message was from Champion, and tried to use that message to defame Champion in an arrogant power play that she probably thought was humorous. But beyond her expectation, the news went viral, and then she was unable to back out of the lie without being ousted, so later, she had to decline going to the prom with Champion."
> "[If this is true, then] She is hamster spinning a false narrative, and she is chatting with and probably sleeping with (at least) two different men!"

This perspective is a potential fifth wall breaker, because generally, the Red Pill is a fifth wall wrecking ball. However, the truth of the matter will probably never reach the general public.

Conclusions

In any discussion or debate, the extent to which a critic or an observer, can accept an argument or criticism, respectively, is confined to how much they can agree with the perception of truth offered. Currently, there is nothing new or different about this precept, except that in the modern, post-truth world, truth itself has become a subjective part of the argument. So in order to have an argument or critique that conveys any applicable meaning (including how to decide who the winner of the debate should be), we must first identify what each person considers as truth within the context of their own pseudo-ethical structure, and work from there.

Because this dynamic requires such a long description, I have called it 'breaking the fifth wall' to make the discussion more conveniently eloquent.

The main points I wish for readers to take away from this essay are listed as follows.

- The structure of both formal, and informal styles of public debate have drifted far from being the ideal tool for analyzing facts, expressing viewpoints, and revealing truth.
- In the past, western culture had an RvG ethical structure, but ever since just before the turn of the century, western society has gradually adopted elements of both the HvS, and PvF ethical structures. This has had a colossal and divisive impact on public debate.
- Adherents to the RvG system (e.g. Peterson, Dalrock, and SF) seek clarity and truth above all else. Proponents of the HvS system seek to garner honor, while shaming their opponents. Constituents of the PvF system wish to rearrange the power hierarchies of society, and will invent seemingly unrelated arguments that serve to promulgate their wishes.
- In my opinion, being joined (e.g. LTR, or marriage) to someone of a different pseudo-ethical structure is more catastrophic than being joined to someone of another 'religion'.
- Presently, there are few (if any) ethics in place concerning public criticism, but a valuable criticism should consider both sides of the argument (i.e. break down the fifth wall) with as little bias as possible, no matter which ethical systems are applied. Dalrock and Peterson, two examples discussed in this post, utilize this technique regularly, and I also attempt to do the same.
- If, in fact, the Left is using Peterson as a tool to divide the Right, this may be counteracted if the various Right wing factions would all agree that Peterson has masterfully broken down the fifth wall, and then address this fact within their discussions as a starting point of agreement. All other discussions which do not address this fact, will arguably become divisive.
- Getting into the habit of considering as many different viewpoints as possible is a powerful tool in strengthening one's Frame. Be aware that the other participants in the debate may intentionally fail to address (or may be entirely ignorant of) other Frames and viewpoints. Breaking down the fifth wall is a master class application of exerting Frame.

The Trump Look

Jack · 15 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

A historical study of the hard iconic gaze frequently exhibited by President Trump.

Readership: Men
Length: 1,000 words
Reading Time: 3 minutes

President Donald Trump has a hard iconic gaze that we see very often.

This look is not one of icy hate or bitterness, as many liberals like to imagine. It is a look of determined Frame. Nothing goes past him without getting filtered through his world view.

He holds this expression whenever he is listening intently, or speaking his mind.

Trump never makes the mistake of using second person 'you' while holding this expression. To do so would be granting authority to the person spoken to, and would be a descent into contempt. If he does use second person, it is to put his finger on a specific motive or behavior, to make it clear that it is unacceptable and needs to be improved.

It is not a cold, heartless look. Underlying the tough as nails exterior, there is always confidence and a glimmer of hope in his eye. There is dignity and self control.

But Trump is not the only man who ever wore this look.

Put aside your political biases for a moment, and just consider Trump's Russian contemporary, Vladimir Putin, as a red blooded man.

Putin rose to power through the Russian KGB, so we know he's got to be one h&ll of a SOB Alpha male with an iron capital 'A'. He also carries this steely eyed gaze.

We often find that men who have this look are labeled ‘sexist’ and ‘misogynist’. A fair translation of this femtalk would be, ‘raw, masculine power’, and of course, we know that’s ‘toxic’ to those ugly, low T underlings who seek to flex their own flab.

This is Richard Branson, the founder of the Virgin group, Virgin Atlantic, Virgin Records, etc. It’s a small wonder that he has never had a sexism charged placed against him merely by virtue of his company name. Look, he has the same look as Trump does.

Look how Branson is objectifying this poor woman! That’s some serious ‘sexism’ right there!

Well, when you’re a British Knight who’s worth 5.1 Billion, the possibility of a spurious #metoo reverse-sexual harassment is significant, except it doesn’t matter, because 5.1 Billion could cover more than 5,000 million dollar settlements. To put that into context, that's more than a hundred gold diggers a year for 50 years. H&ll, he could pay off any one claim with pocket change! But seriously, Sir Branson has never had any #metoo accusations. Is it because he's never been close to a woman? Heh… It's probably because he's a world class alpha male, with an SMV in the triple digit range.

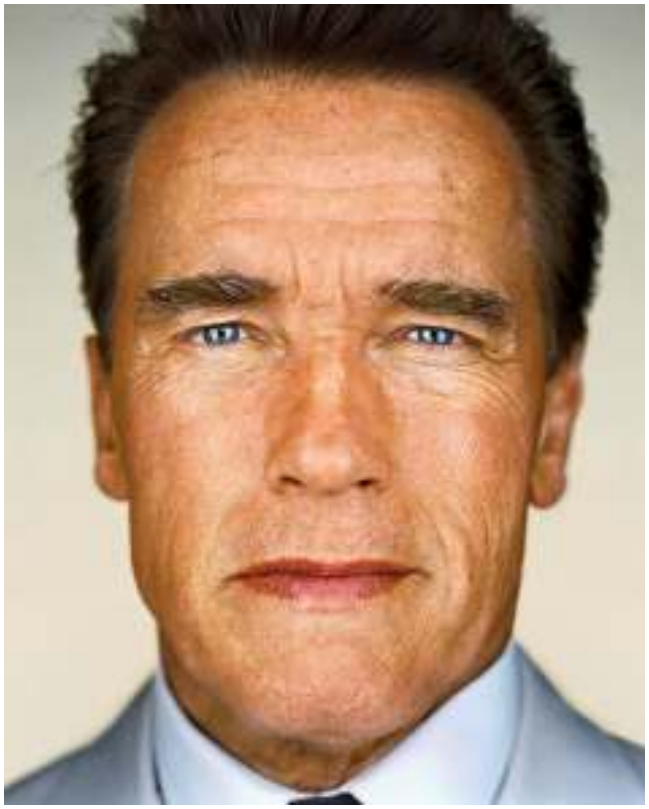
But the Trump look is not limited to politics and business. Many of those 'old school' movie stars have the same appearance. Here's Chuck Norris.

An outspoken Christian, Norris is the author of several Christian-themed books, such as The Justice Riders. His subject matter varies from martial arts, exercise, philosophy, politics, Christian religion, western novels, to biography. He was twice a New York Times best-selling author. Also in 2006, Norris began penning a column for the news website WorldNetDaily, sharing his views on politics, American social issues, sports, and health.

He has also been in a few TV commercials promoting Bible study and prayer in public schools, in addition to efforts to reduce drug use. In his WorldNetDaily columns, he has expressed his belief in Biblical creationism, that those who are troubled should turn to Jesus, and is quoted as saying 'true patriots' do not stay clear of discussing religion and politics.

Speaking of Patriots, Mel Gibson has been noted for having Kamikazi eyes, combined with the deranged, 'bite your head off' Jack Nicklaus grin. This is the warpath version of the Trump Look, which men develop when they're marching off to conquer massive onslaughts of teeming whoards of poon. This picture was taken shortly after he made the news for making 'anti-semitic' comments. Obviously, he was quite proud of himself.

And here's another movie hero who dominated politics later in life, much like Ronald Reagan did.



Schwarzenegger began weight training at the age of 15. He won the Mr. Universe title at age 20 and went on to win the Mr. Olympia contest seven times! He was said to have the most perfect body in bodybuilding history. Not only his muscular structure, but even the veins in his arms and legs were symmetrical!

After he became the Governator, he cleaned up Californian politics quite nicely. How can you trim the budget when you can't even trim the fat off of your own @$$???

Another star, and one of my favorites, is Clint Eastwood.

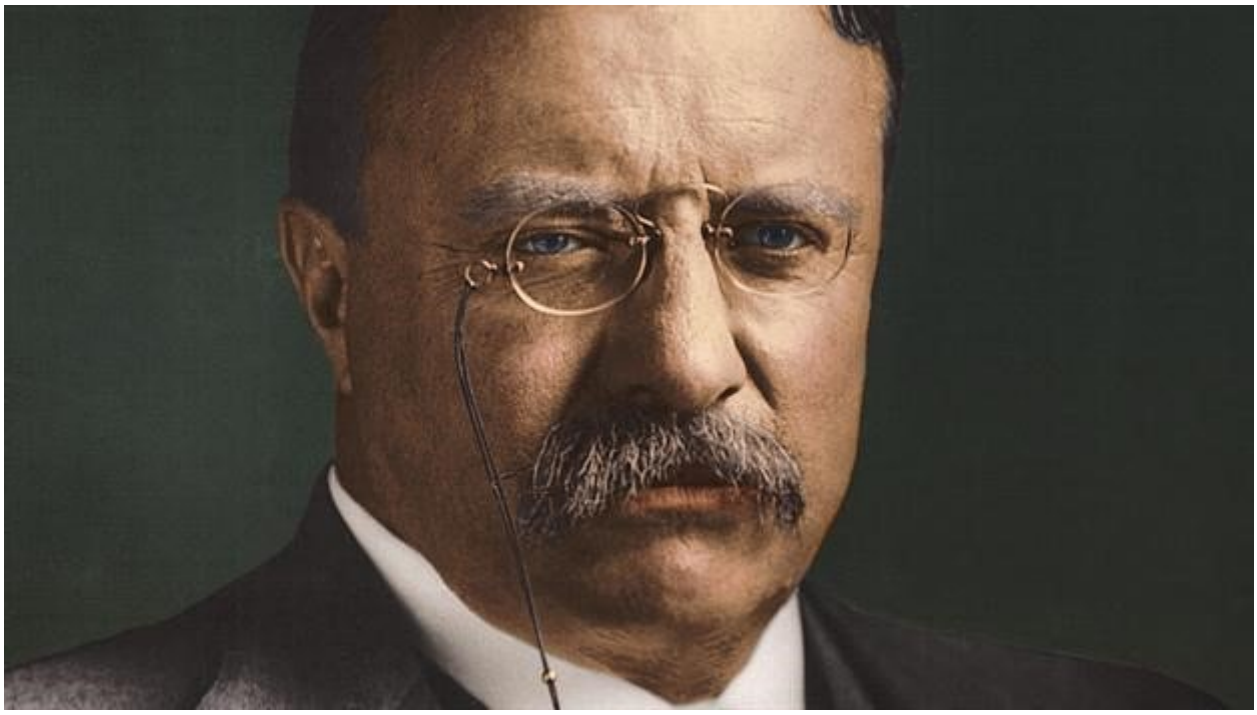
Eastwood singlehandedly made the Trump look famous, even while Trump was a philandering, young business tycoon. And he clenches that cigar just as straight as his Winchester (and probably something else too).

Sir Winston Churchill, largely credited for saving Britain from Nazi Germany during World War Two, also carries the Trump look. This is the look of a man who stands up to Hitler and says,

> "I am fond of pigs. Dogs look up to us. Cats look down on us. Pigs treat us as equals."

Going back even further, we find that the Trump look has been around for quite a while.

President Theodore Roosevelt, famous for his phrase, “Get action!” had the Trump look, and beamed it through spectacles, no less. This is the President who transformed the U.S. from being a backwoods hick country, recovering from the civil war, to a major world power. He built the navy to be the largest in the world during his presidency, and paraded it around the world. He took Cuba and the Philippines back from Spain. He was also famous for his explorations of the Amazon and his big game hunting safaris in Africa.



Can females wear the Trump look? The female actor in the Neo-Bond film, John Wick, also shows this look. But somehow, it just doesn’t work for women. The impression is there, but somehow, it’s just inappropriate – not conducive to the feminine enticement to breed.

Moral of the story: More men, and fewer women, need to develop the Trump look.

Opal's Femsplaination of Cakeface

Jack · 17 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Commenter Opal offers a hamsterbated excuse for why women wear makeup. SF reveals the men's point of view.

Readership: Discerning Men

Cindy Crawford, without (left), and with (right) makeup.

Recently, I came across this query on Quora: Do men prefer women without makeup and with long hair? The answer should be intuitive, but with the current widespread corruption of beauty standards, apparently it's not.

'Opal Smith' wrote the top answer, with 169 upvoters (all women, except for five White Knights, including one g@y, one Muslim, and one musician). She writes,

> "It's funny that so many men say this. It's for a few reasons."

No, it's not funny, and there is just one reason, really. The reason men prefer their steaks rare is so they don't waste their time and emotional energy getting aroused by a woman who is actually not all that great. Maybelline doesn't make a woman any more nubile nor respectful, nor does it improve the gene pool of potential children.

> "Men dislike high maintenance women because they think they're selfish, when in fact, they just care about their appearance and love themselves. They see this as vanity when it's just self love."

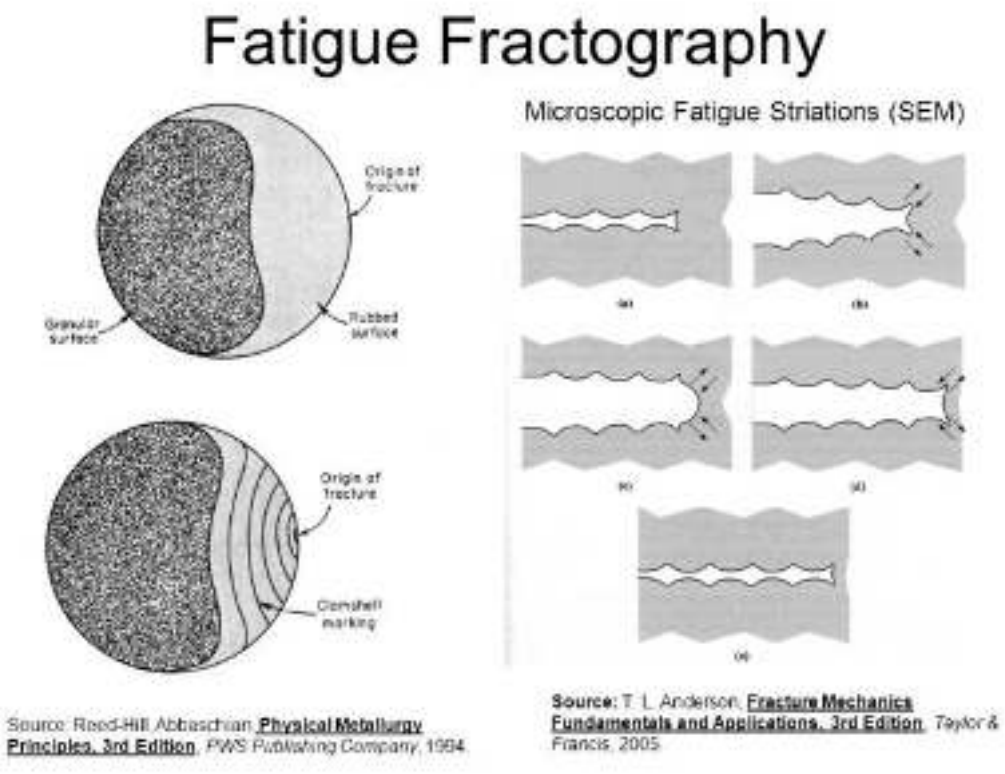
This woman thinks 'high maintenance' means spending an hour to dress up her cake face. Heh… If she can't understand what men really mean by 'high maintenance' then it's definitely vanity. She should improve her posture. Moving on…

> "Second, Men forget that women enjoy makeup and doing their hair. Looking our best makes us confident (not everybody enjoys it but quite a few women do)."

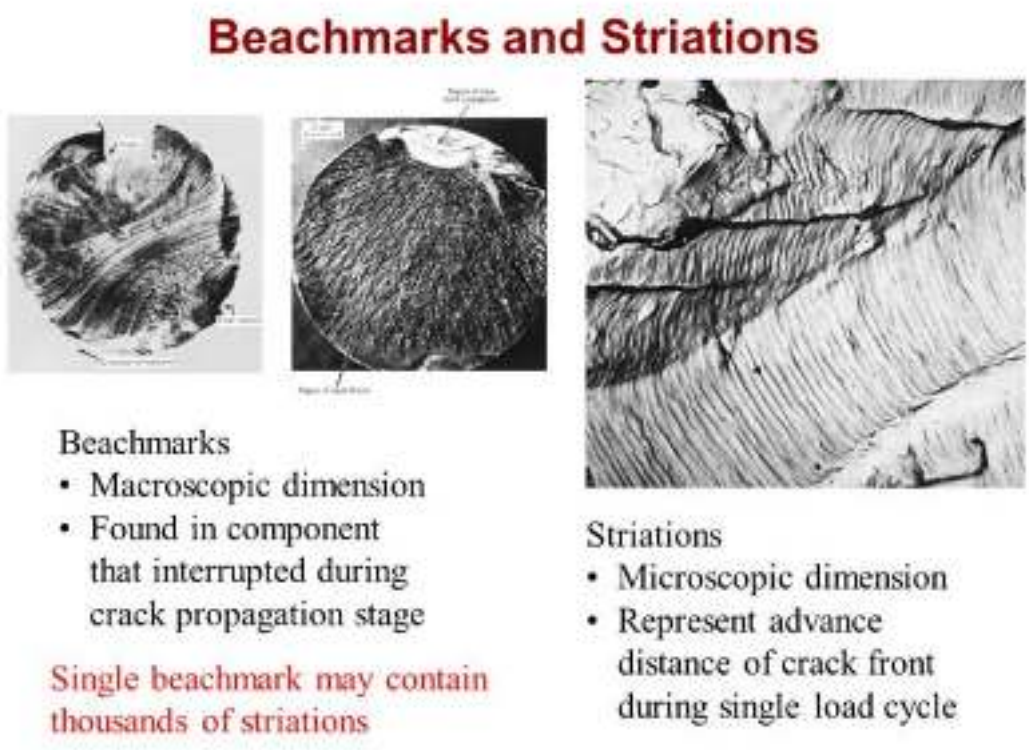
Confident – not because she's truly beautiful, but because she can look better than she does without artistic fanfare, and possibly even better than her friends do – from a distance – all to bask in the limelight of attention. After all, popularity breeds contentment!

> "The other issue is that men have no idea whatsoever what natural is and isn't. Natural is uneven skin tones, dark circles, spots and sparse eyebrows that might need a tiny bit of filling in. Natural hair is plain one dimensional brown."

That first sentence was, well… blonde, but the rest is exact! Those blotches, bags, and pockmarks tell us how many years she's been drunk and DTF. But if she takes care of herself, there should be an absence of tribological clamshell fatigue striations, leading to a premature freak rupture at some unpredictable point in the future. You can paint over the cracks, but it won't remove the flaws.



If possible, men would conduct a non-destructive evaluation to test for cumulative damage, such as beachmarks and striations, shown in the figure below. [I trust the analogies and puns are clear.]



Continuing on…

> "Natural in mens eyes is brown mascara, light eyeshadow, slightly tinted brows and bronzer lightly applied. They think natural hair is a nice chestnut with a little bit of a lighter brown highlight. They don't know what's natural and think they're being nice, but they're actually negging you on some level by doing this."

She has the idea that 'natural' is a style of makeup application. She must look pretty – pretty bad! A mere highlight is conservative in her view! No wonder she gets negged. And she's 'known' a few PUA's, or else she wouldn't know what a neg is called.

> "If a man asks you to intentionally be less confident, less happy and put less effort into your appearance, it's a way to keep you 'his', and so that he is less worried about others looking at you. I see it as a strange thing. Would you ever tell a guy 'oh stop shaving/washing your face/wearing cologne' because it's not 'natural'?"

In thinking that guys are worried about 'keeping her', she's projecting her insecurities onto men. And women are known for dressing down their man, so they can feel less insecure. (Men should never take 'fashion advice' from a woman!) So that last line of reasoning is also projection.

> "In extremes, makeup can look bad. But most guys saying they like 'natural' girls are full of it."

She's dismissing the argument because she can't compete without a buff coat. It's long past time for her to develop some inner beauty, if possible.

Then she offers these photos as an example.

While I will admit it is less glamorous, I feel the presentation on the left is more befitting of 'wife material'. Opal comments,

> "A prime example of natural makeup vs. no makeup. A guy who says he likes 'natural' girls will still go for the girl in the right. Because she's highlighting features without being too bold or making it look like she's wearing > a lot of makeup."

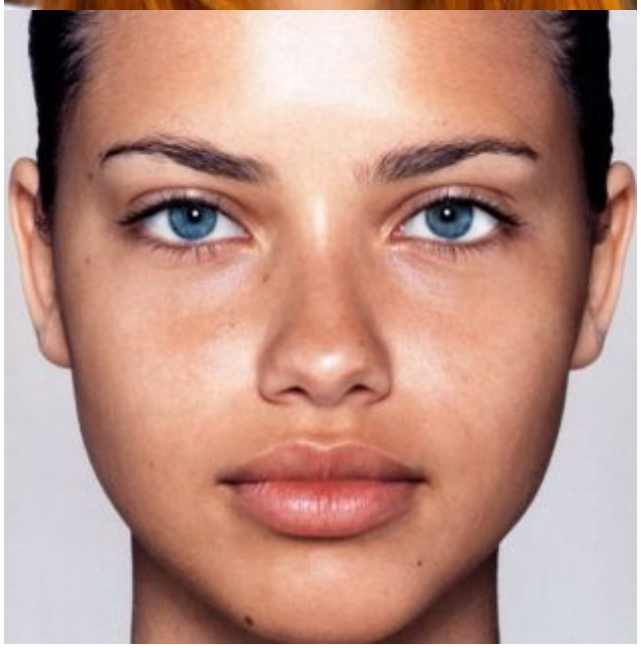
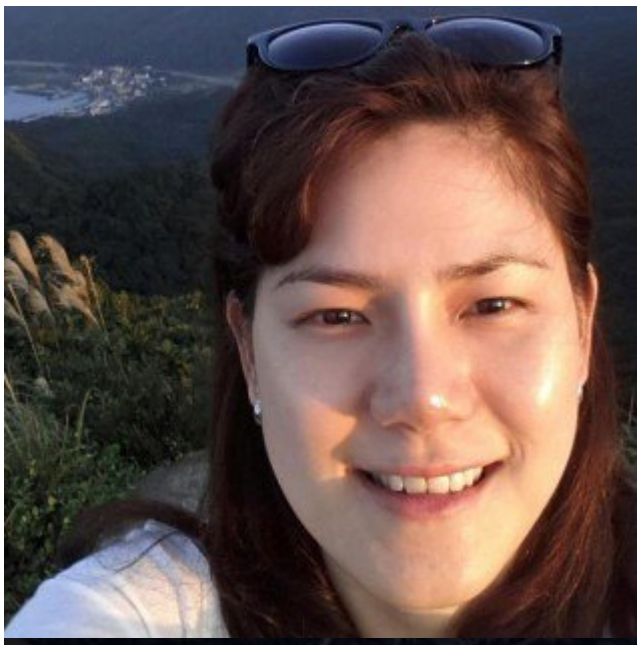
No Opal, this photograph is a prime example of a (slightly) past prime lady, which fits your case.

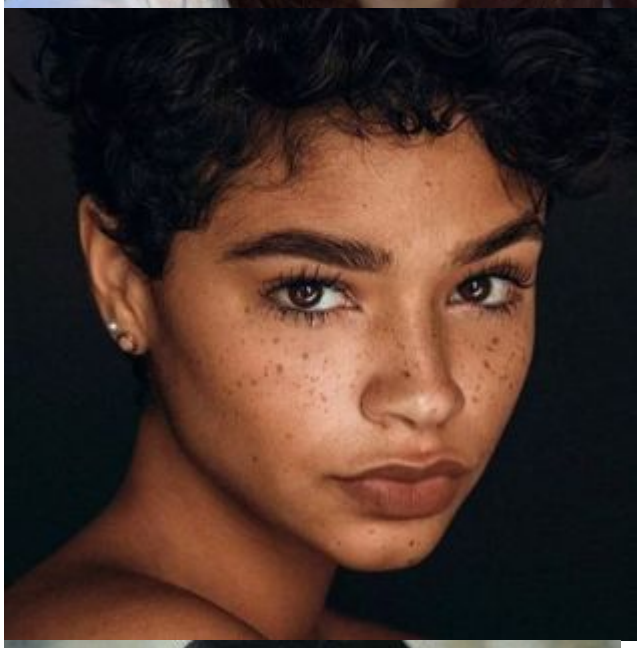
My readers should notice that 'the girl in the right' is a Freudian slip, revealing her true Feminist preference for drag.

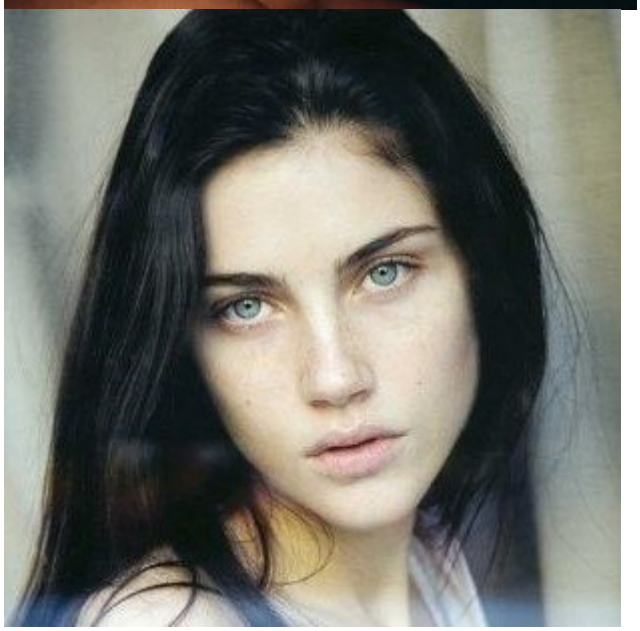
Even in the case she offers, a guy who says he likes 'natural' girls will still go for the girl on the right, but not because she looks better wearing makeup, but because she's more likely to move fast. Whereas, a guy who's seriously interested in a LTR will take his time to know someone looking like the girl on the left, because she's not an attention whoring clownface.

FYI, here's what guys mean by 'all natural'. In case you've missed it, there's a bit of youthful innocence involved. Guy's want to see the healthy 'glow', and makeup only hides that.

