Faith in there being mainstream feminists who are reasonable and there being serious thinking which underpins most feminist theory is a view that can only be maintained on the basis of ignorance of the central feminist doctrines–and the cover given by equity feminism. Equity feminists have been anathematised and suppressed by gender feminists and their doctrines have been explicitly rejected as being no form of feminism.

It is time to stop feminism as a whole trading on the reasonableness of the equity feminism which it has rejected. Equity feminists should therefore abandon the feminist tag altogether.

In conclusion, to proclaim oneself a feminist is to declare assent to and approval of the central doctrines of feminism and to ally oneself with the reasonably foreseeable consequences of those doctrines. Consequently it is entirely fair to confront such people with the actual doctrines to which they have allied themselves by their decision to call themselves feminist.

For them to reply that those doctrines aren't feminist because they are a feminist and they don't recognise them or agree with them is not a defence of a different feminism, but merely a declaration of their ignorance of feminism. Being a useful idiot for female supremacism is not occupying a moral high ground, and ignorance does not excuse it.

Hence, so what if not all feminists are like that? Feminism is.

---

[1] If feminism is truly to each his own we must include men as well as women and hence must use the masculine rather than feminine singular possessive pronoun—that is, we use the sex inclusive rather than sex exclusive pronoun, a fact about pronouns we all know but are obliged to pretend we don't.

A breakup letter to feminism

Rachael Lefler · 5 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial note: is it just us or is this starting to look like a trend? We tend to think so. –DE

When people make this kind of public declaration, such as Salon's article about why the author left the GOP (here), many people respond by doubting if they were "truly" whatever they claimed to be formerly. To me this is similar to the No True Scotsman fallacy, saying that No True X could just give up being X to be something else. I think a lot of this has to do with the way humans are socially wired to create in-group preferences and out-group biases. When someone leaves our group for the out-group, we often look at them with incredulity, suspicious that they were a false friend or a spy for the other group all along. History is littered with examples of this, as is literature, but I won't bore you with examples.

But the truth is, people are more complicated than that. And with politics, I value truth and rationality above any concerns about loyalty to a particular brand or group of people. Loyalty, in my personal experience, is too often used to silence the truth or to attack people for telling it.

There is no amount of real evidence that would satisfy people who would respond to this by doubting if I was ever a "true" feminist. They'd say "well she never castrated anyone," "she never went topless in protest," "she never pulled a scroll dripping with menstrual blood from her vagina to engage in a nude artistic protest," therefore "she was never a TRUE feminist."

But basically, I was just a liberal, and feminism was just another way of saying I rejected bigotry. I bought into the idea that feminist just meant gender egalitarian, and I believed that any decent person should believe in equality between the sexes in terms of political power. I thought that women needed better representation in sexist media, which is reflected by some of my earlier articles on hubpages.

I think I made good points in those articles, but I no longer see the world through the lens of patriarchy theory, and I have shifted away from feminist attitudes in a lot of my thinking. Predominantly, I think that the biggest feminist myth is that women and men are not significantly different in psychological makeup. Therefore, everything, and good Lord I mean everything that women do that men do not do, and vice versa, are criticized as a result of sexist culture, rather than what they usually really amount to, which are biologically-based sex differences. See, biology does not just simply boil down to "some people have penises, some people have vaginas." It really does impact everything about being human, from hair growth, bone and muscular structure, to yes, behavioral traits. And to me, it's simply dishonest of feminists to put everything under the umbrella of patriarchy theory, when there are sex-based differences in psychology and behavior. I do not think these differences ought to result necessarily in discrimination, in fact, I think that because of these differences, women and men complement each other and should share in power equally in society.

You would think that that belief alone, that women and men should have equal political power, is enough to make me a feminist by default, but it isn't. This brings me to my first feminist belief I disagree with.

Feminism is Just About Gender Equality

You have no idea how many times I've argued with feminists and heard this, and I even argued this AS a feminist. Basically the line has become something of a cliche response to whenever women, or anyone, criticized feminism. They'll point to the dictionary definition of feminism and say, hey, if you think men and women deserve equal legal treatment or equal political rights, you're already a feminist!

To me, this is as dumb as saying "ISIS follows Islam, if you follow Islam, congratulations, you're already a member of ISIS!" If feminism were just about gender equality, I think more than 90% of people would be feminists. But feminism describes stances on many political issues. I used to like feminist Jessica Valenti for her book "He's a Stud, She's a Slut," which was about gender-based double standards common in society. But Jessica does NOT think feminism means mere equality, and when you read feminist blogs, or watch feminist Youtube videos, it becomes apparent that that is not what they're about.

Feminism is an ideology and a worldview. Feminists reject people who don't agree with the majority on matters such as abortion, taxpayer-funded birth control, patriarchy theory, and people who think like I do about gender being rooted in biological differences between men and women, not the official feminist platform that all gender differences are caused by oppression. Feminism labels women as oppressed, but ignores problems where sexism also negatively impacts men. Somehow, men are just so darn stupid they're oppressing themselves, apparently. Silly men.

I also dislike the way modern feminism considers itself legitimized by legitimate feminist concerns that exist elsewhere either in time or space. Like if you go back in time, or look to very poor war-torn countries, you can find issues where women were legitimately being oppressed. First of all, this has absolutely nothing to do with modern, western feminism. Secondly, I would argue that men in such societies were oppressed just as much, if not more than, women in those societies. I mean, who is oppressed in Afghanistan, the women who wear burqas out of fear of Islamic radicals, or the men who are expected to become directly involved in the military action? I am grateful that previous generations of feminists fought for my rights to do things like wear pants, vote, and go to college. I'm especially grateful that women during WWII proved that women were capable of factory work.

However, I dislike that the mention of all these things we have PREVIOUS generations of feminists to thank for means we have to accept feminism wholesale today. I mean, there was also undeniable harm caused by feminists in history, who have done things like legitimize promiscuity, attack the nuclear family, and shot up the divorce rate. I personally think feminism is one of the main reasons American pop culture went from classy to trashy. So no, I think it is completely ridiculous to insist that I or anyone has to label themselves "feminist" simply because they affirm a support for gender equality. And I think, in today's society, to be a true advocate for gender equality might be closer to being an MRA (men's rights activist). Defining your terms in such a way so that anyone who does not support you looks like an asshole is intellectual dishonesty.

Patriarchy Theory

Patriarchy is often a word tossed around in feminist circles. The cynical side of me thinks it might be just a term they came up with to silence accusations that they hate men. "No, we don't hate men, we hate patriarchy." Also tied to this view is the idea that non-feminist women are "participating in" patriarchy, whatever the fuck that means, and so they have a very "with us or against us" mentality when it comes to women. So much for a movement about, supposedly, women's liberation. They don't really WANT your liberation, they want your suffering. They want to jack off to your pain as another poor, pathetic victim of "the patriarchy."

People who know me well know my dislike of conspiracy theories. They have become common in our culture because people want something outside themselves to blame for all the things that have gone wrong with society, 9/11, wars, the plummeting economy, the deterioration of freedoms, and environmental crises. All conspiracy theorists do this, and to me, believing patriarchy is behind all the problems facing women and girls is not really all that different from saying our economic collapse can be blamed on the Jews. Both take a group that had nothing to do with anything and uses it as a handy scapegoat.

The feminists say blaming patriarchy is not blaming men. Seriously? Patriarchy is a word whose etymological roots derive from "father," and simply describes any society in which men have most of the political power. The thing is, most societies, past and present, were patriarchies, regardless of culture, and I think of this as proof that men are simply more dominant and more predisposed to prefer political leadership than women, who seem across all cultures to prefer domestic and private leadership. This is not because of some lizard people thing, but just because of biology; women have the babies, the babies need to be fed and nurtured and protected at home, men have to go out and be the ones protecting them and getting food for them.

Patriarchy theory also, ironically for the fact that feminists celebrate these women, ignores the fact that none of this means that women never held political power. I mean, you could say that women like Queen Elizabeth I and other female monarchs had social obligations that were placed on them because of the fact that they were women, but the fact remains that all political leaders have had social obligations and expectations placed upon them. Bess' father, Henry the 8th, ended up breaking with the Catholic church for the right to divorce because one such expectation placed on male and female leaders alike was the expectation of having an heir so that a power vacuum would not be left when the ruler died, which tended to result in a lot of stabbies.

So anyway, I think patriarchal theory makes way too many blanket assumptions that are not correct, and then the core of feminist thinking is mired in this flawed logic. It is rooted in Marxist thinking about class, but instead of the bourgeoisie oppressing the proletariat, it's men as a class oppressing women as a class. This creates generalizations and does not allow for nuances and exceptions. It also dismisses the women who have and who continue to have political influence. The theory also uses oppression as a model for explaining behaviors which have less to do with oppression than, in my opinion, they have to do with biological characteristics.

Rape Culture

One of the earliest blows to my personal feminism was seeing the feminist reaction (ok, overreaction) to the song "Blurred Lines." Now, I have no great love for that song and I think it's stupid. But the fact is, it was just another dumb, catchy pop song, no better or worse than any other.

But that was not how feminists on various locales of the internet took it. They went on and on on long, rage-filled tirades about how the song somehow promotes rape, or at least, questions the feminist ideal for consent that it should be sober and firmly established at all times or the sex is rape.

Now, I think it is important that sex is consensual. And nobody really supports rape except for a few sick individuals who are probably not reading this because they're in jail right now. But is a song like "Blurred Lines" promoting rape?

I don't think so. Lines like "I know you want it, but you're a good girl" are deemed "problematic" by women, but to me, they just signify that the woman the song was directed at probably gave off nonverbal cues of flirtation/sexual interest, and the song does not say, interestingly enough, anything about forcing such a woman into bed with the singer BECAUSE of such signals. Verbal consent is great, but insisting on it ignores the fact that sex is about feel, look, body language, hormones, and pheromones first, and verbal second. I didn't realize until before this how much of feminism revolves around and depends on us women being perpetually shaking out of the fear of rape. There have been numerous instances that have shown me that this hypersensitivity towards all things dubbed "rapey" seems like it's less and less about concern for actual rape victims, especially male rape victims, who are totally ignored by this theory, and seems to have more to do with keeping women terrified of men at all times. If you're enough of a crybaby, anything can be called "rapey." Feminists just can't get enough of talking about rape, as if it's everywhere. They even make up bullshit statistics that make it seem like a scary-sounding number of women will be raped in their lifetime.

More about "rape culture" NOT having anything to do with support for REAL rape victims can be found here. Basically, this author shares my belief that "rape culture" also only focuses on a binary, that men are only ever the perpetrators of rape, and women are only ever the victims. That is not the world we live in.

The Gender Pay Gap is Caused by Sexism

Nowhere near. The gender pay gap disappears when you truly are, as feminists claim, looking at women and men who do the same job. The original "women earn 77 cents for every male dollar" thing was NOT looking at women who do the same job as men and finding they still got paid less because they were women. It just so happens that women take jobs that are primarily indoors, domestic, and care-based like teaching, library science, and nursing, and that men tend to choose more outdoor jobs involving more muscle power usage and bodily risk, for which they get paid more, but also suffer a much higher rate of workplace injury and death.

But how dare a crab fisherman get paid more than a librarian?

Anyway, numerous studies have debunked the “gender pay gap” argument, so I won’t waste too much time. Even ultra-liberal Huffington Post did an article on it. The wage gap is so obviously not a thing. And if it were a thing, wouldn’t the companies hire more women than men in all jobs and discriminate against men, because then they could cut costs if it were really true that society expects women to work for less. Another thing that is inconvenient for feminists is the fact that women make different work-life balance choices, favoring more personal and family time to long work hours. If anyone suffers from sexist expectations, it’s men, who suffer from the sexist expectation that men are work-machines who don’t need family life or rest, because demanding such from bosses makes men seem weak but to women it’s a given that they need these things.

Also, from a story I heard on NPR about a woman who worked in a top position on Wall Street, women get fewer bonuses than men in that ballpark because they simply did not ask for them, or did not ask for money with the persistence and courage that their male coworkers did. This is not sexist culture, it’s biological drives. Men need to push to make more and more money, women might just help our culture with it’s greed addiction because they seem to be content with less, and to recognize the need for work-life balance. But don’t choose to take more time off than a man and choose not to ask for a raise and then blame sexism for the fact that he got a raise, that he ASKED for, when you did not get a raise you did NOT ask for. Ok? Simple.

Sexism is The Reason Women Do Not Choose To Major in STEM Fields

This goes back to the nature vs. nurture debate. Feminists would have you believe that patriarchy or sexism was at the root of women making the choice, as a general trend, to prefer humanities and social science fields over math and science fields.

This pisses me off for two reasons. First, feminism is about choice or liberating women, so then why bitch about women making the wrong choice. Secondly, this carries with it the myth, prevalent in our culture, that humanities and social science degrees are worth less than science, math, technology, and engineering degrees in the first place. If I have a bout of depression, I’m not going to consult someone who majored in computer science. If I want to find a solution to the Israeli-Palestinian crisis, I’m probably not going to care much about what mathematicians have to say on the matter. We have this belief in technocracy and in using science and technology as a panacea in our culture, but I think that it isn’t and that there are really myriad uses for the humanities and social sciences.

Again, I think of this as a case of female and male nature being different, yet complementary or completing, towards one another. Yet the feminists see this division of majors by gender and think that it must not be the result of varying preference, but of varying socialization. “Women are socialized to not want to be engineers by the fact that Legos are seen as for boys” they cry. Ah. Except that I played with Legos, and K’Nex, and other building toys, and that doesn’t make me a fucking engineer today. Legos are a gender neutral, not “male” toy. (I’ll get to the whole toy thing later, it’s another feminist issue that really makes me ill.)

Another problem with this is that it perceives that women have such fragile psyches as to be capable of being dissuaded from pursuing their dreams in life because of sexism. It ignores the courage of women who have done pretty amazing things in the STEM fields because it assumes that women are weak enough that they can be psychologically undone by anything remotely offensive, like a shirt.

Society Marginalizes and Dismisses Violence Against Women

Like rape culture, this feminist claim is that society has some kind of hidden prejudice or misogyny that causes people to disrespect female victims of violence or to take them less seriously than male victims of violence. But the media and the way society is set up (with way more shelters for battered women than battered men, for example) point to just the opposite being true. If anything, the fact that people like Anita Sarkeesian go on huge tirades about how violence in women in video games is some kind of big structural problem for society, while for some reason, ignoring that those games are just as, and usually more, violent against men.

In fact, I see the opposite happening, I see men who are attacked by women shamed as “pussies,” in other words, have their masculinity questioned, but women who are attacked by men are “strong survivors” but also, paradoxically “silenced victims of oppression,” ha, like anyone’s silencing them, they seem to be all you ever read about in the blogosphere and see on news networks. I just watched an hour-long special last night on CNN about the women who are accusing Bill Cosby of rape. Nobody is silencing or marginalizing them, people are, for the most part, congratulating them on having the courage to finally come forward with details that are somewhat embarrassing or even traumatizing to discuss and doing so anyway. But the feminist narrative is that women must always, in all cases, be VICTIMS.

So, this leads to them:

1. Ignoring and marginalizing instances of male victimization, even mocking male victims mercilessly (see the below video).
2. Ignoring and marginalizing instances of female perpetration, even to the point of supporting the female perpetrators (also in the below video). And:
3. Supporting sexist attitudes, paradoxically, about women as helpless victims and men as big, strong bullies.

Basically, feminist theory relies on the pattern being men = perpetrators, and women = victims. In cases where this reality is reversed, feminists still need to find a way to blame men or “patriarchy” for the male victimization, or, more frequently, they tend to ignore that because it’s an exception to the general rule. But it should be obvious that, probably due to biological differences, people in general have more empathy for females than for males, and this empathy-inspiring ability women have is not something, sorry all you feminist sign-holders, that you need feminism for.

This is so disgusting and immature.

http://youtu.be/muuFygvXPAM

Gender is Not Related to Biological Sex

The gender theory given by mainstream feminists today is that there is no biological basis for gender; that all of it is culture, and that physical sex does not determine cultural gender. Well, except the problem is, for the vast majority of people, their biological sex also determines a lot of their innate psychological characteristics. I know that there are people with various disorders who do not have a sex, or have an intermediate sex between the two usual sexes. But saying this disproves the concept that sex exists is sort of like saying that because neurological disorders exist, you can't create an intelligence test, because the person taking it might have a neurological disorder. Not that disordered people are less than human in any way, but talking about them is not a useful way to talk about gender or sex.

There are two genders, because in nature there are two sexes. I know this position will be extremely controversial, and I can hear the screeching. But, basically, all other types of genders and sexes are not truly outside this binary, they are instead some combination of male and female characteristics, like someone being transgendered is simply a biological man or woman choosing to identify as culturally the opposite. I have no real problem with that.

What I am more worried about is that people are insisting that gender has no relationship whatsoever with biology, as if there was just some kind of bearded man on a mountaintop handing us down these rules for patriarchal definitions of gender. The truth is, from a very early age, boys and girls exhibit psychological differences, as anyone who has been a parent or teacher of young children will know, and as we grow through puberty these sex differences in our brains become even more distinct. You can't neatly and cleanly separate mind from body here. Females and males have different levels of certain hormones, different stimuli affect their brain differently, they communicate differently, and they get pleasure from different types of activities. There's no conspiracy or evil in this, it's simply the way things are. Quit trying so hard to be special and an exception, and just accept that there are general trends, but you should do whatever feels more natural to you without having to worry that this should change the way you label yourself.

One thing I especially hate is the term "genderfluid," for Pete's sake, you aren't a special "genderfluid" person if you're a guy who enjoys embroidery or a woman who enjoys karate. You're just a guy who likes baking or a girl who enjoys karate. It's that simple. The term seems to reinforce gender stereotypes, by saying that if a man or woman acts in any kind of non-stereotypical way, they must be acting "as a man" or "like a woman" because of some kind of secret super special rare mega ultra gender identity, don't fucking make me laugh.

Girls and Boys Do Not Have Innate Preferences That Vary By Gender/Sex

Since it's December, the holiday season kicks off a great feminist holiday tradition: whining about kid's toys. You would wonder why these women have nothing better to do than bitch about this trivial fucking bullshit. I mean, we get told so often by feminists that feminism is about very serious political issues, but then find most of the complaints are about:

- Pop lyrics
- a shirt
- razor blades
- Halloween costumes
- Disney movies
- dolls
- Legos (the horror!)
- trees (probably)

So, it becomes harder to take feminists seriously the more they complain about trivial, non-problem, first-world problems. Are toys capable of sexism? Does playing with Barbie brainwash girls from infancy to become Stepford

Wives? If anyone else said toys were a tool for brainwashing children, they'd be called crazy, but it somehow supposedly makes sense when feminists say toys are a male tool for brainwashing girls? What the hell?

Actually, the reason that companies make toys at all is because research and development teams spent all kinds of time and money testing their products and seeing which types of toys are more likely to be successful. Girls seem to naturally prefer pink and bright/light colors, and nurturing and social play. Girls also seem to prefer magic and fantasy play. Boys seem to enjoy violent, destructive play aimed at completing objectives and strategic planning. Boys like action, and boys like science/technology more than girls.

Almost everyone will be an exception in some way to these general trends, of course. When I was a kid, for example, I found Barbie boring, and loved computer games. However, the general trends are still valid ways for toy companies to predict what will be liked by boys and girls and to plan accordingly. It is exceedingly difficult, given these innate differences, to create a toy that both boys and girls will like equally. And as boys and girls get older, these preferences become increasingly divergent.

Video Games and Gamer Culture = Misogyny

This particular sort of paranoia is, of course, related to their crap theories about patriarchy and rape culture and supposed negligent attitudes towards violence against women, which I've already talked about.

But basically, I have always identified as a gamer in addition to being an anime fan. I like video games AND tabletop games and play both as regularly as sleep, anime, money, and school allow. So, I think it's kind of offensive and kind of bullying when the gaming blog sites started to attack "gamers" as a subculture.

Gaming has had its share of critics since the early 90's, who have claimed, without grounds, that video games cause violence. They started by falsely accusing games of causing school shootings, such as the high-profile Columbine shooting. That incident started many of the calls for censorship of media, such as song lyrics and video game content. But they were just as wrong 20 years ago as they are now.

The weird thing is, it seems as though gaming journalism itself has turned against the gamer fandom. A harmless fan subculture has become a target for "basement dweller" jokes and calls for censorship of "sexist" video games like Grand Theft Auto. This is nothing new, but it's alarming that, because this is feminists rather than conservatives doing the calling for censorship, more and more people are listening.

I do not think that video games are sexist. Here, I went into a lot more detail about why I think anime is not sexist, and everything I said there can be applied to video games. But basically, artwork, fantasy, and imaginative play are completely separated and removed from reality, and should not be treated with the expectation that they conform to what the censor wishes reality was. I also think that the freedom of speech for game developers, along with that of everyone else, should not be infringed upon. Guess that makes me a misogynist!

Win a date with Shawna Grimes of Edmonton PD!

Men's Rights Edmonton · 5 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

We notice a trend here with police attitudes about sexual assault, and we'd like to share our thoughts with you, and hope you'll share your thoughts with others.

EPS "Make your move" media release'

Edmonton Police on Twitter

Edmonton Police on Facebook

The poster designs can be found on the front page of www.mensrightsedmonton.com

Edmonton Police Commission
General Inquiries: 780-414-7510
Compliments/Complaints: 780-414-7574
Fax: 780-414-7511
Email: info@edmontonpolicecommission.ca

MGTOW is an impersonal force which Goes Its Own Way

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 6 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

In recent times, a cultural schism has appeared between two prominent lobes of the non-feminist revolution: on the one side the Men Going Their Own Way sector, and on the other, the sector loosely grouped around A Voice for Men. The tension between these sectors has grown steadily for two or three years, but seems to have escalated sharply in the past several months.

I don't want to say either too much or too little, but I'd like to be as impartial as I can while hopefully adding something original. Yes, many of the ideas sketched here will be uniquely my own, but hey…why not?

The bone of contention seems to be a fear, within the MGTOW sector, that the AVfM sector is yielding to something called "traditionalism". So to break this down further: what is traditionalism? I will base my talk on what people appear to mean by that word.

Firstly: many in the MGTOW sector have a settled conviction that married men cannot belong to what they consider their "movement". So stubborn is their conviction, that to question it borders on heresy. Despite this, the leading lights of the AVfM sector do make bold to be heretical, contending that married men can indeed partake of MGTOW.

Secondly: many in the MGTOW sector have voiced unease at a percieved traditionalism in certain members of the AVfM sector. In their view, this foreshadows a return to old-school gynocentric marriage along with old-fangled sex roles — and that is a prospect which repels them.

The foregoing has spotlighted the exact "traditionalism" which MGTOW sectarians believe is creeping into the AVfM community. It is what they generally mean when they toss that word around.

That said, why should MGTOW sectarians even give a toot if AVfM happens to turn "traditional"? Because AVfM still purports to have an interest in and obligation to the greater MGTOW enterprise, and so long as it does, the question of who "owns" MGTOW will remain unsettled. In other words, the question of MGTOW identity will remain unsettled. ("Identity" in this case equates to ownership).

The MGTOW sectarians see MGTOW as a social refuge. They fear that if they admit married men to their fellowship, a camel's nose effect will drive them out of their own tent. That is why control of MGTOW identity (ownership) is important to them: to keep the gynocentric traditionalist camel out of their tent.

There you have it: the two sides are battling for the MGTOW identity like two parties contesting for a wishbone. I am aware, however, that AVfM never wished for such a battle – it just came to them.

So has it occurred to anybody that nobody really owns the MGTOW identity at all, and never will? Come to that, has it occurred to anybody to wonder if there even IS a MGTOW identity?

I leave those questions open, but I'll get back to them later. For now, I pose a singular query: "What is MGTOW?" — and until we have sorted that one out, we needn't hope to sort out the tangled mess we've talked about so far.

All right, so what is MGTOW?

MGTOW is an acronym that stands for "men going their own way". That phrase evokes men walking down a road they have freely chosen — literally, "their own way".

In the context of history, MGTOW signifies the objective political reality where men, as a class, currently find themselves. Under the system of feminist innovation which now predominates, men are second-class citizens. Moreover, this reality is not static: it promises to get worse when feminist innovation develops further.

I say all of this with the understanding that my target audience already knows why men are second-class citizens. They have covered that ground as thoroughly as I have, so I needn't waste time explaining it to them.

Returning to our theme: under such conditions, the system of social obligation which formerly bound men either to women or to society as a whole, is voided of moral authority. Hence it may, at individual discretion, be nullifed.

Briefly then, MGTOW signifies the death of the social contract and the liberation of all males into a system of individual agency where they may form ad hoc social contracts as they see fit. Such is the objective reality of history — one might wish it otherwise, but that is how things are.

Note however, that MGTOW signifies merely freedom, leaving open the question of what should be done with it. Accordingly, we use "MGTOW" in a political or world-historic way, and would stipulate that the realm of personal relations does not fall within its purview. That is to say, there is no MGTOW manual to specify how any man should govern that aspect of his life.

So MGTOW is rooted in the political, not the personal — although it certainly has implications for the personal.

In itself, MGTOW is not a clique, club, cult, coterie or tribe of any sort — and nothing in the present statement should be taken to imply this. So it is incorrect to attach the indefinite article and speak of the individual as "a" MGTOW, since that implies club membership.

Similarly, MGTOW is not a personal identity dog-tag — so again, to call yourself "a" MGTOW, is not a very MGTOW move at all. The phrase "a MGTOW" is a flawed grammatical construction because "MGTOW" is an abstract noun, and no man is identical with an abstract noun. You could, of course, style yourself more verbosely as a man "who goes his own way", but that is rather a natural descriptor than an appellative tag. Also, nobody, and no group, has any patent on such a phrase.

In the end, MGTOW is no more than 1.) a principle or force of history, and 2.) a high-altitude situation map of the male condition.

What we have sketched here is the MGTOW core minimum. Anything less would insufficiently describe MGTOW, and anything more would be bells and whistles. So I turn again to the question of MGTOW identity or ownership. Now that we have inventoried what makes MGTOW fundamentally MGTOW, we may interrogate this more to the purpose.

Since MGTOW is a demographic phenomenon, nobody owns it. It simply "is". So ultimately, the MGTOW principle itself "goes its own way". It springs from the reality of history, and you either tap into it or you don't. It is like an ocean wave that beckons you to "hang ten" and be powerfully carried along, but it does not belong to you. It paradoxically serves but will not be commanded, and you cannot understand it otherwise.

So you are free to form all the MGTOW clubs you wish, with membership rules as you see fit. But keep in mind that "MGTOW" doesn't belong to your club alone. You are not, in or of yourselves, "MGTOW". You are not identical with that abstract noun. You are simply a group of people surfing on the wave of history, organized around the MGTOW principle in a manner that suits you. And that is fine. That is good. That is your right. But never forget that the MGTOW principle is something far bigger than you, and bigger than all of us.

Even so, I think there is an over-arching philosophical mandate to all of this, and I have tried to catch a glimmer of it here.

I should add that I roundly applaud the marriage strike both as a strategy for male survival and as a political leveraging tool to extort proper treatment of the male population.

So, fear not: you can swear off marriage and all relations with women, and you will have my blessing every step of the way. I mean, hey, admit it. That's the main thing you're really worried about, right?

However, the point where I go my own way is the idea that the marriage strike makes the principal focus for MGTOW-related thought, rhetoric or action. No, I see the marriage strike as merely a subplot, or rather, one of many projects that could manifest the MGTOW principle as a force in history.

Here's a related point that I don't want to omit: male solidarity should be grounded in the political and world-historic side of things. It should NOT be centered on personal frustrations about women and relationships. The latter, if voiced within earshot of the general public, sets you up to be the butt of mockery. What's more, it sounds like a form of gynocentrism . . doesn't it?

Very well. So . . . if a married man would express SOLIDARITY with MGTOW, who's to tell him that he mustn't do that?

Furthermore, if by personal genius or luck-of-the-draw he finds the perfect mate and succeeds wildly at self-realization despite her presence, then is he not well and truly "going his own way"? Can you plausibly argue otherwise? Certainly such a man has found his own path. So how if he literally calls himself "a MGTOW", and starts a "MGTOW" website, and a "MGTOW" publishing company, and paints a giant MGTOW logo on his house — what of that? Would you send the One True MGTOW Posse to burn that pretender down? I think not.

So who are you to tell this man he doesn't pertain to "MGTOW"? On what authority do you speak? Yours, apparently. But what about his? You reckon he gives one cold spit about your presumed authority, and what you think? And why should he?

In the end, all that matters is that a man can make the MGTOW principle work for him in his own life according to his innovative genius. After all, a man going his own way goes his OWN way, does he not?

And does such a man make social arrangements with other men, for the sake of mutual benefit?

You bet he does!

In fact, oddly enough, even men who only wish to be left alone, can "stick together".

But none of that in itself is MGTOW. It is only a manifestation of MGTOW — a way of harnessing the MGTOW principle and putting it to work.

So I renounce the indefinite article. I am not "a" MGTOW, nor do I belong to any club bearing that name. I am simply a respecter of the MGTOW principle as a force in history.

To summarize: "MGTOW" is not an identity, but merely a fact.

Meanwhile, the MGTOW sectarians are facing a boundary crisis. They are worried about their little tent, while forgetting that MGTOW is a big tent. Their fears are groundless, for they can always pitch any little tent they want to pitch, and decide who gets in or who doesn't. But they must understand that there is plenty of MGTOW to go around, and that for heaven's sake, nobody wants to steal their piece of the action!

So, hey maaaan! Like…don't bogart that MGTOW, man! Pass it around!

Bye bye Alpha Male, and hello Zeta Male!

Peter Wright · 6 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The title of this article was shamelessly borrowed from the Men Going Their Own Way forums at MGTOW.com. The term Zeta Male continues to pop up on forums and websites as a synonym for MGTOW, though not many people are aware of where it originated.

Zeta Male refers to men who have opted out of traditional societal expectations that a man serve as helper, builder, protector, provider, defender, and husband to women, while accepting that these roles also require him to be disposed of if required – in mind, body and not infrequently in death. Before we get to the earlier background of the phrase here are a few examples of Zeta Male spoken of in MGTOW discussion forums. First up is one from a 2012 Yahoo forum by 'John':

Yahoo (2012):

> John: "I've recently been carrying out some investigation into the Zeta male movement, also known as MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way). This is a philosophy based on the principle of men rejecting the traditional Alpha and Beta role models because they are based upon how women view them. The Zeta male lives life outside of the traditional Alpha and Beta models and undergoes no judgment from females, equally not requiring any judgment from females. This interests me because I see so many guys these days seeking validation from women just to feel they are living their lives correctly. In men I believe this requirement for validation and frequent rejection is a contributionary factor leading to forged lifestyles, a loss of confidence and in severe cases mental illness. This topic interests me hugely and so I am keen to get the views of others. What do you think about the Zeta male and MGTOW?"

MGTOW.com Forums (2014)

> OldAtHeart: "I have long identified myself as an Alpha male to make the strong distinguishment between me, and them well known, but recently I have discovered that Zeta male fits me much better. I have decide to dump the term Alpha male considering how many Mangina's use it to place themselves on a pedestal, based off how much pussy they get, and how much simping they do to get it.
>
> "Why didn't that guy show respect to that woman when he saw she could be placed first? He's a Zeta Male and lives on his own terms. Besides, what reciprocal obligation does that woman have to men but "choices".

Goingyourownway.com (2014)

> BeijaFlor: The "Zeta Male" label was proposed around 2010, for the men who aren't playing the dominance-and-subservience games of alpha/beta – more on point, proposed as a label for the men who actively reject the gynocentric model of alpha-fux-beta-bux and the social-dominance model of "alpha" behavior…
>
> Feminists have used Medusa as a symbol of female rage and power. The Zeta Male is one who has contempt for female rage, and spurns female/feminist power; he views Society and its antics through the mirror of his Red Pill understanding, and doesn't get sucked into the games, the posturing, the alpha-beta roles, the desperate quest to measure himself by the opinions of the crowd or the standards of the girls he might or might not be able to bed. He rises above all that shit, and goes his own way, unseen by the crowd.

We can reduce the above descriptions to the following. The Zeta Male:

a. Refuses to identify with alpha/beta male stereotypes
b. Rejects gynocentric expectations

b. Says no to unreasonably constrictive aspects of traditionalism
c. Champions male self-determination
d. Refuses to be shamed, seduced or intimidated into submission

Sound familiar? It should, because these are exactly what most self-identified MGTOW champion on their blogs and forums, and quietly live in their day-to-day lives. Point d., while not elaborated above, was spelled out in the earlier writings on the subject. In fact it was spelled out in the inaugural A Voice for Men article by Paul Elam entitled The Plague of Modern Masculinity. In that article Elam coined Zeta Male and included all of the five points of listed above. Here's the main excerpt from the original article:

> "As previously noted, the men's movement is a unique and literally unprecedented phenomena. It will bring with it some other firsts. One of them is the socio-sexual warrior, and I refer to him for the purpose of this discourse as the zeta male. The tag remains faithful to the Greek alphabet classification of the other three types of men, but there is more purpose to the label. I took it from the star Zeta Persei. I liked the navigational metaphor of the star as it is applicable in the context of the lost generation. But I was also intrigued to learn that Persei is a variation of Perseus, the first of the Greek mythological heroes. Perseus had a remarkable talent for slaying archaic monsters, Medusa the Gorgon among them, who as a mortal woman possessed great beauty, and was self enamored and struck with the power of her sexual allure until she was turned into a hideous monster by Athena, who later used her severed head as a weapon on her shield.
>
> In 1940, an article by Sigmund Freud was posthumously published, entitled Medusa's Head (Das Medusenhaupt) in which he postulated that Medusa represented castration in a child's mind related to discovered and denied maternal sexuality.
>
> Even more interesting is that in modern times, feminists (Women: A Journal of Liberation, 1978) adopted and reinterpreted the image of Medusa as representative of women's rage, and it served as a binding symbol of feminist solidarity.
>
> So Perseus, namesake of Zeta Persei, was the slayer of Oedipal shame (control) and the murderously powerful raging feminist archetype.
>
> The zeta male.
>
> This classification of a male is new because this is a male that until recent times was never needed, and indeed was never there. He is emergent and unpolished and struggling to find his legs, but is doing so thanks to the fertile, safe ground, provided by, of all things, other emerging zetas on the internet. He has no allegiance to tradition or nostalgia for the past, and in fact is charged with plotting a new course. He cannot be shamed into control or intimidated into silence or seduced into capitulation. He doesn't fit in the classic hierarchy, and would gladly bring it down in the name of his cause. When someone says he needs to act like a real man, he smiles and says, "No, thank you."
>
> He doesn't seek power, but justice. And he has one overarching feature largely absent in the world around him.
>
> He cares about those lost young men who were ambushed coming out of the womb. And he will strive to make himself an example, living proof that there are other roads to take than the ones that lead to self-hatred and self-destruction."

This description inspired other writers to weigh in and elaborate the idea in greater depth, although most of the key points were already laid down in this first article. What we have 5 years down the track is wealth of elaboration about the Zeta on both AVfM and on the wider web. Of interest, most of the early (2010-11) elaborations of the Zeta Male pre-dated the almost identical discussions that were to emerge in the subsequent four years (2012-15) on YouTube channels or blogs under the revitalized heading of MGTOW.

Starting in 2010, the concepts Zeta Male and MGTOW provoked discussions about gynocentrism and male self-determination that moved far beyond the simplistic constructs of a small earlier group (2004-06) who came up with the MGTOW symbol and proposed some traditionalist goals such as instilling masculinity in men, and nurtural femininity in women (along with more acceptable ideas like rejecting chivalry). The earlier group does not register on the Google Trends timeline below.

I used the full search phrases for Google Trends above because the MGTOW acronym serves for the unrelated phrase Maximum Gross Take-off Weight from field of aeronautics, a concept accounting for approximately half of all mentions of 'MGTOW' on the internet, and one creating potential error about the prevalence of MGTOW as acronym for Men Going their Own Way. Likewise for the sake of greater accuracy I chose Zeta Male for the comparison rather than simply 'Zeta,' which would have over-inflated the results.

As a long-term practitioner and advocate of MGTOW, I occasionally use Zeta as shorthand for the longer phrase 'Men Going their Own Way'. In some ways I prefer it because it's short, and rolls off the tongue in a manly way. I'm also a proud MHRA – and Zeta Male sits perfectly within that category.

Like many in the manosphere I'm one of those dual beasts like the mythical centaur – in my case part MGTOW and part MHRA. But for some purists that wont do, for you must be assigned to either one or the other classification, one pigeon hole, so the observer can avoid a frightening cerebral meltdown in the face of human complexity.

For those who deny that the MHRM has always upheld self-determination for men as part of its suite of concerns — that MGTOW is, in fact, a men's human right — and that men can be both MRA and MGTOW simultaneously — for those who prefer to conceptually cleave MGTOW and MHRA apart (even when existing in the same person) and reframe them as radically opposed rather than complimentary orientations, please feel free to re-brand me a Zeta... I'd prefer that to being reassigned into one of your cute cuts and cubbyholes and losing half of who I am. As Walt Whitman puts it,

> "Do I contradict myself? Very well, then I contradict myself, I am large, I contain multitudes." (Song of Myself)

Going back to the heading of this meandering article, I want to re emphasize that one of the first lessons of the Zeta Man is that a man can shake himself free of claustrophobic stereotypes of masculinity. For anyone new to the concepts above who would like to learn more, the following video by David Abram gives an entry-point into the way of the Zeta Male, and the call to say Bye bye to the Alpha-Beta fucktardary.

Further Reading:

Paul Elam, The Plague of Modern Masculinity Part III (2010)
Urban Dictionary: Zeta Male, (2010)
Zeta male, So What is a Zeta Male Anyway? (2011)
Cooterbee Defining and Implementing Zeta Masculinity (2011)
Masked Writer: Definition of a Zeta Male (2012)
Alan's Page: A new discovery – the Zeta male (2013)

How do Men's Rights Activists align politically?

Dean Esmay · 6 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is also available in Spanish

At an average of 25,000 daily unique visitors (and growing), AVfM is the largest Men's Rights web site in the world. At this point almost no one can ignore us, even our haters.

So with this sort of large and growing visibility, you may have at times wondered: Is this a "liberal" movement? Is it a "conservative" movement? Well we have always taken a strong nonpartisan stance, because we view virtually all political parties as fundamentally misandrist, some just more overtly than others. We view this movement as about basic civil and human rights, which no political party or ideology has a lock on.

So what kind of audience has this staunchly non-aligned stance brought us? A bunch of angry people who've dropped out of the political process and live only on the fringe? Well according to Quantcast, a respected web site demographics site we've been using, the answer is just about what I would have thought, although it's surprising to me just how much so: we're right in the mainstream of American politics, and way more likely than the average American to vote regularly.

According to Quantcast, we're not just politically nonpartisan: we are a growing hotbed of voters that politicians may soon have to start taking seriously. Our audience is way more likely to vote than the average American, and so far as politics are concerned, we are overwhelmingly Independent. Among our readers who are partisans, there's a virtually even split between Democrats and Republicans:

And why do I have a feeling that at least a few of those self-identified Democrats and Republican voters would switch parties for the right candidate?

Note to the Democratic and Republican parties: there's a growing group of swayable voters interested in men's and boys' issues. Are you going to keep ignoring them?

Some of our haters like to write us off as left-wing “feminism for men.” Others like to write us off as right-wing fringers. Looks to us like we’re right in the mainstream of American politics, more active than most groups, and growing. And it looks like at some point, it may just be perilous to keep ignoring our issues.

What will the future bring? No one can say. But it’s hard not to suspect that it may be only a few more election cycles before politicians start discussing men’s issues openly, and arguing over the best way to address them. Which, from our perspective, is exactly what we’d like to see.

Tracey Spicer: Sexist, safe and men can be sorry

Jim Muldoon · 6 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Perhaps you'll remember Tracey Spicer for trying to start up a fourth wave of feminism by calling for women to wear less make-up when they go shopping. I doubt you'll remember the fourth wave, but the level of inanity might ring a bell.

She is, of course, the same Tracey Spicer who regaled us with her letter "Dear Mr Misogynist" where she explained just how terrible sexism is.

So, you won't be surprised when Tracey begins her latest quest for a few bucks of controversy entitled "I don't want my kids sitting next to a man on a plane." She begins…

> I know it's sexist.

You already know the next sentence starts with "But…"

The logic for her position on men, unaccompanied children and planes centres on a few unrelated, incorrect, and meaningless facts. The first is:

> In 2001, Northwest Airlines paid a US family half a million dollars after a 10-year-old girl was molested by a 28-year-old man on a flight from Kansas to Detroit.

Ravichandra Thuluva, was flying from Kansas to Detroit as part of his journey to his home in Bombay. He was arrested and detained for at least six months because of the girl's complaint.

What we are asked to believe here is that Mr Thuluva was travelling the skies of the world on the off-chance that he might get to sit next to an unaccompanied minor he could fondle. Yes, fondle a child on a plane with no escape route should the child cry out for help, and where he was easily identifiable from his name and other details given when purchasing his flight to Bombay.

Similarly, we are to imagine that, on a regular flight that included "10 or 11 unaccompanied minors", according to a Judge Rosen, (and so reasonably full) that Mr Thuvula was able to molest his victim unnoticed by the other passengers or flight attendants, even though she "told the man to stop numerous times and that she slapped his hand away numerous times when he attempted to touch her" (according to CNN's quote of her affidavit).

Don't buy it? Neither did the Grand Jury. Mr Thuluva was acquitted of all charges.

Yes, the FBI investigated, charged the man, ran him through the courts, presented all the evidence they had, including all of the eye witnesses who were just a few feet away, and Mr Thuluva was acquitted of all charges.

Still, it doesn't stop Spicer calling it "molested" instead of the more correct term "false accusation".

The airline settled for a reported $500,000. When you consider that Northwest Airline at that time, according to the CNN report, was flying 100,000 unaccompanied minors across the US each year, it comes as no surprise that the airline would settle a case rather than lose business due to the publicity that the case might bring as well as the legal fees.

From a financial point of view it would have been a smart decision that saved them a lot of money.

The other "fact" Spicer relies on has to do with a peculiar manipulation of statistics. She tells us that:

> Sure, almost 90 per cent of child sexual abuse is committed by someone in, or known to, the family, according to the Australian Bureau of Statistics.

Spicer's goes on to examine that other 10 per cent.

> However, stranger danger is a risk and women are perpetrators in only about 8 per cent of cases, says the ABS data.

I've not checked the ABS data, but I doubt that they say that "stranger danger is a risk". They might say that in 92% of the cases of the 10% who were molested by a stranger, the perpetrator was male. They might not. But, don't forget, these percentages are of the small percentage of people who claim they were molested as a child.

In other words, because a fraction of a fraction of a fraction of people in the world are male and molest children they don't already know, the airline should have a policy of treating all males as suspect.

However, the fact that a smaller fraction of a fraction of a fraction of people in the world are female and molest children they don't already know, there is no reason to have a policy treating any female as suspect.

What can I say?

Spicer adds the personal touch by telling the hear-warming story of her own children flying unaccompanied in Australia.

> It was a relief to see their smiling faces at the end but I was disappointed I had no choice about where they'd be sitting.

Is that true? Not really. Spicer could have bought a whole two rows of seats. That way she would have been guaranteed that no one was sitting next to her children. Or, she could have flown with them and then came back on the next return flight.

So does Spicer's concern for her own children's safety stop as soon as she has to put her hand in her own pocket?

But the true vapidity of the matter should become clear if you look harder at Spicer's own statistics and use her own moral panic to judge the situation in its entirety.

If her children are more likely to be abused by someone they know than by any stranger, then surely the safest part of their lives was the couple of hours they were flying on that plane away from family and friends.

But the thing that really disturbs me about Spicer's piece was the timing of it. Was there a incident recently that sparked this debate? No. Were new figures released on the matter of airplane molestations? No. Was there a new study recently on the issue? No.

No, Spicer seems to be stirring the gender war pot for no good reason at all. Is it spite? Bigotry? It's certainly not to solve any real problem that's happening in the real world, that's for sure.

Which brings us to the advice she gives at the end of the piece: why anyone would look to Spicer for advice on anything other than how to get your facts wrong is beyond me.

She finishes off the piece:

> Sure, not all men are paedophiles but offenders are predominantly male.
>
> I figure it's better to be safe than sorry.

She repeats the false logic as if it might stop being bigoted if it gets said enough times. So allow me to repeat my objection: Mr Thuluva, so that others could feel safe, was detained in a foreign country for 6 months, in jail, because of a false, baseless accusation. Other than Mr Thuluva, no one else was sorry.

Is that really the kind of society that Spicer wants? In her letter to "Mr Misogynist" she complains of the harm that sexism did to her. I didn't see any six months in jail, Tracey.

Spicer, it seems, wants the moral panic that surrounds men, unaccompanied minors and planes to continue, and perhaps even ramp up, despite the complete lack of evidence that there is any realistic risk to children outside of Spicer's head.

To follow this logic, no Muslims should be allowed on planes (because the majority of hijackers are Muslim); no mother should have an infant (because the majority who kill their babies in the first few weeks are mothers); no human should have a pet (because the majority of those cruel to animals are human), etc., etc. In other words, I can only agree with one thing Spicer says:

Her opinion is sexist.

Links

http://www.smh.com.au/travel/i-dont-want-my-kids-sitting-next-to-a-man-on-a-plane-20140424-375z6.html#ixzz30E41Qnb9

http://www.smh.com.au/federal-politics/society-and-culture/and-heres-the-news-my-bums-got-nothing-to-do-with-the-story-20121025-28837.html http://www.news.com.au/national/tedx-my-name-is-tracey-spicer-and-i-am-a-vain-fool/story-e6frfkp9-1226809158515

http://edition.cnn.com/2001/TRAVEL/NEWS/08/08/northwest.molest/

http://usatoday30.usatoday.com/travel/news/2004-01-23-nwa-lawsuit_x.htm

http://usatoday30.usatoday.com/travel/flights/2005-04-22-molestation-charge_x.htm

http://www.lawyersandsettlements.com/settlements/03423/airline_abuse.html#.U15M2oGSyig

How the Southern Poverty Law Center cooks their books

Richard Keefe · 7 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

[Ed. note: this post originally appeared here.]

As mentioned in an earlier post, the winter holidays have given us some downtime with which to reflect upon the Southern Poverty Law Center's audited financial statements from 2006 to 2013. Having no accounting training beyond what we got as a college freshman years ago, we freely admit that spreadsheets, etc., are not our strong point, and so we ask our readers to look at the numbers and see what they think.

Is there a CPA in the house?

Obtaining the SPLC's financial information is simple enough, as we described at the end of that previous post. Interpreting the numbers is the tricky part.

STATEMENT OF FUNCTIONAL EXPENSES
FOR THE YEAR ENDED OCTOBER 31, 2013

	PROGRAM SERVICES			SUPPORTING SERVICES
	LEGAL SERVICES	PUBLIC EDUCATION	TOTAL	MANAGEMENT AND GENERAL	DEVELOPMENT	TOTAL	TOTAL EXPENSES
OPERATING FUND:
Salaries and related expenses	$ 7,220,581	$ 4,952,444	$ 12,173,025	$ 1,549,374	$ 2,805,521	$ 4,354,895	$ 16,527,920
Contract labor	48,440	51,832	100,272	16,005	28,272	44,277	144,549
Legal case expense	1,876,999		1,876,999				1,876,999
Professional services and fees	328,227	99,717	427,944	563,308	33,576	596,884	1,024,828
Office equipment and supplies	288,527	397,129	685,456	124,810	153,447	278,257	963,713
Rent	418,918	15,142	434,060	24,052	3,500	27,552	461,612
Utilities, telephone, and maintenance	402,909	522,921	925,830	124,285	180,800	305,085	1,230,915
Library expense	82,322	92,199	174,521	6,879	18,778	25,657	200,178
Insurance	24,047	110,860	134,907	95,759	20,604	116,363	251,270
Investigation and support	110,486	314,173	424,659				424,659
Staff development and training	321,478	169,322	490,800	53,886	78,507	132,393	623,193
Travel and related expense	147,890	134,409	282,299	35,431	34,034	69,465	351,764
Postage	408,586	706,025	1,114,611	779,181	852,537	1,631,718	2,746,329
Printing	421,917	646,630	1,068,547	641,316	545,308	1,186,624	2,255,171
Leadership expense	133,005	210,219	343,222	213,688	855,448	1,069,136	1,412,358
Other development costs	174,933	1,284,095	1,459,028	330,605	1,684,037	2,014,642	3,493,670
Educational publications	272,278	2,142,039	2,414,317		366,743	366,743	2,781,060
Other educational projects	51,269	1,529,389	1,580,658				1,580,658
Interest expense				29,710		29,710	29,710
Depreciation expense	210,072	884,819	1,094,891	69,774	133,079	202,853	1,297,744
Total operating expenses	12,942,682	14,263,364	27,206,046	4,678,063	7,794,191	12,472,254	39,678,300

Above is a breakdown of SPLC expenses through the end of Fiscal Year 2013. With the help of the Internet Archive's cantankerousWayback Machine, we were able to obtain the same information going back to 2006, and it is only after one compiles the numbers that patterns, and questions, begin to emerge.

For example, below is a compilation of postage costs claimed by the SPLC over the eight year period and using the same headings as the audited report.

Postage	Legal Svcs	Pub Ed	Total 1	Mgt	Development	Total 2	Grand
2006	177,147	872,629	1,049,776	771,728	651,080	1,422,798	2,472,574
2007	149,512	629,934	779,446	536,418	489,118	1,025,536	1,804,982
2008	215,669	536,512	752,181	530,852	605,319	1,136,171	1,888,352
2009	327,514	627,262	954,776	618,891	639,561	1,258,452	2,213,228
2010	421,081	746,871	1,167,952	768,795	700,325	1,469,123	2,637,075
2011	445,282	801,147	1,246,429	848,695	723,212	1,571,907	2,818,336
2012	486,865	817,035	1,303,900	836,214	929,995	1,766,209	3,070,109
2013	408,586	706,025	1,114,611	779,181	852,537	1,631,718	2,746,329
	$2,631,656	$5,737,415	$8,369,071	$5,690,774	$5,591,147	$11,281,914	$19,650,985

Looking at the numbers for 2013 in particular, we can almost justify Development (Read: "Fundraising") spending the better part of a million dollars on postage, because many of the SPLC's mostly elderly donors still prefer snail-mail, but we're having a really tough time understanding how Legal Services could rack up more than $400,000 in postage, and that's down $80 grand from the previous year! Have they never heard of e-mail?

And that $400k is just a little more than half of what Management spent in postage last year! Is the management of the SPLC still using stone tablets to communicate? What gives?

Given the high labor costs associated with producing hieroglyphics and cuneiform, that might explain the SPLC's printing expenses.

Printing	Legal Svcs	Pub Ed	Total 1	Mgt	Development	Total 2	Grand
2006	157,401	905,743	1,063,144	727,777	429,028	1,156,805	2,219,949
2007	93,727	558,527	652,254	347,991	316,808	664,799	1,317,053
2008	139,663	387,039	526,702	347,437	370,264	717,701	1,244,403
2009	227,879	402,715	630,594	357,588	381,112	738,700	1,369,294
2010	250,975	413,020	663,995	394,029	329,918	723,947	1,387,942
2011	294,579	491,331	785,910	471,956	371,030	842,986	1,628,896
2012	262,856	422,224	685,080	408,150	507,958	916,108	1,601,188
2013	421,917	646,630	1,068,547	641,316	545,308	1,186,624	2,255,171
	$1,848,997	$4,227,229	$6,076,226	$3,696,244	$3,251,426	$6,947,670	$13,023,896

According to this, Management actually outspent both Legal Services and Fundraising, respectively, on printing costs. What the heck are the all-white managers at the SPLC printing with all of those tax-free donor dollars? And what, for that matter, is Legal Services printing to the tune of $422,000 dollars?

The SPLC doesn't charge their clients for services rendered, so it can't be for billing.

To make things even more confusing, Printing costs are a completely different category from Lettershop expenses?

Lettershop	Legal Svcs	Pub Ed	Total 1	Mgt	Development	Total 2	Grand
2006	71,242	402,449	473,691	341,532	854,577	1,196,109	1,669,800
2007	44,574	255,063	299,637	181,326	812,808	994,134	1,293,771
2008	66,705	187,357	254,062	167,175	820,973	988,148	1,242,210
2009	103,963	205,565	309,528	179,357	870,982	1,080,339	1,359,867
2010	133,223	227,735	360,958	202,527	955,437	1,157,964	1,518,922
2011	124,290	211,214	335,504	201,860	1,186,478	1,388,338	1,723,842
2012	164,364	257,688	422,052	258,431	907,450	1,165,881	1,587,933
2013	133,003	210,219	343,222	213,688	855,448	1,069,136	1,412,358
	$841,364	$1,957,290	$2,798,654	$1,745,896	$7,264,153	$9,040,049	$11,808,703

Finally, we see Fundraising, er, Development, getting the lion's share.

"Well," you might say, "Hate is on the rise and these are necessary expenses. Plus, it takes money to make money, so Development needs to spend these donor-dollars on fundraising."

Business must be booming at the SPLC, which has nearly doubled in size since 2006, from 139 employees to 271 on the payroll in 2013, according to the IRS Form 990s.

If salaries are any indication of where the job growth occurred, it would have to be in the Legal Services sector, whose payroll jumped by a whopping 123% since 2006, compared to a rather anemic 39% for Fundraising.

Such an unprecedented bolstering of the legal team can only mean that the dedicated lawyers of the Southern Poverty Law Center are slogging it out in the courts more than ever, right?

Oddly enough, Legal Case Costs have pretty much remained flat for the past eight years, as shown above, despite the more than doubling of Legal Services salaries.

So where is all that money going? How can SPLC Management justify $779,000 for postage in 2013? As with most SPLC mysteries, the answer is fairly simple.

The only plausible explanation is that the bookkeepers at the SPLC are probably engaging in an old accounting technique known as Joint Costs Allocation.

According to the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants (AICPA):

"[Joint Costs Allocation] focuses on expenses associated with certain joint activities, which in part serve a fund-raising function, but also have elements of program services or operations.

For instance, the expenses associated with an educational mailing that also includes an appeal for donations might be jointly allocated between program services and fundraising expenses." [Emphasis added]

How does it work?

"Joint costs allocation is unfortunately an area where NPOs [Nonprofit Organizations] sometimes use questionable financial practices, such as arbitrarily dividing up and spreading most or all of their actual fundraising and/or operations costs in their financial reports among their various program services in order to make it appear that they have very low fundraising and overhead costs." [Emphasis added]

And what's the problem with it?

"That contrasts with legitimate accounting procedures for accurately assigning a particular program service (or fund or grant) its true share of the operations and overhead costs."[Emphasis added]

And here's what the American Institute of Philanthropy's Charity Watch has to say about the procedure:

"In nonprofit financial reporting, the funds spent on telemarketing, direct mail, or other solicitation activities that also include an "action step" or "call to action" are referred to as "Joint Costs." Charities often use joint costs as a way of inflating their reported charitable program spending and deflating their reported fundraising costs. [Emphasis added]

Although the use of this accounting "trick" is often perfectly in line with the accounting rules for the reporting of joint solicitation costs (AICPA SOP 98-2), these rules allow for many interpretations and judgments that can produce questionable results." [Emphasis added]

Questionable results. Perfectly legal. Inherently scuzzy. Remember this the next time you write a check out to the SPLC.

You think this is a one-off aberration? Check out what the SPLC claims for "Office Equipment" expenses versus Legal Case Costs to see where your donor dollars really go.

	Legal Case Costs	Office Equipment
2006	1,416,775	831,186
2007	1,799,436	901,775
2008	1,365,714	1,407,471
2009	1,114,693	687,317
2010	1,142,926	664,268
2011	1,390,052	916,255
2012	1,647,136	815,679
2013	1,876,999	963,713
	$11,753,731	$7,187,664

To those of you who believe your donor-dollars actually go toward "fighting hate" and "civil rights" law we only ask that if you have any legitimate explanation for the bizarre numbers we've cited, please share them with us.

If an average of $898,000 a year for office equipment and $711,000 for Management postage costs sound like legitimate expenses, we'd like to hear from you. As always, we remind our readers to never take our word for it. Look at the SPLC's own documents and come to your own conclusions, and please share them with us.

If the Southern Poverty Law Center is actively obfuscating on such primary documents as their own audited financial reports, what else can they be "exaggerating"?

You tell us.

Ms. Ann in Harlem: The naked, stopdown racism Of Hollback!'s "Social Justice Warriors"

Mumia Ali · 7 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

"It's a sidewalk, not a red carpet."
-Paul Elam, A Voice For Men

Although it's a new year, there is still way too much meat on the bone that the self-anointed anti-"street harassment" organization Hollaback! threw all of us back in late October. Their viral video presentation, "10 Hours Of Woman Walking In NYC" attempts to make the case that "street harassment" is a global pandemic – armies and armies of men catcalling and worse, kinda like a pickup version of World War Z or something.

Yea, that's the ticket.

Only problem was, that Hollaback! really stepped in it and blew their own foot off with an IED-sized turkey of a "case".

By now, you all know the facts, but what the heck, let's do it one mo gin, shall we?

Fledgling actress Shoshona Roberts agrees to be Hollaback!'s guinea pig for their grand social experiment, dreamt up by a Madison Ave.-styled public relations guru, who as it turns out, has quite a colorful – pardon the pun – past in crafting marketing visions for other big-time clients. Although the claim is made that this outing took place over the course of ten hours of hidden camera footage, we get the ultra-condensed version – barely two minutes long – showing all the world to see the damning evidence of boys being boys.

To say the whole thing was anti-climatic, would be a serious understatement.

Aside from two arguably questionable fellows who seem to have other problems than trying to pick up chicks, the rest are everyday guys being polite. It was news to me to hear that merely saying "good morning" was tantamount to committing an act of sexual violence.

To make matters worse, the video deliberately focused on lower-class/working class Black men in Harlem, Black America's most famous neighborhood, and by their own admission, edited out all of the footage they claim to have of the rest of NYC's men supposedly acting a fool. Put that together with the lone guinea pig – Ms. Roberts – being a white woman, and one cannot help but harken back to a very dark, sordid and not-too-distant past, where Black men were targeted for daring to "holla" at a white woman.

Emmett Till just turned over in his grave.

Indeed, the entire video gives one the distinct impression that the only people Hollaback! seems to be looking out for, are the interests of white, urban, young, relatively attractive, middle/upper middle class women, against working and lower-class Black and Brown men.

Nor was this little fact lost on the general public – even diehard feminists like Hanna Rosin, couldn't help but to put the obvious on blast – and the fact that the video itself has been parodied seventy ways to Sunday (even the Dark Knight himself got in on the act) – just goes to show what Americans in their right mind think of the whole thing:

That's it's all a bunch of bunk.

No, scratch that: it's all a bunch of racist, classist, elitist, snobbish, over-entitled-in-only-a-Ms. Ann-white woman-can-be, bunch of bunk.

Not to be outdone, the Black Feminist Brigades, ever-envious of Ms. Ann dontcha know, pouted and stamped their feet, mewling about how they were left out (forgetting the fact, for like the umpteenth time, that Ms. Ann-type Feminists have made it so abundantly clear that they do NOT want Black women up in their causes). All the usual suspects – Feminista Jones, the Crunk Feminist Collective, and the gals over at For Harriet, hollered about how the

Ms. Anns were sucking all the air outta the room and taking the focus off of Women of Color, who also supposedly labor under such odious "street harassment" and to a much higher degree than Rachel, Becky or Marsha do (although, if you notice, no Black Feminist outfit has dared to do their own version of "10 hours of walking in…" – things that make you go, hmm…). Moreover and to really add some spice to the pot, the Black Feminists charge Black men for making the discussion "about race" rather than about all the bad "street harassment" on the part of the Black and Brown men in the video. Of course, they leave out the part that it wasn't Brothas at large who made the discussion "about race" – Hollaback! did, by presenting their video in the way they did.

Let's be completely honest about things here:

If you're a nominally middle class, relatively young and at least passably attractive white woman in American life, you are literally, at the top of the mating market foodchain – that's not a Brotha from around the way saying that, that's the findings of umpteen surveys and studies and researches of as many online dating sites and services. saying that. In fact, of all the differing types of American women out there, the only one that poses any real competition for the aforementioned white woman, are Asian women – but we'll get to that particular topic another day.

Everyone knows that American women such as described above, got it real good. A case in point, which drives it all home, was the disappearance, roughly a decade ago, of one Natalie Holloway – remember that? The Earth had to stop spinning on its axis until she was found. She wasn't, but everyone was reminded, day and night, that Holloway was missing and that she had to be found. In fact, that same year saw another young lady go missing, and only until the threat of mass protests and marches did the media finally zero in on her as much as Holloway (Latoyia Figueroa, from right here in Philly).

So, when Hollaback! ran with their culturally inappropriate, tone deaf and stompdown racist screed in the form of a YouTube video ran, people were only too quick to mock it for the squealings of entitled Ms. Anns that it was. Nobody was buying it, not even a goodly number of women themselves(!).

But what Hollaback!'s video does highlight, is what I have referred to as Urban Colonialism, also known as Gentrification, where SWPLs and sometimes Bougie Blacks, encroach upon the living spaces of working class communities inhabited by salt of the earth Black folks, and commence to tell them how to live. Oh, how white of you, Hollaback!

You see, unlike people like you Hollaback!, Blue collar Black folks don't have social mixers for young professionals to troll for potential hookups; they don't have college campuses that are in truth de facto mating grounds for the better off crowd. They don't have the church to help them meet and greet the opposite sex, because, as Murray has noted in his excellent work "Coming Apart" the church ceased being a strong force for such things a long time ago. So, you know how people in working class Black America meet?

They meet on the street. Brothas "holla" – and despite all the handwringing all of you supposed social justice warriors do, most of time, it ain't no big thang. Read your "Promises I Can Keep" for more on this point. In the 'hood – like Harlem – guys and gals meet at the Papi Store (that's the Philly slang for what New Yorkers call a bodega), or on the stoop, or just walking down the street.

Now, if you're really all that concerned about this, what you could be doing is providing better venues for guys to meet ladies – ahh, but you see, that would need you to actually address something real. We can start with these guys having meaningful employment, that sure would help, right?

As we move into 2015, it behooves all of us to keep in mind what Hollaback! is really all about, and what their true face – exemplified by Shoshona Roberts – really looks like:

A sneering, entitled, culturally tone deaf and incorrigibly racist, white chick.

And they need to be constantly reminded of that, unless or until they have shown the appropriate amount of contrition, attended the appropriate amount of culturally sensitivity trainings, and have actually addressed themselves to something that actually matters in this life.

Bang, there it is…

[Ed. note: Image "Harlem Pride" is licensed under Creative Commons Generic 2.0. It is attributed to Jere Keys and originally appeared here.]

Yes, please don't apologize for rape jokes

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 7 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Salon assistant editor Jenny Kutner was let out of her cage to spread fear and sadness to all the little children. Before I begin making her regret writing her recent tower of half-baked thoughts and baby Jesus meat, I'd like to ask Salon's recruiters to start screening for insecure morons. I don't know about the rest of you, but I don't want to continue living in fear of being pinned down and having my brain forcibly impregnated with inane theories about first-world "social issues" like rape jokes.

Kutner, you should feel special. I wrote this article on my birthday, which means that picking apart your stupidity was a more arousing prospect than doing anything involving cake and ice cream.

Here's Kutner's entire brain abortion in a few sentences:

> A man told a rape joke. I didn't like it. He learned that I was a feminist and apologized with a hug. Now I feel bad because I feel different. I should not feel different. Everyone should have been offended like me. He should have apologized to people who laughed.

Reading Kutner's inane ramblings brought to mind comedy legend George Carlin's old rant about how rape can be hilarious, all you have to do is picture Porky Pig raping Elmer Fudd. Carlin repeats old bullshit talking points about how men victim-blame, but notice he never lets his stupid gender politics stop him from becoming a comedy legend that talks about whatever the hell he wants.

As a "raucous and inappropriate" man, I find rape to be just as appropriate as a joke topic as the priest and the rabbi. Why? Because I love jokes and I love laughing. I even love jokes made at my expense, because it turns out you can go in all sorts of directions with the colorful stereotypes we have for redheads (Case in point, I look like what happens when Ronald McDonald starts lovin' it with Beetlejuice and Jamie Hynemen in a lumber mill).

I even welcome jokes about men and MHRAs. I laugh at Georgie's pot shots at men, even if I disagree with them. I even laughed at SNL's wildly inaccurate depiction of MRAs as white, balding anti-abortion loons with mail order brides.

Of course I find rape as disgusting and horrifying as you do, but I simply don't let my political leanings influence my ability to laugh, even at the things I love. Granted, I do sometimes take offense when someone isn't actually joking, but laughing is infinitely better than getting pissy and defensive.

I'm nowhere near as funny as Christopher Titus, Cheryl Wheeler, Reginald D Hunter, Doug Stanhope or Aries Spears, but I try to joke around anyway because life is better when you are laughing. But somehow, the whole experience of laughing is ruined if your laughter has to be approved. Why in the hell would I need some idiot's approval for how I should feel? What kind of backwards-ass society would that be?

Every time a feminist scribbles why rape jokes should be banned in "Rosie the Riveter's Time of the Month" red crayon, I immediately stick my head out of my window and scream the most inappropriate joke I can think of at that moment. The neighbors may throw various lawn implements at my head, but I don't care, I'm still free, and they can't take the sky from me.

In fact, I will follow Maddox's example in his fight against the vegetarian superiority complex and say that for every rape joke you don't tell, I'm going to tell three. Here's three heart-stoppers that you can find around the net:

1. I said, "Do you know the difference between rape and conversation?" She said, "No." I said, "Let's go upstairs for a chat."
2. I called that Rape Advice Line earlier today. Unfortunately, it's only for victims.
3. I was raping a woman the other night and she cried, "Please, think of my children!" Kinky bitch.

As a bonus, your article made me remember one of my favorite one-liners: “I used to be a necrophiliac until some rotten cunt split on me.” That one has everything, it’s gross and politically-incorrect, sure, but that’s not why it’s a favorite. I love that joke because saying it immediately helps you find friends who are just as messed-up as you are. I promise that the people who laugh at that joke are the some of the coolest people you will ever meet.

But you just can’t identify with free-thinkers who choose to laugh, right Kutner? You must keep everyone aware of the social consequences of every joke, everywhere.

You make life miserable, even when life tries to make you happy. You reluctantly accepted an undeserved apology hug from the evil, wicked man who told the rape joke. But then, you cast off the embrace of oppression and compressed the top of your personal can of Lysol to liberate your temple from cooties.

Let’s stop for just a moment and appreciate how rude this woman is. Am I the only one who thought to ask how the poor guy must feel right now? He just goes to a family party to have fun, tells a raunchy joke, and now the person he apologized to is trashing him online!

> I wasn’t the only guest who didn’t respond with laughter, but I think I was the only one who didn’t even crack a smile. Everyone quickly turned back to their conversations, but I leaned over to another relative and whispered, “Glad rape jokes are still in vogue.” I pulled out my phone and fired off some similar snark for Twitter, then went inside to eat some more salami.

What the hell is wrong with you, Kutner? Have we already forgotten what going public with emotionally loaded tweets about jokes can do to people? Are you so morally bankrupt that you cannot even attend a social gathering without having your night ruined by your own opinions about a rape joke?

Read this carefully: Making rape into a punchline carries the implicit understanding that rape is awful. The laughter brought on by rape jokes comes from people who know perfectly well that it is a crime. But the punchline, like with other comedic elements, strips the horror of its power.

You have it backwards, Kutner. It is the people who find rape jokes offensive that give rape and rapists power over our emotions, not the people who joke about the topic. The people who joke are not controlled by societal expectations, they are actively seeking joy instead of crying on command. This doesn’t make them less able to sympathize with rape victims, it makes them more able to process and recover from trauma once they are able to do so.

Your emotional instability is no one’s problem but yours, but your family and friends cared enough about your feelings on rape jokes to accommodate you. Now that I think about it, that’s probably why you turned out the way you did.

The man who told the joke came up and apologized, although he had absolutely no reason to do so. He gave up his time and energy to make sure you felt okay, and you still bitched about him on the Internet. Why?! Why would you do that? Do you need other people to feel guilty to validate your stupid emotional framework? Or do you just hate men that much? Why are you such a horrible person?

The only thing I agree with in your piece is the headline “Don’t apologize to me for your rape joke.” If it is a joke, then by nature it is not serious. You took something that had zero moral expectations of your reaction, forced it into your contrived worldview, and expected everyone to react in the same way you did.

I’ll admit it, Kutner, you offended me. But unlike you, I’m not reacting to a joke, I’m reacting to your serious, honest opinion as an assistant editor for a major publication. I get to be offended because you are sharing thoughts that you hope will in some way change life as we know it, and I’m not okay with that.

There is a difference between someone joking and someone pretending to joke. That’s why one can laugh at a racist joke, but not when a racist tells it (because then, it’s uncertain if (s)he’s really joking). But in this instance, your male party-goer was joking. You're not. That's why you are the bitch in this situation, and he's clear of all charges.

I say to you and everyone who thinks like you that I will tell any joke I want, and you will never have the culture you seek if I have anything to say about it. When you are at your next feminist-approved formal gathering, listen carefully over the sound of your guests' pretentious harrumphs for laughter over the horizon. That's sound is coming from an actual party, and it's the sound of something called "fun."

I grew up listening to people joke about male rape in prison, disconnected fathers and circumcision. If I can deal with that, then you can deal with a man joking about Ms. Goody-goody getting a surprise sperm deposit in her ovum bank.

I'm done. Go suck on your salami.

Manspreading video

AVfM Video Source · 8 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

So now, apparently, "manspreading" is a serious issue. It's such a very serious issue, we want women everywhere to know that we apologize for having testicles, and in our shame, we have decided to let Shoe On Head (@shoe0nhead) ladysplain its importance to the world:

We couldn't agree more.

(We like her take on ShirtStorm too.)

Do we need men's studies...History is men's studies, right?

Warren Farrell · 8 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Publishers note: Momentarily we will be starting a MANstream Media that deals with this issue. Here. PE

Women's studies help us create heroes and role models out of women who deviated from their traditional role (Madame Curie, Susan B. Anthony, Harriet Tubman, Marion Evans [aka George Eliot]), who society did not highlight, but made invisible. As such, it offers women options in place of invisibility, inspiration in place of ridicule. That's one of many reasons women's studies exists and one of many reasons it is important. This is one of many messages I tried to impart when I taught in the Department of Women's Studies at San Diego State University in the early eighties.

Women's studies courses are the seeds from which the forest of feminism has grown. Over 30,000 courses are offered at American universities, including about 700 majors or minors.[i] A study at 55 major universities found that every Ivy League school, with the exception of Princeton, "now offers more courses in women's studies than economics, even though economics majors outnumber women's studies majors by roughly 10-to-1."[ii]

In contrast, there are virtually no men's studies courses. The few courses labeled "men's studies" are rarely genuine men's studies, but feminist men's studies. Feminist men's studies' courses tell men how they can forfeit power, be less abusive toward women, share the housework… In feminist men's studies, when men have a disadvantage it is seen as men's fault.

Whether that disadvantage is dying sooner; committing suicide more; doing worse in almost everything in school; being less likely to attend college; paying for children they can see only as "visitors" after divorce; being more likely to be in prison; male-only draft registration; dying sooner of all ten leading causes of death; suffering 93% of workplace deaths; being more of the street homeless than women and children combined. That is, in feminist studies, women's disadvantages are often seen as men's fault; and in feminist men's studies, men's disadvantages are seen as men's fault.

Many women's studies departments have become gender studies' departments, but also only in theory. The male perspective is not dealt with—only the feminist perspective on men. Feminists teaching the men's perspective on men and calling it gender studies is like Republicans teaching Democrats' perspective on Democrats and calling it party politics. Just as it is true that no has less empathy for Democrats than Republican activists (or vice versa), so it is also true that no one has less empathy for men than feminist activists. Feminists call it sexism to refer to God as He; they don't call it sexism to refer to the Devil as He.

Women's studies in its current form is not women's studies—it is feminist studies. A genuine women's studies would involve the views of not just liberal women, but also of conservative women (e.g., Independent Women's Forum; Eagle Forum). Every study of gender should include four perspectives: those of both liberal and conservative women, and those of both liberal and conservative men. Gender studies now studies only liberal women's view of women's powerlessness, and liberal women's perspective on male power. It doesn't look at liberal or conservative men's view of male powerlessness, or liberal or conservative men's view of female power.

What, pray tell, is female power and male powerlessness? For starters, from the male perspective, many women have male-paralyzing beauty power, sexual power, verbal skills and victim power, even as he is paralyzed by his biological instinct to protect women.

As a result of the inattention to male powerlessness and female power, men are as ignorant about their own powerlessness and female power as women in the 1950's were about their own powerlessness and male power. And as a result, men today are psychologically about where women were in the 1950's. The last half century has not been a battle of the sexes, but a war in which only one side has shown up. Men have put their heads in the sand and hoped the bullets would miss. The less sense this makes now, the more you need genuine men's studies.

The feminist objection to genuine men's studies sounds convincing: "history is men's studies." Wrong. History is the opposite of men's studies. Traditional history books reinforce the traditional male role of performer. The function of both women and men's studies is to question traditional roles, not reinforce them. Women had to question the assumption that they must do the child-raising and couldn't do the money raising. Men need to question the assumption that they must do the money raising and can't do the child-raising.

Women's studies is necessary to help women see clear alternatives to traditional roles; men's studies is necessary to help men see clear alternatives to traditional roles. Men's studies is currently needed more than women's studies exactly because men's role has been less-questioned.

History books, by celebrating men only when they perform, trap men into stereotyped roles even more than they trap women, because when we celebrate and appreciate someone for playing a role, we are really bribing them to keep playing that role. Appreciation keeps the slave a slave.

For women, performing is deviating from traditional roles; for men performing is conforming to traditional roles. To help women question traditional roles we had to help people see women who deviated from traditional roles as worthy of admiration—so Susan B. Anthony receives more admiration and Oprah Winfrey receives more opportunity than they would have in the past.

What is the male equivalent of deviating from traditional roles? Deviating for a university man who is heterosexual could be telling the woman he is dating that were he to become a parent he would prefer to raise children than to raise money. Deviating might be to question the norm that he pick up the check by expectation even as she picks up the check by option; or protesting that he take sexual initiatives by expectation even as she takes them by option.

For a gay man, deviating from traditional role expectations might involve celebrating his being in touch with his sexuality; for his classmates, it might involve encouraging him to live his life in integrity, rather than shaming him for it, thus forcing him to escape to a Brokeback mountain to be a double agent in his own life.

For men of any sexual orientation, questioning traditional roles may include questioning laws that emanate from those traditional roles: from male-only draft registration to state and federal departments of women's health without departments of men's health (even as men die sooner from all ten leading causes of death). It involves questioning why 15% of the military is female but only 2 of 663 of the Marines dying in the War in Iraq are female (as of April 2006).

It involves questioning medical breakthroughs based on traditional roles, such as the option for women to have birth control pills but not men (even though we've been within a ten-year reach of the technology for a men's birth control pill for more than a quarter century). It involves questioning his university's institutional sexism, such as female-only scholarships even as women are already about 57% of college graduates.

Men's studies is not for men only. It would help both sexes understand dad: why dads are so often afraid to express feelings; why, when dad becomes 85, he is more than 13 times as likely to commit suicide as mom; why he is more likely to suffer from problems with alcoholism and gambling; why, after divorce, he often feels the children have been turned against him and the courts have turned him into a wallet.

Because half of the children's genes is their dad's genes, as men's studies helps students understand their dad, it helps them to understand the half of themselves that is their dad. Men's studies, therefore, does not merely change the student's relationship to her or his dad, but the student's relationship to her or himself. The corollary is that when women's studies portrays men as the dominant oppressors, and the abusers, molesters and rapists, it leaves women and men feeling shamed about the half of themselves that is their dad– and, for men, the 100% that is male.

Men's studies helps every future mom raise her son more effectively, and to raise her daughter to learn empathy toward men. Her daughter's empathy is eventually extended toward that daughter's sons. In contrast, a women's studies-only approach toward men leaves her daughter with antipathy toward men that can become antipathy toward her sons.

Men's studies helps both sexes understand all the problems men deal with as a result of a heritage that made men able to be loved and respected only if they were able to kill animals, kill in war, or make a killing on Wall Street. It helps both sexes understand all the problems that I discuss in each chapter of this book. Without men's studies, gender studies misunderstands not just gender but also women, in the same way that if party politics studied only one party, it would misunderstand not just party politics as a whole, but also the party it favors.

Men's studies is not the opposite of women's studies. It doesn't say women had rights and men didn't. It explains that none of our grandparents had rights—they had responsibilities. They had obligations. Making money was about not about male power and privilege, but about male obligations and responsibilities. Men who fulfilled their responsibilities most effectively received female love. Men who failed received female contempt.

Men's studies does not say women have the power and women oppress men. It helps us understand that neither sex had the right to play the role of the other sex, and therefore, if power is control over our lives, neither sex had power. For example, most dads prior to the early 20th Century had to forfeit any fantasy of becoming a writer, artist or musician to get paid enough to feed a family of ten.

Working as a coal miner was not power. Pay was about the power dad forfeited to get the power of pay—the power to have his children live a better life than his. Men's studies helps both sexes understand why, instead of power, both sexes had roles. And to understand that by definition a role cannot be power—again, because real power is control over one's own life. Instead, a role implies outside forces have control of one's life.

Men's studies explains why, in the past, the dominant force was neither men nor women, but the need to survive. And why the "oppressor" was neither men nor women, but the fear of starvation.

Without men's studies, neither our son nor our daughter is taught to question the process of our daughter "marrying up" and, thus, our sons don't question the process of programming themselves to raise money to obtain love. Since young men know the most pay comes in engineering, physics, math, medicine, business and law, they will continue to avoid the liberal arts, and instead use the university as a vocational school. Ironically, then, women's studies without men's studies undermines what every women's studies professor would hope for: male exposure to the university as a questioning experience rather than as a vocational experience.

Without men's studies, once children arrive, our daughters married to middle class men (or above) have three options:

work full time;

children full time;

some combination of both

Of course, our son has three "slightly different options"

work full-time;

work full-time;

work full-time

More precisely, our son's second option once children arrive is to work overtime, and his third option is to work two jobs.

When we have women's studies without men's studies, we create an Era of the Multi-Option Daughter and the No-Option Son. Which is what we have done.

If close to a half century of women's studies without men's studies had only given us an understanding of women while neglecting men, the problem would be easily solvable: create balance with a half century of men's studies without women's studies. But after a half century, feminism is part of our nation's consciousness like syrup in a pancake: even if it we attempted removal, the pancake is forever reshaped. For example, who doesn't believe that men earn more money for the same work, or that men batter women more than women batter men, or that women do two jobs while men do one?

These beliefs have created a deep-seated anger toward men and have resulted in policies like affirmative action extended to women, and women-only scholarships. Of course, if these beliefs were true, anger would be warranted. In successive chapters, I'll explain why none of the above is true, but for now let me deal with the anger.

The anger emanating from women's studies has infiltrated all the leading universities. Wherever I travel, I hear those few men who dare to take women's studies courses speak of how shut down they feel. I was doing a TV show in Seattle called Town Meeting. Also invited was Pete Schaub, a senior at the University of Washington in Seattle. Pete had enrolled in a women's studies course. When he objected that all men were not wife beaters, child molesters, and potential rapists, he was classified as sexist. When he persisted with such challenges, he was asked to withdraw from the class.

Pete was not your political protester-type, not by a long stretch, but this was too much even for him. He reminded the school that the course description advertised the course as encouraging "vigorous, open inquiry." To him, it felt more like a vigorous inquisition. The associate dean, caught between feminism and free speech, did "the waffle": He officially reinstated Pete, but told him it was best to not attend the class![iii]

Because the Schaub incident occurred in the 1990's, and in a liberal city (Seattle), I wondered if this atmosphere was still prevalent in 2006, and in the midwest. I find it is. For example, a dad in Illinois for whom I had done expert witness work so he could become fully involved with his children after a divorce, told me that Raquel, one of his six children, was taking a women's studies class at the University of Illinois. I asked Raquel about her experience in the class.

"Warren, the class is very upsetting to me. They keep saying that dads are not good parents, as if there were no exceptions. But my dad is a wonderful parent. His parenting skills and nurturing are much better than my mom's. But in class, by talking all the time about dads as abusers, it makes people afraid of their dads, and by emphasizing divorced dads as molesters and deadbeats, they make it seem as if a divorced dad would only want to raise his daughters if they had bad motives (like to molest them or avoid child support). It's sickening to me."

I asked Raquel what happened when she spoke up. "If I say something positive about men, there is often a pregnant pause—as if I had made a grossly inappropriate comment. And when I write something positive about men in a paper, I get a bad grade. When I write a paper and take the feminist party line, I always get an A; when I don't, I get a bad grade. This isn't right."

The "party line," especially at leading universities, is Marxist feminism. It posits that throughout recent history male-dominated patriarchal societies made laws and customs to benefit men at the expense of women. Capitalist countries such as the U.S. are portrayed as the worst examples. Women are seen as being treated as the subordinate class, as second class citizens, or the property of men.

Just as Marxism in the former USSR required the censorship of Soviet citizens, so the censorship of men's voices is seen as a prerequisite to women making the unfettered transition from subservience to equality. The university—and especially women's studies—is seen as a safe harbor in the patriarchal storm. Of course, in the Soviet Union the result was a repression of speech that felt like an "iron curtain." The ultimate result was disintegration rather than liberation.

In universities the censorship has created a "lace curtain" into which is woven "speech codes" at more than 200 of the leading universities. For example, at the University of Michigan, the phrase "Women just aren't as good as men in this field" is specifically included in the speech code as an example of an offense.[iv] Saying "Men just aren't as good as women in this field" is not prohibited. Students violating the speech code might be put on probation and even sentenced to mandatory community service.

And of course that can be used against them for life (especially if they should run for political office or desire a government or university position). Speech codes prohibit speech which women or minorities might consider offensive, but not speech which men might consider offensive.[v]Even the President of Harvard, Lawrence Summers, found that merely suggesting in 2005 that male-female biological differences in engineering should be studied could cause international furor and catalyze his resignation from Harvard in 2006.

The codes would be less offensive if they were a two-way street, but even that would be undermining the purpose of a university—to prepare students to respond to offensive speech by communication, not litigation. When speech codes are a one-way street, however, they boomerang against women's preparation for the workplace. By giving women more-than-equal protection under the law, they turn women into a protected class.

This overprotection infantilizes women rather than preparing women for equal responsibility. It also turns women into a privileged class, with special scholarships, programs, events and celebrations. Because they haven't earned this privilege, they learn to feel entitled.

When something goes wrong it is seen as evidence of discrimination or oppression leading to blaming and suing rather than as an impetus to look within and confront. This undermines college women's preparation to be effective employees and fair employers. Human resource divisions in all major corporations and government agencies reinforce this need for special awareness necessary for women.

These codes are also damaging university women's personal growth. Why? The less men express their feelings, the more the male-bashing seems justified. Women graduate thinking of their rights, but not men's. Thus, they graduate with a college education of anger toward men, including a lack of appreciation for their dad. A woman who does not appreciate her dad feels love-deprived.

And that affects her ability to love her husband and raise children. In the process of stifling men's feelings about women, but not women's about men, speech codes become divorce training. A setup for children being raised by a single mom who doesn't see how her demonizing of their dad leaves the children feeling unloved by their dad and isolated from their dad's contributions.

In brief, the speech codes emanating from the atmosphere created by women's studies undermine preparation for a happy marriage, or being a good mother, an effective employee, or a fair employer.

Isn't it true, though, that criticizing women, tasteless humor, and teasing create a hostile environment that inhibits women from learning? In the beginning, yes. But part of an education's purpose is to overcome that response, to use criticism as a growth opportunity, to know how to handle people with different values and senses of humor, which includes knowing how to communicate your perspective as well as to listen to theirs. Which is why the solution is not to include man-bashing in the speech codes' censorship. The solution is to *use*conflict between the sexes to teach both sexes how to listen to each other.

One positive contribution of early radical feminists was their focus on the value of the process, not just the end product (e.g., the college degree). A university is a laboratory for learning how to work through our disagreements, not for learning how to put a muzzle on the sex already less likely to complain and stir anger in the sex already more likely to complain.

Aside from this, the use of public institutions to subsidize sex discrimination is unconstitutional. Feminist-only studies is a violation of Title IX (which derives from the 14th Amendment's equal protection of the law clause). Speech codes are a violation of the first amendment (free speech).

And the method enforcing speech codes on campus usually violates the fifth amendment's guarantee of due process. To date, though, no college student has used Title IX to file a suit against his or her university for not having a genuine men's studies department or for not having in its department of gender studies an equal number of courses on men's issues from non- feminist perspectives.[vi]

Toward a Solution: Gender Transition Studies

The solution? There should be neither a woman's movement nor a men's movement, but a gender transition movement. A gender transition movement that helps both sexes make the transition from our genetic heritage of rigid roles to our genetic future of more flexible roles.

The goal of men's studies, then, is not men's studies. Nor should the goal of women's studies be women's studies. Both should ultimately be leading to Gender Transition Studies. And both should be integrating the perspectives of more traditional men and women.

Either women or men's studies isolated from the other is the use of taxpayer money to subsidize mistrust between the sexes. Gender Transition Studies is the preparation of the sexes to change together, and to replace mistrust with empathy.

This doesn't mean we can jump right into gender transition studies. If we do, the agenda will be set by women's studies: Domestic violence will assume men-as-oppressor; contributions to the family will measure women's housework and neglect men's work; discussions of dating will not challenge women to risk sexual rejection, just blame men when they do it wrong; men's health will be neglected, the lace curtain go undetected….

Feminists should be the strongest supporters of men's studies. Why? Ultimately the change in women's roles gets stalled when men's don't also change. For example, moms can't break glass ceilings unless dads are caring for the children.

We're all in the male-female boat together; if women are paddling on the left side and men on the right, and a woman says she wants freedom to paddle on the right, the man had better learn the value of paddling on the left or the boat soon will be unable to steer clear of something that will sink it. When either sex "wins," both sexes lose.

[i]The numbers in this paragraph are the best estimates of San Diego State University's Bonnie Zimmerman, President, National Women's Studies Association, interviewed February 1l, 1999. not rep

[ii]Young America Foundation, Comedy and Tragedy: College Course Descriptions and What They Tell Us About Higher Education Today, 1998-99 (Herndon, VA: YAF, 1998). See http://www.jewishworldreview.com/cols/feder.html. Cited in*Everyman,* Issue 35, Jan./Feb. 1999, p. 38.

[iii]Asa Baber, "Feminist U," in the "Men" column, Playboy, September, 1988.not rep

[iv]David G. Savage, "Forbidden Words on Campus," Los Angeles Times, February 12, 1991, front page.

[v]David G. Savage, "Forbidden Words on Campus," Los Angeles Times, February 12, 1991, front page.David G. Savage, "Forbidden Words on Campus," Los Angeles Times, February 12, 1991, front page. not [vi]Attorney Marc Angelucci, President of National Coalition of Free Men-Los Angeles (www.ncfm-la.org), has filed several lawsuits alleging anti-male discrimination by California and various state agencies and employees.

Much of this work was taken from Dr. Farrell's Myth of Male Power, which can be purchased here.

Elizabeth Farrelly: Violence against logic

Jim Muldoon · 8 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Elizabeth Farrelly, in the Sydney Morning Herald, asked the question "Is Feminism only as strong as the men who support it?" The article itself is something that only the brave should read. Farrelly's diatribe is all over the place like a mad woman's excrement.

A wink, at least from Tony Abbott, is as bad as a multiple murder (by Elliott Rodger) to a one-eyed Feminist. She goes from Australia to the US via the UK, but also visits "Iran, Iraq, Pakistan, Afghanistan and Algeria." All these places, the wink, the killings and more are linked by a common theme – "misogyny."

> The word misogyny has been overworked lately, but men's hatred for women who won't submit is everywhere.

Yes the word has been overworked, but there is still plenty of mileage in the accusation. The evidence for this misogyny is provided in these island hops of logic as she moves from theme to theme. She moves quickly, I feel, because even the most rudimentary investigation would uncover the accusation as false.

Take, for example, Tony Abbott and that wink.

> But the wink! So much callow unthought in a single gesture; so much of the unearned superiority that brought the planet to its knees in the first place and could still send us to a fiery climate-change hell.

Yes! Armageddon in a facial gesture. No need for deconstruction. It is too absurd for words.

We get a quick summary of the murders by Elliot Rodger and how that was misogyny in action. She explains that, in his anti-woman rage, he killed six "people." Of course, killing twice as many men as he did women is not a fact that Farrelly would want to dwell on. The implications for her hypothesis are not good. She'll stick with "people."

She also references the kidnapping of the Nigerian schoolgirls by the Boko Haram group. As Mark Dent points out in his article on AVfM Australia recently, this same group committed an atrocious gender-based murder on a far greater scale that that of Rodger. 58 boys and young men were hacked, shot and burned to death, while all the girls at that school were allowed to go free. For Farrelly, of course, only the plight of females is worth outrage.

Again and again she cherry picks her examples, wrings out all the angst she can, then moves on before anyone can question the legitimacy of her claims.

To give her ramblings some gravitas, she cites a Jackson Katz, noting that he has a Ph. D. so that we are all suitably impressed. He is a "gender-violence educator."

> His TED talk shows how easily "John beats Mary" becomes "Mary is a battered woman". As though we're saying something about Mary, not something about John.

Here is a man who is the perfect example of the pot calling the kettle a pot. In his talk, he explains how people wrongly think that "gender" issues and "women's" issues are one and the same.

> As if men don't have a gender.

Note that he is a "gender-violence" educator who has only interest in "violence against women." He speaks the same language as Farrelly – the Feminist Sacred Babble.

So while he and Farrelly complain about Mary being termed a battered woman, they both are more than happy making careers out of Mary's battered woman status.

Let me explain. John beating Mary is simply a matter for the police and the courts. If John did beat Mary, John should go to jail. Mary being a battered women, however, means more than just John beat Mary, or John might have beaten Mary, or a social worker thinks that John might have threatened to beat Mary.

It means that Mary can't leave John, and Mary can't go to the authorities, and Mary can't give evidence against John, and Mary is just powerless to do anything and John is an evil tyrant and everyone knows it and secretly approves of it. It means Patriarchy.

It means a Feminist Funding Frenzy in which people like Katz get paid to speak across the country and Farrelly gets paid to write her hand-wringing articles on Mary's plight.

Of course, there are no Marys beating up any Johns. And there's no discussion that, as individuals, a John is far more likely to be on the receiving end of violence than a Mary.

And what do the likes of Katz and Farrelly do for Mary?

Nothing.

But it is here that Farrelly gets stuck. Because Katz, for all his supposedly great insights, empathy and activism on Feminism's behalf, is a man. It is here she asks if Feminism relies on the strength of men. Thus, for Farrelly, "the future is bleak."

> Expecting men to share power is like expecting state governments to validate local ones.

I include that quote merely to remind you of the vacuousness of her thought. Please, don't try to work out which state governments have put which local governments in a status that would allow them to exist but not be valid. Earlier, she had this to say on women's power:

> Women's power is different in kind, as well as gender; earthier, broader, more intuitive.

So, does men's power also have a gender? Is that something that can be shared between genders? Do all men have this power? Is it something that they collectively hold, or is it something that can be held by one man?

I doubt it is the power of the man who regularly collects her garbage for her not-valid local government. No, there is no need for equality or power sharing there, mate. Farrelly will let you handle the smelly stuff all on your own.

Although I doubt the intention was to ask a serious question about the nature of Feminism, clearly she does. Because, for all of her talk of strong, independent, "dangerous" women, Farrelly is resolutely lying on her fainting couch with more dropped handkerchiefs than a White Knight could tie to his lance. This sister ain't doing nothin' for herself.

Will no good men come and take all this misogyny away? Preferably without too much noise or fuss, and at a time that is convenient. Perhaps they could do it overnight, so that when Farrelly arouses herself, it will all simply be gone as though a bad dream.

But, it's also a question that Katz should be asking himself. Clearly he believes he has, and is answering the call. But, more specifically, Katz should be asking what happens when he is no longer useful.

Perhaps Katz should look more closely at Farrelly's statement on men not sharing power. She doesn't say some men. Clearly, she doesn't think Katz will "share power" any more than Tony Abbott would. Therefore, ultimately, once his usefulness has expired, he needs to be thrown under the bus along with the rest of us.

> Feminism, the radical view that women are people, threatens no one.

No one? At best, she means "no one who agrees wholeheartedly with Feminism." Cleary "John" and his ilk are under immediate threat. In fact, in many countries Mary can get John locked up without any evidence that he beat Mary. She can definitely ensure that John never sees his kids again without a shred of evidence.

And, if Mary kills John, she can claim that he beat her and they'll let her off scot-free.

Links

http://www.smh.com.au/comment/is-feminism-only-as-strong-as-the-men-who-support-it-20140528-zrqo0.html#ixzz33NndL700

http://au.avoiceformen.com/feminism/the-empathy-gap-is-shockingly-real/

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=KTvSfeCRxe8

http://www.theage.com.au/news/national/tears-as-sniper-woman-acquitted-of-murder/2006/03/03/1141191853998.html

So what's a Zeta Male anyway?

Zeta Male · 8 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The following is an article about the Zeta Male from 2011, which we are republishing for new readers who may be unfamiliar with the topic. It may surprise some readers to learn how much these early discussions about the Zeta Male mirror later conversations that emerged under the heading Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW). — Editor

***

By now I am assuming you have all seen Paul's video on the basic premise of a "zeta male". Paul's video is vague, but a good foundation. Still, you can't help but ask – what the fuck is a Zeta Male?

Well, the term comes from designations in the male hierarchy; labels like alpha male and beta male. The interesting thing is that one does not essentially choose whether to be an alpha or a beta, but you do get the luxury to choose to be a zeta.

The idea of the alpha and beta male are based on observations of leaders and followers in society; who are the best of providers, and who comes in second. You grow up through your life being taught what to do; who you provide for and how you accomplish that. You protect and practice chivalry, and the social constructs and institutional ideas of what men should be are handed to you without reason or explanation.

Before you realize it you have been molded into the man you are told to be, and you fall into a category. You may be caught somewhere in between, but on the odds you still lean more towards one designation or the other. In the end, from a critical eye, and an institutional one, you will be branded whether you like it or not. You have been given a status, for better or worse, based on how you adapted to your upbringing, and a bit of luck.

The problem with the idea of alpha and beta males is that the traits are partially based on superiority/inferiority and they are actually rather constricting and come with the standard restrictions of manhood (the inability to show emotions, you must raise a family, and be the breadwinner, etc). You are given a code of conduct, and how well you do determines your worth as a man, and as a human being. Traditionally speaking, you either played the game or you forfeit by default. There weren't many options, and even alpha males were stuck in their role.[quote float="right"]You have been given a status, for better or worse, based on how you adapted to your upbringing, and a bit of luck.[/quote]

But no matter where you are, there is always a desire for freedom and change. Sometimes when there are few options, people tend to be happier, as they don't have the abundance of options, and never have to look back thinking, "I should have done X,Y, and Z instead…." But often, when there are no choices at all it brings a great deal of pain.

Especially when you see the alternative freedoms other people have. One of the few things feminism got right was the abundance of options that it gave to women. Now that men are starting to analyse all this more objectively, many are coming to a completely different view of their roles. When looking in comparison men have started to decide that how much life sucks as a man. Now, a growing number of men want options, too.

And so the Zeta Male begins to rise from the rubble of the shattered romanticizing of traditional masculinity. Zeta masculinity is more self taught and defiant toward traditional social structures.

Zeta theory tends to be the option of "abstain" from the game. You don't forfeit, but you also aren't playing. Zeta males have no intention of bending to the will of society for gender based purposes, and opt instead for self preservation. This is not an absence of morality or ethics, but rather breaking out.

> For the zeta, when he is told to do something because he is "the man," his answer is a simple "No."

Social expectations of both alphas and betas (being providers, chivalry, etc) are tossed aside, and we refuse to see ourselves as inferior because of it. We are doing what we want, taking our lives into our own hands. The traditional, institutional notions of masculinity will be at our mercy.

The traditional ideals of masculinity are going to be clay in our hands. Zeta male theory lets us mold the social institutions to our will. But first we have a different goal: to take it down. Or, if you prefer, to watch it collapse and fall under its own weight doing nothing to stop it.

Despite public opinion, gender roles are still highly institutionalized in society, and within all institutions that are created. They can also be taken apart, and in the long run, that is what the goal is. It is not simply to step aside and run on a different path, but to open up all the paths to everyone available. Zeta males have every intention of breaking apart society, and building it right back up how we see fit.

> How do we see the new masculinity in its most ideal form? In one word – Freedom.

The freedom to be who you are without shame, to take a professional career and family life of your choosing without being seen as lesser man.

In fact you might not even want to be seen as a man, and that is fine too. As long as you are who you want to be and can keep your head up high with pride you fit into the new design. For better or for worse, there is no shame in who you have decided to be as long as you are happy with it.

We don't change ourselves for women, especially when it comes to relationships. If you don't want to be with us for who we are, then you have no respect for us, and we don't want to be with you. My time may be split to be with you, but my passions will not die for you.

It's not just woman that we stick it to. Men are guilty of trapping others in the gender role. We will help pull you out of the pit, but we aren't going to let you pull us back in. We aren't going to contribute to the system that results in the fact that 80% of suicides are male. We want you to escape with us. Our hands are stretched out are you going to grab ahold of them or are you going to stay where you are?

And if anyone, man, woman, or child protests? Shut up, and get out of our fucking way. We are Zeta Males, and we aren't going anywhere. You are.

The feminist/non-feminist co-operation spiral

Men's Rights Edmonton · 8 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

When confronting feminist ideology, you can't expect any immediate changes to a person's point of view. Here we analyze whose minds can be changed and how that tends to look.

For more, subscribe to Men's Rights Edmonton.

Press conference at Canadian Centre for Men and Families

AVfM Video Source · 9 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The press conference during the Grand Opening Week for the Canadian Centre for Men and Families on November 20, 2014

Short presentations by:
Justin Trottier
James Brown
Eleanor Levine
Denise Fong
Malcolm Johnston
Veronica Kay
Serge Mwimba (en francais)

The press conference and opening was covered by many major national Canadian news outlets: CBC, CTV, Globe and Mail, National Post, Global TV, Sun News, Toronto Star, Metro News and others.

“Going Your Own Way: Understanding MGTOW” – a book review

Aaron Clarey · 9 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original “Going Your Own Way: Understanding MGTOW” is a new book released by Peter Wright and Paul Elam, and (as far as my research shows me) is the first serious publication that attempts to define, explain, and introduce MGTOW to the general public, as well as become sort of a “constitution” of the Men Going Their Own Way movement.

It is incredibly well written, clear, and succinct, and necessarily so as it attempts to lay down the theoretical foundations for an embryonic concept that will only be damaged if more concrete measures were made to define it. This immediately debunks Mr. Elam’s and Mr. Wright’s critics (who claim the authors are trying to claim MGTOW for their own and that it can’t be defined) as nearly two full chapters are dedicated to explaining how MGTOW is similar to an open source software wherein nobody can claim rights to it. After much explaining and intellectual honesty, I believe they manage to best define it as “male self-determination” and am inclined to agree.

With definitions out of the way, the book then delves into many aspects of traits of MGTOW laying down the logic, reason, empiricism, history, psychology, economic and other causes for the MGTOW phenomenon. I was particularly impressed with the amount of research that went into the historical (sometimes, ancient) study of “bachelors,” “bachelor theory,” and the bachelor lifestyle, providing not just historical perspective, but a shocking insight into society’s past psychological relationship with bachelors (for example “bachelor taxes” and the presumption bachelors some how owed it to society to marry and breed). I was also very impressed with the time dedicated towards pair bonding and attachment. The reason for this is that the same critics who berate Elam and Wright for daring to write a book about MGTOW, are also the same people who in a very hypocritical way insist on a rule that “no real MGTOW” would have anything to do with women. This false belief, unfortunately, presents a huge risk to the younger and disaffected men who search and find the MGTOW community, as they are consequently tempted to dismiss women altogether, women that may actually be of great benefit and contribution to their lives.

About the only real complaint or concern I had about the book was what I believed to be the overly liberal use of excerpts from various books, texts, and periodicals. Entire pages of “The Odyssey” and “The Art of Courtly Love” are quoted, where I would have just preferred some key quotes and then more analysis and commentary from the authors. There were also some philosophical and technical differences and disagreements that I had with the book, but nothing that would get my panties in a bundle, unlike many of the authors’ critics.

Besides that, I believe because the book is the first of its kind and is (more or less) introductory in nature, a glossary would be helpful to young men (and women) who are first being introduced to the concepts therein. “Gynocentrism,” “VAWA,” “hypergamy,” etc. are all terms that the average person does not know, and because of this may be misled into thinking it’s one of those “faux” studies like “women’s studies” where academians create made up words and acronyms to sound smart.

Overall, however, the book is a very good, thorough, and honest summation of what MGTOW is, easily digestible by the beginning reader or a people more involved and aware of the MGTOW philosophy. I would strongly recommend it as a primer to anyone looking to understand or research the topic. I would also strongly recommend ignoring all the fake reviews on Amazon as many in the MGTOW community viewed Mr. Wright’s and Elam’s writing of this book as “sacrilege” and have since been voting it down with faux votes.

Editorial update: Aaron also sent us this video, which he did shortly before finishing the book and writing the review. The reviews on Amazon from people who haven’t even read the book are rather bemusing.

The ironical irony of ironic misandry

Jim Muldoon · 9 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Paul Elam, on Manstream Media recently, talked about the lengths Feminists will go to in order to silence men talking about their own issues. “Ironic misandry,” that is, Feminist Approved Misandry, is one such tactic.

This “ironic misandry” is really just loathing in a pathetic, phoney disguise. It’s almost like a primary school girl telling blatant lies, but then claiming immunity from sanction because she secretly had her fingers crossed behind her back. Misandry is hatred by definition, but when the bigotry is called out for what it is, out comes the word “ironic” to dress it up as respectable.

In Slate, Amanda Hess begins the irony in a piece entitled “The rise of the ironic man-hater”.

> “Misandry”—literally, the hatred of men—is an accusation that’s been flung at feminists since the dawn of the women’s movement: By empowering women, critics argue, feminists are really oppressing men.

So, for the hard of thinking: women are trying to free themselves from men’s oppression. The men, seeing equality as second best, are just being cry babies and claiming “misandry” when it clearly is not. The claims of misandry, therefore, are yet another example of misogyny.

Now that she has established that Feminists don’t actually hate (this is irony already), Hess gives us some examples of the comedy.

> Now, feminists are ironically embracing the man-hating label: The ironic misandrist sips from a mug marked “MALE TEARS,” frosts her cakes with the phrase “KILL ALL MEN,” and affixes “MISANDRY” heart pins to her lapel.

Hess argues that their ardent uptake of this latest fad is just to show how ridiculous it is to accuse Feminists of misandry.

Sarah Begley, of Time, however is concerned that this ironic misandry might… wait for it… give Feminism a bad name. Ironic or what? To avert the damage to the brand, she is insistent that its all just fun. In fact, too insistent.

> When feminists joke that they are misandrists, they are riffing off the misguided popular notion that they are man-haters. They mean to satirize the women who say they are not feminists because they love men. It’s an inside, inside joke.

Throughout the piece, Begley continues with these assertions, because, of course, Feminists don’t hate, right? After all, its about equality, right?

Wrong, says Dayna Evans at Gawker. She starts her piece as she means to go on:

> Disclaimer: I hate men. Do not read on if you like men.

This is another spin on the crossed fingers ploy. She’s declared her hate, and gave her warning, so all responsibility simply evaporates. Evans agrees with Begley up to a point. Begley says:

> What feminists really hate is the patriarchy—the web of institutions that systemically oppress women.

But Evans then points out:

> We can hate the patriarchy, but doesn’t the patriarchy have to be held up by someone?

With this logic, Evans argues that she is justified in her hatred of men. Again we're back in the playground, "He started it."

Surprisingly, Begley makes something of a valid point.

> But inherent in this word "misandry" is hatred. And inherent in phrases like "ban men" and "male tears" are cruelty and violence. If a man wore a tee shirt that said "misogynist," even if he were a dyed-in-the-wool feminist, wearing it tongue-in-cheek, it would not be funny. It would be misguided.

"Misguided" is just mild irony. What is true is that every Feminist mentioned thus far would be screaming blue murder, pointing to it as irrefutable evidence of Patriarchy and systemic misogyny.

Evans responds to Begley's point:

> An interesting point. But Begley fails to mention that men have been wearing misogynist t-shirts since there were men on the planet to wear t-shirts. Simply put, every t-shirt a man wears is, in effect, a misogynist t-shirt, whether it is boldly emblazoned with such text or not.

It seems that men breathing is misogynistic too. But is Evans missing the point of cultivating men as allies?

> Do women lose allies by alienating the men who aren't in on the wink-wink joke? Maybe. Are those men worth losing? Probably.

We can only guess that when she says "maybe" and "probably" she is just being ironic. I don't think she actually wants any of us on her team.

But, in case you are worried, men don't need to miss out on the misandric action. In Salon, Haley Krischer shows us that men, or at least some men, can get their ironic misandry pom-poms and cheer from the sidelines.

> Men understand this. This includes my husband, who, when I told him I was writing this story, said: "Yeah, men suck." This doesn't make him a self-hating man, this just makes him a man who understands the problems men can cause.

Maybe, if we say, "Men suck" really loudly, and really, really, really mean it, Krischer could persuade Evans to lessen her hate for us just a little.

See? I'm getting with the irony program.

Of course, for Krischer, misandry can be funny because it isn't quite the male equivalent of misogyny. That's because hating women is far, far worse than hating men.

> But the truth is that feminists as a whole, despite what has been perpetuated, don't hate men or wish for the torment of men. This doesn't mean that male bashing doesn't exist. It also doesn't mean male bashing is somehow equivalent to female bashing. There is nothing equivalent to rape threats, sorry.

Is Krischer being ironic, or does she seriously think that men can't be raped? Or threatened with rape? Or is it, and this might worry her husband, that men being raped doesn't actually count.

And I don't mean "count as rape". I mean simply "count" as in "who gives a shit?"

It is here that the real irony kicks in. The Politically Correct, led by Feminists have been taking the humour out of humour for decades now. Slapstick is all but gone. Irish jokes, Jewish jokes, miserly Scottish jokes or any other race or nationality jokes are not "ironic racism", just bigotry. But now the sour-pusses want to paint their own faces and put on the big red nose suddenly “Clowns with a grudge” are in vogue.

Clemintine Ford, in Daily Life, takes Krischer’s indifference to men as a class to another level. She too takes up the Sacred Babble on ironic misandry. For Ford, though, her ironic misandry is saved for a special breed of men: MRAs.

Sorry, Honey Badgers. You just vanished in a puff of irony.

Because it’s ironic, and the bastards deserve it, she can hate as much as she likes. I loves the smell of irony in the morning. It smells like a consequence-free zone.

> Humour is a vital tool for feminists lest we lose our marbles completely when dealing with the irrational and factually incorrect bleatings of people who, among other things, argue that sexual violence statistics have been made up by feminist run government agencies to oppress man’s sexual nature.

Now, have sexual violence statistics been made up? They most certainly have. MRAs would agree with this so statement so far. The figures have been manufactured, fabricated, and plucked out of thin air for decades. Is that by Feminist run government agencies? You betcha! MRAs are still on board.

But don’t ask us, with our bleating ways. Ask Dr Murray Strauss (not an MRA), who tells how feminism corrupts domestic violence research (see link below). The sexual violence figures are just as corrupt.

So, then, to the bit on the end, “… to oppress man’s sexual nature.” Is that the ironic bit? It seems to me to be simply the misandric bit. There’s an implication to me that man (not “a few men” or “some men”, just “man” as in “the male of the species”, or “those with a penis”) can only achieve sexual satisfaction when women are abused. Every man. All of them. Every. Single. One.

Yes, Krischer’s husband. That’s you too.

And this is something that Ford claims MRAs are demanding as some kind of right. Not on this site. A Voice for Men’s position on violence has been clear from the start. (Check out the mission statements and other policy statements in the menu bar at the top of this page.) I listened to all of the speakers at the recent International Conference on Men’s Issues (find the links on this site or the main site). Not one speaker made such a claim.

Ford’s claim sounds hateful to me.

I would have said the dodgy figures are to justify a Feminist Funding Frenzy myself, but that’s not the least bit funny. Because there are many Feminist agencies that get government funding as a direct result of those numbers, and they do nothing to prevent sexual violence. They just use the money to “educate”, that is propagandize, and get more statistics. And that’s not funny either.

But the worse is yet to come. At the end of a burst of the Sacred Babble that I cannot parse, never mind summarise, she gives us this piece of misandric bile dressed as light entertainment:

> Or, as the little girl in It’s A Wonderful Life might put it, everytime a bell rings, a family court judge kidnaps a man’s children from him.

First, let’s look at Ford’s own justification on why this special kind of hate is alright.

> There’s a generally understood rule about sensitivity in comedy, and it is that jokes must seek to kick up not down. Simply put, it is funny to make sport of the people and institutions who enjoy power and privilege in the world because they have not only the means to defend themselves but also the luxury of being rewarded simply for existing. On the other hand, it isn’t funny to make sport of the people on the lowest rungs of the ladder because it’s like ganging up on someone smaller than you.

So just who, exactly, is ringing those bells? Ex-Family Law Court judge David Collier (not an MRA) said on his retirement that false abuse claims are “one of the ways of completely shutting husbands out of the child’s life.” This tactic, he said, was not only commonly used, but the frequency was increasing. And this, of course, is because the tactic is successful.

So who is the smaller? In the blue corner we have the mother, backed by the Family Court, the police, the social workers and other arms of the government. And let’s not forget a sympathetic media.

In the red corner, all on his lonesome, is the father being kicked out of his children’s lives. And as long as he’s trying to fight it in the Family Court, his lawyers are bleeding him dry.

And Ford, as any caring, consultative, inclusive, empathetic Feminist would do, stops her laughter just long enough to get a cup of his tears.

Other than the usual angst ridden, hand wringing guff of Feminists that I call the Sacred Babble, this “ironic misandry” is simply hatred with big sunglasses and a badly fitting wig.

And the disguise just makes them look uglier.

Links

Manstream media: https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=AUoiXyhCP7o

http://www.slate.com/blogs/xx_factor/2014/08/08/ironic_misandry_why_feminists_joke_about_drinking_male_tears_and_banning.html

http://time.com/3101429/misandry-misandrist-feminist-womenagainstfeminism/

http://www.salon.com/2013/10/27/fighting_sexism_with_cross_stitch_the_rise_of_misandry_crafts/

http://www.dailylife.com.au/news-and-views/dl-opinion/your-guide-to-understanding-ironic-misandry-20140825-3eafb.html http://www.smh.com.au/national/false-abuse-claims-are-the-new-court-weapon-retiring-judge-says-20130705-2phao.html http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/how-feminists-corrupt-dv-research/

Eating MGTOW: Chili, no beans. I got your powder

Paul Elam · 10 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

"We must unlearn the constellation to see the stars." ~ Jack Gilbert from the poem "Tear it down"

If you are going to eat a real MGTOW diet, there is only one correct way to do it. Anyone saying otherwise is a feminist plant sent by the Illuminati to co-opt MGTOW and to sap and impurify all of our precious bodily fluids. They are shameless profiteers; modern day Judas' who have betrayed….

Oh, wait, that was for YouTube. Kindly allow me a fresh start.

Eating healthy, inexpensive and supremely flavorful requires both knowledge and flexibility. Sure, there are some deal breakers. Refined sugar, high fructose corn syrup (HFCS), trans fats, hydrogenated oils, enriched, processed wheat products and the like can all be rightfully called BAD foods. Some of them are very toxic. Even then there are some "bad" foods, like refined sugar, which can be a part of a healthy diet if sufficient moderation and thoughtfulness is employed.

There are also "healthy" eating habits which can be taken too far. Juicing, for instance, has a lot of potential health benefits. You can concentrate the nutritional value of many fruits and vegetables in their natural, uncooked state into a tasty, efficient drink. This is particularly beneficial in a society that tends to skimp on important vegetables.

However, if you are not careful those wonderful juices can produce drinks that are high enough in calories to give Starbucks a run for the money, and which also contain very unhealthy levels of naturally occurring sugars.

This is where food knowledge and flexibility with that knowledge becomes critical. Fortunately, in the age of the internet knowledge is readily available; almost too much of it given the agenda-driven work done by some "nutritionists" who are actually puppets for different interests in the food industry.

That makes information such as found in the following video so valuable. It was posted to the comments of the last column I wrote. I had never seen it before, but have watched it three times recently. It is lengthy, but very well presented, engaging and worth every minute to watch. I highly recommend you put it on your schedule.

If anything else, watching that should have given you some idea of just how much you have been lied to about food and for how long. It also provides a solid launching platform for understanding the biochemistry of eating.

I figure with the video, at least for those that watch it, this will be enough of a soap box stand on nutritional info. Time to get to some vittles.

In the last column I talked about making ribs. Then I remembered that not everyone lives in Houston, so outdoor cooking may not be as appealing for many of you at this time.

This week I opted instead for a great, inexpensive and nutritious basic which is appealing to many a man. Chili. It's a Texas classic, universally loved and a cold weather home run of a meal. You can make it in a large stock pot, or in a slow cooker. I prefer the slow cooker because I don't have to spend a lot of time stirring it to avoid it getting scorched on the bottom of the pot, but don't let not having a slow cooker get in the way. This recipie will be with a large pot in mind.

First, to make good chili you need good chili powder. And to have good chili powder, you have to make it yourself. Trust me, once you make your own and taste it you will never buy it in a store again. The only catch here is that buying the correct chili peppers is usually a little more expensive than buying the processed bullshit powders in residence at your grocery store.

Growing your own peppers and drying them is relatively easy and is a better long term option, but suffice it to say for now that the marginal added expense of making your own chili powder is more than worth it for the quality of you get for doing so.

OK, let's make some chili powder.

For a reasonable supply you will need the following, all of which are available on amazon.com, if not on the shelves of your grocer.

6 ancho chilies, dried, stemmed and seeded.

6 cascabel chilies, dried, stemmed and seeded.

6 chilies de arbol, dried, stemmed and seeded.

Some side notes about the chilies. The anchos are large peppers, generally mild in heat, with a slightly fruity taste. They have a tendency to not be dry enough when purchased to make good powder. This issue can easily be solved by slicing open, removing seeds (which you need to do anyway), and allow them to sit in the open air with the insides exposed for a couple of hours.

Regarding the chilies de arbol. This is your heat. They are the smaller, thin peppers that pack a punch. You can adjust them in numbers to suite your taste for hot food.

OK, once your chilies are prepared, you want to set aside the following ingredients.

3 tablespoons of garlic powder

4 tablespoons of ground cumin*

2 tablespoons dried oregano

2 teaspoons of smoked Hungarian paprika (yes, Hungarian is superior)

Supe up your chili powder a little more by roasting and grinding your own cumin seeds. Simply put a small skillet on medium heat and toss the cumin seeds in. Stir with a wooden spoon for just a while. You will know when they are ready because the oils start to release and you will get a whiff of that. As soon as you smell it remove it from the heat and allow to cool for a minute.* You don't want to burn your cumin seeds.*

Then put them in the coffee grinder and pulse it over and over till they are powdered. Viola! Fresh roasted cumin that is better than the ground cumin from the shelf.

If you don't have a coffee mill, you can do this in a molcajete, but I don't suggest it. Coffee mills are cheap, and molcajetes are a pain in the ass, even if useful for other projects.

Moving ahead, there are two ways to go. I first use a food processor with a serrated blade. Place all the peppers in the food processor and run till they are shredded. It will be a rough shred, not at all like a powder, but that is where the coffee mill comes in. And you can, piecemeal, take the peppers directly to the coffee mill. Same result, just a little more effort.

Use the coffee mill, pulsing regularly till the peppers look like powder. Refill the mill with peppers and repeat till all are processed.

Combine the processed peppers with the remaining ingredients and mix thoroughly.

Your results should look something like this (a sample of my last batch).

click to enlarge

Now, go to your spice cabinet, remove the store-bought chili powder and place directly into nearest trash bin. Now, you can make chili.

Paul's Texas Chili

First, you must understand, that no self-respecting Texan will make chili that contains beans. Sorry, I know I just preached about flexibility, but there are some lines to be drawn in the legume patch. Beans are a great food. But putting them in chili matches up like a tuxedo and a pair of brown shoes. Just don't do it.

For your chili you will need the following:

1 ½ pounds lean ground beef of your choice (also, turkey will do if you want faux, Yankee chili like they eat in New Hampshire and Detroit)

1 (2 if you like the pain like I do) jalapeno pepper, roasted, seeded and finely chopped.*

1 pablano pepper, roasted, deseeded and chopped*

1 medium to large Spanish (white) onion, diced.

20 oz dark ale or beer (alcohol will cook out completely)

28 oz stewed tomatoes

15 oz tomato sauce

3 tablespoons homemade chili powder.

1 tablespoon salt

1 tablespoon fresh roasted ground cumin (I know, TDOM, that is a lot of cumin. Trust me).

1 tablespoon tomato paste

1 tablespoon fresh chopped cilantro (per bowl, optional)

1 tablespoon olive oil

- How to roast peppers

Brown meat in skillet, drain excess grease and set aside.

Heat up large soup pot on medium heat. Add olive oil and then onions. Cook, stirring regularly to sweat the onions. They will become translucent and soft. Should take between 5-10 minutes max.

Add meat and stir in.

Add all other ingredients except tomato paste and cilantro – wet ingredients first, then spices. Raise heat to medium high and bring pot to slow boil, stirring often to keep the bottom from burning.

Reduce heat to low and cover. Allow to cook (simmer) for 4 hours, stirring occasionally. Be sure when you stir to get to the bottom of the pot. Make sure nothing is sticking.

Remove cover, stir in tomato paste and gently raise heat so that it maintains simmering with cover off. Cook for an additional hour to reduce and thicken, stirring every 10 minute or so.

Grab a bowl full (sprinkle with cilantro if you like), a limited amount of saltine crackers, a beer, and a chair in front of a football game.

Forget the sammich and enjoy life.

Kitty Flanagan lectures Women Against Feminism

Jim Muldoon · 10 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Kitty Flanagan, it seems, has read a pamphlet on Feminism, and we're supposed to be in awe of her genius. Watch this video if you can. It's only about three minutes long, but a warning here that the logic really hurts.

http://youtu.be/8iADPHWoJb0

The comedian has a regular slot on Channel 10's The Project. In this she is expected to make comedy of current events and is usually given a topic. This particular show sees Flanagan introduced as a "woman against women against Feminism."

Flanagan is "a little light on the jokey jokes," she tells us up front. From this we can deduce that although billed as a comedian she is actually a politically correct propagandist who attempts to make the medicine go down with a spoonful of laughter.

But tonight, the seriousness of the matter means that the humour can be dispensed with. The political is far more important than the mirth.

The introduction still gets a laugh, as does much of Flanagan's material. The laughter, however, is more ironic jeering. They are most definitely laughing at the women against feminism rather than with them.

Let's not forget these are the same morons who will tut-tut a rude facebook message and call it cyber-bullying, demanding a prison sentence for such behaviour.

Flanagan proposes to "explain Feminism to these misguided lasses." What follows is a demonstration of sarcasm, rather than an explanation of anything. I felt that Flanagan was harsh, condescending, patronising, smarmy and rude. These women have sinned against the one true religion, and Flanagan intends to give them Hell.

Ironically, Flanagan attempts to point out these women's ignorance by showing her own. The cheer squad, firmly aware of the Feminist dogma, laugh and applaud at the appropriate places without asking, for one moment, if any of these things could actually be true.

She first takes to task a woman who claims she has a successful career and is a mother. Flanagan, without any other information on the woman's life whatsoever, decides that this couldn't have happened without Feminism.

Flanagan makes no mention of the Industrial Revolution, without which any ordinary woman's career would consist of a hard rural life. She would be well familiar, for example, in what it is like to strangle, behead, gut and skin something before she ate it. The myriad of inventions that allowed office work and service work (which makes up the majority of female occupations) don't get a mention either.

Moreover, the husbands who work full-time, and sometimes two jobs, so that women can stay home don't get any credit. Nor do the men whose taxes fund the government services that subsidise childcare and maternity leave.

Next, Flanagan wants to remind these nincompoops of the Suffragettes.

> Without them you wouldn't have the vote.

Flanagan's ignorance of history here is astounding. There is no mention here of the Magna Carta, which began the process of Parliamentary rule in England, which eventually brought the Westminister system to Australia. Similarly, the men who died in many wars protecting those freedoms (at their various stages from 1200s to the present day), don't get even a grudging nod.

Not only that, but Australian women had the vote in 1902, and Emmaline Pankhurst's Women's Social and Political Union, better known as the Suffragettes, was formed in 1903. Although it is true that women formed groups in Australia to promote voting for women, they did not resort to the tactics (which included firebombings) of their English counterparts and couldn't properly be called Suffragettes.

It is also worth noting that the majority of British and German men dying in the trenches of World War One did not have the same voting rights as Australian women. They didn't get the vote until 1918.

And, of course, we are all to ignore the obvious doublethink in declaring that women had no political voice, but it was the women who got the politicians to give them the vote.

One woman felt she doesn't need feminism because "she has equality and her own voice."

> What do you reckon that is?

cries Flanagan, assuming that Feminism gave it to her. Here again we need to deal with the doublethink. Women need Feminism because they don't have equality and a voice, yet this woman already has equality and a voice and that must be because Feminists have already given it to her.

Maybe it's just a Patriarchal thing to want your time events linearly.

We then move on to credit cards and mortgages, which Flanagan claims were "not so long ago" unavailable to women. Again the history of banks and credit in the Western world is not as simple as Flanagan would have us believe. Banks have never handed out credit to every and any person who just walked in the door with a penis and a need for cash, and the number of official lending institutions, until recently, (ie not loan sharks) was small. No one without a savings history or collateral got finance.

These days, however, credit is handed out to anyone who can fill out a form. Did we forget the recent Great Financial Crisis? A lot of people blamed banks for giving people loans they could not repay.

But also, since the 1842 Mines Act in Britain, women were progressively taken out of all of the heavy, dirty and dangerous jobs (without Feminist complaint, I might add). In many cases, these were the best paying jobs, and up until the 1960s often the only jobs. Don't forget that up until the 1960s, the Western world was the leading manufacturer. There were more jobs on factory floors than there were in offices.

There was also a Social Contract that evolved. Since women couldn't do the heavy, dirty, dangerous work of construction, heavy manufacturing and mining, employers were coerced, by unions and governments alike, to give a working man a "living" wage, ie a wage that would support him, a wife and kids (again without Feminist complaint – it made "decent" alimony so much more affordable).

Throw into this picture the fact that men were legally responsible for their wives debts, and so would have put some pressure on banks not to sign them up for debts without their knowledge. Fair enough too.

In other words, women and credit was a much more complicated affair that Flanagan lets on.

> One of the reasons that you can write your little sign is because education is available to everyone.

Again, we have a complete fiction masquerading as a fact. The implication here is that there was a time when state funded education was available to males only. This is utter nonsense.

The grain of truth Flanagan relies on goes back to the early 19th Century, when most university places were taken by males in Europe, including Britain. Let's not forget that most people who had a job in those days, with the exceptions of medical doctors, lawyers and religious ministers, did not have a university degree. For those families who could afford the education (and most could not), the choice was usually taken to make an investment in a male child's career.

This was not Patriarchy, as the likes of Flanagan would claim, but simply that most women, if sexually active, would produce lots of children. The technologies of birth control, baby formula as well as the lack of state funded childcare meant that women, regardless of how talented they might be, would have any potential career severely limited. Therefore investing in a male's education made much more financial sense.

However, by the turn of the 20th century, as technologies began to solve these problems and business grew to require more administration and management, it was not uncommon for women to hold university degrees. Many of the Suffragettes were tertiary educated. Pankhurst herself was educated at the elite École Normale de Neuilly in Paris.

Flanagan's piece has a surreal moment. Some women used the word "vagina" as a clear substitute for "woman" in there messages. Flanagan is clearly bothered with this, but doesn't say why. For reasons that are not explained, this woman's face, unlike all the other photographs shown, is deliberately blurred. They only other people who get this treatment are those who are awaiting the verdict of a trial.

Weird.

Lastly, to explain Feminism to these women, Flanagan has done some signs of her own, which are informative although not in the way I think she intended. The first sign says:

> Shut up you idiots

Flanagan promptly disowns the sign she just held up. This seems to be an attempt to remove all responsibility from Flanagan for calling the women idiots. This, of course, is the first true expression of Feminism: There are no consequences for Feminists.

The second sign is more in line with Feminist dogma:

> Feminism is about choice.

Of course, we've just had a smarmy lecture culminating in "Shut up you idiots" for those who chose against Feminism. Is a choice of one any choice at all?

> Choice, ladies. Be grateful you have it.

Yes, choose Feminism or go to the corner until you realise your mistake. When you've thought about your behaviour you can choose again.

> Feminism is about social, political and economic equality.

No, Feminism is about rewriting history so that women are always perceived as victims and underdogs.

There is a bit at the end which is worth watching if you can make it that far. Sometime ago, I wrote about Charlie Pickering and his claim that five out of every three women get beaten or raped. Charlie Pickering, for those who don't know, is the clown who introduces Flanagan at the beginning of the show.

Look at the end, when the camera cuts from Flanagan back to the Project Team. Pickering has his fist raised in what looks like a salute to Flanagan's piece.

If you think it is just rhetoric to refer to Feminism with a capital "F" and describe it as religious zealotry look again at Pickering with the raised fist salute as the rest clap and cheer. I would call the look on his face "triumphant".

Links

http://au.avoiceformen.com/legal/domestic-violence/charlie-pickering-five-out-of-every-three/

MGTOW teacher quits in protest against feminist hate

AVfM Video Source · 11 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Another guy says “to hell with this” and goes Galt:

http://youtu.be/hwjL2xbn2w0

More at MGTOW Teacher 1953.

MGTOW is not a sinking ship...yet

Paul Elam · 11 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

This article presents the challenge of attempting to cover two related but topically different subjects. Being either lazy or pressed for time (take your pick), I am going to give it a shot.

To begin with I want to review some recent events in what is loosely defined as the "man-o-sphere," most notably the realm of Men Going Their Own Way. Trust me, I can imagine the number of groans and eye-rolling going on out there in the conflict weary. The only thing I can say is that I sympathize enough that I have procrastinated this writing for days. I'm pretty sick of it, too.

Then again, there is a problem. AVFM, according to our mission statement, has some inflexible guidelines which we serve without apology or hesitation. To wit, the following:

> AVfM regards gender ideologues and all other agents of misandry as a social malignancy. We do not consider them well-intentioned or honest agents for their purported goals and extend to them no more courtesy or consideration than we would Klansmen, skinheads, neo Nazis, or other purveyors of hate. We will educate them where they are willing to learn, but hold them accountable for their ignorance as much as their actions;

Keeping in mind that the promulgation of misogyny is ultimately misandric, in that it is a catalyst for moral and intellectual atrophy in men, it presents us with the current state of affairs between AVFM and some in the "MGTOW community" who lately have more resembled Social Justice Warriors than what I have always imagined Men Going Their Own Way to be.

The first important distinction here is to point out clearly that there is no rift between AVFM and the MGTOW philosophy. AVFM supports MGTOW, the marriage strike, ghosting and permanent bachelorhood, along with every other phenomenon now visible in a culture of men who have seen through the façade of the Matrix and opted for the road less traveled.

What we (and by we I mean all those who subscribe to the AVFM mission) do not support is class hatred, gender supremacy and gender ideology. Those would be the very things that have come to characterize a strident minority of men who have taken up the MGTOW banner as a flag of war against women and all men who disagree with them. It is ultimately, like all forms of "justified" hate, a war on themselves and a war on young men sucked into the pit of their perpetual acrimony.

For those who may read this and feel concern that it fosters too much division, I argue that there is no division. AVFM was never aligned with the agents of hate. AVFM was never aligned with the victim mandate of identity politics.

I would also argue that this is a needed culling of the intellectual and emotional gene pool, the likes of which is no stranger in our history. I remember the Chicken Little woe-saying of a number of "men's advocates" when we invited women to stand beside us and speak up for the rights of men and boys. I remember much of the same "sky is falling in" chants when we welcomed gay men to join our ranks, not as gay men, but as men who happened to be gay. The same reaction happened, even more hostilely, when we pushed hard to demonstrate that when we said apolitical that we meant it.

We were attacked as left wing feminist plants, as right wing nut cases, as Libertarian fascists. And many people up and quit associating with us, or better yet, dedicated much of their work to attacking us instead of attacking those who were actually causing the problems we are all trying to address.

I am not complaining. In fact, it is something I celebrate. With each "division" that AVFM fomented in its own ranks, there emerged a more cohesive and effective team of activists, cognizant of our mission, able to grasp the intellectual subtleties it contains, and willing to weather the backlash from the divisive, ideological and sometimes bigoted individuals that we sent packing from our ranks.

That philosophy; that adherence to our principles, has made AVFM better and stronger. It is not going to change just because this particular culling was comprised of humans with penises who also happen to loathe feminists.

As I said before, this does not come to us unexpected. In fact, potential problems with what some men might do with the MGTOW philosophy was something I pointed to five years ago in my first article on Zeta masculinity. And mind you, the term Zeta male was getting traction on the internet before the term MGTOW was. Allow me to share some segments from what I wrote in 2010 about what I saw happening with young men, including what could happen to men who treated the MGTOW exit as though it was a destination rather than just a turn:

> In that light, the path they are on is not really the road to manhood, but simply a retreat from the effacing malice woven into the very fabric of their developmental lives. And it takes them not to safe ground, but directly into a dismal culture of shallowness and self-indulgence; a realm of options without obligations; of self-gratification without self-awareness or self-discipline. It is the death march of the western male, destined for a withering end ensured by intellectual, psychological and moral atrophy.

Also, as I proposed, an alternative for Zeta Males:

> He doesn't seek power, but justice. And he has one overarching feature largely absent in the world around him.
>
> He cares about those lost young men who were ambushed coming out of the womb. And he will strive to make himself an example, living proof that there are other roads to take than the ones that lead to self-hatred and self-destruction.

It is, of course, any man's choice, including those who tie their masculine identity to YouTube channels, to simply not give a fuck about whether they are an example to young men of a functional life. Just as they are free to convince themselves that functionality can be achieved by avoiding women alone.

Simply put, there is no moral mandate that I know of which insists that men give a shit at all about anyone but themselves; an idea which some who identify as MGTOW validate with every waking breath.

And it should be acknowledged that my position on this has the danger of moving toward coercion, or even worse, coerced masculinity. There is no denying that the danger is there and the only way I know to prevent that danger from being realized is to constantly remind people that this writing reflects the philosophy embodied in a website. It is not a prescription for manhood or a mandate for compliance.

It is, however, a guiding principle in the content we will publish. We are an advocacy group for men and boys. We can't claim being that kind of thing without giving a damn about what options we are presenting to them.

As I said in the Plague of Modern Masculinity:

> Our most functional response thus far is to check out and go our own way, but I contend that an exit is not a destination, just a needed removal from the line of fire; a chance to collectively regroup and rethink. Remember that the young men festering at those crossroads have, in their own way, checked out, too. It isn't looking too good on them.

I don't think I have been proven wrong. We have a generation of men who are catching on to the idea of shunning marriage. Good on 'em.

We also have a growing group of men who believe the only way to keep themselves safe is to don armor and swing a sword at anything that moves, mired in their own animus for the world, and for themselves.

I will occasionally speak to that around here because our young men deserve something better than slow strangulation and the gangrene of rotting resentment. Those who see that as an “unnecessary division” are welcome to that view, but I would urge them to consider what else they are willing to surrender in order to maintain unity with toxic allies.

I am not saying that MGTOW has been made a lost cause by those in its own ranks. However, I am saying it is possible. One look at feminism will tell you that.

Right now, though, the spirit of the MGTOW philosophy appears as though it is being reduced to a huge, lumbering ship, taking on water and more passengers at the same time.

The passengers on that ship do not need enabling. They need life lifeboats, and few among their ranks have them to give. Even fewer would share space in them if they did.

AVFM has always been a lifeboat. We always will. If that is causing divisions, then I say let it be.

Zen Men Spring semester fundraiser

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 11 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Goal progress: $5,527 out of $10,000

Since you funded our founding in November 2013, Zen Men has captured the minds of students across the nation in its support for men's rights in Kennesaw State.

This is all exciting news, but as we grew, so did our bills. Activism is hard work, and we depend on your kindness to keep going. We have kept all promises when you trusted us with $515 as startup funding, and then $13,120 to host a historic conference.

Remember that we are here because the American university is no longer a place of learning, it is a ground for witch hunts. Young men are dropping out in droves, but who can blame them? We have learned from Duke, North Dakota University and the University of Toronto that all it takes is one accusation to put innocent men in danger, due process be damned.

Our job is to stop the madness, but as low-income students, we cannot run Zen Men out of pocket. We need help paying for operating costs, materials, and most importantly, men's rights missions. Among other plans, we want to bring down a speaker from the Foundation for Individual Rights in Education to remind KSU of its obligation to protect the rights of its male students.

Any pledge, no matter how small, will be used to tell our schools that hatred of men and boys is not acceptable in our professors and textbooks.

The fundraiser ends on January 31st, but if everyone reading this gives $5, then it can end today. If we do not reach the goal, then we will have to make cuts, which means the size of our splash in 2015 is up to you. Will you please donate and share this page with your loved ones to protect innocent young men on campus?

Thank you for helping your sons take back their futures. We cannot do it without you.

Donate

Want to know even more about what you are investing in? Be sure to watch my interview with Paul Elam from A Voice for Men.

More interest from the University of New South Wales

Jim Muldoon · 11 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I had an email from a young man at the University of New South Wales. He is a media student and wanted an interview of some kind. I invited him to forward some questions, which he did. I thought I would share with you the contents of my reply as I think the content may be of some interest. –JM

Hi [Name Redacted],

Sorry about the slow reply. Hope it is still some use for you. I will answer each of your questions in turn:

1. Could you please state your position in A Voice for Men and your age? If you are uncomfortable with giving me your age that's fine, but it's a standard in our news writing assignments.

I am the editor of AVfM Australia.

2. Could you sum up in your words what A Voice for Men does and its ideals?

AVfM Australia is an online magazine that provides a voice, or more correctly voices, in support of men and boys. We do this because we believe that the current zeitgeist is misandric.

3. A Voice for Men's stance is anti-feminist. There have been accusations that the organisation is misogynistic in nature. How would you respond to these accusations?

Being anti-feminist and misogynistic are not one and the same. The claim that A Voice for Men is misogynistic because it is anti-feminist relies on a dishonest link between the two.

There are a number of female contributors to the main site of A Voice for Men. At this present time I just published a female contributor's work for AVfM Australia. These are independent women, in every sense of the word, with their own opinions. Misogynists would not invite women to participate on their websites.

Are these women anti-feminist? Yes.

Is anyone at A Voice for Men misogynistic? No. I challenge anyone to read any of my own articles and find anything that could seriously classed as misogynistic.

4. Do you believe there is a culture of 'everyday sexism' in Australia? If so, against men and/or women?

The Feminist slogan, "The personal is political" has grown to the extent where even the most trivial of behaviour is interpreted through the lens of "sexism". This is where notions of "everyday sexism" get promoted as being somehow not just valid, but important. The irony, of course, is that this "everyday sexism" is only ever a one-way street, which in itself is a sexist notion. For example, the everyday sexism that occurs whenever a heavy box needs lifting, or something requires digging, never gets a mention.

There is, however, among the legal, academic and political elites a strong culture of misandry. This misandry is growing in intensity. This is not nitpicking over who gets to lift heavy boxes, however. Boys, en masse, are falling behind at school because the education system is failing them. Men, en masse, are being mistreated in the Family Court. Men, en masse, are being systematically marginalised and penalised in the area of domestic violence. These are serious matters with serious consequences.

5. Does a Voice for Men have representation on university campuses? (I'm interested specifically at the University of New South Wales.)

No.

6. Could you provide some recent statistics of abuse against males?

Rather than get lost in the world of statistics, let us consider the issue of Boko Haram, the Nigerian group who became famous when they recently kidnapped a group of schoolgirls. This same group has, on a number of occasions, gone to schools and slaughtered all of the males they could find. On each occasion, the girls at the school were simply let go.

The repeated mass murders don't get anything like the same publicity. In fact, had Boko Haram not kidnapped the girls they would not have received world wide publicity no matter how many boys and young men they killed.

http://au.avoiceformen.com/feminism/the-empathy-gap-is-shockingly-real/

http://www.avoiceformen.com/men/boys/boko-haram-bring-back-our-boys/

7. Does A Voice for Men have a general consensus on the Elliot Rodgers shootings and on the perpetrator himself? Could you provide your personal opinion?

Elliott Rodger was a mentally ill young man who killed four men and two women, and injured others. There has been no media reports on the sex of those who were injured. Since his parents divorce, when he was eight, there was a history of mental illness. The diagnosis seems to be in dispute, but it is certain that Elliott Rodger had serious issues from then on.

Also documented was his addiction to Xanax, which was causing him problems just prior to the killings.

http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-2648379/Virgin-killer-Elliot-Rodgers-Xanax-addiction-withdrawn-anxious-days-murderous-rampage.html

To call his autobiographical ramblings a "manifesto" gives the document more gravitas than it deserves. There are sentences in it which, if taken out of context, would suggest a misogynistic streak, but the truth is that Rodger angry because he was still a virgin. His anger seems to have been aimed at his peers. When he talks about women, he seems to refer to the young women in his immediate social sphere. Those he considered potential girlfriends. He also has as much hatred for the men he believed was having sex with these women as the women themselves.

Elliot Rodger has no link to A Voice for Men whatsoever. It also seems that his link to men's rights is tenuous at best. Apparently he frequented a site that was against Pick Up Artists. I know little about Pick Up Artists, but being against them doesn't make anyone an advocate for men's rights.

We, at a Voice for Men, have a strict code of non-violence. I don't call myself an expert on all websites that promote men's rights, but none that I am familiar with would, in any way, encourage or condone any killing. Elliot Rodger is not seen as a hero or a martyr. He was a deeply disturbed young man who committed a terrible crime. Our thoughts and prayers go to all of the victims and their families, including Elliot Rodger's own family.

8. Does A Voice for Men have a general consensus on the #YesAllWomen social media campaign? Could you provide your personal opinion?

This campaign has taken a tragedy and unscrupulously used it to their own advantage. Like the example I gave earlier of Boko Haram, the fact that Rodger killed four men means nothing to the phony social justice warriors. They are determined to use the deaths of the two women, and selections from Rodger's rantings, to make themselves out as "victims", regardless of the how trivial their complaints might be.

http://www.thedailybeast.com/articles/2014/05/27/how-yesallwomen-became-trivial-a-noble-hashtag-loses-its-bearings.html

9. Has A Voice for Men seen heavy opposition in the wake of the Elliot Rodgers shooting? What message would you give to give to your critics?

We have seen opposition since our inception. This is just the latest excuse for the sanctimonious outpourings. The criticism seldom does us any actual harm. Those who come to our site will see well reasoned articles on a range of topics, many written by females. None of these articles promote misogyny or violence.

On the whole, though, these so called outcries are really just preaching to the converted. The Feminists will use each article against the MRA's (or whatever they call us) as a rallying cry for the faithful. It is unlikely that any of them would actually visit our sites to check the claims being made.

10. On A Voice for Men's website the mission statement states that it aims "to promote a culture that values equal treatment under the law for all human beings." Does that mean the organisation believes in gender equality and closing the gender pay gap?

No, it means "to promote a culture that values equal treatment under the law for all human beings." The problem here are the terms "gender equality" and the "gender pay gap". What do they actually mean?

Let's look a the notion of the "gender pay gap". It is illegal to have a man and a woman doing the same job for different pay. The reason for this "gap" is that women take time from full-time employment to have children. Therefore they have, on average, less experience in that particular industry. Even when the child is of school age, many women still work only part-time jobs. The availability of these part time jobs depend on the industry that they are in. It is for these reasons that the average wage between men and women has a "gap".

To achieve "gender equality" we would, as a society, have to insist that for 50% of those couples, the man looks after the children (working part-time or not at all). Not only would this achieve "gender equality" on the child-raising front, but it would also stop the so called "gender pay gap".

That level of social engineering is Orwellian to say the least, and I do not think it would be a good thing.

I hope these answers are of some help for your article.

Regards,

Jim Muldoon

Sistas in America have very good reason to be "Frustrated"

Mumia Ali · 11 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Author's Note: This article originally appeared on The Obsidian Files, on Mar 14, 2013. It is in regards to controversy over a film called Frustrated that upset some black feminists.

"They drew first blood."
-John Rambo

During the recent conversation taking place over the popular teledrama "Scandal" one of my regular reader/commenters –Hollenhund – alerted me to the fact that apparently, there was a fierce discussion taking place over at the blog Hooking Up Smart about a rash of Black American Men heading off to Brazil for the express purpose of availing themselves of the local ladies, as an alternative to what's on offer back home. Using the link Hollenhund provided, I hopped over to HUS, read what was being said, and then checked out the YouTube link provided, which leads you to an under one hour-long documentary called "Frustrated: Black American Men In Brazil." I had intended to take up the matter but forgot all about it in the the crush of my daily activities – until I saw the following link in my Twitter feed by one Ms. Demetria Lucas, the self-proclaimed "Belle in Brooklyn." Ms. Lucas has saw it fit to weigh in on the whole "Frustrated" kerfuffle at The Root, and it was her dipping her toe into these controversial waters, that reignited my interested in the matter – largely because of the twisted and disingenuous manner in which she chose to cover the issue. Grab coffee, this is gonna be good.

First, let's begin with the fact that Ms. Lucas gets off on the wrong foot, by suggesting that the film "Frustrated" just dropped out of the sky – assisted by World Star Hip Hop – made by a bunch of Brotha Losers crying into their beer and wanting to throw the American Sistahood under the proverbial bus. Alas, much to the chagrin of Ms. Lucas I'm afraid, nothing could be further from the truth, for we find out in the very film "Frustrated" itself, its origins and the reason for its existence -it was made, as a response to a drive-by hitpiece written in Essence magazine – the premiere magazine for Black Womenwith issues – on how Black Men were flocking to Brazil for less-than-savory, "sex tourist" purposes. "Frustrated" attempts to offer the Black male perspective on why at least some Brothas are voting with their feet when it comes to looking for love, and yes, sex. Among other things (because, it couldn't be possible that any Man, especially Black, could have any other motives, desires, interests or aspirations in life, that doesn't go farther than the tip of his dick – right?).

That's Strike One, Madam Lucas.

Next, while "the Belle" acknowledges that quite a few of the Brothas featured in "Frustrated" were at least passably attractive, what she doesn't mention – and not by accident in the view of this writer – is that the single biggest detractor of Brothas in the film, is a grossly overweight, facially unattractive, loudmouthed, "sassy" American Sista, talking loud and saying absolutely nothing. It is clear that she is hoppin' mad about the fact that American Brothas would rather take their chances in a foreign land, rather than to put up with her. As the great NFL running back, former Eagle Ricky Watters once famoulsly said: "For who? For what?"

Lucas' lie of omission is completely understandable, one, because it allows her deluded self to sidestep the painful reality of the fact that one of the many problems that beset American Sistas is one of the scale – they be damn-near breaking it, and this is coming from a friend of the Zaftig Woman. But Sistas have pushed passed being "zaftig", "thick", "curvy", or heck, even what they used to call "pleasingly plump" – no, they are fat. Fat Albert, Eddie Murphy playing the Clumps, Nutty Professor & the Big Pun-looking chick from Norbit, Wilson Fisk the Kingpin, King Robert of Baretheon from Game of Thrones, Jabba the Hutt, fat. It's gotten so bad, that even the First Lady of the United States, Michelle Obama, has had to step in. It's gotten so outta control that outfits, like Boston U's Black Women's Health Study, has had to step in. Everyone who has at least one good eye, knows that Black Women in the USA, have an inordinate obesity problem. That's the fact, Jack. And it's gotten so bad that, for at least a not insignificant number of Brothas, going down south – way, way south – of the border, is a much better option, than having to put up with a chick who's looking like a cobra-headed manatee with an attitude. Don't take my word for it, see the film for yourself.

And then, compare and contrast with the ladies from Brazil featured in "Frustrated" – and you tell me who you would choose if you could do so. Yea, that's what I thought.

That's Strike Two, Demetria.

And finally, there's Ms. Lucas' contention – which is the same faux-argument put forth in both of Essence's hitpieces (as Lucas rightfully – for once – points out, Essence did a followup piece on its original 2006 article, this time focusing on the Dominican Republic) and the Sista She-Walrus in "Frustrated," that the Brothas featured in the film were somehow being "delusional", because all they were doing (and could do, since none of them were married – female projection, strikes again) was buying sex from Women who were somehow using them for their cash -despite the fact that the Brothas in the film said something completely different. Sure, they don't deny the fact that Brazil has a thriving sex trade, and that at least some Brothas partake of it – but they also point out the fact that many romantic attachments and the like are not of a fiduciary nature at all, and even the more common everyday interactions with Women in Brazil are of the kind rarely if ever seen in Black American life (they don't call it "Mean Muggin" for nothing). On top of that – as the retired Brotha Ms. Lucas refers to in her article – makes clear, there is more to life, and Brazil, than merely Women. Lots of Brothas get the chance to experience life outside of that which they know in the USA, which, let's face it, can be and usually is stifling, from a racial standpoint. Being in a country that has more peoples of African descent than any other outside of the African continent itself, can give a Brotha a whole another perspective on life. For all the grousing on the part of the Sistahood about how Brothas never want to travel and broaden their horizons, one would think that the Sistas could be happy for Brothas finally taking their first steps out into a new world. But that would sound too much like right. Besides, the butthurt is too much to bear.

And it is this, that many Brothas who visit – or even remain – in Brazil – have made explicitly clear in "Frustrated". For Ms. Lucas, and others of her ilk, to suggest otherwise, is tantamount to her calling all these Brothas bald-faced liars – or dimwitted dupes, easily swayed by the swaying hips of a Brazilian chica walking by. I mean, could you imagine if the genders were reversed yet retaining the same argument – "Terry McMillan was just being duped by Winston Shakespeare, she really didn't go the Carribbean to get away and relax", and so forth? Why, Ms. Lucas would be leading the charge in calling every Brotha under heaven that dreaded "M-word"; we'd never hear the end of it. Speaking of which, where was Ms. Lucas on the issue of Sistas doing a bit of sex tourism of their own? It ain't like it's a closely guarded state secret, dontcha know. Indeed, like Ms. McMillan clearly showed the rest of us many years back, it's often seen as a triumph of the Sistahood that they can go to a faraway place and enjoy the goods of the young stuff. Why begrudge the Brothas the same pleasure? I guess Ms. Lucas and Co. never heard of the right to freedom of association, huh? At least not when it comes to Brothas, anyway. Hmm.

As for the idea that all of the Brothas featured in "Frustrated" are single and that this somehow is a telling sign that there's something wrong with them rather than with any Woman, American or Brazilian – I almost fell out of my chairing laughing at Ms. Lucas' desparate grasping of straws. Only a Woman (in this case, a Black American one) would put marriage as the sine qua non goal of Male-Female romantic interaction, and it couldn't occur to Ms. Lucas that maybe – just perhaps – these Brothas weren't necessarily looking for wives in the first place. That maybe they were just looking for casual companionship. Or just a series of flings. Or maybe a live-in girlfriend. Or maybe a combination of all the above. In any event, as you clearly see in "Frustrated" yourself, none of the Brothas there look to be the least bit, well, frustrated – indeed, if anything, it's the American Sistas back stateside who look flustered. They have every reason to be.

And that's because, quiet as its kept and long before it became fashionable among our White Brothers in the Manosphere, Black Men have been silently voting with their feet in a myriad of ways from "Black relationships" for decades now – and one of those ways involves leaving the country altogether, in search of feminine delights and company that is getting increasingly hard to find here. What the Sistarati didn't anticipate, didn't think through, got the calculations wrong, was the prospect of Brothas deciding to seek other options – options, I might add, that don't have a blessed thing to do with Becky. So we can finally put that old canard to bed. “Frustrated” makes clear, that the vast majority of Brothas, when they can choose, choose Black Women – just not necessarily the ones on offer here. The reasons why should, at this juncture, really go without saying.

Strike Three, Ms. Lucas.

You’re Out.

Mammoth Futrelle enters the age of the internet

Paul Elam · 12 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Buckle your seatbelts, gents and ladies, David Futrelle is taking over the internet! After years scraping around at the bottom of the traffic barrel, Mantitz has suddenly gone viral. As you can see from the chart here, he went from an internet non-entity to what would appear to be serious competition for the likes of A Voice for Men and a host of other websites which have actually built a regular readership based on content that was not only provocative, but remarkable in enough circles to create backlinks across the interwebz.

The gynecomastia plagued mammoth hunter's sudden, meteoric rise into alleged relevance can only be explained by one thing. There must have been a stratospherically viral article (usually meaning more than two paragraphs) penned by the Wizard of Wallow that must have been picked up by every major media outlet in the mainstream.

Trouble is, we could not find it. A complete search of his website for something that coincided with his liftoff into the upper echelons of Alexa rankings, only turned up more of his usual fare. Quote mining, distortions, lies, poorly written snark and hundreds of comments, most of which have nothing to do with the OP and everything to do with kittens.

Not to be cruel, but if your readers are more interested in kittens than in what you have to say, it makes becoming an internet juggernaut a little more challenging

So, that leaves us with only one other conclusion about David's strut-worthy presence on Alexa. He paid for it. Yes, for those who cannot create real traffic, it can be purchased. Of course, purchasing a fake Alexa ranking is, well, fake. But what better tool for web presence could there ever be for a fake writer, with fake ideas waging a fake war against fake enemies for the approval of fake allies?

A fake Alexa ranking fits on David Futrelle like a day old bucket of fried chicken fits in his lap . And it will probably last about as long given it requires regular financial maintenance.

If you want to run on smoke and mirrors, though, you have to have plenty of both. And it appears that David has put both his boobs in one bucket (assuming the chicken is mostly gone at this point).

One far more reliable way to interpret a websites relevant importance on the internet is with Google PageRank. Don't let the word "Page" fool you. It has nothing to do, per se, with your ranking on a page. It is simply the namesake of the man, Larry Page, who developed an algorithm to determine a web pages relative importance on the internet.

The scale goes in value from 0 to ten. I have opted use the interpretation of these meanings of each of these numbers from redfusionmedia.com. They are as follows:

> 0 – You are NOT listed on Google, or you have been kicked off. Not good.
>
> 1 – Very poor. The only good part about a one is you are listed.
>
> 2 – Poor. The good news, you can improve.
>
> 3 – Average. Most sites are about a 3.
>
> 4 – Above Average. You're starting to get warm.
>
> 5 – Good. With a 5 you may land on the first page of some search terms, give yourself a hand.
>
> 6 – Great. You've done some good work. You'll be able to contend for some top positions.
>
> 7 – You're on fire! If you have a seven, you're a top site. Most small and medium size companies should dream of sevens.
>
> 8 – You must be huge. Like ESPN.com
>
> 9 – Your bigger than ESPN, like CNN.com or Yahoo.com
>
> 10 – Reserved for the best, I've found 4 – Google.com (of course), Microsoft.com, Apple.com, and Adobe.com

Now, for the PageRank's of sites you may be familiar with. You can verify here.

Wehuntedthemammoth.com – 0 (yes, Mantitz, with his sudden rise to fame, has a PageRank of not having a PageRank)

Goodmenproject.com – 2 (PageRank is POOR. One has to wonder where their newfound Alexa, which used to trail ours for quite some time, then surpassed us with Futrellian quickness, came from the same internet sweatshop employed by Mantitz)

Avoiceformen.com – 5 (Though we will wait to give ourselves a hand till we hit 7)

Jezebel.com – 7 (600 million in Gawker Media cash has its advantages)

With a glance at Futrelle's Alexa, you will note that he seems to have a disproportionate audience in Brazil. I am not knocking that. We have Brazilian readers, too, but we have always attributed that to our Brazilian affiliate site, published in Brazil's national language, Portuguese.

All I can say to David at this point is keep doing what you are doing. Perhaps you can also take a hint from the goodmenproject.com, who long made it a habit to auto refresh their site every 12 minutes in order to mislead advertisers with the number of page impressions they were actually getting for their money.

After all, you do have that in common with them, don't you? Lies for cash.

Warren Farrell Interview at ICMI 2014, Detroit

AVfM Video Source · 12 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Back in June 2014, Steve Brule interviewed Dr. Warren Farrell at the International Conference on Men's Issues. Steve's finally released this fascinating interview here:

We suggest you subscribe to StudioBrule.

Cosby in Hamilton: Counterprotestors in support of Cosby face attacks

Dan Perrins · 12 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

On Friday January 9, 2015, despite calls for his shows to be canceled due to allegations of rape, Bill Cosby was in Hamilton Ontario to finish his tour of Canada. Cosby on the 2 previous nights had shows in London and Kitchener Ontario before his tour landed him in my backyard Hamilton. At the 2 previous shows Cosby and those who attended were met with protesters.

They braved some fairly nasty weather for their "we-blindly-believe" campaign. The temperatures in the double negatives Celsius, nasty winds and blowing snow.It seemed as if mother nature was trying help those protesters whiteout due process and throw the legal system back into the ice age.

For those of you who have been living in a media blackout at the South Pole and are not aware the allegations of rape by Cosby number around 2 dozen. They are also decades old.

There have also been a number of women who have come forward to defend Cosby.

That's all there is right now about 2 dozen women have made allegations they were raped by Cosby after he drugged their drinks. No charges have been laid yet which means no trial has occurred and that also means he has not been found guilty.

Some history about Bill. He enlisted in the Navy in 1956 and trained as a hospital corpsman. Cosby then went on to serving on ships before finally ending up at Bethesda Naval Hospital where he worked with Korean war veterans. Cosby also became an accomplished runner while he was in navy.

And even though Cosby was faithfully serving his country, his country was failing him by treating him like a second class citizen.When the navy track team competed Bill was forced to eat in the kitchens of the restaurants the team stopped to eat at.

Cosby was honorably discharged in 1960 and went on to Temple University.

Bill has experienced an ism of hate. Bill lived through a time when racism was still accepted by large groups of Americans.

And now his large groups of people in his country, the country he faithfully served and risked his life for, wants to treat Bill like a second class citizen.

AGAIN

In fact that desire to treat Cosby like a second class citizen has spread like influenza beyond the borders of America into Canada and most of the English speaking world. They want to deny a man, who faithfully served his country, his human right to the rule of law, innocent until proven guilty, and due process.

Cosby is black man but the hate fueled ism which desires to erode the foundation of justice and deny him his human rights this time around is not racism. It's feminism.

I have no idea what happened all those years ago. Neither does anyone else outside of Cosby and his accusers in all likelihood.

Knowing there would be some protesters at Cosby's Hamilton show I put together a small team to go down and advocate for due process and the rule of law.

And the most basic of human rights, not to be judged because of how you were born.

Here are a couple of videos of what happened at the Cosby stop in Hamilton. There's more to come, as some interesting things happened that night.

I would also like to say hi to a guy I only know as “Bob.” He showed up with his own sign which said “innocent until proven guilty.” So it isn’t AVfM alone who recognizes this high-tech lynching for what it is.

There were other folks just walking by or going into the show who also agreed with our message about due process and the rule of law and crazy ideas like “innocent until proven guilty.” I thoroughly enjoyed interacting with them.

Our ranks grew a little more that night.

The high-tech lynching of William H. Cosby

Mumia Ali · 12 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

"This is not an opportunity to talk about difficult matters privately or in a closed environment. This is a circus. It's a national disgrace. And from my standpoint, as a black American, it is a high-tech lynching for uppity blacks who in any way deign to think for themselves, to do for themselves, to have different ideas, and it is a message that unless you kowtow to an old order, this is what will happen to you. You will be lynched, destroyed, caricatured by a committee of the U.S. Senate rather than hung from a tree."
-Clarence Thomas, Associate Justice Of the United States Supreme Court, Oct 11, 1991

The above words were uttered by then-nominee for the US Supreme Court, one Mr. Clarence Thomas, nearly a quarter of a century ago. It was said in the midst of what some, and this writer is in agreement with the notion, of what could only be rightly described as a wanton witch hunt. Thomas, accused by a former staffer, Ms. (now Prof.) Anita Hill of "sexual harassment", had his name and reputation sullied in the worst of ways. Though he was eventually confirmed to the nation's High Court, his life would never be the same.

Such things are nothing new to African American Men; indeed, the country's historical record is littered with instances of false or otherwise sensationalized accusations of sexual assault and worse, often lodged by White Women – witness last fall's Hollaback!'s "anti-street harassment" PSA shown world wide on YouTube, indicting working and lower class Black Men as sexual predators – nearly a century after the premiere of the film "Birth of a Nation". It's a very, very old story, sordid and rotten as a whorehouse at low tide.

From the Tulsa Race War, to the Rosewood Massacre, to the Scottsboro Boys, to Emmet Till and beyond, Black Men have been constantly the target of vicious and more often than not fallacious allegations of sexual assault, mainly against White Women – and often, with deadly results. Indeed, the historical record shows, with grim clarity, that a majority of the racially motivated lynchings, race riots and massacres that have occurred in the country, came about as a direct result of such baseless allegations.

As 2014 drew to a close – a year dramatically punctuated by a string of events that would be hard to dismiss as anything but a War on Black Men – one of Black America's national treasures, William H. "Bill" Cosby – was himself subject to a high-tech lynching. Not on the US Senate floor, as was the case in Justice Thomas, but rather, in what seems to be a close-knit mass media assault on his enduring legacy.

More than a dozen Women at last count, most of whom were White (fashion model icon Beverly Johnson is a notable exception) have stepped forward, all with charges and allegations that Cosby sexually assaulted them, using drugs and drink as his modus operandi. Even though prosecutors have declined to bring any formal charges against Cosby, and to date none of the accusers have pressed any charges of their own, each passing day seems to bring more such claims of abuse…claims that have no material evidence, no witnesses and no court date attached to them.

And already, the ordeal has taken its toll on Cosby; late last year he resigned his board position with Temple University, an institution with which he has been joined at the hip for at least a generation. Protestors and hecklers have showed up at his shows in Canada, and famed attorney Gloria Allred continues her on-air media sorties against the actor/comedian.

In a dramatic show of support, both Cosby's real-life wife of nearly half a century, Mrs. Camille Cosby, and his television wife from "the Cosby Show", Ms. Phylicia Rashad, have come before the media to defend Cosby's reputation and good name, and also to point out that the media's rush to judgment and shoddy reporting led to the recent UVA/Rolling Stone "gang rape" fiasco. Both ladies have urged the American public to reserve their judgment until all of the facts – to be determined by a court of law – are in, and to resist a mob mentality afoot among the social justice warrior crowd. In response, the Feminist Lobby and their allies in the Cathedral Media have attacked Mrs. Cosby and Ms. Rashad, as turncoats to Women everywhere, facts or truth, be damned.

Many have speculated on the timing of these mass-allegations against Cosby, and have raised their eyebrows in supicion; to be frank, and I'm no conspiracy theorist, I share their skepticism. After all, in an age where all violent crime, including rape and sexual assault, are at all-time lows, one would think that any Woman who was attacked in such a manner would only be all-too eager to report it to the authorities. But, as my AVFM colleague, Ms. Janet Bloomfield has recently pointed out, there can be ulterior motives for a Woman, or in this case a group of them, to make such outrageous charges. It certainly tallies with the American historical record as we have it with regard to Black Men, that's for sure.

For my money, I don't think this is just about money, as many have suggested; no doubt, I think there is a fiduciary motive. But, as Clarence Thomas so astutely noted so long ago, I think there is a desire on the part of some of the American public, to want to silence those among the Black race, who dare to think outside the box, and to give voice to their heterodox views. Surely, by now everyone reading this will be well aware of what I am talking about with regard to Cosby; a decade ago, during a gala celebration commemorating the 50th anniversary of the famed Brown v. Board of Education Supreme Court decision, ending forever Jim Crow "separate but equal" doctrine in the country's public schools, Cosby delivered what has become known as the "Poundcake Speech" – where Cosby was plain spoken and brutally blunt about the very real internal struggles and problems, foibles and even pathology, that beset the nation's most vulnerable African American sections. His speech was barely over before certain voices within the Black Establishment was calling for his head on a pike, for "airing dirty laundry" within earshot of White folks. Books were written about asking if whether he was out of his mind; charges were made that he was serving the interests of racist Whites who wanted an out to visit their hatred onto Blacks; and still others charged that Cosby was "blaming the victim" – poor and lower class African Americans – instead of pointing to "systemic" forces that held them back. Overnight, Cosby was seen as a pariah by much of respectable Black America, upheld by perhaps its small but not insignificant conservative bloc for saying what needed to be said. I honestly do think there is a move afoot to sully his reputation in light of these facts, among other notable actions taken during his career – one that stands, sadly, as one of the relative few among the pantheon of Black luminaries and celebrities that has been a tireless advocate and supporter of the upliftment of Black Americans.

Does any of this mean that it is not possible for Cosby to be a rapist? Absolutely not – history has also shown us that otherwise upstanding and respected people can be guilty of committing some of the most heinous crimes known to humankind. But that's just it – Cosby hasn't been found guilty; in fact, Cosby hasn't even been charged with a crime. And if the past century of lynchings, riots, race wars and massacres, not to mention the ordeal of Justice Clarence Thomas a few decades ago proves anything, it is that the only appropriate forum to hash out the facts and find out the truth, is the courts – not the mass media.

As one of our most famed Americans, Mr. Bill Cosby deserves his day in court…

…not his name dragged through the mud, by a mob of mostly White Women.

Feminists love statistics – the real sexual assault and violence statistics in Australia

Paul Elam · 13 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists love statistics. This started as an argument on the internet. I had commented on a November 13, 2014 article[1] in the Sydney Morning Herald, which quoted the Australian Labor politician and then opposition MP Tanya Plibersek on why she is a feminist. The piece did not mention it, but it was clear that it was in response to an earlier statement by the contemporary Foreign Minister Julie Bishop, asserting that she is not a feminist[2] and was generally in the spirit of the tit-for-tat style of Australian politics. They were the usual things one hears from feminists; that it's a challenge to have both kids and a career, but that feminism helps. The pay gap. The 1 in 5 women "thing."

…At that statement, I paused, having not come across that statistic here, I thought it originated from an infamous American college campus rape study, unproven to apply in Australia. I thought so, because it sounded similar, but upon rereading the article I noticed that it was a slightly different statement:

"I am a feminist because I know it's unacceptable that one in every five Australian women will experience sexual assault and one in every three Australian women will experience domestic violence in their lifetimes."

The person I was arguing with was very kind to point out where this figure might have come from and that is how I became acquainted with the Australian Bureau of Statistics Personal Safety Study.

This "1 in 5" figure is extremely prevalent. Almost every Australian site dealing with family and sexual violence mentions it. They include it in their brochures and online graphics, which commonly look like this, this one being from Australia's National Organisation for Women's Safety (ANROWS)[3]:

As one can see there is a 1 in x theme throughout. The actual data, Table 1 of the 2012 PPS looks like this[4]:

Australian Bureau of Statistics

49060DO001_2012 Personal Safety, Australia, 2012

Released at 11.30am (Canberra time) Wed 11 Dec 2013

Table 1 EXPERIENCE OF VIOLENCE, Type of violence

	Males		Females		Persons
	'000	%	'000	%	'000	%
Whether experienced violence since the age of 15
Did not experience violence since the age of 15	4,318.2	51.0	5,174.8	59.2	9,493.0	55.2
Experienced violence since the age of 15(a)	4,148.0	49.0	3,560.6	40.8	7,708.6	44.8
Experienced physical violence since the age of 15
Physical assault	3,331.4	39.3	2,606.8	29.8	5,938.2	34.5
Physical threat	1,965.1	23.2	1,118.4	12.8	3,083.4	17.9
Total(b)	4,072.2	48.1	3,006.1	34.4	7,078.4	41.1
Experienced sexual violence since the age of 15
Sexual assault	336.0	4.0	1,494.0	17.1	1,830.0	10.6
Sexual threat	53.5	0.6	386.9	4.4	440.4	2.6
Total(b)	381.1	4.5	1,696.1	19.4	2,077.2	12.1
Total persons	8,466.2	100.0	8,735.4	100.0	17,201.7	100.0

With the source of the 1 in 5 figure highlighted in red. Note that it is a summary of two figures above it – actual sexual assault and a threat thereof with the real estimated lifetime sexual assault figure being closer to 1 in 6.

The notion that "1 in 3 women will suffer domestic abuse in their lifetimes" may originate from either Table 22 or Table 4 of the same study:

Australian Bureau of Statistics

49060DO006_2012 Personal Safety, Australia, 2012

Released at 11.30am (Canberra time) Wed 11 Dec 2013

Table 22 EXPERIENCE OF PARTNER VIOLENCE(a) SINCE THE AGE OF 15, Frequency of violence

	Males		Females
	'000	%	'000	%
CURRENT PARTNER VIOLENCE
Whether current partner has been violent more than once
One incident	*41.8	35.0	82.1	34.9
More than one incident	77.8	65.0	154.5	65.1
Frequency of violence where current partner has been violent more than once
All of the time/most of the time	np	np	*15.4	*6.5
Some of the time	np	np	45.9	19.3
A little of the time	70.7	59.1	93.2	39.3
Total persons who experienced more than one incident of violence by their current partner	77.8	65.0	154.5	65.1
Total persons who experienced violence by a current partner	119.6	100.0	237.1	100.0
PREVIOUS PARTNER VIOLENCE(a)
Whether previous partner has been violent more than once
One incident	166.1	49.4	342.1	27.0
More than one incident	170.1	50.6	925.1	73.0

If this is indeed the source of the 1 in 3 statistic for partner violence for women, this interpretation of the data is entirely incorrect. The meaning of these figures is; "Of the women who reported partner violence, 34.9% reported one incident and 65.1% reported more than one incident." This can also be seen from the estimated number of persons at the bottom – 237,100 is not 34.9% of Australia's population of women in 2012.

Table 4 will yield a 1 in 3 figure if statistics for partner and boyfriend/girlfriend as perpetrator of violence are added together, but that cannot be defined as "Domestic abuse". The ABS can be quoted in order to clarify this point[5]:

"Partner violence
Refers to any incident of sexual assault, sexual threat, physical assault or physical threat by a current and/or previous partner. Partner violence does not include violence by a "boyfriend/girlfriend or date". For the PSS a boyfriend/girlfriend or date refers to a person the respondent dated, or was intimately involved with but did not live with."

Australian Bureau of Statistics

49060DO002_2012 Personal Safety, Australia, 2012
Released at 11:30am (Canberra time) Wed 11 Dec 2013

Table 4 EXPERIENCE OF VIOLENCE SINCE THE AGE OF 15, Relationship to perpetrator

	Males		Females		Persons
	'000	%	'000	%	'000	%
Whether experienced violence since the age of 15
Did not experience violence since the age of 15	4,318.2	51.0	6,171.8	59.7	9,490.0	55.2
Experienced violence since the age of 15(a)	4,148.0	49.0	3,550.6	40.3	7,708.6	44.8
Relationship to perpetrator(b)
Stranger	3,018.7	35.7	1,358.2	12.2	4,066.9	23.6
Known person	2,255.5	26.6	3,106.5	28.0	5,362.4	31.2
Partner	448.0	5.3	1,479.9	13.3	1,926.0	11.2
Current partner(c)	115.6	1.4	237.1	2.7	356.7	2.1
Previous partner(d)	336.3	4.0	1,287.2	14.5	1,603.4	9.3
Boyfriend/girlfriend or date(e)	313.7	3.7	990.7	11.3	1,304.4	7.6
Father or mother	178.3	2.1	306.1	3.5	484.4	2.8
Son or daughter	*16.7	*0.2	46.4	0.5	63.1	0.4
Brother or sister	75.6	0.9	162.6	1.9	238.3	1.4
Other relative or in-law	99.7	1.2	211.2	2.4	310.9	1.8
Teacher	*34.7	*0.4	*10.7	*0.1	45.4	0.3
Friend	402.0	4.7	322.8	3.7	724.0	4.2
Acquaintance or neighbour	873.6	10.3	614.4	7.0	1,488.1	8.7
Employer/boss/supervisor	62.3	0.7	74.5	0.9	136.8	0.8

Contents | Table 3 | Table 3a | Table 4 | Table 4a | Table 5 | Table 5a | Table 6 | Table 6a

Finally, the 1 in 3 figure can probably be obtained by adding the percentage of partner physical or sexual abuse to the figure for emotional abuse (25% for women, Table 32), but that too would be misleading because the ABS does not report overlap between the two phenomena in those statistics.

As such Plibersek's source for the 1 in 3 domestic violence figure remains unclear. To their credit, ANROWS report these correctly – 1 in 6 for partner abuse and 1 in 4 for emotional abuse.

Another figure that stands out from the ANROWS document, although it is reproduced elsewhere on the internet, if one searched for it and the word "women" is:

This one appears to originate from the same ABS study, table 13:

Australian Bureau of Statistics

49060DO004_2012 Personal Safety, Australia, 2012

Released at 11.30am (Canberra time) Wed 11 Dec 2013

Table 13 EXPERIENCE OF SEXUAL ASSAULT DURING THE LAST 12 MONTHS, Broad age groups(a)

	Experienced sexual assault during the last 12 months		Did not experience sexual assault during the last 12 months		Total
	'000	%	'000	%	'000	%
Males(b)	*37.0	*0.4	8,429.2	99.6	8,466.2	100.0
Females
18 to 24 years	*23.5	*2.2	1,048.5	97.8	1,072.0	100.0
25 to 34 years	*21.3	*1.3	1,604.2	98.7	1,625.5	100.0
35 to 44 years	*19.9	*1.2	1,576.4	98.8	1,596.3	100.0
45 to 54 years	16.0	1.0	1,525.0	99.0	1,541.0	100.0
55 years and over	*7.0	*0.2	2,893.6	99.8	2,900.6	100.0
Total females	87.8	1.0	8,647.7	99.0	8,735.4	100.0
Total persons	124.8	0.7	17,076.9	99.3	17,201.7	100.0

* estimate has a relative standard error of 25% to 50% and should be used with caution  estimate has a relative standard error greater than 50% and is considered too unreliable for general use

– nil or rounded to zero

Contents | Table 12 | Table 12a | Table 13 | Table 13a | Table 14 | Table 14a | Table 15 | Table 15a

A keen observer would have noticed that the figures are in multiples of a thousand. The ABS is not given the resources to interview that many people in anything other than the national census. These are projected, rather than actual figures and therefore 23 thousand women did not report to have been sexually assaulted. This statement is misleading all the more so than this shocking statistic would have remained just as provocative if it said "estimated."

I was curious however, where did such a precise figure come from? Its symbolism is quite obvious, that not a single last victim is to fall into oblivion of cold mathematical rounding. And as fair notion as that is, a Google search for the number 23584 and various combinations of "ABS", "women", "assault", etc, failed to reveal the source, until, I looked at ABS's own PSS 2012 commentary and discovered the following paragraph.[6] Please note that an RSE (Relative Standard Error) is a statistical indicator of the level of accuracy of the reported figure when compared to the probable actual figure. It depends on sample size in relation to the real-world population (more on which below):

www.abs.gov.au/ausstats/abs@.nsf/Lookup/2838CC08D526D3E2CA257C3D000D83DE?opendocument

- Women in the 18 to 24 years age groups were more likely, compared to all women, to have experienced sexual assault in the 12 months prior to the survey. An estimated *2.2% of the 1,072,000 women aged 18 to 24 years had experienced sexual assault in the 12 months prior to the survey compared to 1.0% of all women. * this estimate has an RSE between 25% and 50% and should be used with caution.

Peddling misleading figures hidden in pretty graphics is hardly a constructive way to approach an issue as serious as rape and sexual assault. Especially for a research body that relies on Australian taxpayer funding to "ensure the effective dissemination and utilisation of research findings,"[7] as the ANROWS mission statement reads. Their funding is at the time of writing, at three million dollars of taxpayer's money, one might bear in mind, 1.25 million of which went to "Consultancy, contract, temporary staff and employee benefits," with none on "services rendered," as of the last financial statement.

But enough negativity, let's try to effectively disseminate and utilise research findings, seeing feminism is not interested in doing so…By attempting to answer the question "What do the ABS PSS surveys tell us about violence against men and women?"

First and foremost – the surveys. There are three of them – two Personal Safety Surveys conducted with both men and women in 2012 and 2005 and an earlier Women's Safety survey conducted in 1996, whose methodology was adapted for the later PSS's. The ABS site claims that the results are largely comparable. Those unfamiliar with statistical methods may also need to note the following three concepts:

Projected results – these surveys are done with a sample of people much smaller than the entire population. Their answers are projected – one person's response is taken to represent the typical response from x many persons in the wider population. When the number of people interviewed is large enough, this result is taken to be representative of the population on average and the bigger the sample, the higher is the probability of the figure being accurate. This is not meant to be deceptive. Rather, missing responses for a certain question would not require that person's entire survey to be discarded. Each question can have its own sample rate, but as a result, needs to be projected to be meaningful in comparison with data for other questions and for the survey as a whole.
Sample Size – A much larger number of women has been interviewed for these studies than men. The reason is never explained, however the surveys original focus on women's safety is of note. To wit, 31,650 women and 9,700 men were interviewed in 2012. The sample size makes the male figures less accurate, although accuracy of figures may have also been affected by people's willingness to answer certain sections of the survey or the type of questions asked in each instance. This is not elaborated in the ABS notes, as far as I can tell. The sample size is a major factor that affects the RSE.
Relative Standard Error – the measure of accuracy of a particular figure. The 2012 survey divides these in three categories – 0-25% as acceptable, 25-50% as unreliable and over 50% as unacceptable. The technical notes for the 2012 survey explain the concept[8]:

This means that the true results are not best represented by a bar graph, as is the common practice, but by an edifice with a fuzzy top, whose real value is somewhere in the mist of probability. An RSE of 25% or over means that the edifice is mostly mist and these are marked with a single asterisk throughout the survey, including its commentary. The larger the sample, the less mist there is – the 19 in 20 chances spread shown above narrows. It can also mean that results with overlapping RSE's may not be statistically significant, meaning the fact that the results appear to be different is the product of chance rather than a true reflection of reality. Only the 2012 PSS tables have an accompanying table of RSE values, and while p51 of the 2005 survey[9] provides a guide to what the RSE should be, based on the size of the estimate, for the sake of this exercise we'll stick to bar graphs.

So, the true sexual assault and violence statistics based on these Australian surveys look as follows:

	1996		2005		2012
	males	females	males	females	males	females
figure		5	6.5	3.1	5.4	3

	1996		2005		2012
	males	females	males	females	*males	females
figure		1.5	0.6	1.3	0.4	1

	1996		2005		2012
	males	females	males	females	males	females
figure		29.3	40.5	29.2	39.3	29.8

	1996		2005		2012
	males	females	males	females	males	females
figure		15.5	4.8	16.8	4	17.1

The tendency for recent assault is down, while paradoxically lifetime experience for women reporting sexual assault is up. What if anything that means cannot be reasonably surmised with too much confidence, remembering that each has an RSE and when the difference is in the realms of one percent between two surveys is most likely not statistically significant. However and cautiously, these figures ring true with the notion that Australian society is relatively safe and stable. Acceptance of female victims of sexual abuse is on the rise reflected by an upward trend in reporting lifetime versus a decline in recent sexual abuse. The taboo on men reporting violence and especially sexual violence against themselves appears to endure.

The statistics for partner violence across the three surveys appear as follows:

	1996				2005				2012
	males - current	males - previous	females - current	females - previous	males - current	males - previous	females - current	females - previous	males - current	males - previous	females - current	females - previous
figure			8	42	0.9	4.9	2.1	15	1.4	4.0	2.7	14.5

Of note, there is a substantial difference between 1996 Women's Safety survey and the later PSS's. This may reflect a difference in methodology, evidenced by the fact that the PSS surveys do not attempt to compare partner violence statistics as they do assault and sexual violence statistics. The overall picture seems consistent with the previous graphics – general stability with some evidence of decline in the incidence of violence.

With that in mind, the millions of funding that bodies such as ANROWS receive seem to be feeding an advocacy industry that has little to no effect on rates of assault. Violence and sexual assault is a problem for everyone but it appears to be on a gradual decline. Neither the politicians brandishing the "I am a feminist" slogan, nor the advocacy bodies set up to "deal" with the issue seem to be interested in offering any true perspective on the real magnitude of the problem or trends over time. The casual observer is not expected to examine statistics on their own and as such will most likely be misled. Misinformation is not a good use of tax-payer's money and above all is unhelpful to the victims of violence.

[1] http://www.smh.com.au/comment/tanya-plibersek-why-im-a-feminist-20141112-11ktdn.html

[2] http://www.smh.com.au/federal-politics/political-news/im-no-feminist-julie-bishop-20141029-11dn7m.html

[3] http://www.anrows.org.au/sites/default/files/Violence-Against-Australian-Women-Key-Statistics.pdf

[4] http://www.abs.gov.au/AUSSTATS/abs@.nsf/DetailsPage/4906.02012?OpenDocument

[5] http://www.abs.gov.au/ausstats/abs@.nsf/Lookup/4906.0Chapter7002012
[6] http://www.abs.gov.au/ausstats/abs@.nsf/Lookup/2838CC08D526D3E2CA257C3D000D83DE?opendocument

[7] http://anrows.org.au/sites/default/files/page-attachments/ANROWS%20Annual%20Report%202013-14_web.pdf, p8

[8] http://www.abs.gov.au/ausstats/abs@.nsf/Latestproducts/4906.0Technical%20Note12012?opendocument&tabname=Notes&prodno=4906.0&issue=2012&num=&view=

[9]
http://www.ausstats.abs.gov.au/ausstats/subscriber.nsf/0/056A404DAA576AE6CA2571D00080E985/$File/49060_2005%20(reissue).pdf

Gary Johns and Judith Sloane won't limit Broderick's plans

Jim Muldoon · 13 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Gary Johns and Judith Sloane of the Australian wrote articles recently criticising the latest report by the Australian Human Rights Commission's Sex Discrimination Commissioner Elizabeth Broderick. The report is called Supporting Working Parents: Pregnancy and Return to Work National Review.

It is heartening to see such criticism of Feminist governance, even if neither of them refer to it by name. It is also enlightening to examine Broderick's reply in the same publication.

Johns describes the "world inhabited by the Australian Human Rights Commission." Clearly he sees it as delusional, although the criticism remains implied rather than overt. In this world at least half of all mothers have experienced discrimination in the workplace. Johns doesn't buy it, and rightly so.

The Human Rights Commission, it seems, believes all women have a right to have a career that progresses as though uninterrupted by pregnancy, birth and child-rearing even if it is actually interrupted by pregnancy, birth and child-rearing. Of course, this consequence free zone can be summarised in a slogan:

Her body, her choice, everyone else's problem.

But Johns wants to bring us back to the real world:

> There is a world of difference between discrimination and not accommodating someone's desires.

Johns makes some valid comments on the details of the survey. For example, a complaint that hours were changed whilst a woman was pregnant does not mean that the hours were changed because she was pregnant and the intent was to disadvantage her.

Johns also doubts the economic claims made by the report and thinks the overall recommendations do not stand proper scrutiny:

> [The Australian Human Rights Commission] wants these major changes made to employment contracts based on flimsy evidence and bad economics.

Judith Sloane, felt that Johns was "a bit too kind" in his remarks. She found the report "tendentious and pointless."

> The real conclusion is that government bodies such as the Human Rights Commission are clearly too generously funded when they can commission surveys and produce such poor quality, prejudiced reports that set back the debate rather than contribute to it.

Sloane sees real problems with the methods used in the survey.

> This underscores a further weakness of the survey — it contained no control group of matched workers apart from the characteristic of having been pregnant and returned to work.

She continues:

> The exclusion of a control group is made more problematic because the questionnaire essentially invited respondents to whinge.

Yes, and every whinge, whine and moan becomes a statistic of discrimination. Sloane, like Johns, also questions the economic credentials of the report.

> If the deficient survey is not depressing enough — and, no, we don't need to repeat it every four years — the babble about the economic benefits of eliminating discrimination and greater workforce participation of women is a very poor undergraduate standard.
>
> To quote highly questionable studies that point to massive gains in gross domestic product if only more women participated in the workforce completely misses the point

And yet, of course, it is Johns and Sloane who actually miss the point. They are correct in saying that the report is utter rubbish. They are correct in saying that the costs will outweigh the benefits. Eventually, even the mothers they are claiming to help will end up worse off as the system collapses on itself. If everyone is being subsidised, then there is no one left to supply the extra.

But they are dead wrong if they think that facts will win the argument. The truth is, the laws that the Human Rights Commission are calling for will become law, in one form or another. It is just a question of time.

We can see this in Broderick's response to the pair, which appeared in The Australian on Friday last week.

> As I stepped down from the podium in Sydney last week, after having launched my report about the direct link between pregnancy discrimination and women's workforce participation (Supporting Working Parents: Pregnancy and Return to Work National Review), I was approached by women from all directions; women who wanted to tell their stories.

Broderick does not take on Johns or Sloane directly. In fact, while it is obvious that she is responding to the pair, the only people who would know that are those who had already read their articles. Instead, she acts like she is announcing the breakthrough we'd all been waiting for.

> I have travelled to eight cities in the past eight days, to every state and territory. One thing remains constant: the scores of women wanting to share with me their experience of pregnancy, parental leave and return-to-work discrimination.

The messianic overtones are not to be ignored either. Indeed, whilst Johns is wondering about grubby details such as "who pays for it," Broderick sees far beyond this to a brighter future where we all need shades.

> As Australia's Sex Discrimination Commissioner and a mother of two teenagers, I know the most important work I do every day is my unpaid caring work. But I also believe that paid work and care should not sit at opposite ends of one hard choice. We can do both. And when we are supported in this choice, we all flourish — individuals and organisations alike.

Broderick doesn't need facts. She has the backing of the Australian Industry Group, The Australian Chamber of Commerce and Industry, leading Australian academics, employer peak bodies and unions and more bodies that Johns and Sloane could point a fact at. She defends her survey and report by simply relying on her supporters' credentials.

Any remaining doubters are to be simply to be shamed into compliance. She quotes ACC&I CEO Kate Carnell:

> Limiting women's participation in paid work limits us as a society and reduces our productivity.

Broderick implies that Johns and Sloane, with their limited, negative view are just part of the problem. If we all just believe and comply, nothing can go wrong. This is not just the opinion of our own elite, remember. International experts are on the Commissions side too:

> [The survey] drew on international best practice from surveys in Britain and Ireland.

Cynics would note that the next survey, done in the USA or Canada, will cite "international best practice from surveys in Britain, Ireland and Australia." The issue of a control group is also fielded by Broderick:

> In accordance with reputable international methodologies, control groups are not used in surveys of this nature.

What makes it "best practice" and "reputable international methodologies" can be summed up in yet another slogan:

Feminist experts agree that the Feminists are correct in every way.

There is nothing new in Broderick's approach. In 1996 the Women's Safety Study, commissioned by the Australian government's Office of the Status of Women, used a broadened definition of violence to invite women to whinge about men.

The definition of violence included threats. It is true that, in certain conditions, like whilst holding a gun for example, verbal threats can be very damaging. However not all threats or name-calling are therefore violence.

But they were for that study. This gave us, among other things, the "one in three women will experience violence in their lifetime" claim that still reverberates in the Domestic Violence lectures we endure today. And, of course, this figure is now an "international" one that has grown in size.

Here Julia Gillard tells us "one in three women will be beaten or raped in their lifetime" using her office of the Prime Minister of Australia as the authority for this claim.

So the reality, for Johns and Sloane, is they had better hope a lot more Australians take the red pill, and take it soon, otherwise Broderick's sought after laws will become a reality.

Links

http://www.theaustralian.com.au/opinion/columnists/becoming-a-parent-is-a-privilege-not-a-workplace-right/story-fn8v83qk-1227004823713

http://www.theaustralian.com.au/opinion/columnists/commissions-pregnancy-report-a-doubtful-onesided-piece-of-tosh/story-fnbkvnk7-1227013235935

http://www.theaustralian.com.au/opinion/limited-choices-for-new-mothers/story-e6frg6zo-1227017253066

http://www.abs.gov.au/ausstats/abs@.nsf/mf/4128.0

Iggy Azalea is popular and Black men are to blame

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 13 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

[Ed. note: This post originally appeared here.]

Black feminist Professor Brittney Cooper gets her mean-girl panties on for Iggy Azalea, and it's almost amusing to watch the contortions she goes through to blame Black men for what she perceives as a problem with "cultural appropriation". Black men are appropriating black culture?

Huh?

What?

Yeah, let's investigate the Professor's logic.

> Recently, my nine year-old nephew came running into the room, eager to find a seat to watch a performance by Iggy Azalea on an awards show. He sat, enraptured by her performance, yelling, "Iggy!" utterly oblivious to the look of chagrin and dismay on my face, as I, too, tuned in to watch this white girl from Australia, turned ATL-style rapper, caricature everything I love about Southern Hip Hop.

And right out of the starting gate, Cooper goes on a sulk and demands that everyone, including children respond to her feelz! She was chagrined, people! Dismayed! And the boy did not drop everything to assuage her hurtz. Little bastard. He was just enjoying some music. Can't have that now, can we?

> The look and feeling of chagrin has stayed with me each time I turn on my radio and hear Iggy's hit song, "Fancy" coming through my speakers. And some of the dismay I feel is at myself, because almost without fail, I immediately start bobbing my head to the beat.

I'm no huge fan of Iggy, but yeah, Fancy has a pretty good little beat.

> Iggy is a protégé of T.I., one of my all-time favorite rappers. Though T.I. is known for Atlanta-style, crunk Southern bravado that is a hallmark of Black culture in that city, according to journalist/blogger Bené Viera, T.I. recently expressed disappointment that "we're at a place in America where we still see color." Apparently, color is only relevant when he's talking about racist acts against Black men, but not when he has to think through his complicity in white appropriation of Hip Hop music.

The children won't kowtow to Cooper's feelings and the music is pretty catchy on the whole, but there is no way Cooper is leaving a good beat alone. Three paragraphs in, and it's the fault of Black men that Iggy captures her nephew's attention when the boy ought to be paying attention to his Auntie. What I find amusing about Professor Cooper, a professor of cultural studies, is that she appears to have no idea how culture works. The whole point of culture is to share it, so it spreads. Culture is not something you nail shut in a box, and only approved visitors get to see it. Cultural appropriation is just some bullshit feminists and social justice warriors cooked up so they would have something to bitch about. Insisting that culture must never be shared ironically works to injure the very culture these idiots, presumably, are trying to protect.

As a born-and-raised Southern girl, who believes that lazy summer evenings are best spent with your top back or your sun roof open, bass-heavy music booming through nice speakers, while you slowly make a few blocks through the neighborhood, to see who's out and what's poppin,' I resent Iggy Azalea for her co-optation and appropriation of sonic Southern Blackness, particularly the sonic Blackness of Southern Black women. Everytime she raps the line "tell me how you luv dat," in her song "Fancy," I want to scream "I don't love dat!" I hate it. The line is offensive because this Australian born-and-raised white girl almost convincingly mimics the sonic register of a downhome Atlanta girl.

And if one of those downhome Atlanta girls was a pitch perfect soprano with a love for Kiri Te Kanawa, would her ability to convincingly mimic the New Zelander's voice be offensive, or does that only work one way? Is the sonic "whiteness" of Maria Callas up for grabs? Are Jessye Norman or Leontyne Price mimicking white culture, or are they kickass opera singers, singing whatever the hell they want?

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Y9OFIVyQTlE

> The question is why? Why is her mimicry of sonic Blackness okay? Though rap music is a Black and Brown art form, one does not need to mimic Blackness to be good at it. Ask the Beastie Boys, or Eminem, or Macklemore. These are just a smattering of the white men who've been successful in rap in the last 30 years and generally they don't have to appropriate Blackness to do it. In the case of Southern rappers like Bubba Sparxx or Paul Wall, who do "sound Black" as it were, at least it is clear that they also have the accents of the places and communities in which they grew up.

How interesting that Cooper gives white men a pass, but not white women, and certainly not Black men. One wonders how Cooper navigates the twin highways of hate feminism and cultural studies have laid out before her. Men are to blame, but not white men because they pay good money and women are always victims, but not white women unless they're being victimized by white men and Black women are victims and Black men are always to blame but not white men …… and round and round she goes.

> Not so with Iggy Azalea, who left Australia at age 16. To be clear, I know all of the problems with the phrases "sound Black" and "sonic Blackness." As a kid, I was mercilessly teased for and accused of "talking white," "acting white" and basically attempting to "be white." I learned during those difficult days to dissent from social norms that suggested that the only English for Black people is a vernacular English that stands adjacent to "corporate," "standard," or white English. I balked at such suggestions and reveled in my ability to master "standard" English.

Obviously, I do not know Cooper's personal history, but if the narrow-mindedness of her writing is any indication, the key part of this revelation is the word "only". Virtually every adult human understands that there are degrees of appropriateness when it comes to language and expression. Most of us will use a very formal tone standing in front of a judge, and a completely different vocabulary in everyday life with family and friends. Those individuals who never modify their speech, adjusting it for the occasion and the environment are considered socially awkward. Sometimes that is the result of neurological conditions like autism or Asperger's Syndrome, but it can also be the result of dogged adherence to ideology. Class, race, ethnicity, geography, demography – all these things have an impact on language, and mature, intelligent people understand how to navigate the various contours of their social worlds. Not the Professor.

After a few more paragraphs complaining about that darn Iggy, making money hand over fist by singing rap songs, Cooper gets to the heart of the matter. Someone is to blame for Iggy. Someone has made Iggy possible. Someone has permitted Iggy to succeed.

Guess who?

> By riding for white female rappers to the exclusion of Black women, Black men collude with the system against Black women, by demonstrating that our needs, aspirations and feelings do not matter and are not worthy of having a hearing.

