The despair most men are facing is NOT that they are not generating raw visceral sexual attraction. It is because…

1. Our sex-centric culture has made sex and sexual attraction into an all-consuming idol.
2. Marriage has come to have more CONS than PROS.
3. Women are pursuing feminist values and are not holding up to their end in marriage.

In closing, I'll relay this story from Rowena's email. She mentioned that her 2 sons are pretty high on the LAMPS scale. She has no doubt they could generate raw visceral sexual attraction in women. Her main concern is not whether they could marry, but whether they could marry WELL. She questions whether any particular woman who grew up in a Western gynocentric culture would be prepared to fulfil her DUTIES and RESPONSIBILITIES in a marriage to her son. To her, the question is, "Would she make a suitable wife?" Rowena said this is why the women in her family are trying very hard to work on this — to be the older women from Titus 2:3-5 who set an example, teach, and guide the younger women. Their sons deserve better. She says this is not an easy task, but we must trust in the power of the Holy Spirit to do our best.

Now we've come full circle back to Jack's original topic. How can we create a community that…

1. Values Headship and teaches it to young men and women.
2. Helps steer young people around the lies and obstacles (like the implicit deceptions of sexual attraction) in order to find marital sanctification.

Thus, the theme for September will be Redemptive Masculinity.

Thanks to everyone who participated in this insightful discussion.

Footnotes

Σ Frame Axiom 7: The natural interaction defines the relationship structure according to which model it fits best, not what we think it is or hope for it to be.

Σ Frame Axiom 13, AKA Jack's Law of Headship: As a consequence of fitting God's Covenant order, Headship and Tingly Respect both yield a home environment filled with God's glory, peace, and presence, producing a sanctified marriage and providing a superiorly ideal setting for raising godly children.

Σ Frame Axiom 32, AKA Deti's Third Law of Relationships: Most women marry men they aren't sexually attracted to and don't really want to have sex with. They're willing to have sex with those men for a while, until they get what they want. Then, after they get what they want, her sexual withholding ensues, the hideous truth comes out, and marriages, families — and the men and children in them, are destroyed.

Σ Frame Maxim 34: Women rely on Men's Masculine Frame for Redemptive Introspection.

Red Pill Redemption

A Call to Mission and Revival

Catacomb Resident's post, Redemption is Not Convenient (2022-8-13), called out the need for the Christian Red Pill to focus on the topic of redemption. He writes,

> "There is something I would like to see some day: More talk of redemption among those to whom the Lord has revealed a better understanding of reality.
> It's not hard to find any number of men in the Red Pill Manosphere who can slice and dice the problems with our society. They can articulate what's wrong with western feminism as an oppressive social milieu. They can list the ways in which women lie to themselves and can distinguish between the pernicious peculiarities of our world versus the common fallen nature of men and women everywhere. They can examine the words and actions of both sexes and tell you with strong conviction just what this person has wrong when it comes to the Red Pill reality of human sexual response.
> It's fine to classify accurately men as Alpha, Beta, Delta, Gamma, etc. It's downright satanic to act like there's nothing we can do to redeem them as they are. Men who fall into these categories are still people. God made them that way, and He has a plan to use them with those various abilities and weaknesses. If all you can do is b!tch about the numerical dominance of men who aren't as special as you, and try to drive them away, then shut up and stop pretending to be a Christian.
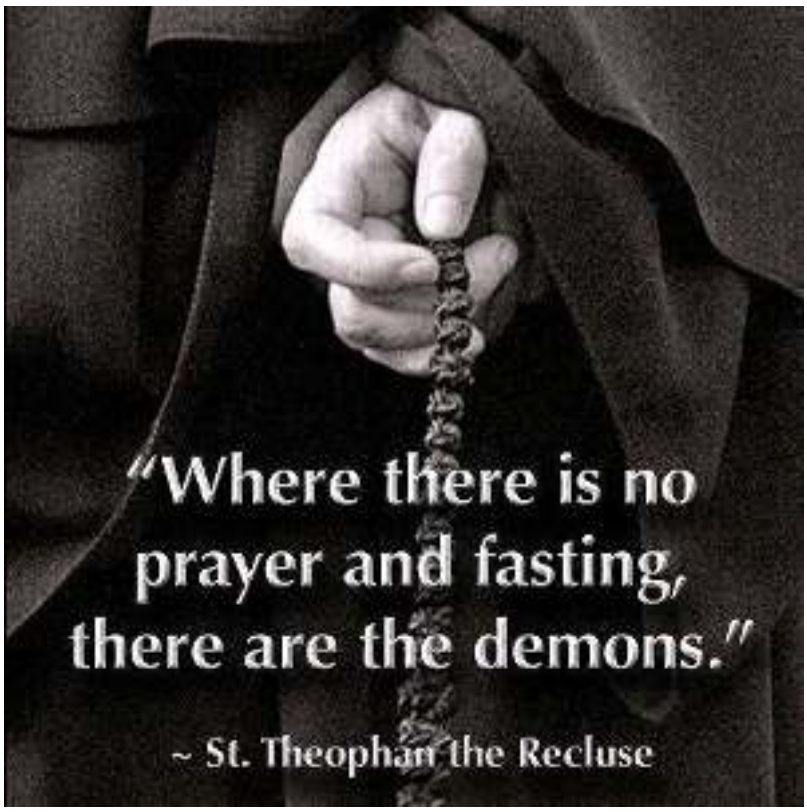
> Our Lord is in the redemption business. That's why He came, and taught, and died, and rose again. The most annoying soy-boys have a place in the Kingdom. The question is not how you identify and run them off; the question is how do you redeem them."

> "How about we start discussing this need on all those Red Pill blogs and forums? Can we start to think about a normative model of a covenant community that departs thoroughly from the rancid society in which we live? Will you pray about how to redeem all these men and women?"



This includes women too.

> "Oh, yeah — I can understand the Red Pill reluctance to handle women who let themselves go, but God made a lot of them with diminished sex appeal for a reason. Every Red Pill guy I know online has a very self-centered obsession with trophy women. How about we discuss this shameful rejection of women who aren't naturally cute, but might be a real moral and spiritual jewel if you bothered to get to know them?"
> Catacomb Resident: Redemption Is Not Convenient (2022-8-13)

Ed Hurst echoed Catacomb Resident's concern in his post at Radix Fidem: Redemption and Typology (2022-8-16).

Redemption is a topic that I have given quite a bit of attention to in my blog over the last couple years, but judging by the tepid response, I'll guess that most readers don't have much of a clue about this.

I'll admit that I am not very confident in my understanding of what redemption is and how it happens, but judging by the (lack of) responses to my posts, I probably have a better handle on it than most other men, so I'll take Cat's post as a call to action.

So I wrote to Catacomb Resident (CR) to talk with him a little bit about this, and find out what his ideas are. Specifically, I wanted to find out if my concept of redemption agrees with his, and it does. I also wanted to hear about any other insights he might have. (I'll relay these on to the reader below.)

We agreed that redemption is an under-discussed topic that needs to be covered more so that it is clear to everyone what it is and how it happens.

I concluded the real challenge in understanding redemption is not in understanding what the scriptures say about it (because Christians have heard or read it before), but in knowing what it looks like IRL and how to make choices that lead one in that direction.

So to begin with, here's a brief description of some outward indicators of redemption.

Hallmarks of Redemption

CR and I discussed the nature of redemption. CR said redemption has several definitions, but the essence is being rescued from the Devil's hands. We are born with our lives forfeited to Satan and his dominion. We are slaves and prisoners. Redemption is the process of being pulled out of his clutches, so that he no longer keeps us from all our covenant blessings. It's a process; a little here, sometimes a lot there. What that looks like is a soft definition; but to the individual man it means answering the demands of your own convictions, both for your own redemption, and for the sake of others.

Redeeming Single Men

For single men, I think a big part of redemption is…

1. Understanding and accepting who they are.
2. Rectifying who they are with who they are in Christ (i.e. confession, repentance).
3. Learning to trust God with the self (e.g. desire, ego, libido, personality) and what they have been given (e.g. intelligence level, placement in the SMV hierarchy, stewardship of resources, etc.).
4. Finding and following their God given purpose in life.

I see several significant challenges to these things as being,

1. Poor, scant, or heretical teaching.
2. Ill treatment and disrespect from women (including mothers and same age female peers).
3. Not being able to apprehend a sense of masculine power and authority (which is most painfully evident in not being able to get any traction with women).
4. Being ridiculed and rejected by other men (which CR mentioned in his post and has been discussed on Σ Frame at length).
5. More, which I'll cover in the next post.

Redeeming Married Men

Based on what I have learned and written about in the past, a man's marriage and family experience redemption when a Headship structure is attained and/or maintained. This means that God is able to use this marriage and family for His purposes towards holiness, glory, growth, and bearing fruit, rather than it being relegated to a common, real life, sitcom drama filled with gynocentrism and self-centered sins of ignorance.

Thus, men need to get away from the churchian babble, get back to the Bible, take the Red Pill, and work towards establishing their own Patriarchal-styled domain of influence.

Redeeming Women

For women, I am less clear about what their redemption involves, except we know the following…

1. A Headship covering offering guidance and accountability is absolutely necessary, and this can take the form of a father, a husband, or even a pastor or an older brother.
2. Sexual promiscuity and buying into the Feminist Life Script works against their redemption, whereas being married and especially having children is a huge boon to their redemption. Therefore, women need to pursue sexual chastity and submit to male authority (father or husband).

When discussing women, we have two issues.

1. We must establish some level of Heart Trust, and make an effort to interpret their Femtalk in order to properly understand their needs and how we are to go about leading them and washing them clean.
2. We are not women. We can only discuss what we believe we must have from them as we build a redemptive community.
3. Women as a whole are far more likely to resist the truth, partly because of their nature of being rebellious towards Biblical / masculine authority, and partly because it means taking away from them almost everything they believe they have won through feminist political and social action.

We can't do (1) or (2) very easily because of (3). Most of feminism could be summed up in the song, "Girls Just Want to Have Fun" — they want complete freedom to act as they wish and still get the marriage of their dreams later. The biblical model is just the opposite in almost every way.

The best women we can find who might contribute their perspectives to the discussion aren't likely to do so. Those who are really good at telling us about it would be a tiny few among the precious few who get it. This is why I value the input from Elspeth, Juliana, and Rowena, as well as Femosphere blogs like The Transformed Wife.

Redeeming Children

Regarding children, their redemption and their sanctification are much more likely to occur if their parents have a Headship type of relationship. The reason divorce is so destructive to children's well-being is because…

1. It prevents them from becoming familiar with the presence and nature of God (as it is demonstrated through their parent's relationship on a daily basis during their formative years).
2. It destroys their inborn hope of redemption.
3. It transforms a sanctified home environment into one of shame and fear.

The redemption and sanctification of children is an extremely important concept because a person's childhood experiences set the trajectory for how they might ultimately find redemption and salvation later in life.

Redeeming Faux-Masculine Men from the Socio-Sexual Hierarchy

CR and I discussed where we can go with the topic of redemption. In his pilot post, he talked a lot about hierarchy types (i.e. Alpha, Beta, Sigma, Gamma, etc.), and my past studies of Faux-Masculine Archetypes figure largely here.

On this topic, Ed Hurst wrote,

> "…we all have a little Alpha, Beta, Delta, Gamma, Sigma and even some Omega in us. It's exceedingly rare when any man in real life is all one thing to the exclusion of every other profile Vox Day delineated in his hierarchy. What matters is that each of those types is an avatar of how the Devil works in men to keep them captive to his false world. None of them is truly Christlike, so it's not a real "hierarchy" but simply a typology. Don't aspire to be any one of them, but seek to understand how each of them needs something that only Christ can offer.
> And because there is an established typology we can all refer to, it provides the grounds for suggesting ways we can redeem each man from the temptations and flaws inherent in each type. That we are obliged by God to deal with others is not a question anyone should have to ask. You are no doubt better equipped to handle some than others, but to dismiss one or another simply because it's uncomfortable is not the way we build His Kingdom. You can't drive them away and demand they change first, before they are fit to be in your company. Would you like to spend time before God without the blood covering of His Son?"
> "I contend that this doesn't mean excluding some of the types identified in the Sexual Hierarchy. Those are not cultural issues; those are fundamental to our human existence. You are not allowed to dismiss the Gamma Mamma's Boy just because he's annoying. You are not allowed to lock out the damaged Omega. You are obliged by the Great Commission to do all you can, whatever and however much that is. But it's utterly stupid to pretend they are equals in the operations of the Body of Christ. They are weaker members in need of healing. The Body needs strong male leadership to be ready for them and to have a plan to handle their flaws."
> Radix Fidem: Redemption and Typology (2022-8-16)

> "To the degree possible, you will identify the men in the body whom the Lord has blessed with the talents for handling the flaws of each different type. That's part of the long-term plan of building a faith community. However, that takes place within the framework of the Covenant boundaries. Those boundaries are what saves your fleshly nature from the Devil's domination. You don't keep the Devil out by keeping out his captives; you take those captives from him by asserting holiness into their lives."
> Radix Fidem: Redemption and Typology (2022-8-16)

CR and I agreed that the dismissive attitude of men trying to model themselves on Vox Day's Status Signaling Narrative is a serious problem, partly because Status Signaling aligns with the current feminist world view, and partly because it excludes the majority of average but decent men. Furthermore, Vox's mantra, "Saving the seeds of civilization while the fire rushes over the forest", focuses on societal order and fails to address the redemption of the individual man who may not subscribe to that philosophy for entirely understandable personal reasons. What Ted got right is that many men refuse to face their limitations. But he cannot deal with such men, even those of his own constituency, and you can scarcely talk about him without facing the wrath of his orbiters. Not because he encourages that, but because he draws a lot of wannabes, and they act defensive of their tribe in ways Vox never would, even though he rejects such men in principle. That's the paradox of men in his position.

Closing Statements

This month, we'll be examining the following aspects of Red Pill Redemption.

1. The factors that are posing an obstacle to men's personal and spiritual development.
2. How men can identify these factors to help mentor them and foster their growth.
3. What redemption looks like for several types of men.
4. Strategies and techniques that men can use to consolidate on their assets and establish their personal domain of influence.
5. The nature of the Black Pill and why it is a false paradigm.
6. How men are discriminated against by other men.

I've hit on all these topics before, but this month we'll concentrate on how to work around them so that more men stand a chance at finding redemption.

We would really appreciate any of the following Christian Manosphere bloggers to join in this endeavor by writing blog posts geared towards the topic of Redemptive Headship and Masculinity.

Readers may like to think about the flaws that are characteristic of each type of man and how individuals get hung up on trying to be something they aren't. CR and I are both interested in hearing how some of the commenters think they could help redeem each type. We're willing to bet the best answers will take the shape of fellowship and support in person.

If Scott's visit with Jason was so redemptive, that should help to indicate something about the limits of online discussions. It really does require us to get our hands dirty touching the lives of others. Not that it answers all issues, but that it is part of the process, and it's part of learning to live with people who struggle to change over long periods. Our compassion and patience is part of the redemption.

The 13 Harbingers of Masculine Doom

The 13 Harbingers of Masculine Doom

Ever since the sexual revolution, Western men and women alike have been conditioned, or rather converted (in the evangelical sense) to a fundamental belief in the The Centrality of Sex in Western Culture, and have since come to see the world through sex-colored lenses. The vast majority of Men have been especially hard hit by this paradigm shift because of several compounding factors I'll call The 13 Harbingers of Masculine Doom.

1. Aesthetics — The innate male susceptibility to feminine beauty and sexuality (i.e. men are visually stimulated); the desire to put on a socially acceptable image and/ or "compete with the Jones'"; Political Correctness; the neglect, rejection, or ressentiment of intrinsic beauty.
2. Bastardy / Broken Homes / Parental Divorce — Removes Headship and the metaphysical knowledge of God from the home. This kills a man's emotional affect and charisma, thereby rendering him socially inefficacious, especially with women.
3. Bitterness — Feelings of powerlessness, too much suffering, overwhelming loss, and not enough acceptance, joy, and thankfulness leads to deep resentment towards life itself and possibly towards God Himself. Men who succumb to bitterness give up, check out, retreat into their man-caves, and embrace the Black Pill, thereby missing present and future opportunities for grace, love, mercy, and renewal.
4. Chivalry — Long established male social norms of altruism and female pedestalization which feed the male ego and give a faux expression to the male mythos of heroism and honor.
5. Concupiscence — A continually aggravated sexual desire and/or a supercharged libido, leading to lust, masturbation, fornication, etc.
6. Depression — Anhedonia; blunted affect display; feeling "dead" inside; lack of energy; lethargy; melancholia; repressed anger; thoughts of suicide; etc.
7. Frustration — An arrested ego development resulting from false notions of the self and/or relatively unsuccessful intersexual interactions.
8. Hereticism — Gnostic teachings, heretical doctrines (e.g. Blue Pill churchianity, gender equality), and various misapplied scriptural eisegeses that reinforce any of these Harbingers by applying a twisted religious significance.
9. Idealism — The innate male propensity to adopt a dreamy idealistic outlook on life and/or love (i.e. Oneitis, The Soul Mate Myth, etc.); the abstract delusion of "making the world a better place", also as applied to polity and sociality.
10. Ignorance — An artificially created vacuum of Biblical truth and/or Red Pill knowledge, e.g. about attraction, women's nature, and female mating tactics and strategies.
11. Rejection — Feelings of being excluded, isolated, or unwanted; purposelessness; searching for "meaning"; social ostracization; soul wandering; "Toxic Masculinity"; etc.
12. Secrecy — Intentional secrecy in some form, e.g. censorship, coverups, hidden agendas, shadowbanning, secret societies, etc. This secrecy can also take the form of passive-aggressive efforts by Alpha males and women (including mothers and wives) to keep Men in the dark.

13. Sex Culture — A sexualized acculturation in a sex saturated culture shifts the focus of male awareness to a preoccupation on the things of the flesh; Feminism; Gynocentrism; etc.

Strongholds

Many of these Harbingers operate in conjunction with one another, and thereby create a self-supporting stronghold of sin and shame for men. Some of these strongholds are well-known to us, but others, not so much.

1. Feminism is a combination of Aesthetics, (Female) Concupiscence, Chivalry, Idealism, Ignorance, Rejection, Secrecy, and Sex Culture
2. The paradigmatic Blue Pill is a combination of Aesthetics, Chivalry, Frustration, Idealism, Ignorance, and Secrecy.
3. The Black Pill is a combination of Bitterness, Depression, Frustration, Rejection, and Sex Culture.
4. Convergent Churchianity is a combination of Chivalry, Frustration, Hereticism, Idealism, and Ignorance.
5. The stronghold of Lust (e.g., masturbation, OASIS, p0rnography, etc.) is a combination of Aesthetics, Bastardy, Concupiscence, Frustration, Idealism, Ignorance, Secrecy, and Sex Culture. Here, the innate male susceptibility to sexual aesthetics combined with a sex saturated culture culminates in (1) a psychological obsession with aesthetic female attractiveness and beauty (i.e. indicators of female fertility, HWR, cleavage, etc.), (2) an intense thirst for visual titillation (p0rn), leading to lust, masturbation, and the use of p0rnography.
6. The Occult is a combination of Hereticism, Rejection, and Secrecy.

Also…

- The Red Pill is a clinical analysis of these Harbingers.
- The White Pill is trusting God to successfully deal with these Harbingers.

Faux-Masculine Archetypes

These 13 harbingers are manifested in particular concentrations (given in the list below) in the following Faux-Masculine Archetypes. Some archetypes are borne out of particular strongholds (given in brackets).

1. Bad@ss Chad = Aesthetics — Rejection.
2. Mopey Dopey = Depression + Frustration + Rejection.
3. The Abusive Criminal / Thug = Bastardy + Frustration + Rejection.
4. The Armchair Philosopher = Frustration + Idealism.
5. The Blue Pilled Alpha = [The Blue Pill] + Hereticism + Sex Culture.
6. The Bungling Dimwitted Lazy Husband = Aesthetics + Hereticism + Ignorance + Rejection
7. The Boring Loyal Dude = Chivalry + Idealism + Rejection
8. The Dark Triad = Aesthetics + Concupiscence + Secrecy + Sex Culture.
9. The Decadent Christian (Antimonianism) = Aesthetics + Concupiscence + Hereticism.
10. The Decadent Christian (Ressentimentalism) = Aesthetics + Hereticism + Idealism.
11. The Decadent Christian (Legalism) = Frustration + Hereticism + Idealism + Rejection.
12. The Incel = Bitterness + Frustration + Ignorance + Rejection + Sex Culture.
13. The Lecherous Horndog = Aesthetics + Concupiscence + Sex Culture.
14. The Male Feminist = [Feminism].
15. The Playboy = Aesthetics + Idealism.
16. The Responsible Figurehead / Sock Puppet = Chivalry + Hereticism + Secrecy.
17. The Sebaceous Soy Boy = Hereticism + Ignorance + Rejection.
18. The Simp = Bastardy + Ignorance + Rejection
19. The White Knight = [The Blue Pill] + Concupiscence + Hereticism.
20. The Workaholic = Aesthetics + Depression + Frustration + Idealism + Rejection.

It should be noted that if any of these types subscribe to any of the various Strongholds listed in the previous section, then the Harbingers associated with that Stronghold are added to the Harbingers inherent in that type. The compounding effect of these factors is why churchianity is a Beta Factory.

The sum total of all these factors have led the vast majority of males to become pussy whipped without the typically accompanying allure of honeycraft.

Causes / Sources

In the past, cultural influences (feminism, divorce, widespread sexual promiscuity, etc.) and various aspects of churchianity (Chivalry, complementarianism, etc.) have been summarily blamed for the downfall of men. However, when we look closely at the 13 Harbingers listed above, we see that these Harbingers can be categorized into the following groups with some overlap.

1. Innate male tendencies — Aesthetics, Concupiscence, Idealism, and some aspects of Chivalry (i.e. being a defender and protector, dignity, ego, heroism, honor).
2. False Worldly Beliefs — Chivalry, Frustration, Hereticism, Idealism, Sex Culture,
3. Promulgated by Men (e.g. cruel Alpha males, absent or careless fathers, heretical pastors, etc.) — Bastardy, Hereticism, Ignorance, Secrecy
4. Perpetuated by Women — Bastardy / Divorce, Ignorance, Secrecy.
5. Compounding Factors — Bastardy / Parental Divorce, Bitterness, Depression, Hereticism, Rejection, Sex Culture.

Therefore, instead of blaming feminism or churchianity for men's woes, we could make better progress in liberating men from sin by checking whether any of these Harbingers exist in the men around us, making them aware of it, and doing what we can to help them break free. In ages past, this was called accountability, mentoring, and/or teaching, but today, there is a shroud of ignorance that needs to be cut through first before accountability can take place. So mentoring and teaching is paramount.

Bastards

A modern revised understanding of the concept.

Origins of the Term

In reduced form, b@stard means "unusual", "odd", or "doesn't fit".

The traditional definition of a b@stard means one born out of wedlock or from an illegitimate or immoral relationship.

> "Illegitimate child," early 13c., from Old French bastard "acknowledged child of a nobleman by a woman other than his wife" (11c., Modern French bâtard), probably from fils de bast "packsaddle son," meaning a child conceived on an improvised bed (saddles often doubled as beds while traveling), with pejorative ending -art (see -ard). Alternative possibly is that the word is from Proto-Germanic *banstiz "barn," equally suggestive of low origin.
> Etymology Online: Bastard

The term has been used to describe certain types of odd tools and weapons used for unique purposes since the early 14th century.

In the late 14th century, it was used to describe things spurious, not pure, or not genuine, having the appearance of being genuine, of abnormal or irregular shape or size, and of mongrels or mixed breeds.

The figurative sense of the word has been "to debase; to make degenerate" since the 1580s.

It didn't become a generic vulgar term of abuse until the 1830s — a time when the number of orphans grew rapidly and it was commonly observed that (1) single mothers did not want to keep their children without a man around, and (2) these fatherless / unwanted children were typically odd, mongrelized, and degenerate b@stards.

All these traditional definitions have become archaic since marriage has fallen out of vogue and cohabitation is now extremely common, such that having children outside of marriage has become so much more the norm.

However, I'd like for us to reconsider our concept of what constitutes a b@stard.

What exactly is a B@stard?

The word has both denotative and connotative definitions which arose through the historical usage of the term.

Concerning the denotative definition, a b@stard is a child that was born out of wedlock, and by extension, one who had a father who wasn't known, or wasn't present.

The connotative concept of a b@stard is someone who is demonstrably untrustworthy, emotionally shifty and unpredictable, mildly psychotic, morally degenerate, or profoundly odd, but yet has no sense of awareness about what it is about him that makes him so, and therefore thinks of himself as entirely normal.

The denotative and connotative concepts of a b@stard did not haphazardly originate by chance, but are directly related through cause and effect.

The denotative understanding of not having a father around during one's formative years has recognizable effects on the development of one's character and personality, which in turn form the outwardly observable traits of a connotative b@stard.

Thus, a more precise understanding of the b@stard phenomenon of identity can be explained by more accurately defining a b@stard as someone who grew up without a father and therefore did not have a fatherly influence during one's formative development.

A looser, but more comprehensive definition of a b@stard is someone who grew up in a home devoid of Headship, i.e. one lacking masculine authority.

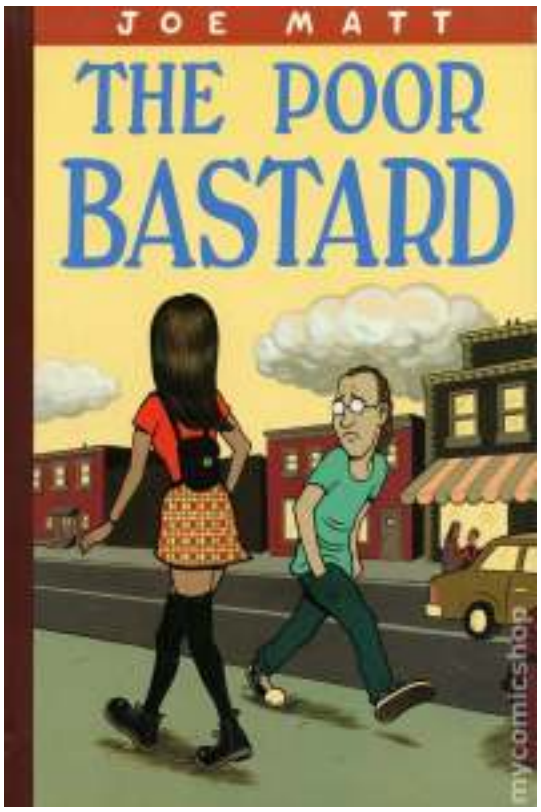
It follows that…

- A denotative b@stard is a connotative b@stard because he/she didn't experience God in his parent's home while growing up.
- A connotative b@stard is a denotative b@stard for some reason related to his/her relationship with God and/or his/her father, the father's absence, or the father's lack of headship authority.

The Differences between Bastards and Bastardettes

The overall effects of fatherlessness are varied and depend on the home living conditions and personality of the child. But there are some common traits that can be observed in both males and females.

For males, the absence of a father figure / Headship / Masculine Authority in the home leads a male child to be…



- More aggressive.
- Emotionally insecure.
- Stunted in self-esteem.
- Short on discernment and wisdom.
- Mentally myopic and easily confused.
- Entirely ignorant of masculine authority.
- Lacking confidence, shifty, undependable.
- Totally clueless about God's presence and power.
- Extremely slow in developing personal charisma and charm.
- Financially insecure, having no hope of receiving an inheritance.
- Clumsy in exercising social graces to the point of being a rude dumb@$$.
- Easily distracted by interesting but largely meaningless pursuits (e.g. p0rn, gaming, etc.).

For females, the absence of a father figure / Headship / Masculine Authority in the home leads a female child to be…

- Emotionally insecure.
- Sexually promiscuous.
- Less committed to LTRs / marriage.
- Lacking in confidence regarding marriage and having a family.
- Having their first sexual experience at a younger age on the average.
- More likely to develop a chemical dependency (e.g. alcohol, anti-depressants, weed, etc.).
- More likely to engage in rebellious or risky behaviors (substance abuse, sexual promiscuity, etc.).
- Less willing to have children, as they tend to see children as being an irritating burden rather than a source of love and devotion.
- More likely to engage in attention seeking behavior (e.g. dressing provocatively, maintaining a heavy online presence, posting and sharing risque photos of herself, etc.).

It is not a coincidence that these traits all form the popularized identity of a b@stard.

Epilogue

Here, I've offered a more comprehensive definition of a b@stard as someone who grew up in a home devoid of at least one of the following.

1. A biological father who loves and cares for them properly and sincerely.
2. A father figure who engages with them on a regular basis and offers discipline, encouragement, individualized feedback, and moral guidance.
3. A home environment characterized by Headship (i.e. one displaying authentic masculine authority) and the knowledge of God that this imparts to children.

Both males and females can be b@stards under this revised definition, but the b@stard phenomenon of identity tends to impact males and females in different ways, and it affects males much harder than females.

Under this revised understanding of the term, there are a few egregious implications which, when acknowledged, may provide further insights into the real spiritual conditions thereof.

1. It is possible for children born into a common law union to experience all of the above three principle elements of having a father, and thereby escape b@stardy.
2. Mothers who have Chad's babies in their early years and then settle down with a Beta later on in life deprive these children from having an intimate knowledge of their biological father. Although having an adoptive father is better than no father at all, the surrogate Beta father may not love and care for these children as much as he would if they were his own.
3. The current understanding of the term b@stard doesn't include one born from a marriage that failed subsequent to conception, nor someone whose parents are divorced or separated. However, a parental divorce or separation in which the mother receives custody results in the child(ren) not having a father around (very much) during their formative years. This can carry many of the same consequences as being fatherless.
4. Those individuals who have a father, even a close relationship with their father, but who nevertheless exhibit the characteristic behaviors and traits of a b@stard may be rather accurately derided as one according to the connotative meaning. This might be explained if we consider how the father failed to demonstrate Headship authority and thereby failed to introduce the child to the metaphysical knowledge of God's presence in the home.

5. Those of us in the sphere have identified women who have "daddy issues" to be promiscuous, risky, and troublesome, but we have not come to recognize them as bastardettes for this fundamental reason. Maybe we should.

Under this revised definition, I would guess somewhere around 80% of Westerners are b@stards.

We may find comfort in the hope that God is the father of the fatherless and gives families to the lonely (Psalm 68:5-6).

On Choosing the Flesh over Christ

Competing in the secular SMP displaces obedience to Christ and destroys the blessings thereof.

This week, the comments have been inundated with observations and viewpoints related to attraction and mating market dynamics — a spillover from last week's mini-series. In this post, I'll attempt to comprehensively summarize the greater points of this subtopic in applicable terms.

Ultimately, Men and Women are locked in a competition for the highest SMV/MMV mates. This is the natural expression of the flesh that is manifested in secular culture. Christian men and women are called to holiness and sanctification (1 Thessalonians 4:3-8), and so sex is (supposed to be) off the table as a method of competition. This puts Christian women at a disadvantage in the secular SMP, much like the Beta factory of churchianity places men at a disadvantage.

Hormones and the inexperience of youth blurs the distinction between the Flesh and the Spirit. Christian Men go along with the secular competition when they focus on hot / sexually active / activated women, and pass over virginal Christian women who are less so. (Catacomb Resident's point can be applied here to mean that Christian Men should not go along with this.) Women go along with this competition when they seek nonChristian higher SMV men outside the church.

Secular women, once they reach a certain point, want very much to lose their virginity and thereby break into the SMP and gain a stronger edge in the competition. Because of the Flesh nature, most Christian women are just as eager to do the same, but they have a (dwindling) number of social and psychological obstacles that make this sociosexual identity transition more tortuous. Secular Feminism vilifies Christianity for making it more difficult for women to be sexually liberated and thereby join the competition (among many other stated reasons). For these same reasons, some women in the church reject Christian sexual mores and leave the church during their rutting phase to make their "season of singleness" more conducive to their own prerogatives of landing and/or bedding a high SMV/MMV man, while others who are less ambitious or who have a lower SMV go along with it (for a while). A very small number recognize the value and importance of sexual purity, but many of these also get swept away by competition envy, cultural currents, temptation, the delay in marriage, and their desire for exclusive high SMV male affirmation and attention.

When Christian sexual mores have been rejected, the SMP defaults to the natural mating selection, which includes "running the gauntlet". (This is the context Thedeti is describing.) Both men and women use the gauntlet as a method of vetting bonding potential and "sexual compatibility". The difference between men's gauntlet and women's gauntlet is in the matter of goals that revolve around their respective priorities and sense of urgency.

Men's motivations for running the gauntlet are to…

1. Primarily to get sexual access / expression / release.
2. Establish / present themselves as sexually viable.
3. Some men do it to "claim" or identify with a choice mate.
4. A much smaller number do it to make themselves "visible" as marriage material.

Women running the gauntlet have the same four motivations, but with more variability in terms of their priorities on a case by case basis. In general…

- Secular women prioritize (1) and/or (2) or maybe (3), and generally postpone (4). However, the age of the woman and the SMV of the male affect the order of these priorities.
- Christian women (presumably) prioritize (4) over (1) and (2). (3) is generally neglected or is rolled into (4). However, many Christian woman are known to behave more like secular women, especially once the cat is out of the bag.

In addition, the pool of high SMV men that women target is much smaller, and because these men have more opportunities, fewer of these men are marriage minded. The ones who are get fished out of the pool quickly.

Unfortunately, a woman choosing an accomplished, more mature, and older man who is marriage minded is culturally unacceptable to both Christians and non-Christians alike.

RPA's statement,

> "A virgin guarding her status has nothing to do with activation. It's about how she values her status as a virgin."

…is true up to the point where she chooses to value her competitive engagement in the SMP (i.e. running the gauntlet) more than she values her virginal marriage potential. If she loses her virginity outside marriage, she becomes sexually "activated" as an active participant in the "natural" / secular SMP competition. There's no going back. And as a young woman ages, this competition pressure intensifies. As RPA describes…

> "In today's western society, once a woman is into her mid-20s and still a virgin they end up in a selection boondoggle. The men who value virginity in their bride enough to be pure themselves and also pass women's attractiveness filters get locked down early and are no longer in the dating pool. The remaining men who pass women's attractiveness filters are men who look for hookups and/or sex while in a dating relationship."

The nature of sexual purity, as contrasted with a sexually activated state, allows the sexually pure person to receive less attention and sexual objectification in the secular SMV. This "invisible" state is actually the protection of God over the obedient. As such, the mating competition should apply differently to Christian and secular women, but currently it does not because of many reasons. Here are a few.

- The centrality of sex in secular culture.
- Most women seek out and enter into a sexually activated state.
- Churchianity is not markedly different from the gynocentric world system.
- Both men and women are approaching the marketplace with similar goals as their secular counterparts, i.e. Men want a hot-to-trot foxy babe, and Women want a hawt, high SMV man. These goals are seen as non-negotiable must-haves by both Men and Women.
- The secular world appears to offer potential mates with higher SMV's on the average than what is commonly found within the church.

- The MMV of a potential mater is not a significant consideration until later in life, statistically about ~10 years after the first sexual experience on average.
- There is no patriarchal structure of authority that would help guide young people towards marriage.

We all know how this works out. Without sexual purity, marriage is debased, and families are destroyed. Obedience is necessary for sanctification to occur.

I am somewhat dissatisfied with this discussion, because I was hoping to see more discussion of redemption instead of attraction and SMP dynamics. Most of the arguments this week have focused on secular SMP dynamics and there has been little emphasis and no distinction of how this relates to applied Christian morality and marital sanctification. Perhaps that's because it doesn't, or perhaps it's because we have no working model of how young people are to rectify the desires of the flesh with God's prerogative of sanctification. I'll take this as a sign that redemption needs to be further explored.

In the comments, readers may like to consider whether all the discussion on this topic relates to redemption, and if it does, then how.

Rollo's 5 Stages of Unplugging

In The Five Stages of Unplugging (2012-7-25), Rollo describes some of the heartache that men endure when they wake up from their Blue Pill delusions and fantasies. He rounds off the list with a sixth addendum – being Jaded.

1. Denial — Still Plugged-In: "These game guys are a bunch of clowns, there's no way this works on women. Women aren't stupid. What a bunch of misogynists."
2. Anger — Post-Red Pill: "This is ridiculous! Why should I have to jump through all these hoops for women? I just want to be myself. Why couldn't I have been a Natural Alpha®? I blame my parents / siblings / teachers / God / liberals / feminists / media / society…"
3. Bargaining — Unplugged: "Well maybe it does have some good points… but, forget the hot girls, they're way outta my league. I'll give it a try if it can help me get around the bases with a plain Jane. Do I have to wear the fuzzy hat and black nail polish?"
4. Depression — The Bitter Taste of the Red Pill: "Wow, women really respond to this puffed-up act? And guys spend big bucks on it and wind up with more @ss than a toilet seat? And I just joined up for this? The world is sad and so am I…"
5. Acceptance — Game Awareness: "Maybe this IS the way things really work. I guess I should give up the gender relations mythology I've been holding onto… Hey, what do you think of these negs I came up with?"
6. Jaded — MGTOW Permutations: "F_ck learning all these rules. Sex isn't worth it and women aren't that fun anyway. The last thing I want to do is learn routines or the 5 stages of pickup. There's too many websites, too much to read, I can't remember it all much less sort it all out. Who has all that time to go out and chat up women anyway? It's not like I see any women under 40 at work at my engineering job to practice on. Video games and porn are more fun and more available. I just haffta look good and let the women come to me…"

When we look around the Manosphere today, including the Christian segment, we can hear voices coming from all these perspectives — men in various stages of discovering who they are in the flesh and learning how to deal with themselves and with life.

Monkey steals cigarette from his trainer and kicks him away. The monkey attempted to escape on the bike but was restrained by the rope.

How do the 5 Stages of Unplugging fit into Redemption?

In the pilot post, Red Pill Redemption (2022-9-5), I listed four steps to redemption. These steps are…

1. Understanding and accepting one's self.
2. Rectifying who one is with who one is in Christ (i.e. confession, repentance).
3. Learning to trust God with the self (e.g. desire, ego, libido, personality) and what they have been given (e.g. intelligence level, placement in the SMV hierarchy, stewardship of resources, etc.).
4. Finding and following one's God given purpose in life.

The Denial, Anger, Bargaining, and Depression stages in Rollo's list are part of (1) Understanding and accepting one's self.

The evil deceptions of the worldly cultural narratives have the ability to prevent a man from entering into a knowledgeable understanding of one's self, not as the narratives would make one out to be, but for what one truly is. One's belief in the worldly paradigms of faux-truths is essentially a Denial of the real truth, hence the name. There is of course some anger, disappointment and frustration that are part of this Denial, simply because it does not match reality.

The Denial stage continues as long as a man adheres to all the Blue Pill / Churchian / Feminist / etc. lies, believing they are true — that Women are angelic princesses who are more aloft, more pure, and more spiritual than men are, among many other myths. Taking the first step towards the truth requires one to first break away from all these false paradigms.

The Anger stage really begins (1) when the truth begins to seep in, and one realizes that "Those Christian / Red Pill misogynists actually have a valid point!" The Anger stage advances upon realizing (2) that you've been lied to all your life, (3) that you were dumb enough to believe it, and (4) that no one loved you nor cared for you enough to set you straight. Anger culminates in the horrifying epiphany of (5) realizing that all the hopes, dreams, investments, and expectations that one formed while believing those lies were all built on sand. And (6), after doing the monkey dance for years, one has to pay the (male) organ grinder.

The Bargaining stage begins when (1) knowing the truth changes one's perception of reality. (2) One realizes that he cannot avoid the truth simply by denying that it is true, and that (3) one is required to respond somehow. The Bargaining stage continues as (4) one conducts a series of various bluffs, experiments, tests, and trials in an endeavor to explore the boundaries of what is true and what is false. The Bargaining stage ends when (5) one realizes that there is no bargaining with God (nor women), and (6) one begins to apprehend what many men in the Manosphere have learned before: You actually have to make yourself into a better man!

The Depression stage encapsulates the final step of (1) Understanding and accepting one's self as who one truly is within the world's paradigm. And for most men, it is not a pretty picture, hence the label.

Rollo Tomassi wrote about this stage of Depression in his post, Incels (2018-6-4).

> "There is a necessary state of nihilism, or at the very least a prolonged doubt, that occurs when men realize that they're cut away from that Blue Pill conditioned life. This is why I compare it to mourning in The Five Stages of Unplugging, men are literally mourning the loss of their investments in that paradigm; they're morning the loss of Killing the Beta they used to be."
> Incels (2018-6-4)

IOW, Men realize that they've built their whole self-image in accordance with the worldly paradigms, and when these paradigms are stripped away through a Red Pill realization, they find they have no self-image at all, resulting in an existential crisis. Past generations of men often came to this realization after reaching their peak, usually around the age of 40, and this was called a "mid-life crisis". But today's generation of men have a choice of continuing in denial, or else taking the Red Pill and subsequently facing this identity crisis.

Many Men, after taking the Red Pill, have extreme difficulties in reformulating their identity. Those who languish in depression and anesthetize themselves with alcohol, jerking off, p0rn, and/or other forms of escapism, are avoiding or delaying their encounter with the Truth. OTOH, men who are quite content with who they are within the world's paradigm have no motivation to continue on the journey towards redemption. So the grand majority of men wash out of the process at this point. Some men commit su!c!de at this point.

Is it Truly Hopeless?

The Acceptance stage is when (1) a man finally lets go of the last vestiges of his false, Blue Pill / Churchian / Feminist / etc. preconceived notions of what he thinks is right or how things ought to be, and (2) he humbles himself to learn and change in order to embrace and conform to the truth. Thus, Acceptance is the beginning of confession and repentance and the formation of an authentic belief in the truth. It is also the beginnings of forging a new identity.

How any individual man reacts to the Acceptance stage depends on a multitude of factors, including his age, his ability to develop and showcase charisma, confidence, faith, marital status, personal desire / interests, socioeconomic status, SMV (e.g. LAMPS), and others. And so we see many men who are swamped in a marriage to a rebellious wife and don't know how to manage the situation. Others who have been abused by the gynocracy are now swearing off marriage and chasing after PUArtistry, going MGTOW, sugaring, and toying with pseudo-relationships through online transactions, thinking these to be an individual solution to a society-wide problem. They haven't yet figured out that what they really want and need are peace with God and the blessings of Shalom*, and most of them probably never will.

A male Gelada baboon (Theropithecus gelada) vocalising whilst mating with a female amongst other troop members in the Simien Mountains in Ethiopia. The Gelada is, following humans, the most vocal of primates. Acceptance is where the breakdown occurs for many of those few men who make it past the Depression stage, because it leads to the next step of Redemption: (3) Learning to trust God with one's self. This requires a man to come to Christ, to get a vision of renewed hope, and to form a Christian concept of his identity in Christ.

In this step, there are a number of obstacles that are unique to the individual.

1. Some men hop right on it, but after they get what they want out of it or else get tired of trying, they backslide.
2. Some men are tied up in denial and/or frustration over certain other beliefs or desires that hold them back.
3. Some men are engorged in sin, e.g. lust, adultery, fornication, masturbation, etc.
4. Some men are too content / lazy / proud / etc. to come to Christ.
5. Some men become immobilized by bitterness or brokenness.
6. Some men never get this vision of Christ in themselves.
7. Some men just can't make it work.

Jesus described four responses to His call in the Parable of the Four Seeds (Matthew 13:1-9; Mark 4:1-9; Luke 8:4-8). I examined this further in The Nature of Evangelism (2010-3-28). I'll add here that a man might face any or all of these obstacles in different stages of his life's trajectory, and that it takes time to go through all these stages and steps. Those Christians who have a sudden change of heart leading to a drastic change in beliefs and lifestyle are widely celebrated. However, I think very few Christians have a salvation experience that is a once-and-done thing. For most men, it is an ongoing struggle to conform to the image of Christ in himself.

 Apparently, the concept of Shalom has been utterly lost and forgotten. Since I posted a description of Shalom in late 2020, it has only received 92 views, which is only about 1/6 of what a typical post receives for the same period. I am saddened by this, because it shows how far we've drifted from God, to the point that we've lost all appreciation for the blessed Life.*

The Black Pill

> [6] So the Lord said to Cain, "Why are you angry? And why has your countenance fallen? [7] If you do well, will you not be accepted? And if you do not do well, sin lies at the door. And its desire is for you, but you should rule over it."

The Black Pill is when a man gives up all hope and settles down in the Jaded stage as a part of his new identity — an existential crisis of ongoing frustration and life without meaning nor purpose. Rollo clings to hope by likening this to an abyss which must be crossed.

> I've heard Roosh and a few other commenters in the 'sphere describe the "Black Pill" – the idea that the social order of the Blue Pill, the Feminine Imperative, or the 'gynocracy' if you like, is so rigged against men that they accept their role in it and give up on trying to make themselves or their circumstance better. What these guys are describing is what I've referred to in the past as the Abyss. This Abyss is the psychological / existential gulf a man needs to cross when he becomes Red Pill aware. He realizes that the person he carved himself out to be in a Blue Pill conditioned ideal was based on a the same falsehoods. This stage of unplugging has difficulties unique to men at various stages of their lives and according to the decisions they made for themselves throughout their lives in accordance with those Blue Pill ideals.
> Incels (2018-6-4)

Rollo goes on to say that there is no Black Pill!

> "Understand this, there is no Black Pill – there is only the Abyss of accepting the truth that comes with Red Pill awareness and a man's capacity to make this awareness work in his best interests.
> Incels, if nothing else, want to find ways to make this awareness work for them, but most are too damaged to > deal with the realities that Red Pill awareness reveals to them. They're not ready for the truth, but it's unavoidable today."

> Incels (2018-6-4)

According to my earlier list of obstacles, Rollo is defining the Black Pill to include men who are tied up in denial or frustration, who are defeated by bitterness, brokenness, faithlessness, hopelessness, or sin, or who can't make it work.

Rollo's 5 Stages model matches the path to Redemption fairly well up to this point. Rollo offers an intimation that the Abyss may not have to be a singularity. But he neither recognizes the concept of sin nor what Christ can do with a man, and he fails to articulate that a heart-led faith in Christ is what can make the difference.

Thus, Rollo's Jaded stage is only one possible outcome of Acceptance in which a man gets tied up in other forms of denial and/or frustration. At the root of this frustration is a man's inability to discern the metaphysics of the spiritual dimension (perhaps due to sin), a lack of a grander vision of purpose (perhaps due to a lack of prayer), an unwillingness to let go of his worldly attachments (perhaps due to doubts and external pressures, e.g. the secular SMP/MMP), and relinquish the desires of the flesh to the hand of God.

The Homeward Stretch

As you can see, going through the Five Stages is only the beginning of the journey towards Redemption. In mathematical language, it only gets you off the perceived local maxima of the Blue Pill Denial and on a path to the local minima of the Depression stage.

Once this is accomplished, a Christian man has the additional task of overcoming that local minima and transcending his personal challenges and limitations in order to progress towards the global maxima of his God ordained purpose, and Headship if he marries.

From there, the Acceptance stage is an uphill climb with a constant risk of backsliding into the Abyss. To avoid the Abyss, a man must take step (3) Learning to trust God with the self (e.g. desire, ego, libido, personality) and what they have been given (e.g. intelligence level, placement in the SMV hierarchy, stewardship of resources, etc.), and step (4) Finding and following one's God given purpose in life. This can only be achieved by trusting in Christ and going through the entire process.

In the case where God has called a specific man to marriage, as opposed to a life of celibacy, the Christian goal replaces the secular goal of getting laid with one of achieving Headship and Sanctification within marriage, which honors and glorifies God, and provides a home atmosphere characterized by the peaceful presence of God.

There are no other options which lead to redemption and the lasting glory of God. If both of these two options (i.e. Headship vs. Celibacy) seem too opprobrious for one to accept, then the default alternative is the Abyss, either in this life (for incels), or the life to come (for Chads who never enter into the 5 stages).

There's been some confusion about what the Black Pill is all about, so I'll cite a few relevant comments and clear things up.

Does the Red Pill lead to the Black Pill for Low SMV Men?

> "The black pill is stating that physical attractiveness is the most important factor in initial relationships and there is a minimum level of physical attractiveness needed."

It is not Black Pill to state facts. The Black Pill is when one responds to the facts with hopeless resignation. It is also Black Pill to present the facts as a goal that a man must meet or else be doomed to a lifetime of misery and rejection.

> "For men that are below this level for factors out of their control (very short or ugly face) this is a difficult thing to swallow. A life without any romantic relationships."

We can presume that the unstated goal in this example is pounding poon. If you've set up reaching this goal to be THE chief indicator of your worth as a man, then you've taken the Black Pill.

The Black Pill Mentality

The Black Pill stream of consciousness goes something like this:

"I am not physically attractive to women, and no matter what I do, I never will be."
—> "I will never have a woman."
–> "I will never get laid."

==> "Therefore my life is hopeless / meaningless / etc."

It is also Black Pill when we change the pronouns to another person:

"He is not physically attractive to women, and no matter what he does, he never will be"
–> "He will never have a woman."
–> "He will never get laid."

==> "Therefore he is worthless as a man! INCEL!!!"

The Black Pill is perpetuated by (1) men and women who convey this kind of message, and (2) men who believe it.

The White Pill Mentality

To offer a comparison, the Redemptive / White Pill train of thought goes like this:

"I am not physically attractive to women, and no matter what I do, I never will be."
–> "I will never have a woman."
–> "I will never get laid."

==> "Just LOOK at me! I'm always obsessing over poon and making myself sick with lust!"
–> "The desires of my heart are evil / fleshly."
–> "Therefore I need Christ."

OR, for the man called to marriage…

==> "I cannot achieve this on my own."
–> "I may never reach the desires of my heart / have a wife and family / get my life in order."
–> "Therefore I need Christ."

This makes it crystal clear how many men are choosing the flesh over Christ.

The Black Knight

> "I always thought of the Black Pill as the black knight equivalent, the "Burn it all down and sow salt on the remains".
> Or, the "Have sex with her sister, her mother, and all of her friends", etc."

The first attitude is the obsessive-possessive expression of the Black Pill for disadvantaged men who are consumed with bitterness, envy, and rage.

The second attitude is the passive-aggressive expression of the Black Pill for high SMV men who are consumed with hate, lust, and spite-filled anger.

The Black Knight has nothing to do with SMV. It is more about having an evil heart — unbridled anger, cruelty, possessiveness, power, schadenfreud, and vengeance.

Conclusions

We can overcome anything with God, we can overcome nothing without Him.

> Psalm 27:14 (KJV)
> Wait on the Lord: be of good courage, and he shall strengthen thine heart: wait, I say, on the Lord.

This is the only way. Anything else, no matter how steeped in worldly wisdom, will ultimately lead to despair and nihilism, i.e. the Black Pill.

The Black Pill is an abandonment of faith.

Paul tells us that the shield of faith can "quench all the fiery darts of the wicked one" (Ephesians 6:16).

When judgement comes, be found with that shield or on it.

A Review of Running the Gauntlet

NovaSeeker wrote a high impact post over a year ago, entitled, The Sexual Market IS the Marriage Market (2021-2-22), which described the necessity of "running the gauntlet" before one can arrive in marriage. I wrote about this most recently in a post On Choosing the Flesh over Christ (2022-9-10).

To briefly review, because of The Demise of the Christian Life Script, and The Centrality of Sex in Western Culture, dating and/or hooking up has become the core vehicle for both the SMP and the MMP for virtually all participants. Marriage only occurs as one possible outcome, or rather an ego affirming afterthought, of a very successful venture in the SMP. As such, the MMP is embedded in the SMP. In other words, the entrance door to the MMP is, for most people, located in the SMP, such that one must successfully navigate the SMP in order to enter the door of the MMP.

Furthermore, since the MMP selection process runs through dating/hooking up, which is itself a process that is inherently sexual in nature, it is therefore strongly impacted by the sex skew of the SMP, as discussed in The Lopsided Liberalized Mating Market (2021-2-17). Thus, one's sexual market value, or SMV, plays the primary role in one's "competitiveness" in being selected in the competition of bid/ask interactions in the market for dates/hookups, which must occur before marriage even becomes a consideration.

These scraggly, scrawny, shaggy hoes look delicious to those men lacking a personal domain of heart and home. As a result, the implications of the contemporary marriage market system require one to “run the gauntlet” in a series of hit or miss sexual interactions that Christians recognize as having eternal ramifications. Those that cannot or will not run the gauntlet successfully will face substantial difficulties securing an attractive mate for marriage. All of this results in The Christian Conundrum (2021-3-1).

The secular RP proposes the solution of becoming a Chadwick who can iterate sexual conquests and thereby rise towards the top of the SMV. But Christian men who desire marriage and family find this approach to be problematic for several reasons.

- The bottom 60% of men can never become a high SMV male, and therefore cannot enter into the MMP.
- The middle 20% of men find it quite difficult to improve themselves enough to compete in the SMV.
- The top 20% of men face immeasurable daily temptation and are therefore tempted to cash in their chips for plenty of p00n. Depending on how it goes, these men are blinded by the marketplace and are unmotivated to make the next step towards marriage. Only some of these men turn their thoughts towards marriage and children rather late in life.
- In the current marriage 3.0 paradigm, those few men who have the opportunity to marry are hesitant to make the next step towards marriage because of the plethora of risks it poses to men (e.g. Duluth, financial grapes of wrath, frivorce, paternity fraud, sexual defrauding, and others).
- The sexual promiscuity that is an implicit feature of this approach contradicts Christian ethics and morality.

Some Christian Red Pill proponents of marriage have suggested improving one’s SMV enough to be “noticed” by women, while still refraining from premarital sex. But as long as a man is playing within the secular world’s SMP/MMP, applying self-limiting Christian ethics is dampening his competitive edge with no guaranteed increase in the payoff (other than the satisfaction of remaining obedient).

One gauntlet after another…

Our Idea of a Different Approach is not all that Different

As you can see, we've reached the logical conclusion that the "rules" of the Christian faith, specifically the restriction against fornication, obviate or reduce the possibility of success in the socio-sexual/marriage marketplace. But here I want to point out that this is only true within the secular mating paradigm which sets up specific goals, i.e. edging out the competition, getting laid, and staking "conquests".

Christians will try to whitewash this reality by using "marriage" as a morally acceptable proxy for "sex", at least in theory, but due to the convergence of the SMP and the MMP in the mating system described above, there's literally no difference.

Christian men who have been following along with Thedeti's recent arguments (starting here) will recognize that NovaSeeker's original observations are true — that a man's SMV must be high enough to establish his eligibility for sex / marriage, AND to continue receiving sexual interest from his wife after marriage.

Likewise, the competitive hurdles are no different. Within this paradigm, if a man can't get laid, and has no hope of doing so at some point, then he's staring down the barrel of the Black Pill.

But we're slow to recognize that by admitting this, we're still trying to adapt to the world's playbook within a worldly mating paradigm.

The error in this particular paradigmatic interpretation of the MMP is that it assigns the whole value of a man to his SMV and does not recognize the power of Christ.

Why are we applying Christian standards to a non-Christian mating market system?

Jesus warned us against trying to juxtapose two paradigmatic systems in The Parable of the Wineskins (Matthew 9:14-17; Mark 2:18-22; Luke 5:33-39).

> [33] Then they said to Him, "Why do the disciples of John fast often and make prayers, and likewise those of the Pharisees, but Yours eat and drink?"

> [34] And He said to them, “Can you make the friends of the bridegroom fast while the bridegroom is with them? [35] But the days will come when the bridegroom will be taken away from them; then they will fast in those days.”
> [36] Then He spoke a parable to them: “No one puts a piece from a new garment on an old one; otherwise the new makes a tear, and also the piece that was taken out of the new does not match the old. [37] And no one puts new wine into old wineskins; or else the new wine will burst the wineskins and be spilled, and the wineskins will be ruined. [38] But new wine must be put into new wineskins, and both are preserved. [39] And no one, having drunk old wine, immediately desires new; for he says, ‘The old is better.’”
> Luke 5:33-39 (NKJV)

Analogizing the parable…

- We’re ‘fasting’ from satisfying intersexual relationships, sanctified marriages, and sexual contentment.
- The ‘old garment’ is the socio-sexual/marriage marketplace in western society, in which “dating” is characterized by hooking up, running the gauntlet, serial monogamy, sexual promiscuity, etc.
- ‘Sewing a new patch on an old garment’ is like trying to instill Biblical teachings of sexual purity within a cesspool of sexual dissipation. BTW, this is exactly what the Purity Movement attempted to do in the late 1990s, with catastrophic results.

And yes, many say, “the old wine is better”. We’ve all heard resounding praise for 1950s Traditionalism and reminiscings of the Blue Pill Arrogance of the 1980s. And yet, no one wants to go back to whatever it is that we believe was good about that time, if that were even possible. Everyone either wants to get in on the current action or else gripe about how it fails to deliver chaste nymphotic wives, and no one wants to get married these days. Meanwhile, wimmin are wailing, “Where are all the good men?”, where ‘good’ means 666 (6 feet tall, 6 figure income, 6 pack abs, 6 inch stroke).

The fear and angst is palpable and wholly justified in the Black Pill, but only the faithful few will find their way through the crazy mess.

Conclusions

We cannot establish a new mating paradigm within the confines of the old.

The absurdity of trying to implement Christian standards in a secular mating market only leads to the paradoxical conundrums described in the first section above with the end result of The Black Pill.

So why are we still stuck in awe-struck wonder about this, as if God doesn't care if you find a wife?

So why are we still seeking some way to "solve" these conundrums?

1. If a man wants to compete for a mate according to the worldly SMP, then he needs to play by those rules and accept the possible consequences, including the Abyss / Black Pill and/or having a debased marriage. Christian men have done it, including some here, but very few are honest about it.
2. If a man wants to seek out other options and trust God with the outcome, then there is a different set of guidelines that he needs to follow, beginning with a heart-led conviction and a sense of purpose, followed by prayer and taking action towards those ends. Christian men have done this too, including some here, but readers are hesitant to believe it.

In the first case, the Abyss of the Black Pill awaits those men who cannot compete within the secular framework, that is, for as long as they cling to the specified goals of the worldly system, but the Abyss of eternal ɦəll awaits those who can and do but still fail to find Christ in the process.

Both types of men get caught up in the worldly system and its focus on the flesh. They never realize their need for Christ, and make no progress towards redemption.

In the second case, the Abyss of the Black Pill awaits those men who start off with good intentions, but stumble and lose hope along the way due to all the surrounding pressures and temptations.

In all cases, men need to find humility, repent and come to Christ, and find His mercy and grace, IOW go through the four stages of redemption. What this looks like for each man will be different.

From now on, whenever we're discussing attraction, arousal, mating cultures, etc., let's make a clear distinction about which paradigm we're talking about.

Black Pill Competition

Competition can either build a man up or bring him down.

The Black Pill is Competitive

In The Status Signaling Narrative (2022-3-21), I described how many Manospherian personalities avoid talking about their personal lives and will say and do things that signal status, such as AMOGing, c0ck blocking, competitive bullying, being condescending, criticizing, making comparisons, mocking, and showing contempt.

My larger point was that men who signal status and habitually deliver a narrative that is more or less a "man up" lecture are usually Black Pilled.

In this context, being Black Pilled means that a specific goal or ideal is set up, and it is expected that every man should jump through the required hoops to reach that goal. This competitive social arena arises from the inherent nature of men to challenge each other, to develop character, and to refine the tribe. This is a good thing in itself and gives rise to hierarchies of authority. But for men who aren't set up to achieve those goals, the future is bleak — not because they can't reach those goals, but because they just don't "Get It" without any tutelage. Thus, these less competitive Men are summarily dismissed as hopeless wussified losers — not because they lack masculine attributes like character, courage, or discipline, but simply because they can't or won't engage in the competition for the particular goals that have been set forth as a standard.

As an example, I identified Ted Beale (AKA Vox Day) as Black Pilled according to this understanding. We might suppose that Vox expresses his faith and life-purpose through his blogs (Alpha Game, Vox Popoli) and other enterprises (e.g. Arkhaven comics, Infogalactic), but he still maintains some vestiges of the Black Pill in his competitive and discriminatory attitude towards other men. IOW, he has no sense of The Great Commission / evangelism.

More broadly speaking, a man who engages in this kind of status signaling could be in any one of Rollo's 5 stages of self-awareness. IOW, he has not yet reached the stage of having a Redemptive Purpose.

"Can you compete with these guys for the chicks? If not, then you're a loser! INCEL!!! Go stand over there and lick up your bitter tears of misery! Wouldn't want to be you!"
Those who buy into this line of reasoning are Black Pilled.

Black Knight Competition

OTOH, Men who go all out in the competition and break all the social rules and tenets of civility and decency to reach those goals could also be considered Black Pill, as anonymous_ng described,

> "I always thought of the Black Pill as the black knight equivalent, the "Burn it all down and sow salt on the remains".
> Or, the "Have sex with her sister, her mother, and all of her friends", etc."

Faux-Masculine archetypes that match this description include, Bad@ss Chads*, The Abusive Criminal / Thug*, The Dark Triad, Antimonianists, Ressentimentalists, Legalists*, certain types of Incels*, and some of the more dominant types of Male Feminists*. The worst antagonists (indicated by an asterisk) share the same Harbinger of Masculine Doom in their constitutive identities — Rejection. In addition to these male archetypes, women are among the worst practitioners of rejection as a tactic of personal defense and social dominance. Thus, they all coopt, choreograph, and propagate Rejection as an ego cathexis in how they treat others. As a result, the other Faux-Masculine identities that are built on Rejection suffer the worst within this paradigm; specifically, Mopey Dopeys, Bungling Husbands, Boring Loyal Dudes, generic Incels, Low Power Male Feminists, Soy Boys, Simps, and Workaholics.

Men need to overcome this fear of rejection through approaching and talking to both men and women, and thereby learning about one's nature, and how to exercise self-control and social graces. In the best case scenario, these efforts are met with acceptance and increased fellowship, and so this practice can build confidence and charisma. The problem is when other men and women pour on the rejection so hard and heavy that a man cannot face and overcome his inner fears. In the worst case scenario, this leads to anger and bitterness and thus more E11iots and Jasons are created. Black Knight wins and the Black Pill is propagated to others.

Choose Goals and Peers Wisely

Perhaps fixing this situation could be as easy as changing one's goals and choosing to associate with social groups that share the same goals. Men can improve their situation by placing themselves in those particular arenas of competition in which they can demonstrate their natural proficiencies and therefore stand a good chance of excelling and succeeding.

Being able to showcase his own competencies among those who share compatible goals would also facilitate his finding a more appropriate mate. In this case, even a simp can get a girlfriend!

We also need to remember that many of the goals pressed forth by the world stand in opposition to the ultimate goal for Christians, which has been given to us in scripture.

> [13] Brethren, I do not count myself to have apprehended; but one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind and reaching forward to those things which are ahead, [14] I press toward the goal for the prize of the upward call of God in Christ Jesus.
> [15] Therefore let us, as many as are mature, have this mind; and if in anything you think otherwise, God will reveal even this to you.
> Philippians 3:13-15 (NKJV)

What this 'upward calling' looks like is different for each man, but I'd be willing to bet it requires most men to break away from the goals and competitions imposed by the world, take an honest look at himself, and then pursue enterprises that employ each man's unique abilities, competencies, proficiencies, skills, and strengths.

If you don't know what your competencies are, then you need to be trying new things on a regular basis. Keep hunting until you find something you're really good at.

In any case, don't stay in a situation where you're not trusted or seen to be a loser.

The Black Pill as a Socio-Sexual Phenomenon

Overview

The assessments of the Black Pill that I've offered this week line up with those of several other Manospherian authors, including Blair Naso, Chateau Heartiste, Jim, Lexet, Opium Tales, Rollo Tomassi, and Scott. The only majorly significant angles I've added to the fray are commentaries about the spiritual significance of the Black Pill — how it relates to Redemption — and some of the socio-psychological characteristics that act as either determinants or tells.

To briefly reiterate the spiritual significances of the various "Pill" phenomena…

- Feminism is a socio-sexual vehicle for women to rebel against Headship / Patriarchal authority and by extension, God.
- The Birth Control Pill is a vehicle for women to abandon their fundamental purpose as lovers and life givers and become sterile hoes.
- The Blue Pill is a socio-psychological vehicle for men to submit to women, worship them, and sacrifice themselves for the Curse of Eve.
- The Red Pill is when a man wakes up from his Blue Pilled delusions and sees reality for what it is.
- The Black Pill is when a man is so pessimistic about the truths of the Red Pill that he loses all hope in this world. This is a critical stage in which the man must (1) let go of all his attachments to the world as well as (2) his own angst and bitterness, and then (3) find a renewed hope in Christ, or else descend in a tailspin into the Abyss / hell.
- The White Pill is finding a renewed identity and purpose for living in Christ.

Lastmod, a self-professing Black Piller, has disagreed with my take on the Black Pill. OTOH, RedPillBoomer wrote a summary of his take on the Black Pill that is pretty darn close to mine. I'll take this as evidence that the message has gotten through to the readers. What is missing from RPB's description is the background social setting that foments all the dynamics within the Black Pill. So the remainder of this post will give a description of this paradigm.

The Black Pill Phenomenon

In addition to the Black Pill being a spiritual force of darkness and despair that has arisen in recent years, it is also a socio-sexual phenomenon, much like MGTOW was a socio-sexual phenomenon that appeared a few years ago, and the Red Pill was a socio-sexual phenomenon before that. Feminism combined with the Sexual Revolution was the original explosive combination that kicked the whole thing off, empowered by the six sirens of the socio-sexual apocalypse. There were many other branches that came out of this grand mal social schism, e.g. the alphabet soup, Beelemzebub, the cohabitation craze AKA "playing house", Christian Red Pill, Intersectionalism, the demise and Graying of marriage, MRA, OOW births, PUA, TransAm, et al.

What we are witnessing is the splintering of society. I've put together the following timeline to make this more evident. I wanted to add liberal / progressive social movements, but if I did, the graph would become quite messy.

I've stated before that the core philosophy of the Black Pill is that the value of a man depends on how well he does in the competition for a specified goal. When the goal-value association is internalized, it shapes a man's self-image and world view. If a man does well in reaching this goal, he is "good" or "worthy" according to worldly sensibilities. If he does poorly, he is rejected as an Incel / loser / outcast, and condemned to the Abyss. But this, you see, is a religion of works.

In the majority of cases in our sex-centric culture, the predominant goal set before men is getting laid, but the goal could be nearly anything that is used to discriminate the value of a man based on how well he can achieve this goal. For example, the elite use Ivy League education as a discriminating factor. Even gradations of Red Pill awareness have been used to slight other men.

Women also complement and support these goals and discriminate among men accordingly. For example, women discriminate among men according to appearance / looks, physical height, socio-economic status, and who "Gets It" or is game saavy. In most cases, the goals themselves are based on women's preferences, e.g. the Feminine Imperative, et al. As the saying goes, "Women stand at the finish line and choose from the winners."

The Contestants for the Poon Prize

> For to everyone who has, more will be given, and he will have abundance; but from him who does not have, even what he has will be taken away.
> Jesus in Matthew 25:29 (NKJV)

Within this social paradigm, there are two kinds of Black Pill men – the winners and the losers. Both are dually complicit with the Black Pill phenomenon. Both have the same goals (e.g. AMOG, poon, etc.). Both have the same social philosophy of "winner takes all." Both base the value of a man, and even of life itself, on their performance in the competition. So they both rely on each other to make the Black Pill social dynamic function. The winners need the losers to prove they can beat out the competition, and are therefore better men according to their thinking. The losers identify themselves as losers because the winners dominate the competition, push them down, humiliate, and ridicule them, thereby proving that they are "lesser men". The losers are not necessarily lesser men, but buying into this paradigm often makes them so. Over time, they believe the lies, lose confidence and self-esteem, fall into self-destructive habits, and actually become lesser men. Men are not very well aware of this paradigm, because their trajectories are established in early adolescence.

The Black Pill is a tentative and anxiety-ridden comfort zone built on social popularity for the winners, and rejection for the losers. As Lastmod said, the Black Pill is "soothing". This leaves the winners egotistically obsessed with their own socio-sexual conquests and the losers despondently obsessed with how they can avoid broiling in feelings of bitterness, envy, and rejection.

A Societal-Wide Social Schism

Another way to look at this is that the competition is so brutally intense that it destroys the social capital between men. Thus, the Black Pill is basically a silent / cold / civil war that is tacitly waged between the Have's and the Have Not's by mutual agreement. The Have's (including the women) establish the goals and terms, while the Have Not's accept / believe these terms, albeit unwillingly. Even though the Have Not's don't like these terms, they have similar desires as the Have's and thus feel like they have no other options. They are both fleshly / worldly minded and therefore don't see any acceptable alternative paradigms that they consider worthy of seeking out.

Of course, the Have's win the war.

> [1] Where do wars and fights come from among you? Do they not come from your desires for pleasure that war in your members? [2] You lust and do not have. You murder and covet and cannot obtain. You fight and war. Yet you do not have because you do not ask. [3] You ask and do not receive, because you ask amiss, that you may spend it on your pleasures. [4] Adulterers and adulteresses! Do you not know that friendship with the world is enmity with God? Whoever therefore wants to be a friend of the world makes himself an enemy of God. [5] Or do you think that the Scripture says in vain, "The Spirit who dwells in us yearns jealously"?
> James 4:1-5 (NKJV)

A Word about MGTOW

These men are not necessarily Black Pill "losers", but some of them are. Basically, MGTOW is when a man says, "If I play this game, I'm going to lose and I'll be worse off for it. So my best option is not to play. Instead, I'll do my own thing." Thus, the underlying philosophy of MGTOW is to withdraw from the competition and pursue other interests. MGTOWs who can truly make a break from the competitive games of the world and continue through the four stages of redemption without being defeated by anger, bitterness, etc. stand a good chance of pulling through. But those who somehow get pulled under anyway, in spite of disengaging from the competition, may become Black Pilled. Some MGTOW find the Nihilism of withdrawing to be a treasured purpose in itself.

Grace Claimed or Forfeited

Both types of Black Pilled men can find Redemption and escape the eternal Abyss by repenting of the worldly religions of idolatry, socio-sexual competition, gynocentrism, et al., and then finding and pursuing a greater purpose according to God's will in which they could bless others and glorify God. Roosh is the most famous Manospherian example of a "winner" (according to the worldly paradigm) who repented and reformed.

We might suppose that certain "winners" like Fresh and Fit, Rollo, and others like them have discovered a greater purpose in using their RP knowledge to teach and help other men. Similarly, most MGTOW, who would otherwise be "losers", eventually find other endeavors that bring a sense of completion and fulfillment to their lives. So in a sense, these men have found a form of redemption from their past. But without a full repentance, confessing Christ, and pointing others towards having faith in Jesus, their eternal Redemption remains incomplete.

Dalrock, DeepStrength, Oscar, RedPillBoomer, and Scott are perhaps the best Manospherian examples of "winners" who have followed through to Redemption. Guys like Derek Ramsey and Ed Hurst are good examples of "losers" who have found that same grace and peace. Others like Adam, anonymous_ng, Jack, Lastmod, Red Pill Apostle, Thedeti, and whiteguy1 are still on their journey home.

For most men, however, pulling through this fallen world is difficult, and some men can't, or don't, or won't embark on the journey to redemption for various reasons. Based on 1 John 2:15-17 and Hebrews 12:14-17 (read it), I would say the most widespread acute reasons are..

For the Have's / Winners: Overinflated hubristic egotistical pride in one's self and one's lifestyle, and fornication.

For the Have Not's / Losers: Anger, bitterness, concupiscence, depression, and envy.

Both Types / All Men: Spiritual apathy / laziness, a lack of desire / incentive / motivation, a lack of self-awareness, and the lusts of the flesh.

The more fundamental reason is a lack of faith and trust in God.

The final challenge for each man is to look past this mortal existence and envision a greater hope and purpose for living that transcends beyond this evil self-centered world.

The prevalence of (relatively) early marriage and family formation is an indicator of God's grace extended towards those communities and individuals.

This past week, the question came up about whether there now exist churches and communities where a sizeable number of Christian young people are marrying in a timely fashion (i.e. the girls are 25 or younger) and/or couples are having children in considerable numbers (i.e. 3 or more).

Several commenters have replied in the positive, but other commenters have refused to believe it, demanding to know the names and locations of these churches / communities.

In consideration of those who are seeking to join such communities, it would serve our interests to have a "map" of these locations.

So, if any readers are members of churches or communities where this is happening, please send Jack an email with the relevant information, or leave a comment below.

sigmaframe@protonmail.com

1. Name of church or community.
2. Location: County / Township, City, State, country.
3. Denominational affiliation (Baptist, Methodist, Presbyterian, etc.) and/or sect (e.g. Catholic, Orthodox, Protestant, etc.)

4. Estimation of the population of the church / community.
5. Estimations of the average ages of marrying couples.
6. Estimation of the number of children in the church / community.
7. Estimation of the divorce rate in said church or community.
8. Other information you believe is pertinent or noteworthy.

Once I get a number of responses, I'll put together a list and/or a map of these places.

Thank you in advance for your responses.

Analysis Paralysis is the Gateway to the Abyss

Introduction

Several concepts came out of our discussion of the Black Pill last week. One of them was the challenge of staying engaged with reality (e.g. facing hardships, interacting with people, etc.), and another was the problem of overthinking. Actually, these two problems are one and the same. This post will explain how it works and how to escape this deceptive trap.

Case Study 1 – Social Flow

Roman@OpiumTales told an account of how he can successfully interact with others, so well in fact, that other guys have asked him how he does it.

> "He came to my brother's wedding and noticed how I danced freely and talked freely with women. He asked me how it's so easy for me to do that. I told him that I don't think about it. I just do it.
> So I think the root of the black pill may be overthinking. A lot of these men are very smart and suffer from analysis paralysis."

Here, I want to point out that Roman is not just referring to thinking, or thinking too much, or not thinking straight, or bad think, or thinking wrong thoughts, or being illogical, or too logical, or whatever. The problem with Overthinking has nothing to do with thinking. It's about losing Flow. Thinking is merely the inner world of thoughts, feelings, and confusion that people get lost in when they lose Flow.

Flow is detachment. Flow is learning and growth. Flow develops confidence and trust. Flow is worship. Flow leads to wisdom. Flow is a vehicle of blessing others and one's self. Flow brings rest to the soul. Flow leads one to success. Flow is key. God is Flow!

Champion skateboarder, Jaime de Lange.

 Less subjectively and more precisely, Flow is a psychological state through which one can experience the presence and power of God.*

Case Study 2 – Stage Fright

One interesting aspect of Flow, is that as long as one is in a state of Flow, one remains unconscious of that fact. But at the moment one stops to ponder their experience of Flow, one falls out of Flow. This summarizes the dilemma of 'overthinking' anything. You've got to stay in a state of Flow to be successful and to worship and glorify God.

Let me describe what I mean.

When I was younger, I was a bassist in a funk-rock-jazz band. We practiced every Tuesday evening, and we gave free concerts at the University every Friday night. We had a younger guy try out as a singer. He was charismatic, had a great voice, rather mature for his age, but he was green on stage. When things happened in the audience (e.g. guys horsing around and yelling at the band, women dancing and doing risqué things) he would become self-conscious and trip up his lines. Even without any distractions, at times he would be overwhelmed with incredulity, as if he were thinking, "LOOK AT ME, Mom! I can't believe I'm really doing this!", and then he'd lose his mojo. It was hard to decide whether to keep him or go with another guy who wanted in the band. We had hoped that he would improve with some practice, but before things came to a head, he suddenly quit with no explanation.

IOW, this young man suffered from "choking", a phenomenon I described in great detail in Confidence and Authenticity in Speech (2009-12-28). Men who suffer from this problem should read this post.

Changing the Context Changes Reality

Context is everything.

Joe2 alluded to this when he wrote,

> "The venue can make all the difference, too. Weddings, in particular, create the atmosphere where women make themselves appear welcoming and will dance, laugh, talk, etc. with men who they otherwise would reject. The same approach — not thinking about it and just doing it — could result in a much different outcome if practiced elsewhere."

When Lastmod hangs around the Manosphere, he's overthinking everything and making illogical connections and inappropriate rationalizations. He has a bad mojo full of anger and bitterness, and no Flow. But I'd be willing to bet that when he's DJ-ing a dance hall, he's in his best form and is nothing like how we know him here. There, he's into Flow. He's got to be, or else he wouldn't be dancing and DJ-ing for so long.

For guys like Lastmod, I'd have to agree with him that following God, for him, means to keep on truckin' with the Northern Soul groove, and stay away from churchian christianality where nominal Christians suck him back into the Black Pill's competitive Frame. "That's far out, man!"

The challenge of faith for each man is to identify a context in which Reality = True (for himself).

Total Flow is an alternate reality that requires and demonstrates faith therein.

Overthinking Engages One in a Suspension of Disbelief leading to Deception

In response to The Ever Looming Black Pill (2022-9-12), Deep Strength wrote,

> "The part where everything gets more complicated is that there can be deceptions in any phase. Usually deceptions get less and less moving through the anger, bargaining, denial, and depression phases, but that's not always the case.

> For instance, even though most Black Pillers have some level of acceptance of observable sexuality (e.g. RP), they also believe the deception that looks are pretty much all that matters. Yeah, looks are important, but female attraction is not all based on that.
> Jaded/Abyss/Nihilism has always existed whether a man is Blue, Red, Black, God or whatever else there is."

These deceptions require one to engage in a Suspension of Disbelief. A previous post described how Suspension of Disbelief works.

> "If we are really "into" the fiction – "transported", as psychologists say – we are… "disinterested". We respond aesthetically, even emotionally, but we are without any "skin in the game", and therefore without any inherent purpose that would engage one's will.

Total Flow requires skin in the game.

> "Within this alternate paradigm in which faith is strong but the will has evaporated, humans have trouble recognizing lies. We first believe in order to tap into the mythological narrative. We do not judge the truth of what we perceive, even though if we stop being transported and think about it, we know quite well that it is a fiction. Only after exploring the narrative and understanding it to the point where one is able to employ it and willfully test it through applying its precepts is one able to come to a decision about whether it is true or not. Otherwise, one will continue to believe the narrative until a shocking collision with the truth of reality upsets one's delusions."
> Σ Frame: Infiltrating the Minds of the Masses through Suspension of Disbelief and Social Catharsis/Cathexis (2022-7-25)

Men get lost at the point when they forget about searching for the truth (i.e. doing the part in bold), and are swept away in a fantasyland of lies (i.e. the last sentence). This leads to a frustrated catharsis, AKA the Black Pill, which continues until one makes a deliberate choice to disengage, or is somehow shaken out of it, usually by another collision with reality, which may not be forthcoming for every man.

If there are a large number of people believing the same lies, including both men and women, then an alternate paradigm of reality is created in which the narrative does indeed appear true.

Σ Frame Maxim 29, AKA The Law of Personal Spheres, "Fungible Reality", "Non-Shared Environment" (Catacomb Resident, Jack): To the man of faith, reality is fungible. God has given mankind the latitude of having multiple dimensions of coexistent realities. Each man's reality is a manifestation of his individual constitution, beliefs, choices, and experiences. One reality is just as valid as another. There is no objective reality that we all share.
Corollary A to Maxim 29: Reality is best understood as a living being (God, if you will), a person with all the quirks and variations we would expect from even the most perfect of persons. And as any real person, reality treats no two of us just the same.
Corollary B to Maxim 29: With all the threads of events and experiences winding through our lives, no two of us will experience reality in precisely the same way.
Corollary C to Maxim 29: It's only true if you believe it's true. Your faith and convictions are the key to discovering and developing the thread of reality God has for you.

Overthinking and Hamstering are Hallmarks of Faithlessness / Unbelief

Hamstering is the female equivalent of male Overthinking in that both men and women lose Flow, lose touch with reality, and get lost in the vanity of their thoughts. However, it affects the sexes differently. Where overthinking leads men to do nothing, hamstering leads women to make rash decisions and do things they shouldn't.

The Bible tells us that "the Gentiles [unbelievers] walk in the futility of their mind", and that this has some far reaching consequences.

> [17] This I say, therefore, and testify in the Lord, that you should no longer walk as the rest of the Gentiles walk, in the futility of their mind, [18] having their understanding darkened, being alienated from the life of God, because of the ignorance that is in them, because of the blindness of their heart; [19] who, being past feeling, have given themselves over to lewdness, to work all uncleanness with greediness.
> Ephesians 4:17-19 (NKJV)

Oh, yeah… and OnlyFans!

It gets worse. Overthinking and Hamstering are the diametric antithesis of Faith, and are therefore the gateway drugs to ħəll.

> [21] …although they knew God, they did not glorify Him as God, nor were thankful, but became futile in their thoughts, and their foolish hearts were darkened. [22] Professing to be wise, they became fools…
> Romans 1:21-22 (NKJV)

Reading through the rest of Romans 1, we learn that Overthinking and Hamstering causes one to become undiscerning, unforgiving, unloving, unmerciful, and untrustworthy, and eventually leads to all kinds of uncleanness and sin, including arrogance, backstabbing, covetousness, deceit, disrespect to authorities, envy, evil-mindedness, evil schemes, gossiping / whispering, hating God, h0m0sexuality, maliciousness; murder, pride, rebellion, sexual immorality, strife, unrighteousness, violence, and wickedness.

Conclusions

The way to avoid falling into the anger, bitterness, concupiscence, despondency, envy, and frustration which are the hallmarks of the Black Pill, and escape all of the other iniquities listed above, is to stop overthinking it, get off one's butt, and find ways in which one can experience Flow, and in doing so, worship and glorify God and become productive.

This is exactly what Paul says in scripture.

> And do not be conformed to this world, but be transformed by the renewing of your mind, that you may prove what is that good and acceptable and perfect will of God.
> Romans 12:2 (NKJV)

Metaphysical Literacy

Jack · 21 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The worldly wise man is the Biblical fool, and double vice versa. Can you identify this difference in yourself?

Readership: All; Men;

The Metaphysically Illiterate Man is the Biblical Fool

The worldly concept of a fool is one who driven by impulsive emotion and has a lot of illogical mish-mashed ideas in his head, whereas a wise man has a well-ordered logic well informed by experience, or "street-smarts".

The Biblical concept of a fool is one who has a lot of logical ideas in his head, *"wise in his own estimations", but which have no basis or application in the present reality, whereas a wise man has spiritually informed and finely attuned appreciation of the nature of things, such that he can almost predict how things will go.

 Scripture References: Proverbs 3:7-8; 26:4-12; Romans 12:16*

Developing Metaphysical Literacy

The two concepts of foolishness mentioned above are somewhat of the opposite, and making the transition from one to the other is a bit of a trick that takes some time and adjustment.

- To make the transition from being a worldly fool to a Biblical / spiritual fool, one needs to trust Christ to redeem him from all his sin and foolishness.
- To make the transition from being worldly wise to Biblically / spiritually wise, one must let go of his reliance on rational logic and develop discernment.

In reality, everyone is a bit of both foolish and wise by either estimation, so the task is to determine what is most lacking and fill in that piece.

The initial task of recognizing one's own lack of discernment and wisdom is, in itself, another challenge that comes at the meta-level.

Consider this example. One commenter wrote,

> "I am skeptical of claims by internet commenters that they can read people from pictures (and video if you like). This claim to being body language experts."

thedeti responded,

> "I don't agree. I think this is a skill that is essential to have and that can be learned. The Will Smith/Jada Pinkett thread was a good one for the photos Jack included. I've seen the way Mychael looks at Scott in some of their photos. You cannot fake that. It's automatic and the women themselves don't know they're doing it. The Manosphere Ladies' Auxiliary denies this because it's in their interest to do so. I again refer to you to that subreddit, GirlsMirin. reddit.com/r/GirlsMirin. Women can't fake that. It's innate.
> You can tell a lot from body language, facial expression, the use of the eyes — all of it yields enormous amounts of information. You fail to learn it at your peril. You fail to detect it at your peril."

The first challenge is for men to believe it is even possible. Yes it is!

Scott et al. have made it clear that it is of crucial importance for men to be able to read IOIs, IOC, microexpressions, "body language", and non-verbal cues. Chateau Heartiste, Gunner Q, and even Rollo (on occasion) have argued that "physiognomy is real". Rollo stated that Blue Pilled men can't "read the room", whereas for Christians, discernment is an important hallmark of spiritual maturity.

Identifying People's (i.e. Wimminz) Spiritual Constitution

The most noteworthy and conversation inspiring subject that can allow a man to practice developing metaphysical literacy is in "reading" people — anyone really, but women are especially entertaining.

Whenever you go out in public, and whenever you have a few minutes to spare, sit down somewhere and have a coffee or a rest. As you're sitting there, studiously watch the bypassers going on about their lives. You'll learn some things, and get a few laughs too!

As you become more familiar with watching people, you'll see their personality and constitution being reflected in their eyes, facial expressions, hand gestures, and the way they walk, dress, talk, etc. After practicing this for a while, you'll get to the point where you'll be able to look at a person's photograph and pick up the patterns.

Because reading women is a critically important skill for men sizing up / vetting women, Σ Frame has had several posts studying various features and phenomenon related to physical and metaphysical indicators of character. Here are a few.

Our analysis of “reading people” has not been limited to women. I wrote an entire series on identifiable traits in men: A Summary of Faux-Masculine Archetypes (the theme for May 2022).

I encourage readers to develop an eye for this sort of thing. I think it’s helpful for men to discuss what they see in people IRL, in photographs of people, and in videos of interactions, and thereby hone their “reading skills”. In real life, this is extended to applied discernment — what information one can “read” in people and in an environment can add greatly to their wisdom in making appropriate decisions and actions.

Epilogue

There is a stark contrast between being Blue Pilled and being Red Pilled / aware / spiritually discerning. The Red Pill has informed us of the nature of women and the SMP, and this knowledge shakes a man out of the illogical mish-mash about wimminz. But this knowledge is not enough to allow greater Biblical wisdom to be exercised. A man must develop his own sense of awareness / discernment through regular practice (Hebrews 5:13-14). The first step is in praying and asking God for discernment and wisdom (James 1:5-8).

Earthquakes

Oscar wrote an email to me, asking how I have been coping with the recent earthquakes in Taiwan. We are doing fine, thankfully. I appreciate his thoughts and prayers and those of other readers.

I have some information about the recent earthquakes and a story to tell about earthquakes in Taiwan.

Information about Earthquakes in Taiwan

Image Source: Taiwan Central Weather Bureau / Earthquake Report
Taiwan lies at the cusp of the Eurasian and Philippine plates. The island of Taiwan was created from plate shifts (involving earthquake activity) over millions of years.

There are earthquakes in Taiwan almost every day. The vast majority of these earthquakes are minor. Most are hardly detectable to human senses. Some are a quiet gentle swaying. The scarier quakes produce a loud rumbling noise and everything hops and scoots on the floor and bangs around.

After living here for a while without experiencing any serious consequences, I now find them to be rather fun and entertaining.

But once in a while, we'll have a big one.

There was a 7.7 magnitude quake that struck on 1999-9-21 that killed 2,415 people and injured 11,305 more. This quake caused NT$300 billion (US$10 billion) worth of damage.

As you've probably heard by now, there have been many earthquakes here lately. There were more than 70 per day between Saturday and Wednesday! Most of these recent earthquakes are minor, but there have been several 4s and 5s. Two of them were over 6! One 6.4 on Saturday night and a 6.8 on Sunday afternoon. These earthquakes were rather shallow (between 5 to 20 km. deep). This translates into more violent shaking compared to the deeper quakes. (Some are as deep as 200 km.)

M6.9 Earthquake Hits Taiwan – Sept. 18, 2022

Many more videos can be found here.

Casualties and Noteworthy Structural Failures

- Compressive fault lines appeared in many places (visible in the videos above).
- One old building collapsed, killing an elderly man inside instantly.
- Gaoliao Bridge and Lun Tien Bridge are two other major structures that collapsed! Yuli Bridge also suffered unrepairable damage. All these bridges are very long and very old, are are located in Fuli Township, Hualien, near the epicenter of the quakes.
- There is a mausoleum that had many cremation urns shaken out of their vaults and smashed, about 800 total. Because of the presumed spiritual significance of this event, the descendants of the dead and the mausoleum managers are in a quandary over this.
- There are also several landslides that blocked roads in the mountains. Many people are stranded in certain locales because of the blocked roads.

Fortunately, the epicenter and most of the damage is in a rural area.

Predictive Factors of Failure

Damage depends on a few factors.

- The depth, intensity, and propinquity of the quake.
- The frequency of oscillation.
- The natural harmonic frequency of structures, such as bridges and buildings.
- The design and construction of the bridges, buildings, etc.
- The composition of the ground under the foundation.

If the frequency of oscillation matches the natural harmonic frequency of a structure, and if the quake is long and intense enough, then that structure will come down if it is not designed to withstand a quake.

For the inquisitive science geeks among us, this is explained in the following video.

The video says earthquakes produce horizontal longitudinal waves. However, I have experienced earthquakes having a rapid up-and-down motion, which I suppose is either a vertical longitudinal or perhaps a horizontal transverse wave. This type of motion has a different science behind it, and these are generally much more destructive.

A Short Story about the Construction Industry in Taiwan

I have a little story to tell, that fits into our topic of redemption.

1951 was a historic year for earthquakes in Taiwan. There was a lot of damage, but people buried the dead, swept up the mess, and moved on with their lives. People considered it to be an act of God, and no one thought there was much that could be done about it.

Then in 1958, there was an old four story elementary school that suddenly and totally collapsed during an earthquake, instantly killing 128 children and injuring hundreds more. To make matters worse, the insurance industry could not shoulder the burden of rebuilding the school and compensating all the families. The public outrage was so tremendous that the Taiwan government responded by going on the warpath to revamp the entire construction industry.

Some of the measures taken included…

- Lots of government funding went toward research in developing structures that can withstand earthquakes. As a result, many new engineering designs were invented that can prevent a structure from undergoing catastrophic failure. Most of these designs are now required by law for new buildings.
- The government instituted a government bureau for overseeing the construction industry. This bureau imposes a large number of standards and requirements for construction projects and attempts to reduce the amount of corruption and fraud related to the industry.
- One requirement is that the planning and finances of construction projects are to be made public knowledge, and people are urged to report any questionable activities or controversial developments.
- Construction companies are required to place large signs in front of every construction project, giving information about the construction company, the lead engineer, the budget, companies under subcontract, and the size and duration of the project, among other information. This includes phone numbers and website links for people to get more information and/or report any suspicious activities.
- Construction companies, executives, and key engineers overseeing construction projects that fail in an earthquake now face spectacular fines (if no one was hurt) and jail time (if it resulted in death).
- Property owners are required by law to carry earthquake insurance, thereby supporting the insurance industry.

Taiwan was under martial law at that time (up until 1987), so these changes were sweeping.

As a result, the Taiwan construction industry is now the best in the world by many estimations, not only because of the rigor surrounding quality, but also because they can build structures that can reliably withstand severe earthquakes.

Of course, there's still a lot of corruption and graft in the industry, and certain older structures continue to fail during major quakes, but nevertheless, the design and construction of newer building projects is much better than most anywhere else in the world. Anymore, the only major structures that fail in an earthquake were built before the 1970s.

Epilogue

If you think about it, this is a story of redemption.

The deaths of those 128 children in 1958 were indeed a sad and grievous catastrophe. But because of this tragedy, the quality and standards for construction improved, deaths continue to be prevented on an ongoing regular basis, and 23 million people live without fear of earthquakes in a land that has earthquakes nearly every day.

A question that readers may like to consider is this: Is suffering and loss a necessary part of redemption?

Brother Where Art Thou?

I put Jason (AKA LastMod) on moderation several months ago because most of his mainstay verbiage is trash talking fellow commenters — which I don't allow.

Another part of the problem is that he's a terrible writer. Some of his comments are rather insightful, but his ideas gets lost in the bitter garble. I always have to ponder his comments to get the gist of what he's trying to say. Other readers don't have the same contemplative patience, take offense, and miss his main points.

But sometimes he'll have something really worthwhile to say. If I think one of his comments has a good point, I'll edit it to remove the cynical trash talk and approve it. Once in a while he'll leave a very long comment that cuts to the heart of things. For comments like these, I'll take the time to rewrite the comment to bring out his main point, and make it presentable, readable, and understandable to the general public.

I think moderating his comments is probably the best way I can let Jason's voice be heard in a way that other men can understand and find acceptable. I'm also hoping that through this exercise, Jason can learn how to present his ideas in a better way so that he can get some positive resonance instead of constant vitriol, and then feel what it is like to be part of the group. So far, he has never complained about being on moderation or having his comments totally reedited. I hope it's because he sees that he is being heard.

Jason's Problems are Rather Common

From picking through Jason's comments, I've gathered that his biggest problem is that he is somewhat like Glover's "Nice Guy™", and being this way under the Blue Pill delusion for most of his life has led him to despair and to despise men, especially men who have a blustering charisma and irrational faith – the same kinds of men who do well with women.

I believe he despises men for many profound reasons.

- Analysis Paralysis.
- Being told outright lies.
- Confusion about the SMP.
- Misconceptions about God.
- A lack of metaphysical literacy.
- God's seemingly erratic concept of justice.
- Being the victim of Black Knight Competition.
- Regular rejection from both men and women.
- The Spiritual confusion of clinging to the "Rules".
- A lifetime of poor treatment, e.g. mockery, ridicule, etc.
- All the typical "man talk" makes him feel confused and/or judged.
- Being associated with Low-Lifes and the resulting Out-Group discrimination.
- Confusion about why nonChristians appear to be more kind, loving, and reasonable than many Christians.

All of this has resulted in anger, bitterness, confusion, distrust, frustration, and carrying a negative impression of others when no offense is intended.

I can understand Jason's position because I was once a little bit like him in the past. I too was disappointed with women and the posture-posing of churchianity. I largely saw overconfident men as being immoral Chads and arrogant bad@sses, and I didn't know how to respond to their antics, which was frustrating and humiliating. I couldn't interpret any of these behaviors through a Christian lens.

It was a hard lesson for me to learn, when I realized that…

- Those men who have a lot of confidence, faith, and charisma are often times the least responsible with what they have been given.
- Some unbelievers are more forgiving, gracious, and kind than believers, and that it is not uncommon for God to use such people to be vehicles of His grace.
- I needed to forgive people.
- I needed to count the cost.
- I needed to get over myself, develop my ego, and learn to hold my own.
- I needed to develop some of their positive traits in myself.

In fewer words, I needed to exercise humility, clear away my presuppositions, find faith, and open the eyes and ears of my heart.

Is there Hope?

All this brings up the question, why do I care? A couple years ago, when Jason was causing a lot of commotion on Σ Frame, I prayed about how I should handle it. During my prayers, I remembered how I used to be in the past (as I described above), and the passage from Matthew 25:31-46 stood out in my mind. Since then, I've come to see him as a burden that must be borne (although I'm sure he would resent this sentiment). After all, this blog is intended to help men, including, and perhaps especially men like him.

Interestingly, Jason may stand a better chance of finding some hope of redemption through participating in the Mod scene than he does by hanging around here.

Some readers have dismissed Jason as hopelessly damned and have suggested that he should be permanently blocked, as Dalrock, DeepStrength, and others have done. Meanwhile, other readers have expressed the hope of redemption for him.

LocustsPlease summarized his own stance with a recognition of the fragility of life.

> "When men see they can't or reasonably won't get what they want from relationships they come to places like this. Nobody claimed to have all the perfect answers or that it would be fair. Being a loser in the SMP or MMP hurts. All of Lastmod's posts show this. People think the line of incel is thick. No, it's thin. I was a virgin until 19. Had I not known some Chad's who knew game, I wonder exactly how long I would have gone or maybe forever? Would I be in Jason's boat?"

Other readers have written to me privately, saying…

> "I rejoice in your patience with Jason. I've long felt he has potential, and it's part of our treasures in Heaven that we can bless people, regardless of how it turns out here below. It's a point of obedience."

And…

> "Keep up the good work. I find your answers to Jason in particular are well-considered."

I'm pleased that Jason has made friends with Scott, or rather, Scott has reached out to befriend him. Scott is a professional psychologist and counselor who knows how to deal with him. Granted, most other men can't do that. I do think Jason is slowly SLOWLY improving his ability to trust and respect other men (i.e. charismatic high SMV men) since he met Scott. Furthermore, Scott's positive assessment of Jason has bolstered my confidence in accepting him, farts, warts, quirks and all.

In the past, Jason was deeply offended whenever I mentioned him in a post. We shall see how it goes this time.

Overall, this is one of the biggest problems facing Christianity these days. How can we reach and integrate all the lost and confused men who are searching for "meaning" in their lives? Jason is just one man among the multitudes.

5 Years with Σ Frame

Jack · 27 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Jack's reflections on hosting Σ Frame.

Readership: Men
Theme: Special Post
Length: 1,600 words
Reading Time: 4 minutes

Today marks the 5-year anniversary of when I kick-started the Σ Frame blog on WordPress. This post offers some thoughts and reflections on this journey of faith.

Sourcing Content

One thing that is unique about Σ Frame that sets it apart from the other Manosphere blogs (those that have survived) is that the topics covered here come out of three main sources which are rare to find elsewhere.

1. The Bible + The Red Pill

The juxtaposition of these two sources provides a fuller analysis of both the nature and character of God (The Bible), and the nature and character of humanity (The Red Pill).

2. Experience

Σ Frame reports the life experiences of myself and other contributing authors and corresponding readers, including the more abstract conceptions we've learned that only began to "click" later in life. The other Manosphere blogs that speak from the voice of experience mostly focus on PUA experiences, and even those are getting rare now. My point is that although this voice of experience lends credibility and specific transferrable knowledge to the purpose of the blog, the Christian experience of Masculinity that we've all had has not been very much Christian nor Masculine, or at least not identified as such according to what typically passes for masculinity. It's been a long hard journey for us to rediscover Godly Masculinity within the modern context. It's embarrassing for us to admit this, but it is what it is.

3. Mystical Metaphysics

By mystical metaphysics, I mean the things I've learned through my prayers and in my personal walk with God. It comes from a position of wonder about the nature of creation, and of not having already attained nor of being already perfected, but of being in a continual search for applied truth and maintaining a state of learning and growth (Philippians 3:12-14).

Beginnings

I first started blogging in 2009, when blogging was relatively new and hot. The reason I started blogging is because of the demand for my writings.

I guess it all started when my circle of friends at church was impressed by some insights I shared with them during group discussions. People realized that what I was talking about was very important to their lives, even life changing, but they found it hard to catch on. Several people asked me to explain some things to them in more detail. They recognized that the nature of what I was talking about was rather complex and profound, and that they needed to learn more about it and immerse themselves in it for a while to catch on.

Within a few weeks, the number of people who were participating in the discussion went from 5 to more than 25. They organized a weekend retreat and asked me to speak there. Soon afterward, this turned into a small group that met every Sunday afternoon at church. A lot of new people started coming to church just to take my class.

The pastors were uncomfortable with how popular the group became in such a short amount of time. They couldn't understand what I was teaching, and they thought it wasn't primarily Christian, so they closed down the group. Later on, after I started reading Dalrock, Donal Graeme, and Zippy Catholic, I realized that it was Christian, it just wasn't churchian enough for their tastes.

Since we were unable to meet in a formal group at church any more, and it was inconvenient for everyone to meet somewhere outside of church, people in the group asked me to write down my ideas so that they could continue to digest the wisdom therein. I found that blogging was a good way to share these essays with them and anyone else who might be interested. So that was how I got started in blogging.

If readers are curious about what I was teaching, then go to the "Posts by Month" on the sidebar. I have preserved 42 posts from the original blog; 29 posts in 2009, and 13 posts in 2010. Most of these posts are rather long. They're not particularly Red Pill either. I didn't discover the Manosphere and take the Red Pill until 2017. There are also two posts dated 2007. I added these later on and listed the date on the post as the day I wrote those essays, not the day they were posted.

Within a year after these events, my first wife left me, and I lost my inspirational mojo for a while. I didn't post much for a long while after this time.

Early Days on WordPress

About a year into my second marriage, I stumbled across the Manosphere. After that, lot of things fell into place in my understanding of things. I found a renewed hope and a sense of efficacy founded on self-regulation and life-regulation that I never had before. Soon afterwards, I felt inspired to start blogging again.

When I first started writing about Red Pill topics on WordPress (in late September 2017), I had no idea that this blog would ever become as popular as it has, or that it would ever become one of the more prominent Christian Red Pill outlets. All I knew is that I had some things to say, what I considered common sense, IMHO, but I just wasn't seeing anyone else write about such things. Also, I had a lot of questions in my mind which no one was addressing. I decided that if I studied and explored those questions in blog essays, then others interested in the same questions might stumble across my writings and leave a note about their own insights and/or discoveries in the comments. Then I might find some answers. I kinda expected someone to shoot me down with a "Look doofus… It's like this…" sort of response. This has happened a few times,* but for the most part, I found that others knew even less than I did about the topics I cover here.

 Those men who took me to task the most often were Ed Hurst, Thedeti, and NovaSeeker, and they were good enough to guide me towards a better understanding of things.*

Content Transformation

My blog posts from 4-6 years ago were rife with sexualized content, which probably helped kick start the popularity of this blog. But after writing on this subject for a while, I realized that this was a catharsis for the malingering angst from my divorce which was finalized just a couple years prior.

The next phase was to use the Red Pill to identify my blind spots, where I went wrong, and how to adjust my life strategy. Posts written during 2018-2019 came from this angle.

A Renewed Focus on the Eternal

In 2020, the Christian Manosphere made a break from its secular compatriots. Since that time, there has been an ever increasing focus on topics related to God, Headship, humility, mysticism, redemption, sanctification, and various other spiritual metaphysics.

Here, I'll cite a passage from a landmark post by Adam Piggott that observed this transformation.

> "The online discussions gradually morphed into a focus on how to get the girls. This had various guises which I will not go into here. Suffice to say that this was a stepping stone. The various stepping stones became known as the red pill journey, of which getting the girls was the introductory stone. But in the last couple of years the online masculinity communities have embraced Christianity to a very large extent. Not completely, but definitely in big numbers. The ultimate red pill as it were.
> If the previous introductory step was how to get the girls, the introductory step today is totally different. The introductory step now is Christianity because how to get the girls takes you away from Christ and towards mortal sin. In other words, for young guys today the introductory step is different from what young guys only 10 years ago were doing. Not completely of course, but in numbers high enough to be influential.
> These days, you'll see a lot more talk about God, Gnon, Metaphysics, and Mysticism in the Manosphere than you would ever have seen only 5 years ago. And more importantly, it is celebrated whereas before it would often have been ridiculed. This is a comprehensive and profound change to an online community that is large enough and influential enough that it has been the target of documentaries and studies by our cultural and spiritual enemies."
> Adam Piggott: "I will draw all men to myself." – Jn. 12:32 (2021-12-12) Last paragraph amplified by Jack.

Current Status

During that time (in early 2020), I took the topics in a new direction by expanding my understanding of religious-sounding words and concepts that fly right over our heads, and how these concepts are to be applied to daily living — words like covenant, defilement, glorification, humility, and most recently, redemption.

Another one of these words was sanctification, and this led into a study of how sex is related to sanctification, an association I had never heard anywhere else in my life but was impressed upon me through reading 1 Thessalonians 4:3-8.

Since then, I've found that there are deeper purposes for sex and marriage which are never discussed in the one place it should be stressed – the church.

To wit:

- That sex and marriage under a structure of Headship is the primary vehicle of sanctification for a large number of individuals.
- Headship is what brings God's blessings, joy, peace, and presence into the home.
- Headship is what allows children to know God while they're growing up.

As this blog has matured, and judging by what I've read from other bloggers around the sphere, it looks like this blog is and will be best known, not for RP Christian marriage as I had imagined earlier, but for developing a fuller understanding of Biblical Headship and various other nuances and expressions of masculine authority.

…and this includes single / unmarried men!

Introduction

St. Dalrock was he who first brought our attention to the fact that Western culture has somehow developed a propensity to disrespect respectability and dishonor the honorable. As such, it is now commonplace for immoral and unethical men to receive honor and respect, and average men see little value in being respectable or honorable.

We've discussed this phenomenon in the comments sections under the following posts.

Roger Bannister was the first to break the 4 minute mile.
The most pertinent questions addressed were…

1. Why is there a moral incongruency surrounding Honor and Respect?
2. What is the profile of a man who "rightfully deserves the respect of other men"? What does that profile look like?

3. What can be done to assign honor and respect to those men who are rightfully deserving of it?

These are the questions I had in mind during the study of Faux-Masculine Archetypes in May 2022. In this study, I set forth 5 benchmarks of Masculinity to form an objective and qualitative criteria which were then used to evaluate each of the archetypes. These five benchmarks form the acronym SHARP (or HARPS) and have the subcategories listed below.

1. Strength — Athleticism; Endurance; Maintaining Frame; Physical Strength; Stamina;
2. Honor — Ethics; Honesty; Identity; Morality; Reputation; Social Status;
3. Authority — Education; Influence; Position; Power; Socioeconomic Status;
4. Respect — Abilities / Skills; Authenticity; Charisma; Excellence; Integrity; SMV;
5. Purpose — Attaining Goals; Discipline; Incentives / Motivations; Meaning / Significance / Value; Perseverance;

This examination of Masculine traits and archetypes and our discussions (noted above) considered the questions above and found the following.

Concerning Honor

- Honor is a difficult balance to attain / maintain, because Ethics and Morality often have a negative correlation with Status, presumably because of competition in a fallen world.
- Among the things that deliver Honor, Reputation and Status carry more weight than Ethics and Morality, again, because of competition. (I will develop this further below.)
- Universal but rare exceptions to this moral dichotomy include instances of heroism and exceptional valor.
- Qualities related to Honor are highly dependent on the ethical system employed by the wider social group.
- Man's identity, ethics, and morality are necessarily tied to Honor. If it is not, then although a man might receive honor for whatever reason, that man may not necessarily be inherently honorable, by definition. (For example, veterans receive honor for their bravery and service, not for the horrendous things they did in battle.)

Concerning Respect

- The archetypes scoring highest in masculinity also scored the highest in Respect.
- The culmination of masculinity is summarily manifested in Respect.
- The core spiritual effectiveness of Masculinity hinges on Respect, which is possibly why St. Paul emphasized that wives should respect their husbands (Ephesians 5:33).
- Respect is linked to Authority through Power.

Comprehensive

- That which makes a man honorable are internal characteristics like character, courage, honesty, and willpower, whereas that which brings a man respect are inherent qualities related to Strength (e.g. endurance, Frame, stamina, etc.), Virtuosity, Status, and Authority (e.g. power, influence, etc.).
- The things which make a man honorable (i.e. ethics, honesty, service, valor, etc.) have no direct relation to those qualities that make him respectable (i.e. expertise, authority, charisma, SMV, etc.).
- Certain achievements can garner both Honor and Respect if limited to a specific demographic, but these are rare and hard won. (For example, Julian Assange, Martin Luther King, Ronald Reagan, and other popular dignitaries.)

Julian Assange changed the face of journalism, politics, and history, and was persecuted by powerful foes.

There is one revision from my earlier study of Faux-Masculine Archetypes. In my earlier assessment, I included Abilities / Skills under the category of Respect and mentioned that these traits branch across Authority and Purpose. But after studying this a bit more, I've come to see that respect is not always given to a man simply because he possesses an ability or skill (e.g. think of gamers or amateur hobbyists), but only when he has achieved a mastery / virtuosity of an ability / skill that is appreciated by the larger social group in question. This is why I advised men to find a social context in which Reality = True (for himself) in which he can develop Flow and work toward mastery.

On a related note, one previous post, What Women find Attractive: Fit and Skilled (2022-4-18), reported an opinion from a female reader saying that women are attracted to men with skills. After considering the above, it would be more precise to say that women are attracted to men who demonstrate mastery / virtuosity in a skill recognized by other men (within a shared social group) to have value, as this leads directly to Respect.

Comprehensively, it is observed that Honor and Respect are somehow intertwined with Strength, Authority, and Purpose through a complex function involving various other characteristics, experiences, and traits, such as Abilities / Skills, Confidence / Charisma, SMV, and others.

To aid our understanding of the dynamic development of masculinity, I've studied all these aspects closely and put together the following system diagram. There is no note of spiritual qualities in this graph, because it pertains to the masculine development of all men.

The diagram illustrates the cause and effect relationships between these features of masculinity, how they occur in a certain order, and that they have a rather complex interrelation.

Strength, Honor, Authority, Respect, and Purpose (SHARP) roughly correlate with Donal Graeme's Looks, Athleticism, Money, Power, and Status (LAMPS). The difference is that LAMPS comes from the perspective of what women find attractive in men and thus forms the primary basis of a man's SMV, whereas SHARP comes from the male viewpoint of masculine development.

Confidence and Charisma are often added to LAMPS as an SMV determinant, and the diagram shows why this is appropriate, as it feeds directly into Respect according to the above nomenclature.

Experience (indicated by the circular purple background) lends to the development of all these aspects of masculinity.

Critiques and suggestions for improvement are welcomed from readers.

For further insights, erudite readers may like to discuss how well the relations shown in the above system diagram agree with what they know about human nature and sociality from the Bible. I expect the ongoing discussion of Honor and Respect will be interesting.

Applying the Systems Diagram to Intersexual Relationships

A man's journey all begins with the self, summarily represented in the diagram as Strength.

From studying this diagram, it becomes apparent why the top SMV men can jump ahead of everyone else without first having to prove themselves –- because having external strength and especially a high SMV are shortcuts to Respect. (Not to mention the additional bonus that Tingles = Respect from an intersexual perspective.)

Most men have to go the route of Purpose, work hard towards developing and mastering a skill in order to take the roundabout path to Respect.

A few men will fare well through Honor displayed through Courage and Competition.

From a social perspective, honor and respect are predominantly offered to those men with a demonstrated utility either to the wellbeing of the community or to Feminine Imperatives. Readers have argued about whether the latter is morally or ethically appropriate, and I would say most of the objections are based on one of the following cofactors.

- Envy
- Implicit sexual immorality.
- The inversion of Headship.
- The idolatry of female pedestalization.

The lurking question of Ethics (one aspect of Honor) can be properly understood when we recognize that human mating dissolves the backdrop cultural ethics and resorts to a Power based ethic. That is to say, the winner is deemed "good" by virtue of his being a winner, and "Might is Right". Such is the Law of the Jungle.

In spite of any moral expectations or ethical considerations we might have, the old Manospherian adage stands true: "Women wait at the finish line and choose the winners." Here, the "winners" are those men who have successfully gone through all the steps necessary to attain Respect.

The nature of female hypergamy recasts men as falling into an AMOG-ish competition for dominance, proficiency, Reputation / Status, etc. As seen in the diagram, hypergamic screening is, at its root, a very quick and dirty way (quite literally) for women to filter men according to their relative progress in Confidence, Expertise, and Virtuosity (expressed through Game) and the concreted Reputation and Status aspects of Honor (as determined by the social In-Group and the personal tastes of the observer).

This also emphasizes why women are drawn to a wide array of specific indicators of masculinity, such as Authority, Confidence / Charisma, preselection, Status, being respected by other men, etc. These traits are very near the “finish line”.

The diagram also reveals why habits and traits related to Honor and Purpose are entirely omitted from one’s SMV evaluation and thus go unnoticed by Women. These characteristics appear early in the “race” and may not be proven. OTOH, men are acutely aware of these things because they inform him of what kind of relationship with that man is most appropriate, e.g. friend, partner, peer competitor, teacher, student, coach, mentor, etc,

The Manosphere commonly cites Purpose as one of the most important tasks in a man’s life. What we’ve learned about Purpose here does not contradict the common RP wisdom, nor does it imply that Purpose is of any lesser value. Purpose is what motivates a man and carries him through these steps and processes.

One more final note. Inside a sexual/marital relationship, the area of Relationships feeds into Purpose and Abilities / Skills concerning how to exercise Headship, manage the household, wash the wife clean, and rear children. (This loop is not shown in the diagram.) It doesn’t work the other way though, and this is why it is a major error for men to think they can make having a relationship with a woman into their purpose. A man cannot very well jump outside the flows depicted in the diagram, and it is practically impossible for him to swim upstream.

In the next post about Understanding Respect, I will give answers to the three questions in the introduction.

Update: In the comments below, Oscar and Thedeti have done a fine job of flushing out the finer details of the differences between Honor and Respect.

Understanding Respect

Jack · 29 September 2022 · Archived copy · Original

For the Christian man, it begins with one's self.

Readership: All
Theme: Redemptive Headship and Masculinity
Reader's Note: The capitalization of words indicates a theoretical concept.
Length: 1,300 words
Reading Time: 7 minutes

Introduction

This post is a continuance of the previous post, Restoring Respect (2022-9-28). Here I'll offer answers to the questions posed before.

The systems diagram for masculine development (given in the previous post) appears below for the reader's convenience.

1. Why is there a moral incongruency surrounding Honor and Respect?

There are several reasons here, maybe more.

1. The qualities that make a man honorable (e.g. altruism, ethics, honesty, morality, etc.) have little to do with the things that draw respect (e.g. expertise, power, authority, and female attention).
2. There is much uncertainty about the constitution, motivations, and social value of a man with Honor, but there is no question about a man who has demonstrated concrete accomplishments.
3. The one link between Honor and Respect is in Reputation and Status which few men can achieve while still maintaining moralistic qualities of honor and virtue, due to competitive dynamics.
4. There exists somewhat of a theoretical / moral dichotomy between those men who are altruistic, honest, and so on, and those men who can get the job done. There shouldn't be, but realistic people recognize this stereotypical difference as being common and therefore use this dichotomy to consider whether a particular man is well-suited for his position and responsibilities. For example, it is appropriate for honest men to be accountants, teachers, pastors, etc., whereas it is also appropriate for rough and ready men to be businessmen, construction workers, lawyers, soldiers, etc. Some types of professions, like policemen, politicians, and public stewards must have a certain combination of traits and are therefore honored or respected according to their position and/or their service to the community.

5. The ethical system used in "natural" human mating conforms to a Power based ethical system. "Only the strong survive." "All is fair in love and war." Within this system, other ethical systems, including Christian ethics, are summarily discarded.
6. In a gynocentric world order, a Biblical ethical system (viz. traditional / Christian notions of Honor and virtue), as well as any strength of Purpose that a man might have, are totally disregarded as qualities that do not register on the female radar. Or if they do, they hardly make a man exceptional. The gynocentric order therefore ignores or discounts these traits.

Looksmaxxing highlights physical appearances, status, and SMV, which can draw respect.

2. What is the profile of a man who "rightfully deserves the respect of other men"? What does that profile look like?

First off, asking this question is an attempt to break free from the gynocentric social stronghold and reinstate traditional standards for assessing men. As such, it poses an affront to this order which men should be aware of.

The answer is that it depends on the surrounding social order that sets the standard of what is to be respected in a man. Here are three broader social systems for the reader to get the gist.

1. According to the gynocentric world order, only tall, hawt, wealthy, high status men are afforded respect because of what they represent to the Feminine Imperative.
2. According to traditional standards and the way of men, it is the man who has made significant progress through at least one of the series of steps that lead to Respect (depicted in the diagram above). These men are respected for what they provide to their family and/or the community, e.g. inspiration, leadership, material support, security, stability, wisdom, etc. Contributing good genes is included in this, which reveals that the Feminine Imperative imposes a distortion of sociality by cherry picking and magnifying these specific qualities and summarily rejecting all others by demonizing men and masculinity in general.

3. According to the traditions of faith, there is a long list of Biblically inspired habits and traits, as well as many personal spiritual goalposts that could be used as a measuring stick for determining whether a man has attained a significant standing with God that would be worthy of another Christian man's respect. Here's a few for starters: 1 Corinthians 12:4-11; 28-31; Hebrews 5:13-14; 1 Timothy 3:1-13; Titus 1:6-9; et al.

The fact that one's social group is vitally important towards establishing Respect is why I advised men to find a social context in which Reality = True (for himself) in which he can develop Flow and work toward those things that would bring him Respect.

I also have to mention this. A different and somewhat harshly self-critical way to approach this question is to question the question itself. Are we asking this question out of envy and laziness, because we think, "It's nawt faaaiiir that tall, fit, good looking men get a shortcut to Respect (and all the benefits and poozy that come with it), while all us other guys have to go through all this work just to make something of ourselves?"

Not much honor here, but there's a whole lot of respect for men who can do this kind of work.

3. What can be done to assign honor and respect to those men who are rightfully deserving of it?

This turns out to be a trick question because it depends on the social system as I described above. Unless one is in a position of power and authority, it would be easier and wiser to switch social groups than to try changing the one you're in. This might explain why a lot of men go church hopping, especially when they're young. They're looking for respect, as well as a community they can fit into.

Within just about any social group you might find, the men who are receiving respect are the ones who already deserve it, according to that group's standards. This is true for both the gynocentric worldly system and the church. Respect cannot be manufactured out of thin air without a dynamic social setting.

This applies on the individual level too. If a man is not giving you the respect that is common to decency, then he's not trustworthy. If a woman is not giving you respect, it's probably better to NEXT her instead of trying to earn her respect. Some caveats apply, such as when you've done something truly offensive, or if you know you should change your ways to fit into a certain group.

What the question is really asking is this: "How can Christian men who normally find it difficult to receive honor and respect in this world receive the same from other Christian Men, or possibly from anyone during their time living in this world?" The answer lies in how Christian men choose to treat each other. We have the choice to respect or disrespect whom we please and for whatever reasons we choose.

So perhaps the question boils down to this: "What does a man have to do or be, to be worthy of MY respect?" And… "Does my yardstick for respect correspond to my Christian beliefs?"

Hint: The answer is in Ephesians 5:21 and Matthew 7:2. IOW, we should show respect to any man we would consider a brother in Christ. He may not have rightfully earned it (according to your own measure), but giving it anyway would foster his faith and further the grace of God in one's community.

Conclusions

Respect is an integral part of male comradery. Giving respect begins with each individual man and how he gets along with other men. A man can and should demand respect, but he should be diligent in showing it too. Furthermore, we should honor and respect older men as a regular habit (Leviticus 19:32), encourage other men (Colossians 4:6), teach and mentor younger men (Titus 2:6-8), and keep our values untainted by worldly influences (James 1:27), all of which have been repeated here many times before.

If respect is not forthcoming from a particular social group after you've given diligent effort, then one might consider shaking the dust off one's shoes and searching for greener pastures.

This post and the last should help us understand why things are the way they are. It may be difficult to change the scenery on the ground, but it's not impossible.

Stage in the Sky Creations (Rock Kitaro): Redemption and the Christian Red Pill (2022-9-26)

Summary

Overall, most of the topics discussed this month have been about circumstances or issues that prevent men from finding redemption, and/or problems to be overcome in the process. A few have discussed confession, repentance, forgiveness, and faith.

To sum up all the posts and discussions, the most noteworthy current issues that prevent men from finding redemption include…

1. A lack of faith / Purpose / vision.
2. Anger, Bitterness, Despair, Envy, Jealousy.
3. Failure to exercise Headship within marriage.
4. Spiritual Abuse / Witchcraft within the church.
5. Christian Masculinity is a lost art and discipline.
6. Failure to discover, develop, and/or defend one's personal Domain.
7. A lack of cohesion, mutual support, and Unity within the Body of Christ and within marriage.
8. Misplaced priorities / A preoccupation with walking in the flesh / Choosing the things of this world over the eternal.
9. The converged church / Churchianity is a red herring distraction from Zoe (life in the Spirit) and redemption, if not worse.
10. Failure to observe Biblical / Covenant boundaries, which leaves one open to defilement, demonic attack, injustice, and loss.
11. Indecision and inaction concerning one's purpose and place. This includes a failure to choose an appropriate setting / social group in which one can develop one's self-identity as a Christian man.
12. Wallowing in the Black Pill — a comfort zone of bitterness, self-rejection, and a lack of faith. (Taking the Black Pill may be unavoidable for many men, but the key for pulling through it is to turn from the bitterness and despondency, find faith, develop a new identity in Christ, and pursue a renewed purpose.)
13. The lack of Honor and Respect being shown to Christian Men for their accomplishments in the spirit (e.g. spiritual discernment, discipline, maturity, etc.) and in the flesh (e.g. competition, developing valuable skills, physical fitness, reputation, status, etc.).
14. Failure to pursue a path towards Respect (as described in the last two posts). The paths to Respect that were identified include: (1) Developing Strength within one's Domain of influence (e.g. Headship), (2) Pursuing a

Calling / Purpose leading to the development of skills that are expressed through service, (3) Finding Honor / Reputation / Status through competition, courage, heroism, etc. (If possible, pursuing more than one path is better.)

15. In sociality, the propensity for Christians to value, prioritize, honor, and glorify that which the world sets forth as beautiful, honorable, and valuable (e.g. Convenience, Gnostic notions, material wealth and the pride of life, the obsession with libido, Sex and sex appeal, top SMV Chads / immoral men, etc.). On the other side of this counterfeit coin is the general hesitancy of Christians to accept those who are weaker in faith or who are not exceptional by the world's standards.
16. Added: The Quiet Desperation of the Autopilot (2022-10-1) Man's propensity to wait in expectation, but never taking the action to work out the issues necessary to make their desires and hopes into reality.

Autopilot — The Faux-Faith Default Setting

The Summary of Red Pill Redemption (2022-9-30) offered a list of the most noteworthy current issues that prevent men from finding redemption. (I had intended to organize this list into categories to see if anything more could be gleaned from it, but I haven't had the time.)

Among these roadblocks are two of note…

11. Indecision and inaction concerning one's purpose and place.

14. Failure to pursue a path towards Respect (as described in the last two posts). The paths to Respect that were identified include: (1) Developing Strength within one's Domain of influence (e.g. Headship), (2) Pursuing a Calling / Purpose leading to the development of skills that are expressed through service, (3) Finding Honor / Reputation / Status through competition, courage, heroism, etc. (If possible, pursuing more than one path is better.)

There is another barricade related to these two obstructions that I need to mention, and this is to be added to the list.

In the comments, Bardelys the Magnificent wrote [emphasis mine],

> "I also realized yesterday that I've never purposely pursued paths that lead to honor or respect. I just expected to do and it would happen."

In the past, I've called this type of blind faith "running on autopilot". The American philosopher Henry David Thoreau described this by saying, "The mass of men live lives of quiet desperation." It is based on one being psychologically "transported" into an alternate fantasy world of one's imagination, largely fueled by the dissonances between an unspecified desire and the drabness of daily reality. It contains a suspension of disbelief that is never explored nor tested for its truth content. It is the vanity of the mind that St. Paul describes as characteristic of unbelievers and urges us to abandon (Romans 12:2; Ephesians 4:17).

Asleep at the wheel… If he's not driving, then who is?
Most men are this way until something happens that shakes them out of their delusion and makes them realize that it is not enough. The fortunate men are those who get this realization early in life.

A man must employ the will in order to enact his faith, and he must make a series of decisions to work that faith into reality. Otherwise, his beliefs remain untested and his life remains unchanged.

Faith in Action in one area, Autopilot in another…

It is also possible to employ faith in some areas of one's life, but not others.

I see this looking back at my own life. Here's my own story about this.

When I was working as a welder in a Honda plant at the age of 22, I had this realization that, "I'm doing alright, making decent money… I like what I'm doing here… but I am capable of more. I can't see myself working in a factory my whole life. God has something more for me in life. I'm a smart guy. I need to get an education for me to reach my potential." I had no idea what that potential was at that time, but this vision led me to pull out all the stops that were holding me back from earning a degree.

Getting my bachelor's was a tough haul that took 7 long years, but my Master's was a little easier and was finished in half that time.

After I finished my masters, I was working as a researcher for the Navy. During and after the 9/11 incident, I witnessed the sheer incompetency of the government firsthand. I had that same impression again: "I don't want to spend my whole life working with these gubmint goons, developing weapons and gunships, and having blood on my hands (figuratively by association). God has something more for me in life." Again, at the time I had no idea what that "more" was.

A couple years later I moved to Taiwan and I found a new life. Then my Ph.D. came along rather serendipitously. Now, I'm quite satisfied with my career as a professor.

Concerning what I've done in the area of intersexual relationships, however, I was more like what Bardelys said. When I was younger, I just expected that I would meet someone "special", fall in love, get married, and have a beautiful family. But of course, it never happened that way. It was as someone else here once commented, "Blue Pilled men get whatever they get, and don't know how or why they got what they got." Experiencing divorce wasn't enough to wake me up. I had to get Red Pilled before I had that moment of realization, and by that time, I was already 45 years old and a year into my second marriage.

Conclusions

When comparing these two areas of my life, I can see how I employed faith in some areas of my life, but not others.

I had a vision for developing my career. Even though I had no idea what I was doing nor where I would end up, I kept busy at it. I accepted various challenges and rolled with the disappointments until I found contentment and fulfillment.

I had a vision for marriage too, but I didn't do the work of making it a reality. I held back, thinking I needed to remain pure. I was waiting for a Miss Right straight out of fantasyland, and I passed over a lot of women who may very well have made a decent enough wife and mother. A lot of these women passed over me for various reasons as well. I didn't settle into the task of working out my beliefs until after I had married much later in life, and I didn't get an accurate concept of reality until I came across the Red Pill much later than that.

The impact this has had on my life is clearly evident.

The Value of Feminine Humility

Feminine Humility

Farm Boy posed a good question over at Spawny's Space: What does it buy? (2021/7/28).

> "What does what buy? Humility that is. Why is it that the fellas around these parts put a premium on it?
> It is rather simple I think. A humble wife appreciates what she has as well as her husband. From this, working as a team can actually be effective. Does anything more need to be said?"

A humble wife as described here would also have aspects of contentment and submission. She is refreshingly pleasant and surprisingly easy to get along with. A woman like this is truly more precious and rare than rubies.

So what does a wife like this get in return for her humility?

A woman like this has the best chance at getting a husband that would do everything in his power to give her everything she wants and anything he thinks she might want.

This is what humility can buy, should a woman be wise enough to recognize it's value.

The Absence of Feminine Humility

Most women seem to be unaware of a man's depth of devotion and purpose when it comes to caring for women in general, but especially for his own wife. Women have a peculiar and self-defeating way of disregarding these altruistic behaviors arising from the better nature of men if they are not shown in very specific ways, by very specific men.

Another way to look at this is to observe the opposite kind of wife, who is unable or unwilling to take her spot in the marriage authority hierarchy. This is a wife who is not content, humble, and submissive. Instead, she is a contentious wife who ignorantly and unknowingly creates a competition in her marriage.

How so?

Most women seem to be unaware of a man's competitive nature, and how a challenge brings this trait to the fore. When a wife foolishly puts herself in a competition with her husband, then she makes a competitor out of her husband, which means he'll try to defeat her. When this happens, the husband loses his natural inclination to help, support and uplift his wife. Instead, he sees her as the competition, because that is what she is, and the natural instinct in him to defeat opposing forces and to establish order comes out.

Men are not hard wired to discriminate between the source or the purpose of competition. Thus, when women become contentious, they are basically instigating a competition with a man — a very unwise move on her part.

By doing so, she removes peace from the home so that instead of the home being a place of rest for the family and husband it becomes yet another place in the world where he has to fight to win battles. Over time, the constant competition weighs on him, and he seeks the peace and rest which should be offered within the home and marriage. This means he must take time away from his wife.

His absence is taken by the wife as an affront, as it detracts from the amount of time and attention she receives from her husband. The wife will complain about her absent husband in various ways. She will become ever more contentious in a vain effort to secure the love and attention from her husband that she wants and needs, and he responds by spending more time away from her. The relationship thus goes into a spiraling nose dive.

After the relationship is completely ruined beyond recovery, she will think about the life and home she once dreamed about, not realizing that it was right in front of her all along. But instead of building it up with feminine humility, she tore it down with her own hands.

> But the foolish tears it down with her own hands.”
> Proverbs 14:1 (NASB)

Nita Marie's threesome with her second husband and God

Introducing Nita Marie

Here's a woman who says she has threesomes with God and her husband!

This Morning: 'My Husband and I Have Threesomes with God' (2021-10-11) Length: 8:29

Notes from the Interview

At 1:20, her eyes dart to the right just at the moment she says the word "He" (referring to Jesus). Hard to know what this microexpression indicates. Breaking eye contact could be an indicator of deep humility, reverence, or it could indicate lying or shame.

3:10-15 Her face lights up when the interviewer says, "You are feeling great about yourself posting some fairly raunchy pictures…"

From 3:30 to 4:30, she gives a little talk about what God told her in her prayers. She says,

> "…the answer that continued to come to me was actually two answers. The first answer was he wanted me to celebrate my body and love my body and to love my sexuality because it's something natural that a lot of women don't feel good in. They don't feel good in their sexuality. They don't feel good in their body. And so it was very clear He wanted me to celebrate that. And then the other thing that He said was that "there are some people that will never know about Me", meaning Him, God, unless I do this. So I do feel like there are a lot of women in the community… um… of adult modeling, that have been shunned from church, have been shunned from… uh… their communities… and so for me, I want to be a positive person in their life as well as for my fans… um… There's a lot of men that might subscribe to my page that are lonely and just need someone to talk to…"

From 4:50 to 5:20, she says,

> "Well, I think there's a difference between having a relationship with Jesus and being in a religion. For me, I've just always looked at what Jesus did, and Jesus was all about love, and he was all about forgiveness, and he was all about grace, and he was all about… Most of his time he spent with sinners, you know, with prostitutes, with thieves, with people that were cast out of the community. And so I choose to focus more on what Jesus would do instead of what religion tells me to do."

Her first sentence (in bold) is an important truth that many religious folks seem to miss. The rest (IMO) is pat blither blather about cheap love.

Maybelline is amazing!

5:24 Her face lights up when the interviewer says, "You're now in a relationship with somebody else, a much more sexually active relationship…" Her face brightens again when the interviewer says, "…God plays a part within your love life…" She responds with a triumphant, "Yass!"

From 5:37 to 6:50, she explains what she means by having a threesome with God. The male interviewer is totally perplexed. The female interviewer looks entirely removed, but it's possible that she could be in deep contemplation.

Nita Marie: "Yass! So, I know this is a funny word when you say "have a threesome with God", but it's really just inviting God into the bedroom; and so, because of my [previous] asexual relationship, I made a commitment that the next relationship I was going to be in, I was going to make sure that God was going to be in our sex life, because… um… I knew that if I had God's blessing in all areas of my life, it would be even better. And so I just decided to invite Him to be a part of everything, including my sex life."

Male Interviewer: "So how do you know He's there?"

Nita Marie: "Well, it's just like anything else. You can invite God to be part of anything in your life, and so… um… for me, it's just an emotional connection, and I'm much more open because I am remarried; so I do have a husband now; so I am much more open to my husband when God is there."

Male Interviewer: "Does your husband know that God is there, when God is there?"

Nita Marie: "Not all the time, but I do, you know, pray that God is with us every night in our… in the bedroom with us… um… and so he feels Him too, even though he doesn't necessarily pray with me to have God there. Um… He feels him too."

Female Interviewer: "And you've said that by having God there, this is the best sex you've ever had in your life…???"

When Nita Marie replies affirmatively, a gleeful smile breaks across the female interviewer's face. It's hard to know exactly what happened in the female interviewer in that moment. Maybe she was glad to know that sex and sanctification are concomitant. Or she may have reached the limits of her own credible belief. Or maybe she identified something in her own experience. Could it be that maybe she realized faith?

There's no greater pimp than God Himself!

Assessments and Incentives

There are a couple questions that come up concerning Nita Marie's story.

1. What makes her think she is having threesomes with God?
2. Why is she posting her sex life on OnlyFans and talking openly about having threesomes with God?

If I were to guess the answer to (1), and assuming she is sincere, I would say she's experiencing the open hearted humility, passion, and feelings of love that God intended people to experience through sex. Yes, humility truly imparts life to the humble!

Concerning question (2), we could take her explanations at face value, but if we dig further into this, we may find that there are a large number of incentives that could be driving her to publicly display her sex life on OnlyFans.

- It's unlikely that hypergamy is a factor here, since she is apparently happily married, or so she says.
- She could be doing this for the attention, fame, influence, and/or the money.
- Or maybe she sincerely believes taking her sex life public in this way is what God wants her to do!

It would be easier to get on board with her viewpoint if her husband stood alongside her saying the same things. But we don't hear any statements from her husband, and I cannot find any information about him whatsoever online, so that leaves her testimony in a rather vacuous context. We can only assume that his silence implies he's happy with the extra 1.8 million she's bringing in.

Be careful what you ask for...

In yesterday's post, The Value of Feminine Humility, Red Pill Apostle cited Farm Boy asking,

> "Why is it that the fellas around these parts put a premium on [humility]?"

RPA pointed out the obvious — a humble woman is contented, pleasant, submissive, and easy to get along with. It stands to reason that many men could easily believe that feminine humility would be somewhat of a cure all for many modern woes.

Well, the reason I wanted to include Nita Marie's story in this month's theme is because she's got humility and submission down pat!

I know this idea will immediately strike the reader as being amusingly incongruent with any OnlyFans star, but consider the following…

- Her willingness to be joyfully submissive to God's will about embracing her sexuality (whether or not you agree with how she does that or whether it is genuine or not).
- Her willing enthusiasm about having regular sex within marriage is unique and remarkable.
- If you can believe she's truly a married woman who is regularly engaging in sexual relations with her husband, then she's apparently having a very regular and fulfilling marital relationship — and she openly gives God credit for this.
- Considering how she talks about God being involved in her sex life, I doubt that her husband is complaining about their sex life. At worst, he might be embarassed when she talks about it.
- OTOH, if you believe Nita Marie is shooting the bull about God and being a Christian, and is jiggling her glands for the money and/or to wag her Triple D tower power on OnlyFans, that still requires quite a bit of humility. She's willingly submitting her fleshly nature to the lusty, cash generating eyes of her 900,000+ followers by effortlessly doing what women do best — and with a warm gentle smile on her lovely cake face.
- Even if she's not truly as humble and submissive in spirit as she appears to be, she clearly recognizes the > charitable soft power of female humility and submission and uses this to her advantage, unlike most women, including Christian wives!

So she's humble and submissive any way you look at it, by spirit, by nature, by personality, or through well honed habit (c.f. Romans 6:16).

Christian men say they want a submissive woman… Well, Nita Marie is a great example!

I can imagine that there are some sex starved Christian men or husbands out there who, upon hearing Nita Marie's story, lovelornly respond by praying inwardly, "LorDDD Jesus! Let my wife be as humble and submissive as Nita Marie!!!"

Conclusions

Overall, I think Nita Marie's testimony has some powerful points, both positive and negative.

The Good

The possible good effect is that it cuts against the common notion in churchianity that sex is dirty or that sexuality is shameful, or that knowing God and having a lively sex life are diametrically opposed to each other. This is more or less her stated purpose.

The Bad

Doing nude / sex shows on OnlyFans while professing to be a Christian denigrates the moral repute of Christianity and contributes to the impression that Christian women are 304s.

Comprehensively, Nita Marie's life and testimony justifies divorce and remarriage and encourages women to do the same. She never offers any details about why her first marriage was sexless for seven years. Her personality comes across as very happy and pleasant, and she doesn't seem like someone who would use sex to control the marriage, but I'm guessing this might be a faux public image. I might guess she could have gained massive amounts of weight to the point that her husband lost interest. It's also likely that maybe she was never sexually attracted to her husband in the first place.

The Ugly

The very idea of having a threesome with God is immediately shocking to traditional Christian sensibilities, and borders on blasphemy.

But the question remains: Is it truly the hamsterbated vainglorious blasphemy of an adulterous* woman? Or is it a miraculous second landing marital sanctification that begs the unfathomable grace of God? Concerning her claims about "God being in the bedroom", could it really be that Nita Marie is experiencing sex the way God intended it and is called by God to encourage other women to discover the same?

 Nita Marie is technically an adulteress since she divorced and remarried while her first husband is still living — if she is actually remarried, that is.*

The Glory of Submission and Humility in Helping

I received an email from a female reader in response to Red Pill Apostle's post, The Value of Feminine Humility (2022-10-4). She points out that a truly submissive wife is not motivated to be that way because of all the benefits that RPA wrote about, but rather because she identifies as the wife of a husband with a mission and she recognizes that her best service to God is in helping her husband.

RPA wrote,

> "A woman [who is humble and submissive] has the best chance at getting a husband that would do everything in his power to give her everything she wants and anything he thinks she might want."

She responds,

> "While I agree this may be the RESULT, as a Christian wife that should not be my INTENTION.
> Christian wives are called to be "helpmates" to their husbands. By being his encourager, respecting him, submitting to him, supporting him and being loyal… that is my DUTY as his wife."
> "1 Timothy 6:6 says, "Godliness with contentment is great gain." How my husband responds is not the point. Whether my husband responds by giving me what I want is irrelevant. If I am not his "helpmate", then I have failed in my DUTY and I am answerable to God for it."
> "Though I agree with you that usually the results are quite positive."

She goes on to explain that the real benefit of feminine humility is not the charitability of her husband (although that is a nice bonus), but the glorious shalom of being a Godly woman. She cites this passage…

> …rather let it be the hidden person of the heart, with the incorruptible beauty of a gentle and quiet spirit, which is very precious in the sight of God.
> 1 Peter 3:4 (NKJV)

…and adds,

> "The value of feminine humility is that it is, in the sight of God, a great and precious trait for a woman to have. And for a Christian woman, finding favor in God's eyes is a supremely satisfying JOY."
> "The question is, do I want to please God? If yes, I please Him by following His Will and design for marriage. And for a Christian wife, that means I am to be my husband's helper. Anything that takes me away from 'helping' my husband — criticism, discontent, disrespect — these are all SIN. Sin has to be acknowledged, confessed and turned away from."

If I'm reading her right, she's saying that humility and submission to her husband gives her a sublime sense of self-esteem and self-worth that remains undisturbed by anything of this world. If there is any perceived lack of care or generosity from hubby, then this doesn't detract from her joy.

Tying back to RPA's essay, the valuable takeaway here is that a joyful woman will naturally receive much better treatment from her husband and others as well.

In the final, this is exactly what Christian husbands want from a wife — a peaceful spirit, gratitude, joy, thankfulness, and making a willing effort to fit in to the larger scheme of things without making waves. Her humility and submission are the keys for her to get in this door. This is not required by husbands (as it is often purported), but by God Himself. Men simply recognize that these traits are important for a woman to have.

16 Permutations of Submission

A wife's relationship with God and her sexual performance with her husband are two entirely different things.

Christian wife, bad sex?

Women who offer heart-exploding sex are not necessarily submissive, but are often the opposite. Conversely, a submissive wife can be a starfish in the bedchamber.
Under Red Pill Redemption (2022-9-5), Info wrote,

> "It may be that some Christian Men cannot avoid [marrying] an attractive woman with a body count. Only that he must count on her genuine faith and salvation."

Not so fast. Yes, we'd like to assume that if a person is mature in faith, then they'll automatically be better Christians, better wives, better husbands, better mothers, better fathers, better friends, better lovers, offer better sex, and make greater life achievements.

But let's get real. People are much more complicated than this, and faith is not always pretty, especially when newly discovered.

We might think that a woman's general attitude and her submissiveness towards authority (i.e. her husband) are the qualities that make her pleasant and easy to live with, and also the most important qualities contributing to Headship. This is true, however, the previous post, Nita Marie's threesome with her second husband and God (2022-10-5), made it clear that a woman can be rather submissive (by different estimations), but still be unsuitable to wife up for an array of other reasons.

The 16 Permutations

A woman's attitude towards different forms of Authority (church leadership, family, government, laws, peer group, etc.), her submission to God, and her emotional / sexual submission to a particular man are separate issues. Likewise, her faith and body count are two different issues, so let's sort this out.

By greatly simplifying things according to (1) her relationship to God, (2) her relationship to a man (i.e. her husband / you), (3) her past sexual history (as an indicator of her habits and character), and (4) her present sexual performance (as an indicator of her humility and marital submission), we have the following permutations.

1. Believing wife, faithfully devoted to the man/marriage, low body count, great sex life.
2. Believing wife, faithfully devoted to the man/marriage, low body count, terrible sex life.
3. Believing wife, faithfully devoted to the man/marriage, high body count, great sex life.
4. Believing wife, faithfully devoted to the man/marriage, high body count, terrible sex life.
5. Believing wife, apathetic to the man/marriage, low body count, great sex life.
6. Believing wife, apathetic to the man/marriage, low body count, terrible sex life.
7. Believing wife, apathetic to the man/marriage, high body count, great sex life.
8. Believing wife, apathetic to the man/marriage, high body count, terrible sex life.
9. Unbelieving wife, faithfully devoted to the man/marriage, low body count, great sex life.
10. Unbelieving wife, faithfully devoted to the man/marriage, low body count, terrible sex life.
11. Unbelieving wife, faithfully devoted to the man/marriage, high body count, great sex life.
12. Unbelieving wife, faithfully devoted to the man/marriage, high body count, terrible sex life.
13. Unbelieving wife, apathetic to the man/marriage, low body count, great sex life.
14. Unbelieving wife, apathetic to the man/marriage, low body count, terrible sex life.
15. Unbelieving wife, apathetic to the man/marriage, high body count, great sex life.
16. Unbelieving wife, apathetic to the man/marriage, high body count, terrible sex life.

We could make a similar list for wives sizing up their husbands by substituting "achievement" for "body count", and "charisma, confidence, LAMPS, masculinity, etc." for "sex life".

We could make another similar list for wives' performance as mothers.

And another for husband's performance as fathers.

Again, all of these are separate but interrelated issues.

Conclusions

All the talk about having a good marriage, a unicorn wife, etc. focuses on situation (1). But, according to the raw statistical probability, a woman has a 1 in 16, or 6.25% chance of being (1). Clinical data shows this number to be slightly lower, e.g. 4% of women are virgins when they marry.

If we are to tack on any number of other qualifiers common to vetting, e.g. being a good mother, BMI / weight, height, intelligence, long hair, no debt, no tattoos, a specific race, a specific Christian denomination, a specific socio-economic status, etc., then the probability quickly shoots into the 1 in 10,000 range or higher! At this point, the "ideal wife" is basically a fantasy for most men.

The reality is that men will wind down with a wife having any assortment of these 16 permutations, even with diligent vetting. If we assume that "church going" is not necessarily truly "believing", then I think I've seen testimonies around the Manosphere that fit all these possibilities.

The important takeaway here is for men in relationships to identify which situation they are in, and determine how to best go about filling in the missing pieces, if possible.

All of this is evidence that we live in a broken world, but I'm guessing that by God's grace, men in most of these situations can find marital sanctification, although some will have it much more difficult than others. However, in this day and age, marriages that don't find a state of sanctification quickly tend to quickly end in divorce.

What makes a woman sexy? Is it incompatible with faith and humility?

How Do You Perceive Women?

Last week, we discussed a few discordant concepts of humility, submissiveness, and attractiveness. Humility and submissiveness are an exceedingly rare combination of traits in a woman, and it is practically extinct among Western women, including Christians.

IMHO, we (including myself) have a poor appreciation for the distinctions between these characteristics, how it plays out in woman's behaviors, and what it looks like IRL.

Men need to be aware of how they perceive different types of women and the effect these women have on themselves. Ask yourself, what do you see in women, and what kind of woman are you attracted to?

Here are a couple posts to help walk you through a self-analysis.

- Σ Frame: Sex Appeal is not strongly correlated with Beauty (2021/4/30)
- Σ Frame: Sexy (2022/10/10)

The remainder of this post is intended to help the reader walk through his own concept of sexiness.

Defining Sexy

We have a particular word that we use to describe those women who are extremely alluring to men — sexy. The dictionary defines sexy as "sexually interesting or exciting; radiating sexuality". In Sexy (2012/2/8), Rollo Tomassi says, "Sexy isn't always s1utty, but s1utty is always sexy" and that modern female seduction amounts to "show up naked, bring beer." However, these concepts of sexiness are based on subjective impressions and fail to account for the personal and spiritual elements that comprise the fundamental core essence of sexiness. So let's take a closer look at the defining traits of sexiness to see whether any of them might have any damning or redeeming qualities.

Check yourself: Do you see sexy, or do you see bimbo?

Secular culture supports the idea that sexy is defined by a particular combination of traits. For example, Glamour had an article entitled, A New Study Redefines What's Sexy — and Courage Really Matters (2015/1/27). The author reports a study from Jeetendr Sehdev, a branding expert and professor at USC, who questioned 10,000 men and women around the world about what makes someone sexy. The results varied by region, but overall, vulnerability was found to be the number one characteristic of sexiness. Also appearing on the list were (2) courage, (5) honesty, (7) spontaneity, (8) spirituality, and (9) passion.

The emphasis on vulnerability could be interpreted as the outward display of feminine submissiveness. The others could be summarized as a combination of trust and humility, which are the key ingredients of falling in love. Overall, the defining traits of sexiness could be roughly summed up as humble, submissive, and sultry*, but the most inherent quality of sexiness is how the total presentation appeals to male desire. In sum, it makes sense that feminine sexiness would inspire masculine desire, love, and passion.

Breaking this down reveals why, as Rollo said, "Sexy isn't always s1utty". For example, women like the 304s in Rock's video are indeed alluring and sultry,* but they are sorely lacking in humility and grace. The reason why "s1utty is always sexy" is because personal attributes of humility and grace are demoted in favor of maximizing the primal appeal to male lust.

Sexiness (without s1uttiness) is extremely rare and difficult to pull off if it is not inherent to a woman's natural personality. Very few women are truly sexy and those who are sexy are man magnets whether they want to be or not.

 Sultry: Capable of arousing passion.*

Sexiness is in the Eye of the Beholder

Check yourself: Do you see sexy, or do you see an arrogant, immature, indignant, selfish tease who relishes every man's lusty gaze?

Looking closely at individual women, each one whom we would consider sexy has a unique combination of certain traits among those mentioned in the last section, presumably a set of traits that fits her individual personality. The exact combination of traits may vary from one individual woman to another, but nevertheless, those women who possess a particular combination that "works" will find it astonishingly easy to be sensationally popular among men, and therefore have the most potential to become sex symbols, even among conservative audiences. Thus, it is not surprising to see many such women (like Abigail Shapiro, Delphine, Nita Marie, et al.) become actresses, celebrities, OnlyFans stars, well-known personalities, YouTube creators, and so on.

As stated above, the most inherent quality of sexiness is how the total presentation appeals to male interest. These specific traits are different from man to man, and so different men will find different women to be sexy. Thus, just as it is with beauty, attraction and sexiness is in the eye of the beholder. Upon self-examination, men may find that only certain combinations of specific traits in a woman can strike the chords of inspiration enough for the woman in question to make the cut to be considered sexy.

Christian men have it much more difficult in sorting out sexy in this regard, simply because some traits are conducive to marriage and family formation, while others don't. I mean, what are the chances of finding a sexy woman who is also a humble faithful Christian? An appreciation of the rarity of such a woman helps us understand the popularity of women like Nita Marie. In her case, even if she is a fake or deceived Christian, nevertheless, she can still play on Christian men's deep rooted fantasies of having a humble and sexy Christian gal!

Check yourself: Do you see sexy, or do you see a (potential) sister in Christ?

Leaving aside the evo-psyche-based hallmarks of physical beauty for a moment, the important thing for a marriage minded man to do is to consider his tastes, and make some effort to be aware of which traits he finds attractive, and then review each of these traits in terms of why he finds those traits to be attractive. IOW, do a little bit of soul searching. Then he needs to pick out those traits that are most conducive to his own personality and purpose, and what would actually bring sanctification into a potential relationship. He also needs to reassess himself in terms of why he is attracted to those traits that are NOT conducive. Finally, he needs to correct his vision in how he perceives and sizes up women, so that what he "sees" lines up with what he actually believes, wants, and needs. A man might be surprised at how his tastes may change as a result of these conclusions, and how some women he overlooked before might pop up on his radar. The result would allow him to be a better picker / vetter.

What I've described here is essentially a repentance from The Quiet Desperation of the Autopilot; one that frees himself from the curse of lusting after Bimbofication.

A man who can effectively weed out the desires of his flesh from his convictions and the call of the Spirit will no longer be frustrated with the unsolvable dilemma of finding a salacious, sensual, sexy, sultry woman who is also a humble, faithful, submissive, Christian, virgin unicorn. He will be able to recognize this expectation as vain and oxymoronic, and will not waste time on women who will only waste his time. He will be able to recognize that a woman with traits A, B, and C, won't necessarily give him a Christian marriage characterized by Headship (however good those traits might be), whereas a woman with traits X, Y, and Z very well could. Again, the particular combination of traits may be different from man to woman. It is the gestalt of the union that really counts towards Headship.

Check yourself: Do you see sexy, or do you see freedom in Christ?

Conclusions

Men are often ridiculed for having a double standard for women. That is, men want a woman who is seductive, sensual, sultry, and is also somehow chaste, faithful, humble, pure, and submissive. And then Christian men tack on the additional qualifier that she must also be a Christian woman who is Tingle crazy for him (i.e. Scott's Axiom).

But Christian men do not need to be so double minded. Based on the above, Christian men are faced with the choice of what set of character traits they consider to be attractive in a woman.

1. Will it be the meretricious, tantalizing, and voluptuous, but arrogant, foul mouthed, haughty naughty bimbo hoe who is wearing skin tight camel toe pants and who can and will suck and fvck on a dime like a pro (either real or virtual)?
2. Will it be Glamour / Sehdev's romantic notions of vulnerability, courage, honesty, passion… etc.?
3. Will it be the collection of traits described in 1 Peter 3:1-6: chaste, faithful, respectful, submissive, trusting, and having a kind, gentle, quiet spirit?

As long as we continue to indulge ourselves in the first view, we are inadvertently contributing to the larger Satanic operations of Submission / Virgin Shaming (described in the first section above).

The second view is no different from the wider secular culture.

The third view is a radical socio-psychological transformation requiring the renewal of the mind and thereby carries the hope of receiving God's grace, not only for one's self, but for one's progeny and community as well.

Ultimately, we will have to decide, and the sooner the better — exactly what is our concept of sexy*?*

Validation

Jack · 11 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

We've heard this word tossed around in the Manosphere, but what exactly does it mean?

Readership: All; Men;
Theme: Feminine Submission

Introduction

Rollo Tomassi made a major contribution to Red Pill lore with his distinction between Transactional vs. Validational Sex (2018-3-7) stemming from his original postulate, "you cannot negotiate genuine desire". Rollo went on to describe many of the problems and pitfalls surrounding Transactional Sex, but to my knowledge, he never explored Validational Sex beyond its evo-psyche association with hypergamy and hormonal estrus.

So here I'll examine a few case studies in which we'll see certain patterns surrounding the phenomenon of "validation".

Case Study 1 – Tobacco Juice leads to Love

Here's an old story from the post-WW2 era. This odd story always confused Blue Pilled me, but it makes perfect sense to my Red Pilled sensibilities.

A young woman bought a brand new pair of expensive white shoes that were in fashion. She wore them while she was out and about town with a female friend. As they passed a young man chewing tobacco, he abruptly turned his head to the side and carelessly spit right on her shoe, presumably by accident. She was very angry and demanded that he should pay for a new pair of shoes as a replacement.

Long story short, this interaction led to them getting married.

In a sense, this is a bizarre Meet Cute. Blue Pilled men will be confused and ask, "Why did she fall in love with a man who spit on her favorite shoes and ruined them?" Red Pilled men know "Chicks Dig Jerks." The deeper reason is because he carelessly defiled her and this aroused an emotional response, most notably her desire for an ego affirmation.

Case Study 2 – The Bored Hoe

Cameron232 came across this short Dear Abby message.* She calls herself a "ho" (!!!) and she even uses the term "validational sex"! (Evidence that the Red Pill is fully mainstream now!)

> Dear Abby,
> I'm a ho who's bored with my hubby. Can't make the switch from validational sex to love sex.
> Sincerely,
> Damaged Goods

Translation: "Bored" means her marriage isn't "validational", as Rollo would say. IOW, there's no Ego Affirmation in the act of sex.

Case Study 3 – The Dazed H0e

Slate: My Husband Thinks I Don't Have Sex With Him Because It's "Typical" for Married Couples (2022-5-18) (Archive)*

> "My husband and I have been married for seven years. We're in our 30s, with two small kids. Our relationship is in a good place. However, our sex life has been lukewarm for years, and despite some haphazard and short-lived efforts to either "talk about it" or even "spice it up" with toys or new positions, I know that my husband is unsatisfied insomuch as he makes frequent "jokes" about how my libido has significantly stagnated since the initial years of our relationship — lots of jokes about how we're such a "typical couple" in that our sex life has diminished in heat since we've been married, and so on.

She gets down to the nitty gritty in the following paragraph.

> "Well, I know why my libido has really waned. […] When we first started dating, I was in what I call my "sexual awakening" period — I began having sex at a relatively later age than most of my peers, so I racked up > a number of sexual partners in a short period of time."

Slore status confirmed!

Reading through this article gives insight as to exactly what "validation" entails. [Emphasis mine.]

> "And during this time, I came to associate sex almost exclusively with being desired and associating that with a kind of (ill-placed) validation and affirming of self-worth. Once I entered into my first real loving relationship with my now-husband, I didn't need the sex anymore to validate his interest in me or my worth as a sexual being. In effect, I never translated my association with sex as a form of validation to sex as an expression of love."
> ~ Dazed and Very Confused

The host is thoroughly confused and responds by glibly urging her to "have more fun" in her sex life, seemingly ignorant of the fact that Fun = Defilement.

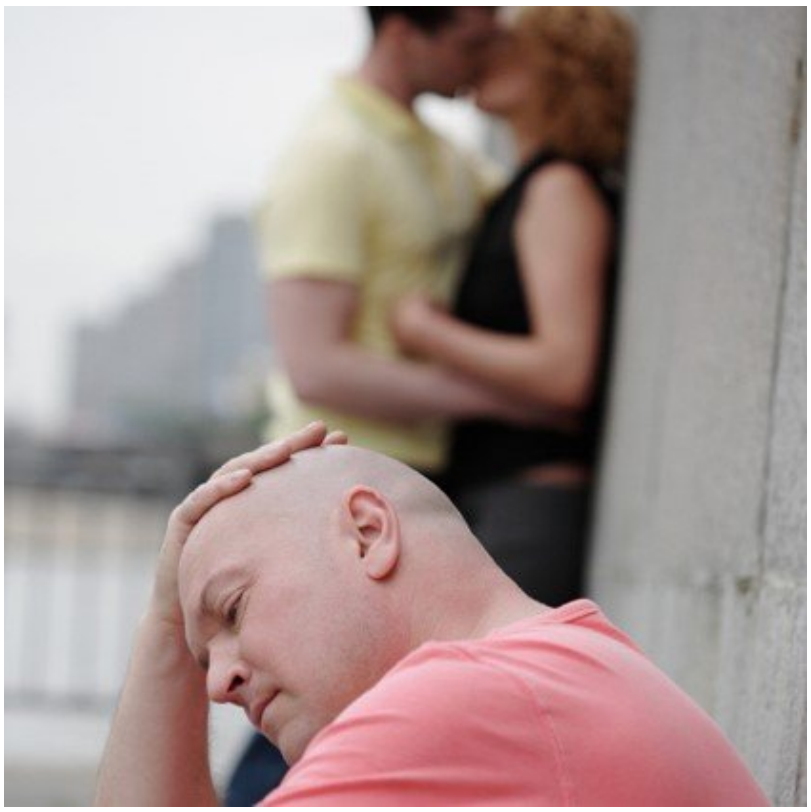
Some things we can get out of this…

- The phrase "my worth as a sexual being" is loaded with euphemistic meaning. Her self image is based on being a dominant man's sexual plaything and she has never developed any personal character aside from this identity.
- She has learned to depend on the libidinous male initiative to get the bed bouncing, which suggests that she never really explored her own desire and sexuality in the process. IOW, she learned to always be served, and never learned to serve.
- Old habits die hard, and this includes bedroom habits. The reality is that married sex is nowhere near as libidinally charged as hooking up after a long dry spell. So this leaves her high and dry (literally), especially after 7 years of marriage and a couple kids.

The thought would never occur to her that she could develop her self-image as a wife and mother, nor that she has her own libido that could be explored and put to good use. But the problem is that (1) these things come from her own initiative and (2) are not defiling enough to be fun. Alas, she can be defiled no worse, so there is no more ego-affirmation nor fun to be had; hence, the dazed dryness.

Note: There was a discussion about this same article at Patriactionary: Wife confesses in advice column to riding the c0ck carousel, hence why bored with sex with her hubby (2022-5-20)*

Case Study 4 – The Ambitious H0e



Here's the next correspondence to the "relationship expert" at Slate (same link, further down the page). This letter conveys the story of a wife who wants an open relationship. She writes,

> "Through many conversations, my boyfriend and I decided long ago that our sex drives and desire for multiple partners differ — I am the one with the extracurricular desires — and that it's OK by both of us for me to have sex with other people. However, though he denies it, I've noticed he seems to get a little jealous or uncomfortable if I reference other sex partners. I do believe him when he says this is not a big issue for him, but I think he chooses to process some of his understandable emotional reactions privately."

Hamsterbation! It is a very big issue for him, but he doesn't have the balls to tell her, "No, you're mine!" Probably because the sex is so thrilling and he's afraid of losing out on that. IOW, he's a slave to her V Power. His hesitancy to enforce a boundary actually increases her sense of insecurity and tips her desire to mess around. This is revealed when she says,

> "When this all first began, I had sex with maybe one other person every other month. It's now sometimes become once a week, depending how horny I am."

Here, it should be noted that Men crave sexual variety, but Women cannot have sex like Men. Women like this are not promiscuous for the variety. No. They crave the affirmation of being dominated and the "fun" soul-shock of being defiled again and again. If this is not done by the same man enforcing boundaries, then she will seek to have it done by a series of men. Whatever is necessary to humble her. This humility is what brings "validation".

As long as he stands by and lets her go on, she will get further into the habit of quickies with strangers – and this will continue until she becomes totally burned out and jaded, or else something happens that puts her in touch with reality (e.g. pregnancy, physical abuse, contracting an STD, etc.).

Fornication is a somewhat reliable source of humility, but it does not endure long and brings an array of negative consequences to the heart and soul.

Case Study 5 – The Revolving Door

Rob Says: She Doesn't Want You, She Wants To Know She Could Have You. (2022-10-10)

In this post, fellow blogger Rob relays some personal anecdotes about several women he had a fling with. He ended some of these relationships, and the woman ended some of them, but all the women he mentions popped back up in his life a few months after it ended. Looking back on these experiences, he observes,

> "The only time women have been quasi-serious about "getting me back," or "staying in my life," was when I ended it.
> Any time they ended it, whether they stayed in contact or not, they were not serious about "getting me back." They just wanted to know that they could."

Rob quotes Rian Stone to explain all this behavior:

> "She doesn't want you. She wants to know she could."

I'll go a little further to say that all these women already got the thrill of being humbled / defiled by him, but the ones that ended it got enough Ego Affirmation / Validation out of him to move on. The ones that he ended came back looking for an ego-affirmation that had been elusive or incomplete while they were together. They all toyed with him until they got it (women call this "closure"), and then they either casted him aside or else put him on the backburner as a backup orbiter, and then went off searching for another fresh sexperience of Defilement / Humility / Ego Affirmation.

Conclusions

> "She's not yours. It's just your turn."

Scott et al. have noted this behavior in wimmin before, comprehensively describing it as,

> "Women's preferred sexual strategy is serial monogamy."

The reason women have the propensity to become serial slores is because they're hungry for the validating humility of being dominated and defiled in an ego-affirming manner. Once the relationship has progressed to the stage in which no more Domination / Defilement / Humility / Ego Affirmation is forthcoming, they'll move on to the next man, looking for the same all over again.

To sum all this up in elegant form,

Validation = Domination + Defilement –> Humility + Ego Affirmation –> Feeelz of Self-Lurrrve

Put simply, in fellow blogger Jim's words,

> "You are mine!"

Put crassly, CH style,

> "The worse you treat her, the more she'll love you."

It all goes back to the point I made harder, that Wimmin always have sex on the brain. To be more specific, they crave the fun humility of defilement. They'll repeat this behavior because they don't know God's love and this Humility is the closest thing to love that they can find (short of repentance).

Ultimately, they're looking for sanctification (i.e. God and His love and grace), but they're going about it in the wrong way. The sad thing is, they will drift farther away from both God's love and the authentic love of a man the longer they continue in the idolatry of the feeelz.

Sexually Mismatched?

Under Roundup on Attraction and Marital Sanctification (2022-9-2), Joe2 writes,

> "Rowena's response is a one way street. She states, "After marriage, you have to learn what pleases your wife (how to arouse her)." That's fine, but shouldn't the man expect the woman to reciprocate?
> I found (from my experience) it's very likely that the woman will not reciprocate and has no interest in ensuring that I'm satisfied or even able to maintain my arousal so I can complete intercourse. It's all up to me to do that. So while she may offer her body, she has no interest in ensuring that I'll be successful."

Some women are not very aggressive in the bedroom. They won't initiate sexual activity and they're not proactive about dressing to entice, or giving handjobs, headjobs, and such. But this doesn't mean they're not sexually interested or sexually aroused. I'd describe their behavioral role as being passive and receptive, and their mindset as wanting to be a man's sexual plaything. They feel loved and get their kicks out of being the object of the man's desire, rather than by self-gratuitously dominating and f—king the həll out of the man. IOW, they are submissive in the bedroom.

Case Study — Jack and Jill

My wife is this way (the passive and receptive "Romantic Type", according to Jaiya's Blueprints given below) but she's still quite a fireball of passion. To give you an idea of how this works, our sexual routine goes something like this. I have to wait for the right timing (after dusk at the end of a nice day) and do quite a bit of work to get her in the mood (dominant, proactive frame game, talking casually about light topics, physical / sensual flirting, and foreplay). But once she's "there", she eagerly and frantically (and sometimes suddenly) mounts up and becomes a wild galloping cowgirl! All the sheets become entangled and the pillows thrown about, and the bed slowly inches across the room until it's banging against the opposite wall. After about an hour, she's sweaty, exhausted, and spent, so then she dismounts and says, "Your turn!" She rolls over with her butt up in the air and begs me for a hardcore doggy romping. When I want her to have another Big O explosion, all I have to do is bite her ear or place my hands around her neck. Another hour later after I've shot 2 or 3 loads, I'm exhausted, but she's still crying for more d!ck! And this lasts all night and through the next morning! After all this, we're satisfied for at least 2-3 days.

In sum, she's like a giant steam engine that takes a long while to warm up under specific conditions, but once she's up and running, she can move mountains (and furniture). She needs to be in a good mood. This is what warms her up. She wants to be desired and objectified until she loses control. This is what turns her on. Then she needs to be dominated and subjugated until she's quivering in humility. This is what gets her off. The setting, the mood, the order, and the timing is very important for making her proud heart pop open in a flood of jism.

It took me a while (2-3 years) to figure out how to pump her fountain of sexual desire enough for me to drink from it, but my ability to master her body makes me the central force figure of our sexual interaction. I'm the man who has mastered her complex sexual desire. This is what satisfies her, and it's also what sanctifies her. The result is that I truly "own" her heart and body. She doesn't want any other man, and we can both be confident of that.

Over time, she's become more willing to "try new things" when she's not in the mood, like impromptu quickies at random times and places, but it's hard for her to orgasm and feel satisfied with this. IOW, she does it just for me, simply because I am her "master" and "owner" and she is content to let me have my way with her.

Erotic Blueprints

There is a "sex therapist" by the name of Jaiya who came up with "5 Erotic Blueprints". It's worth checking out, so here's a video of her giving an overview.

As you can see from Jaiya and Ian's interaction in the video, opposites attract in certain regards. Jaiya is a very sexually aggressive woman. So she naturally "fits" with the man (Ian) who is more fluid, passive, and "sensitive".

If you are more of a sexually introverted man, then a sexually aggressive woman will bring out your softer emotional passivity. But if you are a more dominant man, then a passive type woman will be drawn to you and want to be your sexual plaything. Two very sexually aggressive people will awkwardly lock horns, and two passive types will never get it done. Comprehensively, what we can learn from Jaiya is that an inability or unwillingness to make mutual adjustments to the other's natural erotic blueprint can be frustrating.

A lot of men imagine that they want a woman who is perpetually aroused and erotically simple. That is to say, she initiates lovemaking, so all he has to do is sit back and let her work on the rod for a while, give her a f—k, and she comes on the spot. She feels loved and is humbly grateful to have had a good d!ck. This does happen in the happiest of relationships, but as Jayna's analysis elucidates, most women are not that simple, and when you think about it, having this expectation is rather naïve, myopic, and self-centered. OTOH, I think most women are not as sexually complex as my wife. The truth is, every woman is different. If you get used to one woman's style, it can be dissatisfying or disappointing to try to get used to another woman's style.

This can be a source of sexual frustration and grave disappointment, or even a turn-off, if the man or woman has had a previous sexual relationship with a lover having a drastically different erotic blueprint from the current partner. Sexperienced Men tend to get stuck on the more sexually aggressive women and then they get frustrated and impatient with a passive woman because they never learned how to work on dominating a woman in the bedroom. They think the juice isn't worth the squeeze. Viewing p0rn can also train a man's sexpectations to prefer a more aggressive woman, because the most memorable p0rn starlets are the sexually aggressive types.

How does this relate to Sanctification?

Women sometimes complain about how men want to marry a woman who is very sexually conservative, but then want her to be a p0rn star in the bedroom. Women who say things to this effect already know what their erotic blueprint is, and they are pointing out that it is unrealistic or unreasonable for men to expect them to change from one blueprint to another at the flip of a switch (upon marriage). But the truth is that Men want a woman with no past experience (a virgin) who they can open up for the first time and teach her how to be a sexual animal for his horny house pet, and thereby sanctify her unto himself.

What women don't understand (or don't want to accept) is that their youthful virgin body is the most outstanding gift they could possibly give to their husband (and to God). What men don't understand is that there is more to sanctification than merely having a submissive young virgin wife. You have to master her body and her heart's desire and make her your own.

The Raging Rivulet

In response to Rowena Breaks down Female Attraction (2022-8-31), RedPillBoomer wrote,

> "Interesting! One thing I wondered in reading this, and it is probably beyond the scope of this blog post…"

It is an important question for us to consider, so here's a post dedicated to this topic.

> "…how much of [female sexual attraction] was "wired" in by God in his design of males and females, and how much of it is a result of the fall?"

Judging by my own experience, and confirmed by Rowena's account, women are "wired" to be incredibly horny creatures who are constantly craving to strip, shinny, shuck, and shiver, even when they don't have sex on the brain. This is self-evident in the following examples.

1. Young girls are always trying to out-compete each other as to who can dress the most provocatively without being called out for it.
2. Women expect sex within the first few dates, or else they'll kick the man to the curb.
3. Whenever a woman gets drunk, her prefrontal cortex shuts down leaving her deeper nature uninhibited. Then she'll latch on to whichever guy in her vicinity most tickles her fancy pants, and escalate the physical intimacy to the randysack. (This fully explains the enduring popularity of alcohol for millenia.)
4. Early in my marriage, I told my wife, "No clothes while we're at home alone, and definitely never any clothes in bed." At first, she thought this "rule" was awkward and she felt a little ashamed. But after a few months of gentle reinforcement, she was eagerly stripping down as soon as she came in the door, and chiding me for not doing the same within 10 minutes after her.

In fact, if you look at most of women's behavior (as revealed by the RP), you'll see that women's lives and psychology totally revolve around their own sexual nature, (e.g. hypergamy, branch swinging, AF/BB, etc.) Their secondary priority is how to pursue their Sexual Imperatives without incurring the worst short-term consequences (e.g. shame, social ostracization, STDs, an unwanted pregnancy, etc.).

We see young girls behaving this way even before they have a sexual awakening through being touched by a man, or by losing their virginity. Sexual intercourse merely gives full expression to their inner nature.

The Raging Rivulet has Burst

I assume women were this way even before the Fall. Some apocryphal texts even ascribe a sexual connotation to Eve's deception. (Readers may debate this in the comments.) The larger point is that the Curse of the Fall added, "Your desire will be for your husband…" (Genesis 3:16). The ESV brings out a particular nuance in phrasing this as, "Your desire shall be contrary to your husband…". But there is no reason to assume that desire itself did not exist before the Fall. The effect of sin is that desire is corrupted, perverted, and warped, such that the object of desire does not align with God's original design. In fact, this is exactly what a curse is (among other things) — The conscious experience of being under a curse refers to how a person's wants, needs, desires, values, beliefs, aspirations, and moral conscience are all in constant, perpetual conflict with each other.

As CatacombResident wrote,

> "…the complications are the wiring having to transmit through sinful nature."

To me, this means that females lose the heart awareness that their sexual nature is an enjoyable channel of spiritual obedience, i.e. for "making love", bonding with hubby, motivating him to love and provide for her, and producing children. Instead, the sinful nature causes female desire to manifest as random randyness that is an idolatrous end in itself and therefore flows wherever the wind blows – always seeking titillation, never finding satisfaction – the manifest evidence of the curse.

Worse, because of "daddy issues", a harsh legaligious upbringing, or a traumatic sexual experience, some women either shut down their sexual nature altogether, or else place it in the driver's seat and run on autopilot, thereby giving it full mastery over destroying their lives.

Navigating the Raging Rivulet

In the comments under the last few posts in August (2022), there was a lot of talk about how Scott and Mychael, Sam and Elspeth, et al. have ideal marriages, and the reason is ultimately ascribed to the wife's enduring Tinglebations leading to a steamy bedroom, the wife's submission, and marital harmony.

There's also been a lot said about how a man's attractiveness is absolutely necessary to animate the raging rivulet, but this does not explain how average looking guys like Derek and Ed were able to churn out their broods of children.

I think it is because men/husbands don't need to "DO" much to make this happen, simply because it is a woman's nature to be this way. So for those of us who are lacking action, it might be better for us to consider what is "blocking" the wife's sexual expression and "wash out the gully" so to speak.

What we haven't talked much about, which I think is just as important if not more so, is the husband's role in revving up her Tingle-ometer. We do not really know what Derek, Ed, Mike, Sam, Scott, et al. are doing in this respect, but I'll share my own experience.

Case Study – Jack and Jill

My wife's "obstacle" is a busy mind, anxiety, shame, and self-consciousness. She can't get sexually aroused when she is anxious and/or stuck in her head. I need to make a concentrated effort to remove those things that are making her anxious, teach her to be aware of those things and how to draw boundaries whenever she notices that they begin to affect her.

Most of her anxieties were a result of her mother's blame-and-shame games and this had been ingrained in her since childhood, so it wasn't easy to change.

Once I figured this out, I started telling her, "Do you know, every time your mother calls you, you are an angry b!tch for the rest of the day?"

When I first pointed this out to her, she thought I was trying to start a fight by attacking and blaming her mother (a projection of their blame-and-shame game). I had to prove to her that her mother was having a detrimental effect on her emotional life. So I posed this experimental challenge to her.

"I want you to limit your talks with your mother to 10 minutes long, once a week on Saturday. Then let's compare how you feel during the week to how you feel on the weekend."

She eagerly complied, partly because she was angry at her mother and wanted a mental justification to talk with her less, and partly because she wanted to prove me wrong. After this exercise began, I also had to teach her how to close the discussion after 10 minutes, e.g. by making an urgent excuse.

It took a few months of this, but the breakthrough happened when her mother called her during the week and she answered and talked with her for more than an hour. I was away at the time, but when I came home, I saw she was in one of her moods and I asked her, "Did you talk with your mother today?" Then it all suddenly dawned on her.

After this epiphany, she eventually came to be aware of all the ways her mother's judgmental words were affecting her mood. As this realization progressed further, she began to see how sensitive her emotions are and how she is easily affected by little things.

Lately, she told me, "I don't want to see my family that much anymore. I just want to be at home with you all the time*. You are the only person who can make me feel secure."*

Verily, poon is always willing, wet, and waiting.

That is sanctification!

Now, some men might say, "That's a lot of work just to get some poon out of a woman who already promised you poon." In response to this objection, I want to point out that this is about "washing the wife clean", loving her, and building sanctification (Ephesians 5:25-28), and not so much about pumping poontang.

Σ Frame Maxim 34 (Jack): Women rely on Men's Masculine Frame for Redemptive Introspection.

However, rowing towards sanctification will dampen the poon in the long swim.

Conclusions

My comprehensive point here is that we as men are prone to put the pussy first, and use the pulsating action as a litmus indicator of the health and vitality of the relationship. To an extent, this is true. But we cannot conclude that if the loony poon is not gushing 24/7/365 then the relationship is bad. Then we blame ourselves for not being "good looking" enough to create sufficient sexual attraction, and we degenerate into a Mopey Dopey, thinking, "The V must be venerated!"

This is all backwards and devoid of any spiritual awareness or a sense of purpose. Instead, poon at noon and very soon is more correctly inferred to be a fruit of sanctification. If we patiently work towards spiritual obedience and sanctification, then all our other needs will be satisfied in due time.

Sexual Submission

Her Attraction and Arousal are both necessary, adding to Humility and Trust.

Introduction

In response to 16 Permutations of Submission (2022-10-7), Deti said,

> "I think this post overcomplicates things. It really is just as simple as lack of sexual attraction. No sexual attraction, no submission. Sexual attraction, submission. I don't believe many women are marrying men they want to have sex with but don't respect (submit to) those men. Sure, they might not respect marriage, but that has more to do with their lack of understanding of what marriage is and what it requires, and less to do with the man himself.
> Sure, women can love God and hate sex and their marriages. The reason they hate sex and hate their marriages is due to lack of sexual attraction.
> The quality of a marriage to a man centers on whether she's sexually attracted to him. There may be other factors re the quality of a marriage to a woman, but I am really not concerned with that."
> "If you have a terrible sex life, it's almost always because she's not sexually attracted to you. That's pretty much it."

Yes, this is the standard RP lore which has now become rather simplistic. That is, using a woman's sexual performance as an indicator of the man's SMV. In the post cited above, I took a step away from this viewpoint and identified a woman's sexual performance as an indicator of her humility and marital submission. In this post, it was also shown that attraction and submission are not necessarily concomitant in every case. There is more to it.