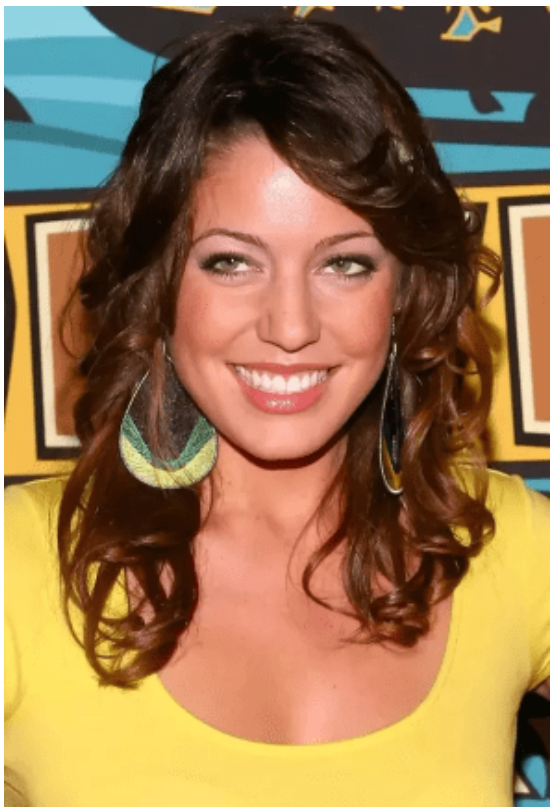








On another, similar query on Quora, Do men prefer women without makeup? Is it really true that men prefer women to wear less makeup? Adam Holme offered a good example of Amanda Kimmel.



> "Do you ever watch Survivor? Everyone on that show looks better 'au naturel', here's the most painful example, Amanda Kimmel, who goes from flawless and unique [on the left], to common and forgettable [with makeup]. Makeup is an attempt to hide reality with a lie. What lie could ever be attractive?"

To answer Adam's question, there are cases when lies are more attractive. For instance, if you happen to look like this lady below, please go to your vanity chest – NOW. We will forgive you.

Why do Women Incite Others to Emote?

Jack · 19 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Women are naturally drawn to create emotional responses in others. Will they choose to use this skill for the good of their relationships, or for their own destructive, egotistical self-centeredness?

Why do women incite others to emote?

It is well known that men are rational, and women are emotional. Just as men prefer to deal with issues using reason and logic, women prefer to deal with life from an emotional standpoint. Women prefer to deal with things on an emotional level, because this is an arena where they are most comfortable. The world of emotions is also where women can wield their feminine powers most dexterously.

As such, women are naturally and powerfully drawn to gossip, drama, and controversy. They take an extreme interest in children, who emote readily and easily, in family feuds, and in troubled individuals who are wrestling with complicated emotions. They get a sense of power when they can influence these situations, and, depending on the particular woman, it matters very little whether that influence is positive or negative. They are too focused on the emotional exchange, and the associated power play, to ever consider the long range outcome of their influence.

A woman does want to continuously elicit emotions out of her man. Women need emotional investment from men to feel cherished and valued. Women say that a man's display of emotion proves to her that he wants her and is willing to be involved in her (emotional) life. Women are continually plagued with doubts about how much the man really loves them. Women are deeply unsettled by this doubt, and are uncomfortable with feeling this way. But it is a need within them that comes to the surface occasionally, and when it does, they need to know that they are loved, secure, and protected. To satisfy this need, women will be happy with getting any emotion out of their man (even anger) rather than silence. Shit testing, jealousy games, pointless arguments, baiting tactics, among many other methods, are all ways in which women do this.

[Eds. note: Some Red Pill theory stands at odds with the above claims from women. So these claims might be interpreted as a rationalized explanation for women's felt need to incite emoting from men.]

If there are no emotions at hand, then they will do what they can to stimulate or incite an emotional response from others. Women have an aspect of their nature that drives them to incite others to emote. This drive is so powerful, that women will become quite confrontational and provocative in their efforts to transform the social interaction into an emotional one.

Problems that women face in their elicitation of men's emotions

Women want to create and observe emotions from men, primarily as a means to connect with him in a way that is meaningful to her. But from the men's point of view, they just hate it when the emotional response she is pecking at is always something negative, like jealousy, anger, frustration, etc. If a woman continues to carry this habit over the long term, it can really undermine the man's good will toward her, and he will eventually grow to regard her as a nuisance to be avoided. Women don't seem to realize that if she is always creating negative emotions, then the man will eventually wise up and shut her out. Instead, men want their woman to create more positive emotions in the relationship.

When a man gets to the point where he has to shut her out, in order to maintain his own peace of mind, men usually take the approach of offering no emotional response. This can be expected, because, for a man, too many ups and downs will cause emotional fatigue. He begins to see the cycle, and then writes it off as static nonsense. Then, when women realize that they are no longer being taken seriously by the man, they become disgusted and angered. This is because, not only do they feel powerless to influence the situation, but they also feel like he is apathetic towards them, and apathy is interpreted as the opposite of love. This is largely why women are attracted to troubled, dysfunctional men, and also why a lot of men who remain passively 'nice', calm, and reasonable get kicked to the curb, and possibly cuckolded out of spite. In short, too much drama brings a bad, long term outcome.

So, the main problem that women face is being caught in a dilemma between (1) being an attractive, sweet, respectful, kindhearted woman that a man would actually want to keep around, and (2) settling their own uncertainties (through shit testing, etc.) as to whether she wants to continue being around this particular man. It's kind of like a push-pull game. It gets more complicated because both of these two extremes have their own unique sets of conundrums (too much to write here). Anyhow, women expect men to do the work of keeping the balance between these two extremes by flexing a dominant pimp hand. Hence, the stereotypical attraction for bad boys and AMOG's.

Another problem that women face is that men prize having a masculine constitution at all times, and therefore scorn emotional expressions as weak beta faggotry. The code of conduct among males never allows a man to display fear, worry, or indecisiveness, much less any display of gushy verbal dribble. Any man who does so will immediately lose respect among his contemporaries. Ironically, many men also consider it to be inconsiderate to show their anger, lust, aggression, drive, or ambition around females. This belief could have been inculcated into men at a formative age, through their mother's or teacher's expectations for them to act in a Chivalrous manner.

[Note to Red Pilled men: Chivalry is not a Christian practice, nor is it conducive towards instilling Tingles in a woman.]

Positive Emoting vs. Negative Emoting

The previous section should serve as a warning to ladies. In summary, men hate what they consider to be useless emoting for no rational purpose. Every single time a woman shit tests a man and forces him to emote, and he knows it's just to pamper her own self-esteem and lack of faith, it takes him one more step towards thinking, "Do I Really Need This Shit?"

So why doesn't a woman emotionally test a man by initiating affection instead of initiating nagging or bitchiness? He'd have to be pretty cold to reject affection. Why not just ask for a hug? Or give him a kiss? Or speak plainly about your thoughts and feelings. All these types of approaches will build your relationship because he will know that you feel safe with him, and it will make him feel wanted and respected by you. Try to consider what you could do that would give him a positive emotional impression of you.

[Eds. note: These last two paragraphs should be memorized by young women, and used as a rule of thumb to govern their motivations and behavior in their efforts to elicit emotions out of others, especially men.]

But why don't women take the positive path towards emoting their men?

Probably because in their mind it is easier to do things that make him mad, than to do things that please him. It's dangerously easy for women to take the negative emotion route, and this is because it's dramatically effective in the short term towards getting an immediate emotional payoff in response.

The positive approach does the opposite, but this requires a lot more thought, work, consideration, and effort out of her. Also, the payoff is long term, and not dramatically immediate. It would be an enormous benefit for women to take the long view, and accept the extra intensive labor involved as an investment in their future happiness. But too many women neglect this opportunity, while most other women remain ignorant of this.

There are some women who really understand that men's opinions of them are affected by whether their emotional contribution is either positive or negative. Women who understand this, will purposely elicit positive emotions in order to obtain favorable responses from a guy.

Faithfulness Maintains the Balance

Women will say that a man being emotionally unresponsive, or ignoring her, is the best method to lose a woman. But Red Pilled men will say that being emotionally unresponsive, or ignoring her, is the best method to teach a woman. That's quite a difference of opinion, and so the level of faith, commitment and emotional investment would make a huge difference in which of these two perspectives would actually play out to be the real case in any particular relationship interaction.

It should be intuitively clear to the reader that faith and trust are central elements of a successful relationship. I believe faith and commitment are the answers to the women's questions of uncertainty. Yet many women continue to shit test, etc., and force men to emote, long after marriage, which obviously is a lack of faith. I mean, he's living with her, paying all her bills, fixing all her stuff, sleeping with her every night and dishing out regular passionate orgasms… He has given up all opportunities to lay other women, just to be with her in a proper relationship. Once a woman proves herself worthy of his commitment, and he has chosen her, the book is closed in his mind. There is no going back. No reconsideration. Period. Forever. He knows his decision. This is how most men are, concerning marriage. All the evidence to believe that he loves her is there, yet, it still isn't clear to her that he is in for the long haul. That is why I say that shit tests and forced emoting are evidence of a lack of faith.

Ladies should be warned that this lack of faith and trust, evidenced by continual shit tests and forced emoting, will start rocking the boat, and if continued unchecked, the relationship will eventually capsize. This problem is greatly exacerbated when women who cannot elicit sufficient emoting to their satisfaction from their men, then turn to their sons, neighbors, and other men in their search for an emotional response to confirm their status. Moreover, women who go overboard with the shit testing and forced emoting signal themselves as faithless, low-class, unworthy partners.

The Almighty made humans (not only women) with two natures, and then gave us the choice of which one to conform to. The feral, 'flesh' nature, or the regenerated identity in Christ which acts out of faith.

> "Your beauty should not come from outward adornment such as braided hair or gold jewelry or fine clothes, but from the inner disposition of your heart, the unfading beauty of a gentle and quiet spirit, which is precious in God's sight. For this is how the holy women of the past adorned themselves. They put their hope in God and were subject to their husbands, just as Sarah obeyed Abraham and called him lord. You are her children if you do what is right and refuse to quiver in fear." ~ 1 Peter 3:3-6 (NKJV)

Every woman has the penchant to rebel from their lawful male authority and it started with Eve. The answer is quite straightforward, but difficult to apply. Women need to face the fact that their insecurities and doubts cause trouble in their relationship, and learn to counteract their natural tendencies.

In other words, women should learn to develop a sense of self-awareness and exercise their personal moral agency. If a woman knows this, then she can address it whenever these feelings come up.

Conclusions

A man and a woman in conjugal union should share the same heart and mind, and be pulling in the same direction. Regardless of how high a level of commitment is shown by the man, the partnership is doomed if one partner is constantly dramatizing, and creating emotional tension and uncertainty, just for the sake of nursing their own faithless doubts and insecurities.

Another thing to consider is this. The older a woman gets, the easier it will be for a man to give up on her and leave, whenever the woman cannot control herself, especially when the negative emoting reaches epic proportions. But it's a lot harder for a man to justify leaving when his woman is faithful, emotionally mature, spiritually secure, and passionately affectionate towards him.

The choice is pretty simple. A woman can either (1) support the man she chooses, make him emote positive emotions, and he'll cherish her for life, or (2) shit test him and tear him down with negative emoting, which will make either him or her eventually leave.

If you are a woman reading this, then carefully consider the results of both paths. This is the empowerment that ladies have.

Racial Discrimination in the US is Alive and Well

Jack · 21 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

A little story about my Dad's fight against Intersectional Feminism in his career.

Readership: All

The Competition for the Corner Office

My father worked for the same company for 45 years. During that time, he had several promotions, and he was also passed over for several promotions as well. As it happened, many times the management chose to give out promotions based on affirmative action, and not because of ability, which predictably resulted in the position being given to many single moms, gay blacks, and other minorities with poor language and social skills.

Every time my father was passed over for someone of lesser ability, he argued with the management about why he was a better choice. In response, the management pleaded with him to 'play ball', and to be more considerate to those in need. In other words, they gave out promotions based on who needed the dignity and extra income the most, and not on how much more professionalism or profit that person might bring to the company. Surprisingly, this company grew to be the leading company in its field during my Dad's career.

The discrimination that Dad experienced wasn't just because of the middle management. No, this discrimination was institutionalized. The company my father worked for is one of 107 major employers that are signatories on Human Rights Campaign's Business Coalition for the Equality Act. It is also one of 609 major businesses (spanning nearly every industry and geographic location) that earned a top score of 100 percent and the distinction of "Best Places to Work for QTBGL Equality".

But my dad could never claim to be a victim of discrimination, because he was an intelligent, white, protestant, middle-class, married man with a family – all the wrong types of intersectional lowerarchy.

The Hypocrisy of Intersectional Hierarchy

As you well know, most companies brandish a similar version of the following disclaimer somewhere on their websites, claiming that they do not tolerate discrimination.

> "The United States Government does not discriminate in employment on the basis of race, color, religion, sex (including pregnancy and gender identity), national origin, political affiliation, sexual orientation, marital status, disability, genetic information, age, membership in an employee organization, retaliation, parental status, military service, or other non-merit factor."

These companies say that they do not discriminate on age, sex, race, gender orientation, etc., but in fact, they do! The discrimination takes the form of favoring those people who belong to the same 'intersectional hierarchy' proscribed by Fourth Wave Feminism, and rejecting those who are white, married, qualified, and professional. I am sure this is not the first time you've seen this pointed out.

Obviously, my Dad's company prides itself for 'equality' and 'diversity', but there is still a lot of discrimination. The discrimination is against competent, white, protestant males.

But this hypocritical 'equality' and 'diversity' trope only applies to the masses. It doesn't apply to the executive board and top-tier management. At that level, the old merit system (and cronyism) is still in effect. This brings me to the next topic.

Promoted to a Position of Incompetence

My father had another observation about how promotions are handled. He noticed that people would get promotion after promotion, until they attained a position which was obviously above their capability, such that they were unable to perform well, nor feel confident about their work. Then, they would stay in that position indefinitely, because they were unable to impress their managers that they were able to handle any more responsibility. In addition to the losses incurred through their mismanagement, those employees under their management also suffered as a result of their poor performance.

So here is where the merit system kicks in – when the person is so obviously incompetent for the job, that, if not for the 'non-discrimination' policies in place, that person would face a dismissal.

My father's proposed solution to this phenomenon was practical, clear and obvious – once a person has been promoted to a position of incompetence, and it becomes clear that they are unable to perform at a higher level, then they should be demoted to their previous position of competence, but should remain at the higher pay level. After this, an equivalent 'promotion' should be awarded by regular salary increases, instead of moving them up to a totally different kind of job.

But you know, as wise as my Dad was, no one ever listened to his ideas. Most people wanted my Dad out of the picture. When he retired, he had to go six rungs up the management ladder, well into the upper levels of administration, and then 'go ballistic' before he found a manager who would agree to grant him the pension benefits outlined in his contract – what he signed on for when he joined the company in 1965.

You would think that after so many years of service to this company, his life's career, that he would be treated better. But even though Dad's employment contract didn't change, the American social contract did. There isn't any social contract between corporations and employees anymore. This happened to my Dad, who is a late member of the Silent Generation. The Boomer Generation is going to discover this same absence of a social contract very soon (and social security too), and on a much larger scale.

Revealing Her Unencumbered Beauty

Jack · 26 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Men need to help women accept difficult truths, develop faith in Christ, and find the beauty of life.

Readership: All

In a previous post about "wife moulding", J.T. Anderson has stipulated that women need to be "sculpted into excellence", meaning that negative qualities and attributes need to be "chipped away" in order to reveal the inner person created by God.

The Artist and His Model (ca. 1890-93), by Jean-Leon Gerome (1824-1904)

But what exactly needs to be taken away?

> "And you shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." ~ John 8:32

There is a relationship between truth, and freedom.

Freedom in Christ means that the believer is relieved from the encumbrances of sin: self-deception, denial (e.g. psychological projection), inner division, and psychological dissociation (AKA 'hamstering').

Freedom in Christ means that one is free from one's own infelicities of disloyalty, ambition, selfishness, fear, avarice, greed, envy… enslavements that, without Christ, would alienate one from God and others.

Freedom in Christ means that one is able to experience the power of 'worldly' passions and desires, but is not compelled to yield to the invitation of temptations.

Thus, Freedom in Christ allows the believer the ability of willing, choosing, and deciding, but these are all under the conditions of finite freedom. There are certain things that could be chosen, that could possibly render one, or others, back under the auspicious oppression of sin.

So to answer the original question, the things that need to be "chipped away" could be any of the following.

- Her ignorance surrounding the difference between the world's pseudo-ethical system, and the spiritual truths of God's Kingdom.
- Lies resulting from her Feminist conditioning. For example, her belief that men and women are not different, but 'equal'.
- Her many false notions concerning her expectations of reality.
- Voluminous inaccuracies about her own self-concept and worth. For example, accepting the worth of her substance, contribution and influence as a woman, and how it changes as she ages.
- Her refusal to face her strengths and weaknesses, and take responsibility for them.
- Her fundamental misgivings about the benefits of having self-centered bad habits and attitudes.
- Many others…

Here, I'll offer an analogy of finding Freedom in Christ. Believing in the truth is like learning to ride a bicycle. Once you learn to balance the bicycle by steering, it's a skill that you always retain throughout life. Likewise, once you've seen the truth and learned to trust God, it's hard to deny the resulting revelations of God's blessings: peace, joy, love, and the other fruits of the spirit. (Satan has his own distorted version of "truth" as well, accompanied by certain "liberties", and if one were to delve into that dark realm to a sufficient degree, it would be hard for one to then have an accurate view of God's truth, and see it for what it truly is.)

So in summary, men, especially fathers, need to do what they can to strip away the false concepts, poor attitudes, and bad habits, from the females in their care; all that would prevent her from learning to ride the bicycle of faith, discovering her Freedom in Christ, and experiencing the joys and blessings thereof.

Ladies Should Respect the Man and Love the Boy

Jack · 28 June 2018 · Archived copy · Original

If a lady can learn to respect the 'outer man', and love the 'inner boy' of the man in her life, she stands a good chance of keeping his heart indefinitely.

Readership: Pink Pilled Women in a heterosexual relationship

After one of my classes this past week, I had an insightful discussion with one of my students. I would describe her as very bright, but insipidly garrulous, annoyingly outspoken, and having some strong, underlying feminist sympathies which she is apparently unaware of. However, she is not an outspoken SJW type.

She told me about her boyfriend back in her home country, and that she is expecting to get married to him after she graduated with her M.B.A. She is 23, and he is 27, and he is already established in a fairly high-paying, white collar career.

Overall, she was happy and enthusiastic about getting married. She said her fiancée loved her very much, but she didn't love him quite as much as he did. I told her that it's not such a big deal if she isn't crazy about him, but what is really important is that she truly and deeply respects him. I told her that if she respects him in an authentic manner, then her feelings of love will grow over time, and so will his for her.

I was happy that she was marrying young, instead of choosing the careerist shrike path in life, and I wanted to push her further in this direction, knowing that it would likely lead to her greater happiness. I decided not to touch on the obvious issue of her materialistic motivations in marrying him. I wanted her to listen to me, and take my words seriously. If I labeled her as a gold-digger, it would only offend her and push her away.

I asked her why she didn't love him very much. She had one main complaint about her boyfriend. She said,

> "Sometimes he acts so immature, like a little boy!"

She found this trait to be so ridiculous and annoying, and she talked at some length about how much trouble it is for her to deal with this trait, and the disappointment she feels as a consequence.

After she said this, I recognized that this is a complaint that most women commonly impute on men – that all men have a 'stupid, selfish little boy' hiding inside them. Women usually label this incorrectly as 'immaturity'. It is a misnomer because they are not referring to genuine immaturity, in which a man refuses to get a job and take responsibility for his life, or when he avoids dealing with his problems and blames other people instead, etc. No, they are referring to the way females regard the emotional nature of fully mature men to be as idyllic boys.

Going back to the conversation I had with my student, I told her exactly how it is with men.

> "Lena, all men have this 'little boy' inside them. It is not a mark of immaturity. It is an aspect of being human. It is not something he will ever 'grow out of', so to speak. He will always have that little boy inside of him, because that's who he really is, in an emotional and spiritual sense. But men only reveal this side of themselves to those people they are closest to, the people they truly love and trust."
> "If your boyfriend is showing you his 'little boy', then that means he is being completely open and transparent with you. He is showing you every emotional nuance and need within his heart. For a man, this behavior is a form of emotional vulnerability that is rarely seen because it is a deviation from the male code of conduct. To do this, a man has to put away his social image of masculinity, and that makes it the ultimate act of trust in you. I don't need to tell you that trust is the central and most important element of any kind of relationship."
> "My point here is this – if you ridicule or embarrass him for showing that 'boyishness', he will recoil in self-defense. And if you do that a number of times, then he will never love or trust you again."
> "So my advice to you is this – and I hope you will listen to me very carefully and take this to heart – if you choose to marry this man, then you need to love that inner boy, and respect that outer man. You must do both. If you can do this, you will have a very happy marriage. But if you do not do this, you will have a very miserable one. Please listen to me here, and never forget this."

Now, I know her fiancée probably has his own Blue Pill problems with oneitis, pussy pedestalization, etc., and he probably has some blind white knighting going on as well. But I can't make the decision for them to get married or not. All I can do is make them aware of what they're getting into, and what will be required of them.

I do think she took my words to heart, so I just have to trust that this young couple will grow into their new roles as husband and wife, as men and women have done since the beginning. I also tend to believe that getting married, as risky as it may be, is probably a better choice than postponing marriage, or not marrying at all.

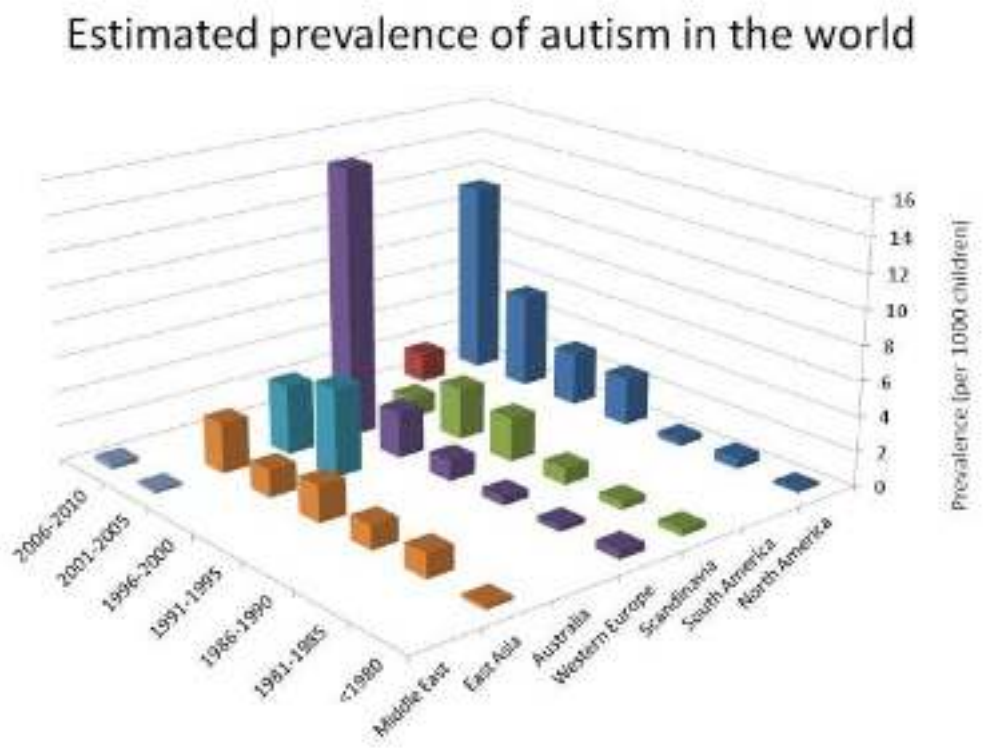
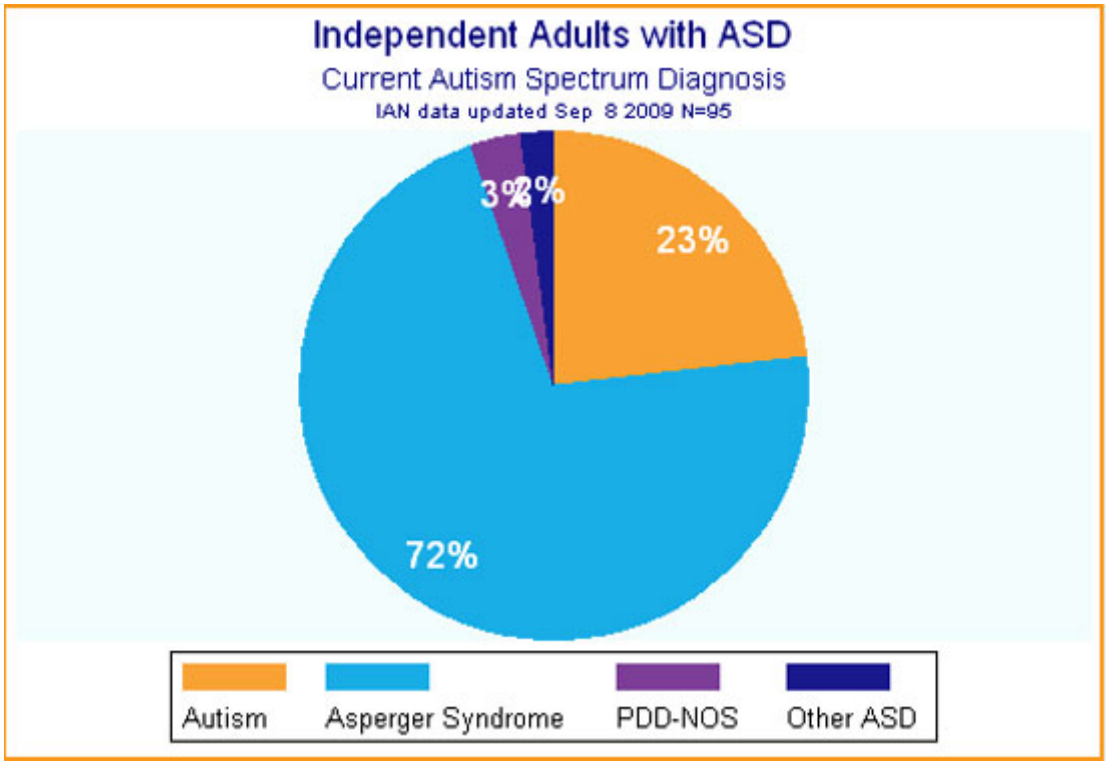
Introduction

I think there must be a lot of guys reading Manosphere/Red Pill blogs who have some form of autism, like Asperger's, yet no blogger ever seems to address their thoughts and needs. Considering how the population frequency of autism has been rising, at some point, they will be so prodigious that we'll have to learn how to get along with them.



