In the end, I received no credit for paying off the mortgage. My ex-wife wanted all her "separate" money back, but she only got 1/10th of what she wanted because the rest was commingle with marital funds. My ex-wife had spent all her "separate" money and/or deposited it in hidden accounts (that we could not prove). She got half of my retirement contributions during marriage. I got half of hers, but the amount was intentionally small, given that she stopped contributing at some point.

During the divorce, she refused to work more than about half-time. We make an identical pay rate per hour, but I make almost double the income because I work full-time (plus overtime that was imputed to me). Because of this "apparent difference in income," my ex-wife was awarded $500K in child support. Note that in my state, there is no modification to child support based on 50/50 shared parenting. Instead, it is calculated as if the person with lower income has sole custody, but with a double-whammy of a wrinkle – that is I was also ordered to pay for children's expenses while they are with me 50% of the time.

Despite the fact that most of her scams worked, my ex-wife is now extremely angry about having any job at all and about the custody arrangement. She says that "she lost" and thinks it is horrible. Just after "losing" the custody "battle," she began a campaign of parental alienation. She has convinced at least eight families in the community to forbid their children from spending time with my children on my parenting time. This is especially difficult for the children because my ex-wife schedules nearly 100% of their free time with those children on her parenting time in an attempt to strengthen the relationships between those children and my children. This charade is obvious to the children because their friends tell them that their parents told them to stay away from my children on my parenting time. There are psychological problems brewing in this picture.

While some might mistake my ex of being a poor little woman who deserves all the financial help she can get, note that she made more money than me for the majority of the marriage (even though she worked part-time) because she is a high-powered attorney with a diamond-studded academic pedigree. Her full-time income is above $200K/year. Now, one can see the source of the so-called "wage gap." It simply reflects the choices of middle-to-upper income women who unilaterally choose to work far less than full-time in order to win sole custody of their children and maximize their children support (a.k.a. "alimony").

It was crucial in my case that the Judge awarded 50/50 shared parenting in temporary orders. The following two years demonstrated that the parenting time was wonderful for the children, making a permanent order very easy. Without 50/50 on a temporary basis, one could have argued that 50/50 on a permanent basis would have been a "change" of the temporary parenting time arrangement, and courts generally don't like to impose change on children.

Perhaps most important, if my state had a legal presumption of 50/50 shared parenting, then I think that my ex-wife would not have battled for so long, at outrageous expense to the children. She always told me what she learned in law school: there is no justice, fairness, morality, or ethics in law, there is only what you can get up to the limit of the extremes of the law. There was no law that presumed shared parenting, so she pushed all she could. In the end, she lost, and the kids won (minus a few hundred thousand dollars that was going to pay for their college).

Finally, I understand that my story of my kids now having 50/50 shared parenting sounds like a fairy tale to most children of divorce. The vast majority of such children are only allowed to see their father four days a month. Without fathers in their lives, the outcomes for these children are dismal. A legal presumption of 50/50 shared parenting would save these children.

There are few things more pernicious than to continually use someone's love for their children to beat them (literally) into submission. While my story does not contain bruises or broken bones, it contains something far worse – years of intentional psychological abuse that enforced a hierarchy of power through the continuous exercise of terror.

When it came time to plead with the Judge that my ex-wife should be expected to have a full-time job instead of a part-time job, the Judge responded by saying that I had accepted the fact that my ex-wife would only work half-time for the rest of her life because I "allowed" her to do that during marriage. If I really did not want it that way, then I would have filed for divorce (and ripped apart an intact family for my children). Imagine a woman being told, "Well, he beat you during marriage, and you did not divorce him. Therefore, you enjoy beatings. Now, I shall order that you be beaten for the rest of your life after divorce."

Straight from the horse's or rather an attorney's mouth: "There is no justice, fairness, morality, or ethics in law, there is only what you can get up to the limit of the extremes of the law." Dirk, thank you for sharing your story. I am delighted for both you and your children that you have shared custody. Thank you also, for the very important advice to other father's fighting to get 50/50 temporary custody.

Cyberviolence—Canadian government allocates $1.1M for women & girls, ZERO for men & boys

Attila L. Vinczer · 9 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Kellie Leich-Status of Women Minister
Kellie Leitch, Status of Women Minister, announced that $1.1 million has been allocated to fund eight programs dealing with cyberviolence against women and girls. Last month, another $25 million was committed over a five-year period to combat violence against Aboriginal women and girls. No funding has been committed to address cyberviolence against men and boys, who are just as susceptible as being victims as women and girls.

There has been a lot of heightened attention to cyberviolence since Rehtaeh Parsons committed suicide after being bullied on the Internet. According to research led by Dr. Sarah Pedersen in the UK, boys are more subject to cyberbullying—so it's not just a girls' thing: "In the sample more adolescent males admitted to both having been bullied (68 percent) and carrying out bullying behaviour on-line (50 percent) compared to adolescent females (percent and 49 and 33 percent respectively)."

During the Toronto DV Symposium this past June in Toronto, PhDs and scholars discussed the lack of attention to issues such as domestic violence as it affects men and boys. Professor Martin S. Fiebert, the keynote speaker, asked that the mainstream media report the science: that men and women are equally responsible for domestic violence.

A common trend and norm that seems to be thriving is that only women and girls are victims, while men and boys are not. Instead, men and boys are routinely considered the problem. The office of the Honourable Kellie Leitch acknowledged that women can be just as culpable to violence as men. They also wondered why there is no minister and ministry for the status of men. The fact that eight men to two women commit suicide in Canada each day is another ignored issue facing men.

Clearly by the lack of program funding to combat violence against men and boys, the Government of Canada is interested in helping only female victims of cyber-violence while ignoring the needs of male victims.

Stop a Bully, a Canadian registered national charity founded by Trevor Knowlton in 2009, has published bullying statistics that show it is not just females who are bullied, but also males, according to a 2011 Ipsos Reid survey of 416 Canadian teenagers:

> – 1 in 5 Canadian teens have witnessed online bullying
> – 25% of kids between 12 and 15 have witnessed cyberbullying
> – 25% of girls and 17% of boys have witnessed online harassment
> – 51% of all teens have had a negative experience with social networking
> – 16% said someone posted an embarrassing photo of them
> – 12% said someone hacked their account

The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms forbids gender discrimination. Is the Government of Canada guilty of violating the Charter by not providing equal funding and protection against cyberviolence to males and females? Canadians should ask themselves, "Why are men and boys not treated equally to women and girls, where gender equality is the expected norm?"

KSU YESBody raises funds to protest KSUM conference

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 9 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A Student Life staff member stopped me today to hand me a couple of flyers quoting Paul Elam out of context that Student Life had to take down.

A KSU student organization called YESbody! started reading David Futrelle and started yet another source of dishonest punditry called MensRightsInfo. The blog states that both students and faculty are behind the blog, participating anonymously. However, they started a $500 GoFundMe fundraiser for a public demonstration during Male Students in Peril. Two of the donors include social justice academic Scott Ritchie and Interdisciplinary Studies Department Chair Robbie Lieberman. These two staff members were involved in attacks on KSUM with nothing but baseless accusations against my character in their arsenal.

YESbody! raised $325 by the time I saw the page. I immediately donated the remaining money with a comment.

As misguided as I think the protest is, I want free speech to prevail and prosper.

The protesters have been invited multiple times to come to the conference and participate in discussion. That said, I'm unsure why the protest is even necessary. The KSUM conference is about raising awareness for marginalized voices anyway, so by all means RSVP.

MensRightsInfo responded with the following post:

> In a post earlier today, we shared the gofundme link where we and the YESbody group on the Kennesaw State University campus are raising money for a "Peaceful Positive Protest" of the Men in Peril Conference to be held on the KSU campus on November 1. Though we easily raised $325 of our $500 goal in less than 24 hours, Sage Gerard of KSU Men took it upon himself to "make up the difference" and leave us this message.
> Please judge for yourself. Do his sentiments ring true? Is our peaceful protest opposing his free speech? Have we judged him and others based on a lack of evidence? Is his donation all in the name of good spirited disagreement and first amendment rights, or is it perhaps another bullying/harassment tactic meant to silence or shame those who disagree?

[image]

In what universe is me giving you money a bullying or harassment tactic? That question is so loaded that it would make for a particularly quick game of Rhetoric Roulette.

Let me make this perfectly clear: You have judged me and others based on a lack of evidence. Your introductory post makes unwarranted, loaded claims (emphasis mine):

> 1. This blog is anonymous for one reason: the Men's Rights Movement has an established record of harassing, intimidating, and otherwise threatening its detractors (we'll cover that in some posts later on). Our anonymity is not a signal that we feel we are doing anything wrong or harmful or a signal that we are afraid of anyone or anything, but rather a signal that those we are dealing with have a record of not engaging in rational discourse all that well and that we'd rather not get threatened with rape!

Oh, good grief.

> 2. The purpose of this blog is NOT to attack men. Let's say that again. The purpose of this blog is NOT to attack men, nor is it to minimize the real issues that affect men and boys. The purpose of this blog is to raise consciousness around the issues that are relevant to men and boys, and the methods and strategies currently > being used by the Men's Rights Movement so that individuals in and around the KSU community can more easily make an informed decision regarding those issues.

They can't make an informed decision if you cherry-pick content and twist context. Which you did.

If your blog makes for an informed decision, then date rape drugs makes for consensual sex. That's how intellectually dishonest your blog is. You hid under the blanket of anonymity with faculty and started making wild and unwarranted character allegations from a Tumblr blog.

"Informed," my ass.

> 3. (This is directed specifically to Men's Rights activists): All information posted to this blog is stored elsewhere, and any attempts to hack the blog, remove the information, etc. will only result in us creating the blog again (heck, maybe we'll even create it twice!). So please don't bother. We're just sharing information about your cause – so that should be a good thing, right?

Scott Ritchie filed a USG Hotline complaint against me with unwarranted character allegations, and Lieberman went behind my back to pull the ear of our current adviser. Neither of them have taken the time to speak to me about KSUM but have been keen to harass and demean with no thought or reason.

I am a marginalized man on campus who is not allowed to speak out. Why is that not in your blog? What happened to not minimizing the real issues men and boys face?

And not only that, but what about the women? You quote Paul out of context several times, but have you contacted the women of AVfM? The women of WomenAgainstFeminism? Why are women compassionate about men not on your blog if it is meant to be a source for men's issues?

> On another note, members of this group have expressed concerns over spending Sage's money on our protest. Wouldn't it be wonderful if we raised enough to pay for the event and donate the excess (at least $175) to local sexual violence resource groups?

You were at $325 when I saw your page, and I matched the difference. My contribution was not excess funds, so not using my money for the protest would be breaking the promise you made on the page. That is fraudulent. Are you sure you want to back out of a promise with someone extending an olive branch this early? Is that the example you are going to set.

Think, for God's sakes.

[image]

The passive aggression around my donation is, well, look at this contributor below. No one thought to say, "Hey, it's cool that someone with a different opinion is supporting your right to participate in the big discussion." No, instead it's "Sage and his buddies want to silence, oppress, shame and harass rape victims. Keep his money, but use my excess funds in the way you promised instead of his non-excess funds!"

[image]

Oh, what-EVER.

Well, since we are on the subject of victims, there is a disparity in representation and funding for men for IPV shelters. KSU doesn't have aggregate counseling services for men in the KSU Women's Resource and Interpersonal Violence Prevention Center. I heard about this Title IX problem straight from Assistant Dean Bob Maddox. Maybe you could contribute to that? I've already made a dent in that effort, and the administration mentioned including a men's center in late 2015, with KSUM volunteering in development.

And if you ever decide to go beyond local stuff, I have this list of Georgian centers related to domestic violence. Some of them serve only women (because equality, I guess?), and the only ones I've looked into that serve men don't actually shelter them. They just offer referral services to unnamed organizations that I've yet to find in the state. Maybe your research will be more fruitful and reassuring.

Or, if my money bothers you so much, then you can return it.

You won't, though.

I know you will spend the money to make yourselves look good in whatever way you please.

Because that's what this is about. Looking good.

When I was pushing for diversified gender studies literature, an equitable campus IPV center, an equitable self-defense program, feeding the homeless, and other issues that could reasonably be filed under "gender equality," you all were nowhere to be found.

I did work, and now you're trying to take the credit for the values I spent countless hours struggling to put on the map. Clearly to silence people like this guy.

It was only when I advocated looking at gender through a non-ideological lens did people start showing up to judge. It was only when KSUM members took a stand with humanitarian non-feminism did we start to see what this culture is really like: anti-male.

I have been subjected to many horrors as a marginalized voice on campus. Can you imagine how it feels seeing people like yourselves come out pretending to care about men while stepping on others in the process? This is not advocacy, it is hate disguised as love.

Just because I can see through the bullshit does not mean I am an unqualified activist. It is experience that tells me that you are not going to use that money out of compassion. Instead, you are going to donate that money to prove a point, and to attack hard-working people to co-opt virtues that don't belong to either you or me.

I lost a lot of money helping others. Often without thanks or support in return. Looks like that happened again. You took my money and denied me a respectful representation of my position.

I won't shut up, and I won't go away. I am a man who is open about his feelings, and who deserves an equal chance with my ideas. I have experienced first-hand what an emotionally honest man endures, and that is why the conference is on, and why the truth will go out.

Feminism got it wrong. Male students are in peril.

UPDATE: After meeting with the co-presidents of YESbody!, I learned that Menformation is not an official publication of YESbody! I have asked the co-presidents to make a statement clarifying their actual involvement, and suggested they distance themselves from those who make character allegations without all of the evidence. You can read what happened on a more recent article.

In His Own Words: Escaping an abusive marriage

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 10 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 10 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month. "Bruce Wayne" shares is story about a short-lived, but very abusive marriage in today's In His Own Words.

I had only been married for five months when I decided to separate from my wife.

After five months of near-daily mistreatment that included cuss-outs, name-calling, cruelty, unrealistic expectations, and threats, I initiated a separation from my wife. Five months of counseling saw no sign of improvement and little sign of empathy and after a year of separation, I decided to divorce her.

Two Becoming Done

I married the most beautiful woman I had ever laid eyes on. "This is the best day of my life," I journaled not long after the wedding (and before the wedding night no less!) This was the first marriage for both my wife and myself. She was 24, I was 27.

We started dating just over a year before the wedding and after two dates, I was hooked. We shared the same sense of humor, tastes, faith, and much more. Six months of dating passed before I proposed. We set a wedding date for six months after that. We didn't enter it completely naively. Five sessions of Christian premarital counseling and the broken marriages of both of our parents made sure we were not ignorant of the strains, stresses, and difficulty of making marriage work.

Trouble started almost immediately upon returning home from the honeymoon. My wife began to make me aware of deep dissatisfactions she felt with me as a husband. "I don't feel like you see me or notice me, or that you're interested in how I'm feeling," she said. She used words like 'absent' and 'disconnected'. These kinds of conversations became commonplace very quickly in our marriage.

I racked my brain trying to provide the best, most creative displays of love that I could. This included planning trips for her birthday, gifts, flowers, scheduling dates weeks in advance, pay special attention to words and touch, attending bible studies, morning prayer, spiritual conversations – everything you could imagine. Nothing stuck or seemed to count for anything.

The days that didn't contain such interactions were fantastic. Filled with love, laughter, food, and sex. These days kept me going, but eventually became part of a roller coaster with no end in sight.

The Abuse

One day, my wife randomly said to me, "I want you to know that if I ever lost you, I'd kill myself and I'm not joking." This was not done during a heated argument, or in a passionate moment of love and adoration. It was flat-lined, frank, and seemingly came out of nowhere. I was taken aback, and had no idea what to say.

Later that week (only 10 days after returning from the honeymoon!), my wife and I were in a movie theater discussing the film we just watched. It was a normal, friendly conversation in which she asked me about the storyline from the beginning of the film. I very nonchalantly told her that I thought she had remembered one key aspect of the story incorrectly. I thought it was a very friendly conversation and meant nothing by the comment, but she became irate, stood up and said, "I've never wanted to say this, but fuck you! I can't believe you'd say something like that to me, fuck you!" and stormed out of the theater.

Needless to say, I was floored, confused, and shaken up. Having no idea what had happened, I found her, attempted to talk about what had happened, and was met with complete unwillingness to discuss the situation for several days. I chalked it up to a strange misunderstanding, and went on.

By the end of the first month of marriage I had been irrationally cussed out, called a bitch, an asshole, and stubborn.

My attempts to talk, touch, and love were often the wrong thing at the wrong time, in the wrong way. There was no grey space for me to make a mistake. I either got it right and she adored me, or I missed the mark and she treated me like she hated me. It was like I had 2 seconds to read her mind, predict what the right thing to do was, and get it right and if I didn't, I would hear about it:

"You should be better at this husband thing by now!"

"All I need is some encouraging words, why can't you get that!?" (After I gave her touch.)

"Don't you know all I need is a hug right now!?" (After I tried encouraging words.)

In return I was told I was absent, disconnected, distant, and withdrawn. The accusations were unfounded and unending. The Christian counselors I was seeing were telling me I was over-sensitive and just needed to pray, have faith, and love her better. I believed something was wrong with me. That I was too nice and too emotional as a man, and not able to stand up to my wife or support her in the way women needed. I read four different books on loving women and being a better man who is grounded in the security and identity of his purpose (which for me is my Christian faith.) People told me these were "woman's issues", that every man deals with them.

My wife had gone from having conversations about the way she felt, to retreating to the bedroom and curling up in a fetal position. I would follow her to console her and attempt to comfort her, and the harsh criticisms continued. I journaled my thoughts and prayers extensively. I would lay awake at night and go to the living room to pray at 3 a.m. where I asked God for strength and perspective.

We rarely ever argued. Her rages were not sprung out of arguments reaching a boiling-point (as many assumed).

In addition to the one-on-one spiritual counseling I was receiving, I was seeking help from online communities I had found. Groups of men facing life battles and supporting one another by listening to experiences and giving frank advice on issues they see. I was uncovering things about myself I needed to work on. The importance of setting and respecting personal boundaries was another common theme, one that I had never thought of or considered, but one that clearly applied to me in every part of my life, not just my marriage.

As I began posting the experiences I was having with my wife, the men in the forum began to tell me that the irrational cuss-outs, ever-changing un-communicated expectations, and shaming language I was getting from my wife was not normal or based in the "Nice Guy" self-improvements being discussed in the forum. They'd ask me to follow-up with them and keep telling them what was going on in my marriage.

Boundaries

When I started talking about boundaries with my wife, and started enforcing them, things got worse and worse. These are things I was asking for: Name calling to stop, insults to stop, my opinions, needs, and desires to have equal value and consideration, help with the housework, etc. I told her that when she's upset I wouldn't follow her into the bedroom automatically any more because I felt I was on a leash. I told her I wanted to know how she was feeling and discuss any issues. I asked her to communicate when something was wrong and I'd be happy to talk or listen – but I wouldn't try to read her mind any more. Sometimes she seemingly received this and then backslid, other times I got more verbal lashings:

"You knew what you were getting into when you married me – I have an attitude, so what!?"

"If you do this (enforce the boundaries) it will get the to point where I never talk to you again."

"You think you're so great! You think you have it all figured out, like you're husband of the year or something. You're not."

I was afraid to tell people about what was going on because I didn't think they'd believe me. The hurt the Christian counselors were causing was so immense, I was afraid to bear it from anyone else. They were telling me I didn't have a grasp on reality, that this was all normal – marriage is hard, that I wasn't walking with the Lord, or being a man. They worked with the assumption that my wife and I were both hurting one another, that we were doing things against each other, and a little more humility, counseling, prayer, hard work, and faith would do the trick. They also assumed that 'it takes two to tango', and I was hurting my wife just as much as she was hurting me. This was simply not the case.

Breaking the Silence

I was quickly reaching my breaking point. The coldness, sarcastic trashing of my needs and desires, and cruel bullying that was going on was too much to handle. I made a solo appointment with a therapist soon thereafter. When I told the entire story you've just read he told me that nothing I was describing sounded normal to him– that he sees couples in physically abusive relationships that are more normal than what I'm describing. He told me I wasn't over-sensitive, that I was doing the right thing by approaching the situation as I was. He asked me to schedule a joint session with her and we finally got into one two weeks later.

In that session, with my wife present, I brought up everything. I expressed the hurt, confusion and fear. I spoke of wanting a change, hope, a direction– to work together. I never threatened to leave her in counseling or out of it.

My wife's response to all of that? She admitted to everything and at the same time expressed surprise that I was bothered by these things, and offered no remorse, no empathy, no desire to change anything. "I think [My Husband] lacks forgiveness and needs to work on that."

That was it.

The therapist asked us to agree to something: [Husband] can call a literal 'time out' when [Wife] gets angry and says hurtful things, and [Wife] must stop what she's doing and leave the room if necessary. In return, [Husband] must agree to discuss the topic at hand and schedule a time to talk and then follow through with that.

This is what happened during the 10 days following that session:

– I found out that in the past my wife had pulled a knife on her Dad in a moment of anger.

– She started bullying, threatening, and name-calling in even harsher ways:

– "You're so full of self-pity, like your life is so fucking hard," was one of the more hurtful things she said after I called a 'time out' in the middle of an angry tirade.

– "All I get from you is hatred, and I have felt hatred in my heart for you." This was particularly troubling as I haven't done anything remotely hateful to her.

– "If you know what's good for you, you'll do what I say."

After that chilling threat I removed the guns from my house. When she found that they were gone, she asked about them and I told her I didn't feel hate and guns mixed. I continued to refuse and one night she got up out of bed and said, "I can't sleep in the same room with you if you won't bring them back in." She left the room and slept on the couch.

The next day she got up early for work and didn't say goodbye. That morning I told the original premarital counselor what had happened, that I was afraid, and thought I needed to leave. This is what they told me:

"You'll be ruining a foundation of trust you're trying to build if you leave."

"You need to think about your vows Bruce, you need to think about the testimony of Christ."

*Note that there was no mention of the destruction of the trust that had already happened due to the abuse. No addressing of the sin, or the pain, or the awful circumstance. I went and talked to my friend at work and he encouraged me to leave. I went home, packed up, and started the separation from my wife.

That same day I spoke to my therapist and told him what had happened since I last saw him. He said he wouldn't try to talk me out of it, that it sounded to him like my wife may have some kind of mood or personality disorder.

As I mentioned at the beginning of this article, I decided to file for divorce a year after our separation. Though my wife began using remorseful language and showing emotion about the separation, she did several things that indicated to me that there was no true change happening:

– She contacted 7 different people and convinced them to confront me about 'overreacting' and separating. When I talked with these people and told them what had actually happened during the marriage, they were shocked and removed themselves from the situation. My wife wasn't telling people the truth about the situation, at least not with any specificity. This, I learned, is a common tactic of abusers called 'triangle-ing'.

– She wouldn't address the abuse with any specificity at all in therapy or out of it. She would say things like "I'm sorry I did things that were hurtful to you, and said things I shouldn't. I didn't need to hear apologies as much as I needed to know why abuse was happening and how we could work together to make sure it doesn't happen any more. There was never an attempt to meet those needs of mine.

– The same dynamic that happened in the marriage was happening during the separation: bullying, grabs at power, manipulation, confusion, etc.

During the marriage and separation, I never cussed-out, belittled, hit, or called my wife any derogatory name. I've been told that in most cases, both spouses become abusive– one in response to the other. People have said, "There's always two sides to the story!" or "It takes two to tango." In my situation that wasn't the case. After all of the counseling and therapy, the only specific thing my wife could point to about me was that I didn't give her enough eye contact. That's it.

In the midst of all of the pain from an abusive marriage and the road to divorce that followed, I have struggled with depression, anxiety, and bitterness. However, I have grown immensely and will continue to seek growth from my trials. I've learned a lot about love, faith, friends, and myself. I felt very alone during this situation and to my benefit I've met and spoken to many men who have experienced similar things in their marriages. Unfortunately, most have faced the same unfair scrutiny and turmoil that I have after confronting the abuse. I've started a blog at DVOWRD.com to try to help.

The bottom line is that you can't prat a personality disorder or abuse away. I'm glad you got out and got out before you had children with her, Bruce.

An open letter to Senator Kirsten Gillibrand

Gary Costanza · 10 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Dear Senator Gillibrand,

I bought a ticket to see you speak about your new book and other topics, along with Gloria Steinem at 92Y in NYC. I had all intentions of attending and trying to record what I could and, of course, try to FTSU (confront you with the facts), but in the end I decided since I wasn't allowed to record that I'd eat the ticket and cut my losses. But, oh, what I wanted to say!

I don't buy the premise of your book, Off the Sidelines: Raise Your Voice, Change the World, that women are discouraged from going into politics and that we need more female politicians. You and your cohorts Gloria Steinem and Hillary Clinton—who wrote the foreword to your book—say we need a "movement" to get women and girls "off the sidelines" and into politics. However, despite what you say, there are no more barriers to women running for office than there are for men, and when they do run they frequently win. Didn't you win your election to the Senate with a whopping 72% of the vote, a record?

Exactly why do we need more female politicians, anyway? Lest you be called a misogynist, our leaders, both male and female, cater to women's needs above all others. The election of more actual vaginas into office couldn't help women any more than already possible. Seems like the whole premise of your book is wrong, as well as your and Hillary's "women at all costs" platform.

We're hurtling headlong into a feminist matriarchy of gynocentric socialism where all matters are decided upon regarding their impact on girls and women. We're already seeing it. Men have no reproductive rights—as women do—yet the focus is now on the right to free contraceptives for women while men will still have to just keep it in their pants.

With Hillary poised to become president, you use victimhood rhetoric to tell America we need more women in office to help women, hoping to someday ride that feminist wave to the White House yourself. You talk about a "sticky floor" that supposedly keeps many women in low-paying jobs. Well, guess what, men also know what it's like to be stuck in low-paying jobs, and amazingly, they hate it too! The reality is that this "movement" to help women is just pushing more female-friendly programs and entitlements that men don't get, and it's not a matter of "women's voices not being heard." I hear that you and a group of 20 female senators get together and, I guess, "network" for women even further. So much for diversity.

With programs like VAWA, HeForShe, It's On Us, and Emily's List, how can you say that women's interests aren't being addressed? Supposed women's issues like affordable daycare and paid family medical leave are really people's issues that both men and women legislate and vote on. Mainstream feminists really don't have any more issues to be won (equal pay is not an issue).

If you really wanted to help women run for office in more numbers (isn't it embarrassing having an MHRA school you this way?):

- tell Gloria Steinem, NOW, and all the other mainstream feminist groups to stop opposing shared parenting laws so women would be less responsible for children and have more time for a political career, and
- tell women to ditch the hypergamy and encourage them to get a "househusband," take care of him and the children, and have the "dutiful wife" feminists joke they wish they had.

There was great publicity about the stories you told of being called "porky" and "chubby" by unnamed colleagues in the Senate. I suspect they're unnamed so you get victimhood status without fear of retaliation all without any proof. Not that it's not believable, actually I think it happened as you said, after all there are knuckleheads in all walks of life, but what didn't happen was you complaining about it and making a ruckus then and there. You know why you didn't complain? Because as an often foul-mouthed high-pressure attorney and senator, you obviously brushed it off and moved on, yet now you expect us to believe you were so thin-skinned that you didn't just brush it off and move on AS YOU DID! Foul-mouthed and thin-skinned doesn't jibe.

Did you know that your friend Gloria Steinem, honorary chair of the Democratic Socialists of America, thinks capitalism must be ended, yet has no problem selling books and charging for lectures?

From the DSA web site:

> Democratic Socialists believe that both the economy and society should be run democratically to meet human needs, not to make profits for a few.

Will Gloria donate all the profits from her books to charity?

(Crickets)

> As we are unlikely to see an immediate end to capitalism tomorrow, DSA fights for reforms today that will weaken the power of corporations and increase the power of working people.

How can Gloria weaken corporations when she writes books and makes money for them?

Sorry I missed a gathering of power-hungry hypocrites cheered on by brainwashed and bigoted people. I had to write this letter to make this known to you and the world, and to redeem myself for giving you any money at all.

Sincerely,

Gary Costanza

In His Own Words: Former male feminist abused by his Borderline Personality Disordered wife

It's day 11 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month 2014. In today's In His Own Words, "David" tells how is childhood programming and his mother's behavior groomed him into relationships with abusive women and feminism.

First, I want to say that I was under the illusion for a long time that I was a strong, very independent person who could do anything and take anything life threw at me. I moved from Europe to America on my own when I was 21 with a portfolio of drawings and a limited knowledge of the English language. I never feared anything. I know now that being so fearless and adventurous can be a mistake, particularly in relationships.

My first wife, a Canadian, was an alcoholic, and when we met a part of me wanted to rescue her, help her, "save" her. I felt like I understood her pain, and could relate. She had a tough, sarcastic, jaded exterior but I felt like deep inside her was a tender and loving heart. I became a perfect co-dependent for 8 years, and was also bullied, put down constantly until I asked for divorce and got it.

Of course she was angry. Part of the reason for asking for divorce was also that I could no longer stand to see her destroy herself deliberately, it was very painful. But because I felt responsible for her emotional and psychological well-being and because I still loved her, walking away from her was the most emotionally wrenching thing I ever did in my life. It felt like I was ripping my own heart out.

I had taken her to treatment centers 4 times in 8 years, saving her life each time. She died from alcoholism a year after our divorce. She had told me many times during our marriage that she did not want to live. When she verbally abused me, which was often, I thought that it was the alcohol talking, not her, and that's how I dealt with it for so long. When drunk, she became an insensitive bully, when sober she was shy and sensitive.

When I met my second wife, I was very vulnerable, as it was shortly after separating from my first wife, and I was still very unwise. One of the first things she told me was that she was very emotional. I didn't heed that warning. She wanted to get sexually intimate right away, and within a few days told me she loved me, which was shocking, but she said it in a way that meant that she was expecting the same from me (If you have ever seen the comedy "Love Stinks" you can visualize her behavior).

She was extremely passionate and intense, charming, extremely possessive, spiritual, creative, seemingly sensitive, very impulsive and bold, interesting, and felt lost in the world. I had never met anyone like her. She also told me that she had been horribly abused by her father and her exes, so I felt that from the onset it positioned her as the wounded, bleeding victim and forced me into the position of the nurturer, the one who was to be unconditionally understanding, supportive, patient, gentle and expected to accept her completely, no matter what, because she had been so terribly victimized by other males. Again, something in me sought to rescue and "save" her.

We had a very intense relationship from the beginning, with so many fights I would wake up not remembering if we were supposed to be mad at each other or not. There were also episodes of violence on her part, she would scream, throw and break things constantly (throw violent tantrums to get her way), throw hot coffee at me, throw an unopened can at my head (missing by an inch and denting the wall), punch me in the chest, etc.

I was never violent, I walked away. I took a month off from the relationship, we broke up repeatedly, and she would disappear and then call me from a hotel several days later expecting a groveling apology from me, and I obliged, because there was absolutely no rational conversation or negotiation possible with her: if I was to be with her I would have to totally embrace her version of reality, even when it was completely upside down, which was very often as she had defined herself as the eternal victim and would never take responsibility for her feelings and behaviors.

I soon felt like I was living under an emotional dictatorship and with an emotional tyrant. But I stayed, and even got bullied (very violent tantrums, emotional blackmail) into getting married after 4 years of living together. Strangely, I felt very sorry for her, and also responsible, and sought to help her with therapy. As with my first wife, I felt that I understood her emotional pain deep down and past all the garbage. I thought it was her past and her pain yelling.

I was going to my own therapist (long-term primal therapy) but my then wife talked me into additionally going to another therapist (more of a counselor) of her choice together, someone she had used before. I quickly understood that in her mind and that of the therapist, the aim would be to “fix” everything that was “wrong” with me. She was relentless, it was not “fixing” but complete demolition, essentially. The therapist was a woman, and I also got the strong feeling that she was afraid of my wife (no one could ignore her extreme intensity), so she would not challenge her in any way, or even ask me for my side of any experience. I was actually not allowed to offer my own perspective. It certainly did not feel right.

My own (primal) therapist advised me to leave in the middle of the night, as she was concerned for my physical safety. But I felt like I had a very special bond with my wife that nobody could ever understand…something like being “soul mates”. I did not know what to do. Again, I felt very responsible for her.

One day I brought up something (a form of abuse) to the counselor that my wife had explicitly warned me that she did not want me to talk about. Although she was doing her very best to control me and largely succeeding, I talked about it anyway. She stormed out of the session immediately like a mad person…and the therapist never confronted her on this in subsequent sessions. I stopped going soon after that, understanding that this therapist was not qualified.

Some therapists are afraid of their patients. I can’t blame that therapist in a way, my wife was dangerous, I learned later from her own daughter that she once crashed her car into her ex’s living room, because she was in a rage. Her daughter also said there was a restraining order from another ex, for stalking. I have never seen such concentrated hate and ability to totally distort reality in any other person, and apparently neither have her family, some mutual friends, her own friends, all of whom she deeply hurt in the same way, repeating the script of the victim.

I was mostly emotionally and psychologically abused for a long time, by someone who had succeeded at convincing me that everything was my fault, that I was to blame for the abuse I endured constantly, until one morning, when she woke me up screaming, insulting and abusing me for not having finished some renovation work on the house. It was the straw that broke the camel’s back, because of having been brutally awakened from deep sleep and not yet being fully cognizant of my daily conditioning (that I was to blame for everything, especially her moods). I finally understood that I had done nothing to deserve this.

After ten years of marriage a mutual friend (a woman as well, with a PhD in psychology) privately told me my wife was very abusive towards me and had severe BPD…This woman also told me repeatedly that she was very concerned for my safety, as she said my wife was very obsessed with me. She also said that my wife had told her and anyone she knew or met that I was the one abusing her, and even went to the police, but the police did not believe her. Neither did this friend, after seeing her behavior towards me.

Here is a small but concrete example of my wife (now ex) perverse behavior: I had a very loving cat that I was very attached to, and so was that cat to me, but it became temporarily ill. Although it was responding to treatment, my ex, apparently annoyed with the cat, took it to a vet without my knowledge while I was sleeping late one day and convinced him to put the cat to sleep. Then she called me from some neighbors’ house, pretending to be terrorized of coming home because saying I would be irrationally angry with her for having the cat euthanized.

Although I had gone through an emotional and psychological meat grinder for many years by then, my jaw dropped, as I could not believe the cold-blooded, twisted dishonesty and manipulation. But I said nothing, as there was no use. I just felt sad having lost my cat.

Before our separation and after realizing I was abused, I had a serious mental break down. I actually thought that the symptoms were psychosis, but I was wrong, thankfully. I had externalized all my pain and fear, and could feel nothing but pure terror for a few days. I went back to therapy and got through it. It was a very difficult time for me.

I had always felt that this woman would destroy me, that she had a need to actually kill, so incredibly intense was her inner turmoil, suffering and hate, and obsessive nature.

To this day, I have heard that she is still obsessed with me (after 5 years of separation/divorce), I do not feel completely safe, and plan to move to another state (or possibly another country). To add insult to injury I have been made by the divorce court to pay spousal support, because she never worked while we were together (14 years and just over 10 years of marriage), as I had told her she was free to work or not or go back to school, to do as she pleased (we had no children and I made a good living).

I grew up in a broken family where my mother presented herself as being a total victim and portrayed my father as a horrible human being (neither of them were saints, so it was confusing), and I followed the programming of feeling innately flawed because I was male, and seeking to redeem myself by saving women from their terrible fate at the hands of men. I ended up being more feminist than most feminists, believing all men were bad, until my eyes finally opened.

My mother made me feel guilty, responsible for her own unhappiness, as she blamed everyone and everything. That's why I was programmed to be made to feel responsible for all women's unhappiness, at least all women I got involved with. Guilt is a very difficult issue to deal with…below it is a bottomless well of pain from emotional neglect from both of my parents, and a sense of growing up like a weed, of raising myself, of having no one to lean on and no security. That's also why I wanted to rescue women who were "lost," as I was, and to help them, because no one ever helped me. That was another way of covering my own pain.

The myth of the “strong, independent woman”

John Ribner · 11 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

“Men can’t handle a strong, independent woman like me!”

How many times have you heard that one from the perpetually single women out there? It’s bandied about quite a bit these days, especially when ladies over 40 are complaining about the dating scene and their collective inability to be successful in it. To wit, here’s a comment pulled from the blogoshere on a post discussing love after 40:

> I hear all the time about people trying to help women who are 40+ find a partner, in fact I was talking about this just last night to one. Through this conversation I found out: Women feel like they have to find someone because everyone keeps mentioning it. They tend to put up with partners that aren’t a good match, just to prove a point that they’re trying. Men in this age range tend to prefer younger women, which annoys and discourages the 40+ year old women. Correct me if I’m wrong, but men are usually wanting to support, protect and care for women, and this is harder for them to envision with a strong, busy, independent woman.

I’ll spare the unfortunate blogger’s name because she isn’t the only one who believes this tripe. Much of society—men and women—willingly buy into the myth that the “strong, independent woman” (SIW) is somehow the unfortunate victim of a dating world that devalues these catches. Sadly, it’s this kind of enabling that allows these repugnant, combative women to once again project their problems onto men. (The dark legacy of feminism rears its ugly head again!) It’s high time this SIW mythology was deconstructed and exposed for what it really is. And who better to do it than a man who’s dated his fair share of SIWs.

First, let’s look at the term itself. Proponents of this self-ascribed moniker use it to describe a woman who is not going to be any man’s doormat. An SIW, according to them, is loud and proud, and she freely speaks her mind whenever the dreaded sin of patriarchy and/or male privilege rears its ugly head. In other words, these women enjoy being combative with men and they seek out every opportunity to argue, berate, and belittle men. What’s worse, they truly believe that this obstinate behavior is a “right” and “duty” of all women, and anyone who doesn’t agree with it or understand it is just a controlling, patriarchal knuckle-dragger who is living in the Dark Ages. SIWs are on a crusade to show dominance over the male gender, and they take no prisoners and grant no quarter. In other words, the term strong, independent woman is simply a code phrase for a stubborn, entitled, selfish, and uncompromising bitch.

Take a certain SIW from my past. Long story short, my former beloved decided to take a male co-worker with her to her grandfather’s birthday party, only informing me of this after returning from said party. When I expressed my discomfort with her decision, she hopped up on her high horse and had it trample me underfoot, loudly proclaiming that a “strong, independent woman” doesn’t need anyone’s permission to have a male friend. “Okay,” I said. “What would you say if I took [name of an exceptionally hot female co-worker] to my friend’s cabin up north?” Within seconds, my SIW’s eyes became lit with the fires of righteous indignation as she declared, “You better not!” I broke up with her on the spot and ironically, eight years later, this particular 39-year-old SIW continues to live alone … not counting her six cats, of course!

Have you ever listened to a woman use the SIW excuse for being alone? I mean, really sat down and listened to her? If you do, you’ll soon realize she’s really saying it to convince herself and you’re nothing more than a surrogate audience. SIWs prefer to blame their situation on external forces rather than look within themselves to find the true source of their problems. Saying that “men can’t handle a strong, independent woman” shifts the blame onto the male gender of men (as per usual), thus sparing these miserable wretches the arduous task of indulging in even the slightest modicum of self-examination. And there is an army of like-minded SIWs out there willing to enable their sisters in their times of suffering, further perpetuating this mythology.

Given their definition of SIW, it’s no wonder why most men avoid SIWs like the plague. These women are too busy being exactly what they say they are— independent—and that's the polar opposite of what relationships are all about. Humans are pack animals by nature, and we expect our relationships to be a partnership where both members love, respect, and above all compromise with each other for the betterment of the union. SIWs are oblivious to this concept because they're too busy trying to prove how "strong" and "independent" they are, usually by picking fights with the men in their lives over every matter, big and small. They believe offering men love, respect, and compromise is being weak on their part, even though they demand these very same things from the men in their lives. They're still women after all, and they better damn well be treated as such … or else!

Perhaps the saddest thing about today's SIWs is that they have no clue about what true strength really is. All they know is the false bravado of the self-righteous. True strength comes from a willingness to be vulnerable enough to tell your partner that you are much better person with them in your life, and that you love and appreciate them for it. But then again, I'm a man, so what do I know? Maybe everything in this column is a complete fallacy. Perhaps all the SIWs out there should just ignore these words and simply continue doing what they've always done and hope to achieve different results.

What's the definition of insanity again?

Owen Davies, we salute you

It's frequently claimed by British feminists—in speeches, articles, in media discussions, on their websites—that more than two women per week are being killed by partners or ex-partners in the UK. The statement was last true in 2002, and the number of women has declined by 25% since then. In 2012/13, 76 women were killed by partners or ex-partners—this link will take you to the government's statistics on the matter.

The most prominent young feminist in the UK is Laura Bates, the "brains" behind The Everyday Sexism Project, which, ironically, solicits stories only of anti-female sexism. In a TEDx presentation in December 2013, Bates claimed that more than two women per week are being killed every week by partners or ex-partners. Herbert Purdy wrote an insightful article about the matter. We publicly challenged Bates to provide evidence for the claim or to retract it. She didn't respond, so we awarded her a Lying Feminist of the Month award and emailed her to notify her of the matter.

A week after we presented her with the award, Bates was on a panel in a televised debate being broadcast live by the BBC, a program titled Free Speech Live. The program has a studio audience of young adults, and it's aimed at young adults. The topic being discussed was, "Is Britain a sexist country?" The extent of the program's anti-male bias was astonishing, even by BBC standards. The program's makers had solicited examples of sexism only from women, and the video of the discussion started with:

> We asked women to send us the comments they hear from friends, online, in everyday life …

This was followed by a 86-second piece with photographs and short video pieces that plumbed new lows of stupidity. Some of the remarks these women claim were said to them seemed highly unlikely, to put it kindly. Some were so preposterous, they made me laugh out loud.

The panel consisted of three women and a man, a typical gender balance for a discussion about sexism. One of the panelists was a non-feminist, Angela Epstein, a writer and broadcaster. The other three panelists were feminists, one of them a male comedian I'd never heard of, who appeared to have made a serious mistake in his choice of career. The (male) presenter was feminist-friendly. The audience was overwhelmingly female and clearly acolytes of Laura Bates. The young men in the audience were mainly feminists, with two or three exceptions who made points about issues such as MGM, none of which were put to the panelists.

Early in the program, between 1:26 and 2:38, Laura Bates repeated the lie that had resulted in her Lying Feminist of the Month award. At 2:39, the undoubted star of the program, a young man, challenged her on her claim, pointing out that J4MB had publicly challenged her on the matter, and she hadn't responded. Bates defended her claim vigorously, ending with this astonishing statement:

> That is ABSOLUTELY the official figure.

This blatant lie was predictably met with enthusiastic cheering from the audience, both women and men.

Laura Bates has become an asset for J4MB and men's human rights advocates globally. A prominent feminist who publicly lies … then publicly lies about having publicly lied.

So who was the young man prepared to challenge Laura Bates in an extremely hostile anti-male environment? We've just learned he's Owen Davies, a student at Brunel University, and we have his permission to reveal these details. Brunel University is, of course, the university where postgraduate engineering students are entitled to a £22,750 sponsorship … if they're female. That story is here.

While there are courageous young men such as Owen prepared to stand up for men's rights, the future looks bright.

Gorillas in their midst

Stephen Jarosek (aka Codebuster) · 12 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The recent video clip [1] illustrating yet again the assumptions inherent in the domestic violence industry can be partially understood from the "women good … men bad" narrative that dominates our thinking.

Where does the narrative for the domestic violence industry come from? Domestic violence, as one manifestation of gynocentrism, goes much deeper than the "women good men bad" narrative would suggest.

Gynocentrism and Matriarchal Authority

This topic relates to things I've posted before on AVfM. So before going farther down this rabbit hole, because of its importance to this discussion, let us recap on the nature and extent of matriarchal authority and the importance of the primary nurturer in defining the things that matter:

- What is it that is behind the gynocentrism that characterizes Western culture (and, arguably, all cultures)? What is "first cause," the primary reason? It is the primary nurturer. It is under the primary nurturer's care that most of a child's neuroplastic brain is wired—one informed estimate being that 90% of a human brain's wiring is accomplished within the first four years of life. And in most cultures throughout most of human history, the primary nurturer has tended to be the mother. The primary nurturer is our primary trainer, training us about the ways of our culture and the things that matter within our culture. The trainer–trainee dynamic has much in common with how a lion tamer is able to train a lion, provided that the trainer raises said lion from the time that it is introduced to them as a cub. These ideas relate to matters of philosophy and theory, such as phenomenology, semiotics, existentialism, and systems theory.
- If it is mostly mothers that wire brains, then the role of fathers, by contrast, is best understood in the context of cultural evolution and improvement, and undoing the baggage of imperfect wiring. Remember, before feminism, when it was permissible to talk about schizophrenogenic mothers? Cultural traditions and religions have always placed man in the more spiritual role. This is the role of freeing oneself of the mother's and the culture's definitions. MGTOW and all that.
- Given the role of the primary nurturer, it would seem self-evident that children first learn violence from their primary nurturer. It is well established that women play at least as crucial a role in child abuse as men do. For example, in 2012, of the perpetrators of child abuse and neglect in the US, 53.5% were women and 45.3% were men [2]. Of child fatalities (in the same report for 2012), 27.1% were perpetrated by the mother acting alone and 17.1% were perpetrated by the father acting alone. Women are regarded as the primary perpetrators of infanticide [3], [4]. "Infanticide is a crime overwhelmingly committed by women, both in the Third and First Worlds," writes Adam Jones of Gendercide Watch [5]. Women have been overwhelmingly implicated in other categories of child harm, such as Münchausen's syndrome by proxy, but given the nature of contemporary agendas that are less than forthright, these references are becoming increasingly "controversial."
- Matriarchal subcultures are often the source of violence. Irrespective of which part of the world you come from, many women choose thugs because, coming from the same abusive upbringing, thugs resonate with their own abusive natures. Like with like, and all that. But there is a further entitlement granted to an abusive woman when she chooses the company of violent thugs … they do her dirty work. Like that woman in Septa, Philadelphia, who cellphoned her accomplice thugs from the bus that she was on. They responded by arriving and shooting out the bus, after ushering her off, because another passenger on the bus criticized her abusive parenting skills. These are thugs who were likely raised by women. Usually raised by abusive women themselves, thugs know instinctively what's expected of them as men. Their womenfolk can direct proceedings from a safe distance without having to so much as lift a finger and without having to confront the sorts of risks that they are exposed to. Such is often the nature of nurturing matriarchies—if Momma ain't happy, ain't nobody happy. Tommy Sotomayor's video clip [6] provides an excellent illustration of how this works.
- Think about it … the very success of feminism is itself an expression of the power of unbridled matriarchal authority that has refused to allow itself to be tested.

- These ideas are also related to hypergamy [7]. You don't need to be a PUA to understand the importance of women's hypergamy.
- Even in cultures said to have the worst reputations in the world for denying women their rights, matriarchs seem to wield considerable influence in defining the conduct that is to be expected of their sons. For example:
  - On Australian 60 Minutes (subject "Human Bombs," August 19, 2001) [8], a Palestinian woman declared, raising her voice, trying to convince the ignorant Westerner who just didn't seem to "get it," that she wants her son to die, to become a hero for the Arab cause—as the camera panned across to the innocent face of a little boy not even into his teens.
  - In The Australian newspaper (November 15, 2005), Natalie O'Brien's [9] front-page headline reads, "Mum's permission needed for terror plan." Quoting from evidence before Sydney's Central Local Court, spiritual leader Abdul Nacer Benbrika is quoted as saying, "Some people claim to love jihad but don't respect their own parents.… You need permission from your parents to go to jihad. If your mother says no to jihad, then no jihad." Two days later, Mazen Touma (alleged to have been training for jihad) asked for his mother's permission to undertake jihad. Her response did not appear in the police evidence, and she refused to speak to the media.
  - Muslim women are not the wilting wallflowers that feminists prefer to portray them as. They may not have the same "rights" as their men, but there is every reason to interpret their purported absence of rights in the context of their privileged, protected status on the pedestal and men's servitude unto them. Ayam Sirias [10] does an outstanding job of dispelling the established narrative.

For all their blather about the patriarchy making women invisible, it would seem that it is feminists who are most keen to make the matriarchy invisible. But we digress. Let us now explore adult women's choices and why it is that women are often predisposed to choosing gorillas over poets … for, ultimately, that seems to be a large part of the unspoken narrative playing out behind the scenes in the domestic violence industry.

Bully–Victim Narrative

Merrick [11] introduces us to the relationship between self-confidence and exposure to risk, and how the infantilization of women predisposes them to diminished confidence and lower self-esteem. This, in turn, has a wider psychological impact on the relationship between the submissive and the dominant. This plays a major part in the choices that adult women make. So how does this relate to the preference that many women have for brutes? Let us take a closer look.

Much has been written about the power of the tyrant, and how a tyrant can only earn respect by being tyrannical. The willing deference of submissives to those who dominate them is a well-established psychological phenomenon, as it relates to the bully–victim narrative. The complicity of submissives within the context of oppression comes under different labels, depending on one's agenda. For example, there is the Stockholm syndrome [12]. Other writers make reference to the bully–victim narrative in the context of cultures, for example, violent–passive tribes, why thuggish rulers are respected more than peaceful ones, etc. It is generally accepted that there is no such thing as a gentle, respectful tyrant. One example from Elias Canetti's (1973) Crowds and Power [13]:

> One of the main attributes of an African king was his absolute power over life and death. The terror that he spread was tremendous. 'You are now Ata, you have power over life and death. Kill everyone who says he does not fear you': thus the formula of investiture of the king of Igara. He killed as he pleased and gave no reason. His wish was sufficient; he did not have to account for it. In many cases he was not allowed to shed blood himself, but the executioner who did it for him was the one indispensable official of his court. Whether the man who started by occupying that office ultimately became Prime Minister, as in Dahomey, or whether there were hundreds of executioners who formed a kind of caste, as in Ashanti; whether executions were frequent or were limited to occasional cases, the pronouncement of death sentences was always the undisputed right of the > king and if he let any considerable time pass without exercising it the terror essential to his power was lost; he was no longer feared, but was held in contempt.

The last sentence is key "… he was no longer feared, but was held in contempt." This bully–victim dynamic plays out not only in violent tribes in far-off places, but also in modern democracies and in households characterized by violence, whether between a woman and a man or a parent and their child. A woman's preference for thugs does not magically materialize from a vacuum. She knows what she wants and she knows how to get it. This needs to be unpacked to properly understand it.

Mostly without realizing it, PUA Game is actually an attempt to harness the submissive–dominant narrative with the intention to manipulate women. Summarizing the main implications of the submissive–dominant narrative, as it applies to female psychology and the spontaneity with which women often pair with troglodytes:

- Women often spook easily the closer that a man is to what they are looking for. If a man does not make it easy for her, a woman's rationalization hamster kicks in, she works herself into a lather, plays hard-to-get, etc., and the poor dude has to flee, wondering WTF just happened. A groping brute, by contrast, can free a woman of all that angst and anticipation. Why? Because his intrusive impulsiveness disarms her. While there is little to be expected of a brute, there is little to get worked up about. There is no anticipation of loss to fear because there is little to lose. Everyone's much more relaxed and at peace with the world, and this primes her for submission and earns him an easy notch.
- When a woman chooses a brute, she validates him. She is casting her vote in favour of what she thinks all men should be. From her choice, many women learn what's hot, and many men learn what works … and her children acquire the training necessary to carry on the family tradition into future generations. Spreading the karma.
- Women most relate to the average in man. They do not relate well to excellence in man. This is one of the ways in which the bell-curve distributions for men's and women's intelligence expresses itself. This is why the tradition has always been for men to initiate and to disarm … it is the man who knows himself better than the woman knows herself, and her only option is to defer to the knower and the doer. Women feel least threatened by the loser in man … he is but an invisible utility device, as expendable as a toaster.
- One often reads of women choosing bad boys with the intention of trying to convert them. From the preceding discussion, we now see how this would work. Women spook easily when they encounter the formidable in man. Many would rather try to convert an adolescent, emotionally stunted brute who is non-threatening than relate to a self-assured adult who knows himself.
- Given the absence of risk in women's lives, what with being provided for, affirmative action, the option to regard employment as a hobby instead of a necessity, etc., it is fair to conclude that the deferential (submissive) role will more likely fall to women than to men.
- Further to the absence of risk in women's indulgent, provided-for lives, choosing a thug can provide spice to an otherwise predictable routine, it annoys over-controlling parents and sends a clear message for them to back off, and it draws attention to oneself as an innocent victim.
- Within the context of the bully–victim narrative, submissives will also be bullies to those who cannot defend themselves— i.e., their children—hence, women as abusers of children.
- From Canetti's passage, "… he [the tyrant] was no longer feared, but was held in contempt." A consistent narrative for a woman who inexplicably finds herself sipping a latte with a deferential beta instead of sculling beer with an exciting brute would be along the lines of: "There must be something wrong with him for believing that I am worthy … what a loser." Many a brute is instinctively aware that a good thrashing can bring his errant spouse back into line, and he realizes that she won't respect anything less. Of course, the odds are that he probably learned this first from his primary nurturer and the context in which he grew up.
- Women often conflate manliness with "degenerate" or "animal." The more brutish a man, the hotter, to many a woman, he must be. What can be manlier than a mumbling gorilla lunging for a grope? The idea of the formidable man as poet, or inventor, or leader, or discoverer is alien to many women's mindsets.

- Often a brute is profitable—Hypergamy 101. A brute with money is less likely to question his existence or her motives, and Material Girl will often overlook his obvious flaws and regard him as an appropriate lifestyle choice. This puts Material Girl in the driver's seat, where she is in control of whether she stays or leaves. Grrrl power and all that.
- Last but certainly not least is the thrill of the forbidden—more specifically, the cultural forbidden. The forbidden lies at the interface between the cultural known and the unknown. This goes into deep psychology, philosophy, and phenomenology that are beyond the scope of this conversation. While abstract in theory, it has practical implications that can be understood within the context of men's versus women's sexualities. For example, a brute with attitude can stir a woman's primal motivations in ways that a deferential beta cannot, but the same analogies cannot be extended to men's primal motivations.

Of course, not all women choose brutes. Far from it. But it is important to understand that when a woman does choose a thug, she's making an active choice. She knows what she wants. Often she may not know, in the early days, that he's actually a thug, but she will be drawn to the dominant and/or the profitable in him. To this kind of woman, a deferential beta won't get a look-in. Contrary to what popular lore would have us believe, woman is not a helpless wallflower being preyed on by opportunistic, clever men. It is a strange irony indeed that feminists don't see the misogyny behind their presumption of women as lame and without agency. In the 1960s during the emergence of contemporary feminism, feminists used to spit on the chivalrous, suited chumps who would open car doors for them. These days, it would make more sense for them to spit on themselves.

The Moral Breakdown of a Domestic Violence Industry

America's Founding Fathers understood some very important aspects of human nature when they framed the US Constitution. They understood, for example, the importance of personal responsibility. Most cultural and religious traditions in civilized societies understand the importance of personal responsibility… or at least, before feminism, they used to. In addition to appealing to commonsense, there is also a rational/scientific basis for this reasoning, for example, within the context of philosophy or the fields of systems and complexity theory. That is to say, personal responsibility plays a role in how cultural systems evolve, and when you remove personal responsibility, you set the stage for systemic disintegration.

The wonderful thing about integrating personal responsibility and accountability into the culture is that it is a cost-effective way of governing a nation. There is no need to employ complex, bureaucratic, legal, and administrative structures to direct resources, and there is no need for a domestic violence industry. A culture embracing personal responsibility, for the most part, basically runs itself.

Pretty much any civilized country in the world has some manner of assault and battery laws to protect its citizens. There is no need to "refine" these laws to create different categories of them. Any attempt to do so suggests an agenda that goes beyond democratic principles. It invites the state to meddle in personal affairs, and extends their license to intrude into our homes and our private lives. We are reminded of Benjamin Franklin's perspective, usually framed along the lines:

> They that can give up essential liberty to purchase a little temporary safety, deserve neither liberty nor safety.

There is perhaps no better demonstration of what Franklin was getting at, with all its implications, than America's VAWA and domestic violence industry. When a woman chooses a thug, she is casting her vote in favour of what she thinks all men should be. She is casting her vote for the disintegration of culture, and the domestic violence industry and the state want to reward her for it. Does she deserve to be protected from assault? Of course she does, as does anyone. As do her children. But the law is a blunt instrument constructed from agenda-driven narratives and applied by humans whose motives range from suspect or ignorant to well-intentioned but ill-informed. Asking of such an instrument to perform as a scalpel is unreasonable and dangerous. Such a blunt instrument should be used sparingly (this is consistent with the emphasis in the original form of the US Constitution on minimal government). But much worse than that, by presuming the innocence of women and the guilt of men, children are more likely to become trapped in toxic environments with no way to escape. The family court standard "in the best interests of the child" becomes a farce and a license for further child abuse from the one primary nurturer who does not have to answer for their actions. The family court standard instead becomes, in reality, "in the best interests of the mother … to hell with the best interests of the child."

From freebie to freebie, from family courts and VAWA to the workplace and affirmative action, this feminist gravy train not only exempts women from their responsibilities but also trashes men's rights and treats men with contempt for everything that has been achieved in Western culture. If they could get away with it, feminists would declare the Founding Fathers and Isaac Newton enemies of the state and divest them of recognition for their achievements. It is a twisted irony indeed that boys and men grow up doing only what their primary nurturer expects them to do, and then get shamed for it by subsequent generations of hypergamous primary nurturers who demand affirmative action freebies as retribution for all those millennia of oppression. Twilight Zone anyone? Truth is indeed stranger than fiction.

The domestic violence industry is not only toxic and immoral and contrary to the principles of the US Constitution. Like the feminism that spawned it, it is also evil and a recipe for cultural disintegration.

In His Own Words: From one abusive woman to the next

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 12 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 12 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month 2015. "Edward" shares his relationship history with two incredibly abusive women. The last of which left him when he was diagnosed with Multiple Sclerosis.

Part 1

I met my then girlfriend sometime in the 80s, she was studying English here. We had a brief summer fling and then she returned to France. I promised I'd keep in touch and I did. She returned after graduating and after a while set up house together. Things went along fine for a few years and then we decided to get married and bought a house…

Things were a bit weird now and again but nothing too serious and then came along my daughter and not long after things started to get pretty weird, most of it was subtle at first with the odd fit of rage.

She took to going to parties and one night she told me she was going to a party in a friend's house, I said no problem enjoy as I was going out with some other people and anyway the party was all French people so it didn't really appeal to me. My few drinks ended early so I decided I'd go to the party and show my face. I arrived and the house was in darkness, so I left and went home. I quizzed her the next day about the party and she told me it was great and they were "dancing" until the small hours. I decided to ignore it, but this became a regular occurrence.

She disappeared to LA for a few weeks and she was to stay with some friends of mine. I enjoyed the quiet of the house. She arrived back and said she'd been terribly busy with work etc and enjoyed staying with Brian.

A couple of weeks later, my friends rang and told me she had arrived, stayed a day or two and disappeared. Brian went looking for her and found her in a hotel with some guy. Again I ignored this.

Then things went like "I was out last night so it's your turn to get up and mind the kid" to "I was out last night so it's your turn." This was all very reasonable until both these reasons got lumped together and I never had a weekend lie-in. She had a full time job and I was self-employed, so I was around the house regularly. I dropped the kid to crèche and picked her up from crèche and fed her dinner.

Slowly, things got really weird in that if I had to go to a meeting she'd fly into a rage. I'd run away and hide in a bedroom, she'd come marching in and start screaming and shouting at me. I took to locking the bedroom door and sometimes she'd kick holes in the door, I'd repair it and it would happen again. I'd get attacked and have my hair pulled and have things thrown at me.

I invented a terminology for these episodes. I called them "the veil", if the veil descended and the eyes went blank and lifeless I knew trouble was coming.

One night I was in minding the little one when I woke up with a pressing feeling on my chest, I opened my eyes to find a completely naked wife holding a huge carving knife in her hand lunging at me. I freaked out and ran away, I stayed with my brother for a few weeks but everybody persuaded me to go back and she swore it would never happen again.

Things started not too badly, but then the "parties" started again and the attacks. She became pregnant again, this time I was almost certain the child was not mine, but the attacks got worse and worse. I had lost it one night after a brutal attack again with a knife, I tried to subdue her by grabbing her wrists but she got away and to my eternal shame I tried to kick her. She called the cops and I was taken away…

I again started to sleep in my office and sometimes at my brother's — anywhere I could really. Sometimes I even slept at home. This went on for months.

I guess I was lonely. I met a girl who seemed to understand and gave my sympathy and eventually we slept together…

I moved out and got a small apartment.

This drove the wife into a rage with endless phone calls “are you with that girl?” etc., arriving at the door at all hours and kicking the front door in and screaming and shouting outside.

One evening I was with girl #2 and her brother. We had a few drinks and went back to the apartment, they left about 10pm. At about 11pm or so the cops arrived at my door saying she had reported me for attacking her, I was taken away and shoved in a cell and brought up to the court in the morning. No evidence was permitted and I just had to take whatever the court decided.

I decided it was too dangerous to hang around the city so I moved to the mountains.

Eventually girl #2 followed me about 6 months later.

Part 2

This was only the start of my problems…

Eventually the wife went back to France and applied for a divorce.

I actually breathed a sigh of relief. I missed my daughter terribly, but there was nothing I could do. I never really got to know daughter #2. I met her a few times when she was tiny.

I lived quietly in the mountains in a small cottage. It was nice, but very lonely.

Now this part is mainly conjecture. I’d previously had an attack of some sort, my back muscles went into spasm and I couldn’t move for nearly a week, I assumed it to be a slipped disk. My doctor told me it was just a spasm. During my time in the apartment, I suffered terribly from heartburn and reflux. I drank Maalox by the bottle.

Anyway girl #2 eventually moved in with me, she herself was recovering from some kind of nervous condition (perhaps a breakdown), so I said she could recuperate in the mountains. No need to draw pictures here. About a year later, she had a miscarriage and went to stay with her parents. Being young and single again, I went on a bender and tried to figure out a way of extricating myself from this mess. I hooked up with a “nice” girl for a couple of weeks.

Her brother rang me a few weeks later telling me it was disgraceful to let her go through this on her own, so I relented and let her come back. Anyway girl #3 was driving me nuts, so she had to go. I did this in as nice a way as I could think of and still stayed friends with her. She was/is more lesbian than hetero, so I figured there’d be no problem. She did say she’d get even.

No sooner was girl #2 in the door when she got pregnant again, so I made a conscious decision to settle down and make a go of this. I put away my doubts and went for it. My son was born and I was a happy dad again.

About 2 years later, along came another son. The eldest son was turfed out. Son #2 was her darling and son #1 was ignored and left for me to deal with.

Things plodded along reasonably, I was making some money and I was helping girl #2 to setup in business. I helped her with her translation business by providing lots of technical knowhow for terminology and computers etc.

She was always at me to buy a house…

Anyway another child came along and the birth was a comedy of errors as she decided to have a home birth.

In fairness she helped me finance and get my two daughters over, sometimes she paid for them. She also helped me speak to them as by this stage they barely spoke any English and also she seemed to believe that she was the reason I had split up from my wife. She did contribute a lot, but it was inevitable as I’ve outlined.

About this time, girl #3 (the lesbian) re-appeared and when she became very friendly again I had ominous thoughts.

We bought the house eventually and we moved in. I started to get problems with fitness, so I went mad on fitness. I trained 2 nights a week, but it wasn't really helping.

I started having difficulties completing projects or forgetting to do certain things in my projects. This was starting to cause difficulties for those projects so much so that the contract was cancelled.

In 2006, on my way home from a meeting something exploded inside me, it was like a flat stone being dropped into water and making a "plop" sound, this was somewhere in my central core.

I'd be walking home and I'd blackout and fall over and recover and go on my way. The reflux slowly got worse, the cognition problems were terrible and I lost my main contract. I tried to get other contracts but I just couldn't do them. I'd arrive back to the house covered in blood and I had no idea where it came from.

My GP examined me and decided this was a stomach problem, so I needed to go get an endoscopy. She had to pick me up from the hospital. On the way back from the hospital, she informed me that if I was sick I was out.

She came with me to get the results and they said there was nothing in the stomach except for a mild hernia. They ordered a series of more tests. A number of possibilities were outlined, but there were many tests to be done before any of the possibilities could be confirmed. She refused to bring me for the first of these tests, so they had to be cancelled.

All this time I experienced nausea and vomiting at regular intervals

She told me she wasn't happy and she didn't she why she should support someone that couldn't support themselves.

Two months later one bank holiday Monday, she attacked me viciously and I had no option but to leave the house.

I broke down a week or so later, was diagnosed with "severe depression" and admitted to a psychiatric hospital. They obviously diagnosed the symptoms as psychiatric, translucent rectangles in my vision, the pins and needles and all the others were just repressed "anger".

I was released from the hospital and a maintenance order arrived. She was looking for 1400 per month. I really had no idea what was going on (medically), but in the back of my mind I knew something serious had happened.

I struggled on for a year or so suffering outbreaks of nausea. Then the reflux got much, much worse and the falling down got more severe. The GP said I had carpel tunnel syndrome and then a hernia. I was starting to have difficulties walking. I saw more specialists than you can shake a stick at…

The hernia consultant laughed at me, however. His young assistant was not so dismissive and gave me a full neurological exam and told me I needed to see a neurologist as soon as possible. He got a verbal slap from his consultant and was told not to interfere, but he persisted.

I went to my GP and told him what the young doctor had said. He examined me and said I think you have Multiple Sclerosis, then the fun started. I had no job, so I had to go public. All told, I waited over 2.5 years to get an MRI. When the results came back they told me there were lesions in my brain and there was a huge "inflammation" on my spine and it was 90% sure it was MS. The damage had been done 10+ years previously.

Three months later I had an attack. I was admitted to hospital where they did final tests and proclaimed it as Primary Progressive MS. In reality, this was a fairly quick diagnosis.

Conclusion

So in synopsis, I suffered horrendous abuse at the hands of my first wife. I was regularly beaten up and attacked with all sorts of implements, yet she was the victim. Yes I understand I reacted once.

#2 seems to meet all the conditions of Narcissistic Personality Disorder, to my mind anyway, including enormous amounts of emotional and physical abuse along with being left to die so she could be "happy". Recently she said she felt no guilt about throwing me out.

Most of the medical descriptions are a common enough course for PPMS however I had the added complication of an unusual symptom nausea and vomiting (brain stem syndrome).

Feminist media censorship puts public safety at risk by Laurie A. Couture

AVfM Video Source · 12 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Laurie A. Couture has been writing for years on issues similar to what Erin Pizzey, Dean Esmay, and others at AVfM have done work on. We have been a fan of her work for some time, though she's never had any interest in the Men's Human Rights Movement. Recently, she submitted an article to The Good Men Project, only to have it severely edited and then outright rewritten and censored. This will come as no surprise to readers of AVfM, given that we have seen this many times with The Good Men Project. (See for example Bad girls purged from The Good Men Project, Fathers can't be mothers too, and Feminism's mythological rape culture

However, this appears to go well beyond The Good Men Project, which any sane person can see is an inherently male-hostile site much of the time. Ms. Couture, a proud liberal, has tried to get information that runs counter to the feminist narrative into the following publications:

The Huffington Post
Ms.
Feminist Majority
Upworthy
Psychology Today
Women's Rights News
Men Advocating Change
Futures Without Violence
Harper's
The Utne Reader
The Atlantic
Miss Representation
Dr. Phil
CNN
Time
Newsweek
Slate
Salon
The Daily Beast
Mother Jones
The Guardian
The New York Times
US News and World Report

She's also written to numerous government officials, to no avail.

Political partisans on the Right will no doubt want to blame all of this on "the left," which they are free to do. But in general we see a bigger problem: whether right or left, everyone is afraid to offend feminist ideology.

But perhaps with more people like Ms. Couture, that will one day begin to change.

Are you listening, editors at those publications we named above? Are your consciences speaking to you? We hope so.

Sexual exploitation of boys – Lynne MacDonell

In Her Own Words: I lost my brother to his abusive wife, part I

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 13 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It is day 13 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month 2014. Today's In Her Own Words is an all too common tale of a loving family torn apart by an abusive wife. "LostMyBro" shares the first part of her story about how her sister-in-law estranged her brother from their family.

Who ever thought a dress could cause so many problems?

My brother met his wife less than a year and a half ago. When he met her, I thought she'd be another girl who'd stick around for a few months and we'd never see her again. That was his pattern at the time. A year prior, he had just ended a six-year long relationship with his ex-fiancé. He dated a few women during that year, but none of them seemed to be what he was looking for, except for "Katie."

I had my doubts about Katie right from the beginning. Their relationship advanced to different stages so quickly. They were making commitments that most people wait years to make with one another, within months. Our first encounter was ok. She seemed quiet and reserved, but I chalked it up mostly to nerves. I mean, who isn't nervous when they are meeting their boyfriend's mother and sister for the first time?

I started noticing little nuances about her the second time we met. For starters, she didn't know how to converse. The conversations for the night were very one-sided and she did most of the talking. Even the way she talked, I felt she was talking "at me" not "to me". The content was odd, too. She didn't tell us the things you'd normally share about yourself when you are first getting to know someone. Most of it was very superficial.

It felt like she was trying very hard to impress us with the amount of money she had. She talked about things like expensive cars she's owned, how many designer dresses she has, how she has all these adventurous hobbies like sky diving, and scuba diving. She also spent a good amount of time talking about all the tropical locations she has vacationed at and what upper middle class towns she's lived in, but nothing about her past, her childhood or her family. It was strange.

Soon enough, my brother seemed completely head over heels with her. She was everything he was looking for in a woman. She was strong, intelligent and independent. The complete opposite of his ex, who spent the better part of their relationship, trying to find herself through meaningless dead-end jobs, while my brother paid her bills.

Katie was different. She had an amazing sales job where she made over six figures (most sociopaths do well in sales positions). She also had her own house complete with a heated pool and well manicured yard. On top of being financially secure, she also had a daughter whom she adored and doted on. Everything seemed perfect about her. Almost too good to be true.

As the first few weeks wore on however, red flags kept popping up. From the very beginning it seemed like the courting phase was some sort of game to her. It was as if she was testing my brother. First she told him she knew someone from her gym who was good friends with him and was giving her the 411, on him. The only problem was, my brother didn't have many close friends and the ones he did have, didn't go to her gym.

Even the things this person was supposedly telling her weren't even that accurate. She was doing a lot of research (aka stalking) on him. She also kept telling him she didn't want a relationship, yet she was the one who was texting him constantly throughout the day. He'd get a text as soon as he woke up, from her and she'd check in many times throughout the day to see how his day was going and what he was doing. There was also a lot of what's known as, "push-pull". She would hang out with him for three days in a row and then suddenly not return his calls for a day or so.

My brother noticed some red flags, too, but he somehow talked himself into thinking they didn't mean anything. One was that she had already been married not once, but twice before. She asked my brother not to tell us about her first marriage for whatever reason, but obviously, he did. She also had a daughter from her second marriage but she gave my brother this whole speech about how she didn't want him meeting her for at least three months or so because her daughter was very attached to her last live-in boyfriend and he just upped and left one day. She seemed very adamant about it when she first told him, but exactly three days after her speech, she introduced them.

They were only together about a month but the relationship seemed very intense. She wanted to spend every waking second that she wasn't at work with my brother. It almost seemed as if she wanted to occupy every second of his time, even if she wasn't physically there. If she wanted to do something with her friends, it was fine, but she'd encourage him to go over and visit with either me or our mother instead of going out with friends.

The few times we did see him without her, it was like he wasn't even there. He would focus in on his phone for the entire time, sending texts back and forth with her. At times, people would try to talk to him but he'd be so engrossed in their texts that he wouldn't even acknowledge the fact that you were speaking to him. It was very odd. Ever since he met her, it was like he seemed to be in some sort of trance or under some kind of magic spell.

After only two short months, Katie had started convincing my brother to cancel the lease on his apartment and move into the house she owned. I thought it was crazy and too soon, but he seemed very eager to do it. He told me he was already in love and he knew she was "the one". She told him she didn't want him bringing any of his furniture or housewares. Just his clothes and a few small items that he needed.

I watched him sell off and throw away everything he worked so hard to earn in the past few years. Once he moved in, she made him cancel his phone contract and switch over to her carrier, on her plan. She also convinced him that something was wrong with his car and that he needed to sell it. She then leased a brand new Mercedes-Benz for him to drive. It's a beautiful car, but so totally not his style. My brother's personality started to slip further and further away the more involved they became. He was totally dependent on her.

He also seemed very exhausted all the time because he said they spent so much time together and would be up all hours of the night, even on work nights. At the time when he was moving into her home, he lost a very good paying job because he was constantly late to work because he was over-sleeping in the mornings. It didn't seem to matter though. He still went ahead with his plan of moving in with her and her 11-year old daughter.

It was only a few short weeks of them living together when he called me up and asked if I wanted to hang out. I really didn't want to. Lately, he had been acting totally different. I used to have so much fun hanging out with my brother. We'd laugh and talk the entire time and now, I felt like I was sitting with a complete stranger, in total silence. It felt very awkward, especially on this night. He came along with me to run some errands, but again, he spent the entire time texting her on his phone.

I felt like I was talking to a wall. He was hardly conversing with me or responding to anything I said. Finally, I asked him what was wrong. He explained to me that they had gotten into a big fight, but he wasn't even really sure what he did wrong. Her daughter was acting like a spoiled brat that morning and didn't want to go to camp because she didn't do the previous days assignment and because of it, Katie started to flip out and be completely irrational. He said her anger didn't match what had happened. She was throwing things, screaming and cursing and calling everyone names, including him.

After he told me that, he started to open up about other things that were going on. He said she constantly had work for him to do around the house, but when he would do it, she would stand behind him and criticize the way he was doing it. He also said she bossed him around a lot and was pretty demanding. He felt like nothing he did was right. In fact, his exact words were that she reminded him of our father in that way and he felt like he was living with him again. (He later denied ever saying such things to me, but I know what I heard. I refuse to be gaslighted).

It was month three of them living together and my brother was still unemployed and showed up at my house with some big news one afternoon. He told me he was going to propose to Katie. I admit, my reaction probably didn't seem too enthusiastic, but I tried as hard as I could to be happy. There were just too many things about Katie that I questioned. She didn't seem to want to build any type of bond with me and my mother. I think she was pressuring him too much to commit to her and it was all way too fast.

It took my brother three years to propose to his ex and here he was, ready to spend his life with a woman he only knew for a few months. I also thought she was too bossy and controlling. Either way, I knew it was his life and he had to do what made him happy.

After the engagement, all bets were off and the real Katie started to shine. My brother started becoming very touchy for some reason. He and I used to text each other often. One day, I had texted him some information I heard about his ex that I thought would be helpful because she owed him money and he got all bent out of shape about me sending a text about her. When he sent me a picture of the ring, I text him back telling him it was gorgeous.

He told me it was a Tiffany's replica and that he had a jeweler special make it for him, so I asked where he had it made and that too offended him. He called my mother and told her, to tell me, to stop asking questions about the ring. It was totally not like my brother to take offense to these things and later I learned it was because his wife reads and monitors all of his incoming and outgoing texts as well as Facebook messages and emails.

My mom and I started to discuss that something seemed very off about Katie and we started to become even more fearful about my brother marrying her. It seemed like she was trying everything in her power, to keep us away. We tried to connect with her, but she was very resistant. I tried to make plans with them for my mother's birthday but Katie was all booked up and could never come. My brother ended up completely blowing off my mother's birthday that year and I had to call him three weeks later to remind him.

My mom tried to friend request Katie on Facebook, but it took her six weeks to respond (even though we knew she was active during those six weeks) and when she did, we were shocked. It was like a complete timeline of all the men (victims) she had dated in the last few years. She had pictures and pictures of her with different men. Some where she was posing sexy and some where she was kissing them. It was bizarre. I would be mortified if my in-laws saw pics of me like that, but she didn't care.

The wedding planning also happened in a blink of an eye. She set the date for as soon as she could. My son and my husband were asked to be the ring bearer and best man but I wasn't included in the wedding. I was a little hurt, but kept it to myself. Instead, I went out and purchased a dress to wear to the wedding. Little did I know, this dress was about to change the dynamics of my family forever.

Katie was very concerned about my dress from the moment I told my brother about it. I couldn't understand why. I wasn't in the wedding party and the dress wasn't even that bad. She sent my brother out to do all the dirty work. She told him to tell me the dress was inappropriate and I had to get something different. My brother even lectured me about appropriate wedding attire for women, a subject he never had even the slightest of interest in before.

He was acting totally out of character and even after I told him I couldn't return the dress, he was still insisting I spend more money on top of the $160 I had already spent to buy a new dress. After feeling attacked and backed into a corner, I defended myself and told him to tell his wife that if she had a problem she should come to me directly instead of using him as her mouthpiece and if she wanted to control what I wore, she should have had me in the wedding party. Katie being the narcissist she is, couldn't take that someone wasn't giving into her demands and because of this, a dress caused a battle of epic proportions, that went on for months.

Tomorrow, I will post the second part of LostMyBro's story. Thank you for taking the time to share your story, LMB.

Potentially life-destroying false allegations a “learning experience”

Pierre Lescaudron · 13 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Treon Harris’s accuser has withdrawn sexual battery charges against him and he’s reinstated to play–but his coach says it was a “learning experience” for Treon and everyone else. Really, coach? Yes, it’s good news for Treon Harris–it appears his lawyer might have been right: it seems Treon isn’t a rapist, and his accuser was both the aggressor in their sexual rendezvous and a false accuser. But I am troubled by the strange, albeit politically correct comment by Florida’s coach, Will Muschamp: “This has been a learning experience for everyone involved. Treon has been honest with me throughout the process and is looking forward to rejoining his teammates.” If Treon has been honest, that means he was wrongly accused, as his lawyer so forcefully explained. And if that’s true, what, exactly, did Treon “learn” from the experience? See, that’s a little too close to Catherine Comins’s infamous Time magazine quote for my taste: “Comins argues that men who are unjustly accused can sometimes gain from the experience. ‘They have a lot of pain, but it is not a pain that I would necessarily have spared them. I think it ideally initiates a process of self-exploration. ‘How do I see women?’ ‘If I didn’t violate her, could I have?’ ‘Do I have the potential to do to her what they say I did?’ Those are good questions.” “Victim blaming” is a cardinal sin against rape victims, but, you see, it’s OK to victim blame men falsely accused of rape. Double standard? The worst example of this kind of victim blaming in recent times occurred at Hofstra. If you aren’t familiar with the case, you need to read about it here. Three of the falsely accused men appeared on the Steve Wilkos show after their false accuser admitted under oath to her lie. What happened is chilling. The men were immediately booed by some members of the audience. Wilkos asked why audience members booed the young men. An angry young women came to a microphone and exclaimed that she had been sexually assaulted, and that “it’s not cool. And if you guys are lying about it, that’s not right. I know what it’s like. It’s not cool.” Her comments were greeted with applause. For his part, Wilkos was unsympathetic to the men. “Does that sound like a wholesome college experience?” Wilkos asked them, to applause. Later, one of the young men volunteered that they never should have gone to the party, to more applause. A male audience member stands up and says that he’s gone to parties, and they don’t have to end up having sex with a girl. The audience applauds again. Wilkos said he’s “not trying to be a prude,” but the story of their encounter was “creepy.” And “maybe if you held yourself to a higher level of conduct . . . .” And “doesn’t that sound a little sleazy?” Wilkos then takes offense that one of the men was videotaping the encounter (the videotape, of course, is what led to their freedom), and asks one of the young men if he’d like it if someone did that to him. The audience applauds again. Another audience member stood up and expressed doubt about their innocence. If a television host had made similar comments about a rape victim, how long do you think he’d be on the air? Another chivalrous man, a writer named Michael Daly, entered the misandry hall of fame with this gem: “The five were freed after getting the good scare that they well deserved.” And this: “These five may not be guilty, but that does not make them innocent. They should stop their whimpering and apologize for acting like mutts.” Did you get that? The victims were not “innocent” (even though they were) and they should apologize to the criminal who lied about them. The statement is breathtaking in both its idiocy and sexism. Yet, Michael Daly wasn’t canned. You see, there is “victim blaming” and there is “victim blaming.” Some “victim blaming” is not only acceptable but proper. Down, down, down the rabbit hole we fall.

Western media degrades people of India for just a few incidents of rape

Anil Kumar · 13 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Teenaged girls in Badaun, India, were never raped.
Recently, India's Finance Minister spoke about the loss of a couple billion dollars in tourist revenue due to the relentless propaganda in the media about rapes in India. The media certainly played an anarchic role here, forgetting that millions of poor people in India rely on the tourist industry to survive.

Last month, India put a space probe in orbit around Mars. The $74 million cost of this mission was less than the budget of the Hollywood movie Gravity. However, this did not stop many Western socialists, liberals, and people in social media from blaming India for wasting the money on a Mars mission instead of alleviating poverty and reducing the number of incidents of rapes in India. Of course, they all could not forget the incident of the gang rape and hanging of two teenaged girls in a north Indian village.

So the arms industry sells weapons, submarines, and fighter planes globally while using the United Nations to sustain various conflicts in poorer parts of the world, and liberals never question it. Meanwhile, India's Mars orbiter cost less than a Sukhoi fighter plane.

Liberals seem to believe that people in poverty-stricken countries must live lives full of guilt and should never feel proud of themselves, aim high, or spend money for research or to fund athletes to participate in the Olympics until the problem of their poverty is completely solved.

Before I go into the details of incidents of rape in India, here are few facts I would like to highlight:

- According to the Central Bureau of Investigation (CBI), the teenaged girls found hanging in the tree were never raped. (CBI is India's equivalent to the US's FBI.)
- The number of incidents of rape in the whole of India is about 34,000 in a year for a country of 1.25 billion people, which means that India has one of the lowest rates of rape in the world.
- Indian government officials, police, judges, and even feminists in women's commissions openly speak about the large number of false rape cases registered in India to settle political scores or by gangs of criminals employing women to file false rape cases.

According to the Delhi Commission for Women, 53% of rape cases filed between April and July 2013 were false. The men accused of rape are thrown in prison as soon as the case is filed. They spend almost a year in prison before getting bail.

> A disturbing trend of filing of false rape cases has come to the fore, mocking stringent laws adopted by the parliament last year to prevent crime against women. The Delhi Commission of Women (DCW) has come out with startling statistics showing that 53.2% of the rape cases filed between April 2013 and July 2014 in the capital were found 'false'.
> The report says that between April 2013 and July 2014, of the 2,753 complaints of rape, only 1,287 cases were found to be true, and the remaining 1,464 cases were found to be false.
> In all, in 2013 there were a total of 1,559 cases of rape in Delhi, where the acquittal rate was 78%. This was a 32% jump from the earlier 46% of acquittal in 2012, when there were a total of 680 cases filed.

India's National Crime Records Bureau of Home Ministry reports that the number of incidents of rape in the year 2013 is 33,764.

The truth about the case of the gang rape and hanging of two teenaged girls in India

Examining the clothes of the girls, anyone could have speculated that they were never subjected to gang rape. They were most probably killed due to a family feud or honor killing, and sexual assault never happened. India's CBI conducted several polygraph tests on the accused and also the parents of the girls as part of the investigation. The accused were found to be innocent and it was established that the parents had framed them.

It is now suspected that this may be a case of an "honor killing":

> In a new twist in the Badaun killings case, the Hyderabad-based Centre for DNA Fingerprinting and Diagnostics (CDFD) has ruled out sexual assault on the teenage girls whose bodies were found hanging from a tree in May.
> CBI sources said it is crucial information from one of the most reputed government labs which has cleared a lot of doubts about the theory of the cousins being sexually assaulted before being killed and the needle of suspicion is now on the family members.
> The sources said they are not ruling out honour killing angle.

Warning to the Western media

It is a fact that the Western media has been indulging in massive anti-Indian propaganda, degrading its people and terming various Indian cities as rape capitals.

India is a country with sharp contrasts. You can see people driving in Audis or Mercedes in the streets of Bangalore while the street dogs and cows also sometimes occupy the same roads. The cities are highly crowded; however, as soon as you go just 30 miles outside any city, the countryside is extremely beautiful and peaceful. Similarly, most places are extremely safe places in India, but there are also some extremely dangerous areas in the country.

While Indian men are portrayed in Western media as chauvinist monsters, on October 10 an Indian man, Kailash Satyarthi, received the Nobel Peace Prize.

It would be wise for the Western media to accept India's diversity and contrasts in society rather than constantly degrade the people of India. Frankly, not just Indian Men's Human Rights Activists (MHRAs) but also many other Indians are really pissed off with this attitude of the West. It is just a matter of time until all hell breaks loose and the Western media will be held responsible.

A few years ago, when U.S. Ambassador to India Tim Roemer was pointing out crimes against women in India, Indian MHRAs responded by essentially telling him to get lost, citing the CDC report that 32 million teenaged girls in the US have STDs. Needless to say, the ambassador had to eat his words. If all hell breaks loose, Indians will respond by raising topics to degrade Western culture, from high school shootings, to teen pregnancies, to gun ownership rights and more. Such an eventuality will not help anyone.

When gender hatred is funny

Mark Dent · 13 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

[Editor's Note: A modified version of this article was previously sent to the ABC's The Drum a few years ago. Needless to say, The Drum couldn't possibly publish it, or any other article critical of feminism. Nonetheless, the topic is as important today as it was then.]

I have, for a long time, been deeply disturbed by the seemingly endless demonization of the male gender in our society. I won't even attempt to delve too deeply into the countless examples of this bigotry that one can come across in some form of media on an almost daily basis. Much of it is based upon utter fabrications and deliberate deceit and propagated by people with a hidden agenda. It is almost impossible to combat because any man (or woman) who raises an eyebrow (let alone a voice) in protest is immediately branded "a woman hater," "misogynist," or a supporter of the oppression of women. It is a very clever tactic. I suppose people who questioned the tactics and rhetoric of totalitarian governments were labelled traitors and enemies of the state in times gone by.

This tactic has been very successful, and only the bravest of people will take the risk of wearing such labels by attempting to address this horrendous imbalance in the way each gender is represented in our Western culture.

Often this bigotry comes in the form of outrageous double standards that are so common most people barely register the fact that they are watching bigotry on their screen. Two of the more mild examples of this happened while I was watching The Big Bang Theory only this week. In the first episode, Penny (an attractive young woman) was comforting a nerdy friend. He mistook her affection for something more. He attempted to kiss her, and she promptly smashed his nose with her fist. In the following scene, we see the man with two black eyes and a swollen nose with bloodied tissue sticking out of both nostrils. A series of jokes were then made about the bashing.

Try to imagine for one moment the scenario being reversed. The show would be banned from our screens, and feminists on soap boxes—both male and female—would hold this show up as yet another example of the hatred and contempt our society feels for women and how little we value their lives. The following night, Penny told Sheldon she would "kick him in the nuts" if he continued to annoy her—cue laughter and hilarity.

Imagine if Sheldon had said, "I'll kick you in the vagina if you annoy me again!" The outrage would have been fierce. Why? A man is every bit as vulnerable as a woman when it comes to being kicked in the genitals and, in fact, more so. The notion that we are physically stronger bears no relevance. Why is the infliction of pain and injury upon a man so often the cause of mirth among people? The vagina threat would never have been allowed to be spoken on this show. Perhaps a similar comment may be used in a film depicting some "typical" wife-abusing low-life, but a popular comedy? I think not. This simple example is enough on its own to demonstrate the double standards present in our society.

A man recently made the comment that if we wished to see the true value of men in Western society, we need only imagine a man having his penis cut off and being found lying in a gutter, bleeding profusely. The commentator was certain that within 24 hours the poor fellow would be the punchline of countless jokes on TV talk shows, newspaper columns, cartoons, and in the Twittersphere. Does he exaggerate? Sadly, no.

Some time ago, a woman by the name of Lorena Bobbitt cut off her husband's penis while he slept. She was arrested but very quickly became the "victim." Then the true horror show began. Hundreds of woman gathered in the streets, chanting for Lorena and calling her a hero. T-shirts with cruel captions expressing great glee over the mutilation of a man none of them knew sold like hotcakes. It was enough simply to know he was a man. She was a celebrity guest on a range of TV talk shows and appeared on stage with at least one comedian (David Statton), who asked her if she had lopped off any more penises lately. This brought roars of laughter from the crowd and a giggle from the happy hacker. To this day, her name seems to bring a smirk to the faces of many women.

We are constantly told we live in a man's world where the lives of women are demeaned and devalued. This is clearly untrue. Such scenarios would never occur if the mutilated victim of a violent attack was a woman.

Never.

All of the incredibly strong feelings this issue has always stirred in my heart were crystallized for me by an incident that took place a few months ago on an American TV talk show. This program is, in fact, titled The Talk, and it operates in a similar manner to women's shows like The View or our local version, The Circle.

A woman—Catherine Kieu Becker—had drugged her husband, tied him to his bed, and when he woke up, she had sliced off his penis and thrown it in the garbage disposal unit, shredding it beyond repair. What was the reason for this savagery? Earlier that night he had told her he wanted a divorce.

The talk show hosts, including Sharon Osbourne, focused on this incident on their TV show. For some eight to ten minutes they entertained their predominantly female audience with comments like these:

"I do think it's quite fabulous!" Cackling laughter.

"That will teach him!" More mirth.

"She should have thrown it in the dog's bowl!" Further hilarity.

"Why should the dog suffer?"

"Can you just imagine that thing whizzing around? Hysterical!" This was accompanied by finger gestures.

"I'll light candles by her picture."

There was more, but this will give you the general tone of the conversation. These women did not lose their jobs. They did not have their media careers even slightly tarnished by this commentary. This poor man was recovering in hospital, facing a future that has been irreparably damaged by this shocking act, and only days after the incident he was the subject of hilarity among a large group of women.

We all recall the unbelievable fallout when Sam Newman had the gall to undress a mannequin dummy on The Footy Show. The same Footy Show that raises hundreds of thousands of dollars for breast cancer and promotes women's involvement in our game has never in its long history for one moment joyfully celebrated the mutilation of a woman. Yet the show is regularly labelled misogynistic and anti-women. Newman was actually suspended from the show for some time for his mannequin misdemeanour, and many outraged media commentators attacked his actions.

Sharon Osbourne continues to appear as a judge on TV shows and does all kinds of media work. The "apology" she begrudgingly gave in between suppressed giggles was almost as offensive as the comment she and her co-hosts had made the day before.

How it is possible for any fair-minded, honest person to deny the evidence of misandry that we witness every day in our mainstream media? There is no need to trawl the net for some anonymous creep posting nasty comments. Just turn on your televisions or read your daily paper.

In Her Own Words: I lost my brother to his abusive wife, part II

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 14 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 14 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month 2014. "LostMyBro" continues her story from yesterday.

While Katie was sicking her fashion police on me, my brother started making some off the wall demands of my mom. He told her she needed to kick in money for the wedding and chase down Katie's "irresponsible friends" (who we'd never met) to plan her bridal shower. He was constantly calling my mom up and telling her what she was or wasn't doing that was offending Katie.

Katie did a great job of painting herself as the victim during this time. My mom tried to go over to their home one day to smooth things out, but instead my brother and Katie screamed at and lectured her for over two hours about my inappropriate dress and everything else under the sun that Katie found offensive. We were damned if we did and damned if we didn't.

Things got so bad at one point that my entire family (over half their guest list) wasn't sure they were going to the wedding. Katie didn't care what she had to do to get her way. She was throwing innocent family members under the bus to prove her point. She twisted and turned everyone's words and used them to her advantage. I even had to block her and my brother on Facebook because she kept insisting that everything I wrote, was somehow a cryptic, negative message about her.

She lied and did whatever it took to make herself the victim. She was so mad about my dress that she even admitted to my mom that she went to the store to try it on for herself! Of course her story changed when she realized how crazy that sounded.

In the end, I wasn't invited to their wedding. My mom went and was miserable the entire time. Our once, close-knit, tight unit was completely busted apart within a matter of a few weeks. Keep in mind, by the time they had gotten married both my mother and I had only met Katie a handful of times. Most of those times we didn't get much one on one time with her because they were at a party. She seemed way too comfortable and thought she had the freedom to say whatever she wanted, even if it was hurtful.

Katie took no responsibility for the way things went. She put the entire blame on my brother and my brother willingly accepted it. I went an entire six months of not speaking with him. My mom and him would speak every now and again, but every time they spoke, they would end up in a fight.

I hadn't spoken to my brother in months, then one day as I was cooking dinner, I heard a knock at the door. I turned around and to my surprise it was my brother. He looked completely frazzled and stressed out. He opened the door and immediately started to apologize for everything that had happened and asked if I wanted to go for a ride and talk.

I invited him in, but he seemed very nervous to be in my home. His phone kept going off in his pocket and he finally excused himself to take the call. He stepped out onto my front porch and all I heard was him yelling. It was Katie. I thought they were fighting because he was at my home, but I couldn't hear exactly what was being said. All I could hear is my brother speaking very loudly to a person who seemed to be screaming irrationally on the other end.

He fought with her for about 15 minutes and came back in. He now seemed even more stressed and out of sorts and he just wanted to get in the car so we could go talk. As we drove off my block, he had explained that he had started seeing a therapist to learn how to deal with Katie and that she was mad at him because he wouldn't tell her exactly what he and the therapist discussed. She was also mad that he had chosen a female therapist.

As he was talking, I noticed Katie's name kept popping up on the navigation screen in his car. My brother ignored her calls for a minute and further explained that things weren't going well. They were only married for two months and apparently some major problems had already started to occur.

Katie kept calling. He couldn't even talk straight and finally I asked him if she knew that he was with me and he replied, with a very stern, "Noooooo!" He said he wanted to try to fix our relationship, but it would have to be kept secret from Katie for a while until he figured out a way to deal with her. As she kept calling, I saw his nerves getting more and more tense until finally, I told him he should answer it. He told me not to make a peep.

What I heard was the most angry, intense and demonic voice coming from the earpiece of his iphone. She was so irate, screaming at him that he needed to come home and gather his stuff before she threw it out on the lawn and destroyed it all. She kept screaming and repeating over and over that he needs to be home with in ten minutes or that she was done with him.

He hung up the phone and told me he had to go. He raced back to my house and dropped me off saying he'd be back soon. He never returned. I was terrified for him. I didn't know what to do, but before he left I assured him I would always be here if he needed me.

The next morning he called me from his phone at work and asked me to download AOL Instant Messenger, so we could chat. Once I did, he apologized for all of the commotion and drama from the night before. I was just happy to hear for him. He started to explain that in the weeks prior, he started to do some research online and had come to the conclusion that his wife was most likely suffering from Borderline Personality Disorder (BPD) and that's why she acts the way she acts.

He explained she had, "an intense fear of losing him"and that "she did crazy things because of it." He also explained that she feels threatened by the close relationship him, my mom and I share and that he needs to show her his love for us is different from his love for her and there's enough to go around. He told me he never wanted to go that long without speaking and that he was very sorry for what he did to me. He admitted it was all her but said that "it was him too and for the wrong reasons."

Before he ended the chat, he asked that I not call his phone nor text him and that if I wanted to contact him, that I do so only on AOL during the times he was at work. I agreed. I was desperate to get back the relationship we once had.

A month went by and I didn't hear from him except for two times I when I emailed him and he came back with one word answers. I was kind of upset. I was hopeful things were going to get better, but nothing had really changed. He had still missed almost 6 months of my son, his only nephew's life, that he'll never get back.

In a bid to try to push him to tell his wife he wanted to have a relationship with me, I wrote to him, explaining that I wanted him in my life, but felt weird about having to keep it a secret from his wife. At the same time, I assured him that I'd always be there for him, no matter what. My hopes however, were squashed when I didn't hear back from him. She had successfully Hoovered him back in and once again, his immediate family was put on the back burner.

In two weeks, it will be an entire year since I've been "no contact" with my brother. He barely calls our mother. I've tried reaching out to him many times in the past few months but he doesn't answer. It's like he has completely vanished from the face of the earth. He used to be very active on social media sites and now he hardly ever posts.

I highly doubt he does anything the "old him" used to do. She has told some family members that she often logs in, under his Facebook page. In July, I threw a surprise party for our mom for her 60th birthday. I invited him, but not his wife, seeing that she can't stand me and won't allow my brother to speak with me. I knew she wouldn't want to come either way but I wanted him to know he was still welcome to be a part of our lives. He didn't show or respond to the invite.

After the party, I made once last attempt to make amends. I offered to sit down and try to repair the damage, but what I got in response was a 15 paragraph letter telling me how I need to learn how to take the high road. Basically, he suggested I try to be nice to his wife and even if she's still a bitch, well at least I could say I tried. I doubt he even penned the letter himself.

In a nutshell, he told me there is no chance of us ever having a relationship as long as she's around. Unless I grovel at her feet and kiss the ground she walks on, she wants nothing to do with me. No thanks!

My brother has missed the best year of my son's life and he will never get that back. I'm not sure I even want a relationship anymore with the new person he's become. I haven't seen the real him since before Katie entered his life. Katie's doesn't even talk to her own sister because her sister's husband either , "threatened to kill" or "tried to kill her" (another story that changes depending on how much sympathy she's trying to illicit from you).

Also, she is now pregnant. I'm am so scared for that baby. I know she will use it as leverage against him. My mom is devastated. She knows if she doesn't keep in line with what his wife wants, she will never see her grand baby. My brother is not allowed to see my mom without his wife being present either.

I saw him last week at a party. We didn't speak or even make contact. It was really sad. I watched him stare at my son playing in the yard and I saw the sadness in his eyes. He looked torn. Torn between the old him and the new him. My brother is gone. I have to mourn and accept the fact that he will no longer be in my life. People used to tell us that they've never seen a brother and sister get along so good. Skeeter and Scooter. That's what they used to call us. Now he is gone. I lost my brother to Borderline!

Sam Allouba · 14 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

On October 9, 2014, the University of Toronto's Men's Issues Awareness Society hosted a talk by Lynne MacDonell, who spoke about sexual abuse of men and boys, in particular abuse of boys within the penal system. The talk was sponsored by the Canadian Association for Equality (CAFE, pronounced café). CAFE is a non-profit charity that seeks to address issues of gender inequality in society, with a focus at this time on issues faced by men and boys. The event went well, despite a couple of setbacks beforehand, such as a police presence being required and a venue change.

MacDonell is mental health practitioner, therapist, and men's support group leader. She is also part of the team that runs MaleSurvivor.org, which is an online support group dedicated to men who are victims of sexual assault. They offer resources, access to health care professionals, and recovery programs for their patients. MacDonell spoke about her time in the mental health field and how she found that, while working in an addiction treatment centre, the one thing that affected the male patients the most was childhood sexual abuse. She sought to understand why this was the case. She also worked with women in this capacity, but eventually realized that female victims had plenty of places to which they could be referred to for further treatment. As one would expect, there weren't any available to men.

Some of the facts she provided were unsettling, to say the least. Approximately one out of every six men has been sexually abused in their lifetime. It has been reported that 90% of sexual exploitation incidents within juvenile facilities are perpetrated by female guards against young males, according to Josh Vorhees in the National Post. Or if you prefer something more hard-hitting, have a look at this report from the U.S. Bureau of Justice Studies, published in 2012. Specifically, go to page 23 and see table 14. An estimated 92.4% of youth who reported staff sexual misconduct said they were victimized by female facility staff. This sort of behaviour is wrong on so many levels. These women are in positions of authority and they are abusing that authority while they're supposed to be ensuring a safe environment for the boys in the penal system. If that isn't rape, I don't know what is, despite what certain members of academia would like us to believe.

MacDonell also outlined ways in which men cope with their victimization, such as internalizing their problems or believing that they aren't true victims because they're men. She pointed out what happens to men who come forward and seek help. If these men aren't flat-out denied the help they want, then they are told that sexual assault against men is simply impossible by virtue of their being male, or that the institution they have gone to doesn't know to how to help them. MacDonell believes that the social atmosphere surrounding male victims will change in time, even if people are only just starting to catch on. After all, nothing lasts forever.

CAFE, of course, is famous (or infamous, depending on who you ask) for the protests that have been known to accompany their events, most notably in November 2012 when Warren Farrell came to the University of Toronto and again in April 2013 when Paul Nathanson and Kathy Young came to the same campus. Thankfully, this event proceeded without incident. There was one attendee who walked in with two of her friends and, based on the way she presented herself, seemed like the sort of person who was going to cause a scene, but they left about 10 minutes into MacDonell's talk. I must admit that I was disappointed by that. When you see the video footage from the previously mentioned events as much as I have, part of you eventually starts to wonder if it could happen in reality for a third time. I would like to experience it for myself, just for the sake of it, but I think the esteemed VIPs have decided that being recorded singing about crying rivers over male suicide victims isn't the best idea in the world.

Ultimately, at the end of the talk, the big question I had for myself (and I suppose I should've asked MacDonell this in person) is why do we, as a society, have such a hard time admitting to ourselves that men can be victims and women can be criminals? The thing is, we know both of these things are possible. Even the staunchest, most rabid, misandric feminists know this. But even more moderate people who don't associate with any kind of ideological group have a hard time admitting either of those things without coming up with some kind of excuse. To my original question, well, I don't have an answer. I wish I did, but I don't. I only take solace in the knowledge that there are people like Lynne MacDonell out there giving male victims the help they need and that there is a little bit the rest of us can do too. It's why I took time out of my Thursday evening. I hope more of us decide to do the same in future.

Crack undercover reporter infiltrates completely open public meeting

Tom Voltz · 14 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

As we reported in a recent article, during last month's hugely successful Melbourne meetup, we assembled some great and highly dedicated MHRAs and achieved a great deal. It was a privilege to have the opportunity to meet with them face to face, and an enjoyable time was had by all. What we did not report, however, was that after about half of us had said our farewells and left for the afternoon, the group began discussing the slightly odd behaviour of one of the attendees, a young man going by the pseudonym "Jordan Jennings." We suspected he'd been less than straight with us and perhaps had ulterior motives but concluded that that seemed unlikely because who would go to the trouble of "infiltrating" an open public meeting? The truth is, the meetup in Melbourne had been open to anybody who wanted to come–even feminists–providing they agreed to be civil. The fact that "Jordan" had contacted us out of the blue claiming to want to get involved in activism while having no known posting history on any men's rights forum or blog, his clichéd "backstory," his readily apparent lack of knowledge of any men's issues, his reluctance to engage in discussion, his lack of interest in the people present, and his rapid departure seemed quite out of place to us.

So when VICE Magazine published an article entitled "I Infiltrated a Men's Rights Group," we were not particularly surprised.

Now, I should point out that we actually don't mind at all that he attended. It's not like we were hiding anything, and as mentioned above, it was a completely public meeting. The main question I have is "Why?" Why would anyone bother to "infiltrate" a meeting that he would have been more than welcome to attend anyway had he simply asked? It's a complete mystery to us. Perhaps he thought that if we didn't know his real intentions, he would catch us out being the hateful misogynists that he obviously thought we would be (and seems disappointed that we aren't). Perhaps he just assumed that this was some sort of closed secret gathering. Who knows? All we know of his intentions is what he claims, which is that he came because he wanted to:

> understand something about [MRAs] outside of their din of blog posts and YouTube videos.

Yet, despite having had a golden opportunity to question us and initiate discussion on any issue he liked, he didn't even so much as ask a single question or participate in discussion on any issue. In fact, during the very brief time he was there, he barely engaged at all. That doesn't seem like the actions of someone with a genuine desire to understand the MHRM better to me. On the contrary, after reading his article, it is clear that his entire approach was merely an attempt to justify his preconceived ideas and biases about who we are and what we think. I'm not surprised, but I am disappointed.

After reading the piece penned by "Jordan"–or, rather, "Kane" as he identifies himself in the article–I find that I'm not particularly impressed with it, as it reflects precisely the lack of engagement he displayed at the meetup. Criticism is not the issue here, but rather his ignorance. If I wrote an article on feminism that displayed a similar level of ignorance about the ideology's core beliefs, frankly I'd be embarrassed. I have no idea whether Kane identifies as a feminist or if he has just been indoctrinated by our society's pervasive gynocentric worldview, but whatever the case, it really is a poor piece of journalism. It's great echo-chamber propaganda, which is I suspect how such a shoddy article got to be published in the first place.

But as a vehicle for achieving Kane's stated purpose of understanding MHRAs? It fails on just about every front. There are three primary reasons for this:

1. Bias–Kane came to the meeting carrying a huge amount of baggage in the form of preconceived ideas about us and didn't have the professional detachment necessary to put that aside and be objective. Instead he simply projected his biases onto the events he witnessed, thus completely misinterpreting them in the process.

2. Ignorance–He has only a very superficial knowledge of the actual issues, goals, and views held by the bulk of the MHRM. Most of his beliefs about us are based on standard feminist misrepresentations or just plain ignorance. He has very little idea about what we really think, and this is just as apparent in his article as it was to us at the meeting. Perhaps if Kane had actually done his homework before attending our meeting and read or listened to some of the MHRM's "din of blog posts and YouTube videos," as he describes it, perhaps he would have had a much better idea of what he was witnessing, thus giving his readers some actual facts to consider rather than just anti-MHRM propaganda.
3. Intentions–Despite his claims of wanting to better understand us, he really had no genuine interest in finding out what we really think or why we do what we do. He had every opportunity to ask questions and discuss issues with us at the meeting but simply couldn't be bothered or didn't think it was important. This reveals a fundamental disinterest in learning or reporting the truth and uncovers his true aim of broadcasting his predetermined stereotypes. He had no desire to discover and report the facts–his goal from the very start was merely to air his preconceived opinions on the MHRM.

Kane isn't shy about declaring his prejudices, as we can see from the very first line of his article:

> I, like most people I know, am indignant at the very idea of men's rights activists.

He is indignant, don't y'know? At the very idea! He gives no reasoning for this indignation so we are left to guess as to why he finds it so outrageous. Is he a bigot who believes that men are less than human somehow and therefore don't deserve equal rights? Is he labouring under the misconception that men already have more rights than women? The only hint to his state of mind is a long yawn-fest of typical shaming language:

> The idea of a bunch of little man babies screaming about the evil militant feminists stealing their rights feels galling.

The fact that MHRAs exist simply feels bad to him, and this is supposed to suffice as a justification for why we should not exist. This is a common pattern among post-modernist "thinkers" like feminists. Contrary to 400 years of scientific discovery, they seem to believe that feelings are at least as valid as facts, and Kane is apparently no exception in this. His entire article is riddled with emotional reasoning, attempts at shaming, and flat-out derision, but he includes not a single logical argument or fact.

I wish I could say I am surprised, especially about the shaming language, but sadly I am not. MHRAs are used to seeing this sort of shaming language thrown at them, but it no longer has an impact on most because we now recognize it for what it is: an attempt to silence men whenever they complain about the injustices that are done to them. Being told to stop bothering society with petty details like the violation of our human rights simply isn't going to work anymore; the genie is very much out of the bottle and it's not going to be shamed into going back in.

Kane continues to berate us for our supposed paranoia by calling us out for wanting our individual privacy respected:

> They are tremendously concerned about not being identified….The meeting place and time wasn't published on the forum …

Gee, I wonder why? Could it be the fact that feminists have a long history of making death threats, blocking access to events and harassing attendees, disrupting academic lectures, assembling violent mobs, and just generally being arsehats? The truth is we had very good reasons for not publicly announcing the location in advance. We didn't want our meeting disrupted and the Young & Jackson Hotel staff and patrons disturbed by mobs of angry feminists yelling, pulling fire alarms, and making a nuisance of themselves. Any feminist who had contacted us and asked to attend (and agreed not to be disruptive), however, would have been more than welcome-we just didn't want a noisy, disruptive, potentially dangerous mob waiting for us. The fact that Kane fails to acknowledge this is, once again, indicative of his ignorance and biases. Instead of educating himself on this, or even just asking us, he prefers to impugn us by implying that we are paranoid.

None of Kane's ranting about our existence really bothers me, nor does it bother any of the other MRAs I know who have read his article. What was most disheartening, though, was his dismissal of the violation of our collective human rights as merely the capriciousness of the legal system:

> It's, perhaps, easier to rail against institutions they feel prosecute and punish their shared manhood than deal with the idea that they suffered an injustice — but that injustice may have been meted out capriciously or through the failure of individuals rather than large-scale systems.

Kane is obviously blissfully unaware that the system he denies is abusive with a wave of his hand clearly isn't merely capricious, and that the abused men whose eyes he had to look into were not simply random victims of unthinking incompetence. The unjust outcomes of this system display a clear and unambiguous pattern of discrimination against men and in favour of women, as evidenced by the following examples:

1. Mothers still receive full or primary custody after divorce in upwards of 80% of cases. In the few cases where they do get primary custody, fathers are 16% less likely to receive child support, and in the few cases where he does, he receives less on average than the mother does.
2. Women receive, on average, over 60% less jail time than men, even when offense, criminal history, and other pre-charge observables are taken into consideration. Female arrestees are also significantly more likely to avoid charges and convictions entirely, and are twice as likely as men to avoid incarceration if convicted.
3. Despite the fact that approximately 40% of domestic violence victims are male, very few, if any, shelters or other services exist to help them and the children they are protecting when they flee an abusive relationship. Furthermore, the feminist-inspired "Duluth model," coupled with police "primary aggressor" and "mandatory arrest" policies, have resulted in a situation in many countries where male victims of DV are actually being arrested & charged rather than being assisted, even when it is clear that they are the victim rather than the perpetrator and even when it was they who called the police in search of protection. Not only is this a gross injustice, but it also deters a male victim from seeking help in the first place because of the well-founded fear that it will be him, and not his female abuser, who is arrested if he calls the police.

For the sake of brevity I will limit myself to these three examples, but there are a least a dozen more just like these where the government, courts, educational systems, and non-governmental institutions all systematically discriminate against men and favour women in a wide range of areas. The evidence is clear that these unjust outcomes are not simply a case of the failure of individuals, or the indiscriminate nature of a blind capricious system, but are a systematic targeting of men and men only. Kane doesn't know this, and that's fine if you're a nobody with an opinion, but if you're going to pretend to be a journalist you have an ethical obligation to do better. Again, had he just raised the issue, we would have been only too happy to enlighten him, and even give him references he could use to check the facts for himself.

Yet again, however, he preferred to rely on pure ignorance-based speculation and his preconceived notions of MHRAs.

After this, his article unfortunately degenerates even further into caricature designed purely to arouse emotions of contempt in the reader:

> looking around the table, they looked exactly how I thought they would. Self-awareness has its limits, I guess.

I have no idea what he expected us to look like, but I can tell you this: attendees ranged in age from 22 to late middle age, with a wide range of ethnic backgrounds including Middle Eastern, Indigenous Australian, South

Asian, Mediterranean, and Eastern European, as well as your standard white European-Australian. We were bearded and clean-shaven, had long and short hair (or no hair at all). We wore shirts and ties and T-shirts and jeans. We were short and tall, fat and skinny, and everything in between. About the only thing we all had in common was that we were male, which should come as no shock. Quite frankly I just don't believe Kane when he says we all looked exactly how he thought we would. The statement comes across more as a balm to soothe his own conscience than anything else. In fact, that's how the entire final paragraph sounds:

> I was disturbed by how easily anti-feminist rhetoric came out of my mouth, how easy it was to lock into a hateful groove …

Kane was ultimately faced with the humanity of the men he'd hitherto chosen to hate. Hearing their stories and how they'd decided to band together to do something about it seems to have caused such painful cognitive dissonance that he'd had to leave and have that dissonance healed. I suspect Kane wrote his article more to reassure himself of his own moral righteousness than for any other reason, and the pleading tone certainly comes through strongly toward the end.

Sadly, for people of Kane's mindset, criticism of the excesses of feminism is in itself hateful. It's not an ideology to be examined or critiqued, but a holy dogma that must not be questioned on pain of politically correct sanction. We can only hope that with the changes that the MHRM seeks, young Kane will never have to be one of those same damaged men sitting in a pub seeking to put things right.

Woman abusing man in Sri Lanka

It's still Domestic Violence Awareness Month 2014, and we noticed that this particular video seems to be appearing and disappearing from various parts of the internet. So we thought we'd save a copy for people to see here.

What more can you say? Most men will not hit women, even in circumstances like this, and yet we live in a cultural mileau which behaves as if "violence against women" is the primary scourge of the world.

In His Own Words: Abused men who suffer in silence

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 15 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 15 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month. Alan shares his story of abuse by his Borderline Personality Disordered ex-wife and the Family Court.

I have suffered in silence.

Dr. T, I am writing this down for you because I can't remain silent and be able to move on from the hell that was my engagement and marriage.

I met my now ex-wife back in 2011. We got together and dated for about 6 months before we got engaged.

The wedding took place almost a year later. We had our fights and stuff, but it got really bad before the wedding. I was about to leave and she used her family to bully me into going through with the marriage. Against the advisement of family and friends, I went through with it. Things were okay for about three months. After that, it all went to complete hell.

She would start arguments and go on a yelling rampage while calling me every name in the book. She expected me to work full time AND take care of the house. She wanted to take responsibility for getting the bills paid. The problem is, she never took the time to pay the bills.

She got her car repo'd, never dropped off rent, and never paid anything else. It was all my fault according to her. I worked over 80 hours a week, and, "I was never home and neglectful." When I had days off, she would say, "You're not making enough money."

I got to a point where I would ignore her when she wanted to fight. She started physically assaulting me to force me to argue. She would punch me in the back repeatedly when I was trying to sleep.

This went on for the next 9 months. In that time, she got pregnant. Yes, my daughter is mine. No, I didn't enjoy being with her intimately because it was always about her and when she felt like I deserved it. She made me feel like a toy.

Her outbursts and combativeness got worse during the pregnancy. She arbitrarily decided that she was leaving one night and, in a hysterical rage, packed a bag and went to walk down the road at 10 at night while she was nine months pregnant. After our daughter was born, she calmed down a bit or so I thought. In reality, she got even worse.

I would come home to find our daughter lying on the floor in front of the TV. By my ex's own admission, she would let her lay there and scream for hours on end. I only had to pick our daughter up for five minutes, and she would go to sleep in my arms. I also had to pick my daughter up from a bar where my ex decided to go drinking. Then the day came when I realized I couldn't save this marriage.

I came home from a five day shift in the field (oilfields). I just wanted to sleep, and she wanted to argue and fight. She started pushing me around. I locked myself in the bathroom and slept on the floor to get away.

I knew I couldn't call the police. They would have arrested me just because I am a male. She then threatened to kill everyone in the house, took our daughter, said she would make sure I never saw her again, got in the car, and took off. The next day, I filed for orders of protection against her along with divorce.

I notified the city PD about the death threats. They said they couldn't help me until she followed through with it. I am not kidding.

The county sheriff went to serve her with the orders of protection and the divorce papers. She evaded the county sheriff for a week. She checked into an abused women's shelter. She went to a district court and had orders filed against me.

I didn't run from the process server or try to hide. I accepted them and turned in my concealed handgun permit to the sheriff and surrendered my firearms to a trusted friend in accordance with the law. The sheriff wrote a letter to the court explaining that I complied immediately and that he knew me well enough to know that the orders against me were unwarranted.

The first court hearing in the case was supposed to be to make my orders of protection against her permanent. Since I filed in county court, the district court judge that she went to threw my orders out without properly notifying me. So, in the first hearing of this whole mess, the judge (Elizabeth Strobel, Weld County Colorado, District 9) would only listen to my ex's case. She told my attorney and me that she didn't want to hear anything from us.

This was the first time she allowed my ex to leave the state with my daughter. At this point, I hadn't seen her in almost a month. Fortunately, the orders against me were dropped, but only because my ex felt like it.

The second hearing established parenting time. Long story short, she interfered non-stop. She violated court orders and the judge said that she wouldn't hold my ex in contempt. The judge enabled her to be even more abusive, while separating me from my daughter even more. I was ordered to pay her more money than I could afford. I lost the house and had to move into a friend's place. Right now, I still don't have a place of my own.

For the last hearing, we went to a CFI. My ex admitted to him that she checked into the abuse shelter under false pretenses. He also noted that she showed strong symptoms of BPD along with HPD. The judge decided to allow my ex to leave the state permanently with my daughter. Her reasoning was that because I am a male, I am not biologically equipped to be a parent, and because I work full time, I am not qualified to be a parent. Under state law, my ex can not collect alimony because we were married for less than two years at the time of filing. I only pay child support now.

My ex still harasses me from a distance. She uses my daughter as a weapon to attack me. She interferes with the court orderd contact. She always has an excuse for why she can't let me talk to her on Skype. The judge won't hold her in contempt. The judge enables her abuse to continue.

I will never be free from this hell. I don't care about myself in this though. What really bothers me the most, is that my daughter is stuck with it, and is being used as a weapon of war against me. She doesn't deserve that, and I wish I knew how to save her from it.

I looked for help. I tried to talk to an abuse counselor. They didn't care about me, and said they couldn't help me. There was no help. And there isn't any for other men like me…

Anonymous feminist provides Anita Sarkeesian with a potential new source of revenue

andybob · 15 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

David Futrelle is beside himself with gleeful horror at the revelation that a so-called death threat was sent via email to several campus officials at the Utah State University, warning them that allowing the allegedly beleaguered Anita Sarkeesian to speak there would result in "the deadliest school shooting in American history."

http://wehuntedthemammoth.com/2014/10/14/anita-sarkeesian-cancels-talk-at-utah-state-after-receiving-threat-of-another-montreal-massacre/#more-13798

"I'm giving you a chance to stop it," the email author added thoughtfully. Even for an entirely fictitious MHRA psycho, I thought that was terribly decent of him.

You see, like many actual MHRAs, I have come to regard all claims made by, and on behalf of, this woman with a cynically weary eye. The fact that Anita Sarkeesian manages to remain miraculously unscathed—which I strongly desire to continue—amidst her numerous, unsupported claims of threats to her person is only a minor reason for my cynicism. So is her uncanny ability to time these damseling episodes for maximum effect, publicity, and fiscal reward.

This time, my cynicism is driven by the fact that this particular "threat" is such a transparent fraud that only a complete cretin could possibly fall for it. As if on cue: "All this because she made some videos discussing sexism in fucking video games," wails Futrelle, rather obscenely, as he makes another embarrassing attempt to mount his very nervous-looking steed to defend Sarkeesian—a woman whose only imminent danger seems to be her ill-advised penchant for wearing earrings as big as her head.

"Feminists have ruined my life and I will have my revenge, for my sake and the sake of all the others they've wronged." The only thing missing is the swish of "his" cape as he exits, stage left, with his "semi-automatic rifle, multiple pistols, and a collection of pipe bombs" cunningly concealed beneath "his" jauntily angled fedora.

By "all this," Futrelle is, of course, referring to the email sent to officials at Utah State University. Here it is in its entirety:

There is no doubt whatsoever that this email was written by a feminist posing as an MHRA. The entirely fictitious character, who is supposed to have written it, conforms so closely to the feminist mischaracterization of MHRAs as dangerously violent psychopaths who dream of brutally silencing women that it could only have been written by someone whose goal was to maintain and embellish this outrageously slanderous threat narrative.

The character created as the author of the email is an artful pastiche of those mythical MHRAs, Elliot Rodger and Marc Lépine, neither of whom had any connection with known MHR organizations, despite fraudulent feminist claims to the contrary. They were personality-disordered psychopaths—who certainly loathed women yet mysteriously managed to include a significant number of men among their victims—but they were definitely not MHRAs.

The feminist author promises to "write my manifesto in her spilled blood" in order to raise the spectre of Rodger, who wrote a lengthy manifesto that primarily detailed his inability to get laid and revealed that he was the kind of sad and crazy pussy-beggar who would probably have been persona non grata in the MHRM had he ever attempted to gain entry—which he never did.

Marc Lépine is referenced with the comment: "feminists have ruined my life and I will have my revenge, for my sake and the sake of all the others they've wronged." This is intended to echo Lépine's statement in his suicide statement that "I have decided to send the feminists, who have always ruined my life, to their Maker." The author must have been concerned that the connection may have been missed because she heralds Lépine as her “hero” and promises to carry out a “Montreal Massacre style attack” against the attendees of Sarkeesian’s planned talk.

The “MHRM produces crazed murderers who target women” threat narrative has been so closely observed throughout the text of the email that it could only have been written by someone who assisted in its construction. Two of the reasons why feminists posing as MHRAs are so easy to detect are the style of language they employ and the fact that their purported representation of MHRAs has the unmistakable tone of caricature that frequently devolves into the realm of pantomime.

“Anita Sarkeesian is everything wrong with the feminist woman, and she is going to die screaming like the craven little whore that she is if you let her come to USU.”

Really? And her little dog too?

This statement sounds more like it came from Snow White’s wicked stepmother as she raises a Sarkeesianesque eyebrow in envious rage than a real-life psycho. There isn’t the slightest hint of articulated performance in the glib and terrifying words of genuinely deranged psychopaths like Elliot Rodger and Marc Lépine. They expressed their evil intentions with a glibness that was almost surgical in their coldness and disregard for the sanctity of human life. Compare the cartoonish nonsense about writing manifestos in “her spilled blood” with this quote from Lépine’s suicide statement:

“For seven years life has brought me no joy and being totally blasé, I have decided to put an end to those viragos.”

The chilling sincerity is believable in a way that the email sent to Utah State University is not. The only commonality between the anonymous email, Marc Lépine’s suicide statement, and Elliot Rodger’s manifesto is that none of them were written by MHRAs. They were written by people whose bigotry and desire to enact violent revenge on their ideological opponents are consistently and unequivocally condemned by A Voice for Men, the flagship of the MHRM.

The only question that remains is: Who has a history of making death threats via emails to venues hosting talks on potentially contentious issues and has a vested interest in publicly demonizing the MHRM by maintaining a false threat narrative through attempted character assassination and misrepresenting everything we stand for? If you answered “feminists” without sneaking a peak at the key below, congratulations, you are no longer a newbie in the MHRM.

Of course, there is always the possibility that I am wrong and that the email was actually sent by an MHRA whom no one in the movement has ever heard of. If you believe that, then you probably also believe that Chanty Binx has rolled up the sleeves of her white lab coat and is currently working hard on men’s issues in Paul Elam’s sammich mines.

It is important to note that evidence suggesting that Anita Sarkeesian colluded in this fraud is as non-existent as the evidence proving that the email was written by an MHRA—and this article does not suggest otherwise.

An Autistic Critique of Feminism: A Humanitarian on the Autism Spectrum Refuses to be Silenced about the Overlooked Side of Social Justice

By Laurie A. Couture

People on the Autism spectrum look at the world in a truly unique manner. What the rest of the world labels as "a disability" is, to those of us on the spectrum, a creative, neurological diversity in how we process information and adjust our "lenses" in viewing the world: Many people on the spectrum can "zoom in" to see miniscule yet crucial details of a situation. I can also pull back the lens and see the extreme whole of a situation, connecting groups of facts across disciplines and fields that may seem to have no apparent relationships. I can do both of these "lens adjustment" feats simultaneously.

Despite the social and sensory challenges of being on the spectrum, I have worked as a professional in the human services and as an advocate of social justice for nearly two decades. I have worked with thousands of hurting children and families in multiple roles, including as a mental health counselor, parenting coach, social worker, educator and mentor. I am also the proud Mom of a 20 year old son I adopted from the foster care system when he was 11. Like many on the spectrum, I also enjoy research, especially of psychology, anthropology, child development, neurology, human attachment theory, learning theory and trauma's effect on the human brain. I am able to translate all of my experiences of working with people affected by violence, my own personal experiences of helping to protect and heal my son and the data extracted from my multidisciplinary research into a mosaic of understanding humanity as a whole. In other words, I can see the threads of how childhood trauma and attachment breaks in each individual family lead to the tragic tapestry of global human suffering. Family violence is almost always a symptom of trauma and unmet emotional and physical needs, usually in the childhoods of the adults. I believe that hurt people need compassion, healing and guidance, not punishment. My passion is to heal human suffering at its root causes and to offer people compassion and hope.

When women and girls are victims, I have found that compassion and fierce political action from our society abounds. There is no resistance from professionals or from the media to raising awareness to the suffering and needs of girls and women. I have always expected equally passionate attention to be given to the needs and suffering of boys and men. However, I have continuously run up against an aggressive blockage when I attempt to raise awareness about the suffering and needs of boys and men and how violence in males is a direct result of childhood trauma. The blockage has come repeatedly from feminists who run most social justice and human service programs as well as from media that is feminist-influenced.

After years of exhaustive attempts to find a forum for these issues in media that is social justice-focused, I have been dismayed to find that it is often frowned upon to mention males as a group unless it is to criticize, blame or even degrade them. Especially taboo is acknowledging the high prevalence of sexual and domestic violence against males, the growing number of female perpetrators of sexual and domestic violence, the mass pathologizing and drugging of boys in schools, the shaming of males in the media, the fact that 80% of suicides are boys and men and that one of the most ignored human rights violations in America is Male Genital Mutilation. Many social justice campaigns and democratic-minded media will not allow for any serious ongoing discussion of these issues except to minimize, ignore or even mock them. The recent United Nations-backed HeForShe campaign is a good example of campaigns that omit attention to sexual and domestic violence against boys and men. The campaign asks men to take “The HeForShe Commitment” pledge: “Gender equality is not only a women’s issue, it is a human rights issue that requires my participation. I commit to take action against all forms of violence and discrimination faced by women and girls.”

However, what about violence and discrimination against men and boys? Why aren’t both men and women being asked to take actions against all forms of violence against anyone?

Males as victims and females as aggressors are human rights issues that have serious implications for the public’s safety. Trying to warn the public is an impossible feat if the information is dismissed or ignored. If human service agencies, social justice campaigns and the media refuse to acknowledge males as victims and females as aggressors, how will the public ever be made aware of the increasing but quiet empirical research indicating that boys and young men actually suffer equal or slightly more rape and sexual violence at the hands of girls and young women than the reverse, or that women perpetrate more child abuse and domestic partner abuse than men? If this information reached the public, what is it that people fear? I believe that if the public was aware of the research, both women and men would get the help they deserve and that boys and girls would be healed to prevent them from passing on the cycle of violence. We cannot achieve true peace between the sexes and genders or true equality unless we are willing to cease viewing domestic and sexual violence as gender crimes and develop a mutual understanding that sexual and domestic violence against anyone—child, woman or man—is not acceptable by anyone.

Increasing numbers of young adults are questioning feminist theory. They are taking notice and are challenging limiting, divisive and sexist beliefs, actions and statements. Social media platforms are exploding with hashtag wars and sign campaigns between feminists and those who are rejecting feminism. Sadly, these campaigns seem to be generating more hostility than mutual understanding. Perhaps media outlets will begin offering a more quality forum for the growing numbers of humanitarians who care about the suffering, needs and rights of all human beings?

People on the Autism spectrum are tenacious and intensely concerned with fairness. Many of us on the spectrum have little interest in placating people or conforming to systems simply to fit in, because most of us do not fit in with neurotypical groups or systems. As a woman on the spectrum, as well as a mental health professional, a human rights advocate and the mother of a son, I refuse to be silenced about the overlooked side of social justice. I believe it is time for all social justice-minded activists, professionals and citizens to ask ourselves how we can call ourselves champions of human rights if we are overlooking very real human rights issues, ignoring human suffering in half of the population and inadvertently preventing the healing of our human family. It is time to allow a fearless and honest critique of any aspect of feminist theory that minimizes sexual and domestic violence against males, minimizes violence by women and advocates for anything other than compassion and equality in healing these tragedies.

In His Own Words: Father screwed over in Bahrain family court by abusive wife

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 16 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 16 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month 2015. "Rob" tells his story of physical, emotional and financial abuse and the Bahrain kangaroo family court.

My abuser was my wife and it went on for a period of about seven years of marriage and the subsequent separation. The abuse I received falls into four out of five categories as defined by the home office of the UK government. I was subjected to psychological, physical, financial, and emotional. I only realised this many categories after I separated, as had assumed that DV was only of the physical kind.

The abuse was occurred in four countries, Malaysia, Qatar, Bahrain and UK (my original home), as we were expats. It also occurred across religion and disability.

The first known abuse I can remember was two years into the marriage (Malaysia) when I was assaulted with an object into my eye orbit (a common target). It had been triggered by my wife having a meltdown about the defects of the house that we had moved into. Somehow it was my fault, even though she had bought it before we married. The same behaviour was repeated six months later. The financial abuse comprised of taking my salary in Malaysia without any explanation as to where it was going (she earned a lot more than me).

When I eventually challenged the financial issue, I was threatened with deportation. During our time in Malaysia, my wife threatened suicide. I discovered later that she had made a previous suicide plan after her first divorce with details to make it look like an accident, Why an accident? Because it's a sin in her religion to commit suicide and you can be sectioned by doctors.

There were also episodes of jealousy from my wife in that she was afraid that someone else would steal me from her — particularly another Malaysian. There were comments in her own law office as to why would I marry her, which knocked her self-esteem a bit.

We eventually relocated to Qatar because my wife was offered a position of lawyer in an international law firm. She got this as a second chance and a big favour. She had interrogated a major equity partner in the job interview, which caused a scandal with her own boss and nearly broke the political partnership between her current and future employer.

Even with this seemingly fresh start the abuse started again. I was denied the right to work in the Qatar without an excessively strict criterion (thus rendering me unemployed). I had no say in the financial decisions that affected our family. My wife had a terrible habit of maxing out credit cards and not paying them, to which I had to remind her that many expats abscond because they lose their jobs and cannot pay (defaulting on loans/debts is a criminal offence).

All of this was enforced with threats of divorce, termination of my spouse visa, deportation (a pattern from most of the countries we lived in) and the threat of never seeing my Qatari born daughter again.

Further violent behaviour ensued such as throwing big heavy shelves and their contents out of cupboards and slamming big heavy doors (an angry woman is surprisingly strong), and hitting me in the face (eye orbit) with a glass bottle. Our infant/toddler daughter was a witness to many of these behaviours, including being caught in the cross fire as she was in my arms when I was assaulted or had hot tea thrown at me.

Jealousy and now paranoia raised its head as she was afraid that some other Asian woman (whether expat or domestic help) would steal me away from her. She had this obsession that many people thought she was a Filipina maid. At one point she threatened suicide again, but this time to kill our daughter as well.

My daughter and I are both sensory disabled and rely on equipment to help us participate in everyday life (my daughter needs it for her childhood development) and we both had regular check-ups in the UK. My wife became resentful of this going as far as to cause damage to my senses.

The doctors had advised us both that the best person to raise our daughter at home was dad because he understood his daughters developmental needs having been through the same situation. My relationship with our daughter made her very positive and independent despite her disability except around her mother's episodes. It allowed my wife to have her legal career for which we had relocated to the Persian Gulf and allowed me to bond closely with my daughter, as I had from day one. This made my wife very resentful and jealous. I was accused of having an affair whilst we lived in Qatar with an unknown person in another country based on something a former work colleague of hers had stated on her Facebook!

After my wife had outstayed her welcome in Qatar, we relocated to Bahrain. Again the abuse continued amidst the Arab spring. The jealousy continued when we hired a lovely Filipino grandmother as a cleaner in our house in Bahrain. My wife said that the good news was that she was too old to have an affair with me.

This same person was instructed by my wife to report my movements to her and spy on me, so that when I attempted to contact family or friends (I was at that point not allowed contact) with my daughter on Skype, I was threatened with divorce and never to see my daughter again if I continued. I had to sneak up onto the flat roof of my home at midnight to Skype my friends and family in order maintain secrecy.

My wife's mental state became gradually worse with more confrontations with her work colleagues (a pattern repeated in all of the previous six jobs she had during our marriage). Threats of divorce, removal of my daughter and a demand to let her have a child with another man because she wanted a "normal child" followed again.

On one of the last trips we made to the UK for my daughter's health checks, my wife assaulted me in our house. My 15-month old daughter was screaming and refusing to let go of me as she watched her mother physically restrain me and beat me around the head and eventually bit me. From that point, my wife denied our daughter's disability removing the medically prescribed equipment and thus impairing her development.

She practiced PAS, withholding our daughter from my company at every point in the day when she was she was not at work (our daughter went to a nursery during the working week). I was referred to as a gold digger, parasite and reminded how the English courts/police would never believe my allegations of abuse and that I would never see my daughter ever again.

The psychological and emotional abuse was comprised of derogatory comments about my disability, although she was happy to milk it to elevate her status in her culture/religion as a redeemer after she abandoned her first marriage. I was blamed for the disability of our daughter even when she knew the possible risks during the pregnancy and willingly accepted it. I was blamed for every fault that happened in her life, including her behaviour issues in the various jobs she held over the years. I was used as an emotional punching bag and was told, "It's your fault — you made me do it".

So why didn't I go to the police?

In Malaysia, I'm neither of the majority race nor a national. The local police had a reputation for corruption and did not tolerate criticism of members of their race by foreigners let alone other nationals outside of their own race or religion. In the Gulf, again the local police were considered untrained and comprised more of rent a cops from outside the country. Even the local population resented them (part of the grievances in the Arab spring). In the UK, most people confirmed the gender bias of the police in DV matters and I didn't want to risk being removed from my own home and not be able to protect my daughter. As we didn't live in the UK at the time of the assault I knew the local authorities would not be sympathetic.

I couldn't leave the relationship because I could not protect my daughter from her mother's behaviour if I left. But I did choose eventually to flee (from Bahrain) after a 45-minute verbal abuse incident. Her behaviour became so erratic that it reminded me of her mental state the previous year in which she had threatened suicide and to kill our daughter.

After I went back to the UK, the abuse continued in a different form. She tried to foreclose on our home in UK to make me homeless and did not acknowledge my requests to see my daughter. I was petitioned for Sharia divorce (from Bahrain) with 12 days' notice, so from the UK I had to struggle to find a Sharia lawyer in time willing to represent me or I'd automatically lose.

That process itself was seriously flawed as our civil marriage was not recognised under the law even though we were married in the UK and state registered. My wife attempted to use a ceremony certificate from a mosque in the UK as a marriage certificate. The same mosque stated that it was not a marriage certificate and that they cannot perform it until we are legally married under UK civil law (to prevent sham marriages).

I found a credit report my wife had taken out on herself just before we got married. She was in debt for 1.7 million. She had previously lied to me about this when I had asked her before our marriage about any debt. She had multiple properties overseas with defaulted loans. This led me to think that our entire marriage had been a sham

I was accused of abuse against my wife and our daughter and of not providing financially (even though my wife wouldn't allow me to work and I became the at home dad to care for our disabled daughter). The court threw out the abuse allegations after I provided a very detailed account of her assault on me and the photo of the bruises and bite-marks on my body. Even though I could prove that I had provided early on in the marriage with proof of salary and work visas, it was not enough for them. To counter it I would have to provide two Muslim witnesses who could back that up, so that I could not do in a country where I did not know anyone.

Worst of all was the secret custody hearing in Bahrain, of which myself and my lawyer were not informed at any point (as required by law), until they gave my wife full custody. I was not allowed any relationship with my daughter because I don't live there. We appealed on the grounds of the secrecy and the child abuse, but the abuse was not considered un-Islamic, which you need in order to remove the custody from the mother to the father.

My wife appealed against her own custody award, demanding alimony despite her very high salary. The court threw that out. They did ask her to consider moving to the UK for the sake of the child to let her see her father, but she refused with a statement I have yet to ever see. My counter memo was in Arabic so I don't know what was said, other than what looks like a counter argument against accusations. I am currently waiting to go through a UK family court as the Bahraini court judgement is not considered legal for many reasons.

Queen's University incites hatred of male students—Administration looks the other way

Steve Brulé · 16 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In March 2014, Queen's University in Kingston, Ontario, exploded with fear and anger toward men. The university's newly formed—and only—men's group, the Men's Issues Awareness Society (MIAS), scheduled a lecture by University of Ottawa professor Janice Fiamengo titled "What's Equality Got To Do With It: Feminism's Double Standards." Campus feminists were furious and intended to block it at all costs.

How do you go from zero to full-blown hysteria in a few short weeks?

It helps to have the complete support of university faculty, and the small but very vocal group of feminists headquartered in the Levana Gender Advocacy Centre knew they had it. Only with that kind of support can a few hundred zealots confidently dominate a campus with well over 20,000 other, generally open-minded, students and create havoc.

Campus feminists began by whipping up hysteria against Fiamengo and anyone who questioned feminism. Thousands of comments poured onto the Facebook event page for Fiamengo's talk, many of which were fearful, angry, and hateful toward men and anyone who dared question feminism. The posts included:

- The Fiamego lecture will attract "Queen's Most Likely To Rape."
- "Kingston is now known as The Most sexually violent city in Canada."
- "MRAs are shit to female safety."
- "scum in your midst that stalk and assault women"
- "I do not know a woman that hasn't been attacked."
- "They have brought someone to say that rape victims don't exist."
- One male student, Steve K., was subjected to over 200 hateful comments from feminists when he dared to share his story of sexual assault at the hands of an abusive female.

The feminist group quickly submitted a motion to the Alma Mater Society (AMS) to disband the MIAS in an effort to block the Fiamengo lecture.

In the lead-up to the de-ratification debate, the feminist cabal attacked students who refused to join their opposition to the MIAS and the cabal's vilification of male students. Irfan Tahiri, vice-president of the Arts & Science Undergraduate Society (ASUS), was one of those who refused and this turned him into a target. But Tahiri stood firm and at the AMS meeting of March 20 stated, "I will not stand here and be demonized because I spoke out and say that I'm opposed to this motion." Tahiri was not a member of MIAS but had merely defended their right to exist.

AMS member and promoter of the "free speech wall" (which, incidentally, was banned by Queen's administrators) Tyler Lively was also targeted. At the assembly, Lively revealed, "I haven't wanted to speak due to the reasons that Tahiri said. I have been called out on Facebook regarding this when I haven't even said anything. I have been called a rape apologist, a victim blamer, and a misogynist."

The feminists even filed a motion to block Lively's ratification as chief returning officer of the AMS at this very same meeting because of his refusal to join them in vilifying their fellow students. The feminist cabal was sending a clear message to anyone who would not join their crusade to silence those who dare criticize feminism: "We will crush you too." This is typical mob behavior, and the only bright spot in this silly, small-minded affair is that there are still a small number of principled students like Tahiri and Lively who have the backbone to stand up to tyranny like this. No such backbone has yet surfaced among Queen's faculty. In fact, as you will see, the faculty made it quite clear that they stood hand in hand with the feminist bullies.

Both motions failed, but the desire to block the Fiamengo lecture only intensified and other strategies soon emerged.
[image]Barely a week later, female Queen's student Danielle d'Entremont was assaulted the night before the dreaded lecture. D'Entremont immediately posted a selfie of her injury to Facebook, and an hour later, at 1:15 a.m., the university's student newspaper, The Queen's Journal, tweeted about the assault and followed up with several stories, taking special care to suggest that the perpetrator was connected to the MIAS.

In fact, The Queen's Journal was so quick and enthusiastic about reporting the assault that one reader expressed her concern that they were not so much interested in the story as "rejoicing that you have a hot story." Editor Vincent Ben Matak correctly responded that "We aren't a PR firm. Our job is to present facts."

But it didn't take long for Matak to reveal just what he meant by presenting "facts." Apparently Matak believes that it's also their job to make them up when necessary. And the "necessity," in this case, was to lend further credence to the claim that feminists have reason to fear male students, the MIAS, and Fiamengo.

Matak wrote an article titled "Student Assaulted: Woman opposed to the Fiamengo talk was assaulted Wednesday night," on page 7 of The Queen's Journal, which included a quote from a Queen's gender studies professor named Maria Matina, and this quote was clearly intended to justify fear of male students and to dissuade students from attending Fiamengo's talk:

> "Maria Matina, a Queen's gender studies professor, advised her students to not attend the event tonight. In an email sent to her students on Thursday afternoon, Matina said students should not speak out against opinions expressed at the talk, to avoid risk of being physically assaulted."

> "In fact, my fellow Professors and colleagues will not be attending tonight for fear of violent attacks," she stated. "I will be there in representation although, I was warned not to speak as I may be sent hate mail, death threats and potential physical attacks."

The Queen's Journal immediately published and tweeted frightened Professor Matina's plea "not to attend this evening's talk, to avoid assault" mere hours before the talk was to begin. An incredibly convenient coincidence for those who were [image]desperate to stop the lecture.

The problem with Professor Maria Matina is that she doesn't exist. There is no Professor Maria Matina in the Queen's University gender studies department—or anywhere else at Queen's. Furthermore, imaginary professors do not give quotes to journalists. Professor Maria Matina was invented, along with the bizarre quotes intended to scare Queen's students. This was all clearly intended to spread fear of male students prior to the lecture.

[image]A little background is helpful at this point. Matak has been studying philosophy at Queen's University for at least three years and The Queen's Journal listed his interests as "political journalism, social justice and LGBTQ issues" (this description has since been removed but a google search still provides the summary). Adele Mercier is a prominent feminist professor in the department of philosophy and was personally incensed that Fiamengo was "attacking Feminism." There are only 17 professors in the philosophy department, and gender studies has only six professors. That's a total of only 23 professors at Queen's who are relevant to Matak's area of professional interest. It is inconceivable that Matak, a student of Mercier's with an interest in LGBTQ issues, would not immediately recognize that there was no professor "Maria Matina" at Queen's University. On top of that, Mercier is so concerned about her relationship with Matak and the information that she shares with him that she required him to sign a non-disclosure agreement, something unheard of in professor-student relationships. Presumably this non-disclosure agreement protects Mercier while Matak works at The Queen's Journal, CFRC Radio, the Levana Society, and The Kingston Whig-Standard, or anywhere else for that matter.

This suggests that The Queen's Journal was playing ball with the cabal, which may have looked to Mercier as their leader. In fact, video of the Fiamengo lecture clearly shows that a significant portion of the audience physically watched Mercier, anticipating when she would speak during the question period, and loudly applauded her every word. Mercier also acknowledged that she taught many of the students in the auditorium, and the audience chimed in with supportive comments when Mercier bemoaned the fact that Fiamengo and men's groups were critical of feminism. The tone from the Mercier team was more "protest rally" than academic curiosity.

I asked Matak about Professor Matina, and I print this because the offered explanations merely deepened my suspicions. Initially, Matak indicates that Maria Matina is a real professor, suggests that he knows a student in her class, and even says that he verified the information before printing the quotes that would clearly inflame fear and hatred of male students:

> Brulé: "You quote a Professor Maria Matina."

> Matak: "Yeah, that was removed from the article."

> Brulé: "How did you hear about this professor?"

> Matak: "We actually had someone forward us an email" … "the email that was forwarded to us was forwarded by a student in her class."

> Brulé: "In Maria Matina's class?"

> Matak: "Yeah."

> Brulé: "But there is no Maria Matina at Queen's University."

> Matak: "Umm … I'm not entirely sure what her name was, um, what we published was the name that the student gave us, um, and I believe that was part of the reason why we took it down, is because we didn't have the full consent to publish her name, instead of going about fighting that argument we just took it down because it wasn't completely relevant to the story."

One thing is certain, Matak was not being entirely honest. Later in that same conversation:

> Brulé: "Don't you think you should have verified that there was a professor by that name at Queen's?"

> Matak: "Well, we did."

> Brulé: "You did verify it?"

> Matak: "We did verify it."

> Brulé: "But I called Queen's and there is no professor by that name."

> Matak: "Well, that's the thing … there was a lot of, there was a lot of issues with that, just, the nature of the information that we received, and the person in question, that it was about, um, it's …"

> Brulé: "You mean the professor, or the student?"

> Matak: "The professor in question, but it was a private conversation, and I just don't feel comfortable sharing that, the details of that with you right now."

> Brulé: "But knowing that it's an actual professor is not hard to find out, right?"

> Matak: "The story broke a month and a half ago, we took it down, I don't see how that's relevant now anyway."

Not relevant now? Really. (The story is still available at this link, p. 7.)

It is relevant if The Queen's Journal is promoting hatred of male students and of anyone who criticizes feminism on campus. It is relevant if members of Queen's faculty are using their influence at The Queen's Journal to spread this hatred. It is relevant because Matak's other employer, The Kingston Whig-Standard, also published a public relations piece on Mercier's behalf. It is relevant because Matak, as a journalist, has written other articles claiming that feminist professors at Queen's have been threatened, but police investigation failed to find any leads on those cases. Are these fabricated as well?

I emailed Matak for further information since our conversation raised more questions than it answered. I waited several weeks and emailed again, but he has become unresponsive.

It doesn't end there. At least two other Queen's institutions were involved in this saga—the Levana Gender Advocacy Centre and CFRC Radio 101.9 FM—and Matak is intimately involved with both.

Matak would have to be connected to the Levana Society, Queen's University's Gender Advocacy Centre, located in The Grey House at 51 Bader Lane on Queen's campus, if he hoped to write anything remotely relevant to the LGBTQ community, and Matak has written several articles on LGBTQ issues.

The Grey House, home of the Levana Society, is one of the feminist headquarters on Queen's campus and has been home to the Ontario Public Interest Research Group (OPIRG), the Education on Queer Issues Project (EQuIP), and Queen's Pride Project (QPP), as well as Levana. These groups are so closely related (their membership comprises many of the same people) that some students believe their simultaneous existence is merely a strategy to maximize funding through student fees (some fees are opt-outable). OPIRG usually receives a fee of over $4.55 per student (over $100,000 per year), the Ban Righ Center (another feminist organization at Queen's) received $3 per student, and the Levana Centre received $0.78. Other examples include: Positive Space Program $0.31 and Reelout (a queer film and video festival) $1.72. The Kingston Coalition Against Poverty (KCAP) receives $2.50, and KCAP not only supported opponents of the MIAS but also claimed to know for certain that a men's rights activist (MRA) assaulted Danielle d'Entremont. Together, these groups stand to receive well over $250,000 per year from student fees. The Queen's Journal receives $3.50 and CFRC Radio receives $7.50, pushing the total to more than $500,000 per year. This is a significant sum paid by the whole student body but controlled by a small group.

It should come as no surprise that membership in these groups overlap, since they share the feminist worldview, which is enforced by Queen's faculty, as explained below. However, The Queen's Journal and CFRC Radio should be treated differently; they present themselves as part of the media, ostensibly neutral, but their actions indicate otherwise. There were seven articles by three staff writers in The Queen's Journal in September 2011 bemoaning the possible eviction of the feminist groups from the Grey House for failure to follow the rules and re-ratify, which is anything but neutral.

Whether deliberately, or unwittingly, The Queen's Journal promoted the interests of the cabal against Fiamengo. But it didn't end there; these tentacles spread outside of the university.

In the days leading up to Fiamengo's lecture, more than 80 professors signed a letter supporting the feminists who were promoting fear and hatred of men on Queen's campus, and The Whig-Standard, Kingston's top newspaper, obliged by printing an article about the letter, written by staff writer Michelle Ferguson, re-enforcing the message offered by the Queen's professors through their spokesperson, professor Samantha King:

> "I would say that feminist theory and politics has been a central part of the undergraduate curriculum at Queen's in arts and science for at least the last 20 years. This is what many of us do in the classroom," says King.

I have read this statement many times, and it still leaves me dumbfounded. Apparently ideological feminism has become so ingrained, so comfortable, so powerful at universities that there is no longer any reason to pretend that universities should not be ideological, but neutral, even skeptical, and no embarrassment about the fact that we have gone from "institutions of higher learning" to "cliques of higher indoctrination" in little more than a generation. But, as this incident so clearly demonstrates, dissent with feminism at university is treated like blasphemy within a fundamentalist religious organization.

Although the interview with Samantha King could still be called journalism, the interview with Mercier is questionable.

Mercier had engaged Alison Tieman from A Voice for Men (AVfM) on Facebook, believing her to be a Queen's student. Mercier appeared to be defending female guards who have sex with juvenile boys in detention centres. Pressed by Tieman, Mercier refused to concede that the guards in question were guilty of raping the boys, even though a whopping 90% of incidents involved some form of force. AVfM published the exchange, and Mercier demanded that they remove all the material about her, accused Tieman of libel, and threatened legal action.

The Kingston Whig-Standard's Michelle Ferguson penned her second article on the Queen's story, with the decidedly biased title "Queen's prof targeted by group," after members of AVfM accused Mercier of being a "rape apologist." Ferguson interviewed Alison Tieman and challenged her about Mercier's claim of libel. She allowed Mercier to explain her Facebook comments but glided past the complaint that Mercier appears to defend female rapists and Mercier does not condemn the prison rapes. This is notable because feminists are outraged at any form of rape when the genders are reversed, and have even coined the term "rape culture," which feminists argue includes the dubious "crimes" now known as "stare rape" and "regret rape." Feminist outrage has become so intense in some jurisdictions that California responded by expanding the definition of rape in the newly enacted "Yes means Yes" law that addresses an issue that critics believe is grossly exaggerated. And yet Ferguson never directly asks Mercier whether she believed that the female guards were rapists. The article ends with Mercier's assertion that her detractors are nothing more than "thugs" and an "angry and volatile fringe group."

Matak also works at the Whig, so getting what appears to be a public relations piece for Professor Mercier, who owns Matak's confidentiality contract, printed in the Whig would have been a piece of cake. It's a small town.

The Levana Society, a prominent feminist group on Queen's campus, organized an event billed as a response to Fiamengo's talk called "What's Feminism Got To Do With It," a play on Fiamengo's lecture title "What's Equality Got To Do With It," scheduled for April 8, 2014. This event appears to have been at the behest of Mercier, who made a public challenge at the Fiamengo lecture and was initially listed as a speaker. Clearly, Mercier is deeply influential at the institutions discussed here, even revered perhaps.

I attended the event, hoping to hear an opposing view, and asked for an interview with the speaker. The organizers not only denied an interview but also called campus security to have me physically removed from the building. Apparently a student recognized me from the Fiamengo talk and decided that I was an "undesirable," referring to me as "whatshisface old guy."

It's unclear whether my crime was "being old" or "being male," but Queen's security wasted no time enforcing the order. Incidentally, it didn't seem to matter that I, too, was a recent Queen's University student. Unfortunately, I was of the wrong age and gender.

The organizer allowed only CFRC Radio to interview the speaker and record the event. Dan Vena, a Queen's cultural studies student, feminist, and co–founder of "Men Who Like Feminism," conducted the only interview of Jaclyn Friedman, thus ensuring that no difficult, or even interesting, questions would be asked.

Vena's interview had absolutely nothing to do with Fiamengo's lecture, and you can listen to it here (link has since been removed). It starts around the 5:00 mark. Friedman posits an extraordinarily contrived duality, something feminists themselves would call a "straw man": the overused cliché of achievement-oriented sex (Friedman also uses the term "commodity exchange," which might be code for prostitution) versus sex for pleasure and communication. The only thing new is her utopian assumption: treat sex like musicians improvising in a room for fun and all the complexities just melt away. Vena pipes in, saying it reframes sex as a "really cool act of communication that happens between bodies." I doubt that any sex researcher would object to the claim that couples should communicate more, but really, can't you read that in Cosmo? Or Playboy?

Vena goes on to claim that our culture promotes the ideas that whiteness is always good and that the "dark other" is the source of violence. Vena says, "We don't disrupt the narrative," and that we deny that "violence can be done by a body that is white." I don't know what planet he's from, maybe planet "1770 America," but how can he possibly be ignorant of the widely publicized profiling of serial killers as white males or the ubiquitous feminist depiction of white males as the near-sole perpetrators of domestic violence. Just turn on any media source and you'll quickly learn that "male villain; female victim" is the central, uninterrupted narrative of our day.

Feminists at Queen's had no legitimate response to Fiamengo, so they resorted to fear-mongering, name-calling, and attempts at censorship. Friedman's trivial lecture was served up only to divert attention from Fiamengo's serious and valid criticisms of feminism.

It is Mercier herself who unwittingly revealed the true reason for her gang's objection to Fiamengo's lecture when she accused Fiamengo of being a misogynist because of "the way you are attacking feminism." This is a surprisingly ignorant accusation, particularly from a professor of philosophy, since misogyny refers to the "hatred of women" not to the "critique of feminism." A high school student should be expected to understand this rather enormous distinction. Later during that same lecture, an exasperated Mercier openly exclaimed that the reason feminists want to ban men's groups is because "they are attacking feminism." In Mercier's world, which is Queen's University, no one dares to criticize feminism.

Professor Adele Mercier controls her students not only through non-disclosure agreements, but also with the looming threat of being labelled a "misogynist." Fiamengo was a threat because if students felt free to criticize feminism, it would undermine the power that fear of the dreaded "misogynist" label holds over non-feminist students and faculty. The power of shaming critics with the accusation of misogyny, and the liberal use of this tactic by feminists, was clearly demonstrated at the AMS assembly and the events leading up to it. As noted above, Mercier's students dutifully organized against the MIAS, labelled non-feminists, including Fiamengo, as "misogynists" and "rape apologists," created false quotes and fictitious professors, and used The Queen's Journal to spread lies and incite fear and hatred of male students. More than 80 professors joined in and publicly declared feminism to be the overarching ideology governing education at Queen's. Faculty expressed their support for the feminist students who sought to vilify non-believing students. Even The Kingston Whig-Standard helped with an interview supporting Mercier, the 80-plus professors, and the notion that their detractors were nothing but a fringe group of thugs. This was organized bullying of non-believers at Queen's University. Kingston may be a small town, but small minds should have no place at a university.

Criticism of ideological feminism at Queen's inspired the sort of response generally only seen from religious fundamentalists confronted with a blasphemer in their midst. It could not be any clearer: Queen's University accepts and enforces feminism as a sacred ideology. This is shameful. Every student at every university should feel 100% safe and free to question any ideology, perhaps especially feminist ideology, since it has had such a profound impact on law and public policy for more than 40 years. But that cannot happen at Queen's, a university where faculty incite hatred and fear of male students in order to protect their ideological stranglehold on campus life and where administrators refuse to defend their students' legitimate quest for knowledge. This is completely unacceptable and should result in dismissals and lawsuits against Queen's.

All other requests for interviews with campus feminists were denied. Calls to Adele Mercier's office went unanswered, and no voicemail was available.

Addendum: Vincent Matak has since responded with new information via email. I will publish his thoughts and a response in an upcoming article.

Dean Esmay · 16 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

You've probably been reading reports in the media about #GamerGate, a growing consumer revolt against corrupt, ideologically biased, anti-video game journalism. Most of the mainstream press has tried various ways of tamping this down, calling those who support the consumer revolt "misogynists," "violent," "harassers," ad nauseum. Sound familiar? It should. They also tried early on, and may try again, to portray GamerGate as "MRAs" although so far, that's failed to gain any traction because there is too much diversity within the GamerGate movement, including feminists and other critics of MRAs.

Which is as it should be, since GamerGate isn't an MRA movement, and should include anyone with an interest in those issues, including people who don't agree with us on other things.

AVfM has, however, featured two excellent reports by Vincent James on the movement, and why Men's Human Rights Activists should care (hint: the same people attacking GamerGate have been attacking us for years, using exactly the same tactics). You can read those here and here. While we haven't been able to keep up with every development in this fast-paced and growing consumer movement, today Spiked has featured a very good writeup worth reading.

While GamerGate is not an MRA movement and never will be, as already stated the same people attacking them are the same people who've been attacking us for years, with the same lies being told about them are endlessly repeated about us. We encourage Men's Human Rights Activists with a genuine interest in GamerGate to participate in discussions about it, but we also encourage you not to try to force anyone to accept MRA ideas or reasoning or logic; this isn't about that, it's about corrupt ideological thugs in journalism.

We would also like to point out that if you can't keep up with everything yourself, a great source of (more or less) daily updates is being done on YouTube by Socks, aka NEET LIFE. Here's her entire, quite fun, video series, starting from the first one a few weeks ago. Well worth rolling through to watch how this whole thing has developed:

http://youtu.be/bH4gwlzhnxw?list=UUj6WU3IdNXHuwqv6WbcUH2Q

We recommending subscribing, her series is not only funny, but it's probably the best way to watch how the story has unfolded from the eyes of those who actually think there's a problem here with ideological thuggery and corruption in the video games industry.

In His Own Words: Surviving Crazy

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 17 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 17 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month 2014 for Men and Boys, the invisible victims of domestic violence. Today's In His Own Words is from Jim Muldoon.

Jim prefers that his real name be used rather than an alias. He tells yet another tale of a corrupt, misandric, and feminist-governed family court. In other words, the status quo.

His description of how the mental health field largely enables abusive, disordered women is bang on.

> Surviving Crazy
> I'm not going to tell you Crazy's name. The fact that she doesn't get any limelight, if she ever gets to read this, will piss her off. She craves attention. She would rather have a crowd questioning her sanity than go unnoticed.
> That's the kind of whacko she is.
> Domestic violence isn't limited to the home, and it certainly isn't limited to physical violence. Crazy, by herself, did a lot of damage, but not enough to destroy the family. In desperation, Crazy turned to the Australian government for help. With the power of the state, the social engineers did what Crazy couldn't.
> They tore my family apart.
> All she had to do was to play her part of the victim, and the lawyers, judges, psychologists, and social workers would do the rest.
> What makes her Crazy? That is a bigger question than you might think.
> She went to see psychologists and psychiatrists. She went to self-help groups. She went on medication. She stopped the medication. She got positive. She got real. She took a holiday. She got a job. She quit. She took up a hobby. She wrote down the whole story. She saw another psychologist.
> Round and round.
> When I looked at the various checklists for various mental disorders, I could see how Psychopathy, Borderline Personality Disorder, Obsessive Compulsive Disorder, and many other "Disorders" and "isms" might apply.
> In short, there was plenty wrong with her. Therefore, it was easy to find yet another label and try yet another "cure." And every time Crazy emerged still Crazy, but now worse because she had a whole new litany of excuses.
> "I can't clean the house because cleanliness triggers my depression."
> Also, clinical diagnosticians tend to focus on their subject. They asked Crazy lots of questions about her past, her feelings, her hopes, ambitions, and disappointments.
> Crazy loved it. Her past grew more traumatic with each telling. For the professionals, this meant more areas to explore, more conditions to discover, more sessions, and more money. Certainly more money than they would have got if they told her to stop lying. No matter the clinical name, front and centre of the cure was that I should remain with her, support her, and encourage her whilst taking up the slack.
> Implicit in this was if she didn't get better, maybe I didn't try hard enough or maybe the fault was mine all along. But diagnosis isn't about lab coats and clipboards and multi-syllable terminology. It's about identifying and defining the problem.
> The problem was Crazy.
> Crazy's contribution to the home was to turn an everyday hurdle seamlessly from an issue through to a problem and onto a crisis with monotonous regularity. She also ensured that every crisis was that much worse by blaming anything and anyone else. The terms used by psychologists deliberately leave out any moral judgment. This, they say, helps with treatment. Treatment that was never effective.

But the lack of moral judgment has two distinct disadvantages. The first is that it relieved Crazy of the responsibility of ensuring her behaviour did not harm others. In fact, she felt entitled to behave in certain ways because her afflictions were official.

The second is that it denies the humanity of those she harmed. Their problems are considered a mere by-product of the real issue. They are second tier, and therefore second rate. It also removes many potential avenues for justice, an injustice in itself.

But, while a moral vocabulary may be unhelpful for the shrink, it is certainly of value to those being harmed. And not just for name-calling. It gives simple and accurate labels for predicting future behaviour. Consider some of the moral terms I believe apply here: dishonest, arrogant, selfish, lazy, greedy, vengeful, jealousy-ridden, gluttonous, and wasteful.

When I met her, Crazy had two kids with two separate fathers. She assured me that she was on the pill because the last thing she needed was yet another child to yet another father.

She lied.

When informed that I was going to be father number three, I wanted to provide and protect, etc., for my child. Like many men in that situation, I thought, “Surely I can make this work.” Crazy told me she, too, would “make it work.” She told me she had even stronger parental instincts, being a mother. She also had another, deeper reason to “make it work”: she loved me.

She lied.

On all counts.

A few years, and two more children later, and Crazy walked out, leaving me with all five children. I’d stayed for the kids, but I was not a doormat. I confronted her about her behaviour and ensured she wore the consequences whenever possible.

Crazy’s response was to up the ante and leave. I think she was hoping that I would crumble under the pressure of single parenthood. Then I’d have to beg her to come back and would learn just exactly who was in control.

But no, Crazy meant no chaos. Things got better.

I did some study, got my career going again, and moved to a better house. Even better, I met and married the wonderful Linda. When Crazy heard about this she went on the warpath. Only this time she brought the cavalry.

To single out individual events or institutions would take too long and the trees would get in the way of the forest. Therefore, when I talk about the Australian government, I am not just talking about those directly employed by the government. I am including those “independent” groups and bodies, like lawyers, who suck on the teat of government for their livelihood.

Feminist ideology is the dominant feature of Australian government bureaucracies. Whilst not always at the forefront of every department, scratch the surface and it soon arises. There are numerous fallacies that have come to be accepted as gospel truths thanks to the feminist influence.

Chief among these is the oppression of women, for which all men, past and present, are guilty of. Closely related, in their minds, is an issue they call violence against women, which they claim explains all domestic disputes.

Therefore, the government tried to translate the madness in my life into a story of Crazy being oppressed by me. To do this they employed what Orwell called doublethink.

Take, for example, her walking out like that. There were times it was portrayed as a symptom of her depression. On other occasions it was my oppressive ways, like keeping the money for rent and groceries, which forced her out.

Had I walked out like that, it would have been called abandonment.

One conversation between a Feminist drone and my son paints a thousand words. He was trying to tell the drone that his mother, Crazy, was the problem. The drone wanted to blame me.

Son: Mum is manipulative, goes into rages, and is sometimes violent.

Drone: Did your Dad hit you?

Son: No, Mum hit us much harder and more often than Dad ever did.

Drone: So, you've just admitted that Dad did hit you …

This bigoted approach was there in every aspect of my dealings with them. Anything that she did wrong was ignored, excused, or minimised. Any fault on my part was exaggerated and referred to repeatedly, no matter how irrelevant it might be to the topic at hand.

"Both parents are to blame," was said repeatedly, especially when Crazy's behaviour was clearly wrong and indefensible. And while they were blaming "both," they were always looking at me.

The game here, of course, was to bait me. Any angry response would then have been used to justify the doublethink.

"I don't care about the parents. I'm concerned about the children," they also said. This was the same as "both parents are to blame," but somehow nobler.

Were they concerned about the children? When the authorities decided to stick their nose in my family's life, the eldest boy had left home. The other four children lived with Linda and I and saw Crazy regularly and often. All five children were close.

Here's how it washed up:

Her three eldest children have disowned Crazy completely. They have also disowned the other two kids.

The eldest boy, who is not my son, brings his son around to my house. Yesterday I got to watch him doing his new trick called walking. We've still to decide on a name for me, but I think I'm settling with "Grandpa."

Crazy has never met her grandson, and, despite living just a 15-minute car ride away, never will.

At age nineteen, Crazy's second eldest (also not my biological son) asked Linda and I to adopt him. This we gladly did to give him some sense of normalcy. He calls us "Mum" and "Dad."

When she turned eighteen, my eldest daughter also asked Linda to adopt her, formalising her position. She's twenty now, and also calls Linda "Mum."

The two youngest children decided to join their mother in her hatred and contempt for me. What caused me pain was the way they lied, knowing that the big bully government would protect them.

They will pay a terrible price for their choices because now they are stuck with Crazy.

I am not seeking any contact with them. I certainly would never be in physical proximity to them without a witness or a camera. I will never trust either of them again.

So when I talk about surviving Crazy, I am not talking about walking away without scars. But I did walk away with more than Crazy and the Australian government wanted.

I came away with my sanity, my identity, and my dignity.

And make no mistake about this. At all times, I was the intended target. My wife Linda, my other stepsons, my children, mother, sister, and other family members, who were all hurt, were just collateral damage.

For Crazy, it was to bring me undone. My diagnosis is jealousy because I have a better life; but also a sick need to dominate anyone in her life any way she can – she has to be the centre of attention.

For the feminists, it was a chance to dominate a man, while the rest just made sure that the dominating force > was aimed at anyone other than themselves.

> Every year, this is happening more and more. Every year, more men will be in similar situations. Here are some lessons I learned along the way.
> Self-esteem is an iterative thing. The more self-esteem I have, the more I will stand up for myself, which will give me more self-esteem. Similarly, not standing up brings self-loathing and doubt, which leads to less self-esteem, and therefore not standing up.
> Therefore, it was crucial that I stood up for myself.
> I also needed support. Luckily for me I have a supportive wife in Linda. She has given me tremendous strength, courage, and comfort. As have the rest of my family and my true friends. And yes, it's times like these when you find out who your real friends are.
> It was also important to know the truth.
> Without getting bogged down in philosophical debate, everything can be questioned and therefore doubted. This is something they use to their advantage. Everything I said was questioned, again and again. "But how do you really know that?" or "But what if your memory is wrong?"
> Everything they said was stated with absolute certainty.
> Doublethink is a terrible weapon. The iron certainty that they are right is difficult to stand up to, particularly when you know that the power of the state is behind them. It took a real belief in my own worth and a real understanding of my values.
> I also needed to know my limitations and cut my losses. Early on, I realised that I had lost the youngest daughter. I still reached out to the youngest boy for a while longer, but in the end had to let him go to.
> My sanity matters. I will not lose it for anyone.
> I matter.

Why there's been silence about Reyhaneh Jabbari's removal from death row

Ali Mehraspand · 17 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The following is a short update on the case of Reyhaneh Jabbari, which, regardless of whether you agree she should be executed or not, the English-speaking world is being given a distorted picture of.

Reyhaneh Jabbari, who was sentenced to death for murder by five judges, was supposed to be executed on September 30. The execution was delayed for 10 days, until October 10, however, in order to give Jabbari another opportunity to get her victim's family's consent to let her off the death penalty. She was not executed on October 10 either, though, a fact that has been met with peculiar silence.

The full story of this case can be found here.

The media frenzy over this case started in April and has gone through four telling phases. In phase one, the media adamantly stated that Jabbari defended herself from rape, with some reports going so far as to claim that she was a rape victim. Campaigns to save her from the death penalty began, and the news outraged the public. After facts shined light on the outright lies of the media and women's groups, in phase two, the media still narrated the story in the same way, except now some claimed that this time "she saw rape to be imminent" or "she felt she was going to be raped." Phase three occurred in the 10-day period when only the victim's family's consent could have released Jabbari from the death penalty. Since the family officially and publicly stated that the reason they would not consent was because of the level of lies against their loved one, most of the media shows during this period did not mention the alleged rape at all and only focused on forgiveness.

Phase four is happening right now: a gigantic silence about the fact that Jabbari has not been executed despite the fact that the victim's family has not given their consent to release her from the death penalty. Technically, nobody in the world except the victim's family could have removed the death sentence, but Iran has bowed to domestic and international pressure.

Months ago, when the Entekhab interview of the judge on this case was released on khabaronline.com, one commenter had this to say:

> I wish I were a woman, then even if I committed murder, people would protest for my acquittal and would call me a victim, and then everyone would say it is a patriarchy.

To which another responded:

> Exactly, she would have been executed ten times by now, had she been a man.

What continues to astound is how few in the English-speaking media will tell this part of the story, which is otherwise well-known and understood in Iran.

The question we should all still be asking: why is no one in the Western media discussing the fact that the evidence for a rape was nonexistent, and that had she asked the family for forgiveness she would likely not have been facing the death penalty?

Feminism and the MRM as marketplace competitors

AVFM · 17 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: We found this posting on Reddit by user RedPillBanana and liked it so much we decided to post it here, with permission of the author. –DE

Imagine there's a company called Feminist Corp (NYSE:FC). FC is large and powerful, has been around for more than 130 years, and has many employees and customers, including most people in the government and the media.

For quite some time, FC has actively disparaged and alienated one half of their customer base while favoring the other half. Their main GenderEquity (GE) product not only fails to serve the needs of this alienated half, but it also actively harms them. When the customers complain about it, FC blames the alienated customers for all the problems with the product (user error) and brings out flawed statistics to support their claims. Many customers become disgruntled but they have no choice because FC is a government-supported monopoly with no alternatives.

Suddenly a new startup called MensRightsInc (NYSE: MRI) appears, offering a new GE2 product. The product is much more fair than the old GE product, and while it doesn't benefit the non-alienated half as much as the old GE product does, it does wonders for the alienated half.

It turns out that MRI has been around for quite some time, almost as long as FC. However, due to the arrogance and monopolistic abuses of FC, MRI's GE2 product starts to gain traction. MRI is not as well-funded or established as FC, and MRI's advertising budget is but a tiny fraction of FC's, but word starts to spread and customers start to abandon FC's product and start buying MRI's product. MRI's customer base and number of employees slowly start to grow.

The alienated customer base finally sees what a truly beneficial product looks like. They are understandably very angry at FC and its employees for years of abuse and also angry at all the consumers that support FC and believe their flawed statistics. Many angry words are exchanged, and FC claims libel/defamation.

FC sees MRI as a small but growing threat to their market share and starts launching attacks against MRI, mostly baseless. They claim that MRI is evil and that all their evil customers are now using MRI's GE2 product, so GE2 must be bad. FC organizes a dismissive media backlash against MRI, and also organizes protests against MRI's user groups which backfire as the general public sees how FC is trying to stifle competition and free enterprise.

Employees of FC begin to debate employees of MRI but lose badly as their arrogance and flawed statistics are exposed so they stop the debates so that they won't "legitimize" MRI. The general public also takes note of this.

Some countries (which have made FC an integral part of the government-industrial complex) actually try to outlaw MRI's products and also try to make criticism of FC illegal. Alienated customers in those countries sometimes have to import GE2 from other countries to get around the laws.

At this point FC is still powerful and their GE product is the default choice for most consumers, but MRI starts winning more and more mindshare for their GE2 product. FC finally acknowledges the concerns of the alienated customers and says that their GE product can be tweaked to serve their needs. Some alienated customers are won over, but most remember how FC behaved when there was no choice, and they also note that FC is just as arrogant as before. FC's monopoly resulted in entitled and abusive behavior and none of the alienated customers want to support the monopoly that belittled them in the past.

In the present, FC is still huge and continues to get favorable legislation passed, but the tide is slowly turning. Major publications are starting to expose FC's flawed statistics and the problems with the GE product. Some elected officials are starting to warm to MRI's product.

One employee of FC who works for the media suddenly writes an opinion piece about how the alienated customers were right all along and FC was wrong to drive them away. He says that MRI is evil and ineffective (due to their relatively small size) and needs to be rebuilt from the ground up to truly serve the needs of the alienated customers. He also says that a new and more inclusive FC should be the one to create the new MRI, with input from the alienated customers. Some of the alienated customers are surprised at the concessions being made by an FC employee, but most smell a trap. FC lost their trust long ago and may never be able to win it back.

Perhaps it is FC that needs to be rebuilt from the ground up, and not MRI.

Beware of Greeks bearing gifts

Maggie McNeill · 17 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

> Trust not the horse, O Trojans. Be it what it may, I fear the Greeks even when they offer gifts.—Virgil, Aeneid (II, 48-9)

In general, people are not stupid; they are, however, extremely gullible. Given the information that there is a problem to be solved and the information with which to solve it, the average person can generally come up with a workable solution. But when that person does not realize that there is a problem, he won't even attempt to find a solution even if all the necessary information is readily available. In other words, the average person is insufficiently skeptical; unless he is warned that someone may be trying to deceive him, he will not expect deceit and in fact may even deny the possibility if the deceiver is someone he has been taught to trust, such as a leader.

[image]This childlike trust is why propaganda works and why names have such a powerful effect; if a group calls itself "the Physicians' Committee for Responsible Medicine," the natural tendency is to assume it's a group of physicians fighting malpractice or the like, and if politicians call a law the Violence Against Women Act, most people will presume that it is intended to combat violence against women. Unfortunately, those natural assumptions would be incorrect. As I explained in "The Anti-Life Equation," the PCRM is actually a fanatical vegan group that uses lies and exaggerations to scare people out of eating meat. And though the original VAWA of 1994 was bad enough, every successive reauthorization has loaded the horse with ever-increasing numbers of hoplites, which credulous women then browbeat men into taking inside the walls built to protect the citizenry from our own predatory government.

Let's start by getting one thing out of the way right now: the VAWA does not protect women. When it was enacted, laws against domestic violence already existed in every state, and most states had already tightened and strengthened those laws due to increased awareness of the problem. The law was therefore totally unnecessary from a practical or criminological point of view, and instead of reducing violence against women, evidence suggests that the law has actually increased it; a Department of Justice study associated the overly aggressive policies spawned by the VAWA with an increase in homicides of women, a National Institute of Justice study warned that "No-Drop" prosecution laws (see next paragraph) may place women "in greater jeopardy," and mandatory arrest or prosecution laws make normal women far less likely to call police. Other reasons the law is bad for women specifically (aside from the ways it's bad for free people of either sex) include encouragement of aggressive arrest and prosecution (the number of women arrested in California increased 446% after the VAWA); flooding the legal system with trivial and false abuse allegations, which hide the real ones; denial of women's agency; and promoting the destruction of relationships instead of reconciliation.

[image]Neo-feminists wanted the VAWA so women would have a gigantic government club to use against men, to promote the criminalization of men, to encourage the breakup of heterosexual relationships, and to provide a precedent for the infantilization of women who make sexual choices (such as sex work or BDSM) of which neo-feminists disapprove—and it has been very successful in achieving those goals. But as I've explained before, neo-feminists are useful idiots to whom lawmakers cater because their rhetoric provides a Trojan horse for anti-civil rights measures, like a gigantic My Little Pony with which silly, brainwashed women are too enchanted to notice its dangerous payload. Take "No-Drop" policies: these are programs authorized and funded by the VAWA that render women powerless to stop the machinery of injustice once an accusation of domestic violence is made. As soon as the woman (or, in some states, anyone at all) calls the police to report an incident, the husband is arrested (no matter what the wife says, in many cases even if she is the aggressor) and prosecuted. Because many wives rightly refuse to cooperate with such proceedings, the Office on Violence Against Women (OVW, the DoJ office that enforces and funds the VAWA) authorized so-called "evidence-based" prosecutions, kangaroo courts in which any evidence (including hearsay) is allowed and the accused man is denied the constitutional rights of confrontation and cross-examination. Is it any wonder domestic violence convictions have doubled under this regime?

The implications of this policy are twofold: first, women are established as moral imbeciles, with the state acting in loco parentis to make legal decisions on our "behalf"; and second, once civil rights are abrogated for men, the precedent of "equal treatment under the law" allows them to be abrogated for women as well, and indeed they are with increasing frequency. Other VAWA-enabled abuses include subjugation of women in shelters to a neo-feminist political agenda and prosecutorial power to abduct the children of women who refuse to participate in the demolition of their husbands. And that's just the beginning; subsequent VAWA reauthorizations have loosened the definition of "domestic violence" so much that a psychotic New Mexico woman was able to get a restraining order against David Letterman for supposedly "tormenting" her with "facial gestures" and "code words" on his TV show, and empowered the police to collect and indefinitely retain DNA from anybody they care to point a finger at. The most recent lowered the burden of proof for male university students accused of sexual misconduct to "a preponderance of the evidence" and gave the accuser (who need not even be the supposed victim) the right to appeal an acquittal.

[image]I'm sure y'all can connect the dots. If dirty looks can be crimes and feelings constitute evidence, any woman can have any man arrested on a whim … even if that woman is, say, a politician and that man is, say, a vociferous detractor; all she has to say is that she "felt threatened." And under policies of "equality," male politicians will soon be able to do the same. To anyone, male or female. Under the newest iteration of the VAWA, cops, bureaucrats, and politicians will be able to have anyone arrested, and even if he can't be convicted under a preponderance of the hearsay, he can be bankrupted by repeated prosecutions or framed for something else via his DNA sample. The proponents of the VAWA include cops, prosecutors, career politicians, neo-feminists, and the brainwashed followers of any of the above who can't be bothered to read something before giving it their support; they are personified by a comic actor-turned-legislator weeping crocodile tears and Republicans targeting throwaway additions about homosexuals and immigrants in order to call attention away from the flagrant civil rights violations they so desperately want to pass. They want you to believe that to be against the VAWA is to be anti-woman, but take a look at the bylines on the articles I linked above, and on all these articles as well. And no, they aren't all Republicans or "conservatives" either; as I stated above, the Republicans want the VAWA just as much as the Democrats do. The only people who are against it are those who care about concepts like liberty, fairness, civil rights, and the recognition of women's capacity for adult decision … and unfortunately, there aren't enough of us to stop the fools from breaking down the wall to drag this artfully disguised menace inside.

In His Own Words: ABR saved my kids and saved me

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 18 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 18 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month 2014 for Men and Boys, the invisible victims of domestic violence. ABR (Always Be Recording) is advice every man or woman in an abusive relationship should follow – especially abused men!

The family court system is extraordinarily biased in favor of women, and female victims of violence enjoy special protections that male victims of violence are not afforded courtesy of VAWA (the Violence Against Women Act), an unconstitutional and sexist piece of legislature.

ABR has helped many men avoid wrongful arrest and restraining order abuse due to the false allegations of an abusive wife, girlfriend, or ex. It has also helped some men obtain custody of their children. Today's In His Own Words is an example of how ABR helped to save one man and his children.