The exclusion of Black women??!?! Is she fucking kidding? Cooper do you even Beyonce? Ever heard of Nicky Minaj? How about L'il Kim? Queen Latifah? Missy Elliot? Mary J. Blige? Nitty Scott, maybe? Anything ringing a bell at all?

Time Magazine put together a list of female rappers worth a listen, and every single one is Black. No one is excluding Black women from rap, least of all Black men.

This is straight up, run of the mill feminist man-hate. There is no evidence that Black men are stomping down Black women and lifting up those precious white rappers at Black women's expense. It's bullshit. But once Cooper gets the misandry ball rolling, she just can't stop.

> Black men keep on proving that when given access to power, money and influence, be it political or cultural, it is not Black women they ride or die for. They want our unwavering devotion, even as they make choices that contribute to the silencing of women of color in a culture we helped to build. And young, oblivious white women, caught up in fanciful ideas about a post-racial universe, climb on board, taking my unsuspecting nephew and his friends for the ride of their lives.

This paragraph illustrates perfectly why feminism and Black women go together like fish and bicycles. The feminist part of Cooper knows she has to blame men, and that women must always be victims. The white woman becomes oblivious – Iggy is not making conscious decisions about her life – she's just some clueless chick being led astray by THE EVIL MENZ.

Which MENZ?

Well, we're talking about rap music here, so obviously Black men get to be the villains.

If feminism rejects traditional gender roles and demands that men and women be treated as social, moral, financial and literal equals, why the hell should men ride and die for women? You want the benefits of traditional gender roles, but none of the responsibilities or constraints? Give me one good reason Black men are obliged to ride or die for any woman, no matter what color her skin happens to be?

> The ability of Blackness to travel to and be performed by non-Black bodies is supposed to be a triumph of post-racial politics, a feat that proves once and for all that race is not biological. Race does not have any biological basis, but I maintain that there is no triumph and no celebration when we embrace a white girl who deliberately attempts to sound like a Black girl, in a culture where Black girls can't get no love.

Black women who sing can't get no love? Alicia Keys, Janet Jackson, Rhianna, Beyonce Knowles, Jennifer Hudson, Erykah Badu, Leona Lewis, Kelly Rowland, Ciara, Brandy Norwood, Nikki Minaj and Aretha would like a word with you.

I wonder what Jessye Norman would think of Cooper's cultural appropriation? She's a dramatic soprano who specializes in Wagner. Flawless German opera.

> Iggy profits from the cultural performativity and forms of survival that Black women have perfected, without having to encounter and deal with the social problem that is the Black female body, with its perceived excesses, unruliness, loudness and lewdness. If she existed in hip hop at a moment when Black women could still get play, where it would take more than one hand to count all the mainstream Black women rap artists, I would have no problem. Iggy would be one among the many. But in this moment, she represents a problem of co-optation. She > represents the ways in which hip hop is on a crash course to take exactly the path that rock 'n roll took such that 20 years from now, people my nephew's age, will look at the Macklemores and Iggys of the world as representative of Hip Hop Culture, with nary a Black soul making their top ten list of hip hop greats.

How many fingers do you have on one hand??!?! Cooper should perhaps keep in mind that most male rappers are not mainstream either, but that is changing because rap music is being integrated, word, by word, into mainstream pop music.

When Taylor Swift adds a rap bridge to one of her saccharine sweet pop confections, you know some headway is being made, and the culture is adding layers.

Cooper's words are exactly what people said about Elvis. Elvis took Black music and brought it into the living rooms of every home in America. He took a great innovation in music, packaged it for consumption by the masses, spoon-fed it to them and created an entire industry and culture that was suddenly open to Black music.

That is how culture works.

Iggy isn't stealing, or appropriating anything. She is celebrating, and spreading inner city Black music far beyond the borders of the original innovators. She is solidifying rap music and inserting it deeply into mainstream culture, from where it will not be dislodged anytime soon, and in doing so, she is broadening the market for all rap artists.

Cooper is the anachronism here, stamping her feet that she doesn't get to dictate the exact terms of how Black culture becomes popularized. That makes her immature, out of touch and petulant. It's her insertion of Black men as the evil oppressors that bothers me. In much the same way that feminists are the true misogynists, Black feminists are the true racists. Cooper's insistence that Black men are running rough-shod over Black women rappers has at it's a heart a rather grotesque vision of Black men: so enthralled with the beauty of white women, they will destroy their own mothers, sisters, daughters, aunts, nieces, friends to get at it.

You know there is something fundamentally flawed with your worldview, Cooper, when you work harder than any member of the KKK to paint Black men as lewd darkies lusting after white female flesh. You might want to think that one through.

I'll be over here, enjoying Iggy singing Black music, and Jessye singing white. It's called "culture."

Feel free to join us.

You can sing any damn song you like.

We'll do the same.

[Image "Iggy Azalea" by Julia Alterburger is licensed under CC BY-SA 2.0 Generic License and appeared here.]

Why is Bill Shorten more equal than others?

Jim Muldoon · 14 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

In November 2013, various mainstream media outlets told us that a senior Australian Labor Party (ALP) person was under investigation after someone accused him of rape. Not long after, Bill Shorten, the leader of the ALP and therefore Leader of the Opposition, "revealed" that it was he who had been accused.

On the face of it, this story is only unusual in the sense that for once the mainstream media let decency rather than the need for sensationalist headlines rule the day. That's right! Mainstream media, it might seem, took a principled approach.

That is, of course, until you take a look at the facts.

This accusation began on Kevin Rudd's facebook page in October 2013, just after Shorten won the ALP leadership. The alleged victim wrote on Rudd's page claiming that Shorten, named explicitly, had raped her.

The internet, being what it is, soon had this story kicking around on numerous bloggers' sites. Shorten's name was front and centre.

As Grace Collier, of the Australian, put it before Shorten put his hand up,

> The person has not been named in the media (if he were a footballer might this be different?) but anyone with an internet connection knows who he is.

So the press could have argued in court that the accusations were made and recorded in public by the alleged victim and Shorten's involvement was therefore already a matter of public record.

Collier also asks an important question about it being different for others. But it doesn't just stop at footballers. Recently the speculation surrounding celebrities such as Rolf Harris, Robert Hughes didn't see the press exercise such restraint either. The most recent case concerning Cliff Richards in the UK is yet another example.

The guilty verdicts that eventually came for Harris and Hughes do not justify the thinly veiled vilification in the press months before the trials even began.

But what is most galling is that Shorten's ALP has been amongst the biggest exponents of the moral panic known as "Violence Against Women" that now pervades the western world. It is for this reason that everyone looks the other way when journalists name, shame and pre-judge any males charged with sexual offences or violence against women.

So strong now is the presumption of guilt that demands for the accused to lose their jobs or their sponsorships are made long before official charges are even laid.

It is inconceivable that the Liberal leader, Tony Abbot, would have received the same shielding from public scrutiny had a similar accusation been made against him.

But the questions for Shorten don't just end there. From the beginning, Shorten's lawyers have declared,

> The unsubstantiated claims are absolutely without foundation and are also distressing for his family and for him.

Shorten, according to a statement in the Daily Telegraph, called the allegations "untrue and abhorrent" and stated point blank,

> There is absolutely no basis for the claim.

If it wasn't a case of mistaken identity, and that seems unlikely given the statements made thus far, and Shorten is to be believed in his assessment, then the woman has made a maliciously false allegation against the Leader of the Opposition.

The seriousness of this can hardly be overstated. Depending on whatever political crisis might have been on the cards at the time, this allegation could have derailed matters of national importance either at home or internationally.

But even if Shorten had been just a regular Bill, like the guy next door, surely a claim with no basis whatsoever requires the police to charge the false accuser.

The real reason, of course, why everyone, including Shorten, is prepared to look the other way is ideological. To admit that women can and do make false rape accusations undermines the Feminist image on the "Violence Against Women" front.

If women do make false accusations, even against the very well protected elite, then maybe, just maybe, some of those heard in the Family Court and other places are just as baseless. To admit that might bring to a halt the Feminist Funding Frenzy, and that, of course, would never do.

Links

http://www.abc.net.au/news/2013-11-14/vic-police-investigate-rape-claim-against-senior-alp-figure/5090514

http://kangaroocourtofaustralia.com/2013/11/29/bill-shorten-accused-of-raping-16-year-old-girl-in-1986-victorian-police-are-investigating/http://www.theaustralian.com.au/opinion/columnists/labors-looming-disasters-a-golden-opportunity-for-coalition/story-fnkdypbm-1227026029199

http://www.dailytelegraph.com.au/news/nsw/opposition-leader-bill-shorten-admits-he-is-the-senior-labor-figure-cleared-of-raping-a-woman-in-1986/story-fni0cx12-1227032096900

How to take out Anita Sarkeesian with her own words

AVfM Video Source · 14 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Does Intel really know who they are throwing their brand weight behind? Do Intel's regular customers know what sorts of things Anita tweets? Maybe it's time we let them both see Anita's own words.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=UX0r0wd_LqA

You may also want to subscribe to Veemonro.

The debate between the sexes

Chris Good · 14 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The debate between the sexes has raged on for decades and it seems necessary to acknowledge that, to some degree, neither side will buckle to the other. The reason for this, obviously, is that we each have our own views, our beliefs and our own cause. A staggering amount of research and statistics are available that prove, beyond doubt, that institutional and cultural prejudice exists against men, so we must ask ourselves why the feminist movement, and individual feminists, refuse to acknowledge this?

My argument would be down to the natural tendency of us all, as humans, to favour information that supports our own preconceptions and our idea of the truth and to discredit that which threatens it; this is well known in psychology and is called “confirmation bias”.

Perhaps one of the first lessons in research, science and experiment is to acknowledge our bias, prejudice and the simple fact that we are, most likely, looking into something in order to prove ourselves right. It can be an incredibly difficult task to remain objective when faced with data that conflicts with, what we know in our core and very being, is correct.

Confirmation bias is no more evident than where emotional investment and identity is at stake. It is one thing to objectively hold a viewpoint and opinion and face the challenge to change that, but it is quite another when it threatens a perspective and ‘truth’ that we have attached to our idea of ‘who we are’ and ‘what we are’. I am a “Christian”. I am a “Feminist”. “I am a….” What we are saying is that we have made a belief a very definition of who we are and, perhaps, why we are here. This truth belongs to me, defines me and more than that, it IS me.

We might, then, understand the conflict of the Creationist when faced with the evidence of the Big Bang and evolution. It doesn’t just threaten a fact within his mind, it threatens the core of his beliefs, who he is, what he is, how he got here. Better to discard the information and evidence and explain it away: better to protect oneself. Emotion before objective thought. Self-preservation before truth.

This is true, also, of anyone adopting beliefs and ideas with which they invest themselves on an emotional level and on a level of identity: “This is me”, “I am a….”

I bought a fantastic book, “Does Feminism Discriminate Against Men? A Debate” by Warren Farrell and James P. Sterba. The reason I bought it? I liked that it was a book devoted to discussion. Both sides were represented. As a complete work, it was without bias, which is the objective manner in which I aim to approach the gender equality discussion. I ran a bath, made a mountain of bubbles, threw on some tunes, had a couple of candles flickering and readied a short whisky (which is perhaps the most stereotypically “manly” thing about that whole event, but I was happy). All that remained was to get the book which had arrived that day. I bought it for objectivity, with a noble and, perhaps, pious, idea of just how fair I would always be in my contributions to the discussion. As I approached the bathroom, the book in hand, my curiosity got the better of me. I would read every word in that book, but I couldn’t wait to find out what its final answer and conclusion was to that question that was burning in my mind: Does feminism discriminate against men?

Padding toward the warmth of the bath, I flicked to the last page. It was going to tell me just how right I was. I had independently researched so many factors in this debate and formed my own conclusion that Feminism does, indeed, discriminate against men; and I was about to read, in black and white, just how intelligent, thorough and brilliant I had been in my efforts. It was going to agree with me…and what a joy the book would be to read as the candlelight flickered on the bubbles, as I sipped on my cheap whisky, knowing that with every passing word, I was getting closer to that last page, where it reads in stark black and white lettering: YOU WERE RIGHT, CHRIS!

“Given that feminism has not discriminated against men, the future of feminism and men looks very promising indeed, especially if men in sufficient numbers come around to endorse the feminist ideal of equality, so that it can be legally enforced.”

I huffed, I puffed, my brow creased and I glared at the page before casting the book down onto a stack of towels and opting to read a sci-fi novel. How could it say that? How could a book claiming to look at the real facts come to that conclusion, in light of everything I've researched, every discussion I've had with broken fathers who are unrepresented in the law and every mind-numbing examination of statistics? How could a credible study of all the information available to us come to such a ludicrous conclusion and say that I am wrong? They'll publish anything these days!

With one foot plunging through the bubbles and half a mind to get some more whisky, I looked at the sci-fi novel, with disgust. Not just because it was proving to be an awful read, that caused me to consider that perhaps I could write fiction, but because I suddenly came face to face with my lack of integrity. Holding that awful sci-fi novel as a preferred option to facing whatever truth may be found in my previously planned bubble bath reading time, I saw bias. Prejudice; against truth and knowledge and wisdom.

I picked the book up again and resolved to find out why I might be wrong. Why did my research and my own mind lead me down a wrong path? I was, perhaps, to be challenged to question whether I was wrong, but that should always be the case, if my previously noble and definitely pious (proven by this point) notion of objectivity was to be believed. I was, perhaps, to find out that I was wrong: but am I seeking truth, or self-affirmation and sense of belonging in a community?

As it turns out, I had been a silly buffoon. The book is, indeed, designed as a debate. Warren Farrell, in opposition to feminism, went first; and if you'd like to read his summary page, you'll find it on page 111, in the middle of the book. James P Sterba then took his turn, concluding on the page that confronted me with an ugly side of myself.

Even with the most noble intentions, my own bias, my own prejudice for the truth I believed in and my own sense of self-preservation got the better of me.

I do not tell you this to, simply, disgrace myself. Rather, I admit to it as an example of how we all, whatever side we're on, are susceptible to that very real, very tangible, but often unnoticed in ourselves, discrimination against real truth and real knowledge. What is our goal?

I did read through that book and it remains my favourite, simply because it includes both sides of the argument in a concise and fair debate. It's not like trying to make sense of the issue as one person speaks about the wage gap and another brings up the disposable sex, before someone then brings up the lack of education for girls in third world countries. Even that last sentence was confusing! Read that book. Each subject is represented by one side and responded to fairly. The only question that matters is about how we will read it.

Through my own disgrace, I realised I had to acknowledge my prejudice and bias and read Farrell's arguments with a mind of questioning and criticism and Sterba's arguments with an openness to whatever truths might be found in his interpretation of the available data.

Truthfully, I do not think that an acknowledgement of personal bias and a genuine pursuit of truth will ever be found in the proud, emotionally-invested, career-feminists such as Valenti, Chemaly or Greer. All they see is that which supports their own sense of self, sells their books and keeps their articles popular. To some degree, perhaps they don't even choose to be blind to the very real facts of male discrimination.

For the same reason, I don't think there is any reversal of major feminist organisations, such as NOW, or even websites such as feminist.com. How many feminists who confront their own confirmation bias does it take to reverse the ingrained assumptions and direction of a moneymaking, job-safe feminist organisation? None: they get fired.

I would hope that any MRAs or humanists would engage with all topics in the gender equality debate as individual evaluations of discrimination, each deserving their own objective study, research and conclusions. Should we study an issue and objectively conclude that feminist claims were correct, would we allow that admission? I would hope so.

Still, I have to say it as I perceive the situation. The prejudice against truth will continue, the emotional investment and bias toward one's own truth will always result in two sides of an argument. Like the Protestant and Catholic churches, we must learn to live and communicate together, rather than spending all of our time and energy trying to pull down each other's steeples.

What we can demand, though, is an unbiased government. It is not their job to support either 'movement' or express any bias, or wear any campaign's T-shirt. What we should demand of them is that, while bias may exist in co-existing MRA or Feminism, it should not exist in the government or in laws.

Let the feminists enjoy their ivory towers and their personal affirmation of their own righteousness, seriously, leave them to it. Let us, instead, focus on taking what we know…what we objectively know…and demanding objective action from our government, not from feminism.

——-

When fathers love their children more than Crazy

Tim Merchant · 14 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I was in an abusive relationship for twenty years, of the sort perfectly described by Paul Elam of 'A Voice for Men' and Dr. Tara Palmatier of 'Shrink4Men' in their excellent, and maybe even life-saving, 'Going Mental' show, and to take it up a notch, by Dr. Robert Hare, the acknowledged world expert on psychopathy.

And still I wonder if this was not just a very bad marriage of the type I used to see around me in Britain all the time. And that, in part, was the problem …

Paul Elam argues that when we men say we cannot not leave Crazy because we don't want to leave our children behind, what we claim is not accurate, is even dissimulating, of our true motivations. We just want to be with Crazy, but the desire to protect our children sounds so much more defensible and reasonable than the true explanation of our crack-pipe addiction to Crazy.

And maybe he is right in all cases. Maybe we lie to ourselves all the time. Maybe we are just addicts who will say anything to justify our ongoing fixes. But that is not what it felt like, and certainly not what I was telling myself daily, which may mean something … or nothing. I have spent a lifetime in psychological research and I know from oceans of data I could drown in that we know what we like and we dislike, but we are useless at determining what drives us, without the aid of statistical analysis.

And our explanations go no way to explaining why we didn't split with Crazy straightaway, before there were any children, when even then it was obvious that she was plain nuts, and more vicious than anyone we knew.

So, first of all I have to explain to myself, and to you, why I did not leave Crazy in the five years before there were children. Then I have to explain why I didn't leave her for another fifteen years thereafter, after there were children. These explanations, necessarily are different.

And I have to admit from the very beginning that my ex-wife, 'Rafaella' was crazy. Over twenty years, as much in the beginning as in the middle as in the end, she conformed to the behavior outlined by Paul and Dr. T., and according to Dr. Hare's checklist she is a stone cold psychopath.

Before I met Rafaella, I had never had a successful long-term relationship with a woman – plenty of long-term friendships with women, some short-term intimate relationships with women – but no real love match. Yet I knew it was possible. My parents were very much in love with each other for nearly fifty years. One of my sisters had been deeply in love with my brother-in-law for thirty-five years. A couple of pairs of my friends were clearly still in love after a significant period. But not me.

I wanted that. I knew it was possible. And, as all experts attest, Crazy is exceptionally good at presenting herself as your ideal mate. Rafaella was my chance. I wanted that reality and, yes, I wanted that status. I never had photos of Rafaella and my children on my desk at work, but I knew it was important to project yourself as a family man both at work and in society at large.

Equally, many of the relationships I had observed were, by any definition, awful. My great-grandmother was a heinous bitch. One grandmother terrorized her mild, and as it happens foreign, husband all his life. The other grandmother was, by all reports, intensely dislikable. One set of aunts and uncles were miserable together. Another aunt was so vile that she was nicknamed 'Lem,' for 'lemon,' for 'sour.' Most of my family in my generation were engaged in relationships in which they would end up divorced, and similarly many of my friends.

In her book, 'Bringing Up BeBe,' Pamela Druckerman describes her New York and British girlfriends sitting around describing what losers their husbands were, these 'losers' often being CEOs of international companies or top professionals. And that was my experience, too. I studied Law at Cambridge, so many of my friends were lawyers, accountants, and similar, in top professional firms. Their wives could barely count a university degree between them and virtually never had a career to talk about, or even a job, and yet they openly berated the hopelessness of their husbands who earned far less than they should have done (bearing in mind that some of them ended up earning in excess of $1 million a year), they were always at work, they couldn't put a diaper on a baby, they never did the housework, they never played with the children, they were terrible cooks etc. Most of this was complete bullshit. British men tend to contribute more toward the household chores and pleasures than those of almost any other nationality. But, hey, what is the truth in a good story?

So when the same thing happened to me, with a wife who downplayed everything I did and up-played everything she did, it seemed more of the same rather than an outrageous travesty of the facts, of the observable facts – I had two Masters degrees and a First Class Bachelors degree, and I was the Strategy & Planning Manager of the European end of a major global corporation; my wife had no job and no qualifications. Everything is fair game in the new 'everyone is equal' world.

So I looked around and it was a simple decision. I could be lonely and alone or I could be lonely within a male-female partnership, and being in a long-term partnership scored you more credibility points at work and among your friends.

Then we drifted into marriage, and into having a child. I was aware that my family didn't greatly approve of Rafaella, but they all lived far away. Some of my friends thought we had the happiest relationship they had seen.

Rafaella was always dissatisfied and never troubled to keep any of her dissatisfactions to herself. I thought she would grow up, but she never did. Then there was our first child, although maybe not mine, and she seemed to become more manic than usual, claiming there was something seriously wrong with him when neither the doctors nor I thought so. And then a second child, by which time Rafaella was demanding that I become a completely different person, because every aspect of my personality was unsuitable to her needs – and, boy, did she have a lot of needs.

But with the arrival of children, the dynamic changed. I adored my children, both of them. One of my biggest fears had been that we would have children I wouldn't actually like. But I loved both of them immediately, and they loved each other. So what emerged was a double-triangle of intense relationships within the family. Me and the boys loved each other, with Rafaella as a really loud, aggressive TV set playing over in the corner of the room that we knew not how to turn down or turn off. Equally, Rafaella and the boys were in another mutual love relationship, with me at work. Those two triangles worked fine so long as they didn't connect at the apex, between Rafaella and me.

From then on, as Rafaella ranted on and spent twice as much money as I was earning month after month after month, I asked myself how I could get myself out of my relationship with Rafaella but keep the boys. I loved the boys. Within a horrible marital dynamic they were sweet and loving and kind and innocent. They were the loves of my life at that time; I just had to learn to get rid of Rafaella, or to ignore her.

The problem was that, if I divorced Rafaella, she would, to all intents and purposes, have gained full custody. Everybody talks about 50/50 custody, but actually it is 85/15 – one weekend in two – and in the UK, as in the US, in 80% of cases primary custody is given to the mother. This leaves the father to see his children every other weekend, tearing them from their mother, their routines, their home, their friends, their things, in a ritual of maintaining a relationship with someone they once knew who increasingly resembles a transgender version of good old Aunt Matilda. Great!

Worse, in 70% of cases in the UK, the father never sees his children again. This may be because fathers cannot face that 'transgender Aunt Matilda' effect, or because of parental alienation, or because the fathers or mothers move too far away from each other to make visitation practical, I don't know.

So, the likelihood is, as a father in the UK, that you will never see the most important people in your life thus far ever again. Yes, they will be still alive, but as the poet Tony Flynn put it, 'Living in the same world isn't so much.'

And what would happen if by some chance the father got primary custody, if perhaps the mother was found perched up on a mountain of empty vodka bottles, surrounded by the flames of her house she had set fire to with the explosion of her meth factory, after having been suspected of stabbing the children numerous times in near-fatal injuries?

Well, us fathers work. We have careers. In my case, I was out of the country, any country, at least once a week. What provisions could I make to look after the children in my care. 50% of my earnings went straight to the Government in taxes (and, actually, it was probably nearer 60%). 50% of the rest paid for the house. Then there was food, clothing etc. for me and the children, and alimony for the ex-wife. On top of this there was the nearly $500,000 debt my ex-wife had run up on my credit cards. Where on earth was the money to come from for a full-time child-minder costing maybe $3,000 a month, i.e. my total net salary after tax? Grandparents? My father was dead and my mother was 85 and soon to develop alzheimer's, and two hundred miles away from where I was working.

That was a financial equation that was impossible to bring to reality, which is probably why mothers in the UK invariably get 85% custody. They don't have full-time jobs, they are therefore free to look after the children, and all this is paid for out of something like 75% of the ex-husband's net income. And he still won't get to see his beloved children, or they will be taught to be about as vicious to him as his ex-wife is.

Small wonder, I would say, that husbands decide to stay and fight it out.

Then there is the issue of whether, as a caring father, you want to leave your children in the hands of super-bitch who is brutal to almost everyone you know and whom you believe will turn on your children when you are gone.

Actually, that is a wrong assumption. She probably won't. In the end, I left Rafaella after one of my children nearly died from the stress of our relationship and the other started to become seriously OCD and missed several days a week of his schooling because he was feeling ill. I was persuaded by an expert that it was I, in fact, who was the problem. Without me, the children would be fine.

So, I left, and they are fine so far as I know – my ex-wife will not allow me any contact with them whatsoever, so I can't be sure. I fell in love with a truly wonderful Irish-American girl (I strongly recommend them), I moved to the US, I cut all communications with my ex-wife, I offered my children a home with us if they so chose, my ex-wife married a millionaire, the children seem happy – or at least not so unhappy that they want to come and live with me – job done. The only person who is miserable out of this final outcome is my ex-wife's new husband, who gratifyingly left her four times in their first year together. Everyone else is great.

The moral is therefore that I should have left way back, but what were the chances then of such a triumphal outcome? I don't know, and that is the problem …

Nikki Gemmell: Doublethink, double standards and double dutch

Jim Muldoon · 15 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I can only stand back in awe when I read anything by Nikki Gemmell. Just recently in the Australian she did it again for me with her piece, "The new female gaze is shocking for its novelty and audacity."

How can anyone talk so much crap in so few sentences? Yes, we get doublethink, double standards and Double Dutch all in one giddy package.

Gemmell wants us men, actually us straight men (she's particular on that point – more about this later), to be afraid, very afraid, because women are now openly "gazing." I kid you not. "Gazing," and brazenly at that.

> We're gazing. Openly and boldly and with a good old giggle, and some men aren't enjoying being reduced to their mere body parts. The shoe, now, is well and truly on the other foot.

This drivel reminds me of Hanna Rosin triumphantly declaring "The End of Men" without one thought for her own husband or son. Gemmell's Feminism is clearly of the "Women are more equal than men" variety.

> The term "the male gaze" was introduced in 1975 by film theorist Laura Mulvey to describe the way women in film are objectified, voyeuristically, when heterosexual men control the camera.

No, this term was introduced by the Feminist Laura Mulvey into Feminist discussion of movie making in 1975. Of course, for Gemmell, Feminism and its dogma is the only world worth thinking and talking about it. Anything outside of that is for the Neaderthals and clearly doesn't count.

Let me sum up for you Mulvey's view on the world of film theory and everything else:

Women good, men bad.

The Feminists would tell you that it's more complicated than that. She introduced a psychoanalytic perspective to film theory, and that she relied on the theories of Freud and Lacan (how sophisticated!). Who would have thought that a Feminist scholar would come to this conclusion, once she reached that intersection between film theory, psychoanalysis and Feminism: women are essentially good but helpless victims and men are just rotten.

It would be more correct to say that "the male gaze" is what Mulvey accused men of, and not necessarily what men do. Do men look at women? Yes. Is there an element of that which is sexual? There can be. Is that all there is to it? No.

Not by a country mile.

Being social animals, we are constantly looking for signs of where we stand with the other humans in our midst. We check for signs of aggression, acceptance, competition, intimacy, respect, challenge, fear, relaxation, panic and more. Our hierarchical structures are complex, and depend on context. All of which is constantly being re-assessed in real time while we look for allies and potential threats.

But let's not have reality invade Gemmell's fantasy of being insightful.

> The man, of course, is the dominant power, the woman passive within the gaze. We're so used to it, still, we barely notice it.

Of course, it's only "of course" to the Feminist scholar. The man is not "the dominant power." What does that even mean? It's not that we "barely notice it." We don't see it at all, because it doesn't exist. But, if Feminists like Gemmell keep repeating it, it will eventually materialise as truth.

Any man's delusions of being a dominant power are usually crushed by the relentless grind of perpetual sacrifice. He is constantly reminded by commercial advertising as much as the Family Courts that he is the dominant wallet. Today's entertainment programs introduce him to himself as the dominant buffoon. And when there's digging to be done, it is impossible to not notice who keeps getting handed the shovel.

And, of course, the woman is "passive." Please ignore the outfit by so-and-so, the shoes by some-other-designer and the hours she spent in front of the mirror layering the make-up on.

And yes, her arms are folded to push up her cleavage. And yes, her skirt gets raised when she sits like that. And yes, that helpless but revealing pose takes practice.

> But the new female gaze is shocking for its novelty and audacity. And it's increasing. Openly, boldly, with much humour from the chicks. And it's not just on film.

See. When men do it, it's dominating and bullying. But when women do it, it's empowering and fun.

> It's in the confident, assessing stare of teenage girls who demand their boys be "ripped," with sculpted abs — and teenage boys are under pressure like never before because they know it takes a lot of work to achieve what these girls want.

So, is the Patriarchy over? Is it done? Not when there are Feminist Funding Frenzies to be had, I'll bet.

But, are teenage boys under pressure? In the real world they most certainly are. Try their backward slide in education. Try their constantly being accused of being responsible for "rape culture." Try their shorter life expectancy. Try their workplace death statistics. Try their suicide rate. Adding the "gaze," as Gemmell seems intent to do, at best would be rubbing the salt in some very serious wounds.

Now those are some shoes Gemmell would not want to walk a mile in.

And are the girls entitled to all these wants? Clearly Gemmell thinks so. And why? Because its retribution for Patriarchy, Dumbo!

Now, try and make sense of this:

> It's sassy and fun but it's also making a point: how do you like it, boys? Isn't it ridiculous? How on Earth do we allow these things in a world increasingly respectful of equality? Or is it?

I couldn't have put it worse.

It seems to me that Gemmell imagines that the imagined world of women's victimhood is now being spread to boys. And the fact that these boys are being victimised is somehow justified because men used to victimise women. No, the boys didn't do the victimising, it was the men who came before them. Does that make them innocent? Don't be silly, they're male.

However, just because women are now in a position to victimise boys, that doesn't mean that women are no longer being victimised. No, she's not giving up her damsel-in-distress status for no one. But, she is taking great delight as she visualises these young men's distress.

For Gemmell, two wrongs do make a right, and all is fair in love and gender warfare. That is, of course, when the girls come out on top.

Interestingly, she dates this "new" aspect to women, that they can be lusty, to within the last 20 years. Perhaps she hasn't heard of the intersection between young girls, four lads from Liverpool, and screaming. Perhaps she is unaware that Elvis made a few bucks on female admiration.

Perhaps she's not even listening to herself.

Given her educated knowledge of film theory, she should be aware that the female gaze was well and truly focussed on celluloid from the beginning. Douglas Fairbanks and John Gilbert won many hearts in their day, although both were in the shadow of Rudolph Valentino. There was nothing hidden about this "gazing" either, it was just a lack of media to record it, and a lack of gender studies classes to turn it into a sign of oppression.

There is also something disturbing about her treatment of homosexual men. Constantly, she reminds us that the men she is condemning are heterosexual. But what does this really mean for homosexual men?

Is this merely a divide and conquer policy? Gay men are to join Feminists in their outright condemnation of their heterosexual counterparts, are they? Is this so that they can become honorary women? Will they too receive the status of the pampered?

The problem here, of course, is that in male homosexuality, by definition, males are at both ends of "the male gaze." They are simultaneously saints and sinners.

Gay men, too, will be on the receiving end of the "female gaze." But Gemmell doesn't make a case for leaving them out of the "brazen, diminishing objectification." Should they have something tattooed on their heads to indicate their honorary woman status so that women don't give them the "gaze." Or should they simply feel "threatened" and "insecure" like the rest of us?

Is their discomfort an acceptable price for this new women's freedom (that hasn't stopped Patriarchy for one minute – all together now "We're making progress, but there is still so much more to do").

So as you watch bi-sexual men vanish in a big poof (pun intended) of irrelevance, and homosexual men are caught in this Feminist purgatory, you might ask what that means for lesbians.

Oops. She left the Sisters out. I wonder why. Now there is an awkward conversation of "gazing" I would think. How can women be the victims here without also being the baddies?

But, that's only if you take any of this Sacred Babble with any kind of seriousness.

Links

http://www.theaustralian.com.au/news/features/the-new-female-gaze-is-shocking-for-its-novelty-and-audacity/story-e6frg8h6-1226906389343

http://www.aber.ac.uk/media/Documents/gaze/gaze09.html

Happy New Year from America's most infamous stalker – Pauley Perrette of NCIS

Suzanne McCarley · 15 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Well 2015 appears to be business as usual for America's most prolific liar and stalker Pauley Perrette (also known as "Abby" on "NCIS")

Continuing our reporting of the Pauley Perrette restraining order abuse scandal unraveling in the L.A. County courts, Miss Pauley seems to have rung in the new year right where she left off in 2014: that is, stalking her ex-husband Francis Coyote Shivers!

Fans of Perrette's NCIS co-star Cote de Pablo, known as #CotesArmy, have long been aware of Perrette's outbursts of jealousy of the younger, more popular De Pablo. Perrette has even had some recent late-night twitter meltdowns, ranting and raving and falsely accusing innocent young NCIS fans of being Mr. Shivers himself, apparently for saying they want De Pablo back on the show. But Perrette's well documented jealousy of De Pablo, and anger towards De Pablo for leaving (or "divorcing") the television show NCIS, is nothing compared to the jealousy and obsession that fuels Perrette's relentless stalking of her happily remarried ex-husband Francis Coyote Shivers. So much that Pauley Perrette just spent New Years Eve trying to get as close as possible to Mr. Shivers and his wife! And we have the evidence here.

As we have reported and what is well known: Mr. Francis Shivers has worked for years as a musician and a DJ, primarily in a very small distinct area of Hollywood that is known as the Cahuenga Corridor, or "Strip" which is an area on Cahuenga Boulevard just south of Hollywood Boulevard. Go to this link and view the map to see the proximity of the various bars, clubs and restaurants. Pay close attention to a club called "The Powder Room", which is right in the middle.

Mr. Shivers has DJ'd at virtually every one of the night clubs on this strip and has done so for over a decade, including many new year's eve's during that time period. Below is an actual Facebook photo from a previous New Years Eve showing Shivers Djing at Burgundy Room, directly across the street from Powder Room.

So well-known was the fact that Shivers was a fixture in the "Cahuenga Strip," LA film director Paul Sapiano directed a 2005 film entitled "The Boys & Girls Guide to Getting Down" where he cast Shivers in a cameo appearance specifically due to his "omnipresence" in this particular little area, and in April of 2012, Mr. Sapiano signed a sworn declaration stating that information, which you can view here: Declaration of Paul Sapiano April 1 2012 (PDF).

This declaration was used by Shivers during Miss Pauley's latest bid to get her wish: yet another restraining order against Mr. Shivers for her trophy collection. He used it to show that Perrette has for a decade, continued to go into areas where she most expects to find her ex-husband, and then scream and yell and dial 9-1-1 to claim that Shivers is stalking her and in violation of the restraining order, just like she did in the Shintaro incident in 2012 by following Shiver's social media postings showing it was him and his current wife's favorite restaurant.

Below is one of several social media postings by Shivers on December 29, 2014, just 48 hours before New Year's Eve, commenting about being on the Cahuenga Strip "as usual" where Shivers checks into the night club "The Powder Room," a venue smack in the middle of where he has been a fixture for a decade.

In short, Mr. Shivers is well-known and is a fixture in this very small specific area of Hollywood nightlife. Our investigation and interviews with countless locals confirm over and over that it is obvious to everyone where Mr. Shivers is expected to be on New Years Eve.

So where does Miss Pauley, a millionaire who has the financial resources to travel anywhere in the world, party on New Year's Eve? A penthouse suite in Vegas? A secluded romantic beach with a current lover? Nope. You guessed it, the Cahuenga Strip. Right in the middle of it at, you guessed it, "The Powder Room," deliberately placing herself within 100 yards of where her ex-husband Francis Coyote Shivers is expected to be kissing his wife of five years, Mayra Dias Gomes, at midnight.

In fact, Perrette even took to social media to proudly announce where she was at on New Year's Eve, like she was sending a message to her ex-husband and his wife saying "hey look you two, look where I'm at, I'm trying to set you up again, i will never ever stop…"

Perrette even admitted in a Tweet that it was she who made the New Year's Eve plans, so she cant even pretend it was someone elses idea that she was somehow dragged along to. Nope. This was where Pauley Perrette herself, with purposeful forethought, deliberately placed herself on New Year Eve.

Aaawww… isn't that sweet? She is really concerned for the welfare of others that she politely reminds everyone not to drink and drive. What a friggen humanitarian.

Take a look at Pauley's New Years Eve tweet below and she is at the bottom of the picture along with group of "hanger-ons." You will also notice the name, "The Powder Room" in pink in the window behind them. Literally about 10 yards behind the window and just to the right, Perrette can actually see the entrance to Burgundy Room, where the above photo shows her ex-husband DJ'ing on New Years Eve. This is as creepy as it gets folks.

At the right of the picture is Perrette's so called boyfriend, Thomas Arklie. You remember him; the guy who Perrette started dating because he was Shivers regular bartender for many years, and who Perrette incited to call Shivers a "faggot" on the night of the "Shintaro" incident that was captured on tape as he tried to assault him. I guess Perrette's gay friends and gay causes that she advocates for (or, ahem, uses to promote her career and fake public image) have forgiven her for her boyfriend's outrageous comments. Or perhaps she covers that information up from these organizations when she is using them for publicity:

Now, we dont even have to ask to know that Miss Pauley already had a perfectly believable excuse all lined up for why she just happened to end up in Shivers' neighborhood within a just few feet of where has likely to be (just like at Shintaro restaurant), but gee, if Miss Pauley was telling the truth and truly afraid of her ex-husband (whom she has stalked and terrorized for a decade), any person with half of a brain wouldn't be within miles of an area where their ex-spouse would most likely be working or partying on New Year's Eve. But of course, that's exactly what Pauley wants and what she's trying to do.

Also keep in mind that Perrette lives in 90068, but this all takes place in the 90028 neighborhood, where you guessed it, Mr. Shivers both works and lives–with his wife of five years, Mayra.

Pauley Perrette follows the same pattern that she has for a decade. She follows Shivers social media to know where he is going to be, or most likely to be, then rather than avoiding that location, she shows up, faints, screams and puts on an acting performance to claim that Shivers is stalking her and wants him arrested. Yawn… so what else is new?

Thankfully, Shivers and his wife were nowhere near Hollywood on New Year's Eve, and video cameras definitively verify their location. Poor Pauley. Foiled again.

These actions and behavior on Pauley Perrette's part are in contrast to her testimony in court last September 24th and 26th that we covered here in a previous post. While on the witness stand, and with tears streaming down her face, shaking hands and trembling lips, she testified how terrified she is of her ex, how she is being stalked, and how she can barely function knowing he is out there. It could have been an Oscar winning performance for a movie that could be called "Liar of the Century." That is, if her acting wasn't so bad. Witnesses remarked at how transparent Perrette's courtroom antics were, especially after watching her laughing, pointing, and scowling at her ex-husband and his wife out in the hallway, when she was out of sight of Judge Stephen Maloney.

Pauley has demonstrated this same pattern before during previous court testimony which we have verified through our trial watchers, court transcripts, and Pauley's own big mouth on Twitter. She has repeatedly referred to Shivers as "her stalker," but her behavior, actions, and social media posts tell a completely different story.

In the Shintaro restaurant case, where Perrette waited for Shivers and his wife to arrive at their favorite restaurant so she could call 911, she has asked for the longest prison sentence against her ex-, again trembling with tears in her eyes, after just minutes before laughing and joking out in the hallway, out of sight of Judge Kathryn Solorzano.

After Shivers refused to take her back and filed for divorce from her, Pauley Perrette even publicly compared her marriage to the Holocaust and herself a Holocaust victim. Something that was also reported by the Daily Mail and Got News.com. So far, attorney Larry Stein has ignored our requests and Pauley Perrette refuses to apologize for her statements about the Holocaust.

Does anyone have any doubt, after seeing this same pattern of behavior on Pauley's part, not completely convinced of what she is doing? Can you say, F-R-A-U-D?

The face of the false restraining order is Pauley Perrette, and that will be her legacy. Despite epic evidence of this fraud and circus, she has so far managed to avoid criminal prosecution and mainstream public backlash. But that is changing. With the ongoing investigations by civil rights groups gathering more evidence every day, and mainstream press like the NY Post, London Daily Mail, GotNews.com, Radar Online, and even the National Enquirer are slowly realizing what has been an open secret in Hollywood circles for some time now, and that dam will burst. And when it does, Pauley Perrette will have nobody to blame but herself.

Even the handful of starstruck public officials who have so far "bent the rules" to protect Perrette (Elizabeth Gertz and Jose Viramontes for example) are starting to realize that Perrette is not being completely truthful with them and this is one big growing celebrity stink they don't want to be associated with. Even Perrette's personal Private Investigator, John Nazarian, famously exposed for advising his clients how to falsify police reports, appears to be distancing himself from this scandal.

We can't make this stuff up folks. Maybe I'll write a movie script and call it "Crazy Star" about how a female TV star can lie to get restraining orders so she can use them as weapons to stalk her ex. Oh wait, Pauley already did that, in her own handwriting.

AVFM will continue to bring to you developments as we learn them and will continue to report every time we find Perrette stalking her ex, and going into his neighborhood trying to orchestrate another false 911 emergency. We also have some MAJOR bombshells coming in this case.

And we will continue to advocate on behalf of the many others who have also been victims of the lesser-famous versions of Pauley Perrette out there, abusing the restraining order process for vindictive motives, destroying lives and wasting precious resources which should be used for real victims. Although we have covered this growing Hollywood scandal extensively on this site, and NCFM has covered it as well, the bigger issue iis the abuse of the restraining order process and the built in and routine biases and discrimination, that males encounter when faced with false R/O's., and the current lack of accountability for proven false accusers like Perrette.

Hopefully, one of these days, we can bring you pictures of some of these folks in orange jumpsuits with the words, "L.A. COUNTY JAIL" stenciled on the back.

Sing it to the tune of the TV show "COPS":

Watcha gonna do

Watcha gonna do, when AVFM comes for you

Bad boys, bad boys…

Pavlov's Parasites

Jim Muldoon · 15 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Ivan Pavlov, in experiments he was conducting on the digestive system of dogs, noted that the dogs would begin salivating when the technician who fed them came into the room. His interest in this was that salivation is a reflex action, not a conscious action. In further experiments, he found that the dogs could be "conditioned" to associate various stimuli, for example the sound of a bell, with food so that, when hearing the bell, the dog would begin salivating.

This, of course, is because dogs, like humans, learn by recognising patterns. The dogs, wanting food, were looking for any clues as to where and when the next meal might be coming from. Once they recognised the pattern of "bell rings, then food comes", then the salivating reflex is brought forward from the time of seeing actual food to the time of hearing the bell.

The problem for the dogs, and humans too, is that the pattern recognition mechanism can be tricked, which should be obvious from the experiment. There was no logical connection between the sound and the food.

Psychologists refer to the phenomenon that Pavlov documented as classical conditioning.

But let me pose a question for you. What would happen if the dogs found a way to ring the bell…?

I've put in links to four articles recently published in The Age on Domestic Violence. The details vary, but there are five things in common with all four articles apart from the subject of domestic violence. I'd warrant that the following observations would be the same if you examined almost any other Australian major publication.

First of all, Domestic Violence is something that is committed by men only, and women are only ever on the receiving end. By their continual omission, female perpetrators and male victims simply vanish in a puff of ideology.

Secondly, they are as much about money as they are about Domestic Violence. The word "money", however, is seldom used. Instead synonyms such as funding, resources, services, and "whole of government approach" are chosen to disguise the greed.

In all instances, government bodies and registered charities are described as needing more money to combat the problem.

And what a problem it is. The third theme is the moral panic. Words like "extreme", "dire", "epidemic" and "crisis" are commonplace. The measures that are currently in place, we are told, are not working and the violence is uncontrollably on the rise.

Fourth, the statistics are mind-boggling. One-in-three are this and one-in-four are that. This many killed, that many in hospitals, another number in shelters. And that's only the cases they know about. The violence is "under-reported" and there is even more violence that goes "unreported".

And lastly, giving these experts, organisations and charities money will somehow eradicate Domestic Violence. Not just help a bit, or even help a lot, but get rid of it completely.

The classical conditioning happening here is on an incredible scale, on multiple levels and requires serious examination.

On the first and most obvious level, there is the classical conditioning that Feminist social engineers are attempting to apply.

The social engineers want to condition the general public to think "men = bad" and "women = victim". Simultaneously, they are trying to conjure a more complex serious of connections between themselves and "rescuers", which leads to an association of themselves with the utopian solution, and therefore finally a link between themselves and the status of being worthy recipients of funding.

The problem for these parasites, however, is that the proof is not in the pudding. Their difficulty lies in two main areas.

First, there is a disconnect between their claimed levels of violence and the real world.

Let's ignore, for the moment, those like me who actually examine the statistics and give detailed accounts as to why they are corrupt, dishonest and plain wrong.

Most of the general public cannot make a real connection between the people they know and this world of "men bad, women good". No one they actually know, man or woman, is only good or only bad. They all tend to be human, and most of the time are "mostly good". Some men they know are more bad than good, but this also applies in equal measure to some women they know.

In other words, they instinctively know that it's not true.

The sense of moral panic with the inflated statistics is therefore utilised to cover up that reality gap and silence any doubters. Similarly the constant referral to the "unreported" numbers with reminders that it all happens behind closed doors is to keep the lid on disbelief.

It is this moral panic that ensures that those statistic checkers I mentioned earlier keep getting ignored. We can't get through the fear and paranoia.

The other fly in the parasitic ointment is that their work actually does nothing of value.

For those households with aggressive women, of course, this culture promotes and encourages their behaviour. Not only are they consequence-free while they commit their crimes, but they now have another weapon in their arsenal: the false accusation.

For those men who are violent in the home, the root causes simply vanish in another puff of ideology. Alcoholism, drug addiction, compulsive gambling and lives of crime no longer play a role in upsetting domestic bliss. Only Patriarchy is to blame.

And, of course, an alcoholic treated for Patriarchy will get just as drunk just as often and create the same havoc as before.

But stopping domestic violence is not the real aim of these Feminist do-gooders. It's all about the money, Honey.

It is a part of the human psyche to rally to the defence of helpless women. This is a reflex action. And it is essentially this that the Feminists are trying to trigger. Hit the "save women in danger" panic button , and the help, in the form of funding, popularity or votes arrives.

But humans are much better at the pattern recognition game than dogs. They can see subtleties that dogs could not. So, they cotton on that the panic is not so real, or the money is not helping, or it is just lining someone's pockets. In short, they realise that they are being tricked.

This means that the tricker needs a new sound to fool them: a different bell, buzzer, chime, or whistle.

This is where the real conditioning comes in.

Imagine if, instead of just salivating, the dogs were conditioned to do something really useful. Let's say that ringing the bell caused the dog to go fetch something of value (money or some equivalent) and give it to the bell ringer. And, for the sake of simplicity, let's imagine that the dogs' behaviour is perfectly legal.

In a few days, each person in Pavlov's laboratory would have their own private bell at home. By the end of the month, there wouldn't be a house in Pavlov's town that didn't have an identical bell.

The same thing is happening here with social engineers, Feminism, gynocentrism and money.

One group makes some small connection between say, blaming men for violence at home and money. Other social engineers see the success and try to replicate it. In other words, they begin to salivate, so they go make their own bell.

They also want to make the bell work better, to get more money. So they try to heighten the effect of the bell by strengthening the conditioning. The more effective they are, the more money comes in, the more they and others salivate.

But, if more money is what they want, they can also ring the bell more often. And the more they do, the more they salivate.

In other words, the social engineers have become conditioned, to the point of addiction, to ring that Feminist bell.

And when the bell stops working they create another trick with another sound. Gender studies, abortion, rape culture, women in leadership, women in history, education, female genital mutilation, the list goes on and on.

At this point in history today, as the four articles clearly show, the level of addiction has reached the level of a Feminist Funding Frenzy.

And it's only getting worse.

Links

http://www.theage.com.au/victoria/the-brutal-price-of-domestic-violence-20140426-37b3s.html http://www.theage.com.au/victoria/domestic-violence-nsw-hits-15year-peak-20140411-36i6b.html http://www.theage.com.au/victoria/domestic-violence-victoria-calls-for-funds-20140417-36uw8.html

http://www.theage.com.au/victoria/family-violence-epidemic-20140422-372ec.html

100% of college aged men report sexual abuse at the hands of women

AVfM Video Source · 15 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

A shocking new study reports that 100% of men experience sexual abuse at the hands of women on college campuses.

If you liked this, you might want to follow SkepTorr here.

Interdisciplinary Shaming Dept. Part I – Introduction

Paul Elam · 16 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

This article is one part of a series exposing corrupt, fear-mongering academics who used police officers and lawyers to silence a single student while they move to crush his free speech and Title IX rights. Read Part II here.

Sage Gerard has been falsely accused of creating a hostile environment for Kennesaw State University (KSU) professors, and for demonstrating a desire to kill women, among other things.

No, seriously, this really happened.

Sage is legally prohibited from contacting his accusers about the accusations they made ever again, even though the allegations were found to be false. KSU has never once made any assurance to Sage that the faculty members who are obviously targeting him will leave him and his friends alone. The final touch to this shit-sandwich is that an attorney on campus says that Sage's harassers have never harassed him.

It's not that I don't love an opportunity to speak in defense of a fellow MHRA, but I am irked that Sage Gerard has once again been legally prohibited from fighting his own fight. He should be the one writing this article, but tell that to the administrators of a University who protects "a marketplace of ideas," or whatever else bullshit the intellectual cowards at KSU tell themselves they are doing.

Some of you who have watched my interviews with Sage on my YouTube channel know that professors of the KSU Interdisciplinary Studies Department (ISD) have been viciously targeting Sage and the alleged evils he apparently embodies. Sage had to be careful about what he could or could not share, but now enough time has passed and enough evidence has been collected to provide the full story.

First Brian Clyne endangered Sage and told the cops to keep Sage from contacting him, and now professors are doing the same thing. The evidence I now have in my personal possession now shows that Sage is innocent (even in the eyes of KSU), and his accusers are more paranoid than a claustrophobic meth-head in a funhouse.

The KSU Division of Legal Affairs has not noted ISD faculty's targeted conduct in their investigation of inflammatory allegations against Sage. Instead, KSU Legal has excluded ISD's retaliatory behaviors and simply reported that Sage acted "inappropriately" in March of 2013, when he posted AVfM stickers around campus, including the inside of an empty women's restroom. It was framed to make it seem that Sage was "askin' for it," and that Sage's arguments in his defense are just complaints about what people think of him.

Keep in mind that they said this about a man who openly calls himself anti-feminist, runs a satirical award show based entirely on mocking idiots, and struts into a women's restroom to slap up stickers that says "MEN'S RIGHTS ARE HUMAN RIGHTS."

Meanwhile, no mention of the department-wide freak-out and disinformation campaign waged about Sage's opinions.

The situation has blown up to a long and complicated story that cannot fit into one article. Sage's bullies would not accept the possibility that Sage is a decent human being. They will now be proven wrong in what is likely going to become the longest article series ever published on these pages.

I offer a disclaimer and a fucking ultimatum:

Sage has made evidence available to AVfM staff in the interests of learning about his options in rectifying the situations he faced, not expressly for purposes of publication. That being said, I am the sole and final arbiter of what will be published on this site once it is in my possession—which I now have in volumes. Any opinions expressed in light of the evidence are also my own – or that of readers in the comments. My ultimatum is that if I hear of any student or faculty member retaliating against Sage for my addressing his accusers about this case, then understand that AVfM will do everything in its power to hold Kennesaw State University responsible for its failure to protect the Title IX right to a safe environment owed to one of its outstanding students, and for instead making a deliberate, systemic attempt to damage his established academic career and well-being.

In other words, back the fuck away from Sage and own up to your mistakes. And if, for whatever reason, you hubristic asshats think this is an empty threat or keyboard bravado, I suggest you look through the history of this website. Look at the judges we have forced to recuse themselves, at prosecutors we have had sanctioned, and indeed at entire prosecutors offices we have so destroyed in the public eye that they were voted out on their corrupt, lying asses.

We fucked them up with the truth, and we will do the same thing to the slimeballs that constitute the Interdisciplinary Studies Department at Kennesaw State University.

I intend to name each and every one of the Sage's abusers, provide their imagery and describe their behavior in dedicated articles. I may even cite their publications and qualifications to see if their reputation for peace, diversity and equality match their conduct. Other articles will also be produced to elaborate on case details where necessary.

Oh, and you might want to remember. Internet search queries are forever. So is our resolve to lay waste to corrupt scumbags.

There are feminist lunatics at KSU that make Big Red look like Clifford, and MHRAs can learn from Sage's example about how to protect oneself under heat. And if you need another reason to be pissed off at KSU, note that these professors have made an organized attempt to dismantle Zen Men (then KSU Men) by scaring off its faculty sponsors and by spreading lies to students. This means that if ISD succeeded, all of the donations you all have been offering Sage to do the incredible work he does would end up in limbo, waiting for a new purpose. These feminist professors didn't just go after Sage, they went after your investment.

The perspectives of ISD will be fairly considered in light of Sage's own conduct, which would understandably upset any brainless ideologue who believes every 20-something non-feminist is a school shooter waiting for an excuse. However, any prudent person who reviews the evidence will understand that the response to Sage's actions was by no means proportionate.

Sage has given too much to be left lost at sea here, so KSU should probably consider giving more of a shit about him instead of playing politics. The world will be watching if the men's rights community has to do the job KSU should have been doing all along.

Enough delay. First in line for a public spanking is Gender Studies Coordinator Stacy Keltner.

Mr. Esmay, my paddle, please. We're going to be here for a while.

A currently bigoted affair

Jim Muldoon · 16 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

In 2010 an Australian woman brought her four Italian daughters to Australia with her. Their Italian father thought that the children were going with their mother for a holiday, but her plan was to stay.

In took over two years, and a lot of the Italian father's money, to get his children back to Italy where they belonged.

The Australian press took the mother's side with incredible bias. Her claims of the father's cruelty and mental instability, which the court dismissed, were publicised as fact. The Courier Mail, in deliberate breach of the Family Law Act, even published the girls' names and photographs, as the mother and her family members tried to put public pressure on the courts to find in her favour.

The bias is best highlighted by the fact that the girls' grandmother, that is the mother's mother, threatened to murder the children, which she claimed was preferable to allowing the children to return to their father.

This led to the Federal Police undertaking a nationwide search for the girls. The Australian media were happy to publicise the mother's tears and fears about the police sending the children straight to Italy. However, not once did they mention the murder threat.

Even the courts gave the father as much of a kicking as they could. The murder threats, after the police search was called, were not treated as proof that the mother and her family did not have the children's best interests at heart. Instead, they allowed the mother to run up the appeals in order to run down the father's money and resolve.

Consider this court order that dealt with the expenses of flying the children back to Italy. Bear in mind that the court found that the mother caused this debacle in the first place by abducting the children:

> That the respondent mother […] pay all the necessary expenses associated with returning the children to Italy, including the cost of airfares and departure taxes (if any) for the children to travel from Brisbane International Airport to Italy, and in the event that the respondent mother fails or refuses to pay these expenses the father, Mr V, pay them. [Emphasis mine]

This settles once and for all the question of bias in the Family Court. Who else gets the right of refusal for a court order?

For the incredibly hard of thinking, no, she did not pay a cent. He paid.

Of course, the mother who would do anything for her daughters remained in Australia. She refused an all expenses paid trip back to Italy so that she could be near her daughters. She claimed that she would be imprisoned if she returned to Italy, even though the father was forced to give a legal undertaking that he would not seek charges against her in Italy.

Now Channel 9's A Current Affair have interviewed an Australian woman who, they tell us, is in a similar situation. She has brought her two South African children to Australia to "visit," and, now that the move is obviously more permanent, the children's father is seeking to have the children returned to their home.

This mother has nothing but tears and a sentence from a text message to convince us that the father had actually given his permission. The rest of the message was obscured, so we have no idea of the context in which that sentence was typed. However, for the reporter, that was as good as official documentation signed in triplicate.

Suspiciously, the story soon switches from "gave his permission" to "not interested in the children" without explaining the jump.

From there, we are to make another leap as the story changes again. Now we are to believe that it is the father's mother, that is the children's grandmother, who actually wants the children and not the father himself. Much is made of the fact that the father's parents are rich, and can therefore afford to drag this "Aussie mum" through the courts. The implication is that if Mummy didn't have the money, then the father wouldn't get off his arse to get his children if they lived across the street.

But, the reporter informs us that the stakes for this tearful, but poor, mother could not be higher:

> Lose the battle and she loses her children.

There are two other aspects to the story which make the stench almost unbearable. The first is a segment where they describe the case of an Englishman who found himself in a similar position.

This man had children with an Australian woman in England. One day he went to work, assuming that his wife was dropping the children off at school and then going to work herself. When he came home, he found out that they had actually moved to the other side of the world.

In perhaps some recognition of his pain, they allow him to describe his anguish at finding his children abducted, and acknowledge that the Australian government added insult to injury by forcing him to pay some 14 months child support in "arrears."

Unstated by the story, however, is the fact that the Englishman had the same right to demand that the Australian woman returned with his children. He did this, and she and the children were returned to England where the custody dispute took place under British Family Law.

It was there that the shared custody arrangement that they now have in Australia was agreed upon. Of course, this contradicts the claim that the woman will lose her children if they are returned to South Africa, and so didn't get past the cutting room.

Also on the cutting room floor would be the part where the judge said:

> Child abduction seldom, if ever, has a happy ending. It has rightly been described as a form of child abuse

The real point of this story for A Current Affair, however, is that the Englishman did the manly thing and moved to Australia to be with his children.

> At least now he has quality contact.

The implication being that if the South African man truly wanted to see his children, he would do the same. And, in giving in to her demands that everyone should relocate, he is somehow guaranteed "quality contact."

The other bizarre angle is that the mother didn't want to return to South Africa because it is a dangerous place to live. There are two issues here.

First, we are told that the woman, born in Australia, met the South African man whilst she was living with her mother in South Africa. Twice she returned to Australia to study and live. On both occasions she realised she was pregnant and returned to South Africa. Whilst South Africa no doubt has its crime issues, they haven't just started in the last couple of weeks. Not only did the crime issue not deter her from living in South Africa herself, but twice she returned to live in South Africa with her children.

But also, consider that she has returned to Melbourne. Is this a safer alternative? These are just some recent headlines from a sensationalist media:

> A 47-year-old man has been assaulted by two men with handguns and bats during a home invasion in Gisborne, north of Melbourne.
>
> A group of armed men have beaten a 20-year-old man to death and injured two others after forcing their way > into a Melbourne home.

>
> A 32-year-old man has been charged over the sexual assault of a woman during a home invasion in Melbourne.

A Current Affair has often covered such stories, with all the sensationalist footage they could find.

We have also just had the Jon Faine's Special Forum on "Women, violence and culture in our society" on ABC Radio. The cases the ABC cites as proof of "the culture of violence against women in our community," are cases that have brought many a "Special Report" on A Current Affair.

It seems that the truth is whatever will have the biggest shock value, and whatever will encourage neurotic women to feel that A Current Affair will be there to protect them when they cry.

The children, like the father, will just have to accept their role in pleasing the advertisers.

Links

http://www.9news.com.au/national/2014/07/17/19/34/mum-s-international-battle-with-grandparents-over-kids

http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-2695751/Young-Australian-woman-fears-two-children-forced-live-South-Africa-father-accused-kidnapping-them.html http://www.avoiceformen.com/misandry/grandma-threatens-to-murder-children/http://www.brisbanetimes.com.au/queensland/the-couriermail-pleads-guilty-to-family-law-breach-in-the-italian-sisters-custody-case-20130823-2sfii.html

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=JF4I_gBfdp4

http://www.austlii.edu.au/au/cases/cth/FamCA/2011/485.html

http://www.abc.net.au/local/stories/2014/07/18/4049223.htm?site=melbourne&ref=front-page-slider-melbourne-regional-landing

http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-2284782/Mother-kidnapped-children-ran-away-Australia-complaining-husband-spent-time-playing-sport.html

http://www.facebook.com/kidswithoutvoices/info

http://www.f4e.com.au/blog/2012/05/15/abusive-father-or-parental-alienation/

http://www.abc.net.au/news/2014-07-04/gisborne-man-assaulted-with-bats-during-home-invasion/5571788

http://www.theaustralian.com.au/news/nation/man-killed-by-group-of-armed-intruders-in-melbourne-home-invasion/story-e6frg6nf-1226811259136

http://www.dailytelegraph.com.au/man-charged-over-melbourne-home-invasion/story-e6freuz0-1226517242496

http://aca.ninemsn.com.au/article/8623252/terror-home-invasion

British government's "Impact Assessment" on the law on domestic abuse

Mike Buchanan · 16 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial note: General Elections in the UK are about 16 weeks from now. Justice 4 Men and Boys (& The Women Who Love Them) is a right-wing/conservative party concerned with men's and boys' issues whose election strategy is to run candidates in seats the Conservatives (also known as Tories) have only a marginal advantage in, to give conservative voters an alternative and to force the currently-in-power Conservative government to pay attention to our issues. Most of us at AVfM think this is a brilliant strategy and hope to see other political parties left, right, and center follow similar strategies. –Eds

Our thanks to "N" for pointing us towards this, the government's Impact Assessment on the Home Office's plans to 'strengthen' the law on domestic abuse. Unusually for such an important government document, it's been released a PDF. It will surely be a wake-up call for anyone still suffering from the delusion that strengthening the law on domestic abuse may benefit men. In practice it will simply extent the grounds on which malicious women can hound partners – and former partners, as we'll see – in line with their judgments of 'abuse' (whether real, imagined, or invented). Many jobs will be created in the domestic violence industry 'educating' women about coercive control – well, you didn't think Women's Aid were working with the Home Office for altruistic reasons, did you?

We publicly challenged Theresa May MP, Home Secretary, to cancel the feminist-driven consultation exercise – here – and later submitted a 154-page report showing what's long been known by researchers about the subject of domestic abuse / violence, outlining the anti-male bias of public bodies and individual politicians (including Theresa May MP, Home Secretary, and Yvette Cooper MP, Shadow Home Secretary) as well as people in public bodies including Alison Saunders, Director of Public Prosecutions, the radical feminist head of the Crime Prosecution Service. We had acknowledgements of the receipt of both documents, but no responses, substantive or otherwise.

> Public accountability is a fine thing.

Onto the Impact Assessment, which is highly detailed, and 28 pages long. We note it's the final draft of the assessment, suggesting earlier drafts. Just six week elapsed between the end of the "consultation" exercise ending – 15.10.14 – and the final report being prepared.

A considerable amount of consultation must have go on with various public bodies to gather the detailed information presented in the report. The idea that this exercise might have started only after the results of the consultation exercise were known, is to beggar belief. A two-legged tortoise would have a higher chance of outrunning an Olympic athlete.

This in itself is strongly indicative that the results of the consultation exercise were utterly predictable, and that in parallel with the charade (and indeed before) civil servants were working on the impact assessment. It took a further six weeks for the document to be signed – last Wednesday, 7 January – by someone whose signature is indecipherable, and whose name isn't printed. In signing the document, the person was confirming:

> I have read the Impact Assessment and I am satisfied that (a) it represents a fair and reasonable view of the expected costs, benefits and impact of the policy, and (b) that the benefits justify the costs.

So what are the expected costs? Over a period of 10 years, between £75.6 million and £164.4 million, with a "best estimate" of £119.1 million (all at Total Net Present Value). On page 7 of the report we see a breakdown of the £119.1 million estimate, which I've placed in descending cost order:

HM Prisons £43.1m

Probation Service £19.6m

Police £19.2m

Crown Prosecution Service £15.7m

Magistrates' courts £13.7m

Legal Aid Agency £7.8m

We can be very confident that all, or virtually all, of the new prisoners convicted under this "strengthening" of the law on domestic abuse will be men. Men already make up 95.4% of those in prisons in England and Wales (81,045 male v 3,932 female prisoners), and it's known that if men were treated as leniently as women in sentencing terms, five out of six men in British prisons wouldn't be there, as William Collins demonstrated – here.

Let's remind ourselves that men will pay 72% of the income taxes which will largely finance this extension of the state's assaults on men.

From the first page of the document (that signed by Ms Anonymous):

> What are the policy objectives and the intended effects?
> The main objective of the policy is to ensure the legislative framework covers all domestic abuse, in particular controlling and coercive behaviour, in intimate relationships. This is so that the public understand and recognise that domestic abuse, including coercive and controlling behaviour, is illegal and perpetrators are brought to justice. The intended effect is more reporting of domestic abuse, more prosecutions, a reduction in the number of repeat victims, and ultimately a reduction in domestic abuse.

There' so much nonsense there I could point out, but hardly need to, for followers of this blog. Let's move on.

On p1 we find the following "key monetised benefit by main affected groups":

> Frontline services may be able to intervene earlier and more effectively with victims, which may prevent the abuse from escalating into physical and/or sexual abuse…

Again, no commentary needed, beyond pointing out this is a recipe for the state to rip men out of their own homes at the whim of a woman. If THAT isn't "coercive control," I don't know what is.

We often hear the claim from politicians and other public officials that strategies and initiatives termed "End Violence against Women and Girls" and the like are equally concerned with male victims (and female perpetrators) and weasel words are employed in an effort to substantiate the lie, when the reality is – of course – very different. The author – or, more likely, authoress – of this impact assessment couldn't even be bothered to pretend anyone in the government cares about male victims of domestic abuse. The first paragraph of the Background on p2:

> Tackling all forms of violence against women and girls, (my emphasis) including domestic abuse, has been a key priority for this Government. The strategy for tackling domestic abuse is set out in 'A Call to End Violence against Women and Girls' . Each year, a refreshed action plan has been published to deliver against this strategy. This has led to a range of interventions to improve the response to domestic abuse.

The cited EVAWG document, prepared by the Crown Prosecution Service, is here.

There's much more in this impact assessment I could write about, but the election is 16 or 17 weeks away, and I need to focus on that. I'll leave you by commenting on some of the content on pp 7,8 of the document, on "Option 2," the proposal to introduce new legislation – through an amendment to the Serious Crimes Bill – "to criminalise patterns of coercive and controlling conduct perpetrated within intimate and family relationships." The extract:

> Draft Framework
> 35. Subject to Parliamentary Counsel advice, the framework for the offence is likely to be along the following lines:
>
> (1) A person (A) commits an offence if—
>
> (a) A repeatedly or continuously engages in behaviour towards another person (B) > that is controlling or coercive,
> (b) at the time of the behaviour, A and B are personally connected,
> (c) the behaviour has a serious effect on B, and > (d) A knows or ought to know that the behaviour will have a serious effect on B.
>
> (2) A and B are "personally connected" if—
> (a) A is in an intimate personal relationship with B, or > (b) A and B live together and—
> (i) they are members of the same family, or > (ii) they have previously been in an intimate personal relationship with each other.
>
> (3) But A does not commit an offence under this section if at the time of the behaviour in question—
> (a) A and B are personally connected by virtue of subsection (2)(b)(i),
> (b) A is a parent of B or has parental responsibility for B, and > (c) B is under 16.
>
> (4) A's behaviour has a "serious effect" on B if—
> (a) it causes B to fear, on at least two occasions, that violence will be used against B, or > (b) it causes B serious alarm or distress which has a substantial adverse effect on B's usual day-to-day activities.

In plain English, this "strengthening" of the law will make a criminal of any man with an intimate partner or former intimate partner(s) – not necessarily a wife – if one of those women claims that on at least two occasions she's feared violence would be used against her. A completely subjective judgment on her part, and the man needn't have struck a woman in his life. No, the woman's feelings – real, imagined, or invented – will make him a criminal, and may even lead to his imprisonment.

Yet another reason why we keep saying Men Shouldn't Marry.

Book Review: Stand By Your Manhood

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 16 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Peter Lloyd walks into the newsroom at the Daily Mail and sees Liz Jones (I Stole My Husband's Sperm And Tried to Trick Him Into Pregnancy), Shona Sibary (I Would Rather Mop Than Have Sex With My Husband), Samantha Brick (Don't Hate Me Because I'm Beautiful) and Esther Walker (I Wish My Baby Wasn't A Beastly Boy) and remarkably, does not run screaming in the other direction. Instead, Lloyd complains to an editor that one of his female colleagues (he doesn't say whom) is just a tad sexist against men in her writing.

And thus his first column on men's issues was born.

Lloyd's book Stand By Your Manhood takes the same fearless, uncompromising stance against sexism as his regular pieces in the Daily Mail and does so in a way that is both empowering and humorous. Lloyd openly and enthusiastically declares his admiration for men and masculinity, writing "men are bloody brilliant." The book never descends into self-pitying or shaming tactics as he takes on key issues facing men and manhood. All too often, men's issues are framed in the mainstream media as something men have done to themselves, or something they could address if they would just "man up," if they are addressed at all. Lloyd refuses to cast men as pathetic wimps, and his entire book is a call to arms for men to celebrate, acknowledge, and take pride in themselves as men.

A master of the neologism, Lloyd coins some hilarious terms including Gal-qaeda and She-hadists to describe radical feminists. There are several others that left me giggling even as the topics at hand were dead serious. Lloyd backs up his explorations of issues such as pornography and sexuality, parenthood and marriage, body image and double standards with readily understandable data, sources, and interviews with practitioners in the field, many of whom will be known to regular readers of AVfM. I was taken aback by some of his findings, which increased my own knowledge of just how much sexism and control men are subject to. Before reading this book, I was not aware that men need their wives's written permission to have a vasectomy! "His body, my choice?" Double standards indeed.

When it comes to male sexuality, Lloyd insists that "women do not own sex" and points to the infantilizing assumptions behind things like "ban the lad mags" campaigns. Male sexuality is a force that belongs to men, and men "do not need permission to consume something legal [explicit photos of women in magazines]." Women readers may squirm a bit as Lloyd interviews some of the women who both produced and posed for explicit photographs, as both groups of women identify other women as the main source of sexism and bigotry.

Bitches be jealous, not to put too fine a point on it.

No doubt, Lloyd will be accused of misogyny for writing about women in a less that one hundred percent flattering light. Lloyd is ruthlessly logical when it comes to women's hypocrisy on certain issues, and pointing out that women have a few flaws is not misogyny. It is very clear that Lloyd is not under any influence and does not seek to appease or appeal to women, but rather demands they act like equals, respected because they have shown themselves worthy of respect. There is an eye-opening exploration of gay men's sexuality and how it is subject to fewer constraints and rules precisely because it does not seek to appeal to women. Lloyd balances the need to for men to be free of women's toxic influence, which aligns with Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW) quite nicely, but rather than eschew women altogether, he suggests that men embrace themselves as fully human and let women learn to cope with that. Or not.

For me, the most interesting part of Lloyd's book is his section on marriage, which he calls the Fraud of the Rings. Lloyd details all the ways in which current laws permit the exploitation of men through the marriage contract. Once again, my own knowledge was expanded as I learned that men can be held financially responsible for women through the simple act of becoming engaged to one. The contract need not even be signed to be enforced. The topic of marriage leads naturally into the twin subjects of parenthood and divorce, and Lloyd explores how sexist assumptions about men have led to skewed laws that favor women to a ridiculous degree. He points out that children who grow up without a father figure, both boys and girls, adopt toxic versions of masculinity and femininity in response to the "hole in their soul." The chapter is a sobering read and should be required for any man even considering marriage. Lloyd also offers some solid precautions for men who choose to go the marriage way.

In a section appropriately called Bullshit, Lloyd takes on "The Patriarchy," "independent women," video games, war, the wage gap, and the concept of being a "real man." With razor sharp wit, biting sarcasm, and solid evidence, he addresses each topic, encouraging men to take pride in themselves and refuse the demand that they must change to accommodate a "new world order." He advocates for "conscious masculinity" that interrogates, investigates and ultimately celebrates men and masculinity, in all of its many manifestations. There are indeed many ways to be a man, and the real takeaway from this book is that "fucking up is a human trait, not a male defect."

Ultimately Lloyd has written a book that celebrates men as human beings, capable of the full range of human emotion and behaviors, both the good and the bad. Being human takes nothing away from being men, and Lloyd's call to men is to take both comfort and pride in being men. "Men are brilliant," and it's time to applaud that openly and energetically.

Stand By Your Manhood is a standing ovation for men.

The book is available for sale here, and has been chosen as the Daily Mail's Book of the Week.

Please join me on the Suck It Up Buttercup Hangout this Saturday, where I will be interviewing Peter Lloyd, discussing the book and his ideas in more detail.

Will Wendy Squires take the red pill?

Jim Muldoon · 17 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

In an article, “Teenage hook-up sex leaves feminism behind,” Wendy Squires struggles with her conscience as she tries to seriously assess how teenage girls view sexual relations. The problem, it seems, is that the actual outcomes of Feminism might not be the Utopia that the Sisterhood promised.

> It is true I find this issue a conundrum, one that tests my own moral boundaries and ethics. As a feminist, I agree I should be supporting young women to live their lives the way they wish; reinforcing the idea that it is their bodies and their choices.

Yes, her body, her choice. But the difficult here, as always, is that it ends up as her problem. And that is where Feminists get in a bind. If women are calling the shots and it all goes wrong, how can they blame men?

This doesn’t stop Squires from trying:

> But, perhaps because I have also have been talking to a lot of young men lately who are either participating in or witnessing hook-up culture, I must confess I am left in despair.

The problem seems to be that these young men are not adhering to their Patriarchal assigned gender roles of providers and protectors.

> From what I’m hearing, young men are happy to participate in casual sex and claim they are still friends with lots of girls they have “been” with. However, ask if they would consider any of them as girlfriend material and a vast majority respond with a vehement “no way”.

Implied here is that “his body, his choice” is not an acceptable attitude. But still, we have the irony of a Feminist telling us to be concerned that these young women won’t get “their man.” Sounding perhaps like her grandmother, Squires tries to give the damsels a word to the wise.

> “But, don’t you worry that this is all too much, too soon? That you’ll wind up jaded or regret your choices?”

Out of the mouths of babes (in both senses of the word, perhaps) comes an reproach for Squires.

> “And you call yourself a feminist!” one young friend admonished. “Now girls are acting like men always have, there’s supposed to be a shame around it. How hypocritical!”

The claim that the girls are “acting like men always have,” is not accurate, but the young woman certainly has a point regarding Feminist hypocrisy.

I am reminded of the Slut Walks and other Feminist propaganda regarding a young woman’s “right” to dress up as provocatively as they like without censure. Dressing like a slut (which apparently involves fishnet stockings and showing your bra), and talking like a slut, is alright by Feminists. But hang on, missy, you can’t be a real slut.

It seems that for Squires this surface view of the issue is as far as she can go. And as long as she stays there, this conundrum will continue to confound her. The answer lies hidden in plain view as she tries again to re-state the problem:

> “While I think it is commendable that young women feel in charge of their bodies and lives, I do wonder whether it comes at the cost of what is at our feminine core, whether through nature or nurture, and that is a > desire to feel secure and respected in our romantic relationships."

A central tenet of Feminism is that gender is a social construct. The theory is that, when born, each child, whilst having a sex, does not have a gender. The child's gender is developed as it interacts with society. In most cases, those with penises are taught to be masculine, and so become men and, apparently, privileged. Similarly, those with vaginas are dressed in pink, given dolls to play with, and turn out to be girls, then women, and oppressed.

In other words, to be a Feminist, there is no "feminine core" because there is no dispute about "nature or nurture." For them, it is all nurture. Each child may have inherent traits that are human, but feminine and masculine traits come straight from The Patriarchy.

It is difficult to overstate the importance of this. Let me explain it by way of an analogy: If a person states that they don't believe that Jesus was the son of God, they could also claim to be a Jew, a Muslim or an atheist. But, they cannot honestly claim to be a Christian.

However, and this is the important bit, Feminism is the only ideology where an individual can declare themselves a Feminist whilst, at the same time, renouncing the ideology's central tenets, as Squires does.

That is the real hypocrisy, and that is real Feminism.

So Squires does this pseudo-intellectual, phoney angst-ridden hand-wringing about these girls and their potential futures. Yet, the cause of this entire dilemma is her own beloved Feminism. Instead of the puppy love she herself fumbled through as a teenager, these girls are getting straight onto the hard stuff and the result is not pretty. And worse, the Social Engineering of Feminism is not producing the strong independent women they desire.

> Of all the young girls I've spoken to recently, I'd say 90 per cent told me they want to get married and have kids one day.

Indeed, Feminism has ensured that, as long as the children and divorces are timely, marriage can still be a career for the modern women. But, as Squires notes, there's a fly in the ointment.

> All [the girls] implied they are aware that men are less likely to commit than in generations past…

For these particular girls, it seems the problem is even more acute:

> "I would never go out with a girl who's been with my mates," one 17-year-old told me. His friend, 19, agrees. "No guys go out with girls who screw around."

These young men, at least, are making some wise choices. Hooking up with these girls is like diving in the public swimming pool even when the sign outside says they've ran out of chlorine.

But, of course, it's not only diseases that they might pick up. Thanks to Feminist inspired laws, they might pick up the tab for someone else's kid. Or, it might be their own kid that they're paying for, but that doesn't mean they'll get to know them.

If only the Feminist mayhem stopped there. These young men would also run the risk of a "hook up" being later described as rape in front of a judge, especially if she had any alcohol that evening.

That's a lotta risk for a little nookie, and no incentive for "commitment." For Squires, however, being a Feminist, there is little interest in the men's problems. Presumably they should simply man up, bring their own chlorine and anti-biotics, and make honest women out of them regardless of the personal cost.

Squires does, obliquely, touch on one other aspect of this topic that is normally front and centre of most newspaper rants on the subject:

> One just-turned-17-year-old, who will remain anonymous so her mother doesn't kill her and then me, confessed that she has had sex with seven guys "so far"

Squires' view of the parents is that they don't need to know the risks their daughter is taking. Of course, should it hit the fan, in the form of pregnancy or AIDS, Squires will probably join the rest of the mainstream media bemoaning how parents today let their children go off the rails.

However, parental authority has been undermined in so many ways by the Feminist agenda. Mostly, this comes from the Family Law Act and the Children, Youth and Families Act. Essentially, parents have no rights, and therefore no real means to assert their authority.

By this, I'm not talking about trivia like who decides what's for breakfast. I'm talking about the point when the child wants to move into the adult world of sex, drugs and rock 'n' roll, but is in no way ready for the consequences. It is at this point that parents find out that the schools, social workers, police, lawyers , magistrates and other authorities all agree with Squires: that the child's actions are none of the parent's business, except when it comes to paying the fines and fees.

This in turn allows children to dictate terms to their parents, rather than the other way around. And if the parents don't like the terms, the child can claim "abuse" and move into state care, where they can behave however they like. The more children who do this, the more other children will find out that they can push their parents even closer to the edge.

Of course, the State likes this arrangement. The more children in care, the bigger the Department of Human Services needs to be.

None of this, of course, get Squires out of her conundrum. All of this, ultimately, is detrimental to the young women themselves. In clumsily using sex to get boys to like them, they can end up doing themselves a lot more harm than good.

So the question, in the end, for Squires is: will she take the red pill and get some idea of how deep the rabbit hole goes? Or will she just keep running around in circles with her angst, looking for a man to blame?

Links

http://www.theage.com.au/comment/teenage-hookup-sex-leaves-feminism-behind-20140627-zsolw.html

Free speech, white knights & feminist hypocrisy

Ken Gallagher · 17 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

For those of you that don't know, feminism has invented yet another form of imaginary male oppression called rape culture. This figment is used by feminists to quash anyone who opposes, or so much as appears to oppose, almost any modern day feminist doctrine. In the "rape culture" fantasy, virtually anything a man says or does that can be contrived as even remotely sexual in nature contributes to the myth and is deemed a threat to the physical safety of women everywhere.

Raunchy pop music is part of rape culture. (And what pop music isn't raunchy these days?) Mythical street harassment is rape culture. The University of Virginia fraternity rape case, even though it was bereft of facts, is part of rape culture. The electronic content men publish on social media websites is part of rape culture. Personally, as a men's rights activist, I think oxygen is part of rape culture because it's simply a matter of time until feminism tells us so.

Naturally, you never hear anything about women's behavior when the feminists are screaming bloody murder. Robin Thicke somehow contributes to rape culture while mention of Miley Cyrus is conveniently absent (at least so far as our "rape culture" goes). And Beyoncé has already declared allegiance to the cult, so she's off the hook. And there's no mention of street harassment when it's rational women catcalling a good-looking young man walking around New York City.

I think you'll agree that this imaginary victim complex is rooted in hypocrisy and is largely facilitated by corrupt politicians and their minion purple poodles and white knights. And if you're like me, you're sick and tired of being labeled a monster by people that know absolutely nothing about you. Males today are hated not because of what we've done, but simply because of what we are – male.

Message from feminism: all men victimize all women.

So, as it were, there was a huge fit of feminist hysteria a couple of weeks ago in Halifax, Canada at Dalhousie University's school of dentistry when it was discovered that a gentlemen's club had been created online in the form of a private Face Book page where a dozen or so male dentistry students were talking trashy toilet talk centered around some young women who also attend the school. So much was the hysteria, that it made national news headlines.

As it turns out, no criminal charges have been laid for the simple reason that no crime has been committed. But, as expected, the brainwashed leftists continue to crow their misogyny anthem as they are of the opinion their feelings should outweigh free speech and the rule of law. Once again, the feminist mind control police feel they must enforce conformity to a twisted ideology despite not knowing the difference between degrading scribbles on a private Face Book page and the actual commission of a violent crime.

Message from feminism: non-conformists must conform.

However; of greater interest is the publicly funded Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, or CBC, which in itself, is a very leftist, pro-feminist organization. In fact, so much so, I jokingly refer to the CBC as the Communist Broadcasting Corporation. The vast majority of people who post on the CBC's online blog are very leftist and folks like myself, who lean right, aren't made to feel overly welcome to say the least.

This is a simple example of how the CBC blocks anything perceived as offensive:

Message from the CBC: intolerance of feminism, real or perceived, will not be tolerated

Perceived misogyny aside, I went back onto the blog with the hope of convincing even a few people that it's futile to try to control the thoughts and writings of a small group of students who were foolish enough to presumably violate school policy by allegedly posting misogynist rants and hate speech on a Facebook page despite the fact the page was private. Not to mention free speech and the rule of law. After all, is Canada not a free country? Do feminists not have anything better to do than troll Facebook looking for men they find offensive?

Simply put, if you don't like what's displayed on a Facebook page, then don't look at it!

Message from feminism: men should be denied their right to privacy

So I decided to post some hate speech of my own:

Wow! Threatening isn't it? I'd much prefer soldiering in Afghanistan than reading this dangerous filth! For those of you that don't know, the underlying humour in this quotation is that it is pure fiction along with its imaginary author Andrew Dworkin.

But better yet, I couldn't get over how fast three responses were posted all of which were from men rushing to the aid of women everywhere as if women are incapable of breathing without the help of men.

Message from feminism: there is a seemingly endless supply of weak men in the world eager to mindlessly defend feminism

White Supremacist? Totally misinterpreting and excusing what happened? Related to Phyllis who? I was, quite frankly, astounded that these white knights would immediately resort to shaming tactics without so much as asking a single rational question. Shocked? A little I suppose given the speed at which the responses were posted. Surprised? No. I think the blog entries shown above effectively illustrate the white knight mentality here in Canada that is shoot first; ask questions later.

Message from feminism: rational debate with purple poodles and white knights is not possible as they are afraid of men, feminists and facts

So I decided it was time these fools were given a simple history lesson by posting the factual quotation written by none other than that beacon of humanity herself, Andrea Dworkin:

JoeBlow

@JoeBlow Actually it's a spoof on a woman named Andrea Dworkin who, decades ago, originally wrote ...

"Feminism is hated because women are hated.
Anti-feminism is a direct expression of misogyny; it is the political defense of woman hating."

Just Google "Andrea Dworkin Quotes" for the truth.

8 minutes ago 0 Likes Like Reply Share

So, as one would expect, the white knights disappeared faster than they had originally appeared. Poof! Gone! Not to be heard from again!

But it gets even better. No sooner did I post the real Andrea Dworkin quote from decades ago, than I was engaged in a simple exchange with a person I'm presuming was female given her online moniker and strong ideological belief in fiction.

CanadaGirl47

@JoeBlow feminism in the 1960s was an anti establishment movement. Lots of groups don't like feminism because of its early associations. Feminism today has a very different meaning -- acknowledging women's experiences and creating justice.

23 minutes ago 0 Likes Like Reply Share

Wow! Now this goes to show the extent to which feminism has brainwashed our youth. Feminism today has a very different meaning from the feminism of the 1960s? It acknowledges women's experiences and creates justice? Justice for who? This little snowflake sounds like she just timetravelled straight out of Pol Pot's Cambodia!

Message from feminism: feminists know more about feminism than any man

So I decided it was time to melt this little snowflake.

JoeBlow

@CanadaGirl47 It's funny how the first post drew so much condemnation so quickly while the second post was met with justification. The radical feminist movement today is no different from the movement all those years ago - it isn't anti-establishment - it's anti-male. Plain and simple.

9 minutes ago 0 Likes Like Reply Share

Now anyone who can't see the hypocrisy here is crazier than Lena Dunham! Anyone who challenges feminism must be shamed and silenced forthwith while anyone who presents cold hard facts as to how evil the roots of feminism truly are is met with feeble attempts at justifying blatant hard-core misandry!

Message from feminism: Andrew represents oppression while Andrea represents empowerment

Where were all the white knights now? I guess the smell of feminist bullshit mixed with sound logic triggered an overwhelming fear of being violently offended. I find it rather comical how pro-feminists disappear so quickly when their baseless ideology is challenged using sound factual arguments. I'm not sure who can run faster? A female feminist or a white knight?

Then I was hit with even more feminist knowledge:

Message from feminism: feminists vehemently deny the truth because it directly contradicts their baseless ideology

So I responded with my own set of hard facts from the U.S. Department of Justice Statistics:

And …

Then I waited for the longest time for a response from my newfound friends but the silence was deafening. So I ended the online learning experience by politely explaining that legitimate men's rights activists are not about hating anyone. Instead, we're all about finding the truth.

While men's rights activists come from a plethora of backgrounds and include both men and women, ultimately we are united for equality as per the dictionary definition of "equality".

Preferably sooner rather than later, the day will come when words like "feminism" and "sexism" are redefined in dictionaries the world over to accurately reflect their true meanings.

But until then, I'll keep fighting alongside my fellow activists to put an end to the social poison that is a never ending stream of modern day misandry because no man should have to go through life being treated like some kind of disposable Joe Blow.

“Slap her”: children’s reactions

AVfM Video Source · 17 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Here we have a bunch of boys, full to the gills with misogyny, doing the “Patriarchy” proud.

So apparently young boys have an instinct not to hit girls. The irony being that anyone who studies it knows boys (and men) are the majority of victims of most forms of violence, including sexual violence. But they want us to believe we live in a culture of “violence against women and girls.”

We do have a question for the film makers though: what would happen if you asked the girls to hit the boys?

UFC fighter Bec Rawlings blasts new age feminists and white knights

Ty Henry · 18 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

UFC Fighter Bec Rawlings wants you to know she is free to act, dress, think and talk as she pleases. One of those thoughts is that “new age feminism” is a destructive force that can “fuck off.”

Some of her offending tweets and retweets are as follows…

https://twitter.com/RowdyBec/status/554936483321114624/

https://twitter.com/RowdyBec/status/555087198794428416/

When someone tweeted to her that feminists don’t oppose MMA, she tweeted this letter from the New York chapter of NOW to Andrew Cuomo, which equated the sport with violence against women.

https://twitter.com/RowdyBec/status/555104578958417920/

https://twitter.com/RowdyBec/status/555102655639347201/

> @mandaellengibbs @joecugo @RowdyBec This is the ugliness of today's third wave "feminism." pic.twitter.com/mEUJC2c9fz
>
> — FeministFailure (@FeministFailure) January 14, 2015

She tweeted out excerpts from this Thought Catalog piece in support of her position. . .

https://twitter.com/RowdyBec/status/555119526980124672/

https://twitter.com/RowdyBec/status/555116925638807553/

https://twitter.com/RowdyBec/status/555116905556500482/

As was to be expected, reaction to her Twitter and Instagram sentiments was swift, condemnatory, and predictable. Indeed, what better way to contravene the claims that feminism “belittles women who don’t conform” than, well, belittle a woman who doesn’t conform. The emblematic riposte was by Sydnie Jones of womensmma.com, who fell on her fainting couch whilst clutching pearls, but recovered long enough to post a finger wagging rebuke of Rawlings. Chock full of red herrings and condescension, Ms. Jones’ riposte abounds with the gender boilerplate we’ve come to expect. Let’s check a few off and break them down, shall we?

> “New age feminists…”
> Not a thing. A Google search reveals there’s no unifying definition, no group claiming to be new age feminists, > no official (or unofficial) website for the new age feminists. So what exactly is Rawlings objecting to? Something she's heard about from other anti-feminists? Trust the anti-feminists to be up on all the fringe feminist groups and have the true definition of feminism, you guys. Not, like, the dictionary. Or actual feminists.

"One True Feminist" fallacy – CHECK! Maybe Ms. Jones believes the People's Republic Of China actually has regular elections. After all, the word "People's" is right there in the title. Or maybe she took away from her civics texts that the 1649 Act Of Toleration meant anyone could worship as they wished, and did not decree death for those who denied Nazarene divinity. After all, the word "toleration" is right there in the title. Someone get this woman some Orwell – STAT!

As for the literalist hair-splitting, "new age" is a synonym for "2nd and 3rd wave," in case Ms. Jones and her fellow Inquisitors were unclear.

> Feminism criticizes patriarchal systems of oppression and points out that cultural constructs of masculinity can be detrimental. In fact, it's ascribing qualities to a gender that limits individuals and demands conformity. If supposedly "masculine" traits, such as non-emotional, aggressive, and competitive, are what constitutes masculinity, then males feel pressure to be those things – regardless of whether they feel that way.

Feminism is good for Da Mehnz, too? – CHECK!

Of course, this "patriarchal system of oppression" is hard to locate. Is it the same system where men at a tech convention can get fired over eavesdropped, misconstrued, public conversations? How does this patriarchy countenance 75% of the homeless having penises? The men of the University of Virginia's fraternity system, which was shut down (and vandalized) over a hoax, would also like the Patriarchy Hotline, as would the five Hofstra young men of color who spent a terrifying night in jail over a false rape accusation, and were victim blamed while their false accuser went free. "Cultural Constructs of Masculinity?" Feminists certainly cheer lead for the "protector/provider" model when men are jailed for being unable to subsidize a woman's unilateral reproductive decision.

Maybe we can endeavor to find it together, this "patriarchy." While we're at it, I'll take the liberty of adding the Illuminati and Tri-Lateral Commissions to this scavenger hunt as well.

Of course, like all gender feminists, Ms. Jones makes the unavoidable Freudian slip > "…don't want equal rights they want to demonize men & belittle women who don't conform!!"

>
> 'Equal rights' is literally the main tenet of feminism. And confronting society's expectations of women is another core value, with the goal being not conformity, and not even non-conformity, but a culture in which women feel free to be how they want.
>
> "My boys are not monsters…"
>
> The idea that feminism claims all human males are monstrous and awful is, again, not a real tenet of feminism.

https://twitter.com/syd1138/status/555411039647322112

NAFALT-based Plausible Deniabilty? CHECK!

Not having my copy of "The Feminist Manifesto" handy, I can only go on what they say, and what I see. So, Ms. Jones, who is it promoting the idea that college men are rape werewolves, whose rape gene gets triggered upon admission, despite all evidence to the contrary (then backpedaling when the numbers don't add up)? Or maybe it's those groups of Feminists at Hollaback!, referring to words like "hey beautiful" and "Good morning" as "street harassment." (I assume they approve of harassment of men in the same city about their body posture)

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=LQVzmrgH8QU

Who, if not gender feminists, is behind the hegemonic "Duluth Model," which defines domestic abuse as something men do to women, despite 200+ studies that show gender parity in intimate partner abuse?

> "(Rape)nothing more or less than a conscious process of intimidation by which all men keep all women in a state of fear"
> "Rape is an historical [sic] condition that underlies all aspects of male-female relationships,"-Susan Brownmiller

So Susan Brownmiller is not a feminist. Who'd a thunk it?

So what of Ms Rawlings' contention that feminists are silencing people, especially women? Let's (re) educate Ms. Rawlings' critics.

Maybe they overlooked that, at Ryerson University, Canadian Federation for Equality and similar groups were banned by the Student Union from organizing events on campus, under the thin pretext of their "misogyny." Under this rule, they attempted to extort security fees for the lecture of Karen Straughan in a scheme that would make Michael Franzese blush. Karen was only allowed to speak when the President, Sheldon Levy, intervened. The catalyst for the censorship rule? Two WOMEN sought to organize a men's issues group on campus.

Maybe they've forgotten that in Toronto, attendees of Dr. Warren Farrell's lecture were violently obstructed.

Or maybe they have no idea that the woman who started the women's shelter movement was literally run out of her country by feminist death threats for saying women were just as violent in relationships as men.

Gender feminism is hegemonic among MMA media like most sports media, so any use of the word with a whiff of detectable impudence is met with the same accommodation as a roach crawling across your dinner plate, as the Rawlings matter has demonstrated. Indeed, using the term "feminist jurisprudence" gets you a warning on MMAFighting.com.

Any criticism of Ronda Rousey brings white knights out like cicadas in mating season. Engage in reasoned debate on sensitive subjects, and get banned (see comments of kosezky). These same people were (rightfully) indignant when a fighter beat a woman half to death. However, in light of their indifference after War Machine got light or no sentences and continued to fight after beating the piss out of man after man after man, (CagePotato.com being the exception), their hands are not exactly clean. There are countervailing voices who mock white knights and critique the feminist undercurrent, but they are few and far between.

Rawlings has, in microcosm, exposed threadbare how the ideology not only chases its own tail, but often devours it. Women's MMA has skyrocketed in popularity, yet when NOW seeks to ban MMA, they are denying women as well as men employment opportunities. That they had no reservations in heaping invective and ridicule upon Rawlings, whilst making no attempt to "educate" NOW, the feminist hegemon, about their misguided obstructionism and smearing of the sport they love, is telling, an object lesson in Voltaire's old saw about how to know who rules you.

Bec Rawlings had the courage to speak truth to this hegemony, accept the slings and arrows, and continues to own her words, not backing down, a luxury afforded few men. For truly being a “strong woman,” she is to be saluted. And to her critics, we kindly invite them to. . .well, Bec said it best.

KSU feminists panic over AVfM stickers

Paul Elam · 18 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

> No one reported that Mr. Gerard used profanity or raised his voice with them. No one reported that he threatened violence against any specific person, or that he committed any acts of violence. Mr. Gerard has no history of misconduct at KSU or, to our knowledge, elsewhere.
>
> […] The next question is whether Mr. Gerard's conduct "is severe or pervasive enough to create a work environment that a reasonable person would consider intimidating, hostile or abusive." We find that it is not.
>
> […] we find no words or actions by Mr. Gerard that rise to the level of a hostile work environment under the law.
>
> — Andrew Newton, Assoc. Legal Counsel
> KSU Division of Legal Affairs

These two documents open and close the case as far as KSU Legal was concerned, but that does not mean the conflict is over:

1. A threat from Flora Devine in KSU Legal. Since receiving this letter, Sage is prohibited from entering the Interdisciplinary Studies Department (ISD) offices and from contacting all actual or perceived complainants.
2. A report by Andrew Newton, also from KSU Legal, which states that Sage is not to contact ANY ISD member about allegations, although he phrases it as a "continuation" of the previous no-contact in spite of the change in parameters.

These two documents contain some facts and some errors framed such that the errors look as true as the facts. If you open the PDFs in Adobe Reader (I really mean use Adobe Reader. Do not view them online because the formatting will break, and you will not be able to read comment boxes), you should see highlighting and comments Sage used to state his side. I won't bother reiterating everything he already wrote. The main take-away I want to put out there is that Sage is innocent regarding allegations that he is Satan.

I'm not talking about innocent until proven guilty innocent. I am talking about didn't do jack shit innocent, except that he expressed ideas to which the fascist swine at KSU took umbrage – which is now clear they do with anything with which they disagree. .

Before continuing The Interdisciplinary Shaming Department series, I need to take a moment to discuss one of the events that caused ISD to go anal explosive.

In March of 2013, Sage put up stickers promoting AVfM. I will call this #KSUStickerGate due to fact that some of the women in the ISD reacted as if Sage had tracked them down and said, "Go fetch me some coffee, and try not to get an abortion on your way back, sweetcheeks."

Apparently for these idiots, "Men's Rights are Human Rights," is codespeak for oppressive patriarchy, with cream and sugar.

I should note that no one here at AVfM asked Sage to put up the stickers, and that this was before Sage held any position at AVfM, and before Sage founded Zen Men. Everything here was entirely Sage's decision, and he said as much in the video.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Euv3GBSfMdQ

I will also note how much I appreciate the fact that I have never asked or directed Sage about much of anything. He like, does crap that needs to be done. It's called being an activist.

If you watch the video, you will notice two behaviors that made KSU attorneys scoff, and made the ISD faculty go rogue:

1. (8:07) Sage remarks about how funny it would be to slap a sticker over the mouth of a feminist screaming at him. I will be damned to hell if that is not indeed some funny shit. I laugh every time I imagine it.
2. (15:20) Sage walks into a women's restroom after checking if it was empty by saying "Hello? Need to clean out the bathroom!"

There are a few dumb positions on #KSUStickerGate floating around KSU. Some of the big ones are as follows:

1. (KSU Division of Legal Affairs) Sage is inappropriately expressive and has violated the student code of conduct. While he is legally innocent and faces no charges, he will face charges if he contacts the people who believe #2 or #3 about their allegations. Translation: Sage will take whatever abuse and lies are doled out by our factulty and he will keep his fucking mouth shut — or we will get revenge.
2. (ISD) Sage posed as a university employee with the intention of posting materials to intimidate women. Translation: We assert that the women at KSU are so fucking weak and retarded that they are intimidated by the idea that men are human beings. We also issue binkies at orientation for girls.
3. (Stacy Keltner of ISD) Sage demonstrates a desire to kill women. Translation: I am a lying ideological piece of human filth that secretly desires A Voice for Men to put me into the public spotlight.

Entering a women's restroom and posting stickers of outside organizations are considered violations of the KSU Student Code of Conduct, but given several mitigating circumstances, like the fact that was much ado about nothing, Sage was not charged.

First and foremost, Sage owned up to everything. He wisely stated that AVfM does not necessarily endorse everything he does, and I should take this opportunity to state that we do not encourage students to break the code of conduct in their respective universities. I'm sure Sage will not break another rule.

Just as I am sure that my actions do not fall under the same mandates that govern Sage's as a student of KSU.

I'm not sweating over this because Sage caused no damage, and told admins in person that he understood that he risked disciplinary action. This is the best possible way Sage could have handled this, because he has the personal accountability that an activist should have. That, and his academic history is too developed to throw away.

Second, Sage avoided private property. Not all public property is fair game either, but Sage chose only durable surfaces that would not be damaged when the stickers were removed. Unauthorized stickers are routinely posted by students and subsequently removed by custodians, which Sage indicates in the video.

It also stands to reason students are not regularly disciplined for posting stickers since they do not publicly identify themselves as Sage did. I imagine KSU really does not need to deal with a full disciplinary proceeding when a warning will suffice.

Next comes the intention of the video. Some of you might be wondering why Sage is wearing gloves and wiping off fingerprints if he was only going to out himself later. The reason is that Sage never actually cared about being caught.

Sage was addressing concerns of activists who want to make a statement boldly, yet carefully. Men's Rights Edmonton faced a lot of direct and productive confrontations over Don't Be That Girl, but not all MHRAs are prepared for that heat. This is why Sage demonstrated clandestine posting practices on public property while making no secrets about the fact he was solely responsible for posting the AVfM stickers he pictured.

And given the way the ISD responded to Sage over this video, they ended up confirming that MHRAs have a reason to watch their asses. In the end, this video has a damned good reason to exist.

Sage is an unconventional, rebellious young man. While people either love him or hate him, Sage has no history of criminal activity or misconduct. Even in this minor act (compared to panty raids, drunken sex raves and other things that would probably make the ISD fall into anarchy), KSU basically shrugged at the time Sage published his video. More stickers that will just get removed, whatever.

But now let's look at some of the most obvious examples of idiocy and corruption at work around the ISD's response.

The most glaring mistake the ISD made was in their timing. Sage only got smacked around by KSU Legal and ISD after contacting ISD faculty about their messing with Zen Men's faculty sponsorships (which I will cover in later articles). When ISD learned that Sage knew what they were doing, ISD turned Sage into a scapegoat by seeking out this video and filing a report nearly a year after the filmed event happened. The way ISD handled this made it painfully obvious that they were politically motivated.

The claim that Sage was posing as a custodian is bullshit. Looking at the video, he was wearing a thick black jacket, was holding a smartphone in front of his body, and had no cleaning supplies on him. Sage was obviously saying what came to mind to check if the women's restroom was empty. If a woman saw him, do you all at ISD really think women are so retarded that they would believe Sage is a custodian?

Don't answer that. It is already established that KSU regards its school as special ed where women are concerned. And it must be said that judging by the actions of some of their faculty we can see where they might have gone in that direction.

We certainly can't expect a KSU girl to have the brains to see that Sage saying he needed to "clean out the bathroom" is a good way for a man to announce his presence in a women's bathroom without scaring anyone. ISD faculty stated that Sage was trying to intimidate women, but the video itself indicates the opposite. If the ISD wishes to assume that the mere imagery of AVfM intimidates women, then they are welcome to talk to the women who actually volunteer their incredible talents for AVfM. Women around the world support this organization, so I really don't know how ISD justifies this presumption of female fear.

Well, actually I do. It's the lying scumbag thing. It is not justification, it is just something to mouth in order to make simple minded people think that Sage Gerard poses a threat to an entire campus of women because he put up a sticker they disagree with.

I am sure that if Sage heard a response from inside the restroom, he would not have entered. And honestly, it doesn't matter what he said, since our fine scholars in the ISD would have reported him anyway. And if students (who weren't there) were really so intimidated, I'd like to see the report from the woman who witnessed Sage march right in on her pinching out the remains of that Monday's bean burrito to commit sticker rape.

I cannot imagine that report existing, because KSU Legal never cited such a report in their concluding document, and the only people who ever reported feeling intimidated were ISD faculty at a time when they didn't even know Sage, and Sage didn't know them.

The KSU Legal Department has all the credibility of the University of Toronto Student Union and Danielle D'entremont. And they share remarkable similarities with those referenced in that there is an agenda to create a false threat narrative behind which they are committing malfeasance, deception and raw bigotry in the name of their ideology.

As for slapping a sticker over the mouth of a feminist (hehe!), people who know Sage understand he is not violent, but he does have an intense, polarizing personality. He is kind to his friends, and he extends olive branches to people who try to hurt him, but he is unapologetically harsh to idiots. Three good reasons to like him in my book.

I've seen him do everything from compliment people to calling them cunts, and he tends to be fair about it across that spectrum. The evidence available to me shows that Sage, while on one occasion clearly upset and defensive when he learned for the first time what ISD faculty were doing, was never unfair or aggressive.

Again, remember the timing. ISD reported #KSUStickerGate approximately eight months after it happened, and Andrew Newton wrote that ISD deliberately sought out content Sage posted. The ISD faculty were trying to pin something to Sage to convince cops and lawyers that he was a ticking time bomb that had to be defused.

Let's recap: Sage avoided surfaces that the stickers could damage, stuck only to durable public property, and made sure not to invade the privacy of others. For an activist out to "intimidate women," he's oddly courteous. I say this not to assert one subjective interpretation over another, but to introduce an interpretation that KSU Legal and ISD clearly refused to entertain.

#KSUStickerGate has accomplished nothing but telegraph the political and personal biases of state-funded staff that have ganged up on one student. Even though Sage did not face charges, he was still punished by being silenced under threat of charges. #KSUStickerGate was one of the reasons that a select few ideologues in the ISD decided to engage in a smear campaign.

With that, you now have more context behind The Interdisciplinary Shaming Department.

Stacy Keltner, I hope you are looking forward to our date. I certainly am. Oh, and for a faculity member of a university who has published a book, it is clear that you have gone to great lengths to keep your image off the internet.

Nice try.

Is that a threat? No, it is a promise. Big difference.

As we have been saying here for years, the time for collegial, polite discussion and negotiation with these piles of refuse is over. Stacy Keltner has conducted an ideologically driven smear campaign against a peaceful activist, painting him as a threat and making him vulnerable as a target.

She has done this to him as a student at the school where she is on faculty, and she has been enabled and abetted by that school's legal department.

So we have a choice. Follow the rules that they want us to follow, which means providing her further cover to conduct her campaign of lies and hatred. Or, to say fuck their "rules" and do business with them in the only way cowards and bullies understand.

2015 will be a year where we shine a light on many corrupt acadamicians. Stacy Keltner is just the first.

We have people working on securing her image. Meantime, $100.00 to the first person who gets us a clear image of her which we can verify. Something large and clear enough to be used as a feature image is preferred.

Twelve foundational points of Counter-Feminist philosophy

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 18 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is also available in Romanian.

1. The dictionary definition of feminism runs as follows: "The doctrine advocating social, political, and all other rights of women equal to those of men." This definition is inadequate owing to the problematic nature of the term "equality," which has no stable meaning outside the realm of mathematics. Consequently, the meaning can forever be refreshed, reframed or updated so that new demands for "equality" can always be put forward. There will never be enough "equality," and feminism will never go out of business because it will always find new "inequality" in need of correction.

2. Feminism's binding principle and driving force is disaffection toward men and maleness. This is arrayed on a spectrum, with mild disenchantment to the lower end, and vitriolic animosity, bordering on psychopathic, to the upper. If disaffection toward men, as men, did not exist in the world generally, then feminism itself would not exist. Feminism is not driven by vehemence about mere issues and abstract principles. Its politics are rooted in personal feelings about men. Feminism's political, you might say, is personal. And so personal emotion is the only thing that keeps feminism in motion.

3. Feminism divides broadly into two cultural cohorts: Academic feminism (more intellectual), and pop feminism (less intellectual). These make opposing ends of a polarity, with a continuum stretching between them. Feminism as a whole needs both the academic and the pop cohorts. The academic cohort is needful so that feminism will have an intellectual vanguard — so that the snake will have a head, in other words. The pop cohort is needful so that the vanguard ideology will be demographically incarnated in numbers — so that the snake will have a body, in other words. Sophisticated ideas originate from the academic cohort, and trickle down to the pop cohort by the process of popularization.

4. At any point on the academic-pop continuum, you will find feminists from any point on the disaffection spectrum. Simply observe that the identical range of viciousness shows up at every intellectual level. Along with viciousness comes irrationality or intellectual dishonesty. All of this is transparent among the undisciplined pop feminists, but concealed under layers of erudite doubletalk among the academics.

5. Feminism at large should be understood as a social organism. The bottom line, is a division of functions which generates the illusion that "feminism is not monolithic." That cliché is either true or false, depending on how you apply the term "monolithic." It is true that feminism has many brands, flavors, schools of thought, "aspects," and so on. In that regard, it is anything but monolithic. But when you consider that these different manifestations combine toward a common purpose as the parts of an organism or mechanism would do, then feminism emerges as One Thing — hence "monolithic." Accordingly, so far as we are concerned, feminism is indeed monolithic.

6. Several counter-feminist (or reality-based) definitions of feminism have been proposed, all of which point in the same general direction. One of these runs as follows: "Feminism is the project to increase the power of women." When you consider this alongside the dictionary definition (which describes feminism as a quest for "equality") and when you consider that "equality" is a mirage shimmering always out of reach, it is easy to see that chasing so-called "equality" ad infinitum, will only increase the power of women ad infinitum. But to increase the power of women, you must increase it in relation to something, and that "something" can only be men. So by its inherent logic, the feminist project can only be the project to put women in a state of power supremacy over men. In sum, therefore, feminism is female supremacism.

7. Feminism's most effective safeguard against discovery is to ridicule the very idea that it (feminism) is female supremacist, and to mock whoever might advance such an idea. Such words as "paranoid" or "misogynistic" will typically be employed to this end.

8. The project to increase women's power does not positively require disaffection toward men. But without it, the project would face a practical limit — to wit, the constraint that mutuality and unselfish regard for the other might impose. Yet sweep all that aside and you can pave the road of depredation as far as your lack of scruples will carry you. Indeed, that is where disaffection toward men comes in handy, and where the project to increase female power hits no glass ceiling of any kind.

9. Advocacy for women's interests, in whatever form, will naturally increase female advantage and thereby increase female power. Yet the advocates involved in such work needn't feel any conscious hostility toward men. They need only carry on industriously, disavow anti-male sentiments, and draw attention away from high-disaffection feminists by such distracting statements as "not all feminists are like that," or "I'm not that kind of feminist," or "those people are only fringe extremists." At times, they will deny that such feminists are even feminists at all. Still, the latter will continue to exist, and to do what they do, while their milder sisters look the other way.

10.The proclivity of feminism is to grow in the direction of greater female empowerment. In so doing, it initiates changes in the surrounding world. These changes create endless new obstacles to the female empowerment project, and force endless modifications to feminist policy in order to overcome said obstacles. At times, these modifications will involve changing the rules of the game altogether. There is no help for this, for if feminism operated from a fixed and finite set of rules, this would leave degrees of freedom that would permit male autonomy to operate. And this, in turn, would set an absolute upper limit on female empowerment. Code-switching, from one code of rules to another, is therefore an inherent feature of feminism as a social organism.

11. Feminist code-switching operates through space as well as through time, since at any given moment an indefinite number of distinct feminist rule systems, planet-wide, are found to be operating. This is quite understandable, given that women differ greatly as to taste, inclination, personality, station in life, and so on. Hence, their exact empowerment needs will differ, and each must employ a suitable code of rules.

12. Feminism's being is identical with its being-in-motion. Feminism, as a social organism, must either grow perpetually or die. "Perpetual Revolution" is the name we have given to this condition.

Serious business: the attack on “manspreading” is not a joke

AVfM Video Source · 18 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

…and it went from Tumblr feminist bigots all the way to public policy in a surprisingly short period of time.

http://youtu.be/dgvCphf5Tqw

You might want to subscribe to Wolf of the West, by the way.

Interdisciplinary Shaming Dept. Part II – Stacy Keltner, garbologist

Paul Elam · 19 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

This article is one part of a series exposing corrupt, fear-mongering academics who used police officers and lawyers to silence a single student while they move to crush his free speech and Title IX rights. This piece uses context from #KSUStickerGate. Read Part I here and Part III here.

Stacy Keltner is a fraud on the run. There is a $100 reward to whoever finds a picture of her that we can verify. KSU students, if you happen to see Keltner out in public, grab a quick shot on your phone and send it over. You would be helping end corruption on your campus, and offsetting the cost of your tuition and supplies.

The hilarious depiction of Keltner shown above will tide us over while we wait. Many thanks go out to the talented Brian Martinez for beautifully capturing the situation.

Keltner's bio was deleted from KSU servers since Part I was published, probably because I announced my intention to comb through histories. These people have clearly never heard of the Google cache and FreezePage.

- ISD faculty page (before, after)
- Gender and Women's Studies faculty page (before, after)

Cowards.

Stacy panicked in response to #KSUStickerGate to Sage bringing questions about the ISD's organized effort to sabotage his faculty sponsorships and Male Students in Peril. Keltner's colleagues will learn that she not an academician when dealing with people who disagree with her.

Here are two more documents for your perusal:

- The campus police report where Stacy Keltner and ISD chair Robbie Lieberman lie about Sage. (Note that discredited faux-journalist David Futrelle jumped the gun and said that Stacy Keltner's name never appeared in the "complaint" posted in my previous article. This is the complaint, and her name is right there, you opportunistic dumbass and you gullible morons who believe that liar who calls himself a journalist.)
- An excerpt from an open record of emails that shows Stacy Keltner inviting everyone on a Gender and Women's Studies mailing list to discuss the AVfM and KSU Men "problem" on campus. Notice that it keeps tabs on how many advisers KSU Men has left, and whether or not the conference continues. The rest of the emails will be provided as we cover more of the story in other articles.

A police report is public record only when the case is closed, which means there was no evidence that Sage is a threat.

That said, let's see who our tax-dollars has been paying. Quote the investigator:

> Keltner stated on 8/26/2014 while she was in a meeting she received a text message from her Department Chair Robbie Lieberman (Faculty). Lieberman told her that Sage Gerard was in the office of Interdisciplinary Studies and requesting to see her. The message also stated Keltner may want to avoid coming back. Keltner stated she immediately left the meeting and returned to her office where her 2 year old daughter was with a babysitter. Keltner stated she remained in her office until Gerard left the ISD office.

When Sage learned of ISD's involvement in messing with Zen Men's faculty sponsorships and Male Students in Peril, he had questions. What's with these meetings about the "problem" of KSU Men and A Voice for Men? Why is everyone in Gender and Women's Studies keeping tabs on the number of advisers Zen Men has? Why is the status of the conference important to them?

When Sage arrived, the ISD chair Robbie Lieberman informed Stacy that she needs to hide, even though Sage and Stacy were both already in a populated office space in broad daylight. Is the babysitter for Stacy, or the 2-year old?

It's funny how Stacy thought to mention her child's existence and age in her report, as if it wasn't already obvious that she was tugging heartstrings hard enough to string a violin.

> Keltner stated after leaving the ISD office Gerard went to the sidewalk office outside her window and the window of the ISD office and wrote on the sidewalk, "KSU MEN/A VOICE OR MEN" with chalk. Keltner stated after writing on the sidewalk Gerard took pictures of the writing and pictures of the people standing around looking at the writing.

Sage works on campus, and his stopping by the ISD offices (before the Flora Devine letter) with questions was one of the many errands he had to run. After visiting the ISD, he chalked an ad for the conference, which is allowed by KSU policy. The Social Science area is a great place to promote men's rights.

As reported, Sage did take a picture of the chalk. And it wasn't visible just by the ISD's windows, Stacy, it was visible by all of the windows on the front side of the building. That's the point.

According to this doohickey that checks data on original photos, this was taken at August 26th, 2014 at 2:06 PM EST in front of the Social Science building. The police report times the incident between 1:30 PM and 2:30 PM, which checks out.

There's no question here. This is the message Stacy Keltner saw.

The conference ad Sage wrote in front of the Social Science building. "MEN'S RIGHTS CONFERENCE RSVP FREE KSUM.EVENTBRITE.COM"

Stacy, learn to read. It does not say "KSU MEN/A VOICE FOR MEN." It's just an open invitation to the conference you and your buddies were trying to sabotage. We had a great time, by the way.

Sage did similar ads on sidewalks around campus, so there was nothing particularly special about this one.

People did walk by, but Sage did not take pictures of lingerers checking out the chalk, unless you count accidentally capturing legs and feet. Either way, it's a public spot.

A lot of students already knew that Sage was different than most, so if Sage was taking photos of people in the perverse manner Keltner suggests, someone else would have reported him since the cops were within eyeshot.

You read that right. Look at this picture from Google Maps.

(Source: Google Maps. Edited for purposes of commentary)
The red "X" is where Sage chalked his ad. The building circled in blue is where all the cops are. Again, an ISD staff member assumes students are stupid.

Like with #KSUStickerGate, the only people who panicked and filed reports are professors who are politically-affiliated with the ideology Sage criticizes in the manner expected from a university student!

This must be the diversity and inclusion thing we keep hearing about.

The reason Sage photographed his chalk work was to gather up potential pictures for The Sentinel to use in this article, since they were looking for a featured image. The photo they ended up using was of chalk Sage put down by a different building. Either way, Sage was doing what he always does by recording his actions.

Stacy is acting like Sage left a mark of death specifically for her.

> Keltner stated she fears for her safety and the safety of her family and colleagues. Keltner stated she has seen the cartoons, video and blogs online and believes Gerard demonstrates having violent fantasies about hurting and murdering women.

I don't even know what to say.

There's dishonest, there's stupid, and then there's straight-up anti-reason. Stacy Keltner is such a vapid, stillborn pile of failed neurons that I am only left to conclude there is something wrong with her. Schizophrenia? Brain tumor? PTSD from seeing Andrea Dworkin naked?

Stacy Keltner never once met Sage, and she has no evidence that Sage is violent. The only thing Sage ever did to her was try to ask her questions, and he never even got the opportunity to do that because the department chair helped agitate her own staff.

Sage still doesn't even know what the fuck Stacy Keltner looks like! All we know from the police report is that she is a white, 40 year old blonde with brown eyes that weighs 105 pounds and stands what I suppose is 5'1″, if I'm understanding the format of the height correctly (Sage is 6 feet even, and his height is recorded as “600.” The first number appears to be feet, and the last two are inches).

Keltner cranked up her subjective hysterics until people start listening reflexively. She cries crocodile tears to grease the gears of the system.

Stacy, if you need some help understanding this, maybe some records will help.

Sage has a 4.0 GPA at KSU. He managed to get an institutional GPA of 4.18 at Georgia State, which also has a 4-point scale. He is in two honors societies and has traveled the country for scholarship programs with NASA and other organizations.

So, number one, he takes his education seriously. Number two, he takes his work seriously. He started working at 15 years old as a programmer, and has a portfolio of projects across several industries that people actually use.

He would not throw all of that away being the kind of person you think he is. He has friends and family (yes, including women) who love him, and you shit on all of that because it just had to be about you. I think you wanted someone to call you out, because on some level, it means back-pats and people calling you “survivor.”

You make me sick.

> Keltner also believes Gerard is interested in challenging/silencing all women and gender programs and educational activities on campus. Keltner stated as the coordinator of gender and women’s studies she is a prime target.

Guys, a black hole of stupid has formed in my office. It sucked all of the oxygen out of the room, but it also took a few laws of nature, so I can still breathe. Gregg Allman is eating my lamp, and my ass is a giraffe.

Nothing makes sense anymore.

Stacy, you used fear to recruit thugs to attack a single student you personally do not like by proxy. One moment you are sobbing and blubbering about an outstanding student coming to kill you and your 2-year old, but then smirk and hum a tune when the cops run to investigate.

> A security escort was provided for Keltner to her vehicle.

Stacy, two things happened to Sage since you decided to sell your story by clutching a cop’s arm with one hand and using a folder to hide your face with the other.

1. Sage’s supervisor asked if Sage knew that a “bodyguard” was hired to repel him. I talked with Dr. Sansivero and he assured us that there was no private bodyguard, but we now know there was a police escort. Either way, this drama bled into his job, Stacy. Do you realize your words can impact a man’s life, regardless if you are telling the truth or not? It’s okay and expected to openly disagree with Sage, but it’s not okay to blow the situation so out of proportion that reality itself distorts.
2. When Sage debated Brian Clyne, Clyne attempted a character assassination. Look at 36:38. We don’t know how he got the information, but Brian Clyne, who actually IS a dangerous, criminally-inclined individual, used what sounds an awful lot like YOUR story to go after Sage in front of the Dean of Students, and a cop. Sage later had to juggle Brian’s relentless attempts to paint Sage as a harasser of women (an action that puts students in physical danger of vigilantism) while being silenced by the cops on Brian’s command.

Stacy, if I find out that there was a link between your report and Brian Clyne’s own vendetta that endangered Sage, I swear that you will never work in peace again. I will follow your activities and call out every lie that threatens the livelihood of decent men, until people stop citing your publications and you tearfully watch your degree gather dust in the closet. I have the resources and the connections to make that happen, and I will use them if you so much as tell one more goddamn lie about a man you don't know. Covering your ass will only make me work harder to expose your sins.

You need to understand that there are people out there who will literally beat a man bloody if they believe that he is some kind of threat to women. Look at the murders carried out where victims are men falsely accused of rape. Perpetrators of this violence won't investigate. They won't even think. They will simply beat him until he is broken, and bleeding. You put Sage, an innocent and intelligent young man with a future, in a position where he has to keep looking over his shoulder every time he walks on campus.

And you won't even let him express himself.

That is why you are one of the most egregious, repulsive and vindictive professors on Kennesaw State University, if not Georgia or the United States.

Sage runs his organization as an extracurricular activity. You responded so disproportionately that you encroached on an innocent student's personal well-being and employment. Sage's world started closing in around him thanks to you. People started treating him differently, because of you and people who think like you.

You stained Sage with a LIE that can follow him to job interviews and his relationships.

You are filth, Keltner.

Neither Sage, myself, or any men's rights activist worth his salt hates women as you suggest, or humanity, for that matter. But rest assured that I hate toxic people who earn contempt with their manipulative actions. You are one of those people.

If you actually experienced even a tenth of what you put Sage through, then you would probably have fled the country by now. Did we learn nothing from Caleb Warner and Vladek Filler? Have we still not evolved the abstract reasoning necessary to understand that a lie can spiral out of control?

We're still looking into your history, Stacy. I would take the time to spit on your repositories of pseudo-philosophical reflections, but I have expended far too much energy on this article as it is.

Just know that I always will learn more. If you think there is something, and I mean anything else in your conduct on Kennesaw State University that will embarrass you, then you better send Sage Gerard an email and try to make things right, because I will publish all of your mistakes. Sage's email is right on our masthead. Try getting to know the guy for once.

If you need more convincing, I invite readers to contact you via your public contact info. We will notice if you delete that, too.

Hundreds of people here have donated to Zen Men, the organization your people have been messing with, and I figure they may want an opportunity to explain how they feel about your disrespecting their contributions to gender equity. Oh, and just a tip: The supporters will not threaten you. They will most certainly be angry with you, but you are not in any physical danger. You never fucking were. Just keep that in mind if some odd troll sends you a message you want to believe we endorse. Use your brain and try listening to thoughtful dissent for once in your miserable life.

Admit you were wrong like an adult, or pack up your desk.

The faculty member in Part III will not be announced. I suggest any ISD member interested in saving face get in touch with Sage before it's their turn. Silence will be considered siding with what will only be disproven.

I don't determine the fate of your credibility, you do.

Anti-Cosby protestors attempt to physically silence Cosby defenders

Dan Perrins · 19 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Men's Human Rights Activists peacefully counter-protest those calling Bill Cosby a rapist, and those who believe Cosby to be Guilty Until Proven Innocent use thug tactics to silence defenders of due process–while Hamilton police do nothing.

Recently I wrote about the experiences some of us had at the feminist hyper-rape-inflation guilty until proven innocent media lynch mob that visited Hamilton on January 9, 2015. The reason the rabid phony "rape culture" circus was in town was Bill Cosby giving a show at Hamilton Place. Cosby has numerous rape allegations against him. Allegations only, which in feminist speak means "guilty."

It was an interesting experience for us all, I'm sure my fellow attendees would agree. A very small number of us responding to the penis owner=guilty cult with advocacy of innocent until proven guilty and due process. You know the rule of law, that concept at the heart of justice and found in the bedrock of a free and democratic society.

The ~~lynch mob~~ protesters proclaiming Cosby's guilt had been growing since he came to The Great White North (Shout out to Bob and Doug Mckenzie who grew up in the Hamilton area) to do 3 shows. Hamilton being his last stop. There was probably 100 or so of them gathered in Hamilton on the South East corner of Summers Lane and Main.

"We believe the women" "1 in 5 women are raped" the cult chanted ignoring the fact that the 1 in 5 myth has been debunked and there hasn't been a trial let alone charges for Cosby. Sexual violence is an epidemic according to them despite what the actual numbers tell us.

I guess feminists do need to keep those donation dollar$ flowing. And the 'sexual violence epidemic' propaganda is just another one of feminism's cash cows they use to milk society out of money, common sense and due process.

But that is another topic for another day.

My last article gave you just a small snap shot of our experiences. There's an interview with CHCH TV in that first piece. Some of you may have noticed in the interview I seemed a little frazzled, somewhat vocal about things.

For those who missed that interview here it is again.

I admit it, I was a little nervous and frazzled at the time of the CHCH TV interview. And for good reason: It wasn't the bright lights big camera which had me on edge.

My nervous frazzled manner for that interview was a result of an interaction between me, a member of the feminist hang the penis-owner lynch-mob and Hamilton Police Services.

The interaction that transpired at the Hamilton Cosby protest was a little more sporty than what I've experienced in the past. And in the past I've faced off against some of the more infamous members of the blame-a-penis club. Big Red and Darwin's Rejects would be 2 examples.

There is another incident on record where I had dealings with a local blame a penis member in which they used a makeshift weapon (club) in their attack on me.

(And yet the world is worried about the threats feminists send to themselves not actual documented acts of violence engaged in by them)

Anyways back to the interview with CHCH TV. Prior to my interview with CHCH, in fact most of my interviews, I was accosted by a member of the lynch-a-penis mob.

Here is the video evidence of the attack;

I'm going to call her "lil' Miss Rapey Hands," because she didn't get enthusiastic consent to lay her hands on me.

The assault is minor, as is the theft, however they are crimes just the same. Lil Miss Rappey Hands decided she had the right to lay her hands on my personal property and proceed to use her substantial girth and weight to knock my person about.

Now this situation could have very easily gone gone badly for all parties involved.

If I didn't turn at the last second before her attack I may not have realized what the intentions of lil Miss Rapey Hands were and taken her attack for something which would require a stronger more physical response. With that in mind I can't say what my reflex action would have been. It may have been to do what I did which was to direct the police to do their jobs.

Or

I may have simply turned around and punched lil Miss Rapey Hands in an act of self defense without even knowing who or what she was. My possible reaction in a situation like that isn't guaranteed, no one's is when suddenly hit unexpectedly like that.

But what doesn't appear to be up for speculation is a combined desire by the Hamilton Police Services and the feminist blame a penis club to increase violence.

One might even say an increase of violence is exactly what the feminists and police services across North America want.

Notice in the video immediately after lil Miss Rapey Hands commits her crimes the "blame a penis" club cheers her on?

Notice how 1 police officer starts to do his job while another calls him back thereby obstructing justice?

There is one other thing I want you to pay attention to in the video, and it happens right at the end. Pay attention to the man in the beige-colored coat whom she goes to after realizing she just became a local feminist hero and Hamilton Police Services are going to turn a blind eye to her crimes. He comes back into the story later on.

The next thing caught on video that happens right after lil Miss Rapey Hands commits her crimes is I have words with the offending police officer. I now refer to him as an offender due to the fact he obstructed justice when he instructed his fellow officer not to do his duty. His sworn duty I might add, and I go into that in this video.

About a 1/2 hour after the incident with lil Miss Rapey Hands and the ~~constable~~ criminal with the badge # 53 the protest was over and we were leaving the area to re-convene at an undisclosed location to decompress and analyze the evenings events.

We were leaving the area heading North along Summers Lane to King Street when Malcolm fell behind. You see Malcolm's path was impeded by lil Miss Rapey Hands and her useful idiot male feminist. We have the video giving evidence of this:

I guess lil Miss Rapey Hands and her useful idiot lackey, realizing her crimes were all caught on video, decided her next move should be to destroy the evidence. And they made their play by first singling out Malcolm, prohibiting his ability to stay with the group.

They keep pace with him and repeatedly block the shot of the camera while biding their time to commit another crime.

Along the way you'll notice they taunt Malcolm trying to get him to act as they do.

And then it happens.

Mr Useful Idiot decides the timing is right: no one is walking towards them and they are about 20 feet away from the open street, so he attacks. It happens right around the 2:18 mark. Malcolm is assaulted in what he describes as an attempt to steal the camera, thereby giving them the opportunity to destroy the evidence of lil Miss Rapey hands previous assault and theft.

The premeditated and intentional assault by Mr Useful Idiot was hard enough to knock Malcolm to the ground. And lil Miss Rapey Hands is a willing participant/ accomplice in this crime.

What is truly deplorable about this situation is the violent attack on Malcolm could have been prevented if the police did their jobs the first time lil Miss Rapey hands got all touchy-assaulty with me.

But Hamilton Police Services didn't, they turned a blind eye, which lead to an escalation of violence by the lil Miss Rapey Hands & Mr Useful Idiot.

Hamilton Police Services aren't interested in reducing violence. Neither is the feminist lynch-a-penis cult.

They're interest is to increase violence.

That's what a legal system on feminism does folks, it increases violence.

Stay tuned for more. Things are going to get a whole lot more exciting before we're done with this one.

Rita Panahi: Women are more equal than others

Jim Muldoon · 19 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Rita Panahi, of the Herald Sun, often writes articles critical of Feminists, which cheers me up every now and then. She complains of "the perpetually outraged sisterhood" and "the duplicitous hypocrisy of the feminist movement."

One might think that I would endorse Panahi and her column as a must read for the Men's Human Rights Movement (MHRM), and maybe I would have. At least, up until I read her latest column. It was every bit as hypocritical as the Feminists she so regularly takes to task.

The crime that gets her on her soap-box this week is:

> The South Australian Government had to remind public transport users to be "courteous and considerate" after a heavily pregnant woman was forced to stand during a recent train trip.

Now, by "forced" she means that no one got up to give her a seat. There wasn't actually any "force" involved. But of course, decrying Feminist techniques doesn't mean that Panahi won't use them herself.

> Obsessing about trivialities and drumming up faux outrage may be a fine clickbait tactic but it doesn't mean you're taken seriously.

And I won't be taking Panahi too seriously from now on, either.

What we are supposed to do, of course, is imagine that everyone else on that train was fit, healthy and fresh as a daisy. We are also to imagine that a young, healthy woman has become debilitated because she is carrying a few extra kilos. Then, we are to fall for the romantic notion that, because she is carrying a new life (cue music) that her discomfort suddenly outweighs everyone else's.

Once again, in true Feminist fashion, it is her body, her choice, and everyone else's problem.

> The lack of manners those women experienced made me think of Blanche and a line in the last season of The Golden Girls where she explains to a suitor: "I don't want to be treated like your equal. No! I want to be treated much better than you."
>
> That should be the ideal all women strive for in life. It's not only pregnant woman who deserve to be treated with all due deference.

Deference, according to the Merriam Webster dictionary, means, "respect and esteem due a superior or an elder."

How, I wonder, does Panahi "strive" for this exalted status?

> As a woman I am as capable, independent and empowered as any man, but that doesn't mean I want to be treated like one.

No, Panahi doesn't want to be handed a shovel when holes need digging. She's not up for the frontline of battle, and wants a guaranteed spot in the lifeboats. On and on, she claims a right to priority, but without telling us why.

Women are superior, it seems, because they just are. But does Panahi have the honesty to admit this? Like every Feminist she has ever criticised, the answer would appear to be in the negative.

> It isn't an admission that I'm inferior or superior; it's merely an acknowledgment that we are inherently different.

This inherent difference, of course, means that she is “due deference” simply because she is a she. The man, being inherently not a she, gets no deference. Like the sky is blue and the world is round, women are privileged. No need for great or kind deeds. No need for achievement or excellence.

Simply put, when she wakes up in the morning, before she even gets out of bed, never mind actually does anything of any value, she is better than 3.5 billion people, because they are all mere males.

> Likewise, a man paying for dinner doesn’t mean I’m obliged to be extra friendly; it’s just a courtesy that should be common practice. Of course, good manners dictates that the woman offers to pay or split the bill but a truly chivalrous man wouldn’t hear of such a thing.

Indeed! She “offers” to pay, simply so that they both can pretend how “capable, independent and empowered” she is. The couple can engage in doublethink as long as they like about how the woman can pay for her half, just as long as, in the end, he gets his wallet out and does the “truly chivalrous” thing.

Note that Panahi uses all of the typical Feminist straw men to strengthen her argument for superiority. To disagree means we expect sex for buying her a taco and want her to be paid a pittance for doing the same job as man, only better, and in heels.

> A British newspaper decrying the death of chivalry claims that it sank with the Titanic where “an age of chivalry, honour and men of all classes trying to behave like gentlemen” was replaced by an “every man for himself” mentality.

A man’s survival, never mind his self-respect, is nowhere near as important as M’lady’s displeasure. The only difference between Feminism and what Panahi calls chivalry is terminology.

The outcome, women with unearned privilege while the men do the heavy lifting, is the same.

Links

http://www.heraldsun.com.au/news/opinion/equality-is-essential-but-so-is-chivalry/story-fni0fhh1-1226955085384

http://www.heraldsun.com.au/news/opinion/nudge-nudge-wink-wink-and-the-banshees-wail/story-fni0fhh1-1226930359249

http://blogs.news.com.au/heraldsun/miss-judgement/index.php/heraldsun/comments/the_perpetually_outraged_sisterhood/http://www.merriam-webster.com/dictionary/deference

Did John Hembling plagiarize an article by Jim Lobe?

August Løvenskiolds · 19 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

In a recent email from a reader of AVFM I'll identify as "IR", it was suggested that an AVFM article written by contributor John Hembling and published April 17, 2011, "appears to have several passages largely cribbed from this 2003 piece at Alternet:

http://www.alternet.org/story/15935/leo_strauss%27_philosophy_of_deception"

The Alternet article was credited to author Jim Lobe.

The article by Hembling in question is this one:

http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/government-tyranny/leo-strauss-and-neo-conservatism/

AVFM takes allegations of plagiarism seriously and in the past we have removed and banned articles and authors we have determined were tainted by plagiarism. Some of these authors had significant followings among our readership and while I was aggrieved to lose them, the integrity of AVFM and our mission of compassion for men and advocacy of men's issues must take precedence.

What exactly does "plagiarize" entail? I Googled the word, and got this primary result:

"pla·gia·rize ˈplājəˌrīz/ verb

1. take (the work or an idea of someone else) and pass it off as one's own."

In other words, plagiarism is a sort of intellectual theft. Copying someone else's work word for word and representing the result as one's own work is obvious plagiarism, but quoting someone is not generally plagiarism.

A harder question is when an idea is "borrowed" and substantially rewritten, but the source of that idea is not credited. I would contend that when a large number of common elements are discovered between two articles, the likelihood that the more recent article contains plagiarism grows and eventually the case for plagiarism becomes persuasive.

To that end, I have personally checked and discovered at least 5 examples of both ideas and writing that seem to have been cribbed, and in the case of example 3, outright copied by Hembling in his 2011 article without proper credit being given to Lobe's 2003 article. Those 5 examples are as follows:

Example 1. From Hembling's 2011 article:

Strauss was a political philosopher who arrived in the United States in 1938. Strauss taught at several major universities, including University of Chicago.

Similar passage from Lobe's 2003 article:

Like Wolfowitz, Shulsky is a student of an obscure German Jewish political philosopher named Leo Strauss who arrived in the United States in 1938. Strauss taught at several major universities, including Wolfowitz and Shulsky's alma mater, the University of Chicago, before his death in 1973.

Example 2. From Hembling's 2011 article:

"Among Strauss's students were the architects of the neo-conservatism which has dominated and defined the agenda of the democratic and the republican parties of the past several decades."

Similar passage from Lobe's 2003 article:

Strauss is a popular figure among the neoconservatives. Adherents of his ideas include prominent figures both within and outside the administration.

Example 3. From Hembling's 2011 article:

While outwardly professing deep respect for American democracy, Strauss believed that societies should be hierarchical; divided between an elite who should lead, and the masses who should follow. Unlike philosophical elitists such as Plato, he was unconcerned with the moral character of these leaders.

Nearly identical passage from Lobe's 2003 article:

While professing deep respect for American democracy, Strauss believed that societies should be hierarchical – divided between an elite who should lead, and the masses who should follow. But unlike fellow elitists like Plato, he was less concerned with the moral character of these leaders.

Example 4. From Hembling's 2011 article:

Shadia Drury, Professor of political science at the University of Calgary described this philosophy as one which requires an environment of "perpetual deception" in which the people are indoctrinated to a manufactured mythology, of simplistic character appropriate to their meagre [sic] powers of comprehension.

According to Drury, Straussian philosophy requires: "perpetual deception of the citizens by those in power is critical because they need to be led, and they need strong rulers to tell them what's good for them."

In Straussian philosophy, the "elite" believe that there is no morality and the only natural right is that of the superior to rule over the inferior.

Similar passages from Lobe's 2003 article:

According to Shadia Drury, who teaches politics at the University of Calgary, Strauss believed that "those who are fit to rule are those who realize there is no morality and that there is only one natural right – the right of the superior to rule over the inferior."

This dichotomy requires "perpetual deception" between the rulers and the ruled, according to Drury.

Example 5. From Hembling's 2011 article:

Strauss also believed that "Because mankind is intrinsically wicked, he has to be governed . Such governance can only be established, however, when men are united and they can only be united against other people."

A Straussian society then, requires a state of perpetual war.

Similar passage from Lobe's 2003 article:

Like Thomas Hobbes, Strauss believed that the inherently aggressive nature of human beings could only be restrained by a powerful nationalistic state. "Because mankind is intrinsically wicked, he has to be governed," he once wrote. "Such governance can only be established, however, when men are united – and they can only be united against other people."

"Perpetual war, not perpetual peace, is what Straussians believe in," says Drury.

From these 5 examples and particularly example 3, it is reasonable to conclude that a substantial portion of Hembling's 2011 article was, in fact, plagiarized from Lobe's earlier work.

AVFM offers our gratitude to reader "IR" who first alerted us to this situation, AVFM offers our apologies to Jim Lobe for the uncredited use of his work.

AVFM also apologizes to our readers for this clear breach of journalistic ethics, and we promise that steps will be taken to remove the offending material.

AVFM reproves author John Hembling and urges caution to those who have used, or are considering using his work.

Thank you to everyone for your understanding in this regrettable case.

Publisher's note: In light of this very disappointing development, Hembling's post will remain up for approximately 24 hours so that readers can make the comparisons of the work themselves, after which the plagiarized piece and all other works from John Hembling on this site will be removed. I know we have had our differences since asking John to leave AVFM, but it never rose to the level of this kind of drastic action till now. We will not allow this platform to be used for the purpose of stealing the intellectual property of others and passing it off as original work. I extend my deepest apologies to Mr. Lobe and my assurances that this is the first I have known of this dishonest act. –PE

ABC News, do you even ethics? #GamerGate vs Nightline Edition

AVfM Video Source · 19 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The American Broacasting Corporation (ABC) News show Nightline recently did a shockingly dishonest piece about online gamers, combining this with a professional tongue bath for con artist Anita Sarkeesian and another person of questionable ethical standards known for professional damseling named Brianna Wu. It was jaw-droppingly awful. Fortunately, Socks has a great deconstruction of this sorry excuse for journalism:

http://youtu.be/YGAetdlStjo

If you're at all interested in video games, you should probably subscribe to her channel or check her out on Twitter.

Breakthrough medical treatment for feminism & related disorders

August Løvenskiolds · 19 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

It is with great happiness and no small level of relief that A Voice for Men announces the first set of medical protocols for dealing with the infectious disease known in the popular vernacular as "Feminism." This puzzling disorder afflicts about 20 percent of the United States's population, resulting in paradoxical symptoms of increased aggression, paranoia, and projection in women, and an unnatural passivity and sexual cessation in men.

In addition to mental disorders, Feminism's major physical impact is to cause abortions, both spontaneous and medically induced, that cost the afflicted the lives of millions of their healthy children as well as wasting countless public medical resources better spent on treating other life-threatening disorders, such as infectious diseases and bodily injuries.

Background

Oftentimes the causes of even widespread diseases can remain obscure and the medical establishment can be slow to recognize cutting-edge theories and treatments, so even as we appeal to medical authorities to take these findings seriously, we recognize that the process of altering the popular understanding of pathological Feminism will be contentious and time-consuming.

For example, once upon a time, the cause of the ubiquitous stomach ulcer was obscure, and often attributed by medical science to vague factors like "stress" or "spicy foods." Bland diets and the career-killing "stress management" of ulcers had poor track records that frustrated patients and doctors alike, although the ongoing treatment of ulcers using ineffective measures did provide something of a financial boon to both legitimate medical practitioners and pseudo-scientific "alternative" therapists.

In 1982, however, it was discovered that stomach ulcers were caused by a bacterium now known as Helicobacter Pylori. This finding was controversial for years but eventually led to effective treatments.

Likewise, a disease known first in the early 1980's as "GRID", or "Gay-Related Immune Disorder," was often attributed to libertine homosexual lifestyles of that era, but as our understanding of the disease eventually transcended both liberal and conservative ideologies it became known as "AIDS," determined to be caused by infection with the virus dubbed HIV.

Like stomach ulcers and AIDS, the causal factor of Feminism was once obscured by poor research, financial motivations, and ideological concerns such as the alleged "patriarchy". Once Feminism achieved its stated goal of legal equality for women with men (and feminists' sotto voce goal of female societal domination) it became clear that something other than ideology was driving the increasingly febrile daily behaviors of feminists.

Indeed, it wasn't until January of 2015 that the infectious agent for Feminism was first identified: a bacterium known as Toxoplasma gondii, or T. Gondii.

Toxoplasma gondii: The cause of Feminism

Let's review the facts known about T. Gondii and how it relates to Feminism.

T. Gondii lives in rodents such as mice, members of the feline family known as domestic cats, and humans as well as other warm-blooded animals, many of whom are common human food sources. Cats are crucial to T. Gondii insofar as it can only reproduce in their digestive tracts and cats propagate the disease through their feces.

T. Gondii has evolved to make rodent hosts alter their behavior to become suicidal: once infected they become sexually attracted to cat urine and instead of avoiding predation, the mice seek out cats to eat them.

Growing evidence revealed in the journal Preventive Veterinary Medicine suggests T. Gondii also causes vast amounts of personality disorders in humans. The CDC reports about 60 million Americans are infected with T.

Gondii, which creates brain plaques that can alter human personalities; in particular, it makes people's thinking more gender neutral: studies show infected women adopt active male-associated traits and infected men adopt passive female-associated traits. In other words, infected humans become feminists as their new behaviors conflict with cultural expectations of normal gender behavior.

Observed mostly anecdotally, the high number of feminist cat lovers is a further result of T Gondii's modification of human mental processes, creating feminists out of otherwise normal humans who, likewise, lose behavioral and physical characteristics more normalized to their respective genders, much in the same way as T. Gondii makes rodents adopt suicidal sexual desires.

The feminist inclinations inculcated in T. Gondii infected human individuals have additional effects: they disrupt human pair-bonding and sexual reproduction, inevitably leading to a solitary death of the host feminist that can go unnoticed for weeks or even months by the larger, uninfected society. Once one of these infected feminists dies alone and is subsequently consumed by rats or cats, the life cycle of T. Gondii proceeds even faster, but this is not essential to the survival of the infection, merely an enhancement.

Around 20% of the U.S. population is infected with T. Gondii. Also, around 20% of the U.S. population identifies as feminist. Studies of the overlap of these two populations are expected to provide routine confirmations of this discovery, better establishing both correlation and causation of Feminism and related disorders such as schizophrenia by T. Gondii.

The meme of feminists dying alone (often with their cats) has been noted here, and here.

Treatment and disease management protocols

Although high doses of psychoactive drugs seem to interfere with the effects and reproduction of T. Gondii, a pharmacological cure for Feminism remains elusive. It is hoped that the huge number of Feminism sufferers will provide lucrative incentives for the market to research potential treatments for this scourge.

Once infected, the damage to the brains of feminists appears to be permanent in most cases, although in an increasing number of sufferers spontaneous remission away from feminism has been observed. "Trigger warnings" and other irrational mental gymnastics seem to perpetuate Feminism and are best ignored by those seeking to grow beyond the hurdles created by the infection. Only the most tangentially infected and mentally stable of feminists seem to be able to manage this feat.

Until an effective treatment or cure is found, it is recommended that domestic cats, when employed as pets and companion animals, be kept exclusively indoors where they can be dissuaded from eating infectious mice or birds. Indoor/outside cats should be avoided. Working outdoor cats on farms, granaries and other areas should be isolated from human touch until they have passed an isolation protocol.

Likewise, all contact, and especially sexual encounters with feminists, particularly cat-owning feminists, should be avoided since the possibility of infection or unjustified rape allegations soars in this population. Ironically, avoiding "cat-calling" and other "rapey" behaviors ostensibly censured by feminists for substandard and/or minority men should also be adopted by even the most attractive and wealthy men, who are urged to seek more healthy, non-feminist partners for their sexual outlets.

Until a cure is found, socially isolating feminists and their cats' feces is the most prudent and effective way of containing the damage caused by this horrible disease.

What do A Voice for Men's readers look like racially/ethnically?

Dean Esmay · 20 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

You may remember we recently obtained professional statistics on what A Voice for Men's readership looks like politically, at least within the United States. We look like the typical American, with a slightly higher-than-average rate of independents and a much higher rate of political participation than average. We're liberals, we're conservatives, we're libertarians, we're nonpartisan–I guess those who want to pigeonhole us lose.

And so we got some other statistics, and those who hate us turn out to be wrong again:

Uh-oh. Another stereotype bites the dust. We also look pretty much–like America! All racial groups are represented proportionally. Of internet users, we have very slight underrepresentation of blacks (8% instead of 9%) and slight overrepresentation of Asians and Hispanics, but all of it within the margin of error.

In short, Men's Human Rights Activists look like average ordinary typical everyday people–with genuine diversity, as opposed to the faux "diversity" based on ideological bigotry preached by feminists and other Social Justice Warriors (whom we notice tend to be overwhelmingly privileged white women and their white knight enablers).

Why do I think no feminist web site can match this sort of ethnic as well as political diversity? And why do I think none of our detractors will bother acknowledging this reality, or apologizing for their racist, sexist, bigoted stereotyping?

We don't have the resources right now to get full statistics for outside the United States, but we wanted everyone to see that photo of our brothers in India, AVfM Indian News Director Anil Kumar's SIFF organization, using AVfM's well-known slogan, "Men's Rights Are Human Rights." India makes up a growing percentage of our readership, and we are strongly considering opening a Hindi language edition of AVfM to go along with our Spanish, Italian, Romanian, Hebrew, Farsi, Swedish, and other language editions. So while our stats can only measure these things for American visitors right now, we want those reading this to know: this is an international movement of men and women of all races, creeds, and colors–a genuine coalition of decent people who care about one thing: the human and civil rights and well-being of all boys and men, around the world.

You want diversity? A Voice for Men is diversity, people.

Daniel Andrews wants a Feminist funding frenzy

Jim Muldoon · 20 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

> Because, once every so often, a genuine crisis erupts, in the most powerful way imaginable.

These are the words of Daniel Andrews, Victorian Leader of the Opposition. You know you're being snowed when it's a "genuine" crisis, because a real crisis, that is an actual crisis, doesn't need any other word in front of it. A crisis is a real, genuine, fair dinkum crisis. Otherwise, it's a moral panic.

What crisis has erupted? What was not a crisis last week, or last month, or last year, but has now come so suddenly to the fore that Danny boy feels compelled to use the hit the panic alarm as it "erupts?"

No, we're not talking about Jihadists coming back from Syria and Iraq. We are not discussing Flight MH17 or the ongoing civil war in the Ukraine. We are not in bushfire season, and no one in Melbourne has been diagnosed with the Ebola virus. What could be happening "in the most powerful way imaginable?"

Why its domestic violence, of course. And not just any old domestic violence, but Domestic Violence Using Feminist Approved Definitions, Terms and Statistics.

The absurdity of Andrews is just too much. Are we seriously to believe that, just recently, there has been a dramatic upswing in domestic violence? That men who were nice to their wives yesterday have suddenly started using their fists today?

And of course, we are not discussing women being violent to either their partners or their children – no matter how many children they kill. No, just nasty, smelly, good-for-nothing men.

Daniel Andrews' pledge to have a Royal Commission into Domestic Violence was made at the Labor Conference last year. Presumably, this distraction was called for because the CFMEU scandals, and Labor poor results federally, have caused a panic about Andrews' own political future.

Whether or not there actually would be a Royal Commission, the rhetoric would go down well with the Feminist factions within the Labor party as well as the media, and Andrews needs all the friends he can get.

> Family violence is the leading contributor to death, injury and disability among Australian women under the age of 45. Just think about that. This is systemic.

If you want to, you can check out the link below to Bev Armitage's fine article on these domestic violence woozles. The key phrase is leading contributor, with the other candidates apparently being obesity, high cholesterol, high blood pressure and illicit drug use. How much of a contribution? Apparently Domestic Violence contributes a massive 9%. Which means it is the biggest little fish in the pond.

The actual, real and genuine leading causes of death and illness for this age group are:

1. Anxiety & Depression
2. Migraine
3. Type 2 diabetes
4. Asthma
5. Schizophrenia

Also, consider this to get a better flavour of the erupting crisis in a powerful way. The other false statistic often quoted by Feminists is that domestic violence claims the life of one woman a week in Australia. Sometimes that gets pushed out to every week and a half, but lets leave it as high as 52 a year for the purposes of this discussion.

In 2010, 862 females were killed by accidental falls in Australia, and 253 females were killed by accidental poisonings. Neither of these, incidentally, makes the top ten of all causes of death for women.

Now, I know that Feminist morons will now take the stance that one is one too many, and I'm not saying Domestic Violence is something to be taken lightly, but for females, falling over is 1,600% more deadly.

Aha! You might say, but accidental falls happen mostly to older women and Andrews is talking about women under 45. The average age for those killed by accidental poisonings was 45.4. But further, consider this: of the 545 women who committed suicide in 2010, 280 were in the under 45 category.

In other words, women are far more at risk from accidents or themselves than they are from any man by a long, long way.

No matter how you cut it, the talk of an erupting crisis that is a "national emergency" is clearly Andrews creating a moral panic while he gets on his trusty steed to save the damsels. It is pure propaganda.

The other tack favoured by Feminists is to claim that these figures cover only the domestic violence that we know about. Andrews played this card too at the Labor conference.

> And all of you in this room know a victim and you know them well.
>
> But you might not know who.

Why doesn't the Labor leader call on all the women in the party room to come forward, there and then, and out their abusive partners? Why doesn't he call on the male Labor faithful to come forward and repent? If it's the big emergency he says it is, why are those attending the Labor conference somehow immune?

Instead Andrews pretends to offer a fresh look at the problem.

> If our solution to this crisis is simply more of the same policies, then we will just see more of the same tragedies.

It is not true to say that the policies themselves have caused the tragedies he refers to. However, to claim that the policies have been ineffective depends on what you think the policies are for. They are certainly ineffective at reducing violence. However, the next set of measures that come from the proposed Royal Commission will be just as ineffective in that regard too. But that's not really what they are designed for.

What they have been incredibly effective at is increasing the revenue of all kinds of government departments and so called not-for-profit organisations. Not just the refuges, but organisations like the White Ribbon Campaign which collects all kinds of government funding for "education programs" as well as their "awareness campaigns." And the Department of Human Services is bigger than most multi-national companies.

The multi-billion dollar divorce industry is similarly boosted with the introduction of the "family violence" fault into the "no-fault" divorce. More mothers can and do use the expanded definitions of violence every year to get revenge on he-who-did-not-live-up-to-expectations.

Yes, we will see more of the same policies. In fact, despite his rhetoric, that is exactly what Andrews is proposing. The only real change the Royal Commission might bring is to increase the reliance on extreme Feminist ideology to bring about "solutions." How extreme?

> We have to admit the system isn't working. We have to commit ourselves to its complete upheaval. Another dollar here or there won't do. We have to change it all.

All? How does Andrews propose to change it all?

> A royal commission will give us the answers we don't have. It will hear from survivors, experts and support groups.

Any guesses as to why we've got the current "system?" For centuries, it has been a crime to assault people – even if that "people" happens to be a man's wife. In recent times, however, the current regime has been fashioned by our legal and political elites following guidance by those very "experts" and "support groups."

Whenever anyone has dared question the wisdom of the wise, of course, "survivors" are paraded in the media to show how heartless the doubters are.

And the Royal Commission won't just be hearing from them. According to the Labor party strategists Hawker Britton:

> The Panel will be headed by an eminent Australian judge with experience in family law, with a panel of survivors and support providers to advise the Commission.

Same as it ever was.

Of course, the point is that the "system" should never actually "fix" the "national emergency." No, it should remain a "genuine crisis" so that Feminist agencies such as the White Ribbon Campaign can get more funding, legal elites can have more Royal Commissions and the like, and politicians like Andrews can grandstand.

What Andrews' Royal Commission will produce, if he gets his way, will be more recommendations for more funding for more organisations, more social workers and more legal conferences to draft up more laws. In that sense, the next Feminist Funding Frenzy will be larger than all that has gone before.

What we should be afraid of, however, is that this moral panic will lead to even more erosion of men's legal rights as politicians like Andrews paint them as the eternal villain of this drama. It is likely that there will be a push to relax rules of evidence while pushing the onus of proof onto the accused.

On the face of it, this will be done to "punish the guilty" as Andrews foreshadows. However, the real effect will be to drive up the statistics so that the panic merchants can demand a even greater Feminist Funding Frenzy on the next round.

Links

http://www.thesaturdaypaper.com.au/opinion/topic/2014/06/07/daniel-andrews-family-violence-royal-commission/1402063200#.U98jQ6Mr9NI

http://www.danielandrews.com.au/media/news/family-violence-royal-commission/http://www.heraldsun.com.au/news/victoria/victorian-labor-promises-family-violence-royal-commission/story-fni0fit3-1226921037798

http://au.avoiceformen.com/activism/domestic-violence-woozles-factoids-in-australia/http://www.abs.gov.au/ausstats/abs@.nsf/0/1676C30C00F8776CCA2579C6000F7064?opendocument

http://www.abs.gov.au/ausstats/abs@.nsf/Products/3303.0~2010~Chapter~Suicides?OpenDocument

http://www.heraldsun.com.au/news/victoria/opposition-leader-daniel-andrews-stands-by-cfmeu-after-claims-official-demanded-50000-to-keep-peace-at-pentridge-prison-construction-site/story-fnocxssc-1226977096414

http://www.hawkerbritton.com/images/data/Occasional%20Paper%20-%20Establishment%20of%20Victorian%20Royal%20Commission%20into%20Family%20Violence.pdf

Brittney Cooper is just mad that Iggy Azalea is hot, and she is not

Mumia Ali · 20 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

"Don't hate me because I'm beautiful…"
-Kelly LeBrock

I remember the very first time I saw Tina Turner; remember it like it was yesterday, in fact. I was about six years old, sitting in the middle of my grandparents' master bedroom in their huge home in North Philly. I was watching their enormous floor-model Zenith television set – a big deal to own back then – and when Ms. Turner took the stage, I was spellbound.

She sang "Proud Mary" and was shakin' it something fierce; my hypnotic, trancelike state was so profound that my grandmother turned off the T.V., muttering something about "them fast-assed girls" – a phrase I would hear quite a bit more in the years to come from her, as I, ahem, came of age in her home.

From that moment on, I was a stan for Tina.

It didn't have a darned thing to do with "cultural appropriation" or any other convoluted notion toward "deconstructionism" that is so much a part and parcel the M.O. of the Sistas of Perpetual Grievance; heck, I didn't even know, nor cared, that "Proud Mary" was originally written and performed by a White guy – the famed John Fogerty, front man for the "swamp rock" (even though they were from sunny California) band, Creedance Clearwater Revival. All's I knew was that day, I knew exactly what a Hot Woman looked like.

So, when I got word from my colleague, Ms. Janet Bloomfield, that "Professor Crunk", Ms. Brittney Cooper, was on yet another Id-Monster-fueled tear because her seven year-old nephew sat enraptured by a recent Iggy Azalea performance, I both chuckled and felt deeply saddened at the same time. Not because I could relate to Cooper's nephew – I most certainly could – but because I saw right through the facade that Black Feminists like Cooper always put up when it comes to things like this. Things like beauty. Things like attractiveness.

Things like Hotness.

Cooper's understanding of musical history – Hip Hop or otherwise – is at best, suspect, if not downright farcical – but Ms. Bloomfield has already done a masterful job in demonstrating how and why. And of course, Ms. Bloomfield – a White, and yea I'll say it, conventionally attractive woman, despite her having birthed three kids – can't say what I'm about to say. And on balance, that is actually a good thing. Because it was time that a Brotha like me started saying what I'm going to say.

And that, is this:

The entire Black Feminist "project", if one can call it that, is built around being Butthurt that they ain't Miss Ann.

Period.

This has always been my argument, and recently here at AVFM, I've laid it out as concisely as possible. I argue, and maintain, that the chief "beef" Black Feminists have, is that they ain't good looking. White women, by and large, or failing that, good looking Black women – you know, the kinds of White and Black women Brothas Who Matter, tend to come out to the yard for.

And. That. Drives. Them. Batty.

Like Ms. Bloomfield, I'm no fan of Azalea, and to be frank, believe it or not, I actually prefer Sistas who are NOT "conventionally attractive" – but I still got eyes that work. And the simple truth of the matter is, that Iggy ain't hard to look at. There. I've said it. Women who ain't hard to look at, tend to get more attention, get a bit further along in life, and yea, get more attraction from a wider swath of guys, than women who aren't so great to look at, all other things being equal. Sucks, I know, but such is life.

But, instead of focusing on what they CAN do to make their lives better, Sista Feminists like Cooper bemoan the very existence of the Iggys of the world (and blame everyone else first and foremost Black men, dontcha know) – who, I remind everyone, work their tushes off to get where they are to begin with. The so-called "issues" Black Feminists tend to bang on about – "street harassment", "Black male privilege" and so forth – are really thinly veiled covers for Sour Grapes gripin' that they came up on the short end of the lovin' stick – and try to ape White Feminists by making their personal butthurt political. It's silly, it's sophmoric, it's petty and yea, I'll say it, it's pathetic – especially when you've gone to the point of going in on young boys who truly don't know any better anyway.

I mean, really.

Ms. Cooper – and her Sistas in Arms – would be much better served by losing weight, hitting up Sephora and, since they admire Ms. Ann so very much, actually LISTENING to White women, like Ms. Bloomfield, as to how to get and keep those Brothas Who Matter. If they really want to tackle "issues" facing Black women in America, they can start by following Chris Rock's lead in his excellent documentary "Good Hair"; or by addressing the fact that, taken together as a group, Black American women are the heaviest people in the country; or, by addressing themselves to matters of comportment, attitude and decorum – things that make it easier, not harder, not just to attract suitors (and keep them! – since Black American women also have the lowest marital rate and highest breakup/divorce rate of all American women, too), but to get along in life, period. These are all real concerns that everyone reading along right now with one good eye can confirm out there – and don't require far-fetched, quasi-metaphysical solutions to implement. It really, truly, ain't that hard.

And I'm really, truly, too tired of listening to Black Feminists moan, whine and hate on Women, White or otherwise, who just happen to put a premium of importance on actually looking good, and using what they got to get what they want.

Please, get with the program, Brittney…

…and leave your nephew alone.

TJSotomayor comes out fully in favor of Men's Rights

AVfM Video Source · 20 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

TJSotomayor exposes feminism for the fraud that it is.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=OL3FkOZHzYM&feature=youtu.be Subscribe to his channel here.

Review: Syfy's "12 Monkeys" – The Germinator?

August Løvenskiolds · 21 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The Syfy Channel has launched a new series entitled "12 Monkeys", inspired by the movie of the same name from 1995.

The movie version of the story was directed by Monty Python alum Terry Gilliam and starred Bruce Willis and Madeleine Stowe, with a remarkable, crazed performance by Brad Pitt.

My friend Mimi and I watched the movie at the Granada Movie Grill in Dallas in '95, and luckily for us, we had been warned by friends that the movie was very disjointed and that we should pay complete attention to every detail of the film or we would quickly get lost. We took this warning to heart: our eyes remained affixed to the screen for the duration of the film, and our monomaniacal focus was rewarded with a fascinating if mind-ripping experience. I'll never forget the less attentive patrons around us murmuring things like "what the fuck was that?" as the lights came up, while Mimi and I were still basking in the epiphany.

The question I had going into the new TV series was this: can the emotionally disturbing atmosphere sustained in part by the disjointed, challenging storyline be reproduced on the small screen with commercials? The neat, linear story structure of almost all television programs is necessitated by frequent commercial interruptions – convoluted stories can become too choppy and fall into complete incoherence when someone breaks in to sell you car insurance.

So, if you are interested in the show, invest all of your focus on it. No flipping during commercials, and if you miss an episode, watch it through some cable system's On Demand features or online.

The Plot

Much of the narrative of 12 Monkeys mirrors The Terminator movie franchise, in which a cyborg assassin is sent back in time after a robotic apocalypse to stop a group of rebels from stopping the apocalypse post hoc. In 12 Monkeys, however, it is a biologically enhanced man, "Cole" (played by actor Aaron Stanford, "Pyro" from X-Men 2), who is "splintered" back from the year 2043 to try to stop a group of terrorists from releasing a biological plague in 2017 that killed 7 billion people and destroyed human civilization. In the first two episodes, Cole, a prisoner in 2043, is sent back to 2013, then 2015, then 2009, then 2015 again. It is also suggested that Cole went back to 1987 but this trip hasn't happened yet – or has it?

You can see the first level of complexity here – the paradoxes and convolutions of time travel stories can be overwhelming unless you are strongly attentive to the story. The Syfy website has a handy time map if you need a clearer picture of the time splinters as they advance through the show's 13 planned episodes.

Cole's biological enhancements have not only unmoored him from linear time, but also increased his intelligence, fighting skills (like the character "River Tam" in Serenity) and healing ability (like "Wolverine" in the X-Men movie franchise), but each to a lesser degree. Cole is also a stone cold killer with a dangerous degree of mental instability.

As if time travel weren't complex enough, mental disorders are the other major theme of the story: Cole is crazy, his allies are crazy, and the conspirators behind the plague – the 12 Monkeys – are nuttier than squirrel scat.

Cole's accidental partner in the years 2013 and 2015 is the aptly named "Cassandra", after the mythological psychic who was doomed never to be believed. Cassandra, played by TV actress Amanda Schull, is a physician and virologist kidnapped/carjacked by Cole in 2013. They rapidly and weirdly bond during the first few minutes of the kidnapping, just before a wounded Cole splinters two years into the future – and now everyone thinks "Cassie" is crazy as well.

Emerging as the bad guy is "Pallid Man", played by the soft-spoken character actor Tom Noonan of Manhunter and Robocop 2, perhaps the archetypal nice-guy monster. He is deranged as well, and the perfect counterpoint to the bad-boy hero Cole.

Both men are fighting to destroy the future – Cole wants to obliterate both himself and the dystopia caused by the plague, while Pallid Man's motives for afflicting the future have yet to emerge.

The romance?

Although it seems inevitable that Cole and Cassie will do the mystery show hookup (like Booth and Brennan in Bones and Castle and Becket in Castle), their current relationship is certain to drive feminists insane: Cole kidnaps Cassie from a rapey, dark parking lot and Cassie is swooning over him five minutes later. In a scene dropped from the broadcast series but available through On Demand, Cassie talks to an unnamed female bartender as 2015 begins, so the show would've almost passed the Bechdel Test if the bartender had a name.

For now, though, Cole is a Man Going His Own Way, finding meaning in his squalid life of 2043 by retreating into the relatively prosperous life of 2015, where the women are the way he prefers: "clean-looking". Actress Amanda Schull is a feminist nightmare: a beautiful, blonde, accomplished white woman in her late thirties with the thigh gap and torso of a woman of half her age. Cassie has survived trauma with aplomb and would look askance at any feminist calling her a victim of patriarchy.

The repeated themes of mental illness will certainly "trigger" most feminists into the shrieking hysteria they are known for.

At this point 12 Monkeys looks more promising as a series than Syfy's Ascension, which I've previously reviewed. The show airs Friday nights on the Syfy Channel in the US, or when and wherever the time splinters take it.

Mike Buchanan debates with Caroline Criado-Perez

Mike Buchanan · 21 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

It's been a groundbreaking three days. Following the Buzzfeed News piece which was published at 8am on Wednesday – and by midnight on the same day had attracted over 146,000 'hits' – we've had many calls from journalists in the mainstream media. Pieces have appeared – or will shortly appear – in major publications including the Independent, Telegraph, Guardian, Observer, Mirror, either their print editions or on their websites. Most have posted pieces lying about, or misrepresenting, our election manifesto, but we honestly couldn't care less. Thousands of people have downloaded the document, and it doesn't take them long to realize the media are lying to them about its contents, or grossly misrepresenting it.

In the past two days I've had three television interviews and a radio interview, and more are planned. Yesterday I was a guest – along with Caroline Criado-Perez – on 'This Morning', an ITV programme which regularly attracts over two million viewers (mostly women). Please leave your comments on the YouTube channel rather than here.

We're working ridiculously hours coping with the mainstream media interest in J4MB – when we were already busy campaigning in our three target constituencies – and we have no doubt this week will in time be recognized as the week the mainstream media realized it had no choice but to start reporting about men's and boys' human rights violations. This explosion of media attention is the fruition of the work of a remarkable team of people at J4MB over the past two years – none of whom are paid anything – and if you'd like to demonstrate your appreciation of that effort, I invite you to make a donation here. Thank you for your support.

Update: Video was broken, fixed now!

True meaning of love- MGTOW

AVfM Video Source · 21 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

YouTuber and Man Going His Own Way Jaye De Black talks about love from a MGTOW perpective. If you like what he has to say you can subscribe to his channel here.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=ord77dlntFs

The Feminists Rape-tilian Brain

Jack Barnes · 21 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

There is usually some point in an article such as this where the author writes an entire paragraph or more about how rape is the end all and be all of horrible things that can happen to a woman. This is done to suck up to women and is the equivalent of spraying a can of air freshener before you fart. I'm tired of it. Yes rape is a bad thing. But there are many things that are a whole hell of a lot worse. Now put your emotions in a drawer and lets have a logical rational conversation.

Rape is one of feminist's sacred cows. For decades they have dominated the discourse on rape. They ARE the authority on anything and everything having to do with sexual assault. Why? Cause they say so and because anyone with a different opinion is cast into oblivion. This fear of feminist wrath caused the sane intelligent people to keep silent as feminists tightened their grip on rape. Make no mistake, feminists love rape. They salivate over it. They fantasize about it. It's what gets them ideologically wet. Rape is the ultimate female victimhood, which is why feminists never needed to convince society that only men rape and only women are rape victims. Feminists simply capitalized on a prejudice that was already there. If it weren't for rape, feminism would have starved to death from lack of funding resulting from a lack of a legitimate issues to wave in the public's face for cash and reputable social status. In order to maintain the victimhood that rape gives them, feminists have to continually up the game. Just like a performer must continue to make his shows bigger, better and more entertaining year after year after year in order to stay on top, feminists have to keep raising the bar on rape. Not only do they have to keep wowing the public with ever more spectacular tales of our culture's rape problem, they have to fight the fact that rape has been on the decline for years. They have to keep up the con that the monster is at the gate. They have to make the monster look meaner, bigger and more deadly every time while hiding the fact that the monster is dying. It's like a king telling his people that an invading army is at the gates when in reality the army is a small child with a slingshot who is running out of marbles. The king must maintain his power to enforce more draconian rules and policies by convincing the people that the child is actually a huge invading army. But like any other tyrant throughout history the tighter they squeeze, the more they lose control.

In the past year we have seen feminists make complete fools of themselves regarding their advocacy surrounding rape. They continue to spout false statistics like 1 in 5 women will be raped on college campuses even after countless media publications and government agencies have proven feminists wrong. They backed a University of Virginia false rape accuser without any evidence. Once Jacky's story started falling apart, feminists doubled down and shamed anyone daring to questions her story. After Jacky's story and credibility laid in ruins, they triple downed with "we must believe women even if we know they are lying." Now someone close to two of the women accusing Bill Cosby of rape has come out and said that these two women are making it up. Wonder what the feminists reaction to that will be? Probably more "believe women no matter what or else!" All of this is nothing new. Feminists have been backing any woman accusing a man of rape for years. They continued to call the young men who were the victims in the Duke Lacrosse case rapists, even after they were proven innocent. Time after time after time when the accused is proven innocent, feminists continue to insist that he must be guilty simply because a woman said it. We are now at the point that feminists must fabricate rape allegations to prove that rape culture exists and to prove there is a rape epidemic on college campuses. Think I'm kidding?

Desiree Nall, student at Rollins College in Winter Park, Fla. and president of the local chapter of the National Organization for Women, claimed she had been raped by two men during Sexual Assault Awareness Week. Police were suspicious of her claims because she could not keep her story straight, couldn't provide a description of the men and a physical examination couldn't find evidence an assault. Nall eventually recanted and was charged with making a false police report. Police suggested that Nall could have been attempting to "make a statement" about sexual assault. Her husband defended her saying she was targeted by the cops because she is a feminist.

Mindy Brickman, a student at Princeton University, falsely accused another student of rape at a "Take Back the Night" rally, in conversations with fellow students. Eventually her claims fell apart and she wrote an article in the school newspaper explaining that she never wanted anyone to get hurt by her claims but she was just trying to "raise awareness for the plight of the campus rape victims."

Meg Lanker-Simons, a student at the University of Wyoming, posted a graphic rape threat directed at herself to on a Facebook page "UW Crushes." A feminist rally followed and one obviously feminist school official denounced the mythical "Rape Culture." The local police launched an investigation from which they quickly determined that Lanker-Simons had posted the message herself.

Tanya Borachi, student at the University of Florida, filed a false police report in which she said that she had been bound and gagged by a man wearing a mask and gloves. Borachi defended her false allegation by saying that she was trying to teach local women a lesson about being attacked.

Mariam Kashani, a student at George Washington University and a rape counselor for a rape crisis hotline, told the school newspaper that a girl had been raped by two men. To back up her claims she had someone, impersonating a police officer, call the newspaper. When the story fell apart Kashani said that she "had hoped the story, as reported, would highlight the problems of safety for women."

Ok, let me get this straight. According to feminists we live in a society that condones, supports and encourages the rape of women by men (rape culture). There is a massive rape epidemic to the point that 1 in 5 women will be raped on college campuses and rape is common in our entire society. But feminists must invent rape victims to bring awareness to this problem.

Where does this come from? What makes feminists so certain that their delusions are reality despite all evidence? Is it indoctrination?

The easiest way to get a person to believe a lie is tell them a lie they want to believe. Tell a skinny woman she is fat and she will believe it. Tell a fat woman she is skinny and she won't. Tell a feminist rape is declining along with proof and she will call you a rape apologist and a misogynist. Tell a feminist that rape is everywhere and that all men are rapists and she will nod a yes with that gleam in her eye that can only be found in the truly disturbed. This goes far beyond indoctrination. This is a symptom of mental illness. The lust for continued and all encompassing victimhood is not the desire of a rational human being of either sex. Yes, women have used a lesser form of victimhood to achieve their goals throughout history. But nothing like this. It was always "I don't want to be a victim of that man or those men over there so please protect me." It has never been "every women is a victim of every man all the time." See the last one would never have worked. Women needed a man to feel loyal to her, not feel like he was hurting her by merely existing. That would have drove him away either through the belief that the only way to not victimize her would be to leave her alone or through "fuck this crazy bitch I'm out of here." So what causes this?

We know the powers that be within the feminist movement are mentally unstable. For proof of this just read anything written by Amanda Marcotte, Julie Bindel, Ti Grace Atkinson, Jessica Valenti or any other notable feminist. From what I can only call their demented minds come the lies that the average feminist swallows. We know that the mentally insane can have a very active imagination. But what about the average feminist? What causes a female feminist to believe these lies? If it's not just simple indoctrination but is in fact another form of mental illness, where does this mental illness come from? Are they born with it?

The old saying about misogynists holds true for feminists as well. Feminists aren't born, they are created. The molding and shaping of a mind that turns it into something that can no longer function properly doesn't begin in college or in school. It starts much earlier.

The whole of feminism is the sum of individual feminists. The ideas may have come from the feminist goddesses on high, but the basic tactics of feminism comes from the subconscious of the individual feminists. Feminism is not a product of higher brain function. In fact its just the opposite. Remember that feminists must continue to up their game so that society will continue to believe in the products feminism is selling? The same is true for the individual feminist. She must continue to raise the bar on her own victimhood to maintain the validity of her victimhood in the eyes of society. She needs victimhood. It's like a drug. It's like money. She needs the drug to ride the emotional and psychological high that victimhood gives her. She needs the currency that she gets from victimhood to get the things she needs and wants.

How does victimhood serve them as a currency?

Victimhood is the currency of the weak. Feminists women have always had others do for them. They have never had to do for themselves. They need victimhood to convince others to do for them. I've seen children pretend they were unable to do something in order to get an adult to do it for them. Imagine now a child who has used this strategy all her life and it worked every time. Don't want to do a chore? Pretend you can't. Don't want society to hold you to the same level of accountability as an adult? Pretend you're a victim. Feminists bum off our general sympathy and compassion for victims.

Why does victimhood give feminists a high?

The path to becoming a feminist begins early. These women started out as little girls. They learned early on that victimhood was power. Victimhood allowed her mother to claim spousal abuse without any evidence thereby giving her mother increased child support, alimony and victimhood money from the government. Not to mention the joy of being able to completely remove her from her father's life thereby enacting daily vengeance on her father because her father got pissed at her mother for banging the mailman. Victimhood got her hugs and kisses after she came home crying because she pushed a boy off a snow bank and in retaliation he threw a snowball at her. Victimhood got her the feeling of superiority as she watched her feminist teacher scold the boys for being born oppressive males and offer words of praise for the goodness of being a poor oppressed female. Victimhood allowed her to get drunk and fuck a stranger then shift the blame for her slutty behavior on to him when her friends called her out for what she did, rather than be an adult and tell her friends to fuck off. Very early on these girls learned the thrill of being able to destroy someone's life for any reason or no reason at all. They learned the good feeling of believing they were superior to lower life forms. They learned to love the power of being able to blame their bad behavior on someone else. These particular women have a whipping boy and get perverse pleasure from hearing him scream. They enjoy being able to behave how ever they want and being shielded from any and all accountability by their victim card. They are addicted and dependent on the power of victimhood. This is how a feminist is made. Normal women understand victimhood is not empowering. Normal women shun victimhood. Feminists do not.

This is why feminists love rape.

Rape is the ultimate victimhood. It's the victimhood that until recently, no one dared to question. The victim card, when played, means you automatically win no matter what. Society is what gives power to the holders of the victimhood card. We are the ones that exchange victimhood for what ever the holder of the victim card wants at the time. Without our cooperation, the victim card would be worthless. But society is easily distracted, therefore feminists must continue to wave the victim card in our faces or it will loose all value. This works to favor the powers that be within the feminist movement. The powers that be have a different form of mental illness than the regular average feminist. For these feminists, female victimhood isn't a drug or money, it's a tool.
The average feminist has rape on the brain because they are in constant victimhood mode. This is why we are seeing feminists soar to new heights of cray cray when it comes to rape and sexual assault. They must keep the victimhood flowing at all cost. It's no different than a junkie who continues to debase herself more and more and more just to get her next fix until she hits bottom. The problem is that these loons want to take the rest of us with them. It's time to give them the cold turkey treatment. This means denying victimhood to women. This means society must collectively say "enough is enough – it's time for women to grow up and be treated like adults." Most women won't have a problem with this. But for feminists the detox will be the stuff they couldn't even come up with in their nightmares. It will be horrible for them as they are forced to grow up and become adults. You know what? I don't give a damn about the pain and suffering that feminists are destined to go through as a result of coming off the victimhood drug. Let them scream. Let them wail. Let them cry.

Society simply can no longer afford to tolerate female victimhood and feminism.

Toxic Masculinity: Woman burns newborn daughter alive

AVfM Video Source · 22 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

This is genuinely disturbing but Raging Golden Eagle makes a very good point about it.

http://youtu.be/rzlC9bLc9Ks

Tackling the bugbear of "Black Male Privilege"

Mumia Ali · 23 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

> "Theatricality and depection, are powerful weapons to the unitiated…"
> Ra'as Al'Ghoul, Batman Begins

One of the more novel wrinkles to come along in the Afrosphere in recent years is the idea of "Black Male Privilege" – the notion that Black Men, taken as a group, somehow enjoy systemic advantages over Black Women, simply for being, well, Black and Male. While certain quarters of the Sistahood (read; homely or otherwise out-of-the-box Black Feminists/Black Women's Empowerment types of varying stripe) have seemed to glam on to this latest manufactured grievance, the concept, such as it is, actually was created by a Black Man: one Mr. Jewel Woods, MSW and last time I checked, Ph.D. student out of the Midwest, who in 2008 authored a book: "Don't Blame it on Rio," which basically is a rehash of a takedown on my part of Ms. Demetria Lucas' latest parakeet-laying on the same topic.

By that as it may, this latest attempt at Black SMP Rhetorical Jiu-Jitsu on the part of the Sistahood and their allies, the Black White Knights, is, unfortunately for them, not gaining much traction among the general Black masses – due largely to the inanity of it all. I mean, c'mon – White Privilege is to Black People, what "Black Male Privilege" is to Black Women?

Really?

"Sure!" argues those who are propagators of this kind of mind-numbing tripe – and they go on to cite a number of differing areas where this supposedly systemic, all-encompassing and pervasive "Black Male Privilege" conspires/coalesces makes the average Sista's life Hades on Earth. In fact, following the lead of the popular White Privilege Checklist, Mr. Woods has cobbled together the Black Male version, which I will be directly addressing on the morrow in my series taking up the matter (and attendant ones) in detail. But today, I want to address the general concept, examining it in detail, and explaining why the whole idea is a bunch of Bunk.

The BMP promoters argue that Black Men enjoy "privilege" because they're able to be at the center of attention, no matter what the situation; so for example, take mass incarceration rates of Black Men – here, the focus when the matter of crime and the like comes up, can remain on Black Men, to the detriment and expense of, Black Women writ large, depriving them of their rightful shine.

OK, so let's look at that – first, does ANY Black Man you personally know, who's been locked up, more than likely for something he did and deserved, ever tell you he felt "privileged" by the experience? Second, how are we to explain the busloads of Black Women themselves, who go to visit their Boos On Lockdown every weekend around the country – by all accounts, they don't seem to evidence much "Black Male Privilege Envy" – like I said, they seem very much to enjoy holding it down for their Boo while he on lockdown.

Third, let us consider a most timely facet of this canard the BMP promoters are attempting to foist onto the rest of us – gun crime. As we all know, the city of Chicago was brought prominently into the news late last year/early this year, for its continuing homicidal crime wave, and most notably, for the death of the late Ms. Hadiya Pendelton, who performed at President Obama's second inaugural only days before her untimely death. Indeed, it was so bad, that it brought not only the First Lady to attend her funeral, but the POTUS himself to Chicago to give his take on Chicago's rampant multi-decades-long gun violence problem.

Here's the thing, though: I'm not seeing much evidence of Black Male Privilege here. Let's be clear: the Obamas are from Chicago; it's where Barack Obama himself, made his political bones. Please name me the numerous sources where either Obama banged on the drum over the issue of gun violence way back when – and did so focusing only on the tens of thousands of Black Men who killed each other over the same timeframe – a timeframe that has seen

MORE dead in ONE American city, THAN THE WHOLE OF US MILITARY DEAD IN AFGHANISTAN?

I'll wait…

No? Yea, that's what I thought. In case you're a bit slow on the uptake here, let's put it this way: UNTIL A BLACK WOMAN GOT KILLED BY GUN VIOLENCE IN THE CHI, THE POTUS, NOR HIS WIFE, COULDN'T BE BOTHERED TO CARE WHAT HAPPENED TO BLACK MEN IN THEIR OWN HOMETOWN.

Capice? Again, I ask the BMP supporters – where's the "privilege"?

And while we're on the topic of the 44th President of The United States, let us tackle yet another aspect of this bugbear, shall we?

President Obama's most recent visit to his old stomping ground included an address to the Black Men of Chicago, a real treat, where he once again denigrated Black Men enmasse for being deadbeats and blaming them for the homicidal gun violence rates in the first place. I mean, it got so bad that even MSNBC's Melissa Harris-Perry – certainly no Friend of the Patriarchy, that's for sure – had to get in on the act to tell Obama to chill. Indeed, Obama – not just the most Privileged Black Man, but the Most Privileged Man on EARTH, has gone out of his way NOT to spread the Black Male Privilege wealth around during his time in Office, thus far – to date, he has upbraided Black Men, a core constituency of his, and cowardly slinked away from supporting two other Black Men, Prof. Henry Louis "Skip" Gates, and the late Trayvon Martin when White folks got mad at him. Oh yea, Black Men all over America are just basking in the glow of all the Black Male Privilege Obama has trickled down to them.

You know what, let's continue on this current track of examination, because, since the BMP agitators contend that Black Men make more money than Black Women, let's take a look at how Black Men overall have fared under the First Black POTUS – well, who's taken it more on the chin overall, when it comes to the job market – Black Men, or Black Women?

Going back to locales like the Chi, to ask the question, is to answer it. It has long been known that Black Men overall – and that includes those with college degrees, I might add – have fared far worse in the American job market than anyone else, for decades, and that this has only gotten worse under Obama. Indeed, there have been many studies and articles written that make clear that Blacks in general have largely lost all the financial ground they've made under previous presidential governments during the current one. Black Male unemployment rates can be as high as 50% or more, depending on the American city you want to examine – so again, I'm having a hard time seeing how Black Men are so very "privileged" over Black Women. Maybe one of you out there can see it – and explain it to me?

"But, what about the notion that Black boys are favored over Black girls, Obsidian?" – excellent question! Let's examine that canard…

Some years back, the Christian Science Monitor put out an article that examined the Adoption Baby Market, and it featured some very interesting results; among other things, it revealed the FACT that the babies/children LEAST likely to be adopted, not just by White parents, BUT BY BLACK ONES TOO, were…wait for it…

Black boys. That's right, out on the open adoption market, girls in general (and to be fair, Asian girls in particular) are seen as more desirable than boys; and when it comes to Black kids, Black girls are adopted at a much higher rate than Black boys. Indeed, and people who do work in social work fields – like Jewel Woods!-know well, all of these facts, and the fact that those most likely to "age out" of the foster care/home system, are yup, you guessed it, Black boys.

Where's the Privilege?

On education and health: we know, for a fact once again, that Black males lag far, far behind on these measures; not only that, but Black Women can easily point to all manner of organizations and groups and foundations, tasked with promoting educational excellence and health and wellness awareness, all for their express benefit – the Black Women's Health Study has been around for the better part of 20 years – clearly, since Black Male Privilege is rampant, Black Males overall should be much healthier and smarter too – right?

Right?

What's that? You say there's no such thing as a Black Men's Health Study, or a Prostate Cancer Month being sponsored by any major American sports organization (despite the fact that the NBA and NFL team personnel are at this point overwhelmingly Black) – or a Presidential Office for Black Men and Boys? I'm shocked – SHOCKED, I tell you!

I'm telling ya, you can't make this stuff up.

Then there's the sexual and romantic arena – ahhh, now we get to the good part. Black Men enjoy tremendous unearned, and deeply, grossly unfair, privilege in this area, so sayeth the BMP activists; Black Men are taking advantage of hapless, helpless Black Women hither and yon, loving and leaving them with reckless abandon.

Does anyone actually, really believe this crap? All the proponents of this BMP nonsense reveal, is not only how utterly ignorant they are of the most basic and simple of Econ 101 concepts, but of how much they suffer from Sour Grapes – first, what they're bemoaning isn't ALL Black Men here, but of the very small pool of highly desirable Black Men who, YES, enjoy tremendous privilege when it comes to the sexual arena. Like ANY highly desirable good, service or commodity, they are in high demand in part, BECAUSE there are so few of them; and as a result, they can and will, exploit their marketplace position – just like any other actor, or entity or cartel or business or corporation on the open market would. Why simple Econ 101 concepts should apply to everything else in this life EXCEPT for "Black Love," really only highlights a very real and easily documented problem in our time: Black Female Entitlement. I'll be discussing this very important issue in an upcoming post so stay tuned, but let's wrap up today's offering with the following:

The problem isn't that "Black Men," writ large, enjoy some all-encompassing "privilege"; the problem is that a small pool of desirable Black Men are acting in a very rational manner, and the Sistas are spitting mad that they won't "do right." Instead of either giving said Black Men what they want and competing on those grounds out in the open market, or, dialing back their expectations and desires to be more in line with what is more realistic and achievable for them, they instead have chosen to glam on to what can only be rightly decsribed as the most cockamamie and ridiculous idea to come down the pike since the Pet Rock.

Ladies – and the Black WhiteKnights that enable them – get a freaking grip. Haven't you heard of the saying, "All's fair in love and war"? NOBODY does anything in the dating/mating realm because "it's the right thing to do" – they do it because there is either an incentive to do so, or an disincentive to do so. Yea, that sucks for those who either won't or more often than not, can't meaningfully compete; but crying into your mimosas and spinning new fangled BS out of wholecloth theories as to why your love life sucks that can be debunked by a kid in middle school, doesn't mark you out as some brave Sista speaking truth to power; it only makes you look like an utter – and bitter – fool.

Bonus Question: how is it possible for so many Black Men to be to the curb on one hand, and, be oh-so-privileged on the other? Hmm?

"Black Male Privilege" my A$$.

Author's Note: This article originally appeared at The Obsidian Files, on Tue, Apr 23, 2013.

Sexual assault myths: Part 1

AVfM Video Source · 23 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

We don't live in a rape culture, but we do inhabit a culture saturated with gender propaganda. So says our friend Christina Hoff Sommers:

A mansplain of feminism femsplained

Jim Muldoon · 23 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The web site known as “The Conversation” website boasts a tagline of “academic rigour, journalistic flair.” Implicit, it seems to me, is that we can expect academic rigour and journalistic flair to be combined in their articles. If the article by Chilla Bulbeck entitled “Explainer: Feminism” is anything to go by, they should put a question mark after both claimed traits.

Academic rigour? Journalistic flair?

The piece begins with a picture of a bunch of men and women, with the Eiffel Tower in the background (how very cosmopolitan), throwing brassieres in the air. The people are fully clothed, which means that they brought extra bras along for the photo.

The bra, of course, is a symbol for Feminism. It can represent the feminine, being a garment uniquely designed for women. It can also represent their oppression, being a garment that restrains them. Throwing them up in the air no doubt has some special significance which only a true feminist will see.

The picture does set the tone for the piece. The theme, at least for me, is symbols over substance.

> “For most feminists, however, feminism is a political practice – a desire to change the world.”

Any idea what that might mean? A practice is something one does. A desire is something one has. Can Feminism be both? Of course it can. Feminism is the right to talk utter nonsense and demand that others be awestruck by the Feminist intellect.

A case in point can be seen in the comments. A Glen Baxter takes issue with the various statistic and arguments presented in the piece and puts forward a few alternative arguments.

> And you finish with the standard Feminist appeal to emotion – “We feminists are fighting oppression, so we must be right and if you don’t agree with us you are for oppression!”

Bulbeck’s dismissive reply to Glen includes an insightful snippet:

> Glenn, I suggest you read the article Shauna Murray posted a link for. You think emotion is inferior to reason…

Instead of answering Glenn’s points directly, she does exactly what he accused her of. The link in question is to someone claiming yet another study proves the oppression of women. Glenn is not only being told which facts to use, but how he should feel after reading them.

But, of course, I am being too patriarchal. Bulbeck was clearly caught up in the moment of making grand statements of the glory of Feminism to be worried about grammar or syntax, never mind logic. I can just imagine her blinking back those tears of pride as she contemplates changing the world, Feminist style.

Bulbeck takes us through the three waves of Feminism with all the academic rigour one might expect of a pamphlet spruiking the latest anti-wrinkle cream. Women, we are told, “struggled for the vote” in the early 1890s. Of course, this implies that men have always had the vote.

Let me give you another pamphlet guide to universal sufferage. In 1780 only 3% of men in England and Wales had the right to vote, with even less in Scotland. Outside of these countries, practically no one had the vote. In the years that followed, in fits and starts, that 3% was increased to what we now call universal suffrage in most Western countries. There are still many countries where the vote is either non-existent or too corrupt to call suffrage.

And who voted in those changes?

Men.

And Bulbeck, like a good Feminist should be, is petulantly ungrateful for their role in the matter.

There are more glaring omissions from this version of history. Women, it seems, were oppressed for a long time.

> Women have struggled for greater participation in spheres reserved for men in every nation, dating back at least to 620BCE.

Any idea why 620 BCE was any different to 621BCE? Did women have the vote before then? Let's just blink back the tears of pride and march on, shall we?

Unchallenged Patriarchy, implied by Bulbeck, continued at least until the 1890s when the first wave commenced. It was here that the vote was "won" by women, among a few other triumphs. Seamlessly, she moves on to the second wave in the 1960s. This might give the uninformed the impression that the first wave lasted some sixty years, but those with any idea of history would know about the two world wars. They come up even in the most rudimentary of pamphlet explanations of the twentieth century.

The importance of this is that Feminists were not keen on "equality" when men were dying on the battlefield. No, Patriarchy was just fine for the average Feminist. It was far better to be handing out white feathers in London than going "over the top" at the Somme.

More importantly, it is hard to run a misandric campaign in the face of such monumental sacrifice. I'm not saying that there weren't any Feminists narcissistic enough to run one, but the attempts to describe men, as a class, as the enemy would not have received much traction. Those not killed by the wars returned physically and mentally scarred from the ordeal. Their families would not have stood idly by while the Feminists tried to run them down.

For these reasons, Feminism took a sabbatical. By the 1960s, of course, generations not directly touched by the wars began to have influence in our societies, and so Feminists could begin their campaigns of bigotry again.

The second wave was fragmented into "socialist feminists," "liberal feminists," "women's liberationists and "radical feminists." Bulbeck is not clear on what brings all these disparate groups under the banner of Feminism. The common link, it seems to me, is that they are all different expression of the same basic theme:

> …women's victimisation by male subordination…

The above quote is from the description of the third wave. Indeed, the whining and complaints of oppression blur into a one mind-numbing moan, wave after wave:

> …wives had to be freed from exploitation of their unpaid domestic labour by husbands.
>
> Women could determine their own futures if they were released from "compulsory heterosexuality…"
>
> [T]hose gender relations that make women and femininity inferior, underpaid and exposed to danger from men and masculinity

On and on. The unseen (except by Feminists) hand of Patriarchy guiding men to participate in female subjugation.

She then asks if we are living in a "Post-Feminist era." Clearly, Bulbeck doesn't think so.

> Ongoing inequality, which cannot be denied and despite over a century of women's activism, is explained in two major ways.

The two major ways are contradictory. The first is that the ground work is set and women will become, in practice

"equal" at some point in the future. The other explanation is that "society is now equal" and the inequalities of outcome can be explained by "…women and men are just expressing their natural desires and talents."

Indeed, for Bulbeck, Feminism is needed now more than ever. She begins the whole sorry saga with this current assessment of the status of women:

> Yet there is no society on the planet in which women are equally represented in what that society most values and rewards, whether that's opportunity, money, status or power.

So Post-Feminism Feminism is probably the next wave. As always, progress is being made, but there is still so much more to do.