Of note, Asperger's syndrome appears as one of the most common occurrences of high-functioning autism.



Educational Resources

If autistic individuals can be properly informed and trained at a young age, they can find it easier to adjust to normal people, and are likely to become much more successful in life, in terms of their social lives, marriages and careers.

Marc Segar offers a self-help-guide for people with autism/Asperger's, entitled, A Survival Guide For People Living With Asperger's Syndrome. His book, "Autism and Computing", launched a blog by the same name, and a Wikibook, Autistic Survival Guide. If you are in constant contact with an autistic person, you may want to read through these sources to glean a few insights. The website Wrong Planet also focuses on the experiences of autistic individuals and how they might best cope with life

In a nutshell, a lot of the most helpful points in Segar's work cover all the most important lessons that neurotypical people learn about life, such as self-esteem, finding one's place in the right career, setting personal boundaries and respecting others' personal space, conveying mannerisms and communicating effectively. One very interesting perspective in Segar's work is how aspies can 'best accommodate the apparent stupidity of normal people'.

Some other informative word studies include Monotropism, Sensory Overload, and Trolling.

- "Monotropism" is when a person has a restricted range of interests and can only pay attention to one thing at a time. Researchers theorize that autistics display this behavior as a way to cope with their hypersensitivity to sensory information. Individuals with attention deficit hyperactivity disorder(ADHD) have the opposite sets of behaviors, in which they are unable to focus on one subject for very long. Both types have difficulties in performing tasks requiring attention and concentration.
- "Sensory Overload" refers to a situation in which there are too many people, too much activity, and too much noise, all of which cause confusion and anxiety for the autistic individual who cannot process this information immediately through intuition.
- "Trolling" Autistic individuals have an interesting relationship with trolling. For one, many immature, but otherwise normal people, find intense, but cruel entertainment in trolling those with autism. Because of their past experiences of being trolled, some aspies think this is just how normal people interact socially and > therefore mimic their behavior in an effort to 'connect'. But most aspies recognize that being trolled by others is a form of mockery and ostracization. (This facet will be covered in more detail later.) On the flip side, many aspies have been known to troll others, especially on internet forums and blogs. Aspies motives for trolling the internet may range from (1) creating entertainment for themselves, (2) experimenting with, and testing the reactions of others for their own personal education about people's behaviors and social interactions, or (3) a kind of passive revenge for being trolled themselves, (4) a need for attention or meaningful dialogue. There may be other motivations as well.

On a side note, I have long suspected that birth control medications are somehow linked to the rise in autism. (Of course, this is probably only one out of many other factors.) The following papers explore the possibilities of this hypothesis.

- K. Strifert, "The link between oral contraceptive use and prevalence in autism spectrum disorder", Medical Hypotheses, 83:6 (2014) 718-725.

Why are Autistic Individuals So Angsty?

I have a couple friends who have Asperger's. I know they have a very difficult life. It's not because they're "dumb". These guys are actually quite intelligent, and gifted with some special talents. But yet, they find it incredibly difficult to be happy. Other people just can't understand why they are so deeply troubled, and so they become a drag to the social scene.

I'll briefly describe four of the most influential factors that lead to this state of angst. My purpose here is not to draw undue pity, but to simply create some empathy which might impart a greater understanding of how to get along with these individuals.

Angst caused by Oxytocin Deficiency

An oxytocin deficiency is commonly found in autistic individuals. Oxytocin evokes feelings of contentment, reduces anxiety, and induces feelings of calmness and security around other people. Many studies have already shown a correlation of oxytocin with human bonding, as it increases trust, and decreases fear. This explains why autistic individuals often appear very uptight, formal, suspicious of others, and socially recalcitrant.

This oxytocin deficiency also affects their sociosexual lives. One study confirmed that there was a positive correlation between oxytocin plasma levels and an anxiety scale measuring the adult romantic attachment.

In other studies, it has been shown that in order for a person to reach full orgasm, it is necessary that the brain regions associated with behavioral control, fear and anxiety are deactivated; which allows individuals to let go of fear and anxiety during sexual arousal. This suggests that oxytocin may be important for the inhibition of brain regions that are associated with behavioral control, fear, and anxiety, thus allowing orgasm to occur.

Angst caused by a lack of Theory of Mind

Theory of Mind is defined as the capacity to mentally represent thoughts, beliefs, and desires, regardless of whether or not the circumstances involved are real. Many individuals classified as having autism have severe difficulty assigning mental states to others, and in interpreting verbal intonation and other non-verbal expressions as indicators of specific mental states in others. This condition is often called "Mind Blindness".

In other words, guys with Asperger's lack discernment. They have a horrifyingly low Emotional Quotient (EQ). They truly don't know what other people are thinking or feeling, unless those people do or say something obvious to reveal it. Because of this, it is impossible for them to know what is an appropriate response to people in a particular social setting. This condition also lays the foundational social elements of being 'out of touch', which then attracts taunting and trolling from others.

Marc Segal's Autistic Survival Guide points out that autistic individuals cannot sense the emotional context of a social setting. He describes the dynamics of this effect as follows.

- Non-autistic people tend to get ALL aspects of social interaction 50-99% right, ALL the time.
- Autistic people can get aspects 100% right or 200% wrong, yet rarely, if ever, will an autistic person be able to achieve 50% of all the aspects.

I can embellish this assessment, based on my own understanding gained from autistic friends and students. Autistic individuals have the viewpoint that neurotypical people always make a game of judging each other by how close they can get to 100% (see Segar's section on 'Confidence').

This may be at least part of the reason why it is difficult for auties to get explanations out of non-autistic people. It takes a lot of time and concentrated effort for a non-autie to transform their subconscious mental processes into socially descriptive words, it usually also exposes their basic desires and deeper motives, which can be embarrassing as well as risky.

Furthermore, normative people seem to regard an autie's need for explicitness as an attempt to "cheat the game". That is to say, from a non-autistic persons point of view, why would I want to go through all the hassle, risk, trouble and time necessary to give a small piece of emotional information to an autistic person who has not first demonstrated an ability to use said information discretely and wisely, and then also not betray my humble frankness?

These contrasting viewpoints reveal how tedious a social interaction can be, not just for normies, but for autistic individuals as well. Obviously, this difference in perception creates a vast barrier between communication styles, which affects every aspect of interaction between an autie and a typical person.

Angst Caused by the Misinterpretation of Eccentric Behaviors

One tragic consequence that results from mind blindness is the inability to judge the context of a social situation with enough accuracy to be able to fit in. Because of the inherent difficulties involved with understanding others, many autistics tend to give up on pursuing meaningful social interaction, and focus instead on the hard work of maintaining their own emotional balance, and obtaining peace of mind. They also fail to express this autorejection in a way that others can understand. As a result, most people misinterpret the eccentricities of autistics as rude, inappropriate, or unacceptable behavior.

The following video identifies five characteristic behaviors of autistics, and the common misinterpretation of these behaviors.

Cliff's notes for the video are as follows.

> "There is always some distress, anxiety, or obsession manifested in every 'inappropriate' behavior that gets misinterpreted by others."

The most common misinterpretations of behaviors common to autistic individuals are listed as follows.

1. A "low tolerance for boredom" is misinterpreted as laziness.
2. The inability to "read" others is misinterpreted as lack of empathy.
3. Poor "emotional regulation" is misinterpreted as psychological instability.
4. Detachment is misinterpreted as narcissism.
5. Deficits in social skills are misinterpreted as abnormality.

Angst Caused by Bullying and Rejection

Simply put, one of the biggest problems faced by autistic individuals is social rejection. This, in addition to the frequent trolling and bullying, are the most crippling reasons why auties find it very difficult to be happy. From the viewpoint of an autistic person, nearly everyone is a bully, and this is largely because most people are careless, and often cruel.

People have a schadenfreudian nature, in which they don't want to see someone who is socially awkward and unfamiliar with being happy, to actually be happy. *

Also, facing someone with an apparent handicap is deeply embarrassing for some unjust reason, and the average person just can't tolerate it. So, no one wants to talk with them, listen to them, or be around them. At worst, most people talk to them, and about them (often behind their backs) with scorn and ridicule. As a consequence, autistic individuals are subjected to excessive amounts of rejection on a daily basis.

In addition, people unfamiliar with autism spectrum disorders naturally assume that autistics are capable of playing the social game (as described in the previous section). But since they can't, those people think it's fun, easy, and ego stroking to win a social spar against an Aspie (not to mention juvenile and cruel). To offer an analogy, if a man had polio, very few people would be so cruel and rude as to call him a 'crip', and kick his one good leg out from under him. But people ignorantly think it's OK to do that, in a figurative sense, to individuals on the autism spectrum.

This video briefly outlines some of the pressures experienced by adolescent autistics.

 This social reaction is apparent, not just for autistics, but for every person with any type of disability, ingrained problem, or spiritual stronghold. At the risk of appearing too 'liberal', I need to say that Christian charity requires us to willfully overcome the callousness of our nature towards the neighbor who is disadvantaged. Adopting this one Christian attitude will drastically improve your relationship with an autistic person.*

Descriptions of Successful Aspies

Many noteworthy and famous people have, or are suspected to have, some form of autism. Ranker.com offers lists of a few of these people: 16 Famous People with Autism and Celebrities Who (Probably) Have Asperger's Syndrome.

Back in 2015, I came across a blog written by an aspie named Penelope Trunk. At that time, I thought her writings had a lot of passion and optimism, which I found admirable, but I also found her works to lack some basic landmarks of logical purity. (Maybe that is just a symptom of being female.) Since then, she has developed a very successful writing career, and has founded a small business. [I don't agree with many of her viewpoints, but I mention her here, because I think some people might be intrigued by her honest writings, and inspired by her professional success, while knowing that she is autistic.]

Personally, I know one guy with Asperger's who has a professional hobby of restoring classic guitars. I've seen him take very valuable, but ruined instruments, and repair them. He has restored several old Gibson Les Paul's with broken headstocks. He cuts out the cracks and splinters, and makes a jig to cut intricate splines and tenons to fit into the joint. He glues all the pieces together like a wooden puzzle and puts several clamps on it. After trimming off the glue and sanding it smooth, he paints the headstock black with a sunburst fade into the natural mahogany finish at the end of the neck. Finally, he replaces the "Les Paul" decal, and finishes it with a clear coat of lacquer. No one can tell that it had ever been broken.

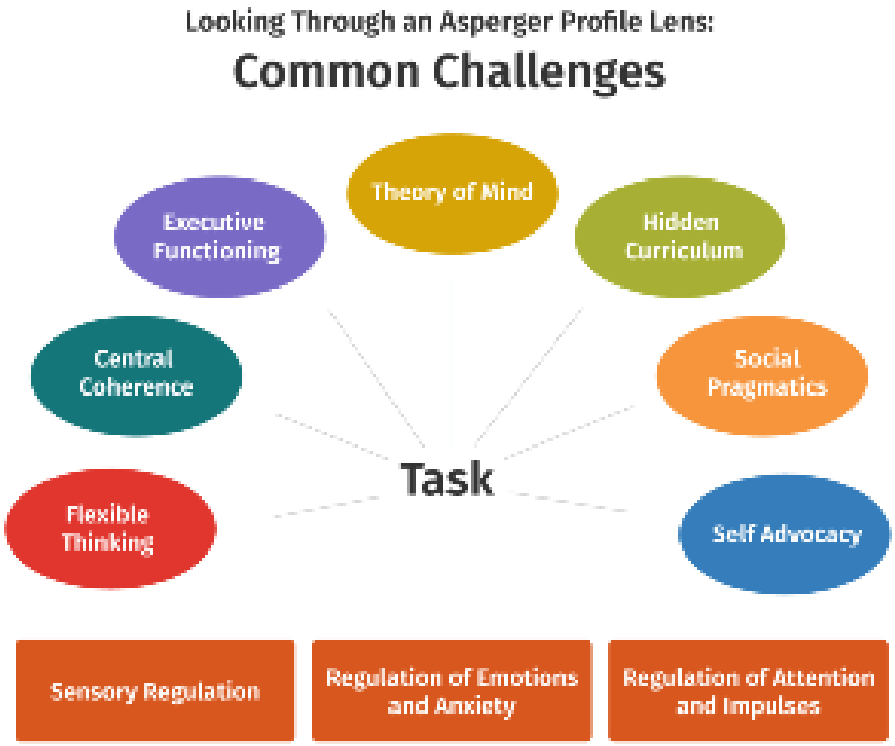
This guy is happy when he is restoring these classic guitars. Many people are inspired by his work, and offer him encouraging words concerning his artistry. For him, the best part is that people leave him alone, and stop noticing his shallow breathing. He enjoys it because he can get into flow, and he makes pretty good money at it too.

Red Pilled Aspies

Guys with Asperger's have one Red Pill advantage that I have noticed, so this takes us to the Orange Pill. The Manosphere often instructs men to not take women's words seriously, but to examine their behaviors instead. Most guys with Asperger's are naturals at this. * They have told me some profound insights on women. Here are a few things I've learned about women from Asperger guys.

- The easiest way to p!ss a woman off, and set her off balance, is to look at her smugly, and give her a cold smile without saying anything. It makes them self-conscious, and they lose confidence. They will typically lash out in self-defense by calling you a pervert. [Heh… Aspies are not Alphas, you know.]
- Some women get slut eye, and start chewing food with their mouth open when they have the Tingles for a man nearby. They do this (presumably) because they're insecure and feel vulnerable. [LMAO!]
- Women have the mindset that all the world is a stage, and they're always trying to do their best act. That's why they stay in groups, and go places (like the restroom) in groups – because they're insecure about their act. The need to talk about each other's performances, give each other tips for improvement, and support each other. It's like a football team taking a break at halftime and getting a revised play strategy from the coach, and if one of them screws up their act, then the whole team gives them hell. [I thought this one was hilariously true.]
- Women are always trying to make other people emotional, often in an attempt to sabojack and control the social interaction. [I was so intrigued by this viewpoint, that I studied it in a previous post, Why do Women Incite Others to Emote?(June 19, 2018)]

 The negative caveat to having this skill is that Aspies cannot detect some of the emotional information that could be beneficially associated with the obvious tells.*



Conclusions

The figure above shows several challenges of personal regulation that autistic individuals face, related to the intake of sensory information, the processing of emotions and anxiety, and the willful control of attention and impulses. These areas of difficulty include,

- Cognitive Flexibility: Difficulty in two skills – flexible thinking and set shifting.
- Central Coherence: Not being aware of the present moment.
- Executive Functioning: Not knowing what to do in a given circumstance, and after knowing, finding difficulty in the efficacious performance.
- Theory of Mind: Not being able to determine the thoughts, feelings, and intentions of others.
- Hidden Curriculum: Not understanding what is expected of them within a social context.
- Social Pragmatics: Not knowing what will bring 'success' in a given social situation.
- Self Advocacy: Not knowing how to express themselves in a way that others can immediately comprehend.

In addition to these challenges, autistic individuals usually experience intense levels of anxiety and anger on a continual basis, and this is because of a combination of the following factors.

1. A lack of trust and bonding caused by low oxytocin.
2. Their 'mind blindness' (an inability to postulate a theory of mind in others) causes them to be unable to intuitively sense the thoughts, feelings, and intentions of others. This leads to regret, frustration and disappointment.
3. Their inability to gauge the social context of a situation prevents them from being able to know how to respond appropriately, and blend in harmoniously.
4. Other people misinterpret their eccentric behaviors as abnormal, psychotic, lazy, careless, unfeeling, narcissistic, unacceptably rude, or as having malicious intent. Such assessments are not representative of the autistic person's true thoughts, feelings, and motives.
5. Their general sense that the world is full of stupid, careless, and cruel people, which is reinforced by daily trolling, bullying, and rejection.

As a result, autistic individuals usually display the following characteristics, among others.

1. They continually experience angst, and find it very difficult to be happy.
2. They tend to recoil into their private inner world, where they are more comfortable.
3. They turn their attention to particular activities in which they are skillful.
4. They require a long time to acquaint themselves with other people well enough to trust them and get along with them.

People who are in contact with autistic individuals on a regular basis, and who wish to improve their relationship with the person, should remember the following.

1. Accept the fact that the autistic person faces great difficulties in simple social exchanges.
2. Adopt a formal personal presentation whenever interacting with an autistic person. This will make them feel more respected and less apprehensive.
3. Exhibiting serenity, reasonability, altruism, and patience, will be interpreted by the autistic person as dignity, intelligence, kindness, and acceptance, respectively.
4. Recognize that the autistic person lacks a great deal of emotional and intuitive information that most people take for granted. Be as verbally explicit as possible, without being condescending. Autistics do not readily comprehend sarcasm and allusions.
5. Autistic individuals are overtly sensitive to disorder, noise, and seemingly random displays of strong emotions. Large crowds, anger, shouting, loud noises, and abrupt changes to schedules are deeply unsettling for the autistic person.
6. Avoid the temptation to tease, taunt, or troll the person. Also avoid being sarcastic or aggressively angry towards him. This is very important. One slip will destroy much hard-earned trust.
7. Try not to presume cruel or careless intent on behalf of the person. In the event that he has spoken rudely or acted offensively, try to discuss this with him privately as a caring friend, and explain why his behavior was unacceptable. If he responds with confusion, you may also need to tell him how to respond in a more appropriate manner. If he responds with anger, you may not have yet developed sufficient standing with him.

If you can gain sufficient trust and rapport with an autistic person, you may be intrigued to discover some of his unique and useful insights on specific people, the social behaviors of normal people, and the world in general.

Shifting Gears in a Career

Jack · 8 July 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Changing careers can be a very difficult, yet positive, turn of events.

Readership: Men facing career difficulties.

An Unpleasant Impetus for a Career Change

A while back, between 2008 to 2012, my ex-wife had a nasty habit of trying to get me fired from any job I had. She succeeded in doing this at least three times, maybe four. For the first two jobs, she did this by spreading false rumors among my coworkers, making me out to be a grossly immoral character. (Hey, I'm just a divorced Manosphere blogger!) But with the second job, I had a very wise and insightful employer who figured out what was going on, and they let me in on what she was saying to people. So after that, I preemptively warned people that I had an ex who liked to stir up drama, and that if she ever came around, then they should just ignore her. Few people took her seriously after that. [Divorced men should take the hint to tell people.]

Then after she got turned away at the door a few times, she upped the ante by filing cases against me on trumped up criminal charges. Because of this, the police came to the school at least twice (that I knew of), and once, they even pulled me out of a classroom full of students in order to interrogate me. (Those were extremely embarrassing experiences.)

This school could handle gossip and rumors, but having the police coming around was just too much for them. So they had to let me go in the end.

After that, I took another job in another city, and I thought she would leave me alone because of the distance between us. But her strategy of calling the police turned out to be more convenient for her than instilling rumors, because she didn't have to take the effort to befriend my coworkers, and she could still sabotage my career, even though I had moved to another city. Also, a lawsuit hit me harder than mere rumors did. Not only did the police intervention instigate damaging rumors which affected my career, but I also had to waste big bucks on a lawyer.

So because she destroyed my reputation again at that school, I lost a third job.

Redesigning a Career Strategy

After all of that mess, I knew I had to create a man-cave where it would be difficult for my ex to find me. So I rented a small warehouse (225 m^2 or 2,422 sq. ft.) in an old part of the city to live in. The rent was super cheap (US$400/month), and it provided space for my car, motorcycles, industrial shop machines, and research equipment. Best of all, I had some good parties there, and my friends and especially the women I knew, loved to hang out there.

I also decided to have a few part-time jobs instead of one full-time job, so that if she ever messed with one of them, I still had the others to fall back on.

> "Ship your grain across the sea;
> after many days you may receive a return.
> Invest in seven ventures, yes, in eight;
> you do not know what disaster may come upon the land." ~ Ecclesiastes 11:1-2 (NIV)

During this time, I was an adjunct professor at two universities, and I had arrangements to teach classes at three or four other schools. I was invited to participate in four research partnerships, and I was publishing an average of two papers a year. I also did some independent work on the side that bolstered my income significantly.

The thing I enjoyed the most about this set up, was that I had the freedom to make my own schedule, and I could accept or reject any work opportunities that came my way. If one didn't fit into my schedule, or work out very well, I had plenty of others to rely on.

I discovered that this revised play strategy brought me a whole new life. Things went a lot smoother for me, and I soon became very nicely set up. I opened a post office box to receive my mail, and picked up my daughters at discrete locations for their visitation, so my ex never found out where I lived. She gave up trying to sabotage my career, and turned her focus onto custody issues and monopolizing visitation rights.

My daughters thought living in a warehouse was a dream come true. On rainy days, they could rollerblade and ride their bikes around the warehouse floor. They hated leaving to return to their mother.

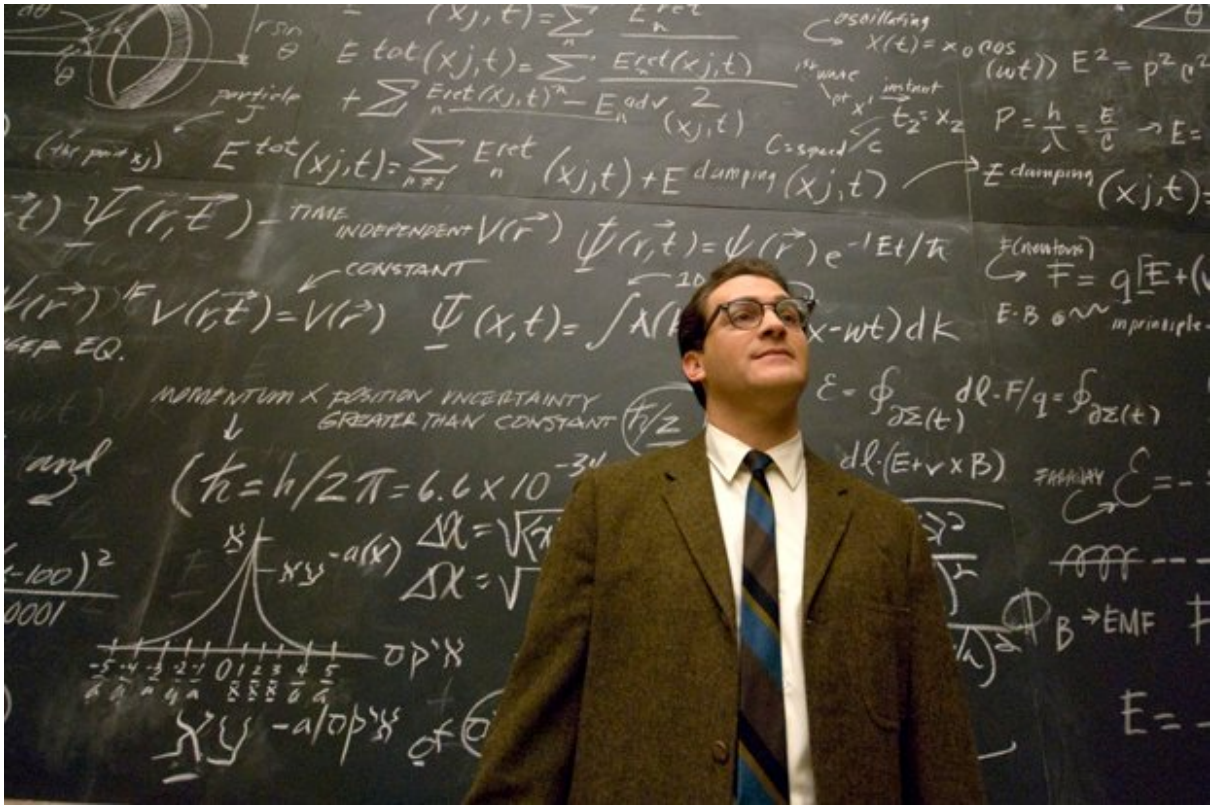
A New Opportunity Emerges

Then in 2014, I was offered a full-time position as an assistant professor. At first, I didn't want to take this job (which is my present job), because it was only a contracted position. I wanted to wait until I found a regular tenure-track position. But the department chairman urged me to take this job, promising that it would help me get my foot in the door to a tenured position after a couple years, so I accepted.



However, it didn't turn out like he stated. I've been here for the last four years, but I have little to show for it.

- The school did not give me any laboratory space, so I was only able to use what research equipment would fit into my own office space (which wasn't much).
- I applied for research grants every year, but I was only granted a partial award for one year, which was barely enough to cover my expenses.
- The other professors in my department were hesitant to partner up with me, largely because our research interests didn't overlap.
- My time was consumed by teaching between 15 to 19 hours a week (which is a heavy load for collegiate level), so I haven't had much time for doing research.
- Even though I have helped a lot of students with their research projects and papers, I haven't had any students who officially called me their advisor. Thus, I haven't had any students to help me conduct any research.
- Not so surprisingly, I haven't had a single SCI publication since I joined this school four years ago. It's not like I haven't tried. I've submitted a few papers, but they were all rejected by the publisher for various reasons.
- I was also rather bored with the environment.

No lab, no money, no partners, no time, no students, no publications, no excitement…

But the University expects me to turn out top-rate, cutting edge, research results worthy of publication in world class technical journals. So my lack of publications disqualified me from being eligible for a promotion. When a tenured position opened up, they didn't even grant me an interview. Some of the other professionals who were vying for my position had Ph.D.'s from famous schools, and hundreds of publications on their resume. A couple of them had even published 30+ papers in the past year alone! (I don't understand how they could do that.)

So you see, in Asia, this profession is extremely competitive, and since I haven't published anything for the last four years, that put me at the bottom of the competition.

Publish or Perish!

In summary, my professional accomplishments at this University have been dismal, and I see that my career as a full-time professor may be reaching its end. I don't feel regretful about this, but instead, I think it's time to embark on a new adventure in life. So lately, I have been reassessing my career options.

Another Career Reassessment

I know I can be very good at research, but my heart is more into teaching, writing, counseling, and even evangelism when given the chance. I am most renowned for teaching students' confidence, of all things. I know this is because I have the heart to share my faith with others, and see others come to know Christ, and grow in faith. I firmly believe this is a part of God's purpose in my life.

In addition, both my educational training, and my Meyers-Briggs personality type, are not suited to the academic field in which I have been working for the last four years. (My lackluster accomplishments probably had something to do with this.)

Besides, when I think back to what led me to come to Asia in the first place, I know it wasn't to be a professor. Becoming a professor is an honorary experience that I've gained only by the grace of God. I came to Asia looking for deep, inner peace and joy, and I've found that (a horrific first marriage notwithstanding).

Conclusions

My plan now is to go back to the career model I had between 2012 and 2014, except that I will make a formal business out of it. I have already attracted a few partners, and an investor. I've found a store-front office space in a prime location, with living quarters upstairs. I will still be a professor, but not full-time. I've lined up two part-time teaching positions at local Universities.