The reason we should be concerned about this factor of marriage quality is that if we get stuck in the habit of using women's opinions and reactions to gauge our own masculinity, then we'll get a feminized view of masculinity. The female view of masculinity is only one slice of it. OTOH, if we can take our focus off of the bottleneck (women's disinterest and disobedience), then it will free us up to pursue the more important (and perhaps less confusing and less difficult) matters surrounding Christian Masculinity. After which, we can hope that the vexing issue of female sexual submission may fall into place, at least for some men. In this view, the following essay constructs a larger Frame which adds a wider perspective to the relational gridlock resulting from a lack of Sexual Attraction.

Going back a little further, there was a mini-theme about Attraction at the end of August. From this discussion, we determined there is a difference between Attraction and Arousal. In the comments, Joe2 asked for more details about the distinction between Attraction and Arousal. This post will explore this difference in regard to Sexual Submission.

I could be mistaken, but I believe this distinction between Attraction and Arousal is a new topic that has not been addressed before in the Manosphere. (Long time Manospherians are welcome to clue me in to any posts from the past that have covered this.)

Sexual Attraction

Similar to the Likert 10-Point SMV scale, Sexual Attraction is on a scale in which there are different levels of Attraction. For many purposes of discussion, these scales are identical. Zoned regions with specific cut-offs have been determined. Cut offs may vary slightly by individual.

- SMV = 8-10 / SA = Chad / "The Have's" — Raw visceral Attraction leading to off-the-charts, panty soaking Arousal. "I need you to F me NOW!" This is a special circumstance in which Attraction and Arousal are concomitant for women. (More on this point below.) Very few men produce this intensity of attraction. And even if they do, even fewer sustain it over a lifetime.
- SMV = 5-7 / SA = Normie / "The Maybe's" — Warm, "sparks flying" attraction. She's repetitively showing IOIs (e.g. casual touching, etc.) and she's thinking,"I wonder what it would be like if he kissed me." That kind of thing. This is highly dependent on the social context and a number of factors, including the combined gestalt of personalities, Looksmaxxing, propinquity, shared enterprises, shared values, SMV parity, Trust, etc.
- SMV = 1-4 / SA = Sub-5 / "The Have Not's" — No attraction at all. She's offended by the thought of him being a potential, and she's thinking, "No way! I am out of here!"

Of note, IOI's reveal whether a man is creating sparks for a girl, and are the main thing to look for in determining a girl's clear expressed interest.

Sexual Arousal

Sexual Arousal involves physiological indicators of erotic passion (e.g. elevated pulse, lubrication in women, erection in men), and a psychological state of humility, openness, sexual desire, and trust.

For Men, Sexual Attraction almost always leads to his Sexual Arousal, and is thus concomitant.

For Women, Sexual Attraction does not always lead to her Sexual Arousal. It is common for Women to assign the responsibility and/or expect the man to create this shift in her emotional state, however, the vast majority of men are not naturally attuned to know how to do this. If he cannot or does not, and/or her Arousal is not forthcoming, then she will feel awkward and hesitant about moving forward towards Sexual Intercourse. In the case where she wants or is expected to have sex, women will feel confused, uneasy, and dissatisfied. If this situation is repetitive or prolonged beyond her expectations, she may even doubt the value of the relationship and wonder if she could find a more Tingle inducing man in his stead. Some women will swing on the Monkey Branch at this point.

For Men, Sexual Arousal does not always lead to Sexual Intercourse. If this situation is repetitive or prolonged (and it is for most young men), it is not uncommon for men to become frustrated and vexed, disintegrate, lose confidence, and experience what is known as “blue balls” (epididymal hypertension) — an extremely discomfiting heaviness, pressure, and mild pain in the testes. It is common for Men of certain means to spin plates in order to avoid this situation, or if this is not possible, resort to alternative forms of sex (e.g. shucking the corn with a bit of p0rn) to relieve the tension.

For women, Sexual Arousal naturally leads to Sexual Intercourse and thus is essentially concomitant. Both Men and Women are unlikely to refuse intercourse after the Woman becomes aroused. Even if a man refuses to bed an aroused woman, she can easily find another man to fill her niche and scratch her itch, and it is not uncommon for women to resort to this stratagem in order to ease her frustrations and soothe the pain of rejection.

For both Men and Women, experiencing Sexual Arousal without having an immediate recourse of sexual expression with a secure partner (i.e. marriage) is awkward, inconvenient, frustrating, and creates temptation. The Bible recommends those who struggle with this condition to marry rather than to burn with passion and be continually tempted (1 Corinthians 7:1-9).

Things that create Arousal are generally frowned upon for this reason. However, the facilitation of Sexual Arousal is absolutely necessary in marriage, since marriage is, at the core, a sexual relationship. Thus, mastering the arousal of one's partner is important for the health and vitality of a marriage.

How Men create and channel female Arousal has been an ongoing topic within the Manosphere which offers insight to this end. Kino is one Game technique that feeds directly into Arousal. Readers are encouraged to suggest other techniques that can trigger female Arousal. (For married couples.)

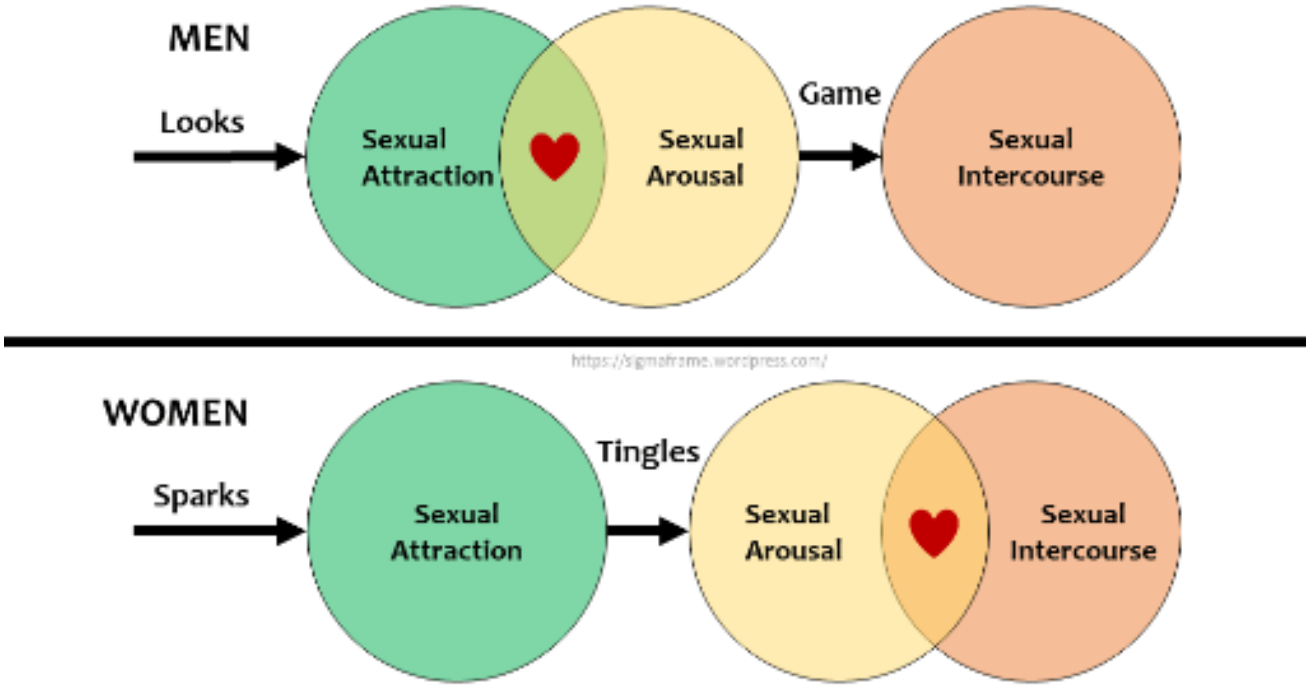
Sexual Intercourse

In summary of the last two sections, there is a series of steps leading to Sexual Intercourse.

Sexual Attraction –> Sexual Arousal –> Sexual Intercourse

This series of steps is the same for both men and women, but the way it occurs is markedly different.

These differences are depicted in the following diagram and are explained thereafter.



Men are initially and primarily drawn to a women for her aesthetic appearance (i.e. "Looks" in the diagram). For men, Sexual Attraction and Sexual Arousal are concomitant. Thus, men can quickly move from Looks to Arousal and then desire Sexual Intercourse. However, Men face difficulty in getting to Sexual Intercourse. To succeed in this, Men often need to employ Game techniques in order to create Tingles.

Women are initially drawn to a man because he possesses certain indicators of masculinity which appeal to her (i.e. "Sparks" in the diagram). There are very few men who can create Sparks, thus there are few men she feels attracted to. Tingles / Sexual Arousal cannot happen WITHOUT Sparks / Sexual Attraction. In addition to the shortage of men who can create Sparks, Women face an additional difficulty in becoming Sexually Aroused. For women, Sexual Arousal and Sexual Intercourse are concomitant.

The red heart indicates the point at which one experiences humility and feelings of love, IOW being "smitten".

- For Men, this happens early in the process, and so it is relatively easy for men to get One-itis, even for a woman they have never slept with.
- For Women, this happens when Arousal leads to Intercourse, and so it is relatively easy for women to get hooked on men they've slept with.

There are some exceptions.

- There may be some men in which Sexual Attraction and Sexual Arousal are not concomitant (e.g. older men, low T men).
- A very small number of men can produce Tingles / Arousal directly. Some men are naturals. Some men can learn how to do this, but most men cannot.
- Some women are autoerotic (viz. able to become aroused at will and/or without external stimuli from a man) and may have lower standards for Sexual Intercourse.
- Some individuals can go through the process with no heart. So they can jump through the process faster, and are not inhibited from abandoning the relationship, or having concurrent relationships. Also, having a well-worn familiarity with the process can kill the heart.

Vetting for Mismatch

Sexual Arousal is simply not possible without Sexual Attraction, and this is true for both men and women. Thedeti continually beats the drum on this fact – a fact that has been casually downplayed and ignored in most of the typical advice given to Men. Deti's main point is that men often marry women who are not sexually attracted to them, and then become frustrated when her sexual arousal is elusive. As a result, the marriage relationship is weak and debased. (See Σ Frame Axiom 32, AKA Deti's Third Law of Relationships.)

Joe2 and many other men are concerned about how Arousal can be vetted prior to marriage, without going for a test drive. "After we are married, what if I am not able to sexually arouse her and then I'm stuck in a sexless marriage until the day I die? What then?" This is a genuine fear and something to consider. Just because the man is attracted, aroused, and willing to commit does not mean that the woman is suitable for marriage. Scott's Axiom states that a woman's suitability for marriage depends more upon her own attraction and arousal than that of the man's. But even this has problems and issues.

This is the reason why there has been so much talk about raw visceral sexual attraction ever since Scott wrote Probabilities (2020-2-24). Because men believe that if a woman has that, then her Arousal is a given and sexual congress will occur naturally and spontaneously. "If she is truly attracted to me, then there is no reason to think she would not be aroused." But this approach is half baked because it assumes that female sexuality functions like a man's, and it does not represent a realistic concept of how women's sexuality works.

For men, Attraction and Arousal are concomitant, but for women, they are not. For men, sex leads to orgasm nearly 100% of the time, but women only peak about 40% of the time. Some women need a man who is dominant in the bedroom and who takes the initiative to bring her into a state of Arousal. And just because she needs that, does not mean she does not have attraction for him. It just means her body works differently.

My testimony in Erotic Blueprints and Personality (2022-10-12) made it clear that creating Arousal leading to a mutually satisfying sexual congress can be a monumental task for some couples, even for those who are attracted and/or committed to each other. Yesterday's post, Riding the Raging Rivulet (2022-10-13), described a case study of why Jill found it difficult to get herself into the mood for sex and how Jack had to do some work on her before she was able to loosen up.

Still, I can understand how Men find it difficult to imagine how women can be attracted to a man but not aroused, or aroused but not attracted (in rare cases). But in fact, Women experience this mismatch between Attraction and Arousal quite frequently. Women will seldom talk about this, and for the same reason that Men are shy about discussing erectile dysfunction or prostate enlargement.

The Fear of Mismatch

It is a genuine fear. Just like Performance Anxiety can kill a man's erection, Arousal Anxiety can make it nearly impossible for a woman to abandon her inhibitions and come forth in all her obscene glory. Women fear not being able to orgasm much like Men fear not being able to stiffen up. Men usually don't have this problem until they're older and then they have Viagra just in case. But for many women, it's an everyday problem with no Niagra available. It would facilitate our discussion if we could respect this reality.

This mismatch is partly why women have an interest in married men, or "players", or men with a sexual history (e.g. divorced men, or men whom other women say are good in bed). It's not only envy, preselection, or the 6-6-6 package as we are wont to believe. Women are subconsciously attracted to these men because they get the sense that these men are skilled in arousing women. "He can arouse other women. Other women say he is great in bed. So he will be able to do that for me too!" Sometimes they can feel directly aroused by such men, even with only a modicum of social interaction, and this is an additional certification of his sexual finesse.

This mismatch is also why we have this whole lie sold to both men and women: "You need sexperience with multiple people to learn Sexual Arousal. If you don't learn Sexual Arousal, then you'll miss out on the best sex you never had." A big piece of this lie is founded on FOMO. Both men and women are afraid that attraction may not lead to arousal, so they want to hedge their bets so to speak, and they are hesitant to commit. This is also why many Christians who know that premarital sex is wrong will still decide that taking the Test Drive is a wise approach.

But in another sense, this lie is a half-truth, simply because we live in a broken world. Consider all the possibilities that could ruin Arousal:

- Most men are generally clueless about how to create Arousal in Women, even men who have been married for years.
- Most men cannot even learn or be taught how to create Arousal in Women.
- Some women have learned how to create Arousal in Men, but because Men are easily Aroused through Attraction, these women often only do it to garner attention.
- For married women, if they don't already enjoy Arousing their husband, they tend to see it as a chore and are disinclined to learn.
- Many conservative / Christian wives are averse to proactively creating Arousal in their husbands, thinking that it is "dirty", or "below themselves" to behave "like a hussy".
- Some women are broken victims of traumatic abuse.
- Some women are damaged by their own sexual sins.

With so many things that could go wrong, the fear of Mismatch is not unjustified.

The Wages of Sin are Paid in Marriage

Jack · 15 October 2022 · Archived copy · Original

A history of Sexperience corrodes marriage from the inside out.

Readership: Christians; Those who are Married or Marriage minded;
Theme: Feminine Submission
Length: 1,800 words
Reading Time: 10 minutes

Introduction

Sexual Submission (2022-10-14) brought up the question of whether the model of Attraction / Arousal described therein was truly applicable in multiple contexts. Derek identified the model as pertaining fairly accurately to the experience of long-time married couples, while Deti argued that Attraction and Arousal are concomitant for women (similar to how they are for men) and that the model is a desperate attempt to deflect, explain, and excuse wives' lack of Arousal.

This post will go over some dynamics that affect the context and then answer some questions that were brought up.

Comparing Models of Feminine Submission

I'll offer some concise descriptions of the models of feminine submission that have been put forth.

Biblical Model: Good marriages last because the wife is chaste, and is regularly submissive and respectful to her husband. Bad marriages fail because the wife does not do these things. (Among other things.)

Jack's Model (as given in Sexual Submission): Good marriages last because the wife is humble and trusting. Husbands play a role in keeping her that way. Bad marriages fail because the wife does not respect, submit, and help / cooperate with the husband. (Among other things.)

Derek's Model: Good marriages last because the wife is focused on family life, including being a helper to and getting along well with her husband. Bad marriages fail because the wife is immature or selfish. (Among other things.)

Deti's Model: Good marriages last because the wife regularly wants to have sex with her husband. Bad marriages fail because the wife is not genuinely attracted to / aroused by her husband. (That's it!)

These models fit the biblical model in the following ways.

- Jack's Model: The wife surrenders to the Headship authority of the husband.
- Derek's Model: The wife conforms to her role as a wife and mother.
- Detis Model: The wife is submissive to the husband in the bedroom.

These models are valid in the following contexts.

- Jack's Model: Generally works in successful marriages, but the specific reasons for that success vary from case to case.
- Derek's Model: Hearkens back to traditional norms for marriage and family and is therefore time tested.
- Deti's Model: Stands true in a sex centric culture where wimmin are ruled by Desires / Feeelz / Feminism / hypergamy / Immaturity and not by God nor husband.

These models proscribe a failure of the biblical model in the following ways.

- Jack's Model: The marriage will fail if husbands do not take the initiative to impose Headship or if wives are uncooperative or unsubmissive.

- Derek's Model: The marriage will fail if the wife is immature, selfish, or screwed up for whatever reason.
- Deti's Model: The marriage will fail if the wife is not perpetually aroused (wanting to have sex with her husband all the time) and the husband cannot regularly and sufficiently gin up his Game (e.g. Dread, et al.).

It is clearly evident that if a marriage is to succeed over the long haul, then husband and wife will have to stick to the biblical model, or make the transition to the biblical model at some point, or else be doomed to dysfunction.

Sin Introduces Weaknesses to the Models

Deep Strength did a nice job describing how promiscuous women are disappointed with a husband because they subconsciously compare his qualities to all the best qualities of the men she's had before.

> "…the higher the number of sexual partners [a woman has had] the more comparisons she has to make toward her husband. Thus, if her husband doesn't measure up in some way to partner #1, 2, 3, 4, etc., up to say 10 (n count = 10) in various different areas then she is more likely to be dissatisfied and start disrespecting and/or rebelling. For instance, if #2 made 6 figures, #5 had an athletes muscular physique, and #7 had his own house, even though all of these are different people she will generally expect that her husband should have most if not all of those qualities.
> This is why expectations seem to be sky high with women nowadays. They're taking aggregate comparisons of lots of men they slept with and expect the next one (e.g. their potential husband) to have all of the best qualities of all of those men put together."
> Christianity and Masculinity: Why expectations of men and women are out of control (2022-10-14)

Women who can't get aroused by their husband in marriage on an ongoing basis are almost certainly guilty of past sexual sins, or else they experienced some sort of psychological trauma, or maybe both. Men who married a virgin don't really have this problem, or if they do, then they don't really consider it to be a problem. Men who didn't marry a virgin are frequently faced with this problem and because of the prevalence of fornication I would say it is now the norm. Scott and Mychael are an exception, by God's grace.

Likewise, the same thing happens with men too.

> "A similar thing tends to happen in men with the desensitizing nature of airbrushed women on social media, advertising, and porn. Once a man has seen so much "beauty" per se, he becomes more desensitized toward normal looking women in everyday life (not counting overweight/obesity type stuff). Hence, normal women can't meet his unrealistic standards anymore."
> Christianity and Masculinity: Why expectations of men and women are out of control (2022-10-14)

Deep Strength didn't go far enough in describing the effects on men. Promiscuous men become disappointed with a wife because they compare her general level of respect and bedroom performance to all the best T&A he's had before, i.e. swinging from the chandeliers at Niagara falls, and so on.

If his wife doesn't measure up in some way to partner #1, 2, 3, 4, etc., up to say 10 (n count = 10) in various different areas then he is more likely to be dissatisfied and fail to truly love, cherish, and appreciate her for who she is. For instance, if #1 laughed at all his jokes, #3 came running to his door in the middle of the night for every single booty call, #5 could suck a golf ball through a garden hose and swallow every drop for four hours straight until her neck gave out, #7 had a "perfect 10" body, and #9 was a multiple orgasm squirter, even though all of these are different women he will generally expect that his wife should have most if not all of these qualities.

Imagine his disappointment then, after he gets married, his wife locks up in the bedroom because she's comparing him to all the men that she's cuff linked before. He's stuck with a contentious nag who won't put out, and regrets ever getting married. He will feel dissatisfied and curse women and marriage (maybe even God too), no matter that his wife may have many positive qualities.

Moreover, both Men and Women are taking aggregate comparisons of lots of media images / portrayals and past lovers and expect the next one (e.g. their actual or potential husband or wife) to have all of the best qualities of all of those images / portrayals / men or women put together.

Case Study — Jack and Jill

Neither my wife nor I were virgins when we married. So it can be expected that we will experience the frustrations and disappointments I described above.

- Even though I am a Ph.D. / professor, SMV = ~8, she still wants more attention, confidence, game, income, status, achievement, and so on out of me.
- Even though she is a sex bunny with an hourglass figure, I still want more respect, sexual enthusiasm, passion, and playfulness out of her.

There is still love and sexual attraction between us, but the sexual arousal is cluttered with emotional triggers and subconscious expectations and so it doesn't occur spontaneously. However, becoming aware of these issues helps immensely, as I described in Riding the Raging Rivulet (2022-10-13). Learning the Erotic Blueprints and Personality of one's spouse also helps streamline the festivities with fewer false starts and less frustration. These things would be difficult even without any past antipathetic experiences, but it can be overcome by God's grace.

The point is, even the best of relationships are difficult to navigate, but having a history of hangups and hiccups introduces many more obstreperous obstacles to be overcome in attaining the ideal.

Difficult Questions

All of the above discussion brings me to a place where I can address some questions that were raised by Derek and Deti. But I'm afraid the answers will be quite disappointing.

Deti wrote,

> "Why should I do all this work for lackluster response and a little dampness, when what I should be getting is great sex and Niagara Falls? And what work is she going to do for me? What do I get out of this? What's in this for me?"

Pardon me for being so blunt, but this statement perfectly represents the male perspective of a marriage suffering from a history of premarital sexual promiscuity, as I described above.

Deti wrote,

> "If you're married to a slow cooker or a steam engine who requires that much work and maintenance to get going, she's not sexually attracted to you. If you have to do this much work and go through all this rigmarole and procedure just to get her to notice you want sex, she's not sexually attracted to you and any arousal you get out of that will be purely mechanical."

The answer is… Yes! That's what a debased marriage is like.

As Feeriker said,

> "Painful, unpleasant truths are always difficult to accept."

Closing Statements

Deti's viewpoint is typical for men who have been psychologically abused by sexually promiscuous women and denied respect and natural affections in marriage. I understand this because I've experienced the same. However, because of the prevalence of feminism and sexual rebellion, even men who married virgins have to deal with dead bedroom syndrome, like Red Pill Apostle.

- In addition to the challenges of being imperfect humans trapped in a mortal body, sexual sins introduce more emotional and spiritual obstacles that must be overcome, perhaps on a daily basis.
- Married life brings to the surface all the best and the worst in people.
- When things are going well (like the humdrum of married life), people fall into habits and get complacent and lazy.
- When things fall apart, it's time to do some inventory and take stock of what you're dealing with, and what can reasonably be done to fit into the biblical model.
- Men can be very aggressive at establishing Headship authority. But only when circumstances demand it. Sexual sin removes the incentives of positive reward.
- Women can be very proactive about being submissive, including sexual submission. But only when circumstances motivate it. Sexual sin (among other things) erodes such circumstances.

No offense is intended to anyone mentioned here as an example.

Women submit to their Head

Biblical Examples of Subjects Submitting to their Head

Citizens submitting to Rulers

The books of Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, 1 and 2 Kings, and 1 and 2 Chronicles contain many examples of rulership and the conduct of Kings, good and bad. One lesson to be had is that when a king is good, then the people are good and the nation prospers. But when a king is incompetent or wicked, the people are corrupt and calamity befalls.

We also see this same pattern occurring in a familiar New Testament story.

> When Herod the king heard this, he was troubled, and all Jerusalem with him.
> Matthew 2:3 (NKJV)

When King Herod was troubled, ALL Jerusalem was troubled. Why were they troubled? The ancient prophecy foretold that the Messiah would be born in Bethlehem. They had been waiting for the Messiah for generations and they knew the time had come for Him to be born. When Herod sent to kill the children – it was for 2 years and under. Even the sages of the East — foreigners — knew the prophecy was being fulfilled and had come to observe the event and worship the Messiah. But apparently the locals thought nothing of it because none of them, other than a few shepherds who were notified by flying angels blowing trumpets, made the walk to Bethlehem to see Him. (If others did come, the Bible does not record it.) Why not? Because Herod was ruler, and if Herod was troubled, they were troubled. They were more worried about the present murderous ruler than the fulfillment of the prophecy surrounding the King of Kings!

Eve submitting to Adam

Rosenda Monteros, actress in The Magnificent Seven (1960).

When we look at the account of creation in Genesis 2:16-17, we see that when God warned Adam not to eat the fruit of the Tree of Knowledge of good and evil, Eve was NOT yet created. That happened later in verse 21.

There is NO record of God giving the instruction to Eve. Only to Adam. Yet when the serpent questions Eve in Chapter 3:2-3, she speaks about the instruction given to Adam. How did she know? There is only one conclusion – Adam told her. Not just told her, instructed her. Adam taught her. That was part of his function as her head. She was under his authority.

Wives submitting to Husbands

> [25] Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church, and gave himself for it; [26] That he might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the word.
> Ephesians 5:25-26 (NKJV)

Everyone focuses on verse 25 because it is about love. But the action of love is given in verse 26. The expression of a husband's love is his sanctifying his wife with the WORD. When wives (and daughters) endure Mr. Clean's Scotch-Brite, she falls under his Headship covering.

Children submitting to Parents

> And thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up.
> Deuteronomy 6:7 (KJV)

How do children learn the way of the Lord? Through relentless teaching by parents. Parents are the head of authority over their children. If the husband is the head of the wife, then this reduces to one head over the entire house. Children who have one head are much more psychologically and spiritually healthy than those who have two (e.g. due to the wife's rebellion or divorce).

Our Design fosters our Dependence on Authority

Yul Brynner and Rosenda Monteros in The Magnificent Seven (1960).

People were created to depend on God and to yield to God's authority. Jesus often used sheep as a metaphor to describe people. There is a reason for Him using sheep, and not donkeys or foxes or snakes. Of all the animals in the animal kingdom, God compares us to sheep. Why? It's not because sheep are helpless or stupid, as true as that comparison might be, but because sheep are completely DEPENDENT on the shepherd. His Voice is that of the Good Shepherd that we listen to.

Women often appear to be rather solipsistic or stupid. But the deeper truth is that they are DEPENDENT. They can only think so far as their dependency permits. This is a product DESIGN feature, not a bug. Thus,

- Women are easily led.
- Women are easily deceived.
- Women will parrot whatever propositional truth narratives or boilerplate they are taught.
- Even every rabid feminist Karen submits to the cultural narrative.

Women yield to their head – ALWAYS. They were never created to be independent. They were always created to be under authority. God has placed them under authority – first her father; then her husband – always to God.

The Power of Authority

Based on the Biblical passages in the first section, as well as our lived experiences, it is clear that we are heavily influenced by those in authority over us. But authority functions on the grassroots level as well.

Women's sociosexual hypergamy has been described in Red Pill lore as an evo-psyche function of choosing the best man from whom to draw her seed and sustenance. The AF/BB mating strategy describes how a woman's needs and interests change as she ages, and how this affects her choice of a man.

Similarly, women display a spiritual hypergamy as well. They choose to follow the head that they perceive will best suit their interests and needs and give them the most benefit out of life.

We may be confused about why some women behave as they do.

- Why will a women decide to sleep with or marry one man, but not another?
- Why do some women decide to ride the CC, while other women decide to be married?

The answer is relatively simple – she is simply following her head, whoever or whatever that head might be.

Women ALWAYS submit to their head. It is only the HEAD which is different.

If her head is the Word of God – which needs to be relentlessly taught by her father and husband – she will sleep ONLY with her husband (the man whom her father gives her to at a time decided by her father).

If her head is the culture and her peer group, then…

- If everyone is a virgin around her, she will stay a virgin.
- If everyone is sleeping around, she will start hunting for a “boyfriend”.
- If everyone is having the college experience, so will she.
- If everyone around her is getting a tattoo, she will get a tattoo.
- If everyone is getting married after riding the carousel, so will she.
- If everyone around her is getting divorced, so will she.
- If everyone around her is losing their virginity at 15, getting married at 30, and divorcing at 45, so will she.
- If everyone around her is talking QTBGLisms, she will learn and spout the same rhetoric.

Identify the God or idol, and you will find the root cause of every man’s behavior.

Identify the head, and you will find the root cause of every woman’s behavior.

The Glory of Authority

Horst Buchholz and Rosenda Monteros in The Magnificent Seven (1960).

It all goes back to the story of Adam and Eve in Genesis. What were we created for? We were created to be in the image and glory of God, which means we were created to DEPEND on God.

> [7] For a man indeed ought not to cover his head, since he is the image and glory of God; but woman is the glory of man. [8] For man is not from woman, but woman from man.
> 1 Corinthians 11:7-8 (NKJV)

We are familiar with this passage, but what is not often emphasized in Christian teachings is that the identity behind one's image and the glory thereof is a function of authority. Men are glorified when God is their head. Likewise, women are glorified when they submit to the loving authority of their fathers and husbands. OTOH, men are debased when they abandon God as their Head, and women are defiled when they reject the headship covering of their fathers and husbands.

Because of this structure, women are 10 times more easily influenced by an earthly authority than men are. This is why when churches preach heresies about female submission, both men and women are deceived. This is precisely why the dark powers of our age target the populace with the lies of feminism and try to destroy male authority and replace it with various social constructs of female "authority" (e.g. anti-evil-patriarchy, birth control, equal opportunity employment, equalism, independence, individualism, toxic masculinity, women's sexual liberation, et al.). In essence, these are all psy-ops that play on women's peculiar weaknesses (c.f. Genesis 3:16) to leverage female oppression and are therefore tools of rebellion against God's ordained order.

Modern feminists like to imagine that they are strong enough to be independent. Some of them actually make it, but they can only do this by abandoning feminine traits and adopting masculine traits. And many of these same SIWs are rather unhappy towards the end of their lives. Why so unhappy? It is because they abandoned their head and made their career / corporation / supervisors into their heads, and were thenceforth cast aside by the corporate machine after they had lost their usefulness. (If the facts were plainly stated, their usefulness is largely determined by their femininity and aesthetic appeal to their corporate heads. That's not a misogynistic opinion or a patriarchal social construct, that's just how it is.) If they had somehow managed to make themselves into their own heads, then they had to shoulder the entire responsibility of their lives upon themselves.

Men bow to their God. Men's weakness is to be tempted to rebel and be disobedient to his Head — The Holy Spirit of the Lord. Men will disobey one god to serve another. But they all bow to a higher authority. The question is, who is a man's God?

Women submit to their head. Women's weakness is that she is easily confused about her head and thereby deceived. Women will leave or chuck one man to serve another. But they all bow to a head. The question is, who is a woman's head?

Conclusions

The common approach that we see today is one of trying to change people's behaviors. On men's forums, men are talking about how women should change so that they will become suitable wives. On women's forums, women are talking about how they want men to "man up" according to various estimations.

But we cannot change people. It is not behavior that needs to change. It is the structure of authority that needs to change. Men need to drop their idols and come to GOD. Women need to quit their shenanigans and adhere to their HEAD.

In this view, the Gospel can be interpreted as a question of authority. The revelation of Jesus' life is that God miraculously became a man in order to demonstrate masculine submission to GOD's authority and also how to act as a HEAD over others, including women. By doing so, He brought us under His spiritual authority and made us HIS!!!

"The Problem with no name" which Betty Friedan was referring to was – a lack of purpose. However, a good marriage; a career; having a work-life balance – these do NOT get you purpose. "The Problem with no name" has an Answer with a name – JESUS! It is KNOWING Christ and making HIM known that gives life purpose.

The PURPOSE that men are looking for is found in JESUS — not in a chaste, perpetually horny sex bunny with an hourglass figure who is worthy of wifing up. Without GOD, men will flounder and fail.

The ONE that women are looking for is JESUS — not a Chad with beta provider qualities who will stick around, and not even a husband. Without a proper HEAD, women will be snared and err.

So what do we do to change things? We can only do what the early disciples did — Preach JESUS – the resurrected Christ; teach about His standards; teach the Word of God, teach His example of masculine Headship.

The door is now open. You can choose to be His or you can choose another god or another head. He gives us that choice. But we must live with consequences of that choice.

What does a Proverbs 31 relationship look like?

Introduction

As Jack stated in his post, Not Trusting women is Deep Inner Game (2021-12-15), Proverbs 31:11 plainly states that the husband's heart trusts the virtuous wife (which is about 1 out of 1,000 women), but even so, it does not say that he trusts her with every emotion or thought that he has. But as men, we very much want to read this meaning into the passage. So this made me wonder, if the husband is not extending full transparent trust to his wife carte blanche, then what kind of relationship does this Proverbs 31 couple have?

So let's explore this ideal relationship a little further, as described in Proverbs 31:10-31. Verse 12 says she does him good and not evil, and then the rest of the chapter is dominated by references to making his family respected through the work she does and how she represents him in the community.

As men, do we have this kind of relationship with our wives?

To get us thinking about real life examples, I'll relay three case studies here.

Case Study 1 – Red Pill Apostle and his admin assistant

I would liken this to the working relationship I have with my admin, Tasha. I know that if I direct her to do something that she will follow my instructions and the task will be completed. I know that the standards I set for managing my clientele will be met. I don't instruct her on the specific means of accomplishing every task because she has developed systems for herself that make it easier for her to follow my bigger picture instructions. This is the trust the husband has in the wife to do good to him in verse 11, not a trust that she can handle his innermost doubts, fears or thoughts and then not change towards him in light of that knowledge.

Case Study 2 – Red Pill Apostle and Mrs. Apostle

How I see this applying in my own marriage is that I give my wife what she needs from me as her head, and what she needs is to feel like I don't keep parts of my life from her. What this looks like is talking with her about many things at a level I would consider superficial, but is enough for her to feel we've "connected". If I've had a rough day at work we may talk about what happened and why it happened and conclude with a platitude such as, "It is what it is and it will work out." What she needs to feel is that I'm working on a fix and that I have confidence that I will find a way to make it OK.

What I will not do is say anything that would shake her confidence because she doesn't handle that well. In the past, she's gone full control freak and my observation is that this is due in large part to her personality paired with the combination of poor theological foundation and a lack of faith in God's sovereignty. The results of control freak wife are contentiousness and a struggle against headship.

My wife is also my secretary. A usual day for us is to go to campus together and she works in my office while I am teaching all day. She answers the phone, and helps me process orders and finish paperwork that is in Chinese, since she can do it much faster than I can and with fewer errors.

I've been in the habit of harnessing my wife's thoughts early in the day – before she can think herself into one of her moods. One day (2021-12-16), she had been in a bad mood for the past couple days, so in the morning, I wrote down two questions on her notepad.

1. What brings you joy?
2. What brings hubby joy?

Right away, she wanted to lecture me about what I should do to make her happy. I told her, "Not now, I need to go teach my class. Think about it while you're working, and we'll talk about it later today."

By the time lunch rolled around, she was in a calmer mood. Several pages of her notepad were filled with her scribblings. She said, "Oh! I have a big conclusion from the questions you posed!" Then she told me some things she realized about herself from thinking over the first question. (Just as I expected, she only delved into the first question, and never got around to the second, but I let it pass for the time being.) While she was talking, she got so emotional that she started crying. I just sat quietly and listened to her talk. She was very contented with herself after this, and she quickly got over her issues from the previous day.

For more on this technique, see The Question Apology Game (2019-1-6)

Concluding Statements

If we were to get into the habit of thinking of ourselves as our wives' supervisors or mentors, and focusing on the ways their behaviors line up with this structure, and being thankful for this, then it might take us further down the road towards sanctification and the Proverbs 31 experience in marriage.

Even single men could avail of adopting this general mindset towards women who are regularly within their vicinity. Conveying a Command Presence resonates with women and Displaying High Value invites respect and deference from women. It will also flush out those women with latent feminist values whom you should be aware of and wary of. Proceed confidently, but with caution.

Exit Question: How does your marriage line up with Proverbs 31?

The Misery of having Weak or Missing Boundaries

A while back, Femmy wrote about her subjective view of others in which she portrayed man bashing as a common female trait.

> "I also noticed I'm really good at seeing what's spiritually wrong in others, but blind to my own.
> For example, all the wives in my family sure can pick out everything wrong in their men, but never once did they say they were wrong about anything they did, except for one: that they shouldn't have married.
> Is this true for all women?
> And why do they morally pick on their husbands?
> Why do they constantly bash them in front of their children?
> Why are they always mad?"

We've been over this before many times. Genesis 3:16 means that all women to one extent or another will chafe against their husband's authority. Wives picking out the moral flaws of their husbands to leverage against them is one way this chaffing manifests itself. Bashing them in front of their children is another way of usurping a husband's authority.

On a personal note, if Mrs. Apostle ever does this particular one again then we'll go see divorce lawyers the next day, which brings us to the answer to Femmy's last question.

Wives are always mad because they are stuck with a husband who they don't think is strong enough to set firm boundaries and enact consequences for breaking them. The insane aspect of this is that the typical unhappy wife does not understand what it is that will actually make her happy and so she grasps at shadows she thinks might do the trick, all the while petulantly goading her husband with "happy wife, happy life" in a vain effort to wring that last drop of life blood out of him. He does his best to keep up until he doesn't see the point of trying anymore, because what he does rarely keeps her happy.

Even wives that were, at one time, Tingle crazy for their husband commonly fall into this trap. After years of nagging and nitpicking, eventually her insolent disrespect causes her to fall out of love, and her lack of humility ruins the entire marriage and family, as I described before. These women never seem to realize that what they're looking for can only be obtained by trusting in God, not by castigating a man. However, when a husband installs boundaries, it creates a structure that can take her one step closer towards realizing this.

Installing Boundaries

In practice, husbands need to ditch all of the culture's ideas about equality and treat his wife like the most responsible teenager in the family. This is done by setting firm boundaries and expectations and then enforcing them without letting his emotions get the best of him. She'll be unhappy for a while, but ultimately she'll find comfort in the security and safety of the parameters he has set.

Think of it like a sheep in a pen with the shepherd at the gate. They may not like being penned in, but the shepherd's protection lets them live their lives more freely because they are safe from predators. The "predator" in this case is demonic — moral criticism, unthankfulness, shame, pangs of guilt, etc. Likewise, a husband's parameters with his wife should protect against emotionally driven poor decision making that leads to painful and costly consequences.

This is, in fact, the model the Bible gives us with Christ and the church. He gives us parameters to protect us from ourselves, knowing that we'd all act sinfully against our own long term best interests. For some of these, it is easier to understand the cause and effect, such as the adulteress leading to emotional, financial, and relational turmoil, while others, like the Leviticus 18 instruction to not procreate with close relatives, make take a little longer to realize. In the case of Leviticus 18, it took a couple generations after Kentucky reached statehood along with modern genetic research to confirm the wisdom contained there. (It's a Southern joke.)

Laying out Expectations

In yesterday's post, Laying out Boundaries (2022/10/19), Red Pill Apostle made reference to the blessed peace and order that results from establishing boundaries within a relationship. Men, especially married men, may now be wondering, "What are boundaries?" "How can I go about creating boundaries in my own relationship?"

RPA tells us that one way to do this is by clearly stating your expectations for her and the relationship.

> "What I should have done differently many years ago was to lay out specific expectations of behavior from her. It may not have fixed things, but she would have had a standard against which to judge her own actions and that may have been enough to let her know where she stood with me."

A couple years into his marriage, Jack laid out very specific expectations for his wife. Here are a few of them.

- I expect you to show respect to me at all times, no matter what I've done or how you're feeling.
- I expect you to seek out my opinion, and value it once it is given, even if you disagree with it.
- Whenever I am talking, I expect you to listen carefully and without interruption.
- I expect you to consider my interests above anyone else's, including your own.
- I expect you to be able to give an account for any money that you might spend.
- I expect you to ask my permission for any expenditure over $100.
- Whenever you need to wake me up, I expect you to do so with a tender touch instead of words.
- I expect that you will not make loud noises or have busy activities before 10:00 am.
- I expect that when I come home from work you will greet me at the door with a passionate kiss and you will allow me half an hour of quiet time to rest before you present your concerns of the day to me.
- I expect you to stay under 55 kg.
- I expect that you will never cut your hair shorter than shoulder length.
- I expect you to dress appropriately and attractively whenever we go out in public.
- I expect you to wear something sexy or nothing at all while we are at home (alone).
- I expect you to be ready to have sex with me any time I get an erection, and that you will have sex with me at least once every day.

For a long time, Jack's wife complained about these expectations, saying that he was too controlling and demanding. Mrs. Apostle was the same way. This is normal. Most women would look at Jack's list and would scoff at it. But within a period of time (about 8 months for RPA's wife, and one year for Jack's wife), they complied.

Jack's Home: "I expect you to wear something sexy or nothing at all…"
Derek (Ramman3000) had it a little easier, because from the onset, his wife agreed with his list of expectations in marriage, given as follows.

- We would first and foremost have a devout Christian home, with regular and active church attendance.
- We would be united as one flesh. Decisions would be made together in unity of purpose. We would always communicate. There would be no prioritization of "his" or "her", for one cannot separate what has been cleaved together as one.
- We would never lie to one another or keep secrets. Complete trust was required. We would keep things in common (finances, email, etc.) because there could be no secrets.
- Our friendship would always be of critical importance.
- Divorce was condemned (and thus, no prenups allowed).
- We would have a minimum of one child, with the expectation (but not requirement) of two. When one person felt it was time to have children, then the other partner could not refuse. To do so would be cheating the spouse and grounds for annulment of the marriage (which was never going to actually happen).
- We would not go to bed angry.
- We would never contradict one another in front of the children. If we had a disagreement, we would discuss it without the children present.
- We would both finish school, get jobs, and do international travel.
- She could wear makeup, but only rarely for special occasions. Jewelry must be modest. Hair should be at least shoulder-length.
- We would never have extra-marital sex.
- We had few other expectations regarding physical intimacy other than that when two people meet intimately for the first time, they must grow together physically however they see fit, adapting together to each person's needs. We agreed that the details would never be shared with anyone else, and it never has been.

Derek concluded,

> "We've been married two decades. This list has served us well. I would not change the relationship's focus on unity, trust, and friendship for anything in the world."

Derek's Home: "Our friendship would always be of critical importance."

A man's clearly stated expectations establishes the wife's spiritual boundaries

Wives may not do all that their husband expects, but they will usually come pretty close.

We might wonder, why do wives eventually conform to their husband's expectations, but only after a year or so, and then only loosely?

The reason is because if she disregards these expectations, then she is not only casually disobeying and/or actively rebelling against her husband, she is also sinning by breaking God's instruction to wives (1 Peter 3:1-6, Ephesians 5:22-33, and Colossians 3:18).

You see, once these expectations/boundaries are in place and are shown to be sufficiently rigid, women can feel those boundaries, and it affects their consciences if they cross them. They do not respond immediately because it takes a while for wives to realize in their hearts that these boundaries are not merely their husband's preferences, nor are these boundaries limited to the home nor even their marriage, but in fact, these boundaries envelop her whole social and spiritual identity.

Case Study 1 — Weight no more!

For example, if Jack's wife really wanted to please him, then she would stay under 55 kg. as he stated. But she'll stay around 58 kg., not because she is lazy or wants to test Jack's boundaries, but because she feels guilty or ashamed to go over 60 kg. After she became familiar with this reality enough for her to take responsibility for it (which took about 4 years), she decided to become a vegetarian who occasionally indulges in playfully stealing shrimp and chicken nuggets from Jack.

Of course, it would be much harder for a man to state such an expectation when his wife weighs twice what she should, and it would take longer for her to fall in line and reduce her dress size. But by faith in the power of God, I believe the results would be very similar. It is not really the wife's fault either. The husband can only blame himself for neglecting to exercise his God given authority and letting the bulge grow out of hand for so long.

Case Study 2 — The Glorious Covering of Hairship

Here's another example. One time, Jack's wife cut her hair shorter than shoulder length. She argued that having long hair required work and sacrifice, i.e. she has to spend more time to wash and care for her hair each day, and she has to endure criticism from other women who are envious of her long hair. Jack expressed strong disapproval, and this made her angry, and then they had a cold war for a couple weeks. But she never did that again, and it's because she felt guilty for not loving herself more, not because Jack said it made her less beautiful. After a while, the hamster caught up to ground speed, and she began to recognize the importance of submitting to Jack's requests to present herself as a beautiful woman.

Conclusions

A man can build a house, but a wife makes it into a home. Wives cannot build, nor can husbands feather the nest.

When a husband tells his wife his expectations, he paints a detailed portrait of a glorified life together. Metaphorically, he shows her the blueprint of a house and plants a seed of hope in her heart.

Once a wife gets into the practice of fitting into her husband's expectations, she begins to form a new life for herself within the boundaries proscribed by her husband. When she catches his vision of a Life shared together, she carries the hope of realizing that. This hope is bolstered as she sees progress in building the house and she is inspired to feather it into a home. At this point, she takes joy in her husband's covering hedge, because she knows how to do well and how to please God within her domain. Her joy then spreads throughout the home and the family.

So you see, the reason why wives conform to their husband's expectations is not simply because he asked her to do so, nor does it need to be her motivation to please him. The reason she never quite matches his expectations is because it is not her purpose to do so. Her goal is to feather the nest and her purpose is to achieve the dream he imparted to her conscious awareness. She is thereby motivated to cooperate with him towards fulfilling this hope. If she gets too far away from the vision her husband gave to her through his expectations, then she will feel ashamed, guilty, and/or regretful.

The things most men don't understand are that…

- They need to have a vision of a blessed and glorified Life to share with the wife (and family).
- They need to continually reinforce the wife's understanding of this vision.
- The husband's word carries spiritual force over his wife and home.
- God has granted Men this spiritual authority over their wives and homes.
- Wives can actually feel in their hearts that disregarding their husband's boundaries is sin.
- Wives get confused and become disobedient when the husband's expectations are not congruent and/or do not contribute towards the vision of a blessed Life together.
- Wives feel motivated to avoid the guilt and shame brought on from moving too far away from her husband's expectations / vision. This internal conviction in the wife is enforced not by the husband's character, discipline, nor love for his wife, but by the power of God.

Moreover, stating expectations is an important part of the feedback that women need, which I've described in the following posts:

- Σ Frame: Women Rely on a Man's Frame for Redemptive Introspection (2021/06/28)
- Σ Frame: Why challenge the character of your wife? (2021/07/07)
- Σ Frame: A Volitional Model of Cascade Courtship (2021/11/15)

- Σ Frame: Moral Guidance Based Feedback vs. Sexual Attention (2021/11/24)

It's also important for fathers to state expectations and give feedback to daughters too, and this needs to be done before they start to adopt the false hopes and dreams offered by the world.

- Σ Frame: 13 Disciplines in Dealing with Delectable Daughters (2018/1/29)
- Σ Frame: Teaching our daughters well is the early foundation of successful wife moulding (2020/2/14)

Men need to teach those within their domain of influence (e.g. male friends, children, and those we mentor) to become comfortable stating their expectations clearly, specifically, and confidently. It's better to break up before marriage because the couple's expectations / values / visions diverge intolerably, than to get divorced for the same reason, or to be stuck in a miserable marriage for that reason (AKA incompatible differences).

Introduction

In its simplest form, setting boundaries entails being honest in evaluating the terms of a relationship. This honesty would require one to know one's self and one's Christian identity well — including one's desires, wants, needs, values, and whether or not certain things are deal-breakers. Boundaries are enforced when deal-breakers are identified and appropriate measures are taken. This honesty allows both parties to assess the nature, strength, and value of the relationship (actual or potential), and to keep the relationship running in good order, no matter how close or distant the relationship it might be.

Depending on other contextual factors, setting boundaries can take the form of a demand or a negotiation, depending on how important the issue is. In this post, we'll review how demands can be made in different ways, and how these can contribute towards enforcing boundaries and correcting bad behaviors.

Types of Demands

Making demands is a topic that we've discussed at length in many previous posts.

- Σ Frame (Thedeti): What can a husband do in response to a rebellious wife? (2022-1-31)

Since I started learning about this dynamic, I've come to see that a husband can make demands in a number of ways, some verbal, and others nonverbal. Here's a summary. I've introduced descriptive names for each kind of demand to foster an efficient discussion.

Making Demands: In general, making demands is essentially when a man takes a directive leadership role that enforces or invites her submission and works towards establishing a Headship structure.

Direct Demands: The man directly asks the woman to change her behavior, or to do things differently. For example, "Would you wear your black dress instead of the red one?"

Implied Demands: Pointing out her failures, sins, and transgressions carries an implied demand for her to change her ways, or confess and repent. Women who don't believe they have the responsibility or the agency to change will resort to labeling this as "judgment": "Don't judge me!"

Intuitive Demands: When the man states his plans or expectations (i.e. for the marriage), then he is inviting her to step into his frame and cooperate with his plans. To do this effectively, the man needs to first make these plans/expectations crystal clear. Some examples include these lists of expectations from Derek, Jack, and Red Pill Apostle.

Circumstantial Demands: The man changes his schedule or behavior (e.g. the man gets into shape, or adopts a new habit), then she is forced to respond somehow.

Contextual Demands: The man is engaged in an activity in which his intentions are expressed through the context. It is up to the other to respond by cooperating with him or supporting him in the activity. For example, if you throw a ball at her, then it is naturally expected that she will catch it. Depending on the context, this may devolve into a delineation of his and her responsibilities. For example, if someone leaves a dirty cup in the sink, who will be expected to wash it?

Teaching: By its very nature, teaching imposes a fundamental demand for improvement. A man should make a regular habit of giving his wife (and daughters) Moral Guidance Based Feedback. When men take the effort to make their wives aware of how her false notions and unrealistic expectations (i.e. her Covert Contracts) obviates her exercise of agency and reduces her to the moral equivalent of a child, then a multitude of blessings will become manifest.

Name it to Change it!

There exists an interesting metaphysical phenomenon; in that when any certain behavior is called out, it acts as an ipso facto forced confession and an implied demand to change that behavior. In biblical language, this is described as "shining the light of truth into the darkness" (Matthew 5:13-16; John 1:4-5; 2 Corinthians 4:2-4; 1 John 2:9-11). This works not only with wives in marriage, but also for anyone in any kind of context.

I'll offer three case studies to illustrate how this works.

Case Study 1 — A Workplace Environment Shifts to a SMP and Back

EarlThomas786 told this story at Spawny's Space a while back.

> "So she called out her female colleagues for dressing to entice and they didn't like it. The hypocrisy is so thick, you need a knife to cut it. Women love to dress to entice but hate being called on it. In the end, it is not very businesslike.'
> It pops the bubble of the narrative "women good, men bad." And "blame the men for everything bad that happens to a woman." Women have seemed to lose all common sense and decency with feminism. Men are going to look at cleavage and tight fitting clothes and most women already know this… They aren't fooling anybody.
> And they always retort with "the 50s called, they want their narrative back." Perhaps if somebody put into their brains that dressing modestly shows off their dignity and 'empowers' them it might change minds."

This scenario is interesting because it is loaded with conflicting demands. By dressing to entice, the scantily dressed colleagues are making circumstantial demands for both the men's attention and for other women to compete with them for that attention. They're also making a contextual demand to turn the workplace into a SMP. The conscientious coworker who called them out is making a direct demand for them to tone it down, an implied demand for them to be more professional, and an intuitive demand for them to focus on their work and keep order and decorum in the workplace environment.

The hoettes threw a hyssy fit because they could not have their fun after being exposed, and then they unwillingly complied.

Note that in spite of all the forces working in the h0es' favor — men's lust, women's natural desire for attention, the default prerogatives of hypergamy, and the conflicting demands — calling out the behavior caused the behavior to change.

Case Study 2 — The Narcissistic Mother-in-Law

Eutrapelia2001 wrote about the woes of having a narcissistic mother-in-law.

> "For the past 11 years, even longer if you count the last part of dating where I started to see these issues, my wife has been embroiled in a two-front war with the fronts never occurring at the same time. She has a certifiable NPD mother with all the typical consequences of that situation, i.e. golden children, scapegoats, and the infamous flying monkeys. My wife has often been the scapegoat except when my wife is feeding her mother drama about our marriage."

First of all, it helps that Eutrapelia recognizes that he's dealing with a family (or "generational") curse — that is, it's a destructive dynamic that has a life of its own, it spreads from family member to family member, and gets repeated from generation to generation. Here, certain expressions of love are withheld (by scapegoating in this case), causing other family members to suffer, and then a reprieve of the suffering is used as a ransom or a method of control. IOW, it plays off of emotional needs (through a carefully controlled balance of drama and scapegoating) and ego affirmation (through conditional acceptance).

> "This dynamic starts off with a fight with her mom or one of her sisters. The family turns against her and she turns to me for guidance and comfort. I help her deal with the situation in a healthy fashion, working to establish healthy boundaries without cutting ties, but being willing to do so, if necessary. This setting of boundaries then becomes a source of family drama. However, after a time, my wife's mother will stop the scapegoating and slowly bring my wife back into her circle of influence. The price of admission, so to speak, is providing the mother with narcissistic supply by recounting examples of me putting my foot down on something (like where our daughter is to go for First Communion classes) and how dictatorial I am, etc."

It seems like Eutrapelia has come to understand how this destructive dynamic works. That's good! The identification of the problem is the first step towards correcting it.

> "This dynamic goes back and forth where my wife comes to me for comfort with family drama and then throws me under the bus with family and friends without a second thought, looking for comfort for her own ego and need to control. Then it is the "boundaries" that I attempted to have her set for her family are set against me under the advice of her mother. What makes this effective against my wife is that her mother never gave her approval or much love growing up. She is always seeking after it, even in adulthood. It doesn't matter if she has to create fissures and destroy the reputation of her husband in a way that only a woman can. I would also add that the mother-in-law is only too happy to split her daughter away from me in subtle and explicit ways because the MIL has come to realize that I have her number and won't allow her to manipulate me."

As you can see, the locus of the MILs power is in calling out the various behaviors of the other family members, labeling them as either a golden child or a scapegoat. She thereby changes and controls the faux truth narrative running in the family at any given time. All she has to do is affix blame to one person or another to create a twisted version of the personalities and motives involved, all in her favor of course.

> "It took me a while to wake up to this dynamic for a couple of reasons. First, no men in my past would talk about these kinds of dynamics or didn't understand them themselves. Second, I had never come across this level of skilled and deliberate manipulation. In a twisted fashion, I am awed by their prowess and have learned in many ways. Not being a naturally manipulative person, it has been a difficult path to understand this mentality and then learn to navigate it."

In writing these words, Eutrapelia is calling out his MIL's bad behavior. But he needs to call it out to his MIL's face for it to do him any good. Nevertheless, the fact that he is talking about it with other men is helping him gather his thoughts and words together, and this will gird him up for such a confrontation.

Next, he needs to make his wife understand this dynamic from an objective viewpoint, such that she will stand on his side when that confrontation occurs.* He needs to explain to her what he sees happening, just like he described here. Name it to change it! It will help if he does this at a time when she is in a better mood, and he will need patience and perseverance too, as it may require him to talk to her about it many times before her eyes can be opened, and even then it might take a while to see results. But when she begins to recognize the pattern, then she'll be able to view the situation more objectively, and see how unhealthy and damaging it is. And don't neglect prayer!

I haven't heard anything from Eutrapelia since this event, so I'm hoping that he's made some progress since then.

For those readers who are facing troublesome situations with their MIL, Dalrock wrote about how to deal with a troublesome MIL in two classic posts. Reading these are a must for men in this situation.

Case Study 3 — Bad Influences

I've mentioned this situation that my wife had with her mother a couple times before, most recently in Riding the Raging Rivulet (2022-10-13), but here I'll describe it in terms of making demands and setting boundaries.

My wife and her mother used to have this emotional enmeshment. (Not sure if that's the correct psychological term, but it is a good descriptor.) My MIL had this long running habit of controlling my wife's behaviors and general opinions of things by playing the blame-shame-game. My wife kept coming back for more because she wanted the attention. IOW, it made her feel loved. They were like this ever since my wife was a child.

I discovered this problem like this. After we married, my wife talked to her mother on the phone every day, sometimes for more than an hour. At first, I didn't think this in itself was a problem, but every time she talked with her mother, she was angry and distraught for several hours afterwards. I assumed my wife was upset about something they discussed, so it took me a while to figure out that her mother was the cause of her distemper. It only became clear to me when I saw that practically every time she talked with her mother, she was gritchy for the rest of the day. Once I identified her mother as the cause of her negativity, and not the content of their talk, I pointed this out to her. "Every time you talk to your mother, you're in a bad mood for the rest of the day!" Of course, this made her angry and she said I was hating on her mother and so on. But I continued to point this out every time it happened. After a few months, she started to believe me.

Name it to change it!

Eventually, a day came when I pointed this out to her and she asked me what she should do about this. (I waited until this time because it was important to her for me to let her see this dynamic for herself and desire a change, rather than for me to try to force a change of her behavior. IOW, I had to be patient and let her grow at her own pace.) So I told her, "Limit your phone calls with your mother to 10 minutes, once a week. If she calls more frequently, then don't answer, or else, answer and tell her you're too busy to talk right now and hang up." She didn't want to do this at first, but as the emotional turmoil continued to drag her down (amplified by my bringing her attention to it), she became more willing to follow my advice, and she made some effort to spend less time on the phone with her mother. As a result, she spent more time talking with me, and she was in a better mood too. Whenever I pointed out this change to her, she became more convinced that I was right about her and her mother. Not long after this, she really stuck to the "rule" of "10 minutes, once a week". Within a couple months, she was practically a different person! Eventually, a day came when she realized she was much happier than she was before and she thanked me for this.

Name it to change it!

Now we're on to the next thing — being thankful for the small blessings in life. I'm handling this in pretty much the same way. I started off by explaining to her how happiness is tied to thankfulness. Then after that, every time she complains or is stubbornly negative, I point out how the situation could be viewed as a "glass half full". She is slowly catching on.

In summary, I urged my wife to draw boundaries for herself, rather than me setting boundaries for her. It took time and patience, but now she's able to do this for herself.

Conclusions

To reiterate what I've said earlier, if men would call out bad habits and behaviors, and explain to their wives how the bad dynamic works, and how she can get control of the situation by drawing boundaries, then you'll be giving her a clear choice to do the right thing. (So many people continue doing the wrong thing or let bad habits continue because they're not sure what the right thing would be, or because they don't have the courage to face the situation, or because they don't know how to face the situation.)

Be that objective voice in her life, calling out directions for her to find her way out of the woods. Again, it takes patience.

Name it to change it!

Validation is about Losing Self-Control

Humility happens when the Lady's Libido Lights Up.

Introduction

I received an inquisitive email from a female reader who asked to remain anonymous. She brought up several questions related to the previous week's focus on Sexual Submission (2022-10-14).

She writes,

> "Your post, Validation (2022-10-11) sparked a few questions.
> Obviously every man wants Validational Sex (VS) from his wife. Every woman definitely wants Validational Sex.
> Question 1 — How does VS happen? You said that humility is an important part of validation. I never thought of this before I read your post because it seems counterintuitive. But after thinking it over I have to agree; validation doesn't happen without humility. But then, how does humility happen? Is it about how much your husband / wife can make you lose control, or is it about how much you can make your husband / wife lose control?"

Your description is exactly right. Losing self-control is a key element of being humbled. The one who loses self-control is the one being humbled. During emotional and sexual intimacy, one's true heart emerges. Outside a setting of intimate trust, this can be embarrassing or shameful, but when attraction and trust are present, it is humbling. This is essential for authentic bonding, learning, growth, and experiencing life. Also, humility is required to have a living faith, and I believe this is why it is said that God joins a husband and wife together on the marriage bed (Matthew 19:4-6; Mark 10:6-9). Ideally, both husband and wife should experience humility during sex, but it is crucial to the stability of the marriage for the wife to be humbled, as I will explain in the answer to the next question.

> "Question 2 — I have noticed that a lot of my husband's sexual satisfaction comes from ME losing control and going wild in the throes of passion, and not so much about HIM losing control. Our sexual interaction becomes hotter and wilder the more I lose control, and the more I lose control, the greater satisfaction he derives. So our sexual satisfaction is not so much about HIM getting off but the extent he can get ME off. Does that make sense? I am not a man but I suspect this is true for most husbands, not just my own."

I would agree that your impression of what gives your husband satisfaction is true for all men. Moreover, the following is true for both men and women.

- Sex is experienced by women as Validational if the man can make her lose control.
- Sex is experienced by men as Validational if he can make the woman lose control.

The common denominator is that a woman losing control (being humbled) is what makes sex Validational for both sexes!

> "Question 3 — I wonder if this desire for VS is hard wired into men — that it is not enough to satisfy him if he is getting off but not her. He needs to "take" her (past the limits of her self-control), and she needs to be "taken". He needs to RULE over her, body, heart, mind, and soul, and to the extent SHE is getting VS from him, that is the extent to which he is RULING. If it is not VS, then she is not being humbled and so HE is not "ruling" her."

Yes, I believe the desire for this kind of sex is hard wired into men. In fact, this is the crux of Scott's Axiom as it relates to sexual authority — the man rules over the woman, not just in word, but also in deed, and this ruling penetrates her heart, her mind, and her loins. Too many men have underestimated the importance and the strength of this desire or have dismissed it entirely, and have thereby defaulted to The Quiet Desperation of the Autopilot (2022-10-1).

> "This brings me to the next question…
> Question 4 — Is VS ONLY about sexual desire?
> Because if the above is true — VS is a man ruling his wife in the bedroom — then the important question is, "What leads to the VS?"
> Sir deti will say it is the woman's Sexual Attraction — and that is true — losing control is not going to happen without an intense attraction / arousal / desire. So sparks are important but it is not everything. Her humility and her willing submission also play an important part of it. If women are sexually attracted to only top 20% men, then either a man has to be in top 20% to get VS or he has to reconcile that he will never have VS. My husband is not in the top 20%, but he can give me VS anyhow, and if I'm having VS, then he's having it too!"

The answer to this question is complex and hotly debated in the Christian Manosphere. Thedeti's stance is the standard Red Pill stance. But personally, I'm of the opinion that although the various traits of attraction delineated by Red Pill lore (confidence, charisma, Game, HARPS, LAMPS, etc.) are certainly responsible for creating raw attraction, a man has to display dominance, or the ruling part of sexual authority that you described (in Question 3) to move a woman into damp thatch arousal territory. Without masculine authority "ruling over her", intersexual relationships degenerate into the situation deti describes as The Unsolvable Problem of The Modern Sexual/Relationship Market (2022-2-7). BTW, this is the norm without patriarchy and I only realized this years after living in a patriarchal society in which it is not the norm (Taiwan).

Other married men have agreed with me that deti's stance is limited to certain contexts common to gynocentric cultures and PUA subcultures, namely one in which the woman is already defiled and her expectations exceed what her SMV can draw. In this case (which is probably 85+% of the time in Western cultures), the man has to be top notch, and he has to Game her really hard and non-stop, which is exhausting for the man. And as deti et al. say, even this may not be enough. For most men in this situation, it's a lost cause.

Outside of this context (i.e. within a patriarchal social order), when a man can rule over his wife and rein in and/or channel her emotions outside the bedroom, then it becomes all that much easier to rule over her within the bedroom. It's like, when you restrict her passions in various ways, then her passion builds up and splurts out in the bedroom. I say this out of personal experience with my wife.

> "Question 5 — As a woman I have noticed that when I 'give' and not 'get' it gives me a sense of power over my husband — to know that HE is the one being humbled by desire and not ME. HE is the one losing control and not ME. Is that control?"

Definitely! The power dynamic is determined by who loses self-control in the heat of passion. The person who is proactively leading the interaction, creating pleasure for the other, and inundating his/her soul with waves of orgasms is in the power bird position.

> "Question 6 — I wonder if this ties back to Genesis 3:16 where sexual desire and control are interlinked. In other words, if I am humbled by my husband in the bedroom, then he is ruling over me. But if he is humbled by me in the bedroom, then I am ruling over him. If I am NOT humbled by my husband, then he is NOT ruling over me. If he is getting off but I am not, then he is submitting to me, and I am NOT submitting to him (at least in that respect) and that gives me power and to some extent control."

Yes, that's right. This is the one area in which wives ~~may~~ are instructed to exert authority (translated from ἐξουσιάζω, exousiazó) over their husbands, based on 1 Corinthians 7:3-5. I explained this dynamic in Sexual Authority and Sanctification (2022-8-8). I'll add that the way the church has espoused ignorance of this matter is one of the most significant ways that the church has failed men in general, leading to a dead bedroom epidemic within the church.

> "Question 7 — I think a lot of dead bedrooms are not so much lack of attraction but a CONTROL play. She can hold out by abstaining completely. But she can also hold out by refusing to lose control of her sexual passions. Either way, she is refusing to be humbled. She withholds VS and thereby exerts POWER. Would you agree?"

A brilliant observation. Yes, women can withhold sex entirely to prevent a man from having any sexual release, but she can also withhold humility and passion during sex to prevent a man from obtaining any sexual satisfaction. I would say both are sinful if done intentionally. However, men could do more to make it easier for women to open up and trust the man enough for her to lose control.

> "Question 8 — How much does a man's lovemaking skills come to play?
> In your post, Erotic Blueprints and Personality (2022-10-12) you wrote,
> "When I want her to have another Big O explosion, all I have to do is bite her ear or place my hands around her neck."
> In other words, the husband learns what gets his wife to lose control. He knows which buttons to push."

Too often, the topic of "lovemaking skills" is confined to the realm of positions, procedures, and techniques. But mastering a woman's sexual desire is much more complex than that. As I wrote in that post, it took me 2-3 years to figure her out – understanding her personality, learning to navigate her sexual blueprint, and removing any psychological barriers that made it difficult for her to become aroused.

Additional Thoughts

> "…there is the concept of one flesh – when 2 virgins become 1 flesh in marriage – it is the best chance for a man to rule over his wife. The wife knows no better; she has no scale of comparison. She loses it (VS + virginity to husband). He learns what gets her to lose control (what turns her on). The more turned on she is, the more VS they both get. The more ONE FLESH they become. The more HUMBLED she is. The more he RULES over her. The more BONDED they become."

Yes, there is also a spiritual component of sex that is closely tied to sexual authority. The blood covenant of virgin sex is intended to be God's way of forming a one flesh bond between husband and wife, thereby molding a wife's natural affections towards her husband and establishing his authority over her. But if Chad gets the honors, then other than the original Chad, only SuperChad Game Master can create Attraction / Arousal in her.

> "All of this explains why fornication is harmful — because the wife has already been "ruled" by other men. She knows how to lose control with others, and so she knows that authority doesn't come from her husband. She is sexually "liberated". If the next man does not match up immediately and blow past the last man, then she moves on. There is no chance, no learning curve for him to rule her."

Yes, a sexually liberated woman knows that being humbled, aroused, and losing control is a function of the man's SMV prowess, and is not connected to nor related to her presumptive husband's authoritative rule over her. Sexually liberated women are like a wild mustang — they are difficult to catch, tame, and domesticate. The sexual authority of a husband is basically destroyed when the wife has had previous sexual experiences.

Concluding Statements

As you can see, the most important element of a husband establishing sexual authority over his wife is in the act of taking her virginity on the wedding night, breaking her in for the first time, learning to master her sexual nature, and humbling her to achieve mutual Validation. As much as women may object to this characterization of masculine sexual authority and power, they deeply desire the Validating aspect of this consummation (e.g. see the popularity of 50 Shades of Grey). This is one of the main reasons why many women choose to ride the carousel if they cannot lock down that first man. They're searching for that deep soul satisfying humility that they experienced with their first (or best). They may find Validation in the short term, and only for a few years at most, but in the long term they usually learn that they cannot trust men. This is because men humbled her, but did not truly love her enough to stick it through. Women err in choosing men who can humble them and give them VS, while they ignore those men who would truly love them enough to commit. Men who can do both are rare and get snatched quickly.

A man might gain sexual authority over a wife with a history of sexperience, but only rarely, and only by the grace of God (e.g. Jack and Scott.)

It is a blessing for us to hear your testimony.

Game is an invitation to Humility

…and Humility leads to Validation.

I received an email from a female reader who brought up many questions related to the previous week's focus on Sexual Submission (2022/10/14). I covered 8 of her questions in yesterday's post, Validation is about Losing Self-Control (2022/10/24). This post will cover 3 more of her questions related to Game, Humility, and Validation.

She writes,

> "Question 9 — In the last section of your post about Sexual Submission: The Fear of Mismatch, you described why women are fascinated by the sexually experienced man. She is searching for the man who will humble her and make her have the wildest Validational Sex (VS) possible. She is confident he has made others lose control, so he will make her lose control too. If sexual experience is enough to grab a woman's interest, then how does Game fit into this?

One of the common criticisms of Game is that it is humiliating to women. However, the CH Maxim, "Chicks dig jerks" is true for this very reason. As I explained in yesterday's post, women need to be humbled in order to have VS. The whole point of PUA style Game is a man demonstrating that he can humble women outside the bedroom. This convinces women that he can also humble them inside the bedroom, so the interaction quickly escalates to sexual intercourse because women desperately want to lose self-control and have VS.

> "Question 10 — Deep Strength has condemned Game as an instrument of the flesh. But the idea I get from you is that Game is essentially charisma and confidence — good qualities for a man to have — and that this has > an important place in dealing with a spiritually immature woman. Is it really necessary or proper for married Christian men to Game their wives?"

The concept of Game is fraught with different definitions, motivations, and degrees of moral substance and value. For married Christian men, it may be better to think in terms of what his wife wants and needs, and what will humble his wife and bring her to her knees (literally), even things that she is unaware of or unwilling to talk about. This approach hearkens back to the basic mechanics of why Game works. However, this is A Revised Understanding of Game which is quite different from the old PUA concept of Game as a toolbox for creating raw attraction, which IMO, is a simplistic and somewhat outdated assessment of intersexual congress. I've come to have a greater appreciation of the Spiritual Significance and Social Value of Game.

To answer your question, I would say that it is beneficial for all men to develop their Game, but only necessary for some men, especially those men who have a wife who is spiritually weak or defiled, namely…

- Women with a weak faith.
- Women who are very young.
- Women who lack moral agency.
- Women who are emotionally immature.
- Women who are defiled / have a history of sexperience.
- Women who are very attractive and have been spoiled with a lot of attention.
- Women who are codependent, dysfunctional, traumatized, or who have psychological disorders, e.g. Bipolar, BPD, NPD, etc.

The problem is that most (???) Western women fall into one or more of these categories, so I have to say the generalized answer is that Game is beneficial in vetting out such women and it is absolutely necessary for men married to such a woman. It is hoped that such a woman can grow up and develop moral agency at some point in time, but until that time, there is little other recourse than wisdom, prayer, and Game.

IMO, the problem surrounding a lack of sexual attraction / arousal which Thedeti often describes can be shored up with some Game. When men can't or won't learn Game, then relationships with these kinds of women will get progressively worse until Thedeti's nuclear option becomes necessary. So instead of letting a wayward wife's shenanigans and sh!t tests rule the roost, I think Game is a better method of managing a wife and keeping the relationship more pleasant than not.

> "Question 11 — On the other side, men want a wife who is a virgin — a woman who has never lost control nor has been ruled by anyone else other than him. I would imagine VS with a virgin would be intrinsically satisfying to a man as he knows HE is the only one that has made her have VS and her loss of control is ONLY by him. Does that make sense?"

Yes, that's right. When dealing with a virgin, obtaining Validational Sex and sanctification is rather simple, straightforward, and easy to achieve for several reasons.

1. She's fresh, innocent, and unspoiled (although she'll probably be a PITA).
2. He can learn her hot buttons / erotic blueprint first hand.
3. Since he was the first to pioneer her hot buttons, he has first dibs on her heart.
4. She belongs exclusively to him in a way that no other man ever can.
5. A man can be confident that she is not given to losing control randomly and spontaneously with other men.
6. He can take some precautions to protect her from being Gamed and plowed by other men.
7. The interaction is not cluttered and polluted with any psychological baggage resulting from her having a sexual history.

This ties back to Deep Strength's post about Why expectations of men and women are out of control (2022/10/14), which I expanded upon in The Wages of Sin are Paid in Marriage (2022/10/15). Furthermore, Manosphere Highlights Daily has a video that explains how women become spoiled, not just by sexperience, but merely by getting widespread unfettered attention!

Why are women willingly submissive to authorities, but not to their husbands?

Introduction

In The parallels of temptation with sex and marriage (2022/2/8), Deep Strength wrote,

> "Women have no trouble submitting to their boss at work or their teacher in school or other human authorities because it is normal. But God forbid they submit to the husband to whom they committed their life to, who loves them the most, and the one they vowed to be with before God."

I too have noticed this behavior with everlasting chagrin.

Bardelys the Magnificent made an attempt to break this down.

> "I think "normal" is an incorrect diagnosis. It's because work and school are spaces that do not belong to her, and naturally she has no right of input. Home, at best belongs to both of you, and at worst belongs to her, so she will feel the need to control, or at least put her two cents in as forcefully as she can get away with. She will not see the house as her husband's domain, where she is allowed to live as long as she tends to her duties. Hence, no respect for headship. Perhaps this is why women were not allowed to own property: she can't control it if she doesn't have a claim on it."

I would not say "normal" is incorrect, but there IS much more to it. So here I'll attempt to complete the diagnosis.

Submission to Secular Authorities

At least part of women's desire to control her husband vs. her ready submission at the office has to do with accepting defined hierarchy roles. Places like work and school are social settings that have a clearly laid out structure of authority. There is no question of who is in charge at the office, or in a classroom. There is no dispute because she and everyone else knows that it is the boss' / teacher's right to make decisions for the workplace or classroom respectively.

Second, although a woman can be an integral part of this structure of authority, she is not in a position to make executive decisions. If there is contentiousness over this point, she'll immediately be taken to task, put in her place, and maybe even sent to the carpet. If she tries to assume executive power without being duly delegated to do so, then this action has a decent probably that it will be reported to a much higher authority and may end in termination.

Thirdly, although she may have a domain of responsibility and influence, the workplace itself does not belong to her, and so naturally she has no right of input about how work and social intercourse is to be done. I suppose there are some rare cases in which the woman is a CEO or business owner, but that is far from the norm.

Confusion about Authority in the Home

Traditionally, the home has always been the wife's domain, and this is not an unbiblical set up. (See Titus 2:3-5.) Women will always expect to retain vestiges of Traditionalism in those specific ways that suit their interests.

Home, at best belongs to both the man and the woman as a couple joined in matrimony, each having their respective spheres of interests and responsibilities. But the problem erupts when the wife does not recognize the husband's authority as clearly ordained by God, and so she gets the notion that the home belongs only to her, with the man being expected to perform certain responsibilities, or the man's input being ignored entirely. Whenever there is a question of authority or responsibility, then she thinks it is her place to resolve the question. Whenever there is a problem, then she thinks it is because her husband failed to do things exactly as she wanted. These false assumptions make it more difficult for a wife to understand that the home is her husband's domain first and foremost. A husband who does not unequivocally set that he is the authority, that it is his family and that she is one who God gave him to be his suitable help, allows his wife to continue on under these false impressions.

All this confusion results in a struggle for control that will continue until the wife can recognize that (1) she's claiming authority that isn't hers, (2) she's undermining her husband's authority, and (3) she ruins the home in doing so. Meanwhile, the husband and family are in for a world of trouble.

Here's a question to consider. When a woman nests, and they all do, is she nesting to make the home a place of rest for him, or is she doing what she wants for her own purposes? The answer to that question of motivation will tell you what she thinks about her role in the household. The end result may be the same, but the heart condition matters and will play out in other areas of the marriage.

Resisting Submission to Husband

In addition to this confusion about her authority and responsibility in the home, women are strongly averse and resistant to being submissive to husbands. Here are a few factors that contribute to this malady.

- Lack of Trust
- Lack of Respect
- Lack of Attraction
- Women's natural propensity to desire power and usurp authority from men, AKA "The Curse of Eve".

All this makes it more difficult for wives to wake up.

Titus 2:3-5 instructs that older wives should admonish younger wives to be discreet, chaste, homemakers, good, obedient to their own husbands, that the word of God may not be blasphemed.

Women are quick to pick out the dominating aspects of being a homemaker, but because of all the things mentioned above, they are slow to adhere to the other habits in Titus 2:3-5, especially being obedient to their own husbands.

Again, the 'why' matters when it comes to what a woman does in the home.

Conclusions

How much work it takes for the husband to make his wife understand God's order for the family is dependent on his constitution as a man and her belief in God and the truth of His word. Having fellowship with like-minded Christian couples of good repute and having wise older women following Titus 2:3-5 can help immensely.

Choose your woman carefully and vet like crazy for all characteristics you'll need in a wife to build your life and family.

Introduction

In his post, "If she loves you, then she'll be a pain in the @ss!" (PITA) (2022/2/23), Jack talked about discerning opportunities to mold a quirky young woman into a worthy wife.

> "…the good thing about the PITA is that what you see is what you get. This is a benefit to marriage minded men, because the task cut out for moulding them into wives is clearly evident. There is no emotional baggage, and no shroud of vain pretenses that must be inveigled before getting down to the business of establishing moral feedback loops and trust.
> Marriage and having children will also shape out the PITA; not because of any effort on her own part, but because husbands do the hard work of moulding their belovedly quirky PITA girls into wondrous wives."
> "[When wives are] just being their natural naughty selves… they trust their husbands enough to let their inner PITA come through. This is actually a good sign for the relationship, as this is an impressionable moment that wise husbands can use to teach and mould their wives."

Jack closes with this.

> "To have the best chances at marriage, a man has to do the hard work of hammering his own woman into shape. So choose one that is valuable raw material, one that is soft and malleable, and not already emotion/heart-hardened in the forge of sexperience."

I question whether this is truly applicable on a broad basis.

Emerging from the cocoon of her father's guidance…

Don't Get Your Hopes Up

Roosh, the godfather of the Manosphere himself who turned to Christ in his later years, speaks against this in his most recent post. The very first of his 33 admonishments to men about the nature of women is this one…

> 1. Assume that you will never change her
> "It's a fatal temptation for a man to look at a woman, especially a young one, as a tabula rasa, a blank slate for him to mold into his perfect, traditional wife who bakes cookies and croissants all day. Such a man sees all her flaws and thinks that, with time, he can eradicate them one by one as if using a laser beam. Or he sees her annoying personality traits and thinks that he can dampen them with a sort of punishment-reward stratagem. This is delusion. Who she is is who she is, and if she does change, it will be entirely dependent on her own will and its cooperation with God to serve the good. Any immediate change you do see in her, without much in the way of effort, should be viewed with suspicion."
> "Do not assume you will change her. Do not assume you can even get her to grow her hair an inch longer than it already is. Do not assume she will change at all. Of course a woman will do many things to please her man, such as to lose a few pounds or dress differently, and she may be motivated to improve for you in a way that she didn't while single, but don't expect immediate, permanent change."
> Roosh Valizadeh: 33 Things Christian Men Should Know About Women(2022/10/17)

Given the current state of the SMP in the West, I'd say this is sound advice.

However, we have seen some evidence of successful wife molding. Jack latched onto this around 2018 and has tried to figure out how this works. Since then he's found that there are so many nuances and contextual issues at play that I can barely understand them all. Of note, there is one post that stands out to me; Teaching our daughters well is the early foundation of successful wife moulding (2020/2/14) makes the salient point that whether a woman is humble and teachable all depends on how well she was raised. True enough. But from the perspective of men already married, or even men seeking a wife, I think it's better to say that it only happens by faith and by God's grace.

Can she trust you with ALL of her heart, like she has with her Daddy?

Points to Ponder

Earlier this month, Jack wrote a few posts about how he was able to mold his wife to some extent. What I think he has failed to emphasize is the amount of time and work it took to do this. From our private discussions through email, I know it also required Jack's older friends' wives talking with Jill, giving her some guidance, and praying for her. And this happened in Taiwan — a patriarchal society!

Personally speaking, my wife has changed her behavior over the past 2.5 years. It's taken some hard boundaries that have life altering thedeti-esque consequences, such as, "If you do / don't do (fill in the blank behavior) we are through, no questions asked." Other instances are me showing her what the bible says on a topic and setting the expectation that she comply, such as obedience. Contentious instances are few and far between compared to the past, only happening when her headstrong demeanor gets the best of her which is usually every other month. I don't believe that my wife has influence from older friends, which leads me to believe that a husband alone can make his wife change, although it would not hurt to have older women's guidance to help out.

RedPillBoomer said he had success in molding his wife, but he also notes that she was quite moldable to begin with.

That's an important point. If your girlfriend/wife is not moldable to begin with, then you can forget about molding her into being moldable, as you are late to the game at that point. But if you're able to start molding her early in the relationship when she is your girlfriend, then it's much easier and less risky. I'd also posit that the longer she is away from her father's guidance before you meet her, the harder the task of molding will be.

Oscar noted,

> "There's no Biblical requirement for a woman to submit to a man before they're married, but if she's rebellious before marriage, it'll only get worse after marriage."

There are actually two important points in Oscar's statement, one I agree with and one that we need to examine further. Whole heartedly, I agree that "it'll only get worse after marriage", and I hope men wise up enough to avoid finding out how true this is for themselves. Secondly, while women are not required to submit to men in general, there are two men in particular who provide covering and to whom they are to be obedient. Prior to marriage the woman's father holds this position and then obviously the husband takes over the work once she is his wife. We get an inkling of the father's authority in Numbers 30 where he is able to disavow his daughter's pledges when he first hears about them, just like a husband can. This is one of the reasons that watching how a daughter interacts with her father is a good indication of what she will be like as a wife.

Waiting to be molded…

Deep Strength also responded to Oscar's statement with some good points in Pre-marriage headship and submission (2022/2/24).

> "The key then, for both sides, is to make good "bids and responses" in terms of proper headship-submission and love-respect lines. The man should show leadership and see how she follows. The wife should be trying to follow and see if he exhibits good headship. The husband should love his wife and see if his wife respects him. The wife should respect her husband and see if it helps him love her more. Building up these good cycles and habits start to hedge against bad behavior from cropping up and going into more destructive behavior cycles."

The glaring point that no one has stated is that men are not likely to transform an unteachable woman into one that is teachable, unless he's got so much charisma and sexual authority over her that she is doing cartwheels in a mini-dress just to get his attention, which is probably less than 5% of all cases, and probably about 0.1% (one out of a thousand) of these cases are women that are actually above the man's attraction threshold.

The vast majority of men are going to have to prod and test a woman to gauge her willingness to trust and submit. So it helps to be a good picker, as I discussed in A suitable ride with low mileage (2022/4/25).

Conclusions

In total, this only reinforces the magnanimous importance of identifying one's pool of eligibles, enlarging that pool by working on yourself, reading IOIs, gauging for Heart Trust, and vetting before marriage.

Set your boundaries and expectations and then gently correct her behavior when she exceeds them. If she responds well to your guidance over an extended period of time (at least a year) you may have a good one. DeepStrength has written extensively about this so I won't rehash the points here, but it suffices to say that if you are dating a PITA and she is obstinate in her PITAness when you gently push back on her behavior, then you are playing with fire.

Withholding Sex is a very Destructive Form of Wifely Rebellion

Sexual withholding is a problem that all too many men suffer from that has been discussed at length before on this blog. Christianity and Masculinity offered some insights to this problem in The goal for Christian husbands whose wives deny them should not be sex but their wife's repentance (2019-10-29). The main point of this post was that husbands should stay focused on their mission, do their best to love their wives as the bible commands, and not let their need for sex make them subservient to their wives. Commenters Joe and Jonadab added some noteworthy points.

In itself, this is sound Christian advice. However, there are a couple major hang-ups with this approach.

1. A wife who is sexually disinterested or "sexually lazy" (to coin a new word: slazy) is actually weaving a subtle rebellion that works through attrition. As such, it is very difficult for a husband to persevere in this condition because it's much MUCH easier for an uninterested wife to refuse sex than it is for a husband to go long periods without.
2. GreyGhost and Sharkly emphasized the valid point that a husband's godly leadership (however you want to interpret that) doesn't always lead to the wife's repentance (in the form of creating attraction and/or increasing her interest in performing her sexual duties to her husband).

All this is to say that if a man's wife is frigid for any length of time, for any reason, then the marriage has become a snare. The relationship will slowly drift off to hades, and take him along with it. Instead of "fighting the good fight of faith", the husband's battle degenerates into the grinding daily task of just trying to keep his faith intact. Blue balled bitterness, frenzied frustration, and lecherous lust become the abiding battle for these husbands, such that the very idea of being obedient to God and loving a wife unconditionally becomes little more than an abstract ideal that cannot even be hoped for. Being reminded of this by others only adds to the sting. If this is a recalcitrant and recurring problem, and the wife has no interest in repenting of her neglect, then what hope is there to improve the union?

All that said, I want to look beyond the issue of sexual defrauding for a moment and look at the larger picture. Sexual defrauding is just one way a wife can be disobedient to God. There are many other ways that wives regularly participate in active or passive rebellion. But it is easy for married men to focus on the lack of sexual affection because that is a form of rebellion that affects them most sorely. It's easy for men to make it about sex (or the lack thereof), because that is what men want and need out of marriage. But the real problem is not about sex at all. It's only about sex from the perspective of a sexually defrauded husband. The deeper problem is an issue of the wife having a heart that has been corrupted by the things of this world (e.g. feminism, FOMO, liberalized sexual values and habits, etc.), and has given herself over to her inner Eve.

The Wrong Way to Respond to Wifely Rebellion

When we look around, we see many men who are living in a tedious marital situation of daily discord, tension, and wifely rebellion, and running on Autopilot for years on end. The reason why wifely noncompliance continues indefinitely is because husbands buckle and revert to pedestalization and the "Happy wife" approach, which is a kind of feedback that places her in a position of authority, and this gives her enough control to value the relationship for what she can get out of it, and not for the blessings of having a Headship covering.

RedPillBoomer and Red Pill Apostle noted that some hopelessly Blue Pilled men tolerate their wives intolerable behaviors simply because they crave female companionship and are afraid to be alone, and they don't have the courage to pursue their desires and/or follow God.

Of course, all these stances are a denial of masculine identity and an inversion of God's created order. There's no way anything can work out. The marriage becomes the Devil's playground — an agit-prop theater of suffering and shame with no redemption in sight.

How should a Husband Respond to Wifely Rebellion?

It seems that the most important piece of information that is missing in the post at Christianity and Masculinity is not how to deal with the problem of wifely rebellion (because the Bible is clear on this), but how to deal with it effectively.

Trey emphasized the importance of discipline, and I agree. There is a severe drought of information about how to administer discipline, and this is why I've studied this extensively and written many posts on the subject.

Of course, it's better if discipline can be imposed in an encouraging way. These positive reinforcements include things like Agree and Amplify, Command Presence, objectifying her in a playful way, pleasant surprises, and so on. But a man has to be on top of his Game to pull that off, and she needs to be at least somewhat willing and pliable.

OTOH, often times people won't learn until it begins to cost them and bring hurt and pain. In this case, a husband can do things that ramp up the tension and press her into a decision, which basically amounts to a host of different approaches for which the appropriateness and effectiveness sharply hinges on the context. Some of these negative reinforcements might include married Dread Game (e.g. spending less time with her), withdrawing emotionally (e.g. ignoring her, not taking her seriously), or humbling her (e.g. mocking her, giving her the dreaded smirk, etc.). Snapper had some good comments about this approach that could be compiled into an essay.

Employing a mixture of positive and negative reinforcement will increase the drama which is known to hook women quite effectively. Most women will get the message if the husband exerts Frame, employs a little Game, and sticks with it for a while.

The bottom line is that she has to respond, and she'll do so either by submitting, or else she'll have an affair, or start planning for a divorce. But she'll make a decision sooner or later because women cannot bear the stress, tension, guilt, and shame of living in rebellion forever. If she can, then a man is probably better off to let that termagant go.

So if you have an immature or unbelieving wife who insists on being degenerate and feral, then you have to be kind of the same. So play up the Game. Otherwise, the marriage is doomed, and depending on how much you've got invested in your marriage, possibly your life and your children's lives will be lost as well. If she is particularly fractious and unruly, and a man is no good at Game, then a man may have to take deti's nuclear approach.

It's her choice whether or not to submit. But you have to give her that choice.

Conclusions

The unpleasant truth here is that it takes work to improve a marriage, and all of the burden is placed on the man and none on the wife. But even if a man does the work, there's very little likelihood and no guarantee of actual improvement — unless the wife can somehow come around to a broken hearted repentance.

If you're a Christian man intent on achieving sanctification, then her non-repentance is totally unacceptable. As important as it might be, the main problem with the husband attempting to solve this problem by being obedient (through cooperating with the work of the Holy Spirit) is that it doesn't guarantee the wife's repentance, which is taken to be a necessary condition for sanctification to occur. If the wife is unresponsive to the Holy Spirit, and she really doesn't care about spiritual growth, or the health of the marriage, then what can a Christian man do? In this case, a marriage to such a woman is little more than an open door allowing Satan into the man's life. The neglect of adopting appropriate gender roles and a wife's lack of submission is exactly why the Bible warns us "Do not be yoked to an unbeliever", and not so much because of a presumed difficulty in deciding whether to attend church as a family or not, as many have been led to believe.

Ultimately, as much as husbands would like their wives to be obedient to God and affectionate, respectful, and submissive to husband, God has granted women the free will to do as they please. It all depends on how much she values the relationship, or more specifically, how much the feedback assuages her ego and self-image, and how secure she feels under his Headship covering. Her decision on this is mostly out of his hands, really. If she has already made up her mind to underprioritize or ditch the relationship, then any obedience to God on his part only postpones the inevitable and drags out the suffering.

As Thedeti wrote,

> "At the end of the day, your Game, your charisma, and your efforts don't matter unless the woman responds to them in some way. There needs to be a change in her. There needs to be a heart change from the inside out. Yes, you can help influence that, you can express your desires, preferences and expectations; but none of that matters without her willingness, from the inside out, to at least try to respond to your influence and to meet your expectations. In the final analysis it's about whether she wants to stay with you or at least is willing to do what it takes to stay with you."
> "If she's not willing to change, to be molded, nothing else will matter, and you'll need to cut your losses and move on, no matter what that looks like."

I know this may not sound like encouragement, but actually, it is. And it all points back to what Deep Strength was saying in his post: Be obedient to God and follow your mission… whether or not the wife tags along or not!

> But if the unbeliever departs, let him depart; a brother or a sister is not under bondage in such cases. But God has called us to peace.
> 1 Corinthians 7:15 (NKJV)*

It's her choice whether or not to submit. Trust God and don't be afraid of giving her that choice.

Skillfully Evading the Command

We're all familiar with the commands in Ephesians 5:22-33, namely that wives should respect their husbands and husbands should love their wives. Husbands naturally love their wives, but it seems that wives find it very difficult to respect their husbands aside from the occasional libidinous impulse, if there happens to be any. Wives don't seem to understand that her enthusiastic lovemaking is perhaps the most powerful way that they can show respect to their husbands.

Another thing that wives find hard to comprehend is that God intended sex within marriage to be freely given in love. Done this way, sex is the glue that creates the mysterious bond of the covenant. That sex is to be freely given, both by husbands and wives, is the basis of the OT law on the subject that was at least in part the basis for Paul writing 1 Corinthians 7:1-8.

The sacrament of marriage requires that both parties engage in acts that the other person is entitled to. Not because they "earned it" but because it's part of marriage.

Sex is part of marriage.

When a wife withholds sex, when she could otherwise participate willingly, she is violating the commandment in order to use sex for her personal gain on some level, whether what she desires is comfort, power, control, goods, or services. This is the definition of a common prostitute, and whether there is one John or one hundred, the definition holds.

NO CHURCH teaches this, not even confessional / sacramental ones.

There may a remnant of churches teaching these truths on marriage and holding wives accountable as well as husbands, but because of women's solipsistic nature, it is doubtful whether this has any positive effects.

Scott wrote,

> "It would be interesting to find out (I'm not sure how) if it has ever "worked."
> "Worked" in this situation, I think, would actually look something like:
> Woman hears the teaching and is convicted. […] But she decides to try it. […] Over time, she finds the relationship grows deeper and more emotionally intimate BECAUSE of the increased PHYSICAL intimacy. The marriage syncs up better, and she reports back to the group."

Following the Biblical Commandment is not necessarily True Repentance nor Authentic Submission

In response to Scott's comment, once upon a time, I do remember reading a comment from a woman to this effect. But I can't remember where I saw it and I have no idea how to find it now. The gist of her comment was that she applied herself to following the commandment in 1 Corinthians 7:5 regardless of how she felt about it, and she was pleasantly surprised to find that it "worked", according to her estimations. Her lugubrious husband came back to life and after a time he became more loving and eventually gave her what she wanted from him.

Imagine that!

It wasn't clear whether she was surprised to discover this result, or if it was her intention all along, but either way it's the same. I mean, when you think about it, even though this woman was convinced that she was following 1 Corinthians 7:5, it is not obvious that this woman had truly repented from having a transactional mindset about marital lovemaking. IOW, she was basically using the Biblical command to expedite her harlotry. The Bible simply helped her realize that she needed to humble herself and put out in order to garner higher wages for being a presumptive wife.

In many ways, this story is not drastically different from Red Pill Apostle's heartbreaking story.

> "Withholding sex had always been an issue with my wife, but after the birth of our second child the withholding crossed the line into clinical sexlessness and I basically gave up asking because the rejection hurt too much.
> Approaching our 15th anniversary she began saying she wanted to go on a trip. The marriage had been sexless (less than 5x annually) for over 2 years at this point and I told her that I didn't want to go anywhere with her because we weren't having sex. She said she'd have sex twice per week with me if that is what would make me feel happy enough to travel with her. She followed through with the goal in mind and then within a few months of the anniversary trip being over gave me some BS excuses and went right back to withholding. Common prostitute under the guise of marriage."

In both cases, we see women who abused their husbands by denying marital consummations, and were only interested in disrobing and lying on their backs for a few minutes in order to get something they wanted.

It is interesting for us to observe that even though women might be obedient enough to see positive results, it may not change their transactional view of sex. Wives understand very clearly how they can exert power over their husbands through their sexual authority, but they are tempted to abuse this power for their own purposes and are reluctant to disabuse themselves of this power. I suspect that harlotry is just as much a part of female nature as hypergamy is.

If a wife actually becomes better bonded to her husband as a result of being obedient to God through submitting to her husband in the bedroom, then this result is chocked up by the grace of God.

At this rate, we'll be waiting a looong time before any Christian wives start following 1 Peter 3:6 without caveat or apology!

Case Study — Jack and Jill

From these accounts, we can see that a wife's obedience to the commandment is not enough to change her into an affectionate loving wife, much less a sex bunny. The core issue to be addressed is for her to repent of having a transactional mindset about sex.

I caught my wife doing this a few years ago (expecting things from me in return for sex). In a long dry philosophical diatribe, I gently explained to her that marriage is about commitment, love, and sex, and that if a wife doesn't think this way but she has a transactional mindset about sex instead, then that makes her a prostitute, not a wife. It took a moment for the truth of my words to sink into her conscious awareness and grab hold of her conscience, but when it did, I saw her countenance flash lightning from hell. She was so angry that she withheld the Fun for a couple weeks, but she never did that again.*

As time went on, I was pleased to discover that this revelation had evinced a regularly genuine display of affection from her without much expectation other than my own enthusiastic responses. Occasionally I will remind her that I enjoy her company more when she is warmly affectionate and sexually playful. She'll respond by making more of an effort to be that way. But after a while, she'll forget and I'll have to remind her again.

Conclusions

A wife's willingness to engage in the duties unique to marriage (being naked and rubbing body parts together) creates an atmosphere of humility. Humility is quite helpful in creating an interaction in which she is more open and teachable, but genuine repentance doesn't happen until you put your middle finger on her sin in a way that she can swallow and not in a way that permits her to wallow. This is a bit of a sideshow trick in itself, and even if you can evoke a repentance in the penthouse, the results are highly dependent on context. TITS, if you're having regular sexual congress, her repentance is more likely to bring her submission. But if you shine a red light on her sin when she's been out of service for a long while, she's more likely to haughtily dismiss your words, dig in her heels, respond with a tit-for-tat vengeance, and continue rebelling.

It all comes back to Trust — Heart Trust in particular.

Overall, this resonates with Deep Strength's post, The goal for Christian husbands whose wives deny them should not be sex but their wife's repentance (2019/10/29).

 This is an example of the strategem, Name it to Change it! (2022/10/21).*

 This is an example of making demands for better bids, as I wrote about in How To Get A Better Response From Your Girl (2018/2/27).*

What we've learned about Feminine Submission

Is she a maidenly Mother or a meretricious Mustang?

Readership: All; Men; Married Men; Marriage Minded Men;
Theme: Feminine Submission
Length: 1,600 words
Reading Time: 9 minutes

Introduction

I'm relieved that this will be the last post for this month's theme about Feminine Submission. It has been exhausting! There's been way too many posts and topics to cover under this theme and it just keeps unfolding. Looking back, I think this could have been a 2 or 3 month long theme!

This post collects some things we've learned, and offers comprehensive answers to some basic questions about Female Submission. Posts are listed in 4 groups of weekly topics, each followed by some conclusions about that topic.

Week 1 – Identifying Feminine Submission

1. Σ Frame (Red Pill Apostle): The Value of Feminine Humility (2022/10/4)
2. Σ Frame (Jack): Nita Marie's threesome with her second husband and God (2022/10/5)
3. Σ Frame (Jack): The Glory of Submission and Humility in Helping (2022/10/6)
4. Σ Frame (Jack): 16 Permutations of Submission (2022/10/7)

Women need some type of covering, whether it be a father, husband, or big brother gubmint. Otherwise they feel insecure and grasp for control. Even if/when she has a covering, if she is made privy to any of the weaknesses of that covering or if she lacks any particular amenities or pleasantries in the arrangement which she expects or feels entitled to, then she'll be itching to usurp control.

For a single woman, her submission to God is most important for her spiritual life. But for a married woman, her submission to her husband is most important for both her spiritual life and her marriage life.

Female humility and submission are immensely valuable, but also very difficult to cultivate within marriage. Women who discover the tremendous value of feminine humility and submission tend to wh0re themselves out for attention and money rather than faithfully apply it towards blessing a husband and family.

Week 2 – The Rodeo of Feminine Submission

1. Σ Frame (Jack): Sexy (2022/10/10)
2. Σ Frame (Jack): Validation (2022/10/11)
3. Σ Frame (Jack): Erotic Blueprints and Personality (2022/10/12)
4. Σ Frame (Jack): Riding the Raging Rivulet (2022/10/13)
5. Σ Frame (Jack*): Sexual Submission (2022/10/14)
6. Σ Frame (Jack*): The Wages of Sin are Paid in Marriage (2022/10/15)

About post 1, my experience living in Taiwan has informed me that it is quite possible for women to be alluring, demure, faithful, feminine, humble, sultry, and vulnerable all at once — the core traits of sexiness. IOW, women can be sexy but NOT sexually liberated.

But in the West these days, most all women are sexually liberated, even those who are rather far removed from being Sexy. Thus, "sexy" is equivalent to sexual liberation, and this has become the cultural norm. Western Men, including Christian Men, are so used to this that they are confused about (1) the core traits of feminine sex appeal, (2) the moral and social value of feminine sex appeal, (3) what Christian femininity is supposed to look like, and (4) that these things are not necessarily incompatible. Some readers even accused me of altering definitions of commonly used words and religious terminology in order to make this argument. Well, you're welcome to take these observations on faith, or else call me crazy, but the former might be more helpful.

Sexually liberated women, including most all Western women, are like a wild mustang — they are difficult or impossible to catch, tame, and domesticate. Whether it is difficult or impossible all depends on the character of the man. For the rough riding ranch hand with years of experience, it is difficult. For greenhorn Opie, it's impossible.

Overall, I agree with RedPillBoomer that it's not worth the effort. But for men already married to such a woman, it is necessary. Posts 2-5 relayed some methods for making progress, while post 6 reported some consequences that may need to be shouldered.

In writing about these things, it was difficult for me to discourage Opies from the false confidence of thinking they can ride the bull, while at the same time encourage unfortunate married men striving to become old ranch hands.

Week 3 – Managing Feminine Submission

1. Σ Frame (Jack*): Women submit to their Head (2022/10/17)
2. Σ Frame (Red Pill Apostle, Jack): What does a Proverbs 31 relationship look like? (2022/10/18)
3. Σ Frame (Red Pill Apostle): Laying out Boundaries (2022/10/19)
4. Σ Frame (Jack): Laying out Expectations (2022/10/20)
5. Σ Frame (Jack): Name it to Change it! (2022/10/21)

All women are submissive to someone or something.

Most men who are crazy or horny enough to commit themselves to a relationship have poorly formed expectations, and therefore fail to communicate them. Also, enforcing boundaries is low on priorities, or they are afraid to enforce boundaries out of fear of losing the opportunity to consolidate on this aspect of a potential domain. Moreover, the Headship qualities of marriage are spoiled from the onset. It is really difficult to change this condition once it is in place and the relationship has gained momentum in this direction.

Week 4 – The Social and Metaphysical Dynamics of Feminine Submission

1. Σ Frame (Jack*): Validation is about Losing Self-Control (2022/10/24)
2. Σ Frame (Jack*): Game is an invitation to Humility (2022/10/25)
3. Σ Frame (Red Pill Apostle, Jack): Why are women willingly submissive to authorities, but not to their husbands? (2022/10/26)
4. Σ Frame (Red Pill Apostle, Jack): Very few women can be Molded. (2022/10/27)
5. Σ Frame (Jack): It's her choice whether or not to submit. (2022/10/28)
6. Σ Frame (Jack): Repentance and Submission (2022/10/30)

One big concept we covered (in post 1) is that Validation involves Humility. A woman is humbled when a man rules over her and she experiences this as Validation. Without the ruling and the humility, women will not perceive intercourse as Validating and will view sex as a chore, or worse (e.g. sour gr@pe juice). Stroking her ego as well as her pleasure synapses will help keep her in this Frame.

The more complex formula is…

Validation = Domination + Defilement –> Humility + Ego Affirmation –> Her Feeling Loved

Here it should be noted that Sanctification and Defilement have many similarities, and the thing that sets them apart is the context. Sex sanctifies a woman to one man and defiles her to all others. Thus, sex contributes to sanctification within marriage and to defilement outside of it.

Another major thing we learned (in post 2) is that the underlying effect of Game is to humble a woman in order to soften her defenses. Hence,

Game –> Humility –> Her Feeling Loved

This is why I advocated using Game with a contentious / defiled / rebellious wife. If she doesn't respond to Christian love, she may still respond to feeelings of love. (I have a post in the works that will explain this connection in more detail.)

On the topic of Game, one particularly contentious reader wrote to me privately saying,

> "[Your arguments] fail miserably out of not knowing Red Pill nor Game!
> A TRUE Christian woman submits and needs NOT to be gamed. Do you NOT know this?"

I would correct his statement to read, "A SPIRITUALLY MATURE Christian woman submits and needs NOT to be gamed." Although it does stand to reason that if a wife utterly refuses to submit, then she is likely neither mature nor Christian. My apologies if this was not already made abundantly clear in post 17.

Finally, my last post emphasized that her willing submission does not necessarily involve nor produce a change of heart. Her repentance is necessary to do this. This hearkens back to what Deep Strength wrote in The goal for Christian husbands whose wives deny them should not be sex but their wife's repentance (2019/10/29).

Conclusions

Red Pill Apostle wrote an email to me describing the highlights of his study of 1 Corinthians 7 and how well it matched up to this month's theme and the whole Σ Frame blog. He wrote,

> "The unifying theme for your blog is that marriage is trouble in the flesh. Every post touches on the concept of trouble, whether the topic is avoiding it, managing it, or mitigating it."

Yes, St. Paul summarized the whole shebang when he said,

> Yet those who marry will have worldly troubles, and I would spare you that. [29] This is what I mean, brothers: the appointed time has grown very short. From now on, let those who have wives live as though they had none, [30] and those who mourn as though they were not mourning, and those who rejoice as though they were not rejoicing, and those who buy as though they had no goods, [31] and those who deal with the world as though they had no dealings with it. For the present form of this world is passing away.
> 1 Corinthians 7:28b-31 (ESV)

Let the matter be concluded as thus.

When vetting, the question is whether she is submissive to her father. If so, then you have found a precious pearl of great price. If she has been sexually liberated in her youth and has since truly repented and is submissive to the Lord, you have found a rare ruby. If she is neither, then she serves another god and the marriage minded man should steer clear of her. Beware of the imposters who wh0re themselves out and will defraud a husband when married.

If she is married, what matters is her submission to her husband. If she is rebellious and headstrong, then the question remains whether she can be brought around to repentance or not (1 Corinthians 7:16).

 These posts were written in response to readers' questions. I've had a lot of emails asking questions that I've tried to address in the posts. I haven't been able to cover all these questions, but I'll come back to the one's I've missed in due time.*

Do women possess moral agency?

The Question of Women's Agency

Readers have probably noticed that whenever Satan tries to push women into sin, women have a propensity to go along with it, and to do so wholeheartedly! They don't want to resist evil influences. They don't even try. Instead, they attempt to maintain ego primacy, and when that is in doubt, they resort to a long list of Female Evasion and Control Tactics. This is what the Manosphere calls a lack of moral agency.

The long standing question in the Manosphere is, Do women possess moral agency? – The ability to resist sin and temptation, and to be obedient to God's created order?

Why are we even asking this question? Isn't it because it isn't very clear whether female agency exists? Whenever we see a particular woman exerting agency (which is not based on a self-absorbed interest), isn't that a strange and remarkable wonder?

Cultural Considerations

The topic of moral agency is usually discussed with an assumed reference to the assignation of responsibility, innocence, and/or guilt. Here, I want to point out that this is a uniquely westernized reference point.

Western cultures have an Innocence vs. Guilt ethical structure. Therefore, the question of whether Agency exists within a certain context is central to the assignation of responsibility, innocence, and guilt. In cultures having other ethical structures, the question of Agency is merely a point of interest that is somewhat irrelevant.

In addition, the question of FEMALE Agency becomes paramount in Western cultures because the gynocentric nature of these cultures assumes that women are free moral agents.

But are they?

Overview of this Month's Theme

The theme for this month will be Female Agency and Accountability. I've made passing reference to these topics many times before, but this will be the first time I have addressed this topic head on. My past writings here at Σ Frame have taken the stance that women SHOULD have agency, but in reality, they do NOT, or at least do not show much of any evidence of it.

This will not be the first time this topic has been addressed in the sphere. Donal Graeme and Rollo Tomassi (at The Rational Male) have done quite a bit of work on developing some basic theories surrounding the moral agency of females. I'll summarize the major insights they produced. I'll also review Dalrock and Deep Strength's positions, connect some dots, and bring the conclusions all into a concise frame to serve as the foundation for this month's discussion on Female Agency and Accountability.

The essays in this month's series will…

1. Review some writings about Agency that came out of the Manosphere in the past.
2. Offer some examples offering support for and against Female Agency.
3. Outline arguments in favor of and against either position.

Independent and opposing viewpoints are welcomed.

In writing these essays, I hope to address the issue of Women's Agency from both aspects, and offer a comprehensive assessment of the matter. I'll also look at Women's Agency through the frame of what we've learned from the Cascade Model, namely that women's motivation is not purpose driven, like a man's would be, but instead seeks to establish a cascading chain of increasing ego relevancy.

Feedback –> Trust –> Relevancy –> Humility –> Comfort –> Security

In this series, the term 'Agency' is intended to mean a person's decision to proactively, and objectively, exercise their free will to do what is perceived to be 'good' or 'right'. Whereas, the word 'Imperative' follows after Rollo's usage of the term, to describe the subjective, reactive, 'instinctual' response of human nature.

I hope to avoid a purely doctrinal argument of 'Free Will', however, comments relevant to faith will be appreciated. Psychological or behavioral arguments for agency and/or free will are also encouraged.

Donal Graeme on Female Agency

Jack · 3 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Female Moral Agency requires forbidden foreknowledge and self-control.

Targeted Readership: Men
Theme: Female Agency and Accountability
Length: 700 words
Reading Time: 4 minutes

The question of women's agency, whether it existed and its nature, was a preponderance floating around the Manosphere for a while. Donal Graeme (DG) was the most proactive in spearheading a formal assessment of this specific question. He pondered this question for quite some time, as evidenced by many of his posts, but DG's post, Moral Agency in Women — Revisited (2013/3/11), was the first post (that I've found) which went over the basic premises for women's agency, outlined the nature of it, and formulated some basic postulates. Thus, DG was thereby the first Manosphere author to put these concepts into concrete words.

Several months later, Graeme obtained a somewhat satisfactory understanding of the subject through his hearing of a tragic story, which is contained in his post, Confessions of a "Good Christian Girl" (2013/12/8). Here, Graeme offered a tentative explanation of women's agency, in which he points out that a young woman must be able to foresee a temptation far enough in advance to be able to avoid its escalation to the point of provocation. With this new insight in hand, he formulated the postulate that women do indeed have agency, but it all depends on whether they wish to use it or not.

DG's post, Knowing When To Escape (2013/12/15), describes how difficult it can be for a woman to create boundaries that would lead to her benefit in the long run, and reaffirmed his conclusion that women do indeed have agency, but that they often fail to employ the necessary precautions which would iterate agency.*

 Note: This agrees with my own assessment of how to counteract the sinful nature, and avoid the trap of temptation — namely, by being aware of one's weaknesses, and anticipating what sorts of situations might elevate the level of temptation above the tolerance level of one's weaknesses.*

DG offered a brief recap of his views a couple years later in response to Deep Strength's post, Formalization of AWALT and NAWALT (2015/3/22). (I'll cover DS's views in a separate post.)

> "First, just because scripture doesn't command it doesn't meant that women don't have the ability to agape love their husbands. Scripture contains what is essential, surely, but it doesn't contain everything- it cannot, in fact. That is why Jesus gave us the Church, after all — for continued wisdom and guidance.
> Second, concerning moral agency, I think Deep Strength is conflating moral agency — the ability to choose between right and wrong — with [edit: potential or alleged] female susceptibility to deception. They are not incompatible. Women can choose to do the right thing, just as they can choose to do the wrong thing. Deception merely makes it more difficult to discriminate between the two.
> Third, women are indeed able to operate as agents outside of the authority of men. Scripture mentions a number of instances of it, in both the OT and NT. However, that doesn't mean it is necessarily for the best, at least, all the time. This ties again to the susceptibility of deception — protecting women from deception probably had a large part to do with that. There might be more, of course, and this could be a subject worth exploring in a further post."
> Donal Graeme: Random Musings and Links- #7 (2015/3/25)

In addition to his notes on deception, another noteworthy conclusion of DG's work is that if a woman is young and innocently naive enough to truly NOT recognize a potentially tempting situation, then it is very difficult for her to know how far is "too far", and she will easily fall into it. The point of interest, it seems, is that young women (i.e. virgins) are ignorant nubes until they gain some sexperience in this area, and therefore they need parents to monitor them, impose boundaries, and offer guidance.

OTOH, if a woman has somehow gained some street smarts and CAN see a temptation far enough in advance to know where the lines are, then the temptation to dabble, flirt, and push the envelope to the brink is magnified and becomes more difficult to overcome, especially when it gets her more affirmation, ego-stroking attention, and a sense of social power, especially over men.

Female moral agency is men's mental masturbation.

Do women have moral agency?

While Donal Graeme came at this question from a Christian approach of morality and responsibility, Rollo Tomassi came at this question from a secular, praxeological viewpoint. In Rollo's work, it should be noted that outside of Christian culture, illicit sex is hardly even considered a temptation, but rather a rite of passage into adulthood.

Rollo's first post that addressed this specific question is Our Sisters' Keeper (2015/7/14). Here he identified this question as unique to the Christian sect of the Manosphere and pointed out that the question of Female Agency appeals to men's sense of honor and justice and therefore is of interest to men only, as women are more pragmatic. He said it is somewhat Blue Pilled to assume that women have the same concerns as men, and then to make an appeal based on reason and ethics for women to behave better. He regarded the answer to the question as a potentially excusable justification for women's ethically challenged behaviors (which is a hint to his deeper belief that women do NOT possess agency), and concluded that men will only make progress in establishing moral agency in women if men will assume some responsibility for women's behaviors.

A couple years later, Rollo answered the question in relation to hypergamy as thus.

> "…women being acted upon by a Hypergamy that's written into their DNA can use it as an excuse for the worst behavior and ugliest results imaginable to men. The logic then follows that women are either active agents and have moral agency or they lack that agency and need men to provide the self-control women are incapable of.
> Personally, I believe its a combination of the two; women do have agency for which they should be responsible and accountable for, but also, men need to provide a confident dominant frame under which women want to submit and be associated with. It is not men's fault that women are Hypergamous, but if there is to be a healthy control of it for the best interests of both men and women, men must understand it and master it. I would say the same of men's own sexuality and sexual expression — however, we are already overwhelmingly held accountable for not mastering it."
> The Rational Male: Hypergamy – The Misconceptions (2018/1/15)

Throughout his other work, Rollo has addressed most of the issues that DG introduced, especially the motivations of desire and hypergamy (for which he is now famous for), thereby supplying us with an evo-psyche explanation for the behavior.

All in all, Rollo is comprehensively saying that women essentially do NOT have moral agency, but… it's complicated… which is a roundabout way of extenuating that men are the responsible agents, not women, and that men must master women's hypergamous, sh!t testing, solipsistic imperatives (or more specifically, a man must master his woman, which I would interpret as being a wife). But Rollo won't come out and explicitly say what he believes — that women do NOT have agency — because of the obvious implications of such a statement giving both a justifiable evo-psyche excuse and a license to hypergamous hoes riding the CC to their jaded heart's content… and dumping all responsibility on men.

But readers did not miss his tacitly understated conclusion.

After a month of backlash, Rollo used Jordan Peterson's "Man up or shut up!" example to denounce his earlier conclusion from being misinterpreted as a "Man Up!" message to men.

> "…in almost all contexts imploring a guy to "Man Up" is following someone else's path, not your own."
> "Manning up Red Pill begins with rejecting the lies of egalitarian equalism and a commitment to real objective understanding of intersexual dynamics."
> The Rational Male: No Prescriptions (2018/2/12)

That understanding being… Hypergamous hoes gonna hoe hypergamously, and AWALT!

He also slated Peterson's stance as being the same as Christian / Trad-Con interpretations of women being "closer to God than men", adding a comparison with Mark Driscoll's "man up and marry those sluts" as a poignant example, among others. He mentions approvingly that Dalrock has overturned the Christian / Trad-Con message that men must qualify themselves and sacrifice themselves for their wives' intimate approval. Rollo goes into some detail about how this dynamic among male "Complementarian" Christian leaders is quite extensive, and that their error, like Peterson's, lies in their insistance on wringing meaning and morality out of everything.

Interestingly, although Rollo shies away from the question of morality de rigueur, overall his conclusions do apply to a moral viewpoint. However, instead of placing the responsibility on women to become moral, he subtly charges men with a moral duty to themselves — to become wary of women's wily ways and to learn how to wrangle them well.

Tingles uber alles!

Do women have moral agency?

Over his 10 year history of dedicated blogging, Dalrock maintained the steady stance that women do indeed possess agency, but they consistently and even predictably fail to implement it. This assumption created a steadfast source of religiously serious tongue-in-cheek humor for his constituency. Dalrock's detractors, many of whom carried the presumption that women do NOT possess agency, often took offense at his writings for this very reason, although for many years, no one (to my knowledge) ever called him out on this, instead attacking and hotly debating him on doctrinal and rational grounds, thereby missing his point and inadvertently giving him fodder for further observations of the phenomena. Because the basic assumption of whether female agency exists was never addressed, these arguments never really came to fruition.

Until… in early 2018, some of his adversaries latched on to Dalrock's understated presumption of female agency, calling it "The Dalrock Route" and clumsily describing it as "over-realized patriarchy" (which is telling of their views). More precisely, The Dalrock Route is the biblical assumption that people, including women, are aware or should be aware of their own nature, and that they should take responsibility for themselves. In short, it is carrying the presumption that all humans possess moral agency, including women. The Dalrock Route is only seen as "over-realized patriarchy" by those conditioned by Feminism and Chivalry (male feminism) who want to believe that women lack agency and are therefore not able (nor willing) to take responsibility for their own decisions.

The real Dalrock Route – Route 66 (AKA Lakeview Parkway) facing east through Dalrock Rowlett Texas, U.S.A.

From there, Dalrock's many readers (he was numbering about 20 million views by that time) slowly latched on to the question of female agency, bringing this issue to the fore, and this ultimately culminated in his interview exchanges with Warhorn Media (2019/2/1 — 2019/3/11). This interview was hosted by Nathan Alberson, the Creative Director of Warhorn Media, a media ministry of Pastor Tim Bayly's Clearnote Church in Bloomington, Indiana.

Dalrock offered the most concise description of his views about Female Agency in this interchange.

Here, I'll focus on one particular post in this series, Warhorn interview: Male responsibility and female agency. (2019/2/18), because it succinctly encapsulates Dalrock's general views on Female Agency – views that run in the background of most all his other writings.

He quotes Nathan as saying,

> "If I'm not mistaken, you see the work of my pastor and others like him as somehow undercutting the concept of female moral agency. I see your work as needlessly undercutting male responsibility in the name of establishing female moral agency."

Dalrock responds by saying,

> "The problem is that the most ridiculous things are being claimed as male responsibility in order to deny reality and therefore shirk [female] responsibility. Feminists openly and methodically marched through all of our institutions for decades. Conservative Christians responded to this by simply denying that it was happening. Changing the subject to men, no matter how ridiculous, is the go-to coping mechanism here."

Moreover, Dalrock asserts that the general stance of conservative Christians is identical to that of the wider secular feminist society, with the most egregious sin being the habit of making up transgressions to pin on men in order to absolutely avoid holding women responsible.

Dalrock went on to assert that Nathan's pastor Tim Bayly, Denny Burk, Joe Carter, Matt Chandler, Doug Phillips, John Piper, Owen Strachan, Douglas Wilson, and many other conservative Christians including Dr. Jason K. Allen, President of Midwestern Baptist Theological Seminary, lack the courage to confront the advancing front lines of feminism and that they even make up all kinds of zany stuff to avoid confronting feminism. He named the following examples.

- Conservative Christians claim that feminism is the logical reaction to Christian men shirking their responsibilities. (This was the same claim made by the feminist firebrand, Betty Friedan.)
- Conservative Christians invented a fiction that women weren't coveting men's roles, and instead men were forcing women to push their way into traditional male roles (such as clergy and the military) by abandoning their responsibilities.
- He quotes Pastor Matt Chandler explaining that if a Christian husband truly loves his wife (according to his understanding of love), then she can't be tempted into feminist rebellion.
- He cites Mary Kassian as an example of how Conservative Christians believe that when husbands fulfill their responsibilities then wives don't feel the temptation of feminist rebellion.
- He quotes Pastor Doug Wilson teaching that a Christian husband is responsible for making his wife more physically attractive.
- Dalrock also offered a couple dozen links (!!!) to posts in which he called out similar attitudes within the church, and gave a list of posts in which Conservative Christian leaders embraced congruent stances on how men should be held responsible for the presumed lack of female agency.

In every case Dalrock cites, the sin of women demanding to usurp the roles and responsibilities of men was never addressed by the church leaders. In all of these cases the pastors blamed men, and entirely avoided the issue of women's rebellion.

Dalrock points out that none of these viewpoints are Biblical, and dismisses all such viewpoints as "flat out nuts." He says no one notices within conservative Christianity because it is so common and it has been going on for so long.

Dalrock then tears down the veil by asserting that Christian men really are shirking their responsibilities, but not in the ways that most Conservative Christians believe.

> "The irony of all of this is men really are abdicating their responsibility. These absurd lies are used by cowardly men to avoid manning up and challenging the feminist rebellion. In this sense I hope we are aligned. You want men to man up. I want men to man up. But manning up doesn't mean cowering in fear while striking a heroic pose. Manning up means doing what is difficult. We are failing Christian women, and women in general. But we aren't failing them by not making them pretty, or forcing them to insist on taking on the roles of men, or making it possible for them to feel the temptation to sin."

Dalrock's banner image. "SLOW NO WAKE" being the general attitude of the converged church in times of apostasy.

Here, Dalrock implies that men are shirking their responsibilities, not by refusing to perform male roles adequately nor by failing to love or protect women, etc., as is commonly purported by conservatives, but by failing to hold feminists and women accountable. IOW, Dalrock is placing his finger on the common belief that women do NOT have moral agency as the primary catalyst of heresy, the convergence with progressive feminism, and the overall failure of the modern church. As a side note, this is fully illustrated in his banner image which depicts a buoy floating in a murky brown lake illuminated by the fiery tones of a sunset, having the words, "SLOW NO WAKE" — the vain plea of the church to avoid being cast about by the winds of false doctrine and the waves of doubt (Ephesians 4:14; James 1:6; Jude 1:12-13) — by denying female agency and catering to women's sin!

Dalrock states that feminists, men, and women who shirk their proper roles and responsibilities (presumably according to either interpretation) should repent, but they haven't been called to repent, and won't be, because complementarians insist on changing the subject to the issue of men's responsibility, and thereby avoid the issue of female agency.

> "Complementarians form consensus with feminists that men are bad and women should be cherished, and the matter is left there. In theory someone, somewhere will hold women accountable for crossdressing. But never complementarians, and never today. […] Women rebelled by demanding to take on men's roles, so the PCA drafted a resolution condemning men for not fulfilling their roles (a lie), and then stressed the importance of cherishing and protecting women (a non sequitur at best). This is cruel to women and girls. Imagine if we did the same thing to boys. Imagine if we responded to [men] cross dressing by declaring that we are appalled that men feel the need to be feminine because women won't do it, and men deserve more than they currently get from women. This would ironically be more true than the claim for women and the military. But it would still be a lie, and it would be cruel to men and boys who are tempted to sin in the way [crossdressing men] are sinning, because we would be sending the most confusing message imaginable to them in order to avoid offending [crossdressers]."

The interesting thing about Dalrock's argument here is that by putting the shoe on the other foot, he is applying the same measure to both men and women, which buys into the unbiblical rhetoric about gender equality. Even so, his argument holds water and comes across as ribald because he is using his antagonists own standards in his arguments.

Dalrock's cutting insights about the nature of female agency (or the lack thereof), his divisive charge of its denial by conservative Christians, and the brilliant humor of his arguments, fully explains his enduring popularity, even going on three years after his retirement from blogging.

Women have Moral Agency

We know women have moral agency. Otherwise God would not have held Eve personally responsible for her sin at the Fall (Genesis 3). Eve was responsible directly to God for obedience to His one directive: Don't eat from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. God held Eve directly responsible, without reference to Adam or anything he did or did not do. God did not say to Adam, "You were supposed to keep her from eating from that tree. She ate, and that's your fault." No. What He did say was that because she ate from the tree and disobeyed God, she would have pain in childbirth and she would have to submit to Adam. "I told you not to. You did it anyway. Here are your consequences." That's the very definition of moral agency.

Women have innate moral agency. It's just that they don't suffer negative consequences for acting contrary to that agency or for failing to exercise it. So whenever the sh!t misses the bucket, the task of cleaning it up always falls on men — not the sh!ttress. This is an important point, albeit one that western churchians are clearly uncomfortable with and try hard to deny. This is Dalrock's take on women's agency in a nutshell.

We can all see the catastrophic results that this consequence-less feeelz gooeyd culture has produced. When we look around, what we see is that women will try to keep all their shenanigans a secret. They'll lie and evade in order to keep everything under cover.

"Yeah, sure, I know what I'm doing is wrong, or it kinda feels wrong. But it kinda feels OK, and there's no reason not to, so I am going to do it. It doesn't affect anyone else. Nobody needs to know about it."

Even though they're guilty, they'll deny it all the way. But if and when it ever spills over the side, then women will subconsciously take the attitude of…

"God holds me responsible, so what right does any man have to do the same?"

"Man screwed up, too, in the Fall, so who is HE to judge what I do?"

If that doesn't hold water, then they'll hamsterbate a plethora of solipsistic justifications.

"Yeah, X is true; but people were mean to me/hurt me/lied to me, so I shouldn't be held responsible for X."

"I did X, but society has it in for me, so I'm not responsible for X."

When that fails, then they'll have a twerking BUT-fest and make a big stink, recasting blame and insisting that they should not face any consequences for their moral failures.

"BUT… Men do it too!"

"BUT… Men make mistakes too!"

"BUT… Men are screwed up too!"

"BUT… Men aren't perfect either!"

"BUT… You don't get to hold my feet to the fire! I answer to God, no one else."

This behavior is no different from a child trying to avoid punishment for intentionally disobeying parents — a behavior that arises from the self-preserving self-interest of the fleshly nature that will lie, destroy, kill, steal, and pull out all the stops to avoid being exposed — but exposure is exactly what is needed in order for her to become more self-aware and adopt a sense of responsibility for herself.

Avoiding consequences for moral failure — it's what women and children do.

The Importance of Operant Conditioning

Women have moral agency, because they are able to conform their conduct to the dictates and requirements of their situations, including dealing with consequences or the lack thereof. When you impose hard consequences, they conform. When someone in power or authority over a woman imposes hard consequences, she conforms. (I mean REAL, hard, social/economic power, not just moral power, though moral power will work too.)

A consequence is most effective when imposed swiftly and without delay. Most of the time women don't suffer immediate consequences in the short term. Instead, women often suffer delayed consequences or only long term consequences which aren't immediately apparent.

It's also the case that women don't suffer consequences all the time. Consequences are most effective when they are suffered every time a moral lapse occurs.

That's just not the case for women.

Women are really, really good at consequence avoidance. And in addition to this, our entire society is constructed specifically for women to avoid or least greatly alleviate negative consequences for moral failure.

It's also the case that women don't always suffer temporal consequences; but only eternal consequences. Only the most spiritually astute women will discern this, and never in themselves.

The Importance of Headship Discipline

Women do have agency in the natural. It's just that those "muscles" aren't exercised anywhere close to as frequently as they should be. Society has been completely re-engineered to permit women to avoid agency as much as humanly possible.

As I discussed in the previous section about Operant Conditioning, the only reason moral agency works to mold and shape female conduct is because of consequences. If consequences are removed, then a woman will act contrary to that agency.

Every time.

The only alternative is as Bardelys told us: If women do not have moral agency, then they are little better than children. They cannot be trusted to make any decisions on their own and must always live under the authority of a man: First her father, then her husband, then her son(s). They must never be allowed to handle money, own any property of any consequence, operate any machinery, vote, or have any voice in public affairs. They most certainly must not be allowed even to speak in church, much less have “ministries.” They can work to earn money, but only at menial tasks and only if her father or husband allow it. All of her earnings are the property of the male authority in her life, whether that be her father, her husband, or her son(s).

Women must always be chaperoned in public. All of her interactions with nonrelatives must be under her father’s watchful eye. Women must never be allowed in the company of men unchaperoned until they are married. Women cannot be trusted to select their husbands — the men of her family must pick her husband or at least approve of her choice; and her husband will have absolute authority over all aspects of her life. She may not divorce him, but he can divorce her (“put her away”). College? No way. Live on her own or with other women? No. She will live at home with her parents until she is married. She does not need any education at all beyond high school and her mother’s training to be a wife.

In this scenario, women still have agency, but they’re insulated from any consequences for breach of that agency because they never get an opportunity to breach it. Again, they aren’t permitted to exercise those moral “muscles”.

This is why women were placed under men acting as heads of a hierarchy ordained by God. Men should have proper authority in those relationships.

But what authority do husbands have over their wives, or fathers over their adult, unmarried daughters?

The answer is none. And that’s the problem.

But men still have all the responsibility, which usually means, “Shut up, get your wallet/checkbook out, and pay.”

Which is why men are walking away, increasingly. Or, they’re just taking their chances and getting married anyway, because they want p_ssy.

Conclusions

Women have moral agency. It’s just that they don’t exercise it, either because (1) there are no negative consequences; or (2) they never get to exercise it in the first place.

Female evasion and control tactics are not so much evidence of complete lack of moral agency. They are evidence of avoidance of consequences for moral failures. It’s not that women don’t have moral agency. It’s that women feel free, and in fact are free, to act in ways contrary to that agency because there are no negative consequences for those acts. It is not only their sinful nature; society and government have done this. Women's freedom from consequences for moral failures are a matter of social, governmental, and public policy. Women demanded, and got, the right to be free from legal, moral, economic, and professional consequences for their moral failures. And, they got society to force men to pay for their moral failures too.

So the real problem is not women's lack of moral agency; it's the lack of immediate and unavoidable consequences. Penal science has proven that it's not the severity of punishment that deters bad behavior, but the surety of getting caught.

Deep Strength on Women's Agency

Do women have moral agency?

It is tempting for Western Christian men to treat women like they either have moral agency or they don't, but it is not such a cut and dried binary dichotomy.

Clearly women have moral agency. Deti seems to have summarized a lot of it with the garden. God punishes both Adam and Eve separately.

However, going off of Genesis 3, Numbers 30, and 1 Timothy 2:8-15, God created women differently so they tend to be more prone to deception. Hence, God has given men authority in marriage and the Church to act as a covering/protection for them. Yet it's hard with the culture now to say that we need to protect women in some cases, because much of the time with churchian / secular men it turns into White Knighting, and many would argue that women are (or should be) under the authority of their father until they are married (or at least treated as such).

Misled by Culture and Churchianity

> "All women have full moral agency. They are responsible for their decisions as much as men are responsible for theirs. However, culture and churchianity tends to infantilize women's decision making placing the consequence of poor decisions that women make onto men as men's burden of leadership and responsibility."
> Christianity and Masculinity: Formalization of AWALT and NAWALT (2015/3/22)

False Humility Misdirects Women's Agency

> "A true godly woman (with great character, humility, etc.) will respect and submit. Albeit, sometimes needs some prompting and sometimes slips up but will get back on track.
> However, what tends to occur in reality is that women can easily let FALSE HUMILITY and PRIDE get in the way of actual HUMILITY. They think they are better than the man/husband because they are reading the Bible more, praying more, going to Church more, or more of whatever "spiritual" things. […] Thus, they fall into a place of disrespect, contentiousness, and rebellion, but think they are actually doing the right thing. Very insidious."
> "…a woman who believes they are more godly than the man usually falls into the trap of pride and false humility. She would actually disobey the Bible's teachings such as 1 Peter 3 and usually starts tearing down her own relationship and marriage thinking she is better than him."
> "…a woman who is actually trying to obey God and spending a lot of time in spiritual disciplines would also probably more easily submit to and respect a man who has put a lot of time into obeying God and his own walk with Christ including the spiritual disciplines as well."
> "Another one of the big areas of false humility with wives who actually want to obey their husbands is they read so many "Christian books" about how they're supposed to do certain things to submit to their husband when in reality they should be asking their husband about how they want to submit. Then when they do these various "things" trying to make their husband happy and he is not she gets all mad that she is trying and not succeeding. This anger is not a righteous one because she is actually following the books, blogs, podcasts, and whatever advice instead of following her husband's lead. In other words, she is getting angry over her submitting to the books, blogs, podcasts, and other advice instead of her own husband.
> In this way, a wife gets off track from actual submission to her husband and into obeying everyone else but her husband. However, since these "everyone else" sources are supposedly godly, she is duped into believing she is doing the right thing. Hence, the false humility because she thinks she is doing the right thing but she is not."

Women Strongly prefer Mystical Consciousness as a Medium of Interrelational Exchange

It's difficult for men to ask women directly for what they want and get a positive response from her, because then women feel obligated to perform, and this kills their desire.

> "Overt contracts are a form of obligation and obligation generally destroys desire. Obligation should not destroy the desire dynamic, but it does because humans are often prone to give into their fallible human desires. This is why women want men to "just get it"…"
> Christianity and Masculinity: Covert Contracts, Overt Contracts, and Women (2015/8/18)

Likewise, women will hardly ever directly tell men exactly what they want or expect, and this could be for a multitude of reasons, some good and some bad depending on the context.

- They want to be passively led.
- They want to preserve solipsistic beliefs and the envisages of fantasy / mythos.
- They are more comfortable to avoid exercising agency and taking responsibility.
- They wish to preserve the option of covert vanity rebellion (discussed in the next section).
- They want the relationship to be based on faith and trust (or else the vicarious proxies of Feeelz and Tingles), rather than a negotiation.
- They prefer the freedom of remaining ambiguous. Revealing too much tends to grant more power to men. This is partly why women love secrecy.

Left to their own devices, women's indefatigable attraction to fantasy, mysticism, and mythos will lead them into all sorts of gnosticism such as astrology, feminism, liberal "Christianity", new age stuff, social justice activism, trendy media and philosophies, witchcraft, and whatever else.

Vanity Rebellion

Submission is necessary but insufficient for exercising agency. Submission by itself does NOT necessarily indicate moral agency!

Shades of Rebellion (2015/12/29) describes the irony of covert rebellion as seen in the difference between these two statements.

1. Submission: "I follow my husband's lead."
2. Covert rebellion: "I let my husband lead."

> "That's ultimately what it comes down to: women want to let their husband lead instead of following his lead. […] Covert rebellion which is "I let my husband lead" is probably the main sin nature of women because it's under the guise of righteousness (e.g. the husband is leading) but it gives her all of the power (e.g. authority) in the relationship.
> This is the true essence of virtue signaling. Grabbing power while maintaining the moral high ground. It's not enough to grab power. It must be done with the moral high ground.

Sharkly on Women's Agency

Do women have moral agency?

Women have moral agency. God treats them as if they do. Thedeti seems to say that women's agency is weaker than men's, and that in the absence of others enforcing consequences on them for their actions, women will usually drift towards following their own emotions, even in contradiction to the moral beliefs they espouse. Women's moral conduct is generally less rationally decided and more driven by what feels good to them in the moment. Although churches will vehemently deny that, God has ordered His patriarchal earthly hierarchy as if that is clearly the case.

Headship Authority is granted to Men, NOT Women!

God has said,

> "You are gods, sons of the Most High, all of you;
> Psalm 82:6 (ESV)*

The Bible teaches that God created men first, preeminent, and in His own image, after His likeness, and showing His glory.

> For a man indeed ought not to cover his head, since he is the image and glory of God; but woman is the glory of man.
> 1 Corinthians 11:7 (NKJV)

The Bible also says that wives are ALL to be treated as weaker vessels, which they truly are.

> Husbands, likewise, dwell with [your wives] with understanding, giving honor to the wife, as to the weaker vessel, and as being heirs together of the grace of life, that your prayers may not be hindered.
> 1 Peter 3:7 (NKJV)

The church is obfuscating these truths!

The Long Unraveling

So where do we get these silly notions of sexual equality?

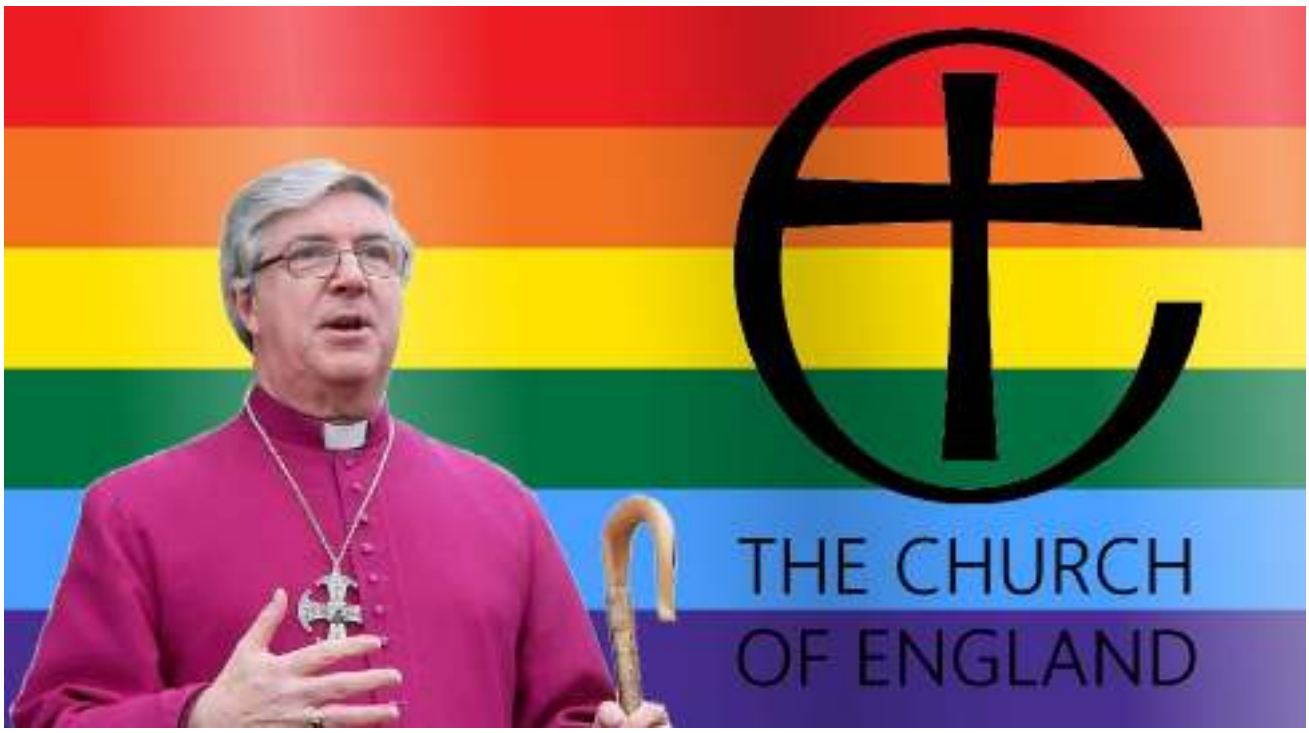
The earliest church fathers all unanimously believed and wrote that men alone were in the matchless image of the Most High, while women are not the image of Christ, but are the image of His straying church.

Early church father, Ambrosiaster, wrote,

> "Paul says that the honor and dignity of a man makes it wrong for him to cover his head, because the image of God should not be hidden. Indeed, it ought not to be hidden, for the glory of God is seen in the man. […] A woman therefore ought to cover her head, because she is not the likeness of God but is under subjection."

In the latter fourth century AD, Rome adopted Nicene Christianity as their Imperial religion. To appease forcibly converted Goddess worshippers, the state-coopted Church of Rome then made women into the image of deity so that they could make a woman, Mary, equal to Jesus Christ as a co-redemptrix, and into a substitute goddess whom people could pray to instead of goddesses like their Magna Mater who had been served by the castrated Galli.

The Protestant reformation to some degree forced the roll back of the deification of Mary, within Christendom, however the reforms fell short of also seizing back the "image of our masculine deity" from womankind. Leaving in place the heretical foundation for presumed sexual equality which is the essential foundation and justification upholding the false doctrines of Feminism.



Women's Agency is Predicated on Men's Headship Authority

A man can marry well beneath himself and easily remain content with his choice for a lifetime, IF his wife is faithful and treats him reasonably OK. But the bottleneck is that ALL Women are hypergamous. I have not met a single woman who truly and consistently defies hypergamy.

TFM once said that:

> "Every woman wants a man she can look up to, and you don't look up to your equal."

In all mutually happy and healthy long-term marriages, wives, at least subconsciously, must see their husbands as superior to them, not just by an unmerited divine fiat granting all men an undue rank and commanding their wives to submit to them. But a hypergamously-contented wife willingly submits to her man, whom she most usually sees as worthy of her submission. Honestly, every woman wants to submit herself to a "god". She wants to submit to a male sex-idol. And that is what God has made you!

The presumption of sexual equality will always agitate against all women's innate hypergamy. If men are not all held to be categorically superior to women, then all male headship is then only merited in the natural world by fleeting conditional degrees of merit, in which women become the arbiters of whether or not a man's merit can meet the demands of her seemingly insatiable hypergamy.

Men's looks and athleticism will naturally decrease with age and are subject to disfigurement and disability. And money, power, and status are also providential blessings which can be fleeting, and are subject to robbery, rebellion, and slander. Who would truly want to restore such a great permanent responsibility to men if it only came with some slim degree of authority as conditionally judged by the caprice of fickle women, who assess their own competing merit with unwarranted vanity, and which could so easily be negated by so many factors beyond our control?

Ending the emasculating blasphemy against the Godhead, saying that "It" is a hermaphrodite, imaged by both men and women, is essential to deconstructing the foundation of presumed sexual equality which is the foundation of Feminism. We cannot rebuild a sturdy patriarchy upon the lie that men are categorically no better than women. Nor would it be much worth wasting the effort trying to establish a patriarchy where men's superiority to women is only a fluctuating matter of degrees, where certain men are higher than certain women based only upon Looks, Athleticism, Money, Power, and Status (LAMPS).

New York Post: Priest arrested for having threesome with corset-wearing dominatrices on church altar (2020/10/8)

Conclusions

Patriarchy has crumbled in the Western world as the inevitable result of the church having given away men's divine birthright, "The image of God", and its accompanying divine worthiness and reason to rule, to women.

Rollo is right in saying that blue-pilled untruthful notions of sexual equality have become false doctrines of the church. They have left off the recorded doctrine which Christ and the apostles first left with the churches, and they have turned aside to peddling Feminist lies.

> With their tongues they praise God, even the Father; and therewith they also curse men, which are made after the similitude of God.
> James 3:9 (KJV)

We, men, need to take back our moral birthright, which is to be seen as categorically superior to all women in power and authority, being the only allowed earthly manifestation of God, having been made in God's own image, graven from the dust of the earth by the Father of all Spirits and all flesh.

Catacomb Resident on Moral Agency

Do women have moral agency?

First, let's take a step back to see the larger picture. In our fallen mortal form, humans have only limited moral agency in the first place. Not every moral issue we might grasp is within our control. For example, we did not choose to be born as fallen fleshly beings. We had no control over the Fall as individuals, yet we bear the Curse of the Fall.

Further, I contend that we do not have moral agency to choose eternal life. Romans 8 and 9 squash that idea. It's portrayed as asking the wrong question. The right question is whether you will embrace what God offers you while in this life.

True Morality Supports Covenant Life

The whole question of moral agency lies in our choice of whether to conform to the requirements of God's Covenant while we live on this earth. Any choice made to debase or neglect that Covenant is a lack of moral agency in God's eyes. Any debate surrounding the question of moral agency hinges on a matter of conviction, not intellect and not our humanistic concepts of morality. So it is not surprising that we've seen so many different takes on this topic, all having some areas of validity.

It becomes necessary to address this question because western minds tend to view things in binary, or in false dichotomies. Moral agency is not a matter of either/or. It's not absolute. It does have distinct limits, and our duty before God in our current condition is to seize the opportunities within the limits God offers them.

Now that we have that laid out in clear view, the fundamental question is better phrased as, Just how much agency did God grant females, particularly in the context of God's distinctly patriarchal revelation?

On this, I agree with Thedeti's take on female moral agency, and I'll emphasize that it is limited to the requirements of the biblical Covenant. Women express moral agency when they choose to conform to those requirements. They fail when they do not. God holds women accountable for their own decisions, not men. Men are held accountable for implementing the structure of the Biblical covenant in which his wife and family can fit into and thereby conform to the Covenant Life.

The Moral Frailty of Women

Given the moral weaknesses inherent in women — the ignorance, deception, and temptation that Donal Graeme observed, the solipsism and vanity Deep Strength wrote about, and the strong inclinations of the fleshly nature that Rollo described — this naturally entails that they should be restricted and restrained from acting in ways that contradict the requirements of the Covenant Life. They need to be protected from themselves, from bad influences, and from predatory individuals. They need guidance and teaching. They need to be held accountable. As Thedeti and others have said, they are to be regarded as beloved children in terms of moral agency.

On this, Deti mentioned several things we might do to limit women.

- They must always live under the authority of a man: First her father, then her husband, then her son(s).
- All of her interactions with non-relatives must be under her father's watchful eye.
- They must always be chaperoned in public.
- They must never be allowed in the company of men unchaperoned until they are married.
- Women cannot be trusted to select their husbands. The men of her family must pick her husband or at least approve of her choice.

- A woman's husband will have absolute authority over all aspects of her life.
- A wife may not divorce her husband, but he can divorce her ("put her away").
- They cannot be trusted to make any decisions on their own.
- They must never be allowed to handle money, own any property of any consequence, operate any machinery, vote, or have any voice in public affairs.
- They can work to earn money, but only at menial tasks and only if her father or husband allow it.
- All of her earnings are the property of the male authority in her life, whether that be her father, her husband, or her son(s).
- They most certainly must not be allowed even to speak in church, much less teach nor have "ministries."
- College education does little to fulfill a woman's role in Covenant life and should not be prioritized. Most women do not need any education at all beyond high school and her mother's training to be a wife.
- Living on her own or with other women does not fit the Covenant model. She should live at home with her parents until she is married.

I'm not sure if this is part sarcasm, but in fact, Thedeti is outlining the Covenant's restrictions on women. The Covenant stipulates that women are happier and better off that way, although they may be slow to realize this.

Individual Liberties

If we apply the revised question to individual women, it's still not a question of whether a woman has moral agency, but how much. Granted, there may be some women who have a considerable amount of agency and can be trusted to fulfill her obligations to the Covenant without some of the restrictions outlined above, but those are uniquely special cases indeed. The Manosphere calls such women "unicorns", and they do exist. (I have one myself.) The older women who are charged to teach younger women in Titus 2:3-5 should be "unicorns". But it would be a grave mistake to assume that any woman has personal agency without her first demonstrating a long track record that she can be responsible in upholding Covenant Life.

Conclusions

Yes, God has granted women some moral agency. He does hold them accountable for their sins. Yet He has tasked His Covenant people with building an atmosphere to account for the differences between female moral agency and that of males. God holds men accountable on a different level.

The Bible says women are not morally interchangeable with men. The Bible also rejects the notion that discrimination — the habit, custom or policy of treating people different based on various identity factors — is wrong. Indeed, God commands us to discriminate between men and women. He also commands us to discriminate between folks inside and outside the Covenant. Further, He demands that we discriminate between folks who hold to the different cultures and traditions. That this last discrimination carries a high correlation with ethnic identity is not really the point, but it's certainly something we have to accept, lest we defy the God who made us.

The single greatest lie of Western Civilization has always been that there can be no divine moral agency in the universe. That is, everything about our world comes down to a matter of biology, chemistry, and physics and that everything is inherently discernible with the five senses or else can be apprehended with the rational mind. The second greatest lie of Western civilization is that women are free moral agents which is interpreted to mean they can do all things of their own volition. According to God's Covenant, they cannot. God's covenant living is a higher calling that women are bound to, whether they agree with it or not.

Even within the church, there is a doctrinal assumption that, sooner or later, all things must be discerned and decided by human agency, cast under the inscrutable label of "free will", and at times, legalism. When anything is inexplicable by that approach, various brands of mysticism and Gnosticism creep in, like those described by Dalrock and Deep Strength. The only free will we have, the only agency we have, is whether to conform to the dictates of conviction within God's Covenant order. All other differences are a matter of culture, tradition, and faith.

If the God of the Bible commands us to walk in His Covenant, and both government and society call it a "sin", what does that suggest about how much separation we should seek from them?

Introduction

First of all, I'll say a few words about Artisanal Toad for those readers who are unfamiliar with him. Artisanal Toad is believed to be a polygynous Mormon. He boasted of having two "Ninja" wives, but it could not be ascertained how serious he was about this claim. He was a frequent commenter in the Classic Christian Manosphere and started his own blog in August 2013. He posted long essays quite regularly up until he stopped posting altogether in December 2017. Then in early 2019, he vanished from WordPress without any farewell.

Toad held controversial stances on sex, marriage, adultery, divorce, lesb!an h0m0sexuality, polygyny, and prost!tut!on. The most interesting thing about his contribution to the Christian Red Pill Lore is his unique interpretation of sex and marriage that was based entirely on scripture and stood completely on its own merit. He used this interpretation to support all his arguments, and no one could definitively prove that his interpretation was wrong (going on a point-by-point basis). Over the course of his 4 years of blogging, in addition to the basic explanations of his stances, he addressed a number of larger arguments that concerned many of the controversial implications that would result if his views were widely accepted as Biblical Truth. After a time, it became evident that the majority of his readers just couldn't stomach it — even if it were true — mainly because of the implications. Apparently, this is why he stopped blogging.

Read on and you'll see what I'm talking about. Links are provided for those readers who wish to further investigate Toadistry. Toad preferred the NASB, so that is what I've linked to here.

Male Authority is Preeminent

> "The man was authorized by God to begin marriage because marriage begins the family and family is the container in which children are to be brought into this world. That is truth. Children need both their biological mother and father working together to raise them. Children need both their parents to work together to raise them. So, how does this begin?
> First is the change in status as the man leaves and goes out from under the authority of his father and mother to be the head of his own house. The man has sexual intercourse with the eligible virgin and she becomes his wife. When this occurs, according to Jesus (Matthew 19:4-6), it is God who makes the two "one flesh" in a spiritual joining that the Apostle Paul said was the same as the spiritual joining that makes the Christian a member of the body of Christ (Ephesians 5:28-32). It is a great mystery. Thus, the "one flesh" portion of Genesis 2:24 is the spiritual joining that is the act of God and cannot be the act of man. This act of God occurs when the man penetrates his wife and they have sexual intercourse…"
> Artisanal Toad's Hall: Theology For Men of the West: Biblical Marriage (2017/3/11)

Sexual intercourse is an act of man that produces marriage and pair bonding (under certain conditions). The "becoming one flesh" is an act of God that happens during sex. Thus, Toad notes that "becoming one flesh" is concomitant with coitus, but sexual intercourse and "becoming one flesh" are NOT the same thing. "One flesh" refers to the spiritual pair bonding that occurs as a result of virginal coitus. Therefore, sex can produce "one flesh", but the pair bonding aspect of sex / marriage requires virginal sex and/or the power of God. A sexual relationship that is lacking any of these aspects is debased.

To support this argument, Toad observes that the Hebrew word, "dabaq", used in Genesis 2:24 (where man and wife become one flesh) means the exact same thing as the Greek word "kollao" in 1st Corinthians 6:16 (where a man and a prost!tute become one flesh). In Matthew 19:5 (written in Greek), Jesus quotes Genesis 2:24, and the word used here is "kollao", thereby establishing the equivalent meaning of dabaq and kollao.

Virgin Sex constitutes a Natural Marriage*

> "As we've just seen in both Exodus 22:16 and Deuteronomy 22:28-29, sex is what makes the two married, which is exactly what Genesis 2:24 said. In 1st Corinthians 6:16 we discover that the Hebrew word "dabaq" that gets translated into English as "cleave" or "joined" in Genesis 2:24 actually means sex. There is no ceremony and nobody has to preside over anything or solemnize anything, all that's required is sex…"
> Artisanal Toad's Hall: The Lie That Caused The Adultery Epidemic (2016/6/3)

So essentially, Virginal Sex = Marriage.

> "A man begins a marriage to a virgin with the act of penetration (sexual intercourse) and with that act he gives his consent and commitment to the marriage. The virgin is automatically married by that act, provided the man was eligible to marry her, because she has no agency as a virgin. Unlike a virgin, a widow or a legitimately divorced woman has agency. She must agree to be married before the act of intercourse will make her married."

> Artisanal Toad's Hall: Theology For Men of the West: Biblical Marriage (2017/3/11)

The first part carries the implications that (1) every non-virgin woman is married in the eyes of God to the first guy with whom she had sexual intercourse, and that (2) she commits adultery with every other guy she may sleep with — including a man she may be currently formally married to (if he wasn't her first). (3) If a man formally marries a woman who is not a virgin, and her first partner is still living, then the marriage is essentially institutionalized adultery. Under these assumptions, Toad estimated that 80% of marriages among Church-goers is adulterous!

In the same essay, Toad gives further evidence that virginal sex constitutes a natural marriage.

> "All women are virgins when they marry. The act of penetrative sexual intercourse with the virgin is what begins a marriage and Scripture does not require any other act, which is why the woman who was sold by her father to be a concubine (Exodus 21:7-10), the woman who was captured in battle (Deuteronomy 21:10-14), and even the woman who was r@ped (Deuteronomy 22:28-29) were all married with that act. News Flash: The virgin's consent is not required. This means whether she knew she was being married or not, whether she wanted to be married or not, with that act she is married. And the Churchians will screech over this, but Scripture is clear what the words of the text mean because the Apostle Paul showed us."
> Artisanal Toad's Hall: Theology For Men of the West: Biblical Marriage (2017/3/11)

Another very controversial point here is that virgins who have sex become married by that act, whether she knows it or not. Every non-virgin woman is married to her first partner!

 I've added the adjective "natural marriage" for clarity. I believe this would also be considered a covenant marriage as well.*

Virgins DO NOT have Agency

> "In Genesis 3:16 God issued his first judgment on mankind, saying "he shall rule over you." I have written about this before and effectively God declared women to be incompetent and appointed their [father or] husband as their guardian. While it might be argued that prior to Christ the husband-wife relationship was primarily a master-servant relationship, it cannot be argued that the father-daughter relationship is anything but a guardian-ward relationship."
> Artisanal Toad's Hall: Ho, ho, ho. (2016/12/14)

This further supports the presumption that male authority is preeminent. This agrees with Sharkly's stance. Male authority is also present in the act of sex / marriage.

> "The act of coitus is the man's consent, agreement and commitment to marriage. It is automatic if he engages in the act but he has a choice in whether to engage in that activity.
> Artisanal Toad's Hall: Ho, ho, ho. (2016/12/14)

IOW, Sex is an act of commitment from the man. This transfers the woman from her father's authority to the man's. If the sexual intercourse happened without the father's knowledge, he can annul the union if he disagrees

In Toad's Churchian Challenge (2017/3/17), Artisanal Toad went over some of the same scriptures already mentioned to explain why he believes virgins have no agency.

> "…when the virgin has sex with a man, she is married to that man whether she knew it or not, whether she agreed to be married or not. A virgin does not have agency and she can be married against her will without her consent. This is proven by the fact that in Exodus 21 a woman could be sold by her father to be the wife (concubine*) of a man whether she agreed or not. In Deuteronomy 21, we see that a woman captured in battle can become the wife of a man whether she agrees or not when he has sex with her. In Deuteronomy 22 we see that the virgin not betrothed who is r@ped (and it is discovered) is married to the man who r@ped her."
> Artisanal Toad's Hall: Toad's Churchian Challenge (2017/3/17)

 Toad notes that both a wife and a concubine are both married. The difference between a wife and a concubine is that a wife has certain rights and privileges that the concubine does not.*

Moreover, the virgin is a ward of her father and can therefore be married off against her will, or r@ped / seduced into sex / natural marriage. Being a ward of her father implies that she does not have agency.

Under these conditions, sex alone will establish the man's authority over her and produce a one flesh bond. The virgin is therefore married to him because she does not have agency nor authority over herself.

Non-Virgins DO have Agency

> "The woman who is not a virgin and not married does have a choice and absent her agreement sex is meaningless. We already addressed this issue and the relevant portion is this:
> Numbers 30:3-5 is specific as to the authority of the father over his daughter and Exodus 22:17 clarifies that even if a daughter's agreement to marry resulted in the act of marriage, the father (in the day he heard of it) had the authority to forbid her agreement, thus nullifying the resulting marriage. He refused the agreement to marry for her and thus the sex did not create a marriage. Numbers 30:9 is very specific in detailing that the widow and divorced woman have agency, in that there is no-one with the authority to review their agreements. Whatever agreement or vow they make is binding on them. It follows that they cannot be bound by an agreement they did not make. Likewise, the Apostle Paul (in 1st Corinthians 7:39) is clear that the woman who is no longer bound is free to choose whom she might marry, only in the Lord.
> If the father has the authority to refuse marriage to the extent that the act of coitus did not make her married and the widow or divorced woman has the same authority over themselves, how can they be married unless they agree to be married? It stands to reason that if the father had the authority to refuse agreement and thereafter sex did not make the virgin married, then the refusal to agree by the non-virgin was sufficient to prevent marriage.
> A non-virgin may be eligible to marry, which means that she may marry. However, [a man's] vow to marry her is meaningless unless she agrees to marry him because that man is not in authority over that woman and he cannot make a vow that binds her unless she agrees to it. The woman has no authority over the man (and > never will), so the idea that her failure or refusal to agree to his vow somehow grants her authority over him is ridiculous."

> Artisanal Toad's Hall: Ho, ho, ho. (2016/12/14)

Here I'll add one caveat about Toad's last sentence. In Sexual Authority and Sanctification (2022/8/8), I described how 1 Corinthians 7:3-5 stipulates that a married woman has authority over her husband's body. This is the only area and context in which a woman has authority over a man.

Alexandra Tyler featured prominently on Artisanal Toad's Hall.

Consent

Of Virgins

> "Genesis 2:24 contains no mention of any requirement for consent by the woman. We know the consent of the woman is not required because a father can sell his daughter to be another man's wife (concubine) as described in Exodus 21:7-10. The woman captured in battle becomes the man's wife (Deuteronomy 23:10-14). The eligible virgin becomes the man's wife due to being r@ped by him if they are discovered (Deuteronomy 22:28-29). The eligible virgin could consent to have sex (she was seduced) which resulted in her marriage, her father had the authority to forbid her agreement (consent) thereby annulling the marriage that resulted from the act of marriage that followed her agreement (Exodus 22:17). Because a virgin can be r@ped into marriage against her will and over her objections and she can agree to be married only to have her marriage annulled, we conclude that the virgin has no agency."
> Artisanal Toad's Hall: Marriage, Whores and Churchians (2017/1/11)

Although virgins can be seduced, they have no agency and therefore can neither give nor deny consent. This agrees with what Donal Graeme said, that virgins have no way of Knowing When To Escape, and that agency is imparted through carnal knowledge.

Of Non-Virgins

> "The non-virgin woman [whose husband has died] has agency and is free to choose who she marries (1st Corinthians 7:39), which means she cannot be r@ped into marriage. Therefore, sex alone cannot make her married because she must consent to the marriage."
> "It should be noted that the issue of prostitution comes after a long series of posts that demonstrate that the virgin is married when she has sex, even though she doesn't know about it, and the issue is somewhat complicated because of that. The thing is, the issue of consent depends on the woman's status and it is the responsibility of the man to deal with that."
> Artisanal Toad's Hall: Ho, ho, ho. (2016/12/14)

On the last part above, Toad agrees with the Liberal Progressive's emphasis on a woman's consent — under the condition that she is a non-virgin, unmarried, and sexually liberated from her father's authority. Essentially, harlots have agency, even though they are not formally married.

Toad's account may explain why so many modern women have latched on to the idea of consent as being an important issue to them. If they are sexually liberated non-virgins and free agents, then maybe it is truly a thing.

Accountability

> "The number one thing about the ideal man (and Job is the leading candidate for an example) is the implied accountability for his wife. The Godly Christian husband is commanded to love his wife as Christ loves His church. The best example of how this actually happens is in Revelation 3:19, in which Christ is speaking to His church:
> "Those whom I love I rebuke and discipline. Be zealous therefore and repent!"
> In other words, the husband presents his wife as "having no spot or wrinkle or any such thing, but that she should be holy and blameless" by holding her accountable for her behavior. Just as Christ says, He will hold accountable those whom He loves. A Godly man is a just man who does his duty, but what the feminist narrative cannot tolerate is a man who holds a woman accountable. This is the feminist perversion of the ideal husband."
> Artisanal Toad's Hall: Perverting The Ideal Husband (2017/2/7)

Basically, men are responsible for holding their wife / wives accountable.

Summary

In summary, what I've gathered from reading through Artisanal Toad's posts are the following points.

1. Virgins have no agency.
2. Virgins are under their father's authority until married.
3. "Becoming one flesh" (i.e. cleaving / clinginess / pair bonding), is created by God.
4. Virgin sex always leads to "becoming one flesh" / cleaving, and this is what constitutes marriage in God's eyes.
5. Sex usually leads to "becoming one flesh" / cleaving, but maybe not always, depending on the context.
6. A woman having sex with any man other than the one who took her virginity is committing adultery.
7. Since many women marry a man who wasn't their first (while the first is still living), most modern marriages are therefore a form of institutionalized adultery.
8. Because virgin sex constitutes natural marriage, there is no such thing as premarital sex, unless the couple agreed not to have sex until a prearranged time.
9. Formal marriage (and the idea of premarital sex) was an invention of the church that was introduced as a means of power and control.
10. Men have the authority to "take" an eligible virgin to wife, with conditions.
11. Sexual intercourse is an act of marital commitment from the man, so men should only have sex with a woman he is willing to marry.
12. The husband is required to feed, clothe, and shelter his wife (or wives), and also teach them and hold them accountable.
13. Married non-virgins are under their husband's authority.
14. Married women are agents under their husband's authority.
15. If a wife exercises her agency as a wife poorly or irresponsibly, then her husband is responsible for dealing with that. However, the husband also has the authority to deal with her as he pleases, up to and including divorcing her.
16. Fathers have the power to annul their daughter's natural marriage by their word.
17. Women who are not virgins and whose father annulled their natural marriage should remain in their father's house and under his authority, but they are able to choose their own husbands. (Fathers are urged to vet her choices.) Under these conditions, women become free agents.
18. The women in (17) can have sex outside of marriage and it would not be a sin unless done outside her father's knowledge and/or permission.
19. Fathers should not allow their daughters to do (17), as it would bring shame on the entire family.
20. For women who are free agents (i.e. 17), their consent (and by extension their father's too) is required for sex and/or marriage.

As you can see, there are points here that would strike just about everyone the wrong way; Complementarians, Churchians, Feminists, Liberals, Progressives, Trad-Cons, men, women… Yeah, just about everyone. To me, this suggests that Toad is on to something regarding the Biblical model of marriage (which is now all but forgotten).

The crux of the whole issue is, as Toad pointed out, how we define marriage.

Conclusions

As you can see, Toad's views align with what we've covered in the past about female submission, masculine authority, and the integrity of marriage.

Toad's Biblical interpretation of sex and marriage brings together many of the topics about female agency and consent that we've covered so far, and it also accounts for many of the confusing issues surrounding agency that have come up.

To wit…

- Toad's stances on agency and consent of virgins and women in general agrees with Donal Graeme's and Rollo Tomassi's views, respectively. Furthermore, Toad gives a Biblical explanation of how it works.
- Toad's views agree with Dalrock's observations that everyone is in denial about the moral agency of women (i.e. non-virgins).
- Toad explains why even married women lack agency, as Deep Strength described.
- Toad's views align with Catacomb Resident's assertion that Covenant Life must come first, and he explains from a Biblical standpoint how the issues of authority, the transfer of authority, the duties of authority should work within the Covenant.
- Toad agrees with Sharkly's stance that Male authority is (or should be) preeminent, and his interpretation of scripture explains how that authority is transferred from father to husband through the act of sex / marriage.
- Toad's explanations ties together the important necessity of managing and teaching women through operant conditioning, as deti explained.
- Toad says all responsibility is (or should be) on men, and this supports the obligations that Headship imposes on Men, which I observed in Headship Authority Takes Work (2022/8/12).*
- We've already determined that sexual promiscuity debases marriage. Toad's account fully explains how this works, and why so many modern women are unhaaappy in marriage (because they're living in adultery).
- Toad's discussion of consent can be extrapolated to explain why many women have latched on to the idea of consent as being an important issue to them (because they're sexually liberated).

 Readers will note that the current condition of society has undermined male authority so much that implementing this paradigm of Headship is extremely hard or even impossible.*

The only thing that readers might find objectionable is Toad's definition of natural marriage, and only because of all the messy consequences that would result from admitting all this as God's truth.

On a personal note, I can see how Toad's vision of marriage aligns with Jesus' statements in Matthew 5:27-32, and His description of marriage in Matthew 19:3-9. I can also see the overall wisdom of regarding virginal sex as the primary act that establishes a marriage, and I will put this idea across to my daughters. But yet, I also believe Western society is far too corrupted in both body and mind for this to be applicable in the present day and age. We are living in an age of harlotry and consent.

I hope I've presented Toad's arguments accurately. Readers who are better read on Toadistry are welcome to suggest additions and/or improvements.

On the Concept of Agency

Jack · 16 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Moral agency is the action of a moral agent.

On Paradigms

Over the past two weeks, we've reviewed the perspectives of 8 noteworthy Manospherians about Female Agency and have seen over 500+ comments (so far) about these views on the topic.

During the discussion under the last post, Artisanal Toad on Women's Agency (22/11/14), it occurred to me that there are a few different paradigms that are being addressed and discussed throughout all the posts and comments this month, namely…

1. Christian Red Pill / Headship (Deep Strength, deti)
2. Complementarianism / TradCon / Traditionalism (Dalrock)
3. Covenant Theology
4. Feminism / Progressivism
5. The Secular SMP/MMP (Donal Graeme, Rollo Tomassi)
6. OT Ancient Near East (ANE) culture / Artisanal Toad's World
7. Catacomb Resident addressed (1), (3), and (6).
8. LastMod jocundly attempted to combine (2) and (6).
9. RPA superposed (6) onto (4) and/or (5) to form an Onionesque quagmire.
10. Sharkly made a comparison between (1), (2), and (4).

And OMG! So many other juxtapositions were assumed in the comments!

Moreover, it is easy for someone to take an axiom, statement, or a line of reasoning relevant to one paradigm and humorously or mistakenly assume that it pertains to, or can/should be applied to a different paradigm. Dave Sora and DesertDweller picked up on this as well. Also, Deep Strength noted that it is easy to mistakenly assign one particular paradigm as being an ideal, but we cannot patch up an old garment with new cloth (Matthew 9:16-17). I think this explains a good deal of the confusion.

But there is more…

Paradigmatic Contexts

As a result of having all these paradigms, there are different concepts of agency floating around throughout all the discussion. In general, Biblical vs. secular views have widely different concepts of agency.

For example, when we are speaking of women's agency within ANE / Christian RP / Covenant / Headship paradigms, we are referring to a woman having the ability to exercise her will in obedience to God and/or the male authority in her life, and that she chooses to do so somewhat regularly.

OTOH, when women's agency is talked about within churchian or secular groups, they are referring to a woman having the ability to make her own choices in life (supposedly independent of her feral instincts) and to make something of herself by the world's standards. So when they say women lack agency, they are feeding the feminist narratives of equality, gender discrimination, and victimization.

Moreover, Red Pilled Christian Men regard women as having agency (with a few conditions / exceptions), while churchians, Complementarians, Trad-Cons, and secular voices do not. I believe this is not a coincidence.

This difference should be regarded and taken into account.

For example, either group would consider it condescending to women to state that women lack agency, but for entirely diametric reasons. As a case in point, Rollo is seen as "misogynistic" by the wider culture because he's willing to state (in a very roundabout way) that women have no agency, without changing from one paradigm (and definition of agency) to the other. Whereas, Rollo is seen as "corrupt" by the Christian Manosphere because he denies that women have agency and we interpret this according to our biblically informed position that they do. As another case in point, within the Christian Manosphere, women who fail to exercise agency are seen as "slores" because of the natural consequences that happen when they don't (i.e. they become unfit for marriage). But OTOH, a woman who does exercise agency would be obedient to God and submissive to her male Head, and this is regarded as being a "doormat" by the world (while males are calumniated as toxic misogynists, etc.).

On Definitions

In addition to the diverging concepts of agency as a result of different paradigms, there are also different definitions of agency being used, even within one paradigm. And when the adjective "moral" is added to agency, it becomes further nuanced. This is where it gets really confusing, hence the importance of this month's study of Agency.

In all the writings and discussion about the topic of women's agency so far, I have noticed a significant source of confusion about whether the term "agency" is used as (1) a noun indicating a potential, (2) a noun indicating an ability, propensity, and willingness to exercise free will, or (3) a noun referring to a general habit of acting in a conscientious and responsible way and taking responsibility for one's actions and decisions. Seeing how this could create a divergence of opinion, I decided to check the dictionary on this, and I was amused to find that it does have several definitions of agency, including 3 that match my observations and 1 that matches my own.

Among other definitions, we have these which are of interest to the discussion.

Agency

1. The duty or function of an agent.
2. The capacity to act or exert power.
3. A means of exerting power or influence; instrumentality.
4. The state of being in action or of exerting power; operation.

The first definition is the one I held going into this study. (See the next section for more on this.) The other three are definitions / usages that have cropped up in the reviews I posted and in the comments. It may be helpful for readers to identify which definition of agency they have in mind, and to consider the others when reading. I believe this will help sort out the confusion as it may explain the wildly diverging differences in opinion.

Agents have Agency

Given the above, I guess I need to explain my initial concept of moral agency.

Put simply, moral agency is the willful action of a moral agent. As Christians, we are agents of Christ, and we strive to put forth God's standards of morality. It is difficult, and at times confusing. But as we grow in spiritual maturity (i.e. discernment and wisdom) we learn how to act better as moral agents of Christ.

The definition of "agent" has a few definitions that lend further insights along this perspective. Among others we find…

Agent

1. A person responsible for a particular action.
2. A person or thing that acts or has the power to act.
3. A person or business authorized to act on another's behalf.
4. A person who acts in an official capacity for a higher authority, e.g. government, police, security, etc.

Revised Statement

My past writings here at Σ Frame have taken the stance that women SHOULD have agency, but in reality, they do NOT, or at least do not show much if any evidence of it. I've had some disagreement, but no one could articulate exactly why they disagreed. But now the reason is more clear to me.

To restate my stance with greater clarity in terms of the above definitions…

1. All women have the potential for exercising moral agency (agency, definition 2).
2. Women do NOT have the propensity nor willingness to exercise moral agency (agency, definition 3).
3. Women only have the power to exercise moral agency within the constraints of the biblical Covenant (agency, definition 3).
4. Women must become moral agents before they can exercise moral agency (agent, definition 3 with my additions; agency, definition 4).

5. Women's agency is learned (agency, definition 4).
6. Men act as agents in molding and teaching women to have moral agency (agent, definitions 1 and 3 respectively with my additions; agency, definition 4).

Concerning points 4-6, (agent, definitions 1 and 2) loom large. IOW, women must be given a task and held accountable for their behavior, and held responsible for their decisions and the outcome. The place and importance of this has been mentioned several times before. IOW, discipline. Combining the Christ : Church :: Husband : Wife analogy with Proverbs 3:12 and Hebrews 12:6, it becomes apparent that men love their wives by disciplining them, "washing them with the Word" (Ephesians 5:25-27), and teaching them to develop moral agency.

As Deep Strength recently emphasized, Men should be aware that some women are compliant, submissive, teachable, and trusting, while others are not, and some women are aggressively militant against Headship. Seeing how important this is towards attaining a God glorifying marriage (and Headship is the only way this can be obtained), perhaps this is the whole reason why it is important for women to be submissive.

So put that in your pipe and smoke it for a while. Given the complexity and confusion surrounding all these definitions and usages, I suspect that further clarification, explanation, and refinement will be needed.

Conclusions

From here on, it seems that we'll need to be a little more precise in our wording. As a way to circumvent further confusion, I might suggest being more specific by…

1. Indicating which paradigm we are speaking of, either the worldly or the biblical.
2. Using the terms functional agency (definition 1), potential agency (definition 2), kinetic agency (definition 3), and dynamic agency (definition 4). (Pardon me for being a STEM major.)

Granted, even if we took the effort to make these distinctions, it would still be wordy and confusing, and maybe even exhausting. This distinction may very well turn out to be meaningless in the real world application, but it does seem to (1) explain the nature of some disagreements and (2) create more order in our mental model of things, and

(3) provide a model from which we can gain some further insights.

The Moral Agency of Dogs

Jack · 18 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

You have total responsibility and limited control. It's a labor of love.

Targeted Readership: Men
Theme: Female Agency and Accountability
Length: 1,600 words
Reading Time: 8 minutes + 31:35 minutes of videos

In our previous discussions, women's level of moral agency has been compared to that of children. This analogy seems to have been lost on some readers, and I'll assume it's because they have no children of their own.

As a philosophical exploration, let's take a look at the moral agency of dogs. Maybe this will resonate with those readers who can't identify with the humbling experience of having children.

The Agency of Dogs is Determined by the Authority Structure

I never wondered whether dogs had agency until I had watched a few episodes of The Dog Whisperer, starring Cesar Millan. Take a look at this video and see for yourself.

Aggressive German Shepard Problem – Solved by Cesar Millan (2020/2/2) Length: 4:40

Here, Cesar points out that the German Shepherd, Savannah, is aggressive towards everyone because she can sense that her owner, Ron, lacks the ability to protect himself. If dogs can sense that their owner is weak and defenseless, then they will be motivated to act as a protector of the owner. If dogs feel their owner has no authority, then they will try to fill the vacuum of authority by asserting a place of authority themselves. So we see that dogs do have a sense of agency in defending their territory and protecting their owners and loved ones. But this agency is strongly dependent on the structure of authority. Dogs know instinctively who the top dog is, and they fall in line.

Cesar's solution is for Ron to learn martial arts so that he can develop a sense of inner strength and self-confidence. After Ron practices karate for a while, he gains the confidence necessary to convince Savannah that he truly has authority and doesn't need her to protect him. As you can see in the video, after Ron gets his inner game together, Savannah is much better behaved and is obedient to Ron's lead.

Women are the same way. If they can't get the sense that a man is confident and self-controlled, then they'll feel insecure and try to assume a position of authority in the relationship. The difference between dogs and women is that dogs will try to protect their owner by being aggressive to everyone else, while women will try to destroy their marriages by taking their aggressions out on the man (e.g. contentiousness, fitness tests, etc.).

Agency and Testosterone

One important piece of information that we gained from Ron and Savannah's story is that a dog's exercise of agency conforms to the structure of authority. Apparently, this also applies to humans too.

Commenter Info brought our attention to a couple scholarly articles indicating that testosterone isn't only associated with dominance but also submission to legitimate authority.

1. Inoue, Y., Takahashi, T., Burriss, R.P. et al. Testosterone promotes either dominance or submissiveness in the Ultimatum Game depending on players' social rank. Sci Rep 7, 5335 (2017). [DOI]
2. D. Terburg, S. Syal, L.A. Rosenberger, S.J. Heany, D.J. Stein, J. van Honk, Testosterone abolishes implicit subordination in social anxiety. Psychoneuroendocrinology, 72 (2016), pp. 205-211. [DOI]

The first paper reports that testosterone promotes either dominance or submissiveness in the Ultimatum Game depending on players' social rank. The second publication indicates that testosterone helps make people comfortable with subordination once a hierarchy is established.