For those who find themselves wondering what Feminism is doing for men, Bulbeck lays it out for all to see. She takes the argument of "natural desires" and turns it back on Feminism's critics.

> Interestingly this argument is not used to explain male disadvantage. Boys are thought to lose out in schools because of prejudice in the "female-dominated" environment and not because of boys' lack of interest in learning. Men lose out in divorce battles because of discriminatory legislation and judges, not because of men's lack of participation in child-rearing. As a result, feminists are accused of crying "victim" where the men's movement is not.

It may be that Bulbeck doesn't do reason, but her doublethink is sublime. Throughout, she claims that women are victims of men. At the same time, she calls out men for claiming victimhood, because that kind of behaviour is just wrong. Of course, what makes her right, and the whining men wrong, are the facts. But if we dare examine the facts, we are oppressing her emotion by our reason, which only proves that Feminists, if not women, are the real victims.

But this dismissal of men and their issues is not limited to the men's movement. Consider her view that one of the "victories" of the first wave of Feminism was "for mothers' custody rights to their children." Clearly, this is not an "equality" issue. Mothers can only get custody when fathers are denied custody. Its one or the other. If equality were the order of the day, then shared parenting would obviously be the way forward. Of course, this would interfere with women's alimony which in many countries is now called child support.

The interesting thing to note here is that when fathers were generally awarded custody, there was no expectation that the mother should make a financial contribution.

As I said, this is not an equality issue.

But then again, none of it really is. Bulbeck's explanation of Feminism is merely a collection of sound bites and thought bubbles glued together with equal proportions of misandry and female victimhood. Inequality alternates between a rallying cry to the faithful and an expedient argument to justify Feminist bigotry towards men.

Links

http://theconversation.com/explainer-feminism-27981

http://www.nationalarchives.gov.uk/pathways/citizenship/struggle_democracy/getting_vote.htm

http://www.firstworldwar.com/battles/somme.htm

Change “muslims” to “men”

Mark Dent · 24 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

For me the quickest and most effective way to demonstrate the rampant gender bigotry in our society is to do the old “gender flip” and substitute the word “woman” for “man.” Others choose to insert a religious group or race in order to ram home the prejudice that is so prevalent yet astonishingly almost invisible to most people. For some it is an eye opener or equivalent to having a bucket of icy water hurled in their face. Sadly, some will give no ground and remain convinced that men are deserving of any hate/prejudice/ bigotry which is hurled in their direction.

What prompted me to write about this oft used and effective formula?

We are all aware of the horrendous acts of terrorism carried out by radical Islamists. These violent actions seem to be growing in their frequency and there seems no solution or end in sight.

Here in Australia, whenever another terrorist act is carried out in the name of Allah there is an immediate reaction. Surprisingly for some, it is not simply condemnation of the atrocity. There is a demand that no-one should blame the Muslim community for the actions of this minority of fanatics who do not represent the real Islamic faith. I agree with these sentiments although the frenzied efforts by some to leap to the defence of our fellow Muslims often override their empathy for the victims of the crimes.

Aside from the distasteful inference that my fellow Australians are about to become a mob of vengeful vigilantes and require a lecture on how to contain their supposed naturally racist and violent tendencies, it is the way in which the very same people who lead the charge in expressing outrage that anyone could hold a whole community responsible for the actions of a few, happily do just that when it comes to another group in our society.

Imagine, if you will, the political fallout any politician would experience if he or she declared:

All Muslims should step up and take responsibility for violence their fellow Muslims are perpetrating. We ask them to take an oath that they will never commit an act of terrorism in our country and that they will speak out and intervene whenever they see another Muslim acting in an extreme or threatening manner to members of the public. We further ask that those who take this oath shall wear a purple ribbon as a sign of their shared responsibility for these crimes and their willingness to prevent further acts of terror.

The outrage does not bear thinking about. There would be mass protests in the street as people expressed their solidarity with their Muslim brothers and sisters. There would be condemnation of this evil, bigoted notion of collective responsibility.

Hang on, one moment!

Recently our Chief Police Commissioner, Ken Lay resigned for family related reasons His departure was widely mourned and he was praised for being one of our great police chiefs, in particular for his stance on domestic violence.

Ken’s approach to this complex issue was very simple. The problem of domestic violence was a male problem according to him. He went further; Ken believed every male in Australia bore responsibility for creating a culture that condoned and excused male on female violence. He initiated, appeared in and supported many campaigns which rammed this message home repeatedly.

Ken believed it was up to every man to speak out whenever he saw inappropriate behaviour or acts of violence. He encouraged all men to wear a white ribbon and take an oath, swearing not to harm women and to prevent harm to women which may be carried out by another male.

He never once commented on female violence-–particularly toward children.

What has been the response to his relentless drive to protect women and children and from male violence? Ken Lay is almost universally admired, praised and even adored by some.

This very same man would have led the attack on any person who dared to imply that the terrorist problem was a Muslim issue rather than the work of a tiny group of radicals. Yet associating the endless acts of terrorism with the religion of Islam is far more understandable than linking the behaviour of people who happen to share a gender.

When a man commits a crime it is a rare thing to hear him proclaim he committed his violent action in the name of the male gender and all "true" males.

Yet time and again the Islamic extremists wave the ISIS flag, call out the name of Allah even as they butcher their victims, quote the Koran and tell the world they are true Muslims living out their faith as it was meant to be lived.

Surely if you belong to a group which these people claim to represent there is a strong argument to suggest moderate Muslims need to condemn such behaviour (as many do) without accepting responsibility for their crimes.

In a comment piece for the Wall Street Journal, Somali-born Muslim-turned-atheist activist Ayaan Hirsi Ali said more acknowledgement needed to made of the political ideology driving Islamists.

"…An ideology embedded in the foundational texts of Islam," she said.

"We can no longer pretend that it is possible to divorce actions from the ideals that inspire them."

Just as English football clubs took responsibility for the actions of their more violent fans who performed their acts of hooliganism whilst wearing the colours of their team and supporting their team at their football ground, one can see parallels with the Muslim world and their more extreme elements.

But when a crime is committed by someone who just happens to be male, there can be no such expectation for other males to feel responsible or in any way connected to such behaviour other than to feel revulsion for the perpetrators.

I wonder how our female population would feel if a new campaign suggested they carry the responsibility for the recent series of horrific murders of children carried out by women here in Australia. Perhaps we could hold them accountable for helping to create a culture which promotes the idea that babies and children are the property of their mothers and therefore as disposable as the nappies they wear.

Our Prime Minister attended the funeral of the eight children who were butchered by a woman a few weeks ago. She was the mother of seven of these children and the other child was her niece. What did our Prime Minister, Tony Abbot have to say about the massacre of these children after he left the funeral service?

"We know that sometimes people break. We also know there are difficult circumstances people deal with. This is a social issue as well as a law enforcement issue, but I'll be there in solidarity with them."

Can you imagine Tony referring to the savage knifing murders of eight children by their father as A social issue as well as a law enforcement issue?

Can you imagine Tony saying in response to the murder of a woman by her partner:

We know that sometimes people break.

And if he was insane enough to say this after a violent crime committed by a man, can you imagine the lynch mobs that would be waiting for him, with, I suggest, Ken Lay holding the noose?

As if to prove my point, Rupert Murdoch tweeted the following comment on the recent terrorist tragedy in France:

Maybe most Muslims peaceful, but until they recognize and destroy their growing jihadist cancer they must be held responsible.

His comments have been savaged (perhaps rightly so) and headlines tell us there has been a "massive backlash on social media."

Yet we continue to openly praise and reward the many men and women who apply the exact same thinking to "male violence" rather than violence committed by those who happen to be male.

This very day, in the Sunday Herald Sun, Darren Chester, the Federal member for Gippsland and a White Ribbon Day Ambassador wrote:

When it comes to stopping violence and harassment against women, Australian men must understand that now is our time.

Both men (he refers to Ken Lay and an army Chief, David Morrison) understand that violence against women is not a women's issue. It's about men changing their attitudes and behaviour.

Let's try the old flip around and see how it reads.

When it comes to stopping acts of terrorism against innocent citizens, Muslims must understand that now is their time.

Or

Ending violence against children is not a children's issue. It is about women changing their attitudes and behaviours.

Rather disturbing isn't it?

http://www.brisbanetimes.com.au/queensland/cairns-farewells-eight-children-20150110-12lhn0.html http://www.theage.com.au/world/rupert-murdoch-tweet-about-jihadists-causes-anger-on-social-media-20150110-12lp3n.html

http://www.news.com.au/national/grandmother-accused-of-trying-to-kill-step-grandson-11-three-times/story-e6frfkp9-1227170570563

http://www.brisbanetimes.com.au/queensland/cairns-tragedy-woman-charged-with-murder-of-eight-children-20141221-12bn54.html

http://www.abc.net.au/news/2014-11-28/mother-of-baby-left-in-drain-remains-in-jail/5924464

http://www.heraldsun.com.au/news/law-order/killer-mum-in-court-bid-to-access-daughter-she-injured-in-horror-attack/story-fni0fee2-1227083123400

http://www.whiteribbon.org.au/standup

A personal request to support Zen Men

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 24 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I would like to ask that you bear with me while I briefly retell the story of Zen Men.

Just two years ago I wasn't really doing much more than study and work odd jobs. I eventually transferred from Georgia State U to Kennesaw State U (KSU), where I started KSU Men (now Zen Men). That was just a little over a year ago. It was just me and a GOPRO a kind soul from afar lent to me to make sure I had some sort of protection. The fact I needed protection to speak tells us why men's rights activism is necessary.

Enough students signed a petition to support KSU Men, and a student-predominated board unanimously voted to approve it as a student organization on November 6th, 2013. Since then, KSU Men has caught national attention. Media inquiries came in from Mother Jones, PJ TV, GQ Magazine, CL Atlanta and KSU Student Media. Tumblrs tumbled and little birdies tweeted. Students and faculty from Fordham Lincoln Center, George Washington State University, New Mexico Tech, New York University, Queens University and more ended up sending me emails just to ask how they can start their own groups.

We, with the help of NCFM, AVfM, the Honey Badgers, A Voice for Male Students, Jeanne Falla and a community of supporters, held an openly non-feminist conference for issues affecting male students. Leaders in the movement such as Jonathan Taylor, Paul Elam, Karen Straughen and Janice Fiamengo graciously took time to explain why school was becoming a hostile place for boys and men. Feminists attended and were welcome to participate in the dialogue, and I yielded much of my Q&A time to a co-president of YESBody!, who apologized for ideological corruption on camera.

KSU Men became a repeat front-page subject in KSU Student Media, and the articles about us have sparked more conversation on campus than any other article. We have funneled many boxes of food and bags of clothing into the KSU C.A.R.E. center to assist homeless or financially struggling students, both male and female.

And just as a side note, one of my favorite things about this organization is that whenever we set up a table, people surround it and talk for hours.

Zen Men VP Bobby Nibbs (right) and Secretary Stacy Evans (third from right) conversing with prospective members outside the cafeteria

We were so successful, so fast, that feminist professors from the Interdisciplinary Studies Department immediately moved to hurt me. They took away my friends, academic references and told lies in lectures. I could not even meet any of them to ask a single question, because my ability to speak to them has been restricted by attorneys. The professors preaching peace, love and equality stated that I wanted to kill women after citing an early 2013 homemade instructional video where I demonstrated safe, clandestine posting practices on a public university.

Students and faculty started a blog called Menformation specifically to oppose me and Paul Elam. Even when I donated to a campus protest organized by YESBody! to support their free speech in spite of my disagreements, my contribution was called a “bullying tactic,” and I had to ask the same feminists who later apologized to use the money. Members of their organization later lectured me on my “privilege.”

Despite all efforts, the KSU legal division does not even seem willing to acknowledge how I have been targeted, and even today I have no assurances of my Title IX right to a safe environment despite the clear and present risk of vigilante retaliation. I have to record everything I do to make sure I have an alibi in case someone decided to punch herself and say I did it, or in case someone decides to sneak up on me.

A clear warning sign that there are sharks in the water emerged in Brian Clyne, now former president of Atheists United. Brian challenged me to a debate, only to start a personal vendetta when nothing went his way. He tried everything from violating our debate terms, attempting a public character assassination, reporting me to the cops, trying (and thankfully failing) to publish the home addresses of my friends, and then announcing that he is going to try becoming the new president of Zen Men. He is still on campus, and he will do whatever he can to win.

Despite finding new foes, KSU Men gained a full new officer team as it turned one year old.

We slumped in our seats, trying to process the unbelievable fact that this was all just one year.

Just. One. Year.

We are one of the most successful men’s rights ventures on a University campus, ever. There is just no questioning that.

But the straight truth is that we need help to keep this up. It used to be that if there was not enough money to pay for operations, my personal finances would pick up the slack.

I can’t do that anymore. One month without your support, and it would be impossible to keep up with my tuition payments, let alone feed myself.

No one else in Zen Men is willing to take my position due to concerns for their own safety, and I must be at least a part-time student to be eligible for an officer position in my own organization. This means that even if I wanted to take a break, I can’t.

Every promise we were able to make was gleefully kept. I ask for your support today because that’s what keeps this ship afloat.

We have less than ten days left in our fundraiser, and we are only about 20% to our goal at the time of this writing. I understand if times are tough, because I experience that struggle every day even without men’s rights advocacy. I may even have to face that struggle for years after if the claims made by professors on this campus follow me to job interviews.

Our job at Zen Men has been to challenge the corruption that make times tough for your sons. We knew that we would be good at identifying where the problem lies because many of us here are your sons!

We, your sons, are sick and tired of people telling us how to think, how to live, and how to express our very selves as young men who deserve fun, rewarding careers and a love of life. And we, your daughters, are tired of being coddled and emotionally-manipulated into distrusting half of the human race and hating our own lives.

Zen Men marketing director Haley working with Vice President Bobby at a Zen Men display

Life is nothing like what it was two years ago. Every morning I drive to a place where many would laugh and cheer if I was knocked down, beaten, or humiliated. All of those crazy people you all look at on the Internet? Some of them are here, and they have physical access to us. But this is also a place where a growing number of students are starting to notice that Zen Men needs to be here.

All I ask is that you help me not risk going broke taking all of this on with my new friends, who also put their time and effort into keeping this alive.

We are a system that is slowly integrating with campus. We have been meeting with administrators about the development of a men's center. The idea is on its way up the chain of command, which means we have a chance at securing space in a new building to get suicidal or battered men the help they need to heal!

I do not want to have to slash expenses and therefore Zen Men's capacity during this vital time.

We are all in too deep to give up, so I am asking you now, as we reach the final few days of our fundraiser, to please consider sacrificing one morning's coffee to your sons and the daughters who love them and love themselves.

Please click the donate button below to help us retake our lives from the ideologues who won't allow us to be happy.

Goal progress: $7,110 out of $10,000

Donate

NOTICE: Dannyboy has offered to shave down his beard if the fundraiser reaches its goal by the 30th! He is also willing to grow it even longer, depending on popular demand. Video proof will be provided.

SNAIL MAIL: If you wish to submit a contribution by snail mail, use the KSU address below. Be sure to put both my name and the organization name so the school employees know where to file the envelope.

Sage Gerard
Zen Men
Room 274 MD0501
395 Cobb Ave NW,
Kennesaw GA, 30144

“1 in 3 college males would rape” claim is fraudulent scholarship

AVfM Video Source · 24 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists are making hay with a misandrous claim that 1 in 3 men said they’d rape a woman if they knew there’d be no consequences. It’s total crap.

http://youtu.be/X7h9AWfBTL8

You may want to check out and subscribe to Mr. 1001 Nights.

And the children of Crazy?

Tim Merchant · 24 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial note: this is Part 2 of an essay series that started with When fathers love their children more than Crazy. "Crazy" meaning the crazy woman in a man's life.–Ed

Not everyone believes us fathers when we say that our greatest concern during our relationship with Crazy was the welfare of the children, but that's okay because we are all too used by now to outsiders not believing a word we say and, besides, there is probably very little objectively identifiable evidence that we were.

We did everything wrong, didn't we?

Yes, we probably did, but we didn't mean to.

My wife, Kathleen, was brought up by Crazy as her mother and had to watch her dad being beaten up by her emotionally day-in, day-out, sometimes feeling forced to take on her mother on her father's behalf at an age – like five – when everyone should have been taking care of her, not vice-versa. As far as she is concerned, her father was collusive with her mother by hanging around being attacked when he should simply have walked off, as she begged him to.

"Go, Dad, please go."

It wasn't that she didn't love him; she loved him very much. It was that, by standing there taking all the punches, he was putting her in danger. She was terrified and distressed by the constant arguing, and Crazy tried to involve her in her reign of abuse against her father whenever she saw an opportunity. Once Kathleen was so outraged by her mother's machinations that she set fire to her.

What should her father have done, according to Kathleen?

He should have taken hold of Kathleen's hand, whatever time of day or night the dispute was taking place, and told Crazy, "I will not have arguments with you in front of our daughter, ever," and then taken Kathleen to a public place, like a bar, where preferably the revelers would inevitably have asked him what his five year old daughter was doing with him in a bar at eleven o'clock at night. Shouldn't she have been in bed?

… and then her father could have told them, and Kathleen would have confirmed his side of the story.

She bets that her mother would never have attempted to argue with her father in front of her again. Crazies hate having their antisocial behavior made public. And if her mother had tried to beat him up again verbally in front of her, he should have taken Kathleen to the bar again … as many times as it took to make her mother shut up.

The trick would not have been in her father walking out and going to a bar – he did that plenty of times anyway – it would have been in taking Kathleen with him. Who believes a guy in a bar bleating about the abusive behavior of his wife? No one. Who believes a tiny child in a bar late at night confirming that her dad is telling the truth? Everyone. And a few people there, or who subsequently heard about her having been there, might well have been moved to do something about it.

I wish I had thought of that … or I think I wish it. I doubt, in Britain, picking up a small child and taking it to the local pub would work – not enough community, unless we happened to be living in a small village where word would get around in seconds, but we didn't live in a small village. I could have taken the children to my family, but I am not sure that would have had the desired effect, either; your own family would be considered too partisan, and Crazy's family was five thousand miles away. To a friend's house? That might have worked, especially if I had taken the boys to the house of one of Crazy's friends. That could really have hit the mark, and as Paul Elam argues, it is the absolute duty of the sane partner to protect the children because we are effectively their only hope.

Would that have been it? Would Crazy have stopped abusing me?

No, of course not, Crazies have to abuse in the same way as sharks have to swim forward, but it would probably have stopped Crazy abusing me in front of our two boys in the house. In the car, with Crazy driving, that would have been a different matter. My Crazy ex-wife loved to trap me as a passenger in the car she was driving, with the two boys in the back seat. She once started eleven different arguments with me under those circumstances during a fifty-four minute car journey, and several times I got out of the car I was driving and walked home because Crazy, as a passenger, wouldn't stop shouting at me in front of the children.

I have learned over time that one of the big tricks of Crazy, as it was of my ex-wife "Rafaella, is to define "us" as her and the children vs. me as "your father." That maneuver worked even in my absence. So, "What are you doing to us?" means "What are you doing to me?"; "You are not listening to our needs" means "You are not listening to my needs"; "You have no interest in us as a family – I am a single parent" means "You have no interest in my needs – and if you want to point out what you are doing for the children, I am the only parent who matters here."

Early on, Rafaella was very aggressive toward the children too, but that soon stopped when she realized that the children were more use to her as allies than they as targets, in other words that they were more useful in her camp than mine. Thereafter she focused on grooming the boys' affections all the way by giving them everything they could possibly want, even things they never knew they wanted until they were offered them by her. A particularly successful trick of Crazy's was to buy the boys daily presents – quite big ones – in the knowledge that I would soon object to the cost of this exercise, which was anything up to $50 a day, and $1,000+ on special occasions if I didn't take the bait at $50. So she became the parent who really listened to her children and got them what they craved, whereas I was the one who said, "No. We can't afford to buy that." My nickname for the longest time was, "Papa who always says no." The converse trick was that she would demand that I take away something the children wanted, like staying up late, and when I complied just to keep the peace between us, she would turn around and say that of course the children could stay up late tonight, we could all watch a movie together or something.

As anyone knows who has been in this type of abusive relationship, the games, tricks, out-maneuvering and gaslighting are like a fog all around you. You haven't a clue what is coming next, only that something is coming next because there has been peace for a few hours. "It's too quiet around here …" is a thought that informs domestic violence movies too.

One of Rafaella's masterpieces was to summon "the jury of the children," my description of the technique, not hers. She would secretly agree a course of action with the boys behind my back, then she would summon me to hear what "we" have decided. Anywhere sufficed, but she had a particular penchant for persuading the boys to get into the bathtub with her and then summoning me to the bathroom for a "family chat." Why are Crazies especially crazy and aggressive when they are naked? I have heard several abused men mention that. In Rafaella's case she claims that she is a Merangel and that her primary element is water, but they can't all be Merangels.

The other classic ruse is using the children as messengers – "Tell your father …" Strangely, Rafaella didn't use this technique very often. I think it would have been an insult to her sense of creativity. What she did instead was to sit down with them and tell them "Your father…" stories, sometimes for hours on end, or once we had finally divorced and I had moved five thousand miles away, she would get the kids to Skype me, then hijack the conversation I was having with them in order to make her demands – yep, in front of them.

I don't know if there is a single effective answer to managing Crazy. I certainly tried persistently for twenty years to find one, and I never did. Crazies are like the scorpion in the story where a scorpion asks a toad to give him a piggy-back across a river.

"But you'll sting me and kill me," protests the toad.

"That would be stupid," counters the scorpion. "I would drown too."

So the toad complies and starts carrying the scorpion on its back across the river. Halfway across, the scorpion stings him.

With his dying breath the toad asks, “Why did you do that?”

The scorpion shrugs. “It’s in my nature.”

Yep, most of Crazy’s statements don’t make rational sense, nor sometimes even strategic sense, but there is no question that viciousness is definitely in their nature, even to the unnatural extent of messing with their children’s psyches and consequently ruining their lives. In the end, the children are just tools after all. No wonder one of Rafaella’s favorite words was “instrumental.”

Byron Hurt throws black men under bus while feminists drive it

Paul Elam · 25 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Byron Hurt is a black, male feminist. I could suggest that you take some time to try to wrap your mind around that, but I won't. I assume your time is valuable and I don't want you mad at me for making you waste it.

Besides, I already read his explanation for it and it made about as much sense as a Jewish, white nationalist railing about the evils of Zionism.

Hurt explains himself in an article he penned for The Root, titled "Why I am a Black Male Feminist." Ultimately he explained a good bit more than he intended.

The Root, for those who don't know, is what you might call a plantation publication. Similar to Jet and Ebony, it's where black, male writers (known as Panda Bears) get to work as long as they don't get uppity with the black, female feminists who actually run the farm.

A quick review of his work suggests he gets to work in the house, though.

His story is simple. When he was young his father used to yell at his mother. That scared him and clearly made him feel protective of his mom. Then he met Jackson Katz and listened to some women complain that they could not look men in the eye. Next he read enough black feminist theory to get his mind right. Well, at least right enough to turn Tom and sell out every bit of integrity and common sense he ever had.

As a student of human behavior, my interpretation of Hurt's writing is that he had some family dysfunction issues that led him to collude with his mother into making his father the family's identified problem. After all, I am sure she never gave dad a reason to be angry. I am sure she was all peaches and rosewater and he was just, well, patriarchal and domineering. It was all him. Like it is in every troubled relationship where men express anger, right?

I am guessing that all Hurt needed was a theory to confirm that and it launched a career. Too bad that career is based on the beliefs of a bunch of privileged and grotesquely self-indulgent white women. These are women, mind you, who would turn on his career faster than you can say Bill Cosby if given any excuse. And the sisters would be leading the charge.

Hurt appears to be acting this out to a much lesser degree in his family of origin. In his piece for The Root, he is still pointing the finger, albeit more gently, at his dad. He enjoyed getting his father to wear a baseball cap that says, "End Violence Against Women."

Hurt made it a point to write about the black, female feminists who had influenced him. I'm thinking that he bought their wares out of the gullibility that sometimes afflicts those seeking to resolve some childhood issues. It certainly wasn't motivated by a passion for civil rights. Black, female feminists sign on to white feminism for the same reason white girls do; because they can use it to control and shame black men even more effectively than they already did. Obviously, Byron grew up thinking his father was someone who needed to be controlled more than he need to be understood. And the control is apparently continuing. He has his father wearing a silly hat like a dunce cap and smile while doing it.

Is that a little ideological dance of victory Hurt is enjoying? You decide.

I know a thing or two about privilege myself. I know, for instance, that as a white, middle-aged guy with short hair and no visible tats, where it comes to cops I am freaking invisible (unless I cross the wrong woman). I have not been pulled over for anything in as long as I can remember. Merchants don't eyeball me when I shop. I generally get treated with respect and without suspicion wherever I go. Other than a black neighborhood the only place I can go and be a minority is a prison. My experience is not the experience of most black men. That's all on race, though, not gender.

I also know enough to know that a great deal of black, male anger and violence is about powerlessness, not power.

Matter of fact, I will hop out on very sturdy a limb here and state that almost all interpersonal anger in all races is about powerlessness, not power. That is an inescapable fact and a source of potential wisdom that Hurt flushed down the toilet so he could swallow the notion that his father's anger must be about privilege.

When it comes to civil rights, Hurt didn't exactly rise up from the mean streets of Compton. And he isn't from the Medgar Evers generation. He was born in 1969, went to Northeastern University where he studied film and went on to host an Emmy nominated TV show. By the time Byron reached adulthood, he could afford to focus on pleasing feminists and making money.

His job came with a mighty fine jacket.

Some may think I am being too hard on Hurt. Or that I am assuming too much. I don't. Case in point his writing in BK Nation about black men and allegations of rape. He demonstrates knowledge of and even compassion for black, male victims of lynching at the behest of white women. Then he swiftly throws out any notion of due process when black men are accused of rape in modern times.

No, Byron, you don't think "he may, in fact, be a rapist." You think he is innocent until proven guilty, don't you? That is how you prevent lynching, destroyed reputations, upended careers and the undying stigma of being accused. Let the law do its job (such as it does).

This is the problem with Panda Bear propagandists. There is a superficial acknowledgement of historical injustices that they will only give weight to till it might piss off a feminist sister, who they know will put gender before race every time. So they learn put gender before race every time, before they hit that line, because that is what it takes to stay in the house. In the simplest of terms, they learn their place. You have to be running on indoctrination autopilot to not know that is exactly what is happening.

That's how you enjoy the authority to talk solemnly about Scottsboro, Emmett Till, and even decry the racism suffered by Brian Banks (even though that was actually sexism), but also speak, in the very next breath, about how 'this guy might be a rapist,' before a single shred of proof is offered.

Panda Bears have to constantly juggle sex and race, always knowing that sex comes first. Always. Ever forget that and you will be back in the field, after a trip to the whipping post.

Ask Stephen A Smith, who Hurt officiously and condescendingly "corrected" on the pages of Ebony for having the audacity (and the intelligence) to suggest that fewer women would be hurt if they did not provoke violence.

The article is straight down the line in lockstep with the infantilizing, hyper-privileged feminist narrative. There is never, ever, ever, ever, ever, a reason to hit a woman, even when the woman that got hit is also arrested for assault and admits she gave him a reason to hit her back.

There is never reason to hit a woman, not even in self-defense. If you ever say otherwise, you will be punished severely, right out in the open so everyone can learn from your pain.

Meet new massa, same as old massa.

Hurt, the scattering of other Panda Bears and indeed the bulk of "black journalism" culture has become a sellout culture. It is not so strange or unbelievable, though, when you think about it. There are few places where feminists have not used the power of gynocentrism to get their way.

The Great American Civil Rights Movement, which used to be about speaking truth to power for an entire people; even in the face of water cannons; in the face of police dogs and tear gas, has been co-opted. It is now about black men playing ideological step and fetch to a bunch of female, outrage-ready establishment bullies, wearing $800 designer shoes and still claiming to be oppressed. The fight for civil rights is over, and the feminists won rights for black women.

Black men have gone from the back of the bus to being thrown under it.

Gynocentrism, in all its shapes and colors is The Man; the walking boss hidden in a shroud of denial and fear so thick that few will even dare to whisper the truth. Why? Because now the gynocentrists have all the bullwhips.

Tell me I'm lying and I'll tell you who you answer to.

Magaluf Girl: Feminist prudery

Jim Muldoon · 25 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The hypocrisy of the Feminist Sacred Babble was brought to a new level recently in the UK over a scandal that became known as the "Magaluf girl." The hysteria and moral panic raised by this is worth a closer look.

The Spanish resort town of Magaluf, on the island Mallorca, has had a reputation of a party town for decades. Each year, young adults from Britain, Ireland, Scandanavia and other European countries head there for sand, sun, booze and sex. So much so that it has the nickname "Shagaluf."

The result is often not pretty as youth and booze can sometimes lead to teenage brawls. Mostly, however, it leads to vomit and stupidity.

Last year a video of a young woman giving "head" to some two dozen men at a night club in Magaluf went viral. The hypocritical and positively misandric treatment that this has been given by the British press, including the Mirror, Huffington Post and The Independent, among others, has been astounding.

I've included a link to the actual video below. For the hard of thinking, this video is not safe for work. I didn't include video for titillation, but if you read anything from the UK's Mirror, Huffington Post UK, or The Independent, you would think that the woman was held to the ground while a group of men put their penises in her mouth.

That view is manifestly untrue. It is clear from the video is that the woman is moving freely about the bar, she is encouraging the young men to "get it out," and is using her own hands to put the penises in her mouth.

If you didn't want to check out the video, or want further proof, consider the view of Geordie Shore (a UK TV Soap) star Jay Gardner, who was at the event in question:

> The lass seemed to be loving it and so did the boys, that's what it's like in Magaluf, it's wild, anything and everything goes.

But, the "Fleet Street Fox" of the Mirror claims the young woman was "bullied into having sex with a drunken mob," and had then been "called a slut all over the internet."

Yet, a Google search will find a different story. Like the intrepid "Fox," journalists were tripping over themselves, the facts and logic to blame the young men, the night club's management, the tour operator, the Spanish police and the woman's parents. In fact anyone but the woman.

Now of course you were wondering what Louisa Zissman and Jasmine Lennard have to say about it.

No, I've never heard of them either. Apparently they had been on reality TV shows, so of course they are experts on just about anything that will get them a few inches (of a newspaper column).

These two geniuses, however, have found a way to squabble over how to remove all responsibility from the woman and blame the men. Zissman says that the woman should be given some slack.

"Who cares," says the media celebrity. She had made a bad choice. Yes, her body, her choice. But, and you knew there was a "but" coming, she does think the men involved should be named and shamed for their actions. Even more so, she believes they should be mocked for not being hung like horses.

> Although after seeing the size of some of those worms, I did wonder if a few of the receivers were pre-pubescent.

Of course, judging women by their body parts is objectification. Judging men by the size of their penises, on the other hand, is journalism.

Lennard, however, is outraged at Zissman's lack of outrage. Apparently Lennard felt strongly enough to tweet:

> Saying "Who cares" – Umm ANY good parent. EVERY good parent would care. I care and it's not my daughter.

Lennard also makes the political personal for Zissman:

> "It's like ok love how about I buy YOUR daughter a ticket to that event in a few years time?!"

Irrespective of how you cut it, however, both are only concerned for the woman. Apparently, Zissman sees it this way:

> You can look at it two ways; she's young, dumb, drunk and made mistakes, or she's an 18-year-old WOMAN [emphasis hers] who has every right to do what she wants with her body

But the "drunk", of course, brings up the ever present spectre of consent and therefore rape. The "Fleet Street Fox" takes the rape angle a little bit further.

> If she was drunk she was incapable of consent.

But, simultaneously the "Fox" chooses a second avenue of escape from personal culpability for the damsel. Harping back to the bullying angle, she claims that, "surrounded by that mob", the woman became terrified.

> And I'd do whatever it took to get out in one piece, which is precisely why many victims of sexual assault and rape don't start a fight, and why their abusers claim they wanted it.

Drunk? Bullied? Or both?

Sarah somebody, last name not supplied, in Huffington Post UK applies a more scientific approach to the matter.

> I have no idea how much the woman in Magaluf had drunk, I don't know how alcohol effects her as we're all different. However, I do know (because every story is the same) that she was drunk.

Yes, why let a lack of information stop her from forming an opinion. Sarah then goes on, like Zissman, to give us a choice in how we should view the affair:

> Best case scenario: sexual exhibitionist, has an amazing time doing what she loves, which now the whole world is watching and is vilified by the press and public for being drunk, female and enjoying herself, despite feeling herself that she has done nothing wrong – nor should she.
>
> Worst case scenario: victim of a serious sexual assault is dragged through the press and attacked by the public for being the victim of a serious sexual assault which now the whole world is watching.

In all of this the 24 men were roundly condemned by all concerned. Although they were at the same bar, drinking the same alcohol, and being encouraged by the same DJ and others to "get it out," they apparently do not deserve the same empathy.

There was no concern that, by the time she got to penis number five, her mouth was an unhygienic place for a man to put his penis. There was little concern that their penises, as well as some of their faces, were on display as "the world" watched.

Zissman aside, there is also little commentary on the fact that most, if not all, of the penises were flaccid, i.e. not erect. Therefore, the sexual pleasure they got from the experience was minimal.

Extraordinarily, the Huffington Post UK, which gave us Sarah noname's diatribe on "Magaluf Girl: Consent and Sexuality," included a link to this tidbit:

> This woman claims she can give blowjobs that are so good, they're fatal

"This woman" goes by the name of Auntie Angel (so you know she's genuine). She claims that men have literally gone to heaven as a result of women learning her special techniques. Did anyone ask if any of these men consented being killed?

No.

From there, Vice gave me another link to a bunch environmentalists who were making porno films and using the proceeds for the environmental campaigns. Part of their videos saw them going to strangers in the street and asking them to participate.

No cries of outrage there.

And, as I said, all this was linked to by the puritanical Huffington Post.

One of the interesting aspects to the outrage was that there were repeated references as to how it would be different had the Magaluf woman have been a man. Now, I am assuming here that this hypothetical man would have been giving "head" to 24 hypothetical women. In each instance, the speculation was that the hypothetical man would become a hero, a "legend."

But consider the how the press had blamed the men who were drinking at the same venue as the woman. It is my guess that the same bigots would have been calling the hypothetical man a serial rapist before too long.

Another peculiar twist was that the Mirror reported that the Magaluf girl thought that she would get a holiday as a prize for her antics, rather than the bottle of booze that she did win. The allusion being that not only had she been "bullied" and "raped," but also cheated.

Perhaps the outraged puritans could show their sisterly solidarity and pass the hat for the Magaluf girl to get a holiday somewhere else.

Lesbos, perhaps.

Links

Magaluf girl – the viral video

http://www.mirror.co.uk/news/world-news/magaluf-sex-video-slut-shaming-most-3824969

http://www.huffingtonpost.co.uk/2014/07/10/magaluf-girl-mamading-video-new-law-pub-crawls_n_5573479.html http://www.independent.co.uk/news/world/europe/magaluf-girl-video-prompts-fears-over-growth-of-mamading-sex-parties-that-exploit-women-9585042.html

http://www.mirror.co.uk/3am/celebrity-news/luisa-zissman-defends-magaluf-sex-3831459

http://www.mirror.co.uk/3am/celebrity-news/jasmine-lennard-slams-bad-mother-3834647

http://www.mirror.co.uk/news/uk-news/magaluf-girl-video-teen-who-3806938

http://www.huffingtonpost.co.uk/ending-victimisation-and-blame/magaluf-girl_b_5562657.html

THIS WOMAN CLAIMS SHE CAN GIVE BLOWJOBS THAT ARE SO GOOD, THEY'RE FATAL

http://www.vice.com/en_uk/read/these-environmentalists-film-blowjobs-to-save-mother-earth-0000106-v20n10

An open letter to feminists: “What are you doing about it?”

Matt Karlsson · 25 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Hi, feminists.

A lot of things have happened recently. They may all end up a blip. I hope they’re the clatter of stones heralding a landslide, that we will look back and see 2014 as a hinge-year, when things truly turned. The MHRM has claimed a space. 2014 was the year of the first International Conference on Men’s Issues, Gamergate, “Shirtstorm,” widespread refutations of the alleged wage gap, Women Against Feminism, the rise of the Honey Badgers, your cheap hack op-eds and lifestyle pieces getting torn apart in the comments sections, the Male Students in Peril Conference, greater recognition of men’s issues and the general growth of AVfM and what we represent into the culture at large… yeah, we’ve had a good year.

As our message spreads, and its truth and power spark in people’s minds, you feminists will have a lot to deal with. To steal from Winston Churchill—you know, the Dead White Male who as much as almost anyone in history could legitimately claim to have saved Western civilization?—you are seeing the end of our beginning, and perhaps the beginning of your end. Like it or not, our movement is out of its infancy and challenging yours, which, by the way, had such a…dignified and important 2014. (Congratulations, and keep up the good work!)

Quick caveat: I’m not writing an apology for this, nor endlessly clarifying that “not all feminists are like this,” nor that I’m speaking to and about male and female feminists and not women. What I think of women in general is irrelevant. You don’t need to know about my personal life, how often I have sex, whether I have a neck-beard, wear a fedora, how much I weigh or how much I love my mother. I don’t really care if you hate me after reading this because I know who I am, and it’s not dependent on your goodwill. I’ll stroll out on this limb and assume you’re intelligent and open-minded enough to get my point. To hear my truth, using your vernacular.

In other words, I’m treating you like an equal. Sometimes that stings, just like the truth. Get used to it.

In the wake of this year, you now have to acknowledge that men face unique problems, or else you risk looking monstrously out of touch, further damaging your credibility.

You’ve always privately known we’re not born with a silver cock-shaped key that unlocks life’s Easy Mode. You’ve known that we are, in fact, profoundly in crisis in a host of ways that other more talented and knowledgeable writers and scholars have examined. You just have to admit it now.

One more thing: you also know that feminism, far from being the cure, has always been a cause and facilitator of this state of crisis.

Soon you’ll have to admit that, too.

But some things won’t change and that question, often shouted (“What are you doing about it?”), is not going anywhere. You could continue to assert that our issues don’t exist or don’t matter, sneer that they’re our own/the Patriarchy’s fault, or that we’re doing nothing, as you have so often before. The clock’s pretty much ticked its last on that line of BS, though. As more people challenge your narrative with facts, you can’t ignore us with impunity anymore; now that you admit some of our issues may kinda sorta exist, this question will probably seem like a better move to you.

So I predict that from 2015 onward feminists will ask in ever louder voices, “What are you doing about it?”

It’s a question we already hear a lot. It’s also fair, despite its prosecutorial nature. But after years of observing you, feminists, I doubt you actually want an answer.

What you desperately want is a new conversation-killing, thought-terminating gotcha. You don’t want answers, because you fear competition. You don’t want to confront any truth that contradicts yours, or where will your funding go? As a bonus, if we don’t have an undeniable, in-your-face answer, you can complacently dismiss us as whiny, bitter, misogynists whose activism is limited to being Keyboard Kommandos–when you aren't accusing us of history-spanning rape, species-wide battery, and Patriarchal mind-crime, naturally. No, what you're really asking is "What are you gonna do about it?"

Just like bullies do.

Because regardless of past attempts at evading this issue, you really wouldn't care if your precious 'Patriarchy' hurt men, too, would you? From what I see, you want us to just shut up, go away and let you spoon-feed the public whatever new conspiracy theory, bullshit statistic, or thought-policing "social justice" hashtag you come up with. (Speaking of Keyboard Kommandos…)

You want us to know our place, where it's always been: silently doing dirty jobs, making things work, through scorn, abuse, broken hearts and broken backs. To carry on doing our duty catering to your whims. To function and be useful.

To be used.

You ask that question to make us look like idiots, hypocrites, or—horror!—misogynists. So you can, with that one word, thrash our reputations, block attempts to solve our problems, even expel us from society, forever relishing the irony of a society that falls for this tactic. To you, anything that feels pro-male is automatically anti-female, because to you life is a zero-sum game. And never mind that "feminism" doesn't equal "female."

At some level, you recognize that you've won the important stuff, and should just go home. Your time and relevance have passed long since. You've become an institutional cancer. When you're making global headlines and screaming on international news because a man who just accomplished something historic wore a shirt–a fucking shirt–you don't like, you've become just another First World Problems meme.

As you worry about your irrelevance and ever-worsening public image (and being the masters of projection that you are) you'll switch from ignoring and shaming us to a slightly different type of mockery for speaking about men's issues: "What are you doing about it?"

You'll point to the money you raised, to laws you got passed—most from and by men, incidentally—and ask: where's ours? (Though you don't want us to have any.) If men are hurting, why aren't we speaking up? (Though you silence and shame us, call us whiners and losers and say we can't get laid.) If men are battered, where are our shelters? (Though you shut ours down and close your shelters' doors to us.)

…actually, you're all living in one of our shelters; it's that civilization thing I mentioned, and it's a joint creation of the human species. Believe me, if the alternatives obtained, you wouldn't have time for feminism because all of us would be too busy trying not to starve to death, and dying young, ignorant, and in pain.

But I digress. If men are disadvantaged, you'll ask, where are our advocacy groups? (Right here, and you hate us.) If our issues are so valid, you'll ask, why aren't we flooded with help? Like you were? Like you are? Like you always will be, if you have your way?

We answer: exactly. Your questions aren't trump cards, they're symptoms—and the dearth of answers doubly so. That's what we're doing, that's what we're fighting to change. Despite our recent growth, we're still small, with a tiny fraction of the resources and institutional clout you take for granted–again, mostly given by men. (We're such monsters!)

So you'll ask us: "What are you doing about it?"

A piece of common sense/decency for you: if you ask the question, listen to the answer, even if you don't like what you hear. Everyone deserves that basic respect, to have their views assessed on merit, or at least be listened to…as you've been listened to basically every time you've spoken up in the last 150 years.

When women, even a small group, speak up, when they cry out, it's a cultural klaxon. People scurry to raise money and pass laws to soothe those cries.

When men cry out, even a vast mass of us, we're told to pipe down and man up. This same society that rushes to women's aid turns a cold, indifferent gaze on the vast majority of men. We are the vast majority of suicides, the vast majority of the homeless, the imprisoned, the involuntary unemployed, the maimed and damaged veterans. We are the majority of victims of violence, including sexual, of addicts, of the enslaved and trafficked, of the unnecessarily ill and the preventable dead, yet simply because we've got genitals that hang rather than fold, no one comes to our rescue. (Do you have any idea how many thousands of men and boys Boko Haram slaughtered, while letting women and girls go, before they kidnapped "our girls?")

This crisis is everyone's problem, because we also happen to be the vast majority of people doing the jobs that make this civilization work—the engineers, the builders, the scientists, the police, firefighters, soldiers, garbage men, programmers, drivers, pilots, plumbers. And sure, the CEOs and politicians, if that's a cause for pride these days. (Most of the electorate is female.)

Function does matter, of course. We are most of the solution-oriented minds and broad backs that give you the space, time, resources and comfort to afford to…ban "bossy," rail against "like a girl," have kids scream obscenities, or any of the other heroic projects 21st-century mainstream Western feminism has undertaken. Unimportant things like male suicides, veteran's health, prostate cancer and the staggering flight of men from college just gotta shut up and wait until you get around to them.

Your actions have spoken, shrilly and constantly. Our lives are less important than your comfort. Sadly, our culture-at-large generally agree, unless the guy is rich and famous, and even then… Half the human race is in, or headed for, second-class status, and we who battle that are labeled extremists. Do you think these issues cannot ever affect the men you care about? (Assuming there are any.)

We're more than just our function, our job, that single facet of us. What are we, besides your fathers, sons, brothers, friends, husbands, and lovers?

We are human beings, just like you. Yet when we point out our crisis–even our mutual humanity–we're told to check our privilege. Or man up. Or have our masculinity derided. (…feminism is about freedom from sex roles, eh?)

That's the point that makes your question moot. Do you understand that when we ask for help fixing something in our lives, when we personally or collectively need it most, most people don't give a shit? They don't listen to our problems. They sneer at us for asking for help. They deny the facts. They look away. They don't know. They don't want to know. They don't help us. Unlike women. Unlike you.

People can't fix a problem unless they recognize it. You have told us that men have no problems worth mentioning, because we are born privileged. Unlike you.

At heart I believe it is one problem, one syndrome, though I can't tell you what it is, exactly, or what causes it, exactly, because guess what? Not enough funding goes to studies to find out why men commit suicide, drop out of university, fail, burn out or simply give up. Not enough people talk about the problems men face, not even men. Not enough people answer with anything besides "man up" when we do dare to talk about our problems or ask for help.

Here's the irony: not enough people truly do ask themselves, "What am I doing about it?"

We ask. The outstanding voices at AVfM ask constantly. It's something I formally resolve to ask myself more, starting now. So what will I do about this problem? For a start, I'm arguing with you. I'm reaching out to the silent majority, as they start shaking off your opiating falsehoods, your indefensible moral bias, your exclusionary ideology. I'm urging them to learn the facts, and think for themselves. I'm urging them to challenge your assertions and listen to evidence, even—no, especially—if it goes against what they believe, or want to be true.

Or does raising consciousness not count unless you're doing it?

The things I'm not doing are also important. I'm not using violence, nor tolerating it, nor any advocacy of it. By anyone, against anyone. I'm not advocating for women going back to the kitchen, or whatever other reactionary beliefs you insist we hold, nor tolerating genuine misogyny. Unlike you. (Women Against Feminism ring a bell?)

Another thing I'm not doing: trying to shut you up. We all deserve free speech. We all deserve rights, and for those rights to be recognized by others. But I'm also not tolerating your falsehoods and attempts to shut me up. I want equal rights and equal responsibilities. For all of us. Period. Either without the other has terrible consequences.

The irony is that in a way, your insinuation is correct: talk is pretty cheap. Just speaking up is not enough, not anymore. Never has been, really, since we truly want to fix human problems, instead of growing fat off them—unlike you. We want to reduce suicide, homelessness, educational failures. We want to heal the hurt, ease their suffering, and help them to rebuild shattered minds and lives. We want our movement to succeed so well it makes itself obsolete. Unlike you, who insinuate your ideology into as many places as possible to keep it going after it's remotely justifiable. Your ends have become hostage to your means, I'm afraid.

So I've got to do more. I've got to take more steps, speak more words and louder, start giving of my time, money, and talents. And not just me; there are a lot of people who feel the same way, but don't know quite what to do. Perhaps they fear the consequences for coming out as an MHRA.

And yes, it is a kind of coming out. Thanks to you, being an MHRA or MGTOW is, as homosexuality was until a few decades ago, considered a weakness, a sickness, a social evil, a degeneracy. (Or are we suddenly not the fedora-wearing, basement-dwelling, micro-peened, neck-bearded losers you like to call us?)

Which, by the way, is another thing we aim to change. So should you; if there was a Patriarchy, if feminism really was its dictionary definition, we would have at least some goals in common. Being an MHRA should be uncontroversial.

Even though that's not the case, even though we clearly disagree, are you really that against people having social space in which to gather, the freedom to say whatever's on their minds? To believe they are equal human beings, entitled to all the rights and liberties you have? To call for equality, as you claim to do?

Do you really not see the hypocrisy in condemning us? Because, you see, most people actually agree with most of what we believe in. They believe in the dictionary definition of feminism you cite over and over: equality. (Too bad your actions have poisoned the Feminist brand beyond hope of recovery.) Most people believe in equality under the law, and the equal application thereof. They believe, fundamentally, in fairness. They've just been conditioned by your social manipulation to think that MHRA's are all angry, divorced, straight, middle-aged, Right-wing white males, bitter about losing some mythical power that 99.9% of us never actually had.

Even if that was who we are, would it matter as long as we spoke truth? Should it?

The truth is that we are diverse, and we don't really care about the gender or race or sexuality of those who speak the truth. Politics and religion also take a backseat to the facts with us. Unlike you.

The truth is that we, unlike you, care about facts and try to speak the truth.

Above all, unlike you, when this fight is done, we will simply get back to being what we are: human beings, living our lives, free to make our own choices and be who we are in peace. Distant though that day may be, I believe it will come. At least, it will come close enough that we may pare back our efforts, remaining only as watchful as needed, and not forever re-fighting battles won long ago, or creating new enemies to justify the expansion of our empire.

Interdisciplinary Shaming Dept. Part III – Tom Pynn

Paul Elam · 26 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

This article is one part of a series exposing corrupt, fear-mongering academics who used police officers and lawyers to silence a single student while they move to crush his free speech and Title IX rights. Read Part II here and Part IV here.

Tom Pynn

Tom Pynn's background is so saccharine that you can't help but suspect he's up to something (emphasis mine):

> Tom is Senior Lecturer in Philosophy and Interdisciplinary Studies at KSU. He holds an M.A. in Literature and an M.A. in Philosophy both granted by the University of Mississippi in 1992. His thesis in Literature is about the themes of Love, Marriage and Place in the poetry and non-fiction essays of Wendell Berry. His thesis in Philosophy is entitled, "Merleau-Ponty's Theory of Perception." His interests in Literature include post WWII American poetry, especially the writings of the Beats; the novels of Henry Miller; and ancient Chinese and Japanese poetry. In philosophy his interests include phenomenology and existentialism, aesthetics, Classical Indian philosophy (Yoga and Vedanta), Daoism, Buddhism, cross-cultural philosophy, and indigenous philosophy (especially North America). Recent publications include both essays and book review essays on such topics as Jack Kerouac's Buddhism, yoga philosophy, Zen ethics in leadership, the ethical implications of karma, and Bob Kaufman's aesthetics. He is currently an associate editor of the Southeastern Review of Asian Studies. Tom has been active in various forms of peace work for more than twenty years. Some of his activities include, founder of the Athens, Ga. chapter of Pax Christi, activist for Greenpeace, U.S.A., activist on the Nuclear-Free Athens Campaign, Board Member of Alternative in Action!, and Green Party organizer and activist. He is currently the faculty advisor to the KSU Peace and Justice Coalition. Tom's creative interests include composing poetry, playing music, hiking, and gardening. In his spare time he collapses.

In summary, Tom Pynn has dedicated his life to becoming a middle-aged Californian. He is the kind of man that would put mint in his water and smile warmly at the dolphins leaping in front of the sunset at his beach house. The kind of man that would gnaw thoughtfully on turkey-flavored tofu as he cultured himself with Haitian prose in a candlelit bath.

This is a man so domesticated that feminists actually feel comfortable around him.

I suppose he would be admirable if he didn't come off as the *Pynn*acle of pretentiousness. (Stop groaning, that pun was gold.)

Surely someone with such a polished image could do nothing wrong. Except he did. He told a lie that ended Sage Gerard's friendship with Dr. Liza Davis, Zen Men's first advisor and what was then Sage's strongest connection to the Kennesaw State University (KSU) honors curriculum.

Here's the only email Sage ever sent to Mr. Pynn-a colada.

Clear proof that Sage is about to murderize the wimminz
….Annnnd here's the police report.

What the hell is wrong with you people?

Quote the investigator:

> On Wednesday September 03, 2014, at approximately 1624 hours, I was dispatched to the Social Science Building, room 2005, in reference to harassing communication.

So the investigator was dispatched at 4:24 PM. When did Sage send the email?

14 minutes earlier.

The instant Tom saw Sage's email, he spat out his white peach tea and knocked over his cage of doves to call the cops. Pynn, trying to sound coherent while sobbing snot-bubbles, shrieked that a big Nazi-skinhead-Klansman-homophobe ginger meanie harassed him with one email.

And what did the officer have to say about the "possible threatening email?"

> I observed no threatening messages.
>
> –Cpt. Obvious

Tom Pynn cannot possibly be an activist. He manages to be both too soft and too high-strung to function under pressure. Pynn is just another demagogue that leverages his personal brand to make people look bad next to him.

So why did Sage send that email? It was not threatening at all, but it did seem like Sage had something he really wanted to talk about.

Here's a chance for us to dig more into the back story of the year-long smear campaign by the Kennesaw State University Interdisciplinary Studies Department (ISD).

Remember that Sage did not always know that people in the ISD were working behind the scenes trying to sabotage what was then named KSU Men ("Kennesaw State University Men"), now renamed Zen Men. In KSUM's early days, Sage was working alone and had a single adviser, Dr. Liza Davis. Dr. Davis and Sage were on great terms. Outside of KSUM, Dr. Davis acted as Sage's primary contact for the KSU honors curriculum. This means that Sage is going through the honors college on KSU, and he periodically sits down with Dr. Davis to go over what is expected of him to get honors credit. Sage, out of respect, asked Dr. Davis to be KSUM's first faculty sponsor.

Some time later, Sage got this email from Dr. Davis.

A Question About the Men's Club

Inbox x

Liza Davis <[redacted]> 3/11/14

to me

Sage, is the Men's Club you've started at KSU a chapter of a national organization with that name? I just learned that there is a "Voice for Men" national organization listed as a hate group by the Southern Poverty Law Center, but I can't imagine that there is any relationship with our "Men's Club," primarily because I can't imagine you're having any association with such a group. Just confirm that for me, if you would. If there is a connection, I will have to step down as sponsor.

Thanks so much, Sage!

Liza D.

Dr. Liza Davis
Director of the Honors Program
Professor of English

Sage provided Dr. Davis all of the information she needed. No, KSUM is not a chapter of AVfM. And the SPLC never actually listed us as a hate group, as has been endlessly explained numerous times by numerous sources, including the SPLC itself as well as its hired gun Arthur Goldwag.

She left anyway, claiming that Sage was lying to her, and insinuating that it was Sage's fault that she didn't know anything about KSU Men (including it's name, apparently).

Student organizations need advisors to reserve space, rent equipment and basically do anything on campus. Student organizations without advisors are eventually rendered defunct, which appears to be exactly why ISD made a dedicated, organized effort to remove KSUM's advisors. Dr. Davis did exactly what ISD wanted and jumped ship with nothing but conjecture backing her. This threatened the continuation of the Male Students in Peril conference as well.

If you have not yet realized why ISD is politically-motivated, it should become clearer now.

Male Students in Peril almost didn't happen because of Tom Pynn's email, which spread the stink smeared by Arthur Goldwag's old, and now retracted, insinuation that AVfM is a hate group. Arthur, when you realize your ill-informed generalizations from years ago have caused an innocent student much undue hardship, remember that a healthy human being would express remorse.

Anyway, someone Sage trusted as a friend and as a fellow scholar thought Sage was associated with the likes of the Klan and the Westboro Baptist Church, which the SPLC actually lists as hate groups, unlike anyone affiliated with this site or with Zen Men (formerly KSU Men).

A lot of stuff happened in the meantime that we will cover in future articles, so we are going to fast forward a bit. Actual-journalist-with-a-brain Sierra Hubbard posted a news piece in The Sentinel, and Sage went to Dr. Davis to let her know that her SPLC concerns should be put to rest. Dr. Davis stated that she had "reliable sources" for her concerns about AVfM. Sage asked what they were, and Dr. Davis refused to tell him. Concerned that the one advisor KSU Men had left would be hearing from a liar soon, Sage followed up with Dr. Davis.

Note for clarification that Sage never made a focused effort to publicize Dr. Davis' involvement when trying to rectify the situation. At the time that e-mail was sent, Sage was unsure what other options he had, but then learned about some new internal procedures and tried those instead.

Dr. Davis said to Sage, among other bullshit, that "some may perceive the tone and closing line of your email as threatening" and CC'd Dean of Students Dr. Sansivero. Dr. Sansivero told Sage to take care when using the word "defamation" (oh, the irony) and talk to him instead. He didn't realize it at the time, but Dr. Sansivero would end up playing the facilitator role in many events connected with Sage.

Sage finally filed an open records request for emails in which he was discussed around Dr. Davis.

What were Dr. Davis' "reliable sources?"

Surprise surprise: it was Tom Pynn.

From: "Thomas Pynn" <[redacted]kennesaw.edu>
To: "Liza Davis" <[redacted]@kennesaw.edu>
Sent: Tuesday, March 11, 2014 1:55:09 PM
Subject: rso?

Hi Liza,

I hear that you are the faculty adviser for the Voice for Men club.

Hmmmm

Do you know that the Southern Poverty Law Center lists them as a hate group?

tom

Chronologically, this email is the earliest incident of ISD involvement in our records.

Sage later scheduled an appointment with Dr. Davis to discuss his honors assignments, since she had the most experience with his academic records. They were not going to talk about KSU Men at all. Right before going to that appointment, Sage was informed that his appointment was moved to a different person in a different building.

Dr. Davis will no longer speak with Sage.

This is so, so wrong.

Tom Pynn, are you starting to understand how badly you screwed up? Did you stop to ask yourself why a supposed hater of women would ask a woman to sit in a vital position for KSU Men?

But you can't take all the credit, Tom. After all, Dr. Davis encouraged you to bring your lies to the attention of other ISD faculty members. You gained an ally on a lie, and you two set something horrible in motion that I will cover in more detail in future articles. But at minimum, you severed a connection for an honors student, which means you encroached on a student's academic career. You smeared a student you never even met, then sat by sipping tea when Sage experienced greater harassment and threats to his academic and future professional career. Because you didn't like his political point of view.

My ultimatum to you is the same as the one to Stacy Keltner: If you choose to stand by your dishonest image, I will dig through all of your connections, your history and your publications, then email your colleagues and superiors all of the reasons they should consider working with other people. I'm sure the network of anti-feminist YouTubers and bloggers looking for content would also have a field day if I pointed them to ISD's publications. Those who think I am just "harassing women" with this article series are too stupid to realize that there is such a thing as corrupt public servants and that they can be any gender.

Tom, if you and your buddies own up to your crap like grown-ups and make amends with Sage, then I will back off. I will even edit my articles to leave notes showing which of you decided to take responsibility for your mistakes.

Staying silent is not going to save you. No more playing politics and operating behind the scenes. If you are an agent of peace, love, understanding, diversity and inclusion then prove it and do the right thing.

Was my relationship with Crazy just a very, very bad relationship?

Tim Merchant · 26 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial note: this is Part 3 of an essay series that started with "When fathers love their children more than Crazy" and "And the children of Crazy? "Crazy" meaning the crazy woman in a man's life.–DE

Like you, no doubt, I have had many relationships in my life of different kinds – within the family, with friends, with lovers, with acquaintances and with work colleagues, including those I reported to and those who reported to me. And, yes, there has also been contact with authorities and shopkeepers and servers in restaurants, but at first sight those types of contact aren't really relevant to this particular argument, except for me to observe in passing that my Crazy ex-wife was as likely to attack them as anyone else. She once got thrown bodily out of the French Embassy in London for raging at an official there, and was nearly arrested at an airport for confronting the security officials who wanted to scan her bag that had homeopathy in it; and shopkeepers, restaurant servers and suppliers were far from a no-go zone for her fury. You'll get my second sight on this, or rather my wife Kathleen's second sight on this, later.

Many of those longer-term relationships I have had have been neutral. I haven't been much interested in their lives and opinions, and they haven't been much interested in mine. If there has been any disagreement, it has been of short duration, followed by our ignoring and avoiding each other as much as possible thereafter.

In the case of the people I have wanted a closer, more intimate relationship with, there have been many near-misses. Psychologically, chemically, ideologically, or whatever, we have been slightly out of calibration with each other. There has been a lot going for us but something has been misaligned between us, leading to a certain amount of mutual goodwill mixed with another portion of mutual wariness. These relationships have appeared to have promise but have also been deeply frustrating, maybe for both of us. There have been arguments, even heated and passionate arguments, but we have usually both been keen to diffuse the bad feeling and seek a more tranquil stability, usually at increasingly arms length. I have never done it, but I can imagine that when marginally mismatched couples divorce, there is a reasonable amount of anger and resentment that has to be worked through, the emphasis here being on the fact that these emotions are reasonable. The ex-couple may end up not talking to each other at all, but they end up not talking to each other amicably, if you see what I mean, as my wife Kathleen once commented about the break up of her first marriage. There were no long-lasting vendettas, just the realization that there was nothing left to say to each other, so it was much wiser not to try.

I have also had several near-perfect relationships in my life: with my mother, with all my siblings, with several friends, and now with my wife, Kathleen. When I returned home from my private boarding school during vacations, there was always a level of testiness between my mother and me for a few days while we checked each other out again, then we returned to our highly companionable norm for the rest of the vacation, with no arguments, no fuss and no need to try to please each other. Our mutual presence pleased both of us without the slightest effort having to be made on either side. With one of my sisters I cannot remember having had a single argument in sixty years and it has been far from a shallow relationship. With the other sister I remember one argument in sixty years when I got enraged by the position she was taking on prison policy – but that's it, one argument that was never mentioned again, and she has probably forgotten it. With my brother I once deliberately antagonized him until he chased me around the yard, whereupon my parents sent me to bed for misbehavior, and quite right too.

Since marrying my wife Kathleen we have inadvertently upset each other perhaps six times in three years, a situation we have both immediately sought to remedy, and neither of us has ever deliberately started an argument with the other. We had a massive fall-out before we were married – one provoked, and indeed engineered, by Crazy – during which I behaved exceptionally badly, but once the issue was resolved between us, it was resolved, and we started planning to get married. Some of the best marriages I have ever seen have witnessed a major breakup immediately prior to the couple deciding to get married and live happily ever after, don't ask me why.

Received wisdom is that all relationships require a great deal of tolerance and effort on both sides. That has not been my experience. Near-perfect relationships are incredibly easy. You both want each other to be an intimate part of your lives, so you will be, God willing.

My relationship with Crazy, my ex-wife "Rafaella," was nothing like any of the above situations. After a period of seemingly total mutual compatibility, she switched onto a war footing and never left it for more than a few hours at a time. She didn't want a peaceful relationship, she wanted war. She even said that a relationship without blood on the ground wasn't a real relationship at all, it was a sham, a front to convince other people that everything was okay. Whereas in every other relationship I have ever had, good, bad or indifferent, there has been a matching strong desire to bring any conflicts to an end sooner or later, Rafaella never had the slightest desire to either avoid confrontation or to reduce it. Some points of contention between us lasted nearly twenty years and were as heated immediately prior to our final separation, and even beyond it, as when they first started.

I often commented that we had probably had a million arguments between us, of which I had possibly started five, which might be an exaggeration depending on whether the question, "Can we afford to buy that?" can fairly be viewed as deliberately starting an argument. When I said this, Rafaella would inevitably counter that while I had only started five of the arguments, my misbehavior had provoked the other 999,995. She even once phoned the police to complain that I was forcing her to hit me because of my provocative ways, like not putting the children to bed on time or failing to anticipate her needs – what, all of them?

So, from my experience, a relationship with Crazy is not remotely the same thing as a bad relationship, even a very, very bad relationship. It is not a matter of quantity, it is a matter of quality. Crazy is … well, crazy. She (although it could equally be a 'he') is not seeking peace, she is seeking war. Appeasement and reconciliation are the last things she wants; she wants total capitulation. Rafaella hates the word 'compromise' and it infuriated her if she thought I was conceding to her demands by way of appeasement or compromise. She didn't want compromise, she wanted wholehearted agreement that she was right.

The psychological community uses many terms to try to define and explain the source of Crazy's behavior – psychopathic, sociopathic, BPD/NPD, hysterical, high conflict etc. I prefer 'inhuman.' Crazies simply do not have the usual attachments, emotions or mechanisms designed to achieve social harmony that exist in ordinary human beings. Nor am I using 'inhuman' as a synonym for 'cruel': human beings can certainly be cruel and careless of acts of cruelty, but these are usually targeted at members of other species – killing and eating other animals, for example.

Whatever the genetic makeup, Crazies are actually a member of another species entirely, possibly humanoid, but definitely not human, and they probably have more in common with sharks and other such apex predators who don't have any feelings for human beings at all, they just want to eat us (and sometimes each other). They don't hate us, whatever the frenzied churning; we are just food.

So my guess is that if you are asking yourself what you have contributed to this very, very bad relationship with a Crazy, as I have done too many times to count, the answer is that you don't have a very, very bad relationship at all in the normal sense, you have a relationship with a Crazy, and the big mistake we have all made is to remain in Crazy's immediate environment more than a few seconds. If she can't sniff your blood – which is much more easily said than achieved – she will eventually swim off on the trail of somebody else's. She will always resent not having been able to continue to devour the excellent meal that your fleshy presence provided her with, but she still has to eat, so she will need to find another victim. As far as I can tell, Rafaella's third husband is such a victim, as was I, as was her first husband. Her modus operandi has never changed, although she may tire over time, not that there is the slightest evidence of Rafaella doing so yet.

And what is the lesson of the restaurant server, chamber maid or shopkeeper I promised you at the beginning of this article? My wife, Kathleen, whose mother is a Crazy and who worked for over twenty years in CPS with abusive families, counsels that should you ever see someone you want a relationship with being abusive to a restaurant server, a chamber maid or someone in that position, run. You will now know all you will ever need to know about them at that moment. Decent, sane people don't kick passing strangers, ever.

A book proposal: “I’ve got your Bax”

August Løvenskiolds · 26 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The historians and authors of AVFM, as well as the editors, have long noted the relevance of the writings of anti-feminist and socialist Ernest Bedford Bax (1854 – 1926) to modern men’s rights concerns. We’ve reprinted his writings here, here, here, here, here, and so on.

For modern readers, though, Bax’s prose can be challenging: his once lively writing has become staid and somewhat inaccessible with the passage of time. Additionally, the “wall of text” paragraphs of Bax are ill-suited to the culture of interruption we live in today.

Making the deep insights of Bax clear to the average modern reader can be a struggle.

The idea, reviewed and approved by AVFM Senior Editor Peter Wright, is to update/translate Bax’s writing into the modern vernacular. I believe this is the logical next step of Peter’s painstaking work bringing Bax’s oeuvre into the modern digital world.

All the primary ideas in my translation are inspired by Bax, except where noted. I’ll link to other sources as necessary or explicative.

AVFM wants you to be a part of this idea: Love it? Hate It? Don’t give a shit? Let us know in the comments.

I’ll show you my modern interpretation of a passage from Bax first, and then I’ll reprint the source material below that.

This is a “proof of concept” trial. The concept under trial is this: to translate the convoluted and antiquated prose of anti-feminist socialist Ernest Bedford Bax into the modern vernacular so that it is more accessible to modern audiences.

Are we on the right track, or not? Please let us know, and we thank you for your feedback.

Here is my idea for the updated passage:

---

10. Feminists: the royal gender

So, it all comes down to this: even the most tone-deaf feminists have to be quaking in their Louboutins over the facts I’ve presented so far – so much so that I expect a false rape accusation from some disgruntled women’s studies ingenue will occur at any time. The general apathy to a critical examination of the claims of feminism is re-enforced by false accusations on the few who manage to overcome that apathy. False accusations are a near certainty once a critical examination of feminism begins.

Rape hoaxes are well-known and were an “old school” feminist tactic at the time To Kill a Mockingbird was written fifty plus years ago. I expect one to drop on me like Dorothy’s tornado-blown house in The Wizard of Oz but unlike a privileged Wicked Witch I’ve taken precautions against such petards.

The fact remains: modern feminism has gained all the rights of men, and then some, while rejecting to take on the obligations of men to preserve society and protect women and children. When women have all the rights and men, all the obligations, this system of society has a simple name. Slavery.

A person with no rights and lots of obligations is identical to the most downtrodden of slaves. A person with all the rights and no obligations is the most extreme of tyrants.

Feminists insist that women are the historical downtrodden and remain so to this day but what honest evaluation of modern politics, education, lifespan, sexuality, or shoe wardrobe can sustain this already faulty narrative? And by "faulty narrative", I mean, "outright lie".

What wartime strife did women suffer that could exceed the harsh slaughter of those men who loved them enough to put their lives on the front lines for women's comfort throughout history?

In brutal times, when vigorous population growth was essential to human survival and prosperity, OF COURSE men protected women. The natural muscular prowess of men was as essential to humanity in times of hand-to-hand combat, just as was the reproductive monopoly of women to replacing fallen warriors and warrior-breeders.

That this natural biological and brilliant partnership of women and men is now dismissed as "patriarchy" by feminists demonstrates both feminism's lack of serious scholarship and their malformed intent.

Feminism barely gives lip-service to the ongoing protection of women's "privilege" as child-bearers but then demands a heightened privilege to childless women competing in business and other spheres alongside and against men who already are naturally inclined to favor women's desires as the single defining characteristic in most men's lives.

This usurpation of so-called male privilege by feminists is unjustified. It undermines feminism's claim of being a movement for gender equality.

Men are happy to compete with, or cooperate with, feminist woman on an equal footing. Equal.

When men are destroyed by feminists merely because they are men, it is time for both men and women to reconsider what it means to be an equal member of a just society: equal rights AND equal obligations.

In response to the usurpation of male rights and denial of male obligations, the foundation of a just society is what we will cover next.

Here is the original passage from Bax:

10. A Sex Noblesse

From all we have said, it will now be evident, one would think, to the most prejudiced reader that modern English Law, following obsequiously a deluded or apathetic stage of public opinion, has solved the problem of the division of rights and duties between the sexes, by conceding to woman all rights, and imposing on man all duties. It would not be difficult to show, were it worth while, that even the disabilities of women in past times have been grossly exaggerated by apostles of the feminist cultus who have, of course, taken a brief to prove the wickedness of "horrid man" to the poor downtrodden female. Such disabilities as really obtained were for the most part the necessary outcome of women's position as non-combatants in a rude fighting age, and certainly did not originate, as is generally represented, in any deep-laid scheme of male devising. In return for a certain formal subjection, in some respects, they obtained not only the blessing of protection, then an important matter, but valuable privileges in other directions. An impartial student of history must admit that, however badly men have treated their fellow-men, they have always treated women with comparative generosity. The change from feudal to modern capitalist conditions, as regards the position of women, is characterised, however, not only by, at one and the same time, the abolition of every vestige of subordination or disability, but, in addition to that, by the extension of the old compensating privileges, which were the counterpart of the former, and by the further heaping up on the top of these of new privileges, the result having finally saddled us with the institution of that sex-noblesse the leading features of which we have sketched out in the foregoing pages.

Well, that is it for the proposal. Should we continue to update and explicate the works of Bax, or move on?

We thank you for your feedback.

Terrence Popp on what motivates MRAs

AVfM Video Source · 26 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

It appears that Popp has hurt some people's fee-fees with basic arithmetic. So he cruelly goes on to do some more:

Although these aren't the only issues faced by men, they're a big chunk of the discrimination faced by millions.

Popp is crass, vulgar, rude, and he's right way more often than he's wrong. You should subscribe.

Unfunny comedy at the expense of the innocent

Jim Muldoon · 27 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

We noticed Mother Jones recently and rather cluelessly brought up a mass-murdering nutjob who was never an MRA, never talked like an MRA, was peripherally involved in (and then left) the PUA community, and was a fan of The Young Turks. This essay by Jim Muldoon helps explain to the perpetually clueless why such comparisons aren't just unfunny, they're mendacious, malicious, and stupid.–DE

Chris Gethard last year gave a video rant to what he called "women haters." He was referring to the men's movement, which he decided to address after the killings by Elliot Rodger. He seems to believe young men's complaints solely centre around not getting laid and women being allowed into night clubs while they wait outside. He calls it "the movement for villainising women" and we can only hope, for his sake, that he updates his research skills before he writes anything of importance.

His advice for young men is to "chill out" and not get "guns and methamphetamines" from the internet. Those who follow this sage advice might not get utopia, but they are promised by Gethard to be just "fine." Presumably he will give some kind of refund if this doesn't work out.

He then amuses himself by declaring that there should be a law which stops men who post on "one of those message boards" from ever finding love. He actually doubles over whilst laughing. Generally, comedians don't laugh at their own jokes. Maybe Gethard hadn't heard that one before.

But, let's look a little closer at what Gethard is saying. There are two options. The first is that the young men who write on "those message boards" are just like Elliot Rodger. These young men, then, are disturbed and irrational, if not insane. They are certainly dangerous. How does mocking them and calling for them to be banned from ever having sex help?

I'm not saying that Gethard has a responsibility to help. You can't make someone responsible for something they can't do. But he is deliberately and directly speaking to these men, and he is choosing to mock them.

Gethard, then, has a responsibility to stop helping.

The other option, of course, is that Rodger, being mentally ill, is not representative of the young men who write on "those message boards." In which case, how does associating them with Rodger, and then calling them names for not having girlfriends, turn into entertainment or a serious message?

Either way, there is nothing funny about it. It seems to me that Gethard is manufacturing easy targets and then giving them all the sarcasm he can muster. Presumably this same clown would tell us that he doesn't believe in doing Irish jokes, or Jewish jokes, because they are using stereotypes to put people down.

In a similar vein, Brydie Lee-Kennedy, as part of SBS's Comedy section, invited readers to "Let's all have a laugh at the men's rights movement." This "comedy" involves Lee-Kennedy claiming to have found a bunch of Gethard's losers at various forums. She takes snippets of fairly inane conversations and makes sarcastic comments about the men who participated in them.

Again, MRAs are just date-less losers who have nothing better to do than sulk about it. It is worth considering her view of MRA's in some detail as the first site she chooses to visit in her "research" is A Voice for Men.

Imagine someone with this view of MRA's coming to the home page of A Voice for Men. The first thing to note would be that there are articles written by a number of authors. Some of these authors should immediately jump out as not fitting the stereotype. There are women, gay men and black men. Even among the white, middle aged, straight guys there are some who are married.

That surely has to rate a WTF moment or two.

Also, the articles are considered opinion pieces and serious analyses of current events. Here is where you might find something of the philosophies that guide the movement. It's possible that Lee-Kennedy might not agree with some of the issues raised. But, if so, why not take some of the articles to task?

Instead, she heads for the forums where people just bang away at the keyboard, sometimes after a few beers (or sometimes more) and have a conversation. Taking snippets out of these conversations removes all context, and it is unfair to these individuals, as well as the movement, to then hold them up for scrutiny and derision.

So, instead of taking the MRM to task on their claims of male disposability, for example, she wants to make sarcastic comments because some guy says, as part of a conversation:

> "Gimme a hard-working, mature, sensible woman who is just regular woman any day (with freckles preferably)"

Whether or not you believe he is on the right track (seems alright to me), clearly it is his choice to make. The reference to freckles is somewhat odd, but it might make more sense if we were part of the whole conversation. But, even if he does have a particular penchant for freckles, so what?

> "I have freckles! New boyfriend alert! HE WILL CONSIDER SUCH!"

This is Lee-Kennedy's feigned response to the discussion. It is clear from her tone in the rest of the article that she would not consider him as a potential date. In fact, from the rest of the article, it is clear that Lee-Kennedy assumes these men have never had a date, and, like Gethard, women should avoid them at all costs.

Her evidence for their loser status? Only the circular logic that they are writing on the site for losers, so they must be losers, and we know it is a site for losers, because losers write there.

The vacuousness of her piece is astounding. She deliberately sets up the guys at the various sites to seem like idiots, then pilliories them for being idiots.

So why does any of this pass for comedy?

It doesn't. It's actually just a bunch of rallying cries for the faithful. Feminists are to listen to their ideology being reaffirmed and be comforted. The infidels and heathen are to be scorned, for they will never have equality in this life or the next.

But why would comedians choose to be politically correct spokespersons for the cause rather than be funny?

Consider Lee-Kennedy's employer, the Australian government's SBS. Here the left-leaning Feminist agenda is the religion of choice. Had Lee-Kennedy's article been a serious attempt at looking at the MRA's it never would have been published. Even if it was riotously funny.

But, even those not directly employed by the government have the same approach. Why?

For almost everything in the arts world, other than the top-tier performers, the work is subsidised in one way or another. Often, these come in the form of grants or cheap venues (or both) from the government. In other cases, the funding comes from charities. Therefore, satisfying the bureaucrats or the charity organisers can be more important than satisfying the general public. Again, in most cases Feminism will be the defacto religion.

Even those not explicitly for Feminism are afraid to cross it lest they get bad publicity. This is why we have such few good comedians. They actually don't have to be funny to get a job. In fact, concentrating on humour rather than politically correct commentary could cost someone a career.

Links

http://www.sbs.com.au/comedy/article/2014/05/28/lets-all-have-laugh-mens-rights-movement

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=6hS6a-e437g

New rape hate-propaganda film “The Hunting Ground”

Pierce Harlan · 27 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Explosive new campus rape propaganda film could do more harm to college men than even the Rolling Stone article

There’s a new propaganda film about the imaginary campus rape epidemic called “The Hunting Ground.” It’s apparently a one-sided tearjerker masquerading as a documentary, and it was “warmly received by its activist audience” at its Sundance premiere, according to one writer. It bills itself as a “piercing, monumental exposé of rape culture on campuses,” even though the preeminent anti-rape group in America has told activists to ditch the phony “rape culture” meme. The New York Times practically ejaculated in writing its “review” of this film.

Institutions of higher learning, fraternities, college sports teams, the justice system — they’re all skewered because they’re all in on it, protecting rapists and everything, don’t you know? With conspiracy theories like that, forget Sundance, this thing should have premiered on the grassy knoll at Dealey Plaza.

Oh, one little thing: the film apparently doesn’t bother to tell the accused’s side of the story for the incidents it chronicles. It “relies on emotional first-person testimony from dozens of women,” and Variety writes: “The absence of testimony from the accused is an understandable omission (though as the Rolling Stone article’s rollback indicates, that can be a problem).”

An “understandable omission?” Oh, sorry, I thought this was supposed to be a documentary, the same way I thought the Rolling Stone article was supposed to be a news story.

Just one little thought: since the incidents the film chronicles are almost entirely “he said-she said” encounters, wouldn’t it have been a good idea to, you know, get the “he said” side of the story? Just a thought.

But, hey, why let the facts get in the way of good old fashioned campus rape hysteria? The facts would have only disrupted the narrative.

Did the film devote time to the lawsuits filed by young men who claim they were wrongly disciplined for sexual assault? Perhaps interview counsel to some of the claimants? Did the film explain how the due process rights of the accused have been severely curtailed when it comes to charges of rape to make it easier to punish the accused (both the guilty and the innocent)?

Jameis Winston’s rape accuser Erica Kinsman (that’s her name) is featured in the film. Just for the record, here is Jameis Winston’s account since, apparently, the film doesn’t bother to tell it.

CNN plans to air this thing. CNN used to be a news network.

What’s the difference between this thing and the Rolling Stone article that didn’t bother to get the accused’s side of the story and that turned out to have more leaks than Titanic? Film carries a visceral impact that the written word can’t, and it will get people a lot angrier about the imaginary campus rape epidemic. That’s the difference.

Make no mistake: the activists plan to use that anger to chip away even more at the due process rights of the presumptively innocent accused of college rape. Innocence Project guru Prof. Mark A Godsey has explained that “the risk of wrongful conviction is the highest when there’s public outcry. Most of the exonerations and wrongful convictions have occurred in rape cases.” This film seems intended to foment public outcry about rape, and as such, it poses a much graver risk to the rights of the innocent than even the Rolling Stone article.

My name is Jack Barnes and I am a serial rapist

Jack Barnes · 27 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Yes, I am a rapist. By feminist standards, I have been a successful rapist for about 15 years. The following is absolutely and completely true:

I have had sex with a woman after she has consumed alcohol, and so had I. Every woman is a porn star after a few drinks!

I have had sex with a woman without asking her permission. Its a little difficult for a woman to answer while she's face down in a pillow so I didn't bother asking.

I have had sex with a woman while she was asleep, although she didn't stay asleep. I was only planning to be there for five minutes, give me a break.

I have changed positions, orifices and techniques without asking for her permission. Hey, change is good right? While all of my rapes involve penile penetration at some point, that's not the total scope of my rape ability. I'm a very versatile rapist! I use objects, as well as digital and oral penetration too. Got to keep them guessing as to what is next.

I have even had sex with a woman after she specifically said "NO." But she didn't really mean it so its all good.

Most of the time my rapes are nonviolent. But there are those times when a man just needs to show her who is boss. Once I asked her to come into the bedroom for something. I followed (stalked) her into the room. When she walked close to the bed I shoved her face down into the mattress. I held her there with one hand while pulling down her pants with the other. I grabbed a handful of hair, mounted her and took care of business. She was sore for a couple of days but she got over it. I have also found its fun when they struggle. It makes the rape more interesting.

I can't even begin to tell you the times when I've just walked by a woman and copped a feel. Its fun to watch her jump.

I'm not a total asshole to my rape victim. I always have a towel or something ready so she can clean up. Its the little things that make all the difference.

There a few things left on my rapist checklist that I will probably never get to do. I will probably never get to lie to a woman about myself in order to get her in my bed. I only rape a woman that knows me.

I must also admit that I'm very single-minded when it comes to my victims: I only rape my wife.

I have had sex with her after she had been drinking. The reverse is also true.

We never ask each other for permission to do anything sexual. If either one of us followed the "Yes Means Yes" law the other would quickly lose interest.

On a couple of occasions we have woken up in the middle of having sex. Yeah we were having sex in our sleep. Guess she raped me.

Sometimes I'm in control. Sometimes she's in control. We change positions and techniques regularly like most people do.

When we were younger we would chase each other around the house. Sometimes I chased her. Sometimes she would chase me. We would run around the house laughing and giggling. when she was being chased she would yell "No! No! No!" between giggles and laughs. It was just playful fun.

I only got rough with her once. It wasn't anything particularly violent. She asked me to do it. I thought I could handle playing that role. I couldn't. She loved it. But it bothered me. That's all I have to say about that.

We walked by and pat or grab each other all the time. It's small displays of affection that make us smile. Its like a hug or a kiss.

There are times that we have that wild freaky sex that would make a prostitute blush. Then there are times when we make the softest most passionate love. The kind that poets have been trying to put into words for thousands of years but can't seem to get it right. Those are the times that she, actually the both of us, needs something to wipe away the tears.

Your probably thinking that none of this would make me a rapist, that all of this is just normal sexual behavior. Well you would be right and wrong. What I descried is normal sexual behavior especially for a couple who has been together for 16 years. But it also rape according to feminists.

Since the feminist idea that all men are rapists was just not acceptable to people living in reality, they have worked hard to make reality into the fantasy. They couldn't convince all women that sex was oppression because… well… women like it. So they had to make sex illegal so that the percentage of women with personality disorders and those who shift responsibility for their own actions onto others could claim rape when their feelz told them it was rape. See, the number of convictions didn't fit their ideology therefore the laws needed to be changed in order to get more convictions.

Sex isn't politically correct. It isn't civilized. Sex is primitive. Sex is animalistic. Its the dark side of us let out to play and to play with others we trust. And there's the key. Trust. If trust is there consent isn't necessary. A look or a touch is all that's necessary. As for making love. Well. That isn't politically correct or civilized either. Its much more. It exists on a different level than political correctness or civilization. Its a spiritual thing. What happens in those instances cannot be put into words. If I knew nothing else about feminism the idea that all heterosexual sex is rape would be enough. There is something wrong with people who believe that I am incapable of sharing a love making experience with my wife. It's heart breakingly sad and infuriating to the highest degree.

So they call me a rapist. I guess in their minds I am. But ask me if I give a fuck.

Oh and as for my wife? She is a very very happy woman. She just walked into the bedroom carrying a load of folded laundry. Poor thing. I wonder if she knows what's coming.

Three more women leave the reservation

AVfM Video Source · 27 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

If we didn't know better we might think this looks like more and more women are leaving the reservation. Somebody do something!

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=nZ7mdJg-xWc

http://youtu.be/FntELLzUakM

http://youtu.be/dg0UWbxEMpg

You might want to click on their videos, subscribe to their channels, and leave them some feedback.

Privatize marriage!

Marian Atodiresei · 28 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Note: This article first appeared on AVFM Romania.

In the American state of Oklahoma, Todd Russ has filed a bill that would abolish marriage certificates altogether in the state with a population the size of Ilfov county including Bucharest (3.8M).

The motivation behind the legislative project is rather complicated and it has a lot to do with the insistence of some courts to legalize same-sex marriage despite a state-wide referendum rejecting the idea. But that's less relevant. What's more relevant is Todd Russ' statement which reads:

> Marriages are not supposed to be a government thing anyway

No matter what one might think about Mr. Russ, this statement is not only valid in Oklahoma, but it's universally valid across the planet.

Historical context

Marriage, throughout almost all of human history, was not the business of the state – but rather a private affair, supervised by a religious institution in most cases.

We say in most cases because, for instance, in the Romanian territories in the 17th century and even up until after the formation of modern Romania in the 19th century, the word "family" doesn't appear at all in the state's laws and it's barely mentioned in the theology. The family was thought of as being built around a "legitimate couple" – and a couple was deemed "legitimate" if it had the acceptance of its community[1]. The acceptance by the Church was recommended, but not mandatory.

Moreover, despite the image presented to us today by the mass-media, marriage was significantly more decentralized and detached from religion before the modern age. For instance, the Hungarian diplomat, Anton Veracsics (1504-1543) wrote in his book about the Romanian territories that:

> [Romanians] can get married unpunished multiple [successive] times although occasionally that's frowned upon. And they can also divorce even in the second marriage if things don't work out, even if children resulted from that union – and they can do this without committing a crime against the State[2]

This is why, when the Church finally took over the marriage business (although even then, this takeover was rather partial), the pre-existent state of decentralized marriage (and therefore private) had already become a tradition – and so the Orthodox Church had to make certain concessions.

Therefore, unlike Catholicism, the Orthodox Church allowed re-marrying up to three times – not because Orthodoxism was any sort of "liberal" force, but because it was a way to attract the formation of the family under the umbrella of the Church. In modern economic language, we can say that the Church adapted to the market in order to gain customers.

The use of such language may offend some people, but it's an undeniable fact that the institution of marriage was a very profitable business for the Church (and it still is today).

The history of marriage in the Romanian territories is far more complicated than what we can write here and now – and a decent evaluation of it is further impaired by some contradictory sources and the partisanship practiced by several academicians and sociologists.

But, one thing is clear: as a historical norm, marriage is in and of itself a private and decentralized affair, spared from state intervention.

Moreover, Romania is not some special snowflake in Europe. Up until the 19th century, most of continental Europe not only didn't have the state involved in marriage – but the Church wasn't terribly involved either.

Both in the Orthodox world and the Catholic world, if two individuals of opposite sexes asserted that they had exchanged marriage vows, even without witnesses, the Church would accept their marriage as valid.

The only major exceptions from this rule in continental Europe are the Netherlands and Belgium whom, through the concept of kerkelijke huwelijksaankondiging, have basically centralized marriage even before the 16th century Protestant Reformation. To this list of exceptions, we should add England and Wales who introduced the concept of state-issued marriage certificates in the 14th century.

Present day

State-issued marriage certificates aren't the norm everywhere even today. In the Canadian province of Quebec, for instance, marriage certificates are optional[3] and in many countries of Europe (including Romania), the legal benefits of state-sanctioned marriage are virtually non-existent, therefore rendering the state-issued marriage certificate as de facto optional.

In Germany, for instance, the number of single people (i.e. people without a stable partner) did not drop at all since the fall of the Berlin Wall, but the number of married people is in a constant and consistent drop[4], making Germany a good example of marriage privatization.

The difference in language is also worth metioning. In Latin-derivate speaking countries, such as our own, we say marriage certificate – which is an official paper that certifies a pre-existent state of affairs – analogous with the birth certificate, which is issued after the birth has occurred.

In the US (and everywhere English is the basic language), the common term is marriage license – which is an official paper through which one obtains permission from the state to do something, in this case to start a family. A license is the paper without which one would break the law. Think of it as analogous with a driver's license: driving a car on public roads without a license is a crime.

Although it would seem that the marriage license from the Anglosphere and the marriage certificate from here fulfill the same role – the subtle difference in language matters a lot, especially in public perception but also in the law. This is why a proposal of re-decentralization of marriage (or privatization as we call it) is seen differently from how it would be seen in Italy or Romania. And by "different" I mean that it encounters a harsher opposition, and in the Oklahoma case, which triggered this article, the opposition is even harsher because it comes from a gentleman who is not exactly popular amongst the mass-media.

Why is this a good idea

Now that we know at least the basics of the historical context and present-day context, let's review a few of the reasons why the privatization of marriage would solve more things than it would break.

- First of all, it would equitably address (and perhaps even solve) the never-ending discussion regarding same-sex marriage.

The churches or the organizations who do not support same-sex marriage would then be able to choose not to support it, whilst the churches and the organizations who do support the idea would be able to choose to act upon their support – and the market will settle accordingly.

Sure, it's not a perfect solution – but there are no solutions, only trade-offs. And this is undoubtedly a better trade-off than the Danish trade-off, for instance, where the churches are forced by the State to sanction marriages they disapprove of.

- It would significantly undercut the power that family courts currently enjoy.

Without a state-issued marriage certificate, the courts would have fewer means to redistribute the wealth from one spouse to the other (usually from the husband to the wife). Admittedly, this is all dependent on the jurisdiction but, in Romania for instance, a couple that does not have a state-issued marriage certificate doesn't end up in the courtroom at all unless there's a disputed custody of children.

And even in that case, each spouse's wealth remains clearly separated and each spouse must prove beyond all reasonable doubt what contributions they made if they demand a split of wealth. In other words, the legal standard is higher – which is of course fantastic.

- It would make prenups more solid.

At the moment, the notion of matrimonial convention – as the prenups are called in the Romanian Civil Code – is pretty vague. In practice, you are at the mercy of the judge on whether the provisions of the contract remain in place or not – exactly when you need them most – during the divorce.

But if the state is removed from this equation, the prenup becomes just like any other commercial contract and the court only has to enforce it when one party refuses to abide by it – while the court has fewer instruments to meddle in.

Moreover, in this way, every couple would get to define their marriage as they please and introduce various rights and responsibilities in their contract that the state may not introduce on its own.

Protection against paternity fraud, is one example. Strict rules on what happens when children come into the equation is another example; or even inheritance in advance for situations when you'd want your first child to inherit all your wealth – and not leave the state to come in and divide it using laws that make no sense whatsoever as is the case now in France and Romania.

All these and many others could become part of the family law for individuals who want them without allowing the state and the courts to modify them depending on how the wind blows today.

- Potential cost reduction

This is a trickier one to notice because the costs related to marriage differ vastly from jurisdiction to jurisdiction and are hard to estimate overall.

For instance, in Romania, the costs vary from 15€ to 90€ in the same city, and to those costs one must add the costs required for the medical tests and various other small fees that you can only pay if you go from one state institution to another and pay them directly. Looking across the Prut river on our neighbors in Republic of Moldova, the marriage registration alone can cost up to 300€ – which is more than the median monthly income in Moldova. And, just like here, Moldovans should also add the various smaller fees that the state demands and the costs of medical tests.

Why are things this way? Because the government has no competition. And when the monopoly is absolute, inefficiency isn't far behind. What if instead of one, there were 10 institutions that sanction marriage?

Just like in any other business (and marriage is a business for the state, make no mistake about it), the competition would bring not only better services but also smaller fees in the long run.

- More stable marriages

OK, I realize that this argument may piss off a lot of people, but please bear with me.

The traditionalist sector of society, in particular, tends to keep throwing studies about how unmarried parents are worse than the married ones. There is some truth in that statement although it's by no means so absolute. But very few dare to ask the honest question: why do so many avoid state-sanctioned marriage?

Actually, a better question would be: why has marriage become so unattractive? Because it's obvious that's the case – but very few have the guts to ask why and those that do proceed to cherry-pick answers that support their agenda.

But, when you have no control over the terms of the contract – realistically speaking, how could anyone fully informed and in full conscience sign such a contract?

Moreover, the "terms of the contract" keep on changing without your consent. For instance, those who got married in 1988 under Communist law, are now subjected to the current Civil Code. Is it fair for those who signed a contract in 1988 which did not contain notions such as "life annuity" (which works like the notion of "alimony" in the Anglosphere) to be now subjected to a whole different contract that they did not sign? More and more people say no – even though they don't explicitly articulate it.

On the other hand, if the act of marriage is decentralized and individuals can establish the terms of the contract themselves, then those same individuals would have a higher incentive to abide by the contract when they know clearly what's coming to them if they attempt to break what they agreed upon and signed in full conscience.

Most people who end up rightfully complaining about the injustices committed by various courts are not, in fact, thoroughly informed about the terms of the marriage contract. It needs to be said that this is in part their fault as well for not seeking to inform themselves but think of it this way: the section dedicated to family from the Romanian Civil Code is over 200 pages written in partly archaic and partly legalese language. I don't think I am mistaken when I say that most of the Civil Code (or the equivalent in other nations) is just plain incomprehensible for most of the populace.

Another argument in favor of more stable marriages is the fact that the current law offers incentives for divorce after 10 or 20 years of marriage, incentives that never existed before in the Romanian legal tradition.

At this moment, if you file for divorce after 10 years of marriage, the poorer spouse has the "right" to a higher percentage of the wealthier spouse's wealth and also the "right" to request alimony (which did not even exist until 2009) – and this applies even if the divorce is filed as a common fault divorce. Things get even worse when it comes to marriages that are over 20 years old.

At the end of the day, today's approach is a "one size fits all," and the "one size" keeps on changing, often times quite radically in short periods of time – and not always for the better.

It is perhaps the time to admit that the state's "size" is not necessarily the best size for everyone and that individuals know better what "size" fits their relationships.

Conclusions

We don't believe that the decentralization or privatization of marriage will solve all the problems arising from family law. We don't even assert that it's a perfect solution. But, considering the aforementioned arguments, we do assert that it would be a step in the right direction.

As we speak the Romanian Parliament is discussing the possibility of allowing priests to issue marriage certificates as well as perform the ceremony. If I were a legislator, I would extend this to any NGO or firm that wishes it. Moreover, the bureaucracy should also be severely cut back (or at least asked to compete with the private sector) – just like our legislators did with amicable divorces (i.e. divorces where the spouses agree on the terms privately, regardless of what the law says).

The privatization of marriage, at the end of the day, should be supported by everyone on the political spectrum – from progressives to libertarians and from traditionalists to liberals. All the ideals about marriage within these groups (and others) could be accomplished without excluding or negatively affecting those who have a different view on marriage.

I find it disappointing that "progressives" seem to be the most vehemently against this idea even though, believe it or not, this idea would allow their vision of marriage to become immediately legal without spending years and years lobbying parliaments and governments.

I find it equally disappointing that too many religious groups are avoiding this idea although there is no doubt that this trade-off would be the one that respects their desires the most.

There is no complaint – whether you want to “save marriage” or “reform” it – that cannot be solved by more liberty.

References:

(1) Simion, F.M.; Teaha, T.; Șerb, I.; Ilișiu, I. – Nunta la români: studiu istorico-etnografic [Wedding for Romanians: A historical and ethnografic study], ”Arcadia” collection, “Grai și Suflet, Cultura Națională” publishing house, 1995

(2) Verancsics, A; Eperjesy, K – De situ Transsylvaniae, Moldaviae et Transalpinae liber tertius, K.M. Egyetemi Nyomda publishing house, Budapest – 1944, from the Bibliotheca scriptorum Medii Recentisque Aevorum., Saeculum XVI series.

(3) Civil code of Quebec, Book Two, Title One, Chapter I

(4) Adams, B.N. – Handbook of World Families, Sage Publications Ltd., 2005, p. 300-301

Worth-based entitlement

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 28 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I can find no good reason to believe that women are uniquely "oppressed," or that their sufferings in life transcends the common lot of humanity at large. And more, I can see a strong case that men have it worse in many ways.

But feminist theory maintains that women as a group are oppressed by men as a group, and specifically names women as a "political sex class." Moreover, feminist preaching for many years has openly incited women to see themselves in such terms. Such is the sisterhood trope. And the last half-century has witnessed a mushrooming growth of women's advocacy groups, lobbying groups, government bureaus, and all manner of special services for women both public and private.

But it doesn't end with blind favoritism toward women. No. The state of matters takes a malignant turn as well, when you consider that female citizens presently enjoy disproportionate power to compromise the well-being of male citizens. As simply as we can put it, women have the power to lie about men with impunity, in a way that seriously harms them. And that power, being vested in laws and institutions, becomes a political power and makes women a political class.

To put this another way, it is not women, but MEN who are "oppressed." Oppression, as feminist theory informs us, is structural. It is not rooted in the power of individuals, but in the power of institutions made disproportionately available to some groups but not others. And when the disfavored group feels the institutionally-based power of the favored group like a boot on its neck, only then may we correctly say that "oppression" is taking place.

That is why men (not women) are the oppressed group in today's civilization — because the power of women to harm men is embodied in laws and institutions. In other words, structurally. If we are to hold the feminists to the letter of their own law, we must insist that they acknowledge this.

All of this tilts the political board against men as a group. In that light, we feel no hesitation in stating that men, as a group, have no political obligation to go to bat for women as a group. Under the circumstances, why should they? They have reached a fork in the road, where they may elect to go their own way. One sees this is logical.

Rationally speaking, men would do best to look out for themselves as individuals, and to form contracts of mutual assistance in order to multiply the benefit. No consideration, either moral or utilitarian, can inspire me with any sense of duty toward women as a group. This would be true even in the best of times, but is doubly true at present, when men are an oppressed class.

Therefore any individual woman I meet will get special consideration from me only as an individual, and only if she proves herself worthy. And clearly, some will prove themselves worthier than others. This way of thinking entails no "misogyny" because it entails no opinion, either good or ill, about women as a group.

Misogyny means disaffection toward women irrespective of their actions or behaviors. Hence, even if you were to form a bad opinion about every female person on Earth, it would not entail misogyny if you had weighed each case on its merits. You would merely harbor a bad opinion about this woman, that woman, and the next woman — but not about women.

I am far from having evaluated every woman on Earth, and I know my life is too short to do that. So I am content to say that I harbor no opinion either good or ill about the huge majority of women, but as I make their acquaintances I will evaluate them one at a time. Then, according to the case, I will form a social contract binding myself to specific behaviors. Upon that basis alone, I will decide what, if anything, I "owe" to the individual in question. In this, I do just as I would do with any man — I am entirely even-handed.

Yes. Characterization by merit is a first principle, and it frames my conduct toward everybody I meet. Nobody, man or woman, is "entitled" to anything save what I, by my good pleasure, bountifully proffer — and calculation of merit weighs considerably in that dispensation. In short, I study the manifested qualities of other people in living form, and work from there.

But prudential considerations are always uppermost in my thinking, with an eye to rational self-preservation grounded in a prescience of natural consequences. My policy, then, entails a strategizing sense of the Kantian hypothetical imperative: “If you want the world to be X, you must do Y and Z.” The reason is, that if you fail to do Y and Z, then by natural consequence the world will not be X.

So in the end, although my conduct is governed purely by a moral law within myself, that moral law is governed by the considerations which I have sketched above. I should add that it never hurts to get on my good side. Deal squarely and rightly with me, and I shall be the truest friend you could ask for. Otherwise, things might get sticky.

Feminism views women as an entitled class, and fails to hold them accountable as individuals. I find this both pernicious and unworkable, and for that reason (among many others) I reject feminism as a movement and as an ideology. I disavow it. I disclaim ownership in it. I repudiate the cultural narrative which it imposes and I wash my hands of any project predicated on any aspect of that narrative.

Briefly then, I am not a feminist and no power in the universe will force me to become one.

Finally, no woman I shall ever meet may exercise any claim upon me in the name of feminism, or under color of feminism in any form. She is entitled to nothing until she proves to me that she is worth something.

Such is worth-based entitlement.

#Gamergate: Feminism is the new pink lynch mob

Jack Outis · 28 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

DISCLAIMER: I DISCOURAGE DOXXING. PLEASE DO NOT DOXX PEOPLE.
Do not imitate psychos by doxxing them. Let's instead dispassionately gather evidence against those who doxx & then make threats or encourage others to make threats. Then let's help the authorities find them and put them in jail.

"Doxxing" gets thrown around pretty easily these days, when most of the time what we really mean is identifying a person who's made it clear they wish to remain anonymous, and then, using that information to threaten to harm them. Revealing information that's already out there and easily available isn't the problem; it's the harassment, the threat to career, to family, and to one's own safety that is the problem. It's not acceptable.

Unfortunately, this has also become all too common online:

"You disagree with me!? You are a terrorist! Worse than Hitler!" Therefore you deserve whatever you get!

To be honest, Godwin's law is a constant while debating feminists on social media, be it on Twitter, Facebook or all the other outlets. It's only a matter of time before someone impulsive enough calls the other a terrorist for daring to agree/disagree with feminism.

But when hyperbole becomes action in the real world, where innocent people are put in harm's way, then we can talk about actual acts of terror. This logic (or logic as a whole) tends to be rejected by feminists on Twitter because what they feel defines reality and facts do not matter. Even within pro-Gamergate groups, there are feminists who claim to support the movement but they snap at you as soon as you state feminism is directly related and woven into Gamergate. Their favorite talking point goes:

"GamerGate is only about ethics in journalism please do not touch feminism"

Let's analyze this impulsive demand: you are actually asking people to criticize the lack of ethics exercised by feminists in journalism but you demand we do not to talk about feminists themselves because feminism has "nothing to do" with their motives for dishonesty? That is a spectacular act of dishonesty in and of itself.

Congrats feminists, you have hit a new low of willful leftist-feminist retardation even within GamerGater feminist circles. By your flimsy logic, Anita Sarkeesian, Zoe Quinn, Rebecca Watson, Brianna Wu and every other present and future anti-GamerGate feminist is not a "true feminist," a logical fallacy known as "No true Scotsman".

What is #GamerGate?
Mountains of pixels have been typed on the subject but to make a short analogy, imagine MSNBC had been involved in a case of blatant corrupt journalism and kept denying all evidence of its wrongdoing. It would read as follows:

"#MSNBCGate started when a sector of the leftist leaning media (the one in charge of TV journalism) was caught red handed exchanging sexual favors for positive reviews of products which led to them being exposed colluding to push or reject products not based on quality but all kinds of bribes (besides the sexual ones). Detractors of MSNBC started a campaign named #MSNBCGate on social media. #MSNBCGate is still going to this day because those corrupt TV journalists still reject all evidence of their corruption. "

Imagine after all the damning evidence MSNBC still denied all of their involvement with corrupt practices. If that analogy is clear then this is GamerGate in a nutshell:

#GamerGate started when a small sector of the leftist leaning media (the one in charge of video game journalism) was caught red handed exchanging sexual favors for positive reviews of video games which led to them being exposed colluding to push or reject games not based on quality but all kinds of bribes (besides the sexual ones) detractors of corrupt game journalists started a campaign named GamerGate on social media. GamerGate is still going to this day because those corrupt Game journalists still reject their collusion despite all the damning evidence. Yes, to this day they still deny all of their involvement with corrupt practices.*

With that in mind, watch this video #GamerGate in 1 minute

Who is @Lizzyf620?
Let's say you support a movement that rejects journalistic corruption but also feminist lies. Let's say that movement is called GamerGate therefore you must be a fedora-wearing, big, fat, hairy, celibate, reclusive and butt-ugly male gamer, right? Let's say you are the opposite, an attractive young woman and you openly mock these assumptions about gamers on Twitter. Let's say you take no prisoners and your level of gifted satire & snark are only rivaled by your very feminine, above average physical looks. The feminists say you are just a male posing as a female, so you take selfies with clear hand-written text showing them you actually are a real woman.

The feminists say you are just "photoshopped," so you record yourself on video sarcastically apologizing for "being a man". The feminists say you are one "isolated case" so you start recruiting dozens of women like you and on video, sarcastically apologize for being a "male posing as a woman" along with dozens of people representative of gamer diversity The reaction from feminists towards you? Harassment and threats.

Let's say that despite all the blow back and the very real harassment you experience, you never play the damsel and instead intelligently mock those who harass you. Then you, the attractive young woman also dare to write and defend GamerGate on a "little" website called Buzzfeed which feminists successfully take down and censor only to have your community protest until Buzzfeed puts it back.

Let's say that both you and your defense of GamerGate go semi-viral. That was the moment when it became clear feminists had put a price on your head. Yes, you the attractive young female gamer. Let's say you also are a mother of two. Let's say that shortly after the Buzzfeed article, those anti-GamerGate feminists released all your personal information on you & your family, including your two toddlers.

How feminist media defends THEIR "decent" women
Imagine this: Anita Sarkeesian has two toddlers and all of her personal information was leaked: real name, address, place of work, list of family members and to top it off, photos of her two toddlers. It would be all over the news.

"Misogynist males have threaten the children of feminist Anita Sarkeesian!
Is there no limit to these monsters!?"

That headline would make for a great Jezebel headline right? Guess what? None of that media circus will happen to Lizzy. Why? Because she does not "deserve" it. Let's not forget that according to feminist dogma, it is only harassment if men and non-feminists do it. Lizzy is not a feminist, therefore she is fair game to doxx and hunt down.

Much like petite porn stars who get beat up and put in hospital by their partner, mass media will barely report on those "undeserving" women and instead focus on leftist hypocrites like Anita Sarkeesian and her fabricated "suffering" (which almost always gets primetime). Mass media will even bring her in person to blatantly display her apocryphal victimhood on the Colbert Report and MSNBC. But Lizzy? She will be ignored, simply because she does not comply. She does not need to be a porn star, she does not even need to be the wrong kind of "whore" all she needs to do is not comply with feminism.
Lizzy, a single mother of two working as a photographer, will likely not benefit from the usual white-glove treatment of "pedestalized" martyrdom leftist media reserves for the like of Anita Sarkeesian. No, the threats against Lizzy and her family do not constitute "real" harassment because for the leftist media, she is an apostate to feminism, one that refuses to comply with the pink, fascist thought mafia. Just like a fascist-theocratic state, feminism and its "Social Justice Warriors" hounds will threaten to harm those who abandon and publicly question feminism. They will hunt you down simply because you "dared" offend feminism almost as if you had directly offended them.

But what moves these SJW hounds? The reality is that "SJW" is an overrated term. What truly moves a "SJW" is not "social" but their own narcissism. It is not "justice" they seek either. They seek retribution. Lastly, they are far from being "warriors." They are cowards looking for a stone to hide under. No, they are not "Social Justice Warriors" they are Narcissistic Retribution Cowards (or NRCs for short) willing to bend their already warped sense of justice for the sake of pleasing their thinly veiled narcissism. They get so deeply offended because they are devoid of a sense of self. Deep down they are just a husk for "feminism" and feminism is their religion. Hence, if you offend feminism, you offend them directly. The very real problem with their narcissism is when it spills into the real world.

SJWs/NRCs will do anything for feminism including threatening to harm little children.
Just let that sink in. Think about the level to which these people are willing to stoop for the sake of feminism. Imagine their flawed thought process led by their deformed, metastasized sense of justice.

"I hate this Lizzy whore…There must be a way we can get her to shut up…mmmhhh…Should I threaten her livelihood and get her fired? Threaten her? Threaten her loved ones?

Yes…threatening her loved ones sounds fair…She deserves to suffer…Let's see…Who is the most vulnerable, most innocent human being she is related to? Yes her two toddlers! I am willing to threaten her two innocent toddlers in the name of feminism…because she offended feminism…and offended me"

In life, we judge people by their ideas and actions not their appearance or ethnicity. Make no mistake: for the sake of feminism, adherents will threaten little children because it does not matter what happens in the world. Feminism must claim the moral high ground, even if that means threatening innocent little toddlers.

Is this what it comes down to you SJWs/NRCs?

You crossed the line. Children are untouchable.

Against Doxxing Them Back
The predictable reaction for moral human beings is to protect children first. It does not take that much to warp that outrage into doxxing those who doxxed Lizzy and threatened her children but that escalation would be a mistake. Our legal system is designed to prevent these escalations because they usually result in worse crimes. As flawed as the legal system is, it is better than the original lynch mobs because lynch mobs tend to get their targets murdered and very often without evidence. The reality is that we all want revenge when children are put in harm's way, but in a lynch mob? Mobs are all to easy to abuse. Mobs create a social diffusion of responsibility or, in other words, you get others to do your dirty work while getting away with murder (by proxy). If anything, our legal system is a process for measured, controlled revenge aimed at preventing said mobs. The SJWs that doxxed Lizzy are a lynch mob and imitating them just makes GamerGate a mob of a different color.

Do not imitate psychos by doxxing them. Let's gather evidence and put them in jail instead.

Let's look closely at the actions that led to Lizzy being doxxed.

1. Feminists dislike Lizzy and her free speech.
2. Feminists tell Lizzy to shut up or else…
3. Feminists organize a lynch mob of SJWs to put Lizzy's info on the table in the hopes for a psycho to do the dirty work. Still ongoing.

Sound familiar? Look at past international events where fascist-theological groups have attempted to suppress free speech, first by "outing" dissenters of their dictatorship to make them publicly known, then by facilitating their execution by a mob/group. Compare, and you will soon realize that do/xxing is the new lynch mob. Doxxing is putting a price on the head of that formerly anonymous person.

Welcome To Feminism: The Pink Theocratic-Fascism
When it comes to free speech, we are all journalists receiving death threats. As long as it is not authentically illegal, all "offensive" speech should be allowed. Unfortunately, we already live in a theocratic-fascist state where saying something "offensive" may warrant doxxing and death threats from feminists. Paint a fascist-theocracy in pink and see the parallels. We live in a pervasive theocracy called feminism and if you dare to openly disagree with feminists, you will be doxxed, in the hopes that a psycho will make good on the threats. Unlike a fascist-theocratic state, which actually publicly executes those whose free speech is "too offensive", feminism delegates the dirty work to "someone" who can doxx those who do not conform with their pink dogma. While feminism mimics a religion, it does not yet openly define itself as one. Here are some of the most blatant similarities feminism has with religion:

- It is based on emotion
- Dismisses evidence while asking you to "listen and believe"
- Does not pay taxes
- Seeks intellectual immunity
- Opposes all criticism by doxxing those who disagree

It would be hard not to see the similarities of an fascist-theocratic state calling for the head of an "atheist" to be served on a platter versus feminism doxxing people like Lizzy "just to scare them" while getting their personal info served on a platter.
Notice that last subtlety: "just to scare them." As if feminists had control over the actions of a random psycho after putting Lizzy's info on the table. Of course, for those leftists defenders of feminism, the comparison with a fascist-theocratic state would be "unfair" because "we do not actually kill people, we only threaten to kill them and their toddlers for disrespecting feminism."

What will it take for actions to become words? Doxxing Lizzy is intended to cause her and her family harm. We cannot allow this to continue. We need doxxers held legally accountable.

Taunting people is one thing. But Mob justice is no justice at all.

If women want more bathrooms give them more bathrooms

AVfM Video Source · 28 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Veemonro gives us more of the deep wisdom of Jessica Valenti.

http://youtu.be/qo8DrkGb0sQ

Why I became a Black Men's Rights Activist

Mumia Ali · 29 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

> "We declare our right on this earth…to be a human being, to be respected as a human being, to be given the rights of a human being in this society, on this earth, in this day, which we intend to bring into existence by any means necessary."
>
> -Malcolm X

Paul Elam's recent column, addressing Black male feminist Byron Hurt's article in The Root, raises a number of very interesting questions, a few of which I'd like to expand upon in this essay. But, before I do, I'd like to more personally address Mr. Hurt myself, because, let's face it: in a world and at a time when Identity Politics is a way of life, where "Who, Whom?" is the order of the day, a White Guy(TM) like Mr. Elam really can't "go in" in the way that I, a blue collar, union card-carrying Brotha, can.

So, let's get to it.

Since what has informed, and inspired, Mr. Hurt's evolution as a Black male feminist is his personal life experience living with his own parents, I'd like to return the favor and offer a bit of my own personal life, which informed and inspired my own evolution as a Black Men's Rights Activist.

It began with my parents and grandparents; you see, what they, and indeed much of my extended family, all had in common, is that they were rich with "strong, independent" Black women – you know, the kind that is lauded by Black America-proper. My grandmother, despite her only getting a gradeschool education, had a burning desire to own a business, and was determined to partner with someone who could help her achieve her goals. Enter my grandfather – a few years younger than her, but highscool-educated and fresh out of Marine Corps as a drill instructor during WW2, they met and courted in their native Virginia, married and moved up north to Philadelphia to seek their fortune. After carefully planning the birth of my mom and uncle, they set out to build the kingdom my grandmother wanted. By the late 60s/early 70s, they not only owned a sprawling home in North Philly, complete with a brand new Imperial in the driveway bought off the showroom floor in cash, they also owned a string of "mom and pop" stores, an apartment block and about a dozen rental houses around the city – all this, while my grandfather also worked at the biggest Post Office branch in the city, 30th Street Station. Which was a very big deal for a Negro back in those days.

I watched my grandfather manage the books for my grandmother; watched him accompany her to purchase or otherwise have equipment and supplies for her various businesses; and perhaps most importantly, advised her on which stocks and other financial investments to get involved in. On top of all of this, it was my grandfather first and foremost, who worked the grueling hours small businesses invariably entail. He stood with my grandmother through thick and thin, even when she was afflicted with stroke after stroke, and retired to care for her himself in her final years, until her death back in the summer of 1997. While Mr. Hurt waxes eloquent about the need for and merits of Black men needing to be more "progressive" in supporting Black women, my grandfather – and many of the men in my family – were doing it long before such notions became fashionable in respectable Black publications like The Root.

Yet, despite all of this, my grandmother – who I and my other family members loved dearly – had a very real dark side. Her "Type A" personality had some serious "side effects", which were often visited onto my grandfather in the form of withering verbal, and I'd say psychological, abuse. She was known, not just in the family, but in the neighborhood and beyond, as a no-nonsense woman who wouldn't hesitate to curse you out or yell at you, and my grandfather endured the brunt of such abuse for decades. In fact, even when my grandfather tried to retreat into the basement – what some refer to as the "man cave" today – my grandmother wasn't having it. She would stand at the top of the stairs leading down into the basement, and continuing arguing, yelling, harassing and cursing my grandfather out – sometimes, for hours at a time. I heard her call him “stupid”, “monkey” and “son of a bitch” too many times to count, and only once did my grandfather totally lose it – which frightened the beejeebus out of my grandmother. That episode aside, which was him cracking a glass table in the breakfast room with his fist and raising his voice, he was the stereotypical “strong and silent” type of Black man that seem to be standard issue at a certain place and time in Black American life.

My mom, my grandmother’s daughter, was as driven as she – and just as abusive. Trained as a nurse coming right out of highschool, she continued in that line of work for the rest of her life, going into private service and amassing a formidable client list due to her professionalism and personality. Nevertheless, she too was known to cuss you out in a heartbeat, and would often cut my own dad down to shreds. My dad, born and raised in Savannah, GA during the Great Depression and in the grip of Jim Crow, met her after his tour of duty in the USMC in Korea, coming home and going to vo-tech school on the G.I. Bill. Like my grandfather, he too was soft-spoken and to be frank, nowhere near as verbally facile as my mom – which really, brutally showed whenever they got into a disagreement. The sheer “rate of fire” of my mom’s verbal barbs and jabs, to say nothing of the ferocity of the actual insults themselves, was like witnessing a lamb being led to slaughter. It was one of the reasons why my dad stayed out so often, among other things.

Nearly all of the rest of the women in my immediate family circle – sisters, aunties, older female cousins, you name it – were cut from the same cloth. They were loud, boisterous, garrulous and often abusive with the tongue, cutting down men like a machete. Nor are they in any way unique or unsual in Black American life – indeed, five will get you ten that every Black person reading these words right now knows at least one, and truth be told quite a few, such “strong, independent” Black women as those I’ve described in my own family. It was this, among a great many other things I witnessed as a kid growing up into a young man, that put me on the path to where I am today as a Black Men’s Rights Advocate.

Now, don’t get me wrong – in no way am I attempting to argue that there aren’t abusive Black men out there – I know firsthand, this not to be so. And I hope that my recounting of my personal life surrounded by powerful, driven and accomplished women should be proof enough, that I am far from some kind of woman-hating reactionary.

But the truth of the matter is, as the events of the past year have made crystal clear, that Black women can be and often are, just as abusive and in some ways, even moreso, than many Black men. In fact, when it comes to Black female abuse of Black men and boys, we don’t see it that way, because very often it comes in the form of verbal and psychological abuse, which we think Black men and boys should and even must, be able to shrug off. Even increasing levels and instances of physical abuse visited on Black men by Black women, is explained away in a fashion that, were the shoe on the other foot, would have Ebony White Knights like Mr. Hurt up in arms, and Black Feminists having a conniption over. No one should have to endure such treatment, no matter who does it, and Black men (and boys) shouldn’t have to put up with such abuse in the name of some cockamamie notion of what Black manhood is supposed to be.

You see, that’s another reason as to how and why I became a Black Men’s Rights Activist: because of something that I refer to as Klingon Culture in Black American life, fostered and cosigned more often than not, by Black Women themselves. You know, like the fictional warrior race of spacefaring aliens from the scifi fixture Star Trek, who seek “death before dishonor”, many Black women hold fast to antiquated notions of Black manhood, even as they fully embrace “New Woman” ideology and real opportunities in our time. Black women have no compunctions in the least pigeon holing Black men into “Manning Up” and those who don’t comply, or dare to question it, are met with the kinds of withering criticism and assault mentioned above. Indeed, many Black woman want to live in the 21st century, while keeping Black men frozen in the amber of the 20th.

This is a huge part of the reason as to how and why “Thug Culture” so doggedly persists – no, “all” Black women don’t shack up with thugs, so before you trot out that trope of an argument, let me stop you right there – but the fact that the stereotype has such staying power, really does say something about the state of relations between Black men and women in our time today. Perhaps more than anywhere else in American life, being a prototypical “thug” carries with it great social cache in the hoods of Black America, where being a thoughtful, even sensitive, Black man is seen as being "soft" – mind you, this is the view often expressed by Black women themselves(!) – which acts as a chokepoint for Black men. They have to conform to this very rigid notion of manhood in order to gain any currency with Black women at large – like the idea of being "strong and silent".

Sure, a lot of lip service is paid to notions of challenging "patriarchy" from Black feminists like Mr. Hurt & Co.; but on the streets, where the beating heart of Black America at large lives and breathes, the reality, is much, much different. Even professional, educated Black women – not that different from the driving, ambitious Black women in my family – will not hesitate to uphold, without fear of contradiction, what their notions of what a "real" Black man is and ought to be. One that basically, has no feelings to harm, no sensibilities to take note of, no inner life to consider, and will "do their duty", like Robocop or something. And that's for starters – let's not even get started on the regular occurrence of Black mothers verbally abusing their sons, for being "bitchasses" and the like, for crying and so on. It happens all the time in Black American life, with predictable results.

Mr. Elam's citation of Stephen A. Smith's observations of the Ray Rice controversy (to which Mr. Hurt vociferously responded himself), are an excellent case in point, to say nothing of other events involving the flipside of abuse obtaining in one way or another in Black American life. Black feminists may pitch a fit, but anyone and everyone in Black America on the ground, knows the truth, and that what Mr. Smith said was a lot closer to it.

And Mr. Elam is correct again, to point out yet another inconvenient truth – that the Afrosphere – my moniker for that corner of the Internet that caters to the lives and interests of Black folk – isn't inclined to give a platform to Brothas like me, who wish to present a flipside to the narrative that is so very often force-fed to us, by the Feminist Lobby, and their allies in academia, the media and entertainment. What Mr. Elam says in speculation, I can say from actual experience, that Black organs like The Root, Ebony, Jet and the like, would never give Black men like me the time of day, let alone be their "leads" in terms of analysis and commentary. After all, Feminism in general, and Black Feminism in particular, is big business – and, to paraphrase Mencken, no American ever went broke telling Sistas what they want to hear.

Lastly, perhaps the biggest reason as to why I became a Black Men's Rights Activist, was because I was tired of being scapegoated and lectured to – never asked for my input or my thoughts – as to what was going on with regard to gender relations, NOW. After all, all of the aims that Feminism sought to address, have in truth been achieved, and is clearly in evidence among Black women themselves: they attend higher education more than anyone else in American life; their health and wellness indices have improved, no small part due to massive governmental intervention and support; and contrary to the handwringing on the part of people like Mr. Hurt & Co., the truth of the matter is that violent crime of all kinds – and that includes that which would have impacted Black women themselves most directly, like spousal abuse, rape and the like – have gone down dramatically, most especially in America's big cities, from the early 90s. Yet, our interlocutors on the other side of the aisle, act as if it's still 1965, or better yet, 1935. The conceit is both wrongheaded and insulting.

The questions that remain in our supposed quest to even the playing fields of American life, are not to be found on Mr. Hurt's side of the fence, but on the side where I'm standing. It is why I am here, doing what I do, and answering those questions, from my own unique perspective.

Mr. Hurt would do well to listen.

The gender gap in first world problems

Paul Elam · 29 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

On November 9 2014, the Sydney Morning Herald (SMH) reported that new research has indicated that the gender wealth gap between single males and single females has widened significantly in the past decade[1]. They cited Curtin University researchers who have conducted an analysis of the University of Melbourne's Household Income and Labour Dynamics in Australia (HILDA) study[2], to make this revelation. The head researcher Siobhan Austen is quoted to state that, "…despite young women now outnumbering young men in our universities quite substantially, we are not seeing a dramatic shift in the gender pay gap or the gender wealth gap." The article proceeds to quote the figures; a substantial rise in wealth of younger single males as opposed to younger single females and a modest narrowing of the gap for older single persons. The researcher is quoted to state that these factors combined with a growing age expectancy for women will mean significant wealth disadvantage for older women in the immediate future. Finally, they point out a possible reason as to why this might be happening – the growth of housing asset values. They note that while women's retirement fund contributions have been growing more rapidly than men's, it was not nearly enough to offset the effect housing assets have on overall wealth.

A seasoned warrior, having spent some time in the trenches of this ideological conflict will know the target is the gender pay gap or in this case, the wealth gap, far across the no-man's land of statistics and academia. Let us try to negotiate this treacherous landscape and see what we can learn from the HILDA study.

The assertions made in this article are dire, but its text contains the key: how many under-35's own property? And has there not been a property bubble in Australia, which is constantly being lamented in the same publication as driving youth away from the property market and into rented accommodation and share housing[3]? Most importantly, what is the HILDA study?

The Household Income and Labour Dynamics in Australia study was initiated in 2001 by the Melbourne Institute of Applied Economics and Social Research at the behest of Australian Government's Department of Social Services. Its two key features relevant to this article are that it is a household study, meaning all adults within a selected household are interviewed and is longitudinal – meaning that the same persons are interviewed in each iteration, which are referred to as "waves." It targets poverty, income, reliance on social security benefits, joblessness and tries to estimate the respondents' sense of well-being. Other data is sometimes collected and presented in "wave" publications, but each one contains at least 4 chapters: household and family life, income, employment and well-being.

These factors are explored using percentiles and quintiles and the dynamics of households moving between them as the survey waves are taken.

As such, it is not designed to be a gendered study – households are found to be of predominantly mixed gender, and no attempt at judgement of what the division of the assets between all people in the household is made. Gendered data is available, but only in areas whose study would be meaningful across the majority of the survey participants, for example spending habits. However, if one is so inclined, further analysis is possible by obtaining the survey's data cubes from the university after some confidentiality paperwork and a fee. It would seem that HILDA is not the ideal tool for making a determination on the gender wealth gap and its choice for this purpose by these researchers emerges as questionable.

The data cubes that they use in their work quoted in the SMH article seem to have first became available in 2010 and date back to 2006 and 2002. Another iteration was released recently and though Austen's latest publications on this subject are not available to the writer at the present time, an earlier article illuminates her methodology. Prepared for a 2010 economics conference, this paper explains that to make a gendered determination of people's welfare, the HILDA household data had to be filtered down to sole-adult households,[4] and exclude single persons living in mixed households.

Approximately 7,500 households and 12,500 persons were interviewed across the relevant HILDA waves,[5] of which about 10% were determined to be single-person households or exactly 773 men and 1,153 women, according to Austen. As such, the SMH journalist purports to project the results obtained from about 1,800 loners onto a population of 20,6 Million (estimated in 2006).

And that is not to say that a wealth gap was nowhere to be found in the data. On the contrary, it was located to begin at the 67th percentile. In other words, the top third of young loners who were men, on average reported to be more well-off than young loner women. It is illustrated in the following graphic. Note that a substantial stretch before the 67th percentile is dominated by Single Female Households (SFH).

Figure 1: Net worth distribution by household type, 2006

Source: Authors' own calculations from the confidentialised unit record files of the 2006 HILDA Survey

The mention of the value of property as being the driving force behind this disparity suddenly resonates in its proper context: if you are well-off enough to own property before the age of 35, chances are that your net worth would have grown together with the current Australian property bubble, granted that Austen's most recent results (based on wave 10 of HILDA, published in 2013) are not available for scrutiny at the time of writing.

The HILDA study can be quoted to elucidate the matter:

"Distribution of wealth

In Australia, as in other Western countries, wealth is much more unequally distributed than income. The findings that wealth and income are not very highly correlated, and that wealth inequality is greater than income inequality, are both primarily due to the greater dependence of wealth on age, or rather on saving as one ages. Wealth also depends somewhat on inheritance, although contrary to widespread impressions, most wealthy people are 'self-made' rather than being beneficiaries of large inheritances (Business Review Weekly, 2004). So wealth accumulates primarily via both voluntary saving and compulsory superannuation, and these savings grow with compound interest as people age. Of course households with higher incomes are able to save more.[6]"

In other words, find a partner, work hard and save. So, let us explore some HILDA statistics.

The most striking finding is probably the decline in absolute poverty in Australia. Over the course of the last decade there has been approximately a 6% change downwards. The pulse of the global economy, meanwhile can be detected in the levels of relative poverty[7]:

Figure 4.3: Percentage of the population in income poverty

Note: Dollar values at the base of the figure are the relative poverty lines in each of the financial years, expressed at December 2011 prices.

The study also provides an indication as to how various demographics fare with this trend as the background. These are taken from Tables 4.5 and 4.6 of the 2014 HILDA publication.

	2001	2002	2003	2004	2005	2006	2007	2008	2009	2010	2011
non-elderly couple	6.1	7.3	7.7	6.8	6.1	6.7	7.2	6.6	7.4	6.6	6.2
couple with children	7.1	6.8	7.6	7.7	6.1	5.8	7.7	7.6	6.3	6.1	6.7
lone parent	30.8	29.1	21.1	14.5	16.0	20.2	25.9	24.9	19.8	24.1	27.4
non-elderly single male	13.7	12.6	13.5	13.1	12.4	11	11.7	13.6	13.1	10.1	13.1
non-elderly single female	14.6	15	14.6	15.5	15.6	12.7	14.1	14.9	15.4	14.1	15.2
elderly couple	22.5	20.4	19.5	24	25.2	25.5	25.5	26.9	20.6	26	25.0
elderly single male	37.9	39.9	40.7	38.4	38.1	34.3	37	35.4	38.7	34.5	37.9
elderly single female	44.5	40.1	42.9	37.0	37.5	29	28.1	40.2	42.4	35.5	35.5
all persons	13.5	13.1	13.8	13.4	11.7	11.5	13.1	13.6	13.4	13.1	13.9

That non-elderly couples "win" and elderly singles "loose" comes as no surprise, though this statistic does not take into accout rent payments, meaning elderly people, who are more likely to own their accomodation may be over-represented as being poor in this chart. The HILDA survey explains futhert that some substantial fluctuations are due to natinal policy events, such as the 2006 Liberal Party "Welfare-to-work" initiative, that moved some onto a less generous welfare package, that seem to have contributed to a rise in poverty levels among sole parents. The same demographic seem to be the most affected by the Labor's 2009 financial stimulus package, this time positively. However, lone parents seem to have done least well out of all the demographics displaying a 7.6% rise in poverty 2001-2011 and a general upward trend. This is also confirmed by a rise of child poverty of children living with sole parents[8] and the rate of reliance on welfare, dominated by sole parents[9]. Oddly, the report does not mention the introduction of Liberal's Baby Bonus in 2002, with an increase in 2004. Designed to boost the birth rate to off-set the effects of an ageing population, the Baby Bonus cames with an income test – poorer families were in this way encouraged to have more children. Finally, elderly single female households display the most dramatic reduction in rates of povery of 7.7% with a similar recent (2009 onwards) trend for the elderly in general. This improvement seems to correlate with the 2009 rise in pensions.

As such, the financial welfare of a household when measured in terms of the likelihood of it being in poverty, seems to be affected most by age, having a partner and having children. These statistics do not show that poverty is a gendered issue. And while it can be argued that the problem areas – single parents and the elderly are dominated by women, it can also be argued also that male mortality rates and the rate of separation and divorce and the policies of the Australian Liberals are the companion culprit issues. However, the HILDA figures do not address those points and we have to move on.

Saving and taking investment risks with one's savings has been identified as the primary contributing factors to wealth. Only the 2003 saving figures are available[10]:

The 2003[11] and 2011[12] attitude to investment figure are available:

	substantial	above average	average	no risk
2003 men	2.1	8.9	38.6	50.4
2003 women	0.8	3.7	32.7	62.8
2011 men	2.6	8.9	43.8	44.8
2011 women	1.6	3.8	35.5	59.1

As can be seen from these figures, the notion that women are better savers is flawed – they are also more frivolous spenders. For simplicity's sake, only the totals are displayed here, However, HILDA reports on these figures by age group. The dynamics are interesting and the reader is invited to investigate those on their own.

Employment is the white elephant in this article, so let us now talk about this animal. According to the HILDA statistics, men are consistently over represented in full-time employment. On the other hand, women are consistently over-represented in part-time work as well as the "not marginally attached" or the unemployable category. The figures look as follows[13]:

Table 7.3: Extended labour force status—Persons aged 25–54 years (%)

	2001	2003	2005	2007	2009	2010	2011
Men
Employed full-time	78.8	79.2	81.5	81.0	78.6	81.0	80.4
Employed part-time (fully employed)	3.6	3.4	4.1	4.2	4.5	4.2	4.5
Underemployed	3.7	4.0	3.3	3.8	3.4	3.2	4.3
Unemployed	5.1	3.4	3.0	2.2	4.0	3.7	2.8
Marginally attached	2.7	4.1	3.4	2.6	3.6	2.8	3.7
Not marginally attached	6.2	5.9	4.8	6.2	5.9	5.1	4.3
Total	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0
Women
Employed full-time	38.8	38.8	39.0	43.0	43.1	42.4	41.3
Employed part-time (fully employed)	21.2	20.7	23.7	22.0	22.5	23.2	22.2
Underemployed	8.5	8.9	8.9	8.2	7.8	8.8	9.2
Unemployed	3.4	2.6	3.2	2.6	2.6	2.8	3.6
Marginally attached	11.0	9.6	7.9	6.2	6.4	6.5	7.2
Not marginally attached	17.1	19.4	17.3	18.0	17.6	16.3	16.5
Total	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0

Note: Percentages may not add up to 100 due to rounding.

HILDA explanatory notes offer further perspective, which the reader may wish to take in. The table above obscures the dynamics of people moving in and out of unemployment and lower paid work. Of note is the greater tendency for men to transition from unemployment to full time work as opposed to women, who trended towards part-time work and a greater tendency for women to become unemployable. These are discussed in Section 7 of the 2009 report. Another thing not evident from this table is the number of hours spent in paid work. Figure 15.1 offers an idea as to what the situation might be:

Again, no real surprises, although HILDA notes that the difference between the sexes has narrowed slightly in the past decade.

Finally, what makes a household wealthy? The answer is presented in Table 14.1, p 83 of the 2013 HILDA release[14], where it is stated that, "The composition of household wealth has changed markedly over the 2002 to 2010 period. Housing has grown considerably as a share of total assets, and superannuation has also steadily increased its share of assets."

As such, SMH seems to severely misrepresent the Curtin University findings by claiming that they indicate a substantial shift in the gender wealth gap. For their part, the researchers do not attempt to make such a claim in their paper, however, their choice of sample design is questionable. The statistics themselves show a much more nuanced picture that does indicate a pay gap, but also provides ample economic data as to why it may exist. As is usual, the casual reader will not be expected to look into the figures themselves, contact researchers and ask questions and re-arrange the figures in Excel to get a better picture. They will be misled by dishonest reporting based on ideologically-driven research.

Overall, Australian society seem to remain committed to the traditional gender roles of men working and women caring for the home and children, with a gradual shift toward a greater participation of women in the workforce. Partnership, hard work, maturity and enterprise seem to be the keys to success. This sounds all the more ominous when poverty is declining for all except single parents. As such, the proclaimed demise of the nuclear family may not be a sound long-term economic policy. Poverty is the real problem, when we look at such figures, because unlike wealth, poverty is a limit. That wealth disparity between the sexes in the top third of society may have increased over the last decade, is frankly a first-world problem that needs to be set aside in policy and social discourse as long as poverty persists.

[1] http://www.smh.com.au/national/rich-man-poor-woman-the-gender-wealth-gap-widens-20141108-11igay.html

[2] http://www.melbourneinstitute.com/hilda/

[3] http://www.smh.com.au/comment/sydney-housing-prices-lock-out-young-people-from-property-market-20140904-

10c9nr.html

[4] https://www.melbourneinstitute.com/downloads/hilda/Bibliography/Conference_Papers/Austen_etal_ACE10-128.pdf

[5] http://www.melbourneinstitute.com/downloads/hilda/Stat_Report/statreport-v5-2010.pdf

- Introduction p v

[6] http://www.melbourneinstitute.com/downloads/hilda/Stat_Report/statreport-v1-2006.pdf p55

[7] http://www.melbourneinstitute.com/downloads/hilda/Stat_Report/statreport-v9-2014.pdf p30

[8] Ibid – Table 4.6, p31

[9] Ibid – Figure 5.2, p 36

[10] Ibid – Table 1 p 57

[11] Ibid – Table 3 p 58

[12] http://www.melbourneinstitute.com/downloads/hilda/Stat_Report/statreport-v9-2014.pdf – Table 6.2, p41

[13] http://www.melbourneinstitute.com/downloads/hilda/Stat_Report/statreport-v9-2014.pdf p 51

[14] http://www.melbourneinstitute.com/downloads/hilda/Stat_Report/statreport-v8-2013.pdf

Mariah Blake goes for record number of lies in one feminist article

AVFM Hangouts · 29 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Mother Jones is an old school liberal publication with some respectable creds. Mariah Blake is a new school feminist. The combination was good for the latter, not so much for the former.

Blake recently used up 6,000 words of column space to pen a disingenuous attack piece on the MHRM, particularly on Warren Farrell, Paul Elam and AVFM. Pity after months of research and all that writing she offered up the same tripe as every other second rate blogger in the yellow world of online feminism.

In the process she took down any journalistic credibility that Mother Jones ever had.

Join us tonight as Tom Golden, Paul Elam and Warren Farrell pick through each of Blake's lies, one by one, and demonstrate the difference between mainstream media and MANstream Media.

It starts tonight, right here at 4 PM Pacific, 6 Central and 7 Eastern Time.

“Mother Jones” betrays legacy of Mary Harris Jones

Tom Golden · 29 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Mother Jones did a 6000 word piece on the Men’s Human Rights Movement and got it wrong in so many ways, and left out so much crucial information, it’s hard to know what to say. Here’s a comment I left on the article:

The namesake of this magazine is Mary (Mother) Jones, a woman who stood up for the rights of men. Her husband was an ironworker and organizer of the National Union of Iron Moulders. After his early death Mother Jones honored her husband by becoming a highly successful union organizer fighting for the rights of working men. She dedicated her life to helping men get a fair deal and did so with great gusto and aplomb. Far from a suffragette she is often quoted as having said “You don’t need the vote to raise hell.”

The irony of this article is overwhelming.

The real Mother Jones fought for the rights of men who worked in the death professions. That is, those jobs that have a very high mortality rate. The jobs that are populated almost entirely by men who are sacrificing their own safety in order to provide for their families and loved ones. Workplace death is actually one of the many men’s issues that the author omitted from bringing up in this article. Rather than compliment the people who are working towards helping with this issue and these men her article instead attempts to denigrate and marginalize those working for the human rights of men and boys by name calling those folks haters and trolls. I do wonder if Ms. Blake thinks of Mother Jones as a hater and troll?

> Yet, despite her radicalism, Mother Jones was no feminist. She did not support the suffrage movement, arguing that “you don’t need a vote to raise hell.” Though she was correct when she pointed out that the women of Colorado had the vote and failed to use it to prevent the appalling conditions that led to labor violence, this should not have negated women’s inherent right to a voice in government from one who had also frequently quoted the Declaration of Independence. Indeed, Mother Jones even argued that suffragists were naïve women who unwittingly acted as duplicitous agents of class warfare; she wrote in 1925 (after national suffrage had been achieved) that “the plutocrats have organized their women. They keep them busy with suffrage and prohibition and charity.” – Doris Weatherford. American Women’s History: An A to Z of People, Organizations, Issues, and Events (Prentice Hall, 1994), 190-191.

The author of the Mother Jones article starts off with a huge cheap shot. In the first paragraph she tries to associate a murderer with the activists she is about to describe. There is literally no evidence that Eliot Rodger was in any way associated with the Men’s Human Rights Movement but facts don’t stop Ms Blake. Right off the bat she loses credibility by pulling such a low-minded trick. Just imagine an article about the original Mother Jones that mentioned an unrelated murder in the first paragraph. It's hard to imagine.

The majority of the article reads like a soap opera. She talks more about the personalities of those involved rather than the issues at hand. In over 6000 words she never discusses any of the numerous issues men face for more than a sentence. That is remarkable.

It is also remarkable how she fails to mention the important work being done by A Voice for Men. And of course, she fails to mention that a good portion of those at that site and who presented at the 1st International Conference on Men's Issues in Detroit last June were women. Women who see the flagrant bigotry that Blake prefers to simply ignore. This might be more excusable if Blake had a short deadline but that was not the case. She has spent hours and hours, weeks and even months interviewing people about this and is totally aware of the issues at hand (including the workplace death issue) but has consciously chosen to not bring them up.

That wouldn't go so well with her personal misandrist theme of haters and trolls.

I think a better name for this magazine might be Mother Dworkin.

#Equality

AVfM Video Source · 29 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Neel Kolhatkar is very funny. We especially liked this one for obvious reasons:

The clock is ticking on male suicide...

Peter Wright · 30 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is also available in Portuguese.

The most recent data from the World Health Organization[1] reveals that an estimated 804 000 suicide deaths occurred worldwide in 2012, representing an annual global suicide rate of 11.4 per 100 000 population. However, since suicide is a sensitive issue, and even illegal in some countries, it is likely under-reported and, in countries with good vital registration data, suicide may often be misclassified as an accident or another cause of death. Due to these factors, death by suicide is likely closer to 1.2 million cases annually.[2]

As most readers here will know, men are vastly overrepresented in this sombre data.

As most readers will also know, the establishment is doing its darnedest to omit the prevalence of male suicide from its rhetoric, as Steve Brulé described so well in his 2013 article about male suicide reporting in the media. Here's an excerpt from his article describing the sins of omission:

> If suicide is to be addressed effectively, it needs to be understood. That means openly talking about victim demographics; who they are and why they commit suicide, for starters. And yet even on World Suicide Prevention Day, the media chose to be evasive about the truth.The CTV news piece about World Suicide Prevention Day mentioned the many suicide cohorts, the complexities of suicide, that individuals have differing motives, that differences occur within each age group. In fact they went to considerable trouble to touch on these complexities.
>
> But the CTV commentators avoided the single biggest and most significant statistic surrounding suicide: Male victims outnumber female victims 4 to 1. Almost everyone knows this fact, and this statistic only represents the confirmed deaths by suicide. The true number of male suicides is likely much higher: men drink themselves to death, essentially self-medicating to avoid intolerable emotional pain, and men engage in extremely risky behavior, often leading to premature "accidental" death as a form of distraction from the reality of their lives.
>
> Most of the website posts that I found about World Suicide Prevention Day also deliberately avoided the fact that suicide disproportionately affects males, for example here, and on Wikipedia. The Centre for Addiction and Mental Health goes so far as to mention Teens, Soldiers, and Aboriginal Communities as having disproportionately high rates of suicide. But no mention of Males as a cohort group.
>
> Not even Suicide Prevention Canada mentions the extraordinary fact that suicide is completed mostly by males, even though the statistical significance of the male suicide rate is so great that "being male" should be added to the list of risk factors for suicide.
>
> But the opposite is happening. This truth is being minimized or even ignored, as if the male cohort is really not important. And that's the crux of the matter. It isn't important because, as courageous researchers like Warren Farrell and Michael Gilbert have shown, males are considered disposable in our culture.
>
> It's not that the suicide researchers are shy to point out special victim cohorts. The International Association for Suicide Prevention (IASP) lists several special interest groups and task forces including Suicidal Behaviour in Adolescents, Suicide and the Workplace, Suicide and the Media, Suicide in Older People, Suicide in Prisons. They simply refuse to consider "Suicide in Males" as a cohort; the single largest and statistically significant cohort within this entire topic. In fact I could not find any mention of the gender-disproportionate nature of suicide anywhere on the IASP website.
>
> This is the 20,000 ton elephant in the room: suicide is overwhelmingly committed by males. Why is that? The media in our culture have no reservations about identifying a male cohort when identification is negative, like crime or violence, or even creating false negative images of males, like men are clumsy, insensitive, less > capable parents, or even promoting the discredited assertion that perpetrators of domestic violence are almost exclusively male. But when males are the overwhelming victims, that topic suddenly becomes gender-neutral, or even reversed using some twisted assertion like when Hillary Clinton claimed that "women have always been the primary victims of war."

>
> The only site I found that has the courage to state the truth about male suicide up front and center was the UK government, which openly states that suicide is the leading cause of death in young men.
>
> The American Foundation for Suicide Prevention (AFSP) leads with the neutral statement that "90% of people who die by suicide have a diagnosable and treatable psychiatric disorder at the time of their deaths." Dig into their website and you will read that 4 times as many males than females commit suicide but this next statistic is particularly revealing: as a race, white people have the highest incidence of suicide, higher than Native Americans by a considerable margin. At first glance this is surprising, because most people believe that Native Americans have a suicide problem. But the hard cold fact is: the cohort group with highest incidence of suicide in North America, and possibly the world, is White Males, the very same group that feminists claim are oppressing everyone else.

A Voice for Men has run many articles about suicide among males, and highlighted many of the contributing factors – not least of which is the global misandric culture that leads men to feeling their lives are worth naught.

To continue raising awareness about this issue, we have added a suicide clock to the homepage this website to highlight the global incidence of male suicide and, in the process, remind yellow journalists, academics and governments to devote more energy to the problem.

To that end here are a few working basics for the figures we have used to set the clock:

1. Gender Disparity in Suicide:

Despite the wide variability in rates, there is a consistently higher rate of suicide among men than among women, with men more often dying by suicide at a ratio of 3:1–7.5:1.[3]

The World Health Organization states that every 40 seconds[4] a suicide occurs globally. A 2002 study found a slightly higher rate of one suicide globally every 20 seconds,[5] or 180 per hour. Dividing the suicide frequency by the conservative male/female ratio of 3:1, the frequency of male suicide is approximately 135 incidents per hour or one every 26.6 seconds.

2. Rate of Suicide Increasing:

The data maintained by the WHO suggest that the global rate of suicide has increased each decade since 1950, especially for men.[5]

[Table 1] A global perspective in the epidemiology of suicide. Suicidology. (2002)[3]

3. Trend Since 1950:

Based on the above table there have occurred a staggering 25,000,000 male suicides to-date.

Between 1950 (the start date of the suicide clock) and 2002 male suicides increased by 49 percent,[5] and data-based projections suggest that the number of suicides will again increase by 50 percent between 2002 and 2030.[6]

While this data is not perfect, it is the best we currently have. If anyone can provide more up-to-date and comprehensive data, we welcome it and will gladly adjust the clock and update the information on this page.

We hope readers will take this clock more seriously than they take the national debt clock in the United States, and take seriously the many preventable issues highlighted by AVfM -reversible cultural issues- that contribute to male suicide..

Sources:

[1] World Health Organization, Preventing suicide: A global imperative. (2014)
[2] Meier, Marshall B. Clinard, Robert F. Sociology of deviant behavior (2011)
[3] Matthew K. Nock, Guilherme Borges, Suicide and Suicidal Behavior. Epidemiol Rev. (2008)
[4] World Health Organization, Preventing suicide: A global imperative. (2014)
[5] Bertolote JM, Fleischmann A. A global perspective in the epidemiology of suicide. Suicidology. (2002)
[6] Mathers CD, Loncar D. Projections of global mortality and burden of disease from 2002 to 2030. (2006)

Feature image by Cristian V

How Mychal Denzel Smith gets Ray Rice (& Ishmael Reed) all wrong

Mumia Ali · 30 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

> "When you go looking for the truth, be prepared to find it."
>
> -African Proverb

In my previous column, I took up the question of Black male feminist Mr. Byron Hurt, and presented a little publicly acknowedged but nevertheless very well known truth in Black America: that abuse, be it verbal, psychological, emotional or indeed physical, is hardly the sole preserve of Black men – Black women are well represented among the abuser ranks of American life, and have been for decades.

Mr. Paul Elam's initial article on Hurt, which my own was a followup to, referenced the term "Panda Bear" and several times suggested that Mr. Hurt was equal parts supplicant to and useful idiot of, the Black Feminist Machine – and rightly so. For Black America – and to put a finer point on it, that part of Black America one might regard as Bougie – has, for quite some time now, produced a small but somewhat influential cabal of Ebony White Knights, also known as Simps, Panda Bears and downright AFCs – ostensible "Good Black Men(TM)" – who fancy themselves full of empathy, sensitivity and self-righteousness, along with a mighty quaff of Critical Race Theory. Seeing themselves as the allies to the Black Feminist Lobby, they have taken up the sword against their own brothers, other Black men, in an effort to reeducate us as to the sundried and varied grievances of Black women far and wide.

Enter one Mr. Mychal Denzel Smith, token Black man in residence at popular Miss Ann hangout Feministing, home of Ms. Jessica Valenti, and part of the stable holding forth over at The Nation, home of Prof. Melissa Harris Perry. Smith has been diligently doing his part to hold Black men everywhere responsible for all that ails Black America on a whole, forever attempting to hold the Sistahood down. In one of his most recent pieces for Feministing, Smith makes the case that Black Lit fixture, Mr. Ishmael Reed, totally gets the Ray Rice issue wrong, by misunderstanding where Smith is coming from on the matter. Perhaps. But, last time I checked, Mr. Reed has the right to express his take on Smith's rendering of events surrounding Rice, right or wrong; and, since we're keeping score here, it occurs to your correspondent, that Reed isn't the only one who seemingly can't keep his facts straight.

For starters, Smith continues to do the very thing he charges Black men writ large do to Black women en masse: refuse to listen to them. Mrs. Janay Rice has repeatedly gone on the record in stating that she was just as much to blame for what went down in that Atlantic City elevator on Valentine's Day weekend last year, as Mr. Ray Rice himself; she has repeatedly taken to social media and the straight-ahead news media, to voice her outrage at the way her husband has been treated, not just by the NFL and the Baltimore Ravens organizations, but by the general public at large. I guess that whole hashtag thing about believing all women only works until they happen to say something that goes against the pre-approved feminist narrative, huh?

Secondarily, with regard to Mr. Reed's supposed more than three-decades-running "mad on" with Ms. Alice Walker's "The Color Purple": again, he makes a highly legitimate point. It is rare to find Black Lit written by Black female writers, where the Black male leads in general, are good guys, or even just average everymen; rather, they tend not just to have foibles, but they have them to such an extent that they represent the utter worst of humanity.

This is a standard trope that does indeed make dollars – the bestselling novel went on to win both a Pulitzer and a National Book Award, and the film adaptation based on it made a whopping $142M USD on a meager $15M USD budget, had for all intents an all-star cast, was directed by one of Hollywood's biggest names in the business, and was musically scored by one of the biggest names in popular music in the past century. On top of all of that, the film garnered nearly a dozen Academy Award nominations.

It would seem, that Mr. Reed's observations are not without merit.

For anyone out there reading this who may consider themselves to be skeptical of Reed's arguments or my citation of the facts which support it, consider this thought experiment:

Switch the places of the people in The Color Purple, essentially making the Black women in the story the bad guys, and the Black men the good guys, and ask yourself seriously, if the result would get anywhere near the level of accolade and acclaim. Indeed, the record shows, as I've discussed previously in an article about Hip Hop music and particularly Tupac's role in it, that Black women are particularly sensitive – and vociferous – about any critique about them artistically on the part of Black men. Moreover, Tupac's best-selling album of his career, the classic All Eyez On Me, has never won or was even nominated for a Grammy Award, the music business' highest honor, despite its indisputable status as a landmark album that influenced a generation of musicians. Meanwhile there are scores of books and films, who have made big bank and won major laurels who were created by Black women, and which either directly or implicitly, cast Black men as a whole, in a not so flattering light.

Think on that for a moment.

Now, at this point, one could rightly ask the question as to whether Mr. Reed is only suffering from Sour Grapes hatin', since Ms. Walker's classic work has proven much more successful than anything he's done; fair enough. But, even if one were to accept that premise, it is hard to see how that obviates the facts as laid out above. Being a putative hater, doesn't preclude one's ability to observe the truth.

Moving on to Mr. Smith's other point, about the protests that took place in the wake of the shooting of young Michael Brown in Ferguson, MO: yes, it is true that Black women turned out in support of Brown; but what Smith conveniently leaves out, is that scores of Black men also turned out in support of Brown. So, it is patently dishonest on Smith's part to present the matter as if it were Black women, and Black women alone, who were out there representing for young Mr. Brown. It is not so.

And since Mr. Smith wants to cite Ms. Feminista Jones' piece that ran in Time magazine online in the wake of the Rice issue, to paraphrase Paul Harvey, let's hear the rest of the story – taken from my previous piece on the ordeal that Mr. Jorge Pena suffered at the hands of Ms. Danay Howard:

> "Even diehard Black Feminists of the likes of Ms. Feminista Jones, has admitted that violence in the Black community is hardly as "gendered" (read: done only by Black Men) as many of her ilk would have the rest of us believe. I quote from her own column appearing in Time magazine earlier this Fall:
>
> "Researchers have also found that Black women report feeling more obligated to fight back than to report abuse and that is reflected in the disproportionate rates of DV/IPV reported by Black men. Our attempts to embody the "strong Black woman" stereotype have often done more harm than good, to us and those we love."
>
> Of course, Feminists of every color, remain utterly silent in the face of daily occurances of real street harassment and assault taking place in our country's public spaces on the part of largely Black Women; as we all know by now, the Social Justice Warrior crowd is more motivated by "Who, Whom?" than by anything resembling fairness or the facts." (Jones' quote bookended by quotes of my own from the original article)

Notice how, for all their preening and self-congratulatory manner, Black feminists, be it Feminista Jones or Brittney Cooper, or Byron Hurt or Mychal Denzel Smith, never, ever, discusses the fact that Black women can be and often are as abusive as any (Black) man – and in some ways, in some cases, much moreso. To let them tell it, Black women are angelic creatures, who can never do any wrong, and are composed of the same stuff as the Power Puff Girls: sugar and spice, everything nice, and some mysterious Chemical X. In so doing, and far from being the purveyors of "social justice" they claim to be, it is people like these who hobble Black women and by extension Black people on a whole, by placing Black women on a pedestal and infantilizing them, instead of seeing them for who they are: Human and adult, with all the potentials and capacities for good and bad therein.

Aside from their obsequiousness, the other thing that really bothers me about the Ebony White Knight crowd, is their insularity – these are people who tend to come from the cloistered intellectual ghettos of high university society, where cockamamie “theories” about Race and Class are spun, and are rarely if ever put to the acid test out on the streets in real time. This explains how and why you rarely see them out there actually interacting with everyday Black folk. In fact it’s hard not to notice how little they talk to such salt of the earth Black folk, the ones they supposedly speak for.

Finally, as for the contention on the part of Black feminists that the interests of Black women are somehow always subordinate to Black men – if you can’t see how utterly foolish such a statement is in the light of the most basic of facts, then yeah, Mychal, you most definitely need to stand to the side.

Where do all the female bullies go?

Mark Dent · 30 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I have often wondered how any person of intelligence and integrity could make statements like the one I heard Caroline Criado-Perez make in her television "debate" with Mike Buchanan. She said 96% of all violence was perpetrated by men.

If I had never read an article, let alone a book on the subject of domestic violence I would instinctively have known this statement was pure bullshit. In fact that is something I understood innately when my personal journey as a men's rights supporter began some 25 years ago.

In the early nineties, in my home state of Victoria, there was a serious and relentless attack on men under the heading "The War on Women" in one of our major daily newspapers (The Age) which featured a series of articles purporting to lift the lid on the unspeakable atrocities men were perpetrating upon their women folk behind closed doors. These articles were promoted on large banners outside the local news agency and I can still remember seriously considering ripping them out of the wire grills they sat behind but I somehow controlled my rage and entered the shop. I looked at the stack of papers calling men violent, oppressors and I vividly recall looking about the store at the other men who casually picked up their copy along with a magazine or packet of gum and wanting to shake them and scream,

"That's you and me they are writing about!"

Of course, I simply swallowed the bile in my throat and purchased my own copy with my heart pounding in righteous indignation.

I cannot begin to explain how personally I took those articles–I literally lay awake at night struggling to contain the seething anger I felt about this seemingly endless barrage of male demonization. All of the male friends and relatives in my life were compassionate, considerate, funny and supportive-not a monster among them! I began writing letters and arguing with people at dinner parties and other social gatherings. The "One Good Man" syndrome was at its peak back then with so many blokes willing to nod solemnly as they sipped their chardonnay and talk about the disgraceful statistics which condemned their fellow man (but never them, you understand.)

I would tell them how ridiculous the statistics were and no person with intelligence could take them seriously. The headshaking would continue and I was told I was in denial.

At the time this series of articles began I was recovering from a serious illness and so I spent a good deal of time watching television. Phil Donohue, Sally Jesse Raphael and Oprah seemed to feature a man-bashing segment every day. There seemed to be no escape from this notion that men were a problematic species which needed to be dissected and analysed by females or males who saw their careers were dependent upon feeding the insatiable hunger for victimhood their female audiences craved. They all spoke as if the very idea that females could be capable of violent behaviour, be it physical or emotional was absurd and unworthy of any consideration.

Why did I keep watching these shows when they literally had me screaming at my TV and punching the cushions on my couch? I felt I had to understand the enemy in order to fight them.
I wrote countless poems to vent the outrage I felt. If not for the poetry I think I may have imploded. Here's an example:

Daily Dissection
Analysing, probing
Endless monologues examining
The many weaknesses and vices
Attributable to only one species
Man.It is a daily revelation to a one legged man

Who just happened to stumble, through unforeseen circumstances into this hostile, alien territory.
The radio talk back assails the listeners
With mouth watering subjects
Which so often focus
On the problem with men
Advertisements patronise and belittle them
Television gorges upon the mute,
Inarticulate volunteers
Who offer themselves up
For sacrifice,
Upon the altar of Sally Jesse Raphael
Or Oprah
The gentle sex shriek their shrill accusations
And whine in unison
At the vulnerable men
Placed before them
They ooze self confidence
And superiority
Safe with their sisters
Knowing innately
That women are good
And men-a problem to be solved, eliminated
Or dismissed with a sneer

As I read about the "oppression of women in Australia" I would look out of my lounge room window and watch the women playing tennis on the courts across the road. They laughed and squealed in delight as they played–no men were to be seen during the day. They were at work.

On occasions when I felt strong enough I would venture down to the local shopping centre. Everywhere I looked I saw women buying items for themselves, having a coffee with their girlfriends or having their toenails painted in a salon and I seethed. The reality of my daily life bore no resemblance to the supposed horrors women were meant to be enduring-horrors I was watching or reading about in the media on a daily basis.

Then not long ago a couple of articles on bullying by women and girls appeared in the Herald Sun. They compelled me to stop and ask a question. I spoke it out loud even though I was alone at the time.

"What becomes of these female bullies when they go home at the end of a day?"

Both articles on bullying had females as the major (or only) protagonists. The first was titled, "Bullying at the Gate" and concerned the violent abuse and threats Victorian mothers are directing at other mums at their kids' school.

Victorian mothers are receiving counselling to help them cope with bullying, intimidation and even threats of violence from other mothers at their kids' school.

Oscar Yildiz, CEO of Bully Zero Australia Foundation, said his organisation was receiving calls from mums being bullied by other mothers.

"I had one mother ring me and tell me that she wanted to 'punch the daylights' out of another mother," he said.

According to author, Debbie Rossi, "Some of the mums avoid getting out of their cars because they don't want to see other mums." Her book is titled "Beyond the Schoolyard: End the Bullying Forever."

Rossi thinks some mums feel judged by what they wear or what car they drive and how their children behave. This in turn leads to violent threats and bullying.

So, I wonder, what are these mums like when they are behind closed doors at home? It defies logic to suggest that a woman who is abusive and violent at her child's school during pick up time would revert to being a gentle easy going, conflict averse person at home where no-one but the hubby and kids bear witness to their behaviour.

Two days later another headline caught my eye: "Bullies on Rampage: One in three face school threats."

This survey showed:

Victorians from Year 7 to 9 show girls consistently report higher rates of being bullied than boys. The trend is especially pronounced when phones or the internet are involved.

More than 20% (of girls) reported being cyber bullied compared with 12.3% of boys. Rates of recent traditional bullying victimisation were 35.4% and 29.3% respectively.

The research was published in the Journal of Interpersonal Violence.

Again I ask the question: What becomes of these girls who take delight in tormenting others either emotionally or physically? Do they become empathic, compassionate and supportive human beings or do their devious, spiteful, bullying natures simply evolve into less obvious but just as hurtful and damaging behaviour in their adult relationships?

Most of us know very well from simple observation and daily interactions with people that no gender has a monopoly on the more noble or less savoury human qualities. We see backstabbing, power hungry, ego driven males and females in the workplace. We encountered nasty, hard hearted bullies, some boys, some girls in our formative years and many have endured volatile, abusive relationships with a member of the opposite sex. Knowing this makes the very deliberate silencing of any attempt to draw attention to the fact that both genders can and do behave in an abusive, harmful manner, unforgivable.

When I think back to those earlier years when the "War On Women" theme was rampant I still hold many of the men I knew in contempt. These articles on bullying girls and women tell us nothing we didn't already know. Those weak bastards were happy to sell their brothers down the drain for the sheer pleasure of having women look at them with warm approval rather than the hostile aggression I was occasionally subjected to for daring to suggest women were capable of violence and abuse or that the vast majority of men were good people.

Having recently reacquainted myself with a checklist provided by The Domestic Violence Prevention Centre Gold Coast which informs girls/women about what behaviour constitutes domestic abuse these two articles seem very pertinent.

Before I provide you with a few samples from the checklist you must understand that every question is framed with the man as perpetrator and the woman as victim.

> Emotional Abuse
>
> Does he call you names or make you feel bad about the way you look?
>
> Does he degrade your self worth by constantly putting you down?
>
> Physical abuse
>
> Has he ever pushed shoved, slapped, pinched, punched or physically hurt you?
>
> Using Male Privilege
>
> Does he insist on making all the big decisions?
>
> Does he see himself as always right?
>
> Using Coercion and Threats

> Has he ever threatened to leave you?
>
> Has he threatened to hurt your children, friends, family members or pets?
>
> Using the children
>
> Has he told you that you would lose custody or never see the children again?

I could go on for a page or more but I think you have the general idea. What a truly Orwellian world we live in today. How could any person with integrity post such bigoted information on an official website? This website is meant to be fighting the scourge of domestic violence yet could make no mention of one half of the world's population in any role other than evil perpetrator.

All of us could think of females who would tick the boxes on many of the questions contained in the DV survey.

The two articles in the Herald Sun demonstrate the sheer bewildering bigotry of the domestic violence industry in a manner which leaves no room for debate. Bullying, violence and abuse are something human beings do. It is a form of behaviour which can no more be attributed to one gender than the capacity we all have to love, protect and nurture others.

I would like to have my question answered:What becomes of these vicious women and vindictive schoolgirls when they go home and close the door behind them?

Links

[Editor's Note: The Herald Sun articles cited in this article are not available online for linking. There is a site by the Herald Sun which allows access to digital copies of actual printed papers for viewing at a fee. This can be found at http://heraldsun.newspaperdirect.com/epaper/viewer.aspx but a subscription will apply]

[Editor's Note: Mark Dent also brought to our attention an article which highlights a similar problem in the UK.]

http://www.dailymail.co.uk/femail/article-1282049/The-school-gates-hell-Bullying-backbiting-tears-No-that s-children-school-run-mums-says-battle-scarred-victim.html

When did you wake up? With Erin Pizzey: Karen Woodall of Family Separation Clinic

AVfM Radio · 31 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Update: Show archive now available!

"When did you wake up?" with Erin Pizzey and Dean Esmay this week features updates on WhiteRibbon.org including her latest article on Malignant Mothers. Then we'll talk with our guest, Karen Woodall, a family therapist and alienation expert. Karen is with the UK's Family Separation Clinic, which "brings together a range of independent professionals with backgrounds in family therapy, child and adolescent psychiatry, social work, dispute resolution and family law." We'll ask about how Woodall came to practice in this area and strategies she and her group use to address the problems caused by divorce and related issues like alienation.

Join us Saturday, Jauary 17, 2015, at noon U.S. Central Time, 6pm London Time, on A Voice for Men on Live365.

Amy Geliebter, typical cowardly censorship-loving feminist thug

AVfM Video Source · 31 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Another feminist is at it again, using the fascist tactic of censorship because someone dared question her ideology or criticize her point of view.

SkepTorr recently became another in a long line of victims of fascist feminist censorship, this time usng phony DMCA (copyright) claims on YouTube.

SkepTorr fortunately is doing the smart thing and disputing this bogus claim. While we wait for YouTube to hopefully do the right thing and issue the thuggish Amy Geliebter a strike for abusing the system, we now present to you the video she didn't want you to see:

http://archive.avoiceformen.com/video/chasing-amy.mp4
Her claim of copyright violation is completely without merit legally or ethically. Her no doubt soon to follow BS claim of "harassment" will also be without merit, when clearly the only "harasser" here is Amy Geliebter.

But guess what Amy? By filing your abusive phony DMCA claim, you just made yourself more famous–as a flaming jerk and an intellectual bully and coward. And if you write to us and try to make claims of copyright or "harassment," we will be happy to explain why your claim is not only without merit, but why it also makes you a flaming jackass.

Tip: you might want to Google "Streisand Effect" for future reference.

Amy Geliebter is not the first feminist to use this bogus censorship tactic, on YouTube or elsewhere. Phony legal claims, ploys of "damsel in distress," phony claims of stalking or harassment, and generally crying like a whiny little bitch are all typical feminist tactics we know very well. But we're going to do our best to see that it stops here, because in the future when we see this thuggish behavior we're going to do the same thing: when feminists censor people, we will do our best to alert the world as to what they're doing and show you the material they don't want you to see.

Feminism is a hate movement, and Amy Geliebter just helps prove it.

A fight for male space: the Australian Men's Shed movement

Syd Jones (aka Shrek6) · 31 January 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I'd like to introduce you to the Australian Men's Shed movement, starting with some background.

It's rumoured that Men's Sheds started sometime during the 1990s, and officially started around the middle of the 1990s, with a steady growth as the years have rolled on.

However, this start date may not be strictly correct, but it's very difficult to find any information proving otherwise. So I'm hoping that some of my Aussie brothers who read this may be able to give me some correction and assistance in establishing a better start date.

The idea of having a place for men to congregate, to communicate and to care for each other freely without judgement, was initiated first by Australian Vietnam Veterans. Again, I cannot find a date for this, no matter what I type into Google. So I'm hoping some Aussie Vietnam Vets might know the dates and facts around these gatherings and can enlighten us.

A lot of these men were treated like criminals and especially rejected by the Returned Soldiers League in Australia, upon their return. It has taken a long time for them to be treated with even a modicum of respect, and before I go any further with this article I would like to make a short personal statement regarding my Brothers who fought in Vietnam:

I would like to say here officially. Thank you to all those men who were forced to go fight a dirty war that we should have never been in, in the first place. It was not your fault, because you were under orders. I feel privileged to be in your company. Your sacrifice and the sacrifice of the Brothers you (and we) lost while in battle, is not lost on me. So I thank you!

Now back to the article!

The Vietnam Vets were going away on retreat camps to escape society, so they could just spend time freely among their own, without the pressures of a judgemental society hanging over their shoulders. This was happening in the 1980s, when I remember seeing reports on TV about it. When it was that they decided to 'urbanise' their meeting places, is another fact I cannot find.

Being proven such an efficacious program for our Vets and a huge help to lonely men, such fraternal gatherings soon took hold within the general population of men. Which brings us back to the mid-1990s and the emergence of Men's Sheds.

This Wiki page gives a very basic overview of what happened in the mid-1990s with the formal establishment of the movement. I am loathe to use Wiki, but it does summarise some points I think are pertinent to this discussion.

The Wiki page also gives you a good idea of the negative impact on the Men's Shed movement by other community organisations and the governments in each state, which is a direct negative effect of Gynocentrism. There was not necessarily any direct government ruling or use of laws per se, but funding grants and removal of red tape, usually came with strings attached. If the Men's Sheds agreed to allow 'Community' involvement, which is PC speak for allowing women in to the Sheds, they would receive the funding.

Indeed this did happen to our Shed when we applied for a funding grant, but so far we have resisted having women. I know however that the clock is ticking!

I have to say here that very little would have happened without the funding, so we are all very grateful for this. It just would have been more beneficial to men if the Sheds could remain for men only and that the grants didn't have strings attached.

There is no escaping the pressure to restrict men having any place of their own without any women as members or any female involvement within the organising or controlling Committees.

Many Sheds started off as men only, but were soon taken over by women. All you need is a few 'White Knights' on the Committee with enough numbers to take control, then they introduce women into the membership and the numbers of men dwindle quickly, with their vacancies taken up by women.
In my own region, recently there was an ad in the local newspaper for an expression of interest for any women who would like to start up a group similar to the Men's Shed. I saw the ad as a foreboding and ominous cloud looming in the distance.

From what I know they have had little to no interest. What worries me is that one day when these women find out just how wonderful our facilities are, they will have jealous designs upon this prize and will seek to usurp control over it. We will, however, fight this for as long as we can!

At this point in the article, I would like to introduce you to the Australian Men's Shed Association (AMSA).

The Association was established in 2007, and "At the 2nd National Mens Shed Conference in Manly during September 2007, Professor Barry Golding, Men's Shed researcher from the University of Ballarat, stated in his key note address that "Men don't talk face to face they talk shoulder to shoulder". This drew unanimous mutterings of approval from all 350 delegates and the quote became the Australian Men's Shed Associations motto."

If you visit the above website, I recommend you spend a fair amount of time looking around it because it's very informative and has a lot of tools to aid in setting up a new Men's Shed. I'm almost certain that they will assist men in other countries with starting up their own Sheds too.

At our Shed we are members of AMSA, because it gives us many opportunities and benefits, like cheap liability insurance. This is something all Sheds must have and if you have established an association with a fairly large membership of functioning viable Sheds, then you can hunt around for an insurance company that will give discounted insurance to the Association and its members. It is a community project, so insurance companies will often help out organisations such as these with cheap insurance policies.

From the AMSA website you can see all sorts of programs for men that you can put in place within your own Shed, or simply think of your own. The only requisite for membership to a Men's Shed is that you are a man. Race, colour, creed, is never under consideration, because within the Shed we are all Brothers!

As for what happens within your Shed, it's entirely up to the membership. Just like here at AVfM, if you want something to happen or change then stick your hand up and be a part of the solution. Otherwise, just shut up!

The Meeting Room

Finally, I would like to speak a little about the most integral part of a Men's Shed. This is the Meeting Room.

The Meeting Room is by far the most important part of the facility. And that room, may very well start off being a backyard shed.

Yes men like to 'do things together,' where they can chat at the same time. This actually suits some men more because most men seem to be more comfortable opening up, if they have a problem, when they have something else to do at the same time which can be used as a circuit breaker if the troubled man is feeling a bit too vulnerable. He can stop the conversation at any time and go about the job without feeling embarrassed or judged in any way at all.

However, the greatest benefit to all men is gained in the time spent just being together talking about the week they just had, or about the idiots in government, or how the latest football match went, etc, etc and on goes the subject matter. There is absolutely none of this sitting around in a circle crying about your problems and taking your turn to say how bad your feelings are hurt. If ever a Shed did do that they would have very few members.

Men are not women!

And because men are not women we have different ways of dealing with problems.

One of those ways is we have experts come in to give us talks on subjects that, as a group, we have decided we would like to know a bit more about. And yes it can be of a psychological and emotional nature. If you have an expert there doing the talking and giving the information out in pamphlets, you can go home armed with some very good info and then decide for yourself whether you do anything about it. And believe me this does happen, because we have had guys close to the edge in our Shed, but now they are fully functioning and very healthy men. And it happened because they were given the right information and the support from other members.

As some of you know I get a bit emotional when talking about how good men are. I am easily aroused into anger when I see the innocence of men attacked and vilified, but I am always pleasantly surprised by just how charitable and caring most men are. The surprise is not there because it is out of the ordinary. It comes to me because I see these men openly caring for others even though they know they will be judged and criticised in the public arena.

In the Shed, when one of our elder members comes in the door, there are always men ready to assist him to his chair and a cuppa is provided for him.

I would like to add a quote here from the William Kibby VC Veterans' Shed (South Australia), which sums up nicely why the Sheds should exist:

> "Good health is based on many factors including feeling good about yourself, being productive and valuable to your community, connecting to friends and maintaining an active body and an active mind. Becoming a member of a Men's Shed gives a man that safe and busy environment where he can find many of these things in an atmosphere of old-fashioned mateship. And, importantly, there is no pressure. Men can just come and have a yarn and a cuppa if that is all they're looking for.
>
> Members of Men's Sheds come from all walks of life – the bond that unites them is that they are men with time on their hands and they would like something meaningful to do with that time.
>
> Because men don't make a fuss about their problems, these problems have consistently been either ignored or swept under the mat by both our health system and our modern society.
>
> It's time for a change and the Men's Shed movement is one of the most powerful tools we have in helping men to once again become valued and valuable members of our community."

Women for too long have claimed the moral high ground on charity and caring when the fact is most of this has always been facilitated by men. It is men who have instituted and run most of the charities that exist, be they community organisations or religious. The Men's Shed Movement is yet another area where the kindness and charity of men is so very evident, acting as a portal of community care and service.

For the sake of men's health and wellbeing the Men's Shed Movement must expand and fight for its independence from the interference of government, women and opposing community groups.

Thank you for reading this article. I do hope you consider starting up your own Sheds. I am very happy to answer any questions if I can. Most of what I know is what we have done in starting up our own Shed and I'm happy to share what I've learned.

Houston, we have a solution

Paul Elam · 1 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is also available in Swedish.

It is with great pleasure that I get to announce that AVFM has secured a venue for the International Conference on Men's Issues 2015, set for October 29, 30 and 31 in my hometown of Houston, Texas.

Houston, for those of you who don't know, is the fourth largest city in the United States. Once known as "Boomtown" during the explosive growth of the oil and gas industry in the late 1970's and early 1980's, Houston is a sprawling expanse of metropolitan real estate with a multicultural, blue collar ethos. It is the "working man's" capital of Texas, and I would dare say most of the country.

Visitors will love the town because it is modern and spacious, with robust nightlife and a spectacular, unsung culinary experience.

It will make a fantastic setting for a men's conference that promises to run a bit smoother than last year's.

And speaking of last year, we have taken our lessons to heart. First, those who attended our groundbreaking event in St. Clair Shores, MI will find that the new venue is several steps up in comfort and aesthetic appeal.

In approaching the venue, we laid our cards entirely on the table with management. We told them about the venue change last year, why it happened, and told them to expect that book burners would undoubtedly be in contact with them prior to the event trying to intimidate them into pulling the plug.

We pulled no punches in this face-to-face meeting. Their response? All I can say is that Houston and Detroit are two very different cities. They have pledged to see this through with us because they support good business and free speech.

We offered, and they accepted an agreement that we would not advertise the exact venue till the last week before the conference. I think it was a fair offer because while ideological thugs don't care in the least who they bully as long as they can shut down the free expression of ideas, we have no intention of putting venue management in their line of fire for months before the event.

In short, they have pledged to stand behind us. We are pledging to stand behind them.

What I can tell you without revealing too much is that the venue is in most ways perfect for what we need, and will make your entire conference experience a huge step up from last year.

I can also say that ticket purchases, registration, meal and transportation options and every other part of your conference experience will be much smoother and more sophisticated than last year. David King has been working hard to make sure that happens by applying his technical wizardry to enhance your comfort.

Tickets will go on sale here on April 2, 2015, with pricing yet to be determined.

Prior to that, a more formal announcement will be posted listing speakers and topics for the event. In it you will see some familiar names from the last event, and many more new speakers that will address a variety of issues that put the red in the red pill. A website for ICMI is also being built where you will be able to purchase tickets, sign on to a mailing list and get the latest updates on conference news.

So, if you need to make arrangements for time off and travel, now is the time to start. Feel free to post questions in the comments, and we will answer any that don't compromise our security measures and our agreement with the venue.

And be prepared to show up! 2014, with all its ups and downs, was a pivotal year for the MHRM. The social justice warriors know it, too. That is why they have come out scared and swinging wildly in 2015.

We are happy as pigs in mud at the prospect of watching them wear themselves out swinging at thin air this year. Detroit taught us valuable lessons. One look at Mother Jones and we see that they have still learned nothing.

So that is it, folks, ICMI 15 is on the way, in the land of Tex-Mex, barbeque and moon landings. This year, we will take the jubilation of last year's conference and amplify it ten fold.

Vladek Filler files suit due to false allegations

Robert Franklin · 1 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Vladek Filler has filed a Civil Rights lawsuit due to false allegations of assault during his Child Custody case.

It's not unusual to find the criminal justice system utilized against one parent or another in family court. After all, criminal courts often adjudicate claims of domestic violence that are then used to come between a parent and a child.

Even now the State of Florida seems poised to settle a civil suit brought by a father who claims a Tallahassee Police Department officer threatened to arrest him if he didn't give up his daughter to her maternal aunt (Tallahassee Democrat, 1/13/15). The child's mother was serving five years in prison for a drug offense and had relinquished her rights to the child, but apparently sought to keep the girl from her father. That involved forging a document supposedly giving custody to the aunt. The sheriff's deputy was then engaged to help the aunt take the girl from her father, allegedly using threats of arrest and imprisonment. Eventually the father was able to have the girl returned to his care. If the settlement goes through, that little exercise in extra-legal child custody legerdemain will cost the taxpayers of the state $104,000.

Now comes Vladek Filler. His legal troubles with two counties in Maine, a couple of sheriffs, at least three prosecutors and various and sundry law enforcement officials are behind him, albeit not without a long fight. Way back in 2009, Filler was embroiled in custody battle with his then-wife Ligia over their two children. Ligia played the abuse card, including the claim that Vladek had raped her. Despite there being overwhelming evidence of her extreme emotional disturbance and his complete innocence, the criminal justice system swung into action against him.

That included, among many other things, suborning perjury, various violations of the code of ethics for prosecutors, various violations of the code of criminal procedure, falsified documents and the like. So egregious were the attempts by local prosecutors and law enforcement to convict Filler and deprive his children of his love and protection from their mother that ADA Mary Kellett became the first prosecutor in the history of the state to have her license to practice temporarily suspended.

And so dubious were Ligia Filler's allegations that, in the middle of the criminal proceedings against Vladek, he was given sole custody of his children. Remember, at the time he was accused of rape and battery. The family court saw through Ligia's claims and that she was far too disturbed to be trusted with children, but Kellett and the police were undaunted.

Despite the combined forces of two counties being deployed against him, Vladek eventually prevailed in court. He was acquitted of both major charges and convicted only of throwing water on his wife, a charge that was itself utterly without support except of course for Ligia's say-so. All the while maintaining custody of his children, he brought the state bar complaint that resulted in Kellett's temporary suspension. This past fall, Kellett's boss, District Attorney Carletta Bossano lost her bid for re-election likely in part because of the behavior of Kellett and others in her office in the Filler case. Kellett departed with her.

Now Filler is suing some 18 separate parties in the law enforcement community and prosecutors' offices, counties and townships for what he alleges to be their violations of his civil rights. Read about it here (Ellsworth American, 1/15/15).

> The 103-page document alleges that prosecutors and law enforcement officers withheld evidence during the discovery process preceding the trial despite repeated requests for that information by Filler's defense attorney. Filler additionally alleges that video and audio evidence was mishandled and, in some cases, was fraudulent or edited in ways favorable to the prosecution.
>
> The complaint lists 18 defendants. Among them are Hancock and Washington counties, their respective > former sheriffs William Clark and Donnie Smith; the city of Ellsworth and former Police Chief John DeLeo; and the town of Gouldsboro and former Police Chief Guy Wycoff as well as former District Attorney Michael Povich and members of his prosecutorial staff…

>
> In the lawsuit, Filler, through his attorney, Thomas Hallett of Hallett, Zerillo and Whipple, alleges Povich, while in office, established a policy of requiring defendants and their attorneys to obtain discovery through law enforcement officers instead of through the District Attorney's Office. Filler maintains this "policy or custom" violated state and federal law as well as his constitutional rights.
>
> Filler further alleges that "as part of an ongoing conspiracy," Kellett released false information to a media organization and directed two police officers to not produce documents subpoenaed by Filler's attorney.
>
> During their investigation of Filler, Kellett, "together with police, conspired to withhold exculpatory information, and falsified evidence, so that Filler could be wrongfully charged and wrongfully convicted of sexual assault," the complaint states.
>
> The allegations of falsified evidence involve photographs of the Filler home and information stored on the defendant's computer.
>
> Filler contends photographs of his home, where the alleged assaults occurred, that were presented during his 2009 trial were staged, illegally obtained and did not accurately depict the alleged crime scene.
>
> Filler's computer was seized in 2007 and sent to the Maine Computer Crime Task Force for analysis. According to the lawsuit, the task force found no pornography, violent images or anything illegal.
>
> Despite the task force report, Detective Steve McFarland of the District Attorney's Office began his own search of the computer using "invalid hidden files to browse the Internet from one webpage to another webpage until he managed to find violent or pornographic material" that never was viewed on Filler's computer, the complaint alleges.
>
> "Detective McFarland then printed out a stack of the most obscene and vulgar images he could find and Kellett submitted this fabricated evidence in to discovery as if it came from plaintiff's computer," the complaint states.
>
> The complaint also names a friend of Filler's ex-wife as a defendant. Linda Gleason, a registered nurse, is alleged to have "concocted" a plan along with the ex-wife where Filler would be falsely accused of sexual assault in an attempt to prevent Filler from gaining custody of their children during divorce proceedings.

Those of course are just the allegations. What's actually proven in court remains to be seen. But whatever the outcome, Vladek Filler is clearly not a man to be trifled with. He's continuing to stand up to a juggernaut and at every turn, when the dust has settled, it's been Filler who remains standing.

Grand jury can't even indict a William Paterson University ham sandwich

Pierce Harlan · 1 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial note: In the US, a Grand Jury is used to determine whether or not a person or persons will be formally indicted and therefore will go to trial for a crime. In other words, the Grand Jury decides whether you can even be put on trial; Grand Juries only need to determine that there's a reasonable basis to hold a trial or the matter is closed. They decide not whether the person is guilty or innocent; They only determine if there is a reasonable basis on which to even bother with a trial. An old, cynical saying is that prosecutors in the US can get a grand jury to indict a ham sandwich if they want to, i.e. grand juries almost never turn prosecutors down. Which makes the grand jury failure to even allow an indictment here all the more damning for those who called these men rapists.–DE

Unjustly accused men

A university president rushed to judgement by assuming a rape had occurred, but a grand jury says there is not even probable cause to indict the accused

The New Jersey University President needs to apologize for unjustly rushing to judgement in a case where five minority men were charged with rape.

Campus Incident

November 30, 2014

To the William Paterson University Community

On November 25, 2014, a sexual assault of a female student allegedly took place in a residential hall on our campus. Five male students who were living in the residence halls have been arrested and charged. As soon as the victim reported this incident, she was attended to by university counselors and police officers. All of the alleged perpetrators of this heinous crime have been barred from campus. Prosecution is being handled by the Passaic County Prosecutor's office and the university is fully cooperating in the prosecution.

I am angry and dismayed that this crime was committed on our campus and allegedly by students.

My deepest concern is for the victim of this criminal act who has courageously stepped forward to take legal action and seek justice. No expression of anger or sadness on my part can alleviate the harm done to the victim and my heart goes out to her and her family. I offer the full support of the University community.

William Paterson University - its students, faculty, staff, and board of trustees - is horrified by this alleged sexual assault. Our University is a place of learning and personal growth where individuals are respected. It is our responsibility to provide a safe environment for all its members and to be a campus where students can grow and thrive.

We are committed to ensuring that William Paterson University will always be a place where students feel safe and sound. This commitment extends from our classrooms to our residence halls and to everywhere on our campus.

Kathleen Waldron
President
William Paterson University

Click to enlarge

In late November of last year, five male students at William Paterson University were arrested and charged with sexually assaulting a woman in a residence hall. At the time, University President Kathleen Waldron said in a statement circulated to students and faculty that the men who were arrested were living in campus residence halls.

She noted: “I am angry and dismayed that this crime was committed on our campus and allegedly by students.” Waldron added: “My deepest concern is for the victim of this criminal act who has courageously stepped forward to take legal action and seek justice. No expression of anger or sadness on my part can alleviate the harm done to the victim and my heart goes out to her and her family.” (The actual statement — which is no longer on the school’s website — is posted here). The statement does not mention the names of the accused, and it says the crime was “allegedly” committed by students, but the men’s names were identified in the news, and it was very easy to infer that if, indeed, this brutal crime occurred (and Waldron’s statement made clear that it did), that these five young minority men had to be the perpetrators.

This week, after hearing evidence for a day, a grand jury — using the probable cause standard (the same as used in college campus sex hearings) declined to indict the young men. Defense counsel praised the prosecutor — a woman named Lisa Squitieri — for doing a fair job. Ron Ricci, an attorney for one of the students, said this: “The facts demonstrated that this was not a sexual assault, and the actions of those young men were not in violation of the law. It clearly wasn’t a crime.”

But Mr. Ricci criticized “damaging statements” made by the college’s administrators that, he said, made it seem the defendants were guilty. “It was outrageous that these young men had to go through the publicity they had to go through,” Ricci said.

Attorney, Laura Sutnick, who represents one of the young men, said the men received letters notifying them they were barred from campus and would have a university hearing on the matter. She said she believed the hearing would be held after the grand jury made its determination. Her client, she said, has not decided whether he would return to William Paterson. “He may be cautious about going back to that school; that school didn’t support them,” she said. “The damage that was done to them can never be repaired.” Sutnick said her client was unable to find work while he’s been out of school, at least partly because of publicity over the charges against him. She said those charges and the events that followed would affect the defendants “for life.”

President Kathleen Waldron’s rush to judgment in assuming this rape occurred not only unfairly tainted the five young minority men arrested for the alleged crime, but was a chilling echo of the sentiments often expressed under the hanging trees of the Old South, where due process was deemed a luxury women could not afford when it came to black men accused of rape. It is a disturbing reminder of the Hofstra false rape case.

President Waldron, who is white, publicly stated that a crime had been committed, and she elevated the accuser to the status of “victim.” She even commended her “courage” for coming forward with the allegation. Anyone who bothered to read the local newspaper could connect the dots and learn who the “rapists” were, even though Waldron herself didn’t name them.

When it comes the wrongful accusations, the group most at risk is young black males. The aforementioned Hofstra case, and the Brian Banks case, are probably the two most prominent cases chronicled on my blog, and both involved young minority men. The men of the black and Hispanic communities are common targets of false rape scandals, and false rape claims strike a very sensitive nerve in those communities, given this nation’s sad history of lynching black men. President Waldron owes the accused and the men of color of William Patterson University an apology.

A Blue Collar Brotha speaks (at last!)

Mumia Ali · 2 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

> You have sat too long here for any good you have been doing. Depart, I say, and let us have done with you. In the name of God, go."
>
> -Oliver Cromwell

I got wind of a very interesting article by way of a commenter on one of the blogs that I write for; the piece was entitled "The Worst Cities for College-Educated Women Trying to Find a Decent Date." An informative read, the author, Mr. Jordan Weissmann, shows the data that in more than 100 major urban/metro areas of the United States, women with college degrees outnumber men on an average of upwards of 30% nationwide.

The article is perhaps even more profound for what it doesn't say, than what it does – that a "decent date" is something only college-educated and degreed men can offer to women, and/or that only "decent dates" from such men are what counts. And, as the ensuing comments following the article were keen to point out, invariably these kinds of discussions turn to the "dating/mating/marrying down" variety – i.e., college-educated/white collar professional, and highly accomplished women, having to "slum it" with their "lesser" male counterparts.

While this kind of news is a bit of a shock to our White brothers and sisters, it is by no means anything new to us Brothas and Sistas – indeed, it has been the broken record soundtrack of many of our lives, at least mine. If I had a dollar for every time I'd seen, heard or read from or about Sistas being in the unenviable position of having it all except an "equal" who was "on their level" I'd never again have to work anywhere. This kind of narrative – which does indeed have its basis in fact, I am fully aware and freely admit – has been extant for most of my post-highschool life.

Now, to be sure, and to be fair, we have to enter a few things into the official record: one, as noted above, yes, there are more college-educated, professional and higher earning Sistas, than there are Brothas, in absolute numbers. Two, not all Sistas feel that they are slumming it or dating/mating/marrying down when paired off with a Blue Collar Brotha. And three, as many Sistas rightly assert, not all Blue Collar Brothas are the salt of the proverbial earth – many do indeed have problems, ranging from Baby Mama Drama, to drug, alcohol, mental and emotional problems, to anger management issues, poor money managing skills, you name it.

But, the problem that I have with these kinds of "the sky is falling" discussions, such as the recent one in the Atlantic and that which occurs all the time in Black America, is the glaring assumptions that are made about Blue Collar Guys in such a broadstroke manner, and the fact that for all the handwringing and alarmist chatter, no one has actually deigned to talk to Blue Collar Guys themselves, and to hear, in their own voices, what, if anything, they have to say about the matter. Please, don't take my word for it – do up a Google search or two yourself. That's what I did for the better part of my Labor Day last year, and after hours of searching turned up… nothing. Part of the reason Why I Write, is to be one of those voices, that never make The Root or The Grio or Madame Noire; that never makes it to the umpteen panels where these kinds of topics are discussed; or, God forbid, such august forums and venues like The Atlantic.

Simply put, Blue Collar Guys like me, have been and continue to be talked about but never talked to; we're stereotyped and objectified, seen as the oh-so-awesome You Go Grrl's "Plan D," often their last stop on the way to Verified Spinstahood. And for other Sistas, those who are coming out of failed marriages, often with kids (and a goodly bit of weight) in tow, we're the guys "they should have met" lo those many years ago. Again, please don't get me wrong here – many people find each other and indeed, love, after a bad marriage ends. Just as many do so, with children involved from previous unions. And I would never presume to tell another man what he should or should not do in such circumstances; it has long my my stance that it is for every man to decide for himself what his life will be, romantic or otherwise.

It's just the way that this whole "Brave New World" type of discussion is conducted, not just in both the White and Black media but as well in real life conversations and the like, well, it just rubs me the wrong way. As noted above, we Blue Collar Guys are not seen as people; just cardboard caricatures, props to be inserted and moved about into the varying discussions and narratives, stereotypes to be bandied about, and little more, that deeply irks me. It's as if we don't have anything to say worth listening to, no romantic aspirations or thoughts of our own…no interesting lives led to be mentioned. A lot of college-educated women assume that if you're a Blue Collar Brotha, you can't string together four or five words into a simple sentence – or that you don't know the difference between chardonay and merlot; or that you don't know what a book or library card looks like. From my own personal experience, and by no means something I set out to prove for myself, I've found that often, I've read more and more widely, than quite a few formally educated ladies I've come across – but since when did the facts ever get in the way of stereotypes, hmm?

Then there's the following well worn trope: "I'll date a Blue Colla Brotha if he owns his own business" – yea – like girlfriend in question is the next Oprah, or something. Look, in truth, just like most people – including Sistas – work for somebody else for a living, most Blue Collar Brothas work for someone else for a living, and there's nothing in the least bit wrong with that. The vast majority of Educated Sistas, at best, work in middle management positions – they are hardly the HNICs of their organizations, more often than not – so why the demand that a Blue Colla Brotha must own the company he works for or something? Are you kidding me?

The insults and slights, just build up bit by bit. It's one thing to have a preference (and for the record, fellas reading along: please do not ever attempt to "convince" a woman to go out with you) – but it's something else to evince bigotry onto others, to profile them, to enervate them, simply because they're not to your liking.

Yes, you read that right – I did indeed use the words "bigotry" and "profiling" – because that's exactly what so many college-educated, professional (in this case Black, but by no means are they alone) women, do, to Blue Collar Guys like myself. Heck, and I say this with an ironic chuckle: I've probably been the recipient of more bigotry and profiling from Black folk, in this case Black Women along these lines, than I ever have from among Whites – and that's saying a lot, given that I've had guns drawn on me by more than a half a dozen White cops for merely trying to get something to eat at a Chinese takeout, or been hassled by White cops for walking home from work through a White suburban neighborhood in Dickies work "blues" and Timberland boots. With "friends" like these, who needs Adam-12?

The hits just keep coming, when all of those articles and discussions attempt to make the case that Blue Collar Guys aren't all bad; "why not give them a chance?" many of these "voices" say. But again, not a single Blue Collar Brotha to be heard among the chorus asking the question.

Well, allow me: who said that we were clamoring for you dusky princesses to "give us a chance" in the first place? By all accounts, Brothas, Blue Collar and otherwise, have left the building a long time ago. I've written about how so many Brothas, Blue Collar and otherwise, have been quietly voting with their feet for quite some time now; Sistas of a Certain Cohort have made it all too-clear as to which Brothas are to step up front, and which who needn't apply – and the Brothas have listened to you.

Hence the anywhere from 3-6 to 1 Sista to Brotha ratio at various "meet market" events, designed to ostensibly bring the two together; many Brothas rightly reason that there is precious little to be gained in turning out for such gatherings, only to run headlong into Sistas who turn their noses up as if a stink bomb had just gone off – and only when all other options have been exhausted for these ladies. when they've been pumped and dumped by the guys of their dreams, could never get his attention at all, or have come out of bad marriages and the like just the same, do they ostensibly turn to me and mine to save them from relationship oblivion. But even then, only if we're showing the proper amount of reverence and awe in their sight, dontcha know.