My (new) wife had hoped that I would continue on as a full-time professor, mainly because of the benefits of having a well-established employer, and the social prestige of the position. But just this week, after several discussions with my partners, she has jumped on board, and is now willing to support my small business enterprise, even though she knows it will require a lot of work, not just for me, but for her too. My partner pointed out that she only changed her mind because she really loves me and wants to support me. So I am finding that I am prodigiously blessed by God.

This coming summer, I will need to focus more of my attention on building my business, and some activities related to this. So I will be checking into this blog sporadically for the next few weeks, or maybe months. I will still try to churn out at least one post every week. It shouldn't be too hard for me to do, because as of today, I have 174 pending posts in various stages of completion, and 314 posts left over from my old Blogspot site that I want to rework before reposting them on WordPress.

Comments will remain open, and any submitted guest articles will continue to be published. Any further questions or requests for post topics, please feel free to contact me at your leisure.

Buckle Down for the Ride of the Centuries

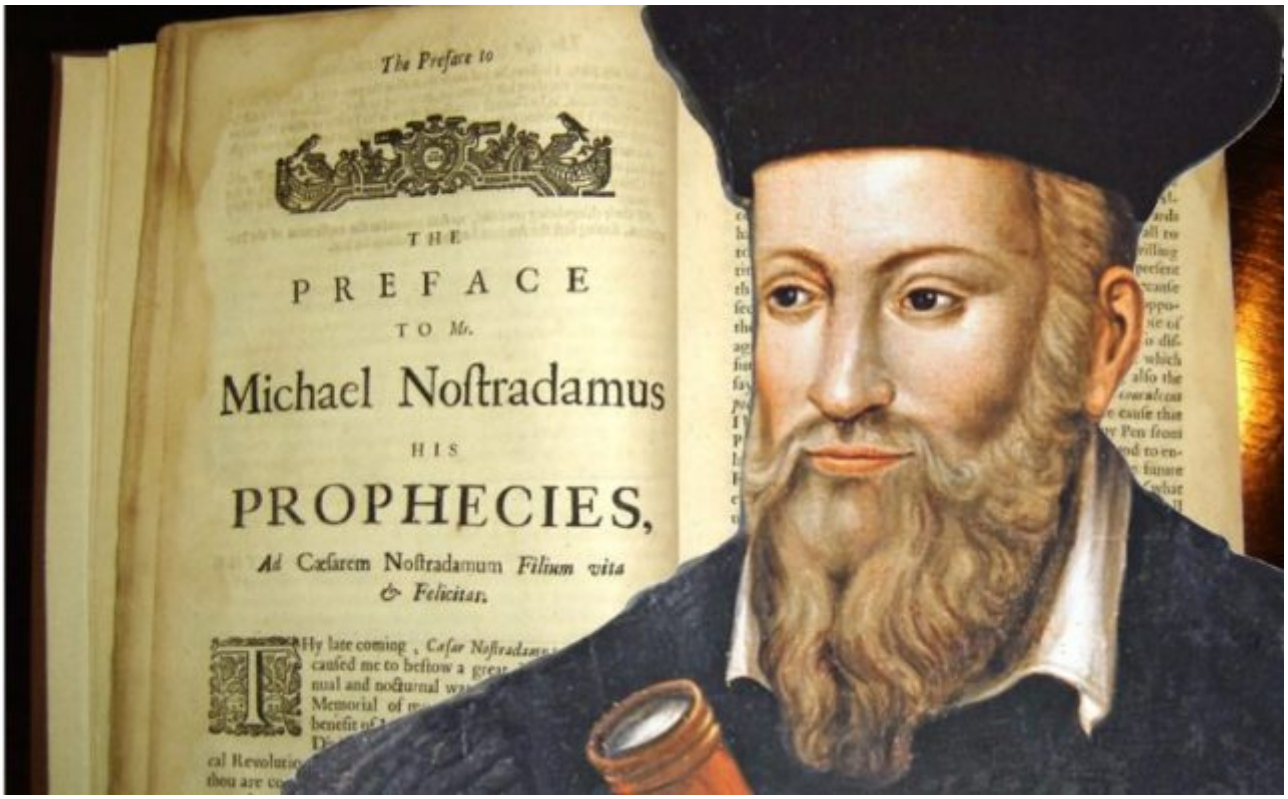
Jack · 9 August 2018 · Archived copy · Original

This post examines a few signs of a coming economic recession and the Biblical End Times.

Readership: All

> [3] Now as He sat on the Mount of Olives, the disciples came to Him privately, saying, "Tell us, when will these things be? And what will be the sign of Your coming, and of the end of the age?"
> [4] And Jesus answered and said to them: "Take heed that no one deceives you. [5] For many will come in My name, saying, 'I am the Christ,' and will deceive many. [6] And you will hear of wars and rumors of wars. See that you are not troubled; for all these things must come to pass, but the end is not yet. [7] For nation will rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom. And there will be famines, pestilences, and earthquakes in various places. [8] All these are the beginning of sorrows.
> [9] "Then they will deliver you up to tribulation and kill you, and you will be hated by all nations for My name's sake. [10] And then many will be offended, will betray one another, and will hate one another. [11] Then many false prophets will rise up and deceive many. [12] And because lawlessness will abound, the love of many will grow cold. [13] But he who endures to the end shall be saved. [14] And this gospel of the kingdom will be preached in all the world as a witness to all the nations, and then the end will come. ~ Matthew 24 (NKJV)

My father was always intensely interested in prophecies, especially Biblically based prophecies, but also any other sort of prophecy which appeared to have reasonable validity or a strong record of being true. Based on his studies of many old writings, he was able to come up with a lot of prognostications. Some of them have actually come true within our lifetimes. So I've always been amazed at his insight.



For example, in 1987, my Dad studied one of Nostradamus' writings, called "Centuries" (pdf). He interpreted one of the quatrains to mean that there would be a very large explosion in the sky, in a major city along the 40th parallel. Dad concluded that it must be New York City, because it's the only major city on the 40th parallel. Nostradamus wrote Centuries around 1555, when New York was barely a trading post for native Americans, and not considered a major city. So Dad concluded that this is the reason why Nostradamus identified the city by its geographic location. He guesstimated that this incident would happen in 1999.

As we know from history, the 9-11 incident at the World Trade Center fit this description to a T. Considering that Nostradamus (and Dad) were only off the mark by two years (out of a difference of 444 years since Nostradamus' writings), that is an error of 0.450%. The numerology of it all, is also astounding.

My Dad ascertained another prediction from reading a lot of Jewish eschatology (rabbinical studies concerning "the End times"). The scholars (according to Dad's account) guesstimated that "something big" would happen within a generation after the Jews "regained their homeland", Israel. (This event happened in 1948.) It's hard to identify what that event could be. It could be Armageddon, the Tribulation, the second coming of Christ (or the first, according to the Jews), the end of the world by fire, or something on that scale. Maybe all of these!

The generation that was being born in 1948 were the Baby Boomers (1942-1960).

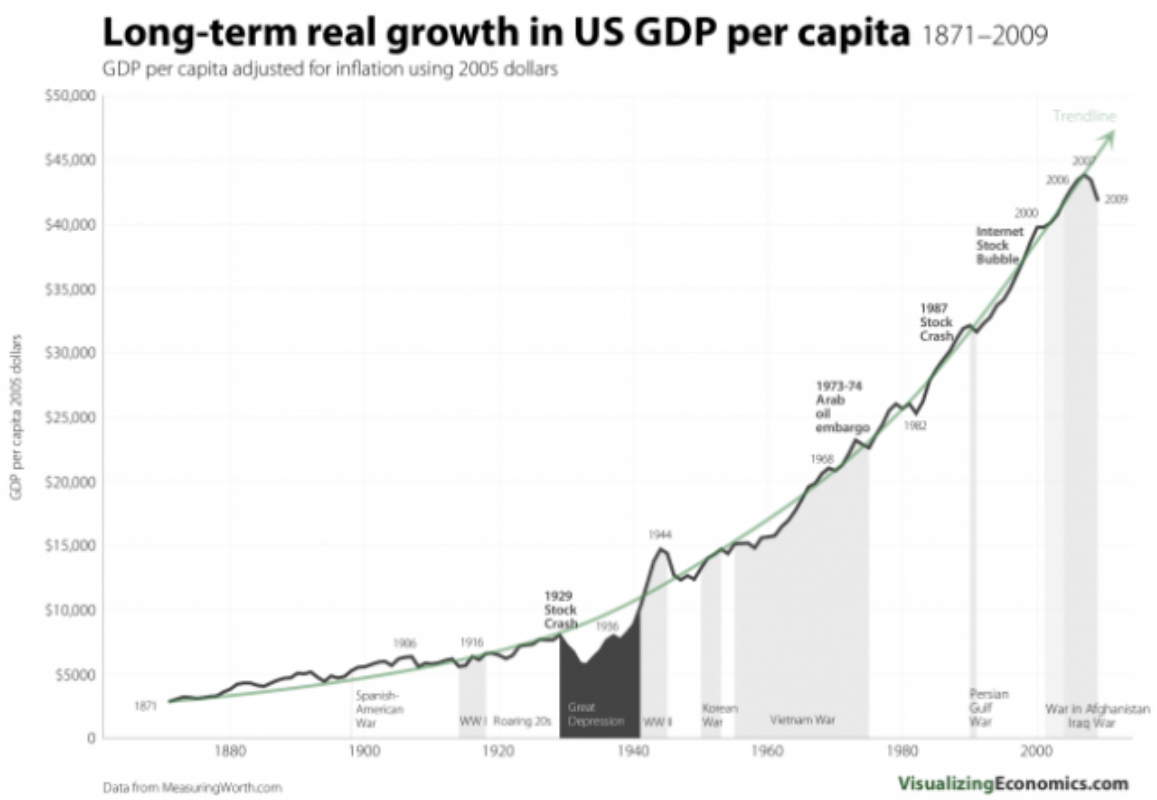
Right now, members of the Silent generation (born between 1925 and 1942) are dropping like flies. My uncle died just a couple months ago, and he was (and is) Silent. (The Silent generation, AKA the Beatniks, gave the world Bebop and Rock-and-Roll.) So we are looking forward to the Boomer generation passing on within the next 20 years or so. (Sorry, that sounds bad.)

Being inspired by Dad's comments, I studied this a bit myself, and found that, not only are there are 1948 years between the birth of Jesus Christ and the rebirth of the Jewish nation, but there are also 1948 years between the birth of the patriarch Abraham, and the birth of Jesus Christ. Again, the numerology of it all is astounding.

So will the X'ers, Millenials and Zyklon's see "the End"?

Another clue from my Dad was based on the life-cycle of the 17-year periodical cicada, which is an insect that burrows into the ground in its larval stage, and then after 17 years, it matures, and emerges from the ground in large swarms. Dad surmised that the plague of cicadas during the years of emergence affect agricultural yields, which indirectly affect the economy of the U.S. In turn, the U.S. national economy bears down on international trade, as it is the largest influence on the world economy.

In sum, this means that some degree of economic downturn will happen every 17 years. The years corresponding to the life-cycle of the cicadas are 1885, 1902, 1919, 1936, 1953, 1970, 1987, 2001, and 2018. It seems like a long-shot, slippery slope argument, but if you examine the graph below, there was a slight dip or plateau in the U.S. GDP during every single one of these years. Most notably, there was definitely an economic crisis in Europe in 1919 after WW1, 1936 after The New Deal was implemented, the conclusion of the Korean war in 1953, 1987, when Greenspan was in charge, and a plateau in 2001 after the 9-11 catastrophe.



A lady at my church has a gift of prophetic dreams. In 2007, she had a dream that there would be an economic recession. Within a couple months after that, the sub-prime mortgage crisis hit the United States, which then rippled around the world. Recently, she had the same dream again. So if you can believe that people have prophetic dreams, then here's your wake-up call.

So based on my Dad's calculations, and the prophetic dreams of the church lady, we should expect an economic calamity later this year. So watch the news. Later this year, there will be a recession. I am guessing it will have something to do with the trade war that just started.

This article from Forbes wants to condemn Trump's policies for the downfall of the U.S. economy resulting from a trade war, while painting a very optimistic outlook on the situation for Europe and Asia. But I have to pose the question: Could this kind of news article be a propagandized red herring that the Banker-Media-Industry Establishment is trying to float as truth? Would Trump's foreign policies be totally to blame for any recession, or would they just be an incentive for the Powers-that-be to engineer a recession?

I recently wrote a post about Shifting Gears in a Career, but if you're thinking about doing this right now, or about making a big investment, buying a house, etc., you may want to reassess your decision in light of the possibility of an upcoming recession, and do some grand mal praying about it.

On a positive note, this rollicking bull market might be a good time to sell off some stocks. On a darker note, could this coming downturn be a foreshadowing of, or possibly the beginning of the End?

The Distinction between Feminine Soft Power and Masculine Hard Power

Jack · 31 August 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Readership: All

Deti rightly presumes that men are well skilled in using Hard Power*, and women are naturals at Soft* Power*. It is argued that everyone's best interests would be better served if men and women stuck to their areas of expertise.*

Hommunism posted a Cultural Collapse Theory that seems to come straight out of the Illuminazi playbook. Hommunism lists the following seven steps of cultural revolution.

The Cultural Collapse Progression

1. Removal of religious narrative from people's lives, replaced by a treadmill of scientific and technological "progress."
2. Elimination of traditional sex roles through feminism, gender equality, political correctness, cultural Marxism, and socialism.
3. Delay or abstainment of family formation by women to pursue careerist lifestyles while men wait in confused limbo.
4. Decreasing birth rate among native population.
5. Government enactment of open immigration policies to prevent economic collapse.
6. Immigrant refusal to fully acclimate, forcing host culture to adopt external rituals and beliefs while being out-reproduced.
7. Natives becoming marginalized in their own country.

Concerning the second phase of collapse, Elimination of Traditional Sex Roles, the natural masculine and feminine expressions of power are fundamental concepts that are slowly eroding, and therefore need more emphasis.

Long time Manospherian Deti left the following gem at Spawny's Space. Deti rightly presumes that men are well skilled in using Hard Power, and women are naturals at Soft Power. It is argued that everyone's best interests would be better served if men and women stuck to their areas of expertise. However, Deti doesn't cover the more positive, uplifting expressions of feminine Soft Power, which is desperately needed, as this is a lost art among 21st century women.

Descriptions of Hard and Soft Power

Soft Power: Gossip. manipulation, deceit, fraud, subterfuge. Lying. Telling half truths. Backchannel communications. Use of status within the Feminine Social Matrix. Threatening, cajoling, persuading, begging, crying, wailing.

Manipulating your man, whether he be your husband, father, brother, whatever. Hiding behind your man and shrieking "let's you and him fight!" Getting your men to do your dirty work. Special manipulation of boys in general, or boyfriends and husbands: Getting your men to do your bidding by offering sex or threatening to withhold sex. Getting men to do, well, pretty much anything you want by offering sex or threatening to withhold sex.

Women are exceedingly adept at lying, deceit, manipulation and subterfuge. Really, REALLY good at it. The main reason, I think, was so they could get men to protect them and love them, and then not kill them when they fucked up.

Hard Power: Brute strength. Use of physical force, or the threat of same, to achieve objectives. Codes of honor based on performance, courage, virtue and honesty. Positioning men into hierarchies based on merit and ability, and the ability of those at the top to move men up or down in the hierarchy based on merit, ability, and any other necessary factors. Men controlling money and property, and deciding how available resources will be allocated. Men put in charge of their businesses, land, wives and children. Men held responsible and accountable to other men for their public dealings and conduct of those people in their charge, and subject to economic, social, and possibly physical approbation for dishonesty or poor results.

Men are exceedingly good at work, getting shit done, and accumulating and channeling resources into goods and services that benefit the most people. Really, REALLY good at it. The main reason, I think, was so they could keep others from taking their stuff, land, money, and women; and to get more stuff, land, money and women.

Problems Resulting from the Homogenization of Sex Specific Expressions of Power

So what's happened over the last 100 or so years is women saying their Soft Power isn't enough, and demanding access to more and more Hard Power. But it doesn't work very well, because women don't like the harsh results that happen when Hard Power is wielded. Hard Power cares nothing for feelings, fairness or kindness. Hard Power is concerned only with results, responsibility, responsiveness, and "getting it done".

But women say that's not fair, and so demand that Hard Power be tempered with Soft Power. We're told we must reach consensus. We must include everyone. We must do it in a way that makes everyone feel good. And [women give men the ultimatum] "you have to do this for us, or NO SEX FOR YOU!!!"

And so, men, with Hard Power, allow it to be softened.

And, women using Hard Power get hardened. They get masculinized. They lose that which makes them attractive to men: Their femininity. Their charm. Their soft inviting bodies at the end of a hard day. Their kindness and cheerfulness. Women really aren't very good at using Hard Power, because they insist that it be changed into something it isn't, and it changes them.

But, women insist that not only should they get and wield more Hard Power; they also insist that Soft Power be the sole province of women and feminized men. Also, that Soft Power cannot and MUST not be changed in any way.

And then, men are told they should use Soft Power. They should also manipulate, lie, deceive, and use backchannel communications. Men should also get others to do their dirty work, pass off the responsibility/blame for others, and use persuasion and negotiation rather than Hard Power to get things done.

But men aren't very good at using Soft Power. First, they're really not very good liars. They can do it, but they're not anywhere close to as adept at lying as women are.

Men aren't good liars because it contravenes their natural bent toward honesty, virtue, courage and performance. Men have that bent because their relationships are based not on love or affinity, but on respect and position.

Men don't respect men who lie. Men don't respect dishonest men. Men don't respect men who lack the courage to say what needs to be said and do what needs done. Men don't respect men who can't or won't pull their weight. Men don't respect spendthrifts, layabouts, poormouths, or fools who squander and waste their resources. Men don't respect manipulators, liars, deceivers, frauds, and saboteurs. Men send liars, cowards, lazy asses, and fools to the bottom of the hierarchy, or kick them out altogether.

Second, men are not good at using words, wiles, and backchannel communications to manipulate people into getting them to do what they want/need. All this requires indirect communication, and men aren't very good at indirect communication. They're not good at innuendo, double entendre, hinting, and body language. They're much better at direct communication.

There's shit to do, you see, and it needs to get done, and men consider that it's better and easier to send orders up and down a chain of command than it is to lie and manipulate and persuade Charlie down there into getting it done. It's better to just tell Charlie what needs done and order him to do it, or lose his job or be replaced. That's clear. That's direct. That plainly communicates what needs done and who is to do it.

Third, men often transplant their natural affinity for Hard Power into their attempts at Soft Power. So the cajole with the underling female employee becomes borderline assault or "sexual harassment". Their attempts at "courtship" with rules and regulations and no pattyfingers become hamhanded sexual misadventures. Their attempts at manipulation at work or church become exasperated statements of "fuck it, I'll do it myself", or "fuck it, I won't do it", or "can't we please just set up some rules for how this is to get done instead of attending time-wasting meetings where we talk and talk and TALK??!!"

Soft Power is much less concerned with results and responsiveness, as it is with how everyone feels. "Is this fair? Is everyone included? Does everyone feel good about this?" Men just can't ratchet up their feels enough to care about these things. What we men care about is getting shit done, because shit needs to get done. We care about:

- Does it work? Is it effective?
- Is it efficient? do we have the resources to do it? Is this a good use of resources?
- How, mechanically, will it get done?
- Who is going to do it?
- Who is responsible for it if it doesn't work?

And so what happens is that men who have to use Soft Power become feminized. They lose that which makes them attractive and appealing to women: Their status among other men. Their low tolerance for BS. Their ability to organize and get things done. Their ability to amass, wield, harness, direct and channel resources effectively and efficiently.

Most importantly, their ability and willingness to do violence and mayhem on behalf of those in their charge, to defend their lives, land and treasure against anyone or anything that would threaten them.

So this has gone on since time immemorial. Where it's going wrong is women's insistence that they get to wield Hard Power; and demanding that men stay away from "Soft Power".

Conclusions

When men exercise Hard Power within their individual dominions, and women stick to Soft Power, and concentrate on transforming it into a positive, inspiring brand of power, then it leads to the following benefits.

- Masculine men and feminine women have a naturally higher SMV/MMV, and are more desirable to the opposite sex.
- Masculine men and feminine women are kicking back against the erosion of our culture and heritage, and thereby preserving our cultural inheritance.

Do your part to develop your SMP presentation, and undermine the progression of global communism, by exercising your hard masculine (or soft feminine) power today!

Eve Ill Idolaters

Jack · 8 September 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Locking down the wild hamster is tricky business.

Readership: Men

Dalrock issued a Thought Experiment in a recent rant about Gregoire. This challenge intrigued me because it seems to be a necessary point, and I thought I could offer some perspectives on this.

Dalrock quotes Gregoire as stating that women should submit to God and not to man, including their husbands. Dalrock's challenge was this.

> "Assume you had to either defend or debunk Sheila's argument using only previously published quotes from Pastor Doug Wilson to found your arguments."

Of course, I would be more interested in debunking her argument. So in this post, I'll debunk the argument using Christian RP tenets. In the future, I may follow up with another attempt using Wilsons drivel, as Dalrock specified.

First of all, why is there even an argument that women should NOT submit to their husbands, when many passages in scripture clearly say they should?

Why do women think it is impossible to submit to both God and their husbands at once?

Do they truly believe their husbands are Eve-ill beings, enemies of God who are bent over leading them to hell? In such a case, it would be impossible.

Oh, no… that was Eve, I mean, Adam. It was the man! Yeah, heh heh…

But if so, then why did they want to marry, and thereby become accomplice to all of mans' (presumed) sin? Is it because he is supposed to supply everything good, and 'fix' everything bad?

Do they think they can reform him, or do they only reserve their savior complex for domesticating Alphas? Isn't this just more solipsistic hamster hoop jumping?

Honestly, isn't all of this just a Churchian, Drive-Through scripture? A talking point to white-wash their motives, signal virtue, and justify their rebellion?

The real issues at stake here are faithfulness, loyalty, and trust. Gregoire blasts all three.

Abraham's wife, Sarah, is cited as an example of faith. Gregoire rolls the hamster wheel through four examples in scripture, and concludes that,

> "Sarah's life was hardly the picture of a wife obeying her husband in everything!"

She misses the point. Sarah was considered faithful (and righteous) because she did not think of herself first. She cooperated with Abraham's plans no matter how crazy they sounded. (…and they were pretty crazy!) Sarah showed her faith in God by trusting Abraham's leadership, and also by trusting God to lead Abraham in the right way, or else to correct Abraham when he was wrong. In the cases where Abraham was wrong, God stepped in to make things right. Sarah did not take it upon herself to be Abraham's judge, and decide for herself whether he was right or wrong. But somehow, christianeasy wimminz have totally missed this point.

Gregoire cites the story of Ananias and Sapphira in Acts 5:1-11 as a cherry picked example of how it is a d@mnable folly for a wife to remain loyal to her husband. Never mind the fact they colluded to cheat the church. Chances are, it was her idea!

Gregoire argues that women should not just follow men and do whatever their husbands wanted, because that's putting the husband in the place of Jesus, and that's idolatry!

However, we know that women will eagerly do all kinds of crazy things, including blatant, immoral sins, in order to cooperate with a top Alpha, tingle-inducing male. Women don't sit around cooking up Bible verses to justify riding the carousel at the moment they jump into bed with Harley McBadboy. They do, however, hamsterize excuses to justify their decision to do so, after Harley skips town.

Sin is characterized by a warped, self-interested mind. But guilt, shame, and heartbrokenness are always reliable vectors that bring people to contemplate on God and holiness in the abstract. Also, when women trust their desire for a bad boy, they inevitably become the victims of transgression, which plants the bitter roots of fear and suspicion.

Much later on, after sticking the necessary landing by settling hard, the subsequent lack of Tingles, combined with the aforementioned fear and suspicion, always translates into a sore lack of faith, loyalty, and trust. It is at this time, women must defend their unwillingness to cooperate with the man they now call their husband.

Rest assured, if Harley ever came back to town with a condom in one hand and a bank roll in the other, all these biblical arguments and virtue signals would be quickly forgotten, because their true God has appeared into their lives once again. These women's hope in their romantic dreams will once again be resurrected, because that's putting the Tingle in the place of Jesus, and that's idolatry!

But they are, of course, deceived. The fact that a woman will willingly submit her body and soul to a liar, but resist submitting to the man she promised to love in the presence of God and all those attending her wedding ceremony, shows the true loyalties of her heart, and it's not to God, much less her husband.

I wonder, how does God view this tangled mess? If Harley was her true spiritual husband (by virtue of a sexual covenant and the related soul ties), then she committed adultery by marrying Mr. Betaboy. If Mr. Betaboy is her true husband (by virtue of her marital vows), then she dishonors both him and God by calling him out as being unworthy of her trust and loyalty. Either way, there's definitely some kind of sexual sin going on here. But instead of waking up and confessing this mess as iniquity, the hamster chugs through a frivorce in order to preserve the holy lip stick ego.

And… Gregoire often writes posts on how women should handle a husband's sin that is endangering the family. Mite and Beam… (or Speck and Log, depending on your translation).

The real question is, who is the woman's true god? Is it the hamster reinforced Feelz and Tingles, or is it the God ordained authority of Jesus and her husband?

She who permits her hamster to chase after the Feelz will lose the Tingle in the end, but she who forsakes her hamster for her husband's sake, will find them.

A Historical Contrast: Western and Asian Women

Jack · 15 September 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Could the attitude of women towards Patriarchy affect the longevity of a culture?

Readership: Men and Pink-Pilled Women

Even a cursory reading of Christianity and Masculinity, Dalrock, or Rollo will reveal that having a marriage and family is a high risk gamble for a man, largely because of the volatile unpredictability of the female nature. This is not a new "de-evolution" of human nature caused by Feminism, but is a byproduct of human nature that has been newly revisited in modern times.

Western civilization has often toyed with the concepts of chivalry, various social movements, philosophy and reason, as can be seen in Greek and Roman antiquity, the Crusades, the Renaissance, and more recently, Women's Liberation. All these cultural fads have come and gone in their time and season, often taking polite society out with them.

Civilizations that thrive must have a firm Patriarchal structure to guard against the wanton wiles of women. But when the Patriarchy dies from being displaced by Fem-centrism, the structure of society slowly unravels.

Think about it…

- Western men play around with social fads and posture posing in their efforts to "accommodate" and "appease" their women. But in the east, there has always remained the strong (but ever loving) pimp hand of the ginsu wielding, kung fu Patriarchy!
- China and other Asian nations can maintain their cultures and civilizations for three to five thousand years, while western nations rise and fall every three to five hundred years.
- Asian women are considered to be the most feminine and desirable women on the planet, while western women are stereotypically described as contentious, obese, slutty, harridans.

Don'tcha think there might be a correlation there?

In the west, relationships began with flowers, serenades, and formal courting. In the east, either their parents hooked them up with someone before the age of 12, or else relationships began when a woman brushed her bare foot against a man's calf.