> ABR Saved My Kids and Saved Me
> My wife and I were together for over a decade. We had a whirlwind romance and were married six months after we met, even though there were several things I now recognize as red flags.
> Bright, burning red flags.
> For example, she told me about how she had a car chase with an ex-boyfriend to "make" him talk to her. She confessed that she faked a suicide in order to try to manipulate him. Then there was the drama. There always had to be drama. She was attracted to it and created it when there was none to be had. And the biggest red flag of all, she actually told me, "You really shouldn't keep seeing me, I am going to destroy your life."
> Despite these red flags and others, I was smitten. She was beautiful, fun, and smart. Plus, there was always something to get stirred up about in her life, and while it wasn't fun, it was satisfying to be her "knight in shining armor," to be the hero for a pretty girl.
> Unfortunately, a professional victim must have a villain.
> Though it took years to recognize it, things were bad, and kept getting worse. About three to four years into the marriage, things were bad enough that I felt very confused but couldn't talk to anyone about it because I just didn't think anyone would believe me. She was so confident, capable, and calm in public! I was certain no one would believe what she was like behind closed doors.
> Plus, I never talked to anyone about it because I was embarrassed to admit to my own groveling behavior just to keep her appeased. I was embarrassed to admit that I spent a lot of time reassuring her that all her ex-boyfriends (and current boyfriends) still loved and missed her. Yes, I actually did this.
> I was embarrassed that I would put up with someone who was always breaking cupboards, dishes, and other things on purpose during tantrums. I was embarrassed that I spent so much money on her just to keep her from acting on the threat, "Well, if you can't buy it for me then I am just going to go get a job stripping!"
> She wasted away our first child's pre-school years messing around with boyfriends on the Internet and obsessing over them, sneaking away to meet with them, etc. It only got worse after our second child was born.
> Day after day, I would return from work to an unkempt home, household shopping that wasn't done, and the baby strapped into a highchair, parked in front of the television with a bloated, unchanged diaper, usually the one I put on in the morning before going to work. Once, our baby broke her arm trying to get out of the highchair (according to my ex). Did my ex take her to the hospital?
> No, she put our baby in the crib with the OBVIOUSLY broken arm and let her lie in agony for several hours with the expectation that I would take care of her after I got home from work. Our two kids were mostly on their own. As time went on, our oldest child started to assume the responsibilities of parent to my wife and our youngest, or what psychologists call parentification, which is a form of child abuse.

Through it all, and year after year, I kept hoping things would get better. She would be better after she graduated from college. A new therapist would help her. New medication would make her better. A new house. More money. Fancier clothes. A bigger house. More time at home. A new baby would make it better. Different medication. Different therapist, etc., but it just kept getting worse.

She started to beg me to help her commit suicide, and even begged me to agree to a murder-suicide pact. She would talk for hours about how easy it would be to turn the cars on and leave the door open to the house. She said we should just drop our youngest off at the hospital and never come back. She would scream for hours, mad raving screams until she was literally frothing at the corners of her mouth.

She kicked, scratched, and slapped me regularly. As time passed, her physical violence escalated and became more frequent. The objects she threw at me became bigger, harder, and heavier. She started to physically assault me in my sleep. Nothing is more startling or unnerving than being hit with something heavy and hard in your sleep. Try falling asleep with this thought in your head: "Is tonight the night she finds the baseball bat?"

But I was scared to leave, scared to divorce. No way I could abandon my kids to live alone with someone like that. I couldn't let them be her next target. I was stuck because, as I mentioned, she was FINE in public. She was wonderful in front of her family. All the awfulness would disappear the moment someone was there to observe.

Worst of all, she can tell a lie better than most people can tell the truth. She believed her lies. To her, her feelings were reality. If she felt you were a villain then, suddenly in her mind, she had a whole villainous backstory for you, things you had done. She was clever enough to weave in dates and places and whatever she knew about you to make it seem more real. She would tell me things that I knew were lies, yet I would believe her or feel chilled by the fact that she believed it.

She wasn't lying. She thinks she is telling the truth. If she felt like you did a bad thing, you did that thing even in the face of overwhelming evidence to the contrary.

I was also afraid to leave because she described the lies she would tell the police about me and anyone who would listen. She would describe, in rich, vivid detail, stories that would get me barred from ever seeing the kids again, if not put in jail.

Somewhere toward the end of our marriage, I was in a bookstore with my wife and caught sight of a psychology book. Reading the title made my hair raise on end and my blood run cold with an odd recognition: I Hate You—Don't Leave Me. Oh how often I had heard those words screamed at me in exactly that way and in so many other variations. It's an odd, impossible phrase I thought no one would ever believe. [*THIS IS BORDERLINE PERSONALITY DISORDER]

Around the same time, I got my first smartphone with video and audio recording features. It occurred to me that I should ALWAYS have it on me. That my only chance of getting the children and I out of that hell was if I had proof.

I switched to pajama pants with pockets. I always had the phone on me. After reading through some reviews over at Gear Hungry, I bought many other little audio and video recording gadgets that could be turned on with a simple switch. I left them around the house and my car, ready to go in case something awful should start to happen.

I started to catch things here and there, sometimes a little video, usually some audio. Helpful things, but nothing that would be a slam dunk in court. I missed a lot of things that would have been even more helpful. It's not always easy to Always Be Recording and it's tricky to be discrete about it sometimes, but I kept at it.

Then one day, the nadir of our marriage, my ex had a full-blown psychotic rage episode. She raged, screamed, broke things, and hit me with enough volume, intensity, and duration that our oldest child called a relative for > help. Once my ex realized our child had “ratted [her] out,” she went nuclear.

> She chased our child around the house until the child hid in the bathroom. Then she grabbed a 9-inch butcher knife and tried to break down the door of the room where our child was hiding. I was able to intervene at this point, and got her to back away from the door to the other side of the room while I backed away to another corner of the room.
> She was frothing at the mouth and screaming at our child, “Come out here and see what you did! Come out here and watch! Watch what you are making me do!” as she raked the dull side of the knife across her own legs. She demanded that our child come out to see his mother stab herself.
> Eventually our child came out for a moment and my ex continued screaming. Then she lunged at our child and chased him back into the bathroom, still with the 9-inch butcher knife in hand and froth on her lips. I intervened again and got a small cut on my hand for the effort.
> I knew I could disarm her without either of us getting seriously hurt. However, I was pretty sure it would leave a bruise on her arm, which would, of course, play into the lies she threatened to tell the police. Then it occurred to me, “This is what the police are for.” So while she was looking away, I took the house phone off the cradle and dialed 911.
> Next, I loudly started saying, “WIFE’S NAME, please put down the knife” and repeated it over and over. She continued raving for what seemed like an eternity, then the doorbell rang. Like a light switch being flipped off, my ex immediately calmed down, put down the knife, and began arranging her hair. She calmly asked, “Oh, who is at the door?”
> I opened the door and five very anxious-looking policemen with weapons drawn were standing there.
> My ex began to lie to the police, but her lies didn’t work this time. I got it all on video. And my children and I, we got away.
> Sometimes people tease me about how much I love my phone, how much I love little recording devices and that I buy so many. I just smile and nod. I don’t explain. How else am I supposed to feel about something that saved my life and rescued my children?
> Always. Be. Recording.

All in the same boat—really?

Herbert Purdy · 18 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It is a universal truth that a person's rights end where another's begin. Put another way, the right to swing my fist ends at the other man's nose. You cannot gain rights to anything without infringing on the rights of others. There are only so many rights to go round, and feminists who claim their rights without proper regard for the consequences for everyone are engaging in little more than an irresponsible social mutiny. It cannot end equitably.

The proof for what I am saying is there before us today.

Men and boys are now being unreasonably and unconscionably harried and vilified everywhere you look in society. Women are invading their work and social spaces (for example, boys cannot join the Girl Guides but girls are allowed in what used to be called the "Boy Scouts"). Maleness is being pathologized in our schools and mocked in the media. And all this is the result of feminism. Surely that cannot be right?

The stock response of feminists is that men have been repressing women for centuries, and this is the justification for their rebellion. They truly believe the wholly unsupportable lie of "The Patriarchy," although it stems from the greatest logical fallacy there is—the argumentum ad ignorantum—the argument from ignorance—meaning that no factual basis for the feminist interpretation of patriarchy exists. And they neatly fail to acknowledge the intellectual truth that two wrongs can never make a right.

Feminists have been enormously successful in implanting this lie in the minds of most people today. Most people believe that there is a mismatch in social power between men and women and that so-called patriarchy is out to get women.

As I have pointed out repeatedly on this blog, men have no more shaped society to suit them than the moon is made of blue cheese, as any sensible reading of history (that is, other than through the lens of feminism) shows.

For centuries, women were held in the highest regard in civilized nations such as Britain and North America. Under the common law principle of couverture, they were accorded enormous privileges over men. The so-called man-shaped society actually protected and cared for women (and their children, which is the point of it all) in a social security system in which men were charged with the responsibility to care for and protect women and step up to the plate of provision and responsibility for their children.

Society has moved on. Economic growth and social development have allowed us the privilege and the luxury of being able to consider human rights. It has also allowed women's roles to develop. There are many more opportunities open to women today than hitherto—but the same is true of men. Men, too, have been "liberated" from many heavy responsibilities that also held them back from truly fulfilling themselves.

Men have never held women back—or down. For most of history, they neither had the time, the freedom, nor the power to hold women back. They were too busy surviving—and ensuring their families survived.

The idea that men have always dominated women is an egregious falsehood, but on the back of it, feminists have irresponsibly, greedily, and selfishly kicked over the tables in the temple that is society. In the name of "equality," "liberty," and "rights," they have demanded freedoms that would have accrued to them anyway.

Feminists have replaced the status quo ante with an antagonistic, adversarial, demanding society in which it is a given that women's needs must take precedence over men's. In the name of equality, feminism is actually promoting inequality. That is fundamentally wrong and, in its very essence, inequitable.

This ideological blindness is dividing us, cancelling all means by which men and women could ever find an accommodation with one another—an ability to forge a future jointly.

What women don't realize is that they have been duped into embracing an ideology that purports to be to their benefit but is actually a deeply divisive creed, intended to use them for its deeper purpose, which is to bring down society as we know it. (Just look at "My Challenge" to see what I mean.)

What those women who espouse feminism (and those turkeys-voting-for-Christmas—the men who agree with them) seem unable to see is that they are promoting a partisan ideology that in its very nature is inimical to all that we hold good in our lives, and that in doing so they are destroying their own lives.

By dividing women from men—setting them against men—feminism is fomenting a battle that neither side can win. It is a battle of attrition that will inexorably grind the whole of society into the ground.

The tool of totalitarianism down the centuries is to divide and rule, and that is what feminism is doing to our society today. Its other main tool is to keep people in a state of fear and antagonism to one another that keeps them occupied and diverted from threatening the power of the state. Furthermore, if you diminish the strength of men, you will prevent their rising up against injustice. It's a neat trick.

Feminism is not about equality, it is a one-sided totalitarian ideology that in its very essence deprives people of peace and harmony: those derivative qualities of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. People who have bought this pup have allowed themselves to be deluded by a bait-and-switch trick.

The truth is, PEOPLE have rights—they're called human rights. It is called egalitarianism. So, if you are an egalitarian, how can you be a sectarian when it comes to your rights? Why not just include everyone? How can women's rights exist separate from men's rights? How can that be a reasonable proposition? Are we not all in the same boat?

Many right-minded and thoughtful people, worldwide, are finding themselves discomfited by what they see is happening to men and boys in our society today. This is why significant—and rapidly increasing—numbers of men (and, it has to be said, women of conscience, experience, and intelligence too) are waking up to what is happening among us. They are rising up, taking a stand for egalitarianism, for fairness, and against totalitarian injustice.

Mothers of boys are increasingly worried about their sons' future welfare in an increasingly stridently feminist society that puts the needs of girls above them. Many fathers are deeply afraid of the toxic anti-male rape culture that is widespread on our university campuses that is placing young male students at such risk of false allegations of rape and sexual assault.

Yet, they continue to espouse the idea that feminism is a good thing. If they could but see it, the feminism that they hold so dear is the cause of their concerns.

No one can logically be for feminism and for equality—let alone fairness, rights, or common sense—and I challenge feminists and their fellow travellers to ask themselves what will society look like when feminism finally fulfills its aims? Will it be fair? Will it be just? What will have happened to the balance of people's rights? Will there be any left for anybody?

Herein lies the acid test of what I am saying …

KSU YESbody! issues apology to Sage Gerard

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 18 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

After Paul Elam and I were made the subject of several angry flyers and posts by KSU students, I learned of a (now closed) GoFundMe campaign funding a protest of Male Students in Peril.

The campaign was branded with a student organization called KSU YESbody!.

Google result crediting KSU YESbody! with campaign
[image]
The section of the campaign citing KSU YESbody! as the creator
On the same campaign page, you can see a Tumblr called Menformation (a.k.a. MensRightsInfo) cited in the following language:

[image]

The use of "We" combined with the branding strongly suggests that KSU YESbody! is responsible for Menformation, but it turns out this is not the case. After meeting with the co-presidents of KSU YESbody!, I got the impression that they were trying to distance themselves from confrontations initiated by their more outspoken affiliates. It was these affiliates whom the co-presidents allowed to set up and manage Menformation and the fundraiser.

Given the way these sources were branded, it appears to me that some of the more passionate feminists in the community have essentially spoken through KSU YESbody!, and the co-presidents were not aware of what consequences that would yield. They asked me to meet to discuss YESbody!'s actual involvement, and to invite me to future panels on men's issues.

I agreed to meet. In the meeting, I suggested that the co-presidents be careful around those who would make hasty character allegations and asked that they use the money I donated to the fundraiser toward the protest (they were seriously considering returning the money). I then agreed to state that Menformation is not an official source of YESbody!, contingent on the fact that the co-presidents make a clear statement that Menformation is not representative of YESbody!'s attitude toward my presence on campus.

The co-presidents issued the following apology on their official Tumblr (with comments inserted by myself):

> The YESbody! presidents would like to make it known that the purpose of YESbody! is not to single out any fellow students or to make accusations about anyone's character which are not supported by proper evidence. We would also like to make it known that there are many individuals participating in our demonstration and supporting our cause who are not members of YESbody!. All those who are participating have various reasons for their involvement and differing opinions about how certain issues should be addressed.
> We cannot be held responsible for each individual's opinions, but we support their rights to those opinions. However, an individual's opinion is not necessarily representative of our group as a whole. Furthermore, neither the MensRightsInfo blog nor the GoFundMe page are run by YESbody! members.

I'm glad to hear that, but please understand that, again, YESbody!'s brand is smeared over the GoFundMe page, and Menformation is lumped with GoFundMe using the word "We." I am willing to admit my mistake in suggesting that Menformation is an official YESbody! publication, but it sure was made to look like one.

> Though we are grateful for the support of the people who run these forums, we wish to make it clear that YESbody! was not responsible for publicly addressing any feeling of hostility toward Sage Gerard or for criticizing him as a perceived threat or harassing force towards faculty or students.

> Regardless of allegations against him, we are unaware of any evidence that he is a threat to students.

Awareness has nothing to do with it. There is no evidence that I am a threat to anyone, full stop.

> Of course, we maintain that all are entitled to their opinion and right to free speech, but we ask that members of YESbody! refrain from making allegations against fellow students without proper evidence.

Good. Thank you for bringing this up, but there is one more thing.

You have informed me that flyers posted around campus taking Paul Elam out of context were hand-delivered to YESbody! by unnamed off-campus individuals. To be fair, you mentioned that you were not aware of your own members posting the flyers and that it was possible that other individuals or organizations may have received the flyers.

But that point is moot. I'm not pointing fingers on who posted what. I ultimately reported the foreign flyers to the Student Life department,* who do not want non-students taking advantage of campus space in this way.

Student Life told me that Menformation flyers will be taken down in the future, so further postering of borderline-libelous propaganda will be a wasted effort.

I appreciate your statement to your members, but please be prepared to ask your affiliates to stick to an evidence-based evaluation of character as well.

Student Life is now keeping an eye out for messages by your friends. If I were you, I'd rethink my relationship with loose cannons.

> We also ask you to keep in mind that our mission is NOT to promote fear of fellow students due to differing ideologies, but to educate the general public about issues concerning inequality. This means that we may end up collaborating with people who have overlapping concerns but may have a different way of addressing those concerns. These situations are where we must practice what we preach and learn to co-exist.
> At the request of Sage Gerard, we will be keeping his donation of $175 and putting it towards our art installation as it has been expressed by Mr. Gerard that it is important to him that we are able to exercise free speech. Once again, we apologize for any attacks either directly or indirectly aimed at Mr. Gerard that were mistakenly sourced to our members and we look forward to possibly collaborating in the future.

Thank you for promising to use my donation for your protest. I've already stated that I think the protest is misguided, but I'd much rather you have it than not. I come from a culture that strongly values the promotion of different positions such that scrutiny defeats weak ideas.

I await your invitation to speak on a men's issues panel. If anything, I'm glad that KSUM helped generate more interest in the conversation.

In His Own Words: Narcissistic Woman

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 19 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 19 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month 2014 for Men and Boys, the invisible victims of domestic violence. Falling in love with an abusive, personality disordered woman is like living a fairy tale in reverse.

A man falls in love with what he thinks is a beautiful princess or damsel in distress only to watch her morph into the destructive, devouring witch. In today's In His Owns Words, Peter shares the story of how the beautiful girl he thought he fell in love with turned into a raging, violent narcissistic bitch.

> Narcissistic Woman
> "A happy wife is a happy life." Whoever coined that phrase must not have been married to a narcissistic woman. You fall in love with Sleeping Beauty only to discover she is the witch once you kiss her awake.
> I met my future wife during a very intense summer camp, and, yes, we fell in love. She seemed perfect in so many ways, absolutely charming and self-assured. We had similar interests; our educational paths were almost identical and both of us wanted to live a life of creativity.
> After camp ended, I went back to my country and she went back to hers. We kept in contact via mail and telephone. I spent part of the following summer with her. We had a great time, and the following year she moved in with me.
> For the most part, things were good. There were red flags, but I did not recognize them as such at the time. I tried to be the perfect spouse and took charge of most of the family duties. At this point it was just the two of us and we were on my home turf. Also, I had seen all that my dad didn't do and how hard it had been on my mother.
> Two years later, we decided to move to her home country because there were more job opportunities. The transition to her country worked well, although there were struggles in setting things up and getting jobs. I did my part and then some to compensate for the fact that I was underemployed for a few years.
> Two years after we moved to her country, we had our first child and then a second child two years later. There were more red flags at this point. In particular, her reluctance to go back to work to make sure we could maintain the lifestyle she wanted.
> She said I should get a summer job or an evening job, so that she could stay home. The best suggestion was that I should get a job as a tree planter up north. When I did get small jobs to bring extra money during the summers, she complained that I was ignoring the family.
> I spent full days with the children and completed the majority of the housework, trying to do all the things that an equal partner is supposed to do. It didn't seem to matter what I did, it was wrong. Her family was not much support either. They have often told me:
> - "She has always been like that."
> - "She has always had a short temper."
> - "She was a strong-willed child."
> Our relationship was (is) a constant power struggle.
> Eventually, her employer gave her an ultimatum: continue to stay at home and you will lose your position. At this point, she had been at home for four years. She went back to work but was incredibly resentful of having to do so.
> We interviewed a lot of childcare providers and none of them were good enough. She was constantly addressing my parenting skills or the lack thereof. We are both educators, and I had worked in the childcare sector for 10 years prior to getting a teaching degree.

I asked why she was so critical of my parenting. She claimed she was the superior parent because:

- My education and experience was from a different country, therefore, it was not valid.
- I had not read as many books as her, and since she had read more she should be referred to as the expert.
- By the virtue of being of being a woman, she had better parenting instincts.

She informed me that because she's a "naturally gifted teacher," she had the right to steer me in the proper direction. She also said I should "thank God for putting [her] in my life," so that I could become a "better person."

She was constantly undermining my role as a parent. She corrected me in front of the children when she thought I was wrong, which was often. She would frequently stand outside the door when I read nighttime stories. When the children asked questions and I answered, she would sometimes interrupt because she thought I was wrong. Or, once I was done she would lecture me for an hour about what she perceived to be my inadequacies.

She also told me that if I left her she would make sure that I was deported and would not see the children again. This was prior to me getting citizenship. My home country didn't accept dual citizenship for the longest time. Back then, I had landed immigrant status sponsored by her.

We often sat down and discussed strategies and rules for the family. I would try to follow them, so at least we were consistent even if I didn't agree with all of them. It didn't matter, ultimately. One day she would praise me for using the agreed-upon strategy, and would yell at me the following day for using the same strategy for the same situation. Also, she wouldn't stick to the rules and strategies herself. When I asked her why, she would say, "To be a good parent you need to know when to break the rules, and you are too rigid. Try to be more flexible."

As the children grew, she became more and more critical about what she called my "lack of communication skills." She made comments about me being ESL in front of the children. When I pointed out that I communicate for a living, she mocked me in a variety of ways.

To be fair, she did teach me a lot of new English words, none of which I can use in a professional setting. It is hard to communicate with a person whose most common response to a difference of opinion is, "Why do you always try to start a fight?" or, "Bullshit!"

As the children grew and the demands on her became greater, she did not cope well. The attacks became more frequent and nastier. They also became physical, which shocked me. Who in their right mind would attack somebody who is stronger, taller, and heavier and has close-combat training? The fact that I was bigger didn't concern her.

The first time she physically attacked me, I instinctively pushed back. When someone is winding up to take a swing at you, you protect yourself. I quickly realized that I would lose if I defended myself, and should just take the beating. She told me if the police were called, they would not believe me. "Just look at you, you are so much bigger than me." The same logic that Dr. Phil uses.

I was under constant stress and walking on eggshells. She would spend half an hour yelling at me for not wiping the countertop, but I could not comment on her overspending. She frequently told me, "You should be like a knight in shining armor that takes care of everything" and "You should put me on a pedestal and worship the ground I walk upon."

It was not good enough that I did 75% of the housework and sometimes more; I still had to give her presents and arrange to take her on dates. I had very little time just for me and there is very little money for dates.

I hypothesized that the reason we couldn't get the finances to work were because we were both incompetent, things cost more than I thought, and/or we didn't make enough money. What I discovered over the years was that initially we were incompetent. I worked on it and learned how to budget and do bookkeeping, so that we could run a family.

The reason things cost more is because my wife refuses to cut back, and wants things her way. She told me that "no man can tell her what to do." Explaining the difference between needs and wants was futile. She would also deliberately make budgets fail, just to prove that I was wrong and then accuse me of not knowing how to handle money because my budget failed.

I frequently broke down my earnings and our expenses to show her what we had to live off during any given pay period. She would stamp her foot on the ground and tell me, "I don't like your budget! Redo it!" and then storm of like a three-year-old.

I tried to explain that you have to live within your means. She said, "You only think about money, whereas I think of what is in the best interest of the family! I should have seen this earlier!" It took me several years to explain that the adage, "It takes money to make money" does not relate to personal consumption.

I have cut my spending down to next to nothing, and when she realizes there is money she manages to spend before I can use it for bills and other necessities. We are always behind and the stress is unbearable. When I try to bring this up, she tells me it's the wrong time or place, I'm putting her under stress, I can't talk about anything but money, I am using the wrong tone of voice, she is tired, I need to learn to just "deal with it," and/or I need to be on medication.

We are both well paid, so finances should not be an issue. She seems to be aware that the finances are something I need to have under control. Since she does not have the threat of deportation anymore, she messes up the finances.

On numerous occasions when she has overspent, she will tell me with a straight face that I am to blame because I didn't stop her. The fact that I am usually not present when she overspends is irrelevant.

My wake-up call happened when I developed diabetes and gastrointestinal problems. I'm convinced the stress she causes was a contributing factor. When I was diagnosed with these conditions, she spent two hours yelling at me about how stupid I was and made an extremely vicious physical attack, one which could have cost me my eye.

As she helped to clean up my injury, she told me, again with a straight face, that she did not realize how mentally unstable I was. I had to explain to colleagues why my face looked like it did. It was humiliating. I told them I biked into a tree. On a later date, she said she wished she had done more damage.

My family doctor asked if she was projecting her emotions onto our oldest child. I didn't know what he meant, so I started to do some research and a new world opened up for me. Even though most of the text I found was based on men being the perpetrator, I was able to talk to my doctor about my situation.

One day, I found a card in my work mailbox stating all of the benefits we had as employees, and counseling was one of them. I decided to go for it. At this point, I thought I was rapidly losing my mind. I told my wife I needed assertiveness training, which she agreed that I needed.

The counselor was very good and helped a lot. She gave me two options, which were to divorce her or learn to manage her behavior. In hindsight, I should have gone for the divorce, but at the time I couldn't leave the kids with my wife because I was afraid she would turn on them without me present.

Around the same time, a sibling gave me a book about divorcing high-conflict people. It, too, opened new doors. Several years later, I came across the article 10 Signs your Girlfriend or Wife is an Emotional Bully and it all fell into place.

We are still married, but now I'm engaged in a variety of activities, several of which are creative. She has chosen not to be a part of it. I'm finally looking after my health, exercising regularly, and putting myself first.

Our oldest child is over 18 and the second one will be 18 in two years. Hopefully, all of the major financial issues will be resolved shortly and I am planning to leave after that. She has begun to turn some of her attacks on our oldest, since he is growing up and ready to separate from her. He has started to question her behavior.

She will work on him and when he has had enough and swears at her, she then becomes the victim and starts > lashing out at me. “No man would let their son swear at their wife, his mother! You are taking his side by not punishing him!”

> Our daughter has asked if I can divorce her, so that she can live with me and get some peace and quiet. My family has been completely alienated by her, they will not come and visit me while I’m still married to her, nor is she welcome to visit them.
> Friends and acquaintances frequently ask, “How is your charming wife doing?” It’s hard to go to social gatherings and see how she turns on the show, when I have seen behind the mask.

Raising boys to men vs. The death of adulthood

Ciaran O'Connor · 19 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

When I was a boy of 10 or so, an old plumber came to my parents' house to install a new water heater. Although he was old and bent, he was powerful—he easily carried out the old water heater and carried in the new one by himself. And he was skillful, rapidly cutting, cleaning, and sweating the copper pipes, leaving perfect, gleaming fillets of solder at each joint. As I sat on the rickety cellar steps, watching his progress with rapt attention, he patiently and kindly described each step of his work to me. There was a right way and a wrong way to do things, he explained. So impressed was I that I retained every word. This to me was a man—strong, skilled, capable, and independent. I wanted to be a man too, to escape the weakness, ignorance, and dependency of childhood. Although I dreamed of becoming a scientist, engineer, or inventor, I saw in the old plumber the essence of what I wanted to be—a man who could do things, build things, fix things. His encouraging replies to my curious inquiries and his compliments on my cleverness reinforced my desire to learn how to do the things men did—to become a man who could work his will upon his little piece of the world.

My story of the old plumber is just one instance of innumerable encounters with grown men that shaped my aspirations and my understanding of manhood. Not all these encounters were with real men—the characters of the fictions and the histories I read served their role as well. Each of these imparted to me a bit of the virtue of manhood.

More than four decades have passed since that day. I have become the scientist, engineer, and inventor that I dreamed of as a boy. I am now much closer in age to the old plumber than to the boy I was. I am the father of three boys of my own, and I am a leader in an organization that builds leadership and life skills in preteen and teenaged boys. When I work with these boys, I sometimes wonder if I inspire any of them as the old plumber inspired me.

On some days, with some boys, I am sure the answer is yes. I see their curiosity and their excitement in the things I teach them. I see their pleasure in my recognition of their accomplishments, and I recall the gratification I felt as a boy when men acknowledged me. With these boys I feel I am having a positive influence, helping them grow to become men of skill, competence, self-assurance, integrity, and honor.

But many other boys are much harder to reach. These boys seem to have little interest in what I teach them, and neither my praise or admonishment has much influence on them. I've pondered why that might be. Of course, some boys will be uninterested in the material and activities, others will not respond to my methods and personality, and some will be simply too young or immature. But I think it goes deeper than this—these boys appear to be uninterested in the realm of manhood as a whole, as well as the men who inhabit it. And why should they? Twenty-first-century boyhood offers endless amusement and adventure, while twenty-first-century manhood is disparaged and degraded, full of liabilities and unprivileged responsibilities.

Writing in The New York Times a few weeks ago, A.O. Scott touched on this phenomenon in an essay titled "The Death of Adulthood in American Culture." Despite his mandatory feminist framing and ritualistic self-abasement as a white heterosexual man, Scott offers a number of observations of the decline of manhood in popular American culture. Asserting his pop cultural conformity from the first sentence, Scott starts with a de rigueur analysis of Mad Men:

> From the start, "Mad Men" has, in addition to cataloging bygone vices and fashion choices, traced the erosion, the gradual slide toward obsolescence, of a power structure built on and in service of the prerogatives of white men. The unthinking way Don, Pete, Roger and the rest of them enjoy their position, and the ease with which they abuse it, inspires what has become a familiar kind of ambivalence among cable viewers. Weren't those guys awful, back then? But weren't they also kind of cool?

In those days before the great Coming Apart, even an old plumber might stand accused of enjoying some of those prerogatives. To be a tradesman was an honorable occupation, a solid member of the broad middle class. Plumbers and garage owners were neighbors with doctors and engineers in my childhood neighborhood. A tradesman had pride in his craft, pride as an American, and even pride as a taxpayer. He might not have been "kind of cool," but he was proud to be a working man. A man whom a boy might emulate.

But today, manhood is the object of cultural criticism, scorn, and mockery. As Scott puts it:

> Maybe nobody grows up anymore, but everyone gets older. What happens to the boy rebels when the dream of perpetual childhood fades and the traditional prerogatives of manhood are unavailable? There are two options: They become irrelevant or they turn into Louis C. K. (fig. 5). Every white American male under the age of 50 is some version of the character he plays on "Louie," a show almost entirely devoted to the absurdity of being a pale, doughy heterosexual man with children in a post-patriarchal age. Or, if you prefer, a loser.

If my old plumber were alive today, he would be just another pale, doughy, heterosexual male loser. No longer an exemplar of masculine strength and skill, he would be reduced to a tasteless butt-crack joke.

It is from this position of degraded masculinity that I try to motivate and teach boys. Stripped of much of the situational authority that society used to bestow upon a man in my position, I have to rely more heavily on personal charisma, individual social dominance, and psychological persuasion. In a curious and somewhat uncomfortable manner, my efforts to motivate boys parallel the efforts of pickup artists to seduce women. In both arenas, the cultural status of men has been greatly diminished and the supporting conventions and rituals have been stripped away. It is no longer sufficient to follow the script—there is none. Detached from the social structures that used to support us, we must instead amplify and project our personal strength to hold the attention of those we seek to impress.

A great achievement of Western culture was the elevation of well-socialized, dutiful boys into leaders of society. The "privileges" of manhood were both an inducement to boys to accept the restraints placed upon them in the pursuit of manhood and a supportive framework for those adult men helping to guide them there. Without the supporting framework of this so-called "masculine privilege," the adult male leader of boys now has to rely more heavily on his own resources—his ability to inspire, cajole, motivate, or even to intimidate when required.

Those who achieve the greatest success in this post-patriarchal culture are not the respected pillars of their communities but those who foster their own little cult of personality. This represents a dangerous turn for society because the individuals with the greatest social wit, charisma, and force of personality are often dark triad sociopaths, not well-socialized, law-abiding family men. By tearing down the "patriarchy" that supported the latter, Western society is increasingly choosing the cult of personality over the rule of law.

No doubt the feminists will read these words with smug self-satisfaction, for they have had great success in tearing down what they regard as "patriarchal privileges." But in doing so, they have damaged the future of boys, and ultimately girls, more than they have hurt men like me. Boys are not attuned to gender politics, but they sense its consequences. What motivation does society provide them to assume the responsibility of manhood when its value is disparaged while the pleasures of boyhood are so immersive and intense? As Scott puts it:

> Why should they listen to uptight bosses, stuck-up rich guys and other readily available symbols of settled male authority? ….
> True contentment is only found with your friends, who are into porn and "Star Wars" and weed and video games and all the stuff that girls and parents just don't understand.

While our young feminist women have great ambitions in education and careers, sooner or later most decide they want a husband. And as a recent Pew Research Center study shows, the single most important attribute these young women look for in a partner is a steady job. But their male peers are increasingly turning their backs and following a different path.

As Scott points out, the theme of men going their own way by seeking comfort in their friends and seeking escape from the society of work and women has a long tradition in American literature:

> At sea or in the wilderness, these friends managed to escape both from the institutions of patriarchy and from the intimate authority of women, the mothers and wives who represent a check on male freedom.

While the sea and wilderness hold little allure for the modern boy, the ever-expanding universe of cyberspace presents an even more attractive and accessible escape. And those who escape may never enter the world of work and marriage. Thus, the feminist victory over masculine status and privilege redounds upon the young women, who still expect men to exhibit their traditional responsibility (though they are loath to reward them for it). But such men are increasingly hard for women to find.

I must admit this leaves me with a profound ambivalence. Perhaps I should leave the feminists to enjoy the spoils of their victory, and leave the boys to eschew manhood for the pleasures of a perpetual adolescence. Do I really want to teach boys to do their duty to God, country, and all the old laws of obedience and service just to prepare them to be exploited? I am very cognizant of the dangers that await them: ruthless employers seeking their replacement with lower-cost labor; hostile feminists seeking to criminalize their masculinity in all its expressions; and vindictive ex-wives extorting alimony and child support. I can sympathize with those who choose to walk away from all of this.

On the other hand, I do not want to see these boys surrendered to a life devoid of the satisfaction that real accomplishment brings. And I do not want them always hiding and retreating while the Social Justice Warriors infiltrate, sack, and destroy their refuges. So I spend many hours each week working to help boys grow into men. Men of integrity, honor, kindness, and generosity, but also men who will stand up for their culture and their beliefs, and who can plan, organize, and fight for their own interests.

To this end, one of the most important skills I teach is leadership—the ability to determine what needs to be done, formulate plans to do it, then motivate others to follow the plan. The boy leader who tries to exercise his new-found authority is supported by the framework in which he works—the rules and practices of the organization and the authority of the adult leaders who support and guide him. Without this support, few boys would have the personal resources to develop their leadership abilities. As the boy leaders need support from the men leaders, the men leaders need support from their society. When society withdraws its support from men, it also withdraws its support from boys. And when these boys grow to men, some of them are unwilling or unable to support women and their children, who ultimately suffer the consequences of the feminist assault on masculinity.

A number of years ago it was time to replace the water heater in my own home. I still remembered the old plumber's lesson from 30 years earlier, but my hands and mind lacked his skill—my movements were awkward, my methods were disordered, and the copper joints I sweated sported unsightly runs and drips of molten solder. Yet with each pipe and joint I gained skill and satisfaction. When it was done, I felt proud and a little more of a man. At last I had stood in the old plumber's shoes.

But there was no boy sitting beside me to watch, question, and learn. My sons had more interesting things to do. There were video game bosses to fight and princesses to rescue. And another game level to beat, and then another, and then just one more …

Feminism and the absolution of sin

Elijah Butler · 19 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A common criticism of feminism is that it removes female agency and promotes perpetual victimhood. Under feminism, women can do no wrong. In fact, this article was prompted by a comment made to me by a woman saying essentially, “I’m a feminist because for years I tried to own my mistakes, but now I don’t have to.” This was disturbing to say the least. But it got me thinking.

The question I’ve never heard asked is why does feminism do this? Why does feminism absolve women of their sins? Why are female rapists and abusers simply erased from existence? It is far too easy to simply blame this on feminism wanting female superiority. If feminism’s goal is female superiority, then it would be logical that feminists would attempt to weed out the imperfections in women instead of ignoring them.

The answer lies in the notion of feminism being a religion. A primary interest of religion is the problem of evil, or why do bad things happen to good people? The answer to this question can be quite personal and complex, but the simplest, most common answer is that there is a malevolent force in the universe that causes evil. This force is known in the Judeo-Christian tradition as Satan. In the feminist religious tradition, this force is known as the patriarchy. In my previous article on the feminist religion, I explained that the point of feminism is the eradication of the patriarchy. It is now that the answer to why feminism absolves women of sin becomes clear. If the patriarchy is sin personified, and the patriarchy is expressed via men and masculinity, then women cannot sin (unless they’ve somehow ingested the patriarchy themselves). This is the core of the feminist theodicy, or explanation of evil: men are bad, women are good. It is this glue that holds the entirety of feminism together. If this idea is violated, feminism disintegrates.

Let us see this via two clear examples. First, behold the Duluth model of domestic violence, best shown via this power and control wheel:

The Duluth model is based on the feminist idea that domestic violence is based on male patriarchal aggression against women. This is most clearly seen in the section where men use the male privilege that patriarchy affords them to abuse women. Under this system, female-on-male violence simply does not exist. While there is an updated wheel floating around where the victims can be female or male, the aggressor is always male because female aggression does not fit in the model by design. If female abusers were recognized, then it means that domestic violence is not simply male patriarchal aggression, so patriarchy is not the sole cause of evil. If patriarchy is not the sole cause of evil, feminism, along with the Duluth model, falls apart at the seams.

Another example is the current campus sexual assault "epidemic." Former George Washington University president Stephen Trachtenberg was criticized when he said that in order to help curb sexual assaults on campus, women should stop drinking in excess. What the criticism boiled down to was that women can drink however much they want, but it's up to men not to rape. What they are doing is absolving women of engaging in high-risk behavior that may contribute to their ability to be sexually assaulted. This whole thing gets even more disturbing when you consider that female alcoholism is on the rise, a fact that feminism would prefer to sweep under the rug as evidenced by the criticism of Trachtenberg and others. Here again, feminism has to absolve women of sin. If feminists admit women's actions can play a role in their being assaulted, then sexual assault is more complicated than just patriarchal aggression and oppression. Like with the Duluth model, patriarchal oppression has to be the root cause, otherwise the ideology driving this collapses.

In the end, feminism has to absolve women of sin in order to function. If the premise of feminism is that patriarchy is evil incarnate, then women sinning either proves that all women have ingested patriarchy, which is absurd, or that patriarchy is not the root of all evil. If patriarchy is not the sole cause of evil in the world, then feminism is wrong. In order for feminism to be "right," women must be free of sin. Therefore, as MRAs, we must push for a society where women are held accountable for their actions if we are ever going to achieve true equality.

In His Own Words: Another beautiful sociopath

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 20 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It is day 20 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month for Men and Boys 2014, the invisible victims of domestic violence. Today's In His Own Words is yet another example of the meat grinder men find themselves in when they don't have an understanding of abusive, sociopathic women.

The following is just a fraction of what "Matt's" ex has put him, their children, and his family through. She is still playing games with custody and using others to commit proxy violence against Matt. The UK family court system has enabled much of it.

> Life With the Missus
> It began at my workplace. She was younger than me and married, so we were friends and nothing more. After eight months of friendship, she announced out of the blue that she had told her ex-husband she was leaving him. She quickly added the disclaimer, "My leaving him has nothing to do with you."
> I had absolutely no idea she was having any problems with her marriage, and the way she spoke about her husband, it was as if everything was fine. I asked, "Why have you left him then?"
> She claimed she'd been sleeping on the couch for months, and that he'd had sex with three of her "friends" five years ago. She went on to say that he was a "useless father" to their two kids and that he was "lazy." At the time, I felt very sorry for her, thinking, "What kind of person could do a thing like that with her friends?"
> That was back in 2006.
> A month or so later, she moved into another property with her kids. Shortly thereafter, she invited me to a BBQ she was having and I accepted. At the BBQ, her behaviour was somewhat manic/erratic, but I put that down to the fact she'd had a couple of glasses of wine. Two of my friends who accompanied me told me the next day that "something wasn't quite right" about her.
> I shrugged off their concerns. I guess that was the beginning for me in making excuses for her behaviour. I felt so sorry for her having such a "rough ride" with her ex. The more she said about him, the bigger a monster he became in my eyes. She also claimed he'd hit her a few times.
> That night, we started a relationship and I stayed the night. By morning, my intuition told me I should not get involved, so I distanced myself from her. I didn't see her for a couple of weeks until I "bumped into" her at work. In fact, she saw me arrive at work and approached my car before I had got out of it.
> "Hi," she says. "How have you been? I haven't seen you for ages." We chatted, she seemed a lot different than she was before, and came across as much nicer. We arranged to meet up in the daytime and go for lunch. She was apparently very "into me" and made me feel like I could do no wrong.
> The relationship blossomed. By this time, I had dismissed my friends' remarks and my initial intuitive feelings. As far as I could tell, I had this gorgeous girl who was extremely nice and made me feel fantastic.
> Things got better and better. Soon she began pushing to make the relationship into something more permanent. I was helpless to resist and let her move into my home.
> She was very sociable and wanted us to go out regularly as a couple. In fact, she insisted we not go out anywhere alone, as that's how mistrust begins. To be honest, I was okay with that, as I enjoyed her company very much. At this point, I hadn't realised the true implications of her intent.
> I have a craft hobby, one that I have always done and like to spend the odd few hours, now and again, pursuing. Prior to our romance, she had never expressed any objection toward my hobby. In fact, she seemed to be enthralled by it and positively encouraged it.
> One day, she playfully said, "Attention, please." Well, we spent pretty much all of my spare time practically glued together, always wanting close contact, cuddles on the couch, watching TV, etc. I had never met anyone who had wanted such close contact on a regular basis as she.

I didn't mind and actually found it quite flattering, at first. However, it soon became clear that she wanted more and more closeness. I generally have no problems with intimacy but realised it was becoming too much. Soon the time I spent on my hobby and myself had become extremely limited. Time spent on my hobby or any time spent without her was met with derision, to the point I felt guilty about wanting to engage in any pastime that didn't include her.

She then discussed the possibility of having children. To be honest, I welcomed the idea. I'd had a family some years before, which crumbled when my first ex-wife resumed a relationship with a man she dated before me. After we divorced, I lost everyday contact with our kids, which hurt me very much. Seeing them every other weekend made me long for a family again.

So when the opportunity to have another family with this woman, whom I loved very much, presented itself, I gleefully took the offer. Shortly after, she was pregnant with our first child.

We married when she was seven months' pregnant. When our daughter was born, I was like a man possessed. I could not hide my happiness, and felt like the cat that got the cream. Here I was with a beautiful, charming, funny, attentive wife and a beautiful new baby. I was so happy, words cannot describe!

This is when another red flag reared its ugly head. I noticed that my wife was becoming jealous of our baby. One day, she said, "I can see the love in your eyes when you look at her, why don't you look at me like that?" Her words burnt into my memory. This really shocked me. I rationalised her comment by telling myself it's probably my fault, and maybe it was true, maybe I did show her too much attention and had somehow neglected my wife to some degree in the process.

Time went by, and the bond with my child grew stronger. Every day, I would think how lucky I was. I just couldn't stop smiling. I have a DSLR camera. I put it to good use taking lots of pictures of my wife and baby together, and lots of my little one as she began to make progress in her early life. Stuff I believe most normal dads would do.

Over time, the jealousy toward our infant child got worse and worse. My wife was becoming upset, and I found myself reassuring her that I loved her as much as always, but was just excited to find myself in the position of being a daddy again.

Things started to settle (or so I thought) and we had minor problems as most couples do. My wife decided that it would be wonderful to have another child. From the outset of her pregnancy, she became more irritated by little things, which I attributed to pregnancy hormones. She began a pattern of packing her things and driving our daughter to her mother's house, saying, I "don't love" her, and that she was leaving for good.

She'd return the next day, and I pulled out all the stops to show her that I loved her. Sadly, she just became more convinced that I didn't love her. I was becoming more and more stressed. She left a total of five times, returning the next day. When she left for the fifth time, she was five months' pregnant with our little boy.

As usual, she was screaming and crying, saying I don't love her over and over. As she went to leave, I decided she was going to stay. I locked the front door and removed the key. I didn't want her driving with my daughter and unborn baby in such a state of upset. She had had five car crashes of varying degrees in the past, but on this occasion her mental state was far worse. I wanted her to stay put until she calmed down.

She went for the front door again and tried to kick me in my testicles (I was standing in front of the door). I deflected her leg with mine, and my knee gently brushed over her abdomen. The argument got heated. I tried to put her on the couch in a vain attempt to get her to calm down. She pulled the telephone receiver above her head and dialed the police emergency number.

I took the phone from her hand and ended the call. She was still crying and screaming and lashing out with her arms. I restrained her arms to stop receiving blows. Around 10 minutes later, an officer from the traffic division knocked on my door, I went to the door and unlocked it to let him inside, he observed that I had to unlock the door and, obviously I suppose, guessed I had locked her in, making me look like the bad guy.

He stated he would be leaving soon and that the regular uniformed police were coming to take over. My wife was crying on the couch. The regular police officers arrived, and the traffic cop left. Two more police officers arrived, one male and one female. The female officer very quickly assumed the worse when my wife told her I had "kicked" her in the stomach.

I was arrested and taken to the police station in a police car. It was very humiliating, as my neighbours, who must have heard the noise, saw me being taken away in a police car. Before locking me up, they took a DNA swab from my mouth, photographs, and my fingerprints. This was easily the most humiliating experience of my life.

I was trying to protect my wife and the kids (one unborn) by keeping her in the house. She is an awful driver at the best of times, has a history of five accidents. She once smashed into a stationary car, claiming she "forgot to brake," so you can see why I was concerned for my kids' safety.

My wife was examined by a police doctor while I was detained in the cells. Eventually, I was herded into another room for a taped interview. I told the officers that I'd reached the end of my tether. I was frustrated, and, yes, I shouted at her as she did to me. I told the police I was desperate to keep her at home because I was worried about her driving in that state with my children in the car.

After a couple of hours, I was taken to the desk sergeant. He told me I was free to leave with a letter declaring NFA (No Further Action). They informed me that they found no marks on her body and that our unborn baby was fine. The female police officer told me she had spoken to my wife, who had described our relationship as "passionate" and that she loved me very much!

She later said her "hormones were to blame" for her behaviour. That was in December 2008.

Time passed and things were generally better, but she still accused me of varying different crimes, like having affairs at work. She would always ask who I was working with, are there any new girls on shift, and what are they like, etc. She would phone during night shifts at the hospital where I work, usually around 2 a.m. My colleagues asked why she called in the early hours of the morning. I can only assume it was because she wanted to see if I was actually at work, and not at some woman's house having illicit relations!

Our son was born in April 2009. It was a very difficult time. My wife had started arguing again, accusing me of having affairs, saying I didn't love her, and that she was leaving. By this time, I was worn down. These accusations occurred on a regular basis, and no amount of logic or reassurance worked.

On the morning the Health Visitor was coming to check on our son, I was getting more and more upset, as my wife was preparing to leave me yet again. By the time the HV arrived, I was in a terrible state, shaking, frightened, and confused. My wife was calm and, to all intents and purposes, appeared okay. The HV lady quickly picked up on my emotional state and thought that I was mentally imbalanced.

In fact, she was correct. I had suffered months upon months of incessant emotional abuse and was close to a breaking point as my wife was about to leave again, taking our children with her. The HV asked if I was okay. I didn't want her to know that my wife was leaving. I replied that I was depressed. I was pacing around a lot, as I always do when I'm upset.

The HV asked me to sit down, and I started crying. My son started crying in the HV's arms. She asked me if I would like to hold him, but I was in no fit state to comfort him so had to refuse. She asked, "Does his crying make you angry?" I said everything was upsetting me, meaning my whole home situation. The HV later told my wife that she was "worried" about my being around him.

I felt so much shame that my wife was yet again leaving me that I couldn't discuss the reasons why I was so upset. I said I felt depressed and the HV referred me to book an appointment with my GP.

I have no idea whether that HV told my wife that she had concerns over me being with the baby or not.

Whether it was true or not, my wife repeated it over and over to make me feel bad, as she really seems to love hurting me in any way she can. To this day, my now ex-wife maintains that I told the HV I don't like our son. I never uttered those words, and have since heard she has told anyone who will listen the same thing.

Adding to my stress and depression, our household bills were being paid but not the mortgage. It was two months in arrears. My wife had a habit of buying and consuming four litres of Coke per day. She'd had this habit since we first met. I tried in vain to wean her off of it. The convenience store across the street was her preferred purchasing point for the Coke, being expensive at £1.50 per bottle. That's £84 per month on Coke alone, plus her 40-cigarette-per-day habit, equating to (most days) £8/day= £150-£200 per month (some days she smoked 20, most days she smoked 40).

Incidentally, she smoked all the way through both pregnancies, even though she assured me she would quit before the second pregnancy (she didn't). Our daughter has severe asthma and needs medication to keep her well now. My now-ex also has asthma, poorly controlled. She won't use her inhalers regularly, particularly the steroid based inhaler, which is designed to stave off further attacks if used daily. Despite doctor's advice, she wouldn't use it, as she was fearful the steroid content would make her "fat." It would be impossible in such small doses, but she knew better.

One day I found a packet of Prozac. One of its possible side effects is weight loss. She had either lied or coerced her GP to prescribe it. She was hardly eating and taking swigs from a bottle of "Effico" tonic to lose weight. She was a size 6, at just over five feet tall, that is skinny, but insisted she was fat. She probably asked me 30 times a day if she looked fat (no kidding). If we were ever going out for an evening, she would try on at least eight to 10 different outfits (dresses). She would ask me, and anyone else who might be present, if she looked fat, over and over.

My wife had many, many dresses. She would come home most days with new outfits, saying she bought them from charity shops. In reality, they were NEW dresses, so no wonder the mortgage was falling behind. At the beginning of our relationship, one of her friends remarked that my ex was "high maintenance." I thought she was just kidding, but that's exactly how she is.

When our son was six weeks old, she finally moved out for good. My father had just passed away from cancer. She and I had been looking after him for some time. He and my mother divorced 20 years before, and he purchased a mobile home/trailer. My wife started a friendship with my father that had dark dynamics.

She had worked on my father, playing the victim and generally taking him in. She pretty much destroyed my relationship with him. He even gave his collection of expensive shotguns to her ex-husband before me. I know, it's all very, very weird. When he died, he left his home to her. He made a will, essentially leaving 5K to each of his grandchildren upon the sale of his home.

He specifically asked my ex not to sell the home back to the site owner, as he knew he would only offer around 5-6K maximum (the home was worth 18-20K on the market). She sold it about a month after his death to the site owner, for a mere 5K. The grandchildren lost out, and she wasted the money in a few weeks.

By this time, my ex had rented a property in a village about eight miles from me. I was still living in my home, working long hours, and negotiating with the mortgage company to clear up the arrears. One day she brought the children to the hospital restaurant to meet me for breakfast.

All seemed well and she was in a good mood for a change. I went home to bed. I woke around 4 p.m. and sent a text asking how the kids were. She replied, "Leave me and my children alone." I texted her back; no reply. I tried calling her, she wouldn't pick up, so I decided that I must go there as I had no idea why I had received that text and needed to know.

When I arrived, she wasn't home. So I sat in the garden with a drink to wait. She arrived 15 minutes later and saw me in the garden. She opened the door and shouted very loudly, "Fuck off!! What the fuck are you doing here!!!!" She slammed the door and locked it. I didn't say a word and just continued to sit there.

Ten minutes later, she opened the door and yelled, "I thought I told you to fuck off, now fuck off and leave us alone!!" She went back inside, leaving the door open. I gingerly went in behind her, saying, "I can see you're angry, but honestly I have no idea why you sent me that text. Please just tell me and I'll go." She said, "It was your son's eye appointment today. He could be blind and you couldn't be bothered to come along, now fuck off and leave us alone!!!"

My daughter was in another room. She caught sight of me and ran toward me, saying, "Daddy!" with a big smile across her face. My ex literally pulled our daughter by one arm into the air and caught her. "He's not your daddy! I'm going to find you a proper daddy, now FUCK OFF! You are no better than a piece of shit on my shoes, die, die, DIE!!!!!!" Our baby boy looked terrified at his mother's outburst.

I went to comfort him. When she realised what I was about to do, she pulled him out of his walker by one arm, flung him into the air, and caught him in her other arm. I was astounded, confused, and utterly speechless by this uncontrolled demonstration of staggering venom. Our children were frightened and I was powerless to help, as I knew anything I did would make her worse.

Moments later, her phone rang. It was a friend. Her demeanour and tone instantly changed from vile, loud, violent abusive fisherman's wife into 1000% victim. In a crocodile-tear voice she says, "Can you please come around? Matt is here and I don't want him here. He's frightening the children."

Maybe I should have left at this point, but I know my ex too well. I knew she would twist things around and blame me for her actions. I thought leaving would make me look guilty, so I went into another room and waited. Her friend and her friend's boyfriend arrived minutes later. Ex is now in full victim mode and doing it very well.

Her friend's boyfriend (a part-time "special" constable) said I had to leave. I calmly explained I was there to find out why I got the text that afternoon and to sort things out. I said I had no intention of leaving, as my children had been abused. Next thing I know, he swiftly put my arm up my back, as police officers do, and I'm unable to move. His girlfriend called the proper police, obviously believing I'm the aggressor.

The police soon arrived. They could see I was a concerned father, wanting to get to the bottom of the horrible text message I received. Yet, they believed her and told me to leave. The next day, she texted saying the police installed alarms within the property and that I must keep away!

One week or so later, my mother was due to collect the children for an access visit with me. I had no intention of going to my ex's after the police visit. I asked my mother to tell her that I'd had all I could take and I wanted a divorce. After hearing that I wanted a divorce, my ex cried to her mother (who was also there), saying, "But I love him!!!"

The next week, I received a text asking me if I would meet her at my dead father's now-empty mobile home. She claimed she wanted to talk about kid access arrangements and that she had something she needed to tell me face to face. I agreed and went to meet her.

When she arrived, I asked what she wanted to discuss. She never once mentioned the children. Instead, she told me she was "seeing someone." I replied, "Okay, good for you. Now, have you anything to say about child access?" She persisted, "A [ex-husband] is fuming as D is his best friend [new boyfriend]." She even smirked as she was saying it.

I said nothing. As I was about to leave, she pulled a brand-new expensive phone from her bag, not to use, but to show it off to me. "That's nice," I said. "Yeah, it's a present." "Nice," I said and turned to leave. Then she said, "You scare me, Matt. I'm taking out an injunction [non-molestation order] against you." Thinking she was trying to be funny, I laughed and said, "It's me that needs protection from you!" I'd heard enough and left, not paying any attention to her comments, as there were no grounds or, indeed, evidence.

Four days later, I was at home when someone began banging very loudly on my front door. I looked down from an upstairs window and saw a huge bodybuilder-type guy pounding on my door. He saw me too.

"I can fucking see you up there with a white shirt on, come down and open the fucking door." Of course, I had > no idea who this guy was and stayed put. He put something through my letterbox and left. To my shock and surprise, it was an affidavit with pages and pages of alleged domestic violence, carried out by me! It was painful to read. No wonder the guy delivering was so aggressive. My ex had made me look like Attila the Hun!

> It was surreal. Here I was reading about scores and scores of alleged abuse, when, in fact, she was the abuser. I was in shock. If I was such a dangerous and violent abuser, then why meet me in an isolated place (my dead father's mobile home) to tell me she has a new boyfriend???? Huh? Am I missing something???
> Her defence to that was, "I had 999 ready to dial on my phone, so if you attacked me, I could call the police." Crazy, just totally and all-consumingly nuts. I went though months of hell for that, not seeing my children, and being subjected to further abuse from her, using Facebook.
> She coerced friends of mine to come over to her house one Saturday for a BBQ. She then got a friend to photograph her with my friends and her new boyfriend, cuddling him and looking so happy-happy. She published these photos on Facebook, along with more abusive pictures over the following weeks. Pictures of her new boyfriend holding our son in his arms with a feeding bottle, him standing over my son as he takes his first crawl, and other photos designed to hurt as much as possible.
> By this time, I had a lawyer to get access back to my children. I printed the Facebook filth to show her. She said it looked like my ex was trying to get me to break the terms of the injunction, but, of course, I could already see that. I didn't take the bait and stayed out of her way, no texts, nothing, no contact whatsoever. Just one text or email and I could've been arrested.

In His Own Words is a joint effort between Shrink4Men and AVoiceForMen to help raise awareness about the invisible victims of domestic violence, men. If you would like to submit your story, please follow the guidelines at the end of this article.

White House–mandated campus climate surveys likely to ignore male victims

Tamen Roe · 20 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Recently someone on my feed retweeted a reference to a study by Jennifer Freyd on sexual violence at the University of Oregon. I decided to spend some time looking into it, and what I found deeply disturbed me.

I'll start from the beginning.

In one of the presentations of the study, authors Jennifer J. Freyd, Marina N. Rosenthal, and Carly Parnitzke Smith say this about their survey:

> - [The study is] designed to assess student experiences of sexual assault and harassment victimization, perpetration, and institutional behaviors, as well as student attitudes, educational engagement, and well-being.
> - The project is similar to other studies we have completed in our laboratory and overlaps with the survey recently recommended by the White House.

Now that's interesting. I wasn't aware that there had been any concrete recommendations from the White House on sexual violence surveys.

When I try to find the survey recommended by the White House, I come across this paragraph in the White House Task Force to Protect Students From Sexual Assault recommendations published in April 2014:

> ### 1. Identifying the Problem: Campus Climate Surveys
> The first step in solving a problem is to name it and know the extent of it – and a campus climate survey is the best way to do that. We are providing schools with a toolkit to conduct a survey – and we urge schools to show they're serious about the problem by conducting the survey next year. The Justice Department, too, will partner with Rutgers University's Center on Violence Against Women and Children to pilot, evaluate and further refine the survey – and at the end of this trial period, we will explore legislative or administrative options to require schools to conduct a survey in 2016.

It seems like Jennifer Freyd et al. are referring to the campus climate survey being developed by the Justice Department and Rutgers University and that Freyd and her colleagues are stating that their survey overlaps that one.

The study by Freyd et al. found a pretty high prevalence of female rape and a very low prevalence of male rape (0.0 – 0.8%). A likely reason for the low number of male rape victims becomes clear when we look at the methodology used:

> Measures Used > Existing Scales:
> - Sexual Experiences Survey: Modified for gender neutral language and additionally modified for use as a measure of sexual assault perpetration. Koss, M. P., Abbey, A., Campbell, R., Cook, S., Norris, J., Testa, M., … White, J. (2007). Revising the SES: A Collaborative Process to Improve Assessment of Sexual Aggression and Victimization. Psychology of Women Quarterly, 31(4), 357–370. doi:10.1111/j.1471-6402.2007.00385.x

Do not be fooled by the "Modified for gender neutral language" assertion. This revised SES is still adhering to Mary

P. Koss's belief that it's inappropriate to consider as a rape victim a man who engages in unwanted sexual intercourse with a woman. The link I've provided to the methodology Freyd used includes all the questions asked in the survey. Students were asked whether they had someone penetrate their vagina or anus without their consent, and they were asked whether they had received or been made to give oral sex without their consent.

There are no questions that would capture a victim made to penetrate their perpetrator's vagina or anus without the victim's consent.

So rape is still not rape–and in this case it's not even sexual assault (see the two slides on page 12 in this presentation).

I am beginning to get a bad feeling about this.

My Bad Feeling Is Confirmed

One could argue that even though this survey completely ignored a subset of male rape victims, it was just one survey done at one university. The White House Task Force is aiming at making campus climate surveys mandatory for all colleges and universities during 2016. So this isn't just about one college. Surely the other colleges and universities will not exclude male victims from their surveys?

The White House Task Force recommendation report "Not Alone" provides a link (page 8) to a toolkit for schools to develop and conduct these climate surveys. That toolkit recommends using the Sexual Experiences Survey (SES) instrument developed by Mary P. Koss et al. on page 17:

> In peer-reviewed research, the most widely used and most researched tool is Koss' Sexual Experiences Survey. It can be used to measure victimization and perpetration. It includes questions across the spectrum of sexual violence.

That description is telling and it is disturbing. What does the assertion that SES includes questions across the spectrum of sexual violence imply? The answer is that anything it doesn't ask about is not on the spectrum of sexual violence. Hence, being made to penetrate someone's vagina or anus is not even considered sexual violence, according to the SES.

A Hope Quickly Squashed

The White House Task Force does, however, go on to deliver a small hope since they in the next bullet point on page 17 also mention the NISVS methodology:

> The 2010 CDC National Intimate Partner and Sexual Violence Survey used similar behaviorally specific questions that were developed in consultation with a panel of experts. This measure is similar to Koss' and very comprehensive. It was developed to be administered in an interview format.

Even though the CDC's National Intimate Partner and Sexual Violence Surveys (NISVS) did erase male victims of being made to penetrate from the rape statistics, they at least didn't erase them completely like an SES-based survey would.

However, when I read farther along in the toolkit document, I notice that Chapter 2 includes "promising practice examples for a campus climate survey." The introduction to that chapter states:

> The questions below are examples that represent the best available promising practices in climate surveys. […] Some of the sample climate questions have not been validated, and this survey as a whole has not been validated. The Department of Justice is currently working toward validating the survey as a whole to produce an evidence-based survey.

The following is what the Department of Justice is currently working toward validating as a mandatory campus climate survey (page 23):

> This section asks about nonconsensual or unwanted sexual contact you may have experienced. When you are asked about whether something happened since [TIMEFRAME], please think about what has happened since [TIMEFRAME]. The person with whom you had the unwanted sexual contact could have been a stranger or someone you know, such as a family member or someone you were dating or going out with. These questions ask about five types of unwanted sexual contact:
> a. forced touching of a sexual nature (forced kissing, touching of private parts, grabbing, fondling, rubbing up against you in a sexual way, even if it is over your clothes)
> b. oral sex (someone's mouth or tongue making contact with your genitals or your mouth or tongue making contact with someone else's genitals)
> c. sexual intercourse (someone's penis being put in your vagina)
> d. anal sex (someone's penis being put in your anus)
> e. sexual penetration with a finger or object (someone putting their finger or an object like a bottle or a candle in your vagina or anus)

Note how they define sexual intercourse above. Apparently men can't have sexual intercourse. That is ridiculous, but it is a good example of the contortion needed to not include all types of male victims. They have taken this list more or less straight from the SES, and the faint hope I had in this being done properly when they mentioned the NISVS is promptly squashed.

Last Ray of Hope?

Rutger University is officially piloting the campus climate survey, and I hope they will implement the due diligence to ensure that male victims of sexual violence aren't erased by the choice of survey instruments. The results they've released so far from this process are inconclusive in regards to what instruments they will use and whether the survey will exclude any male victims. The name of the center at Rutgers University that will lead the survey efforts on campus does not do much to assuage me: Center on Violence Against Women and Children (VAWC).

It would be a huge step backwards for the issue of male rape if surveys being done nationwide on all campuses end up erasing many male victims.

I guess my last ray of real hope is you.

That you'll help spread the call that the campus climate surveys shouldn't use the SES methodology but rather use instruments that will include all victims of sexual violence. That you, by passing this call forward through your network and asking them to pass it on, will succeed in making the call being heard and heeded by the White House Task Force, Department of Justice, and Rutgers University Center on Violence Against Women and Children.

Thank you.

J4MB submits a 118-page report to a Home Office consultation on strengthening the law on domestic abuse

Mike Buchanan · 20 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Although the British government is a Conservative-led coalition, and Theresa May, Home Secretary, a Conservative politician, the Home Office is no less feminist-driven than those in preceding Labour administrations with respect to its approaches to domestic abuse. With only seven months before the general election, the Home Office is engaged in a highly flawed consultation process on "strengthening" the law on domestic abuse. If the legislation is ever introduced, the vast majority of those adversely affected will be men, we can be very sure, because the state's approach to domestic abuse is based upon the utterly discredited "male coercion theory" of domestic abuse—the "Duluth model."

We recently publicly challenged Theresa May to suspend the consultation, and to hold a public inquiry instead, as reported on AVfM here. While we wait for her response, we decided to make a submission to the inquiry.

J4MB has some remarkable supporters. One of them recently completed a lengthy report on the institutional anti-male bias of public bodies, mostly in relation to the state's approach to domestic violence. He generously agreed to J4MB using the document as the basis for our submission to the Home Office inquiry, and a second supporter and myself spent long hours working on the document. The final report is 118 pages long, and it's here.

On behalf of J4MB, I wrote a foreword for the report, which should give a flavour of its contents. It takes up the remainder of this article:

> The continuing failure of public bodies to recognize the suffering of male victims of partner violence, and their failure to support these men at times of crisis, are long-standing scandals.
> One of the most solidly established facts in the social sciences is that the incidence and severity of domestic violence inflicted on men is comparable to that inflicted on women. This is not a recent finding. Researchers have known it for 40 years. Yet the narrative to which the public is exposed paints a very different picture, one in which domestic violence overwhelmingly involves female victims and male perpetrators. These contrasting perspectives are examined at length in this report.
> The Home Office recently published a highly flawed consultation document on strengthening the law on domestic abuse, drafted with the input of Women's Aid, and associated it with an equally flawed consultation process.[i] In a letter to Theresa May, Home Secretary, we explained why the consultation is a charade—an exercise in manipulation, with one direction of travel. We fear the legislation will be used, in practice, to advantage women over their male partners in a situation fraught with difficulty, as a result of ignoring the overwhelmingly large body of evidence that shows beyond any doubt that domestic violence and domestic abuse are broadly reciprocal. We publicly challenged Mrs May to hold a public inquiry into strengthening the law on domestic abuse,[ii] and we await her response.
> Our letter included a link[iii] to our public challenge of Polly Neate, Chief Executive of Women's Aid, over her organisation's lies and misleading statements about domestic violence, which she declined to retract. The influence of this ideologically-driven organisation (and possibly other similar organisations) on the Home Office consultation document and its associated exercise is nothing less than an assault on democracy, as well as already abused men.
> In our view, it is an egregious failure of the Home Office not to have invited a wide range of researchers to contribute to the consultation exercise, given that it is known that the feminist 'male coercion theory' of domestic violence (also known as the 'Duluth Model') is flatly contradicted by a substantial body of evidence, most recently by a study at the University of Cumbria.[iv]
> Martin Fiebert has been a psychology professor at California State University since 1978. In 2013 he published

References examining assaults by women on their spouses or male partners: an updated annotated bibliography.[v] The full Abstract:

'This annotated bibliography describes 343 scholarly investigations (270 empirical studies and 73 reviews) demonstrating that women are as physically aggressive as men (or more) in their relationships with their spouses or opposite-sex partners. The aggregate sample size in the reviewed studies exceeds 440,850 people.' [Our emphasis]

Appendix B of this document outlines details of some of the studies covered by the Fiebert review.

In 2013 the journal Partner Abuse published an account of the 'Partner Abuse State of Knowledge Project' (PASK),[vi, vii] the most comprehensive review of domestic violence research literature ever conducted. 42 scholars at 20 universities and research centres conducted this unparalleled three-year research project. John Hamel, PASK Director, said:

'The purpose of this project is to bring together, in a rigorously evidence-based, transparent and methodical manner, existing knowledge about partner abuse, with reliable, up-to-date research that can easily be accessed by anyone. PASK is grounded in the premise that everyone is entitled to their opinion, but not to their own facts; that these facts should be available to everyone, and that domestic violence intervention and policy ought to be based upon these facts rather than ideology and special interests'. [Our emphasis]

The headline finding of the review was that:

'Women perpetrate physical and emotional abuse, as well as engage in controlling behaviours, at comparable rates to men'.

This report is part of our submission to the consultation process, along with the aforementioned letter to Theresa May. It outlines irrefutable evidence about the level of partner violence suffered by men and women, and details the anti-male bias of public bodies and key politicians, most notably:

Home Office

Crown Prosecution Service

Theresa May, Home Secretary

Yvette Cooper, Shadow Home Secretary

Crown Prosecution Service

Ministry of Justice

Equalities & Human Rights Commission

Probation Service

The police

The judiciary

State schools

The institutional anti-male bias of public bodies results in virtually no recognition of the suffering of male victims of partner violence, and leads to a corresponding lack of concern or support for them.

94% of British men who are being abused by partners are being abused by female partners. On behalf of these men, we present this body of evidence to the Home Secretary, and ask her for a meeting at the earliest opportunity. In the meantime, we'll be posting a link to this document on our party's website.[viii]

Call to action: 3 weeks to end 40 years of tyranny

Brian Danielson · 20 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Your help is needed!

My name is Brian Danielson. I am the Founder and President of Integrity4Maine, a governmental watchdog organization focusing on restoring integrity and the Constitution to the State of Maine.

Maine is ranked the 5th most corrupt state in America. Unconstitutional conduct by prosecutors who violate their oath of office and due process rights of defendants plague this once beautiful and peaceful state. For those who have been following the news in Maine, last year, Assistant District Attorney Mary Kellett became the first ever prosecutor in the history of Maine to be sanctioned by the Maine Supreme Court for violating 7 Bar rules for her prosecution of Vladek Filler.

My own investigation of some 100 cases handled by Mary Kellett showed various degrees of prosecutorial misconduct. Just a year prior to Mary Kellett's sanctioning, I was in touch with two separate victims who had stepped forward and wanted to file Bar complaints against Kellett. But fearing more retaliation, they backed down and left the state.

I have been contacted by numerous victims and their families who have had their lives destroyed by Mary Kellett's District Attorney's Office. One male victim who has been wrongfully convicted by her office was raped in prison while going through the appeal. Another man while under medication for severe depression called his estranged wife just to talk but was promptly arrested for violating a no-contact order. He suffered a mental breakdown in the courtroom, but instead of the man being taken to a hospital, Kellett and another ADA, William Entwisle, piled so many additional charges on him that he hung himself the first night in his jail cell.

I have been working with two men who were accused of sexual misconduct by accusers who had questionable personal motives. Both men are now in prison being convicted without credible evidence, witnesses, due process rights, and even for physically impossible claims. One of these men, like numerous others, will likely die in prison.

The main prosecutors in Kellett's DA office are William Entwisle, Mary Kellett, Paul Cavanaugh, and Carletta Bassano. They all started out being prosecutors after being hired and trained by the former District Attorney, Michael Povich. Povich retired in 2010 after 35 years in office, but in 2012 he was also cited by the Bar Panel for personally approving Kellett's misconduct against Vladek Filler.

What should also be noted in the Final Judgment against Kellett are examples of local police and sheriff departments' complicity in withholding, destroying, and even manufacturing evidence to help Kellett's prosecution of Filler. This is not a case of just one bad apple in Maine, it is an example of a rotten apple orchard that, in the case of this DA Office, has abused countless people in the Hancock and Washington Counties for the past 40 years.

Today, Assistant District Attorney William Entwisle, a proud board member of a local VAWA women's group while being a prosecutor alongside Mary Kellett and District Attorney Carletta Bassano for the past 11 years, is running for DA on the platform of "continuing the work that the District Attorney's Office has been doing."

Integrity4Maine wants to see the "work" this District Attorney's Office has engaged in with impunity end on November 4, 2014 (election day).

On May 31, 2014, Integrity4Maine hosted an historic State Accountability Rally on the courthouse steps in Ellsworth. This was the first such protest against a District Attorney's Office in Maine and one of the largest protests to ever take place in the area. Former State Legislator and Prison Chaplain Stan Moody, Congressional Candidate Blaine Richardson, KSUM Founder Sage Gerard, Daddy Justice's Ben Vonderheide, whistleblower Vladek Filler, and numerous victims of that DA Office attended and gave compelling speeches calling for change. It was a real honor for me to stand together with these amazing individuals.

http://youtu.be/Qw24vH33gTI?list=UUl31wRxmqFaDWLfbouUSEkA

The rally took months to organize at great financial expense to Integrity4Maine, with donations from A Voice for Men and the National Coalition For Men. The results were well worth it and attracted the attention and support of numerous voters, politicians, and law enforcement officers.

Ten days after the rally, ADA Paul Cavanaugh lost the primary to Matthew Foster (a local attorney seeking reform of the morally corrupt 7th District Attorney's Office). Following the primaries, Matt Foster has been ignored by the local press and according to sources subjected to attacks and threats from Kellett supporters, who want prosecutorial misconduct against men and families to continue. According to Matthew Foster's Facebook page, he addressed the following to his supporters:

"I want to send a special thanks to those of my supporters who have been publicly active in their support of me and my campaign. Their resolution to continue to support me even in the face of threats and ostracization by and from the current regime is heartwarming. I will certainly remember this when I am elected and make sure that those who feel the need to act like bullies, won't be doing it under my watch. Such conduct is reprehensible, and cannot be tolerated. This is another important reason that we need change and why we should never let any one group control any government entity for 40 plus years. Please help me clean up the corruption and incompetence that exists in the current administration by voting FOSTER for District Attorney on November 4! Thank you!"

On September 15, 2014, I filed a 41-page Bar complaint against the Hancock County District Attorney's Office for continuing the same prosecutorial abuse that Mary Kellett was sanctioned for. Cited in the complaint are three recent cases and court orders where ADA William Entwisle and his office violated defendants' civil rights by not providing their attorneys key discovery. Based on the compelling evidence submitted, it took just three days for Bar Counsel J. Scott Davis to respond by opening an investigation against both District Attorney Carletta Bassano and Assistant District Attorney William Entwisle.

Despite Integrity4Maine's extensive efforts, the local press has refused to report anything about the continued prosecutorial misconduct coming from Entwisle and his office. I have personally emailed, tweeted, made phone calls, and left voice messages for numerous journalists and editors in the area and to date have not received a single response.

On October 6, I attended the 1st debate between the DA candidates, Matt Foster and William Entwisle. During the Q&A, I was not allowed to ask Entwisle my question about the current Bar's investigation into his misconduct. I handed a copy of the Bar complaint with recent Court Orders sanctioning Entwisle to The Ellsworth American reporter sitting next to me. When the article came out, nothing about the scandal was mentioned. Instead, William Entwisle was shamelessly promoted as the "current assistant district attorney with 11 years experience."

It seems the local reporters refuse to report the truth and are continuing the local tradition of selling out the community.

The countless victims of this morally bankrupt DA Office deserve more from the media and political establishment than cover-ups and enabling of civil rights abuse.

I need YOUR help to make a difference in this crucial November 4th election.

Your help is needed!

There are two important public debates scheduled to take place, one in Ellsworth, Maine, on October 20, and the second in Machias, Maine, on October 21.

The local media has refused to cover the true extent of the scandal involving William Entwisle, Mary Kellett, and their DA office. Integrity4Maine seeks to take vital grassroots actions for the next 3 weeks to finally hold this District Attorney's Office accountable before the public.

Actions are to include public protests and mass distribution of literature and copies of the Bar complaint. I am unable to be specific about the exact type of actions that are planned; however, Intergrity4Maine's track record of activism and results should hopefully speak for itself.

The 3-week campaign needs your help in raising the needed funds.

Together we can make this happen.

Please lend your support and donate as little or as much as you can to help end the suffering of countless innocent men and whole families who have been destroyed by this corrupt DA Office.

Integrity4Maine has set up a DONATIONS PAGE on the top-right corner of Integrity4Maine.com.

Thank you in advance for helping us fight.

In His Own Words: Quiet lives of desperation

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 21 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 21 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month 2014 for Men and Boys, the invisible victims of domestic violence. Today's In His Own Words is yet another all too common tale.

For many male abuse victims, it is both painful and humiliating to admit they are, in fact, being abused. Men are supposed to be "strong." Therefore, acknowledging the abuse is akin, wrongly, to being "weak."

It's often easier for men to acknowledge physical abuse as abuse. A plate flying at your head or a kick in the nuts are obvious assaults. Emotional abuse, particularly covert emotional abuse, is much more insidious and difficult to identify — especially if you've been told and believe that men cannot be abused by women.

"SWM2010″ was married to his abuser for 15 years. After two kids and a nervous breakdown, he finally found the courage to leave his emotionally abusive wife.

> Quiet Lives of Desperation
> I originally wrote this in 2009 on another website that didn't appreciate my gallows humor, so I stopped going there when I found Shrink4Men. I am 4 years past my divorce and happy. Recalling my life with Crazy and how far I allowed myself to sink has set me back emotionally. It now makes me sick that I once lived this way.
> I lived with a borderline personality disordered spouse for 15 years. When we first got together in 1992, she was fun, the straw that stirred the drink. She was a professional when we met making 60k a year, I had a high school diploma. She saw my potential, the potential my parents never nurtured and got me through college.
> She essentially did a hard sell job on what an ideal partner she'd be for me, so I asked her to marry me. During our engagement, I saw what should have been the first sign of things to come. I attributed her pre-wedding anger/frustration to the stress of planning the event. I was wrong. After the wedding, her behavior became worse, not better.
> On the second day of our marriage, she actually said, "I feel like you think you made a mistake and are looking for a way out." Great way to start a marriage. Now I know that this was a sign that she had abandonment issues. Her pathology began to emerge more and more as I finished my college degree.
> I wanted to be a social worker. Needless to say, my career choice was perceived as a threat. I started keeping things to myself regarding my career, like volunteering at an agency for a year that I would later work for. I simply interviewed, came home and told her that it was what I was doing. She did not support this, even though it put me on the path to make as much money as she did and gave us better benefits. She resented that I chose my career, as her father had chosen her academic major. If she'd followed her interests, he would not have helped her financially. He's a prick, but that's a story for another day.
> "Arguments" (at least that's what she called them) would come out of nowhere. I quickly became a non-participant in her rants because they made no sense and left me completely bewildered. It would usually end with me apologizing just to get her to shut her mouth and give me a moment's peace. I would hug her and tell her I would change.
> I became so conditioned to expect a rage rant every time I came home, that I soon began to dread coming home. I developed physical symptoms from the non-stop stress. I felt a physical sensation in my head. I didn't feel right, it was a block. It went on like this for 15 years.
> Her rages would come and go. Oftentimes, they weren't about anything in particular. Or, she would rage about money, money that she complained we never had, but still found ways to spend. We refinanced two or three times, took out two consolidated loans for credit card debt and she borrowed against her 401k at least that many times. She'd had financial problems during her college days, too. Back then, her parents bailed her out. After we married, it was my turn to do the same.

We had our son in 1996, and our daughter 16 months later. She insisted on becoming pregnant with our son while I was still in school. School was my time, once it ended she let me know it was “her time” again.

Our daughter had a bad case of colic and my ex took it personally. She would say our infant daughter “hated” her because she was colicky. I was up with our daughter just about every night for almost a year trying to comfort her. I was exhausted. One night after coming to bed at approximately 5am after two hours of our baby daughter crying, our son jumped into our bed and woke us up.

I groggily said, “What am I, in hell?” BAM! She hit me in front of our son who didn’t say anything because he was too young to say anything. I didn’t say anything either. I laid back down and pretended to sleep. I spent the rest of the day pretending like it never happened.

At least three or four times a year she would ask, out of the blue, if I was leaving her. I could feel the blood literally leave my body when she asked this. In my mind, I shouted, “Yes!” but I was so afraid of her reaction that I would blow sunshine up her ass and tell her she was the “one” and I knew it the first day we met. I know I wasn’t being sincere and I own that.

I was accused of having numerous affairs over the years. If I got home 5 minutes late, I was banging my boss or this woman or that woman. Any time I had to work late, whenever possible, I’d call home using an alternate phone that would show up on the caller ID, such as a police station or hospital, just so she’d know I was working. It got to the point to where my focus became returning home on time instead of doing a thorough investigation.

Looking back, I see how she manipulated me into staying with her by making me dependent on her and her approval. She maintained had the upper hand. She paid the bills and never let me see the books. She took out credit cards without my knowledge. We weren’t able to save for anything while I was with her. Delayed gratification was not in her vocabulary.

She would actually get pissed off when I suggested saving for a trip or a piece of furniture. “No worries,” she’d say, “I will work extra to pay that bill.” She would work extra, but that became “found money” and it never went where it should have gone.

She claimed that she never lied to me ever, but she did. Lies by omission are still lies. I did lie to her. I lied in order to survive living with her. I put my happiness aside in order to keep her happy. I let her think I concurred with all of her opinions. What a stupid co-dependent I was! She will tell you that this was one of the reasons that we got along so well, we never fought. To an extent that was true. I didn’t fight with her because I didn’t want to deal with her borderline rage. I surrendered my sense of self to keep the peace, but it quickly took its toll on me.

In 2000, she told me I needed to go to therapy because I seemed depressed. She was right, I was depressed. The “block” or detachment I employed as a defense was still in effect. I did this to numb myself as I decided it was safer not to feel anything. I tried to keep our kids on the “safe” side of the fence with me, but that proved to be too difficult and I detached from them as well (I was able to work through this eventually).

I was diagnosed with mild depression and prescribed Prozac. I told her the medication worked; it didn’t. It didn’t work because my depression was not the problem. It was a symptom of the problem — us. At that point in our marriage, I was defeated. I was too weak to confront the issue. She had taken the fight out of me and continued to slowly erode my self-esteem.

Six months into our marriage, I was taking a nap. I was on winter break from college and she was working. Typically, she would call me two to three times a day, which I now know was about her abandonment and control issues. She was checking up on me even then. She called, heard the grogginess in my voice and literally ripped me a new asshole. “How dare you take a nap while I’m here hard at work?! You are such an insensitive, selfish prick!” I apologized, again, just to shut her up.

When our son was 3 months old, she had a 60-mile commute home and a bad snowstorm was on its way. I told her not to take the risk and to either spend the night at a hotel or at a friend’s house. She refused to do either of these things. She became angry and let me know she was not going to be told what to do.

She drove home in our Honda Civic, calling me every 30 minutes or so, terrified by the hazardous road conditions. With each call, I became a little more amped up. I practiced the speech I was going to give her when she, hopefully, made it home. Over the years, I had countless arguments with her in my mind where I would win.

I thought I had a good case that time. We had a 3-month old son and she put her life at risk. She was being completely irresponsible. She finally arrived, opened the door and I couldn't get the words out. I experienced the blood leaving my body (like an all over pins and needles sensation) and felt sick to my stomach.

She went on a tirade that still gives me flashbacks to this day every time it snows. She blamed me for her decision to drive home in a blizzard. It was my fault again, naturally. She derided me, my job and my salary. It was my fault I didn't earn more money, so we could have a SUV. If we had a SUV, she wouldn't have needed to put her life in danger. Given how screwed up I was at the time, this made sense. Now I just feel emasculated whenever I think about it.

Things that should have been non-issues, were issues — even something as mundane as grocery shopping. I eventually stopped grocery shopping. According to her, I always screwed it up. If I forgot something? "What is the matter with you?!" If I couldn't find something? "You didn't look hard enough!" She would often come home from shopping trips without everything on the list, but did I give it back to her? No. I wanted to — I fantasized about handing all of her shit right back to her, but I couldn't do it.

I have helped countless numbers of children of abusive and neglectful parents. I can write the most compelling affidavits with evidence that clearly indicates that children are unsafe, which are then signed by Judges. But I can't make a god damned decision in the fucking grocery store. Want to know what finally killed it?

In February 2009, she made a grocery list and I lost the list. I went into a panic and left a pre-emptive voice mail and text message. "I'm sorry, honey. I lost the list." I was 39-years old and sweated losing a fucking shopping list. After almost 15 years with her, I knew what was coming my way and she did it again. She ripped me a new one for losing the list. She left me crying and humiliated with even less self-esteem and self-worth!

The never-ending list of gaslighting and nonsensical arguments are too long to list. These are just a few examples of what being married to her was like. We had the typical domestic violence cycle of peace, tension and explosion. I could always feel it coming.

She never supported my career. At one point, I had about 10 interviews for a promotion. I tanked the first few and did she support me or offer me encouragement? No, I got, "You'll never get promoted! Why don't you quit your stupid job and get your Masters?! What, are you going to be a child abuse investigator when you're 50?"

What I wanted to say to her but didn't is, "Yeah, maybe I will. I love what I do. I've saved lives and I know it. How dare you take that away from me? I have been in places that you wouldn't have the guts to even drive by in the safety of your car. Drug dealers, gang bangers, baby rapists, psycho nut jobs, drug addicts, hookers an junkies." I had anxiety attacks right before every interview because I knew I'd get more of her shit if I didn't get the job. Eventually, I did get promoted.

I finally worked up the courage to leave, but couldn't make it stick. I returned after one day and that's when things came off the rails for me. I ended up in the psych ward for a week. I was suicidal, drinking, taking narcotic medications, Ambien, Xanax — anything to get to sleep and block out my nightmare of a marriage.

She found a therapist and we went in for a joint session. I told the therapist everything. My ex apologized for being abusive for the past 15 years. Shortly thereafter, she recanted it all and told me to grow a pair of balls. Nice huh?

It all clicked for me after that. I work for CPS. I know what abuse is. I know the psych medications my clients take are the same ones that she is prescribed. I saw it all very clearly in my professional life, but not my personal life — a typical conundrum and also ironic as hell.

> I started to see a therapist who got it. Thank god for her. I left one day when she went to work. I signed a lease that I had in my back pocket and moved my stuff out. I waited until the kids got home from school and, with the support of my brother, showed them the place where I'd be living.
> Neither child was happy. Contact in the beginning was strained and controlled until things were put into a legal agreement. The divorce was uneventful. I told my attorney that my ex could have the house, on the condition that she take the 20k in credit card debt. If she disagreed, then we would split the credit card debt, she would buy me out of the house and I would get 100k from her retirement.
> I had no retirement because we couldn't afford it given the way she handled our finances. I heard from my attorney twice and went $62.50 over my retainer. That was in July 2010. Life is good now and my kids are good when they are here with me. Our daughter, who is now 15, has told me more than once that my house is less stressful and more relaxing than her mother's.
> Mission Accomplished.

Malala Yousafzai: Far better than a martyr for feminism

Herbert Purdy · 21 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is also available in Romanian.

When I heard that Malala Yousafzai had been named as co-recipient of the 2014 Nobel Peace Prize, I was filled with a deep sense of unease. I sensed that this innocent young woman, terribly used and abused as she has been, and coming as she does from that crucible of international terrorism, the Swat valley in the Pakistan/Afghanistan border lands, has all the potential of becoming even more dangerous to world peace than Osama Bin Laden ever was in his time operating from that troubled country's mountainous border with Pakistan.

In Yousafzai, we obviously do not have an international terrorist, but what I see emerging is an international figure—Madonna-like (in the Roman Catholic sense)—who is being groomed by international feminism in furtherance of its angry, hate-filled creed.

In Yousafzai, international feminism has found something far better than a martyr for its cause, it has found a "martyr-survivor": a concept that plays perfectly into its women-as-victim narrative and that I have no doubt it will use to enormous advantage in furtherance of its work worldwide disadvantaging men, whom it hates with such venomous passion.

Obviously, we acknowledge that this young woman, barely out of childhood, has suffered abominably at the hands of deeply bigoted people, the Taliban, who treated her with disgusting disdain for her rights and, indeed, for human rights in general. She has suffered terribly at their evil hands, of that there is no doubt, and all right-minded people should be filled with disgust at her egregious treatment, as I am.

However, I cannot but think that she is the innocent dupe of another deeply bigoted and socially dangerous ideology, feminism, that will use her elevation as a Nobel Laureate to enormous effect.

This is evident from her speech to the United Nations on July 12, 2014, in which she said:

> Today I am focusing on women's rights and girls' education because they are suffering the most. There was a time when women activists asked men to stand up for their rights. But this time we will do it by ourselves. I am not telling men to step away from speaking for women's rights, but I am focusing on women to be independent and fight for themselves. So dear sisters and brothers, now it's time to speak up. So today, we call upon the world leaders to change their strategic policies in favor of peace and prosperity. We call upon the world leaders that all of these deals must protect women and children's rights.

Here we have the feminist agenda laid bare: Yousafzai the victim, who survived the acts of evil men and heroically triumphed over their viciousness, morphs into the girl who overcame her oppression by men, then declares that men are no longer relevant to the fight of women for independence, and stands before the very embodiment of male "patriarchy"—the United Nations—challenging it to protect women worldwide. It is all very neat, very political, very feminist.

However, the key to seeing what is coming from this young woman lies in her last words: [The UN] "… must protect women and children's rights…." The rhetoric of Yousafzai, the female heroine, has subtly changed. Presumably for the purposes of finessing her nomination for the Nobel Prize, it has become Yousafzai the advocate for the "plight of children" (for which, of course, read: girls).

What plight? What is this all about? What are these words implying? Are children now being portrayed as a victimized social group alongside women? Are we seeing here a further extension of international feminism to embrace children as an oppressed group too? What is the picture that is being painted here?

I am deeply struck by the resonance of this theme with George Orwell's words in Nineteen Eighty-Four, that dark, depressing foresight of future society under totalitarianism, where O'Brien, The Party's persecutor, headed by Big Brother, says: "We have cut the links between child and parent, and between man and man, and between man and woman. No one dares trust a wife or a child or a friend any longer."[1]

Well, feminism has certainly divided men as either believers in feminism or not. It has succeeded in cutting the links between men and women with its incessant false rhetoric about "The Patriarchy" being the cause of the historical suppression of women.[2] It has certainly caused deep distrust between men and women in the twin areas of domestic abuse and rape. It has been enormously successful in fomenting a climate of fear and loathing of men over the last 40 years in our Western societies, resulting in significant numbers of men turning away from marriage, refusing to sire children, and generally going their own way without women.[3]

I wonder, is feminism now going to make good the schism between men and children? After all, it has already brought about a situation in which men need to tread very carefully in any dealings with children because men as a breed are now under suspicion of being potential rapists and child molesters.

This has resulted in men being unable to touch children with fondness, to console or engage with them if they don't know them (for example, in the UK, male teachers are unable to embrace an upset child anymore. They must stand back and offer a handkerchief or tissue to the crying child).

Indeed, "teacher trolling" apparently is now a national pastime, and some pubescent girls see capturing incriminating photos of "pervy" male teachers as a sport. (See my post titled "Men live in fear of teenage girls flirting with them.")

Is this a further outworking of the dystopia foreseen by Orwell[5], where he says, "… in the future there will be no wives and friends"?[6] Are we seeing the beginning of the process he describes when the central character, Winston Smith, is having his mind reprogrammed in the Ministry of Love (which, in the Newspeak of the dystopia Orwell portrays, really means Hate), and, meeting his former neighbour, Parsons, also incarcerated for thought crimes, the following dialogue ensues?

> "Who denounced you?" said Winston. "It was my little daughter," said Parsons with a sort of doleful pride. "She listened at the keyhole. Heard what I was saying, and nipped off to the patrols the very next day. Pretty smart for a nipper of seven, eh? I don't bear her any grudge for it. In fact I'm proud of her. It shows I brought her up in the right spirit, anyway."

In the quasi-beatification of Malala Yousafzai by international feminism, are we seeing the beginning of the unfolding of this process? Are children now going to be set against men, as women have been?

We already have fathers being thrown out of their children's lives in the feminist-dominated family courts system in Britain, Canada, and America, where one in three children lose contact permanently with their fathers.[7]

We already have a wide gulf of mistrust created between men and children. What is next? Children being indoctrinated into reporting their fathers to the authorities for any form of chastisement that immediately becomes condemned as patriarchy by the authorities?

It seems to me that 1984 is not in the past, but just around the corner.

Male victims and society's lack of concern

Jason J. Bailey · 21 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In Canada, there has been much discussion about violence against indigenous people. It is also a controversial topic for Prime Minister Stephen Harper (leader of the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada), as well as Justin Trudeau (leader of the Liberal Party of Canada) and Thomas Mulcair (leader of the New Democratic Party, or NDP). With the federal election approaching in 2015, the way these candidates are handling this topic is proving to have an effect on voters.

The reason this bears mentioning is because it is viewed with little, if any, concern for the men who are victims (like many other examples, as seen below). As we already know, there has always been a generally accepted (and misandric) rule that men are less valuable than women; hence, the "women and children first" rule. Feminists cover this up by saying it is sexism against women that men die first (which shows how out of touch with reality they really are), but when the lifeboats arrive, or when the server brings the bill, all of a sudden equality goes out the window. But it is taken a step further when men are disregarded as the victim not only in general circumstances but also while being heroic. Here are some examples of the ways in which we treat female victims as if they are suffering more, even if they are statistically suffering less.

Native Canadians

The media has informed us recently about how many Native women have gone missing or been murdered. Twitter users even use #AmINext as a way of raising awareness for the women who have gone missing. Organizations, articles, and campaigns feature the women and girls who are being victimized (like this and this and this and this and this and many more). To their credit, the campaigns are correct in saying that Aboriginals are murdered at higher rates (approximately five times) than non-Aboriginals. However, there is one thing missing: MALE VICTIMS! We know that murder rates between the sexes are similar to those of the general population, for which the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) reports men are about 68% of homicide victims and women are the remaining 32%. Yet when one searches for campaigns and organizations raising awareness for the male victims, there is a scarcity.

Domestic Violence

It is one thing for our media to show us that it is acceptable to be violent toward men, but it is exponentially worse for our legal system to do the same. First of all, the rates of domestic violence across Canada's 10 provinces (see Table 1.2; "current and previous relationship") involve 6% of men and 6.4% of women. Since the rates are so close together, one would think that the number of shelters available would be proportional. Wrong! As of 2010, there are 593 abused women's shelters. How many for men? There was one, run by Earl Silverman, but since his suicide (to my knowledge) there are none. Of the 593 women's shelters, 47 (or 8%) will admit men.

Public Sphere Violence

Remember from the first point that I mentioned that men are the majority of homicide victims and victims of most violent crimes? Well, you would think that would be enough to get citizens to intervene when a man is being assaulted or harassed. Based on awareness videos (like this one and this one), we see that men are not only left to fend for themselves, but they are also laughed at, mocked, and ridiculed.

Breast Cancer v. Prostate Cancer

First of all, the colour pink associated with breast cancer (e.g., the pink ribbon) causes us to think of femininity and female victims. This contributed to 80% of surveyed men not knowing men could even get breast cancer. As far as mortality rates, breast cancer kills 1 in 29 women, while prostate cancer kills 1 in 36 men. Those numbers are not too far apart, so you would think that the funding for research and treatment of these diseases would be proportional. Or since we apparently live in a patriarchy, you would think prostate cancer would get more funding. But surprise, surprise: in 2009, breast cancer received $872 million in funding, while prostate cancer received only $399 million in funding.

Boko Haram

This one is similar to the Native Canadians example in that men/boys and women/girls are being victimized and yet we hear only about the female victims. There was #BringBackOurGirls on Twitter, and yet nothing to raise awareness of male victims. Many people who I've spoken to about this were unaware that Boko Haram was even targeting boys.

Feminist Treatment of Male Victims

We couldn't discuss the lack of concern for male victims without mentioning our favourite hate group. Feminists have a real soft spot for men, and some of these gems really show it:

1. Hillary Clinton: "Women have always been the primary victims of war. Women lose their husbands, their fathers, their sons in combat."

Women certainly are victims of war, but unless they themselves were in combat, they are not the primary victims. The members of combat are the primary victims. You know, the ones who lose their mental health, limbs, or even their lives. They are the primary victims. The women who lose husbands, fathers, and sons are called secondary victims. That is not to marginalize their loss but to recognize the sacrifices that our members of combat have made.

1. Catherine Comins: "Men who are unjustly accused of rape can sometimes gain from the experience."

Yes, because those gains include getting kicked out of school, getting fired from your job, gaining a criminal record, spending time in jail while labelled the lowest criminal besides murderer (somehow feminists think this is a rape culture?!), having increased likelihood of being victimized while behind bars, having difficulty finding a new job once you are released and the stigma of "rapist" or "accused rapist." That doesn't even include the emotional turmoil falsely accused men endure. Yet men are supposed to call that a gainful experience?

1. Many feminists: "What men fear most about going to prison is what women fear most about walking down the sidewalk."

Women walking down the sidewalk have more protections and resources available; they have access to more in the way of counselling, therapy, and other mental health treatment options; they have the support of their friends and family; and they know that innocent bystanders will intervene on their behalf at a moment's notice. Men in prison, on the other hand, do not. On the sidewalk, men have greater reason to fear being victimized than women, so if we were to even try to compare women on the sidewalk to men in prison, feminists would be crushed into the dust on this argument. But, feminists, thank you for marginalizing the suffering that inmates endure. I can't imagine why people think feminists hate men …

1. Mary Koss: "It is inappropriate to consider as a rape victim a man who engages in unwanted sexual intercourse with a woman."

This one should speak for itself. According to Koss, forced sex is rape only as long as it is not a woman forcing a man to have sex. In this case, she is not only showing a lack of concern for male victims, but she is also refusing to even acknowledge that they are victims to the same extent that women would be.

1. Sheryl Sandberg: "We need to help [girls] lean in." (Ban Bossy campaign video)

We know that men earn the minority of college degrees. We know that boys are more likely to drop out than girls. Boys are falling behind girls in language (reading, writing and oral) skills. And Sheryl Sandberg wants to invent a problem to turn girls back into the victim again? Girls are much less interested in leadership than boys (we also see this in politics), as per their biology. Yet when boys fall behind girls, we still care more about girls.

All of this is truly sad considering that feminists will have us believe we live in a society in which female victims are blamed. Like always, feminists got it wrong. Not only do we not blame female victims, but they also receive more sympathy and consideration than male victims. Some patriarchy this is!

The right kind of equality

Hopeland Cash · 21 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Over its recent life, the Men's Human Rights Movement has been repeatedly slammed as misogynistic. There is a widely held belief that the MHRM is a regressive movement, that it wants to undo the advances in status and rights made for women over the past two centuries. On the surface, this is simple anti-men's rights propaganda, characterizing the movement and its activists as backwards and dangerous. The problem runs deeper, however. Just as the MHRM is not a mere backlash against feminism, accusations of misogyny come from more than mere feminist defensiveness.

It is a common misconception that people's rights amount to a zero-sum game. This was seen during the civil rights era and during the short-lived resistance to early feminism: people often assume that to give increased rights to one group means restricting the rights of another. The situation is slightly different with the MHRM, however. The blowback against men's rights comes not only from fear of the more men's rights = less women's rights equation but also from the flat refutation of men's rights as a valid issue.

When women suffer, it is a women's rights issue. When people suffer, it is a human rights issue. When men suffer, it is patriarchal privilege.

Thus comes the label of misogyny: men have no lack of rights, so the only way to "improve" their relative social standing is to reduce women's rights. Male reproductive rights? Restrict abortion or give men control over it. Improve education for men? Since they're privileged already that must mean reducing female educational opportunity. These misconceptions can be argued against with a right-minded non-feminist, citing such documented forms of male suffering as health, suicide, and family breakdown, but even then certain assumptions shine through that illuminate some of society's more deeply ingrained beliefs about men.

One such belief is the immutability of men's social status. With the denial of men's rights issues comes the belief that men, as a group, cannot undergo a change in social status. The status of classes can change, the status of the poor can change, the status of women can change, but never has it been thought that the status of men, as a distinct group, can or should be changed. Only as part of a larger class are men affected by social reform or degradation.

Police violence against African-Americans is often condemned, but no one wants to point out that it is African-American men who are uniquely affected. We should be asking why African-American women aren't targeted so much, and then look for a way to keep their male kin just as safe.

How then could men's rights ever be a valid issue of social concern? Even the liberal-minded struggle with this: convince them that men really do suffer from social ills and they still have a hard time seeing how it can be improved. The patriarchy made it so, after all, so if men wanted it to be different, it would. They hold the power and are responsible for their position. The illusion of male hyperagency robs men of the power to make their lives better.

Worse, this makes men's suffering indistinguishable from their class-based suffering. To some thinkers, the only way to improve the lot of lower-class men is to improve the lot of all lower-class people. That is an admirable goal, no doubt, but will not itself solve uniquely male problems. Maybe it is just our history of female hypergamy, but women tend to be seen as mobile within their classes much more so than men. In effect, men simply are as they are and nothing can change that—a terrible form of misandry that diminishes male suffering in every sphere of life.

Point this out to a class-conscious person and they come to a troubling conclusion: if men's class status can't be changed, and their status within their class can't be changed, the only way to improve their lot, relatively speaking, is to reduce the status of women.

Call it "Equality of Suffering": the idea that the MHRM will remove gender inequality by removing women's protection from the suffering that men experience. Many of the assumptions are the same as the more conventional reactions to men's rights: Men lack reproductive rights? MRAs must want to take away women's access to birth control and abortion. Boys doing poorly in school? MRAs will just undo the advances that have helped girls excel.

These people fear that MRAs would reduce society to some dark dystopia where all individuals, men and women, slink their way through equally miserable lives: if everyone can't have, for example, protection from domestic violence, no one should, not even women. That is just a smokescreen, though. What they fear is real equality. They are coming from a deep-set cultural mythos of gynocentrism. Combined with the aforementioned zero-sum assumption, there is no room left in their thinking for real consideration of men's rights. Any improvement to men's rights would mean a loss of women's rights, which gynocentrism strictly prohibits.

The Men's Human Rights Movement is fighting for equality, but only in the positive sense. Despite claims to the contrary, MRAs are not bitter neckbeards bent on robbing women of all their rights. We see ways in which women are given aid and support and want only to bring the same caring to men.

We want to give men all the parental rights women already enjoy, not take anything away from anyone. We want to reform education so boys and girls reach their full potential. No MRA wants to see women's suicide rate match men's; we want to bring men's suicide down, to the level of women, and then keep bringing both even lower. The same with workplace injuries and death: don't make female-dominated jobs more dangerous; create enough compassion for men that we won't overlook their dangerous working conditions any longer.

This isn't a fight anyone has to lose. Achieving equality is never easy, and it means changes in lifestyle for everyone involved. That doesn't mean anyone's lifestyle has to worsen, though. Men's Rights Activists will bring greater sympathy to men and un-infantilize women to become more responsible members of society.

What we want is for everyone to be cared for, listened to, and respected.

Not Equality of Suffering. Equality of Compassion.

In His Own Words: Nice guy meets abusive borderline personality disordered woman, Part I

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 22 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It is day 22 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month 2014 for Men and Boys, the invisible victims of domestic violence. Today's In His Own Words tells the tale of "Kyle," a nice guy from an abusive family who fell for and married an abusive woman who likely has borderline personality disorder.

When I first met my second wife, D, I thought she was perfect. She was everything I thought I could want in a woman. She was funny and caring and into all of my hobbies with a smile that could melt your heart. A real dream come true. However, what I didn't realize at the time was this was simply her mask.

I had come from an extremely abusive home, so I was definitely the kind of guy looking for a woman to validate my existence. I told myself that this wasn't the case after having been through several bad relationships and a previous marriage to a personality-disordered woman before. So, I thought I had "learned" from my mistakes and was ready for the right person to love me in a way that no one else could.

In the beginning, there were very few red flags, or so I thought. Though, to be honest, at that point in my life, I was so ready to find my "one and only" that I was readily willing to ignore what Dr. T calls those "WTF moments." I thought I was safe, as I had been friends with D for a year previous to us dating.

However, if I knew back then what I know now, I would have run given some of those early warning signs and never looked back. For example, about three weeks into dating D, she showed up at my doorstep with a bag full of laundry, giving the impression that she was: 1) hopeless in managing her own affairs, and 2) ready to move in. As bad as it was having someone whom you've only dated for a few weeks wanting to move in, it was worse. She had the expectation that I was responsible for her laundry.

Not only did she passive-aggressively bring more stuff over to my place, but she started to complain that I was not washing her clothes for her while she was moving her stuff in. Being the "nice guy" that I was, I eagerly complied, since I was looking to win her approval. Yet, this wasn't even the worst part.

After a great night's sex, she took off early in the morning, and I proceeded to do her laundry. I was also in a hurry to get ready for work, so I didn't thoroughly check all of the pockets in her jeans before I threw them in the wash; there were about 10 pairs in total. I didn't realize that she had left her cellphone in one of her pairs of jeans. It wasn't until I heard a clunking sound coming from the wash machine that I realized what had happened.

A couple of hours later, I got a call from D while she was at work asking about her cellphone, and I promptly explained that I had accidentally washed her phone. I apologized for my mistake, and offered to buy her a new one. This is when the "fit hit the shan."

D exploded in a verbal tirade about how I had purposely washed her phone in a resentful act to hurt and offend her. I kept repeating that I was sorry for the incident, but I hadn't done anything on purpose. Further still, I was confused about what the problem was, since I had offered to buy a replacement. This still wasn't good enough.

Not only did I have to buy her a replacement phone, but I also had to admit that I purposely washed her phone "to hurt and sabotage her." After going back and forth like this for about 45 minutes to an hour, I was rather worn down and confused. I was also working (I run my own business and was now severely late getting to my next job site), so I simply "confessed" my crime to be done with the conversation.

This wasn't the end of D's tirades. D comes from an extremely religious family, so her wanting to move in with me before we got married was considered a big deal, or at least it was to them, not so much with D. D's family blamed me for corrupting their daughter and turning her into "a whore and a prostitute," as well as literally calling me Satan. Despite all of this, D sided with her family's actions and blamed me for causing her emotional pain and distress, even though she had no problem living with me or having sex with me outside of marriage.

Even worse, D's family blamed me for causing her to break up with her previous fiancé shortly before we got together, although they repeatedly told me how much they hated him. Of course, they also refused to pay for the wedding as a way of further showing their disapproval of me, as well as threatening to hit me at more than one family function.

This didn't bother me because I was "in love" with D. She told me in those first few weeks, while she was moving in, how she had never felt this way about anyone else before in her life, and how much she loved me/was falling for me. I was pretty hooked on what Dr. T calls the BPD crack pipe.

I offered to pay for the wedding myself: big mistake. D tried to plan the most elaborate wedding she could think of, totaling about $15,000.00. Although I wasn't going to pay for something that expensive, I wanted D to be happy, since this was to be her first and "only marriage."

Planning for the ceremony was awful too. Anytime I would make a suggestion, D would scream and yell and point her finger (trying to shame me), or she would break down crying, leaving my head spinning about what was going on. Fortunately, I was able to calm her down by "agreeing to the alternative plans" that she was willing to agree upon. But in doing so, I realize now that I was being primed for years of emotional and psychological abuse – as well as physical abuse, although that didn't start until later.

Finally, after a year of dating and planning our wedding, we got married. Things seemed to die down. Yep, I was so naïve that I let a girl I had just started dating convince me that she was in love with me enough to get married right away. Worse yet, I was convinced – mainly through oral pleasures – that we didn't need a prenuptial agreement, since that wouldn't have been "romantic." I rationalized all of this away.

I had known and been friends with D for a year before dating, so I thought I knew what she was like, which made it easier to explain away the crazy. Plus, anytime I didn't rationalize things away or I was upset about something, D would either blow me off, blame me for everything, or give me so much sex that I couldn't think straight.

Soon enough things started to get worse, a lot worse. About a year into our marriage, I was continuing to have health problems from growing up in an abusive household. My health was getting worse, and I needed to see more specialists about what could be done. I was losing my ability to work, which of course bothered D. (The long story short on this part, I was left to freeze as an infant by my parents, and although I was resuscitated that evening, it caused permanent injury to my body from frostbite. Further, I was not taken away by Child Services, and in the process of surviving my household, I was taught that pleasing my parents and anticipating their needs was my only way of receiving love, priming me for an abuser like D.)

So, as my health deteriorated, D escalated her abusive behavior, especially when I had a cancerous tumor develop. She actually blamed me for getting sick because it took the focus off of her and the money away from the gifts and trips that she was receiving. Even worse, she yelled at me and emotionally terrorized me whenever I pointed this out, going so far as to point and laugh in my face for wanting emotional support. She still expected me to do all of the cooking and cleaning, like I had been doing up to this point. Anytime I was having issues, she would conveniently be gone with her friends or give me the silent treatment for days or weeks on end.

While I was recovering, I was still expected to bring home the bacon, which I did because I felt it was my duty as a man to be the provider, regardless of the circumstances with which I was faced. No amount of pleading with D helped. It was around this time that she started to take her frustrations out on me while I was sleeping. That is, I would wake up to D punching or kicking me in my sleep.

For example, I remember waking up to my head being slammed against the wall, causing me to have a goose egg on my forehead for about two weeks. When I looked over, D acted like she was sleeping. I again rationalized D's behaviors away by saying it was me being exhausted from surgery and working so much.

The craziness began to die down again as I started to get better and bring home more money. I thought that D was finally coming around. I was trying my best to set boundaries, explain why her actions were inappropriate, and not be such a pushover. After getting things back on track and paying down our bills, not only from my medical expenses but also D's refusal to limit her spending, I was blindsided. During this time, she kept gaslighting me, engaging in double standards and no-win situations, and being physically confrontational like charging and flailing at me (similar to Janay Rice).

I noticed my personality was beginning to change. I was developing severe anxiety, having problems leaving the house, losing work contracts, and was no longer as outgoing as I used to be. In fact, I was even diagnosed with depression and loss of self-esteem at the time from a counselor that D forced me to go see. He said, "[I] was having relationship problems," which were causing my issues. Though, I explained this away – once again – as having relationship problems with my friends, not D, since my social circle was also starting to contract, leaving me rather isolated.

This is when my true nightmare began. I was going through several legal issues with a few different contractors at work. While I was attempting to correct the problem, D was going behind my back, sabotaging my clients and business. Then, in true borderline fashion, she complained that I was not supporting her enough financially. I got good at alternative means of making money, like selling my prized vehicle and downgrading to an older car to use the difference to support D.

No matter what I did, it was never enough. D would even secretly open credit cards, then throw them in my face when she got tired of paying the minimum balance. D even hid the title for my new/old car for several months, claiming that it had never shown up in the mail. Then, one day, she conveniently pulled the title out of her purse while we were at a doctor's appointment (more on that later), claiming, "Look what I forgot in my purse for the last three months." Now, her purse was not one of those dufflebag-style purses either, more the kind that you could barely fit your driver's license and a pack of gum into, so I knew she was lying.

Thank you, Kyle. I will post the second half of Kyle's story tomorrow.

AVFM launches whiteribbon.org!

The people behind the White Ribbon have undoubtedly put in a huge amount of sweat equity and actual funds in branding the White Ribbon Campaign (WRC).

A simple Google search will return many, many references to that campaign and to websites that have been set up to further its message. That message, of course, is that men can stop domestic violence, that they bear the weight of all evil on their backs, and that they need to create a safe world for women, blah, blah, blah.

Obviously, the people getting the job done on behalf of WRC really outdid themselves on planning and marketing.

Well, there was one goof. They neglected to pick up the obvious choices for domains for their program, especially given they are aiming for growth.

I personally interpreted this as an intentional act. It appears to me that the good folks at WRC desire a grassroots movement, with concerned individuals stepping up to the plate to dedicate activism in the area of Intimate Partner Violence (IPV).

As I mulled over the considerable resources we now have at A Voice for Men, and our ongoing interest in the area of domestic violence, I surmised that this was a very opportune moment to invest vigorously in the WRC project. This was confirmed when I found out that whiteribboncampaign.org, whiteribbon.org, and most of the .coms and .nets associated with that name were similarly unspoken for.

What a fantastic time, I told myself, for the AVfM organization to figuratively join hands with White Ribbon Campaign organizations worldwide and to help them spread the unyielding truth about the problem of domestic violence in this culture.

So that is exactly what we did.

Gents and ladies, I present to you without further ado whiteribbon.org and whiteribboncampaign.org. It is a website I am very proud of, and proud to say that AVfM will be investing whatever resources it takes to make whiteribboncampaign.org the most highly recognized and iconic voice in the worldwide White Ribbon Campaign.

With our resources, and our reach on Google, it is only a matter of a short period of time before we can make good on that promise.

If you think misandry doesn't exist, and that feminism does not have a serious problem with attempting to silence all criticism and dissent, you really need to see this documentary on the experiences of Professor Janice Fiamengo of the University of Ottawa.

Watch as not only students but faculty and staff attempt to silence Fiamengo and stop journalists from even documenting what's going on.

For more, you may want to subscribe to StudioBrule.

Also, Dr. Fiamengo will be speaking at the November 1st Male Students in Peril conference at Kennesaw State University. You can RSVP for free at Eventbrite.

In His Own Words: Nice guy meets abusive borderline personality disordered woman, Part II

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 23 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 23 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month 2014 for Men and Boys, the invisible victims of domestic violence. Today's In His Own Words is the second part to Kyle's story.

Yet, despite all of this, like a good lapdog, I held on due to my beliefs about correcting my past mistakes and not letting God down. But the constant fighting was starting to wear on me. In fact, I was developing grey hairs from the abuse and never knowing what was going to set D off. Even on days like my birthday, there was no reprieve, as she would use days like this to emasculate me or make it about her.

She would want to have a party for her "special man," then complain about how much of a loser I was for not planning my own birthday party or making enough money to support her ever-growing list of demands. It got so bad that I started to snap. I became very angry and would yell a lot during these times, which of course then became about my "gross" anger issues instead of whatever preceded the incident.

She even started doing this in public, like whispering something in my ear such as "I saw this _____ while I was out the other day shopping. It was very pink and effeminate just like my pussy of a husband." She was hoping I'd explode and hit her. She was particularly mad because I felt there needed to be more accountability for her actions. I'd tried very unsuccessfully to resolve these issues over the years, which only led to D martyring herself – until I begged and pleaded for her to stop by giving in and allowing her to continue with her actions unabated.

This all came to a head when I got hurt about a year after my final reconstructive surgery. I had gotten severely injured in a sports competition, and needed a lot of time to recover. Meaning that even though I was still working and providing (by using my savings to cover the difference), D had had enough of her "loser husband."

She escalated her violence, blamed me for ruining her entire life, and refused to help me, even when I could barely get out of bed. In fact, I liken this time to being similar to James Caan's character from the movie Misery, with D being Kathy Bates. I was becoming a budding writer and had received a book contract on a trip to NYC a few months before I was injured.

So, there I was, injured and barely able to get out of bed, with Kathy Bates, D, abusing the crap out of me. Around this time, D even blamed me for being abusive since I was getting angry at her for not helping. Plus, I was reducing our spending to make ends meet, so I was trying to "keep her trapped."

It was during this time that my epilepsy started to get worse from the stress, especially as D wanted to know why I was such an abusive monster. She would even make fun of me for being a "retard" while I was having seizures. This was my tipping point. I knew that something was horribly wrong in the State of Denmark.

I was already dealing with so much abuse that it was crazy, like D charging at me, causing me to shout with my hands up, "D, I love you, but not now. I need space. Please back off." Then she would crash off of my hands onto the floor when I had been backed into a corner with nowhere to go, claiming that I was beating her up. Little did I know at the time that she could see I was nearing the end of my rope, and she was developing her own exit plan, involving a smear campaign and the police.

D claimed that I needed therapy for my horrible upbringing (which is true but not for the reasons that she thought), and if I didn't change my ways, she was going to leave me and call the cops, particularly if I ever laid my hands on her again and continued to yell. "Putting my hands up" was a defensive move while she crashed off of me. I felt deeply ashamed and broken.

I was never the type to yell at a women, like "would you just shut the eff up", and even when mad, I rarely hit things, like a pillow against the wall or shadow punch in the air. But I had been abused for so long that I believed that this intense anger originated from inside me and not D, so I was shamed to my core.

I broke down. I couldn't even look myself in the eye anymore. I truly believed that D was right. I was a monster. "A monster who was so horribly scarred that it could never be loved or be healed," as D put it. So, I pursued therapy through a local referral to a psychiatrist, AVfM, Shrink4Men, and I read every book on subjects such as anger, co-dependency (like Melody Bettie's work), narcissism, and setting boundaries.

This is when it hit me. I was still shattered as a man, but it was because I was being abused to the point that D had stolen all of my positive traits. And those she couldn't steal, she tried to destroy. Further still, she forced all of her negative traits on me, blaming me in the process of her projection. Now was I/am I perfect? Heck no. I was a broken person who needed help for my own issues, but at least I knew that I had to get out of my relationship.

I sat D down one night to try to work things out. After spending the night arguing instead, I realized the situation was unsalvageable. And yet, in true white knight fashion, instead of just leaving, I said I would give her six months to turn the situation around where we would both get therapy and try one last time to make things work. Otherwise, "destroying me in the divorce and the threat of me going to jail" wasn't going to stop me. (D had previously threatened to destroy me if I ever left her. Worse yet, when she claimed that I was an abusive POS, she had run away from home a few times only to come back later and forgive me. Then she'd give me some great makeup sex, but only before telling me that she had called a shelter and gotten some literature. So, if I ever left her, she would call the cops. She would even go so far as to leave pamphlets out about domestic violence for me to see to reinforce her threats.)

After our talk, things seemed to get better. D started to come around and our relationship got better for a few months, but then D began to disappear and wanted to go out by herself and not be around. I started to think that maybe she wasn't coming around after all. Yet, between D's continual spending and paying for my medical treatment, I was too focused on trying to pay our bills to have time to create a better escape plan.

I found out that she was having an affair, but I was stuck. This is when it ended: I came home from work one day to my home completely cleared out, bank accounts cleared out, and nothing left but a Dear John letter on the floor telling me how I was an abusive monster who could never change, so D had to flee for her life. Further, I was to never contact her again.

Needless to say, I was in shock. I even played into her game of trying to get her back. Fortunately, I sent Dr. T some emails, and while her responses were terse, they were very blunt. I got the message. I came to my senses and realized, "What am I doing? This is my opportunity to cut Crazy from my life. So, just let her go." I instituted a strict "no contact" policy with D, and only communicated through text and email, even when she would call at 1 a.m. trying to pick a fight. (So much for her telling me to never contact her again.)

I was able to mitigate some of the damages in the divorce settlement, but it did come at a cost. I got D to admit on tape that I was not abusing her. However, she had already taken most of our assets, and while I wanted revenge so badly, I agreed to let them go in exchange for her not pursuing the abuse charges. I also was able to cut free from alimony because I shamefully (in my opinion) blackmailed her with the affair that she had been having and the sizable amounts of money that she had been hiding that would have come out in court.

We also agreed to let an arbitrator handle the discussion on the financial side of things, even though I didn't realize that D had already picked and primed the arbitrator against me. But I figured that I can be free even if it means being homeless because it's still better than going to jail and losing everything else, so I acquiesced. Though, based on Dr. T's advice, I had compiled a long list of things that D had done to try to mitigate the abuse charges to defend myself as best as possible in the event that D changed her mind.

And with lighting speed, we were divorced, mainly because D's mom works at the Capitol in the state in which I live. Her mom was able to influence the judge to push the divorce through uncontested, which was another reason I deeply feared D's threats of pressing DV charges against me. (I later found out that it was so she could get remarried less than six months later.)

All in all, I lost about $100,000 between the assets, a lack of remuneration for our remaining communal property, past due bills that I had to pay, and the managing of the debt with which I'm left. This doesn't even count all of the bills I paid (yep, I paid them all), trips, and gifts that I bought over the years.

However, I'm a hard worker, and without being strapped with years of alimony (we were together for nine years), I'm able to start working myself out of a hole, which is good. Because if our marriage had lasted too much longer, any negotiation wouldn't have mattered. I would have been stuck paying D alimony the rest of my life. I was at least smart enough to never have a child with D, even though she tried a few times. The toughest part about all of this has been the smear campaign that D has waged against me. Not only did I become isolated from my family again, as I had been working to rebuild my relationship with my parents, but I lost almost all of my friends and business customers in the process, since D went behind my back and told everyone stories about me being an abuser.

I hold myself accountable too. I refused to set boundaries in the beginning of my relationship with D. I should have had more respect for myself and walked away when those warning signs and red flags were popping up early on, most especially before I legally tethered myself to D. And while I'm upset about how things turned out, I'm ultimately responsible for myself and my own actions. So, I must live, learn, and never repeat. If you hear my story and it helps you to the same, then I'm truly grateful for having gone through everything that I did.

Thank you, Kyle.

#GamerGate vs. Elevatorgate—A comparison

Randy Macanahaugh (aka Subman) · 23 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

There have been almost 2 million tweets regarding #GamerGate. I have typed out a few myself, along with two blog posts prior to this one about it.

The reason(s) I am on the #GamerGate "side" of this squabble? First, I love video games. My live-in girlfriend would attest to the amount of time I spend with an Xbox 360 controller in my hand. I have been playing video games since Pong. My first "gaming system" was a Commodore 64. I've played on PC, NES, SNES, Xbox, Xbox 360, and Wii.

Second, I'm against ideologies. All of them. In my opinion, ideologies hold certain beliefs to be inviolate, regardless of evidence. Religions, political "wings," and academic feminism are all examples of ideologies. They all have, at their core, a belief or set of beliefs that they consider "great truths." Any evidence that conflicts with these "great truths" is ignored, belittled, or actively covered up.

On to the comparison.

One of the better descriptions of the Elevatorgate drama I have found on the web is this one from Freethought Kampala. The author goes into tedious detail and it's all very well sourced. I have only a few issues with it, one of which is how it claims the drama started. I don't mean that the post is inaccurate, just that it doesn't go far enough back in time to the real beginning of the conflict.

In my opinion, the incident (or something like it) had been percolating beneath the surface for a good while before the offer of a hot caffeinated beverage divided the atheist community.

#GamerGate (or GamerGate) has an equally excellent summary at Know Your Meme. It, too, suffers from the lack of background information on the roiling troubles in the gaming community that preceded it.

Both followed a pattern that can be summarized by:

> 1. A group, hobby, or interest consisting of mostly males (due to disinterest by females) becomes more popular.
> 2. Females begin to join in. Some out of genuine interest and some ideologues who have ulterior motives.
> 3. Ideological joiners begin to complain that women are underrepresented due to sexism (rather than the differences in interest levels).
> 4. Some original group members disagree that sexism is the cause. This disagreement is then claimed to be proof of the sexism in a form of argument called a KafkaTrap.
> 5. Tempers flare. Trolls, seeing the opportunity to create strife, send harassment to the ideologues. These harassments are then touted as further "proof" of the sexism.

The pattern is a proven method of infiltrating a group with an interest and co-opting the focus of the group onto the ideology of the infiltrators. I'm assuming I don't have to actually tell you the name of this ideology. It has been making its "slow march through the institutions" for over 40 years. The result of this infiltration is either capitulation to the ideologues or a schism.

A schism is not the end for the ideologically driven. It simply means they will have to play the long game. This usually involves media-assisted denouncements of those opposing the ideology. They are dehumanized. They are grouped in with the worst trolls and shit-stirrers.

Sometimes these schisms are sparked by a single event that releases the tensions and passions of the build-up phase in a fiery, cathartic moment. In EG, it was the elevator incident and the subsequent infighting about it. In GG, it was the Zoe Post (along with Mundane Matt getting a DMCA and TFYC being decried by ideologues).

History

In the late 1990s through mid 2000s, Jack Thompson, a currently disbarred attorney, brought a good deal of attention to violent video games. Thompson routinely denigrated gamers as "brain impaired" and compared them with "Hitler Youth." The gamers seem better prepared for battles than did the atheists, but that may be false confidence. I'm getting ahead of myself, though.

In the much more recently popular atheism community, the ideologues were beginning to show up in the late 2000s to the present. A post from 2010 when read today conveys a sense of foreboding doom that was likely not apparent at the time. Atheists, used to logical, reasoned debate with theists, at first tried the same approach to these new claims of sexism, privilege, patriarchy, and "lived experience." The traditional methods were only moderately effective, and the ideologues refined their arguments.

In 2012, Anita Sarkeesian, a Canadian communications major with a MA in social and political thought from York University, announced a Kickstarter campaign to fund her latest project "Tropes vs Women in Video Games" on her Feminist Frequency YouTube channel. In stark contrast to most (if not all) of her previous FF videos (several of which had taken issue with video games), the comment section was open for any YouTube user to leave comments. The result was predictable. Irate Internet denizens, trolls, and gamers flooded the video comments section with hateful posts.

Sarkeesian then used these hurtful comments as evidence that there is a sexism problem in gaming. She parlayed these comments, along with a flash game depicting her visage in an ever-increasing brutalized condition, into nearly US$160,000.

The year before (2011), Rebecca Watson, also the proud owner of a communications degree, described her polite encounter with a man in a Dublin hotel elevator (for the life of me I can't figure out why this wasn't called Liftgate in deference to the UK term for elevator).

Striking parallels

Both EG and GG began in what were originally male-dominated interests groups.

Both EG and GG had ideologically minded joiners once the groups or hobby became more popular.

Both used the disproportionate numbers of males as evidence for sexism, when a more reasoned explanation would have just been interest levels (which were organically already beginning to change).

Both harnessed hateful comments and untraceable Internet "threats" as evidence for the claimed sexism.

Both claimed that they received the hateful comments solely due to their gender (rather than the draconian moderation of comments or the refusal to engage in discourse).

Both use emotional leverage provided by the deeply ingrained desire to protect women as a shield from more rational assaults on their points.

Today

So, here we are. An Internet world filled with terms like privilege, cis-het, transmisogyny, internalized oppression, and Tumblr. God help us all (and I'm an atheist).

The way forward should be the same for both groups. Hard science over emotion, logic over feelings, and civility above all. The reason civility is so important is because these people thrive on "threats" and "harassment." Every anonymous threat or vulgar insult are like Pac-Man "power pills" for their cause. These behaviors are so beneficial to them that it has become popular to question their veracity. This, too, plays into their hands. Call for the law enforcement to apprehend the credible threats. Call for folks to report and ban the threats that aren't actionable by law enforcement.

Gamers, at first glance, seem better prepared for an Internet battle of ideas and ideologies. They've dealt with the likes of Jack Thompson and have even moved a developer to create a more fleshed-out game ending through sheer determination. What they lack, however, is the experience with emotionally manipulative rhetoric. Gamers, like atheists, are not seen sympathetically by the overall population. The ideologues, by claiming that they represent women (the most sympathetically perceived group in society), have a decided advantage in an emotional standoff. It's a bit like charging the end boss as a level 5 thief.

The only way to regain popular opinion and stave off this infiltration is coldly. Calm, reasoned points invalidating the claims of the ideologues IS effective but slow. The email campaigns targeting advertisers is also a great strategy. Be warned, though: there is no quick-win here. There are no cheat codes to level up and beat the end boss. You really have to grind it out and remain calm.

Good luck, and Get Some Time.

Parody of “Potty-Mouthed Princesses”

The recent feminist video of young girls swearing on camera was one of the most wretched examples of feminist activism in all history. Our friend Julie Borowski liked it even less than we did.

Lindy West and the quest to kill social interaction forever

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 24 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Lindy West of The Guardian took it upon herself to lecture men on how to spend their time talking to (a.k.a. "pestering") women.

If mirrors could reflect thoughts, Lindy's image would look like a Jackson Pollock seizure-fucked Michael J. Fox on a table saw.

> I was writing in a quiet corner of a Starbucks on Monday when a young blonde woman with a book took a nearby seat. She hadn't even been there five minutes when a man, probably 20 years her elder and clearly a stranger, grabbed the chair next to her and started talking. About absolutely nothing. Dude literally opened with, "Mondays. The worst, right!?" It somehow got less interesting from there.

Cliché, I'll give you that. But strangers, being strangers, tend to resort to small talk until they learn more about their conversation partner.

> It didn't matter to him that this woman's response was tepid at best, or that she was busy reading – an act that explicitly says: "I am choosing not to be in this universe right now."

And what, Lindy, are the actions that consent to existence in this universe?

Strangers are always minding their business and doing something with their time. It is impossible not to interrupt a stranger.

If she was talking to a friend, you'd be upset that he interrupted their conversation. If she was scribbling a reminder note to herself on a napkin, you'd be upset that he derailed her train of thought.

But even if she was sitting stiller than a statue frozen in a glacier, staring straight ahead, and doing absolutely fucking nothing until someone talks to her, you'd get upset that he was interjecting his company into her clearly estranged or meditative daily experience.

What will it take, Lindy? Should women hold up a sign that reads, "I enthusiastically consent to conversation with a man"? Should women only approach men from now on?

Guide us, O Mother Goddess.

> The guy was friendly, gregarious, poised (as if he'd been through these motions before) and even though he didn't say a single sentence with any substance whatsoever, his delivery was studiously, unimpeachably innocent. He couldn't be violating anyone's boundaries – he was being "nice"! What's next – are the feminazis going to outlaw smiles!?

Wouldn't surprise me at this point.

> The woman sat through it, subdued but polite. So he took and took and took, as much as he could get away with. Eventually, she left.

Wait, so you're telling me that she sat there like a posed cadaver, defeated, with her book drooping away from her weakening thumbs in response to friendly small talk? Even the most boring people I know back off when they detect a total lack of engagement.

You basically said this guy wasn't totally boring. How did the woman leave? Did she just shoot up and march out without a word? Did she say, “Oh, sorry. Gotta do something?” You give about as much context as a jammed Pez dispenser gives candy.

How do we know the woman was uncomfortable? All we have is your word on that.

> I was sitting there thinking about how women’s time is treated like a public commodity (yes, I am available for wedding toasts and bar mitzvahs) …

As opposed to a private commodity, when a man’s girlfriend walks in and tells him about all the stupid family gatherings she put on his calendar that he WILL go to if he loves her.

Excuse the tangent. I forgot that there are more horrible things going on, like men talking to women.

But am I the only one wondering why Lindy is not talking about why men did not approach her? Seriously. Lindy is the kind of person who would open right up with a story of a man rudely interrupting her “men suck” acid trip, but that story is nowhere in the article.

Did a strange man approach you, Lindy? If not, is it possible that men didn’t want to interrupt your writing? Is it possible that you’re being a presumptuous clown ass?

> … when, coincidentally, another young blonde woman came and sat down in the same chair. And then a completely different annoying old dude plunked himself down and launched into – I am not joking – a 30-minute, condescending lecture about the history of sampling in popular music. It happened all over again. He wanted her attention, so he took it. Because there’s no law against talking to a pretty woman. And, again, she sat through it.

Anyone willing to sit listening for 30 minutes is either interested in the topic or so socially weak that they cannot assert themselves. I’ll assume that you and the other women are assertive, but I hope you are not then going to give me bullshit about women’s time being stolen.

> Why is it that interrupting someone in a quiet moment, wilfully oblivious to their verbal and physical cues, is considered friendly, but rebuffing such an interruption is considered rude? Interrupting is objectively worse than not wanting to be interrupted. We only get one life.

Stop. You basically rendered impossible all communication between strangers, and therefore potential friends and lovers.

Rewind. Have you actually asked these women if they were uncomfortable? Have you considered that friendships start with strangers? Have you noticed that your article contains no mention of you being interrupted, even though you conveyed in your article that you were writing?

Pause. You’re entering a realm of pure speculation where reason doesn’t exist.

Eject! Turn back now!

> Wasting someone’s time is the subtlest form of murder.

… Or keep playing, but I gotta tell you, this show sucks.

Big talk from a woman wasting hard-drive space with speculation.

> "Whatever I can get away with" is an inherently antisocial standard of behaviour.

Lindy has done every thing she complained about. She's writes many words that say nothing at the expense of my time and is discouraging social behavior (which is obviously anti-social) because she can.

Please reflect on the profound irony before contemplating the dumber things to come.

> It strips your partner of agency and precludes any possibility of genuine intimacy.

It's statements like that that make me realize that I am a college student working 65+ hours a week for less than $15,000 a year while some fuck-knuckle gets paid to hallucinate at Starbucks.

> Why would you want to have sex with someone who is just "letting you" instead of eagerly reciprocating?

God, she just keeps going, but apparently The Guardian never stopped to ask, "Lindy, have you interviewed the people in Starbucks?" Based on Lindy's article, not everyone left.

I previously bitched about KSU feminist students attacking KSU Men even though they were within walking distance, but Lindy is in the same fucking room, and she still won't engage people to learn more.

Are feminists and social justice warriors really this lazy, or are they so socially stunted that they have to compensate for their severe mental defects with a never-ending hero fantasy?

> Why would you want to be tolerated when you could be desired? Who's OK with having sex that's only distinguishable from rape on a technicality? (Ooh, I know that one. It's rapists.)

How the hell did we get to rape?! Slow down! Your petulance is reaching critical mass!

> That's why California's new "yes means yes" law is so exciting – not because of its legal ramifications so much as its ideological ones. Shifting the way we conceptualise our interactions from "I should fulfil as many of my own desires as I possibly can without getting in trouble" to "I should go out of my way to make sure the people around me feel comfortable and respected" has repercussions far beyond the romantic realm.

We need a term for when a writer frames the discussion in a way where all the implied assumptions form an unspoken Gish Gallop. Boogeyman blitzkrieg? Poltergeist premises?

While you mull that over, sit back and appreciate what Lindy has done here: she flew off into a neverland of subtle forms of murder, the appropriation of women's time, rape, and intrusive legislation all from looking at two guys talking to women in Starbucks.

I'm envisioning Lindy sitting in a corner booth, far from the sunlight, wearing a black beret and a scarf. She glares, nostrils flared, over the thick rims of her glasses and the top edge of her Mac toward a conversation. Having no experience with men herself, Lindy takes a sip from her white chocolate mocha (with pecans in it, for some reason) to calm her nerves. She then concocts a story about what the men and women must be feeling and what they intend to do.

But does she verify these claims by standing up, walking 10 paces, and asking questions?

Of course not. Lindy's the polite one who would never take up someone's time like that!

Now that Lindy is isolated from talking to strangers and therefore meeting new people ever again, she turns to a soulless editorial process that looks the other way while she accuses men of being anti-social and then takes an Olympic leap of reasoning to murder and rape that would make the Mad Hatter do a spit-take.

> Michael Mark Cohen has a cleverly articulated essay on Gawker this week in which he declares "douchebag" the only effective signifier for a particular brand of toxic, entitled white male. […] Douchebag supremacy is built on a long history of getting away with as much as possible. […]

What the hell is douchebag supremacy, and why are you pretending that if it existed, humanity would tolerate it? And why are you citing Gawker? If you care about job security, this is a really bad time to do that.

> […] a woman once threatened him with mace to get him to stop talking to her. That's how much it takes to stymie a douchebag's entitlement. He seemed to find it amusing. Typical female overreaction. But the truth is, he almost got a face full of poison. He almost didn't get away with it. And, some day, he won't.

Lindy, stop your retaliation fantasies for just a second and listen to a man's honest opinion for once in your miserable life.

Your paranoid, impish shrieks about clandestine malice are so shoddy and misdirected that you inadvertently wrote the screenplay for the next seven Paranormal Activity films. When you type words, the keyboard contracts Ebola and Jesus resurrects just to stick his head in a car compactor. Your article is a journalistic abortion. You are the anti-brain, sucking hope and reason out of the room and leaving interesting people to choke and die in the vacuum of utopian social justice memes.

Don't take my dislike for everything you stand for to be bullying or harassment because it's neither. I simply reject your bigoted worldview, and I think you should be ashamed for willfully ignoring common sense in the name of your dumb ideology.

If I happen to see you in a Starbucks, relax, I won't talk to you. I'll talk to a woman reading a book instead. Reading indicates to me that she takes in information instead of spewing bile into her laptop in a dark corner, which is a good first impression for a potential new friend.

Have a wonderful day. Try not to mace the next guy asking you for directions to the nearest gas station.

How I made David Futrelle cry and ragequit on Twitter

Patrick John Doran (aka TheMadShangi) · 24 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I had a very interesting exchange with David Futrelle on Twitter the other night. Futrelle, of course, is the mastermind behind WeHuntedTheMammoth.com (formerly Manboobz). By "mastermind," I actually mean "mentally retarded person," of course. This gluttonous windbag likes to keep tabs on the manosphere and all those who dare criticize the sacred cow that is feminism. He documents what he perceives to be "misogyny" and is even kind enough to issue a "trigger warning" disclaimer for the easily offended (wimps). Now, readers of AVfM will be familiar with Futrelle's intellectually dishonest tactics. Time and time again, he has been exposed for outright lies and passive-aggressive behaviour through his blog. Many times he has falsely accused Paul Elam and AVfM of promoting violence against women.

This exchange on Twitter started over Futrelle's recent post about Janet Bloomfield posting a screenshot from what appeared to have been taken from Anita Sarkeesian's Twitter feed but was actually a doctored image taken from a Facebook paged called "Crazy Feminist Quotes." Cue the soapbox grandstanding and hilarious accusations of "spreading libel." While Futrelle was coming at Janet Bloomfield on Twitter, I had stepped in to remind him that he is one to talk, since misrepresenting what other people say seems to be a common practice for him. Cue the demands for a citation. That's when I countered with, "Where are your citations when you claim AVFM promotes violence against women?"

> @MadShangi @JudgyBitch1 AVFM uses violent rhetoric; they hosted a terrorist menifesto on their site. But they always avoid explicitly

My response:

> @DavidFutrelle @JudgyBitch1 Um, that wasn't a citation, buddy. Try again?

People, what followed next was pure gold. To support the claims he's made on his blog, guess what he started citing as a reference. That's right, his very own goddamn blog.

> David Futrelle@DavidFutrelle
> @MadShangi @JudgyBitch1 See these posts for starters. http://wehuntedthemammoth.com/2013/10/18/paul-elam-of-a-voice-for-men-in-his-own-words/ …http://wehuntedthemammoth.com/2013/02/12/with-courthouse-violence-on-the-rise-mens-rights-activists-continue-to-lionize-the-author-of-a-terrorist-manifesto-urging-men-to-burn-down-courthouses/ …

This exchange went on for a little while in this vein. I would challenge him to link directly to AVfM, and then he would respond by whining and linking to his own blog. Does this moron not see how absurd it is to use yourself as your own reference? This guy actually seemed to be afraid to link to the actual source, where he claims Paul Elam and AVfM had endorsed the use of violence against women.

> David Futrelle@DavidFutrelle
> @MadShangi@JudgyBitch1 MY POSTS LINK DIRECTLY TO AVFM. THE LINKS ARE ALL THERE.

> If you won't even bother to look, no point in discussing.

> Patrick John Doran @MadShangi Oct 6
> @DavidFutrelle@JudgyBitch1 Why is it that you have to use your own blog to support your own claim? You're pathetic!

Notice the use of RAGECAPS? He's getting frustrated for being expected to show some accountability. There's a very specific reason for him linking to his own blog, instead of linking to the actual source, which he claims promotes violence. You can't show the source in its original context because then he would not have control over how it's presented with his special brand of manipulation. But, I won't budge.

> David Futrelle@DavidFutrelle
> @MadShangi @JudgyBitch1 Look at what I gave you and your questions will be answered. Otherwise we are done here.

> Patrick John Doran @MadShangi Oct 6

@DavidFutrelle@JudgyBitch1 Your intellectual dishonesty has just been exposed for all of Twitter to see.

Patrick John Doran @MadShangi Oct 6
@DavidFutrelle@JudgyBitch1 Your "evidence" for AVFM promoting violence was a satirical response to a Jezebel article promoting violence.

Grumpy Old Man @xGrumpyOldManx Oct 6
@DavidFutrelle It means a great deal to you to believe Paul endorses DV? Unfortunately we all can read too. @MadShangi@JudgyBitch1

So, what have we learned from David Futrelle? Well, apparently, if beating a dead horse doesn't work the first thousand times, beat it some more. The very same article that Futrelle cites as an example of Paul Elam's endorsement of violence had already been clarified by the author himself. Even when it is explicitly stated, "Am I being serious? No," Futrelle still has the nerve to try to rehash the same song-and-dance routine over and over, using every dishonest tactic in the book with every step. Even Futrelle admits that AVfM never explicitly endorses violence, yet they somehow do it subliminally in a super-secret code that can be perceived or understood only by Futrelle. What a pile of bullshit.

AVFM · 25 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Good evening Mr. Elam,

As the original registrant of whiteribbon.org, I would like to express my thanks that your crew at AVFM have done such a great job of putting this website together, and I'm confident that this resource will help many men, women and children find the balance in their lives that is sorely missing when situations of domestic violence occur.

As you know, since I originally publicly announced that the domain whiteribbon.org was available in the comments of this AVFM article in 2012 http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/activism/pankhurst-white-feather-day/, (8th or 9th comment maybe) the only organization that expressed interest in acquiring the url was A Voice For Men. Despite being offered as a resource on AVFM, a website that garners over 20,000 hits a day and is scrutinized heavily by all manner of people, despite the domain garnering over 16,000 hits in the (almost) two years I owned it (without any promotion whatsoever, I merely redirected the domain), not a single other organization or individual came forward and expressed any interest in owning this domain or helping me create a resource that could help people who suffer from domestic violence.

My contact information was available to the public, yet nary a peep from anyone other than AVFM. No other organization or person seemed to care enough, which does not speak highly of their commitment to promoting white ribbon. It was no secret that I owned this URL. It also does not speak well of the competence of other organizations that centre on white ribbons that this domain was available in 2012. Shoddy at best.

Since the white ribbon is a powerful symbol, used by many diverse causes around the world, from the Quebec Peace Movement to the Russian protests earlier this decade, one would think that this domain would have attracted some interest from other organizations than just AVFM. Dot-Org domains are highly valued.

I really do appreciate the fact that in our subsequent conversations you never once brought up the fact that I owned this domain, nor ever tried to influence me one way or another to do anything with it, even when we spoke personally in Detroit despite the fact that AVFM obviously wanted this domain to publicise issues of domestic violence without a feminist filter. I am thankful to you for allowing me to make up my own mind with what I wanted to do with this domain.

It was a difficult decision to hand this domain over to AVFM since there are other organizations that are involved with domestic violence issues that use a white ribbon as a symbol, so it's not a decision I made lightly. I was convinced by two factors. AVFM has an incredible array of advisors on domestic violence issues, most notably Erin Pizzey and Senator Anne Cools, the two women who were instrumental in starting shelters for battered women in the U.K. and Canada respectively.

The breadth and depth of those two women's experience and the incredibly impassioned talks that they gave at the International Conference on Men's Issues in Detroit impressed me very much. I'm very confident that AVFM's approach to domestic violence is the correct way forward.

The second factor is a little darker, I have included 3 screenshots of my twitter account to help explain. It is a twitter conversation that I had with White Ribbon Canada in which they lied to me. Not just a lie, but they lied to discredit another Canadian charity, the Canadian Association for Equality. I ask you Mr. Elam, what kind of organization deliberately creates a falsehood to discredit another? Is this the ethos of whiteribbon.ca? As you can see, White Ribbon blatantly changed the wording in a blog post by CAFE member Adam McPhee to change the meaning of what he was saying.

They then used this altered meaning to try to establish "misogyny" in the blog post. You can read his original blog post here:http://eyeofwoden.wordpress.com/2014/06/02/a-conversation-with-men-is-needed/ This is highly discreditable conduct for any charitable organization, never mind one that purportedly helps solving social issues.

The Canadian Association for Equality is a government approved charity that has raised enough funding to establish the Canadian Centre for Men and Families. The Canadian Centre for Men and Families, although in its infancy has already established programs that help men and boys in Toronto. It's an incredible breach of ethics to libel another charity in the manner that they did.

Why was White Ribbon Canada so invested in discrediting CAFE at the time, especially in light of the fact that they seem to be reaching out to CAFE now and inviting CAFE members to their events now that the wind seems to be changing a bit? It occured to me that whiteribbon.ca lacked the maturity to deal with the serious matter of domestic violence properly.

My further investigation into whiteribbon Canada revealed a disturbing pattern of an organization that is run by people who merely want to ingratiate themselves to the "Social Justice Warrior" type of people. In fact, my twitter conversation with whiteribbon was accidental, prompted only by their anxiety to rush into the defence of Steph Guthrie http://fullcomment.nationalpost.com/2014/07/23/christie-blatchford-the-twitter-trial-of-gregory-elliott-is-becoming-much-like-twitter-itself-shrill-and-uber-sensitive/, .

This is the mentality of the people who direct the whiteribbon.ca campaign. This is the gravitas of people who are in charge of the white ribbon name, people who don't seem to be able to handle the realities of life and treat existence as an extension of high school. Immature people who are willing to say and do anything because they believe that the end justifies the means despite their own laughable lack of life experience, people who think that they should be able to direct how others should live. Believe me, I'd rather listen to Senator Anne Cools talk about life than Steph Guthrie or any other of those vacuous twits.

Anyhow, Mr. Elam, thanks once again for your patience and allowing me to make up my own mind about what I should do with this valuable domain. I know I have made the right choice. Nobody else seemed to care enough to even contact me, but AVFM's dedication to ending the scourge of domestic violence in a forthright and mature manner made the decision a no-brainer.

Yours Truly,
Malcolm Johnston

[Editor's addition/clarlification] Related to image number 1 and the assertion that White Ribbon Canada had purposefully altered the intent and content of Adam McPhee's statement, we have the following, which is what McPhee actually said on his blog:

> "Telling men to do nothing but listen to women is precisely the kind of conversation we do not need, nor is it a conversation at all, but it is precisely what we are being told to do."

The rep from White Ribbon Canada used the following to quote McPhee:

> "listen(ing) to women is precisely the kind of conversation we do not need".

It's an outrageous change in context, never mind actually altering the quote itself.

Sage Gerard debates Brian Clyne

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 25 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Brian Clyne of KSU Atheists United (AU) challenged me to a debate on the topic "Did Feminism Get it Wrong?" Clyne initially stipulated that I was responsible for preparations. My response was simply that I, the challenged party, was not liable for debate preparations just because I had accepted the invitation. We agreed on terms, some of which were documented on OwlLife (link is to a PDF snapshot of a public page). However, the terms that were published differ from the terms agreed upon in email conversations, which is a problem.

The debate was advertised as Socratic, although it did not seem to follow any national standards. There was not meant to be a winner or loser in the debate, just competing ideas thrown out into the fray.

Here is the complete, unedited footage that came directly off the SD card of the AU camera.

(NOTE: Due to the camera's way of recording footage, the audio runs on only the left stereo channel. My apologies to headphone users for that annoyance. Try using the instructions located here and here to force mono output to fix the issue for yourself, since re-uploading takes half a day for me.)

To Clyne's credit, he defended the choice of Dean of Student Success Dr. Michael Sanseviro as a moderator when a feminist pressured him to hire someone else. In addition, the footage shown above was recorded by an AU member, and it was provided to me by Clyne for publication. My thanks go out for the efforts put forth by AU in preparing this event.

However, there are neutrality concerns and factual errors. Everything I mention below can be observed in the above video and checked against the terms to which I have linked.

The terms emailed between parties stated that we could have a 1-on-1 or 2-on-2 debate. If in the case of a 2-on-2 debate one team member does not show, the remaining team member can opt to debate one person on the other team or both of them at the same time.

Moderator Request Inbox x

Brian Neal Clyne Sep 30

to [redacted]

Dear Professor [redacted]

Sage, the President of Men's Rights, has agreed to debate me on the topic: "Did Feminism Get It Wrong?" Both of us will also have a debating partner.

Sage and I have agreed on the following terms:

That if the partner does not show, the person without a partner may elect to debate both of the other people, or just one person from the opposing side; the choice of who will debate in opposition, if the sole debater wishes to debate only one person, is the choice of the opposing side.

Excerpt from email.
(Note: AU calls me "the President of Men's Rights" in several places and I have no idea why.)

Notice that the terms documented online do not include what was shown in the email, nor was I informed that such information would be omitted. The debate terms were modified due to our negotiations, which is fine, but note that I asked for 1-on-1 when my desired partner would not show, and Clyne agreed and made that known to our moderator.

But when I arrived at the venue, Clyne's partner sat onstage. Clyne cast her as an audience member who was allowed to ask questions during the Q&A, but she still sat on the stage and not among the audience. Every question she had was directed at me, and Clyne claimed that she should be the first to ask questions before any other audience member.

I did not object because what difference would it make? If I questioned her role as an audience member with a conflict of interest because of her pre-existing knowledge of Clyne's position, then Clyne could just point to the other AU members in the audience and say that since they were entitled to ask questions, she could too.

Clyne said he would do a 1-on-1 but then set up a 2-on-1 that he could call a 1-on-1 when questioned. This could also open an opportunity to paint me as if I have trouble with having a woman onstage. I saw how that would play out, so letting the unfair situation stand seemed to be the prudent option.

There was also equivocation on terms regarding opening statements. When Clyne made his opening statement, notice that it was not just an opening statement. The 15-minute maximum speech included several attempted rebuttals. In debate term negotiations, Clyne repeatedly made mention of "opening statements" in emails, as if to say that he and I would make opening statements about our positions. However, the terms call Clyne's opener a "Response." The terms make mention of rebuttals as if to suggest there is equal time and that all rebuttals would be made during the rebuttal period. But that is not how it played out. Without making this explicit to me, Clyne allowed himself up to 25 minutes of rebuttals while I had to live with 10 minutes, based on an ambiguity in language that contradicts the tone of the terms.

I objected when, during rebuttals, Clyne asked leading questions suggesting that I meant to intimidate women on campus and record them without permission. The questions were so loaded that I called "red herring," and Clyne then insinuated that I was dodging questions.

How is interrogating me onstage about alleged personal misconduct with loaded questions relevant to the topic?

I asked Clyne why he felt a need to reframe the issue.

He (not the timekeeper) told me that I went over my time and that he was not obliged to answer my question.

So, Clyne's partner was allowed to participate with priority questioning with pre-existing knowledge of Clyne's position. The time allocation was slanted. Clyne attempted to use loaded questions and a time discrepancy together to facilitate an off-topic character attack.

The moderator, Dr. Sanseviro, never intervened. From what I know of Sanseviro, it did not appear to be because of bias so much as it was not picking up on the manipulation (Sanseviro is actually a really cool guy).

The deck was stacked to make me look like a monster. AU may have done some things right, but that does not excuse manipulative tactics.

KSU Student Media will be covering the debate next week, but I suspect that what I mention here will not make the papers.

The last day to RSVP for Male Students in Peril is Sunday, October 26. If you want to place your feet on campus and speak out against the forces that be, it's now or never. This is your chance to provide a much deserved "fuck you" to those who prevent honest discourse and to secure your place in history as one of the people freed from feminist tyranny.

People are talking, and KSU is dividing. Men's Rights Activists are starting to emerge on campus, but they need one last push to be open and proud. That push is meeting more people like you to know that they aren't alone. RSVP, and be there in the name of free speech, liberty, equity, justice, and honor.

In His Own Words: Married to a borderline

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 25 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 25 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month for Men and Boys, the invisible victims of domestic violence. Have you ever wondered why we view men's violence as criminal behavior and women's violence as mental illness? Have you ever considered the ramifications of doing so?

Male abusers are seen as bad men that women and children would do well to avoid. Female abusers are seen as "troubled," and in need of our compassion and help. Female abuse victims are told to end their relationship with their male abusers. Male abuse victims are often told they need to learn how not to trigger their female abuser and be more sensitive, understanding and accepting of her feelings. Male abusers often go to jail. Female abusers typically go to counseling.

This is especially evident in the way a large percentage of the mental health field approaches women with Borderline Personality Disorder and their victims, which often include the spouses/partners and children of the BPD. It is one of the worst double standards in the mental health profession. These therapists are culpable for enabling domestic violence and child abuse.

I suspect many men who fit the classic male batterer/emotional abuser archetype likely have borderline, narcissistic and/or sociopathic traits, just like their female abuser counterparts. Yet, the mental health field has compassion for disordered female abusers and treats disordered male abusers as criminals. Benevolent sexism?

It's time to hold female abusers to the same standards of accountability, including pressing criminal charges when indicated, to which we hold male abusers regardless of how shitty their childhoods may have been and/or their mental health diagnoses. A personality disorder may explain a woman's abusive behaviors. It does not excuse them.

Today's In His Own Words is written by "MarriedtoaBPD," a man I know via my work on Shrink4Men. His wife received a sort of BPD diagnosis from a former therapist. She rejected the diagnosis, fired the therapist and has kept on with her denial, borderline rage and abuse of her husband, her children and his children from a previous marriage. MarriedtoaBPD began an anonymous blog to journal the severe emotional abuse he experiences regularly from his BPD wife. He has given me permission to share his story in order to help raise awareness for male victims of domestic violence.

Married to a Borderline
What you are about to read is the first time I have had anyone look at this blog. I have to admit I'm scared. I'm scared my wife is going to find this and rage on me. I'm scared because I have to lie to her and tell her I don't think she is borderline when we fight because she will go apeshit on me.

I'm mad at myself because I can't be honest with her about this. I'm scared because her family knows she is a 'little crazy,' but thinks I'm the best thing that's ever happened to her. I'm scared that if we divorce that everyone that knows her as the nice, earthy, vegan, holistic mom will think I'm a major screw, an ass and a cheater.

But mostly, I'm scared for her daughters she brought into the relationship two years ago when we married. They're 7 and 9 now and they aren't doing well. How can you when your mom yells at you, 'I don't have any time for myself and it's your fault! Why are you doing this to me? Why are you stealing my life?!'

My eldest child graduated from high school this past summer. My second child will graduate in early June 2014. I plan to divorce then if things don't change. I have mixed feelings about leaving because I don't want her girls to turn out like their mom, with abandonment issues about men. It's like I'm watching a runaway train careening toward the slope of puberty where it will most assuredly become a fireball of a wreck, destroying anything in its path.

I am also mad at myself for being deceitful, that, as much as I need to write and share this with other men, I am hiding and keeping secrets from her. During her borderline rages, she accuses me of keeping secrets and being a liar. I insist over and over again that I'm not keeping secrets. In reality, I am keeping secrets and I am a liar, because she doesn't know that I am in individual therapy, or publishing anything.

So having said that, I seal my fate to eventually being outed. Welcome to my world.

10/18/2013. I'm sitting here with my headphones on, being called a 'prickless little man' by my wife. This is so frustrating.Her daughter was slamming a door because because they were fighting. Wife said she was going to take the door off its hinges. I asked what I could do to help.

In the ensuing conversation that led up to our fight, I said, 'Sometimes it feels like the whole world is off-kilter.'

I went to the bedroom to work on some stuff and she followed. She asked why I was crying about a little girl being angry. Things started to escalate in a tone that I've become accustomed to. I felt like something bad was coming and said, 'This is not what we are supposed to talk about this week.' She continued to rant about me and the girls. I said the safe word the therapist gave us, 'Prism.'

She got angry, came over and started insisting that I argue with her or have what I call a high-conflict engagement. I said I did not want to talk and asked her to step away. She would not leave my space on my side of the room. I said I did not want to talk again and she said I was a prickless little man and needed to stop running and hiding.

I told her I wanted to go to my private place. She continued to stand over my shoulder, insisting that I talk to her. She said that me listening to headphones and trying to disengage was making her angry and I was responsible for it. I put the headphones on and was told I was not allowed to do that.

I said I wanted to journal. She stood over my shoulder and tried to read what I was typing. I asked her to step away. I had the headphones on and had not found a song on Spottily yet, so I could hear her. She kept saying, 'I know you can hear me. Why don't you act like a man and talk to me?!'

I kept asking her, 'Step away please.' I said this five times. She would not leave my area, so I finally lowered the lid on my laptop and turned to face the wall once the music started. I listened to a song or two and then looked over my shoulder to see she had left the room. I took the laptop off the desk and turned so the screen could not be seen from the room and continued to journal.

She went down the hallway to check on the girls. She came back a few minutes later saying about her daughter, 'I can't even believe it's impossible for me to touch a toothbrush without her freaking out. I can't deal with this fucking disease or a person who fucking can't get over it,' and walked back out.

After a few moments, she came back into the room and started folding laundry. She said something like, 'Why are you messing around, you know this is over, so you should just leave. You can't stand us.' I can't remember it exactly because I was starting to get angry. I had removed my headphones when I saw she was not in the room and put them back on. She crossed around the foot of the bed and attempted to get a sideways glance at my computer screen. She stood on my side of the room and asked/accused, 'Oh what lies are you writing about me now?'

I decided I wanted to leave the room. I unplugged my laptop, got up and walked to the door. She blocked my way again, 'again' as in she's tried to block my egress many times before. I asked, 'Please move.'

She did not move.

I asked again, 'Please move, I would like to leave.' She insisted that she didn't have to move until I answered her questions. I asked again, for the third time, and was told I had no right to leave until she got what she needed.

I held up my right hand and started to count on my fingers how many times I was asking to leave the room. I made sure not to touch her or shove past her. I continued to ask to leave and when I got to six, I started over on the same hand. She continued to block me from leaving the room.

When I got to eight, she reached up, grabbed my hand and closed my fingers. I said, 'I want you to stop touching me and I want to leave the room.' I continued to say these two things as I counted on my right hand.

She taunted me, wanting to know why I was counting. I replied that I was counting so I could accurately journal how many times I had asked to leave the room and was being blocked.

She said the time to journal was when I was at work and this was not the time for it. When I got to the twelfth time I said, 'I have asked a dozen times to leave my room and you are preventing me from moving freely and this is a right I have.' She replied, 'Oh I see how it is. Well you might as well start packing,' and she finally stepped aside.

I went to the front room, sat down with my laptop and started to journal again. She followed and stood by the front door, trying to get a sideways glance of my screen again. I stood up again with my laptop and walked downstairs, so I could be alone and type. After a while, she sent me a text message. It contained a picture of a Maggie Smith quote which said, 'Speak your mind, even if it makes your voice tremble.' I replied, 'When we have had the next session and our therapist says it's time, then we can discuss. Until then, I am going to journal what is happening. Please do not text or message me. I would like some privacy please.' She sent me three more messages:

'You understood her wrong.'

'If you would like a separation for a week to get away from my amazing children and I, go right ahead! That's the only way this will work for you.'

'Pack it up!'

Then, I was on Facebook trying to coordinate a deal for an engine and she sent a message on Facebook:

'Hmm, you've ben on here a long time.'

'Someone more interesting than me?'

10/23/2013. So right after our last couples therapy session, my wife sent me a text saying, 'That was pretty slick.'

I replied, 'What was slick?'

During the counseling session, the counselor asked point blank about any history of diagnosis with mental health issues. Two marriage counselors ago, we had a counselor ask if she had ever been diagnosed with Borderline Personality Disorder. My wife went into a rage about that and to this day calls that woman a quack and someone who shouldn't have a license.

I decided to drive around and think about things. She called. I took a few minutes to ready myself, then I called back.

*Note. This is pretty overwhelming, I'm going to take a break and journal some more later.

As an aside, I last journaled at lunch. More has happened since this afternoon and I had to leave the house this evening. I'm typing this at a Starbucks nearby.

So when I called her back, I was surprised to find out something odd. She said, 'So I have one question to ask and I want an honest answer. Did you talk to the counselor without me there? Have you been in communication with her?'

I replied that I hadn't and would not do that. What she said next was no surprise because this is the siren call of my wife's BPD.

'I know you're lying and I can tell you have talked to her because of what she asked in counseling today.'

Absolutely, unequivocally, as soon as the words, 'I can tell…' have been uttered, I know I'm in for a ride on the roller coaster of emotional insanity. What is even more bizarre is the twisting that happened around the stuff our counselor told us to do.

After last week's episode where I was prevented from leaving the bedroom, the counselor flat out told her she needs to stop preventing me from leaving. I was glad for this because it's a small step in the right direction. The counselor told her the things she was doing would be considered abusive. This was great also.

Right now at Starbucks, she's constantly texting and calling trying to get me to come back to the house. It's very frustrating because she was told to leave me alone when I want space and for me to leave the house if things were feeling confrontational. I'm told I'm being 'vicious' right now because I said I would be home when I was done instead of coming right home when she told me to.

She is insisting I come home under the guise that I have a cold and she 'wants to take care of me.' I'm not sure how this will continue to roll on, but I've just got to be strong and ignore these rants. The only way they are eventually going to stop is if they no longer create a reaction in me.

So to back up a little bit, the reason I'm down here is that she told me the counselor said we need to be separated for two weeks. What the counselor said was that we need to separate the conflict from our relationship.

In a previous session, we also decided on a safe word to use when things got out of hand. I used that word just now in a text message response to her accusing me of being vicious because I asked her to stop. I used the word and she isn't stopping. Now she is going on about how her shoulder is messed up and she needs to go to the chiropractor and get taken care of and why won't I take care of her. Interesting turn from the ploy of trying to get me to come home to take care of me.

Ah yes, here they come, the staples in any borderline's text routine, multiple question marks "???"

Now she's calling again, but I have to honor the safe word from counseling and not break the communication or give in to the urge for her to suck me into conflict or a manufactured emergency.

In His Own Words is a joint effort between Shrink4Men and AVoiceForMen to help raise awareness about the invisible victims of domestic violence, men. If you would like to submit your story, please follow the guidelines at the end of this ar ticle.

Jill Filipovic of COSMO works at the speed of light!

Paul Elam · 25 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Here is how AVfM works. We say and do a lot of provocative things in order to force an examination of the state of men and boys, and we do so in this fashion because the world has demonstrated a consistent history of listening to nothing else.

Of course, there is a price to be paid for that. When people are cornered into paying attention to what you are doing, they find it much easier to take a dim view of your actions. Given that and the synergy with their ideology, bad reviews are a given.

So are lies.

So are disgusting, filthy half-truths, distortions, and the aggressively ignorant avoidance of facts, such as we have seen from the likes of Jessica Roy, Adam Serwer, and a slew of other hacks currently jaundicing a profession once called "journalism."

The only thing different today than yesterday is that we get to add another name to the list of known scumbuckets infesting the mainstream media.

We now welcome Jill Filipovic of Cosmopolitan magazine to the ever-growing circus of fools with press passes and the equivalent of a fourth-grade education. You will find her article here, if you are able to see it in spite of all the "how to make your butt rounder" ads.

I was interviewed by Filipovic the day after WhiteRibbon.org was launched, and the article based on our "interview" was published the day after that. Clearly, Filipovic accomplished a great deal of research in that short bit of time! Or she had made up her mind about what she was going to write, grabbed every negative soundbite she could from places like MammothBoobz, asked me a bunch of bullshit questions, and then started the final edit of her article.

My vote is the latter.

I know you are shocked to hear this, especially about such an esteemed publication as Cosmo, but there is a silver lining. From headline to closing paragraph, Filipovic has given us another irrefutable example of ideological corruption in the media, and a few chuckles as well.

Enough of this. Let's get started. The beginning will do, as in the headline:

> Why Is an Anti-Feminist Website Impersonating a Domestic Violence Organization?

There is enough, in that headline alone, to write a feature review, but I will stick with the basics.

The libelous inference of me and my organization being involved in an ongoing fraud is the most pathetic kind of sour grapes. It is not really damaging to anyone here, as the rest of this article will reveal, but the short of it is that it is just a flatly fraudulent claim.

And I am sorry, but "impersonating" a domestic violence organization? The fuck you say?

One of the most integral and indispensable elements of social change is the dissemination of information to the public. Right now, AVfM, while wildly out-spent, out-manned, and out-gunned by the opposition, has taken a serious bite out of your ass on a shoestring budget and a fortress full of incredibly talented and dedicated people.

Fostering awareness IS activism, Cupcake. I also have to point out that I am writing this article now because Filipovic was using her position as a "so-called" journalist to carry out an activist mission.

Again, fostering awareness IS activism. When people ask what we are actually doing about the problems faced by men and boys, my answer falls along the lines of another question: Don't you think that making sure people even know men and boys have unaddressed problems might make it more possible for people to actually "do" things?

That usually inspires a desire to talk about something else.

That is a good thing, as I love the chance to inform people, even those with selective hearing, that AVfM is an anti-domestic violence, activist website and so is WhiteRibbon.org. And I have more "don't give a fucks" in the garage for anyone who says otherwise. In fact, I had an MHRA email me today after reading the Cosmo piece to let me know he would clear out his garage and park on the street if I needed extra room for my "don't give a fuck" supply.

Wow, all that just from the headline. Well, not totally. There is the subhead.

> So-called "men's rights activists" are trying to make money off one of the world's most prominent anti-violence advocates.

I really had to resist finding one of those animated gifs that shows someone pounding their head bloody against a wall, over and over. I won't even dwell on the psychotic suggestion that any Cosmo writer (or editor) is justified in calling members of the largest men's rights initiative in the Western world "so-called."

That is not creative headlining. That is a deliberate and calculated lie used to mislead their audience. Either that or the good folks at Cosmo are just unable to wrap their consumerism-addled minds around the fact that there is a men's rights movement – one they are now publishing about, for fuck's sake.

When it comes to "world's most prominent anti-violence advocates" in the field? Says who? This is a question I will need to look at, though. I am very fortunate to have at my disposal any one of many highly esteemed and widely recognized experts on intimate partner violence, a handful of whom are already published on WhiteRibbon.org.

Perhaps the opinion of the woman who started the battered women's shelter movement in the UK in 1971 would count? How about a former member of the board of directors for the National Organization for Women? How about the first Black female to become a senator in North America and the founder of the women's shelter movement in Canada? How about clinical psychologists, psychotherapists, and academicians from across the Western world who have specialized in these problems and decided to stand with us and support our mission?

One has to wonder just what is their point here? Are they saying that their German scientists are better than our German scientists?

Lastly, I would like Cosmo (and any white ribbon group) to produce proof of two things. One, that I do not have an explicitly legal right to do precisely what I am doing, and TWO, if we do a background check (and we will) of your alleged experts, will we find a heavy ideological leaning that our long-time experience assures us will result in irrational bias?

In fact, I won't need to lift a finger about that. I am betting that within 24 hours some MHRA will compile the profiles and send them to me, just so we can prove our powers at predicting the future.

Most of the rest of the article was standard fare: a few Google queries for quotes going back a few years; typical Manboobz material.

There was one interesting point she made near the end, regarding the legal aspects of this case:

> Whether the real White Ribbon Campaign actually has a legal claim against the misogynist copycat site remains unclear; according to several lawyers Cosmopolitan.com spoke with, a trademark claim may be a possibility but poses a series of legal hurdles.

Legal hurdles? Oh yeah, in Texas we call that the fucking law. What they are saying is that a trademark claim is possible (which it is not because they don't have a trademark), but the pesky fucking law is in their way. So yeah,

Mr. Suit, you got yourself a hurdle there, but hey, maybe you can lobby for the fix?

Just a few short fun facts. A clip from Wikipedia (with my apologies for linking to that often-ridiculous website):

> The white ribbon, a white-colored ribbon or representation of a white-colored ribbon, has several different meanings depending on the context. As with other color ribbons, is sometimes used by political movements to signify or spread their beliefs. In that context, it is usually worn on garments or represented in propaganda (posters, leaflets, etc.).
> The White Ribbon has been the badge of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union founded by Frances Willard since its founding in 1873.

Short story here: Feminist advocates do not own the term white ribbon. I have no more stolen from them than they stole from the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

So that is the question. Who owns white ribbon? Will the owner please step forward? Because the pearl-clutching and panic of yellow hacks and the issuance of "strong" statements from people who have the audacity to step up and say they actually own the right to force me off my path are getting boring quick.

In the meantime, I do know one thing for sure. I do own WhiteRibbon.org. I am an anti-domestic violence activist, and I am going to use that domain in every legal way possible to truthfully spread the message about family violence.

The only thing we'd add is that Mike Cernovich is not a Men's Rights Activist either, in fact, he's written very negative things about MRAs. But we don't blame Sargon for missing that; it is nearly impossible to fully plumb the depths of the vapidity-and-dishonesty pool that is "comedian" Matt Binder.

By the way, you should probably subscribe to Sargon of Akkad.

What the mainstream press doesn't want you to know

Elijah Butler · 26 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Not too long ago, the mainstream media reported on #GamerGate. MSNBC, Huffington Post, The Washington Post, and The New York Times all said the exact same thing: #GamerGate is about misogyny and the harassment of women online. None of them talked about what #GamerGate is really about: the corruption of gaming journalism and how there is no separation between the journalists and the developers (and critics) they are reporting on. But the mainstream media will not report on it, and likely will never report on it for the same reason that the gaming press censored any discussion of the corruption in gaming media.

Yes, mainstream journalism is just as infected with feminist and social justice ideology as the gaming press is—even conservative media to a large extent. In this climate, only the politically correct narrative as dictated by social justice ideologues gets through. This is why when you search for the men's rights movement on Google, you'll only find one-sided hit pieces that portray the MRM as a misguided hate group. However, in this case, like the gaming press, they're using social justice as a shield. The mainstream press does not want you asking questions such as "If the gaming press is this corrupt, what about the mainstream press?" What the mainstream media does not want you to know is that they are absolutely no different from the gaming press.

Fox News is seen as a tool for the Republican Party. MSNBC is largely seen as a tool for the Democrats. General political journalism is little better. DC political journalists are in bed, often quite literally, with the politicians and newsmakers they report on. They all know one another and frequent the same social scenes at the very least—no different from gaming journalists (Mark Leibovich's This Town is a great source on this). In fact, the only source for political news I actually trust is C-SPAN because they just give it to you completely raw and unedited, but even there you occasionally have to take things with grains of salt.

But it goes beyond political journalism. Take business journalism as an example. The stock analysts who show up on business channels like CNBC are often paid shills for the stocks they recommend. We're led to believe these analysts are impartial when they are not. I do not listen to stock picks from the media, especially from big names like Jim Cramer, for this reason.

Furthermore, the news is often just press releases from businesses and special interest groups presented as news. For example, in her book The New Thought Police, Tammy Bruce describes how, as the L.A. National Organization for Women chapter president, she sent out press releases that were published verbatim, among other actions such as meeting with editorial boards and reporters to make sure the coverage fit her agenda. While the book came out over 10 years ago, these practices are obviously still going on now.

So the next time you hear from a mainstream source that #GamerGate is about misogyny, ask yourself what they are trying to hide and why. I am sure it would not be very hard to find secret email lists and collusion between journalists and their subjects. #NotYourShield has the right idea, but it needs to go beyond gaming journalism because it's not just that crowd who is doing it—it's all press now. That's the lesson of the latest round of #GamerGate articles. Social justice philosophy has infected just about all of journalism, and it's been that way forever. The press knows what they're purposely hiding from the public, and they need to be called on it. It's time we stand up and demand the press stop using women and minorities to shield their corrupt practice.

In His Own Words: Pretty little liar

It's day 26 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month 2014 for Men and Boys, the invisible victims of domestic violence. "Kenneth" had an abusive, borderline personality disordered stepmom.

Children with an abusive parent(s) are essentially groomed to tolerate and accept abuse. They are often told that the abuse they experience is their fault. This can create the faulty belief system that it is their job to "fix" and protect their abuser. It may also foster the equally faulty belief that if only they "do everything right," their abuser will finally see what a good person they are and stop the abuse.

This a recipe for disastrous, abusive adult relationships. Today's In His Own Words is an example of this.

> Pretty Little Liar
> I just ended a 6-month on again/off again relationship with a woman who I think fits the description of Borderline Personality Disorder. A lying, manipulative, crying, sniveling, deceptive and, above all, self-righteous human being.
> First off, I am no saint, okay. Second, until recently, I always believed that woman could never set out to intentionally be selfish and abusive (probably comes from being raised by a physically abusive BPD stepmother and henpecked dad), so excuse me for looking like a dumb ass for not leaving this witch sooner.
> I met her through work and, by all accounts, it seemed like the most normal relationship I ever had. We went for walks in the park, had coffee together and spent hours on the phone talking about everything. We both had very rough childhoods and shared that with each other. She seemed to really struggle with forgiveness and letting go of the past. I found that disturbing.
> She had a lot of hatred towards her mother and all her past boyfriends seemed to be bastards. Everyone was out to get her and the world never gave her a fair shake. These were warning bells, but I ignored them because I thought we shared something deep and meaningful. And, hey, I'll admit it, THE SEX WAS THE BEST I EVER HAD.
> Then the lies started. One night, after she knew she had my affections (we'd gotten a little physical by this point — kissing, touching, etc.), she confessed that she was seeing her friend's boyfriend. She said it was just sexual, nothing else. She also said she wasn't going to end her relationship with him, so I ended our relationship. I should've told her to go to hell, but I was trying to be open-minded. Once she knew I was hitting the high road, she ended it with this guy and that's when things got fun.
> Turns out the affair was was more than just sex. He was in love with her. She lied to me every step of the way about this guy. Long story short, it was a drama-filled 2 months, with her blowing hot and cold. I got blamed for everything.
> It was my fault she had a $400 utility bill. It was 14 degrees centigrade in her house. I asked her to turn the thermostat up to at least 18, so I could sleep. I only stayed over 6 times that month. It was my fault she gained ten extra pounds. She said her eating habits changed when she was with me — what a load of shit. I mention these things because they are ridiculous, but there is much more.
> The first meltdown was lovely. She screamed and yelled that she didn't have time to comb her hair and it was my fault. I ended up grabbing her hands to make her stop as she was tearing her hair out in the car with a pick comb. The next day was my birthday. She called me and seemed to sincerely apologize.
> She invited me over to her place for dinner and said she bought me gifts. I said something innocent that set off her pathological jealousy. She went off the deep end again, screaming and yelling. She made outlandish paranoid accusations, accusing me of lying and infidelity, and threatened to break up with me. I was not ready for that.

> Worst birthday ever.
> We broke up. I changed my telephone number and my work shifts (we're both tech support) and did everything to avoid her. I got blamed for going through her purse and for hacking her computer. I was starting to get scared because this was nuts. I found out later that she even went to my manager and accused me of doing these things.
> Here is where I am a dumb ass. Two months later, she wrote me out of the blue and gave me the affirmation that I so desperately wanted and needed. She acknowledged everything I had done for her and that I made her feel so good when we were together.
> I cried. I called her. The next day, we're back in bed together.
> Two weeks later, she started making more paranoid rantings. She accused me of being a lying, cheating bastard again. I was not a bastard to her. Everything I did for her and the way I treated her while we were together proved I'm not a liar and I'm not a cheater. She is the one who had the history of lying and cheating, which put her in no place to stand in judgement of me.
> Then her cat died. Guess whose fault it was. Go ahead, guess. If you guessed it was my fault, you're right! She said I stepped on the cat and caused it internal damage. In reality, I accidentally stepped on the cat's foot. She twisted it in to something else and I swear she honestly believed her version of events.
> She was going to show me, so she got an autopsy done on the cat. Turns out the cat died of cancer.
> By that point, I'd had enough and I ended it. I can't fit in all the other craziness I experienced with this woman, but one question begs to be asked.
> What the hell is wrong with me?
> I know there is something wrong because I chose to be with this nut. I chose to allow myself to get close to her and that is something I have to deal with. I am going to make an appointment to see a therapist this week. If I don't fix this, I know with my abusive childhood I will likely end up with another nutter down the road.

The BDSM origins of "Yes Means Yes"

"It's the first time together and I'm feeling kinda horny
Conventional methods of makin love kinda bore me
I wanna knock your block off, get my rocks off
Blow your socks off make sure your G spots soft"

"I'm gonna call you Big Daddy and scream your name Matter fact I can't wait for your candy rain"

"So what cha sayin, I get my swerve on, bring it live
Make it last forever, damn the kitty cat's tight"

"Mmm … daddy slow down your flow
Put it on me like G baby nice and slow
I need a rough neck nigga Mandingo in a sec
Who ain't afraid to pull my hair and spank me from the back"

"No doubt, I'm the playa that you're talkin about"

"But do you really think that you can work it out"

"I guarantee shorty it's real, baby stick it out Here comes the man of steel"

While the debate regarding California's "Yes Means Yes" law (henceforth referred to as YMY) rages on—something that, in my view, is definitely a good thing for reasons I should like to make clear in an upcoming essay—for this particular post I'd like to go a bit off the beaten path. You see, for me, I've always been interested in understanding the core ideological arguments driving any movement or, in this case, public policy move(s). YMY, in my view, draws its ideological "strength" from a sexual subculture that is a big hit with third-wave "sex positive" feminists.

What I'm about to put forward in this post is, at this juncture at least, mainly conjecture on my part; I have nothing in the way of hard and fast (pardon the pun), empirical, "smoking gun" proof—just a series of observations of the above-mentioned third-wavers over the past five years or so and my "connecting the dots" in terms of their actions over the past decade or so. If I happen to get this whole thing wrong, I will be more than happy to come back and indicate as such; by all means, correct me if I am wrong.

So, to my argument:

I argue that the current "Yes Means Yes" law—and attendant measures on the part of sex-positive, third-wave feminists to "redress grievances" in the arena of sexual politics in our time—draws its ideological "strength" from the BDSM (bondage & discipline/sadomasochism) sexual subculture.

I say this based on the fact that quite a few of the more prominent third-wavers—people like, for example, Jaclyn Friedman, Clarisse Thorn, Feminista Jones—have noted an expressed interest in, and advocacy of, key elements and aspects of BDSM culture as the way to address what they and their third-wave "sisters" see as problems or imbalances in the sexual arena between men and women. Indeed, they, and many a third-waver, will argue that a big problem is the "power imbalance" between men and women along these lines. Well, as it turns out, "power"—who has it, how it is to be used, and to what end—is a crucial feature of the BDSM subculture.

Moreover, the idea(s) of "enthusiastic consent" and its kissing cousin, "affirmative consent," all have direct links and ties to BDSM subculture in the form of "safewords" and the ongoing "checking in" with your partner (usually, the "sub," or submissive one) to see if she's okay and wishes to continue. Given the nature of the often extreme and sometimes even dangerous "play" in BDSM, these measures developed in that community as a way to keep subs—usually but not always women, I might add—safe.

The aforementioned feminists have all written quite a bit about the "public benefits" of cherry-picking from the BDSM subculture for an ostensible better sexual all-of-us—and in some ways, they do make a point. The elaborate rules and rituals that permeate the BDSM subculture, which definitely involves the active and ongoing seeking of consent of its largely submissive and female participants on the part of its largely dominant and male participants during a sexual encounter or session, is something that, in theory, everyone could benefit from. Of all the feminists mentioned, perhaps the most prolific in this regard would have to be Clarisse Thorn, whose writings on the topic culminated in a book in which she argues that the Pickup community could stand to learn a bit from the BDSM one, particularly along the lines of female consent.

However, there are a number of serious flaws and problems I personally see with this approach, if indeed my surmise is correct.