The idea that somehow you are doing us a favor by gracing us with your presence isn't exactly what we'd consider all that exciting or romantic. I've personally either witnessed, or experienced, those Sistas (again, NOT "all") who act as if they're doing you some grand gesture, by "giving you a chance" – the same Sistas who make up the client rolls of “relationship experts,” and keep the same kinds of book on the New York Times’ bestseller’s lists, bemoaning where “all the good Men have gone”; am I the only one who sees the Great Irony here?

I for one will pass on that kind of Noblese Oblige, thank you very much.

Again, I’m not going to sit here and act as though fellas from the Blue Collar ranks can do no wrong – quite the opposite in fact. I’m just saying that, like anything or anyone else when it comes to these kinds of things, traits and qualities run on a distribution spectrum; or to put it another trite way, there’s good and bad in everyone. For every Blue Colla Brotha you can find me who has umpteen kids by as many Baby Mamas, squanders his paycheck on booze and weed or has trouble distinguishing between his work blues and a blue fedora, I can find you just as many self-absorbed to the point of needing/utilizing navel gazing therapy for years, overly-entitled, squanders their own paycheck on mimosas, Jimmy Choos and lavish vacations, seriously personality-challenged Educated/Professional Sistas who are just stompdown convinced that their stuff don’t stink.

After all, it wasn’t the Blue Collar Brigade that ran this country into the ground economically over the past half-decade, so we can dismiss the notion that fiscal mismanagement (among a great many human frailties and foibles) is the sole preserve of the Dickies Crowd. One would think that for all their education and degrees, these ladies and others who think like that would get the fact that having such things, stand alone, do not a great mate – or even date – make.

There will be those who will read this, and will attempt to dismiss it as the rantings of a (Blue Collar) Brotha choking on sour grapes – and they couldn’t be more wrong. Not that it’s any of their damn business anyway, but for the record I’ve been both on the receiving end of some of the most Nuclear Rejections since Fukishima on the part of the kinds of ladies The Atlantic and Essence speak of; and, on the flipside, I’ve had the good fortune to have met some ladies – most of whom were quite highly educated professionals themselves – who didn’t see my Blue Collar background as a leprous condition to be avoided at best, tolerated at worst. Rather, this is just one data point among many that made up who and what I am; a data point that, for all of us, is increasingly diminishing in real value anyway, as more and more jobs are outsourced or otherwise transformed in our globalized age.

But as the country continues to divide itself along these lines – where more and more Women gain degrees and more and more Men do not – I think it was time someone’s voice like mine was added to the mix.

Actually, I think it’s long overdue.

Editorial note: this article originally appeared at Just Four Guys on Sep 4, 2013.

New South Wales police openly address male victims of female violence, Jenna Price furious

Anika Rose · 2 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

It feels like it never ends: Feminists like Jenna Price of The Canberra Times and Daily Life say they want equality, but when it comes to Domestic Violence, when faced with a serious discussion of male victims, they label it a failure and bitch about statistics.

Recently the New South Wales, Australia Police finally took a progressive step towards addressing the topic of men being victims of Domestic Violence. And before I go much further I would like to say a big thank you to New South Wales (NSW) Police for responding to the people who have requested equal representation of male victims of Domestic Violence. This is what they posted on Facebook:

NSW Police Force

You hear her screaming. The windows breaking.
You see the bruises. The look of fear in the children's eyes.
The police are called.
But don't assume you know how this story ends.
Because she is the one who is arrested.
And he is the innocent victim. He is the one living in fear.
Domestic violence does not discriminate. Last year, 1 in every 5 domestic violence assaults that NSW Police responded to involving intimate partners were for male victims.
The NSW Police Force has zero tolerance for domestic violence. You make the call – we'll make it stop.

I work with the Men's Human Right Movement and speak with a lot of people – either through the movement, my friends or family – who have suffered domestic violence either from their mother or the woman they love. Unfortunately, a lot of the men who have told me stories of their abuse have not ever reported this. One of the men I know who had been the victim of domestic violence, was arrested when the police attended the incident. This man has filmed that same partner threatening to tell the police that he hit her, even though he had not – because he had spoken of kicking her out of his home for breaking his belongings in a fit of anger. Although this is a perfect example of common scenarios, it does nothing towards making the public see violence against men of equal importance to violence against women.

This year the NSW Police have been posting images of women bruised and cowering with men standing over them and wording messages in terms of male on female violence. Many people stormed their images and posts depicting men as the perpetrators and women being the victims requesting and demanding that the other side of the coin be addressed.

Many people felt that this was a sign of our intolerance to awareness being raised about Domestic Violence against Women. Our message was drowned out by the defence of the well-known female victim narrative, a barrage of inconsistent statistics trying to validate why a woman being hurt is much more "importanter" than a man, abuse was hurled at us and accusations of "misogyny" ran rich.

Our request was not to remove this message, our request was not to discontinue discussions on female victims. We simply want to see male victims discussed and held at the same level of importance within society as female victims. When we finally saw this from the NSW Police it was a huge relief and win for us. Many men were filled with tears, emotion & shock that they were being publicly recognised by our police. NSW Police have started to include male victims side by side with female victims. This is all we were asking – for men to be seen of equal importance to women, to be seen as human beings worthy of protection and acknowledgement.

Once again – we thank you!

This is a great move towards equality and a non-biased agenda, so everyone claiming that women be equal with men should be happy to see this, right? Wrong.

I am not sure why people are losing their minds over a "we do not discriminate against gender" message from the police. I am confused by the fact that now equality is now being served, the women demanding "equality" to men are shaking in their boots.

You can't help but think that special treatment and greater funding geared toward female victims is the desired outcome, not equality. If you do a quick Google search for charities, shelters and organisations that employ many people in New South Wales within the Domestic Violence sphere, you will quickly realise that they exclusively cater to women and children – despite the fact that at least a third of domestic violence victims are male.

Suddenly, we are seeing a backlash and the bigots are out in full force.

There is one particular article which has rubbed me the wrong way that I would like to speak about. For the past 5 days I have been trying to put into words the anger I felt, as have many others – towards an opinion columnist named Jenna Price. Her article, written within a few days of NSW Police's post was titled "NSW Police fails domestic violence victims with flippant social media post."

First things first, nothing was mentioned about the previous two posts this year showing similar images and using police statistics to pass forward a message of zero tolerance affecting women. Nobody in the feminist community has said anything to question the statistics, images or message put across. It was accepted and praised. However, now we are seeing police acknowledging and attaching their call out statistics for male DV victims – people such as Jenna Price are quick to express their OPINION that this cannot be correct and it must be dishonest lies.

Let's get a few things straight. The post stated that 1 in 5 call outs by the police to attend domestic violence incidents were responding to a male victim. This is not the statistics however for how many victims there are who do not report. Peer reviewed statistics show that at least 1/3 of domestic violence victims are male, and possibly as many as half, are male. I would suggest you visit the website www.oneinthree.com.au – to see studies, surveys and articles showing how the public narrative that is insinuating male victims of domestic violence are a myth, are very much incorrect.

While all the statistics are available to show that the 1 in 5 statistics is quite conservative these women continue to attempt to discredit the messages being sent out that women ARE violent. They will stoop to the lowest of levels to attempt to uphold the image that women cannot possibly be violent and will jump at any opportunity to push their "toxic masculinity" opinion in the wake of a tragedy. An example of a feminist "opinion" columnist who did this is Ruby Hamad who in the wake of the Sydney Siege and told us that the issue was not Islam, rather the fact that he was male.

An idea raised by Jenna Price was that we are not specifying how many of these victims are in homosexual relationships, now this obviously is taking place because they feel that males somehow have to be responsible for the majority of violence. Well let me ask you this – why are we not hearing from feminists about the peer-reviewed studies that show that DV is more common in lesbian relationships than in gay male relationships, and is even higher than in hetero relationships? We are not specifying this when speaking about violence against women so WHY is it suddenly important now?

I have looked into the relevant studies, and given the fact this was written by the NSW Police I tried to find the most recent and local study into domestic violence between homosexual couples. I managed to find a study conducted by ACON and The Same Sex Domestic Violence Interagency Working Group. Here are a few images I took to show the figures in Sydney, showing that it is being reported that more women have experienced violence from a female partner than men in homosexual relationships:

A SNAPSHOT OF VIOLENCE AND ABUSE IN SYDNEY LGBT RELATIONSHIPS 2006

click to enlarge

click to enlarge

This kind of study shows one of these to be true: women are either more likely to become victims in intimate partner relationships irrespective of sexual orientation, or they are more likely to identify and report abuse.

Which is exactly why we need to be discussing domestic violence against men. Jenna, you know the part where you wrote that there is nothing wrong with discussing male domestic violence victims? You really should have stopped your post there. Now you have successfully shat all over the males being represented and attempted to pull that apart so that you could somehow make it that women are not seen as violent.

Right now there are way too many fights about statistics, more value being put on the abuse of one demographic (mainly gender). One comment on the NSW Police photo said “When they fix the bigger problem with women and children, I will be able to share sympathy with men.”

My issue that I would like to raise with Human Rights discussions is the feminists’ terrible habit of turning people into numbers and valuing individual life based on how many others things are happening to. Of course we should be dedicating resources where required, however by questioning and tit-for-tatting over statistics they are essentially making it out that those who were unfortunate enough to be born on the opposite side of statistics do not matter and should not be acknowledged or discussed.

By discussing all aspects of domestic violence, the police are demonstrating that their moral compass is spot on. This, however, was challenged by women and feminists and just shows the dangers we have been presented with as a result of the push for female supremacy and dominance. Feminists claim to want equality but if equality were their motivation articles such as the one we are discussing would not exist. They would be in support of violence not being viewed as a gender issue and not feel it necessary to pick apart, shadow doubt and throw in variables to discredit police statistics.

Women are just as capable of violence and we need to create an environment where men feel they can speak and report crimes against them in their own home. If this is seen as a let down to women, then I can’t help but ask myself – and encourage you to ask yourself – what is the aim of feminism and the “End Violence Against Women” business when they claim to want equality, however when faced with equality they throw it out and attack it as quickly as it comes to the surface?

#oneistoomany

Time to help one of our own

AVFM · 2 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

We realize of course that we have been stretching it here. Supporters have backed us through the recent donation drive, as well as giving generous support to Sage Gerard and his sterling efforts with Zen Men.

And yet again we have a moral imperative to seek your support again, should you be inclined.

It was my desire for some time to help Dean Esmay with his dental work. With the expense of two children, including special needs, a life consumed by activism when he is not working his job, and almost squat in terms of dental coverage, his health in that area has suffered.

I want to ask this community to help him, please. I will be donating the personal funds that I can, but I don't have enough to take care of it on my own. I don't even have enough to do what I am going to do, but I am going to do it anyway.

Fact is, Dean deserves this. He deserves more, actually, but we hope to make this small thing happen for him.

He works hard on behalf of people he does not and never will know, and I am hoping that our community will see this as an opportunity to help one of our own when it counts.

A message from Dean's wife, Gi, follows the video. Thanks to all in advance for having the back of a man who has yours. PE

Donate

Provided byFund-Raising-Ideas-Center.com

It is never comfortable to reach out for help. And it is even more awkward when being angry, but I just can't do this without getting something off my chest first. John Hembling's attempt to use my husband as a human shield to distract from his own perfidy will not work. I have three things to say to John, thank you very much for the $100CAN. Thank you for the "Fix your tooth, motherfucker" in the subject line of the donation email, and go fuck yourself.

As for the charge that Paul doesn't care about men in general and the people who work for him in particular: total bullshit. I support the work that Dean does at AVfM because I know how much it means to him and I recognize how needed it is. But if I believed that Paul didn't give a shit I wouldn't have volunteered my time and energy to help organize and run ICMI14, I wouldn't be on the planning committee for ICMI15 and I certainly wouldn't have traveled to Toronto for the Nathanson/Young talk.

I was Agent Tungsten at that event and I was asked to go there by Paul because he wanted someone to have JTO's back. Too bad JTO decided to slip a knife into Dean's.

Now, as to why I am here now. As anyone who is following this knows, Kevin, an attendee of ICMI14, gave Dean a check for $2,200.00 for use toward getting a tooth repaired. Dean reluctantly and gratefully accepted. When we visited the dentist we found there was substantially more work that needed to be done before he was willing to address the reason we came in the first place. We went ahead with that treatment, including the first step in the procedure for crowning his missing tooth and figured once I was working again we would finish the work. I am still unemployed and looking.

That is the long and short of what happened, at least as it relates to Dean's dental work.

I want to thank everyone who has supported Dean, and who will support him in this fundraiser to help him out. He works hard every day, trying to make a difference in the lives of people he does not even know.

- Gigi Esmay

That Bitch: abuse, murder, and the dark side of Venus

Roy Sheppard and Mary T Cleary · 2 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial note: the following is digested from the latest edition of That Bitch: protect yourself against women with malicious intent, which also goes by the title The Dark Side of Venus.–DE

She Did WHAT?

The man, a grandfather, worked nights taking home the drunk and the occasional disorderly character, the noisy, those who threw up inside his cab, and those who dropped cigarette butts that burned holes in his upholstery.

At about 3am he picked up two women in their early twenties outside a well-known nightclub. He dropped the first one at her home and took the other to her home, a couple of miles away. The moment he stopped the cab she ripped open her blouse and bra and screamed at the top of her voice: "Rape! Rape! I'm being raped!" Two men heard her screams and rushed to her aid. They dragged the driver from his cab, punched and pinned him to the ground, while one of them called the police.

The cab driver was taken in handcuffs to a police station. His cab was impounded while he was kept in custody for days being interviewed for hours on end. All the while he protested he had not touched the woman. The police didn't (or couldn't be seen to) believe him.

From that moment, nobody else seemed to believe him either.

News spread. This man was now a rapist. He explained to a colleague that the idea you are innocent until proven guilty was a myth. It may apply to other crimes he said, but not when a man is accused of rape.

Out of the blue he was told that all charges had been dropped. The police would not be prosecuting him for rape, or any other crime. "Why?" he asked.

The father of the first woman had asked her what she knew. He persisted when she clammed up. Eventually she burst into tears and said: "Dad, all she did was try to get out of paying the fare. What's wrong with that?"

The cabbie has never driven his taxi since.

Warren Blackwell, a 36-year-old father of two, came off even worse. He was arrested, convicted and jailed for sexual assault and rape. He always maintained his innocence. His wife stood by him throughout. He served three years as a convicted rapist. Then in July 2006 he was released after a detailed investigation by the British Criminal Cases Review Commission concluded he was innocent all along.

Who can imagine the horrors he had to endure because of the evil actions of the woman, whose identity was protected under British law while his name was published repeatedly in the national press? Even the woman's mother described her as "A persistent liar, very manipulative and a bully." It emerged that the woman had a history of making serious false allegations. To date she has not been prosecuted.

How many other innocent men have had their lives wrecked because anonymous accusers make false allegations and get away with it?

And how many of these dishonest women make it even more difficult for genuine rape victims to secure convictions against their vicious attackers?

In early 2007 Emma Golightly was jailed for two years in Newcastle upon Tyne in the UK for conning men out of $500,000. She was described as a serial liar who created the perfect illusion of everything a man would want from a woman, specifically to extract cash from them. In an article in The Mail on Sunday, Stephen Keenan, her 24-year-old fiancé said: "I couldn't believe my luck that someone with her background would be interested in an ordinary working man like me – I really thought I had hit the jackpot."

She was not what she claimed. She created a web of lies to deceive various men. She said she had a highly paid job and was the daughter of a millionaire High Court judge. She said she was born in South Africa and educated in Dallas, and attended university at 16 because she was so intelligent. In reality, she lived in a shabby apartment in a poor part of Newcastle. Golightly also had a child that she didn't mention. She told Keenan she had been married but her husband raped her at the age of 17, that she was pushed down some stairs and lost her twin babies.

To another man she claimed to be a millionaire but was suffering from terminal cancer and wanted to marry before she died.

One of her victims recounted that many of her stories related to highly sensitive, personal matters, which no decent man would ever insist she prove.

Like so many women of this type, she played the sympathy card almost perfectly. When Keenan attended court the day she was sentenced, he is reported as saying it was like attending a funeral. The difference was that the woman he had loved had not died – she had never existed.

Golightly broke the law and went to jail for it, but it is still possible to extract millions from men when you know how to use the law to your advantage.

In 2007 one of the highest-profile divorces in the UK was between Heather Mills, and Sir Paul McCartney, the British music icon. Who will ever know the truth about their relationship?

Men who grew up listening to The Beatles are prepared to accept that McCartney is a highly gifted "good guy." Could he possibly be the ogre Ms. Mills has claimed he is in the tabloid press? Or is she the true ogre of the piece?

Ms. Mills' father, who once served a prison sentence for fraud, has described his own daughter as a liar for making unsubstantiated allegations of sexual abuse against him in her autobiography. Ms. Mills has also been criticised by the police for making too many unnecessary emergency phone calls. Did she make up the stories? And how economical with the truth has she been while using the legal system to extract as much money as possible from McCartney?

Morality and fairness have no place in matrimonial law, it seems.

In December 2014, Reuters reported "Billionaire hedge fund manager Chris Hohn has been ordered to pay his estranged wife Jamie Cooper-Hohn 337 million pounds ($530 million) in the largest divorce settlement in British legal history."

Because of some of these astronomical financial settlements being handed out in the divorce courts, how many ordinary, honest, decent, and ambitious young men are concluding that marriage isn't worth the financial risk anymore? After all, 45% of Canadian, 51% of American and 57% of British marriages now end in divorce.

No entrepreneurial man would invest in a business start-up in which the risk-reward ratio was so stacked against him. It's worth remembering that according to the law marriage is a business partnership, and when divorce breaks it in two, the partners must share all the wealth created while it was intact. Is it any wonder that more men are questioning the idea of making a commitment to a woman when he has potentially so much more to lose than she does?

Research conducted for the UK Marriage and Relationship Counselling Service (MRCS) in 2006 found women are more likely than men to perpetrate domestic violence. This report, based on a survey of 530 MRCS clients, found mutual violence accounts for 33% of domestic cases, female-perpetrated violence 41%, and male-perpetrated violence 26%. Some women's organizations need to perpetuate the myth that all men are a threat to women, just to qualify for the vast sums of public money to fund their work. If they do not maintain the victim status of women, the cash will stop. By refusing to acknowledge the true extent of violence perpetrated on men by women, these organizations effectively deprive male victims of the help they need and deserve. They too, are abusing innocent men.

United States Department of Justice statistics for 2005 show that 1510 people were murdered by 'intimates', which means a spouse, ex-spouse, boyfriend or girlfriend. The statistics are surprising. When men and women are asked "How many of those were men?" the average answer is "probably just a few". They aren't even close. The accurate answer is 329. Still a minority, but more than 21%, which is not insignificant.

These women do not destroy the lives of just their victims:

> "I am a mother. My heart is broken. My handsome son was the victim of domestic violence. His long-time girlfriend of seven years murdered him on July 7, 2002. He was aged 25 years. He had suffered severe violence at her hands prior to his death but was too ashamed to admit to it openly.
>
> She was sentenced to three and a half years in prison, having pleaded diminished responsibility.
>
> She served 21 months for her crime and is now walking the streets without remorse knowing she beat the system."

The victim was a young man named Peter. His sister wrote about the story in a UK Cosmopolitan article in November 2004.

She described how Sonia, the girlfriend, was something of a loner thanks to a difficult childhood. She seemed angry at the world in general and became guarded, prickly and agitated whenever she was challenged by a question, however innocent. She was insecure, distrusting and jealous; Peter took on the role of "looking after her. "She made him feel sorry for her but he was not happy. The guilt became the glue that held them together. Despite his kindness and caring attitude she would snap at him, scream and constantly berate him over the most insignificant things. Once he arrived at the family home covered in cuts and bruises.

Sonia convinced herself that Peter was seeing other women, even though he wasn't. She threatened to stab him if she discovered he was cheating on her.

Peter's father tried to warn him off by saying that such people never change. If she was causing him grief then, it would happen again and again. But Peter continued to defend her and make excuses for her behaviour.

In July 2002 she stabbed him through the heart with a 4.5 inch kitchen knife. She was arrested but released without charge, claiming the killing was self-defence. However, forensic evidence disproved that because of the angle of the wound. That's when she changed her plea to guilty of manslaughter on the grounds of diminished responsibility.

In court she was described as volatile with a jealous temperament and claimed to have attempted suicide twice since the stabbing. Doctors gave evidence that she was not responsible for her actions before she was found guilty and sentenced.

Poison also seems the weapon of choice for many murderesses. Incredibly, they are not always discovered because these "loving" women aren't considered as murder suspects by the police.

Without wanting to pump up the figures of women killing men further, here are two more factors to be added into the mix: suicide and contract murder.

We received a call from a distraught male friend. He is intelligent, in his forties, successful, and divorced with three children he adores. He had met a woman via the internet and fallen in love. Initially, things were absolutely fantastic. They were both head-over-heels, even though everything happened more quickly than he would have liked. It was exciting and passionate. He got on famously with her children, and she loved being with his. An instant family of five children. So what was the problem?

His exact words: "She is driving me crazy. One minute she's all over me, the next she's calling me every name you can think of – and I haven't done anything wrong. I have tried to reason with her. She goes from hot to cold to hot again. I have no idea where I am with her. One minute she wants us to move in together, the next minute she doesn't. She's really doing my head in."

He continued for half an hour talking about her and how and why he was besotted with her. He was certainly under her spell. Then he added “I felt quite sorry for her, too. I’ve really tried to help her get over it. She’d been with a guy for a couple of years. It was tragic really. He committed suicide.”

He was quietly asked to listen very carefully to what he had just said. There was a loud silence. The penny had dropped.

Who will ever know for sure whether this woman made her former partner’s life so miserable that the pain of living was worse than the pain of dying? This friend needed no further convincing. He realised something similar could happen to him. He forced himself to withdraw from the relationship. But the backlash was severe. She turned on him even more viciously than when they’d been “in love.”

From a website for fathers who have been excluded from the lives of their children in the United States comes a tragic end to a story in which an angry mother and the courts unwittingly colluded against an ordinary, normal, average, hard-working guy. Randall Couch, a Phoenix architectural consultant, went through a divorce and got poor advice from his lawyer, including giving sole custody of their child to his wife and an ever-increasing child support agreement. A few years later a new attorney got a revised order in which Randall got a large percentage of each week with his son and eliminated the child support payments. Unbeknownst to him, the order was never officially filed with the court. You can guess what is coming. Several years later the ex-wife went after him for over $28,000 in back child support, plus attorney’s fees. The court ruled in her favour. His bank accounts were seized and his car was taken from him. He was ordered to pay $1,500 by noon the following day. Money he did not have. He shot himself in the head. The wife never got her $28,000, and deprived her own son of his father in the process.

How many other innocent men have resorted to suicide to escape the clutches of a woman who has made their lives unbearable?

And then there are the cases when a woman doesn’t want to do something herself, but she is able to convince someone else to do it for her.

Anthony Riggs, known as Slowpoke to his friends and colleagues because of his gentle demeanour, saw military action in Operation Desert Storm in the Persian Gulf in 1991. He fought for his country, but soon after returning he was gunned down and killed outside his own home. His 22 year-old wife, Toni Cato Riggs, appeared distraught. The police caught his killer: his wife’s younger brother Michael.

This woman had persuaded her brother to murder her husband in return for half the $20,000 insurance pay-off. This is just one of many horrific examples of women who commit murder recorded by Patricia Pearson, a highly acclaimed feminist writer, in her controversial book, When She Was Bad: How Women Get Away with Murder. Pearson tells many thoroughly researched, publicly documented stories of women with malicious intent, and articulates fascinating insights into why society, the courts and the media fall into the traps of what she describes as “chivalry justice.” On the subject of female aggression and the multiple ways women tend to get away with it, this is a must-read book.

Clearly, men are not the only perpetrators of violence. But society doesn’t want to acknowledge that women kill more children than men and that mothers are statistically more likely to abuse their children. Men are statistically the least likely to abuse their children, but try convincing a family judge of that when a mother has falsely alleged that ‘her’ children (not ‘their’ children), are unsafe with the father even when he has no history of such behaviour.

In Poestlingberg, Austria, a horrific story emerged in October 2005. For seven years a divorced mother kept her three daughters locked up in almost complete darkness. As a lawyer, she successfully won custody and did everything she could to ensure her former husband, a local judge, could never see them. Despite his own detailed legal knowledge, the father repeatedly failed in court to win the right to see his girls. The local authorities allegedly received repeated complaints from neighbours but they were ignored. The mother outmanoeuvred everyone.

When the authorities eventually removed the girls and took them into care, they found indescribable filth at the house, excrement at least a meter deep and no running water. Floors and pipes had been corroded by rodent urine. The girls were six, 11 and 13 at the beginning of their ordeal. Even after prolonged specialist therapy, the development of these young women is described as “truly catastrophic.” Experts fear that the eldest is so traumatised that she will never recover. During their ordeal the girls learned to communicate in their own language. In care they could not bear sunlight and huddled together under a kitchen table for protection.

Could these examples be dismissed as non-representative of the “truer” picture, in which men are always the aggressors and women the victims, as perpetuated by so many feminist groups?

No.

> A great many people think they are thinking when they are merely rearranging their prejudices. William James (1842-1910)

Volleyball girls: let's play assess the asses (NSFW)

Paul Elam · 3 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Just recently, Buzzfeed ran an image post showcasing the backsides of every Super Bowl player, ranking their respective derrieres in the order of aesthetic appeal. Of course, the unexpected outrage of feminists remained unexpected because it didn't happen, and the commenters at Buzzfeed, mostly female, cheered on like a coven of cougars at all that fine, young, athletic male ass.

Wondering if there might be some kind of double standard at play, I contacted feminist blob-blogger David Neutrelle and asked if he thought people would be offended if Buzzfeed ran a similar post featuring athletic women's buttocks. His response was sharp.

> Jesus, Elam, are you really saying you don't see a difference between women sexualizing men and men sexualizing women? Holy shit, man, have you EVER jumped the shark now! How stupid can you be? They are entirely different things. One is right and one is wrong. Duh!"

I guess he left me the job of figuring out which is which. Seems like now is as good a time as any to find out which. With that, I am happy to present you with an assortment of asses, courtesy of women's volleyball. Unlike Buzzfeed, I won't publish their names. After all, why bother? Who needs names when the important shit is already there for you to see.

Female terrorists, feminist denial

Robert Franklin · 3 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Terrorism. It seems like it's in the news every day. The slaughter of French satirical journalists is still fresh in our memories when someone detonates a bomb at a mosque in Karachi, Pakistan killing over 50 people. The trial of the Boston Marathon bomber is underway in Massachusetts. These and countless other incidents occur in a context of decades of the most horrifying acts of mass murder.

Who are these people, these terrorists? The question is not rhetorical. It's one of the most important ones we can ask in our efforts to prevent acts of terrorism.

Apprehending terrorists before they strike requires knowing both the what and the who. Did someone recently purchase 1,000 pounds of nitrate fertilizer? If so, who was it? A farmer in Kansas or the Imam of a radical mosque in Newark? No state apparatus can simply examine behavior and, without more, determine who is a terrorist about to act. A necessary part of preventing terrorism is understanding who is a likely terrorist.

Doing so is at best an inexact science, a net that's bound to have gaping holes. But still, the better the net, the greater the chance of preventing acts of terrorism. That makes it all the more remarkable that there's one hole in our net that we've known about for many years but refuse to mend.

That gaping hole is the sex of terrorists. It turns out that, contrary to both popular and expert belief, women make up a large percentage of terrorists worldwide. Moreover, at least one serious study found that women tend to be more effective at their bloody business than are men. And there's a reason why they are – sexism. The popular delusion that women are passive and pacifist, incapable of violence, skews our assumptions about who might be the next to blow up an airliner or a cafe. Overlooked as possible suspects, female terrorists are freed to murder more efficiently than are their male counterparts.

The latest article on the matter in the New York Times makes the situation abundantly clear. Its writer, Jayne Huckerby, doesn't beat around the bush. Our sexist notions about the nature of women, and particularly Islamic women, blinds us to their potential for violence.

> While much will be made in the coming months of France's intelligence failures, the West's inability to appreciate the role that women play in terror should come under the highest scrutiny… Roughly 10 percent of [ISIS's] Western recruits are female, often lured by their peers through social media and instant messaging. The percentage is much higher in France: An estimated 63 of the 350 French nationals believed to be with the group are women, or just under 20 percent.
>
> This story is both a new one and an old one. Women have long been involved in terror of all stripes, from female neo-Nazis in Europe to Chechen "black widow" suicide bombers…
>
> Many [governments] still deny women's involvement in terror at all, particularly in jihadist groups, or focus only on women's role in preventing men from radicalizing. Meanwhile, those same groups are deploying more female suicide bombers who can easily evade detection because of such blind spots. Earlier this month Boko Haram detonated bombs strapped to three girls — possibly some of the abducted schoolchildren — who were able to make it past security guards because of their age and gender.

In short, terrorists are using our own sexism – our assumption that women are largely incapable of violence – against us, to horrifying effect.

This is not news. The linked-to NYT article is just over a week old, but this one came out in 2010. It's by three University of Chicago academics who'd just completed a study of every act of terrorism over a 10-year period by Chechen separatists against Russia. Their findings?

> The three of us, in our work for the Chicago Project on Security and Terrorism, have analyzed every Chechen suicide attack since they began in 2000, 42 separate incidents involving 63 people who killed themselves. Many Chechen separatists are Muslim, but few of the suicide bombers profess religious motives. The majority are male, but a huge fraction — over 40 percent — are women.

The first attack by Chechen separatists in 2000 was conducted by two women.

> This was the first Chechen suicide attack and showed the many advantages of female suicide bombers. They were deadly, as Chechen female attackers generally are, killing an average of 21 people per attack compared to 13 for males.

So female terrorists are able to be much more deadly than are their male counterparts, but their effectiveness doesn't stop there. They can inspire others to follow in their footsteps, women and men alike.

> Ms. Barayeva made a martyr video, as many suicide bombers do before their attacks. While warning Russia that she was attacking for Chechen independence, she also directed a powerful message clearly meant to provoke men to make similar sacrifices out of a sense of honor. She pleaded for Chechen men to "not take the woman's role by staying at home"; so far, 32 men have answered her call.
>
> Just as important, Ms. Barayeva is considered responsible for inspiring a movement of "black widows" — women who have lost a husband, child or close relative to the "occupation" and killed themselves on missions to even the score. In total, 24 Chechen females ranging in age from 15 to 37 have carried out suicide attacks, including the most deadly — the coordinated bombings of two passenger flights in August 2004 that caused 90 deaths and (according to Russian authorities) the subway blasts on Monday that killed nearly 40.

Female terrorists are so effective precisely because they're women and our sexist assumptions about women exclude their being violent terrorists.

> And female suicide attackers have one more advantage: They can often travel inconspicuously to their targets. A July 2003 investigative report by the Russian news magazine Kommersant-Vlast found that a potential female suicide bomber could easily avoid public suspicion. Just days after a Chechen suicide bomber, Zarema Muzhakhoyeva, tried but failed to blow up a Moscow cafe in 2003, one of the magazine's journalists — wearing a niqab, tightly clutching a black satchel to her chest, and behaving in a nervous manner — was able to get a table at the same cafe without ever being questioned. Perhaps not surprisingly, Chechen women have carried out 8 of the 10 suicide attacks in Moscow.

If that's not a failure of intelligence, I don't know what is.

So, where are feminists in all this? As it turns out, feminist misogyny is directly on point. We daily see the feminist commentariat absolving women of responsibility for every wrong large or small. The feminist narrative of women as little children, incapable of agency and everywhere at the mercy of individual men or the "patriarchy," has become the stuff at once of low comedy and public policy.

But what about female terrorists? Surely, when women commit acts so heinous, feminists will alter their narrative of feminine innocence, right? Wrong.

In 2010, a mere 11 days after the New York Times published its piece on Chechen terrorists, this article came out in Salon.com. It reported on Israeli feminist Anat Berko claiming that, when women commit terrorist atrocities, someone or something else is at fault. Men, the sexism of the Islamic world or just life itself rendered them helpless to not kill. Remember, this was an Israeli excusing Palestinian terrorism against Israelis.

> Berko's study, which is previewed in today's Haaretz, paints a disturbing tableau of the inner world of female suicide bombers, the vast majority of whom "were exploited by the terrorist organizations, by close friends or even by their own families, and were pushed into carrying out terrorist attacks." It appears that women's motives for such attacks are rooted less in ideology than in histories of physical, mental, and sexual abuse within their own families. Their motives rarely involve free will, but rather blackmail or the hope of redemption for sexual indiscretions through violence and self-sacrifice.

So, according to Berko, female terrorists lack free will. Now, we might well ask how Berko can possibly know what motivates a person she's never met and is, in any case, dead by her own hand. The answer is simple.

> Berko cites the case of Palestine's first female suicide bomber, medic Wafa Idris, who blew herself up in downtown Jerusalem in January 2002, killing an 81-year-old Israeli man and injuring 100 bystanders. Berko focuses her attention on Idris's recent divorce: Her husband had divorced her after a miscarriage leaving her unable to conceive a child and married another woman, with whom he proceeded to father two children.

Berko, ignorant of the woman's motivations, simply supplied her own that conform to the feminist narrative.

That narrative requires Berko to disregard how women describe themselves. Women often disagree with feminists about why they do what they do, leaving feminists a choice; they can believe the women or substitute feminist ideology for the women's understanding of their own motivations. It's not a hard decision; feminists routinely claim that women don't know themselves, but feminists do. And so it is with Berko.

Female terrorists are all too clear about their motivations; they see themselves as integral parts of movements and will go to extremes to further them. For additional clarity, they often make videotaped statements prior to their final acts, and if they survive, explain their motivations.

Berko isn't having it.

> But once captured and forced to justify their actions, these bombers consistently cite ideological motives. "[I]n prison, since they are now part of a group, these women are expected to rewrite their personal stories and to reconstruct them as acts of heroism on behalf of the Palestinian homeland," Berko writes.

Have we reached peak irony here? In order to rewrite the women's motivations Berko must claim it's the women who rewrote them. Apparently nothing, including respect for women, can be allowed to contradict the feminist narrative. But non-feminists are doing just that.

Back in 2010, the three University of Chicago researchers directly refuted Berko's notions of women as hapless victims of their own lives. They actually listened to what the women said and, unsurprisingly, their conclusions make sense. Those women are not dupes of exploitative men or Islamic culture. They're highly motivated and extremely effective perpetrators of the most despicable crimes.

And, as if she were writing directly to Berko, four years later, Huckerby does the same.

> Indeed, despite stereotypes about their domesticity and passivity — the idea that they must always be under men's influence or tricked into joining — women are drawn to groups like the Islamic State by many of the same forces as men: adventure, inequality, alienation and the pull of the cause.

Berko of course avoids mention of what motivates male terrorists. Men too get divorced, men too grow up without a parent, men too suffer the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune. But for the umpteenth time in the feminist narrative, men are presumptively strong; they're moral actors, free to choose good or evil. By contrast, women are weak, feckless, blown hither and yon by every cultural breeze.

Often enough, the nonsense that is feminist discourse is of little consequence, just words on a computer screen. But when feminists seek to absolve women of their guilt for some of the worst crimes ever committed, the game has changed.

Berko's claims directly promote a form of misogyny that itself promotes mass murder. Berko and her sisters tell us that female terrorists cannot be held responsible for their murder of, in some cases, scores of innocent human beings. That misunderstanding of women is part of the same mindset that fails to include "female" in the list of traits making up the profile of the potential terrorist. Feminists want us to believe that women "would never do such a thing." But women do. And the extent to which we believe that feminist narrative is the extent to which we leave ourselves vulnerable to the next bomb.

Mike Buchanan and Bea Campbell almost have a discussion on BBC Radio

Mike Buchanan · 3 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Here's a fascinating interview from our YouTube channel:

Given the recent excruciating performances on live television and radio of some of the more prominent younger feminists – which resulted in Laura Bates (Special Snowflake) and Caroline Criado-Perez winning new 'Lying Feminist of the Month' awards – it may be that a new tactic is emerging, the feminist 'old guard' is starting to be wheeled out.

I was surprised to learn two weeks ago that on a BBC radio programme I'd be debating with Bea Campbell, 67, an influential Marxist lesbian feminist over the past few decades. Her first job in 'journalism' was with the communist daily newspaper, The Morning Star. Her Wikipedia profile is here, from which we learn, 'Writing in The Guardian, she self-defined as a "republican with politics rooted in Marxism and feminism." '

So, did the BBC give me the opportunity to debate issues with Bea Campbell, an opportunity I should have relished? No. Presumably at her request, I was interviewed first by the presenter, Andrew Peach, who challenged me to name studies to justify my claim that women display same-gender preference in workplace recruitment and promotions. I pointed out that thousands of studies and report underpinned our arguments and proposals in 20+ areas, and I couldn't be expected to name every one at the drop of a hat. In the end I suggested he and his listeners check out Steve Moxon's The Woman Racket for details of studies on same-gender preferences.

I was then taken off air, and Andrew Peach immediately started a discussion with Bea Campbell – apparently speaking into a tin can – starting with this at 8:36:

PEACH: Here's feminist writer, Bea Campbell. What do you make of what you've just heard, Bea?

CAMPBELL: Well, you know, I've just got a book out called End of Equality which is a review of where we're at in the world in the equality stakes, and he's wrong on everything. I would like to say, though, that there's something – I'm trying to be humane here – there is something interesting in the Mike Buchanan phenomenon, and maybe it's this. That what we see isn't evidence, because there isn't any. For him to say there is no discrimination (against women) is patently potty.

Campbell went in for the predictable denial of evidence bases, diversions, and personal attacks. She claimed my two ex-wives don't support J4MB, which was idle speculation – and even if it were true, of no relevance to the strength of J4MB arguments and proposals.

So Bea Campbell, a titan of modern feminism, wasn't prepared to engage in debate with an anti-feminist on a BBC radio station. How low the morale of feminists must have sunk, for that to be the case. It's all good. Bring on Harriet Harman, Germaine Greer, Julie Bindel and Jessica Valenti, I say…

The general election is now little more than three months away, and we've just published our election manifesto as an ebook on Amazon (it will be available from other retailers shortly). It's readable not only on e-readers, but also on PCs, tablets etc. on excellent free-to-download software from Amazon and others. The functionality to access the document's 284 references, then return to your original place in the document, is very impressive. All proceeds from the sale of the book will go towards supporting our work.

Best wishes,

Mike Buchanan

Protecting men from sororities: the power shifts

August Løvenskiolds · 3 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The fallout from the otherwise deadly serious gang rape story-cum-hoax at the University of Virginia (UVA), first "reported" by Rolling Stone and later retracted because of, well, hoax, has taken a somewhat amusing turn. Now that Greek organizations (sororities for women exclusively and fraternities for both men & women) have been restored to operation at UVA, and despite draconian drinking party restrictions forced onto fraternities by the feminist-dominated UVA administration, it seems that this last weekend, sorority girls have been banned from attending parties thrown by fraternity men. Wah wah wah.

Ignoring the damage done to a fraternity as the result of feminist UVA coed Jackie Coakley's ludicrous and ever-changing accounts of her supposed gang rape, the sorority girls are having a hissy fit: what, no parties? The independent girls get in but we are locked up at home?

National Public Radio (NPR) quoted one student thusly:

> Students like Sara Surface say the controversy is about much more than a party.
>
> "This is not an issue of we're angry because we can't go out and drink and party," Surface says. "It's an issue over whether or not we have the choice."

Oh, feminists, how far you've fallen! From the choice of legalized abortion in Roe v Wade (which was also, ironically, bolstered initially by a rape hoax that the alleged victim eventually admitted lying about) to the latest hilarity: fighting for your right to party so you can make more rape hoaxes.

Setting aside the obvious and problematic nature of feminist-driven rape hoaxes – they hurt innocent men up to and including lynching them, they undermine the credibility of legitimate rape victims of both (okay, all) genders, they are lies, they create unnecessary fear in both men & women, and so on – the truth is that feminist rape hoaxes have become so many and so transparent that the biggest rape joke ever is when a feminist cries rape.

You have doubts?

Consider the fake rape case filed against the Duke lacrosse team. Despite being exonerated and their lunatic accuser going on to be convicted of murder, feminist writers still sniff at the innocent men whose lives were tarnished. How dare those innocent men sue for damages.

Consider "1 in 5": the feminist claim that one in five college women will be raped on campus. This number is a feminist rape hoax on a massive scale and various other studies and analyses are ripping it apart.

Consider other discredited feminist rape hoaxes.

Hofstra. ←Notice this link includes quotes and links to some chap named "Paul Elam", then of Men's News Daily.

Meg Lanker-Simons, a feminist at the University of Wyoming whose fake assault was motivated by feminist ideology and no real crime.

Paterson University.

I can go on and on for days linking to deliberate feminist rape hoaxers, but you get my point: even the most well-meaning feminist (if there is such a thing) has gone batshit crazy trying to exploit rape – even when they fake it – to somehow "empower" da wymmyns.

The pitfalls of accountable power.

Women have long enjoyed indirect power over human affairs, and the great benefit of indirect power is the lack of accountability. If, for example, a bartender gives away free drinks and bar management does not detect and fire her, eventually, a tax auditor will bill the bar for the taxes due on the “free” drinks.

The problem for the bartender happens only if and when her perfidy is detected.

I believe it is something analogous to the “cheating” bartender is now happening to the rape-hoaxing feminists at UVA, and eventually, everywhere.

Although feminists still flog the idea that women are somehow inferior to men and need extravagant protections that their own mothers would scoff at, the truth is that women’s power on campus has shifted from covert to overt. Women vastly outnumber men on campus, 12 million women to 9 million men, and this differential reflects the massive power grab by feminism. The new “affirmative consent” laws further empower women at the expense of an innocent man who fails to get witnessed and notarized sexual consent for a one night stand that can turn into a deadly, life-destroying encounter by the once horny and now embarrassed vixen.

With overt power comes accountability, and with accountability comes punishment.

In this case, the powerful feminists in the sororities at UVA are being punished by a party time-out for their abuse of their power over male students. This is condign and appropriate given the girls’ negligence alone in not rebuking feminist women like Jackie Coakley for making false rape claims.

After all, on UVA and other campuses around the world, it is the women who hold power. They need to be punished when they abuse that power, just as men are held accountable.

That’s equality, right?

The fallout

Because of the sorority time-out, the nerdy & tech women (NTW) rejected by sororities gain a unique sexual advantage: the hotter sorority chicks are off-limits and so the NTW will have unique access to the full length and breadth of prime fraternity penis – access that was formerly reserved for “ho-rorities.”

Sororities are now obsolete: they’ve gone from marriage-seeking support groups to brothels to now convents. No healthy, sexually ambitious or marriage-minded woman will join a sorority if she knows this will shut her away from the dwindling supply of top-shelf, tasty big men on campus.

The uniform, across-the-board nature of the sorority party ban indicates that some other force might be in play. I would guess that liability insurers are growing weary of being sued and paying huge settlements to falsely accused men and are creating this party ban to trigger a backlash to feminist crap. Well played, guys, if this is true.

In any case, this is an early case of how women will shriek in horror once they start to grasp the burden of the overt power they now have – a burden men have long shouldered without complaint. A power burden compliments of feminism and their rape hoaxes

The days of both feminism and sorority are coming to a swift end. Unless sororities step forward and reject feminism, history will remember it as a mutual murder-suicide pact.

Re: Why rape is a joke in India! #RapePublicDay

AVfM Video Source · 3 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

There may be yet another new rising star in India. This is mindfulrant's second video. He has already been falsely DMCA'd in an attempt to shut him up. Please sub to his channel. If they take this down, we will be happy to host it here. Oh, and be prepared to mass mirror. You know what to do. PE

Manbreathing

Matt Karlsson · 4 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Has a major bastion of systematic Patriarchal oppression long gone unnoticed and unmonetized by Third Wave Feminism? The Feministuardian's own Jessica A. V. Marcotte takes aim at this ubiquitous modern problem.

What the fuck. I was on the subway the other day, tweeting on my iPhone 6s about how Apple is a misogynist boy's club for technocrat shitlord autists for not making a feminist-friendly iPhone whose touch-screen accommodates long fingernails when I noticed something truly. Fucking. Appalling.

Hours later, I am still literally in shock.

At first, I couldn't figure out what the hell I was hearing. Though at first barely audible over the clatter of the D-line, the more I listened, the more I could hear it all around me. It was this raspy, deep, almost rhythmic noise, this damp hissing, that turned up my creep-alarm straight to 11.

Without thinking about it, I'd grabbed my all-purpose anti-rape kit (sadly unused to date) and was searching for the pepper spray in the tangle of whistles, tasers, and TEACH MEN NOT TO RAPE stickers.

Perhaps the pepper spray finally made me understand what the HELL that ear-raping racket was.

Look, we all know men have a lot to apologize for. Manspreading, mansplaining, sexual harassment, street harassment, family dinner, not paying for tampons and birth control, all forms of rape, murder, suicide, corporate greed, wrapping presents, children, the media–but this has got to be the sneakiest fucking form of pure masculine entitlement I've ever encountered. It's so fucking sneaky, I think I might be the first woman to actually realize it's going on, but the most cursory examination will show you that it borders on violent sexual harassment.

I'm talking about fucking manbreathing. Every single day, billions of these sick fuckers are breathing, in and out (and isn't that itself just so rapey, so like those walking dildos?) gulping and sucking up valuable oxygen. It's practically atmosphere-rape. And for what purpose? To make more of themselves. The oxygen they breathe in actually goes to fuel things like cell growth and repair, basic bodily functions, and even life itself.

Socially, manbreathing doesn't spring from a vacuum. It's yet another daily way women shoulder the burden of systemic, institutional sexism. Statistically, it's also the most pervasive form of oppression: One out of one men is a manbreather…and one out of one women has been victimized by it at some point in her life. For some, it's a nightmare that never stops; my husband breathes all day and all night.

Every rapist is also a manbreather. Same with every woman-beater, every genocidal maniac ever, every one of those fucking neckbeard, fedora-wearing, basement-dwelling, micro-peened virgin mama's boys MRAs. Every. One. Of. Them. The scope of the problem makes me ill.

People ask why right now is such a dangerous time for women; I may have single-handedly saved Feminism in 2014, but this angry male respiration thing had been under my nose the whole time, waiting to explode.

That's not even the worst part. They're actually sitting there, excreting in public. They're shamelessly breathing out disgusting bodily waste right in front of us, all the time. You know what wastes they're exhaling? Fucking CO2 and water vapor…two of the biggest greenhouse gases on the planet.

Congratulations, men. Your loud, angry, dangerous Patriarchal manbreathing is destroying the goddamn environment and putting everyone in danger.

Could any more egregious expression of toxic masculinity possibly exist?

Well, I'm going to put a stop to this shit right now. The New York Transit Authority still hasn't corralled men into special harasser's cars, but that's fine–because those harasser's cars would just need non-oxygenating retrofitting, to literally and symbolically show men the airless box of sexism that our Patriarchal culture places women in every day.

It pisses me off, but I can already hear those “MRAs” (as if they needed rights in this male-optimized culture) bleating about how air is a biological necessity, and forcing men into de-oxygenated cars is somehow sexist (uh, no–sexism requires prejudice and cultural, institutional dominance) or that breathing is a biological reality.

Sorry, ‘bruh.’ Breathing is just another cultural construct, but nice try with that reductionist derailment. Besides, all of society is a male safe-space; is it really too much to ask that they be put–for starters!–in airless subway and train cars to protect women’s ears from involuntary auditory penetration?

It’s not just trains and subways, either, though hermetically-sealed Schroedinger’s rapist-only cars will be a major blow at the Patriarchy. Manbreathing is everywhere. It happens billions of times a second, 365 days a year. Every women within 50 meters of a man is at direct risk of encountering it, and someone has to get the word out: it needs to be stopped. NOW, take note: this is what you were made for, your Mt. Everest. Subways are just the beginning: buses, plains, trains, restaurants, hotels, public buildings, even outdoor spaces need to follow suit. Maybe even family homes.

No doubt more sniveling trolls will crawl out, offering tired excuses when the public is made aware of the urgent need to address this supposed “biological reality.” What, it’s necessary to sustain life? That to restrict it in special ventilation-free harasser subway cars is unethical, “misandrist”, and murder? One can only imagine the rants on AVfM or other Far Right misogynist sites, the impotent whining that always comes when bold, independent women challenge another bastion of male power.

You know what? Stop. Just fucking stop. Check your goddamn precious male privilege, and really examine yourself for once in your life. Are you worth that air? Do you truly need it? Do you even know who else could be breathing it? Women. Children. Non-binary genderfluid individuals. Transfolk. Otherkin. Headmates. The LBQT community (sorry, no G–even gay men manbreathe.) People of color. The disabled. The elderly. The list of people your manbreathing is holding goes on and on, but not one of you fuckers has ever spared a second’s thought for them.

Social breathing room is something you’ve denied us far too long, and you have no right to go around, just taking as much oxygen as you want, day in and day out, without considering our needs.

We can only hope that, as men’s air supply in their special non-breathing harassers’ subway cars run out, their last words will be “Need…air.”

So do we, assholes–and now you know how we feel, denied for centuries our souls’ free right to breathe as women, with our own hopes, dreams, rights…and lives.

Stolen at great personal risk by Matt Karlsson (aka ExpatMatt) from inside the Femistaurdian’s high-security vault.

*NOTE: Occasional single sentences and phrases are taken nearly word for word from the published writings, statements and Tweets of Ms. Valenti and Ms. Marcotte. Believe it or not.

My Baby? My Choice! (my life)

AVfM Video Source · 4 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Skeptorr discovers ground zero in the battle for men's full rights as human beings, and he is mad as hell and not taking it any more!

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=6_72qtLK4_g

Transcript

I just watched a disturbing video on YouTube made by Thorium, which is a must see! He talks about male reproductive rights, or rather lack of rights and it really made me angry. If you watch the video, then you'll probably feel the same.

Now usually feminist BS and actions like ShirtStorm, Anita Sarkeesian or even #GamerGate only irritate me to a certain point, but when it comes to this issue it really boils my blood, because this is so far out it's on the other side of the galaxy. More important and critical.

It's outrageous that once a woman gets pregnant, she can unilaterally decide if the baby will be born, or not, and she has complete control over her reproductive rights, yet at the very same time robs the would, or wouldn't be father of his reproductive rights!

It's a disgraceful heinous fact that a woman can steal a man's sperm, by lying to him about taking birth control, or even steal sperm from a used condom, with impunity! And have his child without his consent, or the ability to have any say.

It's a monstrous vile, disgusting, pure evil fact that when a woman robs a man this way, then robs him of the decision to have this baby after getting pregnant, she will also rob his entire life, by making him work day and night to support an unwanted child, and if that's not enough, she can deny the father to have any contact with that child, if she wishes to.

The fact that women are entitled to commit all these crimes by law, this fact that a man can have his life kidnapped, his most basic freedom robbed from him, become a modern age slave, for life – this fact by itself is a crime against humanity. This crime is worse than rape, much worse than rape, because in the long-term rape has only emotional and mental consequences, while enslaving a man have emotional physical, and financial consequences for the rest of his life. But what is really making it worse than rape, is the fact that rape is considered a crime and a rapist can go to jail, yet robbing men of their reproductive rights, their money, their freedom, is a common practice which is actually sometimes encouraged in public spheres, and the "rapists" here are not scorned or god forbid prosecuted but rather revered by so many. If there's a rape culture this is it.

It's no wonder so many men in this situation commit suicide.

And to pour salt on an open bleeding wound, feminists are claiming that women are the ones who get their reproductive rights taken away from them, as if they are the sole victims.

It would be exactly the same I found a girl, shoved her in a dungeon, made her my private slave to take care of me, made her my private sex slave, then go on TV tell all my male friends about it, tell them it's great and they should do it themselves and then complain that I don't get the government to give me money for feeding my slave. Which they would eventually pay, using the tax money taken from my woman slave.

A woman that makes a unilateral decision to have a baby, who cheats a man out of his rights, is no better than Josef Fritzl [Austrian man who held his daughter as a sex slave]. She is Josef Fritzl.

Now imagine thousands upon thousands of Fritzles out there doing what Fritzl did and then talking about it casually in the media and even encouraging it. You know that people, men and women, would go ballistic, and burn the streets! And would have their representatives pay dearly if they did not act against this.

Yet we just take it with silence. Except for small protests here and there by MRAs, we are silent. Because we don't think it can happen to us. Well most women don't think that they will be raped, yet rape is discussed daily and laws are promoted by everyone, all the time, in every venue.

We need to realize that all the other feminist stuff we protest and mock is dwarfed when it comes to this issue. This is crossing all the red lines! This is war! This is Armageddon! I cannot think of a proper word to stress this enough.

And we allow this thing to happen everywhere on a daily basis. Hell we don't even think about it because we are so unaware. Not by accident, someone makes sure that we stay unaware.

In all the time that I have protested feminism and talked about men's rights on occasion, behind a keyboard, this is the first time I feel I cannot take it anymore. This is the first time that I will get off my skinny ass and not just talk about it, I will actively do something about it. From this point I will take action to let my fellow-men know about this disaster. I will ask men and women to join me, and other activists like the MRA's, to go on an all-out war to ensure that basic fundamental rights of reproduction and financial responsibilities be legalized, to protect men, and also make sure that when a man is robbed of his rights the robber will be held accountable, and penalized if necessary.

Final words.

For full disclosure, even though I know MRA's and engage with them on occasion, I've never identified as one, or considered myself a part of the any men's rights movement, but in this case I will make an exception. Not to trivialize other basic rights that men don't have – this issue in my opinion, outweighs them all. Because of the magnitude of damage and destruction it generates.

How many of us never think about this issue or think it's not important enough? I will tell you who knows about it and has never done anything to change it.

Politicians.

Men's rights activists and ren's rights organizations made sure politicians knew, but because we the public do not stand behind MRA's, politicians continue to ignore and dismiss them.

All the politicians, all our leaders, have failed us. All of them betrayed us, time after time, and we let them get away with it. Leaders like the president of the US, who shamelessly stood in a public forum and openly lied about the wage gap and consequently used this lie to issue executive orders to give more benefits to protect women's reproductive rights like paying for their contraceptives, and health services, at the same time men are enslaved on a daily basis, which he completely ignores and dismisses. Politicians like Barak Obama are nothing but traitors to their fellow-men, the worst traitors to their own kind. We must never forget or forgive them for this.

Men, women, if you have any shred of decency, if you have any shred of humanity in you, stop sitting on your asses and do something about it. You need to take action, you must take action.. Start by talking about this with everyone you know, share information with them, and then do something to let your representatives know, not only as individuals but as a unified voice.

You don't need to be an MRA but we all need to firmly and openly and actively behind them on this one, because they are our front line. They are the ones who fight for us, every day in spite our lack of support, in spite of ourselves.

Now if you please excuse me… I need to go now and find my local men's rights representative and offer my help. All of you must do the same.

Cenk Uygur vs Karen Straughan: Cenk blows a fuse

Paul Elam · 5 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I watched the recent interview of Karen Straughan by Young Turks host Cenk Uygur with a now very familiar sense of amusement. Then I watched it again for the LOLZ.

Full disclosure here. There is an element to the man that I actually like. His politics are in fantasy land, but there does seem to be a streak in Cenk that actually walks some of the stuff he talks. I watched him deliver this speech on mainstream government corruption (and mainstream media complicity) some time ago and was so impressed with that particular message on that particular day that I posted it to A Voice for Men.

Alas, that was a different message on a different day. Perhaps Cenk's venture into sanity was a fluke, because in his interview with Straughan he jumped the shark with Olympic skill. If you have not seen the interview with Straughan, here it is. Everything I have to say will make a lot more sense after watching it.

What Cenk does here is a real life psychodrama on the mindset of the acutely indoctrinated. It is there to be seen in facial expressions, body language, tone and affect with every word that comes out of his very programmed mouth.

The dissonance is palpable. Note the hesitancy, right from the beginning, as he "acknowledges" that men and boys face issues that indeed require some sort of movement to address. He has all the confidence of an antebellum plantation owner acknowledging that perhaps enslaving people is unfair. As he talks of the necessity for a men's movement his eyes wander, as though looking for an exit.

I think Cenk knows he needs to do this, as the days when outright denial of the fact that men have unique issues have passed. We have entered the days of acknowledging men's issues but asserting that MHRAs should not be talking about them; a sentiment that virtually drips with every grudging, condescending admission that he makes. It is clear at that part that he is telling the truth, and he hates every freaking second of it.

What he leaves us with is an attempt at a slightly more sophisticated version of "Yes, men have issues, but, (insert bullshit reason to ignore them here)." Standard stuff for your average indoctrinated pundit, but due to his obvious level of insecurity with the subject he is discussing, he winds up less rational than when he started.

That's where Cenk sealed his own fate and placed himself directly on course for the unavoidable meltdown. Karen short-circuited the man's thinking by presenting him with a much more nuanced, informed and rational look at the history of suffrage than his ideology and soundbite-addled brain could handle. It overloaded his "poor little wimmens could not vote and that is that" circuit, and since there is no breaker box up there sparks started shooting from his brain and his mouth.

He turned into an irrational bully, and on the quick, raising his voice, interrupting repeatedly and demanding that Karen issue a public thank you to feminism which it does not deserve and which she was clearly not inclined to give. Then he resorted to name calling.

I cannot pretend to speak for Karen Straughan, but I can only imagine the irony she must have felt as Cenk went near postal, refusing to allow her to talk, shrieking about how radical she was.

All because she educated him on aspects of history with which he had never considered, and which undermined his distorted worldview.

For the record, she was right. Voting rights for men in the US were (and still are) tied directly to their literal availability for conscription and forced service by the state. Women in the US have had the vote for 95 years with no such assumption of their availability for die for democracy and better commerce. It is a right without a corresponding responsibility that men do not and never have enjoyed. To take it another step forward, there is a strong constitutional argument that without joining men in selective service and forced conscription when it is visited on men, women should not have the right to vote.

Radical? Perhaps to Cenk Uygur. But I am betting that he would not feel that way if he pulled his fingers out of his ears and quit saying, “la-la-la-la-la-la I am not list-en-ing to you!”

I have some suggestions for Cenk, should he be inclined to consider them. One, don’t lose your cool over an ideological tenet that does not reconcile with the facts. It makes you look as irrational and pseudoscientific as a creationist explaining to paleontologists that the world is 7,000 years old.

Blowing up on people in public for daring to be more informed than you are only impresses a following of the terminally stupid.

Asserting that all women should thank feminism for pushing an agenda that privileges women with the same rights as men, but exempts them from the corresponding responsibilities? Cenk, say it ain’t so.

If you want to go that route, you might want to replace the word “women” with the word “children,” as it much easier to digest an egregiously unfair double standard when done for the sake of the feeble and incompetent, which is precisely what you must imagine women to be if you think that way.

Finally, I will suggest some humility for Cenk. There is a men’s human rights movement. It is real, and you just talked to one of its leading voices. With all respect, no one gives a fudgsicle whether you grudgingly admit that there is some merit to it. It will not be shouted down by ideologues who continually display ignorance of and indifference toward historical facts. In fact, it is people like Cenk who are accelerating this movement, courtesy of their willingness to make embarrassing asses of themselves in defense of their own ignorance.

PZ Myers, forgery, and libel: “Duck morality is not for me”

Dean Esmay · 5 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

PZ Myers, the Grand Patriarch of FreeThoughtBlogs, is a biologist and an Associate Professor at a pretty decent liberal arts college. Academically, his career has been one of no great distinction; the fact that he’s still an Associate Professor at age 58–at a Liberal Arts school that mostly offers preparatory degrees for those going on to bigger universities–should clue you in that his achievements as a scientist are hardly impressive.

There is of course no shame in that; simply being a good teacher is one of the most honorable things you can be in this world. And indeed, evidence is that for an undergrad science teacher, he’s pretty good at his job. I imagine he might make a pretty good High School science teacher as well.

However, instead of being content and proud to be a good teacher, it seems that for many years he has tried to overcome his lack of academic and scientific distinction by attacking Creationism (which is like shooting fish in a barrel for a living) as well as bullying anyone of traditional religious bent, while also bullying anyone who dares dissent from any of his atheist-y psuedoreligious “Social Justice” beliefs, such as the ideological feminist pseudoscience he consistently refuses to confront.

He is notorious for attacking minority religious groups, slandering others as rapists with no evidence but allegations, endorsing censorship of campus newspapers he does not approve of, and more. Indeed, by his own standards on rape allegations, he and several other male FreeThoughtBloggers should be presumed to be confessed rapists. (He is of course no such thing, but by his own pseudoscientific standards he should be considered one.)

As a male who embraced the modern day religion of Feminism, it should not surprise that he’s in the habit of smearing men’s human rights advocates of just about every bad thing you can, up to and including pedophilia (which, as a survivor of childhood sexual abuse, all I can say is this: screw yourself sideways with a porcupine PZ). It is worth noting that he’s been politely challenged on dozens of occasions to rebut us on anything we advocate on an evidence-based basis. These requests have always been ignored, so we assume that, like most feminists, he has no rational response to any of the issues we raise on education, suicide, homelessness, criminal justice, family law, genital mutilation, sexual assault and abuse, domestic abuse, and more: we dare to question Feminist Ideology, and as a proud Priest in that Church, he requires no evidence to maintain his faith in the Holy Dogma of Patriarchy Theory.

Mostly we’re content to ignore PZ and the sinking ship that is FreeThoughtBlogs. It’s such a cesspool of antihumanist, hateful ideology, cheap shots, character assassination, harassment, unverifiable allegations, and smear campaigns, why bother? Still, when they outright egregiously lie about us (which they’ve been known to do), it seems worth noting. And when they use clearly manufactured evidence that not only a High School kid could spot, but that anyone who knows anything about us would instantly recognize as wrong, well, I guess we have to acknowledge them.

Not long ago, it was brought to our attention that PZ Myers had libeled Paul Elam with a forged document. No, this is not a matter of opinion. The document is a forgery; our only question is whether Myers created the forgery himself, fabricating the story whole cloth, or if he simply took the word of whoever sent it and did not do the most basic work of verifying its authenticity before launching another smear tirade against someone just because he doesn’t like them.

In a posting entitled Duck morality is not for me, PZ Myers “quoted” Paul Elam as writing things he never wrote. A simple phone call or email to Paul to verify the quote, or checking for a hyperlink to our forums, would have made it easy for Myers to verify the truth of this. Frankly, just a little skepticism would have been called for: anyone who actually looks at this with their own naked eye can see that it does not line up very well with how messages are generally displayed in our forums.

Still, here’s an exact copy of the forged image that Myers used:

This forgery appears to have come in part from this thread in our forum, where you can immediately see, formatting doesn't quite look like that picture would have it. It's also a thread Paul never posted in. It does appear that the forgery used some of what's there that's written by other people, and some of which is clearly just text that's never appeared in our forums, or would likely cause heated debate (and likely mocking) if it did.

But if the naked eye won't do it for you, just adjusting the contrast on the image makes it obvious that this is a really bad forgery:

Looks like he didn't even bother using something decent like Photoshop, but rather a crude program like MS Paint or something.

I asked Paul what he thought of this. He said he finds Myers "such an obvious hack I don't think we should bother responding to him." But I think it's important to get this out there since some credulous people do still take Myers' blogging seriously. So I asked him and he obliged.

> That quotation is a bunch of pseodoscientific horseshit and anyone who knows me knows I'd call that what looks like some of the seedier and dumber PUA crap out there. Not that all PUA is BS but that's what some of > the worst fringe material in PUA-land looks like. Also by the way, Ayn Rand is OK but I'm not a huge fan so I'd never use that quote except ironically, since I don't embrace male chauvinism. For fuck's sake, humans are pairbonders, not all men fawn over all women, and I've said thousands of times over the years that I reject the entire Alpha/Beta male paradigm for humans to begin with. If you know anything about evolution you know damned well that if we were rape-type tournament maters like gorillas we would never have evolved human civilization. That PZ Myers is such a dishonest and irresponsbile douchebag isn't surprising, and at this point I'm used to people putting words in my mouth that I never said. But holy shit can you get any dumber? PZ would try to get a student expelled for this shit, and if the FreeThought Blogs community had any standards they'd throw his ass out. I guess they can't because he owns it, but Christ can you get more pathetic? FreeThoughtBlogs isn't for atheists, it's for morons peddling Social Justice Crusaderism and Feminism as their religon."

Anyway, we won't hold our breaths waiting for PZ Myers to in any way apologize for passing off this crude and obvious forgery. At this point we've seen enough of the man's work to know he'd never be so honest or so honorable; even if he does retract, he'll likely try to claim this is our fault somehow anyway.

But let's be clear: PZ Myers has now undeniably engaged in willfully putting out a provably forged, libelous document. He ought to face censure from the academic, humanist, skeptical, and "FreeThought" communities. We doubt any of that will happen, so we just put this out there in the public record for anyone who cares.

Editorial note: the [sarcasm] 100% true-to-life professional photo [/sarcasm] of PZ Myers that we used for the title image here is courtesy of the Where In The World Is PZ Myers campaign. More people should join!

James Robertson proves that "Black Male Privilege" is bunk and Black political leadership is a failure

Mumia Ali · 5 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

> "Sheeeeeeeit…"
> -Clay Davis, The Wire

Perhaps you've heard of one Mr. James Robertson, of the smouldering crater that was once the proud city of Detroit, and his literal Long Walk to work on the daily – to the tune of 21 miles each way. He has done this for at least a decade, and has touched off a crowdfunding firestorm, complete with offers of cars, money and more from people all over the country. It, of course, has sparked a conversation about all of the usual tropes: about how we, the United States of America, shouldn't be having people laboring under such conditions due to our wealth and largesse; about how evil Republicans view working folk, especially those who happen to be non-White; and, of course, more general pearl-clutching at notions of Racism and the like being the culprit of long-festering conditions that have brought great cities like Motown low.

But what gets left out are the following questions and issues that your correspondent will raise in today's essay. To do that, I refer the reader to a previous article of mine, "Tackling The Bugbear of "Black Male Privilege" – where I made the case, in point for point fashion, that the "argument" proffered by the Black Feminists and Social Justice Warrior crowd, is a feeble one. No one with a straight face, after looking at Mr. Robertson's daily travails, can say that he is somehow "privileged" over all Black women, forever and ever Amen, by simply being Black and well, male. The absurdity gets even greater, when we consider those who make such statements, again with a straight face, who in every way anyone who actually is in tune with reality could recognize, that they are hand over fist more privileged than Mr. Robertson. I mean, really – does anyone reading this believe that Princeton-educated First Lady Michelle Obama, or MSNBC fixture Prof. Melissa Harris-Perry, or media icon Oprah Winfrey, is less privileged than Mr. Robertson?

Really?

It has long been my view that the "thinking" on the part of the supposed Talented Tenth class in Black America has been fuzzy for a very long time, and does not acquit them well, nor does it make the rest of us look good before the world. The proof, in glaring relief and brutally painful detail, can be seen in Detroit itself. While Black Talking Heads like to trot out all manner of excuses as to how and why Detroit has become the poster child for Black fracture, failure and dysfunction (read: "it's all the White Man's fault"), the historical record says something else: at this juncture in 2015, Motown has been under the thumb of a one-party/one-race political rule for the better part of a half a century, and the results are bleedingly, painfully obvious. Sure, racism happened – but what does that have to do with the actions of Coleman Young – or more recently, Kwame' Kilpatrick? How does that square with the kinds of antics that routinely occur in city council, where the wives of prominent Black US congressmen routinely get rip with school kids? How are we to explain the rife corruption, incompetence, graft, greed and just in-your-face cronyism that was endemic on the watch of Black political leadership?

What, Mr. Charlie made them do it?

If you're detecting just a hint of extra "salt" in my remarks and observations, it's because in so many ways, James Robertson is me – as a fellow Blue Collar Brotha who was born and raised in a de facto Black city with strong working class roots, I too have seen how the so-called Black political leadership has run my hometown into the ground, and has not just not done anything worth the name for Black voters, but they've made matters markedly worse. Many of them have no qualms robbing their own constituents blind, all the while talking all that "Black" smack – much like the fictional Clay Davis from The Wire.

And yet, Black folk continue to vote for these jokers, term after term, year after year, and for what? So they can gain some kind of psychological satisfaction from seeing a Black face in a High Place?

You have got to be kidding me.

One of the things I have been doing is asking Black men in particular – everyday, salt of the earth, out on the bricks, working Black men – exactly what has Black political leadership in general, and yeah I'll say it, Presidential leadership in particular in the person of Mr. Barack Obama, done for them? Usually I get some mumbling about "history" or "racism," but when I ask them have they made more or less money since Obama took the White House for instance, all of a sudden they either get really mad, or they get really quiet. When I bring it back home to the local scene, much of the same pattern ensues. Once I roll out fact after fact and instance after instance of exactly how their own Black leaders have actively worked to undermine their own interests, that's when I'm accused of being a Black Republican, a sellout, an Uncle Tom, a self-hater, and so forth. Of course, all of this is just a smokescreen – they do all of this, because they CAN'T refute any of what I have just said.

And yet, they can and will turn right around and vote for these jokers – again. What. An. Embarrassment.

And this is how and why I am a Black Men's Rights Activist – because, truth be told, Black men, especially those like James Robertson, don't have advocates. The cruel joke that is the Black political "leadership" abandoned men like him a long way back, and what's worse, they actively leech off what little lifeblood they can get from him and other Black men, who as we all have seen in the past few years alone, are literally dying out in the streets in a death-by-a-thousand-cuts fashion, all the while singing the tune of fictive "Black kinship." It makes me mad enough to hock and spit.

It was men like James Robertson, and my dad and granddad, and yea, I'll say it, me – who made it possible for all these Black Talking Heads to pontificate from on-high, and what my brothers get for their continued and unquestioned support is a bucket of piss thrown in their faces while being told that it's raining outside.

I don't want to hear anything about "see, what had happened was…racism!" nor do I care to be particular as to which Black pols did or didn't do thus and so – they are all to blame.

And it was long overdue that they were put on blast and told they suck.

What is it going to take for you to wake up, Black man? Don't you get it? The Black political class – which includes, most definitely, the Black Feminist Brigades – have thrown you under the bus a long time ago. Oh sure, when someone not-Black does one of you in, here they come to cry some crocodile tears, toss out some bread and put on some circus minstrel shows to keep you distracted (and never mind when black cops harass you, right?) – but where it counts, on a whole range of life indices, they do less-than-nothing for you; and as we've seen in the machinations of the Black Feminist crowd, they work to actively grease the skids to run you over.

The working class working man, and for purposes of this discussion the Black one, has seen his standard of living sink to truly third world levels, and all on the watch of the so-called Best & Brightest that Black America has to offer. It is time we told the whole lot of them that we want a divorce.

Sorority Row: solipsism, cognitive dissonance, and phony “Bid Night” outrage at the University of Virginia

Ty Henry · 5 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Phi Kappa Psi House at University of Virginia

The mascot of the University Of Virginia is the Cavalier. And the sorority women of Jefferson’s venerable institution believe that’s how their right to freely associate and look after themselves was dismissed by matriarchs of their organizations. So says, Ms Story Hinckley, a sorority active and senior.

At first blush, Hinckley’s entreaty not only tugs at the heartstrings, it threatens to yank the entire interior vena cava from its moorings. She has created an online petition to revoke the edict from a coalition of national sorority directors that their UVa actives not attend fraternity parties, starting with “bid night,” festivities, where chapters accept new member pledges, and, like most fraternity functions, good libations are rumored to flow, and, the matriarchs fear, bloomers are rumored to fall, forcibly or otherwise, as the women are trapped into spontaneous bacchanals by Rape Lycans.

Not so, says Hinckley.

> This is gender discrimination.
>
> Instead of addressing rape and sexual assault at UVa, this mandate perpetuates the idea that women are inferior, sexual objects. It is degrading to Greek women, as it appears that the NPC views us as defenseless and UVa’s new fraternal policies as invalid. Allowing the NPC to prevent us from celebrating (what used to be) a tight-knit community, sends the message that we are weak.
>
> Please sign this petition to support women’s rights at the University of Virginia.

In another letter to the sorority dictators, quoted by the Washington Post’s Susan Svrluga, signatories take issue with the presumed “diminished capacity for agency” implicit within the edict.

Sounds like a cause one can get behind. After all, who wants to see adult women essentially grounded for having done nothing wrong? These women signed up for college Greek life, not a convent. How dare the National Panhellenic and various Sorority National Directors take these “strong women” back to the 1950s, treating them like “children,” they demur.

“This is not an issue of we’re angry because we can’t go out and drink,” says Sara Surface to NPR affiliate WVTF. “It’s an issue over whether or not we have the choice.”

Seems the only choice was to sign the petition, in the name of The Father, The Son and The Holy Booger from

"Revenge Of The Nerds." But not before a visit to the medicine cabinet, for two red pill caplets to blend into my fruit smoothie. Doing such is always a Huxley-esque and clarifying experience, and this time was no different. Indeed, the varied squalls and squawks of displeasure synthesized into their real meaning, as only the words "solipsism" and "cognitive dissonance" were visible on the page.

What complicates sympathy for the plight of these women is that they only sought to advocate for their "adult agency" when faced with prior restraint on their movements and activities. However, a search for a similar outflow of activist remonstration after fraternities were extorted into being conscripted to the role of "Sober Monitors" for these "adults," under threat of revocation of recognition on campus comes up curiously empty. Funny, that.

As our colleague Pierce Harlan at Community of the Wrongly Accused eloquently lays out, the campus rape hysteria template is modeled after how the law protects child victims. Not surprisingly, the new Fraternal Operating Agreement addenda, announced by University President Theresa Sullivan, follows this template. Its provisions require, inter alia, that a minimum of three brothers be lucid at all events. Only these "sober brothers" would have access to upstairs rooms, and would monitor who can enter and exit rooms. It also includes "Bystander Intervention Training," ostensibly to spirit away the innocents in the nick of time. The "agreement" also includes such feminist code words as "addressing. . .unhealthy power structures" and "eliminating chaos and discomfort."

In other words, all risk for the women (children) is outsourced to the men (grown-ups). Can't have the coeds being groomed for spontaneous, tipsy carnal knowledge. It's the same principle at play with the new "affirmative consent" laws; Sexual contact with women is a presumptive crime, as it is with minors.

This hissy fit isn't about freedom. It's about privilege. Specifically, conferring upon these women the privilege to constrain male sexuality whilst holding in reserve the right to invoke post hoc plausible deniability for their own, something Title IX coordinators endorse, especially at Virginia colleges.

Moreover, how many opportunities to take a stand did the Good Greek Women of UVa. let fly by? In light of Ms. Hinckley's stated frustration of the Greek men being stereotyped as "stupid rapist fraternity brother. 'No women can come to your house on this night because they will all be sexually assaulted,"a review is in order.

When their fellow Greeks carried the cross of a fantastical horror story equal parts Animal House, Silence Of The Lambs and McMartin Pre-School/Kern County as a part of "ritual pledge initiation". . .what did they do?

When the story led to these young men being driven from their homes, in fear for their lives after naked acts of terrorism and threats. . .what did they do?

When a student coalition suggested "secret trials" for their "friends," as well as other campus men . . .what did they do?

And yet, when the toga-clad chickens come home to roost, spiking the punch not with date-rape sedatives but with an acrid, caustic load of The Law Of Unintended Consequences expelled from their bowels, they demand the world take notice of their campus-wide bitter beer faces?

How convenient. . .and "cavalier."

This MGTOW doesn't understand humans

AVfM Video Source · 5 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Some have questioned the wisdom of AVfM calling out the extremist fringe that seems to have begun to hijack the noble philosohy of Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW), or even questioned whether such a radical fringe exists. TL;dr, who is not a Men's Rights Activist (so far as we can tell) or a MGTOW (so far as we can tell), nevertheless has a good example of why calling out the fringe is an unpleasant but necessary task:

Despite whatever lies you may have heard, AVfM has supported MGTOW since the day it began, and will always support MGTOW, even MGTOW we don't always agree with. What we will not support is FringeTOW, PigTOW, whatever you want to call them, spreading hatred and pseudoscience.

Anger is a legitimate emotion in the face of injustice. When anger turns to an unending hate and fear and loathing, it's like drinking poison to get back at your enemies.

As the attacks step up, so will I

Paul Elam · 6 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Just last night Buzzfeed published an attack piece on me in the most personal of ways, by digging over 30 years into my past and gathering or paying for statements from my ex-wife and my estranged daughter (referred to by Buzzfeed as "Bonnie"). Very few of you will know I have an estranged daughter. I have the hope in reading this you will understand why I never dragged this part of my life into the public arena.

To make that more explicit I have elected in the past to never speak about this part of my life. I made that decision because the nature of my work subjects me and those close to me to attacks routinely. I did not want to subject anyone to that unnecessarily.

However, since my daughter and former wife have elected for whatever reason to insert themselves into my public life, I see no other alternative than to respond with my side of this story.

If you will allow me a moment's digression, I need to point out that it has not been established that I actually have a daughter. I think it is possible, even likely, but I don't know for sure. For the sake of simplicity, though, I will use that word where it fits.

There were several distortions printed, some of them direct quotes from the mother and daughter, some of them just "reporting" as usual for people like Adam Serwer. In this piece he was trying to create a financial boogeyman, but only as a side note. The piece is really dedicated to where he thinks it will hurt.

As a much younger man I met a woman I was quite attracted to, and who was very enthusiastic about sex. Our first date turned into a live-in and ultimately to a poorly thought-out marriage.

My wife was indeed very enthusiastic about sex. The naivety of my youth also made me pretty blind to the fact that her sexual enthusiasm wasn't limited to me. There was an unending string of affairs. By the time we separated Bonnie had been born and my ex was pregnant again. As the relationship ended, I learned of even more affairs from friends who were silent while we were together.

It was at this time, when I was confronting her about what she had done, that she revealed to me that she had been "raped," though it was not by a friend of mine. It was a friend of hers. Given her ongoing dishonesty about the affairs and many inconsistencies she related about the alleged rape, I did not believe her. I still don't. She cheated and lied constantly.

She also alleges I had a drug and alcohol problem. There is some truth to that, though no more at all a problem than she herself had, including drinking and smoking PCP while she was pregnant with her daughter.

We were both wild, stupid kids. Sad but hopefully forgivable. I, for one, turn my youthful poor judgement with drugs and turn that into a 30 year career helping addicts recover.

Anyway, I became very suspicious about paternity issues as the grief of the breakup cleared the denial I had about her character, and I requested paternity testing, which she refused to give. Needless to say, that compounded my fears that I was going to be saddled with the price tag for my exes cheating.

After being served, I wrote her attorney and demanded paternity testing again, which was again refused. I informed him at that time that I had no intention of paying, jail or no.

Eventually he returned that message with an offer. Pay $1,200.00 and relinquish parental rights forever. Again I interpreted this as yet more of an indication that my then wife was unsure of paternity. The deal was sealed, and I picked up my life and moved on.

I do not regret doing that. I feel bad for Bonnie, but that is a separate and distinct issue from my choices at the time. I had a promiscuous wife who was a habitual liar. I had every sensible reason to suspect that I was not the biological father. And while I would not allow myself to get in that situation again, if for some reason I did I would make the same choices without hesitation.

In 2005, Bonnie contacted me by mail, as is said in the article. We exchanged emails, and in the first one I told her that there was a very good chance I was not her biological father, but that I would very much like to meet her.

We talked on the phone a few times and made arrangements to meet. When we did I saw a family resemblance, though looking back I am not sure if I was seeing what I wanted to see. I sure did not act on it. While we never got paternity testing, I was satisfied on meeting her that she was my biological daughter. And yes, I did cry. Not for shame or personal remorse, but for a sadness. I did not, as alleged, tell Bonnie that I was sorry that I had failed her. I told her that I was sorry such misfortune had been her lot. I did not tell her that I would understand if she hated me. I told her that I would understand if she were angry. And I still do understand that. I would be angry if I grew up like she did.

I was trying as best I could to be open to whatever her experience of that was, but I never felt and still don't that this was something I had done to her. It all could have been avoided with a simple paternity test that her mother would not allow.

A lot of things could have been avoided. Bonnie and her brother both revealed to me on meeting them that the woman I was married to was the same woman they had experienced growing up. Chronic drinking, drugs, a series of short term, often volatile relationships in which both Bonnie and her brother were abused. The abuse was at the hands of her mother and some number of her mother's boyfriends. They disclosed that in nearly all those relationships their mother had cheated.

As to more recent events, I can only suspect that money or anger or possibly both have driven Bonnie to deceit. You have read a story that tells you I was more interested in fancy living than in family. You were told that I spanked my grandson, with the implication that this is why she left without returning my calls (which Serwer takes the liberty to twist into my leaving her again).

That is not what happened. As in all interpersonal matters, things are much more complicated than short, easy to digest versions fit for Buzzfeed reading level. There is the surface actions, and then there is what happens beneath the current. I will tell you both.

I invited Bonnie and her husband down to Houston for a visit a week after my partner and I bought a new home. In hindsight that was a mistake. It was blistering hot and my partner and I had completely exhausted ourselves with the move. I was certainly grumpy and not at my best. It was a bad time to receive them and I know that it showed in my attitude and demeanor.

I was indeed frustrated with both my grandsons. Both were at difficult ages to begin with. They also acted out a great deal at the time in general, I think related to the hostilities they lived with in Bonnie's marriage, and to the fact that her mother, still drinking heavily and very emotionally unstable, lived with them.

I had become uncomfortable at that point visiting them because of the constant tension and fighting in their home.

I know that I snapped a couple of times at Bonnie's children, but I never laid a finger on either of them. When I called and left a voicemail apology to her later on, it was not an apology for spanking anyone, it was an apology for being irritable and less than hospitable while she was there at my invitation.

That is the surface of things. But as I said there is much more underneath. One of the things that I discovered during this remarkable chapter in my life was that sadly I could not get back time lost with Bonnie. There was too much water under the bridge. No matter how hard I tried, and I did for six years, I did not adjust well to the shocker of becoming an overnight father and grandfather. There were too many missing pieces. No matter what I did I would never have the kind of relationship that comes from raising someone. There was a depth of connection that would just not happen.

I was not going to fill the hole in Bonnie's heart from a missing father and a string of abusive replacements. I think we were both starting to figure this out in our own way.

And I think that is where the friction comes in. Bonnie has said that I was more concerned with my new home than with her. What she did not say is that she had repeatedly asked me about moving to her city to be closer. I am sure that the new home represented the end of that thinking for her, and that it hurt.

She was not in a good place herself when she arrived. It was apparent to both my partner and myself that something was bothering her from the moment she walked in the door. That is only a guess on my part, but I am pretty sure that I am right.

That sums up everything I think is worth saying here. Bonnie and her mother both have been less than honest, even attributing racial slurs to me that I did not say, and a number of other items too trivial to go in to. I can speculate that it was maybe for some silver, and that is possible. But I am guessing that it is more about what is obvious to me. Bonnie got short changed. She is angry, and I don't blame her. I don't think this path is going to lead to any peace for her, but often these things take much longer than we would like to land people in a better place.

She must on some level be doing what she thinks she needs to do. I actually hope it does work for her and I wish her the very best in life.

So now, as AVFM continues to grow, I know that I will increasingly be targeted and by people willing to invest much more time and money in doing so. After a long, emotional and sleepless night last night, I am no less committed to seeing this through than I was the day before. Nothing has changed, except perhaps that some of you know me a little better now.

See you all in Houston for ICMI15.

A thinking man's rebuttal to "The Thinking Man's" attack on the Men's Rights Movement

Mumia Ali · 6 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

> "False media – we don't need it, do we?"
> -Chuck D, "Don't Believe The Hype"

The proverbial ink had barely dried on Ms. Mariah Blake's drive-by shooting of a article that appeared on the Mother Jones website last week, where once again the Manosphere in general and A Voice For Men in particular, came in for yet another toss under the bus – this time by none other than White Knight in residence over at London's Telegraph, Mr. Andrew Lowry, the self-proclaimed "Thinking Man". is column generates a hella more heat than light on a movement that the mainstream media, academia and Social Justice Warrior Class – a cabal known to us Manospherians as the Cathedral – can no longer ignore.

The Men's Rights Movement.

As if reading from the same page of the Cathedral's hymnal, Lowry follows in lemming lockstep fashion behind Blake, in attempting to foist lie after lie and half-truth after half-truth on a still-unsuspecting public about exactly who the MRM is and why we do what we do. Without further ado, your correspondent will address, in point for point fashion, Lowry's canards and dispatch each with the truth. Because, as we all know, the truth, shall set you free.

Lowry opens his screed about young Ben Moynihan, the British citizen who stabbed three women on the basis of his supposed mating woes (Moynihan claimed being a hopeless virgin). The problem with this line of argument, is that Moynihan didn't have any links to the Manosphere – just like another young man Lowry squawks about, the late Eliot Rodger – who, it has also been proven, not to have any links whatsoever to the Manosphere. In fact, the only link he did have to anything related to men, was a website known as PUAHate, which, as the name infers, didn't exactly view Venusian Artists in a flattering light.

Lowry's mention of George Sodini though, does require a bit of clarification: he did indeed avail himself of Pickup materials in an effort to end his multi-decades long sexual drought. However, the name of the instructor/author Sodini selected was not known to me, nor to anyone else I happen to know in the seduction community of any consequence. That bad actors (like RSD's Mr. Julien Blanc) abound in any human endeavor, desire or interest that has proven profitable, would seem to be a given to the point of going without mention, except when it comes to the Pickup community for some strange and odd reason. In any event, none of that is meant to explain away or rationalize Sodini's actions, and every article or blogpost I saw on the topic was one where it was clear on the part of the pickup authors, that they condemned what Sodini did.

I did, and still do, share that view.

Lowry attempts to forge a guilt-by-association, wedded to a haggard causation-equals-correlation argument between these events and the burgeoning MRM – you know, a classic case of Post Hoc Ergo Propter Hoc – facts be damned.

Wow. Just…wow.

Next, the so-called Thinking Man rhetorically asks, seemingly with a straight face, what kind of world do we MRAs think we're living in? I am only to happy to oblige with an answer:

We live in a world where a woman, sight unseen and real name unknown, can weave a story about being viciously gang-raped, without a shred of evidence, or witnesses, and then have her story brought before the world by one of the world's renowned pop culture publications – only to be proven a horrid lie.

We live in a world where a man, who just happens to be Black, who has dedicated his life to actually doing something meaningful in helping the Black folk who need the help the most, have his name and legacy dragged through the mud by more than two dozen women, again, without a shred of evidence – and no one pays a price for that. The more things change, the more they stay the same, indeed.

We live in a world where men of color like Jorge Pena, who was just minding his own business on public transportation, can be relentlessly street harassed and then viciously attacked, by women of color, and his ordeal is by no means unusual or unique – indeed, according to avowed feminist and founder of Slate's Double X column Hanna Rosin, it's very much on the rise, the incidence of violent and antisocial women and young girls in our time.

We live in a time where for straight men who happen to like the female form in a sexual way, they are shamed and demonized for it, clowned and badgered about their desire to want to learn how to improve themselves so as to be better able to achieve their desires, be that for one night, or for a lifetime with that special lady. Sex positivity for me (if you're "alt"), but not for thee (if you're a straight guy and get the warm and fuzzies for women).

And that's just for starters. I've written more extensively all over the Internet about the hows and whys I, as a Black man, find the Men's Rights agenda to be quite valuable and meaningful to me.

But, of course, I'm the kind of guy the Andrew Lowrys and other Dudley Do-Rights of the world, never seem able to get around to actually talk to, instead of about.

And that quip about how men are the ones who have that ability to make war on others – that it is somehow unique to our "kind"? Note how Lowry goes to myth over fact: right there in his native UK, a Prime Minister took her nation to war for the first time since Churchill; Israel's first female PM waged war; and India's first female PM initiated a military operation in the far north of her country that set in motion events that would result in her own death. Nor are they themselves, unique; history going as far back as Cleopatra herself, records female leaders being quite bloodthirsty.

The record as we have it on women in power, suggests quite powerfully that they have every bit as much a taste for blood and treasure as any man.

As more hit-pieces come out about the MRM, those sitting on the sidelines need to ask themselves: why aren't these people having a sitdown with those of us who have been toiling away in the trenches, for years? Why are they so content to crib the shoddiest of notes from the most fringe elements of the movement? Why won't they actually address the issues about the MRM they claim are indeed legitimate? What are they afraid of – that their preconceived notions will be proven false?

No, Mr. Lowry – what's pathetic, is that committed ideologues like you, can't even be bothered to get the most basic of facts straight on the matter.

Oh, how the mighty have fallen, indeed.

More video game misogyny

AVfM Video Source · 6 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Calling Anita Sarkeesian! Calling FemFrequency! A just released video game is rife with rape fantasies, violence against women, unrealistic, hypersexualized, helpless women and phallic imagery! We need this to stop!

SkepTorr nails it again!

Beverly O'Connor's twisted view of sex

Jim Muldoon · 7 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Beverley O'Connor has talked some drivel in her time. But one effort she made last year is Feminist Sacred Babble at its finest. She decried that "Porn obscures our view of women."

Now you know, before you read any further, that "our" doesn't include O'Connor. Her view of women is in perfect focus.

She begins:

> I remember when, as a young girl and woman, you'd hear men in a group laughing uproariously as one declared that a woman's place was barefoot and pregnant in the kitchen.

Do you remember this time? I don't. O'Connor claims that this caricature of boorish masculinity not only existed, but was the norm. However, in these enlightened times, those invented days are now behind us.

> It may be the company I keep, but it seems to me that any debate about the right of women to work was over.

Let's ignore, for the moment, that there have always been women who worked, and therefore they have always had that right. There have always been "latch key" kids. There have always been women who, either by circumstances, ambition or both, managed to earn a wage.

Let's pretend that this Patriarchal world existed. If she is barefoot and pregnant, he has yet another mouth to feed and more clothes to buy. There might even be a need for a bigger house with an even bigger mortgage or higher rent. And the burden to provide would fall squarely on his shoulders.

It would mean, for him, working harder, competing for more promotions, and working even longer hours. He might have to get a second job. And, the bigger the burden, the more precarious the balancing act of staying in front, the greater the pressure.

So why is he laughing?

> Those of us who grew up post-feminism, well, we expected to be valued contributors in the workforce and have careers if we chose to.

There are a two things to note here. First, if she grew up "post-feminism," where did the laughing patriarchs and the pregnant women chained to the sink come from? Secondly, "we expected… [to work]… if we chose to" is an astonishing arrogance for someone claiming underclass status. Would O'Connor allow any man such a choice?

If only this was the low-point of O'Connor's babble. It gets worse.

> But it seems we might be hearing that corny old joke from a new generation, with new research showing there's been a 40 per cent rise in men believing a woman's place is in the home.

The rise is a massive leap from around 8.5% to a gigantic 12% of young men. The panic button is being hammered by a Ross Honeywill of the Centre for Gender Equity.

Honeywill, of course, has a theory about it all:

> His theory is it's the manifestation of the "porn generation," the group of young men now in their 20s and early 30s who have grown up with unfettered access to live-streaming, graphic pornography.

Here things start to get really twisted.

> "From an early age those young men have been fed a diet of women who are seen as available, accessible and, importantly, compliant," says Honeywill.

Let's look at what's missing from this Feminist stereotype of pornography. Let us begin by classifying the sex in a pornographic manner. Honeywill and O'Connor are discussing straight sex. And by straight, I don't just mean heterosexual, but "ordinary" sex.

They are not discussing, for example, sadomasochism or people urinating on each other. My guess is that the females are often in the "dominatrix" role, and so it doesn't conform to the Feminist dogma on oppression. If she has the whip in her hand and he is manacled to the bed, then its hard to call him the oppressor.

Best for the Feminists to pretend that it doesn't exist, or at least doesn't count.

Permit me a digression for a moment. I am not an expert on porn, and so I don't know if there are any studies, other than the typical Feminist drivel, on the matter. Would people who are not "that way inclined" be anything other than turned off by particular types of porn? Is being turned off otherwise harmful? Are those who are "that way inclined" harmed by watching their "inclination" on a screen?

I have no idea on the answers to those questions. But, what I am saying is I don't believe either O'Connor or Honeywill do either. More importantly, I am questioning the particular harm they claim is inherent.

Note they do not discuss gay men as forming a negative view of men by watching gay porn. The same goes for lesbians watching other women being "available, accessible and, importantly, compliant."

And, of course, heterosexual women never watch porn. Ever. The Fifty Shades of Grey phenomena was just a flight of Patriarchal imagination. And, if they did, it would never obscure their view of men.

No, it is only straight men watching straight sex who get the wrong idea.

It is also worth pointing out a word that is missing from Honeywill's description of the women in porn. He doesn't call them "willing." Instead, they are "compliant." There is no enthusiastic consent as far as he is concerned. It is just one small step from there to all sex being rape.

> From what Honeywill is saying, by the time they get into the workforce or in a position of management and senior decision making, these young men have an image of women that's in no way equal to them in any meaningful way, or capable of making decisions like they would.

Now "straight" sex, regardless of your view on any other kind of sex, is natural. So why would men watching women having straight sex form the opinion that women are sub-human?

> But if a whole generation is seeing women as sexual beings who are compliant, demeaned and in no way equal to them, that's bad news.

Again, it is this Feminist view of sex, where women are "compliant" rather than "willing" and therefore somehow "demeaned" by participating in it, which is problematic. Neither Honeywill nor O'Connor show us any logical link between "women having sex" and "women being demeaned," but they clearly assume that the connection is very real. So real, and so obvious, that they don't have to spell it out.

> As Honeywill points out, women are not the problem. Women recognise the problem, they live with the problem.

So, is "the problem" men, young men, or sex? Honeywill is quoted:

> There are many young men for whom sex is a very solitary thing …

Again, this peculiar view of sex. Women never masturbate, because clearly, sex is not a pleasurable thing for them. This is why they are "compliant" rather than "willing." If they do masturbate, we should just pretend that they don't, so they can retain their modesty (how Patriarchal).

Men, however, masturbate because they can't get women to have sex with them. This, it seems, should not be taken as a sign that women don't like sex, but that the men in question are inferior. There is nothing wrong, it seems, with mocking them.

For O'Connor, however, the problem is more than just the young men.

> It would seem to me that not only do the women in young men's live have a role to play, but so too do the fathers, uncles and brothers. It's about attitudes and values, and they are formed from those around us who teach and guide us.

So, like all Feminist rantings, we began nowhere with nothing, make some stuff up to create a scenario to accuse men of bad things, and still end up nowhere.

Should the fathers, uncles and brothers be somehow banning straight porn for straight men? Or, should they be starring in a better, more respectful kind of porn? And quite what would be the role of the women in their lives? More sex? No sex?

Or, should we all, now that we have been given the good oil from O'Connor, be hiring Honeywill to root out this curse in the workplace?

> "It's about structured gender equity training that addresses this as a sub-theme, that has so far been hidden."
>
> "With the right role-playing and experts who begin peer-level conversations between men and women in the workforce, this can be easily exposed," says Honeywill.

What do you think would happen to the men whose faulty thinking is exposed? Even if this problem actually existed in anything like the manner in which they say it does, would public humiliation in the workplace help?

Maybe, if the young man gets a certificate from Honeywill, he might get granted some enthusiastic compliance from the women in his life. Is that the point?

It seems to me that the whole thing is a fabricated piece of nonsense so that O'Connor can make sanctimonious declarations of ideological purity whilst Honeywill angles for a Feminist Funding Frenzy for his "training."

Both should be rejected outright.

Links

http://www.heraldsun.com.au/news/opinion/porn-obscures-our-view-of-women/story-fni0fg0d-1226951173367

Sage Gerard exposes Paul Elam

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 7 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Paul has repeatedly put himself at risk to protect me, and the least I can do to express my gratitude in light of the Serwer-Baker Buzzfeed attack is lend my voice in return. I need to offer the obvious disclaimer that I do not actually speak for Paul, and I do not know him as well as his family, closest friends, and current lover. But after spending time with Paul and his awesome partner after they graciously welcomed me in their home, I know Paul well enough to see when people lie about his character.

The first and most obvious criticism I see forming in the air is that Paul cannot complain about the Buzzfeed hit piece because he targets people in articles himself.

Critics will not believe me when I say this, but Paul does respect boundaries. It's just that he reciprocates his targets' intensity. Case in point, Paul Elam is speaking in my defense against the faculty who bullied me on Kennesaw State University, and he stayed within the scope established by the faculty themselves. Despite what some say, he never did anything to ISD faculty that they haven't done to me (But notice that it's only "harassment" when Paul does it).

Paul's takedown of Brian Clyne is the only time I recall Paul swiping at someone on a familial level, and even then that was because Brian Clyne publicly volunteered his daughters as a topic and threatened intervention from his father.

Whether Paul calls out professors by name or writes scathing satire, he has evidence of his targets' wrongful actions. When Paul jumps the gun, he admits it and apologizes. Show me one critic confessing that they overreacted to MHRAs in this way, and I will show you a unicorn.

There is nothing wrong with calling out wicked people, and there is no doubt that Serwer and Baker thought they were doing the same thing. However, their "evidence" is opinion carefully framed to manipulate, not persuade. This is David Futrelle's style of toxic propoganda: Distort context until the target and all supporters appear inhuman.

In terms of his difficult decisions during his youth, Paul had to live with choices that only prove that he is human. Today, Paul faithfully operates within the boundaries of the law as an advocate. Critics lack evidence showing otherwise, but this will not stop them from trying to destroy him.

The attitude of those bent on Paul's destruction are best summarized by Charles Augustus Magnussen in Sherlock:

> Proof? What would I need proof for? I'm in news, you moron. I don't have to prove it, I just have to print it.
>
> — Charles Augustus Magnussen

What does it matter if the lies by omission, or prints as facts things that are merely speculation or allegation? It doesn't matter to them. Propogandists like Serwer and Baker will argue that the sun is black if it made MRAs look bad.

> Men's Rights Activists are rage-filled misogynists who claim feminists intentionally "cover up" issues like male rape and workplace injury rates so women can achieve global domination.
>
> –Katie J.M. Baker, Rape and Death Threats: What Men's Rights Activists Really Look Like

Nope. No bias there at all. Never mind MHRAs pooling money to investigate an alleged assault of a feminist. Never mind welcoming women in managerial positions. In Femtopia, none of those things happened.

Remember that Serwer came to ICMI14 with a free press pass, and spent his time visibly shaking with rage because no one thought like him. Serwer made this personal, because to him, it was personal.

I've read every one of Paul's articles, so I know every confrontational thing he put on this website. Like other people who think, I can read between lines and deduce motivations and character without being distracted by popular emotional impressions.

I bonded with Paul as a guest in his home, where there is no evidence that he is exploiting money in the way David Futrelle and Diana Boston suggest next to their own "donate" buttons. No sex dungeons, no blood money under the mattress, nothing.

For those who think I am a biased source, recall that I'm fiercely insistent on universal accountability. I owned up to every wrong thing I've done, both in internal conflicts here at AVfM, and in breaking any rules at Kennesaw State University. I've banned self-proclaimed MRAs from this site early in my volunteerism here for bigotry (yes, including misogyny), and noticed ideological development in "manosphere" communities.

I'm hardly one to presume infallibility, and I sure as hell do not endorse exemptions in my principles for friends. If I saw Paul drinking Château Lafite out of a pimp glass instead of keeping his promises, I'd be the first to tell the world, even if my doing so ended our friendship. If I was not willing to do that, then I would not be a proper activist.

But I don't worry about enduring that moment because I know it won't happen. Paul uses every cent of donations to AVfM in good faith towards his promises. If he fucks something up, I know he will own up to it. His integrity is solid, no matter what his enemies say about him.

Another money fact that keeps slipping by unreported is that Paul has allowed others to feed off his main revenue stream. Paul hosts fundraisers on this site where AVfM gains no money. I offered Paul a percentage in Zen Men's last fundraiser, and he refused the money. He also gave Dean Esmay money for private dental work in public view.

Serwer tried to paint Paul as being defensive and secretive about money. But Paul demonstrates that he keeps promises. He promised a conference, and there was a conference. Serwer was there! Where else did he think the money went? Hookers and blow? Public information shows donor money being spent in good faith. Paul's just not going to give up sensitive financial documents to complete strangers who want to control money. To them, Paul's sin is that he's not spending money on feminism.

Between Dean and Zen Men, AVfM gave up access to over $10,000, which means Paul gave up more than AVfM itself raised in its last fundraiser. AVfM has historically raised money for people's legal defense, to help activists get to protests, to fund other activist groups, to help build shelters, to help fund research on male birth control, and more, yet no one in the mainstream even acknowledges these things, and some outright lie and say AVfM never does it. But here's my point:

Greedy people out to exploit the masses don't give away money.

Paul's gestures of appreciation are not limited to Dean and me. When one of the many talented activists on staff do outstanding work, Paul helps them step up their game however he can.

Somehow that memo didn't make it to the "Paul just wants money" crowd. Could someone please rub it in their faces until the ink stains their eyes?

Even if Paul legally owns the cash assets as AVfM's proprietor, so what? Running an international organization is a job, and Paul does that job well. It is true that most staff are not paid and the few who are are getting very little, but we are certainly not cheated because Paul supports his volunteers. He also never tells us to do anything; we make up our own work. This allows us to practice new skills and connect with new people. People even find lovers here. Since the AVfM platform is so accessible, it grows quickly and there's basically an entire city's worth of activity going on behind this site. There are radio shows, chat rooms, art, comics and Wild West debates. There's a reason why we stick around: Volunteering at AVfM is fucking awesome.

Critics turn up their noses and act as if real activists like them would work 80+ hours a week saving the world for free and not go broke. The whole reason I started asking for donations myself was because activism costs money, honey, and you aren't much use to your supporters if you can't put gas in the car. Paul gets shit done, and donors take care of the bills flowing out of the P.O. box and yell at idiots alongside him. Looks like a perfectly sensible arrangement to me. Prigs who disagree are free to prove they have a better model.

Paul does not intend to hurt anyone. He is, however, gleefully willing to risk offending millions when there is no other way to make a point. I and other MHRAs follow that example because dammit, it works. One year we are doing odd jobs, and the next year every MHRA and his cat are in the news. Critics cry foul, but they cannot deny that MHRAs are now among the most interesting people in the world.

Feminists and "social justice" crusaders attack Paul because he is not compliant with their Church. In their attempts to pretend that they care about men's issues—they really don't—I find myself only trusting Paul more. He scares the shit out of demagogues because he can guide activists to reform. He went from blogging in a semi to becoming an international media figure.

If I was a crook that lied for a living, I'd be attacking Paul too. Too bad you can't shame men who value themselves.

The Church is trying to excommunicate Paul. But he knows he has my complete support, as well as the support of every MHRA who knows what equity looks like.

Welcome, my friends, to the new Renaissance.

Interdisciplinary Shaming Dept. part IV – Scott Ritchie

Paul Elam · 8 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

This article is one part of a series exposing corrupt, fear-mongering academics who used police officers and lawyers to silence a single student while they move to crush his free speech and Title IX rights. Read Part III here and Part V here.

Scott Ritchie

Scott Ritchie, one of Sage Gerard's false accusers in #KSUStickerGate, believes that Sage Gerard created a hostile work environment on Kennesaw State University (KSU) by peaceful nonviolent activism and expressing opinions. Scott reported Sage on a university system level through KSU's channels. It appears that the method Scott used to file the report revealed his identity, when he expected to remain anonymous. Either way, his ignorance and cowardice are not my problems.

"Menformation," a Tumblr started by ISD faculty and KSU YESbody!, argued that The University System of Georgia (USG) should have protected Ritchie's anonymity. I argue that if these dolts were suddenly under a serious state-funded investigation, they would demand to know who started it if they were innocent.

> What is your involvement in the issue? - I observed it
> Is this an ongoing issue? - Yes
> What is the date of the most recent occurrence? - Unknown
> Have you reported this issue to anyone within the organization? - Yes
> Do you believe that anyone has taken steps to hide this issue? - N/A
> Where did the issue occur? - Onsite
> What is your relationship to the company? - Employee

Scott gets some things wrong in the report. It is true that Sage posted AVfM stickers, but he admitted that before ISD even noticed he did so. Scott did not "observe it" because he was not a witness, nor did he have any evidence to show that Sage putting up stickers saying that men were human was an "ongoing issue."

Scott is a slimy liar, but he is not as overtly ridiculous as Tom Pynn or Stacy Keltner . He is, however, a demagogue, and this article will be more focused on the work he supports. Since some of Scott's papers are easily accessible, I figure this is a good chance to give you a glimpse of what your tax dollars fund.

Before I address Scott, I need to make two statements about harassment and proportionality in light of recent brainless criticisms.

First, KSU students and ISD faculty targeted Sage Gerard, a student, and posted some of his public information. The "Menformation" Tumblr page linked to many of Sage's public profiles, through many of which he could be contacted. Through the links provided, it is not hard to find his email, his professional background, his picture, and so on.

In other words, I am not doing anything to ISD faculty that they have not done to Sage, with the notable exception of actually addressing them (because unlike Sage, I am not legally barred from doing so). So when ISD targets Sage, it's for the safety of faculty and social justice, but when I do it to them, it's harassment–I suppose they will claim so anyway. But if you think I am harassing ISD faculty, then you must admit that employees of Kennesaw State University's ISD harassed Sage Gerard, a student, simply because they did not like his political views.

If Kennesaw State University or some mentally defective demagogue makes even one peep about AVfM "harassing" faculty, then they have to explain why it's okay when public servants do it to Sage Gerard.

Second, bad politicians, judges, cops, and other public servants spend most of their time being "harassed" when they do much of anything, especially when they commit a serious human rights violation, such as in the murder of Eric Garner.

It is our view that corrupt persons, especially those in positions of power and authority within state institutions, should face public ridicule, and that's one of the risks that comes with following a higher standard of ethics. Without accountability, those ethics become meaningless. If speaking in support of Sage against his bullies is "harassment," then every activist who ever targeted a public figure is a "harasser." Get real.

This is not the story of mean ol' Paul telepathically encouraging the next Elliot Rodger to Rambo the campus. This is the story of Kennesaw State Unviersity Interdisciplinary Study Department employees playing dirty.

My intention is to never let Kennesaw State University forget that they made a mistake. I've offered to announce which among them act like adults if they own up to their role in making Sage's life a living hell, and apologize for it.

So that's the end of that. On to Scott Bitchy.

Scott, you are more reserved about Sage in your emails given what our records show, but you are still a flaming hypocrite. You chipped in twenty bucks to YESbody!'s demonstration—with more from ISD chair Robbie Lieberman—to encourage YESbody! to cry "rape culture" with their free expression, all the while following KSU administrators in hopes that Male Students in Peril would be cancelled. Sage Gerard donated the rest of the money YESbody! needed, because Sage actually does support free speech in spite of disagreement.

I wish I had the time and patience to look through all of Scott Ritchie's papers, but I'll just take a look at Teacher Education for Social Change: Transforming a Content Methods Course Block. It seems Scott Ritchie and his co-authors want to groom teachers into "social justice" activists because undergraduate teacher education employs "hegemonic domestication" of candidates. The paper parrots bell hooks' sentiment that candidates bring a discourse of "imperialist white supremacist capitalist patriarchy."

This stuff even sounds made up, Scott. Given the disgusting racist and religious influences impacting blacks, Hispanics, immigrants, and other minority demographics still present in our police force, prison system and courts, you need to accept that you're not helping. You're the guy that gets a black friend just so you can say you're not racist.

Your work lacks perspectives that advocate an end to bigotry through reconciliation. Instead, it seems you wish to indoctrinate people into accepting social responsibilities according to ideological criteria. The only thing obscuring this nonsense is the typical cloud of buzzwords. Nowhere do you ask yourself pertinent questions like "Am I just trying to control what I can't control?"

I agree with you about enforcing standards in hiring practices. The problem is that my standards are "imperialist" because they value merit, so that probably wouldn't help your career much. That, and "enforcement" implies power, so it seems you want to resist hegemonic forces by replacing it with… a hegemonic force you like.

That cliche quote by Nietzsche about staring into the abyss applies only too well here.

Throwing Sage in the “misogynistic conservative imperialist patriarch in training” box helps keep hate and injustice alive, Scott. Your behavior and attitude show that you are the next vessel of empty promises doublethinking about how to control the system without controlling people. And what do you have to show for your crusade? Getting offended at stickers in a woman’s restroom saying that men are human, eight months after their removal?

You joined an organized crusade against a single student and claimed that he alone created a hostile environment. Do you not see the irony in this? It’s staring you right in the face, you blubbering sycophant: You are the hostile environment.

Why don’t you try owning a little responsibility as a “privileged male,” and apologize to Sage Gerard and the student body and alumni as a whole?

Why I became a Black Men's Rights Activist: A reader responds

Mumia Ali · 8 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

> "We few, we merry few, we Band of Brothers; for whosoever sheds his blood with me on this day, he too shall be my brother…"
>
> -William Shakespeare, "Henry V"

One of the things a writer always confronts is how readers will respond to what he's presented to the world; and in my personal experience of doing this writing thing over the past five years, the world can be an unforgiving place. However, I can also say that there have been quite a few instances where what I have said from my keyboard and my heart has touched someone, and I have had the good fortune to be informed of this fact.

Such was the case with a recent column I wrote, "Why I became a Black Men's Rights Activist," a piece that seems to have gotten around on social media last time I checked. Which is a bit ironic, in as much as I've never been a huge user of the varying social media platforms. Today is the day that I have to admit their power and reach.

I say that because on last Friday, while checking my Facebook account, an admittedly rather infrequent affair for me, I found the following deeply moving, deeply personal message from "Darius"; after having a chance to chat with him on the telephone over the weekend – during which I found that he was a delight to bust it up with – he has graciously consented to my sharing his letter to the world:

> "BRUH…
>
> I sent you a request, because I ran across your article on why you became a Black Men's Rights Activist, and wasn't so much floored by the analysis as I felt a stinging, physical connection to it. Like, my heart actually jumped.
>
> Because never had I seen my deepest, most personal thoughts (secrets?) laid out so tough by a modern writer. Baldwin hinted at the "dark side" of black women, and the Moynihan Report always made more sense to me than I cared to admit. But your piece punched me in the mouth and dared me to confront it.
>
> Our experiences are so similar that it's weird. My grandmother treated my granddad and her sons like dogs. Straight punked 'em, day after day. Except one time, when my granddad SHUT IT DOWN. She was so shook that she ran upstairs and locked herself in her room.
>
> But her daughters, including my mom, got a pass. Somehow, from an early age, I connected the dots and fought back against this in-house oppression – it was like all the women were trying to break me – with everything I had, which earned me intimate knowledge of switches, belts, extension cords, etc. No biggie. Every black kid got beat back then, right? But, again, it was the reasons "why" that bothered me, which eventually led to me blacking out on Me-Ma in my 20s.
>
> My mom raised me by herself, and against her better judgment, fell into the same ugly patterns. I have to be clear: To this day, my mother loves me fiercely. And I, her. So much that it hurts just to write it. She evolved to the point of being genuinely ashamed of her past behavior, and now we are best friends. But forgiveness of other black women still escapes me. But that's a whole other story…
>
> Anyway, what made me write you this morning was something I saw on TV last night that was so ridiculous I couldn't believe it was real. At the beginning of his show, Larry Wilmore, who's work I've long admired, issued an apology to black women for a joke he made the night before during a panel discussion on black fatherhood. The "joke" was merely an aside to one of the guests about rating how bossy black women are on a scale of 1-10. That's it… And yet black feminists mobilized in less than 24 hours to back this intelligent, accomplished brother into a corner because he had the nerve to suggest they're not perfect. What part of the game is that?

> Please tell me you caught it."

The above letter is so very important for a number of reasons and levels that merits pointing out, especially at a time when the Manosphere in general, and here at A Voice For Men in particular, have been come under increasing – and increasingly unfair, I might add – media scrutiny. Among the numerous fallacious arguments being proffered by our interloctuors, is the idea that the Manosphere and AVFM itself is shot through with a bunch of, to use Prof. Michael Kimmel's book title "Angry White Men" – Darius' earnest and heartfelt letter puts that lie to bed. In conversation with him I learned that he has been following my work from the sidelines almost from Day One of my blogging and writing journey, dating all the way back to my very first blog, The Obsidian Files, and is an avid reader of AVFM, among other well known Manospherian outlets.

Nor is Darius the first Brotha I've heard from in the past five years – I have scores of emails from Black men from every walk of life and age, who've come out from the shadows to thank me for giving voice to their lives, for giving legitimacy to their truth.

I enter Darius' moving account above, into the official record that will blunt the opposition's empty claims.

The second reason as to why Darius' letter is so important, is because it is a witness to the reach and impact of the Men's Movement – it is now global in scope, and reaching every nook and cranny of the Male Experience in our time. I have had personal communication with men who, like Darius, were moved to reach out and let me know that what I've written has touched them, from Oslo, Sao Paulo, Gangnam, Jarkarta, Manila, Ankara, Burkina Faso, Paris, Madrid, Vancouver and London, just to name a few. It still blows my own mind when I think about it.

To address Darius' query about my knowledge of the Larry Wilmore affair: unfortunately, I was not aware of it, as I don't own a TV and watch very little of it in any event. I have since had the chance to review the matter, and I offer the following link, courtesy of Darius, for my readers to determine for themselves the left and the right of things. My views about the ruinous impact Black Feminists have had on our discourse in Black America is well documented.

I say this to my brothers out there reading this: do not let the haters tell you anything different – you, can make a difference. I offer the above as proof.

Now, is the time to lift up your voices, and in so doing, you will inspire others to do the same.

Thank you, Darius. Welcome aboard!

Female suicides: A deadly fabrication?

Drew Domalick · 8 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

We've all heard the statistic: There are three female suicide attempts to every male suicide attempt. This statistic can be seen on SAVE[1], AAS[2], AFSP[3], and many other suicide prevention organizations. In fact, this has been so engrained into the heads of the public that few people even question this statistic. I did question this statistic because of the high rate of fatal suicide cases (around 80% of fatal suicide cases are males[4]), and the results I found were quite shocking.

During my research for this article, I quickly ran into big red flags. I came across the SAVE organization, and I found this listed under their "Suicide Facts" section: "There are three female suicide attempts for each male attempt. (CDC, AAS)"[1] Then I went to the AAS to check their source and on their "2012 Data – Rates, numbers, and rankings of each state" I find this: "3 female attempts for each male attempt."[2] There was no clear source but at the bottom of the page I found two citations:

1) "Many figures appearing here are derived or calculated from data in the following official data source: obtained 16 October 2014 from CDC's WISQARS website (fatal injuries report figures) http://www.cdc.gov/injury/wisqars/index.html."

2) "SAMHSA 2012 study (2013): Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration [SAMHSA] (2013). Results from the 2012 National Survey on Drug Use and Health: Mental Health Findings, NSDUH Series H-47, HHS Publication No. (SMA) 13-4805. Rockville, MD: SAMHSA."

Checking the CDC was on my to-do list, but first I wanted to check out this SAMHSA study.[5] I found this: "In 2012, male and female adults had similar rates of having serious thoughts of suicide in the past year (3.6 and 4.1 percent, respectively)."[5] Well, this certainly didn't help the case that there would be three female suicide attempts to every male suicide attempt, but it didn't disprove the statistic either, so I kept looking. I looked and looked and I could find no information to support this statistic that there are three female suicide attempts to every male suicide attempt.

This left me with the CDC, especially the WISQARS tool, but in order to use this tool I had to figure out how to calculate what a suicide attempt was. I kept running into the message that suicide attempt statistics are not officially collected in the USA, which made me question this three to one statistic even more, but the AFSP had this to say about suicide attempts on their "Facts and Figures" page: "No complete count is kept of suicide attempts in the U.S.; however, the CDC gathers data each year from hospitals on non-fatal injuries resulting from self-harm behavior."[3]

SUCCESS! Surely, all I had to do now was go to the CDC WISQARS tool, calculate the amount of self-harm cases in 2012 for both males and females, and add those numbers to the official fatal suicide data. That's what I did, and here are the numbers I came up with:

2012 Self-harm Cases:
Total: 483,596
Male: 197,229
Female: 286,367

2012 Official Fatal Suicide Data:
Total: 40,600
Male: 31,780
Female: 8,820

2012 Self-harm Cases + Fatal Suicides:
Total: 524,196

Male: 229,009 (43.7%)
Female: 295,187 (56.3%)

That was unexpected. A suicide attempt ratio of 56.3% female to 43.7% male is nothing close to the expected three female suicide attempts to every male suicide attempt.

I looked around the CDC website for more information. They have a lot of different information on the suicides and suicide attempts, but I found no evidence to support this three to one statistic. I even called the CDC to ask them if there was evidence for this statistic anywhere. The lady put me on hold multiple times to personally search the CDC website, and she could not find supporting evidence.

Throughout this process I sent emails to numerous different suicide prevention organizations that had this three to one statistic listed, and to date, none of them have contacted me back. I contacted the CDC by email to get a response from an expert in the field about this statistic. I'm still waiting on a response.

Given all of the research I found surrounding this statistic, I'm forced to abandon the statistic that three females attempt suicide to every male. There is no official data on suicide attempts to take this statistic as a hard fact. When adding the self-harm and fatal suicide cases together, the statistics from CDC WISQARS aren't close to a three to one ratio. When looking at the surrounding data such as from the SAMHSA study, which looked into those who had suicidal thoughts in the previous year, males and females were found to have "similar" rates of suicidal thoughts. It can also be seen how a lot of these organizations are just pointing to each other, but most data is actually coming from very few places such as the CDC, so one mistake would quickly spread to all of these different suicide prevention organizations. All-in-all, I've abandoned the statistic that there are three female suicide attempts to every male suicide attempt, and you should, too.

Footnotes:
[1] http://www.save.org/index.cfm?fuseaction=home.viewPage&page_id=705D5DF4-055B-F1EC-3F66462866FCB4E6
[2] http://www.suicidology.org/Portals/14/docs/Resources/FactSheets/2012datapgsv1d.pdf
[3] https://www.afsp.org/understanding-suicide/facts-and-figures
[4] http://www.cdc.gov/violenceprevention/pdf/Suicide-DataSheet-a.pdf
[5] http://www.samhsa.gov/data/sites/default/files/2k12MH_Findings/2k12MH_Findings/NSDUHmhfr2012.pdf

Labyrinth, the Goblin King, and the “patriarchal” truth

Clint Carpentier · 8 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I’ve licked at the red pill for many years; and in that time, I’ve met various people with various reasons to attempt to sustain themselves on blue pill mantra, that is, tradconism. With so many people believing that they are individuals, while being the same; it’s little wonder I came to the conclusion in my mid-twenties that we’re all just cogs.

When you break things down to the bare essentials, stripped of the trappings of civilization which we take for granted, what are we to each other but mere animals? I’ve had arguments over the necessity of basic shit shoveler trades; most arguments run along the lines of, “grunt work is no longer essential, most of us work in offices now,” to which I have to answer, “I’m rather partial to wiping my ass with soft paper and flushing it away, aren’t you?”

“The Patriarchy” doesn’t answer the questions essential to civilization. Currently, those who are rich, and/or have power, are just pencil pushers, money shufflers, panderers of female ego, and general scoundrels. To say I hate money, is an understatement of exponential orders of magnitude to the *n*th power… squared. Most people look around and see those big buildings and think, “wealth.” I see a service industry. Service industries don’t generate wealth, they require monetary input, by those who actually make wealth. The industrial and manufacturing economy doesn’t require service; at least, not the services being brazenly advertized on every street corner and magazine. Evil tycoons who have the audacity to create shit-shoveler jobs by the thousands to assign to men, so wives can make use of the meaningless service industry; how dare they, and how dare they ask for tax breaks, and how dare they have no upper limit on their wealth generation To the liberals and feminists… fuck you, just… fuck you!!!

There are two movies I watched as a barely pubescent boy, which got me licking the red pill for the better part of twenty years, while wishing desperately for the blue pill to take root, good and proper; funny how shit doesn’t go according to plan. The first movie was Three Men and a Baby, the second – which brought about this topic – was Labyrinth.

Labyrinth is a fascinating watch. A quick run down goes as such: Upper middle class Princess Sarah has to babysit her baby brother, who is crying while she’s trying to do her own thing. In a fit of pique, she calls on the Goblin King (Jareth) to take him away. The crying stops but, bereft and lonely and not knowing what she’ll say to her parents, she follows the Jareth to the Goblin Kingdom, where he gives her 13 hours to reach his castle or the child is his. Through all manner of obstacles of God’s hellish acre, she befriends some… weirdos (two of whom I can relate to), makes bad choices (as if weirdo friends weren’t bad enough), and then lays siege on the fortifications of the Goblin City:

No matter what way you slice it, the more I hearken back to this movie, the more I’m reminded of all those people I’ve met, who thought their women were “mysterious,” and made their relationships difficult because… reasons. Here, in this movie, you see a girl experiencing 13 hours of what amounts to female logic, something many male spouses have to navigate regularly.

The crowning moment of the movie is really rather charming, because it sums up “The Patriarchy” really rather well:

“Patriarchy,” or tradconism, exists solely for the benefit of women, especially women with children. Feminism, made the same mistake Sarah did, “you have no power over me.” They were right, Patriarchy never did, the Goblin King explained it so well! “I do all these things for you, your dreams are at my fingertips, I ask only that you acknowledge my greatness, and I will be your slave!”

The adventure ends, the Owl flies out the window, Baby is in his crib. At this point, red pill Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW) mentality shifts into overdrive. Ignore for a moment that she has parents; she’s alone, with a baby, in a house which she can scarcely afford, her dreams vanished with Jareth the Goblin King, which was her choice.

GASP!!! But, she's upper middle class with all the trappings of civilization like… parents. It's a pity the child is her brother rather than her son, my plinko chatter of logic would follow better. She has people who will ensure she's cared for, despite what she's done. So what does she do after all that?

She has a party in her bedroom, with all her weirdo friends. Gosh, this sounds like… this IS fiction… right?! The Owl is outside looking in, watches for a moment, then flies off; what can one say to such lack of responsibility?

The fantasy of self-governance is over. The princesses are all grown up, and media, feminists and women everywhere are whining, "Oh woe is me, where have all the good men gone?" Well… there are a few-fan made trailers to hypothetical sequels, but I like this one:

Lobbyists link child support payments and access

Jim Muldoon · 9 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

In an extraordinary article last year in The Australian, still illustrative of attitudes commonly found in national and international groups, two major lobbying groups have openly linked parental access with child support payments:

> Warring parents are seeking custody of children to avoid paying maintenance, the nation's largest counselling group has warned the federal government.

Of course, we know that the gender neutral "parents" are fathers.

> Relationships Australia has told the government's child support inquiry that some parents are insisting on shared custody just so they can pay less — or claim more — maintenance through the Child Support Agency.

The accusation is a stinging one. Fathers are not actually interested in their own children, but will put up with them if it keeps their payments down.

The National Council of Single Mothers and their Children have gone one step further:

> The National Council of Single Mothers and their Children has told the inquiry some fathers seek custody of children one day a week, or every second weekend, just to get a 24 per cent "discount" on maintenance payments.

If there was ever a requirement for proof that Child Support is just a different spelling of alimony, here it is. A "discount" on maintenance payments indeed. Never mind that they need to rent or buy a bigger place if the kids are to stay over. Never mind they have to feed the children, clothe them, entertain them, etc, etc, etc.

> "We remain completely unconvinced that 24 per cent discount in child-support payments in exchange for as little as 13 per cent care is fair or equitable," the council's submission says. "We are concerned that the significant and disproportional outcome is an economic driver, which is contradictory to the 'best interest of the child'."

Apparently, it is in the 'best interest of the child' that they don't see their father whilst the mother maximises her income.

For most fathers, these statements would be seen as the utmost hypocrisy. The fact is that the Family Law Courts have long history of keeping the two issues as separate. The Family Court website, in answer to the question "If child support payments are not made, can your former partner see the children?" says:

> A court considers child support and parenting issues separately.

Of course, unless the father is earning money on a "cash in hand" basis, the Child Support Agency can take the money from his employer. In practical terms, this scenario of access without payment is very much the exception rather than the rule. However, the opposite question of "If your former partner won't let you see the children, do you still have to pay child support" is far more frequently asked, and gets the same answer from the Family Court. Keep paying, schmuck, because the two issues cannot be related.

And, of course, there is no government funded National Council of Single Fathers and the Children They Don't See.

Relationships Australia does make one comment with which most non-custodial fathers would agree with, although not in the context that Relationships Australia puts it.

> "The negotiation of three nights of care per week is a clear consideration for many of our clients as this is seen as the threshold used by Child Support," [Relationships Australia] says in its submission to the parliamentary inquiry, which begins public hearings in Canberra today. "This means that the child support formula, rather than best interests of children, may drive the negotiation."

The child support formula does add to the "negotiation." Not only are fathers punished by their ex-wives by being refused access to their children, but every day that the father doesn't get to see his children, he gets a double punishment in raised child support costs.

Revenge is not only sweet, but financially rewarding.

Relationships Australia also push another barrow which can only add to the problems of separated parents and the raising of their children.

> Relationships Australia warns that children who prefer to live with one parent are being ignored because of the financial effect on the other parent.

This too tends to be a one-way street. If the child wants to see the father less, then the child's wishes and their "best interests" are one and the same. If the child wants to see more of the father, and therefore less of the mother, then clearly the child's best interests must override childish preferences.

Confusing "the best interest of the child" with the wishes of the child can cause parents no end of headaches. All too often, the result, of course, is that the parent who is willing to provide the more lax and "fun" home will not only win over the children, but benefit financially from the ploy.

The children will be well into their thirties before they realise just how they have been cheated.

Once again, we see Feminist ideology being used to punish fathers whilst hiding behind the "best interest of the children". The punishment, of course, is simply because they are men. The underlying premise, as always, is that if he had been a better husband / father / man, this would never have happened. The facts are more that the mother is being bribed to get her ideology right.

Postscript:

> The inquiry has received 10,000 responses to its survey about the scheme, which last financial year oversaw the transfer of $3.4 billion in maintenance payments for 1.2 million children.

If the government keeps each dollar it receives in child support for one week, on average, before passing it on to the other parent, they can easily make something like $4 million a year just in interest.

And you thought they were doing it in "the best interests of the children," did you?

Links

http://www.theaustralian.com.au/national-affairs/parents-seek-custody-to-cut-maintenance-costs/story-fn59niix-1226966903278

http://www.familylawcourts.gov.au/wps/wcm/connect/FLC/Home/Property+and+Money+Matters/Child+support/

The girl who cried, “Rape!”

B.R. Merrick · 9 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

A tale by Whatsop (Aesop’s slightly jaded third cousin):

Once there was a small green village full of happy, boring people: a butcher, a tailor, a midwife, a schoolteacher, an African-American smith, a grocer, a mayor, a doctor, sundry milkmaids and stablepersons, and the requisite amount of white trash.

There was also a boy who spent all day up on a nearby hill tending sheep. Every once in a while, a wolf would come along and steal one of the sheep away in his patriarchal jaws, but the boy had learned to keep silent about such incidents, since he and he alone was blamed every time this happened. But that’s another story. (A ba-a-a-a-a-d one.)

One day, from the top of another nearby hill, the village people (no, not them) heard the cry of a young maiden. “Rape! Rape!” she screamed, and they all dropped the boring work they were doing to lend assistance. Up the hill they ran, with visions of a member of the most physically and emotionally protected sex being psychologically destroyed by a member of the most utilitarian, disposable, and culpable sex. They ruled out the shepherd boy because he had just been seen in town trying to get his last male sheep to do something – anything at all – with either one of the two remaining female sheep.

When they reached the top of the hill, they found the woman-child alone, reading 50 Shades of Grey with no male in sight. She looked up at them with her pale, hypnotic eyes, and said, “Oops.” The people were displeased, but she was, after all, a maiden, and no one was inconvenienced terribly since they all realized that she was A-Okay. She received a couple of serious looks, a disappointed comment here and there, and then they all walked down the hill to their peaceful little village to get on with the business of empire.

On another day, from down in the glen, the people heard the cry of “Rape!” from yet another maiden. They rushed to the glen, pushing the women of the village harshly out of the way as they were wont to do, to rescue the fair maiden from the clutches of some hairy, muscly, big-dicked dude. When they reached the glen, they saw a young woman in tears, who thrilled them (secretly) with a truly nasty-sounding tale of ass-grabbing and frottage, which is a thing that Frenchmen do in public (I’ve been told). She named names, and with torches, pitchforks, and a copy of VAWA, the people went to seek out the sexy perpetrator. They found him in a nearby village reading The Bible and working in a soup kitchen.

In that moment, the people had a collective change of heart, which normally happens in these fables. Surely someone whose balls have been yoked in this manner could not possibly do what the girl said he did. They took the fastest light rail back to their village to confront the accuser as gently as they could, just in case she really was completely traumatized by a church-going do-gooder. When they got there, they found her molesting a stableperson who was rather aggravated by the attention, as he was busy shoveling shit that just had to be shoveled. When one of the ladies, in a kindly, motherly way, asked her whether the accusation was true, she turned with her hand still down the front of the stableperson’s pants, and said, “Oh, I guess not.” Perturbed, but slightly less worried, the good (well, relatively so) people of the village went home to watch Law & Order: Good Cop, Gooder Cop and have cocoa.

Pleasant hours went by as people slept. Then, at 4:42 VST in the morning, the people were awoken from their sleep by another horrendous howl of “Rape!” They all jumped out of bed at approximately the same second, and with marvelous efficiency, were on the scene. This time, it was in flagrante delicto all the way: the hot, mixed-race accused lying up on one arm, his massive, perfectly sculpted, bare chest threatening the women in the room with its inherent violence, and looking rather confused and sheepish.

(I must take a break from the narrative to point out that using the word “sheepish” does not mean in any way that this story has anything whatsoever to do with the economically-challenged shepherd boy. He’s got his own problems, but that’s what his privileges are for. Sheep, wolves; tomato, tom-ah-to.)

The accused grabbed his designer jeans and pulled them under the covers that were barely suppressing his hardon, which was massive and delicious-looking, and made the village ladies feel even more at risk. The accuser, for her part, was half-dressed, red-faced, and weeping. She pointed at him with a trembling finger and gave details: He had asked her out on a date; she accepted. He was funny and charming; she got titillated. He paid for dinner; she got mildly curious. He read her poetry; she got wet. He asked if she wanted to go back to his place; she got excited, because she had never been in a house with a straw roof before. Furthermore, he had talking animals on his property. If she hung out with him on a semi-regular, platonic basis, perhaps the talking animals would befriend her. Then she would have resources in the future whenever she found herself in trouble. Plus, as she gleaned from her extensive hours of childhood research, talking animals have a tendency to attract handsome princes. So, after explaining all of this in detail to the accused, and after he signed a written agreement thereby legally proving that no sex would happen, she got in his Toyota and went to his place.

The accused remained stone silent while she gave her vivid description of the rape, complete with words like "semen," "ejaculation," "groaning," and "oil tanker;" so silent, in fact, that at the next village festival, his presumed guilt was made sport, and everyone had a wholesome, good time.

I would give the more lurid details here of what the fair maiden said, because I know you want them, but this is where it got fuzzy for the people of the village. One lady recalled several days after the village festival (to which the accused was not invited) that the accuser had told her in private that he grabbed her by her boobs and wouldn't let go. The mayor remembered that when she was in his office (along with his female secretary so as not to insinuate any impropriety), she told him that he never grabbed her boobs (although she used the word "breasts" because it sounded more legal and proper); he just raped her doggy-style sans poetry. The schoolteacher then confessed that the young lady had told these sorts of inconsistent tales before, when the accuser was a little girl in her class, but that she had thought it was merely child's play, and hadn't made the connection until now. After several more days of deliberation on the part of the people of the village, who clearly only wanted to help the young woman, and who demonstrated such desire by throwing the mixed-race cutie in the village holding cell with a scarlet letter around his neck, they asked her again about the crime in question. Looking perfectly bored, the maiden shrugged and said, "Ah well. I guess it just wasn't what I wanted. I guess it didn't happen like I thought. But he could have been nicer." The people of the village agreed (I mean, look at that chest!), but were a bit less impressed with maidens in general.

Two more days went by, and from another quarter of the village, another yelp of "Rape!" was heard. The tailor didn't bother to look up from his sewing machine. The doctor continued to tend to her patient's wound. The butcher kept on grinding his sausage (get your minds out of the gutter). The mayor went on bloviating at a buy-my-campaign luncheon for the village elite. The schoolteacher went on with her lesson. The now-sheepless shepherd boy was busy on the Internet earning a degree from The University of Phoenix Online so he could get the fuck out of that village before he was accused. "Rape! RAPE!" went the cry, until there was silence.

Several days more went by, and pretty soon, no one ever heard the cry of "Rape!" in that village again. Presumably, it was because no rape occurred; but in reality, the word had now lost all meaning. True, the people of the village were sad about one thing: If a rape did indeed occur in the future, how were they to know? Especially if the accuser returned to the accused for more?

It never dawned on them that the answer lay in front of them all the time: If they did not coddle the female sex, that same sex would mature much faster. If they did not tolerate lies from anyone, male or female, there would probably be less of them. But none of the false accusers was kicked out of the village. Not a single one of them had to pay any money to the accused. No lying woman was sent to the village holding cell. Not a single girl was raised differently.

Consequently, and this is where Whatsop's fable is at an end, numerous women can accuse Bill Cosby of rape, and I no longer care. Furthermore, I don't believe them, and I don't care who knows it.

However, here's a hypothetical question: What if it were true? Well, I would feel terrible. I wouldn't feel terrible that I don't care, or that I was wrong and therefore fair game for a society that could easily use this article as another reason to reject the men's movement; I would feel terrible because I already feel terrible.

We live in a society that not only shames the penis non-stop, but one where more and more men like me are powerless to help an actual female rape victim, because we are too busy wondering how much time is perhaps being wasted on a liar, as opposed to gaining the opportunity to lend a helping hand to a sad and broken woman, which is an opportunity that men throughout history have seldom denied themselves.

Now, I believe it is wrong to constantly lump groups of people together and make broad statements about them. That is somewhere near the heart of prejudice. To say that women are essentially dishonest because of a few high-profile liars among them is silly and stupid.

Yet this is a terrifyingly fascinating phenomenon that, in my mind, is peculiar to the female sex alone. I can't think of any particular thing that men are predisposed to lie about on such a regular basis concerning the opposite sex. I'm not talking about some guy saying he banged a girl when he didn't so that his buddies will like him better, or because, more nefariously, he wants to ruin her reputation; I'm talking about something that rises to the level of a criminal offense. Can anyone feminist or non-feminist tell me something that men do to women in court on a regular basis that hurts them, degrades them, takes from them their liberty, or possibly ruins their lives; that we later find out in the media was a fabrication?

There are terrible things that a man can do to a woman. There are terrible things that a woman can do to a man. Because of our unique individual selves, the cruelties are, to say the least, limitless in their variations. But when we speak of our common culture, I can't think of a single thing that men collectively do to women to utterly destroy them that rises to this level. The word "rape" appears to be men's Achilles Heel. They've got us by the jewels. And now it has destroyed Bill Cosby.

More than two dozen women have made these accusations, one after the other, giving the same details. Like the "good" people of the village, I am tired of hearing them. People abducted by UFOs give the same details as well. I can give those details right now, and claim that two weeks after Cosby drugged and raped me, I was taken, while strolling through a cornfield trying to figure out how to deal with what Dr. Huxtable did to me, by a powerful light up into the bottom of a spaceship and anally raped again. I could most certainly stand by that statement if someone was going to pay me $15,000 to do it, and, of course, if I had little-to-no conscience, or a twisted ability to over-rationalize, thereby killing what was left of it.

I know both a male and female rape victim personally. I will content myself with feeling for those closest to me, because I have a tendency to distance myself from anyone who has a track record for lying. As our common culture sinks into the comatose empire that built it, I suspect that a lot more people, male and female, will be doing the same. For any real rape victims out there, the few of you that there are, I hope you will do two things, and remember that I'm not going to help you do either of them:

1. Find a therapist. And don't give me the excuse that they're too expensive or hard to find. We are a therapeutic nation connected to the Internet, and I know for a fact that a great many therapists will negotiate costs for those who need help.
2. Talk to family and friends and, if there is no evidence or witnesses, no one else. I can't imagine that talking to government bureaucrats or millions of strangers about Cosby's belt buckle is really going to help you feel better. Roman Polanski's victim did not like all that attention. She just wanted her parents to help her. That's your best bet.

And that's as close as I'm ever going to get to apologizing for this article if, in the future, it is determined that an innocent man is in fact guilty. Out of my respect for innocent men like Bill Cosby, this is also as close as I'm ever going to get to expressing any sympathy for any mass media rape story. I've got orders to fill, a floor to mop, and a plethora of my own (mostly self-made) problems. Good luck, ladies.

Is Prince Andrew guilty?

Danny Baines · 9 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

It has recently been highlighted extensively on AVfM that Bill Cosby is being tried in the court of public opinion. This is significant to the USA, but over here in the UK, we have a different showtrial going on. Prince Andrew has been named by Virginia Roberts as a rapist.

Once again, this case highlights how men are tried in the court of public opinion. Prince Andrew has not been afforded any right to privacy. His identity and the allegations are fully public, no matter how unproven: no evidence has been presented and no conviction has been handed down.

Proof is what Men's Rights Activists want. We are not 'pro rape.' If Prince Andrew raped Miss Roberts, he should go to jail. But again, the point is that Prince Andrew is being treated as guilty until proven innocent, which flies in the face of all principles of democratic justice. The allegations have not been proven, but the public are still encouraged to pass judgement through news articles and the internet.

Once again, this highlights issues of a man's innocence and some women's predisposition to lie about rape, for money and fame. Even if everything Virginia Roberts has claimed is true, it STILL does not show Andrew is guilty of any misconduct, or worthy of legal trial.

Lets examine Virginia Robert's claims.

Firstly, the age issue. The media has connected Prince Andrew and Virginia Roberts through convicted paedophile, Jeffrey Epstein. Much has been made of Virginia's age. It has been widely reported that she was 17, and that Prince Andrew knew it. However, what the media doesn't mention is that this doesn't matter. The age of consent in the UK is 16. In New York at the time of the alleged sexual encounters, the age of consent was 17. Prince Andrew's awareness of her age shows he was aware that, if he had sex with her, then he was doing nothing wrong. Not the opposite.

Secondly, there is the issue of Prince Andrew's awareness in general. Virginia claims Jeffrey Epstein paid her £10,000 to ensure, "Whatever Prince Andrew wanted, I was to make sure he got. I didn't dare say no." Again, this may be true. But even if it is, it doesn't show that Andrew was even remotely aware that she had been paid. The photos of Virginia and Andrew together look naturally happy. Andrew is a Prince, and a Prince is considered highly desirable to women. They don't need to rape. But even if Virginia was paid, who is to say Andrew wasn't flattered by what he thought was genuine attention from a star struck young woman? Virginia says she just called the Prince 'Andy.' Her choice of words seems intimate and familiar, not oppressive and forced. It doesn't show he knew she was paid, and the photo of them together is not sexual. It does not show rape took place, or that sex took place.

Money is a big issue here. Many, many famous people have had allegations of rape for huge payouts. Michael Jackson, Bill Cosby, Dominique Strauss-Kahn, etc. It seems to be a pattern. These people may indeed have been rapists, but it has never been proven in court. Any woman wanting to make money and fame can do so with a false rape allegation. However unlikely it is for women to lie about rape for money, the rich and famous will attract them. Because they have money, the likelihood of a false allegation increases exponentially. Criminal charges are often not filed. The trial plays out in civil court, where the burden of proof is lower, and cash payouts replace jail time. The victim's fame is assured through the fame of the accused.

If Virginia was paid £10,000 to have sex, as she claims, I can't imagine that upset her. Being paid is not 'slavery' as she claims. Having sex with desirable men for huge payouts is hardly a difficult decision for many women, of a certain type. Perhaps she's spent it all, and now wants more. With opinion alone, we are encouraged to publicly try Andrew for what he's suspected of. So, why isn't she on trial in the court of public opinion, for being suspected of getting so used to clawing money from the rich and famous that she is only continuing to do what she knows best? False rape allegations for money would be a logical next step after payments for actual sex had dried up. She holds the power. This version is no less likely than her claims of victimhood.

All the while, the pressure is on the publicly shamed defendant. In this case, Virginia has stated “If a judge wants me to present my information in more detail, including more specific descriptions of the sexual activities with the men Epstein sent me to, I could do so.” To me, that sounds like a threat based on society’s shaming of male sexuality. An exact description of the sex is not required. The circumstances of the consent is what’s required. But the public will lap up sexual descriptions for their public humiliation factor.

Prince Andrew has been asked to comment time and time again. He refuses to do so. This does not make me suspicious. The burden of proof should be on the accuser, not the accused. He should no more be on trial than her.

That brings us to the last consideration. PROOF. Proof, proof, proof.

If Virginia wants Andrew to go to jail, (rather than a big payout,) she needs proof. As usual, if what she’s saying is true, then there IS proof.

As with any crime, proof is not always available. As a security guard I know this well. You can’t catch them all, but you can certainly catch a lot of them. Virginia Roberts says Andrew’s security team left them in the bedroom. Have the security team been questioned? She says she was paid £10,000. Can she show bank statements? Receipts of what she spent the money on? She claims the orgies were filmed. Have copies been found by police?

There seems to be an assumption in the media that if she was paid, Andrew is guilty. However, receiving £10,000 doesn’t necessarily mean you are a victim, or that Andrew is guilty. Are there records of communication between Andrew and Epstein? Do they show Andrew was actually aware that Virginia was paid? Is there proof that she was paid against her will? If she was not paid against her will, she wasn’t a slave by any definition. Anything is possible. But without proof, Andrew is innocent.

Feminism has a lot to answer for, and this is another case in point. The media has publicised Virginia’s claim that she will not be “bullied back into silence.” She uses the language of feminism. The only bullying so far seems to be from her. The allegations are splashed all over the news. That’s not silence. I’m sure Andrew doesn’t want the articles there, but he can’t stop them. Feminism encourages women to make suspect allegations as loudly as possible and shames people with ‘don’t bully me into silence.’ Feminism has demonized men and male sexuality. These presumptions are written into the language of the allegations. We assume that sex makes her a victim. We assume that she is a victim if she was paid. We assume she was a victim if she was 17. But why?

Why do we take these implications from what has been said? The demonization of men and male sexuality has created the power of suggestion that allows us to assume all accused rapists are actual rapists, because of the revulsion we feel about men and sex in general. Why do we assume anything about Andrew? Virginia hasn’t said he bullied her or paid her, so why do we assume guilt can be referred onto him? Even if they did have sex, why would we assume he’s a rapist? Why does her age matter? Why does the photo of them together matter?

Even if everything she says is true, what is Prince Andrew guilty of? Just having sex?

Andrew’s guilt is based on feminist power of suggestion. Its not based on evidence, and it has to stop.

References:

–Swear on oath you’re innocent, lawyers for ‘sex slave’ tell Prince –Disgraced Dominic Strauss-Kahn returns to French parliament two years after rape allegations
–Prince Andrew sex claims: Fresh documents filed in US court
–Virginia Roberts sex claims
–Prince Andrew may have been secretly filmed with underage girl he is alleged to have abused

50 #QuestionsForMen #Mansplained

AVfM Video Source · 10 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists stormed Twitter to ask men some questions, and a lot of them were really, really dumb. Sargon of Akkad patiently mansplains some answers.

Sanctified Bigotry

Mark Dent · 10 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I am about to tiptoe through a minefield.

Rosie Batty has just been named Australian of the Year. Rosie Batty lost her only son when her ex-husband battered him to death at a local cricket ground. Since then, she has become a champion for thousands of victims, demanding systemic changes, political leadership and reforms to the courts system.

It is always difficult to criticise or attack anyone who has endured unimaginable grief, but being grief stricken gives no-one the right to misinform or behave in a bigoted manner, however unintentional.

Sadly, even in the midst of her grief, Rosie cannot find any compassion for male victims of domestic violence. Rosie continually calls for more to be done to protect "women and children" The unspoken and very clear inference is that it is men and only men from whom women and children require protection.

Even after a spate of horrific child murders at the hands of mothers and a grandmother in the past few weeks here in Australia, Batty has never once referred to these shocking acts or suggested perhaps children require protection from their mothers too.

In a recent interview, Ms Batty said in particular, she wanted more men to talk about family violence and confront violent behaviour when they see it. She also trotted out the one in three women will experience violence at the hand of someone they know line, as though we are talking about violence at a level she has experienced. This is deceitful, manipulative behaviour and should be called out.

Batty has received angry mail from some people suggesting she should carry some of the blame for what happened to her son, given she chose the man who perpetrated the crime as her partner, conceived a child with him and allowed him to see their son despite his violent tendencies which she openly concedes she was aware of-Anderson had a history of abusing her and threatening to kill her. She also believed he suffered from paranoia. These criticisms of Batty have been widely condemned as outrageous examples of victim blaming, yet Batty is happy to apportion responsibility for the murder of her son to others.

Having never been in Batty's position I would never presume to point a finger of blame at her because of the violent actions of her partner, but if a questioning finger is going to be pointed anywhere (other than directly at the person who committed the crime), surely it should be directed at Batty before she blames men like me who never knew her partner or had any connection to her family. I just happen to share the gender of the perpetrator and that seems to be a good enough reason for Batty to hold me responsible in some way for what happened to her son.

Clearly the policing of dangerous, violent partners needs to be changed in order to prevent more tragedies and I have no qualms about Batty's criticisms of the failure of the courts and police to give adequate protection. But she doesn't stop there. It is Batty who points her finger at "men" and demands they do something to end this kind of violence.

I would suggest if Ms Batty is going to tell me to confront violent behaviour when I see it then she best follow her own advice. I have never chosen a violent, abusive person as my partner and then had a child with that partner. I have never been physically abused and threatened by my partner and continued my relationship.

Ms Batty called on the Government to dedicate long-term secure funding to fighting family violence and urged the community to "speak up" against sexist attitudes.

"Do not ignore what you see and what you know is wrong," she said.

"To men, we need you to challenge each other and become part of the solution.

Batty wants me and my mates to talk about family violence and confront violent behaviour when we see it. I have to tell Ms Batty that I have never had to talk to a mate about Family Violence other than to express our sadness or horror over the deaths of innocent children or people at the hands of family members.

On receiving her award, Batty also said:

She wanted more men to talk about family violence and confront violent behaviour when they saw it.

She recited statistics she wanted every Australian to know: One in three women experiences violence at the hand of someone they know. On average, one woman is killed every week by an intimate partner. One in four children has been exposed to domestic violence.

"I keep repeating those statistics because we all should know them and they're indisputable.

She said Australia needed cultural change to tackle domestic violence.

"Where does violence come from? It comes from gender and inequality," she said.

"It comes from men feeling a sense of entitlement toward their children and partners.

"Even though women are violent as well, the statistics are clear, it is very much a male issue."

These words seem to come straight from the feminist handbook and are a world away from the comments Batty made only hours after her son's murder:

"What triggered this was a case of his dad having mental health issues," she said today.

"He was in a homelessness situation for many years, his life was failing, everything was becoming worse in his life and Luke was the only bright light in his life.

"No one loved Luke more than his father. No one loved Luke more than me — we both loved him."

"And the very tragic thing about this is the father's life was tragic and based on … challenges in his life that we couldn't help him with and nor could anyone else.

It seems Rosie has had a "makeover" and is singing a different song under the guidance of her supporters and new-found friends in the domestic violence industry. No more references to Greg Anderson's mental demons, tragic life or deep love for his son. Now it's all a result of Anderson's gender.

I think telling men to have conversations about violence is as likely to end incidents like the one which killed Luke Batty as women chatting about violence would have prevented the murder of eight children in Cairns at the hands of their mother.

I'd like to ask Batty a question. If she believes sexist attitudes lead to men murdering their sons, what is the reason for mothers murdering their children?

These crimes were committed by individuals. These individuals were troubled, depressed, sick people. At the time of the murder of Luke, his father was homeless and living in his car. She mentions his paranoid behaviour. The man was clearly mentally unstable yet Batty continues to push the notion that men like her ex partner are to be found in homes all over the country and that such horrific incidents:

"can happen to anyone, no matter their circumstance or history"

Is it any wonder she has become the poster girl for the domestic violence industry? Having endured the loss of her son , Batty is very unlikely to be publically criticised by anyone who values their reputation or career. Here in Australia, Rosie Batty's face has featured on the front page of our newspapers on a number of occasions and she is continually referred to as a hero and courageous. Rosie may well be courageous but I see nothing brave about placing even partial blame or responsibility upon the entire male gender, for a crime committed by a man she chose to father her child.

I also find it quite disturbing when a person who claims to be a passionate advocate for victims of domestic violence refuses to ever mention a group of people who suffer the same pain as the women and children she constantly refers to and equally disturbing that she focuses all of her energy upon only one kind of perpetrator.

As I mentioned earlier, there has been a shocking spate of domestic violence incidents committed by women in recent months here in Australia.

The murder of eight children in Cairns is just one of those incidents. I had a friend ask why that massacre has gone completely under the radar in our media. There have been no feature length articles dissecting this tragedy, weeks after the event. No handwringing or discussions about murderous mothers or changing laws. Nothing-just silence.

After the initial coverage the only reference to this horrendous butchery was a quote from our Prime Minister, Tony Abbott, who attended the funeral of the deceased children.

"We know that sometimes people break. We also know there are difficult circumstances people deal with. This is a social issue as well as a law enforcement issue, but I'll be there in solidarity with them."

Imagine our Prime Minister telling Rosie Batty as he presented her with the Australian of the Year Award:

"Rosie, sometimes people break – the death of your son, Luke is a social issue as well as a law enforcement issue."

Aside from the Cairns massacre:

- Two children murdered by their grandmother in Caboolture, North of Brisbane and she attempted to burn alive another two grandchildren.
- Newborn baby dumped in a Sydney drain by its mother and left to die. Since this incident the mother has been given permission to name her son.
- A mother murdered one of her daughters and permanently maimed the other so badly she will require 24 hour care for the rest of her life. The daughter, according to newspaper reports was :"horrifically injured." The mother has remained anonymous and had recently been granted access with the backing of the Department of Human Services to the daughter she brutally maimed.

Again there has been no attempt by any journalist or politician to look at these facts and conclude that the safety of our children is in any way endangered by mothers or that the invisibility of women as perpetrators of domestic violence in official campaigns is a scandal and an outrage.

Compare the cloak of silence placed over the butchery of eight children by their mother with the media circus around two incidents involving fathers a few years ago. When a father, Arthur Freeman threw his daughter from the West Gate Bridge it became the focus of frenzied media attention and the murder was dissected, analysed and reviewed in forensic detail for weeks on end. A quick google shows that five years after the tragedy articles were still being written about this incident.

The same almost obsessive coverage has been applied to the murder of three boys by their father, Robert Farquharson. This crime has also been written about extensively in the media as well as having had a book written about it by Australian author, Helen Garner, titled, This House of Grief.

Just as the death of Rosie Batty's son has led to outcry and anger about our court system and inability of the police to stop violent men, these two incidents led to copious amounts of print devoted to blow by blow accounts of the crimes, the personalities of the perpetrators and the sheeting home of collective responsibility to all men.

Less than twelve months earlier, a mother, Gabriella Garcia, leapt off the same bridge with her son tied to her body because of her fears about a looming custody dispute. This murder/suicide was almost entirely ignored by the media. To this day, if you google Arthur Freeman's name, countless links open up and all of them denounce this man as monster.

The only article of any depth I found on the Garcia murder/suicide begins with this line.

Gabriella Garcia adored her 22-month-old son Oliver. According to Pedro Soto, her close friend and the last person to see her alive, all the Melbourne mother wanted to do was to protect him.

It continues:

So why did she strap him into a Baby Bjorn carrier, cover his eyes with a bandage, use a milk crate to climb over the fence on Melbourne's Westgate Bridge and jump to their deaths?

"It was basically to save him from a bad life and upbringing. She did this not to harm him but to protect him, in a backwards way. I don't know how to describe it," Soto says in the first public explanation of why Garcia, a 35-year-old mother from Melbourne's western suburbs, chose to kill herself and her son, on a freezing winter's morning, just over a year ago.

At first glance, Garcia's story and Oliver's death is the tragic result of desperate fears over a looming custody dispute.

Garcia's family was devastated by her suicide. Her sister Monica set up a shrine near the lonely spot where Garcia was found under the bridge, writing a letter saying "we will never forget you both. We will always love you. We understand your pain and hope you have found peace and happiness now."

The only reference to the murderer's former partner's family comes near the end of the article.

Members of the Allen family were angry. At the height of the public outpouring of sympathy for Darcey Freeman, the three-year-old girl allegedly thrown to her death off the bridge by her father, who is now facing a murder charge, Oliver's aunt Anita Allen wrote a pointed letter to the Herald Sun newspaper.

"When my little nephew died at the hands of his mother, it went almost unnoticed," she wrote. "Because she committed suicide, there was little the media could say.

And because it was a closed coronial investigation, there is little my family know about this tragedy other than our own loss, disbelief and grief. How could she?

"It seems that my nephew's life became invisible because his mother killed herself in the process. Under any other circumstances, the anger, the disbelief and horror that I feel each day at what happened would be shared by many."

Nothing has changed. The murder of Rosie Batty's boy is a call to arms-more must be done to protect women and children-men must have conversations and stand up when they see violent men.

When Tony Abbott first heard the breaking news of the Cairns massacre of eight children he referred to it as an unspeakable crime. Perhaps this was before all the facts had come out-you know, Tony may have assumed a man had done the killing. I have already quoted the comments he made at the funeral of the dead children. Why the different tone, why the understanding that:

Sometimes people break.

I think it may have been when Tony realized the killer was a mum.

Woman walks 10 hours in Mumbai and did not get catcalled even once!

Anil Kumar · 10 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

India is an awful place for women. This claim is made almost every day in media all over the world. In fact, Trust Law, a feminist charity run by Thomson Reuters foundation claimed that India is 4th most dangerous place for women in the world.

After the feminist video of a woman walking around the streets of New York went viral, a similar experiment was conducted in the city of Mumbai, which has a population of 12 million people.

IBNLIVE, the partner channel of CNN in India reports,

A woman wearing a top and a skirt walks around Mumbai city for 10 hours from Dadar East to Andheri, and Bandra to Kurla but doesn't get catcalled even once! Though the model in the video gets stared at, but no man passed lewd comments or approaches her in the video.

This video was watched by 2.5 million viewers in YouTube in 3 months. The group that conducted this experiment writes,

We at IndieTube in Mumbai decided to mimic the 10 hours of walking in NYC as a woman video. Our model wears a top and a short skirt and walks around Mumbai city throughout the day almost 10 hours of walking. To our surprise she did not get a single instance of street harassment.

I have never seen any street harassment of women in Bangalore, which has a population of almost 10 million now. A camera in a busy street for a couple of hours in a day and a night can easily capture people's behaviour.

Why India is stereotyped so badly in international media is something much more complex, which I will cover in another article. But, for the time being, I hope the concerned people of the West get some sound sleep with the belief that at least one city in India is safe for women. They can continue to believe that most men in India are evil. I can not stop them from having such a compassionate, loving and broad outlook towards people of other countries.

http://https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=tPFdLWPJGck

To feminists, everything is misogyny... even their own vaginas.

Andrew DiKaiomata · 10 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I've learned it's no use to argue with feminists. To them, everything bad, all social ills, customs, all thought are caused by "The Patriarchy" which in turn causes all-pervasive "misogyny," the hatred of every single woman on earth. If you corner them with facts, they go into an emotional meltdown. Despite learning not to argue with a feminist, I'll occasionally ask certain questions that I've found to be unanswerable under a feminist mindset. One such question is "Is there any social ill or any malady whatsoever that is not caused by "The Patriarchy?"

To a feminist "The Patriarchy"(the belief that there is always a man to blame) is the cause of everything bad, feminism is the cause of all things good. A feminist is unable to give the clear answer, "Of course!" because if it's bad, men did it; if men did it, it's bad. Under feminism, being bad and being caused by men are synonymous. What's more, men cause all things, women are always passive. Something being bad, (or in feminist 'problematic') has only one cause; men. "The Patriachy" is really a catchall concept for men being the problem.

"The Patriarchy" has another useful purpose, it can be used to ignore men's issues. Infant boys being sexually tortured to death? 60 million men being drafted to their death in WWII? Suicide, murder, homelessness? "You people have it coming because Patriarchy!" To a feminist, men suffering disproportionately from virtually every single social ill is proof of their power, and confirms the idea of "The Patriarchy."

Another question we could ask a feminist, "Apart from feminism, is there anything that is not misogyny?" Under feminism, everything is misogyny, except for feminism. If it's not feminism, it's misogyny. This false dichotomy within feminism is one of many. This comes from the wild feminist assertion that feminism is identical to the concept of equality and so if you believe in equality, you believe the totality of feminism. Despite being a common feminist assertion, we see immediately how this is silly. The concept of equality existed long before feminism, does that mean everyone despised every single woman before that? Of course not. That's all feminism believes, just equality? Nothing about "The Patriarchy", "Institutional Misogyny, per se.", "Toxic Masculinity", "Male Privilege", or the Duluth Model with assumption of male villainy? Clearly, feminism is not "just about equality."

Another example within feminism is the rule that when someone loves a woman's body, that person hates the woman as a person. Therefore it's misogyny, the hatred of every single woman on the planet. When a woman dresses revealingly, it's also misogyny, especially if a man sees her. There's the dichotomy, to love the body is to hate the person. Female breast: misogyny! Vaginas? Misogyny! Your misogyny is revealed because you're using the word wrong! If a vagina is sexual (hint: it is!) it's misogyny. A feminist can make an argument for literally everything being misogyny and proof of a patriarchal conspiracy.

This goes so deep, even the use of the very word "vagina" is misogyny to some feminists. Simply go to any of numerous feminist websites or forums and you'll see some absolutely vicious, knock down feminist fights over the word vagina. You see, to feminists, even their own vaginas is misogyny, especially if you use the word in an unapproved way. Don't believe me? Here are some example screen shots from various sites:

Displaying misogyny.JPG

Multidimensionality

Furthermore, whereas the word "vagina" implies a singular orifice for a singular organ, "cunt" includes the vulva, clitoris, labia and canal. It speaks of the multidimensionality of women's sexual pleasure, not just a sheath into which a man can thrust his erection. It denotes a sexuality rooted in pleasure, not one denied orgasm by patriarchal doctrine.

I believe the word "cunt" should be revived and reused so that its beauty, force and power is remembered and reinstated in feminine discourse with its etymology intact.

Language controls attitudes in the world and this is why we need to quash the misogynistic thwarting of our sexuality by obliterating and transcending restrictive words that have roots in patriarchy, such as vagina, and move into the orgasmic and celebratory cunt epoch as quickly as possible.

When women finally reclaim and speak this word, its full potential will be released and women will repossess their collective cunt power. They will rise up against misogyny and patriarchy – and end them.

Gillian Schutte is an award-winning documentary filmmaker, writer and activist. She is working on a film titled C is for Cunt.

Jack Crofts The best argument I've heard for why feminists SHOULD refer to the vulva as the vulva is because, by referring to it as a vagina, you refer to it only by the part that is useful to men. It's been described as yet another side-effect of patriarchy that ignores all the parts of a woman that aren't useful to them and calls the whole thing by the only part they care about.

June 26, 2012 at 12:31pm · 38

This isn't the top lunacy of feminism. The real lunacy is the wild disconnect between their view of the problem, and their way to a solution. Feminist solutions include freebleeding, smearing period blood all over their faces, topless protests of catholic churches, calls for a male genocide including #KillAllMen, and the increasingly common tragedy of a feminist who physically or sexually abuses her son for retribution against men in general. A rational person sees that this is not a solution to anything.

Thankfully feminism is a hateful, bigoted ideology in decline. We see leading feminists being compared now in the mainstream to KKK and neo-nazi figures–even though they don't like it, the comparison is being made more and more. Polls indicate an increasing association of feminism with hatred against men. There's a corresponding amount of feminist hand waving over that fact. Society is now slowly starting to acknowledge hateful feminist bigotry as a problem rather than any kind of solution. Now those of us who care about men's issues can undo the damage this bigotry has done and continue working for real solutions..

Generation Porn? The real reasons why men are shunning marriage

AVfM Video Source · 11 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Helen Smith, author of Men on Strike, discusses the state of the young American male with PJTV's Andrew Klavan, Bill Whittle and Matt Orr. Are men shunning marriage because of the economy, or do they have alternatives to marriage, like porn and easy sex?

“Manslamming” – Is it useful to use the opponents’ tactics?

Paul Elam · 11 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

This article first appeared on AVFM Romania.

I think we all already know about the new idiotic idea the feminists came up with, called “manslamming”. For those of you who don’t know what it is about, I will brief you on it. Some chick from New York City, a place which I choose to call the international capital of “social liberalism,” woke up one day and decided that it is a good idea to walk on the streets and to slam herself into everyone that got in her way, to see who will step aside from her self entitled mistress tantrums and who wouldn’t. As you have probably guessed by now, the lady, named Beth Breslaw, is a feminist. Based on her little experiment, she arrived at the astonishing conclusion that almost all the men she encountered have slammed into her and that almost all the women have stepped out of her way. This so called statistic, aside from the fact that it seems very dubious, is very offensive because it implies that all men are jerks and all women have the mentality of a servant.

This fact is not surprising because this has always been the feminist’s movement message. What raises a question mark for me is the decision of another lady, named Katherine Timpf, of showing her support for Men’s Rights by choosing to make her own social experiment, similar to the one mentioned above. I can see how this can become a problem. In the following lines, I will present my opinion on the consequences of such kind of actions on the image of activism for men’s rights.

I will start by saying that I understand Ms. Timpf’s enthusiasm and I appreciate her willingness to help. I find her results in accordance with human society’s mentality because people, in general, have more sympathy and respect for people of the opposite sex than for people of the same sex as theirs (this is why our species still reproduces and raises children). However, I do not believe that it is such a great idea to start slamming into people on the streets just because you have something to prove. This is the attitude of a bully. I believe that people have developed the ability to speak out of desire to communicate something to another without the need to hit each other in the head with a stick. This is why it is more effective to resolve our differences by the way of open dialogue and persuasion than by slamming into people just because we consider ourselves to be all high and mighty and we’ve got something to prove.

The fact that Miss Timpf has proven that three times less women than men are willing to get out of your way when you walk on the street is a good thing for a short term because it comes in opposition to the false statistic made by Miss Breslaw. On a long term, however, the results can be catastrophic and rather undesirable.

The First Wave of feminism was to some extent a sensible movement. Its representatives were married women, they had families, they were devout Christians and furthermore, women with a proper education. These are the reasons why their message, although radical for that period, made sense because it wanted the progress of human society. There were plenty of crazies and fanatics back then in the movement, but they were kept under check.

With the coming of the Second Wave of Feminism in the 60’s however, things have taken a turn for the worse. The feminist message, infected with the communist ideology of those times, had become more violent and anti progressive. This is the reason why the movement was flooded by all kinds of social misfits, which used feminism as a “gateway drug” to something more radical or who were simply looking for an excuse to get back at a society who didn’t agree with them. And so, once upon a day, the crazies took control of the asylum, creating today’s radical feminism, in which the nuttier you are, the higher you will climb.

I consider my sympathy for the MRM to rather be an extension of my love for truth and equity rather than a supreme goal of which I am in need to justify my existence. The message is a peaceful one, encouraging normality and a society free of fanaticism. But if we start to impose our message by slamming into people who walk on the streets and have no idea about our movement, we might be classified as anything else but peaceful.

If somebody wishes to contribute to the movement or to just criticize feminist hypocrisy, I advise them to write an article, make a video or a short humoristic animation or anything else that implies a level of intelligence higher than that of a kindergartener. As a movement, the last thing we need is waves of fanatics which want to use our label as an excuse to inflict harm upon others. After all, only the UN still believes that peace is born out of conflict.

In the ending, I would like to say that I do not personally know Miss Timpf and I do not know anything about her past ideological orientation, which is the reason why I avoided to express any opinions I may have about her. On the other hand, if my hunch is correct and especially if it is not, I would like to state that anyone who ever realized up until now that the feminist movement is harmful to society, had chosen to leave the movement and come to our side, had better leave their rules where they came from and play by our rules instead. I like to think that I speak in the name of every MRA when I state that we, as a movement, do not desire or find ourselves in the need of fanatics.

Reintegration Therapy of child with father – A cruel scam

Gary Trieste · 11 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

When my ex-wife filed for custody, I had been parenting my child every day for the previous seven years. I was with her every day since birth and we had lived together as a whole family.

Up to that point I was never alleged to be a threat of harm to my daughter by anyone, and to the contrary, my daughter and I were inseparable and happy being with each other, and everyone who knew us lauded me as an involved, conscientious father.

My daughter was a happy, well adjusted and healthy child.

Prior to this filing, during a separation time, my ex and I were still amicable with each other, and we continued to share joint physical and legal custody of our daughter as we had before our split.
This went on for about a year, but my ex eventually got ever so more impatient at actually having to share co-parenting decisions with me in our daughter's upbringing, health care and education. As if I was encroaching on a realm of her control that was not mine to opine.

She had become increasingly indignant that I actually had a right to equal decision making authority with her concerning our daughter; she actually believed that I had no such right, that she essentially owned our daughter outright, and she eventually found my involvement in our daughter's upbringing to be insufferable.

At that point, having read much feminist literature on how to seize custody by stealth, and unbeknownst to me until it was a fait accompli, she filed for sole custody in the family court; there she alleged vague and inflammatory sounding allegations, said she was afraid of me, that I shouted at her, said I was a risk of harm, and was immediately granted full temporary custody and a restraining order against me from her, my daughter and my dog.

Whereas before, I had been always with my daughter daily, where we went to all kinds of events and outings, played chess together, watched cartoons, she regularly slept over my place since our adjacent apartments were always open to each other – in a heartbeat, on that day all contact with my daughter ceased immediately.

No contact, no communication. No nothing. It was immediate, sudden and drastic, like an iron curtain suddenly drawn between me and my daughter – and even worse without any explanation to my daughter as to why.

My daughter cried to see me, wondered why I wasn't there anymore. I could hear her through the doors between our apartments, she screamed "Daddy, daddy I love you, I know you're there, why won't you answer me? What did I do wrong?" All the while her mother screamed at her to stop, that she would be punished, and that my daughter would make me go to jail if she continued. This just made her cry harder.

I was constrained by a court order, under penalty of imprisonment, if I even answered her through the door. I bit my tongue and kept mum, against all my instincts. Nothing would have made my ex happier than to see me arrested by police in front of our daughter, just to prove how bad I was, and how her warnings should be obeyed or else.

And yet, night after night, I could hear, my daughter cried herself to sleep, chanting "daddy I love you," and thinking I had abandoned her, and that I didn't love her anymore. The trauma was deep, and soul rending.

At some point, we actually communicated by music, where I would play my harmonica to her, and she would play her ukelele back to me through the closed door. This seemed to go under the radar for a time, seen as idle playing, until her mother caught on, and then more screaming and more vitriol, and punishment was visited upon my child for disobeying.

Throughout this time, it was obviously traumatic for my daughter, and everyone who saw her knew of her angst and pain, yet they just ignored it and her suffering. Rationalizing that the mother must have had a good reason for this, the courts knew best, and that this was somehow best for my daughter, despite the torture she suffered – she was just a child, and didn't know any better about these adult matters, and really shouldn't anyway.

But as time went by, the crying turned into rebellion and anarchy. Her behavior changed into something she was never like before. She had temper tantrums and fought physically with her mom, biting kicking, spitting, and screaming curses.

She had problems in school, and fought with the teachers. Security police at malls, and 911 were called repeatedly by her mother, teachers and other caretakers, and she was repeatedly brought to the emergency room by ambulance for being uncontrollably violent, and she became unmanageable unlike ever before.

As this escalated, at the suggestion of the school social worker, she was taken to a therapist to ease the pain of losing her dad, and how to deal with her angst about it. When she insisted that she just wanted her daddy back, and that her mom punished her when she would say that, the therapist recommended her to be seen by a child psychiatrist for drug therapy.

In short order, she was put on a regimen of psychiatric drugs to further properly erase that angst and pain.

Initially, after feeling the horrible effects of the first few doses, she refused to take the drugs, and fought and screamed that these people, including her mother, were trying to poison her, and that her heart would explode. It took several people to hold her down, and put the drugs into her mouth, and force her to swallow. She begged and pleaded for them to stop.

Alone there, with no one to turn to, she screamed to the air, hoping against hope, “Daddy, daddy, help me, save me, make them stop”. But I was not there, the system rigged to keep me far away and unaware of this torture.

Not able to physically resist, she was coerced into taking the drugs.

After several petit mal seizures, horrific dreams and insomnia, and a doubling of her weight to morbid obesity, she acclimated to the drugs, and finally this seven and a half year old child lost all will to fight the people forcing them into her.

Eventually, over months, properly numbed up and now psychically restrained, this seemed to “help”, according to the therapists and her mother, and she learned to stop asking for her daddy, and to stop resisting the medications.

During this time, my ex seeing how much my daughter wanted to be with me, and knowing I was just next door, resolved to take my daughter away from the building where we had lived with and next to each other for the prior two years.

Seeing the preparations of their moving, I filed for an emergency restraining injunction to keep her in the home she was used to living in. The court denied it, and my daughter was then taken by her mother to another location, further alienating and estranging her from me, this time completely, without even me being nearby for solace.

Later, not satisfied with having exerted full control over our child’s mind, body and legal control, and having removed her from my presence, my ex doubled down on that control, and sought to have CPS attack me, and to undermine the normal due process of our custody case, by inciting them to launch an abuse proceeding against me.

My daughter was now exposed to me being pat-down searched by armed police before being allowed to see her, also while armed police with clipboards observed our every move together. CPS workers further confirmed the message to my daughter that her mother had been telling her, now in an official capacity that could not escape my daughter’s notice, explicitly by telling her that they were there to protect her from me, that I was a bad man who couldn’t take care of her, and that if she said the wrong thing at our visits, I would go to jail.

Eventually I was able to crawl out of the snakepit of CPS hell, and prove my innocence against the false charges. I thought at this point having been thoroughly vetted even more so than the average person as to being no danger, that no one would stand between me and my daughter, that we could normalize our relationship and regain what we had lost for all that lost time. Little did I realize, I was now marked with an unofficial scarlet letter, labeling me dangerous to my daughter. Although nothing formal or stated, the system conspired even more so to keep us apart at all costs.

Not knowing any better about hidden agendas, I tried in good faith to reconnect and be a dad again to her. I was for all intents and purposes legally entitled to equal access to my child, on par with the mother. However the court steadfastly refused to provide for any formal visitation order, and instead I was funneled into a puzzling labyrinth of family therapists, and counselors.

I learned that now I would not in fact be reunited with my daughter, but rather we would become mired in session after session with psychologists and therapists. Each session costing me more than I could afford, but denying me any access to my child unless I paid up. I was told that before I could see my child unsupervised, they had to make sure she expressed absolutely no distress about seeing or being with me alone.

I was told that they wanted to reintegrate myself and my daughter in a careful, methodical fashion, and would not risk even the slightest anxiety in her.

Of course they ignored the continuing messages and threats to my daughter coming from the mother, whom which she lived with exclusively at this point. A barrage of invectives fed to her of how dangerous it was for her to be alone with me, and how bad a man I am, of how the courts had to take me away from her.

That element was assiduously avoided as a point of concern, and not a part of their assessment of how or why my daughter might express any anxiety being with me. It would be obvious to anyone that without including that as a diagnostic factor, there was no way that my daughter would ever initially be able to be with me without expressing some initial anxiety. But it is not so obvious to highly paid professional health workers.

Somehow, I think that oversight was not purely accidental.

Of course, all this time, her mother continued to have complete and total control and access to our daughter, and no one questioned that arrangement. They avoided any therapeutic concerns or questions as to how the denial of a father would affect a child detrimentally. These things were considered unremarkable, and not worthy of comment or attention, despite my inquiring the point several times.

Consistent with this therapeutic modality, little attention was paid to all the stress, turmoil and shock that was involved in taking away her dad. The correlation between the child's history of removal from her home, and the denigration of a parent she loved and trusted and her resultant emotional turmoil, tantrums, hospitalizations and drugging was not looked into – all that got swept under the rug, ignored, considered non or insignificant to the current therapy.
Nor was the repeated re-opening of psychic wounds that would otherwise naturally heal, via the mother's manic messages to the child as to her father's dangerousness.

Getting her dad back into her life somehow now was optional, maybe an unrealistic goal, and required careful reintegration, step-by-step monitoring, and attendant entourage of mental health workers.

Summation and Overview

Although the surface logic of the system seems appealing and reasonable, in regard to how children must be treated with kid gloves in these situations, this logic is only a tool for misdirection and plausible deniability.

There is a subtle lie embedded in their importune and cry for protection of the child's mental and emotional health well being.

The lie is, that drastic and violent removal of their father, and/or removal from their home to places they don't know, and a continuing denigration, is acceptable stress, and not relevant.
Whereas the very mild natural anxiety, that would come from healing and the fast paced curatives of direct, unchaperoned re-connecting with the father, is unacceptable and to be done at a glacial pace if at all, and stopped immediately if anyone thinks there is some "distress".

The simple fact is, the child weathered the horrible life insult of being ripped from a loving life-long parent, and survived that, yet reintegration is considered too stressful to do at the same pace.

And that is self-serving political, professional hypocritical bullshit, designed to extract as much money out of the familial situation as possible.

What is ignored, because there are judges and police, and guns and quasi-criminal enforcement taking place, is any angst and distress put upon the child stemming from all that. And no therapist will even question that, or address it equitably, or even diagnostically.

The simple fact is, that reintegration of a loving fit father into his child's life doesn't need to be attended by an entourage of therapists and legal guardians. All it takes is simple direct being with each other, as they had before, and once again experiencing life together as they had done before.

The truth is that if these professionals actually resolved the problem they purported to be tasked with healing, their money stream would dry up. Such professed concern is false and driven by money, and with the ever present extortionate threat of stopping it at any moment. Even good intentions, if they were really there, have a way of becoming distorted and corrupted when money incentivizes pathological caution, caution that will guarantee a continuing flow of money into their pockets.

As Upton Sinclair observed, "It is difficult to get a man to understand something, when his salary depends upon his not understanding it."

The disconnect in the mental health guild's advice, is in treating children like brittle snowflakes, but only when it comes to reintegrating the fathers back into their lives. They have a whole calculus, a service plan, and an approach to doing this. But they make no analysis, concern or criticism, or comment or anything when it is done in the opposite direction. The removal — not their business or concern.

Just try, during reintegration therapy – ask a therapist about the radical ripping of the child from their father. They will not address it, saying it is not within their purview. No comment. A necessary evil. Sausage making too distasteful to even talk about. Oh, but they have so much to say about "correcting" that problem, and will be more than eager to slow it down, and to interject themselves into that process.

By now I understand their surface logic. I can talk their talk, and I am fully conversant with their peculiar vernacular and child psychodynamic theories. But it rings hollow and sophist, like so much psychobabble, and insincere when it is put in context of the whole situation. A situation they will conveniently compartmentalize, so as to not address the full situation, not their job to address it. There is no outrage, or visceral reaction as to what had happened in the first place, and thus no moral animus to correct it.

And an innocent child suffers for other people's sins.

References:

Missing Anya

In The Trenches, My Daughter's Court Imposed Paternal Exile

Anya's Abusers

Child Psychiatrist Drugs my Daughter without My Knowledge or Permission

American Family Courts, Constitutional Abused Part I

American Family Courts, Constitutional Abused Part II

25 #QuestionsForMen mansplained, again

Lucian Vâlsan · 11 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The incredibly entitled and totally-not-oppressed American feminists who populate Twitter launched a hashtag called #QuestionsForMen which is supposed to reveal “casual sexism” that the poor little American women are allegedly suffering terribly from.

I selected 25 of them and I’ll try to be as brutally honest as I can in answering them. Hope you enjoy it.

No. And I also don’t offer such gifts. It’s a decision I made a long time ago (in fact long before Valentine’s Day was even a thing in my neck of the woods) for one simple reason: I don’t believe in buying stupid shit as a rule. And if I want to buy stupid shit, I don’t need a special day.

Also, in my part of the world, the 14th of February is just the beginning of what I call “The deadly month of men’s wallets” because, you see, in under one month, there are exactly 4 holidays (all of them religiously celebrated by a huge chunk of women) in which men are supposed to buy shit for women. Are there any for men? Well, in reality, no – because modernity has pretty much abolished the old March 9 which used to be a day when women were supposed to buy shit for men.

So, there’s Valentine’s Day on February 14th, then there’s Dragobetele on February 24th, then there’s Mărțișor on March 1st (which is allegedly gender neutral but it’s been almost 20 years since I’ve last seen anyone even mention men) and then there’s International Women’s Day on March 8th.

And women love it when I put my views on this so bluntly. But that’s mainly because they think I’m joking. Until they find out that I am not.

Do I get angry responses for my views? Of course. If I had 1€ for every angry response, Bill Gates would be dirt poor in comparison to myself.

As for threats, I get a couple of them per week although the average is roughly 3.5 per week (and yes, I made the statistic for 2014) because for some reason my philosophical opponents seem to be more comfortable in sending me threats during the spring and summer.

However, it's not my style to pull a Sarkeesian on everyone and just whine for the whole fricking planet to see how oppressed I am. Because in reality, threats on the internet are just words on a screen. If I don't like them, I delete them. Those I find funny I keep for posterity.

For the most part, I don't worry about online threats at all – and that is because they mainly come from people whose existence is totally indifferent to me.

No. What I did though was to call a friend to come to the spot where I am because there was no way I'm gonna cross that neighborhood by myself.

In other words, I actually called a friend instead of an acquaintance who could actually do something practical to alleviate my fears – who did in fact turn out to be legitimate. Thank goodness those thugs didn't have guns, because if they had, it would've been illegal for me and my friend to defend ourselves.

But if calling a friend and keeping him/her on the phone makes you feel better – then more power to you. However, that's not oppression. You are the only one responsible for your feelings.

Christine Lagarde, Fatima al-Fihri, Andrée Virot,… there's a huge list of women who did both great and awful things and who wielded a tremendous amount of power in history yet, ironically, feminists are the least likely group to celebrate them.

But that shouldn't be a surprise, really. Feminism is misogynistic by its very nature and the collectivist-tribalist framework of "thinking" that drives way too many feminists today commends them to frown upon women who not only succeed, but succeed whilst showing the middle finger to the Big Sister.

Lady Thatcher knew what she was talking about when she said feminism is poison.

Of course. And I would wager that most people have been in that situation at least once.

You know, men tend to be human and sometimes they get scared.

Your name is Swedish. But wherever you are – try reading the marriage laws with a focus on how they impact men. And there you'll have at least a part of the answer.

But if my haunch is correct and you are indeed Swedish, just take a look at how men are treated culturally in Sweden. I would never marry in a country where the editor-in-chief of a big news media writes a piece called Yes, I hate men and then not only gets away with such blatant bigotry, but actually gets praise, primarily from female readers.

No matter how much I love a woman, I just wouldn't sign a binding contract in such a nation. It's absurd.

Also, believe it or not, cohabitation (at least in Europe) is getting increasingly profitable. And, in my experience, I get far more joy if I find my girlfriend home because she wants to be there, rather than because she's forced to. And it goes both ways. She gets more joy from me being there because I want to and not because I'm afraid that leaving her is bound to strap me with an annuity or alimony or whatever the legal term is in various nations for what I generally call vaginamony.

Yes. In the end, the direct boss who threatened me ended up being fired herself because when the business owner used a pen and paper, he noticed that I'm far more productive than she had ever been and me having a beard was utterly irrelevant for the company's profits and well-being.

I've been employed in such a place long time ago when frowning upon long-haired men was popular (the Communists really hated long-haired men). I wrote my resignation after 4 months – the long hair policy was one of the reasons for that (albeit the smallest of them).

I'm a self-employed long-haired man now.

No. But it has come to a point where it does trigger laughter in me and an unstoppable urge to mock and ridicule anyone who utters such words towards me.

And that's mainly because exactly 100% of the people who ever told me that have no bloody clue what "privilege" and "oppression" really looks like.

Try having your house under surveillance by the State, whilst having to spend long hours (10 hours in a good day!) in queues for basic necessities like milk, gas cylinder re-fills (here's a picture from 1985) or bread. Oh, and the bread was rationed.

And that's only the beginning. If I start describing the period between 1982 and 1989 from my part of the world, a 3-volume book wouldn't be enough. Suffice to say that I don't view any feminist (or any woman, really) in Europe or North America today as being oppressed by any means.

Virtually all American feminists are wealthier than 90% of the planet – and wealthier than a significant chunk of American men. I simply can't get myself to feel compassion for their "oppression".

Yes, absolutely. I wouldn't even think twice about it.

Okay, that's two questions. First, no, I don't worry about being seen as bossy.

Second, yes, I was called bossy a few times – and in one occasion was deserved. But, being right when being bossy tends to help because when things go right, everyone will either forgive or forget that you've been bossy and be grateful that they still have a job.

The boss is there for a reason. And sometimes, there are situations when the boss has to be bossy and it's nothing wrong with that.

Oh, yes. Especially older people who think that at my age I should've had at least on child if not two.

And yes, it pisses me off – but I treat this sort of people the same way I treat the feminists who want to regulate how I take a leak, how I fuck, how I ride the bus and all that: I not-so-politely invite them to mind their own damn business.

In fact, we'd have a far better world if more people would just mind their own damn business and stop trying to control everybody. Oh, and more adherence to the I don't give a flying tosh school of thought would be nice.

Not now. But when I worked front-end customer service, I used to be told that quite often. That's one of the things that made me realize that that job wasn't for me.

Not now, because the people I hang around with know that I'm in a long-term-relationship. But when I was single? Of course! Especially if she was hot.

It works in a similar manner as with women. In women, if the guy hitting on you is attractive, that's great. If not, then he's deemed a creep.

The reverse though doesn't seem to apply to often in the Anglosphere. But it does apply here. If she's ugly as hell, I might even have some friends help me get rid of her – but if she's hot and I say no, well, then all hell may break loose.

Oh, and here's a secret: Men get called far nastier names (both by women and other men) for not wanting female attention.

Depends on what you mean by reluctant. Anyway, yes, because it's tough to find a decent psychologist (or, I believe you call that a therapist).

And I'd wager a significant chunk of men can relate to what I say. Otherwise dr. T's Shrink4men wouldn't be flourishing.

Not to mention than in my corner of the world, women seeking mental health services are either seen as possibly insane by older people and maybe a bit distressed by younger folks – whilst men in the same position are seen as definitely insane. Which kinda adds to the problem.

But anyway, the social attitudes on this topic don't bother me that much – it's the fact that there's a chronic lack of decent therapists to address men's issues that's bothering me. And it's not getting any better with more and more misandry being introduced into the classes that these professionals take.

Everytime I say that I don't want to have children, the discussion ends with a "you'll change your mind eventually". Every. Single. Time.

Does it bother me? Well, yeah, a bit. But my adherence to the I don't give a flying tosh school of thought helps me move on quite quickly (in under 5 seconds, that is) because it's not worth my time to argue with other people on such trivial matters. So what if they think I'll change my mind eventually?

No, seriously, so what?!

No. Never. I don't exist to receive validation from everyone around me.

Yes, some people will think I'm too fat, or too thin, or that my long hair is too long, or not long enough – or that my dressing style is not good enough… or whatever. Idiots will always find something to pick on.

I, on the other hand, have much more important business than to worry about what some random idiots think or say about my outfit or about my looks. If you don't like how I look, then don't work with me and don't talk to me. GTFO!

It's a healthy attitude, just saying. It also helps in keeping your blood pressure stable. (not joking!)

Absolutely. Especially if I'm traveling in dubious places. You don't want to know what dubious places I was in at 3AM in Budapest last year. You can be damn sure I let everyone who I know they care that I got back safely to the hotel.

And I also have more reasons than a woman to do so – given that men are far-far-far-far more likely to be the victims of street violence than any woman anywhere in Europe or North America (or indeed anywhere in the world, really).

Only by female feminists.

I'm serious with this one. I've argued with all stripes of people – from Bolsheviks, to traditional-gynocentrists, to male feminists, to genuine fascists,… you name it. The only people who have ever called me an unnatural man were female feminists.

In all honesty, though, it shouldn't be a surprise – given that the very view that men as men are somehow unnatural is a view that comes from a particularly nasty branch of female feminists.

Yes. I was 6 (I think). I wanted a skirt for comfort because I needed to climb trees – and those nasty summer pants that were made back in Communism were a pain in the arse for that purpose. I didn't think I wasn't allowed to per se, as today's understanding of allowed would be. I rather thought I wouldn't be allowed to ask my great-grandma to waste a good piece of cloth to make me a skirt for my silly purpose.

Getting a bizarre (but comfortable) skirt was the only way to avoid going out in my underwear. I got giggles from my peers – but I also got first to the top of the tree and ate all those good cherries. I'm not joking here. Oh, and the cherries weren't washed (you didn't think I would just pick them all and take them down and risk losing them to my peers, wouldn't you?) – something which I noticed it sounds horrible by today's standards.

But I also had the luck of growing up in a culture where kids doing such things was considered to be just kids being kids as opposed to taking a crapton of pictures and claiming oppreshun and speshul snowflake status for being gender-whatever.

Thank goodness there was no social media back then. I feel for today's kids, many of their lives being already endangered by the crap that their parents have put up on the web…

Quite a few times.

That's because I not only look younger than I am but also because I take pride in the fact that I had my first job at the age of 12 (I was selling newspapers on the street). By the time I reached 16 I was almost entirely independent and by the age of 19 I already employed a person.

Another issue is that today, young people in most of Europe are caught in a cycle of masking unemployment by taking long, boring and ultimately useless university courses – and in the meantime, most of them (both young men and young women) live off their parents' in some way. I think it's horrible that the young people's most creative years are wasted in a classroom instead of being out there and making something for themselves.

When you add the never-ending recession that's going on in the 28 unfortunate nations of the EU – you'll realize that being an "independent young man" is not really a given at all.

1. I don't know about women in general, but feminist women do interrupt me way more often than common sense and common decency would allow.

2. As often as it's necessary. And I have a high bar for "necessary" and apply it across the sex divide. I argue ideas and refute ideas on their own merit, not on the merit of the sex of the utterer.

3. No, not really. I really do have more important business than to worry about what sex interrupts me or what was the sex of the last person I argued with and whether I interrupted her/him or not. This is not an issue – this is petty bullocks, really.

Oh, absolutely!

Take the issue of reproductive rights. Most women I encountered seem to think that men have all the reproductive rights (or that they have any reproductive rights in the first place) – when in fact, the exact opposite is true.

Yes. As have them watched me doing the same in other occasions.

You see, the women I hang around tend to have a mouth which they use to utter words such as “Please help me with this” if they actually need help.

Also, on most, if not all, private events I attended, it’s usually the host that starts cleaning up and usually the host (regardless of sex) uses the mouth to explicitly mention words such as “I’ll take care of this.”

As far as I’m concerned, if my assistance isn’t being required, then I’ll assume that my assistance isn’t needed until proven otherwise by circumstances. And I apply this to everything – not just trivial stuff such as these.

With an unlocked car, no.

On the other hand… with a wallet? Are you kidding me? Most men are compared with a wallet (or an ATM machine) at least once in their lifetimes, usually by women but sometimes by men as well.

Men are human doings and, at least for the time being (and by that I mean at least until the end of this century), the value of a man will be, at some point, judged by the thickness of his wallet.

My doctor also once compared my body with an overused steam locomotive in trying to tell me that I work too much. But instead of going #fullMcIntosh at him and cry oppreshun, I actually listened to the argument behind the unfortunate metaphor – and he had a point. I was in fact working too much.

In other words, I did exactly what feminists refuse to do when such metaphors are used – and that is to actually look at core of the argument, not just its shape

Anyway, I've mansplained enough for today. I hope I'll come back to read your answers to these questions so that the Fembot Collective will have something to archive.

Cheers!

Page 3 and objectification

Men's Human Rights Ireland · 11 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The announcement that the Sun newspaper was going to drop its topless Page 3 girls had the usual suspects all in a tizzy.

Long a target for feminist ire, the once-symbol of the sexual liberation of the 60s and 70s when women were burning their bras has become, for some, a symbol of the oppression of women by men.

Comparisons are convolutedly made to Muslim women who insist on covering their faces with the niqab, and slogans such as “Je suis page 3” are touted with typical taste and tact. Eloquent odes to verbosity richly marbled with pithy quotes from feminist pugilists are penned and published condemning such anachronistic sleaze.

Dressing up in a way that men might find appealing makes women look inferior and submissive to men, comes the refrain, all you ladies throwing on the glad rags and tottering off to Coppers for a few scoops take note, tut tut.

So when word was spread that this iconic relic of masculine power was being dropped, bottles of Beaumont des Crayeres Grande were popped, glasses were raised, and toasts were made to the inevitable collapse of the ever looming patriarchy.

Protestors at the “No More Page 3” campaign headed by Lucy Ann Holmes were delighted that their online petition had swayed the likes of media tycoon Rupert Murdoch, a heady rush and a solid result for such strenuous efforts.

Across the water The Guardian joined in the celebrations, calling it a “landmark decision”.

Susan McKay in the Irish Times trilled that it was a “sweet victory” for feminists, gleefully asking us “why stop at page 3?” and hinting heavily that such provocative displays were at least partially responsible for inciting men to rape, presumably in much the same way that violent video games are responsible for the wave of street battles and drive by shootings gripping our nation at the moment.

Except of course no such thing is happening.

And neither, as it turned out, was the Sun cancelling its venerable Page 3 tradition. As Dylan Sharpe, the public relations head for the tabloid tweeted shortly after the reports of Page 3’s demise had finished their feverish circulation,

> I said that it was speculation and not to trust reports by people unconnected to The Sun. A lot of people are about to look very silly…

It seems likely that he's got a stellar career ahead in PR! Yes, the whole thing was a marketing stunt designed to boost sales of the newspaper, and it worked just as it was intended to. Those who wanted to do away with Page 3 ended up promoting it.

Disappointment was palpable amongst the self appointed defenders of womens' dignity, with Suzanne Harrington of the Irish Examiner writing a bizarre and somewhat convoluted piece which included such sentiments as:

> This particular fat, ugly, joyless, jealous, feminist fanatic is lost for words. Nice one, sister.