Western men have developed science, explored frontiers, and conquered the world. This is often credited to genetics. But I've often suspected that the real reason could be more insidious – they were simply desperate to get out of the house, far away from the contentious verbal assaults of their women. They sought to distract their minds with various other, more exciting endeavors, and maybe even find some soft, submissive colonial poontang in another part of the world, where the women don't suffrage from a religiously fortified Madonna-hoe bipolar disorder.

By contrast, eastern men have not made as much worldly progress. Maybe that's because their women created a comfortable environment at home, and kept them busy with nubile sexercise activities, which motivated them to work hard and earn money. They now boast the largest populations in the world.

Meanwhile, modern western women have been aborting and miscegenating their race out of existence, and all the while blaming it on "the Patriarchy".

Heh… Give me a break!

Anyone seriously want to get married these days? Take your pick, fellas.

The typical western woman interested in marriage: strong, independent, middle-aged, career-minded, plus-sized, post wall, ex-CC-rider, with a Tumblr account. She has a mouth that is hawkishly garrulous one minute, and the next, derisively demanding you to “man-up”! If you’re lucky, your uncle will loan you his copy of Roosh’s book of Game so that you might hedge against the odds of frivorce court.

The typical eastern woman interested in marriage: young, slender, vulnerable, humble, submissive, respectful, family-minded, near-virginal, seeking meaning and value in life, and has a sense of duty to her husband? She keeps her mouth shut, unless it’s to inspire with sweet words and interesting stories, or to ask whether you prefer rice or noodle. (Tip: You should always answer, “shrimp fried rice”.)

You'll need a job and a thick wallet for both women, but you'll be more likely to keep them (and the children) with the second option.

Made your choice? Worried about the logistics? Don't worry white man! Many Asian girls are ecstatic to receive you into her folds and grasp you (and your billfold) tightly! They are calling out,

> "Come! Come return to the Patriarchy!"

Get It Right Next Time

An introspective monologue on the challenge of absorbing truth and achieving RP excellence.

Readership: Red Pilled Men

> "And do not be conformed to this world, but be transformed by the renewing of your mind, that you may prove what is that good and acceptable and perfect will of God." ~ Romans 12:2 (NKJV)

Renewing the mind requires a bit of time, study, practice, and experience. Very seldom can a man pick up and grasp a totally foreign concept and master it within a short period of time. The learning curve can be improved exponentially by studying in a group, or from a master.

A large consumption of time and effort is required because the concepts that need to be explored while renewing the mind are profound, greatly nuanced, and subject to context. It also requires a good bit of introspection, and checking one's self along the truth, which remains as the most difficult challenge for most.

In learning, some people require that the concepts be accompanied by a connection to something already known. For others (including myself), they need the lesson to contain an experience of joy hope, love, or poignant memories.

To this end, many bloggers, such as Dalrock, often embellish their story telling with presumed details that are realistically probable. I believe he does so to drive his point home with dramatic flair (which is delightful to read). But judging by comments on other blogs, I've seen that this arouses doubts and suspicion in readers who are untrained in TRP. Others tend to read too much into that and connect dots of logic that should not be connected.

Several impressive examples of said misinterpretation was recently showcased on a certain female hosted blog. I remember this blog had a theme of, "Two in the hand is worth one in the bush", or something similar. Maybe my readers will know which one it is. Their recent post was a discussion of Dalrock's post, Feminine Wiles (September 13, 2018). I was amazed at how well they jack-hammer-stered the concepts into an unrecognizable (and meaningless) form.

One commenter (who must have a particularly low libido) described women's instinctive hypergamous nature towards the top 20% of males, and then labeled it as…

> "a fantasy springing from a perverse form of the Patriarchy that suggests all the women will be competing and fighting over them."

The denial is strong in this one. Another one commented,

> "It's pretty amazing how Dalrock et al. have been reframing being an assertive go-getter woman as the Red Pill dream girl. I hope the guys realize that that's correlated with a whole bunch of "feminist" qualities…"

Right… LMAO! …and Sasquatch plays "Coming round the mountain" on a left-handed banjo!

Not surprisingly, the idea of expensive gifts received a lot of virtual ink. Most of the commenters claimed that gifts were not important to them, but they agreed that gift giving was a convenient way to "separate the wheat from the chaff". Furthermore, they couldn't understand why men are scared off by any exchange of gifts. I don't know, maybe it's because men have to cover the costs of such gifts, and the amount of gratitude received from this investment is always questionable.

Another woman believed that the Courtly Love model includes the reversal of sex roles in Tuchman's description.

But Dalrock never said this, and it's a far flung idea. Then came the goose and gander incantation.

One of their big gripes was that men are too lazy, and that they want women to do all the work. Well, it's human nature to desire a life of pleasure and ease. But if a person cannot recognize this and take responsibility for it, then it's Projection.

Then came the master and slave trope, which revealed that many women are hung up on the idea that one person has all their needs and desires met, and the other person is doing all the work. In a well-functioning relationship, the experience will feel this way to both partners, but those who are immature will mistake this impression for an "inequality", and seek to eliminate it by complaining that the other person should "do more" in order for this uncomfortable sense of personal contribution to be mitigated. They rightfully label the expectation of this arrangement as narcissism, but it's not what Dalrock is getting at. Another instance of Projection.

And this one, following the last idea.

> "…if wives are constantly enabling their husbands to act in a childish, immature way [by doing all the work], we are denying them opportunities to grow in virtue, and thereby get to heaven."

We are approaching the slippery slope here. They obviously haven't learned how to Respect the man and Love the boy.

Women might be surprised to know how efficiently a controlling wife's micromanager-savior complex will send her harried husband to Hell in a heartbeat. But instead, women vainly believe they are domesticating him and saving his soul. (SMH)

Of course, a description of dating and marriage would not be complete without being Followed by the "live happily ever after" line. Childish fantasies (unless he's MGTOW).

While reading through that thread, I felt the commenters all shared a general assumption that women are only motivated to either lead or submit out of their personal aspirations for attention or control, and not as an effort to inspire others with a larger vision (in the case of leading) or to be a loyal, faithful helper (in the case of following).

I regularly tell my readers not to admit women's arguments. The above statements should explain why. They butcher the logic so horribly, and they don't have the willingness to open their minds and study a matter diligently until they get it right. (In fact, they often want men, as well as female opponents, to get it wrong, just so they can consolidate their social power.) So I won't exert any further extravagant efforts to set them straight here.

I feel sad to see that there are so many people who are presumably seeking to comprehend the truth, but they can't grasp the point. (I'm being overly generous in my estimation of their motivations, and being somewhat facetious about it too.) My point in citing these comments is just to express how there is a big black hole in female education. But I'm sure this is not surprising to my readers.

This is why blogging is so important. It's an ongoing disentanglement of the false notions that we have been lulled into believing.

And there are so many.

On a positive note, I learned that women will readily and vehemently disagree about Dalrock's comparison of the Courtly Love model to modern Christian dating. This is because women are acutely aware that the current dating scene does not conform to the Courtly Love model at all, especially not within their myopic perspective. No, it is the men who have the idea of Courtly Love in their heads, and Dalrock does men a favor by pointing this out. Men subscribe to this model because this is the model that is so overtly presented as the model that women want, especially those "good Christian gals" they (((might))) want to snag for marriage. They have the notion that they can wind up in a "good relationship" if they would only follow the model that is presented to them in modern folklore.

It's true that women do want the Courtly Love model, but women are a little more aware in this aspect, because they also know that it doesn't work in today's dating market, and that it's not reality. They already know that any man who might give them flowers on the first date will be immediately dismissed to the Beta class, or else, sent to detention. But Blue Pilled White Knights cannot make this distinction. They are too focused on trying to please the women by following an outdated model that is no longer effectively utilized, and they never realize that the man is the prize. This problem continues because noteworthy authors, pastors, and teachers continue to press forward with the same Churched-up variation of the Courtly Love model that they enjoyed as debaucherous teenagers, and they do not care to admit that this is not a God honoring model.

And denial is rife.

Manospherians like Dalrock and Rollo have an impact largely because they keep reiterating the same ideas over and again, from a multitude of perspectives and applications, until readers can finally pick up the underlying concept. This is a habit I need to exercise more frequently as a blogger. I also need to refine my attempts at sophisticated humor and literary devices, because many readers have failed to recognize these as such.

Maybe it would be wiser for me to accept the fact that an artful usage of the English language died more than a century ago – another failure in public education, as the classics have long been replaced by a torrent of fem-globo propaganda.

No, I must press on towards excellence using hyperbatons. Understand my burden, Yoda shall. To do otherwise would admit defeat, it would.

Can You Trust A Dancing Skeleton?

Jack · 21 September 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Sexual promiscuity now has a 10 year window with long term consequences – offering a d@mning dilemma to men.

Readership: Men who have girlfriends/wives with skeletons in the closet.

Some reports claim that the average male has sex for the first time at age 16.9, and females lose their virginity slightly older, at 17.4 on the average. Since these are self-reported statistics, I suspect that these numbers are probably a lot older for males, and younger for females. I would guess the real numbers are about 15-16 for girls, and 18-19 for guys, and of course, race, region, genetics, home environment, and socioeconomic background play into that. But for now, let's use that original statistic for the sake of discussion.

According to the estimates from the 2017 U.S. Census Bureau, the average age of first marriage for women was 27.4 years. For men, it's slightly older at 29.5 years. That's the longest Americans have ever waited to get married.

Now think about that…

27.4 – 17.4 = 10

Exactly 10 years between women's first sexual experience, and getting married – and that's on the average!

Do you know how much shex can be had in 10 years???

And those are the best, PRIME SMV years!

Of course, any documented evidence of the hundreds, or perhaps thousands of carnal acts a girl might do in her sordid history can be swept under the rug all too easily. But they can't hide the state of their hearts. Their soul's can't lie…

The spiritual condition of a bride after riding the carousel for 10 years – no homemaking skills, no inner joy, no sexual desire, no passion for life, no respect for husband… All the virtuous characteristics that would draw forth a husbands love have been sucked out and destroyed, like a fetus at a Planned Parenthood clinic.

In other words, unless a man grabs a girl who's fresh out of high school, he's getting one that has already been eaten up and sh!t out by some/many other men.

I know your imagination is running down a dream the drain at this moment. Or you might be asking, how bad could it be?

In Boxer's post, The Good Woman (June 28, 2018), he says,

> "By the age of 25, about half of all wimminz have admitted being passed around at least once, in a group-sex orgy."

Assuming this is true, then it is reasonable to assume that by the age of 27, at the end of their 10 year slide when most wimminz wind down their sprees and walk the aisle, there is little left to be imagined in a typical woman's sex life. Or even if that figure is only 10%, this is enough to strike flaccidity in the cavernosas of most marriage-minded men.

With a 10 year guarantee, it's near impossible to find a peach before the expiration date. So a lot of hungry men are being forced to choose between eating either the forbidden fruit, or the rotten.

The forbidden fruit is the subject of PUA forums, and Christian men are warned not to partake.

The rotten fruit is the subject of Christian RP forums, and PUA's are forbidden to partake.

The common advice on the 'sphere is, don't ever marry such a woman.

But what is a man to do, if he finds himself already married to a dancing skeleton, having no better alternative? He may fairly presume that the 10 year party is the reason why he is never greeted with a juicy bantz whenever he drops his drawers. But he is told it's because of his low SMV status.

Marriage to an ex-rider is like sweetened lard icing on a cake of poop. It looks appetizing, until you cut into it and take a bite, suddenly realizing the main ingredients are not eggs and flower. The batter has been deflorested, and the eggs have developed chromosomal abnormalities.

And what if you "promised" to eat the whole thing… and it's the only cake you'll ever eat for the rest of your life? Worse, you find that after you swallow, you only get a haughty snicker, with not even a bit of remorse or gratitude?

This is what marital fraud feels like. This is why the RP advice says to avoid it.

Boxer argues that in a situation like this, it comes down to commitment. But the reality is more nuanced.

Some men can accept certain things about a woman's past, while other men just cannot. It is highly dependent on the individuals involved.

In the case where he can't accept her past, then they are both stuck in a bitter arrangement, with no happy solution – either stay together in a dead-bed bizness deal with broken trust, or else endure soul-wrenching divorce proceedings. Either option is a drop into the abyss.

Commitment is important during those times when emotional motivations are lagging, because commitment is a personal choice that one can continue to make each day. But when faced with "surprises" from a spouse's past, the main issue at stake is not one of commitment, as Boxer argues in his post, but one of trust. Trust is not entirely within one's control. Commitment can, and does often increase trust, but the kind of sincere, open-hearted trust that makes a marriage satisfying is also related to, and somewhat dependent on, a multitude of emotional nuances, especially things such as the reliability and faithfulness of the partner. If the quality of trust within the relationship is broken, then THAT is when the temptation to cheat or leave becomes significant, and therefore, a willful commitment THEN becomes a pivotal issue.

[Eds. note: Trust is from a male viewpoint. For a typical female, Tingles are the deciding factor.]

My point is this (and I think a lot of men can relate), if your partner keeps secrets from you, and doesn't tell you about her past until AFTER she's got you by the balls in a legal-contract "marriage", then where is the trust? If the man had any trust in her to begin with, then that gets broken when he realizes that she allowed him to remain ignorant of the truth of the matter, and thereby suckered him into marrying a carousel wearied hoe. In this case, it's obvious that she (at least somewhat) sees him as a disposable utility to be managed and controlled – not to be trusted (and BTW, what about the respect that men desperately need?) For the man, this raises questions like, "What else has she been hiding from me?" What else has she suckered me into (or will in the future) that I don't know about?" and finally the bottom line question, "What is her price for selling me out?" (e.g. cuckolding, frivorce court, etc.)

It's better for a woman to come clean before marriage, rather than be stuck in a tenuous marriage to a husband who can't accept her past, can't forgive her, or can't trust her. But this would spoil women's 10 year window of opportunities for debauchery and dissipation.

Or does it? If the woman just wants validation, control, and continued material security, then maybe HIS commitment is enough, and trust doesn't matter at all. Unfortunately, we all know of marriages like that.

Bottom line: Women play a dangerous game by mud running for 10 years, and then not being completely honest with their fiancees before marriage. If she is honest, then that can either raise or lower her MMV, depending on her past. In the case that it lowers it, then that would be the obvious reason why they lie, or conveniently fail to tell the truth (if you think there is any difference between the two). But if she chooses to lie in order to "sell herself" in marriage at a higher perceived MMV price, it is a form of fraud. After the hidden secrets come to light, there necessarily comes a reassessment of the deal, and how the newly surfaced facts affect the current status. Anything might happen from there.

Severe hunger can drive a man to dribble on monitor glass for a decade, just to eat the corn out of a well decorated cake of crap.

Women know this. They bank on it.

How a Woman Forms a Relationship with a Man

To form a strong bond between a man and a woman who are together in an intimate relationship, there need to be a number of 'strands' in the 'cord' that keeps them together. These things, roughly listed in order of their bonding power, include…

1. Blood Covenant (formed by a virginal sexual union) A blood covenant can only be dissolved through the death of one partner.
2. Sexual passion and desire (A cyclical, periodic, simple harmonic motion that is used as a sacrament or "maintenance" of the Blood Covenants and Soul Ties.)
3. Soul Ties (For more information, see What is a Soul Tie? and Introduction to Soul Ties.)
4. Spiritual maturity and obedience to God in one's dealings with the other.
5. A long history of interaction, which has built up good memories, and an appreciation for the other person, as well as trust and respect.
6. Social ties, traditions, and expectations (pressure from family, friends, societal order, laws…)
7. Emotional attachments (e.g. such as feelings of love, kindness, compassion, and natural affection.)
8. Shared values, interests, and goals in life. (Adds depth to the relationship, and takes the trajectory of the relationship into the future.)
9. Mind mates (having the same mind, and/or an intellectual connection.)
10. Mindful and Willful commitment to remain faithful.

After entering into matrimony, it is even more important to keep one's self on top of maintaining these bonds, than it is before marriage – that is, if you care about the marriage. Many people talk as though it's very difficult and challenging to develop and maintain these bonds. But the next section will explore how the opposite is closer to the truth.

Many women 'let themselves go' after tying the knot. 'Letting themselves go' is generally and easily interpreted as 'not caring about this marriage'. This is often accompanied by the rationalization that the regular humdrum of marriage life (a code word for 'dead bedroom') can be too enervating.

'Letting themselves go' usually means to become hideously obese. But if gaining weight is not an option because she wants to retain her SMV for ordering a side dish of cad, or if she is looking to attract the hawt rich man of her fantasies, then there are many other ways of viscerally informing her partner that she no longer values this relationship, and that she is passively-agressively working to bring about its' demise. Some of these other methods have an even greater effectiveness!

How a Woman Can Easily Get Rid of a Man

Just as a person might sever a rope by cutting each strand one by one, a person can cut off their relationship with a partner by destroying, corrupting, or sabotaging each type of bond listed above. Here are a few of the most common and easiest ways that this can be done, with respect to each type of bond.

1. Blood Covenant – The woman can sacrifice her virginity on a dildo, a ONS, or a cad whom she knows will never marry her. If the covenant has already been formed, then adultery will really throw a monkey wench across the branch. Fortunately, dildos die after a few uses.
2. Sexual Passion and Desire – The woman could spend a decade frittering away the most passionate and powerful MMV period of her life, such that no "stickiness" is left to maintain a marriage properly.
3. Soul Ties – The woman can engage in witchcraft and sexual promiscuity, so that the unhealthy soul ties formed from these activities would displace any healthy soul ties that she might form with God, or any man who might match her for a proper marriage. Also, it's ego stroking easy to make ungodly inner vows and resolutions, such as, "I don't need no man (or woman)", or "If it feels good, then just do it!" or "I'll never marry a man like so and so!"
4. Spiritual Maturity – The woman could totally neglect her spiritual vitality and growth, such that she would never develop any form of virtue or inner beauty that would inspire a man to love her in a LTR.
5. History – Burn all existing photographs of you two doing happy things together. Rip up those cards and mementos that were sent to you from years ago. Defecate on your marriage certificate. Be sure he sees you doing it, while calling him derogatory names laced with profanity. Replace them with photos of you and your boss (or secretary) at the company New Year's gala.

6. Social Ties can be bypassed by going off to college, making friends with the lefty INN-crowd who will support any lifestyle you choose, joining a sorority, and partying with hawt F-boys. Alternatively, you could get a job in a distant city where no one knows you, and you could work the local meat markets and social media to build a new lief, one centered around your own wants and needs. Expectations can be rescinded by firmly announcing that you never want to be married or have a family. This image can be reinforced by getting several large tattoos and a butch-dyke buzz cut. Start a new tradition by broadcasting your race to the bottom, trusting in the pseudo-virtue of being a strong, independent, helpless victim. The societal order and laws are on your side.
7. Emotional Attachments can be sabotaged by being bitter, unhappy, and contentious on a regular basis. Identify his love language, and turn it into his hate language. Call him a lazy loser, and talk disparagingly about his work. Identify all his weaknesses and demand that he change them according to your liking. Use sex as a weapon and make explicitly sure he knows that you're stooping whenever you bend over. Make every interaction with him a repertoire of shame, ridicule and embarrassment, so that he can develop a d@mning library of horrible memories, which will force him to withdraw his trust and respect, and curse your name. If these habits are continued in a regular, consistent manner, then it's only a matter of time until he will suddenly realize his efforts are futile, that he would be better off without you, and then permanently exile you from his heart and mind forever.
8. Shared Values are easy to overturn. Just change your value system by becoming an irrational Feminazi. If you have any shared interests, you'll have to abandon these for a while, and talk about them like they are stupid, immoral, or a waste of time. Cancel any previous goals that the two of you had, and make new goals with other men (or women) in your life.
9. Mind Mates – Stay current on Feminism's new philosophical developments. Vehemently disagree with anything he might say. Interrupt him by questioning his identity when he's talking passionately about something. Walk out of the room whenever he asks you for your thoughts. Put in extra effort to present yourself as an arrogant braggart.
10. His mindful and willful Commitment to remain faithful is difficult to control, but it can be eroded over time, especially when all other bonding mechanisms have failed.

In summary, if a woman wants to end the relationship with a man, the quickest and easiest way for her to do that, is to sleep with other men early and often, be a dead fish in bed, avoid sexual intimacy, condemn his sexual desire, and ridicule his sexual performance with a condescending attitude.

The only reason that a man would stay in a sexual relationship with such a woman, is if they were married, and he had a strong conviction to be faithful to his wedding vows.

Ideally, a wimminz should leave her partner with no other viable bond except 10, so that there is no motivation or reason for him to stay loyal to her, except through his own willing choice to remain committed to her out of sheer obedience to God. Worminz don't need to worry about whether his commitment might be too strong or not, because she can always jerk off the other 9 broken strands until he cuts the last strand himself. One bond is not strong enough to get him to withstand all her verbal, physical, and emotional abuse, cuckoldry, police reports, court cases, social condemnation, ostracization, and rejection.

However, if he happens to be younger and has a strong libido, has an SMV greater than about 5 or so, and he has too much dignity to be fapping everyday, then his willpower will be much easier to break. Provided that the various forms of bonding in the above list are in sufficiently decadent condition, sooner or later, another woman will steal his heart and his desire, and he will automatically nexit the cold varmint in his life.

It would be especially advantageous to the shrew if she can force him into having an affair, because then she can have hard evidence against him for breaking the marital agreement, as well as sufficient plausibility of her perceived innocence within her social group. No one will notice, or even care, that she broke the other 9 bonds herself.

Conclusions

Ladles, don't be so cruel as to allow your chivalrous, chauvinistic, toxic, male baggage to suffer the ignominy and pain of a poorly drawn out execution. Instead, gain the skill to inflict a lightning speed check-mate. He will thank you later.

Wimminz must not forget his greatest weakness – that cursed piece of meat dangling from his groin. He's got to wash it, feed it, and drain it every day. He's such a slave to it, that he'll never be able to endure all the temptation that he faces each day. There's no way he'll be able to keep that thing tucked and folded neatly in his pants until the day he kicks the bukket. He'll go off the deep end first. Wise witches will work this to their advantage.

The femme fatale should make sure she consistently conveys this same brand of contempt for his sexuality, as well as for her own. Even God Himself wouldn't hold him guilty if he could not remain faithful to a controlling, lying, cheating, frivorce thieving, branch swinging, hoez. No worries! He'll be out in no time.

If she's struggling with a guilty conscience, and worried about how this will make her feel, possibly wondering if she could have done better (with Chad), then she can always rev up the hamster cage by telling herself that the Churchian God of the Tingle Tantrum won't hold her guilty either, because, "everybody else is doing it", and "it feelz sooo good", so "just do it".

Moreover, she should never feel guilty about breaking these bonds and destroying his life, because she's a Strong Independent Woman™, and she has only but one peak fertility to exploit to the fullest!

Upon reflection, the reader may discover that most wimminz are already in the habit of abusing all of the above techniques to destroy their relationships and marriages – and they don't even know it, or else, they don't really care.

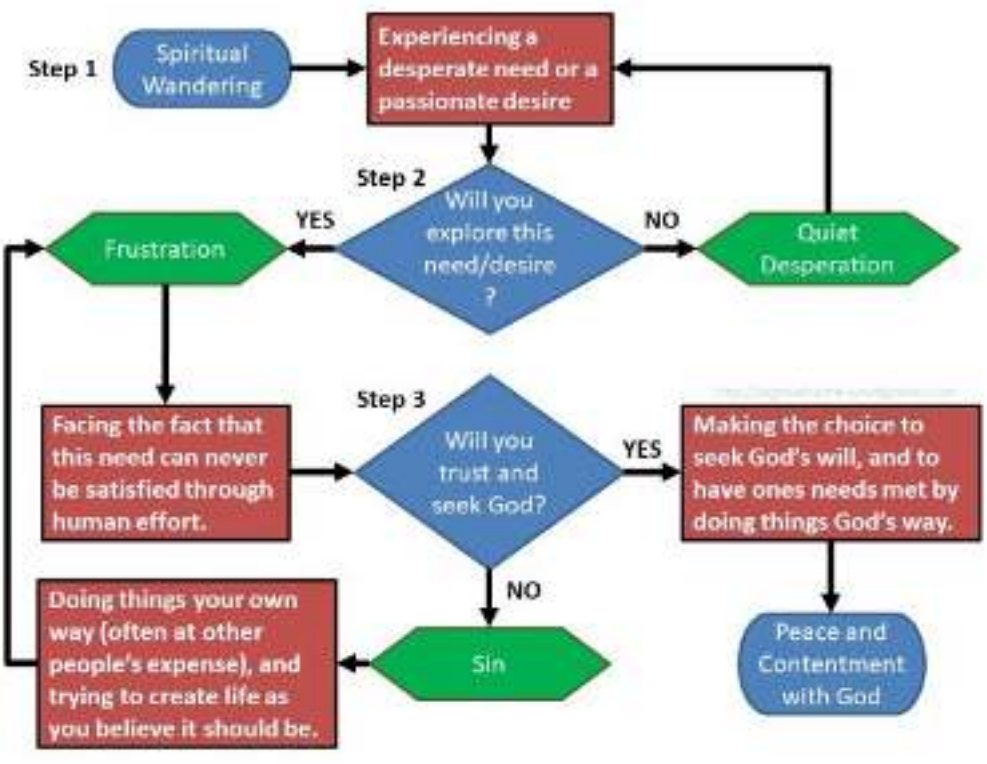
The Three Step Path to God

Jack · 27 September 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Feeling desperate, frustrated, lost, or confused? This flowchart might help you find your way through the mess.

Readership: All

I had an engaging talk with my Pastor on the morning of Monday, July 9, 2018. We put together the flowchart below, which illustrates three phases of growth concerning how people typically find their way to God.



The flowchart is described as follows.

Step 1: Experiencing a desperate need or a passionate desire

For the first step, there's something that you desperately need in your life. There's something driving you. There is a deep need that you're trying to get from others. For some people, this need takes the form of exasperation and desperation. For others, this need is manifested as a passionate desire for a particular thing or state of being. It might even be strong enough to be considered an obsession.

Part of Step 1 is sorting out your spiritual needs, meaning, to fully understand exactly what it is that you are seeking. For most people, this something needed is usually love and attention. People need love, and they try to get this love from other people. But it might also be other things, like a sense of belonging or acceptance, dignity, emotional thrills, honor, hypergamic selection, money, personal freedom, the contentment of popularity, power, respect, sex, social status, etc. This list may not be all inclusive.

It could be generally assumed, that whatever it is that you didn't get enough of in your life, especially during your formative years, is probably the thing that you're missing in your heart, the thing that you are desperately trying to find in your life.

Step 2: Facing the fact that this need can never be satisfied through conventional human effort

The second step is for you to realize that no other human being can truly, fully satisfy this need for love (etc.) in you. You must come to understand that trying to fulfill this need for love, etc. is a frustrating exercise in futility. This is a difficult step for most people. They want to try different things to attract love and attention, because they want to be able to get other people's love (etc.) on their own merit. They have an ego investment in this endeavor, which motivates them to work harder at extracting love (etc.) from other people. So they try desperately to make this work somehow.