For one thing, we already have laws on the books that protect the private, intimate lives of American citizens—the freedom of association, of being protected from illegal searches and seizures, and, if one buys into the ideological arguments that brought about the Roe v. Wade decision, the "right to privacy" are notable examples—to say nothing about the legal procedures bearing on questions of rape and sexual assault, like presumption of innocence and the conducting of criminal investigations by highly trained and experienced law enforcement professionals. Secondarily, I, for one, have problems with the notion of attempting to take the practices of a small sliver of the American population and making it the template for public policy—not just because that shouldn't be the way that public policy should be made but for another, more practical reason:

Most people simply won't have the "stuff" to be built for the BDSM lifestyle.

As I've noted in a recent discussion at J4G on what has become to be known in Manospherian circles as "Marriage 2.0″ (which encompasses relationships, dating, and so forth), a major "bug" in progressive thought in our time is the idea that "everyone" has the ability, interest, and resources to craft a "do-it-yourself" life script that is rich with high-abstract concepts and ideals—and this just isn't the case for the vast majority of Americans. Most Americans, male or female, aren't high-level negotiators or don't have strong communication skills that would involve the kinds of "active listening" and give-and-take exchanges that Marriage 2.0, etc., would demand. Perhaps most especially, as it pertains to today's discussion, most people—men and women alike—simply don't have the kind of sexual skill and experience to compete with the average American's "time of self-discovery"—a process that can take more than a decade between after leaving high school or college and meeting "the one," during which time they are more than likely to encounter at least a few lovers along the way, and with which their intended will (inevitably) be measured against. (It should be noted that this "time of discovery" is even longer for Black Americans—and look at the results.) Indeed, on this score, evidence abounds throughout the Internet of just how much pressure both sexes feel to "perform up to par" to their partner's "previous"—and the angst is palpable, again, on both sides. The conceit that everyone wants to, and is able to, achieve this Utopian mating ideal is just that—a conceit.

During that same discussion, I and J4G brother Ciaran noted something else that, ironically enough, is a strong parallel to today's discourse, this time involving Game/Pickup: the majority of men, for a number of reasons, simply will not be able to apply it. Some will outright refuse to learn it, due to what they consider to be thoughtful, ideological reasons, or sheer laziness—but others because they simply won't have the wherewithal to do so, despite their best efforts. Sure, we can quibble over the precise numbers in each camp, but in the end, it all comes out the same in the wash—the idea that "all" men can learn and implement Game/Pickup is a pipe dream, at best. And this is coming from someone who's written in favor of the topic extensively for years. Indeed, among "seduction insiders," it is well known and accepted that this is the case: most men will simply not "get it." Theoretically, it is possible; in practical terms, out on the bricks in real time, not so much.

Another big problem with using BDSM as an ideological template for YMY is the fact that most people "in the life" are solidly middle-aged(!), whereas most people living on or near the college campus are in their late teens and early 20s(!). This is hugely important because of the implications here—BDSMers, if I can phrase it that way, arrive to their understanding of themselves through a lifelong process of introspection, acceptance, and, yes, trial and error; can we really expect, and assume, people barely out of their teenage years to be possessed of the same kinds of introspection, awareness, and so forth?

Then there's the excellent point that RooshV brought up in his recent article on Social Justice Warriors: that many in their number are of the "alt sexuality" variety, of which BDSM is strongly represented, and that they wish to impose their notions of what constitutes "healthy" sexual mores and norms onto the society at large. Doing so will make them less "deviant." This is a very strong feature of third-wave feminism, and when one understands the female mating mind, one can see the method behind the madness; please share with me the following, from the powerful read "A Billion Wicked Thoughts":

> One of the more noticeable differences between male-targeted and female-targeted porn on the Web is the presence of political messages. On men's porn sites – including gay porn – there is a complete absence of any kind of explicit politics. The only exception is the rare imploration to support free speech. Though there are far, far fewer numbers of female-targeted porn sites, those that do exist contain a relative abundance of political messages. "We do what we can to support the activists who fight for the awareness of cultural appropriation," proclaims graphic porn site NoFauxxx, adding, "We follow an all-inclusive casting attitude: we do not take gender, size, race, or any other consideration into consideration when choosing our models." The Web site Crash Pad Series says the actress and director Shawn "can be found in front of the computer designing digital landscapes of desire as well as in front of the cameras sharing her passion for the 'personal is political' lifestyle." The East Van Porn Collective calls itself an "anarcho-feminist porn collective." Especially common are female-targeted adult sites promoting "empowerment" and "positivity", concepts men do not associate with erotica.
> Social psychologist Roy Baumeister suggest that women's greater sensitivity to cultural influences is rooted in brain mechanisms. "Women's sexuality appears to be more plastic than men's, relying on social framing and cultural conditions when making decisions regarding relationships. Men's sexuality seems more driven by simple physiological mechanisms." Keenly attuned to the cultural values and social rules, the Detective Agency asks: Which behaviors and relationships are celebrated – and which are frowned upon? What values should I endorse when it comes to sex and relationships? Women are sensitive to messages on magazines and television shows, even indirect messages, such as a model's body weight, the car a politician is driving, or a celebrity's views on mental health – subjects that elicit more online comments from women than men. Many more women than men report feeling social pressure on how to behave, dress, and look. Women are also much more likely to attribute sexual anxiety to social pressures.
> Women's cultural evaluation mechanisms appear to be especially concentrated in the middle prefrontal and inferior prefrontal cortex and the middle temporal cortex. These parts of the brain are social evaluation centers, considering what behaviors are appropriate and inappropriate in a given situation. They handle moral cognition (is this right or wrong?) and social judgment (what will other people think of me?).
> Cultural information helps Miss Marple play it safe. Who does society value more, doctors or software programmers? Can I get away with wearing a tattoo on my back or will people think it's a "tramp stamp"? Can I post photos on Facebook of me in a bathing suit or will guys think I look fat? Since women must always consider the long-term consequences of their sexual decisions, a woman's brain is designed to evaluate the particular cultural conditions in which she finds herself.
> (pp. 78-80)

Boom.

A final problem, for now at least, that I have with this notion of a BDSM-powered "Yes Means Yes" law is the idea of "importing" elements of the former into the latter, all the while ignoring the crucial contexts in which "affirmative consent" occurs in the first place. Ask anyone who is into BDSM and they will tell you that the idea of drunken, awkward, and oafish hookups is rare at least, alien at most. Committed relationships are in fact very much the norm in this lifestyle, which revolves tremendously around trust, communication, mutual respect, and comfort. Indeed, for many BDSM couples, their relationship deepened and got "kinkier" over the years they had been together—not over the course of a night or two. Even in the cases of professional dominatrixes, it is not at all unusual for them to have (largely if not exclusively male) submissive clients they've "been with" for years. Compare that with today's hookup scene on the college campus, where people who barely know each other sexually collide into one another. Women who self-identify as submissive, for example, have very good reason to be very discerning about who they partner with, and it isn't to their advantage in the least to get with someone in, say, a frat house party environment. In the BDSM culture, "first contact meetings" between largely submissive women and largely dominant men are, in fact, highly controlled, regimented, and codified—ALL for the safety and comfort of the sub women. Again, given the very nature of BDSM, this makes perfect sense. How "importing" elements of "consent" from such a tightly woven community and lifestyle into one which is, by definition, much more porous and transitory raises a heck of a lot of troubling questions for me.

In closing, I'd like to state for the record that I have nothing in the least against the BDSM sexual subculture—I am a strong believer in and advocate for freedom of expression, freedom of association, and the right to a private life.

But attempts on the part of third-wavers to make "the personal, political"— to take their freely chosen, private lifestyle choices and make them a matter of public policy that is then imposed on everyone else—IS something that deeply troubles me, for all the reasons I've indicated above.

And it should trouble you too—even if you're inclined to get down like that.

Raising free sons and their sisters

Recognizing a problem is only the first step; second is finding a solution. Across nations and demographics, men and boys are suffering and finding the support they need sadly lacking. That is the problem the Men's Human Rights Movement (MHRM) is working to resolve, and there are solutions already within our grasp. More fundamentally important, however, is changing the core fabric of behavior that has given rise to the problems faced by men. That will start with men embracing their human rights and casting off the shackles of expectations that for generations have driven them to self-destruction.

It is a frightening prospect, embracing a new and different future, and one that for many will have to begin in childhood. It is a parent's duty to prepare their children for adulthood, and now we have to begin raising our sons to believe in themselves as something more than a utility. It is a challenge every right-minded parent must face: how to raise your son free of the restraints of traditional gynocentric masculinity, proud of himself as a male and ready to live as an equal to all his peers. In other words, to raise him to naturally be the man every (male) MHRA strives to be.

At present, these traits, when adopted, serve as defense against society's misandry, ways for men to remain strong and confident under the pressure heaped upon them, but one day they will be the new normal when a healthier worldview of masculinity is at last entered into the mainstream. Until then, boys raised to be free and happy will serve as the vanguard, changing the boundaries of what is expected of men and of what men will tolerate being done to them.

Becoming capable of and able to raise free sons will be one of the core outcomes of the MHRM, but that alone will not achieve the equality so dearly hoped for. If nothing else changes, new generations of free men will have no recourse except to become Men Going Their Own Way. They will respect themselves, but if women and society do not, then they will find no comfort in joining that society. Stepping away will be the only sane option. Society, though, is the product of its members' beliefs, and raising sons to respect themselves is only half the battle. The greater challenge will be raising their sisters to support them. MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way) as social comment and protest is a vital part of the MRHM, and for many men it will be their lifelong path, but the final goal must be to get men to a place where they feel safe and empowered to have functional relationships and to build lasting families.

Doing so will require a new breed of woman. Our free sons need partners, and it is up to the parents of today to start raising them, women who love and respect men as human beings and take real responsibility for their actions and desires. A large part of parenting is instinct, and making conscious decisions about it is never easy, but in this case it is an even greater challenge. Much of the modern male-female dynamic is dictated by ancient, deeply ingrained beliefs and habits. These were often necessary for survival in bygone ages but are now obsolete. For many people this will mean raising their sons and daughters to act in ways they themselves do not.

In some ways the raising of a new generation of daughters will be more important to our sons than the raising of the sons themselves. Pending the creation of an artificial womb, women will continue to be the gatekeepers of reproduction by virtue of biology, so men will continue to conform, to varying degrees, to women's expectations in order to mate. It is those expectations that must be changed, or ideally removed altogether so men are free to live as they see fit and still find love and affection from, and not just for, the women around them.

There is a term popular among MGTOWs: NAWALT, meaning Not All Women Are Like That. Originally a strawman defense used by anti-MHRAs, the word NAWALT is now used by itself to refer to the hypothetical "good woman." In reality it is true that not all women are like that, but such status needs to leave the company of unicorns and leprechaun gold. It needs to become common, even normal, so new generations of self-actualized men will have partners to stand beside them. Just as if men had en masse resisted feminism, women have more than enough clout to staunchly stall the MHRM, but MGTOWs are making the statement that that won't be enough; men will drop out entirely rather than put up with any more of society's hatred. Eventually something will have to give.

The ball, then, is in women's court, but they don't need to be activists and they don't need to change themselves. Hell, the current generation (women and men alike) might be incapable of truly realizing equality, but in the future, in the next generation or the one after, girls can be raised to expect as much of themselves as of men and to truly be not like that. Men are ready to cast off their burdens, but they need to know there will still be love waiting for them when they do. If equality is to last, they need to know that if such burdens ever need to be carried again they won't be doing so alone this time. That's not the case now, but if the MHRM has any legacy, it will be the education of a generation where it is.

So raise your sons well. Mothers and fathers, raise your sons to be free and strong, and raise your daughters to love them for it.

In His Own Words: Conned by a female sociopath

It's day 28 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month 2014. "Beeker" shares his story about how his true love became his abuser.

Our eyes met across a crowded room. As trite as it sounds, that is how I met the woman who became my wife and my abuser… the Hungarian Horntail. The cafeteria was loud and boisterous. I was eating lunch and looking for one of my friends so when my eyes met with a woman who I did not know, it was fleeting. When our eyes met a second time, I was curious why.

We ran into each other frequently. She was energetic, bright, articulate, charming and handsome rather than pretty. She was slim, fit and muscular. I wasn't looking for a relationship; she said she wasn't either. Everyone around us relaxed by drinking alcoholic beverages; we had non-alcoholic coolers, juice or coffee. In retrospect, a great number of Horntail's positive aspects were reflections of me.

Looking back, I see the red flags. At the time, I thought some of her behaviours might be as a result of different social upbringing and context. The first red flag happened before we became a couple. Horntail seemed agitated. She kicked a concrete wall as we walked past. After she lashed out, Horntail was calm. I cannot recall what was bothering her just how she dealt with it.

Within a few weeks, our mutual buddies were asking us if we were a couple since we were together so often. When Horntail and I became a couple, things were amazing. When I first heard the expression "love-bombing" on the S4M forums, it resonated like a bell. The first two years were a blast.

Within six months of meeting Horntail, she moved in with me. As soon as she moved in, Horntail declared my apartment was unsuitable and started looking for a small house to purchase. Three months later, we bought a house together. In the space of four years, we were married and had two children.

Shortly after we bought the first house, Horntail offered to take over the budget. I didn't think much about it as it made sense to me to have one person balancing the books. She asked me to consult before making any major purchases. Noteworthy, at no point did she offer to consult me.

After the initial love-bombing period, our sexual relationship became infrequent at best. Horntail often claimed to be too tired or her medication reduced her sexual appetite or whatever excuse suited her fancy. Mind you, when Horntail was in the mood, I was expected to perform whether I was exhausted, sick or disinclined.

It would not be possible for me to create a comprehensive list of the abusive incidents and behaviours perpetrated by Horntail. Suffice to say, there were hundreds of incidents of varying severity and impact.

Initially, Horntail's pernicious behaviours appeared self-directed. Shortly after our first child was born, Horntail became bulimic. To my eyes, Horntail hadn't gained any weight after her pregnancy. I was distressed and asked Horntail to see a therapist. Looking back, I believe this was part of Horntail's campaign of shit-testing and grooming for me.

Horntail exercised compulsively. She was incapable of sitting still for more than a brief period. She frequently had sports-related injuries. She used to run more than 10 km (6 miles) daily. She ran with shin splits, with sprained ankles, with a broken bone in her foot (5th metatarsal from memory) and kept running until the ragged bone edge sawed through tendon, required surgery. She tore ligaments in her shoulders. Over the years, she had at least 14 different orthopedic surgeries; everything from both feet, both knees, carpal tunnel surgery on both wrists, reconstructive on both shoulders and both knees.

Horntail was never physically violent with me but her incidents became more frequent and destructive. I cannot count the number of angry outbursts (up to and including primal screaming), broken dishes, holes in the walls, erratic driving. For years I believed these incidents to be spontaneous. Now I'm not sure anymore.

Horntail had transient periods of bizarre behaviour. For example, for a while she dressed in ragged clothing and wandered the neighbourhood, picking up garbage as well as collecting bottles and cans to return for deposit.

Horntail was a prolific thief. She claimed she found things while running. I only caught her out once. She was examining her "prize" in the car after we left the store. I recognized it as something she'd looked at, but put back on the shelf in a store. I drove back to the store and told her to return the item or I would call the police. I watched as she returned the trinket. Horntail persuaded the clerk that the theft was as a result of poor impulse control due to her medication.

While Horntail might not have had a master plan, these incidents served to keep me attentive to her needs and maintained the pattern Horntail wanted. She made the messes and I cleaned up after her.

Horntail continued to see therapists from the first one in 1992 throughout the rest of our relationship. She changed therapists and she always had an explanation as to why. For instance (according to Horntail) one therapist felt she would benefit from seeing someone who specialized in eating disorders. Once that issue was (theoretically) addressed, she changed to another therapist who specialized in anxiety disorders. As soon as Horntail "fixed" one problem, another appeared.

Part of the reason for changing therapists was due to the fact we moved from city to city three times during the marriage. The final move to Ottawa was so Horntail could reconnect with her extended family. My hope was the extended support network would help Horntail's healing. Within two years, Horntail created a conflict with her mother so outrageous, her extended family all but withdrew contact.

After the death of Horntail's father in 1994, her mother and brother mismanaged the family business into bankruptcy and lost everything, even their homes. Horntail bought a condo for her mother in Ottawa. In 2008, we moved to Ottawa. In 2010, Horntail discovered her mother was financially leveraging the condo illegally (the apple didn't fall far from the tree) so she sold the condo, forcing her mother (then age 74) to move. I learned later Horntail's mother and brother pooled resources and offered to buy the condo, but Horntail refused.

The only time in our relationship I asked Horntail for help was in the weeks after my grandfather's death. I was feeling emotionally overwhelmed by grief and sorrow and was struggling to meet the demands of my job, Horntail and my kids. In tears, I spoke to Horntail. Rather than supporting me, Horntail ordered me to seek professional help. Within a few sessions, I was recovered sufficiently to cope.

I believed I could love Horntail to health. I thought if I accepted her aberrant behaviour without judgment; if I continued to act in a loving manner and raising the children to the best of my ability, eventually Horntail would learn and adopt healthy behaviors. This hope allowed me to see progress where none such existed.

I projected the pain of my neglectful childhood to provide this self-deluding context where Horntail was a victim who I could help. The reality? Horntail is a sociopath who took advantage whenever and wherever possible.

We started down the path to divorce through a miscalculation on Horntail's part. She used divorce threats as a motivational tool once too often. As a result of counseling, I was strong enough to call her bluff. After a couple days of mad scrambling, Horntail hoovered me back in but I established boundaries for the first time in our relationship. For a brief period, Horntail changed but, like all such changes, it didn't last. About a year later, in May 2012, I asked Horntail for a divorce.

Horntail agreed to divorce and suggested we use a single lawyer/mediator. I declined, saying I felt I needed a lawyer to represent my interests. So Horntail got a lawyer and we started to negotiate the legal separation agreement. Horntail wanted her lawyer to be the one who wrote up the agreement. I didn't have a problem with that, but that put Horntail in control of the process. She was in no rush since she was intent of hoovering me back in.

When Horntail realized I wasn't going to reconcile, her behaviour deteriorated. The end came in January 2013. I was washing dishes in the kitchen and Horntail was complaining about the legal costs of writing up the separation agreement. Our son (then 21) came down and asked Horntail why she refused to pay dependent support. Horntail began raging at our son about daring to question her about such matters. He retreated to his bedroom and slammed his door shut.

Horntail turned her rage onto me, claiming I fed such questions to our son and was teaching him to be dependent on others and to feel entitled to dominate women based on my bad example. Ironically, I continued washing the dishes for the meal I'd prepared as she raged. Then, from a distance of about 15 feet away, Horntail started to shriek, "Don't touch me! Don't touch me!" repeatedly.

I didn't recognize the ploy, but felt Horntail was losing control. To escape the situation, I headed to the door. Horntail blocked my path, still screaming. I went around her and grabbed my jacket. At the door, I leaned over to put on my boots. Horntail came up close, screaming in my face and preventing me from opening the door. I straightened up and fended her off.

Horntail did a perfect break fall backwards. She's been doing karate for more than 20 years and has black belts in two different styles so it's not surprising she knows how to fall properly. She bounced back to her feet and smiled at me. Then she said "Perfect. 9-1-1, I've been assaulted!" and grabbed the phone to call the police.

Our son had come out and watched the situation. He picked up a phone and told the police dispatcher what really happened. The police came, interviewed us all and asked Horntail to leave. That is the last time I saw Horntail.

Although I was deeply unhappy, unfulfilled and dissatisfied in the relationship, I did not see myself as abused until after several months of individual therapy. I was convinced this misery wasn't atypical of relationships. My upbringing made it clear that marriage was hard work and it was a husband's duty to support his wife. I thought since I chose to stay in the situation, I wasn't a victim. I now recognize this thinking was illogical and irrational. As well, I have a strong sense of honour and I regarded the oaths of marriage I swore to be binding.

In a way, my therapist did for me what the Shrink4Men forums does for many others. She exposed me to some unvarnished truth about how abusive Horntail's actions were and helped me to understand the source of FOG (fear, obligation, guilt). She helped me develop tools and communication strategies.

I didn't join the S4M forums until months after the false DV incident. Although I had already made significant progress within individual therapy, joining the S4M provided validation of my experiences in a way that individual therapy cannot. Sharing stories and posting about what we've seen and learned is cathartic for me.

Thank you, Beeker, both for taking the time to share your story and your significant contributions to the Shrink4MenForum.

In His Own Words/In Her Own Words is a joint effort between Shrink4Men and AVoiceForMen to help raise awareness about the invisible victims of domestic violence, men. If you would like to submit your story, please follow the guidelines at the end of this article.

AVfM demands apology from Pauley Perrette for comparing her divorce to the Holocaust

Suzanne McCarley · 28 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

> Another growing threat to the memory of the Six Million is when the Holocaust becomes grist for inappropriate Nazi and/or Hitler comparisons. Particularly in the United States, Holocaust trivialization has seeped into the mainstream….
> It must be our commitment to remember and to constantly speak out against those who would trivialize, distort or deny the Holocaust and to inoculate the public against trivialization….
> —Abraham H. Foxman, National Director of the Anti-Defamation League

So continues the saga of Pauley Perrette, our nation's most famous ~~serial liar~~ ~~false accuser~~ ~~stalker~~ restraining order abuser, documentation included as usual. It seems as though Our Dear Pauley, early in her decade-long quest to destroy ex-husband Coyote Shivers with harassment and false allegations, took to social media and compared her divorce to the Holocaust and herself to a Holocaust survivor.

Image obtained by Charles C. Johnson, http://gotnews.com/.

That's right, those are her words. We couldn't make this stuff up. Isn't it bad enough that Perrette has manipulated the court and compromised public officials and unethical attorneys into doing her dirty work? Did she also need to insult the victims, survivors, families, friends, and descendants of the Holocaust of Nazi Germany? Millions imprisoned, enslaved, starved, tortured, and murdered in cold blood, all just exactly like poor Pauley Perrette's divorce. How is it remotely possible that someone could compare a contentious divorce (which she herself made contentious) to one of the most egregious horrors this world has ever seen?

Quite the little drama queen, isn't she? Or possibly a few fries short of a Happy Meal. Could she possibly be that deluded? If so, the psychiatric industry has some very nice facilities that can help with such issues, but that is entirely beside the point. All the cray-cray cred on this planet does not excuse Perrette's narcissistic and arrogant contempt for the suffering of people whom she clearly sees as nothing more than extras on the set of a bio-pic called Star Crazy.

Due to this appalling act of extreme insensitivity, AVfM has faxed this letter to Perrette's attorney, Mr. Larry Stein of Los Angeles, demanding a public apology:

> Re: Demand for Apology, Your Client “Pauley Perrette”
> Comparing her divorce to the Holocaust
> Dear Mr. Stein,
>
> A Voice for Men respectfully demands that your client, Pauley Perrette, an actress on the television program “NCIS,” issues an immediate public apology for comparing her divorce to the “Holocaust” and for describing herself as a “Holocaust Victim.”
> It is not bad enough that your client has engaged in a decade long pattern of Internet hate campaigns, provably false allegations, and vexatious restraining order abuse against her ex-husband; but Pauley Perrette’s public statements and social media postings that she is a “Holocaust Victim” are beyond the pale and abhorrent. You should be personally embarrassed and ashamed as well.
> This extreme insensitivity by Ms. Perrette is offensive to the memory of the six million Jews slaughtered, as well as the actual Holocaust Survivors and Jewish communities everywhere impacted by articles regarding this shameful and degrading reference by Ms. Perrrette.
> We respectfully demand that Ms. Perrette immediately issue a public apology, and that you forward a written copy of that apology to this organization.
> Respectfully,

A teacher's endorsement for Paul Elam's whiteribbon.org

andybob · 28 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

On October 22, 2014, A Voice for Men launched whiteribbon.org / whiteribboncampaign.org, a website designed to offer a more comprehensive approach to addressing the issue of domestic violence by providing information and research that includes the substantial number of men and children who are among the victims and the equally substantial number of women who are perpetrators of intimate partner violence (IPV).

http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/feminist-lies-feminism/avfm-launches-whiteribboncampaign-org/

This launch would not have been necessary if those responsible for the other White Ribbon Campaign, and their various affiliates throughout the world, had not failed so egregiously in their duty to acknowledge the fact that IPV is not a gendered issue where men are always the perpetrators and women are always the victims. As Erin Pizzey, Editor at Large at A Voice for Men, has frequently asserted over the past few decades, IPV is primarily a generational issue centered around family dysfunction and includes a range of contributing factors such as poverty, substance abuse, and lack of education.

Ms. Pizzey has based her assertions on the vast amount of credible evidence produced both by her and by credentialed scientific researchers who discovered what is known as gender parity. As Pizzey has tried so valiantly to have acknowledged—at great cost to her personal safety and the personal safety of her family—domestic violence is not something that men do to women; it is something that some men and women do to each other. By ignoring this fact, the organizers of the original WRC, and their legion of feminist and uninformed non-feminist supporters, have rendered both male victims of IPV and female perpetrators all but invisible.

Such willful ignorance accounts for the woeful lack of support services available to male victims of IPV, as well as the lack of criminal accountability of female perpetrators, who are frequently counted as victims, even when they are literally caught standing over their bloodied husbands and boyfriends with frying pans in their hands and smirks on their faces. When one considers the fact that the people responsible for the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) are the same people responsible for the White Ribbon Campaign (WRC), the pervasiveness of such ignorance becomes more understandable but no less inexcusable.

Like most MHRAs, I am frequently asked what motivated me to become involved in the Men's Human Rights Movement and why I am so proud of my affiliation with A Voice for Men. My principal motivation, which supersedes all others and led me directly to this site, is my passionate belief as a teacher of secondary school students in a co-educational secondary school that none of my students should ever have their dignity undermined by those who wish to impose their ideologies onto the curricula I am required to teach.

Feminist infiltration into the education system of New South Wales (NSW) was well underway when I was a secondary school student, and was completely under their control by the time I first walked into a classroom as a teacher. My belief that it is not the role of teachers to participate in the indoctrination of students—I consider it unethical—but to develop their own critical faculties and the skills to express them put me at odds with a system that was already saturated with feminist dogma. If A Voice for Men had been around 25 years ago, I might have been inspired to stay and fight on behalf of my principles and my students. Alas, Paul Elam was still in short pants in 1989, and I was just a voice in the wilderness. So, I decided to leave Australia to teach in a non-Western county where feminism had not yet reared its ugly head. The year was 1994.

Fast-forward to 2008. I had been happily ensconced as the only Western English teacher in a Band 1 (academically gifted) secondary school for a decade when my adopted country decided to overhaul its secondary syllabus, and I was invited to be one of the four teachers tasked with designing the curricula for three of the senior elective modules as well as the writing curricula for forms 1 to 6. I was thrilled to have the responsibility of ensuring that the new curricula remained dogma-free but had no idea that the ensuing five years would be the most arduous yet revealing battle of my life.

Each team member was responsible for six of the units in each module. We would send our drafts electronically to each other, allowing us time to prepare critiques that would be offered at each of the ensuing meetings. I could write a book about the staggering amount of outrageous misandry that certain members tried to sneak into the curricula. During the first year, I managed to block offending material by simply stating my refusal to allow the boys, whose dignity I was professionally entailed to defend as much as the girls', to be so needlessly insulted and derided.

It wasn't until the second year, when we were working on Social Issues, that it became immediately apparent which social issue some of the team members intended to be the focal point of the module. The avalanche of anti-male feminist material—from the wage gap to the inherent violence of men and boys—was so overwhelming that I found myself sitting at my desk in abject despair the day before the commencement of my Christmas holiday, not knowing how I was going to counter any of it. For no apparent reason, I idly Googled "anti-feminism," and there, at the top of the page, was A Voice for Men. It was the answer to my prayers and the reason why feminism was not permitted anywhere near any of the curricula for which I was partly responsible and which has since been successfully implemented.

I spent my entire two-week holiday devouring every article, every comment, and every link to intelligent and erudite thinkers like Angry Harry, Alison Tieman, John Hembling, Dr. Helen Smith, and Erin Pizzey. I will be forever grateful to these wonderful people for their invaluable contributions in arming me not only with mountains of evidence-based research but also with the vocabulary with which to express my refutation of feminist ideology. "Why do you want to demonize your students?" actually produced gasps of guilty indignation. I discovered, among other things, that feminists really don't like being accused of demonizing men and boys, even though they don't seem to mind actually doing it.

But it is Paul Elam who is most responsible for the fact that tens of thousands of boys will never have to sit in any classroom of mine and be told, among other derogatory slurs, that they are responsible for domestic violence against women. I refer to him as Dr. Elam as a private joke to myself: he cured me of my miasma. My only regret is that I have not been able to express my profound gratitude to him, and the aforementioned MHRAs (Men's Human Rights Advocates), for their powerfully positive influence much sooner. They all contributed to enabling me to squash feminist ideology into the oblivion it deserves and in helping me to fulfill my duty in maintaining the dignity of all my students, boys and girls alike. It is a responsibility that I take very seriously.

The battle to protect students from unethical indoctrination of feminist ideology continues, and it is nowhere more prevalent than in the original WRC's success in foisting their gendered approach to the issue of domestic violence into the NSW school curricula. An examination of their "Breaking the Silence Schools Program" reveals the essential problem of allowing feminist ideologues to be in charge of this or, indeed, any kind of campaign designed to raise social awareness.

http://www.whiteribbon.org.au/schools

The webpage contains two videos designed to explain the purpose of this odious WRC and its relevance to the primary and secondary school curricula. Both of these videos ostensibly claim to deal with the issue of violence and bullying in general and how schools can address these issues. These are admirable goals that any reasonable person would support. However, it doesn't take long to discover which group is targeted as the sole perpetrators and which group is assumed to be the perennial victims:

> Breaking the Silence works to enhance respectful relationship education to prevent the perpetration of violence against women and girls.

Apparently, the perpetration of violence against men and boys isn't deemed important enough to even be acknowledged, let alone addressed. What appears to be a worthy, if short-sighted, approach is soon revealed to be the kind of anti-male shame-fest that MHRAs have come to expect from feminist-supervised initiatives like the WRC—and why A Voice for Men needed to launch its own webpage to counter their bigoted lies and assumptions about this issue.

The first video, "What is Breaking the Silence?," is introduced by Libby Davies, CEO of White Ribbon Australia—a woman who is often paid for giving speeches about "Violence against Women."

http://centreforgendereconomics.org/portfolio-items/libby-davies/

Ms. Davies, filmed in noirish black-and-white, somberly intones the usual statistics about "one woman is killed in Australia each week by an intimate partner" and that "73% of intimate partner homicides are women." The fact that, by her own admission, 27% of those homicide victims must be men is never mentioned, or at any time addressed, as though they simply don't matter—well, not to her anyway or, indeed, to any of the other people featured in the video.

Dr. Dale Palmer, Principal of Endeavour High School, made this fair comment:

> The largest sport we have is rugby league. We started because of some of the disrespectful behaviours from some of the sports boys in the school towards the women. The first evidence we had were disrespectful comments of a sexist nature to girls walking through the playground. The other thing that we found that was a problem was the girls were accepting of these comments. They didn't like them, but they just thought that that's the way it was.

He is absolutely right. Girls should not have to put up with verbal harassment, especially of a sexual nature, from boys, and boys should not be allowed to get away with making them. No one at A Voice for Men would ever dispute this opinion. However, Dr. Palmer goes on to add:

> We talk about how we should treat each other. Boys and girls have a chance to say what they expect and it's very powerful for boys to hear from girls what they expect.

Why isn't it just as "powerful" for girls to hear from boys what boys expect? The message is clear: girls have expectations of boys, and boys are obliged to fulfill them. Boys don't get to express their expectations at all. It is this kind of one-sided approach to "respectful relationship education" to which AVfM objects, not "respectful relationship education" itself. It doesn't require a seismic shift in logical comprehension to understand this objection—unless you are a feminist, of course.

Ray Pooley, Principal of Sans Souci Public [Primary] School, makes this equally obtuse and unsubstantiated observation:

> If you were to sit down with a group of students from our school, they would know that this is about boys and men not hurting girls and women. They know we don't accept domestic violence.

Why isn't it about "boys and men" and "girls and women" not hurting each other? The only reason why the students from his school "know that this is about boys and men not hurting girls and women" is because whoever facilitated their so-called education on the subject of domestic violence told them so. It is an inaccurate and dishonest approach to the issue that A Voice for Men would never adopt.

Andrew O'Keefe, one of the principal architects of the WRC, delivered this stunningly irresponsible piece of bigoted hogwash with an enthusiasm that is embarrassing to watch:

> If in twenty years' time we have a generation of boys leaving school who intuitively understand that violence is wrong in every situation and who always reach for a non-violent solution to their problem, and a generation of girls leaving school who know that they should expect respect in every circumstance of their life, then that will be the first generation of its kind, not only in Australia, but at any time, anywhere in the history of humanity. It > is an exciting thing to be a part of that change.

Sorry, Mr. O'Keefe, but a generation of girls who "expect respect in every circumstance of their life" does not fill me with excitement—it fills me with horror. It is deeply depressing to consider the extent to which a generation of women who feel entitled to respect in "every circumstance of life" will abuse the power and authority that morons like Andrew O'Keefe are eager to give them. Are we to respect their "right" to make false rape/DV/sexual harassment allegations against innocent men? How about their "right" to sexually mutilate their intimate male partners who wish to end their relationships—should we respect that too? It is at moments like these that MHRAs wonder if well-meaning fools, like Andrew O'Keefe, actually listen to themselves when they make these kinds of pronouncements.

The second video, "White Ribbon Ambassadors Breaking the Silence in Schools," is no less offensive in its determination to rob boys of their dignity. It is an insidious indictment of the fundamental flaws in the original WRC and the reason why it has no place in a school environment, or anywhere else for that matter:

http://www.whiteribbon.org.au/schools

Clint Newton, NRL (National Rugby League) player, White Ribbon Ambassador, and man under feminism's thumb, made this deeply offensive statement:

> It's up to us as men to stand up and say we have to improve. We have a responsibility and a job there to make sure that the men that we come in contact with are respectful because … I think the world will be a better place.

Men and boys have to stand up and say that we have to improve. Oh, really? That, in a nutshell, is what the WRC is all about and their real purpose for invading schools across the globe: to make boys feel that there is something innately wrong with them and that this is the reason why they are responsible for all of the world's ills. All participants in a campaign intended to impart such a deeply offensive and bigoted message to young boys ought to be ashamed of themselves for engaging in behaviour that can only be described as psychologically abusive.

Midway through the second video, a script is shown that begins by echoing the sentiments of the MHRM but ends with manufactured statistics that could only have been provided by feminist ideologues with an agenda to shame all of the boys who were required to see it:

> It is a human right to be treated with respect, regardless of gender …
> But Australia has a dark secret
> 1 in 3 women will experience violence in their lifetime
> And one woman a week loses their life

In many respects, it symbolizes the manner in which what should have been a laudable effort to address the issue of violence and bullying somehow lost its way to become yet another attempt to exploit a serious social issue by infusing it with feminist dogma. This is a mistake that A Voice for Men has sought to rectify by approaching the subject honestly and objectively with its own whiteribbon.org / whiteribboncampaign.org.

If Paul Elam had the millions of dollars available to produce glossy videos and employ an army of "education facilitators," as well as the power and influence to establish a blanket presence in schools, he would not have needed to launch whiteribbon.org / whiteribboncampaign.org in the manner which Amanda Marcotte predictably describes as "outright shocking in its ugliness."

http://www.slate.com/blogs/xx_factor/2014/10/24/mra_and_paul_elam_lures_people_away_from_anti_domestic_violence_site_with.html

No, Ms. Marcotte—it is neither shocking nor ugly. Paul Elam did what he has always done. He has done the right thing with the limited resources available to him—something that would not have been necessary if feminist ideologues like you had addressed the issue of domestic violence honestly in the first place instead of using it as an excuse to attack the dignity of men and boys, including those to whom I have a duty of care that good people like Dr. Elam encourage and inspire me to fulfill with every ounce of energy and commitment I can muster. I do not expect you to understand anything that I have written because you are a blinkered bigot who intends to do harm to my students.

Not on my watch. Got it?

A Voice for Men has created its own White Ribbon effort to offer a more accurate and balanced perspective on the issue of domestic violence. It is an effort that I fully endorse for reasons that are inextricably linked to both my personal and professional ethics and beliefs. One hopes that those responsible for the White Ribbon's "Breaking the Silence Schools Program" in NSW can be educated on where they went so horribly wrong in their approach to the issue and feel compelled to mend the error of their ways. No one at A Voice for Men is holding their breath on that score.

J4MB seeks help to launch its 2015 general election campaign – £39,500 ($63,500)

Mike Buchanan · 28 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

> An invasion of armies can be resisted, but not an idea whose time has come.
> (Victor Hugo)

J4MB considers AVfM the most important MHRA website in the world. We've been a strong and unyielding supporter of AVfM from the day we launched our party in February 2013. Our enemies have learned that there's little point in attacking us for supporting AVfM. Indeed, they've learned that the more they attack us for doing so, the more exposure and support we'll give AVfM.

When AVfM had its "hour of need"—the crisis over security for the Detroit conference—J4MB instantly donated $1,000 to the crowdfunder. A British supporter of J4MB also donated $1,000, and numerous other J4MB supporters contributed what they could. All were pleased they'd done so when it was confirmed the conference would proceed. The conference was one of the highlights of the lives of those of us who travelled from the UK to Detroit—as it was for all the speakers and delegates, I feel sure—and we look forward to ICMI15 and later conferences.

In less than seven months' time, the UK will be holding what for the Men's Human Rights Movement could prove to be one of the most important general elections for the past 50 years. The British political landscape is wide open, and anyone who confidently predicts the outcome of the 2015 election based on old political groupings would be considered foolish. The domination of the political landscape by the two major parties is fracturing before our eyes, and their traditional voters' loyalty is becoming ever harder to retain. It is against this exciting backdrop that J4MB—which remains the only political party in the English-speaking world fighting for the human rights of men and boys—will be contesting a number of marginal seats. Votes for J4MB will be a testament to our core strategy being sound—namely, to eventually grow our public support to the point that the main political parties will have no choice but to engage with J4MB in a bid to dissuade us from contesting their marginal seats at future general elections.

However, the mainstream media continues to give us minimal exposure, even as the state's assaults on the human rights of men and boys worsen year after year. This lack of media exposure presents a challenge to J4MB, and we need to raise the party's public profile in the constituencies we'll be contesting, particularly in my own, Bedford & Kempston.

What are our options for raising the party's profile, to maximise our votes at the general election? We've had major input from professional marketing people who are giving their time for nothing. Based on the latest knowledge of voter intentions, informed by current thinking in the USA, they've developed a detailed advertising campaign for the Bedford & Kempston constituency, for posters and other materials to be visible to the general public in the months leading up to the election.

The campaign will cost £39,500 ($63,500), and we've just launched a crowdfunder to raise the sum. On the crowdfunder website we've uploaded images of two of the initial poster designs: the first on the rights of children, fathers, and grandparents; the second on male victims of domestic violence—a graphic designer has yet to "polish" the designs—as well as "mocked up" images of how the posters will look on roadside hoardings, near shops, on buses, etc.

Our previous crowdfunders met their targets, and we ask AVfM supporters to help make this one a success too. The success of this campaign would be felt beyond the UK. On behalf of all those working tirelessly for J4MB, I thank you for your support, and I thank Paul Elam and his colleagues at AVfM for their support too. The campaign will last just two weeks, ending at 23:59 on Sunday, November 9.

The remainder of this piece is drawn from the crowdfunder website and explains in more detail the thinking behind the advertising campaign:

HELP US MAKE A DIFFERENCE IN 2015

A major public advertising campaign for the 2015 general election

In less than seven months—7 May, 2015, to be precise—British citizens will have their first opportunity to vote in a general election in defence of the human rights of men and boys, and we're raising the money we need to HAMMER OUT OUR ELECTION MESSAGE. Please help us do that.

WE NEED £39,500 and we're launching this 2-WEEK FUNDRAISER to fund a PLANNED CAMPAIGN. Since we launched J4MB in February 2013, we've made no secret of the scale of our ambitions. Ray Barry and I will be standing as election candidates. I'll be standing in Bedford and Kempston, Ray in Wolverhampton South-West, and we plan to attract enough votes that one day the main political parties will have no option but to engage with us to deter us from contesting their marginal seats in future general elections.

OUR STRATEGY IS RIGHT, OUR CAUSE IS JUST, and our campaign has been thoroughly planned. We've had major input from professional marketing people who are giving their time for nothing. WE KNOW WHO OUR TARGET VOTERS ARE and WE KNOW HOW TO GET OUR MESSAGE TO THEM, but we need your help, because it will cost money—£39,500 TO BE PRECISE.

Ray and I are going to give this everything we've got. Every ounce of energy will go into this campaign. WE'RE GOING TO TELL IT LIKE IT IS—no holds barred—our planned messages are powerful. We will be appealing to the voters' deepest emotional reactions, through billboard hoardings, bus route adverts, and direct-delivered leaflets—all targeted at specific neighbourhoods where we know our target voters live. We're not wasting time or energy on non-productive areas.

PLEASE HELP US SEND THIS CLEAR MESSAGE TO VOTERS. Please help us make that vital difference through the ballot box.

PLEASE GIVE WHAT YOU CAN. We hope to raise the full amount, but our plans are flexible: WE CAN USE WHATEVER YOU GIVE EFFECTIVELY.

YOU can play a vital role in ending the state's assaults on the human rights of men and boys. Vote for J4MB. PLEASE GIVE NOW! YOUR CONTRIBUTION TOWARDS THE £39,500 WILL BE WELL SPENT.

Thank you for your support, as always.

ESPN Radio's SVP & Russillo discuss whether "mob rule" is driving domestic violence policy, dialogue

Ty Henry · 29 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

With the suspensions of Max Kellerman and Stephen A. Smith, it's not surprising that original, critical thought on the broader issues surrounding the eruption of gender violence discourse is hard to find in sports media.

That's exactly what makes Scott Van Pelt and Ryen Russillo of ESPN Radio so refreshing. They strike that balance of critical thought without being frivolously contrarian, asking tough questions without being strident, all the while avoiding the "hot button" words that ascribe or absolve the principals in any particular case.

Regardless of the "heat" emanating from an issue, they refuse to pander to their audience. Instead, their dialogue comes the closest in the sports-talk universe to Socratic dialogue; you can see both men working through the issue as they ask questions of each other earnestly. There is never a "gotcha" intent.

In the first 10 minutes of this podcast from September 17, they discuss "where we are going" when the societal discourse is driven by anger, when the "mob" is bloodthirsty, whether the thirst is based in righteousness or not. Russillo in particular seems to have little tolerance for folks who "stay mad" even when the NFL comes to the decision they want.

They discuss the danger of a "one size fits all" approach to these allegations and further analyze the controversy surrounding Jameis Winston's newer travails and how the prism of the prior allegations of sexual assault impact the court of public opinion with the latest, more benign incidents.

Van Pelt and Russillo reference primarily the cases that have been most in the spotlight, those of Adrian Peterson, Greg Hardy, Ray Rice, and also touch on Jameis Winston. Adrian Peterson is the running back for the NFL's Minnesota Vikings who was indicted for child abuse. He is scheduled for trial beginning December 1, 2014. Greg Hardy, offensive lineman for the Carolina Panthers, was found guilty in a July bench trial of domestic violence in a bizarre case in which he and a third party both called 911; under North Carolina law, he is exercising his right to appeal to a jury trial. Ray Rice essentially pled no contest for his part in a New Jersey incident with his fiancée, which ended with her unconscious after being struck in the face and hitting her head in the railing on the way down.

Peterson and Hardy have been placed on the Commissioner's exempt list, a sort of limbo where players are paid while they await disposition of a criminal matter. Rice was initially suspended for two games. Upon the September release of the full surveillance tape, the NFL suspended him indefinitely and the Baltimore Ravens terminated his contract, citing the additional footage as "new evidence" and asserting Rice was not completely forthcoming. There is a dispute as to whether league officials saw the video prior to when they say they did, with reports saying it was received, and the NFL and Baltimore Ravens are disputing that claim.

Rice has filed a grievance alleging what amounts to double punishment under the collective bargaining agreement between the players and owners. An independent arbitrator is scheduled to hear the grievance in November, with both Janay Rice and Commissioner Goodell likely to testify.

Jameis Winston is the controversial quarterback for Florida State University. Widely regarded as college football's best player, he won the Heisman Trophy last fall after charges he had raped a co-ed in December 2012 were dismissed. His team went on to win the BCS National Championship. As a result of that case, the Justice Department has opened a Title IX investigation into Florida State. Winston has since been involved in other controversies. In May, he was cited for ordering crab legs and walking out without paying. He was suspended for a game against Clemson for jumping on a table in a campus cafeteria and screaming an Internet meme-based obscenity. He has since been notified that he must answer four student code of conduct allegations, with the hearing to be heard by a retired Florida Supreme Court Chief Justice.

SVP & Russillo are syndicated by ESPN Radio and can be heard Monday through Friday in various American markets. The first half of their show is simulcast live on TV via ESPN2.

Equal Rights Amendment: acquiring equal rights for men and boys

David Ault · 29 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Ratifying the Equal Rights Amendment has long been discussed in the men's movement, but there was none more passionate about the project than men's rights activist David Ault, who established the Equal Rights Amendment Project of Men's Rights and actively lobbied for its ratification from the 1970s onward. The following article by Ault was published in MEN Magazine in 1996, and in honour of his memory we are pleased to republish it at AVfM.—PW

The notion that men need equal rights with women is almost as politically incorrect today as it was in 1978, when I began actively working in Virginia for ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Even today, the ERA is often referred to as the "women's rights amendment." This limited interpretation is difficult to understand given its wording: Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State on account of sex.

During the late 1970s and early 1980s, I distributed pamphlets that explained why women deserve to have equal rights with men. As Vice Chair of the Virginia Equal Rights Amendment Ratification Council, I often passed out our organization's pamphlet entitled Women of Virginia, Rights You Are Denied.

We did not have a corresponding pamphlet Men of Virginia, Rights You Are Denied. In fact, men's rights were so excluded from the ERA ratification process that, despite repeated requests by several knowledgeable men, no men were invited to testify on men's equal rights issues before the U.S. Congressional hearings on ERA ratification.

Harris and Gallup polls informed us then that nearly 60 percent of all Americans favored ERA ratification. Although men were ignored as potential beneficiaries of a ratified ERA, younger men favored the ERA at nearly the same percentage as women. Many older men also supported it.

Despite this majority of women and men in its favor, the ten-year ratification period expired in June 1982 with only 35 of the required 38 states approving its ratification. I recall that some people blamed the ERA's defeat on men who wanted to keep women "in their place" by denying women equal rights. Particularly targeted for blame were those male legislators from nonratifying states who voted against it.

Upon reflection, perhaps some men are to "blame" for the ERA's failure to be ratified, but not for the reasons I heard in 1982. During that period of time, I was one of very few men who donated large amounts of their time and money to support ERA ratification. I also voted for political candidates by giving heavy weight to their stand on the ERA. At ERA meetings and workshops, I was often outnumbered by the women present by 10 or 20 to 1. My level of passion in support of the ERA was typical of many American women.

Although many American men supported ERA ratification, their support was more from their heads. Men often explained to me that they supported the ERA for their wife, sister, daughter, or mother. However, they did not donate significant time or money to support its ratification. Judging from the phone calls that I made polling households for ERA support, many men did not vote for pro-ERA candidates as a top priority.

I submit that it was not the men (and women) who opposed the ERA that defeated it. Instead, those men who are largely to "blame" are the majority of men who favored its ratification and yet failed to give it sufficient importance in their lives to see that it passed.

Winning men's active support for the ERA may be easier today. During recent years, men's consciousness about their own issues has been raised substantially and the momentum is upward. Men are growing aware of how the narrow gender-role conditioning they receive during society's indoctrination of them to become protectors and providers negatively affects both their emotional and physical health. They learn that, on average, men not only live 7 years less than women, but men's quality of life is reduced in trying to live up to this restrictive gender role.

Men are grieving, publicly and privately, for the loss of their fathers and their distance from their own children. They are learning how welfare rules and our father-negative “family” courts separate caring fathers from their children. They are dismayed by the contribution that fatherless families have to the increase in homeless and runaway children, and to teenage suicide, academic failure, drug abuse, violence, and unwed pregnancy.

At the same time that women have control over their parenthood through abortion or adoption, men’s reproductive rights are either ignored or condescendingly dismissed. Men lack the “right to choose” legal fatherhood, but have the responsibility of financial support. Further, men have no corresponding right to either custody or noncustodial access to their children.

Although outlawing female genital mutilation gets national media and Congressional attention, over 60% of American male babies still undergo medically unnecessary, involuntary, and painful infant circumcision.

Men realize that only they have the responsibility to register for selective service and may subsequently face the military draft. Further, as women gain the option of volunteering for combat positions, men are still assigned to combat.

Men see programs instituted to help women, while men’s similar concerns go unacknowledged and unfunded. Examples of neglected areas include male academic difficulties at all educational levels, lack of support for “men’s programs” in higher education, failure to acknowledge and support male victims of domestic violence, lack of affirmative action for men to enter predominately female professions, low levels of government support to homeless men, unequal privacy provisions in public restrooms and dressing rooms, failure to recognize and combat female modes of sexual harassment of men, and more stringent employee dress codes for men.

Men are hurting from 30 years of being the object of unwarranted blame, male-bashing, and negative sex-role stereotyping. As their consciousness increases, men will be more receptive to understanding both the harm done to them by continued pressure to conform to rigid role models and the legal injustices still visited upon them. Men will see how unjustified blame and their traditional stoic conditioning have combined to repress any remedy to their equality issues.

However, when men understand how gender-inclusive application of the ERA will benefit them, their pain, anger, and desire for justice will propel them into action to support ERA ratification. Together with women supporters, they will work to successfully win ERA passage in the U.S. Congress and by the necessary three-quarters of the states.

To make this happen, men’s equality issues must be included in the debate over ERA ratification. The first step within each state is to continue to research and document the areas where men are discriminated against by local, state, and federal law. This includes not only laws written in a gender-biased way, but laws that, although gender-neutral in wording, result in bias against men in practice. Sometimes the remedy will not require changing the law; instead, changing public opinion will result in an equitable application of existing law. In other cases, the law will require modification or elimination.

The second step is to bring men’s equality issues and the ERA remedies to the attention of the public and our legislative bodies. Men might begin by asking each state legislature to memorialize the ERA again, as Washington State did in 1983. Memorialization means that the state legislature passes a resolution asking the U.S. Congress to pass the ERA and to send it out to the states for ratification. However, the reasons expressed this time by each state legislature for memorializing the ERA must include the need for men’s equal rights.

The third step is to secure an invitation for knowledgeable men to testify for the first time before the U.S. Congress when hearings are held again on the ERA. This will have three important benefits. First, it will help to bring the issue of discrimination against men before the entire country. Second, it will increase American men’s identification of ERA ratification with ending this discrimination. Third, it will create an official record of Congress’s intent to include equal rights for men in its justification for the ERA.

This Congressional record will be vital to men after the ERA is ratified, because judges often consider legislative intent in deciding how to apply the law to a specific case. After the Congress records its support for men's rights, men will find it much easier to use the ERA to right legal injustices against them.

Finally, prepared with our research and buoyed by state and federal recognition of men's need for the ERA, men must continue to educate the public and join with women in the ERA ratification process. With women and men working together for a gender-inclusive ERA, to quote Susan B. Anthony, "Failure is impossible."

ERA: Gaining equal rights for men

Editor's note: Ratifying the Equal Rights Amendment has long been discussed in the men's movement, but there was none more passionate about the project than men's rights activist David Ault, who established the Equal Rights Amendment Project of Men's Rights and actively lobbied for its ratification from the 1970s onward. The following article by Ault was published in MEN Magazine in 1996, and in honour of his memory we are pleased to republish it at AVfM.—PW

The notion that men need equal rights with women is almost as politically incorrect today as it was in 1978, when I began actively working in Virginia for ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Even today, the ERA is often referred to as the "women's rights amendment." This limited interpretation is difficult to understand given its wording: Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State on account of sex.

During the late 1970s and early 1980s, I distributed pamphlets that explained why women deserve to have equal rights with men. As Vice Chair of the Virginia Equal Rights Amendment Ratification Council, I often passed out our organization's pamphlet entitled Women of Virginia, Rights You Are Denied.

We did not have a corresponding pamphlet Men of Virginia, Rights You Are Denied. In fact, men's rights were so excluded from the ERA ratification process that, despite repeated requests by several knowledgeable men, no men were invited to testify on men's equal rights issues before the U.S. Congressional hearings on ERA ratification.

Harris and Gallup polls informed us then that nearly 60 percent of all Americans favored ERA ratification. Although men were ignored as potential beneficiaries of a ratified ERA, younger men favored the ERA at nearly the same percentage as women. Many older men also supported it.

Despite this majority of women and men in its favor, the ten-year ratification period expired in June 1982 with only 35 of the required 38 states approving its ratification. I recall that some people blamed the ERA's defeat on men who wanted to keep women "in their place" by denying women equal rights. Particularly targeted for blame were those male legislators from nonratifying states who voted against it.

Upon reflection, perhaps some men are to "blame" for the ERA's failure to be ratified, but not for the reasons I heard in 1982. During that period of time, I was one of very few men who donated large amounts of their time and money to support ERA ratification. I also voted for political candidates by giving heavy weight to their stand on the ERA. At ERA meetings and workshops, I was often outnumbered by the women present by 10 or 20 to 1. My level of passion in support of the ERA was typical of many American women.

Although many American men supported ERA ratification, their support was more from their heads. Men often explained to me that they supported the ERA for their wife, sister, daughter, or mother. However, they did not donate significant time or money to support its ratification. Judging from the phone calls that I made polling households for ERA support, many men did not vote for pro-ERA candidates as a top priority.

I submit that it was not the men (and women) who opposed the ERA that defeated it. Instead, those men who are largely to “blame” are the majority of men who favored its ratification and yet failed to give it sufficient importance in their lives to see that it passed.

Anonymous message to #GamerGate

AVfM Video Source · 29 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

When we saw reports that Anonymous was involving itself in trying to destroy #GamerGate, we thought that perhaps it was misguided, because it's been transparently obvious to those watching closely that 90% or more of the Mainstream Media coverage of GamerGate has been total crap.

Then this video appeared, and it looks a lot more credible to us:

Poseurs pretending to be elite hackers to get attention for themselves makes a lot more sense.

We suspect that those who tried to claim to represent Anonymous and those in the mainstream media who actually thought they were legit are going to regret it.

Does this mean we support everything Anonymous ever does? Of course not. No one can, not even Anonymous.

But this just got a lot more interesting, and we suspect this story is going to be causing splash damage far beyond the gaming journals at this point.

We can't say we'll be upset. A media made up primarily of profiteering ideological liars should be made to quell in its boots.

Tyler Shipley: Musician, writer, protestor and ...

Dan Perrins · 30 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Recently, Steve Brulé penned an incredibly damning piece about who is stopping free speech and running the gender-terror-show at Queen's University in Kingston, Ontario.

Toronto's home-grown version of gender-terror-show indoctrinaughts came out to play last summer. Some of you will remember them as Darwin's Rejects, my local entourage of cranial-windsock indoctrinaughts, whom I've had the great pleasure of meeting.

The video is from a CAFE event held at the University of Toronto on August 5, 2014. The speaker was Igor Serebryany, who is a columnist, editor, former producer of BBC World Service, and founder of the Russia Fathers' Committee. The topic was "Men's Issues Go Global."

Now, if you look closely at the top right corner of the video, you'll see a particularly interesting specimen of indoctrinaught: one Tyler Shipley. He's right there, second from the end in the first row. Shipley is enthusiastically participating and appears to be having a grand time blundering along, grinning, clapping, and chanting with the rest of the "social justice" windbags, whom common sense has left behind.

Shipley has a few other talents besides his ability to grin and clap, symptoms indicative of his common-sense handicap. He's a fairly active chap who is in a band and does some writing. According to his academia.edu bio: "I occasion as a freelance journalist, appearing as both writer and guest in a variety of mainstream and independent media…."

A Google search of his name shows that indeed he is a musician and he does "freelance journalism." His work is well represented at a Canadian site called rabble.ca. Rabble, for those who don't know, is a rubble of "journalistic integrity": think Jezebel with a slightly more libellous flavour. Feminist propaganda poutine published daily from the Great White North would be a fair assessment.

Shipley has one other "talent": he's an adjunct professor at Humber College and York University, institutions of higher learning in Toronto. He currently teaches economics and politics at Humber College and international studies at York University.

No, this is not a misprint.

Shipley is employed at two post-secondary institutions in the Toronto area as a professor who is responsible for teaching and shaping malleable young minds—that is, if you call silencing open discussions and restricting exposure to different cultures, points of view, and experiences "teaching."

Some would call Shipley's brand of "teaching" indoctrination.

Shipley started his quest to ~~teach~~ indoctrinate in Manitoba with a BA (hon) in history and political studies, followed by an MA (with distinction) in history at the University of Manitoba. Our young shining star of the Canadian education system then acquired his PhD in political science at York University in 2013.

With his dedication to the pursuit and promotion of knowledge, our "learned" Shipley proudly goes forth to become a cranial-windsock indoctrinaught, enthusiastically participating in an attempt to shut down a lecture. A talk, with an opportunity to pose questions to the guest speaker. A speaker, with an extensive history in journalism, from another country: RUSSIA!

RUSSIA, you indoctrinaughts!

An expert journalist from a country in which free speech has been prohibited until recent times (in case you fucking missed it, Mr. "MA in history, with distinction" Shipley) was willing to give a first-hand account and answer questions. An opportunity for our over-educated Shipley and others to learn about and discuss others' experiences.

At a university.

I find it hard to believe that a professor with a PhD in political science and a background in history cannot see the error in actively participating in an effort to silence open, honest discussion. Shipley's answer to learning about issues that fathers are facing in Russia (and in other nations) was to, along with possibly some of his students, silence a scholarly discussion, all the while illustrating to the world what first-class asses they are in the process. Shipley, a teacher of young minds, was right there, ensuring that he block attendees from hearing expert, first-hand experience and knowledge.

Shipley's acts do not represent those of someone interested in solutions. Nor are they the hallmark of a teacher who encourages the precious, malleable minds under his guidance to examine problems and possible solutions inside and outside the classroom. Shipley's guiding principle is to control and silence, close off those young minds to different points of view, experiences, and cultures. Restrict access, censor, the limitless potential found in society's youth by prohibiting free speech.

Shipley's involvement in this protest should not go unnoticed by academia or the media. How someone who has freelanced as a journalist and managed to become an adjunct professor at two post-secondary education institutions can display this blind bigotry is beyond me. It's inexcusable and an insult to teachers and journalists everywhere. His attempts to silence a fellow journalist through an act of bullying is a mortal sin in journalism. His censoring of minds, his silencing of voices, illustrates his talent and passion for indoctrination.

Shipley has no business being involved in either of these professions. He is a common-sense-handicapped Darwin's Reject who is infecting students and society with a toxic totalitarian silence, save the whistling of his cranial windsock.

I should point out that I fully support Shipley's and the rest of the indoctrinaughts' right to assemble (aka protest) and right to free speech—along with the right to be held accountable for those public words and actions.

Recruiting domestic violence spies

Jim Muldoon · 31 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial note: The below article describes a false, sexist "White Ribbon Campaign" that operates in Australia and Canada. This should not be confused with WhiteRibbon.org, which is a campaign genuinely dedicated to educating the public in order to end the scourge of domestic violence. -Eds.

In probably the most frightening news to date, the White Ribbon mob has publicized their latest inroads into the annals of infamy with their Breaking the Silence in Schools Program. The Age, that bastion of doubleplusgoodthink, ran an editorial for them called "Boys act on domestic violence."

We are to believe a schoolboy spontaneously became aware of feminist domestic violence statistics and found them "scary." So scary, in fact, that he spontaneously decided to take action.

> The resulting Waverley College Violence Against Women Forum – conceived and implemented almost entirely by the student leaders – aims to get students thinking about attitudes and behaviours that can lead boys and men to hurt girls and women.

Spontaneously, the White Ribbon lot got involved. With coincidental spontaneity, Channel 7's Andrew O'Keefe, along with other domestic violence luminaries, spoke at the forum. Caught up in the spirit of spontaneity, The Age suddenly felt moved to publish an editorial on the matter.

We are assured:

> Content was produced without advertiser influence.

Spontaneously, we are to imagine that "without advertiser influence" and "ideologically unbiased" are one and the same thing. This, of course, requires us to ignore that "family violence," "domestic violence," and "family and domestic violence" are all interchangeable terms for the same phenomenon: "violence against women."

Can a man be a victim of domestic violence? While perhaps technically possible, it seems that the White Ribbon lot, nor the various luminaries who spoke, didn't spontaneously feel the need to warn these schoolboys of that possibility.

And what are the chances, do you reckon, that the school, Waverley College, spontaneously asked the government for a grant to pay for the event?

At the very end of the propaganda piece was some sage advice for those who find themselves under threat.

> Anyone in immediate danger should call the police on Triple Zero (000).
> If a student is experiencing violence in their own home or relationship or suspect a friend is, they should call the 24-hour national Sexual Assault, Family and Domestic Violence Counselling Line to speak with a trained trauma counsellor. 1800 RESPECT.

Other than tourists visiting this wide, brown land from afar, it is reasonable to expect that those with the literary skills required to read The Age will already know to call Triple Zero in an emergency. But the number is not put there for information purposes. Instead, the "immediate danger" is being used to heighten the sense of moral panic and hysteria.

Let me also ask this question: Why the two numbers? Surely those experiencing violence should be calling the police too. The answer, here, is a bit more subtle. With the ever-widening definition of what feminists call violence, not all violence results in an emergency, or is even illegal.

> Tracy Howe, former Domestic Violence NSW CEO, who spoke at the forum, says many types of abuse fall outside of what is recognised by the law.

Howe says this as though it is a bad thing. But when we have such vague definitions of spiritual violence, economic violence, financial violence, and the like, it is without doubt a good thing that these issues have not made the statute books.

Consider this: "Withdrawing interest and engagement" is defined as emotional abuse by the Australian government, yet divorce is still legal.

But if a student suspects a friend, call this number? This is the most disturbing part of all. It's slipped in, almost as an afterthought, yet it is actually the centrepiece.

Here's something else to consider: The Department of Social Services engaged Medibank Health Solutions, who in turn engaged Rape and Domestic Violence Services Australia, to provide online counselling services linked to this number. So the more people who call the number, or use their online counselling services, the more these agencies can ask from the government budget.

But, by now, we shouldn't be thinking about money. We've read "scary" and "violence" and "intimidate" and "abuse." By now we should be hyperventilating in panic and thanking Gaia that the feminists have created this help line for those in crisis when the police (patriarchy!) won't.

Of course, for those in crisis, the terms and conditions are clearly stated on the website. This informs us just how serious this matter is:

> The information provided during the Online Counselling Services is for general information purposes only. The information provided during the Online Counselling Services is not and should not be regarded as advice, including legal or medical advice. [Emphasis mine]

It should be clear to all but the hard of thinking that calling that number is not going to help anyone with any kind of real and serious problem. However, it is also in the White Ribbon's interest that the number of calls go up rather than down. They will certainly be quoting their cooperation with this "help" line on their funding requests and grant applications.

But there are two further issues, both related. First, it is clear, although unstated, that children should be dobbing in their parents. Could this phone line be abused by belligerent teenagers who believe, for example, that their parents should allow, and even fund, their drug use in the family home?

The second issue is even more sinister:

> [Andrew] O'Keefe, a former chairman of White Ribbon, a national male-led organisation dedicated to eradicating violence against women, says it is important to challenge young people's attitudes to gender and violence while they have the ability to easily learn and unlearn behaviours. [Emphasis mine]

So what behaviour is our suspicious student learning? Nova Peris, in the federal Senate, has the answer:

> On Tuesday, Senator Peris, the first indigenous woman to be elected to Federal Parliament, called for all states and territories to emulate Northern Territory laws that make it a crime for any adult to fail to report domestic violence to police.

In George Orwell's Nineteen Eighty-Four, they were called The Youth League and The Spies. The Nazis, of course, had the Hitler Youth. We get the Breaking the Silence in Schools Program.

Today, it is being asked of our children to report domestic violence, with all the vagueness that now comes with that term. Yes, those youths who are not consider old enough to vote, sign legal documents, start a business, etc., because of their immaturity, are being asked to report "crimes" not only in their own homes but in their friends homes as well. And no actual knowledge is required. A suspicion will do.

It is worth noting that these same children cannot be compelled to give evidence in any trial that might result from these reports because of their age.

But breaking what silence?

The statistics at the beginning say it all:

> More than one woman dies every week at the hands of an intimate partner. One in three women will experience violence from the age of 15. One in four children are exposed to violence in their family.

These are stated as fact. The sky is blue, the sun sets in the west, and one in three women will experience violence from the age of 15. These are the statistics that spontaneously scared the schoolboy.

Instead of dragging you through all kinds of data to show why the above "facts" are not actually facts, let me direct you to the link where Julia Gillard who, while prime minister, made a special YouTube declaration that one in three women will be "beaten and raped" in their lifetime.

That's a lot stronger than "experience violence," isn't it? Why don't the White Ribbon people say "beaten and raped" like our ex-prime minister? The truth is that neither statistic is valid. They are used for their dramatic effect, not their accuracy.

If questioned, the questioner will be pointed to any number of feminist authors who make the claim. Prepare to disappear in a maze of feminist author quoting yet another feminist author, while the words like "actual figures" get replaced by "estimate" as you spiral in the abyss. All of this is designed to bamboozle the feminists' critics, and certainly not to seriously study and understand domestic violence.

I've included a link to Murray Strauss's paper on how feminists corrupt domestic violence research.

However, we are not expected to question but rather be dutifully shocked and outraged. Again, it is unstated but should be clear that if one in three women are being abused, the equivalent of one in three men must be doing the abusing. And if this is the true number, then it is happening everywhere, all of the time, and we don't even know about it. That is "the Silence."

The White Ribbon Campaign, and now the boys who spontaneously started the Waverley College Violence Against Women Forum, are setting themselves as being somehow exempt from this statistic. Their plan, it seems, is to avoid being the victim of the witch hunt by being leading with the accusations.

Feminism has often been described as a religion. It is worth considering this when reading this statement in The Age.

> Ending violence against women begins with changing attitudes and behaviours.

In this report alone, the terms "end," "stop," and even "eradicate" are used. This is more than a community reaction to a particular crime. It is a crusade for the Holy Grail of a Violence-Free, Problem-Free World for Women.

And, of course, the violence will never end because the definition will keep expanding. The real reason is that there is too much money and too many careers riding on the Violence Against Women bandwagon for it come to a halt anytime soon.

Meanwhile, these perhaps well-meaning but gullible young men will become feared and loathed in their community as the hysteria mounts and the phone calls for "help" become the "evidence" in courts.

And all because they feel compelled to distance themselves from the original sin of being born male.

The profit in sex addiction

Dr. David Ley · 31 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Note: This article is also available in Romanian.

One of my favorite sayings has always been "When all you have is a hammer, every problem looks like a nail." A similar philosophy applies to the treatment of sexual problems. The label of "sex addiction" is a big, lucrative hammer, and every sexual problem is just asking to be "nailed." For the past year, I've been working on a new book, The Myth of Sex Addiction, and one of the things I found extremely concerning was just how much this field is driven by profit motives.

The finances that lie behind the concept of sex addiction are a significant concern. Treatment for sex addiction is not cheap. A month's treatment at some residential sex addiction treatment programs can cost over $37,000. Sex addiction is big business. All the celebrity attention to sex addiction has driven many more people into the offices of sex addiction therapists nationwide. Alexandra Katehakis, a sex addiction therapist with a practice in California, says that "celebrities have been the greatest evangelists for treatment. My practice wouldn't exist without them."

And it's not just therapeutic business now. Sex addiction treatment is business in the entertainment industry as well. The Logo Channel has a reality show called Sex Rx, focusing on the therapy needs of a group of LGBT clients treated by Christopher Donaghue, a self-proclaimed specialist in sex addiction treatment. The VH1 channel previously had Sex Rehab, with celebrity physician Dr. Drew, which delved into the sexual issues of celebrities and focused on sexual addiction. According to the Sex Rehab show's website, 6% of the American population is afflicted with sex addiction, though no reference is given to shed light on this number. Further, according to the show's description, "nobody is immune to" sex addiction. In an amusing irony, the sponsored advertisement links on the show's website are all for methods to either delay the male orgasm or treat erectile dysfunction. It sends an odd message—"Sex is dangerous and scary, you need to watch out and control it! And by the way, if you can't have sex, here's a link to buy a pill that will fix you up so you can have sex, which is dangerous and scary by the way!"

The New Life Ministries of Laguna Beach, California, runs a three-day seminar for men who say their sexual addiction is threatening their lives and marriages. Paying $1,400 for the seminar (not including hotel room), the men who attend what the church calls their "Every Man's Battle" workshops are there to wage a battle against shame and fear, and the problem of pornography. The Every Man's Battle website sells kits, books, compact discs, DVDs, and self-study resources for adolescents, families, wives, and men of all ages. There is even a kit for soldiers, shipped in a camouflage box, and apparently designed to help men resist sexual urges while deployed in the military. In 2009, according to tax forms posted on the Guidestar website, this organization made nearly $4 million just from selling their educational materials and almost $2.5 million from the seminars and workshops they conduct. In 2009, they reported nearly $8.5 million in gross revenues, according to the tax return documents they filed with the IRS, and since 2003, they have averaged around $8 or $9 million a year in revenue. Stephen Arterburn, the Christian counselor who heads the organization and is the central figure in most of the educational materials, was paid $180,000 a year in salary alone by the organization, a figure that almost certainly doesn't include his speaking fees and royalties.

You may be a sex addict if you see something funny in this cactus.

In the Arizona desert, about an hour from Phoenix, is The Meadows, an elite treatment center where you can go if you are struggling with addiction to drugs, alcohol, or sex and can afford the steep price tag. For a little over $1,000 a day, you get intense treatment designed to address issues that affected you in your childhood, as well as any traumas that continue to impact your adult life. You do so in a facility with an extremely talented gourmet chef, granite bathrooms, and beautiful fountains, art, and sculpture all around the campus. Notably, there are also saguaro cacti all around the facility, giant plants that resemble penises and sex toys so much that they are hard to ignore.

The staff there are dedicated and seem to be good people, genuinely interested in helping people make changes in their lives. But this facility generates close to $2 million a month for the for-profit investment firm that owns the facility. Some sexual addicts choose to stay in their facility long-term for treatment, sometimes as long as six months. And all of this is paid for by cash—this program doesn't bill insurance for their treatment.

The Meadows Rehab, where actor David Duchovny has reportedly gone for sexual addiction treatment, is the "ground zero" for the movement to treat sex addiction. The Meadows' senior fellows are Pia Mellody, author of Facing Love Addiction and Breaking Free; Claudia Black, author of It Will Never Happen to Me and Changing Course; and Patrick Carnes, author of Out of the Shadows and The Betrayal Bond. These authors have all written bestselling books on addiction, sex addiction, and codependency. As one critic argues in reference to these senior Meadows fellows, "Sex addiction was invented by a self-help group aided by popular books. It is trying now to move over into a medical condition."

The concept of sexual addiction is driven by economic factors. The professionals who feed the media's need for psychological and biological explanations of sexual behaviors are the same professionals who make very good livings providing treatment services to individuals who self-identify with sexual addiction after hearing these doctors and therapists on television. The proselytizing of sex addictionologists is a form of disease-mongering, where they are using the media, hype, and fear to create a disorder where none truly exists.

How being back on Twitter has warmed my heart and hurt my head @AnikaRoseAus #GamerGate #womenagainstfeminism

Anika Rose · 31 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Last week I decided to go back on Twitter (@AnikaRoseAus) largely because I have been a games enthusiast my whole life, starting from a Nintendo as a toddler, so I wanted to get in on the action with gamers supporting #GamerGate. Other reasons included me seeing Twitter as a great platform to connect with others who support the Men's Rights Movement, to gather content for my blog, and to have my say about how bullshit I believe feminism actually is.

Well, I have gotten what I desired—and them some, and some more—and it just keeps coming!

First, I would like to say a massive THANK YOU to all the people who are following me, the people I have met and now communicate with regularly, and especially to the people manning accounts that spread an invaluable amount of documentation about how ignored men's issues are and call out feminist hypocrisy and lies.

Second, I would like to give a massive thumbs up and amount of respect to those who are keeping true to the #GamerGate mission and values. We are so often seeing in the mainstream media reports of how #GamerGate is a bunch of basement-dwelling, cis, white, misogynist assholes who are just out to threaten and destroy women in the gaming industry and labeling the gamers calling for ethical reform (and I feel sick when I have to report this) … TERRORISTS. However, it is through Twitter that I have seen the people behind #GamerGate condemning unethical journalists, supporting people who are being doxxed or harassed (irrespective of whether they are pro- or anti-#GamerGate), and showing an unlimited amount of logic and evidence-based reasons for why the fight is yet but hardly over.

Time and time again, we see arguments come onto platforms such as Facebook, where people like one side or the other and (generally) a lot of people agree with one another. However, Twitter is a completely open and interactive platform where you throw yourself and an idea into an unfiltered battlefield and it is "everyone for themselves."

That is, until a community of strangers start standing up for what is right and will jump in to stomp out any backlash or lies you may receive. This leads to you connecting with people and learning so much!—whether it supports your view or not.

#GamerGate is being attacked and misrepresented globally and being presented to be about sexism in the industry and community when it is not. Feminists and anti-feminists alike are coming together to stand up against this. Gamers are breaking down the incorrect generalization of the community being a "cis white he-man woman-haters' club" with people of all ages, genders, nationalities, political preferences, religious stances, and walks of life standing up and saying NO to the media portrayal.

Twitter hurts my head though, with the amount of attacks women who have rejected feminism are receiving and the complete ignorance and dismissal of evidence that men are being attacked, forgotten, and abused in this world. It hurts my head to see how many young women have fallen victim to the indoctrination of society and the education system and who actually believe they are not equal. Those who have been conditioned to believe false statistics and developed with the view that just by being female they are automatically a victim and a target.

It hurts my head that the gaming community, which is constantly bullied and harassed, are being made out as the biggest threat to women. It really sucks to see these people becoming a target once again for more lies and hysteria about a group who just wants to have fun and be left alone to do what they enjoy. That is not abusing or harming women.

Twitter has bought together the VERY STRONG to target #WomenAgainstFeminism, #GamerGate, and those likewise strong and dedicated people focusing on men's rights and men who are being abused just as much as women.

It is becoming clearer each day that we face the same backlash and smokescreen: what we fight for is not real, we need to check our privilege, and we hate women … can anyone say “straw man”?

Our battle for respect, truth, and equality cannot be won with the feminist agenda gaining more exposure and support than our truth.

We need to keep strong and keep fighting out of respect for those before us and for those in generations to come who will be hurt by what is happening now.

Twitter has also warmed my heart, as I have seen and met SO MANY people doing just that.

The war is not over, the battle is not won—this is one hell of a boss fight we are facing, and it can get hard. It does bring you down and open you as a target when you are speaking against a toxic movement, but I ask you to keep strong and support one another as you have been.

The world is round and the truth has a way of making its way around. It is becoming a battlefield because they are TERRIFIED that we are bringing them undone. But this is just the beginning and we can make a difference—we already are, but we have much farther to go.

A few things to remember as my closing:

- Report and boost ALL harassment you see, no matter who it is happening to. Tag #GamerGate Harassment Patrol to boost and bring an end to bullying and harassment.
- You are a consumer and a gamer, not a GamerGater—do not identify yourself as one.
- Be open to both sides of the argument and keep educated and informed on both.
- Anytime someone accuses you of hating women and being a misogynist for supporting an ethical reform tag (#WomenAgainstFeminism) to highlight how the feminist lies are impacting you, allow us to keep records of this. You are under attack by the feminist agenda and we do not stand for this. We will speak out and we will be heard.

North Dakota shared parenting PSA—Vote yes for families & children

Tim Goldich has been a soft-spoken Men's Rights Advocate for many years. Are we reaching a point where maybe people will listen to the soft-spoken, and where yelling just to get a smidge of attention isn't quite so necessary? We'll see. In the meantime, enjoy this excellent video by Mr. Goldich.

The future of fatherhood: North Dakota's equal parenting initiative

Hannah Wallen · 3 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

North Dakota's November 4, 2014, ballot includes an equal parenting initiative statute for fathers' rights in custody cases. Interestingly, all 25 members of the sponsoring committee for the petition are women. The statute, if approved, will add the following to North Dakota law:

- The North Dakota state policy will be that "no requesting biological or adoptive parent shall be denied equal parental rights and responsibilities, parenting time, primary residential responsibility and decision-making responsibility of a child in a custody case";
- A legal presumption that each parent in a child custody case is fit to parent, unless "clear and convincing evidence" demonstrates otherwise;
- A legal presumption that as both parents are presumed fit, an award of equal parental rights and responsibilities, parenting time, primary residential responsibility, and decision-making responsibility of a child is in the best interest of the child;
- The requirement that the presumption of fitness may only be rebutted by clear and convincing evidence;
- The requirement that the court shall support departures from equal parenting time with written findings of fact and conclusions of law.

The wording of the statute requires the court to consider many other factors affecting the best interests of the child. This provides the court with a guideline that can affect a judge's decision regarding what type of arrangement will most benefit the child, including factors such as each parent's ability to provide for the child's needs, each parent's relationship with the child, the living environment with which each parent will provide the child, and any impact a change of living arrangement may have on the child.

According to The Washington Post, opponents of the statute claim it would force an equal parenting arrangement on children of parents who live in different cities or even different states. However, according to the text of the bill, judges hearing custody cases must consider "the home, school, and community records of the child and the potential effect of any change" to be factors impacting the best interest of the child.

Arguments listed on Ballotpedia in opposition to the statue are basically claims that the measure is about parents' wishes rather than the best interest of the children. This argument rests on the presumption that separating a child from one parent at the behest of the other is so harmless that it can be considered secondary to the presumed benefit of simplifying the custodial parent's life, and therefore the child's life.

The reality is that cutting fathers out of their children's lives can have significant negative impact on the child. Data from the 2010 census indicates that custodial single mothers are more likely than custodial single fathers to fail to earn enough of a living to provide for their children, relying instead on a combination of welfare and child support.

A study by Mary Corcoran and Roger Gordon of the University of Michigan shows that receipt of welfare income has negative effects on the long-term employment and earnings capacity of young boys. That study also found that both boys and girls were twice as likely to become unwed teen parents if raised in a fatherless home.

Research by Sara McLanahan at Princeton University suggests that boys are significantly more likely to end up in jail or prison by the time they turn 30 if they are raised by a single mother.

Bruce Ellis of the University of Arizona found that about one-third of girls whose fathers left the home before they turned six ended up pregnant as teenagers, compared with just 5% of girls whose fathers were there throughout their childhood.

This indicates that, barring factors such as abuse or neglect that would change the impact of the relationship, a child's relationship with his or her father is as vital to his or her welfare and well-being as the relationship with his or her mother. In other words, maintaining consistent contact and close relationships with both parents is in the best interest of the child.

- Existing information on the behavior of custodial mothers following divorce cases does not indicate that they're giving children that opportunity but instead are denying them time with their fathers.
- 40% of mothers reported that they had interfered with the non-custodial father's visitation on at least one occasion, to punish their ex-spouse.
- Between 25% and 33% of mothers denied visits.
- 90% of the violence and kidnapping we have seen are in sole custody situations in which the sole custodial parent fears losing his or her custody status, or the parentectomized parent kidnaps the child away from the sole custody parent, who possessively blocks the visiting parent from access.

> —"Frequency of Visitation by Divorced Fathers: Differences in Reports by Fathers and Mothers," Sanford H. Braver, Ph.D., Sharlene A. Wolchik, Ph.D., Irwin M. Sandler, Ph.D., Bruce S. Fogas, Ph.D., and Daria Zvetina, M.Ed.

- Unilateral abuse of parental custodial power is more common in court-ordered sole custody situations.

> —"Child Custody and Parental Cooperation," Frank Williams, M.D., Dir. Psychiatry

- Overall, approximately 50% of mothers see no value in the father's continued contact with his children.

> —Surviving the Breakup, Joan B. Kelly and Judith S. Wallerstein

- The former spouse [mother] was the greatest obstacle to having more frequent contact with the children.

> —"Increasing Our Understanding of Fathers Who Have Infrequent Contact With Their Children," James R. Dudley, Professor, University North Carolina

- 70% of fathers felt they had too little time with their children.
- Very few of the children were satisfied with the amount of contact with their fathers after divorce.
- Few men can afford to legally contest every infringement of the visitation agreement.

> —"Visitation and the Noncustodial Father," Mary Ann P. Koch and Carol R. Lowery (Journal of Divorce, Vol. 8, No. 2, Winter 1984)

This means that not only does the current mode of handling custody deny the child sufficient time with the non-custodial parent, at least in cases of custodial mothers it also puts the child at risk for being denied most or all paternal contact, a behavior that, as some of the above information has shown, is not in the best interest of the child.

It is clear that the best way to protect children from becoming pawns or accessories in their parents' post-divorce emotional conflicts is to ensure that neither parent has the state-enforced power to arbitrarily interfere with the other's interaction with the child. A law that mandates the equal presumption that each is a fit parent, and the court's reasonable enforcement of equal parenting rights, is exactly what is needed.

The man who donated £1,000 to the current J4MB appeal explains his motivations

I should like to start this piece by thanking AVfM supporters from around the world for their generous donations toward funding J4MB advertising materials for the May 2015 general election in the UK.

The other day someone anonymously donated £1,000 to our current appeal, the largest donation we've yet received as a party. We had the person's pseudonym—"numbCruncher"—and an email address, so we wrote to thank him (from experience we know donors of substantial sums are far more likely to be male than female) for the generous donation and asked him for his motivations. He turned out to be a British man, and he responded to the question over a couple of emails. With his kind permission, the content is reproduced below:

> No problem, Mike. Thank YOU for the great work you are doing.
> I made the donation because there is nothing else in the world that I want to do with my money. Every time I switch on the TV, every newspaper I look at, I see men being run down and demonised. It is ME they are talking about. It is ME that is the target of their contempt. Society makes a hell of a lot of demands on me and gives very little back except spite. I have no desire to engage with it on these terms.
> I'm not interested in providing for some ungrateful woman who will openly show her contempt for me and my gender whilst expecting me to make her feel wonderful. I am not interested in funding feminist propaganda via my taxes. I would much rather spend my money on people who respect a fundamental part of who I am. I would much rather work for people who represent my interests.
> I'm also more than happy to provide this financial support. I don't know when I'll be able to make another donation but I'm confident you will use the money well.
> I think we've all seen so much of the "men bad, women good" narrative in our lives. I see so many biased treatments of gender issues in the media—particularly on the BBC. I have been in contact with the Equalities Commission about the lack of men in primary school teaching, but they simply ignore men's issues. I've contacted my MP about the vast differences in unexpected deaths between baby boys and baby girls, but ministers are not interested in funding research into the problem. I contacted the CPS about their case handling guidelines—I think the domestic violence guidelines had been created with the input of an organisation called Women against Violence. No men's organisations were consulted. Again, my protests were simply ignored.
> At the same time, I see even the most tenuous feminist causes splashed all over the media and given unbelievable levels of publicity. Feminist commentators get away with displaying the most blatant prejudice and contempt for men. Even going back to when I was in school (which was a LONG time ago!) I remember us being taught feminist ideology as a formal part of the curriculum. The lessons said nothing about the issues men face. Instead, the teachers actually taught us that the boys would become obsolete and irrelevant in a few years' time.
> It's no good us sitting around saying "why doesn't somebody DO something about all this?" WE have to do something—no one else is going to do it for us. I don't have the verbal dexterity, the dialectic skill or the pugnacity to be a politician. But I CAN spare this money now, and I want to use it to help people who are working for political change.
> I don't particularly agree with UKIP [United Kingdom Independence Party], but their example does give me hope. Five years ago they were written off as a joke or ignored completely. Now the whole political establishment is sitting up and taking notice of them. Five years ago no one could raise the question of immigration without being labelled a racist. That has changed too. Through their persistence, the Scottish Nationalists also experienced a massive increase in the respect they receive from "mainstream" politicians.

> At the moment, when they are not busy ignoring us, a lot of people label us as misogynists for even questioning feminist propaganda. I hope the gender debate can mature in a similar way and I see J4MB as an important part of that process.
> I'm tired of being ignored by officialdom whenever I raise men's rights issues. I think we're socially conditioned to not care about men and the struggles they face. Feminists reinforce this and try to shout us down or silence us when we stand up for ourselves. They can bring all sorts of social pressures—both traditional and new—to bear on men, to make us do what they want.
> But the one thing they can't do is tell us how to vote. Once you get in the voting booth, no one can shame you or ignore your views.
> J4MB seems to me to be the most politically-savvy and well-organised men's rights group in the UK. I have seen you getting airtime on the BBC (of all places!) and in other interviews, and you come across as a serious politician with an important cause. I wanted my money to be used in the way that I think is most likely to bring about change, and I think J4MB has the right strategy and leadership to achieve this.
> Keep up the good work.
> numbCruncher

Following an overnight donation of £100, the appeal total now stands a £3,165. This campaign is going to run for another seven days, to 23:59 on Sunday, November 9. We invite you to donate whatever you can afford to help us campaign for the human rights of men and boys—here. Thank you for your support.

Traitors to their sex

> There is a special place in hell for women who do not help other women.—Madeleine K. Albright

From the very beginning, feminism has been a movement as divided in its sensibilities as women are divided in ours. While many early feminist leaders were concerned with issues that affected all women of every class and situation (such as reproductive freedom and social, legal, economic, and educational equality) and by their efforts reshaped Western society for the better, the majority of rank-and-file feminists (especially in the US and UK) were unimaginative, middle-class White women who were primarily concerned with their own peeves rather than the very real needs of women who were lower-class, non-White, or unconventional. But whenever I dare to make statements like this, I am often countered with a disingenuous "Feminists are just people who want women to have equal rights with men." If only that were true! Certainly some feminists were and are like that, and Goddess bless them for it, but then as now most simply used the movement as most people use any political or social movement, namely as an excuse to control others. While the best and brightest early feminists were working to win rights for individual women and thereby strengthen liberty for all people, the majority were working to do the exact opposite by imposing their own prudish, repressed, Christian, Victorian, and feminine sexual morality on the 85% or more of society who were none of those things.

These conflicting attitudes about freedom of choice vs. conventional Victorian sexual morality can be seen in the person of Josephine Butler (1828-1906), who recognized that English law of the time (especially the draconian Contagious Disease Acts) stripped prostitutes of their rights as Englishwomen and so campaigned tirelessly for the repeal of those laws for 16 years. At the same time, Butler (like most Victorians) believed that women were essentially asexual and so could not accept that any woman might freely choose to exploit the male sexual appetite in order to earn a living; the very idea was anathema to her rigid Christian thinking. She therefore concluded that it was actually whores who were the exploited ones, childlike victims of male lust who had been forced into lives of "degradation" by male oppression. Like so many people both then and now, Butler was so convinced that her opinions were "right" that she imagined anyone who believed differently must be suffering from some form of impaired judgment.

Butler was very charismatic and attracted many middle-class feminists to her cause, but after the repeal of the Contagious Disease Acts in 1886, prostitutes were no longer the cause célèbre; when they refused to repent their whoredom and embrace "honest work" and conventional morality, the feminists abandoned their sympathy like yesterday's newspaper and declared war on our entire profession, vowing to abolish it entirely. Butler founded the Social Purity Alliance, an organization dedicated to imposing middle-class Victorian standards of chastity (i.e., repugnance for sex) onto men, and it was but the first of a host of similar organizations that sprang up on both sides of the Atlantic throughout the 1880s and 1890s. Though the movement boasted a number of high-profile men (such as William Booth of Salvation Army fame and the American health-farm proprietor John Kellogg, who touted corn flakes as a "cure" for masturbation in adolescent boys), the overwhelming majority of its members were female. And though many of these came from conservative Christian backgrounds, many others were former Butlerites; middle-class "feminists" had shown their true colors and abandoned the drive to win rights for the disenfranchised in favor of one that aimed to restrict the rights of everyone. One goal of the social purity movement was the imposition of universal temperance (eventually resulting in Prohibition in the US), but the more important one for our purposes was the war on whores. While male rulers had always been largely content to "control" or ghettoize prostitutes, the purity crusaders vowed to wipe us from the face of the Earth, and their newfound political clout (which increased dramatically after women were given the vote in almost every Western nation in the first two decades of the 20th century) resulted in an unprecedented wave of harsh, repressive laws directed against the women who so offended the retarded sexual sensibilities of their privileged bourgeois sisters.

The purity crusaders used many propaganda weapons against prostitutes, but chief among these were disease scares and the "White slavery" hysteria. As several times before in history, whores were vilified as dirty plague-carriers, and this campaign of misinformation was so well-organized that the notion is still deeply imbedded in the public consciousness a century later despite ample evidence to the contrary. But the "White slavery" propaganda was even more effective; the unholy alliance of middle-class feminists and puritanical religious zealots managed to convince the public, the media, and governments that there was a huge international trade in underage girls, abducted and forced into sexual slavery in foreign countries. The fact that there was absolutely no evidence for such a vast conspiracy made no difference whatsoever; the public devoured lurid stories of child prostitution, and throughout the Western world (especially in English-speaking countries) voluntary adult prostitution was banned under the excuse of combating involuntary prostitution of children. The brothels were closed, girls were forced into the streets, and the pimp as we know him today first appeared; in the name of "freeing" women from male "exploitation," these so-called "feminists" had actually surrendered many women into a new form of male domination.

The war on whores reached its peak in the 1920s but ran out of steam when the Great Depression gave middle-class feminists something more important to worry about; that was followed closely by the Second World War. But once Hitler was safely buried and the dust began to settle, the stifling conformity of the 1950s inspired a new generation of feminists. As in the first wave of feminism 100 years before, the best and brightest feminists concerned themselves with the big issues and the rights of individual women, while the majority of rank-and-file feminists were once again unimaginative, middle-class White women who were primarily concerned with their own peeves rather than the very real needs of women who were lower-class, non-White, or unconventional. One of the big issues this time around was sex; as I discussed in my column of July 20 2010, scientific inquiry had at last exploded the myths about female sexuality that drove so much of the first feminists' agenda, and for the first time in modern history "respectable" women were free to think and talk about a subject previously restricted to their whore sisters; the so-called "sexual revolution" had arrived.

Unfortunately, the evaporation of the social purity movement had not resulted in an equivalent evaporation of the morality laws it had foisted on the populace, especially in the United States; far too many Americans are subject to a peculiar delusion I call "lawheadedness." A "lawhead" is one who believes that man-made laws are actually based in objective reality like physical laws; he is unable to comprehend that the majority of laws are completely arbitrary, and therefore views a violation of a "vice law" with the same horror that normal people reserve for rains of toads or spontaneous human combustion. Though lawheads are a minority of the population, they are disproportionately represented in positions of power, with the result that once a law is on the books it cannot usually be removed by any means short of armed insurrection. Despite the fact that in the 1960s many Americans became far more accepting of prostitution and other sex businesses, this was insufficient to cause prostitution law to even be questioned, much less repealed.

In the sexually "liberated" climate of the 1960s, many feminists found this situation abhorrent. They rightfully recognized that laws against prostitution are discriminatory in the extreme because they criminalize the only profession that is overwhelmingly practiced by and controlled by women; these early second-wave feminists understood that repression of prostitution is the repression of a woman's right to decide what to do with her own body, just as surely as banning abortion or birth control was. And since feminists were working to abolish the latter laws, it only made sense that they should work to abolish anti-prostitution laws as well. But by the early 1970s, the first-wave pattern was starting to repeat itself; the White, middle-class feminists who made up the majority of the movement monopolized debate and elbowed the hookers out, forcing us to start our own separate rights organizations such as COYOTE and the English Collective of Prostitutes. As yet there was no open hostility between whores and mainstream feminists, but sexually repressed caricatures like Kate Millet were working to change that; here's a quote from Millett which defines her view:

> Prostitution, when unmotivated by economic need, might well be defined as a species of psychological addiction, built on self-hatred through repetitions of the act of sale by which a whore is defined.

Recognize the Victorian rhetoric? It's the old "whores are subhuman" dressed up in modern pop-psychology drag. Millett and others like her started to pull feminism in a neo-Marxist direction, transforming what had been a positive movement about making women equal partners with men into a vicious political organization whose catechism was the old Marxist poison of class warfare, except with "patriarchy" substituted for "bourgeoisie" and "women" substituted for "proletariat."

By the end of the 1970s, feminism was in turmoil, torn between the true feminists and the sick, bitter neo-Marxists and their "gender war" rhetoric. But once AIDS appeared on the scene, the war was over, and the misandrists had won; the modern puritanism engendered by the AIDS scare shifted the balance of power to the anti-sex position, and sex workers of every kind (including everyone from porn stars to lingerie models) were demonized as gender-war "Uncle Toms," as typified in this quote from anti-whore activist Julie Burchill:

> Prostitution is the supreme triumph of capitalism. Worst of all, prostitution reinforces all the old dumb clichés about women's sexuality; that they are not built to enjoy sex and are little more than walking masturbation aids, things to be DONE TO, things so sensually null and void that they have to be paid to indulge in fornication, that women can be had, bought, as often as not sold from one man to another. When the sex war is won prostitutes should be shot as collaborators for their terrible betrayal of all women, for the moral tarring and feathering they give indigenous women who have had the bad luck to live in what they make their humping ground.

There is the neo-feminist position in all its histrionic, collectivistic, misogynistic, anti-sexual, completely-detached-from-reality putrescence; whores are evil, Burchill is saying, because by our comfort with sex we make prudish women like her look bad. Like the "learned" men of the 19th century, she portrays us as stunted creatures incapable of free moral choice, "things to be done to," in her words; note, however, that it is Burchill who so characterizes us, not her imaginary "patriarchy."

So in almost exactly a century, we've come full circle. As in 1910, we're still being blamed for spreading disease despite ample evidence to the contrary. As in 1910, authorities justify laws banning voluntary adult prostitution with the excuse that such bans somehow magically help them combat child prostitution and white slavery (only now they call it "human trafficking"). As in 1910, we are characterized as subhuman monsters somehow different from other women. And as in 1910, our worst enemies are not men but a certain type of twisted control-freak woman who is perfectly happy to kick her sisters in the teeth in order to advance her own selfish, prudish, repressive agenda.

Yes, Lena Dunham is a sex predator

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 4 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Yesterday, I tweeted this. Today, I have a bit more information and I fully retract that tweet. Well, not the part about Lena Dunham being a cunt, but the part about her not being a rapist. Dunham, from a very young age, groomed and sexually assaulted her younger sister and is just bag-of-fucking-hammers stupid enough to think that the rules about using children for sexual gratification do not apply to her.

Guess what, bitch? They do.

Let's back up a little and I will explain why I sent that tweet. Kids "playing doctor" is pretty normal stuff. I am completely outraged when children are charged with felony offenses or end up on sex offender registries or in sexual harassment classes for stuff that is perfectly innocent and normal. And of course those children are almost always boys. Even in preschool, boys are viewed by predominantly female staff and administration as predators and girls as innocent victims. It's misandry, pure and simple. Grown women hating men so much that they will vilify, attack, and sanction little boys while giving little girls passes for the same behavior. My tweet came out of a desire to protect children from vindictive women and a few misguided men who see kindergarten boys planting kisses on the cheeks of classmates as sex predators.

I admit I was taken aback by Dunham's own words in describing the events with her toddler sister and her mother's reaction, but I chalked it up to, perhaps, excessive interest, but nothing predatory.

> "Do we all have uteruses?" I asked my mother when I was seven.
> "Yes," she told me. "We're born with them, and with all our eggs, but they start out very small. And they aren't ready to make babies until we're older." I look at my sister, now a slim, tough one-year-old, and at her tiny belly. I imagined her eggs inside her, like the sack of spider eggs in Charlotte's Web, and her uterus, the size of a thimble.
> "Does her vagina look like mine?"
> "I guess so," my mother said. "Just smaller."
> One day, as I sat in our driveway in Long Island playing with blocks and buckets, my curiosity got the best of me. Grace was sitting up, babbling and smiling, and I leaned down between her legs and carefully spread open her vagina. She didn't resist and when I saw what was inside I shrieked.
> My mother came running. "Mama, Mama! Grace has something in there!"
> My mother didn't bother asking why I had opened Grace's vagina. This was within the spectrum of things I did. She just got on her knees and looked for herself. It quickly became apparent that Grace had stuffed six or seven pebbles in there. My mother removed them patiently while Grace cackled, thrilled that her prank had been a success.

Yeah, it squicked me out, but it still seemed like a bit of weird, innocent exploration.

Then people started tweeting me links to more of Dunham's own words and the innocence evaporated. Consider these:

> … anything a sexual predator might do to woo a small suburban girl I was trying.

Uh … what?????

Dunham's interest in her sister's infant genitals did not abate with maturity, as one would expect.

> As she grew, I took to bribing her for her time and affection: one dollar in quarters if I could do her makeup like a "motorcycle chick." Three pieces of candy if I could kiss her on the lips for five seconds. Whatever she wanted to watch on TV if she would just "relax on me."

Dunham even posted an image of the "motorcycle chick," calling her little sister "sex property," and the only thing screaming through my mind is Where the fuck are your parents**?

Where, indeed. Turns out the Dunham parents themselves had some fucked-up ideas about sexuality, boundaries, and age-appropriate visual materials. According to Kevin Williamson, writing for the National Review, [Dunham's] father, Carroll Dunham, is a painter noted for his primitive brand of highbrow pornography, his canvases anchored by puffy neon-pink labia; her photographer mother filled the family home with nude pictures of herself, "legs spread defiantly." Sounds delightful. That kind of misguided parenting might potentially explain the young Lena's uncomfortably bizarre interest in her little sister's sexual value, but Lena's story doesn't end with bribing her sister into kisses or "relaxing" into her.

> I shared a bed with my sister, Grace, until I was seventeen years old. She was afraid to sleep alone and would begin asking me around 5:00 P.M. every day whether she could sleep with me. I put on a big show of saying no, taking pleasure in watching her beg and sulk, but eventually I always relented. Her sticky, muscly little body thrashed beside me every night as I read Anne Sexton, watched reruns of SNL, sometimes even as I slipped my hand into my underwear to figure some stuff out.

Deliberately exploiting and tormenting her little sister and then masturbating beside her? This is full-on sex predator behavior. If this is the stuff Lena thought was okay to reveal, what did she think was not? I can't help but think that if a spectrum of behavior was taking place and this is what Lena thought was pretty tame, and not in the least bit awkward or completely fucking illegal, what was happening that she felt crossed the line? Is this the full extent of her interest in her sister's sexuality, or does the rabbit hole go deeper still?

Grace Dunham's tweets in response to the controversy are rather interesting. There is no vigorous defense of her sister, no denials of abuse, no rejection of the accusations against Lena. Grace instead discusses "heternormativity" and "normal behaviors."

She goes on to insist on the right to decide for herself what behaviors are “harmful.”

Gosh, it seems to me that when Warren Farrell suggested not all incestuous relationships appeared to have devastating emotional consequences, he was roundly decried in the media as a rape and pedophile apologist. Where is the outcry when Grace Dunham appears to be saying the exact same thing?

Finally, Grace encourages us to think about how we “police the sexuality of young women,” and one wonders if the young woman she is talking about is herself or her sister?

Do we think there is merit in policing the sexuality of teenaged men who might like to lie in bed with prepubescent girls and choke the chicken while they’re at it? Willow Smith and her parents sure caught holy hell, and it appears in that case, the chicken was breathing easy the whole time. That didn’t stop Child Services from getting involved. Where are Child Services now?

Hilariously, Dunham has responded to the various media sources reprinting her own words by demanding retractions. Retract what? You wrote the damn book, you idiot. Thankfully, Truth Revolt and Ben Shapiro have a fully functioning set of balls and have told Dunham to go fuck herself.

> We refuse. We refuse to withdraw our story or apologize for running it, because quoting a woman’s book does not constitute a “false” story, even if she is a prominent actress and left-wing activist. Lena Dunham may not like our interpretation of her book, but unfortunately for her and her attorneys, she wrote that book – and the First Amendment covers a good deal of material she may not like.

Let's not beat around the bush here: any man, no matter how famous, no matter how fabulous his left-wing cred, no matter how popular with the feminist in-group, would be facing the media guillotine for writing gleefully about sexually abusing his younger sister or brother. He would also be sitting in a jail cell facing felony charges.

I would never get behind calls to criminally charge Dunham or anyone else for engaging in completely innocent and perfectly normal childhood explorations of bodily differences. This is not what we are dealing with here. Grace Dunham may not feel personally harmed by what her sister did to her, but we live in a wider society in which actions have consequences and laws exist for a reason.

Lena Dunham sexually abused her much younger sister. She is a sex predator, and the fact that she openly, and with no apparent coercion, wrote about that abuse in a decidedly gleeful and unrepentant way suggests that she does not classify her own behavior as anything abusive or even shameful. That makes her a danger to every young woman she comes into contact with.

When peeling open your baby sister's vagina or masturbating next to her after intense episodes of emotional abuse seems like just a charming anecdote to put in a book, we are facing an abuser who is certainly sociopathic, if not outright psychotic.

Lena Dunham is a criminal who has openly admitted to the sexual abuse of a child.

Before all the feminists and left-wingers in the media rush to issue her the standard pussy pass, they might want to ask themselves this: Would you let Lena babysit your daughter? Would you?

Lena Dunham is a sex predator.

Arrest her. Charge her. Convict her. Shouldn't be hard, given she wrote her own evidence. And then put her where she belongs.

In fucking jail.

Man faces “street harassment” in New York City

AVfM Video Source · 4 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A thunderingly idiotic video from the “Hollaback!” campaign has been making the rounds. Here’s what a man experienced doing the same thing in less than a third of the time.

Double standards, anyone?

The bell finally tolls in Ellsworth, Maine

Paul Elam · 5 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

"Would you like some fries with that cheeseburger?"

That decidedly minimum wage proposition may well be the next words out of Maine's main rogue assistant prosecutor, Mary Kellett, as the political power of her office just got dropped in hot grease by the voters in Hancock and Washington Counties.

There's a new sheriff (make that DA) in town. His name is Matt Foster, and he is not here to serve Happy Meals. Foster took the election soundly from distant runner-up Bill Entwisle, a holdover subordinate from Carletta Bassano's office and participant in her prosecutorial reign of terror, which included using Mary Kellett as a legal mercenary against the (primarily male) citizens of the two-county area.

Foster ran a simple "clean up the mess" campaign, regularly citing the actions of Kellett and crew as evidence of why change was so desperately needed in that office.

With the final ballot bell still ringing in the ears of the fighters, this may also be a good time for many in the Ellsworth office to start looking for empty boxes and to start loading up their personal belongings. It is a chance to salvage football mugs, memorabilia, pictures of children, ceramic lobsters, and other memories of their time spent there, and to get them out before the inevitable broom in Matt Foster's hands starts doing its promised duty.

If Foster holds to his campaign message, we are about to see a slate wiped clean for the first time in 40 years.

The true hero of this story remains, at least in my mind, Vladek Filler. For over half a decade, he has stood defiantly with guns trained on him by the scurrilous likes of Carletta Bassano, Paul Cavanaugh, Bill Entwisle, and of course the now infamous Mary Kellett. He has never flinched. He has never backed down. And he has never quit fighting; for himself, for his children, and for justice.

We also must acknowledge the tireless work of the men and women in the Men's Human Rights Movement. The MHRM has played a clear and convincing role in proving that a minority of people, armed with integrity, truth, determination, and raw grit, can indeed change the course of history.

There are just too many of you to name, so I won't try. But I do hope that each and every one of you who helped, those who gave money, who wrote officials, who signed petitions, who tirelessly commented on the many news stories covering this monumental judicial indecency, take just a moment today to stop and reflect on what you have accomplished.

For a brief, precious moment, justice has finally been served, and you were the ones with the iron forehand. You drove in the point till the voters of Hancock and Washington Counties walked into the polls and drove out the cockroaches.

The work, however, is not over.

Soon Mary Kellett and her cohorts will be dusting off their CVs (along with their pride), making trips to the dry cleaners, and scouring their contacts for more work.

Kellett's promises are limited. She is damaged goods; the first prosecutor in the history of Maine to have been sanctioned and had her license to practice law suspended on multiple legal and ethical violations.

This will not read particularly well under the "special accomplishments" header of her CV.

But we can assure you at AVfM that wherever Kellett finds work, if it is in the capacity to further harm the lives of innocent human beings, we will be dogged and tenacious about making who she is known to her new employer, to the public at large, and especially to the people whose lives she may seek to ruin over nothing more than her own ideological hubris.

Corruption and evil are like water. They never really get destroyed. They just change form or occupy another space. Wherever that is, we will be there on top of it.

Toxic feminism experiences severe defeat in U.S. midterm elections

Dean Esmay · 5 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

As those of you who've been around AVfM for a while know, we don't do partisan politics. We view all major political parties currently in office in the United States (and most of the rest of the English-speaking world) as either passively or actively endorsing male disposability and blindly accepting misandry without batting an eye. Therefore, it needs to be emphasized up front: we are mostly happy with the results of last night's elections in the United States but not because we care who won. What we care about is the idea that lost.

Although not every race has been called yet, and at least one major race will not be settled until December, at this writing Republicans have picked up at least 7 Senate seats and 14 House of Representative seats. This gives them a solid majority in the Senate and a crushing majority in the House of Representatives. It appears likely that they will pick up a total of 8 or even 9 Senate seats before the counting is done, but two of those races at this writing are still being contested.

Are we at AVfM happy about this? I'd say most of us are. Is that because we're Republicans? No. Republicans have failed for decades now to make any substantive improvements for men and boys in areas such as divorce law, education, arrest and imprisonment issues, suicide, homelessness, lies about rape and domestic violence, and a list of other things as long as your arm. A Republican douchebag who vetoed an end to lifetime alimony was re-elected. Not one politician we're aware of won by talking about any issues negatively affecting men and boys (although feel free to let us know if there are any honorable exceptions that we missed).

We are nevertheless happy because one of America's two main political parties—which happens to be its oldest political party, the Democratic Party, founded by Andrew Jackson—has for many years been actively tied to the virulently hateful strain of the feminist movement that spreads lies about domestic violence, sexual assault, and fatherhood itself. This noxious type of feminism, including the National Organization for Women and other hate groups, some years ago crafted a phony threat narrative for the Democratic Party that they called the "War on Women," and Democrats have been using it ever since as a way to win elections.

Women are, after all, a majority of the American electorate, and if you tell them there's a war on against them, you will have no trouble getting a certain percentage to believe it. You will also get pernicious white knight/purple poodle types who believe it too, happy to stand up and say, "I'll save you!" to the "damsels in distress" who were never under any real threat to begin with.

The so-called War on Women threat narrative only ever amounted to this: some people thought women should have to pay for their own birth control, and some people are opposed to abortion. That's it. There's your "war on women." Throw in the standard lies about the non-existent pay gap and the phony rape crisis on college campuses, the typical sexist hate-narrative about toxic masculinity causing mass shootings, and the perpetual lies about domestic violence (you can find out the truth about domestic violence at WhiteRibbon.org, by the way) and you have what appears to be a winning election strategy.

Well, it appeared to be a winning narrative at the polls. Funny thing is, those using it have been steadily doing worse and worse in opinion polls. Furthermore, polls on the War on Women trope have begun showing that a majority of women, let alone men, are getting sick of hearing about this phony "war on women" bullshit. It increasingly appears that the American electorate in general has had enough of this poisonous, hateful, bigoted false-threat narrative. Indeed, at least one major figure in the Senate chose to make the non-existent "War on Women" the centerpiece of his campaign, and lost spectacularly, as did almost everyone else who leaned on this sexist trope.

The War on Women trope has been soundly defeated. Or if we were trying to be clever, we'd say, "The War on Women is over—women and men both won it."

But that would probably be speaking too soon; all that voters have really said is that the “women under attack!” narrative doesn’t work on them anymore. That doesn’t mean that toxic feminism, or the underlying gynocentrism that underpins so much of American politics, will be undone. But it does signal that a major underpinning of contemporary gender-feminist thought has been kicked out from under it.

Here at a A Voice for Men, we have some advice for Democrats: if you want to start winning again, feminism is not your savior, and you need to clean house. Just like Republicans did when they showed the John Birch Society and other loons the door decades ago, just like Democrats did when they let the “Dixiecrat” segregationists walk out the door, you need to look the National Organization for Women and other toxic hate organizations in the eye, point to the door, and say, “Get out.”

Many of my conservative pals scratch their heads at my own politics; they frequently accuse me of being a “leftist,” even though I’m not. My liberal pals often accuse me of being a right-winger, which I’m not. Some people will just never be able to handle someone who rejects the left-right spectrum (and also rejects the phony “You’re either a Marxist or you’re a Hayekian” dichotomy). If anyone cares how I voted in this election (I vote in every election): I voted entirely for a mix of wildly different third-party candidates to send an “anybody but you bums” message to the Big Two, helped vote a corrupt judge off the bench (judges are elected in non-partisan fashion in Michigan and we threw one bum out, yaya!), and voted on a couple of referendums on whether or not to allow wolf hunting (and how I voted on that is none of your business).

What do I want for American politics? Well, to be honest, I’d like to see a Constitutional convention to completely redesign our election system for mixed-member proportional representation and a whole bunch of other things. But since that won’t be happening any time soon, I want for Democrats to be the best and most principled Democrats they can be, and for Republicans to be the best and most principled Republicans they can be, and for the country to be better off because of it.

So here’s my suggestion to Democrats about how to come back from this really very embarrassing defeat: Toxic gender feminism is in your ranks, it’s hurting you, and it needs to be amputated and cauterized from your party. It’ll hurt like hell for a bit, but like excising a cancer, getting rid of it will leave you a healthier, more vibrant political party that does a better job not just for women but also for men and boys, whom you damn well ought to care just as much about.

And Republicans, we have a message for you: we’ll be watching you and ready to criticize you too. In fact, we’re halfway hoping you win the White House next election cycle so we can hold our Republican MRA friends’ feet to the fire and illustrate that Republicans are no friends to men and boys. You’re going to need to change your ways before we’ll trust you as a party either.

Subjective annoyance … or let's call it "street harassment"—The not so subtle racism of Hollaback!

Clayton Craddock · 6 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

There are now two videos making the rounds on the information superhighway. A few days ago it was that video of children using the F-word for that radical ideological cult they call gender feminism. FCKH8 used shocking images and inflammatory and incorrect statistics to sell T-shirts. Now we have a woman clearly using Black and Latino men as props to spread hate and distrust. The people behind this video, Hollaback!, want to perpetuate the gender war so that people can donate to yet another organization hell-bent on demonizing men.

This was a set-up and people fell for it. I feel that these organizations attempt to attract attention in ways that are repulsive. Hollaback! does their own agenda injustice by posting this video and calling the actions we see here "street harassment."

Have you even looked into the concept of street harassment? I have. It is just more nonsense from fringe members of the cult of man-haters. Until the actions rise to the legal definition of sexual harassment, catcalls will remain an annoying fact of life for some attractive women in our country.

Men who don't have high status, money, or position to entice and woo women tend to use low investment strategies in the pursuit of the opposite sex. It costs them nothing to catcall. It is completely free. They might stand in the street for days and be on the hunt for women and catcall. Some women in certain neighborhoods turn around and smile, they laugh, they giggle. To these men, this is seen as an open door and they eventually get a phone number or two. They achieve very high return for a minimal investment.

This happens often in places like the ones shown in the video. Over the past few days I've heard from women who have actually said, "No woman likes catcalling." They are completely wrong. Today, men have real options. Women in many communities in New York City are available and interested in getting attention from men through catcalling. Do I condone this behavior? No. Do I understand it? Yes. If it works just once, a man like this knows it will work again if he keeps trying. Low risk–high return.

Harassment is a crime. No crimes were committed within this video. Is catcalling annoying? Yes. Is it a crime? NO! Therefore, what is being described and depicted as harassment is really subjective annoyance, and annoyance is not a crime. All of the men I saw in the video seemed to be variations of the same man from the same neighborhood. There was not an accurate representation of life in New York City depicted here. It might have been more representative of certain people who live in those communities.

In this video, there were no threats made, no requests for sexual favors, no graphic descriptions of explicit sexual acts, no attempts to physically impede her movement. The majority of the men here were being complimentary, friendly, and behaving well within their First Amendment rights. In short, the men were behaving consistent with their gender role as the pursuer and initiator. The one man who was supposedly following her for five minutes was being rude and was way out of line, but let me tell you, my girlfriend gets approached ALL THE TIME. I expect this because she is beautiful. When a man compliments my girlfriend or attempts to catcall, a simple "thank you" or "no thanks" is the response she uses when she does not want to engage. It acknowledges them and shuts them down. Some keep trying, but she keeps moving toward her destination. She understands how it feels to be catcalled but knows how to handle herself in this city. It is the same approach anyone uses when bombarded by people on the street here in Manhattan when they are trying to sell you something. You either ignore them, acknowledge them, or engage.

By the way, this is not your average day in this city.

No one walks around for 10 hours looking for trouble. These events happened in certain parts of NYC (notably 125th Street). If this experiment took place near the financial district, and the woman in the video was surrounded by millionaires in Brooks Brothers suits, would this woman ignore their advances? I noticed that none of the streets included were Park, Madison, Fifth, or Lexington Ave. Neighborhoods like Brooklyn Heights, Park Slope, the Upper East Side, or Williamsburg were nowhere to be found. How about the High Line? Why not? Nothing filmed there either.

I find the racial politics of this video very problematic. When specifically asked about the demographics of the men featured in the video, Emily May, co-founder and executive director of Hollaback!, mentioned in an interview on the NPR show The Takeaway that it "cut across the racial and socioeconomic spectrum." If that were the case, then why edit the video to show predominately Black and Latino men? She never addressed or answered the question. The harassment of women by men is an important issue, but when attempts such as this one uphold the narrative that Black and Latino men are uncivilized brutes, then it does nothing but perpetuate the many ways Black and Latino men are stigmatized and demonized. Is justice really being served here?

When you look closely at the video, you will notice several scenes where the audio does not match the video. It appears as if there were cases of audio overdubs. Also, how do we know this was 10 hours, and where are the 108 supposed examples of street harassment? When asked about the absence of White men in the video and the editing process, director Rob Bliss replied, "We got a fair amount of white guys, but for whatever reason, a lot of what they said was in passing, or off camera," or was ruined by a siren or other noise. The final product, he writes, "is not a perfect representation of everything that happened." If that is the case and you find yourself editing out all the White men who catcalled, maybe you could have taken another 10 or 20 hours looking for that White guy. You can certainly find it if you really are looking for it.

Again, sexual harassment is a CRIME. Nothing here was criminal. Being an attractive woman who gets catcalls is another unfortunate aspect of living in a city of 8 million people. Do we strive for a better life? Yes. But to label all of these videotaped interactions as sexual harassment is stretching the definition.

How does one expect to interact in this large city and have no one talk to them or even say "Good morning"? Good luck figuring that one out.

The whole premise of this video is flawed and became a poorly executed exercise that achieved nothing except more confusion and negative attention for Hollaback! and radical gender feminism.

What is supposed to be done about "street harassment?" Do we make catcalling illegal? According to Hollaback!, yes.

Hollaback!'s mission statement says that the group is interested in modifying state and federal laws to punish offenders. This raises significant First Amendment concerns. They feel that the comments documented in this video are the "most pervasive forms of gender-based violence and one of the least legislated against." Hollaback! hopes to "inspire legislators, the police, and other authorities to take this issue seriously—to approach it with sensitivity, and to create policies that make everyone feel safe" because they feel catcalling is a "gateway crime" that ultimately "makes gender-based violence OK."

This sets a dangerous precedent.

Unfortunately, catcalling is symptomatic of a far deeper societal problem. It is important to note that, like most people, these men are not inherently bad; rather, they are acting based on their natural instincts and the expectations of the people in the community where they live.

As a healthy heterosexual male, I always notice women and I always appreciate when there is an attractive one in the room. That being said, I have never catcalled a woman or made any other sexual comments to a woman I was not intimate with. I try to the best of my ability to treat women exactly as I would a man. I attribute my behavior to my upbringing. My parents had rules for how I was to treat and respect women. In addition, they had guidelines for how my sisters and I were to conduct ourselves, which encompassed dating, dress, and a curfew. I do the same thing with my own children. My parents served and continue to serve as role models and demonstrate what a loving and respectful relationship looks like.

Nowadays, long-term relationships are on the decline, and as a result, proper relationship role models are becoming increasingly rare. It does not help matters that we live in a hook-up culture, which I think reinforces viewing a woman as a sexual object rather than as a person deserving of respect. Until Hollaback! addresses the larger societal problem, I do not think they will be very effective.

Their ultimate goal? They want to make free speech ILLEGAL!

Sexual harassment exists, but are we now redefining it to include casual greetings? This video was edited in such a way to make it look like the harassment is constant, which is false. Harassment is never acceptable, but I feel more sorry for the homeless men in the video than for the person the men in the video were saying hello to.

Why is it that so much attention is paid to what seems like a damsel in distress, when the truth is she wasn't. There was such an outcry in support of her over the past week even though this whole thing was a set-up and a massive hoax. We seem to neglect the plight of the men who are stuck in these communities and only focus on this one woman who is doing quite well and is under no form of "oppression" at all in this country. Why is it that men's issues are totally neglected, but we fall over one another to figure out a way to help out women who feel threatened by a man saying hello? It is time to call these people out and start asking deeper questions about what the motive of organizations like Hollaback! really are.

When we pay the same amount of attention to the gender aspect of homelessness, incarceration, job deaths, suicide, dropouts, and mortality rates, and discrimination in family courts, criminal courts, and domestic violence services, then maybe I'll sympathize with a woman being asked how her day is on the street too many times.

The miraculous rape laws of India

Virag Dhulia · 6 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

"Did you hear that the girl next door was raped?" "What do you mean by that?" "Well, at least that's what she claims, alleging that her neighbor raped her when he came to her house one afternoon asking for some milk for tea." And I was like, What nonsense is this? Why would someone want to rape over milk? It just didn't add up. But more on this later, after we analyze the scenario going around.

So I visited an old friend who is now married and has kids, and her eight-year-old son bumps into me and says, "Uncle, what exactly is rape?"

I was astounded and amused as well. As a child, I came to comprehend the meaning of the word rape much later into my adolescence, and it was probably appropriate as well since I was at the right age to comprehend things. But for an eight-year-old lad—who can't even comprehend many basic philosophies of life, including the importance to earn money—to be inquisitive about rape?!

I immediately gave a "look" to my friend, who said she would explain it to him separately so that the kid doesn't embarrass her further in her circles. While I understand her situation, and this being the age when the gen next needs their parents to double up as their buddies, I still wouldn't blame the kid for the question he asked. He's just a small child trying to understand the world around him, and the world around him is abuzz with the word rape more frequently than the word inflation.

Otherwise, the kid would have asked me, "What is inflation?" And it's inflation that he needs to worry about—not rape—for when he grows up, he needs to know the financial difficulties lying ahead of him, being a boy.

However, it's rape we are teaching him at the tender age of eight when he is probably not even aware that it is but natural for him to become attracted to a female.

So, the problem is grave, and naturally we need to blame someone. Who do we blame? Do we blame men, who are the natural accused in rape cases? Or do we blame feminists and feminist-dominated media for over-blowing the trumpet of rape? Or should we blame ourselves, as a society, for over-relying on feminist principles, feminist jurisprudence, and a feminist-dominated society for setting the record straight in an otherwise chaotic and turbulent world?

I would vote for the third party above. We have applied more emphasis to "feminist problems," and this is what we have come to. The kids are disoriented, asking the wrong questions at the wrong age. Normally, the inquisition quotient in kids is high, and if they are overfed with some particular information, they will embarrass the elders with these kinds of questions.

Having taken a pot shot at the social mindset, let's look at the ramifications. There are times when I actually sympathize with law-makers, I really do. Because law is low-hanging fruit for critics. As a society, we are faster than lightning in judging that a law is being misused, is clumsily drafted, is not getting implemented properly, or the intended beneficiaries of the law are not being reached, and so and so forth.

We often forget the fact that law is merely the effect and not the cause. The cause of law is the social mindset. Of late, the rape laws in India are very much in discussion (obvious with the incident of the kid mentioned above), and they are clearly reflective of the social mindset that we are now going to elaborate on.

Specifically in India, there's an overt feeling for converting even casual relationships between a man and a woman into marriage, and if the attempt doesn't succeed, then the man is arrested on rape charges. This is happening due to a flawed interpretation of section 376 of the Indian Penal Code. So, while technically there's no law to prosecute men for failed relationships, still we have been punishing men whose relationships do not culminate into marriage with rape charges.

Many times the threats of a false rape case and the procedural harassment that follows it force a man to marry the same girl who has accused him of alleged rape, and his life gets ruined further as the girl who has entered his life with threats and coercion continues to abuse him. Since the man is already under a lot of pressure due to the false accusation of a crime as heinous as rape, he submits to the social pressure and this paves the path for further silent abuse of the man.

As in India, we live in a society wrought with the mindset that any romantic relationship between a man and a woman should be converted into marriage. The flip side of this mindset, coupled with the inherent male hatred in the society, is that men are getting trapped into rape cases that aren't really cases of rape. But still, the feminist-dominated media presents these matters as rape, which creates a very bad image of India in the West.

While there are more reported rapes in the West than compared with India, when Westerners talk to Indians, it's like, "Oh, you are from Bangalore, the rape capital of India?" and that tells us the tremendous damage that feminist dogma, feminist jurisprudence, and the over-romance of the society with feminist organizations have done to us.

In fact, women are two times safer in India than they are in the West because, given the huge population of India, the crime rate is still very much less. However, vested interests are hell-bent on demeaning the image of India globally, and that's the reason one isolated gang-rape incident on December 16, 2012, was hyped, over-hyped, and overtly hyped not only to tarnish the image of India but also to spread poison in the society.

It beats the grey matter of my brain as to how after one incident, there's now a barrage of rape cases being bombarded into the media—as if suddenly the men of India have realized that the women in India are rape-able and rape is one pastime the men in India can indulge in.

How foolish we become as a society when we respond to such agenda-driven media and take part in passing laws that are unconstitutional, biased, anti-male, barbaric and archaic, wrought with a colonial mindset of tyranny, and that violate the human rights of men based on unverified media reports. And later, when those same laws victimize our innocent sons and brothers, we cry hoarse and blame the laws.

But wait one minute, didn't we pass those laws? Didn't we take to the streets bearing candles and shouting for tougher rape laws, being misled by the very media that has tarnished the image of India internationally? So when we are the cause (our inherent male hatred) calling for stricter laws, how can we blame the effect (the laws themselves)?

What we fail to realize as a society is that if we do not respect men's human rights, then we will never be able to make progress or reduce crime. In order to reduce crime, it's important not only to punish the criminal but also the criminal mindset that perpetrates crime. Misandry (social hatred against men) is a criminal mindset that validates the violation of men's human rights.

There have been many instances of male rape wherein the legal system has pardoned the female rapist merely because she was a woman and none batted an eyelid. This behavior is unacceptable. It is extremely important to punish women who commit crimes and not develop justifications around them to find an excuse to pardon a "helpless woman in a patriarchal society."

Coming back to the incident of the girl next door allegedly raped by a neighbor over a cup of tea, as long as we convert such nonchalant interactions between a man and a woman into crime, crime will never reduce, for there cannot be but two worlds exclusive to each gender. The lives of men and women would ever remain inclusive of each other, and we must learn to draw a line between humanism and cynicism.

In one such barbaric incident, a mob beat up a man in the state of Rajasthan, cutting his genitals as he was allegedly attempting to rape a teenaged girl. First, the allegation is unverified, and it could be very much possible that they were indulging in consensual sex. If an eight-year-old boy can ask about rape, then a teenaged girl can very well have sex. Second, even if it was an attempt to rape, the man should have been handed over to the police. Mob fury, barbarism, and social violence cannot be the solution to social problems.

The current practice of punishing men at the drop of a hat when a woman complains is not humanist in nature; it's cynicism at best, and men would find no reason to respond to the same in a humanist manner. But for the miraculous rape laws of India and their cynical implementation, men will continue to suffer from institutional, state-sponsored, and socially validated tyranny. The only way forward is to start respecting men's human rights, pivot our social mindset around it, and then change the miraculous rape laws of India.

The rape laws of India are miraculous not by their definition but by the way they have been converted into a weapon of vengeance and a tool to justify abuse and violence against a man. It is becoming fashionable to beat up a man and then frame him with rape charges to cover up the violence. This practice needs to stop.

Jack Barnes · 7 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

On September 22, 2014, Dana Bolger posted her article "It's on us to go beyond 'It's On Us'" on Feministing, in which she exposed her true nature and the true nature of feminism. See, in her mind, it isn't enough to reinforce the old male gender role that men are here to protect women and that men must be blamed for every single instance when women are not safe. Fellas, if something bad happens to a woman, it's your fault that she wasn't protected and your fault that the world isn't safe for women. Bolger promotes this despite the fact that feminism says that one of its goals is to destroy gender roles for men and women.

> Gender-based violence is not like the weather. It has direct, immediate human agents and is structural and systemic at its core.

If you want an example of a person engaging in victim-blaming and rape apologia, then Dana Bolger's article is it. A man raping a woman is gender violence, but any other form of rape isn't—that's what she's saying. She says that "gender violence" is "structural" and "systemic," i.e., the "patriarchy." She actually believes that men dominate and oppress women and that rape is a result of this domination and oppression. The "patriarchy" is a feminist myth proclaiming that we live (and have always lived) in a culture constructed by men to oppress women. In this cultural construct, rape is condoned, supported, and encouraged as a way for men to keep women in a state of fear, thus under male control. Feminists even gave this "rape is the result of patriarchy" a name: "rape culture." In Bolger's bigoted little mind, the patriarchy is real, despite the mountain of historical and scientific evidence to the contrary.

Dana, there is no such thing as "gender-based" violence. It's an attempt to label any violence that is perpetrated by a man on a woman as a hate crime. Rape and sexual assault are perpetrated by men and women against men and women. There are no acts of violence limited to being perpetrated by one gender on another. Women are not special. Women as a group have not and are not oppressed by men as a group. Women deserve no special treatment. Deal with it.

> But the new campaign de-politicizes and de-genders sexual assault, portraying it as an easy-to-avoid problem solely between individuals, and making perpetrators out to be vague "someones" who do "something" to other "someones."

Um. Rape is between individuals or a group of individuals. Sexual assault is when "someone" does "something" sexual to "another someone" without the "other someone's" consent. Mmmkay?

I would strongly disagree that the new program "de-politicizes" and "de-genders" sexual assault. Much like a pimp, Barack Obama has worked hard to pull women into his political harem. In true feminist form, his new program puts women's safety squarely on men's shoulders, thus making his program gendered. But that's not what you meant, Dana, is it? Bolger is from the old "the personal is political" school of feminist hate. Rape, in the mind of a gender bigot (feminist), is political because it sometimes happens that a man rapes a woman. If a man (or a few men) rapes a woman (or a few women), then rape is a political struggle for all women. Remember: feminists believe that women are now and always have been treated similar to slaves on the cotton plantations of old. Rape is not just a crime but it's also the metaphorical "whips and chains" that keep all women under the control of all men. This is how feminists justify using rape as a women-only cause to net them millions of government and private-donor dollars and as a political bludgeon to force through their political agenda. This is why revealing the truth that rape is not obsession of women by men, thus not political, and that rape is not a gender issue because perpetrator doesn't equal male and victim doesn't equal female is cause for great concern for feminists.

> In reality, perpetrators are disproportionately likely to be men and their victims are disproportionately likely to be women (particularly queer and trans women, women of color, and women with disabilities), queer men, and > gender non-conforming folks.

There is a lot of money and political power at stake in continuing to lie about the true nature of sexual assault. Feminists must maintain the intentional misinformation that men rape and women are rape victims in order to keep the money flowing in and to keep their jobs as professional feminists—jobs for which they receive a salary. So, it's no wonder that Dana Bolger would boldface and flat-out lie about the ratios of male perpetrators to female victims, despite the growing evidence to the contrary. This is no surprise to MHRAs and non-/anti-feminists—we have seen this a thousand times before. But she extends the category of victim a little further. She pulls in "queer men and gender non-conforming folks," plus she breaks down women into subgroups. She says that straight women are less likely to be raped than "queer and trans women, women of color, and women with disabilities." Notice how, unsurprisingly, she doesn't cite a source for this. Does any of this sound familiar?

This is pure Social Justice Warrior bullshit. SJWs believe that equality can only be achieved through discrimination, along the lines of: "Women must be treated as special, with special women-only rights and privileges that men do not have, in order to have equality." You can insert any of the following in the previous sentence—other race vs. White, other sexual orientation vs. straight, other religious beliefs vs. Christian, not able-bodied vs. able-bodied, not thin vs. thin, etc.—and all would be true according to SJWs.

Bolger uses men vs. women and "gender-based" violence when it suits her purpose. And when it doesn't, she throws some women under the bus in favor of more fertile victimhood. It's men raping women until a more oppressed group comes along; then it's men raping gay men, transgender men, women of color (as if White isn't a color), lesbians, etc. It's all about victimhood because victimhood is the only claim feminists have. Without it, they don't have a leg to stand on. Feminists have always been happy to throw men under the bus to maintain their false narrative that women are victims. Now they will throw some women under the bus for better quality victimhood and to leech from groups like non-White, non-straight, non-Christian, etc. After generations, feminists are finally showing that they don't give a damn about women—they focus only on victimhood and the money and political power said victimhood brings them.

> The It's On Us campaign's failure to conceptualize of violence as systemic and structural guts meaningful responses to it. While bystander intervention more broadly may be usefully integrated into a more comprehensive anti-violence approach, it has serious limitations. And the way it's framed in It's On Us, it offers a strategy to avoid violence, not meaningfully reduce it. The campaign's tips — like guiding your friends away from perpetrators at parties — might help an individual woman avoid a rapist in an individual instance but it won't stop that rapist from turning to the next girl down the bar. It makes the problem seem discrete and manageable, with a quick fix that fits comfortably within an existing structure of how our world works, who has power, and who doesn't. It enlists men, for instance, to protect their female friends at a bar but not to recognize their own power and privilege, the subtle ways in which they enact violence all the time.

Any sane, rational adult knows that we will never live in a world free of violence. But no sane, rational person has ever labeled feminist bigotry as being sane and rational. The only way to lessen the chance that violence will happen to you is to take steps to prevent it from happening to you. It's called being an adult. What will help "the next girl down the bar"? Why, teaching her and all people how to avoid being the victim of violence, of course. Maybe we could start by teaching her that she is an adult now and as an adult her safety is her responsibility and no one else's? Mmmkay, Dana?

The "who has the power and who doesn't" part of Bolger's article comes from her belief in the mythical flying spaghetti monster that eats kittens and steals presents from under the Christmas tree known as the "patriarchy," which we discussed earlier. Remember that in patriarchy land, men have all the power and women have none. Women can't do anything to stop violence from happening to them. Women are just here, wandering around like goldfish in a shark tank, waiting for their turn to be dinner. If that sounds like misogyny, that's because it is. Women are not mindless robots. Women are not helpless children. Women are fully capable adults. Everyone who has a fully functioning, healthy brain and body has power over their own actions. They have the power to be responsible for their own safety.

"… the subtle ways in which they enact violence all the time"—this is feminism. No one but feminists and SJWs believe that men commit acts of violence against women all the time. But the fact that they are so detached from reality is an important part of understanding the true nature of feminism. Why do they believe that all men are enacting violence on all women all the time? What purpose could this serve?

Feminists and SJWs believe in something called micro-aggressions. Micro-aggressions are small behaviors and actions that most people don't even notice as aggressive or violent—mainly because these actions are not aggressive or violent. Micro-aggressions can include dirty jokes about a woman, calling a woman names, not taking a person's idiotic opinion seriously if the person holding said opinion is a woman, etc. If you're a man and you laugh when a woman says something stupid, then you have committed a micro-aggression against all women. See how that works?

This idea that all men commit acts of violence against all women all the time serves nothing more than to bolster female victimhood. Again, female victimhood is the life force of feminism. It promotes the idea that women are so weak that when they hear a dirty joke about a woman, it damages them. Men can't call women out on their bullshit the way they can another man. You can't call a crazy person crazy if that crazy person is a woman. The idea of micro-aggressions, coupled with social pressure, is how feminists control free speech. Free speech and the free exchange of ideas lead to scrutiny and criticism—something feminists avoid like witches avoid water. These micro-aggression ideas lead to policies that we are seeing develop on college and university campuses.

> It's On You to recognize and dismantle institutions that tolerate and perpetuate violence. If you go to a school that doesn't expel perpetrators, It's On You to hold your school accountable for its abuses. It's On You not to invite rapists to your parties, and not to attend theirs. (Some sororities maintain lists of men who have raped their members and cut off ties with the fraternities to which the perpetrators belong.) If your favorite sports team shelters abusers and blames survivors, It's On You to call it out and refuse to support it with your dollars. It's On You to boycott the actors, musicians, and artists who beat up their partners.

If someone accuses someone of rape, it's on you to socially ostracize that person based on the accusation alone. None of this pesky "innocent until proven guilty" stuff. That's so last century.

> It's On You to condemn police violence against women of color — and to do so loudly and publicly.

Only women "of color"?

> If you live in a country where your government doesn't hold universities accountable for civil rights violations (hint: ours) …

In case you haven't noticed, Dana, thanks to feminist activism, the federal government has ordered the removal of rights from anyone accused of a sex crime on post-secondary campuses. Yep, I'm talking about those irksome Constitutional rights like presumption of innocence and due process.

> It should go without saying that you shouldn't rape anyone; you should also make a commitment to recognize the ways in which you exert power over less privileged folks in your life, the ways in which you may violate someone else's boundaries without realizing.

Here she goes with the "micro-aggressions" thing again. Let's put this to rest once and for all. Social Justice Warriors can take their "you're privileged so you oppress people by merely existing" hate and bigotry and go jump off a bridge. If I can violate someone's boundaries without realizing it, then I'm not the problem. That person is the problem. These people need to learn that the world doesn't revolve around them and their victimhood complex.

> It's On You to be conscious of the space your voice takes up, and not to talk over folks with less power. (I once attended an anti-rape rally where a group of white male students took the megaphone away from a female survivor, telling her they'd had enough.)

Notice the racism and sexism Bolger displays in the above statement. Dana, we all have had enough. We will talk about whatever we want to whomever we want. We will not allow victimhood to trump common sense, reason, logic, and the truth. Deal with it.

> It's On You to use your privilege to create space for marginalized folks to speak and be heard.

Um. No. If people want to speak, it's on them to open their mouths. No one is responsible for you exercising your right and ability to speak except you. No one has the right to speak publicly and be free from being challenged on what they said. Deal with it.

Dana Bolger is a perfect example of the nature of feminism and SJWs. She personifies the bigotry and hate that is at the heart of these ideologies. The privilege checklist of those who use discrimination in order to achieve equality is sickening, to say the least. As Men's Human Rights Activists fight for the right of men and boys to be seen as fully human and deserving of equal rights and treatment, we must remember that feminism isn't our only enemy. People like Bolger aren't just a threat to gender equality but also to the equality of every person around the world. While we focus on gender equality, we mustn't forget that we are a part of a larger group while also realizing that we are on our own because men rank dead last every time, even among the groups fighting against SJWs—and even among some non-/anti-feminists.

Samantha Allen explains why she hates men

AVFM · 7 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial note: The following completely unedited post was written by Samantha Allen on Tumblr. It has since been deleted from Tumblr after it was uncovered by people on Reddit and numerous other sites. It is archived here and here and has been noted on other sources online. We wanted to make sure as many people as possible know her hateful, bigoted views, especially readers of The Daily Beast, The Daily Dot, Salon, Huffington Post, The Advocate, Mic, Kinsey Confidential, Jacobin, and Adult Magazine–all of whom she has written for. We welcome her to write a followup piece explaining herself and apologizing to men, to boys, and to the women who love them, and hope she comes to realize that feminism is, indeed, a hate movement.—Eds.

what misandry means to me

i'm a misandrist. that means i hate men. i'm not a cute misandrist. i don't have a fridge magnet that says, "boys are stupid, throw rocks at them." my loathing cannot be contained by a fridge magnet.

i am not an equality feminist. i don't believe that an asymmetrical world will be cured by polite obsequence to male-dominated systems. i am not a liberal humanist. i don't believe that i need to stand up for men when they've been standing on top of everyone else.

misandry is not a political program; it's a stance. i don't care whether hating men is a good or bad feminist strategy (and i care even less what men think about misandry). i don't think i have a responsibility to change the world. i think i have a responsibility to survive.

imagine being born into a world where your experiences are not represented, where your work is undervalued, where your body is always open for comment, where your friends are routinely harassed and abused, and where this situation will literally be your reality for your entire life. if you're a woman, you don't have to imagine that world because you already live in it.

if you're a man, you never have and never will live in that world. but try to imagine what it feels like. i'll tell you: when i think about the kind of world we live in, i feel simultaneously hopeless and infuriated and i oscillate so quickly between those two emotional extremes that i literally start to get dizzy.

being a woman in this world feels like getting buried alive. think about that. think about feeling that every day.

why do i have to answer the question "why do i hate men?" when men don't even stop to ask why they have always hated women. i have to answer the question because men can't tolerate for one second the sort of contempt they've had for women for thousands of years.

why do i hate men? because life is short. my life is getting shorter by the day and i want to fill it with women. in this sinking ship of a world, i just want to enjoy a tiny little space, a room, if you will, of my own. i want that room to be full of women and free from ego, hierarchy, sexual advances, and violence. i hate men because i can't even have that fucking room without them knocking on the walls. you have the entire fucking house. go play in it. find something else to do.

i hate men because it's not my job to fix masculinity; it's my job to heal from it and to be together with my sisters as we try to make it through a hostile world. and yet i am expected to patiently educate men on how not to be an asshole. here's my only tip: stop spending so much time around men. they're assholes.

i hate men because men hate me and the burden to take the high road should not fall on my shoulders.

i am friends with some men, yes. usually these are men who have some experience of marginalization (whether via their race, class, gender identity, sexual identity, what have you) or who have gone through the self-interrogation and relational deprogramming necessary to build meaningful community with women. you don't just get to read a book and you're golden. you have to get fucking baptized in menstrual blood as far as i'm concerned.

i hate men doesn't mean i hate you. it means i hate your position in this world. it means i'm not obligated to like you. it means i don't have to talk to you if i don't want to. it means i get to have my space and i don't have to dance for you, smile at you, or soothe you. and you can put up with me being wary of you, can't you, because the world has a fucking red carpet waiting for you wherever you go.

1 in 4 women admit to violence in relationships

Rose McGowan gives a shame sandwich and marching orders to the gay community

Paul Elam · 8 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

"Gay men are as misogynistic as straight men, if not more so. I have an indictment of the gay community right now, I'm actually really upset with them."

This is just part of a rant directed at the gay community by Charmed actress Rose McGowan, in which she was defending her decision to host a party in defense of the Brunei-owned Beverly Hills Hotel.

In Brunei, being homosexual can get you the death penalty.

Not satisfied with simply being upset with the gay community, McGowan went on to be as insulting as she could, saying that gays have merely "fought for the right to stand on top of a float wearing an orange speedo, taking molly [MDMA]."

Apparently, McGowan's chief complaint, in which she stopped just short of calling gay men selfish faggots, is that they are too focused on their own issues and not dedicating enough time and energy to feminism.

Look, folks, I just write this shit. I don't, couldn't, make it up. And as bizarre as McGowan's rant is, it is not inconsistent with a theme that has been on the pages of this website for years.

The feminist movement has cast a sympathetic eye on the issues faced by gay men for a long time … as long as they have made themselves available as walkable poodles for the feminist cause. Feminists view gay men as a political utility, offering faux support in exchange for the appearance of inclusivity, and no one has made that more clear recently than Rose McGowan.

"You wanna talk about the fact that I have heard nobody in the gay community, no gay males, standing up for women on any level?" she asks.

Perhaps McGowan has just not been seeing any of the activism for women in the gay community that has gone on for the past few decades. Either that or she does not know fact from fabrication.

McGowan's real problem with gay men is the same problem she has with straight men. Neither group does (nor could they ever) enough for her and her feminist sisters.

African Americans essentially have the same problem. They busy themselves with their own affairs and do absolutely nothing for White Nationalism.

The selfishness is staggering.

Kidding aside, McGowan has an interesting analysis on why gay men might have the audacity not to obsess on feminist causes.

> I think it's what happens to you as a group when you are starting to get most of what you fought for? What do you do now?

You mean like feminists, Rose?

Other than fabricating a wage gap, rape culture, patriarchy theory, false stats on domestic violence, and complaining about all of it from the lobby of the Beverly Hills Hotel, have feminists so run out of things to do that the only thing left is to attack anyone else, including their longstanding allies, for dealing with their own issues too much?

Note to the gay community: This is what feminism looks like.

Second note to the gay community: I told you so.

McGowan adds arrogance to ignorance. “Women, by-and-large, have very much helped the gay community get to where they are today,” she huffs, failing to add, “Now heel, bitches!”

It will be curious to see what comes of the dissonance in the gay political community over this, though it may not be much. Feminists have so successfully co-opted the politics of sexuality that there is not much left for gay male political activists to do but ask politely for an apology, be quick to forgive, and move forward with their heads down, minding their place. And I am guessing sadly that this is what they will do.

I remain hopeful, though, that the MHRM will continue to gain in appeal for men who happen to be gay. Just as I am hopeful that more gay men will branch out completely on their own, not beholden to serving feminist ideals. All it will take is for a few more like Rose McGowan to step up and show them they have been used all along.

Allan Anderson · 8 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

As the Ebola outbreak grows and panic in the US increases, I am struck by the similarities and lessons to be drawn in our handling of "sexual violence" and perhaps other men's issues. Both Ebola and rape are greatly feared, the cause largely invisible, with even the number of victims uncertain. Both are subject to a wide range of beliefs, some superstitious, some more scientific or "reality-based." Many varied responses offer some illusion of knowledge, but in fact great uncertainty remains. The mind craves certainty in the presence of threat and fear. Everyone you meet today could be carrying the deadly Ebola virus. Every man (or woman?) is a potential rapist. We have an epidemic of campus rape. Or it's a judgment from God. Or spread by Western healthcare workers or witchcraft. Or … not. It's all a hoax. Fear and uncertainty are the only certainty.

Epidemiologist Michael Osterholm, in a New York Times op-ed piece and a talk at Johns Hopkins Bloomberg School of Public Health, shockingly said, "Ebola has the potential to alter history as much as any plague has ever done." Wow. He also made some key points in how to stay credible and effective in this environment: admit what you don't know, avoid dogma, and prepare for and expect the unexpected. He remarks that the greatest obstacle to discovering the shape of the Earth was not ignorance but the illusion of knowledge. He quotes and paraphrases the famous physicist Richard Feynman to say that an effective public health response requires that reality must take precedence over public relations because nature cannot be fooled.

He argues that this is very different from saying, "We know nothing, we can do nothing, we … can't."

A lot of men's issues have this same invisibility to them. Men's pain is invisible. Men's pain is even taboo. We never see this pain, nor Ebola virus for that matter, but a lot of people are going to die anyway. Is men's pain even "real"? You might say both are a question of training.

I came to AVfM three years back attempting to understand the extreme hypocrisy, ignorance, and hostility of mental health professionals I encountered during three years studying, advocating for, and speaking about male survivors of childhood and adult sexual abuse and assault. They are there in plain sight, but it seems to require an electron microscope for some to see them. I found male survivors themselves really seemed to need and benefit from simply having a place to consider their experiences on their own terms. Advocates for homeless youth gave me a shocked double-take, grateful somebody was talking about what their homeless boys could not. Feminists and mental health professionals told me male victimization "doesn't happen" and all male survivors are sex offenders.

I've come to understand this situation as part of a larger problem of "misandry" and our mutually degrading feminist-inspired gender politics that repeats with similarities in problems such as parental alienation; paternity fraud; gendered prosecution and sentencing disparities; ignored male domestic violence victims; police violence; educational failures with boys and the "boy crisis"; falling male college enrollment; fatherless families; missing male role models/missing male childcare, elementary, and secondary teachers; male suicide, alcohol, chemical dependency, depression, and many other mental health problems; men's physical health and longevity disparities (five years less); male workplace deaths (92%) and injuries; male unemployment and homelessness; divorce, child support, and family court corruption; pervasive negative media depictions of males; medication of boys for normal boy behavior … it's a long list. A VERY long list. With little awareness and active suppression. (US statistics cited)

This is very much the story Paul Elam tells of how he watched feminist ideology supplant reality in a clinical chemical dependency environment.

Workplace deaths like the 100 men who fell to their deaths climbing cell towers since 2003 so Jessica Valenti can tweet about bathing in male tears.

Like the invisible Ebola virus, I learned that a LOT of men have past experiences of sexual abuse and assault. I learned to see many and sometimes deadly serious effects that are largely invisible as effects of abuse. Instead it's just seen as the way men are: violent, alcoholics, sex-addicted, solitary, suicidal, emotionally distant … This is not about a “victim culture.” It’s about assessing what can be done to help the wounded. I do wonder how DO you respond effectively to male sexual victimization when the politics is so crazy, the facts so uncertain, people are so afraid and misinformed, and professionals so incompetent, ineffective, and territorial while volunteer male survivors with first-hand knowledge are so hatefully silenced and attacked? Men are wise to stay silent. Anything you say can and will be used against you in a court of law.

Or perhaps it’s a hoax and I’m just captive to the victim culture. Or a false memory syndrome. Or whining for attention. Or testosterone damaged my brain. Or just need to man up. I’ve heard all that a lot too.

What lessons can we take from this? In his speech, Michael Osterholm spoke of:

Credibility is greater if you admit what you don’t know and don’t find yourself explaining huge discrepancies and failures. People are, in fact, less afraid of hearing that you don’t know than if you are wrong. I can only comment on sexual violence issues, but I wonder if there aren’t lessons in each of the other men’s issues I mentioned. That would be another hundred articles. For sexual violence issues, we really need choices to respond that don’t require certainty or even any knowledge about who is the victim and perpetrator when that is unknown. Is it a false accusation or truthful? Lacking clear evidence like an uncoerced confession, forcing legal solutions without legal evidence simply destroys the credibility of the justice system. What would that look like? I believe there are helpful responses just like when we don’t know exactly who has Ebola, whether a vaccine works, exactly how it’s transmitted, etc.

Dogma is the enemy. This is very different from staying with the science, the facts, the real evidence. Listening at length to actual men talk about sexual victimization has taught me things I never hear publicly—way, way beyond dismissive “men can be victims too” or even Spetsnaz’s fine video (about society’s dismissive view though, not men’s actual experiences). Feminist dogma, yes, is the enemy. So I would just say, it’s just extremely rare that men actually talk of their first-hand experiences of this, and if you are so lucky to hear of it, just try to listen and perhaps you will know a little more. Knowledge can be helpful if you don’t already know “the truth” of dogma, the silly notion of invisible “germs.” Never seen them!

Focus on if responses are effective without distorting the facts, often when the fact is that we don’t know what’s effective. Suffice it to say, there is very little help currently for suffering men when you cannot see or speak of suffering. What would evidence of help be? Less suffering! Fewer effects, like lower male suicide rates, less alcoholism in men, less depression, risky behavior, injuries and death of men, all unfortunately difficult to distinguish from many other effects, causes, and conditions. For three years I ran a male survivor group centered around asking men to ask themselves what would help and be in charge of getting that. Talk of suicide was very common, though usually as an expression of their hopeless isolation and not their intent to act (an important distinction). A lot of AVfM’s content is about gender politics and attacking who and what’s wrong. I would just say, this alone is not help. “Ebola is real,” say the public health announcements. Rape is rape (except when it’s not). Even detailed knowledge that Ebola is a virus is not sufficient to stop the likely deaths of I fear up to a million next year. Politics like AVfM’s may eventually lead to help, but that is very unclear. Politics is the mind killer, full of irrational, cognitive distortions, and a theory even suggests we reason only to look for arguments that support a given conclusion having little to do with “truth.” Truth seems to run way behind in the scheme of things. That is perhaps why dogma is the enemy because truth doesn’t stand a chance against dogma.

I have benefited from AVfM and a wider understanding of the many ways men are invisibly suffering in this culture, the similarities and differences between many issues besides the ones I personally have experience with. I am still at a loss on what response would be truly effective. Perhaps just making …. “media noise” about them will lead to help. In the meantime …

Africa has an epidemic of Ebola, and America has an epidemic of rape. Or not. Personally, I think it’s all a hoax.

Feminist video turns to child abuse to send distorted message

Barbara Kay · 8 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It's not often that my daughter pleads with me to write something about some or other cultural phenomenon. But recently she sent me a YouTube video and told me that I had to write about it.

I watched it. I have five granddaughters, ranging in age from ten to two. So yes, I knew I would have to write about it, but it's one of the toughest assignments I've ever given myself. Because my head was exploding with rage while I watched, it was hard to type. But yes, I have to write about it, and everyone who can write should write about it, and everyone who can't write should do something else: I don't know, maybe open the window, stick their heads out, and scream, "I'm mad as hell and I'm not going to take this anymore."

First, watch it. If you don't see anything wrong with it, stop reading because I am now going to insult you. To be okay with this video, you'd have to be okay with children serving as adults' toys, for whatever purpose adults want, in this case to embody the need for gender justice through the creative juxtaposition of childhood "innocence" with adult "knowing" through the "irony" of "adult" entertainment. To do that, you have to take young children who shouldn't be thinking or expressing certain kinds of adult thoughts and then get them to act as if it was their custom and normal to do so. Wink wink wink wink wink.

So what's so objectionable? Where to begin? There's adult women thinking it's cool to have young girls—we're talking nine or ten here—rapping like snarling, alienated "gangstas" with every third word out of their mouth f##k, f##king, f##ked up, or motherf##ker to show how "down" they are with badass 'tude. There's White women thinking it's awesomely creative to have White girls (with a token Asian and a token Black) puttin' it out there like hip-hop "hos." There's feminists thinking it's cool to have children posing and pouting like jaded hook-up queens, only—omg, we're so clever and ironic—dressed in the kind of princess outfits that are all the rage for pre-sexual children. Little girls talking like sluts, so inviting the kind of attention one normally gives sluts (not that there is supposed to be anything wrong with that, but there is when it's children). In the parlance, wouldn't you say that's kind of "rapey"?

This video is supposed to be "empowering" for girls ("I'm pretty f##king powerful"). The theme—not the subtlest—is that "society" tells us that the word "f##k" is dirty, but guess what? What's really dirty is that women aren't treated well in our society. For example, "pay inequality" is "more f##ked up than the word "f##k" because women get 23% less for the "same f##king work" than men. And since one in five women will be sexually assaulted, "start teaching boys not to f##king rape." And boys who like to dress as girls are mocked, so "F##k that sexist s##t."

The words "crude," "coarse," and "indecent" do not begin to convey the negative effect of this assault on the sensible viewer's eyes and ears. But the word "falsehoods" is a good beginning. Not a single statement of alleged fact in the video is true. Deconstruction of the pay inequality myth and the one-in-five sexual assault canard have been handily dealt with many times by credible analysts and with irrefutable data.

And nobody is teaching their sons to rape, so there is no need to "start" teaching them not to. And by the way, nobody is making little girls yearn to own and wear princess dresses or enjoy being pretty. They just do, and that's a real fact. Which is, you know, kind of ironic.

This video is not only a prime example of child abuse—any parent who lets their nine-year-old child watch this crap should seriously interrogate his or her parental judgment and maturity, and the parents who allowed their daughters to take part in it should have their heads examined—its tone simply exudes misandry.

Please do not even think of writing to me and accusing me of a lack of a sense of humour, or explain to me the nature of dramatic irony. Literature is my field. I know all about irony, and when it works, also when it is appropriate and when it is not. The only irony I can see in "Potty-Mouthed Princesses Drop the F-Bomb" is that it's going to put off a whole lot of people who were sympathetic to feminism when they started watching but by the end of it will realize that feminism has jumped the shark and become a horripilating caricature of the serious reform movement it once was. They'll back away slowly, run to hug their daughters, and murmur, "Don't worry, honey, I won't let those motherfu##ers, those women get hold of you."

The empathy gap is shockingly real

When will it end?

There are times when I think perhaps I have overstated the level of misandry in our mainstream media. Then I open the morning paper or watch a program like The Project and my doubts are fiercely shredded and my resolve to keep speaking out with words or my pen is strengthened.

We have all witnessed the coverage of the kidnapping of 200 Nigerian schoolgirls by the terrorist jihadists Boko Haram. This coverage is appropriate and warranted. No one could suggest otherwise. It is the gobsmacking, gut-wrenching, breathtaking double standards that so appall and anger me.

The following is a quote from one of the only articles I have been able to locate on an incident that occurred in February of this year.

> Islamic militants set fire to a locked dormitory at a school in northern Nigeria, then shot and slit the throats of students who tried to escape through windows. At least 58 students were killed, including many who were burned alive. They slaughtered them like sheep with machetes and gunned down those who ran away, said one teacher, Adamu Garba.

The headline of the article from which I have quoted the above extract is: "Dozens killed in attack on Nigerian school."

It is at the end of the fifth paragraph that we discover that:

> all of the dead were teenage boys or young men.

All of the schoolgirls were told to go home and were unharmed.

This was clearly a gender-based massacre. The fact that many schoolgirls were present but were deliberately left untouched by these killers while the boys were butchered underlines this fact in a most compelling manner.

You will note that there was no reference to gender in the headline or opening paragraph. It spoke of "students."

There were no demands for intervention by the United States. There were no statements from the United Nations calling this atrocity a crime against humanity. There were no statements from Nigeria's president or his wife. There were no "selfies" by self-important, arrogant celebrities and politicians holding up placards saying, "Stop butchering our boys!" or "Boys are human too!' There was no publicity shot of Michelle Obama holding her own message. There was no segment on The Project or editorials from David Penberthy, Natasha Stott Despoja, or Julia Gillard.

But when the girls were kidnapped, the outpouring of grief and compassion was stunning and powerful. Action is now being taken. Tears have been shed by Nigeria's first lady. Promises have been made by politicians. Celebrities have demonstrated their outrage and compassion with the push-button aplomb that is so prevalent in this age of posturing and moral grandstanding.

But what really burned me was the fact that the three aforementioned people—Penberthy, Stott Despoja, and Gillard—all spoke or wrote about this recent incident and used it to promote the sick, bigoted notion that this is yet another example of the danger and oppression girls and women face the world over. Not one of them even mentioned the massacre of the schoolboys who died horrifically for the same reason the girls were kidnapped: they were receiving a Western education.

Here is a sample of Stott Despoja's work:

> The horrific mass kidnapping of girls in Nigeria has drawn attention to the dangers with which women and girls around the world live on a daily basis….
> Boko Haram means "Western education is sinful", and is modelled on the Taliban movement in Afghanistan. It has little time for the education of women and girls, nor their other rights.
> Nigeria may be the current focus for such horrific actions, but for some parts of the world, these are the dangers with which women and girls live on a daily basis….
> These are just some of the acts of cruelty and injustice that girls face.
> The United Nations has indicated that the threat to sell the Nigerian girls may constitute a crime against humanity….
> [Hollywood actor and human rights activist Angelina] Jolie has condemned the Nigerian kidnappings as "unthinkable cruelty and evil"….
> I have been to Nigeria twice, including in 2011 to observe the presidential elections. It can be beautiful place and I've met some extraordinary people. However, like many countries, it can be dangerous for women…. [Emphasis mine]
> As Angelina Jolie has demonstrated, the combination of political will and international attention can change the position of women and girls around the world.

Enough! Who would not agree with every word but for the fact that we know even greater horrors were perpetrated upon young boys by the same terrorists for the same reason? Yet, there is not one reference to the plight of those boys.

If a mother lost her son and daughter in a terrible accident and only spoke of her grief at losing her daughter, our community would be quite horrified. Yet time and again this is what we do when discussing the issues of domestic violence, slavery, the sex trade, rape, or oppression in various parts of this world.

My genuine and unanswered question is, Why?

How can someone in a position of such authority as a former prime minister or newly appointed ambassador for women and girls be unaware of the facts with regard to Boko Haram and the misery they have inflicted upon people of both genders? How can any truly compassionate person not feel outrage over any cruelty perpetrated upon children, male or female?

Perhaps Stott Despoja's new role as ambassador for women and girls has a clause expressing explicitly that no compassion or concern is to be extended to male suffering. If true, she is doing a remarkably good job.

The rape of language and the mathematics of rape

Susan Patton and Jonathan Farley, D.Phil. (University of Oxford) · 9 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original Trigger Warning: May contain facts.

You've come a long way, baby. You've got the right to vote. You've got the right to keep working even if you get married. You've got the right to go on maternity leave—for 39 weeks at up to 90% of your salary in England.

But now young feminists want the right to do something that is physically impossible: go back in time and erase their mistakes.

Well, you can't have that right, and not just because Albert Einstein was male.

I recently called drunken hook-ups that girls regret afterwards—but usually not immediately afterwards—"mistake sex." That prompted some 220 Princeton professors to write a letter to the Daily Princetonian newspaper reminding students who aced their verbal SATs that rape is bad.

The word "rape" has a power to turn even Princeton scholars' minds off. When a rape occurs, it is common to hear people say that the suspect—suspect, mind you, not perpetrator—should have his neck stretched at the nearest tree. We're not so rash or bloodthirsty even when it comes to murder, which apparently is a less egregious crime.

Universities, like people, also react emotionally and strongly when it comes to rape, especially in light of the rape epidemic sweeping college campuses (according to the White House), with the #YesAllWomen campaign calling all men weapons of mass destruction.

You've heard the statistics: one in four women will be raped in college. Or is it "during her lifetime"? Or is it "sexually assaulted or almost sexually assaulted"? Or is it "nearly one in five"? Or "one in six"? Obviously all these stats can't be true. Somebody is doctoring the books. They are attempting to change the definition of "rape."

According to the FBI, "[t]he rate of forcible rapes in 2012 was estimated at 52.9 per 100,000 female inhabitants." (We don't know if this includes "male inhabitants who think they are female inhabitants.")

Assuming that all American women are uniformly at risk, this means the average American woman has a 0.0529% chance of being raped each year, or a 99.9471% chance of not being raped each year. Since the average American woman lives till 81, even assuming she is in danger of being raped every year of her life, including infancy, that means the probability she is never raped is 95.8% (0.999471 raised to the power 81). Of course, the U.S. Department of Justice reported in 2013 only "10 or fewer sample cases" of "sexual assault victimizations" for women 65 or older between 2005 and 2010, and its report only dealt with females 12 or older, with 70% of the victimizations occurring for women under 34, so it makes sense to use, say, a 50-year timespan: then the probability of never being raped is 97.4%. Over 4 years of college, it is 99.8%.

Thus the probability that an American woman is raped in her lifetime is 2.6% and in college 0.2%, 5 to 100 times less than the estimates broadcast by the media and public officials. Gee, and I never would have thought that politicians would lie.

Of course, the rape-statistic apologists will say that rape is massively underreported. Only 5% of the rapes or attempted rapes in a U.S. Department of Justice paper were reported to the police. But why is that? The idea that women are too frail to repeat their story to police or too sensitive to risk not being believed is nothing short of *Ms*ogyny.

Regarding unreported rapes, scholars Tjaden and Thoennes (with last names like that, no first names are necessary) say that 17.7% of the women who did not file a report thought the rape was a "[m]inor incident; not a crime or police matter."

A 2013 Department of Justice report estimates that 64% of "rape and sexual assault victimizations against females" went unreported between 2005 and 2010, with 8% of women saying they did not report it because it was "[n]ot important enough," 7% saying they "[d]id not want to get offender in trouble with law," 13% calling it a "[p]ersonal matter," and 30% responding, "Other/unknown/not one most important reason."

The website Feminist.com cites different figures, without a clear source: "The FBI estimates that only 46% of rapes and sexual assaults are reported to the police. U.S. Justice Department statistics are even lower, with only 26% of all rapes or attempted rapes being reported to law enforcement officials." Comparing the 64% of the previous paragraph with the unsourced 54% and 74% here, one sees that estimates of the rate of reporting vary significantly. Regardless, they are less than 99%, the most relevant figure, since the current campaigns are based on the threat to college students while at college.

Where does the "one in four" statistic come from? The organization One in Four USA cites Tjaden and Thoennes, "Prevalence, Incidence, and Consequences of Violence against Women: Findings from the National Violence against Women Survey." If one looks at the 2006 report those authors published under the auspices of the Department of Justice, one finds (besides a "one in six" figure!) that their results are based on a 1995-1996 telephone survey of 8,000 men and 8,000 women, and the admission that "only 24 women and 8 men reported during their interviews that they had been raped in the 12 months preceding the survey…." That's an annual risk of 0.3% each year. This yields a 50-year risk of 13.9%, which is still significantly less than 25%.

The Ms. Magazine report I Never Called It Rape cites a survey of 930 women and concludes that 44% of them said they were victims of rape or attempted rape. In defense of Ms., the actual study said that only "22% of the 930 respondents disclosed experiences of completed and/or attempted rape in answer to the one question that used the word rape." The researcher, Diana Russell, doubled the figure.

22% is close enough to one-in-four for government work, but the woman supervising the Ms. Magazine survey, Ellen Sweet, conceded that "1 in 4 or 5 women are the victims of rape or attempted rape, according to the legal definition, but only 1 in 4 of those women identifies her experience as rape." In other words, the real rape/attempted rape statistic is one-in-sixteen or one-in-twenty—5%.

Putting it in a way that non-STEM majors can understand: most girls have more sense than the aforementioned 220 Princeton professors. They do not regard mistake sex as rape.

Further exacerbating the confusion over rape statistics, the Department of Justice counts "verbal threats" as "sexual violence." The Department of Justice report "The Sexual Victimization of College Women"—which includes as victimization "general sexist remarks [made] in front of you" (grow a thick skin, girls)—says that 48.8% of the women who were raped said that what happened to them was not rape, with another 4.7% saying they didn't know if it was rape or not. (Didn't know?) In other words, the rape researchers, and not the police, were the ones telling the purported victims, "I don't believe you."

To underscore this, I Never Called It Rape states in Chapter 4 that 42% of rape victims had sex again with their rapists. The National Violence against Women study says that the average female victim was raped 2.9 times in the preceding year. Since the non-mustard seed-related dictionary definition of "rape" does not describe an experience one would want to have twice, one infers that the "rape" victims were using a different definition of "rape" than the researchers.

By contrast, the U.S. Department of Justice reports that men were more likely to be assaulted than women in 2009, with a 1.56% chance of being assaulted each year, bringing the probability of being assaulted over 50 years to 54.4%, with the uniformity assumption. That is, it is more likely than not that an American man will be assaulted. It is unknown whether male victims of assault have their own hashtag.

A shorter version of this appeared in The Baltimore Sun newspaper. -Eds

Talking: A weapon of mass destruction against one of the leading causes of male deaths

Josh Rivedal · 10 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Men are willing to talk about almost anything—the size of their prostate glands, or how much Viagra they're allowed to take—but they're still not willing to be open about their mental health. If men want to live long, healthy, and productive lives, it's absolutely crucial that we change the dialogue surrounding men's mental health.

I lost my father, Douglas, to suicide in 2009. Douglas lost his father, Haakon, to suicide in 1966. Each suffered from undiagnosed mental health conditions and each suffered in silence because of the stigma surrounding men talking about and getting help for mental illness.

Haakon—a Norwegian man who served in the Royal Air Force (35th Squadron as a tail gunner) in World War II—killed himself in 1966 because of the overwhelming post-traumatic stress he suffered due to the war. Douglas, an American man who was chronically unhappy and abusive, may have been clinically depressed for a very long time, but my mother filing for divorce was a catalyst (not the cause) for his action in taking his own life.

There's a relatively new case study in The Journal of Men's Health that says that men are affected tremendously by divorce. They have higher rates of alcohol and drug abuse and depression and detach themselves from personal relationships and social support.

In 2011, I had several catalysts for my own near-suicide attempt: the dissolution of a relationship with a long-term girlfriend (similar to a divorce), a lack of work, and fallout from my mother's betrayal. I was in terrible emotional pain and unknowingly suffering from clinical depression.

My thought life took a downward spiral pretty fast. How did I get to such a dismal place in my life so quickly, just a month shy of my 27th birthday? Coming out of secondary school and high on optimism, I thought by the time I reached my mid-twenties I would have it all together. After a couple of years singing on Broadway (yes, I'm a theater geek), I would have scored a few bit parts on Law & Order and transitioned seamlessly from having my own television show, A-Team 2.0 as Mr. T's long-lost son, to being cast with Will Smith in the summer's biggest blockbuster. After which, my getaway home in the south of France would be featured in Homes & Gardens and my face would grace the cover of the National Enquirer as Bigfoot's not-so-secret lover. Not to mention, I'd have my perfect wife and perfect family by my side to share in my success.

But instead I somehow only managed to perform in an assortment of small professional theater gigs and on one embarrassing reality television show; and over the course of the previous 18 months my father killed himself, my mother betrayed me and sued me for my father's inheritance, and my girlfriend of six years broke up with me.

This perfectly imperfect storm of calamity and crisis had ravaged my life … and I wasn't talking about it to anyone. My silence led to crisis and poor decisions—to the extent that I was hanging out of a fourth-story window.

Those men who came before me, Haakon and Douglas, each of them suffered their pain in silence too because of stigma, and I felt that same stigma—like I'd be seen as "crazy" or "less of a man" if I talked about what I was going through.

Standing at the ledge of that fourth-floor window, I realized I didn't want to die. I just wanted to end my inner torment and emotional pain. And I needed to break the familial cycle. So I came back inside, took a risk, and asked for help by calling my mother.

Over the next few months I continued to take more risks. I called old friends to tell them I needed their support. I got into therapy. And no one ever told me I was crazy, stupid, or a bad person. They told me they loved me and wanted to help me.

While recovering from clinical depression, I wanted to help youth and other men like me. So I produced my autobiographical book and one-man play, The Gospel According to Josh, about my foray into show business along with my father's suicide and took it to high schools, colleges, and community centers all across the U.S., Canada, the U.K., and Australia. I use it to talk about the importance of mental health and suicide prevention. Most of my audiences were and still continue to be women. One of the things I've found is that most men (not just the Rivedal men) have a difficult time talking about and getting help for their mental health or if they're feeling suicidal. There seems to be some societal pressure that says, "You're not a true man if you don't have it all together, all the time."

But I have a message for men everywhere that's simple yet profound: there's always hope and help out there for you. As a man who has suffered from clinical depression, I can say from personal experience that this is not a character flaw or a weakness. It doesn't make you any less of a man. In fact, by asking for help, it makes you a stronger man. It gives you a fighting chance to improve your life and become the person you want to be. Reach out to your family and friends and ask for help. Nip it in the bud before it turns into a crisis.

If you need a bit of help and don't know where to turn, here is a list of resources for suicide prevention and mental health in the U.S., U.K., Australia, and around the world.

Additionally, for International Men's Day on November 19, 2014, I'm having a live Google Hangout chat on male depression, suicide, and how and where to get help with MensLine Australia in Australia (details HERE), and MenBeyond50 in the United Kingdom (details HERE). #BeenRapedNeverReported and why you all should be cynical

Patrick John Doran (aka TheMadShangi) · 10 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Despite what feminists might tell you, women are human. And humans lie. Therefore, women lie just like men do.

A new hashtag just recently started trending on Twitter: #BeenRapedNeverReported. It appears to be another feminist-driven Social Justice Warrior trend. So-called "hashtag activism" in general has got to be the most backward, pompous, lazy, and delusional form of moral crusading there is. Now you can tell all your friends that you actually give a shit about stuff without actually having to get off your lazy fucking ass and doing something about it.

#BeenRapedNeverReported is coming on the heels of #YesAllWomen, #HeForShe, and #ItsOnUs—with basically the same message: that just about every human being with a vagina is a rape victim and it's all because of men. More insidiously, we're expected to swallow unsubstantiated claims of sexual assault without any evidence or due process. Now any person can claim to have been a victim, post it on Twitter, and this will be used as another documentary reaffirmation of the terrible, permissive "rape culture" that feminists would have us believe we are living in. Never mind the fact there is no possible way to confirm any of the allegations being posted online to be true … since none of these allegations were ever reported or investigated. Because of "rape culture," women have no incentive to actually come forward and report these heinous crimes because of the vicious treatment they receive. Such barbaric horrors these victims face, like "being asked questions," "processing evidence," and "fact-checking." Those evil, sexist, rapey cops are the ones to blame for this reign of terror. Don't they consider someone's feelings before having the audacity to actually investigate someone's claims? Don't they know it's impolite not to automatically assume they're telling the truth?

Of course, it should be quite obvious that I'm being snarky. Then again, if you're a Social Justice Warrior, maybe you have some mental disorder that prevents you from picking up on sarcasm. If so, then this isn't the article for you. Now, when someone claims to have been the victim of a crime but doesn't report it, it's usually a telltale sign of dishonesty. Contrary to popular belief, women are human, humans lie, and some actually do lie about being raped. They lie for a variety of reasons: to get back at someone, for attention, to cover up for an infidelity, etc. Considering that the forum for these confessions is Twitter, it would be a safe bet that a lot of claims are pure hogwash. Mostly for attention. I suspect mostly to push forward even more professional victim propaganda.

Alexandra Stan's manager is innocent

A Voice for Men News · 11 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The scandal that commenced in June last year when singer Alexandra Stan accused her boyfriend and manager, Marcel Prodan, of domestic violence seems to have reached an end with the definitive decision of the Constanța Tribunal, announces AVfM Romania, citing the local press.

In June 2013, Stan appeared on TV covered in bruises and crying. At that time, she confessed that the bruises were not from the automobile accident in which she had been involved but from the serious and systematic beatings to which she was allegedly subjected by her manager and boyfriend. She also said that she won't have peace until her aggressor was held to account.

From that moment on, she launched herself into a victimhood contest that culminated with an anti-violence campaign supported by the Capital City Police.

The trial was long because the National Directorate of Combating Corruption (DNA) also had to be involved due to the allegations of blackmail that had been brought into the trial. Stan alleged that the beatings occurred after several fights between she and her boyfriend/manager, Marcel Prodan, about money and contract disputes.

Prodan, however, claimed throughout the period that he was not a beater and, in fact, there was only one violent incident between the two, in which he was merely defending himself against the real aggressor—Alexandra Stan. He stated for the tabloids that:

> Following several fights that were not money-related but related to her career and our relationship she started hitting me multiple times with her fists whilst I was driving and she also pulled the wheel saying "maybe it's better that we kill ourselves." She almost killed both of us and provoked a serious accident.

Other sources also cite Prodan as saying:

> We were in a 3 year relationship that she denied, or at least kept the silence over it, and only called me her "manager," probably to better fit her false blackmail allegation. […] she even attempted to jump off the care at 90km/h speed!

But these details could not stop the flood of calls from various celebrities for Prodan's head. Mihaela Rădulescu, who enjoys some level of influence among international organizations, jumped in at the beginning of the scandal to say that she fears for her own life—even though Rădulescu wasn't part of the story, nobody had asked for her opinion, and she wasn't even living in the same city with Prodan.

> He should be taken by the special forces from home at 5 AM, lock him up and ban him from any contact with this girl. What if he sees me on the streets of Bucharest and punches me in the face for taking Stan's side in this? He needs to be taken to jail and forced to pay huge fines – to the extent that he'll have to sell everything he has to pay for the reparations.

The attempts of people such as Rădulescu to create a threat narrative added even more pressure on the judiciary, which, at one point, banned Prodan from leaving the city of Constanța, and the newspapers at the time compared Stan with Rihanna or Madonna.

But things started turning around last November when the DNA cleared Prodan's name for the allegation of blackmail and the female judge, Mihaela Lavinia Cîrciumaru, from the Constanța Court rejected Stan's appeal on this ground.

This past Friday, November 7, Stan lost the other trial as well—the one related to domestic violence—with the court appreciating that Prodan acted in legitimate self-defense and Stan was in fact the aggressor in this case.

Following this decision, Stan is now liable for all the judicial fees and for a civil case against her. The papers released by the court even imply that she could be liable for a criminal case against her should Prodan press charges or the DA's Office reacts in the case of Prodan's statement with respect to her guilt in the auto crash that started the whole scandal.

The local tabloids say that Stan declares herself as being "in a state of shock" following this decision. Expresspress.ro, citing people close to the singer, say that Stan is in dire straits financially, as she accumulated debts of roughly €50,000 to her collaborators, plus the judicial fees that she now has to pay.

WAM! continues gynocentric social media harassment

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 11 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Last summer, Women, Action, and the Media (WAM!) put Facebook in a chokehold with an ultimatum, followed by complaints to advertisers. The stated goal was to pressure Facebook moderators into removing content that WAM! felt was hateful or harassing to women, but the criteria seemed to reflect WAM!'s subjective views. Content that was not in violation of Facebook community guidelines and not harassing to women was removed, including content critical of feminism as an ideology.

WAM! then decided that it was time to move on to tweets. Slashgear reports that Twitter teamed up with WAM! right off the bat. The potential political slant to WAM!'s lens is troubling, considering that MHRAs like Janet Bloomfield have been struggling to keep their accounts active in light of excessive flagging by feminist ideologues. In a similar case, Thunderf00t also had his account zapped because he told Anita Sarkeesian that she is about as credible as Steve Buscemi doing a commercial for a cosmetic surgeon.

WAM! released a harassment reporting tool so that users can report harassing tweets and Twitter accounts. WAM! promises to "escalate [the report] to Twitter right away," as in less than 24 hours. The emergence of the harassment tool has been framed by Tech Times as a correlative response to #GamerGate participants and Zelda Williams's Twitter experiences after Robin Williams's suicide. WAM! itself cites the cancellation of Sarkeesian's UoU talk in links on a post by WAM! director Jaclyn Friedman (even though UoU police have found threats against Sarkeesian to be unsubstantiated).

Friedman says in a press release, "We're thrilled to be working with Twitter to make their platform safer for women. The disproportionate targeting of women online results in them removing their voices from the public conversation."

> Women, Action & the Media (WAM!) has announced an unprecedented collaboration with Twitter, aiming to cut down on the harassment of women on the popular social media platform. Starting today, WAM! is running a pilot project to support all Twitter users experiencing harassment and abuse on the platform due to their gender.

A new 1-in-4 statistic has also emerged in the meantime:

> A recent Pew research study found that fully 25 percent of young women online have been sexually harassed online and 26 percent have experienced stalking. What's more, Pew found that women overall are disproportionately targeted by the most severe forms of online abuse.

The Pew study was not clearly cited, although a search brings up this report, which is most relevant given the context. The subject matter matches, some numbers Friedman mentioned are repeated, and the report also mentions Zelda Williams. What is concerning about the report is that the operational definition of "harassment" is not stated clearly but is rather intuitively implied through stipulated levels of severity.

Part 1 of the report, "Experiencing Online Harassment," states areas in which men are more likely to experience harassment, but these figures were not mentioned by WAM! in its efforts to "support all Twitter users experiencing harassment and abuse on the platform due to their gender." This passage is quoted below for completeness, but this is not to be understood as my endorsement of the report in whole or in part. Note that my emphasis below indicates content that confuses me.

> Online men are somewhat more likely than online women to experience some level of online harassment overall. Some 44% of men and 37% of women have experienced at least one of the six types of harassment. Men are somewhat more likely than women to experience certain less severe forms of harassment like name-> calling and being embarrassed. At the same time, online men are also slightly more likely to have received physical threats. While the differences are small, women are significantly more likely than men to report being stalked or sexually harassed on the internet. Name-calling and purposeful embarrassment are the most common forms of harassment experienced by both men and women alike.

The language of the boldface portions of the passage suggests that women report harassment more often while the actual number of incidences is different. The below graph shows men as experiencing more of every kind of harassment except stalking and sexual harassment. The passage above also states that men are "somewhat more likely to experience," whereas women are "significantly more likely to report." The below graph uses the word experience, but it is not clear where the line is drawn between reporting and experiencing. Why does the graph emphasize the experiences of both sexes while the quoted paragraph emphasizes the experience of men? The language makes it unclear if the graph represents purely the experiences of users or a mix of alleged experiences and actual experiences.

Survey respondents in the study featured open-ended comments such as the following and seem to have been counted as victims of harassment. These are the first three quotes in one list of such comments.

> Through social media, and especially when commenting on controversial issues, often my difference of opinion from others would result in those who do not agree insulting and berating instead of arguing their point respectfully.
> While commenting on a sensitive religious feminist issue, I was attacked because of my opinion and some of the other commenters (sic) resorted to name-calling in their anger.
> On Facebook, a few days ago, I expressed my feelings about present issues and was harassed and called names. Of course there were not substantive arguments—just judgmental, harsh name calling.

Name-calling seems to be considered a form of harassment in the report. Note that normally harassment is understood to be repetitive in nature, but many of the complainants speak as if they experienced isolated confrontations with varying degrees of hostility. One respondent writes:

> My Democrat brother chewed me on [a] Facebook political post and I reminded him I'd fight to the death for his right to disagree with me.