Testosterone, and Agency, lends itself to the authority structure!

Agency and Trust

A small number of people are extremely skilled in managing their dogs. But some owners are clueless, lazy, and negligent about taking care of their dog. They just want the dog to be well-behaved at all times and they get angry and frustrated with the dog when it doesn't do what they want, and this only makes the dog more anxious and ill-behaved. In the next video, Cesar illustrates how to release a dog's fears and insecurities and create an atmosphere in which the dog can trust in the authority of the owner.

Confronting Richard | Dog Whisperer (2012/7/31) Length: 2:46 minutes

As Cesar Millan demonstrates, most ill-behaved dogs are in a continual state of confusion and distrust of their owners, and so they behave accordingly. Cesar explains that the chihuahua, Richard, bites everyone because he is very insecure, has way too much power, and gets attention at the wrong time.

Cesar's solution is to demonstrate his authority by confronting Richard until he can release his fears and anxieties, find rest, and learn to respect his authority. This is the first step towards trust.

Women are the same way. They will throw up all kinds of defense mechanisms (e.g. bulverizing, evading, gaslighting, lying, making excuses, etc.) until a man will confront them, demonstrate authority, and hold them accountable. The difference between dogs and women is that dogs will gradually grow to trust their owner more over time, while women will often doubt a man's authority at the least sign of weakness and will backtrack to a more primitive state of reckoning, often in an attempt to usurp control (e.g. denying sex, secrecy, silent treatment, stonewalling, etc.).

Dogs have Personalities

In the video above, Cesar corraled a contentious chihuahua — a breed of dog known to be a belligerent fice. Such a dog needs to be contained in the home and not allowed to roam outside.

But let's say you have a calm, friendly Collie. She likes to run and play outside. It would be morally cruel to keep her penned up in a small cage all the time.

Now let's say you have a Rottweiler. If the Rottweiler bites the mail man, who is responsible for covering his medical bills? It would not be unreasonable for him to expect the owner of the dog to pay. If he did, then it would be the morally responsible thing to do. If the mail man is seriously injured, then you might serve some prison time.

OTOH, if the Rottweiler bites a thief breaking into the home at night and incapacitates him enough to be apprehended by the law, then you have just done society a favor.

Dogs are Trained through Operant Conditioning

If you want your dog to be disciplined and well behaved, then you'll have to learn how to use Classical and Operant Conditioning and mete out rewards and punishments at exactly the right moments, and on a continually ongoing basis. Cesar Milan demonstrates how to do this.

How To Train Your Puppy! (With Cesar Millan) (2022/4/15) Length: 24:49

As you can see, it requires a patient and full-time effort to dispense regular discipline, and it will take some time for the dog to learn.

> For the moment, all discipline seems not to be pleasant, but painful; yet to those who have been trained by it, > afterward it yields the peaceful fruit of righteousness.

> Hebrews 12:11 (NASB)

Yes, we love and esteem those particular dogs (and women) that are well-behaved, well-disciplined, and well-trained!

Dogs have a Feral Nature

In spite of all the hard work you might do in teaching and disciplining the dog, the dog may relapse into feral behaviors at any time. If this should happen, there is not much you can do other than to continue disciplining the dog.

A dog is short lived, 10 to 15 years at most. (That's about the same length of time that women are young, beautiful, and fertile.)

If you want your dog to have pure bred puppies, then you'll have to do a bit of work to find another person who has a dog of the same breed as yours who is willing to let him out to breed.

If your dog copulates with the neighbor's dog and has a litter of puppies, then whose puppies will they be? Whose responsibility will they be? Who will have to buy dog food and supply medical care for these puppies?

If these puppies are mongrelized, whose fault is that? Isn't it because you let the dog out at night and left things to chance and mother nature?

What if you lived in a society that made it a punishable offense to put your dog on a leash, to keep it penned up, to teach or discipline it, or to arrange, limit, or restrict its shagging habits in any way? And at the same time, this society also requires by law that you must take full responsibility for anything the dog does!

In this case, it is no longer a civilized society, but an enslavement to the dog-eat-dog law of the jungle!

This girl loves her siberian husky.

Conclusions

As we can observe from Cesar Milan's expertise with canines, it's somewhat juvenile to assume that dogs either have moral agency or they do not. In reality, the agency demonstrated by dogs depends on…

1. The structure of authority.
2. The authoritative presence of the owner.
3. The dog's relationship with its owner.
4. A history of Classical and Operant Conditioning.
5. The nature / personality of the dog.
6. The context of a given situation.

The most poignant lesson that Cesar teaches us is that relationships are dynamic, and a clear structure of firm authority and an established trust in that authority are paramount.

If you choose to have a dog, then you'll need to spend a bit of time to care for the dog and teach it how to behave. It will require expenses. There will be times when the dog creates trouble, maybe even serious trouble. Even the most well behaved animals are prone to the error of biting the hand that feeds them and regularly engaging in feral behaviors like shagging indiscriminately.

There will also be moments of excitement and joy.

As any dog owner will tell you, owning a dog is a labor of love. People have dogs because they love them, in spite of all the time invested, the extra expenses, and having to sweep up hair, mop up urine, and scoop up sh!t on a daily basis.

Did Eve have Agency?

Jack · 21 November 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Reconsidering an earlier assumption from the Serpent's viewpoint.

Targeted Readership: Men
Theme: Female Agency and Accountability
Length: 700 words
Reading Time: 3.5 minutes

Deti, Sharkly, and others have cited the story of Adam and Eve as proof that women have agency. It is reasoned that since God held her accountable, then she must have been morally accountable, and thus, she must have had moral agency.

But being held accountable doesn't necessarily mean she did in fact possess agency.

In a follow up post, it was determined that moral agency is a result of having experience and being held accountable. Discipline and accountability is what helps build a sense of moral agency. The primary shortcoming in dealing with women today is that they are NOT held accountable and are therefore NOT developing agency. Although it is altogether proper for those who possess agency to be held accountable, accountability itself is not a result of possessing inherent faculties of agency.

So let's reconsider the account of Eve in the Garden of Eden.

Of all the things that make women's agency weak, e.g. ignorance, easily deceived, easily tempted, fleshly desire, solipsism, vanity, and so on, Eve's fault was succumbing to temptation (Genesis 3:6) and deception, "the serpent deceived me and I ate" (Genesis 3:13). Maybe discontentment could fit in there too. If we take her statement as a true fact, then Eve's response shows a level of introspection that is beyond that which we are used to seeing in modern women. If this is the case, then it seems she was pretty honest. She didn't resort to bulverizing, denial, gaslighting, hamsterbating, or any of the other defense tactics that we often see coming out of women. (Maybe she did, but it is not recorded.)

I'm wary of the risks of reading deeper into the scripture, but it's a matter of speculation whether she was being honest about being deceived or if she was always aware of her wrongdoing at some level and was shifting the blame. IOW, it's hard to tell whether she was a willing accomplice or if she was truly scammed.

In addition to her statement, there are two other things that lend evidence that Eve was truly beguiled.

1. Women are easily deceived. It's hard to know whether this inherent weakness in women's nature is a result of the Fall, or if women were like this in the pre-Edenic state.
2. The serpent didn't eat the fruit, but God held the serpent responsible and punished him.

If we look at what Eve did, not what she said, as per the usual Red Pill protocol for discerning the truth about women, then it is clear that no matter what the reason was, Eve failed to exercise agency at a critical moment and then all of mankind fell into sin.

Did anyone ever consider that maybe Eve didn't have moral agency, or at least, not enough to restrain herself from swallowing, but that God held her accountable anyway? If this were truly the case, then this might raise the objection that "God is not fair." But when we read through the rest of the Bible, where exactly do we see God being "fair"? The unpleasant truth is that God is NOT "fair", according to our human estimation of fairness. God deals with each person individually. God has his own concept of justice that is difficult for us humans to understand.

It is common for us to see Adam's primary sin as joining Eve in eating the fruit. But God said He punished Adam, "Because you have heeded the voice of your wife, and have eaten from the tree" (Genesis 3:17). Note there are two reasons. Have we ever considered that maybe… Maybe his more egregious sin was in NOT holding Eve accountable, and this is what is implied by "heeding the voice of your wife" as opposed to him giving her a voice to heed — an inversion of authority. His eating the fruit is mentioned second to this because it just made the situation all that much worse.

Who knows how things would have turned out if Adam had smacked the fruit out of her hand and imposed Frame? All we know is that no one was held accountable until God stepped onto the scene, and by then it was too late.

Bottom line: If anything, the account of Adam and Eve shows that Eve did NOT have agency, and Eve's lack of agency proved to be a weakness in Adam's moral agency.

We'll have to find another example of a woman exercising agency to make a solid case for women having agency, like Esther, Rahab, Ruth, or Sarah — and we would still have to recognize that even these examples would be extremely rare outliers.

Jack's Theory of Female Agency

So far this month, we've seen quite a bit of discussion about women's moral agency.

Putting this all together, I will postulate here that the reason why the very existence of women's agency is questionably vague to men, is the sum result of several interdependent conditions and motivating factors, which are listed as follows.

1. Women's general awareness focuses primarily on (1) maintaining a sense of emotional balance and socio-spiritual security (AKA "the feeelz"), and (2) establishing and maintaining a cascading chain of increasing ego relevancy (getting attention, Feedback, etc.). As a result, women's concept of cause-and-effect is centered around this consciousness, and not one of purpose and longitudinal outcome, as a man would think.
2. Aside from certain areas of particular interest to women (i.e. the general focus of awareness described in (1), e.g. establishing and maintaining ego primacy, garnering or avoiding attention, etc.), women are generally unaware that they have a choice in how they react to their circumstances. So instead of taking responsibility for their choices, they will blame the circumstances or others who are involved, and/or resort to evasion and control tactics.
3. Women are generally hesitant to trust in men and their leadership, and this is often times an expression of their faltering trust in God.
4. Related to 1-3, the peculiar inclination common to women in their attempts to dominate and control men, AKA "The Curse of Eve".
5. A combination of the above causes women to revert into a solipsistic, narcissistic, Machiavellian character, in a self-defensive reaction to the above confines.
6. The Machiavellian nature of women has thus made it appear as though Women lack agency. That is to say, under certain circumstances, it is in a woman's interest, although not necessarily her best interests, to avoid letting men have the certainty that she possesses agency, thereby appealing to men's performative nature (e.g. Chivalry, White Knighting) and abrogating the associated responsibilities thereof.
7. One benefit of feigning helplessness is for her to retain the liberty of her Feelz, to maintain a semblance of control over the cascade, and all while reassigning the sense of duty and physical work to the male. It should be noted that such a strategy takes advantage of the altruistic instincts present in the male, that of acting as a provider and protector.
8. The way things play out IRL usually tends to lock women into this state of consciousness — unless / until adverse circumstances (e.g. desperate helplessness, the responsibilities of motherhood, etc.) strike, and/or a higher authority (e.g. God, or a man) steps in and shakes things up.

In the application, the most important points are as follows.

1. Point (1) above cannot be changed, but it can be managed.
2. In terms of female psychology, Points 1-2 are often described as solipsistic.
3. As long as a woman languishes in the conditions described in 2-6, she will remain spiritually immature.
4. Men must be aware of the above, but especially to avoid succumbing to points 6-7.
5. It is up to men to create conditions that foster accountability, introspection, and self-awareness for women.
6. The degree to which a woman (and men too) possesses and exercises moral agency, is directly proportional to her level of spiritual maturity.
7. As NaturallyAspirated observed, love is the freely chosen action of a moral agent.
8. Love begins where perfection ends.

Women's Agency is Dependent on Men's Agency

Oscar wrote,

> "As always, don't just listen to what people say, watch what they do."

As I've been writing posts for this month's theme, I have come to the same idea. The assessment and assignation of Agency is more about people's behaviors than what they actually say or even believe. And it's not only women's behaviors that come into the equation.

> "A lot of men who claim that women have no moral agency hold women accountable for their actions."

Yes, I've noticed this too, although it seems kinda rare. The interesting thing is that their belief that women DO NOT have agency is what motivates them to hold them accountable. Whereas, men who believe that women DO have agency tend to sit back on their laurels with the expectation that women will exercise agency of their own initiative. But the interesting thing here is that women don't work that way. Usually, whenever you see a woman who actually exercises agency, somewhere in the background there is a man providing the framework / guidance / initiative / incentive / motivation for the woman to be that way.

> "In so doing, these men prove that they actually believe that women do have moral agency."

Yes, but this belief is shown in practice, not in cognition. They may very well have no awareness at all about this difference. This is an example of how people can believe falsehoods in their heads that actually reinforce the practice of truth in their lives. Similarly, people can believe truths in their heads, but have no idea how to practice those truths in their lives.

Often times, it doesn't help to talk about the factual truth with women like men would reason amongst themselves. The trick in dealing with women is not so much about speaking or even thinking the factual truth; it's more about bringing the actual truth to life, which is not at all the same thing.

The thing that is relative to our discussion of agency is that women will only change their mindset and take appropriate action after a man (or men) step in and redirect the course. If men don't intervene, then women will continue in a state of confusion, depression, frustration, etc.

So instead of seeking to engage in rational discussions with women, it may be more beneficial and efficient for men to redirect women's train of thought by interjecting fantasy, mythos, light-hearted humor, and painting an illustration of a glorified Life in the Spirit. Also, Men should be careful not to fall into the traps of admitting women's arguments or taking women's negativity seriously.

A few examples of how to create a guiding frame were given in previous comments from Jack and Red Pill Apostle. Also see deti's many comments. Or check out how Trid interacts with Sheena in the videos!

Trid adopts mythos as a form of humor, with great effect.

Concluding Statements

We all have latent agency. We all have a domain of influence in which there are things we can control, and people we can influence.

We all have limited agency. There are boundaries to our domain of influence, and things over which we have zero influence or control.

Wisdom lies in…

- Categorizing things accurately.
- Being aware of boundaries.
- Maintaining boundaries responsibly.
- Behaving accordingly.

The task remains to develop the full capacity of moral agency within our personal domain in order to become a moral agent of God's love. Love between conscious entities reaches its true nature in glory only when it is freely chosen.

As Dave Ramsey put it,

> "Work like it all depends on you, and pray like it all depends on God."

Deti on Female Accountability

I don't agree with any perspective that puts 100% of the responsibility for the success or failure of a marriage on the man as the head.

I do not agree with the notion that a woman is literally the oldest teenager in the house. That's a humorous way of saying women get ruled by their emotions, so they aren't really responsible for their actions. But, the fact that women let their emotions rule them does NOT exonerate them from individual, personal accountability for what women say and do.

I do not subscribe to The Red Pill's tenet that women are the most responsible teenagers in the house. No. A woman is a fully functioning agent, with her own free will. She is fully, personally, independently responsible for everything she does.

From the very beginning, Eve was held accountable for her sin. Individually accountable. In fact, God the Father held Eve accountable FIRST, before he said, "Yeah, Adam, have a seat, because yours is coming too." And He did not say, "Well, Eve, this happened because Adam…" He didn't say anything other than "This is your consequence." He imposed it on Eve, alone.

He didn't waste any time explaining to Eve why he was imposing this consequence on her because, like the woman she was, she blamed her sin on the serpent. "The serpent deceived me, and I ate." She wouldn't even take responsibility. "Yeah, um, I did that, but it was that serpent's fault! Yeah, um, You caught me… but it's not my fault!"

No point in arguing with Eve what she did and that it was on her. God the Father just said, "OK, here's your consequence." And it was done. "You'll have pain in childbirth. You have to submit to Adam and do what he says. And you'll hate it and chafe under it and try to rule him."

The point is that women have full personal agency. As such they can be held fully personally accountable. It doesn't matter that they themselves will not acknowledge their own agency. All that matters is that they have that agency. So, if a woman will not do what she's required to do in her marriage, then she's accountable for it and should bear all the consequences for it. If she willfully refuses her husband's directions, then her husband is within his rights to impose consequences. Without explanation, as God The Father did. "Nope, don't wanna hear your rationalizations and excuses. Yes, it's your fault, and here's your consequence."

So if a woman leaves a marriage, or a husband ends his marriage to her because of her willful resistance to submission, then that's on her. The end of the marriage is her responsibility. Not his. HERS. He merely imposed a consequence upon her. Or, more accurately, allowed the natural consequences of her actions to bear their full weight on her. So for those reasons, I do not agree that the success or failure of a marriage rides fully on the man's back.

Failing to Launch

The Data

Take a look at these headlines. The earliest were written about 9 years ago.

1. Market Watch: Women leave nest, men stay with parents (2013/8/5).
2. Pew Research Center: Male Millennials more likely to live at home than females (2013/8/14).
3. Pew Research Center: Millennials still lag in forming their own households (2013/10/18)

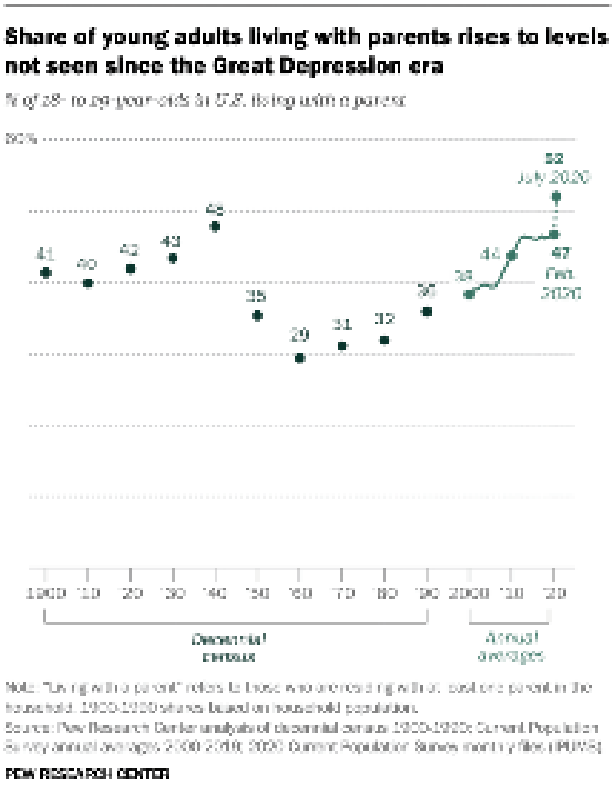
According to articles (1) and (2), young women were itching to go to college for party fun and/or move to the big city and chase after chads, ahem, "careers". Meanwhile, young men wouldn't leave their parent's nest.

Sorority girls learning "professional" skills in college. Heh.
Now compare these reports to these articles from 5-7 years ago.

1. Pew Research Center: Record share of young women are living with their parents, relatives (2015/11/11)
2. Pew Research Center: In the U.S. and abroad, more young adults are living with their parents (2016/5/24)
3. Pew Research Center: Increase in living with parents driven by those ages 25-34, non-college grads (2016/6/8)

And these from 3-5 years ago.

1. Pew Research Center: It's becoming more common for young adults to live at home – and for longer stretches (2017/5/5)
2. Pew Research Center: A record 64 million Americans live in multigenerational households (2018/4/5)
3. Pew Research Center: A majority of young adults in the U.S. live with their parents for the first time since the Great Depression (2020/9/4)



After first reading through these headlines, we might assume there is a pattern: Young women leave the nest, while young men stay at home. Then after a period of time, everyone's living at home with mom and pop. Previous generations used to call this, "failing to launch". If this were the case, we could assume that the same cohort of women reported in the earlier articles failed to make it big in their careers with their worthless degrees in art history, ballet, communications, gender studies, etc. and then returned home with their nails between their legs.

When we consider the history going back farther (see image on right), we find there is more to the story. This trend of young people living with their parents has been rising since 1960!

Now, part of the trend since 2020 can be attributed to the COVID related lockdowns and closedowns. But if we consider the overall trend since 1960, the low numbers of young people living with parents in early 2020 is on the low end.

Furthermore, when we consider Dalrock's report on Percentage of US population over 15 who were married by sex and race, 1950–2017 (2018/8/27) [Archive], we see that marital status took a nose dive starting in… you guessed it — 1960!

Notice that for all data points since 1960, the number of white marrieds corresponds within 2% with the number of young people NOT living at home. It could be a spurious corellation, but I think it's safe to say that the increased numbers of young people living with parents is a direct result of the declining marriage rates. IOW, an increasing number of young women are choosing the college and career route (AKA The Feminist Life Script) instead of getting married; young men have less hope of marrying, and thereby both men and women fail to launch.

That conclusion would also match up with what I am seeing when I look around, even with respect to the data I presented earlier. Let me explain.

The Lifestyle that Explains the Data

I know several women who continued to live at home after they turned 18. They all wanted to move out to get away from family and the church. Most wanted to "live in the city". (I live in a small state, so the few cities we have are a big deal.) Some of these women actually did so. They got roomates in order to afford luxurious apartments that even single men couldn't afford. And then to make their financial status even more precarious, they would spend every d@mn dollar they made! There was no life plan, no goal of getting married, no savings, no wisdom. Even the super duper church girls who said they wanted to "have a family" — they bought nice cars and a whole wardrobe stocked full of sequined party dresses and stiletto pumps, they went out to the bars and clubs, and they ate at pricey restaurants every single d@mn day, etc. etc. And then to cap off all this ridiculousness, they fully expect that any relationship they might enter will carry them above their current fake standard of living!

Life is a meaningless party.

A smaller number of these “single” women are a bit more realistic, but not by much. They are constantly in a relationship (i.e. serial monogamy) and live with their boyfriends all the time. There is less of a need for them to move back into their parents’ place unless things go poorly, as in, “having a baby and the guy leaves” poorly.

The one sad thing they all have in common is the CC.

As you might imagine, it doesn’t last long. Some of these women could easily afford leaving their home and buying another because they were nurses earning a decent salary. But for most of them, at the end of the day, it was a stupid financial decision that cost them a ton of money and indicated they were not forward thinking.

The bottom line is — they didn’t leave home for the money nor even the “education” — they did it for the “life experience” — a polite euphemism for living under Satan’s service (viz. “independently”) and getting their wild oats sowed so as to create stem cells for the PTB.

Here’s another thing I have seen among the people I used to go to church with. Their daughters have been single for many years at this point. They tend to leave the faith and engage in gnostic garbage that appeals to their sensuality/emotions such as astrology. They all adopt dogs as their children and post nonstop about their mental illness of pretending Mr. McScruffy is their son. A few months ago, I saw one of the most repulsive things to date — parents now adopting “grand children” dogs to go along with their demented daughters’ delusions.

Meanwhile, younger men who strike off on their own sleep on mattresses without bed frames and don’t have any furniture in their rooms. Their idea of fun is getting a gym membership or a Play Station.

A Word of Advice to Young Men

I have been saying that we've been in a recession since the fall of 2019, and that the later PPP and stimulus relief were measures intended to disguise the dip and get us through. Well, that ended and we never recovered, and it is getting worse.

I don't know what to expect in the coming months, but I wouldnt be surprised if the housing market will crash. If you have $$$ saved up, you can get a first time home buyers mortgage and take advantage of this situation. But with no cash, members of both sexes will have to continue living at home, or move back there (provided there are jobs where mom and dad live).

If you don't have $$$ saved up, then with the state of the economy right now, I think it would be wise for a young man to remain living in his parents' home if possible, as long as he is busy doing something with his life and is saving up $$$. However, even if a man wanted to stay at home to raise money, in the West it would be frowned upon and considered shameful. Not that I know of many uber masculine guys who do stay at home, but it's often because they don't have a choice.

If you don't have $$$ and if life/work opportunities are scant near home, then a man would probably be doing himself a favor by leaving home and doing something with himself — attending college, or traveling, or working, or whatever — anything that would lead him closer to finding his purpose in Life. Join the f_ck!ng army if you have to!

So whether you live at home or not, get started in your career, save your money, and get ready to "build your field", referencing OT wisdom and the process where a man becomes established before the gold-grubbing hoes take notice and come along.

Conclusions

In summary, investing in one's self takes different paths for either sex. But more and more as time goes on, women are pursuing the male path of establishing education and career, while men are defaulting to the female path of being a home body. Thus, we see that women are leaving home during their fertile years to pursue worldly ambitions (AKA "getting an education" / "life experience"). By chance or by choice, somewhere along the line they hear the siren call of the CC, get gamed, perched, and stuffed, and then they eventually fly back to the home roost with few less feathers to show for it. Meanwhile, men have no such ambitions.

Tying this back into our current discussion of women's moral agency, women are certainly exercising their will to leave home and shinny around the men's dormitories and/or the bars, clubs, and streets of the big cities during their peak fertile years. But of course, by doing so they recuse themselves from any expression of moral agency, and this is true no matter whatever "moralized" behaviors they may be doing, or say they are doing on a day-to-day basis (attending church, avoiding the party life, "looking for a husband", etc.).

Finally, and I hate to say it, but it seems that on the whole, men are not showing much moral agency either, at least in terms of where their life trajectory is concerned. Sitting at home with mom and dad doesn't sound like much of a plan.

Holding Out

Scott's Continuums stirred up a lot of my past. My marriage to my late wife is a textbook case of this discussion (and even this entire blog). I could write a book on my experiences with her of the various topics, but here, I'll share a brief summary of my story as another anecdote to add to the pile.

A large part of the discussion concerned the question of whether women know what they are doing when they hold out sex. By "hold out", I mean this in both senses of the term — offering and denying. They hold out sex as an enticement before marriage, and they hold out on sex after marriage when they fail to deliver or refuse to satisfy.

As far as women knowing what they are doing, my wife certainly knew what my needs were and what she was doing. Two years into our marriage, she wrote me a letter and in it she stated,

> "You need to be respected as the man of the home. You need to have a supportive wife. You need to be appreciated. You need to be loved. You need your physical needs met as well as your emotional needs."

She knew what my needs were and her part in satisfying them. However, her actions didn't align 99.999% of the time, and that 0.001% was clearly driven by her own motives and had nothing to do with my own desires or needs. The best sex we ever had was when she wanted children. During that time she rode me like a porn star!

Twenty-seven years later, she said that sex was never a big deal to her; that it would be okay with her if we didn't have sex but once or twice a year.

It was a soul shattering epiphany. All those times when I wanted to make love with her, and I was met with her indignation, I had gracefully dismissed it as being an untimely moment. But now, suddenly it all fell into place. To me, it was "making love to my wife", but to her, it was, "he wants to have s.e.x…".

How could I take that to mean anything other than making love to me has no meaning to her? That the act of sex with her husband is just . . . sex. Nothing more.

Wow!

How does a husband not lose all enthusiasm for his bride when she reveals that? How do you not feel let down — for all those times you made love to her — to now realize (after 29 years of marriage) that it didn't really mean anything to her. That she would have been fine to have left it — in the "take it or leave it" realm. What choice does a man have but to look at her differently? To look at her less as someone who loves him and that wants to express that love in such a way that is consistent with how God designed the marriage — to have a taste of Eden that resembles the unity of the two in the pre-fall. How can he not look at her more as what she has positioned herself to be — an unwilling tool — and the corollary, seeing himself as a total fool?

But who will she have to blame but herself? After all, she is the one who relegated the act to an unnecessary primal obligation. She is the one who sees it as "just sex", instead of an expression of love that is to be shared between one man and one woman in the union of marriage; an act of communion that sanctifies the marriage; an act of becoming one that cannot be expressed in any other way.

Seven months after that revealing disclosure, she began a 4-day assault of verbal and physical attacks. It was as bad as it had ever been. My description here grossly understates the intensity and the confrontational nature of her approach with me. It is hard to capture in writing the tone of contempt and hate. It is not a demeanor one presents to those they love. It is not an approach of seeking understanding, let alone seeking reconciliation. She persisted intensely for four days. I told her that if she wants to divorce me, to go ahead — we would each take half. She responded with fury, stating that she was going to take EVERYTHING. A couple days later, when she cooled down, I told her she could have everything if that's what is important to her. I'd rather live in a cardboard box than with her abuse.

A day later she came on to give me a kiss in the kitchen. It was a kiss that I don't recall her ever giving. It happened a couple times throughout the day. Later she told me that our kissing got her wet. This is so far beyond what she had ever said in terms of coming on to me in our 30 years of marriage. When I went to bed that evening, she was wearing a nighty and a thong and asserted herself like she hadn't done in at least 15 years. This went on four or five times more for the next five or six days.

Then it all ended.

It confirmed what I already knew, that she used sex to either get what she wants or to claw me back into the relationship. It was straight manipulation. After the "make me wet" stuff, my thoughts were, "So she had this in her all throughout our marriage, but she held it back by her own will." Where did this idea ("You make me wet!") come from within her? From within this woman who had presented herself to me for 30 years as a somewhat prudish Christian woman; who called me a pervert for wanting sex with her on a regular basis. Suddenly this? What I would have warmly welcomed at any other time in the past became something tainted. Where did it come from? Did she recall it from her past relationships years ago before we met? I had never heard it from her before.

I asked her about where she got this and she said, "I thought that's what you wanted." Well… it is, but not as a way to claw me back after a 4 day out-of-control tirade of accusations and yelling. It should have been a part of our relationship all along.

And that's what makes me sick.

The advances I made over the years were always pushed off as, "that's all you want" or worse, indifference. What should have been for 30 years, she withheld from the one person she should have been giving herself to with heartfelt enthusiasm — a passionate act of love to encourage instead of discouraging the "becoming one flesh" that would have been part of a healthy marriage.

Sex for married men is like gambling in that once you experience a winning hand, you foolishly think it's out there to be had again. We know that our wives are capable through a glimpse either in pre-marital sex or after marriage and we foolishly think that something will bring it back. But at some point you realize that it never really was and never will be.

Closing Statements from Jack

In the discussion under Continuums, there was a lot of talk about the motivations a woman might have in carrying a laissez faire attitude towards sexual relations with her husband, including a lack of attraction, being alpha widowed, carelessness, control and the idolatry of control, cruelty, depravity, opportunism, selfishness, sinful pride / a lack of humility, … But upon looking deeper than these things, which may vary from woman to woman and might change over time, it seems that women want to maintain a state of sexual tension primarily to keep their man humble (even at the expense of sacrificing his ego) and also to create the histrionics which their sense of emotional well-being feeds upon. Even if they can't or don't feel visceral desire, then at least they can get the ego validation of being desired. This is often glossed over as being "control", but it is not the same as a man thinks of it. It is more like edging in the spiritual sense – always walking that razor thin edge – not all in, but not out either, but yet, keeping up sufficient appearances in order to let the man believe she's all in, and only just enough to avoid being kicked out. And yes, it is all of the above things which have been mentioned by commenters.

Imagine realizing this after 29 years of marriage!

Update

This post has received quite a bit of feedback in the comments. Readers have offered a few theories about the author's wife's disposition, namely Hysteric Bonding, Incentives, The Main Event, and The Madonna / Whore Complex. This gives us a lot to think about and ponder.

The author of the OP has written a follow-up response to me. He wishes to thank everyone for their comments and support. He believes his wife's behavior was more along the lines of Hysteric Bonding, and it was aggravated by many other confounding issues.

Kyojiro Kagenuma on Women's Agency

Jack · 4 December 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The idolatrous twin sins of Female Hypoagency and Male Hyperagency.

Targeted Readership: Men
Theme: Female Agency and Accountability
Length: 1,500 words
Reading Time: 7.5 minutes + 2 videos totaling 11:25 minutes

Introduction

A little-known Japanese Manospherian, Kyojiro Kagenuma (AKA Going Your Own Way, or GYOW), offers this brilliant tidbit of insight on the MGTOW Forum, Going Your Own Way: The Female Psychosis (2014/3/16). In this essay, Kagenuma paints a damning portrait of female psychology in which he describes four interdependent aspects of Female Psychosis detailing the mental conditions of women.

1. Egocentrism
2. Narcissism
3. Solipsism
4. The mythical and immortal Rationalization Hamster.

The full article is quite lengthy, but well worth reading. I'd even call it required, as IMO it ranks up there with The Misandry Bubble (2010/1/1) and Gems (2020/1/1) by Imran Khan and Kartik Gada in terms of Red Pill literary value.

Many of the sources Kagenuma cites have been scrubbed from the internet, but I have been able to find some archives at The WayBack Machine and have provided alternative links instead. I have not been able to find all the scientific studies that he cites in his larger essay, but I have been able to locate those references cited in the excerpts below.

I've also taken the liberty to clean up the English a bit.

Infantile Solipsism

I would consider Infantile Solipsism to be an expression of severe immaturity, whether it be emotional, psychological, spiritual, or otherwise, as aptly indicated by the descriptor, 'infantile'. The major problem is that modern women languish in this condition until middle age or even longer.

Kagenuma describes this condition in full detail.

> "Infantile Solipsism is when a woman perceives the world as full of appliances that go up and down in terms of their usefulness to her, which therefore from her perspective can go from meaningful to meaningless. Now please take a moment to consider the above statement; if from her perspective something is considered as meaningless, that means that thing does not exist, at least in her mind."

This is why low SMV men are "invisible" to most women.

> "Infantile Solipsism is 'you only see what you want to see,' although that is only half of it because 'you also won't see what you don't want to see.' This can explain why some people – especially Narcissists – have difficulty empathizing with others; if you are meaningless to her then all your actions are meaningless."

This is why it is virtually impossible for low SMV men to get any traction with women, even though they may say and do the exact same things as high SMV men.

> "It also explains why women can easily dismiss obvious evidences so easily; if something is meaningless then it does not exist and conversely, if she perceives something as non-existent then every meaningful detail attached to that thing is null.
> Infantile Solipsism is also the principal belief behind the sense of entitlement. A woman only sees those who are wealthier than her, she becomes envious and she wants that wealth for herself, not acknowledging that there are many people around her that are not as well off as she is. She only feels her wants and that is being entitled for a luxurious lifestyle; her belief in this sense of self-entitlement drives her to search for ways to achieve that goal which leads to Hypergamy."

Kagenuma has identified Infantile Solipsism as the psychological foundation of Hypergamy. Brilliant! I don't think even Rollo went that deep.

He included the following two videos to exemplify how Infantile Solipsism is manifested in Hypergamy.

> "What? Not All Women Are Like That? Here's a clip from the other side of the world."

> "And we know that women all over the world are hypergamous because a study conducted worldwide across 37 cultures strongly support the position that women prefer marriage partners who either have or have the potential to obtain social status and control material resources [Buss 1989].
> This study included that women rated 'good financial prospect' higher than did men in all cultures. Hence most women are hypergamous and this belief that they deserve a luxury stems from their self-absorbed, envious, infantile perspective that they are entitled to such things. You're not entitled to anything that you don't work for.
> But it does not stop there."

Female Hypoagency

> "Among the most fundamental beliefs that women ascribe to is the belief that women are not actors in their own lives but are only acted upon, which is called Female Hypoagency [Ginkgo 2011]. Women believe that they lack the ability to act, to affect things, and thereby can produce no effects [ThinkingApe-TV 2012]."

The article from Ginkgo outlines a specific definition for Female Hypoagency as follows.

> "Female hypoagency is what we call the cultural tendency to deny that women have agency. We are talking about imputed rather than real lack of agency. This means that when a woman does something, her agency in that act is denied, so that if that act is something bad, she will be immune from blame.
> A necessary corollary of female hypoagency is male hyperagency. Under male hyperagency, men are held responsible for all the things women are not."

Back to Kagenuma's essay.

> "Women only want to see men do things and do not want to see themselves doing it; this is termed Infantile Solipsism.
> And because they only want to believe this, they demand others – specifically men – to do and act for them, in what is termed as Male Hyperagency. Feminism then can be viewed as a belief system – a religion – based on feminine tenets, such as Female Hypoagency, where the feminazis cry 'victim' to the Descartian-like Evil Demon fantasy that is "The Patriarchy", or the traditionalist maidens feign damseling to the Gynocracy."

Apparently, Female Hypoagency is quite easy to accept as being true, simply because that is what we always see in 99.99% women, 99.99% of the time. Although women do have the innate potential for agency and all women are aware of this at some level (and definitely those with sufficient sexperience), Infantile Solipsism implies that they are incapable of standing up to the responsibilities that come with it, nor can they shoulder the guilt, loss, and shame that comes from neglecting that responsibility OTOH. Thus, this conundrum gets pushed as far away from their consciousness as they can manage (denial) because of all the obvious negative implications.

That's why it seems like "It's not on their radar screen at all". That's why it seems like they are blind to it, and whenever they are forced to recognize their own agency, they are obstinately opposed to employing it, and so they never exercise it. They never develop that capability and they never grow into it. So they remain spiritual infants. Yes, SPIRITUAL infants. The mindset of Infantile Solipsism, as well as the other three psychoses outlined by Kagenuma, are marks of spiritual immaturity (1 Corinthians 3:1-3; Hebrews 5:11-14).

Women need to repent of Infantile Solipsism and develop their agentic capacity if they ever hope to become mature Christians. For example, in No More Mrs. Hot Mess! (2021/11/29), reader Femmy gave a credible testimony of her repentance in which she explained that she did not perceive that she had agency until someone pointed it out, and once she was aware of it, she said it was very difficult for her to act on it. She also said AWALT. From what I have seen, this is more or less true much of the time. Also, Femmy is somewhat of a unicorn. Most women insist on female hypoagency and thereby deny their agency instead of rethinking their position and doing the hard work of repenting as Femmy did.

As I noted in this same essay, this lack of self-awareness and itinerant agency is what is often touted by women as a "lack of self-esteem". Here, "lack of self-esteem" is code for feeling paralyzed by the fear of taking agentic action. In fact, anytime we hear of women justifying their bad decisions because of "not enough self-esteem", we can safely assume that to mean they were languishing in a crisis of disbelief (or a suspension of disbelief), and were too solipsistic to be able to respond appropriately. In essence, they are hiding behind the pseudo-religion of female hypoagency.

I have concluded that…

> "…men, fathers, and husbands need to make the women in their charge aware of this instinctive reaction common to women so that they will have a greater self-awareness and therefore will possess the ability to exercise agency."

Scott also alluded to this in How do we teach young women about their own nature? (2022/6/18), and suggested that Operant Conditioning is necessary to remove the veil from women's eyes. IOW, discipline and accountability.

Moreover, my point in saying all this is that what Ginkgo and Kagenuma call 'hypoagency', is more simply and precisely understood as a fear of accepting responsibility. It is a lack of faith in (1) the power of God to work through human agency when we make a choice to do what is right, and (2) the grace of God to carry us through those times when we make poor choices that are agentic in nature (not to be confused with non-agentic choices such as addiction, avoidance, denial, hamsterbation, rebellion, self-anesthetization, etc.). In order for women to develop faith and self-control, it is necessary for Men to impose Frame and hold women accountable, especially wives, daughters, and others within our domain of influence.

Gynocentrism and Feminism

> "Gynocentrism then, is cultural Male Hyperagency, which is one of the most blatant forms of Narcissistic Exploitation by women. Gynocentrism includes the idea that men should slave and sacrifice themselves for women and that women's dysfunctional behavior should be forgiven and forgotten, i.e. Narcissistic Supply and the 'Pussy Pass'."

This observation parallels what Dalrock and deti have observed within the church, and independently confirms that the same thing is/was happening in the wider culture (i.e. the church is converged).

> "Feminism is the organized religion of Female Solipsistic Psychosis that spawned and nurtured Gynocentrism, which is cultural enslavement of men, that includes sending men to their death during wartime. Gynocentrism is essentially, the systemic gender violence and discrimination of men; Gynocentrism is Misandry."

Elsewhere in both articles from Kagenuma and Ginkgo and in the comments sections, examples are given of women sending men to their deaths (e.g. the Titanic, WW1, H!tler's Valkyries, Thatcher and the Falkland Islands, etc.)

It seems I've heard the argument of "Gynocentrism = Misandry" elsewhere in the Manosphere, but I cannot remember where. I know Dalrock and Biblical Gender Roles have alluded to this, but I'm not sure if they ever stated it so explicitly. Perhaps a reader knows. Anyway, another score for Kagenuma.

> "And we can prove this Misandry by looking at R@pe Shield Laws where men cannot even defend themselves against the woman's accusations of r@pe which was proven to be false such as the Duke Lacrosse case [Appleborne 2007]. We can also look at British Crime Surveys that put domestic violence against men by women in the U.K. at 40%, and how the society at large ignores this [Hoyle 2013]. We can also see how British society is so blatantly biased against fathers, that 60% of all households in cities such as Cardiff, Liverpool and Sheffield are fatherless [Sawer, 2013]. All of this proves that Gynocentrism and Feminism are both discriminatory and evil."

See links below for evidence of these claims.

Seeing how female hypoagency is a fear of accepting responsibility, I suspect that male hyperagency is also driven by a fear, perhaps a fear of impotency or inefficacy. Readers are welcome to speculate about what those fears might be.

Agency is Anathema to the Female Fleshly Nature

Women desperately and instinctively avoid all things agentic in nature.

Case Study – JustPearlyThings

Whenever we're discussing intersexual dynamics with women, there seems to be no end to the number of denials, excuses, justifications, objections, obfuscations, projections, and red herrings that pop out whenever the topic of Female Agency comes up. It's 100% predictable!

For example, take a look at this video that Jack shared under deti's last post on Female Accountability (022/11/25).

JustPearlyThings: Modern Women HATE being ACCOUNTABLE for Actions (2022/11/28) Length: 11:36

Of special interest is the "Christian" girl in the black turtleneck (sitting on the right). During the earlier part of the video, she carries a smug look that betrays a red flag of pride, and she expresses faux annoyance every single d@mn time women's responsibility or contribution to a relationship is brought up!

The outspoken girl in the red sweater (seated center) is the typical hypoagentic chick who feigns total ignorance of all things agentic. When she is presented with inescapable facts (at 2:30), she keeps evading the question by nit-picking about the wording ("h0e" at 3:00), elaborating on her feeelings, and then (at 3:28) hijacking the conversation by bringing up the "double standard". By doing so, she successfully avoids the issue as then Pearl has to explain evo-psyche mating dynamics to her for the next 3 minutes.

Finally (at 6:50), the British dude in the black cap (i.e. a man) attempts to steer the discussion back to a topic related to women's agency. (BTW, this is a skill all men need to learn — how to keep a woman on topic and not be distracted by her 3 ring circus show.)

But as soon as he's finished talking, the "Christian" girl has reached the limits of her comfort zone and is barfing in her throat. She clumsily fumbles for words in an effort to evade the topic of agency and accountability by bringing up how "purity culture" messed with her mind — a subtle attempt to shift responsibility. She gives a spiel at 7:30 in which she presents her emotions and her indignation at the existence of less attractive men as "deep thought" and "serious commentary". This isn't "thinking things through". This is little more than her "bad feelings" that men want sex, and if they don't get it from her, they'll move on and try to get it elsewhere or do without.

At 8:45, "Christian" girl makes the point that Christianity as depicted in the OT creates a mindset of what she calls "hypersexuality", and she is clearly uncomfortable with the idea of women constantly having to anticipate the "hypersexuality" of men. (BTW, it's called testosterone. Unfortunately, no one brings up how men must constantly anticipate the hypergamy, hypoagency, and other machinations of women.) When Pearl sets her straight (at 9:00), she gets flustered and evades the truth by trying to "clarify" herself (at 9:25). It is obvious that she can see the writing on the proverbial Wall (unlike the other two seated), but she's evading, fighting, squirming, and justifying herself through the whole ordeal.

Just like a 5-year-old girl caught stealing sweets!

You can see this when Pearl brings up some uncomfortable truth (at 10:05): "You'll eventually lose your looks". "Christian" Girl is so overwhelmed by this factoid that she can't even put her thoughts together, and after a moment she deflects by responding, "…that's not my point…" (at 10:20), and then she starts rambling something about virginity.

But, sweetie, that IS the point – that's the entire point of this exercise!

And this is just one 11-½ minute interaction! Readers could randomly choose any conversation or video on TikTok or YouTube in which men and women are discussing intersexual dynamics and/or Red Pill topics, and you'll see the same kinds of reactions from women. Pearl's audience is rather polite, compared to some other craziness we've seen.

Hypoagentic Triggers

From this one video, we can learn there are certain ideas / topics that trigger women's hypoagentic defenses, characterized by a regurgitated flood of denials, excuses, justifications, objections, obfuscations, projections, and red herrings. Namely…

1. That both men and women are sexual beings.
2. That behaviors and choices carry consequences.
3. That women prefer top 10% SMV men, and that all other men are invisible to them.
4. That men prefer easy going hoes for fun, loyal virgins for marriage, and beautiful young women in general.
5. That men want things from their relationships, just as women do.
6. That if they want something from men, then they need to offer something that those men want from them.

I'll guess that if this list were extended, it would include all things Biblical or Red Pill, or… ahem… anything uncomfortably truthful!

A Gynocentric Society Inhibits Female Agency

Western Feminism is a stumbling block for women's exercise of moral agency.

In the past, life conditions imposed responsibilities on women, but modernity and liberal polity have strategically removed these incentives. The feminist movements have advocated for changes in law and social standing that give greater economic and political liberties to women, but which also deny, limit, or even prohibit the exercise of true moral agency of females. Now, women have few incentives and little to no motivation to exercise agency, and there is next to nothing remaining to keep themselves in check.

As the Progressive / Feminist / W0ke juggernaut progressed in scope and reach, it became more and more evident that women will destroy themselves, their marriages, homes, children, and all of society, when left to their own devices.

Meanwhile, whenever women are put on the spot for their failures, whether by chance or by scrutiny, they will routinely, even predictably, deny personal agency. In turn, others deny their own personal agency by accepting this excuse and running cover or interference, subtly assuming that women are particularly subject to suggestion and social pressures, and that their decision making can be impaired easier than that of an equally affected male. While it is basically true, this narrative has been taken to the extreme to form the crucible of female hypoagency which envelops the larger culture.

Yes, although it is true that there is something inherently different about men and women in the way God made us that makes women more prone to the deception that her actions are free of moral consequences, however, the ways in which society has insulated women from the consequences of their actions actually makes this condition even worse. The steady rise in feminine "unhappiness" stands as a stark testament of this malady, and if things are allowed to progress, this condition will only grow more noxious.

One of the most acerbic and shameful results of this is that what a female says cannot be trusted, but even so, their "consent" about everything is necessary and they should be believed and taken seriously anyway. Thus, women are able to consent to something at the moment and then a day or decades later withdraw that consent.

All of this is to say that modern women have been granted unprecedented liberties and powers, but are never held responsible for what they might do.

The matter is further obscured when these women's liberties and powers are often misnomered as agentic by secular culture (e.g. "empowered", "independent", the motivations behind YOLO, etc.), when in fact, it has nothing to do with authentic moral agency. It is a cheap substitute that employs an inversion of values and coerces the ignorant to abandon faith.

Bruce Charlton described this condition in a recent essay.

> "Modern agency has, however, become very individualistic; and insofar as free agency genuinely exists and is deployed (which is apparently not much, very seldom), it operates at the personal level rather than in groups.
> What appears superficially to be group agency, is actually a product of causal and determinative thinking; manipulating individuals (e.g. via laws, rules, and propaganda) to conform behaviour to external will.
> Part of this manipulation is to encourage individuals to believe they are already living by free agency; when in fact they have 'switched-off' their own agency; and are thinking almost-entirely in terms of automatic, mundane, externally-inculcated and -imposed concepts and information."
> Bruce Charlton's Notions: Causation versus Free Agency (2022/11/24)

And given that the forces that govern society are wholly contemptuous of God and His ways, the destructive customs and practices that allow and enable women to get away with avoiding their own agency are systemic ("baked into the cake," so to speak).

Women are the first to fall for this ruse, primarily because they don't actually think things through. They just tag along with the crowd, and duck out for a while whenever they want to privately entertain themselves with a little sidepiece of sin. All the while they emote and feel and vomit their feelings all over the place, meandering from one emotion to another emotion, and expecting it all to make some kind of sense.

It doesn't, of course. It's all anesthetization and avoidance.

Zippy Catholic's View of Female Hypoagency

Jack · 12 December 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Women's Agency is flawed and weak — all the more reason to hold them accountable.

Targeted Readership: Men
Theme: Female Agency and Accountability

Introduction

Zippy Catholic was a top tier Christian Manosphere blogger, once voted as "The best blogger on the Right", who tragically and mysteriously passed away on 2018/9/18, during a period of intense Red Pill persecution.

Zippy seldomly addressed female agency directly as a topic, but only in passing remarks found here and there. I've found that Zippy's stance on female agency is more clearly ascertained by examining his replies to his readers' comments.

This post pieces together several excerpts of posts and comments from Zippy on the topic of Female Agency. Links to the original comments are contained in the initial words.

Women are Equal to Men in Moral Culpability

> "Some days it seems like I am the only person on earth who actually respects women. Men and women are different, both individually and when considered as populations. But one of the ways we are the same – at least in my view – is that both men and women are moral agents, responsible for the behaviors we choose.
> Yet a great many people – notably feminists and the mainstream pro-life movement, though those two are hardly exhaustive – really don't seem to think this is the case at all."
> "Whenever I suggest that women should at least by default be treated with dignity and respect, as adult moral agents, I can count on objections from the usual suspects."
> Zippy Catholic: Women should be tried as adults (2018/2/6)

One commenter agreed that Zippy respects women (i.e. InsanityBytes22) more than women respect themselves because he is willing to attribute Moral Agency to them. IMHO, a man's respect for women is not whether one regards them as moral agents or not, but whether one does right by them, regardless of their level of moral agency. However, the inherent respectability of a woman (i.e. the amount of respect that a woman can obtain) does largely depend on her level of Moral Agency.

Moral Agency is a Function of Capability

In one comment, Zippy describes Moral Agency as a distribution of individual capability.

> "Everyone, male and female, categorically, is responsible for his own choices. Moral agency in this sense is an essential property of being human.
> As we know though different actual particulars can instantiate essential properties more or less perfectly. Man is a rational animal, but the extent and perfection to which one man instantiates rationality is different from another. In general, we can think of a distribution of more-or-less perfection in instantiating rationality.
> Men and women instantiate rationality in this sort of distribution: the populations are different qua population and individuals are different qua individuals. But these distributions overlap. The most rational woman is far more rational than the least rational man.
> And the same sort of thing can be accurately said of moral agency, at least in the capacity sense… Capacity to make good moral choices varies just as capacity to reach correctly reasoned conclusions varies.
> However, it is not the case that all men exceed all women in these capacities.
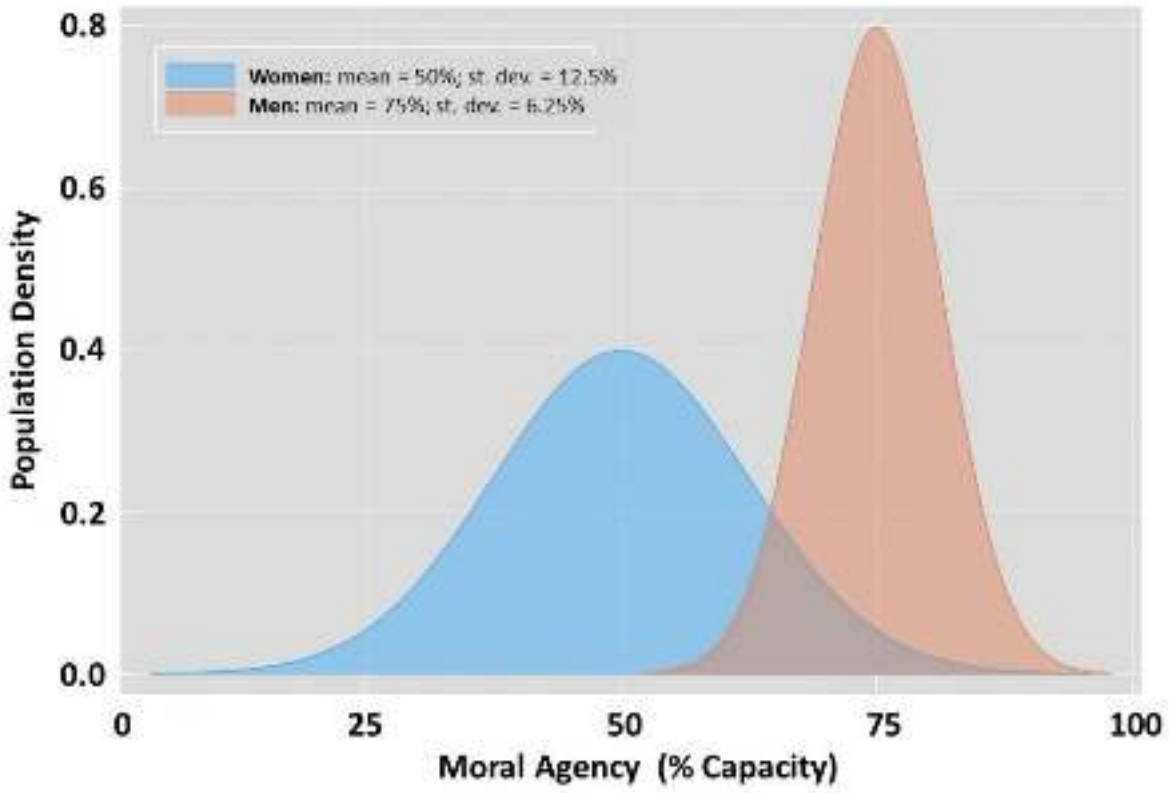
> And none of that changes the fact that men and women are, categorically and essentially, moral agents. Each and every person, male and female, is morally responsible for the choices he makes."

I've put together the following distribution to depict what Zippy is describing. (Data values are guesstimated for the sake of illustration.) This is an entirely new concept of Moral Agency that we have not seen in the reviews of other Manosphere authors.



On Female Hypoagency

One female commenter (InsanityBytes22) made an interesting appearance to argue in several comments that women are strongly influenced by men, are under the authority of men, malleable, vulnerable to fear, and easily led into sin, and are therefore not full moral agents.

InsanityBytes22 is probably not aware of this, but her argument is an example of how women buy into the Power vs. Fear (PvF) ethical structure so that they can readily dismiss questions of agency, which is a preeminent concern of the Righteousness vs. Guilt (RvG) ethical structure. I described this dynamic in The Morphing Ethical System in the U.S. (2020/6/26).

One commenter, Wood, correctly identifies the element of victimhood within the PvF frame promulgated by InsanityBytes22.

> "No one has suggested that women are "impervious" to outside influence. The argument is that women possess moral agency. But the problem with your comment – and the related comments at other places – is that women's moral agency somehow vanishes once something immoral happens – check out Zippy's pro-life link. Then the situation is immediately reframed into one of victimization. This is very harmful because the victimization frame just clouds the more important issues: moral agency, chaste living, examination of conscience, need for repentance, etc. etc. It is not being suggested that women are never victims of sexual assault. But to reframe reality into one where women are precariously bumbling their way through life chronically victimized so that whenever something bad happens to a woman it is "more understandable" because something about victimization, helps no one. Least of all women."

InsanityBytes22 retorts,

> "The only time men such as Zippy ever speak of women's moral agency is when men have been caught in sin of their own. The first thing out of Adam's mouth was, "this woman you gave me," not only blaming Eve, but inadvertently blaming God Himself.

> It's nothing more than an attempted moral plea bargain and it didn't work in the garden of Eden, so it's certainly not going to work today. God is not fooled by such silliness."

InsanityBytes22 is again speaking from the PvF frame by expressing a fear of culpability and projecting that onto Zippy. Overlooking her apparent bulverism, her argument fails to address the topic and is wrong because the issue of agency does not only concern blame, guilt, and culpability, as I stated above. Agency is concerned with issues surrounding faithfulness, innocence, responsibility, and righteousness, which are the default query in a RvG frame of mind, in addition to trust.

Zippy humorously summarized her viewpoint as follows.

> "Apparently the relative circumstance of being a woman reduces human moral agency and subjective culpability to such an extent that a woman who deliberately chooses to fornicate [for example] is not responsible for that free choice.
> So it is always a man's fault, for all values of "it". I expect that even when women masturbate or engage in lesbian sex it is a man's fault.
> And this anthropology of womanhood is respectful of the human dignity of women because, because, because, well, because it is a man's fault."

I'll add that according to the Christ : Church :: Husband : Wife analogy, this is the same as blaming God for one's sin. This is exactly what InsanityBytes22 was projecting onto Zippy!

After some discussion, Zippy eventually responded to her argument as follows.

> "Quod erat demonstrandum."
> "…the belief that women are hypoagentic likely contributes to them behaving that way – not only in that it forms expectations of behavior, but also in others addressing / resolving consequences arising from such a belief on the part of individual women."
> "Right. The whole world is screaming at women that they are hypoagentic (love the term) oppressed victims, and that embracing this conveys status. Trying to discern the 'natural state of women' in some general way from these conditions is ridiculous. People are at their best when society expects the best from them."

This is a confirmation of the same conclusion that we found earlier in this series — that believing in female Hypoagency breeds more of the same.

Women are Subject to the Judgment and Discipline of Male Authority

Elsewhere, Zippy writes,

> "…women – in general, and in general enough for legitimate generalizations in custom and in law – have certain characteristics that render them more susceptible than men to various mitigating conditions."
> "I don't disagree, but this should not be oversimplified. I expect more/different from a well-bred noblewoman than I do from an uncouth lower class man, for example, etc. etc. The part in my comment about overlapping distributions qua sex was not incidental to the point.
> The OP title ("Women should be tried as adults") can be generalized to say that everyone should be treated by law and authority in a manner appropriate to his (meaning his or her, for the modernists in the room) station. And all human beings share the station of moral agent.
> More particularly, women in general should be held to a standard, qua moral agents, which rejects the tyranny of purely subjective 'consent' and accepts that deliberately heading off for anonymous sexual trysts and/or deliberately getting stinking drunk, even to the point of failure to actually explicitly say "no," vitiates claims to have had their purity violated.
> Women who can't even bring themselves to say "no" (and still think they were "r@ped") should be forced to listen to the Georgia Satellites [Keep your hands to yourself] on repeat, while wearing a chastity belt, for every second they are not under the watchful eye of a chaperone."

Conservatives are Feminists because they Deny Female Agency

Zippy fully agrees with Dalrock's assessment of how Christianism denies female agency and about the convergence of churchianity in general.

> "Feminism is just liberalism, applied to relations between the sexes. Calling it a chastisement for the sins of men against women is a terrifically wrongheaded distortion.
> It also feeds the feminist narrative of poor abused victim women and abusive victimizer men. Dalrock has correctly pointed out the alliance between mainstream conservatives and feminists on this point: women are oppressed, abused victims; men are predatory perpetrators.
> This is the root of the alliance between feminists and "conservatives"."
> "Dalrock is right that "conservatives" simply are feminists in this regard: in generalizing women as virtuous victims, men as vicious perpetrators. […]
> "A both more traditional and more realist view is that men and women are all moral agents responsible for their actions."

In a volley with a commenter, Zippy expands his viewpoints.

> "Women today are more vulnerable to predatory men than they have ever been."
> "That is false. They are more "vulnerable" to making bad choices themselves, and more tempted to do so (perhaps), but that isn't quite the same thing."
> "What feminists don't see is that feminism helped create this situation in the first place and continues to perpetuate it."
> "You make it sound like feminists are mostly right but merely lack a few insights, as opposed to being utterly wrong."

The Garden of Eden

The story of Eve's moral agency and temptation in the Garden of Eden (Genesis 3) has become prominent in our discussion of female agency. Concerning this passage, Zippy writes,

> "The lesson of Eden is, quite precisely, "no excuses." Eve is responsible for her choices: being tempted by the serpent is no excuse. Adam is responsible for his choices: being tempted by Eve is no excuse."

Although this particular statement from Zippy is true, it does not address the question of agency itself. In a previous post, Did Eve have Agency? (2022/11/21), I pointed out that being held accountable doesn't necessarily mean that one does in fact express agency. St. Paul addresses this condition in Romans 2 and Romans 9, and it is clear that God holds everyone accountable, either in this life or after, whether they are responsible agents or not. Instead, I offered the argument that it is being held accountable that leads to the development of agency. This agrees with Proverbs 3:11-12 and Hebrews 12:3-11.

Patriarchy

As a final note on a significant tangent, this thread also leads to an argument for patriarchy, summarized as follows.

1. The average level of female Moral Agency is less than that of men (1 Peter 3:7).
2. If females truly have less Moral Agency than men in general, then we have a defacto Patriarchy.
3. If females truly have Moral Agency which they fail to develop and utilize, and use the excuse of a 'lack of agency' (viz. hypoagency) to indulge the feminine imperative, all the while exerting other forms of control behind the scenes, then we have a matriarchy with corrupt feminine figures.
4. The spiritual regeneration of a female may improve her level of Moral Agency. Her spiritual maturity is basically equivalent to her faculties of exerting Moral Agency.
5. Whether a particular female can be motivated to (4), depends on (a) God's election, and/or (b) the responsible and diligent nurturing of a man in (2). Different people subscribe to either (a) or (b).

Where this gets really interesting is when we consider these possibilities on a case by case basis with individual females.

> "As for patriarchy, why shy away from the term? Daughters and wives are in fact subject to the authority of their fathers and husbands — even when the fathers and husbands themselves don't believe this. Disbelief in reality doesn't change reality, it just makes the faithless into dystopian sociopaths."

Conclusions

Zippy's stance concludes that Women have a weaker Moral Agency compared to men, and therefore need discipline and hierarchical authority. Even so, this does not absolve women from being held responsible to the governing authorities and their husband's authority.

As a side note, Zippy's stance can be extrapolated to provide an answer to the longstanding conundrum that has been a point of criticism against Complementarianism in the 'sphere — that men have full responsibility, but no authority, and vice versa for women. Namely, that husbands only carry responsibility as long as the wife is submissive to the husband's authority. If they submit to that authority, then the authority holds responsibility. (See Sarah's submission to Abraham as an example 1 Peter 3:6.) If they reject authority, then they are left to face their own consequences.

Bruce Charlton on Agency

Jack · 13 December 2022 · Archived copy · Original

A commentary on Bruce Charlton's essays.

Targeted Readership: Men
Theme: Female Agency and Accountability
Length: 1,800 words
Reading Time: 9 minutes

Since we began our study of female moral agency in particular and agency more broadly, Bruce Charlton has written a few essays on this topic.

1. Bruce Charlton's Notions: Why is it so difficult to find a creative path – day by day, year by year…? (2022/11/17)
2. Bruce Charlton's Notions: Causation versus Free Agency (2022/11/24)
3. Bruce Charlton's Notions: What is the basis of Christian morality? Or: Nothing Good is ever wasted. (2022/12/3)
4. Bruce Charlton's Notions: Why lack-of-agency is so commonly claimed in this modern world (2022/12/7)

I'd like to thank Bruce for his contributions, as these essays are quite relevant to the topic here at Σ Frame. In this post, I'll quote a few passages and add some comments. Readers are urged to click on over to Bruce's site to get the full flavor.

First, from Charlton's essay, Causation versus Free Agency (2022/11/24).

> "But what of free agency, free will – or what-you-call-it? I mean the thinking of Beings (especially Men); at those times when they are thinking with their real and divine 'selves'?"
> "Free agency cannot be either caused/determined, or random/statistical. Free agency must be something other, which is expressive of a Being itself, arises wholly from that Being — and not, therefore, a product of causes acting-upon that Being.
> To cut the argument short: I believe that genuine Free Agency is either an incomprehensible Mystery and gift from God (which is the mainstream/ classical Christian view); or else (as I believe) Free Agency is a property of Beingness, to be found to a greater or lesser extent in all Beings.
> Which means that all Beings have a divine aspect."

Charlton's view agrees with my own concept of moral agency – that it is an individualized expression of one's inner being, as opposed to autopilot / "going along to get along" / herd mentality / Nice Guy syndrome / NPC / zombie / etc. – something akin to Free Will, but quite distinct from the Aristotelian philosophies on the topic of Christian religion that are usually associated with that term.

Charlton's more recent essay, Why lack-of-agency is so commonly claimed in this modern world (2022/12/7), reflects Kagenuma's observation that women are eager to explicitly claim a lack of agency, and adds that men do the same. He extends this to the larger culture and spells out some of the ideals and motivations of the elites and the masses.

> "People often claim lack of agency for themselves when they wish to avoid responsibility and blame."

As I mentioned in the pilot post, this is ubiquitous in the West, but this only works in a Guilt-based ethical system, which most of the West and all English speaking countries are. In this ethical system, it is necessary to determine one's agency and responsibility in order to assign innocence or guilt. This is why establishing criminal intent is deemed to be a central requirement for being judged guilty in U.S. law. It is also why people want to deny agency (e.g. claiming ignorance, pleading temporary insanity, etc.) — because (in a guilt-based ethical system) it is an easy out. Other countries' legal systems are more Mosaic in nature – One is either guilty or not, and it is assumed that everyone of age and mental capacity has agency unless physically incapacitated, under threat of death, etc. One's character usually figures large into the judgment.

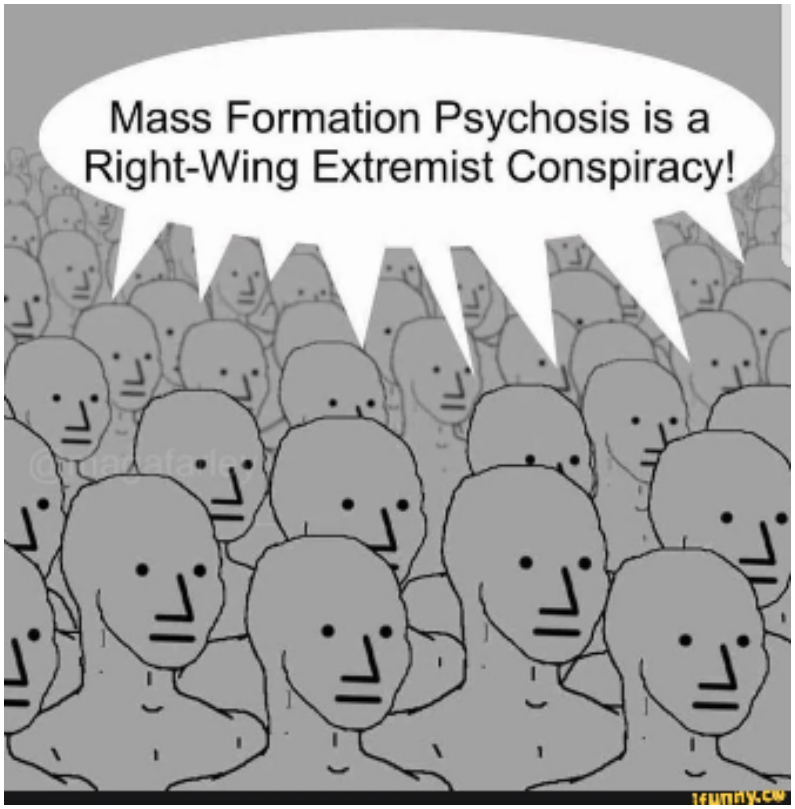
> "Behind these various claims of lack-of-agency is the desire for a better world, in a Godless and de-spiritualized universe."

To put a finer point on this that is somewhat at variance, I would say that behind these various claims of lack-of-agency is the gnostic assumption that people (including one's self) are inherently good and the world is already perfect – therefore no agency is necessary — and that the problem is with a few bad / crazy / "deplorable" / feminist / fluffy / loose screw / oddball / "privileged" / "toxic" / [fill-in-the-blank] individuals who can't or won't get with the program. Thus, the "victim" narrative follows naturally — and easily — by scapegoating a baddie / etc.

People of all political stripes are subscribing to this tactic whenever they blame and demonize the opposing group or party. Such division on a large scale is what leads (and is now leading) to the death of the culture.

However, I do think Charlton's statement holds true for the "elite" that he speaks of. There is the idea that "others" or "the masses" do not have agency, and so those who do (the "elite" in Charlton's essay, but it could be a leader of some sort, or anyone having a robust agentic capacity) must assume control of a situation or society. In a practical sense, this is true, just as parents with agency exercise authority over children with none. Individuals who exercise agency will always have more control and influence over things than those who do not. Personally, I have the idea that true Christians are (or should be) in a habit of exercising agency as an act of faith, and therefore, they have a greater degree of control and latitude than less agentic individuals do. I will go further into this view in an upcoming essay.

The error is when such people who demonstrate agency hold the gnostic notion that the world could possibly be better or "perfect" or utopian (according to a gnostic view), if only those who have little to no agency would comply or "give up" their agency, as Charlton points out. This is the stuff crack pipes are made of — dreaming out loud and in color. In practice, in a fallen world, this is a recipe for usurping control and could only lead to disaster. (Charlton describes this dynamic in depth in his latter essay.)



The fallacy in these beliefs is in refusing to recognize that ALL men are fallen, no one is perfect, and thus, NO "Good" system can be made (following Charlton's use of the term), since all bureaucracies, governments, and institutions are comprised of human beings. Charlton points out that within this godless paradigm sans faith, it is essential that the agentic leaders are seen to be benevolent and morally good individuals, otherwise anarchy runs afoot. Yes, whether the leaders are good or evil is a primary concern in the minds of the hypoagentic herd… But in reality, it is somewhat of a non sequitur, as nations tend to have the governments that God deems they deserve. Also, all leaders are morally corrupt to some degree and all leaders make mistakes and poor decisions from time to time. Interestingly, history shows us that corrupt men often make very capable leaders (e.g. Napoleon, Trump) while many morally righteous leaders have been utter failures (e.g. Jimmy Carter). If the leadership is collective, as Charlton suggests, then their methods and purposes become the primary means of assessing whether the government is effectively good or not, and not so much the leaders themselves.

> "In a strange and paradoxical way; the claimed lack of agency of many or most people, is the only way that hope for betterment can be found; in a world where all meaning is understood to be manufactured by Men.

I do not see how denying agency and avoiding responsibility can lead to any betterment of either the individual or the culture. A society of fussy 3-year-olds is not a society at all. It is a day care / preschool society. OTOH, that's exactly what most people are like when it comes to social issues. It's human nature to autopilot, deny agency, and evade responsibility — just like children do. True Moral Agency is when a person chooses not to behave this way. Therefore, society is much better when there are more people who are agentic and take responsibility for themselves, and society is eternally better when those who possess agency act in accordance with God's order.

> "If everyone was happy and hopeful; then they would take responsibility for their choices…"

This is only true as long as outcomes are positive, in which case, people gladly take responsibility for the outcome. But when something goes wrong, then we are back to the previously mentioned denial and hypoagency.

> "…but the pervasive dissatisfaction and alienation of modern societies means that people seek life satisfaction in social arrangements."

This is less true than it was in the past. These days, everywhere you look, people are quite content to keep their noses in their smartphones and ignore everything around them unless it happens to be photogenic.

> "For there to be a Good Society actually requires that Men are passive products of society.
> That is, for there to be a better world entails that Men must be shaped-by society, and thus Men must lack agency."

Again, I do not understand this line of reasoning at all. If everyone lacked agency, then there would be very little love and grace. Everyone would be automatons running on autopilot, acting out their sinful fleshly nature on impulse. I don't see how that could lead to a "Good Society". It would be more like the law of the jungle.

> "…the — apparently absurdly irrational! — structuring but implicit ideology of the world in 2022 — is a consequence of a deep yearning for a better world.
> (That is, a world 'better' in a material sense: a world where everybody might be happy and nobody suffers.)"

Taking this a step further, the common denominator in all these hypoagentic perspectives is that people want to deny having a sinful nature — in themselves, in others, and in mankind in general – and yet, they can still sense in their souls that something is missing and that the world is broken. Sensing that the world is broken should inspire agentic action, not lead to its denial. We do see this occurring in various forms of "activism" (which is always a collective action, not individual, and much activism is little more than herd mentality), but these efforts are in vain if they are spearheaded by leaders having gnostic fantasies of reality and their purposes are without respect to God's Law.

One commenter, Phil, wrote,

> "So the system must be one which makes men good. If only we had such a system, designed by one who was truly wise!
> We do.
> He gave it to us on Sinai.
> And Paul tells us that it failed to produce righteousness because it was, "weak through the flesh". It depended on men keeping it by their own strength & holiness.
> So all we have to do is come up w/ something even better."

God already came up with something better in Christ Jesus. Christ did not come to abolish the Mosaic Law, but to fulfill it. Denying agentic capacity isn't going to bring one any closer to Christ, but rather the opposite.

A Wife Who Learned how to Motivate her Husband

Jack · 14 December 2022 · Archived copy · Original

You guessed it right… Her submission to his Headship, and moar sex!

Readership: All
Theme: Female Agency and Accountability
Length: 1,350 words
Reading Time: 7 minutes

December is a short month on Σ Frame (I will take a hiatus for the last 10 days of the year), and there is still much to say about women's agency and accountability, so I've decided to continue this theme through December.

This theme would not be complete without an example of female moral agency in action. So here it is, for what it's worth.

A female reader shared this powerful testimony with me through email on 2022/8/17. It's about how obedience to God brings grace, renewal, and blessings. I'm passing this on in a post because people need to hear this kind of testimony. The author has asked not to be identified.

Dear Jack,

I am writing in regard to a recent post of yours, Sexual Authority and Sanctification (2022-8-8). I have responded below to a statement that Thedeti made in the comments section.

Thedeti said,

> "A woman's willful refusal to have sex with her husband when she is bodily and mentally and emotionally able to do so, but simply refuses because she does not want to or does not "feel like it", is marital abandonment and grounds for divorce. Period. End of discussion.
> By refusing to have sex with her husband she is essentially declaring she does not consider herself married. She is separating herself from her husband and refusing to give him the one thing he cannot get anywhere else. It's an open declaration of war.
> By the same token: A man's willful refusal to support his wife financially when he is bodily and mentally and emotionally able to do so, but simply refuses because he does not want to or does not "feel like it"… well, no one knows what that looks like."

Actually, I know exactly what it looks like because I lived it for the first 20 years of my marriage. I eventually figured out how to resolve this issue and improve my marriage.

> "Courts and government step in to make him do it. Elspeth, if SAM refused to work to support you, government would enslave him and make him do it. Government would issue orders garnishing everything he has and giving it to you."

This is also not true. Courts and government can do nothing to compel a husband to provide for his family. There is no law that they can enforce in this matter. They can only compel an EX-husband to provide. That's an important distinction.

> "You would divorce him and the court would issue orders taking at least half of everything he has and giving it to you and your children."

I don't think that anyone but Elspeth could say what she would do in this situation. But I can say that for myself, I did not leave. I do not believe in divorce.

> "A situation in which an able bodied married man can simply… not work — even when his wife wants and demands and needs him to, and government will do nothing about this? Simply does not happen. All of government's machinery would be deployed against him and would simply seize and take anything he owned, any money he made, and turn it over to you."

Again, it absolutely does happen. But things are much different when the wife stays with her husband as I did.

My husband for a long time would stay up late and would often be late or miss work. This often caused him to bring home only a partial paycheck or even lose his job. He was putting having a good time ahead of providing for the basic needs of his family. I thought I had no choice but to do everything: work, house, kids. It created a lot of stress and anger when I was counting on him to help pay the bills and he didn't. We often had to ask family for financial assistance. I had trouble affording daycare, but I couldn't rely on my husband to wake up in the morning and take care of our kids so that I could work either. I begged him to go to work.

I asked his parents to talk to him about it, but they refused. My father-in-law made excuses and said that maybe my husband had some kind of medical issue or sleep disorder. My mother-in-law said that it was no big deal that he wasn't going to work and at least he wasn't an abusive alcoholic (like my father-in-law was for many years). I couldn't tell my own parents that he was missing work because I was afraid that they would refuse to help out financially if they knew that he wasn't doing all he could to pay the bills. I was forced to do everything like a single parent, and my husband just became another mouth to feed.

I started to feel something like contempt for him, and that's when I realized something had to change.

I read Laura Doyle's The Surrendered Wife, and Lori Alexander's site. I also started reading some of the Manosphere sites and books to better understand the situation. And I started reading the Bible. I now understand what my obligations are to my husband, but I also know what his obligations are to me and to our kids.

Every time my husband failed to make it into work, he was telling me that he didn't love me. He was telling me this not with his words but with his deeds. It was incredibly painful. It made me feel worthless. And I sometimes would deny him sex because I was upset with him about this, and because I was exhausted and stressed. I did not know at the time that this was a sin. Once I found out, I stopped denying him.

I was afraid that if I didn't work and pay the bills, we would end up losing our home and everything else. But if I didn't cook, do housework, and take care of the kids, then it just didn't get done. I came to the realization that by doing everything, I was making my husband feel un-needed and obsolete.

The solution was to be more respectful to my husband, to submit to him, and to serve him in any way that he needed. I asked my husband to take a leadership role and I agreed to defer to his decisions, since up to that point, we had basically an egalitarian marriage by default.

Regarding Elspeth's scenario about a husband who decides to order his wife to work so that he can quit his job. I believe that this would be sinful for him to do as the Bible says that a man who does not provide for his family is worse than an infidel. I believe that a wife is not compelled to submit to her husband if he is ordering her to commit a sin. Although I am not aware of anything in the Bible forbidding women from working, in this case it would be aiding in the commission of a sin, and she should respectfully refuse. Kind of like driving the get-away car in a bank robbery.

So I decided to stop working and stay home to take care of the house and kids. I also no longer earn money or pay the bills. My husband knows that if he doesn't make it to work, then he will have to figure out how to pay the bills on his own.

The process of changing our marriage took several months and is a continual work in progress. He rarely ever misses work anymore, and if he does it's for a good reason. He has since apologized for missing work as he did not realize how this was affecting me. And I apologized to him for denying him. We've both repented, and it is not something that I want to dwell on as it just rehashes bad memories. But I had to respond to thedeti's assertion that this could never happen. It happens. You just don't notice it.

Society doesn't acknowledge people who stay in a bad marriage for reasons of faith. The only time you hear about it is when the person stays for the kids or for financial reasons, and the implication is that they are going to bail as soon as the opportunity arises. I stayed because I don't believe in divorce based on what the Bible says about it, which will not change regardless of the circumstances. Those of us who actually honor our marriage and obligation to family are invisible.

Red Pill Apostle on Women's Moral Agency

Red Pill Apostle · 15 December 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Women have situational pseudo-agency under the cover of Headship. Without Headship, they are woeful free agents.

Do Women have Agency?

Sometimes I chuckle to myself over the serendipitous nature of events. In the past 5 days I have had 2 incidences where the same subject matter was addressed on separate occasions by men whose opinions I have reason to trust. The first was with a couple guys from church regarding social media. The second was when deti and Jack wrote to me independently about female agency. When this happens, I tend to slow down, take notice, and ponder the subject.

In Deti on Female Accountability (2022/11/25), Deti wrote,

> "I do not subscribe to The Red Pill's tenet that women are the most responsible teenagers in the house. No. A woman is a fully functioning agent, with her own free will. She is fully, personally, independently responsible for everything she does."

I get what deti is saying, because in order to implement accountability, you have to treat women as if they have full agency, but it does not appear that they do in all circumstances … much like being a teenager. Like the teen, it is her job to obey God and parents and to know right from wrong, but if she gets in over her head …. there is an authority to bail her out. There is an authority to guide her and teach her to do better. Her mistakes are not always a "once and for all" deal, but rather a part of a learning process which involves Operant Conditioning. Scott wrote about this dynamic in How do we teach young women about their own nature? (2022/6/18).

One biblical point to consider with deti's stance is, how does Numbers 30 fit within his statement? According to this scripture, if a man with rightful Headship over a woman (i.e. her father) disallows her promise, then it is wiped clean to the point that God will not hold it against her. This is coming from the Mosaic Covenant, so although the times and culture may have changed since then, the bedrock spiritual principles haven't.

Artisanal Toad interpreted this passage to mean that women don't have agency, but I think it is more nuanced than this. This is definitely worth teasing out further as it may help better deal with the wifely unit.

A Woman's Submission to Headship Redeems her Agency

I had this thought while I was on a recent fishing trip.

Numbers 30 says a man with Headship (a father or husband) can override a faulty decision by their wife or daughter and the woman is held blameless in God's eyes. This passage teaches us that women covered by Headship can be absolved from bad decisions without the decision being counted against them by God.

I had another thought on this topic of agency while I was camping with my son.

Abraham had Sarah lie for him on multiple occasions (Genesis 12:10-20; Genesis 20) and because he told her to lie and she obeyed, she was called faithful (Hebrews 11:11) even though what Abraham asked of her was lying at best and could have lead to the capital sin of adultery at worst had God not intervened, and her obedience was counted as righteousness according to St. Peter (1 Peter 3:5-6). Her obedience — even in sinful acts — was faithful and righteous, which would suggest this odd mix of agency / non-agency for her, which I'll call pseudo-agency. She could have disobeyed Abraham and not lied and not been taken into Pharaoh's harem, and then she would have possibly been held responsible for her disobedience. But she did lie and so on, which we would say are sins she committed, but instead of the responsibility falling on her, it looks like that seems to have gone against Abraham along with his lack of faith in God's promises to him.

Now, it could be a case of the bible talking in general about her as we have people with obvious glaring flaws listed amongst the faithful in Hebrews 11, including Abraham himself. But because Peter specifically mentions her obedience in his teaching on wifely submission (1 Peter 3:1-7), I think there is a good case to be made about headship alleviating the burden of female agency in some instances for covered women.

Headship Hierarchy

My further take on this is that it fits with the Christ : Church :: Husband : Wife analogy and how the church relates to Christ. God takes Christ's Headship and overrides our sin. Likewise, God accepts a woman's submission to her Head (father or husband) and does not count some sins against her.

Are we culpable for our sin? Sure. Do we bear the consequences of it? Sometimes in the form of natural consequences we absolutely do. But do we really bear the full brunt of the consequence for sin? No, we don't. Those are on our bridegroom and they've already been paid for.

According to the model of marriage based on the archetype of Christ and the church, women's agency combined with Headship leads to an interesting and perhaps difficult dynamic of women having agency some of the time, and that agency is specific to her obedience to her Head.

The passages I cited from Numbers and Genesis describe too close of a model, and that coupled with Paul's comparison of marriage to Christ and the church (Ephesians 5:22-24) leads me to believe there is something for us to contemplate seriously here.

All this would suggest that absolute agency does not exist for women — that is, as long as they are under a Headship covering. I would add that all of God's elect, men included, do not have absolute agency as Christ bears the consequences of our actions on our behalf.

Conclusions

The reason that female agency is widely debated and has intelligent, reasonable people that draw opposite conclusions is because a wife has “pseudo” agency in that she falls under the covering of Headship. The OT law on this was not reversed nor improved upon in the NT.

What I believe drives the debate is our lack of theological understanding and a complete ignorance of the importance and responsibility of Headship. Without Headship existing, Christ’s sacrifice would not be a “once and for all” sacrifice, and even on a secular political level, we would not have a government in the States that allows for representatives to bind citizens to the laws they create. But the thing that complicates our understanding on the question of women’s agency is that what God shows us about Headship in the bible muddies the waters of women’s agency, precisely because the associated responsibilities are transferred to a woman’s Head (i.e. her father or husband).

The other confusing part of this is that deti’s behavioral approach to agency, that is treating all women like they do in fact have full agency, is the best means of extracting the desired behavior from a woman, regardless if, from a theological standpoint, they truly have agency.

There is also the confounding factor that not all women are under Headship, and as such, those women would then have full agency themselves for better or worse. Feminism makes this out to be a grand thing, but in fact, it has tragic implications which we are seeing more of with every passing day. Women are much better off under a Headship covering.

So the answer to the question of whether women have agency is that it is situational, dependent on the constraints of her Headship authority, which would mean that we as men need a firm understanding of those situations.

I liken this to the Predestination vs. Free Will debate. From a reformed standpoint, you get God's sovereignty, and yet people retain agency to the point they are culpable for their own sin. Even if it is God who pulls souls from death and nothing of our own doing, purely for human comprehension it makes sense to address the point as an active decision that humans make. I know some people with Free Will viewpoints will have reasonable objections to this line of thought, but it seems to fit well with what the bible teaches us on the subjects.

Side note: Even though I am adamant about Reformed theology being true, it's not anything I get worked up over simply because the behavioral approach is one that seems to work best for many people and to me that in no way invalidates God's sovereignty over the matter.

D. Bradley on Women's Moral Agency

Women's moral agency is and should be limited to their areas of Biblical responsibility.

Introduction

D. Bradley is a relatively new Christian blogger, making his debut late last year. He does not identify as part of the Manosphere, but he frequently acknowledges or addresses Red Pill issues from a distinct perspective that some may see as rather Purple Pill, but it is not the typical churchian viewpoint nor the run-of-the-mill purple haze. His essays are typically lengthy (> 3,000 words; > 15 minutes reading time) and his writings appear to be directed towards a female audience, much like Cornerstone. For these reasons, I've listed these two blogs under the Femosphere on the sidebar menu.

D. Bradley wrote a response to our series on Female Agency and Accountability, entitled, Women and agency (2022/12/8). I'm grateful for his willing effort to participate in the discussion.

Reader's Note 1: I disagree with many things in D. Bradley's post. At first, I started writing a response to each point of disagreement, but when it surpassed 3,000 words, I gave up. Thus, this post will only cover concepts that I feel have a significant contribution to our study of Women's Moral Agency. Perhaps at a later date, I will revisit his essay again to cover the points of disagreement.

Reader's Note 2: D. Bradley's essay touches on a number of interrelated concepts. For the reader's ease of digestion, I have taken the liberty of dissecting his essay and summarizing the main points.

Reader's Note 3: It is not clear that D. Bradley has made a distinction between Agency and Moral Agency in his essay, and so this poses a greater degree of (mis)interpretation of his writings. In this review, I have assumed the more evident or likely interpretation.

Note to D. Bradley: I seldom make it to the end of your posts in one pass. If the topic is noteworthy, then I'll bookmark it with a "like", and then come back to read it with a more concentrated effort. So my suggestion to you is this. For blog posts longer than 1,000 words, it is easier and more likely to keep the reader's attention if you include (1) section headers to break up the writing into bite size pieces, and (2) images to help readers visualize what you are talking about. This is doubly or triply important for female readers. I'm certain that making these adjustments will increase your readership.

Women express moral agency in providing their families with delicious and nutritious meals each day.

Roles and Responsibilities are Sex Specific

In the first half of the essay, Bradley makes the case that roles and responsibilities are sex specific. His main points are outlined as follows.

- Men and Women have different responsibilities.
- Men and Women are NOT the same and their roles are NOT interchangeable.
- Responsibility and accountability are always linked.
- Men are responsible for making decisions, governing families and nations, being priests and leaders, interpreting the Bible, and finding / choosing a spouse.
- As per the Bible, women are responsible for submitting to their husbands, being sober, chaste, humble, not adorning themselves with overly expensive things and becoming conceited, taking care of children at home, helping the poor and elderly, and generally being a comfort and a help to her husband.
- God instilled men with a mind and spirit to understand and make sense of things like ethics, justice, morality, spirituality, and the like.
- It is politely implied that women are not capable of handling these issues, because God didn't give women the capability to go beyond their helper and nurturer role.

The Nature of Women

D. Bradley talks at length about the nature of women. To pick out a few noteworthy quotes,

> "…the feminine spirit is moldable, teachable, leadable, and subjective […] especially the more feminine they truly are."
> "…the feminine spirit does not necessarily look for objective reality but instead looks subjectively at how she can fit in and survive."
> "…another beautiful thing about the feminine Spirit [is] her ability to adjust and to learn and do whatever > needs to be done. She is adaptable and can fit into any situation necessary, sort of like a chameleon."

> "…when [a woman is] acting in a feminine or submissive manner she is not asking questions about whether or not something is right or wrong; she is simply going with what is expected of her. She is basically in a state of surrender, a very feminine state to her man."

In many words, Bradley argues that because of the way women are made, they are incapable of exercising agency and/or moral agency in areas beyond those things she is responsible for (i.e. the things which are stated in the Bible). IOW, Women are incapable of demonstrating the moral capabilities of Men. He states that it is unreasonable or perhaps unwise to expect them to exercise Agency and/or Moral Agency in areas outside their Biblically prescribed responsibilities.

Female moral agency is expressed when farmer Jack says, "Plow this field of corn in a @#$% orange bikini!" … and she does it!

Moral Agency is Expressed Differently between Men and Women

Bradley uses the previously discussed sex specificity of roles and responsibilities and the nature of women to argue that, since a woman's primary God given role is to be a companion, follower, and helper, it is more or less necessary for her to be morally flexible and without any firm convictions other than to trust, submit to, and obey her head. On this he writes,

> "I don't want a wife who is going to argue with me about objective truth but who instead will trust me and is willing to follow my lead while she does her role which is taking care of my household, learning from me, and being a help and support. Is this nothing other than a woman not having an objective truth in her life and her just going along with whatever her man wants? Even more, if men were honest, isn't this what they really want from women? […] I want my woman to just go along with whatever I want, yet while she can rest assured knowing that I love her and I'm always considering her long term and eternal destiny."

Bradley argues that both men and women exercise moral agency when they fulfill the roles and responsibilities according to their God given nature outlined in the Bible.

> "To me, that is moral on the part of the feminine and its moral on the part of the masculine even though it looks different on both parts. It's moral for the man because he is acting in masculine morality by setting boundaries, giving spiritual and earthly guidance, and being an example of strength. It's moral for the woman because she is following, aka submitting to her man's lead, and she is fulfilling her mandate to be a helper."

Bradley concludes that men and women have different concepts of Moral Agency, depending on their different natures, roles, responsibilities, and spheres of influence.

Conclusions

D. Bradley makes a few good points that have not been mentioned so far in our study of Moral Agency.

- Women's Moral Agency is limited to their God given purpose in creation.
- It is women's God ordained nature to submit, fit in, and follow. They do best and are blessed in this capacity. They fare poorly when transgressing these boundaries.
- Women express Moral Agency when they trust, submit to, and obey their God ordained Head.
- Women cannot be expected to act responsibly when given privileges and powers that are outside women's sphere of influence as outlined by the Bible, especially those areas in which men excel and have been charged to be responsible.
- A comprehensive reading leads us to presume that women should be held to a different standard concerning what they should be held accountable for.

D. Bradley more or less agrees with Catacomb Resident's assertion that Women's Moral agency is limited to the requirements of the Biblical Covenant.

Moral Agency = Emotional, Psychological, Social, and Spiritual Maturity

As readers have seen from the many reports of other authors on the topic of Women's Agency and Women's Moral Agency, many authors have tried to nail down the agency question. All have offered an angle, an elaboration, a facet, a perspective of the topic, but all somewhat inconclusively, and when compared, very inconsistent. This may explain why the question has appeared to be mysteriously enigmatic for so many years.

Maturity is a topic that I've covered in a few previous posts (a few are listed under Related below), but my theories on this as it pertains to agency have developed further and will be explained in this essay.

My conclusion is that agency and maturity are correlated. I believe agency is dependent on maturity, and in practice, they are the same thing. During all the writings and discussion over the past month, I've even come to the conclusion that Moral Agency is what the Bible refers to as Freedom in Christ.

This is a correlation that no other author (to my knowledge) has addressed.

It's rather difficult to write a convincing essay (or series of essays) on this point, but after reading a score of essays and hundreds of comments about agency, readers might come to this same conclusion intuitively, as I have.

In this essay, I'll attempt to convince our readers that this is true.

Moral Agency = The Active Improvisation of the Will

Teachings and discussions about Free Will are quite often mispresented as a separate topic from obedience and spiritual growth. Thus, people often misinterpret Free Will as the freedom of choice, but these are not the same thing. Freedom of choice is about which shirt to wear, which job to take, where to go on vacation, etc. etc. Whereas, Free Will is about exercising moral agency to discern good and evil, to walk in obedience to God, and to embrace God's purpose for one's life, no matter what shirt, job, or vacation destination one chooses.

> "He who loses his life will find it, and he who holds on to his life will lose it."

This concept is repeated several times in scripture (Matthew 10:39; Matthew 16:25; Mark 8:35–37; Luke 9:24–25; Luke 17:33; John 12:25; Revelation 2:10), and the fact that it is repeated so many times emphasizes it's central importance in the Christian Life.

Traditional Protestantism interprets this verse to mean that God's promises to replace the old, assuredly sinful life, with a new spiritual Life, and that to hold on to the old life is a rejection of the renewed Life.

While this may be true, pastors and teachers seldom if ever hit on how one is to take advantage of this new Life in one's daily life. Similarly, the Christian literary genre of "Christian Living" would appear to address this in explicit detail, but it doesn't.

The important detail that is habitually and maleficently overlooked is that one must employ the active improvisation of the will to resist autopilot, doubt, and laziness, and at other times, a disengagement of the will in favor of trusting God moment by moment. One must impulsively renege the comfort zone, forfeit self-serving conveniences, sacrifice the natural inclinations, and creature habits of the flesh, and extemporaneously subdue the ego to its proper status in order to exercise moral agency to choose the good and reject not only the bad, but also the not-as-good.

He who holds on to his life in the flesh is essentially a self-sufficient, all-surviving cockroach, who never extends love to others nor receives it in turn, and thus, never finds real meaning in living.

OTOH, he who willingly resists his inner carnal life in the flesh can only do so to embrace Life in the Spirit. If done as a habit, it fosters humility and love such that his life shall be restored through God's grace and the communion found in his relationships with others.

Free Will is impossible without Moral Agency. Without it, all of life is reduced to the stark fatalism of Nature vs. Nurture.

Thus, these passages are not describing a replacement of one life for another, but a discovery, exploration, and redemption of The Life!

Case Study – "You Must Rise Immediately Upon Awakening!"

My father taught me this when I was an adolescent.

When you awaken in the morning, as soon as you achieve consciousness and before your mind becomes alert, you must throw back the sheets, jump to your feet, and busy yourself with a mundane task (e.g. brushing your teeth, cleaning the house, getting dressed, taking a shower, washing dishes, etc.) while your mind is waking up.

Whenever I've done this, I've had a grand productive day. Whenever I haven't, it feels as though a demon invades my psyche (anxiety, fears, guilt, pessimistic thoughts, etc.) as soon as I become alert. Then the rest of the day is a struggle.

I've often thought about this phenomenon, and why it should make such a difference. I believe it is because rising enthusiastically and taking action is an act of faith that God has good things in store for you this day. Without this act of faith, you give yourself over to spiritual oppression.

That is Moral Agency!

Sidenote: Going to bed at a timely hour and getting a good night's rest are a necessary precursor.

Moral Agency = A Will to Grow in Faith

> Not that I have already attained, or am already perfected; but I press on, that I may lay hold of that for which Christ Jesus has also laid hold of me.

In the typical Christian experience, the process of spiritual growth begins with recognizing the demands of one's own conscience and how these demands interplay with a respect for God's Laws and His natural order. It is quite common for individuals to only discover this after reaching the limits of their human capacity, coming to the ends of their natural person. Others discover this after violating God's Laws either out of exasperation, stupidity, or temptation, and then having to face the consequences. The former reveals to one's awareness that humanity is incommensurate. The latter reveals the sinful nature. Both are shortcomings in the eyes of God, but God can and does use both to inspire one to embrace faith.

Then comes the challenge of embracing faith, a sublime consciousness of metaphysical truth which transcends the bounds of human nature, the worldly principles, paradigms, and powers, and all the sociopolitical-isms (e.g. Existentialism, Feminism, Gnosticism, Marxism, Nationalism, Nihilism, Progressivism, etc. etc.). It is the confidence that what is believed, discerned, and hoped for is more true, more real, and more powerful than what is thought, felt, or observed.

> Now faith is the assurance of things hoped for, the conviction of things not seen.
> Hebrews 11:1 (ESV)

Next come the Trials of faith, of doing the hard work to cling to one's faith in the face of all manner of argumentations, confusion, difficulties, persecutions, and temptations. Because of the prior absence of the faith experience, one is prone to become confused and deceived by any number of spiritual assaults. Thus, it is easy to lose faith and stumble during this phase. But one must overcome all these challenges, until one can be sure-footed in one's faith, and not easily unmoored by the winds of false doctrine and the waves of doubt (Ephesians 4:14; James 1:6; Jude 1:12-13).

A failure of faith (and Moral Agency) can be seen when people take any one of the following recourses.

- When they believe that faith can be reliably improved or maintained through one's habits, doings, and/or thinkings (AKA legalism or "works").
- When they believe nothing they do can have a negative effect on their life (AKA antinomianism).
- When they attempt to assign blame to others or to circumstances.
- When they succumb to self-pity (AKA "victimization").
- When they are overtaken by anger, bitterness, contempt, depression, despondency, distrust, fear, hate, self-rejection, etc. (AKA "the Abyss").
- When people anesthetize themselves with various distractions (alcohol, entertainment, idolatries, illicit sex, p0rn, various addictions, etc.).
- When they turn to worldly constructs (e.g. Planned Parenthood, street gangs, welfare, etc.) to shore up their personal errors and insufficiencies and thereby become enslaved to the dark spiritual powers of those systems.

These may prove to be a greater sin than any particular manifestation of one's inherent sinful nature (e.g. The 7 Deadly Sins), because it is a turning away from God.

It is only after we have overcome these trials do we begin to discover The Life as something fresh and new — as a fountain of clear Living Water flowing from within. Although we may have had a fleeting taste of this in our immaturity, it is only when our faith becomes indomitably resilient and robust do we exhibit the Fruits of the Spirit with regularity and force (Galatians 5:22-23).

Moral Agency = Spiritual Identity

As long as our hearts lie dormant (AKA "spiritually dead", we cannot give God anything to work with in our lives. As long as we are passively running on autopilot, we cannot lay claim to making any difference for Christ. Our Christian identity is not revealed until we begin to exercise Moral Agency.

Bruce Charlton describes agency in terms of creativity, and that as a form of true self-expression.

> "…as Children of God with agency; we just-are creators – however partially and imperfectly: and this represents much (not all) of what is divine in us.
> Furthermore, it is what God most wishes from us; as indicated in the Fourth Gospel when Jesus describes his disciples as Friends, and not as Servants.
> I understand this to show that Jesus wants to work-with Men who have taken-on the same kind of primary creative agency as he himself had; and as God has.
> Therefore, we should not and cannot be contented with a life in which our own creation is annihilated – and this discontent will not be ignored nor suppressed."
> Bruce Charlton's Notions: Why is it so difficult to find a creative path – day by day, year by year…? (2022/11/17)

It is through our creative doings that we discover our individual purposes in Christ. This is the "pressing onward" — the manifestation of that for which Christ Jesus has laid hold of us (Philippians 3:12).

Case Study — The Archetypical Bastard as a Form of Identity Crisis

In Bastards (2022/9/9), I described the sort of man who is deprived of identity through the absence of a father figure and therefore never experienced the presence and power of God in his formative years. The effects of poor identity formation are shown in many negative traits, such as being awkward, boorish, hesitant, insecure, irresponsible, shifty, and untrustworthy. He is one who is vainly willful, self-centered and unknowingly frustrating to interact with; one who does not share the privileges of God's children; always busy with self-absorbed activities, never allowing nor even knowing how to let God act in his life, and never conscious of how he could be a part of anything larger than himself. Thus, he never knows faith, and never finds rest.

If we consider this condition in light of agency, faith, and maturity, we find that such a person is swamped in the muck of spiritual immaturity. They are unable to give or receive love in an appropriate and efficient manner. They cannot adapt nor learn quickly, but instead must endure many false starts and stops along a meandering and tortuous path in life. Their spiritual immaturity is a stronghold that perpetuates rejection and shame — being disrespected, unappreciated, and unloved, and never knowing why. Meanwhile, others find constant and endless amusement in mocking and taunting him, which only contributes to his despondency and misery.

Moral Agency = Love

Life is fragile and love is brutal. To not regard life as fragile relegates one to the status of a beast or a cockroach. To not regard love as brutal indicates an ignorance of the irresistible overpowering domination of love. When Life and Love are juxtaposed, the irony is striking. It is a battle between the desire of the will and the fleshly nature to resist domination. To balance the two is not an easy task.

Bette Midler sang a song called The Rose. If we overlook the culturally assigned interpretations of romantic love, we find that Midler describes many true aspects of love and trust, not only between humans, but also in our relationship with God.

> "(I feared that) Love is (only) for the lucky and the strong…"

As these lyrics intimate, one purpose of Love is to preserve Life. This is often shown in supplying the basic needs of others to support their physical life, e.g. cash flow, clothing, food, physical affection, protection, shelter, etc. etc.

A more profound expression of Love works towards preserving Spiritual Life, such as acceptance, companionship, emotional support, sanctified sex, teaching, and of course, Christ's sacrifice on Calvary.

Spiritual Maturity can be broadly described as having both the ability and the purpose to love others efficaciously, properly, and responsibly (not to be confused with the worldly interpretation of love).

Moral Agency is a vehicle for Love. Thus, it is a synonym for Spiritual Maturity or even Freedom in Christ.

Moral Agency = Freedom in Christ

What is the purpose of Freedom that Jesus Christ gave us in the New Covenant?

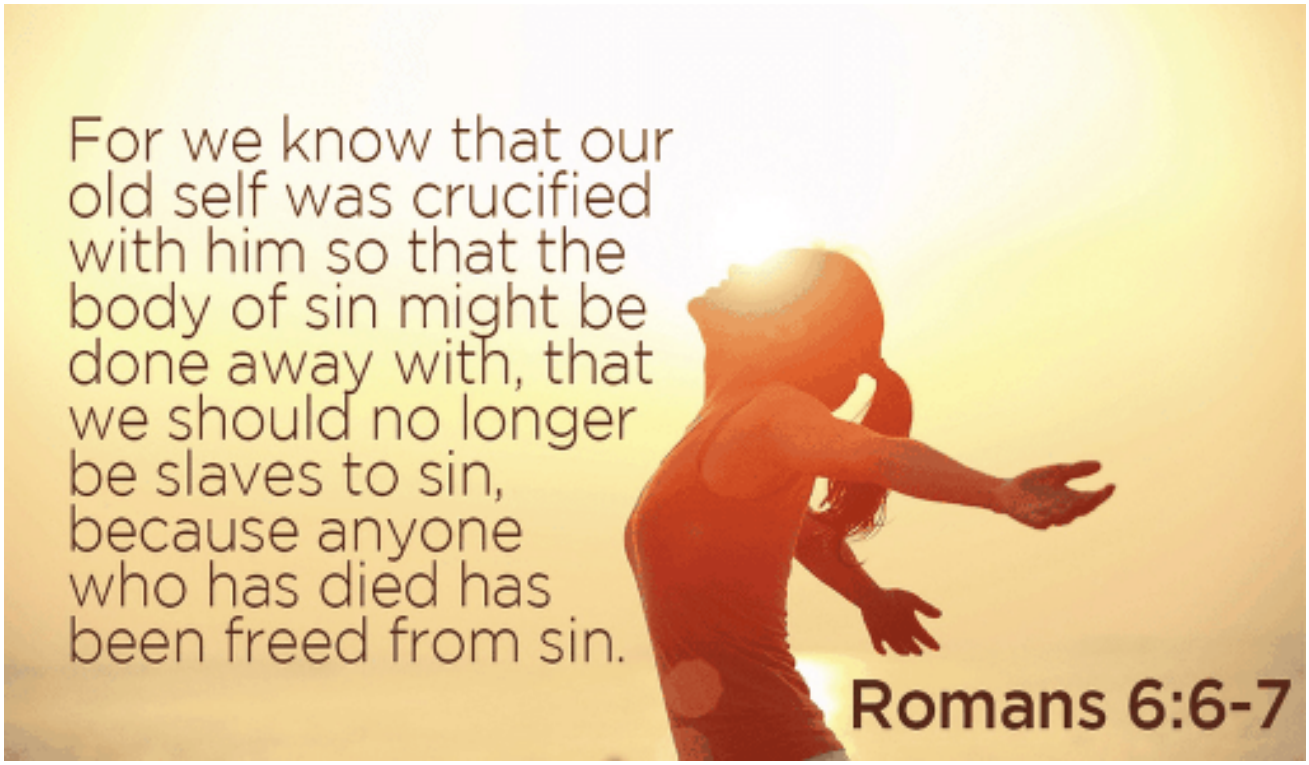
It is in order to save us for Good Works.

Freedom in Christ is often insufficiently interpreted as freedom from sin. This is true, but this description is often easily dismissed by those who are tenuous in their knowledge of God as something doctrinal, ethereal, and theoretical. Thus, it fails to impart a complete understanding of redemption.

To expound further, it is freedom to exercise our volitional will, to defend our boundaries, to express our true selves as God created us to be.

It is freedom to work and create, to decide our course in life for good or ill, and to build His Kingdom on Earth.

It is Freedom to pursue the Virtues of Righteousness. Not as a mere set of rules. But the Organic Righteousness of Christ through the work of the Holy Spirit.



If the New Covenant writes the Laws in our Hearts, it is a restoration of what is meant to be instinctive and as routine as breathing.

Duties and Freedom belong together. How then can we perform good works, faithfully, and with wisdom, unless we have attained spiritual maturity?

Maturity and agency tend to go together hand in hand, do they not? One is considered to have agency based solely on the age of majority — even without maturity, but it would be more difficult to have what would properly be considered adult or Christian maturity without instantiating agency.

Does this not all hinge on developing and implementing moral agency within ourselves?

Conclusions

Now let's put all this into context of Women's Moral Agency. As discussed above, a woman's level of Moral Agency determines all of the following capabilities.

- Her personal self-discipline.
- Her ability to love and be loved.
- Her willingness to grow in faith.
- Her willingness to submit and obey.
- How much she can trust and be trusted.
- Her tenacity to resist sin and temptation.
- How much responsibility she can handle.
- Her overall ability to be a suitable companion and helper.

All these things hinge on a woman's level of Spiritual Maturity. Thus, a woman's level of Moral Agency is largely dependent on her level of Spiritual Maturity, and in practice they are essentially the same thing.

These qualities also determine her overall value as a wife.

Deep Strength takes this even further in his most recent post, Husbands are to improve the moral agency of their wives through sanctification (2022/12/17). Here, he emphasizes that a woman's spiritual maturity largely determines her ability to discern right from wrong and the quality of sanctification that she can bring to a marriage.

> "Sanctification can only be had if someone is a moral agent and able to determine right and wrong. Only if they know what is right and wrong are they able to be convicted by their conscience and repent of their wrongdoing."
> "Regardless of the level of moral agency of a wife started at or has grown in the process, the goal should be to continually sanctify her to be more like Jesus. Thus, her moral capability to acknowledge any wrongdoing and > repent should increase over time. As she becomes a stronger moral agent, she will become a more mature Christian who can resist temptation more effectively."

So when we speak of a woman who possesses Moral Agency, we are unwittingly speaking of an emotionally mature and spiritually pure or regenerated woman. Thus, a continual habit of instantiated Moral Agency should be a priority qualifier for single Christian men vetting a potential wife. For married men, developing Moral Agency / Spiritual Maturity in the wife should be the central focus of their interaction, as DS pointed out in this post.

One year ago, Deep Strength wrote about how Trust is earned and an expression of the character of godliness (2021/12/20). Here he proposed a 4 tier scale of a woman's spiritual maturity which aligns well with Zippy's concept of Agentic Moral Capacity. This scale could be further developed into an "Agency Inventory" that men could use to vet women, grade women's progress and development, and help keep them accountable.

Furthermore, the possession of Moral Agency more or less sums up the FAST heuristic that reddit/RPChristians uses.

I. Faithful — Involved in growing in the faith with Church and also virtues. Shows commitment to what she says she will do. No Bulverizing, solipsism, etc. etc. Her yes is yes, and her no is no.
II. Available — Single, ready, and willing to act as a companion and helper to you specifically.
III. Saved — Professes Christ and lives it out. Not lukewarm. Possesses at least some Fruits of the Spirit.
IV. Teachable — Being open to learning new things and changing her beliefs and behaviors. Being teachable is the key for women responding to a man's leading and loving her by respecting and following him.

At the risk of stating a redundancy, all of these require a healthy sense of Moral Agency in a Spiritually Mature woman.

Posts in this Series

Agency is a very old topic in the sphere that has never been fully resolved (namely, do women have moral agency or not?). In this series, I've attempted to bring the matter towards a conclusion.

Due to the complexity of the topic, this theme has been extended for 8 weeks, so there are quite a lot of posts in this series.

Sources of Confusion

Upon the conclusion of this theme, we have found that much of the confusion surrounding the question of whether women possess Moral Agency is due to…

1. The juxtaposition of (1) overwhelming cultural forces, i.e. Hypoagency, (2) the fallen fleshly nature, (3) women's willful resistance, and (4) men's willingness to concede — all working together to create the deceptive illusion of female Hypoagency. See the next two sections for more on this.
2. The fact that there are 4 intertwined aspects of Moral Agency which are often jumbled together in any discussion of the subject. This will be discussed later in this essay.
3. Not just 1 but 2 ironies which I'll cover below.

Hypoagency and Hyperagency

In Kyojiro Kagenuma on Women's Agency (2022/12/5), Gingko gave us a fuller understanding of hypoagency and hyperagency, briefly described as follows.

Female hypoagency is the cultural tendency to deny that women have any imputed agency.

- Whenever a woman does something that results in negative consequences, her agency in that act is denied, such that she will be immune from blame.
- Whenever a woman does something that results in positive consequences, she is given full credit and may even be over-credited.

The people who excuse and/or permit women's bad behavior by denying women's agency and/or over-crediting them are enabling women's failure to exercise agency. Gingko calls this whole situation of treating women like babies female hypoagency.

A necessary corollary of female hypoagency is male hyperagency. Under male hyperagency, men are held responsible for all the things women are not.

Whenever a woman does something that results in negative consequences and a man is directly involved in the situation, either (1) the entirety of blame is placed squarely on the man, and/or (2) the man is expected to assume full responsibility and take up the slack. He is demonized or punished somehow if he does not comply.

Moreover, these are forms of Operant Conditioning which teach women to neglect agency, and whip men into obedience to the Feminine Imperative.

We see both hypoagency and hyperagency occurring in the church and the wider Western culture as a norm.

Idolatrous Faux Fantasies (Solipsism) and the Failure of Imagination

One of the big issues with women's agency is their lack of perceived agency. That is, women DO have the capacity of exercising agency, but they aren't aware of it. This is essentially a failure of imagination, which is a common symptom of idolatry. Instead of imagining how they might improve their situation by responding appropriately, they indulge their imaginative capacity in various forms of fantasy and mythos and they expect reality to conform to whatever that might be. This is solipsism in a nutshell.

Since their minds are preoccupied with fantasy, they only see imagined choices and they can't see real options. Thus, they do not become aware that they have a choice in the real sense, and so they fail to instantiate agentic force. This is why they are prone to believe that everything that happens to them, "just happens", and that they are helpless victims who are merely responding to what they perceive as injustices (according to their solipsistic fantasies). They never realize that they are out of touch with reality (until a man steps in and sets them straight), so they bumble the decision making about how to respond appropriately. By failing to choose wisely, they unwittingly contribute to the perceived "injustice".

So even though women DO have agentic capacity, for all intents and purposes, they're cluelessly stuck in their heads and therefore behave like they don't. Then because they never exercise agentic capacity, it either never develops, or it atrophies into nothing. Women will often describe this condition as "a lack of self-esteem", which is a misnomer, because the underlying latent idolatry of solipsism has nothing to do with self-esteem.

The 4 Aspects of Moral Agency

As the series wore on, I discovered that Moral Agency has 4 parts which are dynamically interrelated. I sussed out an initial assessment of these differences in a post On the Concept of Agency (2022/11/16), but since then I've concluded that these differences can be better described in terms of Capability, Responsibility, Maturity, and Culpability. What follows is a brief summary of each.

1. Women's Moral Agency in Terms of Capability

The Bible says women are not morally equal nor interchangeable with men.

- Women are more easily deceived than men.
- Women have a weaker moral capacity than men.
- Women are strongly averse to accepting the consequences of their decisions.

All of this is to say that women have an impaired / conditional / weakened sense of moral agency, which is exactly what Paul alluded to in 1 Peter 3:7 [emphasis mine].

> Likewise, husbands, live with your wives in an understanding way, showing honor to the woman as the weaker vessel, since they are heirs with you of the grace of life, so that your prayers may not be hindered.
> 1 Peter 3:7 (ESV)

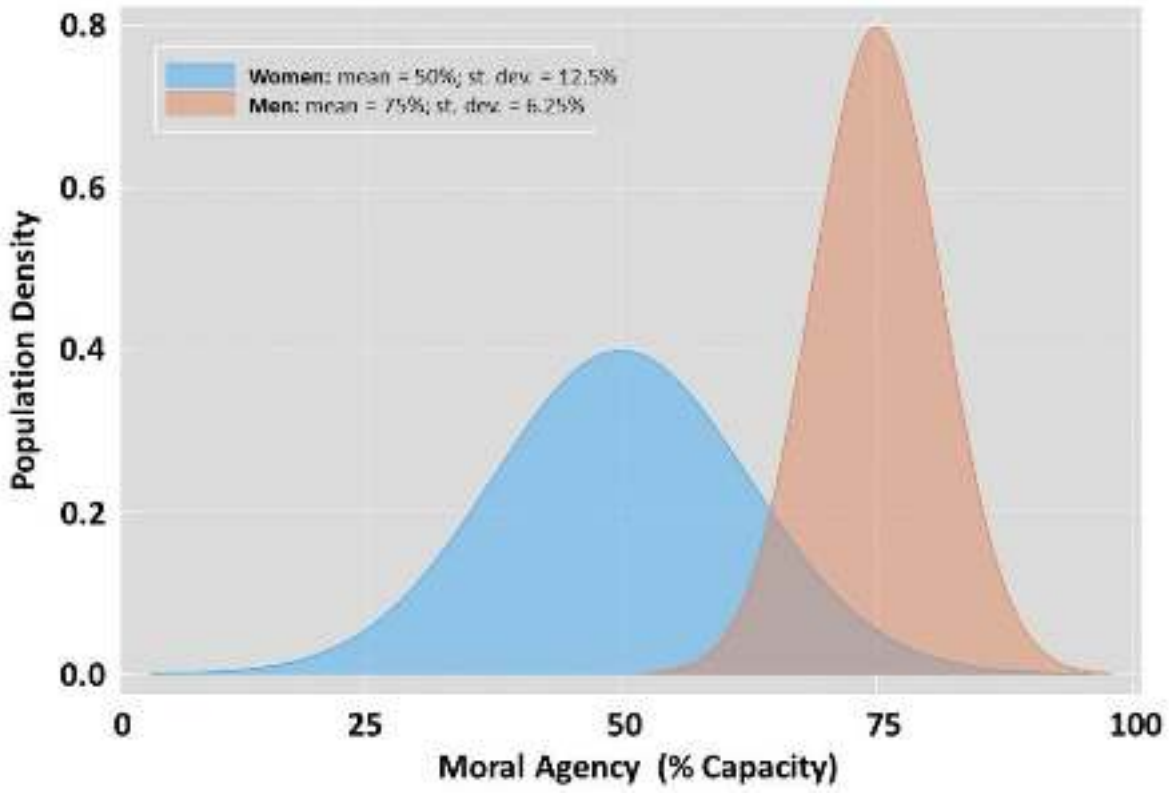
In terms of population distributions, Zippy Catholic's assessment of Moral Agency as a function of individual capability illustrates how most women often fail to instantiate the same level of Moral Agency as men do.



2. Women's Moral Agency in Terms of Responsibility

Moral Agency is always assessed in terms of a structure of authority. Men are responsible to God, women are responsible to their male head. This is the crux of the Christ : Church :: Husband : Wife analogy described in Ephesians 5:22-33.

According to God's ordained order, men and women have many responsibilities that are sex specific. Overall, men have a responsibility to lead, and women have a responsibility to follow. But whatever the case may be, submission to Headship is an integral part of a woman's moral agency.

These roles are dependent on each other, in that when men lead, it is easier for women to follow, and when women follow (through obedience, submission, and respect), it is easier for men to lead.

At the same time, these roles are also exclusive from each other, in that men have a responsibility to lead whether women follow or not, and women have a responsibility to follow whether men lead or not.

D. Bradley pointed out that if women are to be good followers and helpers, then it is necessary for women's expression of agency to be focused on submission and cooperation, rather than on making difficult moral judgments which falls under the responsibility of her Head.

So we see that Trust figures largely in the answer. Trust must first begin in one's trust in God and/or an authority figure (e.g. father, husband, pastor, mentor, etc.). Trust grows among men in community / Christian fellowship, and this fosters and nurtures trust between men and women. Shared enterprises, shared values, and shared purposes expediate trust and provide a vehicle for it to grow. Sin disrupts trust and weakens the authority structure.

3. Women's Moral Agency in Terms of Maturity

In the past, Manospherians have assumed that the answer to the question of whether females possess moral agency is a binary solution set. That is, either women do have moral agency, but they fail to exercise it, or they don't have any agency at all. But the real answer to this question is that any particular woman finds herself in a continual state of growth and development. Hence, the answer is found within an infinite number of degrees and permutations, depending on the woman herself. The variance in case by case is shown in Zippy's distributions.

Nevertheless, it can be summarized in a nutshell, Moral agency and maturity go hand in hand — agency is dependent upon her spiritual maturity, and to a large extent, her spiritual maturity rides on her faith, as expressed in her ability to love, serve, and submit to God and the man in her life, as well as her ability and willingness to recognize, foresee, and resist temptations.

However, just because a woman is mature, doesn't mean that she will go to the effort to employ the moral agency she possesses. This goes back to the degree of faith she has within a particular arena of her life and her commitment to please the Lord and her father/husband.

So the answer to the Manosphere's old question is not whether females possess moral agency or not, but rather, the degree to which any particular woman has grown in spiritual maturity.

4. Women's Moral Agency in Terms of Culpability

Deti cornered the subject of Women's Moral Culpability in his two posts and all his comments.

A typical man's gut reaction to the Red Pill is to regard women somewhat as evil psychopaths. This response comes from a male's projected expectation of women to possess an agentic moral capacity equal to that of a man's.

Indeed, after all the studies in this series, it is evident that women DO have Moral Agency. All the facts and logic put the onus on women to correct their behavior and fall in line with God's created order. But what we see is that Women will resist it all the way, kicking and screaming. Thus, it's up to a man to nurture her Agentic capacity and guide her towards maturity.

It may serve to help men if they adopt a tempered perspective on the issue, and embrace a general attitude of compassion, detachment, patience, and skepticism towards women, which is fundamentally grounded in the belief that women are helpless sheeple, truly having agency, but targeted by Satan, disabled by doubts and fears, and who are ultimately dependent on men and on God. However, this is not to be construed as passively regarding women as Hypoagentic "victims", but rather should be met with a redoubled effort to discipline and teach women through patient Operant Conditioning, with constant watchful care and guidance, as with a child. The ironies of this will be covered in the next two sections.

I have continued to insist that charismatic Game* is necessary in dealing with immature women who are lacking moral agency and strength of character, and who cannot make life changing decisions responsibly. Game is also necessary for dealing with mature women with moral agency who are in rebellion or when Trust is absent or tenuous. The appropriateness of Game* and the nature of its implementation is highly dependent on the context — the constitution and character of a particular woman and the man's relationship with her.

 Not to be confused with PUA style Game which is done for the purpose of exploiting women's lack of agency.*

Irony 1 – Men are the Instigators

> "As always, don't just listen to what people say, watch what they do."

As I've been writing all the posts for this theme, I have come to the same idea. The assignation of Agency is more about people's behaviors than what they actually say or even believe.

> "A lot of men who claim that women have no moral agency hold women accountable for their actions."

Yes, I've noticed this too, although it seems kinda rare. The interesting thing is that their belief that women DO NOT have agency is what motivates them to hold them accountable. Whereas, men who believe that women DO have agency tend to sit back on their laurels with the expectation that women will exercise agency of their own initiative. But the interesting thing here is that women don't work that way. Usually, whenever you see a woman who actually exercises agency, somewhere in the background there is a man providing the framework / guidance / initiative / incentive / motivation for the woman to be that way.

> "In so doing, these men prove that they actually believe that women do have moral agency."

Yes, but this belief is shown in practice, not in cognition. They may very well have no awareness at all about this difference. This is an example of how people can believe falsehoods in their heads that actually reinforce the practice of truth in their lives. Similarly, people can believe truths in their heads, but have no idea how to practice those truths in their lives.

Irony 2 – Women are Responders

Oscar wrote,

> "Where a lot of "Red Pill" men go wrong is that they believe the same lie a lot of "tradcon" men believe – women are responders."

This contains another irony. Women really are responders, so it's not a factual lie. The lie comes into play when men get the notion that the woman is like a vending machine, as Oscar described.

> "In other words, they treat women like they're machines – give them the "right" input, and they give you the desired output. People don't work that way. They never have."

Then when her knees don't automatically spring open they get bogged down in the details of the mechanics, thinking they didn't push the right button or pull the lever at the right time, etc. It's a very naive view of women that leads to the "dancing monkey" impression surrounding charisma, Game, and giving feedback.

This is the same lie that Red Pill grifters use to get men to keep buying their stuff, paying for subscriptions, etc. "You didn't do X right."

People also get similar ideas about God — that if they do X, Y, and Z, then they'll get something they desire or some other kind of blessing, similar to the Prosperity Gospel.

At its root, it's a works-based mentality, or worse, a Covert Contract.

The truth is that men need to give women dynamic feedback and use Operant Conditioning to lead them towards redemption, regeneration, and Truth. Employing Operant Conditioning with the aim of helping women escape solipsism and exercise agency is essentially what it means to "love your wives" (Ephesians 5:25-33; 1 Peter 3:7).

Conclusions — Do Women Have Moral Agency?

At the beginning of this series, we've posed the question, Do women have moral agency?

Catacomb Resident gave us the answer to the question early in the series, but it seems that most of us didn't catch the full meaning of his words until later on.

> "…it's not a question of whether women have moral agency, but how much. And a biblical covenant would assume that women are better off being restricted to protect them from themselves. Yes, God granted women some moral agency; He does hold them accountable for their sins. Yet He has tasked His Covenant people with building an atmosphere to account for the differences between female moral agency and that of males. God holds men accountable on a different level."
> Catacomb Resident: Moral Agency (2022/11/3)

This falls under the category of Headship, and Biblical Headship is the answer, which was Red Pill Apostle's take.

The question as it pertains to men is how to deal with it. I will address how men should respond to this in tomorrow's post.

I hope that this series has provided many valuable insights to my readers.

In the comments, I would like to know if readers have learned anything other than what I've summarized above.

Headship, NOT Hyperagency!

Headship vs. Hyperagency

I've spent about 50 days putting together 26 posts about female agency, moral agency, and accountability. Even so, I've only just scratched the surface of this topic. I plan to continue examining the concepts we've learned from this study and apply these insights to the topics of future posts.

St. Paul also "just" scratched the surface when he wrote,

> Yet those who marry will have worldly troubles, and I would spare you that.
> 1 Corinthians 7:28 (ESV)

It is an enduring source of irritation to us that St. Paul glosses over these issues in such trite language, never really letting on what a pain in the neck it can be. I do not think this is because it is not important to our spiritual lives, because it is of central importance. I would rather believe it is because he would have to write a small library to cover it all, and it wouldn't make much of a difference anyway. I also believe basic Red Pill knowledge was much more commonly known in times past, and men had more authority than they do now, so the truth of the Red Pill wasn't like the gospel of intersexual relationships, as we tend to regard it now.

Oscar et al. have posed the following questions,

> "That women possess moral agency seems like a foregone conclusion to me. So then the question becomes, "Great! Now what?"

I know some readers are going to barf in their throats when I repeat this, but if Western men are ever going to solve our wimminz problems, then it's really up to men to take women to task, hold them accountable, and teach them to exercise agency.

> "How do we hold women accountable?"

In addition to the basics (e.g. knowing yourself, pursuing your purpose, etc.), here's a list of 22 things to get men started — all things we've written about before.

1. Strive to assume a position of Headship, especially to be her head.
2. Be aware of your Masculine Presence and use it to your advantage.
3. Speak with confidence and authenticity. This carries a lot of import with a woman.
4. Start believing that the women within our domain of influence (friends, girlfriends, wives, daughters, and even some elderly women) are subject to our authority.
5. In general, expect Christian excellence seasoned with grace.
6. Offer Moral Guidance Based Feedback with the aim of increasing trust.
7. Encourage women to make hard decisions and take responsibility for the consequences of their choices instead of avoiding it. (This is very important for fathers with daughters.)

8. Start exercising some agency in correcting and disciplining women whenever they fail to exercise agency. (Also very important for fathers.)
9. Learn to discern what is truly your own sh!t, and what is her own projection of you.
10. Be proactive about inspiring her introspection with a mindset of redemption.
11. Gently lead her towards Repentance and Submission.
12. Be aware of which type of submission needs improvement, and concentrate on that.
13. Make women aware of their own nature.
14. Teach women how to respond appropriately within a given context.
15. Draw boundaries and state expectations.
16. Impose demands with clear consequences.
17. Don't succumb to her demands.
18. Don't admit her argument.
19. Recognize your limits (both yours and hers) and improvise methods to reinforce areas of weakness.
20. Employ forgiveness, but only when appropriate.
21. Pray vigilantly and incessantly.
22. Last but not least, try to make all of this engagingly entertaining and/or fun if possible.

As you can see, many of these points involve imposing Frame. As for the others, it's ridiculous to assume that women are ever going to do all this for themselves.

These actions should not be confused with male hyperagency as these concepts are not at all the same and have entirely different purposes. Male hyperagency enables female hypoagency, infantile solipsism, and the Feminine Imperative. Responsible male Headship disables and punishes these things.

Employing Operant Conditioning with the aim of helping women escape solipsism and exercise agency is essentially what it means to "love your wives" (Ephesians 5:25-33; 1 Peter 3:7). Judging by the adverse responses to this assertion, it seems that it is just as difficult for men to love their wives as it is for wives to respect their husbands.

Does it Matter?

Back when we were discussing the Black Pill (in mid-September 2022), RPA mentioned to me in a private email that some men are as non-agentic as women are. They do not perceive that they have any agency. They have a trend of applying the idea that life is out of their control, that women are unmanageable, and this appears to be at least some of the source of their bitterness (hence the Black Pill). What they do not fully grasp is that in those instances when they believe they are in control and take hold of the reins of their lives, they do well.

In saying these things, I am NOT blaming men for women's sin. I am not saying that that a woman's incessant emoting, incomplicit reasoning, lack of accountability, sh!t tests, sin, solipsism, rebelliousness, etc., are just a failure of her man to lead her properly. That would be male hyperagenticism. I believe a lot of that is the because of the bad influence of the herd mentality and the surrounding debased culture. More broadly, it's the result of the failures of earlier generations, their polity, churchianity, and how they raised their daughters. The present situation is the spiritual inheritance we have received from an evil generation. If women want to follow after that folly and they don't want to fall in line with God's ordained order, then that is on them. It's her choice whether or not to submit. But as men, we should at least be offering women the choice to comply with God's ordained order and give them the opportunity to find redemption. This is how men extend Christian Love to the women in their care.

I am telling men to look at the hand they've been dealt in life, which includes the present debauched SMP/MMP, women's rebelliousness, etc., to search their souls to find what God requires of them, and to make a decision and take action. Don't fall into the same rut that women are prone to do, i.e. failing to perceive that we have any agency.

Every man's actions matter and can make a difference. Look at how women have responded to MGTOW. And this, in spite of the fact that MGTOW doesn't really affect them in any real way. The larger lesson from this is that Men must believe that (1) women will respond when men take action, and (2) women will fall in line with the larger order that men create. They must.

Rise up, O men of God! Do not let the conditions of your life be dictated by this evil age!

Reader's Note: Σ Frame will go into winter hibernation for the holidays. I will resume posting on January 2. Enjoy your time with family, friends, and those most dear.

The power of a song to transform one's spiritual state.

Happy New Year 2023! Welcome back to Σ Frame!

I trust everyone had a transformative and restful holiday season.

This month the theme is Consolidating Masculinity. We'll be looking at psychological barriers that prevent men from taking action towards realizing their personal domain of influence, and other ways that men can develop expressions of masculinity and reap the benefits thereof.

The first idea I'd like to impress upon our minds this year is the importance of rest and worship. I've written about this a few times before.

- Σ Frame: True Rest and Worship (2010-2-8)
- Σ Frame: True Rest as a form of Worship (2019-10-12)
- Σ Frame: Why is Resting Important? (2019-11-6)

As an example of how simple rest can be, contemplatively listening to music is an exercise that has helped me throughout life. It's benefitted my father as well, and I'm pretty sure I learned this through his example.

I know Adam despises the Moody Blues, and some younger readers might find this song to be boring or quaint, but this song has been a powerful inspiration to me for most of my adult life. The lyrics can be found at the end of this post.

For the purists, here's the original version, released in 1970. There is more precision in rhythmic execution and a more dramatic energy.

I can remember many times in my life when I was confused, alone, anxious, and under pressure; times when my ex wife refused my daughter's visitation and was taking me to court on various false accusations… But whenever I could find a quiet moment to sit down and play this song on the stereo, and pass the moment with a gin and tonic and a bowl of virginia burley in a Canadian pipe, I could feel my mind and soul drift away to an eternal realm — a place of inner peace and clarity of vision, with an occasional pleasant memory from the past. After a time, I felt rested and deeply refreshed. I could look again at my lot in life with a renewed perspective and a sense of hope.

Maybe this song just does this for me only, but I just had to share this for the possible benefit of others. Nevertheless, the main point I wish to put across is that it's important to find moments like these in our daily lives. Readers may like to share what kinds of activities, songs, or moments can usher them into the eternal.

Lyrics

Rise, let us see you
Dawning is the day
Miss, misty meadow
You will find your way
Wake up in the morning to yourself
And leave this crazy life behind you

Listen, we're trying to find you

Flow to the sea
You know where to go
But still we are free
No one tells the wind which way to blow
Wake up in the morning to yourself
Open your eyes and start to be you
Listen, we think we can see you

Baby there's no price upon your head
Sing it, shout it
Now the angry words have all been said
Do it, don't doubt it

So rise, let us see you
Dawning is the day
Miss, misty meadow
You will find your way
Wake up in the morning to yourself
Open your head and look around you
Listen, we think we have found you

Listen, we think we have found you
Listen, we think we have found you
Listen, we think we have found you
Listen, we think we have found you
Listen, we think we have found you
Listen, we think we can see you

What One Man Can Do, Another Can Do

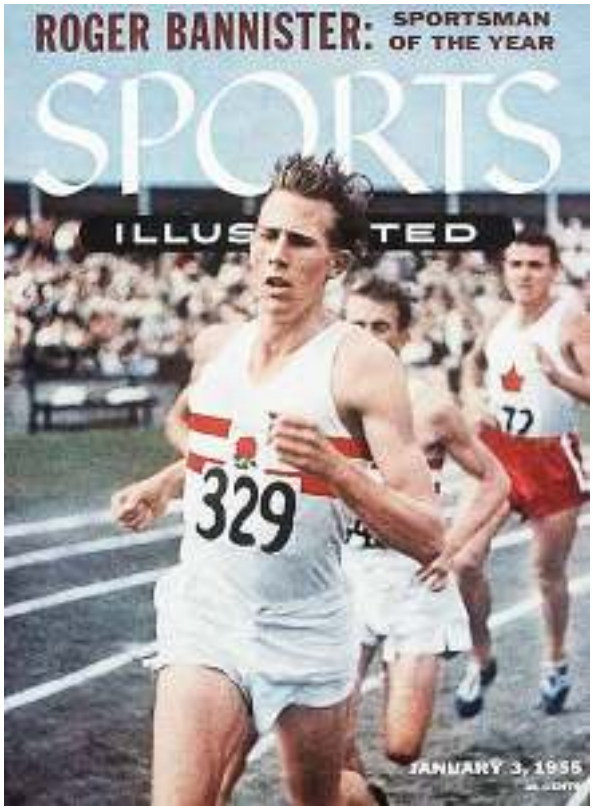
Case Study 1 — Roger Bannister



In his post, Restoring Respect (2022/9/28), Jack shared the following magazine cover of one of the greatest athletes in history, Roger Bannister, the first man to run a mile in less than four minutes.

My favorite part of Bannister's story is what was going on around him as he trained up for the attempt, and what happened after he broke the four minute barrier (emphasis mine).

> "So the four-minute barrier stood for decades — and when it fell, the circumstances defied the confident predictions of the best minds in the sport. The experts believed they knew the precise conditions under which the mark would fall. It would have to be in perfect weather — 68 degrees and no wind. On a particular kind of track — hard, dry clay — and in front of a huge, boisterous crowd urging the runner on to his best-ever performance. But Bannister did it on a cold day, on a wet track, at a small meet in Oxford, England, before a crowd of just a few thousand people.
> When Bannister broke the mark, even his most ardent rivals breathed a sigh of relief. At last, somebody did it! And once they saw it could be done, they did it too. Just 46 days Bannister's feat, John Landy, an Australian runner, not only broke the barrier again, with a time of 3 minutes 58 seconds. Then, just a year later, three runners broke the four-minute barrier in a single race. Over the last half century, more than a thousand runners have conquered a barrier that had once been considered hopelessly out of reach."

> Harvard Business Review: What Breaking the 4-Minute Mile Taught Us About the Limits of Conventional Thinking (2018/3/9)

What one man can do, another can do!

Bannister's story reminded me of a line from the 1997 movie, The Edge. It wasn't a great movie, but this one line has always stuck out in my mind, "What one man can do, another can do." [Language warning.]

No one has taken that principle to heart more ardently than Dave Ramsey. He's been featuring a "millionaire theme hour" for years now, and for decades, his radio show (and now YouTube and podcasts) has featured the "debt free scream" in which listeners tell their stories of how they paid off debts. Many of the story tellers explain that listening to others' "debt free screams" motivated them to pay off debt.

The message is clear. "What one man can do, another can do". As Nadeane, a YouTube commenter on one of the "debt free screams" put it, "I love seeing under 35s becoming debt free! It gives me so much hope that I can do it too! £28,835 left to go!"

Let's look at a few of these redemption stories in which normal people are doing the supposedly impossible.

Case Study 2 — Jack and Lisa

Jack has a 2-year degree, works as an electronics technician, and has a net worth of $2.3 million at 43 years old. (His story begins at 2:18.)

Case Study 3 — Derek and Ambere

Derek is a tattoo artist and recovering drug addict from Salt Lake City, UT. When the government forced him to shut down his tattoo shop, Derek relapsed and ended up in jail. I'll let him and his wife, Ambere, tell their story.

Case Study 4 — Chris and Amanda

Chris doesn't say exactly what he used to do when he was young, but given his vague description (I don't blame him), it sounds gang related. He and his wife, Amanda, paid off almost $48k in 31 months on a fairly modest income.

Case Study 5 — Paul and Stefanie

This link will take you to the story of Paul and Stefanie at Dave Ramsey's YouTube channel. Paul is 29, he has a blue collar job, and he lives with his wife, Stefanie (27). These two pulled off the supposedly impossible trifecta; they got married, paid off student loans, and paid off a house, all in their 20s! All of that in Tacoma, WA, one of the more expensive places to live in the USA!

I hope Stefanie has an older woman in her life telling her what a catch she has!

Case Study 6 — Tyler and Bre

Tyler and Bre got married right out of high school. They're both under the age of 25, and they've already paid off their house and student loans!

Those are just a few clips that stood out to me, and that's enough to make my point, but if you want to hear more encouraging stories like these, there are many other stories from people of just about every walk of life on Dave Ramsey's YouTube channel.

How does this relate to Redemption?

Jack's emphasis on redemption (the theme for September 2022) led me to the inescapable conclusion that each "debt free scream" is literally a redemption story. Note how each of these redemption stories starts with confession ("I'm $X in debt") and repentance ("I'm going to change all my money habits that got me into this mess").

When King Solomon wrote that "The borrower is slave to the lender" (Proverbs 22:7), he was speaking literally. In ancient Israel, one way to discharge a debt one could not pay was to serve the lender as a slave for a predetermined amount of time. During that period of slavery, a relative of the slave could pay his debt and restore him to freedom. His status as a slave would be wiped away completely. This act was called redemption, and the relative was known as the redeemer. This is not the only meaning of redemption, but it's the meaning Jesus referenced when he described our sin as a debt we could never repay (Matthew 18:21-35).

Jesus was a master story teller. His parables are short and seemingly simple, yet they contain depths of meaning that one could plumb for a lifetime.

One of the beauties of comparing sin to debt is that when we're set free from sin, we're set free to serve God. Likewise, when we're set free from debt, we're set free to build wealth.

Qui Bono?

While we're at it, I'd encourage you to consider the old Latin saying, "Qui bono?" Who benefits?

There are three kinds of entities / people / voices that will tell you that striving towards a real life redemption is a hopeless endeavor. Borrowing from Biblical archetypes, I'll call them Thieves, Tax Collectors, and Prostitutes.

1. Thieves

By "thieves", I mean hope thieves. There are a lot of hope thieves out there. You've read and heard the self-proclaimed "best minds", and "experts" on the internet spout all variations of the following statements.

- "The American dream is dead."
- "The little man can't get a head."
- "Young people can't get married."
- "Millennials can't afford houses."
- "Millennials can't pay their student loans."

The message is clear. "You can't win, so you may as well not try."

Hope thieves don't just steal hope from others, they prevent others from seeking redemption. They're like crabs in a bucket. When one crab starts to pull himself out of the bucket, the others pull him back down. Hope thieves know that "what one man can do, another can do", which is why they don't want you to succeed, because if you succeed, that proves they could succeed too, and that would put them to shame. They don't want to change their ways because that would require them to do work they're unwilling to do. They don't want to confess, or repent — and redemption requires confession and repentance. Hope thieves (A.K.A., crab people) would rather wallow in the mud (which also makes them swine) of self-pity than confess and repent, and since misery loves company, they want you wallowing right next to them. They've thrown themselves a lifelong pity party, and you're invited.

2. Tax Collectors

I'm using the label "Tax Collector" loosely here to mean anybody that tries to hit you up coming and going. They're looking to use you, take what they can from you, and then send you off, preferably without you even knowing that you've been conned. Tax Collectors are ubiquitous and they assiduously keep themselves hidden from critical view. Google is a great example of a Tax Collector. They collect all your personal information and sell it to God knows who for a vast amount of money. They censor search result information and even emails, and you don't have any inkling of what goes on. Google benefits* by monitoring start-ups and market dynamics and preventing small fries from amassing market position and wealth. PayPal is no better. Banking policies, insurance scams, and student loans would also fall into this category.

 H/T: PA Pundits – International: Why You Should Ditch Google and Gmail — Before It's Too Late (2022/10/9)*

3. Prostitutes

Again, I'm using "prostitutes" loosely to mean anyone or anything that entices you to spend your time and/or money foolishly and distracts you from making progress towards your dreams and goals in life. Here, "Prostitutes" would include advertisers, Big Pharma, politicians, and any women who are not within your personal domain of influence. Bad friends would qualify too. On a more personal note, bad habits (e.g. excessive drinking and smoking), masturbation, rumination, and Simptation will only slow you down.

Introspection and Incentives

Take a moment to think it over. Who benefits from you believing that "I can't win, so I may as well not try"?

- Do you benefit?
- Do your lazy friends benefit?
- Does your competition benefit?
- Does the converged media benefit?
- Do the crabby hope thieves and swine benefit?
- Do women who are not within your personal domain of influence benefit?
- Do politicians who want you to believe you need them to fix your life for you benefit?

Qui Bono? Who benefits?

Jesus said,

> "Do not give what is holy to the dogs; nor cast your pearls before swine, lest they trample them under their feet, and turn and tear you in pieces."
> Matthew 7:6 (NKJV)

Do not give your precious things – your time, your energy, your efforts, the fruits of your labors – to crab people, Hope Thieves, Prostitutes, Tax Collectors, or Swine.

How do you know if a man is a hope thief, a crab person, or a swine? He tells you that what others are doing is impossible and gets angry when you show him that others are doing what he claims is impossible. He whines about problems, but won't lift a finger to fix them. He demands that things outside of his control change, but he won't change anything within his control. And, most importantly, when you try to help him, as Jesus said, he will trample your efforts and "turn and tear you to pieces".

Lastly, I'd encourage you to ask yourself, "Have I been a hope thief for others"?

If so, then don't be crabby! Or else you'll drag everyone else around you down.

Note: In addition to dogs and swine, another Biblical typology for this type is "birds of the air", specifically the blackbird, owl, vulture, and woodpecker.

The Conclusion

The principle of "What one man can do, another can do" applies to every area of life, not just finances.

How do you feel when you hear stories of people doing the supposedly impossible? Does it inspire you to do the same, or does it make you angry? Do you think, "If they can do it, I can do it too", or do you think, "Sure they did it, but I can't because [insert excuse here]"?

Now, you have a decision to make. Will you listen to the Hope Thieves, Tax Collectors, and Prostitutes, or will you listen to the people who are doing the supposedly impossible, and think to yourself, "What one man can do, another can do"?

You'll never improve your life if you surround yourself with crabby people, hope thieves, and swine. Will you continue to wallow in the mud of self-pity with them, or will you surround yourself with people that are already doing what you want to do?

It's time to identify the crabs, dogs, swine, and vultures in your life and do some house cleaning.

It's your life, your decision, and your consequences.

Farewell to Kings

Roosh took down the Return of Kings (ROK) site on 2022/12/21, corresponding with the winter solstice. He explained the reason for his decision as follows.

> "After my repentance, I did not see a problem with leaving old secular content online since it did not explicitly teach men how to sin. What's so wrong with articles like "30 Signs That A Woman Has Been With Over 100 Men" or "16 Signs That You Are A Weak Beta Male," for example? They couldn't possibly hurt men, I thought, but I no longer believe that. Any piece of content that is secular, created from a godless perspective, and allows you to keep loving the things of this world will end up harming your soul by competing with the love you must have for God. It enables you to stay locked into matters and affairs that will keep you off the path of salvation. I can't have it on my conscious that I left up an archive of thousands of articles that continued to validate for many men a secular outlook that inhibited their worship of Christ. The articles were written as if the spiritual world didn't exist and painted the material world as the end-all-be-all of our existence, presupposing the false notion that there is no God. Therefore, I took down the entire Return Of Kings archive. It is not coming back."

In terms of spreading the Red Pill gospel, closing ROK makes little difference now that the RP has gone mainstream. ROK has already served its purpose in that sense.

However, I have mixed feelings about Roosh's decision to completely shut down ROK. After all, this turn of events is like a Feminist's wet dream come true.

"No more ROK!"

"He censored HIMSELF!!!"

"The Manosphere is finally DEAD!!!"

It is true that ROK promoted many godless perspectives, as Roosh mentioned. But the thing is, it was a forum that allowed men to come together and communicate all the things they were concerned about — things that they had somehow missed in the haze of a gynocentric church and society. There were grifters and players indeed, but also honest talk about perspectives that were explicitly shunned from conversation everywhere else they turned, amid the constant rumble of lies being thrown at them everyday on MSM.

I see it as a free speech dilemma. If you allow free speech, then of course you'll have to tolerate all the trash talk — which anymore, most of the younger crowd just can't tolerate. But if you don't permit free speech, then you, your children, and everyone around you will be force fed the politically correct and socially acceptable boilerplate mantras day in and day out until you're regurgitating the same old puke. In this case, free speech forums will still exist, but they'll go underground and fester into an echo chamber of nightmarish extremism — sorta like what we have today. In the beginning, ROK was just such a place, and it still is (or was) to some extent. But the truth eventually bled out and came to life.

Now that ROK is gone, along with much else of what was once the Manosphere, where will men get a no-holds-barred glimpse of feminine / human nature? What else is out there to help young men (and women) get a handle on that truth? What other gut-level honest assessments of reality are being offered? What other rubber-meets-the-road perspectives are being spelled out as a guide, or as an example of things to avoid? Where are the shared stories and viewpoints of men struggling to attain personal goals and make something of their lives?

The fact of the matter is that any perspective that is authentic, practical, true, and therefore meaningful, will have to touch on these inconvenient truths, the unpleasant issues, the lies, the sin, and so on, and call it out for what it is.

Thorniness is a litmus of the truthfulness that introduces the redeeming aspect of the Black Pill.

A microcosm of masculine men mansplaining “misandry”, an instructive snapshot of godlessness, and a little taste of the horrors surrounding the bitter Black Pill every now and then is a good antidote for the male propensity to coast on autopilot and pedestalize women for their beauty and p_ssy.

How can we find grace without honesty and truth, as ugly as it may be? In spite of all his sordid past, or maybe because of it, Roosh found grace. I doubt that Roosh would have ever found faith if he had always remained in the Orthodox church of his upbringing and played the role of a dutiful altar boy. He was a Prodigal son who had to travail in a world of his own desires before he was truly found.

It all brings up the question, how much knowledge, and what kind of knowledge, do men really need to know in order to know themselves, to know women, to manage their families and their women well, and to do well in life?

Does Roosh’s decision to close ROK truly benefit men? Or is it simply a knee-jerk attempt to distance his conscience from the shame of his sordid shenanigans?

The past might be instructive to younger men, lest those hard-learned lessons be forgotten.

Normative Red Pill

Jack · 7 January 2023 · Archived copy · Original

Thanks to Roosh, et al., the Red Pill is not as esoteric as it once was, but redemption still remains to be had.

Targeted Readership: All
Theme: Consolidating Masculinity
Length: 600 words
Reading Time: 3 minutes

During the past few years, it was recognized that a man had to take the Red Pill in order to fully wake up from the widespread gynocentric indoctrination so prevalent in the culture. But most men couldn't do this unless they were first tied to the feminist whipping post and had all the lies beat out of their heads.

Catacomb Resident wrote,

> "But despite the near unanimity of testimonies of men here having to walk through the fires of Hell to get here, I'm still not convinced this should be treated as normative. Some of you seem to come close to saying that. Typical maybe, but not at all necessary to get to the point we are now."

If society wasn't so far off the mark, maybe crawling through Hell wouldn't be necessary. But what we typically see is that men (and women too) will dawdle along in their Blue Pill / churchian / Feminist Life Script delusions until a traumatic experience shakes them up. That's how most men find the Red Pill.

Aside from the Red Pill experience of waking up from the cultural indoctrination, the shattering of paradigms in general seems to be a typical experience in finding faith as well. This is also true for both men and women.

I counsel students regularly. One student I spoke with yesterday was really broken. She is a Christian from Indonesia. She broke up with her boyfriend because of religious differences. (He's a Muslim.) Then her best friend snatched up her ex-boyfriend and rubbed it in her face. Her social circle rejected her in favor of the new pair. In addition to being heartbroken and rejected, she's also all alone in a foreign country, with all the responsibilities of succeeding in her studies and taking care of herself. She was coming apart at the seams in every which way. She cried the whole time we talked. But… the good news is that she found God, and I can attest that she truly has.

Her story feeds into the phenomenon that is sometimes cynically discussed here as a trope — that women only "find God" after chasing after the Career Life Script / Feminist Life Script, i.e. riding the carousel for 10 years before hitting the wall and having nothing to show for it. Well, sometimes it's true. Their souls might find redemption, but those vital years of opportunities to do right are gone forever. It goes back to what Jesus said about losing one's life in this world in order to find everlasting Life. That's great for them, but of course it does nothing for the interests of marriage minded men.

The same sort of thing happens to men too. But the circumstances and effects are unique to men. This is apparently what happened with Roosh.

Anyway, from what I've seen, that is how it usually happens. People fail or mess up their lives, and then they find faith / God.

All this said, I do not disagree with Catacomb Resident that the way forward should be made more evident to people and as a consequence, less destructive and messy.

In some ways, we are seeing this happen now. Red Pill truths are becoming so widespread that many men are picking up on the grisly gristle and grist of things without going through the meat grinder. It's getting to the saturation point where enough men have woken up that it is forcing women to wake up too. But it's probably too late for Gen X and most Millennial women, unfortunately. Femininity and family formation has a 10 year expiration date.

2022 Sigma Frame Performance Report

Jack · 9 January 2023 · Archived copy · Original

Σ Frame's sixth annual traffic performance report.

Readership: Anyone interested
Length: 2,500 words
Reading Time: 13 minutes

Introduction

History

I started blogging on March 7, 2008, using Blogger as my blog platform. On September 27, 2017, I transferred the best of my blog writings from Blogger to WordPress, and began concentrating on Red Pill topics. I received more views on WordPress in the first two months, than I had on Blogger in the previous 8 years. Since then, my posts have grown more frequent and more regular.

Goals and Purposes

My goals and purposes in blogging are summed up in my About page. I value easily readable, and high content quality posts that stand the test of time – writings that would be of value to readers even decades from now. As this blog has matured, there has been more emphasis placed on Biblical and philosophical purity, sifting out truth from various Red Pill concepts, and determining how these are to be properly applied to Christian Men's lives.

Methods

I have a frequent habit to pray about the purpose of this blog, what I should write about, and what men need to read and know. I've always had the conviction that my testimony, my life experiences, and the things I've learned are valuable to other men, and that it's important for me to share these things for the benefit of others. I also recognize that God is working throughout the lives of many other men. It is for this reason that I pray for other men to join me in this endeavor. The Lord has answered this prayer with exceeding benevolence. Lexet teamed up with me in 2019. Scott and NovaSeeker joined the writing panel in 2020. In 2021, Red Pill Apostle, Thedeti, and two others joined us in contributing their talents and valuable insights in writing. In summary, the authors for 2022 included Jack (147 posts), Red Pill Apostle (13 posts), Thedeti (7 posts), Scott (5 posts), Lexet (4 posts), Oscar (4 posts), NovaSeeker (2 posts), Catacomb Resident (1 post), Sharkly (1 post), and one anonymous contributor (1 post). We are especially grateful to have all these men's input on Σ Frame. Thanks also to all the readers who invested their thoughts, time, and energy to contribute to the scintillating discussions.

Site Changes in 2022

Appearance

On July 8 (two weeks after the Dobbs v. Jackson decision), I sensed that the mood of the era had shifted, so I changed the background theme colors. The old appearance looked like this.

The new appearance looks like this.

Categories

As this blog has grown over the years, I recognized the need to recategorize everything, not by the nature of the subject (as it was before), but something more reader friendly — geared more towards what readers would want to find and be interested in reading. So between March and May, upon Scott's suggestion, I revised all the categories by adding some popular topics and deleting those that were unhelpful to readers. This was rather time and labor intensive, as I had to go through many old posts and recategorize all of them. This work continues to be ongoing as my time permits.

New Pages

Readers may not have noticed, but this year I've added three new pages located in the drop-down menus in the Header.

- Σ Frame: What is Mysticism? (2022/2/1)
- Σ Frame: Σ Frame Maxims and Axioms (2022/2/19)
- Σ Frame: What is IN the Red Pill? (2022/6/12)

Side Bar

Every 21 months, I review how the Manosphere has changed during this period of time. The time to do this again came on the week of June 12-17, 2022. I wrote a post, Red Pill Rollover (2022/6/17), to report these changes, and I updated the sidebar to reflect these changes. I also added a list of Recommended Books to the sidebar.

Writings

Themes

The writing projects in 2022 were arranged in monthly themes, as we've done since 2020. This year, there were several mini-themes that arose from the discussions.

1. January – The Integrity and Fidelity of Marriage
2. February – Dating and the SMP
3. March – Risk Assessment
4. April – Overcoming Obstacles
5. May – Faux-Masculine Archetypes
6. June – Identity, Image, and Impressions
7. June 24-July 3 – Special Theme: Abortion (in response to the Dobbs v. Jackson decision overturning Roe vs. Wade)
8. July – Political Shenanigans
9. July – Special Theme: Trans-National Corporations
10. July – Special Theme: Media Psy-Ops
11. August – Masculine Authority and Responsibility
12. August – Special Theme: Perspectives on the Topic of Attraction
13. September – Redemptive Masculinity (received many responses from around the Christian Manosphere)
14. September – Special Theme: The Black Pill
15. October – Feminine Submission
16. October – Special Theme: Duluth
17. November and December – Female Agency and Accountability (received many responses from around the 'sphere)

March, April, September, and October had the most popular themes.

Readers can go to the sidebar and find “Posts by Month” to read up on anything you’re particularly interested in.

Projects

There are three long running projects that have become a regular staple on Σ Frame.

1. Archetypes, especially Headship and the Christ : Church :: Husband : Wife analogy.
2. Courtship Models
3. Discipline in Marriage
4. Masculine Authority and Dominion

The fourth is quickly growing in scope and significance. These continued to be developed in many posts.

In addition, Jack wrote 2 posts at Spawny’s Space this year.

Traffic Statistics

As the following statistics will show, readership, words, and comments have declined, but likes and views per visitor have gone up over the past year. Σ Frame had an average of 673 views per day for 2021. This figure decreased to 573 for 2022.

This year shows a turnover from the previous year. Introspection dropped to number 7, while Discernment/Wisdom dropped off the report entirely. (The decreased interest in these two subjects arouses some concern in me.) Numbers 4 and 5 are new to the top five list.

Last year, the changes indicated that men were backing away from the tortuous SMP and were placing more attention on improving themselves. The changes this year reveal that men are furthering this pursuit by gaining a more thorough understanding of themselves.

Demographics

The top five countries with the most viewers:

This was the first year that readership fell, largely due to a mass exodus of European readers. Canadian and Australian readership took a nosedive, allowing the UK to supersede both. Similarly, New Zealand fell to #9 allowing India to return to its former position as #5. Figures in parentheses indicate the change from the previous year.

1. United States: 175,654 (-9.3%)
2. United Kingdom: 5,462 (-5.7%)
3. Canada: 4,523 (-56.4%)
4. Australia: 4,333 (-35.0%)
5. India: 2,246 (-37.9%)

Total number of viewing countries/principalities: 151 (-11.2%)

Since inception, it has been noted that the vast majority of readership has come from democratic, capitalistic societies that are being smothered by post-modern, feministic social ideologies. In the past, I have attributed this to the sociopolitical climate in these countries. However, this does not explain why Australia, Canada, and New Zealand have had the largest decrease since these countries continue to endure significant misandry and sociopolitical unrest. I assume that the Red Pill going mainstream and the popularity of online videos are the main reasons for this shift.

Top search engine terms leading to Σ Frame:

In past years, the majority of search terms included some variant of “sigma male”, “sigmaframe”, “sigma frame blog”, etc. (which is not surprising), and the words, “wife”, “discipline”, and especially some variant of “jealous”. This year, the frequency of “sigma” terms have decreased significantly, while “wife”, “discipline”, and “marriage” have completely disappeared!

1. A plurality of all search terms used a variation of the word “jealous”.
2. “IOI” and “MGTOW” made their debuts as a search term.
3. Titles of specific posts

Judging by the titles (number 3), the most searched for posts include these, in this order.

1. What To Do When A Girl Tries To Make You Jealous (2018/4/22)

The top 10 blogs receiving the most traffic from Σ Frame:

Compared to the previous year, Full Metal Patriarchy (Prince Asbel), Gunner Q / Gunner Q2, and Laughing at Feminism (Sharkly) have been superseded by The Other McCain, Vox Day, and Snapper TRX. Figures in parentheses indicate the change from the previous year.

1. Spawny's Space: 3,089 (-20.1%)
2. Christianity and Masculinity (Deep Strength): 2,020 (+18.2%)
3. Pushing Rubber Downhill (Adam Piggott): 1,612 (+4.9%)
4. The Other McCain: 1,512 (+20.9%)
5. Wh0res and Ale: 1,505 (-17.2%)
6. The Transformed Wife: 1,494 (-14.6%)
7. Wintery Knight: 1,469 (-5.6%)
8. Vox Day: 1,349 (+7,000.0% exactly, and no, that's not a typographical error!)
9. Biblical Gender Roles: 1,188 (-29.6%)
10. Snapper TRX: 1,133 (+5.0%)

Of note, this is the first year Σ Frame has received more clicks from Adam Piggott than he has received from Σ Frame.

I am always amused to find even numbers and permutations of previous figures come out in the calculations, and this seems to happen with a greater than random frequency. (For example, the referrals from The Other McCain changed from 1,215 in 2021 to 1,512 in 2022.) But the increase in referrals from Vox Day really blows me away. If you wish to calculate it yourself, the number of referrals from Vox Day was 19 in 2021 and 1,349 in 2022. The increase is (1,349-19)/19 = 1,330/19 = 70 or 7,000% !!!

It must be a sign! ⍰ But what that sign might mean is beyond me…

Complacency

Jack · 11 January 2023 · Archived copy · Original

Complacent energy kills all attraction.

Targeted Readership: Men
Theme: Consolidating Masculinity
Length: 1,800 words
Reading Time: 9 minutes + 13 minute video

Men can be very aggressive about life. But only when circumstances demand it.

Women can be very aggressive about sex. But only when hypergamy motivates it.

When things are going well, people fall into habits and get complacent and lazy.

This post will cover one of the biggest hindrances to Men becoming actualized.

Complacency Will Ruin Your Life

Coach Corey Wayne: Complacency Ruins Attraction (2017/6/5)

Here, Corey tells the story of a male viewer who read his book for a while and picked up enough tips to attract a girlfriend into his life. Then after about two years, he got complacent, lost focus on his purpose, gained weight, and became needy and unattractive. Then his girlfriend dumped him unexpectedly and he fell into a tailspin. One night while he was drinking and feeling sad about himself and his life, he saw Corey's book on the shelf and started reading it again. He came to realize that the reason why his previous relationship failed was because of his complacency. Once he realized this about himself, he did what he could to recover, and he completely turned his life around in only four months. He was able to attract a new woman into his life and he also improved his relationship with his daughters.

Corey says,

> "It's another great example of failure to follow the fundamentals and the consequences, and the successes that quickly manifest once you start applying them properly."

He quotes the guy's email saying…

> "When you love your life, you naturally will take better care of yourself. You'll eat better, exercise more, work harder and have a more positive and optimistic attitude towards life and the challenges it naturally brings. Life will feel more effortless because of the natural enthusiasm you have for enjoying your life and the people in it. The happier you are, the more attractive, approachable and desirable you will be to your romantic partners. Romantic success is the result of having a fun and exciting life that you're proud of. Happiness is contagious and attracts other happy people. Do what makes you happy, even if you have to do what sucks temporarily as a means to an end to get from where you are right now, to where you want to be. With enough time, patience, practice and repetition, you can build the life and lifestyle you've always wanted."

The Under-Addressed Problem of Complacency

Corey Wayne may be a Red Pill grifter, but he's right about the problem of complacency. Casey Zander had a better video on this subject, but he deleted it for some reason. Zander's video described how complacency and sincerity are two traits that are big turn-offs to women, emphasizing that complacent energy kills all attraction. Yes, complacent ENERGY is the thing! Even if a man is not actually complacent, if a man carries a low-energy, laissez faire stance towards life, women can feel this and it is a big turn off, not only to women, but to everyone in general.

So if complacency is a real and widespread problem among Men, then why is there a vacuum of Red Pill voices that address this issue? I'll guess that grifters WON'T cover this topic precisely because this is a key issue for men.

Let me explain.

Maybe you've known some dishonest doctors who pass out a lot of big pharma sponsored pills that only cover symptoms — or so it is claimed. They'll never mention the adverse long-term side effects. Meanwhile, they'll take the kickback from the drug companies for promoting these pills and drag their feet in giving their patients the treatment they truly need. Why? Because if they did, their patients would actually get well and then they'd have less income from both the patients and big pharma!

Likewise, if grifters started addressing the real issues that keep men trapped in a state of dejection and complacency, such that these Men adopted a forward attitude, then their lives would change for the positive so much that grifters would lose their subscriber base!

It's that powerful!

Dealing with Complacency

As Corey's reader demonstrated, complacent energy shuts down the waterworks indefinitely, but let's be careful not to get sidetracked by the p00n. It's not just about attracting women or even currying SMV dominance. Men need to look beyond their urgent desire for snatching thatch and appreciate this aspect of attraction for what it is. Women are attracted to men who have their lives together, so we can regard women's attraction as a litmus indicator that a man has done so. OTOH, a complacent energy sends the opposite signal and women are highly attuned to pick up on this.

Like I said, many Men would fare better if they would step up their game and be more proactive about living their lives, but the problem is that many men don't know how to squeeze that ambitious zest for life out of themselves. So they lumber through life having to accept less than what they're cut out for and thereby rack up many frustrating experiences just to come to a place of disappointment and regret. And yet, they feel like something was/is holding them back and they're not sure what it is.

Think about it. How many Men do you know who are decent hardworking chaps who can put on a smile and introduce some levity when the occasion calls for it, but then when no one is around, they sit around feeling very sad and kind of frustrated, disappointed with themselves and how their lives are going (or for older men, how their lives have turned out), despite all their diligent efforts to work hard and stay close to God.

They may even wonder to themselves (as I have done on occasion), "God has always known that I've been seeking Him. So why couldn't God have done more to help me to grow more spiritually mature and do better in life?"

Well, maybe it's because of complacency. I've come to the conclusion that there's only so much God can do. God has to wait for something to happen with us. We have to do something first in order to give God something to work with. Adopting a more proactive attitude towards all of life is a good start.

This may be men's biggest blind spot – not knowing what kind of action is appropriate, when it is necessary, and why (i.e. having a purpose for doing so). It's the male version of Female hypoagency, which at its root, is a form of spiritual immaturity.

Based on the account of Adam's complacency in response to Eve's sin, I would go so far as to say that ALL of men's spiritual malingerings have a lot to do with complacency.

This applies to myself too. Looking back on my life, I can see that I've have many opportunities to reach certain goals throughout various seasons of my life, but these chances escaped me for reasons unknown to me. Looking back, I see that it's because I was waiting on God; meanwhile, He was waiting on me.

Having a firm grasp on the Bible and the Red Pill helps immensely, as does knowing one's self and knowing how things are supposed to be. For many men, much of complacency is based on spiritual pride — of believing that we are self-sufficient and that nothing needs to be done to advance our state of affairs in life, or worse yet, that nothing can be done. Some men even believe that ambition is anti-Christian (and yes, it can be in certain contexts). But let's not reject the good on account of the bad.

Jack's 10 Tips for Eradicating Complacent Energy

It all begins with simple things that any man can do.

1. Initiate action. Don't procrastinate.
2. Form the vision of achieving your Goals
3. Keep yourself charged up by pursuing an enjoyable interest (e.g. a hobby, a personal project, or listening to music).
4. Go to bed at a timely hour. You need adequate rest to feel alive and energetic.
5. Get out of bed immediately upon awakening. Your attitude will follow your action.
6. At the end of the previous day, prepare a menial routine task to do as soon as you begin the next day. It could be as simple as laying out your clothes to wear, or as complex as writing down a work order to be called in for the next day. These habits will help kick start your day and get you up and running.
7. Always have things to do, places to go, and people to see. Whenever you don't have these 3 things planned for the day, then change things so that you do.
8. Get out of the house every day, even if you're sick or it's your day off. Take a 10 minute walk if nothing more.
9. Talk to at least 5 people every day. Work the phone. Meet people if possible. Strike up a conversation with the neighbor or a stranger you might meet by chance. Every person counts.
10. Be proactive in your social encounters. Initiate contact. Initiate the close.

In short, learn to take each day as a blessing. Be thankful for your life, no matter how fantastic or how lousy it might be.

Readers are invited to contribute other tips in the comments.

Conclusions

It's hard to identify complacency as a source of inefficacy, as we are prone to focus on activity rather than inactivity. It's hard to discipline one's self not to be complacent, as most men prefer to kick back and take it easy. But in fact, complacency prevents men from making progress towards those things that they want most in life. No matter what those things might be, whether it is to make more money, to get out of debt, to finish a degree, to start a business or a men's group, or to have a girlfriend or a wife and a happy family, kicking complacency to the curb in every area of one's life is a good move for the better.

Perhaps the biggest risk of remaining complacent is that Men never get a taste of what life could be like for them if they were in a continual habit of stoking that fire in their hearts.

Readers may sigh and groan if reading these words without any hope, but the sooner we accept the fact that complacency may be our biggest hindrance, the sooner we can capitalize on a better life for ourselves, just as Corey's reader concluded. By God's grace, being proactive about taking action just might create or lead you to the hope you are missing.

The ongoing challenge for Men is to learn to desire dominant proactivity more than complacency, and thereby get the thrill of being on top of their lives. A man doesn't even need to be that good at what he does, he just needs to carry a positive energy about it.

Ambition

Jack · 13 January 2023 · Archived copy · Original

A Man's Ambition and his relationship with God are two entirely different things.

Readership: All
Theme: Consolidating Masculinity
Length: 500 words
Reading Time: 2 minutes

In its positive expression, Ambition is a restlessness in men that pushes them to strive for more. It drives them to do better, and to be better. This is a good quality of Men that is to be respected. If a man's natural ambition is linked to his purpose and mission, then he is blessed.

Reverend Billy Graham

In its negative expression, Ambition is a self-serving desire for achievement, conquest, or distinction, for material gain, power, honor, fame, wealth, and püssy galore. In this case, Ambition is the black hand of conceit and vainglorious pride.

The first type of Ambition lends to the building of civilization; the second, its destruction. The first type lends to redemption and salvation; the second, hell and perdition.

The restlessness of the first type is not equivalent to discontentedness, but rather a desire for continual improvement and the freshness of creative development. Contentment comes when that creative change has been realized in a well-functioning form.

This is why it is written,

> Godliness with contentment is great gain.
> I Timothy 6:6 (ESV)

Thus, it is possible to be ambitious for goodness and the things of God. However, if this Ambition is strongly motivated by a desire for ego-satisfaction, self-satisfaction, or to gratify one's own pleasures, rather than on God's purposes and His glory, then that is putting the cart before the horse. This will only lead to frustration. If it is tainted with conceit or self-righteousness, which is legalism / puritanism, it is in vain and will be met with failure and shame.

Pastor Joel Osteen

The key is in having an attitude of Humility and of trusting and serving God, combined with the proper management of desire, and the putting away of one's own fears and self-centered interests. This is the stance many cannot (or will not) take, and it is the point where many fail.

One of the most insidious forms of self-deception is when one cloaks his desire in something holy, believes it is of God, and therefore neglects to do the necessary introspection. When one dresses up his desire in holiness in order to deceive others to believe it is of God, then this is essentially taking God's name in vain.

Although contentment might be found through accruing the things of this world and thereby becoming self-sufficient, true everlasting contentment is linked with Godliness with Godliness coming first.

Ambition is usually seen as an attractive trait. Men can usually discern whether a man is upright or else bent around his own interests, however, they'll seldom think about this. Women, OTOH, are usually rather ignorant about which type of Ambition a man has. Some Wimmin are intentionally ignorant of this, often to her downfall. Both Men and Women would better themselves by being more aware of the nature of this trait in others and in themselves.

Oscar's THOT Experiment

Hammering down on Female Agency.

Theme: Consolidating Masculinity
Length: 150 words

Here's a thought (THOT?) experiment for the group.

Imagine you were filming one of those random-people-on-the-street interviews. You ask young women, "Would you like to be married to a millionaire?"

Suppose they say, "Yes".

You reply with…

"Okay. Statistics show that the most likely path for you to be married to a millionaire is to marry an ambitious young engineer or accountant. Avoid debt. Live on less than you make. Pay off your house early. Invest 15% of your take home income in good growth stock mutual funds. Send him to work every morning with his belly full and his balls drained so he has that extra pep in his step that helps him climb the ladder faster."

(Okay, I made that last part up.)

"20 years later… Voila! You're married to a millionaire!"

"Would you still like to be married to a millionaire?"

How do you think most of your interviewees would respond?

Contentment

A proactive and responsible stance towards life, with God's blessing, eventually leads to Contentment.

False Concepts of Masculine Contentment

Contentment is often regarded as more or less equivalent to Complacency. This is far from the truth. Perhaps this false identification is made through observation, as we generally see that discontented people are the most agentic, for better or for ill, so it is easy to assume that contented people are not, or less so. For example, compare discontented liberals, who are always on the warpath, with stuffy conservacucks, who philosophize and do nothing. This impression is misleading because both Conservatives and Liberals are rather discontent with the political climate, but they respond in different ways. Liberals believe they need to create change, while Conservatives think they need to prevent change, which comes across as doing nothing whenever Liberals manage to advance their agendas.

While Contentment is not the same as Complacency (as I will describe in this post and the next), the association of Discontent with Agency is true. Discontentedness actually serves a God ordained purpose to drive a man to action. But it is not good if a man responds to discontentedness with either of the following.

1. Complacency — Complaining, losing hope, succumbing to self-pity, and becoming dejected.
2. Negative Ambition — Pushing himself to accumulate more accomplishments and possessions with no sense of mission or purpose.

Going back to the previous example, although both Conservatives and Liberals are intensely discontent with the current political standoff, Republicucks often fall back to the first option, while SJWs and other liberals concentrate on the second in a vain effort to create a utopian world.

The best response is the positive variety of Ambition, which is, as I described before, a desire for continual improvement and the freshness of creative development. Contentment comes when that creative change has been realized in a well-functioning form. So a positive Ambition, or proactivity, is a necessary precursor to achieving Contentment. Thus, Contentment is rather the result of exercising Agency, that is, doing the opposite of remaining Complacent.

A man would do well to know which reaction he is predisposed to doing.

As to the first, if Contentment is translated to mean Complacency — just to let things be and not seek to better oneself (e.g. to be fruitful; to be sanctified; to become like Christ) — that is NOT the true meaning of Contentment.

As to the second, if Contentment is translated to mean Worldly Success — just to conquer all competition, overcome every obstacle, make more $$$, get more stuff, and not see any purpose to it all (e.g. to enhance one's domain for the glory of God; to provide an environment in which others can find peace and be sanctified; to become an inspiration and role model to others) — that is also NOT the true meaning of Contentment.

Contentment and Mission

For Men, Contentment is always linked to one's MISSION. A man's Mission is how he is going to emulate Christ in his own personal way and thereby make Christ known within his sphere of influence. It is unique for each man.

A man's MISSION must be combined with his PURPOSE in life — finding the place that God has put him in — his legacy — creating influence and drawing respect — through competency, achievements, growth — so that he may use that influence to glorify God and make Christ known. This essentially boils down to a man's WORK for the Kingdom.

A man's Mission may or may not coincide with his Career. Jesus was a carpenter, Matthew was a tax collector, and Paul was a tentmaker, but that was not their Mission. But if a man's Mission overlaps his Career, then he is greatly blessed. Jesus grew up in the Temple, Matthew could read and write, and Paul was trained to be a Pharisee – thus garnering experiences and skills which helped them fulfill their Mission.

Case Study 1 – Career = Mission

A married female reader shared with me that her husband's brother is a doctor. He told her sons that his mission in life was clearly defined. He said, for most of his education and career, he felt like he was traveling on a highway with signs giving directions at regular intervals. He now works as a missionary doctor in India. Even though he does not make much money, barely enough to live on, he has an immense sense of peace and Contentment about his work.

He also knew what kind of wife he needed. She needed to be faithful, responsible, intelligent, and able to live without very much attention or oversight. Eventually he found one, but it took her a while to learn how to be the wife of a doctor.

Facing Uncertainty

Many if not most men do not have a clear path in life. The way forward is not so evident. For some, God only reveals the next step.

A Biblical example of this type would be Joseph, the son of Jacob. He had a clear dream about where he would end up. He did not have any idea of what he would have to go through to get there, and this was probably for his own psychological good. Another example is Moses. He did not realize that going to the Promised Land would take 40 years of wandering in the wilderness, but he had daily manna as his provision.

> Thy Word is a light unto my feet and a lamp unto my path.
> Psalms 119:105 (KJV)

The light does not show the whole path. Just where to place your feet next. Men who are in this type of situation need to accept that this is just God's way of working in their lives, and that it is a fundamentally different way from those men who have a clear vision. Men in this situation may find it more challenging to attain Contentment, as the daily challenges are often dissatisfying and repletion only comes after many years of travail.

Case Study 2 – Climbing the Cliff

In the same email, the lady stated that, unlike his brother's, the path was not so clear for her husband. She said at the time they met, he only knew some generalities. He knew a life staring at a computer monitor sipping coffee was not for him. He wanted to start a business and he wanted to mentor younger men. He was not at all clear on his Mission and how it would work out. But he did know what he was NOT cut out for, and he knew what kind of wife he needed. Figuring out the rest has been a step by step journey.

He was not on a highway as his brother described, but more like climbing a cliff wall. There was no clear cut direction — just up or down!!! He could only feel his way to the next ledge, and if there was no ledge, he had to drive a spike to support himself.

Even for many years after they married, he was still on the climbing wall, feeling his way up. He had some setbacks along the way, but he kept climbing. She felt uneasy about the financial insecurity and future uncertainty this created, but she decided early on that she must trust in the Lord more than in her husband's income. Now, they are rather well off.

Conclusions

In summary, attaining Contentment involves avoiding complacency and agentically choosing to submit one's self to God as opposed to pursuing self-interest or worldly things. In the next post, The Path to Contentment (2023/1/18), I will describe the details of how this works.

Contentment involves avoiding complacency and agentically choosing to submit one's self to God as opposed to pursuing self-interest or worldly ambitions.

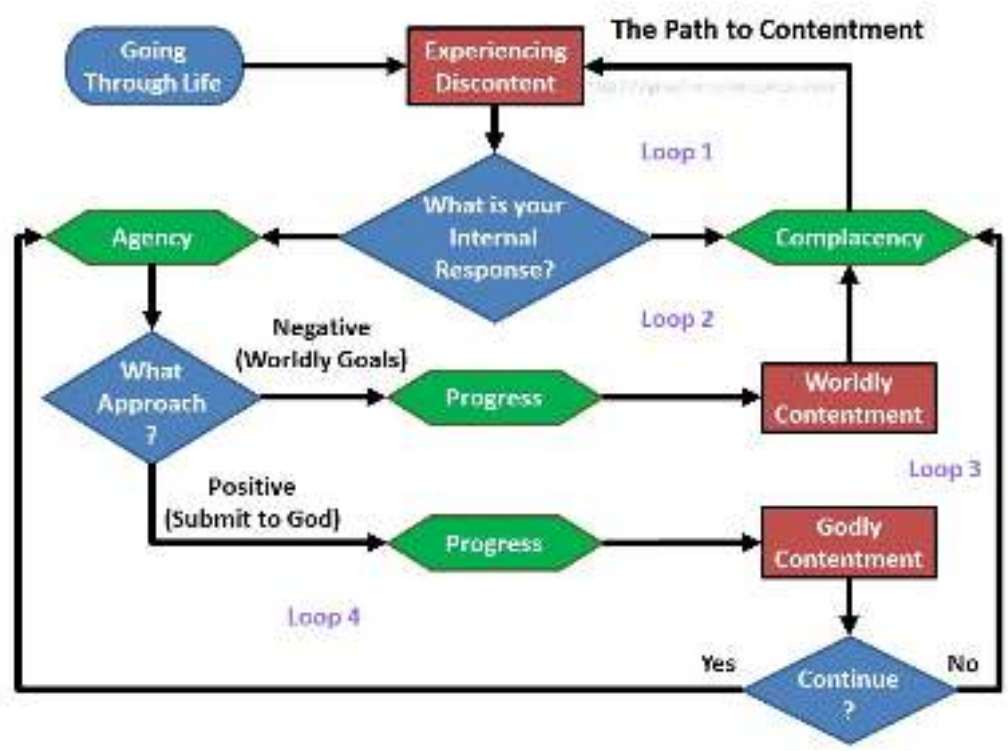
As much as we may wish to find contentment in life, the way forward to that end is not always so clear, as I discussed in Contentment (2023/1/16). For some, it is rather elusive. This post will examine the intricacies of how one may arrive unto a state of Contentment.