But really, when we get down to it, what is sexual objectification and why is it such a big deal for feminists? After all shouldn't they be in favour of women being allowed to do what they like with their own bodies?

Sexual objectification as it is most commonly used means treating someone as if they are a thing, the subject-object dichotomy where a subject acts, and an object is acted upon. Thus, goes the theory, by objectifying women men remove their ability to act and hence their power.

It means essentially that regardless of how the person is viewed aesthetically or sexually, they are treated or thought of with a similar amount of respect and regard as one would treat a thing or object.

The feminist philosopher Martha Nussbaum states that a person might be objectified if they're treated like they have one or a selection of the following properties:

- Instrumentality – as if a tool for another's purposes
- Denial of Autonomy – as if lacking in agency or self-determination
- Inertness – as if without action
- Fungibility – as if interchangeable
- Violability – as if permissible to damage or destroy
- Ownership – as if owned by another
- Denial of Subjectivity – as if there is no need for concern for their feelings and experiences

Now, it hardly seems credible that the treatment of a nude model falls under any different a selection of those conditions with any more severity than any waiter, pizza delivery person, or supermarket cashier.

Surely a photoshoot in Playboy treats its subject with no less concern for her feelings, as if she is no more or less interchangeable, as no more a tool, as no more inert or owned, and certainly no more permissible to harm, than a hotel treats its staff.

In fact, it seems likely that a model is seen as being considerably less interchangeable, owned, inert, and lacking agency. If dining in a restaurant, do we pay much attention to the waitresses' thoughts, experiences, concerns, or emotions any more or less than those of a pole dancer's in a strip club?

The manager of a supermarket would no more wonder about a cashier's political persuasions than the owner of a soft porn magazine would about one of its models. We objectify others all the time, because it is simply not possible to deeply care and thoughtfully consider each and every person who provides a service for us or works for us.

This is certainly not problematic, but simply natural. Objectification is not a problem. It is a healthy way which we deal with everyday life.

So what's the difference here? Why is the objectification of models or strippers so often highlighted, but not the objectification of pizza delivery boys or waitresses? Why does it seem to be the "sexual" aspect that is so problematic?

An argument which regularly makes an appearance relates to the idea that sexual objectification portrays women as aesthetically akin to objects, implying that when you look at someone and only focus on their sexuality you are viewing them as an object or thing. It implies that a sexualised image of a woman, in say, Playboy, shows the woman as an object.

However when you look at a person sexually and only sexually, you may have a very impersonal relationship with them, but you are not sexually viewing them as an object, as “objects” are intrinsically not sexual (an argument that individualist feminist Wendy McElroy makes). People are not typically sexually aroused by cabbages or chairs.

Even if an actual object is to be made to appear sexual (such as sex dolls), it has to be given the resemblance of a human in order for it to be sexually attractive. Or, in other words, for an “object” to be viewed as sexually attractive, it has to be designed so that it no longer appears to be an object.

Therefore, the property of something being or appearing to be an object makes it intrinsically not sexually appealing, so to say that when someone is being displayed solely for their sexual appeal, this portrayal makes them seem like an “object” is simply fallacious, as “objectuality” is the antithesis of sexuality.

Sexual objectification may be very impersonal, but it does not make sense for it to literally mean the portrayal of women as objects.

This may seem as though it’s simply a question of linguistic semantics, but that’s not the case. When discussing subjective opinions it’s absolutely necessary that the words or terms you use have a definite, clear, concrete meaning, especially a term such as “sex object” which has such currency in society today.

If a term is both nebulous and emphatic, then it is hyperbole. If it is used as axiomatically and prolifically as “sex object”, then it enters the realm of being propaganda.

Then there’s the oft repeated notion that porn, erotic images, glamour photos, or stripping are correlated with rape.

Where is the evidence for this? And if people believe “sexual objectification” causes rape, does that mean they believe that sex workers and lap dancers cause rape because their work involves being “sexually objectified”? Do girls who post nude pictures of themselves online cause rape? Can erotic fiction cause rape? Do models cause rape? Perhaps girls in short skirts and crop tops cause rape?

This all sounds rather akin to victim blaming and slut-shaming, not to mention puritanical and controlling. Maybe we should police and regulate women to ensure they do not cause themselves to be raped! Aren’t rapists the only ones at fault? Shouldn’t women be able to live in a world where they can choose to do what they want with their bodies without fear of being blamed for causing sexual abuse?

People should not incur blame for actions that others independently commit unless they intentionally tried to incite them. Such an idea undermines the very foundations of justice.

Salman Rushdie should not have received blame for the violence in Pakistan that ensued after the release of The Satanic Verses. Christopher Nolan shouldn’t be blamed because some maniac watched The Dark Knight and shot people. And a stripper should not bear the blame for sexual assault.

But let’s say for the sake of argument that sexual objectification is a real and negative thing, as resident Irish Times feminist Una Mullally firmly believes.

Why wouldn’t it affect men too?

At the end of the day, men shouldn't feel ashamed, afraid or guilty for admiring the female figure, and neither should women feel bad about admiring the male form. It doesn't hurt anyone except people looking for an excuse to be hurt.

[Ed. note: This post originally appeared here and is reprinted with permission. MHRI wishes to thank the co-author of this article, prominent blogger Red Blooded Liberalism for their excellent analysis of objectification.]

The Enliven Project and the manipulation of rape statistics

AVfM Video Source · 12 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Josh O'Brien eviscerates yet another series of bogus rape statistics. We love this guy.

Save Carnell Alexander!

AVfM Video Source · 12 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The Straight Shooter is trying to help a Detroit man, whose story we also covered previously in our Hotlinks section.

http://youtu.be/WZW2SJ8xBfU

We threw in some funds. If you're so inclined, we encourage you to do so as well.

Crashing the gates: the Non-Feminist invasion of Feminist mindspace

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 12 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is also available in Romanian.

At the heart of the non-feminist revolution lies the project to take back control of the cultural narrative from feminism. We call this project the battle for feminism's soul.

To take control of the narrative means, among other things, to shove a completely new conceptual reality into the feminist mindspace with no prior explanation or preparation. For them, it would be like walking into a movie halfway through — although that comparison hardly does justice to the radical nature of what we are proposing.

The point is, that they have had more than enough time to tell the rest of the world what "reality" is. The time has come for them to shut up and experience life on the receiving end. It is now their turn to wonder what in heaven's name is going on, and be impolitely told to "get with the program."

The treatment that we would dish out differs little from how they have treated the rest of the world for half a century. Henceforth, every settled notion of theirs will be jostled in the common marketplace of ideas like it was just any old thing. They will be critiqued, problematized, made light of, or best of all ignored when they try to express themselves. No more epistemic privilege of any kind, and no more pampering of their aesthetic sensibilities or lexical conventions. Thuswise they shall fare. They will lick it up, and they will like it.

We advocate this as a policy, consistent with the doctrine of post-argumentalism. Post-argumentalism proposes that argument or debate has no primacy among the methods we might use to move our project forward. Post-argumentalism further proposes that argument or debate, although useful in combination with other methods, is by no means imperative to the realization of our ends.

For in the end, we are not obligated to argue with a bully, a tyrant, or a lunatic. We do not delude ourselves that if we craft our words well enough the bully, tyrant or lunatic will suddenly understand us, admit that we are right, and begin to act differently. That realization is a truth which sets us free. So we are free to block their power unceremoniously, by walking away from argument altogether and moving ahead with our plans.

Those who specialize in argument, debate or explanation are certainly free to set up shop doing what they do best, according to their several areas of expertise. It is not good to waste any natural talent you might possess. But we have understood that argument or debate are not the main engine that will press matters forward. Recruitment, networking and mobilization will do that, independently of whether our enemy is persuaded or unpersuaded.

Very well. We have drawn our conclusions, and we claim the right to state them freely and to assume that others are up to speed about what we are saying. We cannot be bothered to attach a full explanatory essay to every word or concept, every time we use it, in our spoken or written communication. So in true post-argumental fashion, we do not argue the merit of our discourse by explaining it.

We must assume that our foundational ideas have been sufficiently established by an accumulated history of explanation, and that adversaries will make some effort to learn the basics before they converse with us. We must assume that the laborious work of establishing our ground of meaning has been concluded, and that we may now discourse with that agreeable speed which is properly the life of conversation.

So any feminist on earth must either sink or swim in the ocean of ideas that we will generate. If we graciously stop to explain, it is more than our duty requires, and gratitude is in order. But we won't slow down for them, and we will unleash a torrent of new jargons, new concepts and new frames of reference that will leave them mentally adrift and bewildered, as if the ground had been ripped from under their feet without warning and they were suddenly bobbing in zero gravity with no idea of up or down any more.

No doubt they will find this disturbing, and will experience something like culture shock when they realize that their reactions are not automatically shared, and that people not only don't know what the hell they are talking about, but are rudely telling them so!

Such is the non-feminist invasion of feminist mindspace.

Feminist ideology has been broken to the ranks, and must share the stage with everybody else. Nothing about the customary feminist discourse will be shown any deference, any leniency or any right of way through any discussion whatsoever. Feminism does not "own the conversation," and accordingly does not set the rules for any conversation where non-feminist participants are present.

Granted, where none but feminists are present it may be said that they are "in the feminist clubhouse," and may order the conversation as they see fit. But in the forum of humanity, it behooves them to embrace a more cosmopolitan outlook and "do as the Romans do."

More and more, feminism's realm of thought and discourse will implode, and it will be as if the floodwaters were breaking through the barriers from every direction, sweeping away every vestige of narrative privilege they have ever enjoyed and placing them on a footing of conversational "equality" with any male rights agitator, or any non-feminist Joe and Sally, they happen to encounter.

They can barricade themselves in the towers of academia for a while, but in the end the towers too will crumble and be swept away, and they will have no choice but walk through the world to the beat of a timeless drummer whom they can no longer ignore. Either that, or go crazy and do something stupid.

So . . I would prepare for that day, if I were them.

I really would do that. . . . if I were them.

Pushing Feminista Jones' buttons: A book review

Mumia Ali · 12 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Feminista Jones has written a new book, a piece of erotica called "Push The Button."

> "It is better to be audacious than cautious, because fortune is a woman, and if you wish to keep her under it is necessary to beat and ill-use her; and it is seen that she allows herself to be mastered by the adventurous rather than by those who go to work more coldly."
> –Niccolo Machiavelli, The Prince
>
> "Rommel, you magnificent bastard! I read your book!"
> –General George S. Patton, Jr.

Readers of yours truly's adventures will remember well my first encounter with one Ms. Feminista Jones, the NYC-based (and Philly-educated) Amazonian "sex-positive" Sista-feminist who was behind last summer's #YouOKSis Twitter campaign. Toward the end of my recounting of me and Ms. Jones' tête-à-tête, I made specific mention that I would be keeping an eye on her, as I felt that she would be someone to watch in the new year ahead.

Imagine then, my delight in getting wind of the announcement of her first foray into erotica, with "Push the Button" a little while back – and just in time for the big rollout of the film adaptation of the runaway bestseller "Fifty Shades of Grey" no less! I've been keeping mum on the whole thing until I could obtain a hard (ahem) copy of her book, and now that I've read it, your correspondent has the following book report:

Festooned in purple, the volume lives up to the hype in its equally purple prose of the sort that is par for the course in breathy fare.

Part instructional on the BDSM lifestyle and part romance novel, "Push the Button" centers on the life and love of Nicole/"Star" the pretty sub (who just happens to "top from the bottom," don't you know), and David, her Alpha Male Dom (who gets initiated into "the life" by Nicole – heh), and how Bougie Black folks "in the life" really do it – and contains all of the usual conceits of the genre: young, conventionally attractive, urban (read: Black) professionals (note the utter lack of everyday Black folk that is the reality of Black American existence), who squeeze in torrid, kinky sex/love scenes in between taking over the world, and whose otherwise idyllic existence is threatened by an outside force, of course, in the form of another hot guy from the female protagonist's past ("Marcus", the 6'5″, ripped and chiseled, Richard Sherman doppleganger – riiight – that she just so happens to conveniently leave out with regard to her current D/s thang with Dave), and where she is now caught up in a love triangle for the ages. After all, what woman doesn't fantasize about two hot guys playing out a game of "let's you and him fight" right? The climactic "mini-brawl" between Dave and Macus that winds up with Nicole/Star being in hospital drives home the point and adds spice to the story.

Oh, drama.

It's easy and tempting to accuse "Push The Button" of being a Negro knockoff of the aforementioned Fifty Shades of Grey – after all, the timing of both does raise an eyebrow – but like I said, that's too easy a leap to make. I for one don't think this was an attempt on Ms. Jones' part to capitalize on a clear and present trend in erotica these days, but rather, an attempt to deal with some of her own very deep and very personal stuff along these lines. In her guise as an advocate for women, Black ones in particular, and their right to explore their sexuality sans recriminations, largely from Black men, I for one think she makes a point, albeit a florid one. I think she would be better served in merely presenting her side of the story, and leave all the hyperbolic squawking out of it.

As for the book itself, it reads easily enough – Ms. Jones is an able, though not terribly inventive writer; indeed, the whole exercise comes off as a mashup between Barbara Cartland, Pauline Reage and Teri Woods – and at 124 pages in deadwood format, is hardly of the stock Sidney Sheldon thumb-turners are renowned for.

Feminista's huge selling point of the book is that it is a look into "the lifestyle" of and for Black folks – a notion that even Black women themselves find a bit old hat, if not downright passe'. After all, their underwhelmed reaction to "Fifty Shades" was more than just a supposed disappointment at the lack of racial or ethnic diversity or relevance; I've personally had quite a few Sistas tell me that there was nothing "shocking" or scandalous in the least about the kink on display between its pages, race matters aside – and, not to kiss and tell, but let's just say that if yours truly's experiences out on the bricks are anything to go by, they ain't saying nothin' but a word. Black women do not lack for anything in the freaky department – a fact that all manner of evidence, from the empirical to the anecdotal to the freely admitted on their own part, backs that thing up.

So, the idea that Ms. Jones is somehow pulling back the covers on an aspect or element of the sexual lives of the Black and uppity that can only be whispered when one is sure of their company, borders on the silly, in a time when a pop queen like Rihanna can literally sell millions of records drenched in BDSM imagery, and when, a generation earlier, one of LL Cool J's biggest hits openly discusses how his lover likes him to, and I quote:

> "I'm gonna call you Big Daddy and scream your name > Matter fact I can't wait for your candy rain"

And

> "Mmm… daddy slow down your flow
> Put it on me like G baby nice and slow
> I need a rough neck nigga Mandingo in a sec
> Who ain't afraid to pull my hair and spank me from the back"

Ahem.

Nor is this a "recent" development in Black American society; one of its most storied and legendary troubadours, the great Marvin Gaye, clearly had a taste for the kink. His stormy relationship with his two wives, the much older Anna Gordy Gaye, sister to Motown founding father Berry Gordy, and his much younger muse, Janis Hunter Gaye, is quite rich in this regard, and is overwhelmingly well documented. As Michael Eric Dyson makes clear in his own good read, "Mercy, Mercy Me: The Art, Loves & Demons of Marvin Gaye," Marvin was very much the masochist, who both lived and sang about his kink throughout his long career. There are many more examples, both in and outside of the Motown canon (to wit: Prince. Do you honestly think he don't get down like that? "Star" certainly does – she's got him bumping in the ride on the way to see "Sir").

Indeed, for the mass public at this point, large swaths of the BDSM lifestyle/orientation/identity have very much become a part of the mainstream, evidenced by the pop culture works of Madonna, Lady Gaga, the "Matrix" and "Hellraiser" series of films and the independent James Spader/Maggie Gyllenhaal sleeper hit "Secretary," just to name a paltry few. Today, it ain't nothing to see ladies out and about wearing various iterations of collars and corsets, latex and leather; other staples of BDSM-inspired clothing, for men and women alike, are quite common; terms like "fetish wear" are household words; and the kinds of accoutrements that accompany the lifestyle, like crops, whips and certain kinds of bespoke furniture that used to be obtained only via mail order on the quiet, are now easily and openly purchased in sex shops that dot popular thoroughfares like Philly's South St.

Putting this together with the fact that what we know today as BDSM has existed in one form or another throughout the world's cultures and has been documented by among others the Greeks, Romans and of course, ancient Indians in the immortal classic the Kama Sutra, and it's a real head-scratcher to see what's got Feminista all hot and bothered about.

I guess that brings us to what's eating me about Ms. Jones' tale (pardon the pun) – it ain't that I'm a stick in the mud here. Indeed, one of my favorite pastimes is reading erotica, for a whole host of reasons, among them knowing and understanding how the female mating mind works and why – nor am I pooh-poohing what anyone with one good eye can see is a burgeoning business aimed at (Black) ladies fiendin' for their daily erotic fix for some tawdry fiction.

But, what gets to me is this sense among "enlightened" Black folk, who dabble and peddle in stuff that is largely off the mark for the vast majority of Black folks on matters where it matters. As I said to Feminista during our first encounter, Black folk don't need "help" in learning 1,001 extra ways they can do the Rumpy Bumpy – indeed, if anything, it can be argued that a goodly deal of our problems come directly from our overdoing it in this area, as "Push the Button" itself aptly demonstrates – but rather, they desperately need actionable, reasoned and most of all evidence-based, information and insight into how to get along outside the bedroom or wherever else the action is taking place.

Indeed, this was the focus of another Sista a quarter of a century ago, when Ms. Jones wasn't even a teenager: one Ms. Shahrazad Ali. Her book, "The Blackman's Guide to Understanding the Blackwoman" created a huge firestorm of interest and controversy, at a time when social media, Amazon or the Internet for that matter, didn't even exist. Sister Ali can be rightly credited for having a marked impact on the Black book business – a legacy that Feminista builds on, whether she likes, believes, or even knows it or not.

In marked contrast to Ms. Jones, Sis. Ali really did break new ground, by discussing topics and issues never before written about in print, and openly discussed from the dais – the inner workings and overall state of relationships between Black men and Black women in contemporary America – one that brings a critical lens to the actions, behaviors, psychology and role that Black women themselves play in the grand drama. To be sure, the detractors and out-and-out haters came out in full force and took their digs; but 25 years on, Ali's book has not only stood the test of time, it has been uncannily prescient in its description of the factors and forces that continue to be at work in the active undermining of Black America itself. Even more to the point, there has been no book written by a Black woman, that superceedes, or even matches, Sister Ali's pathfinding work – both a gift for her, and a curse for the rest of us.

At this juncture it is easy to simply write my missive off here as taking yet another dig at the lady, but nothing could be further from the truth – I did buy the book, after all (the O-Man will always, whenever possible, supports Black business).

In point of fact, I actually think that this is a very positive turn of events for Ms. Jones. Clearly, this is where her strength lies – in the world of make believe, fantasy and what "ought to be" – not the world as it is – and as such, I applaud her entry into the romance/erotica genre. Given her rather tepid grasp of hard-headed, clear-eyed observational truths and empirical evidence come what may, this is definitely her lane. And if she puts out another hot-n-heavy tome (word on the wires is that there is a "PTB 2" in the works), I'll be the first one to buy it!

In my parting shot the last time around, I suggested that chess wasn't Feminista's game, and that she would do well to consider another more suited to her talents and abilities. I'm very pleased to see that with "Push the Button," she has taken my advice.

Further suggested kinky reading: "The BDSM Origins Of "Yes Means Yes"

Elevatorgate and its children

Andrew DiKaiomata · 12 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

We are noticing a bit of a pattern. Moments in time that allow people to break free from feminist thinking and dogma often have the word "Gate" at the end. ElevatorGate, ShirtGate, and now GamerGate. ElevatorGate was a red pill moment for a good number of people, including myself. Previously loyal, unquestioning feminists, many women and men were jarred for the first time by the bizarre feminist attitudes, reactions and double standards against men. This was the feminist crisis known as ElevatorGate; a man allegedly asked a woman out for coffee on an elevator, she declined and they parted. As Richard Dawkins, a leading biologist and prominent skeptic/atheist later sarcastically commented "A man in a hotel elevator invited her back to his room for coffee. I am not exaggerating. He really did. He invited her back to his room for coffee. Of course she said no, and of course he didn't lay a finger on her, but even so . . . "

Feminists were thrown into a fury. To them, this was proof of a rape culture against women, misogyny "writ large", male entitlement and of course "the patriarchy."

For rationalist, skeptical people like myself, it would seem the only thing he did wrong was his being male. Certainly, if he was female in this situation, it would hardly be worth mentioning. When anyone questioned the feminist narrative, explanation or reaction, they were immediately met with accusations of "misogyny," that is, hating every single woman on the planet. The feminist reaction to the slightest deviation grew stranger yet. To them, it meant you supported rape, you didn't think women were people, and were always accused of opposing equality.

To add another dimension to this bizarre story, the central story likely did not even happen. When the woman who came forward with her elevator story was asked who it was that asked her out for coffee, she claimed to have "prosopagnosia," a condition where the sufferer is unable to recognize faces, neither familiar nor unfamiliar. Where earlier that day she recognized people from across the convention hall, pointing people out of the crowd to thank them, she puzzlingly has prosopagnosia, face blindness?

Skeptics have a tool for just this problem, Occam's razor. Oversimplified, it's this: If a proposition or explanation seems overly complicated in relation to what's being proposed or explained and doesn't make sense where it should, it's not likely true.

This is the first concrete departure of feminism from rationalism. In rationalism, the burden of proof is always, always, always on the claimant. Always. If you claim to know something, you must demonstrate it. As I've learned is common in feminism, the burden of proof is always on the man or, failing that, the person skeptical of a feminist claim. What's more, if we fail to put the burden of proof on the man or skeptic, a vitriolic, frothing torrent of hate is poured out on us. Feminism truly is, "Where logic and objective discussion dare not show it's face."

From this "crisis," the skeptical/rationalist community largely split into three groups. The largest, the indifferent group, like the popular James Randi Educational Foundation, didn't react much to ElevatorGate. The next biggest was "Atheism+" (and their allied groups) which was subject to a long list of further crises which will not be explored here. They also eventually ashewed skepticism and rationalism and later even abandoned atheism for the most part, becoming a hub for radical feminists. Being subjected to a long series of self-inflicted crises and embarrassments, they are now a dwindling force. Far and away, the smallest group were those who remained strongly skeptical. Thunderf00t, a prominent PH.D'ed astronomer and anti-creationist became the best-known of the anti-feminist skeptics.

After trying to reach out to skeptics, atheists and rationalists after ElevatorGate, I've learned there are definitely those feminists in the rationalist groups who refuse to subject feminism to critical examination. There is virtually no use in arguing with a feminist. Their emotion is so powerful, logic dare not tread. Terms are constantly being redefined to suit their assertions, goal posts moved, ad hoc and circular reasoning abounds. Presupposition, special pleading and ad hominems dominate. It is up to feminism to show the irrationality of feminism, not the MRM or feminist critics in general. Certainly, before ElevatorGate, I would have said the Men's Rights Movement's characterization of feminism was simply a caricature. I would have said it was a straw man being set up. You often need to feel feminist irrationality at full blast before you're willing to believe it's there at all.

With further movements developing where feminists cause self-inflicted wounds among communities that did them no wrong, one has to wonder: what's next?

The nerve of some people! Teach men not to kill!

AVfM Video Source · 13 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

SkepTorr kills it as usual.

What more can we say?

The Protocols of the Elders of the Patriarchy

Andrew DiKaiomata · 13 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

"They" control all the wars, the media, the banking system. "They" don't want you to know that they, through their web of power, pull all the strings. From the highest positions of power, through global domination, nothing goes on without their permission. You already know who I'm talking about, don't you? Our oppressors!

Men!

Don't call me crazy, that's just what they want you to do, that's how they oppress us!

Sounds familiar, doesn't it? The Protocols of the Learned Elders of Zion is an anti-Semitic conspiracy theory, debunked a million times over that conspiracy wing-nuts keep rehashing. Similarly, "The Patriarchy" is an anti-male conspiracy. Likewise a million times debunked, that conspiracy wing-nuts also keep rehashing. Replace what you may have heard from a conspiracy theorist and substitute, Illuminati, Reptilians or Zionist for Men and bingo, you're a feminist.

If you've ever met a die-hard conspiracy theorist, you may have thought that pointing out a few things that would debunk the theory might disabuse them of their paranoia. Yet, reason is rebuffed in favor of ad hoc explanations. This is because the conspiracy theorist sees through tunnel vision, cherry picks supporting data and discards what doesn't fit their conspiracy. It does no good to argue with them. You'll feel like wanting to bang your head against the wall, or worse, they'll point their finger at you and start weaving you into their delusion.

For example, a person who believes "The Patriarchy" is patriarching them in their brain, might point to the fact that women are raped as proof of "The Patriarchy." If you point out that men are raped much more often than women; more often molested as children, raped in prison, and countless males mutilated within days of being born, that's slides right off their back. They already have a male rape apologetic ready to go for rape "against you people." You see, they start weaving you into their delusion. "You people had it coming" because Patriarchy.

Patriarchy means there is always a man to blame. We draft our men by the millions to be slaves of war and die torturous deaths? "But that's men fighting other men!" We might be quick to point out that they had no choice but to fight. "Yeah, but it's men that sent them!" The anti-male conspiracy theorist often has the gendercide apologetics well rehearsed. We see that at every level, every atrocity that we see: Because of Patriarchy, there is always a man to blame, and that justifies the hatred of men and indifference to their suffering.

Let's imagine this, just for our own illustrations. A conspiracy theorist would go into a psychotic break if you explained it this way, but just for a moment imagine some women mud wrestling. Now, this isn't the best example, because they aren't forced under law to mud wrestle, but it is women against women. Would the anti-male conspiracy theorist be okay with this being explained by "But it's women against women!"

Of course not, because Patriarchy! There's always a man to blame. Someone, some man is making money off of it. Oh, the money goes only to the mud wrestlers? "Well, they are wrestling for the men!" Just like the men dying in war are motivated to die for the women? To the anti-male conspiracy theorist, just keep going up a level until you find a man to blame.

Men constitute the majority of victims of almost all social ills; rape, murder, genital mutilation, sexual torture, suicide, assault, workplace deaths, drug abuse, depression.. That's by no means exhaustive. All an anti-male bigot has to say is "Patriarchy" and then these transform from social ills to just desserts.

I would be remiss if I didn't touch on a funny side to the anti-male conspiracy theories: The odd remedies to thwart or "Smash the Patriarchy." The problem of "The Patriarchy" is simple: there's a worldwide conspiracy of men to blame for everything. The solution is where the clearest insanity is brought out. The deluded solutions include dressing up as vaginas, smearing period blood all over their faces, shouting down church services with topless protests, and how can we forget hashtag activism like #KillAllMen.

We really can't reach the conspiracy theorists already swallowed up by hateful anti-male bigotry. Though we can help change the culture of hate and indifference towards men. Instead of a blame-a-man attitude, we can point out when a man needs help and help him when no one else will. Men matter, men's lives matter, their rights matter. We can remind people that men are good, men are human beings with feelings, rights and their own struggles, with issues that matter.

We got your Valentine's book right here: Say Goodbye to Crazy

Paul Elam and Dr. Tara Palmatier · 14 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Happy Valentine's Day everyone! But hey, we gotta ask, have you ever had that Valentine who just comes up short of knowing that her place in your life was supposed to end with a breakup or divorce?

Sound like a dumb question? Yeah, yeah, we get you.

So, it seems pretty darn good timing to give you a sneak peek at our new book about dealing with that heart-shaped box of chocolate covered nuts in your life. We just released "Say Goodbye to Crazy" on amazon.com for pre-order. It has just been up on the amazon site a short time. So soon, in fact, that the book Intro and About pages are not available yet for viewing. We thought it was a good idea to go ahead and give that to you here.

The full version will be available on Mother's Day, May 10. This is all never before seen material from Paul and Tara. Those of you who get the term "golden uterus" will fully get the irony of a Mother's Day release.

Here are the Intro and About pages for the book. We hope you enjoy. And if you want to pre-order, please click on the cover image embedded below.

Say Goodbye to Crazy

How to Rid Yourself of that Crazy Ex and Restore Sanity to Your Life

Paul Elam & Dr.Tara Palmatier

Copyright © 2015 by Zeta Press

Introduction

Meet Crazy

Who is Crazy? If you plunked down your hard earned money to buy this book, you are probably already well-acquainted with Crazy. In fact, you are likely more acquainted with Crazy than you ever wanted to be.

In case there's any doubt, Crazy is an ex who is unwilling or incapable of letting go of his or her former partner, and does his or her level best to continue to control and interfere in their former partner's life. Crazy comes in both sexes, male and female, but we have decided to focus on the female version of Crazy. For many reasons, our culture and the mental health field does a poor job of addressing the problem of female Crazy, but we'll address that later.

If your husband was once married to, involved with, or had children with Crazy, there are probably times when it seems like she is committed to making his life, and by extension your life, a living hell. Crazy demeaned, exploited and abused your husband while they were together and she continues to harass him through their shared children and Family Court since their divorce.

Crazy is often very entitled. She acts as if she is owed the sun and the moon and everything in between just because she was once married to and bred with your husband. When trying to describe Crazy and her antics to your family, friends, attorney or therapist, you probably find yourself using words and phrases like controlling, bully, entitled, self-obsessed, hypocrite, liar, hateful, terrorist, vampire, bitch, Jekyll and Hyde, psycho bitch from hell, personality disordered, stalker, whack-job and, well, crazy.

Crazy may have taught your husband's children to hate and mistrust him or to see him as a disposable wallet and doormat. She trash talks about you to their kids, his family, mutual friends and anyone else who will listen. She may even encourage your step-children to be disrespectful to you and to resent your very presence in their father's life and their lives. If your husband has failed to set healthy boundaries with Crazy, you are probably frustrated by having to deal with his Daddy Guilt for "abandoning" his family, even if Crazy was the one who divorced him.

At one time or another, you have likely sought either individual or couples counseling due to Crazy's behavior, its impact on you and your family, and possibly your husband's inability to set limits with Crazy. Therapists, clergy or friends who you have turned to for support may have told you that you need to respect Crazy as the mother of their children, that you need to be patient and tolerant of Crazy's ongoing abuse for the sake of the children or that you should have known what you were getting into marrying a man with kids.

We are not going to tell you that.

In fact, we are going to tell you the opposite.

Crazy is a pandemic and there are men and women living similar lives of quiet desperation just like you and your husband. Indeed, if you are reading this, it is very likely that a great deal of your time has already been wasted, consumed by chaos and disharmony brought about by Crazy.

You have found out the hard way that your husband's previous struggles, the ones that should have ended with his divorce, have followed him directly into his relationship with you and are causing turmoil for both of you. If there are children involved, that misery only multiplies.

You are likely to be suffering the effects of all this financially, as well as emotionally and psychologically. Crazy, who was irrational and abusive when they were together, has continued her antics long after their relationship "ended," and now you, and possibly your children, have become the targets of her maliciousness.

You may have also learned the hard way that the family courts are her best friend, enabling her to manipulate and use children like pawns, constantly go after his income, disrupt your plans, and otherwise undermine your lives together.

Your life has become as crazy as that crazy woman is. It has become difficult and sometimes impossible for you to do something as simple as having a family holiday without her finding ways to interfere and sabotage. Often, her avenue of choice to do that is the kids. She will interfere with their visitation at the last minute, or create a crisis that you must respond to at the most critical and inconvenient of times. She has elevated troublemaking to an art form, and your home life has become her canvas.

She will demonize you to his children, encouraging them to disrespect you — to see you as the evil stepmother. She will tell them she cannot provide the things they want because their father is spending all his money on you or on your children. She may even tell them that if it were not for you that she and their father would be reconciled and be one "happy" family again.

She will also encourage the kids to disrespect him, to see him as the loser she thinks he is. Crazy will alienate the children from their father, withhold them from visitation and encourage them to blame him for their broken family. The heartbreaking results of that kind of abuse spill out onto everyone involved.

If most or all of this applies to your life, you are part of a large and growing community of women whose relationships have become the second battleground for his failed relationship with Crazy. It is not what you bargained for in the beginning, but nonetheless it is what you are getting, and you are more than sick of it.

If you are reading this book, you are probably also frustrated with him because he seems either unable or unwilling to do anything about it. You want him to fight to protect you, and your relationship, but it just isn't happening. In response to the ongoing abuse, many men learn to shut down and shut it out. Of course, they are really just hiding from the conflict in the only way they know how, by withdrawing. That does nothing to solve the problem. His approach to dealing with Crazy didn't work in their marriage and it is failing again.

You love him, but you have sometimes wondered just how much of this you can take and hold onto your sanity. You may even have considered leaving.

If this is describing your life, the last thing you need is to spend your time looking for answers in a book that does not have them. It's time for real answers and time to take real world action.

This book does have answers. Not all of them are pretty. In fact, most of them aren't. But they are real answers to your very real problems. We are betting that by now that you are more interested in solutions, in things that work, rather than comfortable pop psychology and socially acceptable platitudes that have not worked. Some of the answers will seem downright unpalatable and harsh. We know that. As we will get into later in the book, there is no way to work cooperatively with Crazy. Understanding that, our goal is to give you a roadmap to escape the insanity and protect you and your family from it going forward. We want you to live the life you deserve. When you have to go through Crazy to get it, the methods to do so can be very hard.

As you read through the table of contents, you will see the list of chapters and topics covered in this book, so there is no need to address that here. Instead let's take a look at what you will not see.

What you will not see is psychobabble or "self-help" talk. Let us be clear about that from the beginning. You don't need to hear it because you are not the one that is crazy. She is. We are not here to help her. We're here for you.

What you will also not get is any advice or suggestions on how to reason with her, change her behavior, make her see the error of her ways or become a better person. In this book, we do not reason or compromise with Crazy, we help you to learn to spot it and get rid of it — by whatever means necessary short of a shovel and a roll of duct tape.

We will not encourage you to give her your compassion. If you are dealing with Crazy, compassion is pointless. Any sympathy or understanding you extend will only bring you more difficulty, but you probably already know this.

We will also not be holding Crazy's status as the mother of your husband's children in reverence. Crazy is the kind of mother who eats her young – emotionally and, in extreme cases, mortally.

We will not tell you that you need to play handmaiden to your step-children or understand how "traumatized" they've been by their parents' divorce and subsequent re-coupling. It is the parents' responsibility to facilitate their children's emotional adjustment and maintain acceptable behavior before, during and after the divorce. Furthermore, it is far more likely that her continued high-conflict behavior is what has been most damaging to the children.

We will not tell you to ignore Crazy's alienation attempts and ignore the lies, half-truths and distortions she feeds the children in the hopes that "someday" they will see the truth. Not only can you set the record straight and still take the high road, it is imperative to the children's well-being and development that you tell them the truth.

We will not tell you, "You knew what you were getting into when you married a divorced man with kids," and that you need to "suck it up and deal." No one should have to live in siege-like conditions because Crazy believes she owns her ex for life and has decided to make him pay. You married the person you love and your relationship does not stand a fighting chance unless you deal with the diarrhea-prone elephant in the living room, i.e., Crazy.

Chances are you have tried a very wide range of things in your attempts to make the situation more manageable. You have tried to be accommodating, understanding and gracious. On the other end, you may have become so frustrated that you have become hostile and/or reactionary. Neither extreme has worked for you.

Nothing has worked. And that is the problem.

With this type of person nothing ever works. This is so important that we need to repeat it: Nothing ever works. The only sane option at your disposal is to get her out of your lives as much as possible. The only thing that works with Crazy is to say goodbye to her once and for all, making sure you don't look back, not even for a second.

We understand that shutting her out completely can be difficult, especially when there are children involved. Difficult, yes, but difficult does not mean it is impossible. It is possible, if you are willing to hold your ground, with her, and with him.

Much of your ability to say goodbye to Crazy hinges on your willingness to do it, and to do it without compromise. This book will not only give you a way to solve many of the problems associated with Crazy, but will also help you cultivate the resolve to get the job done. We will show you ways to help him become your partner in making it happen.

What you will find is that the information contained here will do a lot more than just help you rid your life of a crazy ex. It will help you in a lot of other ways as well. Crazy comes in a lot of packages. Crazy friends, employers, family members, co-workers and others are a part of our lives at one time or another.

Who has not had to deal with a crazy, destructive relative, friend or colleague? After all, isn't putting up with constant craziness a little bit crazy itself?

In a strange way, craziness from other people is a normal part of life. We all face some of it to one degree or another. But tolerating bitter, nasty, destructive insanity, from an ex-wife, or from anyone else, is a choice and a very unhealthy one at that.

It's time to reclaim your life. Don't waste another second. Go ahead and get started on the first chapters of this book. Then say goodbye to Crazy — and hello to a happier, more peaceful life.

About This Book

This book is easy to sum up in a nutshell. It's about ridding your life, as much as is possible, of the destructive influence your partner's crazy ex, whom we will refer to by her generic first name – Crazy.

We know that Crazy would likely find this label insulting, but we are assuming you have called her worse, and with good reason. It doesn't matter. This book is for you, not her.

As you read this book, you may find yourself eager to share it with your boyfriend or husband. He may also be enthusiastic to begin the process of saying goodbye to Crazy. We suggest you start thinking in those terms from the start. Getting your mate to buy into this difficult process is just half the battle, it is near all of it In order for our strategies to work, the two of you must form a united, unbreakable front. If you are not at a place where you are ready to insulate you, your husband, and your family from Crazy, then this book may not be for you – yet. We offer solutions, some of which are very difficult to read. You have to be firm in your resolve. It's your family and future that matters, not whatever the Crazy is doing.

You may, and likely already have, found your loved one dragging his feet or quick to reject possible solutions before either of you even tries them. In that light, reading this book might make him more than a little anxious and upset. This is understandable for a few reasons.

First, it's very common for men and women who have been in relationships with Crazy to develop trauma symptoms. Reading this book may cause him to relive the abuse he experienced while with her. Second, following our suggestions may push him to face fears and discomfort he had long before he met Crazy and he may resist on those grounds alone.

Third, individuals who have been put in one no-win situation after the next by Crazy often develop a sense of learned helplessness, or the belief that nothing they do or say will be effective, so why bother? They give up and let Crazy run amok. You may even feel this way, too, periodically. Crazy maintains her power by wearing her victims down into compliant doormats over time.

So don't be surprised if your husband or you are initially reluctant to read this book and implement its strategies. If reading it is upsetting, find a pace that is comfortable and support each other in seeing it through. The strategies in this book will be ineffective if only one of you is doing the work.

You're both going to need to do some heavy lifting. If one of you starts to feel resentful during this process, it may be that the other is not doing his or her share. Crazy is an army of one. Sane and functional must work together.

This book is grouped into three sections:

- Part One: Defining the Problem
- Part Two: Preparing to Solve the Problem
- Part Three: Solving the Problem.

Part I: Defining the Problem

Before you can solve a problem, you need to identify and understand it. Since you are reading this book, we assume your husband's or boyfriend's ex – Crazy – is the problem. You need to know more, however, than the basic and obvious fact that Crazy is crazy.

We will look at normal divorce bitterness vs. Crazy divorce bitterness and what makes Crazy tick. We will discuss common personality types and mental health conditions associated with Crazy. Some are Crazy with entitlement issues. Some are Crazy ragers. Some are waif-like, perennial, professional Crazy victims. Some are Crazy stalkers. Some are mentally ill (personality disordered and/or sociopathic). Some are emotionally stunted Crazy children in adult bodies. Some are Crazy violent. Some are Crazy drama queens. Not all of the characteristics we describe will apply to your Crazy. On the other hand, you may find there is much overlap.

We will also examine how Crazy is enabled on a cultural and personal level.

Part II: Preparing to Solve the Problem

This section explores the common roadblocks you will need to surmount in order to prepare yourself to say goodbye to Crazy. You may be surprised that Crazy is often not the biggest obstacle to solving the problem. More often than not, the most problematic obstacles are you and your husband. This is good news! While you can't fix Crazy, you can change your behaviors and attitudes.

We will examine your husband's reticence to say no to his ex and possibly his children, Daddy Guilt, your guilt, societal pressures and how both of your family of origin experiences may be causing you difficulty in developing and maintaining effective boundaries with Crazy.

Part III: Solving the Problem

This section provides real world, practical solutions you can implement once you are ready to commit to doing the necessary work. We will walk you through the fundamental attributes, basic skills and strategies necessary to say goodbye to Crazy.

We will show you specific strategies, and ways to maintain your resolve while you execute your plan. We will not kid with you or sugar-coat the fact that it can get rough. Saying goodbye to Crazy, and making it stick can feel like throwing holy water on a vampire. It can be a scary experience. After all, fear is usually the number one reason why people let Crazy get away with her antics to begin with.

So a big part of the work you are about to undertake means facing and walking through fears. If you are committed to making it happen, though, we can show you and your partner not only how to make that a successful experience, but one that will enhance the bond you share and bring more value to your personal relationship with each other.

Let's get started!

Education, emasculation and equality: A letter to Yvette Cooper

Karen Woodall · 14 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Dear Yvette,

It was with a heavy heart that I read your article in the Independent. Writing about abuse in schools, you headline your piece "Why We Must Educate Our Sons to Save Our Daughters" and continue it with the most flagrant disregard for the truth that I think I have recently encountered.

You write of the hurling of insults and the way in which teachers are concerned for the well being of girls and you use as your evidence this:

> According to the Children's Commissioner there is clear evidence that violence in young relationships is growing. The British Crime Survey shows girls aged between 16-19, are most at risk of domestic violence – over 10 per cent had been experienced violence or abuse in a relationship.

Examining the evidence that you seek to rely on to convince us of this, however, it is clear that violence in the world at large, in the family, in the home and at school, is almost equally likely to affect boys as well as girls. In fact men are more likely than women to experience violence per se and almost as likely to experience domestic violence. Don't believe me? Here is the evidence from the source you quote, the British Crime Survey.

> The CSEW showed that young men were most likely to be the victims of violence. The profile of victims of violent and sexual violence varied according to the type of offence. In 2011/12, as in previous years, more than two-thirds of homicide victims (68%) were male. In contrast, women Focus on: Violent Crime and Sexual Offences, 2011/12 | 07 February 2013 Office for National Statistics | 2 were more likely to be a victim of domestic abuse. Some 7% of women and 5% of men were estimated to have experienced domestic abuse in the last year, equivalent to an estimated 1.2 million female and 800,000 male victims.

Whilst you can of course point to the 2% difference in the rate of experience of domestic violence as being evidence that more women than men suffer, it seems to me to be utterly disengenous to simply dismiss 800,000 incidents of domestic violence against men as being either of no consequence or no proof that violence is something that is suffered by men AND women and enacted by men AND women. And yet in your speech this week you consistently and deliberately maintained the illusion that only women and girls suffer violence and only men and boys are to blame.

It is simply untrue. Violence, in the home and in the world around is not a gender issue. Though it is the fervent goal of feminism to convince us that it is.

Our failure to understand this and our belief in what feminists tell us, leads us to witness the creeping emasculation of our boys which, if you have your way, will enter their consciousness in the early days of their education, in the form of your proposal to turn boys into "confident feminists."

I don't think I can properly express how I feel about your proposals, to bring in new laws to safeguard women and girls, which are based upon lies, stereotypes and the self interested proclamations of young women who consider themselves to be 'oppressed.' In your piece you quote the organisations who you feel should be supported by your party and the way in which these are leading the way to freedom for women and girls. You end your list of these with the movement 1 billion rising, the brain child of Eve Ensler, the author of the Vagina Monologues and the infamous scribe of the scene in which a young girl of 13 is raped by an older woman, ended with the words "if that was rape, it was a good rape." And you proclaim that these are the inspiration behind your proposals that boys are educated out of their inherent masculinity.' I could not feel more sickened.

In my view, the Labour party in the United Kingdom and all of its supporters should know the truth of the matter which is that feminism is a political doctrine which teaches not equality, but that the rights of women must come first, last and always. As part of that process, the emasculation of men and boys is seen as a desirable outcome.

Making boys into girls starts early in their childhood these days, with primary education being more likely to be taught by women and good behaviour in children being seen as that which is displayed by girls, whilst dysfunctional behaviour is more likely to be viewed in boys. The notion that boys and girls are different but equal in their value, in their learning capacity, in their behaviour and in their general demeanor appears to have simply been erased by the idea that, in the words of Glen Poole from Equality4Men, girls HAVE problems and boys ARE problems. This narrative, which is evident in your behaviour Yvette Cooper, is shaped by women who have control over family policy and and who see the needs and rights of children as being indivisible from those of their mothers.

But the rights and needs of children are NOT indivisible from those of their mothers. The rights of boys are equal to those of girls and it is not for feminists to determine what makes a 'good boy' or a 'good girl' either for that matter. Feminism is not synonymous with equality, much as the feminists would have us believe that it is so and it does not and cannot solve the problems of the world in which we are raising our children and grandchildren.

A world in which the following is true (Taken from the Equality4Men website):

> Men and boys in 99% of countries are more likely to kill themselves than women and girls
> Men and boys account for 4 out of 5 violent deaths in the world ever year
> Girls in nearly 100 of the world's leading economies are more likely to get a better education and go to university than boys
> Fathers all over the globe are less involved in raising their children than mothers for all sorts of personal, cultural and political reasons

…which is just a snapshot of the reality that we face in terms of helping boys to grow to be healthy and happy people. How does your proposal, to turn boys into 'confident feminists' offer us any kind of road map for the health and wellbeing of boys as well as girls? Put simply it doesn't. What it does is lie to the electorate about the reality facing our children and prey upon the anxieties whipped up by half hysterical women who believe that dancing around the world proclaiming their oppression is somehow about equality. Pity our boys, because what is being done to them prevents their ability to believe in their own inherent sense of self, prevents their ability to trust themselves and others in the world around them and inculcates shame at the earliest age about what it means to be not a girl.

The facts speak for themselves. Your closing words speak only for you and those like you –

> For years we have talked about the importance of empowering our daughters, giving them the confidence to challenge abuse and bringing them up as feminists. If we are going to achieve a real-step change in tackling violence against women, we need our sons growing up as confident feminists too.

Women like you have created a world in which educating boys to be ashamed of their masculinity is seen as desirable instead of cruel, and about equality instead of what it is: An oppressive, discriminatory reality.

As parents and grandparents, practitioners and ordinary people, we will hold you to account for your crimes against our children and our grandchildren. I hope I stay alive long enough to see the day.

The impact of fatherlessness

AVfM Video Source · 15 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Update Sharing for some reason on the video has been disabled but you can still see it here.

Jackie Brewton is a sex educator for High School students. She recently shared a powerful experience she had of girls talking about their fathers:

http://youtu.be/NFIDSO9fxOU

We would say this story is both tragic and unsurprising to us. We would also add this for Jackie, her students, others in her profession, and all adults listening to this tale:

One of the necessary components talking about, and changing, this sort of thing going to be to start openly talking about women who drive the fathers out of their children's lives–and there's a very good chance that this why a lot of these girls don't feel they can talk to mothers about it. We're going to have to talk about Parental Alienation, which is another thing children of single parents are going to have to hear more about, as are more single parents, or parents-to-be. Yes, there are men who do it, but we all know the reality: since it's mostly women who get custody, it's mostly done by women.

Indeed, one of the better choices is that if you're going to make children and you can't (for whatever reason) stay together, if you DO break up, you need to talk about how you keep father and child involved through that–and reality is, that usually requires the mother to do things to make sure he stays involved, and not just put it all on the father. Including, by the way, not trying to put his ass in jail if he hits hard times financially.

Still, we sense a cultural awakening is happening when we see videos like this one. But as we recognize the problem, are we going to start holding mothers as accountable as we hold fathers?

We think Jackie will be surprised just how many women in particular won't want her to talk about any of this. But if so, we hope she stands up to that and talks about it anyway. You can find Jackie Brewton at her web site, and her Facebook as well as her YouTube channel and Twitter.

“Objectification” in Irish society

Men's Human Rights Ireland · 15 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The announcement that the Sun newspaper was going to drop its topless Page 3 girls had the usual suspects all in a tizzy.

Long a target for feminist ire, the once-symbol of the sexual liberation of the 60s and 70s when women were burning their bras has become, for some, a symbol of the oppression of women by men.

Comparisons are convolutedly made to Muslim women who insist on covering their faces with the niqab, and slogans such as “Je suis page 3” are touted with typical taste and tact. Eloquent odes to verbosity richly marbled with pithy quotes from feminist pugilists are penned and published condemning such anachronistic sleaze.

Dressing up in a way that men might find appealing makes women look inferior and submissive to men, comes the refrain, “all you ladies throwing on the glad rags and tottering off to Coppers for a few scoops take note, tut tut.”

So when word was spread that this iconic relic of masculine power was being dropped, bottles of Beaumont des Crayeres Grande were popped, glasses were raised, and toasts were made to the inevitable collapse of the ever looming patriarchy.

Protestors at the “No More Page 3” campaign headed by Lucy Ann Holmes were delighted that their online petition had swayed the likes of media tycoon Rupert Murdoch, a heady rush and a solid result for such strenuous efforts.

Across the water The Guardian joined in the celebrations, calling it a “landmark decision”.

Susan McKay in the Irish Times trilled that it was a “sweet victory” for feminists, gleefully asking us “why stop at page 3?” and hinting heavily that such provocative displays were at least partially responsible for inciting men to rape, presumably in much the same way that violent video games are responsible for the wave of street battles and drive by shootings gripping our nation at the moment.

Except of course no such thing is happening.

And neither, as it turned out, was the Sun cancelling its venerable Page 3 tradition. As Dylan Sharpe, the public relations head for the tabloid tweeted shortly after the reports of Page 3’s demise had finished their feverish circulation,

> I said that it was speculation and not to trust reports by people unconnected to The Sun. A lot of people are about to look very silly…

It seems likely that he's got a stellar career ahead in PR! Yes, the whole thing was a marketing stunt designed to boost sales of the newspaper, and it worked just as it was intended to. Those who wanted to do away with Page 3 ended up promoting it.

Disappointment was palpable amongst the self-appointed "defenders of womens' dignity," with Suzanne Harrington of the Irish Examiner writing a bizarre and somewhat convoluted piece which included such sentiments as:

> This particular fat, ugly, joyless, jealous, feminist fanatic is lost for words. Nice one, sister.

But really, when we get down to it, what is sexual objectification and why is it such a big deal for feminists? After all shouldn't they be in favour of women being allowed to do what they like with their own bodies?

Sexual objectification as it is most commonly used means treating someone as if they are a thing, the subject-object dichotomy where a subject acts, and an object is acted upon. Thus, goes the theory, by objectifying women men remove their ability to act and hence their power.

It means essentially that regardless of how the person is viewed aesthetically or sexually, they are treated or thought of with a similar amount of respect and regard as one would treat a thing or object.

The feminist philosopher Martha Nussbaum states that a person might be objectified if they're treated like they have one or a selection of the following properties:

- Instrumentality – as if a tool for another's purposes
- Denial of Autonomy – as if lacking in agency or self-determination
- Inertness – as if without action
- Fungibility – as if interchangeable
- Violability – as if permissible to damage or destroy
- Ownership – as if owned by another
- Denial of Subjectivity – as if there is no need for concern for their feelings and experiences

Now, it hardly seems credible that the treatment of a nude model falls under any different a selection of those conditions with any more severity than any waiter, pizza delivery person, or supermarket cashier.

Surely a photoshoot in Playboy treats its subject with no less concern for her feelings, as if she is no more or less interchangeable, as no more a tool, as no more inert or owned, and certainly no more permissible to harm, than a hotel treats its staff.

In fact, it seems likely that a model is seen as being considerably less interchangeable, owned, inert, and lacking agency. If dining in a restaurant, do we pay much attention to the waitresses' thoughts, experiences, concerns, or emotions any more or less than those of a pole dancer's in a strip club?

The manager of a supermarket would no more wonder about a cashier's political persuasions than the owner of a soft porn magazine would about one of its models. We objectify others all the time, because it is simply not possible to deeply care and thoughtfully consider each and every person who provides a service for us or works for us.

This is certainly not problematic, but simply natural. This sort of "objectification" is not a problem. It is a healthy way which we deal with everyday life.

So what's the difference here? Why is the objectification of models or strippers so often highlighted, but not the objectification of pizza delivery boys or waitresses? Why does it seem to be the "sexual" aspect that is so problematic?

An argument which regularly makes an appearance relates to the idea that sexual objectification portrays women as aesthetically akin to objects, implying that when you look at someone and only focus on their sexuality you are viewing them as an object or thing. It implies that a sexualised image of a woman, in say, Playboy, shows the woman as an object.

However when you look at a person sexually and only sexually, you may have a very impersonal relationship with them, but you are not sexually viewing them as an object, as "objects" are intrinsically not sexual (an argument that individualist feminist Wendy McElroy makes). People are not typically sexually aroused by cabbages or chairs.

Even if an actual object is to be made to appear sexual (such as sex dolls), it has to be given the resemblance of a human in order for it to be sexually attractive. Or, in other words, for an "object" to be viewed as sexually attractive, it has to be designed so that it no longer appears to be an object.

Therefore, the property of something being or appearing to be an object makes it intrinsically not sexually appealing, so to say that when someone is being displayed solely for their sexual appeal, this portrayal makes them seem like an "object" is simply fallacious, as "objectuality" is the antithesis of sexuality.

Sexual objectification may be very impersonal, but it does not make sense for it to literally mean the portrayal of women as objects.

This may seem as though it's simply a question of linguistic semantics, but that's not the case. When discussing subjective opinions it's absolutely necessary that the words or terms you use have a definite, clear, concrete meaning, especially a term such as "sex object" which has such currency in society today.

If a term is both nebulous and emphatic, then it is hyperbole. If it is used as axiomatically and prolifically as "sex object", then it enters the realm of being propaganda.

Then there's the oft repeated notion that porn, erotic images, glamour photos, or stripping are correlated with rape.

Where is the evidence for this? And if people believe "sexual objectification" causes rape, does that mean they believe that sex workers and lap dancers cause rape because their work involves being "sexually objectified"? Do girls who post nude pictures of themselves online cause rape? Can erotic fiction cause rape? Do models cause rape? Perhaps girls in short skirts and crop tops cause rape?

This all sounds rather akin to victim blaming and slut-shaming, not to mention puritanical and controlling. Maybe we should police and regulate women to ensure they do not cause themselves to be raped! Aren't rapists the only ones at fault? Shouldn't women be able to live in a world where they can choose to do what they want with their bodies without fear of being blamed for causing sexual abuse?

People should not incur blame for actions that others independently commit unless they intentionally tried to incite them. Such an idea undermines the very foundations of justice.

Salman Rushdie should not have received blame for the violence in Pakistan that ensued after the release of The Satanic Verses. Christopher Nolan shouldn't be blamed because some maniac watched The Dark Knight and shot people. And a stripper should not bear the blame for sexual assault.

But let's say for the sake of argument that sexual objectification is a real and negative thing, as resident Irish Times feminist Una Mullally firmly believes.

Why wouldn't it affect men too?

At the end of the day, men shouldn't feel ashamed, afraid or guilty for admiring the female figure, and neither should women feel bad about admiring the male form. It doesn't hurt anyone except people looking for an excuse to be hurt.

Our thanks to the co-author of this article, prominent blogger Red Blooded Liberalism for their excellent analysis of objectification.

Editor's note: original article can be found here.

White Ribbon Australia ambassador challenges the sisterhood – is slated for reeducation camp

Paul Elam · 15 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Tanveer Ahmed is an esteemed psychiatrist, author, media regular and an ambassador to the White Ribbon Australian Campaign. He recently penned an excellent article on the subject. Unfortunately he was critical of the feminist model and talked about an indifference to men as victims that he said needed to be corrected in his article, "Men Forgotten in Violence Debate."

Only now it seems that it is Dr.Ahmed is the one who is going to be corrected, with some reeducation from people who are light years behind him in expertise. Libby Davies, CEO of White Ribbon Australia, the one who wants to send Dr. Tanveer Ahmed for reeducation, is herself only qualified/educated as Bachelor of Arts in Social Science, and some qualification in Secondary Education and Teaching. Ahmed is facing assessment by his ideological controller, not an academic peer.

Ahmed has apparently agreed to submit to some of Davies' help in getting his mind right.

Officials from Erin Pizzey's whiteribbon.org secured quick approval from Ahmed to repost the original in its entirety, which you can read here.

It would be easy to jump the gun and criticize Tanveer Ahmed for what could be considered caving. I hope he stays in because most people who can see the truth can't unsee it. He could be part of a new and better culture in the DV field, even if he has to listen to a substitute high school teacher.

It still remains that every victim of domestic violence could gain from his work (as well as Erin Pizzey's), and at the very least he had the metal in his spine to write it in the first place.

The gravy here is that we have one of their own on the indelible record saying the exact same things we have been saying about the same problems for years. The problems that White Ribbon Australia has hidden since its inception; the problems they are now trying to hide again as of this writing. And they are punishing him for his off-the-plantation sins in full display. We have more incontrovertible proof that the narrative is actually starting to change and that the opposition is clueless on how to handle it. That is in sync with AVFM's mission (and WhiteRibbon.org's).

It is only a matter of time till someone else steps up and stands tall and proud for the coercive reaction of the fascists. Our work will play a role in inspiring more men like Dr. Tanveer Ahmed and women like Erin Pizzey. If we and other MHRAs keep hammering, we can force White Ribbon to clean up its act in full view of the world.

Is it a thousand gold bars? No. But it is still pure gold.

Bang: The Definitive Interview With RooshV (Part One)

Mumia Ali · 16 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The subject of "Game" has many supporters and many detractors. AVfM has historically taken a rather dim view of the subject, for a host of reasons, however, here we present a first-time at-length interview with one of its most noted proponents.–Eds

> "Only Nixon could go to China."
>
> -Mike Mansfield

If there is one guy in the Manosphere who's reputation, for better or for worse, has preceeded him, it's Roosh V. For more than a decade, he has been sharing his adventures with women, life, love and travel, with men across the globe, via more than a dozen self-published books, three websites and a burgeoning YouTube channel.

I got wind of Roosh way back in 2008 when I was a frequent commenter at a blog then known as "Roissy in DC" and today known as "Chateau Heartiste"; I hopped over to his online spot via hyperlink and became an instant fan – but not quite for the reasons one might think.

Although I greatly enjoyed Roosh's earnest and honest takes on his experiences with the ladies while he plied his version of Game & Pickup around the world, what I enjoyed even more was the fact that Roosh was, and very much remains, a do-er. Let's keep it brutally real here: the 'sphere has a lot of guys who talk a lot of smack, but very little gets done. Roosh set out to achieve a list of personal goals for himself, and by any measure, he not only has done so, he's done so by a pretty wide freakin' margin. No matter what you think of him or what he's about, you just have to respect that.

For the longest time I had wanted to have a one-on-one sitdown with the guy, get inside his head just a little bit and ask him the questions that others either didn't want to ask or couldn't ask. I got that opportunity early last month, when he graciously accepted my request for a New Yorker magazine-style interview. Over the course of roughly the past month or so, we communicated back and forth by email, one question a day, from my hometown of Philadelphia, PA, to where he recently moved back to over in Poland from Ukraine.

The resulting in-depth interview – more than 8,000 words – is as far as I'm aware the first and only one of its kind, and we talked about everything. Of all the interviews I've done to date, and that's quite a few, this is hands down the most enjoyable I've ever had. I found Roosh, the man behind the hype and the controversy, to be a layered, tempered and earnest guy, who truly wants to help other men in their most basic and primal of life goals; a deep thinker, a powerful communicator and, even now in his more "settled" mode, a driven personality that nevertheless is a gracious host. He never once got curt or angry with me, never said that I was imposing on his time. In short, he was nothing like the misogynistic jerk that he is made out to be by the Cathedral media. I got nothing but respect for the guy, and I say that even as I disagree with him on a number of points. Like I said, he's a do-er, at a time when far too many men are, to be brutally frank, slackers and whacked. (There, I said it.)

In the interest of full disclosure, and for the record before we begin: back when Return of Kings first got off the ground, I contacted Roosh to see if I could be in the roster of writers; he declined my proposal, on the grounds that I was too controversial. If someone like Roosh says something like that about you, that has to be a huge compliment.

As noted above, this is a sprawling interview, one of the biggest AVFM has published to date (save perhaps the classic Interview with Erin Pizzey). In light of this fact, we've decided to present it to you in a two-part installment, this being Part One. In this installment, Roosh and I discussed his "origin story," his early years in the blogging and pickup game, Game and Pickup more specifically, and his views regarding Race, Feminism, American and foreign women, and more. In the second and final installment, we will discuss an even wider range of topics.

So, with no further ado, I present to you, the AVFM audience, Bang: The Definitive Interview with RooshV:

QUESTION: For those of us out there who don't know who you are, how'd you get started in the Game/Pickup/"sex tourist" business? And if you don't mind, with a name like Roosh, that's rather unusual for an American. What's your background, and do you think that played any role whatsoever in the guy you would eventually become renowned for?

ROOSHV: I got into Game at 22 years of age because I wanted to get laid regularly. Several years later, once I became unsatisfied with American culture and women, I moved abroad to make love with foreign women using traditional Game. I have termed this behavior "love tourism." Sex tourism is when men pay for prostitutes, which I don't do or advise. In fact, I immediately ban sex tourists from my forum.

Developing an internet business centered on Game was an accident. At first I wrote about my experiences on a tiny blog called Rooshlog while working full time as a microbiologist, but I soon attracted a following that encouraged me to write a book. Bang was the first book I wrote, and since then I've written over 15 more. The income from those books allowed me to continually travel. After tiring from writing books for several years, I tried my hand at operating a media site by opening Return Of Kings in 2012, which currently reaches one million people a month.

My parents are Middle Eastern immigrants so racially I'm not American but Iranian and Armenian, though I don't speak their languages. When I look in the mirror I don't see a particular ethnicity staring back at me, for better or worse. My lack of ethnic identity probably explains why I can easily fit into other cultures without missing my "home" culture, and I think my background has led to a lack of attachment to America and the ability to view it more objectively than most. I don't think my background affected my game development, for a man with normal testosterone levels should have an intense desire to fornicate.

Q: That's something I've always had a difficulty in understanding: what appears to be widespread resistance, or at the very least, apprehension, to the very idea of Men learning how to sexually appeal to Women – for example, I've encountered this fierce resistance and at some turns, outright hatred, on the part of Men's Rights Activists, and Feminists alike. In my experience, there seems to be fierce resistance to this idea, as if it is verboten for Men to actually learn the nuts and bolts of making seduction happen. (On the flipside, Women have always enjoyed a "leg up" in this regard – there are entire magazines and the like devoted to the enterprise Cosmo immediately comes to mind). Have you encountered this mindset in your travels, and if so, what do you attribute such a mindset to? Why do you think there is such a strong visceral reaction to the very idea of a Man learning how to be more appealing to Women? As for your books, perhaps the best known among them being "Bang: The Pickup Bible That Helps You Get More Lays," it seems to have really shaken up the industry; why do think this is? Of course, there have been quite a few books written on or about Game/Pickup, perhaps the best known of the lot being the 2005 memoir by Neil "Style" Strauss, "The Game". What is it about Bang that makes it unique from other offerings out there, and what are your thoughts on the overall state of the Game/Pickup book business?

R: Women take for granted that their very existence is seductive to men. Even when they don't try, they are getting hit on by men who want to take them out and have sex with them, so when they read about men trying to manually create attraction, they think it's manipulative or creepy or what have you. At the same time, however, they read psychology self-help to better understand people's feelings and intentions (to manipulate them), which is a form of Game.

When a woman increases her value it's empowering, but when a man increases his value–in a way that he surpasses women that were previously above him–they cry foul. Game haters don't understand that the alternative of Game can mean no sex… possibly ever.

I think Bang did well because it was practical without the PUA jargon that was in style at the time with Mystery and the others. I spoke in plain language and approached the problem logically without advising guys to make drastic changes that would make them feel weird, such as wearing fuzzy hats or approaching massive groups in clubs by acting like a stand-up comedian. My approach to Game is not designed just for extroverts.

Game alone as a movement or lifestyle is dead, even though many Game marketers continue to make a lot of money with cheesy "never get rejected" sales copy. Many Game bloggers of the manosphere realized by 2010 that Game is one component of being a high-value man, and no Game in the world will help you if you're massively overweight with nothing interesting going on in your life. It's a prerequisite for being a successful man in the West.

Q: I've written elsewhere how and why when it comes to mating, Women as a group and in the aggregate, have an innate upperhand over Men, which was in direct response to critics of the Manosphere, who have always held this view. But your remarks about "fuzzy hats" was interesting to me, because there's this perception among Game/Pickup critics, that somehow one MUST do EXACTLY as Mystery, et al, advise, or something. They never seem to be able to grasp the idea that even Mystery himself advocated an "a la carte" approach for each Man when it came to Game/Pickup – to apply what was useful to each Man individually, and, to tailor things to suit his particular circumstances. Yet, the stereotypes about PUAs doggedly persist, and I cannot figure out for the life of me how/why. What say you?

R: Those negative stereotypes persist because feminists want to inoculate the general public against Game's effective teachings. By portraying Game as something like a freak show for guys who wear funny hats, they will prevent men from diving in and using techniques and tactics that decrease their dependence on low quality women who want to keep the attention party going. Feminists will vehemently criticize any behavior which increases a male's sexual options while praising a behavior which increases a female's sexual options. Game does the former.

Unfortunately, a lot of confused men buy into the anti-Game arguments and don't even give a honest chance to a field of study that would greatly increase their mating success with only moderate levels of use.

Q: Also, what do you say about the recent story of PUA Julien Blanc (and we can also include here Ken "Tofu Tofu" Hoinsky from a few Summers back), who seems to have run into some trouble overseas for what Game/Pickup critics charge is his de facto sexual assault on Women; that Game/Pickup on a whole instructs/condones/endorses sexual assault, even rape, and so forth? I suppose it should also bear mentioning that you have encountered a bit of trouble overseas for being accused of being a rapist by your detractors. Why do you think Game/Pickup is so often associated in such a manner?

R: Julien Blanc seemed to be pushing the envelope to get attention. It worked, but his company RSD didn't have the PR skill to properly drive that attention into more business, so it cost them quite a bit of money instead. A lot of RSD refugees come to me eventually because their teachings focus on unsustainable approaching and techniques that are more suited to naturally extroverted men.

There were periods of international anger against me whenever I released a travel guide, mostly because foreigners thought I was disrespecting their culture or women. Perhaps they were right, but the information I shared was valuable to American men who wanted to develop sexual relationships with foreign women, and I'm still frequently asked to put out a guide for popular countries.

I've announced my whereabouts in the past year in several countries but haven't received any backlash, so either I'm losing my touch or the methods I teach are too tame compared to the Julien Blancs of the world.

Q: Finally, there seems to be as much visceral dislike aimed toward Evolutionary Psychology, which greatly informs much of Game/Pickup instruction, as Game/Pickup itself; my experience has been that, without fail, those who have the most to say about the matter in the most derogatory of terms, are also those who know the least about EvoPsych – it's almost as if their very lives are at stake in trying to paint it as utterly disreputable or something. What are your thoughts on this?

R: I'm not a big fan of evolutionary psychologists. They start with the end result and then back rationalize a logical reason which can't really be proved or disproved. The evidence they provide is almost never sufficient to accept as fact, especially when non-human species are used as part of the explanation (birds, insects, rodents, etc). I'm sure evo psych will some day be vindicated on a lot of things, but until then they're simply taking a stab in the dark, and so should be viewed upon as theory, not undeniable truth. I don't use their conclusions as the foundation of my teachings.

I prefer to get my working model of human relationships from what we can see and experience in modern times (empirically based) or what we saw in recent history, where there's a sufficient document trail from first-person accounts to describe human relationships and experience, especially in the last 100 years. I use the traditional way of life in Western societies as near back as 1950 as a model we should strive towards, because they were able to increase their population without using immigrants while having defined roles for each sex that suited their natural genetic strengths. Modern Western societies do not currently do this.

Q: I know we've discussed a bit about Game/Pickup, but I just saw a recent post of yours that made me ask the following question:

As I'm sure you know, Game and Pickup has the very real perception of being geared toward younger guys – you know, those in their 20s and maybe early 30s. But what about older guys? In my case, I came across Game when I was turning 40, and while I was able to tailor it to my particular situation and circumstances (Black, urban, working class, etc.), I've found that very little is written or presented for the older guys out there. What do you have to say about this?

R: A lot of the differences in older man game seems to be based more on the man himself in regard to his decreasing horniness, energy, and tolerance for typical pickup venues like clubs and bars instead of women finding him less attractive. An older man with Game and a high-value lifestyle can access not only younger girls in the 21-25 age range but also slightly older ones nearing 30 who are looking to settle down after not being able to secure their bad boy fantasy, so therefore I see no reason why a man over 30 can't regularly date girls 5-10 years younger than himself. In Eastern Europe, I'm able to date girls 15 years younger if I pursue it, but I find girls in the 23-25 range to be preferable from a maturity standpoint assuming she has a low notch count and has never had a one-night stand.

As long as a man is willing to learn new skills like day Game while keeping himself in shape, he should continue to do well with women even beyond 40.

Q: As a followup, I wanted to get your reaction to the following pet theory of mine – that Game and Pickup, are in truth Sex Positivity for Men – that both teaches men that it is not wrong to seek women out for sexual relationships; that it is not wrong to have sexual desires for women; and that women actually are receptive to the right kinds of approaches from the right kinds of men (those who work on their appearance, body language, making themselves successful in life, etc.). I share many critiques of Feminism with you, but what I do think they got right was the notion of "sex positivity" – the idea that, with education, advocacy and understanding, we all as a society would benefit from these things. My only beef with the third wavers is that they seem to be for sex positivity for everyone BUT straight men; I honestly see Game and Pickup as the much-needed corrective in this regard, and it is interesting indeed to see the response of supposed sex-positive feminists to that. What are your thoughts on this?

R: Sex positivity is used by women to rationalize their sluttiness or to "discover" their "inner self" and beauty. Game is not used by men as a means to rationalize their sexuality or to learn about themselves but to achieve the very concrete and definable goal of having sex with a woman or entering a relationship with one. Game teaches a man how to get laid while sex positivity teaches women how to open their legs without feeling guilty.

While many men study game to sleep with a lot of girls, the skills they learn while doing so helps them meet and keep a girl when they are ready for a long-term relationship, but when a girl sleeps with a lot of men, she actually loses her feminine and nurturing qualities while becoming more cynical and emotionally cold, making her worse off for long-term pair boding. This is because experience incurs benefits to men while doing harm to women, and I'm sure you've seen the studies that divorce becomes increasingly likely the more sexual partners a woman had before marriage.

Game is a functional strategy to achieve sexual relations with women, including family formation, while sex positivity is a feminist paradigm that aims to masculinize women with the inevitable result of delaying family formation. Therefore I can't agree with your theory.

Q: One last question – for some strange reason, and I don't know if you're aware of this or not, but over the years, I keep encountering people, some guys but especially women, who claim that PUAs and Game/Pickup writers never address the physical aspects of a man, i.e., his appearance, grooming, etc. Now, I know for a fact that's not true, because just about every Game writer of any consequence I know has if anything, stressed it to the point of ad nauseam, including you. I can only conclude that these are statements and claims are coming from people who haven't even taken the time to be bothered with reading anything you and other Game writers have said on the matter. What do you say about this? Why do so many people seemingly persist in claiming these things when it's so very apparent that a man's appearance and grooming, style and mannerisms (body language, etc.) are like the very first things a man learns about when taking up Game? What is up with that?

R: The opposition to Game uses teachings and ideas that haven't even been advocated in the 21st century. A lot of Game critics are still harping about version 1.0 of Mystery Method that he shared in alt.seduction.fast, of which not a single man I know has even tried in the past decade. They do this because they need to misinform sexless men that Game is dangerous so that they don't become future enemies of a narrative that is doing everything it can to squeeze out whatever remaining drop of masculinity Western society has left. They create a ridiculous picture of Game, coordinate to propagandize that image to men who could've been helped, and then become satisfied when those same men serve as parachutes for feminists and Jezebel readers who decide to settle down at the ripe age of 34.

As for looks, it definitely matters when it comes to a man's success rate, which is why I teach guys to optimize their appearance as much as possible while starting a bodybuilding program. Some men are born butt ugly, unfortunately, but a Game program will at least increase their results than if they did nothing. Of course it will never match a naturally good-looking guy, but he'll have a lot more sexual success than if he listened to feminists and became a beta orbiter who begs for scraps.

Q: Let's discuss Race – and in America, what that really means is Black and White. One of the things I've found truly fascinating over the past roughly five years or so that I've been involved with the seduction community and wider Manosphere, is the relative lack of participation on the part of Black Men. I have some of my own ideas as to how and why this is, but I am wondering what your thoughts on it is? For example, why does there seem to be little demand for instructionals and the like in terms of Game/Pickup when it comes to Black Men? Even well known Black relationship experts, like Steve Harvey, have gone on record in saying that they have no intention of writing books geared to Black Men in this regard. I've quietly shadowed a number of fairly well-known Black relationship experts, and they've privately told me that they simply cannot make any money by marketing to Black Men in the same ways they can to Black Women. Is this really a matter of finances, or is there something else at work?

R: I disagree with your assertion that there is a lack of black participation. Maybe this is true for the men's rights sphere, but there are many that read my blog and participate on my forum, many of whom I've met. I wouldn't be surprised if their representation on my sites is greater than the general population.

That said, I have noticed that black men tend to be more detached to the manosphere because of the presence of pro-white sentiments that they see as anti-black or even racist. Many manopshere bloggers are sympathetic to white nationalist causes and sometimes make openly hostile sentiments towards minorities, especially when it comes to inter-racial relationships involving white women.

The liberal elite today make a good talk about helping blacks, but they provide no answers for an educated black man who wants to succeed in love and business without being looked upon as a welfare case or victim. Then you have conservatives who are worried about "white genocide," and you can understand that black men today are a bit lost, finding no community that caters specifically to their needs. As time goes on, however, I think this group will get so large that more organization will take place.

Q: As for the Manosphere: in my personal experience, there is definitely something to be said for an anti-Black element in its midst, but this cannot be said for the Manosphere overall. Nevertheless, the space seems to be fairly low when it comes to Black male participation in the Manosphere; I can literally count on one hand, the number of Black male writers/bloggers of stature in the Manosphere presently. Again, why do you think this is, or maybe you don't see it as much of a problem at all?

R: You'll have to ask black men, because I'm not finely tuned to exactly what they're looking for, but my gut instinct is to say that there are so few red pill black men (compared to white men) that there isn't yet a critical mass for a strong black section of the manosphere.

Q: Let's talk a bit about some of the more controversial things you've said and that you're more known for outside of the Game and Pickup realms. You've said some pretty pointed and some would say, harsh and possibly inaccurate, things about American Women in particular, which is best summed up in your YouTube video, "36 Things Wrong With American Women." You've also said quite a few things along these lines over the years on your personal blog. For the record and for the benefit of our readers who may not be familiar with your views along these lines, exactly what is your position here, and why do you take the seemingly hardline view that you do of American Women?

R: My prior writing and videos speak for themselves since I was clear and simple in my criticisms (my most recent entry into this topic was 35 Things Wrong With America). All I can add is that my views are based on first-hand experience, either from living in America for nearly 30 years or dating a large number of American women. I can't help but conclude that many of my detractors have not accumulated the experience that I have.

Every country has its flaws, which includes its women, and so I aim to offer an objective and unemotional analysis of those flaws. I have not spared other countries in my criticisms as well, such as Denmark, and more recently, Poland. If I can be blamed for anything, it's that it is easier for me to see the bad than the good, but that fact doesn't take away from accurate observations that a large percentage of experienced men agree with.

Q: You've also said some pretty pointed things about Feminism, in particular, a widely read article you wrote sometime back where you made the case that feminists in general were unattractive that garnered a great deal of attention and controversy; for the record, could you just briefly layout your position on Feminism, what your chief problem with it is, and what you see as its effect and impact on society?

R: Feminism is an ideology that wants to remove all accountability and responsibility of women for their actions, no matter how immoral, reprehensible, or damaging to society. A feminist society is one where nothing a woman does is wrong. This is being proven with the latest push to eliminate imprisonment of women for any crime, a viewpoint that was recently pushed by the Washington Post.

Whenever a woman is unhappy, sad, or not pleased with her salary, men will be blamed. If she commits a crime, she will be painted as a victim who had no agency of her own, as is she's a helpless child. When women are not happy with their intimate relationships, men will be blamed for rape or emotional abuse and have to suffer a judicial system that wants to remove due process against men. If a woman is not happy with her marriage, it's solely the man's fault. All of this places an undue and unfair burden on men to bend over and please women at a cost of being labeled a misogynist or, in the worst case, being outright imprisoned.

The end result of this is that men stop interacting with women. Currently, many men are opting out of marriage because of unfair divorce and child custody laws. It won't be much longer until we hit a tipping point where men drop out of sexual relationships with women as well, something we're already seeing with the MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way) movement. The stronger that feminism grows, the more that men will run away from women.

Therefore, a feminist victory will be a lonely one for women indeed. "Where have all the good men gone?" They've been scared off by your anti-male war.

Next up: Roosh and I discuss his views on the Paris terrorist attacks, Bill Cosby, Social Justice Warriors, the Manosphere and what he sees as the road ahead. Dropping this Thu, Feb 19, 2015!

Zen Men is Transcending KSU

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 16 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Zen Men made Kennesaw State University (KSU) history by being the first KSU student organization to form a national-level LLC for humanitarian purposes.

Staff is no longer limited to KSU students. Anyone may now join Zen Men LLC to manage the organization, contribute articles and perform on-the-ground activism. Student MHRAs around the nation can now start Zen Men chapters on their local campuses with our assistance. In the event that a chapter is lost, Zen Men LLC will remain operational.

This is exciting news, but do note that Zen Men gained capacity, not capability. In other words, just because Zen Men LLC has more breathing room does not mean it grew to fill the new space. I can make no promises about what the future holds, but the good news is KSU feminists have lost. The worst they can do is target the KSU chapter by using their trademark fear-mongering, but look at how well that worked for them.

I would like to apologize to supporters for any confusion, because we are now shifting the brand once again. You are used to hearing "KSU Men" or "Zen Men" and thinking about the KSU student organization. That's still somewhat the case because Zen Men LLC only has that one chapter right now. The difference is that Zen Men LLC is now an off-campus organization.

Each chapter is identified by a unique name or their home university. I will now refer to the KSU presence as "Zen Men @ Kennesaw State University," or as the "Original Chapter." We will soon petition the KSU Students Activities and Budget Advisory Committee to finalize the conversion from a standalone student organization to an affiliated chapter.

We are now forming a chapter development program, which means Zen Men will appear on a second campus, then a third, and so on. University systems will start to notice something is different. The entire United States education system will be faced with the task of respecting the young men they have neglected for too long, because we will develop a network of men who know their rights and will organize to peacefully, yet firmly resist corrupt state and academic forces.

This approach with Zen Men LLC is, ironically, not Zen because it rallies those who are too agitated to sit idle. Our Zen is in our promotion of experience over ideology, because it takes a pragmatic, persistent approach to take education back from the suffocating forces eating the futures of young men. Only self-assertion can bring a young man the full intellectual experience he is often denied, so we will inform him of his rights.

Zen Men LLC is a national-level body, and it stands a real chance of changing policy and counteracting bigoted forces that incubate mistrust and fear of men. We will name and oppose any person, organization, religion or culture that corrodes the well-being of men and boys. There will be no negotiating away their humanity.

If this sounds like an effort you can get behind, then follow Zen Men closely. I am going to need your help soon.

(Feature image derived from Winter is Leaving by Viktor Hanacek on PicJumbo.com)

Male victims of domestic violence

AVfM Video Source · 17 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

ThinkTank doesn't understand statistics and reading: Bogus "1 in 3 men would rape" statistic

AVfM Video Source · 17 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

1 in 3 men say they would rape a woman if they had a chance? If you heard that statistic, you should have thought "that sounds crazy."

If you didn't think it sounded crazy, TL;dr can explain it to you:

We suggest you subscribe.

Message to Anita Sarkeesian aka @femfreq

Jack Barnes · 17 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Over the past few days I have been having more fun than a feminist in a broom factory. It all started when Anita Sarkeesian posted a compilation of all the “harassing” tweets she had received in one week to her tumblr blog.

This posting featured a tweet from yours truly!

I wonder if I’m going to get a cut of the money she hopes to make off of this? Doubt it.

I was completely unaware of all of this until my twitter mentions exploded with…well take a look at a few examples.

Sarah thinks its a good idea to combat online harassment by sending her nearly 1,400 followers to my mentions. Any wonder why the hashtag #FeministLogic exists?

Haunt me? As in the things I say and do will affect the rest of my life? That's good advice for Anita to think about or else get used to saying "would you like fries with that?

“When in doubt make fun of where some lives.” This is the best these minions can do?

Brett L. Schuchert thinks that we aren’t serious about destroying the ideology of feminism. Wonder if he will feel the same way in about 10 years.

Reginald Braithwaite works for GitHub.

Why these bigots need to bring race into a conversation about gender is beyond me. What's wrong Regie? Would my evidence based opinion on feminism be more credible if I weren't white? Looks like Dianne Marsh could give him a job at Netflix after GamerGate gets done with GitHub.

Maybe that why he's kissing up to feminists? Gender bigots got to stick together when times get tuff.

Suzie Chism: "Lets do what we accuse others of doing. But we're not hypocrites." You would think that someone who's an entertainer in the music industry would try to gain fans, not push them away.

"Whenever someone states an opinion I don't like they must be a member of the political party I hate." Can't argue with stupid.

Even Big Red and her friends decided to get in on the fun.

There were several people who didn't want me on twitter sharing my views against feminism. Wonder why?

This is not the first time someone has tried to dox me only to post the name and address of innocent people. This time they threatened someone's business.

This has been going on several days. I'm happy to report that, for now, my twitter account is still up and running. I would also like to thank all of those who jumped in with me to give these feminists a bloody nose.

Anita Sarkeesian aka Feminist Freak, my tweet was in no way intended to be a threat nor should it be taken as such. I'm sorry if I came across threatening you. I was not. I was making you and every feminist in the world a promise. I promise I will never stop exposing feminism as the hate movement that it is. I promise that I will never stop calling feminists out, or as you call it "harassing" them on their lies, bigotry and general bullshit. I will never stop. Ever. I will hound feminism to the gates of hell then go inside to find whatever shreds are left. I will pound on feminism until it crumbles. When feminists beg for mercy or cry foul I'll just come after your ideology harder and faster. I'm not going to stop and I'm not alone.

Anita, feminism is tyrannical ideology. It can only survive if it is never challenged. Therefore feminism must silence anyone daring to question it.

Fortunately many of these attempts have failed. Feminism is an ideology based on hate and domination. One only needs to look at feminists trying to control how men sit, or urinate or perhaps peruse this long list of feminist quotes that are nothing but pure hate. I could go on and on with examples of feminist hatred for men and anyone daring to question it, and the examples of feminism wanting to manipulate and control men not to mention society as a whole, but to do so would be pointless. You already know what feminism is.

The pages of human history are basically a long story of people trying to overcome adversity. Time and time again tyrannical dictatorships have sprung up, grown, and then were overthrown by those they controlled. As tyranny grows, it must squeeze the population more and more – to the point where people rebel.

Anita, I know that you don't care about any of this. You don't care about the rights of men or women. You care about making money. You found a group of people that would buy almost anything put in front of them as long as they thought that women were oppressed and you were working to change that. You found your group of suckers to con and you've done very well for yourself. But you are playing a dangerous game.

As men and the women who care about men continues to grow more and more tired of the hatred of men and the attempt to control men they are starting to rebel. This is a non-violent rebellion but a rebellion all the same. This rebellion requires that feminism be destroyed. This in turn requires that society be turned against feminism thereby destroying the careers and reputations of feminists such as yourself.
The alternative is that society allows feminism to continue until there is a violent rebellion in which blood will be spilled. Bodies in the streets and cities on fire. The pages of history are soaked with the blood of such rebellions. It has happened many many times before and it will happen again. According to history the rebellion against feminism will turn violent and bloody if allowed to continue. This is something that the men and women of the MHRM are working daily to avoid.

MHRAs like myself want very much to avoid what history tells us is to come. We want a peaceful resolution to this crisis. So we work hard everyday to turn society against feminism so that society can peacefully remove feminism from its place of influence and power. When feminism no longer is a problem then society can set about honoring the rights of both men and women.

This is why MHRAs, anti-feminists/non-feminists and women against feminism will continue to call feminists out on their bigotry and lies or as you all like to put it "harass" you. This will result in your reputation and career lying in ruins. Given the alternative I will not lose a second of sleep over it.

Semen: love drug or health food?

Robert Brockway · 17 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Semen is really surprising. Sperm comprises roughly 3% of semen by volume. The rest is a mixture of various sugars, amino acids, and hormones, including estrone, prolactin, oxytocin, thyrotropin-releasing hormone, and serotonin.[1][2]

Recent research has revealed some truly surprising effects that can occur in women following exposure to semen from a male lover.

There is now ample evidence that absorption of semen can be mood enhancing for women and may even reduce levels of depression in women. Researchers compared three different groups of women:

- Those engaging in unprotected intercourse with men
- Those engaging in intercourse with men using condoms
- Those abstaining from intercourse

Only those engaging in unprotected sex experienced reduced levels of depression. In addition, chemicals originating in the semen were found in these women's blood hours after sex.[3][4]

The idea that unprotected sex with men could be beneficial to women has been described as controversial in recent years and is actively resisted by many feminists. The idea isn't really controversial of course. It is supported by solid evidence. Feminism, in its efforts to denigrate male sexuality, cannot tolerate claims that sexual intercourse with a man could benefit a woman in any way. What many feminists fail to understand, apparently, is that almost all humans rely constantly on many other humans to survive. There are a large number of jobs that women have shown next to no interest in undertaking. Many of these jobs are dangerous and dirty, and they are necessary for the continued operation of society. Even without any reference to semen, women (and men) depend on men every day for their well being and survival. For most people independence is an illusion.

Dr Lazar Greenfield, a US surgeon, was forced to resign from the presidency of the American College of Surgeons for daring to mention the mood enhancing qualities of semen in an article published in 2011. His remarks were incidental to the article, which was intended to be light-hearted.[5] Such is the degree to which feminism has infested the scientific establishment that even these gentle comments resulted in a massive backlash. Scientific results which challenge feminist dogma are not tolerated. The February 2011 issue of Surgery News in which the article was printed is still apparently not available in the publication archives despite the publication claiming it would be again.[6][7]

Vaginal absorption of semen may reduce the chance of breast cancer by up to 50% in some women.[8] More generally it may inhibit tumour formation.[9]

Does unprotected sex with men make women fall in love too? There is a definite link between oxytocin and developing feelings of attraction and closeness.[10] This effect seems to be much more pronounced in females than males.[11][12] Could the oxytocin from semen have a direct result on how women feel about their male lover? Women who regularly engaged in unprotected sex with men seem to have a harder time with breakups.[13] The extent to which exposure to semen really makes a woman fall in love is, as yet, unclear but it seems to be a contributing factor.

Oral sex (and the subsequent exposure and consumption of semen) appears to be beneficial too. Many of the effects noted for vaginal sex may also apply for oral sex. Amazingly, fellatio may be the cure for morning sickness during pregnancy.[14]

In addition, women may be able to reduce their chances of suffering a common and potentially very serious pregnancy related medical condition by engaging in fellatio with the future father of their children. This appears to be true for oral sex before and during pregnancy. Scientists theorize that consumption of semen primes a woman's body for exposure to the foreign proteins found in the man and his child. Being primed for these proteins means that the woman is able to cope with them during pregnancy resulting in lower incidence of preeclampsia.[15] More recent research suggests that receiving semen vaginally may have the same effect and may be an evolutionary adaption that results in children being more likely to be brought up in stable family environments.[16]

It is likely that there is significant individual variation in these effects. Some women may find the impact of semen to be significant, while others may not notice it at all.

From an evolutionary perspective it is entirely plausible that women who responded more positively to semen absorption would be more likely to engage in sexual intercourse. This may have resulted in a selective advantage resulting in human females generally responding positively to semen absorption today. This raises the question about whether vaginal fluids have equivalent benefits for men. At the present time the jury is still out, however it wouldn't be terribly surprising if future research established benefits. Nature has a way of surprising us.

Does this mean that people should be having more unprotected sex? No. All of the usual arguments for and against unprotected sex still apply. This data does suggest however that unprotected sex with men can be beneficial to women as long as this occurs in an environment unlikely to result in exposure to sexually transmitted infections, such as a long-term monogamous relationship.

While the evidence supports reduced levels of depression in women having unprotected intercourse, those suffering from depression are recommended to seek appropriate medical care.

So is semen a love drug or a health food? Well perhaps it is a little of both. It is unfortunate that modern feminist ideology prevents the widespread acceptance of scientifically supported ideas. Research shows that semen has many positive qualities and women are the primary beneficiaries of this. As is so often the case feminism works here to the detriment of men and women alike.

References

1. ↑ https://www.psychologytoday.com/blog/all-about-sex/201101/attention-ladies-semen-is-antidepressant
2. ↑ http://www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/pubmed/9642455
3. ↑ http://link.springer.com/article/10.1023%2FA%3A1015257004839
4. ↑ https://www.psychologytoday.com/blog/all-about-sex/201101/attention-ladies-semen-is-antidepressant
5. ↑ http://www.nytimes.com/2011/04/18/health/18surgeon.html?_r=0
6. ↑ http://retractionwatch.com/2011/04/06/forget-chocolate-on-valentines-day-try-semen-says-surgery-news-editor-retraction-resignation-follow/
7. ↑ http://thedoctorweighsin.com/semen-causes-a-surgeon-to-lose-his-job/
8. ↑ http://www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/pubmed/566883
9. ↑ http://www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/pubmed/18567794
10. ↑ http://www.scientificamerican.com/article/oxytocin-love-hormone-keeps-people-apart/
11. ↑ http://www.natureworldnews.com/articles/9517/20141010/love-hormone-utterly-rules-female-sexual-attraction.htm
12. ↑ http://www.cell.com/cell/abstract/S0092-8674%2814%2901169-6
13. ↑ http://blogs.scientificamerican.com/bering-in-mind/2010/09/22/an-ode-to-the-many-evolved-virtues-of-human-semen/
14. ↑

http://www.slate.com/articles/health_and_science/science/2012/07/morning_sickness_can_more_sex_help_.html

15. ↑ http://www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/pubmed/10706945
16. ↑ http://evolution.binghamton.edu/evos/wp-content/uploads/2009/08/Gallup-2.pdf

Tampon Oppression

Andrew DiKaiomata · 17 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is also available in Romanian.

If feminism has taught us anything, it's that if you're a man, you are oppressing all women. Ever bought tampons for a woman? Well it doesn't matter, that was a trick question, either way you're oppressing all women. You see, tampons are a patriarchal tool that men have devised to get women to rape themselves. If a man buys tampons for a woman, he's fanning the flames of hatred and oppression against women.

However, if men don't buy women tampons and give them to women for free, they are oppressing them by infringing on their basic human rights to their basic health care needs. This oppression is clear proof of misogyny, hatred of women's bodies and oppression by a lack of caring for women's needs. Sanitary products are an undue financial burden on women, why should women be punished because of their basic needs? Men must pay taxes for a government tampon fund to buy tampons for women, anything else is proof of institutional misogyny, the world wide systematic hatred of every single woman.

It makes sense if you don't think about it. Yet, you've likely noticed something. The government tampon fund to give away free tampons to women, if we remember right, is a misogynous patriarchal conspiracy to oppress women. It's should be clear by now how devious men are, no matter what, men are absolutely determined to oppress women!

It brings us back to Hobby Lobby oppression. Hobby Lobby tried to not cover contraception for women for free, as required by the Affordable Care Act. Misogyny writ large! Fought hard for by feminist, it requires companies to provide free contraception and contraceptive surgery for women. And only women. Men were specifically excluded from the HSA contraception mandate. Tubal ligation, mandated , vasectomy, not mandated, the pill, mandated, condoms for men, not mandated. We can see how clearly misogynous our country is by siding with Hobby Lobby. Treating women like men, the lowest of the low? Equality is just another kind of misogyny.

These deep undercurrents of misogyny in the workplace go even deeper. There's a long debunked misogynous belief that women are unable to perform on the job the same as men, because of their menstrual cycles. This is rooted in the misogynous idea that women need to be coddled, and are unreliable workers when their on their period. Treating women differently in the workplace is wrong and proof of misogyny.

Yet, there's another deeply misogynous epidemic of employers refusing to provide menstrual leave to female employees. Feminists have established that cramps and migraines can make women unable to perform on the job the same as men, because of their menstrual cycles. The denial of this obvious fact is rooted in misogyny. The needs of women need to be accounted for and are often unable to function when on their period, the shouldn't be punished for that fact. We must provide paid menstrual leave for all women.

Yes. Another example of the patriarchy rearing it's ugly head. Treating women differently because of their period reveals men's disgusting hatred of all women, failing to account for women's periods also reveals men's hatred of all women. You may simply say there is no winning, and all possible scenarios will be taken as proof of misogyny. That mentality itself is proof of misogyny. Imagine if this problem were facing old white men, how fast it would be solved. Imagine if men ever faced workplace problems, the patriarchy would see it were solved instantly.

I hope this education of tampon oppression has been enlightening. If you've bought or not bought tampons for women, you hate every single woman on earth. If you treat women equally or not, you hate every single woman on earth. If you account for menstruating women or if you don't, you have every single woman on earth. #EndTamponOppression

An open letter to Dr. Tanveer Ahmed

Paul Elam · 17 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Dear Dr. Ahmed,

I just read about your being forced to step down from your position as an ambassador for the White Ribbon Australia Campaign. Pardon my being familiar, but I think we both know that you were pushed out of a feminist organization because you expressed concern for male victims of domestic violence; because male victims and female perpetrators are DOA issues for White Ribbon Australia because there is no money it it. That corruption is currently in full public view with you at the center of the story.

I want to make some respectful suggestions, as I live with the hope that your actions were not a one-off and that you want to have a positive impact of the domestic violence issue.

WhiteRibbon.org, not in any way affiliated with White Ribbon Australia, is run by Erin Pizzey, the founder of the women's shelter movement in 1971. You will find great research and opinion pieces there, including now, proudly, yours. And your work there finds a perfect home. WhiteRibbon.org features the cream of the crop of the many world renowned non-ideological researchers who provide accurate, helpful data on the subject.

There is a growing voice for sanity and science to return to the study of intimate partner violence. You are most certainly aware of how much work there is be done for that to happen. Sir, your voice is needed on this in ways that far outweigh the current hoopla. You are just being ostracized by a cabal of financially driven ideologues whose main line of work is to raise money for themselves. I am guessing at this point you know the truth of that.very well. Just as you know that the people who just threw you under the bus see you as a threat to their deceptive enterprise.

I encourage you to consider taking what you started and becoming an ongoing part of the solution. I would be happy to set up a formal introduction for you to Ms. Pizzey, as I can assure that she would like to speak with you.

There is a desperate need for researchers and academicians to openly reject this outrageous public bullying by people who ironically claim to be concerned about that very problem.

You have my sympathies for your mistreatment, but I also ask you to consider that this will continue to so many others unless important individuals such as yourself act with resolve and integrity to bring an end to the dogmatic ban on science in the domestic violence industry. That is why this letter is public rather than private. The problem you are going through requires a vocal resistance to overcome. There is literally no other way. If you are concerned about the indifference toward male victims, this is the only way your voice will be heard in a way that ultimately matters.

Otherwise, White Ribbon Australia will contine to profit from gagging non compliant academicians, and our future generations will pay for it.

Please contact me, paul@avoiceformen.com, and allow me to set up a proper introduction to Erin Pizzey.

Misogynist MGTOWs

AVfM Video Source · 18 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Aaron Clarey makes an important distinction between MGTOWs making a rational decision based on risk assessment and MGTOWs who just straight up hate women. Subscribe to his channel here.

Is my sexuality okay with you?

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 18 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I'm a sucker for gothic brunette locks of hair that look sapphire blue under a bright light. Mascara is nice, but only just enough to create contrast for a pair of veinless, white eyeballs peaked with irises colored a spine-freezing azure. I'm not crazy about lipstick, but a natural pink, supple cover for a glacier-melting smile is enough to make me evaporate into a cloud.

I don't follow Valerie Poxleitner, but her smile cures leukemia.

I could go on to describe my preferred proportions of jiggly torso protrusions, but I figure the standards of a twenty-something young man are understood. But considering what you can find on the Internet, my tastes are tame, if not predictably dull.

Hah! No, I'm lying. If my Google search history was discovered, a Hazmat team would quarantine my house and administer a Lysol enema with a fire hose. The introductory material in the digital Gentlemen's Club tends to bore after a while, but even today the shape of a woman excites me.

For some reason, my urges are taboo. I can't even so much as glance at a pin-up of Denise Milani without hearing the tired wails of the Objectification Brigade femsplaining why my feelings of attraction reduce women's humanity to that of a lubricated Shop Vac.

Look, it's obviously inappropriate to describe scat porn at a Starkist corporate luncheon, but when did it become uncouth for men to express their sexuality at all?

To call courtship a "minefield" is optimistic because no one gives men a minesweeper. It's more like making a colorblind Parkinson's victim try to defuse a bomb with a vibrator. The only reason the poor sap even tries is because part of him wants to believe the bomb might like him enough to explode into a heap of pussy. Or something like that. I'm bad at analogies.

When I was younger I had to learn to overcome the hurdle of expressing my interests to women I liked. Naturally, I had insecurities about rejection to outgrow. But today, it is not rejection I fear, it's the social consequences that could follow a rejection:

- I risk a false allegation of sexual assault that could put me in prison.
- I risk others initiating toxic rumors that can end friendships.
- I risk suffering vigilante action brought on by a woman's friends and family, if not the greater public.

I risk all of these things, even if I do nothing wrong and it is only the feelings of others that dictate I should be punished. Don't tell me I'm being paranoid, because a university professor told cops that I am a potential serial killer because I put up stickers saying men were human.

But I wonder how much the girl in this suspiciously not viral video risked for taking something a little too far with a guy?

(NOTE: This video is a PSA from http://www.familievold.dk/ meant to bring attention to the problem of violent women)

Regardless if this female rapist-in-training was punished, this was a vital time for people to set and respect boundaries. But a pervasive difference between men and women is that men risk far more even before they know what boundaries to respect! Men risk retaliation for approaching a boundary as if they crossed it, and the attitude indicating that risk is no better articulated by Phaedra Starling in Schrödinger's Rapist. You, a man, are a potential rapist, therefore you will be treated as such until you prove that you are not a threat. Never mind the sexism in that, just man up, right?

There is nothing wrong with me offering or requesting sex with any woman, and it is not embarrassing for me to express my desires since I respect boundaries anyway. It's not like I can't walk ten feet to talk to a second woman if the first shows no interest. The problem is that men can't make a move without risking way more than they should. A woman saying "no" before parting ways is not an excuse to report sexual assault and try to ruin a man's life.

The corn in this shit sundae is that men can't even discuss why this is a problem without hearing another lecture about how they are just frustrated virgins who can't get laid. How are we going to solve a problem if we cannot acknowledge that the problem even exists?

Double standards certainly do not help men express themselves sexually. There are campaigns dedicated to stopping guys in Deadpool suits from pinching boobs in the same world where underage boys are molested by female teachers. Doublethink certainly isn't limited to sexuality, either: When you hear lectures about how women's bodies are regulated by Congress from women without Selective Service cards, you learn why legless veterans who are still waiting for last year's VA check need to chew a handful of Excedrin every hour.

Everything about the feminist and social justice brigade hinges on controlling what is fun, and who gets to have fun. Like Kudzu, they slowly suffocate the life out of life. Social justice warriors barf their theories on magazines and tabletop games, because they are running out of things to complain about and need a portfolio of first world problems to look relevant. Beyond video games, movies, heavy metal and other things that make life worth tolerating, nothing is more subject to regulation by these control freaks than sex.

What is it about every major dogma and this need to control sex? From the Abrahamic religions of antiquity to opal rings and feminist "sex positivity," it seems only the most zealous nutcases develop this unhealthy need to force rules about how sex happens, if it does at all. These attitudes have led people to accept Dr. Corn Flakes advocating genital mutilation to stop masturbation, and to allow only men to wear the title of "harasser," "rapist," or worse, by speculation alone.

Feminists and friends introduce sexually repressive measures in a culture that is sexually expressive, because they really are that horrible. When women go to comic conventions with Double Black Diamond cleavage, men are not allowed to say that they enjoy the view without getting beaten half to death with a Costumes Are Not Consent placard.

To those who think I am just sexually frustrated, guilty as charged! It IS sexually frustrating to live in a cloud of unwritten rules that are as strong as law telling me how I can express my sexuality! It's one thing to look at some dude with a death wish flashing his junk at a feminist rally, but I'm talking about the everyday heterosexual men with perfectly natural urges and a natural desire to express them.

So if you all may indulge my inner 40 year old fedora virgin neckbearding in Mom's basement, I'd like to offer what is for some reason a rebellious statement from a straight male: I want sex, and there's nothing wrong with that. If you want to tell me that's looking at butts is wrong, then explain to homosexuals and other sexual identities why they are "wrong," because I'm only expressing preferences I was born with and cannot control.

If you are a woman, then I may want to have sex with you. Depending on your level of attractiveness, my fantasies about you may range from getting a work visa just to move a continent away, to exploding into the kind of rabid rated-X deep-dish fucking that causes respiratory failure and makes the fire department bring Jaws of Life and a crucifix.

Can you, as a woman, live with me having sexual urges about you at first sight? My urges are natural, and it is perfectly okay for me to want to get in your pants. If you do not reciprocate that interest, that's understandable and worthy of respect.

However, my urges are not my actions. I don't move to have sex on sight, because I only sleep with mature, stable, intelligent women whom I know and trust, and who feel the same in return. I prefer women who don't have chips on their shoulders, and who won't shame me or other men for feeling attracted to them. These women understand that pointing a finger and using their feelings to harm men who have done nothing wrong is both bigoted and unfair. No amount of police intervention and male shaming makes any man responsible for the bigotry of an insecure woman, no matter how attractive or popular she happens to be.

The question in the title of this article is rhetorical, but it's amazing that many men have a need to actually ask if their sexuality is allowed. My penis is worth exactly as much as a vagina in our "enlightened" egalitarian society, and if anyone finds that objectionable or amusing, then their opinions can go in my suggestion box.

I am a white able-bodied male cis-gender shitlord from Hell that will totally take a bundle of curves and smiles to bed for a night of sex and pizza.

And no one is going to stop me.

SPLC Tied to Mass Murderer?

Walter Romans (TDOM) · 18 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

On February 11, a middle-aged white man named Craig Stephen Hicks shot and killed three Muslims, one of them male. Police sources claim this was not part of an anti-Muslim conspiracy, but instead the result of a long-standing parking dispute between Hicks and the victims. But the victims' family disagrees.

According to news sources the father of the two women believes the murders to be a hate crime. And we should always believe the victims, shouldn't we? After all, being Muslim was not their fault. Nor was it their fault that Hicks is white, male, and a devout atheist. His expressed hatred of Christians, identification with atheism, support for the SPLC, and firm pro-abortion/anti-life stance suggest that he may also be a feminist and misandrist. His pro-abortion stance indicates a total lack of respect for life in general. But when combined with the feminist hatred of oppressive Muslim men, it becomes clear that his motives were hate-driven. Further supporting this is the fact that one of his victims was male. His support of the SPLC makes this an important factor in the shooting since the SPLC has taken a stance against men's rights and would consider male Muslims to be hateful oppressors of women. Thus it is quite likely that Hicks was motivated by the feminist, anti-life, misandrist views of the SPLC and its supporters.

Last month, the University of North Carolina cancelled a scheduled broadcast of a Muslim prayer service after the son of a prominent Christian evangelist objected to the broadcast. This helped raise the religious tension in the area and probably provided Hicks with the impetus to commit murder. Most certainly he did not want to be seen as hating Muslims less than Christians. What self-respecting atheist would?

"This level of hatred is not uncommon in the liberal community, especially among atheists and abortionists," stated a source who wished to remain anonymous because he feared reprisal. "It is likely that he only thought he was carrying out the wishes of the SPLC, given their expressed support of feminism and hatred of the men's rights movement. If not the SPLC, then Atheism+ since they are aggressively feminist and also hate religion, especially those religions seen to oppress women." Leading Atheists, like PZ Meyers or Rebecca Watson could easily have provided Hicks' inspiration.

The fact that the liberal news media has not turned this into a high profile media circus by making claims that all liberals must be anti-Muslim only supports this view since that is exactly how they treat those with even the most remote ties to views they oppose. For instance, Salon mentions Hicks' left wing politics, then does its best to paint him as an angry right-winger, even going so far as to interview Mark Potok of the SPLC in a thinly veiled attempt to divert attention away from the fact that Hicks may have been acting in accordance with that organization's left wing politics. Salon's article is particularly disgusting as it is nothing more than racist, anti-white male propaganda that continues to promote the ideals that led Hicks to commit mass murder, not to mention that it might piss off the angry white males Salon believes commit such murders. Salon merely wants to promote murder. It doesn't care who commits it (as long as its an angry white man) or why, and apparently cares even less about the victims.

Yes, Craig Stephen Hicks is a left wingnut. His pro-abortion/anti-life (and therefore feminist) stance demonstrates the low regard for life of the political left that enabled him to commit murder. His atheistic stance was all the justification necessary for him to target members of the hated Muslim community, especially males, who are seen as oppressing their wives. It is time for feminists to own up to their hatred and admit that their racist and sexist anti-white male rhetoric inspires and causes violence and that feminism is little more than a hate movement.

Of course as long as the targets are men, that isn't likely to happen.

Yes All Feminists Are Like That

Andrew DiKaiomata · 18 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

There are two kinds of feminists; The "Not All Feminists" and "No True Feminists." The "Not All Feminist" kind of feminism, when shown feminist bigotry against men, will immediately excuse feminist bigotry by saying "Not All Feminists Are Like That!" (NAFALT). The NAFALT style feminists are more likely new to feminism. NAFALT cedes the point that there hateful feminist bigots. What's more, it almost implies that the overwhelming majority of feminists are hateful bigots.

The "No True Feminist" will, with a fury of handwaving, dismiss your example of feminist bigotry as "Not a True Feminist". A "No True Feminist" will then tell you that you don't know about "True Feminism" and proceed to educate you that "True Feminism Is About Equality." The script continues, "…That's all that Feminism means, Equality. If you believe in equality, you're a feminist." The conflation of feminist bigotry with equality is the trademark of a "No True Feminist". The "No True Feminist" is ever oblivious to the fact that equality existed long before feminism and nearly everyone on the planet believes in equality.

This brings to mind the, "No True Scotsman" fallacy. It's an informal logical fallacy where, when someone makes a universal assertion like "No Scotsman puts sugar on his porridge.", and is countered with something like "But Scotty McGregor puts sugar in his porridge." The person making the universal claim will modify the subject of that universal assertion instead of rejecting it and say something like "Well no true scotsman puts sugar on his porridge." By doing this, they reject all the examples where the universal assertion does not hold up by creating a silly, separate ad hoc category. Yes, we must accept that there exist Scotsmen that put sugar on their porridge.

Rhetorically, the "No True Feminist" is at an advantage over the "Not All Feminist". To them, they've swept all those mean, hateful feminist bigots under the rug. As is quite common within feminism, they've redefined a word. Equality is now synonymous with feminism, and vice versa. Problem solved? Let's see. "True Feminist" is the new category created to mean feminists that aren't hateful bigots." Simply put, this category does not exist. If you're a feminist, you're like that.

We hear great words and sentiment. Who can be against equality, helping women, and even helping men? Yet, where are these true feminists? We look to the thought leaders within feminism. Gloria Steinem? A feminist bigot who suggests that wives ought to kill their husbands. Bell Hooks? A consistently hateful feminist bigot. Amanda Marcotte? A vitriolically anti-male feminist bigot, the "David Duke" of feminism. Andrea Dworkin? "That's a low blow" the feminist might say, "that hateful bigoted feminist leader was decades ago!" How many feminists know that the National Organization for Women has a memorial on their website for Andrea Dworkin, one of the most vitriolic, hateful, vile, bigoted people to ever live and it stands to this day. Now why would that be? A clear feminist bigot who most feminist want to hand have away, with a memorial that stands to this day? Simple, NOW thrives on her legacy of bigotry. All feminist are like that.

Feminism is an ideology. An ideology takes on a sort of life on it's own, you need to get a feel for the environment to assess it. If you've spent a day on tumblr or even facebook you've probably seen the memes "Kill All Men." Always hand waved away with "Oh, that's just a funny joke about killing you people! Get over it! Don't I have a right to an opinion?"

If you've had a feminist facebook friend, you've seen the memes mocking men, minimizing men's issues. and the constant obligatory joke about genitally mutilating or sexually torturing men. Jokes about inflicting violence on men's testes are their own genre. Genital mutilation is another constant source of feminist humor;"Men are animals that can't control their sex drive. What do we do with animals that can't control their sex drive? WE CASTRATE THEM!" It's pervasive, it's sickening, it's representative of feminism. All feminist are like that.

A feminist could easily say "Well, yes, the leaders are hateful feminist bigots, so is the larger ideology, but I'm not!" Let's explore that. Being a feminist entails a hatred of men. We can demonstrate that with the following example. Let's mention up the 60 million men who, because they were men, were forced to be slaves of war, drafted to their torturous deaths in WWII. The feminist, will without fail say "But it's men against men!" they've just let you know they are a male genocide apologist. A normal, empathetic, compassionate human being says "Oh my gosh 60 million human beings dead? That's horrible!" A feminist says, "But it's men against men!" Feminists will claim to believe men are human beings, yet try pointing out that human beings have rights and feminist will always protest men's rights. Feminists claim to support equal rights, but will always oppose men's rights. Why? Because feminism is like that.

Name a men's issue, feminists will try to explain to you why men deserve it. For heaven's sake, who else would drafted to war, but men? It could only be men dying by the tens of millions! If you're male, you may be required to register for the selective service to vote, to gain citizenship and certainly to get a government student loan. Yet, since you're a man that would be fighting a man in a similar position, according to a feminist bigot, you deserve it.

We see how 'True Feminists' ie not bigoted feminists, don't exist. Feminism entails bigotry. Feminism is an ideology of hate against men.

Yes, all feminist are like that.

The Rooshing of AVFM?

Paul Elam · 18 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

We currently have part one of an interview with RooshV done by Mumia Ali. I have already stumbled on “some internet guy” on Reddit having a cow over the article for allowing someone like Roosh a platform here – because Roosh has talked a lot of smack about MRAs. I personally don’t see a problem. He is a notable person in the world of modern men, and by the way I have taken more than a couple of shots at him myself. I figure it only appropriate and fair to let him have this temporary unabridged platform here. I am thankful to him and to Ali for making it happen.

It also gives me the opportunity to say again (minus the internet pissing match stuff) why I find so little merit in the concept of PUA and why I see little benefit in it for most men.

I will keep it short. The fact is that every problem I have ever had with women goes back to my gynocentric mistakes, the primary among them the abandonment of my values for the sake of sex and/or “acceptance.”

The minute I figured out that my problem was not having a set of personal values strongly enough held that no woman could make me budge from them was the same minute I found a path to attract women, cull out the trash without drama or expense and to maintain a relationship with no pussy passes or princess bullshit. It is not that I never have to deal with that stuff from time to time, but I never, ever let it slide. My dick has not been the worse for it.

When I got to the point that I could look at woman in the eye and tell her I was not interested in being anyone’s knight in shining armor and that dinner with me meant finding your purse when the check came — and not give a single fuck about the women who could not handle it — I cleared the way for one who could.

All of these are values choices. They all reflect how I see myself, what I think is right or wrong for me, what I want and don’t want. All it takes is having the resolve to live that way even if it makes kittens bleed.

I still think shows, pretending to be something you are not in order boost your “effectiveness” with women is just a hair-brained alternative to the more sensible and simpler path of owning your life and your standards without compromise. No acting required. No gamesmanship. No trying to pass shit tests while pretending you are not selling yourself out. Just a strong rudder on your morality ship, with a skipper that acts like one.

That attracts women, too, btw.

Roosh apparently says he moved overseas to have sex with a better class of women. It seems strange to me, this apparently powerful force to change women called geography. With all respect to Roosh, it is a lot more about what you attract than in where you live.

That is not to say that what people like Roosh have to say is not at all useful. I think a lot of the knowledge of the female psychology found in PUA circles is very sound. And I have heard a fair amount of talk about “Inner Game” which would be much more complimentary to what I am writing here. But that is hardly a visible entity in the PUA community so far. If Inner Game is actually a thing, some better efforts to market it would be helpful.

As far as helping men, it is my experience that men who develop a strong sense of self by drawing lines in the sand about what they will and won’t accept from women, and from themselves, usually don’t need it. They are doing just fine.

Joss Whedon, MGTOW, and 10 years of "Serenity"

August Løvenskiolds · 19 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

One of my favorite films is coming up on the 10th anniversary of its release: the Joss Whedon film Serenity, the big screen adaptation of the short-lived Fox television series "Firefly".

Oh, whom am I kidding. I love Serenity. It is my favorite film. I've watched it so much I know the dialogue by heart.

Whedon's star has waxed and waned since his TV series "Buffy the Vampire Slayer" but it went nuclear flash bright with 2012's blockbuster The Avengers, which became the highest grossing film of 2012 and 3rd highest all time. Only Avatar and Titanic earned more. Serenity was so-so at the box office, falling a bit short of earning its estimated budget. Nevertheless, IMDB rates Serenity at 8.0 out of 10, compared to The Avengers score of 8.2 out of 10.

Whedon, of course, is controversial in Men's Human Rights and MGTOW circles for his claims that he is a feminist. Of course, modern feminism is an incoherent bag of mushy, overripe fish heads demanding everything contradictory on the planet, from "I want freedom" to "I want protection", which means that, as long as you are not a jump-out-of-the-bushes rapist, you can claim to be feminist and get away with it. If, of course, you are any woman or a wealthy and powerful man like Whedon.

It is ironic, then, that Whedon made one of the most MGTOW-themed movies ever: Serenity.

Warning: spoilers ahead.

While Serenity is the name of the spaceship, the movie is both a space opera and a western: humanity has abandoned Earth for a new planetary system ("The Verse") with dozens of habitable planets and moons (the movie suggests there are 30 worlds at one point). The movie has not one but two spectacular opening sequences: first, a series of nested flashbacks sets out the backstory. Second, the opening credits roll during a single, amazing 4 minute 28 second tracking shot: a lone steadycam follows Captain Mal (Capt. Malcolm Reynolds, played by Nathan Fillion) as he walks through the ship and interacts with all his crewmates in a single, unbroken take. For a film junkie like me, watching the craftsmanship of this one shot alone is more satisfying than watching the nuke go off in The Avengers.

Like almost all the male characters in the movie, Mal is a MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way). The central Alliance (read: feminists) are extending their political and technological hegemony over the more rustic, "wild west" worlds in the system. Mal is an unmarried former rebel soldier once opposed to Alliance domination who now lives as a smuggler, pirate, thief and/or hired gunman on the shrinking frontier. At one point he even says: "I don't look [to fight the Alliance], I just want to go my way."

Joining Mal is Jayne (played by now Gamergate hero Adam Baldwin), a very un-PC mercenary who is fond of prostitutes but avoids relationships, as does Shepherd Derrial Book (played by Ron Glass) an older religious man more interested in building spiritual communities than chasing skirt.

The other male shipmates are also arguably MGTOW but to a lesser degree. Dr. Simon Tam (Sean Maher) left his lucrative practice to rescue his sister River from feminist experiments designed to turn her into a living weapon. The pilot of the ship, Wash (Alan Tudyk), is married to second-in-command Zoe, but as a childless pair in the outlaw lands, their marriage is quite different from the state-sponsored slavery for men that is today's marriage.

Perhaps the most interesting character is the "bad guy," an Alliance agent known simply as "The Operative," played by Chiwetel Ejiofor. The Operative is a calm, brutal killer committed to doing the dirty jobs of the Alliance but he knows he is a monster who ultimately has no real place in the peaceful, regimented society the Alliance is building. This marks him as what we now would call "purple pill": he can see the growing evil of civil society but he reluctantly remains committed to following the orders of that evil.

During the course of the film and as the evils of the Alliance are revealed, The Operative transforms from purple to red pill: in the last scenes he states that “I think [the Alliance] knows I am no longer their man.” Boom, a clear red pill moment, brought to you by the alleged feminist Whedon. The Operative even promises he will disappear from society: “there is nothing left to see”.

The women characters are extraordinary in unique ways but they all are defined by their relationships with men – kind of no-no in the feminist world of today. Kaylee, the intuitively brilliant engineer (Jewel Staite) is backwoods girlish-next-door pretty but lovelorn, her crush on the distracted Dr. Tam unrequited. As Second-in-command, Zoe (Gina Torres), married to Wash, banters with the captain and crew in a comfortable way no feminist would ever stomach. Inara (Morena Baccarin) is a courtesan (high-class prostitute and madam) in a fraught non-relationship with Mal. And, of course, the android love-bot Lenore (Nectar Rose, who also appeared in Independence Day with Baldwin) has liberated Mr. Universe (David Krumholtz) from the dangers of feminist-dictated pair-bonding.

But the woman who steals the show is River Tam. Oh My God, River Tam.

River (played by Summer Glau, more ballerina than actress) is a physical force. As a result of feminist experiments, she is a 90-pound living weapon. She can maul a bar full of customers without breaking a sweat, and her psychic powers allow her to dodge all incoming assaults. She has been trained to believe no weapon in the universe can stop her. Only her brother Simon Tam knows the safe word that causes her to stand down and fall asleep. The “word” is supposedly a Russian phrase: Это курам на смех, pronounced “Eta kooram nah smech”, which translates literally as “that’s laughing for chickens” according to this, and idiomatically as “this is ridiculous”.

The ballerina roots of actress Glau are on full display. Just watching her saunter about is a revelation of how all walking should be. This is more than grace and more than deliberateness. It is command.

But River Tam’s mind has been shattered by both the abusive feminist conditioning she received and a dark secret she learned when she accidentally read the mind of a touring Alliance bigwig.

The secret: the Alliance deliberately doped, and thereby accidentally poisoned one of their planets named “Miranda”. And the enormity of this secret is destroying River’s brain.

In an effort to feminize and pacify the population, the Alliance terraformers introduced an experimental social engineering chemical called G-23 Paxilon Hydrochlorate, or “Pax”. The resulting “peace” killed 30 million people and the few survivors became monstrous:

> G-23 Paxilon Hydrochlorate or “Pax” (Latin for “Peace”) was a chemical compound added to the air processors in order to pacify the populace, by the Union of Allied Planets. An Alliance research team on Miranda discovered that the Pax was effective with 99.9% of people. It was such an effective means of pacifying that the people stopped doing anything, they simply waited for death. However, a tenth of a percent of the population had the opposite reaction. They became highly aggressive, committing unspeakable acts including cannibalism, rape and self-mutilation. These people would come to be known as Reavers. (emphasis added)

The Reavers are a slightly more vicious feminist view of average men: dangerous rapists. Whedon shows the beginning of a reaver-rape of a woman in one early scene, and Mal murders a man also about to be raped and eaten in another. Yet another scene ends with the screams of a female scientist being savaged. Depictions of rape are so triggering to feminists it is hard to imagine feminists giving Whedon a pass on these.

The Operative’s mission is to kill River Tam to protect the secret she learned, a secret which could destabilize the ruling feminist regime if it became known. Once Mal and the crew tease out the secret, they know their only hope of surviving the feminist Alliance’s efforts to silence them is to somehow broadcast the story, Wikileaks style, across the Verse. Noteworthy: Wikileaks officially launched in 2007, two years after the movie Serenity was released.

In the blockbuster The Avengers the male superheros & villains reflect this same semi-MGTOW style that Whedon put on display in 7 years earlier in Serenity. (Whedon rewrote the story once he took over as director of The Avengers).

Iron Man has no interest in settling down (until he is somewhat tamed by Pepper Potts). Thor (still male in this movie) has a forgotten human love interest who makes no appearance. Loki and The Hulk eschew women. Captain America, who was frozen for 70 years, has no interest in modern feminist women. Hawkeye's friendship with Black Widow has no benefits other than his deciding not to kill her.

For an alleged feminist, Joss Whedon seems to favor MGTOW characters a lot and ignore the storytelling guidance of feminists. But don't worry, Joss. I'll keep your secret. I promise.

Bang: The Definitive Interview With RooshV (Part Two)

Mumia Ali · 19 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

> "We must, indeed, all hang together, or assuredly we shall all hang separately."
>
> -Benjamin Franklin

In Part One of my interview with RooshV, we discussed his origins and his early days in the pickup scene, his experiences overseas, his thoughts on Game/Pickup, American and foreign women, and lastly, Feminism. In today's second and final installment of my interview with him, we move from the personal to the decidedly political, with Roosh giving his thoughts on Social Justice Warriors, the Manosphere in general and the MRA and MGTOW ends of it more specifically, what he sees as the future of the entire ball of wax, and gives his take on some of the biggest news stories of the past few months or so. Stay tuned for some "postscript" concluding thoughts by yours truly after the whole thing ends.

QUESTION: That brings me to a piece you wrote last year that, in my view, was perhaps the single best essay ever written addressing the darkside of what some have referred to as "Social Justice Warriors"; the previous year seems to have seen them experiencing a number of faux pas and setbacks – the UVA/Rolling Stone scandal is a case in point, among other things. You suggested that not only were the SJW crowd seemingly hell-bent on doing away with norms and traditions that have been the cornerstone of Western civilization, but you took it a step further in suggesting that what motivates SJWs is a complex of deeply personal demons. Could you elaborate a bit on these points?

ROOSHV: Social Justice Warriors are the more militant wing of feminism and liberalism, though lately it's becoming hard to tell the two apart since their beliefs share a huge overlap. They represent the progressive movement's step-wise evolution to extremism as a result of continuous victories over the past few decades, and so they have decided to punish a broader range of normal male or masculine behavior as sexist, "cisgendered," or whatever made-up word they are fond of using at the moment.

I'm not too worried about them going into 2015 because the mainstream is quickly finding out they are genuinely mentally ill, emotionally unstable, or just outright insane. They did well when they were a bit more moderate in their equality demands, but gamergate has revealed their true aim of female superiority at all costs based on a program of emotions and feelings instead of reason and facts. Gamergate has gone so poorly for them in terms of public relations that you'll see less people voluntarily label themselves as a "social justice warrior"–it is becoming more of a dirty word than even "liberal."

I predict that within a year or two they will burrow themselves deeply on Tumblr while dying off from a vitamin D deficiency due to lack of sunlight.

Q: OK, let's get to the really good stuff. Over the past few years, you've said some pretty harsh things about what some have referred to as the Manosphere, and a particular subset of it known as the Men's Rights Movement. Among other things, and I'm quoting you directly here, you said:

> "Last time I checked, the government is not forcing me to interact with American girls. They are not forcing me to live in Washington DC. I can improve my station any way I want. The reason is because I'm from the motherfucking United States of America. If I can't figure out how to improve my appearance, learn some game, make some money from an internet side business, travel abroad to fuck women, and find happiness in the world, then no one can. I don't need the American government to look after my interests, because I can chase after my own. Instead of listening to Paul Elam tell me that men are getting fucked, I will step out of the house and find a girl who wants to get fucked by me."

The Men's Rights Movement Is Dead

> "At its peak, the non-MRA portion of the manosphere excelled at teaching men how to get laid while laying down Chris Brown-style pimp slaps on feminists. It was great: guys were simultaneously sharing important knowledge and making the world a better place. I've happily met over 200 of my readers by now, but I wouldn't dare meet a lot of these fat old dudes who are the fastest growing segment of the manosphere today. It's one thing to complain about having to work hard to improve your station, but it's another thing to complain while hoping to bang a female manosphere commenter who is a 4 on her best day. The worst part of it is that guys are drooling over old manosphere women who are already married. I don't associate with these people in real life, so why would I do so online?
>
> Don't read the writings of men who don't get laid. If a man can't solve the challenge of getting his dick wet, he's a poseur and internet warrior. He's a bloviator, a troll. Don't read the writings of men who don't know how to walk up to a woman and start a conversation. Don't read the writings of men who lavish attention on female commenters, because if he was getting laid in real life, he wouldn't even notice them. Game is an obligatory pursuit for the Western man in 2013, and if he is not pursuing it, he's not someone worth listening to. He's weak and scared. He needs to talk to women instead of spending hours a day nurturing his beloved manosphere personality. His world view, contaminated by a lack of female intimacy, will lead you down the wrong path. These fools have tainted a community of men that exclusively stood for getting laid and spreading truth, but now rushes to pardon obvious fakes like Minter."

The Manosphere Is Lost

> "What strikes me in manosphere criticisms is the shock that our ideas are actually being accepted by men. I see many comments that go along the lines of "I don't believe this part of the web exists!" and "Why are people following this?!"
>
> It's very simple: we provide answers for men. We help them get laid. We help them make money. We help them with travel. We help them enter relationships with feminine women. We help them lift heavy weight, become healthier, and improve their appearance. We help them navigate a rapidly changing world where men are being pushed aside."

The Manosphere Is Approaching A Tipping Point

Now, I gotta tell you Roosh, these are some pretty pointed remarks by you – and, there does seem to be a running "beef" between the MRA/MGTOW end of the Manosphere, and the more PUA end of it. What do you say about this apparent schism, why does it exist, and do you see a coming to terms, or even a uniting of forces among the major factions? Also, with regard to your own remarks as per above, could you elaborate a bit as to why you said what you did?

R: I think I can count on my hands how many times I've publicly criticized men's rights in the past five years. That said, my main issue with men's rights is that it's too dependent on pleasing and convincing the existing power structure and brainwashed masses, instead of giving awakened men the tools today to make a positive difference in their lives when it comes to women, financial success, health, and happiness.

At the same time, I do see their point that individual strategies have limitations in environments that become increasingly hostile to men. For example, I'm in Poland where they just passed their own version of the Violence Against Women Act. This means that even if I find the sweetest, most feminine girl here thanks to my game efforts, I'm taking a big risk in marrying her because the state may choose to interfere in our relationship and lock me up for a false domestic violence allegation.

I've come to the conclusion that we need both individual strategies and mass activism to help men. A strategy of only game is temporary if feminists continue to implement anti-male laws that criminalize game or masculine behaviors, and a strategy of only activism won't aid men much if men don't have the social skills to meet and connect with women or have the confidence and knowledge to take risks that improve their lives.

While men's rights and game/red pill should keep each other honest, I also don't think it makes much sense to actively battle with each other. Even if I don't agree with everything men's rights is doing, their victories will ultimately help men, and so therefore I hope they do succeed with their goals. At the same time, they should accept that game does work and has allowed scores of men achieve the intimacy and relationships they desire.

Q: Yea, I've always felt that if the entire Manosphere formed up like Voltron, we could really make some things happen, instead of quibbling over stuff that at the end of the day, really isn't all that important. Let me ask you about your take on the MGTOW wing of the Manosphere – they seem to be a number of men who are kind of doing a "civil disobedience" kind of thing by dropping out of society – going off the grid to varying degrees, and disengaging with women. There was a big writeup about it recently called the Sexodus; and there was a book written about too, called "Men on Strike." What are your thoughts about this aspect of the Manosphere? Do you think the MGTOW movement will wind up making a big impact or will they be inconsequential in the overall scheme of things?

R: MGTOWs take the red pill, rightly realize that modern life is getting harder for men, and then… quit. In the one life that we all get, they have decided that the best way to spend it is to let time pass them by, be spectators as if watching a sporting match, and not even try to work for the pleasures that it still has on offer. Their laziness is not admirable and not deserving of respect from men who do work hard at trying to game the system (or fight it) to squeeze whatever drops of happiness on this earth are left for men. I highly suspect that their lack of drive or motivation could be related to depression or other hormonal problems.

Since their "movement' requires absolutely no effort or activism, it will undoubtedly grow by leaps and bounds as it perfectly speaks to the millennial generation of men who have low work ethic along with an entitled attitude that the benefits of existence should be served to them on a platter for merely breathing, just like their millennial female counterparts.

On the bright side, at least, is that they are so passive and meek that they don't bother anyone. I think these low ambition and low testosterone men, who are like Japanese herbivores in their disturbing lack of interest in sex, should be left alone, though I won't allow their game denialism and poisonous laziness to infect the sites I operate.

Q: I see. Let me ask you about another very well known, and controversial, concept: the "Red Pill." There have been several attempts toward explaining what this metaphor is, by both sides of the pro/con debate on the Manosphere; but, as arguably one of its best known denizens, could you please explain what you think this term means, and why it's so very important in the worldview of so many Manospherians?

R: If you want to start a fight in the manopshere, a good way is to offer up a definition of the red pill. That said, my own definition wouldn't be far from its original usage in describing the search for truth, no matter how politically incorrect, but I understand that it has now come to mean "anti-narrative" in that it is opposed to the bizarre stories spun in the mainstream that inaccurately describe gender relations, culture, race, politics, religion, and so on. The red pill is the hard, bitter, and "offensive" truth of our reality.

Q: As I'm sure you know, some truly horrible events have gone down in Paris earlier this week, and I wanted to get your reaction to it, along the following lines:

We know from criminological study, that mass murderers, terrorists, serial killers and the like, often – not always (the BTK killer comes to mind as an exception) – but often, tend to be guys who are loners, with nonexistent romantic/sexual lives with women. I haven't looked into it yet, but if history along these lines is anything to go by, five gets us ten that the terrorists in France would fit this profile as well. If I am indeed correct, could you please speak to this, and what it means for the world at large along sexual politics lines?

R: I can't speak for Islamist extremists, but Western extremists who have gone on murderous rampages never had steady girlfriends or much sexual experience (I challenge anyone to bring forth more than one case where a mass murderer left behind a nurturing and pretty girlfriend). The media is not allowed to point out that their sexual failures as nice guys contributed to putting them in a state of despair that pushed them in murder. I explained this in the Elliot Rodger case and was quickly attacked by Raw Story, who accused me of blaming women for these rampages.

Women can have sex with whoever they want (and they do), but if you want to know why some Western men lose all hope in life, look no further than those women passing them by for bad boys who make them sexually excited. The media does a good job lamenting for victims, but not when identifying root causes of modern problems.

Q: I'm not sure if you're following the Bill Cosby situation here in the States, but toward the end of last year something like two dozen women, mostly white I would add, came out with allegations that he sexually assaulted them using drugs and drink as his method. Both his real-life wife and tv-show wife from "The Cosby Show" have come out in defense of his reputation, but the ordeal has taken its toll on Cosby; last year he resigned his board position from Temple U here in Philly, and his tour up in Canada has been met with hecklers and protesters. Thus far, no prosecutor has brought any legal charges against Cosby. What do you make of these developments from your unique perspective of someone who observes sociosexual relations between men and women in our time? Some, and this includes Cosby's wife, Mrs. Camille Cosby, have likened what happened to Cosby, to the recent UVA/Rolling Stone "college campus gangrape" scandal – and this is an extra-judicial attempt to tar and feather a Black man, bypassing the court system in the process. Do you agree or disagree or not, and why?

R: It's suspect that Cosby has been accused of crimes many decades after the fact without a scrap of evidence. Why should we take a woman's word for it when they have falsely accused so many men of rape in the past? Until I see some type of evidence that Cosby did rape these women, or he confesses to the crime, I don't believe the accusations.

The harsh treatment Cosby is now getting stems from the fact that our culture believes women are infallible creatures who would never lie for personal gain. Men in the manopshere know better. The two most logical reasons for why these women are now coming forward is either to revive some type of declining career or to get a payout. It's definitely not to take a rapist off the streets; otherwise they would have gone to the police the night after they were supposedly raped.

If Cosby really is a rapist then the women who are accusing him now absolutely did not care about leaving a horrible rapist on the loose for decades by not filing a police report. In that case, maybe they hate women more than Cosby does.

Q: We're winding it down now, so let's discuss a bit about your views for the future, first with you, and secondarily with the Manosphere at large. So, with more than a dozen self-published and highly popular books under your belt, a string of successful websites, one of them a media site in its own right, and you having covered virtually all of Europe and a goodly portion of Latin America, what's next for Roosh? What's he doing, say, five years from now? What will be different then, from today in early 2015?

R: I've accomplished all the major goals I set out to do in my mid 20's when it comes to travel, writing, women, and lifestyle, so there is no longer a burning desire within me that strives for something more. Instead, I've entered a sort of maintenance mode where I want to keep my gains while incrementally improving on my existing projects and habits. I am content with a normal day-to-day existence in spite of it having a small number of new adventures and achievements.

It's impossible for me to imagine my life in 5 years, but I'd be surprised if I wasn't still writing and living outside the United States. I do wonder how my relationships with women will change since in the past 5 years I've gone from the hyper-promiscuity of notch and flag hunting to finding more value and meaning in semi-stable relationships. I don't believe in the institution of marriage, but having a kid wouldn't be a nightmare scenario like before.

Q: You've made a number of very interesting predictions for the Manosphere over the past few years, and I think it is fair to say that what you have foreseen has been borne out by real world events. As we begin 2015 coming off a highly eventful year on the sexual politics and gender war fronts, I want to ask you: where does the Manosphere go from here? Do you see the Men's Rights Movement continuing to make headway in the media and political spheres, despite what appears to be a coordinated attack these days by the latter, culminating in a very personal and nasty piece ran by Buzzfeed about A Voice For Men founder, Paul Elam? Do you think that more such "drive-by pieces" by the media are in the offing for other "luminaries" of the Manosphere? Do you see the varying factions of the Manosphere joining forces and doing some kind of wider advocacy for Men's Issues? Will Game & Pickup be banned or otherwise made illegal? What's your view of the future – say, within the next five years?

R: I think we're going to simultaneously see advancement and defeat for the manosphere in dozens of small battles over the next five years, but there will be no death blow as long as we stand strong. By this I mean that all spheres (MRA, red pill/game, MGTOW) will continue to increase their readership by large numbers while at the same time they are put under heavy pressure by the cultural elite, who will categorize their activism or beliefs as illegal. We're already seeing this with some parts of game whereby approaching women during the day is now "street harassment" and being persistent in the bedroom is "rape." While our bullhorn is large, we have little to no power to stop the mainstream's efforts to portray us as the most horrible men in the world.

The Buzzfeed hit piece on Paul is a good example of their lack of integrity and ethics. They crafted the end result they wanted before a single word was written and then used hook and crook to get it. On one hand, such a piece will help A Voice For Men get additional readers, but on the other it brainwashed an even greater number against the usefulness of men's rights ideas. Now many men who could have been helped by AVFM believe that it is evil. Just the other day there was a prominent suicide by a man who was depressed because he had been unable to have sex with a woman. My guess is that at some point he came across an article bashing game, and so didn't even consider its usefulness. The narrative trumps men's lives, a fact that shouldn't surprise a single MRA.

The best thing we can do is to simply survive. Paul must continue his work in the face of a hostile mainstream that may result in violence and I must continue operating Return Of Kings and teaching men how to enter relationships with women. At this point in the game it matters less that we have a huge impact than not allowing ourselves to be silenced while continuing to provide a platform for men who are tossed aside because they don't believe in their own emasculation.

One remaining question is if we can gain power and influence faster than our enemy. My instinct tells me that simply can't happen, and only a societal decline or frightening collapse will wake up the masses. Society is on such a self-destructive track that it's possible we can win just by hanging in there and letting our enemies eat themselves. By then, however, there won't be much to do but stare at a pile of ashes and for us to say, "Told you so."

MUMIA ALI: Roosh, I want to thank you so much for taking the time out of what must be a pretty busy schedule to have a virtual sitdown and chat with me and the AVFM audience; here's hoping they enjoyed it as much as I have. Much appreciated, and here's to your continued success. Salute, bro!

ROOSHV: Thanks for the interview and also for the good questions. You brought out a lot of things in my mind that I hadn't had the chance to share yet.

Roosh

POSTSCRIPT:

I want to thank everyone out there for taking the time out to read this interview, and I want to especially thank the powers that be, and Mr. Paul Elam and Mr. Dean Esmay (the latter of whom is my unofficial editor and "conscience") for giving me the green light for this project. In light of all the activity this interview has generated in as many days, I think a few concluding thoughts are in order.

First, the obvious question: Why Roosh, and why here? Well, the short and simple answer to both is because, it is hard to think up anyone else on the Manosphere scene who is as compelling a figure as him. To be sure, our own Paul Elam is most definitely a force to be reckoned with – just look at the flurry of MSM attention and focus he's garnered, and the month ain't even over yet – but there is a huge difference between the two men that, in my view, makes the difference between one being a hella interview subject, and the other, to be frank, not.

Roosh is an open book in the way that Paul, by his own stated wishes, is not. Sure, Paul could expound on the issues pertinent to men in our time, and they ARE important – but let's be honest here. Interviews are interesting because they tell us something about the inner life and motivations, that forces and contours that shape the interview subject. Roosh is very forthcoming in this regard, while Paul has made it abundantly clear that certain aspects of his life are off limits to public examination. In that I regard a person's private life as sacrosanct, and would never even think of doing what Buzzfeed's Adam Serwer and Katie J.M. Baker did to Paul, to me there would really be no interview to be had. And while one could argue that there are many other notable figures out there on the Manosphere landscape, many of those same people tend to fly under pseudonyms and the like – a clear signal that they don't particularly wish to go balls-out in the manner that Roosh has been all-too-eager to do with me.

Another reason why I wanted to do this interview with Roosh was because I simply got tired of the MSM doing hatchet jobs on the guy. That, for the umpteenth time, doesn't mean that I'm in agreement with everything he says, writes or does, but it does mean that I want the guy to get a fair shake, and it was becoming abundantly clear to me that he wasn't gonna get it from the Cathedral Media. Since I very much consider AVfM to be a media force in its own right, I decided to take a leap of faith that I could do just as good a job, if not better, in interviewing one of the biggest and best known names in the Manosphere, as any mainstream journalist. I wanted to humanize Roosh – not whitewash or sanitize him – but rather to offer much needed nuance to both him and his writings. I mean look, let's face it – is anyone out there cool with some of their more heated moments being broadcast to the world as a sum-total representation of who they are as a person? We've all been there, present company included, and I would like to think that such outbursts form only a sliver of who we are in our totality.

Since Part One of my interview with Roosh ran, Paul Elam himself has deigned to enter the fray, and in so doing, has presented quite a contrast with Roosh – a marked generational divide here, as Paul is literally old enough to be Roosh's dad – and that, among a great many other things, only adds to the many layers and textures of the Manosphere that I've come to know and love over the past five years of my life, warts and all. Indeed, that Roosh and Paul exist in the same space, and were in a very real sense, brought together by a Black man, only goes to show the world that far from the hype, the Manosphere is a variegated place, with as many points of view and areas of specialty and interest, as there are differing types of men (and women!) themselves. Never again can those who our critics say, that the Manosphere is "all this" or "all that"; we are much more complex than that.

One of the big points of contention that was broached in the wake of Part One of this interview, was in the very idea of Game & Pickup being a viable option for mating for men in our time. Quite a few of its detractors, held up more traditional modes of mating, and made it a point to highlight the desire for sharing, intimacy and yes, even abiding love with a special someone out there. We can quibble over the left and right of things until the cows come home, but here again this is a clear and present proof that, not only is there a great degree of heterodox views on the topic of mating, but that a significant portion of the Manosphere highly values relationships and takes it very, very seriously – a direct refutation of the notion by our interlocutors, that the Manosphere is shot through with knuckle-dragging misogynists.

But I guess, at the end of the day, the reason why I wanted to do this interview, was because I wanted to make people – friend and foe alike – think. To really take a step back, put down their preconceived notions and misconceptions, and just consider what is actually being said. And even if they came away still disagreeing with Roosh, the Manosphere, AVfM, Paul Elam, heck, even yours truly – that they couldn't say with a straight face that there weren't some highly legitimate points being made. If indeed people came away with that idea, I will have done my job.

TL;DR: Not all Manospherians are like that.

Thanks for reading.

Mumia Ali, aka Obsidian
Feb 19, 2015

White Ribbon Australia's ethical dilemma

John Stuart Mill · 19 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

White Ribbon Australia has suspended Tanveer Ahmed as a White Ribbon Ambassador and requested that he step down. In a statement from the CEO, Libby Davies, it was made quite clear that White Ribbon Australia doesn't support the views of Dr Ahmed. As to what these views are, the main criticisms of Dr Ahmed's opinion piece in The Australian revolved around what feminist commentator Clementine Ford claimed was a frankly dangerous argument. The thing is however, there is a vast amount of international research that supports Dr Ahmed's position.

The frankly dangerous argument that Clementine Ford is in opposition to is, simply put, that in order to address issues of gender inequality and violence against women, we need to address inequalities faced by both women and men. This is what she wrote in her article.[1]

Writing on the issue of men's violence against women (although notably shying away from the specificity of that term), Ahmed launches a frankly dangerous argument regarding causal links between violence against women and men's social and cultural "disempowerment". Ahmed, a psychiatrist who was once exposed on Media Watch for repeated offences of plagiarism, warns against focusing on the impact of gender inequality on women alone, referring to the disempowerment and displacement of men whose industries are giving way to "casualised, service-oriented work with relatively low wages".

According to Ahmed, the "feminisation" of men previously used to the security of unionised labour is a delicate issue that needs to be taken into account when addressing violence against women. Further, "family violence within newly arrived ethnic groups is often related to the sudden dilution of traditional masculinity, leaving men lost and isolated, particularly as females enjoy greater autonomy and expectations."[2]

She also takes issue with very idea that some violence against women could be caused by the marginalisation or disempowerment of men. Unfortunately for both Clementine Ford and White Ribbon Australia, there is a substantial body of both Australian and international research that supports the claims that Tanveer Ahmed makes.

The claims are supported in the findings of the United Nations Multi-country Study on Men and Violence in Asia and the Pacific.[3]

The case study from China in box 5.3 provides a life history narrative on how men's work-related stress and perceived disempowerment within their career trajectory can manifest in men's display of power in other spaces in their lives. Li Ma's narrative reveals the complex interplay between feelings of inadequacy and powerlessness alongside his gendered attitude of women's and men's roles in society. [3 p.65]

From the given case study, Li Ma is unhappy, stressed at work and feels that he works in a feminised career. As a result he has a low life satisfaction manifested in his feelings of inadequacy and powerlessness.

> Li Ma is a male nurse working in Beijing. Li Ma was a mediocre student during his early education. Although he wanted to be class monitor, his low grades prevented him from being elected, despite his efforts to improve his work. When he failed to test into high school, his older sister (a nurse also) urged him to study psychiatric nursing at medical school instead. During those studies, he envisioned his future career as easy, with relatively good pay. He began working as a psychiatric nurse in 2010, and he finds now that he is overworked, stressed and underpaid. He speaks at length about his unhappiness with his current job, but he does not want to change jobs because he does not imagine he is suitable for another profession. He believes he would not be good at other types of work because he was specifically trained as a nurse.
>
> Li Ma seems to have an inferiority complex about his profession. He believes that because there are few male nurses, society looks down on people like him. This contributes to his job dissatisfaction. Li Ma also seems to make up for his perceived disempowerment as a male nurse by emphasizing his superiority over women. Although he says that he supports gender equality and that women are equally capable as men, he believes that > men should be the main breadwinners and handle external matters while women should be in charge of the household. He believes that 'real men' should be mature, calm, not afraid and should be able to make their loved ones feel safe, which suggests that he finds affirmation of his masculinity within the relationship space. [3 p.67]

The study also finds that gender roles related to being a provider, work-related stress, food insecurity, low levels of education, and unemployment lead to a higher prevalence of depression in men affected by these factors.

> The findings on work-related stress suggests that given the prevailing socially expected role of men as providers, work stress reveals more about men's life experiences than simply asking about income or employment status (Barker et al., 2011). The fact that men who have current food insecurity, low levels of education, high levels of work stress, are unemployed or have sex with men are more likely to suffer from depression indicates that specific groups of men, particularly those who are economically and socially marginalized, face specific gendered health risks (WHO, 2007). [3 p.67]

And in examining causal factors for violence against women, men with depression or who have a low life satisfaction are more likely to perpetrate violence against their partners.

> Depression was found to be a significant factor associated with partner violence perpetration in four countries (Bangladesh, Cambodia, China and Indonesia), and low life satisfaction in three countries (Bangladesh, Indonesia and Sri Lanka). Men who had current alcohol abuse problems were more likely to have perpetrated partner violence in Cambodia and China. [3 p.72]

Looking closer to home, similar claims are also made in the stakeholder report from the Australian 2013 National Community Attitudes Towards Violence Against Women Survey. The findings show that attitudes that are supportive of violence towards women increase the longer migrants have been in the country, this is posited to be a result of women exerting greater freedoms and men attempting to regain control over them through violence.

> Changes over time are most likely to be due to a backlash from some men as women assert greater freedoms in Australia and other countries of migrant and refugee settlement (Fisher 2009; Pittaway 2004; Rees & Pease 2007; True 2012; Zannettino 2012; see also p. 35). However, the possibility that violence may increase over generations suggests that other factors to which new arrivals are exposed in their new countries may also be influential.[4] [4 p.80]

Also from Australia we have the paper Engaging Men from Diverse Backgrounds in Preventing Men's Violence Against Women presented at the 2013 National Conference on Eliminating All Forms of Violence Against CaLD Women.

Experiences of immigration and resettlement also can shape men's use of violence, their actual perpetration. As Flory's report notes:

> The experience of resettlement, particularly changes in women's social and economic status can increase tension and the risk of violence by men towards women. Whilst women often felt empowered by changes to their social and economic status, men reported feeling disempowered and attributed conflict within the relationship to these changes. […] these changes in the gender dynamics within families often results [sic] in increased efforts by men to maintain or regain control, including through violence. (Flory 2012: 8)
>
> Experiences of resettlement may contribute to men's use of violence against female partners in refugee communities. James (2010: 280) highlights a series of potential dynamics here. For example, in the context of shifts in their dominant status within families, men may use violence in efforts to make their wives and > children obey and show respect. Men may fear separation and divorce from their wives. As a result of war trauma, they may experience physiological arousal and respond more readily with violence.[5] [5 p.7]

All three of these studies and conference presentations support the claims made by Tanveer Ahmed.

All three of these studies and conference presentations support the claims made by Tanveer Ahmed, and all three have a single person in common, Dr. Michael Flood. He was a member of the UN study Research Technical Advisory Group, a member of the National Community Attitudes Survey (NCAS) team, co-author of the NCAS technical paper, and the presenter of the conference paper referenced. Michael Flood is also the chair of the White Ribbon Australia Research and Policy Group.[6]

According to the White Ribbon Australia Research and Policy Group webpage, the purpose of this group is to "provide expert advice to White Ribbon Australia to ensure our work is evidence-based and best practice."[6] The suspension of Dr Ahmed as a White Ribbon Ambassador in light of the evidence supporting his position (considering that some of this research has been conducted by Dr Michael Flood personally) seems quite contrary to the claim of White Ribbon Australia making evidence-based decisions.

Tanveer Ahmed has been suspended for the completely outrageous act of telling the truth. Something that is particularly ironic considering that White Ribbon Australia itself explicitly encouraged it's ambassadors to speak out about the NCAS findings.[7] And as a member of a culturally and linguistically diverse community, he spoke out about the issues surrounding the perpetration of partner violence in culturally and linguistically diverse communities as published in the NCAS report itself. He was doing exactly what White Ribbon Australia specifically asked him to do as an ambassador.

If White Ribbon Australia wants to seriously end violence against women using evidence-based and best practice decisions in it's work, there is only one ethical approach to take. Admit you were wrong and reinstate Dr Ahmed as an ambassador. This is not going to be easy, but doing the right thing often isn't. In doing this you will also have to admit that men have issues and are sometimes discriminated against, marginalised, and disempowered. If low life satisfaction and depression have a causal link to intimate partner violence, then solving the problem requires the issues affecting both men and women be addressed. Ignoring the issues men face isn't going to solve the problem of intimate partner violence, there is a distinct possibility it will actually make things worse (as seen in some Australian immigrant communities).

However, if White Ribbon Australia disagrees that a causal link between male disempowerment and violence against women exists, and that promoting such an idea is dangerous, then White Ribbon needs to request the resignation of Dr Flood and stop using the NCAS findings in it's advocacy. If White Ribbon Australia is so strongly against the viewpoint of Dr Ahmed, then Dr Flood needs to go too (and the citation of Rees & Pease 2007 in the NCAS report that also supports the claim, that would be Professor Bob Pease who is also a member of the White Ribbon Australia Research and Policy Group,[6] you should probably ask for his resignation too).

There is however one other approach White Ribbon Australia could take, that is to pretend that none of this exists and do absolutely nothing. But doing nothing would harm the credibility of the organisation, how can you ask one individual holding particular views to step down while at the same time continuing to engage other individuals holding the very same views as research and policy advisors? That would quite a hypocritical position to take.

White Ribbon Australia, the ball is in your court.

1. White Ribbon – White Ribbon Australia statement: Dr Tanveer Ahmed & Clementine Ford http://www.whiteribbon.org.au/update/white-ribbon-australia-statement-dr-tanveer-ahmed-clementine-ford
2. Daily Life – White Ribbon Ambassador Tanveer Ahmed's dangerous message on domestic violence

http://www.dailylife.com.au/news-and-views/dl-opinion/white-ribbon-ambassador-tanveer-ahmeds-dangerous-message-on-domestic-violence-20150209-139yjs.html

3. Fulu, E., Warner, X., Miedema, S., Jewkes, R., Roselli, T. and Lang, J. (2013). Why Do Some Men Use Violence Against Women and How Can We Prevent It? Quantitative Findings from the United Nations Multi-country Study on Men and Violence in Asia and the Pacific http://unwomen-asiapacific.org/docs/WhyDoSomeMenUseViolenceAgainstWomen_P4P_Report.pdf. Bangkok: UNDP, UNFPA, UN Women and UNV.
4. VicHealth 2014, Australians' attitudes to violence against women. Findings from the 2013 National Community Attitudes towards Violence Against Women Survey (NCAS) https://www.vichealth.vic.gov.au/%7E/media/resourcecentre/publicationsandresources/pvaw/ncas/ncas-stakeholderreport_2014.ashx, Victorian Health Promotion Foundation, Melbourne, Australia.
5. Flood, M. (2013). Engaging Men from Diverse Backgrounds in Preventing Men's Violence Against Women http://www.xyonline.net/content/engaging-men-diverse-backgrounds-preventing-men%E2%80%99s-violence-against-women. Stand Up! National Conference on Eliminating All Forms of Violence Against CaLD Women, April 29-30, Canberra.
6. White Ribbon – Research and Policy Group http://www.whiteribbon.org.au/resources/research/WRresearchpolicygroup
7. White Ribbon – White Ribbon Ambassadors Speak Out About National Survey Results http://www.whiteribbon.org.au/update/white-ribbon-ambassadors-speak-out-about-national-survey-results, 17 September, 2014

The sobering reality of the feminist agenda hits #DrunkGirl

Anika Rose · 19 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Last year there was a huge buzz around an “awareness” piece put together which depicted a girl pretending to be drunk, walking down Hollywood Blvd asking men how to get a bus to get home. The men who she approached were not rude or aggressive, however, it did show these men trying to get her to go home with them or give her a lift.

If you haven’t seen the video, it was taken down due to public protest, but you can find a copy of it here, reproduced for news reportage and analysis purposes.

It is worth mentioning that I admin on a Facebook page called Exposing Feminism, and we featured this story. Many, many men and women were attacking this girl across the internet for giving men a bad image in exchange for cash. Interested in the story, I started to look further online and found that this woman was indeed an actor named Jennifer Box.

I didn’t have to look far amongst all the anger and hate directed towards Jennifer before I found a video she published apologizing for her involvement in this video. She apologized for aiding in a negative image of men, and the other actors involved and said that if she had known that it would do so much damage to these men, and men in general, she would not have participated.

http://youtu.be/MOMElSq5IXE

I decided to take a chance and message Jennifer to ask her about why she did this and what her experience had been. She did message me back, to my surprise, and was happy to tell me a bit about her experience.

Jennifer, also known as Jennifo, is a model and actress originally from Texas. She has worked and lived around the world with her career. She had taken this job as it was recommended to her from her house mate and was to help her get some cash. What she was told she was doing and what were produced were very different. When I first approached Jennifo I advised her that I had some fans who did not seem to realise that she was apologetic for the outcome of the video and asked if she was happy to work with me to do this piece. I let her know that I work within the Men’s Human Rights Movement and was hoping to highlight the targeting of men day to day.

Jennifo was in hospital when we first started talking so a thank you is due for taking the time to discuss this with me and give her account. I think it easier for me to just copy and paste our conversation so you have an understanding of exactly how this event played out, in her words. Once Jennifo agreed to work with me she asked me what I was hoping to know and this is what I asked of her:

> We are wanting a clear idea of what you were told would happen. For you to explain what happened that day and how you feel you were treated. How you feel about how the content was used and how you feel about men in society and how they are viewed/attempted to be portrayed. I am against unethical forms of people abusing the rights they have to demonise men and lie/deceive people in order to push their message. This happens a lot with men, I am also hoping it will elaborate more on your official statement and give people a clear image of where you stand on the matter and how you have been impacted by the events.

The following quotes are Jennifo's own words

> It never meant to be like this.. was just a quick $160 cash to pay some bills and buy chick fila n the next thing I knew my face was on the cover of yahoo ha. I'm not even a feminist and in not even into the whole 'prank video' thing was literally the first one I've ever made, I was told it would be a 'staged prank show'…stupid in itself..I know..was literally just doing it for the quick $160 had no idea anyone would ever see it or it would be controversial.

First of all we should highlight that this was released as an "awareness" piece to warn women of the dangers of walking around drunk, as they may run into men who may take advantage of women in the streets. The idea and project was pitched to her as a prank skit and not true to the intentions or nature of the finished project. The very aim of this was to portray an image of predator men and a vulnerable female and continue the narrative that we live in a world where there is a "rape culture" of men targeting women, and high levels of harassment and risk for women on the street.

But Jeniffo was lied to, and it seems the men really taking advantage of her that day were the people behind the camera:

> I met the two guys, Seth and Chris, for the first time that day on Hollywood blvd. one of my my roommates introduced us because she had worked with him on something before completely unrelated, but was under contract for that so she couldn't do this and recommended me.
>
> So I basically just stood there while the guys went and found the male actors, told them what it was about, and introduced us and told us where to be walking from where to bump into each other and then was improv from there. Then at the end said thanks to all of them shook their hand and they got a video of all of them saying it was ok for them to use the footage and it was on to the next one.

The producers not only lied to Jennifo but also lied to the males they approached on the street to be a part of the "comedy." Men agreed to being part of a humorous skit, they did not agree to being used to push an image that men are sleazy or eager to take advantage of a drunk girl on the street. They were fed a false story to which they performed as asked, and it was never known to them they would be the 'face of danger' to women.

> How I feel about how the content was used..I of course am not happy about it..I mean it was supposed to be a comedy me running around acting like a drunk dumbass and then they edited it and made it into this serious controversial thing.

I asked Jennifo to tell me how she viewed men, and how she felt about this topic in particular:

> I don't think all men are like this, and I've seen people making copycat videos of this at night on the streets around clubs and I don't think it's really fair to do to men who are also out drinking because everyone makes stupid decisions when they're drunk..they can't always blame it on the guy.
>
> I'm not a bad person..not saying I'm a saint or anything but I'm a Christian, I have a cross tattooed on the back of my name so Jesus is always on the back of my mind..my own personal 'what would Jesus do,' if you will. I > don't go to church but I pray all the time..because I wouldn't be here today if if wasn't for the grace of god..I should've died ten times over by now. (That's what the tattoo on the back of my shoulder is about but that's another story) But I have this thing that clicks in my head..if I catch myself tempted to do something morally wrong, I don't do it. You can ask anyone that knows me in person and they will tell you I would never intentionally do anything like that trying to make innocent men look like rapists..that's crazy to me…

Now, most of us know that the feminist agenda hurts people, mostly men. However, speaking with Jennifo and learning how she had been lied to and taken advantage of, showed me that the damage and harm of this narrative and movement runs so much deeper. It impacts innocent people trying to keep active in their acting career and I can tell you, the amount she was paid will never compensate for what happened as a result – and what will be with her for some time to come.

> Hah well in this case the girl wasn't demonizing the man, but instead the men [who made the video] demonized the woman by making her look like she demonized men. A twist I suppose
>
> I been getting harassed like crazy, people messaging me, people posting mean horrible things in comments on YouTube, Facebook, Instagram etc.
>
> Another part about how it's affected me- now I can't walk around in Hollywood without someone recognizing me..can't really go anywhere by myself anymore..walking down the street I got people pulling over in their cars next to me just staring at me or trying to take pictures..
>
> I've seen people trying to take selfies with me sitting in the front seat of the car next to them, shit I go on ONE date with a guy I was dating when I first got here but hadn't seen in five months (and mind you I almost never go on dates, this was literally my first date in like three months) and he takes one picture while were out, and then knowing that I was interviewing with inside edition the next day, posted the pic with the title 'catching up with the BFF @jennifoboxofficial' like I can't even go on date now without feeling like someone using me.

The stress of harassment and the pressure from how she was duped into depicting men, for a very small amount of money, landed Jennifo in hospital. Being lied to and tricked into pushing the narrative that aligns to a feminist agenda became too much, and her body gave way.

> Now I've been stuck in the hospital since last Friday with a collapsed lung (and now pneumonia) which I'm pretty sure resulted entirely from the stress of this video because the doctors themselves can't explain it. Have had lung surgery last Sunday, chest tubes etc. Spent thanksgiving in the hospital alone with only my sister..this > video basically sent me to hell over paying my bills and buying chick fila

I hope to see awareness for women being drunk in public in the future–from a place that encourages women to be responsible and look out for themselves, not just because “the big bad men” could come and get you. Many women hurt themselves, start fights, end up in hospital, lose their license and embarrass themselves on a daily basis because of drinking too much. They end up sleeping with drunk men, who are in no better position to be making decisions than them, lose their personal items and wake up feeling very sick with a hangover and a chunk of money missing as it was left with her memories from the night before.

I really do hope to see more men and women being respectful to their bodies and other people by being responsible for their own safety, exercising responsibility and precaution when drinking out in public. This is the message we need to be sending everybody. We must “empower women” and young girls by encouraging them to be responsible – not abuse and demonize men and instil fear and contempt.

The fact these people lied and were deceitful to produce this just adds another cross on the wall for the “Social Justice” and Feminist movement. I hope those who made this film have learnt, through hurting so many people, that anti-male gender ideology is a dangerous message and devoid of truth. Men and women are both at risk of being approached and harassed on the street, and men more so than women. By getting black-out drunk and legless we are increasing our risk of becoming a target, not recognising danger or being able to respond if need be. Both men and women need to realise that it is our responsibility to be in a state of situational awareness where we can prevent harm to ourselves and respond appropriately. There ARE bad people in the world, and they are not all men.

The “Bad Man Good Female” image is distorting our image of ourselves and each other, it is perpetuating a society of blame, fear and hate between the genders while not focusing on the importance of making good decisions and keeping ourselves safe.

The only way society will improve is for us to move away from this.

And here, by the way, is how the poor guys who were suckered by this phony video also felt. They deserve all our sympathy for what was done to them:

http://youtu.be/KzkGBNhcoho

Feature image by Lwp Kommunikáció

5 Reasons Women Love Rape Fantasies

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 20 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

With 50 Shades of Grey titillating women across the country and making serious bank, this is a good time to explore just what women love so much about fantasies that involve humiliation, submission, exploitation and the promise of violent enforcement. Being hand-cuffed to a bed, gagged and whipped with a riding crop by a man who overpowers her in every way seems the very opposite of the empowered, confident, voracious women who stride through feminist media, and yet the pull of these hapless, helpless creatures is strong indeed. Women love rape fantasies. Here's why:

1. She bears no responsibility

Sexually promiscuous women with appetites for variety and bedposts notched down to matchsticks are generally known in the popular vernacular as "sluts." That may not be fair, but it's the truth. We may have come a long way, baby, but we haven't come so far that a woman with a triple digit number is going to be admired in any way, unless she happens to be a porn star who specializes in running trains. Personally, I'm not convinced this is misogyny, but rather our human inclination towards pair bonding. There is a stereotype, alive and well, that men will have sex with anything and have no standards when it comes to their own promiscuity, or at the very least, very different standards, but this is simply not true. Men, as much as women, are not entirely comfortable with sluts, whether the slut is the person standing beside them or the person in the mirror.

Rape fantasies get to side-step all these complicated "how many dicks are too many dicks" questions by removing consent from the equation. No one in their right mind, surely, would count a rapist among a woman's numbers. She was taken. She cannot be held responsible. She's not a slut! She's a victim.

A victim of sweet, responsibility free rape.

2. She gets to be the object of mad desire

This segues nicely into the second reason women love rape fantasies. Rape narratives generally feature conventionally beautiful women with decidedly feminine features and qualities, but if the average reader is just the average woman, the beauty and femininity target is likely being missed by a country mile. No matter. Rapists are so overwhelmed by their physical need for the heroine, they are willing to risk everything to have the object of their desire. They are weak with wanting and express that weakness, perversely, by taking her with force.

The whole concept of rape culture, in my opinion, plays directly into this trope. Genuinely believing that we live in a rape culture, where rape is common, sanctioned and dismissed is to live in a world filled with men who are so overwhelmed with sexual desire for women, they will take them by force. Even if rape is conceptualized as being about power and not sex, the desire to overpower is still omnipresent. He wants you, one way or another. Of course, if rape really was about power, one would expect a lot of grannies and pre-teens to be getting raped, since they are much easier to overpower, but rape seems to be confined to women between the ages of 18 and 29. Those being prime reproductive years is purely coincidence?

No matter how you slice it, rape culture allows women to imagine every man is a rapist. Every man wants her. Every man will do the unthinkable just to have her.

Pretty sweet, as far as fantasies go.

3. Turnabout is fair play

When men are conceptualized as rapists who treat women like personal property, to use and abuse as they please, it becomes that much easier to justify treating men in the exact same manner. The heroes of romantic or erotic novels like 50 Shades of Grey are hardly ever homeless drug addicts with acne and missing limbs. Heroes tend to come in a one-size-fits all variety. They are almost universally tall, broad-shouldered, narrow-waisted, with rippling biceps, a full head of hair and an even fuller bank account. If women in romance novels are reduced to fuck-toys, men are reduced to wallets.

Interestingly enough, real life standards for what constitutes the "ideal woman" have changed dramatically as women's social roles have changed. From the hourglass curves of Marilyn Monroe to the asexual slenderness of Twiggy to the bootyliciousness of Nicky Minaj, the ideal woman has transformed with the times. The ideal man has not. Women's gender roles have undergone dramatic changes, men's have not. The ideal man in 2015 hasn't changed since Paleolithic artists created the Lascaux paintings. Men are meant to be tall, strong and rich. They are meant to serve and protect women.

Rape fantasies make it okay for women to hold men to such grossly exploitative and unfair standards, while demanding their own roles be dissipated to the point of being unrecognizable.

They're rapists for heaven's sake! They deserve what they get.

4. Rape fantasies justify violence against men

In an era where acknowledging any inherent differences between men and women, particularly differences that might work to suggest men are superior in some respects, is tantamount to heresy, many women harbor latent malice towards men. This is because women are not stupid. It will take a lot of feminist Kool-aid before women will uncritically, and unapologetically decree that men and women are exactly equal in every regard. Even the most devoted practitioner of the "gender as a social performance" school of thought cannot fully suppress the awareness that men tend to be bigger, stronger and have more body hair than women. Testosterone whispers across the cultural landscape despite the best efforts of gender feminists to stamp it out. Women aren't landing rockets on comets. Men are. That's because of shirts, of course.

Many women resent men. They resent them for being stronger, more ambitious, for working harder and longer and doing virtually all the necessary work of survival. It's truly sad that a group of disgruntled, disenfranchised feminists in the 70s took their jealousy of men and made it into a religion, simultaneously guaranteeing the unhappiness of generations and implicitly agreeing that men are better. Women may not design, build, manufacture and maintain waste water management facilities, but we do our bit to help civilization along: we have children. The uncritical acceptance of men's standards of living and being and doing has been the most harmful legacy of feminism, in my opinion. A woman born with a burning desire to turn raw sewage into potable water should absolutely be free to do that. She should be cheered from the rooftops and so should every man who desires the same. Clean drinking water is important. But most women don't want to do that. We want to have families and care for them. Opting out, going home, baking cookies and babbling with babies is the new American Dream for working mothers.

Most of them can't opt out, and it makes them angry. That expresses itself in romance novels as violence against men. When the rich, tall, broad shouldered man overcome with lust approaches the heroine, she is the one who uses blood-letting force. She will bite, scratch, kick, clamor and claw her way out of his grips. It never works, but she is left with the pleasure of watching his blood drip while he uses just enough force to subdue her.

There are not many rape fantasies that involve true, brutal violence against women. It's usually just a matter of pinning her down, while she fights back with full force, drawing blood. And deep satisfaction.

5. Women don't need to play the victim

Feminists absolutely love the victim narrative. Women are always and only victims. Helpless, harmless innocents who play no part whatsoever in their own victimization. Real women are not entirely comfortable with the whole victim narrative because it is a denial of agency and responsibility, and even though the rape fantasy has denial of responsibility at its heart, in real life, most women understand that women cannot be both perpetual victims and responsible adults. If we are to be at all times shielded, protected and guided, we become little more than children. Most women reject this.

Rape fantasies walk a perfect line between adulthood and perpetual childhood. Most novels that feature rape fantasies will never, ever depict the same heroine dragging her mattress around campus, whoring for attention and sympathy from anyone passing by. Women raped by their fantasy lovers do not go to rape crisis centers, do not call 911 and will rarely, if ever, even tell a close friend what happened.

Because what happened wasn't rape.

It was sex. Responsibility free sex, fired by his overwhelming desire, backed up with his hot body and gold Amex, in which she got to beat the shit out of him and never feel hard done by.

Sweet deal.

[Ed. Note: This piece originally appeared at Thought Catalog and is reprinted with permission.]

Christine Rupert: Junkie millionaire

Attila L. Vinczer · 20 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Christine Rupert can huff and puff, but no amount of hot air will ever blow over our determination to report the dark facts about this junkie turned millionaire. Her pathetic attempts to silence the truth are useless. She has done everything in her power to prey upon and destroy an innocent, vulnerable man, and the record of her actions will speak for itself. She is determined to steal everything she possibly can from William Mullins Johnson, a man who has already been devastated – spending 12.5 years in jail, wrongfully convicted of murdering and sodomizing his 3 year old niece. She has already robbed him of much of his restitution money, not to mention his heart and soul.

Christine Rupert's Bracebridge court file No. FC 13 196, is public record, and it desperately needs to be publicized. It should serve as a warning to other men about manipulative predators like Rupert, a thieving junkie, who have zero concern for the men they harm. Her despicable actions are the sort that drive 8 men to commit suicide each day in Canada, but she couldn't possibly care less. She just wants the loot, and her next fix.

I attended a Contempt of Court Motion hearing brought on by Christine Rupert against Bill Mullins returnable January 26, 2015, however the hearing was adjourned on consent to Bracebridge Courthouse on February 23, 2015 at 9am. I encourage as many advocates to attend as possible. I then went to ask the clerk about viewing the Rupert vs Mullins Family Court File. I could not see the file, as it was still in the courtroom, I agreed to come back later. I went back the following morning to look at the file, but the clerk said they did not have it. Odd, since I had spoken with court staff the day before and told them to expect me. I asked to speak with the supervisor, Kelly, who was of no help and quite sharp and uncooperative. So I requested to speak with Julie, the secretary of Judge Wood. She too could not tell me where the file was. I was dumbfounded that a Canadian Court would not know where a court file was. How do you lose a file? They said they would call me when the file was located. I told them while they searched, I would contact the Attorney General, to let them know a court had lost an entire file. Of course I wondered if, in fact, staff was deliberately keeping the file from my view, given they had knowledge of Christine Rupert bringing a motion to seal it.

As I was about to drive away, the court called me and said that they had found the file. Imagine that. I was allowed to view it and make copies of all the records therein. It seems Christine Rupert has been working on a motion to have the file sealed, but she was too late and too slow. She apparently failed to realize that anyone could access that file at any time – it's a public record.

Since I wrote about Christine Rupert and Bill Mullins nearly a year ago, I have been threatened with a number of legal actions against me, for writing the facts as revealed by meticulous research. Rupert refused to talk with me, though I wanted to include her side of the story. Instead, I got her side in file disclosure at the Bracebridge Courthouse. At a glance, it illustrated the modus operandi of a druggie who made Mr. Mullins her mark. A junkie will do anything for her fix without a care for those she harms. This is the mentality of Christine Rupert. Bill Mullins was at the wrong place at the wrong time. He became, and continues to be, a victim of Christine Rupert's scam.

Christine Rupert lost her children because of her drug use and drug dealing in Kitchener; this was confirmed to me by a friend who felt the CAS was correct in apprehending her children. While usually I do not agree with Children's Aid taking children, in this case they were in the right to take the children from a bad mother, who's primary concern was drugs instead of her children. It was further communicated to me that Rupert sold drugs to pay the cost of lawyer's fees to get her children back. She often joined up with Canada Court Watch to protest against CAS and this is where she learned how to manipulate the system. When Bill Mullins came along, she found the perfect target. Bill who had just spent a dozen years in jail for a crime that never happened, was eager to settle down with a woman. Unfortunately he settled down with a conniving greedy addict.

Mr. Mullins called me about two years ago,frustrated, nervous and scared. He did not know how to deal with Christine Rupert, who started an action against him in Family Court, on the day, or day after, the required time for the law to deem them common law. She finally won her lottery, the divorce lottery, and the jackpot was the settlement paid to Bill for his 12.5 years of suffering. You read that right. Bill Mullins spent much of his adult life behind bars, and Christine Rupert is attempting to rob him of his compensation. Her method is simple and predictable: Step one, get a restraining order. Step two, tell the police she's afraid and fears for her life. Step three, file an application in Family Court and tell the court how badly Bill treated her and how scared of him she is. Cry crocodile tears and play the sympathy card while the Toronto Star paints her as a victim.

I spoke with Bill a lot, hundreds of hours, with thousands of emails exchanged. And I listened to him. About his abuse in jail, about feeling hopeless, about the horrors he experienced and witnessed in jail. Bill told me about the Association in Defense of the Wrongly Convicted (AIDWYC), and how he was vindicated by James Lockyer, one of the founding members of AIDWYC, Toronto. The taxpayers of Ontario paid Bill Mullins $4.25 million dollars for his wrongful conviction. One million went to the lawyer that obtained that restitution and the rest is all he has. It's not an income earned through work, not a lottery winning, not an inheritance, but a sum to offset the horror he endured spending 12.5 years in jail, in some of the worst possible conditions, branded the worst type of criminal – a child murderer and a child rapist. Bill's nightmare had finally ended – until Christine Rupert came along. A blood sucking leech who did not care about Bill, Rupert spent the next three years waiting to enact her scam.

This junkie's actions and deceit have further devastated Bill Mullins, and even worse, she's trying to silence him and hide the truth from public view, all using his money. Formerly a slum dwelling, drugged out deadbeat mom, Rupert has "won" two houses from Mullins, along with a great deal of cash, and it's still not enough for her. She has also sued him for trying to tell this story, and won again – over $75,000. She has also threatened to sue me for telling this story. If she could I'm sure she'd sue A Voice for Men. But she can't. Christine Rupert's days of "winning" are about to end. She will not silence Bill Mullins, she will not silence me, and she will not silence AVfM. We will continue to expose the details of her case, and show how easily a malicious greedy woman can use the Canadian court system as a weapon to bludgeon an innocent, vulnerable man.

This woman stole one million dollars from a man who spent over 12 years in jail, wrongly convicted of child rape and murder, and on Monday, she wants to put him back in jail so she can take the rest. Let that sink in. Then help us fight her. This cannot happen.

Writers note: The information contained here above and herein I verily believe to be true based on information provided to me by various sources.

Additional correspondence:
http://voices.avoiceformen.com/avfm/wp-content/uploads/sites/2/2015/02/Response-Donna-Macfarlane.jpg

The feminist view from a comfortable armchair.

Mark Dent · 20 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is also available in Romanian.

We have all been armchair critics at some stage. We have passed judgement on another person's behaviour in a particular situation or environment without ever having been in a similar situation or had our values or morality tested in the searing heat of a life and death moment. Sometimes such judgement is perfectly understandable and legitimate. More frequently it is hasty, ill considered and ignorant.

You might hear someone say for example "all of the hostages should have just rushed the gunman" as they drink their morning cuppa and peruse the newspaper. If you are a thoughtful person you would have an instinctive gut reaction to such an easy, throw -away line. You may even call this would -be hero out and ask him or her how they know what they would have done in similar circumstances.

But there is another far more damaging form of armchair critic and they have been sitting back passing vicious, vitriolic, judgement upon a whole gender for decades without ever having walked even a few yards, let alone a mile in their shoes.

One of the first ports of call for any feminist who wants to shut down a discussion about violence or any form of gender equity is to bring up the subject of war. We have all heard the same mantra repeated again and again. Men start all wars. Men do all the killing and raping. If some innocent men get killed in war, blame other men.

The women who speak these words with smug satisfaction almost visibly swell with self righteous moral superiority before your eyes as they say them.

It brings to mind a wonderful quote from a New Zealand cartoonist, Murray Ball who wrote one of the first "anti-feminist "books, in the early nineties, titled The Sisterhood. This wonderful, brave book featured many brilliant cartoons accompanied by some powerful captions and text questioning many aspects of radical feminism.

Murray wrote:

It is foolish to praise a toothless tiger for not biting.

For me, this says so much about feminism in such a simple and concise manner.

I have just finished reading a book on Australia's participation in the killing fields in World War One. It was filled with eyewitness accounts of the butchery that went on and I shed tears on more than one occasion as I read them.

Young boys had their best mate's brains blown all over them as they stood side by side in trenches filled with mud, lice and rotting bodies. Charles Bean, the Australian War Correspondent who had unprecedented access to the frontlines spoke of the horrors of the constant shelling the boys were subjected to and how the nerve of even the bravest men snapped under such horrific pressure.

Bean wrote:

They have to stay there while shell after shell descends with a shriek close beside them. Each one an acute mental torture-each shrieking, tearing crash bringing a promise to each man-instantaneous-I will tear you into ghastly wounds-I will rend your flesh and pulp your arm or leg-fling you, half a gaping, quivering man and like those that you see smashed around you one by one to lie there rotting and blackening……Every man in the trench has that instant fear thrust upon his shoulders-I don't care how brave he is-with a crash that is a physical pain and a strain to withstand.

This could go on for days at a time.

Why this little reminder of the hell endured by men in war?

It's only by having some form of understanding of what confronts a soldier when he enters a war zone and the effect it can have upon his psychological state that we can begin to understand the atrocities committed in war. We have all said and done things in a heated, adrenaline fueled moment of anger or frustration. Is it too hard to imagine the fear, adrenaline and rage pulsing through your body in a life and death encounter with the enemy?

I heard someone comment on the atrocities committed by American soldiers in the Vietnam War and I had to interrupt the condemnation of those men involved in massacres of civilian women and children. Such actions were appalling, horrific and barbaric. Surely these same words could be used to describe any war. Isn't war-even a justified war, an horrific event filled with inevitably horrendous violence and barbaric behavior? Atrocities cannot be condoned or ignored, but before anyone points an accusatory finger perhaps they need to pause and consider what most of these men had endured.

They had seen their mates, their close friends torn apart by cunningly set traps. Young children had entered their camps and were greeted with affection and smiles before they detonated bombs and blew these unsuspecting soldiers into tiny pieces. These men lived on a knife's edge that seems particularly keen in jungle warfare. They were exhausted, highly anxious, angry, and often high on drugs and trained to kill. In this state they carried out shocking massacres.

Many of these young men were conscripts from Australia and America. A simple matter of luck decided whether you received the call up via your letterbox. A brief walk to that box changed the lives of many young men forever. If you refused to go and fight you faced imprisonment unless you had compelling reasons for your refusal. Telling the board you didn't want to die or be maimed or butcher other people wasn't considered a reasonable excuse.

So young men often boys of 18 and 19, were sent away to fight in jungles and experience violence and horror that would permanently scar them. Yet on their return they were branded baby killers and monsters by a large section of the population in their home countries.

Who were these young men? They were unique individuals who had a life at home-perhaps a baker, lawyer, teacher, poet, artist, farmer or labourer. They had family and friends who they loved and were loved by in return. They were not monsters with an insatiable bloodlust, yet some of these young men would commit horrific acts of violence upon other human beings.

The very nature of war demands that a soldier leaves behind the innate empathy most people feel for the suffering of their fellow man. The army constantly reinforces the powerful message that it is kill or be killed-and that message is sadly true in the theatre of war. It is this attitude which saw the allies ultimately win two world wars-something we have all benefited from to this very day. Yes, the very women who sit in judgement on men who go to war are beneficiaries of the actions carried out by these trained killers.

Think about the young men you know in any social setting be it school, the local footy team, choir or just mates who gather for a regular drink at the pub. You know these people are good hearted human beings with the occasional exception-an exception to be found in a group of either gender. These are the men who would be shipped off to World War Three should it break out. These good blokes would witness atrocities and commit them.

As would any group of young women trained and shipped off to fight a foreign foe.

If one day, in a world we can only dream about, women and only women were conscripted to war would we see the same savagery as we see in war today?

What is a human being to do when they are forced, against their will into a combat zone? It is kill or be killed. You begin to lose dear friends, sometimes having their brains and intestines blown all over your own face and body. You are terrified for much of the time and exhausted, physically and mentally fatigued. You want to avenge the death of your friend who was turned to pulp before your eyes. The hatred and anger builds and when an opportunity presents itself, you grab it-with relish.

Of course we would hear of massacres and atrocities. These women would be trained to be ruthless killing machines just as the boys once were. We all know already how brutal some women can be in their own homes let alone a war zone.

Let's continue this little excursion into an alternate universe.

The men back home could pass moral judgement upon every action or inaction by these female soldiers with impunity. We could condemn all women as being blood lusting monsters if given half a chance. We would do this knowing full well these women were given no choice but to go to war and were eagerly cheered on by the same men who now point a finger of condemnation at them.

That is the deliciously comfortable position held by all women in our western civilizations. Tutting and headshaking as you sip your latte with the girls.

We know that most mothers who see their children harmed would happily visit horrendous bodily harm upon the perpetrator. Such a violent response from mothers in response to the harming of a loved one is praised and held up as a shining example of the protective, powerful, passionate love a woman feels for her child-the lioness protecting her cubs. There would (rightly) be no condemnation of the violence she visited upon the target of her wrath.

Somehow this same understanding is not applied to men in war.

The same principle applies to the gender bigotry in operation in our Family Law Courts.

We are often confronted with the devastating stories of fathers who snap after years of torment at the hands of what is meant to be a system which operates under the guise of justice for all.

Imagine if in a parallel universe it was men who were granted full custody of the children after a divorce and full control over when and if the mother can see her own flesh and blood. Would we not see a clear pattern evolve? Is it so difficult to imagine the acts of retribution that would be carried out by enraged, frustrated, jilted mothers? We have seen how some women behave when a man ends their relationship-clothes are burned, cars scratched and dented and physical abuse is common-slaps and face scratching are often a feature of those final moments together.

What of a mother deprived of her children whilst being forced to pay for their upbringing? Suddenly mothers are threatening judges, ex husbands and seeking outlets for their understandable fury. We would have a very different narrative in such a world.

Sadly there is no universe where this theory can be tested.

Men are living this injustice on a daily basis and no –one gives a damn. Fathers are branded "angry" as though that says all that needs to be said on the issue. No-one has the courage to ask why they are angry or turning to violence and threats. They are simply the moral inferiors of women. They consider them to be no more than little boys hiding in a man's body, having a tantrum because they can't get what they want. Some fools would suggest giving reasons for their anger and sometimes violent behaviour is the same as excusing it.

Any person of average intelligence would see what a ridiculous notion this is. How can any issue be resolved or prevented if we do not attempt to understand the events leading up to it? This seems a perfectly reasonable attitude when applied to road accidents, accidental deaths or injury in the workplace or any number of every- day occurrences under investigation. Sadly, when applied to instances of male violence against women it is considered a form of victim blaming.

Female violence however, is always explained away as a result of forces outside of the woman's control. She was post natal, hormonal, menopausal, addicted, controlled, abused, exhausted; overwhelmed…..it was a cry for help.

Male violence is inexcusable and a result of his masculinity.

If a man dares to offer his opinion on abortion, menstruation, pregnancy or menopause he is quickly told to shut his cake –hole before it gets shut for him.

The feminist response is always:

"What would a man know about such things? How dare he offer an opinion on something he has never experienced!

This is not spoken in jest-if you doubt my word, attend a pro –abortion rally next time one hits town and offer a contrary view or perhaps you could pull aside a co-worker who is struggling with her heavy periods and give her some advice.

Yet women feel justified in passing judgement on men for behaviors and actions performed in circumstances they have never experienced and they have absolutely no comprehension of the physiological and psychological strain men feel in these situations. Nor do most men. This is why most war vets simply refuse to talk about their experiences with anyone other than fellow veterans.

My sister told me about a female friend of hers who was given a course of testosterone for a medical ailment. Her libido went through the roof and she said she would never again judge a man after getting a brief glimpse into the world of the male sex drive.

If only the feminists who attack male behavior in time of war or when they are treated as subhuman ATM's by the legal system could be provided with their own brief insight into a man's world in the form of a small dose of testosterone and a two year stint on the frontlines in a war.

http://listverse.com/2012/10/30/10-female-concentration-camp-guards/

http://www.theatlantic.com/international/archive/2012/12/a-wife-accused-of-war-crimes-the-unprecedented-case-of-simone-gbagbo/265828/

http://www.telegraph.co.uk/history/11213702/Can-women-kill-like-men-Meet-the-all-female-front-lines.html

http://www.mirror.co.uk/news/uk-news/nazi-she-devils-566055

http://www.wonderslist.com/10-most-evil-women-in-the-history/

http://learnwomen.com/rejection-often-leads-to-revenge

The Southern Poverty Law Center (SPLC) and sketchy telemarketing tricks

Richard Keefe · 20 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Southern Poverty Law Center founder Morris Dees claims on his company's website that he is a sound financial steward of the millions of tax-free dollars his donors send him each year in the sincere belief that they are somehow "fighting hate" by doing so.

Sound Finances

Our work is made possible by the generosity and commitment of our thousands of supporters across the country. We are proud of our financial stewardship and dedicated to ensuring openness and accountability.

>> Read more about our financial status

Unbeknownst to tens of thousands of donors a year, however, is the fact that millions of their donation dollars never reach the SPLC's coffers. Let's look at the numbers:

First, the Good News: According to the SPLC's tax returns, (shown below), over the past three fiscal years, third-party telemarketers raised $5,156,337 toward the SPLC's worthy goal of "fighting hate" in America.

The Bad News: The SPLC actually paid $5,750,295 to the telemarketers over those three years, for a net loss of $593,958 donor-dollars!

One telemarketing firm, Grassroots Campaigns, of Boston, charged Mr. Dees an incredible $3,883,469 to raise $1,644,804, for an astonishing loss of $2,238,665.

Not only did Grassroots keep every dime they raised from well-meaning donors, they completely wiped out the $1,644,804 turned over to the SPLC by all of the other telemarketers combined AND scooped an additional $593,958 out of the existing SPLC donor pot!

The Other Good News: "Sound Steward" Morris Dees could not be happier with the results.

How can Mr. Dees condone this rampant hemorrhaging of desperately needed donor-dollars? To recycle the old vaudeville punchline: "He'll make it up in volume."

It's simple. Dees isn't hiring these telemarketers to "raise money" for the SPLC, regardless of what they say in their scripted telephone pitch. He's paying them to identify new donors to feed into his own uber-efficient, in-house fundraising machine.

Think about it. As the SPLC's IRS Schedule G returns indicate below, the measly $427,000 the SPLC received from the external telemarketers after expenses in 2010 represents a mere 1.3% of the $32 million Mr. Dees' in-house fundraisers raked in that year.

That's chump change, like a five-dollar bill you find in the pocket of a jacket you haven't worn in a while.

The real money will come from future donations from these people over the coming years, of which the SPLC gets to keep 100%.

It's a beautiful system when you think about it because it not only makes millions for the SPLC down the road, but it's paid for entirely by the gullible donors themselves!

"Sound stewardship" doesn't get any better than this.

The downside is that the tens of thousands of well-meaning donors who ponied up the $5.7 million donor-dollars to pay the telemarketers genuinely believed that their money was actually going toward "fighting hate," rather than padding out Mr. Dees' donor list.

To be fair, the SPLC isn't the only one playing fast and loose with the donor-dollars. A 2012 news report in the Pittsburgh Tribune explains that even the best third party fundraisers only turn over about 45 cents on every dollar they raise but many others keep as much as 97% of the take.

Obviously, the donors have no idea how little of their money actually gets to the non-profits they support.

For smaller charities and non-profits even a paltry 3% return is better than nothing.

The Tribune article even interviews Grassroots' own National Canvass Director, Wes Jones, who claims the donor-dollars paid to his company are justified because organizations like the SPLC are actually buying "a huge amount of visibility" and new supporters* "and their contributions over the next few years will substantially exceed the cost of the effort."
[Emphasis added]

Non-profits such as the ASPCA and Amnesty International are cited in the article as saying they were pleased with Grassroots' work, even when it cost them millions out-of-pocket. They too are far more interested in the donor information Grassroots collects.

When you think about it, Morris Dees paid less than $600,000 for $5.1 million dollars worth of proven donor information. That's less than 9 cents on the dollar. Not a bad return on investment, especially when it is the unwitting donors who are footing the bill and will continue to contribute for years or decades to come.

So how many trusting donors got absolutely nothing for their donations? At $100 apiece, which seems like an unusually high number for first-time donors, that "only" comes to 57,000 suckers. At $50 dollars a head, 114,000 donors were duped, and the more modest the donation the larger the number of people who were deceived.

The SPLC has a long history of making the most of Progressive altruism. Watching the Watchdogs reported back in 2009 on the SPLC's laughable "Stand Strong Against Hate" map.

In exchange for nothing more than your name, street and e-mail addresses, you too can "stand strong against hate." In 2009, that personal information would earn you a digital pinhead on his map with your first name and last initial.

Mr. Dees doesn't explain exactly how your personal information "fights hate," but no doubt his formidable fundraising team makes very good use of the data and there's nothing stopping them from selling it to other non-profits.

According to the map, thousands of Progressive pinheads have signed up for the cause.

It all sounds rather cynical to us.

So what do we make of Mr. Dees' sketchy telemarketing deals? They're not illegal, and apparently "everybody" in Non-Profit Land is doing it.

The donors are still getting a warm-and-fuzzy tingle and the fantasy that they are somehow "fighting hate," which, after all, is pretty much all they would get if they delivered the money directly into Mr. Dees' hands.

Maybe it's a win-win-win situation after all.

Below are the SPLC's telemarketing records from the past three available fiscal years. Look at the numbers for yourselves, do the math and come to your own conclusions as to whether the donors are getting a fair deal.

SCHEDULE G (Form 990 or 990-EZ)

Supplemental Information Regarding Fundraising or Gaming Activities

Complete if the organization answered "Yes" to Form 990, Part IV, lines 17, 18, or 19, or if the organization entered more than $15,000 on Form 990-EZ, line 6a.
▶ Attach to Form 990 or Form 990-EZ. ▶ See separate instructions.

2010
Open To Public Inspection

Name of the organization: SOUTHERN POVERTY LAW CENTER, INC.
Employer identification number: 63-0589143

Part I Fundraising Activities. Complete if the organization answered "Yes" to Form 990, Part IV, line 17. Form 990-EZ filers are not required to complete this part.

1 Indicate whether the organization raised funds through any of the following activities. Check all that apply.
- a [X] Mail solicitations
- b [X] Internet and email solicitations
- c [X] Phone solicitations
- d [X] In-person solicitations
- e [X] Solicitation of non-government grants
- f [ ] Solicitation of government grants
- g [ ] Special fundraising events

2 a Did the organization have a written or oral agreement with any individual (including officers, directors, trustees or key employees listed in Form 990, Part VII) or entity in connection with professional fundraising services? [X] Yes [ ] No

b If "Yes," list the ten highest paid individuals or entities (fundraisers) pursuant to agreements under which the fundraiser is to be compensated at least $5,000 by the organization.

(i) Name and address of individual or entity (fundraiser)	(ii) Activity	(iii) Did fundraiser have custody or control of contributions? Yes	No	(iv) Gross receipts from activity	(v) Amount paid to (or retained by) fundraiser listed in col. (i)	(vi) Amount paid to (or retained by) organization
TELEFUND INC 1999 BROADWAY ST, DENVER, CO 80203	TELEMARKETING		X	716,138.	409,427.	313,711.
BARRIS DIRECT - 4800 DRAKEWOOD AVE #200, CARMEL	TELEMARKETING		X	489,471.	197,340.	292,131.
[illegible] INC P. O. BOX 91101, BOSTON, MA	COMPUTERING	X		142,890.	389,114.	-246,224.
DONOR SERVICES GROUP - P. O. BOX 2166, DENVER, CO 80201	TELEMARKETING		X	45,196.	19,356.	25,840.
SHARE GROUP INC - 8700 SUNSET BLVD, LOS ANGELES, CA 90069	TELEMARKETING		X	19,415.	10,926.	8,489.
Total ▶				1,413,319.	996,160.	417,159.

3 List all states in which the organization is registered or licensed to solicit contributions or has been notified it is exempt from registration.

SCHEDULE G (Form 990 or 990-EZ)

Supplemental Information Regarding Fundraising or Gaming Activities

Complete if the organization answered "Yes" to Form 990, Part IV, lines 17, 18, or 19, or if the organization entered more than $15,000 on Form 990-EZ, line 6a.
▶ Attach to Form 990 or Form 990-EZ. ▶ See separate instructions.

2011
Open To Public Inspection

Name of the organization: SOUTHERN POVERTY LAW CENTER, INC.
Employer identification number: 63-0589143

Part I Fundraising Activities. Complete if the organization answered "Yes" to Form 990, Part IV, line 17. Form 990-EZ filers are not required to complete this part.