Given that some of the incidents do not appear to involve significant psychological or emotional damage, and given the potential inclusion of bickering as "harassment," it is probably safe to request a more thorough investigation into The American Trends Panel's (ATP) network and methodology. The panel is managed by Abt SRBI, which is in turn a subsidiary of Abt Associates.

Part 4 of the report discusses not only women's likeliness to be "upset" by online incidents but also the psychological aftermath of the incidents. Notice that the report only offers levels of how upsetting confrontations were to survey respondents. The report states the following [emphasis mine]:

> … 85%, of internet users who have been the target of online harassment have not had an experience that hurt their reputation. Another 15%, however, do feel that their reputation was damaged by their experience with online harassment.

The report does not appear to verify actual damages to character, finances, or psychology. The emotional impressions of the respondents are emphasized throughout most of the report.

I will not prescribe any one particular interpretation of this situation other than to suggest that further investigation is warranted. Given WAM!'s previous conduct with Facebook and the sensationalist means by which gender statistics have been prepared and presented, we need to stay alert to any conflicts of interest in all involved parties. If it is true that men endure hardship as well, and it is possible that men experience more of all but two stipulated categories of harassment, then why is WAM! talking out of both sides of its mouth? WAM!'s press language suggests that women need to be the focus in an effort to support all Twitter users, but it does not mention men. What reason do we have to expect WAM! to provide equitable treatment? Will all of the reports made to WAM!'s tool actually make it to Twitter if they don't like what the report might say? (#WomenAgainstFeminism may wish to employ WAM!'s tool to report abusive feminists and test WAM!'s political leanings.)

#GamerGate Internet activists have expressed strong concerns regarding censorship and the marginalization of gamers' voices, and they may take interest in the mention of gaming community perceptions in Part 2 of the report.

No matter what our opinions are at this point, the fact remains that social media is about to see another wave of policing.

Stay on your toes, and create some backup accounts.

RWBY: A cartoon review ...

Clint Carpentier · 11 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I stumbled across the following video recently, and I immediately thought about the first four Honey Badgers. Keep in mind, this is for the following video only; I'll get in-depth after.

Red: Alison Tieman
White: Hannah Wallen
Black: Diana Davison
Yellow: Karen Straughan

I've since watched the RWBY series and I'm quite impressed by the content, even the nostalgic, old-school digital animation. Given that the stars are mostly female, all the characters are dynamic in one way or the other. This series is a new spin on the fairy tales as we know them. For instance:

Red—Ruby Rose: Little Red Riding Hood
White—Weiss Schnee: Snow White
Black—Blake Belladonna: Beauty and the Beast
Yellow—Yang Xiao Long: Goldilocks

Now, RWBY doesn't obsess about the fairy tales these characters originate from, but careful observation will reveal Easter eggs everywhere. Let's get to the meat of it, shall we?

Among the major female cast, the male characters are portrayed as just as lovable and/or hateable, given the context of their own character growth. Both sexes have bullies and wusses and everything in between. Characters clash and horns lock and you can't help but fall in love with this series.

When you start thinking about it, you could even say RWBY is anti-feminist, due to a probably unintentional faux pas. For instance, during the trailers, the girls are expected to use their own training to defeat terrible enemies. Ruby Rose must defeat a whole pack of Big Bad Beowolves singlehandedly—this can only allude to the promotion of "rape culture." Yang isn't allowed to arbitrarily hit a guy without facing retaliation from a group of men (hired thugs though they are)—this can only assume supporting violence against women. In the series itself, Jaune pleas for Pyrrha to save him from a particularly dangerous and scary Grimm—this must be advocating female slaves. And Nora is outright told by a guy to distract a giant Grimm bird—which, uhhh … sacrificial lamb?

The world is called Remnant, where the people fought a losing battle with the creatures of Grimm until they discovered the powers of Dust. Grimm are soulless beings that feed off of misery, pain, despair, and general annoyances (let's just call them feminists in secret, wink wink). Dust comes in two forms: crystals and, well, dust. Only a select few dare to harness the power of the crystalline form, but the powdered Dust is used by a great deal of people to do a great deal of things, which would need a great deal more research than any cartoon justifies. Be it resolved, any damned fool can use the powdered form.

All creatures (not Grimm) have what's called an Aura, which, with training, can be used for three things: protecting oneself from harm, through precognition or force; empowering one's fighting ability, by hardening/sharpening weapons and landing heavier blows; and powering one's Semblance—a unique power each person can unlock with training. Most people trained to use Aura are called Hunters/Huntresses and carry personalized weapons they've handcrafted themselves. Aura and endurance appear to be interconnected.

Cigarette Break and tunes …

At 15, Ruby is the youngest character. She's talkative but prefers weapons over people. She's highly skilled with her rifle/scythe, which she admits she was complete trash at until her Uncle Qrow took her training in hand, and her Semblance is Speed. What she lacks in raw power, she makes up for with what seems to be an inexhaustible Aura. A natural tactician, she's given the lead of team RWBY (pronounced "Ruby"). After an argument with Weiss over leadership, Ruby takes to it with serious abandon, determined to make team RWBY the best team in existence. Even though she isn't much of a people person, she finds it difficult to show disdain for new people, no matter how weird they may be, short of blatantly intending her harm; and for the most part, it's worked in her favor.

Weiss is, without a doubt, the richest of the characters. Heiress to a Dust mining corporation (Schnee Industries), there's nothing she can't have if she so chooses to have it—except leadership of team RWBY. She's a snob: educated by the best, trained by the best, and supplied with the best Dust. Short of her immediate family, there isn't a soul on Remnant who isn't already beneath her, and she knows it. Once she's been put into a team, her attitude quickly and often gets called up short, and she's given the nickname "Ice Queen," which is never said behind her back. After a professor chastises her attitude, she takes his advice to heart and attempts to bring herself down to "peasant" level because, like it or not, this is the destiny she chose for herself; yes, she chose to be a Huntress rather than a protected bureaucrat. Regardless of her determination to "fit in," she gets ribbed by both friends and enemies by being named separate from the group, which bothers her: "Friends, enemies, Weiss/Ice Queen"; "Heyyy." She has a scene that I couldn't help but think of the WAF housewives, given the right context.

Blake is the shadiest of the group. She's got her secrets, and knows too much but never enough. Having no use for people in general, she's difficult to warm up too. Ruby manages to spark a timid bond, but gleans little more from her. When Weiss shows a heavy prejudice for Faunus (Humanoid animals), an argument breaks out and longstanding animosities explode, revealing Blake not only as a Faunus (cat) but also as a former member of a Faunus terrorist group that had made repeated strikes against Schnee Industries, Weiss's family's mining corporation.

Yang, Ruby's older sister, is addicted to adrenaline. She's proud of her little sister having been given lead of the team; she has no problems taking orders from the younger girl as—of the many things she knows—she knows that Ruby is cagey, whereas she herself is a hammer looking for a nail. They have different mothers, and while Ruby's mother is dead, her own is AWOL; their father and Uncle are said to be very protective of the two.

Potty Break …

Jaune, leader of team JNPR (pronounced "Juniper"), rankled my nerves at first. He started out by vomiting en route to school and then managed to raise all the red flags of "nice guy" halfwit with his hand-me-down equipment. He then compounded my irritation with PUA tactics and capped it all off by having no real skill to speak of, nor actual training. In the face of these obstacles, it's discovered that he's a reasonably good tactician, with his heart in the right place. He quickly takes a shine to Weiss, calling her "Snow Angel" among other things, and persists on trying to win her heart. To her credit, she doesn't even bother to lead him on, so he is saved the embarrassment of the friend zone. At one point, he's very depressed and in the dumps as he suffers in silence over being bullied by the leader of another team when Ruby catches him between his extorted obligations and gives him some backhanded moral support. When push comes to shove, he's not afraid to step up to the plate; his character grows by leaps and bounds over the series.

Nora is a hyperactive hammer … with a giant hammer. She loves life, and even the scariest of Grimm are just opportunities to have fun. There's not much growth in this character; childhood friend of Ren, she's quite happy to have a one-sided conversation for hours; she has simple answers to complex problems.

Pyrrha is famous as a gifted warrior. Like Weiss, she's set apart from the common folk due to her fame. But like Yang, her secret is in her Semblance: if it's magnetic, she can manipulate it, and she does so just enough to keep it a secret. Notice the metal armor in strategic places (the only woman wearing metal). Fighting is her forte, and she'll gladly wade into the thick of combat, allowing Jaune to hang back and assess a battle. She's completely infatuated by Jaune, simply for the fact that he didn't know her at all when they met and treats her as an equal. Well, he tries and fails to be manly around her. Despite his failings as a "man" and warrior, she tolerates his shortcomings because—infatuation aside—she sees locked-up potential waiting to be trained and let out.

Ren is studious and silent. While an extremely skilled fighter, he appears to lack the Aura necessary to sustain a fight, needing to end it quickly if solo, which could be why he's tolerated Nora for so long.

Last AMV, and then my final thoughts …

Would I let my eight-year-old daughter watch RWBY? Yes, I would, even given the brutality and mysticism, as it portrays a better sense of human interaction than most cartoons that I've had the misfortune of witnessing. It shows that people are flawed, often damaged, not remotely equal, dependent on companion support, and that a normal life will not get you power of any sort.

Friends aren't necessarily people you automatically agree with. Sometimes you have to confront your friends and/or allies in no uncertain terms, lest animosity builds over trivialities.

Prejudices are real, they aren't black and white (no, that's not a pun), and they come in a variety of shapes and forms. Polarizing your beliefs could lead you down a road you never intended to take, simply by taking one step at a time, and one day, someone close looks at you and they don't know who they're looking at anymore.

Bad guys are not always dressed in black with maniacal laughs disemboweling live kittens; they are everywhere, with varying degrees of badness; and allies are not always good just because they choose to fight on your side. Being a bully doesn't make you an enemy, and being an enemy doesn't make you a bully.

There are police, and military, and destructive machinery; all doing expected things, for better or worse, and none of them have the answers to the problems faced. Hunters and Huntresses are set apart, not in that they hunt Grimm, but rather, when not hunting Grimm, they act like the CIA, doing investigative work that often keeps the cops busy but the military bored.

You'll be hard-pressed to find misandry or misogyny, or even gynocentrism. When a dance is coming up, Weiss automatically shoots down Jaune, which her teammates chastise her for, on the basis of her style. However, later her advances on another Hunter get shot down, for what turns out to be a rather trivial reason.

While history and combat training are hinted at during school, actual team training happens in the invisible background, allowing the story to progress through the weeks and months. This becomes apparent during the second season, when the team is seen executing Ruby's commands flawlessly.

While the episodes are short, they are nonetheless captivating, and the first season has been compiled into a two-hour movie.

Paul Elam · 12 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Recently I was contacted by Stephanie Buck of mashable.com. She wanted my take on the so-called “Street Harassment” video and after getting my response said she wanted me to participate in a debate with a feminist using short, written exchanges and possibly video. I agreed.

A few exchanges in, Ms. Buck went dark.

Quelle surprise.

I decided that there was little point in wasting the observations on that video, so I am going to present them here, along with all communications I had with Ms. Buck in the order that they happened. Enjoy.

Stephanie:

Hi Paul,

I’m the features editor at Mashable, where we’re discussing story ideas around catcalling and sexual harassment. You may have heard about the video of the woman in New York who got catcalled over 100 times within 10 hours of walking throughout NYC.

I understand that you advocate for an end to domestic violence and harassment against all people. Therefore, I wonder if your position might echo or sympathize with what many men are feeling and trying to articulate in response to this video: for example, that women should take this treatment as a compliment, and that men experience harassment too.

I wonder if you’d be willing to contribute to Mashable. I’d like to locate two men to engage in a respectful and intelligent written debate about catcalling. The conversation and online commentary around this video is fairly split, especially between men. Some find it appalling, and others still insist that women should feel proud, that as long as men aren’t aggressive physically or sexually, it’s ok.

Would you be interested in pairing up with someone to voice your position?

Cheers,

Stephanie

Hi Stephanie,

Actually, that sounds like it could be an interesting discussion. I am interested, especially if you are serious about the tone being civil. More info, please.

That’s great to hear, Paul. I’m still in the process of signing up someone on the other side of the fence. But mainly,

I'd like this to be an intelligent discussion about the two sides of the catcalling coin, from the men's perspective.

I plan to send along prompts to each participant, then act as the go-between and pass each other's responses to each of you, basically how a oral debate would go, but on paper. I'd also like to extend (and encourage) each of the participants to record either an informal video or audio clip with opening statements, perhaps discussing the recent video, and your take on it. That would be limited to probably a couple minutes or less.

How does all this sound to you?

Paul

Oct. 30

Sounds like a great discussion. Video and writing are both fine as long as I can present the complete unedited exchanges on my venue as well.

The fact is that I am not "pro" cat calling. In fact, I am against it for a number of reasons, but I think those reasons will provide a great counter to what I would expect from the other side.

And no worries. The only way I will participate in this kind of discussion is in a civil and congenial way. Not interested in slugging it out with anyone.

I am leaving tomorrow to go to give a lecture in the Atlanta area, but I will be back Sunday night.

Please let me know if you need anything else.

Stephanie

Would you be able to tell me a little bit about the perspective you plan to bring? I want to make sure we'd pair you with the right person, that your experiences are at least complementary, if not entirely opposite. Basically, give me a short stump speech about your reaction to this catcalling video and the resulting discussion.

Thanks.

Oct 30

Well, first, a couple of minor nits. Defining each one of the recorded exchanges as "harassment" is stretching credibility to the breaking point. "Good Morning" is not harassment. Neither is "God bless you," last I heard.

There were several statements I think were inappropriate, and maybe a couple of that I think crossed a line into intimidation, or at least the intent to make her feel uncomfortable – particularly the man who walked next to her for five minutes.

There are questions that come to my mind, such as, are men not allowed to approach women they are attracted to anymore? Are they not allowed to speak? Or is any form of approach to a woman unknown to you now a form of intimidation and harassment?

And what are the dynamics of sexual power really at play here? Is she a victim of "100" incidents of harassment or is she just a really attractive woman in tight clothing eliciting a very human response to her sexual power? How many of those men, had she stopped and talked to them, would have been willing to reach for their "power" (money) to keep her interested in continuing the connection?

Any analysis we make of the video must also include the fact that the woman was large breasted, dressed in a tight top that accentuated her breasts, which were often visibly bouncing as she walked. This is going to increase the amount of attention.

I also find it unusual, indeed questionable, that the video purports to show men of varied demographics, but is actually dominated by black and Latino men.

I don't catcall women personally for three main reasons. The first two reasons are tied in order of importance. I don't want to make a stranger feel uncomfortable. And I don't want to give women power to make me reduce myself to being lame.

The last reason is that I don't want to say things to women and have it go to their heads.

Yes, there are women, lots of them, who enjoy overtly or covertly sexual attention from strangers. I think it feeds their egos. Don't want to be part of that.

All in all, this video is a fail. It conflates too much, groups too many different behaviors into one, and also appears racially targeted.

I will be happy to have an open, civil exchange with anyone who feels differently.

Cheers

Hi Paul,

I wanted to circle back on this and see if you're still up for it. We've found someone for you to debate — happy to let you know who that is and send out some prompts if you're ready.

Thanks,

Stephanie

Paul

Nov 4

Sounds good. Ready when you need me.

..

Nov 4

OK, great. I'll be pairing you with Amani Herron. Here is the bio he shared with me: "I am the founder of the Truth

From The Basement blog and a freelance political communications specialist. Specific to this topic, I am a domestic violence advocate and former President of a Men's Issue, which is an organization in Syracuse, NY dedicated to redefining masculinity and accepting that ending sexual and relationship violence are men's issues as well."

I'm going to direct the first question at you, Paul. And let's please try and keep responses to under 200 words, or 3 paragraphs. I will edit them down if they go on too long or become inappropriate. Same goes for Amani. Of course, you'll get to see my edits before we publish. And I hope it goes without saying that if things get out of hand or off topic, I reserve the right to kill this piece and decide not to publish.

Cool with that?

If so, here's the first question: What was your first reaction after you watched the Hollaback video?

..

My first reaction to the Hollaback video was that it was highly deceptive. "Good morning" and "God bless you" are now sexual harassment and intimidation? In whose distorted worldview? There was some behavior in the video that I believe crossed a line, like following a stranger closely on the street for several minutes. However, much of what is shown is innocuous, even friendly.

The video also sends a rather chilling message to men that they should avoid conversing with women altogether. The undertone hints at "speak when spoken to," and those who break that rule are guilty of harassment. What kind of message is this to men who were, despite the video's false claim of diversity, almost exclusively African American and Hispanic? Not that it is healthy to send that message to anyone of any color.

The crypto-bigotry in all of it is actually quite stunning, and the producers of this video should be called out on it.

Certainly, street harassment is an issue worth exploring for both sexes (yes, it happens to men, too), but there is enough of the real thing that we need not target every tip of the hat and daily greeting as a street crime.

..

Nov 5

Thanks, Paul. I've sent your thoughts to Amani. Waiting for him to respond, then I'll hand it over to you for a rebuttal.

..

Amani (via Stephanie):

You've just perfectly illustrated why it takes so much to even have this conversation. You watched the video, have heard from countless women saying it mirrors their daily lives, and your takeaway is that it's deceptive and to tell them how they should feel?

The conversation is simple: Do you believe that women as human beings deserve to be able to walk down the street without a constant stream of unwanted conversation and commentary? Most of us hate telemarketers no matter how polite they are; why then would we excuse that behavior on the street where there is the added dimension of physical encroachment in that space?

Now, I'll certainly acknowledge the video's racial politics were disturbing. The notion that street harassment is isolated to black or Latino men is demonstrably false, and omitting white men deserves calling out. That said, there is a difference between addressing the racist subtext in the video and using that racism to divert attention from addressing the topic all together. We're quite capable of having both discussions at once.

Nov 6

All conversations are easier when focused, honest and include both sides, not directives to just listen and believe without question.

I have heard from many women who say this video does not mirror their daily lives, and women who interpreted the video the same way I did, as race-baiting, sexist and deceptive. Are they making it difficult to have a "conversation"? Are they "diverting attention" away from the topic? In your opinion do these dissenting women even have a voice?

This is not a just a conversation about women, but about people across the full spectrum of humanity. I believe all human beings are deserving of (insert ideal treatment here), but I also understand the reality of human coexistence. Sometimes it is imperfect.

There are many nuisances in life; panhandlers, strangers who talk too much, people who catcall and make inappropriate remarks, sales people, survey takers and even officious video makers.

Are we to build walls between all human beings? Are we to silence everyone so that we can all go about our business without being bothered by anyone saying "good morning"? Surely you are kidding.

It's a sidewalk, Amani, not a red carpet.

Nov 6

Great. And I've now posed a question to Amani that I would like to pose to you as well, plus give you space to respond. You'll find it here and at the bottom of the transcript, before Amani's response: If a man wants to talk to a strange woman, what should he consider before doing so? What is the correct approach to make sure everyone feels safe and respected?

Amani:

If a man wants to talk to a woman he doesn't know, I'd suggest following baseline rules for human interaction. A conversation requires mutual engagement and basic decency applies; respect people's boundaries and time, establish eye contact, and be polite. Disabuse yourself of the notion that you are owed anything in return, treat women as fellow human beings and not sexual objects, and you'll be pleasantly surprised how easy it is.

Those attacking the video attempt to frame this conversation as threatening the right to polite greetings, or telling people not to talk to each other. That's not an argument anyone committed to ending street harassment has ever made because it's patently ridiculous. There is however, a difference between talking with someone and talking at them. Yelling at someone who has walked past you and shown no interest in responding is not a conversation, repeatedly doing so because they didn't acknowledge you is harassment even when couched in pleasantries.

The conversation is simple, people should feel comfortable walking (whether on the sidewalk or the red carpet) without having to plan strategies to avoid being harassed and feeling unsafe. If you can acknowledge imperfections, why shouldn't we work to fix them?

After watching this video, one thing a man might want to consider is whether his approach will be recorded and later painted as a street crime, regardless of what he says or how he says it.

Seriously, Amani, if saying “good morning,” is an act of harassment, then what could possibly convey safety and respect?

It is time to remove gender from the equation. Stop infantilizing women as helpless non-actors in their own world, incapable of saying, “I’m not interested,” or even, perhaps, “Hi. Good morning to you, too!”

Demonizing men in order to produce an ideological narrative intended to create fear is not going to make women safer or more respected. Men, by the way, deserve respect, too. Painting them as creeps for showing interest in a woman is highly disrespectful.

How about we frame all this in human rather than sexual or other terms? How about we don’t frame every demonstration of interest in another human being as something sinister and dangerous? How about we avoid the irrational edicts of would-be social engineers? Perhaps that will help stem the tendency to produce videos bemoaning the terrible struggles of attractive, large-breasted White women in Black neighborhoods.

Amani (via Stephanie):

Now we see what happens when you can’t argue an issue on merit. Instead of dealing in reality, you’ve tried to create your own bogeymen. You’re the one demonizing men if you see them as incapable of holding an adult conversation without harassing others.

Women are leading this conversation, not being infantilized, and have been doing so for years. Look at Feminista Jones and her work with #YouOkSis. There’s Holly Kearl the founder of Stop Street Harassment. Amanda Seales has been out front talking about it. Women of all backgrounds have been sharing their stories, writing about them and organizing around them. Amplify those voices instead of silencing them and we can have a real conversation.

If you’re afraid of being painted as a creep, then don’t be a creep and treat people with respect. When someone tells you that your behavior is disrespectful, annoying, and makes them feel uncomfortable or even threatened, a reasonable adult apologizes, tries to understand why, and then corrects it. You want to center this on a “right” to control the terms of engagement — that doesn’t supersede someone’s right to safely walk down the street in peace.

All right, Paul. Next question, you get first response: The woman who was in the video received numerous death threats. Why do you think that is?

This makes me do an eye-roll so hard that it requires a windup.

It’s an increasingly common modern phenomenon that ideologues will use the internet to make outlandish claims, e.g. good morning = sexual harassment, resulting in some of the most depraved morons on the internet making stupid, retaliatory comments.

This is usually followed by, “See, they are trying to silence all women! Help us fight it!” This call to action is often echoed repeatedly by the media, with a link to the latest fundraising effort on behalf of he supposedly silenced.

Straight up fact, you can make a lot of money with this ploy by playing on the general decency of most human beings.

The internet is full of trolls. Some of them make rude, even threatening comments. Others make outlandish, biased and deceitful videos in order to elicit rude and even threatening comments that can then be parlayed into cash.

And that is precisely what we are seeing here. Count on a fundraiser near you, and in the end it will not make anyone, male or female, safer on the street.

And that, ladies and gents, is when the crickets started chirping. Or was that just a cha-ching?

Newsflash! After extended delay and about 20 minutes after we published this, I got another answer, and another question. ⍰

..

Amani:

Since Paul is still too busy slaying imaginary dragons, I'll try to bring us back to the real world.

Rather than listening to and understanding what people are telling you they feel, those who feel their worldview threatened choose to lash out violently to protect their status quo. That's why Paul is so callously able to dismiss rape and death threats as "increasingly common" and even somehow equate that to filming yourself walking the street for your own protection, or suggest that the video provoked it.

It's the same instinct to maintain power that saw Mary Spears shot and killed in Detroit after rejecting a man harassing her, or Maren Sanchez stabbed in Connecticut for turning down a prom date. But instead of dealing with the fact that they don't have a right to women's bodies, attention, or time (or those of any other human being), people like Paul try to make themselves victims and falsely frame this around their "right" to say hello. It has never been about that and ignoring reality is an insult to everyone's intelligence.

Contrary to the fear mongering and logical pratfalls used to criticize the video, this topic is remarkably simple: don't harass women.

Stephanie:

In general, why do women treat strange men differently than men treat women? Should that double standard exist? How should women treat men in public?

The question makes a lot of assumptions. I watched a video that was done to mimic the street "harassment" video, using a man with an exceptional physique and good looks. He was "harassed" repeatedly by women and gay men, or at least they spent enough time gathering video of him walking till they could make a two minute video documenting those "assaults."

The double standard here is that the actions of women are either denied, downplayed or otherwise deemed insignificant. And the fact is, they are insignificant. I won't play into this hysteria by characterizing what happened to the man as traumatic any more than someone saying "good morning" to a woman.

If you research crime statistics you will find that men are much more likely to be the victims of actual violent crime on the streets. And that is where the double standard is so incredibly glaring. Men are by far more at risk on the streets, yet we are actually debating about the evil of men trying to get the attention of a woman, and targeting minorities in the process?

Just wow.

Women should treat everyone with respect. So should men. No one should profit from the fact that at times, both don't.

Stephanie: Nov 13

OK, one final question, which I'd like each of you to answer separately. And please keep your answer succinct, under 100 words.

I think at this point we can all agree on one point: Don't harass women. Just as we can all agree that some women feel flattered by this type of attention, and others hate it. But the definition of harassment is subjective. In conclusion, briefly explain your textbook definition of harassment.

..

Paul

Actually, I can only agree that no one should harass anyone, not just women, and not just at the hands of Blacks and Latinos. I can, though, rely on the dictionary which says "aggressive pressure or intimidation." Nearly all of what I saw in that video did not qualify.

Defining free speech as harassment is a dangerous, sinister thing to do, especially for profit.

J4MB announces a new candidate, and a new strategy, for the 2015 general election

Mike Buchanan · 12 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

J4MB is proud to announce the appointment of Ian Young as a J4MB candidate for the May 2015 general election. Young's a resident of Hucknall, a town seven miles to the north of Nottingham, a city in central England, formerly the home of Robin Hood and his merry men, who robbed the rich to give to the poor—at least that was the defense put forward by their lawyer after a sneaky dawn raid by the Sheriff of Nottingham and his sidekicks on their lair in Sherwood Forest. It was winter, so there were no leaves on the trees, the place wasn't hard to find. Mr. Hood and his band of merry men were found to be in possession of more stolen goods than could reasonably be distributed among the population of poor folk living in Nottingham at the time. I digress, as I am inclined to do.

Young will be standing in the Sherwood constituency, where he has long lived. He's a highly respected person in the area, and his nomination as a J4MB candidate has just been reported in a well-written piece in the Hucknall Dispatch. Historically, Sherwood has generally been a safe Labour seat, but Mark Spencer, a Conservative candidate, won the seat in 2010 with a majority of just 214 votes.

Ian Young is well-known as a survivor of domestic violence and an advocate for male victims of domestic violence. He was recently interviewed at length on BBC Radio Nottingham, here. His contact details and web presences are as follows:

We wish Ian every success and will support him as much as we can in the run-up to the general election and beyond. Which brings us to an important matter—our new strategy for the 2015 general election. For some time we've been considering the possibility of targeting adjacent marginal seats in order to make our campaigning more efficient and effective, to keep campaigner morale high in a concentrated geographical area, and to maximize the value we get from donations for poster campaigns and the like.

The Sherwood constituency is one of three constituencies that are adjacent to each other and that were won by very slim majorities in 2010. To the west of Sherwood is the Ashfield constituency, historically a safe Labour seat, which Labour candidate Gloria de Piero (standing for the first time) almost lost in 2010, winning by just 192 votes. GdP is the Shadow Minister for Women and Equalities. In July we awarded her our Lying Feminist of the Month award for her comments on the gender pay gap—the story is here.

I shall be standing as the J4MB candidate for Ashfield next May.

To the south of Ashfield and the southwest of Sherwood is the Broxtowe constituency, historically another safe Labour seat, which was won in 2010 by Anna Soubry for the Conservatives, with a majority of 389 votes. Ray Barry will be standing as the J4MB candidate for Broxtowe next May. Ray is well-known as the leader of Real Fathers for Justice, and three days ago we video recorded him speaking next to a controversial new sculpture in Birmingham, A Real Birmingham Family, which consists of two sisters who are single mothers, one of them pregnant, with their young sons. A celebration of fatherlessness, no less. We've had good reactions to the video, here.

Our interest in the Nottingham area isn't limited to these three seats. We've never been a party that lacked ambition, and we never will be. We'll be seeking candidates for two adjacent seats that were won by Labour with majorities of less than 2,000 votes in 2010: Nottingham (South) and Gedling.

We're also keen to field a candidate in Loughborough, 17 miles to the south of Nottingham. The seat was won by Labour in 2001 and 2005, but Nicky Morgan won it for the Conservatives in 2010 with a majority of 3,744 votes. Morgan is the Minister for Women and Equalities. David Cameron, to his eternal shame, replaced the highly regarded Michael Gove as Education Secretary not long ago with Morgan.

We've compiled voting data from the past three general election results for the three key seats near Nottingham (and Loughborough)—here.

Our decision to contest one or more Labour seats marks a departure from our former strategy of only targeting Conservative marginal seats in 2015. Our rationale is that until J4MB develops to the point of having rather more candidates standing in general elections, targeting only one party's seats is purely symbolic. We felt it worth changing the strategy in order to target the seat of a (Shadow) Minister for Women and Equalities. Also, life is going to become markedly worse for men and boys if Labour wins the next general election, with truly obnoxious bigots such as Yvette Cooper given free rein to roll out yet more radical feminist agendas, including teaching schoolboys to be feminists, i.e., brainwashing them into becoming lifelong unquestioning slaves to women, grateful for their servitude.

Snapshot of a narrative revolt—Sports media takes it on the chin for pop feminist domestic violence pandering

In order to survive, all industries must aptly convince the buying public of a message. Mercedes-Benz promotes a lifestyle. Mortgage and student loan peddlers are selling upward mobility and generational wealth. Plastic surgeons' and male supplement purveyors' message is the promise of eternal youth.

The template is the same when convincing the government. Halliburton and Bechtel have a message of "our security." Charter and profit-based schools promise to rescue our children from the Big Bad Teachers' Unions. You get the picture.

Likewise, those in the gender grievance industry have something to sell: a narrative of sexual- and gender-based violence. On the matter of domestic violence, their narrative is driven by the Duluth Model: that intimate partner violence is driven by a need, rooted in "patriarchy," to use menace as a means to control women and suppress their aspirations to being fully vested human beings. Domestic violence is something men do to women, reaffirmed by "society" and "the power structure," we are told. These advocates posit acceptance of their narrative as the sole remedy to this malady, present to lead us lost sheep to a better world, to Shangri-La. That is, if only we and the local and state governments shut up, listen, and obey, the latter being in part defined by validating their efforts with check, money order, or credit card. After all, websites, PR professionals, staff, and in-service training materials aren't cheap. A critical mass of acceptance of that narrative is what keeps the weight of opinion, and thus dollars, tipped on one side of the fulcrum.

Speaking of dollars, from all indicators, business is good.

The NFL's rudderless mishandling of several domestic violence cases—those of Ray Rice, Greg Hardy, and Adrian Peterson in particular—had created the perfect conditions for sports media agents of the gender grievance industry to advance their template. Take rare examples of outlier male behavior (in this case, aggression toward women, something men are loath to do even when assaulted), magnify it to create hysteria over a new outbreak in the "epidemic of toxic masculinity," and leverage the moral panic to bring an (masculine) institution to heel. The male protective instinct now triggered, they do most of the heavy lifting for you, unquestioning in their fervor that heads should roll and unchallenging of their own self-flagellation, that "their culture" was to blame, that this was a "men's problem" they needed to fix. Indeed, the public seemed sheepishly compliant with this narrative while paradoxically incensed at this culture of cover-ups and misogyny, with USA Today's Christine Brennan's calls for moral consistency on matters of intimate and familial violence seemingly forgotten like a paved-over pothole. When even a change in policy, indefinite suspension for Rice, and public mea culpas did appease the masses, he hired gender grievance ideologues Rita Smith, Lisa Friel, and Jane Randel as part of a Department of Social Responsibility to oversee training in domestic violence, sexual assault, and "matters of respect."

So it stands to reason that when the narrative is publicly challenged on a broader scale, gender ideologues won't exactly welcome Socratic dialogue. Indeed, a funny thing happened on the way to the white-flag-waving ceremony: a Red Pill pushback of historic proportion. On September 18, ESPN aired footage of accused drunken child-batterer Hope Solo passing a milestone with, well, nary a mention of her child (and sister) battery. Apparently, ESPN took for granted that either A) no one with a platform of scale was paying attention or B) if they were, none would have the temerity to voice The Emperor's Nakedness.

They were wrong.

> Watching @espn and they are showing women's soccer highlights. Not a single mention of @hopesolo & domestic violence. Why?

> The folks at @nike dropped @adrianpeterson but they've said not a peep about @hopesolo and domestic violence. This makes no sense.

Thus began a period of awakening, when Duluth Model feminist hucksters, who double as sports media's social justice taste-makers, would experience some good ol' fashioned populist humble pie, complimented by a feedback loop of mainstream journalists and pundits who wondered out loud why one famous (alleged) child-beater still had a job, reverence, and a Nike sponsorship.

What followed was indeed delicious. Spontaneously, the public in the form of social media and many in the traditional media began to sniff out the sham. Toto could not have done a better job himself of peeling back the charlatans' curtain.

What started the night of September 18 on Twitter and other social media as a slow rumble began to erupt the following morning with Roland Martin of TV One's appearance on MSNBC's Morning Joe. As you can see, just the mention of a "woman doing something bad" triggers Katty Kay's attack reflex, like how the healthy people sparked the zombies in World War Z.

Sometime later, Cindy Boren of The Washington Post chipped further into the dam Christine Brennan had breached, as the first of the blue-blood old media entered the fray.

The lava had begun to flow on Twitter:

> Memo to @espn @espnW @CBSSports @NBCSports @FOXSports @SInow etc. You CAN'T hide from this. #HopeSolo #AllVictims pic.twitter.com/cboBCRuvHb

One of the old guard sports media publications weighed in.

By this point, the debate had caught the attention of H.(ead)F.(eminist)I.(deologue)C.(hick) Jemele Hill, who responded with an equal measure of smugness and weak hairsplitting:

> If everybody is saying nobody is talking about her, isn't that talking about her? RT @drillsgt2011: @jemelehill why isn't she talked about
> — Jemele Hill (@jemelehill) September 19, 2014

> The "how come nobody is talking about Hope Solo"'question is the new "the Spurs are underrated."

> — Jemele Hill (@jemelehill) September 19, 2014

In setting the record for most goalposts moved in one day, Solo defenders start with . . . she deserved the benefit of the doubt because (GASP!) she denies the charges (like Hardy and MacDonald).

> Important RT @Stareagle: @jemelehill Hope Solo denies the charges against her. That's a major difference than the Rice and AP cases.

Of course, even those who cover women's sports, like Sarah Gehrke, weren't buying that dodge.

https://twitter.com/Sarah_Gehrke/status/513315192931762176

The short answer, of course, is "yes."

The relative popularity of the NFL in no way explains why ESPNW, VICE Sports, and others who cover soccer and other women's sports failed miserably to move the camera from their subjects' faces to their transformed feet of clay. You see, Jane McManus, you, Sarah Spain, and Kate Fagan write for ESPNW, the "W" meaning "women." Your charter is not to cover the NFL from the on-field side, as "women" don't play in the NFL. So while your reporters should definitely weigh in with your concerns as women with the NFL's fumbling, it's not like the NFL-centric platforms have been silent on this issue. Indeed, the men were suspended for not toeing the party line (Stephen A. Smith, Max Kellerman). Neither does it forgive your chronic dereliction in avoiding the dark alleys of the beat your platform was invented to cover.

Women's sports is your beat, and you don't get a pass for choosing only to cover the "Sunny Side of the Street." Just as I turn to you to find more in-depth coverage of who the up-and-coming women's tennis players are, I should likewise see follow-up when Martina Hingis is accused of coordinating a three-person beating of her husband amid the toe-sucking of her triumphant return to doubles play.

Moving along, one of pop feminism's most annoying gadflies, Tomas Rios of VICE Sports, couldn't contain his rage.

The most fun of the weekend was watching Kate Fagan herself play her own version of Eminem's "Will the Real Slim Shady please stand up." Within three days of stating with a straight face that men need to be "reprogrammed," she (grudgingly) conceded that Solo should not be playing, albeit with the sincerity of a Kim Jong-un prisoner's letter criticizing America. Then, within hours she expressed buyer's remorse with a rote boilerplate about the NFL's power structure and the like. Garfield's sidekick Odie would have been envious of the expert level tail-chasing on display. Encouragingly, Fagan was thoughtfully and thoroughly raked in the comments.

No word yet from Fagan on when, or how much, her fellow lesbians need to be reprogrammed to stop beating their girlfriends at a rate much higher than the hetero or gay male rate.

Of course, nothing warms the heart like feminists screaming, “MAKE IT STOP!”

The following week, ESPN and others could no longer hide from the matter. On September 23, in a watershed moment, the Hope Solo/gender double-standard issue was taken up by Outside The Lines, ESPN’s investigative news program, and its host, Bob Ley. On the panel, Kate Fagan, after retracting her backtrack, was exposed by Roland Martin and all but pouted and stamped her feet, with interruptions completely out of character, her Duluth Model word salad falling flatter than 30-day-old 7UP.

Moreover, the venerable Ley, an original ESPN anchor from its 1979 launch, lent the matter the gravitas that it deserves, starting with the lead. Contrary to Fagan’s and Hill/Smith’s treatment, Ley did so without flippancy, dismissiveness, or antagonism toward the questions raised by the Hope Solo matter even being asked. On the other hand, Smith and Hill addressed the matter with the enthusiasm of drinking a pint of cod liver oil, with dodges and untruths abounding.

Mike & Mike also mentioned Solo that week, with Mike Golic expressing his annoyance that excuses be made for anyone, including the goalie of the U.S. Women’s Soccer Team.

It should be noted that this is the same program that soft-shoed basketball star Chamique Holdsclaw’s slap on the wrist for whipping out a gun and firing it at her girlfriend and then swinging a bat at her.

The events of September 19 and the following week are a testament to the hubris of those who oppose the more accurate narratives and, more importantly, a testament that our message is getting out there. Thanks in part to our efforts, people are no longer afraid to speak up, and gender feminists no longer have an ironclad monopoly on the narrative. And they’re about as happy as soaked kittens, as drivel by the usual suspects Amanda Hess and this moderator warning for using the phrase “feminist jurisprudence” on the MMA Fighting blog demonstrate.

Even the NFL coverage has lost much of its browbeating specter. That said, work is not done. The NFL has released a video sponsored by NoMore.org, with NFL stars past and present sock-puppeting the industry talking points less than two months after Jane Randel, NoMore.org’s founder, was put on the NFL’s social responsibility advisory board. But when others in the “sphere” suggest that our message hasn’t gained some traction, point to this episode. It matters not whether AVfM or any other “men’s rights” or “manosphere” outlet is given direct credit; Warren Farrell once described feminism as fluoride—”we drink it not even knowing it’s there.”

Likewise, if by bits and pieces our message gets out, it matters not who sells it.

Karl takes a ride on the gravy train

Mark Dent · 13 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Karl Stefanovic has continued the longstanding tradition of so many men who grace our television screens on a regular basis—it is game called "throw men under the bus" in order to win the eternal affectionate gratitude of your largely female audience. Eddie McGuire, Charlie Pickering, Andrew O'Keefe, and many others do this on a regular basis.

Stefanovic's offering "Hitting a Woman Is the Ultimate Coward's Punch" contains all of the self-serving "I'm not one of those men" lines backed with the usual deceitfully manipulated statistics on domestic violence so meekly swallowed by those who have no interest in the truth.

He begins by writing about the New South Wales government's "One Punch" law created to deal with the problem of alcohol-fuelled violence. He supports the law, but it got him thinking and he says:

> Something dawned on me. A coward by definition is a person who lacks courage in facing danger or difficulty. What about the violence perpetrated by some men against women. What do we call that? What do we call the man who strikes a woman?

I can think of a range of names, all of them very derogatory.

I wonder about other perpetrators of violence too. What, for example, do we call a woman who dumps her newborn baby in a bin? Is there a commonly used name for women who beat and abuse their children?

Stefanovic goes on to describe a type of singlet referred to as the "wife beater" in reference to Marlon Brando's character in A Streetcar Named Desire.

> He was violent and wore a white singlet. 'Wife beater'.
> The name seemed to stick in Australia. Can you imagine how anyone could call an item of clothing a 'wife beater' and think it was funny? Like I said, they were different times, although there are still parts of Australia where the term 'wife beater' is accepted Aussie slang. More importantly, this is a country where violence against women seems accepted.

Perhaps he is also offended by the notion that women on prime time nationwide television shows can laugh hysterically about the brutal mutilation of a man's genitals by his wife and call it "fabulous" and still remain working happily in the industry the following day and beyond.

I suppose the sanctification of Lorena Bobbitt all over the world simply because she hacked off her husband's penis was not something that caught Stefanovic's attention. Candlelit vigils and giant banners sung her praises, and to this day the very mention of her name brings a smug, satisfied smirk to the faces of many women. Why? She mutilated a man.

I wonder if he is aware of the T-shirts and badges still available online that call Lorena a role model for women or simply state "Lorena Rules." He didn't mention them in his column. These reactions are commonplace throughout the Western world, yet no one has ever suggested we seem to accept violence against men. Yet we do just that. Violence against men is funny, fitting, or invisible.

I would like to challenge Stefanovic to point to one example of a time when any male on any television show or other form of media praised a man for physically abusing a woman. I don't believe he will find one. It is a regular occurrence when a man is harmed by a woman. What does this say about our society's attitude toward violence?

He quickly jumps to the damning statistics.

> Look around where you work. One in three. Look around the shop you are in. One in three. Look around the bus or train. One in three. Look around your university lecture. One in three. Look on your Facebook page. One in three. Look in your daughter's classroom. One in three will experience it.

I think he really believes it. Every third female you come across has been bashed and battered by a man. The depth of his stupidity is breathtaking. How can anyone who has lived some forty-odd years on this planet truly believe that such a battering is taking place behind closed doors? Who are these people and how do our women manage to conceal not only the considerable physical damage they must be suffering from these beatings but the emotional trauma as well?

And what of the men who are doing all this battering? Unless there is a gang of thugs going door to door, one must logically assume from these damning statistics that one in three men are beating their girlfriends and wives. One-third of our community is up to its neck in violent abuse. Surely many of them are friends and associates of Stefanovic. As they keep telling us, no one is immune. There are dark secrets hidden behind our closed doors. How the hell do we keep functioning so smoothly? How can a society made up of so many disturbed, traumatized people continue to operate in the way it does?

I wonder if Stefanovic has run his eyes over the family violence survey used by the White Ribbon brigade to bring them the mouth-watering statistics he is so quick to use and believe? I doubt it.

He soon gets to the "I'm not one of them" part of his very predictable rant. He explains that he was:

> sufficiently scared of the old man, in a father son kind of way to heed the warning that he should NEVER HIT A WOMAN.
> I also believed that if my dad ever found out I had hit a woman, I in turn would cop a right royal flogging. We know now violence begets violence, but with young men the message from their dads or male role models is crucial. I can honestly say the thought of striking a woman has never even entered my mind.

Notice how casually Stefanovic accepts the notion that he would cop a severe beating from his father and see it as totally justified and perfectly reasonable? A father can beat the tripe out of his son and that's an appropriate way to teach a boy right from wrong. Is this an example of domestic violence—don't be ridiculous. It's just a dad doing what he has to do.

Would Stefanovic feel just as comfortable if his dad had administered a "right royal flogging" to his daughters for behaving in an unacceptable manner? No, I think that would be another example of violence against women.

So the best way to teach our boys that violence toward girls is unacceptable is to threaten them with a violent beating. Well, it worked for Karl. What does that tell them about our society's attitude toward violence against males, young or old?

Stefanovic thinks we can put an end to violence against women because its causes are simple. Bad, violent men beat up females because they have no moral compass when it comes to physical abuse.

His solution:

> The message is as simple as the causes of the violence. If you hit a woman you ARE a coward. In the truest sense of the word.

Yep. That should get the job done. Kevin Rudd's approach was equally brilliant. His statement to young males was "It isn't cool to hit women."

You see, Stefanovic and Rudd understand that the underlying cause of all this violence against women is that men and boys think they are brave and cool when they beat up a female. Well, Rudd's slogan will soon set them straight!

Once again the collective responsibility for all of this violence is placed upon our sons, brothers, fathers, and grandfathers. Stefanovic pleads with them to: Have the conversation. Turn to each other and say it. Because it is very clear to him that unless males are told that it is wrong to hit a female, they will be swinging wildly at every girl they encounter.

It is a sad fact that one woman dies at the hand of her partner each week. This is a tragedy for all involved. It is not an epidemic of murder and abuse as so many like to call it. My calculator revealed that 52 women in a population of, let's say, eleven million females is 0.00000473% of the female population. Too many, but words like epidemic should never be applied to these figures.

Sadly, again, male victims are dismissed as statistically insignificant even though one-quarter of the murdered people are men. We also know of course that the fact that three-quarters of all suicides are committed by males is not deemed worthy of a mention when the issue of suicide is discussed in our mainstream media. Suddenly the figures are irrelevant and the loss of life, male or female, is the focus.

As for Stefanovic's claims of one in three—this lie has been discredited and amended by the ABC on its website. It's actually one in forty-eight, but really, who is counting? One woman is too many, right? Let's not quibble over statistics!

Oh—and the response to this heartfelt rant was everything he could have hoped for. The gushing accolades flowed:

> Oh Karl, if only there were more men like you!

seems to sum up the general thrust of female comments. Job done, Mr. Stefanovic.

You are the man!

Dangerous trends in feminism

John Lauritsen · 13 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Publisher's note: As always, we strive to peel back the layers of our hidden history and mine for evidence of resistance to the onslaught of control, censorship, and bigotry from feminist ideologues. Recently we were gifted with a gem by the name of John Lauritsen, who confirms that where feminism is concerned there is nothing new under the sun, or under the crushing weight of oppression. Let us insist that his words be carried forward for the sake of all men.—PE

This talk was delivered to the Gay Academic Union Conference IV, New York City, 1976. Despite my discomfort with some of the rhetoric I used 30 years ago, I have made no changes in the text. I hereby give permission to print out this document and to photocopy it. However, it may not be published commercially without my permission. My current views on Gay Liberation are found in my book, A Freethinker's Primer of Male Love.

The early homosexual rights movement and the women's emancipation movement were both part of a broader sexual reform movement in the first three decades of the 20th century; they were regarded as comrade struggles. This was also true in the gay liberation phase of our movement, from the fall of 1969 onwards. I believe this is correct, and that every progressive person should endorse the basic goals of both movements — though to be sure, neither movement is a systematic body of doctrine, and both movements have internal disagreements.

Unfortunately, some very serious problems have arisen. Self-proclaimed feminists have acted in ways that were harmful to both gay liberation and women's liberation, and reactionary ideas have been advanced under the banner of feminism. I do not say these things were characteristic of the women's movement as a whole; rather, they can be attributed to a small, but highly publicized, minority.

Although criticism of male homosexuality and gay liberation has issued freely from the feminist camp, there has been almost no reciprocal criticism from gay men, not even in self-defence. It has become almost taboo to criticize anyone who identifies herself as a "feminist."

Why have feminists enjoyed this virtual immunity from criticism? For a number of reasons: Because most gay men really do support the women's movement, and are therefore hesitant to attack a women's liberationist. Because of a mood of guilt. Because feminists have so often demanded that things they disagree with be censored, and have so often gotten their way, that some men frankly are afraid of them. There is also an element of traditional male gallantry. And finally, there is a particular ideology which justifies the privileged status that feminists enjoy within the Gay Academic Union and other gay groups.

According to this ideology, the most basic division in society is not between class and class, but between male and female; distinctions according to gender are seen as far more important than distinctions based on wealth and power. According to this ideology, there is a hierarchy of oppression, with the oppression of women being the worst of all. It is an oppression so profound, so mysterious, and so ineffable, that it cannot even be described in concrete terms, as might other, lesser forms of oppression.

According to this ideology the oppression of homosexuals derives from "sexism," the foundation of which is male supremacy. Homosexuals are oppressed because they, not being seen as "real men and women," violate the "sex-roles" which sexism comprises. It follows that the oppression of male homosexuals is essentially a by-product of female oppression, and that the liberation of gay men must tail after the liberation of women. In effect, the gay liberation movement becomes the fag end of the women's movement.

According to this ideology, lesbians are doubly oppressed — both as homosexuals and as women — where homosexual males are merely singly oppressed. Gay men still enjoy a "male privilege" because, according to a central dictum of radical feminism: ALL MEN BENEFIT FROM THE OPPRESSION OF ALL WOMEN. So it would seem that gay men are not really so badly off, and perhaps it would be better if they did not devote their energies to repealing sodomy statutes and fighting discrimination, because these goals if realized would simply give them equality with straight men, thus objectively increasing the oppression of women. Instead, gay men should spend their time "dealing with their sexism," which they acquired from having been born male, and in learning how to "give up their male privilege."

According to this ideology, the best things gay men can do is to act as a "men's auxiliary" for women's liberation, taking their cues from feminists. And since men are the enemy, gay men should be willing to enlist as agents in the fight against males and against maleness.

Enough of this ideology! Perhaps some of you thought I was just making this up or being satirical. I assure you that the only original formulation in my description was the term "fag end"; everything else was taken from current extreme feminist arguments. There may be elements of truth in this ideology, but most of it is clearly mistaken, and it would be fatal for the gay liberation movement to adopt it. Certainly it is false to say that the oppression of homosexual males is a trivial matter. It is false to say that a perceived violation of sex-roles provides the explanation for our oppression; there have been many societies, before and outside of Judeo-Christendom, including male supremacist societies with rigidly defined sex-roles, which nevertheless did not place a taboo on sex between males.

At any rate, I am not convinced that feminists should be exempted from critical judgment. I shall deal with three main areas of contention: the first concerned with disruptions and diversions, the second with censorship, and the third with feminist bigotry against male homosexuality.

Disruptions and Diversions

I remember a number of such episodes in the early days of the Gay Liberation Front, in the fall of 1969. Women we had never seen before would come in and deliver tirades against the GLF men; they would say that not only were gay men more sexist or more male chauvinist than straight men, but men in GLF were among the worst of all. These charges were unfair and untrue, for GLF had always been in solidarity with women's liberation, and women had played leading roles in GLF from the beginning — but such charges had a certain demoralizing effect. Some of the men felt that rather than acting against our oppressors — for example, picketing the Village Voice — or publishing the first gay liberation paper, Come Out! — instead we should turn our attention inward to confront the enemy which was: Ourselves!

At the first gay conference at Rutgers in 1970, the major panel on the last day was disrupted by a group of women who demanded that all proceedings come to a halt. They charged that the panel was "elitist" and "sexist" (although half of the panelists were women); their main ostensible grievance was that on a table in the hall, provided for leaflets and free literature, were copies of Gay newspaper, in which they had found a reproduction of a beautiful, lush, reclining female nude, painted in the style of classic romanticism. This, they charged, was designed to titillate men, and was degrading to women. Overlooked was the fact that the picture illustrated an article written by a lesbian, and that it was unlikely the editors of Gay had intended to convert their male readers to heterosexuality.

The conference organizers were cruelly attacked, apparently for the sin of not having policed and censored the free literature table. It was a senseless, abusive, and thuggish disruption; the main organizer of the conference was reduced to tears, and the women as well as the men on the panel were moved to call the disrupters "fascists," an epithet that was not unjustified. For the most specious of reasons, a beautiful and mellow gay conference — one of the very first — had been turned into a nightmare.

One could go on and on. I imagine most of the people in this room have witnessed or read accounts of similar disruptions. There was the first international gay liberation conference in Edinburgh, where women discovered evidence of "sexism" and demanded that the conference change its focus from legislative reform to "confronting sexism." Laws, they argued, only affected men, and therefore it was sexist to concentrate upon things like repealing sodomy statutes. A majority of the men went along with this demand, and that was the end of an internationally coordinated campaign to change the laws. It's amazing it should be considered trivial that after two millennia, homosexual men are still criminals.

A certain pattern emerges. The people in power do not like movements for social change. When such movements are in their infancy, they will try to destroy or divert them. When movements have grown large and viable, then they will try to render them innocuous through co-optation.

It would have been inept for the ruling class to send someone into an antiwar conference who would say: “Look here, folks, I’m from the Council on Foreign Relations, and we don’t like what you’re doing. The Vietnamese people are giving us a hard enough time over there, and we don’t want trouble on the home front. So forget about this mobilization. Why don’t you just break into small groups and discuss patriotism?”

That speech would not have been well received.

However, what could be done was to send in representatives of “oppressed groups” — including blacks, women, and gay liberationists — to charge the antiwar movement with being white, male, middle class, racist, sexist, elitist, etc., and to demand that it deal with these issues rather than trying to stop the war in Southeast Asia.

I don’t think we should get paranoid over disruptions, for there exist sincerely motivated disrupters — although I do feel that if one has something to say, and is given an opportunity to say it, then it is at least poor tactics to disrupt. My point is simply that we should not let ourselves be diverted from the struggle, and that we should evaluate people’s ideas and actions on their merits, granting no privileged status on the basis of membership in an “oppressed group.”

So far as “silencings” are concerned — disruptions designed only to prevent someone from speaking — I am categorically opposed to them, and this leads me to my second problem area: Censorship.

Censorship

Throughout its history, the sexual reform movement has had to wage a fierce battle against censorship. So it is especially disturbing to see demands for censorship advanced by a sector of the movement.

The situation is serious. The new censorship, advanced under the banner of feminism, poses a threat to the gay liberation movement, the women’s liberation movement itself, and all other progressive movements. I am convinced that the feminist movement is being used as a cat’s-paw for taking away our civil liberties. The immediate target for ostensibly feminist censorship seems to be pornography — but pornography is a stalking horse, behind which is political repression. And repression is very much on the horizon in the United States. The Nixon Supreme Court has steadily whittled away civil liberties; the death penalty has been restored, and may soon claim its first victim for almost a decade; the Senate bill, S-1, which would virtually repeal the Bill of Rights, is waiting in the wings; new waves of censorship have swept across the country; and everywhere the Ministry of Propaganda is creating an atmosphere of violence and fear, which would justify imposing emergency Law & Order measures. Things like this always occur in a period of severe political and economic crisis, when the custodians of the system perceive it may be in jeopardy.

Now, it would be unfair to blame the women’s movement as a whole for the censorship problem. Only a relatively small number of “feminists” have been proponents and practitioners of censorship, and it would be naive to assume that all of these women were motivated by an honest commitment to feminism, especially in light of recent disclosures of such secret police programs as the FBI’s “Cointelpro.”

A leading exponent of censorious feminism is Susan Brownmiller, author of Against Our Will: Men, Women and Rape. In tribute to her, I have coined the term “Brownmillerism,” which I define as the use of sexual hysteria, in particular rape-fear, as a justification for repression. The main characteristics of Brownmillerism are prudery, intolerance, and irrationality. The immediate goals of Brownmillerism are censoring pornography and reducing the legal rights of defendants in rape cases, but it extends far beyond this. Brownmillerism helps to set up the machinery of repression and to create an atmosphere favorable to repression.

Brownmiller’s book Against Our Will (AOW) has enjoyed an amazing success. Promoted to the hilt by the establishment media, it became a Book of the Month Club selection and a best seller. Nevertheless, AOW is a shoddy piece of work: ludicrously inaccurate, patently reactionary, dishonest, and vulgarly written.

Brownmiller portrays rape as an omnipresent danger to women, whereas in fact it is a comparatively rare event; she argues that rape laws are too lenient, whereas in fact the penalties for rape are second only to those for murder in most states; she calls for reducing the evidentiary requirements for conviction, even though many innocent men have been executed after being falsely accused of rape. By special pleading, falsification, and atrocity-mongering, Brownmiller strives to create an atmosphere of hysteria and misinformation conducive to assaults upon civil liberties, as well as to diverting the women's movement from its rational priorities (according to The New York Times, rape has now become the number one issue of the feminist movement, eclipsing such former concerns as legal abortion and equal pay for equal work).

A long essay-review of mine on AOW and the rape question appeared in the Gay Liberator (Detroit, Spring 1976); I have copies of the review here, so I'll not go further into AOW now.

What is disturbing is the virtual absence of criticism. Two leading gay papers, Gay Community News and the Advocate, not only reviewed AOW favorably, but featured Susan Brownmiller's photograph on their front covers — this in spite of the fact that AOW contains obvious antihomosexual bigotry.

Critical reviews of AOW, all written by women, did appear in Esquire, Nation, the Militant, People's World, the Daily World, Women and Revolution, and the Libertarian Review, but these were a tiny minority compared to the accolades cranked out in the establishment press.

So far as I know, not a peep of criticism of AOW appeared in the feminist press — a sad commentary on the feminist movement's politics or its capacity to criticize a self-appointed spokeswoman.

A striking instance of Brownmillerism in action occurred in New York City last February — an episode I'll call "The Snuff Hoax."

What happened was that a rumor began circulating, according to which there existed a genre of movies known as "snuff" movies. "Snuff" movies, so the rumor went, were produced for the titillation of depraved men; they featured the actual torture, dismemberment, and murder of unsuspecting actresses.

Then a movie opened in New York City, entitled Snuff, and advertising itself as "made in South America, where life is cheap." By this time, the rumor about "snuff" movies had already been exposed as a hoax in the pages of Variety, Screw, and the Village Voice. Nevertheless, a group of feminists began to organize protests against the movie, claiming that the actress in it had actually been dismembered and murdered. The rumor was fed on all sides. A synthetically illiterate leaflet was passed out which began thus:

"Snuff is a film made in Argentina where no less than 18 murders are committed. Not acted out but in reality. Murders. People are actually killed for profit."

Karla Jay, in the Villager (26 February 1976), first protested that she was a "'hard core' civil libertarian," and then wrote: "So what did it take to make me help organize a protest, hit the barricades, and demand that a movie be shut down? Literally murder. Yes, real women have been dismembered, killed, and disemboweled…."

Deluded into believing that real murder had taken place, and that therefore no First Amendment issue was involved, many New York liberals signed a telegram sent to Manhattan District Attorney Robert Morgenthau; it read as follows:

"We the undersigned citizens call upon you as District Attorney of Manhattan to prosecute and to prevent presentation, distribution, and advertising of the film "Snuff" now being shown at the National Theatre in New York City. The film exhibits the violent dismemberment and murder of a woman for the purpose of arousing sexual interest. As citizens we demand the immediate investigation, prosecution and removal of this barbaric film from our community."

One might have expected a better written telegram from the New York intelligentsia, but the thrust is clear; it calls for official censorship, for strengthening the repressive apparatus of the State.

An article in Gay Community News (GCN) gloated that the list of signers of the telegram read like a list of "Who's Who" of the women's and gay communities in New York. The first name on the list was Susan Brownmiller.

To his credit, DA Robert Morgenthau refused to prosecute the film, insisting, correctly, that there was no legal basis for doing so. There were a few other voices of sanity. The American Civil Liberties Union refused to go along with the erst-while-liberal censors, and in consequence, the ACLU itself came in for attack. Bella Abzug sent a letter to the protest organizers, in which she said she would favor picketing and so on, but "could not support a legal suppression of the movie." "I would not go along with official censorship," Abzug wrote, "because I think once it is established, we in the women's movement or any other movement of dissent will find ourselves victimized."

Noe Goldwasser, writing in the Village Voice, continued to expose the "Snuff delusion," but to little avail. Goldwasser wrote: "the so-called actual murder film is a cheap-jack Manson take-off that had been in the can for three years … you can see more gore in 'Taxi Driver' and more sex in 'Gidget Goes Hawaiian'."

The protest organizers escalated their demands. Since there was no legal basis for prosecuting Snuff, they claimed that women in NYC were defenseless. What was needed were some new censorship laws which would protect the lives of women. They agitated accordingly.

For many weeks GCN treated the Snuff protests as the number one gay action; it gave front page coverage to the rantings of people like Lea Fritz, who strongly attacked the ACLU, and who said such things as: "We don't think the big money creeps should be able to foist their sick eroticism on the rest of us!"

A temporary madness swept through the gay community, affecting particularly those who considered themselves "radicals." The Snuff protests were the cause of the moment, and to criticize them meant ostracism. Everyone seemed to know a friend of a friend who had seen Snuff and vouched that the dismemberment and murder was real. They insisted I had no right to speak until I had paid $4 and seen the film for myself. This, fortunately, was not necessary; it was perfectly obvious from looking at the stills outside the theatre that nothing but crude special effects had been employed. What was supposed to be a dismembered hand looked hardly more real than a pair of rubber gloves from the dime store. And yet more than a thousand deluded protesters had filed past these stills without perceiving the obvious.

The rumor died hard. Long after he should have known better, Allen Young, writing in GCN, described Snuff as a movie "in which a women is murdered in order to create a film of erotic entertainment."

Eventually reality broke through. Robert Morgenthau, under pressure, located the actress who had allegedly been dismembered in Snuff. He found her in good spirits and, as he put it, "in possession of all her appendages."

Majority Report, which had helped feed the real-murder rumor, was forced to eat crow. A long article by Mary Lou Fox (MR 6-20 March 1976) exposed the hoax, placing the blame for the rumor-mongering on almost everyone except the protest organizers. The Snuff movie, she informed her readers, had been made in Buenos Aires four years ago, for a mere $33,000, and by a husband and wife team! The three-minute dismemberment scene was tacked on afterwards.

One sentence in Fox's article struck me as poignant: "The truth of the snuff-movie story seemed indisputable coming from so many sources at once."

1. Nolder Gay entered a dissenting opinion in GCN; he summed the affair up: "Is 'Snuff' a gay issue? No, but censorship is … and twisting the bill of Rights in the winds of immediate passion is, and increasing the powers of D.A.s is."

There's no doubt that Snuff was a truly vile movie, and offensive to women (though even more offensive movies were probably playing at the same time). I think women should protest against anti-woman bigotry — but succumbing to rumor-mongering and hysteria, and calling for official censorship, is playing the game of the enemy. If one is opposed to censorship, then one is opposed to censoring even that which one finds vile and offensive.

Perhaps history will group the Snuff hoax along with such episodes as the Flying Saucer delusion or the War of the Worlds panic; perhaps, if one accepts, as I do, a more sinister interpretation, history will class it with such fabrications as the "Protocols of the Elders of Zion," or the attribution of the Reichstag fire to the Communists.

A glimpse of where Brownmillerism and snuff-type hysteria lead was provided only a few weeks later, in Chicago. On May 26, a new censorship board was set up there to deal, at least in the beginning, with movies of violence. The immediate inspiration for Mayor Daley's antiviolence law, according to an article in the Guardian, was the public outcry against Snuff. Members of the new censorship board are all appointed by the Mayor, they average over 67 years of age, and their main qualification seems to be that they are widows of Democratic Party machine politicians.

The Guardian article makes it clear that it is political radicalism, rather than violence, that Daley is concerned with censoring, and that the board, if unchecked, may be expected to extend its mandate. "Mayor Daley himself told reporters the kind of film he had in mind when proposing the ordinance was 'Medium Cool', Haskell Wexler's fictional feature that included on-the-scene footage of [Daley's] police beating demonstrators at the 1968 Democratic Convention in Chicago."

Censorious feminism has also played a role within the gay liberation movement itself. I have already described the incident at the first Rutgers conference.

In the Gay Academic Union, some feminists have demanded that panels on S&M, pederasty, and transvestitism not be allowed at conferences, and more often than not, their demands have been acceded to. A scholarly presentation on the Marquis de Sade was censored last year — feminists felt it would advocate sadism, and that that must not be permitted.

This kind of censorship — the censorship of ideas — is offensive to every person of integrity. If we are opposed to someone's ideas, then if anything we should wish to draw him into debate, so we can counter his ideas with our own — assuming we have something to say. This is known as dialogue, and it is through dialogue that truth emerges.

This year in the Christopher Street Liberation Day Committee, a few women (speaking for all women) laid down a series of demands. First, women would march at the head of the parade, to offset what they called "lesbian invisibility." Second, half of the marshals and speakers would have to be women (actually, this had always been the case). Third, all floats and speakers would have to be approved by a committee, which would censor anything it found guilty of "sexism," "racism," "classism" (whatever that is), and perhaps some other "ism." The main fear of these women was that female impersonators would be allowed, either on floats or as speakers.

Maskenball im Kreis. “I knew you’d be coming!” Drawing by Mario de Graaf — published in February 1956 issue of the tri-lingual Swiss periodical, Der Kreis, which published continuously from 1932 to 1967.

For several years now, drag queans have been special targets of feminist wrath. We gay men have been forcefully told that if we support women’s liberation, we must denounce and repudiate everyone and everything connected with drag. The censorious feminists claim that drag oppresses women — that it is a mockery of women, misogyny, and a form of bigotry. If anyone feels I am exaggerating the feminist position, then I urge him to read an article in GCN (20 November 1976) by Karen Lindsey. Lindsey, who identifies herself as a “straight woman,” delivers a vicious attack against drag queans, and in the process engages in some coy anti-male-homosexual bigotry. She compares wearing drag to “sexual harassment,” pimping, rape, and wife-beating.

I am fascinated by one sentence of hers; she writes: “But when men dress in spike heels, rhinestones, sheer stockings, and evening gowns fitted with bustdarts, there is no room for doubt — or for tolerance.”

I have two questions for Ms. Lindsey. Number one: “You say that there in no room for tolerance. May we know specifically what forms of intolerance you would advocate?” Number two: “Do you believe that Woman, the eternal feminine or whatever, comprises such things spike heels and rhinestones?”

The time has come to defend transvestites. On the level of personal freedom, I say that if women have the right to dress like drag queans, then drag queans should have the right to dress like women. Many states and communities still have laws prohibiting “cross-dressing,” and little enough has been done to get rid of these medieval absurdities. Beyond this, I think we must question whether there be any justification for the current feminist vendetta against drag queans.

Now, the transvestite issue is not a simple one. Superficially it is true that most transvestites are straight; it is also true that the vast majority of gay men have no desire to put on women’s clothes, and are at least as “virile” as the average, exclusively heterosexual man (though perhaps less rigidly “masculine”).

On the other hand, it is also true that drag has long been a part of the gay subculture. When gay men get together for a really fun and special occasion — now, as in the 19th or 18th centuries — costumes and drag may well be a part of the festivities. Drag and drag queans are a part of the gay world, whether one likes it or not. One may believe that the gay world as we know it now is part of our oppression, and I agree up to a point. But I suggest that in drawing up a blueprint for a liberated future, there is a danger of falling into puritanism in the present.

Why drag? Well, gay men have a sense of humor, a unique sense of humor, known as “camp”; it is part of our heritage. And at the heart of camp is a mockery of the situation we find ourselves in, our predicament as homosexuals. And so camp, among other things, includes a mockery of sex-roles, a mockery of taboos, a mockery of danger, a mockery of condemnation.

If gay men have survived the worst oppression that Christendom had to offer, we owe something to camp. For most of the Christian era, the Church and State have not recognized our right to live — not even our right to exist. And yet the gay men who escaped the Executioner often came out strong and more creative than the straights. I would like to believe that even in the dungeons of the Inquisition, men were camping. I would like to believe that even in Nazi concentration camps, the men with the pink triangle gave each other courage by camping.

Drag is considered to be a form of camp, and it is. Drag is the most extreme mockery of sex-roles, the most extreme exposé of how arbitrary most of the real-man/real-woman divisions are. To be sure, there is high as well as low camp, and good as well as bad camp. But at its best, drag is very good camp indeed.

Feminist claims to the contrary, what a drag quean parodies is not women, but culturally dictated sex-roles — sex-roles which are themselves oppressive to women. In anything, by demonstrating the arbitrariness and absurdity of traditional sex-roles, female impersonators, far from being oppressive to women, may actually serve as consciousness raisers aiding the liberation of women.

I think some of the feminist rage against transvestites can be explained by a denial of the element of self-oppression involved in playing traditional sex-roles. So far, gay liberationists have been more willing than feminists to analyze the ways we contribute to our own oppression; immediately Carl Wittman's Gay Manifesto and Andrew Hodges's and David Hutter's With Downcast Gays come to mind. Betty Friedan's The Feminine Mystique and the protests at the Miss America Pageant seemed to promise a women's analysis of self-oppression, but lately the feminist movement has opted for a men-are-the-enemy-period sort of pseudo-radicalism.

Karen Lindsey in the GCN article claims that women adopt traditional sex-roles, and dress the way they do, only because they are forced to do so by men; in her words: "It is men who determine what is fit apparel for men and women, reserving to themselves what is functional and assigning to women styles that conform to male fantasy and power needs."

I find this hard to believe. Surely women have some responsibility for their actions. Do men really force women to wear rhinestones? Spike heels? It seems to me that any woman who is determined can walk into a store and buy a comfortable pair of shoes. Who forces them to buy spike heels? Do men really enjoy walking with a woman who has to totter along like a cripple? Similarly, if a woman is oppressed by cosmetics, then I suggest that liberation lies no further away than the nearest sink, with the aid of a little soap and water.

Now, who is supposed to be hurt by drag queans? Women? How many women have ever even seen a drag quean? If they did see one, what would happen? Would they suffer? The only group of transvestites that really do harm others are ecclesiastical transvestites — that is to say, priests, bishops, cardinals, and popes — but so far the feminists have shown no inclination to attack ecclesiastical transvestitism.

If anybody at all is hurt by drag queans, it would surely be gay men, or so I believed at one time. Since the stereotyped image of a homosexual man is a man who wants to act and look like a woman, I believed that drag queans tended to reinforce the stereotype.

I have changed my opinion. If, to use Mencken's term, "Boobus Americanus" wishes to believe in the stereotype, they I'm sure he will do so, with or without the aid of transvestites. I now believe that transvestites should not merely be tolerated, but actually encouraged to do as they please. If they want to dress up and carry on, then why not? We only live once.

In the very early days of the Gay Liberation Front, we made the decision that transvestites would be as welcome as anyone else. Unlike the "homophile" movement, we were not so concerned with respectability that we would turn away any of our gay brothers and sisters.

When I entered the gay world, many years ago in Boston, I had a hard enough time of it, though I had certain advantages. It was drag queans in a seedy Boston cafeteria, the "Bick," who first let me laugh at things which had been the torment of adolescence. I laughed till I cried — and after that it was easier. I would expand the Nietzschean aphorism to say: “Oh my brothers: Camp! and be hard!”

I have also known sensitive young men who did not have my advantages — who had run away from fathers who beat them and mothers who cursed them — who were not intellectuals — who had no assets other than a sudden will to be themselves. They did not know what it meant to be “gay,” so they plucked their eyebrows, or set their hair; they wore an earring, or a necklace; they sullied their complexion with makeup; or they wore something that put them beyond the pale of masculine normalcy. They were naive.

Usually the phase passed, especially if they were fortunate enough to acquire a friend or lover who accepted them as they essentially were, without the extreme role-playing or accoutrements of either butch or femme.

It frightens me to think that such a young man, assailed by doubts and fears, facing pitfalls and dangers on every side, might be subjected to further cruelty from gay men who have been influenced by the censorious feminists. We must be firm. Not only must we reject without qualification the claim that drag queans oppress women, we must also make sure than none of our brothers are hurt through malice instigated by the censorious feminists. Our lifestyle is none of their business.

At this point I’m sure we are sick of censorship. What is really disgusting about the censorious feminists is that they trample on the memory of the many women in the freethought and sexual reform movements who courageously battled against censorship over the last century. One thinks of women like Annie Besant, Margaret Sanger, Martha Ruben-Wolfe, Emma Goldman. How appalled they would be to see the things now being done under the banner of feminism!

Prohibiting and censoring will be the death of our movement. Our struggle is to get out our own ideas, not to suppress the ideas of others. I share the faith of Thomas Paine, who concluded his Age of Reason by saying: “When opinions are free, either in matters of government or religion, truth will finally and powerfully prevail.”

Feminist Bigotry Against Male Homosexuality

To continue the story of this year’s Christopher Street Liberation Day: every one of the women’s demands was agreed to. Women were at the head of the Gay Pride march, and women with bullhorns cleared the area of male interlopers. In this contingent, two women marched with a banner proclaiming: “Cocksucking Causes Cancer!” Despite the vaunted concern with censoring “sexism,” apparently none of the other women in the contingent suggested to these sisters that they were marching in the wrong parade.

The phrase “cocksucking causes cancer” is from a poem entitled “Cut the Cock,” which appeared in the quarterly journal Dyke (“To be sold to and shared by women only!”). Here are some lines from “Cut the Cock”:

> Cocksucking can cause cancer
> cockclimbers better watch their step
> on the ladder to suck-cess-pool
> cause the cockclock is running out of ticktock
> and when the woman revolution comes
> there ain’t gonna be no pawn shop
> where an old cocksucker can hock a cock…

No comment on the poem, but I do find it reprehensible that the gay press has hidden its head in the sand and pretended that the poem never was published.

Recently I have been reading and rereading many of the major feminist writings, and have come across much prejudice against male homosexuality. Sometimes feminist bigotry against male homosexuals is obvious and crude, as in the poem; usually it is more subtle. Basically, the feminist writers deny the validity of male love; they insist on treating it as the product of misogyny, rejection or fear of women.

(Some of the feminist works I criticize have merit, despite their prejudice against male homosexuality. Specifically, Phyllis Chessler's Women and Madness is moving and informative; the Redstockings anthology, Feminist Revolution, is valuable for its accounts of how the women's movement has been diverted and coopted, as well as for its principled exposé of Gloria Steinem's links to the CIA; and there are things to be learned from Shulamith Firestone's Dialectic of Sex and even Kate Millett's much overrated Sexual Politics.)

A blatant example is provided by Leslie B. Tanner, in her article, "On Being Natural," which appeared in the popular anthology Voices From Women's Liberation. Tanner writes about male fear of women, and she works up to these two sentences:

"The Christian tradition — based on male anxiety from the Hebrew tradition — takes the fear of the female to even greater extremes. During the Middle Ages celibacy (which is related to rear of the female) produced such strong anxieties that both self-castration and sodomy existed."

This is clear enough: if it were not for a pathological fear of women, a terrible thing like sodomy would never happen. Tanner is also conveying the impression that sodomy is a form of emasculation.

Of course the notion that male homosexuality is caused by a fear of women is a stock-in-trade of such psychiatric quacks as Drs. Bergler, Bieber, Kardiner et al. — but then these people are men, so we've been allowed to criticize them.

What feminist writers seem totally unable to comprehend is the validity of all-male attachments — the great desire and need men have for the companionship, friendship, and love of other men. The feminists cannot see male fellowship as a positive thing; to them it can only be misogyny, a rejection and exclusion of women, a form of segregation.

Whereas a gay liberationist would say that men in our culture are alienated in their affection for each other, some feminists believe that men are too close to each other already.

I am not exaggerating the feminist position, and urge everyone to read Carol Hanisch's article "Men's Liberation" from the Redstockings anthology, Feminist Revolution; it is most instructive. Hanisch writes in a very clear, succinct, and straightforward manner; there is never any doubt what she is saying. The essence of her argument is that men's liberation groups are a reactionary development; that it is absurd to imagine that men are oppressed by the prevailing sex-roles, because all men profit from the oppression of all women; that therefore men have nothing to be liberated from. When she gets to homosexuality, Hanisch has this to say:

"Men's liberationists always bring up 'confronting their own feelings about men' by which they mean homosexuality. Male homosexuality is an extension of the reactionary club) meaning both group and weapon). The growth of gay liberation carries contempt for women to the ultimate: total segregation. The desire of men to 'explore their homosexuality' really means encouraging the possibility of homosexuality as a reaction against feminist demands. This is the reason the movement for "gay rights" received much more support only after women's liberation became a mass movement."

The prejudice against male homosexuality contained in Kate Millett's highly influential book, Sexual Politics, is worse than that in Carol Hanisch's article, but it is more insidious. Millett's style is muddled and affected, and her bigotry emerges more in little digs and innuendoes than in direct statement.

To Millett, there is nothing positive about male relationships; they are simply power relationships. Either more powerful males exert dominance over weaker males, degrading them to the status of females, and deriving a peculiar satisfaction from bullyism; or males gang together to consolidate their power over women.

In Millett's world, men do not really like each other; it is only the sexual politics of the patriarchy that makes them spend so much time together.

Millett extends the term "men's house culture," referring to an institution in some primitive societies, to apply to all men's associations. She tosses in the Nazis, underworld thugs, Norman Mailer's U.S. Army, and some primitive sadism, in such a way as to imply that all men's groups are somehow fascistic in character.

Describing the men's house institution in Melanesia, Millett writes: "They reek of physical exertion, violence, the aura of the kill, and the throb of homosexual sentiment." And then later: "Untried youths become the erotic interest of their elders and betters, a relationship also encountered in the Samurai order, in oriental priesthoods, and in the Greek gymnasium." And again: "The tone and ethos of men's house culture is sadistic, power-oriented, and latently [sic] homosexual…."

When things get lumped together this way, a lot gets lost. How can one equate Greek pederasty with the crude sadism of a primitive people? — Greek pederasty with its pedagogical relationship, its concern with the imparting of knowledge and wisdom, its noble code of ethics.

To Millett, the sexual activity that takes place in the "men's house" is not quite real: it is either sadism or a sort of surrogate heterosexuality. She writes:

"Considerable sexual activity does take place in the men's house, all of it, needless to say, homosexual. But the taboo against homosexual behavior (at least among equals) is almost universally of far stronger force than the impulse and tends to effect a rechannelling of the libido into violence."

In reading Millett, it is sometimes necessary to stop and disentangle the things she has mixed together. Notice how she slipped in the assertion that the taboo on all-male sex is almost universal. This is certainly not true, in historical perspective; if the taboo on male homosexuality were indeed a universal, then we might reasonably infer there must be something wrong about it.

Millett gets to her point, that "men's house" homosexuality doesn't really count as homosexuality. Her writing is an extreme muddle here — very, very tricky:

"The negative and militaristic coloring of such men's house homosexuality as does exist, is of course by no means the whole character of homosexual sensibility. [Thanks for nothing!] Indeed, the warrior caste [sic] of mind with its ultravirility, is more incipiently homosexual, in its exclusively male orientation, than it is overtly homosexual. (The Nazi experience is an extreme case in point here.) And the heterosexual role-playing indulged in, and still more persuasively, the contempt in which the younger, softer, or more 'feminine' members are held, is proof that the actual ethos is misogynist, or perversely rather than positively heterosexual. The true inspiration of men's house association therefore comes from the patriarchal situation rather than from any circumstances inherent in the homo-amorous relationship."

A real mess, wasn't it, with Nazism thrown in and everything jumbled together? But we get the thrust of her argument: Men's house attachments occur only because of misogyny, only because of heterosexual default. It is a camouflaged version of the old notion that male homosexuality equals a rejection of women. It is also close to the "pseudohomosexuality" theories of such psychiatric charlatans as Lionel Ovesy.

It is especially regrettable that Millett links Nazism to homosexuality, since we in gay liberation have worked so hard to undo the "fascist perversion" myth — the notion that homosexuality and Nazism go together — a myth that is the opposite of the truth.

Millett is distinctly hostile to the possibility of genuine male friendship. She writes:

"Much of the glamorization of masculine comradery in warfare originates in what one might designate as 'the men's house sensibility'. Its sadistic and brutalizing aspects are disguised in military glory and a particularly cloying species of masculine sentimentality. A great deal of our culture partakes of this tradition, and one might locate its first statement in Western literature in the heroic intimacy of Patroclus and Achilles."

We note the phrase, "particularly cloying species of masculine sentimentality." Millet's language really gives here away here. Was the relationship between Achilles and Patroclus really "cloying" or "sentimental"? For that matter, is there a single line in the Iliad that is either cloying or sentimental? Frankly, I resent Millett's snide attacks on male friendship, of which there are many.

Millett's hostility towards male friendship comes out most clearly in her chapter on D.H. Lawrence, a treatment that can fairly be described as vicious. The tenderest moments in Lawrence's novels, his attempts to describe the need men have for deep male friendship and male love, receive only ridicule and contempt from her pen. Her plot synopses are grotesque, both for their inaccuracies and for the animus that pervades them. If anyone thinks I am being overly harsh, I suggest a simple test. Read her chapter on D.H. Lawrence, especially her synopsis of Women in Love. Read Women in Love — a wonderful novel — and then draw your own conclusions.

At this point, to go through more feminist writers would involve mostly repetition, for the same themes occur over and over. Phyllis Chessler, in her book, Women and Madness, also puts forward the thesis that male homosexuality is an expression of misogyny. She also links male homosexuality to militarism and ridicules the "'glorious' tradition" of male homosexuality.

Susan Brownmiller in Against Our Will blurs together voluntary homosexual acts and homosexual rape; it appears that to her, both are equally horrible.

Shulamith Firestone's book, The Dialectic of Sex, contains many nasty little digs against male homosexuality. Firestone accepts the Freudian Oedipal complex theory on the aetiology of male homosexuality. She also holds the extraordinary notion that men cannot be erotic objects, and that the female body is intrinsically more aesthetic.

Actually, some of the very worst bigotry has come from men claiming to represent feminism. In this camp are the handful of men who call themselves "effeminists" and publish the expensively produced and synthetically pathological magazine, Double-F. Another male feminist is John Stoltenberg, whose article, "Toward Gender Justice," appeared in WIN magazine (20 March 1975). Stoltenberg attacks all of the goals of the gay liberation movement, claiming that if realized they would only give gay men equality with straight men; he puts forward the propositions that males concerned with "gender justice" should embrace "a total repudiation of masculinity" (including a repudiation of erections and pelvic thrusts during sex), and a total repudiation of male relationships. Stoltenberg posits a "patriarchal taboo against unbonding," which is insidiously counter to the truth: what is tabooed in our culture is precisely the desublimation of the male bond; the taboo is on fully realizing eros between males. Stoltenberg deserves only our contempt when he dismisses the yearning men have for male affection by writing: "…all he was ever programmed to long for in relationship with men connects at its center to a process that keeps women oppressed."

A curious double standard exists whereby feminists see all-female groups, publications, etc. as a necessary part of their movement, but would deny men a similar privilege. Again we are grateful to Carol Hanisch for providing us with a clear rationale for this double standard. According to Hanisch, men's groups exist in order for men to consolidate their power over women. She writes: "They are a breeding ground for updating male supremacist theory and strategy for 'handling' the growing feminist movement." Hanisch justifies the feminist double standard with this remarkable sentence: "All-male groups are more of the same segregation that women's liberation all-female groups exist to put an end to."

Some — though not all — of the feminist writers are so bent on eliminating what they see as "segregation," that they would abolish one-sex groupings altogether, as well as all sexual divisions. If they had their way, there would not exist any one-sex spheres whatever. Needless to say, this would mean the eradication of homosexuality. An extreme representative of this viewpoint is Shulamith Firestone, who looks forward to a future where every institution segregating the sexes would be destroyed, and even the gestation of human embryos would take place in machines rather than in the wombs of women. Everything would be homogenized. There would be total and uniform heterosociality; if homosexual couplings did occur, it would be on a random and arbitrary basis.

This is not my view of the future. I think that we are still animals, like it or not, and that it is entirely fitting for the female of our species to give birth to the young. I think that men must learn to love men, and women to love women. No doubt under conditions of freedom, the evolved men and women of the future will make their own decisions, but I feel certain there will be some areas of life where both men and women will prefer to be in the company of their own kind.

Conclusion

Despite all of the sorry particulars I have related, I still believe that women's liberation and gay liberation should be seen as comrade struggles.

I think the women should take a hard and critical look at the extreme feminist wing of their movement; parts of it have become the worst enemy of women's liberation. I think women should fight for full economic, political, and sexual equality with men, and that they should take action against anti-woman bigotry. There is a time to demonstrate, to picket, to march; there is a time to raise hell — but prudery, intolerance, and censorship have no place in any progressive movement.

The rest of my conclusion I address to the men:

Brothers: We have work to do for our own liberation, and we must not be diverted from the struggle.

We must not let our historic oppression be trivialized. We were stoned to death by the Jews; put to the sword, castrated, and tortured by the Christians; burned at the stake by the Inquisition. We were the men with the pink triangle. We are the ones being persecuted right now in Chile, in Argentina, in Cuba, and in the United States. It is male love that has been under the most powerful taboo of all Judeo-Christian culture: an offence worse than murder, the "abominable crime," the "unspeakable crime," the "sin so horrible it is not to be mentioned among Christians."

We must affirm the validity and beauty of male companionship, male friendship, and male love. We must defend our heritage.

We must recognize our enemies wherever we find them. Nobody's ideas and nobody's actions should be exempted from criticism.

If men and women cannot work together in the gay liberation movement in a comradely fashion, then it would be better to work separately. This would be a shame, but the lesbian movement has already become largely autonomous, and perhaps they are right.

KSUM—Georgia on my mind

Dan Perrins · 14 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A couple weeks ago, AVfM's very own Director of Collegiate Activism and president of Kennesaw State University Men (KSUM), Sage Gerard, held the first men's human rights conference, Male Students in Peril, on the campus of his school, Kennesaw State University.

I attended not only because of my responsibility as the Canadian News Director for AVfM but also because I'm a veteran of some of the worst feminist-indoctrinaught attacks/protests at events that discuss issues facing men and boys and criticize feminism. So I have experience in dealing with the possible nastiness dished out by feminists at these events.

There were a few things about the conference that stood out for me.

First, let me say I have respect for the KSU YESbody! positive-protest group and other feminists who attended Male Students in Peril. I may not agree with their feminist-lens view, which I consider to be askew, but I will compliment them on how they conducted themselves.

It will be this ability to show respect for differing points of view (which I hope they will continue to exhibit) that will facilitate open, honest dialogue and will thus bring about equitable solutions.

On one of my trips to the mic during the speakers' Q&A periods, I brought up a quote by Walt Whitman, from the preface of Leaves of Grass:

> Re-examine all you have been told … dismiss whatever insults your own soul.

(I realize that we have atheists in the community, so we can substitute "conscience" for "soul," with all due respect to Whitman.)

I urge all of you to take that quote to heart and apply it when claims are made in gender-politics discussions—especially since, just like regular politics, there is a vast amount of profit to be made in gender politics. Sometimes that profit comes in the form of money, sometimes it comes in the form of silencing open, honest discussion. The KSU YESbody! group is familiar with feminist lies for profit, as was illustrated in their apology to Sage.

I've also got respect for their ability to admit when they are wrong.

I understand their concern that the conference speakers spent a lot of time criticizing feminism; however, feminism has a lot to answer for. And for those of you willing to re-examine what you've been told about feminism, I am about to present to you some very damning evidence of its wrongdoings. I'm going to incorporate events and evidence from both the university environment and society in general.

Let's start with the university environment. I regularly attend talks given by the Canadian Association for Equality (CAFE) in Canada, specifically at the University of Toronto in Ontario.

In November 2012, when I was just another voice in the growing crowd of individuals exposing the misandry in feminism, CAFE hosted a talk by Dr. Warren Farrell, a former chapter head of the National Organization for Women (NOW).

Dr. Farrell is one of the most reasonable and soft-spoken individuals I've ever had the pleasure of meeting, and yet without ever having talked to him, the feminists at the University of Toronto felt the need to prejudge him, protest, and not engage in open dialogue. Their answer to his presence on campus was to commit illegal, life-endangering acts such as blocking fire exit doors and becoming assaultive toward event attendees and security and police alike. There are two videos illustrating my claims that I would like you to pay attention to. The first is by Studio Brulé, and the second is mine, building upon Brulé's exceptional camerawork.

(Note: This video combines footage of Ashleigh Ingles from two separate events.)

My next experience with feminist protestors occurred when Dr. Janice Fiamengo spoke at the University of Toronto in March 2013. Likely most KSUM conference attendees will recognize Fiamengo's name, as she was one of the key speakers last weekend.

I want you to pay attention to their attempts to silence non-feminist views via intimidation. At one point in the video you'll see the feminists trying to intimidate me by taking my picture. My response is, as you can see, non-violent, and I offered them my card. You may also notice how another of the protestors tried to intimidate me by waving their sign around mere inches from my face.

Both attempts failed miserably. They obviously had no idea who I was, most likely due to the fact that they had been lied to by their feminist women studies and gender studies instructors. They also pulled the fire alarm at this event, needlessly putting lives at risk while engaging in a criminal act.

Some of you will profess that these examples are "not my feminism"; however, these are not isolated incidents. At an April 2013 lecture given by Drs Paul Nathanson and Katherine Young also at the University of Toronto, I experienced this charming feminist commonly known as "Big Red." Big Red was heralded as a feminist champion for laughing and mocking male suicides, and in true feminist fashion when I highlighted Red's cretinous behavior I was accused of being a mahhhsawjuhhhnistic monster. All because I faced off against this deplorable individual who laughed at male suicide, which became a very real issue for my family 32 years ago when my brother killed himself.

One would think feminists would toss this cretin to the curb and move on, but they didn't. They portrayed her as a martyr, daring to speak to a man. Another unsubstantiated feminist lie.

Red is actually a MHRM hero in that her monstrous behavior drove people away from feminism.

And again the feminists put lives needlessly at risk when they broke the law and pulled the fire alarm for no valid reason.

Next on my playlist of feminist experiences is a group I dubbed "Darwin's Rejects," out in full force in August 2014 to protest another CAFE speaker at the University of Toronto, Igor Serebryany, a reporter, columnist, editor, and a former producer of BBC World Service who was presenting issues men and children face in Russian courts. Sure, this crowd seems like intelligent individuals, but looks can be deceiving.

I labeled them Darwin's Rejects because they were left behind by the evolution of rational, open, evidence-based debate/discussion. They were so proud of their feminism while protesting but quickly scurried like cockroaches after the light of truth was shone upon them.

With that, I'm going to close the university environment experiences I've had—they're not the only ones, but they do represent a fair sampling of what is happening here in Canada.

To address events off-campus and out there in society at large, I have a few other videos showing irrefutable evidence regarding the misandric corruption either done by or at the behest of feminism in Canada.

First, we have four videos by a group in Canada's capital, Ottawa. In 2012, the Ottawa Coalition to End Violence Against Women put out a 54-page document in which they erased all evidence of male victims of relationship violence. They took the total number of victims and claimed they were all women. Not once, but twice.

Now, some of you may say, "Well, that was just one group." I counter that with the fact that Professor Holly Johnson, who helped advise and edit the paper, is considered a statistical expert by the University of Ottawa and actually wrote the Statistics Canada report on violence against women in 2006. So her not catching the glaring mistakes found in these videos is unforgivable; after all, she allegedly TEACHES this stuff. Still, let's say that Professor Johnson was ill for the three or four months it took to put this paper together. What about the other two professors involved (Professors Jen Fraser and Rena Bivens)? Where were their heads at? Lastly, let's not ignore the fact that the author of this piece of indoctrinaught birdcage liner was a Ph.D. candidate studying under Johnson. The glaring and multiple mistakes should never have made it past first reading, but they did. Were they deliberate, perhaps?

Next up, how about my local police force inflating numbers? Not possible, right? Well, after I pointed out their inflated numbers, they pulled their fraudulent paper off of their website.

And last but not least, we have the sexist, bigoted White Ribbon folks (not to be confused with WhiteRibbon.org, which seeks to End All Domestic Violence). Again, here we have irrefutable evidence of a feminist organization inflating numbers and ignoring male victims for profit.

All of this evidence is widely known by the non-/anti-feminist community, and any attempts to have these feminists held accountable for their actions—either by their peers in the feminist community or by the legal system when laws were actually broken—has been ignored.

Feminism owns every single bit of these deplorable actions. It also owns the negligent/criminal behavior engaged in and promoted by feminism.

As I mentioned, many of the feminists in attendance at the KSUM conference expressed anger at the criticism aimed at feminism by the conference speakers. Although the speakers were all well aware of the deplorable actions of feminists (some of which I illustrated above, but the list does go on …), the feminist attendees were unaware of all this back story, mainly because it's been hidden from I'd say about 85% of those who identify as feminists.

But it hasn't been hidden from Sage Gerard, the KSUM speakers, or the MHRM community. This is what feminism owns. This is what feminism has done. And this is what feminism will continue to do unless it is relegated to the trash bin of history and all humans come together in an egalitarian movement.

That movement is the MHRM. We don't have an ideology; unlike feminism, we base our findings and positions on evidence, not feelings.

In closing, let me remind you again about ol' Walt's wise words:

> Re-examine all you have been told … dismiss whatever insults your own soul.

I took Whitman's words to heart and found that feminism insulted my soul.

Will you?

Whoopi Goldberg (on The View): “She deserved to be slapped!”

A video called “Man smacks the soul out of girl on the NY Subway” has gone viral. Notice the double standard: who started hitting here?

Whoopi Goldberg once again is a fount of common sense–and apparently, what she’s saying is beginning to penetrate with some of her audience and some of her cohosts:

The WRC assists the Australian Parliament in eliminating male victims of IPV

andybob · 15 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Some time prior to the first International Conference on Men's Issues, which was held in Detroit, USA, in June 2014, the Australian Domestic & Family Violence Clearinghouse—a government-supported initiative implemented by the University of New South Wales (UNSW)—made the following announcement on its website:

> The Australian Domestic & Family Violence Clearinghouse is completing its transition to Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety.
> Going forward, UNSW … will build on the Clearinghouse's achievements through the Gendered Violence Research Network (GVRN) and continue to carry out rigorous, multi-disciplinary research related to gendered violence, including domestic and family violence.

The transition, which became effective on July 1, 2014, symbolizes the fact that the Australian Government (AG) has eschewed any pretense of concern for male victims of female-perpetrated intimate partner violence (IPV) and has now adopted an exclusively gendered approach to this important social issue. Rendering male victims of IPV invisible and eradicating female perpetrators of IPV from existence do not count as "achievements" for those who believe that the AG's approach to this issue should be gender-inclusive and comprehensive, as opposed to gender-bigoted, unethical, and intellectually dishonest.

An examination of the GVRN reveals that it is exactly what its name implies:

> Members of GVRN aim to explore gendered violence—also known as gender-related or gender-based violence—as an expression of power and control over individuals or groups because of their gender.

The GVRN's mission is to accumulate a body of academic research under the auspices of the UNSW, one of Australia's most prestigious universities, that supports its contention that IPV is a gendered issue in which one gender (men) expresses its "power and control over individuals or groups" (women and children). The purpose of this body of academic research is to provide some of the so-called evidence that enables the AG to focus exclusively on women (children are invariably included, if at all, as an afterthought) as victims of IPV and lay the blame for it entirely on men.

It is on this basis that the AG justifies its funding and support for anti-domestic violence initiatives like the White Ribbon Campaign (WRC), upon which, as we shall see, it also relies heavily for data, information, and recommendations. This is just one component in a vast network of entities, including academia, the government, the media, and the judiciary, working in concert to define IPV in Australia as a gendered issue. It justifies the anti-male nature of implemented legislation and social policy, as well as the continued denial of adequate publicly funded support services for male victims of female-perpetrated IPV.

The media colludes in this gendered approach to IPV by relying heavily on misleading statistical data and information provided by this cabal, rarely undertaking any type of independent investigation that would reveal the increasing amount of readily available evidence-based research that challenges, contradicts, and frequently debunks official claims. The result is a plethora of articles in the mainstream media (MSM) that not only completely ignores men as victims of IPV but also presents the issue as a national emergency requiring immediate attention and action.

A recently published article "Domestic violence against women reflects national problem: Police" details "a night with Fairfield police officers in Sydney's west to find out what it is like to deal with the sad and often violent reality of domestic abuse."

It includes an account of an incident in which a husband is charged with domestic violence.

> A report has come in that a man has hit a woman in the head…. Constable Easson explains what happened. "There was an argument over the TV channel. It was a minor that escalated into a verbal," she says. "He [the husband] became aggressive and picked a water canister made of stainless steel and threw it at her. It made contact to the back of the head and caused a cut and bleeding." … The husband was taken to Fairfield police station where he was charged with assaulting his wife.

A violent man has been rightfully apprehended for committing domestic violence against his wife that resulted in her being physically injured. At least, that is what the reader is meant to assume from the facts presented in the article.

Not so fast.

There are a few questions that inquiring minds would like answered before passing judgment on this incident.

Who instigated the argument? Who escalated the violence to the point where it became aggressive enough for objects to be thrown, and who threw the first one? Was the husband also bleeding as he was taken to Fairfield police station? Was the husband provided with an opportunity to present his account to the police? The article doesn't mention it at all—only that the wife and a daughter (who was not present at the time of the alleged assault) are reported as providing police with their accounts. Was this a deliberate or accidental oversight on behalf of the reporters, or is failing to secure the male partner's version of events deemed unnecessary and, therefore, not part of the standard police procedure regarding DV?

Unfortunately, inquiring minds will never know the answers to these questions because it either didn't occur to the reporters to ask them or they chose not to include them in their article. One of the key problems of adopting a gendered approach to the issue of IPV is that, by definition, it ignores half of the story. It assumes, as Alison Tieman has observed, that men are always the actor and women are always acted upon. This is a deeply misogynistic, even paternalistic, attitude that robs women of the agency that MHRAs believe all women possess.

However, the most serious problem with adopting gendered approaches to IPV is that it is deeply unjust toward men, and not merely those engaged, willing or otherwise, in DV. The Australian Men's Rights (AMR) organization explains some of the realities of IPV on its website. The AMR conducted its own research and reached the following conclusions:

> Men were just as likely to report being physically assaulted by their partners as women. Further, women and men were about equally likely to admit being violent themselves.
> Men and women report experiencing about the same levels of pain and need for medical attention resulting from domestic violence.
> Violence runs in couples. In over 50% of partnerships in which violence occurred both partners struck each other.
> People who had violent parents were significantly more likely than others to be violent to their own partners and to be victims of violence themselves….
> It is fair to ask researchers how much confidence they have in their own findings.

Needless to say, the GVRN would not consider it as fair to ask such questions. It would probably consider it as impudent, label the AMR as a group of rape-enabling DV apologists, and point to the Australian Parliament's official overview of DV in Australia to validate its bigoted, intellectually vapid, and predictably skewed "findings."

The opening paragraph states that the overview is "intended as an update to previous Parliamentary Library publications on this topic." The nature of this update is suspiciously similar to the one made by the Australian Domestic & Family Violence Clearinghouse when it transitioned to Australia's National Research Organisation for Women's Safety, in which it also, theoretically at least, eliminated the existence of male victims of female-perpetrated IPV:

> Yet for many women, home is a place of pain and humiliation … violence against women by their male partners is common, wide-spread and far-reaching in its impact. For too long hidden behind closed doors and avoided in public discourse, such violence can no longer be denied as part of everyday life for millions of women….
> It also covers policy approaches designed to prevent domestic violence, a survey of current Australian Government programs and initiatives and a review of future directions in domestic violence prevention.

The overview begins by making the same brief pretense of using gender-neutral terms found in White Ribbon Campaign (WRC) literature. For example, it defines domestic violence as "acts of violence that occur between people who have, or have had, an intimate relationship in domestic settings." Like the WRC, it quickly drops this pretense by presenting an entirely gendered approach to the issue of IPV in which all perpetrators are identified as men and all victims are identified as women—"millions of women," according to the overview. Children are given the standard cursory glance of acknowledgment, presumably for the sake of appearances and for the purpose of squeezing out a few extra sympathy funding dollars.

What follows in the overview is a detailed summation of IPV, including the usual definitions of its various manifestations: emotional, verbal, social, economic, psychological, spiritual, physical, and sexual. The overview reveals that it has derived its information from among the following entities: the Australian Bureau of Statistics (ABS) Personal Safety Survey 2005, the Australian component of the International Violence Against Women Survey (IVAWS) conducted in 2002–03, and the ABS Women's Safety Survey 1996.

There is a revealing comparison of IPV data gathered before and after definitions of DV were expanded to include "controlling behaviours such as put downs and keeping track of whereabouts" that explains the dramatic statistical increase in violence toward women that the DV industry uses to justify the amount of funding it demands to combat this so-called epidemic. For a country with a population of 23.6 million, the amount of funding allocated to combat this aspect of the "war on women" is staggering. The overview proudly declares that the $44 million that taxpayers provided in 2010 alone included:

> - $3.75 million over three years for Community Action Grants
> - $8.8 million over three years to provide support for front-line workers, such as allied health, child care and paramedics, to better assist clients who have experienced violence
> - $4.8 million over three years for projects to improve services for women with children who are experiencing domestic and family violence
> - $6.9 million over four years to establish a National Centre of Excellence for the Prevention of Violence against Women and
> - $14.5 million over four years to conduct the Personal Safety Survey and a National Community Attitudes Survey to ensure that there is accurate and up-to-date information about the prevalence of violence against women in the Australian community.

This overview makes it abundantly clear that as far as the Australian Parliament is concerned, women are the only victims of IPV it fully recognizes and the only victims it actually cares about. To emphasize this point, the overview identifies the following groups as being the most at risk: younger women, indigenous women, women living in rural and remote areas, disabled women, women with disabilities, and women from culturally and linguistically diverse backgrounds.

It's all about women, all of the time, in a way that is familiar to those who advocate on behalf of men and boys—and in a way that would convince the GVRN that it has achieved its goal of imposing its gendered approach to DV onto a powerful entity like the Australian Parliament. It is not until the overview reaches a section called "Engaging men and boys" does it become apparent that the Australian Parliament has been led to believe that men and boys are solely responsible for not only all IPV in Australia but also its prevention:

> The increasing focus on men as targets of prevention efforts represents a significant shift; while men have long been seen as perpetrators, they are now also being seen as 'partners' in prevention. The White Ribbon Foundation asserts:
> "It is a men's issue because a minority of men treat women and girls with contempt and violence, and it is up to men to create a culture in which this is unacceptable."…
> Some advocate a role for men in educating other men. When conducting violence prevention work with all-male audiences, there are a number of good reasons to use men as facilitators and peer educators, including:
> - men's attitudes and behaviour are shaped by their male peers
> - all-male groups can provide the space and the safety for men to talk
> - male educators act as role models for other men by practising non-violent expressions of masculinity and demonstrating respect for women
> - men are likely to be perceived by other men as more credible and persuasive, and
> - when men work with men, they are demonstrating responsibility for action against men's violence against women.

The Australian Parliament regards men who support the WRC's initiatives as "demonstrating responsibility for action against men's violence against women," while others would regard it as accepting responsibility for IPV perpetrated by total strangers toward other total strangers and reject this offensively idiotic assertion with the contempt it deserves. They would also reject the entire notion of a gendered approach to DV as, at best, a misguided attempt to address only half of the problem and, at worst, an ideologically driven campaign to demonize all men and boys as default DV abusers—and that the Australian Parliament has no place colluding with any entity, such as the WRC, that promotes such an explicitly bigoted and demonstrably false agenda.

> The Australian Government is funding Respectful Relationships education projects nationally.

The AG should start this process by educating itself on how to conduct a "respectful relationship" with the men and boys it is supposed to represent. It can begin with refusing to further marginalize the already vulnerable males who are, or have been, victims of female-perpetrated IPV by eliminating them from its published literature. The AG should avail itself of the resources available at the whiteribbon.org website to learn that IPV is not a gendered issue at all, despite what the credentialed academics affiliated with the GVRN claim.

By unquestioningly accepting data, information, and recommendations by those who insist on pretending that DV is a gendered issue, the AG is supporting a corrupt DV industry that actively engages in perpetuating myths in order to line its pockets with taxpayers' money—coercing the AG to openly declare that Australian males, including male victims of female-perpetrated IPV, are responsible for all DV is just an added bonus for these misandrists. The AG has failed egregiously in its responsibility to ensure that Australia becomes the fair and egalitarian nation that most of its citizenry would like it to be.

The AG continues to betray Australian men and boys, and the women who love them. This time, it is eagerly assisted by the WRC, proving, yet again, that it should never be the go-to source of information regarding DV in Australia.

What third-wave feminism is fighting for

Paul Elam · 15 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

First-wave feminism fought for women's right to vote. Second-wave feminism fought for equality in the workplace. Third-wave feminism is fighting for the right for women to engage in self-destructive behavior and get away with it while making sure men do not. For proof, I'll now direct you to the Jessica Valenti article titled "Real equality is when women have the right to be as drunk and stupid as men."

> Do we really believe that women shouldn't have the freedom to get drunk and be stupid? That they can't partake in the silly, fun, dumb behavior that we've come to expect of young people – young men – on the brink of adulthood? That one bad decision and they could "get themselves" raped, but that never making a bad one will protect them?
> Do we really believe that only women can stop rapists?
> Sure, binge drinking is a problem among young people – and, though men are far more likely to binge drink than women, the rate of women binge drinking has stayed steady as the rate among men declined. No, we should not encourage people to do dangerous things (and there are dangers). But the freedom to have fun, make mistakes and participate in some youthful irresponsibility shouldn't be limited to men.
> And if we spent even a fraction of the time and energy teaching affirmative consent, fighting rape and punishing rapists that we normally squander on chastising women for not being good boring girls, it wouldn't have to be. Now if you'll excuse me, I need a drink.

Note what Valenti is doing here: she goes out of her way to say we should not encourage women to drink, but if they do drink themselves under the table and do stupid shit, we should give them a pass, just like we do for men. News flash to Valenti: all you have to do is recall the Stubenville rape case to know that, no, we do not give a pass to stupid, youthful indiscretions done by men. If we buy Valenti's premises, then the Stubenville rapists should have been let completely off the hook because supposedly men are let off the hook for their stupid drunken indiscretions, but that is not what happened. The boys were sent to jail. Their lives are ruined because of a really stupid decision.

In fact, what Valenti is arguing for is what women always had all along, because the girl who went to a party full of people she did not know and got passed-out drunk never had to answer for her complete failure to be safe and protect herself from the boys who ultimately raped her. I do not think it is unreasonable to expect women to protect themselves, but in our current climate they do not have to, as it is all men's responsibility to keep them safe, or pay the dire consequences. This is the unequal status quo and Valenti is arguing to keep it in the name of equality.

I used to be a hardcore feminist. Even just a few months ago, I'd probably have cheered at the article, Now I just scratch my head and wonder how I believed that crap in the first place. This is what they're fighting for? From equality under the law and equality in the workplace to … equality only if you live in some bizarre alternate universe where women do not have any privilege at all as they are all thrown in jail for their crazy drunken antics. While first- and second-wave feminism had their serious problems, there were legitimate grievances that those movements were fighting against. Third-wave feminism seems to have emerged simply because the feminist establishment that was created under second-wave feminism gave birth to a new generation of feminists, feminists who had to make stuff up to fight for and against. If there are any articles where third-wave feminism is clearly shown to have flown completely off the rails, if they were on them to begin with, it's this one.

The next time somebody says modern feminism is about equality, I'd show them Valenti's article because Valenti made a gaffe. By arguing what she (and many like minded-feminists) believes equality to be, she proved the exact opposite, that feminism is not about real equality, only "equality" in their minds, which is not equality at all. All third-wave equality is are women fighting for rights they already have, and in effect only giving themselves more rights in the process.

2014 International Men's Day: Working together for men and boys

Aldir Gracindo · 16 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The following is the 2014 International Men's Day Press Release.

In 2014, Global and Regional Coordinators for 2014 International Men's Day are inviting people all over the world to use International Men's Day—Wednesday, 19 November 2014—as an opportunity to work together to improve the lives of men and boys all over the globe.

This year's International Men's Day theme —"Working Together For Men and Boys"—is designed to encourage greater cooperation in addressing issues that affect Men and Boys all over the world, such as men's shorter life expectancy, the high male suicide rate, our collective tolerance of violence against men, and the struggles that boys can face in getting an education and the unique challenges of father-child relationships.

On International Men's Day—Wednesday, 19 November 2014—we are inviting people all over the world to host events and initiatives that involve:

- Like-minded people finding ways to work together for Men and Boys
- People from diverse perspectives finding ways to work together for Men and Boys
- People in different countries finding ways to work together for Men and Boys
- And most importantly, Men and Women finding ways to work together for Men and Boys

We look forward to people all over the world finding ways to work together that reflect the Six Pillars of International Men's Day, which means:

ONE: Working together to promote positive male role models

TWO: Working together to celebrate Men's positive contributions

THREE: Working together to focus on Men's health and well-being

FOUR: Working together to highlight discrimination against males

FIVE: Working together to improve gender relations and improve gender equality

SIX: Working together to create a safer, better world.

Founded by men's rights advocate Thomas Oaster in 1992, and popularized in 1999 by Jerome Teelucksingh, Ph.D., a faculty member in the History Department in the University of West Indies in Trinidad and Tobago, International Men's Day celebrates the contributions and selfless sacrifices that Men make to our families, our communities, and our world. Observed in over 70 nations throughout our global village on 19th November of each year, International Men's Day shares a 48-hour partnership with Universal Children's Day, which is observed worldwide on 20th November of each year.

Yaniv Moyal speaks at the UN Human Rights Council

Yehonatan Roth · 16 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A speech at the United Nations Human Rights Commission shows that in Israel, it's no different than countless other countries.

How can anyone wonder why there is a growing international human rights movement in response to such things?

What International Men's Day is NOT about

Paul Elam · 16 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I'd like to make a few observations about International Men's Day (IMD) that I hope will place the event in its proper context as a men's rights initiative. During the process of elaborating these points, I intend to throw a few people under the bus in order to illustrate misuse of this wonderful event.

As one of just five members of the original IMD Coordination Committee, along with my role as Global IMD Promotions Coordinator, IMD historian, and author of the only book on the history and purpose of International Men's Day, I feel well positioned to make a few observations about the occasion.

International Men's Day was first celebrated by men's rights advocate Thomas Oaster in Kansas City, Missouri, USA, in 1992. He is the founder.

After a quiet period in which IMD was celebrated by only a few small international groups, Dr. Jerome Teelucksingh from Trinidad and Tobago revived the event in 1999, and the world has increasingly begun to celebrate it since then.

With the growing success of the day, it was inevitable that ideologues of every stripe would turn up and exploit the occasion to promote whatever snake oil they happened to be selling. Despite the fact that IMD is a men's rights event, the following are a few of the predictable usurpers who attempt to exploit the occasion.

IMD is for the benefit of women only? No.

The first snake-oil sellers come from the "everything should be for women" camp. This kind of snake-oil seller would have you believe that IMD should be rebranded as "International Men's Day for Women." There are minority groups, for instance, who celebrate IMD as a day for men to show gestures of chivalry toward women.

One of the more memorable examples was orchestrated by the Fawcett Society in 2011, which organized an IMD event bringing attention to government cuts that they say disproportionately affected women. The slogan for this event was "Don't turn back time" on the advancement of women's power, and men were invited to make this the centrepiece of International Men's Day celebrations.

Those promoting IMD4women select any of a variety of women's complaints and ask men to cater to those complaints on IMD. To give a current example, this year it is rumoured that the Irish group Sinn Féin will attempt to redirect IMD celebrations toward the HeForShe campaign.

Fortunately, such initiatives are not (yet) too common on the occasion of IMD, and we can only hope this remains the case long into the future.

IMD is for con men? No.

Beware the con man attempting to exploit International Men's Day for false prestige and money. Australian resident Warwick Marsh, the notorious Christian homophobe and swindler, is a prime example of a person trying to exploit a public event.

Having nabbed for himself the internationalmensday.com domain, and populating it with my writings about IMD (without acknowledgement), he makes the following fraudulent claims on his website that would make a used car salesman jealous of his ability. His website is touted as:

> An Australian Harm Prevention Charity

Nice try. However there is nothing about his website, a portal for promoting traditionalist notions of conservative manhood, that is about harm prevention other than the occasional appeals about fatherless children. The primary "harm" he is concerned about is the current damage being done toward his vision of traditionalist gender roles.

He next claims that his website is:

> The global driving force and the coordinating charity for International Men's Day

In this statement his con-artistry shines through. No one of substance or importance in the IMD community supports his effort or site as being a leading fundraiser for IMD. In fact, most everyone recognizes it as an attempt to grab some notoriety and potentially defraud people of their money.

Marsh also makes the outrageously false claim that he and his site:

> is honoured to work with the founder of International Men's Day, Dr Jerome Teelucksingh.

This too is a fraudulent claim to authority, stating a completely false relationship with one of the pioneers of IMD. I have it firsthand from Dr. Teelucksingh that there is no such working relationship—quite the opposite. Moreover, Dr. Teelucksingh has requested, so far unsuccessfully, that Marsh remove such fraudulent claims from his website.

Marsh also says that his website is the first digital driving force behind International Men's Day, another false claim. There were several IMD websites established before his, including my own, the Wikipedia IMD entry, a site owned by Dr. Teelucksingh, and numerous other IMD websites both then and still today. The claim that his personal website is "the digital driving force behind International Men's day" is thoroughly misleading, because IMD is a decentralized event that has been driven by hardworking people around the globe, and Marsh is not one of them.

What Marsh fails to tell the reader is that the entire global IMD community has shunned him for being a swindler, hater of homosexuals, and a narcissistic opportunist.

Others like Marsh have approached me over the years interested in making money from the event, and only interested in making money from it. A European individual, for example, purchased one of the key domains for IMD and, after building a website with reasonable traffic, offered to sell it to me for $50,000 US. As with all opportunists, I declined his offer as *im*politely as I knew how.

Is IMD for traditional gynocentrists? No.

During the years of promoting IMD I occasionally had to participate on international committees and was forced on occasion to work with traditional gynocentrists, or "tradgyns." I found working with these individuals frustrating, particularly those promoting male chivalry and sacrifice for the benefit of women.

Warwick Marsh offers an excellent example of this problem with his emphasis on "manhood," "traditional values," "chivalry," "honour," and "male sacrifice." On the homepage of his IMD website, we are offered a vision of what he calls manhood:

> The ability to sacrifice your needs on behalf of others is fundamental to manhood, as is honour. Manhood rites of passage the world over recognise the importance of sacrifice in the development of Manhood. Men make sacrifices everyday in their place of work, in their role as husbands and fathers, for their families, for their friends, for their communities and for their nation.

Elsewhere he notes that the theme for International Men's Day is "Honour and Sacrifice," a chance to commemorate what men, sons, fathers, and grandfathers, both past and present, have sacrificed for their families, communities, and nation.

Like Marsh, a significant minority of men and women promoting IMD hold the view that championing "tradgyn" values of male disposability is what the event should be all about.

The real McCoy

The rightful heirs to this tradition are those from the MHRM who champion the dignity and freedoms of men and boys, not those who promote feminism, chivalry, traditionalism, religion, male disposability, nor the charlatans seeking status and money. That's why I have no hesitation in pointing readers to the original Global IMD Website (est. 2007) and to AVfM's IMD Facebook page to gain a taste of what IMD is all about. This International Men's Day, let us all remember that IMD started as a men's rights initiative, and we have every right to continue promoting it as a vehicle to highlight men's rights issues.

Hot collar and cold tea

I am about to piss some people off.

I am going to piss off Dean Esmay, because I can bet he will think this article is imprudent. I am going to piss off our fine editors, because they prefer to get eyes on everything so they can make us shine. I am going to piss off a few in the gaming community, which is easy because that community is already pissed off, and for damned good reasons.

A lot of people will be, or are, pissed off. That includes me.

I have been having hot tea and Twitter for breakfast. I know, the combination clashes, but I get both callings at once. Reading tweet after tweet, sifting past the Obamacare gotcha game that is going on, illuminati freakazoid tweets and people grumbling about getting to work late (while having time to tweet) I spotted a tweet from Salon.com that said, "Bravo to all the nations and hotels banning these jerks who travel the world preaching the gospel of misogyny." The shortlink was to an article about Julien Blanc getting booted from Australia.

That pissed me off, but only long enough for me to reply to Salon with something nasty. Once I reminded myself of who I was mad at, the irony of a publication lauding the banning of free speech lost its edge. Jesus, Paul, its Salon. I took a sip of earl gray and went back to the feed. Then I saw it.

Someone from #gamergate was apparently following tweets about on the #supportmatttaylor and #shirtstorm hastags. If you have been awake any time in the last week you know that Matt Taylor is a scientist. Not just any scientist, but one that was part of a team that landed a spacecraft on a comet blazing though space at an unreal speed. His celebration of being a part of one of the most mind blowing human achievements in history was cut short, and he ended up breaking down in tears and apologizing for wearing the wrong shirt to a bunch of feminists who would go ballistic if you said something about what they were wearing.

Anyway, the guy from GamerGate tweeted out a reminder in the midst of copious support being offered to Taylor and his artist girlfriend that said supporters should remember this is what GamerGate has been fighting all along.

Bingo. I found my anger again.

What. The. Fuck. Since when did people who never noticed jack shit was happening (and still don't notice most of it) until their hobby websites went south a few months ago, come up with the words "all along"? For that matter, "we."

Before anyone jumps. I get it. I have been saying it all along. I am impressed as hell at what GamerGate has accomplished, and I expect they will do more. I also respect the fact that a lot of people in the MHRM are in the gaming community. From there it is a short hop to the reality that one tweet does not come close to representing a whole community.

I have actually been cautious about what I have said out of respect for that community. I've been careful to qualify all my commentary as an opinion from someone on the outside. I have even been a bit hypervigilant about MHRAs from AVFM doing anything that looks like we might be trying to usurp that movement.

All that will continue, but not before I blow off some steam.

Perhaps there are a few in the gaming community that need to hear that "all along" for some people means decades. And they would do just as well to remember that we have been dealing with flak, and a lot more than flak, working in a filthy swamp of social indifference and hostility trying to prevent there ever having been a GamerGate or Matt Taylor fiasco to begin with.

I know Dean is cringing right now. And that is OK. I am just a guy who has been doing battle with these sociopathic fucks in one form or another for the better part of a quarter century. And I am wise enough to the current zeitgeist to know that 10,000 tweets supporting Matt Taylor are not really going to address the fundamental problem, just as I know that most of the tweeters won't notice or care when it happens to a thousand other guys who did not have the distinction of making history.

I did not see a parade of tweets for Caleb Warner, and I am betting that few outside the readership of this site and others like even know who he is.

It sucks, big time.

OK, I feel better now, even if my tea is getting cold. Dean will tell me when we talk later in his kindly diplomatic way that this might not have been a good idea; that we don't want to start a brouhaha with GamerGate, and that we are still on pretty much the same page as these guys.

If so he will be right, especially the "on the same page" part.

Still, all of us need to blow off a little steam now and again. Today just happened to be my day.

Twitter now pre-censoring accounts

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 17 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Note: This article is also available in Swedish.

Banning users without explanation or any example of what they did wrong is now standard operating procedure for Twitter. Have a look at this latest video from Mykeru:

(Transcript here.)

So if they suspend you, they won't even give you an example of what you did.

In light of this, it seems it's time to revisit a topic I've mentioned on my blog:

There are two really important things happening on Twitter right now: one is #GamerGate and the other is Twitter's "collaboration" with WAM! (Women, Action, and Media) to thought-police Twitter users and remove anything or anyone that "offends" feminists and other Social Justice Warriors.

Guess who offends a lot of feminists?

I can't let these particular tweets die. I just can't. They are too funny. And they are the perfect explanation of what "offends" feminists.

Facts and evidence. That is a very basic description of what I tweet, and because the facts don't line up with feminist ideology, I am consistently reported as an abusive account. Here are some examples of things I tweet, for those who are not interested in the clusterfuck that is Twitter.

ABUSE TAKES MANY FORMS
FOR MEN IT IS USUALLY PSYCHOLOGICAL.
DO YOU HAVE A PARTNER WHO...
Stops you from seeing friends,
Stalks by intercepting data (texts, emails etc),
Insists on knowing where you are at all times,
Yells and screams at you,
Threatens you and tries to induce fear,
Insults and demean you,
Tells you that you are not worth the trouble,
Lies or withholds information,
Treats you like a child or servant,
Treats you like you are stupid,
Constantly corrects you or silences you,
Talks about you unfavourably to friends.
NOT ALL ABUSE LEAVES VISIBLE MARKS
KNOW THE SIGNS.
OVER 40% OF ALL DOMESTIC ABUSE VICTIMS ARE MEN

The Merriam-Webster Dictionary
You don't understand feminism!
You need feminism, stupid!
You're a victim, stop being happy!
You're doing it wrong!
I'm here to tell you what you think!
Rapist!
Patriarchy!
Cis-het scum!
Stop complimenting me!
Let me tell you how to be a real man!
Feminists think we're against this.
When we're really against this.
Feminist actions speak louder than dictionary definitions.

So much abuse, amirite?

Taylor Swift has become the soundtrack to my life on Twitter at the moment:

http://youtu.be/nfWlot6h_JM

Players gonna play and haters gonna hate, right?

Then I go and sign up for a new Twitter account and collect all my old followers and I carry on posting ~~abuse~~ facts and evidence. The feminist trolls show up screaming, I give them links to credible sources, they call me stupid and huff off in a hissy fit to report me for harassment. I'm telling on you! Grown women and men acting like spoiled toddlers? Yeah, nothing new when you're dealing with feminists.

#GamerGate critics have been very open about collecting names and subjecting them to banbot attacks to trigger automatic suspends, and I know for a fact users have targeted me for false-flagging campaigns because one of them bragged about it. She spent two months of her life false-flagging me to trigger a suspend.

The banbots can be quite effective, and even managed to bring down @Nero, but Twitter wisely restored his account promptly. There are ways to defeat the bots and they can be similarly effective. It's much harder (although far from impossible) to defeat a human being inside Twitter, butthurt and juvenile, who chooses to suspend accounts before they have sent a single tweet.

My username was changed, my password was changed, and my email address was changed.

I am not being subjected to bot attacks that are reporting me for abuse or harassment. I am a target for a Social Justice Warrior or feminist zealot inside Twitter. I suppose a very dedicated hacker might have broken through Twitter firewalls and modified the account, but that seems highly unlikely. The juvenile changing of my username strongly suggests we are dealing with butthurt ideologues who refuse to accept that they are losing the war and that with every voice they silence, #GamerGate and #WomenAgainstFeminism grow stronger. Even Ben Dreyfuss, who writes for Mother Jones, agrees that the censorship is unwarranted.

Let me take a moment to address the Ben Dreyfuss situation. He sent out this tweet, which, taken out of context, makes him look like a giant asshole.

Someone memed the tweet with a picture of Robin Williams, and the tweet took off and Ben caught some holy hell. He tweeted me directly, and posted the context, at which point I apologized unreservedly.

The tweet was shitty, but the context does indeed explain a lot. He was goaded by a troll (let's hope it was a troll and that guy wasn't for real) into tweeting something he came to regret. Ben apologized and Twitter moved on. See? It's possibly to have profoundly different ideas about issues like feminism and gaming and still act like fucking adults capable of handling an alternate and opposing point of view. "Just shut up and go away" is the refuge of the cowardly and willfully ignorant.

I understand that Twitter is a private business and can do whatever the hell it likes, but if Twitter is allowing employees to censor points of view they happen to differ with, Twitter needs to own that. Quoting from @Nero's article up at Breitbart News today: "mass suspensions of Twitter accounts that have the temerity to publicly support press reform and reject feminist critiques of video games as irrelevant, sneering, pseudo-academic drivel are now being attempted by impotent feminist groups whose only weapon is the silencing of dissent."

If Twitter wants to line up with the evangelists who think statistics are not facts and evidence is not proof, they are free to do so. If suppressing freedom of speech is their new business model, then let them proclaim it for all to see. Twitter is absolutely entitled to shoot themselves in the head. They can hold hands with "a press that, swamped with discredited far-Left ideology and unintelligent, poorly-trained writers, refuses to tell basic truths," and then they can prepare to meet the same end all totalitarian regimes achieve: total and utter defeat.

I challenge Twitter to stand up to wingnut bullies and restore my original account. If Twitter can take on ISIS, how in the hell does Janet Bloomfield frighten them? Really?

Grow a pair, Twitter.

UNFPA study on intimate partner violence and masculinity in India

Partha Sadhukhan · 18 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

On November 10, 2014, the United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA) published the report "Masculinity, Intimate Partner Violence and Son Preference in India," a study in collaboration with the International Centre for Research on Women (ICRW). This report presents findings from a large-scale survey and includes many shocking revelations about intimate partner violence (IPV) in India and how UN groups deal with the issue. However, this article will focus only on the issue of IPV covered in this report.

To establish context, the report claims that "India … has high levels of violence against women." So, from this we are to understand that the study was based on the presumption that Indian women are the victims of domestic violence and Indian men are the perpetrators.

To support this claim, the report refers to studies done on this issue by Campbell in 2002 and the National Family Health Survey (NFHS) in 2005-06. However, an earlier article already proved how previous domestic violence studies done in India were biased.

In order to bolster their claim this time, though, UNFPA provided statistical analysis and chi-square tests to make this report even more complicated for the general public to understand. However, the basic premise about the perpetrator in the study remained clear.

To further establish context, the report states that Indian culture makes people believe that "men's dominance over women is normal and acts of violence against women are justified." Ironically, we see that the survey results also find the same. We understand that the intention behind conducting this survey was to prove that India has got a messed-up society and culture that encourages violence against women by men. So the researchers started with a negative mindset about India and went on to prove the same. They also made men criminals even before they tried to prove in an unbiased manner by their research that men are the perpetrators.

The report also shows how flawlessly statistical sampling was done, keeping in mind the different socioeconomic and geographical factors. But let's sidestep all that demographic jargon and go directly to the report's findings of the survey on IPV.

Ironically, even in this IPV survey, they have captured information about dowry in marriages:

Also, the survey specifically mentions the religion of respondents: "A majority of men (82%) and women (79%) in the sample were Hindu." Or, in other words, the survey findings show that mostly Hindu men are cruel to their wives. (Hindus, take note: The UN is again trying to malign your religion.)

Table 3.2: Religion and Caste Distribution of Men and Women
	Men	Women
Religion
Hindu	82.2	79.1
Muslim	12.1	13.8
Sikh	2.9	2.9
Others	2.7	4.1
Caste
Scheduled Caste	19.6	19.2
Scheduled Tribe	8.6	8.5
Other Backward Classes	41.5	44.8
General	30.3	27.6
Total N	9205	3158

The graph below provides an interesting perspective:

It shows that approximately one-third of the men surveyed did not have any partners. So out of a total 9,205 men surveyed, the effective survey was from 6,159 men; and out of 3,158 women, the effective survey was from 2,627 women. The assumption here is that if they had no partner, there was no question of them experiencing IPV.

In an effort to investigate the key determinants that cause violence, the report tried to examine economic stress: "To explore characteristics that may affect men's attitudes and behavior, we also asked men specific questions about their work-related stress or depression. Given the prevailing social expectation to perform the role of a breadwinner in the family, economic stress is identified as an indicator…." So, in a way, this report agrees that men do have reason to be under stress and that the pressure of being a breadwinner is huge.

Table 3.5: Statements of Economic Stress
Statements	Percentage
I am frequently stressed or depressed because of not having enough work	43.9
I am frequently stressed or depressed because of not having enough income	51.1
I sometimes feel ashamed to face my family because I am out of work	43.7
I spend most of the time out of work or looking for work	35.5
I have considered leaving my family because I was out of work	9.8
I sometime drink or stay away from home when I can't find work	8.2

The above table shows us how men are pushed into a corner by society to be breadwinners for the family and how this can lead to a disaster situation in a poor country like India. (The last four questions were asked of men who were not currently working.)

Overall, 55% of men reported economic stress:

The study also tried to capture the harassment faced by an individual in his or her childhood:

The results show that a total of 88% of women and 86% of men have reported some form of abuse in childhood. This is contrary to our belief that ONLY women suffer from discrimination in India.

This study goes on to measure the relationship control behavior of Indian men (Note: Again this study wanted to know how MEN control relationships and NOT vice versa—a study designed with bias):

Observe the nature of the questions asked and you will easily be able to understand that if these questions were asked the other way (e.g., My wife always wants to know where I am, etc.), the responses would have been the same. But since the questions were asked this way, it confirms that the survey had only one goal: to show that Indian men are control freaks.

In section 5.1, which outlines the extent of IPV in people's lives, the report states, "In the study, both men and women who have or ever had a spouse/partner were asked a series of questions to assess the prevalence of intimate partner violence…. Men were asked 'Have you ever …' and women were asked 'has a current or previous partner ever….'"

Please find the questions asked below:

Emotional violence

1. Insulted a wife/partner or deliberately made her feel bad about herself
2. Belittled or humiliated a wife/partner in front of other people
3. Did things to scare or intimidate a wife/partner on purpose, for example, by the way you looked at her, by yelling and smashing things
4. Threatened to hurt a wife/partner
5. Hurt people your wife/partner cares about as way of hurting her, or damaged things of importance to her

Economic abuse

1. Prohibited a partner from getting a job, going to work, trading or earning money
2. Took a wife/partner's earnings against her will
3. Threw a wife/partner out of the house

Physical violence

1. Slapped a wife/partner or threw something at her that could hurt her
2. Pushed or shoved a wife/partner in anger
3. Hit a wife/partner with a fist or with something else that could hurt her
4. Kicked, dragged, beaten, choked, or burned a wife/partner
5. Threatened to use or actually used a gun, knife, or other weapon against a wife/partner

Sexual violence

1. Forced wife/partner to have sex with you when she did not want to
2. Had sex with your wife or girlfriend when you knew she didn't want it but you believed she should agree because she was your wife/partner or girlfriend
3. Forced your wife/partner to watch pornography when she didn't want to
4. Forced wife/partner to do something sexual that she did not want to

Please note that the surveyors never tried to measure IPV against men by women. The questions considered only men as perpetrators and women as victims. So, in the first place, we understand that the survey was never neutral and unbiased.

Please note the results given below—based on data representing whether a WOMAN (not a man) had experienced such violence in her marital lifetime:

However, a similar survey done by other NGOs in India, which focused on IPV experienced by men, revealed:

Also, in terms of frequency of violence, this report shows the nature of violence in the past six months as:

But again, this was captured in gender-biased way. In the recent survey conducted by other NGOs in India mentioned above, the same domestic violence picture is captured for Indian men, finding that 78% of men who took the survey were subjected to emotional abuse by their wives (as also mentioned, the latest UNFPA survey failed to capture the men's side of story):

Similarly, the survey showed the following results for other abuses.

35% of men reported frequent physical abuse by their wives:

37% of men reported frequent sexual abuse against them:

About 60% of men reported economic abuse by their wives:

In section 5.2 of the UNFPA report, it states: “Intimate partner violence perpetrated by men and experienced by women … is considered as one of the main outcomes of masculinity in this analysis.”

We understand that when only a one-sided study is done, then the outcomes of such a report become invalid.

This report goes on to prove that if a man is abused as a child, he is more likely to become violent in his adulthood:

If we believe this data, then we understand that if men are doing more violence (as claimed by this study), then clearly it is the Indian boys who are abused more compared to the girls. However, we still do not see any separate ministry for men and boys to take care of their issues.

From this UNFPA report, we understand that this study never had an unbiased or neutral approach toward the issue of IPV. The study was conducted with the presumption that a man is always the perpetrator of IPV and a woman is always the victim of IPV. So no matter how much statistical analysis it includes, all its analogy falls flat since the researchers never even considered the other side of the issue. It is thus evident that this is just another effort of the UN to shame India and break up Indian families. Indian media houses that reported the study's results only highlighted one side of the violence and never tried to investigate into the matter to uphold the truth to the nation. This shows how poorly Indian media is performing today.

The significance of this report being published just before International Men's Day (IMD) on November 19 once again points to the dire need to set up a Men's Commission and a Men's Welfare Ministry to challenge the creation of such bias by international organizations against Indian men and boys. Otherwise, the future for our boys will be doomed forever.

“Criticism of teachers is misogyny!” says teacher Nikki Suydam

Jonathan Taylor · 18 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Nikki Suydam is a humanities teacher (surprise, surprise) in Oregon who has just about had enough of everyone thinking that we can improve the quality of America’s teachers. I first came across Suydam’s piece because an 11th grade English teacher—a feminist—linked to it from the r/Education subreddit.

Again, this drives home my recurring point that, too often, the humanities are a feminist zoo.

Anyway, Suydam has written a piece for The Oregonian titled “The mindless misogyny of education reform” criticizing a columnist for wanting the world to have better teachers. Here’s how she starts out:

> New York Times columnist Frank Bruni’s latest attack on public school teachers (“It’s time to address failures of underperforming teachers,” Oct. 30, Oregonian e-edition) is nothing new. The profession has been under assault for over a decade by self-proclaimed education reformers. It is also nothing new from a cultural-historical perspective.

Education reform movements will always be with us. It is something that will never end, ever. Our culture and the learning tools available to us are always changing. That’s nothing too controversial. But here’s where she starts shoving her head where the sun doesn’t shine, starting with her very next sentence:

> Blaming women for society’s problems is as old as the story of Eve in the Garden of Eden, or Pandora and her box of woes, or every medieval witch hunt spurred on by crop failure or plague outbreak. Contemporary education reformers have launched a similar witch hunt to root out “rotten apples” from a profession still more than 75 percent female.

So just because 75% of teachers are female, any criticism of the teaching profession is misogyny? Gee, I suppose if men are 95% of the politicians, that means that any criticism of politicians is misandry as well. I also suppose no invading army in history could ever be criticized if 95% of it were male—surely that would be misandry!

Get this: When men dominate a profession, it’s called male privilege. Any criticism against them is called social justice. But when women dominate a profession, any criticism against them is called the oppression of women.

But maybe I’m just not understanding Suydam’s position correctly. Perhaps I’m jumping the gun here. Maybe if she elaborates a bit, my befuddled male mind will grow with the enlightenment she has to offer. So here’s why she believes the teaching profession is being unfairly singled out:

> No similar reform movement targets doctors (65 percent male) for our nation’s spiraling obesity epidemic.

Yes because doctors—like teachers—spend seven to eight hours a day, five days a week, with the same patients and during what are aptly termed their patients’ formative years. They have the power to shame and praise their patients in a large group setting, in front of their peers, day in and day out, for what they perceive is normal or deviant behavior. Doctors also clearly have the power to punish adults the same way teachers do with children.

Apples to oranges much?

Also, ask a doctor how much he pays in insurance in case he gets sued for medical malpractice. Now ask a teacher how much she pays in insurance in case she gets sued for educational malpractice.

She continues:

> Law enforcement officers (80 percent male) are not blamed for crime statistics.

Are you kidding me? It's a widespread (and erroneous) belief that police can prevent crime simply by existing when in reality the best that they can do 99% of the time (until they gain the power to teleport anywhere instantly) is investigate crimes that have recently occurred. And police are blamed—often correctly, in my view—for misconduct and excessive force.

> Nor are engineers (78 percent male) "held accountable" for the crumbling U.S. infrastructure.

Because, like our education system, our infrastructure ranks 14th among developed countries, right?

> More insidious than the blame, however, is a national narrative that denies teachers a voice in the discussion. The opinions of those with no teaching experience, no pedagogical knowledge, and no training in the cognitive development of children are consistently accepted as having more value than those of experts in the field. When promoting stories about public education, the media can be depended upon to consult and quote business executives, but rarely practicing teachers.

I have no doubt that this happens occasionally, but this is hardly proof of "misogyny." The usual reason teachers do not comment is that teachers themselves—unlike the associations that represent them (which do comment)—don't have time to be full-time advocates. Suydam herself even alludes to how elusive this alleged misogyny is, saying:

> Still, there are no mustache-twirling villains behind this mindless misogyny. There are only ordinary people who never stopped to question a national narrative that sends a very questionable message: that it is better to believe amateurs with context-less data, rather than the lying eyes, ears, and experience of experts.
> One has to wonder if this is because most of those experts are women.

If by "one has to wonder," you mean you assume, then yes.

We simply need more information than just "the majority of lower ed teachers are women" to credibly characterize any criticism of the teaching profession as misogyny, just as we would need more information than just "the majority of politicians are men" to credibly characterize any criticism of politicians as misandry. We need specific examples that demonstrate that these criticisms were motivated by notions of gender.

But Suydam doesn't present any of this evidence. And she starts veering into some dangerous territory. Rather than fighting against misogyny that supposedly criticizes teachers because they are women, it seems Suydam's real position is that teachers should be immune from criticism simply because they are women.

Against parental leave

Jon Gunnarsson · 18 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Note: This article is also available in Romanian.

One of the forms of sex discrimination that many governments engage in is having different laws for maternity and paternity leave. Various countries have laws that entitle female employees who become mothers to several weeks or months of paid maternal leave as well as months or even years of unpaid leave in which the woman's job must be reserved. Where paternity leave exists at all, it is usually much shorter than maternity leave.

This is typically seen as discrimination in favour of women and against men. However, this is far from obvious. In this article, I want to argue that the right to maternity leave is a double-edged sword that probably harms women more than it helps them and that it is in fact women (and in particular women who don't want to have children) who are being discriminated against, while men can count themselves lucky not to be burdened with this right (or at least not to the same extent).

How can this be? Shouldn't it always be to one's advantage to have a particular right, especially when one need not exercise it? After all, women aren't forced to take maternity leave. Consider a different case: suppose a new law were passed that granted you immunity from having to keep your contracts. You would be able to break any contract at will without having to suffer any legal consequences. At first, this sounds like a fantastic thing. And indeed, it would be in the short run. If you have any debts, you can stop paying them. If you've made some agreement that is no longer in your best interest, you can break it. The long-run consequences, on the other hand, will be dire. Since other people know about the new law, no one will be willing to make contracts with you any longer. Banks will not loan you money, you won't be able to use credit cards, no one will be willing to enter into business dealings with you, employers will be extremely reluctant to hire you.

Rights are always rights against other people. They make it illegal for other people to do or to fail to do certain things to you. The more rights you have, the more other people will be constrained in their behaviour toward you and the less eager they will be to deal with you. This is a problem when you want to get people to hire you.

Businesses are not charities. They generally don't hire people out of goodwill but because they believe they can make a profit from doing so. To get an employer to hire you, you need to convince him that you will produce more for him than you will cost him. This cost is not just the wage, but also training, equipment, benefits such as retirement plans or health insurance, taxes, and so on. And if you're a woman of a certain age, this list also includes the expected costs of maternity leave—the granting of paid leave, the cost of having to find and train a substitute who may need to be dismissed when you return a few years later, your reduced productivity as you get back into the grove after years of absence, etc.

Hence, the existence of the right to maternal leave makes employers less eager to hire women. Women cannot renounce their right to maternity leave, even if they do not want to have it. They need to find some other way of decreasing their cost to prospective employers. In practice, this usually means accepting a lower wage. Thus, feminist-inspired maternity leave laws are at least in part responsible for the dreaded wage gap, which feminists so like to bemoan.

So we've now established that women pay a price for maternity leave. This should hardly be surprising. After all, there ain't no such thing as a free lunch. The question now becomes: Is this particular lunch worth the cost? It cannot be denied that maternal leave does provide a benefit to many women, but how do we quantify that benefit? The standard economic approach to determine the value of a good or service is to see how much people are willing to pay for it. At first glance, this approach seems unsuitable for this problem; after all, women don't negotiate maternity leave with their employers (in which case one could see how much women are willing to give up for having maternity leave); they are forced to have this right.

But this approach yields us strong indirect evidence against maternity leave being worth the cost: it is rare for employers and employees voluntarily to agree to more generous maternity leave rules than the ones the law mandates, even though that would be possible. If maternity leave were valued very highly by women, then we should expect some of them to be willing to accept a lower wage to get such provisions.

The central issue is this: If maternity leave is not worth the cost, then the law is harmful. If maternity leave is worth the cost, we should expect to see it offered on the labour market voluntarily, so a law is not needed. Employers generally don't care much for the makeup of an employee's cost. It makes little difference to them whether a dollar is spent on wages, health insurance, improving workplace safety, providing free snacks to employees, or granting maternity leave. What they care about is the difference between revenue and costs. But employees do care about this composition. They have definite preferences in regard to the trade-offs between these expenditures. Employers in turn have the incentive to offer compensation packages that closely resemble the composition desired by actual or potential employees because in doing so, they can get away with a lower overall cost than if the composition is farther from the desired one.

This is why it is in general a good idea to let employers and employees freely negotiate their contracts. Restricting that freedom will often result in them making suboptimal contracts.

Another aspect of maternity leave is its redistributive effect. Since employers do not know which women will become pregnant in the future (and in many countries it is even illegal to try to learn the family plans of a prospective employee), they will offer lower wages to female applicants who are of child-bearing age. So women who never become mothers pay a price for a right they will never use while women who go on maternity leave several times are subsidized by their less maternally inclined sisters[1]. I personally regard this as unjust; others may disagree. But even if we assume for the sake of argument that such a redistribution is desirable, this is still not a good reason for maternity leave. If redistribution is the goal, then a more efficient way of going about it would be to have slightly higher taxes for child-less women (or child-less people in general) and to directly give money to working mothers. These mothers can then decide for themselves if they want to pocket that money or use it to compensate for the lower wages they had to accept to get an employer to agree to grant them a right to maternal leave.

And it is not just working women who are worse off because of maternity leave. Employers also suffer from this policy. Because the law forces them to offer suboptimal compensation packages to female job applicants, they will have to spend more on them than they otherwise would to get them to accept the job[2]. No matter how exactly employers react to this—whether they will spend more on labour or hire fewer workers—less will be produced. This means less goods available for consumers to buy, which means higher prices. Ultimately, everyone in the economy is adversely affected.

Let me now address some likely objections to the arguments made above. The first objection is that paying women less because of expected costs of maternity leave is an unlawful form of discrimination and that it is therefore unlikely that most employers would resort to such measures.

While it is true that such discrimination is illegal in many countries, such laws are difficult to enforce. After all, they are laws that prohibit not a certain action per se, but instead prohibit taking it for a certain reason. Since judges and jurors haven't yet managed the feat of mind-reading, they do not know why an employer has hired or failed to hire a certain applicant or why it offered the wage it did. After all, we are not talking about huge differences here. The expected costs of granting maternity leave will only consume a small fraction of an employee's potential wage.

Moreover, the arguments presented above don't even require employers to consciously discriminate against women or to be aware that such discrimination is prudent and profitable. It works simply through the laws of supply and demand, which have determined prices long before the first coherent economic theories were formed. Laws mandating the right to maternity leave make female labour more expensive. This means there is now a profit to be gained from reducing one's demand for female labour (compared with what it would have been without maternity leave), and losses loom for firms who keep demanding female labour at the same rate. The competitive market process will shift resources from the latter group to the former. The result is an overall lower demand for female labour, resulting in a lower price, i.e., lower wages[3].

The second likely objection is that my arguments so far have only considered the interests of women, not those of children. From this perspective, the goal of maternity leave is not to benefit women but rather to ensure that children will be optimally taken care of by their mothers, at least in their first years. Thus, even if maternity leave is generally bad for women, it might be good for their children.

Of course, women could still interrupt their careers for a few months or years to be full-time mothers in the absence of maternity leave, but given that they wouldn't have a guaranteed job waiting for them, fewer would choose that route. In a world without maternity leave, more women would choose to continue working, but on the other hand, more women would choose to quit working altogether or interrupt their careers for a longer time. So it's not at all clear whether this would induce women to take care of their children more or less. And given that maternity leave makes society as a whole poorer, this also means fewer resources available to spend on giving children the best care, education, nutrition, health care, and so on. Hence, it's difficult to see how maternity leave laws could on net make children better off.

So if maternity leave is so terrible, why are not just feminists but the vast majority of people in favour of this policy? I suspect the main reason is that people want to help women, especially mothers, and maternity leave laws sound as if they do that. Supporting such a policy is emotionally satisfying, while opposing it is much more difficult from an emotional standpoint. Moreover, the good arguments against maternity leave are much harder to understand than the bad arguments for it. They require careful deliberation and certainly won't fit on a bumper sticker. Changing one's opinion on maternity leave has practically no influence on whether the society one lives in adopts this policy, so there isn't any real incentive for investing the time and the mental and emotional energy needed for making an informed and rational decision about this issue. In case you are interested, I've written before about this phenomenon, which has been termed "rational irrationality."

Where does this leave us as supporters of men's rights? The right to paternal leave is bad for men for exactly the same reasons that maternal leave is bad for women. Thus, the worst thing we could do is to demand that men be given the same rights to parental leave that women currently have. Ideally, all laws mandating paternal leave should be eliminated, but given the large popular support for maternal leave, this is unlikely to happen. Nor do I think it would be a particularly good use of our resources to spend a serious effort to change the public's mind on this topic. What I advise instead is to do nothing more than resist the adoption of new laws mandating paternal leave. In this case, ironically, the very fact that people generally care less about the welfare of men is actually helping us.

Notes:

[1] It doesn't follow from this that women who take advantage of maternity leave benefit from its existence. Some of them would be better off not having maternity leave and getting a higher salary, but they take maternity leave anyway because even though they prefer a higher salary with no maternity leave to a lower salary with maternity leave, they nevertheless prefer a lower salary with maternity leave to a lower salary without maternity leave.

[2] Even though the overall compensation package is higher, the wage will still be lower than it would otherwise be. In other words, the cost increase through providing maternity leave is higher than the cost decrease through paying lower wages.

[3] All of this is a ceteris paribus analysis; i.e., we are holding all other things equal. We are comparing the present situation with one that is identical in all respects except for not having maternity leave. So when I say that women have lower wages, I'm not comparing women's wages with men's wages, with the wages of women too old to bear children, or with women in the past or in other countries without maternity leave. We are talking here strictly about comparing women's actual wages with those they would have if maternal leave didn't exist and everything else stayed the same.

In defense of families

Elizabeth Hobson · 19 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I was raised by a single mum. She had a string of more and less serious boyfriends during my childhood. I liked all of them. I'm naturally openhearted so I would become attached straight away, but it always ended in tears—and the revelation that he was (from her perspective) a douche, the most damning vitriol delivered to me via overheard conversations. Having been exposed to the emotional turbulence of human relationships—at a time in life when the ideal is innocence and naivety—I grew up with the explicit attitude that relationships were not a desirable or valuable possession.

Then I fell in love and became pregnant… I shared the most magical experience with my partner—we were happy, healthy, talking about the birth, talking about how we would raise our children, he came to every appointment with me, listened to the baby's heartbeat, saw him in the scans… And I was so surprised because I suddenly realised that I had never even considered the possibility that there might be a man involved if I had a baby—and probably would have snorted at the idea that one might be of any use. I don't think that's such a widespread idea anymore, that fathers are of any use. But by some kind of fluke I was living with the proof of it.

Three years in (give or take), we had a miscarriage that destroyed me completely. I lost my mind, I had no perspective—and no model of a healthy relationship to emulate. Plus, feminism had taught me that men are aggressors and oppressors and women are childlike innocent beings of such great value that men should take any of the shit we throw at them and fucking thank us for it. So that was the filter I unfairly imposed on our interactions with little regard for the fact that I was mentally really quite ill. My partner totally held our relationship together (thanks, baby). A friend, Noel, told me recently that he has friends who have posted on Facebook public announcements such as :

> After a lot of thought myself and my significant other have decided to split. I know that we will both continue to be great parents to our kids … etc., etc.

The tone of such announcements is often almost celebratory, almost smug. I, on the other hand, sometimes feel like posting this public announcement:

> After loads of rows and the stresses and strains of family life, not to mention the tiredness and financial pressures, we have worked really fucking hard to keep our family together so that our kids have a stable home environment … and it's not easy.

It's a cliché that relationships take work, but I really don't think that society generally acknowledges the rewards. Children are such hard work—in a literal sense, as is keeping home—and I can't imagine how much extra strain is wrought upon one parent being responsible for all that. Every two-parent family I can think of (that I know fairly intimately) is already concerned about money in their current one-home situation, which only makes the prospect of stretching that out over two homes rather economically implausible. What is going to have to give? Substandard accommodation? Cheap food? Fewer day-trips? But, of course, the care that children require above all is intangible—it's the love and the security and the guidance—and Mother does not know best, no single person does. The best approach to parenting is collaborative, with two people working through issues together, supporting each other, and freely critiquing each other so they can continually improve themselves. Unfortunately, in my experience, a mother's and father's unequal position post-separation is a major contributing factor to difficulties in communication when relationships are in crisis. Men are scared to speak freely for fear that they could jeopardise their relationships with their children—and what problem can possibly be solved without free speech? I'm willing to bet that if shared parenting was the default presumption instead, it would benefit relationships and be more conducive to healing, possibly even resulting in fewer couples splitting.

Article 16(3) of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights states:

> The family is the natural and fundamental group unit of society and is entitled to protection by society and the State.

Furthermore, Steve Moxon, in his book The Woman Racket, says:

> Of all the rights abuses systematically directed against men, the worst is the unwarranted obstruction from playing their natural part in the lives of their biological children, by denying the basic human and civil right to contact (apart from the barest minimum).

In my life, my dad wasn't interested. To my mother's credit, she respected his right to opt out and never demanded support from him—financial or otherwise—which was fair. According to many feminists I've spoken to, the majority of absent (or practically absent) fathers exist purely because "most men are deadbeats who don't care." Despite my experience, I find this blanket statement incredibly hard to believe. But regardless of the exact percentage of men who want the adequate access to their children that they are being denied, what cannot be disputed is that these anomalies do exist and so they require the protection of the law. In that regard, Moxon references the work of Martin Mears, former president of the Law Society, who makes four recommendations for reform:

> Fully binding pre- and post-nuptial agreements (which the courts already uphold but only when they feel like it);
> Leaving out the assets owned before the marriage
> Disallowing maintenance to any party whose conduct has effectively repudiated the marriage
> Recognising in fact as well as in principle the right of a child to maintain maximum contact with both parents.

Some 80% to 90% of divorces in the UK are initiated by wives. This just can't be right—are men actually exhibiting a potentially unhealthy reluctance to divorce for fear of losing their rights to the children? I think that the statistic certainly suggests that the prospect of divorce is frankly too tempting for wives right now. Typically, the average ex-wife (or ex-partner with kids) is guaranteed a modest income and adequate housing without the "stress" that always comes with living with people who ARE NEVER 100% LIKE YOU (relationship tip: nobody can read minds; fucking talk to each other), she gets to be the main carer for her children, she gets to be involved in the minutiae of their lives, and very often she gets to make the big decisions regarding her children's future too. Then, at the end of the week, she may very well get to send the children over to Daddy's and party like a single girl or relax or pursue her interests. It's a golden ticket for women dealing with relationship problems—one that I doubt reliably delivers on its promises to them and is utterly contemptible in what it leaves fathers with.

What my ethical code recoils at even more than the injustice that fathers experience, though, is the effects of being separated on their children. The 2002 study "Experiments in Living: The Fatherless Family" shows that children miss out on the vitally formative paternal relationship, their educations suffer, and they are more likely to be involved in antisocial behaviour and crime, more likely to experience mental health problems, difficulty in relationships, and have generally less positive outcomes in their adult lives. That's not to suggest that any given single parent cannot do a fantastic job, but let's be honest that it will always be a challenge. The Equal Parenting Council calls for > a legal presumption of shared parenting, so that parenting is divided between fit parents on an equitable (not necessarily equal) basis. To decide that one parent was unfit, the burden of proof must be on others, including the other parent, to prove why contact should be restricted.

A counter-position to this can be found on www.gingerbread.org.uk, which "works to tackle the stigma around single parents by dispelling myths and labels." They claim the following:

> Parental separation and the resulting single parent status often leads to financial hardship. That resulting poverty may be a significant factor in explaining poorer child outcomes rather than family structure.

Were shared parenting arrangements more common (with children having direct access to all of the assets owned by each parent) and with no financial maintenance awarded (which is feasibly a disincentive to earn for the "absent parent"), surely their economic status as a group could only improve?

Moxon goes on to state that "shared parenting (i.e., not what the family court dispenses) was the express intention of parliament when the Children Act was passed in 1989. Supposedly out went the notion of 'custody' with one parent, and in came the 'parental responsibility' of both," and "even very senior judges now pay lip-service to the right of a child to maintain close contact with its father," but the act destroys a child's right to access to both parents by calling one the "parent with care" and the other the "absent parent." "This was in order to suit the purposes of the [CSA]. The collection of money from fathers, to offset the rapidly-escalating costs to the state of single parenthood, would have been hindered if it wasn't easy to distinguish between the cash cow and the cow, as it were." Not only is (usually) the father saddled with the label "absent parent," but because maintenance reductions are available to an "absent parent" who has their children to stay in excess of 103 days per year, courts are under immense pressure to award them with low contact and get the Treasury the full amount of money they require to cover benefits payments. "The position at the moment is that of a dam held back by 'the best interests of the child' concept, which is proxy for 'the best interests of the state.'"

Governments are failing at their duty of caring for families in the UK and elsewhere (personally, I think it's deliberate sabotage in corporate interests), and while I support freedom of speech and expression to champion alternative family set-ups, I think that we, as societies too, are failing to support the concept of families. Furthermore, I think that the reason for this is fear of offending people who haven't managed to achieve or retain the two-parent ideal.

Fuck that shit.

Got to revolution.

It's November 19, International Men's Day!

Paul Elam · 19 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

This is the first year I will be celebrating International Men's Day (IMD). It's the first year because frankly before I joined the Men's Human Rights Movement I had never heard about it.

- Never saw any article about it in the newspaper, or at least I've never noticed one.
- Never saw a Google Doodle about it, but I've seen them for International Women's Day (IWD).
- I've also seen countless videos celebrating IWD but never for IMD.
- Even Sesame Street has a Facebook page with an accompanying video celebrating International Women's Day … they don't have one for men.
- Presidents, prime ministers, yes, they, too, have celebrated International Women's Day, but you won't get them to do anything for men.

The Feminist Perspective on International Men's Day

Feminist will always argue with you that it's International Men's Day each and every day of the year … like this one article that pokes fun at the concept of an IMD. Or this recent one from The Boston Globe, which again minimizes the contributions men have made and the discrimination that they still face.

What amazes me is how virtually all dissent for International Men's Day observance always originates from feminists. They are the first ones to poke fun at it and marginalize it at all cost. Yet, they wonder, "Why is feminism seen as man-hating?"

For an organization that purports to also be about "freeing men" from the "patriarchy" and that relentlessly explains that men are not guilty —"it's the patriarchy!"—they do little to show their support to these supposed casualties of the system. They should be the first ones in line to raise awareness of men and to the issues they face (as they contend), yet they do worse than nothing at all—they scream bloody murder and attempt to derail the whole concept of a men's day.

Are Men Really Celebrated Each and Every Day of the Year?

If so, please point me to one piece where men (as a group) are celebrated? However, you'll be hard-pressed not to have a day go by where you don't see an article praising women or how their contributions help society.

Why, we even have articles trumpeting girls' achievements … yet how many times do we celebrate something boys do? Girls also have their own day of celebration … boys, it seems, are the only ones we've left out. What effect does this discrepancy have on the brain of a developing young male child when twice a year the homeroom teacher announces a day for girls and women … and the boys ask what about the boys? the men?

But enough with the complaining. Let's just celebrate today. Let's celebrate:

- the men who risk their lives fighting and protecting our liberties against tyrannical foes
- the men who risk their lives running into burning buildings to help save those inside—while most people would have the sense to run out
- the men who build everything from bridges to jet planes and who maintain them so that they are safe and effective for us
- the brilliant men who border on the edge of insanity to invent, discover, and compose to expand the human experience—all men, from Mozart to Albert Einstein to Thomas Edison
- (and one for us) the men who care about all human rights—not just those of women—and who venture against the natural tendency of society's marginalization of males to bring truth to the reality of male discrimination.

So let's make today a special day. And who knows, maybe one day Google will even have a Doodle for us!

And to leave you with a Tom Golden quote: "Men are good!"

Happy International Men's Day!

No More Sex War – Neil Lyndon reprints the book that nearly destroyed him

Neil Lyndon · 20 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Neil Lyndon describes his 1992 book, No More Sex War: The Failures of Feminism, as "the world's first radical critique of feminism from an egalitarian, progressive, non-sexist point of view," exposing the contradictions, myths, and falsehoods of feminism. No book and no author in our time has experienced such vilification in the press and at such a professional and personal cost, not only for this book but also for his breakthrough Sunday Times Magazine piece "Bad Mouthing," which we reprinted here. After more than 20 years, Lyndon is reissuing a new volume titled Sexual Impolitics, with the full unexpurgated and uncensored text of No More Sex War, to ensure "that my book will finally … be published as I meant it to be read"—and this time it won't be taken out of print by feminist thugs. We've reprinted a few excerpts from the book's Foreword and two chapters.—Eds.

Sexual Impolitics by Neil Lyndon—including No More Sex War: The Failures of Feminism*—is available for purchase here.*

Can we get a few things straight?

1) This book is not anti-woman. You will not find one word here that criticises, mocks or demeans women in general. My purposes are entirely, wholeheartedly egalitarian, non-sexist and progressive. The essays in this book do, variously, question and criticise the ideology of feminism but that doesn't make the book anti-woman—any more than a book that was anti-communist would necessarily have been anti-Russian. In the past, that distinction has proved too subtle for some of my critics to grasp. I am, categorically, anti-feminist—as should be every well-meaning, conscientious person who cares about liberty, equality, justice and fairness. One day, I trust, everybody will see feminism—that secular faith—as a form of totalitarian intolerance; and no decent person (such as a primary school teacher or a minister of the church) will call themselves feminist, as they do today, any more than they would happily describe themselves as Nazi or Stalinist.

2) Like you, like everybody you are likely to meet or hear from, I completely, unreservedly, wholeheartedly approve of the changes that have taken place in the position of women in the West in the last 150 years and especially during my lifetime. I was all in favour of those changes and advances even before I had daughters of my own—who will, I trust, make the most of them and be thankful to the men (and women) who helped to bring them into being. Equality is a given for me, just as much as it is for all of us.

3) I haven't got a personal problem with women; and women don't seem to have a problem with me. There has never been a day of my life since I was 15 that I have been without the love of a woman.

4) It isn't for me to say (and it shouldn't be anybody's concern except those who have a direct interest in the matter) but the testimonials of others suggest that—despite my critics' presumptions on this matter—I probably haven't got a tiny penis.

5) The bulk of this book is not about me. It's not personal. It is, largely, an intellectual argument, often abstract, frequently abstruse and sometimes academic. That might make it a little too difficult for feminists.

From Chapter One of No More Sex War

Here follows a short list of facts which I ask you to keep at the back of your mind through all the chapters which follow. I shall be returning to them, frequently, for commentary and amplification; but let me just put them down now, straightforwardly and simply, as foundation stones for the discussion which is to come.

- Until the autumn of 1991, when the Children Act became law, the fathers of at least one in every four children born in Great Britain had no rights with regard to those children. Approximately 175,000 children are born every year to unmarried women. Those women have had all the rights of parenthood for those children. The men have had no legal rights of paternity. They might not even register the birth of their baby. The mother might, with unchallengeable legal authority, refuse the father any right to see or to be with his child. Those men might be denied the right ever to see their children. Those fathers have had no right in law to resist if the mother removed the children to another place, even if she took them to another country. The new Children Act will make a difference to the position of unmarried fathers; but we don't know, at present, how that vaguely-expressed intention will work in practice.

- A man who makes an application to the divorce court for joint custody of the children of a broken marriage has a one-in-five chance of success. A man who makes an application for sole custody of his children has a one-in-ten chance. About 175,000 divorces are granted in Great Britain every year. In more than 100,000 of those divorces, the couples have children under the age of 16. The routine practice of the divorce courts of Great Britain is to strip men of their property and income and, simultaneously, deny them equal rights of access and care for their children.
- About 200,000 abortions are legally effected in Great Britain every year. We do not know how many of the fathers of those foetuses might have wished to see their children born: nobody has ever tried to count them. They are not accorded a glimmer of public attention nor an atom of legal right. Subject only to the consent of doctors, the pregnant woman is given the absolute right to choose to abort the foetus, regardless of the state of her relationship with the father when she conceived. The inseminating man has no right, in law or in convention, to express or to record an opinion on the abortion, even if the woman has, in the past, openly and unambiguously expressed the desire to bear their child.
- About 700,000 babies are born in the UK every year. The 700,000 men who are their fathers have no right in law to time off work when those babies are born.
- A man may not be classed as a dependent for social security benefits in Great Britain.
- Widowers who are left with the care of children are not entitled to the state benefits which a widow would receive.
- Though it will soon be changed, the law in Great Britain still allows women to retire and receive a state pension at the age of 60 while requiring men to work until they are 65. The coming change in the law has been imposed upon Britain to bring the country into line with its European partners. The protests of men on this incontestable point of inequality have been ignored in Britain for 25 years.

Two connected consequences flow from this list. First, it gives an unusual perspective upon our times and the societies in which we live: it shifts the focus of the light in which we see ourselves. Second—and more importantly in my mind—it must mean, in each of its particular parts and in sum, that the cardinal tenets of feminism add up to a totem of bunkum. First, let's adjust our eyes to the different angle of light.

Throughout the whole of this century and especially in the last 25 years, Western societies have been extensively preoccupied with the changing position of women. The movement to adjust society to accommodate those changes, to alter the civic and political standing of women and to afford them legal and economic independence has been, incomparably, the most important single force for social reform in this century.

We can now see—it follows from that list—that with the focus of reforming light and zeal being directed upon the position of women, a shadow or penumbra of neglect has fallen upon the realities of life for men and upon the social terms and conditions by which men's personal and family lives are extensively defined and limited. Their common difficulties and their universal and institutionalised disadvantages have been overlooked. Or, where those disadvantages have been acknowledged, the prevailing tendency has been to act as if they must count for nothing—as if any difficulties shared by men must necessarily be trivial blights on the lives of weak individuals compared with the imposing grievances shared by all women.

Men, it has been broadly agreed, would be exhibiting an unseemly ingratitude, unmanly and unsoldierly, if they were to moan and whine about their troubles. But those troubles are not so trivial. Take a look back at that list. Each point touches upon the marrow of an individual's life—the main issues of life and death, of love and sex, of marriage and work, of the very rights of man as a citizen and as a creature of family. After the abolition of slavery, can any human right, any civic issue, be more essential than the right of a parent to live with her or his child, as best they can hack out their own domestic arrangements? No society which abrogates, abridges, compromises or neglects that right for hundreds of thousands of individuals who have nothing in common but their gender may advance a secure claim to be working towards the expunction of sexual prejudices and inequalities.

Even so, the main issue on this page is not the seriousness of the particular grievances on that list; nor is it the overall picture which it relays of routine, systemic and institutionalised disadvantage for men. Each of those disadvantages is an element of fissive material which can be bound together to make a grenade. If the assembled device is lobbed over the ramparts so that it drops deep into the foundations of modern feminism, it may blow up that towering edifice of bullshit, that babel of intolerance and casuistry which has cast a murrain on the life of the West in the last quarter of this century.

During the last 25 years, we have all grown accustomed to the propositions of the feminism which took its origins in the New Left of America and Europe in the later Sixties. The corner-stone of that mosaic of belief, assertion and argument has been the claim that all post-nomadic societies have been "patriarchal".

This ought to mean that all modern societies have been organised to endorse the powers of the father-figure; but it means more than that in the terminology of modern feminism. It means that those societies have been organised by men for the benefit of men and to the disadvantage of women.

We have all, in some measure, paid lip-service to the pseudo-Marxist tenets of modern feminism. We have all gone along with the general presumption that women belong by birth to a social and economic class which is oppressed by the patriarchal system as it is operated by a social and economic class composed, by birth, of men.

Now we can see and assert that those propositions are false at root. It cannot be true that men oppress women in a system which they devise for their benefit if, in a number of vital and central elements of the lives of men, they find themselves in positions of disadvantage compared with women. The proposition cannot be squared with the evidence. You must make what you will of that evidence. You may feel free to say that men, evidently, don't care about their children. You may share the opinion of a woman visiting my ' family house and admiring it who said, "houses are for women and children, not for those with dangly bits". You may take the view that men, being barely sub-human, uncivilised, barbaric, slobbish, undependable, unfamilial, need to be kept in their place by a system of law and regulation which confers them with rights of paternity on strictly limited terms.

You can say what you like but you cannot say that we live in a patriarchal system which is designed to protect and to promote the advantages of men over women. Can you see why that line is insupportable? Are you with me?

If the point is not self-evident, let me bash it into shape.

We all understand that the system of apartheid in South Africa was devised to sustain and to ensure the political and social supremacy of the white minority. The denial of political rights to blacks and the other circumscribinq conditions in which they lived all added up to a simple division of races in which whites had all power and blacks had none. The system could not have been described as a white supremacy, apartheid would have had no meaning, if blacks had been able to exercise rights and powers which were denied to whites. If, for instance, blacks had been allowed to vote while whites were denied that right, the very idea of a white supremacist society would have been preposterous.

Similarly, a king who may not leave his estates without the permission of parliament cannot be called an absolute monarch. The nomenklatura of the Soviet system could not have been called a privileged elite if everybody else but them had been allowed to shop at the special foreign currency stores.

Do you see what I am driving at?

The same logic, applied to the facts I have advanced, explodes the feminist myth of male supremacist patriarchy in Western societies. If any disadvantages apply to all men, if any individual man is denied a right by reason of his gender which is afforded to every individual woman, then it must follow that ours is not a society which is exclusively devised to advance and protect advantages for men over women.

It is not a patriarchy. I want to argue that, since it is demonstrably unreasonable, the false feminist picture can only be sustained through the exercise of intolerance, vulgar prejudice and totalitarianism in thought and speech. I want to try to show that the feminist picture of men which is broadly shared and agreed throughout our society can be contested in every detail, in all its parts and as a whole. I want to advance the opinion that the feminist world-picture came into being, in the first place, not as a tool of progress and a weapon of liberation but as a restrictive force which refused and inhibited change. I want to say that we have all, women and men, been harmed in our personal lives and in our political potentialities, as citizens, by that reactionary world-view. A great number of the correctable wrongs and deficiencies in our societies, I argue, have been deepened by feminism; and the power of its ideology has, in my view, inhibited and diminished the political powers of my generation, now thirty, forty and fifty something, now at the pinnacle of what ought to be their political powers but, in effect, neutralised.

That feminist world-view was always, in my book, a force of troubled and troubling reaction. If you, the reader, take that world-view as given, if it is the essential foundation of your self-esteem, if you take it for granted that women have had to struggle to advance their liberation against an oppressive system and that the changes which have occurred in the position of women in the last 20 years are the crowning jewel of achievement for the libertarian and liberationist generation of the 1960s, then the argument and discussion between us is likely to be a hot and heavy tussle.

Let me say that, from my side, no holds are barred. Shall we get at it?

From Chapter Four: Blind Panic

Here are a few facts. They need to be chewed slowly and digested fully before we move on to the richer banquet of argument. They are drawn from the records of British ministries and official statistics for England and Wales. The pattern they describe was duplicated throughout north-western Europe, North America and Australasia.

1) Between 1965-1975, the number of women received into institutions of higher learning in Great Britain rose from 4884 to 22784.

2) Between 1961-1977, the number of married women in Great Britain's labour force rose by 77%, bringing an extra two million workers into employment

3) The number of abortions rose from 22256 in 1968—the first year in which abortion was made legal—to 139,702 in 1975

4) The number of divorces rose from 27000 in 1961 to 80000 in 1971

In the following decade, the figures altered much less. The decisive change had taken place. The number of women in the workforce actually fell slightly, by one or two percent, between the mid-Seventies and the early Eighties. The number of women in higher education in 1970 was 178200. In 1980, the number was 202800. Abortions rose from 139702 in 1975 to 171873 in 1985. Compared with the trebling in the number of divorces in the Sixties, they merely doubled between 1971-1981, from 80000 to 157000.

Feminists of all varieties presume (and often boast) that the changes which occurred in the position of women in the second half of this century resulted from the claims of the women's movement and the militancy with which those claims were advanced.

Very many of them (see The Guardian Woman's Page any week, hear Woman's Hour any day) really do think that there are more women doctors, lawyers, teachers, broadcasters, businesswomen and truck drivers today because the Sixties sisterhood demanded such change.

The figures tell another story.

Those figures plainly and unmistakably tell us that it was institutional change which transformed the position of women—new laws, regulations and practices which passed with breathtaking speed through the political establishment of the day. The doubling in the numbers of women received into universities resulted directly from government's implementation of the Robbins Report of 1963. Abortions rose sevenfold in a single decade following the Abortion Act of 1967, which itself resulted from David Steele's Private Member's Bill for which the government of the day sympathetically provided parliamentary time. Figures for divorce rocketed as a direct result of the 1969 Divorce Reform Act. How much did the introduction of those reforming laws and practices owe to feminism and the women's liberation movement?

Absolutely nothing. Zilch. Sweet FA. No connection.

The acts, in most cases, were passed into law before the writings of Kate Millett, Ti-Grace Atkinson and Germaine Greer had been printed or even , in some cases, written.

Those reforms grew out of the political consideration of social needs—considerations which themselves long preceded the acts of the legislators. For example, the need to broaden admissions to British universities, to build new universities to meet the needs for an expanded managerial class in the post-war economy, had been generally recognised and agreed from the mid-1950s. If it had not been so, the reforms recommended by the Robbins Report could not have been implemented, as they were, before the 1960s were out.

In retrospect, two features are most striking about these changes.

The first point of amazement is to say that they were introduced and passed into law against negligible opposition. The transformations which occurred in official attitudes towards women's education, their place in divorce and their right to have an abortion were all introduced into the mainstream of the official life of Britain without crisis.

It is customary to see these changes resulting from vigorous campaigning by interest groups against the entrenched opposition of a back-woods establishment. It doesn't look that way if you read the records now, nearly 30 years later. What appears much more noteworthy is the scale of agreement and consensus in British society on the need for these changes. If a patriarchal order of establishment had existed, would it not have acted more forcefully and militantly to defend and to conserve its interests? Compare the Corn Laws repeals and reforms.

The second dazzling point of interest is in the overwhelming magnitude of those changes. In retrospect, it is clear that an unprecedented and largely unrecognised revolution occurred in the central nervous system of our society and in all the cells of our lives.

In the late 1960s and early 1970s, our society took the full impact of a fissiparous shock for which it was entirely unprepared and to which it failed, pitifully, to adjust with patience, understanding, tolerance and restraint. The shock was administered, with shattering abruptness, directly upon the war babies and the post-War generation. They, both men and women, were largely left to their own devices to come to terms with the fall-out from changes which none of our ancestors had ever encountered and which nobody fully understood.

The direct predecessors, our own parents, could not draw from their own experience to comprehend the scale and the impact of the changes which had arrived in the lives of their children. Having, in their own youth, fought a world war which caused the deaths of tens of millions and which included, in its final stages, a vision of the end of all life on earth, they were entitled to feel that the lives of their children were a cakewalk by comparison with their own. Those children had been born and had passed their infancy in a world of domestic stability, high employment and material luxury. What could they (we) possibly have to complain about?

The parents would say, with towering complacency, that the teenagers of the 1960s and the young adults of the 1970s acted as if they had invented sex. In point of fact, there was some truth in this line. A new world of sexual relations had been invented, not by the young themselves but by the chemists and technicians in the laboratories of California where the contraceptive pill was refined. That device exploded over the West with fissive and devastating effect. At the epicentre of its explosion stood the young men and women of the post-war generation. They would be marked for life by its blast and its fall-out. It blew them apart. The contraceptive pill having been invented for women, it naturally appeared that they were, exclusively, the recipients and bearers of change. All their expectations and conventions having been exploded by the device which took its place in their handbags and on their bathroom shelves, it was understandable that the focus of public attention should be directed upon their condition, as they demanded that it should be. Men, it was assumed, were essentially the same as they had ever been. Men, I believe, assumed this too.

I think the strongest argument is that your son isn't an infant any longer and there can be psychological damage to him at this age if it is done now! The strongest argument is that at this point the decision should be put off until Chase turns 18 and allow HIM to decide. His emotional well being MUST be considered as he is just too old at this point to force him to undergo the unnecessary surgery. Please tell your lawyer to add that argument when you make your case. http://representativepress.blogspot.com/2014/11/email-i-sent-savingchaseorg.html

Boynton mom sues to stop circumcision "According to Gillen's order, Hironimus signed a parenting plan in December 2011 and Nebus signed it about a week later, calling for Nebus to arrange for a circumcision. The agreement was entered into the court record Jan. 2, 2012."
http://articles.sun-sentinel.com/2014-05-14/health/fl-circumcision-battle-20140514_1_circumcision-court-fight-gillen

"On November 6, 2014, a Florida court decided that a healthy four year old boy will undergo an unnecessary, risky surgery at the insistence of his father. The boy's name is Chase and his mother is fighting a battle to save him.

According to court records, in December 2011, Heather Hironimus signed a parenting agreement which gave Chase's father, Dennis Nebus, permission to have their (then) baby boy circumcised. Three years later, Chase is still intact, happy and healthy.

Heather Hironimus realized over the years that removing Chase's foreskin was unnecessary, and as he became older the surgery, and anesthesia, were fraught with additional risks. She argues that the surgery is purely cosmetic and the parenting plan no longer pertains to a now older, and more aware, boy. Pediatric urologist Charles Flack told the judge that circumcision is not medically necessary.

Genital autonomy advocates believe Chase's physical and mental health are at risk. He is aware of his body and does not want to have surgery on his genitals. Forcing a child to undergo cosmetic surgery is a violation of basic human rights and medical ethics. This is an unprecedented case worthy of international media attention." see http://savingchase.org/

An article that has Sweden in an uproar

Annelie Sjöberg · 21 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Note: This is a translation of an article from AVfM's companion site in Sweden that has stirred an enormous debate in that country about the rights of men and boys. Annelie had already upset the Feminist establishment there earlier this year, and by announcing her direct affiliation with A Voice for Men the whole country is abuzz. Here's the article, translated from the original Swedish, that has them so upset.—Eds.

Update This article has also been translated into Italian. –Eds.

Now I've had enough, have you?

Now that I've taken the step to become an editor at AVfM, this move seems both strange and completely natural to me. Strange because I've been pretty uninterested in gender issues for most of my life. It's always seemed completely obvious to me that both sexes should have the same rights and the same responsibilities. But at the same time, completely natural because I've come to realize that these rights and responsibilities are a far cry from being self-evident. Women's issues are making headlines in every agenda everywhere, and feminism is viewed as the fairest of all ideologies—a movement that claims to fight so that both sexes are valued equally. If you are not a feminist, then you are viewed as someone who is against gender equality and equal opportunities. Still, whenever any matter relating to the rights of men surfaces, it is met with complete silence. To have the gall to bring to attention that there are some areas where the rights of men should be questioned and defended is something completely foreign in a country such as Sweden, where feminism is viewed as an ideology everyone must profess to lest they be viewed as chauvinist, backward misogynists. If and when men's issues are brought to attention or discussed at all, it is nearly always done from the feminist point of view.

In reality, it is utterly absurd that we have gotten into an equal opportunities debate that bears no resemblance to a debate; instead, it is nothing but a power struggle of women's vs. men's rights. Equality and equal opportunities should never be about who has it worse or about the rights of the one sex being set against and valued according to the rights of the other sex. Women and men have throughout the ages been fighting at each other's side. This has been the prerequisite for our survival. What we have today can only be compared to an all-out war between the sexes, and as such it has only losers, men and women alike.

I have always thought of Sweden as a forerunner in gender equality. Swedish women have had the self-evident right to vote for a long time now, just like women in other Western countries. Equally self-evident is a woman's right to get an education and invest in a career, and most Swedish women today are professionals, which has been made possible due to the extended access to daycare services provided by the state. Whatever prior hurdles that prevented women from fulfilling their desires of getting the education and jobs they wanted are long since gone. This gives Swedish women an opportunity to be economically independent.

That Swedes have liberal views on female sexuality is something that is known to many outside of Sweden. It is not by accident that the movie One Summer of Happiness, with explicit scenes, could be aired as early as 1951 here—something that was utterly unthinkable in many other countries at that time. Today, no one questions a woman's right to her body and her sexuality.

This is why I, with a great deal of wonder and surprise, during the past few years have noticed that more and more people were speaking up and saying that gender equality issues were in big trouble and that feminism was needed more than ever before. I asked myself, quite naturally, "What?" "How come?" "What happened and how did it come to this?"

Purely out of curiosity and not without a great deal of naiveté regarding the matter of gender issues as something to be treated objectively, I started to look around and read more and more. What I found was a vicious gender issues debate all bundled up under the umbrella of feminism. This type of feminism, to which everyone is expected to adhere to, was not only based on false or inadequate premises, but I also discovered that everyone who doesn't immediately accept its holy doctrines or dares to question them will immediately be harassed and showered with pejoratives. There is apparently a special place in hell for every woman who dares to criticize the holy dogma of feminism.

Now that I'm an editor at AVfM, I will be publishing all my posts under my real name. Some might think this to be stupid. Others might find it brave. For me, it is simply an obvious choice for me not to be anonymous here. I have nothing to hide or be ashamed of. I am for gender equality and equal opportunity for both sexes. I feel that both men and women should be valued equally. I am not a homophobe or a racist or a gender role conservative or whatever derogatory term is thrown at anyone who questions the holiness of feminism. AVfM is mainly a movement for men's issues, but my commitment is based on my belief that both men and women will gain from a more nuanced and healthy debate on gender issues. To raise men's issues, which have been neglected for a long time, will benefit men and women equally.

Those issues that lie closest to my heart and that I'll touch on in the upcoming posts are:

- the continuous decline of the performance of boys in the school system
- the high number of reported sexual crimes, including the number of unrecorded cases and the reasons behind why they were unrecorded
- the need of children to have both of their parents present in their everyday lives

Gender equality is not a power struggle between the sexes. It is a struggle to raise women's issues and men's issues on their own terms. It is a struggle to raise human issues.

We will all be better for it.