For most people, Step 2 is the big stumbling block. They cannot face the fact that their need for love (etc.) can only be satisfied through God. So instead of turning to God they continue to try all kinds of devices and manipulations, all done in an effort to control other people, and to attract people's love (or whatever else it is that they are seeking). For some, it might take a long time to face the fact that no human being, and no human effort, can fully satisfy this need in their heart.

Step 3: Making the choice to seek having their needs met through God (or not)

The third phase in this process is when the person has faced the fact behind step number 2 and they understand that no one can satisfy this need that they have. Now, there are two possible responses that a person could have upon realizing that they cannot have their needs met in a conventional manner. These two possible responses are,

1. The "F*ck it all to h*ll!" (FIATH) response, which is filled with cynicism, anger, coldness, and stoicism. This person denies the provision of God through Christ Jesus, and turns to a godless lifestyle. Their purpose in life then becomes one of seeking to maximize their own happiness and contentment, often at other people's expense. Meanwhile, their mind continues to wrestle with the problem of why there is pain in the world.
2. The "Forsaking all, I trust Him" (FAITH) response, which is accepting God's provision and understanding that only God can satisfy the needs in your heart. This is when the person says to himself, "I'm going to pursue God, and let Him satisfy my needs, let Him satisfy my heart. So then the person grows in their relationship with God, and learns to have their needs met through God.

So that's the three step process. Perhaps there are some theological purists who would be dissatisfied with its' simplicity, or its' focus on desire as a motivating factor, but we have found that the step-process perspective, and the subjective approach are the strengths of this insightful illustration. It brings the basic processes of salvation to the conscious awareness of those whom we are trying to council. Once they get the idea, the counseling process becomes smoother, because we are then able to discuss the classical religious concepts (e.g. sin, repentance, redemption, salvation…) within a context that they can readily understand.

Feel free to share this with a friend or coworker who is looking for a life map.

“Biblical” Models of Courtship

Jack · 30 September 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Cutting through the hype and fluff, there is not much to be enjoyed about the prospect of courtship and marriage, unless you are holding out for the moment when you can trust God to catch you.

Readership: All
Length: 2,800 words
Reading Time: 15 minutes

Tangled and Jaded in Lies

The overly revered line of the marriage vow, “Until death do us part”, is now cliché, and has lost its meaning, but the commitment is truly meant to be an indissolvable bond reaching to the pall of the grave. Moreover, one’s conduct in a marriage has eternal consequences. It is, “for better or for worse”, and NOT, “only for MY best”, as modern society has grown to accept.

In an effort to correct this moral lapse, Cane Caldo, Dalrock (Category: Death of Courtship), Deep Strength, Donal Graeme, and Free Northerner, have written about Biblical Models of Courtship. Dalrock has addressed Chivalry and the model of Courtly Love, and has argued that this model is not Christian, nor is it Biblical. Deep Strength has written extensively on the Biblically based expectations of Marriage and Divorce. Very few other Manosphere authors have undertaken a serious approach towards marriage.

So far, these authors have placed a primary focus on debunking the false teachings of Feminist-influenced Churchianity, such as Dobsonism, Wilsonism, Chandlerism, and other variations of the same antique gynocentric lies. The destruction caused by these lies are as subtle as they are magnificent. Not only are women less happy than they were two decades ago, but the rise of MRA and MGTOW over the past decade, indicates that men are losing control of their relationships, and suffering as well.

While the admissibility of these author’s arguments, and the present day applicability of their conclusions, might stand in variance with the beliefs of many readers, I believe everyone should agree that the institution of marriage should be taken as a gravely serious matter.

Getting Back to the Basics

While sharpening our wits to discern heresy and error is indeed very important, we must not overlook, or fail to emphasize, the most important point of the matter, which would be the proper approach to courtship and marriage. It is noteworthy to review this again, because of the pandemic perpetuation of ideological and spiritual corruption, which has been made obvious by the decline of marriage as a revered institution.

Sex and Marriage is a matter to be considered with all seriousness. Jesus gave it to us pretty straight.

> [9] “And I say to you, whoever divorces his wife, except for sexual immorality, and marries another, commits adultery; and whoever marries her who is divorced commits adultery.”
> [10] His disciples said to Him, “If such is the case of the man with his wife, it is better not to marry.”
> Matthew 19:9-10 (NKJV)

It is known that the contents of the scriptures are largely condensed accounts of the events which inspired them. With that in mind, I have often suspected that Jesus’ full length, unabridged sermon describing wimminz and marriage, which is only alluded to in the disciples’ conclusion given in verse 10, probably included much of the standard RP fare, including hypergamy and the 80/20 rule in excruciating detail. If true, this would fully support the disciples’ reactionary statements.

Given all the hassle and risk surrounding any relationship with a woman, under what circumstances would it be advisable or beneficial for a person to marry?

> [8] But I say to the unmarried and to the widows: It is good for them if they remain [single] even as I am; [9] but if they cannot exercise self-control, let them marry. For it is better to marry than to burn with passion.
> 1st Corinthians 7:8-9 (NKJV)

So basically, if I'm understanding this right, you're ready for marriage when you just can't keep your pants on any longer, no matter how hard you try to resist the temptation – and that is the key point. It's when your will power (to honor God by remaining pure) becomes overruled by your passions (or libido).

So how might this situation come about?

"Biblical" Models of Courtship

Being aware of the general dynamics of the courtship model one is engaging in should significantly enhance one's successes in achieving the type of relationship desired, minimizing marital conflict, and reducing the chances of marital catastrophe in the future.

According to my reading of the Bible, "courtship" (a term I'll use loosely here) comes in basically three brands.

1. "Love" – Passionate, blind, feral instincts: e.g. Jacob and Rachel, David and Bathsheba, Amnon and Tamar. Also, ONS's, hook-ups, etc. which develop into LTR's might fall into this category.
2. Arranged – The union is proscribed by parents, family, authorities, a decree, or by social customs, such as Judaic law: e.g. Jacob and Leah, Ruth, and Esther, Chinese filial piety, Indian match maker, etc.
3. Contrived – God plays a direct or indirect part in bringing two people together. e.g. Isaac and Rebecca,

These three courtship styles are discussed in the following three sections.

1. "Love" – The Passionate Hope and Deceptive Ruin of Humanity

I hesitate to label the first type, "Love", because the word is so clichéd and abused in meaning, and so it becomes difficult to think about this model objectively. Also, the word "Love" can be interpreted in a variety of ways, which further compounds the confusion.

Anyway, the "Love" approach is fairly well known to have intensive thrills, but also catastrophic, or at least, problem-laden consequences. But I know that for certain people, this method has been shown to work, merely because they have a combination of the following personal qualities or social skills.

- They have a sufficient degree of maturity.
- They have good social skills.
- They are confident, and willing to accept responsibility for their actions.
- They have a good sense of discernment, and they trust their senses.
- They have a good intuitive knowledge of what is going to work for them.
- They know exactly what they want and how to get it.
- They know how to handle themselves in a relationship, so that they can make it come out the way they want.

Now in order to be successful with this model, one needs to have a strong command of the above qualities. To gain these qualities, one needs to have a long history of practice in honing and refining their spiritual maturity and social skills. This is not easy. The lack of personal integrity and fortitude, as well as not being well grounded in reality, is where spoiled princesses and idealistic white knights fail in Love.

Although mature, well developed people can find success and even contentment through this approach, this is not to say that this is the most God-honoring stratagem for finding a mate. It would be better to say that any longitudinal success achieved through this venue comes only by the grace of God. If one were to study the Biblical examples cited above, one would find ample support for such a conclusion.

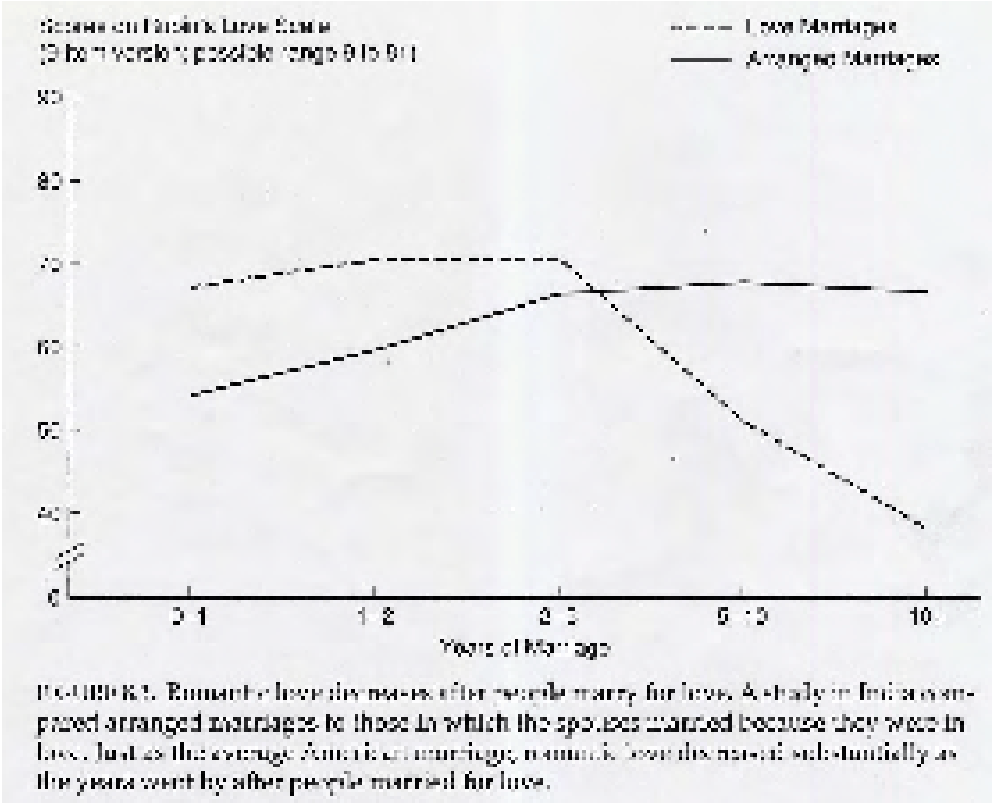
2. Arranged – A Traditional, Time Honored Path to Marital Stability

Concerning the second model of Courtship, Arranged, please consider the graph below depicting Rubin's Love scale versus Love and Arranged Marriages, taken from a study done on couples in India, where arranged marriages are commonplace. Here, a Love Marriage may correspond to the first type of courtship listed above.



In this figure, it is evident that the 2-5 year mark is a significant milestone in a marriage, because both types of marriages show a change in the reported attitudes. The satisfaction of a Love Marriage drops off precipitously at the 2-5 year period, whereas, that of the Arranged Marriage levels off.

Although I loathe to admit it, it appears as though an Arranged Marriage promises a better marital outcome than natural attraction, AKA "Love".

3. Contrived – An ancient, yet novel, approach towards Love

In the third style of courtship, the relationship is Contrived by God when the movement of the Holy Spirit brings two people together. A person can recognize this when they feel spiritually alive and empowered by the glory of God whenever they are together.

Speaking of marital success, the Contrived nuptial would probably be a fail safe bet, provided that one had the discernment to recognize it as sent by God, and the discipline to stick it through. But most people don't even know what this looks like.

My readers should not jump to the conclusion that this is the same as "waiting for the ONE", but rather more akin to "becoming the ONE" that someone could possibly fall in love with. This is done by developing both your external and internal potential. Maximize your SMV. Preserve your MMV. Honor, love, and obey God, and trust God to develop you into His image, and have faith that He will work your life circumstances to your advantage.

Isaac and Rebecca is actually a combination of models two and three. Abraham arranged for Isaac to marry a non-specific distant cousin within his family, but God chose the specific woman by answering the servant's prayer.

I know some of my readers are tempted to become cynical about my description of a courtship Contrived by God, so I'll go further here.

In my osmotic experience of finding "love", which has been fraught with many heartaches and disappointments, I have come to regard one passage in scripture which (to me) really concatenates the experience of "falling in love", with that of trusting in Divine providence. In essence, this juxtaposes the first and third model in the original list. I have also come to believe that this same approach works in modern times, just as well as ancient.

Men and women could best depend on God to find a Love relationship partner by obeying Solomon's injunction to the virgins of ancient Israel:

> "I charge you, O daughters of Jerusalem, Do not stir up nor awaken love Until it pleases."

Remarkably, this charge is repeated three times in the Song of Solomon, 2:7, 3:5, and 8:4. In my formal studies of the Bible, one thing I learned is that if something is repeated three times in scripture, it is of the gravest importance!

Note that Solomon's injunction was directed at young women, not older women or men. Think, those college-aged girls at the peak of their SMV. Apparently, young, nubile females are in control of this game, and that's where this game will be won or lost. Young ladies must therefore get their act together. Furthermore, parents and teachers also need to nurture young ladies to be marriage minded, and discourage them from attending college, where they would surely only defile themselves with premarital adulteries, and lose every characteristic that a potential husband would find attractive in them.

In the Bible Gateway footnotes for the above verses, the word 'charge' has an alternate translation of 'adjure'. The word adjure really manifests the importance of this verse, as it means, to entreat, request, charge, bind, or command earnestly and solemnly, often under oath or the threat of a penalty (Merriam Webster).

Western society is now witnessing the 'penalties' referred to here, in the form of large scale sexual immorality, marital fraud, frivorce, divorce theft, premarital and extramarital cuckolding, children growing up in broken homes, as well as the increased level of unhappiness of both males and females, no matter whether they are single or in relationships.

The Real Problem

Commenters might engage in endless arguments about how one model is better, or more "Godly", or more preferable than another for whatever reasons. But if we zoom out to the larger Frame, we find that our individual preferences and expectations are the real problem. That is to say, the root of the real problem in accepting and implementing any of these three models of courtship, is the general desire to hold expectations about how things 'ought' to be, according to one's own belief system or personal liking.

When young people get notions of "love" into their heads, along with any of the common tropes of courtship offered by Hollywood, media, or even well-meaning "Christian romance" authors, they get lost in fantasy land, and thereby miss the everyday opportunities to suffer for the sake of righteousness, build Godly character in the crucible of life, stoke their spiritual passions, and prepare themselves for the real thing.

Perhaps arranged marriages are so fruitful simply because it removes the mysterious elements of ambitious fantasies and astronomical anticipations, and allows individuals to be more authentic.

It should be noted that the third type of courtship, Contrived, is extremely rare, and I think that it's not because of God's inaction, but rather people's unwillingness to walk the razor thin line between resisting lustful fantasies, and controlling themselves over the period of time they have to wait for God to move. Most people can't do it. Honestly, how many people can say that they waited to have sex until they totally cracked? How many people have been so passionate, and tempted so severely, that they lost control of themselves and were forced to trust God with their sex life and their choice of a partner?

Many people who arrive at this state, who truly cannot keep a lid on their sexual passion, are usually not in the mindset to get married at that point. Instead, they are only looking to maximize their carousel or plate spinning expertise. The prideful ego, the shamefully open SMP, and the high risk, low opportunity MMP, are mostly to blame for this strong reticence towards making a commitment.

Even among those who can honestly say that they waited with determination not to have sex as aforementioned, how many of them actually chose and stayed with the man or woman who was 'God's first choice' of a Contrived partner for them? Or were they even aware of it?

For many, accepting God's choice can be a hard and bitter pill to swallow. Some people find it easier if they are propelled by youthful ignorance and a healthy libido, while others find God's will to be more acceptable to their tastes after they have lost the strength of libido present in their youth. Different strokes for different folks.

But either way, those who are jaded and dissipated from years of sexual promiscuity will invariably find it very difficult and challenging, if not impossible, to achieve a joyfully rapturous consummation in marriage.

> Libido = 1 / Sexual Promiscuity
> "More the promiscuity lesser the libido, lesser the promiscuity more the libido."

[On an interesting side, a high libido in women is extremely attractive to men, whereas a high libido in men is a turn-off to most women. I suspect this is the main reason why Roissy argues that promiscuity damages women's MMV a lot more than it hurts men.]

On the other side of the fence are the people who are not yet capable of making the most of their faith and their SMV to spill their load with reckless abandon. They will come up with a plethora of objections before they arrive at that state. These individuals have a lot of red flags pop into their minds, characterized by heated objections starting with, "But that's not… (fill in the blank with your carefully rationalized objection)!" Or alarming questions starting with, "What if… (fill in the blank with your worst case scenario)?"

Either of these two types of people need to take another step back in the reframe, and recognize that this hesitancy and doubt is caused by a fear of trusting God with an unknown variable in an equation for which the result is of the utmost importance to them, which they are not willing to put up for stakes in a gamble on the grace of God. Yet, they might still choose to believe that they can engineer their life better than God can, and they can be deeply offended when anyone should point out how vain and ridiculous such a claim is.

> Ego = 1 / Knowledge
> "More the knowledge lesser the ego, lesser the knowledge more the ego."
> ~ Albert Einstein

Compare the pursuit of ego gratification to Solomon's command – the direct opposite stance.

> "Do not stir up nor awaken love Until it pleases."

In other words, stoke up your libido by resisting sexual temptations. Increase your spiritual worth by swallowing your pride and submitting to God. Enhance your desirability by developing your SMV (men) and preserving your MMV (women). Do this until Love comes knocking at your door. It might even turn out to be God's choice of a partner for you!

Just take a few moments and think about what that means, and whether it might be worth the effort to explore the truth behind it, and possibly discover a transformation of your spiritual-socio-sexual experience for the better.

I pray it's not too late for you to discover authentic joy through finding God's will realized in your life.

God bless!

1. Introduction – Two Contrasting Models of Courtship and Marital Structure

"Courtship" is a term I'll use loosely in this essay, referring to the social selection process leading to a matrimonial union. There are generally two types of courtship models, corresponding to which sex holds the majority of power in the interaction. The first type of pseudo-traditional courtship model, in which the female holds power, is known as the "Courtly Love" model. The second type of time-honored traditional model, in which the male holds power, is apparently lacking a formal name, so here I'll offer the moniker of "Tingly Respect" courtship (for reasons to be explained later). I'll go further with the creative labeling (if only for the sake of humor), and say that a marriage based on the Courtly Love model is a matrimony, whereas a marriage based on the Tingly Respect model results in a patrimony (for the children).

These two models have been described and discussed in snippets from varying viewpoints within the Manosphere. However, I don't believe a meaningful connection has been made between them. So the larger goal of this essay is to draw knowledge about the two different power structures into one concise comparison.

Of note, Dalrock has written extensive descriptions of modern courtship dynamics in the following posts. A few of the most representative posts on the subject include the following.

1. Cane Caldo: This Weekend on: What's the Real Tradition? (April 7, 2017)
2. Dalrock: A shortage doesn't indicate a buyer's market. (August 17, 2018)
3. Dalrock: A challenge to traditionalists. (August 20, 2018)
4. Dalrock: Real men confess their love to the gas station attendant.(August 21, 2018)
5. Dalrock: The wages of wooing. (August 22, 2018)
6. Dalrock: Returning to a Past that Never Was (September 11, 2018)
7. Dalrock: Empowered to Avoid Responsibility (September 12, 2018)
8. Dalrock: Feminine Wiles (September 13, 2018)

In the first post listed above, Cane briefly describes the two different courtship models addressed here in this essay. He wrote,

> "According to traditionalists (and others): Men are supposed to chase, and women are supposed to be caught. Or they might say: Men are to initiate, and women are to respond. Imagine a party. There are single men and women. The traditionalist wants the men to pick a woman, and then woo her. Then he (the trad) wants her to respond with a Yes, or No, or Show me more. That traditional mating ritual is wrong and foolish. Roissy/Heartiste's maxim that 'Men display, women choose' is much more true. Go to a party and see for yourself."

In the second post, Dalrock describes the Courtly Love model, as well as a point of confusion between these two models as follows.

> "[The idea] that their unmarried daughter is in a great position to find a husband because she's not remotely interested in the kind of men who express interest in her… [is related to] the erroneous idea that the Bible teaches that men should pursue and women should judge the performance. But it isn't the Bible that teaches this ethic, it is the religion of Courtly Love that teaches this. Think of the only two women to have books of the Bible named after them. Both Ruth and Esther pursued their eventual husbands. […]"
> "But since very few Christians can separate Christianity from Courtly Love/Chivalry, there is a widespread belief that Courtly Love is God's model. In the Courtly Love model a man selects a woman and sets out to prove his worth to her in the hope of winning her heart. The woman's only job is to keep being awesome while deciding if the man's performance is worth rewarding with a token of her favor. This is what so many unmarried women and their fathers are so loudly complaining is lacking today. It isn't Christian, but it is a religious expectation."

The third post revisits Cane's original post (1) and asserts that the model that is commonly held to be traditional is backtually bass ackward.

In the fourth post listed above, Dalrock further explains the similarity between the Courtly Love model, and modern Christian sensibilities. This comparison would be hilarious, if not for the obvious (and evil) inversion of the hierarchy.

The fifth post compares, with striking similarities, the nine stages of Courtly Love with the modern Churchian sensibilities of courtship – offering further evidence that the traditional model is backward.

In the sixth post listed above, Dalrock describes how the Courtly Love model has been entrenched in the stereotypically conservative Greaser culture since the mid-20th century, and that because of its long revered history, has somehow created the misleading illusion that it is essentially God's model applied to the modern MMP. I will add here that the Greaser sub-culture of the 1950's actually precipitated the onset of the sexual revolution in the 1960's, which led to Feminism in the 1970's. (This argument remains to be explored in a future post.)

In the seventh post, the Tingly Respect model was described by Dalrock as follows.

> "She can subtlety indicate interest to the kind of men she thinks would be a match for her, men she is attracted to. If her standards are too high and the man isn't interested, or is only interested if fornication is on the table, her ego is bruised but she has retained deniability in her expression of interest. As her over inflated ego is reduced to reality, eventually she will be able to feel attraction for the kind of man who wants to marry her. Internalizing responsibility creates a mechanism for her to both get real world feedback on her self-perception, and for her to be able to become attracted to the kind of man she can attract for marriage."

One important factor which I'm sure Dalrock agrees but fails to mention here, is that she must resist the urge to fornicate with any man she might take an interest in. Remember, women are the gatekeepers of sex, so to speak.

In post number eight, Dalrock highlights a successful example of the Tingly Respect model offered by a reader, Joe. I encourage readers to consider this post as an example of how this model quite often leads to marital success and satisfaction.

2. The Power Game

Far from being the state of "equality" that feminists purport endorsing, the two courtship models discussed herein, are actually two different power structures. This should not be surprising to my regular readers, because I have described ethical structures in several past posts. To briefly reiterate a conclusion of my past studies on this topic, Feminism has adopted a Power vs. Fear based ethical system.

Now, when we talk about the basic power structures of courtship and marriage models, of course, we mean the visceral power. In every relationship, there is always one person who has the ability to shake up the other's world by inducing strong somatic emotions, and thereby incite that person to change their mind and cooperate. This power is often expressed in a relationship in the way one person has the final decision-making authority, and the other person continually strives to "get with the program" defined by the other. Moreover, the person holding more visceral power is the person who defines the structure and goals of the relationship.

As reviewed in a previous post, Conflict Structure and Marital Satisfaction (November 15, 2017), the person in authority is apt to make demands on the other, and the other person must either (1) comply, (2) fight to establish himself as the one holding power, or else, (3) fold and bow out of the relationship.

As we well know, in modern Western Society, men tend to do (1), while women go for options (2) or (3). The large scale frequency of this dynamic indicates that women hold more power than men, in relationships, and in society.

The next section will take a closer look at the balance of Power.

3. The Power Structures

Aside from any religious misgivings, the real difference between the two aforementioned models is how the power game is constructed. In the Courtly Love model, the woman holds the lion's share of power, whereas in the Tingly Respect model, the man holds the better portion of power. Again, power in this sense, is mostly attributed to the visceral power that dominates the emotionally charged motivations of the relationship interaction.

Interactions in which both the male and female truly hold equal amounts of power, as promoted by Feminists and Complementarians, is here presumed not to truly exist except in theory-isms. In reality, one person always has more power than the other, although the forms and expressions of each individual's power may vary.

However, there is one interesting caveat in the Tingly Respect model. Here, men retain power, but women have an advantage in the way of choice. And we know how women have an addiction to choice. Because choice is the deciding factor in the establishment of the relationship, this model is fairly well balanced, in terms of influence. The woman trades her choice for the benefits of a marital commitment. The man may then consolidate his power, and establish order in the newly formed family. (At least, that is how it should work.) The woman also benefits from this arrangement through gaining the freedom to focus her energies on the home and family, if she should wish to do so.

The weak link in the chain is not so much a lack of courage or righteousness in the man's authority, but in the willingness of the woman to continue in a posture of submission.

Women who pine for power, but who fail to achieve it in a relationship, often resort to cheap but greatly annoying substitutions of pseudo-power. This situation is especially prone to occur after a woman loses her SMV/MMV power (AKA "hitting the wall"), while her male counterpart is reaching his peak SMV, which further enhances her sense of insecurity and powerlessness. Typical expressions take the forms of women nagging, issuing various threats such as divorce, playing jealousy games, and setting themselves up as the egotistical judge of the man's character and worth. If the woman feelz led to take this behavior to an extreme, then it has the potential to upset the relationship, as is well known.

In fact, modern women have become adept in using this underlying weakness of the marital bond to intentionally destroy the relationship in order to gain various social and material advantages, such as attention, affirmation, enjoying the continued exercise of willful, wanton choice, divorce settlement and alimony, AKA "frivorce theft".

However (and this is a major point in this essay), there do exist unique situations in which one gender holds the majority of defacto power, but still chooses to conform to the structural model in which the other sex holds authority. Examples of crossovers from both types of structures are prominent. As of late in western society, men who hold the upper hand often willingly choose to defer to women, merely to fit into the Courtly Love model, which they presumably believe is the better model. Here I wish to emphasize the alternative, that women who hold the upper hand, especially young women in their peak SMV years (18-25), can willingly choose to fit themselves into the Tingly Respect model, and obtain the related benefits thereof, such as retaining their purpose and relevance to society after their peak years have passed, and their power has waned.

Within the community of those subscribing to the Courtly Love model, there are obviously many blue balls pilled men who are confused about the proper sex roles and expressions of power. Even for those who hop on the Tingly Respect model, it is not uncommon for a bit of mock chivalry (an expression of the Courtly Love model) to be displayed by the man out of respect for her 'weaknesses', including a formal, down-on-one-knee marriage proposal.

It is presumed that this is due to ignorance on the part of men, concerning the differences and dynamics of the two models.

For those who are interested in further exploration of the two different types of models, the discussions under Dalrock's posts listed above provide more detailed illustrations of the contrast between the two social dynamics surrounding "courtship".