1 Indicate whether the organization raised funds through any of the following activities. Check all that apply.
- a [X] Mail solicitations
- b [X] Internet and email solicitations
- c [X] Phone solicitations
- d [X] In-person solicitations
- e [X] Solicitation of non-government grants
- f [ ] Solicitation of government grants
- g [ ] Special fundraising events

2 a Did the organization have a written or oral agreement with any individual (including officers, directors, trustees or key employees listed in Form 990, Part VII) or entity in connection with professional fundraising services? [X] Yes [ ] No

b If "Yes," list the ten highest paid individuals or entities (fundraisers) pursuant to agreements under which the fundraiser is to be compensated at least $5,000 by the organization.

(i) Name and address of individual or entity (fundraiser)	(ii) Activity	(iii) Did fundraiser have custody or control of contributions? Yes	No	(iv) Gross receipts from activity	(v) Amount paid to (or retained by) fundraiser listed in col. (i)	(vi) Amount paid to (or retained by) organization
[illegible] INC - 32 [illegible] PLACE #101, BOSTON, MA	COMPUTERING	X		715,524.	2,483,189.	-1,768,665.
[illegible] INC - P. O. BOX 1[illegible], BOSTON, MA 02113	TELEMARKETING		X	518,613.	181,354.	338,271.
BARRIS DIRECT - 4800 DRAKEWOOD AVE #[illegible], CARMEL	TELEMARKETING		X	519,114.	291,115.	228,320.
DONOR SERVICES GROUP - 8116 SUNSET BLVD, LOS ANGELES	TELEMARKETING		X	49,471.	44,493.	4,978.
BLUE INTERNET [illegible] - 7750 [illegible]	TELEMARKETING		X	39,788.	31,018.	18,788.
Total ▶				1,743,[illegible]	2,[illegible]	-[illegible]

3 List all states in which the organization is registered or licensed to solicit contributions or has been notified it is exempt from registration or licensing.

SCHEDULE G

Supplemental Information Regarding Fundraising or Gaming Activities

2012

Open To Public Inspection

Name of the organization

Employer identification number

Part I Fundraising Activities.

(i) Name and address of individual or entity (fundraiser)	(ii) Activity	(iii) Did fundraiser have custody or control of contributions? Yes	No	(iv) Gross receipts from activity	(v) Amount paid to (or expended by) fundraiser listed in col. (i)	(vi) Amount paid to (or expended on behalf of) organization
[illegible]	[illegible]		[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]		[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]		[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]		[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
Total				[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]

Click Image to Enlarge

The PUA cheese touch strikes again

Hannah Wallen · 21 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The men's rights movement is no stranger to the tactics feminists try to use to silence viewpoints they oppose. Those tactics have been written about for years, well before the movement was as large as it is today, and well before it ever received media attention. If you're not familiar with them, read Exposing Feminism's post "The catalog of anti-male shaming tactics."

These tactics are a manifestation of a sense of entitlement to control the dialogue based on one's own belief in one's position. I'm right, so your argument must be rooted in objectionable characteristics. They're designed to put the target on the defensive against unmerited charges in order to distract from existing debate. An example would be a feminist leveling the accusation that you support due process rights because you hate women, or an attack on your masculinity in response to your discussion about female perpetrators of sexual violence and their male victims. These tactics are a window to feminism's underlying hateful attitude. Their basic premise is that agitation for any remedy to conditions which are oppressive to men is unneeded, undeserved, illegitimate, and an affront to women.

Many times, activists are able to spot these tactics and call them out when their feminist debate opponents use them, effectively rendering them useless. However, the community at large has failed miserably at this when the shaming involves an attempt to pit us against the pick-up artist community. The most recent version of this failure is an attempt to distance the two groups from each other in response to a feminist diatribe about a recent blog article by Roosh V. Here we go again, handing feminists control that they do not deserve, allowing an unmerited, illegitimate attack on the movement to put us on the defense.

Roosh's article is not bad for the men's rights movement. The feminist reaction is bad for feminists, or at least it would be if MRAs would take a step back and view it without the filter of feminist shaming language through which the article complaining about it is launched. Remove it and the complaint would largely disappear. It can be clearly identified as a vehemently worded charge of misogyny, with a layer of "by association" thrown in.

The only reason feminists feel like this tactic works is that MRAs run scared every time they do it. This is what happens when you give feminists control over the dialogue; their first impulse is to silence views they disapprove, rather than to engage. Feminist use of shaming tactics does not make MRAs or even PUAs bad people. It shows that feminists are so bigoted they can't handle the existing debate, that they must resort to mudslinging and distraction tactics, and they'll use any kind of misrepresentation MRAs are willing to accept.

Letting feminists put the movement on the defensive by carefully framing their own over-reaction to cherry-picked factors and then associating them with the MRM invites this. Capitulation is asking to be slandered again. The behavior tells the shame-thrower, "Hey, look, an enormous target! Shoot here and we'll scramble for damage control just like you want, rendering us totally ineffective for a time."

All they have to do is get MRAs to treat their outragegasm as legitimate and an accurate representation of what they're responding to, and you let them achieve that by panicking without question over the terms in which they frame their complaint. They don't have to be accurate, honest, or even remotely rational, so long as their accusation is sufficiently scandalous, because even though they've demonstrated over and over again a determination to hate, oppose, and slander the movement, there are MRAs who continue to seek their approval.

You're not going to get their approval because their approval doesn't rely on what's right, on logic or reason, or on genuinely equal treatment. It relies on you keeping your head down and saying "okay." It relies on your agreement to subjugate your advocacy to feminist interests. It does not matter if you condemn 1000 PUAs, agree with feminists calling drunk sex rape, even let feminists define all of the terms of the dialogue. None of that will earn you a more open, friendly discussion because you are dealing with people who don't want to have it in the first place.

The Raw Story writer was not really complaining out of a belief that Roosh's article means MRAs want to legalize rape. Feminists do this because they know it will shut you up about men's issues for a while, as you're tied up with damage control. They know that leveling the right accusation the right way will spread hysteria throughout the community.

And over what? The article itself is simply using the style of A Modest Proposal to point out that ideology isn't an effective shield against crime. Contained in it is a paragraph driving home the point that rape is bad and the author understands that. The reaction to it is a typical female chip-knocked-off-the-shoulder knee-jerkin' temper dance. And what's the first thought the responding writer had after reading it, but how it could be used to silence advocates for boys in education, male victims of intimate partner and sexual violence, children's right to a relationship with their fathers; to muzzle opponents of debtors prisons and discriminatory law and policy and eclipse efforts to raise awareness of male suicide. How hateful!

The rush to frame this discussion in the most inflammatory way, light it on ideological fire, and throw it at the MRM isn't a misunderstanding. It's a bigoted attempt to enforce feminism's self-assigned entitlement to control the gender issues dialogue. And it'll continue to happen until MRAs stop falling for it. You want feminists to quit using PUAs as mud to sling at the men's rights movement? Take the benefit out of it! Stop giving them the reaction they want.

A privileged and pampered sex?

Peter Wright · 21 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The following Letter To The editor of Reynolds Newspaper in 1896 provides a snapshot of inequity before the law. Has anything changed? Well, no, it hasn't. Each new generation of men assumes they are the very first to witness gynocentric forces, a delusion showing why it's important for men to break past the historical amnesia and highlight gynocentrism's longevity so that our sons and their sons don't continue to get blindsided. – PW

A Privileged and Pampered Sex

TO THE EDITOR OF REYNOLDS NEWSPAPER

SIR,–A paragraph in your issue of the week before last stated that oakum-picking as a prison task had been abolished for women and the amusement of dressing dolls substituted. This is an interesting illustration of the way we are going at present, and gives cause to some reflection as to the rate at which a sex aristocracy is being established in our midst. While the inhumanity of our English prison system, in so far as it affects men, stands out as a disgrace to the age in the eyes of all Europe, houses of correction for female convicts are being converted into agreeable boudoirs and pleasant lounges.

A case in the police court before Sir John Bridge two or three weeks ago further brings into relief the sort of privilege and pampering accorded to one sex at the expense of the other. A woman of the town forced herself upon a young man going home at night and seized hold of his arm. On his shaking her off, the report says "she fell to the ground" (a well-known dodge). Sir John Bridge, on hearing the evidence, was bound to acquit the defendant, but added a rider to his judgement, advising the unfortunate man who had been first assaulted and then had a false charge brought against him, to compensate the woman with half-a-sovereign! Had some luckless male beggar (the brother, let us suppose, of the prosecutrix in this case), after having seized hold of a gentleman's arm and been shaken off, "fallen to the ground," and then prosecuted the said gentleman for assault, what would Sir John Bridge or any other Magistrate have said? Would he have suggested 10s. compensation or would he have given him ten weeks? I leave the reader to judge. But the several remarks with which Sir John accompanied his decision are especially noteworthy. He said in effect that “however badly these women behaved” the man ought not to resist them. In fact, the law of self-defence is to be suspended wherever females are the aggressors. This monstrous opinion is on par with the constant iteration in the present day of the “manly” duty of non-resistance and passive obedience to female domination.

We want, sir, a little of the sturdy, healthy, good sense of our ancestors to revisit the glimpses of the moon and speak out against these maudlin, whining, sentimentalisms, and tell us that there are occasions when women, despite the blithering weakness on which they sometimes presume, deserve as severe punishment in their own and the common interest as any male human being who grossly misbehaves himself. That anything in petticoats may ride roughshod over every requirement of decency, justice, or fair-play with impunity is a new doctrine, being assiduously preached, sauced with whimpering appeals to men’s chivalry, gallantry, and the rest of it. Woman’s “weakness” is now fast becoming as oppressive an engine of tyranny and inequality as exists in this or any other country. For though the rich man can sometimes buy off his tormentor, the poor man is handed over by the law, gagged and bound, to the caprices of any vile shrew whom in an evil moment for him he may have made his wife.

I am personally in favour of the abolition of corporal punishment, as I am of existing prison inhumanities, for both sexes, but the snivelling sentiment which exempts females on the ground of sex from every disagreeable consequence of their actions, only strengthens on the one side every abuse which it touches on the other. Yet we are continuously having the din of the “women’s rights” agitation in our ears. I think it is time we gave a little attention to men’s rights, and equality between the sexes from the male point of view.–Yours, &c.,

A MANLY PROTESTOR

White Ribbon CEO Libby Davies jumps the cash cow

Peter Wright & Paul Elam · 22 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

There is something we would very much like to know. Of all the activism they do, is there anything about the feminist "sisterhood" that could be deemed going too far, too corrupt, and which would inspire feminists of good conscience to unite and speak out against it passionately?

Nope. Not so far, and it appears that it will not happen now with WhiteRibbon.org.au (WRA), the Australian version of White Ribbon campaigns.

To put this in a nutshell, WRA is a cabal of very savvy business people dedicated to using the issue of violence against women as a way to self-enrich, travel and party — and literally nothing else.

Even if we take the outrageous feminist position and agree that intimate partner violence is best handled by pointing the finger at men only and helping only women, they are still a horrific investment. They provide no service and render no aid to anyone. This is not hyperbole. They make millions and do nothing save spoil themselves with it.

As one Australian journalist, Andrew Street of the Sydney Morning Herald, quipped:

> As part of this they enlist various male ambassadors whose job appears to consist of wearing a white ribbon, say something about how they don't bash women, and… actually, that would appear to be about it."

Feminist activists who work in or morally support the domestic violence industry (which only pays well at the top) sit silent; like obedient employees of an escort service. The reasons for it are not entirely clear.

Perhaps all the right people have been "made happy" by WRA and there are people who fear speaking up, but we are betting on a better answer. This kind of freak show is what you will inevitably see when people circle the wagons too tightly for too long; too much time with too little dissent and too little connection to reality. The hubris and glassy-eyed zeal spreads like mono in a middle school.

Predictably, they are starting to cannibalize each other.

So what does WRA actually do, or at least pretend to do? White Ribbon Australia is by all visible evidence in the business of getting people to sign an online pledge. They have a website hosting the pledge which has about 158,000 signatures.

They also "raise awareness" on White Ribbon Day by teaching schoolboys that they are bad. It makes us wonder, too, if this is the part of WRA that other feminists so admire.

Elizabeth Jackson, a writer for ABC Australia did not find the effort so admirable when her son reported to her that it was a day of bashing boys and making them feel bad.

Maybe some of the boys had smart phones and they could sign the petition.

That is what people get for 2 million a year? Seriously? Since 2009 WRA has collected over 10 million dollars and what they have to show for it is a meaningless online pledge and a day to pick on male children.

This is what feminist success looks like in 2015.

Speaking of that, if the mainstay of your shtick is an online petition, and you pull in that much freaking money, then why is your web presence for WRA less than Erin Pizzey's WhiteRibbon.org, which was literally slapped together a few months ago?

In web presence terms, WRA doesn't exist in any real way. Guess they could not afford web marketing for their web business, what with all the salary, perks and travel to cover.

Even Aussie feminist darling Clementine Ford had some harsh words for WRA:

> Ahmed's views are made all the more disturbing given his position as a White Ribbon Ambassador. Now, I don't have much time for the White Ribbon movement. Call me persnickety, but it seems to me that an organisation addressing men's violence against women should have more stringent standards for action than signing an essentially meaningless pledge and handing out a ribbon that can apparently be worn by anyone. The White Ribbon Foundation has, in my view, very carefully and subtly distanced itself from feminist activism in order to align itself with a more corporate, mainstream agenda that ignores the hard work done by underfunded women's health services across the country."

Seems like a lot of people of all flavors share one thing in common. They have no idea exactly what WRA does, even though the sad truth of it is plastered all over their financials.

Note that Ford complains of a "more corporate, mainstream agenda." She also implies gently that WRA has betrayed the sisterhood and made a cash grab as a small group that does nothing. She is right, of course. That is exactly what they have done. Not that it makes Ford look any better. There is no honor among theives — eventually greed will get them all.

The feminists who care enough about delivering services to battered women to actually do it are being 100% dissed on this deal in broad daylight as WRA laughs all the way to the bank (sorry, but these people are not worth avoiding cliches). Clementine Ford knows all of this, but offers vacant, milquetoast criticism, no more significant than WRA's silly pledge. The Sisterhood comes before everything, including The Sisterhood.

So, who are the real pimps here and what are they up to? Let's take a look.

The above image, an iconic clenched fist above a cowering girl, brings donations as surely as a big-eyed African child with his ribs showing. Well played. But distribution of revenue gained from such images, at least by WRA, is starting to raise more than a few eyebrows.

The White Ribbon Australia 2013-2014 Annual Report states:

> White Ribbon Australia, a company limited by guarantee, is a well established national not-for-profit organisation governed by a skilled Board and operational team which invests at least 85% of its income into primary prevention initiatives focusing on developing community leadership and capabilities to drive positive social change to prevent men's violence against women. [p.22]

White Ribbon Australia claims to invest 85% of its income into primary prevention initiatives. Let's see how this claim stacks up against their own financial statements, with a close eye on what percentage of the total income goes to staff.

White Ribbon Australia Financial Statements from 2009 – 2014

2009:

Total revenue: $1,044,520
Employee "benefit" scheme: $365,470
Employee "benefit" scheme as % of total revenue: 34.9%

2010:

Total revenue: $1,319,671
Employee "benefit" scheme: $411,506

Employee "benefit" scheme as % of total revenue: 31.1%
Percentage increase in employee "benefit" from previous year: Nil [decrease of -10.8%]

2011:

Total revenue: $1,658,444
Employee “benefit” scheme: $675,000

Employee “benefit” scheme as % of total revenue: 40.7%
Percentage increase in employee “benefit” from previous year: 30.8%

2012:

Total revenue: $1,574,456
Employee “benefit” scheme: $879,802

Employee “benefit” scheme as % of total revenue: 55.8%
Percentage increase in employee “benefit” from previous year: 37.1%

2013:

Total revenue: $2,046,724
Employee “benefit” scheme: $1,130,402

Employee “benefit” scheme as % of total revenue: 55.2%
Percentage increase in employee “benefit” from previous year: Nil

2014:

Total revenue: $2,697,261
Employee “benefit” scheme: $1,597,538

Employee “benefit” scheme as % of total revenue: 59.2%
Percentage increase in employee “benefit” from previous year: 7.2%

SUMMARY OF RESULTS:

As you can see, not only has yearly revenue been rising, but the employee “benefit” payment has been taking more of the total revenue too. Moreover, if staff are now receiving approximately 60% of White Ribbon’s total income, it is simply impossible that the organization “invests at least 85% of its income into primary prevention initiatives.”

Employee benefit as percentage of total revenue has risen from 34.9% in 2009, to 59.2% in 2014 – which is almost double the amount of cash being pocketed by a small number of employees. Said differently, in 2009 two-thirds of revenue went directly to violence prevention, whereas now, in 2014-15 almost two thirds go directly into the pockets of White Ribbon employees.

Moving forward, how much closer to 100% of total revenue will the employee “benefit” scheme amount to?

There’s no doubt about where donors’ money is going; the figures speak for themselves. It should also be noted that the employee “benefit” figures above have not included perks such as travel and accommodation, which significantly increases the amount of employee-driven expenses.

What level of “benefit” does Ms. Davies and her industry niche have in store for employees during 2015? We await the financial statements with the prediction that they will be as revealing as those which have come before.

This image does not bring donations

In light of the above figures, perhaps it is not surprising that the WRA Board chose to get rid of people like Dr. Tanveer Ahmed, the White Ribbon Ambassador who recently alluded to "male vulnerabilities" in mainstream media. Vulnerable males are not useful for harvesting WRA's employee "benefit" payments from gullible donors, who are only too happy to open their wallets for damsels in distress, but who are unmoved, and perhaps even repulsed, by discussions of male vulnerability.

That sums it up and there they are. WRA is top to bottom rotten, and precisely because it was designed to go unchallenged in an already hopelessly corrupt feminist establishment.

Given all this, please allow us to suggest a possible way to express your views on this matter. If you have a Twitter account, and you want to speak to the Australian people, click here.

Q&A tackles “Family Violence”

Greg Canning · 22 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Q&A tackles “Family Violence”

The publicly funded facilitator of politically correct and progressive media bias in Australia, the Australian Broadcasting Commission (ABC), will host an episode of it regular “Q&A” program looking at “Family Violence” on Monday 23 Feb, 9.35pm AEDT, Simulcast live on ABC News 24.

Q&A is described as putting “punters, pollies and pundits together in the studio to thrash out the hot issues of the week, live to air.”

Those familiar with the program will know a common tactic is to stack the panel of usually 5 persons plus the moderator with 3 or more often 4 usually politically correct or “progressive” panellists and invite a token conservative panellist or one with an opposing view to enable a veneer of inclusiveness. Suffice to say the studio audience usually appears similarly stacked, as do the questions selected to be asked of the panel.

On Wednesday of this week, 5 days before the program is due to air, I was invited to be the fifth panellist. Speaking to a Q&A representative by phone, I wondered why a representative of the 1in3 Campaign had not been invited, and was advised that they declined the invitation. It all seemed a bit fishy given I had previously attempted to cross swords with one of the other panellists Natasha Stott – Despoja via this open letter, calling out her bias on the issue of Domestic Violence.

Still the opportunity of possibly being able to draw attention to aspects of “Family Violence” left out of the debate around “violence against women” was attractive. This could include an examination of other types of family violence including elder abuse and child abuse where women are known to be the predominant offending group as well as illustrate how the extent of male victimisation in intimate relationships is far greater than commonly acknowledged.

The lack of services for male victims could be highlighted as an abuse of human rights and the state sanctioned sex discrimination that it is, especially in the context of “gender equality” being seen as a key goal in reducing violence. The malicious use trivial or false Domestic Violence Orders as a weapon of abuse and tool alienation of children could be put to a national audience… and much more.

But wait, why me? Was this a set up? Was it a just an opportunity to vilify me as an MRA, misogynist etc. Why would 1in3 decline such an opportunity?

I decided to contact the 1in3 campaign and this is where it gets interesting. They had been approached some time ago and they had offered Dr Elizabeth Celi, a well know psychologist and men’s health advocate. Elizabeth has made many media appearances, is a past board member of the Australian Psychological Society, and has published books on men’s health and male victims of domestic violence. 1in3 considered her best qualified and suited to the task, but the ABC declined this offer, they wanted another MALE panellist.

I’m not sure how many others were approached before they got to ask me, but know of at least one other. The panel has now been publicised and the fifth spot given to a Gold Coast Social Worker, Simon Santosha. As a member of the predominantly feminist / social justice inspired discipline of Social Work it’s not clear where Simon stands in regard to male victims of DV. Still he has expertise in couples counselling, an area that should be more widely available to mutually abusive partner who wish to stay together and strengthen their relationship without violence. We will see how he performs.

Of course the feminist social media frenzy and backlash once the panel makeup was announced was predictable, “structural sexism” at work they cawed with a 3:2 male female ratio discussing family violence. Little did they know that it was the ABC’s sexism at work. Ironically if Dr Celi had been accepted, the criticism would probably be the same, as her proven record in gender equality and compassion for all victims regardless of sex, does not sit well with the narrative espoused by the current wave of Aussie fembots.

I would encourage every one to tune in to the ABC or ABC News 24 and see how the show plays out. You can also ask questions online and comment during the show on the Q&A Twitter hashtag #QandA

Bigotry Exposed: Tracy Crawford of Roots ‘N Wings Montessori

Jonathan Taylor · 23 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Recently certain sectors of the Men’s Human Rights Movement were alerted to the comments of a Montessori school director on the website Quora[1] in which she openly stated that she refused to hire male teachers, assuming them all by default to be potential sexual predators.

She was never publicly identified. Until today.

Quora is a lot like Yahoo! Answers; people post questions, and the Quora community answers. This particular question was “Why aren’t there many men teaching in preschools and elementary schools? Do they hate being around children below the age 10?” Here are screenshots of her response and commentary:

Her comments of this Montessori director are particularly disturbing on their face, but are even worse in context of the more complicated reality of child sexual abuse and the decline of educational achievement for men and boys.

The comments were soon taken down. Screenshots were uploaded to Reddit shortly after, but her name was blurred out due to Reddit's posting requirements. Her profile picture was not blurred out, however, and we have been able to use that, as well as some simple Google searches, to identify this administrator. Her name is Tracy Crawford of Roots N' Wings Montessori[2] in Redwood City, California, as you can see on her Quora,[3] LinkedIn,[4] and Google+ profiles.[5]

I'd like to call activists to write a review on the school's Google+[6] and Yelp[7] pages (see sources below) and warn people of the attitude of the school's director. Their profiles only have 9-12 reviews each, so our statements could have a significant impact.

It should be well known that men and boys currently have severe problems concerning educational achievement.[8] One key solution that is often advocated is greater outreach and acceptance for male teachers, especially in early childhood education. "Coincidentally," Roots N' Wings Montessori focuses on early childhood education.

Interestingly, many other Quora users commenting in the same thread as Tracy Crawford mentioned that male teachers were frequently alienated from lower education and barred from being positive role-models to children due to the kind of hysteria Crawford herself indulges in.

It should also be widely known (but unfortunately isn't) that women are very often the sexual abusers of children as well. A study by the National Center on Child Abuse and Neglect (NCCAN), for example, discovered that 25% of sexual abuse victims were victimized by adult women.[9]

We also periodically see media accounts of female teachers convicted (and too often given a slap on the wrist) for sexually abusing children. One notable case is that of Megan Denman from California,[10] the same state as Roots N' Wings Montessori. Megan believed that she should not serve any jail time for sexually abusing her students.

And why?

Because she was a woman. She literally cited the fact that other female teachers had sexually abused children and avoided jail time as the basis for her expectation that she should be allowed to follow suit. She believed – as many unfortunately do – that being a woman gave her a per se entitlement to sexually abuse children with impunity.

Despite the "concerns" of administrators like Tracy Crawford, I've never heard a man take the position that simply being male gave him such a right, and I've never seen any evidence of a widespread social permissiveness for men to do so.

But that permissiveness is a problem when women are the abusers. Just hop over to The Guardian, where Feminist Barbara Ellen argues that women who rape children should be spared punishment.[11] Or simply follow the many other cases where female sexual abuse is dressed up as "care-giving" when perpetrated on younger children, or a "relationship" or "affair" when perpetrated on older children.

So no, I do not think that such bias against men exists because men "abuse children more than women do," assuming that is even the case since much female sexual abuse is hidden because it is reclassified. Instead, it is clear that this prejudice exists against men for no other reason than because they are men.

Some men's advocates may be tempted to classify Tracy Crawford as a Feminist. And depending on how you define Feminism she very well could be. Montessori schools, however, are more often known for being bastions of traditionalism, which is why they often have religious overtones as well (Roots N' Wings is located on the property of a church, for example).

A common mindset among those who espouse traditional attitudes regarding gender is that women are supposed to have primacy over children. As for men who take an interest in educating and inspiring children to be lifelong learners, they simply don't "know their place" if they hope to be seen as women's equals. Combine that entitled mentality with the cowardice school administrators are rightfully well known for, and you get a person like Tracy Crawford.

There are a lot of Tracy Crawfords out there, and they are able to get away with rampant discrimination – fueled by nothing but prejudice – behind the secrecy of closed doors. But, with our help, their actions won't be a secret for much longer.

Let's make the public aware of this administrator! Access their Google+ and Yelp pages in sources [6] and [7] below.

Sources:

[1] Original post at AVMFS
[2] School website
[3] Tracy Crawford's Quora profile
[4] Tracy Crawford's LinkedIn profile
[5] Tracy Crawford's Google+ profile
[6] Roots N' Wings Montessori Google+ Review Page
[7] Roots N' Wings Montessori Yelp Review Page
[8] Statistics on men's and boys' educational decline
[9] Study by National Center on Child Abuse and Neglect (NCCAN) on female sexual abusers
[10] The Megan Denman story
[11] Barbara Ellen's rationalization of rape by female teachers

Anonymous email received re: University of Nevada, Reno

AVFM · 23 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

So we recently received an interesting anonymous email from someone at the University of Nevada, forwarding on recent communications from the administration there. Doing a little research, it appears to be legit. That being the case, here's our promise to the University of Nevada, Reno: knowing that most male victims will not use your form since almost nobody takes female sexual predation seriously–and since your Orwellian "anonymous reporting" form will almost certainly work like Occidental College or other colleges, where students can be hauled in for questioning and warnings based on completely unsubstantiated allegations, we promise to do everything we can to encourage people both inside and outside your university to make spurious reports to your system just to demonstrate that what you're doing is an obscenity; anonymous tips as well as non-anonymous reports should go to the police. You as administrators are not in any way qualified in this area, and your persecution of male students with these witch-hunt forms have no place in a modern liberal democracy (or anywhere that human rights are respected).

In any case, here's the Orwellian plans being set in motion at University of Nevada, Reno. –Eds.

—

To Whom It May Concern:

Due to my position at UNR it would be unwise of me to reveal my identity. UNR has plans to shortly initiate an anonymous reporting process for sexual assault on campus. The Title IX director is named Denise Cordova and I presume she is responsible for this decision. Please keep an eye on their antics before their purge of male students can begin. I will keep this site up to date with relevant updates as possible.

Thanks

—[Email to university faculty and students from anonymous source follows]—

Dear University of Nevada, Reno Students and Colleagues,

Sexual assault on college campuses continues to be a significant topic for our nation and our University community as well. I am writing to share results from a recent survey of our students regarding sexual conduct and safety and to ask for your continued efforts in creating a respectful and supportive campus climate.

In November 2014, the University of Nevada, Reno voluntarily initiated the "Sexual Conduct and Campus Safety Survey," an action we believe puts us at the forefront of universities seeking to understand this issue among students. We care about our students and we know that experiencing unwanted sexual conduct can negatively impact well-being and future success. The University has many services and resources in place and we have seen impressive student-driven, peer-to-peer initiatives emerge. The goal of conducting the survey was to develop meaningful information to further strengthen these efforts and contribute to a supportive campus climate that has zero tolerance for sexual assault, sexual misconduct and other actions that damage the lives of others. It is imperative we maintain a campus culture that reinforces a sense of hope, potential and personal achievement; we must remain a University that aspires to the highest ideals in all manner of personal conduct.

The survey and the terminology and definitions used were adapted from the federal toolkit for campus climate surveys highlighted in the April 2014 White House report "Not Alone." The University's survey was sent by email to all degree-seeking students. The 33 percent response rate eclipsed our participation goal and indicates students care about this issue and took this opportunity seriously.

We learned that students generally feel safe on campus and most occurrences of unwanted sexual contact (80 percent) happen off campus. Many of our key findings reflect trends reported nationally: sexual assault is vastly underreported, the victim most often knows the perpetrator (80 percent of incidents) and alcohol and drugs contribute (33 percent of incidents). Here are other important findings from our survey:

· Students recognize they can do something about sexual violence and generally indicate they – especially women and those who have participated in training – have a high willingness to intervene as a bystander, assist a friend or stranger and learn more.

· Sexual violence affects both men and women. Men and women are victims, and men and women are perpetrators.

· While only about 9 percent of incidents are reported to officials on or off campus, a high percentage of victims – 66 percent of men and 78 percent of women – do share their experience with someone. This points to the essential role of a roommate, friend, romantic partner or parent in helping the victim. Students not only need to know where to go if they are a victim of sexual assault, but they also need to understand the resources available to allow them to support a friend.

· There are many reasons victims choose not to report an incident, and the survey shows the most prevalent are embarrassment, a desire to keep it private and fear of retribution, typically socially oriented.

As noted, the survey findings can help us improve, and every member of our campus community can contribute. For example, each of us can encourage or participate in these continued efforts:

· Student-driven, peer-to-peer initiatives, such as the I Stand initiative which encourages students to stand for consent, Green Dot bystander training, and open and honest discussions of what respectful and healthy sexual consent means.

· Workshops and seminars available on a wide range of prevention topics such as self-esteem and self-defense, and response topics such as reporting an assault, support for students and the student conduct process. These programs continue to be offered in residence halls, fraternities and sororities, athletics, student organizations, new student orientation and new employee orientation, and through annual training for faculty, staff and students.

· Workshops and seminars on gender, sexism, stereotypes, myths and other topics that address the underlying issues that must be considered when creating a climate of respect.

· Alcohol and drug education efforts.

· Educating yourself on how to help a student or colleague secure the assistance they need if they have been involved in sexual misconduct.

The survey results affirm the need to continue to extend on-campus resources for victims that ensure availability of a variety of reporting options and resources such as free counseling through the University's Counseling Center, staffed by skilled mental health professionals with specialized training. I am pleased to announce new resources being added to further strengthen our ability to support victims:

· A victim advocate from the region's Crisis Call Center will be assigned to the campus and this important, grant-funded position will provide confidential crisis intervention, information and referral, and accompaniment to medical and legal services as requested by students and employees.

· A case manager, also grant-funded, will assist the Office of Equal Opportunity and Title IX in the investigation of sexual assault complaints and provide timely implementation of student safety plans as they relate to academic success and living accommodations.

· An option for anonymous reporting of sexual assault or sexual misconduct will soon be available. This service will be administered by the Office of Equal Opportunity and Title IX.

For more information on the "Sexual Conduct and Campus Safety Survey" visit www.unr.edu/beheard. For those interested, the National Council of Juvenile and Family Court Judges and the University are hosting "A Healing Community: The Effects of Sexual Assault and Trauma on the Victim." This free, public event is Wednesday, Feb. 18 at 5:30 p.m. in the Mathewson-IGT Knowledge Center's Wells Fargo Auditorium.

Sexual assault has no place in our society, let alone in our campus community. Acknowledging the issue, conducting the survey, drawing on the important information we have gathered, and embracing the opportunity to improve are important actions. If you have questions or suggestions for improvement, please contact me at elliss@unr.edu.

Shannon Ellis
Vice President for Student Services
University of Nevada, Reno

Editorial note: Title image by Ryan Jerz, modified for our size requirements, used under this license.–Eds

The Incapables in Portugal: Isabel Feio speaks about us in #MariaCapaz

Aldir Gracindo · 23 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Isabel Feio offered a feminist analysis of the men's movement at the "incapables" feminist site. [1] For a feminist, she didn't do that badly. Still, in keeping with feminist norms, she is intellectually dishonest.

It is true that the men's movement, in which identified masculinists are included, has in part emerged as a consequence of the institutionalized anti-male bigotry propagated by feminist ideologues. The reaction of men and the women who care about them is further fueled by disciminatory policies being adopted at the state level internationally.

That reaction still comes as somewhat of a shock to feminists, and indeed to society at large. Men generally have no tendency to stand up for themselves monolithically. They're expected (and historically comply) with the mandate to fight for church, state and family, but never for themselves or their fellow men as an identified demographic.

Feio's reaction to that begins to evidence itself in the form of fanciful interpretation which gets thick in the second paragraph of her article. She seems to be under the impression (or wants her readers to be) that the MHRM is solely and distinctly a reaction to feminist ideology. She appears oblivious to the fact that judicial discrimination and media misandry have cultural roots that far predate first wave feminism, but have been elevated to new pervasive heights precisely because of the hateful campaigns on which Isabel Feio so depends.

The feminist movement itself is in part a perpetual campaign against women being badly represented in the media, regardless of the accuracy of the representations. This includes when feminists say those representations are misogynistic, when they're not – as when feminists use the fallacy of accusing the media of participating in an imagined rape culture that does not and never has existed.

At the same time legislation, lobbied for by feminists, determine that men are default criminals — threats within their own families and to society at large. That's feminism, and it instructs judges and other state functionaries how to treat men, not as husbands or fathers, and certainly never as victims, but as the privileged, abusive, violent criminals they almost always are not.

Feio talks about an "International Association of Masculinists." If she's talking about who I think she is, they believe misogyny is a tool for change in society – we, MHRAs, don't. Thus I find it implausible that we could succeed in creating a force so destructive as to compare with feminism. Paraphrasing Lenin, we have our own ways to "bend the stick."

There is a range of ways wounded, betrayed men react. As our colleague Fidelbogen says, "You can't poison half a well." We are put to the task of fighting different results of what feminist campaigns, feminist policies and feminist "contributions" to culture create. Many men simply react vociferously to the mostly contrived feminist social narrative. This society is so "misogynistic", "patriarchal", "machista", and "phallocentric," that it is blind to the unjust incarcerations; to the extortion of taxes that will never be reinvested in the benefit of men who pay them; to the destruction and impoverishment of post-divorce families; to the cultural, educational and institutional demonization promoted by "Isabel Feio's" ilk; to the plethora of other issues that place invisible elephants in the living rooms of homes across the planet.

What unique oppressors!

All this is occurring in societies where feminists teach boys from an early age in school that they are inherently defective; that they are rapists-in-waiting who need to bow to feminist ideology to make themselves worthy of love and compassion; the very things that ideology thrives on robbing them of in the end.

There is a massive campaign to end (rightfully) female genital mutilation. It runs concurrent with an even more massive campaign to genitally mutilate men and boys all over the African continent for profit. The hypocrisies are just too many to cover at one time.

Isabel Feio speaks about A Voice for Men in the expected feminist tone. Says Isabel Feio:

> Men's Rights Activist groups – such as A Voice for Men – claim to be antifeminists for they don't believe in feminism's seriousness in the eradication of inequalities faced by men…

That's right!

> …and they advocate parities that, according to them, men never had: equal access to children after divorce, mandatory paternity test to each new born, shelters for men who are victims of domestic violence, equal treatment in the Judicial System, political parties and media

She is being simplistic, we know that. Surely men and women have their difficulties, the shared and the sex-specific. Among many we could mention, women always, in some level of their minds, know what it means to have merely the worth of beauty and sexual potential. And men, in some level of their minds, know what it is to be the financial, social, physical, living stairway, guard dog, weapon, sacrificial lamb, and saviour, for the benefit of others. It is men who keep streets and roads paved, water in the tap, sewers working, elevators, windows, planes, baggage and goods moving; and the scraps of republics and democracies still possible. It is on men's work and/or sacrifice, including of their lives (they are almost the totality of the dead at work, we shouldn't forget that, among plenty of other facts of "male privilege"), that we achieved and keep civilization, wherever we have it.

The problem is that we have learned to see women as Human Beings, but in standards of Human Being we never had before, including for men. But we keep men as Human Doings, not Human Beings. And nowadays, in our political ideologies and political, populist praxis, gynocentrism and misandry are there to keep men strictly as human doings, almost all men. Plus, being demonized and blamed for all hindrances and suffering, past and present (feminist in the populist left wing); and massive, everlasting propaganda for men kept in the naïve and suicidal role of proud human doings (gynocentric conservatives in the populist right wing), in exchange for any poor alms, like a medal and on their coffins, or that pathetic compliment of "You boy are a real man." On both camps of political partisanship, men are not to enter the realm of Human Beings, and that has profound roods (on both sides, let's repeat that) and passionately, zealously, propagated.

> once, they say, there are studying showing that the media portraits men negatively in the vast majority – presenting them as dumb, criminals, cheaters, paedophiles, rapists and murderers.

Excuse me, but I don't believe Isabel Feio is badly informed to the point that she doesn't know how about the misandry in the media. And how her movement consistently reinforces exactly all the negative stereotypes she has mentioned about men. And much more that only those who know feminist theories and campaigns, and are not feminist or traditional gynocentrists, can know the monstrosity of propaganda I am talking about.

Yes, the feminist movement is also campaigning for having more women on the top of corporate and political decisions, no matter how incompetent those women might be.

No, feminism and women are not the same thing. They never were, never will be.

Isabel Feio also uses the routine of well-known feminist framing routine: All men's and boys' problems are caused by "machismo". By "the machismo". This "machismo", Isabel, is a feminist fabrication, it belongs to feminist theory, perspective and convenience. It's used to artificially make men culprits for all the problems. As if only men had made all of the bad, and shouldn't be acknowledged for anything good. Well, men have built civilization, and they certainly wouldn't have done it without women. In addition, it has always been deeply dishonest to assume that women, the most traditional educators of the new generations, never had any power or influence in the making of cultural patterns, cultural gender roles, and that they didn't influence those patterns according to their interests.

Another known routine is, "men are not to blame for your problems, women don't deserve your hatred." First, the ones who single one demographic to blame for the evils on Earth, via hate euphemisms like "The Patriarchy" and "The Machismo" are the incapable ones (meaning, the feminists), not us. Feminist pseudo-scientific theories about men are worst then the Nazi theories about the Jews! We don't do that, we abhor the injustice and cruelty of that! Nevertheless, feminism presents us a plethora of fallacious and incoherent theories, with sophisticated academic varnish, to bypass those kind of ethical principles. In the meanwhile, feminists keep doing what is already proverbial: They (or you) accuse us of what they do, call us what they are.

Another routine repeated by the incapable Isabel: she recites "the white hetero male." The Pavlovian appeal to the common grave of SJW. A code, a ringing bell that triggers the hordes, prepared by post-modern leftist indoctrinators disguised as teachers and professors for decades, to blindly attack a chosen target. Nevertheless, men, white and heterosexual and "cis" don't come in the same package. Some men are white, some are gay, some are very poor, some are not, and so on. The other effect feminists intend with those trigger words is to spark angry backlash of unprepared, uneducated, anti-politically correct people, who will be made rhetorical scarecrows, or bogeymen to "prove" the urgent need for more money and power for feminist organizations and bank accounts. You see, that doesn't work that well with us. Shame on you. Fail.

Moreover, it's not you, feminist ideologues – which are the movement against "The machismo", "The Patriarchy", or, let us be clear, against the alleged evil and pervasive man-power that destroys everything, or, this insidious hate propaganda against all men and boy that you do for a century – the ones to define what is "superior" or "inferior" masculinity.

In order to not keep repeating old refutations to the old feminist arguments of Isabel Feio and her colleagues, I'm just leaving two articles in video, among so many available:

So, when the Portuguese feminist says we must "calm down", we understand her incapability. It would be good to have the discussion in a higher level. The interactions with gender ideologues tend to fall in the deepest, filthiest common rhetorical trenches of fallacies, mean spiritedness, debauchery and more. It is not only low and coarse. It is, at least to me, tedious and childish. However, the simple reason, we used it in the 90's! Today we adapt the discourse not only to our frank indignation, but also to the social need. That, too, is what AVfM exists for. For any level of debate, we find important for Men's and Boy's rights and dignity as Human Beings.

Some things are certain, feminists. We, MHRAs, are here and we are not going away, we are growing, working and producing some results. If you were the decent people you pretend to be, we wouldn't be in different movements.

Salutations from the Men's and Boys' Human Rights Movement.

Aldir Gracindo
A Voice for Men for the community of Portuguese speaking countries.

Notes:

[1] Capaz means "capable" in Portuguese. I beg to disagree on the adjective, concerning to feminists. We are not sorry for that.

[2] Originally posted on A Voice for Men Brazil in Portuguese.

Zen Men will die without volunteers

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 23 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The new Zen Men LLC (ZM) is one of the most successful men's rights ventures in academia, which is why it hurts me to say that if I cannot build a dedicated managerial team by May 1st, I have to allow Zen Men to expire.

No, this is not me quitting, this is Zen Men being too big of a ship to run without a crew. When I say "I can't do this alone," I'm not giving you fluff about the meaning of friendship, I really mean I can't do this alone.

Having an organization grow too quickly is a good problem to have, but it is a problem nonetheless.

The bright and passionate Kennesaw State University student officers in the original chapter will continue governing on that campus, but I am now operating the parent organization without help. This harshly limits both my personal life and ZM, because my volunteer efforts now take too much time for me to hold down a full-time job along with school.

There are MHRAs counting on me to help them with projects, but I can't do so if ZM takes all of my time. A burnt-out activist is useless, and no airplane would fly if one person acts as the pilot, the flight attendant, the engineer and the traffic controller at the same time.

I am not going to disrespect donors by spinning wheels and working to the point of dysfunction. Struggling to maintain a machine without getting a chance to actually use it helps nobody. This is why Zen Men needs committed volunteers.

ZM needs top-level managers, middle managers, lower level managers, and creative activists to keep everything running smoothly. All top-level managers will report to weekly meetings to discuss where we are and where we're going.

You can read summaries of the responsibilities associated with each available position on our volunteer page. The specific, measurable expectations of each position are available to candidates who reach out.

ZM needs every position on the volunteer page filled, but these positions need people immediately:

- Chief Operations Officer (COO): Oversees operations, and designs processes and programs to create and maintain revenue streams for the organization.
- Chief Strategic Planning Officer (CSPO): Develops and applies broad strategies and processes for purposes of activism.
- Secretary: Prepares, maintains and reports meeting minutes and agendas. Must attend every top-level meeting.
- Recruiter: Finds passionate, qualified volunteers for activist projects or organizational business.

Serious inquiries only! I will evaluate candidates and their backgrounds with interviews. All candidates must agree to uphold the mission statement and learn the detailed responsibilities of their chosen position in our discussion. Volunteers will accomplish most—if not all—of their work over the Internet.

Zen Men LLC can take public policy away from gynocentric and misandric forces. To make that happen, just email me at sage@avoiceformen.com and state the position that calls to you.

It's up to you all to help me start the new Renaissance.

A solution to prevent veteran suicide

AVfM Video Source · 24 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Veteran suicide is especially tragic. The Netherlands have a solution.

While others sling mud, we till the soil

Paul Elam · 24 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

While our not-so-esteemed opponents busy themselves with exhaustive efforts to paint us as a sinister menace; a blight on humanity, we have been busy with a few things of our own.

As of today, A Voice for Men is now operating under the structure of two Limited Liability Companies. AVFM Operations, LLC and AVFM Education, LLC are now in place and a lot of things are about to change around here for the better.

I am going to give you a basic sketch of what is about to happen and either myself, David King, Al Martin or Dean Esmay will fill you in with other details as needed.

Some basic changes in operations are about to take place and I am writing this to give you an understanding of how and why.

It has become apparent through years of what can only be called successful growth that we are hard pressed to mount anywhere near the initiatives we would like depending on donations from mostly disaffected men. Something about struggling to keep yourself out of prison for child support arrears, or having to restructure your entire life after a ruinous divorce not only explains the tough financing, but why we need a movement in the first place.

And since the most common reaction to men and boys in trouble is a yawn and instruction not to whine, we are forced to go in another direction. Ford Foundation is not taking our calls.

So, the first order of business is to announce an end to our quarterly fundraisers. They will be replaced by quarterly membership drives. Memberships will be billed annually or monthly and will be available at varying levels of support. Details have yet to be worked out but there will be an announcement in the near future.

Next, AVFM Operations, LLC will be taking advantage of the rather large internet presence we have built together to monetize content on a variety of levels. And yes, that means ads. They are already up on the mobile version of the site and will be up before too long on mainsite.

We understand that advertising tends to clutter up the yard, especially as some ads run counter to the values of this community. With that in mind we will be making the site ad free for paid subscribers. All content on mainsite will still be available for free, but if you want to dispense with the annoying ads it will require a subscription. It's a very fair deal for those that support what we are trying to do.

The current donation buttons will remain until our bank accounts are set up and the corresponding business PayPal accounts are established. That should not be very long and there will be a note in the bulletins when it happens.

Additionally, you will see AVFM launch a series of new projects in the coming months, including our own publishing house, Zeta Press, which we think holds great promise.

We will also be providing web hosting services for those in the men's movement community to host blogs and websites, secure in the knowledge that the only standards they have to worry about are AVFM's.

We will continue with conferences at least on a yearly basis and hope to expand that into more, smaller events at different locations and different times of the year.

Mental health professional continuing education units will remain available through AVFM Education, LLC for all events.

We are also investing in more sophisticated (read: expensive) video and audio recording equipment which will enable us to produce a new and very much improved line of video programming. This will apply to our YouTube programming as well as conference live streams and DVDs.

AND SPEAKING OF THAT, many months after the event, with everything going wrong that could possibly go wrong with data, the conference DVDs from ICMI ’14 are to be picked up by me tomorrow. They will be packaged and shipped as quickly as I can make that happen, with my apologies for the delays, and my promise that I will not let this kind of delay happen again. I make stupid mistakes sometimes, but usually not twice.

Finally, AVFM will be switching to what I call a business model of activism. The fact is that activism sucks money out of your pocket like a coke habit. And as I alluded to earlier, we can’t expect the men who need it the most to finance it. What we aim to do is to take on advertising (as long as they mind their place), offer valuable education and conference services, web hosting, literature and other products as we develop them to a growing community of people who are getting tired of the crap they get from GQ and Buzzfeed.

I think it is fairly safe to say that AVFM has done its part in the growth of that community.

We will still be counting on you. We will need your memberships and your business for things like web hosting and books. We will need to see you at our conferences. Our online stores will need your traffic. Our YouTube channel will need your subs and likes.

The intent here is to provide you and others with value for what you give in addition to the activism we already do.

We think it is a fair deal, and we are committed to making it work.

I need to close with a note of thanks to David King, who in addition to being a technical wizard with our servers, has also shown a great deal of solid business acumen, tenacity and attention to detail to see us through the painful, arduous process of restructuring AVFM into its current form. No one will ever know the ungodly amount of work he put into this and anyone who supports what we do should know it.

And that is it, gents and ladies. AVFM today, in the midst of an unprecedented string of frontal assaults by the mainstream media, has responded by getting busy with our future.

We sincerely hope you will join us for the effort.

GQ's Jeff Sharlet pimps out Blair Braverman for clickbait

Paul Elam · 24 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

OK, so GQ has released its contribution to the recent parade of hack journalism about the Men's Human Rights Movement. This particular balloon float of pristine yellow was inflated with hot air from writer Jeff Sharlet. I am afraid it won't stay afloat long, at least to anyone capable of critical thought. Floats don't do well when they are full of holes.

Jeff's antics are plentiful in this unnecessarily long and wandering piece, dedicated to shaming men who see something rotten with modern feminism and painting them as the tried and true sexual threats in waiting that feminists are always wailing about. It will be best to make a few good articles in response; mercifully shorter and a good bit more honest than Sharlet's.

Right now I want to address Sharlet's anti-climactic attempt at playing the master "gotcha" when he shows up at my hotel room with Blair Braverman. Blair's the girl who narrowly escaped the clutches of the sinister Sage Gerard earlier in the day when he almost raped her at the conference in front of (or maybe with the help of!) the Honey Badgers. Alas, another piece, another day.

Blair Braverman. When she is not the sidekick of a yellow journalist, she is a marsupial.

Sharlet shows up at my room late. He is sans the bottle of Maker's 46 he has promised but he has Braverman in tow. Jeff, being the astute, journalisticky guy he is sets the tone by saying, "Elam is pleased by the entrance of another female."

Oh really? Mr. Sharlet is in my head now? I suppose he is gifted or something. Clairvoyant maybe? Anyway, I say that just to make a point. Setting the scene of your story with the writer mindreading doesn't work unless you are Stephen King. One pass through Sharlet's article will confirm that is not the case. Jeff continues:

"He fixes her with a gaze that says, 'I really want to listen to you.'"

Well, at least he hinted at some reason to suppose what was in my mind, but it hardly seems remarkable. I seldom ask questions when I am not interested in the answer. That comes with warm and gushy "I really want to listen to you," kind of vibe. But I have to pass on the gaze thing. Too many rounds of "evil male gaze" propaganda of late.

Jeff, courtesy of his mind and eye reading, has set up his scene now. He is going for the coup d'état, the inappropriate rape conversation….with a woman!

> I'm curious," Elam says. "What did your friends think when you told them you were coming here?"
>
> "To be honest?" Blair asks. Elam nods. She says, "I had friends who said I'd get raped."
>
> Blink. You can almost see the struggle in Elam's bones: Play the nice guy? Or the perv? No question. "All right!" he booms, swinging his arms together. "Let's get started!"
>
> Jazz winces.
>
> "Get the video camera!" Factory yells at his girlfriend, who giggles weakly.
>
> I should be very clear here: At no point does it seem like Elam or Factory is actually going to rape Blair. We know they're joking. Just a couple of middle-aged guys joking around about rape with a young woman they've never met before in a hotel room at one in the morning."

Yes Jeff, there we were, a couple of middle-aged guys, joking about rape at one in the morning with the girl (much more on her later), who you brought to our hotel room — who had also just walked in with you after friends told her she was going to get raped. The same girl you had already sent after Sage Gerard earlier.

Pretty freaking funny if you ask me. Sharlet actually missed some of our best lines that night.

And I need to come back to something else you said, Jeff, if you don't mind us speaking so intimately here in front of the world. This:

> I should be very clear here: At no point does it seem like Elam or Factory is actually going to rape Blair. We know they're joking."

I am so thankful for your concern to be so clear with your readers, but I don't really think they are that stupid.

Let's see, a girl enters a room with a journalist. The room is occupied by two or three men, including the girl's boyfriend, a clinical psychologist and another woman. The girl informs the group she has been told she will be raped if she comes there, and we all laugh it up.

If your readers at GQ need it so "clearly" pointed out that this is not a serious rape threat to pretty young Blair, then I would suggest submitting your work here. We don't pay, but at least you won't be writing for impressionable morons who would need that explained.

By the way, Blair is into dogs, but I want to make it perfectly clear that I don't mean that in a sexual way.

Clearly Jeff examined what he had written at this point, and in a fit of hopelessness blathered away his account of the rest of the evening on a diatribe of "These guys actually think men have problems, hardy har har harr."

It is good fodder, I suppose, when you don't respect your audience enough to be honest with them. Concerns about false rape accusations are easy to paint as paranoid, even when it has happened to the men you are mischaracterizing. Easier still to attribute even more paranoia about the mainstream media, even when you are the mainstream media, and you have shown up there with a plant to help you create the story you want to write. And when you are busy cherry picking quotes, making fun of us for taking issue with cherry picking quotes.

There was a time when places like GQ and, duh, Rolling Stone, would take serious issue with a "journalist" manufacturing a story. But we all know those days are gone, don't we Jeffy? It's all about the clicks and the bucks.

It's all Buzzfeed now, ain't it?

LiveScience, stop spreading lies!

Lucian Vâlsan · 24 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

A few days ago, LiveScience published an article titled Gendered Grammar Linked to Global Sexism by Stephanie Pappas, an article which quotes researcher Jennifer Prewitt-Freilino, a psychologist at the Rhode Island School of Design who is quoted as saying that "more and more research that is starting to come out looking at grammatical gender and language suggests that it has more of an impact than you would think."

The problem is that the article is either ideological claptrap at best or a bigoted lie at worst. I will explain why, with quotes directly from the piece.

The article categorizes languages of the planet as being either "natural gender languages" (i.e. languages who don't assign gender to nouns, such as Finnish or English) or "gendered languages" (i.e. languages who do assign gender to nouns, such as Spanish or French). This categorization is imperfect to say the least, but if that were the only problem with the narrative promoted by LiveScience, I wouldn't bother writing this response.

The piece begins by saying:

> Languages in which nouns are given male or female status are linked to gender inequality, according to a new study that compares languages and equality across the globe.
>
> Surprisingly, though, languages with no gender at all — where even "he" and "she" are represented by the same word — are associated with the most gender inequality, perhaps because people automatically categorize gender-neutral references as male.

So, in other words, cultures with gendered language are more sexist, and, not to let any culture off guilt-free, cultures with NO gendered language are the most sexist. Really? So Finland, a country where people speak a genderless language, is on par with Yemen (a country with gendered languages) in terms of gender equality?

The "most gender inequality" links to a piece about women in the military. In other words, the supporting link for the assertion that countries in which people speak genderless languages are associated with the most gender inequality doesn't actually support that assertion at all. In fact, that "supporting" link is not even a link about other countries or about language – it's a story about the US military and what Rick Santorum was saying 3 years ago. Seriously, LiveScience?

Moving forward with the piece, it then goes on to say:

> "These are aspects of language that seem very mundane and seem like they wouldn't make a difference," said study researcher Jennifer Prewitt-Freilino, a psychologist at the Rhode Island School of Design. "But more and more research that is starting to come out looking at grammatical gender and language suggests that it has more of an impact than you would think."

The words "grammatical gender" links to a 2011 LiveScience article called Sexism and Racism Linked to Personality. Again, not an article about language – but an article about a study made in the Basque region in Spain.

For those of you who don't know, the Basque region is one of the most nationalistic places in Europe. That place was the home of a particularly nasty terrorist group called Euskadi Ta Askatasuna (ETA) which tormented Spain and France for some time and which finally disarmed almost a year ago.

In other words, the sample of the study is quite irrelevant when it comes to the assertion that "grammatical gender" is correlated with anything. It's like making a study within the neo-Nazi party of Jobbik and then concluding that speaking Hungarian makes one a Nazi. This isn't science – this is prejudiced tosh!

To make things even better, the 2011 article, also written by Stephanie Pappas, quoted to support the nonsensical contention about "grammatical gender" also has this gem in it:

> Hostile sexism is defined in this study as a dislike of women. Benevolent sexism, in contrast, is the view that women are weak and in need of male protection.

How convenient. No matter what, women must be victims. If no victim can be found, we'll manufacture one by twisting the language (how ironic) so that people believe us. Mind you, the Basque study was made back in the days of Gender Stalinism in Spain.

Again, this is not science – this is ideologically driven claptrap. If you define "sexism" as "dislike of women" well, lo and behold, if you ask the right questions, you'll find a certain level of "dislike of women" but that doesn't say much if you're only looking at half the picture.

But it gets even worse. Then the article goes on to say:

> In other words, our thoughts don't just shape our language. Our language may also shape our thoughts. For example, one 2009 study asked high-school students to read a passage in English, Spanish or French. English is a "natural gender" language, meaning that speakers use gender-specific pronouns, but nouns do not have gender. Spanish and French are "gendered" languages, in which nouns are assigned as masculine and feminine. In Spanish, for example "la fruita" (the fruit) is feminine, but "el dia" (daytime) is masculine.
>
> Compared with the students who read the passages in English, those who read in gendered languages responded with higher levels of sexism to a questionnaire they took after the study.

The words "higher levels of sexism" lead to the same article Sexism and Racism Linked to Personality. Are you kidding me?

Again, the article Ms. Pappas quotes to support her assertion "those who read in gendered languages responded with higher levels of sexism" has nothing to do whatsoever with either language or comparison of attitudes between individuals who read anything in different languages.

For all we know, that 2009 study may not even exist. But even if it did, the article doesn't give us a clear reference so we can check it ourselves.

It gets even worse:

> Prewitt-Freilino and her colleagues wanted to take a broader look. Using the World Economic Forum's Global Gender Gap Index, which measures inequality between men and women in economics, education, politics and health, they compared nations' inequality to the type of language most frequently spoken there. Of the 134 countries included in the index, 54.5 percent spoke predominately gendered languages, 9 percent spoke natural gender languages and 19.4 percent spoke genderless languages. Genderless languages include Finnish, which uses the same pronoun for males and females. The remaining countries spoke some mixture of gendered, natural gender and genderless languages. [See Country Gender-Equality Rankings]

The first flaw in this approach is that you have over half of the sample of one type. So of course you'll have more countries that speak gendered languages in both the most "unequal" (whatever that means) and the most "equal" group.

And if you click on the "See Country Gender-Equality Rankings" you'll get to this article which proves my point: half of the first 12 "countries with the most gender equality" speak "gendered" languages. In other words, the assertion from the title is just blatantly wrong.

Moreover, that table also flies in the face of the assertion that countries that speak a "genderless" language are even more sexist. How can that be if the leader of the "equal" table is a country that speaks a "genderless" language (Finland, in this case)?

Also, in the top 12 most "equal" nations, there are 2 that speak a "genderless" language and in the top 11 most "unequal" nations, there are also 2 that speak a "genderless" language.

In other words, the article is just an ideologically-driven lie. None of it is even remotely true – not even by their own standards set in the tone of the article which allegedly reports a "correlation" and not a causation. Well, the correlation just isn't there – by your own data!

Ms. Pappas goes on to say:

> On average, countries where gendered languages are spoken ranked lowest on the scale of gender equality, researchers reported in the journal Sex Roles. But surprisingly, genderless languages didn't fare as well as natural gender languages such as English (though they did fare better than gendered languages).

This is a lie. English didn't even come up in the top 12 most "equal" nations (again, I'm using their own quoted data) whilst two genderless languages did enter the top 12. In other words, genderless languages, by your own methodology DID fare not only "as well" but actually far better than English.

> "There is not a one-to-one correlation between language and equality. Iran, for example, is a predominately Persian-speaking country, and Persian is a genderless language.
>
> "There's a lot of variability between the countries, which is also what makes it pretty surprising that we still found this difference," Prewitt-Freilino said.

But you have not found any difference. Half of the languages on this planet are gendered – and half of the countries in the top 12 most "equal" nations do speak a gendered language. You haven't found anything – you just printed bullocks.

There is also an additional problem with the table – it lists Norway as a country that speaks a "natural gender" language, which is just not true. Norwegian is a gendered language (just like Spanish) and it has three genders: masculine, feminine and neuter and they are being used. A book is feminine (ei bok), a horse is masculine (en hest) and a house is neuter (et hus). Sure, there's also the Bergen dialect which has only common and neuter gender (just like Swedish) but to say that Norway speaks a "natural gender" language is nothing more than a bald-faced lie. It's just not true.

Now, once we corrected all the flaws in this article's narrative, we might as well re-write it since virtually nothing in it even comes close to the truth.

And if you think the problem is only with Ms. Pappas, who incorrectly reported and referenced her piece, think again. The study itself has major flaws. On page 8 it asserts that Norway is a country in which a "natural gender" language is being spoken – which is simply not true. On page 11 it asserts that the difference between the "gendered language" group and the "natural gender" group when controlled for "economic participation" (presumably of women) approached significance as countries in which a "gendered language" is being spoken scored lower in economic participation than countries in which a "natural gender" language is prevalent. What is that significance? 6% (see page 11).

So in other words, 54.5 percent of the nations evaluated spoke predominately gendered languages whilst 9 percent spoke natural gender languages. So 6 times more nations that speak a gendered language were evaluated – and yet when mixing Germany with Yemen and comparing with Finland you got only a 6% lower participation rate? I would say that's not "significance" – but rather a good thing given how many statistical outliers are in the large group compared to the small group (i.e. the "natural gender" group).

This is not science, this is just drivel. Ideologically driven drivel, to be more precise.

Oh, and one last thing: The table quoted by Ms. Pappas ranks South Africa as the 5th most “equal” nation – ahead of Denmark, Germany, Switzerland, Canada and many others. Can Ms. Pappas explain how the country with the highest rate of rapes per capita is more “equal” than say Denmark? I’m just curious.

Seriously, LiveScience, just stop spreading lies – and learn a thing or two about the languages you talk about before printing drivel. Just a thought.

“But She’s So Nice!”

Mumia Ali · 24 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Editor’s Note: This article is also available in Spanish.

We all know what that means; its a euphemism for saying that a Woman is…homely, but her supposed “nice” qualities somehow are to makeup or otherwise compensate for that. In many ways, it’s the analogue to the Nice Guy(TM) phenomenon that’s got the ire of so many ladies in our time these days. And we all know how and when such a phrase is used, too; when such a Woman is being foisted on you, usually in the form of people close to you – supposed friends, family relations, coworkers, that sort of thing, unwanted and unsolicited. People love to play matchmaker and like to experiment with you as the guinea pig.

Oh, joy.

If you’re a guy who has anything going for you, chances are you’ve been the “lucky” recipient of such unwanted matchmaking with such “nice” ladies; and the whole situation is something akin to being waterboarded at Guantanomo Bay, precisely because of the way the whole thing goes down, because of the people involved, and because you’re supposed to somehow be thankful and appreciative that your people have gone out of their way to set you up with a female – not taking into account that she is looking NOTHING close to what you consider to be sexually attractive.

Why is any of this important? Because, in the ongoing discussion on what I refer to as Sexual Politics in our age, where topics ranging from the Nice Guy(TM) problem, the question of Street Harassment and the War on Pickup continues, little things like what I refer to as the “But She’s So Nice!” issue never sees the light of day – in part because Men don’t make any noise about it.

That changes today.

So, since the question of “entitlement to sex/relationships” is often a part of these kinds of conversations, and I consider the “Nice Gal(TM)” to be very much part and parcel of the “entitlement to sex/relationships” axis, I thought the following real life account would suffice.

Many years ago, there was a young lady who liked me and, because she was tight with my family, she attempted to use those associations to insinuate herself into my life – aided, of course, by certain of my family members.

Now, this young lady was NOT sexually attractive to me. At. All. And yet, my people kept trying to “push” her on me, telling me how “nice” she is, and so forth. Not only did I immediately decline, I would continue to decline everytime; it got to a point where I’d try to avoid this young lady everytime she was at the family home and so forth.

After awhile I got tired of the whole thing – and the constant dodging of this “nice” gal, and simply decided to put a merciful end to it all, since it was clear that she, nor my family, was getting the message. Guessing correctly that she would be hanging out at my people’s place, I told the young lady that I was NOT sexually attracted to her AT ALL, and to please stop trying to push up on me. I said it very plainly, in an even, monotoned voice, looking her squarely in the eyes, and in front of many of our mutual people.

She burst into tears.

And then the “Big, Bad Meanie” treatment began:

“how could you do that to her, Obsidian, she likes you!”

O: I’m NOT sexually attracted to her.

“But she’s so nice!”

O: I’m NOT sexually attracted to her.

“She would make a really nice girlfriend for you!”

O: I’m NOT sexually attracted to her.

“That ain’t right!”

O: Zones out

Keeping aside for the moment Ms. But-She’s-So-Nice’s lack of feminine charms, is the fact that I never asked to be setup with the lady in the first place, which pissed me off even more; the assumption is that because I’m a guy with a d*ck, I’m supposed to just hop on anything moving in a skirt, and be happy as a clam about it, no less! God forbid I actually have some ideas of my own as to whom I would like to partner with.

You see, this is the flipside of these kinds of discussions that rarely if ever sees the light of day – Men aren’t expected to have their own ideas and standards of what they find sexually attractive, AND to decline any alternate offers if he thinks they are subpar. If he does this, he “ain’t right”, he’s “mean”, “selfish”, “superficial”, and if you’re Black, you’re full of “self hate”, “colorstruck” and so forth. No, it couldn’t just be, that you simply aren’t into the Woman in question due to her not being sexually attractive to you as a Man; you MUST accept her overtures, because if you don’t you’re “mean” – and besides, “she’s so nice!” – right?

If you think what I said above was somehow “mean”, consider the frequency – and severity – of Defcon 1 level Nuclear Rejections Women unleash on Men all the time – which makes what I said/did look like a peashooter by comparison. Why aren’t those ladies who engage in such actions upbraided for it by their own inner circles?

At any rate, that particular episode, along with a few others, taught me many important lessons – one of them being, just how much people – those most close to you at that(!) – don’t have any freaking clue as to what turns your crank; second, just how much those same people will assume that you, as a Man, is constantly thirsty; and third, how little respect or regard they have for you as a human being. It was these experiences that led me to the conclusion that if that’s what it meant to have family and/or friends, I’d be much better off without them in my life; I don’t need or want any help making things more difficult.

“Well Obsidian”, I can hear some of you saying, “Women go through this all the time – being setup with guys they’re just no into all the time, often unsolicited by family, friends, coworkers, etc – so what’s the big deal?”

The big deal is we all know that this happens to Women – but we never hear about the flipside, from the guys whom this sort of thing happens to. Guys for whatever reason simply don’t speak up about these kinds of events, and that needs to change. Hopefully, my doing so today will inspire other Brothas to follow my lead.

Oh, by the way: there is a popular meme going around the Sistahood that says, that Men really don’t like being approached by Women, but this is NOT true, IF, said Women in question are hot. When Men rebuff a Woman’s advances, it’s usually, not always, but usually, because said Woman is shooting out of her league. Which happens to Nice Gals(TM) more than any of us are willing to admit.

There is ALWAYS a flipside, folks.

Remember that.

Author’s Note: This originally appeared on The Obsidian Files, Thu, Jul 11, 2013.

Doxing MGTOW incident unleashes MGTOW+ fury at AVFM

Paul Elam · 24 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I just read a comment regarding the recent doxing of a couple of high profile MGTOWs. It seems it is already an AVFM conspiracy. I am not going to link to any of the crap referenced. What I will do is answer this nice gent's request.

> Yobyaxes • 7 minutes ago
>
> Speaking about MGTOW, Barbarossa and Stardusk got doxxed (sic) and Bar Bar (not Stardusk, he handled it better) is blaming MRAs for the attacks. This one idiot, Ravishing Rick Rude, his vendetta against AVFM is so deep that he's blaming Paul Elam personally. Anyone have any thoughts on that?

Yeah, I got a couple of thoughts on that. Several, actually. If what you are saying is true, I think these guys probably think communists are hiding under the bed, too.

Prediction right now. No one has any evidence at all that this had anything to do with me or AVFM. I guarantee it. And they never will because no one here had anything to do with it. I know this for two reasons. One is I know the people here. The other is that they know me. Everyone knows that anyone who did something like that would be gone the moment I found out – and that I would find out because of all the people who have my back.

Another thing I have a "thought" on is for them to quit acting like Anita Freaking Sarkeesian. So you got doxed. What do you want now? A kickstarter? A handkerchief?

I get that some people need to hide their identity in the wider men's movement. They should work behind the scenes if they can't take the heat. That is not an insult. We get articles all the time from people who use pseudonyms. There is some brilliant stuff written here in the shadows, and incredible work that goes on behind the scenes.

But what were these guys thinking? Did they think they could draw a large an audience as they do, successfully disseminating very controversial and provocative material, and that people who wanted them to shut up bad would never do this?

You have got to be kidding me. It cannot possibly be that any of these guys are that stupid. Either that or we must pause to offer respect to the idea that there are different kinds of intelligence, and no one has all of them.

I think you have to admit, though, that the expectation secrecy would survive notoriety would fairly be described as incredibly naïve.

I take no pleasure at all in seeing these guys get treated like this, though I think it is an unavoidable lesson. If you can deliver a message, like that found in Bar Bar's consistently superior videos, don't do it unless you are willing to stand publicly with your beliefs.

Unless you are willing to go through a lot worse than this little hiccup, you might want to listen to what I am saying.

People who front this wave of change, all of them, even the ones who hate each other, are going to get doxed. And that is if you are lucky.

So, my advice, for those who want to take it, is that there is lots of room for badly needed support work. That would be writers, videographers, web experts and a host of other things. But if you want a growing personal following, and you have the stuff to make it happen, don't do it unless you can handle the consequences.

NEWSFLASH! UPDATE! Even as I was starting to think this piece was wrapped up, more news arrives. The culprit in the doxing has apparently been identified as somone who goes by Tim Shmiggen. I certainly have seen his name in many MHRA circles. And, just as I predicted, it had nothing do with anyone from AVFM.

Here's the little rat bastard.

And here is a little more advice for those inclined toward ideological pissing matches and WWF level drama with other men and women who share largely the same views, you might want to stop and think about who is going to pay the price for your stupidity.

If you are invested in people who work in the shadows, they will pay for it. So you might want to, you know, think about that. You "leaders in the shadows" might want to think about that, too. Few of those guys cheering you on from behind screen names are even going to look back at you if someone comes along and wrecks your life.

And I again invite you to consider how you want to react to the harshness that marks personality cults and movements on the internet. Decide if you want to stand on a chair and shriek because there is a spot of sunlight on the floor that might illuminate you, or if you want to take a stand in the real world, or better yet if you are vulnerable, do something else where you are more protected.

Sexy Swimsuits and the Factual Feminist

AVfM Video Source · 25 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Christina Hoff-Summers explains why feminists are wrong in how they frame the “debate” about sexy swimsuits on the cover of magazines.

Lithuania to reintroduce mandatory military service

Lucian Vâlsan · 25 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

VILNIUS. The State Defense Council, comprising of the Lithuanian president, prime minister, parliament speaker, defense minister and army chief decided yesterday that mandatory military service ought to be reintroduced in the tiny Baltic nation.

The measure needs to be approved by the Seimas (the Lithuanian Parliament) and if the measure passes, the first conscripts could be summoned as early as this September. Inside sources from the Lithuanian politics quoted by the local media say that the ruling party supports the idea and the measure is very likely to receive the Parliament's approval.

One of the official motivations for this decision is that ever since Lithuania moved towards a professional army model, the army has been consistently under-staffed as not enough people volunteered for a career in the military.

President Dalia Grybauskaitė motivated her support for the measure as a reaction to the "new geopolitical circumstances" and mentioned that the measure is not permanent:

> We must reinforce the country's defence capacities. Under new geopolitical circumstances, the army must be properly prepared for the country's armed defence even in times of peace. Today's geopolitical situation requires that we strengthen and speed up the manning of our army. Therefore the State Defense Council has decided that it is necessary to temporarily, for five years, reintroduce compulsory military draft.

Military experts in the region have predicted that in the next two years the probability of Russian aggression against the Baltic countries will be very high and the Lithuanian Armed Forces Reserve is not even half of its actual need in terms of personnel. The same experts say that 3500 per year is almost 5 times more recruits the Lithuanian army gets through voluntary enrollment.

Under the plan, the Lithuanian military expects to recruit between 3000 and 3500 men between the ages of 19 and 26 (including 26) every year and subject them to 9 months of intensive military training. It is estimated that roughly 200,000 men that fit the criteria live in Lithuania, and if the measure will indeed be limited in time, this means not all of them will be subjected to this decision.

Governmental sources issued assurances that exemptions would apply to university students, single fathers, men with health issues or otherwise unsuitable for military service. The latter category also includes men who file an "exemption request" and the Commission finds their arguments compelling.

Other voices associated with the Lithuanian decision-makers claim that their estimates show that training and supporting conscripts would cost the state only half of what it takes to train professional forces of similar size, but no actual figures have been presented as of yet.

Men aged 27 or older will not be subjected to this measure. Women are also totally exempt from the obligation of fulfilling what President Dalia Grybauskaitė called "the duty and honor of every citizen".

This measure is projected to create within its applicability period between 16 and 17 thousand military men which the Government claims would be a "solid army reserve" that would cover almost 90% of the demand.

Some members of the Lithuanian public are not that concerned, whilst others have started to make arrangements for emigration outside of the European Union. Trying to avoid this measure could result in a European Arrest Warrant issued against him which means he can be deported if caught in any of the 28 nations that comprise the EU.

Members of AVfM had different reactions to this story. Dean Esmay, editor-in-chief of the English-language main site cautioned about the issue of conscription being routinely overlooked when discussing men's issues:

> Those in the West who roll their eyes and say conscription is a non-issue are fools. They neither see that this is a reality that still affects countless millions of men around the world, nor that it could happen to men in any country. Everyday lies about equality of the sexes disappear when this happens.

William Andersson, the head of AVfM Sweden, on the other hand, was appreciative of the exemption of single fathers:

> I can see that this may be the only possible way for Lithuania to maintain a defense, and I like that exceptions are made for single fathers. On the other hand, this also looks, to me at least, as a sacrifice of men's lives for causes that are lost anyway. Suffice to say that I'm a bit conflicted about this.

Marian Atodiresei, editor-in-chief of AVfM Romania is skeptical about the results this measure would bring and is still looking for that equality under the law:

> I'm highly skeptical of the State's assertion that conscription is cheaper than training a professional force. Experiences in other nations, such us our own or Hungary tell a different story. But even if it were cheaper, that doesn't mean it yields the same – or close enough – benefits. I can understand that Lithuania is in a complicated position, geopolitically speaking, but I'm not convinced that mandatory conscription is a good solution for them at this point. Anyway – I'm looking for that equality and I don't see it. My mother was conscripted back in Communism and I'm sure this was the practice under the SSR Lithuania as well. Why not now?

It is yet unclear what will be the exact penalty for attempting to avoid the service.

Interdisciplinary Shaming Dept. Part V – Robbie Lieberman

Paul Elam · 25 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

This article is one part of a series exposing corrupt, fear-mongering academics who used police officers and lawyers to silence a single student while they move to crush his free speech and Title IX rights. Read Part IV here.

Robbie Lieberman, chair of the Kennesaw State University Interdisciplinary Studies Department, looks like what happens when a crow and a Brillo pad fall into a wheat thresher. If I looked like her, I'd be a feminist too.

Barf.

That was insensitive of me. I should not judge a woman on the outside, because we all know that what's on the inside counts for so much more. Sadly, the inside of Dr. Lieberman makes any article insulting her appearance a love letter by comparison. Please try not to choke on your own puke when I say this empress has no clothes.

As a department chair, you would think Lieberman would act as a voice of reason when her underlings collapse into anarchy over the Lone Ginger. Actually, she picked up her own torch and ran screaming all the way to the Dean of Students Dr. Micheal Sansivero, moderator of the Gerard vs. Clyne slaughter, and recent interviewer of Dr. Richard Dawkins.

Imagine Lieberman holding Stacy Keltner's hand as Keltner blows snot into her fifth box of Kleenex, and you'll get an idea of the show they put on for Dr. Sansivero.

Dr. Lieberman was one of the people who approached the last remaining adviser for what was then named KSU Men to pressure him to resign. She did this more than once. Before Sage was silenced by campus lawyers, his adviser came over and told Sage about Lieberman's complaints.

Sage then sent Lieberman this email:

Regarding conversation with Dr. [redacted] about KSU Men

Sage Gerard <sgerard2@students.kenn 9/2/14 to rlieberm

Dr. Lieberman,

This is Sage from KSU Men. Dr. [redacted] has notified me that you two had a conversation.

Our advisors are not liable for KSUM operations, nor are they required to be personally or politically in line with the organization's values. Please do not trouble Dr. [redacted] with concerns KSUM staff are responsible for addressing.

As the public contact, any grievances with the organization must be brought to my attention before moving on to KSU staff.

You are welcome to bring any concerns to my attention.

Thank you,

Sage Gerard (A.K.A. Victor Zen)
Collegiate Activism Director, A Voice for Men
Founder, Kennesaw State University Men

I'll give you three guesses on what happens next.

It's not a police report this time, although Lieberman's name does appear on police reports in support of Sage's hysterical accusers.

The problem is that Liebermen did nothing to encourage investigation and ease nerves. She instead entertained fears and tried to go over Sage's head to get him in trouble. She never bothered to talk to Sage herself to clear up any misunderstandings, even though Sage explicitly invited her to do so.

What makes Lieberman especially disgusting is that unlike other ISD faculty, she actually met Sage once before. Once upon a time Sage brought literature to the former gender studies coordinator and Dr. Lieberman to recommend more diversity in perspectives on masculinity. Lieberman saw how Sage conducted himself, and she had no reason to assume that Sage was a danger to anybody.

This message brought to you by tax-funded scholars.
Let's look at the emails Dr. Lieberman sent through the series of tubes to Dean of Students Dr. Sansivero (Click for the full email thread).

First, congratulations to the dean for sending this message:

From: Michael Sanseviro [redacted]
Date: August 27, 2014 at 1:28:30 PM CDT
To: Robbie Lieberman [redacted]
Subject: Re: KSU Men - important

Robbie - I'm sending an email response right now to you, Robin and the rest of the group. I've reviewed the reports issued to the police and I respectfully disagree and believe their reactions are not reasonable based on the most recent incident and their statements to the police. I'll finish the email so you have what I learned from the police in writing and give you a call so we can discuss the details more.
Thanks,
Michael

Lieberman replies as such:

From: "Robbie Lieberman" [redacted]
To: "Michael Sanseviro" [redacted]
Sent: Wednesday, August 27, 2014 2:23:00 PM
Subject: Re: KSU Men - important

Thanks, Michael. I am not really comfortable having a long email conversation on this topic, but there are a number of issues we need to address. First on my list at the moment is helping my faculty and staff feel safe coming to work. That is subjective, of course, but in my view their reactions are not unreasonable under the circumstances.
Robbie

This email shown above proves that Dr. Lieberman acknowledges this was an issue of subjective perception, right before subjectively defending the hysterical reactions of her lugubrious staff.

The hypocrisy continues in another email:

From: "Robbie Lieberman" [redacted]
To: "Michael Sanseviro" [redacted]
Sent: Wednesday, August 27, 2014 10:36:11 AM
Subject: Re: KSU Men - important

Michael,
I understand what you are saying, and we have no intention of stepping on student rights to free speech. But other students (faculty and staff) also have a right to feel safe when they come to work. His behavior in our office has people feeling threatened, which we will report to the proper authorities. After all, it is actions that matter, not just words.
Robbie

Wow.

Robbie, Sage did absolutely nothing to target your staff. He only ever used words. Don't pretend you were just doing your job, because there are no actions on Sage's part that justify the fears of your drones.

If you had no intention on stepping on a students right to free speech, why did you allow a campus attorney restrict his ability to speak with anyone in your department with nothing but perception backing that restriction?

Liberty and security are mutually exclusive ideas for a reason: Freedom is not safe. So long as speech is free, all ideas risk death, even yours. Your faculty and staff do indeed have a right to a safe environment, but so does Sage.

But you took that away from him when you went on a smear campaign specifically targeting him.

"Dr." Lieberman, I hope you stop to acknowledge your bias. Do you feel even the slightest bit of remorse, oppressor?

I guess not, considering this "fact sheet" you had printed for the purposes of a campus meeting meant to destroy Sage Gerard. Naturally, you cherry picked the same tired out-of-context quotes and oft-refuted SPLC pieces that confirm your perceptions instead of evaluating the sources. Whatever makes your fears feel valid must be true, right?

I think you should know that Sage tried to invite you to a mediation. He was out and about working with the system in good faith trying to clear up misunderstandings. He learned that Dr. T. K. Hedeen, the University of Georgia Omsbud that organizes mediations, was a friend of yours.

Put yourself in Sage's shoes for a second. Assume you are a passionate young woman who stands up for other women without apology. You never intend to offend, but you are willing to risk offending people to say that women are human beings that deserve respect. You are often considered an "oddball," mostly because you tend not to think in terms of popular intellectual fashion. After voicing articulate criticism of systemic corruption pushed by men, a department decides to accuse you of wanting to kill men. One of the male faculty members (who you have never even met) refuses to come to work because of his personal discomfort. You try to work with the system, but learn it doesn't actually care. Everyone more powerful than you are connected to each other, and lawyers decided that you are better kept silent. You cannot trust the system, you have no money to hire an attorney, and degree-holding ideologues are organizing to hurt you because "you are creating a hostile environment."

Can you wrap your head around your department's repugnance after picturing yourself in this situation?

…You don't care, do you?

No, you are the kind of person who would read this article and say something stupid like "I would have cared if you and Sage weren't so rude." But we need to be rude, Lieberman. It takes rude people to make a point heard through your years of ideological brainwashing.

Your biography indicates a passion in diversity, peace studies and social movements. If you had any knowledge of how any of those things actually worked, you would have detected the beginnings of something powerful in Sage Gerard. You have witnessed his passion, but never asked if overreacting would only fuel his fire.

Attacking him was the greatest mistake of your career, and I think you are starting to figure that out.

All of the stress and fear you and your staff are feeling right now are unfounded. This should be good news to you. But in order to stop me from digging up your histories and exposing you for years on end, all you have to do is grow up and apologize to Sage Gerard. You have his email.

If I hear of you calling cops or lawyers to regulate the discussion, then you will be hearing back from me. I don't think you want to convince this community that lawyers are fair game, because some of our readers (who have raised over $20,000 for Sage over a year) are talking about starting a legal fund.

The choice is so simple: Be an adult, or don't. There is no other option. I would strongly suggest picking the one that only takes ten minutes and prevents years of misery. Do not let your stubborn need to think of Sage as a criminal blow back on your department, if not all of Kennesaw State University.

Feminists welcome Patricia Arquette to hell

August Løvenskiolds · 25 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is also available in Spanish.

A couple of days before the Academy Awards, Michelle Goldberg speculated in an editorial at the Washington Post that a lot of feminist writers were leaving feminist advocacy over "abuse" that she attributed to anti-feminists online. Little did she know that the worst enemies and tormentors of feminists are other feminists themselves.

And the winner of this year's award for "Feminist Woman Most Abused by Feminists" is: Patricia Arquette.

After decades of struggling to be recognized as serious and more than 10 years working on the film Boyhood, the matronly Patricia Arquette finally won an Academy Award ("the Oscar") for Best Supporting Actress in that film. In the brief acceptance speech that follows the announcement of the award, winners typically thank those men and women who loved and supported them in their careers.

But not Patricia.

Well-off and elderly by Hollywood actress standards (net worth of $24 million; she'll be age 47 in a couple of months), Arquette defied conventional acceptance patois and instead used her tipsy-sounding 24 seconds of fame to make a feminist-lite shout out for equal pay for poor little girls like her.

> "To every woman who gave birth to every taxpayer and citizen of this nation, we have fought for everybody else's equal rights," Arquette said in her speech. "It's our time to have wage equality once and for all and equal rights for women in the United States of America." – as quoted by Time Magazine.

Welcome to hell, Patricia.

The gates of hell into the first circle are as deceptive as UVa coed Jackie Coakley's rape fabulism: initially, newb feminists were giving enthusiastic consent to Arquette's brazen pandering:

But before even the next morning's hung over walk of shame, that once enthusiastic consent had morphed into a vicious post-hoc rape hoax: it turns out that the "Yes!" didn't really mean "yes" to those statue humping feminists at all. Oh, no.

In the second circle of hell, Arquette was skewered by my personal bum-grabber Amanda Marcotte, who claims that she is a "big fan of celebrities using their platforms to get out the message about feminism" but described Patricia's 24 second Oscar speech as "political grandstanding [that] played into every ugly stereotype about 'feminism'."

Now, that IS impressive: covering the true naked greed, pedophilia, child-killing, child-beating, man-hating, family destroying, sexually incontinent, rape-hoaxing, penis-mutilating, vagina-worshiping, disease-spreading, job-stealing, gay-bashing, colonial, racist, trans-exclusive, patriarchy-blaming, female agency-suppressing, history-rewriting, cannibalistic, lazy, whining, lying, censoring, bossy, loud, annoying, pleasure-policing, fashion-monitoring, gender-alienating, comfort-seeking, Borderline Personality disordered, ungrateful, daddy-issues-having, anhedonic, incoherent and hirsute stereotype of feminism in a short Oscar sentence should have earned Arquette a "Best Screenplay" nod as well.

In the third circle of hell, Arquette met the talons of one African-American womanist named Nyasha Junior, who dropped the worst epithet in their arsenal on Arquette: the dreaded term "problematic", a Social Justice Warrior curse that is worse than eternal damnation and bodily hair maintenance combined. Drastically misrepresenting Arquette's clumsily expressed intent, Junior savaged her in the same way a child might be beaten for asking an innocent question about a naughty sex-related word in church.

"Womanism" is the African-American version of feminism that is in an eternal war with white feminists over their mutual failed inclusiveness and the full brunt of both their disputes collapsed on novice feminist Arquette like a feminist fecal mound in a monsoon.

In the fourth circle of hell, Arquette was interned with other feminist newbs in the re-education camp that awaits all those foolish enough to think that feminism grants personal autonomy to its sycophants: an article in ThinkProgress by Tara Culp-Ressler touched on the idea that after relentlessly recruiting and indeed, bullying high-profile celebrities into a nominal feminism, these raw and reluctant converts may actually undermine the rickety structure of feminism.

> As feminism becomes more mainstream, and rich and powerful public figures start talking about it, there's an inherent tension present because activists are worried about feminist concepts getting watered down by celebrities who toss them around like buzzwords.

Of course, back in August of 2014 I wrote about this same problem with chic feminist Beyoncé:

> A glowing sign proclaiming "FEMINISM" behind the silhouette of a wealthy, attractive woman sans pants is a symbol of female dominance, not the wretched domestication feminists whine about. Symbols of overt power, while briefly inspiring, are ephemeral and quickly turn into objects of scorn and derision…

Looks like it only took feminists 6 months to figure it out.

As her pain-wracked body writhed into the cesspools of the fifth circle of hell, the forty-four words of her speech were carved into her flesh like stigmata and then slowly dissected, one by one, by Soraya Nadia McDonald, in a piece called "Ripping Patricia Arquette to shreds".

> Why was there specific mention of "citizens" and "taxpayers?" Was she deliberately omitting people? And what of the verbiage of "women who give birth" when there are plenty of mothers who didn't or couldn't give birth to their children? Why didn't she just say "mothers?"

And now WE HAVE HER.

Welcome to AVfM, Patricia Arquette. As you may know, we are the sixth circle of hell for feminists.

All we ask you do to escape is to swallow this one little red pill. You work in movies, right? Do you like sometimes scary science-fiction movies? In the 1990's era movies like Total Recall and later, the Matrix, swallowing the red pill was symbolic of one's wish to wake up from the dream world of fuzzy sweet feminists loving everyone in preparation for harvest, to the real world of feminist violence and brutality.

You've just experienced the real feminism: the incredible nightmare of political correctness and the narrow path you have to walk to avoid the hell you've found yourself in. Now, you need to wake up to the reality of it.

Here's the thing, Patricia. Every man and woman you know lives in this hell already. Most don't fully grasp it yet but more and more of us are waking up to it every day. Sure, we are angry and disappointed and we don't always get along but we are all living better, more self-aware lives now that we are awake to the real nature of the feminist world. Even better: we've found others willing to join us in rejecting the hell of feminism. We have lots of women who have joined with us also and we work every day to heal ourselves and reach out to others.

If you reject us, that is okay: you can take this blue pill to keep being a feminist, and move on to the seventh level of feminist hell. What is in it, you ask?

It will be better if we just let that be a surprise.

Peter Lloyd on spousal maintenance, BBC Radio 4

AVfM Video Source · 26 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Feminist lawyer argues that women should not face consequences for their choices, and men should face consequences forever because equality. #SeemsLegit

An introduction to Post-Argumentalism

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 26 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The accumulated wisdom of the activated non-feminist sector finds feminism to be, on balance, pernicious. The reasons for this verdict are many and have been examined elsewhere. For a start, know this: we mean to draw a line against the encroachment of feminist power into the non-feminist world. Since we find that power pernicious, we naturally find ourselves at odds with almost every aspect of it. This brings us to the topic of the moment: post-argumentalism.

Post-argumentalism is the stage "beyond argument", the stage you enter after you deplete the possibilities of debate or persuasion in a given setting. It is a kind of existential crisis in the face of an intractable other: the other may find your stance unacceptable but you find his equally so – and there you stand! Since argument has not settled the issue and apparently never will, you are excused from such activity and may henceforth either agree to disagree with the other, or enter a state of "war" with the other.

None of this holds any great mystery. If you have ever dealt with a fanatical cultist or an incorrigibly pigheaded person of any kind, you will perfectly understand the base dynamic. And what is true of a solitary individual can as well be true of an entire group or subculture.

The intractable other that now confronts us is the subculture called feminism. As said, we find feminism pernicious – and that implies that we have already settled the debate to our own satisfaction.

We see no reason to keep arguing in hope of persuading this intractable other – we've long since persuaded ourselves, and that should suffice. We know whose opinion we value, and whose judgment we trust. In all cases we cherish our own conclusion because we deem it best, and if we deemed otherwise we'd have concluded otherwise.

Argument is useless if it never ends, and worse than useless if it puts a freeze on necessary plans and actions. To tolerate such a freeze would seem to imply that we cannot act without a go-ahead from the intractable other. Yet a moment's thought might reveal that the other is likewise constrained by us – and there we stand! How to break free of this impasse? Apparently not by further persuasion efforts.

What are we waiting for? Will another three, five or twelve years of argument finally clear the road so we can set plans and actions afoot? What force – legal, moral, physical or otherwise – prevents us from turning our back and going our way immediately?

Feminism has been a dynamic force in the world, and never shy about setting plans and actions afoot. Nor has it been dutiful about consulting others and securing their agreement to such plans and actions. The point is that feminism itself is post-argumental. Feminism has trodden upon the alterity of the non-feminist sector, and the non-feminist sector may now, by rights, serve feminism likewise.

We should add that feminism is an entrenched system which extends through the social and political fabric. It is a major power structure, individual feminists are stakeholders in it, and if we think the stakeholders in any major power structure will be talked out of their advantage by sweet reason alone, we delude ourselves.

The two sides do not gather in a clean, well-lighted debating chamber, and air their views in turn until one side says to the other: "Yes, you have convinced me of the truth of your position, and from henceforth I will adopt it as my own and rearrange my life according to what it requires of me." No, that is not how the world works.

Such being said, our project is not to reprogram the deep ideological conviction of every purported feminist. Rather, it is to make such people modify their outward behavior so that the pernicious implications of feminist ideology will no longer translate into real-world consequences. They can believe any pernicious thing they want to believe, but they must stop acting upon such belief. In so stating, we exercise a mandate. Such is the power of post-argumentalism – it nullifies the presumptive moral authority of feminism and commandeers authority on its own account. In this way, post-argumentalism is a revolutionary procedure, the starting point for anything at all that you could rightly call a revolution.

Truly, to nullify authority is a rightful deed when authority is intractable due to fraud or villainy. Post-argumentalism makes no fuss about this. It does the job brusquely, unceremoniously, unapologetically. To make omelets, you break eggs.

Both war and revolution have this in common, that they spring to life when reason and negotiatory discourse prove unavailing. The difference is that war is a contest between parties purportedly equal at the outset, whereas revolution is a contention where an upstart knocks authority off a pedestal. In the end, both war and revolution are a fight, and both involve the element of violation. The rules of war dictate that the parties violate each other until one side gives up, while the rules of revolution dictate that one system of rules gets violated so another system can replace it.

The non-feminist revolution is both a revolution and a war, and is not undertaken for light and transient causes.

As non-feminist men and women we must ask ourselves: what did we originally hope to accomplish by arguing? Supposing we could have persuaded the intractable other, what did we hope to gain? What did we hope to obtain that we couldn't have gotten elsewise, in due course? What prevented us from simply taking it?

If something belongs to us, it is simply a question of overriding or overruling the intractable other in order to secure what is rightfully ours. Correct? In that case, what is the good of persuasion – to talk the other into giving us what is rightfully ours? To talk the thief into handing back our stolen property?

We know that this intractable other, feminism, is a taker who never quits taking, and gives nothing back at the behest of mere persuasion. We ought to craft our politics in the light of such understanding. In other words, we ought to craft our politics post-argumentally. We do not argue with feminism, we simply tell it things – and if it will not listen or modify its course, we hold it accountable.

How much does it cost a school to implement a father involvement program? You might be surprised.

Jonathan Taylor · 26 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

You may have heard of the group Dads of Great Students (D.O.G.S.), which sometimes goes by the name Watch DOGS. I covered it almost exactly a year ago. This is a program that brings in "fathers, grandfathers, step-fathers, uncles, and other father figures who volunteer to serve at least one day a year in a variety of school activities as assigned by the school principal or other administrator." Here is a list of just a few of the things they do:

- Reading to children in the school library or in class
- Helping students with arts and crafts
- Helping students study via flash cards and other cooperative study activities
- Engaging with and providing guidance to students during lunch or other break periods
- Assisting in loading/unloading buses
- Being a monitor in the hall and at recess
- Just being a positive part of children's lives.

Let's remember that many of these students, for one reason or another, are not growing up with dads in their lives, which can be a tremendous loss in more ways than simply having more stability, structure, and adult guidance for children, having dads in particular in the home helps in many other ways.

So how much does a program like Watch D.O.G.S. cost? This USA Today article tells us:

The Watch D.O.G.S. program costs each school $365 the first year, with $195 for each year after that. In most cases, the individual schools cover the costs, although the district allocates funds to schools with large percentages of low-income students for parent-engagement programs such as Watch D.O.G.S.
$365 a year – for just the first year – and nearly half that cost for every year after. That's nothing, even to a small-town school district. How much is it worth for kids to have a positive male role-model in their lives? And for the activists out there, how much is it worth to have a group promoting the idea that men can be nurturing to children, just as women can?

Folks, to a lot of kids, that's priceless. The article continues:

Greg Whittington, 64, a medical researcher with the University of Louisville, said the importance of male role models became apparent to him early in his career when he served as director of a residential treatment center for emotionally disturbed delinquents and observed a pattern among clients — most lacked positive male guidance…Dr. Bryan Carter, a pediatric psychologist at Kosair Children's Hospital, said programs like Watch D.O.G.S. could be especially helpful for the behavioral development of young boys because boys seem to respond differently to men than women. Many boys are "wired" to rebel against mothers and other female authority figures, which he said could be problematic in a school setting, where the majority of teachers and administrators tend to be females. It's an issue frequently seen in Carter's field, he said, although experts don't completely understand why.
I would characterize it differently than simply an "impulse to rebel against women." It's really quite simple: boys and girls are different. Men know what it is like to be a boy, whereas women – by and large – do not. They may know what it is like to care about a boy as a grown woman, but actually relating to boys is different. And the same holds true for men vis-a-vis girls as well.

So what happens when every adult role-model a boy interacts with and answers to is someone who has a little more trouble relating to him? He's going to be much more likely to eventually feel misunderstood, stifled, and so forth. This can lead to both academic and discipline problems, which in turn feed into and reinforce each other.

And that's why having positive male role-models is so important in boys' lives. It's really not rocket science. But if you want a little more of the science end of it, I strongly suggest Teaching the Male Brain by child psychologist Dr. Abigail Norfleet James and Father and Child Reunion by Dr. Warren Farrell.

It's amazing when people look at a small cost like $365 and say "we don't have the money for these kinds of programs." Here's a simple little maxim: at the end of the day, we fund what we care about.

Visit the Watch D.O.G.S. website here.

[Ed. note: this post originally appeared at A Voice for Male Students.]

Black feminists don't need to "go on strike"; They need to get a life

Mumia Ali · 26 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

> "You can always count on the Americans to do the right thing, only after they've tried everything else."
> -Winston Churchill

I knew it wouldn't be long before the Sistahood shrieked their outrage in response to the very White, very blonde Oscar-winning actress Patricia Arquette's backstage remarks about how all the Darkies were to show the Nice White Ladies of America(TM) some love in appreciation for all the good things they'd done for us, and one Ms. Brittney Cooper – the self-proclaimed "Prof. Crunk" of the Crunk Feminist Collective fame, didn't disappoint. In yesterday's column for the well-known left of center wesbite Salon.com, Cooper defiantly proclaims that she has now "gone on strike" from attempting to lovingly correct/educate/whatever White folks – which really means the Miss Annes of the world – and I for one breathes a sigh of relief; "it's about time!"

Unfortunately though, Prof. Cooper's grand announcement that she is packing up her ball and going home, leaves a lot to be desired when one actually examines the record.

Although she is right to say that Black Feminists have been around since at least the latter part of the 19th century, what she leaves out is that Black Feminism as we know it today – and which greatly informs the current cabal of loud shriekers such as herself – got their beginning a bit later in the historical timeline. The "second wave" of Black Feminism can be traced back to what has become known as the Combahee River Collective, founded in part by Ms. Barbara Smith, and it has been more than four decades since that halcyon gathering of afro-wearing fist-pumpers. A powerful question emerges: what have they accomplished for Black women in more than four decades?

Let's count the ways, shall we?

1. Black women get more abortions than anyone else: thanks to Roe v. Wade – a White case that was fought by White lawyers before a White US Supreme Court and and advocated for by White feminists. Quick, name me the Black feminist who played a role in any of that? Yeah, that's what I thought.

2. Black women currently enjoy the highest educational attainment of ANY racial, ethnic or gender group in the country. Can our Black Feminists point to one in their number who played a pivotal role in this development? To ask the question is to answer it.

3. Black women's health concerns have enjoyed at least two decades of sustained longitudinal study and presidential attention; indeed, the single biggest problem Black women face in our time isn't one of malnurishment, but one of eating too much of a good thing in the land of plenty. After all, as the good professor bears witness to herself, Black women as a group certainly aren't missing any meals. What do Black Feminists have to do or even say, about these facts?

They can suck their teeth, stamp their feet and roll their necks until the cows come home, but the harsh, brutal truth of the matter is that Black women enjoy the lives and rights they do along gender lines, as a direct result and actions of White Feminists – NOT Black ones. But, fear not, my Sistas – since Prof. Cooper now has quite a bit of free time on her hands due to her having claimed to give up her obsession with Miss Anne, here are some ways Black Feminists can actually make a difference:

1. Cooper is right to point out the fact that Black women as a group have the lowest net worth of any group of women in the country – but she misses the mark as to how and why. It isn't because of some vast White-wing conspiracy to keep them down and out of the job marlet – it's because Black women are the least partnered group of women in the country, proofed in dramatic detail by the fact – FACT – that more than 70% of all Black kids are now born out of wedlock. Every study, suvery and research project known to humankind has confirmed the fact that not only do kids born into such a state fare markedly worse regardless of racial or even economic background, but the single best way for the average American to accrue assets and build wealth is to get married and work together with your spouse to achieve the American Dream. White feminists know and understand this, which is why they ain't as many Baby Mamas among their number, and the majority of them have hubbies or stead partners. Cooper and her Black Sistas-in-Arms can meaningfully address these facts.

2. As noted above, Black women are the heaviest cohort of Americans in the country, again proofed by all manner of study and research. Prof. Cooper can demonstrate by example that it is possible for Black women enmasse to improve their health and flatter their figures, by her backing away from the table, hitting the gym as hard as she hits her keyboard churning out Id Monster-fueled diatribes in response to anything a Miss Anne type says or does, and encouraging Black women everywhere the importance of staying in shape. She can turn to fellow Sista Feminist, the aptly named Ms. Feminista Jones, for advice and counsel in these areas, as it is well known and documented that she has lost a formidable amount of weight in recent years, and does spend quite a bit of time on her appearance, to great effect; it is my understanding that Ms. Jones has successfully landed a mate. Moreover, Prof. Cooper can use her position as a columnist at Salon and as a professor at one of the country's best known universities to expound on these and related points to her audience, of which Black women play a major part.

3. Black women have an image problem of being irascible, uncooperative, loud, and sometimes violent; Larry Wilmore spoke the truth about one of the reasons why Black women as a group are the least partnered and married, is in part due to their being so "bossy". Nor is this necessarily a respector of class or station, as Sorority Sisters, Real Housewives of Atlanta, the various iterations of Love & Hip Hop, Basketball Wives and what must be thousands of videos on YouTube and Worldstar Hip Hop easily attest to. What if Prof. Cooper and her Sista Feminists took it upon themselves to go on a Charm School offensive for the Sistahood? Not only would it be good for Black womens' overall image, it, along with the aforementioned slimming down would make them much more attractive as wives for many Black men – who, make no mistake about it, ARE "going on a strike" of their own – they have voted with their feet when it comes to saying "I do." Again, I'm NOT saying that the only reason as to how and why Black women have the problems they do, is totally of their own design; what I AM saying, is that Black women have a hella more agency and real power to affect their own lives, than Black Feminists, who ironically drone on and on about "agency" in the first place, gives them credit for.

4. Picking up on point #1 above, Prof. Cooper and her Sista Feminists can address the fact that Black women fritter away what relatively little money they do have, on hair weaves, extensions, and "creamy crack," to the tune of well over $1B USD annually – and despite the facade, everyone and their mama knows the reasons how and why so many Black women literally put their lives on the line to do so – to try and ape Miss Anne. What if Prof. Cooper and her Sista allies took to the streets to really educate their fellow Black women about this, the monies involved, and how to love and accept themselves for who and what they are? Quiet as it's kept by the way, Black men do NOT like these looks on their ladies; they want Black women who actually look like, you know, Black women – not a cheap White/non-Black woman knockoff.

And that brings me to the biggest point: Black Feminists have shown themselves to be massive failures when it comes to getting their Miss Anne sisters to accept them – it didn't happen for Audre Lourde, and it won't happen for today's Sistas either. For more than a century, even longer than that, White feminists have made it abundunatly clear that they don't want Black feminists in their ranks, other than to occasionally be used as cannon fodder and toilet bowl scrubbers (recall "The Help"), and here Black feminists are, refusing to take "no" as an answer and pathetically trying to insert themselves into any and every conversation that White feminists engage in or start, by shrieking "Me too!" Every time Cooper or any other Black feminist knee-jerkingly reacts to anything a Miss Anne White feminist says, this is exactly what is going on – and please do not fool yourselves into thinking that no one else notices. They do. And they're all laughing AT you.

Instead of trying to get a group of White women to accept you into their club, or trying to get White folks enmasse to like you/us, what Black feminists could actually try for a change, is doing something about problems they and other Black women have direct control over. The items outlined above, speak directly to that, and what's even better, they don't require White approval, permission or even awareness of, in order to make an impact. Nor do they require some massive and amorphous government intervention scheme – these are things Black women, individually and collectively, can do RIGHT NOW – and they can and will WORK.

So there – I've outlined four clear, and devastatingly simple, areas where Black feminists can redirect their energies and efforts – areas that most directly impact the lives and well beings of Black women enmasse, and which can make a real difference. Black feminists have a golden opportunity to make themselves relevant and meaningful, in ways no one else can or even has shown an interest: by really improving the lives of Black women.

The burning question that remains, is whether Cooper and her Sista allies will do just that – or whether they will continue on in their Quixotic quest to be the center of attention, always failing to crowd out the Miss Annes of the spotlight. You see, when you accept the rules of the game as defined by others, you're really playing to lose.

Black feminists need a new game.

Theirs.

Ecofeminism's plan for women

AVfM Video Source · 27 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Some feminists seem to think women are dirty and uncultured and should be thrown back into nature from whence they came. Sounds like a good plan, for feminists.

We like Sargon.

Snarkytweet leads to an opportunity?

Paul Elam · 27 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

One of the most shopworn habits of the feminist version of the “men’s movement” is trotting out the canard that the MHRM does not actually do anything to help men. I heard it for about the ten thousandth time today in a tweet from one such concerned individual, Mr. David Pilbäck of mensmovement.com as follows.

> Heard you’ve got a lot of $ these days. Want to help men? Why not use the $ setting up a hotline for male depressed? @AVoiceForMen
>
> — Mensmovement (@Mensmovementcom) February 27, 2015

Another voice from the outside, who I can imagine felt quite triumphant with each retweet of his snarky little suggestion. So, I called him on it.

> @Mensmovementcom I heard you have a lot of time these days. Step up to donate your labor to produce and manage it and we will talk! — Paul Elam (@AVoiceForMen) February 27, 2015

To which he replied.

> @AVoiceForMen Your sources are badly informed. So much to do, so little time ⍰ Great response Paul. I will seriously considering it. — Mensmovement (@Mensmovementcom) February 27, 2015

To which I replied:

> @Mensmovementcom It’s a serious offer. I’ve checked into it, and the problem is qualified, trained personnel. You step up, I will cough up.
>
> — Paul Elam (@AVoiceForMen) February 27, 2015

And of course I could not resist adding:

> @Mensmovementcom Oh, and your sources? Not so on the money, either. Pun intended. Good thing I turned your snark into an opportunity. — Paul Elam (@AVoiceForMen) February 27, 2015

Now, I will wager that 99.99999% of all snark exchanges on Twitter between differing camps in the gender discourse would just end there or escalate into a pattern of unproductive badgering.

But could there be an opportunity here? I think so. While the social justice current seems to run very near the surface of Mr. Pilbäck's river, I did find some things that appear promising — even aside from the very smart ownership of a great domain name — on his mission statement:

> We have to seek understanding of our brothers and sisters; no matter how different their views yet may seem to us. Even if we do not find an understanding we have to, within ourselves, develop a perspective of love for the other person and respect for his or her opinions.
>
> There has to be a common understanding of the biological and neurological differences and limits of the different genders. Societal development needs to be guided by scientific underpinnings, not by blind ideology.

Hard to argue with that. In fact, I endorse those sentiments fully. But I do want to find out exactly where David's intentions actually reside.

As I said, my offer to him is serious. And I can state without question that to whatever degree that David is seriously interested in helping depressed men, as opposed to say, spreading the ideological tomfoolery that men are inherently flawed, AVFM and many of its readers will help him.

There are a couple of red flags, though. There was such a flippant, even condescending tone of superiority that carried the implication that AVFM is not really interested in helping men. And to be brutally frank, there is an air about his Tweet that suggests he has never seriously considered doing such a thing himself. It is as though he assumes that such an operation materializes out of a wallet.

At various times I have spoken with Dr. Tara Palmatier and others quite seriously about how we would go about funding and maintaining such an operation. Actually, Dr. T and I have had numerous conversations on that very subject. The fact is that it is not that simple.

Aside from expense and a thousand things that MUST be done right, there is the issue of maintaining qualified, trained volunteers who will follow through with commitments to man (there's that word) phones faithfully.

And that training? Easier said than done. The people you need for this cannot be products of short-term online courses for dabblers in crisis intervention. Taking on the serious responsibility demands that you dependably train people to know the difference between brief intervention and referring to more qualified help as compared to playing psychotherapist over the phone with depressed, possibly suicidal human beings.

All that takes time, talent and real expertise to produce. It does not produce itself unless you are looking for a disaster.

So yes, David, we have thought a lot about this. Likely before you did. But still my offer is sincere. If you can convince me that your sole interest is in men's dedicated services for depression, and you are willing to step up with your time to provide the skilled labor intensive prerequisites for even getting started, I will endorse the project and ask others to support it with the necessary donations.

I will even draw on our greatest resource, the learned group of clinicians and advocates for men's issues who really do care about men..

Please send a CV of your qualifications to paul@avoiceformen.com and perhaps show up here in the comments to answer any concerns that people might have.

With a four-to-one ratio of suicide between men and women, it is doubtless that we need to more fully address men's depression. That is true both in the provision of crisis intervention and referral, as well as in pushing for more public awareness of the problem.

If that is your cup of tea, it puts you right on AVFM's wish list of allies. The ball is in your court now, sir. And I truly look forward to your answer.

Wendy Murphy: Sometimes “Yes” really meant “No”

August Løvenskiolds · 27 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Okay, so you think you’ve become the master of “Yes” means “Yes”.

You are careful to get not just affirmative consent, but indeed, enthusiastic consent for all your campus sex positive adventures. They are all sober: you test all your partners for drugs, alcohol and mental disorders beforehand and reject any that are suspect. You’ve got signed consent forms from your partner(s), living witnesses to the signing of the consent forms, video and audio records of the sex in both visible and infrared light, and living witnesses to the sex, some of whom watched while wearing infrared military-class gear. Your many partners are well satisfied and admit they consented to the sex of their own free will, and would happily do so again if they get the chance.

Here’s the question: are you now completely safe from a former sex partner who wants to get you thrown out of school and investigated for rape or sexual harassment?

Not even close, stud (or slut, as the case may be).

At least, not according to lawyer and rape-chaser Wendy Murphy. All your objective evidence of your concern for consent is meaningless; only the subjective opinion of the alleged victim will matter if Murphy gets her way.

I want to like Wendy Murphy. I really do. For one thing, she is smart and attractive, so much so that my favorite bunny boiler Amanda Marcotte openly hates her.

How smart is Murphy? She has concocted a novel way to bring you down: she is using the threat of a lawsuit to try to force the State University of New York to adopt a standard of guilt so extreme that your due process rights will become moot.

> Murphy, who is a professor at the New England School of Law, said she has “insider” contacts at SUNY who will alert her when a sexual assault allegation is adjudicated using affirmative consent, since the cases are not publicized, and then she’ll sue, using a standard lawsuit she’s already prepared. – from CapitalNewYork.com

As I understand Murphy’s problem with the existing legal reasoning, to be actionable under federal law covering sexual harassment two conditions must be met: a violation occurs only when a sexual advance or inquiry is both objectively offensive, and when, subjectively, the object of the sexual advance feels that the advance was unwelcome.

Murphy believes this standard is flawed in the case of a campus rape claim because the “objectively offensive” clause is superfluous and only the subjective view of the alleged victim should count. In other words, your understanding of her consent is irrelevant; only her understanding matters. You are, in effect, guilty as soon as you are accused.

That is correct, kiddo: rape or harassment can occur in the private, unexpressed thoughts of the victim, even when the victim gives seemingly clear, objective consent to sex – according to Murphy.

While both criminal and civil laws on sexual consent recognize that people do consent to sex all the time, Murphy wants to co-opt a federal discrimination law standard covering racial and religious discrimination and apply it to sex.

The mistake Murphy is making is obvious: one can’t compare a dispute over consensual sex to one over “consensual racism” (if there could be such a thing) for the simple reason that almost 100% of sex is overtly consensual and 0% of racism is overtly consensual.

When we call into question every sex act in the same way we do every racist act, we are ignoring the fact that common racism is presumed wrong in ways that common sex is not – and shouldn’t be.

Federal law in the case of both workplace sexual harassment and Title IX works quite differently than laws on racism – unlike racism, a victim of sexual harassment (even via rape) has a larger duty to document and otherwise prove his or her case that he or she was harassed/raped, and the accused is allowed to present evidence that he or she had established consent.

> Title IX requires an incident be evaluated for whether it was "unwelcome" and "offensive," Murphy explained. Unwelcomeness is subjective, so it can be determined only by the victim; offensiveness is both subjective and objective, so it can be determined by the victim as well as observers – source.

A case study to illustrate the issues

Here's an example from my own experience in the parallel case of workplace sexual harassment: I once had a female manager that I found to be quite unattractive: a balding, obese tobacco smoker about twice my age. I also knew she was conniving and hostile when you crossed her. She thought I reminded her of her ex-husband (or so she told me) and she made many flirty passes at me.

I welcomed none of those passes but since she was my boss, I tolerated them without an objection, because I feared an objection would cost me my job. She finally asked me out to dinner under the pretense of work. I declined but she insisted, so I reluctantly agreed. Things got much worse from there and soon I quit a job I otherwise loved.

I didn't document her harassing me, nor did I complain about it until after I left the company. I could have built a great case but because I didn't, I was out of luck.

Now, hypothetically, if Wendy Murphy's understanding of discrimination law were somehow applied to my case, my subjective experience alone made my boss's advances a case of sexual harassment, even though I did not clearly communicate my discomfort to my boss. All I would have to do is file a complaint and my harasser would be guilty.

Crucial to employment law is this: my female boss was in a position of power over me and thus should have refrained from making potentially discomfiting sexual advances toward me.

Can a boss then NEVER ask out an employee in the same way a boss should never use a racial epithet? Back in those days (and I think this is still the case), there was a general understanding let's call "ask once": since no one can be sure whether one's sexual advances are welcome, one was allowed to ask for a date or sex once – and maybe only once – as a sort of "safe harbor" to allow for the possibility of consensual sex, but any further nagging could become harassment, as there would then be diminishing doubt that further requests were unwelcome. Contrast this with racism, which we can assume is never welcome or consensual.

Now, under feminist patriarchy theory, however, all men have power over all women, so Murphy plans to override both Title IX and "affirmative consent" to extend this principle to college students where no clear boss-employee power relationship exists: a male student just asking a female student on a date will become sexual harassment even if the woman enthusiastically seems to consent but in the privacy of her own thoughts finds the request unwelcome.

Murphy is planning to sue any school that considers anything other than the accuser's mental state. You will now be convicted of sexual harassment and, indeed, rape, even if from an objective perspective(s), your partner consented. All that matters is if she subjectively found your attention "unwelcome" – even if she kept that a secret during the sex.

> "The very first time that standard gets applied, the victim is going to say, why did you apply a tougher standard of affirmative consent to my case, therefore giving value to the offender's alleged mistake, which is almost always a lie?" Murphy said. "Why did you give any weight to his claimed mistake? That's not allowed under civil rights law. That can't trump [my] subjective decision about my own body. The argument is going to be that you don't apply affirmative consent to issues of racist violence on campus." – source.

The answer should be obvious, your honor: you don't treat sex like racism because two or more parties can and do consent to sex – and sometimes they even consent to violent sex. Two or more parties rarely (never) consent to racist violence.

But what if she wins?

But what if Murphy wins, and convinces a court that a subjective claim of rape should be as quickly and easily accepted as a subjective claim of racism would be?

This is why I want to like Murphy: if she succeeds the fallout will destroy both colleges and consent law in ways that I hope will force us to dump both federal interference and the abusive feminist monopoly on consent and give us a chance to come up with something better – like letting the police and courts do their job by respecting the due process rights of the accused. Murphy is weaponizing women's sexuality: what was once a powerful tool to manipulate men is becoming a dangerous minefield designed to destroy them.

As more men recognize this, I expect the ranks of Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW) and avoiding relationships with women will swell significantly.

If Murphy wins her lawsuits and nothing else changes, we have to ask: is there any legal way to protect yourself from your sexual partner's hidden thoughts?

There is just one, but it is a highly speculative long shot I would never try except as the following thought experiment: consider the idea that you should get your partner blackout drunk AFTER the sex is complete. The plan is to wipe her memory to the point where she cannot remember whether your first or later overtures were welcome or not. You'll then have proof she was sober during the sex but unless she lies, she cannot say for certain what her internal mental state was.

The principle is that since only her subjective thoughts count, you must muddle her memory of her thoughts to try to undermine her claims.

You'll need to give her a blood alcohol test so your lawyer can challenge her memory of whether she welcomed your advances or not.

Luckily, there is no discrimination law (yet) against getting your partner drunk AFTER sex is complete, and you must be careful to do this with all your partners because you'll never know which ones are harboring secret thoughts against you.

Reverse the genders

In an earlier article on affirmative consent, I argued that since women rarely ask overtly for consent, it follows that a gender-neutral law on consent had a huge theoretical potential to be used against sexually active campus feminist women. I caught a bit of flak in the comments of that article because readers found it implausible that the implied consent of a sexually participating man didn't satisfy the higher standard of verbal affirmative consent called for in the California law.

Wendy Murphy's contention – that a subjective consent standard on the part of the alleged victim should overrule all other considerations – does seem to support my contention that a seemingly overt but implied sexual consent does not establish actual consent (affirmative or otherwise) under the law.

If Murphy wins, does reversing the gender expectations create such possibilities of using them against campus feminists?

As the population of campus students approaches / exceeds 60% female, women are becoming more sexually aggressive than ever and one can argue that the few men remaining on campus are increasingly pressed to consent to their sexual advances. Both gynocentrism and the fear of being labeled as homosexual compel straight college men to just say yes, regardless of whether they find the sexual advances by women to be welcome or not.

And women do not take a “no” very well at all.

In cases where sexual consent is in dispute, the first one to report the incident is given legal protections and especially when a man is the victim, those protections are likely to be violated in ways that can be very lucrative to this victim once he files a civil case asking for damages from the college and the accused.

Have at it, guys. Just remember: document everything and file charges before she can.

Men scatter, women gather...

Clint Carpentier · 27 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

As arbitrarily promised, the second part of Over reading the nice guy…

I was talking to my Dad some time ago about fe/male relations. I've always thought of him when watching Clint Eastwood, they look nothing alike, but similar purple pill Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW) mentality and no-holds-barred directness; I love him and his insight, despite his not actually raising me (but that's a whole different topic: moms!!! They can fuck everything up!).

My Dad, is the quintessential MAN!!!

I can NOT… exaggerate his general manness. For instance, back when I was able to visit him during school holidays, I have this memory; I was sleeping on his couch, he and his girlfriend were arguing (if I got the story straight, it was about me), next thing I know, both of them are scuffling all the way up the length of his trailer, naked, and he shoves her out the door, and goes back to bed. Say what you want about that scene, his rarely seen child (he has no daughters, so I can't extrapolate any difference), was more important to him, than his regular lay; Understand that, and you will understand most fathers, pussy is everywhere, your kids are finite, and time is short.

My Dad, bless his soul, worries an exorbitant amount, over things I've long since forgotten; like not being allowed by trailer management, to let me build a tree fort, or teaching me how to swim; he still stresses about the time I was stung by a yellow jacket, and when he had to pierce a canker in my mouth. This is a 6'4″ MAN, a Vietnam vet, who still worries about his influence, or lack thereof, on his only child; a man, who was viciously abused as a child by a WWII vet (ignored by his own mother); who never laid a hand on me. He has always taught me what the world actually was, and no matter what, if I was honest with him, he would always have my back. And I believe him, and I can't, for the life of me, despite the sins I've long since committed, I can't not believe him, when he says, "I'm here for you."

It's almost embarrassing to admit, I'm nowhere near the man my Dad is; I have my reasons, and for the time being, they're my own, shared with those who matter, and for the rest, MGTOW explains much.

Those men in my life, have had much in common with traditional, or prehistoric men. Men who would leave home for days or weeks at a time. My Dad has more cash than he knows what to do with, so currently when he has time off of his camp work, his favorite hobby is to go shopping with his new (and first I might add) wife; he doesn't do this because he likes shopping, he does it because he's fascinated by her antics while shopping.

One of the misconceptions about primitive life is that men were incompetent. I don't say this because it's been said in so many words, but rather it's been alluded to, on both sides of the gender fence. The diet of primitive man was supposedly about 80% grains and vegetation; that statement by itself implies men are either lazy or incompetent, or both; and if you already have the indoctrination that men are lazy, then you will follow that chain of thought.

There are things that primitive man had to do, which modern man does not have to. For instance, protecting women and children is not a matter of following them around and fighting off dangers; that's bankrupt thinking, that's impoverished mentality and leads to abusive relationships. Primitive men were far more sophisticated than we "civilized" retards give them credit for.

Take the military for example. The military is a sophisticated engine of protection. The Americans base their whole military machine on the primitive, thus North America has virtually nothing in the way of threat of invasion; that method is called "Projected Power," it's offensive in nature, as their military has bases OUTSIDE of it's claimed territory. Harkening back to the primitive, and explaining the 20% meat diet; the men scatter. What this means is the village is the "safe zone" where the children can run around without fear of anything but the women; even then, children will adventure, and in some places, children become self-sufficient…

So how is this done?

First, the men are scouts, and natural (or animal) predators are territorial; projecting the power of men has long since proven to push predators away, men have become sure feared creatures in the natural world, that dangerous animals tend to drift farther away, so a pair of scouts just drifting around within eye-shot of the village does more to protect the village, than ALL the men loafing around IN the village. I remember having an argument with a feminist about primitive threats to women, she popped off, "what threats were there to women in the paleolithic other than other men?!" I can't even… there's no words… bears, tigers, wolves, foxes for fuck sake; you can't make that shit up.

Second, the men are scouts, and any human encampments within a day's travel, are studied to determine what threat they may pose. Having to present themselves as a credible threat (that silhouette on a hill watching them) in order to demand negotiation. This is where conversing with my Dad comes in, he has this story about MY peoples; you see, summers aren't always plentiful to primitive hunter/gatherers..

Drought creates friction among clans. My peoples have a story, and it goes as such: In order to survive, they had to steal from an opposing clan; well, this isn't a bank, they weren't stealing cash, they were stealing food. Of course, the opposing clan was also short on food stores, so they weren't going to pacifically say "ok take it." It was a drought, and winter was upon them. So after the men of my peoples had wiped out the protectors of the opposing village, and gained claim of their winter cache, they were left with a dilemma (here we come to understand women's desire for assholes… in it's barest sense), all that were left were elderly, women, and children. We here sit on our first world civilized pedestal and think, "take them home and care for them"; it doesn't work that way. Why steal from a people, only to feed them what you stole? The next option is to leave them to their own devices; but without their protectors, and thereby, their hunters (because winter was already upon them), it was down right cruel to subject those people to the slow and inevitable death of starvation. The third option, and the most humane (despite our "civilized" first world thinking) is what my peoples did, they killed the elderly, women, and children, of the clan they'd just raided. Now, why would MY peoples survive despite a recent plague, why would it explain why women desire assholes over nice guys?

Assholes have one thing in common, regardless of socioeconomic heritage, they all have this trait, they and theirs will be provided for, regardless of cost. And even though my peoples were damn near wiped out, even though we rank verging extinction, we have bounded back, and no one (save the Canadian government) messes with us, cuzz we take no shit, and we continue to assert our territorial claim.

Third, men are scouts, and anyone who has hunted will tell you, "hunting isn't about food, is about the hunt." Nowadays, we know where prey are, we google that; back in the primitive days, we scouted, tracked, assessed, and planned over flint/obsidian. Planning a hunt was far more orchestrated than just going out and killing some animal. Rifles are new, bows are new, hell, atl-atls are new; planning a hunt with close ranged weapons required strategy, and men died doing it. Men learned much from the wolf, which they domesticated into dogs, and then the horse radically changed the hunt. But much of hunting, was scouting. The elderly set traps for small game; the youth, full of piss and vinegar, proved their worth, with blood and broken bones felling big game, and the most nutritious part of a carcass (the liver) was given to the killer.

Fourth, men are scouts. It baffled me for years, why women expected men to get them flowers; flowers serve no purpose. But there's this story of my grandfather, a friend was visiting his camp trailer, and bug-eyed he said, "you better clear this shit out before the camp managers catch wind of it." Here's the thing, my grandfather had done nothing wrong, or even illegal, he had a large amount of what's called "caribou weed" hanging to dry in his trailer, it's a healing herb, not to be smoked for jollies. Now, with this insight, I can attribute "flowers" as a holdover, to any number of tradeable, herbs spices and palatable roots not in the vicinity of the gathered women.

If you haven't already realized, much of men's lives were spent scouting, usually in pairs or very small groups. This is still seen in modern man, braving dangers, everywhere, to protect and provide, for their women and children. Women and children are far less likely to be a victim of any crime, than that of a man; yet men are the least likely to acknowledge the dangers to themselves.

So what of primitive women? Women gather, they move in groups, large groups, with children. Watching modern women shop, is not much different from watching primitive women gather. They sort and they cackle, and they sort and they cackle and they sort some more, and they cackle; and they don't stray far from the village while they do this… sordid cackling. In the basest sense, women collect the most produce, for the least effort, in the safest environment.

Of the few predators who slip by the male "projected power" envelope, they tend not to like noise. If you haven't noticed, women are quite good at babbling; we down play it and call it small talk, but it's just babble. If you're not convinced of this, think back to all the times a woman has asked you if something was wrong, for the mere fact that you were silent. Scouts operate in silence, but women babble; it is virtually always the woman who says, "the child is too quiet, something is wrong." Babbling in a group is a protective measure against stalking predators; and even human predators, avoid noisy human prey.

There's a potty joke here somewhere… Oh yeah; the men's public washrooms are bastions of peace and serenity, while women take their girlfriends to the washroom with them, to babble inanely over a good shit. I shit you not, the most noise you here from the men's room is some passing gas, and once in a blue moon, "hey uh… you got some toilet paper over there?"

You wonder why women have an in-group preference; it's because they rely on the group for their own preservation. Men are on their own, if a man didn't return, the other men could only, at best, speculate as to what the man in question could have done wrong, because finding his carcass would have been near impossible. The more things change, the more they stay the same.

Any laws or legislation needs to take into account, the primitive mindset. And in the primitive mindset, women and children are already protected and provided for. We as a species, are naturally altruistic; we don't require government funded XYZ, because after we pay our 1/3 salary to taxes, we turn around and donate to our charity of choice anyhow, so why pay a ravenous bureaucracy to do it for us too?

Having completed the above diatribe, I've come to two more conclusions.

First, is that women gathering naturally, doesn't make for marketable media. If you notice, most music you find doesn't engender awe or sympathy about women unless they are psychologically fucked up or sociologically damaged. Even though there's tons of tunes about men gathering, none of it is about men gathering "naturally"; and there's a reason for that, men gather for two reasons, and both of them are "heroic", hunting and warfare; which is the most likely reason men gathering are often feared, men gathering mean, that men may/will die.

Second, is that words matter. Men can understand criticism; as I mentioned in the above linked article, men respect the shortest route from idea to implementation, "you're making a dull rock there, knap it this way, you'll make a stronger sharper spearhead." Women on the other hand, use words to make noise, and get their way; they use words on each other, to keep each other in line, not to do anything better, otherwise birthing mortality would have been reduced centuries earlier by midwives, not male doctors. Feminists know this naturally, they were born and bred to wording their way into dominance.

I can't find an AMV which praises the gathering nature of women; so I'll have to settle for the following…

Fifty Shades of Sage: Jeff Sharlet's bizarre sex fetishism and GQ

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 28 February 2015 · Archived copy · Original

"Beware Sage's rape hugs!" cries Jeff Sharlet as he waves his basket of picked cherries and doctored mugshots. I rolled my eyes hard enough to lose them under the desk when I saw that Sharlet's piece was categorized as "news" and not "opinion."

Author Jeff Sharlet opened up his hit piece with a photo of a pedophile no one at the conference even knew to set the tone. He threw in Elliot Rodger for good measure, as is custom ever since The Daily Kos lied about Rodger being a MRA. The funny bit about the pedo is that Jeff in reality "found" him and put him in a car with the Honey Badgers to agitate them. Jeff was also seen ushering Pedobear around, and they rarely separated. AVfM will have a story on Jeff's odd use of the (guy possibly paid to act like a) pedophile later.

I'm a little jealous though, because Jeff should have put more attention to the real evils of the world, such as hug rape. Yes, I was accused of hugging a girl, so now I'm once again Satan.

GQ, you did a great job of putting words in my mouth and bending context like silly putty, but you need to try harder to make me look like a pervert.

First, you need a better picture. Next time, throw me in a dryer and let my mustache grow out so I get a Kim Coates thing going. The "junkyard ginger Hugh Laurie" look might work when you want to describe my stay in a prison hospital where it's never lupus, but not when you want to make me look like a huggy rapist.

Left: GQ edit job, Right: Crops of unaltered pics.

If mechanics detailed cars in the same way that GQ edited images, every Lamborghini would come out an AMC Gremlin. Poor Paul ended up looking like a cross between a duffel bag and that dad from Cloudy with a Chance of Meatballs (Normally he just looks like a duffel bag). The photo editor cranked up contrast and sharpness to bring out every imperfection in our complexion, even if it meant forcing unnatural lighting and drawing in some blemishes that weren't there before.

The photographer Bruce Gilden told me to pose with my sign and I was standing there thinking that this was kind of like doing a mugshot. That's when I should have flipped on my recorder and asked some pointed questions, but stupid me didn't do that. An interesting unmentioned detail was that four Zen Men members were there, and the photos Bruce took of them did not make the cut. One white couple and two black men holding signs discrediting the perceptions Jeff wanted to leverage were suspiciously absent from the GQ article. I asked Bruce for the other photos so these Zen Men members would have something to share on social media, but the answer was an emphatic "no."

To the Zen Men members participating in the photo shoot: I'm sorry you wasted time making signs and trying to voice your opinion, but apparently GQ thought you weren't worth including. On the other hand, I'm glad you all did not end up becoming targets. Take this as a lesson to protect yourself around the media. Remember: They do not care about you.

Blair Braverman, self-proclaimed friend to accused rapists and hug-rape survivor.

Bias from visual stimulus aside, let's talk about Blair Braverman, the dog-sledding plant hired specifically to flirt with men and get GQ a story. Since Blair was attractive, I did flirt with her… at first. Nothing wrong with that. What Jeff failed to mention was that Blair eventually came on so strong that I suspected that she was up to something and withdrew (GQ goons aren't good with subtlety). Our security head Al Martin witnessed Blair's rosy-cheeked banter with me, so Jeff is more than welcome to keep chasing the story to its conclusion if he's hellbent on challenging the testimony of our security people.

I could complain about selective quotation and how Jeff straight up put words in my mouth, but who cares? Jeff is in news. So long as you call yourself a reporter and make your target look bad enough, facts are irrelevant.

But we have to acknowledge at least one fact: Blair was put in the conference, by GQ, under their assumption that she would get hurt, raped or worse.

Jeff wanted that to happen, not MHRAs. Blair would play Seven Minutes in Heaven if it got Jeff a rape story. She was there to confirm a presumption that MHRAs, MGTOWs or other red-pill folk are incapable of self-control and are ready to rape at a moment's notice.

Unfortunately for Jeff, I have an ability to detect manipulation, and I do not think with my dick. He calibrated his bear trap to clamp shut on a hug-trigger, which meant he could try to make me look like a pervert even with totally appropriate physical contact. Since he was obviously desperate to catch prey, his trap misfired and merely ripped my jeans without biting me to a standstill. Having narrowly evaded pseudo-journalistic "capture," I can easily show you that Blair was, indeed, a trap.

Let me tell you the brief story about Blair, with no spin. Blair asked for my advice about how to support her friend suffering from a false rape allegation. I told her we could go to the designated discussion area where we wouldn't bother anybody with what sounded like a private discussion. She agreed. We went to the balcony since other rooms had interviews or Honey Badger stuff going on. Even then we were not alone because conference security staff was visible and people walking around just inside could see us through the glass doors. Blair proceeded to tell me this story about her friend's history in BDSM and how his partner took her bruises from consensual play to the cops. She was sure that the allegation was false, and that led to us talking a bit about relationships in general. She told me her friend was the creative type, so I suggested that he might appreciate a poem. My talking to her included a reassuring knee pat and a hug. She never complained, and she made a sad face that looked like she needed a kind gesture.

Blair, now educated about how to emotionally support a man falsely accused, ran to Jeff to complain about how rapey I was.

I never intend to sleep with strangers, but Jeff framed this interaction as me using Blair's pain as an excuse to eat her out. He painted me as a pervert perching on a chair, licking my lips (Yes, he wrote that I was licking my lips), and waiting for my chance to run my hand up her skirt after some hasty kindness ritual.

"No good deed goes unpunished," I suppose.

This is the gist of the report:

> SAGE IS THE "NICE GUY" THAT DRAGGED POOR SWEET BLAIR ONTO A BALCONY FOR A GAME OF GINGER GROPE. SHE TRIED TO RUN, BUT SAGE PINNED HER TO THE RAILING AND RAN HIS HAND UP HER TREMBLING THIGH AS HE DROOLED GREASE LOOGIES DOWN HER CLEAVAGE TO THE CROWD OF RAPE APOLOGIST ONLOOKERS BELOW. OH GOD, THE SMELL.
>
> WAIT? WHAT IS HE–HE HUGGED HER! HE ACTUALLY HUGGED HER AND DEMANDED A POEM! IT'S LIKE THE COPS DON'T TAKE COOTIES SERIOUSLY. CALL THE EXORCIST! BLAIR SAID IT WAS THE MOST NON-CONSENSUAL HUG SHE'S EVER KNNNOOOOWWWN.
>
> –Jeff Charlatan—wait, I mean, Sociopath. Fuck. Sherbert. Sharlet. There. Sorry, maybe.

Great, now I have trust issues.

I admit it. I hugged her and told her that her friend might like a poem. And I would have gotten away with it if it weren't for that meddling journalist and his talking plant!

Hide yo kids, hide yo wife, because I'm the hug rapist!

Uh, boo?

I happily blame the victim here. If people are feeling down, they're just askin' fer a hug. You hear me, world? I'm going to hug and love the shit out of you!

Ah, but now I am using rape jokes too liberally. Jeff does a lot of implicit brown-nosing about how rape jokes are a problem, but he lowered the "rapey" bar enough to include gestures of reassurance.

Maybe I'm nuts, but I think Jeff Sharlet marginalized rape more than any rape joke ever could. When you make hugs, of all things, rapey, you make it harder for prudent people to take rape seriously–and let's not forget when Jeff took the attempted rape of Alison Tiemen's husband and called it something out of Penthouse magazine. You can hear Alison's account of Jeff's utter insensitivity and suspicious use of a pedophile in the Feburary 26th Honey Badger Radio episode.

Honestly, if me hugging someone is the worst thing Jeff and Blair could spin, then that shows how little dirt on me they had to begin with. Think about it: this is a news article where the author presents the opinion of his own friend as fact.

Jeff, if you want to set someone up and disgrace journalism entirely, maybe find a fact checker that doesn't telegraph your plans.

Blanton, Riley <[redacted]@condenast.com>
to Sage

Excellent. Thank you again for your help with this. The questions I've got for you now are:

If you don't mind me asking, how tall are you?
What color are your eyes?

How long have you been at A Voice for Men?
What is your full current title there? I see that your signature notes your status as the Collegiate Activism Director. Just want to be sure you don't prefer Director of Collegiate Activism or something.
What does your job there entail?

Were you a part of the security team at the conference?
If so, in what sort of capacity?

What was your red pill moment?
And — I'm asking everyone this — what is a red-pill moment?

Where did you encounter Jeff? At the conference itself or somewhere else in St. Croix Shores?
Did you spend much time with him?

At some point during the conference, did you have a conversation with a woman named Blair, who was there as a friend of Jeff Sharlet, our reporter?
If so, where and when did this conversation take place?
What did you speak about, in general terms?
At some point, did you encourage Blair to write a poem?

As always, let me know if you have any questions or concerns I might address. The story is still a bit of a moving target as it's moving through the editorial process, so I expect a couple more questions will crop up for you before the week is out. Hope that will work with your schedule. Please let me know if it does not.

Best,

Riley

Reading Riley's questions about Blair was like watching a thumbless assassin try to hide a kitchen knife. "Oh, this? No, I'm not going to stab you. Promise."

Blanton, Riley <[redacted]@condenast.com>
to Sage

Hey, Sage.

This is all very helpful. Thank you. Did you and Blair end up talking in a stairwell at any point? And did the two of you share a hug?

Best,

Riley

Paul had to pull Riley aside when Riley asked suspiciously specific questions like these to more than one staff member. Remember that Blair flirted with other men. I just happened to be the cleanest fit for Jeff's nerdy "nice guy" mold.

Blair never once communicated discomfort and happily accepted all interactions because my emotional support was ammunition for Jeff. If Blair actually was shocked into some kind of uncomfortable stupor by my hug, I dunno, maybe she remembered bending over to pick up a box of treats before one of her sled dogs gave her a Milkbone instead. I don't care anymore. I can only wish her friend the best given my limited ability to assist, assuming that Blair didn't make the whole thing up.

I take my leave from Blair and Jeff by cursing them with ginger magic. Now they will see my Photoshopped face during every orgasm. I'm creepy like that.

There you have it: Jeff showcases obvious bias through selective omission, doctored photos and enough framing to put most contractors to shame. If you wanted to hear the story behind the story, here is the unedited and neglected interview between myself and Jeff. Remember as you form your opinion that Jeff withheld a mountain of information, leaving only what confirmed common hallucinations tied to ad revenue. Unfortunately, controlling the narrative rewards Jeff's predatory nature with gainful employment. Such is life.

I can only hope that in the future my sign states the status quo, not a wish for a better future.

TL;DR – Onision doesn't understand Women Against Feminism

AVfM Video Source · 1 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The majority of the world's women, who are not feminists, are apparently misunderstood by a few of the slower and less-informed members of society. Teal Deer has some thoughts that might help them:

We don't know if he likes us but we like him, so subscribe to TL;dr.

What is the Non-Feminist Revolution?

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 1 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The non-feminist revolution is not a "movement," but a largely unconscious demographic upwelling of resistance to feminism and its consequences. It is an objectively historical process, of a spontaneous, organic and amoral character. Its center is everywhere, its perimeter nowhere, and its parts do not always accord with each other. We did not initiate or instigate this "revolution". We did not invent it. We merely recognized it in action, and gave it a name.

We have chosen the word "revolution" not because it sounds cool and glamorous, but because no better terminology occurs to us. A revolution is a thing which overturns or abrogates a system of authority, and does so without seeking permission. Indeed, it would be an ironic kind of revolution that would say to the establishment "may I overthrow you?". But the non-feminist revolution is nothing of that sort.

On the contrary, the non-feminist revolution works to reverse the entire spectrum of adverse consequences which feminist innovation has introduced. By this means, it nullifies the feminist project in toto. It works as a primordial energy upon a distributed range of attack points, and not all of the humans involved will intellectualize the meaning of their actions. That is, they might not be aware that they are compromising feminism as such. They might only be reacting to immediate life conditions, yet the combined effect of their actions will undermine the feminist power structure from many directions.

As you might guess, the non-feminist revolution does not compose an identifiable human target group. It has no clear demographic profile and no membership roster. Rather, it operates as a cloud of forces manifesting through human actions whose political linkage is sometimes clear, and other times obscure.

The people lazily called "MRAs" are not the non-feminist revolution, but only a conspicuous vortex within that revolution — rather like the Great Red Spot on Jupiter. And like the Great Red Spot, the "MRA" vortex will eventually dissipate. Yet the Jovian turbulence that originally spawned it will continue.

The boundary between MRA and non-MRA becomes meaningless when you consider the holistic — or ambient — nature of the non-feminist revolution. So-called MRAs are on a continuum with every form of non-feminist reality there is, and the feminist obsession with "MRAs" misses the forest for the trees. This myopia shall be their undoing.

Similar remarks extend to those on the non-feminist side. All presently existing boundaries and categories within the non-feminist revolution are mutable and subject to metamorphosis. Blind adherence to mere labels, political constructs, and "club life," will doom the adherents to imagination death and psychic fossilization.

The order of the day is to think outside the box.

Ever since recognizing the existence of the non-feminist revolution, our interest has been to harness the disordered energy of it so as to make it politically efficient. To make the non-feminist revolution politically efficient means both to minimize the transit time from a feminist world to a post-feminist world, and to minimize any chaos and human misery that might go along with this.

Once the social death of feminism has been effected, it will be safe to say that the post-feminist goal has been attained. On that day, feminism will have fallen into the same disrepute as racism. We must then see to it that the narrative of feminism's rise and fall is correctly written in the chronicle of history, with indelible ink. A permanent moral stigma shall be placed upon the word "feminism" itself; this word shall be non-recuperable.

The project to harness the non-feminist revolution is broadly termed counter-feminism. It is the mountain top view. The gameboard view. The vanguard view. And yes, a revolution needs a vanguard if it is to be distinguished from chaos. Gut reactions might arise from broad masses of people, but politically efficient plans assuredly do not. Therefore, somebody might as well give it a go. If they don't, somebody else will.

Please note that feminism is a utopian project not unlike the pursuit of a rainbow. Some might call it dystopian in practice, but in the minds of its participants it aims at a perfected future state of life.

Counter-feminism is not utopian. It aims only at the disappearance of feminism and harbors no blueprint for a perfected post-feminist state of life. Counter-feminism considers both feminism and non-feminism to be flawed states, but counts the latter preferable to the former. In the end, the role of counter-feminism is simply that of midwife to a post-feminist consciousness.

The project of feminism is to increase the power of women with no specified limit. More tersely stated, feminism is female supremacism, since that term describes the logical outcome of such a project. However, it is not amiss to suspect that the unconstrained growth of female power will generate natural consequences, and that these consequences are not bound to be pleasant or tidy. This describes the character of the non-feminist revolution — it is the natural order of life bursting chaotically through the structure of feminist innovation and reasserting itself.

When water breaks through a dam and roars away downstream, sweeping all before it, the scene is chaotic. But it does not remain that way, for the chaos is a healing crisis, the natural consequence of something that should never have been permitted to develop in the first place. And at last, the water will settle down into a tranquil stream again.

It is even so with the non-feminist revolution and its chaotic manifestation. Forces of nature can be that way, especially when they are unnaturally pent up in defiance of common sense.These things are predictable.

Social revolutions follow a similar pattern — it is best to initiate reforms well before the crisis comes to fever pitch. If you wait too long, you get dérapage. You get Jacobinism and Sansculottism and reigns of terror and all manner of beastly untidiness.

Let it be our endeavor, therefore, to ease the transition to a post-feminist world and to keep the bad stuff to a minimum. Let us reduce the non-feminist revolution to the most politically efficient order possible.

Factual Feminist: The misguided crusade against campus Greek life

AVfM Video Source · 2 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

AEI Senior Research Associate Caroline Kitchens (@cl_kitchens) examines both the efforts to ban campus fraternities and the flawed statistics used to demonize them.

You can subscribe to videos from the Factual Feminist here.

Men – The Forgotten Gender

AVfM Video Source · 2 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Deepika Bhardwa's TEDx talk in India is another sign Men's Human Rights awareness is spreading around the globe.

Mo'Nique Proves That "Diva Culture" Is Ruinous To Black Women

Mumia Ali · 2 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

"Don't nobody bring me no bad news!"

-Mabel King, "The Wiz"

I had just barely put in my copy for last week's column, a response to Brittney "Prof. Crunk" Cooper's own column appearing on Salon.com, when I got a tip from one of my readers that actress and comedienne Mo'Nique was virtually blackballed from the Hollywood entertainment machine. I didn't even need to read the articles to understand what was at the root of the issue, but by the time I had scanned through several of them, they only confirmed my initial suspicions – and provide powerful evidence for my argument made last week: that, contrary to Prof. Cooper's assertions that Black women en masse are somehow being held down economically due to some vast White-wing conspiracy (read: Racism), I offered that one of the biggest impediments to Black female achievement and success in our time today, in 2015, is their own behavior and life choices they make.

Mo'Nique is a case in point.

"Diva Culture"

We learn of Mo'Nique's troubles by way of acclaimed director Lee Daniels, who recently stated in an interview that the Oscar-winning actress has been shutout of the movie-making business due to her unwillingness to "play the game" – in other words, to be courteous and pleasant to be around and fairly easy to work with. None of this comes as any shock to anyone who knows Black women in general; as I noted in last week's column, they have a very nasty reputation for being irascible, uncooperative, "sassy", and even violent. What Daniels noted in Mo'Nique's behavior is something that has long-held great cultural force in Black American life among its women; I refer to it as "Diva Culture".

Many Black women subscribe to the notion that they, and other Black women, are "divas" – a term that literally means "goddess" – and in any event was originally taken to mean a woman of incomparable talent and ability. Names like Maria Callas and Aretha Franklin come to mind, as they are ladies whose outsized singing talent have made them household names.

Unfortunately for many Black women, and even Mo'Nique herself, they have seemed have latched on to the more commonplace understanding of the term "diva", which suggests merely a woman who think's she's all that and is extremely difficult to contend with. While it may not be cricket to say in polite company, the truth is that IF you're extremely talented – and therefore difficult if not impossible to replace – then yes, people can and will put up with you. But if you're merely "alright" or even a bit above average, then people can and will put some considerable distance between you and them. And, when you stop to think about it, who can blame them?

The simple truth of the matter is that Mo'Nique, while talented, is not on the same plane as Lucille Ball, Carol Burnett or Tracy Ullman; her acting chops, while good, aren't on par with Judy Dench, Helen Mirren, Glenn Close or Meryl Streep. She is not a female version of the late Robin Williams, who was able to play both comedic and "straight" (read: serious) roles with aplomb and skill. Her "diva" behaviors got out way ahead of her actual abilities – and she paid a heavy price for it.

Speaking of economics, when topics like the one we're currently examining comes up, it is rarely done so with the bottom line in mind. However, when one considers the facts, it becomes clear just how fiscally ruinous certain cultural norms and behaviors actually are in Black American life, and accounts much more for the state of things there than anything "racist". For example, last week I made the case that a major reason Black women as a group have the lowest net worth of any group of American women, was due to the fact that they are the least partnered group of women – they have the lowest marital rate, the highest divorce rate, the highest rate of breakup and infidelity (both cheating and being cheated on) in relationships, and of course, the highest out-of-wedlock birthrates – and that this too, was due at least as much to the adherence to "diva culture" among Black women, than anything else. I stated a simple truth: that for most average Americans, a surefire way of upping your economic profile was to get married, stay married and work together with your spouse to build a better life. It's something that has worked, and continues to work, and if anyone knows this, it's the White feminists in our time who have successfully implanted the notion into the minds of millions of Black women that "they don't need no man". They've played a seriously cruel joke on their "sistas" – one that amounts to real dollars and cents lost on the ledger.

And, as Mo'Nique's current situation aptly shows, it doesn't stop there. She has lost numerous opportunities to act in what would become highly acclaimed (and financially successful) films that could have put her onto yet another Oscar track. How much has those lost acting jobs cost her? Could it be to the tune of millions?

You do the math.

And contrary to Prof. Cooper's rants, the plain truth of it is that if it were not for anti-discrimination laws and affirmative action, quite a few more Black women would be out of work today, due to their anti-social ways – nor is this a closely guarded state secret. Black women themselves know this to be true.

Of course, instead of examining all the variables on the table, Black women like Cooper insist on "examining" only those variables that please their ideological sensibilities and that assuage their egos. But, the facts have a nasty way of bursting one's bubbles, don't they?

Speaking of which…

Sheryl Lee Ralph Gets The Facts Wrong

Not to be outdone, Black actress Sheryl Lee Ralph has weighed in on Daniels' remarks on Mo'Nique, in which she says the following:

> "What's interesting about that is, she didn't campaign. I wonder, do you think that they would blackball Tom Hanks for not campaigning for a movie? The game is different for women."

Uh, no Ms. Ralph, it's not. If you're an irascible White guy, you can get blackballed, too.

How do I know?

A little movie called The Hurt Locker told me. I watched it several times over the past weekend, a "day in the life" flick about a bomb squad during the Iraq war that just happened to be excellently directed by a woman, who would go on to win an Oscar for her efforts – the first woman ever to do so.

However, one of her producers was banned – BANNED – from the Oscar proceedings for being a jerk:

> "In February 2010, the film's producer Nicolas Chartier emailed a group of Academy Award voters in an attempt to sway them to vote for The Hurt Locker instead of "a $500M film" (referring to Avatar) for the Best Picture award. He later issued a public apology, saying that it was "out of line and not in the spirit of the celebration of cinema that this acknowledgment is". The Academy banned him from attending the award ceremony, the first time the Academy has ever banned an individual nominee."

As you can clearly see, Mr. Chartier, a Frenchman, is very White. So, no, Ms. Ralph – being a woman – or being Black – has nothing to do with it.

It has everything to do with whether you're just a jerk or not.

And that, is a good thing.

The Case For Black Women Going To Charm School

Last week I argued that Black women as a group badly needed an intensive course in charm school; unsurprisingly, not a few Sista ladies on my social media took umbrage to such a notion. However, what I said was not without precedent in Black American life; unlike other Blacks, particularly those who consider themselves "enlightened and educated", I have never found much interest in attempting to reinvent the wheel, but rather, merely affirming that which has proven to work.

Enter Motown, the entertainment and pop cultural juggernaut of the 60s and 70s founded by Berry Gordy. Every major and even minor Motown star was required to undergo charm school training and instruction, (this was true of the male singers too, like Marvin Gaye – so Black feminists, before you even get started, give it a rest, hmm?) under the careful guise of the late and truly great, Ms. Maxine Powell, who passed away only two years shy of her 100th year on this planet barely two years ago. As the Los Angeles Times remembrance of Ms. Powell states:

> "From 1964 to 1969, Powell ran Motown's in-house "charm school," a mandatory course of instruction in proper sitting, standing, eating, dressing, chatting with fans, responding to reporters and every other act of public deportment that might make or break a Motown star."

Well into her dotage, Ms. Powell had many grateful students and well wishers, among them the pantheon of Motown luminaries, like the legendary Diana Ross:

> "Powell 'showed me that there was the possibility of beauty, grace, integrity and meaning to my life,' Ross said in a statement."

Please, go and read the whole article for yourselves – and then ask yourself, honestly – if Black women in our time, come anywhere close to the example Ms. Powell has set?

Shedding The Pounds Is Not Enough – But It's A Good Start

Last spring, Mo'Nique made headlines for losing more than 80lbs – a formidable feat given her previous statements about being, to coin a phrase Prof. Cooper quipped to my copy editor Mr. Dean Esmay via Twitter last week, "fat and fly". Mo'Nique instantly became more attractive as a result of slimming down, and was quickly noticed by Black lady fans, some of whom viciously attacked her for leaving the Obese Club. You see, as I've noted last week, Black women, taken together as a group now, are the heaviest cohort in America, and take great pride in that fact, as Prof. Cooper's social media remarks clearly illustrate. Despite all evidence to the contrary, they insist on making excuses for their ever-expanding dress sizes, outmatched only by their egos and anti-social attitudes. It all adds up to a human being that is extremely difficult to be around.

No wonder so many Black men vote with their feet.

But, as Mo'Nique herself clearly shows (and other Black women, hint, hint), merely shedding the pounds, stand alone, is not enough; you simply have to comport yourself in a pleasant manner, too. Doing so can and has made the difference between those women who are successful in life, and those women who are not.

Like Mo'Nique.

So, in sum: "diva culture" has not helped the bulk and mass of Black women, if all the social and economic indices are anything to go by; indeed, it has proven extraordinarily ruinous for the vast majority of them, incurring costs that simply put, most Black women, and that includes sistas like Mo'Nique, cannot afford. The answer is clear: Sistas need a resolution, because being a "diva" simply hasn't worked.

They might try acting like ladies for a change.

The ABC allows feminists to use Q&A as a bully pulpit

Tom Voltz · 2 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

One of the most disgusting and callous things that feminist domestic violence advocates do – and they do it regularly – is to dismiss and minimise the abuse suffered by male victims. It is especially galling when they do this to a man who has already been through the ordeal of being told by police, friends, and society that he's the wrong gender to be a victim of family violence. Worse again is when they do it right to his face in a public forum for all the world to see. These people wouldn't dream of doing such a thing to a female victim but they apparently feel completely justified in doing it to a man; a perfect illustration of the empathy gap that exists in society.

This is exactly what was done to an audience member during the Monday 24th February, 2015 episode of the ABC's Q&A. An extremely courageous man named Steve, who is a survivor of family violence, had the guts to stand up, tell his story, and pose the following question (paraphrased below):

> With research showing that at least 1 in 3 victims of family violence are male, why is all of the funding, services and discussion focused solely on female victims and how can we raise awareness for male victims?

Given that Steve had to wait until the last five minutes of the show before they allowed him to ask his question – the only question that even mentioned male victims – it seemed to me to be a highly pertinent and important question and one that was well and truly worthy of discussion. However, true to form, even though feminists are always banging on about how men need to stop being so macho and seek help when they are victimised, Steve's question was deftly sidestepped by the panel and the discussion was quickly returned to focus solely on female victims. Simon Santosha managed to achieve this feat in a record-breaking 18 seconds before passing the ball to Natasha Stott-Despoja who continued to run with the standard "woman good, man bad" narrative thus carefully avoiding Steve's question completely.

Fantastic Job Simon! I thought you were supposed to be a men's counsellor? How much psychological damage do you think you did to Steve by completely dodging his question about male victims and then immediately shifting the focus back to female victims and male perpetrators? What do you think Steve will be inclined to do next time he considers speaking up about the abuse he has suffered? What sort of message did you send to other abused men who saw the way that people like you and the rest of the panel treat men who speak out about the abuse they have suffered? Since you seem to have a tin ear when it comes to the pain and suffering of male victims, I'll help you out and tell you exactly what sort of message you sent: you just told every male victim watching, in no uncertain terms, that their abuse simply doesn't matter. You just told them that their pain is insignificant and that they should suck it up, walk it off, and keep their mouth shut because only female victims are really worthy of our concern and the only response they are worthy of is distain. Not that Natasha Stott-Despoja did any better. At the mention of male victims, she seemed to be desperately concerned with convincing everyone that men are hardly ever the victims of family violence and that the feminist model – which insists without evidence that family violence is a gender issue – is the only valid perspective. This, despite the the enormous body of peer-reviewed data available that shows that near parity exists between male & female victims.

The only person on the entire panel that showed even a glimmer of compassion for Steve and the many other men in his position, was Rosie Batty who at least managed a sympathetic look and nod as Steve was asking his question. Of course she didn't go so far as to actually say anything – no, that might have been construed as supportive to men and therefore anti-woman. Still, a sympathetic look is more than male victims can usually expect from the "Stop Violence Against Women" (and presumably nobody else) crowd.

As if all of that wasn't bad enough, much of the audience, chocked full as it was with sour-faced, rebarbative middle-aged feminists with a massive chip on their shoulder, felt it necessary to add insult to injury, and simultaneously expose their complete and utter ignorance, by responding with a chorus of "That's not true!", "No way!", and other assorted scoffing when Steve quoted the entirely accurate statistic that at least one in three Australian victims of family violence are male. I suppose it was just too much to expect from these egregious windbags for them to show Steve the same level of respect that he and the rest of us had extended to them and their appalling cronies while they spent close to an hour slandering our entire gender with half-truths, appeals to emotion, cherry picked factoids, and a series of carefully selected questions. Not only did these questions account for nearly 55 of the episode's 60 minutes, they were largely a waste of time because they were basically just the same question worded slightly differently and asked five times in a row by five different feminists, that question essentially being:

> How can we better protect the poor innocent women from those evil, evil men

Those of us that attended the show in the hopes of bringing attention to neglected male victims knew well before time that Q&A were probably going to be using the control they had over audience selection, question selection, panelists selection, moderation, and time constraints to push the standard feminist narrative on family violence. Nevertheless, Men's Rights Sydney submitted the following question in the, perhaps naive, hope that it would be selected for the show:

> The dominant narrative promoted by government and victim advocacy groups is that family violence is a gender issue and is almost entirely something that men inflict on women. However, in reality, there is an enormous body of research, over 1700 peer-reviewed studies in total, which clearly show that in most, if not all, western countries, male victims are almost as common as female victims. In fact, all the scientific evidence points towards family violence being generational rather than gendered.
>
> Isn't the ideological obsession with this gendered explanation, which flies in the face of all the scientific evidence, getting in the way of addressing the problem, as well as disenfranchising male victims and providing cover for female perpetrators?

In the waiting area before the show began, quite a few of us congregated to chat and we soon discovered that no less than 4 of us had submitted questions along the same lines so we had some hope that, even if our particular question was rejected for one reason or another, that one of the other very similar questions would be selected. Of course, as anyone who watched the show knows, not a single one of them was. An extremely telling state of affairs IMHO.

The truth is that this show was not the open discussion on family violence that it was billed as but was simply yet another excuse to trot out the tired old feminist stereotype of men as violent oppressors and women as innocent helpless victims so that feminist-run victim advocacy groups can continue to justify their existence, and their funding. The entire show was simply propaganda designed to provide justification for their refusal to address the very real and widespread problem of violent women and the lack of support available to the men and children that they abuse. The reason for this is the same as ever, the truth poses a serious problem for feminist theory and calls into question their entire ideology. This is because, according to feminism, family violence is a manifestation of men seeking to assert their patriarchal dominance over women. However if, as the evidence shows, women are just as violent as men in domestic relationships, this entire theory – a foundation stone of feminist family violence victim advocacy – is called into question and the entire feminist house of cards starts to topple.

Thanks to the actions of Men's Rights Activists, and those that support them, Feminism is already standing on some very shaky ground. People are increasingly starting to question their theories and are asking more and more often for them to supply some evidence to back up their claims so the last thing they can afford is to have some of the facts that contradict their ideology publicised on national TV. However, as desperate as these people are to maintain their grip on the public narrative, it is nevertheless waning fast. On a TV show like Q&A where they have total control over the entire process, these people can still manipulate the questions, the panelists, and the tweets displayed on screen, to engineer a false impression of public consensus but the Internet is a very different animal altogether and is arguably already more influential than old media. It is on the Internet that this battle will inevitably be fought and the Internet is a place where no single voice can control the narrative and bury the facts. The days of feminism having sole control over the narrative on family violence is already long gone and more and more people are realising that feminist “theories” are nothing more than dogma based on no solid evidentiary standard whatsoever. With opposition growing ever more rapidly every day, it’s only a matter of time now before a critical mass is reached and people start to reject their lies en masse.

In the mean time however, it’s up to those of us who already know the truth about family violence to support these neglected male victims and to continue to expose the ineffective ideological solutions of feminism while promoting any evidence-based solutions that are proposed. This is an issue that’s devastating the lives of far too many people for us to do anything else.

The fight for father's rights in the UK

Gary Quell · 2 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Within the United Kingdom there remains a silent boundary for every male that either has, or will have a child to call his own. A steel sky, painted and portrayed to look like the real thing which can reduce a man's role as father to a title which exists in name only, and secures none of the accolades that should naturally come with fatherhood itself.

The issue here is a legal term simply referred to as Parental Responsibility (PR). One might assume upon hearing the term that this is a set of unwritten, non-tangible obligations that each person bestows upon themselves when they make the decision to become a parent. In many ways you're right, however in the UK you'd be horribly wrong.

Parental Responsibility, in it's fullest, broadest legal definition is described as the following, by the UK government:

"If you have parental responsibility, your most important roles are to:

· provide a home for the child

· protect and maintain the child"

The above is taken directly from the UK's .Gov website, and goes on to elaborate other benefits of having Parental Responsibility (PR):

"You're also responsible for:

· disciplining the child

· choosing and providing for the child's education

· agreeing to the child's medical treatment

· naming the child and agreeing to any change of name

· looking after the child's property"

Interestingly (and interjected as a side note), they also state that having PR does not entitle any individual to contact with the child, but does entitle them to maintenance payments.

Yes, you heard that right. By law, anyone who has been granted Parental Responsibility is not guaranteed contact with the child/children in question, but is expected to pay maintenance, contact or not.

However, the loose guarantees provided by possessing PR is not the issue. As flippant and unaccommodating as it is to have PR, the real problem is what is involved in acquiring it in the first place. If you're male, that is.

By law any woman that gives birth to a child is automatically granted Parental Responsibility. No paper work, no positive action to be taken – By virtue of giving birth, the mother of the child will instantly be recognized by the state as possessing PR. A perfectly reasonable and logical system at this point.

The father however is not recognized as having PR when his child is born. In order to acquire it he can do one of two things, detailed again by the UK's government website:

"A father usually has parental responsibility if he is:

· married to the child's mother

· listed on the birth certificate (after a certain date, depending on which part of the UK the child was born in)"

A further option is to sign a Parental Responsibility application form, which can only be completed with the mothers consent. To date, these remain the only three methods of acquiring PR amicably.

What do I mean by “amicably?” Well, all of these options rely on the cooperation of the mother. Whereas she will gain PR without anyone else’s permission, a father’s main options are heavily reliant on an amicable relationship with the mother of his child. If things are not amicable between then, no consideration is spared for why this may be, or who may have been responsible for the break up – The mother, in every instance no matter her character, will have the power to influence. If neither of these options are viable the remaining option is to apply via the court system for PR of your own child, which involves the following, again provided by the UK Government website:

“If you want parental responsibility but can’t agree on arrangements with the mother, you can apply for a court order.

A court order costs £215.”

£215, roughly translated to about $331 is the exact price of fatherhood in the UK today. However what the state fails to mention here is that this is an initial cost, one which can inflate should there be objection by the mother of the child. A scenario like this will then result in a court case for parental rights with legal fees applying only to the party that has a full time job, in the UK people who are unemployed receive free legal aid.

Now, if you haven’t joined the dots and you’re still wondering what’s wrong with all this, I’ll explain further.

At the most base level this is an equality issue. Here we have, backed and supported by government, a legislation that grants unique rights and responsibilities to one half of the population, yet requires the other half to take positive action and receive the blessing of someone else in order to obtain it. That is not equality, it’s the exact opposite.

In no other situation would that be deemed appropriate. Further to this, the current system is increasingly open to abuse by the vengeful, unreasonable ex partners of men. By no means is that a statement which aims to label all women as vengeful and unreasonable. Not at all, but there’s no denying that such women do exist.

In such cases where a man is (or is about to become) a father to a child he will share with such a woman, he finds himself in a position of complete submission – A role of utter subordination where another individual (of no comparative, legitimate, credible authority) maintains power over exactly how much responsibility he can have for his child.

All it takes in situations like this to completely negate a man’s involvement with his own children, is to simply fail to inform him of when the birth registration is taking place. He cannot arrange it himself, as he has no responsibilities until it is signed and short of camping outside the registration office perpetually until he see’s his ex partner arrive to sign the paperwork, he will have no way of knowing when registration is taking place and will then fail to sign the one document that would grant him equality with the mother of his offspring.

Once a birth certificate is produced without a father’s signature, as far as the state is aware that child simply just does not have a father. The man in question here also has no legal responsibilities to the child and as such does not have to be involved in any decision making about the child’s name, medical treatment, education or anything else relevant in it’s life.

Currently within the UK there are 2 million “lone parent” families, with women making up 90% of those. These are children which don’t live with their fathers and whose mother is no longer in a relationship with him. It’s unknown how many of these fathers have contact with their children, but each one of these men have the potential of having their rights abused by this lopsided legislation. Custody battles and family courts are notoriously difficult to go through, especially for men, and not being recognized as your child’s responsible parent in the eyes of the state is certainly not helping an already difficult situation, severely disadvantaging all fathers from the beginning.

As with anything of this nature, the first step toward change is awareness. This is not the first time this issue has been highlighted, local governments and political factions have been contacted long before now about the glaring inequality legislation like this establishes, however it is now that a concentrated effort is being made to gain widespread exposure for this vile defamation of basic parental rights.

To help, we would like to ask all of you to assist in spreading awareness, and to start by adding your support here:

https://www.change.org/p/departmental-solicitors-office-grant-fathers-automatic-parental-responsibility-in-northern-ireland

Generally speaking an online petition is not the 'go to' method of achieving things via activism. However this petition provides grounds with which to further argue the case in ongoing discussions with local government and policy makers in all major political parties. To date we have official acknowledgements from most major political groups, as well as from the head office of the countries First Minister – Pending detailed, specific replies from all. A strong signature base for this petition would strengthen our position in all of these talks, and highlight this issue as something that a vast number of people really do care about.

While this petition is solely focused on legislation within Northern Ireland, it's worth noting that NI is part of the UK and is subject to their laws. Any change in legislation here would lend itself directly toward the same change in the UK and would strike a victory for fathers the world over, working as an example of what the reality should be in other countries.

Finally, every time a signature is added, the relevant government department responsible for changing this gets an email. If we can push the boundaries of this campaign and reach signature numbers in the thousands, that equates to thousands of individual emails sent directly to those in power and creates a vivid picture of support for fathers in the UK.

This campaign provides a real platform via which to enact change. And each one of you that reads this and lends their name to the signature base, allow us to take one step further and turns our ripples into waves that can no longer be ignored.

Sources:

UK .Gov website relating to Parental Responsibility (PR):

https://www.gov.uk/parental-rights-responsibilities/who-has-parental-responsibility

Costs of applying for PR:

https://www.gov.uk/parental-rights-responsibilities/apply-for-parental-responsibility

2 Million lone parents:

http://www.ons.gov.uk/ons/rel/family-demography/families-and-households/2014/families-and-households-in-the-uk–2014.html#tab-Lone-parents

Another day in the MadTV life of the MHRM

AVfM Video Source · 3 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Those of us who work for the men's human rights movement are used to the hysterical, contrived, over-the-top attacks on us from both feminist hacks in the mainstream media and feminist cowards in academia, like the UCLA law school.

It is not just us, of course: the feminist meltdown over Patricia Arquette's Oscar speech also comes to mind.

In the face of all this, how do we carry on with such aplomb?

First of all, we recognize that as a result of those hit pieces, curious people worthy of us will investigate our website and discover for themselves that we are evidence-based and our opponents are genuinely unhinged.

Second, we think the attacks on us are hilarious, in part because they expose our enemies for what they are.

The following video, taken from the old television show "MadTV", illustrates our perspective fairly well. This is what it is like to live in a feminist world where everything is "triggering".

Please enjoy. We did. – A.L.

Christina Hoff Sommers talk at UCLA to be boycotted

Paul Elam · 3 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Christina Hoff Sommers, author of "Who Stole Feminism?" and "The War Against Boys," is scheduled to speak tomorrow at UCLA. Campus feminists are organizing a boycott. The talk, hosted by the Federalist Society of UCLA Law, is entitled, "Freedom Feminism: The Best Way Forward in the Gender Wars." It has raised the ire of campus group, "Law Women of UCLA." (LWU)

They are couching their objections to Sommers and her speech from a bedrock of lies. I am going to take a moment to correct the misinformation and then move on to the larger lesson.

First, LWU claims, "In January, 2014, Dr. Sommers wrote an article for the men's rights activism (MRA) website, A Voice for Men,"

This is false. Dr. Sommers has never written anything for AVFM. She did agree to AVFM republishing one or two of her works which were already published by other entities. Much in the same way we have republished work from Dr. Murray Straus, Dr. Gerhardt Amendt and a host of other notable people. That does not constitute writing for AVFM, and I would wager that the author of the LWU piece is, or should have been aware of this.

The statement goes on to indirectly tie Dr. Sommers to WhiteRibbon.org, calling it a copycat site. Two lies for the price of one. Dr. Sommers has no relationship whatsoever to WhiteRibbon.org. Also, it is not a copycat site. WhiteRibbon.org is a website run by domestic violence pioneer Erin Pizzey. Pizzey is the woman who started the shelter movement for women in 1971.

Side note: Even during the course of writing this piece (and after Sommers tweeted the link), the letter from LWU was removed from the internet. But not before I saved it to pdf. Fed Soc Letter

Other organizations, like White Ribbon Australia, UK and Canada, are run by ideological profiteers, scamming the public for funding which they send directly to their own pockets. Pizzey's site is designed to call attention to that and to expose the industry of lies plaguing an issue that needs very real attention from people who actually want to do something about it.

I hope those in the UCLA area will attend Dr. Sommer's lecture and show support for her work, even as the attempts to besmirch her are underway.

This scenario speaks to another issue that I need to address independently from where I sit.

AVFM has become the catalyst from which the monster in the shadows has finally been forced to show its ugly face. The beast, which has largely operated behind closed doors in the past, now has no choice but to engage in daylight attacks. Their targets will be people like Sommers, Warren Farrell and others who did not rise to public attention out of the brawling free-for-all of internet based alternative media. As revolutionary as some of Sommer's ideas are, they are still tailored for mainstream sensibilities.

Naturally, feminists know this and want to force divisions, even where connections are not even present to begin with.

I think this is what we have seen with Cathy Young, a solid voice of reason in the gender discourse, but nonetheless quick to get on the anti-AVFM attack machine.

I can understand why. When your message generally provokes the kind of polite public dissent appropriate for the illusionary world of mainstream media, the idea of getting your hands dirty; the idea of all this suddenly becoming more real than a byline in a major publication, would be most tempting to avoid.

These people have my empathy, but not necessarily my sympathy. Given the choice, I would not spare them the discomfort of dealing directly with the bigots, liars and bullies we have been engaging for 6 years.

What they do with that is up to them, but I think my lack of concern is justified with a simple look past the myopic world of a faltering mainstream media apparatus. Those who dissent from mainstream feminism, as opposed to "Freedom Feminism," are more relevant now than ever because AVFM has taken on the gouging and kicking that other "proponents" have avoided with great aplomb.

Again, I truthfully deny that there is any formal association between CHS and AVFM, but I do so with the knowledge that such a public denial would not be necessary had we not succeeded in yanking the real problem out of the shadows and into the light.

More of this will come in the future. There have already been some murmurs out of the feminist camp that the lead up to the International Conference on Men's Issues 2015 in Houston (ICMI '15) will be plagued by multipronged media attacks on AVFM and anyone associated with us. It is the kind of thing that might bother those interested in mainstream sensibilities.

It is the kind of thing on which AVFM thrives.

I have a great deal of genuine respect for the likes of Sommers and Young. If I have any criticism at all, it is more speculative than justified. I do feel though, that there may be some insulated thinking in some circles out there that still entertains the idea that we can change the world without upsetting very powerful and sinister people. AVFM will not be a part of that kind of thinking, but we will not stand in the way of anyone so engaged unless they use us as a whipping post to maintain their good mainstream image.

I have never seen Sommers do anything like that, and don't expect I will.

This is a lesson for all of us, folks. It is a lesson for me, for Sommers and her compatriots. It is a lesson for you if you call yourself a Men's Human Rights Activist (MHRA). The fight is about to get real. Most of you who follow this site know that I have recently been vilified using potshots from an ex-wife and an estranged daughter. They dug over three decades into my past to gather what dirt they could, then twisted and spun it in an effort to discredit me.

If you think they are starting and stopping with me, you are in for a rude surprise. Most people associated with AVFM will currently be under investigation. You can expect exposés, attacks, yellow hit pieces and the like leading up to ICMI '15.

No one will be spared in feminist's desperate attempt to stem the momentum we are gaining. And the more momentum we gain, the more desperate and malicious they will become.

In the end, they will do with you what they have done with me, which is to say they will likely prove that you are human and flawed, and nothing else. They can spare me the delay. I already know Dr. Sommers is not perfect. I already know you are not perfect. I have known of my imperfections as long as I have had them.

This is how the mainstream media operates. They have a world full of imperfect people, some of whom are trying to do some very just and important work, and they spin the imperfections to a dumbed-down audience of mainstream media consumers anxious to take a look at someone else's flaws instead of their own.

And this is why I won't have any part of it.

I am appreciative to those who use the mainstream media to further the message, but I am not invested in keeping them lilywhite as the fur that needs to fly starts flying. This is what change looks like, bloodiness and all. Anyone who does not have it in them to endure that, this would be a good time to reconsider your involvement in challenging the modern zeitgeist. The war has started, and it is about to get ugly across the board.

Of course, most of us at AVFM never kidded ourselves about that to begin with, which is why we never made ourselves dependent on the approval of the uninformed or the dishonest.

The Myth of Female Frailty

Mark Dent · 3 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is also available in Spanish.

A few years ago I was listening to a late night radio program and the subject of male victims of domestic violence (DV) arose. The male host of this particular show encouraged men who had experienced violence at the hands of a woman to ring in and share their story.

Men did call. I was impressed by the fact that this bloke was swimming against the tide in allowing men a voice. My admiration and respect for this man was extinguished only minutes later. Our radio host was happy for men to share their stories as long as none of them made any reference to retaliation-even in self defence. One caller spoke of the night his angry girlfriend deliberately and literally jammed her stiletto heel through the top of his foot. The man said he pushed the woman over with force.

Whoa! Hold it right there! The host became very agitated and seemed to be overcome with anxiety as he berated this caller for laying a hand on a woman. He raised his voice to emphasise how strongly he condemned this caller for daring to push a woman. He said he wanted to make it crystal clear that under absolutely no circumstances could he ever condone a man pushing, hitting or physically harming a woman. The caller reminded him that he had had a stiletto rammed through his foot, but the host only repeated his mantra and pleaded with listeners to understand that he would not tolerate any more calls that involved the touching of a woman. His fear of being branded someone who condones or advocates violence against women(even in self defense) was palpable.

I lay in bed that night fantasizing about that radio host. I imagined this moron being assaulted by three drunk, aggressive and armed women as he made his way to the underground car park with security cameras capturing every second of his flailing fists and defensive headlocks. How sweetly I would remind him of his earlier lecture as he sat safe and secure in radio land, feeding his female audience the drivel they so love to hear from a man.

There is a chasm, a gulf of enormous proportions which separates the reality of what women are physically capable of doing and the idealized, mythical narrative we have been fed throughout our lives.
I raised this very point during one of my occasional Facebook debates with a family member. I suggested that women were capable of inflicting great harm on a man and that subduing an enraged woman is far more difficult than many men would chose to believe. My relative scoffed and said with the rarest of exceptions any man would be capable of subduing (without exerting undue or harmful force) any woman no matter how angry or aggressive she was.

You Tube can be a great ally at times like this. I immediately found a clip involving a burly police officer trying to cuff a woman who was resisting. He could not do it alone. He wrestled and grappled, he huffed and he puffed and it was only when another officer intervened that the woman was brought under control. I popped this onto his Facebook page and wondered if he would rethink his quaint notion that real men can handle any woman in a physical confrontation without having to harm them in any way. He never responded.

Another clip shows a woman attempting to cut a policeman's throat. He struggles to control her and has to rely on the help of another cop to eventually gain the upper hand. Neither of the women in these clips is powerfully built or above average size and weight. There are many far more physically imposing women than these two, yet the struggles of the police to overpower them is clear to see.
https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=YrRK1xI6eks

If police officers, armed and trained in martial arts have such difficulty subduing an aggressive woman how much more difficult is it for your average man in the street who has no training in any form of physical combat and is passive by nature to defend himself from physical abuse at the hands of an aggressive, abusive female partner?

More recently a knife wielding woman was shot dead in Sydney when she approached police officers in a threatening manner. I wanted to ask my relative how he felt about that. Here we have armed police officers believing that one woman with a knife posed a serious enough threat for them to feel it was necessary to shoot her rather than grapple and disarm her. I do not blame them for one moment.

Yet if these police officers had been called out to a home where a domestic violence incident had allegedly occurred and the male had explained that the female came at him with a knife, bottle, rolling pin….would they have suggested he should have been able to deal with it? The evidence tends to suggest that he would be cuffed and removed from the home. There are many stories being told by men who do call the police which indicate that the police have very little tolerance for men who claim to be abused or threatened by a woman. They often find the very notion amusing and rather pathetic. "Deal with it-you're a man!" seems to be the attitude.

Articles like this one by David Penberthy are typical of the sneering, arrogant attitude of so many of the men who ride aboard the feminist bandwagon.They ask: Are we seriously expected to believe there are men out there who live in fear of the missus?

They present the cartoon caricature of a twenty stone Neanderthal cowering at the feet of a tiny, petite brunette wielding nothing more than a "you go girl" attitude and a disgusted contemptuous sneer.
We witnessed this attitude at play in the recent episode of Q and A which supposedly tackled the issue of Family Violence. At the very end of the program a man dared to tell his story of physical and emotional abuse at the hands of his female partner. People who were in the audience say there was an audible muttering of outraged women calling this man a liar. The panel dismissed his plea to give help to male victims almost as quickly as the audience members. It was a sickening reminder of how deeply entrenched are our myths about females.

Women are not frail. Women are capable of inflicting the most horrendous physical damage on men, other women and children. Let's leave the reality of the emotional abuse some women inflict upon their families and partners and look at the more readily recognizable damage a woman can inflict. One doesn't have to work too hard to find almost unlimited examples of female brutality from the dusty annals of history to online reports and stories from this year.

An Australian woman, Katherine Knight, leaps to mind. I would love to have her meet with David Penberthy and explain to him how she dealt with men who annoyed or upset her. Katherine should surely sit at the top of the mountain of murderous monsters in our countries rich and colourful history of violent crime.. At the age of sixteen Katherine found her dream job, cutting up offal at the local abattoir. She was quickly promoted and given her own set of butcher knives, which she hung over her bed "so they would always be handy if I needed them" This was a habit she maintained wherever she lived. Knight met and married a fellow worker named David Kellett. His mother in law told gave him some kindly advice: 'You better watch this one or she'll fucking kill you. Stir her up the wrong way or do the wrong thing and you're fucked, don't ever think of playing up on her, she'll fuckin kill you! She's got a screw loose somewhere."

On their wedding night she tried to strangle him; Knight explained it was because he fell asleep after only having intercourse three times. During the next few months Knight fractured her husband's skull with a frying pan when he arrived home late from a darts competition. Knight talked David into dropping all charges which he duly did. Knight placed her two month old daughter on a railway track a short time before a train was due. An old local wandering past the track rescued the baby only minutes before the train arrived. Knight was arrested and again taken to St Elmo's Hospital, but, apparently recovered, signed herself out the following day.

Knight wreaked more violent havoc in the ensuing weeks on a number of people. Kellett subsequently left his abusive wife but she found new partners, including David Saunders-she cut the throat of his two month old puppy to show him what would happen if he was ever unfaithful. She knocked Saunders unconscious with an iron and stabbed him in the stomach with scissors. Saunders took long service leave and took off in fear for his life. When he returned several months later he discovered that his wife had issued an Apprehended Violence Order on him after telling police she was afraid of him.

Knight found yet another victim by the name of John Price.- a local miner. He suffered a number of vicious assaults, including a stabbing at the hands of his deranged girlfriend before he finally kicked her out of his house. On 29 February, he stopped at the Scone Magistrate's Court on his way to work and took out a restraining order to keep her away from both him and his children. That afternoon, Price told his co-workers that if he did not come to work the next day, it would be because Knight had killed him. They pleaded with him not to go home but he told them that he believed she would kill his children if he did not. A documentary with the full account of the horrendous murder of John Price can be viewed here. Suffice to say she would be a fine companion for Hannibal Lector. After stabbing Price 37 times Knight skinned him and hung the skin on a meathook upon the architrave of a door leading to the lounge room.

The men Katherine Knight brutalized were miners or abattoir workers-not, lacking in strength and vigor. How was it possible that a woman could inflict such horrific damage upon these hard men? It flies in the face of everything we hear and read about women.

How can any intelligent person suggest or believe that women with a propensity for violence are not capable of inflicting terrible damage upon males, particularly men and boys who have placid, easy going natures? How can those in the Family Violence industry deliberately ignore the fact that even the smallest women with evil intent can bring an iron crashing down upon an unsuspecting man's head or bury a kitchen knife deep in his unprotected back, or perhaps carry out the very popular penis lopping stunt whilst the male is asleep. These acts of violence are not some kind of unimaginable sick fantasy-they have been carried out around the world by women thousands of times.

Yet the myth persists.

More recently here in Australia, eight children were butchered by a woman-mother of seven of them and aunt to one. Eight children, systematically murdered with a knife. Some of these children were mature teenagers, all brutally killed by a woman.

This is the elephant in the room for feminists who never refer to the violence women perpetrate upon children. The endless use of the term "protecting women and children" by domestic violence workers, White Ribbon Ambassadors, Police Commissioners and politicians reinforces (very deliberately) the idea that all of the violence is coming from one group and all of the harm is experienced by "women and children." Perhaps if photos of the homicide scenes which confronted the police who worked on the Katherine Knight case or the more recent mass murder in Cairns were published it might shock people out of their quaint, complacent acceptance of the idea that women are simply not capable of committing such atrocities.

The gate

AVfM Video Source · 4 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Randomercam at his best. Subscribe.

12 ways to spot a female gynocentrist (other than the smell in the room)

Paul Elam · 4 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Janet Bloomfield, of evil JudgyBitch notoriety, just posted an article, "12 Ways to Spot a Feminist." It is a parody piece based on article from Psychology Today, "12 Ways to Spot a Misogynist." She takes the Psychology Today article and switches the term "feminist" for "misogynist" and switches the sexes. Recommending reading of both articles is indicated. They are both telling, and reading the first before the second makes Janet's all the more punchy.

But it did get me to thinking, which makes everyone around me nervous. Since JB's piece was a parody, we are still left without a definitive list of the 12 ways to spot a feminist that was written with that intent (even though her takedown of Psychology Today is convincing enough).

I wanted to end whatever confusion there may be about the subject and give you the definitive 12 ways to spot a feminist here, but even that is incomplete for the purposes of the MHRM. What we need here is 12 ways to spot a female gynocentrist, and that is what we shall have.

She insists on taking the softest, lowest paying job she can, uses that as the excuse for depending on men to finance her social life, and bitches endlessly that she is not being paid fairly.

She talks to you while wearing a blouse cut so low you can see her navel, then leans over directly in front of you to indignantly point out where her eyes are.

Her idea of how to protect women from sexual assault is to strip bare and use a marker to write "This is not an invitation to rape!" across her tits.

She tells you that she is oppressed, pausing to text Daddums that she needs another deposit before spring break.

She spends 45 minutes at dinner reminding you she does not need a man, then looks the other way when the check arrives.

She waxes endlessly about her empowerment and agency, then wilts like day old flowers when someone disagrees with her on Twitter.

She expects you to lavish her with wining, dining and expensive gifts, just to spend time with her, then looks you in the eye and denies she is a prostitute.

When you tell her no to something, the shock on her face triggers a Richter measurement and the expected shaking of the ground.

When someone infantilizes her, she does not put an end to it. Instead she sits there giggling and giddy, like a school girl who got away with something she wasn't supposed to.

When you put a stack of irrefutable evidence and logic in front her that everything forming her worldview is false, she falls silent, starts to tremble, then suddenly turns into Captain Queeg.

Her idea of open debate is brigading Twitter accounts she does not like and having them taken down.

She reads this article, then turns to you and says there are not really twelve items here because numbers are a patriarchal construct and not really real.

Now, we could do a list of the 12 ways to spot a male gynocentrist, but we really don't need to. Just take a look at the list above and spot the guys who are standing there with their thumbs up their butts, allowing it to happen.

Feminist memes reveal their hatred and bigotry

Andrew DiKaiomata · 4 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Feminist memes give us a real glimpse into the twisted logic and bigotry of feminism. Created by feminists, reblogged, re-tweeted, and shared by feminists in their online feminist communities. They often variously show an hysterical over-sensitivity to women, and a cold indifference or hatred against men. We're used to seeing the "Men are pigs! What do we do with pigs? WE CASTRATE THEM!" style memes. Or a meme explaining why we must unite to end fathers day, or why sexual torture and genital mutilation against men is hilarious feminist humor. Then there are the illogical and just plain silly feminist memes that hateful angry feminists just nod their heads at and click like on.

One such meme is this one:

Let's examine it. "Feminism has fought no wars. It has killed no opponents. It has set up no concentration camps, starved no enemies, practiced no cruelties." This is just plain wrong and a bit absurd, but let's take this at face value. Neither has Buddhism, or scientology, or supply side economics for that matter. Would it make sense to bully dissenters to these ideologies by screeching "Why, what's your problem?" What's more, neither has the Men's Rights Movement that feminist bigots so bitterly oppose.

No it hasn't fought literal wars – the war on masculinity and men, on gamers, on t-shirts, tampons, religion, and so on aren't literally wars. Though they have supported the male-only draft that forced millions of mens into being slaves of war and die torturous deaths. They were part of the system that forced men to die in war and then the feminists continue to blame them for being men forced into fighting wars. It's sickening.

Killed no opponents? Hateful feminist author and activist Margaret Jensvold shot and killed her son. A feminist recently aborted her baby simply for being male. Feminists likely would have killed Erin Pizzey. Prominent feminist Valerie Solanas attempted to kill Andy Warhol and a Swedish group based on her ideas creates videos glorifying killing men. So yeah, that claim is just objectively wrong.

No concentration camps? This is a mark of pride to feminists? They'll follow any movement as long as there are no concentration camps? I can just imagine the feminists reading this, the same ones that post their fantasies of genitally mutilating, castrating, murdering and sexually torturing men just reassuring themselves over the fact that they don't have concentration camps, so they must be good.

"It battles for education." Feminism battles _against_ male education. With their zero sum philosophy, a decline in education for boys means a win for girls. Feminism in education is failing our boys and feminists trot out fewer men in college as a success – fewer boys graduating high school is lauded as a victory. The research is exhaustive on this. Simply put, feminists hate boys in education.

"…for the vote." No feminist screed will be complete without this claim. It wasn't feminism that got women the vote but "old white men" (eeeew!) This feminist claim isn't complete without the mandatory age/race/gender shaming and vilifying men. When we examine this issue, we see that when most women favored the vote, within months, they had the vote. The understanding at the time was that eligibility to vote was eligibility for the draft, and women understandably didn't want to be included in the male-only genocide of war. Yet, we gave women what until then didn't exist; the right to vote. Before this, voting was a privilege contingent on the possibility of becoming a slave of war. Today, in many states, drivers licenses, voting, and across the nation, college loans are contingent upon registering for the draft. It is a crime in itself not to register for the selective service, but only for men. So women have the right to vote, men only have the privilege. Do feminists want to help men get the right to vote? Of course not!

This "…better working conditions" bit is laughable. Anyone who follows GirlWritesWhat will remember the hateful feminist bigots protesting the lack of male deaths in the workplace. In a year when male workplace deaths decreased and female deaths remained the same, feminists saw the male percentage drop and the female deaths as a percentage increase. This increased safety for men was misogyny writ large – they took to the streets and demanded more workplace deaths.

This meme reveals feminism to be man-hating and reveling in male death and suffering. "…rape crisis centers, women's refuges, reforms in the law." Rape crisis centers for women only, at the exclusion of men. Even though males are far and away more likely to be raped, feminist are universally blind to the suffering of male rape victims. From infant male sexual torture/genital mutilation, often to death, to prison rape, caregiver molestation, males make up the overwhelming majority of rape victims, and we see a universal opposition within feminism to the MRM's challenge to the feminist idea that males are always rapists, never rape victims that need help and protection.

So, when a feminist tries to gender shame me, telling me that "real men are feminists," I don't have a problem telling them, "I guess I'm not a real man, then." When a feminist tries to bully me, as this meme does with, "why, what's your problem?" my answer is that I'm not a hateful feminist bigot.

I acknowledge that men are human beings with rights, feeling and their own struggles, with issues that matter.

Tommy Sotomayor says No One Should Ever Be Arrested For Not Paying Child Support

AVfM Video Source · 5 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

How exactly are poor men supposed to come up with jobs that simultaneously allow them to live and pay child support and how does jailing these men help anything?

Subscribe to the excellent TJ Sotomayor here.

http://youtu.be/TwHeaTXMVGg

The rise and fall of the Ebony empire proves that the Negrosphere media is irrelevant

Mumia Ali · 5 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

> "When the people formerly known as the audience employ the press tools they have in their possession to inform one another, that's citizen journalism."
> -Jay Rosen
>
> "False media, we don't need it, do we?"
> -Public Enemy

The website Media Wire Daily recently reported on all that ails Black American media institution, the Johnson Publishing Company, home of Ebony, Jet and Fashion Fair:

> "Johnson Publishing Co, which publishes Ebony magazine, Ebony.com, Jet.com and operates the e-commerce site FashionFair.com has been struggling to keep its head above water for years now. A victim of the decline in newsstand and print ad sales coupled with its own lack of doing, the company has also been mismanaged and failed to make any major moves into digital under CEO Desiree Rogers. It has now burned through its second editor after less than a year on the job. Mitzi Miller who was promoted to Editor in Chief of the flagship Ebony magazine, last April replacing Amy DuBois Barnett, has stepped down and plans to shift her career over to TV. In a statement on her departure, Rogers even seems to take a parting shot at Miller…A company like Johnson should've looked to partner up with companies Like BET or TV One or Even OWN to bring some of the stories from its pages to television. But there is nothing. Its as if the company is being ran from another universe where the CEO isn't seeing whats happening in the industry. The company continues to see itself as simply a magazine publishing company and so, for years they've behaved as just that. While other publishers continue to transform themselves, Johnson Publishing is frozen in time."

While the Cathedral Media still reels from revelations that Nightly News anchor Brian Williams made up stories of combat during his time in Iraq and the pincers seem to be closing in on Fox's Bill O'Reilly, what seems to get left out of the mix is just how badly Black news media has fared over the past few decades. The vast majority of it could hardly be called "real" journalism – at best, they are advocacy pieces, centered around "uplift" themes that aim to show Black folk in its best light – at worst, the big names in the business – from OWN to BET to NewsOne and Essence, Ebony, MadameNoire and Clutch, peddle in celebrity gossip that isn't fit to line the proverbial dog kennel with.

Aside from the fact that the lady heads of the Johnson Publishing Co. have "leaned" it into the ground due largely to the kinds of incompetence that Black elite leadership is notorious for, and the general news media continues to devolve into irrelevance, a real burning question for guys like me have another to consider:

Who are telling the stories that matter in Black America? Is it the Negrosphere Media?

"Negrosphere" – that is my term for the aforementioned gaggle of "news" organizations of varying stripe, that in their own ways, purport to reflect the Black America that is today. Yet, one is hard pressed to think up any Black equivalents to Woodward and Bernstein, Mark Bowden or Steve Lopez, Ernie Pyle or David Simon, or George Anastasia. Sure, there are Black journos out there who are putting in standard AP copy on the regular, but what are they really saying? Are they really speaking truth to power? Or are they just getting along to go along?

Last summer, ESPN personality Stephen A. Smith came close to doing just that, when he gave his take on the-then raging controversy surrounding former Baltimore running back Ray Rice and his newlywed wife, Janay. Smith dared to suggest that it could be possible that women, in this case Black, could play a role in the violence that goes on in domestic situations between couples, something that is indeed well documented. For his daring to notice actual reality, he was quickly punished.

And he's not alone: last month, during a panel discussion on Black fatherhood, The Nightly Show host Larry Wilmore dared to raise the question as to whether one of the reasons why the Black marital rate was so low might have had to do with so many Black women being so "bossy" – he immediately apologized, did his mea culpas, and just recently, had on an all-Black woman panel to discuss how oh-so-hard they have it.

The message is clear: Black journos, especially if they happen to be male, simply are not to question out loud anything that might make Black folks, and especially Black women, look bad. This accounts for the utter lack of reporting about the rampant corruption, malfeasance, incompetence and in-your-face nepotism that is par for the course in any Black precinct you can think of in America. I mean, let's keep it brutally 100 – with all that goes on in Black America along these lines, not even including the daily bloodletting, one would think that there would be at least a few Black journos out there doing Pulitzer-level work, reporting on the reality that is urban America's gritty streets.

But: Nada!

If anything, those who are doing the hardest-hitting reportage in Black America along these lines, just happen to be White reporters themselves – the aforementioned Simon, Lopez, and Anastasia, are world renown for their intense focus and coverage of Black America's seedy criminal underground. It's hard to think up a Black equivalent.

Why?

Why is it that there are few to no Black journos out there, giving the straight dope on the gritty, often ugly reality that is Black America today? Who are out there in the Negrosphere Media, telling the stories that are actually relevant and that actually matter, to everyday Black folk – especially Black men? Why is that we have a dime a dozen "pop culture" "reporters" but NO you know, serious ones – who are doing serious stories?