Don’t ask, don’t tell, don’t think about it

The unstated rules for male victims of female-perpetrated sexual abuse and assault

I have a friend, an autistic man, who was ordered to have sex with a woman and was informed by her that he had no choice, and so even though he didn’t want to, he went along because he was doing as he was told.

That was how he lost his virginity: by being told he had to, that he had no choice—and he was laughed at by friends afterward when he said he didn’t really like it or want it.

But he had an erection. So that means he was asking for it, right?

Rape is a horrible experience and awful crime. We hear regularly that there is a problem with women, and men, being raped by men. A little less often, we’ll hear that women can rape women or even rape men, although usually everyone is quick to say, “But it’s very rare.”

Why do we believe that? Probably because most people assume “rape” means “unwanted penetration.” That is also in most statistics: a commonly cited figure is that 1 in 5 women and 1 in 71 men is raped. But this statistic is based on “rape means penetration.”

Dictionaries do not always match reality, but if you look in most dictionaries, you will find that the word originally meant to take or seize against someone’s will, or to force a person into sexual intercourse against their will. Penetration was never part of the definition, which denigrates countless men’s and boys’ experiences.

If you peer closely, almost every study that shows massively more women raped than men are using “forced penetration” as their definition. In those same studies, if they ask about men’s experiences, it turns out that men have unwilling sex with women close to as often as women have unwilling sex with a man.

You may be laughing and saying this is impossible. If he had an erection and if he orgasmed, he must have wanted it, right? Yet almost every report on women’s experiences of being raped shows that most of the time they lubricated, in most cases they found their hips involuntarily moving with their attacker, and many experienced orgasm—so does this mean these women wanted it? Of course not!

Have we all forgotten the classes in basic biology we got when we were teenagers? Or what every man knows? Most erections are not voluntary. Much of a man’s sex life, especially when he’s younger, involves wishing he could get rid of an embarrassing erection. There are also physical ways to force an erection, some of them even painful, and drugs that can be used to force him to get one.

“But men are so much stronger! Most women couldn’t force most men!” But men can be overpowered with restraints, at the point of a weapon, by a gang of women, drugged, or even blackmailed into having sex.

I know another man who was blackmailed by his ex-girlfriend into having sex with him. She was threatening to withhold access to his children if he didn’t have sex with her, and this went on for nearly a year until she finally tired of the game.

I know more stories than this, and I’m willing to bet if you ask carefully and quietly and respectfully among your male friends, without using any emotionally charged words or sneering or laughing, you’ll find that you do too. The fact is studies show men have unwanted sex with women about as often as the other way around. The only exception is when you ask people if they’ve ever been raped in their life, far more women than men say “yes.”

But consider: statistics that ask if it’s happened to them in the last year or two, and the rates of forced sex are much closer than people realize. What’s going on?

I think it’s because we tell girls to watch out for rape, and tell boys that it’s their job to protect girls. Girls are encouraged to take it seriously, boys are encouraged to see it as “getting lucky” or to think about it as anything other than rape.

I've seen many social workers and psychotherapists in my life, and it wasn't until I was in my mid-40s that one even asked me—and even then she asked in a way that would have made me uncomfortable to say that a woman took advantage of me sexually.

Today, when I tell people I've been sexually harassed and, worse, by women, people laugh or call me a liar. It's all happened to me—more than once.

Could it be that our tendency to see women as harmless and men as tough leads us to refuse to even think that the average woman is capable of harming a man—and that this is something we're all in together, for each other?

For an interesting conversation I had about all this with Erin Pizzey, the UK's pioneer in domestic violence, and Philip W. Cook, co-author of When Women Sexually Abuse Men: The Hidden Side of Rape, Stalking, Harassment, and Sexual Assault, see this link. It may surprise you what you hear!

It all balances out

It All Balances Out—just four words. Sounds simple, but it's not. It is, I believe, a phrase that best describes gender reality throughout history and it's a phrase that might cause the modern-day MRA to, shall we say, raise an eyebrow. I'm well aware that men suffer comparison with women in virtually every measure of well-being. But I respectfully request that my fellow MRAs hear me out on this. What you're about to read demonstrates a strategy for getting our message across to the mainstream. In part, it's crafted for "straights," those who've not taken the "red pill." How do we reach them? How do we send our message in a manner that is at least relatively palatable to mainstream sensibilities? How do we penetrate the "lace curtain" in a manner that's healthy and constructive? How do we move gender politics into a new and more evolved phase?

I present to you now how I use the concept of It All Balances Out to further our cause.

It All Balances Out

The underlying principle that pervades and unifies every aspect of my book can be expressed in a single word: balance. In defiance, the book's "radical" premise is simply this: In the benefits enjoyed and in the liabilities suffered, in the power and in the victimization, in the freedoms and the constraints, the good and the bad, It All Balances Out between Woman and Man—and it always has.

Historically, the gender system has certainly been less than perfect, inflicting injustices on both sexes alike. But these injustices have come out even. Ours has been an imperfect yet essentially balanced gender system, except for one thing—the highly *im*balanced gender belief system. If I could, I would shift our entire gender belief system away from feminism's MalePower/FemaleVictimization paradigm and toward a balanced gender paradigm.

As it stands, there's an assumption of imbalance—an "imbalance" of power enjoyed by men and an "imbalance" of victimization suffered by women. That's the story we make up, but that has never been more than half of the full story. The other half, the FemalePower/MaleVictimization half of the story, remains obscure because . . . neither sex wants to hear it. Nevertheless, for every female complaint, there is a mirror-opposite male complaint. For every one CEO, there've been many POWs. Hard/hazardous labor, battlefields, prisons, mines, the streets, the sewers—men have always occupied both extremes, the most and the least enviable positions on earth—the latter in far greater numbers than the former.

Imagine, if you will, a gigantic scale with love on one end of the balance beam and respect on the other:

This love/respect dynamic upon which gender balance pivots can be described in two brief statements:

Throughout history, both sexes have tended to respect men more than women.

Throughout history, both sexes have tended to love women more than men.

Feminism has effectively protested women's lesser status in all things along the respect axis. Both sexes have listened and both sexes have done much to change the cultural environment in ways that promote respect for women. That men are less loved, however, may ring true from the outset yet be met with cynicism just the same. Both sexes receive the female side with empathy and the male side without empathy exactly because both sexes love women more and men less.

Hostility, when directed at women, is given a pejorative label—"misogyny." We give it this very negative label because hostility toward women is forbidden. Arguably, our culture leans more toward misandry (hostility toward men). But few know this word misandry—a word that would condemn hostility toward men the same way the word misogyny condemns hostility toward women. Our lack of love toward men is so pervasive as to be invisible, and we concern ourselves with it so little that we don't even have a word for it.

This balance I speak of is revealed in the following four key statements:

One: At birth, members of both sexes are assigned roles, socialization, and conditioning that facilitate and ensure a world in which men are more respected/less loved and women are more loved/less respected.

Two: Historically, men have been no more empowered to escape their biology, role, socialization, conditioning, and concurrent fate than women have.

Three: The two sexes, equally powerless and equally powerful, have plied an equal overall force of influence in the molding of our world and are thus equally responsible for outcomes.

Four: Throughout history, the enormous consequences and vast repercussions suffered by women for being less respected have been matched in full by the enormous consequences and vast repercussions suffered by men for being less loved.

These four statements are key because taken together they lead inexorably to the one key truth: It All Balances Out!

Last year, while at a Christmas Eve party, I was asked what my book on gender was about. "It All Balances Out between men and women," I said.

"What balances out?"

"Everything," I said. "The power, the victimization; the freedoms, the constraints; the joys, the sorrows; the good and the bad, the whole thing."

So there I was, trapped in the kitchen with a half-dozen women all good-naturedly ready to pounce. "I'm . . . going to go over there," I said, pointing toward the dining room—a tactical retreat that drew a laugh. But, not long after, the hostess approached me and with only a hint of reluctance admitted, "You're probably right." The truths of Balance stand in such direct contradiction to the official (feminist) gender belief system that they may be taken for an "outrage." So it's telling, I think, that *un*officially these truths are so often met with a shrug. In my experience, prefacing a discussion on men's issues with "It All Balances Out" is a good approach. It is an angle that is generally well received. And it gets my foot in the door in places that might otherwise slam the door on men's issues. On a purely intuitive level, the truths of balance ring true.

Balancing out the "official" gender belief system, that is my goal; that is what my book is all about. It's about replacing "female-ism" with a new gender-neutral gender politics (what I'll call "equalism") that deals with the many and varied issues of women and men as mirror-opposites that balance each other. Only with this understanding can the gender politics of the future be built upon an even foundation.

It's funny, but I'm often asked, if it all balances out, then what's the problem? The assumption would seem to be that a balanced system is the same as a perfect system. But, as I see it, women suffer injustice along the respect axis, men suffer injustice along the love axis; these injustices may come out even (balanced), but they're injustices all the same. So, a balanced system is not at all the same as a perfect system. There are many problems. But far and away the deepest problem lies in our failure to know and to acknowledge that It All Balances Out. This failure to perceive Balance results in the one overarching aspect of the gender system that is *im*balanced: the gender belief system. Believing that Man has the power and Woman is the victim is one-sided, which is why it is false, which is why it's poisonous. It is a gender belief system that maximizes victim, vindictiveness, and vengeance motives, which is why it's a belief system that escalates the Battle of the Sexes.

The battle rages, inflicting damages on both sides. The damages may come out even, but they're damages all the same. So, again, a balanced system—especially when it is not acknowledged to be a balanced system—isn't the same as a perfect system, and it certainly hasn't proven to be an entirely peaceful system. Understanding that It All Balances Out, there remains much to be passionate about regarding gender issues and gender politics.

And, crucially, it's also true that the kind of immature emotional rage that both feminism and masculism can provoke finds no basis of support within an It All Balances Out belief system.

On what legitimate basis will we resent our opposite sex for the various powers, privileges, and exemptions it enjoys when we know our own sex enjoys powers, privileges, and exemptions in equal measure? When we come to the realization that the costs each sex pays for their respective privileges are costs that come out even, there remains no legitimate basis for inter-sex envy and bitterness.

But the only way to perceive this balance I speak of is to come to an understanding of the politicized perspectives of both sexes. With that understanding, balance is plain to see. At that point, a whole new gender-political space opens up, allowing for a whole new level of maturity, forgiveness, and fairness. When we proceed from the understanding that It All Balances Out on the global level, then when we focus in on any specific instance of gender conflict on the individual level, we do so without bias, open and available to whatever truths present themselves.

The Battle of the Sexes is like any other battle in as much as it is fueled by rage and righteousness. But while other battles may be settled when one side defeats the other, because the sexes are so deeply intertwined, when one sex "wins," both sexes lose. For the Battle of the Sexes, the only win position is a draw. The battle will only de-escalate when the warring factions become willing to accept a balanced perspective. We give up rancor and resentment when we admit that what "they" did to "us" is balanced by what "we" did to "them."

We acknowledge the wheel of complicity, whereby Man exerts a force of influence upon Woman and, in turn, Woman exerts an equal force of influence upon Man. But we give up foolish blaming and take on accountability when we agree that—as is true of each of us as individuals—Man and Woman are really each their own worst enemies primarily responsible for creating their own predicaments. The predicaments of Woman and Man are different but equivalent. The two ends of the balance beam need not be identical to weigh the same.

It All Balances Out is not an endpoint; it is a new and improved beginning. A balanced system becomes a far more workable system from which to proceed when it is acknowledged to be what it truly is—balanced! Believing that men have the power and women are the victims is the deep, underlying problem. Proceeding from the knowledge that It All Balances Out is the solution!

It is something that may be espoused even as a matter of principle. It's healthy. It's an "olive branch," a peace offering. It is a decision. It is a leap of faith. For both women and men, it is a constructive and magnanimous position from which to start anew. It is the only mindset that leads to the full restoration and preservation of love and respect between the sexes because it is the only mindset that combines the perspectives of both sexes. It is, therefore, a gender-political structure offering real promise toward de-escalating the Battle of the Sexes.

The future "ceasefire" in the Battle of the Sexes in favor of a cooperative era of peace, love, and understanding between the sexes is the reward; and it is attainable, but not without extending ourselves. To reach a perception of balance, we must embrace the truths that are rejected, the truths that are missing, the truths of FemalePower and the truths of MaleVictimization, the truths that go on the other end of the balance beam.

As it stands now, within the "official" gender belief system, all perceptions of gender reality are filtered through feminism's MalePower/FemaleVictimization (MP/FV) paradigm. "Knowing" that men have the power, what else will society do but take power away from men and give it to women? "Knowing" that women are the victims, what else will society do but extra protect and advantage women? Society, in accordance with its gender belief system, requires Man to pour from his cup half "full" into Woman's cup half "empty." Thus, society's efforts to create balance end up creating imbalance.

Moreover, if women are the victim, what else can women be the victims of but men, the ones with the power. So, now we're left with a story of Bad over-empowered men oppressing Good innocent-victim women: thus the MP/FV paradigm leads inexorably to the ManBad/WomanGood paradigm.

What if the MalePower/FemaleVictimization paradigm is the source of all our gender political woes? What if the repercussions of the MP/FV paradigm constitute the sole cause of women on the rise and men in decline? I believe that the MP/FV paradigm is the deep, underlying problem and It All Balances Out is the solution!

Let us admit that no human mind can hold the entire female experience on one side of the brain, the entire male experience on the other, and claim to know, with certainty, which side is lighter/which side is heavier; which is happier/which is sadder; more fulfilled/less fulfilled; freer/more constrained; which is "better"/which is "worse." The reality of the Big Picture is a reality that simply will not support any such certainty. In its place, what you end up with is mere opinion.

Pull the camera back far enough, take in gender reality all over the earth, all through history, and I believe that It All Balances Out is the one gender truth highest in both quantity and quality of truth. Nevertheless, the main objection to It All Balances Out is that it is not "true." In the opinion of feminists, it isn't "true" because men have the power and women are the victims. In the opinion of masculists, it isn't "true" because women have the power and men are the victims.

Currently, masculists have the better claim. I totally get it that masculists have cause to balk at the concept of balance. But what if the dreadful man-stats and misandry all result from actions and attitudes society adopts in response to feminism's MP/FV belief system? If so, then a culture-wide understanding and perception of this balance I speak of may be all that's necessary in order to bring about balance because, in balancing the gender belief system, we balance out the one overarching *im*balance from which other imbalances derive.

If social workers, teachers, police officers, judges, legislators, and politicians operated within a balanced gender belief system, it seems reasonable to suppose that these professionals would do their jobs in a balanced way. It seems to me that, to a large extent, a culture-wide perception of the true balance in gender power and victimization will, all by itself, take us a long way down the path toward creating gender balance!

With little support and/or funding, we few masculists have done a heroic job of raising awareness. Our facts and truths are finally penetrating the "lace curtain"! But I think that, strategically, we could be more effective.

When we present the facts and truths of FemalePower and MaleVictimization as an end in themselves, we turn a lot of people off. We seem to only be adding men to the list of victims and escalating the Battle of the Sexes. But, if we present our truths as a means to end—that end being an understanding that It All Balances Out—we present the facts and truths of FemalePower and MaleVictimization as that which goes on the other end of the balance beam. And, in so doing, we present not only our perspectives but also our vision of a new era of gender fairness, negotiation, and mutual understanding.

We MRAs have cause to be angry and embittered, but we don't really want to oust Woman from victimhood's center seat just so Man can sit there instead, do we? And yet it often seems as if we seek to drag the profoundly entrenched MP/FV belief system all the way to the far other end of the ideological spectrum when the more doable task of dragging gender beliefs into the middle serves our purposes just as well. Out there among the "straights," outside the grip of gender ideology, It All Balances Out rings true. But more than that, it rings healthy and hopeful. It's an olive branch, a peace offering.

When asked, “How does it all balance out?” we’re invited to speak our truths just as we always have. But, because we opened with It All Balances Out, we cannot be dismissed as “victim-mongers.” We present our truths within a framework that validates both sides and promises to bypass war and head instead down a path toward a brighter future. In so doing, we invite a more positive response.

So, what will humanity do?—wait for the “right” time?—wait till all agree? Being a matter of opinion, the battle of MalePower/FemaleVictimization vs. FemalePower/MaleVictimization, feminism vs. masculism can rage back and forth ad nauseam. But at what cost?

And while the contest for the coveted title of most powerless victim can rage back and forth for a long time, it cannot go on forever, can it? A thousand years from now, will we still be debating whether it is Woman or Man who wins the title? What must we endure and for how long before we set victim and vengeance aside and finally, inevitably, call it a draw? It is exactly because there can be no agreement and no certainty in these matters that we might as well be magnanimous about it. And we men might as well be the magnanimous ones because, while a perception of balance can only fatally undermine feminism, we men have nothing to lose and everything to gain by it! So, I urge everyone, why not take a leap of faith, demonstrate a little gender generosity, and simply call it even?

The contest for most powerless victim is destructive, intractable, and can have no positive outcome. A pox on it! Let’s put that behind us and take the first crucial step toward a more evolved phase of gender politics and gender relations. Let’s de-escalate a costly war neither sex can “win.”

If the MHRM truly wishes to affect constructive change and peaceful resolutions, I believe it would be wise to stand behind It All Balances Out as its first principle. To Men’s Issues Activists everywhere I say, let It All Balances Out be the banner that unifies us and keeps us on a healthy and beneficial path. Whether present or distant, it is the inevitable future. What are we waiting for? There’ll never be a “better” time to declare balance. The right time is now!

It All Balances Out!

Townsville City Council celebrates IMD

Greg Canning · 22 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Townsville City Council is to be congratulated for hosting its second Employee Expo in celebration of International Men's Day (IMD) at the RSL Stadium on November 12, ahead of the official IMD on November 19.

IMD aims to acknowledge the positive contributions ordinary, decent men make to family, community, and society while highlighting areas in which men face disadvantage and discrimination.

This year's theme, "Working Together for Men and Boys," is "intended to encourage greater cooperation in addressing issues that affect Men and Boys all over the world."

Taking an inclusive approach, the council was able to facilitate several hundred of its male and female employees attending an expo focused on these issues and supporting men's health and well-being. More than 30 exhibitors provided information on physical, emotional, and financial health and pursuits related to leisure, spirituality, and self-development.

Employee attendance was up significantly on the inaugural event in 2013. Hermit Park Clinic provided brief health checks and skin spot checks to some 150 individuals.

Discussions with TCC staff and organizers indicate that the expo will now become an annual feature of their employee support calendar. This represents a clear win for gender equality, with the City Council demonstrating concern for both sexes.

Below is the text of my opening address to the Townsville City Council International Men's Day Employee Expo:

"Thanks to Mayor Jenny Hill and the Townsville City Council for hosting the IMD Employee Expo for a second year.

Various celebrations of International Men's Day occurred around the world in the second half of the last century, including the first documented Australian celebration at Circular Queue Sydney in 1994.

But it was not until 1999 under the leadership of Professor Jerome Teelucksingh of the University of Trinidad that IMD celebrations became a visible worldwide phenomena endorsed by the UN, with observances now occurring in more than 60 countries.

Counter to the predominant negative discourse around men behaving badly, Prof. Teelucksingh has a vision of celebrating the positive sides of masculinity.

He based IMD on six pillars.

Number 1: To promote positive male role models; not just movie stars and sports men but everyday, working-class men who are living decent, honest lives. Men like you and I. And closely related to Number 1 …*

Number 2: To celebrate men's positive contributions to society, community, family, marriage, child care, and the environment.*

Sadly, current social trends see up to one-third of children growing up in fatherless homes. Fatherhood is often disparaged as unnecessary.

Men are often portrayed as dangerous to children; Qantas and Virgin Australia reinforce this view with policies of not seating unaccompanied minors next to males on commercial flights.

Yet the importance of a connected father to children's development, family stability, and social cohesion is well established.

Against this background, it is great to see the current Dads 4 Kids advertisements on TV showing positive images of ordinary, everyday dads interacting with their children.

Number 3: To focus on men's health and well-being: social, emotional, physical, and spiritual.*

Traditional masculine stereotypes often lead men to be neglectful of their health, especially their emotional well-being, and there is a well-documented "gender health gap."

A male child born in Australia can expect to live five years less than a female child.
• He is 1.6 times more likely to die from cancer
• 1.9 times more likely to die from circulatory diseases
• Males are three times more likely to die in a motor vehicle accident
• Almost twice as likely to die from drug-related causes
• Men are three to four times more likely to commit suicide than women, an indication they often suffer psychological distress alone.

Yet efforts to address male health and government spending are significantly less than efforts and spending on women's health.

Take a moment today to make sure you are looking after yourself.

Number 4: To highlight discrimination against males in areas of social services, social attitudes and expectations, and law.*

Do males face discrimination? They certainly do in some areas.

· Health services and spending, as noted

· Fathers are far less likely to gain custody of their children following divorce, and we are a long way away from the ideal "equal shared parenting."

· A major education gap exists, with boys performing less well than girls at school level and girls significantly outnumbering boys in university enrollments and graduations.

· Male victims of family and domestic violence (one in three) are not acknowledged, and there are virtually no services available to them.

· For the same crime, males routinely receive harsher punishment and sentencing in the criminal justice system than females.

Number 5: To improve gender relations and promote gender equality.*

Often, gender equality is seen as only involved with improving women's lives, and the focus has now shifted from equality of opportunity to equality of outcome.

We are told that women should make up half of CEOs and board members, but, surprisingly, no mention is made of women reaching parity in the dirty and dangerous trades mostly occupied by men.

Women have been helped to move into the workforce, but men have not been helped to have a greater role in the home and family.

Many campaigns exist to stop violence against women, yet men, who are the overwhelming majority of victims of violence (83 % of violent deaths worldwide, according to the WHO), are largely ignored. Why can't we work to stop violence against everyone?

Let's recognize the inherent differences between men and women and give everyone respect, compassion, and equality of opportunity, for men as well as women across the spectrum.

If we do that, we will surely come closer to building a strong pillar Number 6: To create a safer, better world, where people can be safe and grow to reach their full potential.

Thank you."

White Ribbon Australia fraud exposed

Note: This article is also available in Italian and Farsi.

Imagine the image of a woman, cowering in the corner, shivering, blood running from her nose, as a man, possibly just a faceless silhouette of a man, looms over her with a clenched fist.

For most people with their humanity intact, it is an image that elicits sympathy and outrage, and quite naturally so. Indeed, there are only two kinds of people in this writer's opinion who look upon this kind of imagery with callous indifference. The first is the small percentage of people who simply have no moral compass, no sense of concern for anyone but themselves.

The other group is the one turning the human decency that deplores the victimization of the weaker by the stronger into a cash cow. That would be most domestic violence advocates.

Yes, it is all but indisputable. Profiteers have now industrialized battered women, reducing them to storefront mannequins for the sake of lining their pockets. They are not only indifferent to the suffering of the victims of intimate partner violence (IPV), but they also count on those (female-only) victims to make a living—even if they have to manufacture them. In keeping with their agenda, they also manufacture false statistics and a wholly fabricated narrative about IPV that is designed not to offer assistance or ameliorate the factors that lead to violence in the home but, in the simplest of terms, to cash in.

One of the most deplorable examples of that in existence today is the so-called "White Ribbon Campaign." It is largely a worldwide effort to cozen money by playing on the human decency of people concerned about violence in the home. Their modus operandi is to paint a false picture of the problem, identifying its sole source as abusive men and its sole victims as helpless women. It is a calculated deception that flies in the face of virtually all known credible research on the issue, but it is a financial windfall because female-only victims and male-only perpetrators have proven to provide the best incentive for inspiring well-meaning people to give money.

Perhaps the worst of the worst in this worldwide consortium of con artists is the White Ribbon Campaign in Australia. That is an easy conclusion to come to with even a cursory glance at their financials, which are a matter of public record. You can see for yourself.

The first thing that is noticeable is that White Ribbon Australia is undergoing some pretty remarkable growth. From 2012 to 2013, the group increased their revenue by over 25%, with an additional half million dollars. It is especially impressive since more than 50% of their gross revenue ends up in the pockets of their staff.

With $1,130,402 in salaries and benefits, you can add $203,064, $416,077, and $85,565 respectively for "advertising and marketing," "fundraising expense," and "travel and accommodation." You end up with a total of $1,835,108. That amounts to nothing more than raising money, paying themselves with it, but leaving enough left over to go raise more money.

With additional expenditures under informative headings like "purchases" ($58,603) and "other expenses" ($321,483), White Ribbon Australia ended up with a net loss of $441,787.

There is one category conspicuously absent from their financial report: services rendered.

While we are admittedly still looking, thus far we have found no evidence that White Ribbon Australia has ever contributed a solid nickel to a single service for actual victims of domestic violence. That includes female victims.

Indeed, as far as we are able to ascertain, White Ribbon Australia operates at a loss largely due to the financial self-indulgence of its staff, and does so strictly by lying to the Australian public about the incidence, severity, and causes of IPV, with the slight caveat that they do provide an online pledge that men are asked to sign saying they won't beat women.

Lying is a strong word. And it should be backed up with evidence that this is what they are doing. For the next week, we will be providing that evidence on a regular basis on the front page of AVfM, as well as through multiple social media platforms and in concert with other organizations concerned with the corruption that has spread through the domestic violence industry like a stomach virus on a cruise ship.

The first of many examples ahead is the following statement published on White Ribbon Australia's organizational report:

This is patently false, and has been proven as such.

Australia's One in Three Foundation, a true domestic violence prevention advocacy group, offers the following fact check:

Agency or Individual	Misleading 'statistic'	Correction	Corrected?
ABC Radio National AM	"a recent survey in Victoria found family violence is the leading cause of death and ill health in women of child bearing age... It's [family violence] the leading contributor to death and disability for women of childbearing age."	The latest available data[i] shows that the top five causes of death, disability and illness [combined] for Australian women aged 15-44 years are anxiety and depression, migraine, type 2 diabetes, asthma and schizophrenia. Violence (let alone the subset of family violence) doesn't make the list.	ABC's Audience and Consumer Affairs advised, "we are satisfied that the program was accurate."
VicHealth CEO Jerril Rechter	"Violence against women is... the number one contributor to death and disability in Victorian women aged 15 to 44"	Intimate partner violence (not violence against women) is the leading contributor to death, disability and illness in Victorian women aged 15 to 44, according to a single, largely discredited study.[ii] The omission of the word illness here is critical. Deaths from intimate partner violence (femicide and suicide) made up 2.3% and 12.9% of the disease burden respectively; physical injuries just 0.7%; substance abuse (tobacco, alcohol and drug use) 10.2%; sexually transmitted infections and cervical cancer 2.2%; and poor mental health (depression, anxiety and eating disorders) 71.8%[iii], i.e. The vast majority of the contribution to the burden of disease in young Victorian women from intimate partner violence is from illness, not death or injury.	VicHealth advised, "As the media release relates to a past event, no correction will be made to the document on the website. However we will ensure more consistent wording is used in the future" (in other words they are happy for their website to continue to mislead the public).

Also, an examination of Australian government statistics on the causes of injury, death, and illness by gender distribution undermines the claim unambiguously: http://www.aihw.gov.au/deaths/causes-of-death/.

We also have to note that even when counting mental illnesses such as depression and chronic anxiety, there is no evidence anywhere that these conditions are caused by IPV. In other words, this is just one big, fat falsehood being sold like "gold" chains by scam artists who can be found on street corners in most major cities.

White Ribbon Australia, however, is quite aware of how the system works. Once they get the media to commit to one of their lies, there is little to nothing anyone can or will do about it. Least of all White Ribbon Australia.

Psychotherapist Tom Golden demonstrates precisely how this works with the spread of false information through the media here:

And this is no stranger to people involved in White Ribbon Australia.

Consider the case of noted Australian feminist ideologue, IPV "expert," and White Ribbon celebrity Dr. Michael Flood of the University of Wollongong. Some years back, Flood released a, well, flood of false information and statements about domestic violence, including the following:

> Women are far more likely than men to experience a range of controlling tactics and experience violence after separation…. Women's perpetration of violence is much more often than men's in self-defence…. Men are more likely to perpetrate … for instrumental reasons.

Dr. Flood was approached by Men's Health Australia Magazine and asked for research to support these claims. He could not provide it and later admitted that no such research existed.

The facts refuting his statements are as follows:

> The Australian Institute of Family Studies (1999) observed that, post-separation, fairly similar proportions of men (55 per cent) and women (62 per cent) reported experiencing physical violence including threats by their former spouse. Self-defense is cited by women as the reason for their use of IPV (including severe violence such as homicide) in a small minority of cases (from 5 to 20 per cent). After analyzing for verbal aggression, fear, violence and control by each gender, husbands are found to be no more controlling than wives.

Dr. Flood's disinformation made many rounds through worldwide media and he never offered a correction. Not that it would matter. As Golden demonstrates quite clearly, once the lie is out there, the media has an unfortunate habit of sticking to it.

There is a specific and overarching reason that all of this is so important. Decades of clinical experience working with violent families has led me to the inescapable conclusion that the most harm from IPV (very little of it is fatal or seriously physically injurious) is visited on the lives of children who live in homes where one or both parents are violent.

These children are subjected to severe psychosocial stress factors that interfere with their education; lead to drug and alcohol abuse, truancy, delinquency, teen pregnancy, criminality; and perhaps even more importantly lead many of them to enter and maintain abusive relationships as adults.

The false "gendered" model of IPV sold by organizations like White Ribbon Australia not only misses the boat on the science about the problem, but it also contributes to perpetuating the cycle of violence by denying the existence of much of what is happening. By disingenuously painting this as a problem rooted in masculinity, they betray and abandon the children in families with violent mothers, condemning them to suffer ongoing abuse and repeat that cycle as adults. Much of this will lead to even more violence against women, as well as more men and children.

More simply put, the White Ribbon Campaign in Australia is enabling and promoting child abuse in the name of making a buck.

White Ribbon Campaigns in Australia and other countries will not be shaken easily from the corrupt business they are conducting. Their model of IPV, while manufactured and misleading, is the most salable version to a public largely ignorant of the real issues involved.

AVfM will do its part to try, just the same. The very moment this article was published marked a kickoff to our campaign to inform the public that they are being lied to, and that the money they donate to White Ribbon Campaigns does nothing more than make a handful of people affluent while creating still more victims of abuse who will take that dysfunction into future generations.

We will henceforth declare that November 25 of each year is White Ribbon Fraud Day and will dedicate as many resources as possible to outing the deception about IPV that currently profit groups like the one in Australia. One of the best ways to out these hucksters is to name them. The following staff list is provided by White Ribbon Australia:

BOARD MEMBERS

White Ribbon Australia

Directors Report

Directors

Company Secretary

Principal Activities

Finally, we will also take the opportunity to promote and refer people to the one White Ribbon organization that is dedicated to evidence-based solutions to this significant social malady.

WhiteRibbon.org is headed by Ms. Erin Pizzey. She is the worldwide founder of the women's shelter movement and one of the world's leading experts on IPV. Her website is rich with interviews, radio programming, and articles written by other scholarly authorities on the subject of family violence and whose non-ideological research demonstrates just how far the domestic violence industry has strayed from the truth in order to capitalize on fear and miscalled compassion.

We will aggressively undertake this campaign every year until the domestic violence industry is forced to change in a way that actually serves the purpose of helping victims of IPV rather than satisfying an ideological, financial agenda.

Correction issued: re: "Dr. Flood was approached by Men's Health Australia Magazine…" That line should have read "Men's Health Australia," which is a men's issues group, not to be confused with Men's Health publication.

Dr. Flood still maintains that the blatant lies he told about the experience of women's and men's post separation experiences are not really lies, and offers the blatant lies of other ideologues as support.

UFC reinstates suspended fighter Anthony “Rumble” Johnson after independent inquiry into domestic violence claims

Ty Henry · 23 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The Ultimate Fighting Championship (UFC) has reinstated light heavyweight contender Anthony “Rumble” Johnson after allegations of domestic violence and stalking prompted them to suspend him in September.

On November 6, the judge threw out a civil case after conferring with the woman, Johnson’s ex-girlfriend and the mother of two of his children. The UFC also conducted an independent inquiry into the charges through its own retained law firm.

Johnson was suspended after reports surfaced that the woman had filed a police report alleging that friends of Johnson and Johnson himself were harassing/stalking her and that she was “in fear.” The woman further alleges that a 2012 altercation between the two resulted in her “losing two of her teeth.” It also emerged that he pled no-contest to a 2009 matter and received probation.

Johnson denied the allegations.

Johnson was suspended the same week the UFC reversed field a second time on Thiago Silva. They reinstated Silva after his February charges of aggravated assault were dropped in September. After videos surfaced of him appearing to converse with his wife, Thaysa, while trying to investigate an “intruder” (it is speculated that her lover was in the home, hiding), the UFC cut him again. The Silva severance coincided with the Johnson allegations. Coincidentally, both the Silva videos and the Johnson story surfaced the same week as the second Ray Rice video.

Johnson, the number-three contender, was scheduled to fight number-one contender Alexander Gustafsson at UFC on FOX 13 prior to the suspension, making him next in line to fight the winner of the Daniel Cormier–Jon Jones title fight January 3, 2015.

The substance of the 2012 alleged altercation has not been verified, and the substance of the accuser’s conversation with the judge has not been disclosed.

“Men need to back off, take a step to the side and keep their mouths shut”

Note: This is a translation from another original article in Swedish from AVfM’s companion site in Sweden that—surprise!—has feminists there so upset. Stay tuned for the translation of an open letter from AVfM Sweden to “news” site Nyheter 24 that followed a few days later.—Eds.

A feminist reporter from Nyheter 24 is convicted of the maltreatment and molestation of women

> Let’s have a month where men are banned from pubs

> Nyheter24:s Mohamed Touzari.
> Mohamed Touzari
> “98% of those suspected of sexual crimes during 2013 were men. The majority of those crimes were committed under the influence of alcohol.”
> How many more attacks on women should we have to read about? How much longer should the predominant macho culture reign in the pubs?
> Another weekend has passed and yet another…

A reader on the “news” site Nyheter 24 has today [November 18] published a Facebook update:

> This morning I wrote a post on Nyheter 24 where I objectively put forward that I found it quite interesting how he [Mohamed Touzari] writes about what men should do and how they should behave when he himself, according to Lexbase [a searchable Swedish website and database of criminal sentences published in the past five years], is convicted of molestation, female maltreatment and theft. The post went viral and had 37 likes after 10 minutes. After that it didn’t receive any more likes because Nyheter 24 removed the post. I decide to publish the post again and after 3 minutes the comment section is turned off. So, I now have one question: How shoddy are the leading voices of this debate allowed to be before it simply is not OK? Where do you draw the line?
> And a follow-up question—is it ever allowed for journalists to censor the debate they themselves have started?
> Personally I believe that every person on this earth has at one time or the other said something that might be construed as insulting to the other sex. If not immediately after then at least as one of the learning steps we go through as children. But for me, the limit has been reached long before maltreatment of women and > molestation come into the picture. The limit starts at hateful speeches and lies.

An attachment provided confirms the allegations made:

The sentence above is from April 2012.

Another reporter from Nyheter 24, the radical feminist Irena Pozar, is very infatuated with this convicted woman beater and molester, as it is clearly seen from the comments she has made on Twitter.

Mohamed Touzari @mohamedtouzari – 24hI have written about how we should have a month where men are banned from the pubs:nyheter24.se/nyheter/kronik…
Irena Pozar @irena_pozar – 23hMy idol and apprentice @mohamedtouzari has as usual written something very SMART:nyheter24.se/nyheter/kronik…
Mohamed Touzari@mohamedtouzari@irena_pozar oh, you are soooo <heart> <heart>

Irena Pozar has recently gotten one frustrated male reader sentenced for molestation. This man was sentenced to pay a fine and damages of 5,000 SEK for writing a comment seen in the picture below:

Pozar wrote: “Men need to back off, take a step to the side and keep their mouths shut”

The male reader wrote in response: “It is in fact the chauvinist feminist idiots such as Irena that should keep their mouths shut. She is just making a fool of herself. Let’s shove a knife in the vaginas of chauvinist feminists.”

As this is being written, Nyheter 24 has not yet commented on this revelation. Neither has it explained how to separate the men who should be despised from the men who should be held in high esteem. We suspect, however, that this division is done on the basis of one’s skin colour and political views.

AVFM · 23 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Some weeks ago a number of ridiculously bigoted pieces appeared in the mainstream gaming press declaring that “Gamers” were over. This took a small press scandal and turned it into the raging firestorm that is #GamerGate. The shaming language, the accusations of being misogynists, racists, homophobes, non-inclusive, loser, nerd, bitter, basement-dwelling neckbeards, it was all there and visited on the gaming community for having the audacity to note a minor tawdry scandal. And soon the whole catalog of shaming tactics was applied to not just men but also to a huge mass of men and women whose only crime was to question the status quo. One of the coordinated hit pieces declared that “Gamers” are over and “Gamers” don’t have to be your audience when creating or writing about video games. An anonymous parodist wrote a brilliant response that likely has more to it. Whoever wrote this, we want to shake their hand. In the meantime, all we have is what we got from this Pastebin. We present it here so more people can see it. –DE

I never said I was a feminist culture writer, but lately I feel I need to say something. ‘Feminist culture’ as we know it is kind of embarrassing — it’s not even culture. It’s whining about things, reporting memes and in-jokes repeatedly, and it’s getting mad on the internet.

It’s young women writing on tumblr with blue/purple hair and collecting non-binary pronouns. Blogging passionately for hours, around the world, to cry about all the things that feminists want them to fear. To find out whether they should feel offended or not. They don’t know how to dress or behave. You browse these listless posts, and often catch the expressions of people who don’t quite know why they themselves are writing there.

‘Feminist culture’ is a petri dish of people who know so little about how human social interaction and professional life works that they can concoct online ‘wars’ about social justice or ‘gender journalism ethics,’ straight-faced, and cause genuine human consequences. Because of ‘justice’.

Lately, I often find myself wondering what I’m even doing here. And I know I’m not alone.

All of us should be better than this. You should be deeply questioning your life choices if this and this and this are the prominent public face you presents to the rest of the world.

This is what the rest of the world knows about you — this, and headlines about hundred-thousand-dollar youtube videos or those junkies with the overpriced t-shirts. That’s it. You should absolutely be better than this.

You don’t want to ‘be divisive?’ Who’s being divided, except for people who are okay with an infantilized cultural desert of shitty behavior and people who aren’t? What is there to ‘debate’?

Right, let’s say it’s a vocal minority that’s not representative of most people. Most people, are mortified, furious, disheartened at the direction conversation has taken in the past few weeks. It’s not like there are reputable outlets publishing rational articles in favor of the trolls’ ‘side’. Don’t give press to the harassers. Don’t blame the entire humanity for a few bad apples.

Yet disclaiming liability is clearly no help. Social media websites with huge community hubs whose fans are often associated with blunt Twitter hate mobs sort of shrug, they say things like ‘Holocaust? Women have it much worse’ and ‘those people don’t represent our community’ — but actually, those people do represent theircommunity. That’s what their community is known for, whether they like it or not.

When you decline to create or to curate a culture in your spaces, you’re responsible for what spawns in the vacuum. That’s what’s been happening to feminism.

That’s not super surprising, actually. While feminism itself were discovered by strange, bright haired pioneers — they thought social justice would make conventions more fun, or that social media would make for amazing cross-cultural meeting spaces — the extremist arm of the form sprung up from marketing scams to 'media critics'. You know, young white women who gets their income from Patreon, who are 'harrassed'.

Suddenly a generation of lost women had marketers with hula hoop earrings whispering in their ears that they were the most important oppressed demographic of all time. Suddenly they started colouring their hair and started making echo chambers that sold the promise of diversity to kids just like them.

By the turn of the millennium those were echo chambers' only main cultural signposts: No fun. Have issues. Get a Patreon and then a bigger Patreon. Be an outcast. Celebrate that. Block anyone who threatens the narrative. You don't need cultural references. You don't need anything but the narrative. Public conversation was led by an echo chamber press whose role was primarily to tell feminists what to buy, to score products competitively against one another, to gleefully fuel the "oppressed gender" atmosphere around creators and companies.

It makes a strange sort of sense that white men of that time would become scapegoats for moral panic, for atrocities committed by "cis white male shitlords" in hyperfeminist America — not that the men themselves had anything to do with tragedies, but they had an anxiety in common, an amorphous cultural shape that was dark and loud on the outside, hollow on the inside.

Yet in 2014, the narrative has changed. We still think angry young women are the primary demographic for echo chambers — yet average block-lists from the social justice space have grown massively year on year, with only a few sterling lists enjoying any success.

It's clear that most of the people who drove feminism in the past have grown up — either out of feminism, or into more fertile spaces, where small and diverse thoughts can flourish, where communities can quickly spring up around diversity, self- expression and mutual support, rather than upholding the narative. There are new audiences and new thoughts alike there. Traditional "feminism" is sloughing off, culturally and ethically, like the carapace of a bug.

This is hard for people who've drank the kool aid about how their identity depends on the aging cultural signposts of a rapidly-evolving, increasingly broad and complex world. It's hard for them to hear they aren't needed, anymore, that they aren't the world's most special-est oppressed demographic, that equality and incusivity is ubiquitous.

We also have to scrutinize, closely, the baffling, stubborn silence of many media outlets amid these scandals, or the fact lots of stubborn, myopic internet comments happen on tumblr and social media sites. This is hard for gender feminists who are being made redundant, both culturally and literally, in their unwillingness to address new audiences or reference points outside of their tumblr- and twitter-echo chambers as their traditional domain falls into the sea around them. Of course it's hard. It's probably intense, painful stuff for some young kids, some older women.

But it's unstoppable. A new generation of egalitarians and humanists are finally aiming to instate a healthy cultural vocabulary, a language of community that was missing in the days of "feminist pride" and special interest groups led by a product-guide approach to conversation with a single presumed demographic.

This means that over just the last few years, the real world focuses on personal experiences and independent people, not approval-hungry obeisance to the demands of a loud minority. It's not about 'equality' anymore. It's not about telling people what to think, it's about providing spaces for people to discuss what (and whom) they want.

These straw man 'social justice' conversations people have been having are largely the domain of a prior age, when all they did was negotiate feels and Patreon and scraped to be called 'oppressed', because they had the same powerlessness complex as their audience had. Now part of an equality feminist job in a creative, human medium is to help curate a creative community and an inclusive culture — and a lack of commitment to that just looks out-of-step, like a partial compromise with the howling trolls who've latched onto 'social justice' as the flag in their onslaught against evolution and inclusion.

Men and women alike want interactions about more things, and interaction with more people. We want — and we are getting, and will keep getting — tragicomedy, vignette, musicals, dream worlds, family tales, ethnographies, abstract art. We will get this, because we're creating culture now. We are refusing to let anyone feel prohibited from participating.

"Feminist" isn't just a dated demographic label that most people increasingly prefer not to use. Feminists are over. That's why they're so mad.

These obtuse shitslingers, these wailing hyper-victims, these childish internet-arguers — they are not my audience. They don't have to be yours. There is no 'side' to be on, there is no 'debate' to be had.

There is what's past and there is what's now. There is the role you choose to play in what's ahead.

If pictures of “perfect” women cause self-hate and eating disorders, then why not men?

Peter Lloyd · 24 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

When John Prescott revealed that he had bulimia, the world laughed. Yes, eating disorders are funny. Who knew? The former Deputy Prime Minister [of the United Kingdom] had revealed his struggle, no doubt hoping to help others blighted by the condition.

But one award-winning political commentator declared a misdiagnosis, saying Prescott was “more likely just a greedy incompetent, who gobbled every treat going.”

This wasn’t an isolated jibe. Feminist website Jezebel produced a “What Prezza Was Eating … Daily Guidelines For Men”—complete with fat and carbohydrate content. Would women be spoken about like this? Would it be tolerated? No way.

I thought back to Prescott’s revelation in 2008 during the recent uproar over Victoria’s Secret, which launched an advertising campaign called The Perfect Body, showcasing the variety of underwear it sells.

Women were outraged, it seems, because all the models were lithe and toned. US advertising trade publication Adweek reported that within days of posters going up, 10,000 people had signed a petition demanding the company “apologise for and amend the irresponsible marketing of your new bra range.”

Complainants said the advert played on women’s insecurities, sent out damaging messages, and failed to celebrate diversity.

Can you imagine if men made a similar response to the David Gandy posters for Marks & Spencer?

Many of the same women who later went on to denounce Victoria’s Secret used their newspaper columns to leer at the images in ways that would make a builder blush. “Well done M&S on that autumn ad campaign. I’ve spent most of the past fortnight alternately lusting over David Gandy in his pants and that orange coat. But mainly David Gandy,” said one.

A broadsheet interviewer spent an entire article making jokes such as: “I’ve just buried my face in David Gandy’s underpants … it was heaven.” And one famous feminist added: “It’s nice to see that objectification sometimes runs both ways.”

Uproar: When Victoria's Secret launched a campaign called The Perfect Body, women were outraged.

But a diet of David Beckham and Gandy, or whichever Hollywood muscle man of the moment is gracing the cover of Men's Health, is unarguably as damaging to male self-perception as The Perfect Body is to females.

More than 1.6 million Britons suffer an eating disorder, ten percent of whom are men. We have to contend with "bigorexia," which sees men pump their bodies with hormones and protein shakes to get a bigger chest and arms.

One leading rugby coach told me that anabolic steroid abuse was endemic among teenage players, desperate to emulate the muscular physiques of their sporting heroes.

And at least two British teenage boys have died over the past few years after taking the banned slimming pill called DNP. One was apparently trying to get a "six-pack."

Ultimately, there is a wider malaise surrounding male health in general. Not only is there a lack of empathy for our health concerns, there is also a lack of medical care. For example, women are screened for breast, ovarian, and cervical cancer, which is great. But there's no screening program for prostate cancer, even though it kills four times more men than cervical cancer does women.

Labour peer John Prescott was openly mocked after he revealed he had bulimia in 2008.

Research from Cancer Research UK illustrates that men are 16 percent more likely to develop every form of unisex cancer in the first place, then 40 percent more likely to die from it. Despite cases of oral cancer having risen by 50 percent among UK men since 1989—accounting for almost 2,000 deaths annually—there is no vaccination for young men against HPV, which causes it.

Between 2007 and 2012, NHS Primary Care Trusts in the London boroughs of Haringey, Hammersmith and Fulham, Brent, and Camden "spent £4,830,095 commissioning women's services outside the NHS … and nothing on men's." It's a trend that is visible nationally, with female care almost constantly ranked above that of men.

Rather than being the subject of sympathetic public concern or the odd fundraising gala, men are repeatedly told it's all their fault. But in truth, men aren't dying sooner because they're ignorant or proud.

When men don't discuss their health concerns it's not because they're wired this way—it's because if they say anything, they'll be greeted with shaming tactics to stop them, just like Prescott.

I shall leave it to Dr. Timothy Spector, Professor of Genetic Epidemiology at London's King's College, to summarize: "Compared to women, men have shorter markers of longevity, called telomeres—suggesting there'll always be a biological difference [which justifies the need for men to get greater care]. The state needs to realise men are discriminated against by the set-up of the current UK system." I couldn't have said it better myself.

#WhiteRibbonDay – Australian counselor Paul Batey on toxic messages

AVfM Video Source · 24 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

We may seem top-heavy on videos today on AVfM but we think it's important that everyone in Australia, and elsewhere in the world, see these interviews on White Ribbon Day.

Paul Batey works as a professional counselor concentrating almost entirely on men and men's issues. Check out what he has to say:

Barry Williams of the Lone Fathers Association

AVfM Video Source · 24 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In honor of White Ribbon Day, we thought it was a good time to re-run our interview with Australia's legendary Barry Williams, founder of the Lone Fathers Association. A survivor of domestic abuse, a Federal lobbyist in Australia, and founder of what may just be the largest charity to help abused men (and women) in the world:

Australia, you need to know who Barry Williams is. He's an important part of your history and an inspiring pioneer, dedicated to helping all the victims of domestic violence, especially the children.

White Ribbon Australia lies – Interview with Dr. Greg Canning

AVfM Video Source · 24 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Australia's Dr. Greg Canning says it's time to stop the lies: domestic violence is not a problem of men against women, it's people against each other, and it's children who suffer most.

White Ribbon Canada cashes in on the suffering of children

Paul Elam · 25 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

We have spent the last two days in full swing exposing the lies, corruption, and profiteering that are an ongoing part of White Ribbon Australia.

We have discovered that half of their $2M+ income is lining the pockets of a very small group of promotion hucksters and that exactly zero $ are going into the provision of services for victims of domestic violence.

During our information campaign, we have also alluded several times to the fact that a similar—no, identical—situation is happening in Canada.

Canada is one of the world's leading strongholds for feminist ideology, which is to say it is a world-leading stronghold for corruption and avarice that rakes in cash in the name of ending violence while doing precisely the opposite of that.

Even as that nation pretends to seek an end to violence (but only that which occurs against women), it actually promotes violence against men and children who have no one to defend them from the abuses of violent mothers and wives. It is engaged in an active campaign to hide the horrors of those abusive mothers from public view so it can make more money.

A great deal of the enabling of the abuse of Canadian children is done through the White Ribbon Foundation. White Ribbon is an organization known to promote lies about the nature, incidence, and consequences of family violence so that it can conduct fundraising efforts by promoting a debunked and discredited gendered model of the problem.

And, just as we have found in Australia, its record of public accounting reveals that White Ribbon Canada is nothing more than a racket, collecting and pocketing large sums of money while actually providing no services whatsoever to victims of violence in the home.

According to Canadian law, a charitable institution may not pay out more than 50% of gross revenue in the form of salaries and benefits. As you can see by the numbers in this report, the Canadians skated in just within the limits of the law. They even had close to 50k to spare before crossing the legal line. Expect to see this oversight corrected in the next financial statement, which we will be publishing on this date one year from now.

While White Ribbon Canada meets the "legal" requirements on how much of their fundraising they can stuff into the pockets of 11 employees, they do share some other common attributes with their Australian counterparts.

One, they are raising money with lies that result in child abuse and other forms of violence in the home going ignored. And two, they are using the academic fraud of intimate partner violence (IPV) as a gendered issue to get the job done.

They are manipulating and exploiting the basic decency of the Canadian people with false information in order to elicit their financial assistance in operating a scam. And they are willfully demonizing men in the process.

An example:

It may be time for Canada to consider a new name. Flimflamistan comes to mind, though I am not too sure being cutesy with the verbiage is the right message. White Ribbon Canada is a vile plague of deceit that intentionally leaves children who are horrifically abused by their mothers in the lurch.

AVfM investigators will be compiling dossiers in the upcoming year on all individuals profiting from White Ribbon Campaigns across the globe and will be using the information to run featured articles on their activities. We will be starting our campaign of correction a month early to ensure that our global readers have full awareness of who is involved and making money from this nefarious bilking of sympathy money across the Western world, just as we will be exposing White Ribbon's plans to expand operations into several countries worldwide.

By this time next year, you will not only know the complete details of the lies they are telling, but you will also have personal portfolios on the liars themselves.

The frauds will become household names, but not in the ways they have ever expected.

White Ribbon Campaigns: Promoting medieval chivalry

Peter Wright · 25 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The "Enterprise of the Green Shield with the White Lady" (Emprise de l'Escu vert à la Dame Blanche) was a chivalric order founded by Jean Le Maingre and 12 knights in 1399, committing themselves for the duration of five years. Inspired by the ideal of courtly love, the stated purpose of the order was to guard and defend the honor, estate, goods, reputation, fame, and praise of all ladies, including widows. It was an undertaking that earned the praise of protofeminist Christine de Pizan.

Foundation

According to his Livre des faits, in 1399 Jean Le Maingre, tired of receiving complaints from ladies, maidens, and widows oppressed by powerful men bent on depriving them of the lands and honors, and finding no knight or squire willing to defend their just cause, out of compassion and charity founded an order of 12 knights sworn to carry "a shield of gold enamelled with green and a white lady inside" (une targe d'or esmaillé de verd and tout une dame blanche dedans). The 12 knights, after swearing this oath, affirmed a long letter explaining their purpose and disseminated it widely in France and beyond her borders.

The letter explained that any lady young or old finding herself the victim of injustice could petition one or more or the knights of the "Enterprise of the Green Shield with the White Lady" for redress and that knight would respond promptly and leave whatever other task he was performing to fight the lady's oppressor personally. The 12 knights promised not just this, however. They offered also to release any other knight from a vow requiring him to fight a duel before a judge. The letter was signed 11 April 1399 by Jean Le Maingre, Charles d'Albret, Geffroi Le Maingre, François d'Aubrecicourt, Jean de Lignères, Chambrillac, Castelbayac, Gaucourt, Chasteaumorant, Betas, Bonnebaut, Colleville, and Torsay.

Symbols

The emblem of the order was a shield of gold enamelled with green and a white lady inside. It seems reasonable to believe that the dame blanche represented the purity of women, which the knights of the order were to protect; what the green background signified is not so clear. That white and green were sometimes associated together in connection with the observances of May is shown by an account, in Hall's Chronicle, of a "maying" of Henry VIII of England, in which the company was clad in green on one occasion and in white on another. In Machyn's Diary, too, there is mention of a white and green Maypole around which danced a company of men and women wearing "baldrykes" of white and green.

The Enterprise of the Green Shield with the White Lady bears a striking resemblance to the so-called "White Ribbon Campaigns" of today in places like Canada and Australia that require men, as was required of the medieval knights above, to pledge oaths to "Never to condone or remain silent about violence towards women and girls" and especially to intervene when learning of any male behaving badly toward a female. The continuity of chivalry in these two examples is worthy of study in itself.

28 Harvard law professors come out in defense of due process for students

Pierce Harlan · 25 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

For the first time in recent years—since long before the Department of Education's draconian "Dear Colleague" letter in April 2011—it has become respectable to champion the due process rights of college men accused of sexual assault.

On October 15, 2014, a letter was published in The Boston Globe signed by 28 Harvard law professors that voiced strong objections to the school's one-sided, feminist-inspired sexual misconduct policies. At the time, we said: "This letter is the single most important statement to date about American colleges' hostility to due process when it comes to men accused of sexual misconduct." All of a sudden, this became a hot issue. Professor Alan Dershowitz, a titan of criminal jurisprudence, told Time magazine*:* "Harvard's policy was written by people who think sexual assault is so heinous a crime that even innocence is not a defense." Then, he clarified his opposition to Harvard's sexual assault policies: "It's really not a criticism of Harvard," he said. "It's a criticism of the federal government. It's a criticism of the Obama administration."

He added, "These rules are written to preclude a defense" for accused students.And that was only the beginning. In the past week, we've seen the floodgates open. Finally.The New York Times suddenly discovered there's another side to the story in "New Factor in Campus Sexual Assault Cases: Counsel for the Accused." That one followed quickly on the heels of Yale law professor Jed Rubenfeld's indictment of the system in The New York Times: "Mishandling Rape."

David Bernstein in The Washington Post has a perceptive piece called "Three questions about the legality of the Obama Administration's anti-sexual assault on campus policies."

The Daily Aztec takes issue with the "yes means yes" law in "Consent bill hinders judicial rights."

Law student Michael Shammas has a surprisingly perceptive piece on Huffington Post: "To Harvard and Other Universities: In Protecting Students From Sexual Assault, Don't Disregard Due Process."

In The Stanford Daily, Neil Chaudhary says the system is broken: "Realigning universities' paralegal sexual assault systems."

The Star-Ledger has an excellent editorial: "College sex crime investigations violate rights of men, too."

In The Wesleyan Argus, Bryan Stascavage has some interesting ideas as he calls for schools to take a balanced approach in "Understanding Title IX: Addressing Misperceptions about Sexual Assault."

In The Diamondback, Patrick An paints a frightening picture of injustice in "A fair judicial system cannot be forgotten: The revised Sexual Misconduct Policy contains potential legal injustices."

Gil Smart has a humorous take on the hysterics in connection with the Jessica Valenti—Wendy McElroy debate: "Assaulted by an opinion." We wrote about that debate here.

The Australian has a biting piece on feminist excesses: "Women's lib no longer on agenda of today's authoritarian feminists."

Domestic violence Woozles (factoids) in Australia

Beverley Armitage · 25 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In order to tackle any problem, we need to know the extent of it and the reasons for it. The 2012 Australian Bureau of Statistics (ABS) survey reports domestic violence levels at about 7% of the population and that two-thirds of the victims are women. However, it also reports that there has been a dramatic (175%) increase in men as victims since 2005 (93% by women). Further, two women and one man are killed in domestic homicides each fortnight.

Politicians, police, and women's organizations have spread the following Woozle far and wide:

DV is the leading cause of death and injury for women aged under 45.

Wow! We are led to believe that women are dropping like flies due to domestic violence. Therefore, it would be considered the truth by those who formulate policy and domestic violence law. This leads to even more skewed legislation and policies. The extensive media coverage also always includes this Woozle, which is actually drawn from two VicHealth reports:

> Intimate partner violence is responsible for more ill-health and premature death in Victorian women under the age of 45 than any other of the well-known preventable risk factors, including high blood pressure, obesity and smoking. [1]

and

> In Victoria, intimate partner violence contributes nine per cent to the total disease burden of women aged 15 to 44 years. This makes it the leading contributor to illness, disability and premature death for this group, outstripping other known risk factors including obesity, high cholesterol, high blood pressure and illicit drug use [2]

This percentage is dwarfed by other causes as it is slightly less than one-tenth of the total. Further reading of these reports uncovers that a percentage of mental illness is because of domestic violence, though we are not told how much, but another report states:

> Among the younger women, sole mothers were more likely than other women to have experienced suicidal thoughts and self-harm. Among the younger and mid-age women, sole mothers were more than twice as likely to have experienced depression, and had significantly poorer psychological health and used medication for depression [3]

No men here, but single mothers obviously are a significant contributor to the mental illness burden since lone-parent families comprise 15% of all families, with single-mother families making up the vast majority of lone-parent families (83%).

When all this is considered, the truth is something quite different.

Domestic violence does not make the list of the top causes of death and illness.

For women under 45, the top causes of death and illness are:

1. anxiety and depression
2. migraines
3. type 2 diabetes
4. asthma
5. schizophrenia

Clearly, although domestic violence is a problem, it is not of the scale that the media, politicians, police, and women's organizations claim. Exaggeration and distortion of the facts will not contribute to solving or reducing domestic violence. Also unhelpful is treating men as perpetrators only. This allows one-third of the domestic violence problem—that is, violence perpetrated by females—to be completely ignored.

Actions

I have sent the following to Media Watch ABC, the Australian Press Council, Independent Media Council, FreeTV, and ACMA (Australian Communications and Media Authority) (contacts given below):

The following Woozle (factoid) has been widely disseminated in the media:

"DV is the leading cause of death and injury for women aged under 45."

This is incorrect, as the VicHealth report says:

"In Victoria, intimate partner violence contributes nine per cent to the total disease burden of women aged 15 to 44 years. This makes it the leading contributor to illness, disability and premature death for this group, outstripping other known risk factors including obesity, high cholesterol, high blood pressure and illicit drug use."

Something quite different.

DV does not make the list of the top causes of death and illness.
For women under 45, these are:

1. Anxiety & Depression 2. Migraine 3 .Type 2 diabetes 4. Asthma 5. Schizophrenia.

Media should stop disseminating, correct, withdraw and/or publish the correct wording from the VicHealth report.

This Woozle (factoid) is factually incorrect and breaches the code of conduct.

There is strength in numbers, and I urge others to also send an email (as suggested) to these peak bodies (mostly) and Media Watch (as it is more likely to get TV time).

Grasping at the shirttails of #shirtstorm: Blaming men in academia

Flavio Biando · 25 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Across the Internet and in the dominant media, there has been a constant drumbeat about how the sciences are inherently sexist, in particular the STEM sciences. In recent years, most of this attention has focused on engineering, information technology, and mathematics. The social sciences, which always envied the "hard sciences," seems to be desperate to receive the same attention.

It turns out that archaeology is in the grips of a terrible wave of sexism. Or at least this is what a series of recent studies by self-proclaimed feminists in anthropology claim.

I am an anthropologist. More specifically, I am an archaeologist. In the United States, most archaeologists are based in anthropology departments. Over my career, I have had female professors, mentors, and colleagues whom I have respected. This makes sense, as archaeology is attracting an ever-increasing number of young women. The problem with archaeology—and every other discipline, for the matter—is that there are not enough academic jobs for the massive oversupply of freshly minted PhDs every year. So what is a young person who is having trouble finding a job or succeeding in their career supposed to do?

You guessed it. Blame the patriarchy!

Or at least this is what a number of feminist anthropologists decided to blame. "If I don't succeed," they claim, "it's the men's fault." Just like Anita Sarkeesian or Rebecca Watson, the cries of these damsels in distress have generated a lot of attention, helping to advance their careers. The most recent researcher attempting to make this bold career move is Dana Bardolph. Is this the dawning of Archaeology+?

In a recent study titled "A critical evaluation of recent gendered publishing trends in American archaeology" in American Antiquity, the flagship journal for archaeologists based in North America, Bardolph claims that gender inequality is rampant in archaeology. In the Science Daily press release on the paper, she starts off describing her experiences at a field-school in New Mexico as an undergraduate. A field-school is an ongoing research project like an excavation at which students get training in field methods and professors get free labor. (In fact, it's better than that for the profs. The students pay to be there!)

According to the press release at Science Daily:

> On an archaeology field trip in New Mexico as an undergraduate in 2006, Dana Bardolph noticed something that struck her as an odd gender imbalance: The professor leading the dig was a man, while the graduate assistant and all but two of the 14 undergrads were women. "And it just got me thinking," Bardolph recalled. "Is this reflective of the profession as a whole, or is it an anomaly?"

The assumption here is simple. Since most of the students appear to be female, but (presumably) most working archaeologists are male, then it has to be the case that there are discriminatory practices in the discipline filtering out women. What does this mean regarding the researcher running the excavation? His position as the head of the project had nothing to do with his education, qualifications, or successful grant applications. Bardolph implies that the reason he has successfully pursued his career can be explained by something else entirely. As a man in our society, he is privileged. He did not build a career and earn his position. Instead, society granted it to him based on an arbitrary and unfair criterion.

Now, someone not viewing the scene through the filter of feminism might see something that Bardolph is missing. They might ask a very different question: Where are the men? Why aren't there more male graduate and undergraduate students? There certainly is a gender imbalance, but it clearly favors women. This situation parallels the systematic sexism against men and boys in education described by Christina Hoff Sommers and Jonathan Taylor (and here). It also suggests that in the future, male academic archaeologists may become increasingly rare.

So how did Bardolph decide to expose the dark sexism at the heart of archaeology? Well, she approached the problem as a scientist, for which she should be commended. She examined 4,552 articles from 11 archaeological journals between 1990 and 2013. Her results are genuinely startling. Across the board, there is a ~3 to 1 ratio of journals authored (or first authored) by men compared to those authored (or first authored) by women. Even more intriguing, this ratio has been stable over the past 30 years.

This sounds bad, doesn't it? Obviously, this confirms Bardolph's field-school intuition that men are privileged in archaeology. What else could explain it?

Except that male privilege does not explain this ratio. Bardolph has to make an interesting concession in the press release (and also the article):

> The journals don't track submissions by gender, so there's no way to tell if men are being favored explicitly, she said. Other studies, however, have found that men submit papers far more often than women do, with equal rejection rates among the genders.

I think this point conceded by the author should be repeated. There is no bias against women when it comes to selecting their manuscripts when competing against male authors. Women just submit fewer articles.

Blame the men! Patriarchy!

How does she attempt to support her claim that a woman's decision not to write or submit a paper is the fault of sexism? From the press release:

> Based on her research, Bardolph said she suspects the bias is likely a result of authorial behavior rather than editorial or reviewer bias. Women, she noted, are more likely to take on "nurturing" roles in academia and accept positions in smaller teaching colleges as opposed to large research universities with their more abundant resources.
> "When you have grad students you can collaborate with, you publish more than you would if you were doing everything by yourself," [Bardolph's adviser and an associate professor of anthropology, Amber] VanDerwarker said. "I spent a few years at a teaching college just struggling to keep up with the publication record."
> Another potential factor Bardolph noted is more subjective: braving the sometimes-brutal journal submission process. The anonymity of peer reviewers occasionally engenders harsh rejections. And archaeology, which has long been dominated by men, is no exception.
> "I think it's highly plausible that the issue of rejection and whether you do decide to revise and resubmit or discard the manuscript — has a lot to do with confidence issues," Bardolph said. "I wouldn't be surprised if that was in fact the case, that perhaps women were revising and resubmitting less often than men."

So, "harsh" rejection is the fault of men. Women choosing collaboration is the fault of men. Women lacking confidence is the fault of men. Is building a career hard? That, too, is the fault of men.

> For Bardolph, getting academia to acknowledge gender bias is just one step on a long road to equality. "People aren't really realizing this sort of inequality is still pervasive," she said.

Well, how credible are these claims about the culture of archaeology? First, observe that I am not writing this as a letter to American Antiquity, talking about it with my colleagues, or posting alternative views on social media. I am writing this under an assumed name at AVfM. In other words, it is incredibly risky even to gently question this narrative. Not only would I be an apostate, but I would also be an unemployed apostate.

More substantively, look at the people who self-elect to pursue anthropology as a career. A 2005 study by Daniel Klein and Charlotta Stern reported on at Inside Higher Ed found that anthropology and sociology are the least intellectually or ideologically diverse disciplines in the university. In terms of political partisanships, there is a 21.1 to 1 ratio of Democrats to Republicans. Furthermore, the brands of liberal to leftist perspectives in anthropology are indistinguishable from the blogs and "reporting" from the Social Justice Warriors of the Internet. Here is a brief list of titles from recent issues of American Anthropologist, the flagship journal of the American Anthropological Association:

1. Public Indigeneity, Language Revitalization, and Intercultural Planning in a Native Amazonian Beauty Pageant
2. Implementing Feminist Practice: A Conversation with Meg Conkey
3. Managing Labor and Delivery among Impoverished Populations in Mexico: Cervical Examinations as Bureaucratic Practice
4. Tacit Subjects: Belonging and Same-Sex Desire among Dominican Immigrant Men
5. Nimo's War, Emma's War: Making Feminist Sense of the Iraq War
6. Gender and Culture at the Limit of Rights
7. Gender Diversity in Indonesia: Sexuality, Islam and Queer Selves
8. Animacies: Biopolitics, Racial Mattering, and Queer Affect

Obviously, anthropology provides a hostile environment for women.

In fact, these titles would not be out of place on tumblr or at Atheism+. Maybe PZ Myers would find the acceptance and success in anthropology he has not found in biology. In such a one-sided and increasingly extreme political environment, how is it possible for all of these supposed sexists to be hired and to maintain this sexist culture?

While Bardolph admits that the distribution emerges due to the behavior of women, she still implies that this is an example of gender inequality and sexism. Following the traditional feminist logic, she claims that culture intervened at some point and made these women less competitive. In other words, they have "internalized" misogyny and patriarchy. Perhaps this could be the case. However, there is a lot of evidence to the contrary.

Consider this. It is well documented that men, especially young men, take far more risks on average than young women. In fact, this is true across cultures and makes sense evolutionarily. Males of most species have to engage in risky behaviors more often than females in order to have a chance to pass on their genes. In fact, females of many species preferentially mate with males who succeed at risky behaviors, from peacocks to Homo sapiens.

Submitting an article to your peers for scrutiny is risky. Maybe men are more willing to take the risk.

Furthermore, women often express different preferences in their career and personal life than men do. A recent study by Lubinski et al. reported at Science Daily confirms this difference. This 40-year study of mathematically gifted men and women found roughly comparable levels of satisfaction with their work. However, men tended to have higher salaries and more senior positions in their respective fields. Why? On average, the men in the study worked 11 hours more per week than the women. The women in the study preferred flexibility prioritized a work/home life balance.

Bardolph remarks on a similar trend in female archaeologists. However, she blames sexism. She does not consider the alternative. Maybe the male authors in this sample simply put in more hours for longer periods of time. Maybe they placed their careers first and were happier about the choice than most women were.

Between a willingness to take risks and hard work, do we need the patriarchy to explain this difference in publication rates? The more parsimonious answer is "No!" There is no need to claim that there is a millennium-old conspiracy (patriarchy!) to keep women from leading archaeological excavations and publishing their results.

However, as women are our students and colleagues, how would I suggest that we encourage women to engage more meaningfully with the field and to move beyond these immature feelings of resentment?

Academia is increasingly feminized. Consensus and sensitivity to others' feelings is valued over accomplishment. In other words, the reason that women as a group do not publish as much as men as a group is not caused by a patriarchal homunculus hiding deep in the minds of all men and all women. Instead, the problem is caused by feminism itself. The feminist rejection and devaluing of all aspects of masculinity and masculine values hurts women in academia.

Open competition and rewarding accomplishments are seen as negative and hurtful in feminized departments. However, a publication in a prestigious journal is an accomplishment. It is something that you aspire to. Building a CV full of such articles is a goal. More than this, it is a competitive goal. Instead of rejecting these masculine virtues, maybe these women should let go of their gynocentric biases and reflexive resentment and embrace these positive aspects of male sociality.

What is the alternative to rewarding accomplishment? Should we have quotas in scientific journals? Perhaps Bardolph want decisions to publish to be based on the sex and racial or ethnic background of the author? This sounds like the suicide of scientific credibility.

Embracing positive male values would make far too much sense, though, wouldn't it? And it would not provide the clickbait to advance the careers of these charlatans. Bardolph is not well known as a paleobotanist. No, now she is well known as a feminist. Like the carpetbaggers at Atheism+ living in their Willy Wonka SJW fantasy world, this is her golden ticket to academic success.

> I never thought my life could be anything but catastrophe
> But suddenly I begin to see a bit of good luck for me
> Cause I've got a golden ticket
> I've got a golden twinkle in my eye
> I never had a chance to shine never a happy song to sing,
> But suddenly half the world is mine what an amazing thing
> Cause I've got a golden ticket.
> —Leslie Bricusse and Anthony Newley, "I've Got a Golden Ticket," from Willy Wonka and the Chocolate Factory (1971)

She and fellow opportunists have no choice but to go on and on about sexism in science. What is their evidence? A shirt and their own lack of accomplishment. If they had their way, what would the end result be? Will they actually drive women away from the field, away from taking a risk on sending their work in to be judged by their peers? If they do, they will never address the root of the problem—themselves.

Swedish news site called to task for misandry

William Andersson and Annelie Sjöberg · 26 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Note: As promised, here is the translation of the open letter written in Swedish from AVfM Sweden to news site Nyheter24, which originally appeared on AVfM's companion website in Sweden. This censure, too, is driving Swedish feminists crazy.—Eds.

Dear Nyheter24

How much dung will you be allowed to spew before anyone tells you off? Your web magazine with the in-context tasteless use of "news" in the title makes me sick.

Not a day passes without you publishing at least one article of radical feminist drivel. Pure, unadulterated opinion, sexist propaganda with only one goal: to paint half of the population as the worse gender and the other half as victims of structural oppression.

You reinforce, spread, and even create prejudices. Not one of your articles contains sound reasoning or solid arguments. You are probably (read arguably) one of the most horrific examples of a website that teachers should warn their students to avoid when sourcing information.

I could present countless articles published just within the last six months as perfect examples of how you contribute to the spreading of hate and contempt of a specific group based solely on outer attributes such as sex. There is a word for that: sexism. More specifically, in your case: misandry. And yet as you fuel the hate against one identifiable group of people in our society, you contribute to the division of people of different genders and ideological views. This in a time when we need to bridge that gap.

In what can only be a sick form of irony, you have started a rally to quell online hate while at the same time being the biggest web magazine to feed the flames of hate and contribute to the same division you claim to want to fight against. How much can you mock individual people (such as Marcus Birro) or a group based on sex (men) and avoid any form of scrutiny or responsibility? A lot, it would appear. Your victims, on the other hand, do not get to show you their grief, despair, or anger. If they do, you throw yourselves to the ground and yell for mommy prosecutor and daddy court, who will undoubtedly come to your aid as quickly as possible. Yes, the comment was dumb and tasteless. Maybe it even deserved to be sentenced. We have no opinion on that. Not all people are mature enough to express their anger and frustration in a nice way. But everyone can feel it. You can, your so-called reporter Irene Pozar could have chosen to view it that way. Show compassion. Especially as the comment came as a response to a chronicle that was very offensive and belittling towards the one sentenced. But not you. You don't believe in that kind of justice. Instead, you proudly proclaim that you have gotten an online bully sentenced.

Most normal people can see the double standard. That I can promise. The double standard you pretend to be blind towards. The one the justice system is completely blind to. Yet you have no understanding. No pardon. Yet you demand it. And like a mafia boss you keep gorillas who with brute force make sure you get what you want. That the gorilla is a prosecutor paid by the state makes no difference. Does it feel good to bully people from under the protection of our feminist state's wide skirt? Do you feel warm and safe under there?

I realize this is your business plan. To spread this hate and juicy gossip about the innocent. You know what gets you clicks, and since you are on "the good side" you get a lot of advertisers. I doubt that your idealistic conviction runs deeper than that. Start a gossip magazine, employ some hungry, young and angry feminist "reporters," laugh all the way to the bank at the people whose lives get shattered. Well aware that this article is likely to give you more traffic, I feel it is legitimate and necessary to inform about this. Especially young readers, who believe you stand for something other than what you actually do. The usual. Money.

Or do you serve other purposes as well? More political ones? If so, then own it and account openly for those who finance your poisoning of the Swedish youth.

Tweet reads: “@ladydahmer Article is now published. ”

Linked article reads: After misogyny — spokesman for masculine initiative is removed

The connections to the big feminist kingpins are obvious

There are not many readers of Nyheter24 that really support their sick views. However, they more or less unconsciously support the newspaper that spreads them. You who go there and read the filth, is this really the kind of media you want replacing the old ones? Do you want new ones that are even worse? Think about it and realize that even if you are not actively paying anything to read the dung, you do so with your mere presence.

AVfM Sweden also received many visitors yesterday. This is because we showed an example of the apparent hypocrisy Nyheter24 represents. The difference is that we do not promote hatred towards either men, women, or specially designated victims to receive visitors. We reveal those who do. Nor do we bully people or create false campaigns against hate on the web. All we need to do is to write the truth. We are convinced that it is more popular among the readers than even gossip, filth, and conflicts.

We are convinced that it is media like us who strive never to deviate from the truth and do not shy away from it even if it is inconvenient or politically incorrect—they are tomorrow’s winners in the media industry. People are tired of the lies, hypocrisy, and sanitized reality. They want to know the truth. That is the kind of journalism we want to create. The kind of journalism we will create as we get the resources to do so.

However, we have no advertisers queuing up to advertise here. But that day will come. All it takes is just enough people who understand the difference between hatred and opposition to hate. The difference between equality and feminism. As more and more victims of the policies are raising their voices in protest, we are approaching that point with increasing speed.

We are what we are called: a voice for men. This is because it is necessary in a time when there is no pre-existing voice. We take up men's issues. Highlight, inform, and teach. We also want to expose the rotten core of today's policies and the great social costs it creates. Not least in the form of suffering. This does not mean that we are a voice for masculinization or traditionalism. Nor the voice of other ideological dogmas. Rather, common sense and balance.

Who knows? One day maybe the Swedish advertisers will reward such a purpose rather than the speculative trashy gossip, hate, sexism, and bullying. It sure would be a gift to pray about. The day that happens, sites like Nyheter24 will meet their maker.

Karen Straughan (aka GirlWritesWhat) · 26 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Time magazine recently ran a poll, as it has done annually for the past few years, asking readers what words they’d like to see stricken from the cultural lexicon. In years past, successful contenders were “YOLO,” “OMG,” and “twerk.”

This year’s winner by a billion miles, earning three times as many votes as its runner-up, was the word “feminist.”

In contextualizing the inclusion of this particular word, Time wrote:

> You have nothing against feminism itself, but when did it become a thing that every celebrity had to state their position on whether this word applies to them, like some politician declaring a party? Let’s stick to the issues and quit throwing this label around like ticker tape at a Susan B. Anthony parade.

Reaction from feminists was swift and predictable. Outrage. Umbrage. Boycotts. Militancy.

Why, it’s almost like feminists are unable to read or something, since they seem to have failed to absorb the first sentence of the disclaimer, which flat-out states, “You have nothing against feminism itself, but….”

For myself, I voted to “ban feminist” when I stumbled across the poll, and I too am guilty of disregarding that initial clause in the description. In fact, I was forced to disregard the entirety of it because I disagree with the entirety of it. I do have something against feminism—many many somethings, in fact, which I will itemize further on. And, as I happen to have something(s) against feminism, I am fully in favor of celebrities openly stating their political position in favor of or against it, the same way I’d prefer to know if that thing slithering among the pole beans in my garden is a harmless garter snake or something more sinister.

But the disclaimer itself, clearly stating agreement with feminism’s principles (such as they are purported to be) and its goals (however dubious) but rather an objection to its irresponsible use in media, ought to have served to defuse any feminist wrath over the inclusion of the word in the poll. That it did not speaks volumes about feminism and feminists. As did the poll results, and the desperate attempts by feminists to blame the entire debacle on that cesspit of White, straight male privilege known as 4chan.

In fact, the feminist response to the poll only serves to reinforce all the reasons I myself voted to “ban” it (as if words can or should actually be banned, and as if I would desire that). To make it clear, given the way the poll was set up to allow multiple votes, and even given my decidedly anti-feminist views, I only cast one vote myself.

So, some of my objections to feminism include:

1) It cannot handle challenge or criticism of itself, or its premises, goals, and assumptions.

I think the reaction by many feminists to the poll proves this point better than any anti-feminist ever could. After all, the justification provided by Time explicitly excluded disagreement with feminism, and specifically stipulated disagreement with the irresponsible use of it in a celebrity context.

2) It is populated by bullies who react with coercive tactics to any challenge (or even skepticism) of its precepts or criticism of its followers’ behavior.

Forcing an apology and retraction from Time for daring to include the word “feminist” demonstrates this tendency quite neatly. Step out of line and you’d better issue a tearful apology or next week you could find yourself at a soup kitchen or applying for jobs at McD’s.

3) It is based on emotional reasoning, delusions of persecution, and projection of ill intent. Never attribute a charitable or individuated intention to anything a man (or the system) does when a malicious and collective one can be applied.

"… Rape is nothing more or less than a conscious process by which all men keep all women in a state of fear."—Susan Brownmiller
"… Intercourse is the pure, sterile, formal expression of men's contempt for women."—Andrea Dworkin

Despite the explicitly stated justification of "feminist"'s inclusion in the poll, the reaction was that the intention was profoundly different from what was stated. Just as heterosexual intercourse, the means by which all sexually reproducing species procreate, is not a simple biological reality but a conspiracy to subjugate women, and just as the reprehensible criminal act of a single rapist is not the act of a (typically damaged and dysfunctional) individual but a conscious collective effort on the part of all men to terrorize all women, this poll (and its result) was much more than a mere expression of cultural exhaustion to the constant demands that celebrities "pick a side" or justify their ambivalence or opposition to the feminist position. It is nothing more or less than a conscious effort to undermine feminism and reverse the gains women/feminists have made.

While I would assume that many who voted for "feminist" did so not because of the justification provided but because they view feminism as an unhealthy, divisive, and damaging ideology, none of this points to any popular view that women are or should be considered inferior or that anyone wants to "turn back the clock."

4) If there's a man around, blame him and his misogyny, or the misogyny of the "male-dominated patriarchy." Whatever you do, don't engage in self-examination.

4chan is, as far as I know, predominantly male. Regardless of the actual demographic breakdown, it is perceived as a male space, and one that is hostile to women.

Despite numerous opportunities over the past few years for feminists to critically examine the behavior of their sisters, to reconsider their claims and their rhetoric, to adjust their beliefs and consider evidence that challenges them, whenever someone (or a bunch of someones) expresses dissatisfaction with or criticism of feminism, the go-to response is to shift the blame onto men and their misogyny.

#Notyourshield is allegedly nothing but White, straight men creating sock puppet accounts to spew hatred of women or marginalized "Uncle Toms" who've internalized the misogyny and racism of the White, straight, male-dominated culture. It couldn't possibly be that many women and minorities are sick to death of feminism's divisive and polarizing rhetoric and tactics.

Paul Elam's article, a clearly stated satirical work written to highlight Jezebel's genuine and febrile celebration of female-on-male intimate partner violence, is proof that he's not only a misogynist but also a misogynist who promotes male violence against women. (There are simply too many feminist references to this particular article with the intention of vilifying Elam, AVoiceforMen.com, and all MRAs to link to.)

5) Authoritarianism.

Need I say more? In the past week, a genius who landed a space probe on a comet was bullied into a tearful apology over him wearing a shirt that was no more offensive than this one:

A month or so ago, a major news site, Forbes, was bullied into firing William Frezza over an article in which he expressed concern over the liability university men face when drunk women knock on the frat house door. The number of men who've been forced to step down from prominent positions because they offended feminist sensibilities (even, or perhaps especially, when their claims were backed up by evidence) are too copious to mention.

And here we see Time backing down from its moderate stance, due to the authoritarian leanings of feminist activists who will brook no questioning.

Without even going into my objections to the problems inherent to feminist doctrine, which I contend are unfalsifiable, biased, evidence-resistant, and wrong-headed, and only concentrating on their tactics, feminists themselves have managed to reinforce every one of my opinions with their response to the Time poll. They have only served to bolster my anti-feminism and to demonstrate the very reasons why so many people voted to ban the word "feminist."

Here's hoping they keep up the good work.

Ignoring lesbian and gay male victims of domestic violence

AVfM Video Source · 26 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

People who care about “violence against women” rarely bother mentioning violence in lesbian relationships, let alone gay male victims. One British group is trying to change that. Good for them.

Now let’s hope they care about gay men’s experiences with as much passion.

Five questions for feminists and other self-proclaimed social justice warriors “battling” gamers

Jack Goodfellow · 26 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editor’s note: This article is also available in Romanian.

To my own mental detriment, I stumbled upon a website where a massive group of feminists and social justice warriors were discussing this thing called #gamergate and some girl named Anita and all that. First, I am—as Cedric the Entertainer used to say—grown. By this I mean that I have a job and an education, I do not tolerate nicknames, my time on a computer is spent either working or reading or playing chess (I guess that’s a video game), and my only concern at this point is that I do nothing that will leave this Earth worse than the way I found it. Forget change, forget hope, forget ideology and silliness—I just don’t want to fuck the place up. You know, grown.

Here’s the thing about being grown. Your patience for certain things that younger people offhandedly say wears thinner with each passing year. It’s not anything in particular—let’s call it a tone that some young people, especially the social-justice-minded young people, take that is so frustrating that I literally want to pull out the hair that I no longer have.

I’ll give you an example. In this pit-of-sorrow website full of blabbering idiots that I made the mistake of entering, one young man who looked no older than sixteen described this little video game issue going on as a “battle.” He fawned over some girl named Anita, who he claimed was “going to battle against misogyny.”

I have nothing against anyone who enjoys video games. Young or old, for some I can imagine that it is an important part of their lives. I know little about this whole #gamergate thing other than what I read in a few articles, but it seems to me as though the people who are really devoted to games are not happy because they are the most recent to be singled out by the “Social Justice League” to be vilified and called terrible and evil and every other name in the book for doing and pursuing what they enjoy. Being that so many are young and inexperienced and probably not great at formulating articulate responses, they have lashed out. Since social justice warriors seem to have only one real move in their repertoire—cry victim and sulk—they chose their most recent target wisely.

Alas, I am grown, so when a bunch of bullies (standing around and calling a bunch of kids evil for playing with their toys is the definition of bullying to me) get up and play this kind of game where they toss rocks while crying victim, the old man comes out of the front door and has to do what he has to do. So, social justice warriors and simp feminists, I have five questions for you. Try to answer them honestly, if you can.

1. Have you ever seen a real battle?

I was part of what was called IFOR (or Implementation Force) in 1995 /96. This was the expeditionary force that entered Bosnia (officially) after the signing of the Dayton Peace Accords. I was also part of SFOR (Stabilization Force). If you’re not familiar with this time in history, Serbians killed a lot of Muslims (Muslims killed some Serbians too and Croatians got in the mix as well). They (Serbian soldiers) raped men, women, and children. They abducted women, took them east, and kept them in houses where they were raped repeatedly by soldiers on R&R. They cut limbs off of men in front of their wives, off of wives in front of their husbands, and left them cripples for life—or if they felt like it, they’d feed them to pigs.

The primary killing area was a place called Srebrenica. I lived there for a while and spent about 16 hours a day, 6 days a week, for about 7 months in those towns with those people. I got there weeks after the last of the Muslims were killed. I was 20 years old.

Say what you want, talk how you like, but just understand that grown men (and women) who actually have been in the world and made our contributions hear you use the word “battle” in regards to picking on some kids who just want to be left alone to play their games and what we really hear are big kids too afraid and cowardly to take on the real issues falling back on faux crusades to extend their sad, little self-righteous childhoods a little longer.

When fathers were valued, this didn't happen so much. Silliness had a shelf life then. Now it just goes on forever.

So don't call this a battle. It makes the people who know what those are a little sick.

2. Have you ever touched or talked to a homeless person?

For the most part, homeless people are men. Also, studies have shown that more than 60% of homeless people suffer from brain damage, mental illness, or some other condition that makes it impossible for them to function without assistance in the same capacity that you or I do. You certainly don't know this, you proud warriors, but if you got up early in the winter and drove around to virtually every northern city in the country, you'd see that there are people who get up every morning and go around these cities handing out blankets and food. Unfortunately, in recent years, these efforts have been curbed in many parts of the country by local nonprofits that do not want to see their funds reduced because average citizens go out and do these things and since most of those funds go to shelters for women while most of the homeless are men … anyway, I made the rounds until my career made it impossible. I know a lot of other men who did, many of whom came from organized clubs such as the VFM and Rotary. You can walk right up to the doors of any of those types of organizations, knock twice, say you want to help, and I guarantee that you won't be turned away.

Before you go throwing that word "social" around, reach out one of your clean, smooth hands and touch one that's as rough as sandpaper and smells like shit—and do it with a smile. I mean, I may not believe it every time a young woman accuses the quarterback of the college football team of raping her and I may mention the fact that she wasn't arrested after admitting that it was a false rape accusation (ya know, like recently with Treon Harris at the University of Florida), but I have done that much, and many others who would never dare to call themselves "social justice feminist warriors" have as well. Catch up before you run around declaring that everyone else is terrible.

3. Can you define the word "justice"?

When I hear these people talk, they like to throw the words "minority" and "victim" and "oppressed" around. Who do you think African-American men living prior to 1965 feared more—White women or White men? To appropriate the legitimate struggle, often life-threatening struggles, of truly oppressed people in an effort to legitimize a series of complaints posed by privileged White women that quite honestly amount to "You haven't given us everything we ever wanted" is the very antithesis of justice.

Feminists have, at every turn, taken every measure to tear apart the relationships that held the African-American community together through what I can only imagine was a nightmare, all so that you can have never-ending accommodation and preference in all things at all times while crying woe-is-me, woe-is-me.

Maybe you need to lay off that word "justice."

4. Have you ever had to do something not because you wanted to but because you had to?

No one makes the argument that video game characters embody some vague, divisive, and unprovable theory because they have to, unless it is their own psychosis propelling them to do it. That's the action of someone playing an angle or killing time.

You're not fighting evil when the topic of discussion is video games. I don't care what you have to say.

The same is true if you are criticizing music or film or literature. Books are interesting and I'm sure that video games can be too, but if you think you are saving the world by pontificating on the ultimate never-ending power of shapes and colors on a television screen and how you are battling those shapes and colors and noise as a righteous social warrior, a card-carrying member of the "Justice League," all I can tell you, as a grown man, is that you are a child and not a promising one. You are just bothering people who found some enjoyment in an often cruel and painful world.

People with real experience of this world always prefer to watch people happy at play than in an argument. People without … you get it.

5. Have you ever met a man? Sometimes it doesn't seem as though you have.

The crux of the feminist argument is that men are inherently evil and undeserving of life. I know, you don't really believe that, except that you think we need to learn not to rape and you think that we are violent by nature and you think that we have conspired with one another for centuries to deprive you of your every desire, but you don't really think we're evil and undeserving of life. You just kind of say it for the goodies.

I have a mother just like every other man and I love her. I have a sister and I've had girlfriends and I have female colleagues whom I respect and admire. Do you really think that with the emotions men feel for the women in our lives that we want them to suffer in any way? The way feminists describe us, as terminally evil and terrible creatures, it is painful to hear. It's painful for men to be characterized as something we are not and then to have this same thing shouted at us anytime we try to speak up and make a point or describe the world that we see around us. It's just our perspective. We all get one.

Your only accomplishment as social warriors out to battle injustice and get more goodies and more of a hold on things that only someone with too much time would be concerned about is to diminish the honest concern that truly loving men have. These powder-puff male feminists who parrot everything the most attractive feminist around them says—how could they know what respect is? They either don't believe a word of it, have never really thought about it, or really don't care. The ones who actually listen, you hurt.

There are great women out there. Truly phenomenal people. They didn't get that way by worrying about the breast size of animated television characters. I imagine their responses and laugh.

Now step back and look at the young men you are attacking. They're adolescents for the most part. They're unwanted by their schools, uncertain of their futures, unsupported in their culture, and unloved by this modern brigade of radical feminists telling them they will grow up to be rapists and criminals and monsters. And when they retreat into a fantasy land, you chase them into it to harp on them some more and complain about the decorations. Are they perfect? Are they even entirely right? Of course not, but is this the fight you want to pick? This is the best example of misogyny you've got?

Settle the fuck down, get a job, volunteer, take a class where you learn a skill that doesn't involve emotionally assaulting the closest living target, stop using the word "battle" to describe anything you do other than taking a big shit, and make an actual contribution or just plain shut the fuck up. Or maybe just play!

Bonus question: What are you social justice warriors going to do when you have a real problem? Call it terrible and wait for it to make an empty threat? Think about it.

Why depressed men are dying for someone to talk to

Steve Jones · 26 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

On October 30, the Canadian Association for Equality and the University of Toronto Men's Issues Awareness Society hosted the second event in their two-part series on men's mental health, "Suicide and Men: Why depressed men are dying for someone to talk to," with speakers Aara Amey-Ayer and Julian Bachlow, mental health educators at the Canadian Mental Health Association. Happily, this event went off without disruption.

With media reports of a number of high-profile people succumbing to depression and eventual suicide, this talk was indeed timely. Bachlow bravely told of his own struggles with depression and suicidal thoughts, providing attendees an insight into this terrible affliction, while Amey-Ayer delivered an informative talk about depression and the state of mental health in Ontario, both generally and for men and boys specifically.

Suicide is tough to talk about, and this was at times quite an uncomfortable event. However, despite its taboo, suicide must be addressed. For many people, recognizing when someone is in distress can be challenging, and knowing how best to deal with it is even tougher, so the insights from these two speakers I've summarized below were invaluable.

Recognize the Signs
There are many signs that someone may be having thoughts of suicide. Lack of communication with friends, family, or colleagues or isolating oneself completely is common, as are expressions of loneliness or confusion.

Problems at school or work and not eating or skipping meals can also be signals, as can giving away personal items or costly belongings.

Suicide is not, as many people believe, a selfish act. Those contemplating ending their own life often feel as though they are a burden to family and friends. Completed suicide is not generally attempted regardless of the effect it would have on loved ones; rather, it is viewed as unburdening them.

Risk factors are varied: negative family experiences and early trauma as well as experiences in teenaged years often factor in. Although altered brain chemicals from either medical issues such as the onset of schizophrenia or side effects of medication may be a cause, often the reasons are more common, such as excessive stress, major life events such as divorce or loss, or frequent moves and uncertainty regarding the future.

Being able to recognize signs and risk factors can give you the opportunity to be there for that person.

Offer Support
It is often important for someone suffering severe depression to know that they are not alone in their struggles. Let them know that you are there for them. Try to remind them that this is a temporary setback, that the way they feel right now will change. Understand that they will not believe that their feelings will change, but try to assure them that this is the case.

Remind them that you care about what happens to them, and although you may not understand exactly what they are going through, you will be there to see them through this.

A depressed person will tend to dwell on negative thoughts, so it is important to get them to recognize and avoid this. Over-analyzing difficulties can be avoided by "mindfulness," being aware of the present surroundings. Encourage them to observe the world around them with fresh eyes, as a child seeing things for the first time. Another exercise for avoiding "sticky thoughts" is to consciously consider why these thought are sticking; is it helpful?

Above all, encourage them to reach out, and remind them that there is nothing wrong with being a self-advocate.

Men and Depression
Women tend to ask for help with depression in their teens, two-thirds earlier than when men seek help. As a result, troubles are often much more developed before a man seeks help. Unlike women, men tend to seek help after they are in crisis, after they have been arrested or post-divorce, for example. Men will often also express a preference to see male counsellors, which is another impediment: male counsellors are the exception in Canada (and other parts of the world).

While women tend to internalize their pain—eating disorders, for example—men are more likely to externalize. Anger, violence, and self-harm are more frequent. As a result, it is not always the best course of action to notify police when you are concerned. Although most police departments have some officers with mental health training, there is a potential for undesirable results. The incident will be recorded and can cause future issues with crossing international borders or issuing of visas. It is never a good idea to leave a severely depressed person alone; however, friends and family are a better option if the individual refuses to go to a hospital.

There have been many incidents of depressed men being charged with crimes as well. One incident described at the talk was of a man who had cut himself with a knife but then rethought his choice to try to end his life. When he ran into the street to seek help, police were called, and seeing that he still had the knife in his hand, he was charged with possession of a weapon. It is mostly men who are charged in such circumstances.

There are five priority groups with the Canadian Mental Health Association. LGBT, being particularly at risk, are at the top of that list. Although men tend to think and act on suicide more often, sadly, men are not a priority group.

Today, 43% of boys express unhappiness with their appearance and the number of boys with eating disorders is on the rise. There are high levels of PTSD among men. In the United States, two-thirds of the homeless are war veterans. There is also a high level of stigma among men regarding risk factors; men are rarely viewed as victims of violence but rather only perpetrators, for example. And although there is no data on uncompleted suicide, it is known that men and boys make up four times as many completed suicides as women and girls, and suicide is now the second leading cause of death in young men.

Not only are men not considered a priority, but there is also a serious lack of psychiatric services, leaving general practitioners to take up the shortfall. This is far from ideal, as GPs have a widely varying degree of experience and training in mental health.

Mental health services, especially for men, are severely lacking in Ontario—indeed, throughout Canada, the United States, and worldwide—and this is an issue that must be addressed. But until that situation is rectified, it is up to us to do whatever we can to help those around us who are suffering and in need.

Happy Thanksgiving

Paul Elam · 27 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It is Thanksgiving Day in America, which I realize is just another day in most parts of the world. It is also a day traditionally rooted in religious beliefs, which more or less leaves me just about as much a practical non-participant as it would many others.

Just the same, Thanksgiving is my absolute favorite American holiday. No exchanges of presents are required and except for an unusually high amount of frozen turkeys and cans of cranberry dressing in American supermarkets there is still no real overt commercialization of The Day.

For me, it is simply a day to stop and absorb for a moment the wonders in life that might (and all too often do) get taken for granted. The love and support of my family and friends. The gift of feeling like I am doing something with my life that matters, as messy and frustrating as that can be at times.

And even at the risk of being a tad schmaltzy, it is a day to stop and marvel at the awesomeness of life itself; the privilege of being a small bit of stardust that somehow evolved into something that could look at the infinite questions of existence and the universe with the capacity to wonder about what it means and to dream of possible answers.

And, oh yeah, to eat some really good food and take a leisurely afternoon nap.

I am indeed thankful for all of it. And I extend those thanks to you, wherever and whoever you are today, and my wishes that whatever matter of fate brought you to the pages of this website, that you too can take at least a moment to take stock of something to be grateful for in this crazy thing we call life.

The lunacy of a MGTOW litmus test

A Movember to remember

J.J. Kennedy · 28 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It's pretty hard to miss the Movember campaign. It's all over every mainstream media outlet as the annual "feel good" story about how society also cares about men's issues. And the mainstream media milks it for every drop. After all, that one month of the year has to balance out the other 11 months when society really doesn't give—"ahem"—a rat's ass about men's issues.

But with respect to Movember, the vehicle that briefly shines a spotlight on men's issues, it might be a good idea to get some history on the campaign, to better appreciate the endeavor despite any "mainstream media agenda."

Movember began in Australia, where, as is well known, the people there have an affinity for creating new lingo by abbreviating common words: they take the first part of a word and add an "o," "ai," "ie," or "y."(1) "Aussie" vernacular includes "barbie" for "barbecue," "deli" for "delicatessen," "footie" for "football," and "selfie," which has been embraced worldwide to mean a self-shot portrait photograph.(2) And, of course, "mo" for "mustache."

It was November 30, 1999, when Jennifer Ashcroft of Seven Nightly News aired a report about a group of men who had coined the term "Movember" as an initiative to grow mustaches to raise money for charity. The idea was sparked in a pub over a few beers, and the original group of about 80 men from Adelaide soon garnered widespread support across Australia. They also used the slogan "Whiskers for Whiskers" to campaign for money for the Australian RSPCA.(3)

In 2004, an unrelated group out of Melbourne came up with the idea of 30 men growing a mustache for 30 days as a campaign to raise awareness about prostate cancer and male depression. It is this second group of men who would eventually become the Movember Foundation.

Things got rolling for the second group when Travis Garone and Luke Slattery were talking over a beer at a local Melbourne bar. Their conversation turned to 1970s fashion trends and how most things that go out of style eventually come back into style—with the exception, so far, of the mustache. They ended their evening agreeing to do whatever they could to help the mustache make a comeback. Through their joking, and the inspiration of a friend's mother who was fundraising for breast cancer, came the idea to grow mustaches as a charity fundraiser. Recognizing that there was no charitable agency specifically for men's health issues, Garone did some research and discovered that prostate cancer was the male equivalent of breast cancer in terms of the statistical comparisons. For that reason, prostate cancer was selected as the primary beneficiary of their charitable enterprise.(3)

Official rules were created and are still in effect today: no head starts are allowed, and beards and goatees do not count; mustaches are used to initiate conversations about prostate cancer, testicular cancer, and men's mental health issues; and participants help raise funds for one or more of these concerns and are to comport themselves as true gentlemen throughout the campaign.(5) Participants are called "Mo Bros," and female supporters are "Mo Sistas." Movember's goal and slogan is to "change the face of men's health."

Garone made a call to the CEO of the Prostate Cancer Foundation of Australia, telling him that his idea would not only transform the organization but also become a substantial fundraiser. A meeting between the two men was set up in Melbourne. At the meeting, Garone outlined his plan to convince men across Australia to grow a mustache during November to raise money and awareness for the cause and then get together at month's end for a mustache-themed party to celebrate life and change the face of men's health. The CEO looked at Garone and laughed, saying, "Adam, that's a really novel idea, but we're an ultra-conservative organization. We can't have anything to do with you." Garone picked up the tab, and as they shook hands before parting, the CEO said, "Listen, if you happen to raise any money out of this, we'll gladly take it."(3)

Despite the meeting's outcome, Garone said that the lesson he learned was about persistence. He and the other founders pressed forward with their plan and were able to increase their "Mo Bro" numbers to 450, raising $54,000 in 2004 and donating every cent to the Prostate Cancer Foundation of Australia, the largest single donation the PCFA had received to that date. According to Garone, “From that day forward, my life has become about a mustache.”

The campaign picked up more support the following year, spreading to New Zealand. In 2006, Garone said it reached a pivotal point where the campaign was consuming most of their time. They either needed to shut it down or take it to the next level by creating a way for him to quit his job and dedicate his full attention to the charity.

They decided to seek sponsorships; however, the concept of funding a charity based on mustaches was not an easy sell. Even the Prostate Cancer Foundation (to whom they had already donated approximately $1.2 million) was still not ready to commit.

It wasn’t until Foster’s Brewing came on board that they received their first corporate shot in the arm, which was enough for Garone to leave his job and commit full-time to the campaign. However, by November 2006, the Fosters money had been depleted, as well as their personal funds, and after convincing their suppliers to delay all billing until December, they were approximately $600,000 in debt. Had the 2006 Movember campaign stalled or failed, the original founders would have been bankrupt. Luckily, it was another resounding success.

In early 2007, they began to receive emails from the U.K., Canada, and the U.S. expressing interest in establishing Movember in these countries since no other organization existed to raise funds for prostate cancer.

Garone and the other founders decided to move Movember onto an international scale. Garone cold-called the CEO of Prostate Cancer Canada and arranged a meeting in Toronto. As Garone recounted, after he explained his vision, the CEO looked at him, laughed, and said, “Adam, this sounds like a really novel idea….” Garone thought to himself, “I’ve heard this before. I know how it goes.” But to his surprise, the CEO then announced, “We will partner with you, but we’re not going to invest in it. You need to figure a way to bring this campaign across here and make it work.”(3)

Under the assumption that if the campaign worked in the new countries they would be able to raise significantly larger amounts of funding for the cause, they decided to invest some of the capital they had from the Australian campaign to finance a kickoff in the U.K., U.S., and Canada.

Hyped by their success in Australia, the Movember campaign was brought to North America in 2007. Despite their enthusiasm, it was not as successful as they had hoped, but Garone said that that year really taught them “the importance of being patient and really understanding the local market before you become so bold as to set lofty targets.”(3)

In subsequent years, however, Movember has truly become an international movement. In 2010, Movember had more than 450,000 participants and raised $77 million. It is now the largest funding organization for prostate cancer and support programs in the world.

Since 2004, the Movember Foundation has raised over $174 million and spread to South Africa, Europe, the United States, Canada, and, more recently, Ireland.(4) In 2010, in the United States alone, more than $7.5 million was raised.

Now all that is left for Movember to achieve truly equal status with Breast Cancer Awareness Month is for the NFL and other major league sports to embrace it with the same seriousness that they do the breast cancer initiative. There should be no reason for not wholeheartedly getting involved.

MGTOW's opposite

Peter Wright · 28 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In this piece I'll be looking at the opposite of MGTOW, at what MGTOW isn't, in order to throw MGTOW into relief against impostors. Naturally, this is my own take, one of numerous that abound on the Internet and one that comes with no special authority and no assumption that I speak for others.

By now many are familiar with the concept of male self-determination as a basic working definition for MGTOW. Self-determination is the practice whereby a man makes choices and decisions based on his own preferences and interests, monitors and regulates his own actions, and is generally self-directing.

Simple enough.

That leads to a consideration of the opposite of male self-determination, i.e., determination of self by other (DOSBO). Determination of self by other limits the definition of MGTOW and in one stroke negates the claim that MGTOW can mean anything a person wants it to mean. By applying the DOSBO rule, no person can qualify as a MGHOW if he hands over a significant amount of his sovereignty to another entity. Here are some examples illustrating DOSBO in action.

Example 1: Pro-feminist men
On the face of it, we might assume pro-feminist men are self-determined for having made a choice to be led by the spirit and letter of feminism. It hardly needs saying that this amounts to a false assumption.

The only self-determined decision such men make is an initial one to give up self-determination altogether in favor of determination of self by other—which is, of course, the antithesis of self-determination and thereby disqualifies MGTOW status according to DOSBO.

Example 2: Married men
This example is a bit trickier because it raises the question of whether the DOSBO factor is actual or merely potential for a particular married man. Marriage as an institution carries many cultural and legal values, from the symbolizing of a couple's love in ritualized form through to the cultural and legal implementation of a gynocentric contract.

So the question to ask about any man entering into marriage is this: Is he entering the marriage to willfully participate in a gynocentric charade? Sadly, the vast majority of men are doing precisely that, which indicates that the DOSBO factor is actual—such a man cannot qualify as a MGHOW under this definition.

Alternatively, if a couple undertakes to symbolize their love through the ritual of marriage while at the same time imagining they are rejecting the gynocentric aspect imposed by the state, can that man call himself a MGHOW while the DOSBO factor looms in potential due to his wife's latent legal power? Is this man, rare as he may be, a MGHOW?

This is where I stop short of saying he absolutely cannot be—although I would certainly call him foolhardy if he entered a marriage while knowing the enormous risks involved. He is actually a MGHOW in behavior because he presently "does his own thing," but he is potentially a man whose life can be determined by his wife and the government if she so chooses. While I look at what is actual instead of what is potential, I'm forced to conclude that he retains some semblance of a MGHOW.

Example 3: Traditionalists
Like marriage, traditionalism needs defining because not all traditionalism is the same—it is not all gynocentric. Traditionalism is a big basket of historical practices that may or may not be limiting of male self-determination. To simply say "All tradition is bad for men" is a blunt instrument that begs debunking. A better approach might be to ask, Which aspects of traditionalism are limiting to male freedoms?

This is where a phrase like “traditional gender roles” works better, although it too suffers from lack of discrimination. Is it some traditional gender roles, most traditional gender roles, or all traditional gender roles that are bad? Was it bad for married men and non to have the freedom to enjoy male-only fraternal organizations such as the Elks, Masons, Golden Fleece, and others,[1] or was it oppressive for bachelor and married men alike to have male-only drinking saloons? These too were the result of traditional gender divisions.

To use a more controversial example, was it limiting of male self-determination for a woman to stay home during the first two years after giving birth (not beyond!) to breast-feed while the husband worked, or is it limiting for the neotraditionalist couple of today to employ the same traditional “role division” whereby the father stays at home and bottle-feeds a baby while the woman works full-time?

Are not some aspects of traditionalism benign?

While I leave the answer to these questions open, I’m going to suggest that a much more precise term than either “traditionalism” or “traditional gender roles” would be traditional gynocentrism. Gynocentrism is the main perpetrator in limiting male freedom, and for that reason it is more precise to finger the gynocentric thread of traditionalism.

Moving beyond subjectivism

As a limiting principle, DOSBO delivers MGTOW from the meaninglessness of subjectivism, delivers it from the claim that MGTOW has no inherent meaning, or that it can mean whatever the hell a person wants it to mean. It gives a precise meaning with real meta ideological commitments. Whether or not DOSBO proves of wider value is not important, but it will hopefully stimulate discussion about what precisely are the things that all MGTOW hold in common.

[1] Edward Ward, The Secret History of Clubs, published 1709. [This is one of hundreds of titles detailing traditional male clubs, guilds, and fraternities. The examples given show that the clubs were riotous places of laughter, male bonding, drinking, inventing and collaborating on various projects, and above all were places to enjoy a little self-chosen freedom. Married and bachelor men alike participated, and in the majority of clubs no women were allowed to set foot].

Let's talk about Bill Cosby

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 29 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Let me just state up front that I am not claiming innocence for Bill Cosby. Did he drug and rape a bunch of women? I don't know, and neither does anybody else except for Bill himself. What I want to do today is talk about a few facts that should give everybody pause when it comes to judging him.

According to celebritynetworth.com, Bill Cosby is worth $400 million, and yes, it's pertinent. That's four hundred million incentives right there.

Women who claim they were raped by Cosby also openly admit they were whoring for fame, trying to ride the man's coattails into a star-studded future. Does that give Cosby the right to rape them? Of course not, but it sure as hell casts a suspicious light on the innocent maidens' motives to make their claims. Women who failed to hitch their little wagons to Cosby's star have been trying to nail him with rape charges for a long time. Nothing has stuck. Doesn't mean they didn't happen, but for as long as Cosby has been rich and famous, women have been trying to take him down with rape accusations and not a single one has irrefutable evidence, so either Cosby is really, really good at the rape game or they never happened.

Both are possible.

The current witch-hunt in the media is a stark reminder that no matter how rich, how powerful, how well connected, or how critically acclaimed a man might be, even an accusation of rape can tear his life apart and destroy him. Proof? What proof? The word of a woman can destroy a man's life with no evidence of any kind required. Rape shield laws should apply to the accused, not the accuser. The accuser will go on to garner sympathy, appropriate pharmaceuticals, and a speaking engagement where she can discuss her terrible trauma, and the accused will be left with a shattered life even if all the allegations are proven to be outright lies.

And this is doubly true when the man accused is also guilty of the crime of being Black. Nothing packs quite the hysteria-inducing punch of a Black man raping White ladies. There was a time when the lynchings were real. Now we just lynch in the media, and feminists bloggers gloat over their power to shame a man who has not been found guilty of a single charge. Powerful White ladies in the media attempting to lynch a Black man on the word of other White ladies? Gee, that's just so shocking.

Raven-Symone and Whoopi Goldberg have a little more skepticism, and I will agree with Whoopi that "until you know it's true, it's an allegation."

What the Bill Cosby allegations teach us is that "innocent until proven guilty in a court of law" is a pipe dream for men accused of rape. The media tries and condemns the accused without a shred of evidence to back up the charges. The word of a woman is enough to destroy a man's career, reputation, an entire lifetime of achievements. Hey, patriarchy, are you sure you thought this one through?

Here is what needs to change: since allegations of sexual assault and rape carry such devastating penalties for the men accused of those crimes, it should be a crime to name a man period. Victims should file criminal charges and the accused should be granted anonymity until convicted. We need court-ordered and enforced anonymity for men accused of rape. For women accused of rape too. Without a conviction, without evidence, without proof, no one gets to call anyone else a rapist.

The feminist media has made it absolutely clear that they will override any considerations of due process or justice when it comes to slandering and libelling men accused of rape. They will abuse the power they have and that is unacceptable. If these individuals refuse to show restraint and chose their words carefully?

I say, gag the bitches.

They've lynched enough men in this country. Enough is enough.

How most men would deal with a pretty drunk girl

AVfM Video Source · 29 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

You may have heard about the viral video that purported to show how men in Los Angeles would sexually take advantage of a drunken woman on the streets. This video turns out to have been a complete hoax. The men were hired actors whose reputations were severely damaged because they were told they were taking part in a comedy skit and were not told the video would be portrayed as a real event. Even the girl who played the "victim" says she didn't know they were going to lie and manipulate people into believing a false narrative.

Here's a case of someone trying this social experiment for real, and we contend that this is what would actually happen in most cases–because on the whole, men are good:

The folks at Model Pranksters are worth subscribing to. They do all kinds of interesting and funny things, and they've done other videos that, while it may not have been their intent, strongly challenge misandrist cultural prejudices. See 3 Hours Of "Harassment" In NYC and Domestic Abuse In Public! (Social Experiment).

No, they're not MRAs. They aren't anything but pranksters. Often funny ones. But it's interesting how their honest social experiments so frequently wind up challenging bigoted narratives, isn't it?

Why I chose to fight for men

Deepika Narayan Bhardwaj · 29 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is also available in Romanian.

> If you are neutral in situations of injustice, you have chosen the side of the oppressor.—Desmond Tutu

Seeing my uncles leave their parents and set up separate homes no matter how much they loved their parents and wanted to keep them along was normal for me as a young girl. I never bothered to think about it. Though I saw the pain in the eyes of these old and ailing parents, I thought that it was probably more important for a man to listen to his wife than to those who had brought him up in this world, taught him how to walk, and made him the man he is today. I grew up and saw a few of these men completely snapped from family ties, but once again I never bothered to inquire much.

Three years ago, I was forced to THINK.

A very dear friend of mine was on the brink of a divorce a year after his marriage and two months after his parents had started living with the couple. His wife gave him two options: leave his parents forever or divorce with a huge sum. He chose the latter. I still remember endless drives where he spoke less and cried more for that decision. He never wanted to break his marriage but was forced to. He was also forced to pay a price that was worth his and his parents' life's savings. This time, though I did wonder to myself why he was paying so much, I did not get too much into the reasons.

Two years ago, I was forced to ACT.

It happened again, this time very close to me. A young boy (my cousin), who had fallen in love with the "innocence" of this girl, was cheated—and cheated beyond explanation. She was a dream to him; he was a tissue for her. He married her to make a home; she married him for society's tag. She loved another man, and this marriage was just part of the plan! He felt humiliated. She felt victorious. He did not want her to go. She wanted a divorce. He consented to an amicable separation. She cried, DOWRY! My cousin was given two choices: divorce with a huge sum or a dowry case and his family behind bars!

I accompanied my cousin to meet a retired judge and seek guidance. There had been no dowry demand and the girl was lying. "Truth has no significance," the judge said. "As a husband, you can do nothing to save you and your family if she wants to file a dowry case. It doesn't matter if you are right or she is wrong. What she says is right." I was enraged. I told him that we had evidence! He laughed, saying, "A woman isn't punished for adultery in this country. However, she can file endless false cases against you, get you arrested under 498A, and make you run around courts for years until you satisfy her demands. She's a woman."

My cousin was also extorted. I saw his family's trauma and his transition from a cheerful boy to a shattered man. I still can't forget his screams. That's when I understood why my friend had paid, why my cousin had paid, and why men compromise.

After my cousin's case, suddenly I saw it happening everywhere. Or perhaps what I had ignored for years was now staring me in the face. I started researching dowry cases and realized that what the media had told me wasn't the only truth. The deeper I went, the uglier the reality was behind these cases. The other side of 498A left me utterly confused as a woman: How can I use a law when I am wrong? How can it allow me to play with anyone's life? How can it be used as a weapon? How can "she" always be right and he "always" be wrong? How can it allow a woman to get away with so many lies? One night I stumbled upon a suicide video of Syed Ahmed Makhdoom, in which he described false 498A and his ordeal as the reason behind his death. It changed my life.

I could no longer ignore. I could no longer be neutral and side with the oppressor. That's when I decided to raise my voice against the misuse of laws by women and fight for those who have never been considered victims: men.

Increasingly, men in India are becoming victims of systematic abuse through gender-biased laws. Laws in which a man's innocence doesn't matter, where he is presumed guilty, and where a mere verbal accusation by a woman makes him a puppet in the hands of the police and judiciary for years to come. Laws in which he is humiliated, abused, extorted, and pushed to the brink for being a man!

In the past two years, I have come across thousands of these cases—cases where broken marriages have turned into dowry cases, failed affairs have turned into rape cases, appraisal rejections have turned into sexual harassment cases, property disputes have turned into outraging modesty, and street fights have turned into molestation—just because a woman now has the power to "feel" like a victim any way she wants and her words are enough to nail a man.

The misuse of laws isn't the only issue. Another problem is the absolute apathy toward the problems of men. There is no law in India that recognizes violence toward men by his spouse/partner. There is no law in India to analyze the abuse of men by women. There is no law in India that clocks murders/burnings/suicides of married men by their wives or in-laws (like dowry deaths of women). India's domestic violence act—which recognizes emotional, economical, physical, and sexual violence—doesn't accept men as the victims of any of this violence. Despite the fact that the number of men committing suicide in India is twice the number of women, there is not a single helpline dedicated to men. And forget about having any laws for married men; if a married man who is abused uses his only option—divorce—he can rest assured that his wife will launch a dozen similar cases against him. So from being a victim he becomes an accused!

Women's right activists often argue with me that the number of abused men is much lower. I ask, When there is no law to assess their abuse, how can there be numbers? Moreover, numbers is not my game, nor is holding placards with statistics my bread and butter. My fight is against the injustice toward men in the name of justice toward women—even if it's for just one man. I wish to help every man who is a victim of this systematic abuse and hope to fight until justice stops looking through the eyes of gender.

Should fortune favor Brian Clyne?

Paul Elam · 30 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Since his debate with AVfM Collegiate Activism Director Sage Gerard, Atheists United (AU) President Brian Neal Clyne has proved once again that feminists make terrible atheists.

If you have not seen the debate yet, you really should watch it now.

Brian, upset about the public reaction to his abysmal performance in which he tried to assassinate Sage's character, went straight to the cops.

Narrative text

On Sunday October 26, 2014, at 1700 hours, I was at the CITGO on Frey Road speaking with a citizen, when Brian Clyne (KSU student/non-resident) approached me and asked if [redacted] was on duty. I informed Clyne that [redacted] would be on duty later in the evening. Clyne advised that he and Sage Gerard (KSU student) had a KSU sponsored debate on feminism on campus recently. Clyne reported that since the debate Gerard has posted derogatory statements about Clyne and his family on social media sites. Clyne stated that he was upset about the statements Gerard made about him and his family. Clyne advised he was going to seek a restraining order against Gerard to stay away from him while on campus.

I advised Clyne to file an incident report with the law enforcement agency in which jurisdiction he resides under. Clyne advised that he would speak to [redacted] when he was on duty next.

There is no known video of this incident.

There is no record of a pending restraining order because Sage is not guilty of anything except expressing concerns over the neutrality of the debate. AU's VP would even attest to that.

to me

Good Afternoon,

I want to provide my feedback in regards to your recent debate with Brian Clyne. Can I just say that you were well prepared and conducted yourself in a very professional manner. I know this debate was suppose to be an exchange of ideas but you blew him out of the water. I felt your stance was backed up with sources and you refrained from logical fallacies. I feel the debate was biased against you and yet you established your ground and stood on it. If I had the opportunity, I would shake your hand.

Kindly,

I think his civility is due to how he was dragged up at home! There was nothing civil in his language demeanour or mentality - he was so "Covertly"(sic) hostile he couldn't hide his contempt for Sage or anyone who disagreed with him. His conduct was control freak personified! When he mentioned having Kids I shuddered at the idea of the experience they will have!

Brian tried to ban Sage from AU over Issac's comment with permission from the Kennesaw State University (KSU) Student Life Department. Brian's expectations of Sage's responsibilities are as petty as you'd expect.

Sage is the moderator of this site. He should have told people that opinions about me and the Dean of Students are one thing, but talking about how I was "dragged up" instead of raised and then what was said about my kids and me as a father is beyond the pale.

I request permission to remove Sage as a member of KSU Atheists United, for obvious reasons.

Whatever the response is to this publicly available attack on my family is out of my control, especially when my father sees it.

Our own David King explained that Brian did not follow protocol for filing a grievance with the moderation team and confirmed that comments on AVfM are not Sage's responsibility.

Brian cannot legally ban Sage on a personal whim. Unsatisfied, Brian sent Sage and CC'd a campus detective the no-contact email below. Sage respected the request.

Let's fast-forward to November 21, when AU brought Dr. Richard Dawkins to campus. In the opening speeches by professors, Brian was given credit for most of the work behind the event. Based on the information available to me, Dawkins admitted to never hearing of the MHRM after endorsing feminism in a Q&A. The footage should be published by AU in due time if you wish to hear this for yourself.

Brian barked orders at Sage to sit with other AU members and interrupted Sage's speaking to Dawkins during a book signing. Sage was telling Dawkins about the debate so that Dawkins could learn more about the MHRM (assuming Dawkins cared enough to watch). Sage put himself at the back of the line, so he had no one to hold up except Dawkins. But even then, Sage was not allowed to speak for more than a few seconds.

Since Brian had broken the no-contact, Sage responded.

Breach of no-contact to Brian

Hi Brian,

Note that speaking to me broke the no contact.

Thanks for the event! I hope Dawkins can take time out of his busy schedule to enjoy the debate and get the men's rights perspective. But chances are that he doesn't care, which is fine too. :)

Anyway, I wanted to level with you. I've never made derogatory statements about you online. I've stated neutrality concerns about the debate, and others expressed their opinions on your presentation.

I can understand your frustration over seeing so much disagreement, and that is an everyday struggle for me too. But I do not think it is appropriate to threaten to get a restraining order because people, for example, laugh about the men's rights movement. I also do not try to ban people from my organization over an outside disagreement. I have learned to take it all in stride because if I am backed by evidence, why would I get angry?

I'm not going anywhere, so please communicate any concerns with me respectfully and I will hear you out.

But note that I will still record all of our correspondence and keep it all subject to publication (including face to face meetings) for security and accountability reasons.

Regards,
Sage

I had to speak to you due to equal treatment of all members at the event, as well as keeping my word to you: "I will allow AU members in early to sit where they wish."

I did not attempt to get a restraining on you. I was dismayed that you would allow both my children and parents to be spoken of as they were by "men" with whom you associate, not to mention that only a coward needs to record his men's rights activism unbeknownst to the women he harnesses because he is afraid of women assaulting him, as you do, coward.

I cannot kick you out of my group, sadly.

Detective [redacted]

Though KSU Student Life has informed me that Sage cannot be legally removed from Atheists United, I wish to reestablish no contact with Sage Gerard.

I cannot stop him from coming to AU events, and must treat him equally as a member, therefore, I had to ask him to be seated with the other membership last night, which is the "Breach of no-contact" of which Sage Gerard speaks. I also had to ask him to move along when he spoke to Dr. Dawkins about the "Did Feminism Get It Wrong" debate, as it had nothing to with an event promoting atheism on campus.

Mere words cannot convey my disdain for this man after his group of "men" spoke of my family, and I wish him to never contact me unless it concerns his AU membership, and only then when is about the promotion of atheism on campus.

If I would have not allowed Sage to sit with the other members, he would have cried "Discrimination!" and when I do treat him equally, he uses it as a way and means to contact me after the event: a scheme.

This man is a disruption to my academic pursuits, and I do not wish him to be contacted by him again.

If he needs anything other than event attendance from AU, he may speak to Dr [redacted] if so chooses.

Sage has never harassed anyone, Brian did not "ask" Sage to move along, and Sage was never made aware of any prescribed rules on conversing with Dawkins.

Sage learned that the second no-contact only prohibits conversation outside of AU business. The president of an organization that "urges open dialogue of ideas" asked for a no-contact, broke that no-contact, flung baseless accusations, called Sage a "coward," then asked for a no-contact again. This is all over an unwarranted animus that Sage has never reciprocated.

I'm sure Sage will respect the new no-contact. But I can talk to Brian on these pages as much as I want, and believe me, he would have preferred to hear from Sage.

Hi, Brian, let's talk about your criminal record.

I cannot comment on specific case details, especially the nine(!) "disposed" criminal incidents. I also cannot pass judgment on your current character based solely on chapters of your life that ended over a decade ago. You can read the reports I have on your background here, with sensitive information redacted:

- BeenVerified Report
- PeopleWise Report

If there are any inaccuracies, comment below as soon as possible to prevent a misunderstanding. But from what I've gathered so far, the record is legit. When I look at your present in light of your past, "rehabilitated" is not the first word that comes to mind. Healthy skeptics don't involve cops with personal vendettas over Internet comments, nor do they commit larceny after turning 18.

You risked putting Sage in physical danger of vigilante action with inflammatory allegations, and you have the audacity to continue the character assassination attempt by bitching about a comment?

The worst part is that after all this asinine bullshit, you remain in a position of leadership with enough money to hire a celebrity and dispose criminal proceedings. Way to show that you don't need to be decent or sane to make it in life.

By the way, regarding all of those disposed criminal cases, is Daddy rich? I ask because I can't think of another reason why a 34-year-old man would ever write this about one comment:

> Whatever the response is to this publicly available attack on my family is out of my control, especially when my father sees it.
> ...

Let me get this straight: When someone you never met comments about your family, it's Sage's fault, but when you make a veiled threat about your family's response, you can't be held responsible?

You and Daddums can both stick it, Brian.

While you pat yourself on the back for associating with Richard Dawkins, Sage continues to endure increasing restrictions on his speech from the KSU Interdisciplinary Studies Department and your personal whim. Making threats doesn't exactly make you look like the saint you pretended to be at the bottom of this praise piece on AU:

> I suppose that over two years ago, had anyone said, "In just over a couple years, The Sentinel will be writing about how inclusive and respectful KSU Atheists United will become, and that even monotheists will join your group," I would have thought them quite insane. When I and a few other students started this group, we did so with the intent to promote a more dogmatic atheism at KSU. But since then, KSU Atheists United has grown as a group, and our vision has matured to be as inclusive as possible to all students of all ideologies, as a university student group should ideally strive to be, in my opinion.

But again, I suppose I have grown since then and matured as a rhetor, as well as a person. To be sure, I and most of our group are atheists. But if we want to be accepted as atheists, we need to be able to accept all other students' belief systems as we wish them to accept ours. That is multiculturalism, that is what being a university level atheists group is about. Inclusion and acceptance, not dogmatic atheism.

Snippet of Brian's comment. You can replace the rest with a fart noise in your head for what it's worth.

Social justice dogma has been co-opting the secular community, and this situation is no different. You, a feminist who supposedly loves diversity and equality, are prepared to lie and cheat, then milk praise like your very life depended on it.

You and Sage will be in AU meetings together because Sage wants to contribute to secularism on campus. I cannot know what might happen to Sage if you and your brainless groupies see this article, but we cannot allow our culture to reward you while Matt Taylor is reduced to tears and professionally endangered over his shirt.

As a functional skeptic, I remain open to the possibility that you can change. But it will take a lot of convincing for me to change my mind about a (former?) criminal attempting to escalate his personal insecurities to a criminal indictment of an innocent man.

This is the kind of heartless monster we keep on staff.
This is not about Brian's personal beef anymore. Brian is showing his true colors as a leader and an officer with access to state funding through KSU.

With that being said, I'd like to address the students of KSU.

KSU students, if you learn anything from this article, let it be this: Brian will take your name to the cops for petty personal reasons, even if you've done nothing wrong. Brian uses people for his own image and will only treat them well or not in relation to that aspect alone. Do not volunteer any time or personal information to Brian without a recorder running. Given both his criminal record and current behavior, Brian is willing to defame and marginalize you on a whim. And he will make sure you shut up while he does it.

Is this the kind of person you want facilitating open discussion and the growth of skepticism on campus?

I urge KSU students to please report any future incidents with Brian Neal Clyne to your Dean of Student Success Dr. Michael Sansivero, the KSU police, or to our editorial staff. You would be doing your campus a service by both holding corrupt officers accountable and preventing bullying.

Brian, if you want to be able to hold down a job again, stop acting like a sociopathic control freak and own up to your mistakes. So you didn't like how the debate went. Tough. You agreed to go public, and now people are learning the truth about you. Sage did nothing wrong, but you capitalize on political fashion to justify bullying Sage and accusing Sage of things he didn't do.

KSU secularists deserve better, and I'd bet that the AU Constitution would agree with me if it had a clause for dealing with corrupted officers like a real constitution would.

I admire Richard Dawkins's contributions to secularism, but he should have better practiced due diligence before working with Brian. Perhaps a few tweets are in order to see what Dr. Dawkins thinks about this situation. I'd also like to ask our readers to share this article on AU's Facebook and suggest to their members to vote for a more functional president. What could be more relevant to AU business than finding a qualified leader?

There's my two cents, Brian. Use the cash to buy a better brain. Or better yet, integrity is always free. Your parents and your daughters should be ashamed to know you—and if they really did know you, they would be.

Why I divorced Child Support Services, aka “Friend of the Court”

Rosemary Ribner · 30 November 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In most American states, child support is handled by a state agency charged with collecting and disbursing child support payments. The name of that agency varies from state by state: in some places, it’s called the “Office of Child Support Services” or the “Department of Child Support Services.” Where I live, it’s called “Friend of the Court.”

Friend of the Court—that really does say it all. Unfortunately, it took a few years before I realized that it was nobody’s friend but the court’s, and when it finally became clear that it wasn’t my friend, or my children’s friend, or my ex-husband’s friend, my ex-husband and I decided to legally withdraw from its “services.” And we encourage most others to do the same.

What is Friend of the Court? Here’s what the law where I live says:

> FRIEND OF THE COURT ACT (EXCERPT)
> Act 294 of 1982552.501 Short title; purposes and construction of act.
> Sec. 1.
> (2) The purposes of this act are to enumerate and describe the powers and duties of the friend of the court and the office of the friend of the court; to ensure that procedures adopted by the friend of the court will protect the best interests of children in domestic relations matters; to encourage and assist parties voluntarily to resolve contested domestic relations matters by agreement; to compel the enforcement of parenting time and custody orders; and to compel the enforcement of support orders, ensuring that persons legally responsible for the care and support of children assume their legal obligations and reducing the financial cost to this state of providing public assistance funds for the care of children. This act shall be construed to promote the enumerated purposes and to facilitate the resolution of domestic relations matters [emphasis mine].

See that sentence I put in bold? Why construed? Why not simply: This act shall promote the enumerated purposes and facilitate the resolution of domestic relations matters?

I’ll tell you why. Because this law, like most laws these days, is written by flim-flam artists whose main goal is to trick the unwashed masses into believing that they give two shits about us. They don’t. This law and other laws like it are NOT about “the best interests of the child™” as they tell us. This is about M-O-N-E-Y. They don’t give a DAMN about parenting time enforcement or anything else that is in the interests of the child except collecting money.

Sure, they will say that if you withhold time from the other parent you could, as in maybe, be jailed. And it happens—sometimes. Usually they just tell Mom to be a good girl and let Dad see the kids, and if she doesn’t, oh, well, they wag their finger at her again and tell her not to be so mean.

What happens to Dad if he loses his job and can’t pay support? Do you really think they care about the children not getting the support? Hell no, they care about not getting their “fees” and any other money they determined that Dad owes the state. That’s why Dad goes to jail and Mom can play around with Dad’s parenting time pretty much at will.

Here’s the real deal: they collect a percentage of the child support for themselves, to pay their salaries. In fact, in the United States, in most places, the only courts that actually run at a profit are, you guessed it, the family courts because they skim a percentage of all child support and spousal support/alimony that they collect. What’s worse is, in the United States, the federal government matches the dollars they collect, which gives them incentive to collect as much as they can. And so even if there are nice people working there, and I guess there may be a few, the whole system is a racket set up to pay the people who work there.

My name is Rosemary Ribner. I married Dean Esmay 19 years ago, and we were married for 12 years. We had two sons before our marriage fell apart and we divorced. This is not going to be an indictment of my ex-; in fact, I support the work he does at A Voice for Men. Why wouldn't I? I have sons, for God's sake, and a husband I love and an ex-husband who is now a friend. I'm not going to say anything about why we are no longer married, but I am going to say that like most couples who divorce, we went through a very ugly period of fighting about everything. Our hate and anger for each other blinded us to all else, including the fact that our sons needed us to get along. We couldn't, in the beginning, because our emotions were out of control. So, of course, the family court and their "friends" were going to help us navigate the process. They were going to put the needs of our children where they belonged, and at the time, it seemed like a nice shiny beacon of hope.

I was naive.

I bought that loaded pile of absolute bullshit because at the time I didn't know anyone who had gone through a divorce with children, and neither did anyone in my family. I had nobody to ask advice from except my attorney, and you know that attorneys are interested first and foremost about money, and one of the easiest ways for them to do that is to stoke the fires of conflict. I asked for and received primary custody of our two sons. Our oldest was 10 and our youngest was 3 and had just been diagnosed as autistic. I was initially grateful for the Friend of the Court (FOC)'s involvement. They made sure that despite our inability to be civil, the children received regular financial support and that Dean had scheduled parenting time. But for a while after our divorce was final, we continued to hate each other. It was hurting our kids and it was making us both look unstable and fight over stupid shit, which they did nothing to help with. We went through a brief period of using the court's "Friend" as a weapon. Then slowly, as we watched our oldest son deteriorate emotionally, we both decided it was time to love our sons more than we hated each other.

Soon we remembered that we were once friends and we worked on getting back to that place. And we noticed that the government was taking significantly more money than they should be just so they could play middleman, and not doing anything else for us except getting between us when we wanted to change arrangements.

When you're in battle mode, there is no way that you're able to realize that these government agencies can actually make things worse by getting between you. But when you're friends, or at least doing your best to remember that you once cared about each other and are trying to get back to that place, you can discuss things. One thing we discussed was the fact that the state was playing fast and loose with their deduction of my ex-husband's check and the disbursement of those funds to me. When my check came up short, they had no explanation, and frequently, my ex- had none either because he could show me his pay stubs and show me how the amount deducted wasn't what I was getting. I'd call to get explanations and wait days for answers or get none at all.

It became crystal clear that these government "services" cared more about the state getting paid than about our sons getting their father's financial support. Nor did they care if they got his emotional support. After a few months of playing the "here's what they took/here's what I got" game, Dean asked me if I'd be willing to withdraw from FOC and just allow him to pay me directly. I said yes. We found the laws and the paperwork we needed and, without even paying a lawyer, went to the judge together and said, "Let us out." And after making us talk to some bureaucrats, the judge agreed: the court is now out of our lives. Whether it comes to finances or the kids, when one of us has a problem we talk to the other and we work it out.

We had already long ago stopped following the court-ordered parenting time or running to them to get permission or make note of changes. Dean calls and stops over daily to see his boys. The boys go with Dad whenever they want, and while it isn't 50/50, it works for us. We live two minutes away. I'm friends with Dean and his wife, and Dean is friends with both me and my husband, John Ribner. It simply made sense to me that we stop allowing the state to tell us how to support our children, especially since they've never put the needs of our boys ahead of their own self-interest. If we want to change days or arrangements, we don't need to file any paperwork to make it official.

It's like I said in the beginning: the Friend of the Court is exactly that—not my friend, not the kids' friend, not my ex's friend, but the court's friend. And if they call it something else where you live, it still doesn't matter: these agencies are not your friend and never have been and never will be.

They don't care about what's best for children of divorce; their only true concern is their own financial interests.

If you can possibly get the courts and these state agencies out of your personal affairs, do it. Unless you have no other option—and really, while I'm sure there are a few cases where it's the only option, I think we all know in most cases it's not.

I know divorce sucks, I know fighting over the kids and finances with someone you're no longer living with sucks. It seems impossible to get along with that ex you came to hate, but if you made a baby or babies with that ex- of yours, it's time to be an adult and realize it's not about you, it's about those kids. Part of being an adult means taking care of your children, loving and protecting them from the shitty things this world has to offer, putting their needs above your own—and that means making sure that they have BOTH of their parents' love and time and not just money. I don't care how much you hate your ex-husband or ex-wife. It's not about you anymore, it's about your kids. You both chose to get married, you both chose to have children. The only people who had NO CHOICE are your children, so grow up and act like the adults you purport to be. It works if you work it. In most cases, you can find a way to get along and work things out between you as adults, just so long as you let go of resentment and remember that it's not about you. LOVE YOUR CHILDREN MORE THAN YOU HATE EACH OTHER.

Then maybe even the hate will go away.

Heather Mallick spews hate in the Toronto Star

Joe Wilson · 1 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The Toronto Star recently published Heather Mallick's misandric piece "Men's rights groups are a waste of time: Mallick."

This article—a "response" to the November 16 opening of the new Canadian Centre for Men and Families in Toronto—is so wrong on so many levels that I don't know where to start. Here is Mallick's description of Justin Trottier, the centre's director:

> It will be run by a thin pale wary-looking male-victimhood guy who I always get mixed up with another scrawny depressed-looking men-imist, mainly because they tend to pose for photos against walls, cement and brick respectively, and glower at the camera.

My question is: "Would the Star stand by if a male journalist posted a similar derogatory description of a female starting up a women's centre?" No, I'm sure the man would be given his walking papers, and his career in journalism would be over! That any journalist would attack someone based on his or her appearance should be enough to raise eyebrows, but it gets way worse.

Mallick goes on to diminish the reality of the problems men face, including suicide, the seventh most common cause of death among Canadian males. Instead of applauding the formation of a group to look at the root causes of suicide and attempt to fix it before it becomes an issue, Mallick suggests "gun control," even though suicide by hanging is still the most common method, followed by poisoning. Suicide by firearm constitutes only 16% of cases.

With respect to education, boys have been statistically trending downward for the past two decades. Boys are more likely to drop out of school, and only 40% of students entering college are boys. This is a trend that is getting worse. Yet Mallick finds that boys don't really matter:

> I do think worrying about boys doing less well in school than girls is a lot of tosh, since no one ever worried that girls did less well in school.

Really? Could you imagine if girls were trending poorly and the genders were reversed? We would definitely be hearing about it in the news. Instead of fleshing out the reality of the issue and looking to find concrete ways to help our sons, we get Mallick to diminish the impact. Again, let's flip the genders and have a man say this—he'd be out of work, and his career would be over. Period.

Parents with sons reading this should be outraged that a major publication like the Star would stoop low enough to post this. By publishing this garbage, the Star is effectively saying that "boys are not that important" and that we, as a society, should shun any attempt to help them—simply because they have a penis. And we aren't talking about a small newspaper stand out in an armpit city. We're talking about the second largest newspaper in Canada, one of the top news outlets in North America.

But this isn't the first time Heather Mallick has openly expressed her hatred of men. A Google search showed no end to the lengths this woman has gone to bash them. Here are just a few:

In a 2010 article on Russell Williams (woman killer), Mallick began by suggesting that ALL men are like Williams:

> Men should weep. They bruise women's bodies, they humiliate us in the House of Commons, they expend great effort in keeping us pregnant, booting us away from the bigger salaries, they are tireless in their attempts at control and resent our efforts to advance. Frequently, they kill women. Russell Williams is a monster but there will be other monsters in the years to come.
> We know this to be true. I am a feminist but all women know what I mean because they live it every day.

In 2012, in an attack article on a 17-year-old boy, she wrote:

> Women often shop for men, and I shudder to think how men would dress if they didn't. Most men can't even enter shops to buy their own pants.

Earlier this year, she wrote a column criticizing the Canadian government's prostitution bill:

> The online reactions were almost entirely from men, which is true of all commenting and opinion-writing….
> Here's a tip. "Hi, can I buy ya a drink? I don't have access to mainstream sexual outlets" is not a great line. It is known in the mainstream women's crowd as a "red flag" and will result in loneliness and possible late-night weeping into a little corral of crème de menthe glasses at the bar….
> The "need" to buy women is not a "law of nature," as he wrote, presumably with a straight face. Me? Arrested? The overall level of male entitlement was striking.

Sorry, Heather, it may not be what you want to hear or believe, but men and boys have issues and society's role in addressing these issues is failing us badly. Men still make up 95% of workplace fatalities, suicide is four times higher in boys and men, parental rights for divorced dads is non-existent, men are still sentenced to longer sentences than women are (for equal crimes and circumstances), and male genital mutilation (circumcision) is an issue that must be reviewed (but no one is tackling it)—circumcised skin is sold to cosmetic companies in Canada despite it being against Canadian regulations to do so (but no one bats an eye).

I could go on … As I said, sorry, Heather, it's not what you want to hear, but yes, we do need a men's centre, and you're partly the reason.

Doing life with public enemy no. 1

John Ribner · 1 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I'm willing to work for more pay, more benefits, and more opportunity … too bad I'm serving a life sentence.

The stigma of a misdemeanor domestic violence conviction is inescapable. I should know. It's been 16 years since that fateful day I uttered "no contest" and I'm still paying for it. I'm re-sentenced and re-punished for that crime each time I apply for a job. Apparently no one wants to hire a convicted "woman-beater," not this one at least. Instead, it's just more tough love for the naive masses who get off on saying things such as, "You do the crime, you do the time." Well, these uninformed imbeciles should be happy to know that I'm still doing my time behind these gray prison walls and there seems to be no parole in sight.

When I was a kid, my dad said that a life spent living at the survival level is a life wasted. I didn't understand him then, but you can damn well be sure I now know what the old man was talking about. While I'm thankful for all that I have, I want more both for myself and my family. That's the American way, right? Work hard and reap the rewards. Unfortunately, there's only so long I can keep doing what I'm doing only to barely break even at the end of a pay period. I know I have the skills to acquire more than that; what I don't have is someone who's willing to look past this 16-year-old misdemeanor domestic violence conviction to give me a chance to prove that I'm worth the investment.

Ever heard the saying "The truth will set you free"? It's the biggest hoax perpetrated on mankind. When companies and institutions ask applicants if they've ever been convicted of a felony or misdemeanor, I don't lie about it. Sure, there's a chance I could get the job if I omitted this little uncomfortable fact, but my problems would start the minute I was hired. They'll run a background check and they'll find out I lied about that pesky little conviction and promptly fire me. So now I'd have no job. Fortunately, I've never made this mistake. Instead, I answer the question truthfully, crossing my fingers and hoping for the best each time. So far, I can say that honesty is the best policy … for remaining exactly where I am, professionally speaking.

My career choice is another part of the problem. If I had experience in a traditionally male-dominated field, I'd likely have more luck. With a degree in journalism and nearly 20 years as a professional writer, I'm applying for office jobs, which are smack dab in the middle of the "estrogen ghetto." I've had more than one interview in which the woman on the other end of the desk became antagonistic even when there was no reason for her to do so. (One even twisted her face into a grotesque grimace when I mentioned I do occasional blogging for AVfM.) While I'm sure other factors come into play—it's an employer's market, I'm overqualified, etc.—I'm convinced that the stigma of my past is just too much for most employers to look past.

As much as I hate to say it, I don't think there will be a fairytale ending for me. The job market seems to save these Cinderella stories for guys who did prison time for killing someone. Everyone loves to see their smiling and repentant faces when they're given that proverbial second chance that includes a job that allows them to earn a living. For me, every rejection letter reminds me of the broken promises sold to me by those used car salesmen of the legal system. "You don't even have to say that you did it. And you won't have to do any jail time. All things considered, this is best for everyone." That's what they told me while adding that a trial would cost $5,000 and there was no guarantee of winning. In the end, I really didn't have a choice, even though I didn't do what my ex-wife said I did. That, however, was of little concern to the career-minded police, prosecutor, defense attorney, and judge involved in my case.

So as you can see, a domestic violence conviction is the only misdemeanor crime that carries a life sentence. But don't worry about me. As prison cells go, mine is rather comfortable. I have all the space I need, I can eat anything, and go anywhere I want. I even get to see my kids as well as enjoy conjugal visits with my lovely wife. To be honest, it's only when I log on to sites such as CareerBuilder.com that I'm reminded of these invisible bars and how they keep me trapped.

Men's Human Rights Ireland responds to feminist censoring of IMD

Men's Human Rights Ireland · 2 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

One of our Men's Human Rights Ireland (MHRI) members was scheduled to deliver an address at Belfast City Hall this past International Men's Day (IMD) but was abruptly informed at the 11th hour that his speech had been cancelled.

The reason for this cancellation was apparently due to several complaints made against the group that had invited MHRI to speak, Men's Rights Northern Ireland (MRNI), by the "Belfast Feminist Network" (BFN) under the leadership of one Kellie Turtle, who in her private, closed discussion group expressed outrage that there was even a men's day in the first place:

> Kellie Turtle
> November 11 at 11:05am
> "I know it's galling to most that this event is even happening as it totally ignores the nature of gender inequality in society and the fact that it is women who are disadvantaged due to our gender, not men."

I'm not sure how that sits with—and this is a direct quote from their letter, referencing the duty of the government not to support groups that cause division—the "BCC [Belfast City Council] as a public body with good relations duties under Section 75," but I suspect not very well. Having revved up the troops with this stirring address, the BFN proceeded to email as many councillors with off-colour complaints as they could find, all the while snickering among themselves about IMD also being "World Toilet Day."

The complaints they made against MRNI were wide-ranging and often contradictory, if not flat-out wrong: in one part of the letter, much is made of concerns about workplace safety while in the next part they seem to think that the very idea of men being worried about women in dangerous jobs is sexist, rounding all of this off with a triumphant, quivering finger pointed at MRNI's lack of support for the HeForShe campaign, wherein men are called to support women in what looks very like a traditional protective, chivalric role.

They even complained about MRNI highlighting the fact that the gender pay gap is spurious nonsense—the bottom line is that when men and women of equal experience and with equal qualifications are compared, there is no pay gap. In fact, even in bizarre feminist terms, there is no pay gap in Northern Ireland.

Over and over the letter repeats this peculiar notion that being opposed to feminism is being opposed to women. It's really not hard to understand why this is wrong: one is an ideology, the other is a gender.

Perhaps this is why the overwhelming majority of women don't identify as feminists—which according to feminist dogma would make them misogynists who hate equality—and enormous movements like Women Against Feminism exist. Neither, needless to say, does feminism have much to do with equality. That would be egalitarianism.

And the final objection to MRNI's participation in IMD is apparently regarding domestic and intimate partner violence.

> "This contains a common practice among the MRA movement which is to use the word 'crazy' when talking about women. The fact that they use this word as a noun (rather than a description for example 'crazy woman') has a particularly dehumanising effect. Women are no longer viewed as people but merely 'crazy'."

Admittedly salty, but the message is clearly not about all or even the vast majority of women, despite the attempt at misrepresentation. So men it seems should stand up against domestic violence from men, but not from women, who are as likely or more likely to be the primary abusive aggressor in relationships. And that's before we get into the prejudice displayed by her automatic assumption that "crazy" is female.

He for She is fine, but not He for He. What was that about good relations duties under Section 75 again?

We have responded to Belfast City Council's cancellation of the MHRI talk in the strongest possible terms, lodged an official complaint, and are considering all of our options at this time.

Meanwhile, we are pleased to present for your enjoyment the speech that was to be given in Belfast City Hall.

Office of Child Support Enforcement proposes constructive new rules for states

Robert Franklin · 2 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Vicki Turetsky is the commissioner of the federal Office of Child Support Enforcement (OCSE) and, within the understandable parameters of that job, a very good one. As with any bureaucrat, she's limited in what she can accomplish, but Turetsky has always demonstrated a balanced understanding of the child support system. She's no "higher support orders mean more support" type of fanatic. "Lock 'em up and throw away the key" has never been her approach to non-custodial parents who can't pay.

Indeed, it's been Turetsky who over the past few years has gone on record pleading with states to be reasonable in setting child support guidelines. Her reports have been the ones pointing out that over 60% of non-custodial parents who are behind on their orders earn under $10,000 per year.

But that's been only hortatory. Beyond her personal desire to make the child support system make some sense, those statements meant nothing.

But with the publication in the Federal Register of proposed new rules on child support, all that changes. The proposed rules state the intention of the OCSE to require states to do a number of things that would bring child support orders a long way toward responsibility and common sense. They'd also mean that non-custodial parents would be more likely to pay what they owe, less likely to fall behind, and less likely still to be incarcerated for failure to pay.

Click here to go to the publication in the Federal Register. From there, go to pages 68553 to 68557 for the pertinent proposed rules. You'll find them under the heading "Section 302.56: Guidelines for Setting Child Support Awards."

The OCSE's publication in the Federal Register begins by reciting some of the applicable research on child support.

> A growing body of research finds that compliance with child support orders in some States, regardless of income level, declines when the support obligation is set above 15–20 percent of the obligor's income, and that orders for excessive amounts result in lower, not higher, child support payments.14 States like California and Washington have found that the direct result of establishing support obligations that exceed the ability of obligors to meet them is unpaid arrearages. Most arrearages are owed by noncustodial parents with earnings under $10,000 and are uncollectible.15 Research finds that high arrearages substantially reduce the formal earnings of noncustodial parents and child support payments in economically disadvantaged families, while reducing unmanageable arrearages can increase payments.16 Accumulation of high arrearage balances is often associated with incarceration, because parents have little to no ability to earn income while they are incarcerated, and little ability to pay off the arrearages when released due to lack of employment.

Stated another way, when parents have a manageable child support order, they tend to pay it; when the level is set too high, they know they can't pay it, become discouraged, and pay little or nothing of what they owe. That's particularly true of low-income parents. The only thing states get out of setting support levels too high is massive arrearages, and, I would add, a massive state bureaucracy whose job it is to collect money all know to be "uncollectible." The optimum level of support appears to be around 15% of the non-custodial parent's income. Anything above that tends to result in lower payments, not higher.

So one of the proposed new rules would require states to set orders at levels that parents can actually pay. It's amazing that, at this late date, we should have to be fighting that particular fight. In a saner world, it'd be a given that orders would be set that way, but the child support world has never been called sensible.

Another part of that concept is that modifications should occur in ways that would reflect the non-custodial parent's ability to pay. Likewise, orders should be based on actual evidence of parents' earnings. That means judges would be required, in all but the rarest of cases, to hold hearings, gather information on the ability to pay, and issue orders based thereon. In other words, default judgments should be a rarity and, most importantly, so should imputation of income.

> Setting child support orders that reflect an actual ability to pay is crucial to encouraging compliance, increasing accountability for making regular payments, and discouraging uncollectible arrearages. On January 30, 2013, the National Child Support Enforcement Association issued a policy statement indicating that: "As a general rule, child support guidelines and orders should reflect actual income of parents and be changed proactively to ensure current support orders reflect current circumstances of the parents and to encourage regular child support payments. Presumed or default orders should occur only in limited circumstances."

Then there's the little matter that many states consider a parent's incarceration to be "voluntary unemployment." Really. For purposes of deciding child support, those states assume that a father who's in jail went there intentionally to avoid paying child support. They therefore refuse to abate his payments with the result that he gets out of prison burdened with tens of thousands of dollars in unpaid child support debt, plus interests and fees. That's a debt that will never be paid but will make his life on the outside essentially impossible.

That's the background. The actual proposed new rules begin on page 68555.

First, only the "actual earnings" of a non-custodial parent will be able to be used in calculating child support.

Second, states will be required to include in their child support guidelines a basic subsistence level of income the non-custodial parent will be able to maintain. Income considered for child support calculations will only be that which exceeds that subsistence level. Some states already incorporate such a subsistence income into their guidelines, but many do not. The new rules would require all states to do so.

Third, while discouraging the imputation of income, the new rules allow it in cases in which "the noncustodial parent's lifestyle is inconsistent with earnings or income and where there is evidence of income or assets beyond those identified."

Fourth, the proposed rules would prohibit states from considering incarceration to be "voluntary unemployment."

Fifth (p. 68557), if a parent is hauled into court in contempt proceedings for failure to pay, the new rules would require states to allow the parent a subsistence living before he can be held in contempt.

> In addition, we encourage States to develop procedures to take into account the noncustodial parent's subsistence level in other child support enforcement procedures such as credit bureau reporting, license revocation, State tax refund offset, and liens.

Sixth, the OCSE rules would require judges to make written findings of fact based on actual evidence produced in court that a parent held in contempt is actually able to pay but refuses. That's an attempt to make states comply with the requirements of Turner vs. Rogers decided by the U.S. Supreme Court in 2011.

Seventh, the rules would require states, as part of their child support enforcement systems, to provide low-income parents job services to help them train for, obtain, and keep employment.

Those are far from the only proposals made by the OCSE to change its rules on state child support systems, but they're the ones that most directly impact non-custodial parents. For the most part, they'd make significant improvements in those systems.

What's important at this point is that they're proposed rules, not rules. That means the OCSE is now soliciting public comment on them, which further means that advocates for family court reform MUST make their voices known. Here's the link for commenting. (In the search engine, type in the name of the document, "Flexibility, Efficiency and Modernization in Child Support Enforcement Programs." That'll take you to the comment page.

Comments are due by January 15, 2015.)

By all means, let the OCSE know what you think and do so in an intelligent, civil way. Those who wish to keep child support levels as high as possible will be commenting, and we must as well.

A message for the White Ribbon Campaign

AVfM Video Source · 3 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The White Ribbon Campaign had themselves a smashing success with “White Ribbon Day.” The Canadian branch of the organization was gifted with $300,000 of the Canadian taxpayers’ money, which will help them, in turn, to raise even more money so that they can raise more money.

We assume that the White Ribbon branches in other countries like Australia and the UK also experienced similar windfalls.

But while fortune is currently in favor of the dubious organization, it was not all rose petals and petunias for them.

A scandal in Ireland involving phony rape statistics left them looking for an excuse and a scapegoat, which they quickly offered to a skeptical media.

The launch of WhiteRibbon.org, the website owed by domestic violence pioneer Erin Pizzey, has elicited defensive reactions from White Ribbon Canada and White Ribbon Australia, the latter of which has gone as far as to attempt to censor criticism of them from the eyes of the Australian YouTube audience—along with urging the Australian Parliament to take a dim view of anyone disagreeing with them.

Their troubles are not quite over.

Tune in to this channel for a conversation between AVfM News’s Robert O’Hara and AVfM founder Paul Elam at 1PM Perth time, 6:00 US Pacific Time, 8:00 Central, and 9:00 Eastern, in which Elam is expected to deliver a message directly to the White Ribbon Campaign.

Jane Gilmore should stop with the rubbish domestic violence games

Jim Muldoon · 3 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Jane Gilmore, writing in the feminist propaganda online rag Daily Life, gives us a thorough dose of the Sacred Babble of Feminism while she lectures us on domestic violence, which she insists on calling "men's violence against women." The article in question is entitled "No, women aren't as likely to commit violence as men."

Gilmore begins:

> Pick any article on the internet about the violence men commit against women and you can pretty much guarantee that at least one of the first five comments under it will be from a man furious that feminists are ignoring the unreported epidemic of women's violence against men. Most of the time it's quite obvious they've not even read the article in question; it's almost like a reflex action. A reflexive jerk, if you will.

Now, one of the techniques that feminists use for their propaganda is to introduce a little truth with a whole pile of misinformation. The idea is that in order for any reasonable person to discuss the issue with any seriousness, they have to unpack the drivel to show what is truth and what is not. By the time they have unravelled the mess, the point of the exercise is lost in the noise.

So let's just dismiss the "furious" men in the first five comments, and let's not even try to decode what the "unreported epidemic of women's violence against men" might even mean. Let's just assume she's having a little reflexive jerk of her own.

> It's time to stop; this is a rubbish claim. Not only is there no data that supports such a claim, but the data that we have proves the exact opposite.

This is the bit that gets interesting. Gilmore goes on to show why feminists should only quote data from feminist-approved sources with feminist facts and not do some research on their own. Data, especially real data, is never good for feminism as reality and fantasy seldom mix.

Gilmore tell us, authoritatively, that she has examined the Victorian Police's latest data, which gives her the statistics to shoot the raging male commenters down (in a caring, consultative, and inclusive manner, of course).

> According to Victoria Police crime statistics on offenders processed for the 2013/14 reporting year:
> - 87% of homicides were committed by men.
> - 98% of sexual assaults were committed by men.
> - 83% of non-sexual assaults were committed by men.
> - 90% of robberies were committed by men.
> - 92% of abductions were committed by men.

There it is, in all its damning glory. Men, men, men, bloody men.

Those who understand the history of the domestic violence industry know that feminists have long refused to deal with these particular statistics. Let me explain why.

There are, according to the Australian Bureau of Statistics, 5,821,300 people living in the state of Victoria. The total of these crimes in Victoria—that is "crimes committed against the person," as the coppers like to call it—was 59,907, with 55,201 victims (some cases will have involved multiple charges).

That means that 99% of Victorians were unharmed by such crimes.

Do you see the damage this could cause to the moral panic that is domestic violence? How can the Australian White Ribbon phonies emotionally blackmail Victorians for donations when the vast majority of the public are perfectly safe?

Let's look at those figures again, remembering that there are 2,075,454 adult males in Victoria:

> According to Victoria Police crime statistics on offenders processed for the 2013/14 reporting year:
> - 87% of 82 homicides were committed by 0.003% of all Victorian men.
> - 98% of of 8,961 sexual assaults were committed by 0.4% of all Victorian men.
> - 83% of 46,123 non-sexual assaults were committed by men 1.8% of all Victorian men.
> - 90% of 2,587 robberies were committed by 0.11% of all Victorian men.
> - 92% of 691 abductions were committed by 0.03% of all Victorian men.

In other words, almost all Victorian men (about 98%) are not the violent bullies that feminists try to paint them as.

Now, Gilmore isn't really interested in the homicides, robberies, and sexual assaults as a whole because the majority of the victims are also men. She simply wants to flit into the world of recorded crime, grab the statistics that suit her agenda, and get out again before anyone can examine the details.

Female victims are her only interest. For some reason, a man being hit by another man somehow doesn't count the same. It is as if a man only hits another man when he's run out of women to hit. The Sacred Babble has two names for men hitting women: domestic violence and family violence, and Gilmore uses both terms.

The Victorian Police also give a figure for domestic violence. It's not actually a figure for crime. Rather, it's a figure that comes from police paperwork. Whenever they are called out to investigate an incident, they tick a box that reads "Family Incident" if they feel that the incident could be described in such a manner.

But let's pretend, as feminists often do, that the 65,393 "Family Incidents" are real assaults. Let's also pretend, as feminists do, that each and every one of them was a woman being assaulted. And let's also pretend that each and every case means that a different woman was involved.

So of the 2,170,600 adult women living in Victoria, 97% or more were unharmed by patriarchy.

Gilmore then gives us a pseudo-intellectual example, copied from a pseudo-intellectual TED Talk by an "anti-sexism educator" called Jackson Katz. The example starts with "John raped Mary" and ends with "Mary is a rape victim." The logic is too tortuous to go into here, but naturally it proves the existence of patriarchy.

So let us use this tool of enlightenment in a more honest way.

A few men have assaulted a few women
Here we begin with the truth. A very small minority of men, in Victoria, have indeed assaulted a very small minority of women. The numbers, compared to the population as a whole, are not large. This does not make the assaults any less criminal. In fact, the reason why the men were arrested, charged, convicted, and sentenced is because it was wrong.

It is also possible to imagine, in the picture this phrase paints, that a few women could have assaulted a few men too.

A few men have assaulted women
Here we have the beginning of the feminist bending of the truth. There is no qualifier on the number of women, which gives the implication that "a few" is the very least that was assaulted. This further implies that these men assault women as a class rather than the individuals they meet and interact with. In other words, those few men would have assaulted other women, and perhaps even more women, if they'd had the chance.

The notion that a few women have also assaulted a few men still remains a possibility, but these particular men would be unlikely to have been assaulted.

Men have assaulted women
Not only are we now dealing with women as a class, but we are also now dealing with men as a class. This raises the level of the problem. With no qualifier on the numbers, it seems more pervasive. The term systematic becomes a distinct possibility.

Also, while the possibility still exists for a few women to have assaulted a few men, the more general case of "women have assaulted men" becomes less likely. Women, as a group, are probably too busy dealing with being assaulted to carry out attacks of their own.

Men assault women
Here we have the true feminist position, and certainly the one taken by Gilmore. By removing the past tense, we now have a statement that assaulting women is something that men—because they are men—do.

And they assault women because they are women. This is what feminists call "gendered violence."

Gilmore does try to weasel her way out of the bind of the criminal statistics by later trying to argue the standard tip-of-the-iceberg line that feminists often use with these statistics. However, having just declared that there are no groups of male victims "hidden" behind the statistics, her argument that there actually is a hidden mass of female victims is just too silly.

The real problem here, of course, is that the domestic violence industry stays away from these figures because of the low numbers. In other studies, violence gets a much wider definition to the point of absurdity. Spiritual violence, economic violence, and other forms of violence get thrown into the pot to get the numbers up.

For example, it is entirely possible for the words I'll get you to take on a chilling meaning in certain circumstances. If the person is brandishing a weapon, or has a violent history, this threat could be very real. This indeed could cause real fear in the individual being threatened and could properly be called violence.

But to declare each and every utterance of this usually empty threat as "violence" is simply just boosting up the numbers.

Worse than stupid, Gilmore claims that, if men were victims of domestic violence, it would show up in surveys like the Australian Bureau of Statistics Personal Safety Studies. This comes from the woman who accuses the "furious men" who were making the comments (remember them) of not properly reading the articles. She then goes on to state:

> It is also true that men can be the victim of family violence, not to the extent that groups like the 'One In Three' campaign claim, but it certainly happens.…

So where does the One in Three campaign get its name from? According to its website:

> The Australian Bureau of Statistics 4906.0 – Personal Safety, Australia, 2012 (2013)[1] is the largest and most recent survey of violence in Australia. It found that:
> - one in three victims of current partner violence during the last 12 months (33.3%) and since the age of 15 (33.5%) were male

And if you actually read the Personal Safety Study, 2012, you'll find that the One in Three campaign has got its facts correct.

Too many men and boys are being shamed by the feminist facts into believing that they are some kind of monsters, or at least monsters-in-training, because of the original sin of being male.

Jane Gilmore, it is indeed time for this rubbish to stop. So stop it. Now.

Men's rights: Got a problem with it?

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 3 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I, the present writer, am not a member of the so-called "men's rights movement." That said, I would like to share some thoughts about this whole business of "men's rights."

Either you agree that the male population has "rights" or you don't. If you don't, you should straightly declare this. I will thank you for your candor, but then I will send you on your way because the discussion no longer concerns you.

All right, I turn to the rest of you—those who would agree, at least in principle, that men have "rights."

Over the years, I have noticed a peculiar thing. I have met many people who mock and deride the notion of "men's rights" whenever that notion confronts them. They are not in the least dispassionate or cool-headed about this.

I will often ask these people if they think men should have "rights" at all. They will splutter and declare that yes, of course they think that men should have rights. However, when I press them further, they will inform me that only the IDEA of men's rights affronts them, reason being that men "have all their rights anyway" and nothing to complain about.

Men's rights, we are to suppose, are fully intact and uncompromised—hence, there is no warrant to raise any fuss about this.

So their reaction to the phrase "men's rights" is emotion-based, and their clear intent is to shut down further conversation on that subject. They evidently do not wish to entertain, by any stretch, the concept of "men's rights." More to the point, they vehemently reject the thought that "men's rights" are somehow being violated.

One senses that it would please them greatly if all talk of "men's rights" was banished from the public discourse. After all, if they don't want to hear it from you, I'm guessing they don't want to hear it from anybody, anywhere, at any time.

Of course, we understand that these people harbor no objection to "men's rights" as such—or so they tell us. Right? They simply cannot believe "men's rights" are in danger, and they are so sure of this that they want you to shut the hell up about it.

Mind you, I don't say that they would take away your RIGHT to talk about "men's rights." I'm sure they would allow this, in principle. It's just that they would prefer to shut you up where they can personally hear it.

For example, in the mass media—that's one place where they could personally hear it, so I'm sure they'd rather not listen to your presumptuous twaddle about so-called "men's rights" in the mass media. Right?

And when they meet you one-on-one, they certainly don't need to hear your presumptuous twaddle then, either. Right? Of course not.

I mean, hey, these are good, liberal, progressive-minded people. So of COURSE they believe in free speech and all that, but for heaven's sake don't tax their patience with stuff like racism, fascism, or so-called "men's rights." They won't sit still for that, and you can hardly blame them. Right?

And of COURSE they agree that men have "rights"! But men's rights are self-evidently ship-shape—so if you disagree, you'd best keep that to yourself! Sure, you can whine about so-called "men's rights" all you like, but heaven help you if they catch wind of it!

To wrap this up: it seems that men DO have rights, but those rights are allegedly doing fine and men have nothing to complain about. And yes, it seems that you DO have a right to dispute the foregoing claim but no right to do it audibly if there is any chance the claimant will hear you.

In conclusion, let me say it again: I am NOT a member of the so-called "men's rights movement." I say that because I think it is more important to hunt the mammoth that is feminism.

Yet in practice I find it impossible to plan the death of feminism without bumping into “men’s rights” and related topics along the way. You simply can’t avoid it—these things are far too interwoven.

So yes, I do sometimes appear to talk about “men’s rights.” However, it is more precise to say that I am discussing feminism’s crimes—specifically, feminism’s crimes against men. I mean, when you bring a criminal to justice, one thing you do is compose a list of that criminal’s offenses. Am I right?

Very well. Although I am not what is simplistically called an “MRA,” I have friends who might call themselves that. And you know what? They can rant about “so-called men’s rights” to their heart’s content. I will sit back and smile because I know that the first right of all is the right to speak up angrily if you think your rights are in jeopardy. If you lose THAT right, then all the rest aren’t worth one cold spit in a windstorm.

Rape Culture – What is it? What does it do?

Jason Sinclair · 3 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

We have all heard the term rape culture. A lingering look is a part of rape culture. A comment on a woman's body she doesn't appreciate is rape culture. Saying hi to an attractive woman you see on the street is rape culture, etc.

Our society is constantly exposed to someone or another talking about how only men can stop rape—that we, as men, are all really just potential rapists (see Schrödinger's Rapist). As a society, we seem preoccupied with it.

I decided to look into the statistical prevalence of rape and sexual assault in our society and compare it with the prevalence of other crimes to see if there is, indeed, an actual rape culture.

I started by looking at the U.S. Criminal Victimization Survey by type of crime. I found that rape and sexual assault in 2007 was fairly high, with 248,300 cases reported in the survey. (This is a self-reported study that is not related to complaints to authorities about the crime). I did, however, also look at other serious crimes for the same time period. Robbery was more than twice as prevalent as rape/sexual assault, with 597,300 cases in the same time period. So why not call us a robbery culture? How about the prevalence of assault? It's almost 20 times as prevalent in our society, with 4,331,500 cases in the same time period. This makes assault culture or violence culture much more accurate than rape culture.

So then I asked: What is the rape culture narrative doing? Couldn't it be seen as taking our cultural focus and narrowing it down to the point that we really don't see the larger picture? The fact that violent crimes happen constantly and are all serious problems for society. I do understand that sexual assault is a hot-button topic for a lot of us. As a kid I was sexually assaulted once and I know it is serious. I, however, have also been robbed as well as seriously assaulted on several occasions over the course of my life so far.

Is the rape culture narrative causing our society to attack a small portion of the huge violent-crime pie? Why would we do this?

I am guessing it's due to the victim narrative—the victims of these crimes are what's important here, not so much the crime.

So I started to look into what the rape culture narrative was doing to help the victims of these awful attacks. I found that the narrative has led to tons of foundations, homes, shelters, etc. The belief that these people need help seems ingrained and acted upon by our culture. As I was reviewing these services and how they might apply to me, I realized that I don't fit the victim narrative. Within 50 kilometres of my house, there are nine shelters for women/children. They aren't all specifically rape shelters, but they are violence shelters. That seems fair. It makes more sense to have a house that could serve more than such a specific niche.

The problem I have is that I am not a woman or a child. Really, I personally have no need for a shelter; and it's a good thing too because I couldn't find any within 50 kilometres of me. So I expanded the search and realized that here in Canada there isn't one. Not one. As I googled "men's shelters," the only result I got was an article on a man, Earl Silverman, who tried to start one but after years of struggle and strife killed himself. Don't get me wrong, there are several homeless shelters that men can go to, just no violence shelters. (Can you imagine bringing a child into a homeless shelter? You'd most likely lose custody almost immediately.)

So it looks to me that the rape culture narrative is helping those it sees fit to help: in short, women and children—and why not? They are who we have deemed to be the powerless in our society, those that most need help.

So if rape culture is about helping the victims and making society aware, they have done a great job. The victims are women and their children.

However, it leads me to ask another question: If rape culture is about women and their children, isn't it a women's culture? or a children's culture? It looks to me, as an outsider (that is, not one of the people who can qualify as a victim anymore), that the rape culture narrative is about ensuring that the approved people learn the approved narrative.

It seems to follow that rape culture is actually victim culture, and that victim culture is inclusive of a wide variety of people, including women, children, people with disabilities, etc. It's no wonder that that poor terrified woman wrote that post about Schrödinger's Rapist mentioned above. She is terrified! Who can blame her? She's a victim and there's nothing she can do about it. Luckily, there are shelters and foundations out there just waiting to take her in and tell her: "We told you so."

Now, there are other things we could do as a society to help those people who need it. We could educate them on high-risk behaviours and high-risk situations. We could teach them about safety in numbers or make them feel empowered by teaching them self-defence or other strategies to help them in a crisis situation. We could do those things, but we aren't allowed. We're not allowed because it's wrong to expect these victims to have to prepare for the worst. So we as a society decided that the best way to deal with these issues is to tell the criminals that they shouldn't break the law. After all, since it's the criminals who are causing this mess, it should be the criminals' responsibility to fix it, right? I personally agree that criminals should stop being criminals, that they should fall in line with our laws and values. Imagine the society we would have if that happened. It would be a step toward paradise.

If everyone did what they should be doing, we wouldn't need a lot of things in our society. We could stop spending all this money on police and security guards. We wouldn't need seatbelts, tanks, fighter jets, sniper rifles, or grenades. It would be trillions of dollars we could re-invest into health care and education. It would be truly amazing!

The fact that the dream is not likely to become a reality any time soon means I still drive with my seatbelt on and I lock my doors at night. I am still acutely aware of my surroundings in a dark, empty parking lot. I do these things even though I can't really be a victim. Not really.

Maybe—until we are able to realize the dream that we teach these terrified people how to feel safer in their communities—just maybe let's allow them to learn a common sense approach that tells them they can affect the outcome. It may not stop the victimization of people, it may have no measurable effect at all. It could, however, make those people who are able to be victims feel a bit more in control. Feel a bit more secure. Allow them to see themselves as strong and capable members of our society. True or not, it's got to feel better than waiting in terror until the inevitable happens.

Since I can't truly be a "victim," I can't really know for sure—but it makes sense to me.

A Flood of DV insanity and doublespeak

Tom Golden · 4 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Gentlemen, the goalposts have been moved. Buckle your seatbelts.

I read Michael Flood's article that he offered in a comment on AVfM as defense for his assumption that women are 95% of the victims of domestic violence. I was not prepared for what I found. Guess what? He and other DV potentates are reframing domestic violence, and his claims of 95% female victims only refers to what he calls "intimate terrorism" (also called "coercive controlling violence").

The name may be new, but the idea of intimate terrorism has been around for some time. My memory tells me that even the early DV activists used a similar descriptor of the problem. In fact, the implication then, and even now, was that all of domestic violence was intimate terrorism. You know, that big-burly-smelly-angry guy™ who controls the whimpering wifey with an iron hand, yells for his sammich, and beats her to a pulp for not adding enough mayo. That guy. In the early days, this was the poster child for DV: the out-of-control man beating the defenseless woman and controlling her every move.

Everyone in the gynocentric press jumped on the bandwagon like it was the only train out of hell. Donations flooded in (pun intended) by the millions. Laws were written at warp 7 (in Star Trek vernacular), and in a wisp of time the domestic violence industry became a billion-plus-dollar-a-year venture solely by alleging to protect women from these evil, mostly imaginary patriarchs. They made a stunning success of framing all men as potential intimate terrorists and all women as potential victims. Domestic violence was falsely framed as pervasive, and the DV propaganda machine sold the myth that acts of a tiny, pathological minority were representative of all men. They also succeeded at taking a complex, multifaceted social malady and reducing it to a "one size fits all" sound bite fit for low-end public consumption. Of course, a significant part of that reduction was to cut male victims and female perpetrators from the picture.

There was just one problem: that pesky research. Study after study kept showing that women admitted to being violent in relationships as often as men, pointing to symmetry in the victims of domestic violence. In fact, women admitted more often than men that they were violent in relationship.

The DV industry researchers reacted to that by focusing on how men lie and minimize their abusiveness; that women are afraid to report their abusers; that real perpetrators won't admit as much on a questionnaire—and on and on. But guess what? None of those excuses could negate the fact that women admitted to committing violence against their intimate partners. Period. The only way around it was to call the women liars and that wasn't going to happen. Even the self-defense mantra didn't work outside their own insulated ideology.

So, what to do? How can gender symmetry in DV be explained in ways that still demonize men and make them ripe for fundraising? This is where the fun, a flood of it, starts.

It starts by moving the goalposts. They saw the writing on the wall that their worldview of all DV being men beating women was crumbling and something needed to be done to explain why those women would admit to being violent. What did they do? They invented a new term: situational couple's violence (SCV). Wow! Here's what Flood says about this:

> Here, the violence is relatively minor, both partners practise it, it is expressive (emotional) in meaning, it tends not to escalate over time, and injuries are rare. Situational couple violence does not involve a general pattern of coercive control.

Hold the press, folks. Can you imagine a man explaining to a batterer's intervention leader (or to a judge, for that matter) that his violence was emotionally expressive in meaning and not part of a serious pattern of coercive control?

He would be instant toast.

Flood makes a case for men being only 5% to 10% of domestic violence victims by differentiating what he calls SCV, where male victims are common, from what he calls "intimate terrorism," which he concludes is nearly all female victims. He portrays intimate terrorism as mostly a lethal, controlling man dominating a helpless woman. This is Flood's 95% female victims. This is different, he tells us, from the situational couple's violence that is commonplace in everyday relationships when people get upset and might push or shove in a spontaneous manner. This, Flood argues, may be violent but lacks the injurious, dominating, and coercive aspects of intimate terrorist violence (shall we go ahead and coin ITV for you, Michael?).

He tells us that situational couple's violence, unlike ITV, includes both male and female victims. He also tells us that situational couple's violence is much more prevalent than intimate terrorism—probably by at least a factor of 3 to 1.

This gambit superficially appears to get Flood and the DV industry out of some hot water since for decades they have portrayed women as the only victims of domestic violence—while the research clearly demonstrates gender symmetry.

How to explain those gosh darn violent women in a system without male victims? Just create a new category! Situational couple's violence—the violence that does not matter. If he can show that the violence that women are involved with is just, you know, situational violence, then the fact that women are violent in relationships can easily be explained and ignored. And so can their male victims.

Okay, but wait. If you make that jump and believe that the real domestic violence is ITV, with men beating women, then what do you do with SCV? Looks like out of the frying pan and into the fire.

You see, Flood never tells us whether SCV is something that needs treatment from domestic violence services or if it is something that can be ignored and allowed to exist without intervention. Either way, I think they are screwed. What should they be doing with those male and female victims of SCV?

Is it something that needs to be treated by domestic violence services? If it is something that needs to be treated, what services are available for this large group of male and female victims? The research seems clear to say that this type of violence is more likely to need counseling or educational assistance. Is that offered by domestic violence services for this type of violent couple? Are they catering to this large majority with appropriate counseling services? I sure haven't seen it or even heard of it.

Is SCV even something that needs intervention? One might assume that, since Flood completely ignored it in his assessment of victims. If we don't need to change situational couple's violence, then the White Ribbon folks of Australia are right to ignore it. However, if it is something that does need treatment and services, then why would White Ribbon only enlist men to change domestic violence? If SCV has both male and female victims, should they be enlisting both sexes? Flood is an ambassador for the White Ribbon Australia group. I wonder why he hasn't urged them in this direction?

Then the other possibility is that SCV is not something that needs the attention of domestic violence services, and if that is the case, how do they differentiate one from the other and then release those who are only committing "situational" violence? I haven't seen a bit of that either.

When do the "There's No Excuse for Abuse" posters start coming down?

The concept of situational couple's violence, also known as common couple violence, has been around for quite some time. First introduced into the literature in 1995 and discussed frequently in the 2000s, it is certainly a well-known concept, but … you never see a thing about it in the media, nor in the legislation, and certainly not in the services themselves. Something seems amiss.

Are we all to now erase the "no excuse" mantra of the past 50 years and put it in the dumpster along with some others? It seems so, because now they have fabricated an excuse. It's called situational couple's violence.

Yes, after failing to sell the "all violence is male" narrative, it is now intimate terrorism that Flood is convinced is the more virulent form of DV, with 95% female victims. He claims that the nationally representative samples that show gender symmetry were actually not about real violence at all. No, they were just situational couple's violence. Voila! Now we don't have to worry anymore about the research that showed women to be violent. That was just situational—unimportant—violence. Now we can create another boogie man who can keep the woman-only narrative going for a little while longer. The narrative of intimate terrorism, which is the province of men, of course. As we all know, women do not seek coercive control of relationships. Never happens.

The Australian Personal Safety Survey reported that 73,800 females and 21,200 males were victims of at least one incident of physical assault by a current or previous partner. By my math, even this official Australian survey (which, by the way, focuses considerably more on women than on men) clearly states that men comprise about 22% of the victims. Surely not 5%. But what does Flood do with this official figure? He claims that it is mostly those pesky situational couple's violence folks. Here's what he says:

> Violence which is usually minor and infrequent – what Johnson calls situational couple violence – is likely to dominate general survey data.

Then he goes on to mysteriously estimate the number of intimate terrorists from the survey totals. He relies on a crony, Michael Johnson, to do the dirty work. Johnson estimates that 25% of those 73,800 female victims were victims of intimate terrorism and only 5% to 10% of the 21,200 male victims would qualify for this designation. Pretty impressive. But they never did say how they came to those numbers. They just pulled them out of air so thin it might be anorexic.

Notice that Flood is careful when he quotes these numbers when he says:

> So, if this is accurate, then female victims of intimate terrorism by a male partner are somewhere from eight to 17 times as common as male victims of intimate terrorism by a female partner. There are around 19 to 20,000 individuals (19,510 to 20,570) living with intimate terrorism this year, and males are between five and 10 percent of all victims.

Kudos to Flood for the "if this is accurate" disclaimer. It allows him to spread completely unsupported data at a safe enough distance for plausible deniability in the face of inevitable debunking. Also note that he is suggesting that there are a total of 18,450 female victims of what he calls intimate terrorism. Since Australia's female population was about 7.5 million at the time of this survey that boils down to less than three women out of a thousand having experienced what Flood calls Intimate Terrorism. I guess that 1 in 5 thing, even by Flood's suspicious standards, will just have to go, eh?

Of course, he says that in order to get good numbers about intimate terrorism, you need to avoid using nationally representative samples. They just show you the non-important, non-issue violence. The kind of violence that Flood says doesn't count. What you really need to do is to use data from shelters, hospitals, police, and other agencies that specialize in dealing with women-only victims.

Here's what he says:

> Studies using the Conflict Tactics Scale are most likely to pick up the pattern of aggression involved in 'situational couple violence'. Acts-based studies are only a weak measure of levels of minor violence in conflicts among heterosexual couples. They are poorer again as a measure of intimate terrorism or coercive controlling violence (Johnson 1995, 284-285).
> The other two types of violence—coercive controlling violence (or intimate terrorism) and violent resistance—predominate in samples drawn from agencies (law, refuges, hospitals) (Johnson 2010: 213).

So in one sweep of his hand, Flood dismisses years of research using the CTS, which tended to find gender symmetry in domestic violence, and says we need to focus on data from, gulp, women's refuges! Sure! That's where you will certainly find the, um, women who are victims! Yes! What a convenient idea for him to search for male victims from a sample drawn from services that are very specifically built for female victims.

I have an idea, I want to study polar bears. I think I will go to Mexico to study them. After not finding any polar bears, I can easily say I looked and they simply did not exist. Nice try, Mikey. Not.