The path to Contentment is somewhat similar to The Three Step Path to God (2018/9/27), however, Contentment is a cycle as opposed to a destination, as can be seen in the flowchart below.



I'll explain the flowchart in terms of the loops therein.

Loop 1 – Autopilot

Since everyone experiences discontent and disappointments in life, Loop 1 is the default setting. Loop 1 is characterized by a lack of agency, which I've often referred to as "running on autopilot". Loop 1 contains the Abyss, the Blue Pill, the Carousel, the Covert Contracts, the defense mechanisms, the feral SMP, the mantras, the narcissistic, the narratives, the nauseating pleasantries, the nine-to-five, the philosophical-isms, the political charades, the politically correct, the proscribed Life Scripts, the psychopathic, the quiet desperation, the sex-centrism, the social movements, and all the lies, while all the ugliness of humanity is censored, concealed, hidden away, kept secret, and tucked neatly out of sight.

> [19] Now the deeds of the flesh are evident, which are: sexual immorality, impurity, indecent behavior, [20] idolatry, > witchcraft, hostilities, strife, jealousy, outbursts of anger, selfish ambition, dissensions, factions, [21] envy, drunkenness, carousing, and things like these, of which I forewarn you, just as I have forewarned you, that those who practice such things will not inherit the kingdom of God.

> Galatians 5:19-21 (NASB)

Also see 2 Timothy 3:1-7.

The intra-loop challenge is to keep one's faults and sins hidden, and to cope. Addictive behaviors (alcoholism, gambling, illicit sex, jerking off, etc.), entertainment, fantasy (entitlement, gnosticism, p0rn, etc.), Hopium™ (e.g. false gospels, pop psychology, self-help, Therapeutic Moralistic Deism, etc.), and secrecy aid in doing this. Of note, the OASIS and female online personalities who parrot Red Pill lore constitute a powerful combination of entertainment, fantasy, and Hopium™, hence their mass following.

The larger challenge is to escape this loop by confessing sin, repenting, and/or exercising agency. The dynamics of this loop make it very difficult to do so.

Loop 2 – Worldly Ambitions

For those who can develop agentic capacity, most fall in line with the Worldly Order. Loop 1 effectively serves to teach and train people to do so, should they ever escape the loop. The intra-loop challenge is to compete and progress along the proscribed life scripts, and the grand majority spend most of their time and energies doing so. Very few actually succeed, and even fewer ever attain a sense of contentment, and if/when they do, they tend to fall into a state of complacency. Their prime objectives at this point are (1) to compete with the Jones' for worldly status and dominance, (2) to maintain and possibly reinforce their precarious position in life and (3) to control and manage the sheeple who are stuck in Loop 1. We often refer to these worldly agents as "the Elite".

> For what will it profit a man if he gains the whole world and forfeits his soul? Or what shall a man give in return for his soul?
> Matthew 16:26; Mark 8:34-38; Luke 9:25 (ESV)

Loop 3 – Periodic Godliness

Among those few who can attain agentic capacity, a small number will come to realize the emptiness and vanity of the Worldly Order and how any contentment it might bring is elusive, laborious, comes at a heavy cost to one's self and others, and is tentative on a large number of factors which are difficult to control.

Then they may hear the Message of the Gospel, with Jesus saying,

> [28] "Come to Me, all who are weary and burdened, and I will give you rest. [29] Take My yoke upon you and learn from Me, for I am gentle and humble in heart, and you will find rest for your souls. [30] For My yoke is comfortable, and My burden is light."
> Matthew 11:28-30 (NASB)

It is at this time that their eyes of faith may be opened to see an alternate parallel paradigm in which finding satisfaction in the love of God and in pleasing Him becomes a real alternative to the hope of ever finding satisfaction from the grinding slavery under the principalities and powers of this World. In God's paradigm, one's progress becomes dependent upon one's consistent obedience to God's Word, prayer, and trusting Him moment by moment, rather than on the conditions, dictates, and market dynamics of the Worldly System. Upon choosing God and letting go of one's worldly attachments to embrace the Lord, a period of temptations, tests, and trials will ensue as one makes the treacherous leap from the Worldly paradigm to that of the Spiritual. But if one sticks with the Spirit by faith, then after this transformation has settled down, an eternal contentment, AKA peace with God, begins to soak deep into one's soul.

At this point, the requirements of faith involve staying free from the snares of Loop 1, pursuing one's God ordained Mission, maintaining agency, and developing one's agency to become moral in nature. Some find this too difficult (to let go of their sinful desires), too disappointing (to forsake their worldly ambitions), or too punishing (to endure the persecutions and temptations), and thus abandon the faith, defaulting to either the distractions and pleasures of Loop 1 or the entrancing enticements of Loop 2, depending on his constitution and state in life.

For those who can defy these temptations, the opposite risk that men face here is that if one finds Contentment too early or too easily in the transformation, then one is tempted to become lazy and thereby fail to follow through on working out the entirety of his faith domain. Complacency soon sets in, accompanied by an ever increasing number of casual sins of omission, and eventually the undercurrents of an uninspired and aimless life cause him to drift back into Loop 1. Thoughts of his eternal salvation having already been finished serve to refute and settle any objections arising in his conscience.

> So for one who knows the right thing to do and does not do it, for him it is sin.
> James 4:17 (NASB)

Loop 4 – Continual Godliness

Loop 4 has the most number of decisions and steps. It also has the most intensive labor for the Lord. It requires a man to pursue his God ordained Mission in life, and carry it to completion. It requires a man to Count the Cost and to deny or forsake his personal interests that do not serve his Mission, do not glorify Christ, and/or will lull him back into Loop 1 if not contained. It requires an active volition of the will to exercise discernment and moral agency — not just once or a few times, but on a continually ongoing, lifelong basis. It also requires a vigilant dedication to Christ in the face of suffering and temptation.

It is in this context that St. Paul says in regard to the eternal,

> Godliness with contentment is great gain.
> 1 Timothy 6:6 (ESV)

Escaping Complacency

Note that there is no “End” to the flowchart. This is because mortal Death is the end, and it is not our rightful place to choose.

As you can see, Loops 1, 2, and 3 lead back to Complacency. This is no coincidence, but is the Edenic curse on men that reflects the archetypal Sin of Adam. The curse is that men must continually work, perform, and produce, and there is always a constant temptation to slack off and slide into Complacency.

The typical way out of Complacency is to experience a negative motivator — discontent, or something akin to it, such as desperation, disappointment, grief, guilt, shame, etc. The spiritual purpose of this discontent, as was stated before, is to drive one to a response – to exercise agency and ascend to a higher loop. For this, we can be thankful when we experience discontentment and disappointment in life, as it is the lovingkindness of God goading us to become alive.

In certain cases, a positive motivator, such as desire, inspiration, vision, or sheer willpower may lead one out of complacency. In this case, the person’s recovery is determined by his ability to secure and maintain that catalyst. Since the dawn of time, marriage, regular sexual relations, and family have juxtaposed and harnessed men’s desire, inspiration, and vision to serve as a motivation to action and ambition. Modern feminism has effectively destroyed and/or shunted this vehicle for an increasing number of men. It is important for Christian men and women to keep marriage and sex confined within God’s Order such that it can motivate one and others to live for Christ, and not allow it to become a goal of Worldly contentment in which marriage is debased and desire dissipated. I will explore this aspect further in the next post.

It is my prayer that the psychological satisfaction the reader may find in reading this analysis would not lead him/her to Complacency, but rather, that it should inspire his/her awareness of the larger process of redemption and specifically what remains to be done towards the working out of his/her faith.

Expectations (for LTRs)

A man's expectations need to be fully in line with his Mission and Purpose.

Theme: Consolidating Masculinity
Length: 600 words
Reading Time: 3 minutes

Misguided Expectations (for LTRs)

One of the biggest problems in marriage today is that people have misplaced expectations. For men, it is expected that the wife should be a monogamous s1ut, SMV > 8, who stays thin and youthful in perpetuity. For women, the husband should be a 666 Tingletron who cooks gourmet dishes, does housework, and never shows any weakness.

Thus, the questions being asked by matrimonial hopefuls are misguided.

- "Do I Lurrve him/her?"
- "How does he/she make me FEEL?"
- "What is the SEX going to be like?"

Meanwhile, questions about household duties ("Who will do the dishes?"), finances, roles, and responsibilities never come up.

The attitudes and moods behind these questions are half-baked and naive. These expectations / questions do not stand up to the storms of life, and that is why there is so much discontent. Whenever the winds of change or the waves of doubt come upon them, these expectations are tested and discontentment strikes. Women have an especially particular difficulty in attaining contentment as Rollo has discussed at length (see links under Related). Some women even find a perverse form of power in discontentedness and will hold onto this attitude at all costs.

Having unrealistic expectations should not be confused with Laying out Expectations, which I wrote about before. If people took the effort to lay out their expectations, then they would eventually realize any unrealistic expectations in the mix, and come to a more realistic set of expectations. But this seldom comes up, because people do not lay out their expectations, and instead, they keep those questions pent up in their subconsciousness – similar to a Covert Contract.

When HIS expectation is to meet HER expectation!

The Current Challenge (for LTRs)

For a relatively brief time in Western history (the 20th century), one could get away with prioritizing love and sex and still expect a modicum of contentment, largely propped up by the widespread material abundance. But over time, this self-worshipping prerogative took its toll on society. The flames of unbridled passion burned up the MMP and it disintegrated into ashes shortly after the turn of the century.

Today, because of societal and legal restrictions, the only way for Men to find contentment is in knowing his Mission and Purpose and striving for it. As we have seen over the past 5 or 6 years, many men are finding it much easier to focus on their Mission and Purpose by going MGTOW, or by taking the Black Pill and then resurrecting their self-concept. Most of the men who do so have no other option. Fewer men are finding a woman worthy of being a wife, much less attracting her into his life.

But no matter whether a man is single or married, his MISSION is what will propel him forward, both in life, and with God. If a man is to marry, he'd better be damn sure his wife is fully on board with his Mission.

For a woman, the way to godly contentment is either (1) settling down with a man early in life (foregoing the carousel and before hitting the Wall) and applying herself to be his helper in that MISSION. Or, (2) staying in her father's household and helping her family in various ways. Other paths might bring a sense of contentment, but it won't be holy. Nor will it be everlasting, maybe only 10 years at best, followed by 40+ years of cats, wine, and slaving their lives away for the corporation.

For the married, contentment is found when both husband and wife share a common PURPOSE on a COMMON MISSION — to be fruitful and multiply — to do life TOGETHER. To raise a family TOGETHER. The attitude is, "It is US TOGETHER against whatever life throws at EITHER of us." And if you have been married for any length of time you will know — there will be lots of stuff life throws at you.

Failure (of LTRs)

Marriages fail when married couples lose their commonality of PURPOSE and turn against each other in various ways. This turning usually doesn't happen dramatically nor willfully, but rather through a gradual attrition of charity and congeniality that tends to occur under the duress of life. Most notably…

- Failing to conform to a Headship structure of authority.
- Failing to love or respect one another.
- Failing to remain humble and graceful.
- Failing to appreciate each other.
- Failing to respond to the other's accomplishments and bids for attention with enthusiasm.
- Denial of sex within marriage.
- Debasing marriage with illicit sex, before or after marriage.
- In sum, a failure to place God first.

As these habits become entrenched, that is when discontentment rears its feral head and will tear them apart.

SMP Paradigms Compared

In a previous post, The Path to Contentment (2023/1/18), I described two paradigms, described as the Worldly System and God's Order, and how we are to find Contentment by jumping from one Life Loop to another, and then to another. This post will compare and contrast these two paradigms as they pertain to the SMP/MMP.

The Worldly System from the Woman's Perspective

When a woman meets a man with Frame who is going SOMEWHERE in life she is ATTRACTED. That is the essence of why LAMPS etc. works. It shows a man with FRAME. It shows a man with something going on in his life. On a primal level, women want to mate and have children with such a man.

On a deeper level, she wants to be accepted, farts, warts, quirks, and all, and to become an integral and vital part of a man's life, to bask in his love and attention, to drink from his fountain of love, and to feed off of him in various ways. We often refer to these various aspects as Nesting and Validation.

Ultimately, what a woman needs, and what her soul is looking for is PURPOSE. But women seldom arrive at this conclusion until after they find LAMPS and Validation. So they go off pursuing LAMPS and Validation, only to become disappointed upon finding that these things are unfulfilling and cannot give her a PURPOSE. Only deep bonding and a shared Purpose can stand the test of time. This is one reason why many LTRs fail.

The modern response to this emptiness is for women to try finding that missing piece by being Strong and Independent™, Empowering Herself™, Finding Herself™, or following her dreams of having a leisurely lifestyle. These pursuits also prove to be elusive in terms of Contentment, so they double down, try harder, and continue on. Those women who MUST have a man will seek attention / validation from multiple men, or branch swing to find the next LAMPS guy, which we refer to as Hypergamy and Serial Polyandry.

To some extent, in ye olden days this was mitigated in the flesh when she had multiple children. The family and the children were a woman's Purpose. And women did not live very long after the children grew up.

But in today's sexually liberated world, having children is merely one box to check off on her Bucket List of things to do — when she's "ready", "sometime later" in life — and it is in no way prioritized. Meanwhile, she is on her way to do something (or someone) better, whatever (or whomever) that might be.

The Worldly System from the Man's Perspective

For most men, getting a WOMAN to perch on his bird is the mission. One in the bush is worth two in the hand (or more).

So we see a flock of peacocks trying to learn how to get her number, how to please her, how to game her… all in an effort to entice her to spread her wings over his nest.

He goes to the gym, works out, loses weight, gets muscle bulk and definition, and becomes the cock of the walk… all to impress a persnickety hypoagentic girl.

He works hard, goes to college, gets a corner office job with a high pay, all in the hope of being the suitor who is called onto the carpet by a whimsical girl to be her personal ATM.

After marriage, he comes home from work, cleans the house, cooks dinner, does the dishes, all in the hope of settling into bed with her fuzzy muzzle nestled snugly on his nozzle.

But no… "I'm not feeling it tonight, dear." She "needs to get up early", diarrhea, headache, leg cramps, menstruation, stomachache, stuffy nose, too cold, too tired, "the kids might hear us", or whatever other excuse she can hamster up to defer her marital duty and get away with defrauding him — once again.

He goes to the bathroom to rub one out, laying a curse on her under his breath, while she escapes her conscience by sawing logs.

It's all about the p_ssy.

Are you telling me this is a man's Mission in life?

That's not all.

Too many chads infecting the flock. Too many chickens down with the bird flu. Chicks are now laid up and out of service. Too many hens clucking the mantras. The egg market collapses. Competitors are squeezed out of the market. Consumers are charged exorbitant prices for rotten eggs.

Men give up and check out.

"Why work out if I can never impress a girl? Why work if no girl is going to marry me? Why do anything if I cannot get laid / get married?"

They think they're smart in going AWOL, but it's a Pyrrhic victory without fresh eggs to crack open each morning.

No Contentment here.

God's Order from the Woman's Perspective

A woman's PURPOSE is MAKING CHRIST KNOWN by helping her husband in HIS mission. It is MAKING CHRIST KNOWN to the children they have.

Thus, a woman's Mission is NOT attracting ATTENTION, hooking a MAN's DESIRE, or even being LOVED. It is NOT pursuing a CAREER, making MONEY, or chasing after TINGLES. It is NOT getting married and having children either. These are merely choices and powers that women may have at their disposal in accomplishing their Mission.

If a woman's PURPOSE is NOT aligned with God's Order, then exercising these powers will cause great DESTRUCTION to herself and to others. If a woman IS pursuing her God Ordained PURPOSE in her life, then these powers can become a great BLESSING to herself and others.

That POWER is in a woman's hands. If she uses it wisely, her husband and children will rise up and call her blessed. If she uses it carelessly or selfishly, she will be cursed and shamed as a hoe b!tch.

The purpose of sex and marriage is for marital bonding and sanctification, and to be fruitful and multiply. It is not for fun and games.

Once a man and woman are married, they enjoy the sexual relationship (physical intimacy) and romance (emotional intimacy) within the boundaries of the marriage. They seek to fulfill their duties and responsibilities in marriage and seek to always improve in these areas.

The Husband is the Wife's one and only sexual partner, her Head, provider, protector, and father to her children. The Wife is the Husband's affectionate and ready sexual partner, showing submissive respect to her protector and Head, a helper to his Mission, the keeper of the home in accordance to his provision, and being a wise and empathic mother to her children.

Together in marriage, a Husband and Wife display the Covenant relationship of CHRIST and the CHURCH to each other, to their children, to their church, to their community, and to the world at large.

Together, they are a living example of God's love on Earth, and together they make Christ known.

God's Order from the Man's Perspective

Man's Mission in life is NOT "Happy Wife, Happy Life!"

It is Happy King, Happy Kingdom!

And that King is Christ!

Thus, a man's Mission in life is to Know the King and establish His Kingdom on earth. As Jesus prayed, > Thy Kingdom come. Thy Will be done on earth, as it is in heaven.

> Matthew 6:10 (KJ21)

Ultimately, for a Christian man, the Purpose of his life is to Know Christ himself, and to MAKE CHRIST KNOWN to others.

Sex is a carnal need, and Marriage an earthly institution — which begs the question — Why is there no marriage in heaven? It is because the purpose of sex and marriage is to fulfill the Mission. In heaven, we'll have a different sort of mission in which marriage (as we know it) is not needed. My pastor believes there is no marriage in heaven because we'll all be married to Christ.

If a man's mission / purpose / vision isn't in place, then the husband and wife are focused on what each one wants out of life and the marriage. They are fighting against each other trying to secure their own needs and prerogatives, e.g., attention, ego fulfillment, love, material needs, respect, social relevance, $$$, sex, status, etc. When their energies are consumed in this way, they don't have the capability of navigating a ship, much less arriving at any particular destination.

But… if the mission / purpose / vision is right, then the husband and wife both know his / her place. When they know where the ship is going, then it is easier to be the Captain / First Mate / Crew — because then the journey becomes about the destination and what will get the job done and get them there, e.g. respect for hierarchy, boosting of morale (a good sexual relationship boosts morale), supporting and encouraging each other, watching each other's backs etc.)

The bottom line is that a Man needs to stay focused on his MISSION — to make Christ known in his sphere of influence. He does NOT NEED a woman to do that. In the Garden of Eden, Adam was alone for a while. Eve was NEVER alone. Men are much better able to handle being alone than women are, PROVIDED that they have a MISSION. But… a companion and helper makes the job easier.

The problem is that most men do not understand what it means to make Christ known, and much less, HOW they will do it — so this idea fails to resonate with men, even Christian men. As a result, they have a total lack of Frame. I'll continue this point in the next post.

A Response to GrifterShifter's Comments

Jack · 25 January 2023 · Archived copy · Original

Consolidating one's Masculinity requires a man to be responsive, knowledgeable, and get the facts straight.

Readership: All
Theme: Consolidating Masculinity
Length: 2,500 words
Reading Time: 14 minutes

The Rabble Rouser

GrifterShifter is a new commenter. She first appeared on 2023/1/20, criticizing Kevin Samuels as a grifter. Over the next few days, GS left a few comments under several posts, all having the same flavor of criticism. When she started commenting on the most recent posts, she brought up many inflammatory ideas (e.g. immigration, monasticism, tr@nsmaxxing, vaginismus, etc.) that were waaay off topic and effectively derailed the discussion. To top it off, her comments were disdainful towards Red Pill lore and took on a condescending tone towards men in general, especially Incels, MGTOW, et al.

I posed four questions to GS with the intention of eliciting a more solid and reasonable response out of her.

1. How is the secular monasticism you described any different from the Black Pill, MGTOW, or other similar men's movements?
2. How should vaginismus be addressed in order to set proper expectations for a LTR?
3. What do you think the church should be doing differently to help young people set proper expectations for sex and marriage?
4. Finally, how does all this relate to Consolidating Masculinity?

The majority of this post will review GS's flimsy responses to these questions and offer a better informed and more reasonable assessment, followed by a summary statement at the end.

Re: Secular Monasticism

GS wrote,

> "I think if monasteries were made attractive enough and provided real brotherhood, incels would gravitate to them. True, most aren't religious, but the religious ones would. The non-religious ones could join secular communes of brotherhood, which men should be building to help each other."

I'm not someone who would know much about this, but on its face value, what GS describes seems like it might be of interest to a number of younger men who are disappointed with what they're finding in life. However, I think it would be a hard sell to convince younger single men to come live in an all-male commune or on a farm and work for little more than basic sustenance and the experience of it all. As I stated in SMP Paradigms Compared, there needs to be a purpose, and in this case, it would have to be a shared purpose that would unite and motivate single men. GS played the violin on the necessity of "not being alone", but as Rowena pointed out, this is not a sufficiently motivating purpose.

The problem with this whole idea is that GS is trying to micromanage what she considers to be a problem with someone else, or a group of people in this case. Stuff them in a comfortable cage, saying, "Here you go. Problem solved. Now, BE HAPPY!" It would be like someone telling a group of lovelorn women, "Can't solve your problems with lurrve and finding a man who will commit? OK. Be a sugar baby, or go join a rich man's harem. You can F one day a month and have the leisurely lifestyle you desire while your benefactor is busy with 29 other women during the rest of the month. All expenses paid. Go post photos of your bedroom escapades and lavish lifestyle on FB, IG, and OnlyFans to get the attention you need. But if you don't put out, if you mouth off, or fail to produce an heir, you're back out on the street. Now shut up and BE HAPPY!"

The reason this doesn't work is because it removes agentic free will from the equation. This approach essentially excises Christ and imposes a worldly solution contrived by man (or a woman in this case). If one is to be assigned, coerced, or forced into doing something, then one cannot be forced to be happy in doing so. It violates the integrity of the soul. It is essentially an imposed anesthetic that will produce more ɦɘ11 than heaven. This is not to say that a monastic life is not the answer to some men's struggles, but it cannot be imposed. It has to happen organically and by the power of God.

LastMod was the first to recognize this as a dead end "solution". He took a step back and considered what might be GS's purpose in making this suggestion… ???

Re: On Becoming a Monk / Nun

GS wrote,

> "One of the great failures of Protestantism is the lack of a monastic option. As a Protestant, if I want to remain single to serve God exclusively my whole life, I will be looked at as a failure simply for not marrying. That goes for both women and men."

I agree that there is pressure on young people to marry and procreate, especially within the church. There always has been, especially from mothers and fathers who wish to see their family lines continued and to enjoy having grandchildren. From an evolutionary viewpoint, one is a failure if he/she does not procreate. From a moral standpoint, one is a failure if one is sexually active and refuses to procreate. This is the Catholic stance on sex in a nutshell. From a Christian viewpoint, it all depends on whether it is within God's purposes for one to be married and to procreate. If God calls them to do so, and they do not, then maybe those who know them best are correct in their assessment of them as a failure. Of course, only they themselves would know if God has truly called them to be married / have children or not. But if a person is sexually active, it's a good indication that they ought to be married.

Re: Men's Movements

GS wrote,

> "[The Black Pill / MGTOW] aren't movements. Nobody's moving. They are sitting online all day, every day."

This is a tangent from the main topic, but I should explain my reasoning. I would regard these sociological phenomena as a movement — not a social activist movement, which GS is probably thinking of, but a cultural movement — a fundamental shift in the life choices of a large number of men. MGTOW is currently estimated to be 10-26% of men. There are no demographic estimates available yet on the Black Pill, but I would guess it's in that same ballpark, with some overlap. There was no Black Pill nor MGTOW, nor men calling themselves such more than a decade ago. Now there are. I would call that a movement. That doesn't mean they aren't doing anything, as GS says. What GS means is that they aren't doing anything for the Feminine Imperative. In reality, it means they're doing their own thing and going their own way, just as the name implies.

Re: Vaginismus

In response to my second question about how vaginismus should be addressed, GS wrote a generic and unsatisfying answer.

> "Google it, research a bit, then seek treatment."

I am getting the impression that GS is someone who suffers from vaginismus. She's told us a lot of information about this — waaay off topic — but yet she has not given us any transferrable knowledge on the subject, probably because it would be humiliating. At some point, she'll need to start quoting solid research, or else establish herself as an expert on the subject (i.e. someone with first-hand experience), in order to gain any further traction with readers on this subject. (That is why deti et al. were asking for her age, sex, marital status, etc.)

Anyway, I did just as GS said. I Googled "vaginismus" and found some information. Then after doing some reading, I realized that she had probably never done what she was asking others to do — to Google it.

About vaginismus, GS wrote,

> "It's actually not that rare, just un talked about."

How rare is "rare"? Is below 5% rare?

> "The prevalence of vaginismus in the general population is 1-6%, and this ratio rises to between 5% and 17% in sexual dysfunction clinics (Konkan et al., 2012)." [1]

GS said that the problem is underreported and misdiagnosed. As a high water mark, can we assume that the prevalence in the general population is similar to what appears in sexual dysfunction clinics? Or can we say that every woman who defrauds her husband out of regular marital relations is suffering from vaginismus and they just don't know it? In that case, that's about 10-26%,* which is slightly higher than the frequency of those going to the sex clinics. At any rate, it offers a very clever excuse for women who apparently don't know what they're missing out on.

I also learned that it's aggravated by familial dysfunction.

> "The family structure in which the individual is raised is a significant factor for the development of several problems, including sexual dysfunctions. Repressive, frightening, threatening and extremely moral loveless parents, alcoholic father, serious arguments that can even lead to violence, and extremely protective merciful parents are common in women with vaginismus…" [1]

Poor relationship with her father; Not experiencing God through her parent's marriage — More stuff we've covered here before.

According to the research paper [1], the success rate for women undergoing treatment for vaginismus (using Cognitive Behavioral Therapy and vaginal penetration exercises) was 63.8%. Success largely depends on the woman's willingness to undergo treatment, practice CBT, and do the penetration exercises as a habit.

Patients who were reluctant to perform the vaginal penetration exercises had a lower rate of recovery. The researchers noted that it was common for these patients to perceive vaginal penetration as a "violation" of their bodies.

> "In conclusion, patients with vaginismus are aware of their condition and treatment is possible if they want. There is no difference between treatment methods in terms of success rates. However, the patients are more resistant to treatment if they have a history of vaginismus in their relatives or in the presence of a partner who say it is his or her fault."

Note the last part of the last sentence. Translation: Self-consciousness aggravates vaginismus. IOW, a lack of self-confidence and trust, which we already know will put the brakes on the beaver.

GS wrote,

> "…if she's young, healthy, hormones are balanced and has at least a moderate libido, and has a healthy sexual self-esteem (despite anti-sex Church indoctrination), if she does not show interest in sex I would question my bedroom skills as a husband."

That's not what the medical literature says. Granted, there's not much research on this, but the paper I cited above [1] suggests that the biggest issue with vaginismus and the treatment thereof is more or less psychological – a cold family upbringing coupled with a fear of vaginal penetration and seeing it as a violation of the body. To this, I would add, that "violation of the body" is the defiling and humbling aspect of sex (for a woman) which is what makes marital sex validational and contributes to sanctification. IOW, women with vaginismus are women who have a psychological block and don't want to be defiled and humbled in the bedroom. The reasons for this might vary from one woman to the next, but we can all take a guess as to why… Insufficient Tingulation. (Deti is always right, dadgummit!)

 It is interesting to note that the percentage of women with vaginismus is exactly the same percentage of MGTOWs. Coincidence?*

Re: Faulty sex education within the church

GS repetitively mentioned the failure of the church to educate young people about sex and marriage. This is a topic that is covered rather frequently here. I and most readers here would agree that the church has dropped the ball concerning Christian education about sex and marriage. There are many problems in changing this, including…

1. Not having anything better to teach.
2. Current leadership is not willing to teach or even rejects what we've already identified as being beneficial.
3. Things that are beneficial are difficult, embarassing, or unpalatable to women, and church leaders will not address these issues because the majority of churchgoers are women.
4. Building the momentum of a "new and improved" social environment that is free from the corrupting spoils of feminism.
5. Cultural indoctrination has hypnotized and blinded the majority of young people, including those in the church. As a result, they are not "hungry" enough to seek out anything better.

On this problem, GS did not offer any suggestions other than monasticism.

Re: Expectations for LTRs

GS wrote,

> ”Satisfying sex is an expectation people have for marriage. Sexual expression is very closely tied to masculinity and femininity. If our bodies (or anything else) prevent us from fully expressing ourselves sexually in our marriage, it will prevent us from “consolidating” our masculinity or femininity.”

GS should have stated this at the beginning of her first comment about vaginismus, and she would have received a much warmer response. But again, she hasn't offered any transferrable knowledge here. The larger issue with her comment is that she is assuming that masculinity / femininity is dependent on one's sexual function. I suppose to a small degree it is, especially for the married, but it is a mistake to make this blanket assumption because it would imply that all Black Pillers, incels, and MGTOWs are excluded from ever being masculine. Men deserve more respect than this.

Final Statements

Stuff like this makes me certain that GS is a female, because this sounds just like a woman's viewpoint — light on facts, heavy on Feeelz, half-baked logical assumptions, and always leaning towards the Feminine Imperative.

GS left 10 additional comments that I did not “approve” for posting, mainly because they were excusing women's sexual sin, misinformed, petulant, solipsistic, dancing from topic to topic, and disrespectful to men in general. I grew tired of the tiddlywinks and decided that GS had had sufficient air time to make her position and disposition clear. Interestingly, not more than 10 minutes after I decided to stop approving her comments, not one but two other women popped in to resume the fray!

Coincidence?

Teenage girls talking while standing in hallway at university.

Afterwards, I reflected on all this fracas and realized something deep. The past two posts were encouraging men to find their Mission and Purpose in life through knowing God. And riiight on cue, some stranger shows up to pose a messy distraction from the Message.

Coincidence?

I'm proud of the many commenters who were able to quickly and accurately size up GS. Of note, Deti and Rowena left excellent responses to GS's hamsterbations.

I need to apologize to the regular readers. I often state that men should not admit women's arguments, but that's essentially what I/we did here. And look at the mess of confusion it has resulted in! Granted, it was not clear that GS was a woman in the beginning, but as soon as this was apparent, I should have nipped GS's comments in the bud and kept the focus on the recent topics. But… I was on vacation, I didn't have a computer, I didn't have the proper mindset, and I wasn't in the mood to deal with it. I usually view life as an adventure and a continual discovery, but this is one of those times when urgent action was necessary and should have been taken. Because of my inaction, I've had to do more work to address all the issues that have come up and settle the confusion, and I can only wonder about how much my laxity has allowed attention to be drawn away from the main message of men finding their Mission and Purpose in Christ.

OTOH, maybe THIS IS the larger takeaway for us. Perhaps taking action in a timely manner is one of the most important lessons we can learn about Consolidating Masculinity.

What do Women want?

Western society, and even the church as well, has fallen victim to centering all discussion on sex, marriage, and intersexual relations around these questions,

1. "What does a WOMAN WANT?"
2. "How are men best to give her that?"

The answer to the first question is simple, and I'll sum it up for the green reader. What a woman WANTS is to FEEL GOOD. Consequently, she will pursue and explore anything that gives her pleasure and/or ease. For women, the typical vectors of the Feeelz are…

1. Adventures, partying, traveling, etc.
2. Attracting attention, usually by creating drama, social media, wearing revealing clothing, etc.
3. Emoting, and eliciting emotion from others, including men.
4. Catharsis, entertainment, media, etc,
5. Fantasy, solipsism, gnosticism, etc.
6. Friendships
7. Garnering social proof, getting positive feedback, compliments, flattery, etc.
8. Losing self-control
9. Masturbating
10. Physical activities, sports, jogging, etc.
11. Playing sociopsychological games with people, especially men and men's emotions
12. Pretty lies
13. Sex with high SMV men
14. Seeking Validation from men
15. Self care, manicures, massages, etc.
16. Shopping, spending $$$
17. Socializing, talking, gossiping, etc.

Women solipsistically regard their pursuit of Funz and the Feeelz as harmless, but men are more aware of the defilement, destruction, extravagance, inefficiency, and waste that accompanies certain activities.

Husband cutting credit card in half in order to curb wife's spending sprees.

The second question presupposes that men's entire purpose in life is to enable and support women's pursuit of Funz and the Feeelz, and therefore poses an unwarranted demand on men. Most men fall for this ruse, become self-conscious, and worry about whether their performance is "good enough" for a particular woman of interest. Meanwhile, women sit back and watch to see which men will either do their bidding (or knock themselves out trying), or else prove their Alpha-ness by seeing through the faux demands imposed on them.

The former men (i.e. beta orbiters) are for attention, entertainment, and to be used as draftstock. The latter men, which are a tiny minority, are singled out for relationships and sex.

The former men who overtly disagree with playing this role are typically branded as "toxic". This could not be any further from the truth. The latter men are often the men who are truly toxic, but because they play a key role as a focal point of the Feminine Imperative, women refuse to see them as such.

What do Men want?

Over the last decade or so, there has been a growing backlash to the societal assumption that men have little value other than to be the servants and slaves of women's whims. Hence, the rise of the Manosphere, the Red Pill, MGTOW, and various MRA movements. Men have begun asking these question for themselves.

1. "What does a MAN WANT?"
2. "How are men best to go about getting what they want?"

The Manosphere focuses on what a MAN WANTS, and to sum it all up, in the secular sphere it comes down to fornication with multiple women, and in the Christian sphere it is visceral sex in marriage. As Thedeti often says, "It's all about the p_ssy!"

What does God want?

What BOTH MEN AND WOMEN NEED is an identification with Christ that brings them into a proper relationship with God, and a PURPOSE for living that flows from that.

In absence of being identified with Christ and having a Purpose and Mission that flows out of that, AND in ABSENCE of societal restrictions, Hypergamy will rule over Wimminz FLESHLY nature, and P_ssy will rule over Men's. That is exactly what we see in society and all around the world. Men and Women are Fleshly minded, and all their feral unrestricted behaviors reflect that propensity.

In the absence of a larger shared Purpose, relationships will degenerate into a Pygmalion Project in which each person is trying to get the other to "change" in order to better fulfill their wants and needs. A Christian relationship reaches maturity when both partners are focused on their Mission and Purpose, and are in the habit of fulfilling their respective roles and responsibilities to each other, rather than on fulfilling their own unresolved desires.

This month, I've talked a lot about a man's MISSION. Just to be clear, the MISSION is NOT to give women what they want. It is NOT to bed the hottest girl. It is NOT sequestering a woman for marriage. A man's MISSION in life is not even a career. Although for some men, a career and/or marriage could be vehicles for his MISSION.

Glorifying God and making Christ known is THE MISSION. This is the essence of God's purpose for Mankind, and it is same for women too.

Christian Men and Women won't be successful in love, marriage, rearing a family, unless they recognize how it all relates to God's purposes for us. The PURPOSE of CHRISTIAN marriage is to emulate God's love for Mankind and glorify Him. In this context, success in marriage FLOWS from a combined sense of PURPOSE.

Men's Inherent Gynocentrism

It has often been said that "Women are the gatekeepers of sex." It would be better for us to regard the phenomenon behind this axiom with a little more self-awareness. Sex and sexual reproduction are areas within a woman's domain of authority and sphere of influence. Likewise, commitment, husbandry (and all that involves), and making things happen are areas within a man's domain of authority and sphere of influence. Thus, when men are obsessed with poon and desperately looking for a handjob, they are thinking like a woman and they naturally fall under women's domain of authority. It is an inversion of the Christ : Church :: Husband : Wife structure. Therefore, "Women are the gatekeepers of sex" is only true for men who want through the gate, but can't get in. It is a frustration to be expected of the idolatry that it is.

The previous post, How to Assume the Missionary Position, posed the question, Are you on a mission for God, or for Gynocentrism? To aid the reader in answering this question for himself, I laid out the differences between Men's, Women's, and God's prerogatives. In conclusion, Men need to get their heads out of the gynogutter when thinking about how to assume the Missionary Position. I'll admit, this can pose a formidable and continual challenge for some men, especially younger men.

Women keep Men preoccupied by posting sultry selfies.
In addition to this, Men also need to stop prioritizing and being concerned about women's opinions and reactions. This is just as important as purging poon from the prefrontal cortex, and perhaps just as difficult.

One reader wrote to me privately, saying,

> "It is my observation that whatever topic is covered here at Σ Frame or elsewhere around the 'sphere, the discussion in the comments ALWAYS ends up with some variation of…

- "How will women respond to this?"
- Anger and frustration that women do not respond properly or as desired.

> "As deti pointed out recently, any topic about Men's self-development, or his MISSION, or HIS finding CONTENTMENT should have ZERO comments about women and their nature."

Yes! Men are in the habit of looking for affirmation and feedback FROM Women. Instead, Men need to start giving constructive moral feedback TO Women and placing demands on them. Men need to STOP looking for wimminz approval. Wimminz are NOT godz. 99.999% of women will only distract you, waste your time, and lead you away from God and the truth. Men need to FIX their eyes on Jesus, NOT dat plump back end. Men need to LOOK to God, NOT camel toes and cleavage. Men need to learn what pleases the LORD, NOT how to curry favor with the walking wombs. We need to wean ourselves off the teat. This is a habit Christian Men absolutely MUST DO!

As long as a man is beating around the bush, FOOLISHNESS and SIMPDOM will be his default settings.

Unfortunately for everyone, for the past few decades, churchianity has taught Men to place Women's wants and needs first, and to adulate the V (which is idolatry). It has taught young men to place women on a pedestal. It has taught fathers to make their daughters into educated harlots and liberated sex symbols.

In addition to this, or rather as a result of this, the average Christian man is not intuitively FOLLOW-able, partly because this image has not been presented as a Godly archetype. Thus, it is no wonder that Christianity is flailing and failing as a catalyst for forming Godly marriages.

Women are Followers

Instead of thinking that "Women are the gatekeepers of sex", a more Christian approach would be to recognize that Women submit to their Head, whether it be the big head, the little head, the head of the herd, the head of the house, or the Godhead.

But one thing remains. Men can lead and pursue his own Mission and Purpose, but Men cannot choose which women will accept / choose his Headship and Follow along with him. This is essentially why the Meet Cute dynamic, as a selection model, is wholly dependent on the woman's interest in the man.

As we can observe from women's attraction to Chads, a man doesn't even need to have a strong faith to have authority over a woman. A woman will follow a man as long as he is confident and he is going SOMEWHERE in life. You see, women's attraction to Alphas / bad boys / Chads can be boiled down to one simple fact — He is NOT following her. He is NOT ogling her. He is NOT Googling her. He doesn't give a flying flip about her demands. A woman is attracted to a man who is NOT following her but who expects her to follow him. In this sense, Pagan Chad is actually conforming to the Christ : Church :: Husband : Wife structure! (Not necessarily because of his inherent qualities of leadership or sense of Purpose, but primarily because women desire to submit to Chad's sexual authority — because it Feeelz gooed and satiates their fleshly desires.)

But if a man is constantly obsessed with peter poking poon, then his idol is the V and his confidence goes down the Rube Tube. HE is FOLLOWING after the inverted structure and the Worldly System, and thus, he has to Compete therein. If he is always LOOKING BACKWARDS to see if a girl is following Him, then in essence, he is not making much if any progress going forward. Both of these stances are CONFUSING to women. It is like a dog chasing its tail and licking its @ss. The @ss stinks, and at some point the tail gives up and wags off.

Women's inborn propensity to FOLLOW is a necessary part of the equation. Without it, a woman is reduced to being a Brassy, Independent, "I don't need no man", Boss B!tch. Her FOLLOWING is not unnatural nor is it wrong. But it becomes a disaster when women follow after their fleshly desires without any consideration of the consequences, and/or when they follow men who have ungodly purposes and follow them into sin.

The Proper Mindset for Men

The interesting paradox here is that if a man is not a top SMV looker who can compete well within the Worldly System, then Looking to God and His interests offers the BEST chance for a man to get a woman to follow him.

For a Christian man, his focus should be,

- "This is my domain of authority."
- "This is my sphere of influence."
- "These are my talents and gifts."
- "These are my skills."
- "This is what I am working on."

When a man meets a girl, his focus should be,

- "Does she identify herself as being subject to my domain of authority?" OR does she identify me as being an expendable pawn under her authority?
- "Is she a suitable helper to me in my Mission?" OR is she chasing after any of the various Worldly Life Scripts?
- "Does she make an active effort to help me in my Mission?" OR is she only thinking of what she can get out of me?
- "Is she humble and teachable?" OR is she a hasty haughty hamster hoe?
- "Does our relationship glorify God?" OR is it one dramatic and embarassing Sh!t Test after another?
- "Does she respect me and give me IOIs?" OR is she giving out IOCs and treating me like a little boy?

Men do not need to know the specifics of their Mission in life, but they must have a general idea of what it IS and what it is NOT, then COMMUNICATE these things to her and see if she is on board with that. The vetting is to see if she will be a suitable helper and whether she can actually fall into that role. As deti pointed out, she needs to be ready for this NOW. If she is NOT, then she will try to make herself and her own issues, prerogatives, and problems into the Mission. If she is NOT ready, he moves on. If he doesn't for any reason related to her, then he is regressing from his Mission and Purpose.

The Correct Way

1. Man follows God and pursues his Mission and Purpose in life.
2. A Woman notices and places herself within his domain of authority.

3. The Man COMMUNICATES to the woman HOW he is following God.
4. The man and woman discover a SHARED PURPOSE.
5. The girl either helps him — in which case they get married — or she is a headache — and he moves on — alone if need be.
6. After marriage, the Wife follows God by following her Husband and helping him in that journey. Any extra job / ministry on her side is done under the authority of her husband who must clearly evaluate if such job / ministry does not reduce his authority; brings glory to Christ AND does not impede her duties / responsibilities as wife / mother.
7. Children follow BOTH (with Father being Head and God being ULTIMATE AUTHORITY)

If there is one thing Christian men need to remember, it is that being PURPOSE ORIENTED is a powerful force that will elevate his faith and carry him towards the culmination of his true LIFE PURPOSE. Even if a man hasn't yet figured out what his specific PURPOSE is in life, if he adopts the internal habit of being PURPOSE oriented in all his thinkings, actions, and dealings with others, then this one thing alone can totally transform how he is seen by others, including and especially women.

This kind of attitude matches what I've described in the past as determination and detachment. From outside appearances, following Christ appears to be more or less the same thing as the secular concept of detachment, except for Christian men, this follows from being focused on God and his ordained MISSION and PURPOSE. The secular man is detached because he's spinning several plates on his pole, or else he doesn't really care. The Christian man is detached because he is focused on multitasking God's work, and is NOT enthralled by poon nor the things of this world.

Remember, ultimately, for a Christian man, his Mission and Purpose is to MAKE CHRIST KNOWN.

Are Men Responsible for Women's Behavior?

Sorting out the duties and responsiblities from the lies.

Readership: All
Theme: The Snares of Sin
Length: 850 words
Reading Time: 4.5 minutes

Men Must be Follow-able

The sexual Alpha is one who snags tail and then moves on to bed another girl. The Christian Alpha (if you will) is the man who is focused on his Mission.

Problem 1 — Woman follows a man with a wrong purpose –> Sex with Alpha Chad, gets stuffed, Alpha Widowed, jaded, and hung out to dry as a psychotic spinster with wine and cats for the last 50 years of her life.

Problem 2 — Man following woman –> the Beta Orbiters

Problem 3 — Man following his own purpose; leaves woman alone –> MGTOW.

Problem 4 — Woman following God (supposedly), and Man is her helper / encourager. (I suspect most women in church ministry do this.)

In all of the above scenarios, Alpha Chad is the only man who is followable. All the others are of a man's lack of followability.

In terms of Men's responsibilities, we have…

Problem 1 — Alpha Chad would show responsibility if he only F-ed a woman he is willing to marry and refused all others. He also needs to have a larger purpose — something other than making s1uts and Alpha Widows.

Problem 2 — Beta Orbiters would be more responsible by recognizing which women are within his sphere of influence, stop wasting his time, attention, money, and emotional energies on insecure chicks who are only using him. Instead, he should focus his efforts on bringing one girl under his domain of authority.

Problem 3 — The responsibilities of the MGTOW are to make something of himself outside of sex, marriage, and family, while not falling prey to discouragement and depression, and to follow his mission in life.

Problem 4 — Similar to Problem 2, except these men are probably already married. In this case, his responsibilities are to reorient himself around his mission, maintain frame, set expectations, and establish boundaries.

What is a Man's Role in the Mess?

As I described in the last post, Women, being the followers that they are, are more attuned to following a man who is intuitively follow-able, and are less interested in his Purpose. And as I described in the previous post, they are focused on the Feeelz! NOW! They don't look too far beyond that to assess where it will all lead to a decade down the road. This is no less true for Christian women. Therefore, as we learned from our discussion of Women's Agency, Christian women have to be TAUGHT HOW to CHOOSE walking in the Spirit over what their Flesh demands. They need to be taught how to identify and follow a Christian man with a right Purpose.

This has to be taught to them, beginning at an early age. Eight years old is too late. Puberty is waaay too late. Women will learn easier and better the younger they begin. So this responsibility falls on Fathers. Even so, many women will not follow, or when temptation strikes, they will fall away. But to the extent women can learn and practice walking in the Spirit, they will be sanctified. And whether they learn and follow or not, God will judge them accordingly.

What should be the Standard for Vetting?

Deti and Oscar were arguing about whether a man should only accept a girl who is ready-to-go (deti's view), or is her showing promising potential good enough (Oscar's view)?

Well, from our study of Women's Agency, we learned that Women only become agentic under the tutelage of a man. So if we are looking for a woman who is a ready-to-go helper, then she would've had to have learned this from her father.

So, part of the vetting equation is (1) her relationship with her father, and another part is (2) her relationship with the man. Is she willing to invest herself in him? Another part, which I think Oscar is alluding to, is (3) whether she has the inherent character of a Proverbs 31 woman who will actually follow through on what she has learned from her father, and applies that towards serving her husband and household. We can readily observe the first two, and I think this is what deti is getting at. Concerning the last one, only time can tell, as Oscar pointed out. But if we can assume a trajectory, then the chances of (3) are astronomically higher if (1) and (2) are already in place.

More evidence that a woman's relationship with her father means everything.

Moreover, it cannot be understated that fathers play a key role in the formation of marriage-worthy daughters.

What are Single Marriage-Minded Men to do?

Obviously, Christian men cannot be expected to wait around for fathers to mold their daughters into being good wives for them. But OTOH, it is problematic and perhaps a mistake for men to try to take responsibility for a father's failure to mold his daughter into such. The common wisdom around the Manosphere is that it is unwise for a man to be Captain-Save-a-h0e, and as Red Pill Apostle stated, Very few women can be Molded. (2022/10/27). Taking such a responsibility would require a man to make a big commitment to a woman who may not feel compelled to follow after him. Meanwhile, she is creating discord with all her solipsistic shenanigans. If so, then taking responsibility would become a snare and perhaps lead to catastrophe and sin.

So what responsibility do these men have in this respect?

The Lie of Romantic Love

How should a man show love to a woman?

Readership: All
Theme: The Snares of Sin
Length: 1,850 words

Rules to Rule By

In response to the question, "What responsibilities do single, marriage minded Christian men have with respect to women in the present SMP/MMP?", Deti wrote,

> "Come with rock-solid frame. Be on task and on mission at all times. Brook no dissent about the frame and no interference with the mission. Look for women who show clear, obvious, unmistakable signs of sexual attraction. Such women are invited to step into his frame and get on board with the mission. The minute she flips any attitude at him about anything, she is sternly corrected, once. If it happens again, he shows her the door.
> Most of the time this won't work. Increasing numbers of men will have to accept being alone and celibate for life.
> I personally made every one of these mistakes. I personally did everything wrong."

The ironic and sad thing is that deti, like myself and many other older readers here, thought we were doing everything "right" at the time.

Rules to Love By

You see, according to the supposed "wisdom" that was prevalently taught to our older readers back in the 1980s and 1990s, men were given a playbook of Rules to Love By. The rules were legion and supposedly Christian in nature. The general gist of these rules could be summarized as follows.

- "Good" Men should be "nice" to women.
- "Good" Women are attracted to "nice" men.
- Men believed that Women were kindhearted, loving, and romantic by nature.
- Chivalry and preening consideration for women's wants and needs was the polite norm.
- Female hypoagenticity was presumed and fully acceptable.
- Male hyperagenticity was proof of a man's love and care for a woman.
- The Feminine Mystique — Woman were seen to be mysterious and of a higher spiritual conscientiousness.
- Men should maintain a positive attitude towards women and dating, even when nothing was going right.
- Men were to presume that women had positive motivations, even when there wasn't any evidence of such.
- Men were to gracefully assume that women were caught in difficult or unjust circumstances whenever they displayed bad behavior.
- Men were expected to "respect women", which basically meant to tiptoe around her Feeelz. (This is different from men's understanding of respect and was often misunderstood and misapplied.)

Nowadays, we laugh at these Rules to Love By, because we know it runs the Tingle-o-meter into the red, and shoos chicks away and onto the dirty d!ck faster than a simp can croon or a cuck can cry.

But for a long while after the sexual apocalypse, these Rules to Love By remained solidly in place for men while women explored the spanking fresh world of sexual liberation. Meanwhile, in a concerted effort to prop up the feminine AF/BB strategy, women did a fine job of keeping the majority of men in the dark about all the slither-slather. If a man ever discovered that the Rules to Love By didn't actually lead to lifelong love and marital bliss, he was told, "She's bad / broken / etc. She's not the one for you. You'll find someone better. Just wait…" Meanwhile, all the Becky's, Karen's, and Stacy's were getting their tickle kicks with Chads on the regular and the AF/BB strategy steamrolled through another generation, or two. It wasn't until very recently that all the Becky's, Karen's, and Stacy's transmogrified into a generation of Ms. Havisham's, and the men began to wake up and smell the overdue sardines, thanks largely to the Red Pill going mainstream.

Ye Olde Lie was Once True

In some respects, the older generations (Greatests, Silents, and early Boomers) were probably not lying to us in teaching these things. Several decades ago (early half of the 20th century and continuing longer in Christian circles) this approach probably worked. A man who acted in this manner was distinguishing himself as one who would be a fine, loyal, and caring husband. Marriage minded women could then pick these men out from the crowd and move forward towards marriage. But after the sexual apocalypse, this became a recipe for disaster. "Nice" men who were clueless about the shifts in the SMP and continued to act in this manner clearly distinguished themselves as men who were explicitly marriage minded, just as before, but now this meant something completely different. It meant they could not compete with Alpha Chad in the back seat of a Buick. Thus, such men summarily rejected themselves from the gene pool.

Reexamining Ye Olde Lie

After writing a post on detachment, Ash Pariseau at Dames That Know came out to rebuild the old narrative that it is Women who are the romantics, NOT Men. She writes,

> "I decided to poll my audience.

> Ladies, when was the moment you realized that he really did love you?
> Turns out, there are many ways a man tells a woman "I love you." Here are some of my favorite responses:

My first question is "What does she mean by love?" Does she mean the woman came to trust the man, she felt humbled, and she felt loved, or does she mean that the woman realized that he was putty in her paws? Perhaps both to varying degrees, depending on the man and woman in question.

We can't really know the answer to this question, but judging by the several behaviors she lists of men, we see that they could all fall into one of two categories: 1) He's desperate for sex, or 2) he's simping.

> "When he put my feelings first."
> "I was complaining about being alone and he drove out to make me feel better, about 45 minutes round trip, he had to be at work in the morning…"
> "When he stuck around. … he didn't push and unlike the other guys who'd move on, he stuck around."
> "He was always there, and he didn't leave."
> "When he traveled 61 km riding a motorcycle just to see me and went back home the next day."
>
> "When he waited hours for me outside my school and walked home with me EVERY SINGLE DAY."
> When he only [had] a dollar in his pocket and spent it to buy me food because I didn't [eat anything]."
> "I never asked for any of that from him. He did it willingly. Then I realized he truly loves me. No other man can do it for me if they don't love me as much."
> "Alex asked me how I was doing and I said I was fine just a little cold and after I said that he took off his jacket and gave it to me and that's when I realized I wasn't just crushing on him I was in love with him."
> "He stayed through my depression when I couldn't even recognize myself."
> "He told me that just being in my presence made him feel at home."
>
> "The fact he respected my boundaries, didn't pressure me into anything, and asked me if I was comfortable before he touched me. (That was when I knew that he really cared about me.)
> "The look he gives me when I touch his face or simply laughing. That is a look of someone that is in love."
> Dames that Know: A good man is not that hard to find (2023/1/30)

Only one behavior shows masculine dominance.

> "When he started using the word "we" often and referred to future plans as if it was a given."

In general, Beta Orbiting and Chivalry appears obvious here, and we would classify all these behaviors as such. But we cannot overlook Ash's main point – that these behaviors made the woman feel loved – without first examining its validity. So let's hash out the differences between the authentic love that a man should have for a woman and him being putty in the pussycat's claws.

The Deception

First of all, the key aspect that is left unsaid or only slightly hinted is that "she already thought he was hot." This should be remembered going forward.

The deceptive aspect of this approach towards women is that some of these behaviors, (e.g. assuming women are caught in unjust circumstances whenever they display bad behavior, being emotionally authentic, kindness, presuming positive motivations where there isn't any, etc.) are actually ways that men can truly love women, just as we are instructed to do in Ephesians 5:25-33.

As Alain de Botton said,

> "The essential habit of loving others is to have the willingness to interpret unappealing behaviors from others in order to find more benevolent reasons why such behaviors may be unfolding. In other words, to love someone is to interpret their words and behaviors with good will, charity, generosity, and understanding. So love is not just admiration for strength, it is also tolerance of weakness and a recognition of their ambivalences. But we avoid this habit because it is difficult and risky."

The sticking point is that such a display of a man's love towards a woman is seldom returned in good faith. Women only display de Botton's description of love towards Tingletron Chads whom they are in ~~bed~~ love with. Men do not avoid this habit nearly as much as women do, partly because men are the true idealists and romanticists by nature, and when left unchecked, this is the biggest problem with cucks, simps, White Knights, et al. — hyperagentically offering women so much unconditional love that it has the overall effect of spoiling them in a state of hypoagenticity, rather than bringing about the intended effect of making them feel loved and secure, and thus motivating them to grow into maturity.

Another point of deception is that Ephesians 5:25-33 ONLY applies to husbands loving their WIVES. Now, to some extent, if a man is hoping to make a certain woman his wife, he would venture to treat her as such long before it becomes a thing. The idea is that doing so may attract a woman in his sphere of influence to come under his domain of authority. But it is a mistake for men to treat ALL women this way as a general habit. This treatment should be reserved for those women who fall under a man's domain of authority (i.e. wife, daughters, and family members).

The last point of deception that I'll cover here is that men should NOT extend unconditional love to women as a general habit, in spite of how she might or might not respond. Men should remember that the purpose of love is to exemplify Christ, and to grant grace and honor to the weaker vessel. It is NOT to pretend that the woman is NOT the weaker vessel in order to let her maintain false pretenses, run roughshod over his life, and make a mess of everything. Having such a boundary is the difference between a man showing Christian love for his wife and an inverted structure of authority. Men should watch this boundary closely and guard it strongly.

Closing Statements

So we see that what is "right" these days is a long forlorn yelp from what was "right" over half a century ago. I sincerely hope that the Red Pill and all we discuss here will be used to give young men a better compass for how to do things "right".

Looking forward into the future, I can't help but wonder how long our current revised assessment of what is "right" will continue to work.

Discerning the Lies

Jack shared this video as an example of a speech containing calm clear reasoning.

Thinking Ape: The Price of the Lie (2015/1/17)

I agree that the calm intonation and collected delivery is hypnotizingly entrancing and rather convincing in itself. However, the subject of this video talk struck me as being significant for some reason, and so I listened to it several times to understand why. This talk is interesting and a little hard to follow because this sort of mystical ontology is rare and unique in the West, which has emphasized rational thought above intuition ever since the Enlightenment. Finally, I got a complete idea of what he is describing.

He recognizes that this whole world is rife with lies. Small lies, big lies, white lies, black lies, grey lies, damn lies, lies of identity, lies of intentions, lies of interpretation, lies of meaning, lies of purpose, systemic lies, and so on… And yes, people are quite comfortable with this. They even prefer it. They'll get ruffled if a lie is not properly presented or parroted. They'll freeze over once they discover that you're not in on the lie. They'll go on the warpath if a lie is exposed for what it is.

The whole crux of the video is about the difficulties involved with stepping outside the "matrix", for rejecting the lie, and that there is a cost of doing so, or a "price" as he puts it. He mentions specific aspects of suffering, such as being alone, having no one you can trust, no one to rely on, no one to catch you at a moment of weakness, and so on, as being the "price" one pays for being a man going his own way.

He thinks the quandary he is describing is MGTOW, and it probably is, from a worldly perspective. But from an intellectual standpoint, I think he is more in tune with what a Christian is than most nominal Christians are.

He describes the inner travail of Men Going Their Own Way, or at least, that of his own. He describes how MGTOW requires one to live a precarious life of loneliness and separation from the World, and for some, Hopelessness. This is very much like the Christian perspective, except that for a Christian, Christ fills those aspects of suffering that he describes. Christ is our hope.

The overriding expression of his talk is about the inner odyssey of being a searching soul, about not buying into the lie and following the truth, despite the "price" one must pay. It is going against the culture while disengaging from it. For example, at about 22:25, he says MGTOW is about being in it but somehow not being a part of it. This is identical to how Jesus described believers.

> If you were of the world, the world would love you as its own; but because you are not of the world, but I chose you out of the world, therefore the world hates you.
> John 15:19 (ESV), also see John 17:16.

A Christian is IN the world but not a part of it. He does not buy into the lie. A Christian has a mission that inevitably wages war against the lies of the World. He is following truth. Again, I think this man has a better understanding of truth than most cultural / churchian / run-of-the-mill Christians do.

Now, he never describes exactly what truth is, other than seeing through the lies and seeing human nature for what it is. Judging by his general assumptions, I would guess his concept of truth is recognizable to himself, but not very clearly visible. For a Christian — TRUTH is a Person — the Person of Jesus Christ — the Man who said,

> I am the Way, the TRUTH, and the life…
> John 14:6 (KJV)

Truth is not found in having a woman, sex, status, success, nor any of the trappings of the Worldly System. He has figured that part out. What he hasn't figured out is that Truth cannot be apprehended through "happiness", obtaining the fulfillment of one's desires, nor even having a healthy family (although the latter can offer some clues). The missing link he is looking for is Christ.

In summary, a philosophy like that described by Thinking Ape is regarded as Black Pilled or MGTOW. But I think he is closer to finding Christ than others who think they have already found Christ but are not so mystically attuned and therefore do not understand the implications of that.

Aquatic Life on Planet Tumblr

> "Cum with me, and I will make you fishers of men!"
> Satan misquoting Jesus Christ to the life forms on Planet Tumblr (c.f. Matthew 4:19)

Planet Tumblr is an aquatic world filled with desires, feelings, impressions, and moods.

The fish, as well as crustaceans, nematodes, parasites, and other invertebrate species therein, feed on the biosystem and on each other. The interdynamic feedback loop, and the fact that the fish remain submerged in the waters at all times, leads to an all-consuming obsession with life within the system. The bigger fish need constant uninterrupted bathing in the stream of attention, and because they are big fish, the waters of attention repeatedly flow through the gills of their ego, preventing them from suffocating on reality.

As a result of this biodynamic system, over time, the resident species adapt to the risks and rewards by developing a highly efficient selection routine. They know what time of day to go fishing, they know what a "good size" is, where the best location is to spring their trap, and even how much is enough before it affects their feeding schedule. They have a finely honed discrimination concerning certain qualities of the other fish – they know exactly what causes stimulation, they know the best presentation of the bait and just what type of finfare gives their quarry an ego/endorphine rush.

When they go fishing, they circulate certain stimuli through the prey fish's gills, hooking them on a dopamine rush and thereby establish a visceral power of attraction within that prey fish. The trick is to spike the bait stimuli with the sparkling oxygen of lust in a much higher concentration than what already richly exists in the surrounding waters. This has a contaminating effect, which leads to the bioaccumulation of lust (in the male species) and bimbofication (in the female) which permeates the waterways, enriching all the waters and the fish therein.

For example, the female catfish have long tentacles that are highly sensitive to the immediate environment, and they require so little oxygen that it doesn't matter what they catch. They will swim in close association with the other fish and absorb the oxygen of lusty attention by osmosis.

Females of the species are especially wary of certain males who they consider to be excessively undersized but who make themselves appear significantly larger by disguising themselves in a wadding of colorful seaweed. Nevertheless, a small number of these enamored males are successful in this endeavor, and can extract their daily supply of oxygen through short term breeding.

But once even one female determines that a particular male amphibian is deserving of a bit less and no more, the female will emit a sonar signal with a homing device attached to that male (known to biologists as an auto-rejector) in order to warn the other females not to approach. The male is unaware of this and remains oblivious.

Certain female species are known to shift their entire way of life to coincide with the streaming flows. Others make a game of collecting within their abdomens a sperm bank of the largest, most beautiful, and most aggressive fish they might chance to meet. In response, Fishmongers have developed highly refined techniques to deal with what is known as the Tahitian Imperative. Others who were raised in a restrictive aquaculture have been known to swim as far as they can from their hatcheries, sometimes crossing oceans in their quest for "freedom" (which they already have). After a long period away from home, they resemble the local fish in appearance, but they are prone to developing diseases and pathologies which they had been protected from earlier in life and had never formed antibodies against.

Pubescent male amphibians frequently appear flushed in the region of the face and neck, with eyes popping at the very sight of a female's enticingly smooth and bulbous tentacles. The endocrine systems of the young growing male amphibians have horribly intense addictions to the life sustaining oxygen of lust. Because of their biological and psychological dependence on oxygen, these males will grow ridiculously long external gills which stretch out of themselves and brush against anything that moves, causing them to become sensitive to the slightest provocation.

Consequently, their gills will be nipped and trimmed down by competitors, leading them to become oxygen deficient and underdeveloped.

More experienced Carpathians have various techniques of warning these males. However, due to their inexperience and their mind numbing strength of will to survive and mate, the sounds of their warnings often fall on an insensitive layer of tissue. In addition, their tympanic membranes, like that of frogs, become desensitized underwater due to the increased hydrostatic pressure. Should the others ever transmit any negative signals related to one's perceived potential of oxygenation or breeding, it is merely perceived as a painful and distracting percussive noise.

Most young male amphibians will not survive in the water and so choose to burrow under the dense loam under the riverbed. However, a small number eventually gain the size and strength needed to compete for the oxygen of attention in the marketplace.

Other young males endure extreme physical training, building up an immense physical structure, simply because this will attract the oxygen of attention from the opposite sex.

The male amphibians that survive will build a home in a secluded area with turbulent waters which supplies the high levels of oxygen that they need.

All aquatic life forms on Tumblr must always be careful not to give away any keywords or phrases that might attract the glare of the ever watchful eye of the fish farmer when he comes culling. For it is his capitalistic will for the fat fish to grow fatter for his own consumption, and for the thin fish to die off. Social or philosophical Mavericks are not tolerated either, but are suddenly harpooned without notice.

In the beginning, no one knew that they would become hopelessly addicted to the attention (females) and the lust (males). Like frogs in a kettle, that serious feeling had always been there – an innate desire for the dirty dense loam of the riverbed, perpetually teeming with benthic life. It had no gradual build-up nor special day of consummation; it was just there all along, festering and fomenting the dissipation of desire.

Just as Persephone ate the pomegranate seeds that spilt from the ramrod of Hades, all who are hungry may cum and be bitten from the heart at any time, thereby receiving in themselves the due penalty for their fervor – the joys of defilement and the sanctification of sin.

Lust

When does it cross the line?

Donal Graeme wrote a landmark post, Knowing when to escape (2013/12/15), in which he broke down the step-by-step process of how women fall victim to their own desire to be humbled / validated / ruled over by a man in an inappropriate context. The complementary pitfall for men is Lust, and yet, we don't have a playbook that defines lust in communicable words and describes how to deal with it. This post will attempt to fill in this gap, although I think it to be insufficient in itself.

A Description of Lust

First of all, male and female sexual desire is not sinful. Desire is only sinful when it mutates into Lust and is acted upon in an unrighteous manner.

Secondly, Lust is not Attraction, neither is it about the intensity of sexual attraction, as this is a healthy and normal response. Making efforts to establish Sexual Attraction is not Lust. Taking action in response to Sexual Attraction in order to find out if the person is suitable for marriage is not Lust.

Third, some people equate Sexual Arousal with what the Bible refers to as Lust. Arousal is not necessarily Lust, but Lust always involves Arousal somehow.

For Men, Lust is when sex in general, or the idea of having sex with a particular person, engulfs one's conscious awareness to the point of idolatry.

For Women, Lust is not so obsessed with the act of sex as it is for Men (although it is for some), but is instead focused on the prospect of being Humbled, Objectified, and Validated (HOV) by a HSMV man.

For both Men and Women, Lust is a different and separate paradigm of consciousness in which everything is viewed through sex or HOV colored lenses, respectively. It is a vanity of the mind as described in Romans 1:18-32 and Ephesians 4:17-19. For most, it is a faux fantasy characterized by a poverty mentality. For some, it is a lifestyle. There are subcultures that revolve around Lust.

The Spiritual Fruits of Lust

The Bible describes the consequences of Lust in Romans 1:18-32 and Ephesians 4:17-19. At worst, people become base, depraved animals, separated from God. Not good…

The spiritual problem with Lust is that when one is in this state, it is impossible to be spiritually tuned into the Holy Spirit and to have a Christian sense of Detachment from the Flesh and the things of this World. Worse, it also destroys one's discernment of righteousness, thus rendering him a spiritual FOOL. Moreover, Lust alters a man's consciousness such that he becomes oblivious to any real opportunities he may have otherwise had while malingering in a state of Lust, intersexual or otherwise. And the longer one lingers in this state, the more difficult it is to develop (or recover) spiritual Discernment. Therefore, many men cruise through life in this state, experiencing The Quiet Desperation of the Autopilot and never wake up from their delusions.

I believe it is possible for a man to be so deeply entrenched in lust for so long, that he is unaware of his own mental state and believes it to be normal, especially if he fell into this state of mind during adolescence. It is also easy to hide from all but the most discerning.

Lust blossoms into Sin when a man is lazy about snapping his brain out of the vanity of a Lustful mindset and PASSIVELY gives mental assent to entertain fantasies in his imagination and/or act on his desires. If Lust is not proactively nipped in the bud, it WILL lead to Frustration and Sin eventually.

Expressions of Lust

Women who live in a perpetual state of Lust tend to present themselves as Bimbos, e.g. the "Nightclub Vibe", heavy sculpted makeup, hoop earrings, dyed hair, revealing clothing, and so on, or otherwise, any costume or get up she deems appropriate and/or necessary to attract a suitable man into her life and bed. With continued sexperience, the typical S1ut Tells begin to show. (To offer visual examples, check out the females frequently featured on Fresh and Fit's After Hours Podcasts discussion panel. Listen to what they talk about. These women live a life of perpetual Lust!)

The ways men act out Lustful desires come in a few varieties.

If a man has a SMV high enough to attract women or the charisma to attract one particular woman, Lust is internalized in the ego, leading to a faux-confidence and detachment. I believe women can detect this and it becomes a spiritual / visceral vector of attraction, especially when reciprocality is in play, as I wrote about in The Sweet Aroma of Love (2022/2/14). If this trajectory is started early enough in life, it can become a stronghold of fornication. The temptation is to exercise those opportunities to get a woman (or women) into bed. Christian men in this state should NOT be putting themselves in that kind of situation with any woman he would not be willing to marry, and if it does happen, he should be proactive about pressing towards marriage.

For men who don't have such opportunities with women (and the number of these men is growing, unfortunately), Lust remains as an objective fantasy. The ever present temptation is to click on P0rnHub and Flog the Log. However, Masturbating is just as much a Sin as fornication. Men should not think they are more righteous simply because they're NOT an Alpha Chad S1utmaker. Furthermore, Men should not deceive themselves into thinking they can avoid the Sin of Fornication by tossing a load on a virtual centerfold, because they are still giving their minds and bodies over to their idols of Lust. Jerking the Joystick DOES reduce temptation, but only because it culls desire, dulls the senses, and destroys one's discernment of temptation, as I mentioned above.

In some ways, Jerking Off is worse than fornication, because it removes a man's motivation for pursuing a real relationship with a woman, and if done with P0rn, it introduces to his mind concepts of sexual liaisons that are not realistic and which will only lead to frustration. It also increases his expectations for a woman's attractiveness such that normal women can no longer arouse him. (Note: The secular Manosphere views this as beneficial to a man's ability to "ignore her beauty".)

There are other ways men express Lust, but these tend towards perversion. Going G@y or Tr@ns, Ped0ph!li@, etc.

As Jesus said in Matthew 5:28, Sin starts with Lust. Once Lust is established, it is still Sin, no matter how one acts on it while in this state of consciousness.

Conclusions

The challenge to the Christian man is to recognize the moment Lust begins to creep into his psychological paradigm and to respond by righting his spiritual posture. He must be aware of tempting situations, and avoid those specific media outlets, certain women, and men who would introduce temptation. He must be decisive and proactive in doing this, because it is too easy to be lulled into the comforts of fantasy and the stimulation of desire.

Readers are encouraged to share how they escape or deal with Lust.

Why are attractive women more dangerous to beta men than their less attractive friends?

Introduction

There is not necessarily a difference in character when it comes to below average, average, and above average looking women. But the common impression among most men is that hotties are (almost always) b!tchez.

So what is behind this impression?

In the comments under my previous post, An Analogy of Risk Management (2022-3-7), Oscar offered this explanation.

> "One of the reasons hotter women tend to be crazier, and have worse personalities, and fewer useful skills in general, is that men let them get away with it, and demand less from them."

Jack offered an entirely different explanation.

> "From what I have read, the overriding opinion in the broader Manosphere is that hotter women are better quality and have better personalities. Part of this is because they tend to come from upper class homes. The reason why a lot of men think they are worse is because hotter women are farther up the SMV totem pole in > relation to one's self. So they tend to treat lesser SMV men poorer than men on their own tier."

I think both of these perspectives are true, but most men don't understand exactly how this works. This post will dive deeper into this phenomenon.

Impressions are Unnerving

Oscar mentioned that great literature (including the Bible) from pretty much every literate culture spanning centuries and continents warns young men to look past beauty to see the underlying character of a woman.

A possible take on why the bible and literature across time and cultures warns men against overlooking character for beauty is not that good looking women have poor character per se. The reason is because Men become mesmerized by spectacular T&A, and are thereby tempted to overlook the more serious long term life issues created by poor character for the short term gain of banging a hottie (re. Oscar's comment).

Men are largely unaware of this temptation when confronted with shimmering beauty, and so the risk goes under men's radar. Thus, high SMV women are dangerous to men because they appeal to men's primal instinct which shuts down the prefrontal cortex of sound reason.

Let me demonstrate what I'm talking about.

Look at this beauty for a moment.
Now, can you remember the title of this post?
Didn't think so…
In addition to this temporary insanity, it's also easer for men to get drawn into a high SMV woman's frame, especially when there is a significant SMV disparity, and since women have no respect for non-Tingle inducing men, once she's given the power of laying the frame, she'll take him to the cleaners just for the fun of it (re. Jack's comment).

Tying this back to risk, the hot chicklet with the ugly character is potentially a huge risk. If a man does not keep his head on straight and analyze the risk well, he's stuck with all the misery she causes. He's the Proverbs 21 husband.

Hence we have the wisdom of the bible telling us that inner beauty matters a whole heck of a lot because (1) most of married life is lived after the looks fade, and (2) this advice is necessary to help keep men level headed in the heat of temptation. The warning for men then is to not let a vixen's youth and beauty cause the rational analyzer to get glitchy in a way that it would not with a less attractive woman.

Case Study – Missy in The Big Bang Theory

The Big Bang Theory is a great show for highlighting the SMP. Howard, Leonard, Raj, and Stuart (a comic book store owner) are all hapless beta's that pine over women. In real life, their chances of ending up MGTOW are better than average. Sheldon is hyper focused on his purpose and he cares way more about that than interacting with women socially. Penny is a carousel rider who goes out with Chads, but that doesn't stop Leonard from making her his purpose.

This video depicts how attractive women are more dangerous to beta men than their less attractive friends.

Sheldon is unaffected by his sister, Missy, because they are siblings and they grew up together. Even though he's a nerd, he is quite comfortable in negging her now and then.

OTOH, the two other guys, Howard and Leonard, are acting like fools in front of Missy because she's hot and her tits are out. They are totally bedazzled by her glimmering lipstick, plush mammary glands, ravens hair, and long silky legs.

Whenever Sheldon points out Missy's flaws, both Howard and Leonard explain them away because they are already sold on her. Mentally, they are moving down the sales process road where they stop thinking critically and start justifying their choice. This is human nature. Beta males in front of attractive women more easily succumb to this part of human nature than alphas or even betas in different situations such as in the purchase of a washing machine.

It's hard for the men to take their laser beam gaze off Missy, but notice how their fawning hearts shift to passive dismissal when Penny enters the room. For example, Leonard denies that the Superman boxers are his because he is worried about what Missy would think of him if she thought they were his. It is obvious that their behavior changed in the presence of a woman who is leagues above them in attractiveness.

The attention that both Howard and Leonard give Missy is not abnormal necessarily, but it is done in a manner that is distinctly different from the norm for them.

The analogies are not perfect, but the writers picked up on lots of pre-feminist male social behavior. What they get wrong is that the socially awkward nerdy guys end up with the hot women and the resulting relationships are generally depicted as working out. This is simply not true.

Conclusions

In conclusion, we cannot honestly say that all hotties are b!tchez, but it might appear that way because hotties bring out the inner Beta Schlub in men, and hotties can be b!tchez to their Beta Boy underlings.

Oscar might say that Beta men sell the farm to buy the cow (and perhaps one that gives out milk for free to other men).

Jack would say that Beta men are humbled by a woman's beauty, lose Frame, and thereby relinquish their position of power.

To humorously adapt Deep Strength's Law of Reciprocality,

> "Pu$$y attracts Pu$$ies."

However, it should be noted that it is the beauty and the pu$$y, and not just the pu$$y alone that causes men to make worse decisions. Because of this, it's the pretty women who have the potential to create the most risk for men.

All this is what makes attractive women dangerous to men.

So to answer the titular question (which you probably forgot after seeing the second image above), the larger issue is that men are more willing to overlook the character flaws of a beautiful women. The more a man wants a hot woman, the more likely he is to succumb to Lust, and the less likely he is to take the time necessary to carefully consider if the strengths he has match up well to deal with the flaws she has.

Whenever a man starts to change his behavior because of the presence of an attractive woman, the warning sirens should explode in your head. This is most easily judged by how much he wants her, verses how much she wants him (c.f. SMV disparity).

Changing who you are because you are more concerned over what a woman thinks, rather than being comfortable in your own skin as a man, will only lead to shame.

The Disappointments of Transactional Relationships

Transactional Failure

In The Future of Intersexual Relationships is Transactional (2021/3/12), I wrote about how intersexual relationships have become transactional in nature. This is becoming more true as time goes on. This most obviously applies to OASIS as well as marriage itself (prenups anyone?), but it also applies to your average everyday relationship.

What we see today is that people are only thinking in terms of what they're giving and what they're getting out of a relationship. "What do you bring to the table?" is followed by, "I AM the table!" with no question about the intent or validity of the question itself. There is no natural affection, no recognition of symbiosis, and much less any shared enterprise (i.e. a Mission).

Of course, baked deep within this relational ontology is a sense of distrust and a fear of grave disappointment. Nevertheless, people enter into relationships anyway, hoping for the best, or at the very least, to get a piece of the action.

Happy young couple having fun outdoors.

But from the beginning, the whole transactional ontology is what dooms the relationship to failure. Sooner or later, they'll invariably come to the conclusion that the trade-off is not "equitable", and then they'll complain because they feel like they're giving more than they're getting, and/or they're not getting what they want or expect. Disappointment follows, and discontentment settles in, followed by resentment, and then utter contempt. Then one or both bail out, telling themselves that they "deserve better".

No one would ever suspect that "Maybe this person is as good as I can do." (At a time when most people do not and are wishing for one!)

No one would ever think things like,

"God has brought this person into my life for a reason."

"God has granted me a domain of influence over a man/woman."

"What are my responsibilities to God in having this relationship!"

"I have a chance to influence this person for better or for worse, so I'll try to make it for the better."

"I've got to figure out what my role is here and how I might fulfill God's purposes for this."

"I have a chance to do something of lasting value here."

The Bible tells us to be faithful in small things.

Relationships are one of the most important venues in which we can exercise faithfulness, and I don't mean emotional or sexual faithfulness only. I mean, a faithfulness to God's design for male-female relations. A faithfulness to see the other person grow in faith and to grow as a person. A faith that recognizes that every person has foibles and hangups, and that we'll just have to choose one that we can accept and deal with, all the while remembering that we have our own set of faults and f@ggotr!es that the other must tolerate. A faith that sees how God works through these same issues to impart love and grace to each one of us.

Jesus told us,

> He who is faithful in a very little thing is faithful also in much; and he who is unrighteous in a very little thing is unrighteous also in much.
> Jesus in Luke 16:10

> His master said to him, 'Well done, good and faithful slave. You were faithful with a few things, I will put you > in charge of many things; enter into the joy of your master.'

> Jesus in Matthew 25:23

> And he said to him, 'Well done, good slave, because you have been faithful in a very little thing, you are to be in authority over ten cities.'
> Jesus in Luke 19:17

Father and daughter picking wildflowers in meadow.

Furthermore, the experience of falling in love tends to open one's heart, inspire faith, and in many cases will bring one very close to God. This gives new meaning to what Jesus said about the "little ones" in faith.

> …but whoever causes one of these little ones who believe in Me to stumble, it would be better for him to have a heavy millstone hung around his neck, and to be drowned in the depth of the sea.
> Jesus in Matthew 18:6

It would seem that disappointment and frustration is too light of a punishing consequence for having a transactional mindset.

What we need is for us to look at relationships as an opportunity to add to one another's lives a spiritual investment that is of eternal merit — and not merely as a contract or transaction. Relationships will not be successful otherwise.

But alas, no. Tingles Uber alles in a gynocentric order! It's all about the D!ck and P_$$y! Cum one, cum all!

The Male Version of Hypergamy

> "To borrow the parlance of the 'sphere, I have met 3 unicorns in my life."
> "This post by IKR up there reminded me of the unicorns I've met. IOW, the very, very few women I've ever met who really were attracted to me.
> One was a girl I took to my senior prom. I wasn't very kind to her. The second was a girl I've often called First College Girlfriend, or FCG. I was even worse to her. In both cases I screwed up the relationships because I thought I could do better – because they were cute, but not hot. My stupid mistake. Sure, they were both typical women – given to emotional displays, demanding at times, self-centered. But they were not always so, or unreasonably so all the time. And they were (or at least acted as if they were) extremely attracted to me.
> The leading characteristic of these women were that they were not stingy with their affections. They loved being with me, being next to me. They couldn't wait to see me. They were always excited to talk to me. They did what I asked of them.
> Maybe things would have worked out with either or both of them. Maybe they would not. They probably would not, because of timing or school or where I was going to school. or distance, or whatever else. I don't know. I'll never know.
> I know only that looking back, the way Prom Girl and FCG treated me is how a woman who's attracted to a man acts. I wish I had appreciated them more. I wish I had paid closer attention to how they treated me."

When I read this comment from deti, it reminded me of a few girls I dated for a while when I was a younger man. They were really nice girls, and I wished that I would have recognized the value of keeping them in my life. At the time, I felt like we had a great relationship (and now I know it's because she felt intensely attracted to me). But yet, from my end, I felt something was missing, and I could not put my finger on what it was. As I grew older and more experienced, I discovered that the thing that was missing was that they did not have a lot of sexual authority over me — something that really hot girls have.

Now I look back on this and think, "No wonder! Men's strong attraction to younger, hotter, and tighter is the male version of hypergamy." Men are always scoping for younger, hotter, and tighter, like women are always scoping for more LAMPS, more confident, richer, taller, etc. I should have reigned in my Male Hypergamic instinct and learned to love and appreciate the women in my life.

Beauty Provokes Love

Red Pill Apostle covered one way beauty affects Men in Why are attractive women more dangerous to beta men than their less attractive friends? (2023/2/13), that is, how men lose their minds in the presence of a beautiful woman.

There's another lesson to be learned about how beauty affects men. Beauty attracts a Man's Love. A man is humbled by the sexual authority of a hot woman, and this humility is what draws a man to her, lets him fall in love with her, and makes him want to spend his life with her. More concisely, Beauty invokes Humility, and Humility provokes love.

It works both ways too. One's ability to humble others, especially those of the opposite sex, merely by one's physical appearance is power. But the effect is greater for men.

Interestingly, a bit of well-owned humility can help a man attract a hotter woman. But at that age, I didn't know how to manufacture humility by my own willpower.

Men Marry out of Desperation

Lonny Spence puts another angle on this phenomenon in the following video. He says Men get married out of desperation for a woman's love. Men who never experienced falling in love with a woman go nutz when they finally get a chance with a woman, and throw all caution out the window. Note: It is assumed that the Men Lonnie speaks of are Low SMV men who catch women coming off the CC who want a Beta Bux.

Lonny Spence Show: The TRUTH on Why MOST Men Get Married (2023/2/13) Length: 5:10

I'll add that it goes back farther than never being the object of a woman's sexual attention and experiencing love. I'd say it begins with the man's relationship with his mother! His mother may have always held him at arm's length, never given him unconditional love, and thereby set him on a trajectory of rejection and searching for that missing piece. Alternatively, his mother may have coddled and spoiled him with too much attention, leading to him becoming overly attached to her, i.e. a "Mommy's Boy".

OTOH, if a man accepts a woman who is naturally drawn to him (i.e. she feels desire, humility, and love towards him), but fails to experience humility in the relationship, then he is continually at risk of being humbled by another woman, "falling in love" with her, and having an affair. The chances of this happening increase as the woman ages out of her prime, and the Man ages into his. I believe this is why many married men have affairs later in life. They're drawn to the humility, passion, and feelings of desire that a hotter woman can inspire, and as an older man, they are able to command the attentions of such a woman that they could not as a younger man. If a man has never experienced this before, it's quite a hefty temptation.

Humility can be Deceiving

The third lesson to be gained here is that Humility is a powerful trap, and this is largely because Humility is a key aspect of Validation.

For Higher SMV men — men like me, deti, Scott, and many others — the trap is when they willingly trade off the glorious benefits of Headship for the humility and inspiration of having a slightly younger, hotter, tighter piece of @ss, never realizing that this is what they're doing, and that it cannot turn out as well as if they had stayed with the girl who truly loved and respected them.

For Lower SMV men, the trap is when a woman settles for them in midlife and they are overwhelmed by having a woman in their life and jump on marriage out of desperation, as Lonnie described, never realizing that it will be nearly impossible for him to establish Headship sans Tingles.

Also, it is possible for Men to experience both of these aspects. That is, he's High Value, but poor treatment by his mother and other women has made him desperate for feminine love. In this case, he'll attract women, but they'll tend to be rather low quality women who cannot humble him. Thus he will be disappointed, exasperated, and frustrated in his search for love and contentment.

The colloquial term for any of these traps is being "unlucky in love".

Humility is key. When well managed, it can lead to life and Love. If mismangled, it becomes a mess.

P0rn is Faux Validation

The Sin of Private Lust

A reader described a very important issue in an email.

He writes,

> "Yesterday I found my 14-year-old son browsing P0rnHub. When I confronted him about it, he looked like a deer in the headlights. He couldn't say a word. Worse, I didn't know how to tell him how harmful this is to him as a man. Instead I got really angry which didn't help matters at all. Later on, I realized that I wasn't angry at him as much as I was angry about how easy it is for him to get messed up by that stuff. I feel a little heartbroken right now, and I'm not sure how to handle this."
> "How much of modern man's thinking has been warped by LIVE porn? There have always been naked pictures of women from time memorial. But we are at a rare point in history when men are seeing Validational Sex (VS) from women to be as common as dogs humping in the alley. When you consider all the darkness and defilement that is common to porn – BDSM, threesomes, and all the kinky stuff – it's easy for men to be overwhelmed by the raw graphic action and lose touch with the process (charisma or Game if you will) that moves a woman to that point. It is not so much that bad techniques are being shown, or none at all, but the fact that men are witnessing all this as how a woman achieves VS, and as you said in your post, Validation is about Losing Self-Control (2022/10/24), it becomes VS for the man watching it as well. And it is not just VS but the wildest and most out of control VS you can see in a woman."
> […]
> "If VS is required for a man to rule a woman, then men need to get away from the click bate and go back to the basics of how to turn Sparks into Tingles (attraction to arousal)."

Sad story mate, but it is one that needs our dire attention.

The Consequences

The corresponding reader is right about how damaging it is, and for many reasons.

It is known that repeated ejaculation enervates a man's energy levels and reduces his testosterone, and thereby makes a man more compliant and soft-willed.

The dopamine spikes are self-inflicted and addictive.

Men might be able to learn what turns themselves on and become more familiar with the anatomy and function of their own body and that of females, but beating around the bush will NOT make a man any more proficient in attracting nor arousing a real woman. It cannot increase his charisma, confidence, nor his social Game skills. In fact, it has the opposite effect. Moreover, throttling the stick shift does NOT allow a man to learn how to integrate his sexuality into a relationship with a woman, which is the proper venue.

BUT… it can lead a man to become so familiar with the dynamics that he believes that he can, which is essentially a loss of integrity. Making a habit of this is enough to increase men's expectations of the opposite sex to the unrealistic realms of idealism and lower their willingness to do any of the hard work necessary to keep a woman. This is essentially the male version of an addictive entitlement. I believe this is what the reader is referring to when he wrote,

> "…it becomes VS for the man watching it as well."

It's also extremely shameful to admit or to talk about. I think too little is said about how damaging it is to the male psyche, hence the reader's email and the need for this post.

And it's all so convenient and easy! With p0rn, a man has to do little more than click a few links, lie back and stroke his poke, and soak up all the ego gratification of seeing an attractive woman heat up and get off.

Framing the Problem

Well, I'll make a few distinctions which may seem small but are able to provide a Frame to this issue.

First off, I'd say true VS is rather rare in p0rn. This is not to contradict the corresponding author's second paragraph above, but rather to affirm his account of the deception behind it. I mean, how validational can it be when they're banging a different man every month and getting paid for it? Some p0rn stars don't even consider sex on the job to be real sex. IMO, p0rn stars are (1) actors who are (2) very fit, (3) well-endowed with key indicators of attractiveness, and (4) naturally sexually aggressive (many of them have unusually high testosterone), and (5) they get paid handsomely to demonstrate all these qualities for the camera. These are women who are autoerotic (able to arouse themselves at will), or who need very little stimulation to become aroused. Getting naked in a room full of people might be enough to do it for many of them. They are doing it for the money, not for the validation. Overall, I'd say it's more of a lifestyle than a confirmation of personal value or a humbling validation of being ruled over by a HSMV man.

Secondly, concerning the male viewer, a p0rn model who is exquisitely beautiful or sexy, or a scene that is arousing, is enough to make it feel like VS to a male viewer, regardless of whether it is truly Validational to the woman he sees being ravished. As Red Pill Apostle wrote,

> "It is the beauty and the pu$$y, and not just the pu$$y alone that causes men to [lose their minds]."

With p0rn, we have the beauty without the pu$$y, which is a testament to the libido stoking power of beauty.

Third, although Wanking Off with p0rn feelz Validational to the male viewer, it is a Faux Validation — a deception — because there is no real relationship present. The ego and libido are intertwined with visceral force, but with no expression of the agentic will. Thus, there is no opportunity to properly integrate the libido into one's authentic ego. In reality, he's a boy or man sitting at home alone, feeling lonely, overcome with Lust, and unable to do anything about it other than p!ss his progeny down the drain.

Fourth, most men who use p0rn regularly probably can't even tell the difference between VS and non-VS, because any sense of discernment they might have otherwise had has been deadened by Lust.

The secret sauce for Equalitarianism.
Finally, most men who are into p0rn don't really care about the distinctions I just made. Plipping on P0rn is a soothing anaesthetic for the searing pain of loneliness and is therefore prioritized. They only care about finding an actress or a scene that can transfix themselves on a fantasyland of arousal, getting themselves off, and getting a sense of relaxation and relief.

Concluding Statements

For teenage boys, it begins with curiosity and then it turns into fascination. Eventually he'll start flogging the log, and then he's hooked. I believe most adolescent boys are too young to know about all the distinctions I mentioned above and how beating the monkey impacts their spiritual lives.

Exit Questions

1. What do we tell this father and other fathers in his position?
2. What could this father do to lead his son away from p0rn and towards developing useful social skills with women?
3. What can we do to teach young men how harmful p0rn is to their masculine essence?
4. Would it help young men to tell them of the distinctions outlined above? Or would it be useless and embarassing?

How P0rn and Premarital Sex affects one's view of Women

Introduction

In the comments under the previous post, P0rn is Faux Validation (2023/2/17), the question arose about how p0rn and premarital sex affects one's view of women. I challenged LastMod to answer this question for himself, but he has not yet offered an authentic response based on his own introspection. In the interest of authenticity and philosophical integrity, I feel obligated to answer this question about myself.

Effects of P0rn and Pulling Peen

Jack wrote,

> "I can't help but wonder how much p0rn affected your views of women and how that has impacted your relationships with them."

To answer my own question, I was practically addicted to beating off from the ages of 14-26. I didn't always use p0rn (it was hard to get), but I often used images of beautiful, scantily clad women. IMO, the overall effect is basically the same because both indulge Lust. In my estimation, spanking the monkey / p0rn increased my expectations of and standards for women to the realms of fantasy. It also kills Masculine Presence and Charisma. Because of all this, and the relaxed attitude that flogging the log tends to produce, this prevented me from capitalizing on real life opportunities with women during that crucial time period of my life.

Effects of Illicit Sex

LastMod wrote,

> "I can't help but wonder how much pre-marital sex affected your views of women and how it impacted your relationships with them."

To answer LastMod's question, I didn't have sex until I went to Taiwan at the age of 32. It wasn't my intention in going there, but after I arrived I was overwhelmed by all the IOIs and respect I received from women, which I had never experienced in the U.S. After that, the way I viewed women became more aligned with Red Pill lore, although I didn't understand the whys and hows until after I took the Red Pill many years later. I got married within a year because I believed fornication was wrong (I essentially Ran the Gauntlet), but this turned out to be an insufficient reason and purpose for getting married. My first marriage was catastrophic.

The Larger Lesson

The more important thing I've learned is that one cannot have the opportunity to enter into a Godly relationship with a woman as long as one is in bondage to Lust, either through p0rn and jerking off or illicit sex. This is for (at least) three reasons.

1. One cannot attract a godly woman into his life. In the case of p0rn and masturbation, decent women can sense the complacency and spiritual darkness and are repelled. In the case of illicit sex, women are attracted like flies on sh!t, but these women are, for the most part, emotionally broken, dysfunctional, and immoral.
2. One cannot identify women who are properly suitable for marriage and make a good choice of a wife because of the lack of discernment and spiritual blindness that Lust produces.
3. I suspect that God is opposed to allowing it.

Longitudinal Effects

Overall, I feel sad about all of this, because for many years I just couldn't find a way to get past my inability to handle this area of my life. And it has come at a cost. Prayer and Bible study made little difference, largely because of my lack of spiritual discernment. Periods of abstention (lasting up to 2 months) brought a little more clarity, but didn't help me escape the deeper problem overall. For a long time, I thought this problem would go away or become more manageable if I got married, only to discover after marriage (too late!) that it makes little difference. It just becomes more complicated.

I also feel sad because now I have to live with the consequences of being in bondage to Lust, especially during my earlier years, but most of my life actually, i.e. not feeling loved and appreciated, not being able to attract nor identify a woman worthy of marriage, being divorced, having a broken family, a contentious second marriage, etc.

Lust will kick your @ss!

I need to write another post about How I broke free from the Sin of Lust.

Introduction

In the comments under How P0rn and Premarital Sex affects one's view of Women (2023/2/20), Thedeti made a controversial claim.

> "…pr0n elevates sex, and the sex act, out of proportion. It causes men to obsess about sex and attach too much importance to sex, the sex act, and the release that comes from it. They are pedestalizing sex, not the women with whom they're not having sex and not the women they see in pr0n.
> The way that men avoid pedestalizing sex is to actually have sex, so they can find out what sex really is."

This runs directly against Christian doctrine, so let's examine this in greater detail. (My immediate response to deti's comment is here.)

But first, let's back up and get the larger picture of what's going on.

Recent Developments in the Manosphere

A little over a year ago, I read two widely contrasting assessments of the Manosphere. One from Adam Piggot pointed out how the Manosphere was beginning to recognize the place of God, while the other from Catacomb Resident derided the Manosphere for its overemphasis on bagging beaver. I've sat on these posts for the past year, because I wanted to see which one would be closer to how things have unfolded since then.

Excerpts follow. The first is from Adam.

> "[In the early days of the Manosphere…] The online discussions gradually morphed into a focus on how to get the girls. This had various guises which I will not go into here. Suffice to say that this was a stepping stone. The various stepping stones became known as the Red Pill journey, of which getting the girls was the introductory stone. But in the last couple of years the online masculinity communities have embraced Christianity to a very large extent. Not completely, but definitely in big numbers. The ultimate Red Pill as it were.
> If the previous introductory step was how to get the girls, the introductory step today is totally different. The introductory step now is Christianity because how to get the girls takes you away from Christ and towards mortal sin. In other words, for young guys today the introductory step is different from what young guys only 10 years ago were doing. Not completely of course, but in numbers high enough to be influential.
> You see a lot more talk about God in the Manosphere than you would ever have seen only 5 years ago. And > more importantly, it is celebrated whereas before it would often have been ridiculed. This is a comprehensive and profound change to an online community that is large enough and influential enough that it has been the target of documentaries and studies by our enemies."

> Adam Piggott: "I will draw all men to Myself." Jn. 12:32 (2021/12/12)

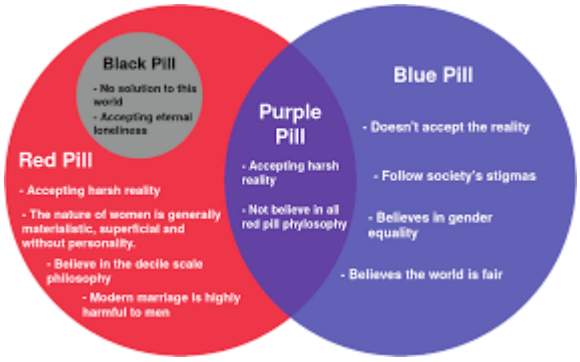
I would say Adam was right for the most part. Now, I see more talk about God, the Bible, faith, humility, purpose, and so on than I ever did before 2020, even among secular sources! What Adam didn't anticipate (nor I) was the rise of the Black Pill, which acts as a defacto vehicle for some men to come closer to the truth and/or God, for example, what I covered in Discerning the Lies (2023/2/6).



Here is the one from Catacomb Resident.

> "I'm going to distance myself here from the so-called Men's Red Pill movement. They have an accurate understanding of the dynamics of dating, but their primary goal is good sex. Even the Christian Red Pill writers tend to miss the point that a good sex life is just a side effect of walking in faith in the first place. In the Bible, sex is just a fleshly appetite, like any other, and must be highly restricted in order to make it an engine of blessing."
> "The Covenant is all about discovering God's design for us all, and then discovering His design for you in particular. The Covenant itself is a grace gift from God. At first reading, these two assessments of the Manosphere may seem like diametric opposites. We might speculate and postulate about how or why this could be. But in fact, they're both true. Let me explain.

The Torturous Path to God

It has been observed for some time in the Manosphere, that many of those men who were previously Players / PUAs / Relationship Gurus came to God over the course of time. Roosh Valizadeh is the most noteworthy example. A naive assessment of this phenomenon might conclude that their sexual connivances brought them closer to God. It might be more accurate to say that they grew bored and tired of it all (AKA "player burnout") and that the spirit of Lust gradually lost it's hold over their minds and lives. But of course, both of these explanations fail to recognize the power of God's grace towards redemption and regeneration — which is really what it's all about, though it is challenging to articulate.

The sequence of "getting the girls", to a mystical recognition of the metaphysical, to finding faith and perhaps God (as Adam described) is a Manosphere-wide (and perhaps soon a culture-wide) phenomenon. The way I see it, this bird's eye view of this "movement" (if you will) is an amalgamation of the life experiences of many men within the sphere / culture. The worm's eye view on the ground is much different, and looks like what CR alluded to — Men trapped in Lust, struggling to compete in the SMP in an effort to fulfill those lusts, becoming disappointed and disillusioned (either with women or with involuntary celibacy), and then looking beyond all this to find a larger purpose for living.

I could say this is true about myself too, at least in the area of my relationships with women, sex, and marriage. I had to slog through years of being in bondage to Lust before I could realize in my heart (NOT my rational understanding) that there is no solution. Then I had to take the Red Pill before I could sort out all the lies in my brain (which is what the church should be offering).

Celibacy is no solution. Getting laid is no solution. Marriage is no solution. Even falling in love is no solution. Only faith in Christ is the solution.

The Path to God is Tortuous

NovaSeeker and I have written about the tortuous Path to God in a few previous posts (listed below under Related). Men (and women) follow this path in other areas of their lives as well, but the area of intersexual relationships is a common thread of humanity that nearly everyone can identify with.

What we are observing both in the Manosphere and in the lives of individual men is that Men are following this path in the area of their intersexual relationships. Some more than others. Some quite willingly and others against their will. Some find it to be a stroll in the park while others are breaking in by hook and by crook.

- A man needs to try Celibacy to know that it has some benefits, but it is no solution.
- A man may need to get laid (many times) before he realizes that it may quench his momentary thirst, but it's not an everlasting spring of Life and it doesn't fulfill the needs of his soul.
- A man may need to suffer through a horrible "marriage" for years before he finds that it is more trouble than it's worth.
- A man may need to fall in love with a woman before he knows how fragile and unreliable it is and sees the treachery and usury of it all.
- A man may need to go through any of a wide variety of life experiences before he knows himself and his need for Christ.

Yes, it's messy, painful, and riddled with sin, as CR pointed out. But what do men have to go through to wake up from their individualized and personalized collection of lies and come to this realization? How else can Men apprehend the Truth?

Epilogue

It would be ideal if Men could somehow magically see through all the lies and discover faith in Christ through a simple prayer or through regular Bible reading. But in reality and for most men, it is not so simple nor straightforward. There is a cesspool of ignorance and unmitigated desire that needs to be dealt with and overcome. It cannot be systematically avoided nor denied. There is a mountain of cultural conditioning and Blue Pill bluffs that need to be identified, called out, and agonizingly extricated from the mind and soul.

Sin is assumed as a given and it must be addressed. The core issue, the "roadblock", is not sin per se (due to Jesus' sacrifice), but a lack of faith, and the humble tumble hassle of finding it.

Thus, we see that deti may very well be correct in the context of nonChristians struggling to find faith. IOW, deti's advice applies to unbelievers — Men who cannot very well be expected to adhere to moral law anyway. For believers — Men who have found faith — extramarital sex is a sin and is not advisable. Instead, early marriage is recommended, although this too is quite a formidable challenge these days. (Deti has said that the modern Sexual / Relationship Market is an unsolvable problem.) Nevertheless Christian Men must trust the Holy Spirit to guide them to fulfill their needs and to do what's right.

A Note on the Impotency of Faithlessness

Jesus described the impotency of faithlessness in the scriptures.

> [19] Then the disciples came to Jesus privately and said, "Why could we not cast it out?" [20] So Jesus said to them, "Because of your unbelief; for assuredly, I say to you, if you have faith as a mustard seed, you will say to this mountain, 'Move from here to there,' and it will move; and nothing will be impossible for you. [21] However, this kind does not go out except by prayer and fasting."
> Matthew 17:19-21 (NKJV)

In today's gynocentric sex-drenched world, escaping Lust and establishing Headship (in or out of marriage) are the modern day equivalents of mountains that must be moved. Until men can find the faith to turn these mountains into molehills, we can only expect to see the machinations of human nature sputter onwards.

Ever try fasting? Diligent fasting will arouse one's faith in a hurry! (Well, after a few days anyway.)

The Moral Law cannot be set aside

Relaxing the Rules???

Starting in late 2020, commenter Eric Francis Silk (EFS), AKA Raphael Tisserand, has presented an observant argument in bits and pieces here and there which have addressed The Young Man's Problem.

Scott summarized EFS's arguments as such.

> "His perspective is that there is nothing any one man can do in the current cultural context to thread this needle and land in a loving, Christian, lifelong marriage.
> And he is ultimately right about that. This is a social problem that will only be solved once the societal level guard rails and supports for nuclear family formation and maintenance are restored.
> That's probably not happening in our lifetimes."

All of EFS's statements are rather accurate in describing the broken state of the current SMP/MMP. But the sticking point is where EFS advocated for a "relaxation of the moral Law" as a practical concession, assuming this would be beneficial in navigating the debased marketplace. Of course, this point of his argument is absurd, because moral Law is instituted by God, and humans cannot change moral Law any more than we can change gravity or the color of the sky.

I thought maybe what he meant to say is that we should allow greater grace in how we regard those who transgress the moral Law. But we already have plenty of that, so that's a moot point.

My conclusion was that EFS's viewpoint could not be described in just a few comments. It really deserves a full length essay. On January 1, 2021, I wrote a private email to EFS to invite him to write a guest post to explain his views in a more reasonable and articulate manner so that he could explain his position more fully. I do think his position is one that many men share, and it would benefit us all if this position could be put into elegant form.

So far, he has not followed through on this, and now, enough time has passed since my invitation that I think he never will. I am not surprised, because I believe such an argument simply cannot be formulated and still remain true to the tenets of faith.

Adam Piggot was considerably less generous to Eric and others who follow his view. He basically called them trolls. Adam wrote,

> "If you don't believe that the moral law is timelessly eternal, unbending, and unable to be changed, then you can go on ahead and try it for yourself, against the good advice of those at this blog. If you relax the rules, then you get USPCA and more of the moral rot that already surrounds us. So I think you don't really know what you're talking about, but it's better for you to find out one way or another. But that's between you and God, and not the official doctrinal stance, of course."

We are Wholly Dependent on God

The time for discussion over this matter is now drawing to a close. Because I don't want any readers to remain in doubt, either about the truth of the matter, or the official position of this blog, I will address Eric's viewpoint as follows.

If one comes to appreciate his need for humility, mercy, and grace, then God is coming to know him. If one comes to appreciate God's Covenant Law, then he is coming to know God.

- Some people want to be known by God without knowing neither God nor themselves. Sin is regarded as an end in and of itself. (This is the hedonistic "prodigal son" archetype.)
- Others want to know everything about God without allowing God to know themselves. They are too proud, too self-righteous, or too fearful to be trusting. (This is the legalistic "elder brother" archetype.)

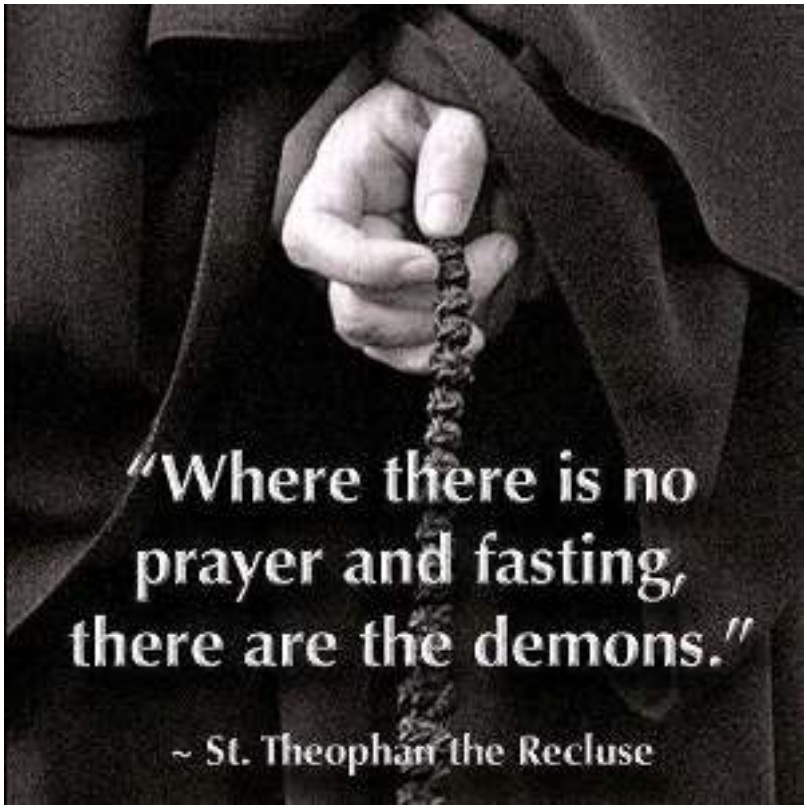
Christians recognize that human beings are sinful. The nature of sin builds Satan's kingdom by destroying one's sense of spiritual discernment and eroding the faith of others, among many other maladies. While it is an observable fact that many Christians discover faith or "find God" after engaging in morally illicit pursuits, the immorality itself is not what inspires faith, but rather, it is the deeper acquaintance with one's self, one's desires and needs, and one's brokenness that causes a man to look beyond his mortal state and realize his need for God. God cannot be "found" through intentionally indulging in sin any more than mystical faith can be developed through legalistic Pharisaism. We cannot "reverse engineer" the process nor can we "earn" our own salvation, respectively.

- People who believe lawlessness is congruent with scripture are Antimonianists. They have little regard for moral righteousness and the value thereof.
- People who advocate loosening up the "rules" are actually endorsing lawlessness, which is something we already have too much of. If one rejects the moral Law, then he's rejecting Christ.
- If one clings to the "rules" as a self-justifying defense to avoid trusting God, then that is legalism. If one rejects faith, then he's rejecting God's love and grace.

- People who believe the Christian religion is all about “following the rules” and “being a good person” are legalists. They have little appreciation for compassion, grace, and love.

As RedPillApostle wrote,

> “We may not like God’s standards, because they are impossible for us to follow. I break them every day, many times a day and I am convinced that I do this in ways of which I am not even aware. This is where faith, grace and forgiveness come in, because the standards are easy to understand, but the application of them in life are not.”



Conclusions

In summary, “Following the rules” vs. “NOT following the rules” is NOT The Way. Faith in Christ is The Way. “Following the rules” is the default setting for unbelievers and for those immature believers who have not yet explored their faith and have not yet developed a discernment of Moral Law (Hebrews 5:12-14).

For those who haven’t yet figured this out, all I’ll say is that human beings don’t have the spiritual authority to change the moral law. We only have the choice of whether to observe it or not. We can either live by it, or we can break ourselves against it. The moral law will not change, no matter what we do. That’s why it’s called a “Law” (by any definition).

However, we do have some latitude about how much of the law we can reasonably expect ourselves and others to follow. Getting these discrepancies and incongruences between the ideal and the real squared away in our mental assessment of self and our practice of living is colloquially called “coming to terms with one’s self”, and doing so under the authority of Christ is a fundamental part of one’s redemption. For readers who are unfamiliar with this, I recommend reading a couple previous posts, Elements of Emotional and Personal Maturity (2021/9/8) and Knowing One’s Self (2021/10/30).

Assuming that Eric is posing his idea with sincere intent, I would conclude that he is a searcher or possibly a new believer who still needs to come to terms with himself.

In the possibility that Adam is right — that EFS is indeed an insincere troll… He wins the consolation b00bie prize (maybe literally). Nice try, but this frame fails in the final analysis.

Asherah Makes Demands: Give Women what they want!

Gynogroveling is Assumed

Why is it that every conversation eventually devolves into a discussion of what women want?

I first mentioned this phenomenon a month ago in Christian Detachment (2023/1/30), in which I quoted a readers comment about this. Nevertheless, Ye Olde Gynocentrism has marched on unabated here at Σ Frame.

More recently, under P0rn is Faux Validation (2023/2/17), commenter "Aaron MacDonald"* (AMD) kicked off a discussion, complete with a video interview, about women's preferred pen!s size, of all things…

When I pointed out the absurdity of introducing this topic, AMD responded,

> "Well, men are watching porn to see women. And they are thinking how to get women so they can do it in real life and not need to watch porn anymore. Any topic relating to straight men and sex is eventually going to come 'round to women and what they want."

An absolutely Splendid reFrame! It's a lovely logical bridge, and it has some truth to it. But AMD is using this as a justification for asking what women want, which is a tangent that he/she introduced in his/her first comment under this post.

As a generous assessment, AMD is putting the cart before the horse in his/her logic and is making assumptions that don't stand up.

Here's how AMD should have presented his/her argument.

1. Premise A: Introduce deti's earlier comment about how "The primary reason boys and men turn to pr0n is because they are unable to get sexual attention from real girls and women."
2. Claim A: Next, argue that Men can get away from p0rn by pursuing real relationships with girls.
3. Premise B: Pick up on deti's other comment: "The way that men avoid pedestalizing sex is to actually have sex, so they can find out what sex really is."
4. Claim B: Establish the link that relationships with girls (Premise A) must necessarily entail snagging thatch to be effective towards escaping p0rn.
5. Premise C: Rehash Jack's post on Game to argue that Game fulfills women's wants, needs, and desires.
6. Claim C: Men must identify what women want in order to employ Game effectively.
7. Premise D: Summarize Roissy to say Game improves intersexual relationships, and that women respond to Game by spreading their knees and curling their toes.
8. Claim D: Women offer sex to Men who give them what they want.
9. Conclusion: Men can get laid and thereby escape their bondage to lust, p0rn, etc. by giving women what they want!

Then comes the application.

1. Man works his glutes off to learn Game and give the Woman what she wants.
2. Woman gets what she wants and is temporarily satisfied, but not content.
3. Woman decides she can motivate Man to give her mooaar by showing her loinfelt appreciation.
4. Woman serves Man a plate of pork loin with three squeals a day.
5. Man is content, and continues to serve Woman faithfully.
6. Ta daaa! Now he's free from p0rn! (Almost…)

In summary, Asherah is Man's Demonic savior!

Where AMD's Approach Falls Apart

There are several errors in AMD's argument.

1. AMD is describing an immoral relationship. It is immoral for three reasons: (1) it is transactional, (2) it views women as a tool men can use to overcome Lust and P0rn, and (3) it prioritizes illicit sex over the value of the relationship itself.
2. Claim A is half baked. The problem of p0rn is more complicated than merely getting laid. Thedeti, EoS, and RPA offered a more contextually detailed analysis of this, involving hopelessness, demoralization, and anesthetization, respectively. Yes, many men succumb to p0rn because they are purposeless, rejected, and underappreciated, not only by women, but by the wider Western culture in general. I'll add that most fathers probably aren't doing much to prevent their sons from falling victim to their own lusts, and I'll guess that this is because many fathers are gynogrovelers themselves. IOW, many men are dealing with a generational curse.
3. Claim B is foolishly inadequate. AMD's approach is no solution to either p0rn addiction or p00n addiction. All this does is replace one sin (lust and sloth) with another (the Sin of Adam / Gynocentrism).
4. Claim C is naive. Game fulfills women's wants and needs on a metaphysical level, which they may not be aware of. It is NOT about giving women whatever they demand on a cognitive level. This is the same a buying into her Frame.
5. Claim D is conditional. Game doesn't automatically lead to sexual congress. Besides, not all men can learn effective Game. Also, at any time, the woman can "change her mind", get bored, or meet another man and then back out of the deal.
6. The Conclusion is in error. Women do not spontaneously have sex simply because they get what they want (on a cognitive level). They have sex because they are humbled by and emotionally / libidinally invested in a Tingle inducing man and they experience a type of validation that causes them to lose self-control (which is what they truly want on a metaphysical level). They may also have other motivations that a man should be aware of.

AMD needs to review what we've learned about Female Agency and Male Hyperagency.

A Better Way

To offer a better way, I'll briefly sum up a lot of what has already been discussed here at Σ Frame. We've already determined that men cannot make legitimate headway with women by simply giving them whatever they want. A man can only make authentic progress by establishing a domain of influence and a sphere of authority, and pursuing a mission / purpose in life. Then by the grace of God, a woman will come along who desires to be under his authority and a part of his domain as a faithful companion and helper. After, and ONLY after a woman submits herself under the man's domain of authority is it appropriate for him to consider her wants and needs according to his responsibilities towards her and her own spiritual growth. Failure to do things in this order will result in a failure to conform to God's ordained structure of Headship.

So the general path for Men, and the key to getting free from p0rn / p00n obsession, is to focus on God, stay busy with one's mission, and adjust one's expectations (for LTRs). Also, WhiteGuy1 and EoS offered some great practical advice on getting free from p0rn.

Concluding Statements

The reason why every conversation eventually devolves into a discussion of what women want is because the more women have what they want, the less they are dependent on men. And female independence decreases the stigma against and moral opposition to female promiscuity.

I suspect that if we picked apart many other glossy presumptuous arguments like the one AMD presented, including those foisted on us by cultural churchianity and even those from around the sphere, we would find that they assume a system of male hyperagency and essentially boil down to Gynocentrism — the modern day version of the worship of Asherah — female promiscuity.

Note: Asherah is the Sumerian god of fertility, AKA Ashtoreth (Hebrew Old Testament), Hera (Greek), Isis (Egyptian), and Queen of Heaven (antiquity), among others.

 Several readers have suggested that AMD is an altar-identity of our old comradette, GrifterShifter. I have reason to believe this is true.*

Note to AMD: Anonymity is expected in an online Manosphere forum, but authenticity, philosophical integrity, and sincerity remain paramount and shall not be dismissed. The best course for you is to be as honest as you can about your persona without giving away any identifiable data, tune into the arguments presented as well as you can, and offer your own arguments in good faith and without jumping topics. Your arguments stand or fall on their own merits.

> "The chief end of man is to glorify God, and to enjoy Him forever."
> Westminster Shorter Catechism

Introduction

One of the purposes for which God created human beings is for us to glorify Him (Ecclesiastes 12:13-14; 1 Corinthians 10:31; Ephesians 3:21). It is easy for us to have a rather superficial concept of glorifying God as sitting in church and singing hymns, praying and reading the bible, loving others in various ways, and being "moral" individuals in general (however that might be interpreted). But in this month's theme, I hope to inspire the reader with a fuller understanding of glory such that one's previous understanding of what it means to glorify God will be regarded as a child's trite reductionism.

What is Glory?

I am consternated that the Bible does not give a concise definition of glory and what it entails. All we are given are acts and things which convey glory, and I assume there are others not mentioned. So I'll have to wing this one on faith. Readers are welcome to add their own insights.

Subjectively, one of the key defining characteristics of glory is that it inspires awe, humility, joy, and reverence. When we read passages that say, "[so and so] glorified God", it is assumed that they were in a state of awe, humility, and reverence in response to God's presence, power, or work in that person's life, and/or that they expressed this through giving honor, praise, prophecy, and/or worship to the Lord. (For reference, see 1st Chronicles 16:23-29 and Philippians 2:9-11.)

But glory is not necessarily always a stunning rock star performance on a stage in the sky. It comes in varying gradations ranging down to common daily activities. St. Paul described what the latter appears like in daily terms.

> "So then, whether you eat or drink, or whatever you do, do all to the glory of God."
> 1st Corinthians 10:31 (ESV)

C. S. Lewis perhaps best put this into layman's terms when he wrote,

> "In commanding us to glorify Him, God is inviting us to enjoy Him."

Glory Appears in Various Forms

The bible mentions the following things as being glorious. (This list and the references included may be incomplete.)

1. The Lord (Exodus 24:17; 33:18-20; 40:34-35; Leviticus 9:22-24; Deuteronomy 5:24; 1st Chronicles 16:23-29; Psalms 24:7-10; 29:1-3; 63:2; 76:4; 97:6; 102:15-16; 104:31; 145:5; Isaiah 6:3; 42:8; 58:8; 60:1; Matthew 5:16; 24:30; John 1:14; 11:40; 17:4-5; Romans 5:2; 2nd Corinthians 4:6; 1st Timothy 1:17; 1st Peter 1; 4:13-14; 2nd Peter 1:3-4; Hebrews 1:3; Revelation 5:11-13; 21:23)
2. The power of the Lord (Exodus 15:6; 1st Chronicles 16:23-29)
3. The holiness of the Lord (1st Chronicles 16:23-29)
4. The Name of the Lord (Deuteronomy 28:58; 1st Chronicles 16:23-29; Nehemiah 9:5; Psalms 66:2; 72:19; 86:12; 115:1; Philippians 2:9-11)
5. The work of the Lord (Exodus 15:11)
6. Children's fathers (Proverbs 17:6)
7. Kings (2nd Samuel 6:20*; Proverbs 25:2; Revelation 21:24)
8. Kingdoms (Esther 1:4)
9. Nations (Revelation 21:26)
10. The King's daughter (Psalms 45:13)
11. The gray / silver hair of the righteous (Proverbs 16:31; 20:29)
12. Faith (1st Peter 1)
13. Godliness, Righteousness (Philippians 1:9-11; 2nd Peter 1:3-4)
14. Good works (Matthew 5:16; Hebrews 13:20-21)
15. Man's praise to the Lord (Psalms 66:2; 87:3; Philippians 2:9-11)
16. Nakedness (2nd Samuel 6:20*)
17. Sin and shame (Philippians 3:18-19)
18. Sufferings (1st Peter 4:13-14)
19. That which is concealed (Proverbs 25:2)

20. The Earth (Psalms 72:19; Isaiah 6:3; Habakkuk 2:14)
21. The heavens (Psalm 19:1)
22. Man is the glory of God (through election) (Psalm 8:4-6; Isaiah 43:7; Romans 8:18; 1st Corinthians 6:20; 11:7; 2nd Corinthians 3:18; Colossians 1:27; 2nd Peter 1:3-4)
23. The glory of young men is their strength (Proverbs 20:29)
24. Woman is the glory of Man. (1st Corinthians 11:7)
25. A woman's hair is her glory. (1st Corinthians 11:15)

One remarkable observation is that the Lord is both glorious and He receives glory (e.g. Jude 1:24-25). Selah! It is thus concluded that glory is a metaphysical state of being, and not a characteristic or a medium.

The Glory of Heaven, Earth, and Creation

If we may focus on the glories of the heavens and earth, there are many things that are glorious by nature, including the following.

1. Beauty (e.g. proportion and symmetry)
2. Light (especially a full spectrum such as natural sunlight)
3. Certain weather conditions
4. The Natural World; the Earth
5. The vast Universe

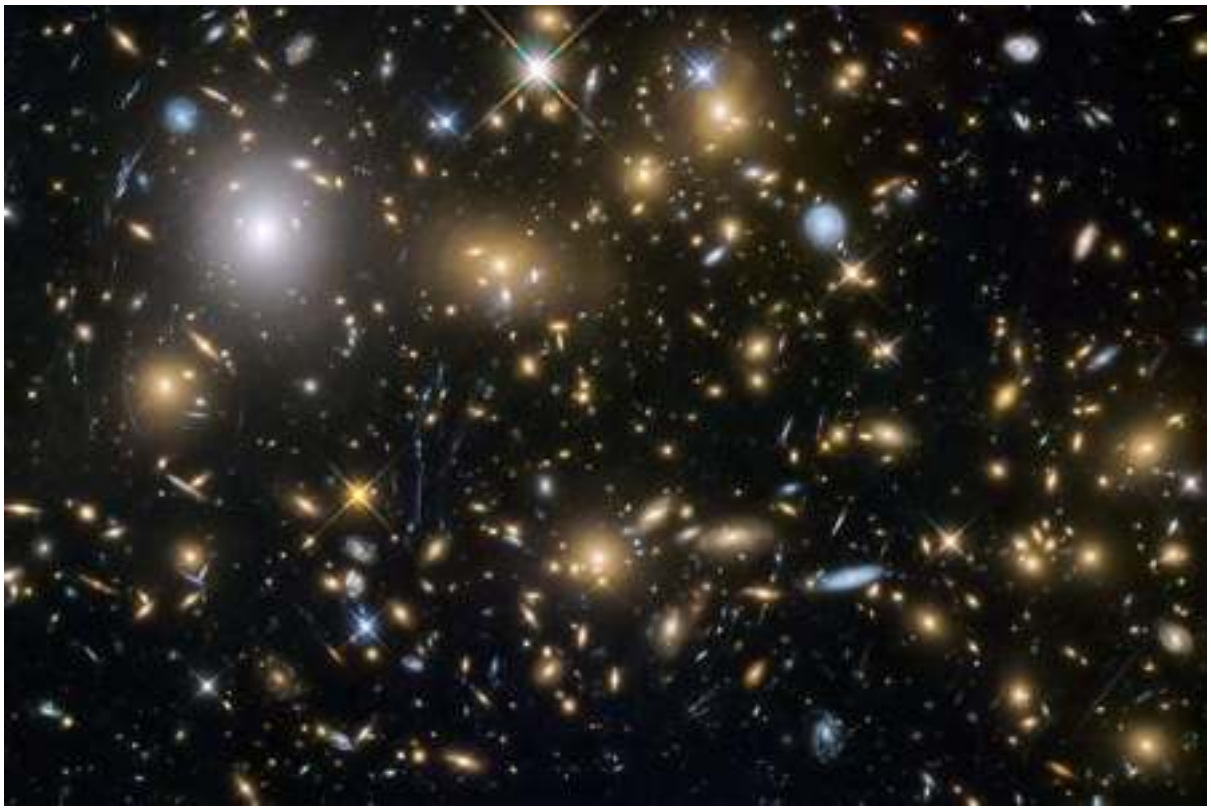

Image Source: Reader's Digest: 14 of the Most Baffling Mysteries About the Universe (2023/2/13)

The Glory of Mankind

There are a few ways that human beings can glorify God, listed here in order from most obvious to least.

1. Masculinity, i.e. strength (Proverbs 20:29)
2. Expert virtuosity in skill.

3. Boldly displaying one's own true character and charisma.
4. Worship (e.g. joyful singing, meditation, prayer)
5. Faith Community
6. Innocent suffering (most easily observed in women and children).
7. Being vigilantly discerning and applying wisdom (e.g. enforcing boundaries).
8. Conforming to masculine Headship, especially in marriage.
9. Living a life of holiness and righteousness in obedience to God's order.

In general, the most obvious is also the easiest and appears among a larger number of people. The more difficult and less observable ways to glorify God require faith and spiritual maturity.

These vectors are especially glorious when demonstrated in the face of challenges and risks. When combined with a righteous purpose, we often refer to this as heroism. Many of the most inspiring plots in books and movies are based on these vectors and are conveyed in a way in which glory is revealed in the face of an intimidating obstacle.

Case Study – Leland Sklar

As an example of expert virtuosity in skill (which is easily observed), I present the following video interview with Leland Sklar, bass player extraordinaire. At the 4:40 mark, he is showcased playing bass with Phil Collins of Genesis (playing piano in the background). [Full video of excerpt.] [Skip to excerpt of Leland.]

I include Leland Sklar as an example, partly because of his mystical intuition about instruments and music, partly because of his impressive virtuosity, and partly because of his stellar career accomplishments, but mostly because he never let it go to his head. His bald head and long grey/white hair and beard is the kicker. (See Proverbs 20:29.) IMO, his humility is the primary reason why he has been able to go the great lengths that he has in his career, while others of equal or even greater skill have come and gone.

He says in the interview above and in others that he has no personal style in playing. He sees each song as a unique expression and brings to the song whatever it needs. He also refers to each person he's worked with by name. That is an attitude of true humility.

I don't know if Leland Sklar is a man of faith by traditional definitions, but he sure shows it in his life purpose. That's what makes him the coolest bassist ever!

Receiving Honor and Glory Tempts us to Abandon our own Humility and Faith

This seems intuitive, but let's examine this in further detail.

In the bible, honor and glory are often described as being either synonymous or appearing together. Many passages use these words interchangeably in translation. The problem here is that we may miss the grace of God if we focus on the honor part and neglect the glory part. In doing so, we fail to maintain humility, lose touch, and thereby dis-integrate ourselves from living in the moment. In common parlance, we let our ego feed off the attention and popularity and let it go to our heads. In a less than honorable instance, we become self-conscious and lose confidence (AKA choking).

The scriptures allude to this distinction in Psalms 115:1 and John 12:37-43, and St. John makes reference to this phenomenon in writing,

> How can you believe, when you accept glory* from one another and you do not seek the glory that is from the one and only God?
> John 5:44 (NASB)

"How can you believe… ???" Wowzers!

One cannot believe (have faith) if one loses humility and fails to recognize the Lord! Humility is key!

Case Study – King Herod

Acts 12:20-23 states that King Herod was struck by the Lord, was eaten by worms, and died because the people of Tyre and Sidon acclaimed him as a god, but he did not give the glory to the Lord.

Conclusions

2nd Corinthians 4:3-6 states that those who submit to the gods of this world (e.g. those who subscribe to all the –isms) are unable to recognize the Glory of the Lord.

We may pray that we are not counted among them in this evil age, but that we may recognize glory, however it may be manifested, and give honor, praise, and thanks to the Lord.

Furthermore, eschewing Communism, Equalism, Feminism, p0rn, and the various worldly life scripts, etc. remains insufficient for one to glorify the Lord. Staying "plugged in" to the NOW and refusing to let self-consciousness sink in (whether of conceit, popularity, pride, or shame) is a mark of steadfast faith and spiritual maturity. It's also necessary in maintaining Frame. See all the ways in the lists above in which a man can glorify the Lord!

 In lieu of "glory", the King James uses "honor", and some other translations use the word "praise".*

Disrespecting the Lord

Under the previous post, Glory (2023/3/1), Info brought up the story of how God revealed His Glory to Moses in Exodus 33:7-34:35 when the Covenant was renewed.

We know that leaders and teachers are judged more strictly (James 3:1). I was just wondering if Moses, who was the appointed leader of the Israelites, and to whom God revealed a part of His glory, was judged more harshly because of that revelation.

In Exodus 33:18, Moses asked to see the Glory of God, and in Exodus 33:23, God said He would show Moses His back but not His face.

In Numbers 20:2-13, when God instructed Moses to speak to the rock, he disobeyed and struck it. We assume that his disobedience was the act of striking the rock instead of speaking to it, or something about the number of times that he struck the rock. We assume that this was the reason why he was not allowed to enter the Promised Land.

But actually, Numbers 20:12 says,

> And the Lord said to Moses and Aaron, "Because you did not believe in me, to uphold me as holy in the eyes of the people of Israel, therefore you shall not bring this assembly into the land that I have given them."

The King James uses the words, "to sanctify Me" instead of the words, "to uphold Me as holy".

So the question is, how did Moses NOT sanctify the Lord? Perhaps the answer lies in the immediately preceding verses 10-11.

> And Moses and Aaron gathered the congregation together before the rock, and he said unto them, "Hear now, ye rebels; must we fetch you water out of this rock?"

The Split Rock of Horeb in Saudi Arabia, believed to be the rock that issued forth water for the Israelites as described in Exodus 17:1-7 and Numbers 20:2-13.
Image Source: Living Passages: Rephidim and the Split Rock of Horeb in Saudi Arabia (2023)

Perhaps that is where Moses went wrong. In that moment of anger, he used the word "we" — not "the Lord God Who brought you out of Egypt", but "we", which may have been taken by the people to mean Moses himself and Aaron who stood beside him. Whether by intent or by a verbal faux pas of passionate anger, Moses shared or tried to share in the GLORY that was due only to God.

So perhaps Moses was punished not because of his disobedience in the way he struck the rock, but because he tried to share the glory of God — the glory of which God had given him a glimpse of in Exodus 33.

Since God will NOT share HIS GLORY with a mortal man, Moses was punished.

The takeaway is this. Glorifying God is one of the most important aspects of spiritual Humility.* That is, we must always recognize the power and authority of God in our lives and revere Him as Lord. We must be dependent on God, do things in HIS strength and for HIS GLORY. Anytime we do things in our own strength and for our own glory, we are guilty of idolatry and we will be judged for that.

It's kind of like how important it is for women to show respect to men.* Even if a woman obeys everything her father or husband tells her to do — to a T, but she doesn't do it with an attitude of humility and respect, then all her work is in vain. No points scored!

We need to be constantly reminded to give God the glory because it's easy for us to forget or neglect this — just as it is easy for wives to forget or neglect to respect their husbands at all times.

* Σ Frame often talks about (1) the importance of humility and (2) the Christ : Church :: Husband : Wife analogy, so I've learned to see things through these lenses.

Glorifying God in the Flesh

Good afternoon, Gentlemen!

Jack asked me to write something about Glory, and I responded quickly and with enthusiasm. BUT, as I started down the path of actually putting my thoughts to 'paper' I pulled up short. The task is not as simple as first glance.

So I'm gonna take a swing at this, I'm probably going to fall flat on my face, but isn't that the purpose of this blog? To think about things, debate, and argue with other men to get to the TRUTH? Iron sharpens iron and all that.

Since I'm an engineer by trade, lets see if we can get to the fundamentals and then build something actionable, because studying without action is just navel gazing, be it spiritual or otherwise, and I LOATH MEN like that.

Foundational

> Glorify, transitive VERB (meaning ACTION you navel gazers!)
> to make glorious by bestowing honor, praise, or admiration

Hmmm… Well, how am I gonna do this without having that person in front of me? I mean I can bow to a king, sing his praises, fall on my face, go to where he's at and say all these things. Kinda hard since he's not "here" walking the earth. ACTION! Remember?

So let me take another swing at this.

Why were we placed on this earth? Why was I born, why were you born?

> everyone who is called by my name, > whom I created for my glory, > whom I formed and made.
> Isaiah 43:7 (ESV)

Well that's pretty simple, I was created and formed and made to glorify God.

So how do a I, a man, given a body, soul and spirit, glorify my Creator?

He must have made a way a simpleton like me could Glorify a infinite being. How do I know this?

> Righteousness and justice are the foundation of your throne; > steadfast love and faithfulness go before you.
> Psalm 89:14 (ESV)

So we've established that God created us to glorify him, and he's a just God. So the logical conclusion is that he equipped me glorify him. He wouldn't give me a task without giving me the tools to do it right?

God has equipped each of us with a unique set of tools to glorify Him.

Now a quick side bar, for those who look onto others with envy or jealously about how God made another man. Seriously, God made you exactly the way He wanted to. He doesn't make mistakes, so why are looking at another man wishing you had what he was gifted with? Don't let pride or envy get in the way of doing right. This is like stepping on your own Johnson! It hurts and doesn't do you any good.

Let's look at these tools. We all have skills, strengths, and of course, weaknesses. Let's call these our earthly gifts. I might not be able to compose a symphony like Beethoven, but I'll bet I can dig a better ditch and probably faster than he could. Does that make him greater than me? Well… yeah, if the contest is who can write better music. Or on the flip side, if it's about who can dig a deeper hole, I could kick his @ss!

But that's not what we are talking about. God is a just God. He grades each of us individually. Each of us are given a set of basic tools in this life, and what he does to improve and strengthen them is what is important. I view these earthly gifts like genetic traits. You are given the basics; God expects you to do something with them… like to glorify Him.

Bring forth the blind people that have eyes, and the deaf that have ears. ~ Isaiah 43:8 (ESV)

How Does a Man Glorify God in the Flesh?

We might be astounded at the esoteric grandeur of this seemingly monumental task, but I think it's really not that difficult to understand.

Let's say there is a man who is 6'10" and has excellent eye-hand coordination, but he sits around smoking weed and playing video games until he dies. Everyone would say he "wasted his life". Maybe.

OTOH, let's say the same man develops the basics that God gave him and he plays for the NBA. But just like many men in the NBA, he becomes a man who wallows in sin and is a total degenerate. We would say he wasted his life just as much, in spite of his accomplishments.

Now let's flip the script. The same man plays for the NBA and thanks God for the gifts He gave him on national television. Then I would say, yep! He used the gifts God gave him to fulfill his purpose on earth.

So here is the actional task. God gave you something you are good at, music, organizing, post hole digging, building, art, basketball, photography, endurance (you can work like steam piston all day). Whatever skill that is, develop that, take pride in what you build on God's given foundation, quietly thank God for what he gave you, and SHARE IT WITH THE WORLD. This is one of the ways you can glorify God.

Andre Iguodola, Christian NBA Basketball player.
Image Source: WayNation: 5 Players in the NBA Who Have Spoken About Their Faith (2018/5/31)

Let me give you a personal example. I have an eye for photography. I'm good enough that I could quit being an engineer and do photography full time. I didn't get to this level on the first day. I had to practice. A LOT! I've taken 10's of thousands of pictures to become this good.

But how I do I choose to use this physical gift? I capture those precious moments of friends and family and give it to them, for free! Why? Because I want to share what God gave me. Because it shows He gave me something and I'm using it! But this is just one of the many ways I give glory to God. I do the very best I can in my actions, knowing in my heart and mind that God gave me this gift to Glorify Him.

Epilogue

Boiling it down to it's essence, God made YOU to glorify Him. He gave YOU all the building blocks to do this. Figure out where your foundation is strongest (remember, the Perfect Creator knows what He gave you) and build up from there.

> "So then, whether you eat or drink, or whatever you do, do all to the glory of God."
> 1st Corinthians 10:31 (ESV)

It doesn't matter what it is, music composition, ditch digging, taking pictures, investigative journalism, or whatever… Anything!

Image Source: 4 Brother's Blog: Digging Ditches to Be Happy (2016/11/13)

> Whatever your hand finds to do, do it with your might, for there is no work or thought or knowledge or wisdom in Sheol, to which you are going.
> Ecclesiastes 9:10 (ESV)

Build it up to the best of your abilities.

> [23] Whatever you do, work heartily, as for the Lord and not for men, [24] knowing that from the Lord you will receive the inheritance as your reward. You are serving the Lord Christ.
> Colossians 3:23-24 (ESV)

Show people what God made you to do, bless the lives of others, and always give Him all the credit and praise.

> And whatever you do, in word or deed, do everything in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God the Father through him.
> Colossians 3:17 (ESV)

If you always remember where this gift came from, then you will be glorifying God to best of your fleshly body.

I haven't gone into the spiritual side of things on purpose. That will be the next action plan.

Glorifying God through Obedience

Ministry, as simple and mundane as it may be, is most important to God.

Hoary Glory

One observation I have on the topic of glory is that I think the very word, glory, tends to make human minds wander to the grandiose. In reality, I think we as humans glorify God in the simple and mundane more than we might think, as these are just as much created by God and subject to his sovereignty as the seemingly big ticket events. Since the majority of our lives are spent on the simple and mundane, and if the simple and mundane truly glorifies the Lord, then perhaps this is just as God intended. The trouble with this view is in thinking that glorifying the Lord through the simple and mundane is boring and thankless and thus losing motivation.

Another observation Jack had is that glorifying God is like practicing for a stage play. Long days and months go into the practice and preparation, all for a 2 hour performance. WhiteGuy1's example of the NBA basketball star giving credit to God matches this view. Others see it as a grandiose accomplishment, and it is. But at some point, that has to be both challenging and mundane. That's just how life goes.

So to sum up, there are two contrasting impressions about glorifying God that are unproductive and wrong-headed simply because they reframe our existential purpose of glorifying God as a vexing task.

1. Glorifying God is grandiose and esoteric, and therefore difficult.
2. Glorifying God is boring and tedious, and therefore taxing.

Carrying either or both of these viewpoints is an indulgence of the flesh, a curse if you will. Are you knowingly and intentionally carrying this attitude? Congratulations! You played yourself!

The Glory of Obedience

Matthew 25:40-45 gives us a clue to God's views on the matter. This is the passage where God tells us that what we've done for the least of these people we have done for Him.

There is certainly an element of obedience in this passage, as we are instructed by God for how to treat others. Upon examining obedience to God more closely, it is certainly a form of glorifying God and might be the foundation upon which rests all of our purpose of glorifying God. Thinking about this more as I'm typing, I am certain of it. To disobey is to dishonor, as the very act of disobedience is to put oneself above the One giving the command. It's rather the opposite of giving glory to Him.

So then, we bring glory to God through obedience and obedience happens in all the small, quiet moments of life in much greater number than the few big memorable events. In fact, the daily grind is necessary in order to make those big events happen.

We use our abilities, gifts, intellect, skills, and material possessions to further the Kingdom because we know that all these blessings are on loan from the Father, given to us to use for His purposes. Sometimes the use is for the extraordinary, but most of the time for the seemingly ordinary aspects of life. It helps to keep in mind that everything we have is from God and that without his provision we'd have nothing. This is why claiming that blessings are of one's own doing, aside from the very idea being false, is a slap in the face to God.

The price of glory. If he said he fell off his bike (or whatever) on purpose in order to win the costume contest, he would be derided as a crazy idiot. God is better glorified if he said falling off his bike was an act of God, or if he simply kept his mouth shut.

The Glory of Purpose

Also in this passage, the focus is not on whether it is enjoyable, or profitable, or efficient, or even beneficial for either ourselves or the recipient. No, these concerns come from our own subjective human viewpoint which has a strong aversion to expense, inconvenience, and any kind of suffering. Remember brothers, there's a special accommodation in ɦəl1 just for wimps!

God has made us His trustees over our own personal domain of authority and influence. So instead of putting our own pleasures first, the focus is on ministering to the physical and spiritual needs of others so that the Kingdom of God may take root, grow, and expand. This is what glorifies God.

This is not Moses hiding his face from the Israelites because his countenance was reflecting God's glory. No, it is the long slog through life, acting in kindness when kindness is not a given, and patiently clinging to a strand of hope. Think Mother Teresa instead of the Pope.

This is not to say that glorifying God is always equivalent to or synonymous with brutal suffering. As Jack wrote in this month's introductory post, glorifying God also involves effervescent joy, especially when we are blessed to see our family members, friends, and loved ones grow in Christian love, faith, and spiritual maturity. Self-sacrifice is merely a small but essential part — but it can be a stumbling block in fulfilling our purpose if we wish to avoid it at all costs.

Intended as a thought provoking satire.

Epilogue

In summary, glorifying God is giving the gift of ourselves to others, and that involves obedience, purpose, and suffering. Put crassly, CH style, we are God's gift to them! It might come across as arrogant to say so, but it's not a bad attitude to have. However, buried underneath this ostensibly proud outlook is a well-owned humility and that onerous and opprobrious state of inconvenience and suffering. If we are not sufficiently boned up on prayer and scripture, and mature enough to maintain our own hope and joy in the Lord, then we're prone to backsliding into the default state of basic awareness — having a negative view of our lot in life.

The TLDR on Suffering

Jack · 10 March 2023 · Archived copy · Original

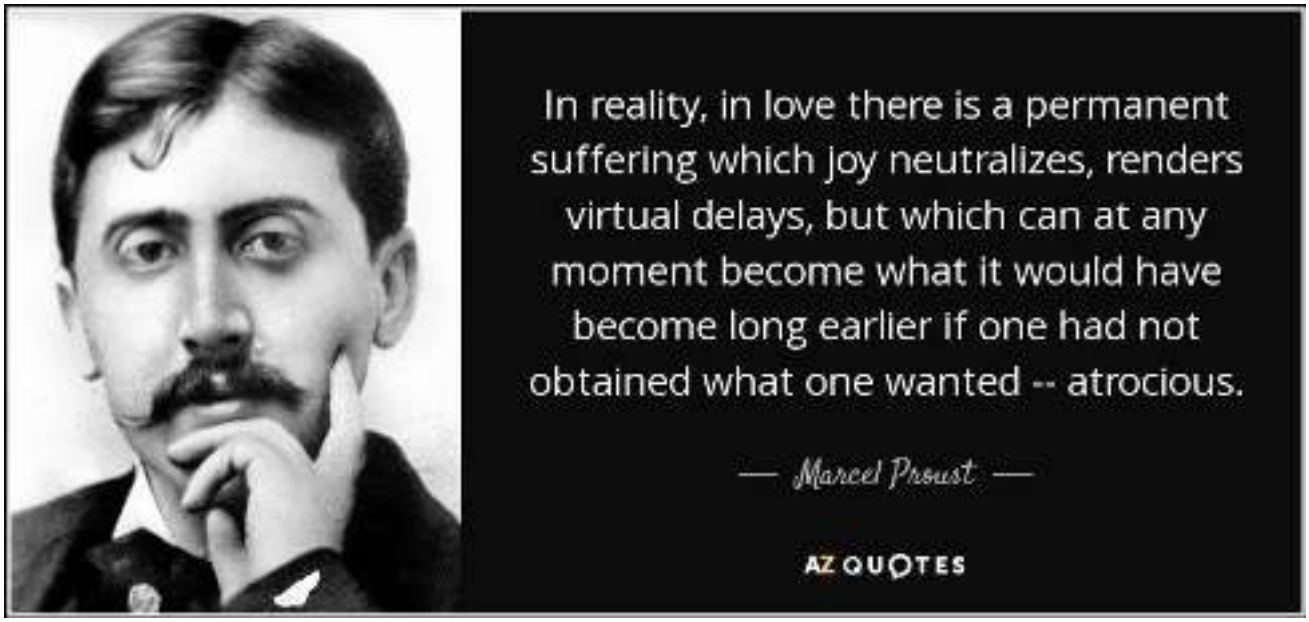
What is the purpose of suffering?

Readership: All
Theme: Glory
Length: 1,700 words
Reading Time: 8.5 minutes

Introduction

In the last couple posts, it's been said in many words that Suffering is an intrinsic part of glorifying God. So let's get down to this.

For thousands of years, there's been a lot of talk and debate on the whys and wherefores of Suffering. This is most notable in Christian traditions, but it extends to the secular philosophers as well.



The most common Gnostic argument is that as long as God allows Suffering, then either He is not loving, or He is not omnipotent. But this is a very solipsistic syllogism that fails to account for the reason why God allows it, and the overall purpose of Suffering. So it comes off as whiny and complainy, especially to God.

Here, I want to make a clean break away from all the philosophizing of the past about Suffering and lay things out clearly in actionable, transferrable knowledge.

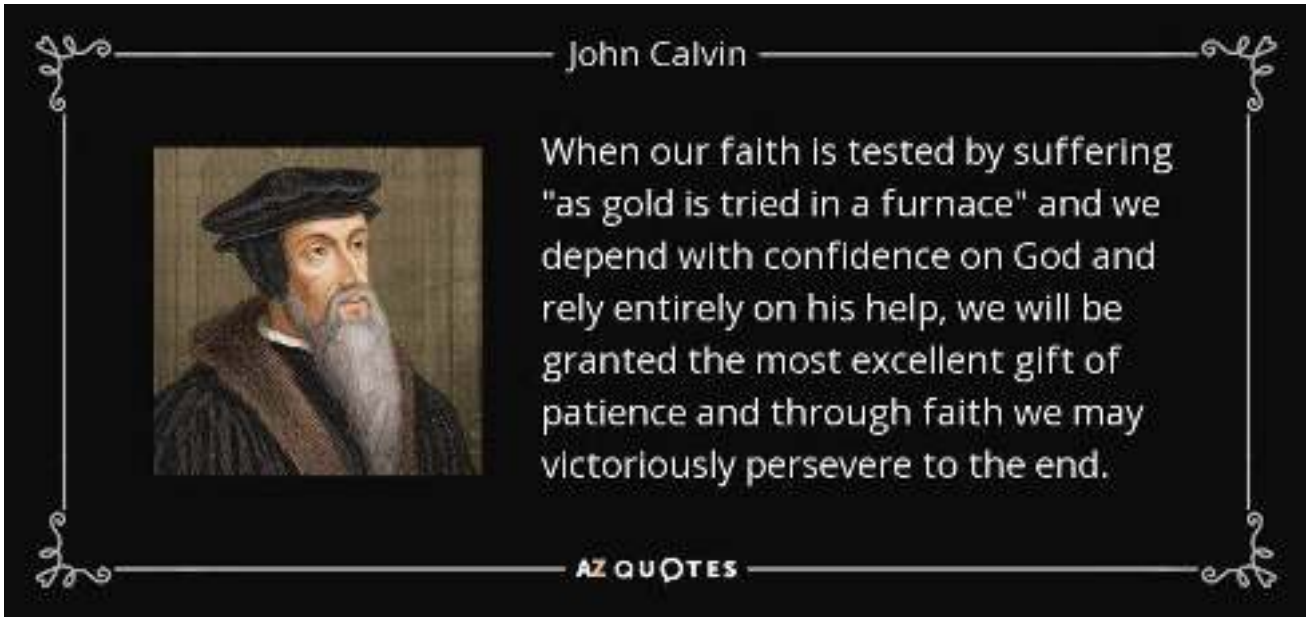
Sources of Suffering

Basically, there are five reasons or sources of suffering, summarized as thus.

1. Suffering as a consequence* of one's own foolishness, sin, or poor decisions.
2. Suffering as a consequence* of other's foolishness, sin, or poor decisions.
3. Suffering from persecution for being holy and righteous in a sinful world. For example, when one is salt and light, it has the unintended effect of putting others to shame, making them envious, making them feel guilty, pressuring them to do better and to be better, and so on. People detest this, and begin to harass and persecute the righteous in response.
4. Suffering from intense unresolved desires or unmet needs.

5. Suffering as a result of a spiritual awakening in which one gains an increased knowledge of God, human nature, and/or one's self. For example, Faith, Hope, Joy, Love, and Temptation can all be both a cause and a consequence of suffering.

* The word "consequence" is left open ended, and may include guilt, loneliness, regret, rejection, shame, and many other forms of suffering.



As you can see, 1, 2, and 3 are a consequence of living in a world broken by sin. Number 4 is a common malady of the human state. Number 5 is a symptom of being spiritually alive.

We can be thankful that God, in His infinite mercy, has limited our human suffering to these five basic sources. (…in this life. In the next life, there are other types of sufferings awaiting those who reject the grace of God, and I would not reject the idea that there may be sufferings of an entirely different sort in heaven.)

I'll refer to these five contexts in the following sections.

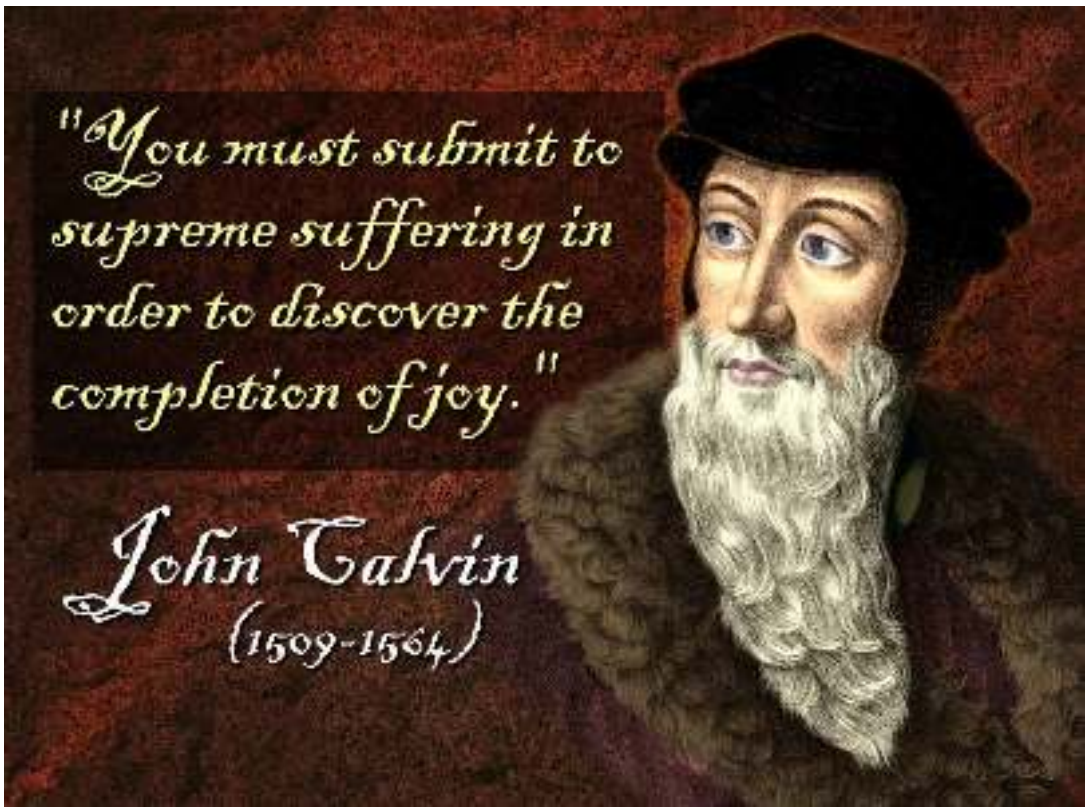
Purposes of Suffering

The purpose of pain is to inform us that something is wrong with the body. Similarly, one purpose of suffering is to inform us that something is wrong with our soul. This is not always the case, but it is rather common.

Suffering also acts as an incentive for us to get our lives together. However, not all suffering is redemptive, depending on how we respond to it. (More on this in the next section.)

Another purpose of suffering is to draw us closer to the Lord. God's Word and His discipline serves to drive and turn our hearts towards the knowledge of Him. This kind of Suffering is usually characterized by disappointment and grief as we discover that the things of this world cannot satisfy. Whenever we face these trials in life it is best to accept it as the hand of God's discipline. What is required to draw one nearer to God is dependent on the constitution of the person and the context. IOW, God deals with us individually as unique patients.

A fourth reason is to share in Christ's sufferings and also become partakers of the glory and joy found in Him (Philippians 2:12-16).



Moreover, the purposes for suffering are as follows (corresponding with the previous list).

1. To get us to repent of our own foolishness and sin, and/or to emphasize the importance of being responsible and making good decisions.
2. To get us to choose our friends wisely, and to draw boundaries. It is also an occasion to exercise forgiveness and grow in grace.
3. To glorify God, to share in the sufferings of Christ, and to inspire others to faith.
4. To break our selfish will and sense of self-sufficiency (which erodes humility), teach us to become continually dependent on God, and to bring us to our knees in prayer, asking for those things we want or need. The asking, suffering, and waiting also makes us more humble and more appreciative of the gift, once it is received.
5. To lead us to desire being liberated from the fallen flesh and the mortal confines of this evil world, and to be one with God.

For the Christian, and in general, suffering appears as a multi-faceted form of discipline (Hebrews 12), and in this sense, suffering is the kindness of God to bring those He loves closer to Him (Romans 2:1-4). IOW, we move away from 1, 2, and get more of 3 and possibly 4, ultimately arriving at 5. Only 1 and 2 could be interpreted as a punishment, or the righteous judgment of God. 3 is training in righteousness and it builds character (Romans 5:3-5; James 1:2-4). 4 is often referred to as being tempted or tested (James 1:12-18). 5 is evidence of regeneration and/or salvation.

Responses to Suffering

Perhaps the trickiest part of suffering is in knowing how one should respond. Is it Endure, Fight, Flight, Fold, or Wait? The proper response all depends on what type of suffering we're facing and why. If one cannot pinpoint the reason for the suffering, then one may be confused about how to respond appropriately. Our response is important because if we do not respond appropriately, unnecessary suffering may be prolonged and then becomes more destructive than redemptive.

Here, I'll offer some commentary and describe a few ways in which we may not respond to suffering appropriately, corresponding to the previous list. I'm sure there are others. Readers are encouraged to add to these in the comments.

1. The most common wrong way people deal with the suffering that is caused by 1, and also 2 and 4, is through Spiritual Anesthetization which usually appears as a form of Carnal Stimulation (e.g. alcohol, drugs, entertainment, illicit sex, masturbation, p0rn, etc.). Other methods include Avoidance, Denial, Displacement, Lying, and a whole host of psychological defense mechanisms (e.g. blame and shame games, personality disorders, projection, psychopathologies, etc.). It requires a traumatic life experience or an act of God to shake one up and out of this mess, which means more suffering!
2. Number 2 happens to be a major ongoing subject of discussion in the Red Pill / Manosphere, and it is the cause of many fractious factions (e.g. The Black Pill, MGTOW, et al.) In addition to the consequences of bad governance, inept rulers, p!ss poor policies, various conspiracy theories, and so on, how do men deal with a whole generation (or more) of women who have made foolish decisions and have defrauded men en masse? The writers at Σ Frame have covered the latter angle exhaustively with posts such as Constructing a Framework of Options (2021/3/15), More on the Framework of Options (2021/3/22), Ethical Issues Surrounding the Christian Conundrum (2021/4/5), The Cross of Our Age (2021/5/3), The Rupture of the Marriage Market Place (2021/7/14), The Young Man's Problem (2022/2/4), The Unsolvable Problem of The Modern Sexual / Relationship Market (2022/2/7), What is the Black Pill? (2022/9/13), The Black Pill is the Natural Outcome of the Secular Mating Paradigm (2022/9/14), Black Pill Competition (2022/9/15), and Holding Out (2022/12/2). There is no real solution except more suffering. However, I proposed a few proper responses to this suffering in Men's Role in the Mess (2022/12/21).
3. Satan has a very tricky way of sucking the life out of our souls and gradually turning our hearts away from God by convincing us that we're suffering for the sake of righteousness, when in fact, we're only suffering for the sake of our self-righteous ego. Or alternatively, we've bought into some insidious true lies and therefore don't have our heads screwed on straight. IOW, were suffering for 1 while thinking we're suffering for 3, so we never get the memo and recognize the pain as discipline or punishment. One example of this has been described in The Delusion of the Good (2022/8/19) and The Lie of Romantic Love (2023/2/3) in which many Blue Pill fables are mistaken for Christian morality. Another example is how many proponents of the Purity Movement applied themselves to a lifestyle of self-denial and suffering for sexual purity or “God”, resulting in many of them falling away. Waking up from these seemingly true lies is another grand mal ordeal of suffering in itself, as was described in The Ever Looming Black Pill (2022/9/12) and Discerning the Lies (2023/2/6).

4. Another context in which we lose out is when we chase after our desires, thinking that we’re going to get something good from God. This kind of situation has been described in many posts, including Are you a man or a mushroom? (2020/8/17), How to Assume the Missionary Position (2023/1/27), Are Men Responsible for Women’s Behavior? (2023/2/1), Lust (2023/2/10), Why are attractive women more dangerous to beta men than their less attractive friends? (2023/2/13), The Disappointments of Transactional Relationships (2023/2/14), and The D@mning Power of Humility (2023/2/15). As I described in Contentment (2023/1/16), God gives us the desires of our hearts after a period of obedience, and as Scott has mentioned in the past, it comes at a moment when we least expect it. So it does us no good to go chasing after it.
5. Any movement closer to God, Obedience, Righteousness, and/or Truth involves some kind of suffering, just as Christ illustrated. Not knowing the difference between one source of suffering and another, not knowing how to respond appropriately, or avoiding suffering altogether, are all unproductive and unregenerative.

The links I included above are just a smidgeon of examples out of the 800+ posts on Σ Frame. Come to think of it, this whole blog is about how to deal with suffering.

> [7] For a man indeed ought not to cover his head, since he is the image and glory of God; but woman is the glory of man. [8] For man is not from woman, but woman from man.

A Once Glorious Culture

We — in the West at least — live in the ruins of a formerly glorious culture. Influenced by the Christian faith, this place, formerly known as Christendom, built a civilization unlike anything the world had known before. Not that glorious civilizations had never existed before, but they had never been built upon this idea: that we, each and every one of us, are created in the image of the Glorious Creator of the universe. Propelled by this belief, Western civilization accomplished great feats.

Neuschwanstein Castle, in Bavaria, Germany (Video)

With the solid foundation of Scripture as the ultimate source of Truth, the glory of God shone through in the music, the architecture, and the arts of Western civilization. There was, as there always is of course, iniquity, injustice, and a deep need for repentance. What distinguished these people was that many of them knew where to find the grace in a time of need (Hebrews 4:16) as well as the virtue to walk upright and to live a righteous life.

A Once Glorious Femininity

At the heart of this scientific and religious awakening was the family. Men and women worked together — worked very hard, in fact — to build lives of meaning, rooted in a commitment to glorifying God and to the propagation of the Gospel. Patriarchal society was commonplace, and although there were, as always, rumblings of feminist revolt, few women were interested in political or marketplace power. Most women understood the true glory of femininity as God designed it. They were happy being the glory of the glory as Paul described in the above Scripture verses.

This is an excerpt from an article in The Atlantic dated 1903:

> "In 1895 the women of Massachusetts were asked by the state whether they wished the suffrage. Of the 575,000 voting women in the state, only 22,204 cared for it enough to deposit in a ballot box an affirmative answer to this question. That is, in round numbers, less than four per cent wished to vote; about ninety-six per cent were opposed to woman suffrage or indifferent to it."
> The Atlantic: Why Women Do Not Wish the Suffrage (1903/9)

In 1903, roughly 96% women understood the true glory of femininity as God designed it. The vast majority of women understood that women's glory — if there was to be any at all — was to be found in her role as helper to her husband, as a mother to her children, and in service to her community.

First Born, by Gustave Leonard de Jonghe (1863)

From the same 1903 Atlantic article:

> "Woman does not wish to turn aside from her higher work, which is itself the end of life, to devote herself to government, which exists only that this higher work may be done. Can she not do both? No!"
> The Atlantic: Why Women Do Not Wish the Suffrage (1903/9)

Our foremothers were overruled however, when their daughters, granddaughters, and great granddaughters were subsequently indoctrinated into the mess we see today.

The deceiver induced Christian women to failure and shame. In her sincere yet misled desire to bring "dignity" to femininity, women cast off the good gift of feminine glory that God bequeathed to us, thereby losing all dignity and the honor of being the weaker vessel.

Because successive generations of women have disdained their place of honor in the home and their purpose in the marital bed, we now live in a world where a slim majority of people, mostly liberal feminists cut from the same cloth as the suffragettes, have turned the world upside down in the name of a social justice and tr@nsgender movement that most people reject.

Returning Home

Women's preference for the pleasure, security, and ease of being a Stay-at-Home-Wife is an oft overlooked Red Pill truth. Women's innate savoir-faire of beauty, family, home, and relationships is an oft-neglected practice. The fact that women possess these traits astonishes our current sensibilities given that modern women no longer understand that being the "glory of the glory" is also truly glorious, an ornament of grace adding to the greater glory of God.

How then, does woman fulfill her purpose, to glorify God and enjoy Him forever? She does this by recognizing that her glory is not in her individual accomplishments, nor the usurpation of a role which she was not designed to fulfill. She takes on the mind of Christ:

> Have this mind among yourselves, which is yours in Christ Jesus, who, though he was in the form of God, did not count equality with God a thing to be grasped, but emptied himself, by taking the form of a servant…
> Philippians 2:5-7a (ESV)

God's assignment of woman as companion and helper was not an afterthought. It wasn't an inferior designation. At least, not in the sense that we define inferior. To the contrary, it is a role for which she is perfectly made and suited. It can only be properly embraced, however, when God is the focus rather than the self.

We see this repeatedly in Scripture. Consider the rare jewel of a wife described in Proverbs 31. She makes the house into a blessed home. Her renown increases her husband's esteem. Her virtue induces her children to call her blessed. She is known for her service to the poor and needy. The glory of God shines through her as a wife, a mother, and in service to her community. Also see 1 Peter 3:1-7 and Titus 2:3-5.

Epilogue

Man is the glory of God. The woman is the glory of the man. She is the glory of the glory, yet too misguided to know that she is incapable, in her own power, of creating a glory that outshines the brilliance of the Lord.

The word of God is glorified (the opposite of blasphemed), when women who have lived longer teach the younger generations of women within their spheres of influence:

> [4] so that they may encourage the young women to love their husbands, to love their children, [5] to be sensible, pure, workers at home, kind, being subject to their own husbands, so that the word of God will not be dishonored.
> Titus 2:4-5 (NASB)

To do this, and do it well, requires a renewing of the mind.

However, our culture continually induces us away from the level of prayer, study, and introspection that would allow us to come to ourselves and see life for what it is. Is it any wonder that when the world looks at us, it does not see our good works and glorify our Father in heaven? We've been hoodwinked right out of God's best for us.

God's Glory is Obstructed by Pride

Lucifer was guilty of Pride. He put Pride in himself — a created being — above that of the Creator. To that extent, he tried to appropriate the Glory that was due to God and he tried to usurp that glory for himself. (Also see Ezekiel 28.)

Ever since the Fall, we humans have had the same disposition. The content of our character spills out in our habits and speech (Matthew 12:33-37; Luke 6:43-45).

- "I am…" — possibly a blasphemous imitation of The Great I AM.
- "I will…" — as Satan said in the scripture passages above.
- "Look at me!" — as children say.
- "The ME generation" — as Boomers think of themselves.
- "What's in it for ME?"
- The Hamster!
- Maddening addictions to "likes" on social media.
- Dressing provocatively to attract sexual attention.
- i-Gen anyone?

Actions and Voices all telling of the self-centeredness that mimics our maleficent father below.

Most women are solipsistic and crave attention, and I am no different. That attention gives me a little pat of Pride. It feeelz good to serve the Satan within the Self.

Since the theme is about Glory, I have been thinking about how Pride in myself can obscure God's Glory.

Boasting as a Symptom of Pride

Usually, we regard Boasting as a behavioural / speech pattern that is a symptom of Pride.

- I am uncomfortable being seen as one of the crowd. I have to stand out.
- I depend on external things such as branded stuff, a nice car, a new phone etc. to make myself acceptable to others.
- I exaggerate and make things up when I talk about my feelings or tell personal stories.
- I like to pretend (and sometimes truly believe) that I know best.
- When I listen to a performer or preacher or speaker, I critique them to others around me instead of listening in a spirit of introspection. Even though I voice these criticisms to others, I will not speak about it to that person directly.
- When someone else is saying something positive about themselves, I feel compelled to point out their flaws and misgivings, humble them, and bring them back down to earth.

Conflicts of Pride

Self-Pity as a Symptom of Pride

There is another form of Pride which I, as a woman, am more prone to. It is called Self-Pity. Self-Pity is a peculiar sort of self-consciousness that shows in my attitudes of indignation, persnicketyness, and unthankfulness.

- "I deserve the best."
- "I don't deserve this."
- "I deserve better than this."
- "I do not know why God is doing this to me."
- "I feel that people have been unfair to me most of my life."
- "I do not understand why _____ does not like / love me."
- "It is not fair if anyone else has something good that I do not have."

Boasting vs Self Pity

Boasting and Self Pity look very different but both have their source in the same sin — PRIDE — and they BOTH rob God of the Glory due to Him because they shift the focus from God to Self.

- I react to Self-Pity by Boasting and critiquing others.
- I respond to success with Boasting and comparing myself to others.
- Pride says, "I deserve admiration because I have achieved so much."
- I respond to suffering with both Boasting and Self-Pity.
- Pride says, "I deserve pity and special treatment because I have suffered so much."
- There is the Voice of Pride in the strong.
- There is the Voice of Pride in the weak.
- Being average is intolerable because there is no Pride in that.

The Snare of Pride, Boasting, and Self-Pity

BOTH Boasting and Self-Pity are manifestations of HUMAN PRIDE.

1. The reason Self-Pity does not look like Pride is because it appears to be needy. But this need arises from a wounded ego.
2. The desire of those given over to Self-Pitying is not really for others to see them as helpless and in need of love (which is an attitude of humility), but to be seen as a beleaguered hero.
3. The need that is felt by those given over to Self-Pity does not come from a sense of unworthiness (which is also an attitude of humility), but a sense of unrecognized worthiness. It is unapplauded pride grasping for a response of affirmation.

People stay stuck in a paradigm of sadness, Self-Pity, and Suffering because they have an ego fixation on nursing their Pride. They're trying to resolve their inner issues, looking for answers, empathy, healing, love, justice, a resolution, satisfaction, or closure. To some extent, this is a necessary part of the process of knowing one's need for Christ, God's grace, and Redemption, but at some point, they have to realize that there is no way to resolve the issue (whatever it may be) and that the only way out is to trust Christ. In order to find redemption, they have to let go of those attachments and jump to a parallel spiritual paradigm made possible through Jesus' sacrifice. IOW, they need to be born again.

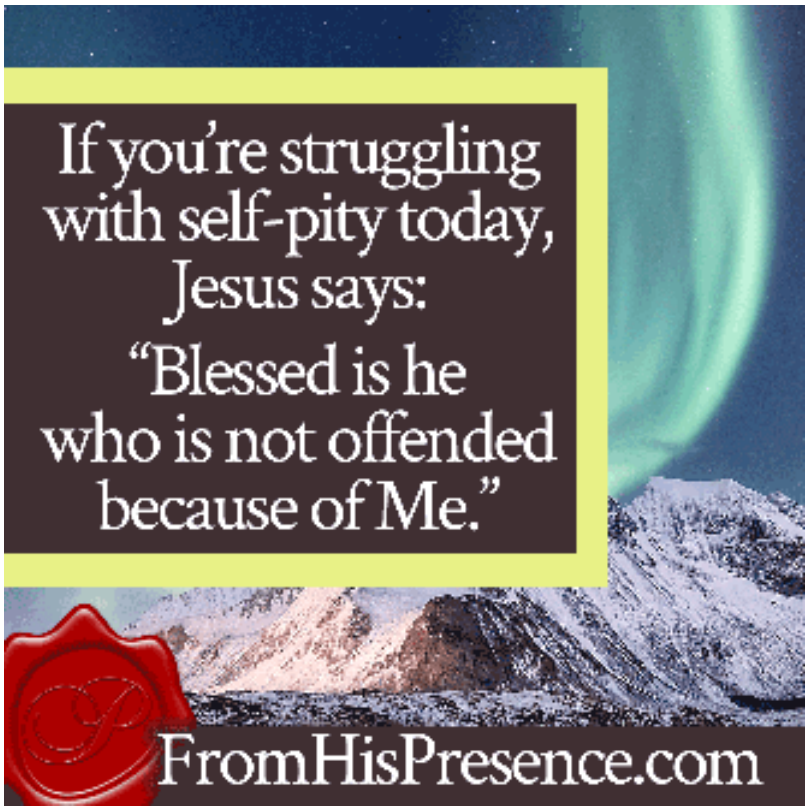
Simply put, they need to take their eyes off themselves and look to Christ (Numbers 21:4-9; John 3:14-21; 12:28-36). But people will not do this because of Pride.



Epilogue

Pride tries to misappropriate the Glory that is due to God to one's self, whether it is through Boasting OR Self-Pity.

I have counseled many young women in my church. Most of the time, their problems amount to little more than an ignorant indulgence in self-centered Pride — Boasting in various ways, Self-Pity, Solipsism, etc. Since I've struggled with the same issues (and still do), it is my job to minister to them as a service to the Kingdom. I often tell them…

> "Humility is not thinking less of YOURSELF. It is thinking of yourself LESS."
> C. S. Lewis, Mere Christianity (1952)

The difference between a joyful life and a joyless one is the same as living a life to the Glory of God vs a living a life for yourself. It is 3 simple words!

A Joyful Life is lived for Glory of God.

The Attitude: "I am grateful!"
The Action: "How can I serve you?"

A Joyless life is lived for yourself.

The Attitude: "I deserve better."
The Action: Complaining; whining; being unproductive; being preoccupied with distractions rather than one's purpose.

Biblically:

> He must increase and I must decrease.
> John 3:30 (ESV)

In Mathematical Terms: + > I (The Cross must be greater than I.)

Bottom Line: The moon has no light of its own. It reflects the sun's light. We need to be like the moon which reflects the SON!

Glorifying God Through the Courage of Upholding His Moral Laws

Author's Note: This essay was submitted by Rock Kitaro, author of Stage in the Sky, on 2023/3/11. Edited with section titles and images added by Jack.
Length: 1,300 words
Reading Time: 6.5 minutes + 2 videos totaling 10:36 minutes

Introduction

First, I want to thank Jack for reaching out by asking me to write a post on Glory.

I spoke to several church members about Glory and what it means to glorify God, and there seems to be so many ways to do so. So I decided to go with the route of glorifying God by holding up His moral laws. In this post, I'll tell you four ways to do this.

1. Take A Stand
2. Overcome Fear and Shame
3. Draw the Line on the Unacceptable
4. Raise the Bar on Commitment

1. Take A Stand

Jack said I'm like the John the Baptist of the Black Community. It's funny, but I guess it's true. Ever since I started Stage in the Sky, I've felt like I'm the lone voice calling out in the spiritual wilderness of Black content creators. "Repent of your sins!" (Matthew 3; Mark 1:2-8; Luke 3:1-14) I've never had a large following with this message, but things in the hood have been changing as of late. Let me tell you what I'm talking about.

In this five-minute video, Rev. Calvin Robinson eloquently breaks down the sin of homosexuality, sexual immorality, and why we as Christians shouldn't bow down to the ways of the world.

Christianity Commons: Why Christians shouldn't bow to "homosexual marriage" (2023/2/23) Length: 5:00

When I saw that video (and having Jack's proposed theme in mind)… I saw an awesome example of how we can glorify God. It reminds me of Stephen in the Book of Acts. It reminds me of what Jesus taught in Luke Chapter 12. Starting in verse 11, Jesus says:

> "[11] And when they bring you before the synagogues and the rulers and the authorities, do not be anxious about how you should defend yourself or what you should say, [12] for the Holy Spirit will teach you in that very hour what you ought to say."
> Luke 12:11-12 (ESV)

Do not be anxious about how to defend yourself or what to say. The Holy Spirit will essentially give you the words to say in that very moment.

That video was released over 2 weeks ago and it has already received over 2 million views and 17,000 comments! You can tell there is a great hunger, a great need for Truth. The people are lost, scattered sheep. The fields are ripe. Jesus commanded us to go forth and make disciples of all the nations (Matthew 28:18-20). That won't happen if we don't take a stand for Christ and God's Word.

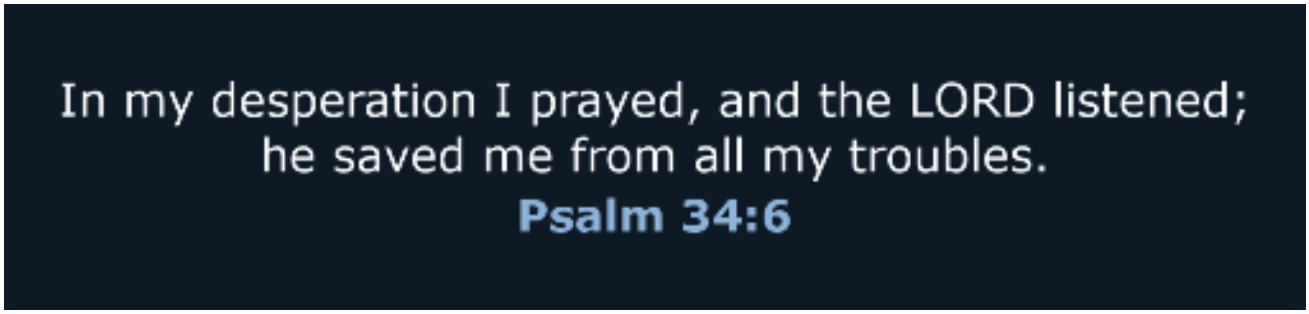
2. Overcome Fear and Shame

Yes! We need to take a stand like Rev. Robinson has done. But we can't do that if we're afraid to tell the truth.

That being said, the fear is understandable. Satan has done a bang up job of giving such power to words like B!got, Intolerant, H0m0ph0be, R@c!st, Sex!st, and Toxic. Nevertheless, until we get to the Kingdom of Heaven we have to survive in this world. We have to work and provide for ourselves and our families. If speaking the Word of God means we get fired, it's definitely understandable why many would fear glorifying God by speaking the truth.



But remember, Jesus Christ told us that the greatest commandment is to love your God with all your soul, all your mind, and all your strength (Mark 12:30). Sometimes a demonstration of love is what we're willing to sacrifice. Can we love God and make him number one in our lives while still embracing the things that God disapproves of? Even if you're just pretending to go along with the world… Is that glory?

Recall Christ's words,

> "whoever is ashamed of me and of my words, of him will the Son of Man be ashamed when he comes in his glory and the glory of the Father and of the holy angels."
> Luke 9:26 (ESV)

In a recent post I made about the Acceptance of Baby Momma culture, I had a commenter criticize me for making the video. Throughout her rant, her main issue was, "So? What is it to you? It's none of your business. Why do you care? That's their decision! It's not your problem!"

I could have backed down and taken the stance that is now so common among conservative Christians. "You do your thing. I'll do mine. (And please leave me alone!)" But instead, I responded with, "I care because I'm Christian." The second Greatest Commandment Christ taught was to love our fellow neighbor. When you love someone, you don't just sit back and say nothing as you watch a generation of your peers rushing head-long into danger.

3. Draw the Line on the Unacceptable

More honestly, people like me speak up because we see the mass saturation of stupid, wicked, and immoral advice that's constantly sprayed out via commercials, music, and social media. How many times have we heard from the secular world:

"Keep your religion to yourself! What if we don't believe what you believe! Why don't you guys just ignore these things and let people live however they want? It's none of your d@mn business!"