You know, like the one I did on James Robertson – you remember him, the Brotha who had to walk nearly 50 miles to work roundtrip in one of the most dangerous and deadly cities on the planet? Sure, outlets like The Root and The Grio wrote about it – but they didn't say what I said about it, which was a coldeyed look at the forces that created the dire situation Robertson was in in the first place.

Why didn't they do that?

Or, how about my recent book review of Feminista Jones' "Push The Button" – there have been other reviews. But one gets the distinct impression that they were more in the realm of sycophancy and fawning adoration than, you know, actual literary criticism.

Why?

Or, what about my more recent column, where I directly responded to, and challenged, Rutgers prof. Brittney Cooper, on her arguments regarding how and why Black women were behind the eight ball in our time – why were there no such responses to be found, from within the Negrosphere itself?

Are we really to believe that they all are in lockstep agreement here, like a Black Borg Hivemind or something?

One of the reasons why I became utterly turned off from the Negrosphere Media was because of its irrelevance to my life and the lives I see being lived by ordinary, everyday Black folk. Because of the rigid adherence to ideological purity that doesn't allow for the questioning of anything outside of "the narrative." Because of the seeming fascination with what can only be referred to as Coonery, gossip and obsession with fame, celebrity and acting a fool. Simply put, I got sick and tired of being sick and tired of being Black and not being able to actually get serious journalism on matters that matter to me and mine from people who look like me.

So, I decided to do something about it – I became what some call a Citizen Journalist. I got myself a few laptops, a smartphone, learned about blogging and social media (after teaching myself to type and use the Internet), and got busy – first blogging, and then writing copy for outlets like The Spearhead and A Voice For Men. I cofounded a Men's Issues blog collective. I became a frequent commenter at some of the biggest websites of their kind around.

I got involved.

And, it has begun to payoff. Now when my column appears, it is not at all unusual for hundreds of people to share it on social media like Twitter and Facebook. My email inbox is full with tips and leads on stories the Negrosphere Media isn't interested – or maybe can't – cover. People who know me on the streets of Philly know they have an ear who'll listen, and who has a voice to make them heard. Both Black men and women alike, appreciate that I bring a truly alternative perspective on the issues of the day in Black American life, from a point of view that is never sought, to say nothing of featured, in the aforementioned Negrosphere Media.

And this is only the beginning.

I have been very fortunate to forge relationships with some of the up and comers of the New Media world – Mr. Paul Elam & Co. here at A Voice For Men, are among them. Thanks to them and others, I now have the full backing of the world's largest men's issues website and organization on the planet. A true media force to be reckoned with, that cannot be scared off or intimidated from chasing down news leads and following those stories no matter where it goes, and reporting on it.

Those who are my targets in my mission to tell the truth and shame the proverbial devil, are right to be afraid, for they know there is nothing they can do to me; I am not connected to their world, so to speak. And I can strike at any time.

So, as the media in general, and the Negrosphere end of it in particular, continues to take it hard on the chin, dropping to one knee on the way out to being flat on its back, the New Media – staffed by Citizen Journalists like yours truly – will rise. We are getting the facts and telling the stories that actually matter in our time.

After all, nature abhors a vacuum.

At present, I'm working on leads to stories that haven't gotten nearly the attention they deserve. In order to keep my mission going, I need all of you to keep me plugged in.

If you've got a lead to a story you think I might be interested in, by all means hit me up: m.ali@avoiceformen.com. Follow me on Twitter: @ObsidianFiles. And you can reach me on Facebook under Mumia Ali.

A Voice For Men is just that. Let's use it.

Library War: an anime review...

Clint Carpentier · 6 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

So I was bored as hell, and figured that I must be criminally behind in my anime consumption. Well off to anime freak I go, a few clicks, some ambush ad pop-ups I had to fight through, and some multiple choice genre search… military. Quickly reminded why I don't often search military, most anime military are heavily mechanized (bi-pedals are inherently unstable, I can't see any sane financier budgeting billions on giant military mechs), overly romantic, or magical; I just want plain ol' fashion blood guts and gore, is that too much to ask? Le dramatic sigh, Kantai Collection is a fun watch, but that pantime Strike Witches was such a let down… scroll scroll scroll…

Library War… hunnnnn… google… wiki…

The concept is nearly ten years old (how the eber liben hell'd I miss this???), starting out as light novels. Quickly got turned into a manga, followed by a twelve episode season anime. A few years ago, it got turned into a movie, shortly followed up by a live action movie.

Ok…

It's set in the "near" future, the Japanese government passed a bill called the "Media Betterment Act". The act itself began as a method to censor what gets published, but the publishers being the cagey bastards that they are, used the ambiguity of the act to sneak around it. So the "Media Betterment Committee" (MBC) was created in order to confiscate books considered a "bad influence", and they proceeded to begin a book burning campaign. Many members of the MBC were shoehorned into service by honor of family; some truly believe the brass do know whats best for the public.

Once books started burning, the librarians who held "freedom of expression" (still part of the constitution) dear to their hearts, got bent out of shape of the wholesale sacrilege. Libraries became battlegrounds as librarians took up arms against the MBC to protect the books under their care. This culminated into what is referred to as "The Nightmare of Hino." The library was burned to the ground, and several people died, many innocents.

As a result, a wounded man who lost his wife to the battle got a counter-act passed and established the "Library Defense Force." It was now an official war, with strict rules of engagement. Libraries and museums are official battlegrounds. Bookstore engagements are often settled by highest rank, as civilian locations are no-fire zones, and harmed bystanders are cause for mountains of paperwork and public apologies. LDF's have the power buy questionable books, right out of the hands of MBC's if they so choose, but they still have to get those books to the library for full protection, so unless the book in question is rare, new, or the library in question doesn't yet have copies already, the LDF often let confiscated books go in the name of public peace.

Enter one high school girl, tall and awkward, who just got her hands on the final chapter of her favorite fairy tale. At that moment the MBC arrive on a routine inspection, and books start hitting the crate, her treasured book is among those destined for the incinerator. With all the will of a high school girl against supreme authority, she stubbornly refuses to let the book go, risking harm and jail (for "theft"). Then a member of the LDF encounters the debacle, and with a confident flip of his ID, he settles the matter, and the MBC leave, for now. The scene is imprinted on the girl's memory, and her hero is henceforth referred to as, "My Prince Charming."

Cut a few years into the future, and Iku Kasahara has entered Kanto's LDF training program, determined to become the first woman in the "Library Task Force", an elite troop charged with carrying out dangerous missions regarding acquisitions. Her large stature gives her a much needed edge, allowing her to keep up with the men in her training group. The other women who enter the LDF often take a different track, favoring information and public affairs. Kasahara is emotional, but dedicated, thrilling at adventure, aggressive in nature, and… somewhat obtuse. Her physique and dedication manage to keep her in the program, but she struggles to achieve the minimum requirements for the rest.

Despite the allusion of rank, and career path, ALL LDF's are librarians. "Librarian" is no longer simply a person who cares for books in some quiet building; military training aside, they have become a skilled career to rival any known trade. These "indoor duties" are the bane of Kasahara, and her instructor appears to use her physical training as a means of punishment, as according to her roommate he has high hopes for her. Her biggest hurdle though, is not any of the choices she's made, but rather, the conservative and overprotective parents she was born to, or more to the point, her manipulatively crying mother.

Asako Shibasaki – the aforementioned roommate – excels at intelligence and presentation, and does what she can to help with Kasahara's shortcomings. As any good intelligence agent, she quickly builds herself a group of invisible contacts, and becomes crucial to Kasahara's (and the library in general) longevity.

Along the way, during a mission gone array, Kasahara is hiding with good natured but wounded senior officer, Mikihisa Komaki. The mission was simple enough, acquire a book, and get it back to base. However, the book in question is colloquially known as "The Book of Prophecy", written some sixty years previous, much like Orwell's "1984", the book is about an information war, and the protagonist is a member of something similar to the MBC. Komaki makes a statement to Kasahara, "If we were observed by people whose world has no Media Enhancement Act, or library Freedom Act, we would've looked absolutely ridiculous."

Enter one suave well to do politician, and older brother of a new LDF recruit. There had been a family fall out, and he is now something of a pariah. He disdains the LDF's method, but regardless, he is most assuredly anti-censorship, and has started a group of his own, with the express purpose of bringing down the Media Enhancement Act by peaceable means.

Five hours plus a movie later, I was tearfully saddened that it was over, but fret not, it wasn't left hanging; there was closure. Sigh… a gritty realistic civil war story always makes me cry.

Hey… young punks, over here, shh, listen… this could be the basis for a good independent flick huh huh, shhhh.

Marissa Mayer – this is what a feminist should look like

Ciprian Azoiței · 6 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Marissa Mayer, president and CEO of Yahoo! and former collaborator of Google, is one of the most prestigious women working in the field of IT. In her youth, Mayer took piano and ballet lessons, she was on her highschool's curling team and precision dance team and she excelled in chemistry, calculus, biology and physics. She studied symbolic systems at Stanford University, where she engaged in multiple philanthropic activities. She got her bachelor's and her master's degrees in artificial intelligence. After graduating, she was hired by Google, becoming their first female engineer. Her career skyrocketed from that point and now she is CEO at Yahoo!, having acquired Tumblr and making Yahoo!'s stock price double just 14 months after her appointment.

By all measures, Mayer is what feminists call a successful and independent businesswoman, right? Well, wrong! In the eyes of feminists, Mayer and other women like her are their own version of heretics. Or infidels. Why? Let's find out!

As you might have noticed in the articles linked above, if you are a successful woman, feminists claim that you have to unquestionably give praise to feminism for allowing you to live in a society where you can obtain such prestige. Who you are or what you've accomplished in your life is irrelevant. You do not have the right to take pride with your own work. You are not really free. You are just free to obey your feminist masters. And everybody knows that the first virtue of a slave is to give grace to his master for everything that he possesses, because he would be nothing and have nothing without his master's benevolence. Basically, these feminist writers claimed proprietary ownership of Mayer and her work.

And here is another pearl that you will find on the first Google search page for Mayer: "Marissa Mayer not feminist". At the end of the article, Mandi Woodruff mentioned the myth of the wage gap. The wage gap has been repeatedly debunked in various studies and by people who refuse to swallow feminist propaganda. Yet, third wave feminists still insist that women need to get under the banner of the fisted vagina and fight along with their sisters in the righteous crusade to repel the vile MEN from dominating the workforce.

After all, these "successful" feminists have to somehow justify all the privileges they receive from society. All the government handouts, funding and support. All the taxpayer monies stolen from the pockets of proper, law-abiding citizens to fund a feminist dystopia. The biggest enemies of feminism are these "heretics" that want to be free from feminism and have their own conversation about gender equality. Only feminists have the right to do so!

What feminists up to date fail to understand is that only petty people concern themselves with the beliefs or background of a hard-working, successful person. Normal people only care if you are a doer or a don'ter, a go getter or a stand receiver, a diligent person or a slothful one. Ambitious people who make things happen will always be admired and respected, while people receiving unjustified handouts will always be looked down upon by their fellow man.

Of course the feminist overlord will hate seeing her would-be slaves able to stand on their own two feet. Feminists would degrade us and drag us all into the dirt, where they feel comfortable. I believe it to be high past time humanity evolved beyond the phase it was in during the Trial of Rouen. Let's make it so!

[Author bio translation: Ciprian Azoiței is a law student in Bucharest, an amateur philosopher and writer and a staunch anti-communist. He loves progress, despises stupidity and takes a dim view of the people practicing it. That's where he got his contempt for communism.]

Newlywed young mother confined to wheelchair comes out as MRA

AVfM Video Source · 7 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Tell us more about how women like this are just doing it to be popular.

You may want to subscribe to Liberal Lunacy.

Feature image by Dideo

It's Over – Hunger strike for men's rights in Bangalore

Rohit Girdhar · 7 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

AVfM's Janet Bloomfield will be liveblogging the hunger strike for men's rights in Bangalore, India as it unfolds over the next 48 hrs.

Update 5

Video footage will be available soon.

After more than 30 hours without food or water, the hunger strikers are looking weary and tired.

The local Bangalore press has provided decent coverage of the event, most in local language. We hope to have translations soon.

A crowd of over 1000 women have gathered across the park, and we will have video footage of them responding to the hunger strikers up shortly.

The strike has now come to an end and strikers are refueling with juice and fruit.

The fight for men's rights in India continues. Supporters dismantle the tents and prepare for the next battle. One thing is certain: they will never give up until men are equal, under the law.

Update 4

Hunger strikers are trying to catch some shut-eye before the morning. 5000 women are expected to be in the park for Women's Day. Strikers are not sure how they will be greeted.

Update 3

More than 150 fathers and their supporters are now participating in the hunger strike, with more expected to arrive as the day unfolds.

Update 2

There are now over 100 people gathered in Freedom Park and organizers are expecting more.

These men will be hunger striking for two days to protest the fact that they cannot access their children.

They are sharing their stories with one another and the observers, many of whom are grandparents.

Update 1

Men from Mumbai, Delhi, Hyderabad and other cities expected to participate. Many will be joined by their parents. The set-up crew is still working at 1130PM.

Freedom Park in Bangalore, the number one location for political protests in the city.

Virag Dhulia, Sujit Deshpande and Anil Kumar helping with the set-up.

Activists are currently on site and setting up tents and facilities. The Times of India provides fair coverage of the issues in advance of the strike start.

What an unfortunate situation for the world's biggest democratic country, India. It is a country which deprives men of their basic human rights! Owing to such arrangements against men, fathers who are being alienated from their kids have declared they will go on a hunger strike on March 7th and 8th 2015 in Freedom park Bangalore!

Let me reiterate the reasons why men have decided of such a step:

Fathers, the silent victims and sufferers of gender bias in the family court system and society, are now voicing their concerns.

1. Tired of being treated as FREE AUTOMATIC TELLER MACHINES and SPERM DONORS, they speak up.
2. Tired of being treated as a visitor in their own child's life, they come forward.
3. Exasperated with the high-handedness of a gynocentric family court system, fathers in Bangalore now say, "Enough is Enough."
4. Having knocked many doors and having approached the temple of justice and returning high and dry, now victimized and distressed fathers come down to the streets.
5. With no one listening to the woes and plight of these grieving fathers and supported by the Father's Rights Wing of Save Indian Family Foundation, these fathers have decided to sit on a hunger strike in Bangalore in order to take their voices forward.

Apart from the above stated reasons, the Men's Rights Movement has been witnessing lots of injustice happening to men for a long time now. Viz, 498a (Anti Dowry Law), DV (Domestic Violence) and CRPC 125 (Maintenance). Also, kids are being alienated from their biological fathers and are being used as extortion tools if the father wants to see his kids. The MRM has witnessed millions of innocent men and their families being sent to jail on mere accusations (obviously false) from their disgruntled wives. They spend nights in jail which haunt them for the rest of their lives.

Apart from being sent to jail men are harassed in CAW (crimes against women) cells, which are meant for young married women only. Why I say so is evident from an RTI reply from west Bengal women's commission and CAW headquarters in Delhi, which clearly states that helping elderly women and registering their cases is not on their agenda. I fail to understand the so-called "Agenda" behind the fact that CAW cells and the women's commission are unable to even file a complaint from elderly women from accused families. From CAW cells to mediation centres and then the bail process, men are bound to shell out huge sums of money on pretext of getting bail; which again is their basic human right.

The Judiciary and police department are actively involved in this extortion business in the name of "bail." After shelling out huge sums of money in the name of bail starts the never-ending process of trial and finally after some 5 to 15 years of rigorous fighting the person is acquitted of all charges. The acquitted is lucky enough to see the day, because thousands of men are unable to handle the undue pressure from every corner and they give up by ending their lives. This fact is evident from the data collected from the National Crime Records Bureau (NCRB). Data clearly states that the number of married men who commit suicide has always been higher than women. 63K+ married men unfortunately ended their lives alone in 2012 owing to this undue pressure.

Data Source: NCRB

Interestingly, family problems are highest across all heads due to which men commit suicide. The percentage is 25.6%.

Data Source: NCRB

Owing to all the above stated reasons and all the injustices happening to men, SIFF-FRW goes on a hunger strike. Anyone and everyone who wish to be a part of the hunger strike can join SIFF.

Feature image from Surian Soosay.

NOW panics and dumps articles after AVFM exposes hypocrisy

Paul Elam · 8 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

We saw it recently with the planned boycott of Christina Hoff Sommers at her recent speech at UCLA. A women's campus law group thought she was going to tell some icky truths, so they launched a thoughtless campaign to libel Sommers and perhaps pressure her out of speaking.

When Sommers tweeted the totally fabricated claims they posted online, they quickly took them off the internet. It is as though they did not get the memo that this was easier said than done. And so now the Law Women of UCLA, the group that attacked Sommers with wild and unsubstantiated claims, has egg on their faces for trying to hide that which cannot be hidden. All for the purpose of attempting to erase their mistakes from the public record.

It looks bad enough on a bunch of entitled little college girls, but how about the National Organization for Women (NOW)? NOW is the certainly one of the oldest, most influential and prestigious feminist organizations in the United States. They are, in the absence of any real competition, the gold standard of women's rights in the western world. They simply have no peers.

NOW has relied on many double standards and hypocrisies in its illustrious history in order to a) make sure they collect money in the name of promoting equality between the sexes and b) make sure their supporters knew they were not really all that serious about equality.

Case in point, NOW has long been on the frontlines of chastising society because men were not expected to take on their fair share of childcare in families. They have argued that gender roles place women at an unfair disadvantage because those roles assume that women are default babysitters. NOW's core values demand that this change and that men be available to take on half of that responsibility so that women will be free to pursue professional opportunities with which pesky and inconvenient children tend to interfere.

At the same time, however, NOW has fought tooth and nail against shared parenting initiatives that would provide a path to accomplishing the very gender neutral goal they claim to pursue.

It's easy to understand the angle here. NOW leadership understands that the only banner they can fly is the alleged pursuit of equality. At the same time, getting that equality in a family court is not something most of their base wants anything to do with. Shared parenting arguably implies less control and less cash for those who are used to calling the shots.

What NOW did was to parrot rhetoric about equality even as they lobbied with no insignificant amount of muscle to make sure that equality never happened in a family court. I won't say I feel sympathy for them, but I do understand what got them between a rock and a hard place. The fact is that NOW's supporters pay them to be hypocrites, and they won't pay for anything else. NOW leadership is acutely aware of this.

Damned if you do…..

Whatever hope of anything redeemable in the NOW leadership was laid to rest late last week when AVFM contributor Prentice Reid wrote an article documenting NOW's decades long jihad against the idea of shared parenting.

NOW responded by losing it and removing ALL of Reid's sources from their website, and removed all other material from their website that opposes shared parenting.

You heard that right. The National Organization for Women are so panicked over an article at AVFM that they have attempted to erase the public record of actions by the organization going back decades. They have literally jumped the shark in the worst possible way, providing the world with proof positive that the entire organization is not only hypocritical, but also devoid completely of any kind of moral compass. They also proved they don't really know jack about the internet.

Quelle surprise.

The temptation here from a personal standpoint is to gloat a little. And I am. It is with no small amount of awe that I consider the fact that a single article on AVFM caused the most widely recognized “women’s organization” in the United States to self-inflict the most ginormous Streisand Effect since the original in 2003. They went full McIntosh on it, conducting a search and destroy mission on the record of their own work within 24 hours of the Reid piece running.

I will put a lid on the unavoidable smugness that comes with making big dogs act like scared puppies. However, I won’t ignore the myriad of implications that this rather enjoyable moment implies.

Most readers here will be aware that just during the short month of February, the mainstream media launched four consecutive, malicious hit pieces on AVfM and the greater Men’s Human Rights Movement (MHRM). Between vox.com, Mother Jones, GQ and Buzzfeed, the attacks were as vicious as they were yellow and misleading.

We have heard from a lot of people who think we are reaping the rewards of what we have sown. They feel that our harsh rhetoric and gloves-off style has come back to haunt us; that more progress would be made with a softer touch and more conciliatory action.

Wrong.

What I ask you to consider is that the proof of what really lies behind all the attacks is now fully exposed to those looking for it. What lies behind all the attacks is a boatload of raw fear. NOW knows they have abandoned whatever their movement ever stood for in favor of collecting bucks from a bunch of entitlement whores who want to have their cake and eat it too. They know the irrefutable proof of it was all over their pages waiting to be pointed out. And when it was they clamored like desperate rats to get rid of all of it.

Too bad the internet is forever, and we have copies of everything they removed available for viewing in Reid’s article. What started as an embarrassing set of double standards has now become the final nail in NOW’s credibility coffin.

In fact, it is advisable that the organization consider a more appropriate acronym for what they actually do. I am thinking “They Hide Everything Notable” (THEN). And how much more appropriate for NOW to become THEN considering they have already accomplished that in spades. What was once arguably a women’s rights organization has now become little more than a latter day SPLC, dreaming up boogiemen and removing the evidence of their own malfeasance whenever circumstances dictate.

Sounds pretty THEN to me.

The larger lesson for the people who really matter is what is important here, then. The fear is the tell. The fear is the revelation that despite the money and the social blindness and the political clout, we are essentially up against a paper tiger. They fold like cheap suits at the first hint of pressure. And they do so because they know what cockroaches they really are.

In what is already a banner year for the MHRM, things just got a whole lot better. Anti-feminism is rising. More and more people, especially women, have started to publicly reject organizations like NOW because they understand those organizations have completely betrayed the pursuit of equality in favor of raising funds driven by fears, hatred and hypocrisy they encourage in their supporters. Pay close attention, because if you are watching you can see the end of gender feminism as we know it.

This is all courtesy of A Voice for Men — and the society we are informing about the toxic cesspool that modern feminism has become.

These folks are getting scared. That is good, but I personally want them past scared and into the realm of terrified. I want them to panic and scramble into even more monumental screw-ups. I want them to feel it as their moral and financial support erodes, and as the society around them stands up and calls them out on their lies and their corruption. And I am going to predict right now that I am going to get what I want. I want feminism dead, and I want AVfM to play the lead role in killing it.

I hate to go all Tony Robbins on you folks, but the fact is that the time for NOW to be THEN is at hand. There is plenty of fighting ahead, but the writing is on the wall. The only thing left is to have more people stand up and challenge these ideological hucksters to a public showdown.

And the sad truth of it for them is that at this point if AVFM were to pull the plug tomorrow, the death of feminism as anything but a banner of hate would still take place. It is too late for any other outcome.

You can see this in play all over the media, as the misandric and discriminatory tone of mainstream writing now consistently draws fire from readers who are tired of the victim narrative and tired of the lies. You can see it as critiques of feminism and feminist ideas find their way into the mainstream. And you can find it as AVfM pushes forward with a shaker of salt, poised to dispense it into whatever deep cuts we can inflict on their actions.

In a few short years we went from a one-man blog to a social force that has organizations like NOW hiding their own articles like they were part of a pornography collection.

This is what men's rights looks like.

In just a few weeks we will announce that tickets are on sale for the International Conference on Men's Issues in Houston this October. When we do, please buy your tickets and plan to attend. The theme of this conference is going to be tagged as "Building Bridges" (between men and women). The locus of this conference is the idea that the social contract between men and women needs to be rebuilt (at least for the percentage of men and women with the integrity and vision to do it). And the assertion will be that the way to get there is with equality as the guideline. Not just the equality that equates to the most choice selections on the sexual politics buffet, but the equality that includes responsibilities with rights; the equality that in many ways is a step down for women and a step up for men.

That wave is coming whether NOW likes it or not. And if they seriously don't want to invest in rebranding themselves as THEN, they should think about that good and hard and start acting with intellectual and moral consistency. It is hard to imagine that, though, from an organization which just humiliated itself in front of the entire world because it was scared of the truth seeing a single strand of sunlight.

Take heart folks. I know the ride is bumpy, but the fact remains undeniable that their ideas are getting less popular, and our ideas are capturing the imagination of more and more people all the time. If we continue to grow, and continue to convince more people to grow a spine and stare these bastards down in the public arena, the day will come when these ideologues have nowhere left to go but down.

And make no mistake about it, this is all happening because we refused to take the advice of weak, ineffectual people and go back to what never worked to begin with; because we refused to play nice or care about the sensibilities of a bunch of ideological thugs. All this is happening because we understand that the only way to kill feminism is to bash it in the head over and over again with bricks of logic until it finally quits breathing.

Every single person reading this has the opportunity to join that noble pursuit. Every single person reading this has the opportunity to add themselves the dogpile on feminism till it is crushed beneath the weight of everyone who will ante up and go after it.

You can witness the collapse of feminism in your own lifetime. And after that collapse you can join us in taking on misandry and gynocentrism in all the other forms they take. Feminists are cheerleaders for female entitlement, male disposability and lying to achieve ends; like, for instance, plundering through their own website to remove any indication that the charges against them are true.

The time to kick them is now, folks, while so many of them are down.

[Ed. Note: The House of Leaves – Burning by LearningLark is licensed under CC BY 2.0 via Wikimedia Commons.]

My return to the feminist cave

Andrew DiKaiomata · 8 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Before The Matrix, there was Plato's Allegory of the Cave.

Plato asks us to imagine there are people in a dark cave, chained their whole lives and unable to turn around. They know nothing else. The only world they know is living in a dark cave. Behind them are puppeteers who pass objects in front of a fire, projecting shadow figures on to the cave walls. These shadow figures are taken as reality to the prisoners. We are then asked to imagine that a prisoner breaks free and sees reality for what it is, sees what's actually being done and then walks out and sees the world for what it really is.

The freed prisoner sees grass, sees real animals, the sun and it's light for the first time. Soon he understands. He would return to the cave to try to free the other prisoners, but not having any frame of reference they may think he's simply mad, and with his eyes having adjusted to the light, he would be blind in the dark and so the prisoners would think his eyes have been damaged by the outside. They would attack him rather than allow themselves to be freed.

This is strikingly similar to the red pill experience. The addition is the return trip. When people wake up to the frothing anti-male bigotry within feminism, the factual inaccuracies and logical fallacies, they often try to go back to that cave to rescue other prisoners. Though, the freed prisoner is soon surprised to find himself attacked.

While you understand the perspective of feminism, they have no reciprocal frame of reference for explanations of social ills and phenomena outside the feminist paradigm. To ask them to consider something outside that feminist paradigm, they mentally snap shut. "No! Feminism is equality! You must be against equality and hate women!" They are absolutely determined not to leave that cave, not even for a moment to see what is outside.

When I woke up, I expected that all I needed to do was point out a few facts that made feminism crumble. I figured I was just needed to explain how, if you take a broad view of things, it was actually men who tended to have it worse. It's just a misunderstanding, men's issues matter, that shouldn't be controversial.

The response was surreal. Anger, accusations of hating women, of supporting rape and the inevitable and puzzling insistence that my questioning of feminism was because of being angry at having a small penis. In one wild example, I was accused of raping my children. I don't even have children.

After escaping the feminist cave, it seems we invariably go back to try to free the others. We try to tell them what we learned, share facts with them that don't support the feminist paradigm. We make the mistake of thinking that male-bashing feminists care about facts, that just as we care about the truth, so do they.

That's not how it is. If you argue with an angry feminist, you'll notice as I did, that they always argue how men are bad, how they deserve bad things, bad things against men are good. If you say that men are good, the feminist prisoner can only hear that as "bad is good." As much as they deny it, they see it as women vs. men, a zero sum game in which women must win. We see this is countless bigoted feminist examples downplaying the death and suffering of men and playing up the suffering of women. Simply put, you may think that feminists care about facts, they don't. The just hate men and don't give a rip about them.

When feminists become MRAs it's without exception a one way trip. Feminists become MRAs, MRAs never become feminists. We never see MRAs take up residence in the cave again.

The Factual Feminist takes on Anita Sarkeesian

AVfM Video Source · 9 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Christina Hoff Sommers takes on #GamerGate and a new educational curriculum attacking gamers that was created by the infamous Anita Sarkeesian.

You can subscribe to The Factual Feminist here.

Let's bring this billboard to cities across Canada

Dan Perrins · 9 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Originally found at CAFE – Dan

"HALF of domestic violence victims are men, but NO domestic violence shelters are dedicated to us."

That's where you come in. Here's what you can do:

Donate so we can extend this ad beyond 1 month or get these billboard ads up across Canadian cities. Currently we are committed to a single billboard for a 1 month period. Donate through the link top right, then email us if you wish to direct your donation to a particular city.

Participate in our forum

Tweet or join the conversation on social media using #LetsTalkMen @EqualityCanada

Download our briefing document and share with your friends and colleagues. If you're a student, do a class presentation on violence against men. CAFE spokespeople are available to assist.

Why are we hosting this campaign?

CAFE is dedicated to advancing evidence-based public policies and bringing services to all those who need support. Policies and services should be built on facts and not beholden to ideologies. Our billboard advertising campaign will highlight a variety of areas where our gender dialogue needs to evolve. When we are concerned with the health and welfare of both men and women, our families are stronger and our communities healthier.

Terms used in this brief:

Domestic Violence (DV),
Family Violence (FV),
Intimate Partner Violence (IPV)

Link directly to a topic:

Facts and Figures on Domestic Violence

How Does Canadian Data Compare to Global Findings?

What about Emotional Abuse and Control?

How come so many people think the vast majority of domestic violence victims are women?

What are the resources available to men who are abused by their partners?

Myths and Facts

Myth: Men are far less likely to be victims of female-perpetrated violence than the reverse

Myth: Violence is overwhelmingly uni-directional, that is a stronger partner commits violence against a weaker partner.

Myth: Men and women abuse their partners for different reasons

Myth: When women do commit violence against men it is always in self-defense

Myth: Violence against men is less severe than violence against women?

Myth: We don't need to take male victimization seriously because men are stronger and can just leave their female partners

Myth: The high gender asymmetry in the rates of police-reported or hospital-reported domestic abuse implies that male victimization is a marginal issue

Myth: Since all public awareness campaigns tell me that all violence is perpetrated by men against women, this campaign exaggerates male victimization.

Myth: I read somewhere that few if any victims of domestic violence are men so male victimization can be safely dismissed.

Myth: Violence against men is less of a problem than violence against women because it isn't part of a patriarchal effort to hold women down

Facts and Figures on Domestic Violence

The Basic Facts on Gender and Violence in Canada

- Of the nearly 19 million Canadians who had a current or former spouse in 2009, 6.2% or 1.2 million reported they had been victimized physically or sexually by their partner or spouse during the previous 5 years.
- A similar proportion of men and women reported experiencing spousal violence during the five years prior to the survey. Among men, 6.0% or about 585,000, encountered spousal violence during this period, compared with 6.4% or 601,000 women.
- The latest numbers have changed slightly since the previous General Social Survey with a decrease in the number of women reporting spousal violence and an increase in the number of men reporting spousal violence.
- In Canada more women than men report being pushed, shoved or slapped while more men than women report being kicked, bit, or hit with something.

Excellent sources for basic stats in support of the above:
Statistics about Spousal Violence from Statistics Canada
StatsCan 2005 Family Violence Highlighted

Juristat 2013 Financial impact Highlighted Emergency room male victims survey Highlighted
Martin Fiebert 2014 Domestic Violence study abstracts

How Does Canadian Data Compare to Global Findings?

- Lifetime rates somewhat higher among women than men. High school student victimization rates somewhat higher for males than females
- The rates of spousal abuse in Canada are consistent with global rates.
- Past year rates somewhat higher among men.
- Higher rates of intimate partner violence (IPV) among younger, dating populations.

Source: The Partner Abuse State of Knowledge Project (PASK), the world's largest domestic violence research database, which summarizes 1,700 peer-reviewed studies.

What about Emotional Abuse and Control?

- 80% of individuals have perpetrated emotional abuse.
- Emotional abuse categorized as either expressive (in response to a provocation) or coercive (intended to monitor, control and/or threaten).
- Across studies, 40% of women and 32% of men reported expressive abuse; 41% of women and 43% of men reported coercive abuse.
- Within studies of stalking and obsessive behaviours, gender differences are much less when all types of obsessive pursuit behaviours are considered, but more skewed toward female victims when the focus is on physical stalking.

How come so many people think the vast majority of domestic violence victims are women?

There are many reasons for the misconceptions surrounding domestic violence against men. These reasons include the increased media attention that is given to cases of male on female domestic violence, stereotypical ideas about gender that view men as strong and women as weak, and the views of some gender advocates that see the genders as in conflict with women being in the oppressed position.

Source: Current Controversies and Prevalence Concerning Female Offenders of Intimate Partner Violence: Why the Overwhelming Evidence on Partner Physical Violence by Women Has Not Been Perceived and Is Often Denied

What are the resources available to men who are abused by their partners?

Not much. After extensive research we found not a single agency in Toronto dedicated to male victims of domestic violence. Across Canada we found exactly one agency – the Men's Resource Centre in Winnipeg – which offers four beds for battered men. When it comes to men attempting to escape domestic abuse situations along with their children, we found zero facilities dedicated to these families in trouble.

The most comprehensive study of domestic abuse shelters in Canada was conducted by the Government of Canada's Canadian Centre for Justice Statistics, which concluded in 2006 that as to "Facilities that exclusively serve male victims of spousal violence… only one such facility was known to be in operation." We attempted to determine the identify of this agency and whether it was still in operation, but the author of this report was unable to provide this information. The Canadian Centre for Abuse Awareness, an established authority on the subject, indicated to our researchers that they were aware of zero domestic abuse shelters dedicated to men in the GTA, while acknowledging that this was a serious gap.

While there are shelters for homeless men, these are not equipped with the broad range of social support that women's domestic abuse shelters often provide.

A small percentage (6-8%) of abuse shelters dedicated to women do accept a small number of male victims. This both proves that such male victims do in fact exist while highlighting the serious gap in services dedicated to men.

The Canadian Centre for Justice Statistics had this to say:

> The THS asks shelters to indicate whether or not they permit adult males to be admitted to their facility. About 9 out of 10 shelters prohibit the admission of men, while approximately 8% have policies that permit men to be admitted.

However, even within this small number, the majority of these shelters were classified as emergency shelters, which tend not to provide the counselling and psychological services domestic victims require.

Many domestic abuse shelters are publicly funded. Public funds should be assigned based on need and not on gender.

Source:
Statistics Canada – Catalogue no. 85-002-XIE, Vol. 27, no. 4 Canada's shelters for abused women, 2005/2006 by Andrea Taylor-Butts

Transition Home Survey

Shelters for abused women in Canada, 2012

Myths and Facts

Myth: Men are far less likely to be victims of female-perpetrated violence than the reverse

Fact: Men are as likely to have been hit by their female partners as women are to have been hit by their male partners.

Source: Sex differences in aggression between heterosexual partners: A meta-analytic review.

Myth: Violence is overwhelmingly uni-directional, that is a stronger partner commits violence against a weaker partner.

Fact: Among large population samples, 57.9% of IPV reported was bi-directional, that is committed mutually by both partners, whereas only 42% was unidirectional. Of the unidirectional violence, 13.8% was male to female (MFPV), 28.3% was female to male (FMPV). In other words, a significant majority of violence in which women are victims is actually mutual violence. Erin Pizzey, a pioneering advocate for women's domestic abuse shelters, has described her experience in opening the first such safe space for women. "Of the first 100 women who came through our doors, 62 were as violent as the men they had left behind," she wrote in her memoir, This Way to the Revolution, "I had to face the fact that the males were always going to be blamed for violence within a family and that.. false claims would be made against them and that the women would always be believed." (p.82) She was ostracized by her community and has received death threats ever since.

Myth: Men and women abuse their partners for different reasons

Fact: The reasons that men and women abuse their partners are the same between the genders. The most common reasons that people of both genders hit their partners are coercion, anger, and attempts to punish a partner for misbehaviour, especially sexual infidelity.

Source: Current Controversies and Prevalence Concerning Female Offenders of Intimate Partner Violence: Why the Overwhelming Evidence on Partner Physical Violence by Women Has Not Been Perceived and Is Often Denied

Myth: When women do commit violence against men it is always in self defense

Fact: Self defence is no more common a reason for female violence against a partner than it is for male violence against a partner

Source:

Follingstad, D. R., Wright, S., Lloyd, S., & Sebastian, J. A. (1991). Sex differences in motivations and effects in dating violence. Family Relations, 40(1), 51–57.
Medeiros, R. A., & Straus, M. A. (2006). Risk factors for physical violence between dating partners: Implications for gender-inclusive prevention and treatment of family violence. In J. C. Hamel & T. Nicholls (Eds.), Family approaches to domestic violence: A practitioners guide to gender-inclusive research and treatment (pp. 59–87). New York: Springer (also available at http://pubpages. unh.edu/~mas2

Myth: Violence against men is less severe than violence against women?

Fact: There is a raging debate on this very question. The Canadian Department of Justice published a study in 2009 on the impact of spousal violence in Canada. They found some studies showing the severity of violence against women was more severe, while others found it was more severe against men. For example, a study by sociologists Richard B. Felson and Alison C. Cares found that male victims sustained worse injuries than did females. The risk of injury to either partner is also highest when both partners are violent so addressing domestic violence perpetrated by women will increase safety for both genders.

Sources:

An Estimation of the Economic Impact of Spousal Violence in Canada, 2009. Department of Justice Canada

Richard B. Felson and Alison C. Cares, Gender and the Seriousness of Assaults on Intimate Partners and Other Victims. Article first published online: 21 NOV 2005. DOI: 10.1111/j.1741-3737.2005.00209.x

The psychological effects of domestic violence are severe and similar for both genders.

Source: Physical and mental health effects of intimate partner violence for men and women

Myth: We don't need to take male victimization seriously because men are stronger and can just leave their female partners

Fact: An important study on male victims of female-perpetrated violence debunks the common sexist excuses for trivializing male victimization. The following is quoted at length.

"One well-noted assumption about women who use IPV against their men partners is that they are acting solely in self-defense or retaliation against their presumably violent men partners. This assumption, held by a few researchers, has been refuted by studies assessing women's motives for IPV, which show that, although some women report self-defense or retaliation as a motive, most do not.

"Another assumption concerning woman-to-man violence held by some researchers focuses on the relative size difference between most men and women. Because, on average, men are physically bigger and stronger than their women partners, some authors have argued that men would strike back or restrain a woman partner who becomes violent and that men presumably also have the ability to leave the premises without being forcibly restrained by their women partners. Some researchers who forward this assumption conclude that, because men can easily fight back, restrain their partners, and/or leave the premises, women's violence against men is trivial, humorous, or annoying, and violence by women toward men has no social or psychological effects on the men who sustain it.

"A related assumption is that men who sustain IPV from their women partners can leave their partners. Some researchers argue that men are not economically trapped in marriage or romantic relationships like women, because their incomes and occupational statuses tend to be higher; they are not physically or economically constrained from leaving, nor are they as psychologically invested in the children or household. Researchers who support this line of reasoning focus on concrete resources that are often available to men such as physical strength, employment, and transportation. Nonetheless, case studies show that men who sustain IPV often focus on these and other barriers to leaving an abusive relationship, including a commitment to marriage, lack of financial resources, and concern for their children. In such circumstances, men often worry that their women partners will obtain custody of their children."

Source: "A Closer Look at Men Who Sustain Intimate Terrorism by Women." The U.S. Library of Medicine

Myth: The high gender asymmetry in the rates of police-reported or hospital-reported domestic abuse implies that male victimization is a marginal issue

Fact: Domestic violence reported to the police is less than 5% of all domestic violence incidents.

Source: Kaufman Kantor, G., & Straus, M. A. (1990). Response of victims and the police to assaults on wives. In M. A. Straus & R. J. Gelles (Eds.), Physical violence in American families: Risk factors and adaptations to violence in 8,145 families (pp. 473–487). New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Publishers.

Men are less likely to view the IPV as a crime or to report it to police. This affects not just the number of domestic assaults reported to the police but also surveys which ask men and women about criminal acts committed against them.

Source: Male Victims of Domestic Violence Donal, D G. Dutton Katherine R. White

Myth: Since all public awareness campaigns tell me that all violence is perpetrated by men against women, this campaign exaggerates male victimization.

Fact: Often older statistics are used in brochures, pamphlets and online resources. These statistics are often taken from studies when men were not the target of data collection efforts. Canadian Juristat Articles that refer to "Intimate Partner Violence" or "Spousal Violence" use the term "Violence against Women" when measuring trends that cover all aspects of these instances in many cases, conflating the meaning of these terms.

Special interest advocacy organizations may use ambiguous language and misleading statistics in an effort to advance their cause. One such example from the Canadian Research Institute for the Advancement of Women:

> "Violence in lesbian relationships: A small study found that 20% of lesbians had experienced some form of emotional/psychological or physical violence in a relationship with a woman. Eleven percent had experienced physical violence, and 2% had been sexually assaulted in the relationship. The statistics are much lower than in male-female relationships, but it nevertheless remains an important issue, particularly because lesbians may not feel they can seek help from social services, police or the courts because of the stigma and discrimination around sexual orientation."

This interpretation is patently untrue. 20% is more than 3 times higher than the rate of abuse in heterosexual relationships.

Another example is from the Canadian Women's Foundation:

> "Some self-reported research shows women are almost as likely to use violence against their partner as men.30 Although some people claim that men are too embarrassed to admit a woman has abused them, the reverse is actually true: in self-reported research, men tend to over-estimate their partner's violence while under-estimating their own. At the same time, women over-estimate their own violence, and under-estimate their partner's."

This is false, there is no study that makes this conclusion.

Newspapers also misreport facts, and whether intentional or not will take statistics out of context. An example of this being "Violence against women is a global scourge" from the Whig Standard.

> "More specifically, men committed 98% of intimate partner violence and 74% of attacks against women committed by strangers."

This is quite often misinterpreted as "men commit 98% of ALL intimate partner violence" instead of "men commit 98% of intimate partner violence against women." This naturally leads the public to believe that women only commit 2% of intimate partner violence.

Whether intentional or not, the wording of many articles on the subject is often ambiguous and allows reasonable people to easily conflate "all Intimate partner violence" with "intimate partner violence against women." How much Intimate Partner Violence is committed against men by women?, rarely seems to get asked.

Myth: I read somewhere that few if any victims of domestic violence are men so male victimization can be safely dismissed.

Fact: There are a number of ways in which the evidence for gender symmetry in domestic violence is ignored by people who insist on seeing domestic violence as part of a program by society to oppress women. These include just not mentioning the facts on male victimization, not asking questions about male victimization, not citing studies that show male victimization, and citing studies as supporting ideas that women are not violent when the studies in fact contradict that claim. It is important to check for to make sure a study is not using one of the preceding techniques before taking it at face value.

Source: Processes Explaining the Concealment and Distortion of Evidence on Gender Symmetry in Partner Violence

Myth: Violence against men is less of a problem than violence against women because it isn't part of a patriarchal effort to hold women down.

Fact: The view of domestic violence as part of a societal wide program to hold women down is not supported by the data, especially the fact that violence within same-sex relationships consisting either of two men or two women is at least as severe as violence within heterosexual relationships. "The National Violence Against Women survey found that 21.5 percent of men and 35.4 percent of women living with a same-sex partner experienced intimate-partner physical violence in their lifetimes."

Sources:

http://www.sascwr.org/files/www/resources_pdfs/abuse/Abuse_in_Same_Sex_Relationships.pdf

http://www.advocate.com/crime/2014/09/04/2-studies-prove-domestic-violence-lgbt-issue

A majority of family violence is in fact mutual in that in these dysfunctional relationships both partners tend to commit violence against each other. We need to accept objective data and allow ourselves to be led by the evidence. This is the only method by which we can formulate solutions that will help keep everyone safe.

Concerning concern trolls

Paul Elam · 9 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

You catch more flies with honey than you do with vinegar. ~ The Original Concern Troll
You want flies, you can have them. ~ The Original MHRA

One thing we get around here is people who come in either feeling or feigning support for "the men's movement," but who nonetheless more closely resemble concern trolls than Men's Human Rights Activists (MHRA). Take that back, they more closely resemble just about anything in the known universe than MHRAs.

They often hit the site in waves, and we have all been surfing around here since my post busting the National Organization for Women red-handed, dumping their public record of lobbying for government enforced gender roles.

So I figure while our movingly concerned visitors are here it would be a good time to remind them what the men's movement, at least here, is about. I mean, seeing as most of them want to define it for us I thought it might be helpful. I know, I know, it is above and beyond on my part, but that is just the kind of guy I am. That's how I roll.

So, what is this thing we call the Men's Human Rights Movement (MHRM)? How do we measure success? What do we think is "appropriate" tone and content for our message, and why? What is it exactly that we want to do?

Well, I can best start by telling you what it is not, from my own personal point of view. It is not about passing a Violence Against Men Act or any other form of government reliance on justice and personal liberty. I, Paul Elam, am not running for office. I don't give a fudgsicle or a rat's ash who likes me and who doesn't. I am not looking for a men's rights parade on Men's Rights Victory Day in Washington, D.C… I am not looking for mainstream "acceptance" of the idea that men are human beings. There are no plans to form a committee for research for testicular cancer or to build a men's shelter. AVFM does not have a program to reform family courts. Of all the things I do not care about, and the list is endless, the concerns of others about how I choose to express myself is so low you could use it for a urinal target.

Oh, and by my saying I don't care about concern trolls who identify as MHRA I mean to say that I am not invested in making it easy for morally weak group identity junkies to stand up and say they support men's rights. You MHRAs who are running around whining about how nice and accommodating we should be are just cowards.

This movement came to be necessary because of the fortitude deficient, and it won't be pushed forward with the burden of protecting the same.

You want to know what this movement is about? It is very, very simple in my opinion. The MHRM I envision is about one simple thing. Talking without fear or capitulation.

Seriously. That is it. It is about nothing more than people talking to each other, openly and freely, in a world that does not want them to. Neither I nor AVFM has a legislative agenda, nor any politicians to endorse, nor lobbying to accomplish because none of that is of any value in a society that still refuses to accept reality.

Sure, if you look at our mission statement you will see many items that will require political and judicial remedy to ultimately accomplish. That, however is not our job at AVFM to accomplish directly. Our job is to push society to a place that it is able to sustain a narrative change that will in turn lead to sustained problem solving.

So relax, concernees. It's all good. We got this so you don't have to. At least have the courtesy to think about that before you come in here with your Starbucks wisdom, spreading the word "we" like you are one of us. You're not, but you are welcome to hang out and learn.

Meanwhile we are humming right along at a 24 karat success rate in doing everything we set out to do. And what we do is certainly worth considering, because it is as far as I am concerned a remarkable first in human history. It is a magnificent feat that I will always take pride in for myself and for the community of MHRA badasses who frequent and volunteer for this operation.

Challenging 3,000,000 years of human evolution — with both socialization and biology screaming at men to submit to gynocentrism with their heads down and mouths shut — is a hell of a thing to take on. It is like trying to scale Mount Everest barefoot and in shorts and t-shirt while chain smoking and chasing down Valium with Jack Daniels.

We are, in fact, the first movement ever to coalesce in opposition to gynocentrism – which is the root of all gender roles. All that we ever need to succeed at that is the courage to speak up about it in a world insanely hostile to our doing so.

So, what we aim to do here is talk, and to make it acceptable for men and women wherever they go to say what is on their mind and to stand behind it with agency when the world goes bonkers at them.

The rest of it, the change, will come at some point. And even if it doesn't, we can still create a subculture of men and women who can largely insulate themselves from the insanity we call modern culture — without turning them into hermits or celibates.

We are already doing that. In fact, once again I get to blow the AVfM horn, a lot of other people are starting to do the same thing because the good people here made it possible. Indeed as we watch the gynocentrists melt down all over the world over one little old website, I would say they make the point pretty well for us. We are doing what we set out to do.

You're welcome.

Now shut up and get out of the way.

Seriously, I want to plead with our excruciatingly concerned brothers and sisters who come here to tell us how we ought to be talking, writing, commenting, thinking, proceeding, planning, structuring, revealing and scratching our privates. Please, please, let not your hearts be troubled. It is all going to be OK.

Cultural revolutions are not products of a social popularity, business as usual ethos. Real social change is not legislated or determined by Nielson rankings. It is not approved or disapproved by the Southern Poverty Law Center. They are not fomented nor are they broken at the ballot box. And they certainly don't hinge on your willingness to tell your parents you are an "activist," even if you tell them you are nothing like that horrible Paul Elam.

Again, all you have to do is shut up and steer clear of the heavy lifters.

That will not mean much to most concern trolls, as most of their activism is confined to being PITAs in the comment threads at AVFM.

It will, however, ultimately affect many members of the lets-sit-down-with-feminists-and-seek-their-approval-over-latte club. As AVFM continues its commitment to, you know, saying what we think the way we want to, some of the arms-length men's issues pundits who have settled for a pat on the head, a paycheck and gender feminism will find themselves with a few more challenges than they are used to.

Why is this? Well, because it is the natural result of actually having a movement instead of just a syndicated column and martinis with the intelligentsia.

I do get that there are some concern trolls that are very sincere. There are those who honestly believe we can overcome the human evolution that ultimately gave birth to feminism with tone policing the people trying to tackle it. I don't understand it for the life of me, but I get that it is real.

At AVFM the only meaningful dialogue is that which we have with each other. Because when all is said and done, that dialogue is what is getting the job done.

When you think about it, it is remarkably simple if not particularly easy. Gynocentrism has been protected by a wall of human denial for countless centuries. All that was ever needed to change the status quo on male disposability was for intelligent, passionate and informed human beings who did not give a damn to step out of the shadows of fear and start talking.

If enough of that happens, it will be very much like Dorothy Gale yanking back the curtains to find the reality behind the illusion.

So, while we all here at AVFM appreciate your concerns, we won't let you distract us from that happening.

And yes, I know, that concerns you.

Professor Judy Haiven and the silencing of men on campus

Jonathan Taylor · 9 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Feminism has long been against men and women having the equal right to speak. We see this in many ways.

Male-only spaces where men talk among men are "breeding grounds for patriarchy," whereas female-only spaces are "safe spaces" that must be preserved at all costs. A woman talking about sex in public is "empowered" and "liberated," whereas a man talking doing the same is a sexist who "objectifies women" and "contributes to 'rape culture.'" The problem of rape – greatly exaggerated – must be rammed down everyone's throats by feminists at every opportunity, and men as a group must be stigmatized and shamed for something that a minority of men do. But if anyone dares suggest that a minority of women make false rape accusations, all of a sudden such speech must be silenced immediately and with extreme prejudice – even if it means saving innocent men from ruin.

Over at UNews (article here) we hear of the latest institutional misandry coming from feminists. This time it's spearheaded by Professor Judy Haiven of St. Mary's University (although this particular event occurred at Dalhousie University). The article begins:

> Women should be heard first in the classroom, a forum on misogyny at Dalhousie University heard Thursday. "Men should not be allowed to monopolize these forums," Saint Mary's University management professor Judy Haiven said.

So apparently, to "prevent a male monopoly," a female monopoly must be established. That's Feminism to a "T," my friends. But it's not just an idea professor Haiven is "thinking about." She's already doing it.

Her idea that women should always speak first in classroom discussions and at public eventswas brought up several times during the forum. Haiven said she already tries to apply this idea in her own classroom.

> "(In) the management department, women get to speak first. I think that that is a primary issue that we actually have to look at, how to do question and answer (periods). And we can start today."

Naturally, since this is a Feminist event, it would be attended by a great number of Feminists. And what was the Feminist crowd's response to Haiven's sexism?

Haiven's idea was met by a round of applause.
Color me surprised. Queue the "but not all Feminists are like that" brigade who want us to ignore the inconvenient truth that most Feminists are indeed like that – exceptions notwithstanding.

Professor Haiven fails to note the irony in her next remark:

> More women are graduating with university degrees than ever before, and often take up the majority of classes, "yet you wouldn't know that."

And why wouldn't we know that, Professor Haiven? Might it have something to do with people being told all their lives that men and boys live on cloud nine all the time simply because they were born male? Might it have something to do with feminists in the media – like Bryce Covert – telling us that we should ignore men's and boys' education issues?

But Haiven doesn't talk about that, of course. She doesn't inquire into whether the recession of men from our universities might have anything to do with the anti-male atmosphere she and her ideological cohorts create. Forums on misandry are overwhelmingly absent from academic discourse – despite the rampant misandry in academia that establishes an incredible need to discuss it.

And in the midst of this, this woman takes center stage at an event created just for women, in a university where women already take center stage in policy and practice, and tells us that women just don't have enough privilege.

And in fact, she's not citing the fact that women are the majority of those attending higher education as an offhanded gesture to care about men. She's using it as to argue that since women are the majority of those enrolling, it should be a matter of policy that they should be the majority of those heard as well.

Feminism was originally marketed to the public as a movement that would empower marginalized and silenced voices of women. Today, it is about silencing and suppressing the voices of men and boys.

Unfortunately, before the society realized that this was the true face of feminism, we gave them tons of money, influence, and power to do what they said they would do. And then – as the pathological liars that so many of them are – they pulled a bait-and-switch and decided to support every vice they originally claimed to be against. And to top it off, they added the insulting arrogance of claiming they are still "for equality" and insisting that we should be stupid or self-hating enough to believe it.

Feminists wander into my website all the time talking about how the "bad Feminists" are really just "on the margins of the movement." And time and time again, we see that this is not the case – that the bad Feminists in fact are the movement.

And – surprise, surprise – none of the so-called "good" Feminists even bother to call Professor Haiven out on her sexism. Instead, they applaud.

It's long past time to get this ideology out of our schools.

This article is reprinted from AVoiceForMaleStudents.com. –Eds

Raheem DeVaughn's "Queens For A Day" have on no clothes

Mumia Ali · 10 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

"All the words in this song are gonna be about you…"
-Raheem DeVaughn, "You"

The website BlackDoctor.org recently reported that NeoSoul singer and activist Raheem DeVaughn has held an event he calls "Queens For A Day" in order to buoy the spirits of battered Black women:

> "Black women are almost three times as likely to experience death as a result of domestic violence/intimate partner violence (DV/IPV) than white women. And while Black women only make up 8% of the population, 22% of homicides that result from DV/IPV happen to Black Women and 29% of all victimized women, making it one of the leading causes of death for Black women ages 15 to 35.
>
> Many of these women's stories go unnoticed or live in shame, but award-winning R&B singer and activist Raheem DeVaughn decided to do something about it.
>
> Raheem DeVaughn held a "Queen For A Day" event through his Love Life foundation for a room full of women–strong, determined women who survived domestic abuse and now share their stories of triumph.
>
> DeVaughn partnered with Lyn Twyman of the L.A.S.E.R.S. domestic violence awareness foundation to find the women to pamper for the day. The ladies were treated to a delicious brunch of chicken and waffles by Kitchen Cray and nail, massage and hair treatments by the host venue Maisie Dunbar Spa Lounge in Silver Spring, Maryland. This "Queen For A Day" event was created to encouragement these women to move forward, tell their stories and inspire other women to leave their domestic violent situations and start a living like a queen."

For those who may not be aware of who DeVaughn is, I've written about his ilk in a previous article, "Noticing Deniro Farrar's "Notice", where I describe the situation with such "Conscious Brothas":

> "The song, called "Notice," is Farrar's ode to the Sista on the Block, who is ever the victim, don'tcha know, of "street harassment." Such rappers are not at all uncommon in urban Black life; they form a part of the constellation of Black America's Nice Guy™ contingent and White Knight Corps, though we Negroes don't refer to these gents as such; we refer to them as "Conscious Brothas." Though considerably overlapping with Good Black Men™, they are in fact quite distinct as a group, perhaps the most standout feature about them being that they are "creatives" of varying stripe—rappers, "spoken word artists" (a cutesy way of saying "poets"), sometimes bloggers/writers, video/film/photographers, and the like. Conscious Brothas mark themselves out as vastly different from more straight-ahead Gangsta Rappers like, say, a 50 Cent or a Cassidy, by not imbibing thetruth supposed "misogyny" of the former's lyrical stylings and instead devoting themselves to extolling the virtues of the Sistahood, come what may. (Examples of this would include the likes of Common, Dwele, Raheem DeVaughn, Talib Kweli, et al. Don't get me wrong, I'm a fan of all of these artists, and have them all on my playlists, though I admit I'm not much of a "Dirty South" rap fan—too much of an Old School East Coaster for that. But I just had to stand up and tell the Truth—and shame the Devil.)"

Like Farrar, DeVaughn was raised by a single Black mom, and as such he is inclined to romanticize them and indeed all Black women; to see them only in a good, if not the best light; to live in denial. This state of affairs is a lot more prevalent in Black American life than we would like to admit, and a good part of the reason that it persists is due to so many Black men themselves remaining silent.

This is important because the stats cherrypicked to form the basis of the DeVaughn article, and his anti-DV initiative, are in fact a very different story from what we've been led to believe. Smelling a rat myself, I decided to turn to the crack-research team here at A Voice For Men, most notably one Mrs. Hannah Wallen*, who co-hosts the popular internet radio show Honey Badger Radio. Thanks to her and the rest of the staff, we were able to find the source of the cherrypicked stats the DeVaughn article cites; here is the very first paragraph listed in "Statistics":

> "In a nationally representative survey conducted in 1996, 29% of African American women and 12% of African American men reported at least one instance of violence from an intimate partner."

Wait, what?–you mean to tell me that the very same source that DeVaughn, L.A.S.E.R.S. and BlackDoctor.org cites, also cites the fact – FACT – that Black men were victims of intimate partner violence, too – to the tune of 12%?

Yes, that's exactly what I'm saying. And if you're Black, this hardly comes as a great shock to you.

Indeed, if you're Black you know better than anyone, that Black women have every bit a capacity for abusiveness and violence as Black men – in fact, if you're Black (and sometimes if you're not), chances are pretty high that you've personally witnessed this in action for yourself. As I've said above, it's a lot more common in Black American life than we're willing to openly admit. Airing dirty laundry, and all that.

I think I know what you're going to say: "12% isn't that much, Mumia! More Black women are being beaten up or worse!" Oh, I don't disagree that 29% is bigger than 12% – ah, but you see, that isn't what's at issue here. What's at issue here is the way in which the issue of DV is presented: that its ONLY something that affects Black women. We know, from the exact same source that was cited to make that case in the first case, that this is simply not true.

Black men can be battered by their female partners, too. We know this, for a fact.

And, if you think 12% ain't a big deal, then I have an interesting thought experiment for you:

Let's say that tomorrow morning, you wake up and find that you have lost 12% of your brain functions; or 12% of your lung capacity; or 12% or your liver or kidney functions. No big deal, right? After all, it's such a small number.

What if this coming Friday, instead of getting 100% of your usual paycheck, you only got 88% – because, you know, you missing 12% of your pay all of a sudden, without explanation, ain't no thang, right?

Right?

So, let's cut the BS – 12% IS a significant number. And in light of that fact, we simply have to ask: WHY wasn't this fact included in BlackDoctor.org's story? I mean, I'm cool if DeVaughn wants to do whatever for Black women, that's his right as a private citizen. But BlackDoctor.org has a responsibility to ALL of Black America – not just one half.

The answer to that comes from Ms. Wallen, who said the following during an online conversation with her on the issue:

> "I've written about feminist dishonesty on DV in the past. I have a couple of articles about that on AVfM and a couple on my blog. Previous DV law was gender neutral – one of the big things VAWA did was change that. The other was that it created professions for gender studies majors to fill. And of course, it attacked due process rights."

Ms. Wallen argues that this is more a matter of ideology, personal axes to grind and just plain ole money – but she also notes something else, something even more insidious – what looks awfully close to demonizing Black men enmasse. She continues:

> "African American men report violence from an intimate partner, but only women are talked about in the article. And since female violence is often not viewed as violent, we can be reasonably certain that 12% is an underestimate of actual incidence.

> I think that I would add one more thing: The numbers from overall domestic violence studies, which show gender symmetry. The question becomes why are feminists trying to portray the Black population as significantly behaviorally different from the rest – particularly, Black men? Is this another example of privileged white women demonizing Black men, and this time they're just using feigned sympathy for Black women to do it?
>
> I don't personally think that skin color makes a bit of difference in whether someone has a tendency to be violent or not – I think circumstances make a lot of difference, but even that doesn't lead to the belief that a single ethnic group would have a significantly different gender ratio in domestic violence."

Ms. Wallen sees a distinct pattern of feminists, usually but as we can see in the case of the DeVaughn story, certainly not always white, who have a documented pattern of propagandizing Black male perfidy, violence and criminality – Wallen specifically mentions last year's horrendously racist Hollaback! NYC's "Woman Walks Ten Hours In NYC" video, and says the following:

> "To bolster their claims about rape culture and the necessity of feminism in western nations feminists say terrible things about India, the Middle East, and Africa, all areas where the people have darker skin. They have a pattern of demonizing darker skinned people in order to scare or shame westerners into accepting their dogma.
>
> Mostly the reason they do that is that their target audience are people who aren't very familiar with the cultures they're demonizing."

Indeed.

While it may be clear that the SJW crowd, white and at least some Black, may wish to propagandize the issues to serve their own ends, the stats remain the stats and what's more, they are often reflected in social media. As avowed feminist notes in her acclaimed work "The End of Men", Hanna Rosin documents the rise in violent criminal behavior among women that she devotes an entire chapter to, called "A More Perfect Poison"; she even discusses the trend of young Black women accosting and often violently attacking, men – something that your correspondent covered late last year.

And that's not including the very public displays of DV violence committed by such Black notables as Mary J. Blige, Keke Wyatt, and more recently, Ray J's girlfriend, just to name a few; even Beyonce's kid sister got in on the act.

So, again: why is there no discussion of this, on the part of BlackDoctor.org, or Ms. Lyn Twyman, or Mr. Raheem DeVaughn? Could it be that they too, are a part of the problem that plagues Black America along these lines, rather than the solution?

Let me be clear, in closing: in no way am I attempting to suggest that Black women who are victims of intimate partner violence – i.e., beaten up by their Black male partners – shouldn't get help or support. They most certainly should.

But what must also be made clear, is that by the exact same evidence the Blackety Black SJWs use to make their case, we know that Black men are abused by their intimate partners, too, and not just physically – as I noted in a previous article – and they are every bit as deserving of help and support, too. If Black women don't report these things due to silence and shame, it must go at least double for Black men, who labor under a bizarre notion of what a "real man" is – notions that are wholeheartedly fostered and supported by Black women themselves, I should add.

If we are going to be serious about addressing domestic violence and intimate partner abuse, specifically as it relates to Black America, it's going to take all of us looking at the problem through a clear-eyed door, instead of through an ideologically emotive keyhole.

Mrs. Hannah Wallen contributed to this report.*

Feminism and eugenics: Engineering reproductive totalitarianism

Prentice Reid · 10 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is also available in Romanian.

Today the feminist movement is rightly given credit for helping to usher in a revolution in family planning. Unfortunately, presenting this obsession with controlling female fertility without examining the motivations and philosophy behind it leaves people naïve and with a shallow understanding of where this mindset originated.

The argument often used by feminists today is that the government should stay out of women's vaginas; however, what is left out of the argument is the fact that early feminists were demanding that the government not only get into women's vaginas (and men's bodies as well) but that governments forcibly sterilize women the elite deemed unfit. These pioneering feminists who promulgated these ideas are celebrated today while men who promulgated them are rightfully condemned.

Feminism's intimate connection with eugenics and reproductive fitness begins with Victoria Woodhull. Woodhull was the first woman to run for President in 1872, a leader of the woman's suffrage movement, the first female stockbroker and the first person to publish the Communist Manifesto in English in her paper Woodhull & Claflin's Weekly.

Her paper was also famous for promoting short skirts and licensed prostitution along with other feminist ideas and included writings regularly from other prominent feminists like Elizabeth Cady Stanton who was perhaps the most influential of them all. Woodhull regularly pushed the idea that the government should prevent the marriage and thus the breeding of those it deemed unfit to reproduce with statement's such as:

"A humanitarian government would stigmatize the marriages of the unfit as crimes; it would legislate to prevent the birth of the criminal rather than legislate to punish him after he is born."

The term "eugenics" was coined by Charles Darwin's cousin Francis Darwin and basically meant controlling human reproduction using the institutions of the state and the scientific establishment to prevent the lower class from breeding and to favor the breeding of the upper class or what they deemed the genetically fit. Adolf Hitler was inspired by the popularity of the American and British eugenics movement and capitalized on it to fanatically engineer his "final solution".

Victoria Woodhull did not originate the ideas that resulted in coining the term but she was perhaps the first person to so boldly risk her reputation to popularize the idea according to historian Michael W. Perry:

"She wasn't the first to come up with the idea, or the first to write about it," he explains, "but she may have been the first to stake her reputation on eugenics becoming a cause."

In her book "The human body the temple of God" she praised the forced operations on the ovaries of girls deemed unfit and recommended the methods the ancient Greeks used for eliminating undesirable children from their population:

> "New Zealand performed ovariotomy on young girls…the preceding indicates that certain savages have at least some regard for the future members of their community….I would recommend the remedy of the ancient Greeks."

In 1927, the Buck v Bell court decision ruled that the forced sterilization of those deemed unfit to reproduce by the government did not violate constitutional rights. A woman named Carrie Buck was subsequently forced to get her tubes tied under police supervision.

Victoria Woodhull, towards the end of her life, in May of that year, applauded the decision and proudly stated that she had originated the idea of the State controlling women's(and men's) fertility:

> "Mrs. Martin who wrote and lectured for thirty years on eugenics, remarked that she was pleased to read that the Virginia Eugenics law had succeeded in establishing the right to sterilize the feeble-minded. "I advocated that fifty years ago in my book "Marriage of the Unfit" she said."

Emily Murphy, the famous Canadian feminist, and first female magistrate in the British empire, believed that the inferior Chinese and immigrant class was outbreeding the native-born white population and thus appealed to the Canadian government for the forcible sterilization of those deemed unfit to reproduce.

> "Her…writings placed a critique of the inadequate or degenerate family alongside racist anti-immigrant sentiment, intimating that addiction was relegated to the rampant immorality of Chinese immigrants…was coupled with a strong conviction that the founding (White) population of Canada was under threat by overbreeding and morally bankrupt immigrants…She also argued that mentally defective children were "a menace to society, and an enormous cost to the state" that must be curtailed….through negative eugenics such as sterilization."

Murphy's obsession with controlling the reproduction of the population resulted in her also pushing for birth control, especially permanent forms of it. This is the climate and mindset from which the phrase birth control had its genesis. Marie Stopes, an early British feminist who created Marie Stopes International, a non-governmental body providing contraception and abortion services in at least 38 countries around the world, also was a fanatical promoter of eugenics and an admirer of Adolf Hitler.

> "Stopes was "an elitist, an idealist, interested in creating a society in which only the best and the beautiful should survive…She attended the inaugural congress of the Eugenics Society in 1912 and became a fellow in 1921… Stopes books on marriage and birth control reflect her eugenic theories. She advocated "the sterilization of those totally unfit for parenthood [to be] made an immediate possibility, indeed made compulsory."

In 1935 Stopes attended the International Congress for Population Science in Berlin, held in the second year of Hitler's rule. Stopes was also anti-Prussian, anti-Catholic and anti-Russian, if one can judge by the following unpublished piece of verse, written in 1942, at the height of the struggle with the Axis powers.

> Catholics, Prussians,
> The Jews and the Russians,
> All are a curse,
> Or something worse…

Stopes, who was ever ready to promote her writings, sent a copy of her Love Songs for Young Lovers to Adolf Hitler with the following cover letter:

> Dear Herr Hitler,
>
> Love is the greatest thing in the world: so will you accept from me these (poems) that you may allow the young people of your nation to have them?
>
> The young must learn love from the particular 'till they are wise enough for the universal.
>
> I hope too that you yourself may find something to enjoy in the book.
>
> -letter from Marie Stopes to Hitler, August 1939

Marie Stopes today is honored with her very own stamp from the British government along with a variety of other accolades.

Margaret Sanger is today considered America's feminist pioneer in birth control and family planning. Her American Birth Control League went on to become Planned Parenthood, the most powerful and active birth control and abortion organization in the United States.

Sanger was also a tireless promoter of eugenics and forcible sterilization of the unfit. At one point in 1925, she was so firm in her convictions, that she actually wanted the American Birth Control League to join with the eugenics movement.

> "Mrs. Margaret Sanger, founder of the American Birth Control League, said that the league was ready to unite with the eugenic movement whenever the eugenicists were able."

In 1950 Sanger urged the US government to start a system of sterilizing people they labeled feeble-minded.

All of this information is rarely discussed when the history of feminism is examined in daily discourse, but we cannot give feminism credit for the positive side of their historical leaders without also discussing the dark side as well.

RapeHoax: The Joshua Strange Story

AVfM Video Source · 11 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Joshua Strange and his mother fought back against unfounded and untrue accusations after Joshua was unexpectedly arrested.

From an interesting channel.

Equality? What exactly do you mean by that?

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 11 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

In the course of dispute, many a feminist will inform you that you "don't know what feminism really is", and instruct you to "look in the dictionary". They will pronounce this with an air of immutable finality, as if they had settled the question for all time. In deference to their wisdom, I share the following dictionary entry:

> Feminism -n: 1 : the theory of the political, economic, and social equality of the sexes.

This definition is the source of the oft-heard claim that "feminism is about equality", meaning that it seeks to establish equality of the sexes in the form suggested. We call this "dictionary feminism", and if you enquire to know what feminism really is, it establishes a core minimum that nearly any feminist would publicly agree upon.

The problem with dictionary feminism is that it does not exist outside the dictionary. For this reason, we favor a more pragmatic or empirical way of knowledge. To us feminism is not merely a sentence on a book page, or even an ideology. It is a set of real-life practices – a dynamic pattern of things existing in the objective world. We see it, and we call it as we see it. From this we draw the counter-feminist maxim that "feminism is what we say it is".

To say that feminism is "about equality" is useless because, frankly, what is this thing called "equality"? No ready answer presents itself, and we are left with no coherent explanation. That compels us to set aside the dictionary and map our knowledge from independent principles.

For that purpose, we now go to investigate the difficulties of the term "equality".

One issue immediately crops up, namely, the rightness of this term in relation to "feminism". One sees that "masculism" could be supplied in place of "feminism" with no harm done to the requirements of "equality". Either term would be equally fitting, and provided both sexes came out "equal" it would all be good. (Ideally, however, both terms should be discarded in favor of something sexually neutral.)

Only if we assume that a present inequality exists, and that this condition disfavors women, can we justify using "feminism" according to the "equality" definition.

But not everybody would accept the notion that women suffer inequality. Many would find this notion problematic. Hence, the word feminism (as the dictionary defines it) is loaded. It is contraband language that smuggles a hidden premise into the discussion and tricks you into harboring an element of the feminist worldview. Like a thought-terminating cliché, it invites no cognitive process of discovery. So in order to ferret out the contraband in the dictionary definition of feminism, we should reconstruct the definition thuswise:

> Feminism -n: Advocacy for women on the grounds that women are burdened with inequality.

Granted, this doesn't quite tell us what "equality" (or inequality) really means. But it frames the talk in a manner that precludes mischief, and puts us in a way to asking the relevant questions. In that spirit, we shall focus our lens narrowly upon the word "equality" itself. What does this word really mean? Here the talk gets especially interesting.

On the surface, "equality" would seem to be feminism's holy grail. Yet although this word is central to the dictionary definition of feminism, it is debatable whether feminism genuinely seeks "equality" between between the sexes. However, let's leave political questions aside for now.

The term is most at home in the realm of mathematics — and we could argue that it's away from home anywhere else. Fundamentally, "equality" is where two sides of an equation are identical. Hence, X = X is another way of saying that "X is X". Simply stated: anything is what it is. This is the law of identity.

Very well. The realm of mathematics is the realm of pure number, hence the realm of pure abstraction. A number is merely a conceptual quantifier. It may keep tabs on things in the real world, but a number in itself has no assignable quality apart from abstractness. Numbers are not hot or cold, wet or dry, sad or happy, male or female, socialist or capitalist. A number has no physical dimension, and it references nothing inherently.

So long as you stick to pure math, or anything that can be mathematically operationalized, equality is a workable concept. Otherwise, it is an essentially contested concept. The reason is, that when you apply this concept to human conditions in the world of lived reality, it turns into a hopeless muddle.

However, that does not stop legions of muddle-headed people from applying the concept of "equality" to the world of lived reality. They do this all the time.

The non-mathematical world is a world in flux, a metamorphosing world. It is a dynamic world, to say the least — it never sits still for long.

In such a world, "equality" becomes a very tricky and complicated idea. So what does it mean as a core minimum? As a core minimum, any way you cut it, "equality" signifies "sameness" or "identity". Numerical quantities on opposite sides of an equation are always the same — otherwise, the math is wrong.

This core idea of sameness carries over into the real world, but quickly goes south. That is because the only way to achieve universal "equality" in the human social world, or in the physical universe at large, is to create absolute SAMENESS of all things everywhere. Pure "equality" would equate to pure nothingness — pure non-existence — because it would*annihilate the basis for all differentiation.*

That's what you get, when you try to make a mathematical idea govern every facet of living reality. Mathematics is pure abstraction, hence pure nothingness, and when you force this upon the real world, the only logical outcome, is pure nothingness.

The real world is not only dynamic and ever-changing, but subject to countless frames of reference at any given instant. Would you make all of that "equal"? Then you must roll it flat, and convert it into . . . . nothing! No differentiation equals nothing. That's the rule.

Now, when feminists and various other people bang on about this "equality" thing, they are simply playing with a noble buzzword that makes them feel warm and fuzzy because it conjures up glowing mental images of truth and beauty and universal justice. This is called the halo effect.

In feminist discourse, at any rate, equality breaks down into two forms:

1. Equality of opportunity — also called "formal equality",

2. Equality of outcome — also called "substantive equality".

Equality of opportunity can be achieved when you mandate "equal rights" under law, so that everybody legally has the same opportunity in situation X. It's about anti-discrimination.

Equality of outcome, however, goes deeper. It aims to rearrange the world so that no gross disparities of wealth or situation will be found anywhere. As if, eveybody has not only an equal right to pick in the orchard, but a positive guarantee they will come away with the same number of apples.

Equality of outcome can only be made real, when some superior force — such as state power — intervenes in the world of affairs and either redistributes the harvest, or handicaps some of the harvesters so that they won't harvest any more than anybody else does.

Furthermore, equality of outcome can only be made real, when the intervening force cuts deeper and deeper into the microcosm of life, to see that redistribution and handicapping are applied to even the smallest of transactions. There is no theoretical limit to this.

In a nutshell, equality of outcome is inherently a totalitarian project. That is the level of control it eventually requires – total. Finally, it generates the biggest inequality of all, because the enforcers of "equality" will hold all the power and other people will hold little or none.

In the end, there is no ultimate "equality" in the real world. There is only endlessly redistributed inequality. That is where all of our efforts to achieve so-called "equality", in the real world, will take us. So if you want to worship "equality", be a mathematician. You will be on solid ground that way.

And never talk about "equality" in an abstract or freestanding way; never as a political catch-phrase or banner slogan. Any time you speak or write this word, you should directly follow up with a finite project or proposal where you hope to see some precise condition "equalized". Otherwise, don't say it. That is the only honest way to use this word: not as a glittering generality, not as a rainbow which invites pursuit, but as something immediate and quantifiable.

Remember that this "equality" thing which so many people prattle on about, amounts to intellectual cotton candy and very little more. In other words, it is a sweet nothing. So when people blather about it, they are blathering about . . . . nothing.

Tell me, how insane is that, to blather about nothing? Hallucination is not a wise idea. We need reality — the more the better.

The in-group bias mistake and Darwinian gender studies

Randy Macanahaugh (aka Subman) · 11 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

In my opinion (granted I'm merely a layman) one of the most important studies performed in terms of explaining societal interaction is this one. You can get the full report (pdf) here. It is called "Gender Differences in Automatic In-Group Bais: Why Do Women Like Women More than Men Like Men?" by Laurie Rudman and Stephanie Goodwin. Unfortunately, I believe its authors (and most of academia) have drawn the wrong conclusions from it.

I think their error was one of starting position. In the first few paragraphs they reveal the ideological lens through which they will interpret their findings.

> Around the world and throughout history, men have enjoyed higher status than women.

Later on in the opening :

> In short men are culturally valued more than women.

It is for this reason, in my opinion, that they then misinterpret the results of their experiments. The authors lay the groundwork for realizing the truth but ultimately explain it away as an anomalous deviation from the expected.

> Indeed, considerable evidence suggests that people who belong to the most socially valued groups strongly and automatically favor their own group.

The authors then go on to briefly summarize several other in-group bias experiments that provide evidence for the above quote. The authors then (again this is only my opinion folks) proceed to ignore this correlation.

> However, gender groups are a proven exception to this rule, > because men are less likely than women to show automatic in-group bias (i.e., own gender preference).

A proven exception? Unfortunately, the authors do not actually substantiate that bold assertion in the text. Indeed, they describe this "exception" as mysterious.

> These findings add mystery to the phenomenon of men's weaker in-group bias.

I argue that they do not add mystery. In fact they make perfect sense if one looks at the results through the lens of male disposability.

Women are inherently valuable in a society due to the biological facts of human reproduction. Women are the ones who create human life inside their bodies and thus are tied to the survival of the species. Having only a few men available hardly impacts species survivability at all since relatively few men can supply enough sperm to keep the population thriving. A group that has relatively few women, however, can die out much more easily.

These biologically evolved biases, I argue, give rise to virtually every social convention throughout history. Many much more eloquent people have written and spoken on these conventions and the mechanisms by which they arose than I could do here. One such speaker and writer is Karen Straughan. I'm sure most of readers are aware of her, but one you may not be aware of is Paula Wright. Paula is interested in what she calls "Darwinian Gender Studies", an evidence based examination of the gender dynamic in human societies.

Paula deviates from modern academic feminist thought in that she bases her conclusions on the data and embraces the science of evolutionary psychology. Modern feminist thought is all predicated on the dogmatic (and evidence denying) Patriarchy theory (or the "New Coke" called "kyriarchy" or "intersectionality"), and as such is unable or unwilling to incorporate actual scientific evidence which conflicts with their paradigm.

In my opinion, Ms Wright and her ideas should be supported by all people who advocate for true gender equality. Only through incorporating all of the evidence can we truly begin to understand the ways in which the sex differences affect society. Only through understanding can we make strides to improve that society.

How do we create a society that cares about men? It might be easier than you think.

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 12 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is also available in Swedish.

Someone posted a link on my Facebook page to comments the fabulous Karen Straughan made on a video on YouTube. I didn't watch the video, so I don't specifically know what she was responding to, but I found her comments to be very interesting. I'm going to reprint them at length and then try to answer her question.

This is Karen talking:

Here's why I attack feminism: feminism bills itself as a progressive movement, yet it employs traditional conservative tropes in order to achieve its ends, and characterizes its appeals to the traditional as "progressive".

Actual conservatism (whether you agree with it or not) is more honest. It says "women are incapable of X, therefore women need protection from Y, and men must provide that protection". Feminism says "women are every bit as capable of X as men, but men are monsters whose agenda is to keep women subordinate, therefore women need protection from Y".

Traditionalism says that sex is something men do to women, therefore rape is something men do to women. Feminism says that sex is something that men and women do to each other, but because of the malicious and malfeasant "Patriarchy" and all the men in charge of it and benefitting from it, rape is not just something men do to women, but a conscious process by which all men keep all women in a state of fear. Also, because of the political context, yada yada, it's just not the same when a woman forces a man to have sex. Yes, we think men and women are equal, but it's still different, because reasons, most of which have to do with how men created a system that oppresses women for the benefit of men."

Conservatism said "women are temptresses, and it is a man's responsibility to not succumb to the seductive nature of women, and if he does, then he's at fault for defiling his own purity, oh and we'll probably make him marry her."

Feminism says "women are helpless victims with no sexual agency even though they should be allowed to climb random guys like fire poles and grind on them because how dare you shame her for expressing her sexuality, and it's a man's responsibility to not succumb to his own predatory and rapey nature, and if he does, then he's a rapist and needs to rot in prison."

Both ideologies hold men more to account than women. Both ruthlessly exploit conservative ideas about men and women. But only feminism says that it's about treating both genders equally.

When we are fighting feminism, we're often also fighting conservatism. But I'm sorry, a shotgun wedding is less bad than 20 years in prison. The acknowledgement that women are "temptresses" (that is: women have sexual agency) is better than the assertion that a woman in an abbreviated latex dress and stripper heels shouldn't have to endure the "male gaze". The claim that women are dependent on men and should be appreciative and respectful of the men they're dependent on is better than the claim that women are independent and need men like fish need bicycles, while women rake in 75%+ of available government benefits that are funded disproportionately by men.

Marriage, even to a harpy, is better than being impoverished paying child support to a harpy who accused you of DV and got you jailed for it and who won't let you see your kids, and who has you thrown in prison for non-payment because your DV record got you fired from your job, and then claims that she's all about "equality" between the sexes. I'm sorry, but it is.

Feminism is traditionalism dialed up to 11. When we fight feminism, we're fighting extreme traditionalism. Moderate traditionalism can wait.

She gets attacked pretty harshly by commenters who feel one must address feminism and traditionalism as mutually complicit in a culture that refuses to care about men. Karen goes on the explain her position a little more clearly:

I think perhaps my biggest beef with feminism is that it has convinced society in general that society hates women and has always hated women, when in reality all societies have largely served women. And they've essentially said that men created these societies that hate women for their own benefit and privilege.

This is a smear on the characters of men that I have a great deal of trouble tolerating, and even more so because it is not remotely true, and I doubt it has ever been true.

During the suffragette era, there were political cartoons that showed a sweating, distressed male politician sitting between two pretty young women, one wearing a sash that said "suffragette" and another wearing one that said "anti-suffragette". Back when universal male suffrage was enduring its birthing pains, the UK put the question to women: do you want the vote? 70% of women said no. Yet Cenk Uygur acted in our interview as if there was no way male politicians would have given women the vote were it not for the suffragettes committing acts of domestic terrorism. He ignored the fact that women themselves opposed women's suffrage, and that this was a major reason why women got the vote later than men. So literally, a government listening to women was a government that was oppressing them.

I guess what I'm getting at is that both traditionalism and feminism require that men provide for, protect, and sacrifice for women. Traditionalists call that loving women. Feminists call that hating women. This is why I oppose feminism first and foremost–all feminist roads lead to misogyny.

As for going back to traditionalism, I don't think it's possible. The toothpaste is out of the tube. As George RR Martin wrote once, the cow's been milked, there's no squirting the cream back up her udder.

Then Karen goes on to ask the million dollar question:

I never said traditionalists accept an individual man for what they are. I said "do X, Y and Z and you'll get respect."

The difference between traditionalists and feminists is that they both demand you do X, Y and Z. Traditionalists will respect you for it. Feminists will spit on you for it.

You can do what you want. I can understand why you're upset with me. But I'm not going to lie to you. I'm not going to say there's some world where you won't be required to do X, Y and Z. I'm only saying that if you manage to do that, you should be respected rather than shit on.

Like I said to some in this thread, show me an alternative. The alternative depends on convincing society to care about men as much as they care about women. So show me how to make society do that. Show me it's possible. Show me a society in the boonies in Nepal that made that work, even on a small scale. Show me that it can happen, on a visceral, emotional level.

Traditionalism is bad for men. Feminism is worse. If you were forced to choose between them, which would you pick?

Show me the alternative. How do we make society care about men as much as they care about women? Both Karen and another commenter mention the possibility of artificial wombs – remove women's reproductive powers and suddenly the playing field gets a whole lot more level. There is something Matrix-like and creepy about the idea of gestating babies in machines, and obviously, that requires a massive amount of technology.

Instead of eradicating women's reproductive powers, perhaps we should be considering making men's reproductive powers equal to women's? Birth control technology for men would go a long way towards achieving this, but we could affect this change tomorrow by changing two laws:

1. Reproductive rights for men
2. Legal presumption of shared custody

I've written before about legal parental surrender and allowing men to walk away from children they have contributed genetic material to, just as women may do, but having given the issue more thought, I am convinced that will only lead to increased hatred of men, not less. For a law surrounding reproductive rights to create a society that genuinely cares about men, the law needs more bite. It needs as much bite as the reproductive rights women currently enjoy.

No human child may be born without the on-going and affirmative consent of the adults involved.

Gender neutral and perfectly clear. To give birth to a child without the explicit consent of everyone who contributed genetic material should be a felony and the child should immediately be seized and placed for adoption by the state. In the beginning, to be sure, we are going to end up seizing a lot of babies under equal reproductive rights, but it will not take long for reality to sink in: make this choice and you will suffer for it.

And note that no one will be forced into abortions they do not want. If a woman falls pregnant with a child the father does not consent to, she will not be forced to abort that child. She is free to follow her conscience and give birth to that child. She will not be allowed to keep it, but she may give birth to it. Marital status will make no difference. If you do not have the consent of the father, the infant will be seized.

The most immediate effect of a law like this is that a market for male reproductive services emerges. A 35-year-old woman who no man on the planet has consented to reproduce with has a choice: she can pay a man to consent to parenthood. His consent means that he is obliged to support the resulting child so his fee will be:

Child support + ongoing expenses over 18 years + premium for looks, intelligence, height, etc.

That could be a very sweet deal, and men will suddenly be rather valued by women who choose to forgo any efforts towards attracting men into a mutually beneficial pair-bond.

Wanna be a bitch? Have at it. If you want kids, you will pay for it.

There's step one in creating a society that values men: bring their reproductive value up to the same value as women's by prohibiting the use of their genetic material without explicit consent. Now on to step two: the presumption of shared parenting. Just as men and women are afforded equal reproductive rights, so too shall they be accorded equal parenting rights.

The genetic offspring of two individuals is the rightful custodial responsibility of both equally.

Wanna break up your relationship? Have at it. But you will not take the children with you.

This also creates a market. Let's say a woman whom no man has consented to have a child with desperately wants children. She will have to prove her worth to the man by parenting his existing children brilliantly. This is gender neutral, of course. A man who wishes to have more children will also have to parent a woman's existing children very well to prove his worth.

Both of these laws instantly provide men with something they currently lack under feminist acknowledgements: worth. Of course, men are inherently worthwhile as human beings – I am simply highlighting the fact that feminists ascribe them no worth, and describing that truth, as Karen notes, is not endorsing it.

Women have gotten away with shit from time immemorial because we have the babies. No society can live without us. It is the sole source of our value and always will be. A society in which all women are brilliant engineers and not one of them will have children is a dead society.

Let's give men the same value.

No human child may be born without the express and on-going consent of the adults involved.

The genetic offspring of two individuals is the rightful custodial responsibility of both equally.

Reproductive equality is the key to making a society that cares about men as much as women. Equality leads to more equality?

Yep.

Lots of women ain't gonna like that.

Tough shit.

Ed. note: this post originally appeared here and is reprinted with permission.]

NOW bullied politicians into killing programs designed to help fathers

Prentice Reid · 12 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

In a previous article I exposed the largest feminist group in existence, the National Organization for Women (NOW), consistently opposing shared parenting bills that would ensure capable fathers had equal time with their children. In this article I will illustrate NOW's repeated declaration that government programs to help fathers were unconstitutional because they did not include women.

The first instance of NOW opposing a program designed to help fathers was in 1999 where they declared that a bill created for a program called Fathers Count was unconstitutional because the program did not include women. The only purpose of the program was to help unemployed fathers find jobs so that they could pay child support and avoid jail-time. Here's a direct quote straight from NOW explaining why they opposed the bill:

> "Because they(the bill's authors) tie the Federal benefits available under the act to gender(i.e. "fatherhood") these provisions violate the equal protection guarantee of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution"

NOW didn't even attempt to hide their gynocentric bias in their explanation about why they were opposing the bill. They just flat-out stated that programs to help fathers did not "protect" women under the Fifth Amendment. So EVERY bill that helps or protects men must either protect women equally or protect women-only according to NOW's rationale. To illustrate how hypocritical they were keep in mind that at the same time they were complaining about this program only benefiting women in 1999 they were declaring in their own newsletters that their goal in 2000 was to elect as many feminist women to office as possible.

In 2006 NOW stated that responsibilities before rights was their agenda for dads. This was in direct response to fathers' rights groups wanting shared parenting so that fathers could have equal time with their children. How can a feminist movement that claims to be about equality make this sort of statement?

In 2007, during the Bush Administration, NOW once again swooped in to declare a Federal program designed to help fathers was unconstitutional because the wording describing the program did not include women as well. The program was called The Promoting Responsible Fatherhood Initiative and it was focused on teaching fathers job skills and helping them connect with their children. $50 million dollars in help for dads was at stake.

NOW filed a lawsuit declaring sex discrimination and the government buckled under and made the program available to women. This still was not good enough for NOW. The Washington Post stated:

> "If a woman says she wants to apply and it's not happening, we want to know about it," said Tara Wall, at the Administration for Children and Families, the HHS agency that oversees the grants. "Yes, fathers are the target group, but at the same time allowing equal access is required."

Problem solved? Not exactly, said NOW President Kim Gandy: "The proposals they received and funded clearly indicate that they only intend to serve fathers."

The seething jealousy NOW has historically exhibited towards anything helping fathers (and by extension helping children through fathers) was on full-display in their opposition to The Promoting Responsible Fatherhood Initiative. If they really cared about helping children it wouldn't matter to them that a program was helping empower fathers because it would be obviously beneficial to families but their gripe was specifically with the fact that this initiative was improving the status of fathers which elicited the hyper-competitiveness we have witnessed from feminists in any program or occupation they see men prospering.

In 2014, President Obama, created a program for identifying issues of disadvantage facing young male minorities called My Brother's Keeper. Immediately NOW swooped in and started pressuring the government to make the program include girls. As expected, they were indeed successful in getting Obama to include girls in the program.

The only reason that NOW did not flat-out declare this program unconstitutional was more than likely due to the fact that it was focused on minorities and openly opposing it would be too politically incorrect for NOW since it loves to operate under the guise of caring for the same black community it helped destroy by fighting programs and bills designed to help disadvantaged fathers in the first place. However, they vehemently kept the pressure on the officials in charge of the program until they scrambled and focused part of the program on girls and even when they did finally include separate programs for girls it was not good enough because according to NOW "separate is not equal". To quote from NOW's statement:

> "The White House report 'Women and Girls of Color: Addressing Challenges and Expanding Opportunity,' was released today in response to the calls of the African American Policy Forum and many allied advocates, including NOW, for a realignment of the My Brother's Keeper initiative (MBK). Unfortunately, it misses the mark.
>
> The report catalogues the Administration's accomplishments for women — all women — while noting that many girls and women of color benefit from those policies. It also invokes the concept of intersectionality, noting that 'the challenges women and girls of color face … often lie at the intersection of race and gender.'
>
> But the report's announcement of an initiative parallel to MBK, a 'Working Group on Challenges and Opportunities for Women and Girls of Color', is the wrong response. Firstly, separate is not equal."

Separate is not equal? I counted 47 female-only programs across the nation and was only able to find one program focused on males and that program of course was My Brother's Keeper. NOW nor any other feminist group is demanding the federal or state governments include boys in any of these 47 female-only programs so their cry about how "separate is not equal" is beyond hypocritical.

The Heart Truth

http://www.nhlbi.nih.gov/health/educational/hearttruth/

National Women's Health Week

http://womenshealth.gov/nwhw/

National Women and Girls HIV/AIDS Awareness Day

http://www.womenshealth.gov/nwghaad/

National Community Centers of Excellence in Women's Health

https://www.cfda.gov/?s=program&mode=form&tab=step1&id=9d2c58438f93677b8be9902417846df3

HIV Prevention Programs for Women

https://www.cfda.gov/?s=program&mode=form&tab=step1&id=5b7e9a6cf626ff4df8378459583c4ae8

Office on Women's Health at CDC

http://www.cdc.gov/women/

African American Women and Mass Media (AAMM) Campaign

http://www.cdc.gov/cancer/breast/what_cdc_is_doing/aamm.htm

The WISEWOMAN program

http://www.cdc.gov/wisewoman/

The Office of Research on Women's Health

http://orwh.od.nih.gov/index.asp

Advancing Novel Science in Women's Health Research (ANSWHR) Exploratory/Developmental Research Grants

http://www.nlm.nih.gov/ep/answhr.html

Specialized Centers of Research on Sex and Gender Factors Affecting Women's Health

http://www.niams.nih.gov/Funding/Funded_Research/orwh_scor.asp

Building Interdisciplinary Research Careers in Women's Health

http://orwh.od.nih.gov/interdisciplinary/bircwh/index.asp

US Food and Drug Administration Office of Women's Health (FDA)

http://www.fda.gov/ScienceResearch/SpecialTopics/WomensHealthResearch/default.htm

Women-Owned Small Businesses (U.S Small Business Association)

https://www.sba.gov/content/women-owned-small-business-program

US Food and Drug Administration – For Women FDA

http://www.fda.gov/ForConsumers/byAudience/ForWomen/default.htm

Targeting Obesity in Young Women to Prevent the Development of Type II Diabetes (Federal Grant Program)

http://www.federalgrants.com/Targeting-Obesity-in-Young-Women-to-Prevent-the-Development-of-Type-II-Diabetes-6801.html

HRSA Office of Women's Health (U.S Department of Health and Human Services)

http://mchb.hrsa.gov/womenshealth/

Women and Girls Initiative (Environmental Protection Agency)

http://www.epa.gov/ocrpage1/womenandgirls/index.html

Women Outreach Program (U.S Department of Agriculture)

http://www.fsa.usda.gov/FSA/webapp?area=home&subject=oued&topic=ops-wn

Girl's Health

http://www.girlshealth.gov/

Center for Women Veterans

http://www.va.gov/womenvet/

Women Veterans Health Care

http://www.womenshealth.va.gov/

Women Veterans Program Minnesota

http://mn.gov/mdva/resources/healthdisability/womenveteransprogram.jsp

Women Veterans Program Massachusetts

http://www.mass.gov/veterans/women-veterans/

White House Council for Women and Girls

http://www.whitehouse.gov/administration/eop/cwg/about

White House Interagency Council on Women and Girls

http://portal.hud.gov/hudportal/HUD?src=%2Ftopics%2Fwhite_house_interagency_council_on_women_and_girls

Women's Educational Equity Act

http://www2.ed.gov/policy/elsec/leg/esea02/pg86.html

EVEN START DISCRETIONARY GRANT TO PRISONS THAT HOUSE WOMEN AND CHILDREN

http://www2.ed.gov/programs/evenstartprison/index.html

NASA Aspire to Inspire

http://women.nasa.gov/a2i/

NASA SISTER Program

http://education.gsfc.nasa.gov/sister/

Clean Energy Education and Empowerment "C-3E" Women's Initiative (Department of Energy)

http://energy.gov/articles/clean-energy-education-and-empowerment-c-3e-women-s-initiative

ADVANCE: Increasing the Participation and Advancement of Women in Academic Science and Engineering Careers (National Science Foundation)

http://www.nsf.gov/funding/pgm_summ.jsp?pims_id=5383

Administration on Aging (AoA) National Education and Resource Center on Women and Retirement Planning (US Department of Health and Human Services)

http://www.aoa.gov/AoA_programs/Elder_Rights/Women_in_Retirement/index.aspx

U.S Department of Labor Women's Bureau

http://www.dol.gov/wb/

Women in Apprenticeship and Nontraditional Occupations Act (WANTO)

http://www.dol.gov/wb/federalregister3-30-2010.htm

Green Jobs for Women

http://www.dol.gov/wb/media/green.htm

Office on Violence Against Women

http://www.justice.gov/ovw

Violence Against Women Grant Programs

http://www.justice.gov/ovw/grant-programs

Enhanced Training and Services to End Violence and Abuse of Women Later in Life

https://www.cfda.gov/?s=program&mode=form&tab=step1&id=ebc1f1481f4cf4480ad4b17eaf54e772

Education, Training and Enhanced Services to End Violence Against and Abuse of Women with Disabilities Grant Program

http://www.grants.gov/web/grants/view-opportunity.html?oppId=215013

NYC Women's Health

http://www.nyc.gov/html/hhc/gouverneur/html/services/women.shtml

Illinois Women's Healthcare Portal

http://health.illinois.gov/woman.html

Women, Infants and Children(WIC)

http://www.nutrition.gov/food-assistance-programs/wic-women-infants-and-children

Free Women's Self Defense Program Virginia

http://www.fairfaxcounty.gov/police/services/women-self-defense.htm

Women's Way North Dakota

http://www.ndhealth.gov/womensway/

Office of Women's Health Arizona

http://www.azdhs.gov/phs/owch/women/index.htm

USAID Women's Empowerment

http://www.usaid.gov/what-we-do/gender-equality-and-womens-empowerment

Removing your nuts for the she-squirrel

AVfM Video Source · 13 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Terry Popp takes a look at the way women prefer to carry out domestic violence. It starts with joint email accounts and ends with your balls in her purse.

Popp is a very naughty boy. You should definitely not subscribe.

Brittney Cooper's very personal "political" problems

Mumia Ali · 13 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

"The personal is political."
-Carol Hanisch

You know, I'm often asked: why do I bang on so much about Black women in general (NOT all), and Black feminists in particular? After all, don't Black men have their stuff with them too – and why am I not addressing that?

Well, these are all highly legitimate questions. As to the latter though, my readers and interlocutors will have to wait for a future column to know my answer; as for the former, however, I'm all too happy to sate your curiousity right now:

Because Black feminists in particular, are the gift that just keeps on giving.

So it is the case with Brittney "Prof. Crunk" Cooper, part of the Black feminist corps of social justice warriors, whose blatherings have made it onto my very own watch list. Every so often I check in with the blog collective she co-founded the Crunk Feminist Collective, to see what inanity they've just freshly cooked up – and the good professor, once again, didn't disappoint.

Writing last week about attending a Black Media Matters panel at Harvard U at the behest of the Black Law Students Association, Cooper notes:

> "So sitting in that room full of mega-intelligent, accomplished young Black folks, inevitably our panel turned to the question of "positive media representations." When I indicated that I wasn't particularly invested in seeing positive black folks on screen, so much as complex and interesting Black folk, one young sister asked me all exasperated, "why can't we just have Black women in normal relationships on tv?!"
>
> It made me think back to that moment, as a 20-something, in grad school, whole world right out ahead. I wanted those same things, too. A banging career, a good dude, a couple of kids.
>
> And before I knew it, I found myself being far more transparent than I had intended on being with her. Because I know how much (cisgender, straight) professional Black women's deep longings for certain kinds of partnership and female friendships drives our engagement with visual representation, I asked her, "what happens if you do everything quote unquote 'right' and it still doesn't work out for you that way?"
>
> These are the kinds of questions that being single in one's 30s and spending too many long, cold winter nights alone will have you asking."

Thus begins what would amount to a nearly 1,300 word, poignant accounting of where Prof. Cooper is in her life; a grand display of the Rationalization Hamster in action if there ever was one. She starts off by crediting (Black) Feminism itself for assuaging her failures as a woman:

> "Feminism will help you get free. Without feminism and the frameworks it has provided me, I don't know that I would have had the good sense to see all the things I see now in the way that I do. I think I would have thought my perpetually single self a failure at life and the things that matter, if feminism hadn't taught me to see all the awesome things I do have. I couldn't have embraced my rage, or made it productively political. I wouldn't believe we could change the world. I wouldn't have known I could simply throw off all the old ways of thinking that were holding me back."

And it all goes downhill from there.

Why am I bringing all this up?

Well, because in my past two columns on Cooper, I made the case that what ails Black women in our time isn't "racism" or "white supremacy" or "Kyriarchy" or whatever flavor of the month made up word they choose to use at the moment, but rather decisions and choices they have made themselves – and as such, can be remediated by themselves.

For example, I've made the case that Black women, as a group and in aggregate, have a serious weight problem. But, they CAN address that – achieving the dual goals of improving their health, and, improving their mating prospects. This is something that most directly addresses Cooper herself, as she is most assuredly obese – and as such, the Brothas in her social world will not want to mate with her, because of her being so obese makes her very unattractive. There, I've said it.

And I will keep saying it, until it sinks in.

Because, it is the truth. The truth that Black women like Cooper need to hear, from Black men themselves.

Now, don't get me wrong – it's not like Cooper and other seriously weight-scale challenged Sistas, don't know this – they do. Cooper talked about it at length herself, almost exactly three years ago, in fact.

But, you see, women can and will follow the lead of men, no matter – especially – when women shriek to the contrary. And, you see, the Brothas of Cooper's milieu – you know, college educated, white-collar professional – well, they're not particularly known for being all that outspoken. Most will toe the party line, even if they don't adhere to the same in their own personal lives – while others will simply vote with their feet (and other body parts) when push comes to shove as to which honeys really turn their crank. Simply put, if you're a chick like Cooper, and you want "in" on one of the more conventionally desirable Brothas of Black American life, trying to holla when your dress size is a high double-digit figure just ain't gonna get it.

And that's just for starters.

So, to recap before moving on to my next point: (Black) Feminism cannot, and will not, address the biggest (pardon the pun) problem besetting (Black) women in our time, though they will try, bless their heart. But, as men who study human mating know well, attraction cannot be negotiated – or legislated – into being.

Nor can it be shamed into existence, either – and here we turn to Federalist columnist Ms. Amy Otto, whose article "The Envy Gap" really drives home what truly holds (Black) women like Cooper back:

Themselves.

Ms. Otto:

> "Recently, an unflattering photo of Cindy Crawford from a Marie Claire photo shoot came to light. Despite the evident poor lighting, heavy filter usage, and now alleged photoshopping that contributed directly to a likely inaccurate and certainly unflattering photo for Crawford, the overwhelming cheers at this "revelation" were revealing. The barely concealed joy from many women seizing an opportunity to tear Crawford down was palatable.
>
> The worst part is that these same women framed it as supportive of Crawford. Heralding this photo as "truth" says more about what drives some women than whether Crawford is still a stunner. Spoiler, she is. This reaction is a fundamental reason why more legislation won't bring equity to western women. The real gap between men and women is the one not often discussed. It's the envy gap.
>
> "No matter where the photo came from, it's an enlightenment – we've always known Crawford was beautiful, but seeing her like this only makes us love her more," Marie Claire posted on its website. Women tripping over themselves to "congratulate" Crawford for a solitary unflattering photo aren't supporting her. If love is only doled out to other women from women when they are at their worst, one might worry at incentive system they're creating. Cindy Crawford is quite aware of the dynamic and does the mandatory self-denigration ritual to remain acceptable to other women."

Then, Ms. Otto really goes in:

> "Women engaged in this stampede of weaponized envy are at the root of why women shy away from achievement. The enforced norm in female culture of managing expectations down to the lowest common denominator needs to stop. The fact is, Crawford per this recent photo is still spectacular-looking.
>
> Some women simply cannot stand that she is stunning despite that having no bearing on who they are. Instead, many women leap with a barely concealed glee when there might be an opportunity to redistribute what they do not possess. Within the same week, women were foaming at the mouth over this woman's post-pregnancy body as if she was violently attacking them with her well-recovered abs. She did not get the memo about keeping her expectations in line with the lowest common denominator and instead took her passion for fitness and demonstrated how it can help your body during and after pregnancy."

Boom! Prof. Cooper, are you taking notes?

For the obtuse among us, let me tie all of the strands in this article into a tidy little bow:

1. Brittney Cooper is obese in a very noticeable way. She knows this. She has written, at length, about how it has negatively affected her chances toward mating. Yet, she chooses to do nothing about it.

2. She turns to Feminism, particularly its Black variant, as a salve toward rationalizing why she's a failure in this area of her life. By somehow "changing the culture," she will be able to bring the idea of female attractiveness, and by extension (Black) mens' expectations of same, down to the lowest common denominator, as Ms. Otto observes above.

3. But, IT HAS NOT WORKED. She has not succeeded in attracting suitors who are able to appreciate the "real her," nor has she attained any real sense of happiness with her supposed "freedom" from being partnered; indeed, it seems that every time she takes to her keyboard it's in Id-Monster fueled rage at conventionally attractive (white) women, like Patricia Arquette and Iggy Azalea.

And this is what is really important about today's column: what has actually worked. Black folk like Cooper tend to remain yoked to the university ghetto, because there they don't have to actually DO anything, PRODUCE anything; they don't have to actually GET RESULTS for those they claim to care about and represent. All they have to do is talk a lot of silly talk, sound pithy and get daps from their fellow flatterers, unquestioned. Nor is this in any way anything new; as Thomas Sowell notes in his excellent work, "Intellectuals & Society", that this is precisely how the academy in our time operates; not with the constrained acknowledgement of the possible, but with a grossly out of step with reality view of humanity. Simply put, there is NOTHING that will change the minds of the most eligible of Black men in American life to partner up with a grossly obese, think she knows it all but in reality knows nothing Sista like Cooper. That should have been made brutally obvious and painfully clear by now at her age; but, you see, the power of the Female Herd Mentality is such that she can allow herself to be deluded into believing the exact opposite of what reality actually holds.

Black feminists, who really take their marching orders from their White counterparts, want to "dumb down" the attractiveness standards of Black women to their lowest point so that Black women who don't make the cut, regardless as to how many mediocre achievements they have (after all, how hard is it to be in the African-American studies department at university, hmm?), and worse, refuse to do anything about the state of affairs they put themselves in in the first place. Even many Black women themselves know this, but they won't openly discuss it, for fear of the Black Borg Hivemind, this time in the form of Black feminists, coming after them for it.

Again, as Sowell points out above, ideas advocated by our putative best and brightest can and should be measured and assessed for their effectiveness. Based on the writings by her own hand, Black feminism has not helped Prof. Cooper find happiness – only one data point among many in a long and documented track record of failures for Black feminism to deliver on the promises of a better life for Black women en masse. If its own proponents cannot achieve what they advocate, it can and should give Black women in aggregate serious pause.

So, I propose a much simpler, easier to achieve program to assist Black women like Prof. Cooper:

1. Lose the weight. Doesn't have to be a ton (pardon the pun), but it does have to be noticeable. Focus especially on the waistline – if your gut exceeds your bustline in profile, it's not a good look. Fix it. By any means necessary (working out, changing diet, Spanx, going under the knife, etc., et al).

2. Fix the attitude. Contrary to what Good Black Men(TM) will say, they really aren't interested, or impressed, by your "achievements." Don't get me wrong, there's nothing wrong with you doing you, but that's really not the reason how or why a man is interested in you. Beyond the sex, he's interested in your softness, your femininity, and what you can bring to the table that supports him along these lines. Doesn't mean you have to be a Stepford Wife, but being a "sassy" ball-busting harpie that's out to seize the patriarchal parapet is a bona fide bonerkiller. Believe it.

3. Sephora. If you got the extra shekels to spend – and Sistas like Cooper most certainly do – you need to definitely hit them up. Early and often.

4. And for God's sake, get a hairstyle that actually works with you, not against you. Contrary to actual belief, Black men really don't like Black women who try to look like non-Black women – nor do they roll with Sistas who haven't found the right au natural hairstyle to rock either. Fortunately, there are many places in the country where a Black woman can go to get real assistance in these matters. They should avail themselves of these.

And perhaps most importantly:

5. Understand that the most desirable of Brothas, can and will play this fact of their existence to the hilt, and all that comes with it. Chances will be very high that you won't be the only gal in his rotation, and if you're OK with that, then by all means go for it; but by all accounts, this isn't the case for the vast majority of Sistas out there. You WILL have to adjust your desire parameters accordingly; the hotter he is, the more accomplished, the more high-visibility he is, the more likely he is to defect. Choose what you will and will not go for in a man accordingly.

Doing just these five things, alone, can and will vastly improve the lives of Black women. Nor does it require congressional mandates or bills signed into law by President Obama; it doesn't require changing the hearts and minds of White folks, or Black men for that matter; and it won't require confabs at tony university settings that ain't really talking about nothin' anyway. All of what I have mentioned above can be done by Black women themselves, often individually, without the permission or even foreknowledge of Whites, Black men or anyone else.

And they've proven to work.

But that brings us to another question:

Do Black women really want solutions to their problems?

That, will be the topic of a future column. Stay tuned…

Women voters: Adolf Hitler was the Justin Beiber of dictators

Prentice Reid · 13 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Plenty of cultural and media discourse has been dedicated to blaming the popularity and power Adolf Hitler achieved on men, so much so that it has become cliché, but rarely is an in-depth examination of the part women played in the adoration for Hitler presented. In the German elections of 1930 Hitler's National Socialist Party received more votes from women than any other party despite not nominating a single woman to the party and despite the competing parties nominating a combined 637 women to their parties in an effort to win the female vote.

GERMAN WOMEN BACKING HITLER

Flatly Informs Them That Officeholding Is Man's Job

Munich, Germany.— (AP) —Adolf Hitler, leader of the German fascist movement, is one modern politician who gets a big feminine vote for his party by telling women that government is a man's job.

After grabbing the reins of power Adolf became known as "Handsome Adolf" as Western media outlets like Time Magazine gushed over his deep blue eyes and his sex appeal.

TIME IN PARTNERSHIP WITH CNN

Monday, Aug. 24, 1936

GERMANY: Next Best Thing

Next Best Thing Devoted Nazis are fond of telling with utmost seriousness about the great German industrialist who found his daughter moping, tried to cheer her up by telling her she could have whatever she wanted for her birthday. "Alas, father, rich as you are, you cannot get me the only thing I want." "And what is that, daughter?" "Oh, if only I could have a child by Hitler!" With many a melting, impressionable Gretchen now in this state of mind, "Handsome Adolf" Hitler was seated last week at the Olympic Aquatic

TIME IN PARTNERSHIP WITH CNN

Monday, Nov. 19, 1934

GERMANY: Adorable

That RealmleaderHitler, still a bachelor at 45, now intends to beget instead of appoint his successor is common report in Berlin.* Many a credulous Berliner has heard the story that Handsome Adolf said recently to a male intimate: "I shall marry a German woman of the noblest blood. But whom? So many are all around me with their hopes in their eyes."

TIME IN PARTNERSHIP WITH CNN

Monday, Oct. 06, 1930

GERMANY: Handsome Adolf

All epoch-making revolutionary events have been produced not by the written but by the spoken word!

Adolf Hitler

In this rare video footage of Adolf Hitler during a public appearance, you can be forgiven for mistaking him for Elvis Presley based on the masses of women screaming in displays of lust for him and literally crying due to being overcome with affection for Handsome Adolf.

https://youtu.be/DHHZti93bgU

The female fanaticism for Hitler is exemplified by the fact that the dream of young women back then was to dedicate their fertile wombs to him for producing more Aryans for the German state.

As late as 1944 just a year before Hitler lost control of Germany German women were instrumental in pressuring defeated male soldiers back into the war to continue the fight.

German Women Backing Hitler

MADRID, Oct. 12—Airplane travelers from Germany reported today that the Nazis are systematically exploiting the mystic adoration of millions of German women for Adolf Hitler, their "Schoen Adolf," to keep the Reich in the war.

They said the propaganda minister, Paul Joseph Goebbels, directed his major propaganda at the women who inspire defeated and battle-weary Nazi troops to go back to the front lines for a new stand.

Tens of thousands of women like concentration camp guard Irma Grese, aka "The Beautiful Beast", were complicit in Nazi activities and Grese herself was hung after the war. Countless numbers of women also snitched on neighbors or husbands which helped keep the concentration camps full of inmates. Housewife Erna Petri dragged 6 children into the woods and coldly shot them in the back of the head at point-blank range. The youngest of the children was only 6 years old.

This is the side of the story about Nazi Germany that is rarely ever told. Certainly the men during that time period need to be held historically accountable but let's hold the women responsible equally accountable.

Lynched by the feminist mob-ette

Dr. Tanveer Ahmed · 14 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I have been considerably disempowered after writing about male disempowerment. Wading into the treacherous, virulent, oestrogen laden waters of modern feminism I have learnt that the gender wars are seen by many as a zero sum game, much like poker or derivatives trading.

After writing in the Australian last month about the limited discussion of male disempowerment in the context of domestic violence, I was treated to an orgy of abuse, threats and complete mis-representation. The attacks were distributed in the convergent media – online, mobile and television.

The article was partly in response to my own experience of seeing relatives and patients who had been violent to their partners. I despised them as a child and adolescent, but with maturity and an education, came to understand that they experienced the social upheaval forced upon them through migration as a kind of humiliation.

I was labeled a misogynist and a blamer of women. Threatening messages were left at my practice. Nurses at my psychiatric hospital in western Sydney took me aside to apply their counseling skills to the public assaults on my character. 'You've really pissed some people off, doc. Are you OK?' This encounter occurred while actual patients were threatening self harm on the ward.

I had morphed into a wife beater and misogynist still pining for the patriarchy after suggesting violence is often an expression of underlying distress. It is alright to try to understand those sanctioned as bona fide victims oppressed by power, but anyone we see as privileged perpetrators are not entitled to exercises in illumination.

The saga was given extra juice for I was closely connected with the White Ribbon movement, a campaign whereby men wear a looped ribbon on their chest and encouraged other blokes not to bash women. My face was one of five to feature in their campaign. I had even gone to Pakistan a few years ago to help expand the campaign there, funded by AusAid. I met furtive, male activists in the cosmopolitan town of Lahore, female victims of abuse at the stronghold of Sufi mysticism in Multan and radicals who were incensed that violence against women was even stigmatised in the madrasah capital of Pakistan, the desert town of Bahawalpur.

Meanwhile, Western feminists remain focused on elite issues such as the pay of women on corporate boards or the wages of millionaire Hollywood actresses, as bemoaned by Patricia Arquette at the Oscars.

Fairfax polemicist Clementine Ford, described by Andrew Bolt as "some feminist with bared tattoos," criticised my views for using the sneakiest, most privileged tool of the patriarchy, a "veneer of reason." She also illustrated the ridiculousness of modern feminism being criticised as man hating, by writing "I don't have time for men's woe-betide-me feelings."

Two nights after my column was published, Labor politician Tim Watts spoke in federal Parliament calling for my resignation. I watched online bemused by it all. An emergency teleconference was held with the administrators of White Ribbon. They asked for a clarifying statement, only to publish a press release the following day outlining how the CEO Libby Davies was shocked and that I was sorry for my views. I wasn't sorry for my views, only that they were so horribly misrepresented. The contradiction was highlighted further by White Ribbon Australia's chief scientific advisor, Dr Michael Flood, who had co-authored several studies across the region confirming male disempowerment as a growing factor driving violence against women.

A British men's group published a story titled "Global feminism goes into meltdown as male supporter reveals he has a mind of his own." A parallel, splinter group also called White Ribbon focused on violence against both sexes, begun by the global founder of women's shelters Erin Pizzey, wrote an open letter of support on their website. I later learnt that the local White Ribbon movement was embroiled in a legal wrangle with the site for using the name without permission. I felt like a newly adopted child caught amid divorce proceedings.[Note]

Male victims of violence emailed me their stories of abuse and I was invited to speak at an upcoming conference in Toronto about modern masculinity, all expenses paid. Several local academics wrote to me, on strict conditions of anonymity, to tell me about how difficult it was to speak openly and scientifically about this issue in their departments.

Fellow psychiatrist and Marxist writer, Dr Tad Tietze, told me that I was seen by sections of the Left as an "Uncle Tom," a term used for race traitors. This struck a chord because my wife and family joked that my growing inability to tolerate chilli laden food was a sign I was becoming a coconut: dark on the outside, white within. I was condemned to befriend other such traitors of my ilk, such as self-hating Jews, house Negroes and bananas – those outwardly Chinese in appearance but eager to adopt white, middle class ways to ease their desire for social climbing.

The White Ribbon site continued to be mobbed by posts demanding my resignation. Despite the group being about men, the hundreds of angry posts were entirely from women. The following day, White Ribbon issued a statement that the calls for my resignation were so persistent that I had been asked to step down. In a final twist in keeping with the totalitarian character of the entire episode, in order to be reinstated, I would undergo a recommitment program to make sure my views were in keeping with the movement. I packed my ribbon away in a basement drawer and sheepishly returned to my practice, no longer an ambassador for the cause, and resumed writing prescriptions for psychoactive drugs.

Editor's note: White Ribbon Australia CEO Libby Davies apparently misled Dr. Ahmed about a legal wrangle with Erin Pizzey's WhiteRibbon.org. There is no legal wrangle; no legal action whatsoever. Moreover, there exist no legal grounds for Libby Davies to take action against Erin Pizzey, her website, or her use of the 100 yr old white ribbon symbol. We are encouraged to learn Dr. Ahmed has not been dissuaded by falsehoods from sharing his perspectives about family violence.

This article first appeared in the print edition of The Spectator magazine, dated 14 March 2015 Aus Feature images used at the head of this article also credited to The Spectator.

An open letter To Rosie Batty

Mark Dent · 15 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Dear Rosie,

I am writing to you with the hope that you will reflect upon the statements you have made since becoming the Australian of the Year and in doing so reconsider your approach to the issue of Family Violence.

You have endured the unimaginable — every parent's worst nightmare and for that you have my deepest empathy and heartfelt compassion.

However, the suffering and grief you experienced and no doubt continue to experience should never be used as a shield to ward off criticism or questions about the position you have chosen to support. Once anyone chooses to be a public figure and uses their status to promote ideas I find highly dangerous and offensive and which have a direct impact upon the lives of many people then their personal experiences cannot be used to hinder/block or intimidate people from raising legitimate concerns.

You have made some remarkable statements in recent weeks. Some of these statements are even more astounding given they completely contradict things you said immediately after the murder of your son. In the days after your son's death, you said:

"What triggered this was a case of his dad having mental health issues…"

"He was in a homelessness situation for many years, his life was failing, everything was becoming worse in his life and Luke was the only bright light in his life."

"No one loved Luke more than his father. No one loved Luke more than me — we both loved him."

"And the very tragic thing about this is the father's life was tragic and based on … challenges in his life that we couldn't help him with and nor could anyone else.

In a recent interview before your address to a cross parliamentary group of MP's in Canberra you said:

"…things like drugs, alcohol and mental illness could exacerbate violence but they are not an excuse and they are not the reason…"

I would like you to explain the incredible change in your attitude toward mental illness as a contributing factor to the problem of Family Violence in such a short period of time. Could it be due to the fact that you are being coached to say these rather glib, very familiar lines by advisers who have taken you under their wing so to speak?

Given that you now believe that mental illness is no excuse for violence can you please let me know when you will begin your campaign to end the use of post natal depression as a defence (and a remarkably successful one) by women who murder their babies or stress and depression when they kill their children?

Will you also be pushing to have all cases of violent assault and murder which resulted in no jail time for the perpetrators based upon their mental state, immediately overturned and have these people thrown in prison where they belong?

You have begun to use the term gendered violence more frequently in recent interviews and speeches. Recently I read an article in which you said:

"When you are experiencing gendered violence, people often tell you what to do — but the strongest predictor of a woman's safety is the woman herself."

I would like you to explain why you call Family Violence a gendered issue? In your position as an authority on the subject, you must be fully aware of the statistics on Family Violence which tells us that around one-third of all victims are male. This is a very large minority.

The evidence in Australia is strong that around one-third of the victims of family violence are male. For instance, during 2010–11 and 2011–12, there were 121 females (62%) and 75 males (38%) killed in domestic homicides according to the latest figures just released by the Australian Institute of Criminology.

Moreover, according to the same AIC source and contrary to what was implied in the Q&A program, the number and percentage of domestic homicides shows a moderate declining trend over the last 10 years. The Australian Bureau of Statistics' Personal Safety Survey 2012 also showed that 33.3%, exactly one in three, of the victims of violence by a current partner within the previous 12 months were male.

How is it possible for a person like you to remain silent about the suffering of one-third of the victims of this societal scourge? I watched you on the ABC program Q&A recently as you listened to a courageous man relate his personal experience of violence at the hands of his female partner. Not only did this poor man have to endure the vicious comments from the women about him calling him a liar but the panel of experts who sat beside you treated this man with the most humiliating contempt whilst you sat there, mute. You did not offer him one word of comfort or consolation. Why is your empathy so gender specific?

Rosie, your co-panelist, Natasha Stott Despoja rammed home the message that Family Violence is gendered violence only seconds after this man spoke of his suffering at the hands of a woman. How can anyone who isn't driven by ideological hatred speak such transparent lies?

Why have you and Natasha never once referred to the brutal slaying of eight children by a woman in Cairns last year? Why have you not spoken out about the two children murdered by their grandmother in Northern Queensland? Why do you never refer to the fact that neglect of children is overwhelmingly carried out by mothers? I've heard people say that these statistics are misleading because it is almost always women who care for the children at home. This is an outrageous argument. Given that people like you never even insinuate that women are capable of harming children why should any child be unsafe in their company?

Neglect was the most commonly reported form of maltreatment in children in New South Wales, Queensland, South Australia, and the Northern Territory. Evidence also suggests that mothers are more likely than fathers to be held responsible for child neglect. In a large representative study that examined the characteristics of perpetrators in substantiated cases of child abuse and neglect in the United States, neglect was the main type of abuse in 66% of cases involving a female caregiver, compared to 36% of cases involving a male caregiver (US DHHS, 2005)

A literature review by the former NSW Department of Community Services (2005) showed that there was a strong correlation between chronic neglect presentations and parental drug and alcohol use, poverty, domestic violence, mental health problems, and young single mothers. In these cases, the presenting problem for the parent distracts them from providing the necessary care for their child and frequently dominates the case planning and intervention strategies provided by child protection workers (NSW Department of Community Services, 2005).

It seems the Department of Community Services believes mental health problems poverty and drug or alcohol addictions are often the main contributing factor in cases of abuse and neglect.

Will you be writing to the Department and letting them know how disgusted you are that they should let these abusive women off the hook by suggesting there is clear evidence that drug and alcohol abuse or mental illness are predictors of abusive behaviour?

When it comes to the murder and physical abuse of children women carry out a substantial proportion of these murders.

Between July 1997 and June 2008, according to the Australian Institute of Criminology's National Homicide Monitoring Program, 291 children, in 239 incidents, were victims of filicide. The research showed women were almost as likely as men to commit filicide, with fathers responsible for the deaths of 140 children and women 127 children, over that 11-year period. The remainder were killed by both parents.

127 children were murdered by women (mums) during this eleven year period and 140 by men — more boyfriends and step dads than biological fathers. Yet every campaign on Family Violence repeatedly and deliberately uses the line (mantra) “We must protect our women and children.”

127 children killed by women and yet there is not one reference to women as perpetrators in any government-funded Family Violence campaign. How is it possible that people like you who claim to be a voice for those who are victims of family violence never mention the many children and men who are victims of violent, abusive women? It seems to suggest that your motivations are more ideologically driven than compassionate.

It seems many people in the Family Violence Business believe combining these two very distinct groups (women and children) somehow blinds us to the truth and reinforces the already prevalent (and false) belief that women can only ever be victims of violence in the home, just like their innocent children. Of course this is a fanciful lie.

These statistics are from a handful of years ago. I don’t know the exact figures for child murder over the past five years in Australia. As already mentioned, the most horrific child murders in our history took place last year and the perpetrator was a woman, a mother.

Here are some examples of children murdered by women from the last few months of 2014. Aside from the Cairns massacre:

Two children murdered by their grandmother in Caboolture, North of Brisbane. She attempted to burn alive another two grandchildren.

Newborn baby dumped in a Sydney drain by its mother and left to die. Since this incident the mother has been given permission to name her son.

A mother murdered one of her daughters and permanently maimed the other so badly she will require 24 hour care for the rest of her life. The daughter, according to newspaper reports was ”horrifically injured.” The mother has remained anonymous and had recently been granted access with the backing of the Department of Human Services to the daughter she brutally maimed.

Can you explain to me how your assertion that Family Violence is a gendered (male) issue sits in the light of these disturbing facts? Do you think Stott Despoja’s aggressive, almost angry reiteration of your view on Q and A would bring comfort to the fathers of these dead children?

You claim “gender inequality and men’s sense of entitlement-that a woman is their possession” is a major contributor to Family Violence. What then, Rosie, is the explanation for the women who kill their children with knives, stuff them down drains, burn them alive, strangle, drown or bludgeon their children to death?

Surely you wouldn’t dare to suggest there were mitigating circumstances to explain this horrendous behaviour? I see the issue of mental illness has already been raised with regard to the murderous mother from Cairns. Do you condemn this outrageous excuse making? Surely the same standard should be applied to any case of Family Violence regardless of the perpetrator’s gender?

Again, Tony Abbott, our Prime Minister and the man who presented you with your Australian of the Year award said, in response to the butchering of eight children by a mother:

“We know that sometimes people break. We also know there are difficult circumstances people deal with. This is a social issue as well as a law enforcement issue, but I’ll be there in solidarity with them.”

This sounds dangerously like excuse making, Rosie. It seems our PM is suggesting outside forces were at play. We all know however that Abbott would never utter such words if a father had just sliced up eight of his children. You and the whole industry that supports you would have launched a torrent of white hot abuse in Abbott’s direction condemning his suggestion that the problem was anything other than the masculinity of the perpetrator and his sense of “male entitlement.”

How would you have responded if Tony has said in relation to the loss of your son: “Rosie, sometimes people break — we know there are difficult circumstances people deal with.”

I believe you would have thrown your award back in his face.

But women's violence and abuse is not confined to attacks on children.

There are many horrific accounts of men being murdered in unimaginable ways by their wives and female partners. Perhaps you are not familiar with the story of Katherine Knight who stabbed and beat many of her male partners before finally killing John Price by stabbing him over 30 times and then expertly skinning him and cooking his head in a pot. A woman in South Australia burned her husband alive when she suspected him of having an affair. Women have hacked off their sleeping husbands' penises, shot them, stabbed them, beaten them or arranged for someone else to kill them.

A member of my family, Walter Hughes, was kicked to death by a drug addicted woman as he made his way home from the local shops. You may have read about it in one of these stories:

http://www.heraldsun.com.au/news/victoria/blind-man-kicked-to-death-court-told/story-e6frf7kx-1226022759761

His story is not unique. Others like it are not hard to find. Some random examples:

http://australian-news.net/articles/view.php?id=111 http://www.abc.net.au/news/2012-06-01/woman-admits-castration-killing-of-ex-partner/4046884
http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-2698261/Woman-charged-murder-headless-torso-identified-partner-thanks-blood-pressure-drugs-system.html

Please explain to me how these facts sit comfortably with your assertion that Family Violence is a male problem for which all men must be held accountable?

You have spoken out about the fact that you believe a great deal of victim blaming goes on when tragic incidents like the one involving your son take place. In fact just this week you demanded that we stop blaming the victims of domestic violence and the focus should be on "perpetrator accountability." When are women who kill or abuse held accountable?

I find it incredibly ironic to hear you claim that any woman who chooses to live with or marry a man and then have him father their children is in no way responsible for what flows from that union, yet in the very next breath you hold all men accountable:

Ms Batty called on the Government to dedicate long-term secure funding to fighting family violence and urged the community to "speak up" against sexist attitudes.

"Do not ignore what you see and what you know is wrong,"

"To men, we need you to challenge each other and become part of the solution."

Men can only be part of the solution if you believe they are part of the problem. Could you seriously look me in the eye and tell me I bear more responsibility for the death of your son than you do? That sounds like a shocking question yet you have no hesitation in applying the broad brush of collective guilt over all men.

I find that highly shocking and offensive.

Aside from the fact that suggestions like "challenging each other" or "having a chat with your mates" is simply meaningless drivel that leaves feminist feeling warm and fuzzy and men feeling "guilty" for crimes of violence simply because they happen to share the gender of the perpetrator, it achieves absolutely nothing.

If you truly believed Family Violence will drastically decrease if men tell their mates not to beat up their wives and girlfriends then it is no surprise that the problem has not been eradicated after forty years of male demonization.

Perhaps we should encourage men to also have a chat with their mates and work colleagues suggesting they should not rob banks, steal cars, drive too fast, swear at the footy, vandalise property, take illegal drugs or drink to excess. We would be living in a veritable utopia in no time! I can't believe this is the type of advice coming from the mouths of "experts" who sit on advisory councils to direct on the National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children.

Why have you not asked the women of Australia to have a chat about the apparent propensity of some mothers to murder and abuse their children? What sense of entitlement drives them to commit such violent abuse? Yes, a good chat with the girlfriends over a cuppa or chardy should quickly address that problem. It really is an asinine idea isn't it, Rosie?

You may well help some women with your role as Australian of the Year and bringing attention to areas you believe will make women safer from violent abuse and that is a good thing. However, you are doing untold damage by helping to promote the evil notion that only one gender is capable of harming their children or partners.

Men who are suffering abuse will already struggle to speak out — anyone who witnessed that brave man on Q and A will realise that there is no empathy and no help available to them. If a man cannot receive a fair hearing and compassion on a program focusing on the problem of Family Violence, then why would he try to tell his mates or the local police? So you are a part of the industry which deliberately silences and ignores male victims. I wonder how many of the men who suicide do so because they are trapped in an abusive relationship?

I will leave you with an analogy which I think perfectly illustrates the sickening bigotry of your current approach to Family Violence.

Imagine you are the parent of a daughter who took her own life. You are in deep shock and grief and desperately searching for some support, comfort and validation. You call suicide help lines and suicide support groups but you are informed that there are no support groups or help lines for female victims of suicide because they only constitute a minority of those who take their own life. Others simply laugh at the idea a female could take her own life or refuse to believe you.

In fact of the approximately 2,500 suicides carried out each year, a little over 1900 of them are carried out by males. There is a bigger gulf between male and female suicides than exists between male and female victims of Family Violence yet no one has ever referred to suicide as a "gendered" problem.

You give up in despair but one night you see the promotion for a television program which will have a panel of experts discussing the societal scourge of suicide. You attend the program as an audience member. You listen to the first 55 minutes of the discussion and you are told repeatedly that suicide is a gendered issue. Men and boys are the sole focus of the conversation. This is clearly just as it should be when you understand that men are over three times as likely as women to take their own lives. We acknowledge that there can be the occasional female death by suicide but we cannot let this in any way undermine or detract from the real focus of our concern–males.

With heart pounding and a sense of trepidation you meekly raise your hand and in a choking voice try to explain the incredible pain you and your family has endured after the loss of your beautiful daughter. You ask why there is no assistance offered to families who have lost a daughter. The panelists nod before aggressively asserting once again that suicide is a gendered issue and we cannot shift from this understanding or be derailed from our focus on boys and men. Rapturous applause and head nodding ensue.

End of discussion.

Many people have labelled you "courageous" for taking the stance you have on Family Violence and for becoming a public figure. You may well be a courageous person but I see nothing brave about preaching a message already supported and applauded by a gullible, deluded public and a deceitful, manipulative government and media. It is people like the man who spoke up about the lack of compassion and recognition for male victims of Family Violence who demonstrate true courage for they are swimming against a tidal wave of hate-filled, bigoted ideology fuelled by the likes of you.

Yours sincerely,

Mark Dent

http://www.theage.com.au/federal-politics/political-news/stop-blaming-the-victim-rosie-batty-to-address-mps-20150302-13sx55.html

University of Wisconsin panel: men accused of rape should not be innocent until proven guilty

Pierce Harlan · 15 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The anti-due process voices on campus aren't bothering to sugarcoat their message anymore. At the University of California-Berkeley a few weeks ago, students protested the very notion that their classmates accused of rape should be treated fairly. At Ohio University the week before, angry protesters called due process for college men accused of rape "bullshit." At Penn, angry law students objected to the very idea that 16 of their law professors would go to bat for fair procedures in sexual assault cases.

Last night, anti-due process voices dominated a panel discussion on campus rape at the University of Wisconsin-Madison. According to The College Fix:

> A woman who identified herself as a teaching assistant stood up and said she did not feel that the notion of innocent until proven guilty should apply to rape cases because it only helps protect the rights of the accused instead of the victim.
>
> Only one of the panel members spoke out in disagreement with this statement. Klingele, the law professor, said that because she was a legal scholar, she had to disagree with this premise.

One student said she was "horrified" to discover that her accused rapist had due process rights. The rights that troubled her included the right to a hearing and the right to have a written summary of allegations from the accuser. She also decried the fact that "he was not required to speak in his defense."

The impulse to eradicate sexual violence is a noble one, but sadly, the rhetoric employed by modern feminists in pursuit of that goal is animated by a disturbing hostility to the due process rights of those legally entitled to the presumption of innocence. This is anything but a "liberal" or a "progressive" position. It is, in fact, a chilling echo of the lynch mobs that gathered at the hanging trees of the old American South for whom due process was a luxury society could not afford when it came to black men accused of rape.

Anyone who believes that the war on rape can't be waged without dispensing with fairness for the accused is woefully unschooled in concepts that are foundational to our traditions of justice, concepts that pre-date even Magna Carta. We don't require fairness in tribunals to protect rapists but to protect the innocent, and Blackstone's Formulation is a cornerstone of a civilized people. Dispensing with fairness for the accused not only hurts the innocent, it undermines trust in the system, which hurts rape victims.

Yet, last night at a major university, supposedly educated people openly disagreed with a notion that until recently seemed beyond debate — innocent until proven guilty. At least they disagreed with it when it comes to one class of citizens accused of one type of offense. The discourse borders on pathology.

We are sometimes told that "not all feminists are like that." If that is so, where are the sane and rational voices of feminism to condemn this Star Chamber mentality? All persons of good will need to stand up and declare "enough is enough."

This article originally appeared here and is reprinted with permission.

Angie Stone and Tina Campbell prove domestic violence is not a one-way street In Black America

Mumia Ali · 16 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

"When you go looking for the truth, be prepared to find it."
-Anonymous

My previous two columns, "Mo'Nique Proves That "Diva Culture" Is Ruinous To Black Women" and "Raheem DeVaughn's "Queens For A Day" have on no clothes" had barely made it into the Wayback Machine when yours truly got word of two prima facia examples of precisely what I was arguing in the aforementioned articles; Madame Noire discusses Ms. Stone:

> "Angie Stone may be done with reality television, but that doesn't mean that she has escaped the drama. According to the WSBTV, the Grammy-nominated singer was arrested Tuesday in DeKalb County.
>
> "Cops were called to a home on the 1400 block of Rogers Lake Road. Once officer's [sic] arrived, Angie alleged that her daughter, Diamond Stone, had punched her in the face several times. The 53-year-old singer confessed that in retaliation, she struck Diamond in the face with a metal stand, knocking two of her front teeth out. She went on to say that once she realized what she had done, she turned to run away, but her daughter came after her.
>
> "A third person in the home, who has not been identified, was able to break up the fight by the time police arrived. According to TMZ, Angie told cops that the fight began because Diamond wasn't cleaning up after her children.
>
> "Both women were taken into custody, but Diamond was released. Angie has been charged with domestic aggravated assault."

Meanwhile, Hip Hop fixture The Source dishes on Ms. Campbell:

> "Tina Campbell, known to the world as one-half of the gospel-and-blues duo Mary Mary – "Shackles," "God In Me" – stars in Mary Mary, a We TV reality show that highlights the personal life of the gospel star, along with her husband Terry Campbell, and the other half of Mary Mary, Tina's sister Erika-Atkins Campbell.
>
> "In the trailer for the 4th season of the show, a major moment came when the clip revealed Terry Campbell's trashed car, which was reportedly a product of a fit of Tina Campbell's rage, which came after Terry admitted to having several extra-marital affairs.
>
> "'We had some days that were really bad, and the car is a clear indication of a very bad day. It was my car and she thought I could have been riding around town with another women in the car, which wasn't the case. My wife in her pain wanted to hurt me.'
>
> "It was VladTV that reported that the true story behind the trashed vehicle is that Tina took a gun to the car in her anger, and literally unloaded on the car's windshield and body. No one was inside the car at the time."

In both articles, I argued that not only was the adoption of "diva culture" a bad look for Black women in our time but that domestic violence was hardly a "one-way street" issue in Black America – that Black women very much had the capacity for wanton violence that any Black man could be accused of.

In case anyone out there wishes to poo-poo the above examples as mere gossip column fodder, consider this news story out of East Flatbush, NYC:

> "Police took another teenage girl into custody Saturday in connection with the savage gang beating of a 15-year-old girl inside a Brooklyn McDonald's — the fifth suspect apprehended in the attack that was video-> recorded by onlookers and went viral on the Internet.

>
> "A sixth suspect is still at large.
>
> "Two of the suspects, Telani Marshall, 17, and a 15-year-old girl whose name is not being released because she is being charged as a minor, appeared in court Saturday.
>
> "They were arrested in Brooklyn Friday on robbery and gang assault charges after they turned themselves in to police, according to the NYPD. Marshall was charged as an adult.
>
> "Mercedes Wilkinson, a 16-year-old Brooklyn girl, turned herself in on Saturday morning and was charged as an adult with gang assault and robbery.
>
> "One teen was taken into custody in Atlanta at the airport Friday as she sat on a plane that was set to head to Jamaica, a law enforcement official told NBC 4 New York. The NYPD alerted local authorities there, and they were able to take the girl off the plane before it departed."

Please, view the accompanying video of the vicious femme fatale gang-attack at Micky D's for yourself – and – please don't forget to check out the other stories linked to the above news story that discusses still more instances of Black Women Behaving Badly.

Why am I bringing all this up, especially in the context of a men's issues website? Why am I not addressing issues and problems that men, and Black men particularly, could better benefit from – say, schools/education, or homelessness, or police brutality? These are questions put forth by my haters, er, interlocutors, and they are quite valid ones. The following is my response:

1. Because I can.

2. See above.

3. Because it is very important for the world to know and understand, that not only don't Black men in aggregate have any advocates in these and related matters, but that they are constantly being maligned, misrepresented and portrayed in the worst possible light, regardless as to the evidence.

As avid AVFM reader and astute commenter Mr. Jack Strawb points out, the notion that Black men being solely responsible for DV in Black America is a big, fat, stubborn lie:

> "Wendy McElroy, in 'Are Domestic Violence Statistics Bogus? A dominant voice in victim-advocacy and research on domestic violence stands accused of flatly fabricating data.'
>
> "Jacquelyn C. Campbell, a professor in the Johns Hopkins University School of Nursing, is accused of fabricating 'key statements [about domestic violence] and then representing the statements as findings of a government survey.' On January 14, the victim-advocacy organization Stop Abusive and Violent Environments (SAVE) filed a formal complaint with the Office of Research Integrity of the Department of Health and Human Services. SAVE wants the unit to 'investigate these allegations of research misconduct by Dr. Campbell and colleagues, and take appropriate corrective action.' (As of January 31, the complaint has been rejected and the rejection is being appealed.)
>
> "Specific Accusations
>
> "In two highly respected journals, Campbell and various colleagues claimed that 'the leading cause of death in the United States among African American women aged 15 to 45 years' was homicide. In the American Journal of Public Health Vol. 93, No. 7, 2003, page 1089, the deaths were described as 'femicide, the homicide of women.' In the National Institute of Justice (NIJ) Journal 2003, page 18, the deaths were ascribed to 'intimate partner violence' or domestic violence homicide.
>
> "Attorney General Eric Holder repeated the domestic violence version of the statistic in a 2009 speech; he stated, 'Disturbingly, intimate partner homicide is the leading cause of death for African-American women > ages 15 to 45.' The statistic was posted in at least two places at the Department of Justice (DOJ) website. The conservative feminist Christina Hoff Sommers took exception. In USA Today (Feb. 4, 2011), she wrote, 'That's a horrifying statistic, and it would be a shocking reflection of the black family, and American society generally, if it were true. But it isn't true.'

>
> "Over two years later, the Washington Post fact checker, Glenn Kessler investigated Holder's statement and published his results. Kessler wrote that CDC 'data show that, for the year 2008 (the year before Holder's speeches), cancer, heart disease, unintentional injury and HIV/AIDS all topped homicide. Then if you break out intimate-partner homicide, that ends up being seventh or eighth on the list (depending on whether you also include all homicides.)' As a basis of comparison, in 2008, cancer killed 1,871 black females; heart disease, 1,629; all homicides, 326."

One simply has to ask: if we know these "stats" are indeed bogus, if we know – proved by eyewitness cellphone video cameras and reality television shows – that Black women can and will be quite violent – WHY does the "dangerous Black male" myth persist? WHY, are Black feminist activists (and others!) still pushing this BS line of reason/argument?

As AVFM Editor-in-Chief Mr. Paul Elam recently noted in his column, "Concerning Concern Trolls," not only is it hugely important for men (and women!) to speak truth to power on these and related issues, but that the mere act of doing so is powerful in ways many may not realize:

> "You want to know what this movement is about? It is very, very simple in my opinion. The MHRM I envision is about one simple thing. Talking without fear or capitulation.
>
> "Seriously. That is it. It is about nothing more than people talking to each other, openly and freely, in a world that does not want them to. Neither I nor AVFM has a legislative agenda, nor any politicians to endorse, nor lobbying to accomplish because none of that is of any value in a society that still refuses to accept reality.
>
> "Sure, if you look at our mission statement you will see many items that will require political and judicial remedy to ultimately accomplish. That, however is not our job at AVFM to accomplish directly. Our job is to push society to a place that it is able to sustain a narrative change that will in turn lead to sustained problem solving."

Boom.

As a Black man of blue-collar roots, it is hugely important for me to speak, loudly and clearly, about matters I care about. I care about Black men like me, who have been cowed into silence (and in some cases, shame) about what this and related articles of mine talk about. I want to create the space for Black men like me to really start speaking the heck up. I want to inspire other Black men to speak the heck up. And in doing so, it will create even more space, to address the problems the concern trolls cry crocodile tears over.

I also do this, because I want to drive home the point, that yet again Black Feminism has utterly failed Black women; it has no answers for "diva culture" or the well-documented rise in violent and antisocial behaviors on the part of Black women – indeed, if anything, it may have contributed to both in our time.

And, for those who attempt to argue that what I and other Citizen Journos in Black America – like Mr. Tommy Sotomayor, for example, are really only talking about "ghetto sistas" – let me disabuse you of that. As Solange Knowles showed us last year, and the cases of Mo'Nique, Angie Stone and Tina Campbell show us currently, "diva culture" and violent acts on the part of Black women are something that is hardly limited to the lower classes – indeed, it doesn't take one long to find much evidence of these behaviors being very much "system wide" throughout Black America. It is no respecter of Class.

Not all Black women are like that, but enough of them are like that.

It really is that simple.

And so are the solutions.

Me, speaking on it, calling it out for who and what it is, is one of them.

Mercedes Carrera on feminist-dominated media ignoring an inconvenient rape

Roosh Valizadeh · 16 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

ROK recently reported on how the home invasion rape of porn actress Cytherea was met with complete silence by feminists and the media, in spite of the fact that they are actively pushing a "rape culture" narrative where men are portrayed as privileged date rapists.

> If ever there was a story for feminists to get enraged about, this would be it. According to SJWs, America fosters a "rape culture," where sexual assault is trivialized and men are encouraged to feel "entitled" to womens' bodies. You can't get more entitled than a gang of ghetto thugs invading a woman's home and raping her at gunpoint.
>
> —From Why Are Feminists Ignoring The Violent Gang Rape Of Porn Star Cytherea?

One of Cytherea's industry colleagues, Mercedes Carrera, was instrumental in publicizing the incident and starting a fundraiser with the help of the following video, which has received over 100,000 views on Youtube:

I interviewed Ms. Carrera to find out why there has been a lack of response to Cytherea's story. Below is our conversation, with my questions in bold.

—

Can you describe your relationship with Cytherea. Is it mostly professional or are you on friendly terms with her as well? How does she feel about your involvement in publicizing what happened to her?

Cytherea is a colleague of mine and we have mutual friends. She is beloved as a veteran of the porn industry. I got involved in fundraising because I heard the story through several mutual friends, did some research, and realized that her fundraiser could use more people to additionally boost it.

When I spent a little more time on it, I was disgusted by how the mainstream media was ignoring this very relevant story (as lately there's so much talk of "rape culture", yet a real rape against a celebrity was only reported on our industry websites). I made that brief video of my frustrations then talked to Cytherea, a few of her friends and other people in the industry. All have been supportive on the video and concurred with me. Even several long time industry veterans reached out to me specifically to thank me for saying what many of them have been thinking.

For me, this is and always has been about getting as much support for Cytherea as possible. As a result of the video and fundraising, Cytherea and I are in fairly constant communication and she has said she appreciates the efforts that we have all gone to to help.

You pointed out the feminist hypocrisy of glorifying fake victims (the cases of Emma Sulkowicz and the UVA rape hoax come to mind). Feminists have a platform where they seek equality and opportunity for women, but they were eerily silent when a woman was genuinely harmed and needed help. Why do you think that is?

I believe the feminists that get media attention these days are the same ilk as the wealthy Victorian era suffragettes: wealthy white women whose panties are in a bunch over imagined slights and imagined injustices. They do not, and never have, spoken for women who are on the outside of their exclusive group. Sex workers, women of color, economically disadvantaged white women are not part of their platform. Those women who have to think about how they are going to eat or live are excluded from the conversation. Women who cannot afford $29.95 "This is what a feminist looks like" t-shirts made by female slave labor in Madagascar are excluded from the conversation.

Additionally, because this was a random example of "rape culture" and the attackers were disadvantaged young black men (not wealthy white lacrosse players) it is too complex of a social issue for them to want to delve into.

Issues of race, socioeconomics and rape cannot easily be deconstructed into the binary paradigms of “patriarchy” or “misogyny” so they’d rather ignore it altogether. Further, a sex worker is less “valuable” in their imaginary class system hierarchy than a “proper” wealthy feminist college student.

Bottom line: It cannot be politicized to fit their left marxist agenda. At the core, modern sex negative radical feminism is less about gender and more about the societal control of all groups that are not them.

In the manosphere we have a term called “red pill” to describe beliefs that go against the current cultural Marxist narrative that attempts to hide uncomfortable truths of our reality. It seems like you have come to very similar conclusions as myself and other men on Return Of Kings. What would you say are the main influences or experiences that allowed you to see the lies and fabrications that are pushed upon the masses by the media and their feminist allies?

Having had experiences in “blue pill” environments and having the faculty of discernment has led me to most of my current conclusions. Additionally, in my current environment, many of the players are surprisingly “red-pilled”. I believe this is the result of being in a fringe type industry that is often attacked by those who adhere to the current mainstream narrative. I was raised in an environment of working class people who had a lineage of, ironically, being members of the Socialist Labor Party (SLP). While I am most certainly not a member of this group, I grew up hearing stories of sedition and McCarthyism and am thus familiar with how far the reach of government, especially when working class people band together to protest the narrative.

You’ve been involved in Gamergate from the beginning, a consumer revolt against unethical journalists that have pushed the social justice narrative upon gamers. What seems to have happened in that gamergate has stopped being acute activism and now become a prolonged movement that is causing continuous damage to the SJW narrative. Do you see a connection between gamergate’s origins and how the media has been silent on Cytherea’s attack? How deep does the rot go?

I was not involved from the onset [of gamergate] but joined several months in when I saw the inequity of the reporting done by the mainstream media. What I see is a consumer revolt centered around the unjust media and corporate collusion happening in the microcosm of gaming. What I also saw were people who, instead of taking personal responsibility for their collusion, decided to paint all of their detractors as abusers and harassers.

The most out of place of these is Anita Sarkeesian, who made herself relevant by hijacking the media narrative and narcissistically turning this well needed consumer revolt into a conversation about her. Part of the reason I spoke out is these anti-sex radicals such as Sarkeesian make quite a lot of profit pretending to speak for women like myself. To me this is completely unacceptable and something I will not stand for. Additionally, having a minority female sex worker protest the media narrative that GamerGate is a misogynistic hate group has been hopefully useful in disbanding that myth.

I believe the silence on Cytherea proves again that the media is currently under the stranglehold of people who would like to monopolize the narrative for their own purposes. If rape culture is so prolific, then why not report on the rape? In fact, many of the sex-negative radicals have gone so far to victim shame and in some way disgustingly imply that because porn stars are responsible for “rape culture”, Cytherea in some way deserved the attack. This proves the point that the current anti-sex radical feminist groups are not about justice for women or about ending “rape culture” but rather are about weakening others so that they can control society with their ideology.

The truth is, that the only “rape culture” they want to focus on is that which they imagine exists on college campuses, which makes me wonder if their current targets are actually wealthy and middle class young men. If that is the case (and I believe it is) then it is consistent with a left marxist narrative to actually decimate the last remaining caste of people who might oppose their ideology.

An ideal world would ignore privileged women favored by the media such as Anita Sarkeesian and focus on genuine hardships that both women and men face. In terms of solutions, what steps do we need to take to get there? Is gamergate the ideal model for how the narrative can be beat? Or maybe you can give me direct advice since I publish sites that reach a lot of men, and increasingly as of late, women.

I wish I was as adept at identifying solutions as I am identifying problems. It seems, and correct me if I'm wrong, that the best solution would be a strong independent media. Fortunately, in spite of the current power play to monopolize the narrative, technology has allowed independent voices such as yourself to speak freely and reach larger markets than would have been possible several decades ago. I believe as independent sites pick up stories that mainstream media neglects, it will lead to you all gaining credibility as the voice of the people. Further, even though there is a current push to monopolize discourse, I believe more people than ever are questioning the drivel they are being fed by the mainstream.

Unrelated to Cytherea: Return Of Kings has a lot of male readers who are tired, frustrated, and even angry about how modern culture is pushing them aside and punishing their masculine instinct to portray them as a privileged gender that needs to pay back for the sins of men of the past. It doesn't help that modern young women are less interested in relationships with a good man than chasing 50 Shades-style excitement with bad boys. The advice I've been giving them so far is to simulate bad boy behavior by learning game or outright moving to countries that have women who primarily seek relationships. Do you have any advice for these men? What do you think they should they do?

Again, I see the problem clearly but not the solutions necessarily. I believe self awareness is key as well as not tolerating any bullshit behavior. As soon as people play games with each other their relationships are doomed. I do think there are many women out there who are just as tired of the modern culture (as is evidenced by the large female proportion of GamerGaters).

Although, at this point I would advise any young man on a college campus particularly to be especially careful when engaging sexually with a new woman and if possible have consent recorded in the form of text messages or other social media in case he is ever unfairly accused of rape. If I had a son college age, I would be particularly concerned about the rape culture hysteria and the potential possibility of false accusations (as we saw in the U.Va. case). As it stands, this behavior will be more damaging to young women than men, as more and more men decide to either marry foreign women or decline relationships altogether. I hope very much that the pendulum will swing the other way and young people will buck these trends that will have long term negative impact on their relationships.

For those who want to help Cytherea, how can they do so?

To help support Cytherea, please go to the You Caring fundraiser.

Additionally, we are collecting 30 second videos for Cytherea for those who would like to participate. #30SecondsForCytherea is the hashtag and people can email their links to me at mercedescaxxx@gmail.com. These snippets will be compiled into a video in support of Cytherea.

Thank you again for your willingness to cover this story!

—

Special thanks to Ms. Carrera for sharing her thoughts on the matter. Follow her on Twitter at @TheMercedesXXX.

This item originally published on ROK. –Eds

Auguste Comte's cult of woman

Professor Mike Gane · 16 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The following excerpts are from Engendering the end of European history: Auguste Comte's Cult of Woman at the Heart of The Western Republic by Professor Mike Gane. Auguste Comte (1798 – 1857) was the founder of the doctrine of positivism, founder of sociology (actually coining the term), and a champion of the idea that women should be placed at the reverential centre of human affairs. Read below to learn more about the Father of Sociology. — PW

August Comte

"After completing the founding study of the law of the three states in 1842, his life and thought were deeply shaken by two events. The first was personal. He separated from his wife, Caroline Massin, in 1842, the very day he completed his first major work. In 1844 he began an intense emotional affair with Clotilde de Vaux, at her insistence platonic, which lasted until her death in 1846 at the age of thirty-two.[1] The second event was the marked change in the social composition of French society and the experience of the revolution of 1848-1851, particularly the emergence of the proletariat as a political factor.

Clotilde de Vaux

In the 1840s Comte's method and conceptions went through considerable transformations. He rationalised his emotional life as a salutory purification and spiritualisation, and after her death Clotilde was transfigured into a saintly figure whose image Comte began to worship.[2] Reassessing his own project he argued that all attempts to solve the western crisis through reason and science alone only exacerbated it. All reason, for him essentially masculine, could be effective in the human context only if guided by the moral and emotional superiority of love and affection, essentially feminine. Comte took his own experience of the sublimation of physical love as a necessary process for all those trying to resolve the social and cultural transition of the three states. He installed the 'Maxims of Clotilde' within the new religion of humanity in imitation of the medieval cult of the virgin mother.[3]

When he came to work out the logic of the revised strategy, he based the new construction on a subjective method: the law of the three states was to be completed by adding a theory of the emotions to the theory of science and industry. The final third-state became, in Comte's last version, a combination of science and fetishistic worship… This fundamental order was to be ruled by a purifying cult of woman, regarded as the centre of love and affection. In order to reach this final state there would be a transition period in which the dictatorship of the proletariat would purify economic life and the commercial spirit.[4]

"Comte's thoughts on the new society were far from communistic. Against the revolutionary and communist visions of the dictatorship of the proletariat, Comte argued that the positive doctrine would legitimate a new hierarchical social order: in the economy it would legitimate differences of wealth, and in the family it would legitimate the separation of the sexes and the spiritual ascendency of women based on the realisation of the principle of virgin motherhood. Comte aimed to appeal to all sections of political opinion, radical and conservative, since he wanted to reveal precisely how each element fitted into a broad scheme of social progression.[5]

"Comte is just as radical in his proposal for a reorganisation of gender relations. Here his aim is to reverse the tendency to the debasement of love in Western culture, and to deal with the new phenomenon of feminism and the demand for equality between the sexes. Comte poses this issue again historically as a problem of the debasement of the ideals of chivalry and courtly love of the medieval period. His aim is to restore some substance to the idealization and purification which the medieval practice seem to inspire.[6]

He commends the principle of eternal widowhood (with certain limited exceptions which would have applied to Clotilde), and reasserts the value of the segregation of the sexes. The woman should obey the husband, but the latter should adopt the cult of women and guardian angels. Comte's radical hypothesis, however, is that all sexual relations in society should be replaced by a utopia of the virgin mother. This utopia itself will reverse the decline in the status of women. The utopia would give women complete control over human reproduction. It is not absolutely clear just what Comte had in mind. There could be an organic development which itself would lead to a new hermaphroditic condition, or artificial insemination would become the norm.

The specific details of the cult of woman were developed and practised by Comte: the nature of the image, the prayers, the language, the gestures.[7] the objective is purification and hygiene. What women will do is left an open question to be developed and solved by women themselves.[8] His view is, however, that the physical act of sex so far as men are concerned is not principally to be understood in terms of reproduction but rather in terms of its sublimating function. Against the demands of feminism, for instance as exemplified by the demands of his wife Caroline Massin, he claimed that they could never form the basis of a set of stable human relationships, but produce only continuous metaphysical strife.

It is through the segregated and hierarchical structures, through idealisation and duty, that a new stability can be attained. In effect therefore, the Comtean programme for the family is intended to end the metaphysical phase within the domestic sphere. Once the final stage is achieved science itself comes to an end in a system of harmonised laws which are all conscious of their place in the totality. It seems at this point that life will be made up of rituals, ceremonials, re-enactments and reproductions of the various aspects of the three-state law. In this sense the law seems to reflect Comte's own deep longing that the pain of the modern crisis be ended, as it predicts the certainty of a positive state in which everything will find its rightful place. Comte noted in 1852 that it is feeling which is; > the sole existing preservative of Western society from a complete and irreparable dissolution. Since the close of the Middle Ages, the influence of women has been the sole though unacknowledged check on the moral evils attaching to the mental alienation toward which the West more and more tended, especially its centre – France.

He insisted that it is only when men begin to think under 'the inspiration of women' can they 'bring synthesis into constant harmony with sympathy.'[9]

"The final system of Comte's sociology, with the modifications introduced from his reconstructed masculinity, suggests that the medieval system already attempted to install a cult of woman in the worship of the virgin. In 1853, Comte returned to the great western transition and again treated it in terms of the contrapuntal movements of its main phases.[10] But Comte's reorganisation of his explanatory forms did not change: he simply added a note at the beginning of the story indicating the fundamental but passive influence of women. –women preserved society from complete dissolution.[11] At the other end of the account of the transition he added a note on the effect of the decisive influence of Clotilde to the reconstruction of the positive philosophy.[12]

Nevertheless the social topography of Comte's later vision was strikingly different from the earlier one: the western revolution is an interregnum between two social systems in which the feminine principle, the heart, rules the masculine principle, the intellect. More and more the systems at both ends of the historical sequence became structurally identical. the scientific elite would become the priesthood of the new religion of humanity, but a religion without theology. Paris would replace Rome as the sacred heart of Europe, and Clotilde would replace Mary at the heart of a new cult.

Notes:

[1] I have discussed Comte's personal relations and how they related to his intellectual development in M. Gane, Harmless Lovers? Gender, Theory and Personal Relationships (London, 1993), ch 6; and in 'Unresolved Comte' in Economy and Society, 24 (1995), 138-49.
[2] In the crisis of the insurrection in Paris in June 1848, Comte wrote a 'Saint Clotilde,' an address of commemoration on the anniversary of Clotilde's death. In the address he referred to the 'ill-omened detonations… of bloody conflict' going on around him. He said, 'I am indebted to thee for finding some pure satisfaction in a dreadful crisis… Though mingled with warlike sounds, I already hear indications that the human metropolis is returning to its normal condition. The carnage on both sides may have ceased, at least until the next conflict, which will be still more terrible, unless the working men now in arms shall have discovered their real camp.' A. Comte, Confessions and Testament: And his Correspondence with Clotilde de Vaux, edited by A. Crompton (Liverpool, 1910). pp.349-57.
[3] For a typical statement of these relations see the Preface in A. Comte, System (New York, nd) vol 1, pp.ix-xxix.
[4] See Comte, System (New York, nd).
[5] These propositions were worked out in continuous outpourings in the years of positivism after 1847.
[6] All the main details of his ideas are expounded in A. Comte, System, (New York, nd), all four volumes.
[7] Comte might well have been influenced by the revival of Catholicism which emphasised Christian love. See a discussion of this in E. Berenson, 'A new Religion of the Left: Christianity and Social Radicalism in France, 1815-48' in The French Revolution and the Creation of Modern Political Culture, edited by E. Furet and M. Ozouf (Oxford, 1989), vol 3, ch 29. For details of Comte's religious practice see for example the collection of texts in The Religion of Humanity, edited by A. Crompton (Liverpool, 1907).
[8] In effect Comte leaves women little room for choice since his sociology has already allocated women their role, function, and place in the final state.

[9] In Comte, Preface to The Catechism of Positivism, (London 1891).
[10] See A. Comte System, vol 3, pp.452-531.
[11] See Ibib. p.436.
[12] See Ibid. p.530.

Criminal sentencing: Do women get off easy?

AVfM Video Source · 17 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

There are ten men in jail for every one woman, and men's sentences run far longer. Factual Feminist Christina Hoff Sommers offers some solutions.

Yoy can subscribe to the Factual Feminist here.

Men over twenty times as likely as women to die at work

Hollie Mantle · 17 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Warning! Men are over twenty times more likely than women to die at work.

Studies show that men are at grave risk in the workplace. According to an analysis of official HSE data, between the years 2009-2014 male workers within the UK had a 20.75x higher fatality rate compared to females. This comes despite the fact that the workforce ratio between men and women is relatively equal, with 47% of the UK workforce made up of women.

Data from 2013/14 shows a total of 85 men died at work, whilst in the same year the fatality rate for women was considerably lower, at just four. This gender divide can be viewed in the following interactive infographic: The main cause of these worker fatalities was falls from height, which accounted for three in every ten worker deaths, of which most took place within the construction industry.

So why is there such a gap between the genders when it comes to fatality rates? One reason may be occupational segregation. Whilst there has been a big push to get women involved in trades typically associated with men, there is still a large divide between the number of males and females working within these risk-heavy industries. According to Health and Safety consultant Bryan Richards of Arinite, "Although there has been an on-going debate for more women getting involved in 'physical industries' such as construction, it does not work out in practice. Although `top percentile' women may be fitter and more physically capable than many men, it's about averages here, and typically the average woman cannot do the physically demanding work that an average man can do. These tend to be the jobs where there is a greater risk of fatal injury e.g. construction, utility industries etc."

Gender stereotypes also make it difficult for equality in such industries. Construction worker Daniel Long suggests, "[women] would struggle to gain respect. Other builders wouldn't want them carrying heavy blocks, for example".

Construction work, though physically demanding, entails a variety of skills, some of which do not require workers to be overtly strong. Plastering, woodwork and bricklaying, whilst requiring stamina and high levels of fitness, are jobs where it is physically possible for women to get involved.

Official statistics suggest that although the proportion of women employed in the construction industry reached 13.4% in 2014, up from 11.7% in 1999, they still account for only 1.3% of the industry1. Essentially, men are expected to carry the brunt of the work when it comes to hard labour.

On top of the unfortunate likelihood of male deaths in the workplace, men are almost twice as likely as women to suffer a major or minor injury in the workplace. In this instance, the major cause of accidents is cited as slips and trips. These hazards are not industry-specific, and yet in 2013/14 the number of reported male injuries per 100,000 workers averaged at 94.9, whilst female injuries averaged at 52.8.

Office worker Luke Rees suggests this may be because of the stigma surrounding what constitutes "men's work." Rees says, "People often say 'I need some strong, young lads' when they want something done that involves risk. Even if it's something simple such as changing a lightbulb, it's still often expected that men will be the ones that get up there to do it. This means we're constantly getting exposed to more workplace hazards – falling from stepladders and those kinds of things – than women."

Have you struggled with gender stereotypes at work? Give us your thoughts below!

(1) http://www.hse.gov.uk/statistics/tables/index.htm
(2) http://www.theguardian.com/business/2015/jan/13/construction-training-board-women-outnumber-men
(3) http://www.arinite.co.uk/arinite-health-safety-tracker-infographic/

Bill Cosby is an Evil Genius

Samuel Heist · 17 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

There has been a lot of reporting on Bill Cosby in the news but none seem to have even begun to scratch the surface of Bill Cosby's Machiavellian genius.

But first, to really admire the man, we need to cover his humble beginnings and recap what has been covered in the news so far.

Born in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania in 1937 he started his comedic career in 1962. His comedic routines centered on his experiences as a kid, intentionally avoiding race as to include everyone and spread the message that we are all the same underneath. He was invited on television's The Tonight Show in 1963. He released his début LP in 1964 with Warner Bros.

He became a television co-star in 1965 on the show I Spy, then in 1969 went to star in The Bill Cosby Show for 2 seasons.

He then went back to university (as we all know, a dark pit of eternal rape) to earn an MA from Massachusetts Amherst U.

After a few less successful shows he went on in 1984 to début The Cosby Show which would go on to become one the highest ranking sitcoms of all time.

Fast forwarding to recent events, starting in 2014 as Bill Cosby was negotiating with Netflix for a stand up special and a new TV series with NBC. As of January 2015 34 women (including many white women) have accused Bill Cosby of sexual assault. Accusations going all the way back to 1965.

Now here is where Bill Cosby's evil genius start to shine.

Bill Cosby has allegedly…

- in the rumor and sex-scandal-hungry Hollywood and TV world
- as a black man
- in 1965-onward America

… raped 34 women…

- many of them white
- over the course of 50 years

… and not a peep in the media for 35+ years.

He was somehow able to convince his alleged victims, including the white ones, that no police force would arrest a black man for rape in the 60s-70s.

If those accusations are true, then Bill Cosby has for a long time hidden an extraordinary mesmerizing talent that not even the charming former president Bill Clinton had, and Clinton's impeachment sexual scandal case was over a consensual, legal act at that.

As a lone man in the spotlight for decades, Cosby's feat of legerdemain goes far beyond any Illuminati story or Harry Potter-esque invisibility cloak.

You simply have to admire this level of evil, sociopathic genius.

How can a lone man, an African-American in the USA at that, so in the public eye, pull this off? It simply boggles my mind. I am in awe. This is way beyond James Bond villains or cloaked Romulan warbirds.

If all those allegations turn out to be true I will certainly vote for Cosby as president of the Patriarchy.

Or is it much more plausible that the vast majority, if not all, of those accusations are bullshit? You think about it.

Feminists don’t understand consent

AVfM Video Source · 18 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

That’s it. We are now officially Teal Deer fanboys.

Is feminism a movement?

Andrew DiKaiomata · 18 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is also available in Italian, Swedish and Romanian.

Nausea and feminism both often come in waves. Understanding feminism in terms of waves is essential to understand feminist thought and its assimilation of Marxist and communist ideas. It is easy to see how someone might not think of feminism as a movement. We might question whether feminism is best described as a movement or simply as an ideology. Certainly feminism is an ideology, as in a system of ideas within political theory or policy.

Clearly, it has a firm grasp on our political and educational system and a strong influence on public opinion. Feminism isn't so much fighting the oppressive system: it is the system. What's more, feminism has in mind a revolution to overthrow, dismantle or smash the system created by its perceived oppressors. The word movement brings to mind a societal change, not the destruction of society.

Yet, feminism, like Marxism/communism, sees itself as progressing in waves of permanent revolution. Each wave is a movement within a broader permanent revolution. Even after complete state and economic control, there is still the movement for further refinement, correction and more revolutions, where yesterday's heroes are today's oppressors.

When applied to feminism, the term wave is a term borrowed from Marxist/communist thought. It alludes to the Marxist suggestion that a simple, one-time revolution cannot destroy the old system and put another in its place overnight. To do this, the revolution must happen in waves, progress through stages until there is complete control of the state and economy. From this point, the revolution is thought of continuing in further waves of permanent refinement to the system. This is the communist idea of continual revolution.

In both feminist and communist philosophy, the first wave is simply the oppressed becoming aware that they are oppressed, gaining class or group cohesion and identifying their oppressors. In feminism, first wave feminism is so-called retroactively from the 1960's during second wave feminism, and refers to the suffragette movement. Feminism draws the comparison and retroactively describes this movement as women becoming aware of their oppression and identifying their oppressors. Under communism, the oppressors are identified as the Bourgeoisie, and under feminism, The Patriarchy.

The philosophies behind the stages of the creation of communism, Marxism and feminism are varied. What they have in common is that one single revolution overthrowing the oppressive class is not possible, there must be waves of revolution. These waves must be of destruction of the old system and alternating waves of growth of the new. This is where we find communist/Marxist slogans like Dismantle the Bourgeois state and the correlating feminist slogans Dismantle The Patriarchy (or alternatively Smash The Patriarchy).

We see that feminism is a carbon copy of communism/Marxism, both sharing a central feature of "waves" and that even after complete control, the waves of permanent revolution continue. Each wave is described as a smaller movement, or smaller revolution, not changing but destroying the old system and creating a new one. Feminism is a series of movements that use communism/Marxism as a blueprint. When we understand this blueprint, we understand how the waves of feminism are movements of revolution within feminist ideology.

Nick Reading responds to Bar Bar

AVfM Video Source · 19 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Pubishers note: Nick nails quite a bit down solid in this offering. One correction, though. While I agreed with the lion's share of the Aaron Clarey video referenced, I never referred to MGTOWs as frustrated virgins. I did express support for the video, though, so I can see that the confusion was of my own making. PE

In Swedish education, the problem is the absence of a male-norm for boys.

Annelie Sjöberg · 19 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The performance problems of boys in school are not the fault of masculine norms. It is the absence of these norms that is the problem.

In an article in SVT Opinion, the three authors (Ida Östensson, Karen Austin and Roberth Maier Ericsson) argue that traditional masculine roles are to blame for boys' declining performance in Swedish schools. This supposedly limiting male role allegedly leads to an anti-study culture where boys exhibit "hyperactivity, aggression and an aversion to learning during schooling."

The article is a response to another recent article by editorial writer Csaba Bene Perleberg in the newspaper Göteborgs-Posten. Perleberg highlights boys as a discriminated group in the Swedish school system with a focus on the alarming divergence in performance and grades that educators and the public have been been aware of for some time.

Swedish education seems to be suffering from a growing shortage of equality in both the treatment of students and educational results even though we, more than any other country, are preoccupied by concerns over gender and feminism.

To say that boys are discriminated against in school is obviously a very provocative position. Yet we know that this is so. Statistics speak for themselves. Boys are the big losers in today's schools.

The grade performance gap between boys and girls is widening today at an alarming pace. The latest PISA results show that girls achieve higher average scores than boys in all subjects except athletics. The same trends can be seen for the rest of our universities and colleges. Significantly more women than men both enter higher education and reach graduation.

To then try to explain these indisputable facts by shifting the problem to masculinity is not only misleading but also clearly inhumane.

It will ultimately only increase the disparity in both the treatment of students and the educational results we see today. It is based implicitly on the premise that boys do not have problems in school: they are the problem.

But it is NOT masculine norms that are the problem in Swedish schools. It is rather the absence of masculine norms and the lack of boys' perspectives that have become the biggest obstacle for us to combat the problem of differential achievement. We have created a school system that favors girls. It is this and nothing else is causing the boys' lack of success reflected in school performance lags and grade gap increases. Social skills and interpersonal skills are overvalued in today's schools. This favors the girls in front of the boys who are often driven by intrinsic motivation and stimulated by challenges and competition.

We also know that boys generally mature in social skills and linguistics more slowly than girls in the lower age groups. These differences can be smoothed out eventually in schools that recognize and are able to deal with this fact. That biological factors and gender differences play a role in school performance has been documented by neuroscientist and researcher Professor Ingvar.

Many of today's male students testify that their problems began as early as middle school, sometimes even earlier. It is also at this age that sex differences in maturity and mental concentration (focus) are greatest. A feeling of not succeeding and being considered a problem is likely to become permanent in an individual's self-image, which will affect the motivation and desire to learn in a negative way for a long time to come.

By trying to squeeze all students in the same educational template we create in fact a school that is the opposite of equality.

A school that is unable to adapt to students' intrinsic conditions can never be the springboard to a continued successful and prosperous life that school is supposed to be.

Boys' declining performance in Swedish schools is a problem that not only involves personal suffering and the risk of exclusion. It is also an economic failure and a problem that is worth being taken very seriously before it becomes even more of a societal crisis.

Authors: Annelie Sjöberg is a Secondary School teacher and Joakim Ramstedt is a web editor and blogger in Sweden.

This article was originally published in Swedish here: http://www.svt.se/opinion/article2763027.svt

Translation assisted by August Løvenskiolds and Ulf T.

“Consent For Me, But Not For Thee” and other Black feminist hypocrisies

Mumia Ali · 19 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

> “Hell hath no fury, like a woman scorned.”
> - William Shakespeare

Last week’s column, “Brittney Cooper’s Very Personal “Political” Problems,” examined the theory and practice of Prof. Crunk’s sociopolitical worldview where it mattered the most – in her own personal life. Your correspondent has offered damning evidence, written by the good professor’s own hand, as to how and why Black Feminism has utterly failed to deliver the goods that matter, to Black women generally and most importantly, to her in particular:

A conventionally attractive (which includes meaning highly educated and high-earning) Black man as a mate. Or failing that, as a phallus-on-demand sex partner.

By her own admission, she has discussed how her morbid obesity has greatly hindered her mating prospects. It has been years since she has publicly acknowledged this fact. And yet, as recently as this month, Cooper continues to tow a line of (un)reason that has proven itself not to assist her meet the very life goals she has written so longingly about now, again, for years.

Reader response to my article was quite vociferous – as to be expected. Among the critiques, was the idea that instead of my recounting the ways in which Cooper has proven herself a massive (pardon the pun) failure in the mating realm, my writing talents would have been better served by examining the politics of one Ms. Brittney Cooper, and kept the personal stuff out of it.

But, as I noted in the lead-off quotation of my previous column, for feminists, the personal IS political. They were the ones to coin that phrase, and Black feminists, ever the good lap dogs of their Miss Anne betters, have aped this notion as well. Cooper has made it a point of using her personal testimony as evidence for the veracity of Black feminist ideology and beliefs.

It is therefore quite logical to examine her own words and the life she has chosen to live based on them, in the light of the Black feminist philosophy she and her Sistas espouse, and assess them in terms of their impact – or in this case, the decided lack thereof.

Thanks to one of my newer readers, who wishes to remain nameless, and who knows the “luminaries” of the Black feminist world quite well, he/she has supplied me with even more information that tallies the losses of Prof. Cooper’s love life – even more to the point, the following links will highlight just how early and often Black feminists can and will engage in out-and-out hypocrisy, when it suits their warped ideology to do so – and then justify it under the rubric of “privilege” that Black men enmasse supposedly have.

In short: we shall proceed, and continue, to rock the mic.

Long(er) time readers of yours truly will recall a post of mine called “The Inability To Seek Consent” – it was a response to Ms. Feminista Jones, who is as thick as thieves, ahem, with Ms. Brittney Cooper by the way, for the former choosing to air a private email correspondence, and attempting to use it as prima facia evidence for how and why Black women in particular were somehow being (sexually) harassed everywhere they go. In case you missed it, here’s what I said, in summation:

> “I’m gonna cop to everything that Jones has said about me—guilty as charged! People who know me well would definitely agree that not only can I be quite persistent, but I can also be quite persuasive. After all, how do you think I got the interviews I’ve gotten thus far?

> But there is one little problem with Jones's argument …
>
> She never obtained my CONSENT(!) to air our email exchange. Please note that in the previous email exchanges-turned-de facto interviews I had with Evan Marc Katz and Lindsey of Cards Against Harassment, I was keen to obtain their consent to bring our offlist conversation to the J4G audience publicly. I've also been careful to obtain the consent of others in terms of their thoughts and words expressed either offlist or elsewhere online; Dr. Edward Rhymes, for example, can attest to this fact.
>
> Why is this important?
>
> Well, because consistency, that's why. Imagine what Jones and her flying monkeys followers would have said if the shoe was on the other foot—and I had taken it upon myself to air an offlist email exchange of her and me, releasing it to my readers without her foreknowledge or consent—I can hear the "comparisons" to rape and the like right now.
>
> Of course, when it comes to social justice warriors like Jones, little trifles like the rule of law or even common decency don't apply, especially when it comes to working-class, blue-collar brothas like yours truly—which does indeed bring us back round-robin to the point about "street harassment."
>
> …
>
> For Black women like Jones, Black men like me have no rights toward consent that they are bound to respect. She is emblematic of those people—like Amanda Marcotte, of Duke LAX infamy, for example—who have no qualms in the least running roughshod over the civil liberties of others or just plain ole dissing them in the name of some "higher goal"—which is, of course, their own twisted utopian delusions of grandeur.
>
> …
>
> The irony of all this is that if she had only asked me, I would have readily and enthusiastically—heh—consented to our exchange being aired because I have nothing to hide and consider myself to always be on the Jumbotron—I don't say anything online that I am not prepared to cosign or defend. Not only that, but this exchange being aired to the general public serves in itself as a kind of "debate," in which both sides of the issue can be aired, and the public reading along can then decide for themselves. As Lindsey's parting shots in our recent exchange aptly shows, it's not the menz that are the problem here; it's the ladies themselves."

I also said, in the same post, that it was my judgment, based on the then-available evidence (and that which I have been able to obtain since), that Ms. Jones was an A1, rank, out-and-out, in-your-face, stompdown disingenuous, manipulative hypocrite of the first order – and that I would make it my business to be on her like stink on doo-doo from here on out.

Like her ace boon coon, Cooper also holds the view that Black men have no rights toward bodily autonomy, or the right to say "no," that she or any other hugely (pardon the pun) unattractive Black woman is bound to respect – something that I have written about at length, previoulsy. Don't take my word for it, see for yourself:

> "TrueStory: chalk it up to #VenusRetrograde but last month saw exes coming out the woodworks. I had a chance to have dinner and clear the air with one that I really liked. After a lovely dinner and good conversation (not to mention an extended drought), I asked if he'd like to accompany me back to my room.
>
> Surprise of surprises: he declined. Exasperated (and horny) I asked "Why?" Lo and behold, he flipped the gender script and told me some version of: "I'm happy to have you back in my life. I don't want to move too prematurely because we are rebuilding our relationship." Riiiiight. What I wanted to know is what our "relationship" had to do with the sex that I needed to have right then and there.
>
> For that there were no answers."

Au contraire, grande dame – for the answers are not in our stars, but in ourselves. As we've pointed out the last time around, and as you've noted yourself on at least one occasion, it's your prodigious ability to break the scale that keeps you from getting your back blown out.

I mean, seriously – go to Brittney Cooper's Facebook page, and checkout the pics for yourself. Honestly, it reminded me of that scene from Star Wars: Return of the Jedi – you know what I'm talking about. Princess Leia is being held captive by notorious gangster Jabba the Hutt; at one point, he licks his lips with his tongue…note Leia's response.

That's how yours truly felt. Real rap.

And if I were a betting man, I'd wager a princely sum that this is exactly what all those dudes who say "let's just be friends" to Cooper felt, too, when gazing upon her. This is the harsh, brutal truth – but, as I noted in my previous essay, women in general, and apparently Black feminists in particular, have a preternatural ability to make their Rationalization Hamsters achieve transwarp speed:

> "What should we do when men flip the script and tell us no?
>
> For instance in this recent piece at Essence.com, the male author had the nerve to be "concerned" that a woman might reject the possibility of a relationship with an otherwise compatible mate if his sex game was found lacking.
>
> Now that women are prioritizing sexual pleasure, men are changing the rules. They are recognizing that sexual performance can decline with age just like beauty.
>
> But frankly, strictly speaking from my own experience, I think that men say no as a way to regain power.
>
> I have a strong personality, I'm outspoken, and smart. Whatever the fuck Steve Harvey says, I know some brothers have found it intimidating. Denying sex becomes an easy way for men to let you know who's boss.
>
> Of late, I've had more than a few homegirls tell me about the negative reactions that they have gotten from men they were casually involved with, when they tried to prioritize sex in the interaction. Apparently, even when these brothers weren't all that interested in a relationship, they took it as a serious blow to the ego, to find out that sisters just wanted to engage them for their bodies and sexual talents.
>
> And in the classic fashion of those with privilege, they played the victim, changed the rules, and refused to give the thing they had the power to give. In this case, sex."

Note the doubling-down on the harpiness, even when it has consistently (this post was written in the dog days of summer 2012!) shown THAT IT DOES NOT WORK.

That Black feminism is a powerful drug.

In a followup post written a scant week later, Cooper tries to back peddle on her blatant rapeyness, overblown sense of entitlement and flagrant IDGAFness about the importance of gaining consent from Black men, THAT WAS POINTED OUT BY HER OWN FELLOW TRAVELERS:

> "Last week, I wrote a post called Asking for Sex: What to Do When the Guy Says No. My interest in writing the post was to explore the contingencies and challenges of asserting sexual desire as a straight Black woman. What I know now is that there is much truth to that saying about hell and good intentions.
>
> Because I respect our community of readers, I want to both take some responsibility for the lack of clarity in the post and also actively (and perhaps aggressively) respond to many of the claims (and attacks) made on and about me in light of it
>
> …
>
> The primary criticism of my story has been about the issue of consent. My choice to question my ex's decision read to many of you as a failure to respect the classic feminist anti-rape mantra "no means no." Thus, one > blogger whom I respect referred to my story as "rapey and presumptuous." Moreover, some of you felt that my suspicion about his intentions and my read of his responses as a kind of patriarchal power play amounted to a bad and un-rigorous invocation of feminism. Many of our male readers felt compelled to let me know that "men are human beings with feelings, and not mindless sex fiends." Finally, many of you felt that the post wreaked [sic] of entitlement to sex and/or partnership."

Uh, yeeeeaaaaa? In fact, let's check in with another happy social justice warrior, one Dr. Nerdlove, to see what he has to say about Nice Guys(TM) and the dreaded Friend Zone, just for point of comparison, sh*ts and giggles, shall we?

> "So while I'm sure the whining felt good to get off his chest at the time, it's also a great big insight into just what's going through a Nice Guy's head. Here's a hint: it's "ME ME ME ME ME ME ME ME ME MEMEMEMEMEMEMEMEMEMEMEMEMEMEME". In ira veritas, after all.
>
> The entire rant says exactly two things:
>
> 1) How dare you like someone who is not me?
>
> 2) You owe me for all the time and effort I put into you.
>
> There isn't a word about her needs, her desires or feelings except as how they relate to the Nice Guy. The insinuation that she must have had feelings for him but refused to acknowledge them, the unfairness of not being attracted to him just because he doesn't look anything like the people you're usually attracted to. This is the person who was supposed to be her friend – except this was evidently a friendship where "emotional intimacy" is supposed to be reciprocated with access to her body.
>
> Entitlement issues, much?
>
> How much do you want to wager that this "Nice Guy" neglected to mention that particular aspect of his friendship to his "friend"?
>
> It's ironic that the Nice Guy complains about having been "used" by the object of his crush, considering that he all but admits that he was using her trust and affection for him as a means to try to fuck her. But again: it's not about her. It's about him and his complete abdication of responsibility for the situation he's found himself in. It isn't his fault that he's bitter and resentful, it's her. It's all her fault that he's now forced – forced, I tell you! – to be an asshole against his will and to unleash his cynicism2 on the faces of the young, more attractive3 women he's now compelled to seek out.
>
> Of course, when a Nice Guy dumps a screed like this online, he's doing so knowing that there will be other Nice Guys out there eager to pat him on the back and commiserate about how evil women are and how much it sucks that Nice Guys like them can't get a break. After all, the Internet loves a Nice-Guy-done-been-wronged story; witness the ongoing love for the patron saint of Nice Guys.
>
> The more Nice Guys bitch and moan on the Internet to their fellow travelers, the more it validates their ongoing persecution complex that they're the victims in this equation. There's nothing like an Internet circle-jerk of sadness to reinforce the idea that somehow it's unfair for women to stubbornly refuse to reward being a friend by giving up the pussy."

Now, here's the good professor, dishing on being put into a friend zone all her own:

> "Recently, I had a five-hour ice-cream date with an intelligent, ambitious, chocolate cutie, with friendly eyes and a great smile. Yep, I said five hours. He's a great conversationalist, wonderful at asking questions, and pretty interesting himself. He showed genuine interest in my career, my research, and my recent career-related travels. He respects my intelligence, told me so in not so many words. Awesome, right? This is what feminists have been fighting for.

> Yes. But these days me and my well-educated hetero feminist friends have two categories of male-female relationships, if we have them at all. There are those of us with intellectual affairs and those of us with just, um, affairs. Never the twain shall meet. I am in the first category, and let me tell you that the grass is looking much, much greener on the other side.
>
> What, pray tell, is an intellectual affair? I've had so many of them, that I might as well have a Ph.D. in that, too. Intellectual affairs revolve around the episodic mind f*ck and they have all the potential to leave you feeling just as emotionally drained as an ill-thought sexual liaison. In an intellectual affair, your mind, rather than your body, is your biggest asset. That's all the person wants you for—the amazing insight you have, the way you make them think differently, the advice you give. Ugh. Your body, however, get the short end of the stick."

Prof. Crunk, meet Dr. Nerdlove.

As I said, compare, and contrast. The EXACT same things that feminists, Black and White alike, have been banging on with regard to men, for YEARS, is being mouthed by this Black feminist icon-in-her-own-mind. The EXACT same thing. Oh, but, what had happened was, that all of those Nice Guy(TM) things are baaaad, because it's men doing it; when (Black) women do it, it's a sign of their sexual agency and power.

Gotta love that postmodernism!

Oh, by the way: not to put too fine a point on it, but ladies, seriously – if YOU, have to ask a guy out; and if YOU, have to ask a guy back to your boudoir, the reasons why, and why homeboy has given you the LJBF treatment, just might have something to do with your reflection in the mirror, and/or your being the poster child for the latest edition of the DSM. In other words, you're seriously cray.

In many cases, it's both.

By now, I should like to think you've gotten the point: that Cooper, and Jones, and the whole lot of Black feminists, are hypocritical to the core, totally willing and able to trample all over the very ideas and concepts they claim to hold near and dear – when it comes to their interests, desires or needs – and the rights of others – in this case, Black men – be damned. It's all right there, in black and white.

By their own hands, ahem…and actions.

I'm gonna wind this up, by quoting again Prof. Cooper, from a post she wrote some years(!) back called "Dating While Feminist: Anatomy Of An Intellectual Affair," where again, a brief sliver of hope slices through the three-foot thick wall of cognitive dissonance:

> "So yes, just for today, I blame feminism for the particularly sucky state of my love life. If you ride or die for feminism, you will inevitably find yourself in a kind of dating quicksand, knowing that you're sinking, but absolutely unable to do anything about it."

Wrong again, Prof. Crunk – you CAN do something about being in the d*ckless desert…

…it starts, by backing away from the table.

We're done here.

The Freud of feminism and the red pill bridge: Recovering teamwork

August Løvenskiolds · 19 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The theme of our upcoming conference ICMI15 (International Conference on Men's Issues 2015) relates to building bridges between men and women in a feminist-dominated world. In this article I'd like to explore the idea of building bridges in a different way – between the disparate elements of the red pill community of MGTOW, MRAs/MHRAs, and PUAs.

I've been watching with interest and dismay the ebb and flow of the discord between those of us in the red pill world. I identify as both MGTOW and MRA/MHRA, and I often use PUA conversation techniques when I engage feminist women in real life. I do that to charm them into dropping their emotional revulsion to men like me, not to sleep with them (yuck).

I find harmony in these red pill perspectives because we all work from a common data set (our understanding of what women respond to and why) and our common enemy is feminism. I detest the open lies, rape hoaxes, man-hate, and misogyny of feminism on a level so fundamental that even if the entire red pill community vanished tomorrow, I would still seek allies to demolish feminism with every waking thought, even if those allies were somewhat hostile to me and each other.

The Freud of the Red Pill

Because I both empathize and sympathize with all three red pill perspectives, I find it fun and easy to apply them using a simple Freudian personality model. Yes, Freud is passé and discredited in modern feminist-dominated psychology but what better endorsement could one have?

I view PUAs as the Id: a primal sexual energy unconcerned with everything except its own sexual needs, satisfaction, and perfecting the behaviors necessary to achieve those goals. The Id/PUA wants sex and judges everything by its utility in getting sex. The only worthy men are the ones whose penises smell of pussy, according to Id/PUA.

We can discount and even criminalize the Id/PUA, but the fact remains that human civilization was built to satisfy the Id/PUA, and every happy baby owes its life to the sexual machinations of the Id/PUA. Every bedroom was built by a man's Id-driven hand and hammer to placate the privacy and safety needs of a woman's sexual requirements.

The Id/PUA is unable to grasp the importance of the more cautious thinking of MGTOW and MRA; It dismisses them as lower status (beta/omega to their alpha) when it even thinks about them at all.

I view MGTOW as the Ego. The Ego/MGTOW is a realistic response to the harsh realities of the world. The Ego/MGTOW fights the impractical, dangerous desires of the Id/PUA and turns away from the societal dangers imposed on those with an unbridled Id/PUA: forced fatherhood, marriage, divorce, child support, alimony, false rape allegations, suicide, emotional/physical trauma, and slavery to obligations born of normal human sexuality corrupted by government/feminist meddling.

The higher stages of Ego/MGTOW (and I identify strongly with this) turn away from both women and society as the folly of Id/PUA plays itself out. MGTOW believe that the only effective way to reform or even to deal with society is to check out of it. Paradoxically, Ego/MGTOW view their self-interest in undermining society is the only cure or hope for society.

I view MRA/MHRA as the Superego. The Superego/MRA tries to interface with both society (in order to reform it) and with the self (in order to inculcate worthy societal values – morality – into the self). Whereas Ego/MGTOW is at most passive-aggressive in trying to reform society, Superego/MRA aggressively engages both society and the self in the struggle to improve both.

Superego/MRA seeks ways to address the sexual power of the Id/PUA without falling into the feminist traps and hatred of male sexuality. Unlike Ego/MGTOW, Superego/MRA seeks a positive engagement with society and male sexuality but recognizes that this may, in the end, be as impossible as Ego/MGTOW purport.

Conflict, competition and coöperation.

Feminism is the uncontrolled, "liberated" female Id. It wants what it wants, and it wants it NOW. It is no small irony that the largest feminist organization in the world is named "NOW" (the National Organization Women) and that this group reflexively fights men and men's issues with bleached tooth and manicured nail.

Feminists want perfect safety for women AND perfect freedom to do as they please, even though these desires are mutually contradicting: a safe world has no full freedom, and a free world has no full safety. The feminist id reacts with the rage of a frustrated, hungry baby when this is explained to them.

Conflict between feminists is their major failure – even as they fight to become a unified Id their individual, angry brains turn on each other whenever any one of them meets with a modicum of success. Attempts to form an internal feminist ego or superego can never succeed because they have never had to face a world that doesn't jump to feed, pleasure and otherwise placate their raging desires. Feminists with glimmerings of ego-awareness like Christina Hoff-Sommers are routinely savaged by the feminist id collective.

Likewise, Anita Sarkeesian recently came out against what she called "choice" feminism (the idea that feminism is women doing whatever they want – the id). Sarkeesian is also attempting to gain ego-awareness and quell the feminist id but she will come under increasing fire from feminist id-monsters once they become aware that Sarkeesian is advocating restricting their choices, not expanding them.

The unfortunate truth is that blue-pill men serve as the proxy egos of feminist women: they are the white knights, the practical interface with the world that feminists can view directly with only such interest as the next shoe sale or alpha penis. This is why feminists detest their blue-pill sycophants: their ids are frustrated by the practical limitations blue pill servants / boyfriends / husbands / Sarkeesians must explain and modulate to them.

Feminists cannot handle criticism or restriction – it is all "abuse" to them. You cannot reason an infant into learning to tie her shoes until the infant grows up a bit. Men handle criticism and competition in ways feminists find perplexing and frustrating – men in the crucible can grow stronger. Feminists can only abide at best.

Although feminism cannot grow much from conflict, red pill men can as long as we maintain a certain decorum – a sportsmanship – that is impossible for feminists.

Red pill men can fight each other, and harshly so. This is both our strength and the source of our growth.

But can we tone it down a bit, guys? There is a real enemy out there, and we need to remember who it is. When we are not fighting each other we can do serious damage to feminism.

PUAs fight feminism exploitively: women are wary of uncontrolled male sexuality but since feminism strips women of their protective instincts ("don't protect yourself – teach men not to rape") the PUA can undermine feminism in the female psyche by entangling women with meaningless sexual hook-ups that leave those women feeling confused and angry in the aftermath.

MGTOW fight feminism passive-aggressively by refusing to kowtow to feminist demands for more pampering and protection from men. Choking off the excess of work and resources generated by men undermines the prosperity that is essential to feminism.

MHRAs fight feminism aggressively by engaging them directly with reason and evidence-based counter-arguments that expose the rotten core of feminism to neutral observers. We can't change the minds of feminists – the feminist id has no capacity to reason – but we can convince those under the yoke of feminism to cast it off.

No one will ever win the PUA Superbang, or the MGTOW World Un-Series, or the MRA Venal Jeopardy.