So the struggle now is how to differentiate when and if there is such a thing as intimate terrorism and who are the victims. How does one tell the difference between situational couple's violence and intimate terrorism? Where is the line? Are there different treatments for both?

Frankly, I see this as progress in some ways. I have seen for years men and women who were actually what are being called situational couple's violence types get trampled by a "one size fits all" system that vilified the man and snatched away any power from the woman to stop the DV Gestapo from stampeding her husband. Maybe this new terminology will give the majority of couples who get into a scrum some help to process things and to learn new ways to cope rather than to be separated, jailed, shamed, and impoverished.

There is such a thing as intimate terrorism. It is rare, but it is there, and it is deadly whether the perp is male or female. I am happy to see efforts made to find and sort out that type of pathology and deal with it. When I have seen this before, the perpetrators—whether male or female—have been sociopaths and not likely to benefit from therapy. They generally need a different approach.

Many of us have been suggesting for decades that these extreme cases do in fact exist but they are not representative of all family violence. All too often therapy would be very helpful for many of these couples, but the DV industry has thus far refused and preferred their totalitarian judgmental approach that treats the ladies with kid gloves and the men with a whip.

Maybe this way of differentiating will help to tease out those who are truly sociopaths from those who are struggling as couples. Let's get those non-sociopath couples into therapy with a good therapist. The treatment regimes I have seen for DV seem to run on the vastly erroneous assumption that all perpetrators are male and sociopathic. Maybe that can change. Just my two cents.

It is not much of a guess to say that this will take a long time, years, to sort this out. What is more than clear, however, is that we will not get to that point with the help of ideologues clamoring desperately to maintain a false narrative at any cost. And the cost is formidable.

My heart goes out to all the men who have been imprisoned and/or forced to attend sexist, hateful, and abusive batterers programs who were in a relationship that had situational couple's violence. I think the DV industry owes millions of men and children an apology and a serious change in direction.

Some men have problems, but men are not the problem. Indeed, men are good.

Author note: The link below goes to a paper by Denise Hines, PhD, and Emily Douglas, PhD. It is an excellent academic resource that refutes many of the typical anti-male arguments about men and DV. This one focuses on the reality that men also are victims of "intimate terrorism." If you don't know Hines and Douglas, I strongly urge you to get to know some of their work. They are the ones who documented the mistreatment men receive when seeking help from DV services. I am very grateful for their excellent work.

When ladies rule

Mark Dent · 4 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

You have to laugh or you would cry and perhaps never stop.

As I perused the morning paper (Herald Sun, Nov. 15, 2014), I came across an article entitled "Sorry lads, ladies rule."

It begins:

> You may well know the name Miranda Kerr, but have you heard of Joel Meacock?
> She is Australia's No. 1 supermodel and he is king of our male catwalkers. But there the similarities end.
>
> Our top male models earn a fraction of their female equivalents with the modelling industry one of the only professions in which the gender pay gap is reversed.
> The top male, American Sean O'Pry made 31 times less than the industry's highest money maker, Brazil's Gisele Bundchen.

This should not cause me the slightest angst as this is clearly a market-driven industry where public demand decides who gets paid the most. It's simple and fair. Except that when this same principle is applied to the film industry, sports, or other areas dominated by males, it is no longer considered appropriate. How many times have you heard female actors who have made millions and just collected their fifth Golden Globe or Oscar bemoaning the lack of roles for females in movies or the sexism inherent in the film industry?

Cate Blanchett, a woman who has made millions from her acting career, felt it necessary after just receiving an Oscar to attack the industry that provides her with her luxurious lifestyle and fame.

> Cate Blanchett chided Hollywood for sexism Sunday night while accepting an Academy Award for Best Actress — encouraging studios to make more movies about women.
> The Oscar-winner expressed hope that the success of "Blue Jasmine" and films starring fellow nominees Sandra Bullock ("Gravity") and Amy Adams ("American Hustle") would break the myth that "female films with women at the center are niche experiences."
> "They are not," Blanchett said. "Audiences want to see them. In fact, they earn money."

It is interesting to note that the financial success of a movie is based entirely upon the number of people who wish to see it. No one is forced to see a film that does not interest them. Movie moguls are in the business to make money. They may get it wrong occasionally, but they are the experts in this field. If what Blanchett says is true, then she is suggesting that the producers and directors of Hollywood are deliberately overlooking women for lead roles or blockbuster movies simply because they are sexist. These businessmen (and women) are choosing to lose millions of dollars in revenue just to keep women off our screens.

Blanchett says movies with women in them "earn money." Of course they do—but just not enough to justify the risk of replacing men in lead roles or action films with chick flicks. I might add that women make up at least half (and probably more) of those who regularly go to the movies so why aren't women and girls flocking to movies with females in the lead roles?

Let's return to the world of models. Imagine for a moment what the reaction would be if Australia's leading male model spoke out and said the reason Miranda Kerr earns so much more than he does is because of the inherent sexism in the modelling industry.

He would be laughed out of town. The modelling industry would point to the facts, which are:

> Globally, the womenswear retail industry is worth $621 billion while the menswear industry comes in around $400 billion. In Australia's $12.8 billion retail market the difference is even more pronounced, with womenswear accounting for 46.9% and menswear 20.2%.
>
> Martin de Courtenay, from Chadwick models said, "The discrepancy in income for models arises with the release of advertising campaigns-that's where we see girls earning significantly more."
> Few men were able to make modelling a fulltime career living solely from catwalking and campaigns.

So, clearly, the facts show that there is more demand for female models because there is more money in womenswear. Male models could bleat and whine, but they would simply look stupid. Unlike Blanchett, these men understand the industry and they know that if they don't like it they can always leave.

But there are other aspects to this article that interest me. We continually hear of the poverty of women or lack of financial security. Yet here in Australia women are spending many more billions on essentials like shoes, dresses, hats, and lingerie than men do on clothing.

Whenever I walk through a shopping mall, it is clear that women are the overwhelming market for our retailers. How does this tie in with the notion of patriarchal oppression and subjugation?

The shops I frequent have beauty salons in which rows of women sit in chairs and have their nails on their feet and hands painted. Every time I go past one of these salons, I am reminded of the days of queens and princesses having their servants cater to their every whim. They sit in their padded seats while attendants kneel at their feet. I always mutter quietly to my wife:

> Behold, the oppressed!

Where are all the men? Probably at work earning the money that pays for this weekly pampering. However, I digress!

The world of sports is another that leads female athletes, cricketers, netballers, and soccer players to complain about the lack of sponsorship and coverage of female sports in the media.

They argue that the reason males bring in the big crowds and high ratings is the fact that they receive so much more attention than their female equivalents. In other words, the TV networks are sexist and deliberately choose male sports over female ones simply because they think women are an inferior species.

If only netball or women's cricket were given saturation coverage, the crowds would come flocking to their venues and we would have female sportswomen becoming household names and adorning posters on bedroom walls.

The problem once again with so much feminist drivel is that this is simply untrue. What comes first—the chicken or the egg? Male sports receive huge coverage in our media because huge crowds pack stadiums to watch them. Many of those who pack the stands are female. Why are they attending a male sporting event when they could be watching their sisters throw a netball around or smack a cricket ball to the boundary? The answer is simple. They prefer male sports because the athletes are bigger, stronger, faster, and more spectacular in every aspect of the game they play.

If a female sport started gathering crowds of 50,000 on a regular basis, you can be certain the TV networks would be lining up to win the TV rights.

Here's what some believe is the reason for the focus on male sports. Caitlin Horsham in her article entitled "Women Deserve a Sporting Chance in the Media" states:

> During the year the men's AFL, cricket, rugby league, soccer, rugby union, tennis and golf dominate Australian sport via national television coverage. Why is this so? Men's sport does have the advantage of incumbency. It > has been around for a long time which enables teams to be build long-lasting loyalties that can even be passed down through families. In addition, there is the stereotypical prejudice against the level of women's athletic ability as not as strong as a males and the large variety of sport available in a crowded marketplace is also a contributing factor.

So the fact that every sports fan can see that men jump higher, throw farther, run faster, punch more powerfully, and perform everything they do at a faster, more explosive manner has nothing to do with the huge crowds that attend their performances. It is all due to "long lasting loyalty" and the worrying fact that the large variety of sport makes for a crowded marketplace.

Again, it is also prejudice that makes us prefer male sports—not preference. Could I say the same of the modelling industry? Only if I wished to be branded a moron.

Isn't the marketplace the one and only factor in deciding who gets the big bucks and dominates media coverage? Isn't that what competition is all about? We put our best out there, and if people like what they see, they vote with their feet or wallet. If female sports are as entertaining as Caitlin claims, why can't they compete?

The UFC brand has become a worldwide phenomenon, yet it was unheard of 20 years ago. It has had to compete with sports like boxing, kickboxing, and wrestling, which have been entrenched in our sporting psyche for decades. The product was so well presented and the quality of the athletes so impressive that fans (both male and female) went to the events in huge numbers. TV wanted in on the action and this created even more interest and passion. The promoters of mixed martial arts didn't squeal about the "crowded marketplace"—they jumped in and competed, believing their product was superior.

It seems that when the marketplace dictates that women should receive in some cases 31 times what a male receives (modelling), there is no problem to be fixed. It is a simple matter of supply and demand. However, when this same equation is in play in areas where men receive bigger rewards, we have an urgent issue that needs to be investigated and "fixed" as actors whine about sexism and injustice even as they win prestigious awards and pocket millions.

The final paragraph of this article is what truly underlined the absolutely Orwellian capacity feminists have for the ability to doublethink. Doublethink is the act of ordinary people simultaneously accepting two mutually contradictory beliefs as correct, often in distinct social contexts.

Workplace Gender Equality Agency representative, Yolanda Beattie said,

> "It's great to see a profession where women are finding success—but it's a shame it's that one that is based on looks."

So this woman for gender equity thinks it is wonderful to see some women earning ten times the money males do in their profession. She calls this "finding success."

However, she is still flying the feminist flag by reminding us what a shallow, objectifying form of employment it is to make money based on your looks—just so we realise that these mulit- millionaire female models are still the victims in this story. Making money based upon your ability to punch another man or tackle him to the ground would not be considered demeaning or objectifying. Yolanda would probably call this privilege.

Can you imagine Yolanda congratulating male CEOs for finding success in their chosen profession? Success earned by their capacity to devote long years of their talent and time to their career—something many women are not willing or are unable to do?

Don't hold your breath.

An inquiry to Twitter management

Hannah Wallen · 5 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In the past few months I've seen some discussion on the exploitation of vulnerable aspects of Twitter's rules by social justice warriors to silence political dissent by using bots to mass-block or mass-report so dissenters' accounts would be suspended. On October 29, I emailed press@twitter.com with questions, explaining my intent behind the request. I wanted to be upfront about the fact that this was for an article to ensure that their reply would consist of information they wanted known. My email:

> Recent trends in some groups' tweets have included referencing the option included in the "block or report" menu to report another user for content that is "Generally offensive, disrespectful or in disagreement with my opinion." Some users are touting that option as a means to silence political dissent. This sounded unlike a social site policy, and led me to look further into the reporting options.
> Further investigation has only led to more questions, including questions about other options for reporting. The help bubble for that option says "Twitter does not screen content and does not remove potentially offensive content unless such content is in violation of the Twitter Rules and Terms of Service," so I have read those.
> Some of the twitter rules have wording which could be subject to broad interpretation and potential abuse. I'm writing to request clarification, as I am considering an article. My current focus is communication, harassment, censorship, and how twitter's rules affect engagement between users in relation to political and other potentially controversial discussions. Any information I receive in response to these questions will contribute to that article.
> For instance, listed under "targeted abuse" are
> - if the sole purpose of your account is to send abusive messages to others;
> and
> - if the reported behavior is one-sided or includes threats
> What factors determine if the sole purpose of an account is to send abusive messages to others?

> Is disagreement with others' opinion considered an abusive message, and if so does that mean engaging in debate by replying to publicly made statements of opinion with counterarguments is now considered abuse?
> If not, what is the specific reason for including "in disagreement with my opinion" in the harassment reporting options?

> I am assuming that tweets without @user mentions are not considered "targeted" because they do not involve intentional contact and users can block feed they do not want to see. Is this correct?

> Does "targeted abuse" include @user mentions without abusive language, but which contain a dissenting counterargument to something the user has said? (eg. I disagree with @twitteruser's stated opinion in LinkToPublication because reason #politicalorsocialconcept or @twitteruser I disagree with what you said.) If so, is that a blanket rule or does the behavior have to be repeated or continue after the user engaging in it has received some variation of "stop talking to me" before it is considered to be in violation?

> Does the tone of a tweet change whether it is considered abusive, and if so what is the criteria for that? ("I disagree with what you said" vs a similar line containing expletives vs a line containing slurs or the suggestion > that the user deserves to suffer violence because of his opinion.)

> Under the Spam heading are the following criteria:
> - If you have followed and/or unfollowed large amounts of users in a short time period, particularly by automated means (aggressive following or follower churn);

> When a political or social movement forms on twitter, users often follow each other so that posts about their specific pet issue will show up in their feed. Is it a goal of twitter to prevent this, or does following require automated means in order to be considered a violation?
> - If your updates consist mainly of links, and not personal updates;
>
> Many users post links to news stories, videos, and memes related to hashtags created for issues and concepts that have meaning to them. Very often these are, to the user, personal updates because they are new information about the issue or concept. Will users whose personal updates usually include links to information be considered spammers?
> - If a large number of people are blocking you;
> - If a large number of spam complaints have been filed against you;
>
> This looks like it could be used by ideological groups to silence popular or very vocal users whose updates contain statements of opinion to which they are opposed, by banding together to all block and/or report the same person, thereby putting him or her in violation. What is twitter's administration doing to counter potential abuse of these rules?
> - If you post multiple unrelated updates to a topic using #, trending or popular topic, or promoted trend;
>
> There are Twitter users currently interpreting this to mean that dissenting views to a hashtag's political outlook and criticism of the belief or assertion behind a hashtag can be considered spam if it is posted to the hashtag. For example, posting an opposing viewpoint with a political hashtag can offend the readers of the hashtag, but it's a discussion attempt. Is it considered spam even if it is not belligerent or threatening?

> This line is hard to interpret. Can you please give a more detailed explanation of what it means? How does twitter determine when following, favoriting, and retweeting are random or aggressive, and when doing those things is acceptable?

> Finally, do you have a policy in place to deal with habitual, vexatious false flagging (users repeatedly reporting content which does not violate rules or terms of service in an attempt to silence speech they disapprove or people they dislike)? This is a behavior I've seen on other social networking sites where administrators have written and posted broadly interpretable policy without stipulating that false exploitation of it would also lead to discipline. What is Twitter doing to prevent users from banding together to engage in this type of harassment, and how do you differentiate between a user engaging in this and a user who spots or experiences and reports a lot of genuine violations?

> If you provide me with a statement on the overall goal of Twitter's rules and guidelines as they relate to discussion on the site, I will include that in the article.

> If you have any questions for me, please let me know, and I'll be happy to clarify anything that has not come > across clearly. Thank you in advance for taking the time to address these questions. I hope to produce an article that will bring about better understanding of Twitter's rules and their relationship to the many discussions among users of the site.

To date, I have not heard back. I cannot be sure if this is simply due to their staff for handling press requests being small and unable to keep up or if they are avoiding answering the questions. If it is the latter, it could be because now that they've realized there are holes in their policy, they want to fix them before replying. It could also be due to a desire to leave those holes in place without having to answer for them. The only way to know would be to hear back from Twitter, and that is largely out of my control.

To try to get Twitter to answer my questions, I've tweeted @support.

The links go to the original posting of this on Breaking the Glasses, the Atheism+ blockbot list, and the github page for the GGautoblocker, which is up to nearly 10,000 accounts (including @WRCorg and at first, @KFC) blocked for being even remotely associated with #gamergate. According to the github talk, they can't block Christina Hoff Sommers or Adam Baldwin without slowing down the list's functioning. Apparently having a ton of followers makes a difference.

The GGautoblocker block list has its own personal Twitter account under its own name. If you want to find out if you're on it, according to a link posted in that account, a list of blocked users, broken down into chunks of 500 accounts, is here.

I'm all for Twitter users having the choice to block in order to avoid unwanted contact and conflict. That's everyone's right. However, both bots appear to be in violation of the terms of service in that bots are forbidden, and these can easily be employed in the manner I've described in the letter to shut down accounts over political disagreement. The GGautoblocker is being actively used as a tool of attempted (and failed) intimidation, as users not associated with #gamergate who find themselves on it are being told by #gamergate's opponents who they should or should not follow and who they should or should not allow to follow them.

If Twitter condones this use of blockbots, that is a clear demonstration that their rule system is not about preventing abuse but about facilitating a censorship effort. It's a question that, if news@twitter will not answer, the @support staff should. The other question is: How many users are going to have to ask before Twitter's staff will pay attention to the problem?

Borrando a Papá—A documentary review

Lucian Vâlsan · 5 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is also available in Portuguese.

A few weeks ago, the Argentinean documentary Borrando a Papá (Erasing Dad) was released on the Internet. I've been waiting to get a chance to see this full-feature documentary for roughly two months since I read on AVfM's Voice of Europe radio program that the feminists tried really, really hard to get this documentary censored in that country.

My gut feeling always tells me that if something is heavily censored or frowned upon by a totalitarian authority, then it clearly must be on to something and that particular work needs to be read/seen as soon as possible. And Borrando a Papá didn't disappoint—on the contrary, it turned out to be far better than I could've expected. And herein lies the paradox that bothers me—the fact that it's such a good documentary means that it made me sick watching it …

Borrando a Papá shows the full misery that Argentinean fathers and children are going through at the hands of the Argentinean state, whose policies are being enforced by ideologues with a terribly warped worldview.

Seeing the movie also made me understand why the feminists wanted so badly to keep this documentary away from the Argentine public. The filmmakers managed to catch on tape various ideologues bragging smilingly about how they mistreat fathers or how they thought that a mother murdering her six-year-old son "to fuck up the father" (her exact words!) are not an indication of a misguided system, even though the father had complained officially about the problem for at least three months before the event.

The documentary sinks its teeth into the very real Evil Empire, as our Editor-at-Large, Erin Pizzey, would put it. In fact, they even brought Pizzey into the documentary, using the footage published by manwomanmyth on YouTube.

The filmmakers expose to the world at large how the work of a chronic child abuser and leader of a gang of pedophiles, Jorge Corsi, essentially ended up influencing the policy on family not just in Argentina but also in Chile, Brazil, the USA, Canada, Germany, Spain, Australia, Dominican Republic, Mexico, and a few other nations.

Very few people even know who Corsi is. Googling his name results only in links in Spanish—but this individual designed what is now called "the Corsi method," which is allegedly a method of diagnosing sexual abuse and violence—a method that is a variation of the Duluth Model, only it's more insidious and broader in scope than just domestic violence.

Corsi started the first master's degree in family violence in 1989. In his entire curricula, there's no mention about women being abusers or men being victims. In this "expert's" opinion, such a thing does not exist. He also designed the so-called "violent man test," which he himself says can even be completed without interviewing the alleged violent man. I won't say more on this because you have to see it for yourselves in the documentary. This is literally a case of "you can't make this stuff up!"

The most shocking footage for me included the comments made by Lilian Hendel, a psychologist and TV columnist, who said upfront that she believes all men who allege violence are liars and that women rarely, if ever, lie about such things. And consequently she thinks that the burden of proof in what she calls "gender-based violence" cases should be reversed. "If I say he's guilty, then he is until he can prove otherwise"—her exact words. To understand what she meant by "gender-based violence," I suggest you read my series about Spanish gender Stalinism that I wrote over a year ago (part I, part II, and this article).

Equally abhorrent are the words of the staff at "Shalom Bait"—which is a centre for protection of victims of domestic violence. One of their staff members just outright says that they prefer advising women to file violence allegations (regardless of the truth) instead of dealing with a fair court trial. Why do they prefer this? Because the courts tend to follow "the ideology that the father is important." Yep, you read it right! An employee of the Argentinean state, a public servant, thinks that fathers' importance is an ideology!

It's hard even to merely list all the abhorrent stuff that's being presented in the film without laying out the entire documentary. Watching this documentary almost makes you feel pain—in a quite literal sense.

Andrei Costea, one of the editors at AVfM Romania, said that:

> A big State in collusion with feminist ideology results in hatred against humanity. This is not merely a societal cancer. One can still deal with cancer and save some patients. But with feminism, it's just almost a war against humanity. I for one cannot see the facts presented in this documentary as anything else but a direct attack towards humanity itself.

What I also appreciated about this documentary is that it also provides an international perspective, thus putting the blame where it stands—at the ideologues' feet, which fly from nation to nation and tear families apart. Images from fathers' protests from France, Italy, Spain, Brazil, Chile, the UK, and the US are presented.

In other words, this documentary has an almost perfect balance of emotion, cold facts, exposing of the Evil Empire, talk about the financial interests in the industry, and an appropriate international perspective on things. And for these reasons, I'll go as far as to say that Borrando a Papá is a far better documentary than Divorce Corp, which in my eyes is way too weak and incomplete.

And that's all I'm going to say. Now please go and watch Borrando a Papá over at AVFM en Español. The video has English subtitles (just click CC), which I can attest are properly done and properly synchronized.

Seriously, Borrando a Papá is a definite must-watch, and it should be at the very least in the all-time top-five best non-feminist productions.

Enjoy!

White Ribbon Ireland campaign launches

Men's Human Rights Ireland · 5 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Are you a man? Did you know that you might be a rapist?

This is the message that the newly launched White Ribbon Ireland campaign wants men to hear. After all, thousands and thousands of women are raped every year in this country, so someone must be responsible.

Except, of course, they aren't. As White Ribbon Ireland was launched to much fanfare, its organisers managed to overstate the number of rapes that take place in Ireland eightfold, an astoundingly farcical failure from people who are supposed to be the experts on serious issues like rape and the violence of men toward women. Conor Lally of The Irish Times reports:

> The organisers of the high profile launch in Ireland of White Ribbon Day have been forced to retract their claims for the number of rapes recorded last year.
> The retraction came after it emerged they had overestimated the number of rapes reported almost eight-fold.
> Literature distributed at the Irish launch of the international campaign highlighting the problem of violence by men against women said there were 3,500 rapes recorded by the Irish authorities last year.
> The official figure recorded by the Central Statistics Office (CSO) is 451.
> The literature distributed by Carr Communications, which is handling the media for the campaign, said: "According to CSO statistics, there were 3,500 reported rapes in Ireland in 2013."
> However, the CSO data reveals 451 recorded rapes of women and men last year.

The White Ribbon Ireland campaign is being managed by three groups: SAFE Ireland, the Men's Development Network (MDN), and the Rape Crisis Network Ireland. Apparently the moral-panic-inducing incorrect numbers were provided by the MDN to themselves, as leaders of the Irish chapter of "the world's largest male-led movement to end men's violence against women."

Tom Meagher, whose wife was tragically murdered in Australia, is the spokesman for the campaign. He penned an essay entitled "The Monster Myth" for White Ribbon, which, as you can probably guess, implies that rapists aren't stereotypical monsters, unhinged and violent individuals often with a long history of violence and crime, but rather, and I quote, "friends, acquaintances, husbands, lovers, brothers and fathers."

This despite the fact that his wife's murderer was, as we learned after a suppression order was lifted by Justice Geoffrey Nettle, a man with an "extensive history of rape and violence."

What Meagher is describing with his "Monster Myth" is the feminist concept of rape culture, which claims that we live in a culture where rape is normalised and accepted by society instead of being the universally reviled and despised crime it actually is.

When pressed on the matter, feminists usually fall back on saying that the idea merely represents power imbalances between men and women, but as the White Ribbon campaign makes manifest, in terms of dealing with the public, they're very much talking about physical violent rape. Seen through a feminist lens, men are collectively culpable for the actions of a miniscule minority.

Needless to say, even major victim support groups have started to distance themselves from the insane idea of "rape culture," including the Rape, Abuse & Incest National Network (RAINN), which is the largest and most influential anti-sexual violence organization in the United States. In a February 2014 letter advising a U.S. White House task force charged with creating a plan to reduce rape on college campuses, RAINN's president, Scott Berkowitz, and vice president for public policy, Rebecca O'Connor, stated:

> There has been an unfortunate trend towards blaming 'rape culture' for the extensive problem of sexual violence on campus. While it is helpful to point out the systemic barriers to addressing the problem, it is important not to lose sight of the simple fact: rape is caused not by cultural factors but by the conscious decisions of a small percentage of the community to commit a violent crime.

The enormous inflation of sexual assault figures by White Ribbon Ireland is very much emblematic of their feminist contemporaries; they were simply taking a page out of the books of other feminist research that has been conducted at home and abroad, such as The SAVI Report: Sexual Abuse and Violence in Ireland:

> Researchers now suggest that the optimal way to collect accurate information is to provide behaviourally specific definitions rather than summary terms which have varied meanings across the general public (e.g. "put his penis in your vagina against your will" is preferable to "raped you") (Walby and Myhill, 2001; Kilpatrick et al., 2000; Koss, 1993; Wyatt and Doyle Peters, 1986; Russell, 1983). The researcher can then provide the specific prevalence estimates of these experiences as well as combining these very specific categories into larger ones such as "contact" or "non-contact abuse".

The problem—or advantage, as the "researchers" would no doubt see it—is that these questions remove all context from sexual acts. If they were brought up in court by a distraught victim, would they result in a conviction? Maybe. But "distraught victims" aren't bringing such matters to the attention of the law because in the context of the moment they certainly wouldn't have called it rape. The researchers have taken that burden upon themselves.

Essentially the research is predicated on the idea that women don't know what "rape," "violence," or "stalking" means and need a feminist expert to speak for them.

This is a technique that was pioneered by Mary Koss and also used by the much touted European Union Agency for Fundamental Rights (FRA) report: a feminist researcher decided that the official unbiased government reports weren't giving her the answers she wanted, so she set up her own surveys in order to adjust the statistics to make them more useful for her ideology.

Post-survey examination of the outcomes revealed that around three-quarters of the women she identified as having been raped did not consider themselves victims of rape and almost half of them not only had sex with their supposed attackers after the event identified as a rape had occurred but also continued dating them.

Koss herself admitted that her methodologies were fatally flawed back in 1992; the 27.5% of survey respondents who answered yes to any of the following three questions resulted in the 1 in 4 shibboleth:

> 8. Have you had sexual intercourse when you didn't want to because a man gave you alcohol or drugs?
> 9. Have you had sexual intercourse when you didn't want to because a man threatened or used some degree of physical force (twisting your arm, holding you down, etc.) to make you?
> 10. Have you had sexual acts (anal or oral intercourse or penetration by objects other than the penis) when you didn't want to because a man threatened or used some degree of physical force (twisting your arm, holding you down, etc.) to make you?

Koss owned up to the fact that her question relating to sex after consuming alcohol was misleading—and that if omitted from the study the actual number of Koss-defined rapes is 1 in 9. When considered in the context of Koss's identified victims (only 27% self-identified as rape victims), the number drops to 1 in 33.

And that's before we start to examine the rest of the survey.

Weasel words, asking seemingly innocuous or contextless questions and representing the answers as among the most foul of crimes like these, permeate the entire moral-panic-mongering industry. One of those recently putting them before the public was Dearbhail McDonald in the Irish Independent, who complains:

> The landmark Sexual Abuse and Violence in Ireland Report (SAVI) showed that 42pc of Irish women and 28pc of Irish men reported some form of sexual abuse or assault in their lifetime.
> Almost a third of Irish women and more than one in five men experiences sexual abuse in their childhood, with more than a quarter of women and more than one in 10 men experiencing sexual abuse in adulthood.
> Yet the vast bulk of sexual assaults, including rape and incest, go unreported.
> And of those that are reported to gardai, about eight out of 100 cases result in a conviction – that leads to a staggering amount of abusers in our midst who are never held to account.
> Something is seriously wrong: in 1977, 73pc of reported rape cases were prosecuted.

Hold on a minute—8 out of 100 result in a conviction, but 73% of reported rape cases were prosecuted? Surely Dearbhail realises that a prosecution is not the same as a conviction? What percentage of reported rape cases in 1977 resulted in a conviction? Dearbhail wraps it up with:

> A commitment by the Government for a SAVI style report to be produced every three to five years is vital.

No, Dearbhail, neither the government nor the victims of sexual assault need a SAVI-style report on a regular basis—or ever. What they need are impartial, non-ideologically warped facts and action taken on the basis of those facts.

But the international White Ribbon is no stranger to controversy, and has raised serious questions among the Irish public even as it gets started. Biased, misleading, heavily slanted, and hateful rhetoric has resulted in White Ribbon Campaign materials being destroyed and sites being taken offline by government bodies in Australia:

> An online 'domestic violence study' has been ordered offline by the University of NSW Human Research Ethics Committee.
> Flyers published by the survey organisers have been ordered destroyed.
> The study, being conducted by the Gendered Violence Research Network, White Ribbon Australia and Youth Action NSW, was found by the Ethics Committee to have breached the University's code of ethics.
> The decision comes after a national coalition of men's health advocates made a formal complaint to the University claiming the survey was gender-biased, poorly formulated and misleading. They argued it could not achieve its stated aims and any consequent findings would be unreliable and likely to mislead the public.
> Chair of the Ethics Committee, Professor Heather Worth, found that a quote on the original flyers claiming that "childhood exposure to intimate violence increased the likelihood of intergeneration violence particularly amongst boys" was incorrect. The ethics committee has ordered that the flyers be destroyed and replaced by a new flyer that has correct information, including any quotes.

But surely it's for a good cause, right? One can hardly criticise zeal in the defence of the weak and defenceless.

Except not a red cent appears to be going toward helping the victims of sexual assault and domestic violence, at least in the cases of White Ribbon Australia and White Ribbon Canada. Instead, about half of it seems to be going toward salaries and most of the rest toward making more money by ginning up hysteria.

Just prior to White Ribbon Day in Australia, AVfM publisher Paul Elam exposed the White Ribbon Australia fraud:

You end up with a total of $1,835,108. That amounts to nothing more than raising money, paying themselves with it, but leaving enough left over to go raise more money.
> With additional expenditures under informative headings like "purchases" ($58,603) and "other expenses" ($321,483), White Ribbon Australia ended up with a net loss of $441,787.

Elam followed up a few days later with this exposé of White Ribbon Canada's financials:

> According to Canadian law, a charitable institution may not pay out more than 50% of gross revenue in the form of salaries and benefits. As you can see by the numbers in this report, the Canadians skated in just within the limits of the law.

From ignominious start to inevitable collapse, we'll be chronicling, tracking, and investigating the actions of the White Ribbon Ireland group and its finances, and broadcasting our findings as they arise.

Don’t expect jail for the mother who abandoned her child to die in a Sydney drain

Jim Muldoon · 6 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It is just appalling to see the same old charade being played out yet again, particularly when we have had to endure the ramped-up level of sanctimony for White Ribbon Day too.

If a man had dropped a baby two and a half meters down a storm water drain and left it to die, it would have been a crime of national importance. It would have been the lead story of every news outlet. White Ribbon ambassadors would have been shoving each other out of the way (in an inclusive and caring manner, of course) to get their heads on TV to condemn the monster.

This, we would have been repeatedly lectured, is why we are spending millions of dollars on the National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children.

There would be no interest in why he did it. Can you imagine the outrage at even posing the question? His mental problems? His financial difficulties? His emotional insecurities? How would a new baby interfere with his social life?

What part of “left in a drain to die” don’t you understand?

That the child survived is somewhat miraculous. The child was squeezed into a small hole between concrete slabs and then dropped two and a half meters.

There was no blow to the head on the metal rungs on the side of the shaft during the fall, or on landing on the concrete below, to cause death. No broken neck. There were no cuts that would have caused the child to bleed to death. Similarly, there were no internal injuries of major organs leading to internal hemorrhaging and death.

So the child was left to starve and dehydrate until he died. Or drown if there was a heavy rain.

For five days, before he was found by passers-by, the little boy lay alone, waiting to die. In those five days the mother did not alert police, or any other authority, or make any attempt to recover the child.

At the time of writing, the mother has been charged with attempted murder and remanded in custody. The news coverage has been minimal to say the least.

Does anybody seriously expect this woman to serve any time in jail?

She’s in custody until her second hearing December 12, but they won’t keep her for long. The feminist campaign to ensure that responsibility and this mother do not meet has already begun. It takes several distinct threads. The first is that we have the “woman in an uncaring society” angle. Yet another candle-in-the-wind. On www.news.com.au, we are told:

> The Australian Association of Social Workers (AASW) is calling for vulnerable parents to receive more support to avoid further cases such as the abandoned baby boy found in Sydney yesterday morning.

Yes, the billions of dollars being spent by the Australian state and federal governments on women’s issues is clearly not enough.

Consider what this woman had to avoid to be in her current predicament. First and foremost, given that she is 30 years of age, she has avoided the maturity to be responsible for herself. She has also managed to avoid free contraception, free pregnancy termination, free social work services, and a plethora of government handouts to assist single mothers.

She also could have just left the child in the hospital.

In the same news.com.au story, we also find the second angle of mental health issues.

> Lisa Knott, spokeswoman for Post and Antenatal Depression Association (PANDA), said 1 in 7 Australian woman suffered some form of postnatal depression.

So how do we know if this depression was to blame?

> It was a common misconception that postnatal depression was attributed to hormonal changes, she said. The reality was though there could be a variety of causes from a traumatic birth, to previous history of mental illness.

Knott went on to clarify:

> "The signs are different for everyone," she said.

In other words, we know she had depression because she abandoned a baby in a drain, leaving it to die, and now she's in danger of being held to account.

The other bizarre contradictions being spruiked by the mainstream media, complete with serious faces, is on how often this happens.

In The Age, we are told:

> Department of Family and Community Services western Sydney district director Lisa Charet said such incidents were rare.

So rare, in fact, that:

> Helen Polley, a senator in the opposition Labor Party, said the near-tragedy could have been avoided if emergency hatches were rolled out at Australian hospitals, police and fire stations where babies could be safely abandoned.

Of course, the Australian White Ribbon Campaign is not interested in this issue because clearly a mother dropping a baby two and a half meters down a concrete drain and leaving it to die is not a question of domestic violence. Perhaps they too might believe this peculiar line being spun by the ABC:

> Paediatrician Andrew McDonald said the baby was "very lucky that it was left where it was".
> "It was left in a natural incubator," he said.
> "Not too hot and not too cold, and protected from weather and from predators."

That the child can go from "abandoned to die" to "very lucky" is an extraordinary piece of newspeak propaganda aimed directly at ensuring the woman does not face jail time for her crime.

> Polley also called on Sunday for the repeal of laws that make child abandonment a criminal offense, which she said encouraged the problem to be hidden.

So what now will happen to the child? The mother is not out of the picture here by any means, according to SBS:

> The baby is now in the care of the NSW Family and Community Services (FACS) Minister. It will be up to the state agency to assess how – or if – the mother and baby can be reunited.

And the father? Apparently the mother hid the pregnancy from him. But you'll be relieved to know that efforts are being made to find him. Not that he will get custody of the child, or even any kind of access. But someone is going to have to pay child support to whomever raises the child.

We wouldn't want a man avoiding his responsibilities, would we?

Woman, protect thyself

Elijah Butler · 6 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In my most recent article, "What third-wave feminism is fighting for," I made the point that women need to protect themselves from rape instead of expecting men to do it for them. I think it's a point worth delving into fully here.

It used to be that society protected women. Back in the days of wolves lurking outside and barbarians marauding, protecting women was key to a society's survival. Basically, one man could impregnate multiple women in a short amount of time, women who normally bore one child at a time, every nine months. It was a numbers game. But we, in modern Western society, don't live in that kind of world anymore and have not for a while. Feminism came along and demanded the dismantling of those old systems of female protection, which they saw as the patriarchal oppression of women. Society listened and they were dismantled.

But then feminists discovered something that most people already knew: the world is a dark and scary place with mean people who will hurt you. And in 2014, feminism, which used to have the slogan "I am woman, hear me roar," has now digressed into "I am woman, hear me whine." The movement that used to be about "female empowerment" now wants those old systems back, and they're starting with sexual assault. For example, It's On Us is really "it's on men to protect women from sexual assault." Affirmative consent is really old-school female protection with a modern veneer.

But feminists, I've got something to tell you. You cannot count on men to be solely the ones to protect you from sexual assault. No, you have to protect yourself as much as you can. "It's on us" should really be "it's on you." "But that's victim-blaming," you say. That may be, but if feminism is the radical notion that women are human, then you better be expected to be treated like one.

Let's suppose I walked down the street in the most crime-ridden neighborhood in the most crime-ridden city in the country flashing large amounts of cash and then I get mugged and shot. When I wake in the hospital, do you think I'm going to be told, "Poor baby, we need to teach people not to mug"? Of course I won't. I'll be told that maybe I shouldn't have walked down the street in the most crime-ridden neighborhood in the most crime-ridden city in the country flashing large amounts of cash. But suddenly when it comes to women and sexual assault, logic and common sense fly out the window, and its victim-blaming to say maybe you shouldn't have gotten yourself passed-out drunk at that party.

Feminists, you cannot have it both ways. You cannot sit there and demand to be treated as equals while expecting men to come running at your beck and call to protect you from things that go bump in the night. You created this by demanding that the old systems be dismantled. The genie is out of the bottle, and now you have to live with it. It's time you act like the humans you want to be and protect yourselves from the mean people who seek to hurt you. It's time you take steps to prevent your own rape. Take a women's self-defense course. Buy a rape whistle and a can of pepper spray. Watch the videos on this AVfM page. Or just practice common sense, like don't get passed-out drunk, don't date creeps, and keep to well-lit, high-traffic areas when walking alone if you can.

The bottom line is that sticking your fingers in your ears and crying, "Teach men not to rape" only makes you more unsafe. While even with self-defense you cannot prevent every rape, you can prevent enough, and that's what matters. Telling men not to rape is not the answer, and never will be because one day the wolves will be at your door and there will be no one there to save you. Will you be wolf-chow or live to see another day? The choice is yours.

Men are exceptional

Robert Brockway · 7 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Men and women vary in many ways. The debate has raged for a long time about whether this is more likely to be a result of nature or nurture. Some feminist groups tend to maintain that the differences are socialised and thus very much within the nurture camp. Recent research has shown that there are fundamental differences between human males and females, and that behavioural differences are evident even a day after birth.[1] So while some differences are certainly socialised, we cannot any longer ignore or dismiss the fundamental differences that exist between human males and females.

It is the thesis of this article that a large proportion of observed differences between male and female life outcomes can be explained with reference to only one difference: variance. Men tend to vary in characteristics more than women. This has been shown to be true for all characteristics that have been studied, and there is good evidence to suggest it is generally true.[2] This is often known as “greater male variability” or “the variability hypothesis,” although it would perhaps be better called a theory now as evidence builds. It is notable that this notion fell out of favour as a result of the activities of feminists in academia.[3]

Men vary more in height[4], weight, and many other physical characteristics. While the average intelligence of men and women are the same or almost the same, what is clear is that males vary more than females in intelligence.[5] This means that a majority of people with high IQs will be men, as will a majority of people with low IQs. The further we get from the mean, the more pronounced this phenomenon is. Astoundingly, greater variance among men even appears to be true when it comes to personality.[6]

Everywhere we go, we see the same trend: men tending to dominate at the top of society with other men tending to fall to the bottom of society, with a smaller group of men and most women clustered in the middle.

When the females of a species invest significantly more energy in to gestation than males, as is the case for humans, then the size of the next generation is largely constrained by the number of fertile females. As a result of this, a species can generally tolerate the loss of a male more easily than the loss of a female. It thus makes sense for a species to allow males to vary more in their characteristics. If a characteristic is disadvantageous to a species, then the loss of males will be less damaging than the loss of females. If a characteristic is advantageous, it can be spread to the rest of the species. Thus, testing new characteristics on males is an advantage to a species overall, and so we find men vary in their characteristics more than women. In effect, the loss of women will constrain the size of the next generation while the loss of men will constrain genetic diversity. This does not justify male disposability, though. Even if men were biologically disposable in the past, they no longer need to be. The Earth carries more than 7 billion people today and could be carrying 10 or 11 billion within a few decades. We no longer need the ability to rapidly recover numbers, thus any presumed bias toward male disposability that existed in the past no longer applies.

Among humans the greater variance among men leads to significant implications for society. These tendencies have a widespread and profound impact on the human species and human civilisation and go a very long way to explaining the observed differences between men and women in terms of life choices and outcomes.

Since men vary more in characteristics, it follows that they will be overrepresented among the highest achievers in many areas. The lowest achievers in an area, those not suitable for employment or endeavour in that area, will generally choose to not work in that area. As a result, when we look at most areas of achievement, we should see the highest levels dominated by men, with the rest of the men in the field and most women among those who perform in the field competently but without great distinction. If the highest achievers in a field are mostly men, then we should expect the highest paid members of the field to be mostly men too.

A particularly notable area is scientific achievement, which has been overwhelmingly conducted by men. Some argue that female scientists have been marginalised and their accomplishments attributed to men. That may be true in some cases, but the reverse is true also. Marie Curie is often remembered for conducting groundbreaking research in to radioactivity. Most know her name, but few know that she collaborated with two other scientists for this work—her husband, Pierre Curie, and Henri Becquerel. Marie was actually the junior of the three scientists. Despite this, she is often believed by the wider community to have made significant discoveries on her own, with the efforts of her husband and Becquerel forgotten. Both Marie and Pierre were responsible for the discovery of polonium and radium[7], although today these discoveries are often attributed to Marie alone.[8]

Business and political leaders are overwhelmingly men. Just as with scientific endeavour, men will dominate among those who are overachievers in business, with other men and most women performing competently.

Evidence suggests that men have always dominated among societies' leaders. This is reflected in the modern world with men dominating among politicians in every country today except Rwanda. Rwanda is an exception because men were overwhelmingly the victims of the Rwanda genocide and even today constitute only 46.5% of the population.[9]

Since men vary more in personality, in capabilities, and are overrepresented among those with low IQs, it follows that men should be overrepresented among those who are anti-social and have difficulty fitting in and following societies' rules. These are precisely the people most likely to commit offences and be imprisoned. This is what we do see in societies around the world.

It should be noted that all else being equal, men are more likely to be charged with an offence, more likely to be convicted of an offence, and if they are convicted they are more likely to be incarcerated and will on average serve a significantly longer sentence. This is all true even when the circumstances surrounding the offence are substantially similar. Thus, the higher proportion of male prison inmates cannot be explained by variance alone and is a function of institutional bias against men in the judicial system of many countries.

The vast majority of composers are men.[10] Music composition shows the same pattern that we see in other areas of endeavour. Those who have little or only average capabilities in music composition will not generally pursue this as a career. In contrast, those who excel at music composition will pursue it as a career. Similarly, the majority of musicians are men. Many orchestras have around 25% to 30% female participation.[11] We should see the greatest domination by men in areas where individuality is most important. Among all areas of music, the greatest gender disparity exists in jazz. This is also the area of music where individuality is most important, with high emphasis on creativity and improvisation.

A notable area dominated by men is the game of chess.[12] Chess is notable because it does not require physical strength, manual dexterity, or any physical characteristics other than the ability to communicate. Chess does not require any knowledge other than knowledge of chess. Even having a high IQ is not a guarantee of success in chess. Like many fields of endeavour, hard work and commitment are necessary along with innate ability. Having said that, chess is perhaps the purest example of exceptionality we have. The vast majority of chess grand masters are men.

Men even dominate in knowledge-based game shows.[13]

It is a reasonably obvious position to claim that employers will generally want to employ people who can perform the work involved in that job to a reasonable standard. It can often be difficult to differentiate people who would be exceptional at performing the work. The bottom few percent of the population (as measured by job specific capability) will be the ones most likely to be unable to obtain employment. The bottom few percent of the population will be dominated by men. Thus, based on gender variance alone, we may expect men to have a higher unemployment rate than women.

Quite a lot has been made of the Y chromosome of late. Claims are made that it is small and inadequate.[14][15] This is just more casual misandry. Those making statements like this have, at least, a fundamentally flawed view of human sexual selection and genetics.[16] The Y chromosome is the basis of the exceptionality of men. It destabilises human genetics, which is precisely what you need to have exceptional individuals. It is why more male foetuses abort, but it is also why there are more male Nobel Prize winners and great poets. Many of those denigrating the Y chromosome are ignoring the evidence right in front of their eyes.

This article has discussed the notion of greater variation, the negative and positive consequences of this, and how they explain many of the historical trends observed. History is replete with powerful, famous, and successful women, but they were typically a minority.

The notion of greater variance among men has been discussed for decades and is, perhaps not surprisingly, not popular in feminist discourse. In 2005, Lawrence Summers, then the president of Harvard University, speculated on greater variance among men and the resultant domination of certain fields, particularly physical sciences, by men. Despite the fact that he made it clear that he was not criticising the suitability of women to physical sciences, he was publicly castigated[17] and was subsequently the subject of a no-confidence motion by a faculty at Harvard.[18] Harvard subsequently launched various initiatives to advance women in academia over the following months. It is likely that Summers' innocent comments on gender variance and the subsequent outrage were major contributors to his resignation the following year.

In the end, statistical analysis of the relative merits of different groups of humans is interesting, but it says nothing about the ability of a particular individual human to achieve. Just because men dominate in a particular field does not mean that any given man is able to achieve in that field and it does not mean that any given woman cannot achieve in that field.

The title of this article may seem incendiary and may have caused some people to become angry. The title is, of course, a pun. Men are exceptional—which means that men are not only overrepresented among the most successful people in society but also among the least successful people in society. The title is offered as proof that Hanna Rosin, author of The End of Men and "Men Are Obsolete" is not the only person who can write articles with provocative titles.

In general, if you have a group of people who are competing on equal terms for top roles, the most capable will be the most likely to gain these roles. In many cases, we can expect more men than women to be among the overachievers and among the underachievers. But the top roles are taken by the overachievers, who are more likely to be men.

It should be noted that nothing in this article should be taken as being negative toward women. Women and men are needed for a properly functioning society. This article should also not be construed as suggesting that women cannot achieve at the highest levels. An individual is not constrained by the norms for their gender. Just because there are fewer women at the highest levels of achievement in many areas does not mean, in general, that a particular woman cannot be the best at what she does. It does mean, though, that most areas of exceptional achievement will be dominated by men.

Music & Men's Issues: The approach, female space, and "street harassment"—"Let Me Down Easy" by Chris Isaak

Ty Henry · 7 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Author's Note: There's been a rapidly ramped-up cultural shift toward pathologizing male initiation of contact on multiple levels, starting with initial approaches to get women's attentions. We are told that "street harassment" is not only culturally normative and epidemic but part of the "rape culture" continuum, emblematic of a wider cosmological worldview that men are entitled to female space. What naturally follows is boorish, borderline brutish tactics to Bogart women's attention, pushing contact upon them whether it's wanted or not and brooking little concern for her feelings of insecurity. It's a jungle out there, and women are the newborn water buffalo calves.

The Music & Men's Issues series uses popular music to demonstrate that the truth countervails the promoted narrative. Far from "entitlement," nearly all men experience uncertainty when dealing with women. They learn early on that they must in some form "earn" access to female space. They understand the threat that awaits should they miscalculate when or if to enter it and when the rejection is a coy demurral or expresses a desire for him to get lost. Men bear the overwhelming risk and experience of rejection at initial contact and thereafter, whether it be an unkind look, word, or worse threat of physical removal (nightclub security) and administrative reprisal (HR). Fear of rejection often breeds feelings of unworthiness and self-loathing, which for some can be paralyzing, but we nevertheless (usually) soldier on.

It's against this backdrop and the new layers of risk (i.e., "unwanted" approaches on campus that may get one suspended or expelled) that Music & Men's Issues is set against. Share it with the women in your lives.

In recent years, the waters that men wade through to initiate the most basic contact that most relationships start with have become increasingly more fraught. When colleges are codifying that one "unwanted approach" as expulsion-worthy harassment, and with the "street harassment" trope gaining momentum (and, possibly, legislative purchase), it can seem that the Ocean of Love is more icebergs and drifting, unmoored contact mines than water and lush islands.

That is why it's necessary, now more than ever, to advocate for and demonstrate the humanity of men in this area, as an exsiccant to a popular discourse oversaturated with a narrative of pathologically boorish, overbearing men on the make, emboldened by patriarchal entitlement to women's space. The other caricature is the lily-livered invertebrate, unworthy of his gender assignment, for failing to be bold in light of exponentially rising risk.

Chris Isaak's "Let Me Down Easy" is emblematic of the internal turmoil that can and does attend the male approach. The song's device is simple. The protagonist is engaging in an imaginary dialogue with the object of his desire, a means not only of summoning courage to "do what a man has to do" but also of girding himself for the rejection he knows is inevitable. The tail end of the street harassment response brought me to this song, which gives voice to the uniquely male "shadow world" of running dialogues, self-deprecations and affirmations, and rehearsals preceding an approach, even for weeks. It's a world that women are oblivious to, and almost none have a frame of reference for. They have no idea that the man outwardly sounding the right notes from his opening line may be a cacophony of nerves on the inside.

Speaking of inside, let's allow Mr. Isaak to lead the way, shall we?

> At first you smile, then turn away
> I've been thinking of what I should say
>
> All last night I stayed up dreaming
> I'm still dreaming

Even the most outwardly swaggering "alpha" was once that young boy quavering in his Toughskins or Garanimals, summoning up the courage (and right words) to ask a girl to sit with him on the school bus after dreaming of slaying dragons on her behalf. Every man can become that boy when a cute woman walks by, sits near, or glances with a smile, the latter of which can be both an invitation and a taunt, a challenge to his facade of strength. Or it can just be a friendly smile, with no pregnant meaning.

> I look at you
> I'm just a guy
> I know my place but still I try

Far from privileged, Isaak's lyrics embody self-subjugation. You can't help but feel sorry for a guy who goes from paralysis by analysis to expectations of failure. Indeed, the refrain expresses his absence of "entitlement" to even a polite and courteous rebuff, considering what she seems to endure.

> You must be tired of people asking
> But I'm asking
> Please, oh please. Let me down easy
> Please, just let me down easy
>
> Another day, you're passing by
> Today's the day I'm gonna try

Who hasn't been here? The intern in another department, passing you in the office hallway on the way to lunch. The girl whose path to her class crosses yours on the way to third period. The shy girl with the locker next to yours who looks like Phoebe Cates (okay, I'm dating myself). In the face of perceived powerlessness over female beauty, such words can be delusional masochism ("you keep saying you'll ask her out, but you know you never will") … or the false bravado that provides just enough impetus for you to snap on the bungee cord and jump. Speaking of jumping …

> If you asked me to follow, you know I'd fly to you
> Here I go, I may fall, but I will try

Herein lies the heart of the matter. Simply put, the approach is the most ubiquitous expression of male courage, at least by the average guy. Men may soar like the eagles or their wings may melt like Icarus, but the attempt, the risk is what is instructive. All men have feared rejection on approach at some time, and without fear, there can be no courage. This courage is at a greater premium in this moment in time, where the "risk" side of the "risk/reward" scale seems to tipping permanently to one side.

The male approach, for most men, is rooted not in "entitlement" but in a culturally enforced performance paradigm that men are compelled to navigate should they desire female company, companionship, and to pass on their genes with them. Every heterosexual male understands the apprehension, insecurity, self-doubt, and outright fear that is attendant to any decision to approach a member of the opposite sex—and thereafter "qualify" for her approval—and that our success is in many ways dependent on our capacity to mask and overcome them. Even if it means not being "let down easy."

Will the real Richard Dawkins please stand up?

Paul Elam · 8 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Normally, a piece in Raw Story does not move me to set something to paper. Indeed, the online "publication" triggers my chuckle-and-ignore switch with as much ease as the average Tumblr feminist.

Today, though, they ran a piece about noted scientist and skeptic Richard Dawkins that I had already had confirmed from several other sources. While nothing in it changed my mind about RS, it did cause me to question whether Dawkins is a victim of his own celebrity—or if he is just selling out.

The contemporary darling of the skeptic community appears to have become so insulated in his ivory tower that it has disconnected him from anything, well, contemporary. He seems so unplugged at this point that he actually seems to think that ideology is good for science.

He has also never heard of the men's rights movement.

"Of course feminism has an enormously important role," he told Kennesaw State University's Michael L. Sanseviro.

> Feminism, as I understand it, is the political drive towards the equality of women — so that women should not be discriminated against, nobody should be discriminated against on grounds that don't merit discrimination. So, yes, feminism is enormously important and is a political movement which deserves to be thoroughly well-supported.

That was his response to Sanseviro's question about alleged contributions of feminism to, get this, science.

For some reason, Dawkins elected to give a non-answer to the actual question. I suspect that was because actually naming things that feminism has contributed to science (other than a gag) is too challenging, even for the biologist's notably sharp mind. At least for today. He seems to have made a tectonic shift from earlier beliefs, as evidenced here:

Dawkins's air of disconnection was amplified when asked what he thought about the Men's Human Rights Movement.

> I didn't, I hardly knew — is there a men's right movement?

He probably did not catch the meaning of the laughter that followed. The amusement in the room was undoubtedly driven by the fact that controversy over the men's movement had already swept through the Kennesaw campus like a brush fire and that some members of his giggling audience were neck-deep in a smear and censorship campaign aimed at silencing members of that movement on campus.

He also must have missed a boatload of stories from the likes of ABC News, The Washington Post, National Post, Salon.com, Huffington Post, Fox News, and several others.

Dawkins goes on to explain his information gap in his next breath.

> If there is discrimination against men, then that's bad too. I don't know whether there is. I haven't heard of it.

Richard Dawkins has not heard of discrimination toward men? Really? Sorry, Richard, but please tell me this is because you have invented human teleportation and have managed to remain in an academic setting constantly for the past several years. Tell me that you have so successfully avoided the real world that you are unaware of the ongoing problems of fathers and children in family courts, the egregious and blatant discrimination against men in criminal sentencing, and the transparent sexual double standards applied against males in the domestic violence and sexual assault industries.

Perhaps you have actually done so well with insulating yourself that you have managed to exist completely within the walls of interdisciplinary studies departments, lest you may have actually heard of the loss of due process for young men now rampant across college campuses. Or maybe it was harder to notice, even for the great scientist-skeptic, because there are so few young men left?

A respectful suggestion for the illustrious Dawkins: feminism, “as you understand it,” is not anything like you understand it. In fact, you don’t seem to understand it at all past a myopic, politically expedient definition which depends strictly on who is listening at the moment.

The snickers in the audience had two meanings, Richard. One, they were the auditory equivalent of eye rolls. And two, they were an acknowledgement of hateful ideologues (the feminism you no longer seem to understand) that you have been sufficiently conditioned or cowed into being useful to.

That is the problem with living the insulated life. Not only do you end up making foil-hat-worthy observations that translate to ideology being good for science, but eventually the insulation becomes so thick, so protective and muffling, that whatever tiny spark remains in the wire is of little use to science or to society.

It is even more disturbing when insulation and ignorance seem to be retroactive.

Will the real Richard Dawkins please stand up?

And while you are standing, please explain to us what “real” feminism is. Is it the variety that you have repeatedly mocked and scorned as anti-scientific but suddenly fell into a memory lapse when addressing a group of “atheist-feminists” at Kennesaw State University?

Or is it the kind found only in the dictionary and in the denial-ridden rhetoric of feminist defenders?

The impact of parental alienation on children

Dr. Edward Kruk · 8 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is also available in Romanian.

I offer here the first installment of a three-part series examining: (1) the impact of parental alienation on children, (2) the effects of parental alienation on parents, and (3) programs, services, and interventions that combat alienation and seek to reunite estranged parents and their children.

What children of divorce most want and need is to maintain healthy and strong relationships with both of their parents and to be shielded from their parents' conflicts. Some parents, however, in an effort to bolster their parental identity, create an expectation that children should choose sides. In more extreme situations, they foster the child's rejection of the other parent. In the most extreme cases, children are manipulated by one parent to hate the other, despite their innate desire to love and be loved by both parents.

Parental alienation involves the "programming" of a child by one parent to denigrate the other "targeted" parent in an effort to undermine and interfere with the child's relationship with that parent. It is often a sign of a parent's inability to separate from the couple conflict and focus on the needs of the child. Such denigration results in the child's emotional rejection of the targeted parent and the loss of a capable and loving parent from the life of the child. Psychiatrist Richard Gardner developed the concept of "parental alienation syndrome" 20 years ago, defining it as "a disorder that arises primarily in the context of child custody disputes. Its primary manifestation is the child's campaign of denigration against a parent, a campaign that has no justification. It results from the combination of a programming (brainwashing) parent's indoctrinations and the child's own contributions to the vilification of the target parent." Children's views of the targeted parent are almost exclusively negative, to the point that the parent is demonized and seen as evil.

As Amy Baker writes, parental alienation involves a set of strategies, including badmouthing the other parent, limiting contact with that parent, erasing the other parent from the life and mind of the child (forbidding discussion and pictures of the other parent), forcing the child to reject the other parent, creating the impression that the other parent is dangerous, forcing the child to choose between the parents by means of threats of withdrawal of affection, and belittling and limiting contact with the extended family of the targeted parent. In my own research on non-custodial parents who have become disengaged from their children's lives (Kruk, 2011), I found that most lost contact involuntarily, many as a result of parental alienation. Constructive alternatives to adversarial methods of reconnecting with their children were rarely available to these alienated parents.

Parental alienation is more common than is often assumed: Fidler and Bala (2010) report both an increasing incidence and increased judicial findings of parental alienation; they report estimates of parental alienation in 11% to 15% of divorces involving children; Bernet et al. (2010) estimate that about 1% of children and adolescents in North America experience parental alienation.

There is now scholarly consensus that severe alienation is abusive to children (Fidler and Bala, 2010), and it is a largely overlooked form of child abuse (Bernet et al., 2010), as child welfare and divorce practitioners are often unaware of or minimize its extent. As reported by adult children of divorce, the tactics of alienating parents are tantamount to extreme psychological maltreatment of children, including spurning, terrorizing, isolating, corrupting or exploiting, and denying emotional responsiveness (Baker, 2010). For the child, parental alienation is a serious mental condition, based on a false belief that the alienated parent is a dangerous and unworthy parent. The severe effects of parental alienation on children are well documented: low self-esteem and self-hatred, lack of trust, depression, and substance abuse and other forms of addiction are widespread, as children lose the capacity to give and accept love from a parent. Self-hatred is particularly disturbing among affected children, as children internalize the hatred targeted toward the alienated parent, are led to believe that the alienated parent did not love or want them, and experience severe guilt related to betraying the alienated parent. Their depression is rooted in feelings of being unloved by one of their parents, and from separation from that parent, while being denied the opportunity to mourn the loss of the parent or to even talk about the parent. Alienated children typically have conflicted or distant relationships with the alienating parent also and are at high risk of becoming alienated from their own children; Baker reports that fully half of the respondents in her study of adult children who had experienced alienation as children were alienated from their own children.

Every child has a fundamental right and need for an unthreatened and loving relationship with both parents. To be denied that right by one parent, without sufficient justification such as abuse or neglect, is in itself a form of child abuse. Since it is the child who is being violated by a parent's alienating behaviors, it is the child who is being alienated from the other parent. Children who have undergone forced separation from one of their parents in the absence of abuse, including cases of parental alienation, are highly subject to post-traumatic stress. Reunification efforts in these cases should proceed carefully and with sensitivity. (Research has shown that many alienated children can transform quickly from refusing or staunchly resisting the rejected parent to being able to show and receive love from that parent, followed by an equally swift shift back to the alienated position when back in the orbit of the alienating parent. Alienated children seem to have a secret wish for someone to call their bluff, compelling them to reconnect with the parent they claim to hate.) While children's stated wishes regarding parental contact in contested custody should be considered, they should not be determinative, especially in suspected cases of alienation.

Hatred is not an emotion that comes naturally to a child; it has to be taught. A parent who would teach a child to hate or fear the other parent represents a grave and persistent danger to the mental and emotional health of that child. Alienated children are no less damaged than other child victims of extreme conflict, such as child soldiers and other abducted children, who identify with their tormentors to avoid pain and maintain a relationship with them, however abusive that relationship may be.

In the second installment on parental alienation, I will examine the effects of parental alienation on targeted parents. In the third installment, I will suggest a range of strategies for preventing and intervening in these cases.

Orwell's nightmare: Intensified

Marshall Rottman · 8 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Synopsis

For this response, I will be using stopstreetharassment.org and ihollaback.org, the two largest groups working to end "street harassment." I will analyze an excerpt from a Made Man article entitled "How to Compliment Women Without Being a Skeeze or a Catcaller" by comparing it to the statements found on these two sites and seeing whether this article's supposed examples are permitted. I will do this in order to prove that feminist propaganda organizations actually set rules that make any and all communication from males to females illegal.

They literally want to go beyond Orwell's nightmare and make it so that men speak only when spoken to. No exaggeration. I'm being quite sincere. As you shall see, this is an accurate statement.

From Made Man:

> There is, however, a way to speak to a woman of any age and still be a gentleman. This is important to teach and be taught because guys who do not have any idea how to talk to women are the idiots in the video. Here is the method:
> 1. Body language. I mean yours. A woman's first thought when approached by a guy is, "What does he want, and when is he going to go away?" Your first instinct is going to be to approach with both shoulders and chest facing her. Your first instinct is wrong. Point your body (especially your hips) in another direction. Look over your shoulder, even.

Approach a woman by pretending you're not approaching her? [rubs head] I can see this is going to be very agitating. This is literally submissive behavior, and it's impolite. If you approach while pretending you're not, then when you do finally say something to her, within physical range, she's likely to be startled. You have literally ambushed her … Yeah, that's gonna go over well. What could possibly go wrong?

Furthermore, according to stopstreetharassment.org's "What Is Street Harassment?":

> Street harassment is any action or comment between strangers in public places that is disrespectful, unwelcome, threatening and/or harassing and is motivated by gender or sexual orientation or gender expression.

Simply stated, it does not matter how you make your approach—approaching the woman is an action that may be unwelcome and will still, therefore, be "street harassment," no matter the method of approach. Therefore, Rule #1 is incorrect. This is harassment. You may not approach a woman you do not know. Only the woman may approach you. You are a man: speak when spoken to or not at all.

> 2. The compliment. It should never be remotely sexual. Compliment a woman the way you would compliment a woman of any age. Are you going to go up to somebody's grandmother and tell her you like how her dress fits? No. "That's a great color," however, works. If you find the need to look both ways in case someone overhears you: shut your mouth.

Actually, according to ihollaback.org's "What is Street Harassment?":

> Street harassment can be sexist, racist, transphobic, homophobic, ableist, sizeist and/or classist. It is an expression of the interlocking and overlapping oppressions we face and it functions as a means to silence our voices and "keep us in our place." At Hollaback!, we believe that what specifically counts as street harassment is determined by those who experience it.

If the woman in question determines your comment "That's a great color" to be a sexist show of approval of her choice of attire, then this is still street harassment. You are a man: speak when spoken to or not at all.

Also according to stopstreetharassment.org's "What Is Street Harassment?":

> Types: It ranges from leers, whistles, honks, kissing noises, gender-policing, and non-sexually explicit evaluative comments, to more insulting and threatening behavior like vulgar gestures, sexually charged comments, flashing, and stalking, to illegal actions like public masturbation, sexual touching, assault, and murder.

"That's a great color" qualifies as a non-sexually explicit evaluative comment and is therefore street harassment. You are a man: speak when spoken to or not at all.

> 3. The exit. Now be off with you. If you stand around looking like a bellboy waiting for a tip, you will undo everything you just did.

If you leave as quickly as possible, then there is no possibility for interaction. What, exactly, was the point of making contact to begin with?

And oh, by the way, according to ihollaback.org's "What is Street Harassment?":

> Street harassment is a form of sexual harassment that takes place in public spaces. At its core is a power dynamic that constantly reminds historically subordinated groups (women and LGBTQ folks, for example) of their vulnerability to assault in public spaces.

You approached the woman by pretending you were not, ambushed her with a comment, and left as quickly as possible. A woman prone to misandry or androphobia is likely to take this as having been an intentional show of dominance and, therefore, a sexist verbal drive-by. This is wrong. You are a man: speak when spoken to or not at all.

Conclusion

The excerpts from the Made Man article are wrong according to both of the major street harassment organizations (ihollaback.org and stopstreetharassment.org). Not only that, but because they set the definition so loose, even intentionally attempting to determine an acceptable way for a man to approach a woman in an open or public setting will result in failure. Simply stated: According to feminists, there is no acceptable way for a man to approach a woman in a public space to say anything at all.

The trick is that no one looks at the definitions they set because everyone focuses on the examples provided, such as a guy yelling, "Nice ass" at a woman. It is this bait-and-switch maneuver that will allow them, if not resisted, to enact laws that make it illegal, or legally punishable, for a man to speak to a woman in a public place, no matter how polite or well-intentioned. The devil is always in the details.

Let's revisit an excerpt from stopstreetharassment.org's "What Is Street Harassment?":

> Types: It ranges from leers, whistles, honks, kissing noises, gender-policing, and non-sexually explicit evaluative comments, to more insulting and threatening behavior like vulgar gestures, sexually charged comments, flashing, and stalking, to illegal actions like public masturbation, sexual touching, assault, and murder.

Pay close attention to "leers." If you look at a woman and she doesn't like it or doesn't like you, then it's magically street harassment. Men apparently should avoid making visual contact with women to prevent the "male gaze," or what some feminists have termed "stare rape" (yes, it's a thing, however imaginary).

And I remind you that ihollaback.org stated:

> At Hollaback!, we believe that what specifically counts as street harassment is determined by those who experience it.

Which, again, means that if you look at a woman and she doesn't want you to or doesn't like you, then you're guilty of street harassment. Men should look down at the ground at all times to avoid offending a woman in public. You are a man: look away and know your place.

Also take note of "non-sexually explicit evaluative comments." "Nice weather we're having" is a non-sexually explicit evaluative comment. They have added so many non-harassment acts and actions to the list of what should be considered "street harassment" as to eliminate the possibility of a man being able to say anything to a woman without it being harassment. You are a man: speak when spoken to or not at all.

These two feminist organizations are quite literally, in their definitions and in what they seek to enact, creating a world in which men may not look at or speak to women in a public place. They are to look away and say nothing unless directly addressed by a woman.

I said it previously, and I will say it again: They are literally attempting to create a society that ventures beyond Orwell's nightmare. This extends past the literary fascism of Nineteen Eighty-Four. This extends past the allegory of Animal Farm.

If these two massive feminist groups are able to push legislation using their bait-and-switch tactics of exclaiming "hey, nice ass" but defining "non-sexually explicit evaluative comments" and "leers," then they will make it legally punishable for a man to look at a woman or say anything to her. After that, I would ask, how long before we are no longer permitted to walk on the sidewalk and instead have to walk through the gutter on the side of the street? How long, I would ask, before men are forced to wear symbols on armbands when in public?

I assure you, I am not being facetious. I am posing you the question: If they can make it illegal for a man to look at a woman in public or even speak to her without her addressing the man first, then where does it go from there?

Are bad boys really sexier?

Dr. David Ley · 9 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is also available in Romanian.

Like many men, I remember feeling my heart break a little, as an adolescent, sitting at a cafeteria table. I listened to the beautiful girl I had a crush on as she told me what a great friend I was, then gushed about her interest in one of my best friends. I've never really wanted to be the "nice guy," though it is apparently just in my nature. And sadly the nice guy often doesn't walk away with the girl, at least in the short term. Increasing psychological and biological evidence suggests that the "bad boy," sometimes called the "cad," often gets hot, spontaneous sex from women while the "nice guy" has a very different kind of relationship.

I was interviewed recently about whether the "nice guys" could benefit from an understanding of the traits and qualities that attract women. Basically, for those men out there who worry that they are too "nice," are there ways that they could borrow some of the bad boy sexiness while not losing their integrity? It was a provocative and fun interview, though as often happens, the finished article only used a bit of my discussion. The interview, and the question, led me to think about this issue and ponder whether there were ways to help men out there without resorting to the sometimes manipulative, deceptive strategies of the "pick-up culture" in which men are taught to use psychological principles to create and exploit insecurities in women.

Much of the bad-boy versus nice-guy dynamic is based upon an understanding of the complex interplay of biology and psychology, which emerges from exploration of the concepts of evolutionary psychology. Now, when we talk about the evolutionary traits that influence women's selection of mates, we are talking about the hypothetical average person, a composite of all people, in a way that washes across individual differences. It can be deceptively easy to use these traits and dispositions to explain the actions or choices of individuals, but this is ultimately little more than a creative narrative that may or may not offer any real, verifiable explanation. I find this evolutionary theorizing useful and helpful in inviting people to consider and explore unconscious motivations behind their sexual desires and preferences. This allows them to look at these desires, such as a desire for multiple partners, as normal, even when the desire is socially stigmatized.

That said, I think that one of the subtle ripple effects of the feminist revolution is that women now have the freedom to express and explore some of these sexual desires. Throughout human history, the ability of women to explore a greater range of sexual desires and freedoms has been intrinsically related to economic freedoms. So, today, from both a social and individual perspective, economic independence is connected to the ability of women to pursue an individualized exploration of their sexual desires. Women who have more financial and social independence are more likely to engage in infidelity, seeking sex with different kinds of men than their primary partner, because that financial independence gives the women some protection from the losses and consequences that could result from infidelity.

We can look at the popularity of Fifty Shades of Grey as an expression of the greater acceptability of women desiring both sexual freedom and desiring to sometimes be with that dominant, assertive, take-charge male. What is different now is that in Victorian times women were "told" by society that the traditional sexist paradigm was the only acceptable desire. Now, decades after the feminist revolution, women are allowed a greater range of desires and allowed to sometimes want the freedom to be independent and assertive in their sexual desires, like men, and to also sometimes want to be taken, to be overcome by the raw force of masculine desire.

But women, and men too, are not all alike in these unconscious desires and the expression of these evolutionary sexual pressures. There is tremendous individual variation, and even variation within a certain person, across time and context. For instance, women's desire for different kinds of mates varies across biological cycles, where women may prefer a stable, good provider as mate for much of the month but be drawn to the more aggressive, dominant, and tempestuous male when they are ovulating. But the conscious, behavioral expression of these desires is also modulated by social context—for instance, women might be more likely to take this risk if they have already had children with their primary mate. Having done so might decrease some of the male reaction to infidelity, as he has already had children by the woman. For the woman, an evolutionary explanation suggests that she is unconsciously looking for a diverse, robust range of genetic differences in her children. By mating with different men, and different kinds of men, she offers her children (and her genes) a greater diversity and thus a better chance of overcoming different kinds of environmental challenges such as disease.

Masculinity is intensely connected to testosterone. I'm not reducing masculinity to that single hormone, but the biology and unconscious evolutionary expressions of mating desires are intrinsically connected to levels of this hormone. When women are ovulating, and attracted to that very masculine man, they find the body odor of men with high testosterone very attractive. In non-medical situations, I'm not in favor of things like testosterone replacement or supplements. But testosterone levels are not a fixed variable. Men (and women) can manipulate their levels of testosterone through activities, such as exercise or competition. Levels of testosterone fluctuate in men in response to competitive challenges like sports, even politics and business. Men who are interested in connecting to that internal masculinity—and having it "ooze out their pores," so to speak—would do well to consider engaging in activities like martial arts, bodybuilding, competitive sports, even adrenaline-type activities like skydiving. All of these increase a man's libido, increase his levels of testosterone, increase his confidence, and bolster that male swagger, making him more attractive to that woman who is seeking, consciously or unconsciously, that highly masculine partner.

Rather than talking about the "bad boy," I suggest talking and thinking about these men as being highly expressive of a traditional masculine ideal. For these men, that masculinity comes out in a more unconscious, confident, even brash and arrogant manner. These types of men are not self-conscious about their desires and their dominating tendencies. Their impulsivity, aggressiveness, and even selfishness are expressions of an internal lack of self-consciousness or self-questioning. In The Empire Strikes Back, when Han Solo first sees Darth Vader, there's absolutely no hesitation as Han pulls out his blaster and starts firing away. In contrast, Shakespeare's Hamlet spends the entire play questioning himself, his thoughts, desires, and beliefs. This isn't to say that Hamlet is not masculine, but it shows that these are two sides of the same coin and are two good examples of the different types of male expression that women are drawn to in different ways and times.

Hamlet's questioning, thoughtfulness and anxiety show the dilemma of the "nice guy."

But I think it's important to recognize that some men (and women) may be more disposed to one side or the other. And it is healthiest for an individual to understand and accept who they are and what their internal dispositions are. Self-acceptance is attractive as well. When I think about these things, with patients and even in myself, I believe that we need to help men define for themselves what masculinity is and to try to explore a greater level of internal acceptance of their masculinity.

A sad dilemma is that society currently characterizes masculinity as dangerous, beastly, even morally and intellectually deficient. I see many men come into my office with internal feelings of shame and guilt about their masculine desires, about their internal inclinations toward assertiveness or aggression. These men have been programmed to fear these desires, and view them as dangerous, because that is how society characterizes them—the television character of Al Bundy is a great example of the modern view of maleness: bumbling, slave to sexual desires, and stupefied by masculinity. And so, many men try to overcome these desires, be better than them, suppress them, and reject them. These are often the men who then end up questioning how and why that jackass swaggering thug gets the girl while they are just a “friend.” Men can identify that internal conflict and become more comfortable and confident in themselves. A man can be both a male with very masculine desires and attitudes and a self-aware, responsible, and thoughtful person. The two are not mutually exclusive—a man can be both Hamlet and Han Solo, in other words, and can still get the girl.

Jorge Pena and Danay Howard shine a light on the real street harassment taking place across America

Mumia Ali · 9 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Advisory warning: Not All Black Women Are Like That (NABWALT) but Enough Black Women Are Like That (EBWALT).

Barely two weeks after Hollaback!'s incredibly racist, classist, and socially tone-deaf panhandling video came out, which purportedly set out to document all of the supposed "street harassment" New York City women have to endure daily, the whole country got to witness, for the umpteenth time no less, an actual case of street harassment that didn't require a tony, upscale marketing firm to document.

A simple cellphone camera sufficed.

Jorge Pena—a 25-year-old, six-foot-six NYC native—reached back into last week and slapped Danay Howard, another NYC native, into next week after being subjected to all manner of harassment and abuse on Howard's part while riding on the F train. Pena's slap that was heard around the world came only after he was savagely attacked by Howard, who used her six-inch stiletto-heeled-shoe as a weapon on his face. As the New York City District Attorney's Office made clear, Pena was clearly defending himself.

Compare and contrast this event to the "10 Hours of Walking in NYC …" video footage, where not one instance of Shoshana Roberts being accosted, assaulted, or attacked could be seen. To any reasonable person viewing both events, the conclusion is obvious: if there is a such thing as "street harassment," it's a problem of the lady folks' own making—and one that they can and should solve.

What Pena endured is by no means anything new. Indeed, in Hanna Rosin's popular work The End of Men, The Atlantic writer documents this rise in women behaving badly in a chapter devoted to their devolution, entitled, interestingly enough, "A More Perfect Poison." Rosin observes that criminologists and related academics have noted the steady rise in antisocial and downright criminal behavior on the part of women over the past several decades reaching back into the 1990s but have been rather mum on the results of their findings. As Shahrazad Ali notes in her numerous interviews after her 1989 book, The Blackman's Guide to Understanding the Blackwoman, went viral, women, in this case Black, have been and continue to be a protected class—free from public examination and evaluation in terms of their behavior and the impact it inflicts on others.

Thankfully, the wonder of telecommunications technology has come along to remedy the reticence on the part of our nation's eggheads.

As Rosin points out in her book, it is difficult to see the wanton harassment and, yes, misandrist attacks and assaults often on Black men and other men of color by (usually and disproportionately) Black women on the nation's mass transit systems as some sort of "legacy of slavery," especially since there was no recorded precedent for such behaviors by Black women in times past. In cities like NYC, Philly, Chicago, Houston, Washington, DC, and elsewhere, it is not at all unusual to witness Black women running amok on the bus or subway, often acting in pairs or indeed packs, on unsuspecting and innocent men and at times other women. YouTube is overflowing with cellphone video after cellphone video of these brazen attacks, with seemingly more being added daily—indeed, one of the more well-known and publicized incidents along these lines took place in spring 2013 when a Cleveland, Ohio, bus driver was forced to defend himself against a Black woman who harassed him to the point where she spat on him (sound familiar? read on)—to which he responded with a stiff uppercut to the jaw. Again, as YouTube documents, these incidents are far from unique or rare—in fact, they're quite commonplace.

In a column written earlier this year, your correspondent made the case that violence, be that domestic or pedestrian, is hardly the preserve of Black males; if anything, the evidence as best we have it shows that Black women are just as likely to attack you as Black men, if not much more so. Drawing comparisons to then Baltimore

Ravens running back Ray Rice to pop diva kid sister Solange Knowles, I argued that not only are Black women known to be violent to Black men, but their antics are also well publicized*—and are just as often explained and rationalized away under some rubric of "disparity," i.e., supposed physical differences between Black men and Black women (forgetting the fact that Black women, taken together as a group, are the biggest people in America). Yea, that's the ticket.

Even diehard Black feminists of the likes of Feminista Jones have admitted that violence in the Black community is hardly as "gendered" (read: done only by Black men) as many of her ilk would have the rest of us believe. I quote from her own column appearing in Time magazine earlier this fall:

> Researchers have also found that Black women report feeling more obligated to fight back than to report abuse and that is reflected in the disproportionate rates of DV/IPV reported by Black men. Our attempts to embody the "strong Black woman" stereotype have often done more harm than good, to us and those we love.

Of course, feminists of every color remain utterly silent in the face of daily occurrences of real street harassment and assault taking place in our country's public spaces on the part of largely Black women. As we all know by now, the social justice warrior crowd is more motivated by "Who, whom?" than by anything resembling fairness or the facts.

Meanwhile, for the rest of us who have to make our way out on the increasingly meaner streets of America's urban centers and inner cities, we know the real deal: steer clear of the Sistahood.

The life that you save may well be your own.

It is important to note that Knowles is hardly unique as an entertainer/singer who is violent and abusive toward (Black) men. There's also the very well-known attacks of fellow R&B singers Mary J. Blige and Keke Wyatt, and rappers Foxy Brown and Da Brat also come to mind. Of course, none of them got the Chris Brown treatment…*

Stop fibbin' White Ribbon Campaign!

Jim Byset · 9 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The mission to end violence against women received another boost last week with the news that White Ribbon Canada is to receive $300,000 in funding from the Canadian government. The money, donated by the Minister of Labour and Minister of Status of Women, Dr. Kellie Leitch, is to be used to fund the development of an "online toolkit" that will help men end violence against women. Todd Minerson of White Ribbon Canada and Minister Leitch made the announcement in front of assembled press in Ottawa.

The news comes as something of a fillip for the White Ribbon Campaign (WRC) amid increased scrutiny regarding its financial affairs, the accuracy of its claims surrounding domestic violence and rape, and the methods used to draw attention to its mission. Both White Ribbon Australia and White Ribbon Canada have recently had their financial records investigated, with the findings showing that the overwhelming majority of the WRC's funding goes directly to staff salaries. In the case of White Ribbon Canada, this amounts to $528,101 from a total of $1,108,850, paid out to just 11 staff.

The next-largest tranche of funding is used for further fund-raising efforts, the net effect of which is that while most of the money that White Ribbon Australia and Canada make goes into staffers' pockets, most of what is left over is used to make sure that it keeps going there. Neither set of records shows how, or where, funding is spent on serious anti-violence efforts. For now, the WRC has two main campaigns—the most visible being "Walk a Mile in Her Shoes," the purpose of which is to raise awareness through symbolic gestures of solidarity for women who suffer domestic violence. Yet, despite significant fund-raising, the WRC does not operate or offer any counseling services, helplines, or legal advice to those who are victims of sexual assault or domestic violence. According to WRC organizers, their job is simply one of "awareness raising," but if recent efforts in the Republic of Ireland are anything to go by, they're failing.

Badly.

White Ribbon Ireland is also taking fire for making grossly exaggerated claims on the prevalence of rape in Irish society. The Irish arm of the advocacy group has apologized for a recent "error" that inflated the Irish government's Central Statistics Office (CSO) rate of 451 reported instances of rape in 2013 to a massive 3,500. White Ribbon Ireland made the claim in a press release prior to its official launch, stating that "[a]ccording to CSO statistics, there were 3,500 reported rapes in Ireland in 2013." It is difficult to see how such an "error" could take place within a group whose expertise is supposed to be on these very issues. White Ribbon Ireland has not as yet fully explained how the number found its way into print or what it's doing to ensure that such obvious falsehoods aren't repeated—a worrying sign indeed. If the WRC's mission is truly to raise awareness on issues such as rape and domestic violence, then it behooves them to ensure that data is accurate. Exaggerating data on crimes such as rape will only have one result—spreading fear.

But perhaps worst of all is the WRC's insistence that domestic violence is an issue that only affects women. It is a well-established fact that men are just as likely to be victims of domestic violence. However, the WRC's framing of the issue is one that ignores the male reality of suffering. This is completely unacceptable, especially so in an environment where the overwhelming majority of men do not feel able to speak out regarding their abuse. Police authorities are not trained to deal with male victims of abuse, and there are practically zero resources from which men can seek help. Tonight across Canada, and Australia, and Ireland, men will suffer their abuse alone, behind closed doors.

If the White Ribbon Campaign is serious about its mission, then it's time to acknowledge ALL victims of abuse.

It's time to put all money into the direct provision of services. It's time to stop manipulating figures. It's time for honesty and transparency.

Unfortunately, Minister Leitch's announcement may not prove to be as helpful as we'd hope, despite all of the fanfare. As long as Canadian taxpayer money goes to groups like the White Ribbon Campaign, we will never be free of domestic violence and we will never, ever have a fair and equitable approach to these issues. The men, women, and children in our lives deserve so much better.

13 reasons women lie about rape

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 10 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Note: This article is also available in Portuguese.

Two sensational rape stories in the media have brought to light the question of false allegations, prompting many to wonder just why a woman would lie about rape. In her memoir, Lena Dunham claims that she was raped by Barry, a flamboyant, well-known campus Republican, but her story does not hold up under scrutiny. Jackie, the woman at the center of the Rolling Stone profile on Greek culture at the University of Virginia, claims to have been gang-raped, but the discrepancies in her account resulted in the magazine backing away from the story and questioning Jackie's credibility. We do not know if either of these women has made false allegations, but false allegations of rape can and do happen. Here are 13 reasons women lie about rape.

1. Women lie about rape to cover up their infidelity.

One night, Nicola Osborne got a bit drunk and ended up in bed with a man and they enjoyed "extensive sexual activity." The episode was entirely consensual and the two swapped phone numbers after they were through. On the way home, it occurred to Osborne that her husband might not think very highly of her "activities" and she became flustered and visibly upset. When passers-by came to her aid, she told them that she had been forcibly abducted and raped by a stranger, sparking a massive police response to find the rapist. A subsequent DNA test led police to the man whom she had slept with and he was arrested and held for 12 hours. Once the truth came out that the encounter has been consensual, Osborne was charged with filing a false report and sentenced to 18 months in prison. Women lie about rape to cover up their infidelity.

2. Women lie about rape to explain why they are looking at porn.

When Elizabeth Coast's mother discovered her looking at porn on the internet, Coast explained that her actions were the result of sexual abuse she had experienced at the hand of a neighbor. Coast testified that when her neighbor was 14, and she was 10, he had sexually molested her. Her testimony was compelling enough to secure the man's conviction. He was sentenced to seven years and served four of those until Coast's guilty conscience became too much to bear and she admitted that she had lied about an innocent man. Coast was sentenced to two months in prison for her lie and must pay the man $90,000 restitution. Women lie about rape to explain why they are looking at porn.

3. Women lie about rape because they are mentally ill.

Rosanne England scratched her face, tore her clothing and concocted a story about a man asking to use her telephone and then violently raping her. She gave police a detailed description that happened to match a 59-year-old father of two teenaged daughters who had no alibi as he had been walking his dog in the woods when the rape allegedly occurred. The man was arrested and held for 28 hours until DNA tests finally cleared him. He continues to face suspicion from his neighbors about his guilt. England gave no justification for the accusation other than she suffers from "mental illness." Women lie about rape because they are mentally ill.

4. Women lie about rape because they feel guilty.

Kelly Harwood had a few drinks and decided that sleeping with her friend's son was a good idea. Upon reflection, she decided that she had betrayed her friend by doing so and reported her friend's son for rape. She told police that she had been raped while sleeping, and her friend's son was subjected to an "intrusive medical examination and interviewed under caution." Two days later, Harwood relented and admitted that she had lied about the rape. She suffers from depressive illness, exacerbated by the amount of alcohol she had consumed. Women lie about rape because they feel guilty.

5. Women lie about rape if the sex is bad.

Lynette Lee arranged to meet a man whom she had contacted through a dating site. They went on a date, which ended with consensual sex in a motel room. Lee then reported the man for forcible rape. He was interviewed by police, who then re-interviewed Lee, who confessed to lying about the rape because "she did not enjoy the sex" and "it was bad." Women lie about rape if the sex is bad.

6. Women lie about rape when they fail school exams.

Rhiannon Brooker knew her party lifestyle was catching up with her when the law student failed her bar exams. She told her exam committee that her performance was affected by "extenuating circumstances" and had her boyfriend charged with multiple counts of rape and assault, including punching her so hard in the stomach that she miscarried. She faked her own injuries to support the charges. The accused spent 36 days in jail before police confirmed that he was at work and had alibis for each of the alleged rapes. Brooker was sentenced to three and a half years for false allegations. Women lie about rape when they fail school exams.

7. Women lie about rape because of psychiatric medication complications.

Katherine Bennett had consensual sex with a national guardsman but then reported to police that he had abducted her from a parking lot, taken her to his house and drugged her and raped her at knifepoint before she was able to escape. The police were able to establish that the story had been fabricated but not before the guardsman lost his job and had his reputation seriously damaged. Bennett's attorney said that Bennett suffers from depression and obsessive-compulsive disorder and "although her condition and complications from medication were not an excuse for the false report, they were contributing factors." Women lie about rape because of psychiatric medication complications.

8. Women lie about rape when they want attention.

Gemma Gregory, desperate for attention from police officers, filed eight false rape charges, accusing seven different men over a period of six years. Former boyfriends were subjected to DNA tests and interviews and huge amounts of police time were wasted so that Gregory could have the attention she craved. After recording hundreds of calls with Gregory, the police arrested and charged her with false allegation offenses. Women lie about rape when they want attention.

9. Women lie about rape to get sympathy.

Linsey Attridge was having some relationship problems with her boyfriend and needed to win some sympathy from him. She trolled Facebook and found a picture of a 26-year-old man and his 14-year-old brother whom she had never met and reported them both for a violent rape. To make her story more credible, she punched herself in the face, ripped her clothing and told police that the two men had broken into her house while her boyfriend was away and subjected her to a brutal attack. Both were arrested and had their lives turned upside down as word of the charges spread throughout the community. Attridge eventually admitted to making the whole thing up and was sentenced to 200 hours of community service. She has never apologized. Her boyfriend dumped her. Women lie about rape to get sympathy.

10. Women lie about rape to make boyfriends jealous.

Hannah Bryon was mad at her boyfriend for breaking up with her. Wanting some attention from him and to make him jealous, she told him that a man whom she had been flirting with attacked her on a bridge, raped her and then threw money at her to get a taxi. The man whom she identified as her rapist was arrested and put through a stressful examination and questioning but was able to provide police with evidence that he had not attacked Bryon. Bryon was given a suspended sentence and 150 hours of community service. Women lie about rape to make boyfriends jealous.

11. Women lie about rape for revenge.

When Cori Lynn Osiecki's boyfriend broke up with her and started "spreading rumors," she decided to exact revenge on him by filing a rape charge. She was taken by ambulance to the hospital, where a rape kit was collected and an investigation was started. Eventually Osiecki admitted that she had lied about the assault because she "wanted to get back at him." Women lie about rape for revenge.

12. Women lie about rape because they are "moody."

Isabella Himmel was at a bar and her friend wasn't paying attention to her, which left her feeling "moody," so she told another friend that she had been gang-raped by a group of male students at the University of Connecticut. That friend believed her story and reported it to police, triggering an action alert to more than 30,000 students and a considerable amount of distress on campus. Surveillance video, however, showed no attack. Himmel then agreed that she might not have been grabbed by the hair and gang-raped by five men, but she might have been kicked or she might have just fallen. Himmel must complete a program that could lead to the dismissal of the false rape report charges against her. Women lie about rape because they are "moody."

13. Women lie about rape when their friends get mad at them.

Biurny Peguero was extremely drunk, out a bar with friends, and impetuously accepted a ride in a van with three men. When she realized where she was, she became frightened and hysterical. The men took her back to the bar, and that's when the trouble started. The friends she had left behind were angry with her and a brawl broke out among the women, who punched and bit one another. When a friend demanded to know if the men had raped Peguero, she said that they had. The bruises she had sustained in the fight with her friends were accepted as evidence of rape, and one man spent four years in jail on the charge. Women lie about rape when their friends get mad at them.

Shockingly, this is not even a complete list of the reasons women lie about rape, but if anything is clear, it is that women do lie.

Torture techniques used on innocent men after 9/11

Pierce Harlan · 10 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The Senate investigation into CIA interrogation practices after the 9/11 attacks reopens old wounds and raises questions long ago asked, but never properly answered, about the appropriateness of such techniques in battling terrorism. The current administration prohibits these kinds of techniques, but it, Senator Feinstein, and others concerned about the CIA's use of torture under the previous administration support utilizing drones to kill enemies. How appropriate is any of it?

These issues are debated by people far better informed than me, but I would make one point. Many folks who are perfectly okay with the CIA's techniques after 9/11 are assuming that the techniques were used on "terrorists." In fact, the Senate report reveals about one-fifth of the men imprisoned were wrongly detained, and some were subjected to the "enhanced" interrogation techniques (President Obama called these techniques "brutal"):

> . . . the CIA used enhanced interrogation techniques against at least one of those persons [according to the report].
> "They include Abu Hudhaifa, who was subjected to ice water baths and 66 hours of standing sleep deprivation before being released because the CIA discovered he was likely not the person he was believed to be," that footnote states.
>
> Other detainees . . . include one detained as "useful leverage" against a family member and an "'intellectually challenged' individual whose taped crying was used as leverage."
> The report shows that the CIA acknowledged it had wrongly detained five individuals throughout the course of the program, but the committee's review of CIA records found at least 21 others who did not meet the standard for detention.

War is hell, presidents and people acting on their behalf in the defense of America have an impossibly difficult job, and people acting in good faith sometimes have terrible lapses in judgment. If this report forces our leaders to ponder how this happened, and to insure that processes are in place to minimize these sorts of abuses and mistakes, then this report will serve a useful purpose.

Readers of Community of the Wrongly Accused know we loathe sacrificing innocents as collateral damage—whether it be in the "war on rape" or the war on terror.

Not everything is black and white, Eddie

Mark Dent · 10 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It pains me as a passionate supporter of the Collingwood Football Club to concede that our president, Eddie McGuire, is an embarrassment whenever he decides to speak on the subject of women and how our society treats them.

The formula is so infuriatingly predictable and lacking in any meaningful insight that one wonders how he can happily put his name to such tosh.

Recently ("Celebrities such as Katy Perry entitled to rights and privacy," Herald Sun, November 28), McGuire decided it was time to remind all of the women out there that he has got their back and, knockabout bloke though he may be, he will not tolerate the subjugation or sexual objectification of women.

McGuire begins his article with words that are so blatantly inaccurate that I found myself thumbing the pages of an English dictionary to see whether the word secret had been redefined in recent days.

No.

A secret is defined as something that is kept or meant to be kept unknown or unseen by others.

He writes:

> In launching White Ribbon Day on this page on Tuesday, Chief Commissioner of Police Ken Lay said, "For too many years, violence against women has been one of Australia's dark secrets."

I have been reading headlines in our major newspapers, watching documentaries, seen endless advertising campaigns, and stared at huge billboards alerting me to the fact that violence against women happens and is not acceptable for nigh on four decades. If the reality of domestic violence in our society is still a secret, then our entire community must be blind, deaf, and dumb.

The only subject to match the irony of such a clearly false statement is the notion that we need to raise awareness of breast cancer. These words are attached to every one of the countless charities and fundraisers that continue to add millions to the bulging coffers of breast cancer charities. A visitor from outer space could be forgiven for believing that breast cancer is the only cancer that affects humans. But still, the line is used unashamedly, even as we are surrounded by pink on an inordinate number of days throughout the year.

With regard to domestic violence, there is a fact that is kept secret, unknown and unseen by others. People like Ken Lay and McGuire ensure this is the case by refusing to acknowledge male victims. But that is a discussion for another day.

McGuire quotes the gender bigot, Ken Lay, again:

> We also know that attitudes and violence are related. We know vulgar attitudes toward women contribute to their abuse.

Mental illness, alcohol and drug abuse, financial pressures, and reciprocal violence are apparently not the concern—it all comes down to men with bad attitudes beating up women cause they can. Simple.

Now McGuire leaps onto the subject of Katy Perry and her recent run-in with the Australian paparazzi:

> Perry, enjoying a rare time off on her Australian tour, decided to spend the day at the beach, choosing a nudist beach in Mosman, presumably for its privacy.

McGuire goes on to describe how Perry was aggressively harassed and then, “according to the singer,” they tried to browbeat her into a pact with the devil:

> “Give us a photo of yourself in a bikini and we’ll leave you alone” was the gist of the threat/deal.

Apparently a member of the paparazzi took off his clothes to continue trying to photograph her. McGuire writes:

> To her credit, Perry returned serve and took snaps of her own of the photographic pack while tweeting to her 60 million followers. Good on her for being a role model to young women.

McGuire has done what countless feminist have done for decades. He takes one interaction between a female and some males and immediately holds it up for all to see as something men do to women.

He makes no mention of the fact that countless male celebrities are stalked and harassed by the same paparazzi and photographed when naked or semi-naked. Jude Law had full frontal photos of himself published when he was photographed changing on a balcony. He was also mocked for the size of his genitals. I don’t recall anyone condemning the paparazzi when this occurred.

John Hamm, star of the Mad Men series, has experienced ongoing stalking by the paparazzi and the obsession many have with the size of his genitals. Hamm expressed his disapproval for the “John Hamm’s Wang” Tumblr, saying:

> They’re called privates for a reason. I’m wearing pants, for fuck’s sake. Lay off. I mean, it’s not like I’m a fucking lead miner. There are harder jobs in the world. But when people feel the freedom to create Tumblr accounts about my cock, I feel like that wasn’t part of the deal.

But all we have in response to such harassment is hearty chuckles and a wink and a nudge.

McGuire clearly has no idea that men are subjected to this objectification on a daily basis. Does Ken Lay believe this is what creates an attitude in our society that says beating up men is okay or in any way acceptable?

But the most crucial aspect of this issue is entirely ignored by “the one good man,” Eddie McGuire.

Who is the target audience for the wicked paparazzi? Who are the people who make these stalkers rich? Why, none other than the very women McGuire is so desperate to protect! These photos of semi-naked celebrities, be they male or female, fill the pages of women’s magazines. That’s right—magazines produced for and devoured by women.

Let’s name but a few: New Idea, Women’s Weekly, Who Magazine, Cleo, New Weekly, and Women’s Day.

It is our females who feed the paparazzi frenzy. Without an audience, the photos have no value and the paparazzi die. It is women who pore over the cellulite on a celebrity’s backside or the boob job on show as a bikini-clad celeb emerges unsuspecting from the swimming pool or sea.

The great majority of men do not purchase these magazines. Who is doing the objectifying in our society? Who is supporting the harassment of our celebrities?

Lay and McGuire make no mention of this important fact.

You would think that McGuire, being the president of an AFL club, would be fully aware of the groupies who stalk the young footballers.

A recent article by Andrew Rule, a respected Herald Sun journalist, presented a rare but very welcome sense of balance to the issue of sexual objectification in the wake of the Stephen Milne rape case.

Rule writes with regard to the St. Kilda footballers:

> The Saints were no saints but bad behaviour ran both ways.
>
> One star was mildly shocked to be lured to his girlfriend's parents' house – only to be greeted by the girl's 40-something mother, home alone and nude except for a fur coat, as was clear when she opened the door, then the coat. Tricky etiquette problem, that.
> Football's all-time scoundrel Fred Cook, expert in debauchery, modestly admits he and his mate Sam Newman were sex objects exploited by every "Big M girl" in the troupe of bikini models promoting the flavoured milk drink.
> Somewhere out there, almost respectable middle-aged mothers are blushing or pretending they haven't read this.
> At least they are more anonymous than a famous prime minister's daughter who entertained Cook and Newman in Peter Janson's Hugh Hefneresque apartment at the Windsor Hotel.

McGuire must have no knowledge of such disgusting sexual objectification of our footballers, for surely he would have otherwise mentioned it.

Rule continues:

> A former Herald reporter, Kate Nancarrow, once spent weeks with female sports groupies, then wrote a mesmerising magazine story exposing the sordid underbelly of the "glamorous" scene where naïve, desperate, disturbed or cynical young women pursued young men treated like heroes but in many ways immature, irresponsible and spoilt or worse.
> The story, Sirens, was published years before the Milne incident, but not much had changed. It tracks groupies in the hierarchy from the changing room door to the nightclubs and awards nights.
> Nancarrow talks to them all. From the pathetic, chain-smoking losers hanging outside changing rooms trying to swap sex for "friendship" to the predatory groups of competitive bachelor girls who cynically bed sportsmen for sport, through to ambitious "hunters" aiming to climb the red carpet on Brownlow night to catch a footballer husband.
> So who is exploiting whom? The line between exploited and exploiter is as fuzzy as what another writer, Anna Krien, calls "the grey zone between rape and consent".

Where are the demands from Ken Lay for our young women to be taught to respect our men and not treat them like toys made for their sexual gratification? Girls routinely assault and grope young males in boy bands and it is regarded as cute. If young men did the same to female performers, they would be facing jail time, and Ken Lay would point to yet another example of our disgraceful violence inducing attitudes to women in our society.

A few months ago, when the cast of Modern Family were here to shoot an episode, one of the female cast members Sarah Hyland, had her bottom squeezed by a fan, contrary to earlier reports that her breast had been touched.

Was this behaviour inappropriate? Undoubtedly, and Hyland had every right to be affronted. However, once again the thorny issue of outrageous double standards raises its ugly head. For decades we have witnessed young girls tearing the clothes off young male singers. They scratch, pull, grope, and grab, and the men are often left battered and licking their wounds after running the gauntlet of their screaming female fans. I don't believe I have ever read one word of condemnation of this behaviour. Why? The sexual frenzy that possesses so many females at concerts or appearances is quite disturbing and has terrified many male pop stars over the years. Hyland's bottom squeeze saw the intellectually challenged defendant go to court to face charges. What he did pales into insignificance when you look at the mauling that male pop stars have endured. There are sites where the sexual prowess and size of male rock stars/entertainers are rated. Yet this kind of objectification is never on Ken Lay's or Eddie McGuire's radar. No one gets a pat on the back or group hug for telling the world that females should respect males, so why would you bother?

McGuire goes on to pull out all the old, familiar lines:

> Do we still think because a woman decides to dress in a certain way she's fair game: if she's famous, less human?

How sickening. Suddenly "we" (all men) are in the firing line. McGuire can barely contain his disgust. The he makes the link with rape:

> And when Perry tells grown men who are threatening her to stop, that NO means NO. We must stop the conflicting messages—that there is a time to belt your wife or girlfriend or there is a type of woman who deserves respect and others who don't.

It was at this point I believe I was entitled to believe that McGuire had become unhinged.

I had to read the lines two or three times before the true enormity of the idiotic, infantile, vacuous, inane, and imbecilic nature of these words hit home.

The paparazzi wish to take photos of a female celebrity who is wearing a bikini on the beach. This quickly transmogrifies into men believing there is a time to belt their wives or disrespect women on the basis of their appearance.

Again, McGuire underlines the infantile approach the White Ribbon mob has when speaking about domestic violence. It's nothing a few short, sharp words from the boy from Broady won't fix. It would surely go something like this: "Fellas—don't belt the missus when you've had a bad day! It's not acceptable behaviour."

Job done—if only the men out there will take McGuire's wise advice on board when they find themselves contemplating another belting of their missus.

McGuire says:

> No person has the right to intimidate anyone. Especially now we are calling for a new order in how we treat women in this country.

This sentence is breathtaking in the sheer scale of its absurdity. I found myself unable to frame a response for some time as I was too flummoxed by the notion that women in this country are treated in a manner that demands a new order. Note that he didn't say some women or a minority of women—it is just women.

Does that include the hundreds of thousands of women living lives of great comfort, prosperity, and leisure with more choices open to them than any man could dream of having?

What and who was he referring to? I am genuinely bewildered. With men killing themselves at more than three times the rate of women, one could be forgiven for believing we need a new order for how we treat men in this country.

McGuire, like so many men involved in the media, knows how to win the approval of those who control how we think about the important "issues" of the day. He bows and scrapes at the feet of feminism and will do so for as long as he works in the media business. There is not one media man brave enough to question the lies being peddled on a daily basis. Even Andrew Bolt refuses to take on feminist lies.

Perhaps McGuire has spent too long at the Collingwood Football Club. Like him, I love the black and white stripes, but only a simple fool views life through a black and white lens. There are subtle shades of grey in every issue, but that is too complex a belief for McGuire to adopt.

As UVA case unravels, feminists scramble with damage control

Jonathan Taylor · 10 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Three weeks ago Rolling Stone published an article by Sabrina Rubin Erdely. It chronicled the story of a young woman named "Jackie" who was (allegedly) "brutally assaulted by seven men at a frat party." According to Erdely, "Jackie" tried to get the University of Virginia to take her (alleged) sexual assault seriously, but the university was indifferent because it wanted to protect its reputation.

It is hard to overstate the degree of exposure this piece achieved. Nearly every major media outlet reported on it (for example, CNN, PBS). Sweeping reforms were demanded at UVA. The university president, Teresa Sullivan (who had actually resigned as president in 2012, only to be reinstated later), suspended all Greek activity at UVA.

Massive hatred was poured upon fraternities through a plethora of channels. The frat house itself was vandalized, and the members were demonized (see the various pictures in this post for examples).

The Kool-Aid drinkers were out in force, lashing out at men as a group, at fraternities writ large, and university administrations. Simply read through the comments section of the RS article and see for yourself. Or check out the #istandwithjackie Twitter feed.

One small problem: Sabrina Erdely at Rolling Stone, at the behest of "Jackie," never contacted the men she claimed assaulted the alleged victim to get the other side of the story. That should have been a red flag that "Jackie" quite possibly didn't want them to get the other side of the story. Call it a rookie mistake, but award-winning "freelance journalists" like Sabrina Erdely should know better.

Perhaps she thought she could get away with it. And granted, if this were the 1990s, she very likely could. But we live in 2014, an age when information is not only much more free but also travels much more quickly.

Since her initial article in mid-November, more facts discovered by other news organizations have come to light that do not support "Jackie's" story, let alone Erdely's article. The cumulative impact of these facts has prompted Rolling Stone to write a retraction, in which they said, "we have come to the conclusion that our trust in the accuser was misplaced."

What are these facts? Let's list a few:

- The person that "Jackie" named as the "main rapist" was not a member of the fraternity where she claimed the rape occurred.
- There was no frat party on the night "Jackie" claimed to have been raped, nor that entire weekend.
- "Jackie" herself is now "unsure" whether the man ("Drew") who (allegedly) lured her into the room where the (alleged) rape occurred was a Phi Psi brother. As it turned out, "Drew" was not a Phi Psi member; he belongs to a "totally different fraternity."
- None of the frat members worked at the UVA pool in the fall of 2012, whereas Jackie claimed that she and "Drew" both worked there as lifeguards at the time.
- A friend of "Jackie's" later told Rolling Stone that "he found Jackie that night a mile from the school's fraternities." She did not appear injured, despite her claiming that she was grabbed from behind by a large man who fell on her and "crashed [with her] through a low glass table" that night. She also appeared uninjured despite emerging from this "party" (the party that never happened) being ""barefoot, disheveled … face beaten, dress spattered with blood," according to Erdely's article.
- She also never went to the hospital on the night of her severe "injuries," nor did she ever report the matter to the police.
- "Jackie" did not want the newspaper to contact the men she accused of sexual assault to get their side of the story.

When taken altogether, these discrepancies look very bad for "Jackie's" story. And it's not just the facts that make the story look bad, although they are indeed primarily what does.

Oh by the way, here are the noble ~~Kool-Aid drinkers~~ crusaders:

Let's take a look at how Erdely wrote the story in Rolling Stone. Take this passage, for example:

> She remembers every moment of the next three hours of agony, during which, she says, seven men took turns raping her, while two more – her date, Drew, and another man – gave instruction and encouragement. She remembers how the spectators swigged beers, and how they called each other nicknames like Armpit and Blanket. She remembers the men's heft and their sour reek of alcohol mixed with the pungency of marijuana. Most of all, Jackie remembers the pain and the pounding that went on and on.

"Armpit and Blanket" were what these frat members called each other? What, they didn't just call each other Lunkhead #1 and Lunkhead #2? I thought all frat boys were lunkheads? The point being this: Erdely's story is so caricatured and saturated with stereotypes that we should immediately question it on that basis alone.

Take a look at the next passage:

> "One of my roommates said, 'Do you want to be responsible for something that's gonna paint UVA in a bad light?'" says Jackie, poking at a vegan burger at a restaurant on the Corner, UVA's popular retail strip. "But I said, 'UVA has flown under the radar for so long, someone has to say something about it, or else it's gonna be this system that keeps perpetuating!'"

The language here is so contrived that it looks like the entire conversation was manufactured for political purposes. We are led to believe that "Jackie's roommate" plays devil's advocate and takes the side of the university, despite her having no real interest in doing so. And all of a sudden, "Jackie"—who never went to the police or the hospital despite supposedly suffering severe injuries—now talks about how it's everyone else's fault that the issue has "flown under the radar" for so long.

Feminists are now redirecting their crusade toward criticizing Rolling Stone for publishing the retraction. Don't get me wrong: they don't disagree with Rolling Stone presuming the guilt of the accused men. Feminists are just fine with that, and they are maintaining their practice of labeling "Jackie" a "victim" and a "survivor," even though we not only have no real evidence that she is either of these things but also have strong evidence that she is not).

Here's what one feminist, who writes for Slate, Salon, and other online media, says:

In a sense that is true that people don't have to have a perfect memory to have a case; people can easily mess up on dates and times. I do it myself occasionally.

But there is a matter of degree as well. Expecting accusers to have a perfect memory is one thing. Expecting accusers to not tell a story that is overwhelmingly contradicted by evidence is another. Messing up on 10% of your story—a 10% that doesn't call into question key events? Okay, maybe there's something we can still work with. Messing up on 90% of your story? Expect to get called out on the carpet.

Yes, some people have accidents. And for others, "accidents" happen with remarkable consistency. And "Jackie" clearly falls into the latter category.

Here's another gem:

Feminist Zerlina Maxwell recently wrote an article for The Washington Post. Note the title:

The word “automatically” was later changed to “generally.” Here is what she has to say in the article:

> We should believe, as a matter of default, what an accuser says. Ultimately, the costs of wrongly disbelieving a survivor far outweigh the costs of calling someone a rapist. Even if Jackie fabricated her account, U-Va. should have taken her word for it during the period while they endeavored to prove or disprove the accusation. This is not a legal argument about what standards we should use in the courts; it’s a moral one, about what happens outside the legal system.

Ah, you mean like what we did back in the days of slavery, right? Back when we acted “outside the legal system”?

This is why feminists, with their bigoted due-process-be-damned mentality, do not deserve a seat at the table in these issues. It’s not just that they get it wrong in “one or two cases.” They are hostile to the basic concept of not presuming a man is guilty because they are hostile to men as a group. No, not just “a few men who happen to be rapists.” All men.

The utter hypocrisy of feminists like Zerlina Maxwell—to be presuming guilt on the basis of one’s arrangement of chromosomes and then lecturing those who disagree on “morals.”

Here is what leading feminist website Jezebel thinks when a user doesn’t say the rape accusation is false but merely questions whether it’s possible for it to be:

Feminists & friends are now all a-twitter at #istandwithjackie. Why do they stand with Jackie? This feminist, author of the book Full Frontal Feminism, founder of the uber-popular website Feministing (popular among feminists & friends anyway), and columnist at The Guardian tells us why in a simple tweet:

Well, too bad—I do not trust women. But then again, I also do not trust men, White people, Black people, or any other “group,” period. I trust individuals. I don’t presume that individuals are good or bad, or trustworthy or untrustworthy, based on what group they happen to be born into. Unfortunately, we cannot say the same for feminists like Jessica Valenti.

Feminists say they trust women, but in fact they only trust the women who support their narrow, dogmatic, and generally anti-male worldview. They hide behind women as a group—indeed, they use and exploit women—to throw venom-tipped spears at men and boys.

I must give a shout out to The Community of the Wrongly Accused, which describes the implications of this case expertly in a must-read article:

> The Rolling Stone debacle did not happen in a vacuum. The sordid saga of the infamous article about a supposed gang rape — the fact it was written in the first place, then published in a mainstream magazine, and then unconditionally believed by so many — is the product of a culture that has allowed gender extremists to dominate the public discourse on sexual assault. These are people who demonize college men and reduce them to vile caricature; insist that college campuses are rape pits; claim with a straight face that women don't lie about rape; and preach that due process for men accused of rape on campus is a luxury college women can't afford. In short, they buy into "rape culture."

Indeed, the presumption of male guilt by feminists & friends is nothing new. We have seen it at Duke during the 2006 false rape case. We have seen it at Ohio University. We have seen it at Columbia University. We have seen it at Eckerd College. We have seen it at Dartmouth. We have a warehouse of statements from these people, demonstrating clear as day that their mindset is not one of equality and justice, as the public has erroneously been led to believe.

It is beyond clear that "Jackie" is not just an "imperfect" accuser; at this state in the game (which is no short time of two years), she is an accuser with near-zero credibility. And the possibility that she was never a "victim" or a "survivor" in the first place just might be why she never went to the hospital, or to the police, and forbade Rolling Stone from interviewing the men she accused to understand the bigger picture.

Is it still possible that "Jackie" was a victim of rape at a frat party on the UVA campus? Highly, highly unlikely—and that's where my "judgment" will rest.

When this story broke a month ago, I was tempted to do a writeup on it but felt that waiting would be better. As we have done in the past (see here and here), A Voice for Male Students will continue to maintain a policy against presuming guilt simply on the basis of sex. We will leave the less morally inclined feminists to shoot themselves in the foot over cases like these.

The time has come to seriously reconsider the prominence feminism has in conversations on gender. Rape is a significant issue on campus, just like false rape accusations are a significant issue. But neither is an "epidemic," and the kind of bigotry and hatred that feminism advocates should not lead the way.

We do not need to punish students who have not been found guilty of a crime, and the time has come to leave it up to the real professionals—the criminal justice system.

Q&A sessions at Male Students in Peril 2014

AVfM Video Source · 11 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Here are the Q&A sessions for every speaker at the Male Students in Peril 2014 conference.

There were a lot of technical issues with the house microphone in the audience, including six questions getting cut after said microphone died. As a result, closed captions (CC) are enabled for this video. Click the "CC" button at the bottom right of the YouTube player to turn them on. Phone users should press a plus sign (+) or relevant settings button (depending on the app playing the video) to enable CC. If you do not enable CC, you are just going to hear mumbling or silence from the audience.

Also, note that this footage and the panel footage will be here on YouTube but not on the DVD. The three obvious reasons are the technical issues with audio, the size of the footage, and the fact that audience faces were not blurred (which makes it impossible to use in the privately developed product, the DVD). Sage Gerard/Victor Zen's campus men's group (now called Zen Men) wanted room for bonus footage on the DVD and an overall professional presentation, and due to the technical issues, this video does not contribute to that goal.

To the FundAnything sponsors: The DVD case cover and label have been designed, and Zen Men will be moving to distribute as soon as the footage is re-encoded with a DVD menu and sent to the print shop. Your patience is appreciated while Zen Men moves into the last stages of production.

25 benefits of being a female while gaming

AVfM Video Source · 11 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Anita Sarkeesian's partner-in-fraud Jonathan McIntosh (of #FullMcIntosh fame) recently made a fatuous video listing all the "invisible benefits" of being male while video gaming. Some #GamerGate supporting women have a response.

http://youtu.be/6d6nRUBKdB4

You know, conversations on gender issues would be a lot easier if we admitted that there are (at least) two sides to every idea about sexism in the world. That would lead to intelligent conversations between adults.

But intelligent, thoughtful conversations appear to be the last thing people like McIntosh want.

Why the #YouOKSis "White Feather Campaign" failed ... badly

Mumia Ali · 11 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

> Of all our studies, history is best qualified to reward our research.
> —Malcolm X

With summer 2014 now firmly in the history books, it's a good time to review some of that season's biggest "stories" on the sexual politics front. Fortunately for us, our sistahood's feminist contingent never fails to disappoint—recall summer 2013's tempest in a teapot involving Professor Hugo Schwyzer, for example. Great job, ladies!

So, what was this summer's "big story"? Well, to let Feminista Jones, the Amazonian "sex-positive" third-waver from the Boogie Down up in NYC, tell it, it was the "epidemic" of "street harassment," dontcha know—and her solution?

To "call on" (read: cajole, shame, demand) brothas to "police" other brothas, to intervene whenever they spy a sista out and about being "harassed" by another brotha, by "simply" (heh) going up and asking said sista in distress(?), "You OK, sis?" Jones was able to drum up a bit of media attention for her bright idea, which culminated in a feature appearing on the Black-themed News One channel, and some social media buzz came along for the ride. Ultimately, though, the whole thing fizzled out before summer was done and instead wound up alienating not just (Black) men but quite a few (Black) women as well—for example, I got wind of her Twitter beef shooting war with Tariq Nasheed via a Black female follower of his. None of these developments came as a surprise to your humble correspondent; indeed, in an email correspondence to Jones, which, interestingly enough and completely unbeknownst to me at the time, occurred shortly after her spat with Nasheed, I made the case that she was going about the whole thing all wrong. Of course, my attempts toward reason, moderation, and understanding with an eye toward real solutions with the brothas who actually matter all fell on deaf ears. Such is the way of the sistahood, to favor irrationality in the face of reason.

Sigh.

Why was I able to call the outcome of this much ballyhooed "campaign"—one that, in Jones's own words, has done more harm than good in the form of garnering the attention of lots and lots of very irate (White) men in the form of emails, tweets, and the like (not even including the Nasheed factor et al.)? Well, aside from the very poor strategy planning of the whole thing—assuming that Jones truly does want meaningful solutions, that is (which is questionable in the light of this incident and a string of others that I'll be discussing in due course)—there are the grand lessons of history to look back on and to learn a tremendous deal from. You see, attempts to "shame" men into doing the bidding of others, in this case that of Black women, is a very, very old story—at least a century old. And back then, the story ended as badly as this summer's #YouOKSis Twitter campaign.

Let's take a look, shall we?

A Brief History Lesson

A century ago, when World War I was jumping off in earnest, a British Navy officer, needing fresh recruits to throw into the meat grinder of the Western Front, instituted an interesting idea—have all the women present a white feather to any man not in military uniform, which would mean that she was calling him a coward for not fighting for God and country. The white feather notion itself came from observing that fighting cocks born with a white feather or two in their tail plumage tended to be weaker fighters (or didn't fight at all) than fighting cocks that weren't born with such feathers in their tail plumage (which just goes to show that feminists don't really have a problem with Darwin's discoveries and, by extension, EvoPsych—only those parts that they do have a problem with, i.e., those parts that show up their tortured ideology for the sham that it is). Well-known feminists of the era, like Emmeline Pankhurst and her daughter Christabel, not only jumped on board with both feet but also lobbied hard to institute an involuntary draft of men who couldn't even vote. Gotta love that equality.

The campaign worked so very well that soon even civil servants (who, of course, didn't wear the uniform) and decorated war veterans coming back home injured and broken were being HARASSED ON THE STREET by women thrusting white feathers in their faces. Even soldiers on leave from the dreaded Western Front were getting the white feather treatment(!).

The White Feather Campaign finally died a merciful death by the end of WWI, but was briefly resurrected during WWII, only to go down in flames again. But the damage had been done, and the historical precedent had been set—for feminists, the shaming of men became a powerful tool—weapon, even—in getting them to do their bidding.

Today, we see the White Feather Campaign live on via the #YouOKSis social media campaign and other such "efforts" supposedly aimed toward getting men to "act right"—earlier this spring, the Obama government released on its YouTube channel a series of video shorts featuring well-known actors, including Daniel Craig himself, shaming, er, imploring men to police other men when it came to the issue of campus sexual assault. And of course, more recently, there's the HeForShe campaign brought to us courtesy of the United Nations, spearheaded by none other than Emma Watson of Harry Potter fame. And in clockwork fashion, both of these campaigns have been met with formidable push back—looks like the fellas are pretty solid readers of history after all, hmm?

Another Lesson of (Recent) History: Charles Ramsey
Of course, no such White Feather Campaign can be complete without a mention of Charles Ramsey—the everyday brotha who rescued not one, not two, but three women, who were White at that, from the clutches of a man who kept them hostage for the better part of a decade. Here's the very first Google result that came up when I typed the words "charles ramsey, feminista jones" into the search engine. Very complimentary.

It plays right into the insights that Tommy Sotomayor (yasssssss, I'mma go there) noted in his commentary on the topic—in the minds of sistas—like Jones (who, by the way, had a VERY strong reaction to my informing her that I was having a conversation with Lindsey of Cards Against Harassment fame—fascinating!). How dare Ramsey or any other brotha do anything heroic for White women? They should be heroic for "their own," dontcha know. Take a wild guess as to who just had to come in and piss all over Ramsey's moment in the sun … Here's a hint: It wasn't Becky.

Couldn't find any tweets by Jones addressing that, though (and that's saying A LOT, since Jones seems to be quite the prolific tweeter). Perhaps one of you reading this right now can?

At any rate, in a widely published column written on the matter shortly thereafter, I made the case that Ramsey proved what I had long suspected to be the truth: that it didn't pay to be a white knight. Playing Dudley Do-Right can and often does put one right in the line of fire—in his case socially, but in others, as this story right here in my hometown of Philly aptly shows (thanks to a SISTA LADY reader of J4G for sending this in!), it can prove literally life-threatening.

In both cases—that of Ramsey and that of the guy in Philly who got stone-cold knocked the eff out that night down on Rittenhouse Square—it just isn't worth it to put your neck on the line for people you don't know and for other people who you don't know who will have no qualms about dragging your name into the dirt because of their own personal axes they gotsta grind. Best to mind your business, look out for your own, and let the pros (read: police) handle the rest. Besides, especially when it comes to the sistahood, they're strong, independent, and don't need no man—right?

Right?

Yet Another Recent(!) History Lesson: "Handbags 4 Peace"
Picking up from the Ramsey debacle was something that also took place here in Philly: a fellow Black feminist/activist demanded that Black men be shamed into protecting her and other Black women who just had to go into sketchy areas of town at all times of the night to shake their tail feathers and show off their handbags by holding a rally to that effect in the wake of a spate of what became known as "handbag shootings" across the city. In response, your correspondent wrote two columns outlining how and why such a notion was so woefully wrongheaded. Here's an excerpt from each:

> Let's take things a step further, shall we? I feel your questions are ill-put; for example, the question isn't "Where are our men?", Ms. Sanchez; the question is, "Where is YOUR Man?" – especially given the fact that, per the article in which you were quoted, you are the mother of a daughter, yes? My question is, where is the father of your daughter, and why are you not turning to him as your first line of defense in terms of "protection"? And if he is not around, why is it my or any other regular citizen male's "duty", to step into his place? If you feel justified in posing such a question, then I feel as justified in posing mine. If you feel that I or any other male Philadelphian "must" protect you, because, well, the "mothers/sisters/daughters" argument, then I have yet another question for you:
> WHY, should someone else's father, brother or son, hubbie or "boo","protect" YOU? Do they not have a responsibility to protect their own people? After all, the very article in which you were quoted, notes that one such "boo" was shot after giving chase to a perp who snatched his lady's purse. This I highly respect, though his tactical awareness left a bit to be desired (more on this below). Why should this fellow, take a bullet, for you – or for those ladies out at 53rd and Market?
> Similarly, your lament about how you feel that "our men are not protecting us" is again, misleading – how can a Man protect YOU, Ms. Sanchez, if you don't have one in the first place? Again, per the article, you have a daughter – and it was implied that you are a Baby Mama – are you not? If this is indeed true, again I ask: why isn't YOUR Baby Daddy, protecting YOU? And why is it my or any other Philly Brotha's job, to protect YOU, or any other Baby Mama? Per the article, you are 40 years old – so it is difficult to see how your mating decisions were the result of "youthful indiscretion". Again: why should I or any other Brotha in Philly, step in when the father of your child, or failing that, your current mate, can and should?
> If you feel it is within your right to demand that other Men protect you, I feel it is within my right to demand that you answer these and other questions; if you feel that my questions are out of bounds, than I feel that yours is beyond the pale of legitimate discourse as well.

And here's the second excerpt:

> On the very day that the aforementioned column appeared on JFG, a very interesting story appeared on the New York Times website (H/T: Steve Sailer): "Growing Support & Tea From Young Women Embolden Kiev Street Fighters". It was a piece covering the-then "Defenders of Maidan" – the ragtag group of ordinary Ukrainian Men who, with the aid of improvised melee weapons, helmets and body armor, successfully fought against the riot police and forced the ouster of the utterly corrupt Pres. Viktor Yanukovych. What was interesting about the piece, however, was the fact that the Women of Kiev were out in force, supporting their Men as they made what would amount to for some, their Last Stand against Yanukovych's forces; young Ukrainian Women in their 20s, out there in the bitter cold (as much as 20 below!), serving hot tea and light refreshments to the "Defenders" and boosting their morale. Several of the ladies quoted in the piece had made it very clear how so very proud of their Men they were, and fully intended to marry a number of them as soon as possible.
> Now, the events in Ukraine over the past few months has risen to the top of the global news and political agenda, as the West, mainly in the form of the European Union and the United States, battles against Russia for the highly strategically significant Ukraine, a former client-state of the Soviet Union; as I type these words on Sun, Mar 16, a referendum is going down in its southern state of Crimea to determine if it will remain a part of Ukraine-proper, or if it will breakaway and become a part of Russia itself. It's a fast-moving story with many twists and turns; but for our purposes here at J4G, the aforementioned NYT coverage highlights the > arguments I presented in my Open Letter to Ms. Sanchez, namely the following:

> 1. That the ONLY Women talking that "strong, independent/I don't need no Man"/then turnaround and bemoan Men "not showing up for them" BS are American Black Women: notice how even Black Women in post-colonial, war-torn Africa, don't talk that nonsense, and for good reason – because they know firsthand, what the Women of Ukraine know – when the deal goes down and the you know what hits the fan, bunk what you heard, "Girls DON'T Rule The World" – Men do, and it will be Men who sort it all out, one way or another
> 2. That no Man worth the having is gonna put his life on the line for Women that not only aren't his own in some fashion (lover, wife, daughter, sister, mum, auntie, nana, etc. et al), and definitely ain't going there when a plurality of Women in a given locale have cavorted with Mr. Big and now "demands" bodyguard and human shield protection from Mr. Plan B (read: Tyrone)
> 3. That the Ukrainian Feminist outfit, "FEMEN" was NOWHERE TO BE SEEN OR FOUND when the bullets started flying – and this is true of White Women Feminists here in the States, too, as lady blogger Ms. Judgy Bitch has rightly pointed out recently, and as I noted in my previous column, "One Of The Good Guys: A Conversation About Why Tyrone's World Is Coming Apart". Let that be a powerful lesson to observe on the part of the Sistahood: White Women understand very well the profound difference between Rhetoric and Reality – which is why, for all the bunk they talk about "Patriarchy" and whatnot, at the end of the day, they got their Chad – and can and will defer to him when the Going gets Real. ONLY American Black Women, cling to the Rhetoric like the proverbial life preserver – and how's that been working out for them?
> Yea, that's what I thought.

The "campaign," predictably, went down in flames … and Sanchez hasn't been heard from since.

Ahem.

Why Are There No Feminist Chess Grandmasters?

In a previous post where I briefly discussed the "shooting war" between Feminista Jones and Tariq Nasheed, I made the observation that, based on said "war" and the overall "strategy" of her #YouOKSis campaign, no one would be accusing Jones of being the next Kasparov. For those who may not be familiar with whom I'm referring to, Gary Kasparov is among if not the most successful chess player the world has ever known, holding the title of Grandmaster. Chess is a game of strategy on multiple levels, requiring the ability to both "zoom in" on parts of the board and to "see" the whole board at the same time. On top of that, you have to be able to anticipate what your opponent is likely to do so as to be able to counter him with moves of your own, and all in the service of capturing, or "checking," his king. Chess is perhaps the oldest military strategy game … and is it really any wonder as to how or why precious few avowed feminists like Jones are adept at it?

Again, this is important because of the stated goals of the #YouOKSis campaign itself: to get more brothas involved in the active intervening of sistas supposedly being "harassed" out on the street. Jones—while definitely able to shake a social media rattle, create some buzz, and the like—doesn't seem able to actually engage those people on the ground who could actually help her achieve her ends; indeed, the fact that she's been beefing with Nasheed, a brotha of national stature and a demonstrated track record of achievement (and resultant respect) on the streets of Black America, proves her tactical ineptitude. As many of the nodding brothas said over at Very Smart Brothas earlier this summer when the same topic was broached, why are the sistas aiming their fire at them? After all, they're not the ones who are on the streets anyway. Why not take their "fight" to those brothas who are actually out there? Indeed, this was the point I raised to Jones, again in an email correspondence, and to which she again reacted violently. Which really got me to thinking: Exactly what is the point of this "campaign"? Because if indeed the point is to get brothas on the block policing each other, bougie brothas like VSB/Ebony's Damon "The Champ" Young or New York Daily News'/The Root's Jozen Cummings et al. ain't gonna get it—they don't live, or work, or socialize with the Pookies and Ray-Rays of the world. Indeed, they live, work, and love a world apart from them.

Brothas like Tariq Nasheed, and even Tommy Sotomayor for that matter, DO. They can be found busting it up with brothas on the corners of Black America all the time, with plenty of video footage to prove it. THEY are the brothas (along with yours truly, of course) that the Feminista Joneses of the world NEED on their side if they're serious about the "mission" they claim to have. But the very fact that, again, Jones has alienated the likes of Nasheed (and by extension Sotomayor, given that they hold similar views along these lines despite their own "beefs" of late) really calls into question what she actually hopes to achieve with her own little white feather campaign.

Perhaps Black feminists like Jones know deep down that engaging brothas like Nasheed, Sotomayor, and me would invariably lead to us asking a series of pointed questions of our own, which could make life a bit uncomfortable for said sistahood. And perhaps that explains how and why they assiduously avoid us like the proverbial plague, playing to a group of ostensibly sympathetic brothas (and completely out-of-the-picture SWPLs—aka "White educated liberal bohemians," a second meaning arising from the acronym for Stuff White People Like) who, as I've noted above, don't have a dog in the fight and are more than willing to do the Oprah nod in the face of the sistahood's perpetual pleas of victimhood and being passed over for Ms. Ann's fainting spells. After all, to be bougie is to care, deeply, about appearances, dontcha know.

By this time next year, as we look back on the big stories of summer 2015, #YouOKSis will be a distant and, to be frank (as far as Jones is concerned), embarrassing memory. It remains to be seen where the larger "street harassment issue" will be a year from now and whether it will still have the legs to run another lap or two before finally petering out. But what is clear is this: Feminista Jones has squandered a real opportunity to get something real and meaningful done out on the streets of Black America. Maybe I'm expecting too much of her and her kind; maybe I'm a bit naive myself.

All I know is it's never a good look for a sista to embarrass herself.

So, what's really behind all the Sturm und Drang animating Black feminists? And why do I care so deeply about the so-called "street harassment" issue? Both excellent questions that I'll be tackling in my next column. Stay tuned.

Rolling Stone rolls over

Paul Elam · 11 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Rolling Stone magazine was birthed in 1967, named after an amalgam of bitter, dissident artistry from the likes of Bob Dylan, Muddy Waters, and, of course, The Rolling Stones.

Literally bursting from the emotional and intellectual heart of Haight-Ashbury, the magazine carved its way into the American consciousness with an inside track to the new, revolutionary music scene and began hefting cultural influence with scathing political commentary from Hunter S. Thompson.

It quickly became the iconoclastic temple of a generation at once "dropping out" yet determined to rebuild something better. I remember days when the latest edition and a cigar box full of Mexican weed were coffee table essentials.

As the hippie generation heaved its last breaths and gave way to gaudy clothing, horrible music, and a more superficial ethos, RS wandered into a transparently commercialized focus on pop television and other things "of interest" to young people.

Eventually, more intensely political material returned to its pages, but the acerbic cutting edge was gone, replaced by a mindless rubber stamp for mainstream establishment politics as defined by the American left.

That is not an indictment of the left, but just another epitaph that looms over the grave of objective journalism. The point here is that Rolling Stone sold its soul a long time before it started peddling fraudulent gang-rape clickbait and shielding the hacks who wrote it.

I won't bother with detailing all the events in this, the latest confirmation of the mistrust of the mainstream media. The story itself has already tested its bandwidth worthiness on a thousand venues. A simple Google query should keep you busy for a month or so.

Besides, there is a larger and more important truth here that takes precedence over Rolling Stone sinking its credibility with the rest of the mainstream.

The fires of the Scottsboro Boys still burn brightly, like torches in a mob, and have been blazing across the pages of modern rape journalism, which was destined to include RS. Names like Duke lacrosse, Hofstra, Dominique Strauss-Kahn, and now Bill Cosby have been mere brushstrokes on an ever-expanding canvas of journalistic turpitude.

Frequently, their angle is no less racist than the Hollaback! video. And, unsurprisingly, they have begun to feed on their own.

Paul Farhi dared to do a postmortem on the Rolling Stone debacle. It is published now in The Washington Post. That's the same WashPo in which Monica Hesse was allowed to do a disingenuous, jaundiced, and sneering hit piece on the International Conference on Men's Issues without raising a single editor's eyebrow.

Rape journalism has not risen from the slime pits of Daily Kos and Jezebel to infect the mainstream. The mainstream has simply slithered in and taken up residence next to them at the bottom.

Short term, that means a lot more rape journalism, a lot more blurring between the truth and fantasy, and a lot less work for editors as verification and research become expensive hindrances to selling stories.

Long term, however, this is an essential evil. Even as the mainstream media busies itself ignoring the smell of toast, cornering itself as a purveyor of a social narrative that is increasingly rejected by its readers, we are witnessing the emergence of the inevitable reaction.

Anti-rape hysteria, rape culture debunking, anti-feminism, and, God forbid, men's rights proponents are on the rise.

Just a year ago, Canada's National Post and the rare article in The Wall Street Journal were among the few places that gave respite to the quite literally insane rape journalist narrative. Things have changed considerably.

The Blaze, Breitbart, Thought Catalog, and other high-profile websites are fresh and astute enough to smell the blood in the water (that AVfM so generously helped provide). They are also savvy enough about reader appetites to go for it. They also go way past the myopic, Rush Limbaugh–version of anti-feminism, which is furthered by stupid men on white horses. That is not to endorse everything they post, but just to acknowledge that they stand as proof that the new market is emerging.

This has left some rape journalism outlets a bit discombobulated. For example, Huffington Post was so excited by Dean Esmay's writing that they instantly invited him to have his own blog. When feminists noticed this, it apparently sent them scurrying for the crash cart. His article was quickly removed (like it was a tumor), and he was abruptly instructed that future submissions from him were unwelcome. While they were at it, they erased the existence of egalitarian contributor Chris Good, who was critical of feminism. It is pretty much a certainty that they scrubbed HuffPo completely for any other signs of ideological impurity.

And that is the good news. As mainstream entities like Rolling Stone and HuffPo keep digging holes too fast to notice they are in them, brasher, more honest voices are finding their way into the hearts and minds of the general public.

Crashing the rape journalism party is gaining popularity, even among rape journalists. Who knows, maybe someday publishing the truth will turn a profit.

Until then, if I were anyone in the mainstream, I would not be throwing stones.

Christabel Pankhurst – The White Feather betrayal of history

Famous women's suffragist Christabel Pankhurst is frequently held up as a great humanist icon. Unfortunately, the tale of this woman and others who fought for the vote for women isn't quite as clean and saintly as many have been led to believe.

Hanna Rosin: A lesson in propaganda

Jim Muldoon · 12 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Slate magazine, that bastion of free speech (as long as you agree with them), gave us the lowdown on men's status in the family court in a link to one of their articles:

> Men's Rights Activists Say The Courts Are Against Them. They're Wrong

Of course, when I clicked on the link I got a modified headline:

> The perception that family law is unfair to fathers is not exactly true.

Interestingly, the title on the link says:

> men_s_rights_recognized_the_pro_father_evolution_of_divorce_and_paternity

Make any sense of that?

You're not supposed to. The intention is to twist, turn, and deceive in order to manipulate the emotions. There is no intention to inform the mind.

The author of the actual article, Hanna Rosin, is a deft hand herself at this type of propaganda. It is important to understand and expose this emotional manipulation, in order to counter it with some effectiveness. While her article addresses the U.S. family court system, this discussion is equally relevant in Australia, the U.K., Canada, and elsewhere.

That Rosin must rely on such dishonest methods to disguise the truth about the courts is one of the best indications of corruption I can think of.

She begins by discussing the recent court case of Jason Patric that has received quite some publicity.

> Last week the actor Jason Patric went to court to "fight 'til I'm dead," as he put it, to see his 4-year-old son.

So, here we have a man going through the courts to see if he can get access to his son. In the next sentence, Rosin shifts the ground in a number of key areas.

> Since then, Patric has become a hero to frustrated fathers everywhere who are alienated from their ex-wives and girlfriends.

Note here that Patric's case has been raised from the personal to the political. It is no longer a question of the man (Patric) getting to see the boy (his son). Patric is now a champion for fathers. But they are not just ordinary fathers. These are frustrated fathers (scary).

But also Patric's purpose has changed. His issue, because we now understand he represents the bitter fathers, is that he is alienated from his ex.

Does he want to get back with her or get back at her? That question is implied but left unanswered to raise the tension. Clearly, however, trying to see his son was just a cheap ruse.

It's also worth noting that this is the only time the child gets mentioned. Clearly, his best interests count for nought. By ignoring this supposedly fundamental guiding light in modern family law, Rosin implicitly acknowledges that the “best interests of the child” has never been anything more than a smoke screen for feminist lobbyists.

> Patric is part of a movement of vigilante fathers who challenge the assumption that mothers should have any more rights than they do.

In one paragraph, Patric has moved from individual man trying to see his son, through a kind of accidental hero phase, to being a signed-up, card-carrying member of a movement. This allows the implication that he was a member of this group before he started his legal action. Therefore, his asking to see his son becomes even more deceitful. Instead, his allegiance is to this movement and its aims to dominate women.

But also notice that the nature of the group has also changed. No longer merely “frustrated,” they have now taken to venting that frustration by taking the law into their own hands (even more scary). And the purpose of these outlaw types has also changed. Even getting back at their ex is only one wicked piece in their evil master plan.

Without saying what more rights feminists are demanding, Rosin tells us that these villains don’t want women to have them. The implication is that any single right for women is one too many.

But the real problem with all of this, it seems, is that the “broader public” also believe that men are getting a raw deal. Who are this “broader public”? It is that uneducated, unthinking, common-as-muck crowd that are not feminists but sadly are allowed to vote.

In case we are not sure who it is the “broader public” (misguided as they are) are siding with, a direct reference is made to Michael Kimmel’s book Angry White Men.

And the focus of the growing, aggressive, and threatening mob?

> It used to be that women had to worry about men disappearing after they got pregnant or divorced. Now, some women have the opposite problem.

Forget Patric and his frustrated band of men (we’ve already forgotten Patric’s son). Women are the real victims here. It was bad then. It’s bad now. Only the complaint has changed.

Note here the rewriting of history. Gone is the time when the father would keep the children. During most of the 1800s, for example, this would have been the norm. Also banished from history are those pregnancies where half the males in the village would be candidates for fatherhood.

Similarly, gone are the women who left babies to die in the forest or on someone else’s doorstep, with the father unconsulted and perhaps even unaware of the pregnancy.

Erased from more recent memory are women who lied about being on the pill so they could trap a man. Into the void, too, go the men who did not want the woman to have an abortion.

Rosin then goes on to sow the seeds of doubt about the raw deal for men so that we may save those victims of the patriarchy.

> But is this actually true? “There’s a real perception—even women share it—that courts are unfair to fathers,” says Ira Ellman, a custody expert at Arizona State University.

You say, “The sky is blue.” I ask, “But is this actually true?” See how sophisticated I sound? We could then spend the rest of our lives wondering if my blue is the same as your blue. And if it was not, what could that mean for green?

But if there were a large group of fathers who did get fantastic treatment by the courts, Rosin would not be teasing out the issue in this way. She would instead jump straight to the facts and statistics that would prove her point.

There are no details from the expert as to why this “perception” is incorrect. Is the expert a feminist? Yes. Surprised? Not me.

> But in fact the great revolution in family court over the past 40 years or so has been the movement away from the presumption that mothers should be the main, or even sole, caretakers for their children.

Ah, yes. You would do well to brush up on your Orwell here. This is the part where O’Brien asks Smith how many fingers he is holding up.

We are to ignore that Rosin has just told us of the angry vigilantes and how they are taking away women’s rights. We are to ignore that Rosin told us that women are the ones who really suffer.

Now we are to believe that the “revolution” was not just a revolution but a great one. And the presumption that mothers should keep their children has gone. It is now, by implication, fair.

Propaganda is not effective if it is not mesmerising. Rosin takes us to the next level with this little reality shuffle:

> Individual cases like Patric’s may raise novel legal issues, but on the whole, courts are fair to men, particularly men who can afford a decent lawyer.

See? Patric has transformed from vigilante poster boy to a side-show. The great revolution, undocumented until now, has gone against women and … courts are therefore fair to men. No warning, no lead-up, no evidence. Just emotional manipulation and then, when everyone is in a panic, just slide in a statement pretending it is as obvious as the sky is blue.

And even more, there are those men who get fairer than fair, by forking out for a “decent” lawyer. Note the implication here that some men might be getting a poor result because they are not paying enough. It’s their own fault, the cheapskates.

Now, Rosin delves into some statistics. After all, someone who shows you where their facts come from has to be genuine, don’t they?

Not Rosin, I’m afraid. Again, her dishonesty has the sophisticated subtlety of the true propagandist. First she tells us of how, in the 1980s, men’s rights activists (MRAs) had a point. Not a big enough point to go into details, but a point nonetheless.

Then she brings us up to date, showing why these vigilantes have got it all wrong:

> According to one of the most thorough surveys of child custody outcomes, which looked at Wisconsin between 1996 and 2007, the percentage of divorce cases in which the mother got sole custody dropped from 60.4 to 45.7 percent while the percentage of equal shared custody cases, in just that decade, doubled from 15.8 to 30.5.

Now, technically, her figures are correct. However, if you understand how they report child custody cases in Wisconsin (and who doesn’t?), you would know that these figures are less than half of the story. She is counting on most people’s eyes to glaze over at the mention of statistics. Only a very few would take the trouble to follow the link and check out the figures.

The key word here is divorced. The Wisconsin study has three categories of custody cases. These are divorced, adjudicated paternity, and voluntary acknowledged paternity. It is from the first category that Rosin got her figures. The divorced category makes up 43.6% of the total.

So, when we add all three categories together, that “dropped to 45.7%” was actually 67.9% of mothers getting sole custody. For equal custody, that “doubled” figure of 30.5% turns out to be 17.5% when we include the other two categories.

And the figure she couldn't bring herself to tell you? Fathers got sole custody in a massive 4.5% of all custody decisions.

But, in terms of "balance" and "fair," weren't we talking about the court favouring mothers over fathers? The above figures concern sole custody. So, let us now consider all of the figures for that last year, 2007, that Rosin claims herald a new beginning for fair treatment for fathers.

Overall, the mother was awarded sole or major custody in more than 75% of the cases. Less than one-fifth, 18%, of the cases had an equal arrangement.

It is Rosin's assessment that men should be satisfied with their fair treatment now that they have almost 7% of all custody cases awarded in their favour.

A major factor in men getting what Rosin insists in calling a fair deal is because:

> … more recently judges have been catching up to the law.

We've had vigilantes, second-grade lawyers, cheap men, and poor men. Now it's the judges who've been asleep at the wheel. How many fingers is she holding up?

Personally, I think it's just one middle finger.

So now, Rosin turns the question around again.

> The real inequality in family courts these days is not based on gender, but on income.

A few paragraphs ago, men were getting a fair deal, with high-income men getting a better than fair deal, so who is getting this "real inequality"?

> Wealthy men have successfully fought against proposed reforms that would have forced them to pay more child support. With elite, college educated men, "it's outrageous how little they can end up paying in child support in some cases," says Ellman, the Arizona State professor.

How outrageous is this "little" these men of undisclosed wealth pay? So outrageous that it seems that neither Ellman nor Rosin could bring themselves to say. But we can guess that if it was a really small figure, say a few dollars per day, then Rosin would have started the article with this fact.

And again, how many cases are "some" cases? Perhaps we, the "broader public," don't need to know.

But this mention of child support is an error on Rosin's part, for she just mentioned the elephant in the room. Up until now, it's been pole-dancing on the coffee table and Rosin has been studiously ignoring it. More on this in a moment.

Her last paragraph is propaganda sublime.

> A father who never married the mother of his child has a much shakier legal status.

You might remember—the bigger half of the statistics in Wisconsin. The unmarried half that lose so badly that it dramatically drives the statistics up for mothers and down for fathers. Of course, Rosin phrases it in such a way that it sounds like the moron had his chance and blew it, so he probably deserves his shakier legal status.

His case is apparently so shaky that:

> As Cahn and Carbone have written, in this social class the women are generally better off and choose not to marry the fathers, precisely because they want to avoid future legal disputes over children.

She can't resist, can she? Having defined it as a class problem rather as a gender problem, she gloats how the law gives these women a real edge. They choose to keep the father out, and the law obliges them. In 89% of the unmarried cases in Wisconsin, the father was kept out of the child's life.

But note here, the issue of class is not in the statistics. As before, the class issue is inserted by Rosin as though it is cast in stone. She has still not provided a shred of evidence to back up her claim. Instead she follows the golden rule of propaganda—tell a lie often enough and it will become the truth.

> If that father is Jason Patric or Bode Miller, he can probably afford a lawyer and get sympathetic publicity.

Note that she doesn't mention sole custody, major custody, or equal time with all that money. That's because if the two men were backed by the International Monetary Fund they still would have little chance of a real win. What they might get is to join that exclusive 11% of unmarried fathers who get some access to their child.

> But if he's not, the best a poor father can hope for if he wants to impact his child is to be a steady paycheck.

Note that the majority of men, that is the poor men, have been reduced to one single guy. And, after all the talk of the courts being fair, suddenly they are not fair on him. But that's because he is poor, and not because he is a man, so that doesn't count as a gender problem. Even if he has to be poor and a man in order to qualify for the unfair treatment.

Also, there's the elephant again. Note how the unmarried status of the father, for Rosin as well as the law, is an almost automatic disqualifier for access to his children. It is not, however, a disqualifier for demands, enforced by the state, for child support. Clearly, Rosin supports this distinction.

But, of course, this isn't quite the whole elephant. Rosin says "impact his child," but the money doesn't go into the child's bank account, does it?

And yet here, at the end of the article, is probably the heart of the Men's Human Rights Activists complaints. You remember, the guys in the headlines who were wrong, well, not quite correct, well actually the law is kind of, sort of, heading in their direction. Those guys.

They can't participate in their children's lives, but they're paying, sometimes through the nose, so that the mother can choose the lifestyle of a single mother.

It's also worth noting that throughout Rosin fails to list one reason why men, as a class, should not have access to their children. She treats it as though it were as obvious or as natural as the sky being blue. The only implied justification she offers is that because of women's general ill-treatment at the hands of patriarchy, past and present, then perhaps it is time that women got some compensation. The needs of the fathers or of the children are of little significance. Feminist dogma must prevail.

Rosin's aim is to bamboozle, not inform. While most people will probably instinctively know that she is playing games, it takes some time and effort to analyse this game in detail. Rosin is counting on most people to put it in the "too hard" basket.

For those who do dare to question, the accusation of being part of an angry and misogynistic vigilante mob is already in place. Further, she expects the feminist cheer squad to applaud loudly at the appropriate points to further drown out the doubters.

Hanna Rosin writes for the faithful, and the rest of us can go to hell.

Laws targeting bachelors in colonial America

Dr. John G. McCurdy · 12 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Today, men are increasingly rejecting marriage and traditional civic expectations in preference for living as bachelors, men going their own way, sōshoku danshi, or whatever names we use for men who shun traditional expectations. While most of these men boast of freedoms they enjoy in comparison to others, it's important to remember that history has not always been kind to them. In this article, Dr. John G. McCurdy gives examples below of anti-bachelor laws from American history.—PW

In 1756, the province of Maryland began collecting a bachelor tax. The immediate cause for the levy was the recent entry of Great Britain and her American colonies into a worldwide conflict known as the Seven Years' War or, in the colonies, the French and Indian War. Desperate for new sources of revenue, the Maryland House of Delegates taxed nearly everything in the colony: land, slaves, alcohol, billiards tables, and bachelors. Specifically, the province targeted wealthy single men, requiring that bachelors "of the Age of Twenty-five Years or upwards, and have in Possession, in their own Right, an Estate of One Hundred Pounds Current Money and Upwards" to pay five shillings a year and those who had three hundred pounds or more to pay twenty. For eight years, Maryland collected this impost on unmarried men, which brought in between £300 and £500 per year, or between seven and thirteen percent of the province's total revenue. Hundreds of bachelors paid the bachelor tax each year including the attorney general, the mayor of Annapolis, and several Maryland legislators. Although Governor Horatio Sharpe was himself a lifelong bachelor, he refused to pay the tax, believing that as a representative of the crown, local laws did not apply to him.

The Maryland bachelor tax of 1756 was not the only instance of laws that applied explicitly to the unmarried in colonial America. Since the arrival of the first English colonists in the early seventeenth century, colonial lawmakers had repeatedly passed statutes that singled out singles for unique treatment. These laws had their origin in English jurisprudence, although they evolved in response to the conditions of colonial life. In the 1630s, Massachusetts passed a law that required "that all townes shall take care to order & dispose of all single p[er]sons & inmates wth their towne to servise, or otherwise." This law prevented the unmarried from living on their own and soon spread to Connecticut and Rhode Island where it continued in effect until the late seventeenth century. Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New Hampshire also adopted laws that encouraged judges to pressure single fornicators to marry their partners and that allowed towns to sell into servitude bachelors who could not afford to buy guns and thus serve in the militia.

These earliest laws were quite different from the Maryland bachelor tax that came more than a century later. First, they did not only apply to men. The law prohibiting the unmarried from living alone applied as fully to single women as it did to single men. Second, the laws did not apply to wealthy singles, but the youngest and the poorest. In the wilderness of early New England, a great deal of pressure was placed on the family as a unit of government as it was believed that everyone needed to be under the authority of a paterfamilias. Until young men became fathers and masters themselves, the law ensured that they would remain dependents on another man. Third, these laws did not go unchallenged. The Massachusetts legislature repeatedly reminded the towns that it was their responsibility to police their single men, although the towns often ignored these instructions and granted permission to bachelors to live alone—or with other bachelors. Unmarried fathers likewise thumbed their noses at the colony's fornication law, opting to pay fines or face corporal punishment rather than marry the mothers of their children. By 1668, Massachusetts lawmakers acknowledged the failure of the fornication law and moved to require the colony's bachelor fathers to simply pay child support.

As English settlers erected more colonies, the singles laws spread up and down the Atlantic seaboard. By the time of the American Revolution, laws explicitly applying to the unmarried had spread to eleven of the thirteen colonies that later became the United States. As the laws spread, their application changed. New York, Maryland, and Massachusetts approved statutes in the early eighteenth century that provided lighter sentences for married debtors than for single ones. At the same time, Pennsylvania implemented a host of sex crime laws that connected penalties to one's marital status. A single man convicted of rape could be deprived of his entire estate, while a married man would only lose a third. Harsher sentences also faced Pennsylvania bachelors convicted on adultery, bigamy, and fornication. However, in the case of sodomy and bestiality, single men in Pennsylvania actually made out better than their married counterparts. Although all men faced imprisonment and floggings for their first offense, if a man was convicted of sodomy or bestiality more than once, the law insisted that as "a married man, he shall also suffer castration." As this law suggests, colonial lawmakers apparently did not draft the bachelor laws because they feared that unmarried men were more likely to be homosexuals.

As the bachelor laws changed over time, they increasingly applied only to men. In part, this was because men in the eighteenth century were beginning to assert themselves as independent even if they were unmarried or owned no property. Indeed, bachelors refuted the earliest singles laws by insisting on their right to live as they pleased and to have sex outside of marriage, liberties that colonial authorities were increasingly willing to grant them. Single women, however, did not win the same type of freedom and remained effectively dependent in the eyes of the law.

As more single men asserted their independence, a new type of law emerged: the bachelor tax. Indeed, once single men demonstrated that they could support themselves, the government reasoned that they could also pay their own taxes. After 1660, Parliament had introduced a series of taxes on unmarried Britons as well as tax breaks for married men with four or more children. In America, New York collected a short-lived bachelor tax in 1703 to help fund the colony's defense, although it was Pennsylvania that implemented the most long-lasting bachelor tax. In 1693, Pennsylvania lawmakers exempted men from pay taxes if they had "a great charge of children." Three years later, the assembly added a provision requiring that all men over the age of sixteen who "have not families or charge to maintain, and are not under their parents tuition," to pay six shillings per year. In 1711, this was simplified to "single freemen." Authorities collected this tax for the rest of the eighteenth century and the language was not entirely expunged from Pennsylvania's laws until 1919.

The target of the Pennsylvania bachelor tax was not all single men, but rather those who did not own real estate. Such men were typically young and often lived and worked with a family who paid them wages. Recent work on labor in the colonies suggests that Pennsylvania single freemen were among the highest paid workers in colonial America and thus we might understand why provincial legislators were so eager to tax them. Nevertheless, the tax burden on Pennsylvania's bachelors was quite steep. Although the tax began at six shillings, it fluctuated depending on the financial needs of local officials. During times of war, this tax was augmented by special levies that could easily double a bachelor's tax bill. Tax records reveals that Pennsylvania's bachelors often faced a higher tax burden than property owners who paid land taxes. In Chester County, local taxes on single freemen were higher than property taxes on eighty to ninety percent of landowners, while in Bedford and Lancaster counties, bachelors paid more in local taxes than approximately seventy-five percent of men with real estates.

It is difficult to discern how much social engineering was at work in the Pennsylvania bachelor tax or the ones that followed in Delaware, Maryland, New Jersey, and North Carolina. The progression of the Pennsylvania legislation—beginning as a tax break for men with children—suggests that lawmakers wanted to promote marriage and family. Similarly, the Maryland bachelor tax of 1756 included explicitly anti-bachelor language. The Maryland law announced its intent to promote "holy Estate of Matrimony" as well as "the more orderly Propagation of Mankind," such that "the continuing in a State of Celibacy discountenanced, especially in every Infant Country" had to be discouraged. Despite this language, however, the actual bite of the tax probably drove few men to the altar. The amount that a bachelor worth a hundred pounds faced—five shillings—was the same amount as the land tax on five hundred acres, while the twenty shillings demanded of bachelors worth more than three hundred pounds was only a third of the assessment on billiards tables. Moreover, Maryland proved reluctant to renew the bachelor tax once the Seven Years' War ended. Although the assembly considered extending the levy in order to fund a public college, it ultimately rejected the idea.

Moreover, we might consider the discussions of the bachelor tax in the British and colonial press. Many English writers—including novelist Daniel Defoe, political theorist James Harrington, and economist Charles Davenant—promoted the idea of a bachelor tax to reign in single men's immorality and to bolster the population of the kingdom. These and other authors drew attention to the practice of taxing bachelors in ancient Rome in the time of Augustus Caesar. Such ideas were transmitted to the colonies where they were reprinted in American newspapers. At the same time, however, other authors poked fun at the premise of the bachelor tax. An English pamphlet from 1695 titled The Levellers contained the fictional dialogue of two women so desperate to find husbands that they demanded Parliament tax bachelors at ever higher rates until they would marry them. The pamphlet was not serious but included the proposal that bachelors should be consigned to an almshouse "wherein every one of them shall be chained about the Middle to a Post, like a Monkey." As a humorous commentary on an actual debate, works like The Levellers discredited the bachelor tax as harmful government meddling in the personal lives of individuals. This type of humor also made its way across the Atlantic and informed some of the early satirical writings of Benjamin Franklin. Although Franklin had an overwhelmingly negative view of bachelors, he always stopped short of promoting a tax to punish them. Indeed, in Observations Concerning the Increase of Mankind from 1751, Franklin announced that bachelors were not really a problem in America. Because of the plentiful land, men in the colonies could marry earlier and father considerably more children than Britons, preventing the need for punitive taxation.

The bachelor laws reached the apex of their popularity during the American Revolution. As cash-strapped states struggled to pay for soldiers and weapons to win their independence, they placed ever higher taxes on unmarried men. They also adopted conscription laws that drafted single men into the army while exempting married ones from service. However, unlike what had been the case during the colonial period, bachelors received something in exchange for their taxes. In 1776, revolutionaries in Pennsylvania wrote the state's first constitution, a radical document that promised equality to all citizens. It also broadly expanded the franchise, extending the right to vote to "Every freeman of the full age of twenty-one years" who had "paid public taxes." With this, all the propertyless bachelors who had been paying taxes were suddenly enfranchished. To be sure, bachelors were not the only men given the full rights of citizenship by the Pennsylvania Constitution of 1776, although tax records suggest that forty percent of the new voters in Chester County and twenty-five percent in Lancaster County were propertyless unmarried men. Similar taxpayer suffrage provisions enfranchised taxed bachelors in Revolutionary North Carolina.

By the time of the Treaty of Paris of 1783, whereby Great Britain formally recognized the independence of the United States, the bachelor laws were well on their way to becoming a vestige of the colonial past. Through their service to the Continental Army, bachelors had gained greater respect among Americans, while others were able to capitalize on the Declaration of Independence's promise that "all men were created equal." Women and African Americans were barred from full citizenship in the new republic, but lawmakers made quick work of the statutes that delineated different rights and obligations for white men based on property, religion, and marital status. The bachelor laws were slowly expunged from the laws of the new states, although their spirit has never entirely disappeared from the nation's statutes. Indeed, the debate over the so-called "marriage penalty tax" in the late 1990s and efforts on the part of federal and state lawmakers to provide "marriage incentives" to unwed parents suggest the persistence of the colonial bachelor laws even today.

Correcting history: “Petticoat Government” (1896)

Peter Wright · 13 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The following are excerpts from Max O’Rell’s 1896 article Petticoat Government. They describe women’s domination in home and society in the United States of America in the 19th Century. Written nearly 120 years ago, this is yet another article showing women’s powerful influence over both culture and government legislation via political activism in which they were supposedly rights-free chattel/slaves with no rights.—PW

Women’s Political Influence

The women of good society in America are what they are everywhere else, satisfied with their lot which consists in being the adored goddesses of refined households; but there exists in this country, among the middle (or in European parlance, lower-middle) classes restless, bumptious, ever poking-their-noses-everywhere women who are slowly, but surely and safely, transforming this great land of liberty into a land of petty, fussy tyranny, and trying, often with complete success, to impose on the community fads of every shape and form.

If there is one country in the world where the women appear, in the eyes of the foreign visitor, to enjoy all manner of privileges and to have the men in leading strings, that country is America. You would imagine, therefore, that America should be the last country where the “new woman” was to be found airing her grievances. Yet she is flourishing throughout the length and breadth of this huge continent. She is petted by her husband, the most devoted and hard-working of husbands in the world; she is literally covered with precious stones by him. She is allowed to wear hats that would “fetch” Paris in Carnival time, or start a panic at a Corpus-Christi procession in Paris or a Lord-Mayor’s Show in London. She is the superior of her husband in education, and almost in every respect. She is surrounded by the most numerous and delicate attentions. Yet she is not satisfied.

The Anglo-Saxon “new woman” is the most ridiculous production of modern times and destined to be the most ghastly failure of the century. She is par excellence the woman with a grievance, and self-labelled the greatest nuisance of modern society. The new woman wants to retain all the privileges of her sex and secure, besides, all those of man. She wants to be a man and to remain a woman. She will fail to become a man, but she may succeed in ceasing to be a woman.

Teetotaler Politics

I think that of all the grand fads indulged in by some women in America the palm should be given to the compulsory water-drinking work. That is a colossal illustration of what women can do when left entirely to their own resources.

Now, I will lay down as a sort of principle that the “temperance” woman and the teetotaler are not to be found in refined society, and I don’t think that in saying so, I shall run the risk of being contradicted. I have often been a guest at the Union Club, the Union League Club, the Manhattan, the Century, the Players, and many other good clubs, I have dined in the best houses of the great American cities, and nowhere have I met teetotalers in those circles of society. Refined, intelligent people of good society, artists, literary men are not teetotalers; that will be granted by everybody. I don’t mention politicians, even of the best class, who have at times to be teetotalers to catch votes in a democracy.

The smaller towns of America—and that is America proper—are ruled by fussy, interfering faddists, fanatics of all sorts, old women of both sexes, shrieking cockatoos that will by-and-by make life well-nigh intolerable to any man of self-respect and make him wonder whether he lives in a free country or not.

The Mayor's Wife

Take two lively illustrations. A few months ago I was in the town of E. (Kansas). There was a mayor who was married, and the happy pair had a little boy. That little boy was a wicked little boy. One day he was caught smoking a cigarette. Now what should be done by sensible parents to such a wicked little boy? Why, he should be turned over and given a good hearty—you know! This is not at all what was done. The mayor's wife called up a meeting of women, made a violent speech on the pernicious habit of cigarette smoking, and it was decided to petition the mayor and ask him to forbid the sale of cigarettes within the precincts of his jurisdiction. For the sake of peace and happiness at home, the worthy mayor published an edict prohibiting the sale of cigarettes in his district. However, cigarettes can be had in the town of E., but you have to walk nearly a mile, just outside the limits of the mayor's jurisdiction, to find a store where a roaring trade in cigarettes is done. All the same, you must admit that it is a nuisance to be obliged to walk a mile, in a free country, to buy a little article of luxury that you indulge in, without ever abusing it, because there happens to be in the town a wicked little boy that once smoked a cigarette.

Women's Temperance Society Activism

When I was in the town of T. (Arkansas), only a few weeks ago, I gave a lecture under the auspices of "temperance" ladies of the city. They called on me.

Being of a rather inquisitive turn of mind, I said to them: "Now, ladies, I understand I am in a prohibition State. How do you account for your existence? Do you wish now to advocate the suppression of tea, coffee and icewater, which, I must say, would go a long way toward improving the complexion and the digestive apparatus of your fellow-creatures?"

"No," they said; "we find that, in spite of the law, there is liquor, wine and beer still sold in this town, and we want to put a stop to it."

I knew that such was the case, for I had, proh pudor! a bottle of lager beer in my pocket which I had bought for my dinner, but which, I am glad to say, was not discovered by the ladies under the auspices of whom I was to lecture in the evening. I can do with ice-water, but in a prohibition State I cannot. The evil spirit prompts me. I must have beer or wine with my meals. I have never been drunk in my life; but if I ever get drunk, it will be in a prohibition State.

"Well," said the lady president of the temperance society of the town of T., "could you believe that, a few days ago, a poor woman of the town and her children actually died of starvation, while every day her husband got drunk with the wages he received?"

"But," I mildly suggested, "you should see that that man was punished, not the innocent population of this town. Don't suppress the wine, which is a gift of God: punish—suppress, even, if you like—the drunkard. It is not wine that makes a man drunk, it is vice. Don't suppress the wine, suppress the vice, or the vicious. Imprison a drunkard, lynch him, hang, shoot him, quarter him, do what you like with him, but allow hundreds of good, wise, temperate people, who would use wine in moderation, to indulge in a habit that makes men moderate, cheerful and happy."

My argument was lost on them.

Every year there are men who use knives to stab fellow-creatures; but there are millions who use their knives to eat their meals peacefully with. The law punishes the criminals, but would not think of suppressing the knives.

Any law is bad that punishes, injures, or annoys thousands of good, innocent people in order to stop the mischief done by a few—a very few, after all—blackguards and scoundrels.

These Christian ladies left me certainly unconverted, and took their revenge by not paying me my fee after the lecture, which confirmed me in my firm resolution never to have anything to do with angels—this side of the grave.

The Anglo-Saxon should by all means preach temperance, which means moderation, not total abstinence. What they preach overreaches the mark and does no good. When you say that a country enjoys a temperate climate, that does not mean that it has no climate at all, but enjoys a moderate one, neither too hot nor too cold.

These same Anglo-Saxons should not despise, but admire and envy, those who can enjoy, like men of understanding, like gentlemen, the glorious gifts of God to man without ever making fools of themselves. For these, the law should be made.

If your husband or son, dear lady, would like to have a glass of wine or beer with his dinner, let him have it in your sweet and wholesome presence. Don't make a hypocrite of him. Don't compel him to go and hide himself in his club or, worse, in a saloon, or, worse still, don't allow him to go and lose his manhood's dignity by crawling on all fours under the counter of a drug-store.

There is no virtue in compulsion. There is virtue only in liberty.

Ah! how I remember admiring, in the hot days of blue-ribbonism in England, that free Briton I once met who had a yellow ribbon in his button hole.

"What's that you have on?" I said to him.
"That's a yellow ribbon," he replied. "I belong to the yellow ribbon army."
"Ah, and what is it the yellow-ribbon army do?" I inquired.
"What do we do?" he said, "Why, we eat what we likes, we drink what we likes and we don't care a — for nobody."

There are well-meaning, most highly estimable and talented ladies who go about the world preaching temperance, that is to say, total abstinence, not moderation.

Now, as a rule, these ladies have special reasons for so doing. Very often they have led a life of sorrow and misery with wretched husbands, and they should be pitied. But hundreds of thousands of women have good husbands who have not to be cured of habits which they never in their lives indulged in, and who would be condemned to deny themselves every little luxury that helps make life cheerful when used with moderation and discretion, if the preachings of these often unfortunate ladies were to take the shape of laws.

I have often had to listen to self-confessed, reformed drunkards who preached to me who never was once drunk in my life. The thing is ludicrous.

There exist, among the Anglo-Saxons, people to whom the strains of Wagner and Beethoven's music say absolutely nothing, to whom the Venus of Milo is indecent. They declare music and the fine arts immoral, and if they had their way, they would close the concert halls and the museums on every day of the week. Because their minds are distorted, foul and even dirty, they would condemn people with lofty and artistic minds to never hear a masterpiece of music or behold a masterpiece of painting or statuary. I have met people who declared they would never again set foot inside the walls of the Louvre and of the British Museum. And if the Anglo-Saxon fanatics, those arch enemies of art, make a little more progress, the future of that great Institution, the British Institution, is not safe.

As everybody knows, there exist, in Great Britain and in America, thousands of people who declare the stage to be a most wicked and immoral institution. I have on the subject a rather pleasant reminiscence which illustrates how the Anglo-Saxons can combine the spirit of morality with the spirit of business. I once gave a lecture, in a town of some twenty thousand inhabitants in the State of Kansas, under the auspices of a society of lady reformers. They had engaged the Opera House for the occasion. I arrived at the theatre a few minutes after eight. The ladies in charge were in the ticket-office pocketing money as fast as they could. To my great gratification there was an immense house, which was due, no doubt, far more to the popularity of the ladies' philanthropic cause than to my own modest personality. When the crowd was in and seated, I asked to be led to the stage, and I said to the lady president of the society: "I suppose you have your seats reserved." "No," she replied, "I have not. I don't think I will go in, if you will excuse me. I am proud to say that I have never once in my life set foot inside a theatre." I literally collapsed. There were in that theatre some twelve hundred people whom these good ladies had induced to "sin" to fill the coffers of their society.

All these movements, headed by women, are in the wrong direction. They interfere with the liberties of a great people, and punish thousands and thousands of good, orderly, well-behaved people, to reach a score or two of bad ones, whom they often fail to reach and of tener still fail to cure. I repeat it, there are many hundreds of good people in this world for a very few hundreds of bad ones. The laws should aim at reaching the former and protecting them. This world is considerably better than the fanatics of all denominations and superstitions would make us believe. For eleven years, I have travelled all over the world, and I have never met any but honorable people to deal with. For instance, I have given 1,272 lectures in my life, and only once did I come across a man who behaved dishonestly toward me. He ran away with the cash while I was speaking.

Yes, the world is good, very good, in spite of the calumnies that are constantly hurled at its face by the Pharisees of Anglo-Saxondom. Yes, full of good men, crammed with good women, and the excellent ladies of the Philanthropic societies of America should take it for granted that there are many, many good and virtuous people besides themselves.

You don't cut down an apple tree because there are two or three bad apples on it. You cut down the two or three bad apples, and all your efforts tend to see that the hundreds of good ones are made healthy, happy, and comfortable.

Eating MGTOW

Paul Elam · 13 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Author's note: I mention commercial products in this post. I am not being paid to do so.—PE

Obsidian, aka Mumia Ali, recently suggested that I start publishing recipes and other food-related information on this website. No, we are not turning into Betty Crocker on red pills, but he rightly pointed out that self-sufficiency and self-care were indeed cornerstones of Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW), and with many of us living the lean financial lifestyle, some advice on eating healthy, tasty—no, great—for less is actually a good idea.

Hey, we all gotta eat.

I am going to follow his suggestion with three particular ideas in mind for the offering. They will be generally geared for flavor, health, and budget. Fortunately for those who find benefit in this column, you will discover that healthy, good eating is frequently cheaper eating. In fact, the most expensive way to shop for groceries is to buy the crap processed food that lacks nutrition and causes not-so-pleasant things like hyperinsulinemia, metabolic disorder, heart disease, diabetes, and cancer.

I will do my best to keep differing eating lifestyles in mind, from low-carb to low(er)-fat and vegetarian (but not vegan). I am currently a reformed vegetarian on a low-carb diet. I have dropped nearly 30 pounds eating like royalty, but it is not my objective to steer you that way. There will be something for everyone, save perhaps those who live on refined, simple carbohydrates and their virtual equivalent, sugar. I want to help you feed yourself, not die.

At the risk of bragging, I am not understating the fact that I know my way around a kitchen pretty well. I have also picked up a great deal of nutritional information over the years. I won't be publishing anything here that I have not cooked repeatedly and successfully myself and found to be much more than just passable. Some of the items will be recipes I created.

I think most will enjoy them, but I would not be surprised if Walter Romans aka TDOM, an actual, real chef, shows up to point to my mistakes or offer improvements.

As I am usually prone to do, I will include some commentary with most of these posts. Next time about nutrition, which we have all been lied to about our entire lives. And about the food industry, which is in bed financially with most governments in such corrupt ways that it makes Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) profiteers viridescent with sheer envy.

I'll also try to keep it fun because that is what eating should be in the first place.

I will give this a shot for a few months, trying to post something weekly, and we will see what happens. Many who are not used to cooking may be surprised to find that it can be a psychologically therapeutic activity and creative outlet. Indeed, having decided to even write about it has boosted my morale by promising an escape from my routine.

We need to start with the only part that is relatively expensive: essential equipment. Or at least what I think is essential to eating MGTOW. The good news is that these are not items you have to replace all the time—if you take care of them. They will pay for themselves many times over.

So let us begin. The first essential is a decent set of knives. By decent I don't mean a set of Michel Bras that will set you back an insane three grand for 10 blades. I use Chicago Cutlery, an insult to higher-minded chefs, but from which I can get several years of use for less than $150. Keeping them clean, dry, and honed works just fine for me—the same treatment you need to give the pricey stuff.

When it comes to knives, knowing which knife to use for what job makes things much easier and faster. You don't want to cut carrots on a bias with a paring knife, for example. I will get more into that with the recipes.

Next, a cast-iron skillet is a big plus. These skillets are inexpensive, last longer than you will if you take care of them, and have some advantages for certain dishes that I'll highlight in the future. You just have to ensure that they are cured properly and never see soap. Lodge makes great cast-iron skillets at decent prices.

A Dutch oven is also one of my must-haves. Lodge provides quality on this one too. You can get an enamel-covered cast-iron version for around $70, and it makes braising meats to ridiculously tender perfection a cinch. You can also get the non-enameled cast-iron versions for a 20-spot less.

Also recommended is a slow cooker. They are no muss, no fuss, inexpensive, and don't require you to hover over them in the kitchen. They can turn out some amazing food if you know what you are doing.

You need a couple of skillets and saucepans. You don't need to fork out big bucks for the All-Clad. You can get pretty decent results with less expensive stuff. I suggest, though, that a $10 fry pan is a poor investment because you will have to replace it when it turns to crap, which it will in quick order. Calphelon has reasonable prices and an acceptable product with proper care.

Finally, get a food processor. They are not particularly expensive, and in many cases they will cut your prep time drastically.

I won't get into more of the lesser details. Of course, you will need things like spatulas, colanders, wooden spoons, and the like—mostly stuff you already have. But if you need to buy them, get the cheap stuff. Most of it will last a long time. I also suggest silicon cutting boards. They are cheap, easily replaceable, and dishwasher-safe.

Next week, I will start with two recipes, including the protein, carbohydrates, net carbohydrates, fat, dietary fiber, and sugar content; the number of calories; the serving size; and the cost on every serving. I might even get into this enough to make some simple videos on an alternate YouTube channel. By the time you are done, the idea of a personal sammich maker will be history (provided it already isn't).

I will also be passing on some tidbits and suggestions for food purchasing and storage.

Now, I am sure you noticed that I am sitting here writing a column on food and eating for men having not said a word about a grill. Don't worry, I will get there, but after some kitchen basics and food essentials are covered.

While you wait for the first recipes from me, please enjoy this from Jack Barnes on southern fried kitten. Eat well and live long, gents.

Dangerous rape myths: Part 1

Hannah Wallen · 13 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In the wake of the flurry of rape accusation–related news stories, feminists are up in arms again, spouting the same old casually hateful rhetoric against presuming the accused innocent until proven guilty. Most are advocating automatic belief of accusers, and as always there are feminist groups consistently attacking the recognition of due process rights in criminal and civil court when an accusation of sexual misconduct is at stake. Some groups are even complaining about the prosecution of false accusers. These groups are not bothered at all about the impact of a false accusation on a man's life, yet they are outraged that if it appears that a woman abused the system in a way that wreaks such havoc, she might as a consequence experience a shadow of it. Feminist advocacy pits the accuser's feelings against the accused's right to due process and the innocent's right to liberty.

Feminist writers and advocates are using the most flimsy, sexist excuses for this. Many of these have been discussed and countered. I've written about them before as well, but it's obvious from recent discussion that they'll need to be addressed over and over because knowing that they're unjustified does not stop feminists from continuing to spout dangerous rape myths. These rape myths must be examined and challenged.

Here in Part 1, I will examine three common and destructive rape myths: that doubt = misogyny; that the innocent have nothing to fear; and that false allegations are rare.

1. Not believing a woman's rape accusation is misogyny.
In portraying the perpetrator of a harmful act as a victim, this excuse disregards the impact on the accused man, the actual victim of her lie. It's his life that is affected, his reputation, and his future. It's his freedom that is threatened and his welfare, depending on how vigilante-prone his community happens to be. Insisting on the automatic, unquestioning belief of a woman's accusation against a man is misandry, as it depends on either a willingness to sacrifice innocent men or the belief that no man can ever truly be innocent.

However, there are also specific reasons why it's not misogynistic to question a woman's accusation. In fact, it's misogynistic to make female gender a reason for ignoring standard analysis and denying the impact of the accusation. Nothing is more demeaning to rape victims than saying the charge is so minor that accusing a man of it is not damaging to him. Of course it is damaging! It's a heinous crime, the nature of which incites social responses that feminists exploit for political and social power. They have spent far too much effort and money spreading panic over it to pretend not to understand the gravity of being accused. This excuse is feminists showing that the ability to exploit proxy female victim status is more important to them than supporting actual victims and seeking a just outcome.

To claim that the investigation and assessment of an accusation made by a woman is an attack on women, one must first consider women's accusations unique from and unequal to men's accusations—and therefore uniquely exempt from being expected to meet the standards for proof to which male accusers are subject. To exempt a woman's accusation from standards for proof, one must consider her exempt from criticism, exempt from accountability for her word, exempt from scrutiny for mistakes, as if women aren't capable of living up to those standards or expectations. It's another example of feminist denial of female agency and female strength. They need women to be helpless and stupid in order to support their agenda.

So let's assume for a moment that a woman's lie really has no impact. What are feminists telling rape victims, both male and female, when they make assertions based on that assumption? After all, if an accusation does no damage to the accused, how serious can the crime he's accused of be?

And exactly how is it empowering to women when a man is told, "It's only rape that you've been accused of … nothing serious. Why you gotta be so mad?" Isn't that the same thing as telling women, "You are so meaningless that when you attack someone the damage you do is irrelevant." But that's not nearly as demeaning to women as acknowledging the gravity and power of her rape accusation enough to want it proved before acting on it. God forbid she be expected to live up to that; that's a standard only men are capable of handling, right?

2. If a man is not guilty, he has nothing to fear.
The wrongness of this assertion is highlighted by cases of false conviction such as the Brian Banks story. Even if we ignore existing examples, there is still the ordeal the accused must go through: mandatory investigation, public defamation, and possibly being tried on the charge. During the ordeal, he faces discrimination and suspicion at the hands of his peers and possibly also harassment and violence. If he's underage, the chance of violence increases because social violence among youth is more tolerated than among adults, due to the expectation among adults that kids will sometimes fight and to the fact of reduced legal repercussions for fighting while underage.

We all know what gym class is like for a boy bullied because he is unpopular. Imagine what it would be like for an accused boy who is believed by the other kids to be guilty of raping a girl.

But let's not ignore the factors that lead to false conviction, as it is a very real, very serious risk. Under legislation like the Violence Against Women Act, policies enacted by police precincts, and procedures followed within the court system, a male accused of rape is considered guilty until proven innocent—a daunting and perilous standard. Conviction may occur in the absence of evidence. Even if he is acquitted, the allegation can stick to his reputation. An accused male who has been acquitted faces the likelihood that to some he will never again be just a guy; he'll always be seen—and treated—as a falsely acquitted rapist.

However, just for a moment, let's assume that assertion is true, that the falsely accused are never convicted. How does that justify subjecting anyone to the experience, putting him through the rigors of an investigation, damaging his reputation, and possibly forcing him to defend himself in court? Is it really believed within the feminist community that the hope of an acquittal negates all other aspects of the experience? Does feminism now consider no harm to be done even if only the worst harm is evaded? Does this mean that it's okay for men to fantasize about rape, joke about rape, and threaten women with rape as long as they don't actually do it? After all, if a woman is not actually getting raped, then she has nothing to fear, right?

3. False allegations are minor because their occurrence is rare.
This is contradicted by existing factors within the community. Victim advocacy on the topic of rape calls for the treatment of allegations as credible without doubt, including when there is not sufficient evidence to support them. Even the lack of a conviction is not viewed as a vindication of the accused but as an instance of the perpetrator getting away with the crime. The assertion of rarity, based on loyalty to the concept that female accusers must not be doubted, is circular reasoning—a logical fallacy in which the reasoner begins with what he or she is trying to end up with. (Because we are not allowed to doubt the credibility of alleged rape victims, it must be accepted that false allegations occur only in the rarest of circumstances, when evidence against the accusation is overwhelming.)

Broadening the definition of rape to include incidents in which the alleged victim was not averse to the interaction until after the fact has further muddied the water by creating a conflict between what feminists consider rape and what rape actually is (and is considered to be by the law). This manner of twisting the definition turns sex into a form of entrapment in which the woman may withdraw consent after the event. The fact that the man involved did not force the encounter by any means does not deter feminists from applying the label "rape." This leads to the filing of allegations that get tossed out or struck down because the accuser was never actually victimized. These cases, in turn, build an area of disagreement in which the term rape has been falsely applied to sexual encounters in a way supported by feminist ideology. That disparity in viewpoint is the key to a lot of feminist dismissal of the falsely accused.

Basing the assertion of rarity, in any part, on loyalty concepts like regret as evidence of rape, and guilt until innocence is proven, is an act of begging the question, or basing one's belief on a false premise that one has accepted to be true. (The allegation cannot be false because the woman feels raped or because the man must be perceived as a rapist.)