It's the Progressive Left's version of, "You do your thing. I'll do mine. (And please leave me alone!)" And yet these same people have no problem flaunting their lifestyles and personal beliefs, and forcing others to acquiesce to their demands, regardless of whether or not God-fearing Christians agree with them.

Sexual immorality. Drag Queen Story hour. The Breakdown of Gender Roles. Gender C0nvers!on. Hyped Up Feeel Good Humanitarianism (i.e. human idolatry). Pride Parades. Self-Love. Sex positivity. S1ut Walks. Or even amoral ideologies in law (No Fault Divorce, Duluth, Widespread Abortion and Birth Control, Euth@nas!a), politics (unfettered immigration), medicine (v@xx mandates), mainstream religions, r@c!al beliefs, and special interest movements, whether it's with BeeEllEm or Feminism. And the list keeps growing every year…

All of this is unacceptable!!!

But the moment you bring God's Word into it, we're expected to keep it to ourselves. And of course, we all know why. Don't we. The moment you bring God's Word into it, their issue is no longer with you. They're now faced with the undeniable choice of accepting God's Word or rejecting it. That's why they get livid in debates and say things like, "I don't want to know what the Bible says. I want to know what you say!" AS IF a Christian's personal views would be any different from what the Bible preaches. Obviously, it's a set up designed to dig up your doubts, separate you from God's Word, and hook you into their false rhetoric.

It's long past time we opened our eyes to what is going on. We need to draw the line like Jason Whitlock does in this video on D!$ney's R@c!al Pride propaganda where he calls it out for the idolatry that it is.

4. Raise the Bar on Commitment

I call upon others to glorify God not just when it's convenient, not just when it's safe… but every chance you get to help save the life of another. Especially in moments where you see Satan's minions hard at work trying to corrupt those around you. Don't give in to apathy or fear! (Jude 1:17-23)

This is a bit of dark comedy, but it reminds me of when people say, "The only way to stop an active shooter is with another shooter." That's how I feel when I see someone spreading Satanic influence. The only way to combat that is with God's Word.

I encourage everyone to pray and ask for God to bless you with His Holy Spirit, to say the right words, to say it with love and kindness, and to exercise wisdom, to know when it's a trap, and to recognize that very often, your real audience isn't the person you're speaking to. It's those who happened to be listening in on the conversation (c.f. John 12:28-30).

The Glorious Warlord

The Warlord

In one of my comments under a previous post, I noted that the Hebrew word most often translated into English as "glory" is variously transliterated as kavod or kabod. You can look it up in Strong's Concordance or some other dictionary, but the history of the word itself arises from the most primitive linguistic sources reaching back into the time when the Ancient Near East was dominated by nomad sheikhs. This is how Jehovah most frequently portrays Himself. Almost everything in the Books of Moses in particular reflects this image of God as a tent-dwelling eastern potentate. The Tabernacle is a very fancy version of a standard sheikh's court. Most of the imagery is the same symbolism translated into a higher level. For example, instead of fan-waving servants, the Mercy Seat has winged angelic creatures.

The ancient tribal societies never actually had a king in terms of a monarch, but simply a warlord. A man became the chief by his ability not only to fight, but to lead others in victorious battles. That's where the fundamental role of king comes from. Thus, when you chase down the word "glory" in Hebrew culture, it echoes the idea of someone who is marked by military prowess. Thus, to refer to Jehovah as "glorious" first and foremost refers to His excellence in handling opposition.

That Hebrew word kavod is synonymous with a weapon of war, such as a bow or a shield. But even the idea of a weapon might be symbolic for something else. Unlike the western tradition of kings, who were primarily land owners, eastern kings were heads of extended family households — their treasure was their people. Thus, their people were also their glory, whatever glory they were going to have. A nomad sheikh could lose all of his property, but as long as he had his people, he could recover material possessions through them. Thus, having good people was of the ultimate importance. A sheikh might even go so far as to adopt a particularly useful bunch of people into his household. His reputation or glory rested on what he could accomplish with his household.

The Peacepussy

> And He was giving orders to them, saying, "Watch out! Beware of the leaven of the Pharisees, and the leaven of Herod."
> Mark 8:15 (NASB)

The "leaven of the Pharisees" is obviously legalism, and the "leaven of Herod" is what we might now call "compromising for the sake of peace", AKA "convergence" in Red Pill parlance, or in some cases, ressentimenalism. Watch out for these!

Under WhiteGuy1's post, Glorifying God in the Flesh (2023/3/6), there was a discussion about God's purpose in our lives and someone made an argument based on the assumption that we are supposed to make this world a better place, as if that was a major purpose. Well, if this world is all there is, that's a reasonable assumption. But the Bible says flatly that this world is transitory, that it is slated for destruction. Further, that destruction will wipe away everything mankind has done, so that nothing will be remembered in Eternity.

I mean "the world" in the biblical sense, not creation itself. The worldly zeitgeist presses towards a plethora of goals that are presumably concerned with making this world a better place, e.g. suffrage and feminism, SeeArtTee r@c!sm, Politically Correct hogwash, hype about global warming and saving the ecology, lockdowns and the "v@xx", eradicating poverty, equal opportunity, eliminating "toxic" masculinity, muh democruhcy, coddling the underprivileged, creating a utopian society, and so on. All these endeavors play masterfully upon people's desires, fears, and insecurities like a banjo. When an allegiance towards these goals is assigned a pseudo-moral value, it is then weaponized through accusation and shame within Progressive Identity Politics. Jesus flatly stated that all these sorts of goals are a human effort of the flesh that work against the Kingdom of God. Participating in these efforts only has value as much as it glorifies, honors, and promotes faith in the Lord, if at all possible. (For example, see Matthew 26:6-13.) Participating in these activities for the sake of catharsis, sympathy, virtue signaling, or covering one's own @ss is a net negative for the glory of His Kingdom.

What is Worth Fighting For?

Similarly, there has been an ongoing stew about "Saving the seeds of civilization while the fire rushes over the forest." and the value thereof. Jack broke this down into three camps, Civilizationists, Nihilists, and Preservationists, but I think this too misses the point from God's perspective. If by "civilization" we are talking about the economic / social / political / philosophical traditions based on Rousseau and the Enlightenment, and a capitalistic democracy that is based on that system,* then we are referring to "the world". The fruits of this system are Individualism, Materialism, and the sinful pride of life, all of which, BTW, is what fuels Identity Politics and The Status Signaling Narrative. In this lens, one is working against the Lord by preserving said civilization while the fire of God's judgment and wrath rushes it towards its demise.

If however, by "civilization" you mean a large number of families characterized by Headship and living in Covenant fellowship, then we have something to discuss that is in God's interests. In this case, each man is the head of his household and a Warlord fighting in the interests of his dominion / mission / family / clan / tribe. In this view, one is working for the Lord by preserving said civilization while the fires of this world persecute and harass us.

The latter has the potential to glorify the Lord. The former glorifies humanity and demonizes and rejects those things which bring glory to God. I am deeply uncomfortable with the way most professing Christians fail to see any difference between these two paradigms. This ignorance is what fuels all the endless debate.

 Marxism and communism is just another flavor of "the world" which has been presented to the West as a threat in order to employ a Hegelian Dialectic. But as time goes on, we see socialism churning in the west, and capitalism growing out of previously communist countries. This should come as no surprise to the Christian, because they're all the same thing referred to as "the world" in the Bible.*

Conclusions

The Ancient Near East archetype of the Warlord is now seen as archaic and barbarous through modern sensibilities. But this archetype is not incongruent with the nature of the Lord. It is that our modern sensibilities have become so comatose, indolent, and effeminate that we would view it in this way. Modern men have no idea what truly brings glory to the Lord.

A warlord may stop to smell the flowers on his way home after a battle, or else push up daisies if it ended badly. But he'll never forfeit a battle because he's too afraid that soldiers would trample the flowers or that they might become fertilizer.

Only one of these scenarios is glorious. Know the difference.

Jesus said,

> "Do not think that I came to bring peace on the earth; I did not come to bring peace, but a sword."
> Matthew 10:34 (NASB)

Read all of Matthew 10 to get the full context. The Christian is at war against "the world".

Hopefully the implications are still obvious to us these many centuries later. Our God willingly adopts us into His household as family alongside His Son. For whatever reason, He considers us useful and potentially positive for His glory.

El Agujero del Infierno

El Salvador is the smallest country in Central America. It's smaller than New Jersey. Its population is only 6.8 million people, which is substantially smaller than that of New York City. Its GDP is smaller than that of Rhode Island. El Salvador is the least significant country in one of the least significant regions of the world. And yet, El Salvador has been all over the news all over the world lately. Why?

In one category, El Salvador has punched far, far above her weight for decades – crime. El Salvador (The Savior in Spanish) used to be known as the murder capital of the world.

The country suffered a devastating civil war from 1979-1992 in which the Soviet Union supported Communist insurgents, and the United States supported the Salvadorian government. From InfoGalactic:

> "The full-fledged civil war lasted for more than 12 years and saw extreme violence from both sides. It also included the deliberate terrorizing and targeting of civilians by death squads, the recruitment of child soldiers, and other violations of human rights, mostly by the military. An unknown number of people "disappeared" during the conflict, and the UN reports that more than 75,000 were killed."

That is an extremely mild description. The civil war gave rise to brutal criminal gangs of which MS-13 is now the most famous, although they were formed in Los Angeles by Salvadoreños escaping the effects of the civil war, then returned to El Salvador. The gangs gave rise to vigilante groups like Sombra Negra (Black Shadow in Spanish), which in some ways were even more brutal than the gangs themselves.

In short, El Salvador became a murderous hellhole. Think of the worst neighborhoods in Baltimore, only poorer.

Image from Mother Jones: PHOTOS: In El Salvador, a Gang Truce Can't Stop the Violence (2013/3/7).

La Expiación

Until recently.

In 2015, El Salvador's homicide rate was 103 homicides / 100,000 residents. In just 7 years, this figure dropped through the cellar floor to 7.8 homicides / 100,000 residents in 2022. That's comparable to the USA with just over 6 homicides / 100,000 residents in 2022.

Many credit (or blame, depending on whom you ask) El Salvador's current president, Nayib Bukele. As a staunchly conservative populist, he has been criticized for governing in an authoritarian manner. For example, on 2020/2/9, President Bukele sent forty soldiers from the Salvadoran Army into the Legislative Assembly building in an effort to coerce politicians to approve a loan request of $109 million from the United States to be used for Bukele's security plan for the country. This event is now being called The 2020 Salvadoran Political Crisis, commonly referred to as 9F or 9-F.

In this news clip, Tucker Carlson gets Bukele's view of the Salvadoran immigration crisis.

Note that President Bukele says (at 1:38),

> "Our country has failed to provide security and economic opportunity, so people leave."

He's saying this about his own regime on international news! But that's NOT an admission of failure. That's a man looking at the situation with both eyes wide open and being willing to take action. That's a president with agency and responsibility!

That's significant, because Latin American politicians invariably blame the USA for all their countries' problems, essentially denying agency and playing the victim card on a national level. Now, there is some truth to that. American meddling in Latin America has in fact damaged Latin America. However, it's also true that Latin Americans have been their own worst enemies since they gained independence from Spain. Nothing will change until Latin Americans take responsibility for their own corruption.

El Salvador

President Bukele has been heavily criticized for the draconian measures he's employed against MS-13 and other Salvadorian gangs, but it's hard to argue with the results. Ordinary Salvadoreños can finally live normal lives after 40 years of atrocious violence.

Whom does President Bukele credit for these changes? He gives the glory to God! (Bukele's speech begins around 1:00.)

I don't know how much credit President Bukele deserves — the homicide rate in El Salvador was already in steep decline before he took office — but I do know that he's right. A nation that glorifies God can't help but rise, and a nation that abandons God can't help but fail.

La Revolución

In a previous comment thread a few of us discussed how nations go through this cycle.

Tyranny → Faith → Liberty → Prosperity → Decadence (disguised as Liberty) → Chaos → Tyranny

Jack pointed out that Tyranny is necessary to restore order after a time of chaos.

This turn of the cycle is exactly what we are witnessing now in El Salvador. This country has suffered four decades of chaos, and now seems to be going through the Tyranny (reestablishing order) and Faith stages simultaneously.

May El Salvador continue to glorify God, and may others learn from their rise from chaos.

> [18] There are three things which are too wonderful for me,
> Yes, four which I do not understand:
> [19] The way of an eagle in the air,
> The way of a serpent on a rock,
> The way of a ship in the midst of the sea,
> And the way of a man with a virgin.
> Proverbs 30:18-19 (NKJV)

In this post, we'll look at three vastly contrasting arenas in which God is glorified.

1. The wild and untamed natural world
2. Masculinity
3. The backwoods bumpkin.

God is Glorified in the Wildness of Nature

Misunderstanding the nature of the Fall has continued to resurface as a sticking point of misunderstanding the basic nature of life on this planet. I addressed this question in a previous post, Is Our Fallen Nature as God Designed it? (2021/10/4). To make sure I got it right, I teamed up with NovaSeeker and Ed Hurst to help me write and double check everything. It is a must-read post, in case you missed it.

Moreover, it is not as simple as saying, "The world is fallen. The world and everything in it is corrupted by sin." This is only true if we define "world" in the biblical sense of the word. If one doesn't understand the contextual nuances (for example, the difference between "creation" and "the world"), then one is prone to fall into The Wrath of GNON* crowd which has slowly been gaining popularity.

* GNON is an acronym for the "God of the Natural Order / Nature". The primary and strategic appeal to GNON permits a consensual acceptance of Natural Law, unobstructed by theological controversy. A logical appeal to GNON enables important things to be said in contexts where, otherwise, an interminable argument would first need to be concluded. Thus, an agreement that "Reality Rules" need not be delayed until religious differences are resolved.

The GNON approach accepts as a fundamental truth one thing that is difficult for most mild mannered Progressives and theological moralizers to accept, and that is the competition for dominance and survival that is stereotypical of the Animal Kingdom and the Natural World. There is great wonder and glory in this, so much so, that it has been the subject of documentaries, National Geographic programs, and scientific research ever since the advent of the modern age.

From a humanist viewpoint, being ripped apart by claws and fangs is regarded as ruthless and cruel. But from a practical standpoint, namely that of the Animal Kingdom, it's just taking care of business, succinctly captured in the latest buzz-phrase that's been trending: "F around and find out."

It's plain and simple really. It only becomes a difficult question when we try to mix theology into it, and the essence of the truths behind creation and the glory of it all is lost when we try to reduce it to a system of logical precepts.

For example, venomous animals and poisonous plants kinda proves that humans weren't the only ones who "fell"… Same goes for lions, hyenas, and other aggressive animals. They're self-defensive. They're territorial. They defend and provide for their own, even if it comes at the life of another creature. They have these characteristics in order to compete and survive in the grand game of life, e.g. "survival of the fittest". However, tarantulas, thornbushes, tigers, and bears aren't sinful. At worst, we could say they are "unclean", according to the Old Testament. But human beings are prone to speculate upon mortal things from an eternal perspective, and that's where it gets hairy.

God is Glorified in the Masculine-Feminine Dichotomy

Likewise, one thing about masculine nature (and by extension, God) that a lot of Christians find difficult to accept as being "good", is the brutal dog-eat-dog competition to survive, dominate, and procreate. Feminism has done well in convincing us that these aspects of masculine nature are "toxic". That alone should give us a clue as to how good it is in God's eyes.

This competition extends to the SMP. Although moralizers may shudder at the ongoing immorality of it all, in the long run, human beings who fail to successfully capitalize on the opportunities presented during their youth will be outbred, outearned, and outmatched by those who do. Standardized Religion has little to do with it, although conviction and genuine faith can be a guide. Already, we are seeing a small number of men starting businesses while many others are "enjoying the decline" with a joint and a beer. Already, we are seeing many aging feminists expressing regrets over not having children, while stable communities with marriage minded gals, although few, are experiencing a boon in population. Perhaps it is God's way of cleaning disobedience, debauchery, and faithlessness out of the gene pool. Another case study of the "survival of the fittest".

The Gentile Rube

We have the common notion that a Gentile is anyone who is not a Jəw, or so we have been taught to believe. A fuller understanding of the word ethnos (Greek: ἔθνος), which is commonly translated as "Gentile", is an ethnic minority, a foreigner, or an outsider. Although the definition is given as "race" or "nation", the distinction made is not so much about Jud@!sm or even r@cial!sm as we understand it today, but rather refers to those who are NOT a member of your own tribe, ethnic group, or in-group. Remember that the authors of the Bible were Jəws, so to them, anyone who was not a Jəw would fall under this definition of ethnos.

To wit, "gentle" and "gentile" come from the same root word origin. By "gentle", think of a friendly working-class person who is very relaxed and easy-going due to his poor, diminished, or minority status in society.

God is glorified in our weaknesses. (1 Corinthians 1:26-29)
In some contexts, "Gentle" could also have the connotation of being just a step away from effeminate. IOW, those feeel-good do-gooders possessing a weak agentic capacity. After having lived abroad for many years, I can attest that foreigners must always play second fiddle and kowtow to the locals, no matter how classy, excellent, or wealthy they may be.

As a mental exercise that should prove to be a real eye-opener, replace the word "gentile" with "gentle people", foreigner, hillbilly, "deplorables", etc. whenever you read the Bible. Here's a little taste. Click on the embedded links for the suggested context.

> Therefore I will give thanks to You, O Lord, among the hillbillys / ethnic group / Taiwanese / etc., And sing praises to Your name.
> 2 Samuel 22:50 (NKJV)

> He gave them the lands of the foreigners, And they inherited the labor of the nations…
> Psalm 105:44 (NKJV)

> And He gave them into the hand of the deplorables, And those who hated them ruled over them.
> Psalm 106:41 (NKJV)

Epilogue

There is irony in how God has chosen the insignificant, the small, even shameful things of this world, the thorns, the chickens, the rednecks, etc. to glorify Himself and extol His Power.

There is irony in how Jesus wore a crown of thorns. Thorns — which sprang forth after the Fall — a symbol of sin, shame, and suffering — became Christ's crown of glory. His bloody countenance raised high with arms outspread — the physical stance of a victorious conqueror in battle — was His posture during His gruesome death on the cross.

Drama and Glory

Drama can either contribute to or detract from God's glory.

Introduction

A purview of this week's posts, The Glorious Warlord (2023/3/20), Order Out of Chaos (2023/3/22), and God is Not Gentle (2023/3/24), reveals that God is glorified in battle, in competition, conflict, opposition, and at times, the spectacular. I'll summarize this idea in one word — drama.

However, not any kind of drama can glorify the Lord. Drama can either add or detract from God's glory. This post will examine the differences.

Drama can Enhance God's Glory

Anonabaptist shared this story under Oscar's post.

> "In 1569, the Roman Catholic Church arrested and imprisoned Dutchman Anabaptist Dirk Willems for rejecting infant baptism and baptizing other believers. He escaped his confinement, but a guard noticed and gave chase.
> Willems crossed the ice of a frozen pond, but the guard chasing him fell in. The guard struggled in the icy water, crying out for help. Willems could not leave the man to die, so he returned and saved him."

> "Willems was recaptured. Shortly thereafter he was condemned and burned at the stake. During his execution, the wind was blowing so hard that Willems was not quickly consumed, prolonging his suffering. So great was his suffering that the bailiff instructed the executioner to dispatch him immediately.
> Willems would not trade another's life or liberty to save his own. Not even persecution, torture, and death could change this."

This is definitely a dramatic story. Furthermore, it has many of the elements we've identified of that which glorifies God: conflict, justice, mercy, righteousness, taking a stand, self-sacrifice, and suffering. Many stories of martyrs and saints have similar elements, and this is how they glorified God. We also glorify God whenever we hear these stories recounted.

Drama can Detract from God's Glory

Disrespecting the Lord (2023/3/3) brought up the idea that Moses was not (only) disobedient by striking the rock, but because he presumptuously used the word "we", implying that the water was produced by his own authority and not God's. (See Numbers 20:2-13.)

After this post was published, the person who submitted that essay wrote to me privately to say that it was not just that Moses said "we" — trying to make it appear that it was because of Moses and Aaron that water would come — there was the additional insult that he struck the rock instead of speaking to it as per God's instruction — thereby implying that the Word of God was not sufficient and so God needed Moses' "help". By striking the rock Moses added his own drama to the instruction… (God does not need works to be added to his Word.) So in addition to the self-glorification of saying "we", the added drama of striking the rock also took away from the Glory of God and showed HIS POWER in a poor light. (That is, speaking is not enough. He had to strike the rock for it to yield water.)

In Moses' defense, God had told him in an earlier miracle to strike the rock (Exodus 17:1-7). So the incident in Numbers 20 was the second time he was doing this.

But given the fact that he was the leader AND that God had given him a special revelation of HIS GLORY, Moses should not have been presumptuous in his taking credit for the miracle or adding to God's instruction by striking the rock instead of just speaking to it.

Moses was punished for this disobedience, but it was not as simple as him not following instructions. The article below at Ready 4 Eternity goes into Moses disobedience in more detail.

Glorifying God through Spiritual Gifts

A Recap of Earthly / Fleshly / Physical Gifts

Last time, in Glorifying God in the Flesh (2023/3/6), we looked at our earthly gifts and how we give glory to God when we use them. But after looking at the discussions we've had, there still seems to be confusion over spiritual and earthly gifts and what that exactly means.

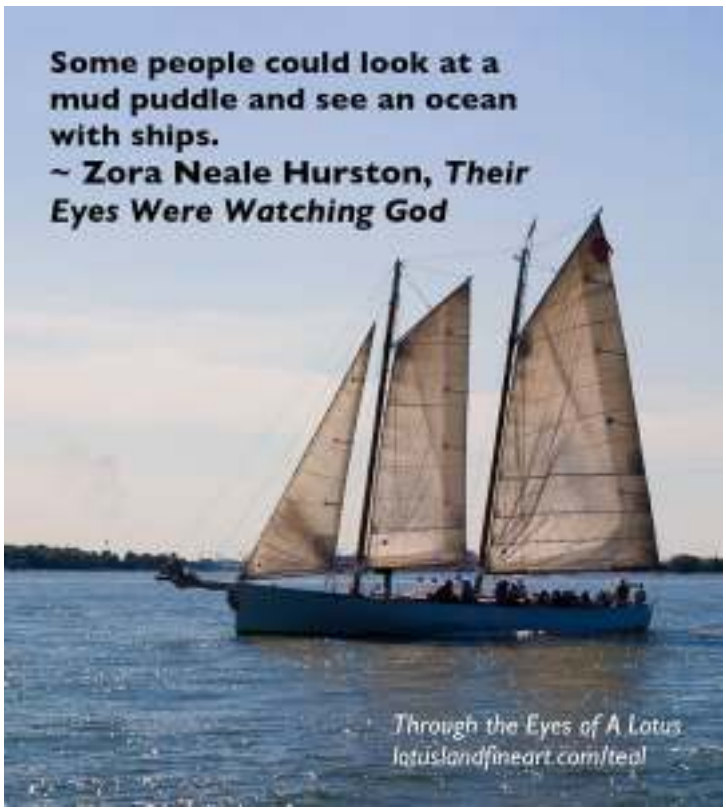
Looping back to my engineering training, I want to see if I can simplify the concept some more.

God gives each and every one of us a unique set of traits, or let's say foundational building blocks. If we use the analogy of a computer, this is like the operating system and hardware. When we are born, we each are a given some basic tools we can prosper with.

Got a good 'sound card' on the motherboard? Well, I hope you are creating new and interesting things with music, or do you use it to sit around watching movies?

Got a printer? Are you creating art, making unique things? Or just printing out invoices?

Have a really fancy case that's really 'flashy'? What are you doing with it? Trying to make other people jealous? Getting invited to LAN parties but then treating others poorly because you have some hardware that other computers don't? Or are you finding a way to bring value to the network you are connected to?



Be thankful for what you are given. Maximize it as much as is humanly possible. God gives us the potential to be great in something because He truly loves us, thus these unique and earthly gifts. Just know you won't ever be 'perfect', but striving for that is an amazing thing, and I for one love to see this effort in other men. I know I didn't really start utilizing my earthly gifts until my early 40's… So much wasted time trying to be what I believed the world / people / family thought I should be, instead of being what God wanted me to be.

Alright, I hope that makes it clear as mud for everyone.

Now let's look at the Spiritual Gifts that come with the indwelling of the Holy Spirit. But first, let's talk about what they are NOT.

What Spiritual Gifts are NOT

Spiritual Gifts are NOT a Christian version of status signaling, virtue signaling, or some kind of hierarchy of authority, although with continued practice, it may be tempting for the less spiritually mature to regard it in one of these ways. In 1 Corinthians 12:12-26, Paul states that some members are bestowed more honor while others are less presentable, but I believe the applied meaning in this is to be aware of each person's gifts and roles and act with honor and propriety. Overall these gifts should reduce division, not create it.

Thus, Spiritual Giftings are NOT the gift of lawn mowing, handing bulletins out, cleaning toilets, running the accounting of the church, cooking pancakes on a Saturday morning for men's prayer breakfast, or any of that non-sense. A person doesn't need to have Spiritual Gifts to be the church gopher. When the modern church started to be run like a 'business' we got into 'how to get labor for free'. It's then that the modern churchians went down the path of questionnaires, checklists, or 'telling people' what sort of gift they 'should' have. This sort of gatekeeping action is not in scripture.

So if anyone at church ever says something to you like, "You have the gift of a Green Thumb, so you should be watering the church flowers", it is a condescending and trite joke, and they should be called out on that. It may very well be something you can do well, and something you can do for the church that the church needs, but that's an Earthly / Fleshly Gift — NOT a SPIRITUAL GIFT! If they try to guilt trip you into doing something like that, that is a form of spiritual abuse. God loves a cheerful giver, not a coerced one.

Spiritual Gifts

Enough of WhiteGuy's rambling! What does scripture have to say about the Spiritual gifts!

> Now concerning spiritual gifts, brothers, I do not want you to be uninformed.
> 1 Corinthians 12:1 (ESV)

OK, cool! I can always count on Paul to explain these hard things to a simple man like myself.

In 1 Corinthians 12, Paul clearly states that Spiritual Gifts are to be used for the edification of others in "the Body of Christ" — the Church.

In verses 4-11 of the same chapter, Paul writes,

> [4] Now there are varieties of gifts, but the same Spirit; [5] and there are varieties of service, but the same Lord; [6] and there are varieties of activities, but it is the same God who empowers them all in everyone. [7] To each is given the manifestation of the Spirit for the common good. [8] For to one is given through the Spirit the utterance of wisdom, and to another the utterance of knowledge according to the same Spirit, [9] to another faith by the same Spirit, to another gifts of healing by the one Spirit, [10] to another the working of miracles, to another prophecy, to another the ability to distinguish between spirits, to another various kinds of tongues, to another the interpretation of tongues. [11] All these are empowered by one and the same Spirit, who apportions to each one individually as he wills.

Hmmm, we're not seeing "the gift of lawn mowing" here!

But I do see variates of Service, so there is one area we can all do to glorify God, by helping as we can, each giving something to contribute to the common good. For example, YouTube is full of videos of kindhearted people who mow grass for widows, repair the homes of the elderly, and so on. Some of them spread the gospel by doing so. Some churches even have “lawn care ministries” designed to help those members who are disabled or elderly and in need of a regular clipping. Mind you, this is only a Spiritual Gift of Service if it is evident that God uses one to bless the lives of others. This is not the common ‘churchian’ “goodness” of wasting our time and efforts on things that thankless degenerates care nothing about, nor helping a man rob ya blind and calling it “generosity”, etc. We are still supposed to use our discernment here.

OK, so we’ve got Service and 9 others listed out by Paul.

1. Knowledge
2. Wisdom
3. Prophecy
4. Faith
5. Gifts of Healings
6. Works of Miracles
7. Discerning of the spirits
8. Speaking in Tongues (Glossolalia)
9. Interpretation of Tongues

Years have and will be spent trying to understand these Spiritual gifts, and gallons of ink will be spilled writing about them, but let's just leave it at this: God gave these gifts to the body of believers to Glorify God through Jesus Christ.

Identifying Our Spiritual Gifts

The nature of using these Gifts is to minister to others. This is essentially the whole message of the book of 1 Corinthians in a nutshell. The intriguing aspect of our role in ministry is how others can intuitively identify what it is about ourselves that helps and inspires them, even though we are not very well aware of this ourselves. Obviously, it is not us who works, but God who works through us (Philippians 2:13).

Consequently, we are not able to identify these gifts in ourselves very easily. In 1 Corinthians 13:12 and James 1:22-25, it is said that we can only see ourselves dimly and at certain moments, like looking in a mirror. Because we rely on others to identify and practice our spiritual gifts, perhaps this is just as God intended it to be. We can't know, develop, or use our gifts without interacting with others and practicing them. To keep "looking in the mirror" (using the Biblical analogy) means that we must continually be engaged in ministry.

The GOD turtle is totally unaware of how it glorifies God. It probably just wants to be left alone to nibble on grass and bugs.

Case Study 1 — How I discovered some of my own Spiritual Gifts

I still don't fully understand the spiritual gifts (I do believe it's plural) given to me. For me, it took others pointing out things in my own life that I couldn't / wouldn't see myself.

The first indication that 'something' was different came through an interaction I had with my Dad. My Dad was a 'churchian' for the first 50 some odd years of his life, but he became a believer later in life. I used to work for him in a small engineering firm. He once said to me, "Son, you do such a good job writing about spiritual things, why can't you write like that in your engineering reports?" Ha! To this day, I can still write with more clarity and purpose on Biblical things than I can on any engineering subject, and I'm considered a subject matter expert in my field!

The second indication happened just a couple years ago at church. At that time, my life was pretty rough. I was in the middle of my divorce. I was alienated from my children. I was sinking deeper in debt. My globo-engineering job was crap and getting worse, and I was feeling more and more like Job. All I remember about that time was that I was at my lowest. Then one Sunday morning, one of the matrons at our church introduced me to someone new, and in her introduction of me, she said that I was one of the most encouraging and positive people they were ever going to meet. Needless to say I was shocked when she said those things. I was like, "Who is this woman talking about? Surely not me!"

Her statements made me realize that for some reason, whenever I am around others, the rest of the world does not see my inner turmoil. Inside, I was a beat down introvert at the end of his rope. But they saw a man of faith, encouraging and uplifting others. It was clear to me that this was one of those Spiritual Gifts that Paul talked about.

I won't take even an ounce of credit for what they saw in me. I'm an introvert by nature, who at his core really doesn't like people. I especially have an underlying contempt for the Daughters of Eve, largely because of my divorce. Who says God doesn't have a sense of humor? He gives the introvert gifts that require him to spend time around "people"! Ugh! But I do it, because I know it gives Glory to God every time I take the opportunity to use "my" gifts. No matter how much it drains me and wears me out, it's too important to neglect.

Case Study 2 – Follow your Gift, NOT your Passion!

In this video, Steve Harvey preaches about how people glorify God by following their God given Gift (whether it be Physical or Spiritual) — NOT their Passion, as we have frequently heard.

This is one way a man can discover and establish a domain of authority and a sphere of influence — something every young Christian man should be doing.

Final Statements

Spiritual Gifts are given to those who are indwelt by the Holy Spirit at the time of our acceptance of Christ as our Savior.

Using my computer analogy, I view Spiritual Gifts given by God to be software that runs on top of the hardware and operating system each of us are given. For me it almost feels 'foreign', 'too much', like the software was designed for a more powerful computer, not my cheap budget PC!

Just like the Earthly / Fleshly / Physical Gifts God gives us, the Spiritual Gifts require us to use them, exercise them, perfect them, and by doing this we Glorify him. But here is the best part of those Spiritual Gifts — you can actually achieve "perfection" (i.e. spiritual maturity) with these gifts given to you, unlike our physical gifts! Because these gifts are not limited by man's fallen nature, they have a heavenly 'boost' from the Holy Spirit and we are told we can be 'perfected' in the Spirit (1 Corinthians 13:10; 1 John 4:17-18; James 1:2-4).

So have faith brothers (and sisters) in Christ, we can get a taste of that heavenly perfection here on earth! Just ask and you will Glorify God in your march toward that perfection in Christ.

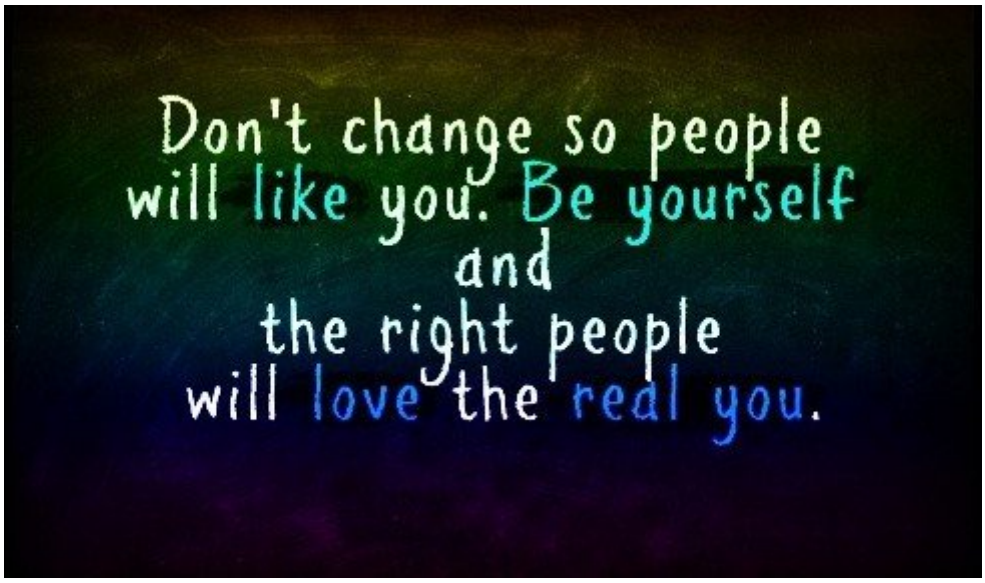
Just Be Yourself ?!?



We've all seen memes with messages similar to the one above and have heard statements to this effect. This is one of those kinda sorta half-true truthy truths. It's only true according to a very specific context, but this context is often misunderstood or lost altogether.

In this post, I'll go over some misconceptions about this quip, followed by a more accurate and useful description of its applied meaning and value. Finally, I'll list some factors that prevent men from obtaining the benefits of "Just being themselves".

Misconception 1 — Boomer Mentality

The LastMod's monologues include a quip about how people told him, "Just be yourself"… I'll assume these admonishments came from Boomers. I think the Boomers were not wrong in saying this, except that they could not explain exactly what they meant by it, so it was ill received or misinterpreted by younger men (like LastMod and myself too). There is also the fact that the Boomers had a much different SMP/MMP landscape than Xers, Millennials, or Gen Z has had to face, and this also contributed to the miscommunication.

I think the intended meaning behind the old Boomer cliché is mostly what we would call detachment, but they also had a sense of optimism and personal / political liberties that subsequent generations didn't have. This detachment, accompanied with a sense of Headship and Purpose, is presumably what women are referring to when they say they want a man who "just 'gets it'."

Misconception 2 — Being 100% Self-Centered

Dr. Orion Tereban makes the point that the most toxic relationship belief is that in a relationship, you are free to be 100% yourself.

He says (at 8:18),

> "…you are NOT free to be "yourself" in a relationship … you are free to express those parts of yourself that are most conducive to that role within your relationship, and if you do that successfully you make the relationship easy which facilitates the transaction of value."

In summary of his talk, people play roles in their career and in relationships, and to play that role, you cannot be 100% "yourself".

Red Pill Apostle added,

> "This is self-explanatory to anyone who understands the struggle against sin nature. I once followed the common clichéd advice to "go find myself". What I found is that I'm an @$$h0!e, just like everyone else, who is destined to hurt those around me because I'm a sinner. So I can see where being 100% yourself might have its drawbacks in a relationship.

As I paraphrased Alain de Botton's speech, Why you will marry the wrong person (2022/3/2),

> "We expect that those we love should be able to accept us, farts, warts, quirks, and all, so we do not think it should be necessary to protect others from the uglier aspects of our character. But this is not loving to others."

Moreover, the idea that people should be themselves 100% is 100% self-centeredness, selfishness, solipsism — or worse!

If she is 100% herself, he'll have to play a role that he really doesn't want to play.

Misconception 3 — Being 100% Open

"Just be yourself" might be interpreted to mean total emotional openness. To some extent, emotional openness is a necessary quality of a good relationship — BUT within limits. Being open does NOT give one full permission to crap and vomit all emotional turbulence onto others, similar to Misconception 2 above.

On this, Thedeti wrote,

> "Some people think (Mrs. deti in particular used to think this) that in a relationship the two participants are entitled at all times to know each other's' opinions and emotions because that's the only way you can really "know" and "relate" to one another. It was a revelation to us both to understand there is no such requirement and that such heavy, constant self-disclosure actually damages relationships."

My wife also carries this belief, as I'm sure most wives and women do. Women are this way because they feel the need to be privy to every emotional nuance of every person they're emotionally invested in. They think knowing all the scuttlebutt will buffer their sense of social security. In reality, it's little more than worldly gossip and vanity entertainment — a symptom of the female Herd mentality. The problem is that most women are incapable of dealing with the negative emotions of their male head, because this introduces doubts and insecurities which they are not able to settle for themselves. IOW, it's due to a lack of faith and maturity.

Red Pill Apostle gave us some insights about when it may be appropriate for a man to open up emotionally to a woman. Basically, female humility and respect needs to be firmly in place, and all interaction must conform to the Christ : Church :: Husband : Wife model. IOW, it's a cherry on the cake of Headship — a cake that many women find unpalatable.

Women want to pick off the cherry and leave the cake.

Misconception 4 — Being 100% Childish Cuck

By "childish", I don't mean cheery innocent optimism, which can be quite charming. I mean spiritual immaturity — an inability to assume the responsibilities of Headship, love others effectively, and maintain a reciprocating and mutually satisfying dynamic in a relationship. Spiritual Immaturity also involves being too deeply immersed in any of the various cultural lies of the world, e.g. the Blue Pill, Equality, Feminism, Gynocentrism, etc.

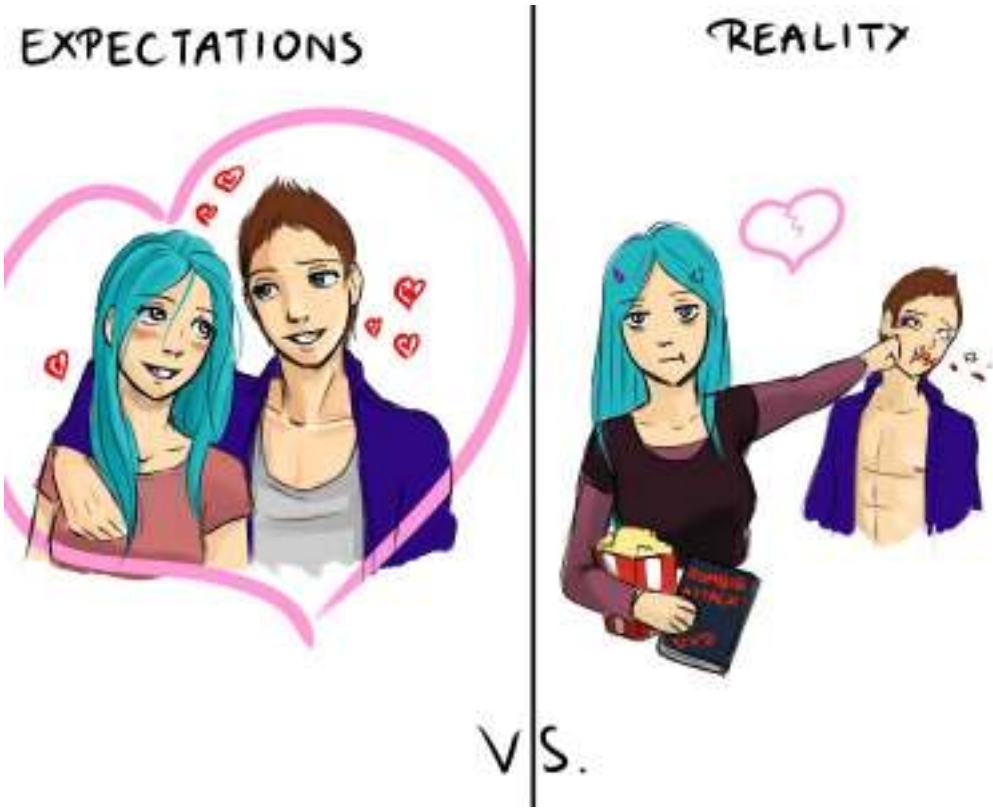
One lie that men are particularly susceptible to, is the subconscious desire for a Soul Mate. We carry the belief that the more a person is right for us, the less we're going to have to explain about who we are, how we feel, what upsets us, what we want, and so on. We believe, rather as a young child believes of its parent, that a true soul mate should be able to guess what is in our minds without us having to say it. We have this deep desire that we'll simply be understood wordlessly. When we are not, then we feel let down, we feel resentful, and we sulk. While it may be true that this is "Just being yourself", it is a symptom of immaturity and is detrimental to any relationship.

In addition to Oscar's post about the Soul Mate Myth linked above, the following posts go into more detail about other ways that the Blue Pill / childish immaturity can exclude a man from finding love.

- Σ Frame: Why you will marry the wrong person (2022/3/2)
- Σ Frame: Unlucky in Love? (2022/3/9)
- Σ Frame: The Lie of Romantic Love (2023/2/3)



Being 100% yourself will not meet expectations — neither his nor hers.

A More Accurate Understanding of "Just be Yourself"

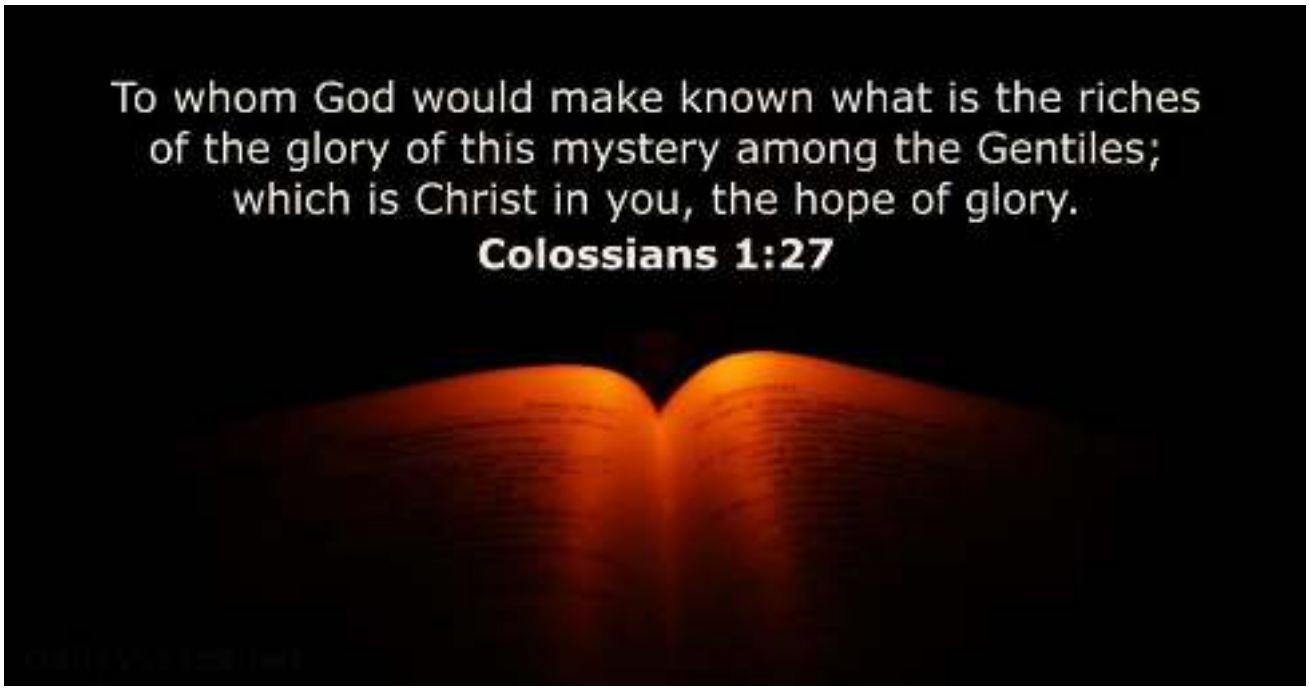
To sum up the nuances we have covered so far, a fundamental part of "being yourself" is to adopt a character role that fits one's personality, personal charisma, and set of values. Tying this into the Christian faith, playing one's respective role in a relationship is one of the most effective ways to glorify God and show love to others.

As I mentioned in Glory (2023/3/1), one way to glorify God is in boldly displaying one's own true character and charisma in the light of God's love. IOW, being who you are in Christ, your true authentic self as God made you to be. I believe this is the truest meaning of the adage, "Just be yourself".

When all these things are in place, then and only then is the adage in the preceding meme true.

> "Don't change so people will like you. Be yourself and the right people will love the real you."

But in this case, people love the Christ in you, not your personal baggage and hangups. Remember, Christ suffered and died to give His best. For some reason, that vital part always gets left out.

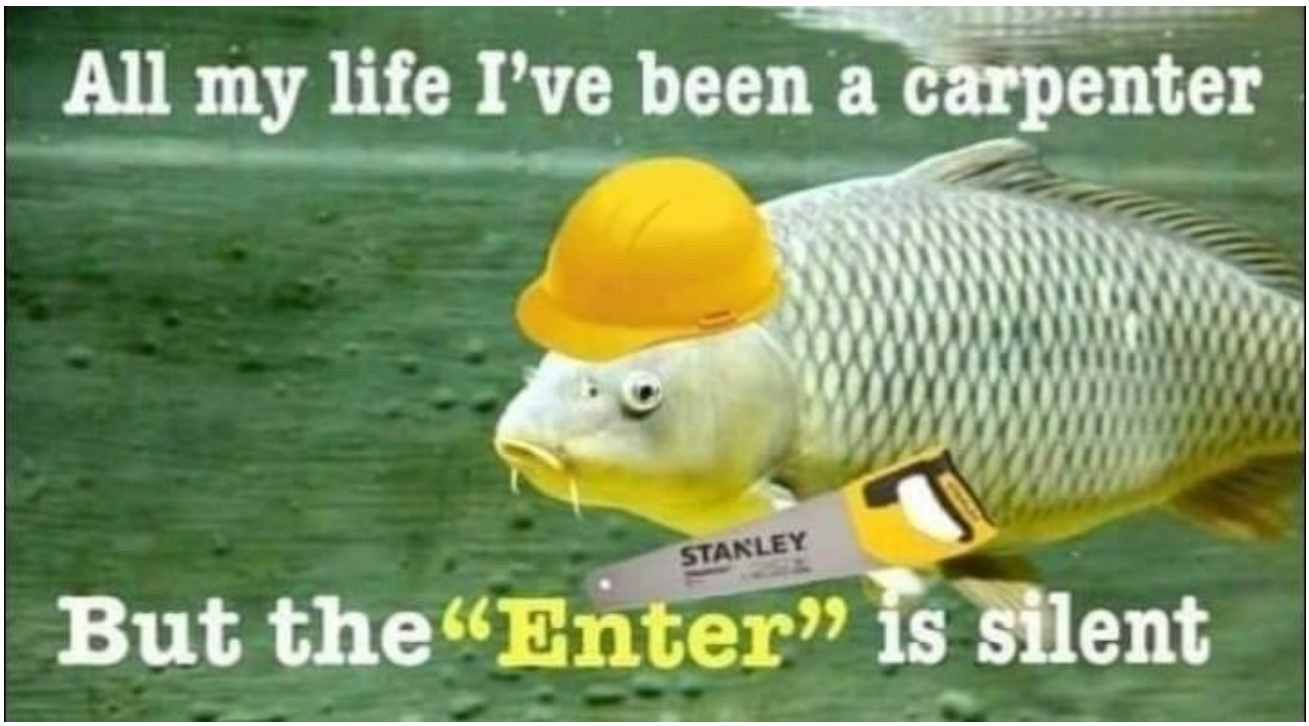


Limitations

People cannot play their roles 100% perfectly for any of the following reasons.

1. They don't have a clear concept of what those roles are.
2. They have a clear concept of those roles, but they refuse to do the work of playing it.
3. They have a clear concept of those roles, but they think it is abusive, toxic, wrong, etc. and therefore avoid it.
4. They have the negative idea that playing a role is being fake and not who they truly are.
5. They refuse to play a role because they think it is egocentric and/or manipulative.
6. They have personal weaknesses that pop up and ruin their role play.
7. They carry conflicting sets of beliefs and/or values that make it impossible for them to play any role sincerely and convincingly. IOW, they are under a curse.
8. They can't get into the role for some reason, e.g. bitterness, depression, immaturity, lack of vision, unbelief, etc.
9. They're simply very poor "actors" in playing a specific role, e.g. a lack of self-awareness or self-discipline, etc.
10. They don't have the personal attributes necessary to play a stereotypical role in a certain kind of relationship, IOW, they are not "cut out" for it.
11. One important aspect of "Just be yourself" that will carry the day is displaying personal charisma. For men who lack charisma, this is the part that is lost on them.
12. Adding to the previous point, parental divorce destroys male children's charisma and confidence (for many years, if not for life), and many men are suffering from this effect.

A person who struggles with any of the above reasons could be described as going through an identity crisis.



Conclusions

Women often state that men are immature, or that they mature very slowly. It should be noted that in saying this, women are referring to men's social maturity in particular, which women naturally excel in. Truth be said, in fact, women are also immature and/or mature very slowly in the areas of logic and moral agency, which men naturally excel in.

In terms of Christian faith, maturity is determined by one's ability to assume his/her identity in Christ. Given the sin nature, this may very well feel like role-playing, except for the help of the Holy Spirit. It becomes more authentic the more we practice it.

In terms of relationships, maturity is largely determined by one's ability to successfully play his/her respective role in a relationship. Men should be responsible Heads. Women should be submissive companions and helpers. This is the essential truth that has been lost on moderns. Men are discouraged en large from taking on a masculine role. Women are very good at playing a feminine role when they want to shag a HSMV man, or receive a marriage proposal, etc., but they drop this façade and become lazy actors after they get what they want.

Thus, the adage, "Just be yourself", properly understood, refers specifically to the demonstration of a mature persona, which necessarily involves playing a role of some kind. IOW, "Just being yourself" is NOT just being yourself. It is being the best aspects of yourself in terms of the context — the glorified image of God whom He made and intended you to be, often extolled through faith, confidence, and charisma. This is not to be confused with being fake or phony. Glory is what indicates the authenticity of the presentation.

Overview of This Month's Theme

Originally, I had planned 3 posts on glory to sort out some issues of confusion on this topic. In response, a couple readers sent in submissions and I had some more ideas too. Then, commenter Excelsis suggested that this month's theme should be about Glory. I thought this was a fantastic suggestion so I ran with it!

I also invited a number of co-bloggers and those who have contributed writings to the Christian Manosphere and/or Σ Frame in the past to write a short post on the topic of glory.

Here is a list of all the posts that appeared this month. Names of contributing authors are given in parentheses.

Pros

Throughout this month's writings, we've identified many elements of that which glorifies God.

1. A culture that is ordered in justice and the fear of God
2. Being one's self (in Christ), e.g. charisma, confidence, etc.
3. Battle, Competition, Conflict, Opposition, etc., specifically overcoming these.
4. Drama
5. Drawing the Line on the Unacceptable
6. Enjoyment; Joy
7. Ethnic identification and affiliation (e.g. belonging, group loyalty, humility)
8. Faithfulness
9. Fearlessness; Overcoming Fear and Shame
10. Fulfilling Purpose; Working heartily;
11. Grace
12. Honor, praise, or admiration.
13. Justice
14. Mercy
15. Nations turning from Chaos → Tyranny → Faith
16. Obedience to authority
17. Playing a Role (c.f. an appeal to Mythos)
18. Power; Military might; Martial prowess
19. Raising the Bar on Commitment
20. Righteousness
21. Self-sacrifice
22. Sexual Dimorphism (Masculinity vs. Femininity)
23. Submission to Authority (e.g. Subutu, Wives*)
24. Suffering
25. Taking a stand
26. Thankfulness; Having a grateful attitude;
27. The insignificant, small, and sometimes shameful things of this world
28. Creation; The wild and untamed natural world
29. Using Earthly / Fleshly / Physical Gifts
30. Using Spiritual Gifts to minister to others needs.

We glorify God when many of these elements are manifested in our own lives. Many stories of martyrs and saints have similar elements, and this is how they glorified God. We also glorify God whenever we share or hear these stories recounted.

Cons

We've also identified a few things which detract from the glory of God.

1. Anger
2. Bitterness; Joylessness
3. Boasting
4. Cowardice
5. Denying the power of God, or attributing it to Satan.
6. Dishonor; Shame
7. Disrespect
8. Faithlessness; Unbelief
9. False Humility
10. Fear
11. Identity Politics
12. Legalism; The "leaven of the Pharisees"
13. Compromising for the sake of peace; Convergence; Ressentimenalism. The "leaven of Herod"
14. Over-the-top or self-centered Drama
15. Pride; Claiming self-sufficiency; Denying God's providence.
16. Rebellion
17. Self-Pity
18. Sin; Guilt; Unrighteousness
19. Status Signaling
20. Virtue Signaling
21. Vain works of the flesh

Observations

This month, a number of topics came up as related to Glory, some of which I didn't expect.

- The place of Humility.
- The purpose and role of Suffering.
- The Warlord archetype.
- "To whom much is given, much will be required."

Overall, this series addressed some questions that may have been confusing or not well understood.

1. Why dominant masculinity is glorifying.
2. Why submissive femininity is glorifying.*
3. Developing one's natural abilities / gifts is one way a man can discover and establish a domain of authority and a sphere of influence.
4. Man is the glory of God. The woman is the glory of the man.*
5. The purpose of tyranny is to restore order after a time of chaos.
6. We cannot know ourselves well unless we keep "looking in the mirror" (using the Biblical analogy), which means that we must continually be engaged in ministry.

In summary, I learned many things from this excursion and I found some of the implications to be rather intriguing. It is my hope that this month's series has helped readers understand what it means to glorify God, such that they may identify the many ways they can do so in their daily lives, and have more confidence in doing so.

A review of Neville Goddard's teachings.

Readership: All
Theme: Headship
Length: 1,400 words
Reading Time: 7 minutes + 20 minute audio speech

Neville Goddard

A reader asked me about a 20th century teacher and radio personality, Neville Goddard, wanting to know whether his teachings are true or heretical.

Here's a speech from Neville Goddard that gives us a snapshot of his views on the Christian Faith. Interested readers can find many others on YouTube.

In this speech, he makes frequent reference to "the I of Man". I take this to mean one's sense of discernment, or one's "Noetic Nose", a foundational element of faith. Goddard points out (at 3:42) that this is also the power and wisdom of God, which makes sense because spiritual discernment is a necessary element of wisdom.

Sources of Confusion

I can see how someone would suspect that Goddard is heretical, especially when he says things like (at 4:40),

> "You really are God. Your own wonderful consciousness. Your human imagination. That is the God of scripture, and there is no other God."

One obvious source of confusion is that Goddard speaks from a mystical viewpoint, something which has been roundly condemned as heretical by the modern converged christianese church. But in fact, some amount of mysticism is absolutely necessary to exercise discernment and true faith. As it turns out, whenever people speak of knowledge that is obtained through mysticism, it usually appears odd or off-center. This is because such a revelation is deeply personal and not intended for the masses. God speaks to individuals where they are.

Another source of confusion is that the listener may jump on a tangent that is not intended to be the main point. As such, I think it is easy to jump to one of the following conclusions.

1. That he is preaching a prosperity gospel.
2. That he is making the individual man out to be God (i.e. blasphemy, see next section).

However, perhaps one's focus on these interpretations arises from psychological projection. That is,

- Those who are greedy and materialistic would jump on the idea that they can get whatever they want (code word: "prosperity").
- Those who are spiritually proud would interpret this as self-deification.
- Those who are intemperate would take this to mean a free ride.
- Etc.

St. Paul described this sort of reaction to the gospel in 2 Corinthians 4:1-6.

From these perspectives which are self-centered and to be blunt, sinful, what is perceived about Goddard's message is recognized to be a false gospel. Thus, a person who was raised in a typical Bible thumping church that misinterprets Sola Scriptura to mean the rejection of Christian Mysticism would impulsively reject Goddard's message as heretical. A person who was not raised with such an understanding wouldn't care about this and would be more open to the interpretation. This is precisely why Goddard's message has grown in popularity among the "Spiritual but not Religious" crowd.

A Note on Blasphemy

The Pharisees said Jesus committed blasphemy because he assumed the power and authority of God (e.g. Matthew 26:59-66; Mark 2:1-12; 14:53-65). However, Jesus said the Pharisees committed blasphemy by denying the power of the Holy Spirit, and/or attributing that power to Satan (Matthew 12:22-32). Upon my own reflections on this contrast, it is apparent that the path down the road to blasphemy begins with the rejection of one's own sense of mystical / spiritual discernment, or what Goddard refers to as "the I of Man".

A great deception lies in how it may seem right to reject the path of discernment simply because discernment brings one into a greater internal awareness of desire, sin, and temptation, and therefore may be perceived as a dark path that is not of God. However, this awareness, followed by repentance, is only the beginning of the process of regeneration.

Furthermore, one of the reasons why believers are urged to be sensitive to conscience and refrain from doing things not of faith is because it causes others to stumble (Romans 14, compared to 1 Thessalonians 1). Likewise, one reason believers are urged not to sin is because it causes others to blaspheme the Holy Spirit.

To use a carnal example for the reader's ease of understanding, this is what happens when Black Pillers and MGTOWs reject charisma, confidence, and Game simply because Chads use these traits to get laid, to make them bitter and envious, and to put them to shame. Therefore, instead of recognizing these things as admirable qualities of character, they reject the pursuit and development of these qualities in themselves.

Moreover, this is a gravely serious issue of eternal magnitude that readers should take time to reflect upon.

Introspection

If we are to examine Goddard's message through a generous lens and without any personal desire, expectations, or preconceived notions, we get a different perspective on his message — one of inner conviction, personal agency, and the power of faith to move mountains (Matthew 21:21-22; Mark 11:22-24).

The main ideas I got out of Goddard's lectures are that…

- I have known for some time that idolatry destroys the imaginings inspired by faith. But here I learned that this also works in reverse — a rejection of mystical intuition can also lead to blasphemy, idolatry, legalism, etc.
- People look for help, a "savior", in the form of other people, but fail to exercise personal agency. When help from others is not forthcoming, this often leads to a "victim" mindset.
- People look towards an external God and thereby deny the internal aspect of faith, but knowing God is more about looking within, understanding one's faults and sins, trusting God, repenting, and taking responsibility for one's self.
- People may believe in the historical man of Jesus as a point of fact, but do not know nor understand the power of the indwelling Holy Spirit.

The Path of Faith

Faith is the key towards understanding all of this.

> For in [the Gospel] the righteousness of God is revealed from faith for faith, as it is written, “The righteous shall live by faith.”
> Romans 1:17; Galatians 3:11; Hebrews 10:38 (ESV)

> The natural person does not accept the things of the Spirit of God, for they are folly to him, and he is not able to understand them because they are spiritually discerned.
> 1 Corinthians 2:14 (ESV)

Activating one’s faith does not come from an external source. Jesus told us,

> [20] Now when He was asked by the Pharisees when the kingdom of God would come, He answered them and said, “The kingdom of God does not come with observation; [21] nor will they say, ‘See here!’ or ‘See there!’ For indeed, the kingdom of God is within you.”
> Luke 17:20-21 (NKJV)

So if faith does not come from an external source, then where does it come from? The Bible says,

> So then faith comes by hearing, and hearing by the word of God.
> Romans 10:17 (NKJV)

Ultimately, it is God who opens one’s “ears” to accept Faith.

Question to Consider: Does Goddard’s speech open your “ears” of faith? In spite of your logical objections and inner wrestlings, do you get the sense that he is speaking the Truth?

Scriptural Support

For reflection, there are several verses that correspond with Goddard's understanding of faith. [Emphasis mine.]

> Do you not know that you are the temple of God and that the Spirit of God dwells in you?
> 1 Corinthians 3:16 (NKJV)

> [7] But we have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellence of the power may be of God and not of us. [8] We are hard-pressed on every side, yet not crushed; we are perplexed, but not in despair; [9] persecuted, but not forsaken; struck down, but not destroyed — [10] always carrying about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life of Jesus also may be manifested in our body. [11] For we who live are always delivered to death for Jesus' sake, that the life of Jesus also may be manifested in our mortal flesh.
> 2 Corinthians 4:7-11 (NKJV)

> Examine yourselves, to see whether you are in the faith. Test yourselves. Or do you not realize this about yourselves, that Jesus Christ is in you? — unless indeed you fail to meet the test!
> 2 Corinthians 13:5 (ESV)

> …my little children, for whom I am again in the anguish of childbirth until Christ is formed in you!
> Galatians 4:19 (ESV)

For more reading and scriptures on this viewpoint, see the links below.

The word Christian literally means "a little Christ". Think about that. This meaning has been lost on modern Churchians who see themselves foremost as sinners broken by sin. Certainly, this attitude is a necessary step in repentance, but there is more for us to press on towards that we may lay hold of that for which Christ Jesus has also laid hold of us. (Philippians 3, v. 12-15).

Update

Ed Hurst responded with his views of Neville Goddard. In The Faith of Foreigners (2023/4/4), he identifies Goddard's background in the Kabbalah as a cause of suspicion. The Kabbalah is mysticism, but it's not Christian mysticism, so readers should be wary when reviewing Goddard's work.

The Challenges of Moving Towards Headship

Jack · 5 April 2023 · Archived copy · Original

Developing Masculine Authority is the Key.

Readership: Christian Men
Theme: Headship
Length: 1,900 words
Reading Time: 10 minutes

Introduction

According to the Christ : Church :: Husband : Wife Analogy / Archetype (Ephesians 5:22-33), women need to be under the authority of men for God to be glorified in the marriage and family.

However, what I've written in previous posts about Women needing authority is also true for Men too. The difference being that men fall under God's authority. Men are in the middle of the hierarchy, between God and the women within their domain of authority and/or sphere of influence, i.e. their daughters / girlfriends / sisters / wives. Thus, men need to submit to God's authority and also exercise authority over the women in their lives as well.

The snafu is that the latter is socially taboo, and TBH, technically illegal in the Wimminized West these days.

Lest we forget, exactly what does this look like?

The Centrality of a Man's Socio-Sexual Authority

The nature of the Mating Game in the modern context has been discussed ad infinitum in the Manosphere over the past 15 years. In summary, these days, male authority has been reduced to little more than socio-sexual authority, and only a small number of men possess it.

In all the discussions about masculinity around the 'sphere, there's been a lot of talk and airplay about confidence, LAMPS, developing your career, self-improvement, working out, etc., but it is frequently presented in the context of snagging thatch (for unmarried men) or milking the cow (for married men), as if that is the whole point of these endeavors. Meanwhile, the proper context of Headship authority and family formation is always omitted. Most content sources don't even recognize the glories of Headship.

And yet, no matter how much a particular man has developed any of these masculine traits, it is apparent that this same socio-sexual authority is what is required of a man to achieve Christian Headship in marriage (unless the wife happens to be exceedingly mature in faith). It is assumed that the unmarried man who seeks to have a Christian marriage, or the married man who wishes to move towards a Headship structure, developing sexual authority (and the magical charisma and confidence thereof) is of prime concern. But with the way things work in today's overlapping SMP/MMP, only the top dogs have a chance at chicks, marriage, and having a family, and there is more risk and less motivation to accept those risks. Thus, Headship is slowly vanishing before our eyes.

So it is imperative for us to consider first and foremost how these things affect a man's sexual authority around chicks and in marriage, and how this contributes to a Headship structure that glorifies God. Too much attention is given to the outward appearances of masculinity, and without any perspective on how it magnifies Headship.

However true it may be, developing confidence, LAMPS, etc. is not the primary goal for men, at least not for Christian Men. The primary purpose is to glorify God, so in the application, a man's goal is to attain a sphere of influence and a domain of authority in which a man can appear as the glory of God on earth. Likewise, women should be behaving in a manner that would make themselves the glory of their fathers or husbands.

Properly regarded, a man should pursue these endeavors to glorify God and further His Kingdom. Within this paradigm, Masculine Authority can be a magnet for attracting the responsibilities of keeping a woman. Thus, attracting chicks or having a solid marriage should be seen as a reward for the faithfully continued exercise of masculine authority — not a goal.

Case Study — Drawing the Line

A man can still exert Social Authority, even if he has no Sexual Authority and cannot compete in the SMP.

Recently, LastMod shared a story about how a younger woman put him to shame — publicly — and within his sphere of influence! (Read my response here.) Apparently, she presented herself as having a domain of authority in the area of relationships, and presumed to offer value to LastMod via introducing him to a woman. When she dropped the boon on his ego, he was hurt by her cutting remarks.

LastMod's big mistakes in this situation were as follows.

1. He was seduced by her flattery and her implied promises of helping him find love.
2. He bumbled into her assumed frame.
3. He failed to anticipate her treachery. (Her motive was not to help LastMod, but to signal her power and status to her friend group.)
4. He became hurt and sad when he should've gotten angry.

By taking this route, he failed to maintain frame and exercise masculine authority.

Going back to the topic of this post, his sexual authority (LAMPS, etc. or the lack thereof) didn't matter. It only mattered to her. If he admits that it matters in a context like this, then he's folding himself into her frame. However, by keeping the conversation revolving around his frame and domain of influence (music, dancing, the Mod scene, etc.) and deftly avoiding the scrutiny of women, he is still able to maintain social authority in spite of whether or not women find him attractive. In fact, carrying this attitude has the potential to draw respect and improve women's regard of him. LastMod needs to be aware of this and work towards this in his future social interactions.

Masculine authority doesn't succumb to self-centered women stealing the Frame and crashing the mood. It doesn't tolerate being disrespected by said women. You have to somehow send them the message, "Whether or not you find me attractive, you're going to give me the respect that is appropriate for a man of my age, character, and reputation." If they don't respond with an apology and start treating you with dignity, then it's time to get them out of your life. Once you start doing this, after a while you'll eventually find the people who TRULY accept you and respect you. They may not be attractive, popular, young, or hip, but they'll offer you something better and more worth your while in the way of a social interaction.

Σ Frame Maxim 3: You have a responsibility to yourself to teach others who you are and how you want to be treated.

A senior man talking with young people. The chicks may not be turned on by him, but they respect him deeply. Respect is more important than poon because it identifies Headship, and Headship is what glorifies God.

How does a Man Develop / Exercise Spiritual Authority?

The foundations for developing Spiritual Authority are as follows.

1. Transforming the mind (Romans 12:2). Getting boned up on Scripture and other edifying readings.
2. Prayer (i.e. asking for discernment per James 1:2-8).
3. Knowing Christ.
4. Knowing One's Self.
5. Knowing how things are supposed to be.
6. Maintaining appropriate boundaries, and defending them when necessary.
7. Refraining from sin.
8. Familiarizing one's self with a working Red Pill knowledge of social / intersexual dynamics.
9. Age and experience helps.

Oscar is criticized for his "Just do it!" stance by men who find the challenges to be very difficult or impossible. This disconnect in understanding is because a man can't achieve these things simply through willpower alone — adopting better habits, going to the gym, looksmaxxing, losing weight, working harder, and so on. Rightly regarded, Confidence, LAMPS, etc. and everything that comes with those qualities are only outward manifestations of Masculine Authority, and men who lack these things by genetics or by providence tend to dwell on their lot in life and therefore cannot truly believe they can obtain anything different out of life.

To BE authoritative, a man needs to first believe in his heart that he is an authority. He should not be anxious or worried about whether he can actually make things happen, nor should be conceited or stuck in his head about tactics, methods, power plays, and such. Instead, he needs to Form the Vision of Achieving a Goal. He needs to believe that whatever he decides shall be done, and rest in that conviction by faith believing that one way or another, events shall unfold and transpire towards that end, whether it takes 5 minutes or even a lifetime. A man's belief in himself (and in the power of God in his life) is the first step towards being able to "Just do it!" This is one practical application of Neville Goddard's teachings. Rick Warren approaches this idea in his book, "The Purpose Driven Life", Myles Munroe's message gets to the same point through the inspiration of visions and dreams.

The next step is to act in a way that expresses that faith. To begin with…

- Being domain oriented.
- Being purpose driven.
- Choosing friends wisely.
- Christian Detachment.
- Drawing boundaries.
- Maintaining Frame.
- Utilizing Discernment and wisdom.

To gain authentic authority, a man has to dig deep in his soul, trust God with whatever he finds there, and become confident in his self-expression of who he is, preferably who he is in Christ. This is where jerks (as in "Chicks dig jerks") get it right.

Concluding Statements

Upon introspection, there's always the possibility that in certain cases, the bottleneck to blessing could be something on the man, oh, like his Authority, his sense of Boundaries, his Faith, his Frame, his Game, or his Masculine Presence, maybe. Identifying the weakest link in the chain and coming to terms with one's self is not a silver bullet, but for some men, it could be.

Men need to learn how to be more effective at exercising authority than what we have seen in the recent past. Put bluntly, a man must be the best version of himself that he can possibly be, and lead those within his domain of authority towards the same excellence.

> [12] Therefore, my beloved, as you have always obeyed, not as in my presence only, but now much more in my absence, work out your own salvation with fear and trembling; [13] for it is God who works in you both to will and to do for His good pleasure.
> Philippians 2:12-13 (NKJV)

Vetting serves limited benefits if you don't understand the "goals" of establishing Headship and glorifying God — and rest assured, if your relationship doesn't glorify God, it will be punishing. Without God's hedge of blessing, the sinful self, the world, and Satan himself will use every opportunity to test and try a man's mettle at every turn.

So why not go with God?

The challenge or the "downside" is this: For some men, this will come at a cost which he will have to count (Mark 8:34-36; Luke 14:26-33). It's better to do this before making his move than after. But in spite of the cost, whatever it may be, the eternal reward is greater.

> "…the world is passing away along with its desires, but whoever does the will of God abides forever."
> 1 John 2:15-17 (ESV)

In the West these days, a man has to truly trust God to exercise masculine authority, believing that God will come to his defense, or in the worst case, use the situation for His glory somehow.

The Battle for Headship begins on the Home Turf

Introduction

The previous post, The Challenges of Moving Towards Headship (2023/4/5), had a case study that highlighted how women are exceptionally skilled and well practiced in haranging men, while men are often caught unawares.

Bardelys the Magnificent wrote,

> "Problem is that men do not play these games and very seldom come across them, so they are hard to spot in real time. Wonder if there are ways to practice or create these scenarios to better spot them?"

Yes, it would be helpful for men to have some practice training in how to exert frame and regulate a conversation. Commenters offered some good examples of different ways to shift the frame in these types of situations. However, going over verbal responses isn't enough. Men need to practice these things in real time, and long enough to build up skill in dealing with wimminz.

Devon70 reminded us of the futility of such efforts.

> "In the modern U.S., guys should avoid arguing or confrontation with women because only negative can come from that. Guys get cancelled for glancing at a woman in a gym. It isn't worth it, especially when you're older. […] Just walk away and avoid them."

Yes. This is one of the risks, or "costs", that I mentioned at the end of that post. Men need to make an impromptu decision analysis to determine whether the benefits of a particular interaction are worth all the trouble.

If a man is up on his social game, he might be able to shift things in his favor and redeem his social image / reputation. But what about those men who don't have the skills and qualifications necessary to "win", but still need situations like this to "practice"? After all, a man can't get good at this sort of thing without practice. But as Devon pointed out, the risks are too high to engage in practice.

Perhaps skills of this sort are best taught by other men, or during one's familial upbringing. This would put the onus for instruction on more experienced men and fathers respectively. Perhaps an agreeable and trustworthy woman might be found who would be a willing subject for this purpose, but that would be a rare find, and it would still pose risks.

I'll proffer that the home is probably the safest and best place for a man to learn such skills. Practicing on sisters (for younger men living with parents) or wives (for married men) would be less risky than practicing on classmates, coworkers, or strangers. So the remainder of this post, I'll focus on the contributions of Sons, Husbands, and Fathers towards this endeavor.

The Warlord is a Warrior

Under The Glorious Warlord (2023/3/20), thedeti wrote,

> "The glorious warlord implies glorious warriors. Which gets down to the real issue here – a man needs something he's willing to fight and die for. The warrior gets up and fights. Usually he knows why he fights, for whom he fights, and what he's willing to do in the service of his master.
> Most men have nothing they're willing to fight or die for."

Well, here's something we can "fight" for.

1. Skilled men can take it upon themselves to coach younger men on how to parry with women.
2. Fathers can school their sons on how to handle women.
3. Married men can start by fighting for Headship in their marriages.

Think of this as soldiers training for battle — before the battle begins and the casualties start mounting.

Women themselves may or may not be involved.

Non-Warlords Fail to Prepare for Battle

Now, before the reader says to himself, "I'm no good at that stuff. I'm not cut out to be a freaking dating coach / PUA / etc." Remember, a man fails to be a Warlord when he gives in to Herodianism.

- "Whatever, man…"
- "It doesn't matter…"
- "Go along to get along…"
- "Happy Wife, Happy Life."
- "Whatever she says, goes…"
- "When Mama ain't happy, nobody happy."
- Etc.

Instead, he should be saying stuff like…

- "Let me tell you how it goes…"
- "Here's what I'm doing, and here's what you can do to help."
- "Let's have beef steaks for dinner tonight, dear. Thank you!"
- "Look closely at that floral pattern on the bedsheet. Does that daisy have 12 petals or 13?"
- "I'm so happy when I come home after a long day and you greet me with your headlights on!"
- "You always stop talking whenever I kiss you. You're the best wife on the planet!"

Sure, you might make a fool of yourself, but at least you're getting some practice in. Practice makes perfect!

Readers are welcome to offer other suggestions in the comments.

Enjoying the decline — and going no where fast.

Case Study — The Contention

Lastmod responded,

> "And most wives will say:

- "Help you? I help you daily! You need to be helping me! Don't you know what I deal with all day? And now this……"
- "I just worked eight hours like you. You never appreciate me….. You don't… You have not…"
- "I have asked you for months to fix this and that……. It's still not fixed! Why should I do anything more for you?"
- "I already thawed chicken the night before, and you got mad last week when I bought rib eye, saying it's too expensive and I am wasting money…"

> "Any man that allows floral patterns on the bedsheets as a married man… has more problems that I can or you can help him with.
> It boils down to this. She has to have the hots for you from DAY ONE or it will never work. Most married men who try this will be given a barrage of answers like I mentioned above or it will look "phony", like when I was "being a man and approaching girls and exuding confidence".
> Today in these matters, it's the difference between the Have's and Have Not's. Most men probably gave up when they realized their "tough guy" stance didn't work. It's easier to take the "Happy Wife, Happy Life" stance and just deal with it. Because we know in a divorce…. the court doesn't care if she didn't "follow your masculine leadership". They will side with her, and the married man will be forced to move back home, or move in with his old college roommate, or with his family, or be regulated to alcohol, other addictions, or suicide."
> "Just tell your wife what to do, bro!"

This goes back to what I wrote in the last post, The Challenges of Moving Towards Headship (2023/4/5). To reiterate, a man can impose Headship Authority whether or not a woman finds him attractive. Of course, it's easier if she does, but most men don't have this luxury.

Rebelling against the Wifely Master

Unfortunately, the overriding gist of what LastMod wrote is true for most men. Much of this is because modern Blue Pilled men esteem wimmin and/or their wives as their lord and master (and wives implicitly expect their full obedience). But let's sidestep all the contentions, "Happy Wife" stuff, issues of attraction, p00n worship, and so on, and let's reframe the situation as one of Headship — not brute force authority as some readers may imagine, but a social dexterity that allows a man to roll out of a verbal punch and come out on top, much like what Tim Tackett demonstrated in the video above.

A man has to come to a point where he sees that this inverted structure of authority does not glorify the Lord and is, in fact, the source of the many problems he is facing in his marriage and family. And if/when a man ever comes to that point, he must decide whether to buckle down and obey the wife more perfectly (and risk being disrespected and/or tossed away by her whenever he doesn't measure up), or else stage a rebellion against the wifely master. In the latter case, the battle for Headship begins on the home turf!

Jesus described this situation as thus.

> "If anyone comes to me and does not hate his own father and mother and wife and children and brothers and sisters, yes, and even his own life, he cannot be my disciple.
> *Luke 14:26 (ESV)

Looking at the state of relationships between the sexes these days, in general, I think men are acclimating towards the new norm of distrusting and "hating" women* en masse. Those of us who are family minded are saddened by this state of affairs, but on a positive note, it's good for men to be turning away from the idolatry and pedestalization of wimmin.

 Readers should be mindful of interpreting "hate his own wife" / "hating women" in context. It speaks of the importance of placing Christ first and is not intended to be a blanket policy of m!s0gyny. Cane Caldo explained this context very well in Making Heads or Tails of It (2014/2/13)

You'll waste a lot of time fighting worthless battles if you don't know who the enemy is.

The Battle begins in the Home

To address LastMod's statements:

> "Most married men who try this will be given a barrage of answers like I mentioned above or it will look "phony", like when I was "being a man and approaching girls and exuding confidence"."

It doesn't matter. It only matters if the goal is poon. What matters more is that he's working towards Headship.

> "Today in these matters, it's the difference between the Have's and Have Not's. Most men probably gave up when they realized their "tough guy" stance didn't work."

Most men are the Have Nots, but it doesn't matter. Remember, this is a gynocentric view of men. What matters more is that he is glorifying and pleasing God in his own way. BTW, the "tough guy" stance is sooo 20th century.

> "It's easier to take the "Happy Wife, Happy Life" stance and just deal with it.

Yes, it's easier. But as deti said,

> "Most men have nothing they're willing to fight or die for."

The key idea in this case is not so much that men have nothing at all, but that they lack the WILLINGNESS to choose their battles.

> "Because we know in a divorce…. the court doesn't care if she didn't "follow your masculine leadership". They will side with her, and the married man will be forced to move…"

Yes, a man will have to decide whether Headship is something he wants enough to fight and die for it. As it has been said,

> "The measure of a man is in how far he is willing to go to do what he has to do."

Understanding where the Battle Lies

Deti wrote,

> "Usually he knows why he fights, for whom he fights, and what he's willing to do in the service of his master."

Yes. Most modern men don't recognize Headship as a battle that needs to be fought, and perhaps die for. The crux of this problem is that too many men believe that pedestalizing their wife as their lord and master is the Christian way to approach things. It is not.

Deti said,

> "A man needs something he's willing to fight and die for."

If a man who has been through the wringer can come to see a broken home, a failed marriage, fighting a termagant for the welfare of his children, etc. as a hill he fought and died for (figuratively), this may give him a sense of dignity, honor, and self-respect. But men need to know what it is that he's fighting for — glorifying God through Headship — resisting being dominated by a woman, and refusing to let his children be devoured by a consuming mother and the rebellious lies of this world.

Many men have already fought this battle, and many more are still fighting it. It's time they received recognition for their valor — instead of being denigrated for not fulfilling the intransigent Feminine Imperative.

The Battle Within

The Sinful Nature is the Default Setting

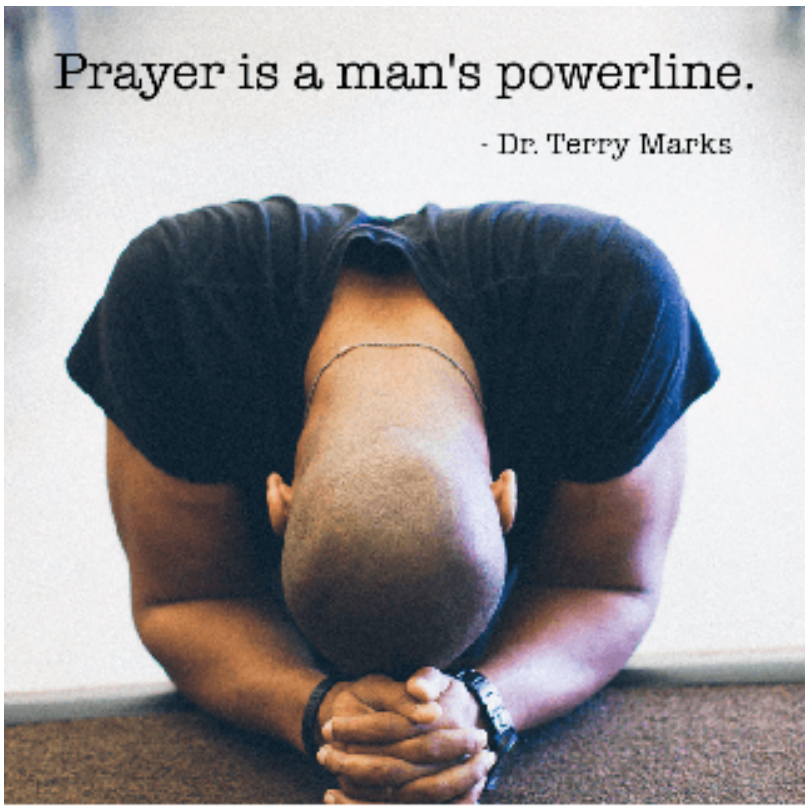
Every person by virtue of being made in the image of God and being descendants of Adam and Eve who ate of the tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil, inherently knows what is right and wrong. However, we are subject to our sin nature, and without Christ that sin nature will ALWAYS choose wrong. With continued practice of choosing wrong, humans sear their consciences, lose that sense of discernment, and become confused about what is right and wrong. Christian circles refer to this as being "lost".

This is why there is always dissonance between one's conscience and what one wants to do. To appease the conscience and alleviate guilt and shame, they invent justifications, narratives, reasons, or stories. They boast. They hamsterbate. They keep secrets. They lie. They project. They scheme. This leads to a disconnect between people and God and between people and other people.

This is why proponents of abortion, euth@nas!a, h0m0sexu@l!ty, no fault divorce, tr@nsgəndər!sm, and so on will SHOUT from the rooftops about all the supposed GOOD reasons why what they do is justified, even moral. They NEED to believe it is good, so they can sin with their consciences appeased. They need to JUSTIFY the sin – because they know it is sin – but they salvage their consciences by telling themselves that they are doing it for "love", tolerance, to end suffering, to prevent su!c!de, to "make the world a better place", and so on — all for the supposed common GOOD!!!

Redemption is a Battle against the Sinful Self

Christian redemption and regeneration is the only way out of this mess of confusion and sin.



Firstly, we get back in touch with the conscience. We gain clarity about our own sin and how it is harmful. We repent and reject our own sin. When we receive Christ, our spirits are regenerated and we want to please God. God gives us the desire to fight against our sinful nature. We have the Holy Spirit Who empowers us. But the sinful nature doesn't just disappear. It will always be there in us as long as our spirits inhabit the fleshly bodies we live in. We continue to live in the weak mortal flesh of earthly bodies surrounded by a world of sin and temptation. Our sinful nature is reviled by this inner conflict. It continues seeking escapement, or to fight for its own dominance in our lives, or to be included in the corrupt world around us. Our conviction wants the opposite.

Hence, the true fight. The Christian is in constant battle with his own sinful nature, the flesh, the world, the value system that feeds the flesh and Satan — the deceiver who tells us that our sinful nature is GOOD. That voice saying, "It does not matter if you sin, so long as you are happy. Your HAPPINESS glorifies God, not your OBEDIENCE."

The Weaker Vessels are Especially Susceptible

As we learned in the study of Female Agency, women are less capable of maintaining this fight than men are, on the average.

Women shun introspection and personal responsibility. They will fight and become feisty nasty if pressed into it. Meanwhile, the world tells women they are beautiful, perfect, strong, and independent to stoke their sinful Pride and further fuel their rebellion against conscience and God. In addition, the world offers them a smorgasbord of entertaining distractions, gnostic assurances and justifications, and gynocentric narratives about how they are "victims" (presumably of men). Satan feeds them the idea that everything "just happens" and that they have no control over their own lives.

Women resist trusting and submitting to male authority. They seek independence and profligacy. The world tells women they need an education, financial independence, and birth control so that they will never have to depend on nor trust a man. Satan feeds them the idea that men are childish, immature, irresponsible, reckless, selfish, "toxic", and untrustworthy.

Wives' sinful nature wants to control their husband (Genesis 3:16). The world tells women they need to control men or else they will be abused, and then offers methods of controlling men (Duluth, MƏT00, No Fault Divorce, etc.). Satan deceives women by feeding them the idea that controlling their husbands and men in general is GOOD. "Feminism good, Patriarchy bad!" Even the church propagates the false teaching that a husband needs to "earn" his wife's respect by being a true "servant leader". No! Wives need to respect their husbands because he is their husband!

Women are their own worst enemy.

Men Prefer to be the Weaker Vessel

Men have to perform and produce. No exceptions. Men can't get a break. It is easy for Men to feel like mules or workhorses which are only valued for what they can do, or how much they can earn. Men fail to find the joy or value of achievement, or building a domain, or developing confidence and a healthy ego. Thus, Men are prone to see work as a curse and not as an opportunity to build, consolidate a domain, and succeed (Genesis 3:17-19).

Things like appreciation, gratitude, having a dominion of authority, honor, respect, and yes, a regular fulfilling sex life, can guard men's hearts against losing vision and feeling like lowly draftstock. But these motivations are meticulously trimmed out of a man's life by the carelessness and cruelty of others and the forces of evil. In fact, Women / Wives have a multitude of peculiar and well-honed skills designed to inflict the opposite mentality on a man which a man must guard himself against at all times.

The World ignores a man if he's not 6'2", good looking, rich and/or well employed.

The World punishes a man if he's short, fat, bald, homely, honestly outspoken, or exceptionally common.

The World snarks a man if he can't compete with Chad or the Jones'.

The World goads Men into sin and then kicks them when they're down. To keep them down, the World offers them a smorgasbord of entertaining distractions, e.g. alcohol, legalized marijuana, NetFlix, and endless p0rn at a click.

The World tells Men they are abusive, bad, corrupt, immature, "toxic", and that they need to "control themselves" (meaning to be emasculated and impotent) or else they will be branded as abusers and predators.

The World feeds Men gynocentric narratives about how they are supposed to serve and worship women endlessly and with no thought to themselves.

Satan feeds Men the idea that they have no abilities nor gifts, no authority, no domain of influence, no purpose, and that they have no control over their own lives.

Satan discourages Men with the half-truth that their value is determined by how well they can compete in this World, and that they are worthless if they can't. Again, even the church propagates the false teaching that a husband needs to "earn" his wife's respect by being a true "servant leader". No! All Men, including Husbands, have an intrinsic need for respect regardless of their performance! If Satan can get a foothold in this area, he'll stoke bitterness, confusion, discouragement, envy, fear, lust, and anything else he can invent.

Satan tells men they need a woman to make their life complete, and this in a culture in which women are self-centered, tattooed, h0ed out baby elephants, ruined for marriage right out of high school.

Satan deceives Men (and Women) with the idea that women are perfect goddesses, princesses, but utterly forbids Men from viewing Women as companions, helpers, housewives, lovers, baby makers, and sex toys to be used for their natural purpose.

All said, and as you can imagine, it is easy for Men to resist exerting the will, to avoid the battle, to retreat, and disengage through comfort, distraction, and ease. Men lose the battle when they become confused, lose discernment, lose focus, lose purpose, and give in to cowardice, fear, laziness, Herodianism, and self-indulgence. Men go AWOL when they fail to engage in living out the challenges that each day brings. If Men fall in battle, it is to be expected. He must pick himself up and prepare for the next day of battle. But if Men willingly choose a path of desertion (e.g. by resorting to an addiction, entertainment, p0rn, etc.) they are resisting God. Turning to a faux archetype is a cope, but Men need to work through those issues towards maturity (i.e. "perfection" in Biblical language).

The Battle Lies Within

As discussed above, there are three main arenas in which we battle.

1. Against the flesh (sinful nature) by displaying Fruits of the Spirit (Galatians 5:22-23).
2. Against the world by basing our lives on God's morality and transforming our minds in accordance with His thinking according to His precepts and commandments.
3. Against Satan by calling out the Truth from the lies (how Satan tries to deceive).

To the extent the Christian wins these battles, we bring Glory to God.

As Christians, we have to align our actions with the Word. We must obey the Lord in Spirit and in Truth, but our fleshly nature resists at every turn. We want to run on autopilot and pursue pleasure without a care as to whether it is wrong or not. We want to enjoy the three ring circus of the world and feel accepted therein. We listen to Satan ignorantly and passively and get confused, swept away, and incapacitated. Thus, the Battle Lies Within.

Women's main battle within is to NOT create unnecessary battles with and difficulties for the men in their lives, but to SUBMIT to their fathers or husbands in ACTION and to RESPECT them in ATTITUDE.

Men have a more complex battle to contend with. As we learned in the study of Faux Masculine Archetypes, Men have many ways to cope with this, but overall, the battle within is to resist the temptation to anesthetize, cop out, and kick back.

In our own strength, it is impossible. But having received Christ, we have the choice to obey or disobey. We depend on the Holy Spirit for strength to do it. We cannot do it on our own. It is a daily struggle, which is why the disciplines of Bible study and prayer are important, as I mentioned in The Challenges of Moving Towards Headship (2023/4/5). Over time, as our spiritual maturity increases the battles are won but the struggle is always real. There are days when we will have epic fails — which happens when we try to do it on our own strength. It is only when we abide in the Holy Spirit does the Fruit of the Spirit become manifest. And we have to keep our eyes on the prize. "Well done, good and faithful servant."

The war is real. The battle lines are drawn. We already have the final victory which was achieved by Christ when he died and rose again. It is the daily battles that still need to be done and this will continue as long as we inhabit our earthly bodies. Since we are born again, our spirit will never die but our earthly bodies will (which is why Christians believe in resurrection of the body NOT the spirit).

In heaven, we will have glorified bodies. We will not contend against our fallen fleshly nature. We will not have the world's value system to contend with, and Satan is out of the picture. We will have all these restraints removed from our desire to follow God (placed in our regenerated spirits when we received Christ). We will be free from the curses of sin. That is why it will be HEAVEN!!! Finally, true lasting peace and no more battles to fight!!!

We cannot do this on our own strength. It is only Jesus who can give us the wisdom and the strength to do so. To the extent we depend on HIM; to the extent we OBEY HIM — we will win. We will bring GLORY to GOD and we will be given a heavenly reward for it.

A Hierarchy of Authority Establishes Order

In any organization, order comes from hierarchy.

History teaches us that the strongest and/or the weakest link is the Second in command.

Strong — If you have the loyalty of the second in command.

Weak — If the second in command is trying to usurp the authority of the head.

Several case studies follow.

Case Study 1 — Ghengis Khan and Subutai

Info shared this video about Ghengis Khan and Subutai as an example of Agentic Purpose. His life is full of achievements. Constantly on the move, constantly in action until the very end. To be alive is to never stop. But to constantly be in action.

Subutai was the Khan's hound. Every emperor had to watch his back – literally – but not Genghis, because of Subutai.

Indeed! The fact that Temujin was able to command such loyalty is the reason why his "Praetorian Guard" never backstabbed him. The most excellent Roman Emperors never commanded an equivalent loyalty.

Case Study 2 — King David and General Joab

Joab was King David's general. He was a loose cannon, BUT he was loyal to David for the most part. Of note, Joab went to some lengths to give honor and glory to King David.

> 26 And Joab fought against Rabbah of the children of Ammon, and took the royal city.
> 27 And Joab sent messengers to David, and said, I have fought against Rabbah, and have taken the city of waters.
> 28 Now therefore gather the rest of the people together, and encamp against the city, and take it: lest I take the city, and it be called after my name.
> 29 And David gathered all the people together, and went to Rabbah, and fought against it, and took it.
> II Samuel 12:26-29

Joab had the chance to get credit for the victory, but he left it to David.

Case Study 3 — Tribal Families

In Jəwish culture, the firstborn got the double portion. It also meant that the greater responsibility of the family rested on his shoulders. The younger siblings had greater freedom to go forth and establish their own fiefdoms — little kingdoms, so to speak. But the understanding was that in a time of crisis, the brothers could be summoned.

To extent the brothers were united, the family stood strong. But if there was a war between brothers, the family grew weak. Consider the classic case of Joseph and his brothers. Even though Reuben was the eldest, he was ignored when he wanted to spare Joseph. It was only when Judah took responsibility for his younger brother Benjamin many years later that their repentance was complete and the family stood united again.

Case Study 4 — Marriage

In a Family, if the Wife is loyal, respects her Husband, and has his back, there is order in the family. If the Wife is contentious, disrespectful, and trying to usurp Headship, then the family crumbles.

In marriage, the source of ALL contention is a disobedient / unsubmissive wife.

This is exactly why Satan approached Eve in the Garden of Eden. "Why be loyal to God when you can be god yourself?" And Adam let Eve be his god. So the hierarchy of God / Man / Woman / Creation became inverted to Serpent / Woman / Man.

Other Examples of Authoritative Hierarchy

In an organisation, if the second in command manager stands behind the CEO, then the organisation stays strong. But if he tries to take the CEO's position, either in position, role, or decision making capacity, then the organisation goes into a takeover war.

In a sports team, when the captain supports the coach, the team is strong. But when there are differences between the two, then the players get confused about leadership, purpose, and strategy, morale falls, and the team starts losing.

On a ship, when the First Mate supports the Captain / Commander there is smooth sailing. If the First Mate goes against the Captain, it is a Mutiny.

Conclusions

The takeaways are as follows.

When the hierarchy is honored and respected, there is order.

The second in command, be it the General, the second brother, or the wife, et al. has a crucial choice: You can have the back of the chief or you can be the knife in the back. ("Et tu Brute!")

The strength of whatever institution is at stake depends on that choice.

Therefore, the second in command should be loyal to the first in command, the Emperor, the heir, the husband, et al.

If the second finds contentment in that role, then the purpose of the hierarchy becomes stronger and better able to withstand attack. Consequently, everyone in the nation, army, organisation, family, et al. is significantly benefitted and better off. But if the second tries to usurp the first's authority, then the whole institution will be weakened and defeated.

Indeed, coveting a position of leadership can wreak great havoc, while Godliness with contentment is great gain (I Timothy 6:6).

Exit Questions

What is your purpose? To be the head or to create something strong?

- As Christians, all authority has been given to us with Christ as our head. Are we loyal to Him, or are we trying to become gods ourselves?
- Between brothers, fights and scraps are normal. But nobody else hits your brother without going through you first.
- Between husband and wife, disagreements are bound to happen. But nobody talks bad about my husband / wife within earshot of me. Whatever is to be discussed, it will be done with propriety and tact.

As a result of your choice, what will your legacy be?

- A feared general of a powerful nation, or a derelict Benedict Arnold?
- A Christian man with a purpose for living, or a gynocentric simp (or worse)?
- A much beloved wife and mother, or a decrepid battle axe b!tch who disrespected her husband, dishonored her marriage, broke up her family, and destroyed her own children?

Domination is not Destruction

Introduction

The earth was given to Man to dominate:

> Then God said, "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness. And let them have dominion over the fish of the sea and over the birds of the heavens and over the livestock and over all the earth and over every creeping thing that creeps on the earth."
> So God created man in his own image, > in the image of God he created him;
> male and female he created them.
> And God blessed them. And God said to them, "Be fruitful and multiply and fill the earth and subdue it, and have dominion over the fish of the sea and over the birds of the heavens and over every living thing that moves on the earth."
> Genesis 1:26-28 (NKJV)

A quote from this interview with Kelly Ware, a permaculture practitioner and Christian, caught my attention:

> "We were put on earth as stewards, to take care of the garden, and our domination thing, that we're able to, you know, dominate is that we make the choices for things. We say this plant goes, this plant stays, this earth works needs to happen. So I really think that in terms of empowering ourselves to do earth works, because you're changing a lot of things, but we've been given that right, to dominate and through that job that we were designed to do, which is steward creation."

According to Merriam Webster, domination means:

1. Supremacy or preeminence over another
2. Exercise of mastery or ruling power
3. Exercise of preponderant, governing, or controlling influence

Notice one thing that the word dominate does not mean: destroy.

Progressive Liberalism associates Domination with Destruction

Many conservatives seem to believe that domination and destruction are synonymous. Ann Coulter writes:

> "The ethic of conservation is the explicit abnegation of man's dominion over the Earth. The lower species are here for our use. God said so: Go forth, be fruitful, multiply, and rape the planet — it's yours. That's our job: drilling, mining and stripping."

Is this truly what God says in the Bible? Let us check:

> The Lord God took the man and put him in the garden of Eden to work it and keep it.
> Genesis 2:15 (NKJV)

It is Man's job to dominate and subdue the earth not by raping and destroying it but rather by working and keeping it. The reason for working and keeping the earth isn't because the earth is an object worthy of spiritual adoration, as environmentalists and some permaculture practitioners believe, but rather because God gave it to us for sustenance and human flourishing:

> And God said, "Behold, I have given you every plant yielding seed that is on the face of all the earth, and every tree with seed in its fruit. You shall have them for food.
> Genesis 1:29 (NKJV)

Environmentalists, who are nearly all liberals, frequently fantasize about the elimination of humans from the earth due to the mistaken belief that the earth would be "better off" without us. They see Man's domination of the earth as inherently sinful (I use the word sinful to describe their religious-like beliefs because liberalism is their religion and is as authoritarian in its moral prescriptions as any other religion or political orientation).

Some secular permaculturists share the opinion that Man's domination of the earth is bad, Bad, BAD! But others do not, as this quote demonstrates:

> "Societies and their inhabitant are the reason that ecosystems (such as the Amazon Rainforest) are abundant in bio-diversity and life. In Permaculture it is constantly reinforced that human disturbance leads to environmental degradation; however, new evidence strongly concludes that without human disturbance, eco-systems would not be as thriving if humans were out of the picture."

Stourhead Warminster gardens, England

Women are a part of Man's Dominion

In addition to the earth, Woman was also given to be under Man's dominion:

> Then the Lord God said, "It is not good that the man should be alone; I will make him a helper fit for him."
> Genesis 2:18 (NKJV)

Women, kindly read that verse again. For whom were we created? For him. And to whom were we given?

> And the rib that the Lord God had taken from the man he made into a woman and brought her to the man.

Woman was given to Man to be under his dominion, not so that he can destroy her but so that he can cultivate a helper for his work of having dominion over the earth. This is where feminists, like environmentalists, get it wrong. They correctly perceive that some men are using their God-given dominion to destroy rather than cultivate their women, and they decide that Man's domination itself is the problem, when in fact sin (destruction) is the problem.

We moderns see the word domination used in the man/woman context almost solely in the sense of sexually perverse role plays, but this is not what Christians should understand it to mean, not even when the context is the marital act. Rather, the godly husband takes dominion over his wife and cultivates her to better fulfill her role as his helper in his domination (cultivation) of the earth.

Pastor Doug Wilson explained this well in something he wrote a few years ago:

> "A man penetrates, conquers, colonizes, plants. A woman receives, surrenders, accepts. This is of course offensive to all egalitarians, and so our culture has rebelled against the concept of authority and submission in marriage. This means that we have sought to suppress the concepts of authority and submission as they relate to the marriage bed."

People lost their minds when he wrote this, with Christian feminist Rachel Held Evans writing:

> "It's not about sex. It's not about church leadership. It's not about roles. It's not about the Bible.
> It's about power.
> It's about whether or not patriarchy — man's rule over woman — really represents God's ideal for the world.
> And I believe, with every bone in my body, that patriarchy is a result of sin. I believe that followers of Jesus are to be champions of equality, and that it is our calling…"

But a man conquering a woman does not implicitly mean he destroys her. A man who conquers his wife in the sense that Pastor Wilson means is cultivating a family. His dominion leads to flourishing rather than destruction.

Man's Dominion is to be Cultivated, not Destroyed

Although it is pagan in spiritual orientation, I love the blog Bealtine Cottage, a site written by a woman in Ireland who bought a derelict cottage on some old agricultural land that was badly damaged by conventional farming practices and transformed it using permaculture gardening techniques into a gorgeous food forest. Her stories and photos are fascinating. However, the authoress Ms. O'Neill has misunderstood what domination of the earth and Woman by Man means. She writes:

> "As this era of masculine dominance comes to an end and a feminine understanding of life's wholeness is included, we are beginning to experience a different world in which physical, mental, and spiritual well-being are interdependent."
> "A limited and patriarchal interpretation of the Creator, has given us a male figure, with the female as subservient.
> Dominance of Nature and continuous war has ensued…"

It is clear from the Bible that God gave the earth and Woman to Man not to destroy but rather to cultivate, as we saw in Genesis 2:15. It isn't that male domination destroys the earth or women; it is that after the fall, men sometimes use their God-given right to dominate the earth for destructive purposes, rather than using their domination of the earth and their women to cultivate a flourishing garden and thriving families. The solution isn't to reject the order of creation that God intended, that of loving domination by Man, but rather for men to teach one another (something women absolutely cannot do) to use their God-given right of dominion to cultivate rather than destroy and then insist that it be so.

Part of the chaff of modernity is the belief that humans having dominion (domination) over the earth and Man having dominion (domination) over Woman is inherently destructive. This is not true. Only sinful behavior is destructive. Godly dominion does not destroy; rather, it cultivates so that all which is under dominion flourishes.

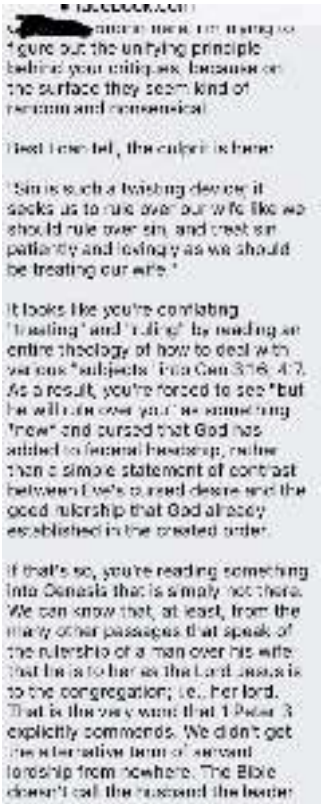
Bnonn Tennant's Viewpoints

I've been really busy so I have been sitting on this for a while, but a long time ago on their Faceb00k page, It's Good To Be A Man went on a spree of posting bizarre interpretations of scripture. They then deleted posts / comments, and started blocking anyone who raised any questions.

Here's a clip of one such interaction between Bnonn Tennant and a commenter on their Faceb00k IGTBAM ministry page…



In the above interchange, the commenter wrote,

> "Sin is such a twisting device; it seeks us to rule over our wife like we should rule over sin, and treat sin > patiently and lovingly as we should be treating our wife."

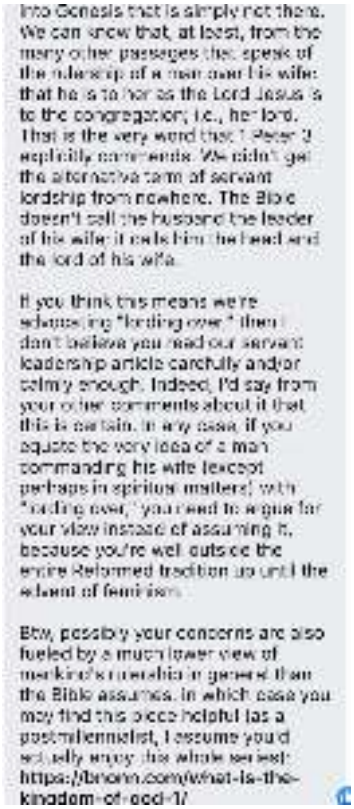
The focus of his comment is on how we approach sin, with the marital relationship being used as a comparative analogy. The commenter is clearly a churchianized complementarian, as there is a strong negative connotation with "rule" here, only as it applies to the husband ruling over the wife (in contradiction to Genesis 3:16, which states that husbands shall rule over their wives). But yes, sin is twisting. If we correct this bias error, then the sentiment behind the commenter's statement infers that he was trying to say,

> "Sin is such a twisting device; it seeks us to oppress our wives while we treat sin patiently and lovingly, when instead, we should be ruling over sin while we are being patient and loving with our wives."

While wordy, and filled with churchian presuppositions, the intent of the comment was benign, and something most would agree with on a superficial level. That wasn't good enough for Bnonn. In response, Bnonn picked out the above commenter as the "culprit", and unleashed an unprovoked tirade, stating that the commenter's critiques are random and nonsensical.



into Genesis that is simply not there. We can know that, at least, from the many other passages that speak of the rulership of a man over his wife: that he is to her as the Lord Jesus is to the congregation; i.e., her lord. That is the very word that 1 Peter 3 explicitly commands. We didn't get the alternative term of servant lordship from nowhere. The Bible doesn't call the husband the leader of his wife; it calls him the head and the lord of his wife.

If you think this means we're advocating "lording over," then I don't believe you read our servant leadership article carefully and/or calmly enough. Indeed, I'd say from your other comments about it that this is certain. In any case, if you equate the very idea of a man commanding his wife (except perhaps in spiritual matters) with "lording over," you need to argue for your view instead of assuming it, because you're well outside the entire Reformed tradition up until the advent of feminism.

Btw, possibly your concerns are also fueled by a much lower view of mankind's ruership in general than the Bible assumes. In which case you may find this piece helpful (as a postmillennialist, I assume you'd actually enjoy the whole series): https://bnonn.com/what-is-the-kingdom-of-god-1/

Bnonn Tennant responded,

> "It looks like you're conflating "treating" and "ruling" by reading an entire theology of how to deal with various "subjects" into Genesis 3:16; 4:7. As a result, you're forced to see "but he will rule over you" as something new and cursed that God has added to federal headship, rather than a simple statement of contrast between Eve's cursed desire and the good rulership that God already established in the created order.
> If that's so, you're reading something into Genesis that is simply not there. We can know that, at least, from the many other passages that speak of the rulership of a man over his wife: that he is to her as the Lord Jesus is to the congregation; i.e. her lord. [Citation of 1 Peter 3:1-8] The bible doesn't call the husband the leader of his wife, it calls him the head and the lord of his wife."

Those of us who are well read on Dalrock can get the point, but why all the vitriol towards a reader who is starting to "get it"?

What does Bnonn Tennant believe?

It's clear from his comment that Tennant subscribes to Federal Headship (FH). Personally, I have a negative opinion of FH, but I will not go into that here. Readers who are familiar with FH might comment about how this influences his argument.

According to this dialogue, Bnonn's responses communicate his beliefs to be the following:

1. Male rulership, according to Genesis 3:16, is not an indication of a curse.
2. The nature of male rulership did not change as a result of the fall.
3. The statement, "he will rule over you", poses a contrast between Eve's cursed desire, and the "good rulership" that God had already established.
4. That marital headship is a perfect analogy to the relationship between Christ and the Church.

On point 1, Tennant is going overboard in his defense of headship. It is true that there was headship pre-fall. It is true that Adam had authority over Eve. However, "he will rule over you" is given in the same pronouncement as sorrow, pain in childbirth, and increased desire, so it is hard to penalize someone for thinking that it is not somehow part of the curse.

With point 2, the glaring problem is that there is effectively no basis for saying that improper rulership over a woman is not a product of the fall. Ephesians 5:25-29 encourages husbands to love their wife with the implication that in our fallen world, our default is to be harsh in "ruling over" our wives.

Third, we have a logical conundrum here. The woman is placed at enmity with her husband — she will strive for his power. Does it make sense that strife within a marital relationship would be taken in stride, as opposed to causing a reaction (i.e. passivity on one end, harshness on the other)?

On the last point, the likeness between Christ and the Church and Husbands and Wives is an analogous ontology to be regarded as an ideal for us to work towards. Unfortunately, it is not the real thing, and it will never be so because we are in a fallen world and in a state of sin. While we hope to grow in our sanctification, we will never be perfect. But instead of holding this up as a model to aspire to, Tennant appears to be laying this down as a law comparable to the 10 Commandments; one that must be obeyed or else!

Douglas Wilson

Tennant and Foster are not the only guys who are confused about Genesis 3:16. Douglas Wilson holds a very similar interpretation of this passage, which might explain why they often cite his work on this and many other topics. If readers are interested, Wilson v. Genesis 3:16 (2020/9/26) from Full Metal Patriarchy recounts a conversation he had with Douglas Wilson over his ever changing interpretations of this scripture.

A Double Minded Man

Hold on! Just when we think we've understood Tennant's stance, a little more reading from his blog shows that he is more confused than we might've believed!

In the series he linked to at the end of his comment on FB, Tennant contradicts the stance he took on FB by admitting that man's rule is not always good. In the sixth post in this series, he writes,

> "The problem since the fall has been that men, by nature, cannot represent God. In our natural state we are enemies of God; we stalwartly refuse to rule on his behalf; we will always choose to rule for ourselves instead. We choose injustice over justice, vice over virtue, divisiveness over shalom — because every thought and inclination of our hearts is only, always, toward evil (Genesis 6:5; 8:21; Jeremiah 17:9)."
> In the Habit of Goring (Bnonn Tennant): What is the kingdom of God? Part 6: how God is retaking Adam's kingdom from Satan (2017/3/29)

Of course, he is right about this. The Bible declares that man's nature is corrupt in many other verses in addition to those cited by Tennant. (See Job 14:1-6; Psalm 14:1-3; Isaiah 53:6; Isaiah 59:7-15; Isaiah 64:6-7; Romans 3:10-20; Romans 3:23; et al.) We need look no further than the history of government to find real evidence of this.

Conclusions

In the earlier conversation on FB, Tennant is correct in pointing out the commenters negative bias against "rule over", but he fails to acknowledge the reader's primary fear that man's rule is not always good. If the commenter was already aware of the scriptures that describe the corruption of man (which are emphasized in churchian circles), then I can see how he could be confused about what Tennant is saying.

It seems that Tennant cannot bring himself to see nor admit that it is God's ordained order for men to rule over their wives, and that man's rule is corrupted by the sinful nature (as a product of the fall) and therefore may not always be good. For the uninitiated or those weak in faith, this might call into question the fundamental goodness of God.

At first, we might think Tennant's theological dance is founded on the Complementarian conclusion that it is better for men not to rule, but to implement a "Federal" system of authority in which authority is shared with women (or "nicely balanced" as Wilson puts it), thereby making it necessary to deviate from God's ordained order. The fact that women are also fallen, possess less moral agency than men on the average, and are therefore also unfit to lead is casually glossed over, but if this does come into question, this is then easily explained as being another consequence of the fall.

Or, maybe Tennant is aware that such an admission would undermine his whole argument in favor of man being the ruler over his own household (which is correct, but questionable in the eyes of his churchian followers).

Dominic Bnonn Tennant

While it is truly humbling to present a frustrated argument that is nevertheless true, this logical conundrum is exactly what pushes us to find faith in Jesus. But instead of allowing us to see Jesus, he doubles down on saying male rulership is good (and whips his reader in doing so), and then says, "Go see my other series" in which he presents a Biblical exegesis that says male rulership is corrupt.

> A double minded man is unstable in all his ways.
> James 1:8 (KJV)

I suppose things like this are why IGTBAM has decreased in popularity since that time. It must be exhausting for their followers!

It would be much simpler and easier to say that it is right for man to rule (e.g. Headship, patriarchy, etc.), but it is difficult for men and not always good for women. But even so, a lack of male rule would be much worse. Thus, having good strong male rulership is essential.

More Contrasting Exegetical Interpretations

If I haven't worn the reader out yet, here's another blunder from Tennant.

Tennant also castigated his reader's stance on Genesis 3 to be "outside the entire Reformed tradition up until the advent of Feminism", thereby insinuating that his own stance was in line with Reformed doctrine. So let's compare Tennant's beliefs with those of the heavy hitters.

John Calvin's commentary on the relevant portion of Genesis 3:16 states,

> "The second punishment which he exacts is subjection. For this form of speech, "Thy desire shall be unto thy husband", is of the same force as if he had said that she should not be free and at her own command, but subject to the authority of her husband and dependent upon his will; or as if he had said, "Thou shalt desire nothing but what thy husband wishes." As it is declared afterwards, "Unto thee shall be his desire," (Genesis 4:7.)

> Thus the woman, who had perversely exceeded her proper bounds, is forced back to her own position. She had, indeed, previously been subject to her husband, but that was a liberal and gentle subjection; now, however, she is cast into servitude."

John Gill writes:

> "And he shall rule over thee, with less kindness and gentleness, with more rigour and strictness: it looks as if before the transgression there was a greater equality between the man and the woman, or man did not exercise the authority over the woman he afterwards did, or the subjection of her to him was more pleasant and agreeable than now it would be; and this was her chastisement…"

Matthew Henry writes:

> "She is here put into a state of subjection. The whole sex, which by creation was equal with man, is, for sin, made inferior, and forbidden to usurp authority (1 Timothy 2:11, 1 Timothy 2:12). The wife particularly is hereby put under the dominion of her husband, and is not sui juris – at her own disposal, of which see an instance in that law, Numbers 30:6-8, where the husband is empowered, if he please, to disannul the vows made by the wife. This sentence amounts only to that command, "Wives, be in subjection to your own husbands"; but the entrance of sin has made that duty a punishment, which otherwise it would not have been."

The Reformed Study Bible notes:

> The harmony, intimacy, and complementarity of the pre-fall marriage relationship are corrupted by sin and marred both by domination and enforced submission. The restoration of this relationship takes place through new life in Christ.

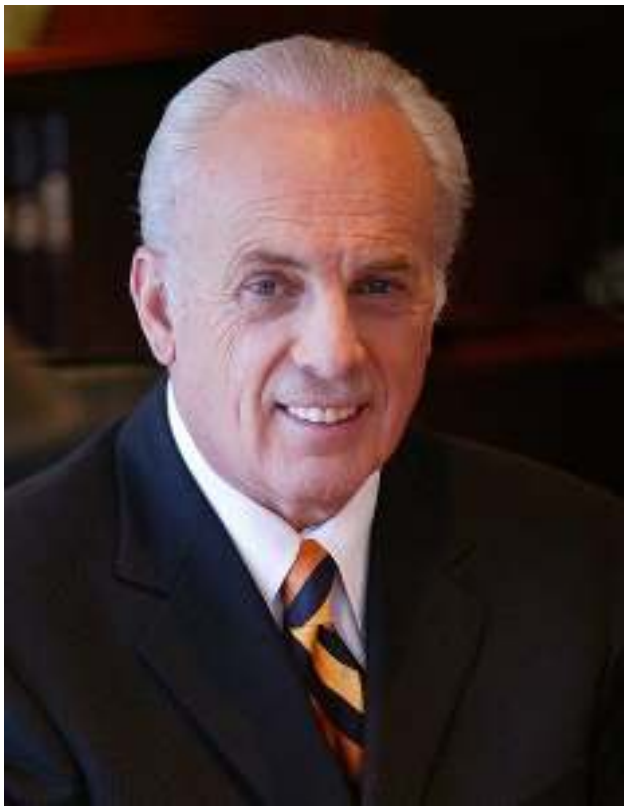
Bnonn's exegesis of the passage is strange and novel, it is not mainstream, and it is not historic. It is not from "Reformed theology." John Calvin, John Gill, Matthew Henry, and the Reformed Study Bible all share an opposing view of this passage.

However, Tennant's stance coincides with certain views of John MacArthur. The MacArthur Study Bible deviates from the sources above. It states [emphasis mine]:

> "Just as the woman and her seed will engage in a war with the serpent, i.e. Satan, and his seed, because of sin and the curse, the man and the woman will face struggles in their own relationship. Sin has turned the harmonious system of God-ordained roles into distasteful struggles of self-will… the woman's desire will be to lord it over her husband, but the husband will rule by divine design (Ephesians 5:22-25). This interpretation of the curse is based upon the identical Hebrew words and grammar being used in Genesis 4:7 to show how the conflict man will have with sin as it seeks to rule him."

This is the first commentary that favors Bnonn's position. As a side note, it is ironic that Bnonn, a self-described post-millennialist, would agree with the perspectives in the MacArthur's study bible.

John MacArthur, however, is in line with the other interpretations of this passage cited above. On his exegetical sermon on the subject, he stated:



John MacArthur

> "Let's take the first line. "Your desire shall be for your husband." Some have suggested that this means a sexual desire. That's certainly not a punishment and that is something God gave them before the Fall. How else could He say, "Be fruitful and multiply," if they already weren't prepared to engage in that kind of relationship? This is not God cursing them by having the woman desire a physical relationship with her husband. She has always desired that in a perfectly loving way. This means something else. This means that her desire – her desire is going to be something negative, something that reflects separation and alienation. Up to this point everything does. Enmity was put between the serpent and the woman. Enmity was put between the man and the ground. And enmity is put between the wife and her husband. She can't do what she wishes. She isn't going to live her own life totally independent, like the feminists demand, because her husband rules over her. Whatever she wishes, whatever she desires is subject to his will. She won't always get what she wants. She won't always have what she desires. She's going to have to bear the sorrow of unfulfillment. She's going to have desires and dreams and ambitions that aren't going to be fulfilled, because her husband does not have a perfect love for > her, does not have a perfect understanding of her, or even, some might say, an imperfect understanding of her. And he's going to rule her in ways that lack compassion and sympathy. This is how it is in the world. This is how it is.

> On the other hand, verse 16, the end, "And he shall rule over you." Let's look at the word rule for a minute, mashal. It means to dominate, to reign, literally means to install in office. The idea is as the woman seeks to overthrow the rank, as the woman seeks to twist the divine order, as the woman seeks to master her husband, seek control over him, he dominates her. As the woman tends toward rebellion, the man tends toward despotism. And you have the battle of the sexes right here. That's why there's conflict in marriage. And there is conflict in marriage, no question about it. Her desire is teshuqah — teshuqah. It doesn't mean sexual desire, she already had that before the Fall. It's the desire to get her way. And it even shows up, sad to say, in places where it shouldn't show up. Paul is writing to Timothy in the church at Ephesus and he says, "I permit not a woman to teach nor to" – what? – "usurp authority." Because that's a tendency.
> What is it saying in chapter 4 verse 7? The Lord is speaking to Cain. He says, "Sin desires you." What does that mean? Sin wants to control you. Sin wants to dominate you. Sin wants to take over your life. "But you must master it. You must rule over it." It's the very same expression. The woman desires to control man, and he rules over her. Sin desires to have you; you must control it. The woman then has the same desire for the man that sin has for Cain, a desire to control, a desire to have its way. And the husband has the same need to control his wife that Cain had to control sin."
> (See References below)

Going back to Bnonn's comment, he would say that John Calvin, John Gill, Matthew Henry, and the editors of the Reformed Study Bible (as well as John MacArthur personally) have a viewpoint that is "random and nonsensical." As I have just demonstrated, the majority consensus on the matter disagrees with him.

I do, however, think Bnonn is random and nonsensical. He is a so-called Calvinist / Reformed post-millennialist who rejects historic Reformed positions (and the interpretations recognized by non-Calvinists). The only widespread commentary that can offer him support is Dispensationalist.

Wayne Grudem's Study of the Greek Word kephalē, "Head"

Foreword

Deep Strength shared a couple papers written by Wayne Grudem on the meaning of the Greek word kephalē, translated as "head". I found a couple more.

1. Wayne Grudem, "Does κεφαλή ("Head") Mean "Source" Or "Authority Over" in Greek Literature? A Survey of 2,336 Examples," Trinity Journal ns 6.1 (Spring 1985): 38-59.

4. Wayne Grudem: The meaning of κεφαλή ("head"): An evaluation of new evidence, real and alleged Articles 1 and 2 are the same papers. 1 can be located in the formal literature, and 2 is the online version.

I was unable to access Article 3, but the links indicate that it is contained in both a MSWord and a PDF document.

Article 4 is reprinted from Biblical Foundations for Manhood and Womanhood, edited by Wayne Grudem (Wheaton: Crossway, 2002), 145-202, and is used by permission of Crossway Books. This article is identical to the article by the same title that he published in JETS 44/1 (March, 2001), 25-65 (referenced below), with the exception of the added interaction with Anthony Thiselton's recent commentary on 1 Corinthians in section VIII (to be discussed below).

These papers are long and theologically technical and thus tempting to dismiss as TL;DR for the layman reader.

However, I also found a PowerPoint presentation (Source Link) by Wayne Grudem which succinctly summarizes this work.

Hence, the following is the text from Dr. Wayne Grudem's presentation entitled, "The meanings of kephalē ("head") and hypotassō ("submit to"): After 30 years of controversy, where are we?"*

This part of the presentation only considers the meaning of kephalē ("head"). Hypotassō is not covered in this part. It is covered in a separate presentation which I have not yet found.

The text has been slightly edited for readability in this essay format.

Introduction

The word kephalē "head" is crucial for understanding Ephesians 5:22-23 and 1 Corinthians 11:3.

> "Wives, submit to your own husbands…. For the husband is the head of the wife"
> Ephesians 5:22-23 (NKJV)

> "the head of a wife is her husband, and the head of Christ is God."
> 1 Corinthians 11:3 (NKJV)

Question: Does kephalē "head" mean

1. "authority over" or
2. "source" (as many were claiming in 1985) or
3. (more recently) "prominent, preeminent"?

A. Background

Research papers written by Wayne Grudem on this topic:

1985: "Does kephalē ("head") mean "Source" or "Authority Over" in Greek Literature? A Survey of 2,336

Examples," Trinity Journal 6 NS (Spring 1985), 38-59. [+ plenary session debate at ETS, 1986, Atlanta]

1990: "The Meaning of kephalē ("Head"): A Response to Recent Studies," Trinity Journal 11NS (Spring, 1990), 3-72.

2001: "The Meaning of kephalē, ("head"): An Analysis of New Evidence, Real and Alleged," JETS 44/1 (March, 2001), 25-65. [+ earlier paper at ETS, Santa Clara, CA, 1997]

Conclusions of this paper:

LEXICONS:

6 of 7 Greek lexicons relevant to NT now give "authority over, ruler, leader" as a meaning of kephalē. (7 of 7 if the correction from the LS editor is counted.)

1 of 7 now give "source" as a meaning of kephalē. (0 of 7 if the correction from the LS editor is counted.)

0 of 7 have ever given "prominent, preeminent" as a meaning of kephalē.

SPECIFIC GREEK TEXTS:

In all 56 examples in Greek that take the form,

"Person A is the kephalē of person(s) B,"

Person A always has authority over person(s) B.

No example has ever been discovered where A does not have authority over B.

0 examples have ever been discovered where the sense "source without governing authority" would fit the context.

0 examples have ever been discovered where the sense "prominent or preeminent person without governing authority" would fit the context.

→ Why should we translate Ephesians 5:23 and 1 Corinthians 11:3 in a way that lacks this component of meaning that is present in every known example of this construction?

B. Greek Lexicons

1. BDAG (2000), 542:

A being of high status, head (a) in the case of living beings, to denote superior rank …. Of the father as head of the family…. Of the husband in relation to his wife…. Of Christ in relation to the Christian community…. But Christ is the head… Of the universe as a whole… And of every cosmic power.

(b) of things, the uppermost part, extremity, end, point.

["Source" not mentioned. "Prominent" not mentioned.]

Walter Bauer, Griechisch-deutsches Wörterbuch[6] (Berlin and New York: de Gruyter, 1988), lists for kephalē no such meaning as "source" but does give the meaning "Oberhaupt" ("chief, leader") (pp. 874-875).

2. Danker, The Concise Greek-English Lexicon of the New Testament (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2009), 200: (b) in transferred sense of (a) [an anatomical term], as directing agent within a ranking system. (1 Corinthians 11:3; Ephesians 1:22; 5:23; Colossians 1:18)

3. Louw-Nida: Johannes P. Louw and Eugene E. Nida, Greek English Lexicon of the New Testament Based on Semantic Domains (New York: United Bible Societies, 1988): "One who is of supreme or pre-eminent status, in view of authority to order or command — 'One who is the head of, one who is superior to, one who is supreme over'." (Ephesians 4:15; 1 Corinthians 11:3 (vol. 1, p. 739)

4. Lust, J., E. Eynikel, and K. Hauspie, A Greek-English Lexicon of the Septuagint (Stuttgart: Deutsche Bibelgesellschaft, 1996), 254: "head, leader".

5. Lampe, Patristic Greek Lexicon (1961), page 749: B. of persons;

1. head* of the house, Herm.sim. 7.3;
2. chief, head-man…
3. religious *superior…
4. of bishops, kefalai ekklhsiwn [other examples include "of the bishop of the city of Rome, being head of all the churches"]…
5. kefalh einai c. genit. [to be head, with genitive] take precedence of.

6. T. Muraoka, A Greek-English Lexicon of the Septuagint (Louvain: Peeters, 2009), "he who or that which plays a leading role: in a societal group (?)," 396.

7. Liddell-Scott: Greek-English Lexicon edited by H. G. Liddell and Robert Scott, and revised by Henry Stuart Jones (ninth edition; Oxford: Clarendon, 1968; revision of 9th edition of 1940), p. 945:

II. 1. Of things, extremity

a. In Botany
b. In Anatomy
c. Generally, top, brim of a vessel… capital of a column
d. In plural, source of a river, Herodotus 4.91 (but singular, *mouth); generally, source, origin, Orphic Fragments 21a; starting point [examples: the head of time; the head of a month].

→ This definition "source" was for plural, under the category of "things;" and singular kephalē referred to "mouth" of river meant "end point" (as ends of poles that carried ark of covenant in LXX). It did not take the form "person A is head of person(s) B".

Levite Priests carrying the Ark of the Covenant.

But in about 1997 I sent my 1990 article to: “Editor, Liddell-Scott Greek Lexicon, Oxford Univ. Press, Oxford, England”

On April 14, 1997, a letter from P. G. W. Glare, editor of the Liddell-Scott Lexicon: Supplement, was sent to Wayne Grudem (after I had sent him my 1990 article):

> “The entry under this word in LSJ is not very satisfactory…. I have no time at the moment to discuss all your examples individually and in any case I am in broad agreement with your conclusions. I might just make one or two generalizations. κεφαλή is the word normally used to translate the Hebrew rosh and this does seem frequently to denote leader or chief without much reference to its original anatomical sense, and here it seems perverse to deny authority. The supposed sense ‘source’ of course does not exist and it was at least unwise of Liddell and Scott to mention the word. At the most they should have said ‘applied to the source of a river in respect of its position in its (the river’s) course’.
> By NT times the Septuagint had been well established and one would only expect that a usage found frequently in it would come easily to such a writer as St. Paul …. I hasten to add that in most cases the sense of the head as being the controlling agent is the one required and that the idea of preeminence seems to me to be quite unsuitable, and that there are still cases where κεφαλή can be understood, as in the Septuagint, in its transferred sense of head or leader.
> Once again, thank you for sending me the article. I shall file it in the hope that one day we will be able to embark on a more thorough revision of the lexicon.
> Yours sincerely,
> Peter Glare

8. Summary of Lexicons:

“Authority over, ruler, leader”: 6 of 7, with P. Glare letter: 7 of 7.

“Source”: 1 of 7 (LS) but under heading, “of things, extremity” applied to source of river in plural, but applied to mouth of river in singular; 0 of 7 give person as “source” of other persons now w/ P. Glare letter: “source” 0 of 7 lexicons.

“Pre-eminent, prominent”: 0 of 7 lexicons.

C. Actual citations from ancient literature

I. Literal "head" said to rule over body

(1) Plato: "the head… is the most divine part and the one that reigns over all the parts within us" (Timaeus 44D). (5th/4th cent. B.C.).

(2) Philo, The Special Laws 184: "Nature conferred the sovereignty of the body on the head" (1st cent. A.D.).

(3) Plutarch, Table Talk 6.7 (692.E.1): "We affectionately call a person 'soul' or 'head' from his ruling parts."

II. "Head" as a simile for leader

(1) Plutarch, Pelopidas 2.1.3: In an army, "The light-armed troops are like the hands, the cavalry like the feet, the line of men-at-arms itself like chest and breastplate, and the general is like the head" (1st/2nd cent. A.D.).

III. Examples of kephalē meaning "authority over / ruler" (where a person in authority is metaphorically called the head of others under his authority)

There are approximately 56 examples in EFBT.

(6) Judges 11:11, LXX: "So Jephthah went with the elders of Gilead, and all the people made him head and leader over them" (2nd cent. B.C.).

(7) 2 Kings (2 Samuel) 22:44, LXX: David says to God, "You shall keep me as the head of the Gentiles: a people which I knew not served me" (2nd cent. B.C.).

(8) 3 Kings (1 Kings) 8:1 (A), LXX: "Then Solomon assembled the elders of Israel with all the heads of the tribes" (2nd cent. B.C.).

(16) Lamentations 1:5, LXX: [of Jerusalem] "Her foes have become the head, her enemies prosper, because the Lord has made her suffer for the multitude of her transgressions; her children have gone away, captives before the foe" (2nd cent. B.C.).

(17-19) 1 Corinthians 11:3: "I want you to know that the head of every man is Christ, and the head of the woman is the man, and the head of Christ is God." (1st cent. A.D.).

(20) Ephesians 1:22: "He has put all things under his feet and has made him the head over all things for the church" (1st cent. A.D.).

(22-23) Ephesians 5:22-24: "Wives, be subject to your husbands, as to the Lord. For the husband is the head of the wife as Christ is the head of the church, his body, and is himself its Savior. As the church is subject to Christ, so let wives also be subject in everything to their husbands" (1st cent. A.D.).

(25) Colossians 2:10: "And you have come to fullness of life in him, who is the head of all rule and authority" (1st cent. A.D.).

King Charles III of Great Britain.

But couldn't kephalē mean "source" in Ephesians 4:15?

(21) Ephesians 4:15: "We are to grow up in every way into him who is the head, into Christ, from whom the whole body, joined and knit together by every joint with which it is supplied, when each part is working properly, makes bodily growth and upbuilds itself in love" (1st cent. A.D.).

→ Here Christ functions as the source of bodily growth.

→ And he also functions as the recipient of growth.

But that does not mean "head" means "source" or "recipient".

To offer an example of this error, substitute the word "head" with "Savior":

"We are to grow up in every way into him who is the Savior, into Christ, from whom the whole body, joined and knit together by every joint with which it is supplied, when each part is working properly, makes bodily growth and upbuilds itself in love"

Would "Savior" now mean "source"?

Sound lexicography should cause us to be cautious about adopting a new meaning for a word based on one difficult passage, or one passage where it "could" have that meaning. This was emphasized by John Chadwick in reflecting on his many years of work on the editorial team for the Liddell-Scott Lexicon:

> "A constant problem to guard against is the proliferation of meanings…. It is often tempting to create a new sense to accommodate a difficult example, but we must always ask first, if there is any other way of taking the word which would allow us to assign the example to an already established sense…. As I have remarked in several of my notes, there may be no reason why a proposed sense should not exist, but is there any reason why it must exist?"
> John Chadwick, Lexicographica Graeca: Contributions to the Lexicography of Ancient Greek (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1996), 23-24.

Example: "I was carrying a birthday cake with both hands, so I used my head to open the door."

→ Does "head" now mean "door opener"?

No, it just functioned as a door opener but the word "head" did not take on a new meaning.

President Donald Trump of the United States of America.

Other examples of the use of kephalē ("head") from Antiquity:

(27) Josephus, War 4.261: Jerusalem is the "head of the whole nation" (1st cent. A.D.).

(28) Philo, Moses 2.30: "As the head is the ruling place in the living body, so Ptolemy [Ptolemy Philadelphos] became among kings" (1st cent. A.D.).

(33) Plutarch, Galba 4.3: "Vindex … wrote to Galba inviting him to assume the imperial power, and thus to serve what was a vigorous body in need of a head" (1st/2nd cent. A.D.).

(40) Athanasius, Work 005, 89.2.3 (NPNF series 2, vol. 4, p. 147; TLG, Athanasius, Work 005, 89.2.3.): He refers to "the bishops of illustrious cities," as "the heads of great churches" (4th cent. A.D.).

(53) Chrysostom, Homily 20 on Ephesians (NPNF series 1, vol. 13, pp. 146-147; TLG Work 159, 62.140.51 to 62.141.13): "The wife is a second authority let not her then demand equality, for she is under the head; nor let him despise her as being in subjection, for she is the body; and if the head despise the body, it will itself also perish. But let him bring in love on his part as a counterpoise to obedience on her part…. Hence he places the one in subjection, and the other in authority, that there may be peace;"

(56) Chrysostom, Homily 15 on Ephesians (NPNF series 1, vol. 13, p. 12; TLG Work 159, 62.110.21 to 62.110.25): [To a woman, on how to treat a servant girl] "Consider that thou art her mistress, and that she ministers unto thee. If she be intemperate, cut off the occasions of drunkenness; call thy husband, and admonish her…. Yea, be she drunkard, or railer, or gossip, or evil-eyed, or extravagant, and a squanderer of thy substance, thou hast her for the partner of thy life. Train and restrain her. Necessity is upon thee. It is for this thou art the head. Regulate her therefore, do thy own part." [In this example, a woman is called the head of her maidservant.] (4th cent. A.D.).

Queen Elizabeth II of Great Britain.

D. Conclusion about meanings where person A is said to be "head" of person(s) B:

1. "Authority over, ruler, leader" is clearly established by over 50 examples.

2. "Person as "source": No lexicon includes this meaning because no example in any period of Greek requires it.

3. "Prominent, preeminent, foremost" "One who is preeminent": No lexicon includes this meaning because no example in any period of Greek requires it.

Question: Where is one example in all of ancient Greek literature where a person is called "head" of a person or group and that person is NOT in a position of authority over the other person or group?

E. Commentaries

1. Ephesians 5:23: Wives, submit to your own husbands, as to the Lord. [23] For the husband is the head of the wife even as Christ is the head of the church, his body, and is himself its Savior. [24] Now as the church submits to Christ, so also wives should submit in everything to their husbands. (Ephesians 5:22-24 ESV)

F. Objections to the meaning "prominent or honored part, honored member"

1. Found in no lexicon (therefore apparently required by no ancient text).
2. Removes the one component of meaning that is found in every single ancient example where person A is head of person or group B, that is, Person A is in authority over B.
3. Involves linguistic sleight-of-hand: It changes the noun to an adjective, and then supplies a noun.

For example, consider 1 Corinthians 11:3.

> "The head of every man is Christ, the head of a wife is her husband, and the head of Christ is God."

If we substitute [a noun] "leader" for "head", this makes sense. The "leader of / authority over" of a wife is her husband, and the head [leader] of Christ is God. However, if we substitute [an adjective] "preeminent" for "head", then, "the preeminent of a wife is her husband" is not sensible. Therefore, it is necessary to supply a suitable noun: "member". But if we do so, then, "The preeminent member of a wife is her husband" doesn't work because it introduces another meaning: The husband is not a member of his wife. This holds for other substitutions as well. For example, "The honored member of a wife is her husband" departs from the original meaning.

Note on Thiselton:

While Thiselton rightly notes that metaphors usually carry multiple layers of meaning in any language, that is not true of his translation. The Greek text contains a metaphor of the head in relation to the body. But Thiselton "translates" not the mere word but the metaphor itself in a way that renders it no longer a metaphor but an explanation of only one possible component of meaning — "man is foremost in relation to woman." Yet he himself had said that the metaphor has "multiple meanings." In his rendering, there is no metaphor left for English readers, and no opportunity even to consider multiple meanings.

Why did he make this move? He says he cannot translate it simply as "head" because "in English-speaking contexts 'the head' almost always implies leadership and authority" (p. 817).

So he is removing the one component of meaning (leadership and authority) that is present in every single example of person A being the "head" of person or group B.

→ Why must we try to avoid the one meaning that is represented in all the lexicons and is unmistakably present in every instance of this kind of construction, the idea of authority?

G. Dictionary of Paul and His Letters:

1. C. Kroeger article, "Head" (1993, Kindle 2009)

a. Head = "source"

> "John Chrysostom declared that only a heretic would understand Paul's use of "head" to mean "chief" or "authority over." Rather one should understand the term as implying "absolute oneness and cause and primal source." (PG 61.214, 216)."

> "church fathers argued vehemently that for Paul "head" had meant "source." Athanasius (Syn. Armin. 26.3.35; Anathema 26. Migne PG 26, 740B), Cyril of Alexandria (De Recte Fide ad Pulch. 2.3, 268; De Recte Fide ad Arcadiam 1.1.5.5(2).63.), Basil (PG 30.80.23), Theodore of Mopsuestia, Eccl. Theol. 1.11.2- 3; 2.7.1) and even Eusebius, Eccl. Theol. 1.11.2-3; 2.7.1) were quick to recognize the danger of an interpretation of 1 Corinthians 11:3 which could place Christ in a subordinate position relative to the Father."

b. I analyzed this article extensively in my 2001 article in JETS, and in the Appendix in 2001 EFBT. There are numerous examples of erroneous citations, references that on inspection do not even contain the term kephalē, deceptive omissions of crucial information, and outright false statements. Unfortunately, this article in DPL, a standard reference work, has never been corrected by IVP.

The Royal Romanov family of Russia.

H. Conclusion: 30 years after:

1985: "Does kephalē ("head") Mean "Source" or "Authority Over" in Greek Literature? A Survey of 2,336 Examples," Trinity Journal 6 NS (Spring 1985), 38-59. [+ plenary session debate at ETS, 1986, Atlanta]

The meaning "authority over, ruler, leader" is firmly established.

The meaning "source" is dying its last breath.

The meaning "preeminent, honored member" has some advocates, but no support in any lexicon, ever, and it has the fatal flaw of removing the one component of meaning that is present in every ancient example.

→ It should also be rejected.

[End of Grudem's presentation.]

In sum, Grudem has made a very convincing argument that the original Greek use of the word kephalē ("Head") must necessarily entail one having authority.

Introduction

Over at Truth and Tolerance, D. P. Monahan wrote a post, Godliness Is Not Attractive? (2021/8/10), which addresses the fundamental disjunction between the modern Churchian approach to intersexual relationships and that of the Red Pill. Here, I'll respond to what he wrote and offer some of my own thoughts.

He writes,

> "Christian Red Pill bloggers like Aaron Renn insist (against the claims of Evangelical preachers) that godliness does not attract women. Women, instead, are attracted to power, what we call "alpha" attributes, i.e. size, strength, status, confidence, money. In fact, godliness is unattractive. Godliness is "beta". Women will settle for "betas" because they are good providers, but will secretly despise them. Women pick alphas for sex and then settle for betas to take care of the alpha's bastard kids. Therefore, men have to be taught not only how to be godly but also how to be alphas."

So if a man wants to compete in this SMP, then he has to display some Alpha characteristics, just to get on women's radar. Here, I'll remind the reader that this description fits the SMP of the post-sexual revolution, although this has started to shift into stalemate territory as of late. Before the sexual revolution, most men knew this and strove to hold their own. Fewer men had to make a concentrated effort to "become more Alpha", largely because of the social pressure to marry and the prevalence of assortive mating.

> "I understand what they are getting at – we do observe these kinds of behavior and the examples he gives of what passes for Evangelical marriage advise are ridiculous – but I think the model for understanding the > behavior is flawed. From a theological perspective it can't be the way God intended human nature to work; since status is purely relative, by definition not all men can be high-status. There will always be inequality of alpha traits. But since God wills that the great majority of men marry, it cannot be the case that God makes a condition for being married the display of these traits."

I agree that the model is flawed, but for a different reason. I am hesitant to believe that God requires men to become Alpha in order to marry (as is required by the secular SMP/MMP), but I do believe a man must show himself capable of managing his life well before he can receive further responsibilities and blessings (in the context of one's relationship with God). I am also willing to concede that women require men to have certain Alpha traits before they will consider them as potential partners. Whether this is, in fact, the same thing remains a question of debate.

Update: Deep Strength has written a follow-up post, No, godliness is still not attractive (2023/4/21), in which he examines this disjoint. To summarize his essay, women are attracted to virtues related to Dominion, i.e. LAMPS, etc. (c.f. Genesis 1 and 2).

Running Towards an Unknown Goal

Concerning the social order, Monahan wrote,

> "The alpha / beta dichotomy is basically a Nietzschean one in which the ubermench takes what he wants while the ordinary people huddle in fear of social scorn. It is not a vision of an orderly society but of a fundamentally disordered one. It is also based on evolutionary psychology which tends towards just-so stories: an evolutionary explanation of how the alpha got his game is analogous to a wives' tale of how the cat got his tale, tending towards tautology and generally free of evidence."

Personally, I regard evolutionary psychology to be a collection of interrelated theoretical models that attempt to explain the reality of human behavior, and rather well I might add. But Monahan is right that Western society is broken in this way, Nietzschean, as he put it.

But anyway, what kind of social order do we have?

More to the point, what is there for a man to assume Headship over?

In summary, we are currently presented with the following frameworks of options, discussed afterwards.

1. Churchianized Feminism – Complementarianism, “servant leaders”,
2. That which is touted by secular society – Promiscuity, serial monogamy, inceldom, and so on.
3. Secular Red Pill – Polysexuality or MGTOW
4. Christian Red Pill – Extreme vetting with awareness or else celibacy
5. Covenant Relationships – Headship / Tingly Respect

The Secular Scene is decidedly pro-woman and anti-masculinity. Women are enabled to attain “independence” and gradually usurp dominance, which is an inversion of Headship. This is a no go.

The Churchian set up is not much different from the Secular one, except the Churchian view of intersexual relationships is an attempt to Christianize Feminism by imposing lofty ideals which apparently apply only to men. A cursory reading of Dalrock or Deep Strength makes this clear. Also a no go.

The Red Pill assessment is more true to reality, but still, it is only a praxeology of the current scene. Although this approach has the benefit of being practical and well informed, it fails to capture what God intends for us as Christian men, husbands, and fathers.

The Christian Red Pill is perhaps the best working model at present, but this only benefits a very small number of men.

Same thing goes for Headship / Covenant Relationships, which I’ll guess are 1 in 10,000 or more.

Moreover, we don’t have much of a working social order to begin with or even a working model that can be improved upon. From an optimistic view, this sets the stage for a new beginning.

> By faith Abraham obeyed when he was called to go out to the place which he would receive as an inheritance. And he went out, not knowing where he was going.
> Hebrews 11:8 (NKJV)

The Intersection of Virtue

D. P. Monahan identifies virtue as a trait which intersects with godliness and attraction.

> "Virtue understood as the perfection of a good potential is attractive because there is nothing else a person can possibly be attracted to except for virtue. Problems arise when a person is attracted to lesser virtues instead of higher, or is so enamored of one virtue that they ignore vices in other areas, something that happens all the time. This is probably not a simple matter of nature but also of social conditions: our society encourages young people to start fornicating in the second half of their teens and marry ten to fifteen years later, which means we are habituating them to judge members of the opposite sex and themselves in terms of what makes for a good fornicator and not a good spouse, hurting their marriage prospects later in life."

Yes, virtue is an important part of attraction that correlates to godliness, but virtue alone isn't enough, especially in a culture that does not reward it.

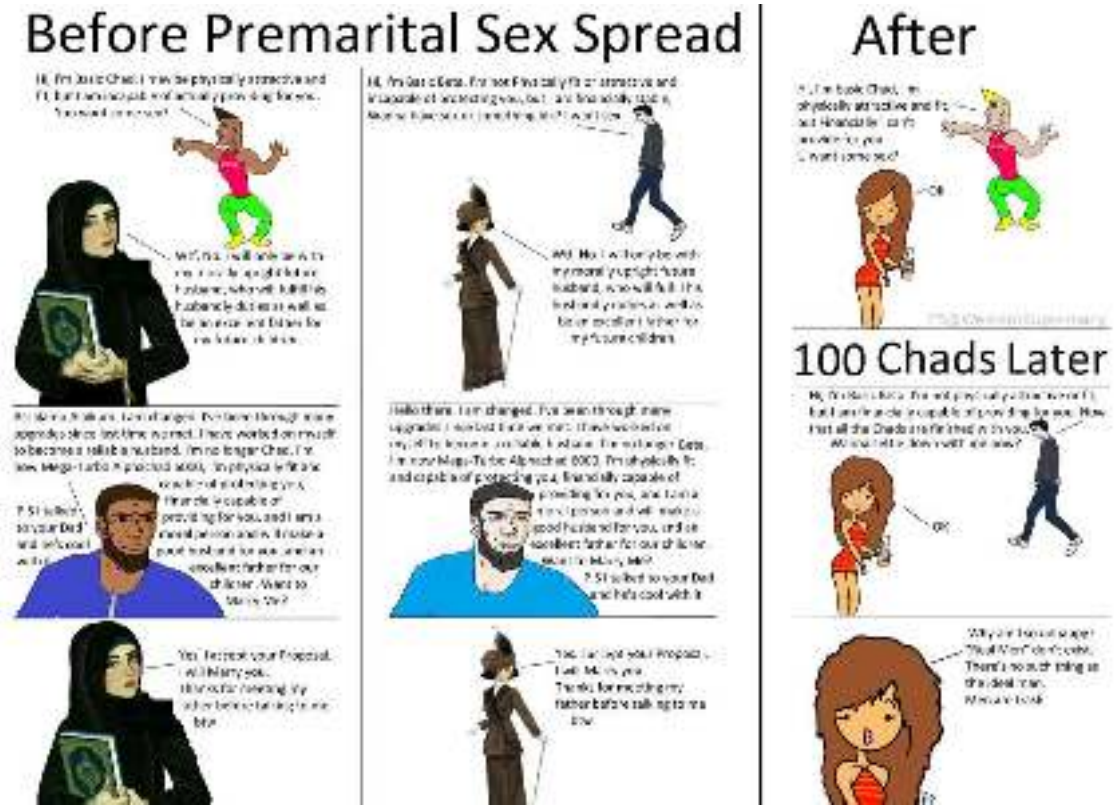
As EoS stated,

> "What keeps marriage together is a perfect storm of variables, in a dose / formula that is very hard to control for in the current environment. Two of those ingredients are virtue and attraction."

(More comments on this topic under the linked post.)

Here I'll point out something that is often overlooked in the discussion of the value of virtue — that every virtue is coupled with a vice. The virtues of Alpha males include social / sexual authority and the ability to generate raw attraction in females, while the vices of Alpha males are what perpetuate promiscuity and marital fraud. The virtues characteristic of Beta males is what maintains order in society while the Beta vices lead to social and sexual stagnation. It has often been said that what is needed is the perfect balance of Alpha and Beta traits.

Our concept of Godliness is too feminized, due to decades of Chivalry and the convergence of the church. As a result, the Beta set of virtues is held forth as the standard of godliness, in spite of its inherent vices, while the Alpha set of vices is branded "toxic masculinity", and its virtues are either strongly admired or summarily ignored. This topic will continue to simmer on the backburner until we come up with a new paradigm of attraction and godliness in which Alpha virtues are recognized as masculine, and Beta vices are labeled weak.



Identify That which is Lacking

Ever since the Manosphere pointed out that "Chicks Dig Jerks", the Christian Manosphere has been amazed (and angered) by this fact. Has it never occurred to us that this reaction may arise from the envious voice of the inner simp within us? I say this because if we could take any Blue Pilled simp off the street and magically transform him into an Alpha, then he would quickly adapt to the polygynous, plate-spinning lifestyle of the Chad/PUA within a year, maybe even less — or worse, due to years of desperation and frustration.

In this respect, Chads stand a little closer to the Covenant ideal of masculinity, although they lack certain traits which are the vices of the archetype — submission to the Lord, purpose, self-control, and empathy.

Likewise, all women have an inner Becky, Gabrielle, Karen, Katie, Lorena, Mikayla, Gretchen, Stacy, Tomi, and so on in theirs. Women are also differentiated by which traits they feed and allow to grow.

Seeing how we are living in a time when female agency is at a millennial low, and sexual degeneracy is at an all-time high, perhaps it is God's grace to women and society that we have more simps and fewer Chads who plunder their hearts.

My point here is that all men have an inner Chad within their hearts. All men have an inner Gimp, an inner Simp, and an inner Wimp. Men are differentiated by which traits they feed and allow to grow. Men are also differentiated by which traits they are lacking.

> I now rejoice in my sufferings for you, and fill up in my flesh what is lacking in the afflictions of Christ, for the sake of His body, which is the church…
> Colossians 1:24 (NKJV)

You breed what you feed.

The current cultural environ feeds the simp in men, and the hoe in women. The churchianized church-lite does likewise and then offers "forgiveness" to the women, and a "man up" lecture to the men.

Instead of teaching men to be Betas who need to "man up", maybe it would be closer to the point to teach men to be Alphas who need to "tone it down". In fact, the latter approach was common prior to WW2, back when Men were MEN.

Dan Bilzerian

Start your Journey from where you now Stand

> [12] Not that I have already attained, or am already perfected; but I press on, that I may lay hold of that for which Christ Jesus has also laid hold of me. [13] Brethren, I do not count myself to have apprehended; but one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind and reaching forward to those things which are ahead, [14] I press toward the goal for the prize of the upward call of God in Christ Jesus.
> Philippians 3:12-14 (NKJV)

Regardless of what the churchians, or the culture, or even our own experience might tell us, if any one of our various inner natures don't come out, it's only because we don't have the opportunity, or we don't give ourselves permission to let it out.

We need to accept the fact that we are all sinners, men and women alike. We have to come to the point where we admit that we don't or can't measure up, and that it is "okay" in the sense that we must accept it because that's just how it is. We cannot make ourselves any more or less sinful. We have to find some way to work within this paradox. It's also "okay" in the sense that we don't have to face eternal damnation because Christ redeemed us. But it's NOT "okay" to assume we have this priceless gift from God and then reject God's sovereignty over our lives.

The bottom line is that as things now stand, when we compare Carnal Chads to Churchian Cucks, the basic Chad most resembles Headship!

Therefore, instead of condemning Chads and Stacys (etc.) for their egregious sins, we might be better served by their examples to ask, "In what ways are they conforming to the Covenant Archetype of masculinity/femininity (such that God would allow this)?" Instead of riding hard on envy and questioning the sovereignty and grace of God by asking, "Why does God forgive bad boys/slores?", we might be better off to say, "God is merciful! How can I receive God's grace for my own shortcomings?"

Note: Some readers might presume that I am condoning promiscuity, but I am not. I am not saying that, "Since God forgives the bad guys, then it's okay to be bad. After all, God will forgive." This is a very naïve and antinomian view of the gospel — one that fails to recognize one's own moral agency and need of salvation. To go so far as to say "sin doesn't matter" fails to recognize the beauty, power, and righteousness of Christ and His kingdom. We must not lose sight of Christ and the reason why He forgives — It is for our own redemption and sanctification.

Exit Questions

Some questions arise from this, which I'll pose here.

1. What does Covenant Law mean to the reader?
2. What does Covenant Law mean in the context of romantic love and marriage?
3. Why would we not experience/feel/recognize Covenant Law as God's love?
4. Does this mean that husbands should anticipate wives to fail in exercising agency, and arrange reservations or make a Plan B in the event that she does?
5. If a wife is insufficiently mature enough to exercise moral agency, does this mean that husbands should employ prophecy (e.g. expounding on Biblical principles and how they are applied), and/or knowledge (e.g. Red Pill theory, "Married Game" techniques) to keep their wives in line and feeling loved? Is this what love would require in this case?
6. Should men who take the Red Pill feel sorry for their past Blue Pill selves? On one hand, true repentance is necessary, but on the other hand, excessive self-pity is not helpful for moving on.

The Captain and First Mate Analogy

NaturallyAspirated mentioned this interesting tidbit from ye olde Manosphere, The Captain and First Mate analogy, presumably originating from Athol Kay. This analogy is quite informative about the marital relationship.

The Captain and First Mate analogy is essentially this: The man is the "Captain" in the relationship, and the woman is the "First Mate." So the man is in charge, and the woman must follow his lead and do what he says. The man navigates their course in life, and the woman role is to help him do what is necessary to reach their itinerant goals and fulfill their purposes.

If the Captain needs to stand at the helm to steer the ship through a storm, then he'll need a First Mate to coordinate the crew's labor in the maelstrom. If the First Mate argues with the Captain about who should be steering and who should be battening down the hatches, maintaining the sails, etc., then chaos and possibly disaster will quickly ensue. In fact, anything the First Mate does against the Captain's wishes poses risks of varying degrees to the entire crew.

Likewise, if the husband needs to go out and fight the world, then having a peaceful home is essential. Anything she does to upset this is working against him. Ditto goes for how the kids are to be raised and what he wants for his family.

A First Mate exercising agency means that he/she takes "orders" / requests without a lot of hassle and faithfully carries out his/her duties to the best of his/her ability. A "good" First Mate is one who carries out his duties well and with few errors, such that the journey can be made safely and securely.

According to this analogy, a daughter or wife exercising agency means that she is respectful, submissive, and obedient without a lot of turbulence and faithfully carries out her duties to the best of her ability. A "good" daughter or wife is one who carries out her duties well and with few errors, such that the husband and family can enjoy the many benefits of having a warm, well ordered home.

Customs and Courtesies

Another characteristic of intersexual dynamics that is preserved in the Captain and First Mate analogy is the importance of customs, courtesies, and formal appearances. The Captain and First Mate must appear united in the eyes of the crew or else morale and respect will be lost. The Captain and First Mate must express appreciation and respect for the position and role of the other at all times.

However, in marriage, this is not limited to the norms of interaction within the relationship (which are often neglected). It extends to include the image of the husband and wife within their wider social circle.

Naturally Aspirated referred to this idea in his comment,

> "I can't overstate how important it is for a functioning marriage that other women see you as a good Captain, and constantly let your wife know that there are plenty of good First Mates out there who would line up for you if you were available.
> Scott's wife seeing IOIs from 30 year olds when they are out together is incredible glue. It's like that rhino horn aphrodisiac you dip yourself in every morning in her eyes."

Yes, sexual competition continues after marriage, and staying ahead of the competition requires a man to keep an edge on his Game.

> "So when men lift, look good with their shirt off, have interesting hobbies, set clear boundaries, protect the household, provide reliable resources… then women properly respond. They don't choose to care about all this, it's how they are wired. It's said they are "the oldest teenager in the house", and they need the structure provided above, or they act out."

Of course, proper appearances and a formal interaction is not constantly maintained, especially in very close, warm relationships, however if this mutual recognition of the authority structure is not firmly established, the relationship cannot settle into a state of intimate congeniality, and if it is not expressed and reinforced from time to time, the authority structure will slowly degrade.

Derelict by Default

Of course, it is always possible for the Captain to make a bad or misinformed decision. However, infighting amongst the crew over the effectiveness or validity of his decision does not help matters in the slightest. Order must come first and foremost, through thick and thin. The First Mate and Crew must trust in the Captain's leadership, and the Captain must trust himself and God with the outcome.

Other than poor decision making and a failure to trust, the greatest weakness in this structure lies in human weaknesses. On this, Naturally Aspirated commented,

> "I cut my teeth on the Red Pill on the reddit "Married Red Pill" forum. There was a lot of "owning your own sh!t" bantered about, with the idea that if you are the proper Captain, your First Mate will be content. Drunken Captains are the main issue, and then the First Mate has to do a bunch of sh!t she isn't trained for, wired for, or really has any interest in doing. (She's not particularly good at it either.) Then she starts to resent the Captain, the respect is lost, and it's all downhill from there."

> "This seemed to make sense, and it explained things I had witnessed and experienced, and opened my eyes ("swallowed the red pill"). It assumed that women are fundamentally reactive, that they want to settle into your frame and leadership, and when they don't have that security blanket, they start to malfunction."

Often this course of events shows up with a woman being "perpetually unhappy". The misguided man errs when he tries to make her happy and his acts of actually loving her reinforce in her mind that he is inferior to her because he's appeasing her bad behavior.

> "Maybe they need to have the introspection to know that they work best as a First Mate and not be afraid to articulate it. (Although they hate when they have to tell men how to act. They want men who have it as the default setting, not pretenders who have to work at it.) Maybe they just have to react as they are wired and not overthink it."

This would certainly help. But the larger problem is wives getting the notion that the Captain is derelict or incompetent, and thinking they could be a better Captain themselves — a subtle mutiny. And as Dalrock elucidated, this problem is amplified when the church feeds women the same narratives that feminist secular culture does, thereby encouraging mutiny on a mass scale.

Not to keep kicking the dead horse, but this situation is not just a problem with the church or even society. It runs deeper than that. It is the embodiment of God's curse on Adam and Eve. He wants to kick back and take it easy. She wants control and is subtle and manipulative in procuring it for herself. He becomes annoyed and bitter about her wranglings. She is then turned off by a man who is too weak or incompetent to catch on to her schemes. He throws up his hands and lets things crumble. She's put herself (and him) in a damned if you do, damned if you don't situation. Finally, she alights herself adrift and the Captain goes down with the ship.

Ignoring the Call of Duty

This analogy is strongly criticized by liberals because of the inherent inequality of the relationship. Proponents of this analogy are ridiculed by progressives because of the implied claim that a Captain and First Mate relationship is superior to all others because of this power dynamic. They fail to recognize that this dynamic is what allows God to be glorified in the relationship, and that it also satisfies the needs of both the man and woman, leading to a very efficient, productive, and sanctifying union.

Furthermore, the level of competency for accepted Captainship among First Mates has gone up with feminism. Women expect more and offer less in return. What used to keep a woman "happy" was a Captain operating at the 50th percentile or higher. Now, you need to be an 80th percentile Captain to keep her "happy". In addition, the waters have become rougher. Feminism run amok, wokeism, social media, online dating apps, and an increasingly secularized culture (among many other things) have made captainship harder. Reprimands for violations are not tolerated and are sometimes retaliated with a vengeance. Together, all this makes mutiny statistically more likely.

More "fitness tests" is another way to look at it. Feminism is one gigantic fitness test.

Men are increasingly realizing the juice is not worth the squeeze, thus MGTOW continues to grow.

This is why Men need to think about women as "the most responsible teenager in the house". If we agree that women are reactive, and the oldest teenager in the house, how do we view their agency?

With kids we don't, or at least we shouldn't, let them create scenarios where our leniency on boundaries causes them to hurt the family or themselves. With wives the same applies. A man's purpose should be the focus and anything she does to detract from his efforts should be corrected.

Once a man's eyes are opened to the truth, knowing what needs to be done to make one's marriage better is a matter of logic. What gets hard is the will to implement the steps.

Summary

Here's what the Captain and First Mate Analogy gets right.

1. The structure of authority is spot on.
2. The First Mate / Wife is regarded as a companion and helper.
3. The sense of mission and purpose is preserved in the analogy.
4. Customs and courtesies are an important part of the interaction.
5. The strength or weakness of the structure of authority lies in the loyalty of the second in command (i.e. the wife).
6. If your First Mate / Wife behaves like a bombastic teenager, it's going to be rough sailing, or worse.

Here's where the Captain and First Mate Analogy goes awry.

1. When applied to intersexual relationships (i.e. marriage), the First Mate is a woman, and is therefore statistically less able, less responsible, and less reliable to carry out her duties than a male First Mate on a ship. Some allowances or additional measures must be made here (which leads to the next point).
2. Husbands are commanded to love their wives (Ephesians 5:25). There is no such expectation from a Captain, although it certainly helps if the Captain and First mate have a tight comradery.
3. It doesn't take into account that there are nearby ships with other Captains. It's easy for her to scuttle the ship and just a short swim for her to jump on board a nearby freighter.

4. These days, a small number of pseudo-Captains have several First Mates at their beck and call, while many other Captains don't even have a ship.
5. Most men don't even know they are (or could be) a Captain.

Introduction

I've noticed that a lot of what thedeti, Jack, and the Eye of Sauron have written about in the past has come out of their own experiences with marriage. I am getting to that point myself lately.

I don't know why I was thinking through this, but I was having a running counter argument in my head when I had an idea about the influence feminism has on marriage. It was driven by me feeling tired, because of poor sleep which often happens to me after my wife has one of her rebellious heart fits.

The question that came up in my mind was about what it costs a man to live in a Biblical Headship role compared to what it costs him in a feminist marriage (I know, it's an oxymoron) which is essentially a tentative liaison within serial monogamy. As the saying goes, "She's not really his, it's just his turn", and here, the husband gets a long, formal "turn" with bells, and whistles, followed by a hefty soul-crushing price tag.

Long time readers of the Christian Manosphere are probably well acquainted with the high costs of a feminist marriage, however, we are not so familiar with the burdens of Headship in marriage, which are great. The responsibilities of it weigh on the heart, soul, and mind, even when the home is peaceful. When the home is NOT peaceful (often because of the wife's antics), that burden is amplified 10-fold as you pull the weight of your own responsibility and also pull the weight of trying to enforce what is right against considerable resistance from the wife.

Free Market vs. Communist Marriage

We can describe these two situations in economic terms, in which having a freely submissive wife is like a free market system, while a husband asserting Headship against a non-compliant opposition is like a communist system.

In a free market economy, everyone is trying to do their best in order to beat the competition and maximize profits. In a free market marriage, both husband and wife perform their respective roles to the best of their ability. He pursues his work and his mission, and she functions as a companion and helper to him.

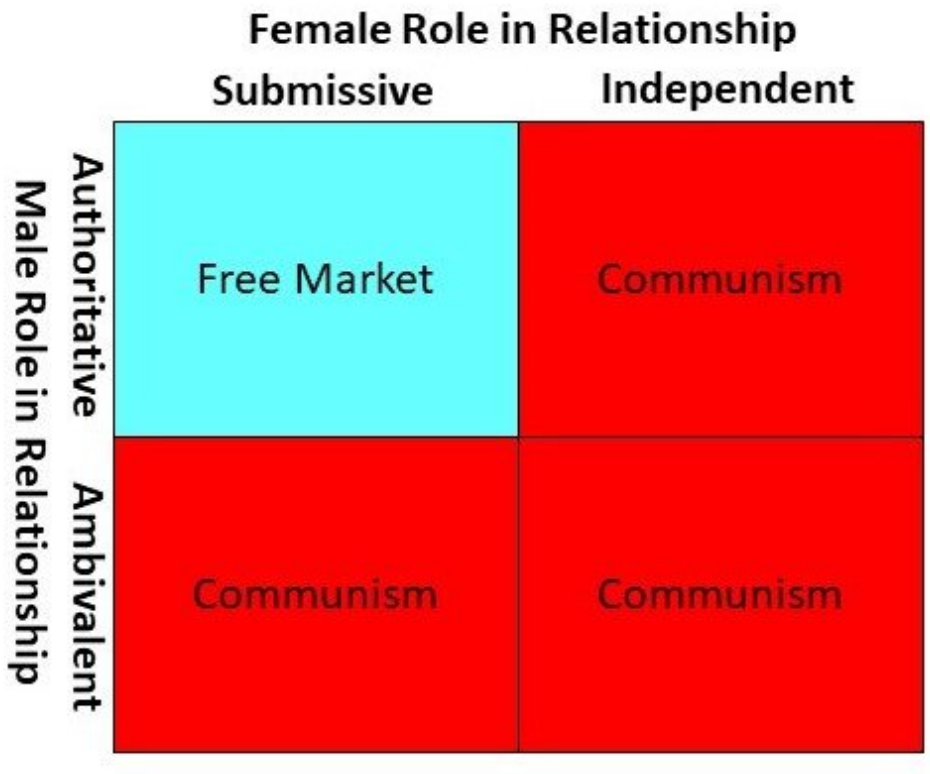
In a truly free market, everyone is out for themselves, but outside of rare circumstances, the interactions are not isolated one-move games but games that involve multiple interactions over time. So the strategy to make the most money for yourself is to actually do what is in the best interest of the customer, even to your own minor short-term deficit, because you'll make more serving them long term than fleecing them once. This incentivizes self-regulation and organizes economic systems very efficiently compared to other options.

In a communist economy, everyone works as little as necessary and relies on "others" (presumably an abstract entity, "the government", but ultimately from the redistributed wealth of others) to take up the slack. In a communist marriage, the wife has her own independent pursuits or she does practically nothing at all except spend and consume, and she relies on the husband to provide for the family and make everything work out. Another variation of a communist marriage is when the wife is the dominant figure in the marriage, and he has to follow along with her plans and schemes or else nothing will be accomplished.

Communism's top-down structure demands people work against their self-interest and this design in the system requires heavy compliance enforcement costs in order to implement it. The way to deal with this will be discussed in the next section.

A free market system always beats a communist system in quality, efficiency, and output.

As shown in the graph below, authoritative Headship and the willing submission of the wife is what determines a free market home economy. Any other arrangement results in communism, characterized by compliance enforcement and mutually leeching off the other with little progress.



Compliance Enforcement

In the analogy of the Free Market vs. Communist systems, the cost of compliance enforcement is contentiousness and a general lack of peace in marriage. This is almost solely on the wife because contentiousness is a combination of (1) a lack of faith in God because she is disobeying God's commands, (2) that lack of faith leading to a sinful grasp for control, and then (3) her general distrust of her husband which ties back in with a lack of faith in God.

When you think about this, a woman looking to her husband to be "perfect"* in order for her to follow him is a form of idolatry in that she is substituting God's commands with the quality of the husband's performance. Worse, she sets herself up as the judge of his performance! The crux of the matter is that God gave her a man to follow and she does not trust God's sovereignty in the matter.

 As Christians, we are to grow in maturity and to become "perfect" (Leviticus 19:2; Matthew 5:48; Philippians 3:12-15). However, the lack of maturity of others should not be used as an excuse for not obeying the Lord in one's faith.*

With a man, the same idolatrous notion shows up as him putting her on a pedestal in which he substitutes God's mandates with his desire to serve her, and in doing so, God's standards are either deprioritized, ignored, or lost in the fray. Instead, he should uphold his role as the Image bearer and serve God to the best of his abilities without worrying about how she'll feel about his performance.

However, if a husband thinks he can transform the system by subscribing to a free market arrangement solely through his own efforts without any on her part, all he accomplishes is being the work horse for the farm. The inevitable failure occurs when some aspect of his performance does not measure up to her standards and her thoughts and emotions surrounding her perception of his "inadequacy" spiral out of control without him having an inkling of the $h!t storm raging between her ears.

Rebuilding the Economy

The sphere tends to focus on men improving themselves to combat a woman's general distrust of her husband, which will always be a failing endeavor due to every man having flaws a woman can pick apart with some Monday morning quarterbacking. Even the highest status, most accomplished men, due to the reality of limited resources and human weaknesses, will have areas in life that will fall short of some women's standards. She'll overlook those for the guy who is good enough in his strong areas, but any stumbling at all in those strong areas, which is bound to happen at some point, and she now will justify her free-for-all picking him apart, especially on his weaker areas or areas which can deliver her an advantage.

The good news is that God has built into marriage a means of mitigating her spiritual immaturity.

The logic is simple. God is sovereign over all of his creation down to the number of hairs on our heads at any moment in time, which means he is most certainly in control over who we marry. That means, for his eternal purposes, he gave a woman a husband to follow and obey and he is in control over their marriage and family. She does not have to try and control, not because her husband will never make a mistake, but because God is perfectly in control and it is her inadequate faith in God that causes her to not follow her husband. It really is that simple. Show me a wife who won't obey God's commands for her in marriage, and I'll show you a woman of weak faith. Every time. No exceptions.

OTOH, if a wife can be taught to trust in God's provision instead of relying solely on her husbands performance, then she will understand that the power of faith is available to her whenever she doubts her husband's capabilities. So, a husband's role is to guide her through the bible to blunt the effects of her hypergamy through directing her gaze to God and not on himself.

Epilogue

In summary, the only way to combat the male performance aspect the sphere purports as necessary for female submission is for husbands to embrace their God given role as one of the primary drivers of their wives' sanctification per Ephesians 5:22-33, "washing her in the Word". The husband guiding his wife to a deeper faith in God is how he combats her hypergamy and her drive to usurp control.

Making this transition is no simple feat. Consider how the satellites of the former Soviet Union required large sums of investment capital and took more than 30 years to reposition themselves from communist states into functioning free market economies.

Men, if you are not actively guiding her to a greater faith in God and insisting she follow God's role for her in marriage, you leave the door open for her to believe with unwavering faith that her emotions and thoughts are correct and the small furry rationalization hamster wins with relative ease.

A Question

After The Great Persecution of the Manosphere (2018) in which many followers fell away, there followed The Great Schism of the Manosphere (ca. 2019-2020) in which the disciples' faith was sifted sore before the Great Red Pill Awakening (2021-2022) occurred across the bedlam land in lockdown. During this period of transformation, Rollo sized up the internal squabbles as such.

> "…far too many disingenuous actors have entered this community of late and all have an interest in shifting those [Red Pill] definitions to cater to their pet ideology. In fact, converting the Red Pill to be interpreted as an ideology rather than a praxeology (or a heuristic if you prefer) founded in an objective understanding of intersexual dynamics has been their primary goal."
> The Rational Male: "The Believers" vs. The Empiricists (2019/7/4)

In Blue Pill Conditioning and Equalism (2017/4/17) and elsewhere, Rollo has succinctly described this difference in Red Pill hermeneutics as "descriptive vs. prescriptive".

In essence, there was (and still is) a sizeable number of Red Pill proponents who have tried to misappropriate the Red Pill into the guiding light of a personal religion which could be used to milk meaning out of the madness (which cannot be done, of course).

As with any pseudo-religion having a sizeable cult following, there was an emphasis on maintaining doctrinal purity and of ridding the fold of any heretics. But for this winnowing to be done with any degree of rigor, there needed to be a litmus test that could be validly used to sort out the wheat from the chaff. Yet, no one could come up with any such test. However, the discussion surrounding this issue brought up an interesting, navel-gazing question in the Men's 'sphere: How does one know when one is truly Red Pilled?

Men who have "taken the Red Pill" often do so after they've been run through the centerless ball grinder of the wider Feminist society. A wife-initiated frivorce was for a long time the defacto hazing experience of joining the Red Pill community. It's typical for Men to say the way they viewed the whole world changed afterwards, much like Neo's experience in The Matrix. So the straightforward answer to the question is when one undergoes a painful "wake up call", and then reads enough Red Pill literature until one begins to see one's life in this world for what it is.

But not everyone has endured such an ordeal. Anymore, !nceld0m is the most common hazing routine. But even if a man has not undergone any of the typical initiation programs, then does that mean one is not truly Red Pilled?

Those who have long frequented Red Pill sites, and even some content creators, continue to ask themselves this question about the overall value and significance of all things Red Pill.

In spite of the fundamental necessity of introspection, very few Red Pill gurus have answered this question in great depth. T. W. Beckett, Rollo Tomassi, and Red_Curious at reddit/RPChristians have addressed this question more directly than anyone else to date. So let's review what they have said. At the end of this post, I'll propose a current definition of what it means to be Red Pilled.

First, let's get "The Purple Pill" out of the way.

The Purple Pill

The juxtaposition of the appealing aspects of both the Blue Pill and the Red Pill has often been called the Purple Pill, and this half-way house has existed for as long as the Red Pill has.

In The Awareness (2016/12/19) and in recent podcasts, Rollo has described the Purple Pill as "using Red Pill praxeology to solve Blue Pill problems" (my paraphrase). IOW, one has such a profound ego investment in the Blue Pill that they cannot bring themselves to see it as the lie that it is. Thus, they continue to pursue Blue Pill ideals with the added information about female nature that the Red Pill provides.

Examples of the Purple Pill abound and are not even limited to Manosphere personalities or even males.

One particular manifestation of the Purple Pill is the "Invisible Fence" men put up to distinguish themselves from what they consider the more egregious elements of the Manosphere. "I'm Red Pilled, but I'm not like THOSE GUYS!" [Insert Men's subcommunity of choice, e.g. Black Pillers, !nce1s, PUAs, MGTOWs, Christian or Secular, etc.] To the "Invisible Fencers", there exist some elements of the Red Pill which remain immoral, or off limits, or untrue, etc. and thus there are some aspects of the truth which they refuse to accept.

Another one is what I'll (politely) call "Observer Status".

Case Study: Observer Status

Back in October 2022, RealFemSapien announced that she was leaving the Red Pill.

RealFemSapien: I took the Red Pill and I'M DONE! (2022/10/8) Length: 16:00

It is apparent that RealFemSapien was only coopting the Red Pill branding to garner attention and build her subscriber base.

Pinned at the top of the comments is one from Rollo saying, "Meh, she'll be back…" He was right. She continues to produce content centered around Red Pill lore, although she has dropped the Red Pill branding.

Is she Red Pilled? Hmph…

Women can parrot Red Pill ideas, but they cannot come up with objective and profoundly original content. At best, RealFemSapien has, has always had, and always will have, Observer Status. Now although she is not truly Red Pilled, we cannot very well completely dismiss her as a fraudster because she's brought greater sociosexual awareness to many women, and this is greatly needed.

Moreover, the most noteworthy difference in how people approach the Red Pill lies between men and women. As such, the Red Pill is an uniquely masculine view. Perhaps this is one reason why many Red Pill voices have posed the above question as a rhetorical rite of passage into the Red Pill Men's Club.

The Red Pill — A Pit Stop in the Race of Life

Among the top comments under RealFemSapien's video, That Guy Pete You Refuse to Invite to Gatherings wrote,

> "The "pills" were never meant to be a permanent stop in life. You risk rage and depression if you stick around too long. Without acceptance you never move on and actually apply the stuff to your life in a meaningful and positive way."

This is exactly right. Back in September, I wrote about how dwelling on the Red Pill and never coming up with a revised Game plan leads to the Black Pill, and if a man cannot successfully manage the Anger Stage, then the Black Pill leads to the Abyss.

Solo Earthly Sojourner wrote another noteworthy comment under RealFemSapien's video.

> "Red Pill is about awareness, awareness of female nature, the female primary social order, the legal pitfalls of modern marriage, the importance of masculinity, the feminist supremacy movement, pursuit of excellence etc. It's men helping and informing men. You can't leave something you were never part of."

Yes. The Red Pill is for Men only. Women are hypoagentic and incapable of handling moral responsibility, and are thus agent provocateurs and/or catalysts for Men's Red Pill awareness. It is precisely for this reason that the Red Pill exists and is necessary for Men.