But we can be respectful rivals as we thrash those feminists back into their well-deserved hell.

The mutual coöperation of PUA. MGTOW and MRA – a Zeta masculinity – is the worst nightmare for feminism ever.

Source(s):

McLeod, S. A. (2008). Id, Ego and Superego. Retrieved from http://www.simplypsychology.org/psyche.html

Milo Yiannopoulos vs. Feminism: A response to The Big Question

AVfM Video Source · 20 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

It is always a thrill (and too rare of one) to see men's human rights talking points make it into the media, especially when feminists are tripping over each other's tripe to try to silence them.

A recent BBC program saw feminists crapping on the whole idea that men might have any problems that aren't self-inflicted while those trying to speak for men were routinely shot down with contempt. Ceara McCord has a great analysis:

https://youtu.be/suPptFV-DPU

You may want to subscribe to Ceara McCord.

The original program can be viewed here:

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=97k8SNnQkgY

You can subscribe to Libertarian MGTOW here.

Most dads are deadbeats?

Prentice Reid · 20 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Most fathers are deadbeat dads who abandon their children and who flee commitment.

We've all heard the mantra repeated endlessly by media and popular entertainment. We witness constant fictionalized accounts of it on television, in movies and in commercials. Culturally, it is profitable to sell products in ads using this myth as a selling point. So, what are the facts about paternal participation in children's lives today? Let's look at some widely held myths and in doing so, shed light on the truth.

Myth #1: Most dads who owe child support do not support their children financially.

More men than women pay child support regardless of custody status. Only 25% of mothers with physical custody of their children do not receive any child support payments. Mothers who were owed child support by the father of their children also were paid a higher percentage of the child support owed than were fathers who had physical custody of their children but were owed child support by the mothers. Also more mothers than fathers paid none of the child support they owed the other parent so if we culturally judge a non-custodial parent's value based on how much child support they pay then technically there are more "deadbeat" mothers than fathers.

Demographic Characteristics of Custodial Parents by Award Status and Payments Received: 2011

(Numbers in thousands, as of spring 2012. Parents living with own children under 21 years of age whose other parent is not living in the home. For information on confidentiality protection, sampling error, nonsampling error, and definitions, see www.census.gov/prod/ftp/pub/p60/p60rev12.pdf)

Characteristic	Total	With child support agreement or award
				Due child support payments in 2011
					Average due	Average received (in dollars)	Percent receive	Received all payments		Did not receive payments
		Total	Percent	Total	(in dollars)			Total	Percent	Total	Percent
All Custodial Parents
Total	14,440	7,057	48.9	6,252	6,052	3,771	62.3	2,716	43.4	1,621	25.9
Standard error	263	538	[illegible]	196	139	122	1.2	130	1.0	102	0.7
Sex
Male	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
Female	11,797	5,537	58.4	5,558	6,115	3,862	69.2	2,438	43.8	1,405	25.1

Myth #2: Fathers are more concerned with money than mothers.

This persistent myth is often used to explain the belief that most fathers fail to provide financially for their children. However, judging by the reasons given by parents with physical custody, custodial fathers, more often than custodial mothers, choose not to force the other parent to pay child support (27.5% vs 22.9%) and also a higher percentage of mothers than fathers stated that they did not want their child to have contact with the other parent (21% vs 12.7). These facts are indicative of custodial mothers engaging in parental alienation.

Table 3. Reasons Custodial Parent Had No Legal Award, by Sex: 2012
[Numbers in thousands]

Characteristics	Number	Percent of total
CUSTODIAL PARENTS
Total without a legal child support award 1/	7,883	100.0
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
Child stays with other parent part of the time	1,427	18.1
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
Did not feel the need to have legal agreement	2,988	37.8
Did not want the child to have contact with other parent	1,495	19.0
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
Child's other parent could not afford to pay	2,636	33.4
Paternity not established	542	6.9
Unable to locate other parent	1,083	13.7
Other reasons	1,021	13.0
CUSTODIAL MOTHERS
Total without a legal child support award 1/	5,938	100.0
Child was too old for child support	21	0.4
Child stays with other parent part of the time	[illegible]	[illegible]
Child's other parent provides what he/she can	2,141	36.0
Did not feel the need to have legal agreement	1,929	32.5
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
Did not want child's other parent to pay child support	1,972	33.2
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
Paternity not established	542	9.1
Unable to locate other parent	1,102	18.4
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
CUSTODIAL FATHERS
Total without a legal child support award 1/	1,895	100.0
Child was too old for child support	[illegible]	[illegible]
Child stays with other parent part of the time	601	31.6
Child's other parent provides what he/she can	724	38.0
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
Did not want the child to have contact with other parent	210	11.1
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
Child's other parent could not afford to pay	672	35.5

Additionally, fathers are less likely to want gifts for Father's Day and more likely to say they want time with their children than mothers on Mother's Day. CBS News reports:

> "When shown a list of possible gift categories, only 35% of fathers who responded to the survey said they wanted some sort of gift that cost money for Father's Day. Conversely, 52% of moms who responded to a similar survey in May said that they wanted gifts that cost money vs. homemade items or time with family.
>
> Of fathers surveyed, only 3% of dads said they preferred time alone over other gift options, compared with 11% of moms who responded to a similar survey in May, who wished for time alone away from the kids and spouse on Mother's Day."

These numbers hold true whether speaking of a complete family or a broken home; time with children is simply more important than money or gifts for most men. The following graphic from USA Today summarizes the lopsided numbers in Father's Day spending versus Mother's Day spending.

Myth #3: Fathers who live in intact families contribute considerably less to the home than mothers overall.

Work is work, whether performed by a man, a woman or a farm animal. How anyone could discount the labor done that results in bills being paid is an enigma. Nevertheless, this oft-repeated myth is bandied about by the feminist movement with their cherished claim that mothers do all the work while fathers lounge around forcing her to make "sammiches." However, according to the Pew Research Center, when work outside the home is combined with the hours fathers and mothers devote to household duties, fathers actually devote slightly more of their time to labor than mothers (54.2 hours vs 52.7 hours).

Myth #4: Most fathers who don't pay the child support they owe choose not to out of greed.

This might seem a repeat of Myth #2 but there is enough of a difference to let Feminists to make both claims as suits their purpose. On the one hand, they claim "men are more focused on money than the welfare of their children." On the other hand, they also claim that "men simply love money more than their child." The myth of the greedy cheap skate who simply wants to pocket the money is one that won't die easily but the facts show that most of the child support owed to mothers is owed by poor fathers and a very small percentage is owed by fathers who live above the poverty line. The New York Times reports:

> About 70 percent of the debt is owed by men who earn $10,000 a year or less, or have no recorded wage earnings at all, according to the Federal Office of Child Support Enforcement. Less than 4 percent is owed by men with incomes of more than $40,000.

Myth #5: Black Fathers are uninterested and uninvolved.

Perhaps the most widely spread myth of them all is the claim that black fathers are nowhere to be found and that most black mothers are left to raise the children on their own. Children estranged from their fathers are a problem in every demographic regardless of race, one that is more pronounced among Blacks but not to the degree we are led to believe. An impartial review of the facts can defuse the hysteria. Government research reveals that black fathers, despite being less likely to live with their children than white fathers, are involved in their children's lives and to a much higher degree than people think. The LA Times reports:

> Defying enduring stereotypes about black fatherhood, a federal survey of American parents shows that by most measures, black fathers who live with their children are just as involved as other dads who live with their kids — or more so.
>
> For instance, among fathers who lived with young children, 70% of black dads said they bathed, diapered or dressed those kids every day, compared with 60% of white fathers and 45% of Latino fathers, according to a report released Friday by the National Center for Health Statistics.
>
> Nearly 35% of black fathers who lived with their young children said they read to them daily, compared with 30% of white dads and 22% of Latino dads.

Myth #6: Most fathers do not live in the same home with their children.

Most fathers in America, regardless of ethnicity, live under the same roof as their children. The idea that most dads have skipped town and walked out of their children's lives does not reflect the actual data. Though the number of fathers living with their children can never be high enough and the number of dads living away from their children is increasing due to the declining rate of marriage; 79% of white fathers, 65% of Hispanic fathers, and 56% of black fathers actually live with their children. CNN reports:

> The study found that 21% of white fathers live away from their children. For African-Americans, it's more than double, 44%. For Hispanics, 35% live away from their children.
>
> But of the fathers living apart from their children, black dads were the most involved in their kids' lives.

Myths do not die easily; their persistence is part of their nature. But we have an obligation to society and to posterity to debunk false myths with truth whenever possible before they can do further harm.

These sexist myths are internalized as truth by the police, family court personnel and the people who will grow up to make or enforce laws that dictate family structure. What children need is not more laws or rhetoric; they need their parents in their lives.

This is a culture that seems hell-bent on creating the deadbeats it claims to hate and the only way to prevent this recurring process is to give people access to the truth.

Mike Buchanan – a man with a van... a surprisingly valuable van

Mike Buchanan · 20 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The British political party Justice for men & boys (and the women who love them) will be standing in three adjacent highly marginal constituencies at the general election on 7 May. The party needs to attract only 400 votes to reach the point at which, had it attracted this number of votes in 2010, the three incumbent MPs would have been denied political office. The explanation is here.

'Silver Surfer', a fathers' rights advocate, recently bought and donated a 13-year-old Ford van to the party, to help with campaigning. The van is worth vastly more than Silver Surfer paid for it. Mike Buchanan explains why.

An Introduction to the Men's Rights Movement.

Robert Brockway · 21 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: No doubt the material in this article is familiar to most readers here. MRAs and those friendly to the MRM are encouraged to publicise this article as a straight forward explanation of our movement to counter so many lies told about us. Even if people don't want to believe the truth, they can't claim we didn't try to put our case in plain terms.

This articles is also available in Spanish.

The Men's Rights Movement (MRM) also sometimes known as the Men's Human Rights Movement (MHRM) is a pluralistic movement of men and women who have identified certain problems facing men and boys. It is comprised of many organisations and individuals that are loosely affiliated. Despite this, participants within the MRM maintain a largely consistent position on men's rights. The movement accepts robust and frank internal discussions, which are generally conducted in public. Individuals within the MRM are sometimes known as Men's Rights Activists or Men's Rights Advocates (MRAs). While the MRM has existed for a long time, it is only in recent years that it has been growing rapidly and receiving significant media attention.

The movement started to significantly increase in membership around 2010. The MRM has many detractors. Some who want to discredit the MRM claim it is a violent movement. This could not be further from the truth. The MRM goes out of its way to be non-violent. The most popular online sites within the movement such as A Voice for Men and the MensRights sub on Reddit actively censure and ban people who make threats of violence or advocate violence.

The MRM is a movement concerned about problems facing men and boys and focuses on bringing attention to the problems in the wider community as well as discussing ways to alleviate and resolve these problems. This article mainly focuses on western countries, where the MRM has its roots, but we want to help men and boys all around the world. Many of the issues we advocate for, such as father's rights, have organisations focussed on that issue only. We advocate on a variety of issues and support certain societal changes.

Despite what many outside of the movement think this is not just a movement for men and is ethnically and culturally diverse. Many women participate in the MRM and often seem to be among the movement's most active contributors. The movement is pluralistic and inclusive. The MRM includes many gay and transgender men and women.

Participants in the movement come from across the political spectrum. They are united in their recognition of the problems facing men and boys and agree that these problems need to be addressed. Anyone who broadly agrees with the aims of the movement is welcome to participate.

We reject many of the claims espoused by leaders in the modern feminist movement, such as that women cannot be sexist to men, a belief that men have systematically oppressed women for thousands of years through the use of violence or that domestic violence impacts women far more than men.

The MRM and its participants are routinely subjected to vitriolic attacks and derision by feminists and others. Feminists routinely try to shut down public talks held on MRM topics. Sometimes they have succeeded as a result of local authorities declining to enforce the law in the face of feminist aggression. The MRM rejects such attempts at silencing others. While we may disagree with, and even object to, much of feminist ideology we would never seek to silence feminists. We acknowledge that women and girls face gender-specific issues. This is particularly true for women and girls who live in the developing world.

Many of the men who have entered the movement until now have been personally affected by one or more of these problems. They might be, for example, men who have been dealt with unjustly by the family law courts in their country. After experiencing this they may become aware that their treatment by the courts was common and from there became aware of the broader MRM. Young men may experience discrimination in their high school or university on the basis of their gender and from this may become aware of the broader movement. Increasingly people who have not been personally affected by these problems are recognising a broader problem in society and are stepping up to make a difference.

The movement is notable for being task focused and not subscribing to an ideology or dogma. Although there is no one definitive list of the issues that the MRM is addressing there is broad agreement on a core set of issues. Most activists within the movement have certain areas that they focus on.

Many people look at the top of society, to leaders in politics, business and the military and see men. They conclude, erroneously, that men rule the world. While some men dominate society it is not true that men generally dominate society. This is an example of the apex fallacy – looking at the most successful members of a group and judging the group by that standard. What these people miss is that men also "dominate" at the bottom of society: men are the majority of the homeless and those who do the dirty, dangerous and difficult jobs that society relies upon.

The MRM is often associated, incorrectly, with other movements. Sometimes this would be a genuine mistake but sometimes this is done to attempt to discredit the MRM. Many people have agreed on the problems facing men and boys but have disagreed on the way to respond to these problems. Various movements with names like Redpillers and Pick Up Artists (PUA) have appeared. The name of the former movement occurs because when a person recognises the problems facing men and boys, regardless of their subsequent response to that, they are sometimes said to have taken the red pill. The name of the latter movement should be obvious and generally revolves around young men manipulating the situation to their own benefit rather than attempting to fix the underlying problems. Participants in these movements do not generally call themselves men's rights activists as they understand what the MRM is and they do not agree with our attempts to address the problems facing men and boys. They can even be quite hostile to the MRM. It is interesting that many of the worst allegations made against the MRM are actually a result of things attributed to the MRM that are said by people who do not identify with the MRM.

One movement, Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW), involves men who disengage to varying degrees from a society that is hostile to them. In general, MGTOWs avoid marriage and conventional relationships with women due to the significant financial and legal risks this entails for men today. MGTOWs often work only as much as they need to to survive, thus legally reducing the tax they pay and reducing the support they provide to a system that is hostile to them. MGTOW is the only other movement that has significant overlap with the MRM. Some MGTOWs will simultaneously disengage from society but will still work to fix the problems in society. It is notable that Japan has had a similar movement for decades with heterosexual Japanese men (known in Japan as herbivore men) explicitly deciding to avoid romantic or sexual relationships with women due to the high social and economic costs. This is one of the major contributors to the plummeting birth rate in Japan.

While it may be true that men's rights advocacy was perhaps initially more popular among the socially or politically conservative this has long since ceased to be the case. The MRM has participants from across the political spectrum and is in itself an apolitical movement. MRAs are not traditionalists. We are not advocating for a return to the gender roles seen in the past. We want everyone to have a fair playing field on which they live their lives free from traditional gendered obligations.

A selection of issues important to the MRM are presented here.

Bodily Autonomy

Female genital mutilation is now illegal in many countries, and international organisations work to reduce this practice. These same societies often refuse to grant boys the same bodily autonomy that they grant girls – the right to be protected from unnecessary medical procedures. The men's rights movement objects to male genital mutilation (also known as circumcision) on the same grounds as female genital mutilation. Both violate the human rights of the person being mutilated and both should be illegal. In many countries today all people have protection from unnecessary medical procedures except for infant boys. That the foreskin is removed in most cases without anaesthetic exacerbates the problem.

Many do not know that the foreskins of infant boys are not destroyed as medical waste but are rather put to a variety of uses. While it is true a few are used for medical research the majority go to cosmetic companies. In some countries the sale of foreskin by hospitals is a lucrative business.

Disposability

All societies consider men to be disposable. Men face conscription into the military and can be forced into combat against their will. Men overwhelmingly take on the dangerous jobs in society. In general men are expected to be prepared to give up their lives for the good of the community and, specifically, to protect the lives of women. This is so ingrained that few people, men or women, recognise it. Fewer still object to it.

The MRM rejects male disposability in the modern world. While it may have made sense for a society in the past to be prepared to sacrifice it's men for the survival of the society, the MRM holds that this is no longer necessary. With a population exceeding seven billion that might reach 10 or 11 billion in a few decades, we no longer need the ability to quickly recover numbers and so the original reasons for male disposability no longer apply.

Domestic Violence

Men constitute between one-third and one-half of all victims of domestic violence. A similar proportion of domestic violence aggressors are women. In about half of all cases each partner is both a perpetrator and a victim of domestic violence. The notion that domestic violence is a gendered issue is simply not supported by the evidence. We object to all domestic violence regardless of the genders of the people involved. While women's shelters receive government funding in many countries, very few men's shelters exist.

Unnecessary Medication

Children, and boys in particular, are being diagnosed with Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder (ADHD) and drugged at an alarming rate. This rate has been increasing rapidly in recent years, which is prompting an increase in the sales of drugs to treat the condition. In the United States, for example, sales of ADHD drugs have increased by 89% in four years. This should be of great concern to parents who have received a diagnoses for ADHD for their child and a recommendation to medicate. The long-term consequences of ADHD medication on a forming brain are not yet known.

The MRM is concerned that the normal behaviour of many young boys is being considered abnormal and thus, unnecessarily medicated.

This is not to say that all diagnosis for this condition are invalid, but when the diagnosis rate is changing as rapidly as is currently occurring more needs to be done than simply prescribing more drugs.

Education

The performance of boys in education systems has been declining for decades. Up until the mid 1980's boys tended to consistently perform better in primary and high school than girls. Educators set out to change this and improve the results for girls. The problem is that this was achieved at the expense of boys and continued well after it was clear that boys were falling significantly behind, not only in comparison to their female peers but even in comparison to male students of the past.

For example, education research clearly shows that boys tend to do better in exam assessment and girls tend to do better in in-class assessment. Relative performance in male and female students can be tracked with changing assessment. There has been a clear move away from exams and towards in-class assessment in the last few decades. One notable exception was a recent reversal of this trend in the UK. As expected the performance of boys in the UK improved with the increase in exam assessment.

Increasingly students have less and less time to burn off energy and are expected to sit quietly in the classroom for hours at a time. This is sometimes characterised as the incredible shrinking lunchtime. While this is probably affecting many students negatively the evidence suggests this is generally more of a problem for boys. It is interesting that this should be happening at a time when office workers are entreated to stand and move around more for their long-term health.

Alarmingly, research shows that in recent years teachers have been academically marking down students with alleged behavioural problems and this has overwhelmingly impacted boys.

The MRM objects to significant gender biases in primary and high school education systems and seeks to reform the system in to one in which both boys and girls can benefit.

The problems don't end there. Men have been abandoning the dream of a university education in droves, partly because many university campuses have become very hostile for men.

In many US universities, if a man is accused of sexual assault against a woman:

- He is not allowed legal counsel,
- He is not allowed to know the details of the allegation,
- He is not allowed to know the name of his accuser,
- He has the burden of proof placed on him,
- His opportunity to mount a defense is restricted,
- His right to due process of law is curtailed.

It is not surprising that the bulk of such accusations result in the male student being expelled or banned from campus, which generally results in his failing courses even when there was little evidence against him and he is subsequently cleared by the criminal justice system.

In most western countries men now constitute less than 40% of university enrolments. While increasing the female participation rates in certain STEM fields is actively promoted there is little interest in addressing the falling university participation rates among men.

Father's Rights

The family court system in many countries is heavily biased in favour of mothers. In many countries courts still show a strong preference for granting custody to mothers over fathers. Non-custodial fathers often find themselves with very limited access to their children and routinely find that breaches of court orders by mothers (such as not allowing visits in accordance with court orders) are ignored or receive only a token response from authorities. Many men fight in court for years to get reasonable access to their children, only to give up in despair when they are unable to continue funding court battles and they realise the system has failed them.

Health

Males have higher mortality rates at every age. The difference in life expectancy for men and women actually widened during most of the 20th century, peaking in the 1990s. One significant contributor to this is the far greater amount spent on women's health than men's health. In fact most countries spend several times as much money on women's health as they do on men's health.

State Discrimination

Even when the evidence against men and women and prior criminal histories are the same men are more likely to be arrested for an offence, more likely to be charged with an offence, more likely to be convicted of an offence, more likely to receive a custodial sentence, and the sentence will on average be significantly longer. Some states openly advocate on this basis. A UK government commission recently advocated the abolition of all women's prisons. One of the advantages, they argued, was that these prisons could then be used to incarcerate more men.

Laws that are written in a gender neutral way are often not applied that way, and this is most often is to the detriment of men.

In Canada there is a special statute for a woman who kills her own newborn, and this statute limits the sentence to five years imprisonment. A major children's charity in Canada opposes this, arguing that Canadian law already has sufficient provisions to deal with mental illness and a newborn should have the same right to protection from violence as any other member of the community.

Reproductive Rights

Today men actually lack reproductive rights. Unlike women, in many western countries, men cannot choose not to be a father. In the United States there have been many cases in which a boy has been raped by an adult woman. The boy was not legally able to consent to the sexual activity and yet when the woman became pregnant the boy was required to pay child support (including back payments) on reaching the age of 18.

Many men have been ordered by courts to continue supporting a child that is not theirs, even after they present conclusive evidence (such as the results of a DNA test) showing that they are not the biological father of the child, and in some cases had no relationship with the child at all.

Suicide

Men and boys have suicide rates several times higher than women and girls. Male suicide rates have grown at a far faster rate than female suicide rates over the last century. While the high rates of suicide among men has gained recognition within the last few years there is still a long way to go in addressing this serious problem.

Vilification

We live in a society that routinely vilifies masculinity. The TV formula so often seen in sitcoms of a stupid or inept (but often well-meaning) man married to a super-woman who can solve all of his problems for him by the end of the episode is so common it is a cliché. The mass media is full of negative portrayals of men. The news media is constantly telling us about negative aspects of masculinity. This has led to a general perception of men as people to be feared and suspected.

This had led many airlines to maintain a policy of never seating unaccompanied minors next to men. The implicit assumption here seems to be that the men cannot be trusted next to a child. Many men report feeling uneasy around children, fearful that they will be accused of some terrible act. This is a major cause of men avoiding certain industries, such as childcare and teaching.

A series of t-shirts and other products produced in the United States a few years ago suggested Boys are stupid, throw rocks at them. The manufacturers took no regard for the impact their products would have on young minds.

A very concerning problem relates to the distribution of food following disasters. Many relief agencies believe that if food is given to men they will keep it for themselves rather than provide food to their relatives and children. The world's largest humanitarian organisation, the World Food Programme, which is part of the United Nations, excludes men from food distribution centres on the basis of gender alone. Many other organisations that distribute food following disasters do this also. Men and boys may not enter the food distribution centres. Women are permitted to enter and are then expected to distribute the food to their relatives. These organisations claim that special provision is made for families with no female members but they are light on details. It seems unlikely that in the hectic environment of a food distribution centre that the staff would have time to properly investigate the claims of men and boys that they have no women in their family. There is anecdotal evidence to suggest these men and boys are simply excluded from the food distribution.

Violence

Men experience high levels of violence in society and there is very little recognition of this. Men are close to twice as likely to experience violence as women, even though it is women (we are so often told) who need to be fearful walking alone at night. Despite popular perception, men are raped almost as often as women. In the US more men are raped in prison then all women in society.

Female-on-male violence is an often ignored problem. Some women, having been taught that violence is gendered, simultaneously object to violence against women but feel that violence against men is inconsequential. One often repeated myth is that a woman cannot physically harm a man. The many men injured and killed by women are a testament to the erroneous nature of this belief.

Society and the government both ignore and marginalise male victims of violence.

Further reading: A Brief History of The Men's Rights Movement: From 1856 to the present

Eating while MGTOW: Buck buck chicken

August Løvenskiolds · 22 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way) lifestyle, ideally, involves both a real-world withdrawal of men from women and a reduction in the large excess of productivity by men necessary to support the pampering of women through the state's taxation of men's natural high productivity.

Men like me who choose this path may experience a decline in disposable income as we no longer strive to be the stripper pole of cash climbed by needy, seductive succubi eager to harvest us for our resources. But this doesn't mean that MGTOW should be denied the gastronomic pleasures of preparing our own easy, affordable, and low-cost meals.

I go shopping for food once every two weeks or so. I eat out less than once a month – twice in calendar 2015 so far, and a woman paid for one of those meals.

Beef is quite expensive as I write this but chicken is cheap and in Dallas, I can buy a "family pack" (heh) of 7-9 boned (heh), skinless chicken breasts (heh) for less than 10-12 dollars US. I break them up into individual plastic freezer bags, carefully bleeding out as much air as possible before freezing them. I then have a fortnight's worth of protein for the price of buying some crazy feminist harpy two sour apple martinis.

Now, the basic preparation of one of these frozen breasts is easy: remove from freezer and wrapping, plop onto a pan and place into a 450 degree Fahrenheit (about 230 Celsius) oven for about an hour or less.

While you are waiting, get on Twitter and give hell to any feminists you can find.

At the end of an hour you will find a beautiful, tasty (if a little dry) roasted chicken breast. Pair that with your favorite dipping sauce (teriyaki and chili paste for me), some veggie dish and a glass of cheap wine, and you are eating in a way Caesar would envy two thousand years ago.

Now, after a while, you can get more elaborate with seasonings, dipping sauces and side dishes but the basic idea is the same: low-cost, low work, and good, sensible food to keep you going on your latest online adventure.

I just polished off my latest variation on this dish. It is much more elaborate but adds a variety necessary to keep gastronomic things interesting.

First, before I removed it from the bag, I thawed the chicken breast. I picked a large breast because I intended to stuff it with butter and herbs.

I force-thawed the still-bagged chicken breast in a small container under a leaky faucet dripping slowly on top of it. It took about 50 minutes to thaw. Two twitter feminists screamed and blocked me while I was waiting. I then preheated the oven to 400 degrees (about 205 Celsius).

As I held the thawed breast gently, my knife made a small incision on the thickest side of it. I enlarged the incision with the blunt plastic handle of a small spatula until there was a tight canyon/cul-de-sac in the breast as far as I could force the probe without rupturing the other side of the breast.

I stuffed the resulting cavern in the breast with one smashed clove of garlic, several shards of frozen butter, and a fresh leaf of sage. Oregano, rosemary, or really, any herb you like can be used here.

I placed the stuffed breast in a 10-inch (25 cm) heavy aluminum pie pan with some frozen whole-kernel sweet corn. I put some pats of real butter, hot sauce, pepper and salt over the whole mess and baked them for about 40-55 minutes while I abused some more online feminists with logic.

And voilà. A feast of buttery baked chicken and sweet corn. Life is GOOD.

You can stuff the chicken with whatever you like before baking: ham & cheese, bleu cheese, leeks, olives (green and/or black), horseradish & apple – endless choices. No affirmative consent is needed. Ever.

A cheap, delicious meal – costing two to four bucks – and a nightmare for feminists.

Living well is sweet revenge.

Pub note: Apparantly, feminist douchequeen Amanda Marcotte was so PO'd by the idea that men might find her as useless as she is, that she actually took time to write an article about it on Pandagon, sending thousands of her readers here to get the same message.

Now that is what I call bang for the Buck Buck, here at AVFM, especially during our quarterly fundraiser.

Please help us help Amanda find equally important things from which to be offended. PE

Donate

Ayaan Hirsi Ali's feigned fear of men in her family and the lie of a forced marriage

Sekhar Chandra · 22 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is also available in Romanian.

Over the last few years, many internet communities have seen a spate of women playing the damsel in distress card quite successfully. Many White Knights came to the rescue and brought the dollars with them, and there were plenty of skeptics, too. In the New Atheist community, the Ben Radford and Karen Stollznow episode is well known. In the wider culture there were some spectacular rape accusations that unraveled under scrutiny, such as the University of Virginia's Jackie case, and the University of Columbia's Emma Sulkowicz case. Women are human and they lie just like men, and sometimes they lie spectacularly. But society is easily fooled by tales of women's oppression, especially religious oppression and Islamic oppression. Ayaan Hirsi Ali is one such woman who played the damsel in distress card quite successfully in the 2000s, before being exposed by Dutch documentary Zembla in 2006, and yet retains a lot of the same victim cred to this day.

The exposé is quite thorough. It gathered evidence from Ayaan's family members, school records in Kenya, and from Ayaan's hosts during her immigration to the Netherlands. When Ayaan is confronted with the evidence, she admits to most of her lies. After such an exposé, one would hope that Ayaan's lies would not be repeated by her supporters. But as late as 04/2014, even the anti-feminist Barbara Kay repeated the falsehoods. She says

> But to recap, Ali was raised in a strict Islamic society in Somalia. She is a survivor of female genital mutilation, civil war, physical abuse from a violent father and a forced marriage. Through good fortune and her own determination, she exchanged a life of subjugation and misery under an oppressive religious yoke for secular freedom in the West

All of the above are lies, except perhaps female genital mutilation.

1. She left Somalia at age 7 before the civil war started. Her primary and secondary school records prove that she lived in Kenya from age 10.
2. She was reared mostly by her mother. Her parents divorced when she was 12, her father worked in a different country and sent home money, and she lived in comfort in a big house.
3. She studied in a reputed Muslim school, while her brother studied at a Christian school, thereby indicating that the family opted for a quality education and were not religious fanatics.
4. She had an arranged marriage, not a forced marriage, to a Somalian immigrant to Canada.

Ayaan is embraced by Barbara Kay and the wider Judeo-Christian Right for obvious reasons. They use her story to further their politico-religious battles, especially using the narrative of Islamic oppression of women. Lefty New Atheists have also embraced Ayaan as she is a great ally in Islam bashing. New Atheists are careful enough to repeat the only lie she has not admitted, the forced marriage. A 10/2007 article by Sam Harris and Salman Rushdie, > Hirsi Ali first fled to the Netherlands as a refugee from Somalia in 1992 after declining to submit to a forced marriage to a man she did not know. Once there, in hiding from her family, she began working as a cleaning lady.

A 05/2014 interview with Sam Harris

> In 1992, Ayaan was married off by her father to a distant cousin living in Canada. In order to escape this forced marriage, she fled to the Netherlands where she was granted asylum and then citizenship…

> Hirsi Ali: … I figured that if I could get this intake interview, then my father or the man he married me off to could come and say that they were looking for Ayaan Hirsi Magan, born November 13, 1969, and they would find me very easily. I wanted to prevent that, so I called myself Ayaan Hirsi Ali and changed my birth year to 1967. I was trying to cover my trail just enough that I wouldn't have the fear of being immediately found. I had never before lived in a system where there were any protections put in place for me.

> Harris: So you did this because you were afraid that someone would come to the Netherlands for the purpose of harming you?

> Hirsi Ali: Oh, yes. Absolutely. I was terrified that either my father or some of our clansmen—or the man whom I had been married off to—would come looking for me and find me. And they did come! My ex-husband was accompanied by three other men when he showed up at the asylum center where I was. But by then I had been in the country for something like four to six months, and even in that very, very short period, I came to understand that I had rights.

Ayaan insists that she escaped a forced marriage, and feared that her father and family may force her to go back to her husband, or honor-kill her otherwise. These claims fall flat in the face of the evidence presented in the documentary.

1. At 19:00, Ayaan is seen on a Dutch TV show claiming that her forced marriage even took place in her absence. I am from India, the land of arranged marriages, and I have never heard of a marriage in absentia. I have heard of something as odd as a marriage to a dog, and even that was not in absentia. They brought the dog to the wedding ceremony and managed to make it sit still.
   There is apparently such a thing as Proxy Marriage, but it is rare and still involves a substitute, real, person. It was historically engaged in by European Monarchs under extraordinary circumstances.
2. Ayaan's brother Mahad, aunt Faduma Osman, and bridegroom Osman Muse state that she was not only present at the wedding, but that she was happy throughout (~20:00). Ayaan claims all of them are lying.
3. After reaching the Netherlands, Ayaan is quite happy to appear on camera for a TV programme on the lives of Muslim immigrants. This is certainly not the behavior of someone who is fearful for her life.
4. Ayaan's first immigration-host in Netherlands, S Veerman, a fellow Somali, says Ayaan appeared just fine and never complained or showed fear of her family. Veerman says she has never heard of honor-killings in Somalia, and has only heard of them in some other countries like Turkey.
5. Ayaan's second immigration-host in Netherlands, a white Dutch woman W Scwoemaker, says Ayaan was in contact with her father and even received mail from him.
6. Ayaan's husband visited her in Netherlands after 6 months, and she admits to him that although he is a decent man she does not want to live with him. The husband accepts that and they part ways amicably enough.
7. Ayaan's husband feels that she used him as a passport to Europe. She would not have gotten to Germany as a first step without the Canadian visa and the ticket he got for her via marriage. Ayaan admits that she even offered to pay him back, but he refused to take the money.
8. In Nairobi, it is quite common for women to marry a foreigner to get a ticket to Europe and then get a divorce. Could Ayaan have done the same?

The evidence against Ayaan is substantial, and the evidence for her is just her testimony. If we apply the same scrutiny to her story as we did to the recent tales of damsels in distress, she would be seen as a false accuser that played the damsel in distress card and hyped up fear of men in her family.

Fast forward a few years. In 02/2010, at age 40, Ayaan was outed as having an affair with a wealthy, influential historian and married father of three Niall Ferguson aged 45. At the time, he was married to British Media executive Susan Douglas, aged 52. Ayaan got married to Niall in 09/2011 in Boston, with Henry Kissinger in attendance, just 3 months before giving birth to her first child. Wealthy men trading in an older wife for a younger wife, isn't that what "equity" feminists fight against? Luckily Ayaan does not live in a "patriarchal" country like India (or perhaps even Kenya), where mistresses have reason to be fearful, as they are sometimes beaten up by the current wife and her relatives.

This is the ultimate goal of feminism. Ramp up fear of men, trigger protective instinct in other men to clear women's path, and preferably mate with high status men.

I've had enough – I'm leaving Sweden!

Svante White · 23 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Editors note: the Swedish version of this article on AVFM Sverige was picked up by Swedish News Nyheter24 and is causing quite a stir.

The first time I seriously entertained the idea of leaving Sweden came last summer when I was listening to Asa Romson's hate speech from Almedalen, an important meeting place for everyone involved in Swedish politics, where the major parties give speeches during Almedalen Week.

Her speech demonized Swedish, white, heterosexual, middle-aged men. Men like me. When Romson painted us all with the same brush – a prejudiced and stereotypical brush, blaming our entire ethnic group for everything under the Sun,– the cup finally ran over for me; I had enough. When she became Deputy Prime Minister, there was no longer any alternative. I knew I had to leave.

I am leaving my country. In my homeland I'm now regarded as being the root of all evil. What makes me the enemy? My sex, my skin color, my sexual orientation and my age. Things that make me who I am, things I didn't choose. What doesn't matter when judging me are my actions. So who am I, this evil man?

- I come from a modest background and have worked very hard. I have taken sick leave for only about 1 week in the last 18 years.
- I have been involved in starting up five companies which meant shouldering the burden of all the late nights and at great risk to my personal finances.
- I have started and owned companies that exported millions of dollars of goods – business that has been very beneficial for Sweden.
- My company has created employment for 75 people, many of them immigrants.
- I can safely say that I've paid more taxes than the average Swede.
- I have represented Swedish business enterprises in China, Germany and Russia.
- I believe that I have contributed to the Swedish economy to a greater extent than many others and certainly to a much, much, MUCH higher extent than Åsa Romson has ever done.

Now I'm saying goodbye to Sweden. If I ever have the opportunity to start up again in business and spend my money and resources it will not be in Sweden. Not in a country where I was seen as the enemy, regardless of my actions. Not in a country where I am only judged on my sex, my skin color, my sexual orientation and my age.

These are enough to have a target painted on my back and be described as fundamentally evil by people instead of thanking me. I've sold my house, terminated all my business in Sweden and I am leaving everything entrepreneurial behind me. This evening, I ordered a one-way ticket out of here. My flight leaves April 7th.

I have lost hope. I have no faith in a government, politicians and the media who follow political dogmas that can not be questioned or even discussed – which means the odds are against it ever being changed.

Sweden needs a new Pär Ström, a famous critic of Swedish feminism who feminists directed attacks and death threats against until finally halted his advocacy for gender equality. Sweden needs someone with knowledge, the courage of a lion and with the financial backing needed to challenge political correctness and stand up against prejudiced people like Åsa Romson.

Svante White is (or was) a Swedish entrepreneur.

August Løvenskiolds and Lucian Vâlsan assisted with the translation

Editorial note:

Please help AVFM continue to provide you a quality website, and to change the public discourse on gender to one more rational and sane. –Eds

Donate

Feminist strategy: containing the non-feminist breakout

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 23 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The word is out about feminism. The cat is out of the bag. The genie is out of the bottle.

People in growing numbers now understand that feminism is the problem, and they are talking frankly about this, in ways that break the feminist narrative. These people are NOT PLEASED, and they are increasingly unabashed about saying so. The trend has not broken into mainstream media or mainstream conversation quite yet, but the silence shows ominous cracks.

So while feminism is still a sacred idol for many, it seems only a matter of time before critical numbers of iconoclasts find the nerve to desecrate that idol with gusto, in broad daylight, in the public square.

The feminists are well aware of this development, which poses a threat to their power, their worldview, and their entire way of life. They have reason to be fearful, and what they fear most is the non-feminist breakout.

What is the non-feminist breakout? It is a tipping point in the non-feminist revolution, where non-feminist people gain the mutual knowledge and strength in numbers to openly voice, en masse, their opposition to feminism. It is called a “breakout” because it is like developed force breaking out of a vessel. When the non-feminist breakout happens, a counter-feminist culture of critique will spill across the social terrain unstoppably and merge with the ambient of the culture at large. On that day feminism will lose, for good and all, the power of self-definition.

In other words, the shoe will be on the other foot because the rest of the world will be telling feminism what feminism is.

Quite understandably, the feminists want to suppress the non-feminist breakout. We can summarize their method in a single word: containment. We might also call it isolation, encapsulation or quarantining. Feminism defines itself as the only legitimate social order, hence endowed with a manifest destiny.

So in the long run, feminism will brook no resistance to its perpetual revolution. Everything foreign to feminism is regarded as space to be either filled with feminism or made tributary to feminism in some way. As far as feminist plans are concerned, everything which is not feminism must be reduced to feminist terms.

However, the task must be prioritized for efficiency’s sake. So clearly, if you are a passive non-feminist who speaks neither good or ill about feminism, you pose no present danger to feminism and can safely be ignored until later. For now they must tend to those cheeky troublemakers who have the gall to speak their minds too freely. Those are the ones we call the activated non-feminists. Or call them the uppity non-feminists.

How about the cognitive dissidents? They are the shock troops of the non-feminist breakout, the threat to feminism that must be contained. For feminism, the practical challenge is how to do this.

For years, the feminist way of containing the non-feminist breakout has been a trick that we call Pavlovian binding (or Pavlovian set-building). This means assembling a varied set of elements, some of which carry an odious emotional charge, so that said odium will infuse itself into all of the elements, irrespectively, by mere association. The set is called “Pavlovian” because it triggers a conditioned response. When odious things are jumbled in the same bag with innocuous things, the innocuous things will smell odious by association. Call it the stinkbug effect.

The feminists work their Pavlonian trick by conflating “anti-feminism” (an innocuous thing) with “misogyny” (an odious thing). These things are completely different, but the feminist technique is to play loosey-goosey with that difference so that people will forget to keep tabs on it.

Hence, anti-feminism and misogyny become a Pavlovian set and, in the minds of politically naive people, synonymous. Humanity en masse is prone to such conditioning. Note that the feminists are not a bit concerned about “misogyny” for its own sake. They don’t authentically care about this as an issue. It is of interest to them only if they think they can tar their enemies with it, and the only reason they bang on about misogyny at all is to conflate it with anti-feminism.

Misogyny is no threat to feminism but anti-feminism certainly is, and so it must be dealt with. Feminist containment strategy binds all anti-feminism as a Pavlovian set, with various items loosely clumped under either a misogynist heading or an anti-feminist heading. However, only the anti-feminist part is truly under feminist attack, because only that part threatens feminism. The misogyny poses no threat and so it is not targeted. It is included in the set simply in order to taint the anti-feminist part by association. You know, the stinkbug effect.

Hence, the Pavlovian response from the politically naive public is to regard anything critical of feminism as somehow tainted by "misogyny." That is the effect which the feminists are banking on, and they work hard to encourage it.

Accordingly, on the "misogynist" side, the Pavlovian set might include such elements as Marc Lepine, Elliot Rodger, Rush Limbaugh, George Sodini, Darren Mack, greasy pickup artists, random commenters, alt-right "manly men," anti-abortionists, adolescent girl-haters, online "harassment," alleged "threats," and internet forums dedicated to rape jokes. All of these could help to generate the stinkbug effect.

And on the "anti-feminist" side, examples might include Warren Farrell, Janice Fiamengo, Carnell Smith, Monica Ebeling, Glenn Sacks, Erin Pizzey, Trudy Schuett, SAVE Services, Nick Reading, NCFM, Karen Straughan, Sage Gerard, Adam Kostakis, and yours truly. All of these elements are considered "anti-feminist" because they threaten the feminist power structure in some way.

The feminists also look for people or things which appear both "anti-feminist" and "misogynist". (In their view, AVfM fits the bill.) This makes an intersectional segue between the two categories, and greatly enhances the Pavlovian binding effect. After the activated non-feminist sector has been defined as a Pavlovian set, it needs a stigmatizing label. The feminists have used several of these. "Men's rights movement" seems to be a perennial favorite, along with "MRM," "MRA," and even "MRA movement." When they want an all-embracing perimeter category, "mansophere" is their word of choice.

In a feminist mouth, all of these terms are mere constructs, political fictions, or figures of speech – reality is more complex. There is no qualitative difference between simple lack of feminism, and developed opposition to it. Both get in feminism's way, and the only question is how much.

To declare yourself not a feminist is to harbor a tiny seed of anti-feminism in your mind already, because it means that feminism is not your preferred option. This very decision, though seemingly non-aggressive, is oppositional at its core. Furthermore, the tiny seed is apt to grow. A non-feminist is an anti-feminist waiting to happen, and an anti-feminist is a non-feminist in a hurry.

Pavlovian binding is direct feminist aggression against all who openly oppose feminism, and indirect aggression against all who are merely not feminist. With the former, you know you're under fire, but the latter poses a silent threat: "Keep your mouth shut or we will target you the same as any rapist, mass-murderer, or woman hater. If you're not a feminist you're a bigot!"

So in the end, Pavlovian binding directly or indirectly targets anybody who says no to feminism. Inherently speaking, there is zero connection between mere lack of feminism, and any of those unsavory items listed under the "misogyny" heading.

Yet according to feminist propaganda, you are mystically woven into the same fabric of moral causality with Marc Lepine simply because you are not a feminist. Such is the libel which feminism propagates in its drive to contain the non-feminist breakout.

Hence, if you are silent by reason of fear, it is a measure of their success. The fact that feminism even uses such methods, ought to make us think twice about feminism altogether. Do we really need to have it around?

The breaking point of the non-feminist breakout will occur when developed non-feminist force exceeds the feminist power to contain it. When Pavlovian binding doesn't seem to work for the feminists any more, we will know that the non-feminist breakout is happening for real. For many people it will be hard to accept that feminism is entirely rotten, with nothing recoverable about it.

And yet, that is the message that must eventually rise to the surface and be understood. Putting feminism on Front Street – that's the game! If you shut up about feminism, you are doing exactly what the feminists want you to do.

Editorial note:

Please help AVFM continue to provide you a quality website, and to change the public discourse on gender to one more rational and sane. –Eds

Donate

Why do people hate #feminism? 1 – Feminists hate men

AVfM Video Source · 24 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The popular non-feminist and #Gamergate commentator, Sargon of Akkad, has started a series of videos attempting to explain why people hate feminism.

This is the first episode of his series in which he, in our opinion, eloquently explains his first argument – that feminists hate men. -eds

You can subscribe to Sargon of Akkad here.

Amber Rose's slutwalk takes a wrong turn

Mumia Ali · 24 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

"Men like a woman with a past because they hope that history will repeat itself."
-Mae West

In an age where it seems that every minute of one's life can be used as reality-show fodder or ammo for a pet cause célèbre, I suppose it should come as no surprise that the latest tempest in a teapot controversy that is Hip Hop impresario Kanye West's life has fueled such an endeavor – his one-time squeeze, Ms. Amber Rose, has announced that she will be hosting a Slutwalk all her own out in Los Angeles later this summer, in response to Mr. West's "30 showers" remarks about her during a well-publicized radio interview he did last month.

The Slutwalks, for those out there who may not be aware, got their start up in the Great White North a few years back, and are ostensibly supposed to raise awareness of the high rates of rape and sexual assault against women, especially those who may dress or otherwise behave in "slutty" ways. Of course, the problem with such notions, is that the fantasy rarely comports with the facts. As AVFM colleague Ms. Janet Bloomfield notes on her personal blog:

> "Second, this is IMAGINED assault and street harassment. Here's something that confuses me: RapeCrisis.co.uk reports that only 9% of rapes occur in dark alleys and over 80% of rapes are committed by men known to the women who claim to be raped. Really? Over 80%? How about 91%! Math ain't THAT hard, bitches.
>
> So if 91% of rapes are committed by men we know, why all the hysteria about avoiding men we DON'T know on the street? Surely, we are only supposed to treat the men we KNOW as potential rapists, and more or less go easy on the men we DON'T know? Apparently not. It turns out that we should treat ALL MEN EVERYWHERE AT ALL TIMES as potential rapists.
>
> Who knew?"

Here in the States, forcible rapes are literally a shadow of their former self, the lowest point they've been since such stats have been recorded by the FBI and DOJ. Here's Harvard cognitive scientist and evolutionary psychologist Steven Pinker giving a presentation based on his book, The Better Angels Of Our Nature: Why Violence Has Declined, where he makes the case that violence of all kinds, including rape, have not just declined over the years, but have gone way, way down, and haven't gone back up.

Like the false flags that have been the bread and butter of the Slutwalks themselves, what Ms. Rose fails to grasp in her being miffed by West's comments, is the fact that had it not been for another woman's remarks about Rose's past, West would have never said anything in the first place.

For those who follow Black celeb gossip, you will know well by what I mean. Khloe Kardashian, the younger and much more outspoken sister to West's wife Kim, got the whole ball of slut-wax rolling when she brought up Rose's past as a stripper during a heated Twitter exchange. Rose's response was to note that Khloe's sister Kim was in the same position, basically "whoring" herself by using her body in a sexual way to support her family – most notably, in her participation in a sex tape with singer/rapper Ray J, brother to singer/actress Brandy Norwood years back. It was this barb by Rose, that West was responding to, in fact.

That brings us to something that is rarely acknowledged by self-proclaimed feminists – that "slut-shaming" is in truth a woman's thing – and for good reason:

Because it would undermine the entire notion of men somehow wanting to control womens' sexuality/bodies/choice, and would highlight the fact – FACT – that women can be incredibly competitive when it comes to vying for mates.

For example, in his excellent work The Evolution of Desire, University of Austin, TX Prof. David M. Buss notes the following on a mating tactic known as derogation of competitors:

> "The fact that female promiscuity is abhorred by men in committed mates and is exploited by women to undermine rivals is reinforced by the prevalence of derogatory terms for this activity in the language.
>
> Although there are words for men who are promiscuous, such as Lothario and Don Juan, they are fewer in number and less derogatory than the words for women. Indeed, such terms applied to men are sometimes not intended to be derogatory at all but are said with admiration or envy. In contrast, John Barth's The Sot Weed Factor illustrates the range of insults hurled by women. An English woman competes against a French woman by using these labels to cast aspersions on her character: harlot(1), whore(2), sow, bawd(3), strawgirl(4), tumbler(5), mattressback(6), windowgirl(7), galleywench(8), fastfanny(9), nellie(10), nightbird(11), shortheels(12), bumbessie(13), furrowbutt(14), coxswain(15), conycatcher(16), tart(17), arsebender(18), canvasback(19), hipflipper(20), hardtonguer(21), bedbug(22), breechdropper(23), giftbox(24), craterbutt(25), pisspallet(26), narycherry(27), poxbox(28), flapgap(29), codhopper(30), bellylass(31), trollop(32), joygirl(33), bumpbacon(34), strumpet(35), slattern(36), chippie(37), pipecleaner(38), hotpot(39), back bender(40), leasepiece(41), spreadeagle(42), sausage-grinder(43), cornergirl(44), codwinker(45), nutcracker(46), hedgewhore(47), fleshpot(48), cotwanner(49), hussy(50), stumpthumper(51).
>
> The French woman uses a comparably long list of counterderogations in her native language. In literature as in life, denigrating a competitor's promiscuity decreases her attractiveness to a man in the marital market." (pp. 115-116)

I'm sure you've noticed that immediately after each slur, was a number in parentheses, something I added to the quoted text above to note the sheer number of such derogatory terms for promiscuous women – that are uttered by other women themselves. In all, the above passage lists more than fifty(!) such terms. Women have a vested interest in putting down other women whom they see as potential competitors for mates – and the easiest, quickest way of doing so, is to suggest that a woman is sexually loose.

So, the Slutwalks are factually wrong all the way around – the empirical evidence does not support them, nor does premise upon which they are based – and as such, Ms. Rose's argument for hosting her own stroll down Sunset Blvd., is shaky at best. If not just outright wrong.

What has started out as what can only be rightly considered a family affair involving West's in-laws and one-time girlfriend, has metastasized into an ugly mess that Ms. Rose seeks to capitalize on in a self-righteous show of indignance – and in so doing, has done much, much more than merely calling herself fighting against supposedly being "slut-shamed" by a former lover…

…she has shown herself both to be grossly ignorant of the facts, and worse, to have no class.

Which is a problem an increasing number of Black women in particular, seem to have these days.

Editorial note:

Please help AVFM continue to provide you a quality website, and to change the public discourse on gender to one more rational and sane. –Eds

Donate

Why women should be sympathetic to men

Rachael Lefler · 24 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I'll start right off the bat by saying that I'm neither exceptionally sexy nor exceptionally beautiful in appearance. Men I've expressed such doubts or such a lack of confidence to have reassured me that I have this or that attractive feature. But I know that the reason that so many like me, and so many are attracted to me is not really about my looks. (I mean, if I really was better looking, I could make a living off of modeling, Hooters-type waitressing, stripping or being a cam girl, and I'm not quite there.)

No. The real reason many men seem to like me is simply that they can confide in me their darkest secrets, without me being judgmental or hateful in response. This seems so simple to me; I mean, we're all human, we all make mistakes, and we all do things that we know are wrong or that feel icky to us later. Most everyone has a dark side to them that they're not proud of. To me that means though that, if I can acknowledge my own faults and still love myself, it is second nature for me to do the same with others.

But it really seems to me that many of the men I've talked to online need someone sympathetic to talk to in a way that most women don't. Perhaps it's that women are able to cry on one another's shoulders and express their emotional vulnerabilities with much, much less fear of being mocked and stigmatized for such. In fact, it may even be more beneficial to women to express psychological vulnerability, because it seems to make them more attractive, owing perhaps to the male instinct towards protectiveness.

I don't think, however, that men have it so easy when it comes to their own psychological struggles and inner turmoil. It's me the high school friend, now a veteran coming home from service in Afghanistan, yearns to chat with at 3am because no one else probably cares enough about what he's been through there. I'm the one a YouTube "celebrity" reveals his sickest secret fetishes to, because no one else would listen without judgment or revulsion. I gave a high school friend the opportunity to cross-dress with me at an anime convention, promising to keep it secret from his dad. He's beautiful "as a woman". I wish he could feel comfortable doing it every day. I say of a Facebook group member's photograph that his eyes contain sadness, and later and privately, he confides that it's because his wife of 18 years is leaving him for someone else. Another man I've known for a long time tells me of the horrific nightmares he has every single night.

All of these experiences, though tainted with sadness, I feel also enhanced my life. I also hope that I was, by simply being that "shoulder to cry on", helpful. It's hard to know sometimes what to say or how to respond. But I think just listening is sometimes all that you need to do to be a friend to someone in pain. Being a teenager in the early 2000s acquainted me with these books called "Post Secret". The idea was, that people would send post cards of their most personal secrets, things they've never had the courage to tell anyone else. From those books, I always wondered if telling the secret in such a way was beneficial; I think that it must be in some way. I know from personal experience too that having someone I can show all of my vulnerabilities to is valuable. Our doubts, weaknesses, and struggles are something we live with every day and yet, rarely come across a person that we think will listen sympathetically. No wonder it's so powerful to find someone who will.

The world is a frustrating and too often harsh place. This applies to both men and women. But women do seem to get more support for their psychological problems. Usually, it's the men in society that have all the pressure to be strong and to comfort everyone else; their spouse or girlfriend, their kids, their family, etc. They're supposed to be psychologically sound rocks women can lean on when they're afraid or feeling insecure. So then, when men are afraid or insecure, who can they lean on? Well, it seems that finding a woman they can talk to is too often a slim possibility.

Sex workers often take the place of intimate friends or psychological counselors in many men's lives. Women who engage in the practice confide that they never expected that they would play shrink to their clients, or that that would sometimes be more of the reason they got called than the sex. Most of these men have wives or girlfriends, but to their significant other, they are afraid to express their darkest thoughts. They want to look like a confident, strong, knightly kind of man to their ladies. But secretly, many of them find themselves needing the company of someone who is guaranteed to listen to them and care, or at least, pretend to care, and not be offended or put off by what they have to say.

And yet, this is a problem that is definitely made worse by feminism. As much as feminists talk a big game about how they don't hate men, they shame them for going to sex workers, for having sexual desires, and often just for being men. It's a power thing. In their eyes, women have no power, men have all the power. So, according to that faulty notion, sex work is nothing but men exercising their dominance and control over women. The reality is very different; men are in my experience, doing this, when they know it's fake and they know it will jeopardize their relationships, just because they need someone. And the anonymity and secrecy of being with the sex worker or mistress means that they can often be emboldened to say what they really want to say, without holding anything back. That's why a man will leave his wife and go to the same stripper for years. It's really sad, a sign that at home he does not feel that he can express his weakness to his wife, who is supposed to be his emotional support. In the feminist theory dogma, this is framed as a sign of the "whore-Madonna complex". They say that men cannot see women as human, but that they only see them as either good women to marry, or bad women to use for sex.

There is some basis for such a judgment, but I think women also choose the role of either whore or Madonna whenever it suits what they want to get out of the men in question. I feel that in this situation, it's the woman with the power definitely. They exploit men's often complicated sexual and psychological needs for their own profit. They fake sympathy, patting his shoulder with one hand while the other hand reaches into his wallet.

I do not see men as "money objects" the way I swear a majority of women do. They know if they confide in me, I ask for no reward. I'm not doing it for anything but because I deeply care about each and every one of them and wish them the best. But with that, I think if I ever were single, a hundred guys would want me to be their girlfriend. I think that if I were ever in serious trouble myself, those men would remember me, and do anything they could to help me. That's just how powerful it can be to simply listen to and care about men. And yet, I'm not doing it for what they can give me back. I just like knowing that if I can talk to someone who's hurting, I can help them feel better. You do sympathy for sympathy's sake, or not at all.

Editorial note:

Please help AVFM continue to provide you a quality website, and to change the public discourse on gender to one more rational and sane. –Eds

Some extraordinary women support J4MB. Here are two of them.

Mike Buchanan · 25 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

J4MB is fortunate in having some extraordinary female supporters. Two of them are here. We should stress that their support is primarily related to specific issues. Anne O'Regan with respect to children's access to fathers and grandparents following family breakdowns, and Sue Parker Hall with respect to male victims of intimate partner violence.

Of media hypocrisy, police killings, race and ‘rape culture’

Robert Franklin · 25 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The news media’s deletion of the sex of the victims from their narrative about police shootings of unarmed civilians comes as no surprise, at least to MHRAs. But closer examination of that narrative reveals media hypocrisy in which journalists’ willingness to marginalize men trumps even their supposed concern about race.

Case in point: The Diane Rehm show on Friday 13 March 2015 featured the story of the shooting of two police officers in Ferguson, Missouri, apparently in retaliation for the killing of Michael Brown. The show’s narrative – the victimization of African-Americans by police – was appropriate. The Department of Justice had just released the findings of its investigation of the Ferguson police department that revealed rampant racism at all levels of the police hierarchy. Rehm’s takeaway: racism is common among police officers which leads to the profiling of blacks and the use of excessive force against them. As far as it goes, that description isn’t wrong. A look at the body count of police killings of unarmed individuals indeed shows a large preponderance of victims to be black. But “as far as it goes” isn’t far enough, as soon became clear.

In her impromptu list of recent lethal shootings by police, Rehm ignored the one in Pasco, Washington last February 10th. That incident has raised the type of public protests in Pasco that Michael Brown’s shooting did in Ferguson, but Rehm never mentioned it. Why? Because the victim was a Mexican and therefore failed to reinforce her narrative of race.

So the preferred narrative, while not incorrect, narrows and distorts the reality of police shootings. It highlights the race of victims, but ignores their sex. The fact that sex plays a much larger role than race in predicting who will be shot by the police went unmentioned by Rehm as it does in virtually every account of police killings. Indeed, if unarmed women are ever killed by the police, I’ve never seen it reported. Meanwhile male bodies stack up like cord wood.

To his credit, New York Times columnist Charles Blow bucked the trend in this article (New York Times, 1/4/15):

> The day after Christmas, a shooter terrorized the streets of a Chattanooga, Tenn., neighborhood. According to the local newspaper, the shooter was “wearing body armor” and “firing multiple shots out her window at people and cars.” One witness told the paper that the shooter was “…holding a gun out of the window as if it were a cigarette…”
>
> “Officers found two people who said they were at a stop sign when a woman pulled up in a dark-colored sedan and fired shots into their vehicle, hitting and disabling the radiator. Then more calls reported a woman pointing a firearm at people as she passed them in her car, and that she fired at another vehicle in the same area.”
>
> When police officers came upon the shooter, the shooter led them on a chase. The shooter even pointed the gun at a police officer. Surely this was not going to end well. We’ve all seen in recent months what came of people who did far less. Surely in this case officers would have been justified in using whatever force they saw fit. Right?
>
> According to the paper, the shooter was “taken into custody without incident or injury.”
>
> Who was this shooter anyway? Julia Shields, a 45-year-old white woman.

Imagine a man who had fired at numerous occupied vehicles, led the police on a chase and pointed a loaded pistol at an officer. Surely, he’d be shot to death. And the incident would barely make the papers because his killing would be considered justified by the police, prosecutors and courts. But that’s not what happened and the woman’s sex and race seem to explain why it didn’t.

Simple accuracy demands that the news media say that, whatever the race of the victim, the sex is the same from one shooting to another. Failure to make the point strongly suggests an anti-male animus on the part of the media.

Of course the shootings themselves suggest the same on the part of the police. And when the police kill, they mostly do so with impunity. For every case in which a police officer has gone to prison for killing an unarmed man, there are scores in which he hasn't.

But the news media aren't interested. Their preferred narrative of race, while valid enough, serves a vital function; it obscures the larger reality of male victimization. By doing so, it helps to "manufacture consent" for public policies that find male disposability useful. Were they to mention the sex of victims, the concept of male disposability might seep into public discourse. As well as police slayings, they might apply it to mine cave-ins, drilling rig explosions, wars, suicides, incarceration, etc. The public's awareness of male suffering and death might increase. People might demand widespread reforms, from workplace safety to criminal justice to family courts and beyond. And we can't have that.

Excluding from the narrative the sex of male victims is business as usual. But here's how we know that the media's narrative of race, accurate and important as it is, serves the larger purpose of marginalizing males and male suffering. When the topic turns to sex and the sexes – poof! – the news media's concern with race vanishes.

Consider:

Expanding on her narrative, Rehm next brought up the shameful display of racism by the Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity at the University of Oklahoma. Apparently fraternity members had chanted about lynching African-Americans. The incident was deeply offensive and immediately condemned by the university's president, David Boren, as it should have been.

But again the narrative of race deflected attention from that of sex. For what the fraternity's song evoked was our former willingness to hang black men accused of raping white women. That disgraceful past bears an eerie resemblance to radical feminism's enthusiasm for putting ever more men in prison on rape charges and running ever more of them off campus. And those are trends Rehm, the NYT, National Public Radio and the like have never criticized and in fact avidly support.

I don't suggest that being expelled from college is the moral equivalent of being hanged, much less the actual one. And no feminist organization has yet called for men to be strung up from lamp posts. But, while the punishments are far different, the processes are disturbingly the same. Lynching was charge, trial, conviction and punishment without due process of law. The current rules on campus, as mandated by radical feminists in government, similarly lack due process of law. That was the message delivered by 28 professors at Harvard Law School and by countless other commentators. It is also a simple fact.

The absence of fair notice of the charges against the accused, the absence of the right to counsel, the absence of the right to confront his accuser, the absence of an impartial tribunal and the absence of a clear description of what behavior is prohibited all characterize campus rape adjudications. Add to that the fact that a man can be found to be at fault based on no more than a complainant's allegations and you have the closest thing now possible to conviction and punishment without due process of law. The man doesn't die; only his academic career does.

For example, the New York Times has conducted its own written lynching of Florida State University football star Jameis Winston. As detailed by Charles Taylor, the "paper of record" has done its worst to convict, in the court of public opinion, a man thrice exonerated of the offense charged – rape. In the third instance, lawyers for the complainant, Erica Kinsman, were unable to muster even a preponderance of evidence against Winston. So the Times, in order to find him guilty, had to omit or marginalize many of the facts that compelled Winston's release without charge.

Now we have the movie The Hunting Ground that many commentators, including Taylor and the president of FSU John Thrasher, have excoriated for its shameful take on campus rape generally and the Winston case specifically. The movie pretends to be a documentary, but traffics in outright falsehoods and strategic omissions, and offers no opposing viewpoints. And, much like the new rules governing claims of rape on campus, one of its goals is the destruction of an innocent man's career. As Taylor says, > the film “throws down a challenge of a sort for the National Football League with a not-so-subtle suggestion that teams should think twice about drafting one of the top college prospects, Jameis Winston,” as the New York Times enthused.

Meanwhile, National Public Radio, which airs the Diane Rehm Show, gave the makers of The Hunting Ground a lengthy hearing, with no chance to respond afforded those with pertinent facts or differing opinions.

Of course all of that might be defensible if there were any evidence that Winston had raped Kinsman. But apart from her allegations, there is none. And her frank misrepresentations and ever-changing story render her incredible, as the former Chief Justice of the Florida Supreme Court, Major Harding, found in his ruling against her. In short, the Times and others have chosen to believe the word of an unbelievable woman against all the other evidence in the case. That is precisely what lynch mobs do.

Where is race in the media’s iteration of the Jameis Winston matter? Not in the Times, not in The Hunting Ground, not on the Diane Rehm show nor anywhere else on NPR. When it comes to a white woman, accusing a young black man of rape, the media’s concern with race takes a holiday. When the cry is “Rape!” all of a sudden, the only place for a black man is behind bars, the facts and due process be damned.

Hypocrisy is a difficult thing. It requires mental contortions and genuflections that few can long sustain. So I have a suggestion for the news media: take notice of men. Value us as fully human. When you do, you’ll notice that the people killed by the police are all but invariably men, that those lynched by mobs were all but invariably men, that those killed and maimed in war are all but invariably men, etc., etc.

Doing so will make your life much simpler. You’ll no longer have to pretend outrage at racism in police departments while promoting it yourself on campus. Your brains can then be used for better things than attempting to rationalize your own hypocrisy and we can all get on about the important business of treating men as more than mere utilities or worse.

Editorial note: Please help AVFM continue to provide you a quality website, and to change the public discourse on gender to one more rational and sane. –Eds

Donate

MGTOW: know them by their words

Peter Wright · 25 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Are all MGTOW anti-gynocentrism? Yes, strictly speaking, that's the only logical conclusion. But not all MGTOW demonstrate anti-gynocentrism as the dominant focus of their narratives; some will choose a narrower focus.

MGTOW narratives are focussed on positive commitments such as celibacy, casual sex, friendship, lifestyle simplification, financial goals or something other; or on negation – on elaborating what they are fighting against – such as gynocentrism proper or on a more narrowly defined target such as feminism, MRAs, government, etc.

This article fleshes out three MGTOW groups based the dominant issues they negate – on the "enemy" they most like to talk about. Curiously, some of the primary objects of MGTOW hatred are not gynocentrism in its broadest sense, but one or another sub-element of the gynocentric matrix.

Some discussion forums devoted to MGTOW attempt to classify it according to "levels" and other ideological pigeon holes; that's not what I intend to do here. I want to leave that kind of classifying, of Alphas and Betas, and of levels, well alone. Instead, I'd like to suggest three MGTOW groups based on the dominant language they use. Call it a phenomenological classification of MGTOW speech. The first of these groups is the broadest: Anti-gynocentrism MGTOW

The focus of MRAs and MGTOW on anti-gynocentrism means they are in lock-step on the nature of the problem, and while the MRM has literally hundreds of ways of responding to gynocentrism, MGTOW is one of the important ones; it is a men's right to self-determine in defiance to gynocentric servitude, and a men's issue worth promoting.

Anti-gynocentrism MGTOW

The speech of the anti-gynocentrism MGTOW revolves around precisely that – discussion of the myriad cultural, biological and historical roots of gynocentrism, along with examples of it in everyday life, and ultimately a rejection of it all. This is the kind of 'MGTOW speech' you would be most likely to witness at A Voice for Men and in the wider MRM – although it should be noted that not all in the MRM identify as MGTOW.

Elaboration of gynocentrism, and particularly anti-gynocentrism, emerged most strongly out of the MRM. Adam Kostakis, for instance, a dedicated MRA, wrote the landmark Gynocentrism Theory Lectures which inspired many, including my own humble attempts at Gynocentrism.com. My experience at A Voice for Men is that the majority who write articles or post on the site are declared anti-gynocentrists, not antifeminists alone.

Anti-MRA MGTOW

The speech of the second group is dominated almost exclusively by reference to men's rights activists, or to A Voice for Men supporters (largest men's rights platform in the world), consisting almost entirely of finding real or imagined flaws in MRA ideology. Their main soapbox is YouTube.

Most of them will frame their discussions as "against" MRAs and AVfM. While some in this group attempt restraint, saying, "I regret having to touch on the subject of MRAs again, but will do so and move on," they nevertheless return to the subject in a few days saying, "I said I wasn't going to touch on this gentlemen but I want to talk about MRAs again." And the talk about MRAs, or AVfM, goes on, and on… their primary "MGTOW" narrative.

Anti-MRA MGTOW claim that all who participate in the men's rights movement are not, indeed cannot, be MGTOW — that male self-determination, MGTOW, can never be approached within the purview of a men's rights focus. They contend that men cannot subscribe to multiple initiatives and must choose to stay "in their lane" bereft of any claim to self-determination. You can be MGTOW or MRA but you cannot be both, they say. It sometimes makes wild claims suggesting AVFM/MRA are a government-run secret agency tasked with restoring marriage to the planet; this lunacy has earned them to title pigTOW due to their ideological piggery and dishonesty.

It should be mentioned here that a significant number of the anti-MRA MGTOW have been ejected from participation in the wider MRM for trolling, violence advocacy, mean-girling, and other behaviors. That disenfranchisement is unmistakably fuelling some of their angst – a rendering pain they have been successful in recruiting others to share with them.

This behavior amounts to a usurpation of the MGTOW brand for the sake of retaliation; It's not enough to simply kill MRAs in one's mind, over and over; they need to go even further and defile the MRA-corpse as did the Greek Achilles to the lifeless body of Hector. The hate has no foreseeable end. While free speech is welcomed, one might legitimately wonder if this group would be better off calling themselves anti-MRAs, rather than MGTOW proper.

Anti-feminist MGTOW

Much like the obsession of the above anti-MRA group, the third group emphasises one issue –feminism– over the wider category gynocentrism. Feminists are the problem. Are the sub interests of anti-MRA and anti-feminist any less myopic than each other? Not really.

The anti-feminist MGTOW are best exemplified by a 2004 group of MRAs who urged that women be "instilled" with traditional femininity and nurture, and that men be "instilled" with masculine virtues. Needless to say, these recommendations fall flat with most who self-label as MGTOW, and many would argue, myself included, that such traditional-gynocentric precepts are at odds with male self-determination.

While I don't begrudge antifeminists for their focus (after all, feminism is the vanguard of gynocentrism today) I agree with complaints from anti-MRA MGTOW who cite antifeminists as ignoring the wider problem. Further, the antifeminist MGTOW tend to claim traditional gender roles were a comparatively better deal than feminism and therefore, the fight against gynocentrism should prioritize weakening feminism first and oppose traditional gender roles only secondarily. Some even suggest we should return to traditional gender roles – i.e., recommending we swap contemporary feminist gynocentrism for traditional gynocentrism.

Where we disagree with both the anti-feminist MGTOW and the anti-MRA MGTOW is that traditional gynocentrism and marriage are not advocated for by most in the MRM, and AVfM.

Put simply,

- Some anti-feminist MGTOW think AVfM should advocate marriage and traditional gender roles. We do not.
- Some anti-MRA MGTOW think AVfM does advocate marriage and traditional gender roles. We do not.

When I listen to, or read MGTOW monologues, the emphasis on one of these three categories is usually obvious. When you are talking with any self-described MGTOW, listen very closely to the things they most emphasize, for the old adage is true that What a man speaketh, so he is or You will know them by their words. Ideological categorization of people is airy and abstract, but phenomenology of speech, the words people speak, is immediate proof.

It's important to reiterate that the above classifications are based on what MGTOW most virulently reject, but for most who identify as MGTOW the discussion does not stop at being anti, or veto, but includes positive goals about how to cultivate non-gynocentric lives and relationships.

Eating while MGTOW: Look at the flowers! stoup

August Løvenskiolds · 26 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Eating well, eating healthily and eating inexpensively are my goals as MGTOW. As MGTOW we have to be smarter and more self-aware than the putative pair-bonders not only in how we manage our sexuality and relationships, but also in how we both manage and enjoy our physical existence.

I enjoy eating potatoes a great deal but eating a great deal of potatoes is not a good idea – as far as they hit your body, eating one is like eating a brick of sugar: potatoes are mostly starch that the body quickly breaks down into – yes – sugar in the bloodstream. Nutritionists measure this effect with something called the glycemic index and on that scale of 0 to 100, a baked potato rates an astounding 111 – 11% HIGHER than eating a brick of sugar (100).

So if you are watching carbohydrates in your diet, dropping or restricting potatoes and other starchy foods like rice and pasta is the only correct way to go MGTOW. For me, anyway.

A great vegetable to use in place of potatoes, rice and pasta is cauliflower.

To use it as rice, I grate it into rice-sized grains and toss it directly into stir fry dishes.

To use it like mashed potatoes, just boil for 10-12 minutes, drain well and mash like you would potatoes. I boil mine with a couple of cloves of garlic, then mash with butter, heavy cream, sour cream and/or cream cheese to get a mashed-potato-like result. Season with salt & pepper and voilà!

In college, our favorite late-night cram-time meal was Kraft(tm) macaroni & cheese mixed with browned hamburger. Not exactly great cuisine, but it was a fast, tasty and filling meal before my computer nerd friends and I slogged back to the books to memorize reams of feminist "academic" crap. I still remember being so frustrated by getting repeated grades of "B" from my feminist English professor that I stole an "A" paper written by a female friend. Her writing was so bad that I had my first red-pill moment: the only problem with my writing was my penis.

Nowadays, when I'm in the nostalgic mood for mac & cheese I fall back on my favorite way to prepare cauliflower: as a pseudo pasta product. The result is something the delightful, husky-voiced Rachel Ray on 30-minute meals would call a "stoup" – sort of stew and sort of soup.

"Look at the flowers! Stoup"
(serves one)

- Fill a large saucepan with water, add a bit of salt and bring to a rapid boil.
- Prepare 1/2 a head of cauliflower by slicing it thinly. Some of it will fall into crumbs but that is okay; gather up all the crumbs as well as the slices.
- Add the sliced cauliflower and one smashed clove of garlic to boiling water and return to a boil for 7 minutes; 6 minutes if you want a firmer result, 8 minutes for complete disintegration of the result.
- Drain in a colander while you prepare the sauce in the same saucepan.
- Under very low heat, add 1/8 cup (30 ml) heavy cream (more or less) to the pan. Half-n-half or milk will also work but these contain a bit of sugar that cream does not.
- Add about 3/4 cup (200 gm) of cubed Velveeta pasteurized prepared cheese product and stir to melt. I season the melting cheese with Sriracha Hot Chili Sauce, Mrs Dash Southwest Chipotle Seasoning blend, and freshly ground black pepper. Stir in the cauliflower until evenly coated and serve immediately.

You can augment this basic recipe with a variety of meats and vegetables. For example:

- Add 1/2 cup (120 g) of cubed or sliced ham to the cauliflower during boiling.

- Substitute broccoli or even broccoflower for some or even all the cauliflower for variety or a change of pace.
- Mix in one link of crumbled, browned hot Italian Sausage before serving.
- Add chopped fresh jalapeño or red bell peppers during boiling.
- Mix in pickled jalapeño peppers before serving.
- Bacon, hamburger, chicken, pork, shrimp – go wild if adventure suits you.

Whatever you do, make it so spicy that any delicate, easily triggered feminists in the vicinity flee in terror from both the intense, rapey flavor and the reality that you don't need them for anything any longer.

Whence "Look at the flowers!"? If you are a fan of the Walking Dead, you already know.

Some previous entries in Eating (While) MGTOW:
Buck buck chicken
Chili, no beans. I got your powder

Therapy and male circumcision grief

Lindsay R. Watson · 26 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

> Currently I am collecting information from men who have experienced difficulty coping with their circumcision grief and have sought professional help from psychiatrists, psychotherapists etc. Preliminary findings are that often therapists treat such grieving men flippantly and dismissively.

Genital cutting societies such as that of North America deny that male circumcision is a human rights violation and that men in particular suffer physically and psychologically from the procedure, and this is often reflected in therapist attitudes. As more male teenagers and adults find out from the Internet that they have lost out sexually and enter a circumcision grief process, there is a greater need for therapists to be educated that this grief is very real and should be accepted and treated seriously. (The author knows cases of attempted and actual suicide as a result of circumcision grief.)

While some therapists are empathetic and appreciate why the man is upset, more typically men report being called “nuts” or “crazy,” the therapist joking about their own son’s circumcision, “some men are happy” [so you should be too], “you cannot say lack of an orgasm is due to circumcision,” “piercing ears is just as damaging,” “some girls prefer it” or “you should be grateful” and that circumcision prevents STIs and cancer [which is unproven]. Surprisingly some therapists thought it was “just a psychological problem and not a physical one” and that “the foreskin is not a part of the penis.’

To understand how inappropriate and misandrist such reactions are, consider what would happen to a woman patient grieving over her childhood genital mutilation. A therapist would support this woman to work through her grief and there are World Health Organization guidelines published to support the therapist. A therapist would not joke about circumcision, say she is “nuts,” justify her circumcision using health reasons or tell her she should be grateful for what was done to her. This sexual bias arises from the North American social construct that female circumcision is far more physically and psychologically damaging than medical male infant circumcision. Some forms of female circumcision are more damaging, but some are less damaging in terms of amount of tissue removed, reduction in erogenous tissue, effect on mechanical and protective functions and damage to the development of sensory pathways in the nervous system.

This sexual bias is further confounded by the belief that the foreskin is a non-functional structure and is often the source of disease, a concept promoted by the North American mainstream medical profession. On the contrary, the foreskin is, like any body part, usually healthy and is a connected part of the normal penile skin, blood, muscular and nervous systems. The foreskin: provides a major part of the sensory input during sexual activities; protects the sensitivity of the head of the penis by acting as a barrier to abrasion from clothes, low air or water temperatures and desiccation; provides enough skin to accommodate the increased penile volume during erection without tears and bleeding; reduces of the force needed to penetrate the vagina; reduces friction by acting as a linear bearing between the penile shaft and the vaginal walls; and helps retain vaginal fluids during intercourse. For circumcised men, some of these functions can be regained through nonsurgical foreskin restoration.

It is hardly surprising that in response to negative therapist responses, men report feeling “terrible’, “sick”, “frustrated” and “not understood.” Men report therapists were “not helpful” and “refused to listen”. Diagnoses included obsessive compulsive disorder, dysmorphia and “obsessive thoughts,” “You’re blaming circumcision for sexual issues,” “You’re fixated on what is missing; lack of sexual feeling is just in your head,’ and “You’re obsessive about restoration.”

Strategies did not usually follow the normal treatment for grief because most therapists could not believe a man would ever grieve over a missing foreskin. Example strategies included: further evaluation, meditation, refrain from visiting restoration websites, “roll with it” and further digging to find the real cause of the problem. It is hardly surprising that men did to make follow up appointments.

Men have suggested that therapists should consider: investigating post-traumatic stress disorder, depression and intrusive thoughts; empathizing and validating the man's feelings; trying to "help sort out those feelings to reach solutions"; and being "logical and not in denial".

On entering circumcision grief men feel isolated and lonely, because they are unable to share their grief with peers, parents, partners and medical professionals for fear of ridicule. Men must be seen as being strong and in control. What works best for men who are working through circumcision grief, is non-surgical foreskin restoration and the support given to them by similarly grieving men on restoration websites. Such websites often recommend that men do not visit professional therapists for obvious reasons.

If you have experiences of professional therapy for circumcision grief please contact me at peterpinkpink@hotmail.com and I will supply a list of 16 questions most of which require brief answers.

A little blood in the mix never hurt a revolution

Paul Elam · 26 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I was young, but I remember seeing America burn in the late 1960's. I watched the television screen, wide-eyed and fearful as plumes of smoke rose from Detroit and Watts. It was much closer to home than that, too. In 1967 here in Houston a deadly riot broke out at Texas Southern University (TSU). After a story broke that a young black boy had been killed by a white Houston police officer the violence erupted quickly. The Houston Press described it as follows:

> Angry students gathered, more police arrived. Rocks and bottles were thrown. A shot rang out, wounding an officer in the thigh, and within minutes, a full-blown riot erupted. Over the next hours, HPD shot 3,000 rounds of shotgun and carbine fire into the building, and received return fire. Five hundred officers eventually stormed Lanier Hall, the men's dormitory, from which the first shot supposedly came. When the smoke cleared, one police officer was dead, one student and two officers were wounded, and 488 students were arrested.
>
> Time reported one police officer as saying, "It looked like the Alamo.[1]""

Similar tragedies were erupting nationwide, all with one thing in common: damage to primarily black assets. TSU is a predominately black university. It was pretty much the same everywhere else. Whether at the hands of black rioters or police responders (often both), it was black businesses, homes, institutions and people that bore the brunt of the destruction.

The attempt to draw attention to a history of marginalization and discrimination, aggravated by "white flight" from inner city enclaves that were left to rot in the hands of corrupt and indifferent city governments, turned inward and the afflicted suffered more. It was a tragic but arguably necessary part of the civil rights movement.

Elam Compares Internet Flame Wars to 1960's Race Riots

Of course, that subhead would be a gross overstatement. I had to say it though because it is part of my responsibility to assist the not-so-creative David Futrelle develop headlines for his blog.

And indeed, even if not nearly comparable in scope and gravity, there are some similarities. Certainly there is much more valid comparison of the American Civil Rights Movement to the Men's Human Rights Movement than there ever was to Feminism.

The cakewalk of women's liberation is best described as women telling men what they wanted and men pushing each other out of the way to be the one to give it to them. The necessary digression is to point out that overall it turned out to not be what a lot of women actually wanted, which is why women are less happy now than they were before they were "liberated."[2] Even as some imbalances between men and women did warrant correction, a rights movement for those already privileged only proved to produce a step down.

Men on the other hand contend with a set of social and legal double standards that are arguably as bad (at this time) and even easier to ignore than those of racial minorities. Just watch what happens to a black man who stands up for his rights as a black man vs what happens to him if he stands up for his rights as a man. He won't get any slack, and he is more likely than not to be crushed by his own community, even, no, especially by his fellow men. Perhaps even more than the white community it is the expectation that black men will serve black women with their heads down and their mouths shut.

Disposability means invisibility.

It is that invisibility; the invisibility of issues, of discriminations and especially the invisibility of pain that tends to pressurize to blowing points

And this is where the men's movement is not similar to, but exactly like the Civil Rights Movement. Society is all too happy to see one guy driving down the street in a Maserati and ignore the countless homeless, suicidal and desperate men laying at its feet. Or even worse, kick those men in the teeth for obstructing the view of the Maserati.

That is indeed the fuel for explosive, inwardly directed anger. And it is what we see happening, even in the nascent population of men and women who are reacting consciously and actively to the current state of affairs for men and boys.

The recent round of sabre rattling and infighting on YouTube between camps that are 98% on the same page philosophically is indicative of that problem. I have been "guilty" of it as anyone, and make no promises that I won't be a part of it in the future. It is, after all, the nature of the beast.

If anything I am grateful that the internet is not only a powerful tool to change the social narrative, it also provides a largely safe, virtual battleground for pressure to be released. And when it comes to pressure, we have our share and then some.

The challenge here isn't to create a Utopian legion of SJW-like lock-steppers with "the" message on men's rights. That is born of a herd mentality not suited to the world of most men. But rather the challenge is not to view the natural process of growth as a setback or a defeat. The world is already changing, not least proven by the fact that anti-gynocentrism is not only a thing, it is growing even as gynocentrism is being increasingly called to the social carpet.

And that is the entire point. After 100 years of an unknown Men's Rights Movement — largely buried by media and historians — one is emerging that is on the path to success because the path to success is not in attempts to change law or governance, but to change culture. Laws change because culture does and for no other reason.

Finally, the insanity of gender feminism is providing society the undeniable proof that gynocentism unchecked results in evil; that it visits harm on all men, women and children. Finally society is just starting to lift itself out of the fog of denial that has led to toxic obsession with the problems of women, real or imagined, and callous indifference to the problems of men.

How do we know this? Because MGTOW exists and is leading more and more men to drop out of society's expectations. We know it because anti-feminism is growing; because the Men's Rights Movement is no longer unknown. Indeed it is causing panic and backlash from a culture still clinging to archaic dictates which no longer serve it and have in fact begun destroying it.

And soon enough the narrative will emerge that feminism is just an extreme example of the real problem: gynocentrism.

During this process we benefit from remaining circumspect. The story of the black youth slain by a white police officer in Houston turned out to be far from true. Actually, it was a white boy wounded by another white boy. That is what started that particular riot. Well, that and a few hundred years of slavery, Jim Crow and government sanctioned bigotry.

At AVFM we will continue to do what civil rights activists did after the late 1960's in the United States. That is, we will push our message into the mainstream consciousness. Just as civil rights activists campaign against racism, we will campaign against gynocentrism. We will promote MGTOW and a marriage strike, and we will advocate for all men from all walks of life, even those who hate our guts for doing it.

We will shake people from their transfixed stares at the Maserati and refuse to allow them to ignore those suffering at their feet. And just as civil rights activists finally accomplished with racism, we will shine a light on the ignorance and bigotry of valuing one half the population more than the other based only on their sex.

A little venting on YouTube from time to time is not going to slow us down. In fact, it will likely make us stronger.

[1] http://blogs.houstonpress.com/news/2009/07/houston_101_tsu_shootings.php

[2] http://www.law.yale.edu/documents/pdf/Intellectual_Life/Stevenson_ParadoxDecliningFemaleHappiness_Dec08.pdf

Editorial note: Please help AVFM continue to provide you a quality website, and to change the public discourse on gender to one more rational and sane. –Eds

Donate

David Futrelle exploits Germanwings crash for ideological gain – big surprise

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 27 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

When Men's Rights Activists celebrate male rage, they make murder/suicides like the one that may have brought down Germanwings Flight 9525 more likely Futrelle has a long, sad history of advocating for some truly sick stuff, including the rape and torture of children "for art", and skinning men to be used as glue, but he has outdone himself with his recent shitposting about how Paul Elam at A Voice for Men, and people in general who are concerned about the well-being of men and boys caused the tragic Germanwings plane crash.

Yes, that's right – caring about the well-being of men and boys led to the depressed co-pilot slamming the Airbus A320 into the side of a mountain, killing everyone on board.

Futrelle writes, "[a]ll this would be a little more believable as a "warning" if Elam and other MRAs didn't devote most of their energy to cultivating exactly this kind of male anger — and in some cases lionizing those who have acted out this rage."

If MRAs didn't devote most of their energy to cultivating exactly this kind of male anger. Show me where, show me one single line out of the millions of lines that have been written across the manosphere where anyone, ever, suggested flying a fucking plane into a mountain.

In a desperate attempt to remain relevant and collect funds, the one-time MRA and "lapsed feminist" Futrelle exploits the brutal murder of 151 innocent people, including two infants and numerous children, bringing his "sick motherfucker" quotient up to the full 9000 points allowed on the "sick motherfucker" scale.

Hell, I think Futrelle might have broken the "sick motherfucker" scale on this one.

Futrelle references the tragedy of Tom Ball who killed himself in protest at the wickedly cruel and unfair family court system that awards support and custody to mothers and relegates men to nothing more than cash dispensers, but rather than address the actual issue of unfair courts, Futrelle cherry picks a dying man's agonized cry for help to promote the disgusting idea that women and men who think parenting should be shared equally are actually advocating for mass murder of entirely innocent men, women and children.

It's so disgusting, I can barely find words.

It's one thing to hate equality, as those who oppose rights for men do. Irony: feminists throw the dictionary around when challenged on their beliefs, citing equality as their only interest, but then literally oppose equality when it comes to sharing their rights and privileges with men.

You know what, fine. We'll carry on, bringing the message that feminism is not about equality and advocating for real, genuine equality regardless of how much feminists and their "allies" cry and scream about it.

It's quite another thing to openly write that caring about equality for all human beings is tantamount to calling for mass murder of innocent people. Male anger did not cause the Germanwings crash. Male anger at being treated as disposable,obsolete, stupid, uncaring and unworthy of any assistance is justified. Any group being treated so unjustly is right to be angry. What Futrelle is doing is saying that any expression of male anger is advocating mass murder. As far as Futrelle is concerned, male anger is not an acceptable emotion and men should just….what, David?

MAN UP?

Go fuck yourself Futrelle. But before you do, take a look at these images first. Notice anything?

They're all men. Those men you despise so much? They're up on that cold mountain picking up pieces of human beings. They are grieving, mourning, suffering and still getting the job done. How much do you want to bet that every single man up on the mountain, scraping baby parts into body bags is angry? Would you be angry, Futrelle?

Nevermind, we already know the answer to that. You gleefully watched a film in which adolescent boys were tortured, raped, forced to eat excrement and insisted dumb police officers were too dumb to know art when they saw it. Because torturing children as a form of art totally belongs in a porn shop. Yeah, people were doing art.

It seems you have forgotten, Futrelle, what it is like to be a child. Let me remind you:

Exploiting the deaths of innocent babies, school children, men, women – all of them innocent – as a way of insisting men are toxic, bad and worthless unless they subscribe to the one true ideology is beyond sick. It's fine if Futrelle and his ilk hate men. Go right ahead.

Using a dead baby to make that seem rational and reasonable makes you not just hateful, it makes you a sick motherfucker. Here is one of the dead babies you are standing on to libel the men and women who care about boys and men as much as they care about girls and women:

Take a good look, you sick motherfucker.

Rest in peace, little one. I'm so sorry for what happened to you.

We all are.

Editorial note:

Please help AVFM continue to provide you a quality website, and to change the public discourse on gender to one more rational and sane. –Eds

Proof positive that feminists don't care about women

Robert Brockway · 27 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

There is a medical condition that is easily corrected, is debilitating if not corrected, is generally cheap to correct, and only affects women. It is a huge problem in the developing world, currently thought to affect over two million women.[1]

Many developing countries lack the infrastructure to correct this condition among the many women who are impacted. Despite being easily and cheaply corrected, many of the women who live in these countries can't afford to pay for the operation to correct this condition.

The condition is known as an obstetric fistula. It normally occurs as a result of complications in giving birth and results in a tear between the vagina and the bladder or the vagina and the rectum. This results in urine or feces being discharged by the woman through the vagina. Women afflicted by this condition are unfortunately often ostracised by their communities. Even those that are not excluded from their communities are effectively housebound due the nature of the condition. Naturally this can result in a variety of mental and physical ailments.

In contrast, women in wealthy countries rarely have to concern themselves. Although very rare, obstetric fistulas still happen occasionally as a result of birth complications in wealthy countries but they are normally fixed quickly after the birth with a small operation.

The cost to correct an obstetric fistula is estimated to be around US$100-400 per patient in the developing world.[2]

That's a tiny price to pay to give someone their life back. So here we have a condition that:

- Is easily corrected
- Is debilitating if not corrected
- Is generally cheap to correct
- Only affects women

Given these characteristics it would be an ideal issue for western feminists to focus on. They could raise money for their sisters in the developing world, allowing hospitals and the medical clinics to buy the equipment and medicines they need and train staff so that they could work on fixing this serious problem today and in to the future.

But that hardly happens. Hospitals and clinics in the developing world are devoid of resources and have a shortage of staff trained to deal with this problem.

Feminists, as it turns out, do very little to help correct this problem.

There are clinics that specialise in this condition of course. One notable clinic in Ethiopia, the Addis Ababa Fistula Hospital was started decades ago by two physicians, a husband and wife team from New Zealand and Australia respectively, and continues to function today.[4] It continues to function with a shortage of resources to address this problem. Where are the feminists?

The fact that obstetric fistulas are a common and well known problem among the medical fraternity around the world means that feminists cannot explain their inaction through ignorance. There are many feminist doctors who would know of this condition and who could make the problem known among the wider feminist community. In any case, feminists do occasionally talk about the topic.[5] Apparently this doesn't extend to actually doing much about it.

They even occasionally mention organisations like the Fistula Foundation that do work to correct this problem.[6][7] The response from feminists, though, seems to be mild disinterest at best.

An operation to easily and cheaply correct this condition has been available for decades and yet we hear little from the feminists.

If feminists focussed on this serious issue rather than telling us all about mansplaining, manspreading and manslamming they might actually help some women who are in desperate need.

The lackadaisical approach of feminists to the problem of obstetric fistulas is proof positive that feminists don't care about women.

- ↑ http://www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/pmc/articles/PMC2621054/
- ↑ http://www.biomedcentral.com/1471-2490/11/23
- ↑ http://hamlinfistula.org/
- ↑ http://www.motherjones.com/mojo/2007/12/what-now-feminist-fatigue-and-global-quest-womens-rights
- ↑ https://radicalhubarchives.wordpress.com/
- ↑ https://radicalhubarchives.wordpress.com/2011/05/27/the-fistula-foundation/

My Shout from the Pigeonhole: Review of Dr. Michael Kimmel's Talk at Kennesaw State University

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 27 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Michael Kimmel, professor of Sociology and Gender Studies at Stony Brook University and the author of Guyland and Angry White Men, visited Kennesaw State University on March 24th, 2015 to deliver a speech. Several campus organizations sponsored Kimmel's appearance, such as the KSU Interdisciplinary Studies Department, the Gender and Women's Studies program, YESBody!, the Non-normative Anti-Assimilationist Students of KSU, and Kennesaw Pride Alliance, to name a few.

A recording of the speech is available on MediaFire, as is an interview ad-libbed by a Zen Men volunteer. I cannot possibly cover all of the material in one article, so I encourage everyone here to listen to the speech while taking a drive or cleaning the house.

The thesis of Kimmel's speech is that men and women are more similar than they are different. Kimmel's fans were nodding in sync to waves of validation, as evident by the googol sounds of "Mm-hmm!" or "That's Right!" every time Kimmel verbally punctuated sound bites. As an architect of manufactured context that would give M.C. Escher motion sickness, Kimmel reports arguments that seem plausible only to those unaware of how ideological paradigms distort the scientific method.

Kimmel's presentation "Mars, Venus, or Planet Earth?"* proves how important it is to know the difference between presenting a cogent argument and framing a discussion to make any dissent look wrong. Marketable sentiments easily make many a kind man too conflicted to even play devil's advocate.

Kimmel beats old drums, from praising Women's History Month as a marginalized event beside 11 Men's History Months, to telling men that they will get laid more if they just stop being so stubborn and support gender equality. This, to me, sounds like telling an obese person that bakers will sell them cheaper cakes if they support laws that help local businesses.

Pro-feminists view a smiling older white man's flagellation of masculinity as a gesture of humble affirmation, so long as they forget that Kimmel said that women are more similar than different to his targets of criticism.

It is unfair of me to focus more on a person than the point, but I must shout from a pigeonhole and mention the man who puts people like me inside of it. What makes Kimmel difficult to challenge is not his claims, but rather his ability to execute Gish Gallops around a regulated, if not already dogmatic audience.

As a white, good-looking, intelligent (and clearly humble) male college student between the age of 16 and 26, I am a citizen of Guyland, and not my own person. Even though I am a strong advocate for gender equity, gay's rights, anti-racism and generally an individual's right to choose, I am still the next "angry white man" if I make one wrong step on the minefield. Despite Kimmel's appeals to curiously contrived data, it seems that a specious understanding of historical social contracts defines a man's credibility. After emphasizing his dependence on hard data, Kimmel never accounts for missing contextual information from his presentation.

As Kimmel reminds us that he is a social scientist, I find myself wondering about his credentials as a historian or a psychologist. Kimmel asserts historical oppression of women, and my thoughts go to the 18th century female blacksmiths who worked in a "male" profession:

> Guests expect to see women cooking, cleaning, sewing, and raising and educating children in the home, and are understandably perplexed by a female swinging a hammer at a forge or planing a board at the cooper's. This curiosity often leads to questions of political correctness versus historical accuracy.
>
> –History.org, "With All the Grace of the Sex"

Never mind the authoritative role women historically played in the private sphere, the murderous contempt for wife-beaters before 1853 (hat tip to St. Estephe for the reference), and the sexual power of women over men back during the days of Lysistrata!

Politically, women influenced men in government, proving that power was not always about titles in a formal hierarchy. Kimmel also states that women died getting the right to vote. This brings to mind suffragette Emily Davison's stepping in front of race horses to the horror of jockey Herbert Jones, who expressed remorse over Davison's death like an oppressive bastard obviously would. Never mind that the greatest opponent to suffrage was other women, not the men who approved the new state of affairs.

That aside, today women are the majority voter in most developed Western nations since the 1980s [1][2][3], which brings questions as to why male predominance in government persists. Kimmel stood on stage saying that his data shows what men want, but does voter turnout data not show what women want in political leaders?

I just can't see any form of hegemonic masculinity in a society where women decide what titles men wear in government, and I don't see any of these contraindicators in Kimmel's analyses on institutional or structural discrimination. Is power simply seats in offices?

Women dealt with flawed social contracts and human rights violations, but so has every other demographic. A focus on women's suffering is a matter of salience, and there is no evidence to suggest that women were uniquely targeted in the manner suggested by prigs.

The race element of our pop history lesson is also rich with topics that render dissent taboo. In presenting history, a demagogue is now obligated to cite the antebellum slavery of the U.S. South as if it was the only period of slavery that ever existed. Arabian slave owners, white slaves, African slave traders, and trafficked children certainly do not capture the whole context either, but one must ask why Kimmel glosses over whatever does not confirm the perplexing "Bad whitey, no Ferrari!" approach to combating racism.

I'd like to offer a hypothesis on the nature of Kimmel's narrative, and this is best done from a brief tangent:

When observing how people behave, it's not enough to ask why they choose to do what they do; you must also ask why they did not choose an alternative. When I observed fundamentalist Christians of the Westboro Baptist Church variety target gays with hate speech, I asked myself why they rarely (if ever) target other groups that were clearly more offensive to their ideology such as swingers, BDSM enthusiasts, or openly Satanist purveyors of alternative culture. Instead of seeing hyper dysfunctional gang wars between exorcist brigades and Slayer fans—which would make for a damn good movie—, I see a bunch of intolerant people wrongfully prosecuting innocents like founder of modern computer science Alan Turing, and Damien Echols of the West Memphis Three. These men didn't do anything wrong, they were just "different" around the wrong people.

The West Memphis Three are young men falsely convicted on a murder charge by religious ideologues (Source: Wikimedia Commons).

I think that ideologues attack people who are, one, easy to pick on, and two, easy to frame according to a bigoted paradigm. Case in point: Gays are generally awesome people who mean no harm, which to me suggests why Abrahamic fundamentalists harass them, and not the Lovecraftian cult trying to summon Cthulhu using a goblet of month-old menstrual blood. Gays aren't scary, and some people give them a hard time because they think God approves. Whatever.

Similarly, I do not see feminists swarming strip clubs to protest objectification as much as I see them sexually abusing men trying to protect their church from vandalism, yelling at people who want to talk about issues affecting boys, attacking the jobs of IT professionals for making a "dongle" joke and reducing a scientist to tears for wearing a shirt depicting scantily-clad women.

Even if my stated examples do not represent the whole of feminism, the point is that bullies don't pick on people their own size.

Kimmel chose the life of a demagogue, which in my mind is a kind of bully. He picks on easy targets for political bashing. In a system that benefits whites and men so much, both Kimmel and his groupies seem oddly comfortable taunting it as if they know there will be no retaliation. If a pro-feminist worldview is growing as rapidly in academia as Kimmel claims, then where is this systemic oppression I keep hearing about? I certainly see systemic oppression against blacks in law enforcement and criminal court proceedings among other things, but certainly no threat to a profitable narrative pushed by feminists and social justice activists.

Through selective omission, Kimmel frames the discussion so that when a man, a white, or a white man dissents, Kimmel giddily Leans In™ to lecture the oblivious, entitled soul about how blind he his to his privilege from a position of academic prestige. So long as the selectively-applied memes of "privilege" and "Angry White Men" exist, all Kimmel has to do is draw an association to silence a critic in a room full of judgmental onlookers. After creating this environment, Kimmel claims to want a discussion.

Kimmel claimed that only about 5-6% of men commit sexual assault. In a world of "1 in 3s," "1 in 4s" and "1s in 5s," I desperately wanted Kimmel to connect the world of 20-33% female victims of sexual assault—that Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand's staff silently stopped reporting—to a world of 5-6% male perpetrators. Not even Evel Knievel would jump that gap if he was still alive.

During the Q&A, a Zen Men volunteer asked Kimmel if men could be trusted to pursue truth and justice without the guidance of feminism. Kimmel's response was a display of linguistic contortion that, if rendered on paper, would resemble David Lynch and Frank Gehry designing a NASCAR track over a drunken game of Twister. The good news is that Kimmel's answer was "Yes." I think.

If Anita Sarkessian taught us anything, the profit margins for emotional manipulation are massive. Ideologues do not sell a service, they sell a message. History repeats itself, and with each cycle comes people in new hats that make money promising everything, but delivering validation instead of solutions. It was only courtesy that kept me from snatching Kimmel's microphone and yelling news of freedom a la my dream ending to Logan's Run.

Kimmel wants to start discussions, but on his terms. He is a leading meme salesman in an economy of intellectual masturbation, where every ego stroke pushes targets of fashionable hate deeper into pigeonholes. Kimmel uses the often unchallenged epistemology of the standpoint theorist, where the perceived privilege class can never speak objectively.

Kimmel makes no mention of the responsibilities women have towards building an equitable world, and instead places the entire burden on men. To add insult to injury, Kimmel hangs pussy on a stick and waves in front of men's faces as if to say "If you big, silly lugs just care about equality, maybe you'll get more of this! Do the dishes and spend more time with your kids, that is, if a judge hasn't already told you that you can never see them again!"

I would happily accept Kimmel's empirical (?) data if I did not suspect it was a constellation of picked cherries presented as indications of a cultural habit. Feminist academicians abused early pioneers of domestic violence researchers Murray Strauss, Susan Steinmetz, Richard Gelles and Erin Pizzey, and fought to exclude awareness of male victims brought by Dr. Adam Jones in the peer-review process.

I am somehow unable to trust sources cited by a feminist orthodoxy that excommunicates inconvenient truths, especially by a man who sees me as an angry "almost-man" (to borrow language from Guyland) pining for approval . As a 4.0 student with a distinguished degree in my near future, I have nothing to prove to anyone, be they from the imaginary Guyland, or the feminist academy. I've proved to myself my capacity to think, and I reject Kimmel's insinuation that men are entitled, insecure lost souls that are somehow both incompetent enough to seek approval from the drunken fratboy in Guyland, and powerful enough to uphold a society-shifting "Guy Code" that corrupts adolescence as we know it.

If Kimmel wants a discussion, he needs to admit that anatomy is not destiny in a shared quest for equity. Otherwise, empathy for men will remain lacking in genders studies classrooms everywhere.

—

* On an interesting tangent, one of my first contributions to A Voice for Men is a poster bearing a similar message to the title of Kimmel's speech.

Photo in feature image by Stephan Röhl, distributed under CC BY-SA 3.0 (de).

Editorial note: Please help AVFM continue to provide you a quality website, and to change the public discourse on gender to one more rational and sane. –Eds

Donate

Lengthy Stardusk interview with Karen Straughan: Traditionalism, MGTOW and society

AVfM Video Source · 28 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Although this probably qualifies as “inside Baseball” to those new to the internal politics of the men’s movement, and mostly came about due to bad blood that developed between people with similar ideas but differing conclusions, this lengthy interview with Men’s Rights Superstar Karen Straughan and Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW) philosopher Stardusk (aka Thinking Ape) has some interesting insights into the future of MGTOW, MHRA and even PUA.

You can subscribe to Thinking-Ape here.

Eating MGTOW: Stuffed Chauvinist Pig

Walter Romans (TDOM) · 28 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I was a bit hesitant to write an article for this MGTOW series since it brought back college memories of my little British sports car, once again sitting on the side of the road in dire need of transport back to the service station for yet another repair I couldn't afford.

You see, back when I was a frat boy in college majoring in courses now related to rape studies, I decided that, in order to attract all the young, innocent, drunken college women that I was entitled to introduce to patriarchy, I would need a sexy little car. Instead, I bought an MG.

It looked like a car, but it mostly just sat in the parking lot at the frat house because, well, it was British and that is pretty much what British cars did back then. But I guess that is only fair since I have criticized Paul's recipes and called August's chicken boring, that I give them a chance to criticize my own recipe. So, although my MGTOW isn't quite the same as their MGTOW (NAMGTOWALT), a little diversity never hurts, right?

So I give you:

Stuffed Chauvinist Pig
(about 12-15 servings)

1 pork loin (about 5 lbs, costs about $12.50)

Trim any excess fat and starting about half an inch from the end cut a lengthwise opening along one side of the loin to within about half an inch of the other end. Cut as deep as you can without piercing the other side. The opening will form a large gaping gash into which you can thrust… well, you'll see.

Marinade
¼ cup (60 ml) white wine
¼ cup (60 ml) white wine vinegar
½ cup (120 ml) apple juice
1 tbs sriracha (15 ml) chili sauce
1 or 2 dashes Worcestershire sauce
Salt, pepper, sage, rosemary, thyme

Like anything that is about to be stuffed, the pork loin should be well lubed. Combine the marinade ingredients; place your loin into as small a container as it will fit and pour on the marinade. Put it back into the fridge and leave it alone for anywhere from a couple of hours to overnight.

You can do this with a pork loin but don't try putting off young, innocent, drunken college women. This is asking for a false rape accusation whether you indulge them or not: they may come to regret the experience and then so will you.

Stuffing
½ cup (120 ml) dry bulgur
½ cup (120 ml) dry buckwheat
2 cups (480 ml) water
Seasonings: Salt, pepper, sage, rosemary, and thyme
½ cup (120 ml) pecan pieces
½ cup (120 ml) dried fruit (I like raisins, dates, figs, apricots, prunes, cranberries, etc. Just chop anything large into raisin or cranberry-sized pieces)

Cook the bulgur and buckwheat in the water with the seasonings (it cooks the same as rice). If you've purchased whole pecans put some of your excess testosterone to good use by placing them between paper towels on the counter and violently battering them into submission with a mallet. If you've got large pieces of dried fruit, now would be a good time to hone your knife skills by chopping the fruit into small pieces. Mix into the cooked grains.

Preheat the oven to 350 degrees F (about 175 C). Remove your meat from the marinade and pat dry with a paper towel to get rid of some of the evidence. Stuff the meat with as much of the stuffing as you can.

If you know how to tie a stuffed piece of meat, then now is a good time to apply a little bondage. If not, use a few toothpicks to secure the stuffing.

Place your loin on a baking sheet and roast in the oven until the internal temperature (in the center of the stuffing) reads at least 150 F (about 65 C).

Remove from the oven and allow to rest for about 20 minutes. Remove the string or toothpicks and cut into 1 inch slices. Serve with any leftover stuffing and steamed veggies.

But wait, there's more.

No good piece of meat is ever finished until you've smothered it in white sauce.

Dilute about half a cup of mayo with some white wine vinegar until it drizzles nicely off a spoon. Add a little minced garlic and/or grated horseradish, some salt and coarse ground black pepper. Drizzle over your loin.

Voilà! Stuffed Chauvinist Pig.

Sadly, I never did become the serial rapist that my feminist overlords insisted that I should aspire to be.

Instead, my career options as either patriarch or as MGTOW were cut short when I sold the car and met a nice Asian woman who wanted nothing more than to make my sammiches, bring me beer, and massage my feet; all while working two jobs so I don't have to.

Four years later, forced genital cutting is still strange

Ron Low · 28 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Four years ago I accepted an invitation from the producers of The Learning Channel's Strange Sex series to appear and discuss non-surgical foreskin restoration and my family's business helping men undo some of the sexual damage of circumcision. I did this despite my reservations about the show's title. I know the only thing "strange" about restoring is that someone's penis was mutilated in the first place. Watch my episode here:

[vimeo 112886027 w=500 h=372]
If you watched it you'll agree they handled the topic respectfully.

I had hoped participating in the show would call attention to the fact that many men are unhappy having been circumcised, and it really did. The producers decided to run my episode to open the season, so it coincided with Genital Integrity Awareness Week 2011. The smattering of press reports about GIAW plus the fact that I was going to be on TV made me legit enough to get booked on various radio shows that week. This was punctuated by my idol (and the world's loudest intactivist) Howard Stern interviewing me for 35 minutes with his radio / TV audience of millions. See that here:

[vimeo 112981379 w=500 h=375]
As you watch the second video you'll agree that he handled the topic of restoration irreverently, but he was fully on board for infants' rights to genital integrity. After the Stern show I headed directly to the Genital Integrity Awareness Week demonstration at the US Capitol in Washington, DC. Every year we are asked by tourists what we're doing there, why protest this particular week, etc. This year the answer is that we mark the 18th anniversary of the US anti-genital mutilation law which protects only girls from forced genital cutting. The law leaves boys and intersex children vulnerable to the whims and cosmetic preferences of people who will not spend a lifetime with the result. Cutting in childhood gives absurdly haphazard results and of course denies someone's right to make a rational informed decision about their own body. We demand a law that protects everyone from forced non-therapeutic genital cutting.

One of these days a boy or intersex person who was forcibly cut after the US female-only law took effect will turn 18 and gain standing to sue over the fact that the law unconstitutionally failed to afford his/her healthy genitals equal protection (even if the surgery was not "botched"). This brave pioneer will probably be thought weird by some friends and family, and folks who read about the case. But nothing could be more natural than objecting to forced non-therapeutic genital reduction surgery. Circumcision – that's strange.

Music and Men's Issues: Domestic discord, contrition and Anita Baker's "I Apologize"

Ty Henry · 29 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

As men in the Red Pill multiverse, we can fall into the trap of conflating the predictable outcomes of perverted incentive structures with congenital character flaws inherent in "the other." While there are differences between men and women and yes, hypergamy is a natural force, it's still important to recognize capacity for agency and accountability, and not be fallaciously reductionist in our outlook.

Of course, our popular culture reinforces said structures, whether it be the most influential female singer (and self-proclaimed feminist) of her generation promoting a caricatured manhood as the ideal:

…to other singers justifying relational vengeance in the form of larceny (Blu Cantrell's "Hit Em Up Style") to rationalizing infidelity (TLC's "Creep"), to campaigns to end women's prisons, there's no shortage of messages telling women they can behave badly without suffering adverse consequences to themselves. You almost can't blame teacher Megan Denman for her confusion.

The most compelling example in recent years is how the Tiger Woods story went from a textbook case of female domestic violence to "where did Tiger stick his dick?" Never that feminism was supposed to teach us that realtionSHIP does not mean ownerSHIP; Elin Woods's payoff, literally, was $500 million, zero days in jail, and openly expressed heroine status.

Indeed, in matters of domestic discord, female hypoagency and male presumptive guilt are increasingly codified into policy or law, regardless of the level of physical violence, who initiated it, or even if there was no physical contact at all ("coercive control," "verbal abuse"). What is "domestic violence" is increasingly (and unfortunately) less about what is done, but the genitalia of the person doing it. This piece linked on the AVFM "Hot on the Web" sidebar (and a comment by Paul in another article I cannot recall) reminds us that despite the popular reinforcement of plausible deniability, hypoagency afforded to modern women, introspection is more common than we think.

Indeed, it's how we get so many women in the MHRM. Neither physical nor emotional bullying know gender in the real world, and it's refreshing to hear women in public space query aloud, "why am I treating my partner like this?"

Which brings us to Anita Baker's "I Apologize" immediately to mind. Despite what we all know (that women are just as likely, and probably more so, to singe their partners with fiery words), few and far between are melodic expressions of female contrition for a fight. Indeed, the catalogue of "I'm Sorry" songs is overwhelmingly male, which corresponds with the male trait, socially reinforced, of taking the blame, whether it was all his fault or not. The apologetic woman is not a common trope in popular music, which makes Baker's unvarnished self-repudiation all the more exceptional.

Quite possibly the most distinctive voice in R&B, the veteran chanteuse is used to breaking the mold. The song doesn't recount a physical altercation, per se, but does accurately reflect the origin of plurality of the physical disputes, based on the available research from those not in thrall to the Duluth Model Hive-Mind model of scholarship. Particularly, misplaced indignance and "bringing home problems" are not the sole province of "patriarchal oppression." The device Baker uses as port of entry into her confessional is the phone operator, whom she implores to connect her to her man, melancholy and regret palpable in her voice.

> Operator, get my baby on the line Just the other night/We had a horrible fight I admit that I, I was out of control

The subtext of the device is the novel conceit of the telephone operator as confessional priest. She unpacks her burdens, but not to relieve her guilt, but rather as a trial run.

> Operator, it was like a bad dream Lord, you should have heard The way he shouted and the way that I screamed I regret it, because I was unfair I took it all out on him Just because he was there.

The allusion is a circumstance familiar to anyone who has ever been in a relationship – using a loved one as an outlet for misdirected anger

> When the road gets rough, we say things we should not say I never meant to treat my baby that way

What makes the song most effective and sincere is the absence of the Passive Voice. The persistence of the personal pronoun "I" is like a metronome, punctuating the confession. In the chorus it's uses no less than eight times, counting background vocals.

> I apologize (Believe me I do)/Believe me I do I apologize (Honest and true)/Honest and true Because I know I was wrong/So I sing you this song And I'm tryin' to get through/And make it up to you

No dissembling, no half-measures, no passive-aggressive narcissism, no reversals ("but if you hadn't") Just a pure, unvarnished penitence. Implicit in the song is the recognition that nothing hurts more to someone than biting, acerbic words from the one they love. Baker sets an example that should be emulated by all in relationships, but is sadly only socially, morally and legally reinforced for one. Enjoy, for you are unlikely to hear its type in the near future.

Please help AVFM continue to provide you a quality website, and to change the public discourse on gender to one more rational and sane."

Donate

All feminists are tradcons

Andrew DiKaiomata · 29 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

In the MRM we often see feminists and tradcons (traditional conservatives) compared and contrasted. We hear that tradcons are almost as bad as feminists. In this article I submit that all feminists are tradcons, though perhaps not all tradcons are feminists.

The initial objection to this thesis is that feminism is radically liberal, while tradcons are conservative, so how can feminists be tradcons? The reason is that under traditional conservative expectations, as with feminism, women have much more relaxed and different rules. There's a very narrow dress code for men, but wide dress code for women. Same with hair, personal expression, and with showing feelings and the expectation that people care about your emotions, or at least will not mock them like we do with male expressions. I'm thinking of the trendy "Manfeelz," "I bathe in male tears," "I drink male tears," "Oh, I hurt your fee-fees?" compared to the traditional-conservative equivalent "Keep a stiff upper lip," and "Boys don't cry."

With feminism and traditional conservatism, women are given more relaxed rules. For feminists, bouncing their bare breasts with the word slut painted on them is an absolute right, of course men don't ever dare take on a similar "slutty" display because the dress code is much stricter with men. In feminist thought, and I think it's safe to say traditional conservatism generally, this would be labeled "creepy", with female feelings being of the utmost importance.

When we look at the shared feminist and tradcon attitudes, near verbatim talking points and views on sex and gender, it makes me wonder if feminism isn't simply a subset of traditional conservatism. When taking a broader view, we see that all feminists are in fact tradcons. Let's talk about five ways feminism is traditional conservatism:

Separate rules for women

Feminists, like all tradcons have a real hard time saying no to women. To them, as a man you need to both satisfy and protect women. Treat her with kid gloves, like a child. To them, a man should never make a woman cry, he needs be attentive to her every need. For example, They'll shout "It's never okay to hit a woman!" Not even to defend yourself or your child? Not even to protect another woman? No. To tradcons, and I include feminists when I say tradcons, women are weak, therefore innocent. Men are strong, therefore abusive. Women can hit men without violating the tradcon mindset, because "What harm can a woman really do against men? Men are stronger." This is where both feminists and tradcons mock abused men, and minimize their issues. Being stronger, to them, means being deserving of abuse.

Real men

"Man up and be a feminist!," "Take it like a man!." Feminists, as tradcons, love controlling male behavior with this idea of "The real man". "Real men are feminists" didn't you know that? I guess I must not be a real man then. And piggybacking on our last point "Real men don't hit women." That's because "Real men protect women." We need men to sacrifice to their detriment for the benefit of women, that's how you get to be a "real man." "Benevolent patriarchy" you see? It's problematic, except when it directly benefits women… in all other instances, it's "misogyny writ large."

Women and children

When the boat starts sinking everyone yells "Women and children first!" It demonstrates the selfless sacrificial love men are trained to have to women they don't even know. Yet, to a feminist and perhaps even to an everyday tradcon with quite a dim view of men, this selfless sacrificial love is actually based on a hatred of women, on misogyny. Being in the unfortunate position of hearing a feminist try to make this point, we'll just say it makes sense if you don't think about it. It's a recurring theme within feminism, the absolutely indiscriminate use of the concept of hatred with the word misogyny. This might seem like a position where tradcons and feminists disagree, the idea that love for women is hate. Yet, keep in mind the next point.

Men are after women for sex

Tradcons and feminists agree, men are only after women for sex. If he does something nice, watch out! A “nice” guy? No no, naive MRA, men are scum, they’re dangerous. Watch out for the big bad man. To them, men need to be restrained because they are like werewolves, ready to attack innocent women. As with traditional conservatism a female might “flirt” with a man, but a man in the same position is looked at as a potential predator. There’s the presupposition that a man is a up to no good with only sex on his mind, while the woman is pure and innocent. A display of male sexuality is variously “creepy” or “not appropriate,” contrasted with female sexuality where it is variously giving women a wider dress code or the title of “slut pride”. Don’t ever slut shame, you creep!

Men are super men and women are damsels

This last one is probably the biggest point to show how feminism overlaps with traditional conservatism. It screams both at the same time. “Save the women!,” “Fight for women!.” Those brave white knights, feminists, and other tradcons trumpeting the call to rescue those poor damsels. “You don’t say that to a lady,” “Check your privilege before you mansplain to a woman.” This is huge within feminism and a sentiment they love exploiting. Think Elevatorgate, Anita Sarkeesian and feminism generally. Feminism’s whole thing is the “men are evil oppressors”, “Women are oppressed” shtick.

After we consider these five points, we see how feminism is tradcon. When the male-bashing media portrays the MRM as pushing back against feminist over-reach, we have a good reference to see how there hasn’t been “over-reach” it’s simply a new kind of anti-male sentiment substituted for the old. There’s war between men and women for rights that men must lose so that women can win.

Feminism exploits traditional conservatism and our traditional thoughts to attempt to benefit women to the detriment of men in much the same way traditional conservatism expects men to sacrifice for the benefit of women to the detriment of themselves. Feminism and traditional conservatism are virtually indistinguishable, if not identical.

Funding an end to fundraisers

Paul Elam · 30 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Welcome to AVFM's most out of the ordinary fundraiser, and without a doubt one of the most important ever. Financial supporters will want to read all of this appeal, as it will explain the enormous transformation AVFM is undergoing. I will try to get all this out without writing a book, and hopefully without diluting the point, which is to raise money.

If you have been following us closely you are probably aware that AVFM has formed a Limited Liability Company (LLC) which now governs our operations. This means some very significant changes, beginning with a team of company officers responsible for operations, events and commercial opportunities that can finance the work we want to grow into doing.

That team is comprised of myself as CEO, Dean Esmay as Chief Operations Officer, David King as Chief Information Officer, Al Martin as Chief Security Officer and Peter Wright as Chief Marketing Officer.

As you might imagine the expense of pulling this together was considerable, given the rates of attorneys and CPAs. And that is not even close to all of the expenses.

For our upcoming publishing house, Zeta Press, we have had to engage attorneys to develop editor's and author's contracts and invest in the web development and ecommerce necessary to make that a reality.

All of this has been slow, arduous and expensive, and all of it has been happening in the middle of planning for ICMI '15 in Houston – an even more time consuming and expensive project than the organizational transition. At this point it has been so financially consuming that the LLC's needs preclude me from AVFM personal income for the foreseeable future. That means I have to work at something else for personal income. The LLC's needs take priority over mine.

To accomplish this I will be offering online coaching services to men only for a limited amount of hours a week in order to keep food on the table. I will be including one hour per week of pro bono work for those who cannot pay.

Another thing we have learned during this process is that these things move slowly. Contracts involve negotiations which can drag out and die as often as they succeed. And they are very time consuming.

We had fully intended to have a membership plan ready for launch with this fundraiser but it was just not possible to make that happen. So, with your kind indulgence we will do one more traditional fundraiser with high hopes for success. That money will be directly used for LLC needs and to push us to a position to do the things we really want to do. For instance, we would love to see this (or something like it) on a billboard in Houston for a month leading up to the conference.

After we get the doors open to Zeta Press and An Ear for Men, a functional Patreon page, secure our advertising agreements and make payments on conference expenses, we can then formulate a realistic set of perks for different levels of membership support. We can make AVFM more self-sustaining, financially viable and socially powerful in complete defiance of the modern zeitgeist.

We do not intend to fail at this and we have the people to get it done.

So, with that I will ask you again to reach in and help us over this hump to the next level of AVFM's ability to change the narrative on gender and sex to one that is rational and functional. As always, our deepest appreciation to those who help.

[image]
Provided byFund-Raising-Ideas-Center.com

Funraiser will end midnight CDT, April 4, 2015

Gender relations in India with Anil Kumar and filmmaker Deepika Bhardwaj

Steve Brulé · 30 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The details vary slightly but the one-sided, false-narrative of female-victim / male-villain in domestic violence is being told around the world in many different ways. Join us on March 31 at 10 AM EST (7:30 PM IST) to discuss how this narrative is playing out in India today.

Deepika Bhardwaj is a filmmaker in India whose current project, Martyrs of Marriage, explores the "legal terrorism" inflicted on men by section 498A of IPC, a law which presumes a husband is guilty when charged by his wife: "Any woman in India can file this section against her husband, his parents and relatives … at any point of marriage (even after 22 years), get them arrested."

This law assumes that the husband is guilty as charged by his wife, and the courts can issue restraining orders as well financial and residential compensation without trial. Violation of these orders is a criminal offence, and the man must prove his innocence or go to jail. Furthermore, "a two-judge bench of the Supreme Court of India reviewed enforcement of Section 498A in 2014. The court found that the law was commonly misused and often resulted in unwarranted arrests." Nevertheless, the law remains unchanged and an increasing number of women are using this law to extort money from their husbands and his family.

More than 60,000 married men commit suicide every year in part due to the draconian nature of this law, and Bhardwaj recently spoke on this topic on Ted Talks. More information about her film, Martyrs of Marriage, can be found on her facebook page.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=1_2gl7lz25E
Anil Kumar is founder of India's first Men's Rights Research and Community Center in Bangalore, India. He has been invited by Indian Parliamentary Committees several times to speak about amendments to domestic violence and divorce laws, and he spoke at the 2014 International Conference on Men's Issues in Detroit, Michigan.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Q8AZJUBBkN8
The distorted view, promoted by feminists, that domestic violence is a gendered crime in which victims are always female and villains are male has had many disturbing consequences that can no longer be ignored. Recently a man in India was accused of rape. A mob broke into the jail where he was held, dragged him into the street, and beat him death. A few days later police determined that he was innocent and that the sex was consensual.

Many people in the west believe that India is an example of an oppressive Patriarchal nation, and the media seems to feed this prejudice by focusing almost exclusively on incidents in which the victims are female, especially in so-called "honor" crimes like acid attacks (see Huffington Post). Most people are surprised to learn that an estimated 40% of acid attack victims are male (a recent female on male attack ignored by western media is also described here), and that many of the female victims are in fact attacked by other women as reported here and here, further confounding the statistics about this heinous crime! In another recent incident a woman accused her boyfriend of throwing acid on her. Further investigation revealed that the woman had thrown acid on herself and accused her boyfriend in order to punish him for cheating on her. But in the west we are only told that acid attacks and all domestic violence are crimes perpetrated by men against women.

None of these injustices can be ignored. Crimes against women have been given such an enormous priority globally that they not only take precedence over crimes against men, but they also cause us to ignore or minimize the destructive impact of crimes by women. Women and men are equally capable and equally guilty of horrendous acts. If we ignore one side, both sides will suffer as the anger, and resentment of injustice, fuels an escalating cycle of revenge.

[Ed. note: this post is reprinted with permission from Studio Brule.]

Chinese man jumping in river reveals the hidden side of arranged marriages

Mumia Ali · 30 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

> "Matchmaker, matchmaker, make me a match…"
> -Fiddler on the Roof

Millennial pop cultural news website Elite Daily reported on an interesting story over the weekend that your correspondent thinks is highly legitimate insofar as men's issues are concerned. A Chinese man named Kang Hu attempted to commit suicide by drowning himself in a nearby river rather than marry his intended bride, 30 year old Na Sung, for being "too ugly" and citing the serious damage it would do to his image. After being rescued by a policeman and a foreman using a rope tied around Kang's chest to haul him out of the drink, Kang said the following:

> "I feel bad about what happened, but when I saw her, she wasn't what I expected, and I realized she would be bad for my image. My parents had arranged this and I couldn't see any way out apart from suicide."

The story immediately resonated with yours truly because I know firsthand what it's like to have a homely gal foisted upon you by kith and kin – something I've discussed at some length previously – and the story has great interest because it belies the notion in our time of arranged marriages being something that is oppressive only to women. While no doubt women can indeed suffer under the yoke of such arrangements, the assumption and indeed the presentation of these issues in the wider advocacy press is that women women alone can and will suffer under such circumstances – never men. Kang Hu proves that to be false.

How so?

Well, the dirty little secret that no one wants to openly confront is that very often, arranged marriage was a way to palm off a less than comely lass – and quite a few sons were stuck with such a bargain. No man if he can choose it, wants to be paired off with the equivalent of Quasimodo. There. I said it. Being the Homely Gal with a Heart of Gold might sell box office tickets and fuel our romantic notions of what love and romance should be, but in real life no man who can choose it, chooses a to put a ring on a busted chick.

I'm just saying.

Perhaps what's most interesting about the story, are the comments from the ED's readership – many of them were of the "he's nothing to write home about himself!/he's so shallow!/beauty is in the eye of the beholder!" variety – all coming from female readers. If the shoe were on the other foot though – a pretty young Jungmädel being wedded off to a decidedly older/ugly man – I am sure the righteous indignation would never end. Which proves my point yet again, that women taken together as a group (NAWALT but EWALT), simply do not care about the interests, desires or needs of men, and indeed see them as illegitimate, crude, base, even "evil", degenerate and reprobate. The premise is that regardless of a woman's outer appearance, her "inner beauty" somehow entitles her to a boyfriend, a relationship, or a husband – and if she fails to acquire these things, it isn't her fault, it's the fault of a misogynist society that cruelly judges her for failing to make the grade.

Of course, if a man fails to make the grade along the metrics that women's desire in any of the aforementioned areas yet still desires a mate, well, he's an entitled prick who needs to grok that life ain't fair, and oh, Man Up.

Even assuming that the ED's lady commentariat was right and Kang was no hearthrob himself, so what? Why should people continue to peddle the lie that less than attractive people are somehow or should be jumping up and down for joy at the prospect of being yoked, forever, to someone just as jacked up as themselves? People are trying to upgrade, because no one in that situation wants a daily reminder of how bad life is for them – hence my argument that assortative mating is hardly the panacea that some in our time try to make it out to be. There's a lot of fine print involved and if anything, goes to explain how and why there is so much suffering in our world today.

No "3" is hankering at the prospect of getting together with another "3". Please don't believe the hype. Shrek was a movie.

At any rate, I can fully relate to Kang Hu – I too would have rather been waterboarded in a noble site somewhere in Eastern Europe by the CIA, rather than contend with the prospect of bedding or even being in the same room with Ms. "But She's So Nice!" – and the rank emotional manipulation at work on the part of one's own flesh and blood who are supposed to at the very least care about their kin, once again belies any notion that men don't have legitimate issues in our time (in this case, those of very basic respect and trampling over their boundaries), issues that in point of fact women themselves are at least partially at fault for.

If I could counsel Kang, I would tell him this: not only does he need to get as far away from the gal his parents tried to set him up with as humanly possible, he should get as far away from his parents as humanly possible, too – because their actions have proven that they mean him nothing good.

Why women don't need to earn the same as men

Timmy Kennedy · 30 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

International Women's Day (March 8th in this year, 2015) has just passed, and one of the hottest topics was the gender pay gap. The fact that, on average, there is a 9.4% gap between what a woman earns compared to what a man earns, disgusts many. It paints a picture of a misogynistic society. Anything that paints such a picture will, of course, be something anybody with any form of interest in gender equality will jump all over. How, in this day and age, can a woman still earn less than a man?

Well, not only can I explain why, I'm also going to explain why it quite simply doesn't matter. If anything, asking the question, "how much does the average woman earn in comparison to the average man?" does nothing but encourage gender inequality.

Warren Farrell posed a very interesting question when he wrote his book, Why Men Earn More: if men are truly paid more for the same standard of work as a female, why would anyone ever hire a man? It's a question that, in my opinion, essentially debunks the myth that men earn more because, well, they are male.

However, he didn't stop there. His research suggested that there are twenty-five key workplace decisions that men make which, in turn, allow them to earn more on average. Things like, for example:

- working longer hours,
- taking riskier or more hazardous jobs, and
- willingness to train for more technical jobs which will limit their human contact.

And there you have it: men don't earn more because of their gender. But, that's not the point of this article. Far from it, in fact.

This week, Nick Clegg secured new measures to champion equal pay. Emma Watson, in her HeForShe interview, outlined that she wouldn't stop working to reduce the pay gap.

The why, of course, is to make sure that women earn the same as men, because that would be a huge step forward for gender equality. And, you know what? That seems like a pretty important step to take in the fight for gender equality. I mean, after all, men and women are no different. They are, as we all know, entirely equal. So, why should a man earn more? Let me explain to you why it doesn't matter. Or, to take it a step further, explain why trying to champion equal pay is actually a huge step in the wrong direction. Why trying to kill the pay gap will only encourage gender inequality.

For me, it's rather simple. In the workplace, comparing, ranking and rating workers on their gender is total gender inequality. Boiling people's skills, dispositions and competencies down to their gender? Total gender inequality. Even asking the question: how much does the average man earn in comparison to the average woman? Total gender inequality.

Surely, within the workplace, comparing workers by their gender is quite simply wrong. And, hence, to make sure that all men and all women earn the same is wrong. I'm almost certain that both men and women would rather be ranked by how good they are, how qualified they are and how suited they are for their job. Surely, within the workplace, comparing workers without even considering their gender once is equality. If equality of opportunity is there, equality within the workplace, period, is there.

Consider this thought experiment: there are two jobs available. One is worth a salary of one-hundred-thousand-pounds, the other worth a salary of ninety-one-thousand-pounds – a 9% difference. Two people apply, a man and a woman. One will get the higher paid job, the other, the lower paid job. The man has more experience, interviewed better and has more appropriate skills. The man gets the better job: he deserves it.

Comparing the two candidates solely on their skills, abilities, dispositions, competencies and qualities is equality.

On the other hand, in a society which is striving to reduce the pay gap, the woman may get the better job. In turn, the pay gap will be lowered, and many will think equality is being achieved. It isn't. I'm sure the woman wouldn't want the job if her gender was the only thing that merited her it. The man deserves the better job, but won't get it because the pay gap needs to be reduced, apparently.

Reducing the pay gap is encouraging gender inequality. The most qualified, most suited, and most experienced candidates should get the job, not the most suited gender.

Let's stop reducing such an important question to a male or female question. Stop comparing workers on their gender. Stop ranking workers on their gender. Stop rating workers on their gender.

Rather, let's start asking questions like: what's the pay gap between workers with so many years of experience? What's the pay gap between workers with 2:1 degrees and 2:2 degrees, and so on. Let's stop boiling things down to genders. We don't live in a misogynistic society, and the workplace is no different.

Let's start comparing, ranking and rating workers on their qualities, skills, dispositions, competencies and abilities. Let's prevent gender inequality from being introduced into the workplace in the form of killing the pay gap.

Do you even Patriarchy?

AVfM Video Source · 31 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

This is brilliant.

https://youtu.be/qZTt6sZtvqU

And by the way, does anyone else notice the groundswell things like this almost certainly represent?

You may want to subscribe to Evan Delshaw.

When will YESBody! care?

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 31 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Kennesaw State University (KSU) student, trans-woman, and now Sentinel staff writer Jessica Fisher reported on Zen Men's recent live educational event Rape Culture Does Not Exist, which united an entire classroom of KSU students to explore non-feminist perspectives on the toxic effects of the "rape culture" meme.

Our teleconference guests included Nick Reading, Karen Straughan, Alison Tieman, Richard Rall and Anna Cherry. KSU students were welcome to come on camera and talk.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=JH6td2Sc5U8

Fisher is a member of YESBody!, a gender-ideological student organization.

During my presentation I reiterated academic and political corruption on the part of influential feminists when spreading the Rape Culture meme. Feminist students, including Fisher, framed the criticism as "feminist bashing." When Fisher did not twist words, she selectively omitted information to set a pretense that Zen Men is an unwelcoming environment.

I personally invited YESBody! to attend the event several times, and to participate in the open discussion component of the event. I didn't fuss when complaints poured in because that's what debate is about. I encouraged feminists who were there in person to challenge what they heard, and I completely opened the floor after my presentation.

Defaced Zen Men poster.

I'll admit that I wanted to see prigs have a meltdown because I think oversensitive people are hilarious, but I sincerely hoped for passionate discussion and wanted feminists to challenge Zen Men right there in person. Sadly, no feminist in attendance participated, and instead left as soon as the open discussion started despite being welcomed. If YESBody! wishes to complain about a strong non-feminist slant in the overall event, they need to take responsibility for their decision to remove themselves from what was originally a diverse pool of opinions.

Fisher's bubble is even more noticeable thanks to her interviewing YESBody! member Devyn Springer —whom they brought — and no one else. My favorite part was when Devyn apparently expected explicit personal acknowledgement in a largely unregulated discussion. Devyn called the event a cult meeting, and asked why we couldn't talk about men's issues without "bashing feminism."

I've written over 50 articles on A Voice for Men, many of which cite evidence I do not need to rewrite. All I need to do is remind everyone that feminism is a worldview, and it's not healthy to hold it above scrutiny. Zen Men members and volunteers are happy to admit if they are wrong about something but they also insist on expressing their opinions on gender without feeling shamed or disrespected. We live under dogmatic conviction to what makes us feel good, instead of what makes us think. Case in point, YESBody!'s advisor Stacy Keltner lied to the cops, claiming that I fantasized about killing women, among other things. Is this the diversity, tolerance and understanding YESBody! brings to the table?

I've been a subject of many campus police reports filed strictly by feminists because I'm not like them. Every police report fizzled away harmlessly. I hope that my readers acknowledge the attempt by feminists to harm me because I don't worship them.

Merely criticizing feminism makes people risk their jobs, if not their lives. This is enough evidence for Devyn to know that there is a monopoly in the marketplace of ideas. A land where disagreement is not disagreement, it's "bashing."

What about the defaced flyer? Was that not bashing? What about your advisor's accusations, YESBody!'s response to my side of the October debate, and all the lovely things I have caught in screenshots on YESBody!'s Facebook page? Is YESBody! ready to say that they've been perfect little angels?

Now, if I make people feel uncomfortable for having strong opinions, then they can just sit there and be uncomfortable. I cannot respect people who subjugate others using emotional manipulation, because that is the heart of a dysfunctional relationship. I don't intend to get out of bed and attack other people's feelings, but I will happily risk offending everyone to make important observations that bring sanity back to gender relations.

Fisher placed an unfair focus on me, when there were several non-feminist women at the event. Only Karen Straughan's perspective was included. Apparently heretic women aren't allowed a voice in discussions on equality and diversity. It's not misogyny if feminists do the silencing, right?

If Zen Men is woefully mistaken about everything, then why would anyone feel intimidated by what it has to say? I presented evidence showing that Rape Culture is a message of fear and emotional manipulation, and offered alternative, evidence-based options to aid victims of sexual assault.

Instead of asking questions like a staff writer for a news team ought to do, Jessica Fisher chose to make passive-aggressive tweets a la Adria Richards during the presentation and evade discussion altogether:

In response to my mentioning that due process violations threatened constitutional protections:

> Two mentions of the constitution so far tonight – the constitution was written by racists misogynists.
>
> — Jessica Fisher (@TransAnarchist) March 13, 2015

In response to my claim that rape culture is a meme that spreads hysteria:

> Conflating rape culture with 'hysteria' is part of the problem.
>
> — Jessica Fisher (@TransAnarchist) March 13, 2015

In response to my showing the class how 1880–1930 lynch mobs and rape culture ideologues rationalize crime similarly:

> The presenter compares feminists to racists. Those combating rape culture to those who lynched.

> — Jessica Fisher (@TransAnarchist) March 13, 2015

In response to my mention of innocent men being torn apart by due process violations:

> Innocent people shouldnt be found guilty of crimes – thats a criminal justice problem, not a problem sexual assault victims should deal with
>
> — Jessica Fisher (@TransAnarchist) March 13, 2015

In response to my discussing the April 4th Directive and it's recommendation of the "preponderance of the evidence" standard for allegations of sexual assault:

> "Preponderance" is enough for me
>
> — Jessica Fisher (@TransAnarchist) March 13, 2015

I'm comfortable allowing intelligent readers to figure out problems in Fisher's reasoning. For the purposes of this article, I find it more productive to compare track records. I'll do so by bouncing off one last quote by Fisher:

> Feminists and activists here at Kennesaw State University have gone through great pains to emphasize the ways that rape affects and is perpetrated by all kinds of people. This culminated in last fall's YESBody! display on the campus green.

One thing Jessica fails to mention is that at the last part of my presentation I promote the North Georgia Mountain Crisis Network (NGMCN) and provide information on volunteer opportunities for this organization. I showed my research of 142 Georgia crisis networks across the state, and proof that NGMCN actually provides shelter for men.

> If you are a man experiencing domestic violence or sexual assault, and feel that you need shelter specific to safety concerns (whether the danger is from a woman or another man), don't give up. CALL our hotline number so that we can help you through your immediate crisis. Often, a few nights in safe place can help you to come up with alternatives. In many cases, just having a safe place to stay for a few days to get some sleep, to make phone calls, firm up plans, and have a base of operation can give you the the leeway you need to regain some control of your life, implement safety plans, and turn the proverbial corner to an abuse-free life.
>
> — North Georgia Mountain Crisis Network, Inc.

Talk about an oasis in the desert!

I encourage everyone to support organizations that help all victims of domestic violence and sexual assault. For whatever reason, Fisher figured a gender-equitable shelter wasn't worth mentioning in her crusade for raising awareness for victims. Helping all victims would be helping Zen Men, and helping Zen Men is bad!

Fisher instead delightfully reminded us all about YESBody!'s underwear display. How kind of her to omit the fact that I donated the rest of the money they needed for that. Fisher also omits the fact that YESBody! members have called my donation a "bullying tactic." Since holding the event, YESBody!'s only act of "collaboration" since promising to help Zen Men during Male Students in Peril was to drop off two Hefty bags of undies for me to proxy donate to the C.A.R.E. center on campus.

So, their message is "Your money is icky, you're a piece of shit, and you will get rid of this underwear for us. Don't expect thanks, because we're taking credit."

YESBody! is a hub of pop politics, where gratitude and common decency collapse under the weight of ideological commitment. The co-presidents issued two apologies for making evidence-free character allegations, but to this day have not corrected that behavior, because to them, integrity is not as important as popularity.

Our intention was to counteract propaganda that hides victims of sexual assault and advocate for real (not perceived) victims of rape. If you wish to help, Zen Men is preparing a letter to Sen. John Lewis and House Rep. Margaret Kaiser requesting to change the rape definition in O.C.G.A §16-6-1 to recognize gay victims and male victims. Zen Men is also still collaborating with KSU administration in the (painfully slow) development of a men's shelter to complement the Women's Resource Center and provide comparable services based on sex pursuant to Title IX. I wish all missions would finish overnight, but they won't. This a long, thankless, and often depressing job.

Zen Men is doing it's part to aid victims of sexual assault, and I put tens of thousands of miles on my car networking with businesses I find in KSU databases. Most of the work I do is not reported online because it is busywork, but it is that busywork that gives me the experience to know what I am doing is right. I'm not the kind of person that sells shiny messages or promises, because I am the opposite of YESBody! in that respect: integrity is more important than popularity.

YESBody! members have violated apologies, used up my Q&A time in the November conference to make empty promises, cast my giving them money as "bullying and harassment," stood by while their friends in faculty told lies about Zen Men and it's members, and dismissed everyone who doesn't think like them.

This is the hysteria that drives toxic memes that twist reality, whether it be Rape Culture, the Glass Ceiling, Guyland or the Patriarchy. Just because Zen Men challenges ideological nonsense behind these memes does not mean we oppose individual agency. In fact, it is because we care about equity that we oppose feminism.

Zen Men expresses unpopular opinions, but that is not bashing, nor is it a reason to file police reports. If we at Zen Men even came close to acting like YESBody!, we'd be cast as a hate-group only because we lack the popularity that makes their antagonistic bigotry okay. Replace "YESBody!" with "Zen Men" and "Zen Men" with YESBody! in each of our historical actions and see if that helps you realize who needs a lesson in what it means to care about human beings.

This article originally appeared on ZenMen.org.

John Stuart Mill on chivalry

Peter Wright · 31 March 2015 · Archived copy · Original

In 1869 John Stuart Mill published his gynocentric work The Subjection of Women (SOW), stating that while people everywhere were being freed from social roles, women remained tethered to theirs, stating: "Men hold women in subjection by representing to them meekness, submissiveness, and resignation of all individual will into the hands of a man, as an essential part of sexual attractiveness." (SOW, p. 272). Ironically, Mill sympathizes with women's subjection while lauding the male chivalry that women both inspired and were recipients of. Mill contends that male chivalry, however, was not always reliable and thus must give way to a more reliable, State-enforced protection and benevolence toward women.

In light of Mill's gynocentrism, Ernest Belfort Bax published an incisive rejoinder to the book pointing out the greater injustices faced by men.

The following is a quote from Mill's venerated SOW – PW

The moral influence of women: chivalry

The other mode in which the effect of women's opinion has been conspicuous is by giving a powerful stimulus to those qualities in men which, not being themselves trained in, it was necessary for them that they should find in their protectors. Courage, and the military virtues generally, have at all times been greatly indebted to the desire which men felt of being admired by women: and the stimulus reaches far beyond this one class of eminent qualities, since, by a very natural effect of their position, the best passport to the admiration and favour of women has always been to be thought highly of by men.

From the combination of the two kinds of moral influence thus exercised by women, arose the spirit of chivalry: the peculiarity of which is to aim at combining the highest standard of the warlike qualities with the cultivation of a totally different class of virtues – those of gentleness, generosity, and self-abnegation towards the non-military and defenseless classes generally, and a special submission and worship directed towards women; who were distinguished from the other defenceless classes by the high rewards which they had it in their power voluntarily to bestow on those who endeavoured to earn their favour, instead of extorting their subjection.

Though the practice of chivalry fell even more sadly short of its theoretic standard than practice generally falls below theory, it remains one of the most precious monuments of the moral history of our race; as a remarkable instance of a concerted and organised attempt by a most disorganised and distracted society, to raise up and carry into practice a moral ideal greatly in advance of its social condition and institutions; so much so as to have been completely frustrated in the main object, yet never entirely inefficacious, and which has left a most sensible, and for the most part a highly valuable impress on the ideas and feelings of all subsequent times.

The chivalrous ideal is the acme of the influence of women's sentiments on the moral cultivation of mankind: and if women are to remain in their subordinate situation, it were greatly to be lamented that the chivalrous standard should have passed away, for it is the only one at all capable of mitigating the demoralising influences of that position. But the changes in the general state of the species rendered inevitable the substitution of a totally different ideal of morality for the chivalrous one.

Chivalry was the attempt to infuse moral elements into a state of society in which everything depended for good or evil on individual prowess, under the softening influences of individual delicacy and generosity. In modern societies, all things, even in the military department of affairs, are decided, not by individual effort, but by the combined operations of numbers; while the main occupation of society has changed from fighting to business, from military to industrial life. The exigencies of the new life are no more exclusive of the virtues of generosity than those of the old, but it no longer entirely depends on them.

The main foundations of the moral life of modern times must be justice and prudence; the respect of each for the rights of every other, and the ability of each to take care of himself. Chivalry left without legal check all those forms of wrong which reigned unpunished throughout society; it only encouraged a few to do right in preference to wrong, by the direction it gave to the instruments of praise and admiration. But the real dependence of morality must always be upon its penal sanctions – its power to deter from evil. The security of society cannot rest on merely rendering honour to right, a motive so comparatively weak in all but a few, and which on very many does not operate at all.

Modern society is able to repress wrong through all departments of life, by a fit exertion of the superior strength which civilisation has given it, and thus to render the existence of the weaker members of society (no longer defenseless but protected by law) tolerable to them, without reliance on the chivalrous feelings of those who are in a position to tyrannise. The beauties and graces of the chivalrous character are still what they were, but the rights of the weak, and the general comfort of human life, now rest on a far surer and steadier support; or rather, they do so in every relation of life except the conjugal.

Shrilling Sandberg

AVfM Video Source · 1 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Sheryl Sandbery claims that companies with more women perform better? Oh, really? Skeptorr has a few inconvenient truths to share.

Eating while MGTOW: gender binary gelatin dessert

August Løvenskiolds · 1 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

One of my previous articles on "Eating while MGTOW" drove feminists into an online rage. Both my bunnyluv Amanda Marcotte and some other chick with mammoth boobz had massive freakouts over the idea that MGTOW might organize their lives so that they can withdraw from a feminist world that openly hates us even as it loves stealing the fruits of our labor.

They are desperate to shame men who can no longer be shamed by women. They hate us and they really, really want us back so they can fail to shame us some more as they rape our wallets. No thanks, honey. It is over. Stop stalking us and get out of our kitchens.

As sweet as their feminist tears are, I prefer dessert, especially when I invent it myself.

Growing up in a small-town Southern Bible-belt traditional community almost certainly means you ate a lot of sugary, gelatin-based, mom-made desserts in school and at church potlucks. Later in life, rapey "jello shots" (flavored gelatin prepared with vodka instead of some of the water) became all the rage in the club scene that is normalized by rape culture. Add the smiling evil genius Bill Cosby as the advertizing face of Jello(tm) brand gelatin and you get the clear view of the extent to which gelatin desserts are proof that the patriarchy hates and oppresses all women through all time.

Which makes gelatin the perfect candidate for the MGTOW lifestyle cuisine.

Although packaged, pre-flavored gelatin is inexpensive, the pallet of fruit flavors is limited and the amount of sugar is appalling, especially if you are trying to cut back on it, as I am. In Dallas, all of the sugar-free pre-sweetened options in gelatin are sweetened with Aspartame(tm), which is not my favorite artificial sweetener: it tends to degrade both with age and when heated, making this sort of sugar-free Jello(tm) less than ideal, taste-wise.

So, to feed my sweet tooth, I decided to make my own.

My favorite sweetener is Splenda(tm) brand artificial sweetener (sucralose). Sucralose is also the sweetener used in the so-called "water enhancers" like Mio(tm), and Dasani Drops(tm). Many stores now carry less expensive house-brands of these products but I have tried several and have yet to find one I would buy a second time.

We drink a lot of water here in Dallas, Texas – summers are long, windy and brutally hot. I keep about 7 liters of water in my refrigerator and I use "water enhancers" as a convenient way to perk up the water's flavor.

In my area, unflavored gelatin can be purchased in bulk boxes of pre-measured packets for about one-half to one-fourth the price of flavored gelatin. I used two packets of "Knox(tm) Original Gelatine Unflavored) for my latest experiment: combining water-enhancers with gelatin to make my own customized dessert. My latest recipe:

Gender Binary MGTOW Gelatin
(makes four generous servings)

This dessert is a two-layer gelatin mold. You will need a medium-sized non-reactive container (glass or plastic, for example) that holds at least 1 1/2 quarts/liters.

First, prepare the bottom layer:

Layer one:

Juice of one lemon, freshly squeezed
3 packets of Splenda sweetener (I used the version "with Fiber")
1 packet of gelatin
2/3 tsp (3.5 ml) of Dasani Drops "pink lemonade" flavor
One cup (240 ml) of boiling water

One cup (240 ml) of ice cubes with water (or use vodka or tequila from the freezer)

In the non-reactive container, add the lemon juice and the packets of sweetener. Sprinkle in the gelatin and add the boiling water. Stir until gelatin is dissolved (about 30 seconds or less). Add the flavoring and iced water. Stir until the ice is completely melted and refrigerate immediately.

Proceed to your computer and read up on the latest feminist-driven rape hoax. There are always a wide variety to catch up on.

After an hour the first layer should be congealed enough for you to start on the second, top layer.

Layer two:

3 packets of Splenda sweetener (again I used the version “with Fiber”)
1 packet of gelatin
2/3 tsp (3.5 ml) of Dasani Drops “strawberry kiwi” flavor
One cup (240 ml) of boiling water
One cup (240 ml) of heavy cream (or a creme liquor from the freezer)
One cup frozen raspberries (or your favorite low-sugar frozen fruit)

In a new mixing bowl, add the Splenda and gelatin. Add the boiling water. Stir until gelatin is dissolved (about 30 seconds or less). Add the favoring, the heavy cream and the frozen berries. Stir briefly. Remove the container with the first layer from the refrigerator and pour the creamy second layer on top of the first. Chill in the fridge for two more hours or until set. If not eating immediately, cover before storing in fridge.

I serve a huge slab of the result (about 1/4 of it) with more fresh cream poured on top.

Here’s another version of this dessert that riffs of recipes for Key Lime Pie.

Key Lime Gender Binary MGTOW Dessert
(makes four generous servings)

First, prepare the bottom layer:

Layer one:

Juice of 15 Key Limes, freshly squeezed about 1/2 cup (120 ml)
8 packets of Splenda sweetener (I used the version “with Fiber”)
1 packet of gelatin
8 oz (226 gm) of cream cheese, room temperature
1 cup of pecan halves

In one-cup measuring cup add the juice of 15 limes and enough water to make 1 cup. Transfer to a microwave-safe container and microwave at full power for 3 minutes or until piping hot.

In a non-reactive container, add the packets of sweetener and a bit of the zest from the key limes. Sprinkle in the gelatin and add the boiling water/juice mix. Stir until gelatin is dissolved (about 30 seconds or less). Add the cream cheese and beat/mix until the mixture is uniform. Add the pecans (they should float on the surface) and refrigerate immediately.

Proceed to your computer and read up on more feminist-driven rape hoaxes..

After two hours the first layer should be congealed enough for you to start on the second, top layer.

Layer two:

3 packets of Splenda sweetener (again I used the version “with Fiber”)

1 packet of gelatin
2/3 tsp (3.5 ml) of Mio “fruit punch” flavor
One cup (240 ml) of boiling water
One cup (240 ml) of heavy cream (or a creme liquor from the freezer)
One cup frozen raspberries (or your favorite low-sugar frozen fruit)

In a new mixing bowl, add the Splenda and gelatin. Add the boiling water. Stir until gelatin is dissolved (about 30 seconds or less). Add the favoring, the heavy cream and the frozen berries. Stir briefly. Remove the container with the first layer from the refrigerator and pour the creamy second layer on top of the first. Chill in the fridge for two more hours or until set. If not eating immediately, cover before storing in fridge.

Serve the result (about 1/4 of it) with more fresh cream poured on top.

When prepared as above, the Gender Binary Desserts will both challenge the feminist notion of fluid gender roles and be thicker than the gelatin desserts you remember from your youth. Add more liquid during preparation for a softer result. If you want a very firm, chewier result you can cut the liquid down almost 50% for an extreme, radfem version of the dish.

When dealing with feminists, few things are as satisfying as delivering them their just desserts.

Previous entries in Eating (While) MGTOW:
Buck buck chicken
Look at the flowers! stoup
Chili, no beans. I got your powder

Feminists have their heads up their cant

Andrew DiKaiomata · 1 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Recently, an angry, hysterical feminist bigot with a history of compulsively lying, summarized a recent article as my allegedly writing, "…that all feminists are evil women who hate men." I searched through the article I wrote; never does the word "evil" even appear, nor do I ever imply that feminists are all women. Yet that's the best that this poor feminist with his unfortunately poor feminist reading comprehension skills can do.

That's really all any feminist can do. The often repeated "They hate teh wymynz" argument: conflating hateful feminist bigotry with women and claiming you are attacking women. I don't need to point out how that reasoning is fallacious. What's funny is the claim that only women can be feminists is a claim I've only ever heard from feminist bigots themselves. It makes you wonder; why do feminists have such bad reading and listening comprehension skills?

It seems to me their poor reasoning and reading comprehension skills are caused by feminist cant. Loaded language used to reinforce feminist ideology, especially its presuppositions.

Feminists see themselves as wizards, able to cast a sort of spell simply by redefining words or creating a word or phrase in their cant language to make their delusion true. It's a linguistic shell game:

"Oh, you don't think women are people, huh?"

"You don't believe in equality, huh?"

I don't need to point out how this thought-stopping feminist cant is absurd, though it may be worth mentioning that it's doubtful that anyone in the history of the world has ever actually said women aren't people. Yet, plenty of people claim that men aren't people they are always feminists.

Another example, with the Duke Lacrosse team or UVa, when people point out the rape story could not have possibly been true for several separate, slam dunk reasons, we are told that it actually did happen, we just support it or we are rape apologists.

What's going on here? The idea that the accused man is guilty of rape is presupposed within feminist cant. Just like "Feminism just means equality", "The accused man is guilty of rape", is presuppositional in feminist cant. The feminist therefore sees the person explaining that no crime occurred as necessarily defending rape, and therefore a rape apologist. Feminists simply have their heads too far up their feminist cant to see reality.

The possibility of a man to be accused, yet be innocent, is unimaginable to a feminist because of another layer of feminist presupposition. We are told, "It is cruel to not believe the rape victim." Why should we presuppose the guilt of the accused? Because we should believe the victim.

The accuser is presupposed to be the victim, the accused is presupposed not to be the victim of a false and malicious accusation, but the villain.

Epistemology, a concern for how we know what we claim to know, is completely missing. In feminism, it's replaced by a feedback loop where the conclusion is used as a premise to support the conclusion.

"Rape apologetics!", "Patriarchy!", "Misogyny!" If you hear these phrases, you can bet the person screeching them is a feminist. Examples of feminist buzzwords abound, loaded language full of presupposition. If you're like me, you've at one point had the strange experience of honestly trying to impart logic and reason into a hateful feminist bigot. Of course, you didn't know beforehand the feminist you're talking to is a hateful bigot; you'll learn that later.

Another stomach-churning example is the twisted tumblr feminist response to Bill Cosby, blinded with their frothing hate of him, his race and gender declare that he needs the "Emmit Till treatment." or needs to be sexually tortured to death. A well-intended, naïve person might try to interact with these vile feminist bigots, to try to change their minds. Yet, their own jargon is loaded with presupposition. If a man is accused of rape, even if there is clear and convincing proof of his innocence, a feminist deems him guilty. To a feminist, pointing out that he may be innocent isn't pointing out that he may be innocent, it's defending rape.

The feminist cant seriously gets in the way of their listening comprehension. Feminists can't listen with their heads up their cant.

Just as "Rape apologetics" is feminist cant used to presuppose their beliefs and misrepresent what is actually being said, even the term "Feminism" is used to misrepresent feminism.

People who support equal rights for men and oppose hateful feminist anti-male bigotry are almost always asked by puzzled feminists "How do you define feminism?" The question presupposes that an individual can define feminism. In reality, we don't define things, reality itself defines them. Simply defining things doesn't change reality. Reality needs to change definitions. We can't simply recast a definition like a magical spell and turn feminism into something else.

Saying "Feminism just means equality" and therefore it is so, is like saying "Let's define a unicorn as a magical flying horse with a horn on its heads that exists," then declaring that unicorns, by definition, exist.

"Feminism just means equality" is their GOTO line. When someone says something off-script like pointing out how "The Patriarchy", "Male Privilege", "Toxic masculinity", "Institutional misogyny" "Switch rape", or "Gender-criticism" are clearly different from equality and that the concept of equality existed long before feminism did, the feminist will simply blink and start back at the GOTO line, "Feminism just means equality".

In summary, "My assertion is true because it is. It is because I know it's true." It is presupposed to be true. This is how feminist cant controls their thoughts; loaded language that impedes their ability to think critically.

It's easy to see how this faulty reasoning is used to vilify people who support solutions for men's issues. Under this mindset, opposing feminist bigotry is identical to opposing equality. Not hating men means you hate women and are a misogynist. Supporting the legal principle of the presumption of innocence is identical to supporting rape. Championing men's issues is seen as identical to supporting crime, domestic abuse and rape.

Feminism has a thing with words that control thought. You may have almost lost your lunch when you heard the bigoted feminist slogan "Redefining masculinity."

Feminists see masculinity as evil. Their hateful and deluded understanding of men doesn't allow them to re-evaluate their bigoted view of men, no, that is presuppositionally true. In their bigoted brains, we need to change the definition of masculinity to something that can never ever ever be toxic – femininity. Their own feminist cant wags the dog. They don't see that masculinity is what men are like, just as femininity is what women are like, they think to put another label on what men are like will change what men actually are.

So if you've ever wondered why feminists fail so badly at listening comprehension, why they just can't understand what words mean, why they are determined to misrepresent what you say, the answer is plain; feminists have their heads up their cant.

“No Boys Allowed” day teaches girls about science, math

AVfM Video Source · 2 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Yes, “No Boys Allowed” is now a thing in US Public Schools:

https://youtu.be/wr413iKJMJA

Veemonro‘s had about enough.

ICMI 15: Building Bridges Between Men and Women in the 21st Century

David King · 2 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

[redirect]

ICMI 15: Building Bridges Between Men and Women in the 21st Century

Paul Elam · 2 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

For fifty years we have struggled with the promise of a more fair and equitable world for men and women; a world in which men and women would stand on equal ground without the burden of archaic and limiting expectations based on sex.

By undertaking a meaningful examination of gender and power, we have also attempted to remove the limitations of those expectations from the backs of our children. Such is our effort to provide them a future of fairness and equal opportunity.

Fifty years later we have only realized the precise opposite of those ideals and the reasons for this are clear.

Our quest to understand gender roles and the limitations they impose on human beings has been narrowed to a select, very limited part of the overall human experience. The goals of understanding sex-based power and powerlessness in both sexes has devolved into a rigid, ideological agenda that focuses only on disadvantages faced by women and privilege enjoyed by men. We have become a society obsessed with the struggles of one sex and indifferent, even hostile to the struggles of the other.

The result of that ill-fated path is evident.

Rather than creating a more egalitarian and principled social climate; rather than unite the sexes as legal and social equals, we have instead twisted our ambitions into a growing chasm of dysfunction, mistrust, animosity and ignorance. Rather than building new and better bridges between men and women, we have simply contented ourselves with burning the old ones down.

It‘s time to extinguish the flames, lay out the blueprints and start building again with a renewed commitment to addressing the issues of both sexes without bias or ideological corruption. We do this with the understanding that no one is exempt from the hardships or the rewards of such an effort.

This is the theme of A Voice for Men’s Second International Conference on Men’s Issues: Building Bridges Between Men and Women in the 21st Century.

On October 30 and 31, 2015 in Houston, Texas we will start corrective measures in earnest by initiating a more complete and honest dialogue; one that includes key factors that have literally been elbowed out of the way for half a century. That is male disposability and female sexual power. More succinctly, we are talking about gynocentrism — the powerful human drive to protect and provide for women, to put them first at all times and at all costs, even when doing so is detrimental to both sexes.

It is a vital conversation. We cannot limp forward as a society on concerns for only one sex, just as we cannot advance as two equal sexes by continuing to address the problems of only one of them. To row ahead instead of going in circles we must have both oars in the water.

This exploration is tough ground because it requires us to examine how gynocentrism has impacted and derailed the discussion on sex and power; how it has, in fact, done nothing more than paint a new face directly on the problems we set out to fix.

We will have to examine the clear constitutional violation of male-only selective service, male-only socially and legally sanctioned genital mutilation, the criminal sentencing disparity, male exclusion from reproductive rights and a host of other issues at which we find gynocentrism squarely at the core. In doing so, we will face the reality that equality when convenient, chivalry when not, is a glaring hypocrisy that has unhinged our efforts toward meaningful change.

We must correct where we have failed when we allowed ideology with a financial agenda to corrupt our understanding of men and women and contaminate our connection to each other.

We will have to do all this as men and women unified by the idea that all human beings deserve equal rights and equal treatment under the law, as well as the fact that all those who have those rights share equally in the price of paying for them.

A Voice for Men will bring you an opportunity to be an important part of that discussion this October in Houston. We invite you, men and women, straight or gay, of any color, nationality, religious or nonreligious, to join us. Hear provocative, fascinating speakers and enjoy shared meals and social festivities with the idea in mind that we can put society back on track to move forward instead of just continuing to set bridges ablaze.

Visit ICMI Website
Purchase Tickets

Abortion facilities: Spartan or spa?

August Løvenskiolds · 2 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The latest outrage of entitled feminist demands for more luxurious pampering comes from my honey pie cuddle monkey Amanda Marcotte, who, writing in Slate, decries the status quo that procuring an abortion might be an unpleasant experience for those feeble ladies with an inconvenient delicate condition:

> Getting medical treatments in general is unpleasant. That's exactly why health care providers should try to smooth the edges as much as possible with creature comforts. The same should go for abortion, a really common procedure that a woman runs a 1-in-3 chance of needing at some point in her life. Abortion is legal. If you want a little more misery and shame with your abortion experience, feel free to impose that on yourself, but for those who disagree, pass the fluffy robes and the herbal teas.

The for-I-am-a-Princess! gall of these feminist Antoinettes makes me consider efforts to calm myself that include bourbon and revenge porn. It is not enough that we grant them leave to kill their "fetuses": they want their servants rubbing their feet while the chugging sounds of the vacuum aspiration machine are muffled by soft, fuzzy headphones playing the dulcet tones of lesbian icons like the Indigo Girls singing Closer to fine.

A much better choice of music guaranteed to piss off every feminist on the planet would be Raelynn's God Made Girls.

Medical resources are limited and getting more dear and dire all the time. Our truly most deserving patients – wounded military veterans – face daunting treatment wait times so bad that the US Veteran's Administration even had to delay the report on the delays:

> Pending Appointments (As of 2/15/15) and Completed Appointments (As of 1/31/15) were previously scheduled for release on March 5, 2015. VA did not post patient access data on March 5, 2015 due to an incomplete transmission of January 2015 appointment data from two facilities. This incomplete transmission of data resulted in underreporting the number of Veterans' appointments completed as well as associated wait times for those appointments.

Meanwhile, as wounded veterans go untreated and even audits of their plight go unreported, Marcotte wonders "why shouldn't a health clinic aim for a more welcoming experience? I know I appreciate, for instance, having a DVD player on hand." By all means, let's put more doilies and teapots into abortion clinics before we add more doctors and nurses to treat national heroes.

Naked greed. Entitlement. Sexual incontinence. Callous disregard for nascent human life. Horrific rape hoaxes. Is it any wonder why more and more people are coming to a visceral rejection of feminists and their bloated bloviating? And that this hatred is largely divorced from the many logical, historical, and ethical failings of feminism?

The lifespans of men continue to fall 5 years shorter than women's and all feminists want is a more opulent lounge for their fat asses while they wait to kill their kids? What the hell?

Believe it or not, when it comes to abortion, I am pro-choice. Reluctantly so, but I am. Back in the 1980's I volunteered as an escort and human shield to ferry terrified and ashamed patients from the parking lot to the clinic doors – past the screaming, spitting mobs of fundamentalists that would gather like locusts every weekend outside the Routh Street Women's Clinic in Dallas.

But now, in addition to a safe space, feminists want us to give them a spa? Where, exactly, is the dictionary "equality" of feminism in any of that?

Yes, I was an idiot white knight that cared about women's rights and access to safe abortions. I was young and stupid and the ugly, evil truth of entitled princess feminism wouldn't hit me for another 5 years.

Feminists have made me regret that I ever gave a damn about them.

Fool me once...

B.R. Merrick · 2 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I was genuinely surprised and excited when Martin McKenzie-Murray contacted me from The Saturday Paper online. I've never known a McKenzie-Murray, I'd never heard of The Saturday Paper, and I've never been to Australia, though I've seen pictures. I was also, of course, a little apprehensive when someone with little knowledge of the men's movement asked for an e-mail interview exchange. However, I readily accepted because of my preference for writing on hot-button issues, as opposed to any other sort of discussion about them. I've also never done a written interview before. Furthermore, his picture was cute.

I grew more wary when I read the content of some of his articles – not because I found myself in much disagreement – but because it was clear that he was used to reporting or commentating on a wide range of issues not including the men's movement. In spite of mild misgivings, I dived in.

To say that I am disappointed in the end result is to understate. However, I am not surprised nor upset. I could tell by some of his questions that he had a different operating premise from mine, and that his premises would have to be dealt with in a longer exchange that I would not be interested in having.

As the end result is this nasty article that puts me in a tent with alleged misogynists, I am actually gladdened that someone with obvious writing talent has so completely misrepresented a worldwide phenomenon. The article doesn't need to be taken down here and it won't be. It takes itself down. All I have to do is give you one example, and not very far into the article.

McKenzie-Murray's first quote from me is accurate as far as what I wrote: concerning more violent deaths, shorter life spans, higher suicides, and more public mocking and shaming for men; but read on for his conclusion:

"It is difficult – nay, impossible – to succinctly present the philosophy of men's rights activists, because there doesn't appear to be a center. Rather, it's a jumble of resentments – some lofty but most deeply personal and idiosyncratic [emphasis mine]."

In spite of the fact that I'm not dead yet, have not suffered from a violent crime, have not been seriously publicly mocked or shamed, or many of the other extensive things I listed, I have jumped on to a bunch of resentments:

"Look there! That building is on fire! I was just in there! There's at least 15 more people in there!"

"Hey, why the resentment?"

There is no point in nit-picking at garbage. You can read for yourself how an otherwise decent and seemingly studious writer, who never fails to point out the supposed contradictions inherent in the men's movement, goes right on to contradict himself. Anyone who thinks he does not is free to point out in detail in the comments section here. It is not the intention of this article to pick apart where I was not adequately represented. (At least I was accurately quoted.) It is the intention of this post simply to give readers the full body of my e-mail exchange with McKenzie-Murray, edited for seamless reading, chronology of questions, Americanized spelling, and nothing more.

MM: What's your story? How did you come to be a men's rights activist? Is it recent conversion–or something that's been with you all along?

BR: I came into the men's movement slowly over time, beginning back in the 1990s as a college student in what's called "reparative therapy," where a man tries to lose his sexual attraction to other men and increase his interest in the opposite sex. As you can tell from my snarky comments in my own articles, that didn't go over so well. What did happen was that I spent a lot of time in the library researching issues surrounding masculinity. I did not become an activist. What happened was that I lost my taste for what I refer to as "cultural misandry," which is based on two criteria:

1. Men are utilitarian.
2. Men are disposable.

[I did not come up with the phrase “cultural misandry”, but I fail to find exactly where I first read it.] I began looking at the “straight” men on campus with a great deal more sympathy and increasing interest. What I get out of any “activism” is chiefly the opportunity to write about masculinity, which is an issue that becomes more important to me with every passing day of my life.

MM: What was your relationship like with your parents? Did it influence your later path? How?

BR: My parents are dear to me, and my feelings towards them have always been friendly. They raised me to be Mormon. They hoped for me to be married with children. I honestly sought after these things to no avail. Now that I no longer believe in God, and have gone through a sea change in how I view society, the world, and the universe itself; I find that those early influences are consciously distant, but that good and bad in those early relationships is something you take with you. That is something you either use to learn about yourself in relation to everyone else and accept and love yourself; or you let it drag you along. In short, I was raised to respect and put my trust in all sorts of earthly authorities. Now I find most established authority distasteful, so I get to spend mid-life working my own, new, unique way through society and its expectations.

MM: What other influences have exercised themselves on your philosophy? Many advocates like yourself reference Warren Farrell, for example.

BR: As far as the men’s movement is concerned, I would credit a great many authors whose names I don’t remember from those library stacks. (Ironically, I would have to thank a great many reparative therapists among them.) The main source of men’s social issues that galvanized me was, as it is for many others, the writings of Angry Harry, who is considered the father of the online men’s movement. For other social issues, I would have to credit the writings of John Taylor Gatto and Alice Miller, who both got closer to the root of all our ills by writing about the influence of government schooling (Gatto) and childhood trauma (Miller).

MM: The more sober spokesmen cite genuine equality as a goal, and the pernicious effects of identity politics on such a goal. Where do you stand on this interpretation?

BR: Well, I don’t know that I’m a sober spokesman, then, because equality, as I see that it is currently used, is politically loaded and based on a fraudulent idea: that you can not only organize society using coercion but also by treating men and women the same. Not only do I not believe in the equality of the sexes, but I do not believe in the equality of any other individual or group of individuals within either sex. This does not mean that I believe that any individual or group is superior to any other. I lost the last of that sort of thinking when I left Mormonism behind. I believe that society is self-organizing, and that within the terms set by that principle are addressed a great many issues with which the equality types are concerned.

What those who believe in equality are saying, however, is: How is it possible for a woman to tie up the courts, the media, and the personal lives of a great many innocent people back at Duke University in 2006 with an outright fabrication of rape, including no witnesses and no evidence? Such a scenario would not have happened if the sexes were reversed. That’s an example of the inequality before the law that people within the movement can see.

MM: An argument often cited is that the goal is genuine equality–but I’ve seen fairly obvious examples of misogyny in online comments. Is this fair? Are you a broad church, meaning that advocates come at this with varying levels of legitimacy?

BR: Charges of misogyny will continue to be made as long as millions go on believing that feminism is about helping women who need help and nothing more. We live in a world where men have a shorter life expectancy; where men are imprisoned far more often and for longer; where men are far more likely to die on the job; where men hold almost exclusively the top ten deadliest jobs in the world; where less men graduate from school; where there are less men in the workforce; where battered men can find no shelter; where the homeless are composed almost entirely of men; where there is lots of government money for female-specific health concerns and virtually none for men; where men are laughed at as imbeciles or sneered at as villains throughout entertainment; where more men in prison are raped than women not imprisoned; and people think we need to be concerned about suspect misogyny.

The men's movement, as I see it, is an intellectual shift in the evolution of human thought on par with various other historical social movements, and will ultimately overtake feminism by peaceful means. There are men the world over walking away peacefully to do things their own way: in Japan, in Sweden, in Australia, in America, in Brazil, In India, each for their own reasons and following their own inspiration.

MM: An example of the previous: A Voice for Men founder Paul Elam has said some incredibly incendiary things. Things that might be construed as misogynistic and incitements to violence. (For e.g. saying last year that October should be "Bash a Violent Bitch Month"). Where do you stand on this kind of rhetorical militancy? Is it helpful, or not?

BR: Anyone who thinks after reading Elam's words that he advocates for any violent solutions must also think that Jonathan Swift was in favor of eating children.

MM: I assume from your answers that "reparative therapy" was something you rejected. Can you tell me what this therapy entailed? Did it spring from your Mormonism? And what was your journey in embracing your sexuality?

BR: Yes, I reject reparative therapy along with Mormonism, and it was my access to this therapy from within a Mormon university that introduced me to the idea of change. For the most part, reparative therapy by the 1990s no longer involved revulsion or electroshock therapy (inducing vomiting in or electrocuting the subject while showing the subject gay porn). I was not tortured. Instead, we spent a great deal of time on family issues and talked about the lack of male bonding in my personal life. The premise of change may have been pointless, but it introduced me to the idea of exploring masculinity. Since I consider myself a masculine entity, the idea of finding out more about myself was intriguing.

However, ultimately the therapy was a waste of time as I now believe it is premised on many wrong ideas about men and masculinity. After reparative therapy I had simply given up on the idea of having a relationship with a woman, but I still believed in the church. Finally I stopped believing altogether and was able to fully accept myself as I am. Mormonism is about a constant drive to perfection. Now I am free to be imperfect and figure things out for myself.

MM: You talk about this triggering spells in the library, studying. Can you explicitly link your experience with reparative therapy to your studious quest around masculinity?

BR: Yes, that is the case. I would not have started reading so many books about men if I had not started reparative therapy. There lies the irony.

MM: You believe that society is self-organizing: doesn't that mean, then, that men can choose to be in the dangerous professions, or leave school earlier, etc.? If not, what forces are at work here?

BR: I believe that society can and will organize itself. It is obvious to me that, like dogs and certain other species, humans are naturally social creatures. However, we do not live in a completely self-organized society. As we become technologically more advanced, I feel that we as a species are learning ever more about our true selves. I suspect it will seem silly to future humans to be arguing over pointless lawmaking and political positioning.

Society, however, is currently coercively organized. Men living in disadvantaged parts of the world find themselves lacking a great many opportunities. Hence, they accept dangerous work and drop out of school to try to find what little they believe is better. It's hard to organize yourself when you've had your mind organized for you by so many outside influences, and when resources are hogged by wealthy people who bid the favors of world governments.

MM: Regarding violence against men–it's mostly committed by men, right? The common denominator in most violence is men. Doesn't this demand some sort of gendered framework?

BR: Violence against men by men does not reduce the seriousness of the violence, does not sufficiently explain it, and does not lead to the conclusion that violence is overwhelmingly a male phenomenon; nor should it exclude the violence done against men by women, the violence done against women by women, or the violence done against children by women. There's violence that gets reported and violence that goes on behind the scenes. More than half of child abusers and half of sex abusers are women. A significant portion of intimate-partner violence is female-initiated.

Beyond those considerations, there is a great deal of violence done by men that is on behalf of women and that meets with their approval, everything from "Support the Troops" bumper stickers to defending a woman's honor in a bar fight. Men, not women, are called upon to do the violence of society when the state deems it necessary, and then those same men are expected to turn it all off when told to stop. Male boxers, ultimate fighters, and American football players are lauded for their violent abilities, and then we are surprised when these same men are guilty of some violent crime. In short, society asks an awful lot of men and then is surprised when negative consequences stemming from what is asked are manifest. At the same time, they fall mute upon the violence perpetrated by females.

MM: Finally, regarding misogyny: there is a mix of voices–some thoughtful, some not–but in spending much time in online forums and reading many articles and open letters, I've detected an enormous amount of vitriol, misogyny and bitterness. Do you deny that the MRA scene is not seriously touched by this?

BR: An enormous amount of vitriol? I probably haven't been to those websites. I took down Return of Kings in an article I wrote last year, which claims to be a site on board with the men's movement but appears to be nothing more than a website built for hyper-heterosexualized men (alpha-male-wannabes); yet even at that site I do not see anything worth being concerned about. What I see in comments at various sites has more to do with anger and hurt. You must remember that a lot of these men have had their lives destroyed in family court. There are bound to be harsh words.

And that was it. I enjoyed the process of writing and explaining. It's a pity that none of that pleasure showed up in McKenzie-Murray's article, which, I suppose, means it didn't even puncture his brain. Regardless, I'd like to thank Marty for essentially giving me my latest article. In a barrel.

Some girls are just hot for teacher

Paul Elam · 4 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

"Think of how stupid the average person is, and realize half of them are stupider than that."

— George Carlin

The above quote was the first thing that came to my mind as a read the comments to a recent Daily Mail article "Teacher, 30, faces decades in prison after pleading guilty to 37 charges for having sex with three students and getting pregnant by one."

The anecdotal conclusions one could draw on them is a cause for despair. Based on that we must assume that the average human being, indeed the majority are too stupid to do anything but lead humanity to a brick wall.

Take a look at these 5 comments, which seem to be the only 5 to pass muster with the mods, paying special attention to the first and last comments and their respective number of up votes and down votes.

Carlin was far too generous.

As someone with a bad case of Role Reversal Repetition Burnout, I am going to use my entire month's allotment of pointing out the obvious. If the roles were reversed we would have a very different reaction to pointing out with a nudge and a wink that underage female sexual "abuse" victims are just hot for teacher; that they liked it.

Try that one at a PTA meeting.

We can up the outrage factor by pointing out that a fair number of underage female victims become willing accomplices in their own abuse. I have had female victims of sexual abuse, including incest, report that it made them feel special, that they enjoyed it, found a sense of power in it, and yes, had orgasms as a result of the sex, which they would begin initiating either for profit or sexual satisfaction or both. Just 'lil sluts, right? Awesome! Wrong.

Most people are capable of understanding that this is just an artifact of the abuse perpetrated by the adult; that the girls are simply responding to egregious circumstances they should never have had to face in the first place. Most people who can actually think, which appears to not be most people, can also figure out that there is something more complicated to the sexual abuse of a boy than high fives in the locker room and punch lines from morons on the interwebz.

This is why AVFM promotes anti-gynocentric counterculture rather than pretending we can have a direct legislative or even moral impact on a society so impaired that people openly support the sexual abuse of boys, even laughing at the problem. A society that turns into a frothing lynch mob the moment the same thing happens to a girl.

Even in the depths of George Carlin's deeply cynical worldview, you could not imagine a society as stupid as the one we live in.

So, we do what we always do here, even if we have to grimace while doing it at times. We try to reach people who aren't morons and give them something to think about which they may not have considered, like reality.

Canada’s White Ribbon Campaign denigrates women

AVfM Video Source · 5 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

DoomRulz has a poem:

https://youtu.be/pSqJ5Xqy7lE

Oh, muh soggy knees!

Nineteenth century – hotbed of false rape accusations

Peter Wright · 5 April 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The following are samples from the long and ignoble tradition of false rape accusations. They come from nineteenth century newspapers, and reveal women making false accusations for the purpose of extorting marriage vows, money, seeking attention, revenge, or other reasons. – PW

Falsely accused had to wed accusers or go to jail – 1839

Attention of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was attracted to several cases which were compromised at the very time of trial by the prosecutrix marrying the prisoner and, as it appeared to Lord Normanby to be a very objectionable practice, he had it brought under the notice of the law officers, who declared it to be illegal. He then directed a circular containing that opinion to be issued to all the stipendiary magistrates, the gaolers, to eleven clerks of the crown, and to the crown solicitors, forbidding them to authorise or connive at the solemnisation of such marriages.

The Letter: "The fact of the willingness of the prosecutrix to marry the prisoner in the case of rape has nothing to do with the question of whether the prisoner should be admitted to bail or not, save and except so far as it may or may not, according to the circumstances of each case, furnish the presumption that the charge of rape has been falsely made, in order to compel the person accused to marry the prosecutrix.

If the magistrates think, upon the whole of the case before them, that there is not a strong presumption of guilt which is described by the act of parliament, they ought to bail, whether the prosecutrix is or is not willing to marry the prisoner. On the other hand, when the presumption of guilt, founded upon the whole of the case, is strong and unrebutted, they ought not to take bail merely because the prosecutrix, in the hopes of repairing her disgrace, may be willing to marry the prisoner.

As to admitting the parties to compromise a charge of rape by marriage, the law officers state that it is illegal; and that such compromises have the twofold bad effect of encouraging women to adduce false charges of rape to compel men to marry them, and of encouraging men to commit the crime in expectation that the worst which will befall them, if brought to justice, will be to marry the victim of their lust.

False charge of rape – 1851

At the summer assizes last year two men were convicted of rape on a young woman named Mary Anne Bennett. At the following spring assizes she was tried for perjury alleged to have been committed on that trial, and the two men who had been convicted and sentenced to transportation on her evidence were brought from Woolwich and examined as witnesses against her.

Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper - Sunday 17 August 1851

GLOUCESTER.

FALSE CHARGE OF RAPE.—At the summer assizes last year two men were convicted of a rape on a young woman named Mary Anne Bennett. At the following spring assizes she was tried for perjury alleged to have been committed on that trial, and the two men who had been convicted and sentenced to transportation on her evidence were brought from Woolwich and examined as witnesses against her. She was then convicted of perjury, but some point of law having been reserved for the consideration of the Court of Appeal, Mr. Justice Talford, who tried her, deferred passing sentence. On the argument in the court above the conviction was upheld, and on Tuesday, Mr. Baron Martin passed the sentence upon her which Mr. Justice Talford directed,—the heaviest sentence that could by law be passed—transportation for seven years.

She was then convicted of perjury, but some point of law having been reserved for the consideration of the Court of Appeal, Mr. Justice Talford, who tried her, deferred passing sentence. On the argument in the court above the conviction was upheld, and on Tuesday, Mr. Baron Martin passed the sentence upon her which Mr. Justice Talford directed — the heaviest sentence that could by law be passed — transportation for seven years.

Serial false accuser – 1851

It is, we think, clear, from this statement, that this “artless” servant-girl of eighteen has been for some years past a regular trader in rapes and felonious assaults; and we trust, after this disgraceful exposure, that the law of perjury may be made to reach her. It is impossible to believe that she is in any one point the witness of truth.

In the preliminary examination before the magistrate, Mr. Clarkson said that in five instances he could prove that this girl, from the age of fifteen, had made charges of this description against persons in whose houses she had been hired as a servant. There was reason to believe she had been successful in compromising some of them, and that on one occasion she had received twenty pounds.

Much of the evidence damaging the character and conduct of this disreputable person was adduced before the magistrate; and there is little doubt that, but for the corroborating evidence of the house surgeon of the Royal Free Hospital, the accused would have been at once discharged.

Medical-men duped by false-rape accusations – 1851 science to the bolstering up of false charges, and they irretrievably damage the reputation of innocent persons. They entirely forget the real nature of their medico-legal duties, and allow themselves to be guided and influenced by what the newspapers designate the "artless simplicity" of a cunning impostor. It was long since remarked by a barrister of large experience, that for one real rape tried at the assizes there were twelve false charges; and we believe that this is no exaggeration. It is a fact, however, that scarcely a charge can be made, notwithstanding its improbability and untruth, which does not receive some medical support. Pseudo-medical science is carried away by artless simplicity. It is quite time that this system was exposed, and that the medical questions arising in a case of alleged rape should be placed in their true aspect. A medical man should not frame his opinion on the statement made by a female, but on her bodily condition at the time he is called upon to institute an examination of her person. The first question is—Has there been any recent intercourse? And secondly, if so, is there any medical evidence that the intercourse has been effected with violence? These are the questions which he is called upon to answer with a strict regard to truth, according to the best of his judgment, and wholly irrespective of any sympathy for the prisoner or prosecutrix. These questions are at all times difficult of solution: but they become especially so in the case of an unchaste woman, and when some days have elapsed.

[Medical men] entirely forget the the real nature of their medico-legal duties, and allow themselves to be guided and influence by what the newspapers designate the "artless simplicity" of a cunning imposter. It was long since remarked by a barrister of large experience, that for one real rape tried at the assizes there were twelve false false charges; and we believe that this is no exaggeration. It is a fact, however, that scarcely a charge can be made, notwithstanding its improbability and untruth, which does not receive some medical support. Pseudo-medical science is carried away by artless simplicity.

It is quite time that this system was exposed, and that the medical questions arising in a case of alleged rape should be placed in their true aspect. A medical man should not frame his opinion on the statement made by a female, but on her bodily condition at the time he is called upon to institute an examination of her person.

False rape accusation leads to perjury charge – 1852

London Standard - Monday 01 March 1852

PERJURY.

Harriet Cousins, a young woman of loose character, was convicted of perjury in making a false charge of rape, which was ignored at last assizes. On being convicted and sentenced to seven years' transportation, she thanked his lordship, but declared she was innocent.

Harriet Cousins, a young woman of loose character, was convicted of perjury in making a false charge of rape, which was ignored at last assizes. On being convicted and sentenced to seven years transportation, she thanked his lordship, but declared she was innocent.

False charge of indecent assault – 1852

Lincolnshire Chronicle - Friday 27 August 1852

A curious and instructive case of this kind came before the magistrates at Spittlegate, Grantham, on Friday last. A young girl, Rebecca moore, living with her late sister's husband, Joines, a tailor, of North Witham, brought a charge against William Wallen, a married man, in consequence, it would appear, of him having quarrelled with Joines about a pair of trousers…

The Bench dismissed the case. It was quite evident to every one that there was most gross perjury on one side or the other, and a little further inquiry would show which is the guilty party. If, as at present seems probable, the girl has perjured herself and tutored the little boy to lie, surely she should not go unpunished. Perjury of this kind is most dangerous to society, from the difficulty of corroborating it.

False charge of rape – 1858

On Wednesday at the central criminal court, a labouring man named James Harrison, was indicted for committing a rape upon the person of Mary Southeran, a married woman, and the mother of six children. We purposely omit the evidence, which spoke little of the virtue of the woman.

Mr. Sleigh addressed the jury for the prisoner, and contended that as the evidence of the prosecutrix was not corroborated, it ought to be received with great caution, and that if the woman had made the resistance that she said she had, it was exceedingly unlikely that it should not have been heard by the other parties who were in the adjoining room.

Hampshire Advertiser - Saturday 15 May 1858

FALSE CHARGE OF RAPE.—On Wednesday, at the Central Criminal Court, a labouring man, named James Harrison, was indicted for committing a rape upon the person of Mary Southeran, a married woman, and the mother of six children. We purposely omit the evidence, which spoke little for the virtue of the woman. Mr. Sleigh addressed the jury for the prisoner, and contended that as the evidence of the prosecutrix was not corroborated, it ought to be received with great caution, and that if the woman had made the resistance that she said she had, it was exceedingly unlikely that it should not have been heard by the other parties who were in the adjoining room. Mr. Baron Martin, in summing up the evidence, said—

The offence with which the prisoner stood charged with was one of the most heinous offences known to the law, and therefore they should be perfectly satisfied with the evidence before they found the prisoner guilty. There was a discrepancy in the evidence of the prosecutrix, which they could not have failed to have observed. In her examination in chief she said that at ten o'clock on the evening in question she was awoke by the prisoner entering the room and locking the door, and in her cross-examination she said she was awoke by finding the prisoner in bed with her. It would be for them (the jury) to reconcile these two statements.

The jury, after a short consultation, returned a verdict of not guilty.

Baron martin, in summing up the evidence said:- "The offence with which the prisoner stood charged with was one of the most heinous offences known to the law, and therefore they should be perfectly satisfied with the evidence before they found the prisoner guilty. There was a discrepancy in the evidence of the prosecutrix, which they could not have failed to have observed. In her examination in chief she said that at ten o'clock on the evening in question, she was awoke by the prisoner entering the room and locking the door, and in her cross-examination she said she was awoke by finding the prisoner in bed with her. It would be for them (the jury) to reconcile these two statements. The jury, after a short consultation, returned a verdict of not guilty.

False charge of rape against a clergyman – 1863

A serious charge was heard on Thursday at the Petty Sessions, at Helmington, against the Rev Lewis Moilliet, of Abberley Hall. The complaint was by a Mrs. Harriet Tyler, whose husband was gardener to the defendant's father, and in consequence of his ill-using his wife he had notice to leave the situation…

Cork Examiner - Monday 01 June 1863

FALSE CHARGE OF RAPE AGAINST A CLERGYMAN.

A serious charge was heard on Thursday at the Petty Sessions, at Helmington, against the Rev. Lewis Moilliet, of Abberley Hall. The complaint was by a Mrs. Harriet Tyler, whose husband was gardener to the defendant's father, and in consequence of his ill-using his wife he had notice to leave his situation. The defendant was asked to intercede in his behalf; but before he would do so he must see what truth there was about the charge of cruelty, and for that purpose went to the house. While there the plaintiff alleged that he made indecent overtures to her, and forcibly committed a rape—that he was there an hour—that her children were outside the house—that she screamed loudly—that none came to her assistance, and that she was in consequence obliged to keep her bed. Her husband was examined, and in many important and unimportant points flatly contradicted the evidence of his wife. She had stated that they had been married 12 years, he said that they had only been married four. Both admitted that they had been married after they had had children. Evidence was given by a man who was outside the house at the time, saying he did not hear any noise, and must have heard the woman scream had she done so. Further evidence was given, proving that Mr. Moilliet could not have been in the house more than a quarter of an hour. The charge was finally dismissed amid the cheers of the villagers, and designated by the magistrates as a conspiracy to extort money, as the complainant's husband had offered to say nothing about the matter if Mr. Moilliet would pay him £500, and pay all costs.

Her husband was examined and in many important and unimportant points flatly contradicted the evidence of his wife. She had stated they had been married 12 years, he said they had only been married four. Both admitted they had been married after they had had children. Evidence was given by a man who was outside the house at the time, saying he did not hear any noise, and must have heard the woman scream had she done so. Further evidence was given, proving that Mr. Moilliet could not have been in the house more than a quarter of an hour.

The charge was finally dismissed amid the cheers of the villagers, and designated by the magistrates as a conspiracy to extort money, as the complainant's husband had offered to say nothing about the matter if Mr. Moilliet would pay him £500, and pay all costs.

Arrest warrant for false rape accuser – 1866

Hull Packet - Friday 08 June 1866

A WARRANT has been issued for the apprehension on a charge of perjury, of Miss Ellen Allen, who last week brought the false charge of indecent assault against Mr. Moseley, a dentist, of Bayswater, London. At the trial, which we noticed last week, it appears she gave a false address.

A Warrant has been issued for the apprehension on a charge of perjury, of Miss Ellen Allen, who last week brought the false charge of indecent assault against Mr. Moseley, a dentist, of Bayswater, London. At the trial, which we noticed last week, it appears she gave a false address.

Woman convicted of false charge of indecent assault – 1866

Our readers may remember that some time ago a woman named Allen charged Mr. Moseley, a London dentist, with committing a serious assault upon her in a railway carriage. the charge broke down completely, and the woman was on Wednesday put upon her trial at the Central Criminal Court, on charge of perjury. Convincing evidence was given of the infamous character of the defendant, and of the respectable character of the prosecutor; it was satisfactorily proved that Mrs. Allen had sworn falsely, not in one but in many instances; that her dress and her bouquet were unruffled by her supposed struggles with her ravisher…

Leeds Times - Saturday 14 July 1866

A WOMAN CONVICTED OF MAKING A FALSE CHARGE OF INDECENT ASSAULT.—Our readers may remember that some time ago a woman named Allen charged Mr. Moseley, a London dentist, with committing a serious assault upon her in a railway carriage. The charge broke down completely, and the woman was on Wednesday put upon her trial at the Central Criminal Court, on a charge of perjury. Convincing evidence was given of the infamous character of the defendant, and of the respectable character of the prosecutor; it was satisfactorily proved that Mrs. Allen had sworn falsely, not in one but in many instances; that her dress and her bouquet were unruffled by her supposed struggles with her ravisher; and that she had omitted to complain of Mr. Moseley's alleged violence at the several stations at which the train stopped before reaching Euston-square. The jury found her guilty, but strongly recommended her to mercy, on the ground that "Mr. Moseley might have taken some little liberties with her"—in other words, he might have done what by their verdict they were convinced he had not done! The Recorder said he always paid great attention to the recommendations of juries, but on the present occasion he felt he should be neglecting his duty to the public if he paid any attention to this recommendation. The ground furnished for it was not of sufficient weight. It was suggested that some temptation might have been afforded by Mr. Moseley in the railway carriage, but there was not a particle of evidence to support that view. The offence was one of the most serious which could be advanced against any person, and if it had been successfully established in this instance, it would have unquestionably involved the utter ruin of an entirely innocent man. When the charge was made with the view of extorting money, and when that charge was deliberately persisted in before the magistrate, the court felt bound to pass a severe sentence, and yet the lightest which for such an abominable crime could be passed—namely, that the prisoner be kept in penal servitude for the term of five years.—No one will think the sentence too severe. Charges such as Mrs. Allen preferred against Mr. Moseley are, we fear, much more frequent than is generally supposed, as the difficulty of meeting them commonly makes the accused, however innocent, only too glad to escape by a compromise. It is not often that a lady is so indiscreet as to represent herself as the subject of outrageous violence, and at the same time present herself to the police with a highly-ornamental bonnet, undemolished, on her head, and a bouquet of unruffled flowers in her hand.

The offence was one of the most serious which could be advanced against any person, and if it had been successfully established in this instance, it would have unquestionably involved the utter ruin of an entirely innocent man. When the charge was made with the view of extorting money, and when that charge was deliberately persisted in before the magistrate, the court felt bound to pass a severe sentence, and yet the lightest which for such an abominable crime could be passed — namely, that the prisoner be kept in penal servitude for a term of five years — no one will think the term too severe.

Charges such as Mrs Allen preferred against Mr. Moseley are, we fear, much more frequent than is generally supposed, as the difficulty of meeting them commonly makes the accused, however innocent, only too glad to escape by compromise.

False charge of indecent assault – 1868

FALSE CHARGE OF INDECENT ASSAULT.