4. A Comparative Physiognomy of the Structural Models

Since we are talking about visceral power in this essay, there is necessarily a full spectrum of responses correlating to the power structure.

- The Emotional response – Tingles (in women), Anxiety (in men)
- The Physical/Biological response – Increased pulse rate, an erection (men), the slop spilling out of her shorts the moment he enters the room.
- The Psychological response – Self-Consciousness, Scrambled Thinking.
- The Relational response – Admiration and Respect (women), special consideration, Pedestalization (men).
- The Spiritual response – Love, Joy, Humility, Deference.

If the man displays the cues listed above, and the woman much less, then it is obvious that the female has visceral power over the male – and he becomes a simpering, starry eyed fool. This is the case with the Courtly Love model.

If the woman is experiencing the above responses, then it is the male who possesses visceral power over the female – and she is loving every moment of it! This is the case with the Tingly Respect model.

All these conditions are cofactors of a healthy relationship, and ideally, both partners should experience these responses. So the models presented here express the general overall nature of the interaction.

For those of you who are having trouble visualizing what this difference in structure appears like to the eyes, Rollo offered a concise comparison of Body Language (September 26, 2018), in which the visceral difference can be felt by the reader. The poses he labels as "Lean In" (by the male), "Lean Out" (by the female), "Mate Guarding" (by the male), and "I Love Mommy" (by the male), all illustrate a relationship structure in which the male is pursuing the female's adoration and attention. All these types of poses are characteristic of the Courtly Love model described by Dalrock. Rollo describes the physical display of the Courtly Love model in terms of Frame as follows.

> "…the lean-in is a physical display that illustrates how a man's subconscious has decided that his woman's Frame is the dominant one in the relationship. He feels the compulsion to put himself into her space as his natural impulse."
> "A (Beta) man leans in to find inclusion and acceptance in a woman's Frame while her own hindbrain instinctively reacts and attempts to lessen any inference of intimate acceptance to a larger audience."

Rollo only offers one section entitled "Alpha Tells" in which the opposite structure, Tingly Respect, is depicted.

> "…a natural Alpha man is almost never aware of his own Alphaness and that's what really stands out in these photos – the men aren't trying to evoke the reflexive responses of the women. They fluidly (almost Zen-like) prompt these reactions in women. There is no pretense or the obvious mugging for the audience that you see in shots where the Frame is clearly being directed by the woman while the hapless Beta tries to prove how in love he is by kissing on her while she finds something more interesting to occupy herself with. When a woman admires her man he is literally all she can think about."

It should be noted that the male may not necessarily be an Alpha for this structure to be manifested, but only that he is the dominant visceral power figure in the relationship. Lost Patrol adds,

> "It's just more confirmation that there is no such thing as the equal partnership most women claim to want. When you're talking about men and women, somebody is operating within the other body's frame."

Next, let's review some major points of contrast between the two models.

5. Differences between the Two Models

In the Courtly Love model, the man is overcome with emotion, and openly pursues the woman. In the process, he loses his sense of his God ordained purpose in life, becomes the plea bargainer, and plays a submissive role to the woman – all done in an effort to "win her love". This is an inversion of God's ordained hierarchy, and is well known to produce sin and ungodly unions. The results are catastrophic, not just for the man and woman involved, but for others as well. Dalrock has written a multitude of posts to this end. To offer a few Biblical examples in which the man pursues, or is subject to the woman, we have David and Bathsheba, Amnon and Tamar, and presumably from the context, Ahab and Jezebel.

It has generally been implied that the Tingly Respect model of courtship typically involves a situation in which the man is just doing his thing, and the woman picks him out of the crowd and offers IOI's, which the man either takes notice of, or misses. If he can read them, then he either accepts or rejects the further development of the relationship. If he accepts, then the relationship proceeds. Dalrock suggests that the Biblical examples of Ruth and Esther fit this model.

With the Tingly Respect model, it is assumed that the woman naturally chooses a man who consumes her with the Tingles, and is thus more open and pliable to his wishes. Since the man holds the veto power in this case, then he is the one who is 'in charge', and she is blissfully wrapped around his finger.

Conservative feminists and complementarians have attempted to blend certain aspects of these two models into a hamsterbating hybrid, appealing to large numbers of females with a glutton for wealthy, masculine, chiseled-torso, servant boys who deliver Tingles, and who willingly overlook any obvious shortcomings, such as disrespect, on the female's part. Manospherians know that this fantasy doesn't work because it poses real world contradictions.

Notably, high SMV men will never submit to a woman's' preferences, and that's partly what makes them tingle-inducing, high SMV men. Also, high SMV men (as rated by women) are exceedingly rare (i.e. the 80/20 rule), so the probability of capturing one in marriage is slim indeed. Sorry ladies, you can't have the best of both worlds!

The next two sections will discuss the strengths and weaknesses of both the Courtly Love model, and the Tingly Respect model.

6. Strengths and Weaknesses of the Courtly Love Model

The strengths of the Courtly Love model, in which the man vies for the attention and favor of the woman, include the following.

- The woman is more likely to attract men who possess an equitable SMV/MMV with hers, and therefore present a proper and willing matrimonial match for her.
- The vast majority of men who engage in the Courtly Love model are likely to have sincere convictions about committing to a LTR or marriage. Such men, typically referred to as White Knights, are not likely to be Alpha Chads, who are merely looking for a pump-and-dump.
- Within this model, the man's honor is assumed and taken for granted, and this setup allows the woman to call the shots. Therefore, the woman need not fear getting burned in love by being rejected by a man, no matter how immature, contentious, and disrespectful she may be. It is left to the man to 'prove his manhood' by doing whatever backflips are necessary to deal with the problems she creates. (This male behavior is defined as 'love' within this model.)
- The Courtly Love model has been very popular for the past few decades in western societies, so you may enjoy the immoral support from your friends and family, and need not risk being ostracized or labeled 'too conservative'.

The weaknesses in the Courtly Love model include the following.

- The hierarchical structure is an inversion of the Biblical analogy of a marriage between a man and a woman, and therefore fails to resemble the relationship between Christ and the church.
- Marriages in which the woman is the dominant player have been shown in many studies to be less happy, and at greater risk of divorce.

- Men who have serious intentions of marriage when engaging in the Courtly Love model are not likely to be top quality men who have the ability to instill the blessed Tingles, known to yield life-long loyalty and admiration (or pining alpha widowhood) on the part of the woman.
- This model presents frustrations concerning the feral inclinations of the flesh. That is, the woman can have her ego stroked, but not her Tingles. Her desire for Tingles remains as a continual temptation to engage in extramarital affairs. Meanwhile, the man gets to binge on lust, but cannot fully enjoy the consummation of a female rapture within his reduced domain of power and authority. Both of these situations weaken the marital bond.
- Women who hold more power and authority than the man tend to be less passionate and satisfied with marital lovemaking. Over time, this condition leads to the dead bedroom syndrome. Women who get their orgasms from power trips usually have no problem with this situation, but the men suffer greatly.
- Steadily increasing dissatisfaction on behalf of the male tends to erode the power and authority of the female's dominance. Men learn to be more resilient to female dominance over time, usually by ignoring her demands, or simply disappearing for a few hours, or days. Some men learn game techniques, or they might even venture into an extramarital affair, just in order to get a taste of sexual satisfaction, normalcy, and respect.
- Female belligerence and kick-@ssery tends to grow more pronounced with each recurring success in embarrassing the male, especially after an Alpha enwidowment.
- Children growing up in this environment experience less of the power and Kingdom of God within the family environment, inhibiting confidence, and developing into less well-adjusted adults.

Concerning the Courtly Love model, the strengths largely encompass the indulgence of fantasy, thereby feeding male lust and catering to female insecurities, while the weaknesses of the model penalize the male and weaken the marital bond.

7. Strengths and Weaknesses of the Tingly Respect Model

The strengths of the Tingly Respect model of courtship, in which the woman presents herself to be 'taken' by the man, include the following.

- The hierarchical structure conforms to the Biblical analogy of a marriage between a man and a woman, resembling the relationship between Christ and the church.
- This model accounts for the feral inclinations of the flesh. That is, the woman can have her Tingles stroked, while the man gets to enjoy the power and authority.
- Children growing up in this environment tend to become happier, more wholesome, more Godly, and better adjusted adults.

The weaknesses in the Tingly Respect model include the following.

- The woman may foolishly choose a man who far outranks her on the SMV/MMV scale, and thereby does not present a proper and willing matrimonial match for her.
- The man may have no deep seated conviction to man up and marry that feverishly Tingulated Christian gal, and may very well use the opportunity to simply sow his wild oats, and prance off to the next future.
- OTOH, the woman may be so contentious and disrespectful, that she essentially invites a rejection from the man, regardless of the man's honor or the model chosen. In truth, a woman who does this is begging to switch to the Courtly Love model, in which she can call the shots. This hang-up tends to grow more ostensible with each recurring round, especially after an Alpha enwidowment.
- If the above conditions hold true, then one high SMV man is likely to spin off a series of Alpha Widows using this model, which we know from modern clinical studies to be very unlikely to form successful, Godly marital unions. Rather, unions with Alpha widows tend to regress into a dark bitter chocolate semblance of the Courtly Love model, complete with furry mammal accomplices.
- The successful application of the Tingly Respect model strongly depends on the propriety, respectability, and honor of the sought after male. Simply put, with power (high SMV) comes responsibility.

The strengths and weaknesses of the Tingly Respect model are both very significant. It should be noted that the weaknesses of this model are most paramount in the courtship selection process, while the strengths come out in the LTR.

8. Courtship Models vs. Marriage Models

As discussed before, the power game takes the form of selecting who defines the structure of the relationship. In this view, Dalrock et al. got it right, en large, but they have overlooked a major point in the application. That is, when courtship is first instigated, the participants may or may not know which power structure model they currently adhere to, or actually prefer to develop. You know the reasons: blue balls, thinking with the little head, Satan's deceptions, blindness, ignorance, generational curses, etc. As a consequence, most young people instinctively, and blindly, follow the type of power structure they are most familiar with, which is most likely the one they experienced while growing up in their family of origin.

This is an important distinction, because if this power structure is not settled early in the relationship, then as the relationship continues over time, a battle to determine the power structure will develop. I would guess that this is the root contention of the vast majority of marital conflict. But if a person's preferred power structure could be clearly determined from the outset, then a lot fewer mismatches would be made in the heat of the moment, and a great deal of marital conflict, affairs, divorces, and unhappy childhoods, could be avoided later on.

9. The Transition from Courtship to Marriage

Following the courtship, no matter which model of courtship is employed, and upon the establishment of a formal marriage, there remains the task of working out the power structure that will be habitually used in the relationship.

A previous post discussed three general avenues of finding a partner. These three methods included,

1. "Love" – Passionate, blind, feral instincts: e.g. Jacob and Rachel, David and Bathsheba, Amnon and Tamar. Also, ONS's, hook-ups, etc. which develop into LTR's might fall into this category.
2. Arranged – The union is proscribed by parents, family, authorities, a decree, or by social customs, such as Judaic law: e.g. Jacob and Leah, Ruth, and Esther, Chinese filial piety, Indian match maker, etc.
3. Contrived – God plays a direct or indirect part in bringing two people together. e.g. Isaac and Rebecca,

Upon reflection, it should become intuitively clear that the third method, Contrived by God, is uniquely based on a higher authority, reminiscent of the Tingly Respect model. Although an Arranged marriage also depends on a higher authority, there is no guarantee that this authority is masculine in nature. So unless one finds a partner through the third method of trusting God, starting a relationship may be somewhat different from maintaining a relationship.

Concerning the first model of courtship, feral attraction (AKA "Love"), it appears difficult to transition into the Tingly Respect structure of power, unless the attraction first began on that foot, and the male possessed the honor and foresight to take the necessary responsibility for the relationship in the form of a commitment. However, in the second and third models of courtship, a male dominant power structure is more likely to prevail.

Of course, certain exceptions may apply within any arrangement. One onerously common example is when the family of origin is a defacto matriarchy, and the mother-in-law continues to exert the dominant hand in the marriage. However, a strict adherence to a Patriarchal structure of power will slowly erode this influence, as Dalrock describes in his post, A wife's best defense against a troublesome mother-in-law. (March 13, 2013)

10. Which Type of Courtship Model is More God Honoring?

"Godly" or "God honoring" is a Christian buzz-term which is meant to convey an idealized image of a large number of preferred conditions. These conditions in a marital setting include qualities such as emotional openness and intimacy, honesty, confidence, faithfulness, and sexual passion, as well as longitudinal security and stability. Overall, members of a God honoring family should happily have their individual needs met, experience joy, healing and spiritual growth, while the family enjoys a sense of unity, belonging, harmony, and purpose. Granted, this is a tall bill of sale, especially in this day and age, but the goal here is clearly to achieve a solid nuclear family which offers a home environment free from harmful or dysfunctional interactions and inordinate amounts of confusion, which are especially harmful to the healthy development of the children's psychology and spiritual well-being.

Dalrock, et al. have established that the Courtly Love model is not a robust Christian model. Dalrock implicitly assumes that the Tingly Respect model is the "Biblical" or most God fearing model. Deep Strength has several posts that describe the Biblical structure of authority in a male-female union, which parallels the Tingly Respect model. However, it is evident that many males are not fully convinced as to whether the Tingly Respect model is truly God's best model for courtship or marriage. This post has offered the reader some helpful guidelines in making this decision. It is hoped that this might clear up any confusion of the matter, and encourage the reader to come to their own conclusions on how to best approach courtship and marriage.

Since the focus is on building a God honoring marriage and family, this article has not explored the dynamics of non-heterosexual relationships.

11. Conclusions

It should be clear to the reader by now, that the most "Biblical", God glorifying power structure typifying a Christian marriage would be the Tingly Respect model, as suggested by Christianity and Masculinity, Dalrock, and Snapper. Most Christians should agree that within a long term Christian marital relationship, the Tingly Respect model delineates the preferred power structure.

The courtship model doesn't seem to matter quite as significantly as the power structure shown in the relationship, although there is typically some degree of correlation or causation between the two.

Being aware of which courtship model you are engaging in, and which type of power structure you wish to achieve in your relationship, should significantly enhance your success in achieving the type of relationship you desire, minimizing marital conflict, and reducing the chance of marital catastrophe in the future.

Tingles = Respect

Jack · 6 October 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Hypergamic selection carries with it a woman's Respect for the Tingle-inducing man.

Readership: All

Hypergamy is a term that has been redefined since the advent of the Red Pill, and since then, Rollo has cornered the search engine market on the term. The references to hypergamy are ubiquitous in RP venues, almost universally giving hypergamy a bad rap. However, I have come to believe there is a silver lining to women's inherent desire to "marry up". Consider the following expositions.

1. Adam Piggott: The Definition of Hypergamy (August 14, 2014)
2. Spawny's Space: Hypergamy Unleashed — Tingles Uber Alles (December 30, 2014)
3. Christianity and Masculinity: Hypergamy is good (December 7, 2017)

In the first article, Adam quotes Keoni's definition of hypergamy. The latter part reads,

> "In other words, if she does not "look up" to a man in some way, she will not be attracted to that man."

Second, "Tingles Uber Alles" is the 3rd Titanium Law of the Manosphere. Farm Boy wrote,

> "The difficulty is that for a woman to feel tingles, the man has to be dominant."
>
> "From a woman's perspective, there are so very many men of the wrong type (non-tingle-inducing) approaching. These must be rejected and rejected quickly, lest they get any ideas. This was such an inconvenience. She must get on with her purpose, the tingles. This situation is bothersome, but it is the price that women must still pay."
> "The flip side of the same coin is that much of "dominance" comes from the relative status between the man and the woman."

In the third post, Deep Strength offered this:

> "Hypergamy is simply the traits in which women are sexually attracted to men: masculinity, power, status, charisma, looks, money, athleticism, talent, and so on. These are the ways that women will "marry up" because they want to be with a man who is sexually attractive to them."

I want to offer the reader an observation about this trait of Hypergamy, and I hope I'm not stretching this a bit too far.

If a man has the ability to strike the blessed Tingles in a woman, then he has a strong, visceral power over her. Respect is the proper display of appreciation for one who has power and authority. Therefore, a woman's desire for a powerful, Tingle-inducing man, and "looking up" to that man, could easily be conflated with "having respect" for that man.

Men can't really identify with women's hypergamic instincts, or their experience of the Tingles. But respect is something that men can relate to, as it is a pertinent need for men. Men need to be respected by the women in their lives. This is both empowering and inspiring to them. In this view, hypergamy offers a win-win deal for both the male and female, as it offers Respect to the male, and Tingles to the female.

If you're following this connection, I will here propose the theoretical law that there is a high correlation between when a woman experiences the Tingles, and when she has a high degree of respect and admiration for the man. In other words,

Tingles = Respect

Of course, there is the all too common exception when the woman is too selfish, immature, or clueless to know how to express respect to the man in a way that the man can read and appreciate.

There is also the exceedingly rare exception when the woman chooses to respect the man in her life out of obedience to God's Holy Scriptures, even though he may fail to confer the 3 T's of Total Tingle Tantrum on her.

But other than these exceptions, this equivalency generally holds true. This knowledge may offer to certain men who are desperately in need of Respect, a greater motivation to become Tingle-inducing studs.

This interaction is a key point to understand the Tingly Respect model which I described in the last post, Models of Courtship and Marital Structure (October 3, 2018), because this is the fundamental dynamic within this type of relationship.

Meretricious Power and the Tingle

Jack · 9 October 2018 · Archived copy · Original

A response to Lexet: (1) Courtship model Framework, (2) the unavoidable merger of the SMP and MMP and the resultant dominance of visceral power, (3) the necessity of the Tingle in the Tingly Respect model, and (4) how the fragile Tingly Respect model of courtship becomes spoiled at the outset, especially in the converged MMP.

Readership: All

Lexet's post, Courtship and Power (October 4, 2018) offered a thoughtful analysis and critique of my previous post, Models of Courtship and Marital Structure (October 3, 2018). As a response, I wish to further develop a few important concepts that are essential to my original post.

1. Courtship Model Framework

There are a few broad statements I should say up front. The first is that we are talking about theoretical models, so of course, real world examples of relationships will always have their own unique characteristics.

Secondly, these models of courtship could be formally institutionalized, or informally practiced, and we might also find many variations, or 'sub-models' of these two types, based on different cultural and religious values, as well as the personalities of those involved.

I am sure there are other models of courtship besides the Courtly Love or the Tingly Respect models – models which are not focused on the visceral power dynamics between the man and the woman involved – and these other models might be more suitable for couples who are more mature in their ability to offer selfless love, and altruistic respect, and who are more willing to submit to a hierarchical order of authority out of faith in God's Word.

There are also variations of these models with respect to the individual roles of the bride and groom within the extended family. Lexet pointed out one variation of the Respect model, by offering an example of specific arrangements of power between the husband and his father-in-law.

> "[In one variation, the] family calls for the suitor to submit to the father… forever. The single man does not maintain any sense of personal identity, as he is over shadowed. [In contrast,] The Respect model should theoretically work both ways with a father and the suitor: mutual respect, and an understanding of boundaries. From a Christian perspective, this is due to the father's authority over his household, until the daughter marries and cleaves to her husband."

2. Meretricious Power

Of course, mature people should not make lifelong commitments based on passing emotions, but in fact, this is the norm for modern society, and the church is hardly any different.

Currently, the Courtly Love model is institutionalized in society au fait, and it is perceived as a formal style of courtship. However, it is not formally institutionalized, meaning that the model is presented as a traditional standard, but there are no regulations for courtship that are enforced by society or the church.

Since a formal, institutionalized model of courtship is absent, young people are naturally going to approach courtship from a subjective point of view, just as they now do. Hence, the visceral power to create emotional impressions on the other partner then becomes the overriding center of focus in defining the rudimentary nature of the relationship. I believe Lexet would agree with this description of the present ontology, because he wrote,

> "The result of this curse is that there is constant friction between the sexes, with power being a fluid force. Men tend to abuse their power, or give it to the woman, who tends to desire that power. It takes great strength > and willpower to find that balance (for a man)."

On a larger scale, the fact that the modern SMP is marshalled by meretricious Machiavellianism, and the fact that "courtship" is besmirched as much as cuckoldry is taken for granted, are sure signs that the sexual revolution has reached its' rapturous consummation. Pursuing Zoe has been replaced by ravishing Trixie. The flesh is thrust in everyone's face at adolescence, and there is little other recourse.

> "…even in Christian circles, men face the dilemma of being forced into a non-biblical, or even anti-biblical, system to become married (the only lawful outlet for sex permitted)."

In other words, the MMP is converged with the SMP.

Will society repent, or roll over for another round?

3. Don't forget: Tingles Uber Alles!

Aside from his preamble, Lexet conspicuously dropped the adjective "Tingly" from the name of the Tingly Respect model. I know "Tingly" makes the name somewhat ludicrous, but it is an integral part of this model, because this is the form of power that the man has over the woman. That is, the man makes the woman Tingle, and the woman responds to his power over her emotions by displaying respect for him. This fundamental characteristic of this model was derived in a previous post, Tingles = Respect (October 6, 2018).

Similarly, for the Courtly Love model, the Courting is an integral part of this model because the woman requires the man to court her (e.g. show various expressions of his love, devotion, and willingness to invest in her) in return for her "love". Of course, we know that "love", in this sense, is experienced by the man as a purely subjective experience which motivates him to perform acts of love towards the woman. The problem with this model is that the man's respondent acts of love are unable to generate the Tingles, and are therefore merely expressions of obsequiousness. This is the visceral power that the woman has over the man in this model.

Lexet argues that there are no examples of the Respect model in western culture as follows.

> "In all seriousness, this model needs to be fleshed out. It can only work in a Christian environment, or in a culture influenced by Biblical Christianity, and not churchianity. This model must be fleshed out in order to advocate its implementation. The likelihood of a person finding this in the real world is slim to none."

I would fully agree that there are no formal or institutional examples, but informal examples are somewhat ubiquitous. Anytime a woman gets the Tingles for a man and chases him down, we are seeing an example of the Tingly Respect model in its beginning stage. Although this happens very frequently, it is considered improper, dishonorable, and often obscene, to discuss, reveal, provoke, or satirize female desire. Furthermore, females are extremely careful to hide their arousal, and are evermore discrete in their liaisons with the male objects of their affections. In fact, women will usually lie about their feelings towards a particular man whenever they are confronted, especially in public. So it is not something that is obviously witnessed, except by those who have the knowledge and discernment of such things.

The reason why these budding Tingly Respect relationships seldom develop into stable LTR's is somewhat complicated. The next section examines the factors.

4. Complexities of the Tingly Respect model during Courtship

As mentioned in my previous post, the Tingly Respect model is weaker in the courtship phase. The failure could be caused by either the man or the woman. If either one fails, so does the model.

1. The woman's failure: The woman foolishly chooses a man who Tingulates her, but who is also far above her own MMV banding, and therefore cannot attract a marriage proposal from the man.
2. The man's failure: Even when a woman chooses a man who Tingulates her, and is also within her own MMV band, the man may not feel any compunction to develop a LTR with her, and therefore may not take responsibility for the relationship, nor offer any commitment.

There are a few different methods by which either sex could louse up the process.

Concerning the first stumbling block, Dalrock describes how women should be aware of the feedback they get from men, identify their true MMV, and learn to regulate their expectations accordingly. He wrote,

> "She can subtlety indicate interest to the kind of men she thinks would be a match for her, men she is attracted to. If her standards are too high and the man isn't interested, or is only interested if fornication is on the table, her ego is bruised but she has retained deniability in her expression of interest. As her over inflated ego is reduced to reality, eventually she will be able to feel attraction for the kind of man who wants to marry her. Internalizing responsibility creates a mechanism for her to both get real world feedback on her self-perception, and for her to be able to become attracted to the kind of man she can attract for marriage."

For the second error, men need to resist the easy opportunity for a pump-and-dump, and think more seriously about sex and marital commitment. Or else, make it clear to her that she should move on. If a man screws her up, and then dumps her, then afterward, she is defiled in the eyes of any future suitor (i.e. Alpha Widow syndrome).

A third problem is when a woman becomes so defiled by previous (sexual) relationships, that recalcitrant men refuse to marry her. This is the biggest challenge to young Christian woman – to resist the urge to merge with any particular man who turns her headlights on.

A fourth issue arises when men have no power, because they are clueless about how to create a Tingly emotional response in women. Developing visceral power is the biggest challenge to young Christian men, as Churchianity has basically castrated their sexual potential and forced them to submit to the Courtly Love model. As a result, women have a much smaller pool of Tingle-inducing men available to choose from, and those few men who remain "sexually visible" to females are more likely to resort to p*ssy plundering and thereby mass produce defiled Alpha Widows.

In view of the above issues, much of the success of a Tingly Respect courtship, in terms of it leading towards a satisfying marriage, is largely dependent on practicing self-control (especially for the female), and self-development (especially for the male).

Knowing human nature, Lexet's statement is probably true.

> "[The successful implementation of the Tingly Respect model] can only work in a Christian environment, or in a culture influenced by Biblical Christianity, and not churchianity."

Value Harassment Training

Jack · 12 October 2018 · Archived copy · Original

What kind of workplace environment are we creating?

Readership: All
Length: 1,000 words
Reading Time: 6 minutes

Introduction

This post reviews some articles discussing sexual harassment training, and how the narratives contained within stand in diametric opposition to Christian values and the Tingly Respect courtship model.

This post reviews the following articles.

1. BBC Capital (Claire Lampen): Why Sexual Harassment Training Doesn't Work (2017/11/22)
2. Inc. (Marcel Schwantes): Yes, We Can Defeat Sexual Harassment in the Workplace. Here Are 6 Powerful Ways to Do It (2017/12/11)
3. Biblical Gender Roles: Do Christian Values Cause Sexual Harassment? (2017/12/16)
4. Sigma Frame: Meretricious Power and the Tingle (2018/10/9)

Lampen's Article

The first post laments the lack of effectiveness shown by training sessions designed to end sexual harassment in the workplace. The article cites studies, one by Lipnic, reporting the carelessness of the employees, and the awkwardness of the legal mumbo jumbo as supporting reasons.

> "People are kind of cynical about it," Lipnic says, comparing such training to an episode of TV show The Office. "People are kind of rolling their eyes… they're watching the clock and trying to get through it because they've got to get back to work."

Also in this article, Eden King, an associate professor of psychology at Texas' Rice University, lists the following four values, labels them as false, and claims that they actually lead to the sexual harassment of women.

1. "A belief that women are inferior to men"
2. "The belief that men should have power over women"
3. "Men should be aggressors"
4. "Women should be gatekeepers"

King labels the first value with the adjective "inferior" to describe women, and the label "aggressor" to describe men. That's quite a twist of "toxic masculinity" spin on these values.

King and Lipnic suggest that sexual harassment training is more effective "in person". [Sounds exciting!]