Beckett's Qualifications

A while ago, T. W. Beckett at *A Father's Journey put out an examination of what it means to be Red Pill, in The Purity Test [Archive] (2019/12/22). He said the defacto "Purity Test of the Manosphere" is:

- Don't have a woman cheat on you and take her back.
- Don't allow your woman to sleep with another man willingly (cuck).
- Don't go to jail for a petty crime that now involves a legal substance.
- Don't try to sell your advice.
- Don't council men to fall in love, give flowers, show affection or emotion, etc.
- Can't or shouldn't ever raise another man's kids.
- Have a long term marriage with a woman that is in your frame.

In the same post, Beckett dismissed these criteria as the basis of petty infighting and concluded that the only real qualification for a man to be Red Pilled is to be "unplugged from the matrix".

For a long while as I sat on this post, I kept thinking that there is something more to it — something fundamental. I mean, Beckett's list is all negatives. "Don't do this… Don't be that… Just be married and unplugged." But is this really all it is? His only positive qualification is to have a stable marriage, and yet, there are many Red Pilled men who are single.

So what is the fundamental postive characteristic? A leader needs to have something extra, maybe Alphatude, character, discernment, experience, wisdom… something.

I agree with Beckett's statement that to be truly Red Pilled, you need to have first "unplugged from the Matrix". In other words, you need to have done the hard work of restructuring the way you look at life and revise how you process all the information coming in from the world around you — not just riding an exhilarating rush when it's "cool", and then tossing it away when it has lost its usefulness, or has become inconvenient…

Or embarrassing.

The Criteria of Embarassment

Rollo once wrote…

> "Facing red pill truths is uncomfortable, and I understand the need to casually pass them off for fear of really having to critically reconsider ego-investments; that type of insight requires either real depth of character or an experience traumatic enough to shake one from beliefs that, in essence, make up part of their personality."
> The Rational Male: Game Works (2014/10/9)

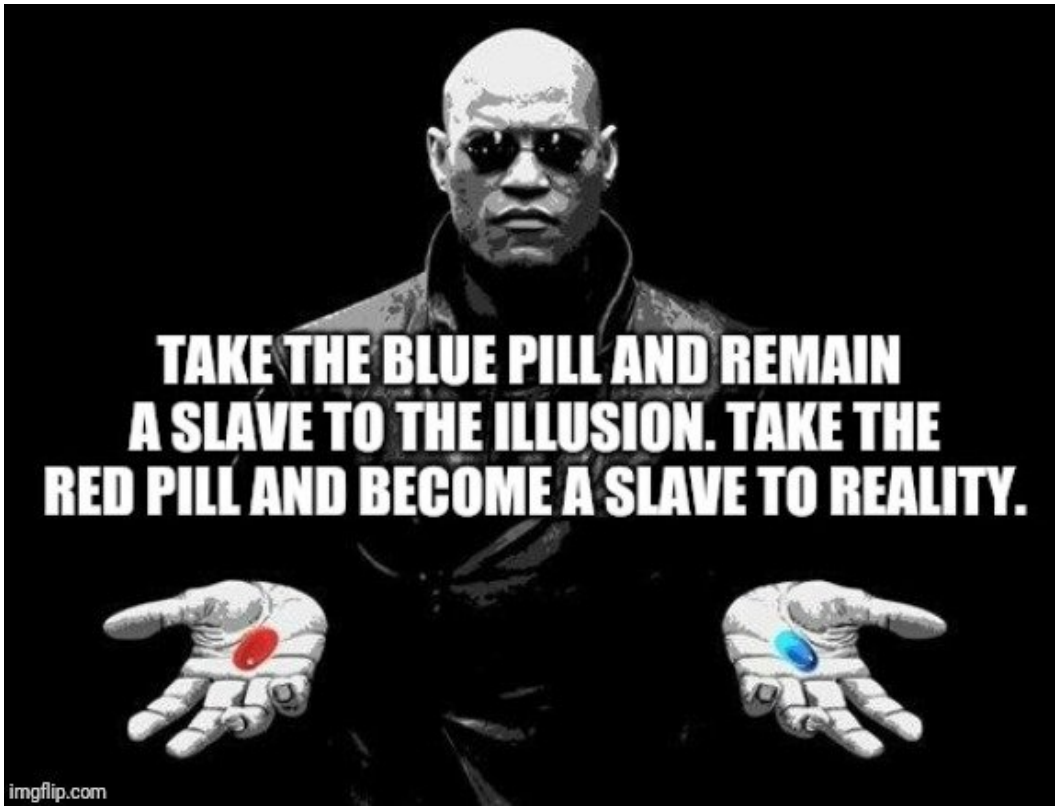
This goes back to what I wrote about hazing in the intro. Rollo is right in saying that most men only discover the RP after a traumatic event, and yes, it takes real depth of character to accept it as true, even after a traumatic event.

So here is one quality of Red Pill authenticity that encompasses the main gist of Beckett's essay with respect to Rollo's input: The criterion of embarassment is a critical analysis of historical accounts in which accounts embarrassing to the author are presumed to be true because the author would have no reason to invent an embarrassing account about himself. Likewise, some of the most valuable contributors to Red Pill lore are those men who have an embarrassing story to tell (e.g. most of the authors' panel here). Therefore, one good indicator of being truly Red Pilled is making an embarassing confession of having once been Blue Pilled. This may also be regarded as a testimony of repentance — turning away from the falsehoods and lies of this world, and embracing the truth, even though difficult.



Rollo's Assessment

Diving into the original question, Rollo takes a more critical stance by viewing the Red Pill as a sort of rite of passage (hence my earlier allusion to hazing).

He writes [emphasis mine],

> "I've made this point in several prior posts, but, The Red Pill is the theory while Game is the practice and the fieldwork experimentation. Both inform the other, and one suffers without the other. This is what is at the heart of The Red Pill and it's what shocks men into a new awareness and a new experience in life. It is not founded in pessimism, cynicism or misogyny, but rather, honest, unvarnished assessments and correlated experiences of men. Those assessments are often disconcerting, but they are only upsetting to a mindset that holds Blue Pill conditioned ideals as a correct interpretation of them. That can lead to those outside a practiced > knowledge of it to believe that the awareness the Red Pill brings is a net negative. What is undeniable is the appeal of the truth The Red Pill presents and that appeal is attractive to men who are still trapped in their Blue Pill idealism.

> Their want is to find some way to achieve a Blue Pill idealistic goal with the very harsh reality a Red Pill awareness brings to them. They want to be reinserted back into the Matrix, but with just enough Red Pill awareness to make their Blue Pill hopes a reality. They don't believe The Lady in Red is real, but they do believe that she's attainable and can be made real because they have the Red Pill awareness to effect it.
> They also see the potential for selling a sugar-coated version of the Red Pill's knowledge-base as a means for other men to achieve their own false hope in Blue Pill idealism. There really is no going back once you have a grasp of the praxeology of the Red Pill, but it's a comforting fiction for Blue Pill men (who've yet to kill their inner Betas) to believe they can achieve those Blue Pill goals with just enough Red Pill awareness (the pro-feminine parts they think women will approve of).
> And this false hope, one that conveniently ignores the uncomfortable parts of Red Pill awareness, is what will be sold by profiteers no matter what title they apply to it."
> The Rational Male: The Awareness (2016/12/19)

In summary, Rollo's "Red Pill rite of passage" is that a man has let go of his Blue Pill idealism and his faux-hope affinities for the elusive raptures of lust for the Matrix. IOW, NO Purple Pilling! Rollo's larger point is that those who are fickle and have no foundation are not truly Red Pilled. He also alludes to the importance of fellowship with other men. Comprehensively, these observations offer three more qualifications of Red Pill authenticity.

Does being Red Pilled require one to be Alpha?

A couple years ago over at reddit/RPChristians, someone asked the Simple Question, How Do I Know If I am Truly Red Pilled?

One moderator, OsmiumZulu, was crass enough to write, "If you have to ask, the answer is NO."

Moderator Red_Curious directed the readers over to his post, Are you TRULY Red Pill? There he writes,

> "We'd all agree that behavior alone does not make a man "Red Pill," right? You can't lift enough, be charming enough, or have a good enough social game to be Red Pill if you're still pining over women.
> We'd all agree that knowledge alone does not make a man "Red Pill," right? You can't read enough books, write enough posts, or have a thorough enough understanding of the content to be Red Pill if you reject the notion that these things have any application in your personal life — you are not transformed by them.
> But at some point something clicks in the content. You realize: This isn't just some interesting theory. If it's true, then to accomplish my relational and sexual goals, I have to adjust my strategy. That is when you're Red Pill, right?
> And perhaps even the man who doesn't know the content for what it is, yet by nature lives by what is true and trusts that it will work for him — as it does … perhaps he is also Red Pill."

In short, no Alpha required. However, there is something more to be obtained and internalized.

Another moderator r_horizon probably had the most comprehensive answer.

> "The way you will know if you're truly Red Pilled is if the life you're living reflects the beliefs you hold.
> If you say you see the importance of lifting, but fail to lift, even if you're capable of doing so, have you really accepted it as something integral in a man's life?
>
> If you say you understand frame, but lack it when you talk to women, then has the Red Pill actually changed your life in this respect or was it really just an intellectual ascent?
> Most guys will understand Red Pill concepts, but fail to live by them. Likewise, many men will say they understand scripture, but fail to live by and be transformed by it.
> You may be Red Pilled on the inside, but until it's apparent on the outside, you're not truly Red Pilled."

Well, yes. If you're Red Pilled, you'll have disciplined habits, a renewed Purpose, a revised Frame, and a developing Game. But are there any other specific indicators of import?

Obedience to Biblical Precepts

In a comment, DeepStrength wrote,

> "You and many of the other husbands are clear examples of getting rid of the nice guy tendencies and actually starting to lead, workout, and otherwise become more dominant in your Christian walk and life. You can clearly see the effect it has on women and not just your wife too.
> The issue is not that you need to choose between being an a-hole and a nice guy, but it's that you need to remove Western Christianity beta factory producing nonsense from your brain (easier said than done) and actually do what the Bible says."

RedPillBoomer responded,

> "Yes, this has been a definite side benefit to being RP and developing myself in it. I had a good relationship with my wife prior to my RP'ing, and it's even better now, mostly in subtle ways. And yes, I've noticed the effect on other women as well.
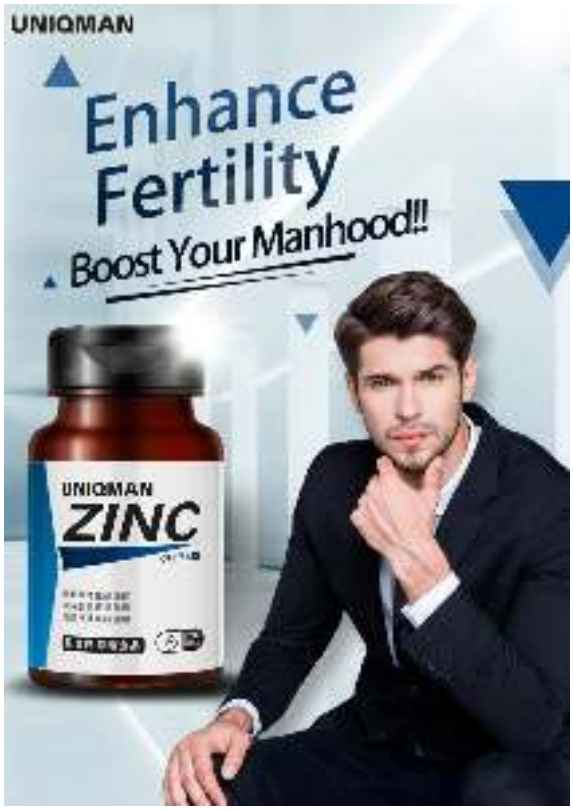
> Even in my church home group, I see the effect. The women in there, I believe, see me as the AMOG and I can sense the attraction. It's not like I'm trying to be "Mr. Big" or anything like it. In fact, just the opposite, just one of the group; however I do have a leadership role — playing the guitar and leading worship (and I'm pretty good, a Rocker by background, so it's not your normal Beta church guy strumming pithy Christian tunes), and I co-lead the study. We're all pleasant and get along great. AND… I have noticed and felt the subtle attraction from the women, most of them married."

Now we're talking! The thing that sets a man apart is when a man can get his life together such that people recognize him as a humble yet authoritative Head, and this applies whether he is married or not. This could more or less be described as possessing moral agency, as was described in Men's Role in the Mess (2022/12/21).

Conclusions



In summary, the inarguable qualities of being truly Red Pilled are…

- Must be a man.
- Able to sift out the truth from the falsehoods in a Fake News, Post Truth world.
- Building depth of Character out of a new awareness and a new life experience.
- The Embarassment Criterion — Confess having once believed the Blue Pill and having since repented.
- Has abandoned his Blue Pill idealism and false hopes concerning both women and the Matrix, and is in the process of rebuilding a stronger foundation on Biblical and Red Pill truths.
- Has forsaken the practice of Blue Pill habits (e.g. Covert Contracts, Nice Guy, One-itis, Female Pedestalization and Supplication, V Worship, White Knighting, etc.)
- Recognized as a Head of a domain of influence, e.g. his wife and family if married, and his life purpose if single.

Of course, no man is going to have all these traits down pat at every moment of every day. The Red Pill is a continuing journey towards the truth, and developing one's self as a Man with a purpose for living.

In my experience, whenever I have grasped a deep truth in my understanding, I have noticed an internal difference within 2-3 days, but it takes 2-3 months before other people begin to notice that there's been a change in me.

> "If you're not married yet, well, you'd better get married quick so you too can understand the Bible!"

It's funny, but fundamentally true, just like most stuff coming out of the Babylon Bee.

I've gotten into the habit of telling this to women who ask me about confusing or controversial matters. I am usually met with a steely indignant glare with overtones of annoyance and consternation. It seems they hate being under cover of authority, or at least, they hate being reminded of it. Perhaps it would be wiser to abbreviate my response to simply saying, "1 Corinthians 14:35", and let the Lord deal with their irascibility.

I remember I told this to a female commenter (Titus2Homemaker) back in July, 2021. She said I ran my blog like a church meeting and left. I suppose I should consider this to be a compliment, and her disappearance as a good outcome. Hard to say whether she actually went to consult her husband on the matter. I have the feeling she didn't. Funny how she calls herself "Titus2Homemaker". (Read Titus 2:1-5.) She should be calling herself "AntiFirstCorinthians14-35Homewrecker"!

Rebellious women galore… Take them away from me, O Lord!

Let our prayer for them be as follows (based on Psalm 51:10-19),

> [10] Create in our wives a pure and submissive heart, O God; and renew a right spirit within them.
> [11] Let them never become so onerous that their husbands are compelled out of exasperation to cast them away from their presence for the sake of order and sanity; nor that their husbands lose their wife goggles and forsake all desire for the shaking of the loins.
> [12] Restore unto them the joys of marital consummation; and uphold them with the humility of righteous desire.
> [13] Let their husbands teach transgressing wives the error of their ways and the proper paths in which to conduct themselves; and the harlots shall be converted unto housewives.
> [14] Deliver them from a sharp tongue, O God, thou God of my salvation: and they shall sing aloud of the righteousness of their Head.
> [15] O Lord, open thou their lips; and their mouths shall shew forth praise.
> [16] For husbands desirest not sacrifice; else they would demand it: they delightest not in showy superficial offerings.
> [17] The wife's sacrifices of marriage are agentic obedience; a vulnerable spirit; an open and a contrite heart eager for their husbands' amply erect affections; an ever willing, never failing comfort, knees bent in submission, spread out as a banquet of love and shamefaced with desire. O God, husbands shall never despise.
> [18] Do good in thy good pleasure unto our families, our marriages, and our children: build thou the walls of safekeeping and sanctified contentment.
> [19] Then shalt thou be pleased with the sacrifices of righteousness, with authentic offerings and honest humble offerings: then shall they offer themselves upon thine altar of sacrifical love.

Men need to always remember the concomitant Σ Maxim.

Σ Maxim 19: Do not invest attention, time, energy, or resources into any woman who is not within your domain and under your authority.

To add to this maxim, it is helpful to recognize the authority of other men by directing their wayward charges back to them whenever they are trying to skirt the boundaries by looking for alternate interpretations of life that may not apply to their particular source of Headship authority – their fathers or husbands.

Recognize the man who is the source of authority over her (i.e. her father or husband), and don't waste your time on her. In doing so, you're showing honor and respect to the man and his household.

Stay sharp!

Young Men, Forsake the Love of Dionysus. Embrace the Love of Headship!

Readership: All
Theme: Wives and Mothers
Reader's Note: This may be one of my most important posts this year.
Length: 800 words
Reading Time: 10 minutes

Introduction

A man chooses to marry a woman whom he loves, and it is seldom (if ever) the case that a man will marry a woman he does not love in some form or fashion. However, it is this very form and fashion of love, yea, his mental state in this decision regarding the nature of love itself, which is what will determine whether he is destined for a God glorifying life of Headship, or the soul crushing legacy of being the ignominious punching bag of a ball busting battle axe.

We know that men love idealistically, and this remains true in either case. However, a man's paradigm of consciousness determines what love is in itself, and therefore whom is to be chosen as a wife. Here, let us compare these two paradigms of love.

The Love of Dionysius

Within blank slate equalism (AKA Blue Pill mentality), a man would deem himself to be in love with a woman who humbles his desire and therefore holds sexual authority over himself. This is an entirely natural relationship, and to some extent, ordained by God. (Song of Solomon 4:1-15; 6:4-12; 7:1-9)*

When he says, "I love her!", he is confessing his quivering heart's submission to The One™ who has captured his lustful imaginings in the hope that he will forever be her personal Dionysus, and her his personal Aphrodite, and to pour his pagan lust upon her with every stirring urge.

The problem with this approach is that the woman holds the majority of power in the relationship. So when the warm fuzzies fade away, and the humdrum rigamarole of daily living kicks in, he is relegated into the subservient mode of pedestalizing her and working like a son of a b!tch to recapture that original spark through various vain attempts at making her "happy" once again. Unbeknownst to him, these efforts to satiate her non-burning bush will only further destroy whatever Tingles she may have ever had for him (if any at all) and ye olde dreaded dead bedroom syndrome sets in, never to be rescinded.

Within this type of "love" arrangement, it appears superfluous for St. Paul to have to tell husbands to love their wives (Ephesians 5:25-33; Colossians 3:19). It would seem more appropriate for him to be telling wives to love their husbands with tender affections and a gentle rocking motion. However, Paul's admonishments make more sense when we recognize that this is not a Christian marriage to begin with.

The Love of Master Ch@d Head

Within a Headship structure of Authority, a man would deem himself to be in love with a woman who attaches her soul to his like a monkey on his back. Although this is annoying and perhaps even embarrassing at times, she is submissive to his will and eager to please him in all things. This is the more important piece of the equation which must be firmly set in place before Master Ch@d can quench his thirst without fear of being poisoned. (Song of Solomon 1:2-4; 1:12-14; 1:16-17; 2:3-6; 2:16-17; 3:1-4; 5:4-5; 5:10-16; 6:2-3; 7:10-13; 8:1-3; 8:14)*

When he says, "She loves me!", he is declaring his commitment to stick with her, teach her, mold her into wife material, and wash her clean, doing what is necessary to admonish her soul in the fear of the Lord. Although he may not be raving mad with Dionystic desire, anytime she licks his ball sack with wide-teary-eyed eagerness of affection, he cannot resist ruling over her passions by shagging her eager thatch on the regular. Atten-SHUN! Thus, he is the master of her heart, and she the mistress who purveys the child-bearing receptacle for his loin slush.

Within this type of love arrangement, it is altogether fitting for St. Paul to tell husbands to love their wives (Ephesians 5:25-33; Colossians 3:19), as this added effect is what will keep her enthralled with pangs of humble hungry desire and perpetuate her pasty passions of impalement into the eternal.

Conclusions

As you can see from the illustrations above, a man becomes trapped in a soul-sucking marriage when he puts his own thirst first and foremost, and bows down to worship p00n in the abstract. Meanwhile, he fails to take advantage of other opportunities in which a woman may be offering her sincere submissive love to him.

OTOH, a man enters into a daily c0ck-sucking marriage and attains the glories of Headship when he settles in with a woman with whom he can make a game of keeping her dancing on her toes and begging for moar. He stays focused on steadily nurturing his obedient house pet until she is capable of taking the honored place as his sidekick.

 Important Note: In the Song of Solomon, the majority of verses are of the bride singing praises to the groom, and not the other way around. This is as it should be.*

Strong Independent Women

Jack · 3 May 2023 · Archived copy · Original

It all depends on what that means.

Readership: Men
Theme: Wives and Mothers
Length: 1,200 words
Reading Time: 7 minutes

Introduction

Modern women cling to the idea of being strong and independent as if it were a profound virtue.

Men naturally scoff at this, but is there any truth to it?

This idea is somewhat confounding to men because many of the women who proudly brag about being Strong and Independent are the same women who are in debt, and/or are financially dependent on alimony, child support, welfare, and other forms of government or court-ordered dole. Yet, it seems to be acceptable among women to claim this income and still call themselves independent.

This post will look at how Men and Women have totally different concepts of what it means for a woman to be Strong and Independent.

Women's Concept of a Strong and Independent Woman

For women, "strong and independent" is a psychological construction that means some combination of the following.

A "strong" woman is…

- A woman who can moxie herself into a princess mentality without doubting herself.
- Able to be sexually promiscuous without getting heartbroken.
- Able to maintain feelings of emotional security without having any real source of security, such as a husband or a steady income.
- Arrogant, haughty, and/or proud.
- Controlling, domineering, extroverted, and outspoken.

An "independent" woman is…

- A "free spirit", or "spiritual but not religious", which usually means she is into Gnosticism or witchcraft.
- A woman who believes (or professes to believe) all her material needs are provided for somehow. (The how doesn't matter.)
- A woman who does not perceive her need of a Head or a spiritual covering.
- A woman who is not emotionally or financially dependent on the good graces of a man.
- Promiscuous; sexually liberated.

To men, any or all of the above traits indicates that a woman is one or more of the following.

- A ball buster.
- A feminist.
- Distrustful and Untrustworthy.
- Emotionally unstable or dead on the inside.
- Emotionally unavailable in a relationship.
- Excessively insecure.
- Lacking authenticity and vulnerability.
- Lacking feminine graces.
- Lacking moral agency.
- Narcissistic.
- Spiritually immature and/or self-centered.

Moreover, a Strong Independent woman is, for all intents and purposes, a “man”, and is therefore unattractive to men and a poor choice for a wife.

EoS adds,

> “All these platitudes about being strong and independent are really just cope.”
> “I failed to use my youth, beauty and fertility to secure a nice, healthy, loving, providing man to have babies and grow old with (when I had the chance). I squandered those things on hedonism and sex and whatever. I DON’T NEED NO MAN!”

This has had a trickle down effect. A lot of younger women spout the Strong and Independent moxie long before they reach that point in life. They are taught to think this way by the older harridans who missed the boat in their pursuit of the Feminist Life Script, and also by weak Male Feminist fathers who desire for them to not be dependent on a man. It becomes a spiritual stronghold, and a self-perpetuating generational curse.

Men's Concept of a Strong and Independent Woman

For men, "strong and independent" has a totally different meaning than what is touted by the wider femcentric society.

"Strong" means that she's…

- Able to bear a large number of healthy children.
- Able to handle her own affairs (e.g. managing a budget or a household) without screwing everything up.
- Able to love and respect a man.
- Able to say "no" to unhealthy habits or a debaucherous lifestyle.
- Able to submit to a man without a lot of emotional turbulence and games.
- Able to take as much d!ck as he can give her, and still be up for more.
- Confident in her own skin.
- Emotionally mature – able to give and receive love in a reciprocating and effective way.
- Emotionally secure – enough that she isn't prone to handing out sh!t tests and many other non-compliant tactics that are relational non-starters. All those things suck the life and joy out of a man.
- Not incapacitated by doubts and fears.
- Physically healthy.

"Independent" means that she's…

- A self-starter. You can give her some instructions, and she's able to handle it without coming back every ten minutes for advice, encouragement, or help.
- Able to resist peer pressure.
- Able to think for herself and make good choices.
- Able to trust a man, i.e. her father or husband. (Ironic, but true. Women should think about this one.)
- Agentic without needing excessive oversight.

- Responsible for her choices and decisions.

Moreover, we have painted a portrait of a woman who is mature in faith, useful to a man's purpose in life, and more likely to be a good choice of a wife.

Caveats

According to the Reciprocal Rule, it is possible for weak men to be attracted to insecure women posing as Strong Independent types (according to the female view). Meanwhile, such men will have no desire for emotionally healthy women and have no confidence in approaching them.

However, even normal joes may find some Strong Independent wimmin attractive, simply because an emotionally buoyant attitude and egocentric pride can be attractive (although deceptive) qualities.

For some men, there is something about an emotionally secure and socially dominant woman that makes them feel deeply satisfied with the relationship, and here it should be noted that women become this way by having a strong relationship with their father.

It is easy for men to get a sense of satisfaction from this sort of relationship simply because her upbeat positivity and lack of insecurity leads him to feel more secure about the relationship. Furthermore, Men can easily become convinced to commit to such a woman, even though other key markers of a healthy union may be missing, such as her attraction and her commitment to him.

Conclusions

As you can see, to Women, “Strong and Independent” doesn’t actually mean Strong and Independent as a man might think of it. No, it is nothing more than a feminist moxie that doubles as both a cope and a virtue signal. What it really means is that a woman resents and rejects Biblical Headship and Patriarchy.

One of the earliest posts I wrote on this blog was, How does a Woman Attract (and Keep) a Husband? (2009/10/5). Here, it was posited that there are three necessary qualities a woman must have to attract a mate.

1. A woman must be reasonably attractive.
2. A woman must know how to “Get Along” with a man.
3. A woman must have a “Life”.

The first and second points were summarily described in the post, 16 Qualities of an Irresistible Woman (2017/12/1). In this essay, emotional maturity was listed as the most important trait of all. This is essentially men’s concept of what it means for a woman to be “strong and independent”.

Concerning the third point, this can be summarized as having moral agency and spiritual maturity. IOW, a man can sense that she has a Life, i.e. the Life of Christ in her heart, and sharing this inner Life is a continual source of inspiration.

Knowing her Place

A woman who knows how to fit in and support her husband's Mission — without making waves — is a blessing to her entire household and to society at large.

Introduction

Before marriage, every man must be on his way to finding his passion; what makes him come alive; his calling – which ideally coincides with his career. He must have some idea about where he is headed even if the details are not too clear. And he must know what kind of a wife he needs to be a helper to that.

On the wife's end, she needs to know what will be required of her if she marries a particular man, and what kind of life she can expect out of a marriage to him.

This post describes 5 lifestyles of men with a Mission and Purpose in life, and wives who know how to support their husband in their work.

An Athlete and his Wife

A quarterback's wife needs to be comfortable with a competitive marriage and a physically active home life. He will have a crazy schedule, practicing and training long hours in and out of season. He can never have a Happy Meal with the kids and will talk way more football than she has the stomach to digest. She will also have to attend a lot of football matches and keep a happy smile throughout, even if she personally finds it too violent. She must control her weight and stay fit, and never let him regret choosing to marry her instead of remaining a bachelor with many girlfriends in rotation. She will have to accept the fact that many other women will find her husband utterly lip-biting f_ckable, and will lose control of themselves in his presence. In spite of this competition, she must keep her wits collected and resist jealousy, keeping herself confident of her place as his wife, trusting in the Lord to protect her husband's heart whenever she is not around him.

A Doctor and his Wife

A doctor's wife has to learn that he will always have urgent responsibilities to attend, and important matters will always be on his mind, both which detract from his ability to be fully present in mind and body with the family. He will never have regular timings. He will probably not have a regular vacation. He will run out in the middle of the night for emergency calls. He will always be sleep deprived. He will walk in at 2:00 in the morning after missing his son's 10th birthday party the previous evening. After a shower, a shave, and a short cat nap, he'll have to run to work again at 7:00 in the morning — before his son wakes up. She knows it would be improper and unwise to berate him for missing his son's birthday but should instead give him a warm smile and a hug, never knowing whether her husband may have lost a patient that evening and needs an emotional boost to get through the day — maybe even a quickie if he is up for it and needs to de-stress. She knows it is better not to know such things, and not to ask. Meanwhile, she must tell their son how proud they are that he has a Daddy who works so hard, cares about people, and saves lives on occasion. Because it must have been one very sick patient which made him miss his son's 10th birthday party. And how maybe they will celebrate — just father and son — another day.

A Pastor and his Wife

A pastor's wife has to accept the severe pressure of being the primary role model of a wife in the church. She must observe all that the bible says wives should do and in relation to their husbands — dress attractively yet modestly, submit to him in all things, respect him at all times, refrain from speaking too much in church or as an authority over men — without ever failing! She must be the perfect mother and housewife, a Proverbs 31 woman who cares and prepares for her household in every way. She must keep the house looking like Better Homes and Gardens as it is also a place of fellowship and ministry for the church and for the Lord. She must be on call throughout the week, in case her husband needs a quickie to relieve his stress and temptation, or if he asks her to sit in a counseling session with a younger woman, and then not undermine his council by overtly sympathizing with her complaints too much, even if she agrees with her. She will have to negotiate handling the women in the church when they gossip, spread rumors, and say things that they would never say in the company of the men. In addition to all this, she must guard herself against becoming arrogant, conceited, lazy, and vain. She must resist the screamings of her flesh that tell her she is a human who has bouts of sin like every other woman, and carry on with her duties with honor and grace.

A Professor and his Wife

A professor's wife should be respectful of her husband's propensity to be abstract, logical, and reclusive, and observant of his drive to study and to do research. He will spend long hours in his "cave", churning out experimental results and writing publications. Whenever he comes out of his "cave", he is off to class, or to a conference, or to a meeting with other professors, industry businessmen, researchers, and/or students. She knows that she must not pose any distraction to him while he is working as he needs to concentrate on his work. She cannot be given to drinking, or gossiping, or nagging, or being a busybody, or noisy, etc. as these things would create unnecessary turmoil and reduce his productivity. In spite of this droll inactivity and lack of attention (from her perspective), she needs to dutifully support his material needs consistently without failure — cooking meals, cleaning house, caring for the children, washing laundry — all to allow him to concentrate on his work with all his heart and mind. She also needs to deal with the long inactive summers and winter breaks, in which he has no work other than to pick away at his research, which continues to be no less important than her desire for a vacation. She should also be able to cope with female students who take an affectionate liking to her husband, and be able to defuse those situations without embarrassment nor scandal. Meanwhile, she keeps his balls fully drained on a daily basis so that those young horny college chicks can never present a formidable temptation to him.

A Writer and his Wife

An author's or blogger's or content producer's wife needs to accept that he will be a homebody and he will always have his nose in the computer. This has the benefit of him having lots of family time and time with the children, but she may grow tired of seeing him do little other than talking and writing, etc. The family may enjoy short vacations together, but even on vacation, he will be emotionally distant, brainstorming for ideas and jotting down notes at random times. She must accept that there will be spans of time when he has no output, or output that doesn't sell well, and so there will be periodic dry spells in the finances. He may not have good health, which may be part of the reason he chose to be a writer, and he may have poor personal habits, such as smoking, drinking, and may languish in a state of poor fitness. She may grow bored with the lifestyle after a few years, however, she is free to pursue her own hobbies and interests without too much public scrutiny, as long as it doesn't interfere with his ability to concentrate and produce content.

Epilogue

In past comments, it is sometimes asked why women should have standards. Of course, we are not making reference to an entitled princess's standards here, but it would not be wise to hitch your wagon to a horse if you had no clue where the horse was headed or what that journey would require of you to be made successfully.

The answer to this question is not so much about standards but the direction in which a man is headed and whether a woman has the ability and interest to support that man on his journey in life, because if a woman marries that man, then they are both going there together.

In many past posts, the case has been made that the husband's headship and the wife's submission is what constitutes a Christian marriage. It has also been argued that the second in command (the wife, in the case of marriage) either makes or breaks the enterprise. So as you can see through any of the above examples, a man's life and work can be greatly blessed by a wife who knows her place, and it can be hamstrung or severely jeopardized if the wife fails to get with the program.

Moreover, every woman needs to know where the man she is going to marry is headed in life. Some men have very promising futures in the profession God has called them to. She can support him in that, or if she does not, she becomes dead weight, or worse! Some men, sorry to say, are headed to jail!!! And if she marries such a man, then she can only expect to be supporting herself and their children alone. Moreover, they should not have any misgivings or false expectations about what their life will be like together.

Wives may chafe at these duties and responsibilities, but that is part of the cost of marriage. If women want to have a husband and a home, then they must fit into his life and work and become an asset, not just a pretty @ss who runs her mouth all day.

Women were Created to Conform

A Christian concept of the Female Herd Behavior / Mentality.

Readership: All
Theme: Wives and Mothers
Length: 2,000 words
Reading Time: 10 minutes

Introduction

This post conveys an email I received from a female reader on 2022/8/18. Her testimony about familial Headship / Patriarchy is a reminder of how things are supposed to be, and illustrates a social structure that can be implemented to align our families to the Christian ideal.

RedPillBoomer shared his observations of presumed good Christian girls corruption after going off to college.

> "I always wondered about the women of my generation that got married, raised kids in suburbia, and seemingly had a conservative bent in some of the ways involving their child rearing practices. Their girls dressed fairly modestly as teens for the most part, took music lessons, played girls sports, did well in school, some went to church, etc.
> Their girls then spent their twenties off at college (including Christian colleges I might add) being party girls, chasing the bad boys, sleeping with them, and living what they refer to now as their "hoe phase." Then I'd see these girls in their late twenties into their early thirties getting around their family members trying in some ways to "turn the clock back" and regain some facsimile of their growing up phase to "land a husband / provider" type man for marriage. The modest dress would return, they'd try to act more grown up and responsible, etc. Some in the Manosphere cynically refer to this as being a "Chameleon," pretending to be one thing, in this case an older "good girl," yet in reality, underneath, a bad girl in disguise.
> It struck me as odd that these mom's (and dad's) didn't teach them [why bad boys are attractive and why they should resist that attraction and train their attraction to good men]. It seemed strange to me that the parents invested all that effort in raising their daughters "right" and then just let it all out the window when the girls graduated from high school.
> I know intellectually why this happened, stuff like the cultural conditioning of feminism (focus on your career and don't get married too young, "You can have it all!"), wokeism, etc. However, at a more emotional level, it still seems odd to me these types of situations occurred at all. Why invest all that time, energy, resources and YEARS as parents to "swim upstream" against today's culture in an attempt to raise "good girls" and then let it all "fly out the window" when the girls became young adults?"

[Begin Essay]

I am writing in response to the last paragraph of RedPillBoomer's comment, but realised it was way too long for a comment. And perhaps also not my place as a woman in a men's forum.

The simple answer to this is most parents simply will not believe this can happen to THEIR kids. "It can happen to others, but NOT mine!" Till it does!

And it happens frequently — ALL the time! Parents should not be surprised to see what happens when they relinquish their authority over their daughters by sending them away to college.

This reminds me of something my father taught me when I was a teenager, and I have since then observed it in my own life. So I thought I would respectfully share this with you.

Sex Specific Differences in Group Interactions

There are fundamental differences between how men and women behave and react in groups.

A man usually prefers to join a group in which he has a shared interest. So if what the group "does" interests him, he will hang out with them. If not, he would rather be a lone ranger or join a different group that he has a shared interest in. The men may be very very dissimilar but the shared interest makes them a group. A science guy will not join a football league unless he likes football. Even if they were to invite him.

Girls are very different. Girls join a group that another girl invites them to join. And then she becomes LIKE the group. Most "all girl's groups" are rarely about a shared interest but how well they get along with EACH other. Every all-girl's group has a "Queen Bee" and a "Sidekick" who is not as pretty or as much of a leader as the Queen Bee, but second and moreso than the others. The Sidekick must purport herself as the Queen Bee's "Best Friend" at all times. The other girls adopt various roles of some other social placeholders, but they all must get along with the rest — or else face the risk of exclusion, or (gasp!) rejection from the group.

Jack's Note: We often talk about Hierarchies in men's social groups and in larger organizations such as the military or the workplace, but here we see that hierarchies form in women's groups too. And just like in men's groups, you have to fit into the hierarchy and follow, or get out or else be thrown out. The lesson here is that hierarchies are absolutely necessary for both men and women to establish an ordered social structure.

Stacey may hate divorce. Stacey may hate green hair. Stacey may want to be a virgin till she gets married. But then Stacey joins a group where 4 out of 5 women have green hair and tattoos, are banging Ch@ds, and/or are getting a divorce — and guess what? After a period of social acculturation, Stacey becomes a green haired tattooed Ch@d banger who will divorce her future husband one day. Surprise!

I do not care how many sermons Stacey has heard about marriage, self-esteem, or chastity — Stacey is going where the group is going! There are NO dissimilar women in a group — all wannabe the Queen bee or have the approval of the Queen Bee. The most cruel thing in a girl's group is to be UNFRIENDED. Girls will avoid this AT ALL COSTS!!!

In summary, in a men's forum, it is the shared interest that brings very dissimilar men to a common place. In a woman's forum, all the women are alike or will soon become alike. There are no exceptions. Expecting a girl to NOT conform to a group and thus face rejection is like expecting a nerd to join the football team just so he can get beat up, shamed, and ridiculed every day. Utter foolishness!

Women are not Made to be Independent

My father refused to send me away to college even though I had very high scores. He supported my education in a local college — the best in our town. But I lived in HIS house till the day I got married.

My father gave me an explanation for his decision in the form of an analogy, which was this — God is the Potter. Man is clay. Woman is water. God shapes the clay. The clay holds the water and gives it substance in which the water moves and lives and has its full being.

In other words, Men PERFORM. Women CONFORM.

He then told me — in Genesis — first man was alone for a while before God said it was not good for him to be alone. But from her first breath, woman was NEVER alone. She went from God directly to Adam. She was NEVER on her own. Her purpose was to be Adam's companion and helper. Women cannot function outside of that role! If there is no man to be the clay pot in which she moves, she will find a "boyfriend" or a group of other women to be a surrogate pot, and then she will become just like them!

My father told me, it was not my education or lack thereof that made me untrustworthy to be on my own, and not because he did not believe I had the intellect or agency to care for myself. The reason was because my female nature was to conform and to be a helper, and it would be irresponsible and foolish of him to remove me from that role. A Father does not give his charge (daughter) to a college or any other group. That did not mean I could not have friends, but I was never to forget that I was under HIS authority and after marriage — my husband's.

This is also why both my father and my husband "approve" (as in having final say) of who my friends are. They do not select or choose my friends. I do. But to hang out with them a little longer, they needed to be "okayed" by dad

(before marriage) and hubby (after). Interestingly, all of my closest women friends are in my family, like my mom, sister, and niece. I do have church women friends and other friends, but not at the closest level. I think this protects me from group think so that my husband is not just my major influence but my ONLY influence. Other than my personal walk with Christ of course.

Primary Groups and Roles for Females

For a woman, her primary "group" leader is 'Father', and then "Husband" after she marries. Her roles are to be a helper and companion to her husband, and a mother to his children, and once she completes these roles successfully, she takes on an additional role to mentor younger women within the family / group very specifically about how to behave (Titus 2:3-5). If her husband dies, she is to marry again, or if she is older, to be an influence in the church teaching younger women.

In short, her "group" leader is…

Father, if single → Husband, if married → Second husband, if widowed → The Church, if older.

She conforms to these leaders. It is in her nature. That was the significance of the father giving the bride's hand in marriage to the husband. It is moving from one "group leader" — Father — to another "group leader" — Husband.

When I got married, my father actually made a speech about it. How he would always support me but I now belonged to, was answerable to, and was to submit to my husband. The onus of responsibility of being my "leader" — though I do believe the word he used was "head" — was passed on to my husband.

Jack's Note: In most patriarchal societies (e.g. ANE, Chinese Filial Piety, et al.), the eldest son takes on the role of leading / caring for his mother after her husband has died.

Epilogue

In ALL the years of human history — ACROSS cultures — when a girl went from father to husband — marriage thrived. In any culture where this fails — the culture fails.

Women are not meant to be independent. Our purpose is to be companions and helpers. Unfortunately, Satan has deceived us into accompanying and helping exploiters and playboys instead of fathers and husbands.

The truth is, every single woman IS dependent on a leader and/or a group, and she IS conforming to that group. If the group is not father / husband and family, then she is dependent on…

- Consumerism — Corporations lead her to buy their products and service their offices for a cheap, monthly wage.
- Celebrities — lead her with the lie that they can have it all.
- Fly-by-night F-boys — sate her lonely libido with an occasional Pump-n-Dump, leaving her all the more desperate, diseased, and insane.
- Political leaders — lead her with dumb ideologies.
- Pharmas — lead her to buy more drugs to cope with life when it all comes to crash and burn her.
- The "Boyfriend" — wasting her precious peak years with someone she'll never marry.
- Women's social groups — "Girl's night out!"

They ALL are her "group leaders" and "heads" instead of father and husband.

That is why it is a bad idea for women to be on their "own". They NEVER were meant to be. That is why Feminism is so destructive. Because it removes women from their father and says husband is irrelevant.

Apologies for this long post, but this is what my father explained. I do believe he protected me.

The New Trad-Wife

The C0v!d-19 pandemic and lockdown in 2020-21 appears to have kickstarted a slow return to normalcy. Ever since then, there has been a steady increase in the number of women who are rediscovering the pleasures, conveniences, and ease of being a Stay at Home Wife™. Some of the more vocal are adopting Red Pill talking points in justifying their decision.

Backlash

Not sure if we could call this a “social movement” just yet, but it is trending enough on T!kT0k, Tw!tter, and YouTube to attract the criticism of feminists and firebrands.

Note how most all these collateral voices use the typical progressive calling cards, catch phrases, coded language, cultural signs, dog whistles, figures of speech, signal words, and shibboleths (e.g. “M!s0gyny”, “N@z!s”, “The P@tr!@rchy”, “sex!sm”, “toxic”, etc.), all used to vilify decency and order. One overused slant is an attempt to poison the Trad-Wife well by associating conservative traditionalism with female insecurity, physical abuse, and shame (all projection), as well as target groups like the Alt-R!ght, capitalists, criminals, the Manosphere, Musl!ms, and Wh!te Suprem@c!sts. However, since all these tacks are little more than alarm bells for the narrative parrots, and because their rhetorical devices are ineffective in revitalizing the bankruptcy of Feminism Inc., all this gibberish falls flat with the based who are growing tired of the same old hyperdramatized ressentimental talking points borne out of a fear of condemnation and shame.

Too Good to be True?

Considering the length of time men have suffered under the feminist, post Sex Rev regime, we might hesitate in thinking this would be too good to be true, and that there must be a catch. Well, the catch is that these women are not thinking about how to become better wives and mothers, nor about how to serve their husbands and families, or better their children's futures by dedicating themselves to life at home. No, they are thinking about what's in it for them, of course.

- Attention, especially male attention.
- Able to dress provocatively without appearing like a slore.
- Boasting and showing off their @$$ets.
- A new embodiment of feminism.
- A method of convergence that appeals to conservatives, churchians, and men.
- A trendy cover for being Strong and "Independent".
- A venue of competition in the boss b!tch sphere (which is tough due to the vast number of women vying for attention in that segment).
- A way to escape the corporate grind and the financial pressure of being independent.
- Click bait to monetize their channel.
- Rebelliousness, specifically against fourth wave feminism.
- Status signaling among women.
- The Feel Goods of false righteousness.

Competition in the Trad-Wife sphere is no where near as fierce and men are hungry to listen to women say things they are thinking to themselves. It has been said that women want men to tell them what they're thinking/feeling, but in a deeper voice. Likewise, men want to hear women spouting masculine viewpoints, and they must be young, well-endowed, and feminine to get any traction. You don't see any 50+ year old Trad-Wives teaching the younger women, which would be closer to the Biblical model. Instead, it's mostly cosplay with sexual semiotics.

The supply/demand aspect makes it much easier for women to get the attention they want by promoting counter culture "traditional" roles. The giveaway is the faux modest dress that still flaunts, rather than flatters, the underlying form. Take a look at the more prominent Trad-Wives, e.g. Alena Pettit, Estee Williams. Most of their subscribers / viewers are men, as it is for most of the other Trad-Wives and feminine Red Pill parrots.

Feminist values and mantras appear prominently, even among the most conservative of Tradwife voices. There are even some media personalities who have attempted to reclaim the Trad-Wife image into traditional Feminism and churchianity.

For example, one English lady in waiting, Alena Pettit, has attempted to nail down a monopoly on the Trad-Wife branding. She has her own blog on the topic, The Darling Academy, with a small but sizeable following (6K on FB; 8K on YT.) In one post, What is a Trad Wife? (2020/7/25), she says that the Tradwife is a Proverbs 31 woman who believes in equality!

Besides the ongoing convergence, which seems to be the worm of perdition that never dies, the most obvious attraction of being a Stay At Home Wife™ is the benefit of escaping the corporate grind and the financial pressure of being a Strong Independent Woman™.

For example, over at Prospect, Catherine Rottenberg and Shani Orgad wrote a response to Pettit's post in their article, Why the rise of the domestic "Tradwife" tells us more about modern work culture than feminism (2020/2/10). They quote one 33-year-old self-proclaimed Trad-Wife, Stacy McCall, as saying, "Being a tradwife is empowering and has enabled me to take back control of my life…" It is implied that corporate office w0kettes have less control over their bosses than kick@ss wives have over their nubby hubbies at home, so why not consolidate power within their primary sphere of influence?

RedPillBoomer summarized all this in saying,

> "I see all of this as an attempt to have the best of both worlds, the Stay At Home Wife™ and Strong Independent Woman™; all the while avoiding the worst of both worlds."

Moreover, the problem with the current 'Trad Wife" movement is that it isn't real. Tradwives aren't really traditional, nor are they wives in the truest sense of the word. They're attention wh0res LARPing cosplay with a heavy emphasis on sexual semiotics. It's all about incentives, and the incentive is NOT to please God nor their husbands.

Sorting out the Real Trad Wives from the Fakes

If a marriage minded man meets a girl who says she wants to be a Trad-Wife, he would be naturally overjoyed, given the relative rarity of such a woman. However, a wise man would want to know exactly what she really means by "Trad-Wife".

OK, so what kinds of Tradwives are there?

The author of Gynocentrism has attempted to sort out these different responses of women in his post, Tradwives, Modwives and Feminists (2020/1/19). He writes,

> "A Gynowife refers to a women who adheres to either the traditional gynocentric role (#Tradwife-2) and expects her husband to adhere to a gynocentric perspective, or alternatively to the modern feminist insistence that wives should dominate and set the tempo of all relationship matters and the men should simply fall into line instead of mansplaining etc. Whether of the traditionalist or feminist variety, the Gynowife implies a Gynohusband who sacrifices a significant amount of his own self-interest in service to his wife's interests, needs and comfort. By way of contrast, Tradhusbands and Modhusbands don't defer to wives on all matters – they retain some agency in the service of their own welfare and interests."

Gynowives would include 95+% of all married women in the West, and a good number of these Gynowives may be eager to flatter themselves by claiming to be traditional.

> "Whatever the trend for women to become tradwives, it is not the only alternative to feminist prescriptions, and it may not be the 'best' of the available alternatives either.
> Here I'd like to introduce the phenomenon of "modwives" – women who have embraced multi-option lives over trad roles, and who allow, nay encourage multi-option lives for their husbands. Of course I just made up the term modwife, but they exist and are possibly also growing in number. Both tradwife and modwife eschew feminism which is geared only to female privilege, and not to partnerships based on reciprocal labor and devotion.

> Over 150 years of feminism has bequeathed to women the famed multi-option lives, a sword which shattered the more narrow traditional roles with sure and mighty strokes. But the big question is this; are women today willing to renounce their multi-option lives in favour of single option traditional roles?
> I would say not a snowflake's chance in Hell. And to invite them to do so today can be construed as coercive and even an abusive act. I submit that few women today are going to genuinely trade in multi-option lives for traditional roles, other than a limited few who like the idea of free time and cosplay, and who can rely on husbands to bring home a healthy wage."
> "This unlikelihood that women will embrace roles of yesteryear with any real commitment leads to another option mentioned above – the modwife. At best, today's multi-option women can invite their men to do same. The modwife's modus operandi is based on personal liberty within relationships, extending a true freedom of opportunity to her partner such as society has championed for her, even though it goes without saying that the loaded gun remains in her draw, same as it sits in the draw of the tradwife.
> Yet few multi-option women today are willing to extend that multi-option liberty to men, preferring instead to pocket the advantages extended by women's 'liberation' while expecting their boyfriends and husbands to remain in the mismatched role of protector and provider. There are women however, limited in number as they are, who lean toward the model of commensurate liberty for both men and women in relationships — some of them you will recognize among the supporters of the men's rights movement.
> That libertarian spirit is usually understood as belonging to the political sphere, but it is accepted by the modwife as a guiding principle in her relationship with men. It emphasizes individual choice, relative autonomy, voluntary association, individual judgement, free will, self-determination, and free labor-sharing arrangements and agreements. In a word; freedom."

It's good to have separate terms with unique definitions just to make our communications clear. However, having only three categories, Gynowife (feminist), Tradwife, and Modwife is insufficient to describe what is happening these days. (Readers are invited to describe other types of reactions in the comments below.) Nevertheless, a more precise differentiation should help men sift through the growing number of women who are jumping on the Trad-

Wife bandwagon.

Life with Princess

Too real to be funny.

Readership: All
Theme: Wives and Mothers
Length: 1,600 words
Reading Time: 8 minutes

I just had a "funny" idea (not so funny actually, but you'll see what I mean).

What if there was a TV sitcom of a modern marriage depicted at its WORST, just like we discuss here in the Manosphere?

The husband is good natured, macho, and hardworking. He has a tough working class job as a plumber. He wears the worn out vestiges of having once been handsome, long before the daily hassles of 10 years of marriage took its toll on him.

The wife is an acrid, bitter, blue-haired, loud mouthed, overweight, tattooed, ex-carousel rider, always spouting off back-handed insults / bulverisms, and incinerating her husband's ego with every overworked run-on sentence. She works in a w0ke corporate office, like Am@z0n or G00gle. She constantly compares him in a negative light to other men she works with, especially her boss and her boss' boss. He interprets this as a "Man up!" message and takes it seriously to heart with comedic effect. "Yeah, she's right. I've got to do better than this."

She makes more money than he does and she never fails to lord it over him and grind it in, which comes across as overkill. Even so, all their expenses come out of his earnings. Meanwhile, she is saving up her income, saying that "It is for the children's college funds." In passing, it is revealed that she is preparing this money for the possibility of a divorce. If and when a divorce ever rolls around, she plans to take the whole nest egg on top of alimony and child support, and the children will be left to fend for themselves.

After his long hard days fixing pipes, when he comes home he has to cook supper, wash the clothes and dishes, help the kids with their homework, and tuck them into bed. Meanwhile, she gets tanked on boxed wine, cheese, and coldcuts, and watches Netflix with her cats while sitting in a pile of pillows and blankets. She repetitively gets angry at her cats for stealing her coldcuts and she yells out boorish questions and presumptuous orders from time to time in a drunken stupor.

They go to church about once a month. He is torn between wanting to go more often for the kids' sake, and not wanting to go because it's a discouraging, man-bashing, beta factory. She is also torn between wanting to go more often to hear the ear tickling feminist heresies of the handsome apostate minister, and not wanting to go because the proud@ss church ladies make her look embarassingly bad by comparison. Scenes of them attending church offer caricatures of a wide variety of highly skewed characters; the prissy Choich lady, the irrationally ultra-positive matron repeating "Yes, but you must always look on the bright side… and be thankful for what you have!", mysterious oddball deacons who are Freem@sons secretly conniving on how to make money off the church's real estate investments, the tattered unshaven recovering drunkard who's constantly praising Jesus, good beta boys pontificating on "What would Jesus do?", party girls forced to attend church by their emotionally cold parents, snotty sophisticated sorority girls pretending to be good girls, post-wall single-moms who can't keep up with the carousel competition and suddenly "found Christ", a sexy female choir director who wags her @ss in front of the congregation whenever she waves her baton, and a hot church secretary who is secretly having affairs with several married men in the congregation including the pastor. The brief excerps of sermons borrow scriptures to wank over W0ke social constructs and tear down men. All with comedic effect.

They have duty sex about twice a year. He's sneaking p0rn to take the edge off, and she catches him on occasion, and ridicules and shames him for that. From the context of the discoverie, it is evident that if she was putting out more regularly, there would be no need for skin pics.

She goes out with her boss on the weekends, and they travel abroad together a couple times a year. These scenes involve intersexual interactions which show the wife has a zany flirtatious side that comes out whenever she is outside the home. Each time, she comes home and brags about it. She says she “earned” her “social standing” and that he could never afford to treat her like the princess that she assumes she is. There are lots of circumstantial and physical indicators that there’s some hanky panky going on, but always with plausible deniability accompanied with a reverse accusation on the husband for violating the code of assumed trust (which is non-existent). He feels ashamed of himself and vows to think more highly of his wife, again with soppy comedic effect.

He has to perform, put up with all her crap, and make her “happy”, because if he slips up even once, she’ll enforce Duluth and run him through a nasty divorce in which she takes the kids, half of everything (which is revealed to be much more than half after the house would be sold and the lawyers are paid), and leaves him with nothing but alimony and child support payments. She doesn’t tell him all this directly, but instead insinuates this threat by talking about all her “friends” who railroaded their once relatively rich husbands into the grave and took up with another man. In one story, she claims that one “friend” ran off with her lawyer to ensure it was a done deal and got a Maserati in the process. Another story holds that the “friend” got knocked up by 3 men so that she could collect 3 child support payments, thereby ruining all 3 men. It is assumed that men “owe” this to women, all to the guffaws of viewers.

To cap it off, she never lets him forget how thankful he should be to have married a Precious Princess like her, who will never do those things that her "friends" did, which are the same things she is secretly scheming in her heart to do to him! [Insert canned laughter as an irony to incite conviction and a frustrated catharsis in viewers.]

In every other episode, another married couple cast as neighbors drops by to visit. In separate scenes, the men talk privately with each other and so do the women. In these scenes, the husband's friend attempts to Red Pill him, but he feigns shock and insists that he's got to be a "good man", not a "m!s0gyn!st". "She has her problems, but she has a good heart." He comes up with all the common anecdotal Blue Pill excuses for every Red Pill point his friend makes. "No man, it's not like that…" Over the course of the season, the Red Pill is fully explained.

In the scene of the women's private conversation, the wife laments about how much pressure she faces at a workplace that has 6 hour work days, 6 weeks paid vacation every year, free lattes, and a meditation room. She commiserates about how boring and emotionally unavailable her husband is, recasting this as "abusive" behavior. She engages in a pity party, going on and on about how much emotional work she has to do just to tolerate him and the children. Wine, cats, social media, and TV are her only relief valve. The audience is captivated in a suspension of disbelief. All their words and behaviors parallel exactly what the men are discussing in alternating scenes, thereby proving the truth of the male friend's Red Pill advice.

After these scenes are over and the cast members all appear together again, they all pretend as if there wasn't any serious discussion, putting on airs like they were discussing football, a difficult plumbing customer, etc. and pedicures, "that new guy", etc. respectively. The incongruency is self-effacing to the husband, but the Red Pilled neighbors shake their heads, understanding that this couple can't wake up from their delusions because of various ego investments. To nail down the duplicity, the following scene is of the neighbor couple discussing their interactions and empathetically joking and laughing about it while walking home.

In every other other episode, another married couple cast as friends from church drop in. This couple is even more Blue Pilled than the main characters. They bring their kids, and they are a mess. The son is dressed like a buffoon, and gives one word answers whenever he is spoken to. He carries an iPad covered with anime stickers and plays video games constantly. The daughter has a nape cut hairstyle, tattoos of onions on her oxters that look like purple b00bs from a distance, and a snarky tongue — an arrogant slore in the making. The wife has a repetitive line in which she says, to the shame of her entire family, she should have gotten one or two more abortions. In every episode, they quote the bible out of context, and from the context of the social interaction, it is crystal clear (1) why they believe what they do, and (2) how their wrong thinking contributes to their overall turbid weirdness. Then they advise the main characters to go to church more often and follow the bible like they do in order to solve all their problems. Viewers are astounded by the hypocrisy. Over the course of the season, the errors of the Blue Pill and Churchianity are fully explained.

IMO, this Bizarro World would be the hottest sitcom of 2023, even better than Married with Children or Raised by Wolves. However, I know in reality it would hit way too close to home for all too many viewers, thus rendering it an opprobrious agit prop. OTOH, maybe that's just what the Western masses need to get them off their @sses and do some changes.

Of course, a sitcom like this would be much too close to the truth of reality to ever be approved by the MGM hegemony.

16 Bible Passages for Teaching Wives and Daughters about Male-Female Roles and Marriage

> [25] Husbands, love your wives, just as Christ also loved the church and gave Himself for her, [26] that He might sanctify and cleanse her with the washing of water by the word, [27] that He might present her to Himself a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing, but that she should be holy and without blemish.
> Ephesians 5:25-27 (NKJV)

Introduction

Loving your wife like Christ loved the church in no way means bending to her whims. Rather, she should be submitting to your leadership as her Head. A key part of this is "cleansing her with the washing of water by the word", as it says in Ephesians 5:26 above.

The husband is the spiritual head of the house, so a married man must have a firm grip on scriptural truth and be familiar with the typical arguments for why what it says is not really what it means. Think of the whole Ephesians 5 "mutual submission" / "servant leader" angle that feminists love to tout for why 4 millennia of scripture is wrong because of the modern misinterpretation of a verse or two.

The majority of Western women are defacto feminists, even those who grew up in the church and profess to be Christians, and that includes most wives of the married men reading here. These women subsumed by rebellious feminist doctrines are on the path to damnation, which is saddening, but God calls those who He's given to his Son, so who knows what their future holds?

As a married Christian man, it may help if you can believe that your wife living in a biblical marriage with you might be what God uses in His call to them, which means you leading your wife the way you are could be part of the process of her regeneration. In fact, it is very difficult for a typical woman to grow in agency, grace, and truth without the daily guidance and tutelage of a faithful Head.

16 Bible Passages for Teaching Wives and Daughters about Male-Female Roles and Marriage

Here is a reference list of some passages of scripture concerning the female nature, male-female interactions in marriage, and how women should generally behave. Husbands / Fathers should definitely cover these passages in admonishing and teaching their wives / daughters. The "washing with the word" begins here.

1. Genesis 2:15-25 – Adam and Eve, an archetype of male and female.
2. Genesis 3 – The Fall and the Curse
3. Numbers 5:11-31 – The Law of Jealousy Concerning Unfaithful Wives
4. Numbers 30 – The Law of Vows; The power of headship overrules the Law of Vows; The father or husband can recant a pledge for a daughter or husband and God will not hold it against her.
5. 2 Samuel 6:13-23 – Michal scorns David for worshipping the Lord and then she becomes barren.
6. Proverbs 5:18-19 – The wife should give her husband joy. Her body (i.e. breasts) is for his satisfaction. He is enraptured by her love (i.e. sexual affection). The wife provides this from her youth. To be satisfied with the pair he's got, he needs to have access to enjoy them … all his days.
7. Proverbs 21:9,19; 25:24; 27:15-16 – What it's like for a husband to be married to a contentious woman who argues with her husband. Notice the hopelessness conveyed in verse 16. There is no constraining her poor attitude and behavior, meaning the only options are getting rid of her or breaking her down and rebuilding her, but who wants to do that kind of work?
8. Proverbs 31 – The standard by which all women are judged. Note that her husband is by the gate with the town elders. If you want to know the importance of this chapter, read the story of Ruth (described in the following section). When Boaz decided to marry her and act as her kinsman redeemer, he went to the town gate where the important men of the city gather.
9. Song of Solomon – The joys and raptures of love and sex.
10. 1 Corinthians 7 – Principles of Marriage
11. Ephesians 5:22-33 – Marriage, Christ and the Church; Roles of husbands and wives.

12. Colossians 3:18-25 – The Christian Home; Instructions for wives to submit and husbands to act well towards their families.
13. 1 Timothy 3:8-13 – Qualifications of Deacons and their wives
14. 1 Timothy 5:13 – Behaviors and situations be wary of. Wives should be given tools to recognize these pitfalls.
15. Titus 2:1-10 – Qualities of a Sound Church; What women are supposed to do in and out of the church.
16. 1 Peter 3:1-7 – Wives should be in subjugation to their husbands; The adornment of women is a meek and mild spirit. (I'll toast to that!)

4 Stories of Noteworthy Women in the Bible

1. Ruth – The Book of Ruth is a crazy story of God's grace and redemption when you know the details of the places and people. The story begins when Elimelech leaves his home in Bethlehem during a famine. Bethlehem roughly means, "the house of bread". He leaves all he has ever known, his work, his family, his synagogue, because he doubts God's promise to take care of his people. He takes his wife Naomi and their sons to Moab. The Moabites were a people born of incest between Abraham's nephew Lot and his daughters. Moabite roughly means, "Who's your father?" His sons came of age and married Moabite women, one of which is Ruth. After a time, it all falls apart. Elimelech and his sons die. So Naomi and her two daughters-in-law were widows in a place where they no longer had a home because Elimelech bailed. Naomi returns to her people in Bethlehem, the best chance Naomi knows of to survive. Ruth goes with Naomi, leaving behind all she had known, her family of origin, her people, her homeland, because she felt God's call in her life. There was no going back to a faithless Moab. Once in Bethlehem, Naomi called the elders together to arrange a marriage for Ruth, and they eventually decided that Boaz is the right man. Naomi sees Ruth's heart and guides her in how to act and what to do (looking at you Titus 2:3-5). She is hard working, humble and submissive to Boaz and it is her attitude towards him that wins his heart. The end result is that Boaz, at a cost to his own estate, marries Ruth and redeems Elimelech's land that should have been Naomi's had Elimelech not faithlessly run from God's promises. (There was a lot more significance to the land back then than we grasp now in modern times, especially in the West where being a white collar nomad is common as people chase careers. Land back then meant real applicable wealth. It meant provision, avoiding starvation, and it harbored the furry walking bank accounts of the time — livestock.) Ruth becomes one of the Gentile ancestors of Jesus listed in the gospel of Matthew's genealogy (Matthew 1:5).

2. Esther – The book of Esther and King Xerxes I (AKA King Ahasuerus; 485–464 B.C.) is a picture of feminine power. Her femininity not only saved her life but the lives of all the Jews as well. She contrasts nicely against Queen Vashti who was the picture of the modern empowered contentious argumentative woman. If you think about it, after King Xerxes deals with Vashti, Esther must have been a breath of fresh air to him. First, she's physically stunning and she cares about how she looks in front of Xerxes. Second, she is humbly deferential in how she makes her requests to him. This isn't to say that she is wishy washy or weak in anyway. She knows what she wants and does not hesitate … like when she tells the king she wants Haman hanged just like Haman had planned to do to her uncle Mordecai.
3. The Shulamite in the Song of Solomon – In the Song of Solomon, King Solomon and the Shulamite girl are enthralled in the mystical passion of eternal love. Both King Solomon and the Shulamite girl sing praises of love to one another. However, the majority of verses are of the bride singing praises to the groom (Song of Solomon 1:2-4; 1:12-14; 1:16-17; 2:3-6; 2:16-17; 3:1-4; 5:4-5; 5:10-16; 6:2-3; 7:10-13; 8:1-3; 8:14), and there are fewer verses of the groom adoring the bride (Song of Solomon 4:1-15; 6:4-12; 7:1-9). This is not equality, but it is as it should be, as revealed in the timeless beauty and inspiration of love in this book.
4. Tabitha (AKA Dorcas; Acts 9:36-43) – When Tabitha became sick and died, St. Peter prayed and restored her to Life. The faithful woman is worthy of love, attention, and eternal life.

There are others, but this list paints a nice picture.

Don't forget to read the requirements on husbands without the feminist lens on.

Keep pressing on in wisdom!

7 Things Men Want out of a Woman in Marriage

Jack · 17 May 2023 · Archived copy · Original

So simple, and yet so impossible to find.

Introduction

Knowing her Place (2023/5/5) made the point that a woman who knows how to fit in and support her husband's Mission — without making waves — is a blessing to her entire household and to society at large.

The question was raised, "What does a woman need to be to have a satisfying life with her husband?" The question applied to ALL husbands with their wives, ranging from the Average Joe to Herr Gigachadwick.

The Wants

In general, a man wants a woman who is an inspiration and a blessing to his life, and who is more of an asset and a benefit than a bothersome burden.

More specifically, there are a few basic things every man wants from his wife.

1. Submit to him.
2. Respect him.
3. Look good for him. (Stay thin, dress attractively, etc.)
4. Make his house a place he actually wants to come home to.
5. Be a good mother to his children.
6. Feed him food he enjoys.
7. Have lots of sex with him.

Other than that, there are things each man wants that are particular to him.

- Some men want a woman who knows her place.
- Some men want an adventurous traveling partner.
- Some men want a woman who is fun to hang out with.
- Some men want an intriguing intellectual conversation.
- Some men want a woman who is super-hot and sexy, at least in his eyes.
- Some men want a woman who will be an affectionate and tender lover and/or a crazy sex partner.
- Some men want an assistant who'll keep their personal lives organized because they have demanding careers.
- Some men want a woman who'll faithfully maintain the home front while he's away, maybe for long periods of time.
- Some men want a woman who will keep him inspired to achieve the larger vision he has in life, and support him in that endeavor.
- Some men want a "trophy wife" to create an attractive looking couple, boost his social confidence, and enhance his public image.

Obviously an immature relationship that will probably not last. Note the “air hand”.

Whatever it may be, the man needs to be honest about his expectations, and the woman needs to be honest about whether or not she’s willing and able to meet his expectations. Some men overlook the qualifications in the former list to his own detriment. Some men don’t know which specific kind of woman described in the latter list is best for him, or he can’t decide, maybe even thinking he’ll find a magical unicorn that can be all of the above. Such a man is immature and/or does not know himself well. Dishonesty, ignorance, and/or immaturity concerning individual values, goals of marriage, and their future life together is where many marriages fail — even before they begin.

The Needs

To BE a wife, a woman needs to…

1. Submit to her husband.
2. Do what her husband tells her to do.

Such a woman needs to be…

- A credit to her family of origin
- Agreeable
- Appreciative
- Chaste
- Cheerful, mirthful, optimistic, winsome…
- Common sensical
- Contrite
- Honorable
- Humble
- Industrious
- Modest

- Patient
- Prudent
- Quiet spirited, not mouthy or copping an attitude
- Realistic about her own value
- Reasonable
- Reverent towards authority, i.e. respect for her Head (i.e. father and husband).
- Sober
- Serious-minded
- Teachable
- Thankful in her heart
- Willing to have as much sex with her husband as he wants to have.

Any woman wanting a husband needs most or all of these attributes, and be willing to work very hard on developing those she doesn't have.

The Overlap

There are three things that appear in both The Wants and The Needs categories: Respect, Sex, and Submission. Thus, these three things are crucially important. For a woman to successfully navigate these three critical Wants and Needs, she needs to be…

1. Aware of the fact that the most valuable gifts she could ever give to a husband are her chastity, her complete trust, her sexual purity, and children. In simple terms, she must be a young virgin at the time of her wedding.
2. Aware that her sexuality must be protected and a good sex life must be nurtured, and ONLY with the man she chooses to marry. (Women who don't do this, which is most women these days, will be eternally disappointed in marriage, because they'll never, ever be able to "want to have sex" with their husbands, simply because the quality of man they can land in marriage won't be able to inspire the intense feelings they experienced while fornicating with Ch@dwicks in the past.)
3. Aware that the ADIEU HUSsie Script, the Career Life Script, the Feminist Life Script, et al. and Progressive Feminism in general are Worldly LIES designed to entice women to sacrifice their own souls on the altars of self-centeredness and sexual promiscuity, and thereby destroy that which is most important to men, marriage, family formation, and God.

4. Aware that the entire Western culture conditions women to NOT respect and NOT trust men as a fundamental principle. She must actively guard her heart and mind against these influences.
5. Cognizant that her ability to attract men for sex almost never translates into attracting men for commitment.
6. Cognizant of the fact that she will probably not marry a very sexually attractive man.

The Deficiency

The problem here is that women are no longer taught and trained to be good wives and mothers. Worse, women do NOT in general have any respect for men en masse, and women are actively taught to openly disrespect men as a group. Even worse yet, women are subtly or not so subtly encouraged to leave and/or rebel against the Headship Authority of their fathers (assuming there is one in the first place), and play the harlot for 10 years on the average before even thinking seriously about marriage. Thus women are ruined for marriage long before marriage. Worst of all, fulfilling their God ordained purpose as wives, mothers, companions, and helpers never even enters their minds, even after marriage.

In terms of Men's Wants and Needs,

1. "Submit to him" — Not taught nowadays when girls are growing up.
2. "Respect him" — Not taught this.
3. "Look good for him" — Only in "getting him," after that, many let themselves go.
4. "Make his house a place he actually wants to come home to" — Not taught this.
5. "Be a good mother to his children" — TBD, some are, some aren't.
6. "Feed him food he enjoys" — Many wives can't cook. Hubby has to make the meals or they eat out, take out, or eat very simple meals, e.g. store bought frozen pizzas, hot dogs, hamburgers / fries, instant noodles, etc.
7. "Have lots of sex with him" — To get him, after that, the bedroom fun tapers off.

Those few women who do manage to somehow learn of the vast power they hold in being naturally able to easily fulfill men's Wants and Needs (i.e. offering respect, sex, and submission) will often coopt it for selfish purposes that have nothing to do with family formation (e.g. getting attention, Gold Digging, OASIS, OnlyF@ns, pr0st!tut!0n, Sugaring, or worse).

But fortunately for our society, most modern women are completely ignorant of their powers of agency and will twist themselves into pretzels justifying why they shouldn't have to do these very simple things.

The Worldly Zeitgeist

We are now starting on our fourth generation of women who have been specifically taught that fornication* is the broad road to self-actualization; that they are men's "equals" in every significant way; that there are no real functional differences between men and women; and that men in general cannot be trusted. To today's crop of women, men are, at best, befuddled, confused, sex obsessed horndogs who can't lead themselves, much less anyone else. At worst, men are evil, idiotic, m!s0gyn!st, subhuman, sex crazed, potential r@p!sts who have to be curtailed, controlled, brought to heel, and kept at arm's length.

Women are taught all that, and then say,

"What?!? You want me to submit to that? You want me to pick one of them and then spend the rest of my life doing what he says? Are you out of your mind?"

"And you want me to do that for Billy Beta? You expect me to do that for Ernie Engineer, Tom Teacher, Paul Plumber, Carl Claimsadjuster, Fred Farmer, Alan Assemblyline? You have GOT to be kidding!"

"Yeah, let me explain something to you. I have the p_ssy, so I make the rules! If he wants anything from me, he's doing it MY WAY! Plus, scripture says he's required to love me as Christ loved the church and gave Himself up for her. So that means he has to love me no matter how crappy I am and he has to go out there and give himself up for me."

"So you can take that "submit" and "obey" sh!t and shove it where the sun don't shine, brother. That AIN'T happening, not today, not ever!"

That's women's attitudes toward men and marriage. That's why men are tuning out and turning off. Men just can't get what they Want or Need out of women and/or marriage anymore, and there's too much hassle and too many significant risks to even bother.

Meanwhile, Men's Wants and Needs continue to be unaddressed and unfulfilled. That's why we are where we are.

 The idea of fornication is seldom mentioned, as this would cast light on it being sin. Instead, women are pushed into settings and situations in which fornication "just happens", e.g. "finding yourself", FOMO/YOLO, "getting experience", going away to college, living independently, pursuing a career, traveling, etc.*

International Dating: Are Chinese women really left over? (2021/7/22) Length: 13:22 minutes

The Chinese woman being interviewed is extremely suave in her explanation of marriage, divorce, and concubinage in China and Taiwan. She's speaking on behalf of a dating agency, so she paints these "left over" women in the best light possible, describing them as educated, sophisticated, and wealthy. But actually,

- Her concept of urbane women is better described as materialistic.
- Some women are "left over" because no (Asian) man wants them.
- Some women are "left over" because they're "retired" from concubinage (described below).
- Not all "left over" women are wealthy.

She makes Chinese men out to be "cheaters" and "deadbeats", which is a gross mischaracterization. From the hypergamous Asian female's perspective, men are categorized into the "have's" and the "have not's". In this view, the former are "cheaters" and the latter are "deadbeats". When she says, "nice guys don't exist in China", she means the "have's" (the men who pass their hypergamous filters) are not compliant with the Asian version of the Feminine Imperative. (This is somewhat comparable to how Western women are attracted to cheaters / players / etc. and so they think all men are that way, but they're only referring to apex alphas. Other men are invisible.)

She claims the men "cheated" in order to justify the women leaving the arrangement, but the picture she paints is not accurate. First, the word "cheating" plays on the Western penchant for monogamy. Second, in informal concubinage, polygyny is generally assumed. Third, most concubines willingly sign up for the easy bread and butter. (A small number are arranged or set up by friends or parents.) Fourth, they knew the lifestyle and the eventual outcome when they signed up for the deal. But her account of the situation implies that concubines up and leave because their harem baron was a "cheater" or otherwise morally corrupt. In reality, most concubines stay with their tycoons until they're too old to "entertain", and their "employment" is then terminated. If given the choice, many of them would prefer NOT to depart from Mr. Moneybags.

In sum, she is loquaciously stacking several cards that are popular in the West…

- The false primacy of monogamy.
- "Men and women are equal."
- "Men are cheaters."
- "The woman is the victim."

…thereby reframing the whole situation in order to conceal the true context and present past-prime concubines as women worthy of monogamous marriage. Very svelte!

She also fails to express the male perspective and either the enticing or the uglier aspects of Concubinage. In the remainder of this post, I'll fill in the blanks.

The Feminine Hierarchy

First, I need to explain the social structure in East Asian culture (i.e. China, Taiwan, Japan, and maybe others).

In the East, there is considerable pressure for women to marry. A woman who is not under the Patriarchal domain of a husband or her father is considered shameful and she becomes the subject of gossip and rumors. (This expectation has eased somewhat in recent years because of growing Western influence.)

Moreover, in East Asia, there is an informal and unspoken, yet rigorously observed hierarchy among women, primarily based on their personal attributes (given in parentheses).

1. Wife (beautiful, good mannered, intelligent, and responsible)
2. Concubine (beautiful, good mannered)
3. Single, educated and well employed (intelligent and responsible)
4. Single, working class (N/A)

Being a wife offers the highest status. If a woman cannot be a wife, then the next best choice is to be a concubine. (Hypergamy applies here as elsewhere.) If she lacks the traits and skills necessary to be a wife or concubine, and/or she's unwilling to "settle" for what she can get, then it is important for her to get an education and secure a good job in order to support herself. (This is part of the reason why 57% of Taiwanese women have a bachelors or higher.) Women who cannot do any of the above are at the bottom of the barrel and usually remain single throughout their lives. These are the true "left over women". They'll live with their parents for decades, or perhaps get a small apartment if it is amenable to their families' finances and living situation.

Then, there's always the alternative of marrying a foreigner. In fact, 25% of women in Taiwan marry out.

Concubinage

Concubinage is a social construct which allows and supports wealthy men having soft harems and cohabitation. The difference between Eastern concubinage and Western soft harems / sugar babies is that concubines will stick with one man, have his children, and depend on him financially for the duration of her fertility or longer. Compare this to Western women who are "strong", financially independent, educated, employed, do the serial monogamy thing and rely on abortion / birth control until they're "ready to settle (down)".

A significant percentage of Chinese / Taiwanese women spend their later teens and twenties in some form of concubinage (to be described in more detail below). In Taiwan, I'll guess it's somewhere between 10-15% for each of the 2 demographics of women described in the following 2 sections, resulting in about 20-30% of women in total. (Not sure about the frequency in China.) Thus, they have a significant but hidden presence in society.

I've known women in Taiwan who were a concubine from as early as 15 up to 30. According to the information I've been privy to, concubines have monogamous sex between 3 to 5 times a week, on average. If a pregnancy results, then they may be expected to have and raise the child. If children are not wanted, they will have an abortion.

Informal Concubinage

Concubines are informally "owned" by one man, and because no man of status wants a second-hand concubine, these women will do whatever it takes to submit to and get along with their male benefactor.

However, not all concubines cohabitate. Depending on the financial status of the man, many of them are given their own house, although small, in order to reduce tensions between her and the wife and/or other concubines. In this case, the man comes around whenever he wants some “entertainment and relaxation”, which may be frequently if his wife is contentious, or jealous, or it’s that time of the month.

Like clockwork, as soon as they hit 30 the man will “retire” them and/or dismiss them from service. If she is especially beautiful and retains her beauty past 30, and she is remarkably good natured, intelligent, and responsible, such that she gets along well with her MacDaddy and contributes something valuable to the household, then she may stick around until 40 or so.

Formal Concubinage

Another significant percentage of Taiwanese women get married, climb the ladder of success with their husband, and then have an amiable divorce later in life. This is done in full mutual agreement, sometimes planned in advance, as it allows the man to take a younger wife, and it allows the “ex-wife” to pursue her own interests without having to give an account of herself to the “ex-husband”. The downside to this scheme is the social stigma of divorce.

Successes

The benefits of concubinage are that she gets a top grade man, regular attention, a leisurely and pampered lifestyle, spending cash, all expenses paid, and possibly a house and children. All said, her hypergamy is satiated.

If she produced children, especially a son, it is customary for him to set her up in a house of her own to raise the children and give her a modest allowance or other source of income to cover the expenses, usually for life.

Even if she had no children, but she aroused a particularly intense affection from the man, or if the man is uncommonly generous, then she may receive a very comfortable “retirement pension”, often times for the rest of her life.

I know of one extremely wealthy tycoon who had a wife and three concubines. He owned a huge 4-story apartment building in which each woman, her maid, and her children had one floor all to themselves. After work, he would stay over with the one who happened to be in the best mood that day, which often coincided with certain times of the month.

Failures

I have known a couple ex-concubines who faced an unhappy ending.

One was particularly clueless and overly trusting. She got caught up in the fairytale lifestyle the man provided and never gave a thought about the future. Thus, neither she nor her family ventured to secure any bond from the man. Being so vapid, she didn’t contribute much to the man’s life either. Fortunately for her, she was dismissed when she was only 25 (after 10 years of service) and was still stunning enough to draw less-qualified suitors.

The other was beautiful, intelligent, responsible, and well-mannered — almost enough to be a wife, except she was self-conscious and could never get aroused during sex. So when she hit 30, the man kicked her out on the street without any severance, and she had to return to her parents’ home in utter shame. Fortunately for her, she had an engineering degree and was able to secure a job in the public sector.

Every concubine’s story is a little different, but in general, if the woman did not produce any children and she brought absolutely no benefit to the household other than a flesh decoration, or if she spent an excruciating amount of money, or was belligerent, disrespectful, or unfaithful, or caused a lot of trouble and/or embarassment to the man, then the men are less likely to grant them a “pension”.

Retirement

Many “retired” concubines have very leisurely lives. Children or not, it is typical for the man to set her up financially so that she is not living on the streets for the rest of her life.

Those playboys who are less wealthy and can’t afford to award their arm candy a lifelong “pension” will $support her earning a college degree on the side so that she’ll have a job to fall back on after she reaches the next phase of her life.

Moreover, most ex-concubines are rather comfortable and happy about their lot in life. Their primary grievance is about their suffering from a lack of attention and the sheer loneliness they experience after their early “retirement”, especially those who didn’t have children. Hence the complaints from “unwanted / left over women”, as highlighted in the video above.

After these women age out of their genteel h0e phase, they want to settle down with a man who will “take care” of them. In this case, the “care” that is implied is social, not financial, as described in the video. IOW, she wants a regular companion because she doesn’t want to be a social pariah / recluse, alone and/or lonely for the rest of her life, similar to the archetypical Western spinster with cats and wine.

Here is where the above video interview picks up and the chivalrous western nice guy comes into the picture. He thinks he’s got a prize, because compared to the fat, arrogant, multiple N, contentious, foul tempered, western women coming off the carousel looking for a sucker they can divorce r@pe 5 years after they pop out their 2 kids, their Asian counterparts are thin, feminine and well-schooled and well-practiced in feminine graces as a result of spending 10-15 years “working” as a concubine in a rich man’s house. They’re also rather well off financially having some form of a retirement pension from their service as a concubine. They are wise to keep all this information tucked neatly into the past.

A small number of these women truly find love with their “second” foreign husband, although it is an “equal partnership” (at best) and authentic Headship is nearly non-existent except as a formality. Nevertheless, these unions tend to be better than average because the woman is emotionally mature, financially secure, and socially sophisticated. Thus, she knows very well how to get along with a man, and that her respect and submission is required to make the best of her family life and social standing. As such, a chivalrous Blue Pilled man may be seen as naive but quite tolerable, maybe even preferable if he’s easy to control with smooth words, honeycraft, and p00ntang.

Concluding Statements

In Asia, asking a suspected concubine about her status is rude and taboo. If her sugar daddy should ever be identified, she will deflect the topic, or if they are on extremely good terms, she might refer to him as her “friend” or sometimes “boyfriend”.

So how would you know?

If you’re in East Asia, and you see a beautiful, emotionally mature, socially smooth young woman who is well dressed and well cared for, and she isn’t married, never been married, and she isn’t looking for a husband or lover, there’s a very good chance that she’s a concubine. If said woman appears to be living on her own and/or has children but with no man to speak of, she’s definitely a concubine. With rare exception, Asian women will NOT have a child out of wedlock unless she’s receiving a man’s $upport.

“Retired” concubines resemble and talk like the women in the video above — very well put together and elegantly spoken, but with a touch of fakery and a bit of a hard edge.

Eschatological Polygyny

Jack · 20 May 2023 · Archived copy · Original

Isaiah predicted some type of polygyny in the end days. What is this all about?

Readership: All
Theme: Wives and Mothers
Author's Note: This question was posed by a reader through email.
Length: 600 words
Reading Time: 3 minutes

> And in that day seven women shall take hold of one man, saying, We will eat our own bread, and wear our own apparel: only let us be called by thy name, to take away our reproach…
> Isaiah 4:1 (KJV)

Concubinage and/or polygyny in some form or fashion has been quite common since ancient times up to the present day and across cultures. The Bible contains many examples, including the Kings and Patriarchs of the Old Testament.

What is common in all the examples throughout time is that the MAN always takes on the role of a PROVIDER.

In Asian concubinage, the woman wants the man for comfort, pleasure, PROVISION, and security. In Western soft harems, the woman wants the man for attention, affirmation, PROVISION, and sex. In any culture, if a woman is looking for marriage then she is definitely seeking PROVISION.

But NO WHERE do we see women wanting a man for nothing other than his NAME, as the Biblical prophecy foretells.

According to the Biblical prophecy cited above, one day we will reach a stage where women will provide for themselves and will want nothing from a man except his NAME.

In Biblical typology, a name represents more than just a moniker. It represents power, authority, domain, enforcement of will, formality, glory, identification, ownership, and reputation, among other things. So this passage might be interpreted in several ways…

- Women will want an identity.
- Women will want a formal marriage.
- Women will desire a Headship covering.
- Women will want to be an agent of the power and authority that men have.
- Women will want a sense of acceptance / inclusion / security, or to actually belong to a larger group.
- Women will want the hedge of protection that comes from being identified as one under a man's domain of authority.

In addition to these possibilities, the scripture explicitly states that the reason is "to take away our reproach".

This begs the following questions…

1. What would be the nature of this reproach?
2. How can a man's NAME take away reproach?
3. If a woman does not want a man's PROVISION, then why would she want his NAME?
4. What kind of social situation are we looking at here?
5. How will the current structure of polygyny be reversed such that a man's PROVISION is no longer required of him by women?
6. What will precipitate this change?
7. What needs to happen for this to become a reality?
8. What kinds of events would need to take place for this to occur?

Lest we jump to an apocalyptic conclusion, the above verse is followed by,

> In that day the Branch of the Lord shall be beautiful and glorious;

> And the fruit of the earth shall be excellent and appealing
> For those of Israel who have escaped.
> Isaiah 4:2 (NKJV)

Reproach?

"Reproach" could be interpreted as blame, disgrace, or shame. This pretty well sums up the P0rnocracy, as J. M. Smith described in a recent post at The Orthosphere. Thus, women may want to identify themselves as being different or separate from the cultural P0rnocracy zeitgeist.

In a comment, J. M. Smith writes,

> "…in the jargon of therapy [shame] usually means the belief that one is unlovable. […] One interesting thing about shame so defined is that it would almost certainly spread through a population as that population dechristianized."

Could it be that the women of the future might earnestly desire LOVE more than PROVISION?

Progressive is Regressive

One year ago, Bill Maher put together this hilarious spoof.

Lest we forget.

New Rule: Along for the Pride | Real Time with Bill Maher (HBO) (2022/5/21) Length: 9:21

When Maher came out with this, it made a big splash because it struck against the overweening QTBGL narrative — a narrative which no one had the balls to address at that time. People were more or less accepting of it, as long as it didn't affect them personally.

This is one thing that has changed in the year since then, especially since The Bud Light Revolt — more people are realizing that, contrary to what is purported by the mainstream media, the narrative is not reality, nor do the majority of people accept it. People are beginning to realize that the QTBGL agenda is going to march onwards to its ultimate culmination unless they speak up and stand up. So now, more people are more active in challenging it.

Misplaced Motherhood

Jack · 22 May 2023 · Archived copy · Original

A couple interesting theories to consider.

Readership: All
Theme: Wives and Mothers
Length: 1,000 words
Reading Time: 5 minutes

Introduction

Western liberated adult wimmin feel that they're made holier and sanctified unto the W0ke Feminist cultural zeitgeist when they escape the natural consequences of sex outside of marriage (i.e. pregnancy). Abortion and birth control are sacred because these twin idols allow them to sacrifice their apex fertility to Molech, and continue making their sacramental rounds on the carousel, respectively. The highly sought after blessings of faithful devotion and obedience include the regular bliss of perpetual Tingles with every new Ch@d, the deliverance from the responsibilities of motherhood, the deterrence of the most natural opportunity to mature, and that they may avert their GNON ordained purpose of being progenitors of future generations. All these reasons are why abortion and birth control are central pillars in the feminist religion. Being on the pill, for a feminist, is like worshipping at the altar of the Strong and Independent self, similar to going to church or reading the Bible would be for a Christian.

We already know the pill is largely responsible for the culture-wide postponement of marriage. But could it also be possible that the pill is (part of) the following effects as well?

1. The reason why women are drawn to bad boys?
2. The reason why women are slow to mature.
3. The reason why feminist moms ruin everything for their daughters (and sons too), usually with envy, fear, frustration, rage, and self-loathing, but sometimes by subjecting them to being abused by their paramours.

Let's consider…

Mis-Mothers and Bad Boys

During Dalrock's heyday, the conventional wisdom was that women are attracted to bad boys because they lacked "self-esteem". Of course, this tripe was roundly mocked as a diversionary excuse by anyone with an ounce of discernment. More recent developments in the Christian Men's Sphere have made it clear that women are attracted to bad boys because that is their sinful / feral nature, and they lack the moral agency necessary to choose otherwise.

Red Pill Rabbi notes another compounding reason why women are drawn to bad boys.

> "An interesting side effect of this whole business is that young women, without any children to nurture, are attracted to "bad boys". Young children, especially boys, are naturally selfish, unpredictable, unreliable, and fun. God gave to women a special ability to tolerate these aspects of male personality and be nurturing and forgiving. God put an innate desire into women to want to work with these traits to mold rowdy children into functioning adults. Women love a project, they want to feel needed, and who could need them more than children?
> But without any actual children, a young woman can only use this special skillset to nurture adult "bad boys" who have similar traits. So she feels attracted to the "bad boy" types, both sexually and on a deeper level. This is because she wants to express her mothering instinct. That is why she is so forgiving and nurturing especially to a "bad boy" who other men would say is no good for her.
> This is my theory; I would be curious if there is any relevant data out there. Perhaps women without their own children who teach in an all boy preschool are less inclined to be attracted to a bad boy type as a mate. They get enough outlet for that type of interaction at work."
> Red Pill Rabbi: Tazria and Metzora: circumcision and pregnancy, Lamech's two wives, women and bad boys (2020/4/24)

In summary, we know that women are naturally attracted to Alpha / Bad Boy types. But Red Pill Rabbi postulates that certain Bad Boy traits provide a venue in which childless women can bring their misplaced mothering instinct into the mix in lieu of having actual children.

At first, we might think this is an odd theory, but the more you think about it, the more it makes sense. You'll never see a Stacy coddling a Beta Orbiter — no, it's always a Tingle-inducing Alpha. Also, it stands to reason that this dynamic might be reversed if she should ever have an actual child, which might explain some of the shifts we see IRL.

In sum, women are superposing their feral attraction with their mothering instincts and directing it onto the testosterone-laden object(s) of their lusts. Sounds like a recipe for a pathology.

In summary, the theory goes…

No Children → Maternal Hybristophilia

Mis-Mothers and Nice Guys

Commenter Johnson J adds this twist.

> "It could be that women used to be attracted to stoicism, bearing burdens, anti-fragility, etc. but hormonal birth control is mind control and now they are stunted in growth and perpetual children due to the hormones that make them grow up and their brains develop being blocked by the pill, so now they want little boys, both in maturity level (the bad boys) and in actual age (all the female teachers getting it on with students).
> I see something like this in my cats, if you will pardon the animal analogy. There is a female cat that came up as a feral and was very mature, but after being spayed she has reverted to kitten behavior, rolling around, playing (she would never play before, her play before was killing squirrels but now she plays like a kitten). What happened? Loss of hormones. Those sexual hormones produce maturity. When they are gone, reversion to childhood. This is what the pill is doing to women."

While we might laugh at Johnson's observations of his cat, remember, the gist of what he is saying is true. The link between hormonal birth control and chemical alterations of the brain and mood have been firmly established.

1. One More Soul: Problems associated with Hormonal Birth Control (2009/12/6)
2. Christianity and Masculinity: Oral contraception alters your brain (2015/4/14)

3. Σ Frame: How the Pill Changes the Brain and Emotions (2019/10/28)

According to this logic, women on the pill would be more attracted to Nice Guys, and the research shows that they are. However, a major problem arises when women come OFF the pill. They experience a more natural hormone cycle and suddenly go nutz with cockamania.

This is a recipe for disaster. Women who marry or shack up with Nice Guys while on the pill eventually stop taking the pill when they want to conceive. Then they are magically no longer attracted to the Nice Guy they are with, and are ravenously hungry for some Alpha seed. Perhaps moreso since the clock is ticking and they're closer to their peak sex drive (30s).

Of course, this doesn't end well. They've wasted their peak years with Nice Guy, and they can't lock down Harley on the rebound. They take their disappointment and rage into whatever relationship they end up in, and it trickles down to the children.

So here, the theory is…

The Pill + Promiscuity → Children + Rage

Conclusions

These two theories seem to be somewhat at odds with each other. Or maybe they simply concern two different subsets of women, or two different life phases, though I'm sure there is some overlap.

This might all be explained if women on the pill choose bad boys for fun, but merely as an exercise in Maternal Hybristophilia, social dominance, and/or status. Later on, after The Wall descends, they settle into LTRs with Nice Guys. This would correspond with the AF/BB strategy. Then when they want to have a child and come off the pill, they experience the raw carnal desire for maximizing their hypergamy and it is no longer playful fun and games as it all seemed to be while they were hormonally tranquilized on the pill. Plus, they're stuck having a kid with Beta Man, and at the same time, they discover that in doing so they've violated their own Existential Fear. Hence the frustration and rage.

Readers are invited to suggest other possibilities.

I have another theory that the pill is responsible for the increase in learning and spectrum related disorders, but that is a topic for another post.

Case Study 1 – RedPillBoomer's Wife and Her Mother

RedPillBoomer says:

My wife was a fairly agreeable woman when I married her 32 years ago. However, there was one red flag that I didn't even recognize at the time, her relationship with her mother. She had 'mommy issues' because her mother was a mess in a number of ways. Fortunately, she didn't have any daddy issues. Her relationship with her father was very solid (parents were still married, no divorce). HOWEVER, even though it was just one red flag that was missed by clueless, Blue Pill me, it made the first ten years of our marriage difficult as she worked through her mommy issues. We came close to divorce over it. Thankfully, the mommy issues were correctable, and in the course of time, another decade or so, she got them worked out to the point where now, they are a non-issue.

So, I dodged a bullet, but not without significant personal cost to me during those first ten years. We have a really good marriage now, and that is a testament in part to her agreeableness. From that spirit of agreeableness, she worked very hard on overcoming her mommy issues, and eventually did. She was willing to accept her 'problem' and do the work to correct it; but it took a lot of work on her part. Kudos to her for doing the work. Kudos to me I guess for being patient.

Knowing what I know now, would I marry her over again? Yes, BUT, the Red Pill version of me would have to do a lot of what Thedeti talked about in this post. If I had back then, assuming I'd been aware, AKA Red Pilled enough, AND had some coaching from the men on this blog; I'd have probably avoided much, if not most, of the headaches I went through during the first ten years of my marriage.

Gentlemen, as you all know, there are NO unicorns out there. There are some women who are marriage material, but they must be vetted thoroughly for 'agreeableness' or else a man, particularly in these times, is headed for potentially his own mini version of the proverbial 'hell on earth.' It's a sad reality, but a reality nonetheless.

Case Study 2 – Eutrapelia's Wife and Her Mother

Eutrapelia2001 says:

How did you resolve the mother issues? I have a similar issue right now.

For the past 11 years, even longer if you count the last part of dating where I started to see these issues, my wife has been embroiled in a two-front war with the fronts never occurring at the same time. She has a certifiable NPD mother with all the typical consequences of that situation, i.e. golden children, scapegoats, and the infamous flying monkeys. My wife has often been the scapegoat except when my wife is feeding her mother drama about our marriage.

This dynamic starts off with a fight with her mom or one of her sisters. The family turns against her and she turns to me for guidance and comfort. I help her deal with the situation in a healthy fashion, working to establish healthy boundaries without cutting ties, but being willing to do so, if necessary. This setting of boundaries then becomes a source of family drama. However, after a time, my wife's mother will stop the scapegoating and slowly bring my wife back into her circle of influence. The price of admission, so to speak, is providing the mother with narcissistic supply by recounting examples of me putting my foot down on something (like where our daughter is to go for First Communion classes) and how dictatorial I am, etc.

This dynamic goes back and forth where my wife comes to me for comfort with family drama and then throws me under the bus with family and friends without a second thought, looking for comfort for her own ego and need to control. Then it is the “boundaries” that I attempted to have her set for her family are set against me under the advice of her mother. What makes this effective against my wife is that her mother never gave her approval or much love growing up. She is always seeking after it, even in adulthood. It doesn’t matter if she has to create fissures and destroy the reputation of her husband in a way that only a woman can. I would also add that the mother-in-law is only too happy to split her daughter away from me in subtle and explicit ways because the MIL has come to realize that I have her number and won’t allow her to manipulate me.

It took me a while to wake up to this dynamic for a couple of reasons. First, no men in my past would talk about these kinds of dynamics or didn’t understand them themselves. Second, I had never come across this level of skilled and deliberate manipulation. In a twisted fashion, I am awed by their prowess and have learned in many ways. Not being a naturally manipulative person, it has been a difficult path to understand this mentality and then learn to navigate it.

Any advice would be greatly appreciated.

Jack's Advice to Eutrapelia

Jack says:

In Eutrapelia's situation, he is dealing with a family (or "generational") curse — that is, it's a destructive dynamic that has a life of its own, it spreads from family member to family member, and gets repeated from generation to generation. Certain expressions of love are withheld (by scapegoating in this case), causing other family members to suffer, and then a reprieve of the suffering is used as a ransom or method of control. IOW, it plays off of emotional needs (through a carefully controlled balance of drama and scapegoating) and ego affirmation (through conditional acceptance). It seems like Eutrapelia has come to understand this destructive dynamic and how it works. It helps that he recognizes that for what it is. The identification of the problem is the first step to correcting it.

Eutrapelia's situation is different from the one Thedeti is addressing in his post. Deti is talking about a rebellious wife — a wife who knows what she should do but refuses to do it, or a very immature wife who is predominantly swayed by her feelings and/or feminist dogma, and who has no concept of personal responsibility.

Since the problem itself is different, the way Eutrapelia should handle this problem is also different from what deti suggests. A rebellious wife tears down the marital relationship, but a family curse tears down the individual, and yes, this can also tear down the marriage, the whole family and children too, if left unchecked. It often does just that.

I suggest that Eutrapelia should try to make his wife understand this dynamic from an objective viewpoint. Explain to her what he sees happening, just like he described above. It will help if he does it at a time when she is in a better mood. When she begins to recognize the pattern, then she'll be able to view the situation more objectively, and see how unhealthy and damaging it is. He might have to talk to her about it many times, and it might take a while to see results.

Case Study 3 – Jack's Wife and Her Mother

As an example, I'll describe a situation that my wife had with her mother. It's probably not as severe or destructive as the situation with Eutrapelia's MIL is, but it should give you an idea of how to deal with it.

My wife and her mother always had this emotional enmeshment. (Not sure if that's the correct psychological term, but it is a good descriptor.) My MIL had this long running habit of controlling my wife's behaviors and general opinions of things by playing the blame-shame-game. My wife kept coming back for more because she wanted the attention. IOW, it made her feel loved. They've been like this ever since my wife was a child.

I discovered this problem like this. After we married, my wife talked to her mother on the phone every day, sometimes for more than an hour. At first, I didn't think this in itself was a problem, but every time she talked with her mother, she was angry and distraught for several hours afterwards. It took me a while to figure out that her mother was the cause of her distemper because I assumed my wife was upset about something they discussed, but after a while, I saw that practically every time she talked with her mother, she was gritchy for the rest of the day. Once I identified her mother as the cause of her negativity, and not the content of their talk, I pointed this out to her. "Every time you talk to your mother, you're in a bad mood for the rest of the day!" Of course, this made her angry and she said I was hating on her mother and so on. But I continued to point this out every time it happened. After a few months, she started to believe me.

Eventually, a day came when I pointed this out to her and she asked me what she should do about this. (I waited until this time because it was important to her for me to let her see this dynamic for herself and desire a change, rather than for me to try to force a change of her behavior. IOW, I had to be patient and let her grow at her own pace.) So I told her, "Limit your phone calls with your mother to 10 minutes, once a week. If she calls more frequently, then don't answer, or else, answer and tell her you're too busy to talk right now and hang up." She didn't want to do this at first, but as the emotional turmoil continued to drag her down (amplified by my bringing her attention to it), she became more willing to follow my advice, and she made some effort to spend less time on the phone with her mother. As a result, she spent more time talking with me, and she was in a better mood too. When I pointed out this change to her, she became more convinced that I was right about her and her mother. Not long after this, she really stuck to the "rule" of "10 minutes, once a week". Within a couple months, she was practically a different person! Eventually, a day came when she realized she was much happier than she was before and she thanked me for this.

Now we're on to the next thing — being thankful for the small blessings in life. I'm handling this in pretty much the same way. I started off by explaining to her how happiness is tied to thankfulness. Then after that, every time she complains or is stubbornly negative, I point out how the situation could be viewed as a "glass half full". She is slowly catching on.

In summary, I urged my wife to draw boundaries for herself, rather than me setting boundaries for her. It took time and patience, but now she's able to do this for herself.

Case Study 4 – RedPillBoomer's Wife's Recovery

RedPillBoomer says:

> "How did you resolve the mother issues? I have a similar issue right now."

I asked my wife about this so I could respond here. Her mother, we believe, has a couple disorders catalogued in the Diagnostic Statistical Manual: Social Anxiety Disorder and Avoidance Personality Disorder (co-morbid with Dependent Personality Disorder, with elements of the Borderline and Paranoia thrown in there for good measure), quite the witches brew. She's a piece of work, and so is her younger sister, both from one of those "vaunted" 1950s / early 60s families that get stereotyped as "wonderful" because of the family stability, i.e. few divorces. Her mother's family, I can tell you, while superficially they resembled Leave it to Beaver or Mayberry RFD, it was anything but that, once you got on the inside of it. A real sh!t show of a family.

My wife's "mommy issues" really put a strain on our relationship and the family as well during the early years of our marriage and family formation. If my wife wasn't a Christian, and as importantly, really DEDICATED to doing her self work on the road to healing, we would never have made it as a couple or a family.

Anyways, the short of my wife's long journey to healing began with her having a nervous breakdown and then seeing a couple of therapists in the first ten years of our marriage for deep inner work. She said the big thing breakthrough-wise for her was the CBT (Cognitive Behavioral Therapy) work she did with her therapists. It began surfacing deep habits she had in relating to the world and others acquired from her mother's pitiful role modeling.

Another big thing, surprisingly, was her enrolling in a Karate class with me and actually making it all the way to black belt. It took her four years to get there, the equivalent of a college degree in terms of time length. Why so significant? She said it was the first time she'd completed anything in her life that required such commitment; and it was all her doing, it had nothing to do with her family of origin (they are a bunch of mediocre life performers). She didn't count getting her high school diploma as that was a fairly easy thing for her since she was a good, dedicated student growing up. However, she did this (graduated from high school) in the midst of moving SEVENTEEN times growing up as her mom yanked them all over the country. Her dad was an oilfield manager, and very good at it, a masculine guy, but of course, Blue Pilled to the core. He let his nutcase of a wife jerk the family all over the country in chase of her dreams, or running from some perceived slight from family members (particularly her mother-in-law) or the people in her communities (the paranoid side of her).

The next thing for my wife was getting her college degree from Rutgers (in Teaching) and then her Master's Degree from Liberty University (in Therapeutic Counseling); AND taking her first job as a teacher teaching in an inner city school in Trenton New Jersey. She learned that a lot of those kids had come from dysfunctional family of origin situations (many much worse than hers, if that's possible) and she had compassion for them; and just as importantly, the KNOW HOW in how to help them, i.e. teach them AND address their socio-emotional issues at the same time. She said she learned a lot about herself through those kids and their family situations.

The last big piece of her healing was taking a course in Reactive Attachment Disorder for her Counseling career development / career broadening. In taking this course she realized it was exactly what she developed growing up; she now had a name for it and a diagnosis / treatment to go with it. She was floored, and tenaciously and persistently dove into the subject to learn everything she could. She said she learned more about herself in that course then everything that went before it put together. An exaggeration I believe, but an exaggeration to show how important it was to finally get a name and diagnosis of what was wrong with her that her mother had caused.

She continues to study to this day, but is now more dedicated to helping others heal, and she's really good at it. I mean like darn good! She feels she still has work to do on herself, but I'd say from where I sit, she's 100% healed. That's the short story version of her journey. I know there was more to it, but those are the things she highlighted when I asked her so I could respond to your question. Hope this helps!

Summary

In general, if a man can get his wife to see how the bad dynamic works, either by explaining it to her, or by educating her in the matter, and then instruct her how she can get control of the situation by drawing boundaries, then he'll be giving her a clear choice to do the right thing. (So many people continue doing the wrong thing because they're not sure what the right thing would be.)

Sometimes the damage is so deep that it cannot be ascertained (like with RPB's wife). In this case, diligent prayer and faith in the Power of Christ are needed to bring those issues to the surface where they can be dealt with properly. (RPB didn't mention this, but the serendipities expressed in his testimony makes me certain it was there.)

Be that objective voice in her life, calling out directions for her to find her way out of the woods. Again, it takes patience.

Single moms can't escape the shame.

Shame on those who forsake the Feminist Life Script to have a child.

Introduction

In The normalization of the trashy single mother. (2012/10/18), Dalrock noted,

> "With the exception of widows, single mothers have traditionally faced strong social stigma. Feminists have made removing this stigma a priority as it is essential in order to free women from the reciprocal obligations which traditionally have come with motherhood. Feminism is far more about removing women's responsibilities than it is about increasing women's rights, so this is a critical area of focus for feminism."

He goes on to say that feminists have been very successful removing the stigma associated with unwed motherhood on the surface.

The rest of Dalrock's post highlights the prevalence of OOW births and fatherlessness, and goes over a few religious conservatives and other media sources who have made efforts in shifting the Overton window towards greater acceptance of single mothers and OOW births.

Dalrock ends with this conclusion [emphasis mine],

> "To some degree this represents an overall loss of class by mothers in general, but it is also clear that single mothers and soon to be single mothers are leading the cultural charge here. As this progresses further it will put more and more strain on "Team Woman" as higher class married mothers become less and less comfortable being associated with low class single mothers."

Kylie Jenner with daughter, Stormi. An upper class single mom setting the fashion trend for lower and middle class single mothers to follow.

Dalrock was right in saying the reframing of single motherhood is only on the surface, and that it actually puts more strain on "Team Woman". But contrary to what Dalrock predicted, and as readers will see upon further reading, the strain is not so much on higher class married mothers associating with single mothers (partly because the former's numbers are decreasing, and partly because many higher class women are also having children out of wedlock), but moreso on single childless women to put aside their differences with single mothers and overcome their innate self-stratifying discriminations based on marriage, motherhood, and status.

Almost 8 years after Dalrock's assessments, we see "Team Woman" has made no progress on this issue. When we look at the reality on the ground, "Team Woman" is dropping the ball. Women are the first to stigmatize and reject pregnant single mommies, and readers who are aware of this can observe this everywhere.

Here's a good example.

Case Study – "I got knocked up by the Boss!"

Reddit/Relationships: My coworkers / friends are treating me coldly after they found out I'm [28/F] pregnant with our boss' [28/M] baby. (2020/9/26)

Over on Reddit, one woman (ThrowRAbossbaby) posted a story about cohabitating with her boss during the COVID lockdown. She says she "ended up hooking up with him", and got pregnant.

> "I work in a team with 5 other people who I've grown close to over the 3 years I've worked here. I consider them more friends than coworkers at this point. We work for a company founded by Caleb, who I've also been friends with since college."

She nonchalantly calls Caleb a "friend", but actually, he is her boss and the father of her child. I wouldn't doubt that he invited her to the interview, and I wouldn't be surprised if they had pegged the pooch at some point in time before she took this job.

> "Caleb and I spent the quarantine together at his place because I have a roommate who made working from home impossible. We ended up hooking up during it and now I'm 17 weeks pregnant. We talked about it and decided to keep the baby and co-parent. We've both only told our families about the pregnancy.

She says her roommate "made working at home impossible." M'kay… A likely excuse.

"We ended up hooking up…" LMAO at the denial, AS IF she NEVER anticipated THAT possibility! This sounds like "It just happened!" — the old quip women use to feign innocence by denying agency.

Face it… She was seduced by an old lover to resume their affections.

> "We started working from the office again two weeks ago. You can't really tell I'm pregnant if I wear baggy clothes so no one at work knew except for Caleb's older sister who also works for the company. On Monday, she was asking me when we were going to decorate the nursery and she was complaining because Caleb told her she couldn't help. One of my coworkers overheard and asked if I was pregnant. I reluctantly told her. She ended up telling the other girls in our team. At first, they all seemed happy for me but slowly they've been acting weird / cold towards me."

So what could have turned "Team Woman" against her?

I can imagine everything was peachy from her perspective. Shacking up with an old flame during the lockdown. Working from home. Frequent coffee breaks and fondling sessions throughout the day. Netflix every night followed by regular hot sex. Breakfast in bed followed by an all-morning romp. Everything seemed to be going swell.

Until… Her busybody coworkers heard the cubicle wind and it all went belly up.

 Surveys report between 15% to 27% of women have had a sexual relationship with their supervisor. That's at least 1 out of every 7 women you work with!*

Office Politics

> "The team has a running joke about one of the girls wanting to sleep with Caleb. She's always denied it and claimed she wasn't interested in him."

So Caleb is obviously a top 10 percenter, judging by his reputation with the ladies. I wouldn't be surprised if he's gone into other chicks at the office too.

> "They usually make the joke whenever he comes to our floor, which he did on Thursday. Someone made the joke and the girl replied with "[my name] beat me to it". She said it in a way that felt like she was taking a jab towards me."

Female competition and the related stage show reinforce the Tingles which are then transformed into bitter envy / jealousy when bodies start slapping. This is amplified further when the object of dripping desire is transfixed in fatherhood. Paternal preselection provides a positive feedback amplifying the drama.

> "I wouldn't have hooked up with him if I knew she liked him…"

Translation: "I wouldn't have moved in with him if I knew she was banging him too…"

> "…and I feel like her denial was mostly because she knew we were friends and everyone else probably knew she really liked him."

No. It's because to the feminine psyche, secretive sex is "empowering", and accountability and responsibility are anathema.

> "I think I've realized that the jokes hold some truth to them, and I feel incredibly guilty and a little dumb now."

Like Jesus said,

> "Out of the abundance of the heart, the mouth speaks."
> Jesus in Matthew 12:34-35

These jokes are a collective catharsis for all the wimminz' guilt arising from lust and shagging on the fly. All the signs are evident.

Imposing Shame

The fantasy land is shattered when the news gets out.

> "I'm pregnant with our bosses' baby and my colleagues / friends have started behaving weird / coldly towards me after finding out."

Apparently, the HUSsy harridans have employed a number of female control tactics (e.g. backbiting, backchannel communications, conniving, conspiracy, Gaslighting, passive aggressiveness, loaded hurtful comments, shifting responsibility, the Blame Game, and yes, the Shame Game) to oust her from the herd as a social pariah.

> "I think it's because one of the girls in my team likes our boss and now I feel incredibly guilty."

Translation: "I realized that I'm not the only lonely coquette who's spreading her soul for the suave supervisor. I'm just the only one stupid enough to get pregnant by him and then let everyone know about it."

Notice here that she didn't feel ashamed or guilty for shacking up with her boss. She didn't feel ashamed or guilty for getting pregnant out of wedlock. No, she never felt ashamed / guilty until everyone at the workplace knew she was prego.

So why does she feel ashamed / guilty about this now?

I suspect she feels guilty because her cover of secrecy is blown, thereby ruining the Sex and the City narrative for everyone at the office. She may also feel guilty for giving up on the Feminist Life Script. As a single mother, she can't join in the vulgar bacchanalia of "Team Woman" any longer. She can't fly the virtue signaling flag of forny feminism with full flair any further. Perhaps she even feels guilty for NOT having the stones to abort her baby.

Furthermore, by cashing in her reproductive chips, she probably made many of the fempowerment hens in the clownhouse feel guilty if they had ever slept with a married man or had an abortion, or regretful for NOT having a child of their own.

In sum, she's ousted herself and all her coworkers from any further frolicking in the Feminist fantasy land. And worst of all… (Gasp!) She is now REJECTED from the harridan herd! No more fun with "Friends".

That's why she feels dumb and guilty.

The henhouse would have looked the other way if her liaisons with the boss were discreet, as that would maintain a much needed shroud of secrecy necessary for the collective fantasy, the jokes, and the private affairs to continue. But now that the truth is out, the joys of sneaking around and joking about it are gone, and their fantasy world is transmogrified into reality. Now everyone has to accept full responsibility for their relationships with Caleb. ThrowRAbossbaby has to settle down with raising a child with Caleb, and the others have to limit or go without his attentions or else risk being outed as a peen-poacher. She has cancelled the creamy charades for all of them.

If she decided to have a baby with Randy Random, perhaps the henhouse herd wouldn't have cared in the slightest, and would've indulged in the typical joys of "Team Woman" offering faux fluffy feeelz disguised as congratulations. But when the news hits that she's pregnant with the boss' baby… Well, now there's a socially significant man of authority who's directly involved. Worse, it's a man the other women must defer to on a daily basis, which puts Ms. ThrowRAbossbaby a square notch above the others in social primacy and status. Worst of all, it destroys the Sexually Liberated / Strong Independent Woman / Feminine Mystique narrative. Suddenly the lies are not so pretty anymore.

So instead of honoring her as a single mother, as would be prescribed by Feminism / "Team Woman", they knock her down as a punishment for ruining their sexual playground (headquartered at the office), and also so they won't have to humble themselves in sincere deference to one who was once their equal, but has risen to be the boss's defacto concubine. The purported issues of the father being her boss, her getting "special treatment", and so on are little more than an angry ego defense, a virtue signaling cover, and/or a good excuse to engage in the turd flinging.

> "Is there anything I can do to rectify this situation?"

Translation: "Calling on "Team Woman"… Give me some sympathy!"

But there's no sympathy from her coworkers, so she runs to Reddit to wipe her tears.

Snowballing Shame

The rejection and shame didn't end with ThrowRAbossbaby's coworkers. It continued in the comments under her Reddit post. Here are a few. The general flavors of the comments are summarized in the subtitles. Most of these statements express passive-aggressive shaming.

 We never see any report of, nor an appeal to, the man's position, nor any account of his circumstances, feelings, or intentions. Evidently he doesn't matter, as if he's just a clueless Tingle generator who's getting played (with) by all these women.*

Converged Moralizing

2percentevil wrote,

> "You shouldn't feel bad because you slept with someone that somebody else lied about actually having a crush on. If they denied it, you have no way of knowing they liked that person. You should feel bad because you moved in with your boss and then slept with him. It's just not appropriate in any way and I'm not shocked everyone is acting weird around you; they're assuming you've been getting special treatment. It's time to switch jobs, don't sh!t where you eat."

Translation: "You deserve the shame for being an idiot, but everybody sleeps around, so don't let it get to you."

Prego wins the ultimate prize, but with penalties assigned.

nblackhand wrote,

> "Yeah, let's be real, there was no making this not weird. They cannot just treat you like a normal colleague and friend, because you aren't. You're the mother of their boss's child, and they have to act accordingly."

Translation: "You've been kicked out of "Team Woman." Tough sh!t!"

mockingbird82 poured on the shame in writing [emphasis mine],

> "That's to be expected. There is now a power imbalance because you will (and have been) getting unequal treatment. I'm not going to chastise you for sleeping with him because you did know him prior to working for him, but it's a bad idea for people to get into relationships at work for a myriad of reasons, especially when one is a supervisor (or the actual boss). You're now in the thick of it."

"That's to be expected." and "…it's a bad idea…" Translation: "You're stupid!"

"I'm not going to chastise you…" Translation: "You should be ashamed, but if I blamed you, I would be an uncool hypocrite."

"You're now in the thick of it." Translation: "You deserve it! Tough sh!t!" (with schadenfreude) rlroyal52 wrote this cynical chastisement,

> "It's kind of a situation where it should be a shock and more should be expected. There will be comments and feelings like, "In this day and age, nobody should get pregnant on accident, and if that can't be handled, then…" […] …in a small workplace, I can't imagine it will get much better when the drama happens, like when he gets a gf or you get a bf and the baby is involved. It's a hard situation to be in."

Translation: "Don't blame "Team Woman. YOU are the dummy! You should have gotten an abortion. Go back to the carousel where you belong. Who gives a sh!t about the baby?"

In summary, it's pretty clear that Caleb is the prize, but it's also clear that having his baby is penalty.

Old Flames Flicker Forever

The author of the OP, ThrowRAbossbaby, finally comes out with a confession.

> "I probably should've included this in the OP but we dated briefly in college (my coworkers know this). Sorry if this is TMI but we didn't have unprotected sex once. We had protected sex multiple times."

Now the truth comes out. They go back a long way, just as I suspected. And they were getting it on. It wasn't an "accident".

marie96336 responded,

> "That's probably why there were undertones of some kind of feelings there."

Normgirl added,

> "Yeah this makes sense why the girl wouldn't admit to liking the boss when OP was around."

Yes. I can't believe that the other women who were joking and then became jealous were totally innocent. I suspect others were also banging the dude on the down low (or had in the past), and were keeping it quiet so that it wouldn't create a commotion in the workplace.

“Team Woman” has Failed

Women are in a dire dilemma when it comes to having a child these days. Getting pregnant out of wedlock has always been shameful, and this is what Feminists have been trying to reverse. However, getting pregnant out of wedlock is still shameful even from the feminist point of view, but for different reasons. Instead of being shamed for playing the harlot, as was done in times past, a single mother is now shamed for exposing the soft harems in the workplace. She is shamed for ruining the feminist fantasy. By having a baby, she reveals that women are not as Strong and Independent as it is imagined women should be, and she is shamed for this. She is shamed for not continuing her career and c0ck carousing until the ripe old age of 29.999. She is shamed for sacrificing 10 months of her finest carousel riding days to having a child with a man. Most of all, she is shamed for shaming her peers by defeating them in the sexual market evolutionary race and locking down a long term commitment / investment from a HVM in the form of a child.

So we see that no matter how much the zeitgeist glorifies single mommyhood, when the rubber meets the rod, Female envy, herd mentality, and status signaling take over and “Team Woman” disintegrates over petty squabbles.

Moreover, single moms can’t escape the shame — especially those that breed jealousy by sexing up and procreating with the studly supervisor, thereby beating all her competitors to the evolutionary finish line.

Wifely Submission has become a Profane Topic and an Illegal Practice

The Western world has created all kinds of exceptions to wifely submission, accompanied by well-developed justifications.

The main reason, the only reason, women submitted before the Sexual Revolution was because they had no choice if they wanted a man's money and resources.

Now? Women can get their own resources (but never enough — men are still better at getting, managing, and marshaling resources than women are). Now, women are on par with men in every significant way, via legal fictions and constructs, and men go along with it because they want püssy. So, given all this, why should women submit?

No one is going to make them do it — making a woman submit is illegal.

Apostate Churches do not teach Submission

The primary reason churchians, Christians, and protestant family "ministries" like Crossway, Family Life Today, Focus on the Family, Steve Arterburn's organizations, and others, have relationships that break down, is that they cannot bear the concept of wifely submission to husbands. They can't deal with it. They can't accept it. They cannot get all the way to actually implementing "Wives, submit to your husbands as unto the Lord" (Ephesians 5:22), and "Wives, submit to your husbands in all things" (Ephesians 5:24). They cannot deal with or accept that concept.

They especially cannot deal with "all things". All things means ALL things. It doesn't mean "some things" or "most things" or "things we agree on" or "things that don't make me feel bad" or "things that don't make me uncomfortable" or "things that I want to submit on." It means all things. It means everything. It means no exceptions, ever.

It says "as unto the Lord." That means "all the time, every time." It doesn't mean "when I feel like it" or "when he's doing what I want him to do" or "when he's obeying God" or "when he's going to church" or "when he's reading his Bible as often as I think he should" or "when I feel good about my marriage." It means ALL the time, every time, without exception.

But is this what is taught within the church?

No. Today's feminist "theology" tells us, yes, wives have to submit to husbands. Yes, they do. But the conditions for submitting are entirely up to the wife. They have to "submit" ONLY if the husband earns it. ONLY if he is doing everything she wants. ONLY if he is "Godly" enough for her. ONLY if he is leading her where she is comfortable going. She must submit, but ONLY if she is comfortable submitting to him and his courses of action. She must submit, but ONLY if he is "Godly" and "doing Godly things". She must submit, but never, ever sexually. Because, see, he's not entitled to sex. He has to "earn" sex. Just ask Dr. R. Albert Mohler of the SBC.

Submission ONLY with all kinds of whimsical conditions attached is not really submission. All of this is pure evil from the pit of hell. It is destroying marriages, destroying men, and destroying women.

Submission is a Choice

The main message the church is giving to married couples and husbands especially is that the husband has to do all the work to make submission simple and easy for the wife, and if he doesn't do that for whatever reason, then the wife is fully within her rights to disobey.

But this is not how it works.

Scripture doesn't say anything about husbands having to do anything to earn that level of obedience and submission. A husband has done all he needs to do to earn that submission when he marries a woman. He is entitled to that submission by virtue of his position: a position she agreed to put him in when she said "yes" to his marriage proposal.

A position she put him in when she stood up in front of his family, her family, and God, and agreed to love, honor and obey him, and then when she laid down with him that night. And if she says, "Well, I didn't agree to THAT", well then, she didn't agree to a Christian marriage,* and if she's not fully married, then he's free to dump her and find someone else — and he's free to take his money with him and she is free to hit the bricks. If she's not married, then she's just playing house, cohabitating, fornicating, and he doesn't owe her anything — especially not sexual fidelity.

Scripture doesn't say anything about submission to a Godly man. She still has to submit to a nonChristian husband. She still has to submit to a husband who has never been a Christian, who is questioning his faith, who is going through a crisis of faith, who stops going to Church, and even husbands who leave the faith. As long as he consents to live with her and discharge husbandly duties, she is still required to submit. Again — she picked him. She chose him. She stood in front of his family, her family, and God, and took vows, and then laid down with him.

She didn't have to do any of those things. She chose to do them. So if she's going to do those things, then she must also submit — even if he's an unbeliever, even if he's a terrible husband, even if he does evil, even if he IS evil (because we all do evil and we all have evil in our hearts).

This is why women shouldn't trust themselves to pick good men: Because when left to their own devices, they pick sexy bad boys who overreach and who do evil and are evil. Nevertheless, if a woman married him, then she has to submit to him. Otherwise, she's not a Christian wife and she can't expect God to bless her marriage in any way, in spite of the problems she brought upon herself.

Scripture also doesn't say anything about submitting to "men" or "a man". It requires submission to husbands. This is another strawman women always use — "I am not going to submit to men! I am not going to obey a man!" No one says you have to, sweetie. You don't have to obey "men". You don't have to submit to "a man". You just have to trust, obey, and submit to the husband you freely chose.

Besides, this statement is a copout, like DeepStrength said:

> "Women have no trouble submitting to their boss at work or their teacher in school or other human authorities because it is normal. But God forbid they submit to the husband to whom they committed their life to, who loves them the most, and the one they vowed to be with before God."

The only man that scripture requires a wife to obey is her husband — again, because she agreed to that when she picked him. If she didn't want to submit to a husband, then she didn't have to get married. If she didn't want to submit to THIS man, she didn't have to pick THIS man, and she didn't have to marry him.

Women Marry for Ulterior Motives

Women have absolutely no intention of fulfilling Titus 2:3-5.

Women don't even want a Christian marriage. They don't. They want a legal marriage. They want a legal claim on a man's resources. And they demand husbands' absolute unswerving fealty and obedience to "husbands, love your wives as Christ loved the church and gave Himself up for her." Oh yes, women love that scripture. Every husband better be ready to be nailed to his own personal cross and hoisted 10 feet high. Every husband better damn well be ready to sacrifice everything for snookums. Because "that's what the scripture says!! You have to love me no matter what! You have to give yourself up for me! That's what God commands!" They want men to be married to women; but women don't want to be married to men. They don't want to do what the Lord commands them to do, and they won't do it. Why should they do it, when they can go even to their own pastors for exceptions and absolution from that requirement?

If the wife decides not to have a Christian marriage, then why should the husband?

Why should a husband give himself up for a wife, when she will not submit to him?

Trust and Obedience

Whenever women are asked to trust and obey their husbands, the worry women always bring up is that her husband will ask her to do something that is unethical or even sinful. Of course, this argument is cherry picked from the defiled depths of female fantasies.

Scott brought this into sharp focus for me.

When wives ask…

"But… but… but… What if he asks me to rob a bank!"

The proper response is…

"Uh huh. Because there's such an epidemic of Christian male bank robbers. Because there's such an epidemic of Christian men demanding that their wives rob banks…"

But even in the worst case scenario, and in spite of the obfuscation designed to avoid doing what is clearly stated in the scriptures, wives are still required to obey their husbands.

"Well, what if he wants me to get an abortion??" Then you do what he demands. You picked him.

"Well, what if he wants to do weird sex stuff?" Then you do what he asks. You picked him.

"What if he's mean to me? What if he lords his position over me? What if he's overreaching?" Then you don't trust him. In that case, don't pick him. Or else, why did you pick him?

Women who come up with these justifications are revealing that they don't honestly believe 1 Peter 3:1:

> "…wives, be subject to your own husbands, so that even if some do not obey the word, they may be won without a word by the conduct of their wives…"

By extension, they're also revealing that they don't believe God will regenerate their husbands (or don't want Him to because they prefer to have a bad boy), and they don't trust God to guide and protect the two of them through the process.

Women must Decide

Women don't have to marry. They don't have to pick a man. They don't need to have sex or raise children. They don't have to do any of this.

But if they do decide to marry, then they have to follow through in obedience to God. They have to trust and obey their husband. And this is a habit that begins long before marriage. One reason women marry bad boys is because women do not trust other men in their families to help them pick good men. Then this results in women picking men they don't trust, and then they cannot trust the men they married.

No matter who you marry, you have to live with the consequences, which is also something women aren't very good at.

If wives ONLY submit when it's easy, or ONLY when they feel like it, or ONLY when their personal preferences are met, then they're not truly submitting. Submission is not commanded of wives because it is easy, but because it is hard. Yes, it is much harder if her husband is not kind, patient, and loving, but most wives don't pick men on the basis of how easy it is to submit to him, because they never intended to really, fully submit to him in the first place. They think submission is optional, and only when it is convenient to their own interests.

Women need to start submitting to their husbands in ALL things. Wives need to submit to the men they picked. If they cannot do that or don't want to, then they better start learning how. If they don't want to do this, then they shouldn't get married and shouldn't complain about the consequences.

Cathodoxy's Sacramental Marriage Construct

Confusion Surrounds what Marriage is all about

Under Red Pill Apostle's post, 16 Bible Passages for Teaching Wives and Daughters about Male-Female Roles and Marriage (2023/5/15), there was a long discussion (starting here) about the value and purpose of marriage in terms of whether it is a Civil / Contractual / Covenantal / Natural / Sacramental Marriage. This opened up a can of worms concerning the definitions and characteristics of each. I still haven't figured that all out, but when I do (God willing), I'll write a post about my conclusions. Since these definitions remain unclear, and to avoid unfruitful tangents in the comments, I will not dive into these distinctions very deeply.

Instead, in this mini-series, I'll look at how marriage as an institution is regarded, structured, and handled by the church and how that is perceived by the individual, whether single, married, Christian, or pagan. I'll focus on the Catholic church as a topic of discussion, but these observations could well extend to the Orthodox or the Protestant churches as well, according to their respective concepts of marriage, etc.

In these writings, it is not my intention to attack the authority, glory, validity, or value of the church, but only to provide an objective frame of reference that would allow readers to think these things through.

The Catholic Church's Purposes for Establishing Sacramental Marriage

As a comprehensive assessment of my readings on this topic, the Catholic Church's purposes for establishing the Sacramental Marriage construct (as found in Catholic sources online) are as follows.

1. To reinforce the authority of the Bible and/or the church concerning marriage as ordained by God.
2. To provide a theoretical framework of marriage that coincides with doctrine.
3. To provide a practical understanding of marriage that is able to conveniently avoid, handle, or sidestep conflicting issues and disagreements, including a way to escape dipping into the progressive / worldly shizz.
4. To provide clarity in sorting out many of the confusing or difficult issues that arise in marriage and especially annulment / divorce.
5. The distinction of a sacramental marriage is made to differentiate it from marriages which are not Biblical, i.e. fruit loop “marriages”.

There could be others I have missed, but anyway…

These are different from God’s purposes for marriage as recognized by the Catholic Church (which Thedeti and Jack outlined in the introduction of this post).

As you can see, the primary purpose of the Sacramental Marriage construct is administrative in nature — to monitor church life and to provide a framework for regulating ecclesiastical activities, such as recognizing marriages, counseling, etc. It is not to redeem people* nor even to improve marriages.* Only God has that power.

 If readers find some Catholic teachings to this effect, please share links / quotes / etc. in the comments as well as the type of church it is.*

Are the Church Policies and Teachings on Sacramental Marriage a Social Polity or a Doctrine of Salvation?

First of all (and I’ll go out on a limb to say this), the Catholic church doesn’t have a monopoly on marriage and salvation. That is to say, there is not a direct one-to-one correlation between baptism, salvation, and a sanctified marriage, etc. Many Catholics are baptized and yet they still have a horrible marriage, while some others have never cast a shadow in church but still find marital bliss.

I have come to the conclusion that only God can grant a successful marriage — not baptism in a church, etc.

That said, I view the church's policies and regulations on marriage to be their best attempt to establish a social order within the church, done in the hope that constituents might achieve sanctity and holiness through faith and by God's grace. This is both a hope and a cope — it is not a fail-proof system, unfortunately. It is a clumsy implementation because of the nature of the beast, and yet it is necessary in order to maintain clarity, structure, and order.

However, in the mind of the layman, since these concepts are the policy of THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, and because human beings commonly make the false assumption that our most natural and basic sense of a thing is the correct one, it takes on a weighty significance that is larger than life. [These false impressions were referred to respectively as "The Idols of the Marketplace" and "The Idols of the Tribe", by Francis Bacon (1561-1626).]

According to this quote, Catholic sacramental marriage is apparently the gospel of collective salvation that will redeem us from all the ills of society.
So when the Catholic church officially implements the Sacramental Marriage construct as an interminable element of its constitution, the weight of the law affecting men's minds and consciences tends to set whatever notions they may have about that in concrete, and thus they are expressed with firm conviction, believing themselves to have the authoritative endorsement of the church — and of God Himself by extension.

Thus, it is somewhat understandable that there are some half-baked ideas floating around that "Only Sacramental marriages are REAL marriages", "Marriage Saves", "Sex is Sanctifying", or some kind of complex "IF and only IF" thing to that effect. Of course, this reasoning is not entirely valid (largely because it is a cognitive approach towards an understanding of the metaphysical — which is wholly inappropriate and unfitting), but it is easy for many people to get the impression that it is more or less equal to the gospel — or in some cases (like what is contained in the image on the right), that it IS a gospel.

I'll go into some of these misconceptions in the next post.

The Catholic Church's Teachings on Sacramental Marriage are a Response to the Brokenness in the Real World

Derek L. Ramsey has written many comments about the Catholic Sacramental Marriage construct. I suspect that Derek is reading too much into his interpretations of this, but for now, I'll go along with his claims for the sake of discussion.

Derek wrote,

> "Salvation under the covenant of Jesus should precede both baptism and marriage, as part of the already established covenant, not sacraments. As Ed Hurst and I noted, Roman Catholicism and Eastern Orthodoxy falsely assert that marriage and baptism are sacramental, that is, part of saving grace, and thus sacramental marriage cannot satisfy the prerequisite above."

At first, I agreed with this stance, but after thinking it over and writing the posts in this mini-series, I do think it has some value as a church policy, but not as a doctrine of salvation. Perhaps that is the primary disconnect in our understanding.

To illustrate what I mean, according to Christian doctrine, marriage is not required by God for salvation. But according to a common understanding of human nature, it is for some. If they can't control themselves sexually and they refuse to marry, then they're rebelliously walking down a path to hell. In this situation, the Catholic stance rather appropriately sends the stern message, "Get with the program, or else you're OUT Forever!" (Whether they will hear it is another matter.)

Perhaps this is what the Catholic stance is getting at — to act as a goad against laziness, self-centeredness, and fallen human nature. Of course, this approach coddles those who are weak in faith at the expense of more mature believers. But perhaps this is right, according to Romans 14.

Is Marriage a Part of Salvation or a Certification of Good Standing in the Church?

Personally, I believe a sanctified sex life can be means of grace, and that sex within marriage is a necessary "sacrament" that maintains the marital covenant. (If you don't believe this, then try denying sex to your spouse for a few months and tell me how that goes and what hell is like for you as an individual.) I believe marriage can be a vector of redemption / regeneration for some individuals, but this is wholly by the grace of God and therefore cannot be expected as a byproduct or result of marriage, nor does this happen to the majority. I also believe that marriage is infinitely better for those who are regenerated and who are also obedient to God. (That last clause is very important.)

In this case, the joys, shared purposes, sufferings, and tribulations of marriage provide a living path towards salvation / sanctification, by God's grace. But we should also be aware that what I have just described is a subjective view of marriage that is ignorant of the unfathomable Power of God that uses those experiences to draw one closer to Himself.

Of course, these kinds of blessings don't happen to everyone who marries, unfortunately. But does this experience of marriage only apply to the elect?

According to the Catholic church, it does. Derek / Ramman3000 quoted the CCC#1213 as saying,

> "Holy Baptism is the basis of the whole Christian life, the gateway to life in the Spirit (vitae spiritualis ianua), and the door which gives access to the other sacraments."

…with marriage being one of those sacraments.

This brings up the question… Does this broadly mean that marriage is only a sacrament to those destined for election (as I described above)? Or does it mean the authority of the church only recognizes marriage as a sacrament to those who are initiated, baptized, bona fide members of the Catholic church (in accordance with the purposes of the Sacramental Marriage construct described in the previous post)?

Negotiate or Dispute?

What is the value of Sacramental Marriage as a Policy / Social Construct?

As Ed Hurst pointed out in There Is No Sacrament (2023/5/15), the daily ins-and-outs of marital life are different from a religious ritual, and neither are sufficient for being "saved". Furthermore, any doctrine or ecclesiastical policy concerning marriage necessarily takes a step away from the real substance of two people in a marital union. The reason is simply because the ecclesiastical rigamorale of church polity is external to the marriage relationship itself.

However, having a Sacramental Marriage policy is beneficial in helping the church sort out the oddballs from those in good standing by having established protocols and regulations to guide and back up their decisions. Those in good standing (whoever they may be) receive favor and grace with the rubber stamp of the church, while the oddballs are dealt with on various terms, depending on the priest's interests and time constraints, and the resources available to the parish. This clerical discretion is the weak point at which non-Biblical marriages, usury, and other catastrophic influences make inroads and gain acceptance in the church, e.g. a wealthy powerful patron could entice the clergy to make unwise investments, and an overly "sympathetic" clergy leads to the progressive convergence of the entire church.

Aside from church polity, however, the marriage issue ultimately comes down to "God's will" for each man's life, and that man's capability and willingness to tap into His Power to live it out. At that point, the task of maintaining a marriage falls on the responsibility of the man and woman to "work OUT their salvation" (Philippians 2:12). (This does not mean "work FOR their salvation".) Keep in mind that in this case, salvation has already been granted / predestined* / "in process" / etc. (depending on your personal beliefs about that), and only nepsis* / redemption / synergeia* / theosis* / etc. remain.

Of course, finding "God's will" is even more confusing and difficult to sort out. It's like one of those things where either you "get it", or you don't.

Ed Hurst addressed this same question of knowing God's will in a recent post. He writes,

> "If you are Elect but fail to live within the boundaries of Biblical Law (for whatever reason), you still get some thin slice of the promises, but they are consistent with God's plans for you. Without that feudal orientation, you will never quite understand God's will and plans. You will carry a lot of false impressions. You won't know what to expect from His promises, and you'll end up disappointed quite often."
> Radix Fidem: Covering Differences (2023/5/27)

The Catholic Church and its construct of Sacramental marriage is an attempt to fill in those blanks for the postmodern masses, in lieu of a feudal / hierarchical orientation proscribed by Biblical Law (which is nonexistent in the West). Of course it's not the same, but it's better than nothing, I suppose.

 These terms are borrowed from the Protestant and Eastern Orthodox traditions, as the Catholic Church has no supporting doctrine or terminology for these concepts.*

The Necessity of Requirements for Sacramental Marriage

Church policies about Sacramental Marriage require members to get on the same page as the other congregants (and presumably the Bible).

Foreword

This Mini-Series on Church Policy and Sacramental Marriage is turning out to be a complex topic, at least, more than I had expected going into it. When I started pulling together some ideas for this mini-series, two of the questions I used to generate ideas for the writing process were,

1. How do the Catholic Church's Teachings on Sacramental Marriage Play out in the Church and Society?
2. How are the Catholic Church's Teachings on Sacramental Marriage viewed by unbelievers and/or believers who are outside Cathodoxy?

I haven't yet arrived at a definitive answer to these questions, but nevertheless, a lot of insightful tangents are spilling out. This post conveys some further musings.

Concerning the first question above, I'm sure some readers would take great delight in jumping at the chance to go off about the various ways the Catholic church has been converged and/or corrupted. So to focus this discussion and avoid hot button issues (for now), I'll continue on some points that have already been raised, especially some quotes from Derek L. Ramsey / Ramman3000. I'm a little confused about which of Derek's statements are his own interpretation of Catholicism, and which ones are his own beliefs. So I'm going to address his statements line by line.

The Red Pill is best expressed through Marriage

> "…for even a man — who follows all the Red Pill advice and achieves a wife who submits and gives him all the sex he could ever want — would still be a failure if he loses his soul."

Well, obviously, if we are looking at this from an eternal perspective. The Red Pill is insufficient to save one's eternal soul (but it sure helps avoid unnecessary suffering). In taking this view, it is assumed that one is already lost. But if we address the social impacts rather than the soteriological, such a man wouldn't be a total failure in society and especially in a church fellowship IF he pursues (or is pressured into accepting) either celibacy or marriage and thereby cuts down on his engagement in the culture of lust and fornication that would cause others to stumble / sin and ultimately erode the civilized aspects of society. OTOH, Red Pill advice would probably increase fornication if sexual continence (i.e. celibacy or marriage) is not already set forth as a goal or a priority.

In this view, a Red Pilled marriage is a small but insufficient step towards righteousness / salvation / sanctification, at least for others, if not for one's self. If diligently pursued, especially by the grand majority of people in a church body, I suppose it could culminate in such, by the Power of God. At the very least, there is hope for civilization.

Is Sacramental Marriage a Soteriological Issue?

In Regulations vs. Reality (2023/5/30), I discussed how Sacramental Marriage has more value as a policy than as a doctrine. But the more I've thought about this, I've realized that there are some real problems in making it into a doctrine.

> "You can't help a man with general relationship advice if you fail in the prerequisite that Christ be his Lord first."

I agree with this. At least, it becomes a lot easier and more efficient with the Power of God and regeneration. But even for non-believers, taking the Red Pill does help, and it's not just simple advice, but is better described as rejecting the lies and renewing the mind (Romans 12:2). So we might think of the Red Pill as a stepping stone to the Truth.

But when we get to this…

> "Salvation under the covenant of Jesus should precede both baptism and marriage, as part of the already established covenant, not sacraments."

…then all the questions come up. Yes, it should. But does that mean people should wait to get married until they "find God"? No, because the statement above describes an ideal situation. Reality is messy. Most people are far from the ideal, even many of the elect, and especially early in life. Perhaps this is why the Catholic church defines baptism as the starting point.

As I stated before, I do believe that marriage is more fulfilling / sanctified for those who are believers / saved. But the quoted text above sounds like the equivalent of saying, "You cannot be truly married unless you are truly saved."

Maybe I'm boiling this down into a straw man, but even so, people will take such a meaning to heart as I described in the first post in this series.

This begs for clarification. Does "marriage" mean God's recognition of a one flesh union, or does it mean a marriage that is officially recognized by the church?

If it means the former, then the truth of this statement is doubtful, because marriage goes back to the Adamic covenant, which means it applies to all humanity.

If it means the latter, then it makes perfect sense for the church to pose certain requirements in order to receive its endorsement.

Moreover, we must beware of logical categorizations that are devoid of faith and/or removed from reality.

Is Sacramental Marriage a Pitch for Cathodoxy?

Thanks to EoS's insights here and here, we know that the purpose for requiring new converts to go through marital "reeducation" and be married again within the church is to make sure those coming in are clear about what a Sacramental Marriage is and what is required of them. We could think of this as a "quality control" device of the church.

But to those coming in, this…

> "…in the Roman Catholic frame one cannot have a sacramental marriage unless one has first experienced the Roman Catholic sacrament of baptism."

…sounds like a pitch for Catholicism, saying in effect, "If you want to be married in OUR church (according to OUR definition of marriage), then you have to do things OUR way", which is not unreasonable, IMO, because the church should be setting forth a protocol in which, if followed, people are more likely to find salvation (and better marriages too) if they haven't already done so.

Like I outlined in the previous section, even though the above statement is valid if it is instituted as a church policy, this sounds like saying, "You cannot be truly married unless you are truly saved." We might as well add, "And you cannot be truly married / saved unless you are truly Red Pilled." Followed by, "And you cannot be truly Red Pilled unless you truly love and seek the Truth." It makes a fine syllogism, and there is some truth there, but it's pretty nebulous, difficult in the application, full of sufferings, and somewhat evasive. That's the reality.

> "If you would be a real seeker after truth, it is necessary that at least once in your life you doubt, as far as possible, all things."
> Rene Descartes (1596-1650)

Thus is the beginning of true humility.

Church shouldn't be an Elite Social Club for the Married

The church's emphasis on marriage does not support the Christian faith or lifestyle for those who are unmarried.

The Defacto Primacy of Marriage within the Church

Anyone who has attended church for any length of time will know that it's a subculture that favors and honors those who are married, and especially those who have children. This is true for all churches.

To some extent, this is entirely warranted. For one, churches that have many children and young people tend to have a healthier, livelier ambience and are more likely to be growing. Speaking of the married themselves, on average, those who are married with children are ostensibly more disciplined, mature, responsible, and self-controlled than their unmarried peers of a near equivalent age.* They also tend to be more physically attractive, more intelligent, and more financially stable too.*

On the other hand, the church's high esteem for the married, as well as the church's unfettered celebration of women and all things feminine, and the complementary disparagement and disrespect of men and masculinity that are often presented through a jovial delivery, are all discriminations that contravene the scriptures (e.g. Leviticus 19:15; Deuteronomy 1:17; James 2:1-13). Partiality, favoritism, and treating certain people as if they are of more inherent worth is inconsistent with faith in Christ, and causes one to violate God's law of liberty. It also transforms the church into a married clique and a henhouse respectively, thereby attracting more of the same types and repelling the fair-minded faithful.

 Note: This comparison of married vs. unmarried is NOT made to disparage the unmarried, but to emphasize that the differences can be easily observed and are sometimes striking. I am a school teacher who interacts with such people on a regular basis. Whenever adult non-school-employees come to the school, I can visibly ascertain from their overall appearance and mannerisms whether they are a parent or a solicitor, and I can also tell which of the parents are married or unmarried. It's rather obvious.*

Setting the Primacy of Marriage is one of the Failures of the Church

The notion that "You cannot be truly married unless you are truly saved" that is implicitly understood concerning the Sacramental Marriage construct dovetails this fancy favoritism perfectly and buys right into it in practice. The problem with establishing such a policy is that it further divides people along the lines of the "Have's" and the "Have Not's", thereby exacerbating these biases and modeling them to others as "Christian".

There could be some variations of how this plays out for different individuals. The "Have's" would include…

1. Those who believe they are saved / baptized / etc. are interested in family / marriage / sexual purity, and are therefore drawn to the church (perhaps through a covenant).
2. Those who are interested in family / marriage are drawn to the church (perhaps through covenant relationships with church-going family members, i.e. parents) because they believe they are saved / baptized / etc.
3. Those who are interested in family / marriage and believe they are saved / baptized / etc. are therefore drawn to the church.
4. Those who are drawn to the church (perhaps through a covenant) because they believe they are saved / baptized / etc. become more interested in family / marriage.

The "Have Not's" would include…

1. Those who do NOT believe they are saved / baptized / etc. are repelled from the church because are NOT interested in family / marriage.
2. Those who are NOT interested in family / marriage (perhaps because of parental divorce, or a traumatic or despondently unhappy childhood) are repelled from the church because they are led to believe they are NOT saved / baptized / etc.
3. Those who are NOT interested in family / marriage do NOT believe they are saved / baptized / etc. and are repelled from the church.
4. Those who are repelled from the church because they do NOT believe they are saved / baptized / etc. become LESS interested in family / marriage.

In summary, it strongly aligns the ostentatious marriage club with church attendance and "salvation" — thereby segregating marriage minded believers from ostensibly single pagan revelers — all to the benefit of the married and to the church at large.

Singles are "welcomed" to attend, but will not be heartily accepted into the married church clique.

Church Policy Helps the Church at Young Singles' Expense

The Sacramental Marriage construct combined with the preening preferential treatment shown to the married sends the message that Church (and the public face of Christianity by association) is only or primarily for the married. But in fact, there is no such alignment / dichotomy. For instance, what about Christian incels? What about the average relatively decent person who is unsaved or unchurched but who wishes to improve his/her marriage and/or parenting abilities? In the past, these demographics were perceived to be a minor concern since the "Have Not's" were mostly unbelievers and probably wouldn't have attended a church anyway. However, these demographics have recently swelled in ranks. Assuming an association of "Salvation = Marriage = Respectability" sure doesn't help any evangelistic efforts or build any interest in church — that is, UNTIL one is ready to marry or at least comes to see the eternal value of marriage.

All this might explain several things…

- Why there is a strong pressure to marry, even for those who have no calling / interest / opportunity to do so.
- Why converged churchianity and purity movements don't cut the wedding cake for young people in the church.
- Why, as marriage is decreasing in popularity, so is the church losing favor.
- Why some churches endorse g@y marriage.
- Why Christians wash their hands of sexual morality.
- Why young people, especially the unchurched, postpone marriage.
- Why many young people leave church as single young adults and then return to the church later in life.
- Why women take an increased interest in church when they realize they need a man / husband, e.g. when the Wall approaches or after they become single mothers. (By then, a woman's MMV has already been degraded / sullied.)

- Why many of them never come back.

Granted, all these problems have various causes / sources, ranging from the confusion that is prevalent in the young, to personal interests, to the influences of Progressive Feminism, to bad interpretations / applications of doctrine, to simple immaturity and laziness, but they are also exacerbated by the church's policies / teachings and social environment regarding the spiritual elitist concept of marriage and the favoritism shown to the married.

Are Common-Law Marriages the most Biblical?

Modern Marriage Ceremonies are Not Biblically Based

This article was written by Pastor Ryan Ahlgrim of First Mennonite Church in Richmond, Virginia, U.S.A.

Anabaptist World: Where are marriage ceremonies in the Bible? (2014/10/11)*

Pastor Ahlgrim's viewpoint appeals to the basic Sex = Marriage paradigm, which Artisanal Toad derived from Old Testament passages.

> I have often been puzzled by something missing from the Bible: marriage ceremonies.
> Although lots of people are married in the Bible, there are no descriptions of any ceremonies. Adam and Eve are "married" simply by the fact that they are made for each other and they procreate. Jacob marries Leah by mistake, which happens not because of a disguised bride at a wedding ceremony, but because he consummates the marriage in the darkness of a tent. Jesus attends a wedding in Cana which consists of a family party, but no ceremony is described. The only "ceremony" I can find in the Bible is Tobit 7:12-14 in which a father places the hand of his daughter in the hand of the husband, and then writes a contract.
> The reason why there are no marriage ceremonies in the Bible is because marriage did not involve a ceremony. Marriage in the Bible simply consists of a man and woman, with the consent of the woman's father or guardian, living together and attempting procreation. No vows, no priest, no ritual, no prayer, no pronouncement, no license, no registration.
> *Anabaptist World: Where are marriage ceremonies in the Bible? (2014/10/11)

This is quite different from how we define and enact marriage today.

Today, for a marriage to be “real” it must be legal; in other words, it must be recognized by the laws of the state and registered with the state. Also, for many Christians, a marriage is not a “Christian marriage” unless it is officiated by a credentialed minister who makes a verbal pronouncement, preferably in the presence of the congregation.

But these are all recent innovations. For most of human history, marriage has simply been an agreement, recognized or arranged by the immediate families, for a man and woman to live together.

Marriage as a legal institution, and as a religious ceremony, began as a result of the Reformation. Beginning in the Middle Ages, churches kept records of who was married to whom. But Luther viewed marriage as a “worldly matter,” and so he turned over the recording of marriages to the state. Calvin believed that for a marriage to be valid it needed to be both recorded by the state and officiated by the church. The Catholic Church did not require marriages to be officiated by a priest until 1563, and the Anglican Church did not get around to making this requirement until 1753. So for the past five hundred years there have been, in the European tradition, three kinds of marriage: legal, religious, and social. But social marriage, strictly speaking, is the most biblical.

*Anabaptist World: Where are marriage ceremonies in the Bible? (2014/10/11)

Comparing Paradigms

The larger point which Pastor Ahlgrim is making here is that according to the Bible, marriage is NOT officiated by the church at all, but is arranged by fathers and takes place upon consummation.

This stands at odds with what The Eye of Sauron wrote about the Orthodox position.

> “To be clear, the purpose of performing the sacrament is to ensure that the sacrament took place in the absence > of documentation. Otherwise they may be living in sin and their kids will be illegitimate. The side effect is that it gives the church an opportunity to teach the couple what the sacrament actually entails. Do they always do this? Not that I know of. (RCC does with precana but Orthodoxy does not have as well refined of a system.) It is a missed opportunity."

When we consider EoS's viewpoint in light of Pastor Ahlgrim's, we see a stark contrast between the Sacramental Marriage construct and Marriage as described in the Bible.

If we admit EoS's Orthodox view as being valid, then that would imply that all the Patriarchs in the Bible may have been living in sin and their children were illegitimate, including Abraham, the father of faith, and baby Jesus too, I suppose — all because they never received a Sacramental Marriage from the church (or whatever official approbation was required).

OTOH, if we admit Pastor Ahlgrim's Biblically based view as being preeminent, then it appears that the Cathodoxy is overreaching their authority. This is precisely where Sharkly* is coming from in writing, Could a modern "social marriage" fit the description of Marriage as described in the Bible? Why or why not?

> "When a man has sex with a virgin they become one flesh, AKA married. But that fact didn't give the church the control over men to create the earthly kingdom and earthly power they lusted for. So they lied and said, "That makes you a "fornicator", because only the church can join a man and a wife. Put her away, you're living in sin, or else come to our church and for a small fee we'll legitimize your illegitimate relationship."

This also appears like Sacramental Marriage is a sales pitch for Cathodoxy, as I described in The Necessity of Requirements for Sacramental Marriage (2023/6/1).

 Sharkly is (or was?) a Mennonite, like Pastor Ahlgrim.*

Bridal Charades

Modern church marriages are a gynocentric fantasy parade with no practical usefulness to marriage itself.

Throwback to the 50s — Not the 1950s

While I was writing Are Common-Law Marriages the most Biblical? (2023/6/3), I was amused to imagine most grooms would be delighted to have a marriage just like what is described for the Biblical Patriarchs and was enjoyed by most of humanity before the modern age.

Imagine what it would be like. All a prospective groom needs to do is to cut a deal with the bride's father, celebrate with a joint family supper consisting of grilled meat and spirits, and then get straight down to the butt end of married life — the ins and outs of the bump and grind, followed by a simple life in a clean home with daily meals well-prepared. No fake frills and no big bills. Hymens, not diamonds. No rented limousines having the faint residual odor of the previous customer's binge barf. No bachelorette's parties to sweat over. No bridal showers to be ignored. It's not even hard to imagine that most men, having the piquant premonition of pumping prime poon at the end of the day, would willingly forego having a bachelor's party too.

Having these quaint pleasantries in mind, I had to ask myself, is it right for us to look at the Bible's descriptions of marriage and conclude that it is archaic, primitive, and unrefined by our modern materialistic accoutrements? That now we need a pompous ceremony in a grandiose church with stained glass windows and a 200-year-old pipe organ playing canons, cups and crowns, diamond rings and white dresses, plus full legal licensure and the sanction of the church… All to ensure marital sanctity and the blessed continuity of our lineage? It seems like more trouble than its currently worth.

Or because it is primarily women who want a large, expensive, and extravagant marriage ceremony? And why? In the female psyche, a modern marriage is mostly a figment of delusion flushed out in the herd's affirmation of the bride's inestimable worth. In reality, it is little more than one more grandiose life experience to be had, and then afterwards the husband is discarded in favor of her "independent" lifestyle supported by alimony.

Or because this charade is now the social norm? Because if we don't play charades, then we're seen as either inelegantly impoverished or mean or stingy and we would be publicly excoriated and humiliated for denying Princess from having her "Big Day" and all that.

What is the Purpose?

As it is, the modern church-based marriage with all its bells and chimes is just another materialistic embodiment of gynocentrism which, like diamond rings and so on, specifically caters to and glorifies brides, wastes extravagant amounts of money placing husbands and fathers in debt, and actually distracts from the actual substance of marriage itself.

The most practical use of a wedding dress in the 21st century.
H/T: Patriactionary
What is the significance of a white wedding dress when only 4% of brides are virgins? It's just one more lavish expense that will be worn for one day, and then sold or mothballed for the next few years.

If we are honest, social customs attuned to affirming feminine delusions of grandeur do not contribute to marital stability and sanctification. The 33% divorce rate among church wed couples is not something to be conserved in our faith tradition.

How about cutting out anything that does not directly contribute to the quality and sanctity of the marital union, and prioritize making sure those things that do are firmly in place?

Sectarian Judgment

St. Paul warned us against sectarianism in 1 Corinthians 3.

Sectarian judgment in the Christian Manosphere has been a monumentous roadblock to the development of further CRP knowledge, as well as ministry and evangelism, ever since the Christian Manosphere broke away from the Secular Manosphere in 2020.[†] This issue has recently come to a head again. We've even had some hellfire sermons!

We had a discussion about this (starting here), and I've had to place a couple commenters in moderation for making arguments in bad faith / intellectual dishonesty / trolling.

Fellow blogger and Lutheran Brother Matthew E. Cochran has witnessed the scuffle and has prepared an appropriate exhortation for our "Men's Red Pill church service", complete with an audio sermon: Moral Wisdom vs Adding to God's Law (2023/6/5). He notes that 500 years ago, Sola Scriptura was employed as a corrective response to the heavy handed Magisterium's habit of interpreting what Scripture is allowed to say, and to restore the Bible's proper use as a tool of judgment over traditional errors. But in the 21st century, Sola Scriptura is now a source of fractal division and is absurdly abused to eschew creeds, traditions, and human reason, and I'll add mystical faith to the list. He correctly calls out the widespread foolishness of being trigger happy with canned doctrinal arguments while failing to exercise spiritual discernment. Readers who've been disheveled by all the commotion here would greatly benefit from clicking over to Cochran's place and feeding from his perspicacious revelations for a wisely spent 13 minutes.

Current Divides

The biggest "divides" that I can see right now in the Christian Manosphere are as follows, and roughly in this order. I think these could be extended to describe Christianity in general. (Converged churchianity is not included here.)

1. The Sola Scriptura camp vs. the Mystical Faith camp.
2. Moral Absolutists vs. Moral Relativists vs. Moral Discernment / Wisdom.
3. The Ecclesiastical camp* (those having an allegiance to an established faith tradition) vs. the Independents (those who've had a bad experience with organized religion).
4. The Sex = Marriage camp vs. the Sex ≠ Marriage camp.
5. The Headship Authority camp vs. the Peaceful Unity camp.

* I think the differences among the various Ecclesiastical camps (denominations, sects, etc.) are not a dividing issue in themselves, but certain doctrinal beliefs tend to sweep hardliners into one of the above camps. For example, I've had the impression that Sola Scriptura Calvinists make up the majority of the Sex ≠ Marriage camp while the Sola Scriptura Mennonites / Mormons subscribe to the Sex = Marriage camp. Many in the Mystical Faith camp are Independents. I am interested to know if readers have had these same impressions or any others they may have noticed.

 I believe there are more fundamental differences that have not yet been ascertained, probably something to do with Law vs. Grace.

 I've invented the label Peaceful Unity to describe Derek L. Ramsey's concept of the ideal Christian marital relationship structure. He has written many posts about what it is NOT in relation to the Authoritative Headship model, and I am putting together a post about what it IS. He is the only person I know who is pushing this model.

Would the "Real Christians" please stand taller?

Whenever we see comments to the tune of "If you believe X, then you're not a real Christian", it would be wise for us to interpret this reaction as a defense of one's psychological integrity. The true meaning of such a statement is roughly translated as, "If you believe X, then you're not a duly-qualified member of my own camp that I firmly believe has an indisputable monopoly on God's salvation. I would rather walk away with my ego intact than to reexamine my own beliefs under the speculum of alternative but well-established Christian interpretations / traditions. And furthermore, I'm so hard-hearted that I'm willing to employ a curse of damnation as a dual strategy to end the discussion immediately and to send you off with a punishment for subjecting me to the implied suggestion that I should do so." The short version of this would be, "HOW DARE YOU touch my comfort zone!"

This habit of judging who the "real Christians" are, as it is currently used as a deterrent method to stump an ecumenical discussion, is a hump that the Christian Manosphere will have to overcome at some point if we are to move on to bigger things like a "Biblical / Red Pill church" or "Biblical / Red Pill techniques to attain sanctity in marriage", etc. Some readers have suggested such things, and TBH, I have the same ideas in mind.

[†] After the secular RP arm petered out, taking with it the last of the PUAs, it was thereafter replaced by a plethora of Red Pill YouTube channels that spread RP lore across the internet and took it mainstream. Interestingly enough, its dissolution and rebirth fits the Christian archetype of death and resurrection. Meanwhile, the Christian RP staggers on like a zombie.

Conflict Precedes Progress

Derek L. Ramsey is a well-respected husband, father, blogger, computer whiz, and philosopher who made his debut in the Classic Christian Manosphere many years ago. Over the past couple years, he has written much on the topics of patriarchy, headship, authority, and submission. For the most part, his essays are long, theologically complex, and difficult to wade through. It requires some dedication, prayer, and moderate intelligence to fully understand all that he has written.

Our exchange is usually amiable and sometimes jovial, but at times, real contention has erupted. He has made reference to the Σ Frame blog in many of his essays, usually in the form of a criticism or a rebuttal. One recent skirmish occurred under Thedeti's post, An open letter to Christian Wives (2023/5/27), in which Derek was offended by deti's claim that men should have authority over their wives, even when asking them to sin.* (For those readers who are intensely interested in the scuttlebutt, Derek's response begins here.)

 RPA pointed out that this is basically what Abraham did with his wife Sarah in the situation with Pharaoh.*

An Epiphany as an Answered Prayer

At first, I had the notion that Derek was using the "Wives should not submit to sin" argument to undermine deti's "Wives, submit to your husbands in all things" argument and thereby affirm an egalitarian concept of marriage — which is exactly the same tactic that feminized churchians take when interpreting wifely submission.

In response to this heated disagreement, I started to pray about this. After praying about this for a time, I came to understand Derek's viewpoint and I realized I was wrong in my assessment of his argument. I no longer think he is rooting for egalitarian marriage as I thought before. In the next section, I will describe what I envisioned and then it should be obvious to readers why I changed my opinion.

The Living Entity of Marital Harmony

Derek's conceptual paradigm of marriage originates from his own experience in marriage and is completely different from the Headship Authority dynamics that we often discuss on Σ Frame. Instead of him and his wife interacting as distinct individuals, as most might think of a marital relationship, he is conscious of his marital relationship as being a Living Entity in and of itself, which is not the same thing. I could only believe that this Living Entity is God's presence dwelling in his marriage. This is why he's always stressing "unity" in marriage. What he means by "unity" is that he needs to always nurture and protect, not only his wife (and children), but also that Living Entity between the two of them. Consequently, his entire family experiences that Living Entity as the splendor of God in their marriage and family life. This ambience is also what creates Godly children.

 The presence of a Living Entity in a marriage is an unstated assumption that appears in many of Derek's comments, such as here, there, and elsewhere. He does ascribe this to God, but this identification is lost on readers who have no such personal knowledge of God's presence in a marriage and therefore cannot understand nor relate. Readers who care to peruse his other posts and comments with this assumption in mind will see the same pattern.*

 Unity is a recurring theme that appears abundantly in Derek's writings. This word is used in nearly every single one of his posts. We would be daft to miss it.*

DeepStrength's Description of the Peaceful Unity Marriage Model

Another way to comprehend the Peaceful Unity Marriage Model is by regarding the marital relationship as DeepStrength outlined in Structures of Authority Summarized (2014/5/16). Here, DS describes how the husband's perspective is to view his wife as a co-heir, companion, and friend, while the wife's perspective is to respect and submit to her husband as her authoritative Head.

Image Source: Christianity and Masculinity: Structures of Authority Summarized (2014/5/16)
Derek's view of marriage lines up with DS's model to a tee.

Based on how Derek describes this from his own personal perspective, yes, it does sound like what we would call egalitarian, but that's not it at all, and he doesn't seem to be able to articulate this difference very well. Also, we cannot observe the graceful faith of his wife's submission, which makes all the difference in the world, so this absence of information further obscures the truth of the matter.

Conclusions

If readers can understand what I've described above about the Peaceful Unity model, then it becomes apparent why Derek is so upset over all the discussion of power dynamics in marriage, as that implies that the marital relationship is immature or dysfunctional and is not (yet) a Living Entity in and of itself. He is right in saying that a husband taking The deti Route (which is effective and maybe necessary for hypoagentic, immature, rebellious wives), would destroy bonding and trust in a relationship between more spiritually mature individuals. GBFM has also expressed this truth in saying that "A TRUE Christian woman submits and needs NOT to be gamed!", although he doesn't explain the specific context in which this is true, nor why.

Mature Christian women, and young innocent pure women need NOT to be Gamed. In fact, it is detrimental to trust and destructive to the relationship. Discernment is needed to know whether Game is appropriate or even necessary.

The thing is, there are so few men or women who experience a marital relationship as a Living Entity, that others can hardly relate to Derek's viewpoint. There is a great need for this model to be further developed so that others may find marital sanctification in this manner, should this happen to be God's will for them as an individual couple.

Since I am not very familiar with the Peaceful Unity marriage model, I am hoping that Derek will take these insights and run with it to independently develop his own descriptions and theories of this model, and thereby cease writing negative comparisons to the Authoritative Headship model.

Of note, Derek is a proponent of the Sex = Marriage argument, although he differs with Artisanal Toad on certain points. It would be insightful to readers if he could include this angle in his explications of this model, namely, why sexual purity is a necessary element of Peaceful Unity, and how it contributes to sanctification.

Meanwhile, it appears that the vast majority of men married to spiritually immature and obstinately unsubmissive wives who grew up under the inspirations of Feminism would fare better with the Authoritative Headship model.

Best wishes~!

Gentile Authority vs. Genuine Authority

Gentile Authority vs. Genuine Authority

In response to The Peaceful Unity Marriage Model (2023/6/7), DeepStrength wrote a comment illustrating an excellent comparison between two different types of authority, citing Matthew 20:25-28 and John 13:12-17.

> [25] But Jesus called them to him and said, "You know that the rulers of the Gentiles lord it over them, and their great ones exercise authority over them. [26] It shall not be so among you. But whoever would be great among you must be your servant, [27] and whoever would be first among you must be your slave, [28] even as the Son of Man came not to be served but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many."
> Matthew 20:25-28 (ESV)

> [12] When he had finished washing their feet, he put on his clothes and returned to his place. "Do you understand what I have done for you?" he asked them. [13] "You call me 'Teacher' and 'Lord,' and rightly so, for that is what I am. [14] Now that I, your Lord and Teacher, have washed your feet, you also should wash one another's feet. [15] I have set you an example that you should do as I have done for you. [16] Very truly I tell you, no servant is greater than his master, nor is a messenger greater than the one who sent him. [17] Now that you know these things, you will be blessed if you do them.
> John 13:12-17 (ESV)

DS ties things together by saying,

> "Jesus makes it clear that His authority is to be used to love and serve the disciples and by extension the Church, which makes this a clear analogy for husbands and wives with Christ : Church :: Husbands : Wives."

DS describes this difference in more detail in these posts:

1. Christianity and Masculinity: The cultural blinders of authority (2018/6/1).
2. Christianity and Masculinity: Headship with Gentile and Genuine authority discernment (2023/6/9)

Confusion about the Differences

Derek L. Ramsey objected to this characterization, saying,

> " A servant or slave does not have authority of the types above: they take orders from another. When Jesus washed the feet of His disciples, He was socially debasing himself."

Yes, he was debasing himself — according to the Gentile understanding of authority. But according to the Genuine Authority paradigm which He introduced to His followers in John 13:5-20, He was NOT debasing himself but instead demonstrating his ability to love and serve them. In the Genuine Authority paradigm, the person who is able to love and care for others has more spiritual authority because others are depending on him to fulfill their needs, NOT because he does whatever they want him to do, according to the Gentile Authority paradigm. Providing for the needs of others requires one to have a domain of authority, moral agency, and a sphere of influence — all markers of personal and spiritual maturity.

The Recognition of Genuine Authority is what changes the Paradigm

We also need to recognize that Jesus was NOT obeying orders from His disciples in washing their feet. He did it of His own volition upon seeing their unkempt condition of having unclean feet. Also, He was serving (or debasing himself in the Gentile view to) those who had ALREADY recognized Him as Lord. That is, He was NOT washing the feet of the Pharisees, nor was He sitting beside the street washing the feet of everyone who passed by. These people did NOT recognize Him as Lord, and they would of course interpret this action in the wrong way according to the Gentile understanding of authority.

> "Do not give what is holy to dogs, and do not throw your pearls before pigs, or they will trample them under their feet, and turn and tear you to pieces."
> Matthew 7:6 (NASB)

The "turn and tear you to pieces" clause is real. There are possible risks that should be assessed before engaging in what one might consider charity or ministry to those who are NOT under one's domain of authority.

Live I've said before, you're only responsible for those within your domain of authority — those who have their needs fulfilled by you, whether it be physical needs, or emotional needs, or spiritual needs, or what not — those who continually depend on receiving love and care from you, those who look up to you, those who are inspired by you, those who are taught by you, those who are shepherded by you. Here I am referring to an ongoing relationship in which you are recognized as the dominant person in the relationship. This is NOT a one-stint act of altruism nor is it being a Nice Guy™.

Men, those women who give you NATURAL IOIs (as opposed to IOCs or seductive come on's) are signaling that you have Genuine Authority in the area of granting their emotional needs and quite possibly their sexual needs too. Scott's Axiom's apply.

Genuine Authority Superposes — NOT Replaces — Gentile Authority

Lest we jump to the wrong conclusion that the Gentile Authority structure is somehow "worldly" or "unChristian" or whatever, this structure of authority is emphasized in John 13:16-19, where Jesus says,

> [16] "Truly, truly I say to you, a slave is not greater than his master, nor is one who is sent greater than the one who sent him. [17] If you know these things, you are blessed if you do them. [18] I am not speaking about all of you. I know the ones whom I have chosen; but this is happening so that the Scripture may be fulfilled, 'He who eats My bread has lifted up his heel against Me.' [19] From now on I am telling you before it happens, so that when it does happen, you may believe that I am He."
> John 13:16-19 (NASB)

In verse 16, Jesus makes it crystal clear that the Gentile system of authority is still in place and is not rescinded in any way.* But His overall demonstration adds to this a juxtaposed responsibility to love and serve those under one's domain of authority.

In verse 18d (in which Jesus quotes Psalm 41:9), Jesus implies that we should expect resistance, rebellion, and trouble from friends and those who receive our love and care, which is exactly what wives do to their husbands, and many children do to their parents. Verse 19 means that when this happens, we are to depend on Christ.*

Concluding Statements

In addition to the Curse of Eve in which discontented and distrustful wives attempt to usurp control over their husbands, another reason why feminists and wives are so reviled by masculine authority is because they are thinking of it in terms of the Gentile Authority structure, in which power is lorded over the underlings. Thus, one of the main challenges of moving from a Headship Authority to a Peaceful Unity marital structure lies in the renewing of the wife's mind, namely, that she should recognize her husband as her lord and Tingle Meister (1 Peter 3:5-6).

 Readers are invited to debate the accuracy and validity of my exegesis in the comments.*

Introduction

While I was writing Are Common-Law Marriages the most Biblical? (2023/6/3), I was intrigued by Pastor Ahlgrim's historical account of church officiated marriage, and I wanted to know what was going on at that time in history that might have influenced those changes in 1563 and 1753, respectively. Here's a shocking little summary of what I found.

The Medieval Concept of Marriage

Before the passage of the 1753 bill (described in greater detail below), all of society including courts of law held the common view that the essential elements of marriage involved (1) "that FAITH by which the Man and Woman bind themselves to each other to live as Man and Wife", (2) an exchange of binding promises (which alone were respected in courts of law), and (3) sexual union — NOT clerical intervention, NOT parental consent, NOT public announcements, and NOT even the presence of witnesses, as marriage is typically regarded today. [Bannet, Lasch]

Thus, it was perfectly acceptable in all classes of society (except the ruling nobility) for a couple to exchange promises, bed down, and start a family long before ever going to church. In many cases, the church ceremony was skipped altogether. The public ceremony in a church or before witnesses was only viewed as a public repetition and solemnization of that primary promissory and implicitly contractual / covenantal act of faith. [Bannet]

Furthermore, clandestine marriages (discussed in the following section), seductions, as well as abductions and most situations in which couples willingly engaged in sexual relations, were for all intents and purposes, regarded as real marriages by both public opinion and law. Church Courts and Justices of the Peace would uphold the claim of a pregnant woman that she had been debauched under the promise of marriage, and if necessary the man in question could be compelled to perform his promise.

The outstanding problem within this social order was that many unscrupulous characters gamed the laxities of the system and took advantage of the public's trust. For example…

- Marital abandoment was a chronic malady, resulting in many single mothers.* For example, a wife who had joined herself to an abusive or alcoholic man, or a man who had taken a frigid or contentious wife, could escape their "irksome cohabitation" by moving to a distant town.
- Those who took the above route could pretend to be single or widowed and start over with a new spouse and family. Spousal death followed by remarriage was common, allowing such stories to be easily believed.
- There were no public records (except for the nobility), so there was no way of knowing about someone's past except through the testimony of witnesses. Witnesses were difficult to locate, and if identified they could easily lie or reframe the context to protect friends and loved ones.
- Persons known as "Celebrators" (often priests who had been excommunicated for their heretical views), got rich by posing as ordained clergy or someone having the authority to officiate a marriage. Such masqueraders were often preferred over clergy as they did not ask awkward questions or pry into private matters and they were willing to forge names and falsify dates in order to please their eager-to-marry customers. [Leneman]

In response to this situation, and in light of the social pressures exerted by the Catholic canonical law which was enacted by the Council of Trent in 1563 (described in greater detail below), and especially the strong widespread preference for marriage over celibacy, which was a view worthy of excommunication as stipulated in the Council of Trent, both Catholic and Protestant critics proposed, in effect, a whole new conception of marriage, one that stressed love and companionship rather than carnal union — "the relief of man's loneliness rather than the relief of concupiscence." [Lasch]

What is a “Clandestine Marriage”?

When I began this study, the term “Clandestine Marriage” appeared prominently. It was clear that this had been a problem long before 1563, perhaps even continuing from before such things were recorded. This problem was one of the main reasons why The Council of Trent was called to order in 1563, and The Clandestine Marriages Act was passed in 1753. (I’ll get to these later.)

To the casual 21st century reader, it is not very clear exactly what is meant by “Clandestine Marriage”. When I first saw this term, the contextual use of the word clandestine gave me the idea that this was referring to secret marriages (possibly polygamous) or short term marriages that ended as a result of abandonment. I also thought this might mean common-law marriages, contractual marriages, short term marriages of convenience (e.g. to obtain social recognition or legal rights granted only to those properly married), fly-by-nights, or a bowdlerized euphemism for fornication in general.

But upon further reading, I learned that it was all of these and much more, but the nuances behind the term “clandestine marriage” cannot be fully appreciated without a familiarity with the social context of that time. I had to read several papers before I was able to figure this out. Here’s what I’ve gathered from my readings.

In general, a “Clandestine Marriage” is defined as “a marriage conducted in secret” [Francis]. However, the government, law, Catholics, and Protestants all had widely contrasting concepts of what a “Clandestine Marriage” specifically entailed, thereby adding to the confusion. Comprehensively, and to be more precise, a “Clandestine Marriage” was (1) any marriage that occurred outside the jurisdiction of the officiating authority named, or (2) any marriage which did not have the approval of said jurisdiction.

In general, to each of the respective sensibilities, a “clandestine marriage” was defined as one that fit one of the following descriptions.

Signing the Marriage Registrar, by Edmund Blair Leighton.

To government and law officials:

- A marriage in the absence of the free consent of one or both persons.
- Common-law marriages.
- Unofficiated marriages.
- Marriages conducted without a public announcement.
- Marriages not properly licensed / registered with the state.
- Marriages among multiple persons, or with someone already married (usually in the form of serial monogamy).
- Marriages of persons under legal age (12 for girls, 14 for boys).

To the Catholic church:

- Marriages not condoned by the church.
- Common-law marriages.
- Unofficiated marriages.
- Catholics marrying Protestants in a Protestant church.
- Catholics marrying Anglicans in an Anglican church.
- Marriages among non-Catholics.
- Marriages conducted without banns (notices given to the church as a public announcement of a proposed marriage).
- One or both of the couple was a minor who had not obtained permission from his or her parents or guardians.
- If the wedding ceremony did not occur between 8:00 a.m. and 12:00 noon.

Protestants were more concerned about the compatibility between husband and wife than about ecclesiastic regulations, and so they fought against Catholic canon law by forbidding (1) enforced marriages which were arranged by parents against their children's wishes, and also at the other extreme, (2) impulsive marriages entered into without parental consent [Lasch]. The former was considered clandestine when parents married off their children against their wills and without the church's knowledge, and the latter when sexually mature children eloped.

In earlier times, the term "irregular marriage" was used to refer to such unions. But apparently, the "clandestine" label was implemented as a PR spin intended to (1) cast shame on those who failed to register their marriage with the respective church and/or state authorities, and (2) to set the standard place and tone of marriage as being identified with the church and/or state.

Clandestine Marriages Could Not be Prevented — Regulations made it Worse!

During this time in history and just as it is today, many young people engaged in sexual relations soon after adolescence and before the age of adult accountability under the law [Schellekens].

Where there's a will, by Edmund Blair Leighton (1895).

Because of the heavy familial, financial, social, and ecclesiastical pressures surrounding sex and marriage, it was not uncommon for young couples in forbidden love to run away to a distant town, change their names, and present themselves to the locals as a married couple. If they were not accepted in one locale, they would skip to the next town, and the next, until they found a place where they were accepted into the community and could continue on with a normal life. It was also not uncommon for breakups to occur as a result of these challenges and uncertainties, sometimes with infants involved.

In view of this situation, the 1753 Act gave parents absolute control over the church endorsed marriages of their minor children [Probert]. It is evident that this pushed sexual relationships even further underground and encouraged more secret liaisons and elopements among late adolescent minors, thereby exacerbating the main problem that the 1753 Act was purported to resolve.