Still, just for a moment, let's accept that assertion as true. Let's say, for the sake of argument, that only 1 in 100 allegations actually turns out to be false. How does that make the act of falsely accusing any less wrong, any less serious, or any less harmful to the victim, the falsely accused? Does he suffer less because of the rarity of his plight? Does the “fact” that other accusers are honest reduce the damage done to this victim’s life? How about we apply this to rape. If we get the occurrence of rape down to 1 in 100 women, can we just let it go and not prosecute the perpetrator in that one case simply because the crime is rare? If it doesn’t happen often, then it doesn’t merit much attention, right?

How is this an accurate or honest way to measure the severity, seriousness, or wrongness of any crime? Applying the rarity-as-an-excuse standard, misdemeanors such as moving violations while driving (running a stop sign, speeding, improper lane change), which are committed with greater frequency than any assault, should be taken much more seriously, discussed at length, and subject to greater legal consequences than, say, anything as comparatively rare as rape. When played out to such an obvious extreme, the belief that rarity excuses the behavior is exposed as irrational.

Of course, these three rape myths aren’t the only ones common to the feminist bigotry of our times. In Part 2, I’ll examine three more myths: that it hurts real victims to question fakers; that false allegations are not harmful to the accused; and that even if they are harmful, they are not near as bad as actual rape.

Innocent until proven guilty

The politics of the penis

Peter Lloyd · 14 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

No man is ever born with a sense of insecurity about his penis – ever. It's something he's taught.

Fortunately, once you understand this, you can 'un-learn' the toxic myth that size is king and finally be at peace with your penis. Not only is this psychologically healthy, but it also sets you free from a lifetime of put-downs, painful operations and expensive scams which never, ever work.

Best of all, it also makes you bulletproof in the face of size slurs which are part of everyday life for all men, regardless of how big they actually are.

It hasn't always been this way. In ancient Europe, less was considered more – see Michelangelo's Renaissance masterpiece David if you need a visual aid. Today, however, it's a little different – and not just in art. Now, men are rated, denigrated and humiliated by their penises in every facet of life.

For most of us, this is a universal experience. One which every bloke, every boy, will have a memory of, neatly tucked away and rarely – if ever – referenced. But it sits there, smirking. I've seen it myself. In some of the most prolific media operations in the country, I've watched smart, clever colleagues in positions of power sell out to stiletto sexism with a hooked little finger at the most inappropriate time, even though any man would be fired if he claimed a female CEO was rude because of her roomy vulva.

Thankfully, the unspoken truth is that every penis is perfectly fine exactly as it is – including yours. It does not need enlarging, pumping, piercing, widening, trimming, straightening or stiffening. You wouldn't be loved more, better in bed or more popular if it were the size of a fire hose. You'd simply walk funny. Besides, cock-mocking isn't really about rating length or girth anyway but about the power that can be gained simply by doing it.

Thankfully, your masculinity, your dignity, your credibility is bigger than that. Chances are, so is your penis. And, even if you think it isn't, your best sexual organ is your brain. Read that all again.

In a world where belittling men's bodies is often confused with women's sexual literacy, this is all important to remember. Despite their life-creating brilliance, our dicks face regular ridicule in everything from song lyrics to government road safety campaigns. (No, really – thank Australia for that one. In 2007 Sydney's Road and Traffic Authority ran the 'Pinkie' ad 'Speeding: No One Thinks Big of You', which showed women equating reckless driving with smaller genitalia.)

Here in Britain, we have Lily Allen doing it for them. She spends hours slagging off MailOnline for 'judging' women's bodies and putting pressure on the sisterhood to be a certain size and shape (even though it's mostly female journalists who write these articles, and female readers, including her, who consume them) but doesn't extend the same courtesy to lads.

The first was 'Not Big', in which she muses about her classy size demands by singing: 'You're not big, you're not clever, No, you ain't ya big brother. I'm gonna tell the world you're rubbish in bed. And that you're small in the game.' Lovely. Then, Goldicock's second family-friendly offering is the ironically titled 'It's Not Fair', which sees her deride a boyfriend for not giving her an orgasm when, where and how she demands it. The lyrics go: 'Oh, he treats me with respect, he says he loves me all the time.… There's just one thing that's getting in the way. When we go up to bed, you're just no good.… It's not fair and I think you're really mean.'

Now, I don't want to get into the nitty-gritty of Lily's sex life – in fact, I can't think of anything worse – but, wow: isn't this the pot calling the kettle black? Here we have a prime example of a woman who says making people feel bad about their bodies is cruel and harmful, sexist even, yet she does exactly that.

So when I call her out about this on Twitter it instantly hit a nerve. She responds within seconds, arguing the songs are about 'specific men, not all men', so she's 'not a hypocrite'. I can only imagine how comforting that is for her ex-boyfriends, not to mention her son. But let's turn the tables. What would happen if a singer like Ed Sheeran or Paolo Nutini released a track about the equivalent – a woman who needed to do more Kegel exercises at the bus stop? Or an ex who was dumped because it was like throwing a sausage down Oxford Street?

We all enjoy a bit of good-natured, self-deprecating humour – after all, none of us are perfect and the human form exerts a fascination with all its quirks – but it wouldn't get airplay and it certainly wouldn't be considered funny. Christ, it wouldn't even get released.

So what's the difference?

Well, while dick-dissing is portrayed as good fun for girls, the reality is considerably darker because, actually, Ms Allen is spot on. All this negativity does coalesce in people's minds and, if they're not thick-skinned enough to handle it, it damages them. It sparks a chain reaction. Boys start worrying about their dicks, then start acting like dicks. They strap on 'elongating' devices which promise to stretch them if they wear it for ten hours, every day, at the bargain price of £1,000. Or they try the Middle Eastern technique 'jelqing', which can only be described as trying to stretch a jumper after you've put it in the dryer.

Not only does this make me wince with sympathy pains, but I dread to think what happens when these guys invest all their time and see absolutely no difference at the end of it. One thing's for sure, they wouldn't get any sympathy from the outside world. We are fair game.

When Jude Law was photographed naked on holiday at his private villa, the media couldn't resist printing the shots. In doing so, they implied that every redeeming quality about him – his talent, his good looks, his success, his intelligence, his skills as a father – had been deleted in one go because in his trousers was an utterly NORMAL penis. In an article entitled 'Nude Jude's Not A Huge Issue,' the New York Post wrote: 'In snapshots that recall George Costanza's infamous 'shrinkage' episode on Seinfeld, the love-rat actor's meager manhood is on full display as he changes into a swimsuit outside his mother Maggie Law's house in Vaudelnay, France.' Meanwhile, Gawker (check out the hypocrisy of their strict, moral code in the Sex chapter) chimed in: 'Photos of Jude Law's peniwinkle [time in France] have been circulating. It'd be cruel for us not to share them with you. So, make sure your boss isn't looking, click here to see the itty bitty fella, roll eyes, take [a] shower [and] get circumcision.'

Then again, even Napoleon's penis wasn't sacred. After it was removed during his autopsy, it went on display in a New York exhibition in 1927 whereby Time magazine claimed it resembled a 'shrivelled eel'. Half a century later and the staff at Elle, who collectively couldn't achieve half of what he did – despite their advantage of all the amazing things men have created, are still banging on about his alleged 'tiny sceptre'.

Yet when Kate Middleton was papped sunbathing topless, everyone was furious. Violation! Sexist! Rude!

I wanted to weep. Not because of Jude's genitals, which were perfectly fine, but because our private parts are forever ridiculed in a way women's aren't. OK, breasts adorn Page 3, but at least they're celebrated. They're not put up to be laughed at. Ours are. Even multinational companies like Pepsi, who sell their soft drinks to children and teenagers, for God's sake, use slogans such as 'Size Does Matter', which isn't just offensive but really shit copywriting. I can do better on the back of a fag packet. Drunk.

Most people justify this stuff by saying it only affects arrogant men who somehow deserve it. On the contrary, I'd bet a small fortune that the blokes taking the biggest blows are those battling a depressing size neurosis.

Once, a seventeen-year-old boy emailed me via my website. He'd quit his rugby team, stopped going out and refused to date girls – all because he thought his penis wasn't 'good enough'. He also refused to use urinals, only ever cubicles, because the risk of being seen was too daunting. This boy (who actually had nothing to worry about – then again, none of us do) had been conditioned to hate his body from everything he'd seen and heard over the years. Yet the issue wasn't his penis, it was his perspective.

Worryingly, it's a view shared by millions of men everywhere. It hides in teenage bedrooms up and down the country, regularly reinforced by pop culture of every form and calibre. Even Sam Mendes's recent production of King Lear at the National Theatre featured three, yes THREE, references to men's 'small' dicks. Integral to the plot and tastefully done? I don't think so.

Together, this all feeds a multi-million-pound juggernaut of fear, which invades every spam inbox on a daily basis with the promise of lotions, potions and Perspex pumps which do more harm than good. Worse of all, it becomes acceptable. The new normal.

When I first started writing at the Mail, I saw a man on This Morning discussing his decision to undergo a penis enlargement operation. A conversation which brought a tear to my eye (for all the right reasons). The nine-minute feature peaked when before-and-after photos flashed up on screen, no doubt to cackles of laughter in the production office and across the country.

And while the end result wasn't awful, it wasn't the difference in this man's size that impressed me. Far from it. I was more amazed that this brave chap coined a phrase which totally nailed our obsession with size: penile dysmorphia. Borrowing terminology from body dysmorphia, which sees patients clinically preoccupied with non-existent physical faults in themselves, this bloke summed up an endemic – and encouraged – bloke problem with just two words.

It was this – not the gory footage of the operation – which brought a tear to my eye. See, he hadn't undergone surgery for vanity or to outdo his mates in the changing room. Why would he? None of them really care. Nor had he done it to correct a medical problem which was blighting his life (one that wouldn't have been taken seriously, even if he had). Instead, he was simply trying to undo years of taunts from women and the media which had left him psychologically scarred. The very messages that affect all males, from young boys and teenagers to war veterans.

So I track down his surgeon, Dr Roberto Viel, to get an idea of what motivates his patients – and if there's a trend. 'I started doing penoplastys in 1991 after a woman asked me if we'd operate on her boyfriend, who has getting very depressed about his size,' he says from his Harley Street office, wearing Day-Glo scrubs as he sits under a portrait of himself and his twin brother, also a surgeon.

'She'd heard about a doctor in America who was already doing the procedure and wondered if it was available here.

We researched it and, after realising it was safe, trialled it here. That was twenty-three years ago.'

Now, he says, it's their biggest seller amongst men. 'Liposuction is common and so is gynocomastia [surgery to correct 'man boobs'], but penis enlargement tops the lot. I do at least two or three cases per week. Even when the recession hit and people stopped spending money, the demand for every other procedure suffered a dip – except the penoplasty.'

Big business indeed. So, come on, how many of his patients are genuinely small? And by that I mean medically defined small.

'It's very, very rare to see a real micropenis, which affects less than one per cent of the male population,' he assures me. 'I've operated on a few, but the overwhelming majority of my patients have a penis which we consider average by textbook standards. Unfortunately, what we consider normal isn't necessarily what everybody else thinks is normal, but it's understandable: everything tells men they're below average.

'My patients don't come to me wanting to be porn stars, they want their lives back. They're refusing to take their sons to the swimming pool because they've focused all their anxieties and self-hate onto their penis. We consider it a psychosexual treatment. By changing a person physically we are changing them mentally. Yes, they end up with a larger penis, but ultimately they leave with a bigger sense of confidence. A better quality of life.'

That sounds very philanthropic (although the surgeries cost about £7,000 combined), but surely all this added size also improves sex, right? 'Length isn't important, nor girth,' he says. 'It all relative when combined with the size of the vagina. Increasing numbers of women are having surgeries to tighten the vaginal wall [commonly referred to as 'designer vaginas'] because they consider themselves too big, especially after childbirth.'

Which brings me to my next point. Because if size does matter – as women often say it does – then surely it matters on them too. After all, friction is friction and their bits vary as much as ours. This reminds me of an episode from the US television show Curb Your Enthusiasm called 'Big Vagina', which flips the issue and offers a new gesture for men to adopt in response to women's use of the 'inch' gesture with their thumb and forefinger.

In this sketch, the show's protagonist, Larry David, meets a nurse, Lisa, who claims she stopped dating his best friend, Jeff, because he has a small penis. When Larry later confronts him about this, it transpires that it's her who has the anatomical anomaly. I won't ruin the punchline, but it's better than ten years of therapy. Not least because the moral of the story is this: if she thinks you're too small, chances are it's because she's too big. After all, men can put a master key in a door, but if the lock's too big then it won't open. And that's not our fault.

A 2006 study by Barnhart, Izquierdo & Pretorius for the Kinsey Institute found the average vagina measures 62.7 mm, with a relatively large range (40.8–95 mm). The position of the cervix, marking the end of the vagina, can also vary at different points in a woman's cycle, making them all shapes and sizes.

The difference between this and penis size variation? Young lads are forever told size matters, while girls are counselled over skinny models in magazines. Women scorn the fashion industry for putting pressure on them, but – while I sympathise – it's these women who trash a guy because his body isn't to their liking. Even though his body is his, not theirs.

Rarely is a penis respected for simply being the amazing, life-creating body part it actually is.

I was once at a friend's 21st birthday party, which was festooned with pictures of him at various stages in his life, including some as a child in the bath. Even here, while celebrating his passage into adulthood, there were women whom I overheard say: 'Hmm, he hasn't changed much … if you know what I mean.'

Another time, during a man's speech about prostate cancer at a major health seminar, two women in the row ahead of me leaned in to each other and made an inch gesture between their thumb and forefinger. Both times, my heart sank – not for me or my body. I'm happy. But for the death of basic manners.

So let me take this opportunity to make a point: the very inference that small penises are bad puts all penises on a spectrum of judgement, which is just BLOODY RUDE. Small does not equate to bad. On top of all this, the sense of female entitlement is staggering because it assumes all penises are primarily there for their pleasure – when, actually, they have a whole gamut of functions for their owners before women even enter the room.

More importantly, the entire size debate is … well, bollocks. Biology proves it. If male size did matter, it would affect our ability to urinate, father children and get an erection from the moment we reached puberty. Which it doesn't. Even the Kama Sutra explains that there are three sizes of penis and three sizes of vagina, the perfect combination of which depends on personal preference.

Instead, small is a shame we're taught about, then taunted with. Advertisers use it as a foundation on which to sell their 'remedy' products, whereas women broker it as an insecurity only they have the power to relieve us of. Influential German psychoanalyst Karl Abraham, workmate of Sigmund Freud, suggested this was a vindictive form of penis envy – and, who knows, he might just be right. After all, why else would people – well, let's be honest here: women – be so vile about something so amazing? If he's wrong, then said women are just sexist.

Either way, it doesn't tickle. So trust me when I say that making a mental leap into healthy thinking is the cheapest, safest and most satisfying solution there is.

I once knew a guy at university who thought buying herbal growth pills from Japan would cause him to wake up with a penis like porn actor Jeff Stryker, solving all his problems. It didn't. It just cost him £45 plus import fees, one awkward trip to the Post Office and, later, embarrassing diarrhoea. He'd spend hours devising ways to pimp his penis (because of a throwaway comment an ex had made when he was fifteen), which essentially meant trawling websites for a whole manner of gadgets and tricks, including shaving his pubic hair off to give the smoke-and-mirrors effect of an extra inch.

The rule of thumb was: don't ever open his post.

Thankfully, he eventually met somebody on a night out and, from that moment on, changed. Turns out the sex was mutually their best ever and, naturally, his penis was an integral part of that. They're now married with kids – and he's never doubted his dick since. Even though it's exactly the same as it was before.

He got off lightly, though. In recent years I've spoken with countless urologists who've seen horrifying home enlargement jobs that would cause even the toughest man to faint. There was one who used chip fat in an old glue gun to give himself bigger girth (it didn't work), another who tried to release his own suspensory ligament with a pair of kitchen scissors (don't even think about it – it didn't work) and the man who, quite literally, used Poly Filla to fill out his phallus (seriously, don't do it – it didn't work. And I think he died).

Instead, we should learn from these men. They weren't home alone looking for something to do because the football season hadn't started; they were searching for solutions to their anxieties, which had completely spun out of control. OK, the above cases are extreme ones, but men everywhere are wasting hours, days, weeks and months worrying about something they can't do much about anyway. Forget worrying if your penis is short; LIFE is short.

Author and comedian Richard Herring wrote 2003's Talking Cock – the male equivalent to The Vagina Monologues. In it he noted that men's paranoia about their size is so deeply ingrained (and encouraged) by society that we don't question it:

'Few of us are going to be prepared to rock the boat and look at the positive things that men do – to focus on all the men who are being good fathers, good lovers, good friends … for fear of appearing un-manly.… Rather than making the obvious mental leap and concluding that the male stereotype was wrong, I had decided there was something wrong with me.'

One easy, immediate and fun way to do this is by viewing porn with reality glasses. Not literally, of course, but by simply understanding that the actors in them are no more atypical than the pneumatic blondes they're with.

'I was always careful to point out the actual rarity of penises over eight inches,' says publishing editor Dian Hanson, referring to her work on Taschen's The Big Penis Book.

‘Seriously, I can’t tell you how many thousands of photographs I had to examine to find ones of that size.’

Interestingly, proportionate to body scale, man already has the biggest penis of all the primates – but does bigger always mean better? I enter the online world of Craigslist to find out.

In the personals section I find a man who’s advertising his eleven-inch penis to women with pride, which thus begins a very unusual email exchange. When he eventually agrees to speak with me, he admits that he frequently fails to get it completely up because a bigger dick requires so much more blood flow than normal. Even then, its heaviness means it often fails to stand at the optimum erect angle.

Still envious? Thought not.

In 2012 a man called Patrick Moote learned self-acceptance the hard way. He got down on one knee and proposed to his then-girlfriend at a UCLA basketball game in Los Angeles. Crushingly, before an audience of thousands, she said no – later telling Moote privately that it was because his penis wasn’t big enough for her. Gutted, as any man would be, he then became an overnight phenomenon when the clip of her rejection went viral, being watched more than 10 million times in four days.

Already on the world stage, penis in hand, he pragmatically decided to answer the size question in a documentary – or is it cockumentary? – called Unhung Hero. According to the film, which was endorsed by Fahrenheit 9/11 director Michael Moore, the US penis size industry is worth a whopping $5 billion. Gentlemen, that’s $5 BILLION WORTH OF SELF-LOATHING AND SHAME which could be spent on so many better things. Specifically, things that work. DO NOT GIVE IT ANY MORE.

Peter Lloyd

One man who knows this all too well was British filmmaker Lawrence Barraclough. Armed with a penis which was 3.5 inches when erect, he spent years agonising over his size until he finally faced his issues in a BBC Three documentary called My Penis and I. Groundbreaking for British television, it rugby-tackled women’s fascism with size and translated it into something positive for the guys.

Once again, Barraclough’s issues weren’t innate or justified – they were simply acquired from a toxic narrative in the wider world. ‘My penis insecurities stemmed from being laughed at by everybody who came into contact with my dick,’ he told me. ‘Right from my first sexual experience.’

In a bid to be accepted, he considered everything from completely avoiding sexual relationships to surgery, which either sees fat transferred from love handles and pumped into the shaft or else erection ligaments slashed so it hangs lower when flaccid (although only when flaccid – in fact, this tactic can give men ‘dive-bomber dicks’ that hang down, even when erect).

‘It stopped being an option for me when I was told how little I’d gain and how potentially dangerous it could be,’ he added.

‘I tried a penis pump a few times, but I just found the whole thing a little too dispiriting. Ultimately, what set me free from my size concerns was being open and talking about them. When the film aired I thought people would see my penis and laugh at me all over again, but that couldn’t have been further from the truth. Since making My Penis and I, not one person has said anything derogatory about my cock. Instead, they congratulate me on sharing such a personal story so publicly. I’m also a father now, which my penis had a small part in, so I couldn’t possibly be anything other than happy with it. My penis made that happen. It’s pretty amazing.’

So can we definitively say, once and for all, that size doesn’t matter? ‘Yes, absolutely,’ says leading psychosexual therapist Phillip Hodson.

‘We live in a bigness culture where most women know that many male insecurities are penis-focused, so belittling their endowment is a power-play. Fortunately, there’s no penis that is too small to give some pleasure – even if it’s just a ‘bud’ then it’s still as hot as the external part of a woman’s clitoris, but if you’ve already been affected by the size myth, use reason to eliminate absurd and mistaken thoughts. Straight men should know that the average length of the vagina is only six inches long, so what are they going to do with the other four inches they claim are so important?

‘Besides, when it comes to experience, does not possessing a ten-inch penis really stop you having the fuck of your life? Answers on a postcard, please.’

Author Susie Orbach once said that fat was a feminist issue. I suspect she’s right, but if she is, then penis size is an issue of the same scale for men. Now, thanks to the likes of Lawrence Barraclough, Larry David and Patrick Moote, millions of men might just stand an inch or two taller because they appreciate the politics in their penis.

So, the next time you’re about to sleep with somebody who looks at your perfect penis and asks, ‘Who’s that going to please?’ the answer should always be: ‘Me.’

Not only does this ensure you’re the custodian of your own dick dignity, but it proves you’ve got the balls to tackle sexism head on. Now that’s big.

Parental alienation: The impact on parents

Dr. Edward Kruk · 14 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is also available in Romanian.

In this second installment of our three-part series on parental alienation, we turn our attention to alienated (targeted) and alienating parents. Parental alienation is the "programming" of a child by one parent to denigrate the other (targeted) parent in an effort to undermine and interfere with the child's relationship with that parent, and it most often occurs within the context of a child custody conflict. This includes the "legal abuse" of parents who have been disenfranchised from their children's lives subsequent to sole custody and primary residence judgments. Within an adversarial legal process, non-custodial parents are often subjected to shame and stigma, lack of access to their children, and devaluation of their role as parents. And those who speak about the pain and woundedness in their lives are subjected to a mean-spirited cultural response, where their talk of woundedness is mocked.

Most alienated parents are non-custodial fathers, and engaging these fathers is a significant challenge, as clinical and research literature has described the lack of "fit" between fathers and therapeutic agents as emanating from two sources: the characteristics of men and fathers themselves (their resistance to counseling and therapy) and aspects of the therapeutic process (which have failed to successfully engage fathers). Patterns of traditional gender-role socialization directing men toward self-sufficiency and control, independent problem-solving, and emotional restraint have largely worked against fathers being able to acknowledge personal difficulties and request help. A fear of self-disclosure and a feeling of disloyalty to one's family in exposing family problems are not uncommon; a fear of losing control over one's life and the need to present an image of control or a "facade of coping" in the form of exterior calm, strength, and rationality, despite considerable inner turmoil, characterize many fathers. Professional service providers do not always consider such psychological obstacles to therapy and thus do not address fathers' unique needs. The research on divorced fathers is clear about their most pressing need: their continued meaningful involvement with their children, as active parents. The lack of recognition of this primary need is the main reason for therapists' lack of success in engaging alienated fathers.

Above all, the key to engaging alienated parents is to validate their parental identity and combine advocacy efforts with counseling focused on enhancing their role as active and responsible parents. Human service professionals have been notably absent in the politics of reform with respect to the issue of legal child custody, yet they are desperately needed as allies in policy reform efforts. An important role of human service professionals in supporting alienated parents is through such advocacy and activism, challenging the custodial/non-custodial and residential/non-residential parent dichotomy and advancing the cause of co-parenting.

An active program of outreach is essential as alienated parents report a lack of effective support services, and they remain a highly vulnerable population. Service providers need to be persistent and proactive, as it takes time to build and sustain engagement in the context of these parents' feelings of isolation, helplessness, and their tendency to wait until there is a crisis before accessing support. Parents who were highly involved with and attached to their children and suddenly find themselves forcefully removed from their children's lives experience profound woundedness. The experience of being removed as a loving parent from the life of one's child via a sole custody order strikes at the heart of one's being. Suicide rates are reported to be of epidemic proportions among parents—fathers in particular—who are struggling to maintain a parenting relationship with their children (Kposowa, 2000; Kposowa, 2003); and legal abuse has been noted as a key factor in these cases. Being vigilant regarding symptoms of post-traumatic stress and suicidal ideation among non-custodial and alienated fathers and mothers is an essential role for service providers. A strengths-based approach—recognizing alienated parents' aspirations to their children's well-being and the experience, knowledge, and skills that they can contribute to this well-being while maintaining the high road in addressing the alienation—is vital.

And finally, what about the alienating parent, who uses a combination of fear, lies, flattery, and gratification of material desires to win over their child and whose sense of entitlement and desire to control the child is greater than the desire to nurture and care for the child? As Amy Baker writes, parents who try to alienate their child from the other parent subtly or overtly convey a three-part message to the child: I am the only parent who loves you and you need me to feel good about yourself; the other parent is dangerous and unavailable; and pursuing a relationship with the other parent jeopardizes your relationship with me. Alienating parents are themselves emotionally fragile, often enmeshed with the child, with a “sense of entitlement, needing control, knowing only how to take” (Richardson, 2006). Yet although it is easy to pathologize and blame such parents, it must be remembered that alienating behavior is encouraged in the context of a legal adversarial forum where the goal is to “win” the custody or residence of one’s child. And although some would recommend a solution of removing child custody from alienating parents and placing children in the care of non-alienating parents, it is often very difficult to adjudicate who actually is the alienating and who is the targeted parent. Family law judges are not trained in the finer points of child development and family dynamics and can be easily swayed by legal arguments made on behalf of disputing parents, including alienating parents.

On the matter of parental alienation, I have come to see that the problem is systemic in nature; that is, the problem lies primarily in the adversarial nature of legal determination of parenting after divorce. Parents are set up to fight in an effort to win “primary residence” or “custody” of their children, and the system tends to reward those skilled in adversarial combat. Parents often win their case by disparaging the other parent as a parent, in effect engaging in alienating behaviors, and the system thereby encourages and produces alienating behavior. A legal presumption of co-parenting, rebuttable in established cases of child abuse and family violence, may in fact be the most effective means of combating parental alienation and curtailing its damaging consequences while at the same time protecting the safety and well-being of children at risk of abuse.

The final installment of our three-part series on parental alienation will examine programs, services, and interventions that combat alienation and seek to reunite estranged parents and their children while addressing the significant clinical challenges in working with alienating parents.

Dangerous rape myths: Part 2

Hannah Wallen · 15 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In Part 1 of "Dangerous rape myths," I examined three common rape myths: that doubt = misogyny; that the innocent have nothing to fear; and that false allegations are rare. Here in Part 2, I will examine three more: that false allegations are not harmful to the accused; that even if they are harmful they're nowhere near as bad as actual rape; and that combating false accusers hurts real victims.

1. False allegations are not harmful to the accused.
False allegations can be extremely harmful, both immediately and in the long term. The falsely accused suffers, and faces, serious damages.

- His reputation takes an immediate hit.
- He will be at least temporarily imprisoned.
- There will be at least the financial loss involved in paying bail.
- Regardless of the outcome of the trial, there will be at least some in his community who will always view him as a rapist.

In addition, the stress of dealing with the false allegations and the ensuing mandatory investigation can:

- damage his existing relationships with family and friends;
- cause him problems at work due to lost time, reputation issues, and hostility resulting from reputation issues; and
- cause stress-related health problems, including anxiety, depression, elevated blood pressure, digestive issues, and the exacerbation of existing health conditions.

He faces an uphill battle, being accused of one of those crimes for which discriminatory law requires that the accused be treated by the court as guilty until proven innocent. If he cannot prove his innocence, he faces:

- imprisonment, followed by
- abuse by fellow prisoners and guards because of the nature of his conviction.

If he survives long enough to be released, he is subjected to invasion of privacy via:

- sex-offender registration;
- publication of said registry for public viewing, including online access;
- forced self-identification to neighbors;

as well as

- compromised freedoms (regarding where he may or may not reside);
- reduced employability; and
- the loss of the right to bear arms.

Falsely accused boys—whose selves are still forming at a rapid rate and are strongly subject to outside influence and whose community includes the closer knit and less private environment of school—would face issues not present for adults, such as:

- frequent and consistent violent bullying and harassment in response to his damaged reputation;
- lost education opportunities, as the accusation could lead to his being barred from attending school during the investigation, or if convicted;
- reduced academic achievement, even if allowed to attend school; caused by stress, time lost to compliance with investigation and hearings, and possibly educator bias;

- loss of time-specific personal development opportunities, in the delaying or prevention of enrollment in youth programs and activities that won't be available to him when he's older;
- greater susceptibility to the emotional and psychological repercussions of the terrible lessons the experience may teach him, including damage to his ability to trust both authority figures and women;
- change to the path of his character development by subjecting him to incarceration, where defensive behaviors must be adopted, at an impressionable age;
- damage to his developing self-image, and possibly his future ability to emotionally connect with sex partners, due to a possible mental association of sex with betrayal; and
- potential damage to the formation of his entire sense of self, as kids' beliefs about themselves can be shaped by what they are told and shown that their respected or loved elders and those in authority think of them.

What if the excuse was true? What if being falsely accused doesn't change a guy's life in any way? Aside from how absurdly difficult to hold, and insulting to the accused, that assumption is, there is also the question of why that makes it all right to create a false alarm in the community. Let's compare it to pulling a fire alarm when there is no fire. Since no harm is done to the building, is that okay, feminists? Should we treat false fire alarms as if no harm is done, when police and firefighters are occupied, resources are used, and a disturbance is created around the source of the alarm? Should we enact legislation to protect false alarmists from prosecution? After all, since no damage is created by the false alarm, the alarmist hasn't done anything wrong, right?

2. The experience of being falsely accused doesn't feel as horrible as being raped.
This kind of statement can only come from someone who has never seen the devastating effects that false accusations can have on an individual's life. It's not just dismissive of the damage done to the accused but also insulting to the intelligence of the listener or reader, who is apparently expected not to be able to imagine how the fear, shame, humiliation, and other feelings often associated with rape may also be experienced by the falsely accused.

Subjected to the perception of guilt within his community, and because of that treated as a walking perpetrator, the accused will experience a sense of being violated coupled with a response of indignation at the assumptions others are making. He may feel betrayed by the accuser and/or by other people he expected to know him better. He may feel outraged by behaviors exhibited by those around him in response to the allegations against him. He may feel frustrated and confused by the dissonance between his knowledge of his innocence and his experience of being treated by those around him as guilty.

He may have a sense that his own personal choice, or control of self, has been taken away from him. He may be stricken by a sense of helplessness or powerlessness. By creating a false public impression, the accuser has robbed her victim of a level of personal sovereignty. It is no longer enough for him to live within the bounds of common decency; he can now be viewed as an indecent person through no action of his own—in fact, his actions don't matter. He has been robbed of his right and his ability to shape his reputation through the behavioral choices he makes.

He may be oppressed by the hostile environment that a discriminatory public attitude toward him can create; reluctant to confront the stares, whispers, and sometimes open aggressiveness of individuals who have judged him by the accusation rather than by any evidence. Even though he knows that he did nothing wrong, he may pick up and carry the guilt lobbed at him by a judgmental public. There is a vulnerable, naked-in-public feeling in knowing that everyone around you may have a bad impression of you in mind as they interact with you, more so when it's a concrete belief that you've committed a crime thought of by most as an atrocity. He may be humiliated and ashamed at what strangers might think of him, made to feel dirty or tainted by the allegations against him.

He may feel like a predatory presence or perverse outcast among other people in response to the knowledge that that is how others see him. This can lead to a level of phobia—fear of interpersonal interaction within the community in which his reputation has been tarnished or even of going out in public at all. That phobia may be made worse by others' treatment of the victim. He can end up isolating himself and becoming depressed, even suicidal.

There is also the fear of the other potential consequences of those allegations, as described above, all of which can take an emotional toll. As with the experience of rape, that emotional toll can, and often does, last well beyond the duration of the experience of facing false allegations, which can arguably be said to last much longer than the experience of rape.

However, let us again take this assertion to its logical conclusion. Let's accept, for a moment, the belief that being accused is a less horrible experience than being raped. How does that justify advocating tolerance of the behavior? The argument basically is that because the experience of the victim is thought not to be emotionally traumatic, the crime is not a crime. Taken to its logical extreme, that assertion excuses embezzlement, tax fraud, grave-robbing (the victim is dead), destruction of public property, and a host of other serious crimes that do not emotionally traumatize anyone. Or, rather, that we should not prosecute a rapist who victimizes an individual who is too mentally disabled to understand or care about the experience. Since it's not as emotionally upsetting as forcible rape, it's not worth addressing, right?

3. Addressing and combating false allegations hurts actual rape victims.
This assertion is based on the pretense of an either-or competition, pitting the rights of rape victims against the rights of the falsely accused. The claims are as follows: first, that the effort to prevent men from being wrongfully convicted would create a legal environment in which legitimate rape allegations would not result in conviction due to the court's requirement for actual evidence; and second, that penalizing women for leveling allegations proved to be false will discourage legitimate rape victims from coming forward.

The first claim, offered as an argument in support of rape victims, is really an attack on due process in hopes of making rape accusations a weapon that can be pointed and fired to destroy a man's life and reputation.

The second claim, also offered as an argument in support of rape victims, is really an attack on the value, or weight, of the human rights of men in comparison with the human rights of women. It amounts to the assertion that some men may be subjected to the involuntary sacrifice of their rights, reputation, health, family, and freedom to foster the emotional comfort of some women.

Taking the attitudes of these claims to an extreme end, one could justify the abolition of due process. If affording accused criminals the right to due process is a violation of the rights of crime victims, then there should never even be hearings held to determine the validity of criminal charges involving a victim. As soon as there is an injured party, it doesn't matter whether the party convicted is guilty. It only matters that someone is convicted. Who cares about a few human sacrifices when there are women to protect, right?

Finally, even in the one concession that ever gets made in favor of addressing an effort toward prevention of false rape allegations, there is the move to transfer victim status from the accused to uninvolved women. This is done by stating, as one's reason for condemning the act of false accusation, the fear that public awareness of the existence of false allegations will negatively impact the credibility of real rape victims. Doing this marginalizes the real victim, the falsely accused, and ignores the ordeal he suffers at the hands of his accuser in favor of steering the discussion back around to a gynocentric perspective.

Of all the various ways in which feminists dismiss the wrongness, ignore the impact, and marginalize the victims of false rape allegations, this one is both the sneakiest and the most blatant. It's sneaky in that it involves a pretense of support, and it's blatant in its designation of men as irrelevant and disposable. It relies solely on the treatment of the human rights of men as having less value or weight than the human rights of women.

That attitude is at the bottom of all the ways in which feminists dismiss and marginalize male victims of false rape allegations. The hypocrisy is that these self-described fighters for equality cannot abide any acknowledgement that the human rights—or human experience—of men are equal to their own. Doing so would take away the Mantle of the Oppressed that gives women the power of Blame, used to maintain the privilege for which feminists have so passionately fought since the beginning and the soapbox from which feminist ideology is preached. Everything has to be about feminism's female proxy victims, and if it's not, the dialogue has to be directed back to them. This is the way that the feminist response to false rape allegations against men reveals the underlying basis for feminist advocacy: that they fight not for human equality but for female power, and they're willing to ignore, step on, or sacrifice anyone who gets in between them and their achievement of that goal.

I'm not playing: That "street harassment" thing

Rom Wills · 15 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Social media has been abuzz lately over the video of the young woman walking through the streets of New York and getting catcalled over 100 times. At least that's what we're told, since apparently there was some selective editing done. Once again the subject of street harassment has been brought front and center for people to express moral outrage over. Me being me, I have looked at the issue and want to share my perspective.

The main issue with street harassment is not that it happens. The real issue is that the women who are being "harassed" are getting attention from men whom they do not find attractive. If one pays attention to the commentators and videos complaining about harassment, the main issue is that women are getting unwanted attention from certain men. I don't say this lightly. When I speak, I do so based on actual life experiences. Let me share some things.

Back in the 1990s when I worked in downtown Washington, DC, I used to meet women in the streets a lot. A whole lot. I got phone numbers, dates, and sex from women I met initially on the street. Even in my books I talk about how to meet women on the street. Now, to be clear, the way I met women was decidedly different from walking up to a woman and saying, "Hey beautiful" or even "Hello." I used to meet women at either bus stops or subway stations. Often a woman would strike up a conversation with me while sitting next to me on the bus or train. Another scenario that happened a lot is that women would simply say hello or otherwise just start conversations while I was walking down the street minding my own business. Even to this day, an occasional woman will see me on the street or especially in a mall and say, "Smile." I keep a serious look on my face most of the time.

It was extremely rare that I initiated a conversation with a woman on the street. One time that I did was in the 1990s when I worked near the White House. I'll call the woman Celia. She was tall, about 5'10", had a pretty face, and big shapely legs. Shapely legs drive me crazy. She could literally cause accidents. It was of the rare times that I used real game to connect with a woman. I was walking by the bus stop when I saw her and I walked past her without saying anything. I didn't even look back. I just looked at my watch and noted what time she was at the bus stop. The next day she was there again and I still didn't say anything. A few more days went like this. After a couple of days I walked by and just said, "Hey" and she responded by saying, "Hi" and we left it at that. After a few days of this, I stopped and said, "We always say hi to each other. We should at least know each other's name." We exchanged names. A few days later phone numbers. Maybe a month or so later we went out on a date.

Now someone may say why I took my time with her. One: I read the situation. The reason she was at that particular bus stop was that she was constantly getting harassed at the bus stop that was closer to her job. She was pretty and built like a brickhouse. The combination is a magnet for catcalling. I knew that men were constantly hitting on her. By walking past her without saying anything, I did several things. The most important thing I did was set myself apart from other men. Then by walking past her I allowed her to get used to my face and to give her a chance to choose me. I knew she chose me when she would smile when she saw me coming. Also a very important factor was that I always had on a suit when I walked past her. This brings me back to a point I mentioned at the beginning of this blog: The main issue with street harassment is unwanted attention from certain men.

People who follow my blog and have read my work know I divide the male population into four major categories in terms of how women see them. Two of the categories are select, meaning that women will seek them out for relationships. Two of the categories are non-select, in that women generally do not seek them out for relationships. The two select categories are Mr. Goodbar and the Masked Men. Goodbars are select for the most part because women find them very good-looking. There are a few exceptions. Masked Men are men who look successful. The two non-select categories are the Nice Guys and the Gamesmen. Nice Guys lack the looks or look of success that will turn a woman on sexually. The Gamesmen are in the same boat. Each group of men will interact differently with women on the street.

Goodbars rarely say anything to women on the street. A man in the Goodbar category typically gets harassed by women in the streets. Some women are extremely aggressive when they see a man they find physically or sexually attractive. Ask me how I know. Goodbars also have to be concerned with gay men hitting on them. The average Goodbar will ignore all but the most physically attractive women when he is out and about.

Masked Men are not going to be inclined to say anything to women on the street. Masked Men are successful men and as a result tend to be elitist. In the eyes of men commenting on the street harassment issue on social media, blogs, and websites, most of the women complaining are average-looking at best. Masked Men want trophy women. It's very rare that a successful man will be seen walking around with anything less than a woman who looks a fashion model. If a Masked Man is even on the street, they will be about business and will generally ignore most of the women around them.

Nice Guys are generally not going to say anything to women on the street. Nice Guys as a group are not that aggressive. They will generally be too shy to approach. At most they may look, but the average woman wouldn't feel threatened. Nice Guys are the invisible men of the dating world. Women simply don't see them.

Now those Gamesmen. Any real discussion about street harassment has to focus on them. Every single man I have seen in a street harassment video has been a Gamesmen. I can tell this even in cases where the faces are blurred. Goodbars will tend to have superior body builds. Masked Men will be dressed well. Nice Guys will be dressed plainly. Now please understand what I mean when say Gamesman. The Gamesman is non-select. He doesn't have the looks or the money to attract women. He would normally be invisible to women, like the Nice Guy, except for one key factor: he is aggressive. At some point in his life the Gamesman realized that the only way he was going to fulfill his sexual needs was by being aggressive in his dealings with women. Formally or informally, he had to learn some game. One aspect of that game is to approach as many women as possible.

Most women are going to reject the Gamesman. He knows that and is quite frankly cool with that scenario. The Gamesman if nothing else has a thick skin. It's part of the game. Here's the thing. Say a Gamesman says hi to 25 women in a single day. Likely, 22 of them are annoyed beyond belief and will complain about being harassed. And 2 of the women will engage him because it's easier and some women do like the game. Finally, 1 woman will give him her phone number because the Gamesman may be the only man to show her any attention. Guess what? Those 24 women rejected the Gamesman, but in his eyes he wins because 1 gave him her number. The Gamesman repeats this process for a month and he will end up with 5 to 10 serious prospects. There are Goodbars and Masked Men who don't have that many prospects in a month.

Gamesmen are going to keep talking to women in the street because in their eyes it works. Bottom line. Now, there are extreme cases where a woman's life can be in danger. People will say we have to criminalize street harassment for that reason. Okay, let's say we criminalize it. Has criminalizing rape, which is a way worse crime, stopped it? Has criminalizing child molestation stopped it? Even if street harassment was criminalized, which incidentally some of it is anyway as touching somebody can be considered an assault, would that stop it? A man has more to gain than to lose by hitting on women in the street. Even if the laws are on the books, how often would they be enforced? Say a woman feels harassed, she calls the police, and goes back to the spot and finds the man she feels harassed her. Without witnesses or a cellphone recording, it's just one person's word against another. Police will not be inclined to arrest someone without evidence that a crime has been committed. Also the possibility exists that someone could be falsely accused of harassment. The accused could charge the accuser with slander and maybe libel as well. As someone with experience in the court system, I can say that prosecutors will not want to be bothered with these types of cases.

Now, to be clear, I'm not saying just ignore street harassment. I personally believe that men should limit who they talk to on the street anyway. If a woman isn't giving a man a blatant invitation such as a smile or she initiates the conversation, he should just leave her alone. Too many men are gassing up the heads of basic women and it really isn't worth the trouble. That's what men need to do. Women, on the other hand, need to examine their own actions in encouraging street harassment. I don't mean in terms of how they dress. Women need to look at their selection criteria. Boys evolve into Gamesmen because they no longer want to be invisible. The only way for them not to be invisible is for women to change their criteria.

Now I know women feel justified in wanting what they want. Many women feel entitled to have that pretty boy or bad boy with the killer body. Women feel entitled to successful men. What I have seen over the years are attempts to shame men into engaging with less than desirable women. One thing is shaming men into dating fat women. Even though there are men who are genuinely attracted to larger women, most really are not. This is especially the case with Goodbars and Masked Men. Yet many women feel like a man should want a less than desirable woman. Friends and family will say, “She’s so nice though.” Many men can attest to feeling this type of pressure. Let’s turn this around. There’s no real pressure on a woman to take a less than desirable man. The complaints about the “shortage of good men” is really about the shortage of desirable men. The largest category of men are the Gamesmen. If women gave Gamesmen that same opportunity that they want Goodbars and Masked Men to give basic women, I guarantee the incidents of street harassment would drop immensely. All these men really want is a loving relationship. Most of them are good, loyal men. No, they aren’t fine, nor are they likely to become millionaires. At the same time, the women rejecting them aren’t fine, nor are they likely to be millionaires. In many ways, women are rejecting men who are their matches.

Now let me be very clear. I’m not saying women need to respond to men on the street. Women do need to pay more attention to men in more proper venues such as churches, gatherings, cultural festivals, or wherever men and women gather. Another way is good old-fashioned personal introductions. If a man should give unattractive woman a chance, a woman should do the same. Sometimes people find diamonds in the rough.

The only way to truly deal with street harassment is to change the relationship culture as it exists now. Anything else is simply a waste of time and energy.

Myth vs. reality: Universal suffrage in the UK

William Collins · 16 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The popular belief is that the suffragettes won the vote for women and before that men already had the vote. Both these beliefs are false.

What follows is a story that almost no one knows about the true history of universal suffrage in the UK. I have pieced it together partly by reading the parliamentary records from 1917 (these records are known as Hansard).

The true history of universal suffrage in the UK is the history of the working-class struggle, not a gendered issue at all.

The property-based right to vote goes back at least to King Henry VI in 1432, when it was established that only people owning property worth 40 shillings or more could vote. Since this sum remained unchanged over centuries, the natural effect of inflation was to increase the size of the electorate. But even by the eighteenth century, the electorate was still only about 1% or 2% of the population (though virtually all men).

During the Victorian era, there were three reform acts that together increased the proportion of men eligible to vote to about 50%. As an illustration of the unreliable, partisan commentary you will find on websites on the issue of the franchise, consider this quote from Ref. 1:

> Political changes were very slow in coming from 1750 to 1900. Those that did come in 1832 and 1867 were seen as not changing a great deal especially as neither gave women the right to vote.

This fatuous remark dismisses the reform acts as unimportant on the grounds that they did not give the vote to women. But these acts increased the male franchise from almost nothing to half the adult male population, hardly an insignificant matter. And hardly insignificant even if your whole focus is on women because, without men pioneering a broader franchise, the ground would not have been prepared for women to do so later. It is a fine illustration of how a gynocentric mindset fails to appreciate that the fates of men and women are interwoven.

The years immediately before the First World War (WWI) were the most active period for the suffragists campaigning for the vote for women. But throughout WWI only about half of men aged 21 and over had the vote. Most of the men killed or maimed in that war did not have the vote.

The popular version of the story of how women got the vote is summarised in Ref. 2:

> The standard version of the story of the fight for female suffrage sees it as a straight contest between the suffragettes and a chauvinistic male establishment, headed – not to say embodied – by the prime minister, Asquith, and encompassing blinkered politicians, burly policemen and brutal prison warders. This [traditional] version has the merit of simplicity, with obvious heroes and villains, which makes it well suited to general public consumption; unfortunately it ignores some of the important paradoxes of the story.

That is an understatement. The standard version of the story is completely incorrect.

The principal misunderstanding that I wish to expose is that before WWI the main barrier to women being granted the vote was not the absence of support for the idea among (male) politicians. On the contrary, there was widespread support within the Liberal and Labour parties. Ref. 2 tells us:

> On the whole male politicians were by no means opposed to some form of female suffrage. The Labour Party supported it, and leading figures like Keir Hardie and George Lansbury were deeply involved in the issue, Lansbury to such an extent that he voluntarily, though unsuccessfully, put himself up for re-election in his Bow and Bromley constituency on a female suffrage platform. A substantial section of the Liberal Party, quite possibly the majority, supported it, as did many leading Liberals, including Churchill, Lloyd George and Sir Edward Grey.

In view of such widespread support for their cause, why did the suffragists fail to win the vote earlier? The answer is, with delicious irony, their sexism.

They campaigned for “Votes for Women,” but they should have campaigned for “Votes for All.” They failed to understand the nature of the obstacle to their enfranchisement. It was not lack of male politicians’ support. The obstacle was that working-class men did not have the vote, and it was politically essential for working-class men to get the vote before it became possible for women.

Prior to WWI, there were many attempts to pass bills to permit limited female enfranchisement. All failed. They had to fail for a very simple, purely party-political, reason. Because only men from the upper half of society had the vote, the best that could be offered to women was to give the vote to upper-class women. But the support for female enfranchisement lay in the Labour and Liberal parties. Giving the vote only to upper-class women was perceived as introducing a few million extra Conservative voters into the electorate. So how could the Labour and Liberal parties support it? It would have been electoral suicide. So, those men who were inclined to favour female suffrage nevertheless had to vote it down, while the Conservatives were against it on principle.

So, you see, votes for women were an impossibility unless and until working-class men got the vote—to break the above political deadlock.

By 1916 the British Government realized it had a problem. The electoral process had been shot to pieces by the war. The electoral register had become a nonsense, with the most important voters being away fighting in France and elsewhere, and huge numbers of people in the UK had moved around the country to do essential war work. This led to a fundamental re-think of the franchise.

The extraordinarily egalitarian recommendations of the 1918 Representation of the People Act were summarised by a near contemporaneous US source thus:

> The old practice of defining franchises in terms of relationship to property would have to be discontinued, and that in lieu thereof it would be necessary to adopt the principle that suffrage is a personal right inherent in the > individual.

This proposal, to extend the franchise to all adult men, enjoyed overwhelming majority support across all parties and in both Houses of Parliament. It was recognised that anything less would be insupportable after the horrors of the trenches. This is absolutely clear from reading the many debates on the act in 1917 as recorded in Hansard. The Home Secretary, George Cave (Conservative) introduced the act as follows:

> War by all classes of our countrymen has brought us nearer together, has opened men's eyes, and removed misunderstandings on all sides. It has made it, I think, impossible that ever again, at all events in the lifetime of the present generation, there should be a revival of the old class feeling which was responsible for so much, and, among other things, for the exclusion for a period, of so many of our population from the class of electors. I think I need say no more to justify this extension of the franchise.

So there we have it. The principle purpose for the 1918 act was the need to dissolve the previous class-based franchise—and the specific motivation was the recognition that "If they are fit to fight they are fit to vote"—an actual quote from Hansard. The primary motivation was men.

Women got the vote as a virtually automatic collateral consequence of working-class men finally getting the vote. WW1 broke the previous political deadlock.

If the new mood to recognise the rights of working-class men was the result of the slaughter going on in the trenches—and it was—then this perspective suggests that the vote for women was bought with men's lives. This reality will not be popular in some quarters. It stands in stark and hideous contrast with feminist orthodoxy.

That women got the vote owes more to the Kaiser than to the Pankhursts.

The graph that heads this article tells the true story. With a suitable historical perspective, the bulk of men and women achieved the vote at much the same time. On an historical timescale, the enfranchisement of men hardly preceded that of women significantly.

During WWI most suffragettes suspended their campaigning activities. Many, including Emmeline and Christabel Pankhurst, took to speaking at recruiting drives for the war. The potential recruits would be largely from the working classes and hence would not have the vote. What staggering hypocrisy. The Pankhursts were insistent on their own right to have the vote while remaining safely at home, but at the same time they were happy to send to their deaths men and boys whose right to vote they did not recognise as significant. This must surely rank as one of the most flagrant pieces of amoral, political hypocrisy of all time.

The true history of women's suffrage is the working-class struggle. The correct perspective is gender-neutral. The historical Big Picture is that the enfranchisement of men and women was a single process. The suffragette movement did not bring about the enfranchisement of women. The suffragists failed to realise that their enfranchisement was a political impossibility unless working-class men were also enfranchised. This Big Snag was unsnagged by WWI, not by political protest.

While the suffragettes' perspective was the gender-specific "votes for women," this was only because they did not recognise the equal rights of working-class men who were also disenfranchised. The irony is that universal suffrage was ultimately achieved thanks to the slaughter of these same working-class men in the trenches. For this motivated the enfranchisement of working-class men, which had been the barrier to women's enfranchisement.

Monstrously, the one action of the suffragettes that really did assist with gaining votes for women was their involvement in sending men away to war. Present-day feminists are culpable because—even with the leisure to put the history into proper focus—they still insist on regarding the suffragettes as triumphing over the hegemony of men. The orthodox feminist narrative is not only inaccurate but disguises a horrible, if unintentional, truth. The "woman good, man bad" worldview is not only false but, in this context, also flagrantly heartless.

Review: Syfy's "Ascension": Weak science, sexy social commentary

August Løvenskiolds · 16 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I'm writing this minutes after the Day 1 launch of Ascension, the Syfy Channel's three-day/six-hour series about an epic, if fictional, early 1960s era attempt to send a multigenerational "lifeboat of humanity"—a huge colony ship with about 600 people—to our nearest interstellar neighbor, the red dwarf star called Proxima Centauri.

At the beginning of the story, the ship, which is comparable in size to the Empire State Building, is 51 years into its 100-year journey. There is something for every viewer in the opener—a murder mystery, a period piece about the early 60s, a government conspiracy, a crew rumbling toward mutiny, a seemingly psychic tweener, a social commentary that crosses 50 years, and, of course, everyone is fucking (or fucking with) everyone, with the nude ass of the aging Tricia Helfer, the sexy Cylon of Battlestar Galactica, thrown in at minute 30-ish for even more fun.

Crappy Science and Engineering

There are a large number of obvious problems with the science and engineering of the Ascension, another fun thing to note while watching the show. I'll skim through a few of the more blatant concerns to add to the flavor of what we're being asked to digest.

- The interior of the interstellar ship boasts near-normal gravity, which, given the configuration of the ship and the 60s era technology, could only be generated by a sustained acceleration of 1 G—about 10 meters per second per second. A crew woman mentions that the ship is moving at a relativistic (close to light-speed) velocity, something that would happen normally after about one year under that acceleration. So far, so good, but there is a problem—at the titanic speeds produced by 1 G of acceleration, Proxima Centauri, at 4.26 light-years from Earth, would be reached after only about 14 years of Earth time, and even less (11 years) in ship's time, due to the time-dilation effects of relativistic speeds. This blows apart the scientific accuracy of the proposed mission right away.
- Of course, the show ignores the time-dilation effect completely and suggests that 51 years have passed on both Earth and the ship.
- Even worse, at the halfway point in the journey, the ship would have to rotate 180 degrees to begin 1 G of "deceleration" (slowing down), yet the show depicts this maneuver as not having been made 51% into the journey. Oops. Even this slight navigation error means they will fly by Proxima Centauri and waste years trying to get back there.
- At various times, objects are ejected from the ship—a gun, a dead body, and a living body. When traveling at relativistic velocities, this is a really bad idea because once your ship begins decelerating, those ejected objects will catch back up to you in a hurry and ram you at lethal speeds.
- Also, failing to recycle dead bodies back into the ship's tiny ecosystem is a very bad idea.
- The ship carries livestock such as pigs and chickens, fed by massive amounts of grain, presumably grown somewhere else on the ship. This is horribly inefficient and impractical on such a long mission.
- The ship's lighting appears to use large numbers of 1960s era incandescent and fluorescent bulbs. These bulbs have a limited lifespan, and for a 100-year journey the ship would have to store a vast number of these, in addition to the limited-life vacuum tubes needed to run the numerous black and white TV screens scattered around the ship. There is no hint of a manufacturing plant on the ship that could make these items.
- There are no elderly people on this ship—either they are all dead past about age 55 or they are being systematically exterminated by some protocol we haven't learned about yet.

But let's get to the real fun—the society that has grown up on the ship.

The Gender/Caste Struggle

The upper and lower decks of Ascension represent, both figuratively and actually, the upper and lower caste system aboard the ship, and they also represent gender as well.

The clean, comfortable upper decks are populated by large numbers of privileged, highly attractive, and sexually competitive women, along with a handful of high-status male leaders. Denizens of the lower decks are almost exclusively disenchanted and disenfranchised men, mucking away in dirty, difficult livestock and water-processing jobs.

The leadership is a nominal patriarchy in which a few talented men jockey lazily for power, but this patriarchy is dominated covertly by a matriarchy run by the captain's wife, who controls the sex lives of almost everyone on the ship and doles out her nubile female charges as sexual playthings to the men she is seeking to influence. These meta-whores are called "stewardesses," and almost every young girl growing up on the ship envies their fine clothing and comfortable, highly sexed lifestyles.

In the boring, little hope, and little-to-do atmosphere of a colony ship, sex is everywhere, and the overpopulation of women displays enormous amounts of both skin and competitive relational aggression toward each other that the high-status men are oblivious to, even when it happens literally in their laps and beds.

Sufficiently talented men can advance from the lower to the upper decks, but they retain the stigma of their lower-deck origin their entire lives. Lower-deck men live in a state of sexual starvation and can be manipulated into performing any favor, no matter how humiliating, for the mere promise (however forlorn) of attention from the ruling hotties. Not a single woman is depicted as lower-deck in the first part of Ascension, although they are alluded to briefly.

The opening murder of one of the hot young women touches off a halfhearted investigation that seems lackadaisical until one realizes that the vast numbers of sexually available women have made the individual women disposable in a way that would never be tolerated in a gynocentric or feminist-dominated society like ours. The forgotten men on the lower decks are too out-of-touch to even consider "white-knighting" for the murdered meta-whore.

There is a sharp twist at the end of the first episode that I won't spoil here, but it will rip the whole fabric of the show apart.

The Ascension is a microcosm of the upper educational class in our modern-day society, where 12 million college women compete for the attention of 9 million college men. Loser feminist college women, who hopelessly outnumber eligible college men, should grow increasingly competitive and then increasingly frustrated by their failure to land an acceptable male partner. We can expect increasingly febrile and desperate measures like rape hoaxes, intra-female violence, relational aggression, and feminist regimentation in this population, much like when too many rats are fighting over too little cheese.

David Penberthy shows us what “puerile trash” really looks like

Mark Dent · 16 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

David Penberthy’s article “Puerile Trash Avoids Facts on Violence” (Sunday Herald Sun, 21/9/14) is the perfect example of what makes any call for an equal focus on male suffering in any form an almost futile task in today’s society.

Any time a person is brave enough to suggest that our gender-specific campaigning against domestic violence (DV) is in fact a wrong and bigoted approach to a social problem, that person is received with sarcasm, mockery, belittlement, and scorn. This is why it takes such courage to speak up on behalf of men. Even many men disregard or entirely ignore the suffering of their own gender. This is not surprising because contrary to what many feminists would have us believe, it is the natural instinct of the vast majority of men to be far more concerned about protecting or saving women and children from harm than to be concerned about the violence or abuse perpetrated upon men.

Penberthy has taken issue with Gary Johns, who wrote an article decrying aspects of the anti–domestic violence movement. Johns took the brave stance of suggesting that violence against men needs to be acknowledged and addressed and that our focus on women only is imbalanced and unjust. Penberthy begins his article with a reference to members of the men’s movement as “petals” and then says Johns is far too intelligent to belong to such a movement.

It says so much about the blinkered, biased lens through which Penberthy views any discussion of gender and the issues men in particular are facing when his opening words call men who wish for more attention to be given to male victims of domestic violence “petals” and unintelligent.

Like many others who deride any suggestion that women abuse men in a manner that is comparable to male abuse of women, Penberthy paints a stereotypical picture:

> Those guys would have you believe there’s a whole army of browbeaten blokes out there, who despite being a good 30kg heavier and six inches taller than their better half, still live in fear of getting duffed up when she gets home from a hard night’s drinking with the girls.

This rather pathetic caricature is meant to make the average man or woman laugh at the very notion. Let me say a couple of things. It is a fact of life that many men who are far bigger than their wives are still physically and emotionally abused by their partner. Penberthy’s sneering attitude to this scenario is precisely why these men often endure this abuse in silence.

May I ask Penberthy what a man in this situation is to do? If he touches his abusive partner (even in defence), he will be facing jail time. This is something that has happened many times. Men who have been hit or attacked with a weapon have called the police and found themselves being handcuffed and taken away. There are no shelters for these men. Perhaps that is why the vast majority of our homeless are males.

The second issue I have with his statement is that there are many large, powerful women and small, passive men in our society. This idea that women are incapable of harming anyone with their petite fists is as mythical an idea as the “fact” that one in three women are bashed.

Every feminist, be they male or female, knows that when they say one in three women have been subjected to abuse, the true meaning of this statistic is so blurred by what constitutes abuse and the deliberate intent to inflate and confuse the public that it is totally meaningless.

We all know that, according to our government, you can be considered a victim of domestic violence if you have been grabbed, pushed, screamed at, had something thrown at you, had a door slammed in your face, had money withheld, or been slapped or been threatened by a partner. Yet Penberthy would have us believe this one in three is related to severe physical abuse.

A tiny proportion of DV is at this extreme end of the scale, but to say this would undermine the campaigns' deceitful message, which is*: a huge proportion of our women are in danger*. Natasha Stott Despoja said, "Violence against women is a national emergency!" In fact, as terrible as the murders of 50 women each year may be, this constitutes approximately 0.00036% of our female population. One death is a tragedy, but to call it an epidemic or national emergency is to misuse the English language. Approximately 2,000 males kill themselves each year. I have never heard this terrible fact referred to as a national emergency or epidemic.

This is a very deliberate, oft-repeated lie. If the same survey questions were given to men, we would come to the horrifying realisation that all men have suffered abuse under the vast umbrella definition of domestic violence.

I have a question for Penberthy. I have only ever heard spokesmen and women representing the campaigns against domestic violence tell us repeatedly that the problem is getting worse every year and at epidemic proportions. So here we have the "experts" in this field, through their own admission, telling us that after 40 years of relentless blaming of men for all domestic violence and the belief that it is all about male power and patriarchy, the problem is, in fact, escalating. Surely that is a signal that the current approach is a miserable failure and needs to be reviewed? But no–all we hear is a demand for more money and more attacks on men. We hear the same song over and over again.

Who is held to account for this outrageous failure? Perhaps DV needs to become a dark secret again because shining a light on it has only exacerbated the problem if what the leading experts of domestic violence tell us is true.

Here's another Penberthy comment that can only be classified as "absurd" bordering on insane. He refers to the deaths of a couple of children not being in vain because:

> … they have at least sparked a mature and important discussion between blokes about the way they act, the way their mates act, the way complete strangers can act.

What in God's name does this twaddle mean? I encounter men every day and have many mates and we have never once had a discussion about the way we act toward women or anyone else for that matter. We have expressed empathy and grief for the murder of these young kids. The only "discussions' about male behaviour I have seen have been in the pages or on the screens of our newspapers and TV shows where gutless male panellists shake their heads and make pseudo-serious noises about the problem with men.

Is Penberthy actually insinuating that the average bloke in the street is likely to murder his child or someone else's' child and a good talk with his mates will alert him to the inappropriateness of such behaviour? Perhaps he thinks most blokes give the missus the occasional backhander when she puts one too many sugars in his tea? Surely such a man will be set straight on this misunderstanding if his mates let him know that Andrew O'Keefe and Penberthy say this is not the way to behave. I suppose women have the same conversations among themselves when they read about another baby being murdered by its mum. "Girls, don't murder your babies … it's not a good thing to do."

Do any of the mental giants running these campaigns seriously believe if blokes have a good sit down and heart to heart with their mates the incidences of domestic violence will be greatly reduced? Is there any wonder why the campaigns have been such a disastrous failure? Surely, in order for a problem to be solved, we must understand what causes it in the first place?

Bill Burr nails this pertinent point in one of his routines:

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=AlvvCYUDHrQ&w=750&h=420

This is the childishly obscene method that has been used by those who work in the domestic violence industry for decades. The inference is that men who kill their wives or children do it because they can, or they want to assert their male superiority rather than an incredibly complex issue involving drugs, reciprocal violence, alcohol, and mental illness. It's just easier to say, "Men do it … because they are male and cannot control their violent and controlling tendencies."

Another aspect of Penberthy's approach that leaves me shaking my head is his use of statistics. Because more women are victims at the extreme end of the scale, this justifies the fact that men are entirely absent from any mention in any campaign about this "scourge," as many call it. Let's see how this logic would work if applied to other areas of concern in our society.

Clearly, any campaign on suicide would never mention women or girls. We would create entire campaigns about this horrific societal problem that focused entirely upon male victims of suicide. After all, men commit suicide at over three times the rate of women, and from the late teens to mid-twenties, it is six times the rate of female suicide.

Any campaign on workplace death and injury would exclude any mention of women. A whopping 93% of all workplace deaths are male, and one can only imagine the imbalance of victims when it comes to limb loss, paraplegia, broken bones, concussion, and other serious injuries leading to permanent or temporary disability.

Women would never be mentioned on Australia and New Zealand Army Corps (ANZAC) Day or any other day that commemorates those who served our country and made the ultimate sacrifice.

Homelessness would only focus on men because the vast majority of those wandering our streets—true homelessness—are males.

And yet … women are given equal status as victims in every one of the above-mentioned categories. The imbalance in the number of victims in most of these areas is a chasm compared with the gap in victims of domestic violence, yet women are not invisible at all. Why?

Penberthy again makes light of any suggestion that young men should have a campus officer at universities to care for the welfare of male students. Johns's column reminded him

> … of the nonsense arguments that used to be spouted at university by poncy types from private boys' schools about the fact that there was a campus officer to care for the welfare of female students.
> Well none of the blokes I hung out with at uni was ever date raped or felt up while they slept in their bed at a residential college, never flashed at by a naked woman as they walked through unlit parks to their car at night. None of the blokes I know turned up to work with a shiner and explained that they had walked in to a door.

How does Penberthy know what any of his peers experienced? Given his complete dismissal of and disdain for male suffering, why would anyone confide in this self-confessed gender bigot?

Note that the "poncy private boys' school" student didn't say we should get rid of the woman's officer for female students. He simply suggested we should have one for males. Cue the derision from Penberthy. It's akin to the "you must have a tiny penis" argument that feminists might use to shut the mouth of a man who questions their victim status. He doesn't argue—he mocks and belittles. His attitude goes to the very heart of the issues Johns was trying to address. Male suffering is a joke or simply unworthy of serious discussion as a relevant subject.

Young men face tremendous pressures in our universities, which have become more and more feminised in the past few decades. Some people would go so far as to label universities hostile toward males. The numbers of male graduates has been on a downwards spiral for years. If the reverse were true, I have no doubt Penberthy would be alerting us to this crisis. Most people are entirely unconcerned. The rate of suicide and depression alone would be grounds for young males to have a men's officer who focused on their welfare. Young men clearly face different problems and issues to females. Why would Penberthy object to an officer for men?

Penberthy mentions date rape and flashers and says no bloke ever turned up with a shiner and explained that they had walked into a door. In all my years at a teacher's college where the ratio of women to men was about 10 to 1, I never encountered one female with a shiner. I would suggest that Penberthy didn't either—but it sounds good, doesn't it? He again dismisses entirely the notion that males at unis may have been hit or abused by a female and kept it quiet.

And finally Penberthy dismissed Gary Johns's concerns about equity by saying he had "decided to be contrarian just for the sake of it."

Surely there could be no other reason as Penberthy knows that there is no money to be earned, no prestige to be accorded, no friends to be won by writing on behalf of men. Everyone knows this, so why would a man or woman be stupid enough to risk all of the derision and scorn, along with accusations of being a misogynist, by writing on behalf of men and questioning the feminist narrative that dominates our society? I think this quote from George Orwell says it all:

> Being in a minority, even in a minority of one, did not make you mad. There was truth and there was untruth, and if you clung to the truth even against the whole world, you were not mad.

Parental Alienation: Parent-Child reunification after alienation

Dr. Edward Kruk · 16 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The final installment of our three-part series on parental alienation examines programs, services, and interventions that combat alienation and seek to reunite estranged parents and their children while addressing the significant clinical challenges in working with alienating parents.

Children and parents who have undergone forced separation from each other in the absence of abuse, including cases of parental alienation, are highly subject to post-traumatic stress, and reunification efforts in these cases should proceed carefully and with sensitivity. Alienated children seem to have a secret wish for someone to call their bluff, compelling them to reconnect with the parent they claim to hate; despite strongly held positions of alignment, alienated children want nothing more than to be given the permission and freedom to love and be loved by both parents (Baker, 2010). Yet the influence of the alienating parent is too strong to withstand, and children's fear that the alienating parent may fall apart or withdraw his or her love holds them back. Research has shown that many alienated children can transform quickly from refusing or staunchly resisting the rejected parent to being able to show and receive love from that parent, followed by an equally swift shift back to the alienated position when back in the orbit of the alienating parent (Fidler and Bala, 2010). Thus while children's stated wishes regarding parental residence and contact in contested custody after divorce should be considered, they should not be determinative in cases of parental alienation.

Reunification efforts subsequent to prolonged absence should be undertaken with service providers with specialized expertise in parental alienation reunification. A number of models of intervention have been developed, the best-known being Warshak's (2010) Family Bridges Program, an educative and experiential program focused on multiple goals: allowing the child to have a healthy relationship with both parents, removing the child from the parental conflict, and encouraging child autonomy, multiple perspective-taking, and critical thinking. Sullivan's Overcoming Barriers Family Camp (Sullivan et al, 2010), which combines psycho-educational and clinical intervention within an environment of milieu therapy, is aimed toward the development of an agreement regarding the sharing of parenting time and a written aftercare plan. Friedlander and Walters' (2010) Multimodal Family Intervention provides differential interventions for situations of parental alignment, alienation, enmeshment, and estrangement. All of these programs emphasize the clinical significance of children coming to regard their parents as equally valued and important in their lives while helping enmeshed children relinquish their protective role toward their alienating parents.

In reunification programs, alienated parents will benefit from guidelines with respect to their efforts to provide a safe, comfortable, open, and inviting atmosphere for their children. Ellis (2005) outlines five strategies for alienated parents: (1) erode children's negative image by providing incongruent information; (2) refrain from actions that put the child in the middle of conflict; (3) consider ways to mollify the anger and hurt of the alienating parent; (4) look for ways to dismantle the coalition between the child and alienating parent and convert enemies to allies; and (5) never give up on reunification efforts. As much as possible, Warshak (2010) recommends, alienated parents should try to expose their children to people who regard them, as parents, with honor and respect, to let children see that their negative opinion, and the opinion of the alienating parent, is not shared by the rest of the world. This type of experience will leave a stronger impression than anything the alienated parent can say on his or her own behalf, according to Warshak.

As Baker (2010) writes, alienated parents acutely feel the hostility and rejection of their children. These children seem cruel, heartless, and devaluing of their parents. Yet it is important to realize that from the child's perspective, it is the targeted parent who has rejected them; they have been led to believe that the parent whom they are rejecting does not love them, is unsafe, and has abandoned them. Thus, the primary response of the alienated parent must always be one of loving compassion, emotional availability, and absolute safety. Patience and hope, unconditional love, being there for the child, is the best response that alienated parents can provide their children, even in the face of the sad truth that this may not be enough to bring back the child.

With alienating parents, it is important to emphasize that as responsible parenting involves respecting the other parent's role in the child's life, any form of denigration of a former partner and co-parent is harmful to children. Children's connections to each parent must be fully respected, to ensure their well-being, as children instinctively know, at the core of their being, that they are half their mother and half their father. This is easier said than done, as alienating parents are themselves emotionally fragile, with a prodigious sense of entitlement and need to control (Richardson, 2006), and thus pose significant clinical challenges. Yet poisoned minds and instilled hatred toward a parent is a very serious form of abuse of children. When children grow up in an atmosphere of parental alienation, their primary role model is a maladaptive, dysfunctional parent. It is for this reason that many divorce specialists (e.g., Fidler and Bala, 2010) recommend custody reversal in such cases, or at least a period of separation between a child and an alienating parent during the reunification process with an alienated parent. I have come to believe, however, that the means of combating alienation should not themselves be alienating, and that a non-punitive approach is most effective, with co-parenting being the primary goal. Thus engaging and involving the alienating parent in reunification programs, whenever possible, is critical (Sullivan et al, 2010).

Finally, it is often quite difficult to discern who is the alienating and who is the targeted parent in alienation cases. Thus, equal or shared parenting is clearly preferable to primary residence or sole custody orders in potential alienation cases, as courts are ill-equipped to assess the dynamics attendant to parental alienation, and co-parenting is preventive of alienation.

Feminism ... it sounds ... familiar ...

Elizabeth Finnegan · 17 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Note: This article is also available in Romanian.

On December 10, the woman who brought us such thought-provoking gems as Why Should I Have to Pay for Tampons? and You Can't Be a Feminist Because I Am has given us yet another taste of her very real and very traumatic oppression as a woman, in America, in 2014: wrapping Christmas presents. Posted within hours of articles detailing the intense emotional reaction Malala Yousafzai had to seeing her blood-soaked school uniform on display at Norway's Nobel Peace Center, Jessica Valenti, founder of Feministing.com and fluff columnist for The Guardian, unironically details the "gendered expectations" supposedly placed on women during the holiday season. Placed side by side with a 15-year-old girl who was literally shot in the head for wanting to be able to go to school, Valenti has single-handedly redefined the popular term "First World Problems."

I have been a fairly vocal critic of modern/radical feminism and, as a result, have seen some of the uglier sides of this "equality of the sexes" movement. A recurring topic, as highlighted so considerately by Valenti, is the need to find oneself oppressed, regardless of the situation. This is done in a variety of ways.

Undermining the Suffering of Others

It is a fairly common theme in society that people like to "root for the underdog." You want the smaller, weaker guy/gal/team to win. Unfortunately, this mindset results in people intentionally placing themselves into the position of the underdog. This is not possible without an opponent, however. In order to maintain your stance as society's David, you need a Goliath. In a recent article on FeministCurrent.com, founder Meghan Murphy bluntly asserted that male victims of rape are less victims than female victims of the same crime.

> But to say that "believing male victims" is a "feminist imperative" isn't actually true. As some feminist writers have pointed out, this kind of analysis fails to understand or acknowledge what feminism actually does. Feminism explicitly and necessarily is about understanding the fact that, and the way in which, men, as a class, oppress women, as a class. There is no equivalency in rape because men and women do not share similar experiences of gender oppression … because men do not, in fact, experience oppression because of their gender — women do.

She then goes on to make assumptions about the possible victim's upbringing in an attempt to further belittle the trauma he may have faced:

> Maybe LaBeouf was actually raped, I don't know. What I do know is that he wasn't socialized his whole life to mistrust himself and his own experiences; to be polite when strange women approach him, sexually harass him, or hit on him, lest he offend them; to believe that women have insatiable sexual urges that can't be controlled; that his primary role is to provide women with pleasure; and that he must fear violence from women at all times, whether he is in public or in private spaces.

Murphy ends with an assertion that, because she is a woman, she knows literally everything, beyond question:

> These are the facts. I know these things to be true because this reality is impossible to ignore if you pay any attention to media at all, because I am a woman and this is my life, and because I am a feminist and I understand the devastating impact patriarchy has on women and girls everywhere. And that is why, as a feminist, I believe women.

Calling "Dibs" on Being Hated

A sad, and fairly terrifying, trend currently dominating the minds—and Internets—of those attempting to sell the illusion of being "oppressed" is to act as though only they—and others physically similar to them—are capable of experiencing hatred. For radical feminists, this has manifested in the talking point of "there is no sexism against men."

This can be done by a) redefining a word in order to prove a point that does not stand up to scrutiny without first altering facts:

Anita Sarkeesian, host of Feminist Frequency

b) insisting that actual words don't exist because they harm your ability to be the sole victim:

Well, I don't like lupus. Maybe if I just say it isn't real, I won't have it anymore?
or c) publicly treating everything from a member of the "Goliath class" as a personal and vicious attack on your David:

Brianna Wu, head of development at Giant Spacekat

Fabricating and Exaggerating Additional Controversy

We live in a world where a new identity is a few short clicks away. When a member of the "oppressed kids club" is having a slow day, a fairly common occurrence is to either exaggerate or construct attacks in order to further paint yourself as a victim.

A sockpuppet is an online identity used for purposes of deception; false identity.

This sounds familiar …

The above examples, while seemingly rational to irrational minds, are also common symptoms of a very real, and very serious, psychological disorder: Munchausen syndrome. In those affected, there is such an intense need for attention, people are willing to lie, exaggerate, poison themselves, and even undergo unnecessary surgeries in order to garner the sympathy of others. Those suffering from the disorder will often feel the urge occur more severely when others are suffering, putting their own attention at risk.

I feel fully confident in saying modern radical feminism is the sociological manifestation of Munchausen. By constantly painting yourself as an oppressed person, as a victim in need of special protection or consideration, and by driving this point with an "ends justify the means" mentality, you are exhibiting the same symptoms as a Munchausen patient, especially in a world where true oppression exists—Malala, for example.

When you have to stretch reality beyond the point of tearing in order to find a way in which you are somehow victim to the boogeyman … when you have to spit in the faces of victims in order to continue your reign as Queen of the Oppressed … when it isn't just you, rather tens of thousands of people just like you … maybe it is time for an intervention.

A big one.

Syfy's "#Ascension, Chapter 2": 50 shades of bullshit

August Løvenskiolds · 17 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Author note: This review of Ascension, Chapter 2 includes spoilers of Chapter 1 as well as a few of Chapter 2. (Heh—the difference between a spoiler alert and a trigger warning: one respects your adult suspension of disbelief and the other treats you like a child.)—AL

Love it or hate it, passions about the December 15 airing of Ascension, Chapter 1 are running hot on Twitter:

> @andrearoth888 #Ascension is quite literally out of this world fantastic. Ready for night 2 on @SyfyTV, With a great cast!
> — Jerrod Perez (@neatnick9780) December 16, 2014

> #Ascension: @SyFyTV's idea of #PeytonPlace in SPAAACE! God what a lump of ludicrous dung to disgrace the tube.
> — Anon Kopimi (@AnonKopimi) December 16, 2014

The closing scene of Ascension, Chapter 1 revealed the overarching truth: the supposed intergalactic mission never left the Earth's surface and is, primarily, in year 51 of a 100-year sociological experiment in which the onboard participants have, ostensibly, no clue that their space journey is a hoax with ulterior motives.

For the science fiction viewer, this is a wretched letdown, a Wizard of Oz moment when we see behind the curtain and are disabused of any pretense that we are watching an epic of hard science fiction (or in the case of Oz a real wizard).

Luckily for me, studying the plot twists, gender issues, and occasional naked bottom was sustenance enough to keep me interested.

Chapter 2 is in some ways the plot of The Matrix: those inside the good ship Ascension are unaware that they are being monitored, studied, and occasionally manipulated by the Overseers (in essence, slave masters) in charge of the experiment. Mostly.

The Overseers must contend with a government investigation into the onboard murder of Lorelei. There is even a "blue badge," sort of like the blue pill of The Matrix, which restricts whom you can communicate with.

The outside world is unaware of both the ship and the experiment. Mostly.

Let's call these separate worlds the onboard Mission Control and the larger world.

Onboard Drama

In the onboard world, the murder of Lorelei was presumed solved by the spacing of the lower-caste Stokes and the forbidden gun he didn't know how to use, but Stokes has an unrevealed bastard son intent on using bombs, both to sabotage the mission and avenge his father—shades of Hamlet but closer to the bomb-happy Junior Green Goblin of the Spider-Man franchise, whichever you prefer.

As the ship approaches the putative point of no return, one explosion damages the ship's cooling system, causing the living quarters to overheat and the bevy of space floozies to shed even more of their clothing. Interestingly, the cheating wives seem to sense the vulnerabilities of their cheating husbands and begin to pull back a bit from their wayward ways. This emboldens the floozies to start making their own sexual power plays to dislodge some of the matriarchal dominance of the wives over their husbands. Yes, there are showgirls and, in fact, plot lines from Showgirls as well.

"Where are you going? Finish the massage, first." That's the line the naked fading beauty Viondra (Tricia Helfer) uses in the same breath as she fires a young meta-whore, "Jackie" (no kidding), who had dared to try to poach Viondra's husband, the captain. Yes, we get to see both women's issues, relational aggressions—and asses.

The real onboard power and currency among the upper decks is sex, sex, temptation, and more sex. The once mighty group of scientists and leaders has been undermined by boredom and conquered by hot vagina hedonism. Poor bastards.

Meanwhile, tweener Crista Wright, wee sister of the murdered Lorelei, is manifesting more and more seemingly telepathic powers, including remote viewing, mindreading, premonition, and post-cognition. Ah, Syfy, why do you always have to flirt with that pseudo-scientific chickbait bullshit? The plot is in real danger of becoming dominated by Crista's faux fey powers, wrecking whatever value this story might have had for those who enjoy speculative science or sociological intrigue.

Let's pull out some Tarot cards and check astrological charts while we are at it, shall we?

Mission Control Drama

The onboard ejection of accused murderer Stokes resulted in Stokes's traumatic entry into the modern world, a mind-shattering result that leaves him alive but psychotic and violent, yet restrained for the time being. More and more evidence piles up to indicate that Stokes is innocent.

Enter the feminist. In a bit of foreshadowing, an opening scene of Chapter 1 mentioned feminist Betty Friedan by name, and sure enough, in Chapter 2, a newcomer, ex-military Teutonic lipstick lesbian Samantha Krueger (not a feminazi at all, yeah; played with earnest sincerity by actress Lauren Lee Smith), bursts onto the scene, whining that the crew of Ascension has no civil rights.

Uh, that was the point of the 100-year experiment, but whatever.

Feminist Frau Krueger, in the deepest of ironies, is the only cast member not involved in massive conspiracies to hide the truth. She is relentless in seeking to break open the truth about the Ascension experiment (thereby destroying it) to reunite kidnapped children (now in their fifties) with their elderly parents. Frau Krueger lost her military career when she outed her own lesbianism at the end of the "don't ask/don't tell" era; she hasn't deployed her sexual wiles in the current story. Yet.

Very soon, however, she is canoodling with an outside world conspiracy nut who is also an attractive woman. Despite Anita Sarkeesian's lackluster efforts, Syfy has yet to drink the fat-chick Flavor-Aid, and for that we can be grateful.

Other Details of Interest

Ascension's initial crew complement depleted 70 top scientific minds from across the United States, creating a noticeable brain-drain and resulting in new technologies invented onboard to be co-opted by Mission Control for commercialization to further fund the mission. This included implantable birth control like Norplant, which fuels the sexual power struggle in both the ship and real life.

Despite the libertine atmosphere, marriage and reproduction onboard are strictly controlled: no one can give birth unless someone else has died. Four crew members (three men and one woman) have perished or left the ship in the first two chapters, a fact that has been noted but not exploited for reproductive politics—yet. Genetics of both potential parents are compared before legal births are authorized. Unauthorized pregnancies do occur, but the prospects for the offspring are grim.

Women dominate almost every scene—in numbers, they overwhelm the few men. The so-called Bechdel test (two women talking about something other than a man) is passed repeatedly.

Ejecting the dead is routine on the ship; Mission Control stores the cremains of hundreds of the crew.

The MGTOW-sounding phrase "Going Your Own Way" occurs about 49 minutes into the broadcast. The lead character and executive officer's name, "Aaron Gault," is suggestive of the Randian "Going Galt," meaning to abandon civilization in order to watch it burn to the ground.

In one telling scene, matriarch and captain's wife Viondra feigns annoyance when one of her lovers caresses her ass and then delivers a mildly painful swat as she saunters away. A wry smile would have better betrayed her satisfaction at having secured sexual and, hence, political domination over him. The feminist implications of this oversight are intriguing.

In Summary
While there is enough intrigue to keep me going, I can forgive science fiction purists for bailing out on this series. The 50 shades of bullshit power struggles and conspiracies are mind-numbing unless you are into that sort of thing. Is Ascension still a "Lifeboat for Humanity"?

Magic Eight-Ball says, "Murky—Try Again."

Rape accusations are all lies until proven otherwise

Paul Elam · 17 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

So help me Yahweh, the next time I hear some feminist dimwit like Zerlina Maxwell crowing about how we "must believe the victim," I am going to hack off one of my toes just to get my mind off the pain in my head from having to listen to this bullshit.

First of all, unless something has been proven in a court of law, the word "victim" should remain forever in scare quotes. You know why? Because we have something, however dwindling, called a criminal justice system. That carries with it certain principles, like the presumption of innocence.

Let me explain a little about what that means. I will try to break it down real simple-like, so that even rape journalists like Maxwell can comprehend it—when she isn't glassy-eyed with zealous misandry.

Presumed innocence means those exact words. Literally. It means that if you are sitting on a jury, or just sitting at your laptop or TV, you must assume that whoever is getting the finger pointed at them at the moment didn't do a damn thing. You must assume that they were just living their life, minding their own business, but for some reason that you know absolutely nothing about, they were scooped up by police and charged with a crime for which the prosecutor believed there was enough provable evidence to convict them beyond a reasonable doubt.

Until that conviction comes, they are legally and morally innocent.

Consequently, for the sake of justice, you must assume that the prosecutor is full of crap and is prosecuting someone for no apparent reason until he or she can provide you evidence so compelling and convincing that there is no reasonable doubt in your mind that the accused is actually guilty.

You must assume that whoever accusing them is doing so falsely, until you are convinced by the same solid, completely credible evidence that they are not lying. Until then, you must assume their accusation means nothing. That is what presumed innocent until proven guilty means. It means that you don't have a single iota of belief in the so-called "victim's" story until evidence forces you to believe otherwise.

That includes rape.

To be even clearer, there are no rape victims until it has been proven in a court of law. There are only "victims."

Even then, it can be quite questionable. Rape shield laws, rules on allowing convictions without forensic evidence, corrupt cops, corrupt prosecutors, and the built-in bias of jurors to protect alleged (female) "victims" already cast a shadow on the criminal justice system wide enough to cover a small country.

But that is just digressing for the moment because the court of public opinion is the topic at hand. We are now deluged with scores of two-bit rape journalism and ideological witch hunts in our university system. We have abandoned any sense of due process in the cultural narrative and yielded like zombies to insultingly stupid public outcries to believe anyone with a hangover and a fuzzy rape story, even if that story changes every five minutes.

Believe the "victim"? My ass. I don't believe in anything I have to put in scare quotes. And that is the way it is supposed to be in a society guided by laws and legal canons that are supposedly inviolable.

Instead of that society, we now believe "victims" until it is proven that they lied (and they lie for an encyclopedia full of reasons). Even then we hear feminists uttering nonsense like "even if they lied they were a hero for starting the conversation."

I actually saw that on Twitter recently regarding Rolling Stone's decline into the rape journalism cesspool. Fortunately, I don't remember the silly twit who tweeted it, but I am betting that a screenshot of it turns up in the comments to this article.

It is time we faced up to some facts, and I am growing ever more grateful that AVfM remains here as a place where things like facts can still be discussed.

Fact: Our culture has gone rape-crazy. Not with rapes but with the insistence that the crime happens about 500 times more than it actually does. Per rape academicians like Mary Koss, we are identifying rape "victims" even when they were reporting on surveys that they were not raped, even when they continued dating their "rapists" after the "rape." And we are publicly crushing the reputations of anyone who has the audacity to insist on that pesky thing we call proof before picking up a torch and pitchfork with everyone else.

We have a world full of Horace Gilmers while a smattering of Atticus Finches are reduced to writing blog posts that scores of people hold their nose while reading. It's as though their fake nobility raises them above the principles of law and common sense—because vagina.

Let me put it this way. I have an abundance of sympathy for rape victims, of either sex. Rape "victims"? Meh. Truth be told, I am pretty much sick and tired of hearing about them. And I am sick and tired of hearing them be called "survivors."

You have to be a victim to be a survivor. If you are a "victim," you are just someone with an unproven story, pointing a finger at someone who has not been proven to have done anything wrong.

Sorry, but that is the only way a system of justice can work unless you count gangs wearing sheets and carrying lots of rope as "justice."

Oh, and if you were "raped" but you reported it to your college administration and not to the police, then as far as I am concerned, you are doing a shit-poor job of even being a "victim." Your story could and should be used as fertilizer.

Reporting any violent crime, from muggings to assaults of varying degrees, can be an emotionally stressful, often embarrassing experience. It does not have to be a rape to be a hard process. I know that from personal experience. That is life for any real crime victim. Deal with it and start taking your life back. Sucking sustenance off the reflexive, gushing sympathies of others is a scam—no more, no less.

Having just enough courage to tell your college administration that you were raped, when you know that they will not give the accused a chance to even question you about your allegations, but too little courage to tell the police is a chicken-shit move that helps cast doubt on all alleged victims of this crime.

Give real victims a break. Tell the cops or shut the hell up.

If you won't even tell the police, don't expect people to pay for your "survivor" T-shirt or to give a rat's ass about why you are wearing it.

But hold out your tin can anyway. P.T. Barnum assures us that someone is born every minute who will toss in a dime.

Naomi Cahn and June Carbone's recipe for their own success

Jim Muldoon · 18 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

So two feminist law professors—Naomi Cahn and June Carbone—wrote a book, Marriage Markets: How Inequality is Remaking the American Family. In order to get some publicity for it, they wrote an article that Slate published under the headline "Just Say No: For white working-class women, it makes sense to stay single mothers."

But "makes sense" for whom? For fathers, the intent is to keep them out of their child's lives. Is it for the fatherless children? The single mothers? Other married mothers?

Or what about the professors themselves?

Autonomy and independence
Cahn and Carbone give us the example of Lily and Carl, supposedly two real people from the professors' chosen demographic. Lily is the classic example of what Peter Allemano dubbed the Bold Independent Woman of Today (BIWOT). Carl, on the other hand, was a Deadbeat long before he became a Dad.

To ensure her independence, Lily breaks up with Carl when she is four months' pregnant. To call this independence, however, is delusional. Lily is quoted at stating:

> I can support myself. I always have. I can support myself and our kid. I just can't support myself, the kid, and him.

From this statement we are supposed to infer that Carl is a failure. However, to be determined a success, Carl would have to do what Lily can't—support himself, the kid, and her.

But how does Lily support herself and the kid? There's no mention of child support, although how she would otherwise gain welfare is not discussed. She gets assistance from her parents, which is not the same as independence. But these are only two aspects of Lily's ersatz autonomy:

> … programs such as Medicaid, food stamps, early childhood education and child care, mandatory family leave, and other policies that make it easier for women like Lily to raise a child on their own.

As Allemano makes clear, the BIWOT term is ironic.

The deadbeat Carl
But what about this Carl character? He is like Homer Simpson without the funny bits.

> Carl, however, was not at the hospital with Lily and his paternity has never been established.

The implication here is that Carl chose not to be at the hospital. Perhaps we are to forget that Lily broke up with Carl while she was pregnant. Are the feminists now suggesting that Carl should have stalked Lily for several months and then barged into the delivery room demanding his rights?

As for getting his rights, the authors point to the fact that Carl's unmarried status stacks the odds very much against him. So can he overcome the odds?

> If Carl were that organized and determined, though, he didn't show it during their relationship.

No, Carl has no redeeming features. And, apparently, it's not just bad luck that caused Lily to hook up with such a dud.

> The women ready for marriage in this group have grown larger than the group of marriageable men who would > be good partners.

It seems that Lily will have as difficult a time in finding a “good partner” as Carl would have getting access to his child.

> Lily did go out for a while with a more promising high school classmate. But then she discovered text messages with another woman on his phone.

Was Carl just as “promising” at one stage?

Something about Lily
So why did Lily, this wise, canny BIWOT, have unprotected sex with Carl?

Was Carl a rising star in a legal firm who woke up one morning with an entire personality transplant? Did he, overnight, switch from a “more stable” life to exhibiting a preference for debt and chaos?

Could it be that Lily didn’t care about what kind of person Carl was? Could it be that Lily was choosing the single mother option from the very beginning?

Surely not! No, Lily, because of class, has been reduced to fishing in the shallow end of the gene pool and, now pregnant, has given up looking for Mr Right.

> Nor does she believe that she will meet someone who will meet her standards anytime soon, and the statistics back her up.

Proof positive that Lily is not at fault.

Indeed, we are to assume that Lily would be a fine catch for any young, stable, gainfully employed, career-oriented man. Yes, a man who didn’t mind his wife checking through his phone for unapproved text conversations. A man who didn’t care that she was willing to have unprotected sex with a deadbeat like Carl.

A man who didn’t mind that the only reason Lily would allow him to have a relationship with his own child is that she can’t get a better deal anywhere else.

The phony marriage
This, of course, only leads to the question of how these two professors view marriage itself and the values that inform their judgments of Carl and Lily.

> Lily … believes that marriage means an unqualified commitment to the other spouse. When you marry someone, you support him in hard times. You stick with him when he disappoints you. You visit him if he ends up in jail. And you encourage him to become an important part of your children’s lives.

So Lily, according to the professors, has a conservative view of marriage. It’s all about doing the hard yards. Cue Tammy Wynette and “Stand by Your Man.”

> It’s just that Lily doesn’t believe that Carl is worth that commitment.

I find the same thing with digging. It is good, honest hard work. I approve of it. I recommend it. I sing its praises. Right up until someone hands me a shovel.

Suddenly, I remember an important appointment and I’ve got to go.

But do the professors share Lily’s penchant for other people getting married, even if it’s too hard for Lily herself? On the contrary:

> Those who would promote marriage seek to do so largely by taking away Lily's independence.

They then go on to give some scathing criticism of the conservative voices who would encourage or even demand that Lily be a dutiful wife to Carl's patriarchal leadership.

So, if they didn't believe that Lily should marry Carl in the first place, why all the baloney about how few suitable men there were? To understand this, we must first make a digression into an issue that might have bothered some readers from the beginning.

Why the racist element?

The un-racist racist element
The authors are clear that they are only referring to White, low-income women. This is because single mothers are already a large demographic in the Black communities of America. There is no need for the professors to encourage these women to eschew marriage for a life of "independence." Their focus here is to encourage the White sisters to follow where their other sisters have led. But why?

There are strong links between single motherhood and poverty. This is as true today as it always has been—and has been extensively documented. In America, it is currently true for non-White single mothers. So, will this move to encourage more White single mothers help anyone else? Or will it just impoverish White women equally?

To understand its attraction, we must not look at it from the point of view of the single mother. We must look at it from the point of view of feminist lobbying groups.

The real attraction of the single mother
What is it that gives Lily her "independence"? On her own, single and childless, she truly is as independent as Carl will ever be. But once she has a child, she becomes a welfare magnet.

This, of course, is where all the Carls of this world come in. They don't have the resources to stop the need for welfare, but they have the sperm to create it.

And welfare magnets need more than welfare. They need offices to administer it. They need social workers to advise them how to claim it and how to spend it. They need government programs to provide it, with advisers to tell the government what programs to set up and how they can fund it. They need charities and non-government organisations to lobby for it so they can extend it with their own programs. They need lawyers to recommend legislation for it. They need researchers to determine how effective it is, how it needs to be modified, and academics to give the programs their expert approval.

They need an industry that stretches from Lily's local town council to the United Nations and back again.

Lily herself will make no difference, but for every 1,000 Lilys with their hands independently out, the state will employ a proportion of the above cast of thousands. Grants will be made available for charities and NGOs to aid all those independent mothers. Private individuals and corporations, moved either by the plight of single mothers or the opportunity for good publicity, will donate by the bucket load. For activists there will be a feminist funding frenzy to ensure Lily gets all the help she needs to need more help tomorrow.

For men like Carl, of course, the professors have no real interest. His kind does not invoke much public sympathy. Even 10 times as many Carls won't generate as many jobs for the social justice warriors. Carl can donate sperm, child support, and taxes and be glad they don't take more.

And for every child who grows up in a single-mother household, there will be more Lilys and Carls for generations to come.

Nancy Kaffer: Men run all of “the things”

Paul Elam · 18 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The Daily Beast has made another foray into the Men’s Rights Movement, this one even more obnoxious and laughable than the last.

Nancy Kaffer penned “Men Need a Better Men’s Rights Movement,” subtitled “The world is changing, and men really could use a movement—just not the misogynistic, conspiracy-minded one they have now.”

The title work was either Kaffer or some editor, but either way the very idea that men need a movement—and thus the entire alleged premise of the article—was eviscerated by the author in the first few lines:

> The first time I heard the phrase “men’s rights movement,” I think I rolled my eyes. And I probably rolled them pretty hard, because come on: Men have all of the rights. They control all of the things: The U.S. Congress, corporations, banks, Hollywood, governments, all of the money and power and launch codes in the world.
> Men, particularly white, heterosexual men, are undeniably in charge.

Yeah, Nancy, we men control all of, uh, “the things.” Brilliant articulation, by the way. Still, one has to wonder how any of those cisgender, snowy-white brutes even consented to letting you voice an opinion in such a prominent venue as The Daily Beast. How did you get away with speaking such raw truth to the real power? Did you have to fetch coffee or maybe “retrieve” something from under your white male heterosexual boss’s desk?

It is hard to imagine that anything you think could be true, since it is you, in fact, doing the talking. Just wondering, is all.

Kaffer tries to clarify herself in the next sentence:

> But take a few steps back from the echelons of power—and the elite corridors that lead to said echelons—and the picture isn’t so pretty.

Okay, Nancy, so you have now described the other 99.9% of the male population. And you are right, the picture there isn’t so pretty. In fact, for many it is downright ugly and treacherous. So pardon me if I question your impulsive need to cast a blanket of implied privilege and power over an intended miniscule percentage of men as though it is even remotely relevant to the issues faced by the rest of us.

Nancy Kaffer, oppressed and outraged.

While Kaffer seems to possess a limited inkling of awareness that the Men's Rights Movement is here for a reason, she also demonstrates quickly that her insight will remain forever limited and useless.

The tactic of feminists for the past half-century is to view the upper crust of all men, a micro-fraction of the population, with the implication that it somehow defines all of us.

They do the same at the other end of the bell curve. We are all tainted by the extreme minority of men who are violent and dangerous, not to mention financially unviable.

It just depends on which part of the victim narrative they want to cash in on at the moment. If the alleged glass ceiling is the issue, then we men are all captains of industry. If raising money for the domestic and sexual assault industry, then we men are all thugs and deviants.

Standard, shopworn feminist skullduggery aside, those of us in between the extremes are the ones who need a men's movement. Lo and behold, we are coincidentally the ones who are making it happen, with equal participation from women who don't want you to define what they should be either.

Reality's a bitch, innit?

Kaffer then goes on to do what any good propagandist does with sufficient brio to make Goebbels proud. She acknowledges some very superficial truths about men's issues, then she pares it all down to men needing to do more for women, and ultimately concludes:

> Men, it seems, do need a movement. Just not the one they have.

Or that they will ever have, Nancy. The men's movement you want already has a name. It's called feminism. But the movement for men you don't like, the one that actually concerns itself with men's very real problems, is on the way up while yours is on the way down.

That is precisely why you wrote your stupid hit piece, even if you are too obtuse to be aware of it or aware enough to know that the glaring ignorance of people like you has been increasing our ranks for a long time.

And so the saga continues, folks, and the narrative continues to shift. Now we actually do need a men's movement, just one that this poor, oppressed woman who writes for The Daily Beast will find redeeming and, more importantly, useful to the movement to which she already belongs.

Is that too much to ask for? Uh, yeah. In fact, it ranks as one of the stupidest requests in modern history.

This is ultimately gratifying to me on a very personal level. I love watching feminists scramble pathetically. I can just imagine Nancy Kaffer storming around her office, wearing a monocle and wielding a swagger stick, barking about how we must do something about the "men's rights threat."

And I love watching them getting it so very, very wrong. I could have spent a good part of this writing explaining to Ms. Clueless about how the men's movement predates modern feminism and that there is much more to our understanding of men's issues than just a bunch of ideologues who hate us with their vaginas.

I could point to a ton of material by men's rights activists (MRAs) that quickly demonstrates that our understanding of gender roles, sexual politics, and history is much more informed and nuanced than they teach in women's studies.

But we are here to educate men and women who want answers more than they want dogma or compliance.

I do recommend reading Kaffer's full piece on The Daily Beast, though. It is hysterical to watch her imagine that she is brilliant and cutting edge as she recycles the same garbage that most thinking people took out a decade ago.

The Ms. Ann syndrome

Mumia Ali · 18 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

> The Blackman has always been held up for public evaluation and scrutiny, whereas this has never been the case for the Blackwoman. In fact, the Blackwoman has been shielded, protected from such public evaluation; they are a protected class in this way.—Shahrazad Ali

While much has been said, written, and studied about Black America more generally, and certain aspects and sectors of it more specifically (for example, the "hood" or ghetto precincts and its denizens), what hasn't received as close a look are the inner workings, motivations, and psychology of a small but rather vocal and, to some extent, influential group of African Americans: Black feminists. While they've been around since at least the early 1970s, there has to date been no attempt to delve into what makes them as a group tick, to attempt to explain why they do what they do.

Until now.

In this article, I will lay out my particular take on the psychology of the Black feminist, where it comes from, and, finally, how it manifests in real time today—what I refer to as the Ms. Ann syndrome. It is, if I do say so myself, an unprecedented look into the psyche of a particular sort of Black woman in Black America.

So let's get right to it.

The Bougie Sista Mindset

As Roosh so eloquently put it in his recent article "What Is A Social Justice Warrior?" those who make it their life calling in our time to "right wrongs" almost always come from an "alt" or "unconventional" background; indeed, such people regard their "otherness" as a kind of badge of honor, imbuing them with special superpowers that make it possible for them to lord it over everyone else. When it comes to Black feminists, via the superpower of intersectionality, they can claim a unique oppression: they're not just women but they're Black women, and in some cases they're queer Black women, and in many cases they're "plus-sized,"unconventionally attractive Black women, and … well, you get the idea.

But what they don't tell you is the following:

They're very often not very attractive Black women, at least not in terms of what most of the Black men who matter would think of when asked to give their idea of such a sista who fits the description. And it is not making the select brotha's cut that really puts a bee in the Black feminist's bonnet.

Now, of course, they'll deny this, but the sheer volume of their screeching in protest really tells you all you need to know on this score—they care deeply what select brothas—the Mr. Bigs of Black America—think of them. If this wasn't the case, they would have never come out with ridiculous drivel like "Black male privilege"—yet another smokescreen for Black feminists crying sour grapes.

Anyway, let's discuss the essential mindset that animates the Black feminist. It is informed by hailing from at least nominally middle-class and increasingly upper-middle-class backgrounds. They tend to attend "White" schools—either parochial or private schools outright or, in the case of public schools, those that tend to be suburban and "magnet" in orientation. Moreover, they tend to take classes in which the majority of their classmates will not be Black, and this will tend to be the case going all the way through their graduate studies (if anyone out there can hip me to well-known Black feminists who have attended predominately Black schools/universities, by all means do so; to the best of my knowledge, this simply is not the case).

Of course, their experience as feminists, like just about everything else in their lives, is defined in "White" terms; after all, feminism came about as a direct result of the actions of White women and continues to be defined along those lines, despite almost a half-century of teeth-gnashing, feet-stamping, and "me too!"ing on the part of Black feminists themselves. From their high school and/or college years when they're first cutting their teeth on feminist ideology, they do so in the shadows of their White "sisters"—who regard them as little more than stepsisters up in the attic, in truth of fact.

But perhaps the most impactful experience for the Black bougie sista turned Black feminist is life after graduation from college and heading out into the working world. Most sistas of this class tend to work in "do-gooder" professions—nonprofit, health care, certain types of law, and, more generally, academia. And it is here that they, once again, are surrounded by Beckys and Rachels, where they "live" cheek by jowl with them. The sistas that become Black feminists see the world of Becky and Rachel and see the possibilities—of being able to be adored, protected, and catered to by the whole of society. They marvel at how their White "sisters" can explore themselves sexually—even to the point of making horrendously boneheaded mistakes in doing so—and none of that is held against them, professionally or otherwise. For example, Becky and Rachel can hook up like mad in school and shortly thereafter, and they can still "get their Chad", i.e., get a (relatively) conventionally attractive, educated, and successful White guy willing to go on bended knee and put a ring on it (compare and contrast to brothas, regardless of where they fall on the socioeconomic status (SES) spectrum, who aren't exactly the marrying kind among America's men). Many sistas in this strata know and understand well that if they give off even the hint of being a ho, they can and will forfeit their pass to the better-off brothas: they may like it, but they ain't gonna put a ring on it.

Think about this for a moment—put yourself into Danielle's or Tanya's shoes. For most of their lives, they have lived as "aliens" among Whites generally, and White women in particular; oh, they may play a role in their lives but rarely anything more than a bit part, so to speak. Wouldn't you want more for yourself too?

A Mistake of the Intellect

Of course, the problem here is that Black feminists haven't put anywhere near enough thought into their ideology, thinking that all they need to do is mix 'n' match elements of White feminist "thought." For example, take the idea(?) of patriarchy—if one accepts the (White) feminists' premise, it then raises powerful questions as to how this applies to the American Black man, who has never had, and doesn't now have, patriarchal control over his woman. In fact, it has long been a matter of common knowledge that Black America is decidedly matriarchal in configuration, function, and outlook. Black feminists never really address this glaring hole in their "argument," instead attempting to sidestep the whole thing by tossing the red herring of so-called "Black male privilege" onto the table, yet another White feminist ideological knockoff (by discussing "White straight male privilege"). Again, Black men writ large have not and cannot be said to possess "privilege" in any way that would be considered meaningful, and again, upon closer inspection of the facts, it is revealed that if anyone in Black America enjoys "privilege," it is Black women themselves, seven ways to Sunday—from presidential attention and caring about their health and wellness concerns to that same presidential laser-like focus when a Black girl is killed, which raises the profile of her death to such an extent that her killers are swiftly apprehended by local police. Compare and contrast to President Obama's tepid responses to the verdicts in the cases of Trayvon Martin, Michael Brown, and Eric Garner; and Obama could barely finish unveiling his My Brother's Keeper initiative before the Black feminist coalition jumped down his throat for daring to suggest that any attention be given to the plight of Black men at the Oval Office level. There are many more examples.

Undaunted, Black feminists continue to make the case(?) that Black female lives are somehow not just substandard when compared with Black males' but also that said Black males are themselves the direct cause and reason for the deplorable conditions of Black female lives—this, despite the fact—FACT—that Black women themselves call the shots in every demonstrable way in Black American life. That Black feminists have been able to get this far on such a flimsy, weak-sauce "argument" really does beggar belief.

The Ultimate Goal: To Be Ms. Ann—What Else?

Of course, the ultimate goal of Black feminists—de facto White women who aren't attractive enough to get the attention of select Black men (or successful enough to swim in the same social orbit waters in order to get close enough to them)—is to somehow ape enough White feminist cant to qualify as quasi–Ms. Anns themselves. This explains all of the squawking on the part of Black feminists of late around so-called "issues" like "street harassment" (which the White outrage outfit Hollaback! recently proved, by hoisting themselves on their own petard, is a bunch of bunk) because Black feminists are trying to say that they're exactly like the Ms. Anns of the social justice warrior world, when all available evidence, from what little has been academically conducted to what one can glean with one good eye out on the streets for themselves, says otherwise. The sad truth is, like Blanche DuBois in A Streetcar Named Desire, Black feminists aren't the people they think they are, and no one is going along with the charade—which explains how and why Black feminists themselves continue to get short shrift from their own "sisters" time and again, as recently as a month and half ago. After all, if Hollback! really thought Black women mattered, they'd have included them in their big media video too, now wouldn't they?

In summation, the entire project that is Black feminism is really an elaborate smokescreen that runs interference for the fact that there is a not insignificant number of Black women in our time who are deeply envious of White women, want what they have, and have set out to try out "Ms. Ann" herself … which, by all accounts, hasn't gone over very well.

As per usual, Black women are attempting to do everything but accept themselves for who and what they are and stand up for, and with, the very people in America they should most be able to trust: Black men. But, I fear at this juncture, that they may have alienated far too many brothas to make a difference.

I sure do hope that I'm wrong.

Review: Putting the “ass” into Syfy’s “#Ascension, Chapter 3”

August Løvenskiolds · 18 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Author’s note: This review contains spoilers of all three chapters of the Syfy channel’s Ascension three-day series. Lots and lots of them. My review of Chapter 1 can be found here. My review of Chapter 2, here. It is recommended you read all three reviews in order.

If you feel like Syfy’s miniseries Ascension is a scam, a colossal fraud, a bait-and-switch con game—well, then you are correct, and on many levels too. The Sci-Fi Channel was once a reliable source of quality science fiction, but eventually it morphed into Syfy, full of psychic quacks and other unwatchable rubbish. Ascension seemed to be following this pattern during the three-day run. Whether it can redeem itself is now an open question.

Ascension is a deeply nested, recursive maze of lies and political machinations. The viewer is hoaxed just as the characters in the story are hoaxed: with multiple misdirections—feints within feints within feints, and a few more feints just for fun.

As the convolutions degrade the storyline from mind-blowing to annoying to just boring, enough hot sex and nudity (a well-lit skinny-dipping scene at about minute 34, for example) are tossed in to alter the viewer’s focus and keep one involved, sort of like how a manipulative lover will give you just enough hope to keep your passions burning—or a fisherman might jiggle a baited hook.

In my review of Chapter 1, I noted that Ascension had something for everyone: “a murder mystery, a period piece about the early 60s, a government conspiracy, a crew rumbling toward mutiny, a seemingly psychic tweener, a social commentary that crosses 50 years.”

To that list we can now add an espionage story, a sexual morality play, a prison escape yarn, a death camp opus, an old-style horror flick, Mission: Impossible, Teen Mom, ALF, and The Ghost Whisperer. Additionally, the relational violence between the feminist lesbians leads to one of them killing the other (no real surprise to Men’s Rights Advocates familiar with the overwhelming levels of deadly violence in feminist and lesbian couples).

Chapter 3 opens with an annual shipboard ritual know as “Ostera” (or maybe “Ostara”), a pagan, goddess-centered fertility rite wherein the process of replacing the year’s dead crewmates begins with the announcement of birth authorization—official permission for the lucky selected couples to procreate. Despite four crew deaths, only three couples are chosen because one of the dead (Dwight) was an unauthorized bastard birth and so not worthy of replacement under the ship’s rigid protocols.

The fertility ceremony is marred when a sex tape of the captain and the not-dead-then Lorelei is played on the main display. The captain and his wife face a vote of no confidence and a twisted power struggle now that their wholesome public image is tarnished. Yes, even though everyone is fucking everyone on the ship, there is still a threadbare layer of propriety, much like highly religious societies that force seedier human desires underground.

And to top off the fertility theme of this chapter, we have the “Star Child” from 2001: A Space Odyssey. Yes, the aptly named tweener character Crista is “the anomaly,” a Christ-like (or Neo-like) figure of vast divine power, making this a born-in-a-pigs-n-chickens-manger starship Nativity tale as well. Crista can read minds, summon the ghost of her dead sister (who seems to have had some of the same mental powers as well), perform telekinesis (often with massive violence à la Firestarter), vaporize bodies, and even teleport you light-years across the galaxy—or maybe the universe—to a habitable planet only Crista knows about. Of course, you’ll have nothing to survive with on that planet except the clothes on your back and whatever rocks and mud you can find. Perhaps Crista will fashion you a wife from your rib, or something.

The birth of Crista and others like her was the deep goal of the Ascension mission-experiment. A cult-like religious group (of whom we get only a hint) creates a multigenerational breeding program (sort of like if one could recombine the descendants of Jesus from The Da Vinci Code) that is hidden inside a fake sociology experiment inside a faked intergalactic science mission. This is eugenics on nuclear steroids, a breeding of superior humans to produce god-like ultra-beings, of which Crista and the deceased Lorelei are the current pinnacle. In the next generation, will we get a child like Q from Star Trek: The Next Generation?

In the course of Chapter 2, we got to overhear the quasi-religious matriarchal oath of allegiance that the whorish stewardesses took, pledging "body and soul" as "We are the Wife, Mother, and Caregiver to All." The matriarchy assumes full power in Chapter 3, both on board Ascension and in the Mission Control group that oversees the experiment. During the final crisis, the captain's wife fights off an attempted sexual assault by a lower-caste man (teach lower deckers not to rape, you idiots) and takes command of the ship's bridge because all the real men are off doing the dirty work trying to save the dying environmental systems.

Meanwhile, in Mission Control, lifelong mission manager Harris Enzmann (End's Man?) wore a shirt with nekked babes on it (or something) and is now facing removal and execution by the sinister higher goddess powers, represented by the ruthless Catherine. Harris escapes through a harrowing series of accidents and maneuvers to toss Catherine and her wicked cellphone into the void, much like Gollum and the ring splashing into the lava inside Mount Doom. The King has returned, maybe.

Lesbian investigator Samantha manages to break former crewman Stokes out of Mission Control, but not before Stokes learns of the death of his bastard son. Samantha is wounded, Stokes has no experience in the modern world ("Everything is cocooned in plastic!"), and so they must call on Samantha's new conspiracy-nut girlfriend to help get Stokes out of the country. They are betrayed by the girlfriend, but Stokes manages to flee on his own, a stranger in a strange land.

Ascension ends with lots of dead bodies and loose ends, enough so that we can expect a regular series to spring up eventually if the Syfy folks get their soap opera act together and feminists don't object that Ascension lays bare the truth that women dominate the hidden power structures in society. Will they? Many of the names of the Ascension characters (like Gault and Denninger) seem to be patterned after similar names (Galt and Danniger/Danneskjold) in Ayn Rand's novel Atlas Shrugged.

So, whatever.

25 men talking crap about male privilege: Part 1

How much did feminism cost Romania in 2014?

Lucian Vâlsan · 19 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article first appeared on AVFM Romania.

Taxpayers' money tends to be the main funding source for the feminist ideological program and Romania is no exception to this rule. So we tried to calculate just how much money the Romanian state spent on purely ideologically driven projects or on projects meant to help women and only women, even when there is no need for any help, as stated by the would-be helped women themselves. We will, at least at first, exclude the EU funds, although those amounts should also be included in a broader analysis since this country is a net contributor, at least according to some economists.

The greatest part of these useless and resource-wasting projects comes from the POSDRU[note 1] line of EU funding. Since the list of useless projects is very long, we won't include them by name here, but we will provide the documents from where we gathered the numbers so readers can make the calculations themselves if one thinks that we messed up the numbers or we are exaggerating.

First, we'll take the list of POSDRU contracts signed until July 31, 2014[1], and add the numbers from the column "buget național" (national budget) of all the projects that are finalized (see the last column in the table) and explicitly mention women or we have data to support that they're feminist-oriented.

Also, please notice that there is no project dedicated to men and the word "men" appears exactly twice in all the 173 pages of the table: once in the name of the National Agency for Equality of Opportunity between Women and Men and once in the name of a suggestively named project "Interactive lesson for women and men. How are women like?" which by itself swallowed over 1 million Romanian lei (henceforth referred to simply as lei) from taxpayers' pockets—1,057,986.21 lei, to be more precise (see p. 142).

Huge piles of cash were spent on various projects, one more asinine than the other, such as "The social inclusion of women," which gives the impression to anyone reading the list that women here live somehow beneath the country and are not the sex that controls two major powers: the justice system and the press.

Going through all the lists is in and of itself funny. This is how you find out that the state spends half a million euros on a project called "The Woman—genesis, patriarchy, leadership" (p. 146).

From this table alone, we reach the amount of 80,187,334.26 lei, which is almost 18 million euros. And from this calculus, the projects that listed as 0 (zero) the amount received from the national budget but that still got money from city halls, county councils, and other state agencies are missing.

On December 16, 2014, the POSDRU organism published the list of projects to be financed this year[2], and on this list there is only one project that fits what we're looking for—and that is the project "Fidelis" (no. 11 in the table), which swallows from the state 3,704,501.21 lei, meaning a little over $1 million, or almost 830,000 euros. That's not much, right?

We asserted earlier that some of these projects have actually consumed more from taxpayers' money than what is stated in the "national budget" column in the POSDRU central documents. One such example is the project "Equality and access on the labour market," whose beneficiary is the Alba County Council[3], and when we look in the third column—the one called "contribuție beneficiar" (the beneficiary's contribution)—we see that 43,200 lei from the taxpayers of Alba county were directed toward the little project about nothing implemented by the county council[4].

Numerous other projects are in the same situation, with beneficiaries being state universities, various do-nothing state agencies, and other state institutions in which, by virtue of not being profitable, it is clear that they've covered the "beneficiary's contribution" also using taxpayers' money. Also in this situation are the projects initiated by pseudo-unions like Agrostar (who have a de facto subscription to money from the Ministry for Agriculture) or the National Syndicate Block, which exists and acts as anything but a private union or entity.

So we went again through the list, this time paying attention to the projects whose beneficiary is a state institution and adding the amounts in the third column from the "beneficiary's contribution." Through this process, we reached the amount of 9,296,644.19 lei, which is a little over 2 million euros. That's nothing, right?

Identifying the obviously sexist projects from the POSDRU list is in and of itself quite complicated. For instance, the project called "Three generations for tomorrow,"[5] which swallowed 230,941.47 lei from taxpayers, is presented in the press and its literature as being exclusively dedicated to the women of Bucharest. But nothing in the name or in the list suggests such a thing. So more research was needed.

The same goes for many of the projects initiated by the National Union of Public Servants (which despite its name is not a union but an institution subordinated to the Ministry of Finance), which is selling its sexist projects to the public as being "novel,"[6] yet it adopts neutral names like "Solidarity through social dialogue," which makes their identification as ideological projects more difficult.

In the same situation, we have the project called "CoRes,"[7] which swallowed 229,606.69 lei from the national budget[8], although nothing from its name suggests that it's a gynocentric project. And examples like this go on and on. This is why we assert that the amounts we calculated do not represent the entire dimension of the taxpayer money hemorrhage that took place this year alone.

But EU-funded projects aren't the only excuse that our government is using to waste public funds in a discriminatory fashion. "The multi-annual national programme for the development of entrepreneurial culture amongst women in managerial roles from the SME[note 2] sector" (gee, that's a long name!) is a local scheme[9] that consumed this year 500,000 lei—because we all know that female managers are terribly oppressed by the patriarchy because that's why they became managers in SMEs … oh … wait. Never mind.

You will probably tell me that half a million lei is not a big amount, but that doesn't change the fact that the amount was entirely wasted. Besides, the maximum eligible amount for each applicant (41,500 lei) is enough to buy a small flat in a modest town in Romania or enough for a deposit for a highly advantageous bank loan to buy a nice flat in a city. Is it really that radical to suggest that managers of private companies (female or male) should not be eligible for state welfare of the equivalent of an apartment?

Also, from the series of taxpayer money spent in a gynocentric fashion, there is the Tecuci Town Hall, which spent 55,550 lei to award 1,111 women from the town for their fantastic accomplishment of breathing as women in the town of Tecuci[10]. Seriously! You can't make this stuff up!

Is it really that radical to suggest that that amount of money would've been better invested in renting two more snowplowing machines? We're just saying that with five machines instead of three, the citizens of the small town from Galați county wouldn't be forced to swim through snow for longer periods of time, nor would they be at an increased risk of breaking limbs on the sidewalks in these December days[11].

And now let's do the math.
Without claiming to have identified all the amounts that taxpayers paid in this sector, let's see at least a very conservative number regarding how much the feminist ideology did cost taxpayers this year.

Description	Amount (Lei)
Total "contributions national budget"	80,187,334.26
The "Fidelis" project	3,704,501.21
"beneficiary's contribution" when the beneficiary is the state	9,296,644.19
Money for lady SME managers	500,000.00
Tecuci, March 8	55,550.00
GENERAL TOTAL	93,744,029.66

That's 21 million euros. Is that a lot? Or not really? Let's put the number into perspective.

How much does this practically mean?
First of all, we shall mention once again that this is only money taken straight from taxpayers and given to feminist causes—without going through the terribly inefficient bureaucratic apparatus of the European Union. Considering that the difference between Romania's contribution to the EU budget and that funds that come back to the country are minuscule (that much everyone agrees on, regardless of political persuasion), the real amount is far-far-far higher—somewhere around 200 million euros. But we'll focus only on this smaller amount, which is more obvious, to avoid any arguments.

The state estimates that in order to build a school with eight classrooms, roughly 360,000 euros ought to be spent[12]. Let's say, for the sake of the argument, that when we add the corruption costs inherent to any bureaucracy, the costs go up to 500,000 euros. However, even with that, we're still left with the fact that with only the money wasted this year on feminist projects, the state could've built 42 schools with eight classrooms that are ideal for the rural areas. Is that a lot? Or is it nothing?

On average, a Romanian pupil costs the state roughly 2,360 lei a year[13]. We won't make value judgments on whether the amount is too big or too small. But by doing the math, we come up with the fact that with only the money wasted in 2014 on feminist projects, the state could've funded the education of 39,722 pupils, which is far-far more than the total number of pupils who abandon school because they can't afford it.

In other words, the Romanian government could have permanently eradicated school abandonment, provided that it hadn't wasted mountains of money on feminist projects and instead invested the funds into the future of our children, regardless of their sex.

The construction of a state-of-the-art emergency hospital with 462 beds costs roughly 90 million euros[14]. In other words, two such hospitals could've been built by now since we joined the EU if the state hadn't co-funded feminist projects at all.

The rehabilitation of a policlinic to state-of-the-art standards costs 34.5 million lei (8.2 million euros)[15]—an investment that in Craiova (southwest) would help 270,000 people annually. With only the money wasted this year on feminist projects, three such units could've been rehabilitated and over half a million citizens (funny thing, most of them women!) would've been receiving far better medical care—without extra burdens placed on taxpayers.

And if the state really wanted to help primarily women, they should check this out: At Bistrița, a new lying-in hospital (or maternity unit) has been built that is the first state clinic to reasonably be a rival to the clinics in the private sector[16]. How much did it cost? 8.5 million lei, money that came from a governmental loan from the World Bank. With the money wasted on feminist projects, nine (yes, nine) such hospital units could've been built just this year alone without the state putting us all in debt with even one cent. Moreover, such an investment would have undeniably helped more women than all the feminist projects ever ran in this country combined.

The cost of a kilometer of county road[note 3] built from scratch varies between 500,000 and 2.3 million lei[17]—so, an average cost of 1.4 million lei. Make no mistake! This is the cost for constructing a road from scratch, meaning from raw land until the last layer of pavement. With only the money spent on feminist projects this year, 67 kilometers of county road could've been built. That's almost enough to connect the few remaining remote villages.

The average cost of rehabilitation of a kilometer of county road is somewhere around 975,000 lei[18]. With only the money wasted on feminist projects this year alone, 96 kilometers of county roads could've been rehabilitated. Just with the amount spent on feminist claptrap, the biggest road problems of, let's say, Suceava county could've been entirely solved. Surely more citizens would've been better served by a rehabilitated county road than by the do-nothing projects with a feminist smell that the state has funded this year.

Recently, there was another accident involving a helicopter from SMURD[note 4]—apparently due to the fact that the pilot wasn't sufficiently trained, allegedly because there's not enough funding for training. Such a helicopter costs

5.3 million euros[19]. With the money that the state used on feminist projects this year alone, three such choppers could've been bought and enough money would've still been left to fund more than enough training for the pilots, thus preventing tragedies such as the recent one from Siutghiol. Make no mistake: we're talking only about the money wasted this year on feminism.

The rehabilitation of a school costs roughly 1 million lei[20]. In other words, at least 90 schools could've been rehabilitated just this year alone and several thousand pupils would've studied in conditions worthy of this century.

So, let's recap how much feminism really cost us in 2014. With the money the state wasted this year, any of the following could've been accomplished:

- 42 brand-new schools with eight classrooms each
- Fully paid education for a year for 39,722 pupils
- A quarter of a state-of-the art emergency hospital
- Three state-of-the-art policlinics serving over half a million citizens
- Nine lying-in hospitals comparable with private clinics
- 67 kilometers of county road built from scratch
- 96 kilometers of county road rehabilitated
- Three brand-new SMURD choppers, plus extensive training for all the pilots
- At least 90 schools rehabilitated

Conclusions

Had any of these nine alternatives been chosen instead of the ideological feminist projects, the populace (including women) would've been far more well served than all the feminist claptrap combined that the state chose to fund.

If we also take into account the money that feminists have taken after it's been shuffled through so many bureaucracies that it no longer seems to be taxpayers' money, we reach over 200 million euros wasted just this year alone. So multiply by 10 all the things aforementioned and know how much could've been done if these corruption-generating projects would not have existed.

Also, when we talk about 200 million euros, we enter the big leagues, and a case could reasonably be made that some taxes could be shrunk or even axed—a move that undoubtedly would serve more women than all of the feminist projects combined.

Is it really that radical for us to suggest that female managers from SMEs would be better served by some lowered taxes or a reduction in the internal costs associated with the state bureaucracy?

The fact that the government allocated 20 million lei for churches[21] in October[22] is front-page news and a national scandal (and rightfully so, I'd say, although not everyone agrees). But the fact that the government spent almost five times that amount to fund the feminist religion doesn't even get on the media's radar.

It is a big scandal that the Catholic Diocese in Stau Mare gets 1 million lei per year from the state[23] while Catholicism is a minority religion—with way under 10% of the populace adhering to this denomination. All right, but what about the state giving over 90 times more (!) to a cult—the feminist cult, that is—which surely has even fewer adherents than the Roman Catholic denomination in this country?

Large segments of society (including feminists) have condemned the fact that the state has funded through successive donations the construction of the People's Salvation Cathedral—again, rightfully so, I'd say, even if many disagree.

But feminists are the last people who should be complaining about this, given that from the start of the fundraiser for the cathedral until now, the state has donated a little over 13 million euros—in seven years[24]. The secularists will argue that it's 13 million too much.

But also as a secularist I will argue that 21 million euros this year alone for the feminist cult are 21 million too much!

An entire movement has rapidly been formed, shouting, “We want hospitals/Not cathedrals” for less money wasted in seven years than for the feminist cult in one year! Where is the “We want hospitals/Not feminism” movement? The irony is that “We want hospitals/Not feminism” would be a slogan much more favorable to women than all the feminist projects combined, given that 80% of the employees in health care are women.

Eating MGTOW: Learn the food, dude

Paul Elam · 20 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

When I announced last weekend that I was going to do a regular food column for AVfM, I promised two recipes in this installment. My 20/20 hindsight has informed me that I have some more basics to cover before getting my ass into the kitchen.

Approaching food in a healthy, cost-effective, and tasty way requires an ethos. It mandates a set of beliefs that guide what I write and why. My independent spirit, as well as my knowledge of food and nutrition, prevents me from resorting to sound-bite descriptors like paleo, low carb, low fat, or other labels that put a rigid boundary around what I am going to recommend.

Indeed, if I had to give an actual name to my approach to eating, it would be called "The Knowledge Diet." I promise, that is the last time you will see those words in this column, but the fact remains that everything in this column hinges on actually knowing some stuff about food. If you are like most people, you probably don't know near as much as you should.

Let's start with some basic facts, and by facts I mean what I believe to be true. Some of you will know this stuff, some won't, but saying it now will establish a loose but identifiable framework for the future.

You have been lied to by your government and the food industry about health and nutrition your entire life. And I don't just mean little white lies. I mean great big, nasty, evil disease-causing lies designed to addict you to toxic foods, produced by toxic means, so that you stuff yourself with them until you croak.

One of these lies is actually a white lie. The Big White Lie. Sugar. Refined sugar is a toxic, disease-causing, and highly addictive substance that is added to thousands of food products not to make them sweet but to addict you to it and to keep you coming back for more, literally until it kills you.

The United States Sugar Corporation has killed more people than RJ Reynolds, Philip Morris, and street corner drug dealers have ever dreamed of.

Keep in mind that some degree of sugar does occur naturally in some foods. I am not suggesting the elimination of any particular food group, and I am not even saying that I will only be suggesting recipes that don't contain any sugar or sugar substitutes.

Carbohydrates, fats, and protein are going to be parts of any way of eating that anyone will stick with. And while complete and total sugar elimination is impossible, it is important to know that sugar is not a food group. It contains no nutrients, healthy fats, enzymes, or protein. Unless you are fond of some avoidable diseases, you will want to cut sugar and sugar substitute consumption drastically.

Before your brain goes into panic mode, that does not mean you need to be deprived of delicious, satisfying food, even sweet foods. You just don't have to get there with a hundred times more sugars than it requires.

I could make this entire column about sugar, or ten columns, but rather than that I can suggest more reading here and here.

Another component to consider here is that of refined, simple carbohydrates. In the metabolic picture, they are barely distinguishable from sugar. The bread products you eat made with enriched white flour (pasta too) don't meaningfully differ from sitting down and eating a bowl of sugar by the spoonful. It will overstimulate insulin production and put weight on you and lead to the joys of diabetes and cardiovascular disease in the very same way as a diet of candy.

The "whole grain" craze, spurred by all the bad press on processed grains, is not your ticket out. More on that in future columns.

Allow me to digress a moment to say that I am fully aware that for every idea I put forth in this column, you can find literally dozens of online articles from nutrition “experts” that will say I am full of it.

There are a lot of interests at stake here. For example, since soy-based protein powder became a big seller, there has been a ton of very harsh critiques on it, much of them funded or influenced by producers of whey-based protein powder. That does not mean I endorse soy-based protein powder. And it does not mean that there are not fair concerns about soy. It just means that the agendas running rampant in food journalism make #gamergate, by comparison, small potatoes.

In America, food scams being conducted by the USDA in concert with food producers have inspired an ongoing cultural war between differing camps of Food Nazi Clones. Some of their battles can make heated abortion debate seem like a friendly chat over tea and biscuits. Call that foil hat stuff if you want, but it is true.

I have little doubt that we will see some of that debate here before too long.

Moving on, another important thing to know is that most everything you have been told about fat is pure baloney, even saturated fats. I won’t go into a scientific analysis of this here. Google is available for those who want a range of conflicting views on the subject. I simply bring it up here because that is another critical component of understanding the columns you will see here in the future. Research at your leisure, but here, fat is an essential nutritional element that has been demonized far too long. Fat is your friend, and without it you will die.

And, very importantly, fat is flavor.

Finally (or as final as you can ever get when writing about food), calories matter. They matter whatever the source they come from. I don’t view them as something to obsess on every waking moment, but people on low-carb diets who think that they will lose weight consuming a quart of heavy cream every day will be in for a big fat surprise at the scales.

There now, you have a fairly good preview of the perspective you will see here in the future. More will come with each column, along with a recipe that I think you will very likely enjoy. Food production and storage will also be a key part of future writings. Put very simply, producing food is a hell of a lot cheaper than buying it, and comes with the benefit of you knowing exactly what you are eating. You cannot get that last part from the food industry anymore. They have the government’s backing to tell you deadly lies.

The whole point of this is to offer a way for you to eat well enough to make you smile because it tastes great and leaves more cash in your pocket—which you will hopefully not have to spend later on treatment for preventable diseases.

And to give you more self-reliance and independence. Nothing says Going Your Own Way like driving past the grocery store with a smile on your face.

Next week, “Some more fat facts, and spice—the variety of life.” I will show you how to make your own chili powder and use it to season braised ribs that fall apart under the touch of a fork. All on the cheap.

The problem with “We need more women in—”

Elizabeth Finnegan · 20 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Note: This article is also available in Romanian.

The gender gap in science, technology, engineering, and math (STEM) fields has seen no shortage of coverage, in media reporting and academic studies alike, in recent years. Theories on this disparity range from speculation about biased hiring practices to blaming Barbie dolls. Conjecture aside, there is one indisputable and widely documented truth to this imbalance in gender-diverse representation in STEM fields: women simply are not as interested as men.

It has been reported that an estimated 14.5% of female students express an interest in a STEM field—particularly in biology, chemistry, and science—in stark contrast to an estimated 39.6% of male students. Despite reports that women earn an estimated 33% more working in STEM fields, they make up a mere 24% of the workforce. This can very realistically be attributed to the lack of interest in a number of related occupations, especially considering roughly 90% of registered nurses, 78% of clinical laboratory technologists, and 60% of accountants and auditors are female. Combine that with female interest in law and most medical fields steadily rising and it is reasonable to conclude that women aren’t becoming chemical engineers and environmental scientists at the same rate as men because they’re more interested in doing something else.

Past and present, with future projections. Link to full study here.
The typical response to this is for people to ask, “How do we get women into—?”

In 2012, President Obama launched a new Cross-Agency Priority Goal, which emphasized providing additional focus and support to women. In 2013, the administration’s five-year STEM Education Strategic Plan was released, listing as a priority the need to increase the participation of women. In addition, affirmative action is still offering preferential treatment and special consideration to women during the application process for schools and jobs alike (many universities, colleges, and companies have a diversity quota). However, some people still feel it is the obligation of any employer to intentionally seek out female candidates for jobs, regardless of expressed interest.

At the time this post was published, it appears 45 people agreed with the above statements enough to share them on Twitter. I am not one of those people. My response to the "How do we—?" question is simpler, less costly, and guaranteed to piss off a lot of people.

I do not believe that women should be sought out for jobs that are publicly posted if there are already qualified candidates interested. If you believe this should be the case, then you are promoting bias and discrimination on the basis of nothing but gender.

You are more interested in the demographic breakdown of an industry/company/area of research than the quality of work, or employee, involved in said area. I believe that by actively seeking out women to fill a certain percentage of a specific field, you are not only turning women into tokens but also promoting a very troubling belief that they should expect special treatment and consideration for just being women. In addition, you are teaching girls and young women that, no matter what, they will be viewed by their gender first, and all else will be secondary. A troubling and heartbreaking side effect of this is that the same will happen with boys and young men, although the outcome will be much less pleasant for them.

I believe that all healthy human beings should be held to the same expectations, that work should be judged on its merit, and that a qualified and interested potential employee should be given a job that he or she applies for. I don't believe that special consideration should be awarded to women, especially for no reason other than they happen to be born women. I also don't agree with sending the message that no matter how hard a man studies and works and fights in order to advance himself academically, it will never be enough to combat a woman being a woman in an industry looking to meet a quota.

And I certainly don't agree with pushing a specific area of study or occupation at a woman whose interest lies elsewhere.

Reasonable doubt: Who died and made Zerlina Maxwell Red Queen?

Mumia Ali · 21 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Author's Note: As always, Not All Black Women Are Like That (NABWALT), but Enough Black Women ARE Like That (EBWALT).

I'll be completely honest with you: I haven't been following what seems to be wall-to-wall, up-to-the-nanosecond coverage of the UVA/Rolling Stone "college campus gang-rape" story. Why? Well, the reason is easy, if a bit politically incorrect.

Because it doesn't concern me.

Let's be brutally frank. A tremendous amount of the Sturm und Drang about sexual politics in our time really centers on what I refer to as "White folk who matter"—the upper middle classes and/or elites who dominate national discourse in the form of the media, which includes academia and entertainment, and who steer the conversation (heh) into areas that they deem appropriate. The result—from the vantage point of a blue-collar brotha out here on the block of one of America's dying inner cities—is that all this "stuff" is little more than internecine squabbles between Ms. Ann and Mr. Charlie. It don't concern me, it don't got nothin' to do with me, and so while, yea, I'm hip to the general jist of what's going on, nah, I ain't up on the latest 411 of it all.

And then along comes Ms. Zerlina Maxwell.

See, I'd heard of Maxwell in my travels too—she's one of those Ms. Ann wannabes that I've recently written about who seem to be part and parcel of the Black feminist brigades. And to be frank, I'd written her off as yet another empty weave not worth the trouble of dealing with. Yea, yea, I'd heard about her "showdown" with Sean Hannity and the whole "teach men not to rape!" thing; yea, yea, I'd known about her claims of being a "survivor" of rape and thus her claim to fame as the newest talking head. But, again, since she really wasn't dealing with the world that I know as a blue-collar brotha out here on these streets, I pretty much paid her no mind.

That is, until I got word of Maxwell's edict article, calling for all—all!—women to be believed if they claim they were raped, no matter what.

Let's get that right here. She's not saying some women. She's not saying White upper-middle-class women who do dumb stuff on elite college campuses to put themselves in dumb situations in the first place. She's saying all women—everywhere, forever and ever, amen—must be believed, no matter what.

Now that statement of hers got yours truly's attention.

Why?

Well, because of the inconvenient fact that it was precisely that kind of thinking(?) that has led, and continues to lead, to scores of Black men—most of whom will never be feted by The Washington Post or called in to chit-chat with Jon Stewart or Sean Hannity—to languish in prison, sometimes for decades, or to wind up being the strange fruit swinging from trees, based on such insanity. Indeed, not a year goes by that some brotha is finally(!) freed from prison, where he was incarcerated as a result of being falsely accused of a rape he did not commit. Brian Banks is now a household name, as Black women finally got to get in on the "all women must be believed!" act. Black men from Banks to Tupac to Emmett Till have had to endure this "all women must be believed" BSery. And for a supposed sista like Zerlina Maxwell—holder of a law degree—to fix her mouth and utter such words as she did in the WaPo recently, not only does it beggar belief, but it also disgusts me, a proud Black American, that I share DNA with her. She more than most, given the facts of her well-publicized background, ought to know better than to say what she did recently—but, again, as I've said, the desire to ape Ms. Ann is a powerful drug.

No, Ms. Maxwell, when brothas like yours truly—who may or may not have, in the words of Jigga himself, "a few dollars to fight the case" (cough, Bill Cosby, cough)—have to contend with a situation in which a woman is believed in her BS claims "no matter what," the result is always the same: us brothas have to face years of social, financial, and legal ruin, only to be found innocent sometimes decades after the fact and at the twilight years of our lives. We have much, much more to lose than "a few Facebook friends." We have our entire lives on the line. And people like you, who have sworn to uphold the law, have turned your back not just on that but also on the scores of Black men who continue to be railroaded by the "system" you have sworn allegiance to and the coddling that those of your ilk give to women everywhere because they said so. The annals of American history are littered with the bodies of innocent Black men, and your edict the other day will ensure that such a sordid tradition will live on into the 21st century.

That there isn't an army of sistas out there chin-checking the bejesus out of Zerlina Maxwell in the wake of her published remarks should give every Black man reading this some serious pause. It ain't like they don't know the history—they just don't care.

About you.

Going your own way: The minimalist option

Aaron Clarey · 21 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Minimalism is bantered about as a Buddhist "Zen" type of philosophy. But if you take the time to think it through and realize what it truly means, you'll soon realize that it is the key to happiness in life. Setting yourself free from the shackles of corporate employment allows you to spend your life on you, your loved ones, and (as it just so happens) it may be the key to riches. You owe it to yourself to have a more thorough and deeper understand of minimalism.

Minimalists or "Galtists" do not hate work as much as they hate authority. So much so that they are willing to minimize their lives, thereby lessening their need for employment and, consequently, minimizing the time they need to "suffer" working under an authority. They value their time and freedom above all else and couldn't care less about a mortgage, a car, or other standard staples in life. As long as they're not answering to some boss or clocking in at the factory, they are happy.

Because of this, their "job" isn't to make money but rather to minimize their spending. However, to what extent they pursue this depends on the individual. At some basic level, everybody is a minimalist. Nobody likes work and we'd prefer never to work again if given the choice. Therefore, we may downsize our house or cut out the cable to make ends meet and avoid taking another job. However, true "minimalists" go to the extreme: living in trailers, generating their own electricity, and getting by on less than $5,000 a year. What extremity of minimalism you might wish to achieve depends on your own personality. But somewhere between "cutting back on sushi" and "living in a trailer using car batteries for electricity" is a happy medium that may suit a lot of people.

There are a lot of "minimalist" jobs out there where you have to answer to an "authority," but you rarely see their face. Being a security guard is a perfect example. You rarely see your boss. You rarely tolerate office politics. As long as you show up on time and are sober, you are allowed to be left alone for eight hours a night, permitted to work on your hobbies or just goof around on the Internet. A truck driver is another example. Bar some minor office work up front, you can just drive around the country, looking at its beautiful landscape, listening to the radio or your thoughts. There are other jobs that minimize your face-time with authority, but the larger point is that you can find jobs conducive to a minimalist mindset. That added income can be the difference between a life of living in a cheap studio apartment or out of a van down by the river.

Another approach is to "suffer" working a real job for a certain amount of time, only until you save up enough money or have a side business going that allows you to never work again. If your expenses are minimal, say, $7,000 a year, and over the course of a decade you manage to save $140,000, you have 20 years' worth of savings. This, of course, requires that you spend some time in the real world, but if you can tough it out and adhere to strict fiscal discipline, you could retire well before most of your debt-laden peers.

However, a cynical though poignant question to ask is: Why have a job at all? Setting morality aside, with such minimal spending it is possible just to get by on the government dole. Matter of fact, it's almost impossible not to. In having such minimal spending, you need an equally little amount of income. Such little income almost guarantees that you will receive more in tax benefits, refunds, tax credits, and general government services than what you paid in. Matter of fact, half of all Americans do not pay federal income taxes, as they are heavily subsidized by the rich, mathematically making most of us default economic parasites. Therefore, the issue of whether you should be "moral" and work hard is moot and academic, especially if you're deciding to "go Galt." You are already living off the system. It is merely up to your own personal moral code as to whether you want to engage in work to make yourself feel better about it.

Moral debates aside, though, there is one final huge and often unforeseen benefit to minimalist living: you stand a much higher chance of becoming rich, even more so than the most obedient and ass-kissing of MBAs.

Understand that what makes people rich is not being the good little corporate man or being the good little obedient wage slave. It's ideas and innovation that make people rich. Ideas and innovation most normal corporate cogs have not the time nor the energy to dream up, let alone pursue, as they finally pull into their driveway after a ten-hour workday and two-hour commute, creative and conscious as zombies. However, the exact opposite can be said of minimalists or Galtists. If anything, these people have plenty of time on their hands to dream. And not just dream but think through. And not just think through but actually pursue.

Take Douglas Adams, for instance, author of The Hitchhikers Guide to the Galaxy. He came up with the idea while working as a security guard.

Have you heard of Harry Potter? The boy would never have existed had its author, J.K. Rowling, not benefited from the British taxpayers' generosity financing her bills and writing career as she collected welfare.

And your fancy little Apple doodad wouldn't exist if Steve Jobs and Steve Wozniak were working on Testing Procedure Specification (TPS) reports at Initech instead of tinkering in their garage.

Authors and anecdotes aside, the truth is that if you're constantly occupied with a 9-to-5, mind-numbing job, you won't have the time, energy, or desire to pursue any dreams you might have. But if you are a minimalist, working barely 10 hours per week, the human mind will find something else to do with the remaining 30. And usually what it picks isn't mind-numbing or boring, but your hobby, your interest, and your passion. And in being your passion, it will inspire you to dedicate even more time to it than you would a normal job, thereby ensuring its uniqueness and quality. And it is high-quality, unique things that act as a lightning rod to riches.

There is no guarantee, of course, that you will make it rich sitting inside your studio apartment, drinking Weasel whiskey, smoking cigarettes, contemplating the next great work of fiction or "Angry Birds" app for smartphones. But it is a guarantee that you stand better chances of becoming a millionaire than the mass-produced MBA slaving away 80 hours a week, hoping for that promotion, as his employer secretly files for bankruptcy.

It's time for the manosphere to mend bridges with the MHRM

Davis M.J. Aurini · 21 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

As part of the filming process for The Sarkeesian Effect, Jordan Owen and I attended the Kennesaw State University's Men's conference, Male Students in Peril, in November—and to be honest, I was mildly skeptical going in.

The split between the manosphere and the Men's Human Rights Movement (MHRM) occurred several years ago, and while I haven't held the same level of vitriol for A Voice for Men (AVfM) as others within the manosphere, I've remained generally skeptical. I've been supportive of them in our mutual fight against the social justice/feminist left, but for the most part I haven't been keeping up on their activities.

After what I saw at the Male Students in Peril conference, I should have been.

Before we get into that, however, it's worth revisiting where this split came from—not to rehash the past but to re-examine it through the eyes of a historian.

Aurini and Elam

The manosphere and the MHRM come from the same place: they're both reactions to present-day misandry. Over the past 50 years, we've completely reordered our society, throwing out the basic rules that regulated (i.e., made regular) interactions between the sexes (rules that served humanity well for millennia) and replacing them with a corporate/democratic "equality" in which we're all equal cogs in the machine … only some cogs are more equal than others. The marriage contract has been defanged while alimony law has been beefed up. Schools have become more "inclusive," which in practice means that they've become more female-oriented, punishing boys for acting like boys. The workplace has embraced "equality," the result of which has been ambiguous HR standards meant to protect the feelings of the weaker sex. The myth of the "patriarchy" is pushed (a supposed society in which men conspired to oppress women), justifying a tilted playing field in favour of women.

The result of all of this has been a world that despises men who fail while castigating those who succeed. It's a world that has excised the masculine role.

It should go without saying that this has harmed women as well. Despite what the Marxists believe, there is no "gender war." Both sexes are in it together: when one of them suffers, the other does as well. Modern women are discovering just how exhausting it is, being chained to a desk, that those sexy bad boys their grandmothers tried to warn them about really are a poor choice for baby-daddies, and that the "patriarchy" they smashed was made up of their fathers, brothers, and sons.

Unfortunately, it's still a rare woman who recognizes this. The majority are too inculcated into the Marxist "gender war" theory of patriarchy, too addicted to the easy money of corporate slavery, and harbour a misplaced anger against all men for the actions of the minority who've abused them (the sexy bad boys they picked over the "nice guys" that their grandmothers would have approved of).

These problems have been apparent, and worsening, since at least the 1970s, but for a long time the mainstream media managed to keep a lid on things by representing the exception as the norm: the abusive husband as the culprit behind rising divorce rates, the sexist bosses who refused to promote their brilliant female intern, etc. The innocent men who were swept up in the system believed that they were the exception, that they'd just fallen between the cracks, that the dominant narrative was an accurate representation of reality.

All of that changed with the Internet.

While women are expected to be the cheerful sex, men are expected to be the stoic one. It's not in our nature to complain about our lot in life; we're supposed to be the fixers, not the excuse-makers. Give us anonymity, however, and we're willing to open up. That's when we started comparing notes and realizing just how heavily slanted the system was against us.

This was the primordial sea from which both the MHRM and the manosphere emerged: comparing notes, learning that we weren't crazy, researching accurate statistics, and throwing out the mainstream narrative. At first both movements seemed to be moving in lockstep, but in mid-2012 the split happened.

If you ask most denizens of the manosphere, they'll describe AVfM as nothing more than "feminism for men." The MHRM, meanwhile, would probably describe the manosphere as "nothing but a bunch of guys trying to get laid." These are both gross mischaracterizations.

Part of the reason for this confusion is that at the time of the split AVfM was overrun by leftist/Marxist entryists, individuals claiming to support the movement who were ultimately trying to co-opt it into the same destructive system that we have already: men versus women, Blacks versus Whites, rich versus poor, all while the "enlightened" elite sit above it all and pass legislation for "our own good." But there was more to it than just that; even after these entryists were dealt with, there were still some fundamental differences.

The manosphere is a group of radical individualists. We study the principles of masculine virtue, we search out old tomes full of forgotten wisdom, we reject movements and organizations because we don't need to belong to an army to justify our existence—we only need to become better men.

The MHRM, on the other hand, is an army; it's a guerrilla force.

On the surface, it shares similarities to the mass-movement "Human Wave Attack "organizational chart of the social justice warriors—"Sign here, pick up your slogan, stop all rational thought, and obey, obey, obey!"—but that's only a cover. Scratch the surface, fellows: Paul Elam's gone fourth-generational. It might look like a lobby group, but that's just what he wants you to think. What he's actually doing is changing the narrative.

The MHRM is acting as a lobby group to undermine lobby groups. They're demanding equality so as to destroy what the left means when they say equality. They're occupying enemy territory to salt the earth.

The MHRM and the manosphere are fundamentally different but not antithetical. The break was inevitable, necessary even. One side became a guerrilla force, the other a bunch of lone snipers. The tactics we employ are utterly different and incompatible, but our enemies and our end goals are identical (or close enough as to make no difference).

Elam's done a sneaky thing: he's actually managed to turn the weapons of leftism back onto the left. That's one helluva fait accompli. And if Sage Gerard is any indication, this force is highly trained: he had a group of feminists begging to join his side at the conference!

This isn't to say that I expect you to like it over there; we're the snipers, after all. We speak hard and blunt, we have no interest in building communities, and any softness or sensitivity is grounds for the Banhammer. Elam's camp is a little too "civilized" for our tastes: it's apolitical, eco-friendly, and he even lets women in!

But there's method to his apparent madness. Snipers can take out high-value targets, but they're ineffective against swarms; with guerrillas, it's the opposite.

So before you dismiss the MHRM as nothing but "feminism for men," take a closer look; there are some interesting currents stirring beneath the surface…

AVFM end of year donation drive

Paul Elam · 21 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It is time yet again for AVFM to start its quarterly fundraiser. This is the time we appeal to activists, regular readers for help. We ask you to help us force feed a sane narrative about men, women and society to counter the insanity and destructiveness of feminists and social justice warriors.

As we begin, allow me a moment to look back on 2014 and what we have accomplished, and helped accomplish, with your support.

Needless to say, we held the first ever International Conference on Men's Issues, defying threats, corporate backstabbing, protests and an onslaught of mainstream media attacks, all aimed at shutting us down.

2014 was the year that Mary Kellett was convicted of ethics violations, and also turned out to be the year that Kellett got her walking papers from the new prosecutor when the residents of Hancock and Washington Counties in Maine voted the criminals out of that office.

The past year AVFM has, as every year before it, continued to grow, not just in traffic, but in influence. Feminists are clearly on the defensive. The more "moderate" among them have been forced into relenting to the emerging change in narrative. The more stubborn among them have simply grown more shrill and insane in a frenzy of defensiveness.

It is clear we still have a long way to go, but it is also clear that we are gaining steam and momentum.

During the last 12 months we have seen more and more MRA friendly and anti-feminist commentary in the mainstream media. And between Fox News and USA Today we saw our first actual positive coverage of Men's Rights Activists.

We even saw Huffington Post publish, then unpublish, the evil, kitten-eating Dean Esmay.

This year has seen the emergence of ZenMen, Kennesaw State University Men, and the previously unimaginable spectacle of an AVFM sponsored anti-feminist conference on an American University Campus.

We have recently launched and hosted the WhiteRibbon.org website for domestic violence pioneer Erin Pizzey, and were able to watch as the corrupt White Ribbon Campaigns went ballistic with complaints to the Australian Parliament and threats to sue. We also watched them shut up and go silent when we called them on their bluff. We are scarcely done with those folks.

Not even close to done.

It has actually been an incredible year. And the year ahead of us looks much brighter. Before I get to that, let's look back to our traffic for a moment, from the past two years.

I wanted you to see that because I want you to see where your support has taken us in terms of our presence. And because it will serve as the starting point to tell you what 2015 will be like, with your continued help.

2015 will be the year we start averaging a million views a month. Aside from our organic growth, the kickoff for that will be in part due to a Gentlemen's Quarterly (GQ) feature on us coming out in March. That publication is sending a pro photographer across North America to do shoots on us for the article.

We also have a documentary on us by a Cannes Film Festival Best Documentary winner which will be released. CNN recently called, and we suspect they will call again.

2015 will see the next and even bigger International Conference on Men's Issues. The official announcement is due soon.

And 2015 will be a very important year for another reason. For almost six years now, we have literally made the impossible happen for comparatively little money. That is thanks to the incredible and fiercely determined talent that AVFM has attracted and to your support.

That talent, and the juggernaut of a platform we have built together, has now taken us to the point where we can break through the monetization barrier and actually start planning much bigger things.

This year will see AVFM go into commercial ventures that will fund even more activism. I cannot go into any details at this point, but rest assured it is coming, and as with most everything else we have set out to do, we are going to pull it off. This track will ease the pressure on some of our larger donors who have always seen us through donation drives.

We have the plans in place, and the people to execute them, but we need your help to get there.

At this point I think it can no longer be denied that we are starting to change the world. We can't claim credit for all that change. Anti-feminism was bound to emerge. But AVFM has been pivotal in much of what has happened and we are about to turn the burners on high.

Please help us reach our fundraising goals so we can make 2015 the astounding year that we know it can be.

Casual misandry

Robert Brockway · 22 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Casual misandry is a phenomenon in which unfounded negative claims are made about men as a group or men as a group are insulted or put down. Both men and women can engage in this behaviour. It is much more broad than male-bashing, which is usually more direct in its attacks on men. Casual misandry often consists of oversimplification, half-truths, or in some cases outright lies. Casual misandry may be a recent learnt behaviour. It has certainly become more prevalent in recent decades.

Selected examples of casual misandry are presented here.

Men are genetically inferior
These claims usually come about as suggesting that the Y chromosome is somehow defective and is ultimately doomed.[1]

These claims can occur because the Y chromosome is smaller than the X chromosome, contains fewer genes, and may once have been an X chromosome that lost a leg. These sorts of simplistic claims show a fundamental misunderstanding of genetics. There is no clear relationship between the number of genes and complexity in multicellular organisms. Research shows, for example, that humans have fewer genes than grapes.[2]

Every difference between men and women comes, directly or indirectly, from the Y chromosome. To claim that the Y chromosome is a disadvantage for men is to reject everything it is to be male and to reject all of the achievements of men, now and in the past.

Men have lower pain thresholds than women
On the surface, this may seem to be logical. Women experience childbirth so it seems reasonable that they would have higher pain thresholds. Surprisingly, no one had scientifically tested this assumption until recently. Scientists actually discovered that men tend to average significantly higher pain thresholds. This means that a man would experience less pain, on average, than a woman would in a comparable situation.[3] Very recent research has found that men may experience more pain than women after major surgery, but that the reverse is true after minor surgery.[4] Scientists found that pregnant women do tend to have very high pain thresholds, although this is lost soon after birth.

Differing gender experiences of pain have implications for pain management so it is important that the medical profession recognise that women often experience more pain than men and apply this knowledge appropriately.

Men and boys are stupid
“Boys are stupid, throw rocks at them!” is a slogan used on a line of products produced by the corporation David and Goliath. This product line held to the notion that boys are stupid and endorsed violence against them. The products continue to be available for purchase.[5] This merchandise line is just a particularly egregious example of a widespread trend. While this may be intended to be humorous, humour does not excuse prejudice.

As is widely recognised today, men are routinely portrayed as stupid in popular culture.[6]

In 2012, it was widely reported that women had passed men in IQ.[7][8][9] These claims came from statements made by a well-known intelligence researcher from New Zealand, James Flynn. Flynn states unequivocally that he was misquoted and that he was reporting that women had caught up to men in IQ.[10]

Men are linear thinkers
Another widespread but baseless claim often made today is that men are linear thinkers while women are not. Variations on this idea include that men are more rigid thinkers, that women are more capable of thinking outside of the box, or that the male brain is more specialised.[11]

These claims include the notion that men are unable to alter their thought processes to match a changing situation[12] and are less able to think of novel solutions to problems.

These claims tend to ignore the fact that men are responsible for the overwhelming majority of innovation, invention, and problem-solving, today and throughout history, and form the vast majority of people who work in unstructured work environments (e.g., police) or who solve problems for a living (e.g., engineers). Women tend to choose occupations in which the tasks are more structured and clearly defined (as well as generally being cleaner and safer).

Claims relating to women thinking outside of the box are in fact nonsensical. One can only think outside of the box relative to those thinking inside of the box. As such, if we consider that men and women in general think differently, then each group will tend to think outside of the box relative to the other. This is in fact a corollary to the notion that diversity in opinions on solving a problem can lead to better outcomes.

Claims about male thinking usually go on to claim that women will lead in the 21st century and that this is reflected in increasing female participation in the labour force.[13] Interestingly, while female labour participation rates increased from the 1970s, they peaked around 2000 and have been steadily declining since that time.[14]

Men can't multitask but women can
It is actually true that men can't multitask, but neither can women. The overwhelming evidence suggests that those who think they can multitask are deluding themselves and that people who try to do so suffer a net loss in productivity.[15][16][17][18][19]

Attempts to multitask may even increase stress levels and ultimately impact health in a negative way.[20] Humans are capable of continuous partial attention, which allows them to perform multiple activities at once, but in general these must be simple activities and there is still a net loss of productivity.

Men can't maintain attentiveness as well as women
A recent article in The Times of Israel highlights this belief:

> Speaking in her officer's presence, she never once swiveled her head or removed her eyes from the screen. "Their powers of concentration are incredible," the intelligence officer said, noting that very few males would be capable of maintaining the grueling attentiveness necessary to patrol a stretch of road for four straight hours.[21]

In actuality, men have routinely maintained vigilance for long periods of time during conflicts (and for other reasons) throughout history. Software developers (85% men) routinely stare at screens without interruption for periods that are often much longer than four hours.

Men think about sex every few seconds
This claim varies in frequency and is of uncertain origin. Some reports state that men think about sex as often as every seven seconds. This claim has been thoroughly debunked and is without merit.[22]

Men have fragile egos
The claim is made that men are so emotionally fragile that opening the door for them damages their self-esteem and self-confidence. The Wire news site tells us that "Men Are Fragile and Do Not Need Your Common Courtesies, Says Science."[23]

The online dating site Lavalife feels that women may need to take men down a peg or two to keep their egos in check but goes on to say:

> Guys pretend to be tough, impervious to pain, but the ironic thing is that the male ego is as fragile as an egg. Or, as NewYorkMoments writes on the appropriately titled blog Tired of Men, "The male ego is like a zeppelin. It's big & bloated & full of hot air. In fact, it's so big it floats, but one little spark destroys the entire thing."[24]

In reality, women tend to have lower self-esteem from adolescence onwards.[25][26][27]

Men complain unduly when sick (manflu)
Today, many people apparently believe that when ill with a minor virus, men complain more and remain sick for longer. This is commonly known as manflu. Some companies even feel it is acceptable to refer to a man as a man-child while sick.[28]

manflu.info tells us:

> Man Flu is a crippling and debilitating disorder indiscriminately striking down male members of the human species without warning. The illness is often referred to pejoratively by female members of the species who are in fact immune from the illness as man flu is now known to exclusively attack the XY chromosome carrier. If Man Flu is kind enough not to kill the infected party it will definitely leave him weak, sick, hurting everywhere and in dire need of TLC.[29]

While this site is obviously intended as satire, the sad truth is that a lot of people, especially women, believe this to be true despite solid evidence to the contrary.

mamamia.com.au states:

> What's that? That sounds a lot like regular flu you say? Well spotted and correct! Man flu presents exactly the same as it does with regular flu except for an added degree of difficulty commonly known as "chronic exaggeration". In fact, Man Flu, according to absolutely no credible source whatsoever is:
>
> - 13 times worse than normal flu
> - More unbearable than childbirth
> - Easily recognisable when the patient continues to tell you he really wants to go into work but is too selfless to risk spreading his awful condition amongst his work colleagues. Only cured by moaning. A lot of moaning.[30]

In reality, while the exact rates vary from country to country, women take more sick leave from work than men.[31][32] While some may suspect that women are taking additional sick leave to care for children, childless women take more sick leave than childless men.[33] One study reported that women take 50% to 70% more sick leave than men performing the same work in Norway.[34]

Men are immature, childlike, and emotionally stunted
Today, it is very common for opinion pieces and even mainstream news articles to claim that men are childlike or are not growing up.[35][36][37]

This criticism is often levelled at men who are choosing to remain single throughout their lives. The argument presumes that because these men are not following a traditional path of attempting to form a permanent relationship and choosing to have children that they are immature. This is an inherent value judgment. People who recognise that they do not want to be parents (or would not make good parents) and make sure this doesn't happen may well be more mature and responsible than people who plunge in to relationships and parenthood without having considered the long-term ramifications of these choices.

CNN, like others, argues that women are better at dealing with emotional problems than men.[38] It would be more accurate to say that men and women tend to deal with emotional problems in different ways, and claiming that one method is better than the other is making a baseless value judgment.

Statements like the one below, often couched in humour, suggest that men are more simple than women:

> Men have two emotions, hungry and horny. If you see him without an erection, make him a sandwich.[39]

This is perhaps the most insulting and dehumanising of all of these claims.

Men don't ask for directions
It is often claimed that men do not ask for directions.[40] Despite how widely repeated this claim is, there is very little evidence to suggest it is actually true.

Men speaking condescendingly to women (mansplaining)
Mansplaining is the notion that men routinely speak to women in a condescending manner and in particular do so far more often than they would do so to men. This term is now widely used by women. Stories of men engaging in this behaviour are widely available online.[41]

One of the principal problems with the concept of mansplaining is that it presumes that the men talking in a condescending manner only do this to women. They may simply be arrogant individuals who act this way towards many people, regardless of gender. Because of the inherent assumption about the gender bias of someone who is allegedly mansplaining, the concept is unfalsifiable. It is not possible to prove that these men would never act that way towards other men.

Men aren't as efficient or effective workers
From time to time it is asserted that women are just better workers than men. For example, this article in the Daily Mail:

> Women DO work harder than men: How female employees are less prone to distraction and more likely to get a job done[42]

This alleged study monitored male and female employees for 10 minutes per person and failed to control for various factors, such as the men and women actually performing different jobs or even establishing what constituted work. Someone reading a technical article related to his or her work would appear to not be working in the above study.

In contrast, some hard data suggests that men are slightly more productive workers, at least in blue-collar roles.[43] In practice, the difference is negligible in most positions. There is a notable exception, however, in which female scientists had significantly lower scientific publication rates than male scientists.

Conclusions
Statements like these are common in Western media. Many men and women believe these myths about men. It is reasonable to expect that constant denigration of men and masculinity will have a negative effect on men and boys. Of particular concern are boys being born into a world where they are taught from a young age that there is something fundamentally wrong with being male. If we do not stop spreading these lies and half-truths about men and boys, we will continue to see young men and boys disengaging from society in ever-increasing numbers. If this trend continues, we will all be the poorer for it.

Davis Aurini, the MHRM, and the manosphere

Paul Elam · 22 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I met Davis Aurini at the start of November at Zen Men's (formerly Kennesaw State University Men) Male Students in Peril conference. Actually, I spotted him in the area outside the conference room and went over to introduce myself.

We chatted it up a bit and met later in my hotel room so he could interview me for his and Jordan Owen's very important documentary project, The Sarkeesian Effect.

I am sure that if Davis and I talked long enough, we would find things to disagree about, but it did not happen that particular day. He struck me as an informed, thoughtful man with a developed sense of decorum. I enjoyed visiting with him.

Recently he wrote an article for his blog and granted us permission to run it at AVfM. He brought up some very salient points, to which I would like to respond in agreement and expand upon.

Also, he missed the mark on a couple of items. I want to address those first because they are actually the least significant items, so better to dispose of them at the outset.

Aurini is somehow under the impression that at some point in 2012 AVfM was suffering from ideological drift because of Marxists in our ranks, but that we have solved the problem. That does not jibe with the reality.

I remember, I believe it was in 2012, that we got rid of one individual. It was not because she was a leftist. It was because she wasn't smart enough to keep herself from using YouTube to attack men for Going Their Own Way. That is kind of a deal breaker around here, so out she went.

The truth is that no one has ever been invited into, or forced to depart from, AVfM because of political ideology. Just as true is the fact that I don't know the political orientation of most AVfM staff. I don't know because I don't care. I never ask.

I assume that most of the political spectrum is represented, but the thing is that people who are more wed to governance politics than men's advocacy generally don't show up to help. They only show up in the comments to say we are too left or too right. We like it that way. At least, I do.

So where Aurini got his impression about AVfM and Marxism, I don't know. In the end, it does not matter because what he gets right in his piece is a lot more important than the single misstep.

What he did was actually quite remarkable. His article was not just an important olive branch, it was a rare, spot-on analysis from "outside" of what AVfM does and why it is so important. In that sense, he nailed it. He groks AVfM and what we are doing.

I want to seize the opportunity he has presented to take a deeper look, starting with the manosphere. Aurini points at the ongoing friction between the Men's Human Rights Movement (MHRM) and the amalgam of other online communities—Game, Men Going Their Own Way, Pickup Artists, etc.—and notes quite rightly that there is a stark difference in standards of expression and sensibilities between the MHRM and the others.

If AVfM is a civil but heated arena of public controversy, the manosphere is a chicken-wire roadhouse. For those of you who don't know, a chicken-wire roadhouse is generally a rural establishment where the band plays behind a chicken-wire fence so they don't get hit when patrons throw beer bottles at them to express their disapproval of the performance.

Aurini also points out correctly that AVfM is more of a collective effort, whereas other forums tend to be run and frequented by lone wolves.

It's a solid observation that led exactly and correctly to his analogy of guerilla warfare versus individual snipers.

There is, however, some more to that picture.

I think the explanation of why there is friction between the guerillas and the snipers lies just under the surface of his assumptions about the average guy in the manosphere:

> If you ask most denizens of the manosphere, they'll describe AVfM as nothing more than "feminism for men."

He's correct on his assessment. You will see that sentiment fairly often in what most of us would call the manosphere. You will hear it despite the fact that there is nothing in it resembling reality.

You will never see AVfM pushing for a "Violence Against Men" act, or for legal intervention on pay inequities that favor women (they do exist), or any other governmental program to identify men as a victim group in need of special victim money. We might be willing to say that letting women who commit murder walk and sexually mutilating male babies as a standard operating procedure are bad, but that hardly seems comparable to Anti-gamergate SJWs and slutwalks.

What AVfM does, just as Aurini asserts, is force a change in the social narrative about men and women. We undermine lobby groups as much as possible. And if I may say so, we are pretty damned good at it.

In the process, we do point rather directly to the hypocrisy of gynocentrism, which may be confusing enough for some people to conclude that men's activism is "like feminism."

It's still an illogical conclusion. And it ignores the obvious in that the only thing AVfM is invested in is making people reconsider their worldview about men and women.

With all respect to manospherians, you can't get that done with just snipers. It requires an organized effort that will not be divided by politics, race, sex, sexuality, or any other of the typical walls we construct between human beings.

And it is a critical change to pursue. The more the narrative changes in the direction that the MHRM wants, the more things become user-friendly in the world in which denizens of the manosphere are born into and forced to live.

In the end, whether we like to admit it or not, the MHRM and the manosphere are both products of the inevitable reaction to runaway gynocentrism, though some are more proficient at it than others. Discrimination against men and the increasing infantilization and depraved privileging of women are the fuel for what most of us do. We just handle it in different ways.

Aurini points out with a hint of humor that AVfM even allows women. Yes, we do, and as a matter of fact we have lessons to learn from them, primarily the social-networking skills needed for our end of this struggle to change the zeitgeist.

I doubt if there are many, if any, participants in the MHRM or the manosphere who will argue that men have not had their asses handed to them, largely by women, over the past 50 years. We did, in fact, have a gender war, and the guys got their asses kicked.

The fact that they chose not to show up and fight, or rather that the ones who did fought for women, had a lot to do with that, but in the end an ass-kicking is still an ass-kicking.

Why did this happen? Only a few snipers and no guerillas.

Men took a severe beating because when it comes to circling the wagons and sticking together as men we are pathetically inferior to women. Indeed, we have a lot of men, maybe most of them, who take pride in how inferior they are at social connectivity. They call it independence, if you get my drift.

Feminism has raised literally billions of dollars and amassed incredible power because women stick together and are efficient at recruiting men to help them.

Or another way to put it is that feminism has raised billions of dollars and amassed incredible power because men suck at supporting each other and recruiting women to help them.

Paint that with a “fiercely independent” happy face all you want, it still results in an ass-kicking.

That is not to say that lone warriors are unneeded or ineffective. It is just that what makes an army an army is warriors working together in a chain of command. There is no other way to build an army or run it.

Some may argue that what I am saying about armies is proof that masculine virtues infer some sort of social bonding and productive cooperation. And they do. After all, how could we have built the pyramids or landed a spacecraft on a comet without men working together? Men, working together, built civilization as we know it. It is just that somewhere along the line we suddenly found ourselves getting the note that we were no longer welcome here.

And the “men cooperate” argument only plays up to the point when men try to form an army to fight for themselves. Then it all, at least until now, falls apart. It is why there has been men discussing these same issues for over a hundred years and getting exactly nowhere.

Zed did not coin the term “circular firing squad” for nothing.

One of those “masculine virtues” that we don’t talk about too much is that men are wired to compete more than cooperate. That wiring makes some men very successful at the acquisition of sex and money. It also makes most men malleable in the hands of women and other men.

That competition is the friction that Aurini is addressing. It is the source of “the split” he referred to.

I am not saying that is all bad. Competition is a great motivator, and I agree with Aurini that the split actually did some good for both sides.

But I also think that his stance on chilling out the resentments is a hell of a good start on better perspectives and a better chance at change.

As for the manosphere, I can honestly say that I have nothing against any of those guys. After all, I spend my life advocating for them, even if they don’t like it.

Part of this will never go away. It is human nature for men to climb over each other’s backs, even over petty shit.

Still, looking back over the history of AVfM, I also see that it is possible for men to do what they have been previously incapable of doing. We have circled our wagons and begun to take care of each other.

I have to send some props to Davis Aurini for noticing, and to say that I have no hatchet with him that needs burying.

The box: Life in prison, according to Inmate #565862

Editorial note: Given the state of the aptly named "criminal justice" system today, we think Inmate #565862's harrowing story should give anyone pause. Is this really what we want to be doing to millions of men, sometimes based on allegations alone?—Eds.

Recently, while bouncing around this, my favorite website, I happened upon the phrase "carceral feminism," a term with which I was not familiar. After a cursory investigation, in which I found almost as many definitions for the concept as there were sites referencing it, I concluded that it essentially concerns the push by feminists and other sympathizers to "criminalize" male behaviors and involve the state in policing them. Nearly all of the discussion focuses on what gets criminalized. As an innocent man accused of domestic violence who took his case to trial and yet was convicted of misdemeanor assault and sentenced to a year in jail by a jury of "peers" for a first offense, my interest is to draw your attention to the other half of Dostoyevsky's famous coupling: the punishment.

This is my nightmare:

It is late and I am lying on the floor in my "boat," slang for the plastic half-coffin "beds" that are used, after all the bunks are filled, by those of us left over standing around holding our dicks.

I took to calling them "canoes," but it never caught on.

On both sides of me are two other "boat" riders. One guy's White, mid-40s, balding, and goes by the nickname "Gator" because—so he says—an alligator bit off half his foot when the two had a falling out years ago in Florida. Up until his arrest—he'd been in the "box" going on a year and a half when we'd become cellies—he was spending most of his time huddled under an overpass with other homeless. Now he sleeps upwards of 20 hours a day, rising almost exclusively to eat, shave, and choke down one of the thrice-daily antipsychotics that keep him in a state of near hibernation. When he's up, though, he's a lively, glad-handing, tall-tale-spinning lunatic savant who is forever thrusting his half-foot into your face to prove that he had, in fact, once been partially consumed by a large reptile. The rough edges where his first two toes and the ball of his foot used to be do resemble teeth marks, truth be told.

On the other side is a Black guy, also mid-40s, completely bald, slightly overweight, and about as soft-spoken as a cat burglar at a funeral. He's friendly, generous, almost retiring, and, like my other bunkie, seems about as dangerous as a cotton ball on a pillow. "Mark," a transplant from the deeper South to the African-American community of Poisonville's West End—he'd either emigrated too far north or not far enough—is my frequent spades partner in the endless games we play for hours at a stretch every day, a distraction from the bigger "game" we're all individually playing collectively: "Killing Time."

Both men are awaiting trial for murder.

In my canoe, I am dressed in long johns and cocooned from head to almost toe (a foot sticks out) in the single, reedy, olive-drab-green blanket provided to me courtesy of the state. It's freezing. Outside the cell, the guards sit dozing in winter parkas at banks of monitors. But don't call them "guards"—the correct term is CO, for "corrections officer"—or they'll front you with some dumb-shit schoolyard taunt like, "What the fuck d'you just call me?!" Which then presents you with the near-impossible-to-resist temptation to tell said "guard" what word you thought was most appropriate to capturing the above-average dickishness of your below-average, knuckle-dragging human zookeeper.

And that ain't ever gonna be good for you.

My cell—the official term is "dorm" or "pod," though a "box" by any other name is still a six-sided enclosed space—is my fourth and final home during my trip through the Poisonville criminal justice system. Fifth, if you count the two days I spent in solitary during one of my many moves. The dorm, J4 4B, is one of two that are mirror images (the other being 4A), which together make up one of the eight or so "dorm couples" on the fourth floor of our Hall of "Just Us," which is only one of several interconnecting buildings forming the criminal justice leviathan that is located right smack in the center of the beating heart of our downtown. It is a three-city-block, above- and below-ground labyrinth of such disorienting complexity that Daedalus would envy its design.

This may sound like I know where I am, but I have no idea. It isn't until much, much later, after I'm free, that I get a sense of where I was when I was in my various cages in our human zoo. Originally I had walked through the front door of a seventh-floor circuit (felony) courtroom, but after my jury found it amusing to give me a little rest among the mad—and far from the madding crowd—I was quickly ushered out a heavily guarded side door and elevatored down to a sub-basement of the Grim Factory where me and the other bullheaded Sons of Minos were processed, sorted, and placed into a cubicle in a Seventh Circle corner office.

Our job was simple and our schedule fixed: belabor our penance every minute of every day.

4B, like 4A, like all the other A-and-B couples on all the other floors, is a rectangle of 55-and-a-half size-10 Florsheims in depth by 26 across, and I should know. I counted it once a day, if not 50, and it troubled me in the way that a fly bothered Mother Norman that the dimensions were not symmetrical. The front half of the dorm—the "common area"—has two long metal dining tables, each seating eight uncomfortably, and two matching circular tables, which together seat an additional eight. In the back are the three rows of connected bunk beds with metal dividers, enough to sleep two dozen men. Next to the bunks are a row of three stainless-steel sinks followed by a chest-high concrete divider followed by three matching toilets, two for No. 1 and one for No. 2 (and woe be it to the man who gets those confused!), and in the very back are two individual, semi-enclosed showers, one for hygiene and one for less-than-hygienic purposes. From floor to second-story ceiling, the walls are made of interlacing concrete blocks painted eggshell, and the floor is poured concrete. I sleep on a boat in the common area because the cameras can only view so far back among the bunks, and that is where bad things happen.

On any given day we are an unhappy "family" of more than 30, counting those of us riding "boats" up in the front.

The showers are push-button, and in any other pod, the button-pushing gives you about 30 seconds of ice-cold water sprayed at torrential pressures, a half-minute swim against a dam-burst of pine needles wrapped in icicles. The guards—excuse me, COs—will tell you that the water gets hot, but I've never seen a guard taking a shower … and yes, that is something many, including myself, would very much like to see. In our pod, though, the water is hotter than a Tahitian atoll at bomb-testing time because one of the guys has busted it so that it runs constantly, allowing the water the time it initially needed to warm up. But its strength is also its weakness: the noise fills the room 24/7 with an industrial "hiss" that sounds like a fireman's heavy hose turned directly on your ear. Now, late at night, as I curl into a tighter fetal fist in my canoe, the "hiss" is a monotonously steady (and angry) background tune—one scratchy note of Muzak in an elevator going nowhere—to the cacophonous mumble of noise made by the men back in the bunks talking, shooting dice shaved out of the "balls" from the jail-issue roll-on antiperspirant, or working out with weights made from mop handles and garbage bags filled with water and wrapped and tied in sheets.

Sometimes men scream out for no apparent reason, or moan, while the rest of us turn inward and silently wish we were somewhere, anywhere, else.

It's well past midnight now, long past when the harsh halogen light of day gives way to the softer mood lighting of night, though it is not dark. No, never dark in the box. Then the walls might fall away and a man might get the idea that he's no longer inside the funhouse of our nightmares, a place where every day is literally worse than the day before. Most of the men are awake, time in the box having some effect on a person's circadian rhythms; that, or maybe the shadows, and the guards' retreat away from them, afford a man the chance to feel himself freer … but certainly not "free."

The din the men are making has a particularly needling undercurrent of anxiety tonight, as the guards had tossed the pod earlier in the evening after a few of the men smoked a contraband cigarette back in the showers, one that had been brought in by a freckled-faced White kid barely in his 20s who worked in the kitchen and was fighting a charge that had made the local news, though I can't recall now what it was. I don't think it was murder—though folks awaiting trial for capital offenses are allowed to work in the kitchen while those of us serving for "gender" crimes are not. Somehow the guards got wind of the smoke, and when the men refused to name names, the bulls ushered us across the hall into a large "recreation" room with a small bank of monitors on one wall—and little else—that are used for visiting day. No, it's not like on TV where we all sit around in a big room—cons, family, and guards—and have ourselves a festive time or you and a loved one talk on phones on either side of a Plexiglas divider. In the Poisonville jail, you video chat.

In addition to a plastic, "pillowed" mat, bed linen, and a canoe if bunks aren't available, inmates are given a plastic collapsible bag about big enough to hold one of those standard-sized boxy TVs that you only see now in old shows on your new flat-screen TV. In the bag are stored all of your worldly possessions. The guards had tossed the mats and linens and dumped the contents of all the inmates' bags on the floor, creating a kind of post-tornado-through-an-office-building swirl of legal papers, letters, books, drawings, and all the other detritus collected by us, society's dregs.

And, of course, as everyone picked through everyone else's stuff, disagreements ensued and tempers flared. Two men in their late 20s or early 30s—that still-full-of-piss-and-vinegar age—who in the past had been friendly for all outward appearances, raged at each other—one on each side of the center row of bunks—over a "missing" mat. Apparently one felt the other had stolen his mat during the ensuing cleanup, and the case of mistaken mat identity was only contributed to by the fact that the guards had returned us to the pod in small groups, thus allowing the first to pillage the last, if that were indeed the case.

As I lie squirming in my canoe, the oppressive noise of the room pressing down on me bubble-wrapped in my blanket, the vision of the man who lost his mat pushes away sleep. I see him, utterly defeated but unwilling to concede defeat, straining against being held back by a bigger, older, and well-respected inmate, nearly in tears as his voiced cracked when he finished each exclamation about reclaiming his mat with "my nigga!" As in "You know that's my mat, my nigga! I put that mark on the pillow, my nigga! Give me back my fucking mat, MY NIGGA!"

He didn't get it back. You get called out stealing and admit it, you might as well "get on the door," an expression that roughly translates to calling the guards to request a transfer to another pod for reasons of safety, derived from the location of the intercom button to summon our keepers; also, the button next to the door is surrounded by Plexiglas, allowing for visual contact.

So the man who stole the mat would not give way and the other man would not resort to violence to retrieve it. An equilibrium was later reached when one of our trustees—those fortunate inmates who work around the jail—brought a "Cadillac of mats" to the guy who'd lost out, one of the jail's newer models with large, attached pillows.

And it's those kinds of things that become so important: your mat, which bunk you get (lower is better, but as in all real estate, it's location, location, location), whether you've got money on your books so that you can get commissary. An inmate can make a lot of friends if he can afford a weekly ration of coffee, foodstuffs being the primary currency of exchange between the incarcerated, although there are other "things" that are bartered. Like all places where small groups gather—the classroom, the boardroom, the box—the "atmosphere" is dictated by the participants. There was only one pod I was in where the homoeroticism of pent-up men with impulse control issues was palpable, and that might've had something to do with having an openly gay man in the cell. Perhaps it's the knowledge that blow jobs were available in the showers for a bag of Snyder's of Hanover Jalapeno Pretzel Pieces that was agitating the men and charging the atmosphere, as only here were the jokes about guy sex constant, with men regularly putting their arms around other men, saying, "Hey, girl!" in that singsongy way that indicates a come-on. I never saw the sex, or much evidence of it, but I wasn't particularly interested. Like most of the men, I found solace jacking it in the showers, an activity much discussed among all the men, with constant references to going to "flush some babies down the drain."