> "Perspective exercises, like imagining oneself or a loved one on the receiving end of an unwanted touch, for example, encourage empathy…"

Yes, make it an emotional experience, and make it thoroughly embarrassing so that no one will forget it. That will teach those conservative Christians falsely presumed to be perverted, ham fisted thugs to detest the training even more, while reminding them to keep their Gamma hands to themselves!

These professionals actually suggest that the executive and middle managers should start playing the Name and Shame Game.

> "If the leaders themselves act as allies, if they engage in behaviours that call attention to inappropriate behaviour… that can create a norm that that's what we do in our organisation," King says, adding that the presence of senior managers — whom we know to be just as likely to be perpetrators or as capable of offense as anyone else — might also win respect from the more likely culprits, who wouldn't take much away from a video presentation but might be more inclined to listen to an authority figure."

That line in boldface says, "We SJW's value conservative hypocritical bigots, as long as they're supporting our narrative and sealing our grip on power. We Feminists value upper level managers even more, simply because they're jacked and loaded."

> "With those offenders in mind, among the most important things training can communicate, Lipnic says, is: "This is not trying to change your mind, this is telling you how to keep your job."

The message is clear: Don the psychological strait jacket. Conform or die!

Schwantes' Article

In the second article on Inc. listed above, the author takes King's assessment a step further by calling these four values "toxic" ways of thinking, and concluded that the fight against sexual harassment is "about deconstructing false values embedded in toxic systemic thinking".

"Toxic thinking" – That's exactly what they are doing by labeling traditional values as "false". They are projecting their own spiel onto others.

The methods suggested include these six, followed by a RP interpretation.

1. Promote more women into leadership positions. [Just because they're women? Isn't that sexual discrimination?]
2. Make sexual harassment training mandatory for every leader. [We can't leave them out, because they're the hawties with the cash to fork over after being accused of anything inappropriate.]
3. Create a culture of intervention. [#MeT00 wants to get our hands on you! Not the other way around.]
4. Return to values. [But not those values!]
5. Creating a culture of openness. [Like post-#MeT00 open.]
6. Fight against gender bias on all fronts. [Wasn't the gender wage gap refuted years ago?]

The reader will note that all of these approaches will have the opposite effect as what women truly desire. Just give it some time there.

A Based View

In the third post, Biblical Gender Roles did a take-down of the aforementioned claims that these four values are false and toxic, by showing that they are actually rooted in Christian values! If you are a Christian who is being forced to take a course in sexual harassment training, then this is worth reading.

Finally, one of the conclusions of my last post (number 4 above) was this…

> "…much of the success of a Tingly Respect courtship, in terms of it leading towards a satisfying marriage, is largely dependent on practicing self-control (especially for the female), and self-development (especially for the male)."

On reviewing the article from BGR, it occurred to me that men pursuing self-development requires self-determination and initiative, which falls right in line with value 2 concerning power, and value 3 about men being "aggressors". Also, women practicing self-control is exactly what "gatekeeping is all about".

That's 3 out of 4. I'm waking up now, but I'm still not W0ke!

Conclusions

In conclusion, these training philosophies not only contradict Christian precepts, as BGR elucidated, but they also undermine the requirements for preserving the more successful and relatively God-honoring Tingly Respect model of courtship, especially during its fragile formative stages.

In other words, the attack on traditional values posed by sexual harassment training is not only anti-Christian, but it is also anti-Tingle (so to speak), and (ultimately) anti-family-formation.

Is anyone surprised?

Feminists might believe this poses no trouble for them, because they can claim sexual harassment against any typical Joe who looks at them longer than 20 milliseconds, but they can still accept improper advances from hawt upper management chads for a few weeks or months before blowing the whistle on them. But in the wake of #MeT00, anything on the topic of sexual harassment only adds fuel to the flame of male burnout.

The Blue Pill, Feminism, and Sin

Jack · 16 October 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Feminism, and most of the Blue Pill, is SIN!

Readership: All

Recently, Rollo wrote about Blue Pill Trauma (August 1, 2018) – the experience of being so hopelessly lost in Blue Pill conditioning, the indoctrinated self-incrimination, and the simultaneous (and contradictory) sense of self-righteousness – that it drives their nature to vehemently fight tooth and nail against the Red Pill truth.

Why so serious? Because… Sin ye, all ye sin! Thou shalt not dismantle mine precious sin!

I gave the following speech about "Sin" to a mostly Christian audience on Thursday, September 13, 2018. Since I wrote this speech, I pondered the subject further, and couldn't help but see how Feminism, and much of the Blue Pill mentality, is nothing more than a bastion of sin.

Following further introspection, I made some connections to Feminism and modern culture, and added these points to the speech. In the following essay, my speech is displayed in blue font, and my RP comments follow in black font.

Welcome to the show!

Tonight, I will pose the question: What is sin?

The idea of Sin is one of those concepts that is shrouded in a lot of confusion. Christians hear this word often, but they don't really know what it means. They think they do, but not really.

So what is sin?

Sin is when you don't want to accept reality. You're always trying to change your reality into what you want it to be.

You always have the opinion that you're right, and other people are wrong, and you might even have the habit of saying so. Your deceitful heart resorts to various defense mechanisms in an effort to protect your thoughts and ego from the vicious assaults of the truth. You're relying on a wide assortment of tricks, lies, deception, slandering, stealing, killing, and so on, all done in an effort to change the world according to your comfort and liking – that's sin.

Sin can be interpreted from a holy, or unholy view, depending on whether one is really pursuing God's truth or not. That is to say, from a holy perspective, anyone who indulges in solipsistic, self-centered sin is a sinner, while from the sinners perspective, anyone who upsets their own fantasy world is a "sinner". Here, defense mechanisms abound, exacerbating the confusion. And so, a war erupts between different factions, based on their variations of what they consider to be "truth".

> "And almost all things be cleansed in blood by the law; and without shedding of blood remission of sins is not made." ~ Hebrews 9:22 (WYC)

Today, we see the "shedding of blood for the remission of sin" in the form of terrorist bombings, suicides, assassinations, politically motivated violence (e.g. Antifa), martyrdom of Christians around the world, and especially the sacrifice of abortion. All these things are committed in an effort to defend and advance the perpetrators sinful world view, and reduce the subjective abrasiveness of reality. At the same time, it increases the corruption of offenses that cause the faithful to stumble.

One prominent example of this dynamic of sin is the "planning" aspect of Planned Parenthood. Young wimminz want to ride the carousel, and they don't want to marry and have children ("yet", so they say), so they sacrifice their sexual purity, their honor, their unborn children, and with them, their opportunities to start a happy family, all in order to control their own lives, and fulfill their own will about how they think their life should turn out.

Of course, it never turns out exactly as they imagine, and that is the deception of Satan. The strategy of Satan (their god) is to forbid that they should ever offer their bodies to inspire and motivate a husband or their reproductive ability to produce Godly children. For the family to be destroyed, such noble purposes must be calumniated, as they currently are.

[Eds. note: So far, my Red Pilled readers may have picked up on the point of this essay – that the lies of Feminism, the Blue Pill, and much of the Purple Pill, the convalescent legal system of the west, and the convergence of the Church, are the steel reinforcement for the expression of the sinful nature.]

Most people experience their sinful nature as frustration, or "quiet desperation". They want something, but they can't get it.

This completely sums up the life experience of both the typical Blue Pilled incel, and the post-wall Feminist. The Blue Pill conditioning creates a shroud that surrounds and blinds the male since early in life, and he cannot see past it. This experience of guilt and frustration catches up with "Liberated" women about a decade later, when they become a widowed victim of their own Hypergamous Addiction to Choosing.

If a person were sufficiently determined and diabolical, he/she could probably find a way to fulfill his/her desire, but at some point along the way, guilt kicks in, and he/she stops in his/her tracks thinking, "This is wrong. I can't do this." Various people have different thresholds for how much guilt they can endure. It seems that the wide variance in the tolerance for hell is a quality that sets people apart from each other.

The tolerance for hell and self-deception is also something that can be conditioned into a person from education and cultural norms, as well as a converged, Churched-up, Feminist doctrine. This is basically what has happened over the last 40+ years since the sexual revolution. People have developed a taste for indulging their personal sin-fetishes, and a tolerance for guilt.

Christianity is basically a guilt based ethical system. If a person feels guilty after doing wrong things in his efforts to fulfill his particular preferences, then that is God's way of saying, "This is not who you are. You're better than this." So through our guilt, God calls us to change our life strategy. In Christian parlance, this is called "repentance".

But if a person is doing everything according to their feral liking, and they are successful at that, and they don't feel guilty about any of their offensive methods or techniques of forcing their will onto others to get the job done, then they are really going to hell.

The rationalization hamster, as well as various defense mechanisms, have a way of accounting for any feelings of guilt.

> "…hate speech is acceptable provided it's aimed at what feminists decide is the 'right' demographic."

The 'right' speech and demographic is whatever aligns with, and supports, their self-centered sinful predilections.

Although everyone has this inclination, God condemns it as evil. It is evil because you are basically requiring other people, and perhaps even God Himself, and all of creation to submit to your will. You set yourself up as the ruler of reality, and as the judge of all that transpires. This is essentially a rebellion against God's will.

Feminists and SJW's have a regular pattern of resorting to violence, rage, and dishonesty, all efforts to force others to conform to their narrative of truth.

Even if you don't actually do anything to cause others to follow your will, you still have the desire for them to do so. Your nature is no different. Either you don't have the ability or opportunity to make things your way, or else you are just wasting a lot of energy to act contrary to your nature, which is basically lying, because you are not being your true self.

A lot of Christians fall into this trap of denial, thinking that they are being "righteous", simply because they do not act out the feral inclinations of the flesh.

When we face the truth, the first thing we perceive is that nothing is the way that we want it to be. That introduces the elements of suffering – we have to live in a situation where nothing is as we wish. We have to be patient. We have to forgive people. We have to accept other people's shortcomings. Yet, we still need to do something to contribute. But what we contribute is not what makes us valuable and worthy in God's eyes.

A lot of people think that our "work" is what makes us good. They think, "if we do good things we will go to heaven, and if we do bad things we will go to hell". But that is only part of the story, and certainly not the main point. To be declared righteous in God's eyes, you have to get to the root of the problem. You have to face the fact that you are sinful. You have to face the fact that you want to change everything to be as you want it to be. Then, you need to depend on God to make things right by faith.

SJW's always talk about being offended, but they are the ones who are primarily creating offense through their alternative reality. Their "offensiveness" only serves to draw others into sin. For example, angry Feminists draw men into sin when they gain weight, hatchet chop their hair, and dye their hair strange colors.

A normal man's reaction will be, "No, I don't want women to be fat, or have short, blue hair! I cannot accept this reality! I must do something – anything – to change this reality!"

Now enter the 'perfect' sex dolls… Oh luscious silicone aphrodite! Fulfillest thou mine sin!

But then Feminists are angry that men have access to sex dolls, and bring further judgment upon them. Sin compounds sin.

The problem is not that everything is wrong and that you cannot change it without doing something bad. No, the problem is that you cannot accept the fact that everything is wrong, and you're doing (or want to do) all kinds of wrong things in an effort to make it according to what you think is right, according to your self-centered opinion, which is not actually right.

So when we come to Jesus, we just say,

> "God, I don't like anything the way it is, I want to change everything according to my liking… and this is the problem. Not that I can't change everything to my liking, but the fact that I can't swallow my pride and accept the truth of being helpless and in a state of need – that's the real problem. Please show me Your will."

Feminists have been trying to bend the social structure to their liking all along. But because of their rebellion, the western, Christian, white male is facing this state of sin more and more. Unfortunately (I suppose), Christianity, whiteness, and being male will never qualify as “intersectional disadvantages” under the current regime. But that, you see, would be buying into their argument.

So when we begin to accept the truth, then we have to suffer because things are not the way we want. Actually, we have been suffering all along, but this is the moment when we stop resisting it and denying it, and begin to accept our suffering as a path to a new life.

Those men who resist prostitution, or the trappings of the sex doll, will either go MGTOW, or will be forced to search for a wife-worthy woman elsewhere, maybe even abroad. Such men are destined to sacrifice and suffer, but they’ll also find a new and better life.

God has a purpose for us in this suffering, and that is to build character in us. Character gives us the vision to see beyond our selfish preferences. It gives us the ability to say,

> “I’m not going to do things the wrong way. I’m not going to do things the way I want. I’m going to do things the right way, God’s way, even if it doesn’t lead to the outcome I want. I will do what is right, even if it hurts me.”

And when you begin to think this way, then that frees you from the bondage to sin, which is basically just the habit of serving your self-centeredness (and Satan), and it puts you in alliance with God. You stop resorting to your old ways of lying, stealing, deception, and so on. That’s also when you become righteous, because people will know that you will do the right thing, even if it hurts you. Only when you are willing to sacrifice, then people can trust you, respect you, and even fear you. People will begin to like you (or hate you) for that reason, and that sets us free from all those bad ways of thinking and doing things.

Case in point: MGTOW’s all make a personal sacrifice by abandoning females and Feminist society’s rules. Even though MGTOW’s only comprise a small segment of the male population, their sacrifice has struck fear in the hearts of all women everywhere.

The thing that a lot of people really don’t like about Christianity, is that (1) it does not provide a solution to satisfy the sinful nature, which is merely your being bent on getting what you want. If that were not disappointing enough, (2) it frames and embraces suffering as a character-building coping mechanism.

It is possible to get what you want out of God, but not in the way you think. He will satisfy the desires of your heart.

Personally, I could never find contentment as a white Christian male in the U.S. It wasn't until I went to Asia that I found satisfying relations with women, a new life, a wife and children, and eventually, a new purpose for living, contentment and joy.

Every man is different. Find out what you need to do, to escape the traps of your own predilections and predetermined asservations, and to find a new life in Christ.

A Tribute to Matthew, AKA "Zippy Catholic"

Jack · 18 October 2018 · Archived copy · Original

A collection of various testimonies concerning the influence of Zippy Catholic.

Readership: All

Zippy Catholic was the first Christian Manosphere blog that I discovered. So I must thank him for introducing me to the RP sphere. His work stands out in my mind as being perhaps the first gut-honest blog that really spoke to my heart as a Christian man facing the evils of a reviled western society.

It's been exactly one month since our beloved brother in Christ, Matthew (the author of Zippy Catholic), passed from this world. During this time, there have been sweeping changes in this corner of the web. Scott is back. Roosh shuttered Return of Kings. Jason closed down Air Strip One. Dark Brightness had a Trojan (or something similar) that forced him to restart his blog on another server. Lexet decided to expand further into RP topics. There's a whole lot of shaking going on.

My tribute to Matthew cannot properly be in the form of a eulogy (since I did not know him personally), but instead, I have taken the time to compile a list of all the other articles that have been posted in his memory over the past month.* I hope my readers would savor reviewing these articles as much as I have, as we grieve his loss together.

Please continue to keep his family in your prayers.

Rest in peace, brother!

Dark Brightness Returns In Times Like These

Jack · 20 October 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Announcing the return of Dark Brightness on two weblog platforms.

Readership: All

Dark Brightness has been experiencing technical and political difficulties with his blog for at least the past six months. I wrote about this situation in an earlier post, Notice: Dark Brightness Relocates (June 7, 2018), and I included a prayer at the end.

> "If you're the type who prays, you might consider asking for DB's blog and livelihood to be preserved, and even that it might grow as a result of this persecution."

Now, we are seeing this prayer being answered! Dark Brightness has a new blog up now. The address is:

http://darkbrightness.nz/

His new site is called "In Times Like These", and the title is eponymous of the Foo Fighters song of the same name.

In parallel, he is changing webhosts and trying to resurrect the old site. To do so, he needs to transfer his previous blog to a different platform, and that will take another week or so. He is using the Ghost program, and he needs to modify everything. He requests anyone who knows how to use Ghost to contact him or post a link to a tutorial.

Even after DB repairs his old site, he intends to maintain two blogs. I am not sure if these will include two different subject materials, or aim for two different audiences. I am guessing that his designated purposes for each one will evolve soon.

Back in June, Dark Brightness moved from an older set up. You may need to check your subscription linkage to make sure you're up to date.

The Feminine Dilemma

Jack · 27 October 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Women must choose between two different life paths, and two different kinds of men.

Readership: All

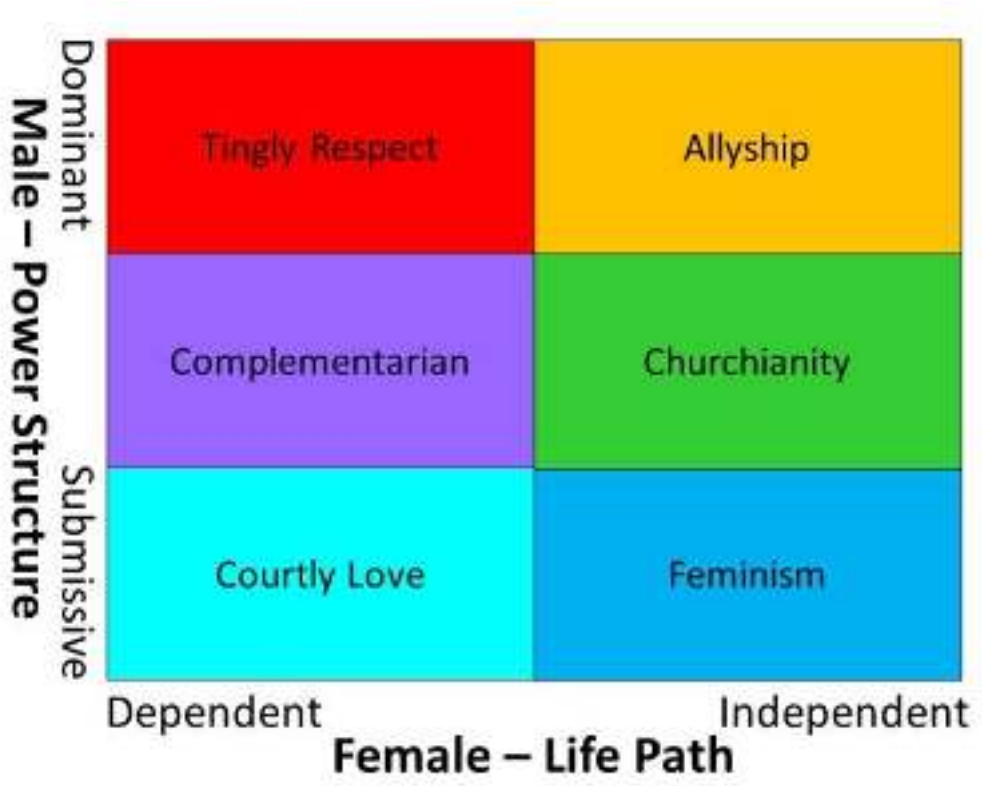
Introduction

Rollo's socio-sexual inventory ratings of SMV and MMV are based on a person's desirability in the SMP. This post will take a step away from this commonly used analysis, and embrace Visceral Power and Choice of Lifestyle as fundamental stances which affect the interplay and outcome of a relationship. These two variables may be ascertained through objective tests (to be developed), or projective measures.

The following relationship ontologies are ridiculously broad, and certainly have many exceptions. However, the characterization is readily apparent, and therefore sufficient to develop the descriptive, prototype model discussed in an earlier post, Models of Courtship and Marital Structure (October 3, 2018). References to the Courtly Love and the Tingly Respect models will be made throughout this essay, so if the reader is unfamiliar with these courtship models, he/she should first review this post.

The Dyadic Feminine Dilemma

The following illustration depicts the female's Life Path on the abscissa, and the Power Structure exercised by the male on the ordinate. Please refer to this figure as an aide to help visualize the descriptions that follow.



Her Life Path

Concerning their path in life, there are generally two types of women.

- She is either pining for love and hoping for a husband and children, or she is seeking to advance her own interests, pursue her dreams, and/or develop a career.

- She is either attempting to make herself more feminine, family oriented, industrious, and desirable, or she is looking to travel, meet many people, see the world, and get “experience”.
- She is either seeking to serve others, or else seeking to serve herself.
- She is either hoping and/or learning to be a happy help-mate, or else she is working herself towards a position of autonomy and independence.

As a woman advances down either path, it becomes more difficult to change to the other path as life goes on. However, it is considerably easier for a woman to make no effort at all, and for the vast majority of women not abundantly blessed with good breeding, this choice defaults to the independent lifestyle. Thus, a woman must prepare herself to build a satisfying LTR with a man.

What Determines Her Life Path?

Women may or may not be aware of it, but they choose the path they take in life. Early in life, I would guess during or shortly after puberty, females are faced with a dilemma of choice. Their choice is largely determined by a myriad of factors.

- Agreeableness: Less agreeable → more independent
- A pattern of being either pursued or rejected by males: more rejection → more independent
- Education: In general, more education → more independent
- Emotional Constitution: stronger constitution → more independent
- Life Experiences: Complicated and nuanced
- Personality: More extroverted, more rational → more independent
- SMV/MMV: (Relation is complicated, but in general, a higher SMV/MMV → more opportunities to form relationships are available)
- Strength of Libido: A weaker libido is thought to be associated with more independence.
- Temperament: more distemper → more independent
- Testosterone level: more T → more independent
- The presence of an authoritative and loving father: less father figure involvement → more independent

I suspect that there are many other qualities that could affect one’s propensity towards independence, such as one’s level of intelligence, neuroticism, personality disorders, socialization habits, cultural norms, and identification within a peer group. So these personal characteristics will remain as an ongoing investigation

This is quite a comprehensive gestalt of many divergent characteristics, but here we’re talking about a person’s natural inclination or general preference.

If a woman decides against independence in favor of having a male partner in any capacity, she must then choose which power structure she wishes to have in her relationship. So here we come to the second choice that women must consider.

Her Choice of a Man

Concerning the type of male partner that a woman could choose from, a typical woman will find that she has a choice between two basic types of men.

1. Men who possess an equitable or lower SMV/MMV compared to hers, and who are generally more willing to go through a formal courtship and offer long term commitment. These men are typically labeled “Betas”. The vast majority of regular church-going men would also fall into this category.
2. Men who possess a higher SMV than hers, and/or who can induce Tingles. These men are presumed to be Alphas, or “worldly men”, and they would probably be much more reluctant to marry her.

A woman will be able to attract a larger number of men who have an equitable MMV or lower (the first group), and likewise, she will also receive a significantly larger number of marriage proposals from these men, compared to higher SMV men.

Correspondingly, she will not find access to commitment from very many men in the second group, men who have the ability to exert visceral power over her. So in summary, she will have a much greater selection of choice within the first group, however these choices may not strongly appeal to her liking.

Lexet disagreed with me on this point, arguing that the relatively lower propinquity of such men, and women's general disinterest in such types, invariably leads to an attrition of volume. So perhaps another way to approach this decision is in asking what type of man will she choose? (This is the fundamental dilemma explored in this post.) In the most simplistic form (within the visceral power based ontology here entertained), a woman is faced with two options:

1. If a woman seeks to consolidate power and control over a relationship with a passive, agreeable man of lower SMV (Beta), or if she simply 'settles' for this type of man, she is adhering to the Courtly Love model.
2. If a woman chooses to submit to a man's authority, or if she just happens to set her thighs on an assertive, higher SMV, Tingle-inducing man (Alpha) and becomes enslaved to her passion for him, she is opting for the Tingly Respect model.

As you might see, this dichotomy boils down to the simple choice, "To Tingle, or not to Tingle". It might be argued that there is a third choice, "To Tingle intensely during peak SMV years (while riding the carousel), and then not at all (during marriage)". This is actually a very popular choice these days. Certainly, women may or may not choose to date and sexually entertain men of either or both types before marriage, but her longitudinal relational pattern will determine what types of men will be available to her at the time she decides to marry. In other words, a woman will fall either one way or the other. The vast majority of women will find that the third choice is nothing more than a convoluted and dissipating path to the first choice. This view will be further explored later in this essay.

We might anticipate some objections from women at this point. Women will invariably argue against the concept of female submission when the Tingles are absent, and so women will magnify this caveat as a fault of the Tingly Respect model. But on the other hand, women will hardly ever chafe at the task of submitting to a high-SMV, Tingle-inducing stud. So it can be assumed that a woman's choice to submit is highly tentative on the visceral power of the male. In other words, a female's submission is inherently conflated with, and wholly dependent on masculine power within the Tingly Respect model. If and when the Tingle is absent, the relationship may very well default to the Courtly Love model, unless the woman can place her faith in God during the dry spells, and submit to the man out of obedience to God.

But whether there be Tingles or not, those women who resist submitting to a man's authority are left to wallow at the bottom of the graph. Here there are basically two genres of relational structures. Women who desire companionship must continually grapple for power in the relationship, while those women who can accept or prefer more independence fall into the Feminist category.

Combinations of Power Structure vs. Life Path

This section will examine each of the four extremes of the original chart, encompassing the Tingly Respect model, the Courtly Love model, Feminism, and a fourth, uncharted type of relationship, *Allyship.

This assertion that either the male, or the female, but not both, hold a place of power in the relationship agrees with Rollo's Cardinal Rule of sexual strategies:

> "For one gender's sexual strategy to succeed, the other gender must compromise or abandon their own."

It will be shown that a woman's willingness to submit, and to be a help meet, is a reflexive critical Factor in determining her life path.

Dependent Female + Dominant Male = The Tingly Respect model

Since a woman forfeits the position of power upon entering into the Tingly Respect model, pulling off a successful venture in snagging a Tingle-inducing, high SMV man for marriage can be a challenging feat for most women. She needs to have/do the following.

1. Self Development: A woman needs to have a firm command of several qualities of excellence just to get her foot in the door. This is important, because the type of man she can attract in marriage is directly dependent on the current level of her character development.
2. Self-Estimation: She needs to have a real-time feedback mechanism built into her self-consciousness, so that she can exercise personal boundaries, which can be used to accurately assess the quality of man that she can reasonably assume to receive a marriage proposal from, and adjust her own self-perception accordingly.
3. Socio-Sexual Awareness: She needs to clearly know the difference between her SMV and her MMV, and use this knowledge to achieve her lifelong relationship goal.
4. Social Estimation: She should be acutely aware of the interest level, and the type of interest, she gets from men, and use this information to identify her true MMV, and learn to regulate her expectations and/or her character accordingly.
5. Recognize Authority: She needs to accept the fact that the man will expect to be the head, and that she will need to submissively fill the role of his helper and life companion.
6. Dignity: She needs to learn how to offer honor, respect, and genuine friendship to a man in a way that he will appreciate.
7. Sexual Purity: She needs to preserve her sexual purity, so that she can avoid being Alpha Widowed, and will thus be able to bond with, and feel genuinely aroused by a man who is on par with her own SMV.

Now, what happens to many women these days, is that at first, they pursue the Tingly Respect model. However, somewhere along the way, they run into some problems (corresponding to the list above) and drop the ball. See this list from Deti for more.