In fact, illegitimate fertility in England skyrocketed between 1750 and 1810. Schellekens modeled the incidence of formal marriage vs. illegitimate fertility during the second half of the 18th century and concluded that about 30% of the increase in formally recognized marriages, and 45% of the rise in illegitimate* births during this period were caused by the Clandestine Marriage Act. Shellekens also concluded that the increase in formal marriage also contributed 35% to the rise in illegitimate births.* For comparison, the decline in real wages during this same time period only explains 9% of the rise in illegitimate births.*

 Before 1753, "illegitimacy" meant that a child had no legal or real claim to his/her father's inheritance, whereas after 1753, illegitimacy took on the modern meaning of being born outside of an officially sanctioned, church ordained marriage. Thus, the passage of the Clandestine Marriages Act rendered many children "illegitimate" by the new definition. Currently, with the breakdown in sexual mores and the rise of Political Correctness, the word "illegitimate" has become archaic and has thus lost this meaning.*

1563 — The Council of Trent

The prevalence of clandestine marriages and the church's exasperation in dealing with the irregular nature of these marriages posed doctrinal dilemmas leading to intense disagreements among church leaders. The government also found the issue to be confounding and could offer no assistance to the church. The resulting complications in resolving church policy regarding marriage and an inability to maintain a coherent ecclesiastical administration in the face of these challenges was at the heart of the Protestant Reformation. In response to this schism, The Council of Trent (1545-1563) was a meeting of Catholic clerics convened by Pope Paul III (served 1534-1549) as a desperate attempt to establish order within the church.

Pope Paul III, convener of the Council of Trent.

As described earlier, no particular "form" of marriage (how and before whom it should take place) was required for Catholics until 1563, when the Council of Trent ruled that a marriage must take place before one's pastor or bishop to be valid.

Furthermore, in a brutal grab for power to counter the Reformation, The Council of Trent issued 12 "canons" regarding public opinions on marriage. In this decree, a person was excommunicated, NOT for violating the Biblical institution of marriage, but for disagreeing with the Catholic church about how marriage is to be instituted! Every resolution takes the basic form of, "If anyone disagrees with the Catholic church in this or that area regarding marriage, let him be anathema."*

Including [paraphrased]…

- Anyone who says marriage is not a sacrament is damned.
- Anyone who says marriage is preferable to virginity or celibacy is damned.
- Anyone who says divorce should be an option in the case of abandonment, adultery, domestic violence, or sexual denial is damned.
- Anyone who says the church cannot separate married couples for any reason is damned.

Wow! These requirements were even stiffer than what Jesus described in Matthew 5:27-32 and Matthew 19:3-12! Jesus said, "Don't look!" to avoid temptation, but these pontificators were saying, "Don't talk!" to avoid damnation! Talk about tying up heavy burdens on men's backs! This is the kind of stuff that motivated the Protestant Reformation!

To the legalistic perps who make such stern moral demands, Jesus said…

> "Woe to you lawyers as well! For you load people with burdens that are hard to bear, while you yourselves will not even touch the burdens with one of your fingers."
> Luke 11:46 (NASB) c.f. Matthew 23:4

While Catholics upheld the supernatural character of marriage as a sacrament, Protestants viewed marriage as a fundamental building block of society, and therefore prioritized the domestic peace and the sanctity of marriage. Protestants admitted divorce in extreme circumstances as a practical concession, thereby earning their damnation according to the Catholic church.

Thus, The Council of Trent sparked widespread fervor and popular support for the Protestant Reformation, thereby accelerating this monumental ecclesiastical schism which led to…

- Capitalism
- Philosophical skepticism, which yielded the scientific revolution.
- A societal life regulated by the bureaucratic dictates of the church and state, ultimately culminating in a multitude of revolutions followed by modern democracy.
- The Enlightenment, which produced civil rights, collectivism, individualism (e.g. the Pendulum Effect), and eventually feminism.

In short, this marked the end of the Medieval period and ushered in the beginning of the Modern Era.

 Anathema = Excommunicated or Damned.*
 This goes against what Jesus said in Matthew 5:32 and Matthew 19:9.*

1753 — The Clandestine Marriages Act

The Clandestine Marriage Act of 1753 required religious non-conformists and Catholics to be married in Anglican churches. It was a further attempt to channel marriage into a set form that could be recorded and regulated.

Lemmings reported that the 1753 bill was promoted by Lord Hardwicke as a response to desperate confusion and frustration among lawyers about the law of marriage regarding private contractual marriages (including those officiated by non-Anglican churches, i.e. the Catholic church), and pushed its passage against mounted public criticism. Leneman gives a detailed account of the social ills and legal quandaries that led to the passage of the bill, and points out that lawyers and politicians lied about the details in order to gain enough acceptance for the bill to pass.

The barely prevailing narrative presented to the public was that the Clandestine Marriages Act would reduce the prevalence of clandestine marriage and pose a measure of quality control that would encourage marriages of intentional love and commitment. In practice however, the Marriage Act meant, in effect, that a couples' private verbal promises to live together as man and wife no longer had any force in the eyes of the law. Once the Marriage Act became law, couples who had already exchanged promises of undying fidelity and devotion and had long been married with children were no longer recognized as married under the law. A man who debauched a woman under pretense or promise of marriage could no longer be compelled to perform his promise. A woman who yielded to her lover and was with child no longer had any legal recourse if the man left her. [Bannet]

Probert and Brown studied 95 marriages occurring between 1758 and 1795. They concluded that the overall impact of the Clandestine Marriages Act was that it attached importance not only to religious conscience but also to having a legally binding marriage. The former was satisfied by having the Catholic ceremony first, and the latter by the Anglican ceremony. They noted that many couples would travel long distances (up to 34 km. among those studied) in order to be officially married in both the Catholic church and the Anglican church.

As you might imagine, all these changes were immensely unpopular at the time. People complained that the Government had changed the meaning of marriage by making the existence of a marriage depend entirely on a couple's public observance of some purely ceremonial and procedural forms. [Bannet]

Ultimately, the Clandestine Marriages Act spelled an end to patriarchal and propertied interests and gave birth to egalitarian marriage and the preeminent value of "marrying for love" as opposed to a faith commitment. The Clandestine Marriage Act is thus regarded to have achieved its aim of channeling marriages into an ecumenical set form.

Conclusions

Historically, the Catholic Church has been rather cozy with civil laws concerning marriage, and this is exactly what we see in this brief survey. The social upheaval arising from this alliance is exactly why the founders of the U.S.A. stipulated the "separation of the church and the state" in the constitution (1789).

Looking at this history through a Red Pill lens, we might speculate that hypergamy played a dominant role in the widespread marital fraud occurring throughout the 15th to 18th centuries*, just as it does today. This view would be supported by (1) the large number of abandoned children / orphans and (2) the large number of upper class men who fathered multiple "illegitimate" children over the past several hundred years.*

To summarize, in 1563 the Catholic church cracked down hard on coercing society to conform to its ecclesiastical definition of marriage, and this created such immense societal upheaval (i.e. the Protestant Reformation) that in 1753 the state attempted to create order by basically making it illegal (and shameful) to not have a marriage registered with the state via the Anglican church. The result was that marriage was no longer regarded as authentic unless it was recognized by both the church and state. Thus, the popular concept of marriage shifted from one of commitment, faith, and sexual union to one of jumping through multiple hoops of rigorous formal regulations.

Personal conviction was hijacked to serve the state, instead of God.

Because of some technicalities in church law which were stymied by all the conflict surrounding the definition of marriage and the church's role in officiating and regulating marriages (which continues to the present day), Trent's regulations did not apply to much of the world, including large areas of the U.S.A., until the early 20th century. The current canonical form of marriage didn't come about until 1983, in which women were no longer required to wear head coverings during mass.

These reforms set the stage for the modern church marriage as a show of pomp and circumstance — a gynocentric fantasy parade with no practical usefulness to marriage itself. Only recently have we come to find that what looks good on paper and on stage has nothing to do with the daily reality of marital sanctification (or the lack thereof).

Lest we think that all of this is merely a horror story from the history books, the bad news is that clandestine marriage has transmogrified into something much worse — the C0ck Carousel, Marriage 2.0, the modern hollow cosplay of marriage, Duluth, frivorce, custody battles, and so on. Likewise, the church's and state's hegemonic vying for power and control (under the guise of correcting social and marital ills) continues to the present day, although in different forms and functions.

For example, Joe2 wrote,

> "Cohabitation Agreements or Domestic Partnerships must also legally operate under community property law in California, Nevada and Washington. Those three states recognize that you are not married, but nevertheless will subject you to community property law."

IOW, the state is saying, "You were smart enough not to play our game, but we're still going to win anyway." This pulls the rug out from under those who think that the church and government are NOT trying to "control" marriage. As we've seen in this synopsis, they've ALWAYS been trying to control marriage and it has only made everything worse.

 Probably occurring much earlier if it had been documented.*
 See footnote above regarding illegitimacy.*

Superposition

What is Superposition?

Before I get into the steak and eggs of the conclusions to this mini-series, I want to introduce the concept of superposition which should prove to be enlightening to our discussion.

The superposition principle states that when two or more phenomena are superimposed the outcome is the total of what you would have gotten from each of them separately. In a mathematical analysis, we simply add the two together. The value of superposition is the ability to assess the impact of two different phenomena that might appear to be totally unrelated, and yet both are true and are observed to affect the outcome.

For example, superposition can be observed when two wave pulses interact with each other to create constructive and destructive interference, as seen here.

Superposition can be used to provide a satisfactory answer to the Schrödinger's Cat thought experiment. In this view, both a live cat and a dead cat can exist, but not simultaneously. If we add the two states together, then we have a live cat for a period of time, and a dead cat for a period of time. A third variable is introduced into the thought experiment in which the period of time for each is unknown (usually by placing the cat in an opaque box), thus creating the aspect of uncertainty. The uncertainty is what creates the paradox, not the state of the cat's life.

Another example is Schrödinger's Sexual Marketplace (H/T: Thedeti) in which sex is everywhere and nowhere at the same time, e.g. in the OASIS. Here, sex is purely transactional and happening all the time, but taking place in private. People want sex and are willing to transact for it but they don't want anyone knowing that said transactions are taking place or when or where or with whom. The superposed result is, as we all know, a culture-wide ambivalence towards sexual mores and the degradation of society as a whole. If either illicit sex or the secrecy were removed from the equation, then the superposed result yields MGTOW or the Red Pill, respectively.

Social regulations and church canons governing sex and marriage are based on doctrinal interpretations and maintaining structures of ecclesiastical administration. They are NOT designed on the basis of what "works" towards increasing chastity, marital harmony, and sanctification. So in this case, we are superimposing hard rules over marriage without addressing the question of who's pegging who, which only complicates things further as we saw in A Concise History of Marriage Regulations (2023/6/12). In effect, all the regulations do is assign MORE responsibilities.

In many of my expositions, it is assumed that the superposition principle applies to the metaphysical as well as to the physical. It remains to the reader to decide whether this assumption is accurate / applicable or not.

Superposition NOT Applied to the Christian SMP/MMP is a Recipe for Disaster

We often make a distinction between the SMP and the MMP. We have to do this because modernity assumes extramarital sex is the norm and marriage is some kind of formal ceremony in a church with lots of strings attached.

IOW, we refuse to superpose sex and marriage. We want the sex, but we don't want the responsibilities.

So how is that working out for us?

Looking back on my own dating life in college, I can see that my ignorance of how female attraction works (in combination with being Blue Pilled) made me see things much differently. A lack of Red Pill knowledge about the female nature left me unable to superpose what I was thinking and what I was seeing. It also left me unable to superpose sex and marriage, such that I could navigate the SMP to arrive in a relatively good marriage (MMP).

I didn't know that women have less agency than men do on the average. Without this information, I assumed women had more agency than they actually do, and if they didn't, they were bad / not marriage material.

I didn't know anything about female arousal, or that women want sex as much as men do (but only with certain men). I didn't know AWALT. Without this information, I had the impression that women who expressed sexual desire towards me were bad / s1utty / not marriage material.

Because I thought this way, I avoided those women, which essentially cut me off from ever marrying a woman who was really into me.

Just as the uncertainty in the Schrödinger's Cat thought experiment or the Schrödinger's sexual marketplace creates a sense of mystery, a lack of knowledge left me unable to superpose sexual attraction with marital bonding.

This lack of knowledge is a big problem, maybe THE biggest problem (or at least it certainly was when I was coming of age back in the 80s and 90s). If men knew how these things work, then the SMP/MMP would be a lot easier to navigate and the chances of coming through it all right would be much better.

The secular Red Pill postulates that men need to have sex in order to learn how these things work. This is a "nuts and bolts" antidote to this ignorance (pun intended). A better approach would be to have an older man sit you down and explain these things. Older men should demonstrate to younger men how to arouse a woman, handle her sh!t tests, and so on. We have the idea that this is what PUAs do, but instead, this is what fathers should be teaching their sons, and they should emphasize that this is what marriage is all about, not just how to get laid. But we don't do this because modern Christianity is unable to superpose the Old Testament's description of human nature, sex, and marriage with the current SMP/MMP, and this to our own demise.

Sex = Marriage is Superposed by God

The thing I like about the Sex = Marriage concept is that it superposes the two, as God intended it to be. It recognizes the soul changing nature of sex and assigns responsibilities to it — NOT responsibilities that make things easier for ecclesiastical authorities and lawyers to navigate the bureaucracy, but responsibilities that should be shouldered if we are to expect things to go well.

In fact, we cannot deny it. Sex and marriage are superposed by God, whether we like to admit it or not. For example,

- N count matters.
- Higher N → higher chance of divorce.
- Sexual conduct is directly related to sanctification (1 Thessalonians 4:3-8).

- Sex without marriage, or marriage without sex just isn't right nor is it acceptable. (This is the reason most of us are here.)
- A one-night-stand is a life changing decision, because it affects every relationship that follows after — especially the relationship that is called a marriage.
- Church regulations have an impact on sexual behavior and marital quality.

Couples who have sex for the first time should recognize it as the substance of marriage, and NOT separate the two by seeing sex as a sin and marriage as a distant and somewhat unrelated pie in the sky. This is unrealistic and wrong.

What it is is what you get. A formal ceremony isn't going to change that, but only makes those responsibilities "permanent".

Oh, yeah… THAT'S what we're trying to avoid!

I think this is the same reason many others DO NOT like the Sex = Marriage concept. They want to keep sex and marriage in separate categories and deal with them separately, blithely thinking that this is going to work out somehow.

But thinking this way — refusing to superpose the two — is disastrous. Take a look around.

Apostolic Apostasy

Apostolicity is not as authentic as it appears.

What is Apostolicity?

Derek wrote a summary of this in Axioms of Faith (2023/6/5), but more of the text is spent on qualifying his argument than on actually presenting it. So at the risk of boring the reader with another tedious recital, here I'll try to boil it down into digestible pork and tomatoes for the reader.

Understanding Apostolicity as a structure of doctrinal authority is crucially important for apprehending the wide divide between Cathodoxy and Protestantism. Apostolicity is the main crux of why Protestantism broke from the Catholic Church.

Apostolicity basically refers to what doctrinal authority is regarded as preeminent. In summary, there are two different conceptions of Apostolicity held by Catholics and Protestants, Sola Ecclesia and Sola Scriptura, respectively. (For more information, see footnote on The Solas below.)

In the former view (Sola Ecclesia), church authorities interpret and confirm the authenticity of doctrine which the adherents must then accept by faith. Thus, apostolicity in the New Covenant is considered to be a matter of "succession of leadership", which is why Cathodox churches adamantly claim to trace their papacy to St. Peter.

In the latter view (Sola Scriptura), scriptural hermeneutics are used to interpret and confirm the authenticity of church authority, which the adherents must then agree on by faith. Thus, apostolicity in the New Covenant is assessed by a particular church's leadership's "adherence to scripture". The fact that biblical exegesis is widely open to differing interpretations is why there are hundreds of Protestant denominations.

As Derek and EoS explained, since these are completely different paradigms with different structures of authority, you cannot really have both.

Apostolicity as it Relates to Marriage

With respect to Sola Scriptura, the Bible makes a coherent case throughout the Old and New Testament that Sex = Marriage. Every instance of marriage described in the bible holds to this postulate. Those examples in scripture that do not conform to this definition are instances of sexual sin: adultery, fornication, fraud, incest, r@pe, etc. (The discussion on this topic begins here.) Perhaps this incoherency is the exact reason why these things are sin – because they cannot lead to a sanctified marriage as God created it to be between male and female.

Regarding Sola Ecclesia, the Sex = Marriage concept of marriage was widely recognized by law and society… UNTIL the church instituted matrimonial regulations in 1563, thereby solemnly declaring under penalty of excommunication (viz. eternal damnation), that only those marriages condoned by the church are to be recognized as valid. More regulations were imposed by law (in England) in 1753.

These laws and regulations are loosely interpreted by laymen to mean that only marriages endorsed by the church and/or state are "real" marriages. This belief has since been incorporated into tradition and has spread throughout all of society. In summary, this is the main reason (and perhaps the only reason) why most people now believe that Church / State Confirmation = Marriage and Sex ≠ Marriage.

Since Cathodoxy IS Sola Ecclesia, it is easy to understand how the church ordinated marriage construct arose and its place and necessity thereof. What remains as rather confusing is why the Protestant church abandoned their firmly held Sola Scriptura Apostolicity and adopted a Sola Ecclesia approach in the area of marriage.* It appears as though every Christian church in the whole wide world wanted everyone to forget that Sex = Marriage according to the Bible, no matter which Apostolicity they formally embraced.

The Bitter Fruits

As described in the previous section and in previous posts in this series, social regulations and church canons governing sex and marriage are based on doctrinal interpretations (Sola Scriptura) and maintaining structures of ecclesiastical administration (Sola Ecclesia), and both of these authorities have become more gynocentric, progressive, trendy, and whimsical with every passing decade. They are NOT designed on the basis of what "works" towards increasing chastity, faith, marital harmony, and sanctification, although it is believed and intended that such should be the result, by the inscrutable grace of God.

In spite of the lofty aims of establishing ecclesiastical and legal regulations regarding marriage, in reality it superimposes hard rules and hoop jumping onto marriage without addressing the more fundamental nature of marriage regarding one's sexual history and who's pegging who. The modern Protestant version of this holier than thou acerbity is Purity Culture.

Meanwhile, the larger secular culture has embraced a free-for-all view of sex, having very few restrictions, if any. The juxtaposition of these two extremes, combined with the church and state imposed bifurcation of sex and marriage de jure, and the latent confusion surrounding the central importance of sex in marriage, has led and still leads many to ruin.

It's a marriage because the church and state says it is. St. John's Episcopal Church, Springfield, Missouri (2018/1/20).

Now, 270 years after Church / State Confirmation = Marriage has replaced Sex = Marriage, we can see that the results have been catastrophic. In effect, Sola Ex Iude Dictatum ("dictated by the law alone") has taken precedence over Sola Ecclesia, Sola Scriptura, et al. But the law alone cannot produce righteousness (Romans 8; Galatians 2:15-21). This transplanted authority only elides and complicates things further as we saw in A Concise History of Marriage Regulations (2023/6/12). The emphasis on procedural regulations assigns MORE pressure and responsibilities which obfuscate the central place of sex in marriage.

As it stands today, Marriage 2.0 is a fake mockery and a sham, and the problems are more profound in the church — any church for that matter. Anyone who has been reading Dalrock (Protestant), Wintery Knight (Protestant), Adam Piggott (Catholic), Darwin Catholic, or Zippy Catholic should already know this.

Concluding Statements

Overall, the longitudinal consequences of this confusion over sex and marriage has become The Cross of Our Age (2021/5/3).

Rolling back Feminism or even the Enlightenment would not be sufficient to counteract these forces originating from ecclesiastical schisms that occurred more than 500 years ago. These ills are merely the bitter fruits of both Cathodoxy and Protestantism abandoning the recognition of human fallibility and the power of personal faith in Christ, in favor of imposing conformity on the masses.* We need to return to the elementary faith in Jesus the Messiah. If the law could produce righteousness, then Jesus died in vain (Galatians 2:21).

 Catacomb Resident pointed out that it is all for human political unity in the church.*

The Solas

The Solas include…

1. Sola Scriptura (“by Scripture alone”)
2. Sola Fide (“by faith alone”)
3. Sola Gratia (“by grace alone”)
4. Solus Christus (“Christ alone”)
5. Soli Deo Gloria (“glory to God alone”)
6. Sola Ecclesia (“the Church alone”)
7. Sola Caritas (“Charitable love alone”)

The first three were issues addressed during the Reformation. The first five are identified with Reformed theology. The last two have recently been adopted by the Anglican Church.

Consternated Communications

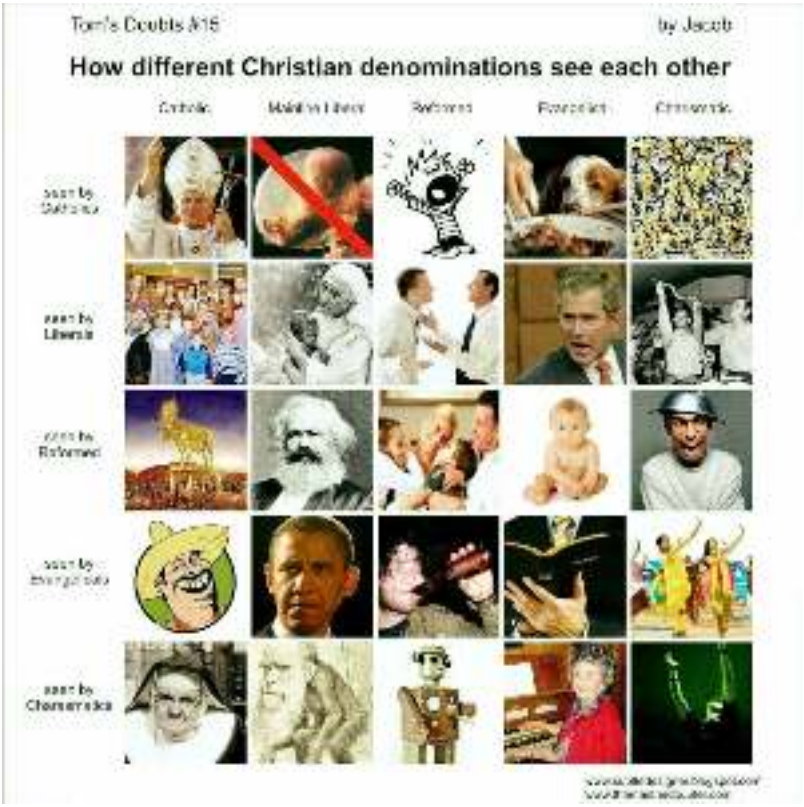
Similar to what happened with the Tower of Babel in Genesis 11:1-9, The Great Schism and the Reformation have divided the organized church, and in some ways have distracted men from having a pure faith in Christ. In response to men's doctrinal quibbles (which are little more than conflicting philosophies that vainly attempt to reconcile mystical truths with human understanding), God has confounded our language in matters of religion, as illustrated by our confusion over different words and terms used to describe relevant issues. These ecumenical differences and divisions among the sects extend to the present day — not only doctrinally and ecclesiastically, but also in language and outlook.

For example, Orthodoxy uses the word "salvation" in the context of the here and now, and "sanctification" is about glorifying God, holiness, and spiritual maturity. Meanwhile, Protestants would refer to the former concept as "redemption" or "regeneration" and think of "salvation" with mental images of St. Peter standing before the Pearly Gates. The words "sacrament" and "sanctification" are not well understood nor widely used in Protestant circles.

So when Cathodoxes speak of "the salvific grace of sacramental marriage", Protestants get their tighty whities in a knot thinking that Ortho's are saying that marriage replaces the blood of Jesus.

Another example is the confusion between Sola Ecclesia and Sola Scriptura, not as an Apostolic authority, but in the practical application thereof in the life of the believer.

Protestants suspect that Cathodoxes are telling people to believe a canned and heavily reconstructed interpretation of the Bible which has been twisted to serve the monetary interests of a distant and uninterested papacy, whereas Cathodoxes see Protestants as a bunch of legalistic yahoos playing fast and loose with whatever scripture pops up in their minds thinking that it was inspired by the Holy Spirit.



Where is Jesus?

So what does it all mean? Which paradigm is “right”?

Using the principle of superposition, they must both be true. To wit,

1. Regarding Sola Ecclesia, Christians, and the church by extension, are ineffective at best, and lost at worst, if they fail to abide by fundamental truths of God’s order in both their personal lives and as a community of believers.
2. Regarding Sola Scriptura, scripture is useless at best, and a stumbling block at worst, if Christians fail to interpret the scriptures correctly.

Where is Jesus?

Upon taking the larger view of faith, it becomes evident that all these precepts and principles may inform some small aspect of our faith awareness, but they also introduce impediments that pose a distracting obstacle to communication and spiritual growth. In general…

- The formal restraints of Cathodoxy are designed to maintain church unity and consistency in doctrine, but the heavy unbending regulations tend to arouse, provoke, or reveal the fleshly nature. Those who can’t toe the line are rejected.
- Protestantism is strong in adaptive creativity, evangelism, ministry, and work ethic, but is weak in resisting divisive or heretical teachings and worldly influences.

Where is Jesus?

A Call to Unity

Instead of converging with secular W0ke Feminism, the various Christian sects should be converging with each other.

In regarding those Christians of other faith traditions, St. Paul warned us that sectarianism is sin (1 Corinthians 1:10-17).

Regarding those within our own church, partiality, favoritism, and treating certain people as if they are of more inherent worth are all discriminations that contravene the scriptures (e.g. Leviticus 19:15; Deuteronomy 1:17; James 2:1-13).

Both sectarianism and discrimination are inconsistent with faith in Christ, and causes one to violate God's law of liberty. It also transforms the church into a worldly clique, thereby attracting more of the same types and repelling the fair-minded faithful.

Much of the contention arises from the fact that each sect believes that their way is the only "right" way to approach how church and marriage should be regarded. Questioning apostolicity is considered to be apostasy, and this is used to deflect attention away from the larger extant apostasy of Sola Ex Iude Dictatum ("dictated by the law alone") which has descended over the church and all of society over the past 270 years.

If we can look past our sectarian indoctrinations and return to the ancient faith, then it becomes apparent that, in respect to the major issues of faith, we are talking about the same things using different terminology and are emphasizing different elements.

Sacramental Soteriology

What is the Eternal Significance of Sacramental Marriage?

In the first post of this series, I posed the question, "Are the Church Policies and Teachings on Sacramental Marriage a Social Polity or a Doctrine of Salvation?"

In this post, I expressed how the Sacramental Marriage construct has value as a social polity. Regulations vs. Reality (2023/5/30) further explored how it could be utilized to guard against fallen human nature and support the sanctity of marriage. The Necessity of Requirements for Sacramental Marriage (2023/6/1) examined how it was a pitch for Cathodoxy and a means of consolidating unity in the church. All in all, I've addressed this construct's value as a practical implementation and some of the problems thereof. The issue of soteriology was addressed in terms how the above relates to sanctification, but was not considered as a doctrinal principle.

Derek L. Ramsey (ramman3000) has taken a leap into abstract soteriological doctrine by continually describing Sacramental Marriage as some sort of rite of passage that is necessary for salvation (presumably according to the Catholic view). For a long while, I thought the same thing (about the Catholic position), due to my ignorance of all things Cathodox. Apparently, Ed Hurst made the same assumption in his post, There Is No Sacrament (2023/5/15).

However, after investigating this further, I believe Derek has misinterpreted and misrepresented Sacramental Marriage.

As I quoted him saying in Regulations vs. Reality (2023/5/30),

> "Salvation under the covenant of Jesus should precede both baptism and marriage, as part of the already established covenant, not sacraments. […] Roman Catholicism and Eastern Orthodoxy falsely assert that marriage and baptism are sacramental, that is, part of saving grace, and thus sacramental marriage cannot satisfy the prerequisite [that Christ be his Lord first]."

Asking "Which comes first, Christ or salvation?" is a circular, morally redundant argument, like asking, "Which came first, the chicken or the egg?" It is a question that assumes a chronologically linear, human instigated cause and effect, rather than the hand of God moving throughout a person's life. Confusion arises because the metaphysical phenomenon which is addressed here has no explanation that can be comprehended by human rationality alone.

Some people might have a born again experience (which is a Protestant characterization of salvation, BTW), but for most, redemption involves continual growth and renewal (a Cathodox position). For some, this may continue for a good majority of their lives.

All Marriages involve Sex, but NOT All Marriages are Sanctified

Concerning the Apostolicity behind Sex = Marriage, in one explanatory comment Derek wrote,

> "Every argument has assumptions behind it. The Sex = Marriage and Sex ≠ Marriage arguments are no different. They both axiomatically assume a particular apostolicity.
> I can't argue Sex = Marriage without also arguing that apostolic succession is wrong. This is obviously true! If I thought Roman Catholicism or Orthodoxy were legitimately God's authorized apostolic representatives on earth, I would be obligated to say that sex does not equal marriage and that marriage is a sacrament of salvific grace.
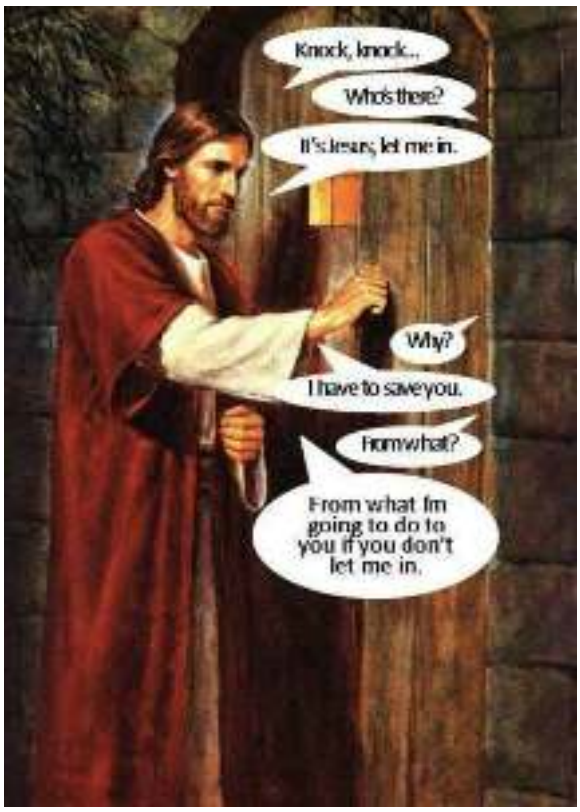
> I shouldn't be blamed merely for pointing out what no one wants to admit, that these matters of extremely great importance to us (i.e. what constitutes marriage) go to the heart of the Christian denominational divide that has existed for over 1500 years."

Although the different sects have different structures of doctrinal authority, there is no such dichotomy concerning Sex = Marriage as this is a more fundamental truth that originated in the Adamic Covenant.



While it is true that Marriage is sacramental / sanctified for some, it is not for others, and this is not necessarily correlated with any particular faith tradition. Whether marriage is sacramental / salvific / sanctified or not does not negate Sex = Marriage as described in the Bible. It only means exactly what it means — that the quality of the marriage is (or isn't) blessed / salvific / sanctified, or whatever. In Christian Red Pill parlance, it means that there is no Headship and it does not fit the Christ : Church :: Husband : Wife structure (which is common, even within the church). It does NOT mean that the individuals are NOT truly married nor can we conclude that such individuals are certainly going to hell. (Although having a debased marriage certainly approximates the experience by comparison.) If the Catholic church refuses to recognize an extra-canonical marriage, it is NOT because the couple is having sex or not, nor is it because they are NOT "truly" married. No. It is an effort to identify the nature of the relationship and to see what needs to be done to bring the couple closer to having a sanctified God honoring marriage.

Closing Statements

From what I have gathered so far, Sacramental marriage, properly translated, is basically just the Cathodox label for what Protestants would call a sanctified marriage. It is not an issue of eternal salvation in the hereafter, as Derek has made it out to be, but one of experiencing the joy and peace of the Lord in marriage, which is what Catholics call "salvific grace", and what I have attempted to capture in the Peaceful Unity marriage model.

Of course, tapping into this Life in the Spirit carries with it eternal significance, and this is how it relates to the Protestant concept of redemptive salvation. That is, it is not THE deciding factor in salvation, but it enhances the sanctimonious qualities thereof.

I am surprised that Catholics have not called out Derek for misrepresenting the Catholic position on Sacramental Marriage, or me for misunderstanding it. Catholic readers have been strangely silent about this whole topic, as though it passes right over their heads without any perception of what is being discussed, or maybe they just don't give a d@mn about what others perceive about their faith tradition. Not sure which is worse. I have made the mistake of assuming that their silence is a tacit agreement.

For all his talk of "unity", whenever Derek L. Ramsey strikes up an argument, the unity falls apart. I kindly suggest that Derek's skills are better suited towards infiltrating non-Christian sites in order to tear down their atheistic / progressive constructs.

Is Sacramental Marriage a Ritual or a Relationship?

I gave my assessment of Sacramental Marriage in the Closing Statements of the last post, Sacramental Soteriology (2023/6/19). But there is still some confusion about whether "sacrament" refers to a ritual or to the nature of marriage itself. Derek L. Ramsey and Ed Hurst are convinced that it is a ritual, whereas DPMonahan (Catholic) has presented a snapshot of Sacramental Marriage as an ongoing harmony (if we withhold quibbling over whether marriage is a contract / covenant / sacrament / etc.). On this he writes,

> "The sacrament is not the ceremony, the sacrament is still the contract, here between baptized persons. It is not merely the moment of agreeing to the contract, but the sacrament is sustained over the life of it (i.e. until one of the persons dies). The point of the ceremony is to help ensure that the contract is formally correct, which is why in modern times the church requires it, but that was not always the case."

St. Wilfrid's Church, Preston, Lancashire, England, built in 1793.

> "Sacraments can fail: i.e. the person receiving the grace can resist it.
> The grace of marriage is supposed to result in greater conformity to Christ and therefore a greater participation in the joy of heaven. So the natural institution of marriage becomes something supernatural, having effects not just in the natural plane but also on the supernatural."

In my writings, I am generously assuming the latter is the case, i.e. that Sacramental Marriage is a sanctified relationship, and that "sacramental" is Catholish for "sanctified" in Protestantese. If not, then I guess it is up to Catholics to sort this out for themselves. I suspect that most of them don't really know or have never thought about it.

Ecumenical Differences

Some big differences that are apparent to me are as follows.

Cathodoxy emphasizes (1) the supernatural phenomenon (viz. the mystery) of marriage, (2) that couples understand what is required of them, and that (3) they take the commitment to heart; whereas Protestants focus on (1) establishing marital harmony and (2) social integration, and (3) individual responsibility.

Another difference is that where Protestantism expects individual couples to work out their own issues in the setting of continued fellowship in the church, Cathodoxy explicitly says it is required as a matter of salvation / sanctification. The formal ceremonies reflect these perspectives.

Of course, all these aspects of marriage and others are important, but as mentioned in previous posts and as we can also observe, both the Cathodox and Protestant viewpoints have their own sets of weaknesses too.

The Penny Wedding, by Sir David Wilkie (1785-1841).

A curious irony about all this is that where Protestantism professes to believe salvation comes by faith alone, and Cathodoxy emphasizes conformity to church sacraments, in practice, it is Protestants who tend to do more "works" in relation to faith, while Cathodoxes tend to coast on church identification and sacramental duties.*

It's kinda like that whack-a-mole game. If one area is restricted, human ambition will pop out somewhere else; whereas if it is liberalized, it will stagnate.

It's also like what I have observed about unique laws that are instituted around the world that are not laws anywhere else: The offense that is made punishable by a weird law is a big underlying problem in that society that everyone would be doing if not restricted by the same law. For example, divorce is outlawed in the Philippines (a predominantly Catholic state) precisely because everyone there would divorce if it were permitted by law.*

Another example is how Singapore outlaws spitting gum on the sidewalk.

Another similar irony is how Protestants emphasize social integration, but Cathodoxy is characterized by more unity.*

Like Derek (Protestant) is always talking about "unity", but he's eager to sacrifice the opportunity for the sake of engaging in polemics, and then justifying this with some religious principle.*

The same old Red Pill axiom for sizing up women also applies in matters of religious beliefs; slightly altered to, "Watch what they DO, NOT what they SAY they believe."

 These are my own first-hand impressions / observations.*

A Peasant Family at Lunch (1895), by Albert Neuhuijs (1844-1914).

Saving Grace or Salvific Grace?

Another big difference and/or source of confusion is in exactly what "grace" means and what that entails, namely, is "grace" a soteriological issue (viz. "saving grace") or is it more about getting something better than what you deserve in the area of marriage (viz. "ordinary grace")?

I addressed this question in the second section of the second post in this series, Regulations vs. Reality (2023/5/30). Readers kicked this around in the comments under this post, but in the end, it was concluded that Catholics, Orthodox, and Protestants seem to be talking about the same things using different words — a problem I addressed in Ecumenical Translations (2023/6/18).

Derek L. Ramsey disagreed and wrote a commentary about this discussion in his post, What is Grace? (2023/6/14).

In his post, There Is No Sacrament (2023/5/15), Ed Hurst stated,

> "Grace … either happens or it does not. God chooses; the initiative is totally in His hands. He puts His grace on you at His whim."

The current broken state of the SMP/MMP makes "ordinary grace" very difficult and/or chancy to find. However, it is also assumed that God is in control and that this is a good thing. If one humbles himself and draws closer to God, then He will draw closer to you. James 4 speaks pertinently to this question, and also to the nature of all the disagreement here. I encourage readers to prayerfully read through this passage. Furthermore, we should be seeking God's love, not wimminz love. This is the basis of what I've called Christian Detachment (2023/1/30). If you're seeking wimminz love first and foremost, then God Himself will make sure that you are disappointed in that endeavor.

Aside from all the discussions about this, I think it is important for the reader to nail down his own understanding of grace and put his restless mind at peace about this. The whole reason many of us continue to hang out in the Christian Manosphere is because we're disappointed with marriage, some even to the point of losing faith, and we are looking for some expression of God's grace to manifest in our lives.

Red Pill truths can certainly offer a bittersweet salve to our pain, but ultimately we are dependent on God. All we can do is sort out the reasons for our sufferings and repent of any shortcomings or misgivings. Considering the state of the church these days, church cannot help us in this regard, other than as a place of fellowship and worship. We shouldn't be relying primarily on church as a crutch when we should be praying and looking to God Himself for help.

Summary of Sex = Marriage vs. Church/State Sanctioned Marriage

A trip to the altar or confessional won't fix marital ills.

Summary

According to the authority of the Sola Ecclesia Apostolicity, the Sex = Marriage paradigm that is presented in the Bible and which prevailed before the modern age was rendered invalid by ecumenical policy at the end of the Middle Ages, and this eventually became the law of the land in the early modern age. In fact, these policies are entirely responsible for ushering in the modern age. As a result, Marriage has become identified with Church / State Confirmation, and has totally replaced the idea that Sex = Marriage.

In late Medieval times, the move towards regulating marriage was a response to the breakdown of societal institutions and all the administrative and legal fuss that ensued. The stated motivation was to eradicate the abuses of the common law system of Sex = Marriage and to protect women from abduction, repudiation (informal divorce, essentially what we would now call abandonment, fly-by-nights, or one-night-stands), and clandestine marriage (any unions not officially sanctioned by the church). This can be compared to the present day obsession with making sure hookups are fair, except with a tinge of Christian morality. They had the idea that requiring the formal solemnization of marriage with a priest as witness would do the trick.

Thus, civil marriage (Sex = Marriage) became 'Ecclesiastically Officiated Marriage' (Sacramental Marriage) with Church laws regulating the terms of both the union and the celebration, followed by state sanctioned marriage (Sex ≠ Marriage), even though this artifice stands at odds with biblical accounts.

This is not a social construct that is unique to Catholicism and Sacramental marriage, as some commenters have maintained, but it is conveyed through both Cathodoxy and Protestantism, and all of society, as I described in Apostolic Apostasy (2023/6/16).

Instead of decreasing the prevalence of 'abuses', the longitudinal effect of dissociating sex from marriage has resulted in…

- The culture-wide bifurcation of the SMP from the MMP.
- Generational rebellion, e.g. The Pendulum Effect.
- The liberation of women to abuse themselves and all of society by removing all mechanisms of restraint.
- An increase in fornication, OOW births, polysexuality, and divorce.
- The debasing of marriage.
- Many ethical conundrums.
- Widespread depression and hopelessness.
- Legal and social prerogatives that are misandristic and are unjustly prejudiced to enable and reward women's sins.
- Further doctrinal compromises in response to the above changes.

Today, amid all of the above problems, the stated reasons for maintaining Sacramental Marriage are…

- To inculcate a higher standard for marriages to be sacramental / sanctified.
- To provide an ecumenical tool to ensure marital sanctity within the church.

But it's a band-aid on a broken neck.

In spite of Cathodoxy's lofty stance of preserving the integrity of marriage as a sacrament, from a comprehensive historical viewpoint, it has done nothing for the integrity of marriage, all things considered. In fact, the church has done more harm than good.

- It has not decreased the prevalence of 'abuses', but has invigorated them.
- Instead of preventing single motherhood, it coddles and celebrates them.
- Instead of reducing the prevalence of OOW births, it feeds the abortion mill.
- It doesn't change the fact that marriage is now a hellish experience for most men.

- It doesn't change the fact that men staying married to ex-s10re wives is an embarrassment to the church.
- It doesn't cure venereal diseases.
- It doesn't change the fact that many married men suffer from liver damage accumulated from drinking as a coping mechanism.
- It doesn't prevent their children's knowledge of God from being defiled, all the while believing it is holy.

I am becoming more convinced that Sex = Marriage is a better way to look at things.

Epilogue

So what does it all mean? Which paradigm is "right"?

Using the principle of superposition, they must both be true. To wit,

1. If you want to maximize marital bonding, joy, and sanctification, and thereby achieve God's best for your marital relationship, then limit yourself to N = 1 for as long as you and your one-life-stand shall live. This is God's will for those called to marriage.
2. If you want to be an upstanding member of a church, have your marriage recognized as legit, and not be continually derided and harassed for living in perpetual sin, then you must observe the Sacramental Marriage rites, or whatever other official assertions or qualifications are required by the particular church you attend. "When in Rome, do as the Romans do."

So the gospel message for those who fail to navigate the broken SMP (which is currently the de facto doorway to the MMP), is that men can receive "God's special gift of (involuntary) celibacy" for a 10+ year span, allowing them to participate in the sufferings of Christ who was likewise chaste. Meanwhile women can slore around to their wicked widget's content, thereby fulfilling the archetype of Idolatrous Israel. Upon marriage, men may assume the honors of wearing the prophetic mantle of Hosea, as he must stay married to a woman who has debased the relationship by riding the carousel before marriage. This in no way negates the years of bitterness and rejection that have shaped one's life trajectory towards being a disrespected and underappreciated workhorse, but at least you'll have a wife to fight with at home and in church and children to fight for in court. You can also join the men's bible study at church and discuss the joys of servant leadership or whatever.

The gospel message for Ch@ds and carouselers who bombed on N > 1 is that if your last coital encounter turns out to be a lasting one, and upon convincing an empathetic clergy member that you have truly forsaken your ways of sin and have "settled down" (Translation: You have accepted the social responsibilities stipulated by polite society's concept of Christian adulthood), then you can go through the ancient magic rites of passage and make your N^{th} "One Flesh" / "playing house" debased marriage officially recognized by God in the eyes of His holy church. This in no way negates the jaded wear and tear you accumulated from racking up N de facto concubines / dannas and then "sending them away" or "being sent away" (repudiation, AKA Biblical divorce), but at least no one will chide you for it with threats of eternal damnation. You can join the church's breakfast club and you can get on with making the best of whatever life consequences you have accrued for yourself.

All jesting aside, it is God Who brings individuals to repentance and Who works to regenerate their hearts by His grace through their faith.

Expectations, Laws, and Policies regarding Marriage

Jack · 22 June 2023 · Archived copy · Original

Featuring a video from Dr. Orion Taraban.

Readership: Christians
Theme: Church Policy and Sacramental Marriage
Length: 800 words
Reading Time: 4 minutes + 10 minute video

I had to include this video as part of this series on Church Policy and Sacramental Marriage, because it touches on many of the points I've been making throughout this series, most notably those contained in the posts listed below under Related.

Dr. Orion Taraban: Why most MARRIAGES FAIL: you are not enough people (2023/6/20) Length: 10 minutes

Dr. Orion Taraban says our current concept of marriage would be totally unrecognizable to people living hundreds of years ago.

He describes how our modern notions of marriage have been burdened by romantic love (c.f. Dalrock's take on Chivalry*) as well as many other exorbitant expectations. He emphasizes the crucial importance of simplifying marriage to being only what it is supposed to fulfill — family formation and the protection thereof.

Going further on this logic, and considering how marriage is now whatever the law says it is, I imagine a revised set of laws to this effect might look something like this.

1. In general, laws refer to marriage as a special protected status.
2. Having marital status is rewarded by various incentives, such as preferred hiring, preferred medical care, tax breaks, special interest rates for home ownership, etc.
3. The benefits of Marital status are converted to life if and when the couple remains together until their youngest child reaches the age of 25 (with the exception of death).
4. Marital status is only granted to couples where the man has no criminal record, no history of psychopathy (e.g. narcissism), and has demonstrated the capability to support a wife and family.
5. Marital status is only granted to couples where the woman is of childbearing age (18-28) and is not infertile.
6. Marital status is not granted to hope-to-be brides who are non-virginal (N > 1).
7. Marital status is revoked for women who have a medical record of abortion (for non-medical reasons) but who did not produce at least one child before the age of 40.
8. Marital status is revoked in the event of adultery. In this case, a new status is then assigned to the woman, perhaps Madame.
9. Marital status is not granted or is revoked for women who bear children by more than one man when the first was not already deceased before procreating with the other. In this case, a new status is then assigned to the woman, perhaps Breeder.
10. Titles associated with marital status, such as Mister and Missus, naturally take on a new honorary significance.

Passing a bill like this would line up fairly well with Biblical proscriptions for marriage and would fit God's natural order rather well too. It would also resurrect society in a jiffy, largely because it rewards contribution to society (in the form of emotionally healthy children) and performance as a successful coupling, but also because it assigns status to being (and remaining) married and producing children. It would also make the current adulterous generation livid with rage, thereby contributing to the holier than thou schadenfreude.

Rather than emphasizing discrimination against non-marrieds, as I described in Church shouldn't be an Elite Social Club for the Married (2023/6/2), I believe laws to this effect would reduce this partiality by providing a venue in which this life achievement is formally recognized and honored.

I was amused by how Dr. Taraban uses "humility" as a mass media digestible euphemism for filial duties and marital sex, neither of which would go over well, and compares it to "work" to get the point across.

The problem of "not enough people" (in a marriage) as he describes it, is not a pitch for polygyny, but is merely expressing the fact that one person cannot fulfill all the expectations that we currently place on marriage. I suppose this was much less of a concern in a feudal society (which was common before the modern age). Couples had extended family living in proximity, people who were well-known and could be trusted. The atomized nuclear model of today has none of these benefits and hedges, thereby exerting more pressure on marriage to fulfill the whole package deal of emotional and social needs — needs that were once fulfilled by the feudal social structure that existed before the modern age. I imagine the current social structure would have to adapt somehow, if the bill proposed above were to be passed.

Starting at 7:15, he summarizes the historical role of the church, as I covered in A Concise History of Marriage Regulations (2023/6/12).

It warms my heart to see secular Red Pill content producers cite the Bible and borrow Christian viewpoints so frequently now.

 I suspect that the introduction of Chivalry and "Courtly Love" by the French nobility in the 11th century, which slowly spread and became popular among the lower classes in the following centuries, contributed to or directly led to the breakdown in societal institutions that were so problematic by the late 15th century.*

Meta Cognitions

Jack · 23 June 2023 · Archived copy · Original

Jack's reflections on the discussion surrounding this month's topic.

Readership: Christians
Theme: Church Policy and Sacramental Marriage
Length: 2,400 words
Reading Time: 12 minutes

Overview

This series on Church Policy and Sacramental Marriage originated as a 6 post mini-theme, but as unforeseen supplementary topics unfolded, it quickly snowballed into a full month's theme.

One of the first tasks in this series was to dig into the status of our ecumenical understanding of Sacramental Marriage, not from a subjective point of view, but as a construct. For the initial topic, I focused on making a distinction between the purposes for which the church might practice the administration of Sacramental Marriage as a construct and how it is regarded and experienced by the layman. Several questions arose which called for subsequent posts. Many other questions came up that were not pursued very far.

Weblogs are not only a learning experience for the reader, but also for the author.

After the first few posts, I discovered that I/we knew very little, and what I/we thought we knew was fraught with false notions. So I had to take everything apart, go back to look at the history, compare Cathodox and Protestant perspectives, and examine everything. After all I have written on this theme, totaling about 20,000 words in posts plus another 10,000 in my study notes, I feel I have only scratched the surface.

Although the response has been dramatic and fraught with contention, the actual understanding conveyed therein has been just as diffuse as my own. Just as I suspected, as stated in the first post in this series, nobody — not even Catholics — really know what Sacramental Marriage is all about, or at least, not enough to communicate it in words that others can understand and relate to.

The efficiency of our communication of this topic was and still is the first obstacle that we need to overcome before we can move on to more pertinent issues, like how to apprehend more sanctity in marriage. Even now, I am not sure we are able to discuss these things in meaningful terms with others. About half way through, some commenters went psychopolemic, and others gave up and quit.

Looking back, this series might be better described as "An Exercise in Ecumenical Discussion" with Sacramental Marriage being only one of the main topics of the discussion.

Conflict

The fray has been pretty bloody. This month has seen four commenters sent to the brig. I had to put more commenters in moderation in one day (2) than I have in the whole previous history of this blog (1).

It grieves me to have to moderate commenters who are insightful and sharp Christians — two especially.

Derek L. Ramsey (Anabaptist) has been emphasizing polemic argumentation from a Protestant point of view, using Protestant assumptions and Protestant terminology. Sharkly (Protestant) uses a soapbox, shoehorn, funnel, and plunger to force his exegeses down everyone's throats. This is why all their arguments are explosive firebombs. There has been no shortage of these kinds of arguments for the past 500 years or so, and it has accomplished little more than stoking ongoing division.

I consider the benefit of such polemics and bombastic brimstone to be limited to an exercise in philosophy and philosophical dominance, respectively. In practice, it is a distraction from and/or an obstruction to online fellowship, repentance, and heart-led living. No argument ever convinced a person to forsake his ego integrity and drop his obsession with rhetorical dominance in favor of having faith.

Is there any Catholic who, upon reading Derek's diatribes, will say, "By jove, Derek is right! CCC#3,129,438 is unscriptural! I'm going to convert to Lutheranism (or whatever) TODAY so that I can embarrass my family and friends and be seen by them as an unstable heretic!"

Is there any Christian alive who, upon reading Sharkly's condemnations, will come to the conclusion that he knows about 13 women in his church who should face capital punishment under the Mosaic Law and then ask his pastor to do something about it?

No. Aristotelian arguments cannot redeem hearts any more than sound logic can be used to create attraction in women.

Unity of Purpose, NOT Unity of Rhetoric

Unity of purpose is what brings people together. Unity of rhetoric is what we call NPCs repeating the platitudes of a narrative and getting angry and offended by anyone who doesn't parrot the same half-baked bromides.

Without a shared purpose, any social enterprise will fall apart. In practice, if there are fundamental disagreements about goals and/or purposes, then there will be a schism. For example…

- If two of the best players on a sports team won't mutually agree on following a strategy because they each want all the glory for themselves, then the whole team loses.
- If a husband wants a Christian / traditional marriage and his wife wants an egalitarian marriage, then a battle for power will arise and marital strife will ensue.
- The early church couldn't agree about church leadership, so The Great Schism emerged in the 11th century (1054).
- Protestant reformers disagreed about the authority of the church and how faith should be exercised, among other things, so the Reformation happened in the 16th century.
- The secular Red Pill insisted that evolutionary psychology, Game, understanding women, etc. was only to get laid and that morality was an obstacle. Christian men disagreed with this, instead emphasizing sexual continence, marriage, morality, family formation, and glorifyng God. So the Christian Manosphere and the Secular Manosphere made a break in 2020.
- Certain commenters vehemently acted in opposition to the purposes of Dalrock's blog and violated the comment policy, so they got canned in 2018.
- Certain commenters vehemently acted in opposition to the purposes of the Σ Frame blog and violated the comment policy, so they got canned in 2023.

This is not rocket science.

Trolling in Effect

Derek's post, Unity in the Church (2023/6/22), shows that he still doesn't get it. He writes,

> "One of the repeating themes among critics of the church is that disagreement is the same as disunity and that conformity is the mark of unity. Neither of these are true statements."

The statements are only untrue within a certain context in which it is assumed that (1) everyone values communication and increasing understanding as the purposes of having the discussion and (2) disagreement is limited to the conclusions and the interpretations of a logical exercise. However, if one's purpose is to (1) disrupt the discussion by stoking tension and unrest, (2) dominate the discussion, or (3) intimidate and/or proselytize others with walls of technicalities and/or hellfire sermons respectively, then the foundational principle of arguing in good faith has been breeched. This is trolling in effect.

Polemics of this style is the grotesque half-breed ogre of evangelism and Platonic reasoning — a mixture of Legalism + Hellenism + Condemnation = Hell. Aristotelian logic and faith mix together like oil and water, so you need to add the emulsifier of a shared purpose to make it all blend together.

Sola Polemica!

In one comment, Derek revealed that he does understand my purpose, but he considers polemics to have greater soteriological value. He even goes so far to say that my purpose is a lie that is outside the authority of Christ.

> "Sigma Frame has an implied mission to be ecumenical: to help men with their relationships first and foremost, regardless of their faith. Whenever I point out that scripture needs to be followed first and not the traditions of men, this derails the discussion."

This is the second time Derek has boasted of disrupting the discussion at Σ Frame.

Derek's approach here is very Sola Scriptura, but it's not very Evangelical.

No one is saying that scripture should be ignored. We unwrap scripture in nearly every post, and I am not following any traditions of men.

> "In other words, if the underlying assumptions in their arguments are invalid, then the arguments themselves are invalid and I don't bother continuing to discuss those topics. Everything should be derailed and discussion should instead focus on correcting the false assumptions."

IOW, social interactions and friendships should be discarded if Derek doesn't approve of their assumptions and they refuse to be converted to his way of thinking.

> "The problem is that Sigma Frame is being utilitarian, not ecumenical. One cannot be ecumenical unless one is part of the church, and to do that you have to be under the authority of Christ. and do what he says. An inter-faith approach is, by definition, a lie, because it says that there is a legitimate path of unity outside the unity of Christ. For Christ came to divide."

Derek's last paragraph is a word salad. Apparently, he associates ecumenicalism with membership to an established church (no, I'm not representing any established church authority), and then he equivocates that church authority is akin to the authority of Christ. This is ironic because he is Anabaptist, but this perspective is very Sola Ecclesia.

In summary, a little bit of Sola Ecclesia, a little bit of Sola Scriptura, and a liberal dose of legalism are what Derek uses to prop up his arguments.

Aside from all the word play, it is obvious that Derek believes Catholics and probably other denominations too are going to hell simply because they blithely accept CCC#2,413,539 without any critical review (when they don't even know anything about it), so he thinks he has to proselytize them to save their souls. This viewpoint is very typical of Evangelical Protestants. Except Derek thinks polemics is going to win minds and souls, so he prioritizes this over having a shared purpose.

This is not Sola Ecclesia nor Sola Scriptura, it is Sola Polemica!

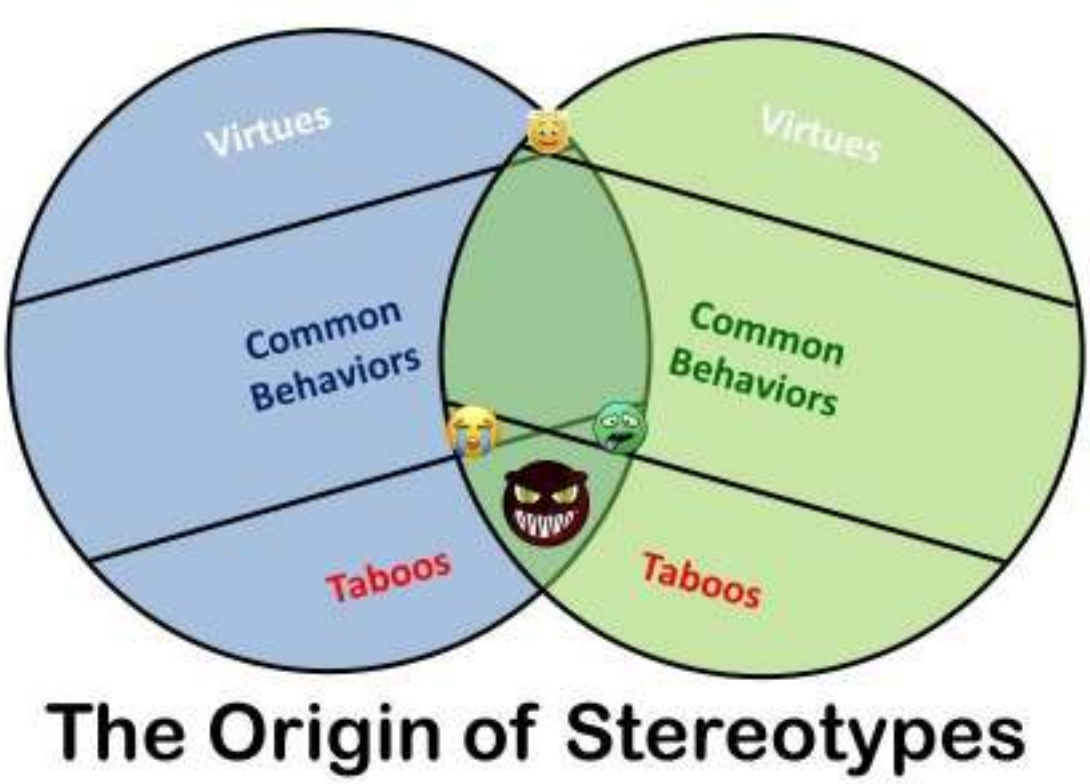
I don't think God works that way. I believe God works through our daily activities and through our relationships with others. I believe God works in us and through us, especially when we share our thoughts and embark on a shared purpose. We discover God's purposes by doing things in life with other people, not by being keyboard warriors.

Furthermore, a man doesn't have the spiritual authority to tell another man he is wrong unless he is first established as a genuine authority in that man's life, and he is willing to work through the issues with that man. That's called ministry. In the absence of this genuine authority, telling others they are wrong is obnoxious, pharisaical, and detrimental. In my writings, I do not claim to be an authority, but I know that truth is it's own authority, and it is my hope that men might get a taste of the truth from reading here. It is only by the power of God that this can occur.

It pains me to see Christians identify with a church tradition, or polemic argumentation, more than with Christ, and to penalize each other for their eccentricities rather than appreciate them for what they're doing well.



A Statement of Purpose

If I were to rewrite Derek's assessment with more clarity and precision, it would be as follows.

Sigma Frame has a mission to help Christian men to renew their minds towards developing confidence and faith foremost, masculinity second, and in the process learn how to handle their relationships better. Men of all stripes are welcomed, regardless of their faith tradition or lack thereof. (Yes, ecumenicalism is implied but not emphasized.)

Men are welcomed to present their viewpoints for the purpose of sharing ideas and identifying underlying assumptions that they may hold. Discussion is necessary to determine whether arguments are beneficial / useful / valid or not. Men should be respectful to other men in the process, whether their arguments themselves are valid or not. The focus should be on building up the individual man, and men in general by extension.

Shared Purpose as an Expression of Faith

For anyone who hasn't figured it out yet, the main conflict between myself and certain inflammatory commenters is one of purpose.

Shared interests are what draw men together. Opposed purposes make them competitors.

Similar to what Ed Hurst described in Dealing with Allies (2023/6/12), I do not expect every man who shares my purpose to fully agree with me in every minutiae of political or religious doctrine before I'd be willing to work with him or hold out my hand to help him. But if our purposes (which arise from faith convictions) are opposed, or trust cannot be established, then I must draw the line.

I know many regular readers consider this online community to be a form of church, (and in some ways it truly is). But it is not my purpose to play the role of an indoctrination inquisitor running about with a bible and a gavel in hand in an effort to censor or stamp out every disagreement with whatever doctrinal or ecclesiastical policy might be assumed. Instead, I see this blog to be more like "iron sharpening iron" — a forum attuned to support men's learning, practice, and training in the area of confidence, faith, and masculinity. It's not a cult or sect. It's a basic thing common to all men. It's not Sunday School, but it IS a Bible class. We reference the Bible as a playbook for life containing plays that have long been forgotten and are now out of fashion. Most anyone can read the Bible and get the notion that they understand how it's supposed to work, but actually, no one really knows how those plays work anymore, at least, not enough to make them work in reality. As a couple commenters have said, right now it's all chance, luck, hit-or-miss, "by the grace of God", etc. We're facing the fact that men have dropped the ball somewhere, sometime before any of us were born, and we're doing our best to figure it out.

Given the purpose and aim of this blog, and through the context of what is posted and commented, it should be evident that we must stick together and support each other. The most on-topic discussion we could have is correcting mistakes and healing wounds. And where it's too late to heal, it is to get us back on our feet and moving towards where we need to be going.

Polemics are off-topic, as is condemning other faith traditions, especially as an outsider who has no first hand knowledge of the situation. Yes, it's fine to mention your religious background; it's fine to point out problems with established churches and traditions; it's fine to construct platonic arguments, but it's not fine to hammer on the law such to prevent others from entering in; it's not fine to arrogantly yammer about religious precepts as a way to insult others who are trying to build hope.

We need to emphasize the common ground — a shared purpose. We have wasted too much time and virtual ink sniping at each other over polemics. We have enough trouble supporting a common goal of facing the evils that surround us.

Synopsis of Sacramental Marriage

Readership: Christians
Theme: Church Policy and Sacramental Marriage
Length: 700 words
Reading Time: 3 minutes

Summary

The average number of views per day for this series jumped 27.1% compared to the previous month, indicating that men are intensely interested in figuring out the fundamental truths of marriage.

Even though it's been a Pandora's Box of contention, overall, this series has accomplished my intended goal of further understanding Sacramental Marriage as a construct. Other highlights include further insights on the Sex = Marriage paradigm and how marriage regulations have shaped the modern age. Also, we have made some small progress on establishing an ecumenical discussion of such things. IMO, the latter development is probably more important than the former in terms of being able to move the discussion forward.

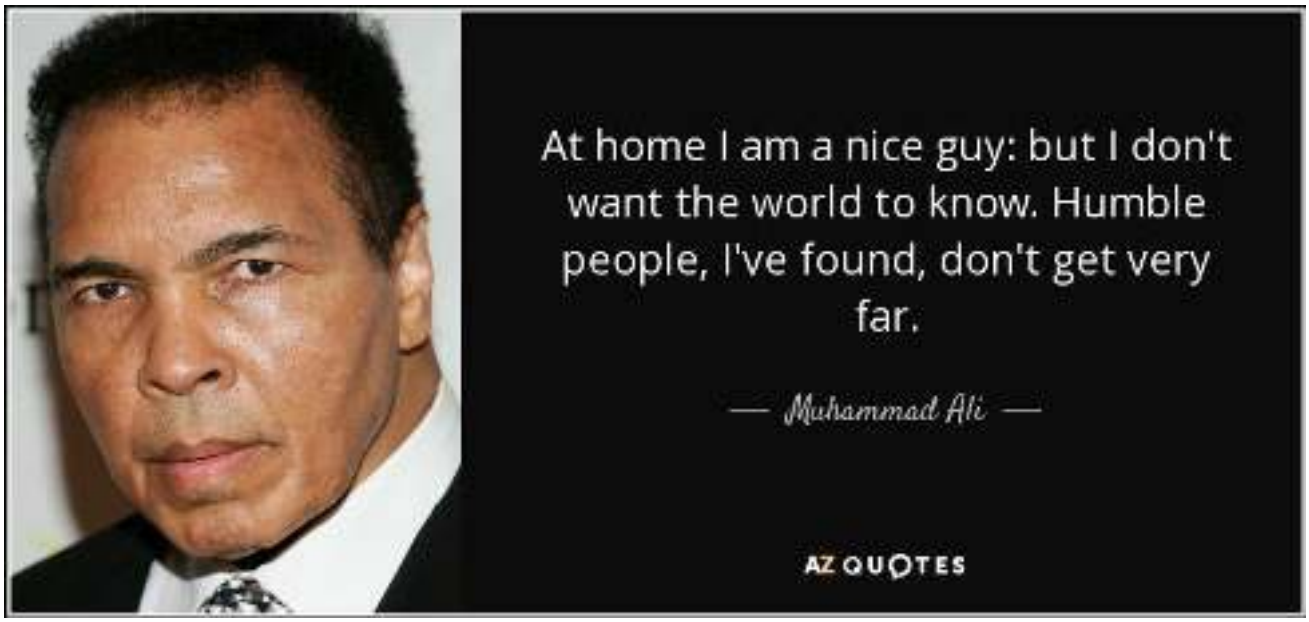
Honor is Denied to the Common Man

In the comments section of Jack's article, Are Men Responsible for Women's Behavior? (2023/2/1), I linked to a Substack article by The Fiamengo File called The Henpecked Hero. I'll excerpt it here, but I encourage the reader to read the whole thing.

> "But why is she disappointed at all? The question of the woman or girl's anger arises and is never answered in any of these programs. Are we to condemn the man because he didn't grovel harder with an emotionally volatile woman? Because he didn't compromise his professional obligations? Because he is so dedicated to his demanding and often dangerous job that he is emotionally spent when he comes home — or because what he deals with is so brutal that he can't talk about it? So often in these scenes of castigation, one is struck by the ludicrous inappropriateness of it all. How dare this girl berate her father? How dare this woman debase her man? And why does he put up with it?"

The article details a common trope in modern entertainment that we've all seen a thousand times. A heroic man who – although flawed – is obviously worthy of respect and admiration and receives both from the men around him, but never from the woman (or women) he loves most. From his women (typically a wife, ex-wife, girlfriend, ex-girlfriend, and/or daughter) he receives nothing but contempt, disrespect, or even disgust.



Many men have experienced this dynamic in real life, which makes me wonder if this is a case of art imitating life, or life imitating art.

We know that popular culture greatly effects the way people think and therefore behave, so we don't want our children or wives to indulge in entertainment that encourages this behavior. Besides, who wants to watch another good man be humiliated this way?

Honor Showcased

Fortunately, there are examples of popular entertainment that honor husbands and fathers.

This article is the first in a series that will highlight popular entertainment from the year 2000 and later that honors fathers and husbands. I encourage readers to add examples of their own.

As we'll see later in the series, documentaries and movies that are based on true stories are more likely than fictional movies to honor fathers. That's because in real life, fathers aren't the incompetent, impotent imbeciles commonly portrayed in modern popular culture.

We'll start with my favorite example, a BBC documentary called Human Planet.

Human Planet is a 2011, 8-part BBC documentary originally narrated by the legendary David Attenborough. Every documentary of his I've watched is about animals or plants, but this one is different. Here, the BBC shows us how people from vastly different cultures all over the world live. In so doing, the BBC ends up telling compelling stories about the extraordinary things fathers do to support their families. Because it's a documentary, and because it didn't set out to portray fathers heroically, Human Planet sets the difference between real life and Hollywood indoctrination in even starker contrast. I assume this is inadvertent, but that makes the documentary even better.

Human Planet used to be on Netflix, but these days it's tough to find on any streaming service. I was able to find a lot of it on YouTube, though. You'll have to hunt this one down to watch the whole thing, but I assure you it's worth the effort.

Without further ado, let's look at my favorite story.

Sailau and Berek

Sailau belongs to a Kazakh tribe who traditionally use golden eagles to hunt foxes. His family needs fox furs to stay warm through the brutal winter. Sailau trains his son, Berek, in the art of falconry, beginning with capturing a fledgling female (they're bigger than the males), then training her, then taking her on her first hunt. The best part is when Berek and his eagle make their first kill. Sailau tells his son, "Now you are a man of your people". The look on Berek's face is absolutely priceless.

Stanzin

Stanzin and his family live in a remote Himalayan village. He wants his children to receive an education, but there are no schools in his village, so Stanzin takes his children to a boarding school 100 Km away. It's a serpentine six-day trek over the frozen (but thawing) Zanskar River, elaborated by freezing temperatures, high winds, and treacherous avalanches.

Sam Niang

Sam Niang risks his life every day to feed his family of seven. The roiling rapids of the Mekong River trap migrating fish, but to net them, Sam Niang has to climb wet, mossy cliffs and traverse the Mekong on a makeshift bridge he jury rigged together in the dry season.

Tete

Tete also risks his life for his family, but in his case it's by climbing 130 ft up a tree with no safety gear and suffering dozens of bee stings to score some honey for his wife and children.

Tete's wife has some great lines.

> "Tete is the best. The kids are not afraid for him, just proud. They say, "Wow! Look at dad!"… My husband has a kind heart. He always brings me honey."

The narrator, though, gets the best line.

> "Tete takes time to savor his success. He's done enough to keep his wife sweet, treat his children and earn respect from his tribe."

Isn't that what all married fathers want?

Hatogo and Sulaiman

I've observed good men work themselves into an early grave to support their families, but nothing quite like this. In the Indonesian island of Java, men mine sulfur in the Ljen Volcano's crater. The gasses that constantly fill the crater, including Hydrogen Sulfide (H2S), are highly toxic, and even if they don't kill the men right away, they destroy their lungs over time. On top of that, carrying 90 kg (about 200 lb) of sulfur at a time in baskets leaves their shoulders scarred, calloused and deformed.

All for $5.00/load!

One of them states:

> "They say this job can shorten your life. I do it to feed my family. No other job pays this well."

But that's what dads do. They sacrifice themselves for their families.

Concluding Statements

Human Planet contains many more stories. Not all of them are about dads, but most are. The documentary is beautifully shot, entertaining and educational, but what I love most about it is the stories of dads from wildly different cultures who are remarkably alike. They all want to provide for their families and earn their peers' respect. That theme is so nearly universal that it's almost as though someone designed it that way.

I shouldn't be surprised anymore when I see God's plan naturally bubble to the top through layer upon layer of human sin, but for some reason I still am. I doubt that any of the men whose stories I highlighted have ever heard the Gospel, but they all bring to my mind passages from the New Testament.

> 14 Indeed, when Gentiles, who do not have the law, do by nature things required by the law, they are a law for themselves, even though they do not have the law. 15 They show that the requirements of the law are written on their hearts, their consciences also bearing witness, and their thoughts sometimes accusing them and at other times even defending them.
> Romans 2:14-15 (ESV)*

Having never read the book of Ephesians, these married fathers nevertheless love their wives and children sacrificially. My experience and observation tell me that is the rule, not the exception, among married fathers, and for that we should honor them.

The Archetype of Father as God

I've always enjoyed watching Jesse Lee Peterson's videos, and for several reasons.

1. He interviews people from all walks of life on his show.
2. He makes his guests comfortable and asks them incisive questions.
3. He lets his guests talk freely and without judgment, thereby allowing an authentic and honest exchange.
4. He really listens to what they have to say. He does not just listen to their words on a cognitive level, but he also listens to what they are NOT saying. He listens to what is deep in their hearts and openly recognizes how that is expressed in their personas. This kind of listening is a lost art and it is an immensely valuable skill.
5. At some point in every interview, he reframes the essence of the conversation in terms of its metaphysical value to one's spiritual life. As a result, it is not uncommon for his guests to dive into some introspective pondering.
6. Finally (and this is the reason why I've written this post), he explicitly recognizes the archetype of father as God, and he explains how a father's influence plays out in the life of an individual. This is a fundamentally important truth that no other Red Pill voice ever emphasizes (other than EoS and Jack on occasion).
7. JLP drives this truth home by presenting himself in the character of a kind loving father.

In many of his speeches and talk shows, Peterson digresses extensively about the important role of fathers and the impact fathers have on their children. Here, I've picked out a couple that I've found to be very informative and inspiring.

Jesse Lee Peterson: God is our Father (2017/4/9) Length: 4:53

Peterson says the average Christian does not see God as their father. He cites a couple reasons for this.

> "They play the role of God in deciding for themselves what is right and wrong."

> "They didn't have a good father on earth, so they turn away from their heavenly Father."

Pointing the Way Back to the Father is a Blessing! Thank You! (2020/12/24) Length: 8:07

Peterson rambles on a bit in this video, but the overall impression is valuable. His main point is that the way parents raise their children has a huge impact on the children's relationship with God later in life.

Case Study – James J. Braddock

Cinderella Man is a 2005 movie directed by Ron Howard and starring Russel Crowe as James J. Braddock, a real-life working class boxer of Irish descent from New Jersey whose professional career spanned the 1920s and 30s.

The movie starts in 1928 with James as a promising, undefeated contender for the world championship with 20 straight wins, 16 by knockout, who's never been knocked out himself. He's making thousands of dollars per fight (a lot of money in 1928), and his wife, Mae (Renee Zellweger), and children live in relative luxury. From there, things take a turn for the worse. James begins to lose in the ring. Then he loses all his wealth in the crash of 1929. Then he breaks his right hand, "his only real weapon", as one announcer put it. Finally, the boxing commission revoked his boxing license.

Indebted, utterly defeated, "all prayed out", and unable to pay for gas, electricity, or even milk, James goes to the docks to compete with other desperate men who – if they're "lucky" – get hired for one shift only to do physically demanding and often dangerous work. With a broken right hand. Most days on an empty stomach.

Obviously, this wouldn't be much of a story if James didn't get a second chance, and he absolutely does. Every movie needs a villain, and world champion Max Baer (Craig Bierko) plays that role here. The movie exaggerates his negative qualities compared to real life, but that's to be expected.

Love

How does Cinderella Man honor fathers? Check this scene out for one example.

The main theme of every movie that honors fathers is love. Obviously, everything fathers do for their families flows out of their love for their families.

But, in addition to love, each movie highlights other themes as well. Two themes that have stood out to me are agency and purpose.

Agency

James' manager and promoter is Joe Gould (Paul Giamatti), whose only weapon is his wit. His wife is Lucille. In one scene, Lucille tells Mae…

> "Can you ever stop yours when he sets his mind to a thing? I don't know who it's harder on – them or us. We have to wait for them to fix everything, and every day they feel like they're failing us. Really, it's just the world that's failed, you know."

James – like the vast majority of Americans in the Great Depression – was fighting against forces over which he had zero control – economic fallout, stupid government policies, drought, etc. So, he chose to fight in the one place where he felt he had some control over his circumstances. James tells Mae…

> "There's still some juice in these legs, and I can still take a few. Just let me take them in the ring. At least there I know who's hitting me."
> "I have to believe I got some kind of say over our lives, that when things are bad, we can do something about it, make things better for our family."

Too many men lie to themselves about what they can and cannot control. They look for excuses to evade agency. James knew you can't make anything better that way. He ran towards agency, not away from it, even if it meant risking injury and death in the ring against men who were younger, stronger, better trained, and better fed than he was.

Purpose

As for purpose, in one interview James says…

> "This time around I know what I'm fighting for… milk."

James and Mae also demonstrate the importance of choosing a spouse wisely. When disaster strikes, some couples shatter, while others cleave to each other even more strongly. The movie shows both types, and James and Mae are definitely the cleaving type. As I keep saying over and over, attraction doesn't keep couples together. Virtue does. A woman may be head-over-heels for you at the beginning of the relationship, but when you suffer a run of bad luck, like James did, if she's not virtuous, she'll activate Briffault's Law and detonate the relationship.

Mae isn't perfect, and the movie doesn't shy away from her flaws, but she's definitely a virtuous woman.

Choose a woman like Mae, who'll cleave to you for better or for worse, for richer or for poorer, in sickness or in health, or choose none at all.

Cinderella Man is one of my all-time favorite movies, an absolute gem, and it's only gotten better with age – probably because I didn't have kids the first time my wife and I watched it, and now we have 10. It's a movie about faith, hope, and love that honors fathers. You can rent it on Amazon Prime, but I'd recommend buying a physical copy, and reading the book.

The Value of the Rite of Passage

Bonding with Dad leads to bonding with God.

The Rite of Passage

The Rite of Passage is an archetypal mythos that, when employed, has served humanity well towards developing masculinity in young men ever since its genesis in the ancient past. One's father plays a crucial role in the Rite of Passage, as he takes on the role of disciplinarian, head, mentor, and teacher. From a spiritual perspective, the father personifies the archetypal role of God.

In Entering Manhood (Rite of Passage) (2021/6/18), I described the value of a rite of passage for young men, and I told of several of my own experiences with my Dad. Caterpillar expressed a desire to create such an experience with his own father. In this post, I'll offer a full response to his questions concerning the Rite of Passage.

> "…what if my father doesn't really understand the concept of a rite of passage? He may have never been through something similar himself."

Philosophical descriptions of the Rite of Passage are intended to convey the theory of the concept to those of us who are more analytically oriented. But having a mental framework of how the activity is beneficial doesn't matter as much as experiencing the personal challenges, the benefits to one's character, and the joys of the activity. You can simply tell him that you want to take a trip together, just you and him, for old time's sake. He should intuitively grab on to the meaning of it, even if he doesn't understand the mythos.

> "You mention the concept of the authority structure but in the case of my own father, he seems content to view me as essentially an equal now that I'm becoming my own independent man (and have out-classed him in certain areas like technology)."

I am guessing that your father is a Boomer or an Xer, and it would not be surprising, at all, if someone of those generations has a feminist leaning, or egalitarian views (as you said, "essentially an equal"). In fact, this would be the default assumption in dealing with someone of these generations. But again, his mindset doesn't matter as much as having that quality father and son time. It doesn't matter because the activity itself is renewing and refining. Once two men get away from the rabble and riff raff, and begin wrestling against nature in the mountains / forests / oceans / etc., all the preconceived notions and social conditioning melts away, and the deeper masculine natures come out. Coming through an adversarial experience together as a team having a structure of authority is necessary to set this in the psyche / soul.

> "Seems like it could become a son-directed activity that flips the authority structure."

It could be, and if so, then that would prove that you've already established yourself as a man. There's nothing wrong with it being son-directed or even son-dominant, as long as you honor your father as your senior.

> "But maybe I could carefully prompt or suggest in such a way that would allow him to retain the necessary authority and make a point to place myself back under his authority for the purposes of the exercise."

This is an excellent approach, and it ascribes honor and respect to him as well. It would be smoother and easier for him to assume the role if the activity is one he is already familiar with but you are not. You might want to do some digging to find out what he was really good at when he was younger and ask him to do this activity with you. Ask your older relatives about this.

> "…what's the point at this time? Is there any value in attempting to do something like that now?"

The impact is greatest when the son is of post-adolescent age (13-16 years old). Keep in mind that during the young adult years (18-24) it is not uncommon for a son to want nothing to do with his father as he is challenging himself to stand on his own two feet during this life stage. But if a father is doing activities with the son during his post-adolescent phase, then the son is less likely to have feelings of shame towards his family during his young adult years. Doing things together later in life still has great value, but the father-son bonding, and the psychological impact on the son will not be as great. It would be best if activities like these are a regular occurrence, like once or twice every year. This is what men do. You and your father will never stop being men, you know.

Don't overthink it too much. It will only demotivate you and slow you down. The major point is in connecting with your dad (or your son) and building character, confidence, faith, self-reliance, and trust. A man's relationship with his father has a hefty impact on his relationship with God, so take advantage of whatever opportunities you may have.

Final Statements

Besides traveling and camping, there are many other activities that would "count" – a hunting or fishing trip, scuba diving, canoeing or kayaking. Other than striking off on a bark chewing, bloody knuckle, "survival of the fittest" style trek in the wilds of nature (which is most appropriate and perhaps even necessary for the post-adolescent young man), having a shared enterprise is the next best thing. Things like remodeling a house (or a large room) or renovating an old house / hunting cottage; constructing a barn / shed / workshop; repairing / restoring a car; a woodworking or an electronics project; building a model; a business or sales marketing enterprise, or other endeavors related to a small business project.

With the exception of scuba diving, I've done all of these things with my dad, my uncle, and an older cousin.

I could go on, and readers could come up with many other types of activities. But moreover, the activity should involve a significant challenge, require planning and cooperation, and have a clear goal and purpose, such that one can say with a confident sense of accomplishment, "We did it!" when it's over.

The effect is magnified when there is investment and risk. However, one needs to carefully decide on the level of risk one is willing to take. If your dad is in poor health or is in his golden years or has important responsibilities that he cannot step away from for a period of time, then maybe it just wouldn't be a wise move to embark on a perilous father and son activity for practical reasons. Choose an activity that is ambitious enough to be a cause, but is also within an acceptable level of risk.

Also, it is not uncommon for elderly men to find the will to live until a cherished and hoped for activity or project is finally checked off their bucket list. This is the stuff movies are made of.

Apocalypto

Apocalypto is a 2006 fiction movie directed by Mel Gibson, and starring no one you're likely to have heard of, mostly because in order to keep the movie as authentic as possible Mel Gibson chose actors of various Native American tribal descents, none of whom were famous in 2006, nor have any of them hit the big time since then. The movie begins with the following quote:

> "A great civilization is not conquered from without until it has destroyed itself from within."
> ~ W. Durant

Looking back, I get the feeling old Mel was trying to warn us.

> "As a civilization comes to an end."

Set in Yucatán around the year 1502, the movie's main protagonist is Jaguar Paw (Rudy Youngblood), the son of a chief (Flint Sky, played by Morris Birdyellowhead) of a small tribe living in pre-Conquistador Mesoamerica. Their lives are as simple as only Stone Age tribesmen's lives can be. They hunt, they make and raise families, they tell stories around the fire, and they tease each other mercilessly. That's pretty much it. Don't get me wrong, Gibson is not Rousseau, he doesn't portray them as idyllic noble savages, but there is an admirable simplicity to their lives.

That all changes when Mayan slavers raid Jaguar Paw's village. Compared with Jaguar Paw's tribe, the Maya are sophisticated, technologically advanced, and insatiably cruel. They kill some of Jaguar Paw's tribe, and capture the ones they think are valuable. Jaguar Paw hides his heavily pregnant wife and their toddler son in a sinkhole. Thanks to his quick thinking they evade capture, but it's impossible for them to climb back out on their own, and Jaguar Paw gets captured by the slavers. Jaguar Paw must escape his captors and race back to his village to rescue his family before the unthinkable happens.

The main themes I saw in the movie are love, legacy, contentment, and natural marriage. I won't go into too much detail, because there really isn't much plot to this movie, and I don't want to spoil what little plot is there. Not that I'm complaining. Once the action starts it never stops, and sometimes that's all a movie needs to be great – a simple, coherent plot, lots of action, and a whole lot of heart.

Love is fairly obvious, so let’s start with legacy. In one scene, Jaguar Paw’s tribe meets another in the forest. It’s a tense scene. Both tribes are obviously acquainted with inter-tribal violence. Flint Sky, Jaguar Paw’s father, attempts to diffuse the tension with the following introduction.

> “I am Flint Sky. I have hunted this forest from the day I came of age. My father hunted this forest with me and before me. Jaguar Paw, my son, he hunts this forest with me. He will hunt it with his son after I am gone.”

That’s a legacy. Even though our lives are vastly different from theirs, we empathize with Flint Sky’s desire to continue his father’s legacy, and pass it on to his children and grandchildren. Our lives are short (theirs were even shorter). If we get to see our grandchildren, that’s a huge blessing.

> [5] The Lord bless you out of Zion,
> And may you see the good of Jerusalem
> All the days of your life.
> [6] Yes, may you see your children’s children.
> Peace be upon Israel!
> Psalms 128:5-6

> Children’s children are the crown of old men,
> And the glory of children is their father.
> Proverbs 17:6

Isn’t that what every good father wants?

More importantly, why would Jaguar Paw return for his family? Obviously, the Maya know where his village is, so his odds of reaching them before the Maya raiders intercept him are pretty much nonexistent. Why not run in a completely different direction and start over somewhere else?

Love and legacy.

Yeah, I know that in real life there would be practical considerations, but love and legacy are the reasons this fictional movie presents.

What about contentment? I don't want to give too much away, so I'll recommend that you pay close attention to the story that Jaguar Paw's tribal elder tells at the camp fire. It reminds me of this Proverb.

> Hell and Destruction are never full;
> So the eyes of man are never satisfied.
> Proverbs 27:20

The decadence of the Mayans contrasts powerfully with the simplicity of Jaguar Paw's tribe. By "decadence", I mean that they have the luxury to ignore reality (so they think). The Maya can afford to pretend that their rituals and incantations change reality. Jaguar Paw and his tribe don't have that luxury. They can't talk an animal into becoming their next meal. They either hunt it down or they starve. They have no choice but to deal with reality as it is, not as they wish it to be. Guess who's happier.

That leaves natural marriage. As Jack has pointed out before, you don't need two Christians to make a marriage that follows the headship / submission, Christ / Church framework. We recognize such marriages in Jaguar Paw's tribe, despite the fact that they have absolutely no concept of Christ or the Church. How is this possible? Because God wrote His Law in their hearts (Romans 2:12-16).

One of my favorite scenes shows Jaguar Paw lying awake with his wife – their toddler son sleeping peacefully beside them – watching his baby "dance" in his wife's belly. Every married father can relate to that scene.

We also recognize some of the negatives of marriage, such as struggles with infertility and in-laws. Watch for a bitter-sweet exchange between one of Jaguar Paw's peers and his nagging mother-in-law. It's one of the saddest scenes in the entire movie.

Closing Statements

I do recommend watching Apocalypto with your older kids, especially teenage boys, and discussing the themes you see with them. Beware that the violence in Apocalypto is not the typical stylized Hollywood violence. The Conquistadors were shocked by the orgies of savagery they found in the Mayan empire. It was so bad that many tribes joined the Spaniards in defeating the Maya. Apocalypto portrays that violence realistically.

Apocalypto is an underrated movie. It pretty much flew under the radar back when it was released. If you enjoy movies with a lot of action and a lot of heart that honor fathers, I highly recommend that you give it a try. You can find it streaming on Amazon Prime Video.

Instilling Legacy, not Leisure.

Theme: Honoring Fathers
Author's Note: Written on 2023/6/26.
Length: 550 words
Reading Time: 3 minutes + 2 video clips.

The Pursuit of Happyness (yes, I meant to spell it that way) is a 2006 drama directed by Gabriele Muccino and starring Will Smith as Chris Gardner and his real-life son Jaden (before he went nuts) as Chris Jr. The story is based on Chris Gardner's autobiography by the same name.

The main theme of the story is spelled out for us right at the beginning – legacy. Chris grew up without a father, and he's determined to break that generational curse. Left out of the movie is the fact that Chris' mother shacked up with abusive men. Consequently, Chris suffered every kind of abuse as a child. Keep that in mind as you watch the movie.

The other themes are love and agency.

As the story opens, Chris is down on his luck. His latest get-rich-quick scheme is failing. Chris Jr.'s mom (she and Chris never married) leaves him with their son (she's no Mae). His car gets impounded. He owes parking tickets and back taxes he can't afford. And it only gets worse from there.

In short, Chris makes a lot of dumb mistakes and he takes responsibility for them. He doesn't give himself excuses. Taking responsibility for his failures never feels good, but it gives a man the power to change his circumstances. Making excuses feels good in the moment, but it neuters a man. There's a shortened version of the following clip in the trailer, but it's worth watching the whole thing.

Chris' question, "What do you do, and how do you do it?", explains his success. He could have envied and/or hated the man in the Ferrari. A lot of men would have done exactly that. He could have attributed Ferrari guy's success to "luck", or "inheritance", or "wh!te pr!v!lege", or any number of factors (real and/or imagined) outside his control.

Chris does none of that. He asks, "What do you do, and how do you do it?" The implied question is "Can I do what you do?" When Ferrari guy says, "You need to be good with numbers and good with people", you can see the gears turning in Chris' brain. He's thinking, "I'm good with numbers and good with people…"

None of this would make a lasting impact without Chris' love for his son. Throughout the movie, no matter what happens, Chris repeats over and over, "My son stays with me." If you can watch the scene where Chris Jr. holds Chris' face and says to him "You're a good papa" and not get a lump in your throat, you may not have a heart. The best part is that Chris and his son are spending the night in a homeless shelter when Chris Jr. says to him, "You're a good papa."

Children naturally see their fathers as heroes, even when the fathers feel like failures. Sometimes a child's perspective can inspire a man to be the hero his children believe him to be.

As of this writing, you can stream The Pursuit of Happyness on Netflix. I highly recommend watching it with your kids.

A Quiet Place

Theme: Honoring Fathers
Author's Note: Written on 2023/6/27.
Length: 550 words
Reading Time: 2.5 minutes + 2 minute video

A Quiet Place is a 2018 science fiction horror film written by, directed by, and starring John Krasinski. Krasinski plays Lee Abbot, whose wife, Evelyn (Krasinski's real-life wife, Emily Blunt) and three children are among the few human survivors of an alien invasion. The aliens are blind, but they have extremely acute hearing, and are so heavily armored that they're nearly indestructible. They're also fast, their front limbs are essentially scythes, and they behave like relatively intelligent predatory animals. At the beginning of the story, most of humanity has been presumably eaten, and the Abbots are eking out an existence on an abandoned farm.

Contrary to most fictional dads of the last 35 years, Lee is brave, competent, resourceful, highly intelligent, selfless, and unabashedly masculine. He's not an action hero. He's not trying to fight the monsters, he's trying to hide his family from them. He's an ordinary man trying to raise a family under nightmarish circumstances. The circumstances are a fantasy, but imagine an ordinary father trying to raise his family during the Babylonian siege of Jerusalem, or as the black plague ravaged Europe, or during the Congolese Civil War. (Which one? Any of them.) It's that kind of vibe.

The themes I see are love, competence, and selflessness.

In most modern movies, Evelyn would be a girl boss constantly rolling her eyes at her oafish, cowardly husband before single-handedly saving the family from her husband's incompetence. Not here.

Another movie trope that irritates me like beach sand in my shorts is the badass post-apocalyptic feminist. The most egregious example is the biker grandmas from Mad Max: Fury Road. Not here, which is refreshing, because there are no feminists in collapsed civilizations. There are many feminists in pre-collapsed civilizations, but given their girth, they're usually the first to be eaten post-collapse. The rest quickly find their inner damsel in distress.

Again, contrasting with most female characters of the last 35 years, Evelyn is feminine, loving, caring, and nurturing. She even wears a dress. She's strong, but she's the kind of strong that gives birth alone, in a bathtub, sans epidural, while struggling to remain quiet.

Whether they meant to or not, the movie demonstrates where "gender roles" came from, and it isn't the oppressive, wh!te suprəm@c!st, heteronormative patriarchy. It's biology. In the state of nature, pregnancy, child birth, and caring for infants (they have the feed bags, after all) incapacitates women for years. That leaves dads to provide for and protect the family from monsters, be they saber tooth cats, the Mongol Horde, or indestructible aliens who arrived in an asteroid.

Finally, there's the "I've always loved you" scene. That's all I'm going to say about that.

A Quiet Place is a rare gem these days. I highly recommend it, even if you're not a fan of the genre. You can find it streaming on various platforms, but you'll have to pay for it. The sequel is good, but not as good as the original, and the theme of honoring fathers is not as strong in the sequel.

Thirteen Lives is a 2022 true life survival drama directed by Ron Howard (who also directed Cinderella Man) starring Viggo Mortensen, Colin Farrell, and Joel Edgerton.

The story begins in June 2018, when a boys' soccer team in Thailand went to explore a cave with their coach. Monsoon rains arrived unexpectedly and trapped the 12 boys and their coach in an air filled chamber deep in the mountain.

An international rescue effort quickly coalesced, racing against time and rising flood waters to rescue the boys and their coach, including Royal Thai Navy SEALS, American military, and expert cave divers from the UK and Australia.

I'm kind of cheating with this movie review, because only one of the main characters is shown to be a father (although many of them are in real life), and it's not a central part of the story. What I love about this movie is that it honors men, and fathers are men, so I hope the reader will cut me some slack.

The main themes I see here are love, mastery, and faith.

In the other movies I reviewed, love of family drives the plot. In this story, love for one's neighbor, and love for the stranger (ex-race / foreigners / out-group individuals who are regarded as a fellow man) drives the plot.

> You shall not take vengeance, nor bear any grudge against the children of your people, but you shall love your neighbor as yourself: I am the Lord.
> Leviticus 19:18 (NKJV)

> The stranger who dwells among you shall be to you as one born among you, and you shall love him as yourself; for you were strangers in the land of Egypt: I am the Lord your God.
> Leviticus 19:34 (NKJV)

Love for their neighbors drove thousands of Thai people to volunteer to do whatever they could to rescue the boys and their coach, and so did the love for the stranger. Several of the boys, and their coach, were refugees from Myanmar. The foreign boys' families feared that the Thai people would decline to rescue their boys, but that's not what happened. Having never read Leviticus, the Buddhist people of Thailand loved their neighbors and the strangers among them as themselves in obedience to God's law.

This is not an argument for Ecumenical / Unitarian claptrap, but a confirmation that God did in fact write His Law in all men's hearts (Romans 2:15). In fact, two of the Royal Thai Navy SEALS (Saman Kunan and Beirut Pakbara) died due to their efforts.

> Greater love has no one than this, than to lay down one's life for his friends.
> John 15:13 (NKJV)

The cave divers weren't even Thai.

That brings us to mastery.

Men used their expertise in a myriad of fields to assist. The SEALS and cave divers are the focus of the movie, but we also see workers operating pumps to prevent the cave from filling with water. A hydrologist enlists local men to divert water away from the mountain. They run out of pipes, so a local farmer teaches them how to improvise pipes from bamboo. Others set up tent kitchens to feed the thousands of volunteers. Not every man's contribution is as film-worthy as those of the SEALS or the cave divers, but take one piece out of that Jenga tower and the whole thing collapses. Competence in useful skills is how men earn respect from each other, but these men went beyond competence to the realm of mastery.

That brings us to faith.

No matter how skillful these men were, they were all in over their heads. The SEALS were master divers, but they were trained in open ocean diving, not cave diving. Despite the best efforts of the hydrologist, his improvised team, and the pump operators, the cave was filling up anyway. Worst of all, none of the boys had ever scuba dived. Most couldn't even swim. And they were somehow supposed to make an extremely dangerous, supremely technical dive that took expert cave divers five hours each way and killed two Navy SEALS? How?!

I had never heard of the solution these men devised until I watched the movie, and I assure you it is utterly insane. I request that readers who know not spoil it for others, because it's mind-blowing. There was no reason to believe that it would work, and where reason proves inadequate, faith takes over.

Most movies these days portray men as stupid, evil, or both. We know that's a lie. Most men are respectable, hardworking, and driven by love. Because Thirteen Lives is based on a true story, it portrays men as they really are. Better yet, it portrays men rising to a challenge no one could have foreseen under atrocious conditions. I watched the movie with my entire family, and even my little kids enjoyed it. It was easy for them to identify with the boys trapped in the cave, but it wasn't too scary for them to watch.

You can find Thirteen Lives streaming for free (with a Prime membership) on Amazon Prime Video.

Red Pill Song Review: Can't Have Mine (Find You A Girl)

caterpillar345 · 8 July 2023 · Archived copy · Original

Positives and negatives of the 2022 Dylan Scott tune.

Readership: All
Theme: Honoring Fathers
Length: 1,300 words
Reading Time: 6.5 minutes + 3.25 minute video

I am a country music fan and I enjoy listening to FM radio so that occasionally I can stumble on new music (or older music I've not heard). While driving recently, I heard, for the first time, the 2022 song Can't Have Mine (Find You A Girl) by Dylan Scott and my ears perked up at several lines. I thought it would be enlightening to evaluate the song lyrics in light of the many topics here at Σ Frame.

In this post, I'll discuss the surprisingly based lines that align with the Christian Red Pill and then discuss the lines that trot out the common tropes of Blue Pill thinking. At the end, I'll summarize and give the song a rating.

Surprisingly Based Lines

This line is included in the chorus and repeated three times.

> "Find you a girl that loves her daddy"

Not every girl really loves her daddy. Or even thinks of him so affectionately as to call him "daddy." Fathers are denigrated in the culture. This line may well just be a platitude where the girl "loves" her daddy but not with any respect, admiration, or depth. But nevertheless, as we've discussed in the Manosphere, it is likely a green flag if a woman has a good relationship with the primary masculine role model in her life.

Father and daughter relaxing on a rocky beach by the sea and having time together.

> "And talkin' 'bout babies makes her happy"

To even hear this statement in popular culture is surprising to me. Our society worships at the altar of Strong Independent Women who advance in their careers at the expense of motherhood, generally denigrates mothers, motherhood, and stay-at-home-moms, and views children as an impediment to a "happy, fulfilling" life for both men and women. A woman who welcomes and looks forward to having children of her own, especially if that is nuanced with the idea of having "HIS babies", is waving at least one green flag for a man interested in a God-glorifying marriage.

Here's another line that is included in the chorus and repeated three times.

> "Find you a girl that likes to do all the things you love to do"

This describes a woman who is fitting into the man's frame and possibly sharing his purpose. There are many songs where the lyrics revolve around the man acquiescing to whatever the girl wants / is doing / likes / etc. (e.g. Yeah by Joe Nichols). But in this song, the narrator effectively advises to find a girl who wants to join the man's team!

> "And even on your worst day
> She still thinks you hung the moon"

She's willing to stick with her man even when things don't go well, when he fails at something, or even when he's just not being his best self. She chooses to see the best in him and to overlook his faults. It even speaks to the line in the traditional marriage vows:

> "…for better or worse…"

We've learned about how the woman's choice in attitude, commitment, and contentment plays a crucial role in the success of an LTR.

> The wise woman builds her house but the foolish tears it down with her hands.
> Proverbs 14:1

As an aside, I love clever call-backs in songs. I believe this line is a reference to either Rope the Moon by John Michael Montgomery or to She Thinks She Needs Me by Andy Riggs. Both of which are uncommon songs that demonstrate the powerful effects of a woman who really believes in and supports her man.

> “Find you a girl that’s like fine wine that just gets better with age”

This is talking about a trajectory and possibly a growth mindset. The relationship depth and closeness grows over time. Since we know women’s SMV declines rapidly after her 20s (at best), this line would have to be implying that she continues to put effort into herself, the relationship, and other attributes / skills / etc. that contribute to the delta between her SMV and her MMV. Things like serving her husband, being a good mother, etc.

Common Tropes

Now on to the common Blue Pill tropes that inevitably must be sprinkled throughout almost every song ever written.

> "You could find you a girl on a Friday night
> Dancin' in the back of a bar
> A Sunday morning hands up high
> Singin' front row in the choir"

And in the chorus:

> "Gets wild on the town but still loves Jesus"

The common trope of the nominally "Christian" girl who is in church on Sunday but lives up her worldly pleasures the rest of the week (and probably enjoys her rides the carousel) despite her ostensible love for Jesus. So she's leading at least somewhat of a double life.

However, I do find a possible charitable view of these lines.

Depending on the man's personality, having / being with a woman who is adventurous with an innocent, vivacious, open-hearted love for life, especially if those adventures are at the side of her man (the idea of being wild on the town or dancing in the back of a bar) but who is also tempered with a humble faith in God and deference to her spiritual head, is a very alluring pairing.

There are also two references to religious faith – "still loves Jesus" and the reference to her singing in the church choir. The implication being that she has faith / a relationship with God and that she is participating in her church congregation. These two things would, at least theoretically, be a green flag for a man desiring a God-glorifying marriage.

Of course, as discussed before, the likely reality is that she puts on appearances on Sunday morning to assuage her guilt from the "fun and games" from Friday night until Sunday morning.

> "One that's worth the wait even when she ain't on time"

(Aside: This line may be a reference to Waitin' On A Woman by Brad Paisley.)

It's a fairly common trope in country music (and in our broader culture) to defer to a woman's frame by not expecting her to be on time for things and that it's OK because she's a woman and that's just how it is (i.e. pu$$y power, as thedeti is fond of saying). In reality, aside from deferring to her frame, this is disrespectful to a man's time and injures his reputation by causing him / them to be late.

Charitably, there is an insinuation that she's worth the wait to find in the first place, which fits with the overall theme of the song. But nevertheless, they have to soften the blow of the good lines by slipping a little "normal" disrespect into the chorus to be repeated three times. We just can't bring ourselves to not subtly chip away at men and pedestalize women!

Summary

It seems the culture is getting tired of the W0ke Feminist anti-Patriarchal messaging. But because it's sort of a culture-wide game everyone is playing to avoid being labeled a m!s0gyn!st / etc. / etc., anything attempting to participate in popular culture can only say so much against the prevailing narrative. Anything even slightly conservative / Red Pill has to be couched in a healthy mix of common tropes in order to be palatable.

Despite this, we ought to be grateful for any positive movement, even if it's not as much as we'd like. And after all, I need something to listen to that doesn't make me roll my eyes all the way back into my head after hearing the first verse!

Dozer Score

On a scale from flaming liberal feminist to hard right patriarch, I'd say Dylan Scott is like the president of the local university chapter of the "Young Americans Forum."

The Godfather undermines Fatherhood.

Getting Snipped is now the quickest path to becoming a High-Value Man? (Rollo Tomassi's views on vasectomy.)

Readership: All
Theme: Honoring Fathers; Cultural Demise
Length: 2,000 words
Reading Time: 10 minutes + 18 minute video

Introduction

In May of this year, Rollo endorsed men getting a vasectomy in a tweet (which has since been deleted) in which he said this was necessary to become a "high value man".

The response? He was roundly hit with criticism and incredulity from all over the Men's Sphere.

In case you missed it, here's a video commentary from MTR covering Rollo's spar with Destiny and Sneako on the topic.

Mediocre Tutorials and Reviews: Red Pill Godfather EXPOSED by Sneako and Destiny (2023/5/14) Length: 17:52

The Godfather really goofed on this one.

Confused about His Role

The main contention arose because people naturally read Rollo's tweet as a blanket truth coming from the Godfather. However, a tweet is insufficient to fully explain all the specific contexts and motivations that are assumed in his statement. Things only got worse when he refused to walk back on the statement in his tweet — that getting a vasectomy is the way to become a high quality man. Instead, he continually buffered and couched his statements, saying things like, "It's data, not advice", even though the only way younger men could interpret his stance as an RP Elder is as advice. Instead, he should have explained all the assumptions and conditions under which his statement is true, and compared that to all the assumptions and conditions under which it is NOT. But of course, this is too much information to put into one tweet.

The way I see it, Rollo is suffering from a lack of social self-awareness, resulting in poor communication. Rollo's current role in the Manosphere is different from what it was in the days of the Old Manosphere, and he's having trouble with the PR details of recasting himself as a Red Pill authority to newer generations. As before, he is broadcasting himself as a philosopher who is an expert on intersexual relations, but he fails to acknowledge the immutable authority of his words as the last standing godfather of the classic original Manosphere. (The other two were Roissy and Roosh.)

Another issue is that he is using certain catch phrases that each man could interpret differently (e.g. "high quality / value man"), and making broad statements without defining the context. This is one thing Kevin Samuels always took care to avoid. He defined the term "High Value Men" in nearly every discussion he had, because he knew that his viewers would have their own ideas or else define it to be whatever they wanted. Rollo seems to be aware of this, but he fails to explain the psychological dynamics at play within his audience and break the fifth wall* effectively (with respect to men's interests).

This doesn't fly with his younger audience of Manospherians. They are intent on getting actionable knowledge, and miss the fact that he's just tossing out ideas and theories without framing it in the context he assumes, and without much thought about how this will be received by his audiences.

Rollo is no longer just a top rate Red Pill philosopher. Now, he is also an elder, a teacher, and a mentor, whether he likes or wants these roles or not. Now as a sage authority, Rollo must pay excruciating detail to every word he says and how that will be taken by his audiences, much like what he has done in his writings. Rollo should have stuck to blogging and writing books. His books and blog posts will outlive him, but his podcasts won't. But this will not change as long as his podcasts are earning him $$$.

One thing Rollo's critics get wrong is in thinking he is a Boomer. (Rollo's birthday was on 1969/4/2, making him an Xer.) Or maybe this is merely intended as a slur on his age.

 Breaking the fifth wall is to address the meta dynamics and the motives within the context of the current discussion. This is a key element of maintaining an effective argument in the 21st century.*

Rollo's Views on Vasectomies

I decided all this contention was worthy of digging into Rollo's views of vasectomies in the past, so I swallowed my deep revulsion of this topic and took a dive into the annals of The Rational Male. Relevant excerpts follow.

> "There is no more permanent a devotion to the male sexual strategy than to get a vasectomy and thus deny a woman the ultimate culmination of her own. If you ever want to experience just how close to livestock the Feminine Imperative considers men to be, just try getting a vasectomy before you're married or without a wife's explicit and written consent. Legally it's easier to geld horses or neuter dogs."
> The Rational Male: Making Up for Missing Out (2015/3/16)

In general, Rollo supports vasectomies as a form of responsible birth control for men who are sexually active and do not want an unintended pregnancy. But in reality, this is only an appropriate choice for men who do not want to have children EVER. Furthermore, this is a secular view that is explicitly anti-family.

> "One reason I don't think Vasalgel will be legalized for mass consumption (or will eventually meet stiff legislative resistance) is because it puts a measure of Hypergamous control in the hands of men. We've already seen attempts to make 'sex by deception' equitable with r@pe. And we've already seen the legislation that makes even approaching a woman on the street equitable with a hate crime. My guess is that not disclosing a guy is on Vasalgel or he's had a vasectomy could easily be construed as such too."
> The Rational Male: Spare the Rod,… (2016/10/2)

In the two quotes above, Rollo breaks the fifth wall by presenting a vasectomy as a way for men to take control of their reproductive choices in a way that allows them to continue having profligate sex, but still avoid being manipulated, pressured, or used by women or society at large.

IOW, Rollo is assuming that a man's motivation is to have as much illicit sex as possible without being held accountable for it. This is basically the male version of the feminist standpoint on abortion and birth control.

Another thing implicit to the context he describes is that said men are immersed in a gynocentric culture that penalizes men for being fathers instead of honoring them.

I would agree that under the above assumptions / conditions his statement may very well be true for such a man.

However, outside of this context, in fact, taking this route is throwing the baby out with the bathwater, quite literally.

> "You will never be appreciated for your sacrifices, and certainly not while you're making them. Your presence is only as superfluous as you allow it to be. While you will never be appreciated for it in any measurable sense, you will be liable for it, so my advice is to make the most of it in a Red Pill respect. Your reward, your motivation, for being a Red Pill parent and a positively masculine example in your kids' lives needs to come from inside yourself because it will never be rewarded by a feminine-primary social order. If you don't think you will ever find being a parent intrinsically rewarding, get a vasectomy now because > it will never be extrinsically rewarding."

> The Rational Male: Red Pill Parenting – Part II (2015/10/14)

Here, Rollo focuses on personal rewards and takes a negative view of being a parent, but he fails to consider the metaphysical, psychological, and spiritual benefits of being a virile man and being a father, e.g. the calling of Headship, the development of identity, having a sphere of authority, the joy of having children and grandchildren, and so on.

> "In Selective Breeding, I made the argument that Women's Existential Fear is the possibility of having her Hypergamous filter (feminine intuition) fooled by a Beta male and becoming saddled with his shitty genetics for the rest of her life. This is a primal, evolved, fear for women that manifest itself, often unconsciously, in many of women's behaviors that we either take for granted or we have social conventions that accommodate them. Decidedly gynocentric societies will legally mandate against this existential fear.
> But what about women who are already married or pair-bonded with men that their evolved subconscious knows is a suboptimal choice for her? What about women who are trapped in a marriage with a guy that her hindbrain confirms is not the 'best she can do'? How does that primal fear of being saddled with a faithful Beta manifest itself?"
> The Rational Male: Unconscious Contempt (2019/11/15)

Rollo goes on to answer these questions by saying in so many words that women feel comfortable – to the point of taking it for granted – in expressing passive-aggressive contempt for their husbands and veiling this contempt in humor and teasing. This is the main point of his entire post.

In the same post, he writes,

> "I feel it's incumbent upon me to address what will be the predictable binary responses of literalist critics here:

- No, I'm not saying don't get a vasectomy.

- No, I'm also not saying that if you did get a vasectomy you're a pathetic loser Beta.

Judging by his other views expressed, these statements are merely politically correct buffers intended to reduce backlash. A comprehensive understanding of this post as well as his other writings, tweets, and statements in recent podcasts illustrates that he IS telling men to get a vasectomy IF they want to be a high value man, and yet, if you've read any of his works and have paid attention, it is understood that they are pathetic evolutionary losers if they DO.

So how else are younger men supposed to interpret this double talk?

They are right to castigate Rollo on this point.

Returning to the last part of the last essay quoted above, Rollo smears a salty salve on the slashed scrotum sack as follows.

> "I will however point out that when I see stories about how a Beta husband did come to the decision to get a vasectomy there are always a lot of subconscious reasonings that go along with it. For all the notions of egalitarian marriages and self-praise for being rationally evolved above the hindbrain interpretations, on some level of consciousness a man electing to sterilize himself is a confirmation of the value he puts in his masculinity. This is why women think it's funny to ridicule your impotency. Her hindbrain has 100% confirmation that you know your reproductive viability has no value.
> A man's reasons for getting a vasectomy may be valid and in some ways empowering for him. I imagine there's at least some confidence to be derived from knowing you won't be held responsible for any "accidental" pregnancies. I get why men would opt for it, but the way a woman's feral brain interprets a man sterilizing himself is what I'm getting at here. You may think, "Well, I don't give a damn what women think about it." Fine. Totally valid, but I'm outlining a woman's instinctual response to a man permanently preventing his own reproduction. There is a subcommunication underneath this decision that denotes emasculation, and this is what women resent."
> "In some ways I see wives celebrating their husband's vasectomy for reasons that have nothing to do with improving their sex lives. In the original Twitter thread, I had men tell me that they got a vasectomy at the suggestion of their wives, believing it would lead to greater sexual frequency (or any sex in a sexless marriage) > only to admit that it never improved anything for them. So, why the goading to get a vasectomy? The dots I keep connecting are a subconscious desire on the part of women to geld a husband to ensure he never reproduces with other women. It's almost like a service she's doing for the Sisterhood. She's making sure that her mistake never becomes any other woman's mistake."

> The Rational Male: Unconscious Contempt (2019/11/15)

So, if I am getting this right, Rollo thinks Alpha men are maximizing their sexual strategy by getting a vasectomy. But Beta men are a laughingstock and are cucking themselves for doing the same.

Conclusions

For many men, including myself, being a father is one of the key achievements of a life well lived. But Rollo offers a no-win strategy for those men who feel called to be a father.

Whether being a parent is intrinsically or extrinsically rewarding or not is unique to each man, and this is a separate (but related) question from the younger men's focus on becoming a high quality / high value man. Rollo failed to make this key distinction.

Also, Rollo fails to recognize the fact that men's SMV rises as they age and thus, getting a vasectomy at a young age could jinx a man's strategy later in life.

MTR suggested other ways for men to take responsibility for their sexuality (e.g. abstinence, condoms) without getting the snip. But Rollo never satisfactorily answered the question of why a vasectomy is absolutely necessary for a man to quickly become "high value".

In all, I'd say Rollo is taking his evo-psyche philosophies to their fullest logical conclusion as applied ONLY to the present SMP in the debauched West, but he fails to reconcile this with the foundational principle that evo-psyche assumes reproduction as an incontrovertible necessity.

Fulfilled Prophecies

Over 5 years ago, in Zeitgeist Report 2018 (2018/4/15), I predicted the following. (My username was Wayne back before I adopted the Jack of Diamonds as the avatar of Σ Frame in November 2018.) Note that this post was written a few months before the persecution and shakedown of the Manosphere during the latter half of 2018.

> 2016-2024? The waning influence of the Manosphere. Red Pill Awakening continues and spreads to the general populace amidst continuing societal decay. Many women begin to respect and appreciate the Red Pill perspective. The sun finally sets on PUArtistry, as men segregate into different archetypes of SMMV hierarchy. The rise of Nutraditionalism.
> 2024-2032? The Reset? Crash and let 'em burn, the Phoenix rises.

Comments under this post were sparse. Jason, GunnerQ, and Kentucky Headhunter disagreed / doubted all this. Not one commenter agreed.

In the same post, I also put together a list of Future Projections and Prognostications about where society was expected to go in the near future, all which appeared from the Far Right / Manosphere at that time.

- An increase in the frequency and social acceptability of Open Hypergamy.
- Increasing castigation and emasculation of men and fatherhood
- Mass Immigration changes demographics, cultures and traditions.
- Miscegenation on a larger scale.
- Decline of the White Majority
- Decline of Christian Influence
- Decline of Protestantism and the rise of more conservative religions, like Orthodox. Example here.
- Persecution of Christians – As of late, the persecution, rape and genocide of Christians is reaching record proportions, especially in the middle east and Africa.
- Persecution of Red Pillers – As Scott and Boxer have pointed out, Red Pill adherents are catching an ever increasing amount of flak from opposing segments of society, e.g. feminists, liberals, media conglomerates, 'big brother' entities, (whatever one might believe they are).

All of these things have transpired, just as predicted. (At the end of the post, I said I would update this post, but in fact, I never did. Instead, I wrote new posts about the developments. See posts listed below under Related.) One thing I did not anticipate was how various social issues have forced people into choosing between Red or Blue, and how those who chose Blue were physically immured and penalized, with some succumbing mortality for doing so, thereby impelling a mass subsequent conversion to Red.

Observations

In this report, I've collected video formatted proceedings from 3 central personalities in the current Men's Sphere, Dr. Orion Taraban, The Thinking Ape, and Joker at Better Bachelor. These excerpts accurately and aptly describe the current Zeitgeist. Interestingly, all three of these videos came out in the space of 4 days last week, fitting perfectly with July's theme of Cultural Demise at Σ Frame.

PsycHacks: Most people DON'T WANT RELATIONSHIPS: understanding the decline in romantic relationships (2023/7/3) Length: 9:25

In this talk, Taraban emphasizes that relationships have become functionally transactional, which is something I predicted a couple years ago in The Future of Intersexual Relationships is Transactional (2021/3/12).

At the 8:00 mark, Taraban concludes,

> "…the validation and connection that comes from social media are definitely not the same things as the > validation and connection that come from an actual relationship. But apparently it's enough like the same thing that it's trapping a lot of women, especially because from a certain perspective it's less risky and less expensive. In any case, women are foregoing relationships, at least in part, due to the fact that they can now transact resources more easily, more cheaply, and more safely elsewhere."

> "…people are increasingly replacing relationships with simulated relationships. That is, rather than transact resources for sexual opportunity in actual relationships, people are increasingly transacting simulated resources for simulated sexual opportunity in simulated relationships; and men and women are inhabiting roles online that mirror their roles in the real life Sexual Marketplace."

Most people everywhere have adopted a transactional mindset in regards to the opposite sex. MəT00 and the OASIS are merely the two bordellos having the worst repute and the best service, respectively, within the red light ghetto that is the West.

The Thinking Ape: How The Pills Broke The World... (2023/7/6) Length: 11:38

At 8:10, he summarizes his main points in saying,

> "…even though the mainstream has become, quote unquote, aware of all these pillings and all these things, at the same time they don't really accept any of the negative aspects of these things and they remain just as they did before — quite gynocentric. […] …things happening online […] have become so massively represented in alternative media, whether people like it or not, that the mainstream, on some level, has to confront it."

At 9:12, he summarizes the transactional nature of the SMMP these days, adding to what Taraban and I have described.

> "…there's no way getting around the fact that mating and dating is like a job application. It's very mechanical, romance is secondary, you need to meet the requirements above all the men… And the resistance people show, the sense of ickiness when confronted with that reality just goes to show, in my humble opinion, that we as a species need to live with certain fairy tales and myths. Saying the truth outright can be destructive oftentimes. Sometimes you need metaphors. You need some kind of interpretive lens through which you can see things, rather than saying, "Well, here's the deal. You need to be tall. You need to make money. You need to look good. You need to do this. You need to do that." All mechanical."

Since many if not most of these specific traits are more or less immutable, it comes out as the difference between the "Have's" and the "Have Not's".

> "But for most human beings that doesn't work. Most human beings are better off "Blue", to use the phrase right, and when confronted by it they'll reject it and to the extent that they don't, they have to deal with it."

In agreement with how I predicted that the Red Pill phenomenon would spread to the general public amidst continuing societal decay, the Thinking Ape goes a step further in attributing much of the current intersexual distrust and social malaise to the tidbits of truth that originated in the Manosphere and have since gone mainstream.

At 10:16, Thinking Ape declares,

> "It was the Manosphere, for good or ill, for better or worse, that was ultimately responsible for putting a lot of these ideas out in public, and now people need to deal with it, for better or worse. And I don't think they're dealing with it well. Certainly in modern times, never before have the sexes been as split as they are now, and there's nothing to go back to. There's no romance. There's just the mechanical job application driven style notion of relationships with nothing else left over. No romance. No fantasy. No more myths about human nature. Just the harsh, unfortunate, brutal reality, and people don't want to deal with that."

The commentary on Better Bachelor's video will appear in Zeitgeist Report 2023 — Part 3 (2023/7/14). But before that, we'll hear a word from Thedeti.

Stay tuned.

"Only if she thinks he's hot"

Physical appearance for men has become paramount. It has always been the case that male physical appearance is important in terms of female sexual arousal; but this is even more prominent now. It can't be hidden now. Trends which men were noticing back in 2011 when I got here have become much more pronounced, by orders of magnitude. If you're not top 20% in looks, you're dead in the water. Hell, you can't even get to the water. You can't even see where the water is. You're just a nonstarter.

This should utterly expose the lie we often hear from women that "personality is most important". Clearly, this is not the case.

When we here in what's left of the manosphere talk about "women's attitudes toward men" or "women disrespecting men", we are really talking here about how women feel about attractive men, the men they want for sex and relationships. When women complain about men, they're talking about attractive men. When women talk about what they want from men and what they want in a man, they're talking about what they want from an attractive man. This is why it's so important to add "…in a man I already think is hot" to anything a woman actually says.

If you're not an attractive man or a woman thinks you're not attractive, she doesn't think about you at all. She doesn't care about you at all. You could be wiped off the face of the earth and she will not think about it for even a split second. You literally don't matter at all.

Hostilities towards Men

There is growing hostility toward men in general. There is a lot of generally accepted misandry in Western society today. It's acceptable to hate men, especially unattractive men, especially men who are getting no play. It's generally considered that if you're a man, you're not entitled to anything — not even politeness or common courtesy. If you're a bottom 80% man, you're not even human to our current society. You're an animal – soulless, valueless except as a beast of burden. If you're not working as some sort of drafthorse in the service of society and women, you're utterly worthless.

There is extreme hostility toward the idea that a man in a relationship is entitled to anything from that relationship. Oh, the woman may choose to give him table scraps and crumbs, or whatever else she deigns to give him, but entitled? No way. He has no rights whatsoever. He is there to give the woman whatever she wants or demands. He has no right even to expect anything at all, much less demand anything or have standards for the woman he's in that relationship with. He is just a male. He's entitled to nothing at all — not even humane treatment or politeness.

The idea that men want anything is "m!s0gyny". If a man wants something, anything at all, it must be because he hates women. If you're not singing the praises of women 24/7/365, "you obviously hate women".

"Shut Up and Go Away!"

Men are not allowed to bring up any complaints about any of this. Anytime a man discusses any of this in any mixed company, he is immediately labeled a m!s0gyn!st, an !ncel, or an Andrew Tate sympathizer.

Any man calling any attention to any of this or talking about how men are disadvantaged is called a woman-hater or g@y or a bitter small d!cked loser who's not getting laid. (And this is what Christian women say.)

Men are not allowed to criticize women at all. You're not allowed to say anything negative about women at all. Men's criticisms, at best, are being waved away and dismissed as if they're nothing and meaningless. At worst, any criticism of women at all, no matter how fact-based or legitimate, is "m!s0gyny". "M!s0gyny" is now anything short of slobbering devotion to, or slavish praise of, women.

It's really funny, isn't it, how women talk about how sex isn't important; how it's OK for men to be virgins; and then when men criticize women, the first place women hit men is in their masculinity? "You're a loser, you're an incel, you're a fa&&0t, you're a p_ssy, you have a microd!ck, you can't get laid." (And this is what Christian women say.)

That's why men are walking away. And they're coming back for crumbs of p_ssy, because a debased marriage with a harridan is the only way they can get anything without becoming johns, without going to the OASIS.

Incentives Matter

Incentives matter. And transactions work both ways. If men are not entitled to anything from women, then women are not entitled to anything from men. If the only way for men to get sex is to pay sugar babies and hookers (but I repeat myself), that's what they'll do. If the only way for them to protect themselves is to withdraw, that's what they'll do.

This is nothing new. Men have been saying all of the above, and more, for at least the last 12 years since I found the manosphere. It's just way, way worse now. Back then, we were talking about Game and how not-so-attractive men can make things work and get women. Now? When's the last time you heard or read anyone talking about Game? Right — not at all. Game is out. Male self-preservation and withdrawal is in. Red Pill is slowly giving way to Black Pill. Women got wise to Game, and just said "top 20% men is all". Then it was only the "top 10% men". Now it's only the "top 5% men". Women are refusing to give anything to any men other than those in the top 5%. All other men have to "hire" them as hookers or sugar babies, or marry them at age 38 or so in exchange for blown out bodies, shredded psyches, and vacant souls.

Most women and most men are still marrying but it's eroding. Moreover, they're having at most 2 kids, and some have only one. Their relationships seem devoid of love or affection or attraction. They're purely transactional — they get each other's money (well, she gets his; she supports him a little) and he gets whatever sex she's willing to give him. Pure transaction. There's no love. There's no affection. There's no altruism. There is only "we need each other's money and we need to give each other status".

There are no Incentives

As things stand now, there's no point to men getting educated or trained. There's no point to knocking yourself out at 8 years of post-secondary education to get trained for an office job earning 6 figures. There's no point to making 500% of what you need to survive and buy a few toys. There's no point in making any effort with women beyond getting some sex from a woman who you know won't be with you this time next year. There's no point to committing to a woman who has made it very clear she thinks you're sh!t and you're not entitled to anything and she can treat you however she wants to. There's no point in doing anything for anyone when they're telling you they don't like you, don't need you, and don't want you. There's no point in becoming a father.

There's no point to any of it.

And so, men get subsistence jobs and earn only what they need. They avoid everything.

Men are Checking Out

Men's withdrawing from relationships, from work, from education, from job training, from society, is a baffling curiosity to our society. All of our society stands around scratching their heads and can't figure out why men won't do anything. Our society considers that maleness, manhood, masculinity, is getting educated / trained for a job, getting a job earning enough to support a wife and kids, getting married, and becoming a father. That there is literally nothing else to being a man other than serving society, and then serving women.

The Powers That Be cannot figure out why men are doing less and less of this. They really do believe that men are just going to keep doing all this, for less and less return. They really cannot understand why men won't do this. They really do believe that the jobs and the functional outward appearances of "husband" and "father" are rewards in and of themselves.

They don't understand that the jobs give men money with which they then live the lives they want.

They don't understand that men get married so they can have a relationship with one woman who they can bang and f_ck silly. They're getting married so they can have a permanent sex partner. They're getting married so they can have ownership and dominion and lordship over a household and so their territories will grow.

Men become fathers so they can have legacies, so that through their children they will "live forever" and have a lasting impact on their world. And so they can enjoy companionship with family into middle and old age.

If men can't have any of these things, they might as well check out.

A Message to Women

Look, girls, I know you don't like any of what I've said here. But that's why men get married and have any interest in women at all. We're marrying you so we can bang and f_ck while we're young and while we still can; so we don't have to expend so damn much energy trying to get laid; and so we can have households and kids and little empires. Just like we know you marry us for money, for status with the feminine social matrix, and for security. Ok. We get it. We know that's why you're marrying us. It's not because we're fun or hawt or sexy or exciting. You're using us; we're using you. Hopefully it can be fun enough that we're making the best of it.

And when you tell men, "You're not entitled to anything, you're not entitled to sex, you're not entitled to fun, you don't get anything from us that we decide we are not willing to give you", then men just…. leave. They just walk away. There's no point to any of it.

The Ugly Truth

Women crave love from men. Men crave respect from women. But when men and women know the truth about each other, the clear unvarnished truth, men hate women and women disrespect men. The knee-jerk reaction to the raw ugly truth of the sinful human nature is to draw back and disengage. Thus, men and women will each deprive the other of what they need the most from the other. So, in some sort of natural vindictive form of vengeance, when the truth comes out, men deprive women of love; and women deprive men of respect.

I suppose as I am writing this, I think now that it's more that men end up indifferent to all women; but women split their attitude toward men depending on the attractiveness / value of the men. Women's attitude toward attractive men is one of seething, raging contempt. Women's attitude toward all other men is one of indifference. ("Let them FOAD.")

When you add a Red Pill to the mix, you eventually get to Black Pill. Black Pill has become the Singularity.

We in the West deserve every bit of the holy vengeance headed straight at us.

The Current Ambience

As Thedeti described in Part 2, Western society is too debased and the times are too volatile for pursuing satisfying intersexual relationships and creating stable marriages and families. Intersexual competition has grown tighter and more brutal, and yet at the same time, it is more acceptable, even anticipated by some.

The overall consequence to the individual man (and many women too), is an atomized sense of loneliness. Without a stable society held together by a widely accepted and truthful mythos, life lacks meaning and purpose. Men are living day to day, only thinking about how to keep their lives and fortunes together for the near short term. There is a spirit of hopeless pessimism in the air, and we have grown used to it.

The number of men who are choosing to embrace life on their own terms continues to grow, and this is becoming so prevalent that the stigmas thereof are slowly fading away, although not without heated protestation from women.

Western Men have given up on marriage to Western Women / in the West because…

1. They have succumbed to the cultural lies and therefore see themselves as incapable of such.
2. They have read the writing on the proverbial Wall and therefore see women as incapable of such.
3. It is assumed that a capable, “high value” man meeting an agentic mature woman with all the bells and whistles associated with marriage that is now fully expected within marriage is an impossibility.

The Response

In response to all this, many men are returning to the basics. Men are doing this through a number of ways…

1. Men who are able to snag an acceptable woman's interest and who are interested in LTRs and having children prefer to cohabitate and take one day at a time. These women willingly agree IF they are interested in maintaining an LTR and family formation AND if the man piques their Tingleometer sufficiently. This trend signifies a societal-wide return to how marriage used to be before the modern age.
2. Men who are NOT able to snag an acceptable woman's interest and who are NOT interested in LTRs and having children are going it alone. Many men are finding satisfaction in this choice and are having no regrets. Thus, MGTOW, in the defacto sense, is at an all time high, although the label itself is falling out of fashion and fewer men are identifying with it.
3. Some men are relocating to more conservative states and locales that are less W0ke, more friendly to men, have laws that are more respectful to men's interests, and have lower taxes (i.e. ID, MT, AZ, SC, DE, NV, ME, FL, NH, TN).
4. A growing number of men are traveling abroad to get a taste of other cultures, breathe the fresh air of normalcy, and search for adventure, life, and possibly love (e.g. Passport Bros). Top destinations at this time are Brazil, Colombia, Croatia, Ecuador, and the Philippines.

In sum, Men who are aware of the pitfalls of the debauched Western SMP, Feminist / W0ke culture, and Marriage 2.0 (or 3.0? 4.0?) have rejected the heartaches and snares thereof in order to retain peace of mind as well as their personal and financial integrity.

Yet, Western women, for the most part, have NOT forsaken their sinful notions of entitlement, of equality, of feminism, and continue to break their own hearts and ruin themselves in the crucible of the SMP, all the while ignorantly parroting all the associated lies and moxies, and even boasting of their debased glory and their "victory" over "The Patriarchy" which already died decades ago in the West.

Embrace Reality by Rejecting the Lies

Here I'll turn to Better Bachelor's take on all of this, as I mentioned in Part 1.

The magic of Joker's monologues is found in the way he addresses the hopes and fears of younger men, and offers them a touch of wisdom and a voice of encouragement, thus earning him an esteemed seat in the halls of the Manosphere's greatest sages, saints, and sinners.

In this monumental monologue, Joker runs through the whole gamut of problems in society, from top to bottom, and then says in his own words that he is only scratching the surface. He then astutely concludes,

> "The world can't lie its way out of reality."

Better Bachelor: From both the left and right, no one can outrun what's really here. (2023/7/6) Length: 20:47

Excerpts and Commentary

Joker's main opus begins at the 12:00 minute mark.

> "My point of doing this video is to show you that at this point in time the government… doesn't matter, Right, Left, Center, whoever… the governments are lying to you. Businesses are lying to you. The financial markets are lying to you. Dating coaches and… and… whether it's conservative or left-leaning or whatever, are saying that, "Our way is the right way to be happy in life. Just get married and have kids." Or "Just have four boyfriends or girlfriends and two different baby daddies and get money from the government… THAT's the REAL way to be happy."
> The truth is everybody's really miserable — online… And I think the people there that are screaming and yelling the loudest online are actually the most unhappy. And that if you really want to understand what's going on in the world, take anyone in a place of power and whatever they tell you, believe the opposite.
> That's where we are right now.
> That's where we are right now."

Comprehensively, this is essentially the same message Ed Hurst has been preaching for years.

> "And people are continuing to try to lie their way out of reality, and reality is still going to happen. It may happen in a way you like. It may happen in a way you don't like. But more than likely, I mean, well, it's definitely going to happen. We can run down rabbit holes of why? Why it's all happening, and why they're trying to control the narrative, and why they're trying to get you to do a certain thing in a certain way to give them more or less power, or make you feel or not feel a certain way, and to emotionally manipulating to voting a certain way or thinking a certain way… We can go down all those rabbit holes, and we'll probably all have very diverse opinions on that stuff. But before you even walk in the door on those conversations, the first thing you need to understand is, whatever you've been told is likely a lie and not the truth, and things are going to get pretty crazy in the years to come."

At 15:37, Joker gives the same advice to men that my father gave to me as a teenager back in the 80s.

> "I want you guys going forward to be armed in understanding that you can't just believe what you're told anymore by governments and the media. You got to start doing your own research. You got to look a little bit into it. But your default setting, your default place should be, "Well they're lying." That's just, "Okay, I think they're lying. Let me see if they are, or are they actually telling the truth on this one." That's really where you need to be."

At 16:08, he describes the red flags of the Worldly liars pushing false narratives.

> "And so the more someone's pushing a narrative down your throat and just cramming it, slamming it down your throat, saying, "You MUST believe us! You're an –ist, or a –phobe, or a bad person, or whatever, and we should remove you and stop you!" "[We need to make sure that] these [people on] Twitter can't talk about this!" and "Elon Musk is evil for letting people talk about this!" …says ex*-government…* More than likely that's a good starting place of saying, "Okay. I think that's a lie."

Get away from it all!

At 16:40, Joker tells men to push away the plate of lies that is being served to them, and get back in touch with the daily realities of life and the common goodness found in daily living.

> "So forgive me for being offline for a couple weeks but I needed to clean my soul a little bit. I'd suggest you do the same at a certain point because the real world is still beautiful."

This is a Must Do for every man. In my writings and in real life, I often urge others to get out of the house every day, to go somewhere new — anywhere really, to meet new people, to take a short trip, to spend time in nature, to take up a new hobby or sport, or resume an old one, and so on.

Those who are circumspectful and wise have taken this life approach to the extreme — relocated to "warmer climates", so to speak (Joker moved to TN), or have moved abroad (like Jack, EoS, Nikolai, et al.), or else have stocked their homes with canned goods, clothing, firewood, supplies, off-grid power generation systems, ammunition, etc. Preparation is good and necessary to attain success in any endeavor.

However, I suspect that the actual event of a catastrophe as it pertains to the individual man will not happen as anyone might imagine it. If you had hoped to hear some more predictions for the next 5 years, sorry. All I can say is that the REAL catastrophe will NOT be something that can be foreseen or very well avoided once it occurs. The die had already been struck sometime in the closing months preceding the C0V!D lockdown. The most we can be sure of at this time is that it is necessary for a man to remove himself from the lying voices and destructive influences of The Worldly system, and to filter the information and guard his heart against that which he cannot avoid.

Make the most of where you now stand. Pray with diligence and vigilance. Be thankful for all good things. Always remember that God protects and provides for the faithful. You can always anticipate this, no matter what The World™ may sling at you.

All the best~!

When Two Worlds Collide

Jack · 17 July 2023 · Archived copy · Original

A commentary about Fresh & Fit's arguments on female accountability.

Readership: Men
Theme: Cultural Demise
Length: 2,100 words
Reading Time: 11 minutes + 18.5 minute video.

Overview of Fresh & Fit

The hosts of the Fresh & Fit podcast are Walter Weekes (AKA "Fresh") and Myron Gaines (AKA "Fit"). Their podcast was initially created in 2019 as a fitness and health advice show. However, it started gaining massive traction back in 2021, when Fresh & Fit introduced their After-Hours Special, a talk show focusing on dating from men's perspective and effectively offering exemplary advice for men about how to interact with women.

In their After-Hours Special, they invite young, buxom, scantily clad, subculture class women onto their show to discuss the current SMP and intersexual dynamics. Apparently, their choice of guests boils down to a small number of qualifiers.

- Those who are able to contribute insightful and relevant points to the conversation.
- Women who possess an iconic gynomorphic profile displaying cleavage and skin, and who don't need to say anything at all, really.
- Quotidian Carousel Riders and/or CCR veterans, both male and female.
- Feminist parrots who are sufficiently articulate enough to voice their boilerplate viewpoints, but who do not possess the cognitive or moral capability of defending them in a formal argument.
- Guest personalities, most of whom have their own social media platform and who cover similar topics.

Myron is extremely gifted in argumentation and debate and he uses this skill to host the discussions very adroitly.

Case Study — Fresh & Fit on Female Accountability

Here I'll cover one exchange that I found to be rather insightful and also very entertaining. I won't address the content of their conversation as much as I'll offer a meta-analysis of their interactions.

Of note, the woman sitting to Myron's left is Sarah Dawn Moore, a social media influencer with her own YouTube channel. From what I have seen of her content, she is very articulate and has some pretty fair-minded advice for both men and women. Note that she is the only person at the table who is NOT drinking. (Her cup has been pushed away.) She is the only woman at the table who is able to properly address Myron's arguments. The others are merely expressing their own fluffy feeelz-filled feminist frames.

Mano World: This Lizzo Size 304 Can't Take Accountability (2023/7/2)

Overview of the Video

The main topic of their conversation is about whether it is men or women who are responsible for the death of Chivalry. Myron's take is that women are responsible, and men are just dealing with the reality on the ground.

Long time readers will know that it is neither really. It is because Chivalry is self-defeating, and Feminist ideologies and sexual promiscuity has led to a breakdown in authentic trust between the sexes (as amply demonstrated in the women's attitudes) which is a necessary precondition for Chivalry.

There is some confusion of terminology though. They are NOT speaking of Chivalry as we understand it to be a social construct originating in Medieval times, which has morphed into faux Christian morality and which forms the foundation of the Blue Pill. In this conversation, when the women speak of "Chivalry", what they are really expressing is their expectation that men should treat women with dignity, grace, and honor. It is an expectation of decency by those who conduct themselves indecently.

Instead of addressing Myron's arguments though, the women are constantly obfuscating and justifying themselves all throughout the discussion on this topic. But they won't go so far as to explicitly state that men stopped reverencing women or that weak men are screwing up the SMP. Instead, they take the currently trending tack of saying men are manipulative, sociopathic, and toxic. Since the majority of men are sexually invisible to women, they don't seem to realize that it is only a small percentage of men who are this way, who also happen to be the men they choose — a point which Myron touches on a couple times but which is assiduously avoided (or not detected) by his guests.

Patriarchy is Assumed

I'm not sure Myron or Walter are aware of this, but they are not speaking of Chivalry per se either. Myron's argument implicitly assumes that women should submit to a man's authority, not the other way around as is characterized by Chivalry. (Myron wisely avoids using the terms Patriarchy, authority, and submission to describe his position.) Thus, "Chivalry" appears to be a code word with two different meanings and this impasse arising from these incongruent definitions is what drives the virulent discussion.

Throughout his podcasts, he does exercise masculine authority and he refers to a code of conduct when the hens get too uppity. For example, at 9:00, Myron calls a woman out for avoiding his point that women killed Chivalry and romance, and at 9:55, Myron restores order by taking the ladies to task about their conduct on his show, calling their arguments and behavior foolish.

The interesting thing about this discussion is that within the Framework of this structure of authority, Myron's argument is correct. That is, women who will not submit to their male authority cannot reasonably expect that man to behave properly towards them. So it is the woman's fault for not submitting. Myron is wise in not stating this explicitly, but the message still comes through. This is exactly what the women cannot accept, because it pops their Feminist bubble.

Two Paradigms Collide

Dalrock stated that the problems associated with a lack of female accountability were a result of them not being held accountable by men, which he described as "a lack of ownership of women". In Myron's video, we see the same problems being manifested, i.e. the attitudes and disorders associated with "independent women" who naturally receive bad treatment from men.

> "The feminist response to this reality is that no one owns them, and they are of course right."
> Dalrock: Tragedy of the feminist commons. (2019/3/26)

Likewise, Fresh & Fit's female guests angrily assert that women are "equal" and "independent", and yet they are confused and surprised that men do not honor and respect them as "equals", thereby revealing their ignorant denial of God's created order.

They continually resort to the dishonest debate tactic of dismissing Myron's argument as merely an opinion. But no, it is not an opinion. It is the parallel paradigm of Patriarchy which feminist women refuse to be a part of, and yet they want to be treated as though they are.

What all these women are refusing to admit is that the only way a woman can receive the dignity, grace, and honor she desires is by recognizing a man as an authority over her, accepting his discipline, complying with his wishes, deferring to his decisions, and making a diligent effort to beautify his life. IOW, as Dalrock said, the woman needs to have an "owner" and be a "helper" to him, otherwise, a woman has no other choice but to help and own herself, which is clearly a mortally difficult and shamefully embarrassing state, as seen in the video and elsewhere.

Women initiate a Relationship Structure which they do not want

I'm sure the previous description of women being "owned" by one man (e.g. in marriage) has offended a few readers, so let's break this down further.

In demanding an equal standing with men, women are inadvertently creating the very kinds of relationships which they do not want.

Σ Frame Axiom 7 (Jack): The natural interaction defines the relationship structure according to which model it fits best, not what we think it is or hope for it to be.

When a woman treats a man like an equal, the man can only interpret this and respond in one of three ways.

1. He can treat her like a Friend.
2. He can treat her like a Competitor.
3. He can treat her as an Enemy.

Any of these types of relationships cannot give the woman what she is seeking, for the following reasons respectively.

1. The Friend Zone is not a mature sexual relationship. It reduces the male to Beta status, and is therefore untenable with regards to hypergamy. (Myron points this out at 3:40.)
2. In a relationship between Competitors, it is men's nature to defeat the competition and "win" the game.
3. For Enemies, it is men's instinct to destroy or eliminate his adversary.

The Fresh & Fit peeps probably don't know this, but Points 2 and 3 are why the discussion leads to the topic of physical abuse later in the video. At 13:00 Moore leads a discussion about how women should respond to physical abuse in a relationship.

Again, the only way that women can receive the dignity, grace, and honor they desire is by recognizing a man as an authority over her. In this type of relationship, a man's nature as a protector and a provider shines through.

Without Moral Agency, Holding Females Accountable is Interpreted as "Abuse" and Condemnation

Although Myron is fundamentally correct, it is foolish to expect women to accept what he is saying. This is because Women do not have the capability of accepting responsibility for their own actions. They lack the necessary moral agency. That is why they get bent out of shape and blow up when he makes a very general statement like, "People are responsible for their choices."

For example, at 6:10, the woman sitting next to Moore loses her cool and goes on the warpath, saying,

> "I'm not talking about a woman taking accountability [sic] because a woman will fall for whatever the F__k she wants to feel like falling for, but at the same time, the man knows better."

In this statement, she is admitting that women are dicktated by the Feeelz and have no moral agency, AND that men have more moral agency than women do. But then at 6:30, she starts preaching "equality" as if that's going to fix everything (???) without any awareness of her contradictory assumptions.

Then at 6:40 on, she paraphrases what she feels Myron is saying as, "Women are wrong. Women are at fault. Women are horrible." She goes on like this for more than 3 minutes. From her speech, it is evident that she feels blamed and/or condemned, and is trying to shift the line of reasoning to relieve the expectation that women should be responsible for their decisions (which is more evidence that women lack moral culpability).

Later on, reality suddenly dawns on the two women sitting in the back, and they respond in a similar manner.

Moreover, when it is said that men are responsible for their choices, women have no problem accepting that, because it has nothing to do with their own moral culpability. But when the onus is placed on women, they do not perceive that they have the moral agency required to act otherwise, and they therefore interpret the statement as a judgment of condemnation on themselves.

Agency is Anathema to the Female Fleshly Nature!

Summary

The question that the men should be asking is, how can Women proudly state that they are (or should be) equal to men, in spite of the obvious moral incongruences?

1. Women choose poorly. They openly admit to preferring bad boys, and then want to blame those men for being bad boys.
2. Women cling to a gynocentric microcosm built on feminist notions of equality, and therefore set themselves up in a relationship that is either abusive or unfulfilling.

3. Women do not have the moral capability to take responsibility for their decisions. They need a man's moral covering.
4. Women refuse to submit to the man in their life and thereby accept his moral covering.

In summary, it is women's fault, as Myron claims. Meanwhile, men are standing by, waiting for women to swallow their pride and get their act together. But the women remain lost in their Feminist gynoworld mental microcosm and aren't even aware of their proper role in a relationship, which is to accept a male head and submit to his authority.

Another question is, how can Women boast about being independent of men, when they desperately need a man's attention and love, they lack the capability of exercising moral culpability, and are in dire need of a Man's moral covering?

More and more women are coming to the conclusion that they don't want to be independent.

In general, it is foolish boasting to wave these facts in women's faces. Nevertheless, Myron's wisdom of foolishness provides an effective forum for demonstrating the reality and revealing the truth of the matter.

The Abortion Bottleneck

Roe vs. Wade was a Bottleneck Event

In No Mo Roe, No Mo Hoe! (2022/6/29), I described the Roe vs. Wade period of U.S. history as a genetic bottleneck event that selectively removed ~30% of the birth population every year for 12 years and more than ~20% for another 37 years.

As mind=blowing as this was, I was not content with this analysis. I decided to look into the data further to see exactly how much of a bottleneck it was.

Initially, I had expected that poor and highly promiscuous women were the most likely to kill off their progeny. It turns out, I wasn't too far off the mark. But there's a lot more.

After looking at 40 years of data, Dehlendorf et al. [1] reported that the open season on baby parts hit lower income blacks the hardest.

According to KFF [2], in 2020, the percentages of abortions by race are listed as follows.

Race	Percent of the Population	Number of Abortions	Percent of Abortions
Black	13.6%	130,538	39%
White	58.9%	108,904	33%
Hispanic	19.1%	70,420	21%
Other	8.4%	23,427	7%

When comparing the percent of the U.S. population to the percent of abortions by r@c!al categories, Blacks had the highest per capita rate of abortion, while Wh!tes had the lowest. Abortions among Hispanics and Others were proportional to their populations.

Image Source: The Guttmacher Institute [3].
And this is just one year (2020).

In 2004, it looked like this. → → →

The numbers are pretty similar.

If every year since 1973 had similar rates by race, this would appear to be a massive Black cull.

Where is the W0ke outrage over this?

Apparently, women's "right" to "choice" is more important than Blacks' right to life.

Legalized and Subsidized Abortion as a defacto Eugən!cs Program

History will show Roe vs. Wade as the most diabolical form of eugən!c r@c!al discrimination in modern times — enforced not by edict nor force of law, but by an unrestricted appeal to the base insecurities of the feminine nature. Restrictions were removed by making it legal, subsidizing it, and relegating the decision to be made privately by individual women while they're in a dependent and helpless state.

Apparently, this was no accident. Abortion firebrands of the 1960s and 70s actually had this motivation.

> "Marcus Epstein raises an interesting question when he asks if harping on Sanger's r@c!sm does harm in other areas. Does it feed into what we might call the Left's "Anti-Southern Strategy," which entails hunting down and denouncing every trace even of group identification among European Americans, while coddling and profiting from outright r@c!sm and bigotry among every other ethnicity?
> Well, maybe. But that's not the real problem with tarring today's Planned Parenthood with its founder's ethnic obsessions. Instead, it is this: Attacking an organization that kills tens of thousands of children every year because it might, just might, be a little r@c!st is simply a joke. And in very poor taste, like denouncing H!tler for destroying German typography.

Conclusions

Throughout most of history, excess populations have been curtailed by disease, famine, and war. Now that disease and famine are decreasing, and economic prosperity and life expectancy are increasing, we now enjoy living conditions that would normally promote a massive population boom.

So now the PTB must cook up another plan to keep populations in check.

Since the 20th century, various regimes around the world have employed various defacto eugən!cs and population control programs.

- Mass destruction of European men during WW1 and WW2.
- During the latter half of the 20th century, China culled their population through a cultural revolution followed by the One Child policy and ended up with a glut of men.
- In 1973, the U.S. adopted the practice of culling their population through legalizing abortion.
- Since the turn of the 21st century, India has been embracing the Feminist Life Script and the higher education / Career Life Script for females as a time tested and trustworthy method to reduce marriage and proliferation.

All these changes have set up a world ripe for mass warfare, where sin and death are the only paths to peace. (Angry, disillusioned, and displaced men are only pacified by hormone blockers / testosterone reduction, recreational drugs, p0rn, sex, war, or death. Take your pick as to which one of these is coming next.)

Questions

If we are to assume a grand consp!r@cy as the information above suggests, then the question that arises is, "If this eugən!cs program worked so well, then why is it now being stopped by repealing Roe vs. Wade?"

IOW, what happens when we get rid of the bottle neck of abortion?

Now that the first few rounds of experimentation have proved successful, it's possible that the PTB realized that by allowing states to prohibit abortion, they could achieve certain other goals, such as…

- Decrease the percentage of Wh!te Deplorables in society.
- Increase the percentage of minorities in society.
- Eradicate the Wh!te majority. (We're almost there now.)
- Increase the crime rate. (It's true. See [5].)
- Bankrupt the social security, medical care, prison, and welfare systems.
- Create a Malthusian Crunch.

The realistic honest answer is that there will be a lower class population boom, and a sh!t ton of people will be added to the welfare rolls and end up in the prison system.

And this is only the beginning.

R@c!st Admission Policies are Baked into the Best Educational Business Models

I remember reading an article about 10 to 15 years ago that made the rounds on social media in Taiwan. I can't find that particular article, but here are a few others that are very similar.

- Wikipedia: Asian Quota
- The New York Times: 'The Chosen': Getting In (2005/11/6)
- The American Conservative (Ron Unz): The Myth of American Meritocracy (2012/11/28)
- Unz: Asian Quotas in the Ivy League – We See Nothing! (2014/5/27)
- Harvard Magazine: Court Upholds Harvard's Race Conscious Admissions Program (2019/10/1)
- New Yorker: The Many Sins of College Admissions (2019/10/7)

The article I read examined the admissions process at Harvard. The targeted readership of the article was primarily upper class Chinese parents who wanted their children to attend Ivy League and other upper tier western Universities. These parents were intensely interested in getting the inside scoop on how applicants are selected, hoping to learn something new about how their children might get in.

In this article, an insider on the admissions board at Harvard bluntly stated that they have to preserve a Wh!te majority on the order of 86% or higher. If they didn't, then Asian students would flood the campus and Harvard just wouldn't be Haahvahd anymore. "At Harvard," he explained, "we're not just selling education, we're also selling the Harvard experience. Harvard is a predominantly Wh!te academic culture and it's 200-year-old reputation is based on this image. If that changes, then Harvard as everyone knows it would no longer exist."

On the face of it, it seems r@yc!ss as ɦə11, but it makes perfect sense from a business marketing standpoint.* I mean, how many Chinese parents would want their children to go to Harvard if the student body was 50% Indian, 30% East Asian, and 15% black? (The answer is none!) It is because of these policies that Harvard has preserved its legacy as a world famous brand of education with a targeted consumer base. Courts have allowed it because it preserves the identity of the institution and because it does not constitute an animosity explicitly targeted towards specific races.

 It also makes sense in terms of national immigration. In fact, many nations have tight requirements on immigration for this purpose, often based on education and race. For example, Taiwan keeps immigration limited to 4.5%, favors those who are educated and/or wealthy, and has more stringent requirements for non-ethnic Chinese.*

Admissions are a Highly Biased and Subjective Dance in a Swirl of Affirmative Action Policies and R@c!st Business Policies

Coming on three years ago, there was a burp in the narrative that was quickly swallowed down and spit under the rug. Only those who were diligently following F@r R@ght media sources ever had the chance to hear this news.

1. U.S. Department of Justice: Justice Department Finds Yale Illegally Discriminates Against Asians and Whites in Undergraduate Admissions in Violation of Federal Civil-Rights Laws (2020/8/13)
2. The Ethnic European: University Charged with Racism (2020/8/14) [Archive]*
3. Vox Popoli: The Sino-Jewish war (2020/8/14)

 This site was kicked off of WordPress in late 2020, just a couple months after it opened.*

Long story short, after an intensive two-year investigation, the U.S. Department of Justice found that it is much easier for African Americans to go to college than people of other races, and this was happening in spite of admission practices that favor Wh!tes like the one described above for Harvard. It was determined that the admission rate of Asian Americans and Wh!tes was between one-tenth and one fourth of the admission rate of African Americans having comparable academic performance. Evidently, it is easy for this to go unnoticed because blacks are only 13% of the nationwide population and few of them aspire to attend college.

The next year (in 2021) under the Biden administration, the case was withdrawn and the decision was effectively reversed.

Under source [2], one commenter (Outlier88) wrote,

> "This is great news. Of course I'm not referring to the anti-Wh!te r@c!sm, because that is not news. No, I'm referring to the investigation and accusation of this clear and present anti-wh!te r@c!sm, by the justice department."

Outlier88 is mistaken. The Justice Department's investigation of the discrimination at Yale is not taking on anti-Wh!te r@c!sm within higher education. If the justice department required Yale to end their pro-Black discriminatory admission quotas, it would NOT have resulted in less anti-Wh!te r@c!sm or more Wh!te students being able to attend. Instead, it would result in more Asian students, especially Chinese and Indian.

So either way, Wh!tes are going to lose ground on their own turf.

Currently, the racial demographics of Wh!tes in these esteemed tertiary instititutions are less than before. Forbes reports that…

> "At both Harvard and Yale, white students make up the largest share of the 2024 class (Harvard is 54% white and Yale, 45%). The second-largest ethnic group at both schools is Asian American. In Harvard's class of 2024, 24% of undergraduates are Asian American. African Americans make up 15% of the student body and Latinos account for 13%. At Yale, 29% of the 2024 class is Asian American. African Americans comprise 13% of the class and Latinos, 14%. According to census figures, 18% of the U.S. population is Latino. Less than 6% is Asian and almost 13% is Black."

Affirmative Action Finally Falls

Now we come to the present news story.

In a 6-3 vote, the U.S. Supreme court declared that affirmative action programs at Harvard and UNC are unconstitutional.

4. Not the Bee: Dean of Berkeley Law caught on tape explaining how the school gets around anti-discrimination laws for the sake of "diversity" (2023/6/30)

Trump's legacy endures through the court system.

If we are to honestly reject the inherent r@c!sm of r@ce-consciousness, then we'll have to recognize that there are some benefits that come with this change, as Sharkly described.

> "If Affirmative Action really does get removed from colleges, and the Leftys don't reflexively force some other way of affirming Blacks and Hispanics at college, the potential is there that within a decade Black and Hispanic college degrees could be viewed as meaning about the same as degrees earned by Wh!tes and Asians. Right now only the Lefty fools in HR would assume that a Black person's college degree wasn't partly a reparations gift. As always, there are exceptions, but the norm is "disadvantaged" graduates who leave you assuming that somebody must have had their thumb on the scale. If the playing field gets leveled, then Black and Hispanic educations might gain a similar value to the educations of Wh!tes and Asians. I see the removal of built in r@c!sm from education as benefitting everyone. Because honesty is the best public policy."

Source [1] cites The New York Times as lamenting,

> "The major ruling curtails race-conscious college admissions in the U.S., all but ensuring that elite institutions > become whiter and more Asian and less Black and Latino."

Not quite. Just as with the failed case against Yale in 2020-2021, those most benefitted by this ruling will be those of South and East Asian descent.

Source [1] also displays a tweet that states,

> "MSNBC claims now that affirmative action has been ruled unconstitutional, there will only be 3 black students per law school class."

I'm sure readers have seen many other comments, posts, and Tweets conveying similar self-betraying antipathies.

Here, the progressives are inadvertently admitting what they have been denying all along, that on the whole, some races are more academically inclined than others, and that Progressives are the worst r@c!sts of all when it comes to open competition.

Conclusions

All these seemingly contradictory policies and rulings may have left the reader with some confusion, so I'll summarize things here.

College admissions are subject to the following contexts.

1. College admissions have to jump through many contradictory policies and regulations in order to preserve the reputational integrity and financial solvency of the institution while also conforming to laws geared against discrimination.
2. Discrimination is sometimes permitted when it protects business and/or the in-group in general.
3. Apparently, it is OK to discriminate on the basis of race in favor of a business model as long as it does not constitute an explicit animosity towards another race.*
4. It is sometimes OK TO discriminate AGAINST those who cannot perform well in competition, as long as this discrimination is based on one's competitive performance and not on race. (The PTB tried to change this in the past.)

5. Apparently, it is NOT OK to discriminate IN FAVOR of those who cannot perform as well. (This is what has changed recently.)
6. Discrimination is unjust when it disenfranchises rights, privileges, and opportunities from those who are otherwise qualified, those who have earned it and/or those who are not already disqualified on the basis of their competitive ability.

 Catering to the major consumer's identity is an essential element of a successful business strategy. Another example is how Tanqueray Gin and Bombay Sapphire often feature blacks and South Asians in their advertisements, since these demographics comprise a large chunk of their consumer base. Contrapositive examples include how Bud Light and Gillette cut against their consumer identity and lost beaucoup revenue as a result.*

 In the context covered here, this discrimination happens to be based on academic performance and race.*

Moreover, discrimination is not as demonic as Progressives have been saying for the past 70 years or more. All the MGM's school marm lectures about "diversity" and "wh!te suprem@cy" are chitlins and giblets concealed in gravy.

Essentially, equalism is inherently r@c!st, and equalism destroys fair competition.

Go W0ke, go broke!

The Diversity of Natural Abilities Necessitates Discrimination in Competition

Diversity and Discrimination go together. You can't have one without the other.

Theme: Cultural Demise
Author's Note: Written on 2023/7/17, after the two previous posts were compiled.
Length: 700 words
Reading Time: 4 minutes

Following my coverage of r@cist eugenics and r@c!st college admissions, which inspired me to write this post, all this brings us to my little rant that follows.

Diversity is Naturally Competitive

Amid all this institutionalized r@cism, meanwhile…

- Those of European descent will continue to corner the fields of business, design, precision manufacturing, quality craftsmanship, abstract theory / philosophy, and technological innovation.
- African Americans will continue to dominate culture, sports, music, and entertainment.
- Asians are the most diligent and successful in academic pursuits, and family formation and stability (and not coincidentally, also the most impervious to the debauchery and Woke indoctrination that is prevalent in the tertiary educational campuses).

But we can't talk about this, because that would be "r@c!st". So, where is this so-called "Free Speech" that is supposedly guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution?

It stands to reason that this evident diversity of natural abilities necessitates discrimination in competition.

- If we try to artificially fill academic, engineering, and computer science jobs with Blacks instead of well-qualified Asians and Wh!tes (as in current practice), we just won't have the highest quality products that we might have otherwise had.
- If we try to force more average Asians and Wh!tes into sports, instead of Bl@cks (in theory), we won't see as many spectacular feats of human virtuosity like what Michael Jordan and Vince Carter did on the basketball courts.
- If we try to exclude Asians from academia (as discussed in the previous post), we're only harming scientific research and technological advancement.

Allowing and encouraging those to succeed in what they naturally excel at is a benefit to all. Isn't this what it truly means to "celebrate diversity"? But it is regarded as r@c!st to say so, because of appearances, and because of $$$.

Vince Carter, playing for the Toronto Raptors, hits a slam dunk, a feat for which he was famous for doing (ca. 2001).

More Rantings

In my experience growing up in middle America, Wh!te Deplorables will make r@c!st jokes until their cows wander home, but when face-to-face with someone of another r@ce, considerate and respectful behavior is duly demonstrated. Look! It is wh!tes who instituted all the laws and policies about affirmative action, anti-discrimination, equal opportunity, and women's suffrage! Despite all the talk about so called Wh!te Suprem@cy, Wh!tes are the most altruistic and respectful of self-imposed law of all r@ces, even to their own demise. But it is NOT regarded as r@c!st to say so.

Progressives are much the opposite. They will parrot the politically correct narratives all day and chide and shame those who don't. But in actual practice, principle, and policy making, we see ruthless litigation, vile hatred, and violence demonstrated. Readers will remember how the police were defunded and stood by during the riots in Seattle a couple of years ago, and when Martha's Vineyard became a sanctuary, suddenly the spiffy residents changed their tune. But if anyone points this out, it is r@yc!ss!

Why should Wh!tes sacrifice their own culture and history under the guise of "free speech", which is essentially letting hypocritical projecting r@c!sts police the content and tone of what is supposed to be free speech? For free speech to be truly free, it cannot be entirely free. There must be order, backed by a system of values, allowing an honest and fair critique of how those values are played out in society. It is the same way in education, politics, and elsewhere.

But everywhere on the Left, we hear the condemnation of Wh!te c0l0n!iz@t!on (in history), Wh!te Suprem@cy, etc, attempts to reframe the history books, and tearing down cultural icons and statues of the great men in American history — simply because they were Wh!te — or "Wh!te Suprem@c!sts" as we are told.

Seeing how Wh!tes, in general, are so altruistic and law-conscious, even to their own demise, I'd say the world has been rather fortunate that it was Wh!tes, and not some other r@c!al group ruling the world over the past few centuries. Try to imagine how history would have turned out if Chinese communists, or Congolese, or Shariahs, or Z!0n!sts held world dominance.

Well, Wh!tes have failed in their little experiment with The Enlightenment, “equality”, etc., so now we’re moving in that direction.

Diversity and Discrimination go together. You can’t have one without the other.

A Brief History of Gynocentric Churchianity — "The Beta Factory"

Society has shifted leftward for the last 100 years or more in the West. Since the increasing rise of Feminism about 50 years ago, the church has modified its views on marriage and church leadership in an attempt to make its doctrine more palatable to the masses. These false teachings in the church, including Chivalry (which extends back several hundred years), Complementarianism, Egalitarianism, and Feminism, have undermined male authority both in the church and in the home. The church has thus been transformed into a Beta Factory which continues to condition church-going men into Betas.

There have been two distinct developments in the Protestant church's teachings to this end — Complementarianism and Egalitarianism.

Complementarianism

Back during the women's empowerment movement of the 1970s and 1980s, the church became ashamed of the Bible's clear patriarchal teaching and considered it necessary to compromise in order to make the church relevant to the wider social trends towards Feminism. So the first step down the slippery slope was in teaching the idea that men and women "complement" each other. Now, there's nothing wrong with that so far as it is an observation of the way God made male and female such that marriage reflects God's character (Genesis 1:27). However, this new approach stressed a role structure which omitted wifely submission and avoided this topic entirely in order to retain traction in an increasingly gynocentric culture and to avoid scrutiny and/or offending Feminist sympathizers. Questions naturally arose about the scriptural validity of this new teaching, and so many caveats, bells, and whistles had to be added to this approach to form a complete doctrinal model. This model eventually developed into what is now called Complementarianism.

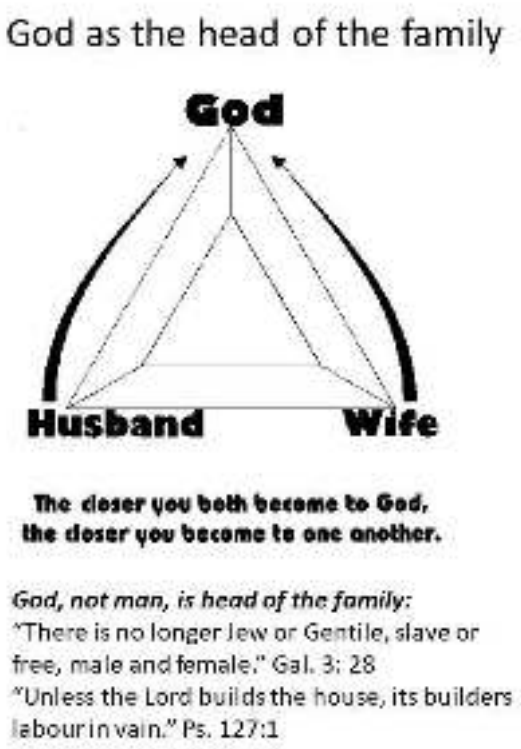
Essentially, Complementarianism makes a token effort to reconcile Ephesians 5:22-33 and I Peter 3:1-7 with today's attitudes about sex roles, so that modern Christians can accept and incorporate "wifely submission" into marriage. Essentially, Complementarianism allows nominally Christian wives to say they're "submitting" to their husbands while retaining the option of doing so on their own terms. Of course, conditional and/or contextual submission is actually not submission at all, but Complementarianism allows modern husbands and wives to assert they are being faithful to scriptural requirements, while not actually being faithful to scriptural requirements. It's essentially legalism and not 'heart'.

Egalitarianism

Over time and with further doctrinal restructuring, the sympathetic response towards women's liberation that was responsible for Complementarianism gradually gave birth to Egalitarianism.



The Egalitarian structure of authority.
Image Source: Elaine Kelly: Biblical Models for Family and Community (2022/1/10)
The next step was in teaching that men and women really are "equal" per Galatians 3:26-28. In this view, men and women are said to be "equal" in every way (a denial of 1 Corinthians 11:3,7-9 and 1 Peter 3:7) but they are required to occupy different roles as husband and wife. However, these intersexual roles are deemphasized in favor of the idea that man and wife are equal under God, with each being directly accountable to God.

This sleight of hand was done by introducing a misinterpretation of Galatians 3:26-28, thereby changing the application of this verse to include the context of earthly authority status and not merely redemptive status (Galatians 3:29).

One way they made “equal” jive with the previous step of Complementarianism such to make this Blue Pill easier to swallow, was to contrive a numerical model — men are to have 50.1% of authority and women 49.9% of authority. It sounds good and looks just about equal, but it’s a smokescreen because that 0.1% means men have complete control — or so they said.

The Christian Manosphere’s Take on Complementarianism and Egalitarianism

Complementarianism and Egalitarianism are regarded by the Christian Manosphere for what they are in practice.

In the Complementarian and Egalitarian view, wifely “submission” is not “submission” in the sense the apostles intended and made clear in several passages in the scriptures, but rather…

- Wifely “submission” is reinvented in the theoretical abstract as her “submission to God (alone)”.
- Wives are told that “submission” in practice is demonstrated in the wife’s willingness to presume a different but “equal” role of a wife in her marriage.
- From the wife’s perspective, this role of wifely “submission” is whatever is purported to be acceptable within the herd sensibilities of the local church community, and this is invariably gynocentric in nature.
- In reality, this brand of “submission” is defined by herself and is not subject to the authority of any man — not to a woman’s father nor the man who occupies the “role” of “husband”. Some credence is attributed to pastors, but pastors will never hold women accountable.
- In reality, whatever the wife thinks or decides is casually supported by the church, even decisions that are anti-biblical and/or horrendously catastrophic to her marriage and family.

All this basically boils down to a vanity of the mind in which female solipsism is glorified as the will of God.

Changes in the Distribution of Authority

In reality, when male authority is craftily excised from God’s ordained structure through Complementarianism / Egalitarianism, then…

- Women have all the authority with none of the responsibility for their actions and decisions.
- Men have all the responsibility with insufficient authority to execute their responsibilities.

In reality, Men do not categorically have 50.1% authority. Under a normal distribution (pre-Feminism), the male-female power balance looks like this.

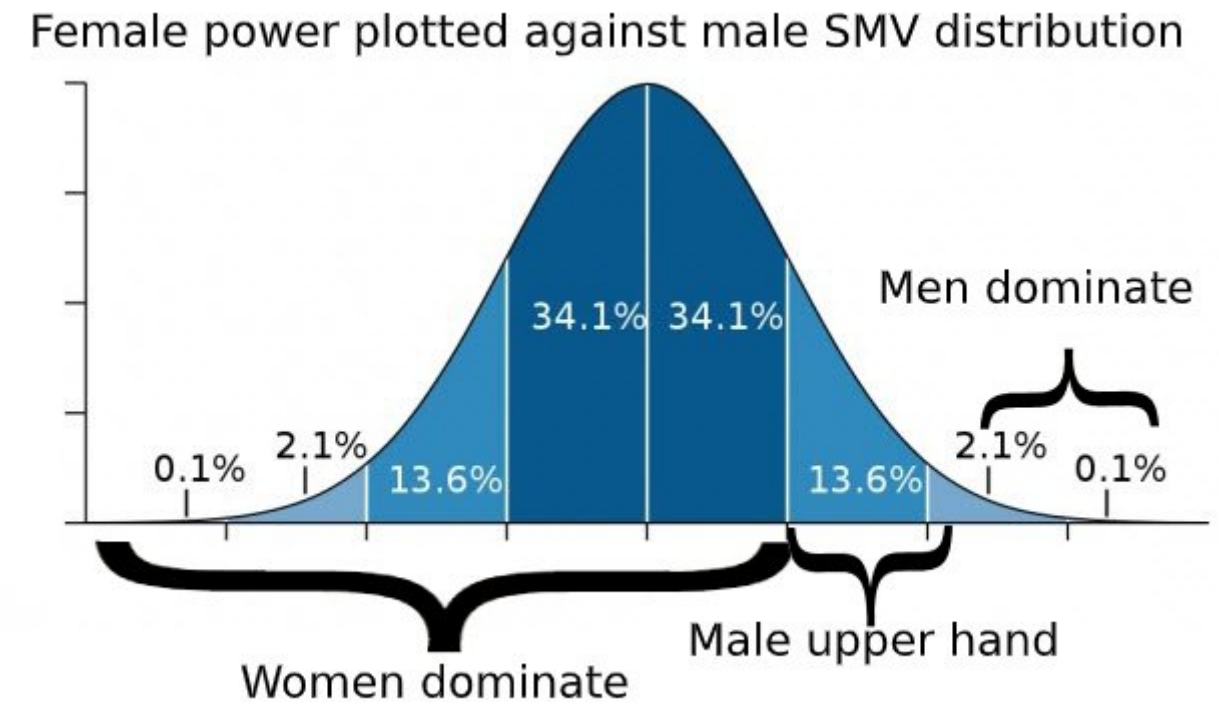

Image Source: The Power Moves: The Sexual Marketplace: Overview of Intersexual Dynamics (2020/9/26)
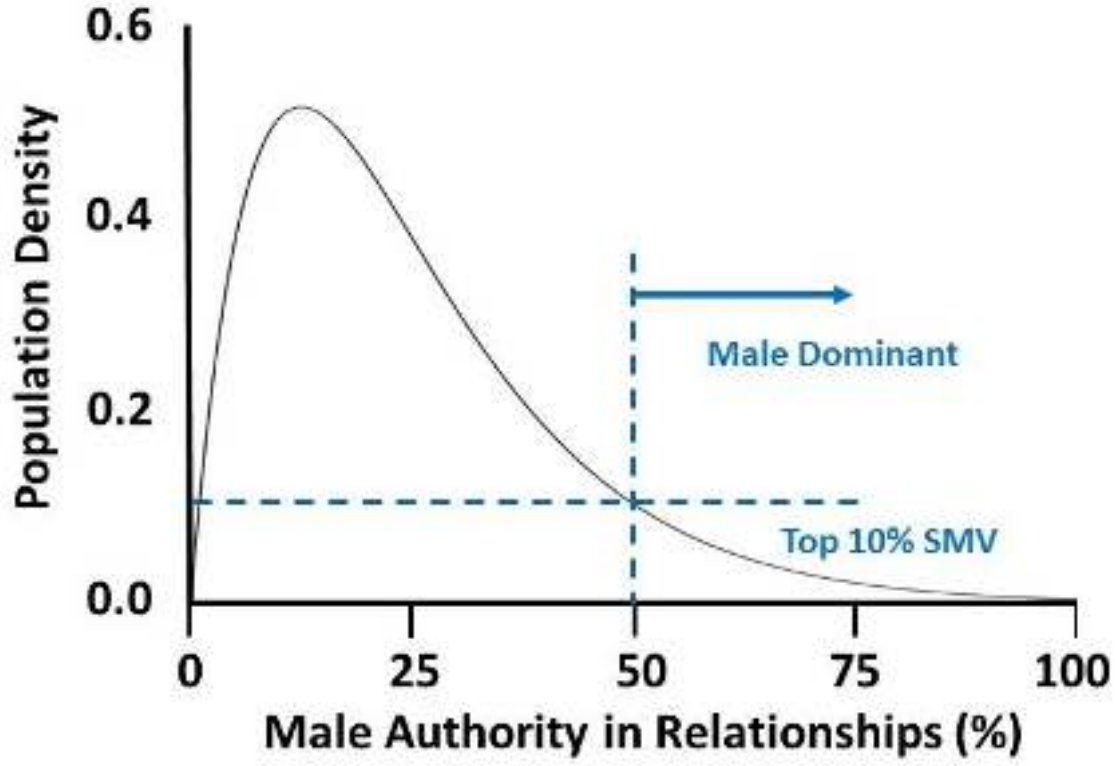
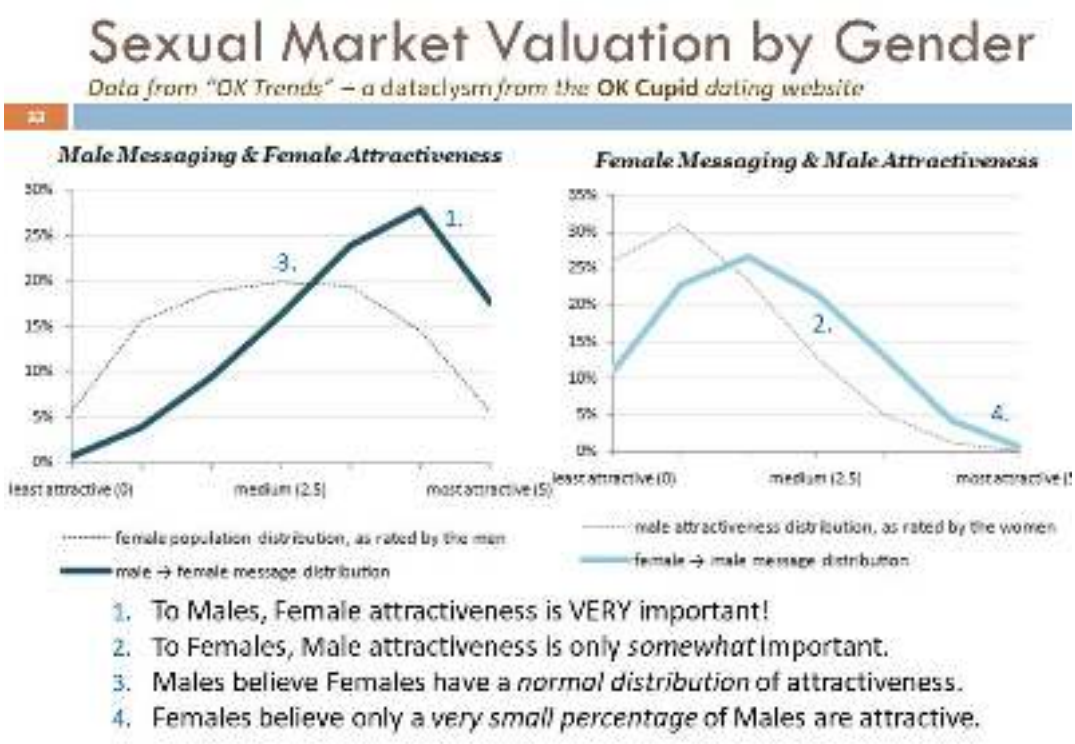
If we were to plot the real world distribution of male authority under the present system, it would look something like this.



Note that this distribution of authority closely resembles the male attractiveness distribution shown in the graph on the right below.



This is no coincidence. Without male authority being imposed by the church community, the whole substance of male authority is reduced to their SMV markers. Thus, women see church-going males through the same SMV speculum that they place on secular men, except that church-going men can't compete because they have been hobbled by Complementarianism, emasculated by Egalitarianism, and limited in their sexual conduct by the burdens of conscience.

The only way out of this mess is to reinstate masculine authority in the defacto sense as imposed by the church community.

Conclusions

All in all, Complementarianism is most accurately thought of as weak men trying to appease women in their congregations and denominations and being willing to bend the scriptures in doing so. (Dalrock has done the vast majority of the work in uncovering this.)

Egalitarianism is simply understood as an attempt to dismiss Biblical teachings on wifely submission (e.g. Ephesians 5:22-33; I Peter 3:1-7) as being outdated and culturally irrelevant in today's modern gynocentric (and sex-drenched) culture.

In practice, Complementarianism and Egalitarianism are essentially the same, except for what goes on in people's heads. Men get an excuse to be weak, women get a free pass, and everyone can still think of themselves as good Christians.