Violence and the threat of it, however, were a constant of jail life. Yes, some of us certainly were men of violence, but you crowd anyone into a box for long enough and opportunities are going to find that person to express himself through aggression. The boredom, the oppressive nature of the environment, the monotony, the ever-closing-in walls … but especially the boredom. The worst I saw of it, an older, bigger kid threw a cup of urine on a younger, weaker one (both were kids to me), and when the little guy got up to walk tall, the bigger kid beat him unconscious before somebody got on the door and both kids were taken away. When almost any disagreement occurs, everybody involved gets tossed from the pod, regardless of who's right or wrong. One strike and you're out, off to another box where you might better fit in.

Twice I came close to fighting with the same man, both times related to disagreements over ownership, with me trying and failing to enforce the general rule of my possession of my stuff being nine-tenths. But Eric, or "E," didn't see it my way, didn't like the percentages. Now, I'm an admitted coward. Had I been a braver man, I would have killed myself when I was in the box, but my great desire was thwarted by my much, much greater fear. Still, I very much wanted to fight with this man but not to avenge a wrong he'd done against me. In fact, though I was reasonably sure I could take him, the compulsion to fight was motivated as much, if not more, by my desire to be hit and to feel pain. When all the rage in your mind seeks to rend you apart, there is a calming power to physical pain. But please, for God's sake, don't vent your rage on a wall in front of your significant other! One of my bunkies got a two-month vacation in the box for shadowboxing in front of his soon-to-be ex-wife!

Still, I don't know what to tell you. I turned all that rage inward and now I'm a walking, talking vegetable, a ghost. A person who looks like me but, like one of the pod people from Invasion of the Body Snatchers, just doesn't seem quite "right" anymore. A man who dogs bark at, someone with a soullessness in the eyes.

That "E" was Black—and still is, I would assume, if he is "still is"—and I am White had nothing whatsoever to do with our scuffles. In the box, as in the world outside, race does matter, but it's far from the racial gang wars of life in your average prison. I've thought about this a bit and concluded that there are reasons this divvying up in racial gangs is less prominent in jail. You see, there is nowhere to retreat to in the box, so there's more pressure to "get along." Prison is a "world," a city unto itself where cons move from and through a maze of boxes. In such a maze, you need someone to watch your back, but in the box, your back is always against the wall and therefore not in so much need of watching.

In prison, a man works, goes outside to "The Yard," takes his meals at the cafeteria. In the box, there is only the box.

Because Poisonville's rotating 2,000-plus daily collection of society's underclass skews African-American, the jail makes it a matter of policy to divide pods up about 50–50 along racial lines, with a few Hispanics and maybe the odd-man-out Asian thrown in for good measure. Now the great revelation I had about race relations while I was in the box was somewhat unexpected: age trumps race. When you controlled for the fact that Whites and Blacks lived in different areas, went to different schools, were familiar with different landmarks and memorable events in the community, it was age more than anything that determined who was playing cards, working out, or just hanging out with whom. I shared much more in common with older Black inmates than I did with younger White ones, and if the old Black guys I hung out with were any indication, they felt pretty much the same way. The young'uns still had something to prove and this, coupled with the general fidgetiness of youth, made them volatile, erratic. The older men could be just as loose-screwy, but by a certain age, the need to prove oneself becomes a ridiculously pointless exercise in futility, and it is then, perhaps, that the boy becomes the man. All of the older men, Black or White, repeatedly expressed the same sense of remorse for the lives they'd misspent and, shockingly, how when they got out they wanted to make it right, especially for their kids. Over and over again I heard the same refrain from the older inmates, and even from many of the younger ones: "I got to get back to my kids!"

I could spend the same amount of time trying to write out an explanation of what it's like to be locked up as I actually spent locked up, but even then I wouldn't quite get it right. The closest you could probably come to replicating it in the "real" world is to invite four of five strangers over to spend a long weekend with you in a closet. If the lot of you don't come out mad or dead, then you're on your way to understanding the carefree life of the caged.

Honestly, I'll never visit a zoo again … and I loved the fucking zoo.

And now, back in my boat, the evening is stretching into that zone of twilight, the sounds of the pod permeating me so thoroughly that I have become both another vessel and transmitter as I sink deeper into that Black Pool of Unconsciousness that has no bottom …

And suddenly, I am lying on a paved street in the middle of nowhere, a black ribbon of asphalt surrounded by the hovering waves of heat coming off of an indistinct horizon. I'm on my back staring straight up into nothing, a giant tire on the most monstrous of monster trucks—a muscled-up dump truck or cement mixer—slowly crawling up my stomach to come to rest on my chest. The gears whistle and squeak as they're shifted into park, permanently. The weight is unbearable, and each time I exhale, the tire digs a little deeper into my chest, and when I try to inhale, resistance, as they say, is futile. Each exhale, the truck crushes down upon me a little more until I begin to hear my ribs cracking and my flesh ripping like thick typing paper, and just as the tire slams through me to the ground, I wake up in my boat back in the box.

But I still can't breathe! It's as though the four walls are right on top of me, the Orwellian boot of Big Brother stepping down hard on my throat, forever!

And then, like some character in that movie about dreams within dreams, I wake up … again. And even though now, when I wake up, I'm on the outside, I'm always on the inside.

Yes, I'm still the man in the box, up to my eyebrows in shit, and nobody … nobody can save me.

Postscript: How I got in the box is another story for another time.

Sexodus: Why are young men giving up on women?

AVfM Video Source · 23 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The “Sexodus”—we’ve heard the term bandied about a lot lately as a reference to the increasing numbers of men shunning marriage and traditional relationships with women. Whether we call them bachelors, celibates, Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW), or Grass Eaters, the trend appears to be spreading across the world.

To no sane person’s surprise, the Social Justice Warrior set has recently begun openly advocating doxxing and violence and harassment.

Noel Plum has watched the breakdown of Atheism+ due to heavy-handed feminist influence, and he brings it to light in many of his YouTube videos.

The sexual assault that nobody saw

John Stuart Mill · 23 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

What would happen if a skit making light of rape or sexual assault was aired during a prime-time comedy show broadcast by a national public broadcaster? If the victim was female, the outcry from media commentators would be widespread and the responses from sexual assault activists and advocates would be of outrage and condemnation. In this case, however, the victim is male—and the response has been an overwhelming silence.

On December 3, the Australian Broadcasting Corporation (ABC) aired a skit titled "Tatiana The Cultural Excuse Girl, Part 2, The Bedroom" as part of the indigenous comedy program Black Comedy. As part of marketing and promoting the show, the skit has also been uploaded to the official ABC Indigenous YouTube channel,[1] where it has received a predominantly positive response.

So what is wrong with the skit? Tatiana initiates sex with her partner, who is not interested. He is tired, has a headache, and has an early start at work the next day. He explicitly rebuffs her advances, saying no multiple times and demanding her to stop. After multiple attempts to get him to have sex with her, she finally emotionally blackmails him through an accusation that he is racist if he refuses. Faced with this, he submits to having sex with her.

So what is wrong with all of this?

Over the past few decades, the discussion surrounding consent obtained through intimidation and coercion has made it clear that it isn't actually consent at all. Organisations such as DVConnect in Queensland, Australia, use this in their definition of what constitutes consent, as stated on their web page about what constitutes sexual assault:

> Sexual Assault in an intimate partner relationship is often entwined with emotional and other forms of blackmail, it includes a range of behaviours including but not limited to the following:-
> Sexual assault during which; physical force or restraint is used.
> Coercion into sexual intimacy using a range of threats such as:- physical violence, withholding household finances or support, diminished access to medical or psychological support or medication, having you deported from Australia because you are on a spousal visa, demeaning you to family and friends.
> Coercion into sexual intimacy under threat; whether it be to end the relationship or marriage, to withhold your rights during Property Settlement or to abuse the children including threats to seek intimacy with your daughter or son.
> Coercion into sexual intimacy because it is your obligation as a marital partner to provide sex to your partner, making you feel that your refusal to engage in sexual intimacy is abnormal and where the perpetrating partner is male, that it is a "man's right" to seek out and receive sex from his partner.
> Often your partner may constantly harass you, wearing you down until you give in sexually to "keep the peace" or you know that if you don't comply with the wishes of that partner, it could be dangerous for you or you know the consequences.[2]

Based on this definition, it is extremely hard to argue that the skit doesn't involve consent obtained through intimidation or coercion. Tatiana makes it clear that it is her partner's obligation to have sex with her. She continually harasses him in an effort to wear him down and make him "keep the peace," finally threatening to demean him to his family and friends by calling him a racist.

This sort of definition isn't used by only DVConnect—it is widespread and used by the majority of rape and domestic violence service providers as well as government agencies providing policy directions. A similar definition is also used by organisations working with male victims of sexual assault, such as Living Well:

> Although the majority of sexual assaults of men are committed by men, women do sexually assault men. Sexual assault is not always enacted through overwhelming physical force: it can involve emotional manipulation whereby a man can be coerced into sexual act out of fear of potential repercussions for his relationships, work, etc.[3]

It's no coincidence that all these definitions make it clear that consent obtained through intimidation and coercion isn't actually consent. It's just a reflection of Australian legislation, the legislation that was passed after lobbying from sexual violence researchers, advocates, and activists to include these things.

Let's have a closer look at the legislation involved.

In Queensland, this is governed by section 348 of the Criminal Code (1899):

> a person's consent to an act is not freely and voluntarily given if it is obtained … by threat or intimidation.[4]

In New South Wales, it is governed by section 61HA of the Crimes Act (1900):

> the grounds on which it may be established that a person does not consent to sexual intercourse include: … if the person has sexual intercourse because of intimidatory or coercive conduct, or other threat, that does not involve a threat of force.[5]

In the Australian Capital Territory, it is governed by section 67 of the Crimes Act (1900):

> the consent of a person to sexual intercourse with another person, or to the committing of an act of indecency by or with another person, is negated if that consent is caused … by a threat to publicly humiliate or disgrace, or to physically or mentally harass, the person or another person.[6]

In Tasmania, it is governed by Schedule 1 of the Criminal Code Act (1924):

> a person does not freely agree to an act if the person … agrees or submits because of a threat of any kind against him or her or against another person.[7]

In South Australia, it is governed by section 46 of the Criminal Law Consolidation Act (1935):

> a person is taken not to freely and voluntarily agree to sexual activity if … the person agrees because of … an express or implied threat to degrade, humiliate, disgrace or harass the person or some other person.[8]

In Victoria, it is governed by section 36 of the Crimes Act (1958):

> Circumstances in which a person does not freely agree to an act include the following … the person submits because of the fear of harm of any type to that person or someone else.[9]

In the Northern Territory, it is governed by section 192 of Schedule 1 of the Criminal Code Act:

> Circumstances in which a person does not consent to sexual intercourse or an act of gross indecency include circumstances where … the person submits because of force, fear of force, or fear of harm of any type, to himself or herself or another person.[10]

In Western Australia, it is governed by section 319 of the Criminal Code Act Compilation Act (1913):

> consent means a consent freely and voluntarily given and, without in any way affecting the meaning attributable to those words, a consent is not freely and voluntarily given if it is obtained by force, threat, intimidation, deceit, or any fraudulent means.[11]

It is also interesting to note that section 319 also defines "to sexually penetrate" as including "to engage in cunnilingus or fellatio." Sections 327 and 328 of the same act recognise the crimes of "Sexual coercion" and "Aggravated sexual coercion," which is defined as "a person who compels another person to engage in sexual behaviour is guilty of a crime and is liable to imprisonment for 20 years."[11]

The skit clearly portrays sexual coercion and as such is a crime under the present legislation in all Australian states and territories. The threat involved is an accusation of being a racist. Within the context of the relationship, this threat has little meaning and consequence except for the mental health of the man and the health of the relationship itself. The major impact of the threat is the harm to the man's standing with others outside the relationship should the accusation of racism be made publicly, something that is strongly implied. A public accusation of racism has a potential direct impact on both the man's professional and other personal relationships—it is something that could be used to destroy him. It is hard to argue that this is not a threat (either implicit or explicit) to publicly humiliate or disgrace him if he doesn't comply with her demands.

So where are the public condemnations and outrage directed at this skit? It's not like ABC comedy shows haven't been criticised for rape jokes in the past, such as The Hungry Beast in 2009[12] and Summer Heights High in 2007.[13]

As prominent Australian feminist commentator Clementine Ford has said, rape jokes just aren't funny, especially if they come at the expense of victims.

> As a general rule, I think that the victim of the act should never be the victim of the punchline. So a rape joke where the follow-through is someone getting raped doesn't seem particularly funny to me. A rape joke whose punchline is an evisceration of rape culture is different—it's clever, it's transgressive. It means something. This is what the people defending Daniel Tosh (a comedian who responded to a female heckler complaining about a rape joke by saying, "Wouldn't it be funny if that lady got raped by, like, five guys right now?") didn't get.[14]

I didn't find anything about this skit funny, absolutely nothing. If anything, it is one of the most disturbing things I have ever seen—its premise is absolutely believable and that is a real problem. It's not an eviscerating critique of rape culture but rather an example of it, diminishing and marginalising male victims of rape and sexual assault by their female partners.

And the most disturbing thing of all is that I know that Australian rape and sexual assault advocates and activists know about it and are remaining silent. I know because after a week of this being ignored in the media I picked up the phone and called an advocacy and support organisation for male victims of sexual assault. I had verbal assurances that this was unacceptable and there would be media action on this. I saw the plays this video received rise by over 1,000 in four hours after I brought this to their attention (and after the views had remained relatively static for a week).

Even though they know, there have been no media releases, no public statements, and no media commentary. The silence is still deafeningly loud. What does this say about community attitudes toward sexual violence against men in Australia, where a man can be sexually assaulted on national television and nobody says a thing?

The scenario doesn't fit the dominant narrative, and if anything it is a realistic portrayal of the most prevalent form of the sexual abuse of men in heterosexual relationships. It's both confronting and awkward for those who control the narrative, but ignoring it and hoping it will go away just won't work.

My question to the sexual assault advocacy and activist communities in Australia is quite simple. Where the fuck are you?

The NFL, male suicide, and lost opportunities

Ty Henry · 23 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Author's note: I wrote this piece against the backdrop of the concussion controversy that engulfed the NFL and has since spread to college and high school racks with lawsuits on how players with brain trauma were dealt with—an obvious men's issue.

The catalyst for public awareness of the issue was the suicides of some NFL players and, specifically, how the broader narrative tied the suicides to chronic encephalopathy (CTE), which is a brain tissue loss disorder linked to repeated head trauma. However, the link of CTE to suicide is far from conclusive at this point, and there certainly is no causal link. What we do know to be true is the link to suicide and certain other external conditions, regardless of prior head injuries, that these men were also experiencing. In the wake of another recent suicide by a college athlete, Kosta Karageorge of Ohio State, I thought it would be worth sharing here on AVfM as a demonstration that any discussion on men's health that implicates institutional male marginalization or hypergamy-associated financial woes is often verboten, even in ostensibly "male" endeavors. Sports media, like the culture at large, only addresses these matters through the prism of corporate neglect or malfeasance, which all but guarantees the scourge of male suicide will continue unabated.

Quickly: What did Junior Seau, Andre Waters, Terrell Owens, and Dave Duerson all have in common?

A) Acrimonious family breakups/custody disputes
B) CTE
C) Financial issues

If you chose only "B," you'd be wrong.

Though the national sports media treated the news with the attention we pay to a TV show's closing credits, Junior Seau's brain showed no trauma (author's update: Seau's brain later showed evidence of some CTE).

This in no way suggests that football played no part in the deaths or problems of any of these men, nor that we should not continue the heightened vigilance over head trauma. It is merely to suggest that in our endless obsession over the exotic, we miss the mundane.

Eric Adelson's piece on O.J. Murdock's death represents the most high-profile departure from the "CTE/concussions = suicide" herd. More journalists should be asking the question, "Is football killing them?" Here is what they might find out.

Men in the US, the UK, and Ireland are four to five times more likely to commit suicide than women. In 2007, 27,000 American men committed suicide compared with 7,000 women. While divorce and unemployment do not change these rates for women, the same factors spike male rates. As father's advocate Glenn Sacks points out:

> Because our society strongly defines manhood as the ability to work and provide for one's loved ones, unemployed men often see themselves as failures and as burdens to their families.

Think about it. Sacks points to the farmer suicides tripling during the Midwest crisis of the 1980s, as well as the male suicide crest after the Flint, Michigan, auto industry cratered.

The other main risk factor, shared by the men named, is divorce or support/custody issues. When kids are involved, divorced dads are 10 times more likely to end their lives than divorced moms. Simply, women almost always receive custody and thus do not lose their role as mother like men lose their role as father, according to attorney and psychologist Bruce Hillowe. Men often become estranged, their only nexus to their children often in the form of a check—or a jail sentence if they can no longer pay it.

We understand the ferocity with which these men played the game. What we don't know is the impact on Seau of his divorce and the impending loss of his restaurant. Or that Waters was in a bitter custody dispute over his daughter, whose mom had relocated her to Arizona from Florida. We glossed over Dave Duerson's bankruptcy and his ex-wife's filing just three months prior that he was concealing $70,000 in assets. That Owens, though now on the cusp of being back on an NFL roster, was facing occupational irrelevance, looming child-support/mortgage debt, and no income just 10 months ago when he was admitted to an LA hospital.

The question is often asked of these men, as we ask of men whose suffering comes into light only after they act out, "Why did you not ask for help?" Going forward, the answer will be in how we address the disparate manner in which we 1) treat the genders' health and 2) treat the genders in family disputes. Will we demand that the Affordable Care Act (aka "Obamacare"), which calls for free wellness checkups for women, do the same for men as it does for women? Is there a "Race for the Cure" for prostate cancer? Will we contemplate presumptive joint custody or giving dads custody more often, lifting their financial support burdens while keeping their emotional connections with their children normalized? We pay lip service of our concern to these men after they're gone, but will we continue to neglect the simple steps to show we care when they're here? Will we begin to respect the essential humanity of men beyond their ability to provide and protect?

Or will we continue to dishonor these men of action with just more talk?

“Men are selfish, uncaring idiots”

Joe Wilson · 23 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Note: This article is also available in Romanian.

Last month, a study in the British Medical Journal (BMJ) declared all men to be idiots. More recently, a new study claims that men have no empathy toward others except for themselves. You can almost set your clock to the steady stream of literature aimed to cast all men as uncaring, inferior beasts of nature.

The “idiot” study

The BMJ “idiot study” had little to do with real science and more to do with perpetuating the gynocentric social agenda to cast all men as inferior and to project women as superior.

In reality, men conform to a bimodal distribution of intelligence rather than the Gaussian distribution displayed by women. Men and women will have equal intelligence when you average everything out. When you analyze the distributions, you find, however, that there are more men who make up the lower distribution of the intelligence scale than there are women, but there are also more men on the higher intelligence scale than there are women. Some have argued that this distribution explains why you have more male geniuses but also have more male idiots. The (male) authors of this study conveniently left out this important former piece of evidence. But please don’t blame them—they probably fall into the lower spectrum of male intelligence.

For more information, I direct you to an excellent interview with Camille Paglia.

Determining empathy

As mentioned, a more recent study concludes that women are more empathetic than men. Researchers used data from 20,000 people across Australia involved in the Household, Income and Labour Dynamics in Australia (HILDA) Survey to analyze how the mental health of individuals changed when something happened to their partner. One of the researchers, Dr. Cindy Mervin, stated:

> It is not that men are unemotional or uncaring, since they are quite strongly affected by what happens to themselves, but they simply are not very emotional when it comes to the feelings of their partner.

This is a strong statement because it assumes that men are inferior when it comes to thinking about their partners and it claims that men are self-centered. I’d like to tell that to the three girls who lost their boyfriends during the James Holmes “Dark Knight” Aurora Massacre, when in a last act of heroism the boys covered their girlfriends with their own bodies—shielding and protecting them from gunfire. I bring this up because of the statistic: if one boy did this, it would be an anomaly, but that three young men acted independently to do this at one time speaks more to the nature of how men feel about others.

As someone accustomed to reviewing peer-reviewed research papers, I was, however, intrigued and wanted to get my hands on a copy of the analysis. Specifically I was interested to see how the HILDA study would have dealt with the rather difficult job of calibrating perceptions of empathy between the sexes? Empathy is defined as “the ability to understand and share the feelings of another.” It is different from “sympathy” in one crucial detail—that is, for someone to be empathetic, you had to have experienced the ordeal before you can relate intimately with the other person.

If, for instance, a friend’s pet—let’s say his dog dies—you can sympathize with him, especially if you had your pet hamster die. However, unless you had a dog and experienced the dog’s death, you couldn’t empathize with your friend. Personally, I recall the day a friend called me up to say he was going to miss our previously scheduled engagement because his pet German shepherd had died. He fell into depression, and I recall meeting him a few days later and he cried his eyeballs out. I remember thinking, “Wow, Pete’s a really sensitive guy. It was just a dog … it’s not as if it were a human.” It wasn’t until a decade later when my wife and I decided to get a dog and then I lost “Buddy” to cancer a few years after that I was truly in a position to empathize with my friend and his loss. Even many years later, I still mourn the loss of Buddy—anyone who has experienced the loss of a dog knows what I’m talking about.

So having experienced the same traumatic event brings you that much closer to understanding the other person. But empathy gets more complicated because there are physical as well as psychological aspects—both which differ between the sexes. I can never empathize with a girl who is experiencing menstrual cramps, just like she’ll never know what it feels like to get kicked in the nuts. If researchers wanted to demonstrate that getting kicked in the balls was more painful, they would have to first find a way of quantifying the experience of pain. You would also have to control for any of the many factors that can influence your results. For instance, circumcised men tend to be more sensitive to pain than women.

I can’t comment on the study since I haven’t seen it yet; however, by the statement released from the researchers it appears that one measure was to determine how the mental health of individuals changed when something happened to their partner. Feeling depressed because your husband lost his job doesn’t necessarily mean you are depressed because you feel for him. It could also mean that you are concerned for your own livelihood. So I am eager to get a copy of the study and look at the types of questions that were asked in the study … and to determine how they analyzed the data. I hope I’ll have a follow-up article.

“What we’ve known all along”

In the pursuit to determine which sex is more empathetic, researchers often have to account for the fact that women appear to be able to assess the emotional states of others more accurately than men. That is something that science has determined now for some time. In particular, girls and women have an advantage over boys and men for accuracy in judging emotional cues based on facial expressions, body posture, and vocal intonation. A quick scan of the extensive number of articles that are covering this latest empathy study are also making the assertion that “it’s something we’ve known all along.” Intuitively, we make the (false) assertion that women must be more empathetic because they have this skill of reading emotions.

But does the ability to “read” emotions in people make you more empathetic?

Interestingly, it has been shown that psychopaths are often remarkably good at assessing the emotions of others. It has also been shown that psychopaths completely lack empathy. Now, the purpose here is not to make the assertion that women are psychopaths(!), but it illustrates an important point: that the ability to read emotions is separate from the ability to be empathetic. Psychopaths use the ability to read emotions for one reason and one reason only—for their own personal benefit.

Instead of trying to superficially describe the differences between men and women and make straw man assumptions that purport a “win” in the tally of male/female differences, we should really focus on how our differences complement each other. And in the unlikely event that men are shown to be less empathetic, the data from these studies should be used to find ways to help improve the disadvantaged group—not to make them feel less valued as human beings.

’Twas the night before a feminist Christmas

AVFM · 24 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

’Twas the night before a feminist Christmas, when all through the house
Not a creature was stirring, ’cept Diana Boston and her mouse.
The blanties were hung by the chimney with care,
In hopes that St. Dworkin soon would be there.

The gender studies students were nestled snug in their beds,
While visions of slut walks danced in their heads.
With me in bed all warm with my cats,
I’d closed SCUM Manifesto and decided to nap.

When out on the lawn there arose such a clatter,
I sprang from my bed thinking a stalker on ladder.
Away to the window I flew like a flash,
Tripping on my dildo I fell with a crash.

I peered through the window like an old creepy male.
I stared out and exclaimed, “Oh man—what the hell!”
What to my oppressed eyes then did appear,
But a pink sleigh pulled by eight flying simps in bondage gear.

With a hairy old driver so angry, that bitch!
I smiled ever so slightly while my panties did twitch.
More rapid than state funding, her flying monkeys came,
And she hissed and she cursed and she called them by name:

“Now Kimmel, now Stewart, now Clinton and Alda!
On Gosling, on Flood, on Biden—Obama!
To the top of the porch! To the top of the wall!
Now dash away! Dash away! Cis male scum ’n all!”

To the women’s shelter rooftop the male feminists flew,
With the sleigh full of hate and St. Dworkin too.
As I drew in my head and was turning around,
Down the chimney St. Dworkin came with a bound.

She was dressed all in spandex from her head to her foot,
And her clothes were all stained with much food grease and soot.
A bundle of baby foreskins she had flung on her back,
And she looked like a whore with a huge sagging rack.

Her eyes were hollow and her moles were hairy.
Her hair was all matted with spittle—quite scary.
Her gaping mouth was drawn down in a frown.
Her breath smelled of cat shit and her teeth were all brown.

Her shirt said “#YesAllWomen” and “men are dumb.”
I knew right then that I wanted me some.
She had a hideous face and a huge round belly
That shook when she talked, like old K-Y Jelly.

She was crusty and smelly—a ripe old self,

And I sighed when I saw her in spite of myself.
With a fart and a scratch she started to work,
Filling the panties, and then turned with a jerk,

Grabbing her crotch and picking her nose,
Then giving a huff, up the chimney she rose.
Waddling to the sleigh, to her oppressors she yelled.
And away they all flew—like their balls that she held.

But I heard her swear as she drove out of sight,
“#killallmen and to all women good night!”

Top 10 feminist failures of Jessica Valenti in 2014

August Løvenskiolds · 24 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In her otherwise delightful opinion piece entitled "Top 10 feminist fiascoes [sic] of 2014," author Charlotte Allen (@meancharlotte on Twitter) made a crucial oversight: none of the fiascos mentioned Jessica Valenti (@JessicaValenti), a "daily" (more or less) professional feminist columnist for The Guardian. It is shocking that poor, inept Jessica didn't get a "Feminist Screw-up Achievement Award," or at least an Honorable Mention, for reifying some of the worst stereotypes of feminists as goofy, lying, man-hating, money-grubbing whiners with no redeeming characteristics whatsoever.

Now, in defense of Allen, 10 slots is a small palette, and the huge number of feminist fiascos this past year gave Allen a lot to choose from. Allen did single out Amanda Marcotte as the penultimate fiasco and noted three of Marcotte's more egregious catcalls, but this is no excuse to pass over Valenti's menstrual-blood-painted door frame.

Shall we get on to it then?

10. Blood money.

> We need to move beyond the stigma of "that time of the month"—women's feminine hygiene products should be free for all, all the time.—Jessica Valenti

While most "empowered" feminists are content babbling for government handouts in the form of free food, free housing, free abortions, and free birth control, Valenti goes further and demands that big daddy government flows her some cash to pay for her monthly blood plugs. In her August 11 column, "The case for free tampons," Valenti argues that although First World women sporting the latest designer fashions can run companies and governments, they are too frail and ineffectual to pay for their own menstruation products, citing her own fumbling embarrassment at menarche as proof of her case.

Never mind that the vast variety of feminine hygiene products available today arose through free market competition—the melee of free government-issued menstrual rags would likely have all the comfort and convenience of a monthly tax audit.

Fail.

9. Equality with men means that only women can choose abortion.

There are a variety of arguments why women should have the choice to abort their pregnancies in certain circumstances. I generally have little disagreement with some of them—notably but not limited to incest, rape, severe genetic or developmental abnormalities, or even the nebulous "health of the mother."

In my understanding, A Voice for Men has no formal position on abortion, leaving the controversial question open to the individual conscience of those concerned with the issue as long as men and women retain equal rights in the process. I agree that this is as it should be.

But Valenti loves abortion because … equality with men?

> The hard part about arguing that abortion is necessary for women's equality, of course, is that there are still too many people who don't see women's pursuit of happiness as an unalienable right.—Jessica Valenti

Notice the phrasing here: "women's pursuit of happiness" as a right. Not men's, but only women's.

Equality in reproductive rights would mean a balancing of the rights of both men and women. That I have to mansplain this to feminists is an indication that feminism's version of "equality" is nothing more than a sick political ruse to advance women at the expense of men.

If women have the right to reject becoming a parent during pregnancy, then a real concern for equality would demand that men should have similar rights.

If women have the right to reject continuing as a parent under "safe haven laws," then men should be able to reject the legal obligations of parenthood and opt out of child support and other such laws.

For good or ill, that is what equality means.

Abusing equality to gain a unilateral abortion right for women (but not men) is illustrative of how feminism in general and Valenti in particular undermine the very idea of equality that they supposedly support.

8. Hating women who disagree with my feminism.

> When men are against feminism, it's frustrating, if ultimately predictable—groups with power have always been loathe [sic] to give it up. But when women come out against gender justice, it feels worse: no matter how fringe, the rise of the anti-feminist woman is not just baffling but a betrayal.—Jessica Valenti

Setting aside that women dominate society's power structures—family, education, employment, the ballot box, criminal justice, healthcare spending, and longevity—when you look below the man-hating surface of her feminism, Valenti carries even more contempt for those women with the audacity to disagree with even the most egregious feminist lies. In her July column bewailing the Hobby Lobby birth control decision, "Punching Gloria Steinem … ," Valenti conflated every female opponent of feminism, no matter how nuanced or well-researched, into a single, amorphous blob of vicious betrayers of womanhood. In doing so, she proved that feminism is only for feminists, not women, and that feminists are authoritarians who will punish any women who deviates from their party line.

Of course, Valenti still believes the thoroughly debunked wage gap, rape culture, and one-in-five rape lies that even other feminists are backing away from. Her fidelity to these falsehoods could easily be other enumerated items in this list, but I'm going for gold here.

7. My favorite thing is not-rape.

> That rape is a regular part of The Walking Dead's world is hinted at several times throughout the series: we hear about rapes that have taken place, but we're not forced to endure watching them. For me, this makes all the difference.—Jessica Valenti

In a June column that was unusually weird even for Valenti, "Why do women love The Walking Dead? It might the lack of rape scenes," she gives us an unintended peek at her fetish for sexual assault—a fetish that she shares with almost all modern feminists. Valenti loves loves loves loves loves The Walking Dead—she uses "love" five times in the article, including in the title—and she attributes this love to the fact that sexual assault is never depicted directly?

The thing is, sexual assault is rarely depicted directly outside of fetish porn and a few R-rated movies like The Girl with the Dragon Tattoo. Valenti is obsessed with the political power she can, through rape, leverage against all men through the crimes of a few deviants.

Her love for rape as a political bludgeon is tempered only by the mild discomfort she feels during depictions of rape—she just hates seeing the (fictional) actual victims she exploits having to actually suffer. Otherwise, the sanitized rape suggestions of The Walking Dead she embraces—times five.

Unfortunately for Valenti, or maybe in spite of her, the fall episodes of The Walking Dead included multiple attempted and/or completed sexual assaults against several of the most vulnerable female characters in the show—all of whom, including the beloved Beth, died violently before mid-season.

Fail.

6. A hoax designed to protect and promote women is … wait for it … an attack on women!

During actress Emma Watson's launch of her befuddled feminist #HeForShe campaign, one group of her supporters thought using a nasty threat was a wise way to augment her damselling appeal for men to rescue feminism:

> Rantic Media (also known as Social VEVO), the supposed marketering bros behind the threat—hoax or no, it was still a threat—swears that the goal was to bring attention to the sexism of 4chan and the recent celebrity photo leaks. But sexually threatening an outspoken woman to shine a light on how outspoken women are sexually threatened—well, that's idiotic at best.—Jessica Valenti

"Hoax or no, it was still a threat." Um, no, Jessica—a hoax of a threat, made by one's supporters, is no threat at all, just like a rape hoax is no rape at all. The fix was in.

"Well, that's idiotic at best."—Yes, and not only did you fall for it, Jessica, but you attempted to legitimize feminist liars as reasons to support feminism. You became complicit with the hoax when you equated a fake threat to a real one.

Fail.

5. Feminists love hating men of color for catcalling.

> There is by now a familiar pattern to campaigns to bring attention to the problems women face in the world: sexism gets documented in a way that is irrefutable, it goes viral, and then sexism continues on unabated.—Jessica Valenti

The actual familiar pattern was Valenti's defense of the hyper-racist video from Hollaback!. She was unwavering, even after Hollaback! apologized for demonizing men of color and other attempts to replicate the experiment around the world failed to reproduce either their racist or sexist results.

Fail.

4. Valenti agrees: Feminism makes women victims.

In her July column disputing the charge by #WomenAgainstFeminism that feminism seeks to turn empowered women into victims of patriarchy, Valenti proclaimed,

> … denying that women are a victimized class is simply wrong. What else would you call a segment of the population who are systematically discriminated against in school, work and politics?…
> Naming what is happening to women—that we are being oppressed, held back, and yes, victimized—is not weakness. It takes strength to tell uncomfortable truths.

Is there systemic discrimination in education? There are 12 million women in U.S. colleges today, compared with 9 million men. Numerically, women dominate teaching positions. Fail.

Is there systemic discrimination in work? The wage gap lie has been debunked and women freely sabotage their male colleagues with bogus sexual harassment charges. Fail.

Is there systemic discrimination in politics? Women are a majority of voters—it is not the fault of men that women voters prefer to elect more men than women to office. Fail.

It takes no strength at all for Valenti to continue to spread facile lies.

3. Turning all sex into rape, both on campus and elsewhere.

> … I'm so baffled by the spate of criticism levied against "yes means yes" policies. Are people really so frightened of the consequences of a law that says that all sexual partners must enthusiastically consent?—Jessica Valenti.

In an October column, Valenti used gaslighting bafflement at the affirmative consent, or "yes means yes," laws that require endless call-and-response interrogations at each escalation of sexual activity. As a part of her gaslighting, she conflated the laws with "enthusiastic consent," a separate idea not codified in the laws at all.

Others, including me, have pointed out the fatal weaknesses in these laws and the havoc they will bring to feminism.

Fail.

2. Killing family relationships.

Like many feminists, Valenti loves using intimate partner aggression, neglect, and family violence against her own loved ones.

Sometimes Valenti's family disruption is subtle. At Thanksgiving, she wrote,

> As I prepare to celebrate Thanksgiving with my family this week, I'm acutely aware of how incredibly lucky I am to have a family that loves me, to have food on the table.
> But I'm not thankful….

In September, Valenti argued that despite all evidence it is acceptable for feminist mothers to shirk parental duties by using technology to distract very young children.

Other times she is openly hostile.

In October, she railed against husbands for having less exacting housework standards than women—and ignored evidence proving that men who perform less housework have more satisfying sex lives.

In December, she assailed her husband for being less obsessed about holiday gift-wrapping than she was.

Three days before Christmas, Jessica attacked her own mother for caring about the well-being of their child/grandchild.

Fail.

1. Believe rape hoaxers like Jackie Coakley because they are people.

> Whether she is able to remain anonymous or not, and even though her story of being raped has not been disproven, the fact that Jackie is not and was not a symbol or a cause, but a person, has been lost in the rush to indict her and anyone who believes her.
> I choose to believe Jackie. I lose nothing by doing so, even if I'm later proven wrong—but at least I will still be able to sleep at night for having stood by a young woman who may have been through an awful trauma.—Jessica Valenti (emphasis added)

In her December piece, "Who is Jackie? Rolling Stone's rape story is about a person—and I believe her," Valenti urges us to believe University of Virginia student and rape hoaxer Jackie Coakley, who spun a lurid tale of sexual assault that Rolling Stone printed with little additional corroboration. As detail after detail of Coakley's account was disproven, Rolling Stone disowned her, and Coakley's catfishing of a love interest who had friend-zoned her came to light, Valenti refused to jettison her support for a now obvious liar.

What you lose, Jessica, is credibility, something every journalist should be especially concerned about. By siding with a fake victim—a hoaxer—you lose every single real victim of rape who will now have a harder time making themselves believed. You also lose the innocent men who were falsely accused—but you've never cared about men because you don't see men as people at all.

You are not a journalist, Jessica Valenti. You, like Coakley, are a lying, cheating feminist piece of shit.

Happy New Year!

Merry Christmas!

False rape allegations—An old tradition

Ernest Belfort Bax · 25 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The following gives an account of false sexual assault and rape allegations, and the reasons women manufactured them, that were commonplace 120 years ago when the below article was written by E. Belfort Bax. Were the methods of evidence-gathering 120 years ago faulty? Definitely. Were some genuine victims of sexual assault disbelieved? Unfortunately, yes. Were high numbers of demonstrable false allegations made for ulterior motives? Absolutely. Read on with this fascinating testament to false allegations from over a century ago.—PW

The necessity for careful inquiries into the character and antecedents of witnesses is nowhere so great as in cases of offences against women and girls. Charges so easy to make, so difficult to refute, ought to be regarded with the greatest suspicion, and not be accepted with ready credulity. The bona fides of all witnesses, the character of the accuser ought to he carefully scrutinised. To the undefended prisoner this is impossible. And even if the prisoner is defended, sentimental juries are deaf. Even where the character of the accuser is good, she may very well happen to be a woman of highly hysterical temperament.

The eminent French scientist, M. Brouardel, says of this type of woman: “She is essentially a liar, that is the true criterion of the hysterical woman. Such a one has been known to keep at bay for several years law courts, doctors, her own family, with a rampart built of lies upon lies.” Accusations of sexual offences are readily forced by such women, and unless the juries can be convinced of the irresponsible character of their statements, the liberty and honour of the most innocent man may be destroyed.

That distinguished judge, the late Baron Huddleston, in his charge to the jury on one occasion, referring to the Criminal Law Amendment Acts, stated that in his opinion, after an extensive experience of the Acts, men stood far more in need of protection against women than women against men.

The total oppression inflicted by charges of sexual crime must not be measured by the cases which come into Court. It is a commonplace of the legal profession that for one such case ten are settled out of Court. In other words, a system of blackmail of the worst type finds its direct incentive and opportunity in the present state of legal administration.

The following selection of a few of the cases arising in the years 1894 and 1895 gives some idea of the widespread evils of the present system. It must not be thought for a moment that because these cases have resulted in acquittals no reform is necessary. In view of the law of libel only cases where the accusations have failed can be cited, but every criminal lawyer knows that failure occurs in only a small minority of cases. It must also be borne in mind that such charges entail social infamy unless triumphantly rebutted; a mere acquittal will not suffice.

> 7.–Thos. Moore (44), manager to a tea merchant, was charged with disgraceful conduct to a young girl. He alleged that she began first by kissing him and poking him in the ribs. He was acquitted. May 27th, 1894.
> 8.–Walter Hill was charged at the Old Bailey with indecent assault by Louisa Smart, and Ellen Windram was charged with aiding and abetting him. Hill and Windram were also charged with conspiring to incite Maria Wakefield, a married woman, to commit adultery. The jury stopped the case and acquitted the prisoners. It is to be noted that Mrs. Smart was prosecutrix about the same time in another indecent assault case, and that Ada Wakefield was prosecutrix in a similar case against her uncle which was dismissed. September, 1894.

In a paper read before the Birmingham and Midland Counties Branch of the British Medical Association, on November 9th, 1893, the eminent surgeon, Dr. Lawson Tait, F.R.C.S., thus sums up a large number of cases brought under his notice by the police authorities:–

"In this way I have now reported in all upon nearly a hundred cases, and I have advised prosecution in only six, and in all of these convictions have been obtained. It has, of course, been left to the police to prosecute as they chose on my report in twenty-two cases, and they have refrained from the prosecution in all but seven cases, and of these the bills were ignored in two cases by grand juries, in four light sentences were passed summarily or at sessions for common assaults, and in one case punishment, probably well deserved, was obtained on a charge of wounding another person. In the remainder, about sixty-six, I have advised that no effort at prosecution should be entertained for a moment, and the police have aquiesced in my advice. I say, concerning the number of the last class, 'about sixty-six,' because a number of the cases involved charges concerning two children, so that reckoning from the number of plaintiffs there would be a larger number of cases than if the statistics were taken from a list of defendants, and one case in particular will show how curiously important this may be."

In a further analysis he says:–

"Excluding the special groups I have already alluded to, and a few others, to be excepted for various but not important reasons, I find I am left with a list of nearly fifty, in which there was not the slightest surgical evidence of an assault of any kind having been committed; and from the fact that only in some five or six was the question of a charge on the reduced count even entertained, it must be clear that the amount of manufactured charges of this kind is most alarmingly large. In twenty-six cases there was evidence quite satisfactory that the charges were trumped up from evil motive and in twenty-one the evidence was all in favour of accidental inducements, the children having been seen to be fondled by men of suspicious appearance The first fact that strikes one about these cases is that the average age of the first group of children was within a small fraction of twelve years, whilst the average age of the second group is only seven years. A second material fact is that whilst the second group contains a considerable proportion of children of respectable and even well-to-do people, the former group is entirely composed of children of the lowest class of the population."

BLACKMAIL.

HE further states:–

"There are at least twenty cases on my list where no assault was committed, nor could have any been, consistently with the story and the appearances found, in which blackmailing was deliberately attempted; and I regret to say in many it was successful. One of the most outrageous was a charge of completely successful assault on a girl of fifteen, alleged to have been accomplished at 11 a.m. on one of the iron spiral staircases in the Municipal Art Gallery. The complainant described the place and gave the date and hour with a precision which was remarkable, as also was her description of what took place. She described accurately the attendant, whom she charged by name. Only two things were against her–she was uninjured, and the attendance books of the institution showed conclusively that the defendant had not been at the gallery that day."

"WANDERING SERVANTS" AND FEMALE VIGILANCE COMMITTEES.

THE following passage from his paper throws some light on the origin of many of these charges:–

"The charges in a very large proportion of cases were distinctly based on motives sometimes of the most extraordinary kind, and in the great bulk these motives were malevolent. The 'wandering servant' motive is one of the least harmful, and accounts for a small number. To those who do not understand the phrase I may explain that it simply means that a girl who may have been quite innocently dawdling about till past the hour of return rigidly enforced by a strict mistress, does not go home, but wanders about all night or sleeps in an outhouse. She is either found by the police or goes back home in the morning and concocts on the way a story of rape, particularised by the most minute details, not one of which is corroborated on examination, nor can the police find a scrap of evidence in support of her story. Yet she becomes the interesting prey of some Vigilance Committee, and it is more by good luck than by good guiding, as the Scotch say, that she does not pick out and name some unfortunate man for the gratification of the prurient curiosity of the fussy women who have taken up her case. In one of these cases brought to me the interesting wanderer by misfortune, selected as her victim the husband of the chairwoman of her committee, and thus trouble came upon her and the committee was dissolved."

FORCING A MAN TO MARRY.

Women weeping into handkerchiefs

IN the following cases the facts are instructive as showing the use to which such charges may be put:–

"In one of the cases I regret having advised a prosecution, though technically I was quite right in doing so and bound to do it; but now I have no doubt whatever that the assault was arranged and encouraged, and but for an untimely interruption something more would have followed. The charge preferred was laid solely for the purpose of bringing an unwilling bridegroom to the altar. This effect it had, for on the prosecutrix declaring in the witness-box that if he would keep his engagement and marry her she would withdraw the charge, a sympathetic judge advised him to take the offer, which he unwillingly did under pressure of receiving a nominal sentence. The subsequent history of this couple has convinced me the whole thing was a plant on the unfortunate man."

SPECULATIVE ATTORNEYS AND MILLINERS [TRIFLERS].

IN some of the cases he examined the question of age was important:–

"In a very few of these cases prosecution was not advised and not undertaken by the police on the question of either real or apparent age. The wording of the Criminal Law Amendment Act is made to supply a few of the omissions of the old law concerning rape, and in raising the age under which the consent of the female participator is not recognised, the Act puts the dangerous weapon into the hands of that person of showing that she does not appear to be sixteen.

This is a fertile source of blackmailing, because a girl of fifteen and a half has only to get a man to have connection with her, or to attempt it, and he is at her mercy. If he will pay up his defence is easily arranged by the speculative attorney who is always at the back door of such cases. He has only to plead that he had a discussion with the girl about her age, that he reasonably believed she was over sixteen, and a little skilful millinery displayed in the witness-box settles the release of the defendant. But if he won't pay up then the milliner can make the prosecutrix look much under sixteen, and a heavy sentence is the result. To give an opinion on the part of a skilled expert that a girl is or is not under fourteen, the usual molimenal age, is a matter of infinite ease compared to giving an opinion that the girl is or is not under sixteen. Maturity has been reached, and the changes at fifteen and sixteen are far less than at thirteen and fourteen, a very important fact which has been forgotten."

THE MOTIVE OF MALICE.

THE following passages show that spite is often as potent a motive in these charges as blackmail:–

"There is another and still more dangerous element in these cases, and that is the malice of persons, always women, who practically get up the cases or provoke them, and with this may be placed a few subsidiary influences which may well be classed with this. A few examples of some of them will be given in detail.

"Two children were brought to me (case 56), aged fourteen and eleven and a-half respectively, living in the same set of back houses in a well-known and fairly respectable street, the elder girl looking much older than her ascertained age. The person against whom the charge was made was the father of the older girl, and she made the charge that she found her father indecently assaulting the younger girl. She told the neighbours and the neighbours brought in the police. The younger girl proved to be quite uninjured, but it speedily came out that the elder girl was her own father's regular mistress for more than two years. The girl who was the cause of this action was one of the most virulent little minxes I ever saw, and she made no secret of her reason for splitting on her father being the fact that she found him taking up with another girl. I have included this little wretch as one of the habitual prostitutes, but I do not believe she comes under the definition. She does afford, however, a perfect example of how the great bulk of these charges are brought about."

FEMALE REVENGE ON FATHER OR HUSBAND.

THE following shows that a similar horrible charge may be brought against an innocent man:–

"Two little wretches, of ten and twelve, who had been thrashed by their father for stealing, promptly turned round on him with a charge of having 'seduced' them both, giving here an interesting example of female revenge of the direst kind, attempted at an unusually early age. The charge had not the slightest foundation, and they admitted as much when they found they were not believed. Stepmothers give frequent examples of the same abominable attempts to punish their husbands by trumping up such charges, and in three instances mothers used even their own children as the instruments of their diabolical designs."

PREJUDICE AGAINST ACCUSED.

As to the prejudice accusations of sexual crime incite, Dr. Lawson Tait says:–

"Matters are such under this unrighteous combination that however men may laugh at it and make jokes, they do not willingly travel with single unknown female companions in railway carriages. They know very well that for a man to have the finger of a woman pointed at him with a charge of a sexual offence is to secure that man's extinction, no matter what the verdict of a jury may be. In 1881 (Lond. Med. Gazette) a case was tried in which a girl, to shield herself against her equal share of guilt, charged her partner in it with the crime of rape. The jury could hardly be got to acquit the innocent man even though the prosecutrix had to admit that she never called out, her mother sleeping in the next room, because she was afraid her cries would waken the old lady."

The following indicates strongly one of the disadvantages the undefended prisoner labours under:

DANGER OF RULE ALLOWING UNDEFENDED PRISONER TO GIVE EVIDENCE.

“This new arrangement by which a defendant is allowed to go into the box and give evidence on his own behalf is most mischievous when a poor prisoner is undefended. His poverty involves ignorance, of necessity, and in the hands of a prosecuting barrister his slightest slip in cross-examination will be made to tell against him mercilessly. That is the case if he elects to be sworn. If, on the contrary, he declines, either from ignorance or fear, the jury invariably reckons the fact against him. “I sat through a case quite lately and saw a poor ignorant wretch who, being undefended, did not understand the purport of the invitation, neglected this opportunity. The judge charged clearly in his favour–indeed, there was hardly any evidence against him. But the jury brought him in guilty, and in talking the matter over with one of them after I learned that they were much impressed by the fact that he did not give evidence.”

In considering the results arrived at by Dr. Lawson Tait we must bear in mind that the series of charges he analysed had all been brought under the notice of the police. The vast number of charges compromised for money, without any appeal to the police, must be added to form any fair estimate of the situation. The foregoing catalogue as regards specific crimes is striking enough, but it does not quite exhaust the criminal law privileges of women.

2014 Feminists “Achievements”

SkepTorr has a look at the amazing accomplishments of feminists in the media this year.

These are quite remarkable achievements, wouldn’t you agree?

Most hateful quotes of 2014

Pierce Harlan · 26 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

This year has witnessed a plethora of disturbing comments by influential mainstream writers, feminists, progressives, and others manifesting hostility to due process and college men accused of sexual assault. Which do you think is the most egregious?

1. Amanda Childress, sexual assault awareness program coordinator at Dartmouth College, declared that campus policies aren't going far enough to protect students. She asked, "Why could we not expel a student based on an allegation?" Dartmouth defended Childress's comment, noting that she "was asking a question—a provocative one—meant to generate dialogue around complex issues…."

2. Ms. Magazine quoted Caroline Heldman, a professor at Occidental College, on suits filed by men for alleged violations of their due process rights in connection with sexual assault claims: "These lawsuits are an incredible display of entitlement, the same entitlement that drove them to rape."

3. California's new "affirmative consent" law requires "affirmative" consent at each step of a sexual encounter on its college campuses. The co-author of the bill in the state assembly, Bonnie Lowenthal (D-Long Beach), was asked how an innocent person is supposed to prove consent. She said, "Your guess is as good as mine."

4. Senator Claire McCaskill circulated an extensive survey about sexual assault to 350 college and university presidents. The survey classified persons who make accusations of sexual misconduct as "victims," and in one place called persons merely accused of sexual misconduct "offenders." Then on page 14, it contained this query: "Below is a list of policies and procedures that may discourage victims from disclosing and reporting assaults at some schools…. 1. Disclosure of offender's rights in the adjudication process…." The implication: It is somehow improper to ensure that students accused of serious sexual offenses are aware of their rights.

5. A jury acquitted former Dartmouth student Parker Gilbert of raping a female student at the school in a "he said/she said" dispute. A juror told a reporter: "[The woman's] story of how the night played out, the evidence wasn't there to support that." And: "There is tons and tons of evidence that just doesn't add up." But WISE, an organization that seeks to empower victims of domestic and sexual violence, issued a formal statement: "Today's decision in the Dartmouth rape trial of Parker Gilbert is devastating and there is no doubt that it sends a terrible message to survivors of sexual assault."

6. Duke University Dean of Students Sue Wasiolek was asked what would happen if two students got drunk to the point of incapacity and then had sex. "Assuming it is a male and female, it is the responsibility in the case of the male to gain consent before proceeding with sex," said Wasiolek.

7. Jessica Valenti mocked the efforts of the three mothers who started Families Advocating for Campus Equality (FACE), which seeks to raise awareness about the injustices faced by presumptively innocent college students accused of sexual misconduct. Each of the three FACE founders has been touched directly by campus rape injustice: their sons were ensnared by it. Valenti wrote: "Alternative name for this group: Not My Nigel." Of course, "Not My Nigel" is radical-feminist shorthand to suggest that women who defend their male loved ones accused of rape or similar acts are defending rapists.

8. Ezra Klein evinced satisfaction that possibly innocent young men will be expelled for rapes they didn't commit: "Critics worry that colleges will fill with cases in which campus boards convict young men (and, occasionally, young women) of sexual assault for genuinely ambiguous situations. Sadly, that's necessary for the law's success. It's those cases — particularly the ones that feel genuinely unclear and maybe even unfair, the ones that become lore in frats and cautionary tales that fathers e-mail to their sons — that will convince men that they better Be Pretty D–n Sure."

9. Elisabeth Dee—Stanford class of 2016 and one of the organizers of the "Carry that Weight" demonstration in which students were urged to carry a pillow or mattress around for a day to symbolize the burden placed upon survivors of sexual assault—called on the school to reduce the burden of proof required to find someone guilty of sexual assault (even though Stanford already uses the lowest legally permissible, "preponderance of the evidence"). Dee said that Stanford should not be focusing on "defending the perpetrator, because essentially burden of proof is a defense of the perpetrator."

10. Laura Dunn, executive director of SurvJustice, on why some colleges have pushed back against lowering the standard of proof for sexual assault cases to make it easier to hold young men accused of sexual assault: "To put it bluntly, I think it's arrogance and ingrained male privilege…."

11. Julia Horowitz, a journalist at University of Virginia's school newspaper, wrote that while the Rolling Stone "gang rape" story may be false, "from where I sit in Charlottesville, to let fact checking define the narrative would be a huge mistake."

12. Zerlina Maxwell wrote: "Ultimately, the costs of wrongly disbelieving a survivor far outweigh the costs of calling someone a rapist."

13. Jessica Valenti debated Wendy McElroy at Brown University. A live-blog shows that when a questioner suggested that the conversation had become unnecessarily adversarial, with some people supporting the accuser and others supporting the accused, Valenti responded, "… in the society we live in now, we need to side with the survivors. That might not be a fair and equal thing, but that's how I think it has to be."

14. Sabrina Rubin Erdely, recounting the alleged gang rape of "Jackie" at a University of Virginia frat house in Rolling Stone magazine: "'Grab its motherfucking leg,' she heard a voice say. And that's when Jackie knew she was going to be raped. She remembers every moment of the next three hours of agony, during which, she says, seven men took turns raping her, while two more – her date, Drew, and another man – gave instruction and encouragement." And: "For men, skepticism is a form of self-protection…. For much of their lives, they've looked forward to the hedonistic fun of college, bearing every expectation of booze and no-strings sex. A rape heralds the uncomfortable idea that all that harmless mayhem may not be so harmless after all. Easier, then, to assume the girl is lying, even though studies indicate that false rape reports account for, at most, eight percent of reports." (The managing editor of Rolling Stone later apologized for the story, noting with almost other-worldly understatement: "… there now appear to be discrepancies in Jackie's account.")

Double standards on false accusations and rapes

Alvar Bardolf · 27 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Eleanor de Freitas falsely accused Alexander Economou of raping her.[1] The police let her get away with it, so he brought a private prosecution of perverting the course of justice to clear his name. The Crown Prosecution Service (CPS) took over the prosecution. De Freitas then killed herself three days before her trial. She had bipolar disorder, but a forensic psychiatrist instructed by her own legal team had "recommended that she was aware of the implications of making a false allegation and was fit to stand trial."[2] Her father was "'still astonished" that the CPS had decided to prosecute her.[3]

For a contrast, consider this hypothetical case. Jack raped Jill. The police let him get away with it, so she brought a private prosecution of rape. The Crown Prosecution Service took over the prosecution. Jack then killed himself three days before his trial. He had bipolar disorder, but a forensic psychiatrist instructed by his own legal team had "recommended that he was aware of the implications of rape and was fit to stand trial." His mother was "'still astonished" that the CPS had decided to prosecute him.

The contrast is salutary. Many will feel some sympathy for Eleanor de Freitas. None will feel sympathy for Jack. This is the first double standard.

Many will feel sympathy for the father of de Freitas. Most will regard the mother of Jack as callously failing to realise the severity of the crime her son committed. This is the second double standard.

Jill will be offered all sorts of help and support. Men who are falsely accused are shunned and shamed. This is the third double standard.

Jill is regarded as a victim deserving of special care whether or not Jack is convicted. Men who are falsely accused are regarded for the rest of their life as probably guilty unless the malicious woman is prosecuted. This is the fourth double standard.

A false accusation of rape is an attempt to destroy someone's life. It frequently succeeds. The person accused is regarded as guilty until proven innocent. They will be shamed and shunned. If the accusation is successful, he will be imprisoned with an average sentence of eight years.[4] He may well be raped while in prison. An accusation will usually cost a man his job, his home, his marriage, and his children, and he won't get them back even if he proves himself innocent. It often results in suicidal ideation.[5] It can result in him committing suicide.[6] It often results in him being assaulted. Most outrageous of all, it can result in him being beaten to death.[7] A false accusation is therefore a more serious crime than attempted rape. It is an attempt at much more than that. The only crime commensurate with such effects on the victim is attempted murder. Eleanor de Freitas, however, was prosecuted for perverting the course of justice, which has an average sentence of 10 months.[8] This is the fifth double standard. I wish it were the last, but it's not.

The charity War Against Rape wants to stop the prosecution of false accusers of rape.[9] They are being supported in this by Professor Lisa Avalos of the University of Arkansas, who said that false allegations in the US were dealt with as a misdemeanour offence, not a felony—and most women were not jailed if found guilty (sixth double standard). She is also quoted as saying, "In the course of my research I have not found any country that pursues these cases against women rape complainants in the way the UK does. The UK has an unusual approach, and I think their approach violates human rights."[10]

Let's get clear about this. This woman thinks that prosecuting a malicious lying woman who has sought to destroy a man's life by a false accusation—possibly resulting in suicide, assault, rape or murder for him—violates her human rights. I do not understand how anyone could seriously say this unless they hate men. If anyone said anything remotely similar to this about rape, they would be accused not merely of rape apology but of promoting rape as a tool for the oppression, subjugation, and humiliation of women.

“No Working Title”: An introduction

The Author · 28 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The Back Story

There are many facets of abuse: emotional, physical, spiritual, sexual.

I was actively involved in a sex act with my parents at around four years of age.

It is my oldest memory.

My first pornographic magazine was at around five or six—Cavalier magazine, I believe. At 11, Deep Throat was the feature at my first introduction, a fathers-and-sons night called Porn and Prawn. At 13, it was Debbie Does Dallas. I grew up believing that *Penthouse Forum*s were all true stories and that was what sex and women were really like.

I was made to have oral sex with my mother at four years of age while my father watched. My early teen years are a muddle of my parents’ parties I had to go to and the things I had to do or were done to me by family friends or strangers, sex I had to have with strangers while being watched, or the sex I had to watch taking place.

My experience then became one of emotional abuse.

Later in life, I became a magnet for the spiritually manipulative and emotionally abusive. They fed off my brokenness, capitalizing on my need for acceptance and my desire to have a place to belong. The strange thing is that I never connected the dots until I was in my 40s. It all lay in unconnected little pieces, hidden broken shards of memories, disconnected.

Life went on.

I got married—way above myself—to the woman who is still my best friend and mentor. But sadly, over time, I started to break and become a monumental asshole to live with.

We could never figure out the destructive force or reason behind personality changes, the occasional incidents that turned into episodes. They went from once a quarter, to weekly, to daily destructive cycles.

One day all the pieces came together while I was sitting reading in my study—like the reel on an old projector, the movie of my life played back, including every disjointed scene. I knew I was fucked up, but I never realized the extent of my abuse or its effect.

The revelation of what was done to me, and by whom, finally broke me. I was 45.

The book No Working Title?

A “working title” is a temporary name given to a project when it is still in progress but nearing completion.

The thought that the life I have now is as good as it gets for my wife, my kids, or myself is devastating. The things that were done to me were wrong, but I am not finished. It is not over. My life is an unfinished project. I’m a daily struggling someone, not a recovering anything. I will see my life turn around. The term “victim” is not one I will ever use in regards to who I am.

No Working Title as a book started some 20 years ago. I look back on these reflections and I was obviously looking for understanding and trying to process my memories. There is a loose chronological sense to the writing. That’s the challenge with memories and emotion, they all lie like sludge in the bottom of a timeless bucket. All old, all new, all timeless all together.

At no point in my journey did I feel that I could talk to anyone about what I had gone through and am still going through. Being a sexually abused man is difficult enough to talk about in our society. Being abused by your parents is just not the sort of thing you bring up at dinner.

I hope the book and the poetry give you a vocabulary, pictures and words, for your walk—but above all else I hope you now know that you are not alone and that victory is an absolute possibility for you.

Here is an abridged version of the upcoming book. More information is available on www.noworkingtitle.org.

Thank you for reading.

Putting Anita Sarkeesian in the public square

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 28 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

If I had to single out a prime mover who set the #GamerGate chain of events in motion, Anita Sarkeesian would be my candidate. I grant you that Zoe Quinn was the proximate cause—the spark to the powder keg, if you will—but props to Sarkeesian for filling up that keg in the first place.

For at least a couple of years, Sarkeesian was busily undermining the gamer community in preparation for trouble that was clearly anticipated. So when the planned operation was finally launched, the Zoe Quinn fracas served only as a pretext—a "Gulf of Tonkin" incident to justify aggressive intervention. The time was ripe, Quinn popped up, and it was off to the races!

But the tension had been building for quite a while, and there would have been no #GamerGate without it. And that tension would never have been ratcheted to fever pitch without Sarkeesian's steady, slow-motion agitprop.

So here's the condensed version of events since #GamerGate erupted: the other side (meaning the feminists and the authoritarian left) have constructed a threat narrative. The order of the day has been slander, obfuscation, conflation, misrepresentation, and other dirty tricks directed against anybody aligned with #GamerGate or merely imputed to be aligned with it.

This is old stuff for us, since we have studied their modus operandi for years. They make lies fly faster than machine-gun bullets, and it's humanly impossible to stop all of them. They routinely make unsupported accusations against unnamed people—for example, they claim to receive threats from such people, but we have only their word for this. They hardly ever show the moral gumption to look a real person in the eye and say, "You did x, y, and z!" Instead, they vaguely impute crimes to some vaguely defined "group" or "movement" and insinuate that you too are a part of it … and that's all, folks!

Let's get back to the admitted feminist Anita Sarkeesian, who is our person of interest at the moment. Sarkeesian has goaded and bullied the gaming community beyond endurance, and her social justice warrior cohorts have jumped into the fray as if on cue. People on that side have a lot to answer for, but right now I want to make this simple. So I will drag Anita Sarkeesian into the public square for an inquest—her and her alone.

Among other things, Sarkeesian is notorious for constructing threat narratives, and her accounts of reality have been widely doubted. I won't try to cover all of these but shall drill down into one example only because that example looks superlatively damning.

I want to explore this very, very thoroughly—and if I err on the side of prolixity, so be it!

Among other episodes, Sarkeesian claims to have been menaced by a series of luridly pornographic Twitter tweets, purportedly from a "Kevin Dobson." She screen-captured the material and shared it on her Twitter feed, and I have posted the item below, with some annotations that I made in Photoshop:

Several things about this ought to command our attention.

1. Sarkeesian was not logged in to her own Twitter account when she made the screen capture. She was viewing the page as "Public."
2. Sarkeesian landed on this page only 12 seconds after "Kevin Dobson" posted his final tweet, and she made her screen capture shortly thereafter.
3. All of "Kevin Dobson's" tweets were posted in less than three minutes time.
4. There is no sign that the Twitter search engine had been used to arrive at this page. The field is empty.

On the strength of these points, I will offer a narrative conclusion that seems plausible.

I believe that Anita Sarkeesian has committed a fabrication. I use that term because I don't know if the apparent action fits the legal definition of "fraud"—I rather doubt that it does in this case.

Let's review the lines of argument. "Kevin Dobson" posted his 10 tweets in under three minutes. The spelling and grammar are impeccable, which hints at careful thought and composition. Are we to believe that all of this happened in such a brief time frame? I find that odd, but I certainly can't rule it out.

Moving along: By the evidence of her own screen capture, Sarkeesian arrived on the page a mere 12 seconds after "Kevin Dobson" had posted tweet number 10. This is where improbability poses a serious hindrance to belief. It is only by astonishing coincidence that Sarkeesian could have opened that page in her browser almost immediately after "Kevin Dobson" had finished his activity. There was no compelling reason for her to show up at that precise moment rather than, say, 43 minutes later. The odds were dramatically against this.

If somebody other than Sarkeesian found the Dobson material and made the screencap, the coincidence would be no less remarkable. Either way, the odds were dramatically against it.

Now let's consider that whoever made the screencap was not logged in to any Twitter account whatsoever.
If Sarkeesian had made the screencap, and if she had been logged in to her own account, her case would look more credible because Twitter notifications might have alerted her—which could explain her timely arrival.

But Sarkeesian can offer no such defense. The screencap was clearly made from outside of anybody's Twitter account, so it remains an astonishing coincidence that anybody got in through such a narrow time window.

One might ask what sort of directed activity would push anybody there, specifically, in the first place? It occurs to me that they might arrive via the Twitter search engine, but as witness the screencap, there is no evidence of this.

To me, it seems that whoever screen-capped the Dobson material already knew it was there, knew precisely how to get to it, and knew this less than 12 seconds after the material was posted. The weight of probability stacks heavily on that side.

If we assume that "Kevin Dobson" was an authentic personage, we could allow that he made his tweets, logged out of his account, and then made the screencap—which he subsequently sent to Sarkeesian for her to post on her own Twitter feed! But frankly, this theory is so bizarre that I refuse to entertain it further.

On that basis, the only people who could have been "in the know" would have been either Anita herself or both her and a cohort whom she'd previously confided in. Both possibilities reek of fabrication, and the latter would also reek of conspiracy. So again, I believe that the admitted feminist Anita Sarkeesian fabricated the "Kevin Dobson" threat tweets in order to construct a threat narrative and mount a smear campaign against the men and women of #GamerGate.

In my considered opinion, the narrative timeline went like this:

Sarkeesian opened a sock account with Twitter under the name "Kevin Dobson" (@kdobbsz) or had a cohort do this. Then she (or her cohort) composed threatening tweets purportedly by @kdobbsz and posted these in orderly succession within three minutes.

Directly afterward, Sarkeesian (or her cohort) logged out of the @kdobbsz sock account and went directly to the "Kevin Dobson" Twitter feed where the threatening tweets were viewable. She (or her cohort) arrived there precisely 12 seconds after the purported "Kevin Dobson" had posted his final tweet. She (or her cohort) screen-capped the Dobson material in less than 26 seconds. (The Twitter time stamp refreshes after 26 seconds.)

If Sarkeesian (or her cohort) had been wise, she would have logged in to her own Twitter account and then waited some time before making the screencap. But she (or her cohort) failed to do any of this, and it was a costly slip-up. Now, in the interest of leaving no stone unturned, I will address some further concerns.

For example, some might suggest that the screencap was a Photoshop deception meant to fabricate evidence that Sarkeesian had committed fabrication in the first place. It would be easy to "shop" the 12-second time stamp as well as the sign-in link at the upper right. One could also get creative with the time stamps on the various tweets.

But there is zero chance that such a theory would inspire general belief, given that Sarkeesian herself originally posted the screencap exactly as I've posted it here—minus my annotations, of course! The Internet never forgets, so let's call the Wayback Machine to the witness stand:

https://web.archive.org/web/20141206233003/https://twitter.com/femfreq/status/504718160902492160

Sarkeesian has, quite significantly, not deleted the Dobson screencap from her Twitter feed. It's still up there. She might wish the damn thing would go away, but if she did remove it, it would be obvious to everybody why she had removed it. In fact, it would be tantamount to a confession.

So she is leaving that unfortunate item in situ, likely hoping that if she combines stonewalling with "playing possum" it'll get buried and forgotten as time rolls along. Honestly, there's no good move she can make here, but this one looks like the best of a bad lot. Very well, I am 99% convinced that the admitted feminist Anita Sarkeesian fabricated the "Kevin Dobson" threats. I do not state categorically that she has done so but only that I have a strong personal conviction of this. Others may form their own conclusions on the strength of what I have argued.

So this gives us a pretty good idea what Sarkeesian is made of and what she is capable of. I think it throws a compromising light on anything that she might have said or done already—or might say or do in the future.

I'm not the first to take note of this succulent little scandal. Several others have reported on this long before me, but I know I'm the first to placard it boldly on the front page of AVfM under a glaring spotlight. This story hasn't gotten nearly as much play as it deserves, and frankly, nobody has scooped into the job with half the claws that I am using here.

I want to put this information in the public square. That is, I want to put it in the realm of mutual knowledge—so that everybody knows, and everybody knows that everybody knows that everybody knows …

And I do mean everybody. Yes, I mean you too! Do me a favor and retweet the hell out of the present article. Post it on Facebook also, and send it spiralling through every communication channel that occurs to you. Above all, be sure that the self-admitted feminist Anita Sarkeesian learns all about this. (That would be @femfreq, if you are active on Twitter.) We ought to make this universally known, and etch it indelibly in the public memory.

Anita, since I know that you are reading this, I would love to hear your side of the story too. What's your take? What have you got to say for yourself? What's the nitty-gritty lowdown on this "Kevin Dobson" thing, eh? We would all love to hear from you, Anita, and I personally invite you to make your entrance at the AVfM comment section any time the spirit moves you. Don't be a stranger, Anita.

Oh, and have a happy 2015!

Late Thursday evening, only hours away before my "#YouOKSis White Feather Campaign" post was to drop, I got word from several longtime JustFourGuys (J4G) readers that Feminista Jones had elected to "air" our offlist email exchange in its entirety on her website. Published on August 18, 2014, under the title "The Inability To Accept 'No,'" Jones takes our exchange as prima facie evidence of how she and so many other sistas are so besieged by various and sundry forms of "harassment":

> I'm offered [sic] asked to appear on shows, give interviews, opine on issues, and such. I cannot do everything, so I occasionally have to decline. Most people are gracious and understanding of the demands on my times. There are times, however, when some people simply cannot accept "No" for an answer.
> I'm posting this because I'm calling attention to the ways that some of us are often treated online and in person. When I talk about #YouOKSis and street harassment, it applies to online harassment, work harassment, etc.– any place where the motivation behind the aggressors words and actions is the inability to accept "No" for an answer.
> I'm tired of this and it happens so often that I'm completely disgusted by the inability to respect my personal boundaries and those of SO many women.
> Here's one example of how one man simply cannot accept "No" from me and attempts to goad me into doing what he asked by guilting me with fictive racial kinship. He HAD to have the last word. This shit is disrespectful and abusive and it happens so often, to so many women.

Got it? I know the logic is a bit overwrought, tortured, and convoluted, especially in light of the numerous facts as they pertain to yours truly and in general—see the always excellent work of Ms. Cathy Young in this regard—and which yours truly took up recently right here at J4G, I might add. But do try to work with the lady; she is quite "busy," don't cha know.

Okay, so let's get to the actual email exchange, shall we?

Here we go:

That's good!–and much needed discussion and debate should ensue. For there is much to discuss, and indeed debate.

While they certainly feel good and grant laurels, they do nothing in terms of actual change, which is what so many on your side of the aisle claim to want. Meanwhile, while Ms. Lindsey and others like her (read: White Feminists) and I don't have any love lost, she/they are at the very least willing to, to some extent, talk.

Getting up in the MSM and crying on the shoulders of Good Black Men(TM), again, while gratifying to some extent, won't make much of a difference in the overall scheme of things; talking to guys like me on the other hand, will. Of course, guys like me have quite a bit to say – and quite a few questions of our own to ask.

Now …

I'm gonna cop to everything that Jones has said about me—guilty as charged! People who know me well would definitely agree that not only can I be quite persistent, but I can also be quite persuasive. After all, how do you think I got the interviews I've gotten thus far?

But there is one little problem with Jones's argument …

She never obtained my CONSENT(!) to air our email exchange. Please note that in the previous email exchanges-turned-de facto interviews I had with Evan Marc Katz and Lindsey of Cards Against Harassment, I was keen to obtain their consent to bring our offlist conversation to the J4G audience publicly. I've also been careful to obtain the consent of others in terms of their thoughts and words expressed either offlist or elsewhere online; Dr. Edward Rhymes, for example, can attest to this fact.

Why is this important?

Well, because consistency, that's why. Imagine what Jones and her ~~flying monkeys~~ followers would have said if the shoe was on the other foot—and I had taken it upon myself to air an offlist email exchange of her and me, releasing it to my readers without her foreknowledge or consent—I can hear the "comparisons" to rape and the like right now.

Of course, when it comes to social justice warriors like Jones, little trifles like the rule of law or even common decency don't apply, especially when it comes to working-class, blue-collar brothas like yours truly—which does indeed bring us back round-robin to the point about "street harassment." Consider this:

Haven't you found it just a wee bit odd that the one voice totally left out of the "conversation" on this "issue" is working- and lower-class Black men? They're talked about but almost never actually talked to. And as far as Black feminists like Jones are concerned, that's exactly how they like and want it—for us to be completely without a voice, to not be able to face our accusers in open court or even the public square, to be subject to dehumanizing and draconian legal and social measures that would make diehard Stalinists blush. It's all deeply problematic and forms much of the basis and reason as to why I do what I do.

For Black women like Jones, Black men like me have no rights toward consent that they are bound to respect. She is emblematic of those people—like Amanda Marcotte, of Duke LAX infamy, for example—who have no qualms in the least running roughshod over the civil liberties of others or just plain ole dissing them in the name of some "higher goal"—which is, of course, their own twisted utopian delusions of grandeur.

The irony of all this is that if she had only asked me, I would have readily and enthusiastically—heh—consented to our exchange being aired because I have nothing to hide and consider myself to always be on the Jumbotron—I don't say anything online that I am not prepared to cosign or defend. Not only that, but this exchange being aired to the general public serves in itself as a kind of "debate," in which both sides of the issue can be aired, and the public reading along can then decide for themselves. As Lindsey's parting shots in our recent exchange aptly shows, it's not the menz that are the problem here; it's the ladies themselves.

I disagree with Tariq Nasheed's contention that Feminista Jones is some kind of "agent provocateur" for White feminists; I have yet to see any smoking gun proof, though I remain open to the possibility should such evidence present itself. But what I will say, without any fear of censure or reprisal, is that Jones is disingenuous, manipulative, and a hypocrite of the first order—and I will make it my business now to keep a close eye on her from here on out. People like her, can and have proven, to be downright dangerous to people like me.

In the meantime, Ms. Jones, please, find another hobby; chess doesn't suit you.

Acid-throwing: Almost exclusively a women's crime?

Peter Wright · 30 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Adam Lee Hargrave was an early 20th-century crime reporter and documentarian who wrote extensively on Scotland Yard, the C.I.D., Jack the Ripper, and similar topics. The following article about acid-throwing is from his 1912 book Woman and Crime, in which he states that women were almost exclusively responsible for the crime.—PW

THE VITRIOL-THROWERS

THE act of throwing vitriol may very well be bracketed with secret and slow poisoning as an example of extreme cruelty in women. Vitriol-throwing is rarely resorted to by men, being almost exclusively confined to females. The latter as we have already pointed out are also largely in the majority among poisoners. It is just as inexplicable as is the inhumanity of women towards little children, and why such savagery should find a home in the bosoms of those who are universally supposed to be inspired by instincts of sympathy and tenderness it is fruitless to try and discover. But it makes one thing quite clear, namely, that the orthodox opinions held by most men concerning women are not strictly accurate.

I recall the case of the Frenchwoman, Madame Emilie Foucault, who was indicted at the Old Bailey for throwing upon Andre Jacques Delombre a corrosive fluid, with intent to disfigure him or do him grievous bodily harm. I have already given an account of this case in another work of mine,[1] but think it as well to include it here, as in many respects it is a remarkable case of its kind.

Sir Charles Mathews, who conducted the prosecution, referred to it as a "drama," and drama of a most sensational kind it certainly was. The story that preceded the act for which the woman was indicted might very well have been fiction written by a novelist in the habit of turning out "risky" works. The prisoner and the prosecutor first became acquainted in the year 1898, the man then being seventeen years of age and the woman twenty. They met in the streets, and their acquaintance at first was merely of a casual kind. But it was soon to become more cordial, for the woman was very pretty and the young man susceptible. Their respective social positions were widely asunder, he being the son of an ex-Cabinet Minister of France, and she the daughter of a tradesman. This difference in caste was destined in due course to lead to a tragedy.

In March, 1899, the prisoner married her first husband, a man named Foucault, who died in January, 1901. Directly after this marriage took place an improper intimacy began between Madame Foucault and the young fellow, Delombre. It endured through Foucault's life and survived his death. In May of 1903 Madame Foucault married again, this time a literary man in a good position. But she still continued the improper intimacy with Delombre. The husband soon became suspicious, discovered how matters stood, at once sued for and obtained a divorce. The divorced wife intermittently continued the intimacy with Delombre. It is quite clear that she now entertained the notion and formed the resolution that the young fellow should marry her. He would seem to have still been somewhat infatuated with her and to be willing to become her lawful husband. But here the social disparity between them became an obstacle, and Delombre's parents would not entertain the proposed alliance. This opposition enraged Madame Foucault, who armed herself with a loaded revolver and threatened to shoot the young man's parents. His mother was most firmly opposed to the match, and upon her death-bed she made her son promise that he would not marry the woman.

In the course of 1906 Madame Foucault fell in the family way, and subsequently she asked Delombre if he would acknowledge the child. This he refused to do, in consequence of which some unpleasant scenes ensued. Upon one occasion Delombre forcibly took a loaded revolver from her. Apparently in consequence of the annoyance she gave him, Delombre decided in October, 1906, to come to England. He did so, taking up his residence in Lindley Road, Tottenham, where he pursued his studies. He was an agricultural engineer, and held a degree of the University of Paris. On November 17th, Madame Foucault followed Delombre to England, bringing with her a loaded revolver, a box of cartridges, and a large bottle of sulphuric acid, or vitriol. The latter she had had coloured to the hue of coffee. The reason for this will appear presently. Having discovered where Delombre was lodging, she went there and asked him for an explanation. That was a Saturday evening, and it was arranged that the interview should be postponed till the next day, a lodging for the night being found for Madame Foucault. The next day she said to a friend of Delombre's who lodged near him:

"I am expecting a child in January, and Delombre has abandoned me. After I have had an explanation I will return to Paris and make as much scandal as possible. I will have birth cards printed, and send them to his friends." (In France birth cards are sent round as marriage cards are sent round in this country.) At the Old Bailey Delombre stoutly denied that the child referred to was his, and that he was not the "only one."

Later in the day Delombre went with Madame Foucault to a hotel in the City, where he engaged a room in the name of Foucault. They had dinner there in the public room, afterwards retiring to the room they had engaged, where they would be by themselves. While seated at the dinner-table Delombre asked Madame Foucault what explanation she required, and the lady replied that she would wait for it until they had retired to their room. In the light of subsequent events this was significant. Well, when the woman found herself alone with her companion she said, "The explanation I have to ask you is this: Either you shall marry me or you must kill yourself, if you are not a coward, or I will kill you." That was the first time, said Delombre, that she had made any mention of marriage. He replied "Marry! No; never. Why, you don't love me. You hate me, and I don't love you." Then the woman said, "I shan't be troublesome. We shan't live together, but I want my child to bear your name." He replied "No." Madame, who all through this was perfectly calm, said "Then you must kill yourself, or I will kill you." It is difficult to understand why she should wish him to die, or how his death could benefit her in any way. But the fact that she was so calm through it all proves that it was mere idle talk and that she was temporising. It is a pity that he did not do the same thing. A man, however, is never equal to a woman in cunning and dissimulation.

It seems clear, however, that Delombre had become apprehensive, for he suggested that they should go for a walk. At the same time he went to the bed and took up his coat, which he proceeded to put on. Foolishly he turned his back upon her for a few moments. When he turned to her again she walked up to him and deliberately threw a cup of vitriol in his face. The premeditation was made apparent by the fact that she had contrived, unseen by her companion, to lock the door. He discovered this when, writhing in agony, he endeavoured to quit the room. His cries brought assistance, and he was conveyed to the hospital. The woman was taken into custody and while in prison awaiting trial she gave birth to a child.

Delombre permanently lost the sight of one eye and was otherwise disfigured for life. Most outrages committed by women are cowardly, and this one was particularly so. It was sheer vindictiveness, and no amount of provocation could mitigate its enormity. Her defence was that she intended to commit suicide in his presence, and that the vitriol and revolver were for that purpose. She further stated in the witness box that it was while in the act of drinking the vitriol herself that Delombre, while endeavouring to prevent her, splashed the vitriol over himself. This rather feeble contention could scarcely hold good in the face of the fact that the vitriol had been thrown or dashed at the prosecutor, as shown by the nature of the injuries. The prosecutor declared that her original intention was that he should drink the acid, and that is why she had it made the colour of coffee. Her explanation of this discolouration was that it was caused by being poured into the bottle through a pewter funnel, and that it was the action of the latter on the acid that caused it to change colour. As a matter of fact pewter would not do anything of the kind, so that falls to the ground. The prosecutor explained that her intention was to cause him to drink the acid by "ringing the changes" on the cups. After they had had dinner he asked her if she would have coffee, and she declined. He, however, had a cup, and this evidently upset her arrangement, for her idea was to have the coffee upstairs, when she would have effected the change. She did in fact alter her mind when she got upstairs and had a cup brought up. And this served a purpose, although not the one originally intended. Having emptied the cup of coffee she substituted vitriol, which looked like coffee. So that she was able to get to close quarters with Delombre without arousing his suspicion as to the nature of the contents of the cup. If the vitriol had in any way failed she unquestionably intended to make use of the revolver.

The above facts would appear to be pretty conclusive evidence of guilt, and there can be no doubt that the jury would have returned a verdict of "Guilty" had it not been for the introduction into the case by counsel for the defence of a number of letters which had been written to the prisoner from time to time by the prosecutor. These put the latter in a very odious light and seriously prejudiced the case for the prosecution. The letters were allowed to be read by the judge, although when counsel for the prosecution attempted to read some which had been sent by the prisoner to the prosecutor his lordship put his veto on it. He should of course have put his veto on the others, as they had nothing to do with the charge before the court, most of them having been written years before the visit to the City hotel took place.

The case occupied four days. The prisoner, a dark young woman of strikingly handsome appearance and neatly attired, was one of those females whom I have already referred to as possessing force of character and invincible will-power. The latter in combination with her personal attractions was destined to be destructive to men. Her complexion was pale, and she had what the French call the "fatal eyes." They were in fact very remarkable eyes, very dark and wonderfully expressive. They had a velvety softness, and at times could be most alluring. She also contrived to get into them a remarkable number of varied expressions. When it was her purpose to enlist sympathy her eyes were irresistibly soft and caressing. But now and again when the lady was heckled in cross-examination, there flashed from her eyes something resembling forked lightning, which gave one an uncomfortable notion of what she was capable. I have already referred to a case where a female prisoner succeeded in winning over a jury. I then referred to Madame Foucault, who, in spite of the conclusive evidence I have detailed above, was acquitted. This I attribute to her personal influence on the jury, combined with the reading of the letters mentioned. It was a verdict, not of justice based on fact, but of sympathy in the face of truth. The conduct of both prior to the events of November 18th at the City hotel was deserving of measureless reprobation, and the letters should not have aroused sympathy for either. What can be said for a woman who readily gives herself over to a paramour immediately after she has been wedded to another? Can she be "wronged" in any way? Delombre worked her no mischief; those whom he wronged were the husbands. There can be no doubt that the first marriage was entered into so that the husband might be utilised as a safeguard to the intrigue. I suppose a husband could hardly be put to a worse purpose than this, or a marriage contracted under more odious conditions. And nobody who saw the two young people in the flesh can doubt that the woman was the leading spirit in the intrigue, and that she influenced Delombre by her "fatal eyes" and her other attractions as she influenced the jury at her trial. A woman who cares twopence for her chastity does not give way with the readiness with which Madame Foucault did.

Just as I have already described how Mrs Chard Williams set herself to seduce the jury from the straight line of their duty by directing her gaze full at them and keeping it so throughout the hearing, so did Madame Foucault, and with more success. She directed her “fatal eyes” towards the jurymen, each one of whom she took in turn, lavishing upon them the most bewitching and ravishing glances. I sat beneath the jury-box and quite close to the dock. I closely watched her, and upon one occasion she, noticing my scrutiny and thinking perhaps that I might be an official and worth including, she turned her gaze full upon me and favoured me with a most entrancing optical caress. I felt a trifle “shivery” over it, like one might feel while being grinned at by a tigress, and was not sorry to avert my eyes. After her acquittal she stated to an interviewer that at a certain stage of the proceedings she knew she had so many of the jury on her side. There can be no doubt that she did. Women like Madame Foucault know the weak points of men like they know their A. B. C. When counsel was describing the injuries of Delombre she appeared to be moved, but that it was humbug was proved by the fact that after the verdict was returned she pointed down triumphantly at the injured man and jeered at him. No doubt that what the man himself had told her, namely, that she hated him, was true. She subsequently endeavoured to fix the paternity of her child upon him, and a summons was served at the place in London where he had been staying. He had, however, gone back to Paris, but in spite of this fact an order was made against him by a magistrate. It seems a very easy matter to get a bastardy order against a man. In this case the magistrate took the bare word of the solicitor that the summons was duly served, when as a matter of fact it was not. Delombre took the matter to the High Court, where the judges set the order aside.

Vitriol-throwing is altogether a most ugly crime, for it is always committed in a spirit of extreme vindictiveness. Sometimes, too, it is done to avenge a wholly imaginary wrong, as in the case of the woman who, ironically enough, was named Mabel Truelove. The crime was committed in May, 1908. The woman Truelove was a habitual criminal, who had previously been confined in Reading gaol. She had conceived a great hatred of the matron, Miss Elizabeth Rogerson, who, she declared, had treated her harshly and cruelly. As a matter of fact Miss Rogerson was a most humane woman and had always dealt leniently with Truelove. However, the latter determined to do the matron a mischief, and she accomplished it in a truly fiendish manner. On a Sunday evening, while Miss Rogerson sat in St James’s Roman Catholic Church with a friend named Mrs Emily Cushan, Truelove came down the church and seated herself beside Miss Rogerson. In her teeth she was holding a shawl. She said to Miss Rogerson, “Well, how are you?” To which Miss Rogerson replied, “Oh, all right.” Truelove then drew a large cup of vitriol from under her shawl and flung the contents in the face of Miss Rogerson.

Miss Rogerson called out “Vitriol!” and fell in a faint. She was unable to see, and after she had been attended to by a nurse and a doctor she was conveyed to the Royal Berks Hospital. She was very seriously injured, being likely to lose the sight of one eye. Her friend, Mrs Cushan, was also seriously injured, the acid having splashed on to her. Also Truelove herself was very badly burnt, for the liquid also splashed back on her, which was a recoil of her vengeance peculiarly appropriate. If all vitriol-throwers also injured themselves in this manner, there might be less of the dastardly crime committed. When Truelove appeared in the dock of the Reading Police Court next morning her face presented a most repulsive appearance, the features being quite unrecognisable. Her lips were distended, her eyes invisible, and her cheeks scarred and wounded. She had to be assisted into the dock, and was hardly able to remain seated on the form. Would that all would-be vitriol-throwers could have witnessed this spectacle! She was remanded and afterwards removed to that prison upon the matron of which she had committed such a gross outrage.

The prisoner had had a most remarkable career. She came of a family which was said to be well connected and respected. She was an accomplished pianist, and some years ago had been a teacher of music. She was a pupil teacher at a Board School, but failing to pass a certain examination her scholastic career came to an end. She would then appear to have gone into service, acting as governess to several well-known families, but her temper was of such a violent character that nobody would keep her very long, and so she was constantly going from situation to situation. Her friends also gradually tired of assisting her, and so she sank lower and lower. Eventually she found herself without a roof "on the road" in which condition she remained some years, sleeping in various places, such, for instance, as doss-houses, churchyards, outhouses, or any place where she could find shelter. During this period she committed innumerable offences, prisons being among the places wherein she periodically slept. She resorted to all kinds of tricks to evade the police, on one occasion exchanging her dress for male garb while in a railway carriage. But as she left her own clothes behind, the police were enabled to soon get upon her track.

During her career she had been in several prisons of which Miss Rogerson had been matron, including that at Reading. Two years prior to the outrage at Reading, Truelove committed an assault on Miss Rogerson, for which she was bound over for six months. She then said to Detective-Sergeant Clarke, "The time won't be long passing; I will leave the town and have something ready for her (meaning Miss Rogerson) when I come back." After she had committed the assault on Miss Rogerson at Reading, she said, "I don't care what I have to put up with myself; I have got my revenge, and revenge is sweet." When asked by Detective-Sergeant Clarke where she obtained the vitriol, she said, "Never mind; I know where to get it, and how to use it. I did not get it here. I should like to serve one or two more like it. I did not intend to hurt the other woman (Mrs Cushan). It serves her right though, if she mixes up with a – – like that." She was known in nearly every prison in the country, having been convicted no fewer than 127 times for various offences. In whatever prison she was located she created disturbances and put fear into the minds of the wardresses. She had followed wardresses about, molesting and threatening them, sometimes to throw vitriol over them. In consequence the wardresses went in fear of her. A wardress named Pemberdy told how on one occasion she saw Truelove carrying a jug without a handle, and that she told her, Miss Pemberdy, that she would like to spoil her face. Upon one occasion, while following Miss Rogerson and Miss Pemberdy, she said to the former, "You have played your ace, and it is my turn to play trumps now." She had also waited for days outside Reading Prison, in consequence of which the wardresses had remained indoors rather than go out and be insulted.

Another wardress named Miss Bingham wrote from Hull Prison to say that Truelove had followed her to church and waited outside until the service was over. Subsequently discovering that her home was at Lancaster, she gave a great deal of annoyance by calling at the house of her parents and waiting outside. She afterwards sent a postcard to Miss Bingham at the address of her relatives, worded, "I am coming. –(Signed) Jack the Ripper." Upon two occasions she had been sentenced to imprisonment for assaulting female officials. During the hearing of her case at the Berkshire Assizes the prisoner continually interrupted the proceedings. When reference was being made to Miss Rogerson's injuries, and counsel was describing the condition of "one of the lady's eyes," the prisoner interrupted with, " You don't call that thing a lady, do you?" It was inevitable that an effort would be made to establish a theory of insanity, and certainly the extravagance and pertinacity of her wrongdoing would seem to suggest that she was not altogether in her right mind. However, her counsel, Mr. Nash, was proceeding to say that she had been suffering from delusions for two years, when she interposed with, "You are no doctor. It's no use proving that I am mad, because I am not. I never suffered from delusions." The jury having found her guilty, the judge, Mr Justice Darling, sentenced her to five years' penal servitude.

Whether sane or insane, one thing is quite clear, Mabel Truelove has never been dealt with properly by the law. She ought never to have been allowed to carry on her career for so long a time, to have been constantly committing offences and continually going in and out of prison. She ought to have been dealt with more severely long ago. She is a fit subject for an indeterminate sentence. It is clear that it is dangerous for such a woman to be at large, and during the whole of her career she has never once exhibited any intention or desire to reform. She was most persistent and determined in her wrongdoing from first to last. Probably her lawlessness and rebellious behaviour generally is traceable to her early years, when she may have been without any restraining influence. Over-indulgent parents may be the source of as much mischief to their offspring as negligent ones. The seeds which are sown in childhood's days bear fruit years hence. The ironically-named Mabel Truelove seems to be a pretty hopeless case.

About the same time another case of vitriol throwing occurred at Hull, where a middle-aged woman named Selina Spencer threw acid over three persons, namely, Annie Roberts, a widow, Eliza Precious, her married daughter, and a little girl named Lily Dunelly. It appeared that Spencer had had a business transaction with Mrs Roberts and had called her a rogue. In consequence of this Spencer was ejected from the Alexandra Hotel. A few minutes later Mrs Roberts and her daughter left the hotel. They had not gone far, however, when they became aware that Spencer was following them. Eventually the latter came up with them and dashed the contents of a bottle in the face of Mrs Roberts, at the same time exclaiming "Take that!" Upon Mrs Precious interfering she also was served in the same way, being so badly burned that she lost the sight of one eye. Some of the acid also splashed on to the little girl. Spencer was then overpowered and prevented doing any further mischief. When taken into custody she had the effrontery to deny the charge, in spite of the evidence of eye-witnesses and the fact that her own hands were burned by the acid. She was duly convicted and punished.

A case which bore a striking resemblance to that of Madame Foucault, already dealt with, occurred at the end of April, 1907. It was generally believed in fact that the woman in this case had been reading the newspaper reports of the Foucault case, and had practically copied the Frenchwoman's methods. And the fact that the latter was acquitted doubtless acted as a strong incentive to her to venture on a similar course of conduct.

The woman's name was Lilian Sarah Woodcock. She was 27 years of age and was tried at the Old Bailey. She was charged with throwing a corrosive fluid hydrochloric acid over Mr John James Avery, a photographer, of Sandringham Road, Dalston. It appeared that she had been employed as manageress at a shop kept by a son of Mr Avery, in the East India Dock Road. The relations between Miss Woodcock and her employer, as admitted by the latter in the witness-box, were rather more cordial than those of master and servant. Mr Avery, senior, was the freeholder of the premises in East India Dock Road. Miss Woodcock claimed the premises as her own, as she said they had been given to her by Mr Avery's son. The latter, however, stoutly denied this. Well, the woman went so far as to obtain an injunction in the High Court to restrain Mr Avery, senior, from entering the place. However, other proceedings followed, and the injunction was at length quashed.

On the afternoon of the same day Woodcock called at the house of Mr Avery, senior, and asked to see the latter. Mr Avery accordingly came to the door, but thinking it unwise to discuss matters with his visitor was about to close the door when the woman exclaimed, "Take that!" Although he saw nothing he felt a burning sensation about the face. He was removed to the German Hospital, where it was found that the acid had entered both eyes and burnt the right side of the forehead and the right cheek.

The defence put forward by the woman was that she had intended committing suicide, and that in knocking the vessel containing the acid from her hand Mr Avery received some of the contents on his face. It will be remembered that that was precisely the story told by Madame Foucault. In this case it was just as feeble as it was in that of the Frenchwoman, for the wall at the back of where Mr Avery stood was marked with the acid, which made it clear that the latter was thrown. Fortunately Mr Avery's sight was not affected, although the acid used is of a very corrosive nature, and if not promptly attended to will destroy sight.

Fortunately in this case there were no letters, and the woman was convicted and sentenced to a year's imprisonment.

I have thus given the particulars of a few representative cases of vitriol-throwing, a crime almost exclusively committed by women. It is a crime of vindictiveness alone, expressed by the invariable cry of "Take that!" and represents woman in one of her most repugnant aspects.

Translator's note: Western feminists routinely claim oppression for the most trivial things that they happen to dislike. Here is a 25-year-old text depicting the true story of real oppression during the December 1989 Romanian Revolution.—LV

The law of the survivor is to bear witness. You are subjected to the moral imperative of seeing the world with the eyes of those who have ceased to see it for good. Nothing of what they have seen has any right to remain hidden. You are only free at the moment when you have the guts to bear the truth. It should also be noted that, following the ancient word of the Gospels, in Romania even the stones were crying out—so how could the people have kept on remaining silent?

But it's not about the emergency of the revolt that I want to speak but about the things I saw in the 26 hours that I spent under arrest, first at the General Inspectorate of the Militia (IGM)[1] and then at Jilava Fort[2]. I was among the first to be busted, when the unbelievable resistance of the people of Bucharest against the Communist dictatorship was just beginning.

At first, there were only six of us in a room in IGM's headquarters, and we weren't allowed to sit. Then there were 25 of us. The door leading toward the hallway was open and guarded by one militiaman. Then, as the hours passed and we moved toward night, the door was shut and three armed militiamen were brought in. Low noises of a bizarre concourse could be heard from the room we were kept in. The noises resembled a breath stifled with a gag—gasping.

When night fell, a military major with a neutral, clerk-like face read off several names from a typewritten list. Mine was among those. I was pulled up and turned to face the wall with my hands behind my head. Seven others were with me. I remembered the feeling of intolerable moral aggression when their hands searched between my legs—with contempt and brutality. They put handcuffs on both of my hands. We were formed into a disoriented and chaotic line and pushed into docile hobbling along the dark hallways of Bucharest's Lubyanka[3].

Here, I was about to witness the first signs of the violent repression that was going on outside. The hallway I was walking through, convoluted through the entrails of the building like a segmented serpent, led to more rooms (I counted four of them), all filled with people. But these weren't people I would normally meet on the street. Perhaps it would be more appropriate to call them "bodies," namely a pile of whacked bodies. They were muddied, beaten, disfigured, and scared. A young man was just getting boot-kicked in his shin bone: the one who was doing the kicking was a kid with piercing eyes and pleasant features who kept asking his victim to keep, for the bloody hell, his face against the wall.

A bearded man, with the air of a painter, was screaming loudly at the bayonet with which a militiamen was ravishing his testicles. Others, the luckier ones, were only sporadically beaten when the militiamen would provoke one another and then rush to strike while cursing. Those who didn't have their hands beaten and broken yet were still clinging to the wall like drunk people usually do (although nobody was drunk in there); the others, whose hands were fully red with their own blood, were clinging to the walls with their chest or cheeks in an effort to avoid pissing off the militiamen, who wouldn't stop screaming, as if they were possessed: "Just stand straight, you animals, stand straight! Stand straight, you bloody cow, can't you hear me?"—and then the strikes followed, and then more beatings and so on until the gasps became rarer and the aggressor lost his breath. On the thin layer of plaster on the walls were wide, unregulated drawings made by splattered blood.

The hallway floors were covered in randomly thrown bodies. Between them, stepping and kicking, were the boots of the militiamen who were making footpaths of order. Filled with hatred, spurred on by the lectures from a violent military major and other militia members, they were constantly cursing but in a monotonous way, always mentioning the comrade secretary general. Both the fear of their superior officers and the pleasure of disposing of bodies were visible on the faces of these kids in uniform, who were only asking for the mere sketch of an order so they could torture with a clean conscience.

They were randomly hitting whoever happened to be around: using their fists, boots, police sticks—anything would do in order to produce and exacerbate the suffering. It was a horror spectacle. Other militiamen were assisting on the sidelines, smiling while smoking. There was no inmate in the hallways who wasn't bleeding, and almost all of them were gasping. They had all been terribly beaten. Several of those lying down on the floor were begging in whispers for medical assistance: they had been wounded by gunfire. The militiamen who were leading the group I was part of were screaming at us not to turn our heads. But it was impossible not to watch: even if we had all been blind, our terrified skin would've instantly gained sight features anyway.

We were shoved onto the plateau in IGM's backyard, which was now drowned in darkness. The apartment buildings around us seemed mournful. I hadn't seen any lights on, although I was looking for them in the hope that someone would see us. The militiamen who shoved us into the van were using flashlights to see where they were going. There were a lot of them and they were whispering. They ordered us to only stay on the left side. We could not have stayed in another position anyway given that we were bound to one another by handcuffs. The space in the van was too tight, and two of us, with injured hands, had to sit on the knees of the others.

I heard an authoritative voice asking how many "pieces" were inside. "Seven," was the prompt answer. "Bring seven more," the first voice shouted. After a moment of silence, someone asked with a less authoritative voice: "Are … are … we shooting them now?" "No, no shooting. An order is being expected," someone else responded. I sadly understood then that the repression had been more powerful than the protesters, that the killings in Timișoara would continue, and that in Bucharest those of us who were already in custody were bound to become the first exemplary victims. Since my hands were bound, I made the sign of the cross with my tongue inside my mouth[4] and started praying. I quashed my sorrow by humming the Lord's Prayer.

The van hit the road a little while after. Through the small window just above the driver, we looked out at the night. We got onto Eforie Street, crossed the Dâmboviță River in the Izvor area, and then headed on to the Victory of Socialism Boulevard toward the Devil's House (which was improperly called by the official press "The Republic's House"). I was instantly stricken by the symbolism of this forced descensus ad inferos[5]: with the notable exception of the presidential cars, I think that the cars of the repression were the first to have inaugurated the glorious "victory of socialism." The symbol was dictating this confirmation: one can only reach the victory of socialism through organized death. Our destination, as we had come to understand with time, was Jilava Fort.

When we arrived, we were identified again. Admission papers were made in our name. And then we were thrust into some sort of preventive arrest—63 individuals in a room of less than 15 square meters surface. The room had a ventilation system of Yezhov and Yagoda[6] type: it was calculated to make you suffocate without actually choking to death. Obviously, nobody could sit: we were so jammed together that if a round of bullets had been fired through us, our bodies would have continued to stand. That's how we spent our night: torture through sleep deprivation amplified by our wounds, suffocating and with a clear knowledge that we would be shot.

We discovered that in the face of death, the physiological needs go silent: I didn't feel hunger for a second, although I'd spent the entire period without eating. I wondered what those who had open wounds were feeling. I also discovered that the imminence of death rips people's identity. None of us had the curiosity to ask his cell neighbor his name and none of us presented ourselves by name. We were already cloaked under death's anonymous and indifferent decency. We'd all consented to it, with much naturalness and, I'd say, grace. It was a grace in which we were co-existing.

Most of us had been bestially beaten. Many had open wounds, the blood crusting in a repelling manner with the mud we had been dragged through. Our clothes were wrinkled and soaked with blood: the stains were starting to dry but the smell was unmistakable. One of the men in the cell had his cheek cleft in three lines with frayed edges starting from the cheekbone. I saw a man with his shankbone fractured from the beatings, and from whose hideously tumefied face the blood kept flowing, curdling beneath his dewlap and on his neck like icicles.

A young man had been beaten so hard that, despite his unsmiling, disfigured face, he was constantly giggling, which scared us even more. I later found out from those who had witnessed his torment that he had been beaten for an hour with boots solely in the head by two militiamen (a first sergeant and a sergeant major: one of them was rustically named Gheorghe). The poor fellow had lost his mind. It's useless to describe the horrific effects of the human cruelty. Their parade, despite the horror, is monotonous: the ways of torture are finite; but the degradation, the outrage, and the suffering are infinite. So it remains the fact that each of these men had been tortured in cold blood by a fellow human being, a fellow whose sole motivation was a slightly bigger salary and a few petty privileges.

More arrestees arrived throughout the night: their conditions were worse and worse. Ours, by contrast, actually seemed better. And so, through them, I found out that the demonstrations could not have been dismissed until only very late at night; I also found out that many people had been shot or simply squashed by tanks, and that in the upper side of Royal Street, the special troops were doing 15-minute shifts, beating people with an unprecedented cruelty.

It has been told to me about people arrested and dragged by their feet to the nearby Negoiu Hotel, where they were smashed with their teeth against the wall and crushed by beatings. Transformed literally into an inert mass, they were then shoved into vans and expedited to Jilava. Some of the arrestees were whispering with horror about mercury-filled batons, whose strike literally ripped the muscle apart, smashed the bone, and could crack one's skull. A bearded young man told me about the fate of a teenage boy who had been injured at his feet near Danube block. As he was groaning and dragging his bloodied foot, he kept on shouting against Ceaușescu until two militiamen dragged him into a building's vestibule and, behind the door, blew his brains out with two gunshots.

When dawn came, they took us out of the kennel in which we had been suffocating. They separated us into groups of eight and shoved us into another van. In front of me, on the bench, there was a big young man who was groaning slowly. He looked crushed. I managed to find out from him that he had been beaten with a baton until he had lost consciousness; when he regained it, he discovered that he had gone blind. He started screaming. After beating him for screaming, the militiamen, who by now knew that he had lost his sight, kept on savagely hitting him in the liver, kidneys, and testicles—this time because (they thought) he was shaming them. Now he was laying in front of me, a mountain of pulverized meat from which a small, plaintive, lost voice was intermittently coming out.

Travelling through the milky fog of dawn, which seemed stuck on the wet pavement, we were heading toward the core of Jilava complex. We drove along a road lined by two-meter-tall fences topped with barbed wire and then stopped in front of a dirty booth guarded by a soldier. The one with smashed sight stayed in the vehicle while the rest of us got out. I don't know where he was taken. Later on, I looked him up among those who were set free—but I couldn't find him. Even today, I don't know if he is alive. As is the case with almost all my detention colleagues, I still don't know his name either.

We entered into a sort of wine cellar with grained white walls more than 1.5 meters thick arched over the line of the floor. We headed toward a dead-end cut with whitewashed bricks. They ordered us, by calling us all sorts of names, not to turn our heads. On my right side, on the wall, around the height of my shoulders, I saw some longish ragged stains of brown. It took me a moment to realize they were dried blood. Some zealous soldier had struck the head of an inmate against these walls as he was passing by. Once I had realized that it was blood, I started sensing its smell.

A warder with a brutal voice told the militiaman who was guarding us to take us next door: "I will arrange those now," he added. When we turned our heads, I saw him: I don't know what my colleagues thought, but in my case, that was the moment when I sensed fear for the first time. The room "next door," where we were supposed to be "arranged," also seemed, like all the others, built into the ground. An unsettling "hospital wine cellar." Near the wall on my left side was a string of chairs. We sat. Only when I allowed my eyes to look around the room did I understand where we had been brought.

Placed in the middle of the room was a chair with a backrest; around it, rope was cut into pieces; a table with a faience panel was only one meter away and on its white glow I saw two iron bolts and a few crumpled cloths; two plastic barrels of 50 liters, one ladle, and a huge funnel were next to it. But what was obvious, what was screaming from every object that my eyes were seeing, were the pools of wet blood on the floor and the cloths soaked with fresh blood. Around the chair—blood; on the table—blood, the cloths—blood. A human had been tortured here just a little while before, and we had been brought in to take his spot.

Malraux[7] used to say that nobody can endure torture. Well, none of my accidental colleagues had shown any signs of terror. Their dignity impressed me. And then, as if we'd been suddenly illuminated by the imminence of torture, we exchanged among us the first phone numbers, as each and every one of us believed that the other would make it out alive and we were ensure that our families would get word of the fate that had been foredoomed on us. I sensed derision toward my future mutilated body, which would have been separated from life in screams and pain. I was finding out with a certain level of indifference that even the suffering can make you blush.

But God wanted this cup[8] to pass us. Roughly 15 minutes afterwards, the warder with a brutal voice dragged one man to the chair in the center of the room and evacuated the rest of us—without calling us names this time—to cell 88. The man he dragged to the chair had been horribly mutilated even before the torture commenced, his moribund leg throbbing and twitching. In cell 88, we were crowded hurry-scurry—probably on purpose—until we ended up staying three people in the same bed.

So we sat waiting for the questioning and the beatings to start. We listened. We looked at each other and inspected the cell. We were getting our instincts accustomed to the heavy breathing of the dungeon. Time passed. Every once in a while the door was opened and a name was read. Over time, the risk of being called out didn't produce any emotion from us. We were getting used to detention in the same way we had immediately accepted the unimaginable dirtiness of that hideous penitentiary.

Being at the mercy of the energumen who had taken Romania into absolute possession, we knew that we were haunted by death at every step. Slowly, cautiously, with a certain level of disgust, the discussions started: for the first time since we were locked up, we started piecing together an image of the amplitude of the demonstrations. An appeal for a general strike on December 22 was discussed insistently. Within ourselves, as is often the case with those who are isolated, our hope was getting chaotically mixed with our resignation. It is perhaps the reason why every one of us toward himself and any one of us toward the others had not yet identified as individuals again. None of us needed a name in order to consider the other a trustworthy colleague. Spontaneously, we, the imprisoned of a rebellion fallen out of the sky on the head of the bizarre Romanian people, did not need a name in order to identify ourselves.*

I record this fact with amazement, as its significance remains to be understood. We met each other—in the sense that we made our names known to each other—only when it was announced that we'd be set free in a few minutes, somewhere around the afternoon. Also at that moment, a priest from Greaca who had been arrested with us loudly delivered an extraordinary paternoster and the hymn of praise to the Virgin Mary, which starts with "It is truly right to bless you[9].… " I don't know how many of those there were believers in their everyday life. But it is a fact that we all rose and all at once, as if we were asking for forgiveness, cried. It was by far the most emotional moment of the detention period.

Anyway, the wounded were eventually hospitalized and the ill got medicine only after the release order. Without this order, the militiamen would've left us all to die with a clear conscience that they were only doing their job.

One last detail, with a symbolic value: we were taken out of the cells into a yard that seemed sheltered from the other buildings and had the aspect of a wide trench: in there, our rings, money, watches, and IDs were given back to us. The yard had three sides of brick-and-mortar walls and one side made from soil shaped as a tall wave guarded by pavilions with soldiers armed with field machine guns. The side of the yard formed by the narrow wall was, apparently, the place where the death sentences were carried out. I got closer to it: the wall had a reddish-brown colour and the mortar was gnawed at, as if it had leprosy, by the holes left by bullets. Underneath my feet the ground was so trodden that its flatness suggested the lack of elasticity of the skin of a dead person. The wisdom of chaos had made it so that we were set free through the spot where people were usually set free of their lives. With this last symbolic coincidence, I came back into post-Ceaușescu life.

I operate under the absolute certainty that if the Communist regime in Romania had not fallen on December 22, 1989, most of those who had been arrested the day before would have been shot. The events would have followed the already practiced course by the murderers in Timișoara: beatings, arrest, torture, shootings—disposal of the bodies. For this reason, because I know to whom I owe my life, for me, starting with December 22, people are of two categories: those who went out of their homes into the streets in the morning of December 22 knowing they might get shot—and who saved my life; and those who refused to protest and who, in my opinion, consented to my obliteration from among the living. My blood relatives, for instance, protested on December 22 but were waiting, with a cowardly prudence, to see what would then happen. As were most of the people to which I belong through birth, they were also waiting for things to be decided through others so they could then take advantage, one way or the other.

I shall never forget. I would also like to say that all those who led the arrests, the inquiries, and the detentions were not regular people, nor were they normal. They were criminals, specifically paid to torture and kill. These people were groomed for such acts, and most of them loved their jobs. They will always be able to say that they were merely doing their job and/or duty. Today, as if nothing happened, they mix among us on the streets: the assassins are moving around in Romania among their former and future victims. They are only waiting for a new regime to offer them the legal possibility to intimidate, torture, and kill again.

I dedicate this memorial essay to all of those who have dared: my love is headed toward them.

January 21

- I shall provide here the only names that I remember: Mihai (freshman student at electronics), Gradin Bogdan (whom I've seen again in the PNȚ[10] group at the great protest January 28, 1990, and whom I know he was then part of the hunger strikers in the University Plaza), Gabi Garabet, Andrei Ion, Alecu Ivan Ghilia, Popa Laurenţiu, Nicolescu Lucian. I was arrested together with Vali Constantinescu and was kept at IGM in the same waiting room with Mariana Berechet. Other than that, I don't know anything else.

2014: Rape culture on the ropes

Jim Byset · 31 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

When Jaclyn Friedman entered the atrium of the Queen's University Biosciences Complex on April 8, 2014, she did so like a visiting dignitary. At the university to deliver a guest lecture, Friedman walked briskly and upright, pausing briefly to look at some artwork here and there, nodding gently during conversation, all the while radiating a reserved enthusiasm—much like what one would expect of royalty. Just like any dignitary, she was escorted by eager volunteers, and just like any dignitary, she had a security detail.

While Friedman is a somewhat popular figure in the feminist community, she is by no means generally popular. The overwhelming majority of people—including students—likely have no idea who she is; she does not in any sense enjoy the sort of popularity that would send legions of shrieking fans armed with autograph books and smartphones to book signings or lectures. She's known by other feminists. That's about it.

Friedman's security detail was present not to fend off frenzied aficionados but because of a supposed threat from a small group of Men's Human Rights Activists (MHRAs) correctly rumoured to be in attendance. There wasn't any threat from the MHRAs present of course (I know this because I was one of them), but if you haven't done so before, you can check out what happened prior to and during the lecture here.

In any case, Friedman's lecture was advertised as a rebuttal to a talk given at Queen's a couple of weeks earlier by Professor Janice Fiamengo, in which the former feminist delivered a calm but merciless dissection of the double standards inherent in modern feminism. Friedman didn't discuss any of Fiamengo's lecture, however, and instead spoke at length about rape culture. Those in attendance, hoping to hear Friedman engage in some form of debate, to challenge the assertions made by Fiamengo, were left deflated.

Instead, Friedman's lecture was predictable—dependent on the usual canards surrounding consent, sexual assault, and statistics. Frankly, it was bloody boring. However, as boring as it was, there was one illuminating moment—a moment in which an offhand remark from Friedman provided a telling insight into the workings not just of her mind but also of the minds of those invested in the perpetuation of myths like rape culture.

About halfway through her talk, Friedman made reference to a letter written by the Rape, Abuse & Incest National Network (RAINN) to the White House Task Force to Protect Students from Sexual Assault. RAINN is the largest anti-sexual violence organization in the United States, which makes it one of the largest anti-sexual violence groups in the world. The letter was a 16-page document containing a number of recommendations for preventing and responding to rape on college campuses.

As well as making recommendations, RAINN provided a statement on rape culture:

> In the last few years, there has been an unfortunate trend towards blaming "rape culture" for the extensive problem of sexual violence on campuses. While it is helpful to point out the systemic barriers to addressing the problem, it is important to not lose sight of a simple fact: Rape is caused not by cultural factors but by the conscious decisions, of a small percentage of the community, to commit a violent crime [emphasis mine].

The idea of blaming rapists for rape, and not a community for rape, is pretty commonsensical. A debate on the issue isn't really necessary. Rapists rape, after all. Friedman, however, wasn't happy with RAINN's recommendations, and as soon as the acronym had passed her lips, she breezily dismissed the letter, saying, "I don't know what that was all about."

Unfortunately for feminists like Friedman, her dismissal was not reflective of a wider desire to ignore what RAINN had to say—the letter proved a massive rhetorical blow against the rape culture narrative. RAINN not only enraged the feminist community but also emboldened many within the media. Prior to the declaration, few mainstream journalists dared confront the idea, instead submitting to the unwritten but broadly understood rule that "she is always to be believed." The feminist cult of rape culture went unchecked in the mainstream media for years—as did the establishment of kangaroo courts on U.S. college campuses and the persecution of innocent men. Testament to this ideological hegemony was the daily regurgitation of the repeatedly debunked and outrageous one-in-five statistic; even Obama got in on the act.

The Dear Colleague Letter of 2011, penned in an effort to reduce sexual assaults on campus, made things worse. University administrators, terrified at the potential loss of revenue and funding from government, enrolled feminist ideologues to help structure and administer "justice" on their campuses. The result was a growing list of men denied due process, their reputations destroyed. (Another consequence of these bizarre star chambers is a mounting number of lawsuits in real courts of law, from many of those same men.)

However, following RAINN's denouncement, journalists began to ask questions and to more closely examine what was (or wasn't) happening on college campuses.

In Canada, journalists at the National Post along with the newspaper's editorial board spoke out against the idea of rape culture, publishing four articles within a fortnight on the subject. But they weren't alone. Margaret Wente of The Globe and Mail also attacked the idea, as did many others. Quite suddenly, the deference—or, more accurately, the fear—surrounding rape culture began to dissipate. Journalists were questioning not only the statistics but also the theory. A re-examination of other ideas such as justice took place, and concepts like "innocent until proven guilty," "burden of proof," and "beyond a reasonable doubt" began to receive a proper airing once more.

This didn't stop rape culture adherents from banging the drum whenever possible though. In April 2014, Emma Sulkowicz filed a Title IX lawsuit against Columbia University in which she claimed that the school had mishandled a previous sexual assault case in which she was an apparent victim.

Sulkowicz and two other women had previously banded together to bring a case against fellow student Paul Nungesser. Following three separate campus hearings, Nungesser was adjudged to have been "not responsible" in all three cases despite the application of a preponderance of evidence standard and despite the fact that Nungesser was not allowed to bring potentially exculpatory information into evidence. Nungesser, who has remained publicly silent throughout the entire episode, broke his silence in a recent interview with The New York Times, stating unequivocally that the case brought against him was malicious and as a result of deliberate collusion between the three women. The German student has become a pariah at Columbia as a result not only of the accusations but also of Sulkowicz's decision in September 2014 to make her senior thesis a protest against the administration's handling of her case. "Mattress Performance: Carry That Weight" created a stir on campus and across the United States. The protest intensified the focus not only on Sulkowicz's supposed plight but also on the hostility toward Nungesser, who by that time had been excommunicated by friends and become the victim of graffiti slurs and other forms of bullying. Sulkowicz's piece, in which she lugs her mattress around with her on campus, was lauded by critics and journalists and even compared with Christ's Stations of the Cross. It didn't matter that Nungesser was cleared of all charges. Nor did it matter that he was undergoing immense psychological and reputational damage as a result of Sulkowicz's actions.

Nungesser is set to graduate in May, during the same ceremony as Sulkowicz, who, according to The New York Times, says that she might throw her mattress on the stage during the event.

As the year went on, rape culture proponents continued to shriek and caterwaul. They continued to hold vigils and rallies and cling tenuously to the idea that society was just really, really rapey. At no point during the various protests and SlutWalks did they stop to think that they might be wrong. All that mattered was the narrative. They kept walking, shouting, and lighting candles. They did all that and more at the University of Virginia (UVA) following "revelations" of a rape culture there from Rolling Stone journalist Sabrina Rubin Erdely.

Erdely penned a 9,000-word piece on an alleged campus rape going back to 2012 when a freshman at the college, "Jackie," was apparently gang-raped by seven men. The alleged details of the rape are utterly horrific: "Jackie" was raped atop of broken glass and at one point penetrated with a bottle while others watched and "swigged beers." Except, it is highly unlikely that anything like that happened; not only was the account offered by Erdely self-contradicting, but it was also wildly at odds with eyewitness testimony as well as factually dubious in numerous areas. The veracity of the article was initially investigated by The Washington Post but was soon picked to pieces by the mainstream media in a fashion that was utterly unprecedented. Journalists around the globe seized on the story and between them repeatedly, and viciously, pulled it asunder, calling for the removal not only of Rolling Stone editor Will Dana but also of anybody involved in checking the validity of the story.

Of course, this wasn't the first time that a male student was accused of rape by a female student. It wasn't even the first time that factual inaccuracies cast such a looming shadow of doubt over a story. What made this story special, however, was that for once the media finally acknowledged that there was a problem. Erdely had put ideology ahead of truth in her pursuit of a hot story. She wasn't investigating a scandal. She was creating one.

If Ederly's goal was to raise awareness of the issue of campus rape, she certainly succeeded, albeit not in the fashion that she would have anticipated. Her article provided fresh impetus for a new direction in the conversation around campus sexual assault and the reality of false accusations. As the year came to a close, yet more evidence was presented to an awakened public on what was really happening on American campuses. The lunacy of rape culture theory was finally laid bare. And just days later, the statistics that buttress the theory would also come under renewed scrutiny.

The timing really couldn't have been any better. Erdely's article was barely off the agenda when the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) released a report about rape and sexual assault among college-age women.

For those who have been at the forefront of debunking rape culture hysteria, these findings are not surprising. What is new, however, is the consistent attack on rape culture theory, maintained and focused over the period of a full year. What is also very new is the news that Senator Kirsten Gillibrand (D-New York) dropped the one-in-five factoid from her site after publication of the study. It was silently removed without explanation, but there is no doubt that the 38-word deletion, which specifically removes the reference to the one-in-five myth, was done so in recognition of a changing dynamic around the conversation.

Put bluntly, people aren't going to swallow the bullshit anymore, and Gillibrand is smart enough to get out while the going is good.

When I wrote "Fear and Loathing in Kingston, Ontario: Confronting Lies at Queen's University" earlier this year, I did so with an agenda of my own in mind. I wanted more than anything to create a mood, to sound a very particular tone. It was important that readers of the article, already familiar with the theories and statistics, were also made familiar with the cult-like behaviour of those invested in perpetuating rape culture. That was part of the reason I wrote the piece the way I did. I wanted readers to feel uneasily close to the emotional manipulation, unethical methodology, and the cynicism necessary to make people believe such hysterical nonsense. As I look back on 2014 and how the media's coverage evolved, it seems as though I'm far from being the only one.

For me, 2014 will be remembered as the year that we did serious damage to rape culture. There now exists a media that has grown skeptical of feminist claims. There now exist organizations like RAINN, the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education (FIRE), and even the DOJ whose voices are growing louder and who are undoing the myths around rape and feminist "theory." There's also a little group called A Voice for Men and we've been doing our bit too.

I wasn't surprised when Friedman sneered and cast aside RAINN's statement on rape culture. It was typical of her. I wonder now, though, how easily she could dismiss all of the evidence, all of the counter-argument, all of the pressure heaped on her bigoted worldview today. I'm sure Friedman will give more lectures in 2015, but will she as summarily dismiss the DOJ data on rape and sexual assault? Will she as easily dismiss the UVA scandal? Will she dismiss Paul Nungesser—a man cleared of any wrongdoing—the victim of a disgraceful smear campaign?

Will she say, once again, “I don’t know what that was all about”?

She probably will, but she won’t get very far because the next time that she tries to do what she did at Queen’s University, there will be more people in the audience waiting to call her on her bullshit. It won’t be just a handful of MHRAs. There will be more people saying, “Wait—we know those statistics aren’t accurate. That theory is bigotry masquerading as a legitimate idea. You’re not telling the truth.”

The year 2014 marked a serious turning point in the fight against rape hysteria; if we are to finally rid ourselves of this hateful idea, then we must continue to speak out and to call out those who propagate the myth.

Maybe this time next year we can finally say that we killed rape culture.

It can’t come soon enough.

Have your victim's child in order to avoid jail: The culture

Jim Muldoon · 31 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is the second in a three-part series on the ramifications of a case decided recently in Melbourne's County Court. The first article—which looked at the farcical judgment of Judge Chris O'Neill and highlighted that men and boys cannot expect justice from the Australian courts—can be read here. The final installment will focus on the victim.

This article looks at the culture that allows an adult woman to use a 13-year-old boy for sex, manipulate him to leave his parental home, and father three children for her before he turned 18. Here, of course, we have to dig a little deeper and read between the lines.

County Court Judge Chris O'Neill came up with a suspended sentence because it did not challenge the prevailing culture. A harsh sentence for the woman would have been an acknowledgement that she did great harm to the boy. But worse, it also would have been an acknowledgement that the various authorities who knew that the boy was being harmed were wrong in doing nothing about it.

The tactic, used to great effect, was to examine, in great detail, the problems of the accused woman.

> Forensic psychologist Pamela Matthews told the court the woman's level of cognitive functioning was comparable to that of a six- to eight-year-old, and she gravitated towards those of similar functioning.

Matthews told the court that the woman had an IQ of 64. This, however, was not her only problem.

> The woman now has six children and Judge O'Neill said her family circumstances had to be taken into account in the sentence.

But the problem here was for O'Neill to steer a path between condemning the woman's actions (she was pleading guilty to the charges, after all) and ensuring that the excuses being proffered to keep her out of jail did not just raise even more difficult questions for the establishment.

The chief problem was described by the Herald Sun in this manner:

> He [Judge O'Neill] said the boy's mother, police and the Department of Human Services all vainly tried to intervene, but both the boy and the woman denied there was any inappropriate relationship.

There are two other versions that don't quite give the same picture. The West Australian puts it this way:

> Prosecutor Francesca Holmes said the boy's mother tried to tell authorities while the relationship was occurring, but they declined to act when both denied it.

The Age adds this information to help complete the picture:

> The boy denied to police and family members the relationship was a sexual one, Ms Holmes said, but told his mother he had become a father after the girl was born.

So, at the age of 14, a boy takes up residence in a pregnant woman's home. He is otherwise unrelated to this woman and there is no adult male living in the home. There is no dispute that the boy was of an age where he would be physically able to have sexual intercourse and impregnate. By the time he was 15 and his first daughter was born, the nature of the relationship was blatantly obvious. They "investigated" but dropped it at the first sign of an excuse.

First of all, let's clear something up. The Department of Human Services is an enormous organisation that has many sub-departments to deal with many things. The sub-department that would have been dealing with this matter is usually referred to as "Child Protection."

And, secondly, let's not be fooled by the name. The purpose of the sub-department called Child Protection is to ensure that there is more government money for their department in next year's budget. Protecting children, as we shall see, is more an expression of an ideal than it is an actual activity.

So why is it that the Child Protection people did nothing when told this boy was living, in the conjugal sense, with this woman?

To answer this, we have to take a few steps back. Ultimately, the answer lies in the fact that the Children, Youth and Families Act and the Family Law Act were written in accordance with feminist ideology. Child Protection relies on the Children, Youth and Families Act to prosecute its cases in the Children's Court. Therefore, feminist philosophy is the prevailing culture of the Children's Court and Child Protection.

It would be simplistic to accuse them of favouring the woman because she is female. Rather, the children's court sees its main purpose as halting the effects of the patriarchal culture it claims has dominated our society. It sees any and all domestic violence through the prism of patriarchy. The father not only dominates the wife directly but also indirectly through bullying her children. The mother, if she treats the children badly, is doing so against her will. Instead, she is being forced to dominate the children by obeying the father's orders.

To combat this, the feminists seek to assert themselves as a higher authority than the parents in domestic life.

To this end, the Children, Youth and Families Act and the Family Law Act have been written to ensure that parents have no rights under Australian law. Parents are assigned responsibilities, and can be punished for not meeting them, but they have no authority or rights. It is for this reason, for example, that the Children's Court and the Child Protection workers prefer the term "young person" to "child." This is not mere games with synonyms. The intention is to insist on these "young person's" independence from their parents.

In other words, Child Protection is about protecting children from their parents. In practice, this generally involves filling in copious amounts of meaningless reports while running the parents ragged through an expensive court process. All the time, Child Protection is threatening to take children away from their parents. All of this we can refer to as "the stick."

"The carrot" that is then offered to bewildered parents is that they can sign a legally binding undertaking to not harm their child in the future. The parents are told that this is not an actual admission of guilt but rather just a promise that it won't happen. Most parents, whether guilty or not, sign. Those who are rich enough and stubborn enough to insist on justice are put through meaningless, but expensive and exhausting, hearing after hearing after hearing until they see sense and sign.

In theory, the process is so punishing for the parents that they learn to treat their children better. In practice, it puts the children in charge of their own discipline as the parents become frightened to upset them in case they make another complaint to Child Protection.

The undertaking allows Child Protection to record the matter as a "substantiated" case of abuse. If they can increase the number of substantiated cases, they can claim that domestic violence is on the rise and they therefore need more funding. The legal undertaking is the most cost-effective method for Child Protection for getting their substantiated case numbers up.

In this case, however, the boy was not living with his parents, and so the threat to remove him from his mother's care would have been empty. The woman he was living with could not be controlled in the same manner as she is not legally responsible for him. The only option open to Child Protection, then, would be to take him into their own care.

The problem then, of course, is that under their watch there is the risk that the boy would leave wherever the Child Protection people might place him and go back to live with the woman. At that point, Child Protection would be legally responsible for the situation, and could be sued accordingly.

To avoid this responsibility, Child Protection would have taken a pragmatic view of the situation. They would have known that the boy was unlikely to complain. The woman, after all, was giving him “all the cool stuff” he wanted.

> Prosecutor Francesca Holmes said the boy was 13 when he first had sex with the woman and found he could get access to alcohol, cigarettes and drugs and attend parties with her.

And, as long as the boy himself did not complain, Child Protection could feign that their investigations were thwarted at the outset. By the time the boy would have been old enough to realise that this “cool” life came with a hefty price tag, it would no longer be a Child Protection problem. Indeed, he only spoke up at the age of 20.

But this cynical approach is only acceptable to the establishment because the child was male. There is no feminist dogma surrounding female sex offenders. In their ideology, such women do not exist. Equally lacking in substance, in their eyes, is the notion of a male victim. It is impossible to imagine Child Protection, the courts, or the media taking such a “hands-off” approach if a 14-year-old girl, pregnant or otherwise, was moving in as a sexual partner with an adult male.

Of course, if Child Protection would do nothing, then the Victorian police would be unwilling to get involved. Unless the boy gave evidence against the woman, the courts would insist that the problem be turned over to Child Protection. The boy’s mother could complain until she was blue in the face. Being a parent, she had no rights and no authority in this matter whatsoever.

Judge O’Neill, in his summary, was hoping that by glossing over the failure of Child Protection, his court could then smoothly proceed to give the woman a suspended sentence without too much adverse commentary.

Nothing to see here. Move along, please.

Our mainstream media, it seems, bought it. Hook, line, and sinker.

Have your victim's child in order to avoid jail: The verdict

Jim Muldoon · 31 December 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is the first in a three-part series on the ramifications of a case decided recently in Melbourne's County Court. The second article will describe the culture that allows this to take place, while the final installment will focus on the victim.—Eds.

A 23-year-old single mother enticed a 13-year-old boy to have sexual intercourse with her. This was not a one-off occurrence. The sex was regular, as was the booze, drugs, and cigarettes that came with the woman's lifestyle. The abuse began when the two were neighbours. When she moved to another house, he, at the tender age of 14, went to live with her. She was pregnant with his child.

The Victorian Police and the Department of Human Services, we are told, were powerless to do anything about it, even though they knew. The shocking fact is that the authorities were outsmarted by a woman with an IQ of 64.

By the time he was 18 years old, he was a father of three. That same year he found out what it is like to pay child support but not be allowed to see his own children. Finally, in 2011, he filed a complaint to the authorities. It took them three years to bring the matter to trial. That trial ended with the woman avoiding any jail time.

This story highlights a number of concerns for the rights and well-being of men and boys in Australia, and we will tackle them in a few articles. This first article looks at the farcical judgment of Judge Chris O'Neill, which shows that men and boys cannot expect justice from the Australian courts.

The Herald Sun tells us:

> County Court Judge Chris O'Neill said that the hardship that would be suffered by the now-married woman's children if she was imprisoned, as well as her reduced moral culpability due to cognitive deficits, meant her jail term would be wholly suspended.

Prison almost always affects more than the person being put in jail. In most cases in which a young family is involved, a father going to jail causes hardship for the whole family. There is no question that the children's relationship with their father, and therefore their relationships with men in general, would be harmed by the resulting lack of contact. Not only is there an immediate reduction in the family income, but the father's career prospects are damaged. Add to this the stigma of criminality. This obviously affects the family as a whole.

In the case of males going to prison, however, O'Neill would be among the first to remind us that this is the unfortunate but necessary part of the deterrent aspect of prison. Not only is the man punished, but also he is seen to be punished without favour because of the crime. It is not the court's fault, nor the victim's fault, that the criminal has dependants. Perhaps his children, a judge might say, might learn that crime does not pay.

For this woman, however, the question of children is not incidental. According to the Herald Sun, the woman insisted that the youth did not wear a condom. Three of her children are therefore a direct result of her crimes.

In other words, for all of those other women who are interested in taking advantage of young boys, the message is clear: The best way to avoid jail is to have your victim's children.

The "reduced culpability" is also somewhat concerning.

> Forensic psychologist Pamela Matthews told the court the woman had an IQ of 64 and the intellectual functioning of a teenager.

According to the Herald Sun, Matthews went on to say that this is why "she gravitated towards those of similar functioning."

> The woman had good prospects for rehabilitation and was not sexually attracted to children, the judge said.

Rehabilitation? What rehabilitation? She went home free. And as for "not sexually attracted"? She "gravitates" to people of her own mental age. Most people with her mental age have the actual age of children. And she has shown by her own behaviour that she will, repeatedly, have sex with a boy who has just gone through puberty. That's "children" by any definition, including the legal one O'Neill is supposed to use.

> Judge O'Neill also said her cognitive deficits meant she had a reduced understanding of the risks involved with the illicit affair and less able to make the appropriate decisions.

How bad are these "cognitive deficits"? When challenged about having a sexual relationship with a minor, she continually denied it, obviously understanding that it was wrong. According to The Age:

> She was arrested in 2012, the court heard, but told police the boy had claimed he was 17 when they first had sex.

So those cognitive deficits didn't stop her from understanding that 17 was legal but younger was illegal. They also didn't stop her from obtaining an intervention order against the now young man when she no longer wanted him to see the children.

> She also accused him of raping her, the court heard.

So, this woman knew that what she was doing was wrong and told vicious lies to avoid the consequences. Judge O'Neill's view of diminished responsibility is lacking in substance. For this reason, we must question his conclusion that there is little chance of her reoffending. The psychologist's evaluation of the woman was recent. She currently has an IQ of 64. That will not improve. Her "cognitive deficits" will not magically get better.

No, the person who committed those crimes, complete with the reduced capacity to understand them, went home unaltered and unrepentant. The prosecutor called her crimes "opportunistic." If similar circumstances arise in the future, it can only be expected that she will seize the opportunity again.

It is also interesting to note the crimes she was not accused of. Consider this snippet from a recent case in the UK reported by The Guardian that involves a former radio personality, Chris Denning, being accused of sexual assaults on young men:

> The Crown Prosecution Service announced on Thursday that Denning was accused of 41 crimes, including 34 counts of indecent assault, on 22 alleged victims between 1967 and 1985.

Compare this with the case that was before O'Neill in the County Court:

> The woman, now 32, pleaded guilty to maintaining a sexual relationship with a child under the age of 16.

No repeated "counts" of anything. And yet their sexual history is of the frequent nature expected of an adult couple. To reduce this repeated abuse of the boy to one charge is not consistent with the recent history of how sexual predators have been dealt with in the courts. It is also not consistent with justice, given the enormous, lifelong consequences for the victim.

> Judge O'Neill said the woman gave the boy alcohol, drugs and freedom, but that was not evidence of grooming or predatory behaviour.

Giving the boy alcohol was illegal. Giving the boy drugs was illegal. How many charges did she face for these crimes?

None.

And if the sex, booze, and drugs were not predatory behaviour, what were they?

> "Rather, you were simply attempting to endear yourself to (the boy) as you felt genuine affection towards someone with whom you could relate," Judge O'Neill said.

Quite how the judge sees that as not "grooming" is beyond belief. It seriously brings the judge's own "cognitive deficits" into question. But further, the boy didn't just have sex with her.

> He moved in with the pregnant woman, who was in her 30s, when he was 14.

[Editor's note: According to our calculations, the woman's age at the time the boy moved in would have been around 23 or 24. The boy was definitely 14 when he moved in with her. The quote is taken directly from the Herald Sun article dated May 21, 2014.]

The ineffectiveness of the police and the Department of Human Services to rescue the boy is the subject of another article, but it is worth noting here that the woman was active in deceiving the authorities on this matter that was vital to the boy's welfare. Were there any charges relating to this deceit and effective abduction?

No.

She made a false accusation of rape. That, too, is illegal. Any charges from this?

Again, no.

So, in the end, O'Neill lets the woman off with a warning, due to what he seemed to call "exceptional" circumstances. The Age describes it as follows:

> "Normally offending of this seriousness would warrant a significant jail sentence," Judge O'Neill said on Friday.

> "(But) there is a discretion to the court to grant special mercy where the circumstances of family hardship are exceptional."

> Judge O'Neill said the woman's husband worked full time to support the children.

> "I accept that almost every waking moment is spent looking after the children in one way or another," he said.

What is exceptional about any of this for any young family? Is the husband working full time exceptional? Is the constant need for supervising little ones "in one way or another" exceptional?

Without doubt, these "exceptional" circumstances would not keep a man out of jail. Without question, the judge's "exceptional" double standards have allowed a predator to escape the consequences of her actions.

She selfishly allowed her own sexual gratification to take priority over a young boy's mental and emotional development. She used the boy as an amusement and threw him out with the rubbish when she was done. Now that O'Neill and the rest of the Australian authorities have failed to deliver him justice of any kind, how does that young man rebuild his life?

Zara Faris debunks feminism at London debate

AVfM Video Source · 1 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Despite the myths we hear about Middle Eastern women being utterly oppressed, anyone who looks at the situation experienced by many women and men in this area tells a different story. Take Zara Faris, for example:

Indeed, she makes a strong case for why women are strongly advantaged overall in her religion. The question we'd ask her is: Are men advantaged in any particular way? From what we can detect, it sounds like they aren't, even if sensationalist Western media wants us to think differently.

“It was a social experiment,” claim Rohtak sisters

Partha Sadhukhan · 1 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

*Editor’s note: The following article describes the latest update in the story of Pooja and Arti Kumar, known as the “Rohtak sisters/girls,” hailed as national heroines after a video of the sisters fighting off a trio of men who allegedly harassed them on a bus in Rohtak in Haryana in northern India went viral. Shortly after the incident, conflicting eyewitness reports and other videos started to surface, putting into question the sisters’ actions. Indian MRA Pardha Sarthukan spoke to the Rohtak sisters, who revealed yet another twist to their story while the investigation continues.

In a shocking revelation, the Rohtak sisters now claim that they were performing “a social experiment” to show how men in Indian society have become vulnerable. In an exclusive interview with us, the girls claimed that they had been trying this experiment at a national level for some time and had already shot earlier videos [in which they had beaten up a few other men in parks] but that these earlier videos were not successful because the girls could not figure out how to continue the experiment.

With this revelation from the Rohtak sisters, the explanation of new videos surfacing every day has become clear.

The sisters claimed that as part of their graduation research program, they had decided to take up the men’s cause and show how Indian men could be exploited by simple complaints from a woman and how idiotic the Indian media can behave in those situations. They also wanted to experiment with the reaction of the Indian government, which just fell short of posthumously rewarding Bharat Ratna [the highest civilian award of the Republic of India] to Nirbhaya [a pseudonym of the victim of a December 2012 gang rape and fatal assault on a New Delhi bus].

The sisters claimed that they knew that the Indian government would bestow Bharat Ratna on any woman if the woman could play the victim card well. One of them claimed that even though their drama was well written and well rehearsed, they were really disheartened to see that the government was only going to give them 31,000 rupees each as a reward for their bravery. They claimed that filing a false rape case on someone is a much better money-making business, whereas sexual harassment is still not lucrative in that sense.

Commenting on the sisters’ reward, India’s National Commission for Women (NCW) chairperson said that “the bravehearts’ efforts are really commendable.” She added, “This shows how Indian women do care for men and how they respect men. We feel that Rs. 31,000 as compensation is very less for such bravehearts and we are recommending the government give them the Bharat Ratna Award instead.”

Men’s Rights Activists (MRAs), however, continued to demand greater punishment for the girls. They are claiming that these girls have cheated the entire nation, misused the laws, taken laws into their hands, misbehaved with senior citizens, and wasted national resources, and hence they need to be dealt with strongly and punished heavily. They have also demanded that the Indian Army should recruit the men in question as they have shown real bravery in saving an old woman. Some MRAs even suggested that the men who praised these sisters’ behaviour without trying to understand both sides of the story should marry these girls and see how this empowerment feels like in their own life. Let them be proud of their wives, they said.

Mainstream Indian media, which has so far believed and projected one side of the story (as they always do), has reacted to this news as well. Non Developmental TV and the International Budhhu Network have lauded the bravery of the girls, demanded castration of the men and other male members of their families, and supported NCW’s request to reward these girls the Bharat Ratna for their bravery.

When we contacted the officers who had refused jobs to the three accused men and shared with them these new developments, the officers still refused to give the accused men jobs, saying, “Those men were cowards and they were beaten up by two women. We can’t recruit such cowards to save our nation as even some Abala Pakistani Naris can attack and capture India.”

MRAs, who have become a headache for everyone nowadays, have strongly condemned the action of refusing these men jobs by saying that this shows that we now need to recruit women like the Rohtak sisters and let them fight it out with other Pakistani soldiers. They claimed that the moment our enemies see these girls, they will die out of shame and India will always win in all battles.

Famous Indian National Congress party leader Rahul Gandhi (RaGa), who was silent for so many days, could not stop commenting on this occasion either. In an interview, Gandhi claimed that it was Congress's women's empowerment policies that could create bravehearts like the #RohtakGirls, and people have made a big mistake by refusing Congress the power. He has again said that the Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) government has failed to recognize the true nature of these bravehearts and they should have awarded the sisters Bharat Ratna for their behaviour.

Women's rights activist turned self-styled celebrity Sanjana Kumari welcomed the proposal of awarding Bharat Ratna, saying that she wanted the same to be given out to these girls as she wanted to see how this would look.

West Bengal Chief Minister Mamata Banerjee, however, created a new controversy while commenting on this incident. She said that this is a conspiracy of Maoists against her government since the incident happened in Haryana and not in West Bengal. She claimed that the women in West Bengal are also empowered to behave like this and if this happened in West Bengal in the future, her government will offer more compensation to the victims only if they are women.

Currently, our reporting team is confused about which state in India has empowered their women the most, as we are receiving many more claims from other states that they would have offered even more compensation to women victims. We need to wait for some time to see the real welfare of the state and to see how much taxpayers' money each state can swindle in the name of women's empowerment.

Men are good and so are men-only spaces: Part two

Tom Golden · 2 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Part One of this series described numerous male spaces that over the past 40 years have been dismantled. Nearly all of the examples of male spaces had something important in common: they focused on all-male groups who gathered to be supportive to women and the culture at large. The armed forces, police, and firemen are obvious examples of men being of service. The Lions, Kiwanis, and Rotary are also obvious examples of men gathering in male spaces to be helpful to women and society. These spaces harmonized with men's traditional provide-and-protect role. Even the all-male colleges could be seen as ultimately preparing young men to be of service to women and societye, especially the military academies. The athletic groups were also similar and provided a competition ground that helped a woman choose which man might be best for her. Most of these male spaces had a similar objective to be of service to women and the culture by helping men perform their primary sex role of providing and protecting.

Then along came the 1970s with the battle-cry that men and women were equal. No differences existed between men and women outside of socialization, they said. When we run under that assumption, that men and women are exactly equal, it is easy to see that the need for male spaces that enhance men's ability to provide for and protect women is no longer a necessity. If we are truly equal, then women should be able to provide and protect on their own. Male spaces lose their cultural importance. If we are truly equal, then they're optional. Male spaces become as disposable as males themselves. They are no longer necessary.

This might have been an interesting development if men and women were truly treated as equal. Women would have been drafted and dying in wars at an equal rate; there would be no affirmative action if we were truly equal; those women's commissions would have been people's commissions to serve both men and women; the health laws and funding would have focused in a more balanced manner rather than focusing primarily on women; we would have a Violence Against People Act rather than a Violence Against Women Act; and on and on.

But that is not what happened. At the same time that equality was proclaimed, we see the powerful and quiet hand of gynocentrism shaping our world. Prior to this, gynocentrism helped our civilization by providing for and protecting women at the expense of men. This ensured the survival of our species. But now with the proclamation of equality, gynocentrism continued its influence but in a different manner. Now the heading is that we are equal, but as Orwell explained, "Some animals are more equal than others." This is clearly seen in the dismantling of male space and the simultaneous expansion of female space. Yes, we are equal, but women should get more. The ridiculous excuse for this is that men had it all for so long and now it is women's turn. Okay, if that is the case, then why not have women-only battle groups, women trashmen, women sewage workers? We don't see that though, do we? Just more perks for women, and tell the men that they are equal and to sit down and shut up and keep those sewers running. This is a far cry from equality.

It is interesting to note that as male spaces that were meant to provide for women, children and society were being dismantled, female-only spaces were being built. These female spaces seem markedly different from the male spaces that were intended to serve women, children, and society. The female spaces seem to focus only on helping women and sometimes children, especially female children. Men's service groups tended to serve everyone but themselves, while women's service groups seem to serve primarily only themselves. Very different. So if men "had it all," then women still don't have it all since they have omitted a large part of what men did when they were of service to women, children, the needy, and the culture at large.

To make matters worse, the same gynocentrism that offers more to women by default also continues to hold men accountable for women even though we are "equal." If we were truly equal, then women and the public would have no problem with men meeting in male-only spaces. Why not? If we are equal and women can have private spaces, why not men? But we see the opposite. Men are discouraged from meeting together in male-only spaces and even more discouraged from meeting together for their own benefit. The male spaces of yesteryear as we have seen had the open purpose of being of service to others, especially women and the needy. So these spaces are discouraged, but guess what? Even spaces where men would meet just for their own benefit are greeted with shaming and harsh judgments. Let's take an example.

Think back to the 1990s and the mythopoetic movement started by poet Robert Bly. This movement began creating very powerful male spaces that had nothing to do with providing and protecting and these men paid a dear price for it. As we have seen, our culture has tolerated male-only spaces in the past since they were mostly related to the gynocentric harness that held men to sacrifice their own needs and focus on the needs of the culture and of women and children. But these spaces were very different. The mythopoetic groups offered spaces for men to enjoy one another's company as men and to explore their vulnerabilities and woundedness in a non-competitive and supportive space completely void of any women. Sounds good, right?

The media had been blasting men for decades for being too violent, for being too silent, for being too insensitive, too competitive, and, well, just too "testosterone poisoned." Then along came the mythopoetic movement, which is the antitheses of all of these criticisms, and what did the media and public do? They shamed these men time and time again with insults like "All they do is go out in the woods and bang drums." The public went along with the media assessment, and this huge shift was simply shamed and turned into a cartoon even though the men were doing the very things that the media and the public had complained that men had forever lacked.

The question is: Why would this happen? Why would people not see this important shift in men's behaviors and applaud these men for breaking new ground? I think the answer is very simple. The answer is that the thing that most upset the public was that males were leaving their traditional roles of providing and protecting. It didn't matter what else they were doing. All that mattered was that they were meeting as men, with other men, and not focusing on caring for women or doing anything that was related to providing and protecting. They were looking at their own wounds and supporting one another and this was enough to set off the media and the public into auto shame mode.

In some ways I think these men got a taste of what gay men had experienced for many years: shaming, harsh judgment, and the assumption that they just weren't "real" men. Real men provide and protect, and have an interest in women, not in themselves or other men.

In some ways, the mythopoetic men and gay men were pioneers in the Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW) movement. We can see the same shaming being dished out to the MGTOW men of today. All these groups have the common bond of not catering to provide for and protect women. When men meet on their own, in male-only groups, they become a target of the culture.

If I am correct, it will help explain why Men's Human Rights Activists (MHRAs) are getting such an automatic shaming and hatred for standing up for men and boys. These men and women are focusing on an aspect of being male that has nothing to do with a man's primary sex role of provide and protect and has everything to do with his own needs, wants, and well-being. This is seen as a threat just as the mythopoetic men, gay men, and MGTOW men were likely seen as threats since they were ignoring the provide-and-protect side of things and focusing instead on themselves.

And so it goes.

Let's not forget, men are good. Gay men, straight men, MGTOW men, mythopoetic men, MHRA men, and on and on. Men are good.

Paternity fraud: Father by default

Have your victim's child in order to avoid jail: The victim

Jim Muldoon · 3 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is the final installment in a three-part series on the ramifications of a case decided recently in Melbourne's County Court. The first two articles show how corrupt the verdict was and describe the culture that allows this to take place.

This article looks at the results of an adult woman using a 13-year-old boy for sex, grooming him with drugs and alcohol, and manipulating him to leave his parental home and father three children for her before he turned 18. Shortly after that, she dumped him, and now he cannot see his own children.

Her punishment for these crimes was a suspended sentence.

Since we began looking at this case, another example of this type of leniency happened in South Australia. This shows how commonplace these situations are. In the latest incident, a woman befriended a boy, his mother, and his sisters when she worked at the school canteen. She organised with the mother for the boy and his sisters to stay overnight at her place. At the appropriate time, she put the girls to bed and then proceeded to have sex with the boy.

> "In some respects, you are a person to be pitied – life has not dealt you a good hand," [the judge] said.

No, he was not talking to the victim. The person to be pitied was the criminal, Kylie Fiona Henry. She was let off with a suspended sentence. The other excuse proffered was:

> The court heard jailing the woman might force her children into state care.

In both of these cases, the attention was firmly focused on the problems of the perpetrator. When the boy's issues from the first case are discussed, they are minimised and discounted.

> The teen became a father at 15, and again at 16 and 18, which the judge said would have had a profound impact on him.
> "He had to deal with the pressures of fatherhood at far too early an age," Judge O'Neill said.

This does not even begin to describe the boy's problems. First of all, the judge puts his problems in the past tense. This is manifestly untrue.

At the tender age of 13, he was given frequent access to drugs and alcohol. The following is taken from the Victorian Education Department's website:

> Drinking alcohol during the teenage years can cause permanent brain damage. Damage to the brain could be responsible for memory problems, inability to learn, problems with verbal skills, alcohol dependence and depression.
> Alcohol can affect a teenager's social development if they start drinking at an early age. They may spend their time drinking instead of participating in sports or other recreational activities. They may turn to alcohol as a form of coping with problems and be more open to using other substances. The learning difficulties caused by teenage drinking can result in poor school performance and an increased risk of social problems, depression, suicidal thoughts and violence.

According to Drinkwise Australia, a Professor Ian Hickie of the University of Sydney believes that > … alcohol can disrupt brain development during the critical phase of growth that occurs from around 12-13 > years of age until our early twenties. As the brain shapes itself throughout adolescence it needs the most positive and alcohol free environment to thrive. Professor Hickie's advice for parents and influential adults is to avoid introducing alcohol to teenagers for as long as possible.

That the young boy should run this risk so that the woman could have sex with a child is abhorrent. The judge citing the woman's problems of low IQ and maturity to excuse his lenient sentence surely must rub salt in the wound. Clearly, the family court didn't see any problem in allowing the same woman sole custody of three children. Perhaps her IQ was better on that day.

It is difficult to imagine that the boy—living an adult's life with sex, booze, and drugs—was putting in a great effort at school and getting good grades. Of course, now that he is an adult, the expected low income and lack of career as a result of that lifestyle will be just his own bad luck. It is also hard to imagine this young man feeling that society respects him as a citizen with full rights. Instead, he must feel like there is a permanent "Kick Me" sign on his back.

But the other problems will only come to light as the young man gets older. One major factor will be his own guilt. The truth is he probably enjoyed the sex, booze, and drugs at the time. Therefore, there will always be, in his own mind, a place for blaming himself. As he gets older and realises the damage done not only to himself, but also to his children, there will always be some blame for himself because he willingly went along with the paedophile's games of deceit to hide their sexual relationship from the authorities.

Also, note that the young man no longer has access to his children. Not only did he get "the pressures of fatherhood at far too early an age," but he also learned how to lose all contact with his children in his first year of official adulthood. While any mature, fair-minded adult would have been able to predict that his foray into fatherhood at 15 would not end well, the teenage boy would have never seen it coming.

In the South Australian case, the young boy is quoted as follows:

> I felt ill. I can't trust women and I hate them[.]

How long before that phrase is used against him as evidence of misogyny, with the patriarchy to blame?

And yet, as the true nature of this betrayal sinks in to these young men, how can it not warp their lives in numerous ways? This is not simply a question of how they perceive women. The courts have held their problems as insignificant compared to that of their abusers' issues. How does that affect their self-esteem? How does that impact their view of the authorities?

Can you imagine that these young men will grow up with a respect for the courts? Can you imagine that these young men will believe in our justice system?

And can you imagine that the feminist courts will give these young men the same amount of slack given to their abusers? Will a judge tell them one day they are to be "pitied" as life, their abusers, the authorities, and the courts have not dealt them "a good hand"?

And further, is it possible for these young men to mature with an attitude of self-respect given that their society has treated them as disposable dildos?

The truth is that these victims are also suffering thanks to the feminist view on sex that seems to inform our society these days. This view sees men as thinking only with their penises. They will be grateful for any sex they can get, regardless of how tawdry the affair might have been.

This view also sees heterosexual sex as somehow tainted because the man penetrates the woman, thus somehow always injuring her. For this reason, the young man from Melbourne will see cases make the headlines like those recently involving Rolf Harris and Robert Hughes. The crimes these men are being publicly denounced for do not compare to the injustices he suffered. In Hughes's case, he indecently exposed himself to some girls and sexually assaulted one girl.

That's one girl. Once. No rape. No pregnancy. No children. No leaving home. No alcohol or drugs to warp a developing brain.

For the hard-of-thinking, or more accurately for the acutely bigoted, this does not mean that I condone in any way Hughes's actions. But his crimes are a far lesser evil than those inflicted on this young father of three, and Hughes was sentenced to 10 years and 9 months jail time, along with significant public humiliation.

These young men will have to revisit their situation again and again as they mature and their understanding of sex, sexual politics, and other matters grows. If they are lucky, they will find forgiveness for themselves for participating in acts that they couldn't begin to understand the ramifications of. They may eventually understand that they succumbed to a temptation that should never have been put before them.

Perhaps even the day might come when they will realise that they have value just for being human, irrespective of what the media, the courts, and the feminist ideology they kowtow to dictates.

What they should never do is turn to feminist ideology for answers because there is nothing but bigotry and hatred and indifference for them there.

Before we begin today’s discussion, as always, we have to note that time-honored red pill maxim: Not All Black Women Are Like That (NABWALT), but Enough Black Women ARE Like That (EBWALT).

I was hoping that someone among our esteemed readers here at J4G would pick up on what I “sensed” and “saw” in the previous email exchange, and once again I wasn’t disappointed. The above lead-off quotation is by one Ms. Alana, a relative newcomer to J4G. She got wind of our merry band via my series of email conversations with noted relationship and dating coach Mr. Evan Marc Katz, as she’s been reading his blog for sometime now and decided to come on over to see what the hubbub was all about. As you might imagine given those facts, Ms. Alana is hardly a “Stepford Wife” stan for the manosphere, a “Yes” woman who merely approvingly consigns whatever we say here. Indeed, a careful reading of her comments in quite a number of discussions here shows her to be very much of an independent mind.

Additionally, Ms. Alana is not Black, nor is she an American; she happens to be of Asian background and hails from one of the "Asian Tiger" countries. Yet despite this, the reputation of American Black women is so widespread that people from the far-flung corners of the Earth can spot their 'tude many time zones away.

I post this because it is vitally, hugely important in the ongoing "conversation" pertaining to "street harassment" and attendant issues relating to sexual politics in our time. The argument, as proffered by Feminista Jones and Co., is that (Black) women are constantly besieged by (Black) men who not only don't "come correct" (read: make a "respectful" approach) but also "can't take no for an answer." This line of argument is presented a priori; it is stated as if it were empirical fact.

Jones and her ilk present the issue as if they were just walking along, minding their own business, when suddenly out comes a "brotha ne'er do well" who accosts them in the most crude manner and then refuses to depart when told to step off. Yet, by her own words, Jones tells a different story—and thus raises lots of questions about the "truth" of "street harassment."

Jones's argument, as laid out in my previous post, is that my email exchange with her is indicative not just of "street harassment" but also of all forms of "harassment," including "online harassment" and "workplace harassment" that (Black) women like her must endure—despite the fact that if anyone in terms of gender experiences "online harassment," it's MEN (as we have noted, documented, and observed right here in this very forum, thank you very much); and that, if the famed Anita Hill/Clarence Thomas US Senate Confirmation Hearings more than two decades ago are anything to go by, the "evidence" that supposedly makes the "case" for (Black) women being put upon left and right by "brothas who can't take 'no' for an answer"™ is shaky at best. A closer examination of the assertions that sista social justice warriors (SJWs) like Jones proffer, however, raises a whole other set of very interesting questions that belie any claims toward "sistas being ever the victim"™—indeed, more often than not, as Dr. Edward Rhymes recently noted and documented, sistas themselves are very much active participants in the BSery they supposedly decry.

Which brings us to our second quotation above.

Tupac: Relevant Now More Than Ever

The second quotation is the first verse of Tupac Shakur's song "Wonda Why They Call U … ," a verified hip-hop classic taken from his double album All Eyez on Me. The song, which details Tupac's "beef" with civil rights/Black feminist icon C. Delores Tucker, makes clear his position that neither he nor "all" rappers declare "all" women to be "bitches and ho's" but rather certain types of women who rightly deserve the labels based on their actions. Since Feminista Jones fancies herself something of an "expert" on hip-hop history, particularly as it pertains to sexual politics in Black America, I think my citation of Tupac's classic song is particularly apt in the light of Jones's "elaborate" remarks to yours truly.

As Ms. Alana has noted above from afar, Jones's reply to my respectful(!) "approach" really says it all as to how and why (Black) women like her are often met with profanity-laced "hollabacks" from brothas out on the block in Black America—because they often respond in the same snooty tenor and tone that Ms. Alana picked up on above, and streetwise brothas often pick up on that. Indeed, it is the escalation on the part of many of these sistas that forms the basis of the supposed "harassment" to begin with—note Lindsey's Cards Against Harassment jihad: she openly confronts (Black) men and then has the gall to be "offended" when they rightly fire back with a few barbs of their own. While Lindsey can be forgiven a bit, due to her SWPLness (Stuff White People Like-ness), sistas like Jones ought to know better. Ahhh, but here we arrive at another truism in Black American life: that of the unspoken rule that holds that Black women in aggregate somehow have a "right" to act a fool and that Black men in particular are just supposed to take it. The YouTube video Ms. Alana includes in her remarks is yet another(!) case in point—the manner and bearing of the sista in the video is not at all unusual or unique in Black American life—and even their more "toned down" manifestations, á la Jones's faux "respectful declines," is the proof.

Hip-hop has long had a cottage industry of self-styled Black feminist "critics" and "experts" who decry the supposed wanton "misogyny" of rappers like Tupac while never, ever, questioning how or why said rappers say what they say about some Black women in the first place(!); they never ask whether what they're saying about them is true or accurate; they never ask if it is deserved or warranted. Black feminists like Jones proffer an incredibly simplistic and sophomoric view of things here, where "all" Black women are queens and all Black men/rappers are somehow reprobate knuckledraggers. Tupac, in his song "Wonda Why They Call U … ," says something else.

Some (Black) Women Get Off On Nuking Guys—Yes, It's True

In his excellent post "The Masked Man," Rom Wills discusses how it is not at all uncommon, in Black America at least, to find truly sadistic Black women who get off on "nuking" Black men:

> Here's a reality that women need to grasp. Truth be told women tend to get mad when this reality is pointed out to them. Many don't want to hear it. Too bad. Women need to get their heads out of the sand because what I'm about to share is a very real dynamic. Many women will reject a man for many reasons. Admittedly some reasons are very good but many are frivolous. The rejection itself might not be that bad. It's part of life. I personally say that a man can learn a lot from a rejection. Rejection helps a man to grow. The problem though is that many women can't just graciously reject a man in way that leaves his self-esteem intact. Many women will reject a man in a mean-spirited way. Many women will purposely try to hurt a man's feelings. For what? All he did was find them attractive and work up the courage to approach them. A woman doesn't have to want a particular man but don't make him feel bad that he isn't tall with a six-pack and pretty eyes. Yet many women have no problem rejecting a man harshly. Too bad many women don't understand a simple universal principle: What goes around comes around.

The idea that women are somehow "socialized" to be "polite" to men despite their not digging them, and that nuclear rejections and the like are rare and the result of men not being able to take "no" for answer, is FALSE. Not only can women do it early and often, but society at large condones, encourages, and endorses such jerkified behavior under the rubric that said men somehow "deserved it." This perpetuates the idea that (Black) woman = good, (Black) man = Bad; and hip-hop has addressed this in dramatic fashion, per songs like the one this post is examining. Rappers—Black men who are drawn from Black America's most marginalized sections—are lifting their voices and being heard, presenting another side to the blue pill narrative that so many of us have been indoctrinated with along sexual politics lines. YES, there are some (Black) women out there who are like that …

… and it is not only right, but also just, for a brotha to call them on it.

The Importance of Being Earnest—And Calling the Miss Thangs on Their Crap

Hence how and why Jones really has a problem with me: because I called her on her bunk. To be sure, I didn't use the crude language of the brotha on the block—that's not my style—but I used other methods with which to highlight her stuff, hold it up, and put it on blast for literally all the world to see—as Ms. Alana, literally a world away, can attest to. A vital component of what has become known as Game is the talent/skill of being able to suss out these "tells" on the part of some (Black) women and then be able to let them know that you know that they know what the deal is.

While we're on the topic, let's put another pretty blue pill lie to bed. The notion that if a guy only acts/approaches "respectfully" that it will somehow open the floodgates is also a LIE. Guys make "respectful" approaches all the time, and more than we're willing to admit, they are met with utterly demeaning and dehumanizing and sometimes just downright mean-spirited "nuking" reactions on the part of SOME (Black) women. When you hear about these (Black) women bemoaning "street harassment" in the Cathedral media, what you're really hearing is them being an A-1 jerk of the first order and a brotha calling them on it, however inelegant it may be. They would be right to do so—for no one should have to accept demeaning treatment in the name of it being part of life. That so many sistas think it is wholly right to routinely diss Black men, no matter how they "step," is really indicative of the extent to which the social rot has set into Black America itself in our time—and yes, hip-hop has been singular among American men in responding to this asshat behavior and addressing the attendant sexual politics issues it raises.

Some (Black) women in our time are under the illusion that they are exempt from the observance of norms of civility, which, when coupled with the notion that some (Black) women in our time are actively encouraged to diss Black men in general, and working-class ones in particular, really accounts for what we're seeing when we're being "asked" to consider the crocodile-tears-laden "pleas" of the sista SJW crowd: they're crying foul because they ran across a brotha who decided that he wasn't gonna take their asshattery lying down and decided to call them out on it—and guess what?

It. Works.
Because if it didn't, we wouldn't be having this conversation right now, would we?

Therefore, I hereby recommend to all men reading this—Black or otherwise—to be sure to call out a (Black) woman who is acting like a meanie. Let her know that you know that she knows that she's outta pocket—and do it in a way that really drives the point home before you eject.

Like Feminista Jones aptly demonstrates, they will be beside themselves with being caught cold-busted on their stuff.

Booyah.

Now adjourn your arses …

The Obsidian

 Tupac made it clear in many interviews that not all women are bitches, and this is the song in which he identifies the women who are. Notable, Faith Evans sings the chorus on this song: she is the widow of the late Biggie Smalls. Tupac wrote this song in response to the allegations of C. Delores Tucker, an African-American politician and civil rights activist best known for her participation in the civil rights movement and her stance against gangsta rap music. Editor’s note: We know that feminism and its underlying gynocentrism predate Marx, but it should be telling how people from former totalitarian regimes like comedian Veemonro instantly recognize totalitarian ideology in so much of what is called “feminism” and “equality” these days.

On nerds and “entitlement”: An open letter to The Two Scotts

Karen Straughan (aka GirlWritesWhat) · 4 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

As you may or may not have heard, in early December 2014, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) took the rather startling step of stripping famed and esteemed physicist Walter Lewin of his Professor Emeritus status and removing his online lectures and courses from its web site because he had been accused of sexual harassment.

In response to this murky sexual harassment scandal involving a retired professor, Scott Aaronson penned a blog post. In his post, he expressed a desire that MIT not penalize the thousands of online students who depend on that professor’s uploaded lectures by pulling them down (perfectly reasonable), as well as some dissatisfaction as to the lack of transparency regarding what had actually transpired that was bad enough to see MIT strip a noted professor of his emeritus status.

This is not an unreasonable request. Sexual harassment policies in universities and colleges are consistently vague as to what behaviors are in violation and where the line is between interacting with women and expulsion. Many such policies rely heavily words like “unwanted” or “unwelcome“:

> The definition of sexual harassment may differ slightly among educational institutions. The types of behavior constituting sexual harassment may vary in degree of severity. Its > definition always has one key element — the behavior is uninvited, unwanted, and unwelcome.

His concern, which he went on to explain in the comments, and unlike that of a typical observing public, was not so much that he longed to enjoy the titillating and salacious nitty-gritties of the case, but that for many men, particularly nerdy ones, life is already fraught with the, to them, arbitrary, ephemeral and capricious rules of social and sexual interaction, and for those already living in constant anxiety about offending women, not knowing what offenses had actually earned this man the complete annihilation being meted out… well, nerds across the globe were probably rushing to pharmacies to refill their anxiety meds.

For a group of people high in IQ and low in social expertise, who were likely bullied in high school, who are frequently not conventionally physically attractive and know it (because they heard it, constantly, possibly amid the sound of flushing water while being held upside down, often by people who WERE conventionally attractive), the vagueness of these definitions, combined with the dubious competence of adjudication, the erosion of due process and the sometimes draconian punishments that accompany a finding of violation on a typical university campus, well, Aaronson’s now famous Comment #171, posted under his blog post delves into the very heart of that particular darkness.

And after exposing his vulnerability, fear and pain from a place and time where he has now worked past much of it, the response of the usual feminist suspects was typically brutal.

The establishment feminists dubbed him privileged and misogynistic, accused him of viewing women as subhuman sex objects, and asserted that his entire heartfelt and heartbreaking post was merely an expression of thwarted male sexual entitlement to women’s bodies, a projection of his bitterness at the women who rejected him (though he mentioned none) onto all women everywhere. He told them that feminism–an ideology he still mostly supports!–convinced him to loathe his own sexuality and consider himself simultaneously sexually unworthy and sexually privileged, convinced him that the mere biologically intractable fact of his desire for women posed a harm to women that he wanted to avoid at any cost to himself (even chemical castration), and they responded by saying, “it wasn’t feminism that told you that, you entitled, unworthy, predacious, privileged, rapey oppressor, and daring to say it sucks to be male and shy and socially awkward and alone makes you even more of every one of those things feminism never told you about yourself. Signed – a feminist.”

The level of overt cruelty displayed by bigots like Amanda Marcotte is breathtaking. And as this blog post (long but well worth the read) by another Scott demonstrates, even the most reasonable of all the feminist responses to Aaronson's pain is rife with plausible deniability and victim-blaming. "It wasn't feminism that told you you're a privileged, entitled, rapey creep, it was patriarchy. Also, women have it worse, so stop complaining, privileged man-baby. Also, your complaining oppresses women, so it's no wonder they don't like you, creep. Signed – a feminist."

As Scott Alexander points out in his delightfully extensive blog post:

> The problem is that nerds are scared and confused and feel lonely and have no idea how to approach women. From this root problem blossoms both Aaronson's problem – that sometimes all you can do is go to a psychiatrist and ask to be castrated – and Penny's problem – that other times people go read pickup artistry books that promise to tell them how the secret is "negging" people.

> But Aaronson's solution to the problem is to talk about it. And feminism's solution to the problem is to swarm anyone who talks about it, beat them into submission, and tell them, in the words of Marcotte, that they are "yalping entitlement combined with an aggressive unwillingness to accept that women are human beings just like men"

And while Alexander goes to extreme lengths to deconstruct and discredit virtually every feminist assertion on this particular issue (with links to research and studies and all kinds of goodies for people who operate on facts rather than emotion), and while he accurately identifies much of the problem to be binary zero-sum thinking on the part of feminists (that is, one class is privileged and the other oppressed, therefore the suffering of one is by default less bad than the suffering of the other, even when we are forced to acknowledge it), he does not seem to see Marcotte's final quoted sentence for the projection it is.

I mean, this proposition–that men do not consider women human–is the primary axiom of the feminist definition of "patriarchy," which has been the dominant social system for as long as anyone can confidently determine. According to feminists, the entirety of history is one where men arbitrarily, capriciously and unjustly oppressed and subjugated women, treated them as nothing more than objects of sexual enslavement and domestic drudgery, for the privilege and benefit of all men.

So let's unpack this. Men, all through history, were nursed by women as infants, had their boo-boos kissed by women, were cuddled to sleep by women, had their illnesses tended by women, formed their very first and most important (most important because an infant is entirely dependent on the woman who feeds and nurtures it) emotional attachments with women. And yet the men so overwhelmingly influenced by the care and nurturing of women for their formative years, indeed, the men who were molded in the cradle of female love, affection, care and forbearance, created a society that subjugates and oppresses all women for men's privilege and benefit.

That is the real assertion Marcotte and other feminists have consistently been making since the Declaration of Sentiments of 1848: that men are so sociopathic and subhuman that they would, collectively, oppress and subjugate the very people they formed their most intimate and important emotional bonds with. That men are so universally beyond the pale that they consider the person who brought them into the world and was their sole tether to life for their formative years, and all others like her, as less than human, as a slave class, as undeserving of the smallest human decency or respect.

This is what feminism tells men about themselves (it's what feminism told you about you, Scott Aaronson), and it's what it tells women about men. Feminists like Amanda Marcotte (and the #yesallwomen and #notallmen hashtags, among others) just come right out and say it, and then pretend to be victims when men say, "we're not like that." And feminists like Laurie Penny, say, "well, men, you're kinda sorta almost human at this point, unlike all the other men throughout history, but you could still do better," all while portraying men as a class as uniquely capable of subhuman behavior and uniquely deserving of derision and scorn.

Alexander closes his blog post with this:

> Once I see anyone, anywhere, publish an article that not only recognizes our pain, but doesn't derail it into an explanation of why we're definitely still terrible and there is no need whatsoever for them to change, then I will be more optimistic that progress is at hand.

This is one such article, but tellingly, it was written by an anti-feminist woman. And there lies the rub, and the kernel of the message I want you to hear:

You said that male nerds are not only more likely to be feminist than other men, but that the average nerdy man is more likely to be feminist than the average non-nerdy woman. The reason for this is not because non-nerdy women are less likely to consider themselves or other women human–it's because they are more likely than feminists to consider YOU to be human, and therefore capable of seeing your mothers, sisters, daughters and wives as human beings.

Feminism's most basic premises sees men and women as tribal adversaries when they never have been, not even prior to the emergence of homo sapiens sapiens, and they see men as the oppressors of women and women the slaves of men all through history when this has never remotely been the case. It is not men who see women as less than human–it is [female] feminists who see men as less than human, incapable of even the most rudimentary compassion for the very people in their lives they are closest to, and [male] feminists who are convinced to internalize this message not because it's true, but because it is the opposite of true. It is because you see women as human, even more human than yourselves and more deserving of human dignity and consideration, that you have always felt you could never treat them as human enough.

They are using your compassion for women to convince you that all men (including you) hate women and so much they designed an entire form of social organization that dehumanizes women. It is because you have so much compassion for women, and so little for men, or even yourselves, that you are able to believe it.

You have seen these feminists retreat to their motte when such allegations are levied against them, but they live their lives in the bailey, Scott(s). In the bailey, men are universally privileged subhuman monsters who oppress, exploit and subjugate the very people they love, on a macroscale. And because you are so incredibly compassionate toward women, in your own minds, you could never consider women to be as human as they deserve, you could never treat women compassionately enough, while in the mind of a feminist, you, as a male, are entirely undeserving of anyone's compassion because you're a subhuman monster, as was every man who came before you all the way back to the cave.

So my message to you Scotts and all the other shy, nerdy males out there, just let it go. Not your pain. Not your suffering. Not your anger. Not the injury you feel when your disclosure of your most deep and intimate pain earns you little more than a more vicious public ass-kicking by the very people you have begged for understanding, feminists like Marcotte.

Let FEMINISM go. In its entirety. There's nothing just or compassionate in it, and there never has been when it comes to mainstream feminism, not even as far back as the 1850s. There's nothing real in it, only boogeymen designed to terrorize women and teach them to live in a state of heightened fear and learned helplessness, and the encouragement of scab-picking and the nursing and expanding of female grudges until they contaminate every facet of the relationship between men and women, and to whip men into guilt, shame and submission as the subhuman beasts they are.

Yes, sexism is real (against both men and women), and yes, gender roles are too rigid (for both men and women), but feminism provides no insight into the actual causes of any of it, and can therefore never provide an effective cure. All it provides for women is a sense of perpetual victimization and undeserved entitlement, neither of which will ever help women succeed, and all it provides for men is shame and self-loathing.

This is an intervention, gentlemen. I'm a bisexual, gender-queer, divorced mother of two sons and a daughter. I want them to inherit a world where the humanity of all people is respected and where all people's pain can find a compassionate ear and some form of redress. Where even men are considered to be human beings, and where the content of a woman's character rather than her pants defines what she is and can be.

An ideology that sees men and women as warring tribes, with men cast as the bourgeoisie and women as the proletariat, cannot and will not bring that world into reality. An ideology that sees men as subhuman and women as beyond human cannot and will not bring that world into reality.

So please, I beg of you, and of all the sensitive, wonderful, sweet, considerate, compassionate yet awkward men like you:

Let it go.

So what if not all feminists are like that?

Alvar Bardolf · 4 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Note: This article is also available in Romanian.

When criticising feminism for its many and varied faults and bigotries I have not uncommonly found myself criticised in turn. “Fool! Don’t you realise that feminists are not all the same. There are many different types of feminist, so ranting on about all feminists is just ignorant and irrelevant.”

The first point I make in reply is that I haven’t said “all feminists…,” but just “feminists.” I agree that there is an ambiguity here, since I might be generalising over all feminists or just generalising over some. Feminists, however, are the last people who can complain about this ambiguity. For who has not observed them commit the fallacy of inferring conclusions about all men from premisses about only some men? (Rape culture, anyone?) Exploiting the ambiguity has been the mainstay of their rhetoric for many years. When pressed they retreat to the truth about some men (but fail to retract the conclusion that they have invalidly inferred) and when the pressure lets up they return to using the conclusion about all men.

When I say “feminists this” or “feminists that” I am generalising over the women who have formulated and propagated the central doctrines of modern feminism, and over anyone who subscribes to those doctrines. An illustrative list of the formulators and propagators, in no particular order, would be Greer, Friedan, Faludi, Wolfe, Sharpe, Dworkin, Steinem, Mackinnon, Harding, French, Millett, Segal, Boycott. More recently one might add the contributors to Jezebel and such éminence grises as Amanda Marcotte and Laurie Penny. There are many others, more obscure, who I could add to the list. It is not me that has constructed the central doctrines of feminism: feminists have; so it is not a question of whether you agree with my definition of feminism but whether what you choose to attach the word “feminism” to really is a sort of feminism.

Apparently plenty of women count themselves as feminists but they do not subscribe to the doctrines of feminism (as just defined) and such feminists claim I am being unfair to them. Now, whilst anyone can call themselves a feminist, what matters is what it is to be a feminist in a meaningful sense. For example, there are plenty of people who call themselves Christians who neither know nor subscribe to Christian doctrine. There is no meaningful sense in which they are Christians. The same is true for feminism. Although feminists are not all of exactly the same opinions, to count as a feminist in a meaningful sense one must subscribe to the central doctrines of feminism. Since I am criticising those doctrines I am not being unreasonable when I say “feminists…” in order to generalise over those people.

Sometimes self-appellating feminists deny that there are any central feminist doctrines because, they tell me, “feminism is a matter of to each his own.” Of course, they can’t actually put it in those words, or at least, not in one of them, because to do so requires the correct use of the masculine gender[1]. Consequently they choke on reaching the word “each” as the awful realization dawns that the next word must be “his,” and head off into some garbled circumlocution. But that is what they mean, even when they must garble it. This is a disastrous move to make, since then feminism, by including everybody’s beliefs, becomes empty of distinctive content. To each his own reduces feminism to soulful mood music that may accompany any proposition.

Some such feminists are also Humpty Dumptyists: they believe that words can mean whatever they want them to mean and hence “feminism” can mean whatever they want it to mean.

> “That’s a great deal to make one word mean,” Alice said in a thoughtful tone.
> “When I make a word do a lot of work like that,” said Humpty Dumpty, “ I always pay it extra.”

Of course, it doesn’t matter which collections of syllables we use to represent which things, but if you allow the same word now to mean one thing and later another, you can’t pretend to be talking about the same thing now and later. Since “potatoes” refers to potatoes, saying that—while for some people potatoes are root vegetables, for others potatoes are green things that grow in trees—is not profound talk of a different sort of potato-hood but merely talking nonsense.

And that is the point of Lewis Carroll’s Humpty Dumpty. “Glory” doesn’t mean “a nice knock-down argument.” If you change the meaning of “glory” so that it does, what then are you going to use when you want to talk about glory? If we are to talk about things rather than merely to play with words, words cannot mean just whatever one wants them to mean when it gets to talking about those things. We can talk about glory and we can talk about nice knock-down arguments and we can talk about feminism, and we can use any words we wish to do so; if, however, having decided on those words, we now start changing what they mean again, we don’t end up with an exciting flexibility of thought, we just end up having no idea what we are talking about.

Now if feminists wish to insist upon it, I would be quite happy to agree that feminism is exactly whatever anyone says it is. If all it is to be a feminist is to call yourself one, without there being anything else in common between feminists, then feminism has no central doctrines: it is just whatever anybody wants it to be. Feminism is vacuous, and as such is defeated. No further obligation to refute its doctrines, all that remains is to spread more widely the appreciation of its vacuity. What a relief! And if a feminist insists that “feminism” is in the hands of Humpty Dumpty, what more need we say (as long as they pay it extra).

By contrast, whereas and insofar as feminists, speaking as such, present themselves as offering truth-evaluable claims, and since asserting a truth-evaluable claim commits one to denying whatever is incompatible with it, that self-presentation commits them to feminism having some distinctive content. So they face a dilemma: either feminism is to each his own, in which case it is vacuous, or it is not vacuous, when feminism cannot be to each his own but must have some distinctive content. And what else can that content be but the central feminist doctrines?

Unfortunately, there are a great many people who count themselves as feminists whilst being unaware of the actual doctrines of feminism. So the extent to which it might be a mistake to say “feminists think such and such” is the extent to which there are people around who call themselves feminists and who either indulge in the sort of nonsense analysed in the last few paragraphs or who don’t take their affiliations to political doctrines sufficiently seriously to bother to find out what the doctrines are. They just accept the feminist propaganda that feminism is about justice and fairness, and since we are all for justice and fairness, count themselves as feminists.

But every tyrant there ever was said they were for justice and fairness. Such people go along with whatever they take to be fashionable opinion and then get cross when they come in for criticism because of the doctrine to which they have allied themselves.

I agree that there are some feminists who could claim to be feminist in a meaningful sense and who are reasonable (Janet Radcliffe Richards, Christina Hoff Sommers, and Cathy Young, for example). On occasion these feminists have tried to make a distinction between themselves and the majority by referring to themselves as “equity feminists,” and the majority as “gender feminists.” Unfortunately, these feminists comprise a tiny minority and their doctrines have nothing to do with central feminist doctrines.

The doctrines put forward by equity feminists consist mainly in pointing out that there is nothing in liberal political philosophy which means it applies only to male humans (not an especially hard thing to do—just requires remembering that the word ‘men’ can refer to all humans).