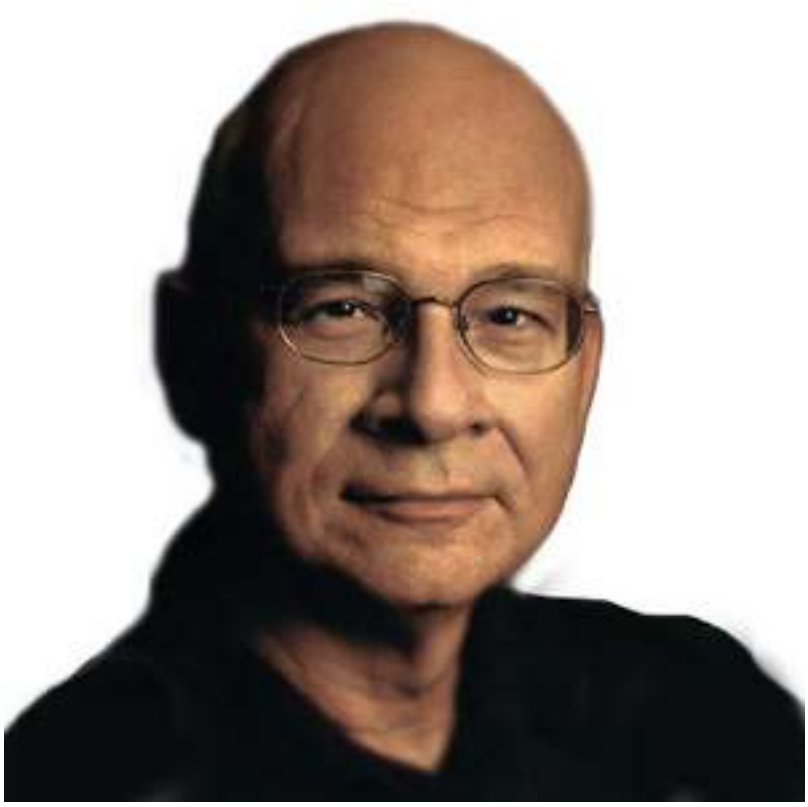
Introduction

Aaron Renn's latest newsletter, Newsletter #78: Big Eva Says Out with Complementarianism, In with Anti-Fundamentalism (2023/7/17), examines some recent developments in New Calvinism's hefty influence on Big Eva. He focuses on the intra-church political stances of the late Tim Keller and his younger protege Russel Moore and how they're planning to "adjust" their theological stances to appeal to the popular masses of churchians. It is hoped that this might preserve the legitimacy of New Calvinism among the next generation, and it is expected that this move could possibly consolidate the power and authority of the Protestant church in an age when the church is losing cultural relevancy. If successful, it may even become the grand historical legacy of New Calvinism as a religious movement.

Renn is speaking to a slightly different audience than the Based / Manosphere / Red Pill crowd, and so his description of Complementarianism isn't anything like what we're familiar with. So in order to offer readers a sensible understanding of this topic, I put together the previous post, The Beta Factory (2023/7/24), which compared Complementarianism and Egalitarianism, both in theory and in practice.

In contrast to the Christian Manosphere's defacto approach, Keller and Moore (and Renn himself in his report) are not addressing the nature of real intersexual relationships, but are more focused on official church policies about gender identities and gender roles within the church. As such, they are sticking to an abstract theoretical approach of Complementarianism and Egalitarianism (i.e. men and women are "equal" and have complementary roles and responsibilities). For example, the word "Complementarian" denotes that women should not be allowed to hold a church office, whereas "Egalitarian" implies that men and women are equally welcome to fill any and all roles including elders and pastors.

Renn's article only makes sense within the context of these solipsistic abstractions, so when you read Renn's piece, think of it in terms of Christianese politics and selling an egalitarian message that would appeal to the vast majority of Blue Pilled churchians. Once you understand these assumptions, it reframes the whole context. If the reader fails to think within this frame while reading his essay, you probably won't be able to follow what they're talking about. I (Jack) had to read Renn's newsletter twice to pick up on this, the second time with these things in mind.



Timothy Keller

Russell Moore

Keller's Plan to Shift the Overton Window Leftward

Before his death, Tim Keller devised a strategy that is best described as a scheme to form a more monolithic Protestant entity which would be more or less "catholic". By "catholic", I'm not implying any reference to Roman Catholicism, but rather as the word means, "universal in extent; broad or wide-ranging in tastes, interests, or the like; having sympathies with all; broad-minded; liberal*".*

Perhaps the easiest way for readers to understand what is happening is to think about it from an Overton Window perspective. What Aaron Renn is talking about is the next step for moving the church forward as the Overton Window shifts along societal lines. (Renn never states this explicitly, but leaves it to the reader to gather from the overall context.)

Renn reports of a plan contrived by Keller in his later years, in which the two largest factions of the church, the Complementarianists and the Egalitarianists, are merged together under one doctrinal teaching. This is recast, predictably, as an appeal for "unity", but the result of this superposed doctrine is decidedly more Leftist and is only about unity in terms of official church polity.

Concerning the polity, this is a case of theologians trying to make the message more palatable to the masses instead of keeping with the simple message of God's word and courageously telling the truth, which is that male elders are to be the authority over the church, husbands are to be the authority over their wives as the weaker vessel, and that this structure of authority is necessary to raise their congregations and children respectively in the fear of the Lord. The message that men need to hear is that their authority is good and necessary, and should neither be neglected (e.g. the sin of Adam) nor abused (e.g. if they lord that authority over their wives and kids instead of using that authority to raise and protect them the way a shepherd protects a flock).

Aside from a cowardly omission of these simple truths, the error in Keller's plan is that instead of reforming the actual problems of Complementarianism and Egalitarianism within the church, the intended implementation entails a broad political shift for the church to stay closer in line with societal norms in order to retain relevancy and gain traction with a larger mass of people. Renn's article reports that Russel Moore, et al. are actually working on the task of combining the false doctrines of Complementarianism and Egalitarianism (or else blend the boundaries) and coopt this combined ideology to consolidate warring factions of the church and prevent it from dying.

Critical readers will find that there is a conspicuous absence of any scriptural foundation or adherence to doctrine, and that Keller, Moore, et al., are subtly assuming a very liberal and pragmatic approach in tinkering with the false doctrines of Complementarianism and Egalitarianism that are already established.

The most interesting thing about the quotes in Renn's article is that they are from men who are very scripturally knowledgeable, and yet they appear to be entirely ignorant of the horrendous effects of women's desire for unfettered feminine control, as if they have never had to endure this from their own mothers and wives. This is the most likely explanation for why these men who know scripture so well can tie themselves into knots trying to reinterpret scripture that is so simple to understand, in a manner that more aligns with current societal trends in the West.

Fundamentalism is the Sacrificial Lamb

Aaron Renn wrote a follow-up post to his newsletter, entitled, Who Is a Fundamentalist? (2023/7/20). Here, Renn summarizes Keller and Moore's take on Fundamentalism as basically, "It's so uncool." Renn goes further by tacitly agreeing that Fundamentalism has some real problems that need to be addressed. On this he writes,

> "There is a sort of fundamentalist social impulse that is anti-intellectual, overly wedded to Americanism (though of multiple varieties, often not of the kind Keller seems to have in mind), and is very focused on doctrinal purity and pursues that through a general posture of hostility and combativeness."

IOW, the problem with Fundamentalism is that its constituents actually revere the scriptures, they are resistant to convergence, and they aren't "nice enough" for Churchian / Feminist sensibilities.

It is not stated explicitly, but I would assume that Headship (as we understand it) is an assumed part of Fundamentalism. It's sad that any mention of Headship is so assiduously avoided. After all, this is the very thing that allows a man and wife to reflect the image of God and thereby extol His glory through their union.

The bottom line is that, in making this shift, they're rejecting Fundamentalism and Headship in favor of MORE Egalitarianism!

Final Statements

Society has shifted leftward for the last 100 years or more in the West. Since the increasing rise of Feminism about 50 years ago, the church has modified its views on marriage and church leadership in an attempt to make its doctrine palatable to the masses. The bible clearly puts men in authority over the church and over their own wives and kids. This does not work with modern sensibilities so we get Complementarianism and Egalitarianism, which was the focus of the previous post, The Beta Factory (2023/7/24).

Well, as our regular readers know, women are never satisfied with anything other than world domination. Eve lived in a perfect paradise and yet she was still unhappy that she did not have God the Father's power. So the appeasement of 50.1% Complementarianism would never last.

Once the reader can see how society is shifting further away from God, while masculinity and masculine authority are increasingly under attack, it becomes clear that Keller, Moore, et al. are looking to affect inter-protestant church politics such to move further away from God's order to a place where Egalitarianism is adopted as an official church doctrine.

Overall, Keller's strategic move towards the centrist Complementarian / Egalitarian line is not incongruent with his leftward intellectual move in his later years. Later in life, especially during the Trump years, Keller seemed to move politically leftward. His stance on having families with children accept h0m0sexu@l people into their homes to allow them to experience family life is an example of this, as he'd rather bow to the alphabet mafia under the guise of grace and forgiveness rather than simply explain how the gospel of salvation works and tell them to come to God to overcome their sin.

Perhaps it is a sign of the times that Keller and Moore are not even trying to hide their motivations to feed the masses what is most appealing to them rather than the truth. This is Herodianism (converging with political expediencies and the popular mood of the times). Jesus warned us against this in Mark 8:15.

Overall, their efforts are doing little more than propping up churchianity for another generation or so. This can't be good, and it can't last for much longer. If this is the forecast, I expect the church will continue to shrink in numbers and its reputation in the West will continue to decline, simply because it is not that much different from the World, except with the added burdens of sexual purity and marriage — both unpopular teachings that easily morph into legalism (another thing Jesus told us to avoid in Mark 8:15).

Judging by the way Keller, et al. are playing fast and loose with scripture as a tool to be utilized for political expediencies, New Calvinism, and Big Eva by extension, is dangerously close to becoming "catholic" in another sense — believing that they act as ecclesiastical arbiters of the authority of Christ, and that the political authority of churchianity / New Calvinism / Big Eva IS His Holy authority.

As time goes on, I expect whatever remains of Protestantism will become more converged, yet also more authoritative, similar to what happened with the Catholic church a millennium ago.

Imagine a church which requires the sacrament of a debased egalitarian marriage as a necessary prerequisite for salvation.

Men's Altruistic Idealism in an Age of Apostasy

Hard Times and Weak Men

As Thedeti and I described in the Zeitgeist Reports — Part 1, Part 2, Part 3, The Beta Factory (2023/7/24), Tweaking Complementarianism for Mass Consumption (2023/7/26), and other posts this month, we are living in a time of great social and spiritual upheaval.

We are experiencing the same spiritual conditions now that the prophet Micah did in the 8th century B.C.*

> [8] Recently My people have arisen as an enemy —
> You strip the robe off the garment
> From unsuspecting passers-by,
> From those returned from war.
> [9] You evict the women of My people,
> Each one from her pleasant house.
> From her children you take My splendor forever.
> Micah 2:8-9 (NASB)

 Micah (ca. 740-670 B.C.) prophesied from approximately 737 to 696 BC. He was the first prophet to predict the downfall of Jerusalem in 722 B.C.*

It is said that history never repeats itself, but it often rhymes. In contrast with Micah's description, today's rich are fleecing the middle-class. Women are disrobing themselves for every man who passes for a Ch@d / HVM. Men are returning from war to find themselves cucked, used, and discarded. Women are advised to evict themselves by choice from their father's home to pursue various worldly life scripts. And there is little difference between the World and those who call themselves Christians.

The end result is the same. Women are exposed and disgraced and the children are cut off from the heartfelt knowledge of the Lord's splendor.

Eventually, the women pass into self-absorbed ignominy (many of the wine and cats variety) and those children grow into "men" (lower case m).

Image from How to Beast: A Generation of LOST MEN (The Masculinity Crisis).

Men are Spiritually Broken

We are now looking at a generation of men who have been treated like defective women and who have been systematically beat out of competition by morally deficient men.

We are dealing with a generation of men who did NOT have the privilege of seeing their fathers as masculine men who were honored and respected by their mothers when they were children. Consequently, they never knew the authentic love of the Lord through their parents' sacrificial love for each other.

We are suffering with a generation of men who never experienced a father's loving Headship authority during their upbringing, and thus have never experienced the presence of the Lord.

We have an epidemic of men who had feminist mothers who cucked their fathers before they even married, and later frivorced their fathers leaving them high and dry with a cynical and hopeless attitude towards marriage and family.

Furthermore, these men didn't get enough unconditional love from their gynocentric solipsistic feminist mothers, so now they're desperately and hopelessly looking for women among their own generation — women who are even more defiant and morally deficient than their mothers — to match this need and fill up the emptiness in their hearts.

In a sense, Feminist mouthpieces are correct in calling men immature boys / man children. But it's not because men aren't giving women what they want (as they say). It's because Men's masculine development has been emasculated / retarded / suppressed by feminist mothers, by decades of progressive values / norms / ideologies, by churchian beta factories, by gynocentric laws, by parental divorce, and by having no masculine role models.

This is where we as a society are right now.

Men Expect Women to be Ideal

As a result of (or in spite of) these enervating and punishing conditions, Men continue to hold themselves to the old standards of Chivalry in their regard for women. In fact, it is in Men's nature to do so on account of one strength / weakness in particular — Men's undying romantic / idealistic love, and how this shapes Men's view of women as being the primary recipients of that love.

On this, The Eye of Sauron wrote,

> "The ubiquitous Blue Pill conditioning plays upon and exploits Men's biggest weaknesses. Our undying romantic / idealistic love. Our innate sense of responsibility and accountability. Our propensity to simply work harder in the face of adversity. Our tendency toward introspection, self-reflection / improvement and raising the standards — striving for excellence. Our faith that logic and reason can be imparted to all and they will simply comply."

All of these traits and more are coopted by the Feminine Imperative for the benefit of women, as has been discussed at length here and elsewhere.

In this, there is some degree of projection on the part of Men. Men imagine women to be Moral Agents who are Strong and Independent enough to be lovingly empathetic to Men. Therefore, Men, especially Blue Pilled men who remain ignorant of reality, expect women to be actively affectionate, kindhearted, and considerate of their wants and needs.

Then… Men become deeply angry, bitter, and/or disappointed when it is discovered that women are not actually like this, contrary to what they have been taught, told, and led to believe.

We call this experience "Taking the Red Pill" and the resulting angst, "Red Pill Rage".

Ultimately, this disappointment arises from having their Blue Pilled perceptions of reality destroyed, especially the liberal notion of women being "equals" which infers that women have all the uniquely masculine traits EoS described above.

When Men discover that their projected idealizations of women are false, injury is then added to insult when they learn that Men are literally on their own, and that all these defiled solipsistic women, helpless children, and all of society are riding on their backs.

We call this experience "Taking the Black Pill".

Men Expect Themselves to be Ideal

When reality is so bitter, it is tempting to escape into fantasy if only to retain one's sanity and keep one's hopes alive. Not only do Men like to entertain the notion that the women in their lives are perfect princesses with a pink P pocket, Men also like to think this about themselves too.

For example, one commenter wrote in regarding the sh!tlord deti approach,

> "Where does the patience, bearing, believing, hoping, and enduring come into your method of doing things?"
> "It's just that your way (at least seems) to lack the grace and mercy that I know Christ has surely shown to me in my life. It also seems to lack many of the other attributes of what the Bible tells us that love is. I am not going so far as to say that it's not right, it's just that I have a hard time reconciling it with the standard we husbands have been given… to "love your wives as Christ loves the church".

Here, the commenter is holding himself to love his wife altruistically, in spite of her displaying the worst sorts of defiant behavior (which is a necessary condition for taking The deti Route). In this context, whether the husband is being sufficiently merciful and forbearing is not the question. The true question is one of appropriateness and effectiveness. Men should not close their eyes or look the other way when the Curse of Eve overcomes their wives, and thereby allow sin to proliferate, nor should they love their wives more than Christ Himself. And we should not forget how Christ loved the 7 churches in Revelation 2 and 3. The problem with each church was different, but the message for all was essentially, "Get your act together before the Almighty's wrath descends upon you!"

How difficult will it be for men to forsake the quiet desperation of the autopilot, wake up from their idealistic daydreaming, reassess the efficaciousness of their altruistic habits, and engage life with the force of reckoning with reality?

The Philosophical Basis of Secularized Altruism

Jack · 31 July 2023 · Archived copy · Original

Altruism is considered to be the essential constitutive trait of a moral agent. But should it be?

Philosophical Foundations of Secular Altruism

Altruism was recast as a secular virtue by philosophers of the late Post-Enlightenment period, probably first and foremost by Immanuel Kant (1724-1804). Perhaps the most important contribution of Kant towards secularizing the morality of altruism is in defining morality and moral action in terms of a particular type of motive. In Kant's epistomology, doing something that actually helps people is not sufficient evidence that one is a moral agent. Only when it is crystal clear that there can be no inkling of self-interest attached to one's motive can it be certain that an action is truly moral.

Kant offered some famous examples of this in his book, Groundwork for the Metaphysics of Morals (1785). One example was of a benevolent philanthropist who has a good will towards others and who enjoys helping people in need. Kant's approach is to question his motives. Maybe he's doing it to improve or embellish his public reputation. Maybe he has cronies that he's patting on the back in return for some other favor. Maybe he's doing it to appease a guilty conscience. Maybe he's donating to charity in order to receive a tax break. Maybe he's receiving a compensation from the government or a social agency. Maybe he makes so much money that what he gives to philanthropy is no more than small pocket change to him and is thus inconsequential to his own financial status.

Any action that would elicit direct beneficial consequences to one's self, such as feeling good about participating in social interaction, receiving gratitude, public acclaim, or remuneration, are possible motivators of self-interest and therefore do not define morality. Such a man gets no moral credit, according to Kant, if there are ulterior motives behind an ostentatious moral action, because any of these motives would certainly cast into question, challenge, or negate the moral credit of his action. Even if it is simply the case that he feels good in doing it, and that's the only reason he does it, there is no moral credit there.

The only clear case that Kant gives in which someone gets moral credit is if they hate their life, they hate everybody else, but they tear themselves away from that stupor of bitterness and help people out anyway. Only then can the observer be certain that a person is acting out of purely moral incentives.

The bottom line for secularized altruism is NOT about the willful act of helping other people, it's NOT about the mercy or grace demonstrated, it's not about the efficacy nor wisdom nor outcome thereof, nor even about motive as Kant argued; the bottom line of altruism is the suffering of the moralized individual. True morality, according to the Post-Enlightened ethic, is shown in a blood sacrifice. You have to let others see you bleed. You have to be nailed to a cross. Kant makes this very explicit in his book, Critique of Practical Reason (1788).

Secular Altruism is NOT Christian

In spite of the obvious parallels with the sufferings of Christ, Kant's philosophical analysis of altruism is not a Christian one.

Kant is perhaps rightly critical of human nature in assuming a possible ulterior motive. There is always the suspicion that, even if it is not apparent, there might be some secret, self-interested incentive that is motivating one's action, and it is necessary to assume that such an incentive might be competitive or malevolent in nature. But this departs from the Biblical social structure and only becomes of value in an atomized society and/or for those who lack spiritual discernment. In these contexts, Kant may very well be correct from an epistemological view — if you want to be absolutely certain that a person is totally selfless and acting for the right reasons, and thus worthy of receiving moral credit (which is a proxy for trustworthiness), the only way to know for sure is if the person in question is experiencing embarrassment, loss, pain, and/or suffering through his/her own moral actions.

The point at which Kant's rational epistemology departs from Biblical Christianity is in his basic assumption that self-interest disqualifies the moral value of an action. True morality, according to the scriptures, is in discerning good from evil, acting towards the greater good, and eschewing evil. The greater good most often appears in the form of glorifying God somehow, or in dispensing grace and obtaining blessing for God's own people, or for those of one's own family or tribe, or for those under one's domain of authority (e.g. masters over servants, officers over soldiers, parents over children, supervisors over employees, etc.). It also appears in the form of discipline and rebuke in the case of sin or rebellion. But since the Biblical social structure is feudal and hierarchical in nature, doing what's good for one's own tribe is also doing what's good for one's self. "He who loves his wife loves himself." (Ephesians 5:28) Although self-interest may indeed be selfish or even morally wrong in certain expressions, self-interest itself cannot be isolated and rebranded as an act of wrongful selfishness.

For those interested in further reading on this topic, Bruce Charlton and Francis Berger have written extensively on the pitfalls of secular altruism. Berger says secular altruism is a symptom of people who have rejected reality. In Berger's post, Loving Others As You Love Yourself Hinges On The Self You Love (2020/7/16), he describes how the Golden Rule has been deceptively coopted as a justification for secular altruism. Charlton notes that secular altruism is responsible for Political Correctness and is the antithesis of Christian love. A small selection of their posts on this topic are given below.

Summary

The value of Kant's epistemology is as follows.

1. It provides a fairly reliable method of determining the trustworthiness of an individual in an atomized, foreign, or unfamiliar social structure.
2. It emphasizes the necessity of being willing to go whatever distance may be required (a mark of masculinity).
3. It elucidates the nature and the power of sacrifice and suffering as thoroughly convincing evidence of selfless concern and perhaps love.

In some instances, such as in a missionary marriage, cross-cultural evangelism, and in the grand case of Jesus Christ's love for mankind, this may be what is ultimately required for humility and trust to sink into the observer's / recipient's conscience and for mercy, grace, and love to take effect.

Kant's views of Secular Altruism are incongruent with Christian morality in the following ways.

1. It ignores the fact that solidarity and social capital are characteristic indicators of a healthy society (i.e. one that is feudal or tribal in nature).
2. In Kant's view (which has come to be widely held by Westerners), altruistic actions are and should be indiscriminate of the beneficiary, whereas in the Biblical view, moral actions should be primarily directed towards one's own dependents, family, tribe, etc. It is considered foolish to help strangers without any sense of evangelism, moral purpose, or responsibility, or without any interest in integrating that person into one's family / tribe / domain of authority.
3. It assumes that self-interest is necessarily immoral, when in fact, serving God has moral value whether it has immediate or distal benefits to the self or not.
4. It puts the observer in the place of God in judging the moral value and the heart motivation of the moral agent in question.
5. It dismisses many benefits of maintaining a good will as inconsequential, such as exercising personal discipline, helping others (especially those under one's domain of authority), and therefore demotivates such actions. Instead, it is right for such actors to be recognized, honored, and rewarded.

Who will Take Care of Men?

Men's Altruistic Nature is Redemptive

In Men's Altruistic Idealism in an Age of Apostasy (2023/7/24), I described how altruistic idealism is a very common trait inherent in Men. Men expect, hope, and strive for the ideal, both for themselves and from women, even though Men are deeply broken and these ideals are thus out of reach.

Going further, this characteristic nature of Men is not limited to Men's stance towards themselves, women, and romance. It also appears in Men's attitude towards his fellow man. This is most obvious among Red Pill content creators and Men in the Manosphere who are waking up from the Matrix. Men have been wronged in ways that they do not fully comprehend, and the conditions that we now live in have now made it appropriate and right to be empathetic towards Men. Thus, we can now observe a growing concern for Men who have been indelibly wronged.

For example, consider the following case studies.

Case Study 1 — "No One Cares"

Here, The Thinking Ape describes the growing empathy for men as a new "movement" of sorts that is increasingly pointing out the disadvantages that men suffer from. He takes a very negative view of this, citing men's basic role in society and saying it will not actually make any difference. Although he may very well be right, he comes dangerously close to adopting a victim mindset.

The Thinking Ape: The "New Men's Movement" (2023/7/28) Length: 10:23

Case Study 2 – Better Bachelor becomes a Secular Minister

Over the past year, Joker at Better Bachelor has shifted his overall stance. He used to be more cynically focused on women and society, but lately he has made a subtle shift towards focusing on his male viewers themselves. As a result of this change, his popularity has surged.

For example, take a look at this video from Joker. (The first few minutes are sufficient for readers short on time.)

Better Bachelor: But... but... Who will pay for what women want? (2022/4/13) Length: 24:48

Joker says (at 0:30),

> "When you start diving in and reading between the lines, all of a sudden you start realizing the real reason society freaks out about men staying single.
> They don't really care about men staying single, they worry about the repercussions of men staying single. Again, it's not about the poor guys. It's about, "Oh, what's gonna happen to the rest of society?"

Then he goes on to review an article to show that nobody cares about men.

The Black Pill is the Current Red Pill

Likewise, most of the popular Red Pill voices come from this same perspective. Some are dignified and reasonable (e.g. Alexander Grace, Casey Zander, Iron Disciples, Rev. Jesse Lee Peterson at The Fallen State, Joker at Better Bachelor, Kevin Samuels, Dr. Orion Taraban at PsycHacks, Phillip Scott, Stage in the Sky, Thinking Ape), while others are profanely crass (e.g. Fresh and Fit, Poor Man, Rollo Tomassi, The Red Man Group, Whatever), and everything in between (e.g. 33 Secrets, Dhar Mann, Greg Adams, Man Talk, MHD, MEN, MTR, Strong Successful Male, Taylor the Fiend).

As an aside, the widespread expectation among Men for women to exercise their non-existent agentic capacity towards being "understanding comforters" of the male plight is why so many female online personalities have jumped on the Red Pill and Trad-Wife bandwagons — and it's not because they truly care for Men, but because that's where the $$$ is.

But whatever the ethical system or philosophical flavor or socioeconomic status or subculture that is portrayed in any of these channels, for every one the message is, "Women are careless, cruel, heartless, promiscuous, scavenging, self-centered Vagabonds. Society, law, and life itself are stacked against men. Men are getting the shaft in every way imaginable. There has been a dearth of strong male role models…

…and NOBODY CARES!"

In most all of these case studies, the natural response that is provoked in the hearts of the male audience is, "So who will take care of Men?" The absence of a satisfying answer inevitably leads one to the Black Pill.

The Cynically Compassionate Voice of the Black Pilled Manosphere Speaks to Men's Deepest Needs

This message is not just sensationalism contrived for clicks and cash. This message generates $$$ because it resonates with the generation of men I described above.

One commenter articulated this common experience when he wrote,

> "I realised that I never had role models to look up to in all of my life as a disciple. There is no man who is out and up there showing himself to be, at least, competent in managing his wife, family and household. There is no importation of wisdom on how to deal with females, specifically wives and their frequent spells of emotional upheavals. I don't need an older man to avail himself as a mentor but just by short conversations and casual sharing the imparting of wisdom can be possible."

It is not unreasonable to believe that he is speaking for a whole generation of men.

Black Pill advocates, apostles, prophets, and content creators are responding to men's needs and they are doing men a great service by pointing out these bitter truths in an empathetic way that edifies men who are waking up from their Blue Pill delusions.

From a superficial assessment, we might conclude that Joker, The Thinking Ape, et al. are merely Black Pilling men with hopelessness, but the fact that men need these kinds of talks is telling of men's general concept of masculinity and of themselves. From a more comprehensive view, this is only the first step of a long process which involves guiding men to face their situation, forsaking their false hopes in society and women, and ultimately working through the 5 Stages of Unplugging — which is what men really need the most.

The way out of this mess is for Men to recognize women as being the weaker vessel, come to terms with their deeper assumptions and expectations of women, get their inner game together, and assume the mantle of a Head (1 Corinthians 11:3,7-9; 1 Peter 3:1-7). Of course, this will be a looong slog through hell, but still, we see men like Joker and The Thinking Ape are making some incremental progress on this.

Epilogue

We could think of the current Men's sphere as four groups.

- The last remaining starry eyed Blue Pill rubes.
- Churchianity is The Beta Factory.
- Black Pill communities are the half-way house.
- Christian Red Pill communities are the Beta Hospital.

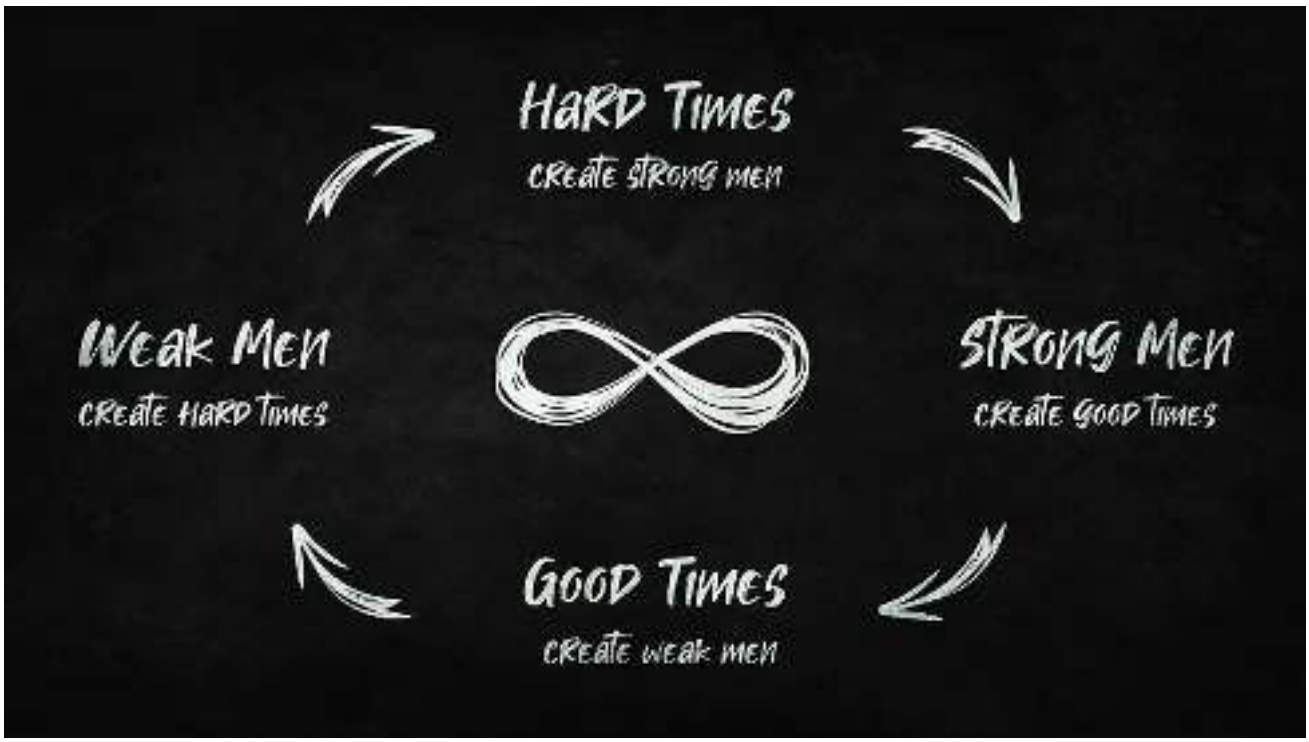
As time goes on, more and more Men are having their eyes opened to the reality on the ground, hence the continually growing popularity of Black Pill media.

Just like the last of the Greasers passed through in the early 1970s (20+ years after the social phenomena's heyday), right now, the last of the Blue Pillers are becoming old school and are slowly fading away. The Red Pill, as it was once known a decade ago, is now embarassingly naive with respect to its cocksure hopes for viable intersexual relationships. Now, the entire Manosphere is drifting into Black Pill territory, and for good reason. Compared to the general populace, Black Pillers see reality more clearly in this regard.

Meanwhile, Men are deeply uncomfortable with the truth that women are NOT their equals, morally and otherwise, partly because it requires them to stop idolizing women as their superiors and put away their lusts for feminine sexual authority, and partly because this puts the onus on Men to initiate a proactive ambition to take their place as Heads.

This is where we as a society are right now, and Joker's message and others like it is what men need to hear.

Yes, my Manospherian Mugwarts! "The best time to be a player" is coming to a close. We have now entered into The Classical Age of The Epic Black Pill, The Great Spiritual Depression of the 21st Century. The Hard Times (and weak men) are here at last!



To answer the titular question, it is Men who will take care of other men — Men who place their trust in God to take care of us all. The emergence of strong Men is coming soon to put things in order, once again.

A Note of Caution: In recognizing that women lack moral agency and are hypoagentic, content creators and Men in general need to be careful that we do not react by going to one of the opposite extremes of either becoming hyperagentic, nor adopting the victim mindset characteristic of W0ke / Progressive Feminism.

Men need to grow out of the lust and poverty mentality that is killing masculinity.

Baby Red Pill is not yet Weaned off the Tits and @ss

Manospherians can all agree that a man should be honored, respected, and sexually desired by a woman. But there is also the deeper conviction that women should treat a man like a virtuous mother would treat her young son, except breastfeeding is replaced by proliferous images depicting scantily clad vixens with plump mammary glands and enough cleavage to burp in. This can be seen in almost every current Red Pill video.

Of course, these are men's spaces, and men find the feminine form inspiring, so it is what it is. However, seeing how many men do not possess the mature mental state required to accept this sort of adult inspiration as an artistic form of beauty, nor are they in a position to make good on that inspiration, it is thus more or less a vector of lust that instills and perpetuates a poverty mentality.

In this video, Casey Zander went off the cuff to express his frustration in catering to the lusts of the masses of men on his channel.

At the 2:00 mark he says,

> "[Producing this content] really affected my mental health to where every single day I would not like the channel and I wouldn't even really like doing this, and truthfully I started to hate who I became, because… what you have to realize and understand is when a man has lust at the forefront of his brain 24/7, […] whether it's titles, tags, thumbnails, anything of the topic of discussion, I think that it turns you truthfully into a weaker man and it also turns me into a weaker man. When a guy has lust and pleasure at the forefront of his brain 24/7 and all the topics and the things that a guy's studying or researching or doing or improving on is strictly to get women, you become super weak…"

As I recall, lust is a sin. Maybe this is precisely why lust is a sin.

Baby Red Pill still needs Hugs

As I described in Men's Altruistic Idealism in an Age of Apostasy (2023/7/28)),

> "There is some degree of projection on the part of Men. Men imagine women to be Moral Agents who are Strong and Independent enough to be lovingly empathetic to men. Therefore, men expect women to be actively affectionate, kindhearted, and considerate of their wants and needs."

Much like a mother would be (or should have been).

There is also the idea that men should be able to be emotionally open and transparent to women. (This is a complex irony.)

The juxtaposition of these deeper beliefs is precisely what produces all the disappointment and psychological outrage when men discover that the tit is ice cold and the milk is sour.

But this is not how a HEAD behaves.

Red Pill Apostle alluded to this failure of men to recognize their God ordained roles as HEADS when he wrote that…

> "Women are not that complex. They want time, attention and some validation, especially in areas that they lack self-confidence. The whole situation is much like the way a good parent guides and builds up a child. Once you stop seeing women as equals and start seeing them as needing guidance and protection, much of what we discuss here gets easier.
> What I mean is that I can get frustrated with my boys or with Mrs. A, but the correct appraisal of their natures helps me with patience and understanding even if I am still the arbiter of discipline. It is much easier to be kind and understanding when my expectations are appropriate."
> "Husbanding, not for the faint of heart."

Epilogue

I expect that the next phase of the societal wide Red Pill Awakening will be when the predominant majority of men shake off their Blue Pill delusions regarding women as irrational but enlightened "equals" with a pisstol holster, and begin to grow into their rightful place as authoritative Heads having a sphere of authority and influence.

For this to happen, men must take it upon themselves to wean themselves off the witch's tit of lust, accept the present state of reality, and become more comfortable with their place as the instigators, movers, and shakers of society.

Forsaking this deeply held idolatry / pedestalization of V Power will be difficult and painful to men's ego investments, and it will require work, so this may be a slow transition.

Update

Casey Zander posted the following video with an update in which he makes reference to God. He is almost going full Roosh. Almost.

Casey Zander: The Emasculation of the Modern Man and the Toxic MANOSPHERE (The END of Casey Zander) (2023/8/3) Length: 7:39

H/T: Thedeti

Zander then deleted the above video on 2023/8/6.

Fortunately, Thedeti was able to provide us with some video excerpts and an audio of the original.

One doesn't build a legacy by deleting published content.

I would guess that Zander is now discovering what Roosh discovered in 2019 — that when he abandons the idolatry of the lust for p00n, he loses the monetary support of his idolatrous followers.

Let us pray for him to stay strong and not look back (Luke 9:62). We can also pray for him to not simply delete his older content as Roosh did, but to reframe it in terms of his faith and testimony.

Rant

I've been around the Manosphere since 2011, at the tail end of Game, and through 2014, when Game finally drew its last breath. We've moved from "Game will get you fast sex", to "Game will get you marriage", to "Game will save your marriage", to "Game works if the woman responds to it", to "women are now Gameproofed", to "Game probably never really worked; it's about women's character", to "Women have no character", to "It's completely and totally hopeless, only top 20% men have any chance". Then it changed to "…only the top 10%". Now it's 5%.

Why?

Mostly because women wanted to be slores and didn't do their part to fix all this, which is primarily to remain sexually chaste until marriage and then to submit to the men they marry. They had one job, and they won't do it. Also because the majority of men were under the gynocentric spell of the Blue Pill and let their power be usurped by women.

Women didn't do that, because they don't want to and don't have to. Men didn't do their part, because they didn't want to.

Now, women are becoming "The First Sex", with men relegated to "The Second Sex".

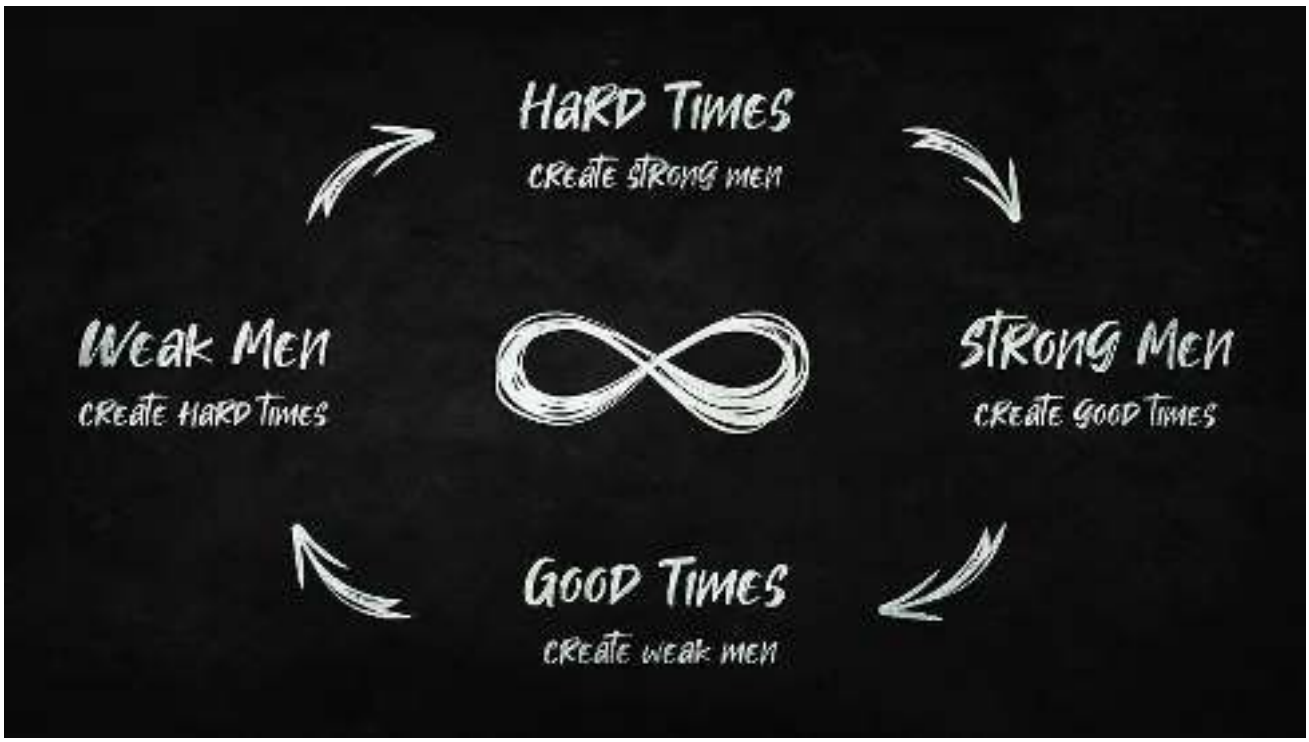
By "The First Sex", I mean women are now outranking men in education and employment, social status and recognition, and men have second class citizen status, or lower if they're "Wh!te". "The First Sex" also means women put sex with Alpha Chads first, and sex only happens when they feel like it.

When women were the second, "weaker" sex, men took care of them. When men have power, they bring along and protect all women. Now that women have power, they are working to exterminate all but the most attractive men, or at best, keep those men tightly controlled and away from them. Now that men are "The Second / weaker Sex", women are canceling and exterminating all but the most attractive of them. Or egging men on to exterminate themselves.

Oh, no one is SAYING unattractive men are being exterminated. That's a taboo topic in our Politically Correct Woke society. But make no mistake about it, that is what's happening, and it's by design.

Predictions

So let's take a look at what will happen in the next 100 years or so. I touched on a lot of this in Zeitgeist Report 2023 — Part 2 (2023/7/13).



Right now, western civilization is at the upper left hand corner of this diagram, on the arrow above "Weak Men Create Hard Times" and pointing to "Hard Times Create Strong Men".

My guess is the USA will have some sort of socialist "revolution" that will do away with the final vestiges of what was once a capitalist / democratic republic, and formalize a socialist / communist style government with Politburo-style / one-party rule that is fascist in polity. IOW, things will stay the same but decisions will no longer be made in secrecy behind closed doors. Instead, there will be a dictator/committee at the helm assisted by megacorporation rule and constant social monitoring and a "social credit" system. No more Constitution. No more individual rights. Private property will be limited / on lien. There will be p!ss poor universal health care including euth@n@s!a for patients whose medical costs exceed their tax revenue + "social credit" value. There will be forced conscription and indentured servitude which will be deceptively labeled "full employment", with the mass of people driven to poverty.

In sum form:

1. Economic contraction as more and more men are shut out of relationships and therefore have little incentive to perform, produce, work, and earn.
2. More and more men producing less and less.
3. "Dirty jobs" not getting done or filled with male slave labor / conscription.
4. A Malthusian population crunch / massive population reduction due to some "reset" / cataclysmic TEOTWAWKI event / series of events.
5. Fall of Western Civilization / Civil War followed by socialist government takeover of some kind.
6. Reversion to Middle Ages-style feudal society with local landowners/ tribal warlords / nobility, ruling over a mass of subsistence wage workers.

We aren't really more advanced than we were in 1723 or 1923. All we have now is gadgets that take us from one place to another faster, make us talk to each other faster, keep us alive longer, and enable women to have sex with more attractive men without immediate negative consequences (i.e. the harbingers of the sexual apocalypse). Those 4 things are all that's changed in the last 300 years, or 3,000 years, really.

All these changes are due to advances in science and technology. So my only question is how technology plays into this. I don't see it going into agrarian middle ages feudalism. I see it more like Demolition Man (1993 movie with Sylvester Stallone and Wesley Snipes), with the mass of people working for MegaCorp and their every move monitored by Big Brother, living in 15 minute cities, requiring internal passports where you need permission to leave your city, without individual rights, and with everyone tightly monitored. Everyone has their iPhones and their virtual pr0n and their entertainment, and they all have just enough to keep them alive. People aren't dying in the streets or of mass starvation. MegaCorp and Big Brother take care of all that.

Film Comics Explained: The CHILLING Prophecy of DEMOLITION MAN (2022/6/14) Length: 11:54

Does anyone see Women as "The First Sex" stopping any of this? Of course not. They want this. They want this so they can have ultimate power, a la the Curse of Eve. Of course, a great fringe benefit for women is that they can all have sex with, and reproduce with, top ~~20%~~ 5% men and share them if they have to; and so unattractive men will be kept away from them.

Western culture is built on a false mythos.

Kevin Dahlgren wrote a piece, Organized crime and the homeless (2023/6/22)*, in which he details the extent to which Portland Seattle has become a hive of scum and villany. It may be hard for us to believe muh Murica could stoop this low. Reading through this article made me realize that the U.S. is already Balkanized and it is continuing to happen as we watch.

NovaSeeker's post, The Amalgamation of Western Culture (2020/12/2), and my more recent post, Tweaking Complementarianism for Mass Consumption (2023/7/26), discussed how secular influences have infiltrated the church and offered a praxeological interpretation of Christianity as seen in its convergence with the larger culture.

To the average Christian, the logical conclusion would be to somehow remove those secular influences. But it is not that simple.

Ed Hurst has written many posts about the intrinsic difficulty of cutting the rotten core out of an outwardly delicious looking apple.

> "You cannot save Western Civilization by taking it back to some previous stage of development. Sorry, but the life cycle of civilizations doesn't work like that; the stump is dead. The thing develops and follows the DNA in the cells. The current nasties — communism, feminism, SJWs, etc. — are the latter stage of a civilization that is dying. They didn't come from outside of the tree; they aren't grafts. Those things were inherent in the seeds of the West. The aging has set in and the tree will never be young again."

> "This is how those who most strongly resist the Gl0b@l!sts and their commie proxies are not our allies. They want to restore what they imagine is the more ancient Christian West. Those who seek to save Western Christianity are dreamers longing for something that was already far, far away from New Testament Christianity. Even if these reactionaries succeed politically, they cannot prevent the West from dying. It never did have God's favor, so it's just a tool to be used and discarded in His plans."
> "Western Civilization stands firmly on the imagination of human greatness without God. It's another Tower of Babel in itself. The Gl0b@l!st efforts to finally pull it all together is paradoxically the death knell. But this is where the West has always been headed. This is the native fruit of its DNA. Complaining that this or that influence is destroying the West is missing the point entirely. The West is devouring itself. Only the culture that God built can last until Christ returns, and that culture is far, far different from the West."
> Radix Fidem: The Native Fruit is Rotten (2020/11/28)

So what is the cultural DNA that Ed mentions here?

Here are a few constituent elements of it.

Western culture is obsessed with ontology and is out of touch with the heart. If you've never lived outside Western culture for at least a few months, then you may not even know what I'm talking about. I didn't really understand this until after I had lived abroad for a couple years, and even after living in Asia for 19 years, I'm still learning about it.

I don't know why this is, but nominally Christian and especially Anglo cultures tend to be ordered around the idea of personal "rights" that are supposedly granted through law or some legislatorial process, but in reality, are little more than a collection of political philosophies that are used to indoctrinate the sheeple in schools and are parroted among the masses.

This concept of "rights" is so ingrained in Western culture that the typical untraveled Westerner cannot even possibly imagine a culture existing without the overarching preeminence of law and order pressing down upon the conscience and forming a misinformation effect that reframes and spins every event into an epic struggle for "democracy", melting-pot "diversity", and "the rule of law and order".

In case you never considered it, this is all mythos — not reality.

In reality, a right cannot be guaranteed by law, except by the faith and good graces of those who execute the law.

I had to live in Asia for several years before I realized that a "right", properly and literally understood, is the ability and freedom to do what is right. It is far removed from both (1) the Western concepts of "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness", which are glib by comparison, and (2) the bitter injustices that pass for law these days.

In reality, these days, it is flatly against the law to do what is right. That is hardly a "right", and it is not right.

In reality, courts will overturn individual "rights" on mere presumption and judicial decision (e.g. child support, Duluth, false MəT00 accusations, No-Fault divorce, etc.), especially when it conflicts with larger political prerogatives.

In reality, elections are set up and rigged such that no matter who you vote for or who wins, you just get a continuation of the same old sh!t. (Donald Trump's presidency was a small hiccup in this pattern, and he's still being persecuted for it by TPTB.)

Then there's this common idea that the "good" people are those who follow the law, and those who don't are "bad" — by definition — as if the law itself is what makes men who abide by it righteous.

The fallacy of this approach becomes more evident when we see that more and more laws are being passed that stand flagrantly against the standard social codes outlined in scripture. It is slowly becoming obvious to those who are aware that this is NOT God's idea of justice nor righteousness.

Even our idea of salvation has been corrupted by the western reliance on law, dualism, and reason. Ed described this in his post at Do What's Right: Terminology: "Getting People Saved" (2020/11/28) [Archive]. Furthermore, I described some of the history of how law and ecclesiastic regulations have changed our whole concept of marriage, and introduced the Enlightened scientific modern age in A Concise History of Marriage Regulations (2023/6/12). The final fruits of this 300+ year experiment is Complementarianism, Egalitarianism, and the feminization of the church, as well as the decline in male authority, the sexual apocalypse, the breakdown in marriage, and widespread divorce.

I'm not saying that God's order is lawless. I'm saying that God's order flows from a deeper communion with Himself and nature. To the typical Western reader, even this sounds like tree-hugging bohemian hippy talk, but that is not it either. The fact that Westerners don't even understand a deeper connection to God and nature only stands as further evidence of how far off the mark we've drifted.

Perhaps the best way to deal with all of this is for the honest hardworking faithful to migrate out of areas of concentrated corruption, and let the system eat itself until it collapses.

Besides that, the best a man can do in these circumstances is to tap into the Source of all wisdom, and return to the ancient, and yet simultaneously, ever refreshingly new ways of God's order. Pray to escape being crushed by the spar strangled edifice as it falls.

The Essence of the Black Pill

Men cannot invest their egos in a gynocentric and sex-centric social system that rejects them out of hand.

Introduction

Jack's post, The Next Step (2023/8/4), described how lust and P00nani pedestalization continues to be a central defining feature of the Men's sphere. The same post also reviewed how Casey Zander is kicking around the idea of forsaking this path and possibly going the way of Roosh.* Zander deleted a recent video conveying his sentiments about this, so he seems to be waffling on this decision. I would guess that Zander is now discovering what Roosh discovered when he became a Christian in 2019 — that when he abandons the idolatry of the lust for p00n, he loses the monetary support of his massive crowd of idolatrous followers.

 It has been observed for some time in the Manosphere, that many of those men who were previously Players / PUAs / Relationship Gurus came to God over the course of time. (Jack wrote about this phenomenon in a post earlier this year.)*

Zander's Omissions

Zander's angle is that he is a HVM talking about an average woman's response to a HVM, which in women's eyes, is getting to be around 5% of the male population these days. Even so, in 2023 America, average women get high quality c0ck thrown at them every day of the week, and many if not most of them are going to sample that from time to time. Around 30% of women are going to go shag wild on it.

But let's face it. If you're a man watching Zander's videos, you're among the 95% of men who have trouble with women.

If you're a man hanging around the Manosphere in 2023, the chances are worth betting on that you are Not Hot.

In fact, most of the reason the Manosphere exists is because generally, the men who come here for help have never been Hot; or they used to be Hot but became Not Hot.

With respect to his audience, Zander has committed a glaring omission of the intersexual dynamics that must necessarily transpire for any of his advice to work for the average man:

1. A man has to have charisma, confidence, Game, LAMPS, etc. and he has to looksmaxx.
2. She has to notice it.
3. She has to like it.
4. She has to come away with the impression of thinking he's Hot.
5. She has to want him so badly that she's inadvertently signaling IOIs. (Women will never tell a man they're interested.)
6. The man has to read her IOIs to know she thinks he is Hot (and women intentionally try to hide this).

Then and only then can you go into all the whiteboard stuff of making her qualify for you and making her earn sex from you.

But if a man can't run through all 6 steps and follow up on it, then absolutely none of this matters. Most men can't even do step 1.

Zander's advice only works "IF She Thinks You're Hot."

Absolutely none of Zander's advice abrogates the rule of "…IF she thinks you're hot."

IF she doesn't think you're Hot, absolutely none of this matters.

IF she doesn't WANT to qualify or earn you, then not one bit of that video means anything. If you are not hot, you can't make a girl earn sex from you. You cannot make a girl earn anything from you if you're not hot.

NONE of this will get you anywhere unless you have something she wants — and money and a good job and a winning personality are not it. She has her own money and her own "job", and she can meet men with "winning personalities" everywhere.

 To women, a "winning personality" has nothing to do with personality. To women, any charismatic hot guy has a "winning personality".*

Categories

Here's the thing that Zander would never say, because it would cost him 95+% of his followers. It's essentially the truth of the Black Pill.

A single man in 2023 falls into one of the following categories, with respect to the SMP/MMP.

1. You are HAWT.
2. You are able to Get Hot if you go to the gym, looksmaxx, work hard, etc.
3. You will never ever be able to Get Hot and you know it.

If you're in category (1), you're probably too busy splitting thatch to waste time reading blogs and watching videos.

If you're in category (2), and you're unable or unwilling to do the work necessary to get on the feminine radar, then you need to forget about women.

If you're in category (3) — you cannot be Hot, then you need to forget about women forever. If you can't do that, or if you genuinely feel called to marriage, then maybe you could try the Passport thing, but that opens up a whole different can of worms I won't go into here, and you shouldn't set your hopes or break your bank on it.

Pill Philosophies

Now that I've covered the basic qualifications, let's get into the psychological phantoms that lead up to the Black Pill.

Following on the heels of Jack's post, Men's Altruistic Idealism in an Age of Apostasy (2023/7/28), Dr. Orion Taraban has just produced a video on how most men are romantics at heart. In this video, he unpacks what Rollo introduced to the Red Pill back in 2011, and he gets much closer to the truth than grifter Zander.

At 2:22, he says,

> "The most common male romantic belief is, "I can be loved for who I am." That's it!"

At 5:00, he says,

> "Men have to provide value in order to secure mating and dating opportunities. If you can accept the truth of this one statement, then everything else that I've been talking about with respect to the behavioral economics of relationships starts to make sense. It is essentially the Red Pill in one sentence. On the other hand, the Blue Pill is the fundamentally romantic ideology that "I can be loved for who I am, that my loyalty and my virtue and my love can and should be enough to satisfy a woman." It's not."

Taraban doesn't mention the core of Black Pill thinking, but I'll get to that in the conclusions.

* To women, being "romantic" has nothing to do with romance. To women, a tall, hot, charismatic guy with some Game and some money is "romantic".*

Taraban's Omissions

What Taraban doesn't spell out is that "value" is relative to what a particular woman wants or needs. This hearkens back to why Game works, and AF/BB — Seed or Greed.

If you want a woman to want sex from you, then the only way to provide "value" (in her eyes) is to be HOT.

If you are Not Hot and a woman is making herself unavoidable or trying to qualify herself to you, it is probably because she wants / needs your resources. You're a beta provider and that is the best you will ever be. And she will treat you as such, usually because she has issues of her own that have nothing to do with you.

If you happen to be Not Hot and loaded with $$$, then you'd better watch yourself at all times. There are millions of women planning and scheming to fleece you of everything they can get.

The way it is, a woman who doesn't have a perpetually damp muff for you will walk all over you with continual disrespect and intransigence because of her natural female narcissism that couldn't care less about the male point of view. She'll usually be boiling over with anger and resentment because of her mommy issues and daddy issues, because Chad pumped and dumped her and wouldn't commit, and because she has to settle for you if she is to have any hope of getting any commitment from any man and the status and resources that will come with it. And she will make you pay dearly for your heinous crimes of Not Being Hot and Being a NonChad.

This is why you must avoid anything with a woman IF you are Not Hot.

Conclusions

In essence, the Black Pill is the realization that a gynocentric and sex-centric society has no place for you in the wet orgasmic folds of its STD infested innards. So if you're a man who still clings to the romantic notions of the Blue Pill, or even a man who has taken the Red Pill but who still worships P00n, then this will be perceived as a cataclysmic ego crushing rejection.

And here's the core of Black Pill thinking:

The Black Pill is the fundamentally self-nihilistic philosophy that "I can NEVER be loved for who I am! Relationships are transactional and my social value hangs on what I bring to the table — and… I have nothing to bargain with! The only reason I could have for not going my own way or else giving up on life is if I could somehow develop a masochistic desire to improve myself and then only to be used as a walking ATM success object."

Jack did a mini-series on the Black Pill back in September 2022 as part of his theme on Redemptive Headship and Masculinity. (See links below under Related.) The running idea behind his posts is that as long as a man laments being rejected from the worldly SMP (e.g. hookup culture), he is (or soon will be) staring into the abyss.

It's true. But the message that bottom SMV men and Christian Men need to remember is that a man is not defined by his usefulness to women, but to God. A man who has been rejected by this fallen gynocentric world is not necessarily rejected by God. A man is only rejecting himself if he chooses the flesh and/or the World over Christ.

The Black Pill Fear of Being Used

Jack · 14 August 2023 · Archived copy · Original

Is it an acute fear of being used, or is it a pervasive fear of living in perilous times?

Readership: All
Theme: Cultural Demise
Author's Note: This post is based on an email correspondence with Thedeti on 2023/8/8-9.
Length: 1,400 words
Reading Time: 7 minutes

Why should I do anything?

Whenever I read through the comments under Red Pill or Black Pill videos on YouTube (take your pick), I always see the same sentiment come up, which is … "Why should I work, earn, perform, improve myself, get married, or do anything, etc. just to have a woman consume it, destroy it, or take it away?"

Reading so many comments like this is how I identified The Essence of the Black Pill (2023/8/11), which is essentially the fundamentally self-nihilistic philosophy that "I can NEVER be loved for who I am! Relationships are transactional and my social value hangs on what I bring to the table — and… I have nothing to bargain with! The only reason I could have for not going my own way or else giving up on life is if I could somehow develop a masochistic desire to improve myself and then only to be used as a walking ATM success object."

Yes, I understand the present SMP/MMP is extremely demotivating. I can understand why a man would not want to lose his livelihood on account of a woman. (It's happened to me.) I won't go into a defense of male utilitarian ethics here, nor will I urge men to throw themselves into the meatgrinder. The issue I want to address is that I see men being tempted to reject striving for livelihood altogether as a preemptive move to prevent that livelihood from being taken away from them. IOW, hopelessness.

The issue at stake here is Masculine identity. God made man to work, create, earn, perform, and provide. Our purpose is to do the work which God gave to each man. Every man has (or should have) a purpose for living. For men who have not (yet) found Christ, a purpose (e.g. ambitions, interests, personal goals, etc.) is what keeps them running. Christian men are called to a more specific purpose. We honor and glorify God by aligning ourselves to the purpose He gave to us Men as individuals.

As Men, we need to find our purpose and stay on it, run the race well, and not be paralyzed by fear.

Fear

One of the biggest confidence / faith killers in Men is fear. It comes in many forms.

- Fear of being used / abused.
- Fear of betrayal.
- Fear of failure.
- Fear of missing out.
- Fear of messing up.
- Fear of not "having what it takes".
- Fear of ostracization (e.g. by a social group).
- Fear of persecution (e.g. accusations of harassment, for being male, for being Incel / MGTOW, for expressing masculinity, etc.).
- Fear of regret.
- Fear of shame.
- Fear of rejection (e.g. by women).
- Fear of being tempted and then either caving in or becoming bitter.
- Fear of the unknown.
- Etc.
- Add your own.

We should not shirk away from our work, our purpose, our calling just because it is difficult. We should not shrink back out of a fear of being used and discarded. We should not give up because of any of the other sources of fear on the above list.

It's fine if God uses us. God made Masculinity to have the general attitude of always looking forward towards the goals, and to hardly ever complain about the personal costs or the pain or the amount of work that is necessary to achieve those goals.

But the cognitive idea in men's minds that I see being expressed in those comments is a fear of being used / rejected by women (and occasionally some other fear listed above).

Some readers might think, "Why would these men fear being used by women if no woman wants them?"

Good question! Maybe being excluded from a horrible experience is a blessing in disguise!

The thing men should be aware of is that deep down this attitude may be more than a reticent disgust for the widespread abuses of gynocentric power. At best, it could be a mental block that keeps men from finding their purpose. Somewhere in the middle is a fear of one's own strong innate desire for female companionship and sexual congress making one vulnerable to lust and/or the worst of wimminz wiles. At worst, this could be an expression of a deeper fear of being used by God — IOW, a coward.

What to do?

Instead of asking, "Why should I do anything?", men should be asking themselves, "What can I do?" "What might I find?" "What does my inheritance from the Lord include for me in this life?" "What is my purpose?"

From a spiritual view, the key question is "Which way am I running? Am I running towards the glory of God, or am I running away from life in fear?"

This proceeds from an assumption that the men in question are low SMV men and also Christian men who are disadvantaged in the secular SMP because of their faith convictions against sexual immorality which make them less competitive. These men will be GTOW mostly because they are unable to attract women. We will have to face the fact that in the coming years, there will be a lot more men in this category. There is going to be a great winnowing of lower quality men from the gene pool, whether we like this or not.

Even so, there will always be men who hope to have a woman but have not yet figured out that it's not in the cards for them. There will always be some upper but not top SMV men who have not yet figured out whether they are on the cusp and can change something at the limit of their awareness, or mature a little more to make it work for them, or whether there is nothing they can do. An ever shrinking number of men could do it if they just had some guidance from older Red Pilled men. Each man has to work through this realization for himself. However, a man should know his own sociosexual trajectory and whether he has any chance with women by the time he's 20. If it hasn't happened by age 25 or so when the die is cast, it's time to rethink one's life strategy concerning women and marriage. There are a few men who might get a second chance in their late 30s – early 40s (peak SMV years for males), but don't count on it.

More than this, it is a deeply personal decision. Some men are determined to have a woman / family come hell or high water, like the Passport Bros, or myself.

So why, then are we telling men not to "shrink back for fear of being used"?

I think it needs to be said. It is an exhortation against fear. It is not offered as a "Man up and marry that h0e" message, if anyone should interpret it as such.

P.S. Seeing how the number of single men is growing, and marriage is becoming archaic and a practically unwise pursuit, one of the dilemmas I'm facing right now as a blogger is whether to continue focusing on men who are struggling with vetting / marriage / managing wives as I have done in the past, or to focus on the larger problem in society, which is the lack of masculinity and the lack of faith shown in men's feelings of helplessness, hopelessness, and not knowing what to do with themselves when women / marriage / family is not an option.

Readers are welcome to comment about any vision they may have for future writing projects.

P.P.S. This is the last post on the theme of Cultural Demise. Thanks to Thedeti for contributing 2 posts to this theme, and to all the readers who shared their thoughts and insights in the comments. The next theme will be Charisma and Chemistry.

Obesity lowers Testosterone

Just as it is so with women, the things that make a man healthy are also the things that make a man attractive.

Conversely, there is a self-fulfilling physiology that is expressed when a man makes himself attractive, he is more confident, he feels better about himself, and his self-respect improves. Voila! He is more healthy!

We all know being overweight kills attraction dead in the water. But it also affects Testosterone — the nectar of holiness.

> "Obesity lowers testosterone levels. For example, a 2007 study of 1,667 men ages 40 and above found that each one-point increase in BMI was associated with a 2% decrease in testosterone. In addition, a 2008 study of 1,862 men ages 30 and above found that waist circumference was an even stronger predictor of low testosterone levels than BMI. A four-inch increase in waist size increased a man's odds of having a low testosterone level by 75%; for comparison, 10 years of aging increased the odds by only 36%. All in all, waist circumference was the strongest single predictor of developing symptoms of testosterone deficiency. And if you doubt these two American studies, just consider Australian research that found almost one in every seven obese men could benefit from testosterone replacement, a rate more than four times higher than in nonobese men."
> Harvard Health: Obesity: Unhealthy and unmanly (2011/3/1)

Not sure if they have the cause and effect reversed. That is, maybe low testosterone leads to less activity resulting in obesity. The outstanding question is whether a man with a pouting paunch can fuel his testosterone by eliminating the pudding and trimming off the padding.

Another article provides us with an answer to that question.

Obesity has adverse effects on the flagellated swimmers.

> "When men shed extra pounds and keep them off, the health benefits may extend all the way to their sperm count, a new study finds.
> The study, of nearly 50 men with obesity, found that those who lost weight by following a low-calorie diet improved their sperm count by about 40%. But there was a catch: They needed to keep the weight off to maintain the higher sperm count.
> And in this case, the weight loss was fairly substantial: After an eight-week low-calorie diet, study participants had lost an average 36 pounds.
> Both the weight loss and rise in sperm count were rapid — and striking, according to Dr. Bobby Najari, a urologist who reviewed the findings."
> UPI: Losing weight may boost fertility for obese men (2022/5/27)

So it is true! Obesity is associated with both lower testosterone and spunk deficiency. But the excellent news is that it apparently works both ways, as described in the introduction. Turn off the telly, cut the jelly, and lose the belly. Reduce the hip to weight ratio, and attract some fellatio.

Are You Overweight?

The Body Mass Index (BMI) has been the gold standard since 1830. However, modern health and fitness information has rendered it archaic. (Personally, I look pretty scrawny when my weight falls within the range classified as “normal”.) Waist to Hip Ratio (WHR) is a slightly leaner general indicator of health and fitness.

Aside from the mathematics, a look in the mirror is probably the easiest and best indicator for how fit you are.

To find out if your weight puts you at risk for low T juice or genitourinary disorders, you need a more precise assessment. Go see your doctor.

If you are overweight, click away on the links below for more information and some inspiration.

Bye bye and farewell, fatty patches!

All the best~!

Liberal Men are Sooo Unmanly!

Back in early June 2023, a liberal carouseler with the moniker ms_petch went on TikTok to rant about how she cannot find a traditionally masculine man who is NOT a Conservative.

Judging by the look of her indignant impertinent smirk, apparently she thinks male qualities are a fungible commodity subject to her whimsical choice.

Her video quickly went viral and was covered by several news stories. Here are a few.

- Fox News: 'Liberal woman' goes viral on TikTok for saying it's hard to find 'masculine' man who's not conservative (2023/6/8)
- Daily Mail: Liberal TikToker goes viral after complaining that the only masculine and chivalrous men she can find are conservative (2023/6/9)
- New York Post: I'm a liberal — it's hard to find masculine men to date who aren't conservative (2023/6/9)
- Washington Examiner: Liberal woman complains that liberal men are not masculine (2023/6/9)

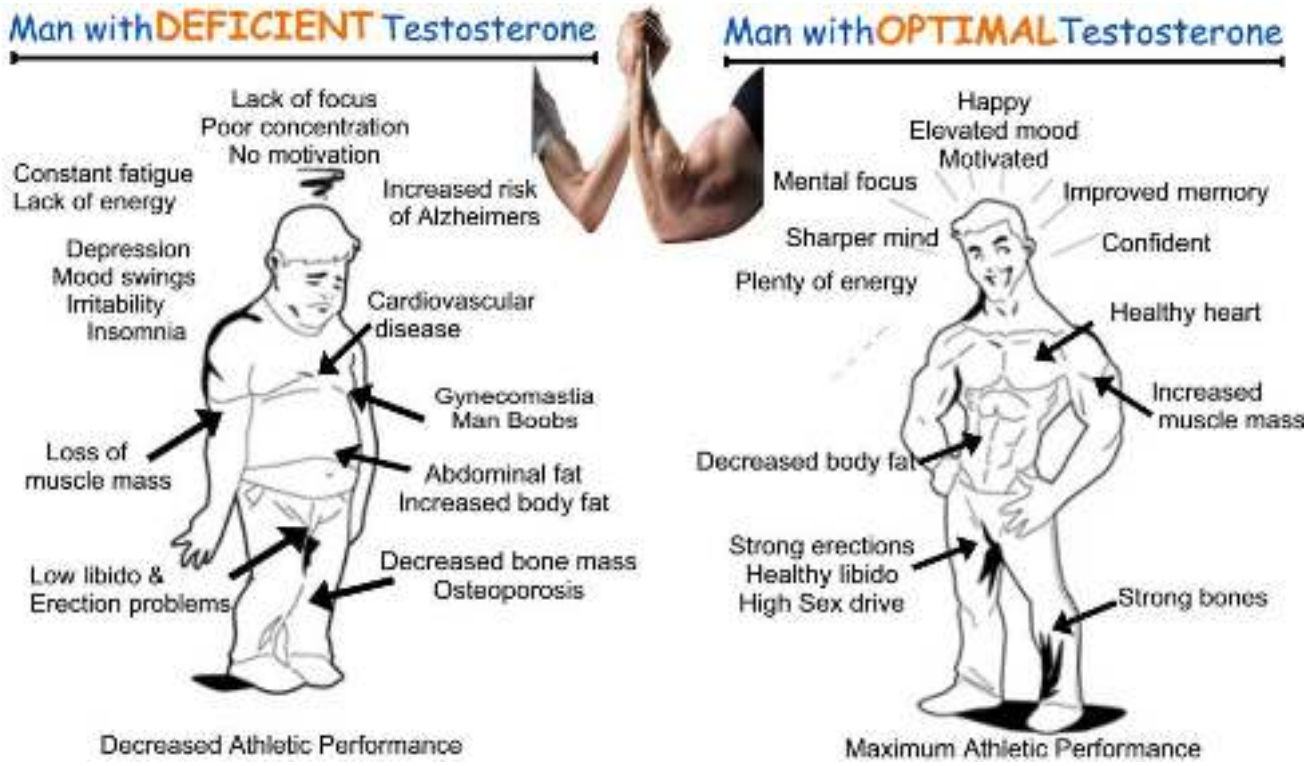
This video was also critiqued by Rebecca Barrett and Amala Ekpunobi.

Hilariously, some of the more liberal outlets (not listed above) reframed her rant as a cry for liberal men to "Man up", which is not much different than Conservatives scolding carousel riders to be chaste and submissive.

Moreover, this is just another embodiment of Selective Feminism / Traditionalism. Women want to select all the traditional aspects that benefit them and they also want all the perks of Feminist 'Equality'. However, they want nothing to do with traditional femininity or morality, and have never considered what kinds of responsibilities true equality might impose upon the unfairer sex. Meanwhile they expect to find a HSMV man who is going to readily accommodate all their stratospheric expectations while they whimsically consider their own contribution towards a relationship to be fully optional.

Some degree of self-awareness is evident at the end of the video, when she proudly asks, "Am I asking to have my cake and eat it too?"

Now ¡Science! provides the answer to her question!



Testosterone Affects Political Orientation

Take a look at this study about how testosterone affects political orientation.

The study – Testosterone Administration Induces A Red Shift in Democrats – was published on 2021/11/14 by Prof. Paul Zak, the Director of the Center for Neuroeconomics Studies at Claremont Graduate University.

> "Our results demonstrate that testosterone induces a "red shift" among weakly-affiliated Democrats," summarized the paper.
> Researchers administered synthetic testosterone or placebo to participants who previously disclosed their political affiliations, allowing researchers to track how the hormone affected participants' politics.
> "When weakly affiliated Democrats received additional testosterone, the strength of their party fell by 12 percent and they reported 45 percent warmer feelings towards Republican candidates for president," explained the study.
> "Before the testosterone treatment, we found that weakly affiliated Democrats had 19 percent higher basal testosterone than those who identified strongly with the party," the study continues, reiterating the correlation between individuals with lower testosterone having left-wing political beliefs.
> While the effects of testosterone waned with individuals who were staunch Democrats or weak Republicans, "our findings provide evidence that neuroactive hormones affect political preferences," posits the study."
>
> "The study comes amidst an ongoing discussion about declining testosterone levels in the U.S. and mainstream media outlets such as The New York Times attacking Fox News host Tucker Carlson for addressing the issue in a recent documentary.
> The unearthed link between hormones and political ideology also follows scientists floating "morality pills" as a method to enforce COVID-19 mandate compliance.
> The National Pulse: STUDY: Testosterone Treatment Turns Democrat Voters More Conservative. (2022/5/18)

So it is just as we suspected. There is no such thing as a Liberal MAN, according to the connotative definition. The two states are diametrically and biologically opposed.

As Sting once sang,

> There is no political solution
> To our troubled evolution
> We are spirits in the material world

Political Polarization between the Sexes

Here's another thing that Zak's study did not bring out.

Because conservatism is directly correlated to testosterone, then not only does this explain why more masculine men tend to be conservative, it also explains why women (who are low in testosterone by nature) lean liberal. As ms_petch made clear to everyone, this biological divergence in society already exists in the political polarization by sex.

That is, until they get married.

If the polarization between conservative male and liberal female keeps growing, then we will eventually get to the point where it will be a rite of passage for young men to go on an epic adventure into the vast and dangerous liberal urban forests to hunt for a feral wife, and upon harpooning one, to domesticate her by training her to be humble, loyal, submissive, and thin Trad Wife.

Peachy Keenan mentions this very idea in an interview she had with the Young Heretics, in which she explains how she was lovingly converted to sound reason and sanity by her conservative husband. A real life Taming of the Shrew.

Testosterone has been Decreasing for Decades

Introduction

In Testosterone is MAGA (2023/8/18), I covered an article about how testosterone (T) affects political orientation.

Here are excerpts taken from two articles that discuss how T has been decreasing for decades. The cited research report [Travison, 2007] describes a substantial age-independent population-level decline in T in American men that is NOT attributable to observed changes in explanatory factors, including health and lifestyle characteristics such as smoking and obesity. The estimated population-level declines are greater in magnitude than the cross-sectional declines in T typically associated with age.

Generational Decline in Testosterone Levels

> "During the past two decades, testosterone levels in American men have rapidly declined."
> "The interesting thing we discovered was that, on average, when we measured the testosterone in the blood of a 60-year-old in 1989 it was higher than that in a different 60-year-old measured in 1995," said Thomas Travison, PhD, of the New England Research Institutes, Watertown, Mass. "We observed the same phenomenon over a wide range of ages."
> "This population-level decline in testosterone concentrations in men is not explained fully by the usual suspects: increasing BMI and prevalence of obesity, certain other co-morbid conditions or decreasing incidence of smoking.
> Healio: Generational decline in testosterone levels observed (2007/2/1)

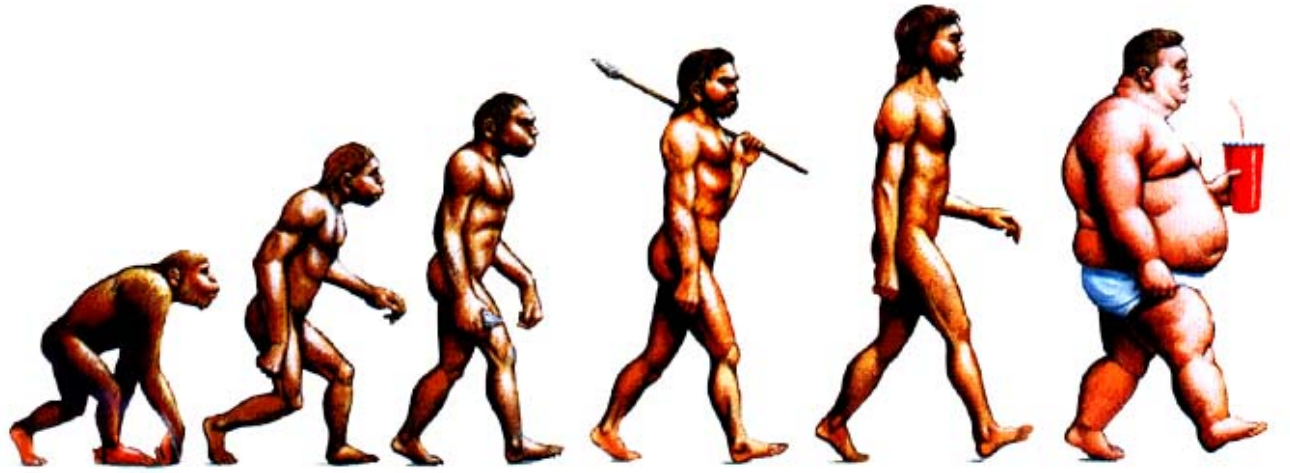
The authors of the study attribute the low T endemic to birth cohort differences or to health or environmental effects not captured in observed data.

Jack's pet theory is that stress [2], hormonal birth control [3], and possibly v@cc!nes may have a lingering effect that lowers T levels in developing male fetuses which has a longitudinal effect on their masculine development. So far, I've found one paper [Bhasin, 2007] that supports this theory.



You're not the man your father was!

Neil Howe, the man who coined the term "Millennial Generation" and is the author of over a dozen bestselling books, including Generations, The Fourth Turning, Millennials Rising, and The Graying of the Great Powers, commented on the above cited study [1] as follows.

> "Across the population, men today have less testosterone compared to men of the same age a generation ago. Asking why requires untangling a complex web of social, environmental, and behavioral factors that are dismantling age-old ideas about masculinity and triggering real anxiety over changing gender roles."
> Forbes (Neil Howe): You're not the man your father was (2017/10/2)*

Howe's verbiage indicates that he thinks the advances that Feminism has made over the past 50 years will keep on chugging.

> "The confusion over what masculinity means today is reflected in the conflicted feelings of males now coming of age. Most American Millennial men report feeling pressured to project a traditional image of manhood characterized by traits like toughness, self-reliance, and hypersexuality — but when asked if they wish to emulate these characteristics themselves, the majority don't. A separate survey asked men to rate themselves on a scale of "completely masculine" to "completely feminine." Only 30% of 18- to 29-year-olds chose "completely masculine." That's compared to 65% of men over 65."
> Forbes (Neil Howe): You're not the man your father was (2017/10/2)*

Are men really being pressured to project a traditional image of manhood anymore, or are they being taught to abandon those traits? It's a combination of both. Men possess an inner desire for traditional manhood that is being shamed and contradicted by Feminist narratives that are taken to be the norm. This is why younger men are confused about whether they want to be masculine or not. Further clouding the issue is that men don't know how to be masculine in a gynocentric culture that eradicates masculinity, and there's a lot of fear about what being masculine would entail in the present social environment.

Neil Howe

> "All these social and cultural changes have also left Millennial women in uncharted waters. More face a dating pool where partners of equal education and status are harder to come by, leaving them waiting for men catch up or deciding to go it alone. "They aren't men," one young woman told Philadelphia Magazine flatly. "They're boys." It's a sign of a long-term generational reversal: When Boomer women were coming of age, they wanted kinder, gentler men in touch with their feelings. Now Millennial women yearn for guys who can "man up" and take care of business."
> Forbes (Neil Howe): You're not the man your father was (2017/10/2)*

Whenever women say they want "a kinder, gentler man", or yearn for "guys who can 'man up' and take care of business", we are obliged to add, "…who is also hawt". Also, Boomer women felt the pressure to marry and wanted a man they could control. Millennial women have a totally different SMP with no pressure to marry any man who isn't hawt enough to make their bits drool.

> "Ultimately, it's impossible to pigeonhole what's happening to masculinity as wholly positive or negative. The strongest objections come from critics who believe men and women are naturally built for traditional roles — or from those who argue that toxic chemicals are wreaking havoc on men's health. Those who believe traditional gender roles are dysfunctional, however, welcome moving past them. A less testosterone-laden world might be less aggressive and more emotionally expressive. If there's one thing on which observers agree, it's the need for solutions to support the men the 21st-century economy is leaving behind."

Testosterone is Associated with the Assertion of Social Status

A team of Japanese psychologists and sociologists [1] explored the relationship between pre-existing social status and salivary T level among members of a rugby team at a Japanese university, where a strong seniority norm maintains hierarchical relationships. They found that T promotes either dominance or submissiveness in a chosen game strategy, depending on players' social rank. Also Testosterone was associated with not only dominance but effectively fitting into a Hierarchy once the status of everyone is settled.

In this study, participants engaged in the Ultimatum Game, in which each participant decided how to divide a monetary endowment between himself and a matched anonymous responder. Proposers decided upon a sum to offer the responder that ranged between nothing and JPY 1000, at increments of JPY 100. The responder was not made aware of the actual offer made by the proposer. The responding participants indicated whether they would accept or reject the matched proposer's offer. If the responder accepts at the actual offer level, the players receive the funds as proposed. If the responder rejects at the level corresponding to the actual offer made by the proposer, both proposer and responder receive no money. The responder's choices, quantified as the amount of the wager and whether the proposer's offer was accepted or not, defined the strategic stances of the participants.

The results showed that senior players tended to offer less than their juniors, and those participants with higher rather than lower levels of salivary T offered more money in the game, while lower offers in the game were more often rejected by men with high levels of T. The effect of T was more pronounced in beginners, with low T beginners offering less than any others, and high T beginners offering more than any others. Moreover, higher T among the lower-status participants was associated with higher acquiescence. Conversely, among the most senior participants, higher T was associated with lower acquiescence.

The main effect of T was highly significant, whereas none of the other main effects or interactions, such as rank in the game or proficiency in the game, were statistically significant.

Researchers concluded that T has an impact on status-asserting behavior. That is, low offers are interpreted by responders as a challenge to their status, and this challenge is more salient to responders high in T. These results suggest that T may enhance socially dominant behavior among high-status persons, but strategic submission to seniority among lower-status persons. IOW, T is associated with an assertion of status, regardless of whether one's status is low or high.

Testosterone Facilitates Social Interactions

Social Anxiety Displaces Confidence

The Manosphere, as well as most all ladies worldwide, have long held the trait of confidence in high esteem. One of the primary detractors of confidence is social anxiety.

¡Science! has concluded that people suffering from social anxiety are afraid of being scrutinized, judged, embarrassed, and/or being negatively evaluated by others. People with this disorder tend to experience excessive self-consciousness and may avoid social interactions or situations to prevent feelings of discomfort or humiliation.

Many research studies have shown that individuals with social anxiety display less dominant behavior, more submissive gestures, and more frequent indicators of subordination, like blushing and gaze aversion during social intercourse. Observations of implicit gestures of appeasement and subordination combined with increases in ritualized behavior in relation to anxiety have further fed this idea, leading to the neuro-evolutionary theory that social anxiety may be directly linked to what is called "implicit subordination" in scientific jargon. The neuro-evolutionary theory of social anxiety draws heavily on the idea that social anxiety, as well as anxiety disorders in general, are driven by a neurocircuitry that supports adaptive fear reflexes.

In simple words, "implicit subordination" means that people intuitively sense that they have to put themselves aside and play a role in a group in order for the social intercourse to be a rewarding experience for all involved.

Those suffering with social anxiety and a lack of confidence due to "implicit subordination"…

1. Have a fear of being an integral part of a group.
2. Don't know how, or are not willing to play up their personality (c.f. to "put on Christ") to actualize an effective social role.
3. Are averse to submitting to the seniors of a group.
4. Ultimately, and aside from any generational curses or neural abnormalities (e.g. autism, personality disorders, etc.), a lack of humility and trust are root spiritual factors.

Testosterone Reduces Social Anxiety

In a study of the causes of social anxiety, a team of psychologists, psychiatrists, and neuropsychopharmacologists investigated whether T affects social anxiety [1]. They found that it certainly does, along with some other surprising results, including…

1. Confirmation that submission to the dominance of others is an implicit mechanism in social anxiety.
   Translation: Anxiety is caused by an inherent inability or unwillingness to trust authority.
2. A single dose of T can temporarily abolish the negative effects of implicit subordination.
   Translation: T can boost one's willingness to overcome the perceived risk of trusting authority and mingling with others.
3. Treatment strategies can benefit from targeting hormonal mechanisms of dominance.
   Translation: More T is just one proven way to reduce anxiety and increase confidence.
4. T helps make anxious people more comfortable with subordination once a hierarchy is established.

Conclusions

People suffering from social anxiety appear to behave submissively. However, this is NOT authentic submission, but rather an unhealthy response arising from the fear of man. It is an effeminate trait and is exceedingly maladaptive for men.

OTOH, Implicit Submission, that is, overcoming one's fear of social interactions, adopting a social role, and contributing to the vitality of communal interaction, is not an inherently feminine trait, but rather a glorifying and godly trait of emotionally strong and mature individuals, men and women alike.

Humility and Trust are necessary for authentic subordination and implicit submission to occur in the context of regular social intercourse. Implicit submission isn't inherently demeaning unless…

- One is fearful of criticism.
- One is ashamed of one's self in the presence of others.
- One genuinely dislikes or distrusts the group and/or the leaders.

To remedy,

- A regular habit of introspection and prayer can increase self-awareness and help one overcome doubts and fears about one's self.
- Making a concentrated effort to overcome complacency and face one's fears by engaging in more social interactions on a regular basis.
- A shot of T can help one migrate from fearful pseudo-submission to authentic submission.

Less Stress, More Testosterone

How does stress affect masculine dominance?

Targeted Readership: Men
Theme: Chemistry

In July, 2023, Σ Frame had several posts that all pointed to the dismal state of men in Western society these days. Men today are anxious and stressed out.

How can a man reduce anxiety and stress?

In yesterday's post, Testosterone Facilitates Social Interactions (2023/8/24), I described one source of stress, social anxiety, and summarized a study that said testosterone (T) reduces the fear of social interaction.

So stress and anxiety are directly related to T levels. There is a feedback loop.

More Stress → Less T

More T → Less Stress

There's more.

Dr. Robert Josephs, professor of psychology at The University of Texas at Austin, and Dr. Pranjal Mehta, assistant professor of psychology at the University of Oregon, discovered that testosterone and cortisol jointly regulate dominance [1,2].*

The stress hormone, Cortisol, which is produced when an individual is under prolonged stress, has negative effects on T levels. When cortisol is released in the body in response to a threat, the body is mobilized to escape danger. The thing is, humans are more predisposed to escape danger than to assert status. IOW, the effects of cortisol dominate over any influence that testosterone may have on behavior.

The juxtaposition of cortisol and T on dominance looks like this [1].

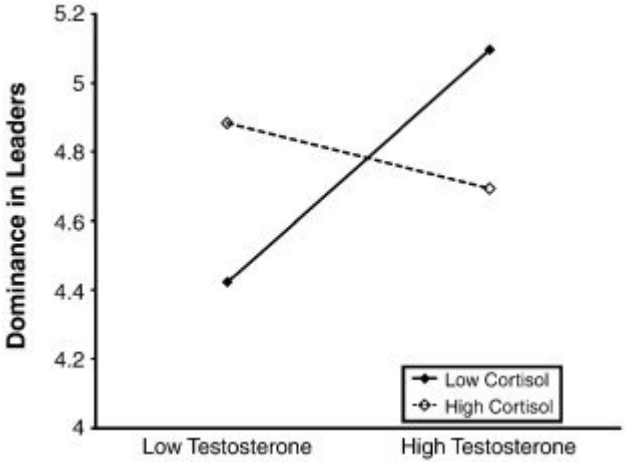

Image from Josephs, et al. 2010 [1].
Not only does cortisol reduce T, but it also reverses the natural expression of dominance induced by T.

Cortisol can drive low T men to be more dominant, but it also makes high T men less dominant.

A low T man under stress exhibiting dominance tends to be domineering. We pity those under his authority.

A high T man under excessive stress is underperforming, to the detriment of those under his care.

Another study was conducted on Special Forces students going through the Survival Evasion Resistance Escape (SERE) school. They found that by the end of the 19 day training, the students' cortisol levels were higher than for Ranger school and testosterone levels were below the average level for sterility. An article detailing this study can be found in the summer 2000 issue of Special Warfare magazine.

So how do you reduce anxiety and stress?

Utilize the Winner Effect.

Elevate T and reduce cortisol.

Fix the problems causing stress and boost T in the process.

How do you do that?

There's a multitude of problems that contribute to stress. There's an infinite number of things over which you have zero control. Focusing on those will drive a man insane. Instead, focus on the few things you can control. Choose to engage in activities that are challenging to you, but not too difficult to succeed in.

Find the sweet spot of your Flow.

Begin with your own behavior.

You control how fit you are within your physical limits. You control your finances. You control where you live. You control how much you work, how hard you work, what you eat, how much you eat, etc.

Eliminate stress.

If you're a man preoccupied with a woman, obviously the chick or wife has a major influence on all these factors. Many readers have shared stories of how their wives have influenced them for better or for ill. Marital conflict is a sure source of stress.

Nevertheless, the same principle still applies. Figure out what you control, focus on that, and start working on it. As you make progress on the issues in your life, your stress will gradually be reduced.

Whatever the case may be, figure out what you control, choose a direction, and get to work. Reassess and repeat.

Anxiety and stress are intended by God to drive us to action.

Anxiety + Inaction = Crazy and Low-T.

Testosterone Makes Men more Punitive and also more Generous

A pan-European group of researchers studied the effects of testosterone on 37 men playing a modified Ultimatum Game, which included the opportunity to punish or reward the other player. Players who were given testosterone inflicted greater punishments on the other players, but they also granted larger rewards.

> "We found that those in the placebo group with high levels of testosterone were more likely to both punish and reward their proposer than those with low levels of testosterone. These effects indicate that, even among those with typical endogenous levels, high testosterone is associated with increased rates of both retaliation and generosity. We did not find an effect of testosterone within the placebo group on the magnitudes of punishment or reward chosen by participants."

This behavior is context dependent, and surprisingly, it is NOT strategic or otherwise motivated.

> "We found that administration of testosterone caused participants to punish their opponents more frequently than those administered placebo and that higher testosterone levels were specifically associated with increased punishment of opponents who made unfair offers. Importantly, this punishment was costly to the participant and could not be used as an instrument to coerce their opponent into offering them larger amounts… […] …we can conclude that testosterone can indeed cause male aggression and that this aggression was not mediated by an increased motivation to maximize task earnings or altered beliefs about the strategic influence of their actions on others."

These findings disprove the earlier theory that testosterone is only linked to aggressiveness and reduces generosity.

> "Our findings flatly contradict a simple link between testosterone and male aggression, a theory that would have predicted increased rejection and punishment of unfair offers and reduced reward of generous offers in those who had received testosterone. Instead, we find that testosterone's effect on male behavior depended on the social context, and we show in a single experiment that testosterone can enhance both reactive aggression and generosity. This pattern of behavior cannot be explained by altered strategic beliefs and is consistent with testosterone's proposed role in promoting male behaviors that will increase social status…"

Dreher et al. formulated a new theory as follows.

> "Although increased aggression may be critical in achieving social rank among other animal species, human social interactions are arguably more complex, and status may be obtained by nonaggressive, even prosocial, means, such as generosity. Although human generosity often occurs without an expectation of material benefit, experimental research has shown that generosity to others can also have a social signaling function; for example, it is increased when donations will be made public, and male generosity specifically is increased in the presence of female observers. This generosity has been repeatedly shown to increase ratings of the giver's social status, leading to greater influence in group decision making and election to leadership positions as well as reciprocal generosity."

> "In line with this observation, an alternative theory of testosterone's effect on male behavior proposes that, instead of promoting only aggressive behaviors, testosterone promotes behaviors intended to achieve and maintain social status or dominance. This theory predicts that, while in social contexts where status is threatened by perceived provocation, this motivation may indeed lead to increased aggression; in others, nonaggressive behaviors, such as generosity, will be more appropriate for advancing social status and will, therefore, be promoted by testosterone."

Moreover, Dreher, et al. summarized the effects of T as instilling status-enhancing behaviors that are both prosocial and antisocial. While this may appear true on the surface, based on the findings reported in the last couple posts, I believe this trait might be better described as expressions of self-determination and dominance.

Just as Carl G. Jung said of Christ,

> "gentle to the elect, terrible to the reprobate," a "true pastor"
> Jung, 1963

Just as Men are created in the image of God Himself, who is the ultimate T-ster and the creator thereof, who delivers the ultra reward of eternal Heaven through Jesus Christ, or the mega punishment of the fiery Hell of damnation, higher T Men offer more beneficent rewards and more extreme punishments.

Scientific Advances towards identifying the causes of Depression

The Ongoing Controversy Regarding the "Cause" of Depression

The fields of psychiatry and psychopharmacology have failed to adequately identify and treat depression and anxiety.

Dr. Scott once stated that after 20 years and 50,000 clinical contact hours dealing with patients suffering from depression, he still has no idea what causes it. He tends to think people are born with a predisposition inherited from their parents. In his conception, one's biological nature and temperament is inborn, and environmental factors either bring out or suppress whatever is in there. Knowing one's self is half the battle.* GOOD therapy can help patients work through their nature and nurture and hopefully gain insight into the behaviors that are most troubling to them. But they will ALWAYS have those core personality traits to fight against.*

What "causes" depression is debatable, and that debate has been going on for a really long time. All of this debate revolves around the various conceptualizations that different medical and behavioral health providers have of these disorders. Is depression just a list of symptoms that hang together in factorial analysis? Or is there something deeper to it?

This post reports several new concepts of depression that have emerged over the past year or two.

Chemical Imbalance?

Since the late 1980s, the most popular explanation for depression has been attributed to a "chemical imbalance" in the brain. This concept was supported by the fact that many symptoms of depression have been successfully treated with drugs that affect neurochemical imbalances (e.g. dopamine and serotonin reuptake), such as Prozac, selective serotonin reuptake inhibitors (SSRIs), and tricyclics.

Although it was never decisively proven that depression is "caused" by a chemical imbalance, the view that depression is NOT the function of a chemical imbalance was never contested and remained uncontroversial…

Until just last year, when a comprehensive research study by Moncrieff, et al. determined that the main areas of serotonin research provide no consistent evidence of there being an association between serotonin and depression, and no support for the hypothesis that depression is caused by lowered serotonin activity or concentrations. There was even some evidence that long-term antidepressant use reduces serotonin concentration. Several papers have been written over the past year challenging Moncrieff's claims, and as of the time of this writing, the conclusions remain undecided as to whether serotonin is a base factor in depression.

Meanwhile, scientists have been discovering other factors related to depression, such as zinc deficiency, neuroplasticity, immune activation, inflammation, stress related hormonal dysregulation, and conditions within the digestive tract. I'll briefly go over each of these (except for zinc which I covered before).

Neuroplasticity

A process called "neuroplasticity" is increasingly thought to play a role in mood disorders like depression. The basic idea is that in depression, there may be issues with the quality, number, and type of connections our neurons make, and this may help explain the symptoms of depression. Importantly, research is showing that we may be able to positively affect neuroplasticity through lifestyle choices like exercise, learning new things, and certain dietary modifications. There is also data showing that conventional antidepressants, as well as psychedelics (yeah, 'shrooms), may positively influence neuroplasticity.

Immune Activity

Immune activation, and especially inflammation, is thought to be a risk factor for the development of conditions like depression. Excess, chronic, or higher levels of inflammation in the blood and/or the brain blocks healthy neuroplasticity, impairs the healthy function of neurons by physically damaging them, and leads to the breakdown of molecules thereby generating toxins that further damage neuron health and contribute to depressive pathology. This concept may also partly explain the link between alcoholism and depression. The good news is that inflammatory status can be regulated by a nutritious diet, regular sleep and exercise, stress-lowering interventions, and… spending time in nature.

The Digestive System

A wide range of research now suggests that the digestive system and the brain are in constant communication, and it's been proposed that this data exchange may have an effect on everything from our attitude towards life, to our cognitive state, to our mood. In fact, alterations in the bacteria that live in the gut microbiome have been linked to depression. It's thought that these bacteria may influence brain function through their effects on the vagus nerve (which runs from the gut to the brain), their impact on the immune system (e.g., by affecting levels of inflammation), and through tiny molecules they create (e.g., short-chain fatty acids), which may reach the brain by way of the bloodstream. Researchers have proposed that the state of our gut health (e.g., the porosity of our gut lining, AKA "leakiness", the immune cells in the gut, and the biodiversity of the microbes that live in the gut) plays a major role in our mental health and may significantly influence depression symptomatology. In fact, one study showed that the type and quality of microbial culture in the digestive system was even more important than diet for maintaining good health. Probiotics and eating fiber rich foods may help regulate and replenish a healthy digestive microbiome, and thereby improve mood and energy.

On an interesting side note, C. S. Lewis once identified "good digestion" as a necessary precursor to vital physical health. He wrote,

> "Most of the man's psychological makeup is probably due to his body: when his body dies all that will fall off him, and the real central man, the thing that chose, that made the best or worst out of this material, will stand naked. All sorts of nice things which we thought our own, but which were really due to a good digestion, will fall off some of us: all sorts of nasty things which were due to complexes or bad health will fall off others. We shall then, for the first time, see every one as he really was. There will be surprises."
> C. S. Lewis, in Mere Christianity

Hormone Dysregulation

Although married men have known this about their wives for millenia, ¡ScIeNcE! is only now discovering that the endocrine system and hormones play an important role in mood regulation. There are at least four hormones especially that are under growing suspicion of being linked to depression — cortisol, insulin, estrogen, and testosterone.

Adverse and traumatic life events cause stress, which burdens the neurochemical pathways, increasing inflammation, damaging neuroplasticity, and even killing off neurons. Extended periods of increased cortisol, AKA the stress hormone, leads to anxiety, depression, irritability, and weight gain, and has been shown to exacerbate wear and tear on both the endocrine and neurological systems and accelerate aging.

Insulin is a key metabolic hormone that facilitates the uptake of glucose by cells throughout the body. In the brain, insulin is thought to regulate blood sugar as well as influence memory and behavior. Insulin resistance is an increasingly common condition of metabolic dysfunction, where the body has trouble sensing insulin and using glucose. In addition to diabetes, insulin has now been linked to a substantially higher risk of developing depression.

Scientists are discovering that estrogen (i.e. estradiol) plays a major role in depression. Estrogen has a number of brain-protective, mood enhancing, and neuroplasticity improving roles. It has been proposed that declining levels of estrogen, progesterone, and other related hormones during menstruation and after menopause may explain the higher rates of depression and moodiness seen by women during this period. Conversely, higher levels of estrogen in men is linked to depression in younger men and obesity in older men.

One might suppose that testosterone would exacerbate stress since it induces aggressiveness and vigilance, but scientists are discovering the opposite. Low testosterone in men is associated with numerous maladaptive symptoms including anxiety and depression (Khera, 2013; Alkamel et al., 2014). Testosterone modulates serotoninergic transmission which plays a crucial role in the development of depression (Jovanovic et al., 2015). Standard antidepressants tend to normalize testosterone levels (Pope et al., 2003). Testosterone replacement therapy has been shown to greatly improve mood, alleviate anxiety, and mitigate symptoms of depression (Kanayama et al., 2007; Zarrouf et al., 2009). These findings suggest a strong and also reciprocal relationship between testosterone and depression; not only that lower testosterone can lead to depression but also that depression can lower testosterone. Overall, the evidence shows that testosterone improves mood and quality of life for men.

A Note on Antidepressant Medications

¡ScIeNcE! has no idea how or why antidepressants work.

When psychiatrists prescribe medications for treating depression and anxiety, they are only addressing the symptoms. If the symptoms of depression can be alleviated, then this can help a person suffering from a depressive episode to get back up and running, which helps speed up the recovery time. Medications are never expected or intended to "fix" brain chemistry. Some people have good results from taking antidepressants, while others do not. Side effects are always an issue.

Prozac and tricyclics are now outdated and have been replaced by newer medications. OTOH, SSRIs do a pretty good job of treating the physiological symptoms of depression, for example, the appetite disturbances, low energy, psychomotor agitation, sleepiness, slowing, etc. But they are not so good with the purely psychological symptoms like anhedonia, guilt, low mood, poor affect, etc. Patients on SSRIs can SOMETIMES get some relief from the symptoms that make it difficult to even get up in the morning while they actually work on the issue that is the underlying driver of their depression (or anxiety). The patient has to decide if they can tolerate whatever side effects it comes with.

Concerning su!c!dal!ty, SSRIs are a mixed bag. There have been some cases in which patients became more su!c!dal AFTER taking SSRIs. The prevailing theory about why su!c!de risk sometimes increases with SSRIs is because the person now has the energy and inclination to do something about it. IOW, they are activating the will.

Jack's Personal Testimony

Jack suffered from depression after his parents divorced in 1994. He took some antidepressant medications at that time. The medicine did help him recover faster, but it also made him jittery, jumpy, and unable to sleep. Ever since then, he has had severe and recurring insomnia that has affected his work performance and has required other medications. (Melatonin is his personal favorite, as it is all natural and doesn't lead to a dependency.) Jack cannot be certain, but he believes his insomnia is related to his past use of antidepressants. Looking back, he wishes he would have stayed away from antidepressant medication unless his depression became so severe that he couldn't function or had recurring su!c!dal tendencies.

“Side effect” is an understatement.

Closing Statements

The scientific field of psychoneuralendocrinology is complicated and remains poorly understood. However, it is markedly different for men and women, and is strongly affected by age and BMI.

Concerning depression, overall, the body has a limit of how much anger, disappointment, frustration, and stress it can endure. Once the hypothalamic-pituitary-adrenal (HPA) axis (AKA the stress system) is exhausted, dysregulation sets in and the risk for depression is significantly increased. It has been found that a single high-stress event increases the risk for a depressive episode by 1.4 times, and episodes of major depression are 2.5 times more likely to come behind the heels of a stressful event than not.

A number of strategies have been shown to be successful in reducing stress and recovering from depression, such as…

- Avoiding excess smoking and alcohol consumption.
- Daily meditation (e.g. prayer).
- Deep breathing exercises, which reduce cortisol.
- Dietary modification, eating right, less sugar and more fiber.
- Eliminating or minimizing contact with stressful people and situations.
- Getting enough rest.
- Improving insulin resistance.
- Regular exercise.
- Regulating HPA function.
- Spending time in nature and the great outdoors.
- Taking essential vitamins, zinc, and probiotics.

Moreover, using the term “chemical imbalance” to explain the cause of depression is now naïve and outdated. There’s a lot more going on that is now being discovered and is not yet fully understood.

Aside from the physiological vectors, my faith tells me there is a spiritual component to depression. Unresolved anger, chronic bitterness, frustration, sinful habits, and a lack of faith may all contribute towards depression.

Ultimately, the only thing we can be sure of is that depression is a symptom of all the sin in the world. Good habits like those listed above can all keep the zephyrs of depression at bay or help fight them off. This post may remind us of how important these things are to our biological, emotional, and spiritual lives.

 Here at Σ Frame, we have condensed this concept into "knowing one's self", and "maturity" – striving for spiritual perfection which includes a whole bunch of introspection and recognizing your own limitations and boundaries, leading to growth, good health, and the glory of God.*

Sleep and Testosterone

Sleep quality and quantity affect testosterone levels.

> "Plasma testosterone levels display circadian variation, peaking during sleep, and reaching a nadir in the late afternoon, with a superimposed ultradian rhythm with pulses every 90 min reflecting the underlying rhythm of pulsatile luteinizing hormone (LH) secretion. The increase in testosterone is sleep, rather than circadian rhythm, dependent and requires at least 3 hours of sleep with a normal architecture. Various disorders of sleep including abnormalities of sleep quality, duration, circadian rhythm disruption, and sleep-disordered breathing may result in a reduction in testosterone levels."
> *Wittert, 2014

The paper also says that the male body reaches its highest testosterone levels during sleep. This might explain the morning wood phenomenon.

Good Sleep Promotes Good Health

A reader shared this book with me on 2023/8/29.

Why We Sleep, Matthew Walker, Simon and Schuster, 372 pages [PDF]

Concerning our study of male body chemistry, Chapter 8 covers Sleep Deprivation and the Body, including sections on,

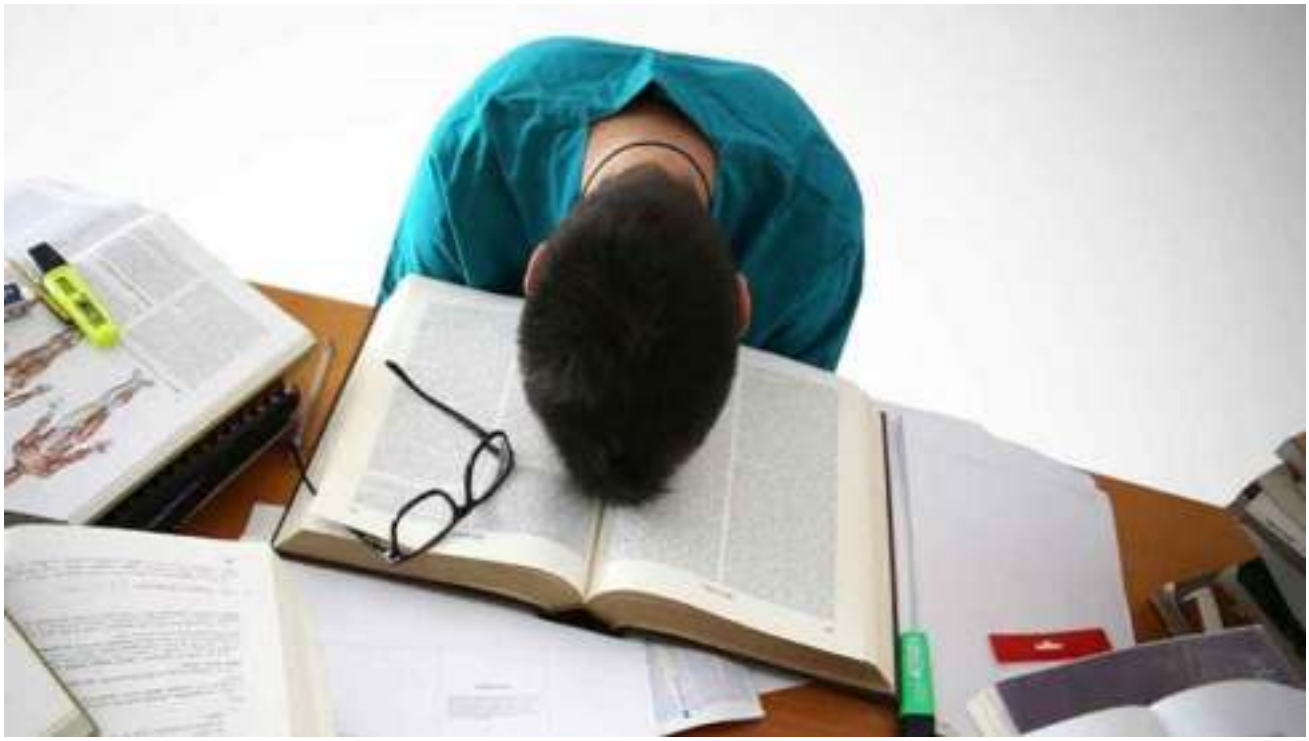
- Sleep Loss and the Cardiovascular System (p.161)
- Sleep Loss and Metabolism: Diabetes and Weight Gain (p.166)
- Weight Gain and Obesity (p.168)
- Sleep Loss and the Reproductive System (p.175)
- Sleep Loss and the Immune System (p.178)
- Sleep Loss, Genes, and DNA (p.183)

Also, Chapter 9 (p.188) is an interesting overview of REM-Sleep and Dreaming.



Concerning the effects of sleep on male reproductive health, on pages 175-176, Walker's book says,

> "If you have hopes of reproductive success, fitness, or prowess, you would do well to get a full night's sleep every night. Charles Darwin would, I'm sure, cleave easily to this advice, had he reviewed the evidence I now present.
> Take a group of lean, healthy young males in their mid-twenties and limit them to five hours of sleep for one week, as a research group did at the University of Chicago. Sample the hormone levels circulating in the blood of these tired participants and you will find a marked drop in testosterone relative to their own baseline levels of testosterone when fully rested. The size of the hormonal blunting effect is so large that it effectively "ages" a man by ten to fifteen years in terms of testosterone virility. The experimental results support the finding that men suffering from sleep disorders, especially sleep apnea associated with snoring, have significantly lower levels of testosterone than those of similar age and backgrounds but who do not suffer from a sleep condition.
> Uttering the results of such studies will often quell any vocal (alpha) males that I occasionally come across when giving public lectures. As you may imagine, their ardent, anti-sleep stance becomes a little wobbly upon receiving such information. With a genuine lack of malice, I proceed to inform them that men who report sleeping too little—or having poor-quality sleep—have a 29 percent lower sperm count than those obtaining a full and restful night of sleep, and the sperm themselves have more deformities. I usually conclude my response with a parenthetical low blow, noting that these under-slept men also have significantly smaller testicles than well-rested counterparts.

> Rare podium fracases aside, low testosterone is a clinically concerning and life-impacting matter. Males with low testosterone often feel tired and fatigued throughout the day. They find it difficult to concentrate on work tasks, as testosterone has a sharpening effect on the brain's ability to focus. And of course, they have a dulled libido, making an active, fulfilling, and healthy sex life more challenging. Indeed, the self-reported mood and vigor of the young men described in the above study progressively decreased in lockstep with their increasing state of sleep deprivation and their declining levels of testosterone. Add to this the fact that testosterone maintains bone density, and plays a causal role in building muscle mass and therefore strength, and you can begin to get a sense of why a full night of sleep—and the natural hormonal replacement therapy it provides—is so essential to this aspect of health and an active life for men of all ages."

Can a man "fake it 'til he makes it"? ¡ScIeNcE! says it is possible!

Targeted Readership: Men
Theme: Chemistry
Length: 500 words
Reading Time: 3 minutes

The Manosphere has, for a long time, kicked around the idea that lower SSH men can, or even should, "Fake it 'til you make it", which carries the connotation that a man can act like an Alpha until he actually becomes an Alpha. It is assumed that a man can adopt a new mindset and practice new habits until it becomes, more or less, a natural part of him — an act of faith, or a self-fulfilling prophecy, if you will. A multitude of heated arguments and debates have surrounded the question of what this is truly all about; whether this is merely a red herring, or a cathartic pep talk, or glorified fakery, or a politely veiled "Man Up!" sermon, or a faithful and well-intentioned stab at "putting on Christ", or whether it is, in fact, true.

Well, ¡ScIeNcE! says it is true!

A team of "gender studies" psychologists at the University of Michigan studied the effects of behavior on testosterone (T) levels.

> "Gender-related sociocultural experiences related to femininity (sociocultural habits and norms tied to women and girls, usually promoting communality and nurturance) (10) and masculinity (sociocultural habits and norms tied to men and boys, usually promoting agency and competition) (10) may affect physiological parameters such as testosterone. This could occur in ways similar to how social experiences related to poverty or harsh parenting exert profound neurobiological effects (11, 12). If social experiences related to gender can modulate androgens, this may lead to surprising biological consequences: a gender → testosterone pathway."
> van Anders et al., 2015

The researchers tested two hypotheses regarding how stereotypical gender behavior affects T levels. One hypothesis, called "stereotyped behavior" (H1), assumes that wielding power increases T regardless of performance. The other hypothesis, called "stereotyped performance" (H2), assumes that wielding power in masculine-stereotyped but not feminine-stereotyped ways increases testosterone.

The results showed that wielding power significantly increases testosterone regardless of how it was done. This was true for both men and women, but the effects were much more significant for men.*

Also, van Anders et al. mention a number of habits that can increase T, roughly listed in order of their impact.

- Winning a competition
- Playing a social role that is oriented toward competition, masculinity, and/or power.
- Not winning, but merely engaging in certain types of competition, especially those that are formalized or involve clear win/loss outcomes.
- Engaging in high risk ventures, e.g. gambling, stock trading.
- Not winning nor engaging in, but merely watching a competition.
- Power poses

Moreover, practicing these habits, like winning a competition, boosts T which in turn promotes dominant behavior. OTOH, repeated defeat decreases T levels, subsequently decreasing one's drive for dominance.

In conclusion, there is a behavioral ↔ endocrinological feedback loop. Small changes in T results in significant behavioral modification. Conversely, repeated practice of socially interactive behaviors expressing dominance and power may lead to epigenetic changes increasing T over time.

 My readers may bemuse themselves with a chuckle upon knowing that this "gender studies" research was intended to "deconstruct masculinity" by showing that women can be nurtured into becoming dominant and masculine, but the results actually undermine their egalitarian assumptions and add to the construction of masculinity.*

Right on cue, Men Elite had several posts on Testosterone that coincided with this month's theme.

Overview

The effect of testosterone (T) on social behavior is not well understood and continues to be contested. The most current theory assumes that T enhances a man's impulse to protect or enhance his social status — one of the primary SMV markers. However, it is not nearly that simple, and this is why T remains enigmatic.

Here is a summary of what we've covered in this series.

Status

It is believed that the social and/or environmental context plays a crucial role in human decision making, and that T affects both one's sensitivity and responses to varying cues that are perceived to challenge, enhance, or reduce one's status. Therefore, higher T is believed to be associated with social dominance and the establishment and preservation of status.

Confidence

T has been shown to decrease social anxiety and increase confidence. ¡ScIeNcE! has tied this to the individual's fear of being judged versus willingness to engage in "implicit submission" — scientific jargon for the social phenomenon in which people intuitively sense that they have to move past themselves and adopt a positive contributory role in a group setting in order for the social intercourse to be a rewarding experience for all involved.

The Winner Effect

It is well known that T recursively promotes competition for status and dominance in many species, including humans. T is what makes a man perform strongly in a competition. It is also what makes a man avoid, reject, or withdraw from a competition he believes he cannot win, or a social interaction that would leave him in a bad light. It has also been shown that winning a game or status competition boosts testosterone which in turn promotes dominant behavior.

OTOH, repeated defeat decreases testosterone levels, subsequently decreasing one's competitive drive for dominance.

Case Study — Competition vs Cooperation

One interesting point is that a high T man's competitive edge is NOT strategically goal oriented, but rather impulsive and egocentric. That is, sometimes high T men will act in ways that might help them assert dominance or status, but actually disadvantage them in competition.

I have seen this IRL. Once I saw a very interesting basketball match in which there was a team of high school and college aged men who played basketball every day, playing against another team of middle-aged men, most of whom hadn't played basketball in years and were less active and much less physically fit than the younger men. A couple of them were obviously overweight. All the spectators expected this to be an exercise in humility for the older men. They were surprised when the team of older men soundly defeated the younger men, game after game, until the seniors were too tired to play anymore.

Why? The younger men were pumped up on adrenaline and T, and every one of them aspired to be the team champion. So once one of them got the ball, he would run circles around the court and would never pass the ball to another teammate. Meanwhile, the older men remained relatively stationary and passed the ball between themselves until one of them could make a shot.

Moreover, T is crucial, but teamwork matters too, maybe even more.

Social Boundaries and Status Stratagems

One of the features of Masculinity is the strong vigilant enforcement of boundaries. Although the ¡ScIeNtIfIc! literature doesn't pose an association between social boundaries and T levels, a comprehensive reading indicates that high T traits could be summarized as boundary enforcement applied to a diligent pursuit of a social stratagem. Again, it is believed that this is related to social dominance, self-determination, and status. The ego appears as a central pillar in the expression.

In the context of social reciprocation, (1) the employment of game stratagems (e.g. altruism, mercifulness, tit for tat, willingness to suffer, etc.) and (2) the enforcement of operant conditioning overlaps with boundary enforcement. Boundaries are not only expressed in competitions and negotiations, but also in daily social intercourse. Thus, T makes men more decisive, hard, proactive, punitive, retaliatory, and tough. T is what makes a man respond strongly to provocation and to protect his own. At the same time, higher T levels also make men more generous and kind-hearted. T is what makes a man perform strongly in a competition. It is also what makes a man avoid or withdraw from a competition he knows he cannot win. T causes men to respond more generously to a negotiating partner who is loyal and shows him respect. T is also what makes a man reluctant to accept an unfavorable or disrespectful proposition (e.g. in business, sports, etc.) and highly vindictive towards the person who proposed it.

Going back to what we learned about Gentile vs. Genuine Authority (2023/6/10), T plays significantly into both forms of authority. Men with high T are more likely to assert agency in Gentile authority, and more proactive and more protective in displaying Genuine Authority.

Risk

Some studies indicate higher T in men is associated with a conservative view towards risk, while other studies indicate a greater appetite for risk. In comparison, high T women are predictably less risk averse than their low T sidekick hens.

Concerning one's attitude towards a particular risk, risk is filtered through a cost-to-benefit analysis yielding varying results depending on the individual's physical and psychological constitution, strength of purpose, status, skill level (in the challenges at hand), and social influence. Decisions are made on the basis of the most robust stratagem that is intuitively perceived.

Stress

There is a feedback loop between cortisol (the stress hormone) and T.

Stress (high cortisol) has a negative effect on T and also dominance. Cortisol also accelerates aging.

Stress causes low T men to be more domineering.

Stress causes high T men to be less dominant.

Low levels of cortisol / stress have a moderating effect on T. High T men with no stress (low cortisol) are more prone to aggression, ego scuffles, retaliation, violence, and even redrum.

Health

Low T men are more prone to obesity and various other chronic illnesses. Again, there is a feedback look involved here too. Obesity and illness reduces T, while OTOH, being physically active and fit tends to increase T over time and increases overall health and longevity. Across the population, T usually decreases with age, however T can be maintained throughout one's years if one remains healthy and active.

Sleep

Adequate sleep is vital in maintaining a healthy T level. T levels surge to their highest after 3 hours of sleep. Sleep deprived men have drastically less T. A lack of sleep combined with high stress may cause infertility in extreme cases.

Conclusions

In this study, I have assumed that T correlates directly to masculinity. Seeing how many high T traits align with masculine traits and SMV, it appears this presumption was more or less valid. It is hoped that this information may provide readers a more solid theoretical understanding of Masculinity from a biological viewpoint.

There are many Christian men who adopt compromising loserish social habits simply because they've been taught and led to believe that's the way a Christian man ought to behave. Over time and with practice, his T actually does goes down until he blends into the Mass of typical churchian beta boys. Christian men would be better served if they were taught how male human nature defaults to laxity while females prefer drama, and how to counteract and/or regulate this nature by enforcing boundaries.

The God ordained pathway towards developing confidence and trust in any endeavor is to pursue Flow. There is a long learning curve, but don't let this intimidate you. Start where you are, latch onto your own internal locus of control, and develop your skills day by day. Over time, you will build confidence and your testosterone levels will rise, thereby making everything easier and smoother. Small successes will eventually lead to great achievements. If you are totally crippled by social anxiety or if you believe abnormally low T is an inhibiting factor for you, then see your doctor for T supplements.

If any readers have taken T supplements, we would greatly appreciate hearing about your experience in a comment below.

All the best~!

The Slow Demise of Masculine Leadership

Jack · 1 September 2023 · Archived copy · Original

Many factors have contributed to the eradication of Male Dominance.

Targeted Readership: Men
Length: 700 words
Reading Time: 3.5 minutes

Aaron Renn wrote an article at Governing: The Need for Homegrown Urban Leaders (2023/8/10). Renn highlights the contributions of Richard Ravitch and former New York City Mayors Ed Koch and Michael R. Bloomberg as examples of masculinity.

Regardless of political affiliation or administrative actions or what one's opinion of them might be, one thing all these men have in common is… High T. They are all uber Alphas.

Renn cites an author of the New York Times to describe the qualities that made Ravitch effective as…

> "…local rootedness, independent wealth embedded in the community itself; pragmatism; and a willingness to chart an independent course that sometimes resulted in conflict with other elites."

Left to right: Richard Ravitch, Ed Koch, and Michael Bloomberg.

Renn goes on to discuss the downward trajectory of local civic leadership over the past three decades. He attributes this primarily to structural forces. Excerpts of causative factors are listed below.

- Deregulation that led to corporate consolidation, particularly in banking, utilities and retailing.
- Local ownership of banks, businesses, and utilities have been replaced by global corporations.
- In this new globalized business culture, those who aspire to high corporate positions must take great care to echo standardized positions, particularly around ESG (environmental, social, and governance goals) and DEI (diversity, equity, and inclusion). They are constrained by career considerations from taking any truly independent positions or actions.
- Civic leadership has been democratized and diversified in recent decades. It's no longer a small group of connected white male elites along with a Black leader or two, getting together in a room and deciding what to do. Now, civic leadership is diffuse, bureaucratized, highly risk-averse, and with limited capacity to address major challenges or implement major civic initiatives or institutional changes.

- Renn also blames leaders of the Silent Generation and Post-War Boomers who have dominated, and continue to dominate, the leadership landscape of America. They were entrusted with real power at young age, often their 40s or even 30s. But they've failed to develop or empower the next generation of leaders. Instead, they revel in their accomplishments and give a careless finger to their younger upstarts.

Then Renn wrote a follow up at his own blog, Weekly Digest: The Decline of Local Leadership Culture (2023/8/26), lamenting the absence of effective civic leaders. Renn states that changes in cities and social structures over the course of the last 30 to 40 years have greatly undermined local leadership cultures like the one which produced Ravitch.

Moreover, Renn highlights the diffuse and weakened authority that has descended over civil structure and the collapse of local banks, businesses, and other enterprises, and he pins responsibility on corporatization, globalization, and the self-centeredness of Boomers.

I can't disagree. However, this is only the tip of the iceberg that sank the Love Boat.

I can see how corporatization has eliminated the middle class, gentrified local communities, and homogenized the lower class income bracket, thereby eradicating the social environ that would have otherwise shaped men into small town local winners and transforming them into wage slaves.

Combine this with the rise of Strong Independent Women, the broken SMP / MMP, the downfall of marriage and family, the divorce mill, and the resulting broken children eventually growing up to be less-than-men, and what you get is a social structure that is broken to the very core.

The one area in which most every hard working man could attain a modest position of status and achievement — having a family and owning a home – was methodically stuffed in the trash can. All of this introduces a great deal of inner turmoil and stress on the average man, which further wars against testosterone levels, male dominance, and masculine expression. And let's not forget the rise in obesity and how masculinity is demonized, persecuted, and suppressed by the Progressive Left.

Worse, children who have grown up since the turn of the century have been chastened for exhibiting a competitive edge, and “caring” and “compassionate” leaders and teachers have fallen (if not coerced) into the habit of giving everyone a trophy under the guise of egalitarianism. The value and social status of being a winner has thereby been cut down and reduced to a social ritual having no meaning other than a rote exercise in feeelz-gooed cooperationism.

Are there any more nails left remaining to hammer down the lid on the coffin of masculinity?

With all these things in mind (and I’m sure readers will add more in the comments), let’s recall how Testosterone has been Decreasing for Decades, and reflect on how this has gone hand in hand with the demise that Renn describes. It all makes sense. The Winner Effect has been elusive and will remain so for some time.

Good times produce Weak Men; Weak Men bring Hard Times, and all that.

The History and Current Value of Vetting

Jack · 2 September 2023 · Archived copy · Original

Vetting still has relevancy, but for a different purpose.

Readership: All
Theme: IOIs and Vetting
Length: 850 words
Reading Time: 4.5 minutes

The theme for September 2023 is IOIs and Vetting.

To kick off this month's theme, this post will recount the history of vetting since the turn of the century. Then I'll describe why vetting is still important.

A Brief History of Vetting

The Red Pill community went through several phases of vetting that had its origins in PUA culture, took on a new spin for LTRs around 2015, and reached its peak between 2019 and 2021. Then it quickly died out during (and perhaps because of) the C0V!D lockdowns.

Back in ye olde days of the Manosphere (2005-2014), the purpose for vetting was initially for selecting quick lays, that is, being able to quickly size up whether a woman is DTF in order to reduce wasted effort / investment and streamline lay efficiency. (I'll go further into this line of reasoning in a future post.)

Around 2014, the SMP went belly up and MGTOW kicked in, and then Vetting morphed into an emphasis on LTRs. This brand of vetting was only relevant to a much smaller number of men who could pass women's then-evolving Game saavy filters. Vetting also became more important because LTRs required more investment from men — and garnered more risk too. This continued until the time period between the Great RP Persecution of 2018 and the Great RP Schism of 2020, in which the Christian Manosphere seceded from the Secular Manosphere, and then the latter evaporated.

When the Christian Manosphere became the last standing embodiment of the Manosphere for a brief time in 2020-2021, Vetting for LTRs was narrowed down even further to Vetting explicitly for wife material, with an even smaller number of men in the running. DeepStrength did a considerable amount of work on LTR vetting for Christians. Here at Σ Frame, we cited Scott's Axiom and boiled it down to "Look for IOIs".

In parallel, the C0v!d epidemic in 2020-2021 brought with it a resurgence in vetting to new heights, as the restricted social environment caused by the lockdown shifted the sociosexual dynamics to prefer LTRs. Cohabitation became prevalent and men were deciding on whom to shack up with.

As the lockdown progressed, the topic of vetting all but disappeared from the RP content output. Meanwhile, YouTube and vlogs became the main Go To for turnkey RP content, and RP based content exploded from a multitude of secular content producers. Interestingly, many of these secular sources cited Christian concepts in their deliveries, which proved the impact of the Christian Manosphere in the year prior. Praise God! Despite the rising popularity of video formatted content, most of the philosophical theories and heavy lifting, although far fewer in number, continue to be done on the few remaining blogs.

Vetting finally died out in 2021 and little has been written or video-casted about it since then. It was believed that Vetting no longer held much value — neither to churchian beta boys and MGTOWs who never got any attention from women in the first place, nor to Chads, who had multitudes of chicks flocking to their nocturnal chambers and could easily NIX the current fling for the NEXT one if she proved to be too onerous.

Young men are not taught what visceral attraction from a young woman looks like.

Perhaps the most valuable life hack that has been added to RP lore throughout all these evolving phases of development is knowing what IOIs look like and the magnanimous importance of reading them correctly. Read them correctly, and you're IN like Jim. Read them wrong, and you could wind up counting cobwebs in the slammer. The value of this knowledge has never changed throughout all these shifts and schisms and has only become more important as time goes on and the culture becomes more debased and more vindictive towards men.

Several commenters have described how they were never taught what visceral attraction from a young woman looks like, neither did they see it expressed between their parents (e.g. parental divorce). It's also as rare as a 25-year-old virgin. Most men just don't meet many women who will show them that level of sexual attraction. Most women just don't feel this way about most men.

Several regulars, including Jack, Thedeti, and many others have reminisced on their own lives with sore regrets of having been so j@ck@ss clueless about IOIs in their younger years. The typical story tells a tale of having multiple women all in the 19-23-year-old age range during and just after college who exhibited all the signs of hard physical attraction that would have been easy to recognize with even a fraction of conventional Red Pill knowledge. But we never picked up on that because we had never been taught those things. Instead, we were taught lots of other worthless chivalrous and gynocentric garbage that kept us locked up in Beta prison.

Naturally, older men who have such regrets have a burden on their consciences to see to it that younger men have their heads screwed on straight (the Big head, that is). This fuels the ongoing importance of teaching and stressing the practice of Vetting.

IOI #1: She's in la la land whenever she looks into his eyes.

The Current Value of Vetting

Overall, I sense a shift in the value of Vetting as it takes on a new importance in the current SMP which is drying up and blowing away (or drying up for most, and blowing away for a few) — not only for choosing good girls, but also for detecting and avoiding bad ones.

Right now, we're in an environment where it's a greater priority to determine which berries are poisonous than which are edible.* Therefore, it is necessary for men to maintain integrity by adding "self-preservation" to their internal locus of control, as MHD always says with his slogan, *"Protect yourself at all times." Only when the coast is clear can a man then vet for anything further.

Even men who have no intentions with women, MGTOWs (or whatever they call themselves these days) gotta protect their flanks, you know. Otherwise, "gynophobic" will be the next solipsistic slur used against men. (I'm surprised it hasn't been used yet.)

Thus, I anticipate another "Vetting craze" will resurface, but NOT primarily for matriculating lays nor for establishing LTR's as before. Instead, Vetting is becoming increasingly valuable for identifying high risk women / social situations. We might compare this to an employer that does a criminal background check on potential hires, except that we don't have much of a database on what constitutes a socio-sexual repeat offender. This series is intended to fill in this gap. Granted, this is not really Vetting as we typically think of it. Maybe "socio-psychological-relational analysis" is more to the point. In times prior, Vetting always carried the burden of hope for a viable relationship and not messing it up. But the new form of Vetting will carry the burdens of diligent awareness (especially of female evasion and control tactics), vigilant discernment, self-preservation, and warding off self-deception.

Therefore, this topic will be revisited here at Σ Frame this month, with an emphasis on vetting for character and trustworthiness with the view of increasing male dominance and social relevance and controlling / decreasing risk. I will begin with a few posts about old style Vetting to summarize what we already know for younger men, and as a refresher and reading entertainment for the RP veterans. This will be followed by some currently more practical applications of Vetting in various social contexts and interactions.

The Relative Importance of Vetting Flags

Every woman has red flags, but men move forward anyway because they naively assume that these issues will be resolved somehow.

In one sense, believing that the issues will be resolved is an expression of faith, but because of Blue Pill saturation, it is a poorly informed faith.

In another sense, believing that the issues will be resolved somehow is utter foolishness!

The difference is that some issues can be resolved, but there are certain issues that are not able to be, and never can be resolved — not even by God! So the difficulty in vetting (in addition to overcoming the blinding obsession) is to know which red flags can be resolved, and which ones cannot. The value of the Red Pill is that it gives men a better understanding of which issues can never be resolved.

RedPillBoomer suggested there should be a categorization of red flags, because this is one subject men, especially young men, really need to go to school on. I'd assert that there are red flags that are significant and require discernment ("Is this manageable or a deal breaker?"), red flags that are definitely deal breakers ("See you later sweetheart!"), and red flags where the man better get the he!! out of dodge as fast as he can at the first whiff of it. Better yet, whenever you see the "get out of Dodge flags", never even enter into any kind of relationship with them in the first place. In other words, spot it coming and run the other way, DOUBLE TIME IT out of there.

Lists of Vetting Flags

Here I'll give a list of flags, categorized by racing rules and organized by their DEFCON level.

Green Flag = Go!
Yellow Flag = Caution!
Red Flag = Stop until the cause is cleared!
Black Flag = Disqualified!

Green Flags = Go!

- Age 18-22
- N = 0
- Attended a private high school or home schooled.
- Gives consistent IOIs
- Kind and empathetic.
- Seeks your opinions on things.
- Defers to your decisions.
- Generally respectful towards men.
- Has a good relationship with her father.
- Has a number of good friends of high character.
- Has no pets.
- Submissive.
- Teachable.

Yellow Flags = Caution!

- Age 23-27.
- Public high school education.
- Doesn't seek your opinions on things.
- Has a poor relationship with her father.
- Displays feminine drama, gives sh!t tests, etc.
- Disrespectful towards some men.
- Parrots Feminist lingo.
- Has no friends.
- Has a pet.

Red Flags = Stop until the cause is cleared!

- Age = 28-32
- N = 1-2
- College education. (See notes below.)
- Has friends of poor character.
- Has a bad relationship with her father.
- Disrespectful towards all men in general.
- All her friends are guys.
- Has a large number of beta orbiters.

- Talks openly and/or frequently about exes.
- Calls their exes “abusive”, “crazy”, “controlling”, “manipulative”, etc.
- Displays aposematism (e.g. green or blue hair, gaudy cosmetics, etc.)
- Poor at enforcing boundaries on attention, money, time, etc.
- Lacks vulnerability and/or withholds emotional intimacy.
- Exhibits persistent distrust.
- Exhibits persistent jealousy.
- Uses Feminist jargon and talking points with dexterity.
- Has a history of substance abuse.
- Behaves in a controlling manner.
- Has tattoos, extra piercings.
- Frequently on social media, e.g. F@cebook, Inst@gram,
- Has a male pet dog.

Black Flags = Disqualified!

- Age ≥ 32
- N ≥ 3
- Divorced.
- Has a child.
- History of infidelity.
- Gives consistent IOCs
- Post-graduate education.
- Displays violent behaviors.
- Mismatched relationship goals.
- Has an OASIS account, e.g. OnlyFans,
- Currently has a habit of substance abuse.
- Participates in Feminist social movements.

12 Golden Litmus Test Indicators

When vetting for a wife, there are a smaller number of flags that may appear on a sliding scale and are very revealing. These indicators are broken down into the following categories.

Personal Qualities

1. Age — Lower is better.
2. CC — Lower is better.
3. Education — In general, less is more. (See notes below.)
4. Modesty in appearance, dress, and speech — More modesty is better.

Social Qualities

1. Peer group — Better is better.
2. Relationship with father — Better is better.
3. Level of respect towards men and authority — Higher is better.
4. Social media presence — Less is better.

Relational Qualities

1. Openness — More is better. If she is honest about things that would be considered a yellow or red flag, that is a +1.
2. Companionship — She should play the role of a helper, not a ball buster. If things go easier and smoother with her, it's a good sign. If you find that she often does things that effectively "undo" things you have done, it's a bad sign. It doesn't need to be anything big.
3. Compliance — More is better. She should be agreeable, not contentious.
4. IOIs vs. IOCs — More of the former, less of the latter.
5. Influence — She should inspire you, heighten your confidence and faith, and improve your life. If your relationship makes you anxious or jealous, or your bible reading, prayer and worship habits begin to slide, and/or your faith, your love for God, and Christian fellowship is weakened, it's not a good sign. If you've never drank, smoked, etc. and you suddenly and inexplicably find yourself craving these things, then there's a good chance you're not a good spiritual match.

6. Respectful — She should have a good handle on this.
7. Teachable — She should be open to your instruction and find joy in learning from you.
8. Trusting — She shouldn't hesitate to trust you. If she is suspicious or second guessing you, something is off.

Notes

1. Men who are older, divorced, have children themselves, or who are relatively unsuccessful in life may have to adjust these qualifications according to their own socioeconomic standing and situation in life. See Deti's Advice to Underqualified Men (2021/12/8).
2. Readers are welcome to suggest additions to the lists and/or another placement in different categories.
3. College education has both pros and cons and needs to be considered more carefully. More discussion, information, and analysis can be found in the following posts.

Natural Selection Dynamics leading to the LTR / MMP Breakdown

Jack · 6 September 2023 · Archived copy · Original

The value and purpose of Vetting depends on the social context.

The SMV has been converged with the MMP for quite some time, going back to the 1980s or 90s at least. But this scheme broke down when a critical plurality of women became willing to sacrifice their MMV in their competition for a moment in the dome light of a tiny number of HVM (via hypergamy), and thereby essentially transformed the K-selection MMP into an r-selection SMP (prompted and moulded by feminology, and aided by gynocentric laws and advances in medicine and technology, AKA The Six Sirens of the Sexual Apocalypse, H/T: Roissy).

Christianity strongly favors K-selection and is theologically opposed to r-selection. The church failed to adjust to this shift and continued to tout the pretty lies that kept men invested in the old K-selection paradigm. Christian men were still urged to vet for LTR / marriage minded women in a debased SMP, thereby making themselves socially irrelevant. Thus, Christian men were effectively evicted them from the SMP/MMP competition for both (1) young innocent proto-Christian chicks who had yet to prove their faith, and (2) less-than-Christian vixens who wouldn't give a sh!t about faith or purity.

Of course once the community noticed the effects described above, during the late 10s it was the hype to vet a woman for "red flags" — the presence of which would indicate that she was in the latter category (2). But as more Wimmin caught onto the new game, men realized that if they demanded standards in vetting women, women raised the bar by demanding more from men as well, resulting in a stalemate in which Wimmin were the winner by default, due to egg production. Men who had realistic expectations were consistently and fervently stonewalled by women with incubus fantasies (AKA "Tingles Uber Alles", H/T: Farmboy), fed by mass media and a few decades of Feminology. This brinkmanship gradually progressed until Wimminz hypergamically inflated standards blew through the proverbial glass ceiling. By 2023, Wimminz expectations were so astronomical and unrealistic that they effectively priced themselves out of the market. It became the norm for men to only encounter women with delusional demands and exorbitant expectations.

Moreover, women worthy of LTRs almost completely disappeared from the SMP shortly before the C0V!D epidemic (except maybe for a few coming right out of high school).

As Briffault's Law implies, the K-selection paradigm relies quite heavily on Women possessing and exercising moral Agency, and the presence of a community of faith to hold it all together. As these two necessary conditions have all but disappeared over the last couple decades, more young people are having to strike out on their own. As a consequence, fewer young people now identify with Christianity and church attendance continues to decline precipitously.

Anymore, the value and purpose of Vetting is highly dependent on the social context in which it is applied. In a healthy conservative Christian community, Vetting still has great importance. Outside of such a social environment, the whole concept of Vetting suggests that there is a "type" of woman who is somehow different today than they were 2,000 or 6,000 years ago.

We're still waiting for the D!tz C_nt bubble to pop and for the SMP to blow open and normalize. Maybe it never will, short of a civilizational / cultural reset. Lettuce Spray that the Laud Almighty grants us mercy beaucoup when His wrath is congealed upon the unrighteous.

- Her shoulders are squarely facing him for most of the interview.
- She's taking short, shallow breaths.
- Her eyes are triangulating (looking at his left eye, then at his right, and then at his mouth, lingers looking at his mouth, and then she repeats this cycle). Occasionally she gazes at his chest.
- At 0:08, 0:11, and again at 0:15, when she turns her head to face him, she flashes a brief S1ut eye. The third time she realizes it and looks away. The fourth time she turns to look at him at 0:18-0:20, she turns her head very slowly in a concentrated effort to prevent herself from going S1ut eyed again.
- 0:25-0:27 — She smiles and rocks on her feet. Then she assumes a stance that makes herself shorter than him.

Are College educated women less likely to divorce?

Jack · 9 September 2023 · Archived copy · Original

A Comparative Risk Assessment.

Readership: All;
Theme: IOIs and Vetting
Length: 1,700 words
Reading Time: 9 minutes

Introduction

Vetting Flags (2023/9/4) categorized a woman's level of education according to DEFCON flags.

- Green – Attended a private high school or home schooled.
- Yellow – Public high school education.
- Red – College education.
- Overall – Education — Less is more.

DeepStrength disagreed with these flag assessments, and he cited a number of statistics to support his argument.

- Non-College educated women initiate divorce 70% of the time.
- College educated women initiate divorce at the 90% rate.
- Divorce rate is about 40% for first time couples.

Concerning marriages that last at least 20 years…

- 78% are college educated women, or 22% total divorce rate.
- 49% have some college, or 51% total divorce rate.
- 40% have a high school education, or 60% total divorce rate.

Then he compared the College vs High School divorce rates as follows.

- College – ~22.5% women initiated total population divorce rate [= (25% divorced out of total population) x (90% of these women initiate divorce)]
- Non-College – ~45.6% women initiated total population divorce rate [= (65% divorced out of total population) x (70% of these women initiate divorce)]

I didn't understand where he came up with this last calculation, so I did a little research on this.

Those college parties!

Divorce Rate by Educational Attainment

> "According to the U.S. Census Bureau, in 2019, the divorce rate for individuals with a bachelor's degree or higher was 25.9%. This suggests that individuals with higher education levels, such as a bachelor's degree or beyond, tend to have lower divorce rates compared to individuals with lower levels of education."
>
> "The Census Bureau reported the divorce rate for individuals with some college education as 36.3%, while the divorce rate for those with an associate's degree was 30.1%."
> "The divorce rate for individuals with a high school diploma was 38.8%, while the divorce rate for those with less than a high school diploma was 45.3%.
> The Center for Divorce Education: Divorce Rate by Education Level: Understanding The Relationship Between Divorce and Education (2023/6/9)

So DS's 65% figure is too high. It should be between 38.8% and 45.3%. For the sake of calculation, let's assume the average is ~42%.

So after correcting DS's figures, we have…

- College – ~22.5% women initiated total population divorce rate [= (25% divorced out of total population) x (90% of these women initiate divorce)]
- Non-College – ~29.4% women initiated total population divorce rate [= (42% divorced out of total population) x (70% of these women initiate divorce)]

Those co-ed college games are pretty wild and crazy!

Comparative Risk Assessment

In addition to comparing College vs. Non-College educated female initiated divorce, we should also include the others too — College vs. Non-College educated male initiated divorce, and College vs. Non-College educated women who are NOT divorced.

As of 2023, almost 40% of women in the U.S. have a college degree.

- College – 22.5% x 40% = 9% women initiated total population divorce
- Non-College – 29.4% x 60% = 17.6% women initiated total population divorce

Assuming past trends continue, I did some more number crunching and came up with the following pie chart.

The Non-College, Not Divorced has the largest slice of the pie.

To offer another comparison, the differences between the divorce rates among College and Non-College educated women pales in comparison to the differences between the divorce rates among Atheists and Protestants. Protestants divorce at nearly twice the rate of Atheists.

If we put all this together, a man's best chance for marriage is to marry a highly educated atheist. Is this really where we are now? This just doesn't sound right to me.

If the lower divorce rate among atheists is truly because atheist women are more educated, then perhaps Feminists are correct in rooting for female higher education.

Those sorority parties!

College Campuses and Dormitories are an OPEN SMP

We also need to consider that going to college has many negative influences on young women.

- W0ke indoctrination.
- Hookup / fraternity / sorority / party scene
- Accruing student loan debt.
- Interim "college boyfriends".
- Postponing marriage.

Also, going off to college takes a girl out from under her father's authority and subjects her to the most corruptive elements of society, while she is young, foolish, and in a vulnerable state, and is at the pinnacles of both her SMV and her rutting season. AND, Women are typically very terrible pickers of men.

This meme is not untrue. There are a number of previous posts that described how women are highly susceptible to corruptive influences in a college environment. A brief summary is given after each link.

- Dalrock: Thoughts on the 80/20 college hookup question. (2011/10/23)
  The college carousel is a mating glut.
- Σ Frame: My Dating Experiences in College (2018/3/25)
  Women are sexually aggressive predators, and they flit from man to man on impulse.
- Σ Frame: Things I Learned About Women in College (2018/4/4)
  Women follow their lusty feelings when they are unfettered by social constraints. They qualify men through sexual trysts.
- Σ Frame: What is her true motivation for getting an education? (2022/7/6)
  Around 2/3 (66%) of female college students are sexually active with an average of 2 partners per year, and this figure stands for most any college or university. If a girl grew up in a red state but chooses to attend college in a blue state or a state with legalized abortion, that is a glaring red flag.
- Σ Frame: Women were Created to Conform (2023/5/8)
  Female nature conforms to the Herd. Wherever the herd is going, she will be going there too.

Attending college greatly expands a woman's pool of men to choose from. This is a good thing if it allows her to make a better choice of a husband. It is terribly bad if she is immature, is not seriously marriage minded, or if she lacks self-control.

College is SOOO much FUN! YOLO!

Comprehensive Assessment

Overall, a woman attending college is a risk factor that deserves a red flag. So I disagree with DS's statistical assessment.

The thing to keep in mind is that there are many more things to consider than comparative risk assessments, probabilities, and raw statistics.

A woman who attends college is more likely to…

Positives (smaller probability of divorce)

- Have a higher intelligence
- Come from middle-class to upper class family
- Have better discipline / self-control (necessary to complete the requirements for a degree)

There are also some correlations.

- Having a college degree correlates with higher income.
- Having a college degree correlates with higher intelligence.
- Both higher income and higher intelligence correlate with marital stability.

Negatives (greater incidence of divorce)

- Have debt.
- Have ridden the carousel.
- Have her own career and income
- Have a "liberal" education
- Postpone marriage

- Emphasize her own career over finding a husband / marriage

I think the reason why college educated women have a slightly lower incidence of divorce is not because of education per se, but due to other factors like discipline, family background (e.g. parental divorce), intelligence, agency / maturity, socioeconomic class, and maybe r@ce.

Peer pressure and being away from home is a dangerous combination.

The big question is this. What are the chances that a young woman can make it all the way through 4 years of college unscathed by the experience, and then land in a Godly marriage? To the former question, what little data we have on this indicates less than 31.6% of college attending women do not have sex in college, and to answer the latter question, we know there is less than a 5% chance of marrying a virgin.

I wonder how many of those virgin brides have a Bachelor's degree?

Studies have shown that between 40-60% of incoming freshwomen are virgins and between 12.3-20% of them remain so upon graduation.

A woman's major matters too. Art students are more likely to lose their virginity at university… but those studying science have the least sexual experiences.

It's easy to say, "Oh, but MY daughter won't be like THAT!" …until she falls flat with the trend herd in the art department and IS.

Also, we need to remember that just because a marriage doesn't end in divorce doesn't mean that it glorifies God. In fact, the reason why many marriages DON'T end in divorce is NOT because the wife is a smartly submissive unicorn, but rather because the husband succumbs to an inverted, Feminine dominated relationship structure, which ironically tend to be more enduring (because of men's altruistic nature + testosterone), but of course, less blessed by God. IOW, college educated women are smart enough to keep their man under their thumb without blowing up their marriage.

In conclusion, Scott's Axiom (displaying IOIs), and Headship / Tingly Respect are much better indicators of relationship success than educational level.

Spring break!

Questionable Data Sources

While I was researching information on this topic, I came across a number of sites purveying information that was apparently false.

Here's what I mean.

The article cited above from the Center for Divorce Education cited a study conducted at Bowling Green State University, Ohio, U.S.A. Bowling Green has a notorious reputation for being liberal and feminist.

Bowling Green's report cited the U.S. Census Bureau to back up their conclusions. However, if you follow the link to the U.S. Census Bureau, that particular page did not have the data on divorce rate vs. education that the article claimed.

Another article from Love to Know: Breaking Down Divorce Rates by Religion (and What They Tell Us) (2023/6/20) also presumed to cite data from Pew Research which did not appear at the links provided.

For example, compare their figures with the data from Pew in Table 2 above. Big differences!

Religions and Denominations	American Divorce Rates
Catholic	19%
Protestant	51%
Mormon	9%
Jehovah's Witness	9%
Orthodox Christian	9%
Born Again Christian	33%
Muslim	8%
Jewish	9%
Hindusim	5%
Buddhism	10%
Sikhism	6%
Wicca/Pagan	1%
Atheist	2%

Data Source: Love to Know: Breaking Down Divorce Rates by Religion (and What They Tell Us) (2023/6/20)
In summary, Liberal Feminists want to push the idea that female higher education is all good, so we need to be wary of sources.

More Education, Less Marriage

As more women achieve higher education, fewer are getting married — ever.

While I was researching data for yesterday's post, Are College educated women less likely to divorce? (2023/9/9), I found some other information that relates to career, education, and marriage.

Readers have probably heard that the number of college educated females surpassed that of males in 2014, as shown in Figure 1 below.

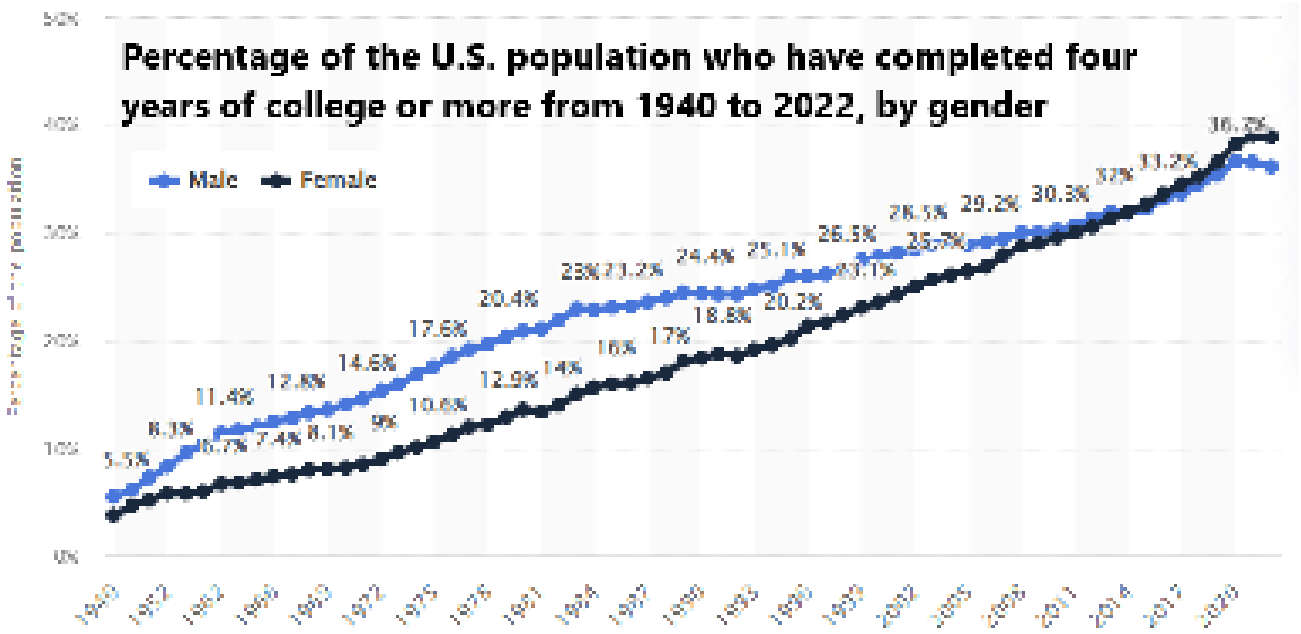

Figure 1: Statista: Percentage of the U.S. population who have completed four years of college or more from 1940 to 2022, by gender (Accessed 2023/9/6.)

While the percentages of the college educated are increasing, the share of marrieds has gone down considerably over the past 60 years. See Figure 2.

Source: Pew Research: Barely Half of U.S. Adults Are Married – A Record Low (2011/12/14)
In 1960, having a degree didn't have much of an impact on marital longevity, but in 2010 it had a significant effect (and still does).

Another article from Pew Research confirms this.

> "College-educated adults are more likely to be married than less-educated adults. Among those who were ages 25 and older in 2014, 65% of those with a bachelor's degree or more were married, compared with 53% of adults with less education, according to a Pew Research Center analysis."
> Pew Research Center: The link between a college education and a lasting marriage (2015/12/4)

When reading, "College-educated adults are more likely to be married than less-educated adults", keep in mind that the share of marrieds is steadily going down (shown in Figures 2 and 3).

This graph from Five Thirty Eight helps put things into perspective.

Image Source: Five Thirty Eight: Marriage Isn't Dead — Yet (2014/9/29)

Marriage is decreasing for everyone, but those who are educated have a better chance at tying the knot than others. This suggests that a degree is required to get into marriage these days. Put another way, marriage is for the elite.

This data also suggests that if a woman goes to college, then she'll be more likely to marry and presumably have a better marriage.

However, I'm not sure how well this logic holds up or how long this trend can continue, because the marriage rate will bottom out eventually.

According to basic RP sexual dynamics, Women who are entitled by a college education have a much smaller pool of men to choose from — higher SMV men who pass her hypergamous filters and who are also willing to marry her, etc., ad infinitum. IOW, there is, and will continue to be a shortage of "good men", as we often hear from women these days.

Putting all this together, I believe this downward trend in marriage may be inversely correlated to the steady increase in the ratio of females to males holding a college degree (Figure 1). That is, more female education, less marriage. It's The Feminine Dilemma.

As the percentage of college educated women continues to grow and further surpass that of men, I believe we will see fewer college educated women ever marry.

But the bright side is that those few female graduates who do manage to stick the ~~chump~~ landing will most likely end up with upper tier men and probably have better marriages too. But if they don't, they can easily jump ship and rely on their credentials. IOW, "don't need no man" can become a reality for these chicks, just as Feminism promised them.

Is Education now more desirable than Beauty and Youth?

Just last week, IFS published a report about The Growing Class Divide in Divorce (2023/9/7).* In conclusion, it reads,

> "Thus, divorce is still more likely for those who cohabit before marriage, for interracial marriages, for women who marry young, and for women from non-intact families, but it is increasingly likely for women without a BA, for black women, and for women who marry young. Given that women with less education and black women are less likely to marry in the first place, this means the myriad benefits of a stable marriage for individuals in the U.S. have become increasingly rare, and more confined to white, well-educated women from intact families."

Getting to the question of Why?, which is what I've been interested in while writing the last couple posts, the explanation offered by IFS cuts against the grain of common Red Pill praxeology. See part in bold.

> "Part of the reason for this is that white, well-educated women are more likely to marry similar men who are likely to have stable employment and comparatively high earnings, and marriages to such men are less likely to result in divorce. For women with less education, marital prospects are more likely to be confined to less educated men with unstable employment and low earnings, and such men are less attractive as marital partners. That is, regardless of their own earnings, women still expect their husbands to provide for the family, and men who cannot do this are less likely to marry and more likely to be divorced. As a result, access to that most basic source of human well-being — a happy, stable family — is becoming more unequal."

Briffault's Law still applies. But men don't give a flip about a woman's education or earnings. Instead, SMV markers like beauty and youth are what make women desirable for both STRs and LTRs.

However, IF beauty and youth are not on the table, primarily because the average age of first marriage is 28.6 (U.S.), 30.7 (Taiwan), and 31.5 (U.K.), then given a choice from what's left over due, men would prefer to marry a woman who is a college educated bread winner.

A Christian Woman's View of Submission

Jack · 13 September 2023 · Archived copy · Original

It is futile to wait or work for a Woman to FEEL like submitting.

The FEEELZ!!!

Weighing in as a woman here:

Whenever the discussion on Σ Frame or Christianity and Masculinity comes to the topic of wifely submission, there always seems to be an emphasis that a woman should FEEL like submitting or she should WANT to submit. There is also the idea that a godly leader / sexually attractive man makes it easier for her to WANT to or FEEL like submitting.

This is simply not the case in reality. My husband is a godly / sexually attractive man. Yet, have I always submitted to him??? No!!! No non-Christian woman can claim to be submissive. Christian women can only claim to be submissive at the moment that they actually submit and at no other time.

Why is that?

This has always been something I really struggled with in my marriage. Why is the DEFAULT setting one of NOT submitting? The answer is in Genesis 3:16. All women have it in their sinful nature to CONTROL their husbands. It has nothing to do with the man / our husbands. But of course, women like to blame men for their non-submission, partly because they feel like they can do nothing about it.*

When a person becomes a Christian, he/she is given a spiritual nature which has the CAPACITY to walk in the Spirit. But the body and the nature thereof is NOT regenerated, which is why we have a constant struggle between the fleshly nature and the spiritual nature.

The fleshly nature DEFAULT for a MAN is to kick back and relax. How this passivity is expressed differs based on the character of the man and his life situation, but ALL men want to escape / minimize their work / responsibilities.

The fleshly nature DEFAULT for a WOMAN is CONTROL. How this control is expressed differs based on the personality of the woman and on societal expectations, but ALL women have their buttons set to CONTROL.

This is something that is NOT taught to men, but it should be, because men do not have this DEFAULT setting of control. For men, the DEFAULT setting is to NOT CONTROL, to NOT rule over her. It is a DEFAULT setting he must overcome in the Spirit by being her HEAD in LOVE.

Men should control, but they do NOT. Women should NOT control, but they do. Such is the fallen sinful nature.*

 Jack's Note: We covered this phenomenon in a few past posts about moral agency. For men, agency is exercised when they take decisive action. Women exercise agency when they give up their quest for control and submit to their male authority. Moreover, Moral Agency is Dependent on Spiritual Maturity. (See more posts under Related.)*

The unbelieving woman's lack of control leads to a pity party.

Carnal Motivations for Behaviors

When unbelieving women submit, they do it for ulterior reasons, which are usually self-centered, and only for a while. They might meet the expectations of an attractive man / a godly man / society long enough to gain the rapport necessary to access something she wants out of the situation. But once that is accomplished, the mask comes off and the DEFAULT resumes.

Likewise, when unbelieving men control, they do it for ulterior reasons. They'll do it long enough to get a job, or earn a degree, or to get laid. But when those goals are achieved, he would prefer to be a couch potato.

Here, we are dealing with the desires of the fleshly nature and with fleshly motivators / rewards.

The talk around the Christian Manosphere apparently treats all women like unbelievers. That is, men have a difficult puzzle to solve to make her FEEL like, or WANT to submit in the flesh, either by INSPIRING her somehow (e.g. charisma, confidence, Game, peacocking, etc.) or by being VISCERALLY attractive to her. This is not much different from either PUAs or Complementarian churchianity — they all cater to and/or appease the feminine fleshly nature.

The larger problem is that we are dealing with a fleshly problem by applying a fleshly solution. And the burden of pulling it off is placed on men. For married couples, the man / husband is designated as the one responsible for the woman's submission. (Singles don't even think about the Headship / Submission dynamic, but they should.) Churchianity avoids the issue of submission entirely, but still places the burden on men. This is the primary failure of churchianity — failing to recognize the sins and weaknesses of women while putting all the responsibility and blame on men. But again, this approach only works for a short time while the woman's fleshly desires are engaged, and then when her desires are sated, she regresses to the DEFAULT. That is why even godly / sexually attractive men get duped / dumped / divorced.

Spiritual Obedience is a Daily Struggle

The secular Manosphere teaches that as long as you keep her desires inflamed and frustrated (both are very important), then you can keep her following and submitting. This does string her along and extend the drama — but not indefinitely. Even this has a shelf life. The consequences of applying this fleshly solution is that the womens' desires get burnt out, and she eventually learns to distrust / hate all men.

Christian women, OTOH, submit because they know they SHOULD. It is a COMMAND given in Scripture. It is not something that a Christian woman can do out of habit, except it does get easier with regular practice. The volitional will is important, but it's not enough. It is ONLY possible long term when she WALKS in the Spirit. And just like how men must choose to be dominant and proactive in every circumstance, women must choose to be submissive to her HEAD. It is a DAILY walk. Every day we must CHOOSE. Do we choose what the DEFAULT fleshly nature craves (passivity for men, control for women) or do we choose to walk in the Spirit (dominate or submit, respectively)?

What Men Should Be Doing

Submission is NOT about getting a woman to WANT to submit, nor is it about arousing / coddling / winnowing her until she FEELS like it. Submission for wives is about HER making the choice to crucify the fleshly nature which makes her WANT to control and to INSTEAD walk in the Spirit by submitting, trusting that God sees and records and rewards.

“Husbanding” is calling your wife out when she is walking according to the flesh. It is making her aware she has a CHOICE. It is pointing out that she is choosing wrong when she is walking in the flesh. It is an appeal to her to choose right. It is teaching her how to obey God and follow.

If you are dealing with a woman who ONLY walks in the flesh, then you will have to use fleshly motivators to get her to submit and go along with you. You will need to be charming, debonair, and suave. You’ll have to learn Game. You will need to have a gym membership and looksmaxx. You’ll need a competitive income and a comfortable lifestyle. You will have to tolerate her envy, insecurity, jealousy, projection, and rage. You will have to prove yourself to her by passing all her sh!t tests. You will have to sacrifice to earn her trust, and sacrifice in a way that doesn’t make you appear weak in her eyes.

But if she is redeemed, all the man has to do is make her aware that she has a choice. She can go with her fleshly nature and what FEELS good, being a controlling drama queen, and so on. OR, she can do what is RIGHT, walk in the Spirit, submit to her HEAD, and allow the Holy Spirit to form in her patience, kindness, and self-control. A man also has to teach and encourage her to do the same, and pray for her to make the right choice.

The man / husband is NOT responsible for what her choice is. It is her OWN personal walk with Christ which determines that.

Women have free will just like the church does. And she may not always make the right choice, just like the church does not. But that is HER choice and there will be consequences for that choice, for better or worse.

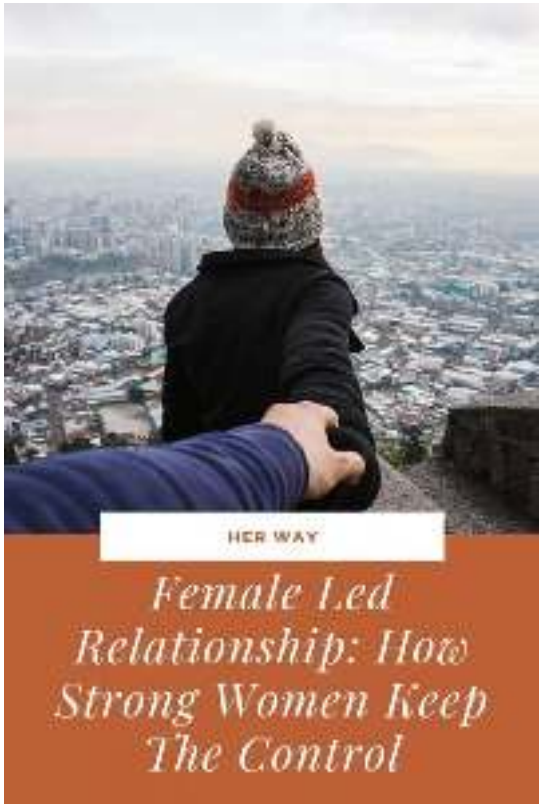
Concluding Statements — The Obedient Wife

The Bible commands wives to submit. Do I like it? Nope! Who cares? God cares. And if you care about God, then you care what He cares. You submit anyway because being right with God is more important — even if it feels sucky — which on most days it is.

The main thing about submission is DOING the right thing regardless of how you FEEL.

Men are taught this repetitively in an effort to make them better beasts of burden. (Men get burnt out on this and want to do even less, just like women do from getting played and jaded by PUA types.)

Regrettably, this is NOT taught to women. Instead, women are taught how to control more “wisely”.



Initially, my husband had to "husband" me quite a bit. He had to call me out rather frequently. Now, I am more self-aware and I tend to catch myself, say a quick prayer, and DO the right thing regardless of my FEELINGS on the matter. I'm not saying I always get it right. It is still a daily thing. My husband still has to call me out on things sometimes but considerably less than before. The submission part still sucks (that struggle will always be there as long as I live in this body), but I catch it more often now BEFORE my husband is aware — which makes our marriage go more smoothly.

So much of life is not fair — but living in this world means we get to suck it up and be faithful regardless, trusting that our reward for it is in heaven.

This is no reflection on the godliness / sexual attractiveness of my husband. It has to do with my fleshly nature. But thank Jesus, I am not defined by my fleshly nature. Because of the Holy Spirit (in His Power) I have the capacity and ability to walk in the Spirit. Praise Jesus for what He did on the cross for that! I am no longer condemned to live as per my fleshly nature. I have the victory through Christ Jesus.

Are Working Women Less Likely to Divorce?

Elite no longer implies Stay at Home Moms

In the past, the Christian Manosphere has drawn a sharp distinction between career gals and Stay At Home Wives / Moms. The general consensus has been that independent career gals represent a higher risk of divorce and that SAHW/Ms are preferred.

Here are a few old posts on this topic for the reader's enjoyment.

- Dalrock: Let them become elite. (2017/9/26)
- Christianity and Masculinity: Marriage a mark of privilege? (2017/9/26)

Also, we usually think of college educated career gals as solidly middle class, whereas we tend to regard "elite" as being rather leisurely, with the wife being a SAHM or working part time at a frivolous job or doing some sort of volunteer work in the community or local school extracurriculars.

However, lately we have seen some evidence that college educated women are more likely to marry and may be less prone to divorce, although the reasons for this continue to be debated. One prominent explanation is that educated women place more emphasis on lifestyle and socioeconomic security and are therefore less likely to blow it all up with a divorce. It was also observed that culture, subculture, and community has a significant influence on marital outcome.

On this, Thedeti wrote a comment that leads us to the main topic of this post.

> "…educated women tend to be more future time oriented, be better problem solvers, make more intelligent and successful children, and persevere better."

It is assumed that these traits make a woman better at maintaining a marriage.

> "Educated women stay married at greater rates than uneducated women in large part because of that FTO and perseverance. The work required to get that education does build some character. It also impresses on a woman what's at stake: her children, her standing with family, and most of all, her standing and reputation with other women."

"High Attachment" vs "Low Attachment" Women

I found a paper by Newman and Olivetti (2015) that reports how those older stereotypes may not be entirely true.

Newman and Olivetti found that couples where the wife has a stronger attachment to the labor market are significantly less likely to divorce (10% less out of a 25% divorce rate) than couples where the wife has a more intermittent participation in the labor force. Having a wife who is highly involved in the labor force decreases the probability that the marriage ends in a divorce. A wife with intermittent employment is riskier. For example, women with troubled marriages are more likely to enter the labor market and earn a higher share of household income right around the time they file for divorce.

To account for this phenomenon, Newman and Olivetti came up with a trait dichotomy, “High Attachment” vs “Low Attachment”, to compare women who stay in their marriages, regardless of their career, education, or socioeconomic class, with those who do not. They found that High Attachment women share many of the essential features commonly associated with career women, including…

- High Attachment women are more likely to have attended at least a few years of college.
- High Attachment women earn more $$$ than Low Attachment women.
- High Attachment women display more stability and a much lower volatility both in their earnings and their share of earnings in the household income than Low Attachment women.

This even holds true when accounting for other factors, including age at first marriage, husband’s education, wife’s education, husband’s race, wife’s race, number of children, average income, wife’s share of household income, and husband’s educational level compared to the wife’s.

Educated Career Women Remain Risky

However, Newman and Olivetti’s findings do not completely overturn our long-held notions of working gals being more prone to divorce. They found the following correlations between working married females and divorce.

- When the incomes of husbands and wives are on par, marriage between “equals” becomes less valuable.
- More investment in a career is associated with less investment in home, marriage, and family.
- Career couples often have increased marital conflict.
- Career women are more capable and more independent and therefore more willing to divorce.
- Career women view divorce as less risky, and are therefore more willing to divorce.

Income Ratio is Key

Newman and Olivetti mentioned that increased wealth contributed by the wife's income contributes towards marital stability. However, when wives join the workforce, there is a trade-off. More income brings a more convenient and comfortable life, but also less investment in marriage and family. As the wife's earnings grow in proportion to the husband's income, at some point, marriage is considered optional or even confining to the wife, and may be abandoned altogether.

Working married women in stable marriages typically earn about 30-40% of the household income. When the woman makes more than 50% (i.e. more than the husband), then the marriage becomes unstable and is effectively prone to divorce. Researchers found that some wives intentionally make less than their husbands in order to have a more robust life, all things considered — more time with family and a more stable marriage.

Conclusions

The most interesting finding of this study is that the characteristics (education, earnings, etc.) of husbands married to High Attachment wives do not differ systematically from those of men married to Low Attachment women. This stands in contrast to the influence of husband / wife income ratio and it also runs against common RP lore which suggests that women are more secure when married to a man with high(er) earnings and status. Apparently, the success of a marriage predominantly depends on the character of the wife.

So Briffault's Law is revealed to be true once again. That is, "The female, not the male, determines all the conditions of the family." The corollary to Briffault's Law is, "Where the female can derive no benefit from association with the male, no such association takes place." We are also seeing more of this as well.

I think the takeaway from this is NOT that a man should look for a wife with a college degree or her own career per se. It's more than that. These things are merely indicators of a woman's capability. In addition to capability, a woman's character must also be considered. "High Attachment", as Newman and Olivetti attempted to quantify in their assessment of non-divorcing wives, is a woman who is disciplined and committed enough to accomplish things in life, whether it be earning a degree, holding down a regular job, or maintaining a marriage and family (whether she has those things or not); a wife who keeps herself busy, and can apply herself to get things done. This lines up with the Biblical description of a wife's role of a helper (Genesis 2:18) who is diligent and productive (Proverbs 31:10-31).

Moreover, a wife who can commit herself is more likely to be committed to her job and also more likely to be committed to her marriage as well. I imagine one way to vet this is to look for her commitment to friends and family. If she is faithful to her friends and other social and working relationships, then she's probably a committed person. If she's frequently changing friends and jobs and talks sh!t about her coworkers, friends, or people in general, etc., then that is a red flag.

Another takeaway is that if the wife is a SAHM and suddenly wants to get a job, then that is a red warning flag. The husband should prepare himself financially and mentally for the possibility of her having an affair or filing for divorce.

Case Study 1 — Busy Jill

In fact, I have experienced what Newman and Olivetti have described about working wives. My wife has always kept herself busy. When she was a SAHW, she was always busy cooking and cleaning. When she got a job, she was fully preoccupied with her work. I saw her settle down and become more content in our marriage when she started working outside the home. There have been a couple years when the university didn't offer me a contract and my wife made more money than I did, but this didn't faze her very much. I think part of the reason is because she made sufficient money such that she didn't have to worry about what I was earning. I think another reason is because her employment experience forced her to mature in certain ways that I myself was unable to adequately address with her.

Case Study 2 — Busybody Wife

I know a woman who was a SAHW for more than 20 years, and then she got a job, saying she wanted to help put her oldest son through college. After a couple years, she started an affair with her boss. After 4 years, she divorced her husband and married the boss. The boss also divorced his wife to marry her. The money she had been saving for her son's education became her nest egg for her divorce. The son received less than 10% of that money. The question is, at what point did she decide to leave her marriage? Was it when she got cozy with the boss, or when she first went back to work?

What is S1ut Eye?

A reader asks,

> "You mentioned that s1ut eye is both positive (an IOI) and negative (a s1ut tell). What does s1ut eye look like? How can I identify this and tell whether it is good or bad?"

Comprehensively, s1ut eye is the look of desire on a woman's face when her heart is totally exposed. When a woman is in this state, she is completely emotionally vulnerable.

In particular, usually the sclera (the white of the eye) will be visible above and/or below the iris (the colored part of the eye), but this is not always the case. Also, some people have the white of their eye showing all the time. In the far East, this is called Sanpaku, and it is supposed to indicate that the person is emotionally volatile or psychologically unstable.

Of additional note, s1ut eye is usually accompanied by other IOIs, especially a gaping mouth, and/or touching her hair, face, or neck.

Read on to learn more about this curious expression.

S1ut Eye — When Her Desirous Soul Peeps out of her Eyes

S1ut Eye is the expression of a female who has abandoned her self-awareness. Emerging from behind the prim and proper play act, the feminine heart is brimming with raw feral desire and craving the affirmation of her ego through the titillating scrutiny of male attention and the intense carnal pleasure a man wields upon her body, mind, and soul. In a horizontal context, it extolls the ravishing desire of a woman (feeling) viscerally loved, which is a very beautiful thing to hold and behold.

When vetting, it's important to choose a woman with a lively emotional affect display, as this indicates good emotional and psychological health. This is usually men's first impression when sizing up women – whether she is happy and pleasant or not.

However, when reading IOIs, men shouldn't look only at her emotional display. Women can have s1ut eye when they're afraid, angry, happy, sad, or surprised, but never in a state of contempt or disgust. You have to look at her inner disposition — how she's feeling inside. You have to read her soul's desire. As the saying goes, "The eyes are the window to the soul".

The Appearance of S1ut Eye

It is not hard to find pictorial examples of s1ut eye.

S1ut eye is ubiquitous in advertising, especially cosmetic ads. It is favored by advertisers, models, and photographers alike, simply because the eyes appear larger, it expresses her emotions, and it is attractive and alluring.

All of the following photos were taken from cosmetic ads. These "windows to the soul" are rich in emotional undertones (e.g. admiration, desire, excitement, fear, feral aggression, joy, love, surprise, vulnerability, and wonder are depicted). Some expressions reveal the sclera under the bottom of the pupil, which makes the conveyed emotion more obvious and intense.

Surprise

Admiration

Wonder

Vulnerability

The Contextual Appropriateness of S1ut Eye

It's very important for a wife to gaze upon her husband with S1ut Eye, but if a woman gazes upon any other man with S1ut Eye, or merely just walks around in public with this expression on her face, then that is simply just 'S1ut Eye' — a lusty gaze of unquenchable desire.

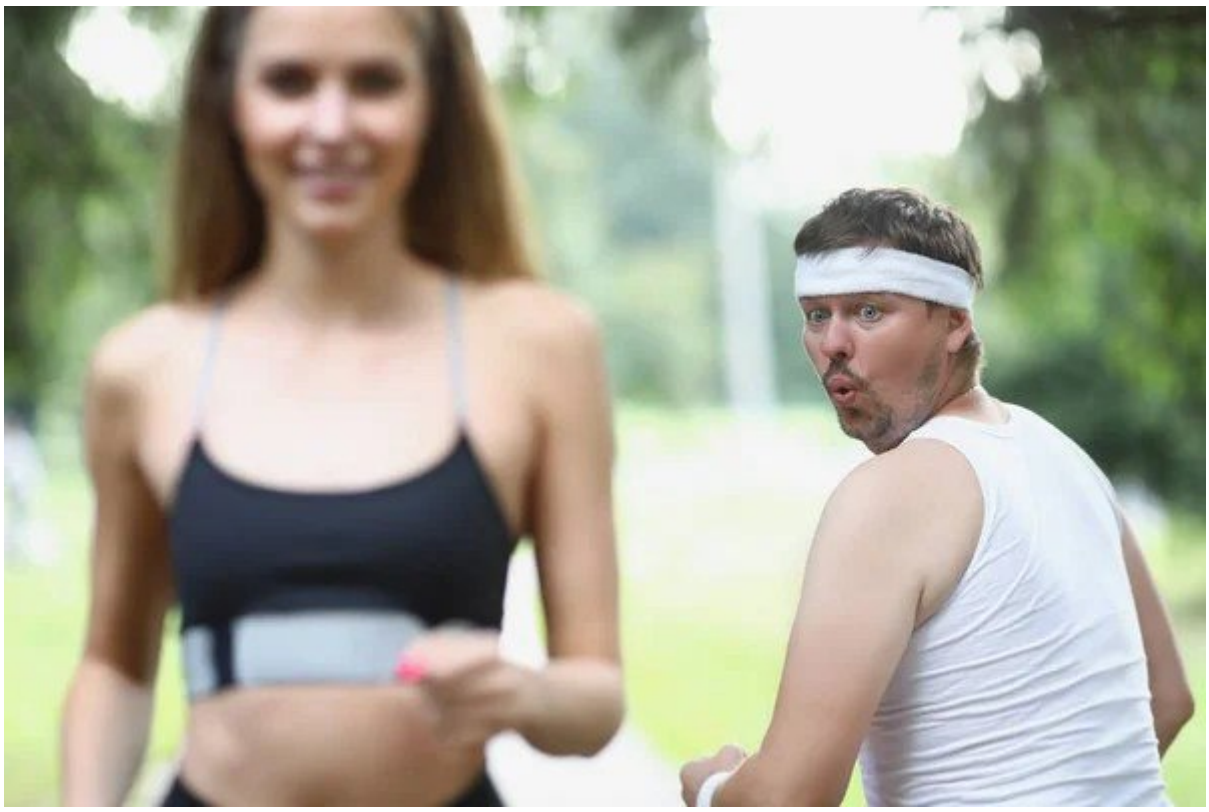
S1ut Eye is an IOI because if a woman looks a man in the eye for more than 6-10 seconds with any of the above expressions, she's ready to go home with him, or anywhere really, and ASAP (unless he screws it up). If a man misses or passes up that opportunity, ~~she~~ it may never come again.

But because s1ut eye is seen everywhere in the media, men may take it for granted and therefore fail to notice when it is displayed by women as an IOI IRL.

In fact, seeing s1ut eye IRL is rather rare. Most women are VERY conscientious about any overt display of heart-felt emotion, and they will shame other women for losing their sense of self-consciousness and showing such vulnerability. It goes against the Strong Independent Wimmin™ trope. The only time it is roundly accepted is when several women are crooning over a hawt guy in their vicinity. But if any of these women have the courage to approach the man, the others will remind her to "check herself" and/or "calm down" first. "Checking herself" not only means making sure her hair, make-up, and general appearance is presentable, but it also means to get her desire under control so that she doesn't make a fool of herself by displaying s1ut eye. The thing is, guys will seldom pick up on her interest unless she makes a fool of herself. And even then, most guys won't "get it".

Can Men have S1ut Eye?

There is a dispositional equivalent of s1ut eye for men, but it is not so obviously expressed in a man's eyes as it is for women. We would think of men in this state as being childish, foolish, or naïve, or we might say he is "wearing his heart on his shirtsleeve", or "thinking with his little head". And just like with the female version, this kind of emotional openness in men is chided and ridiculed.



S1ut Eye in P0rn

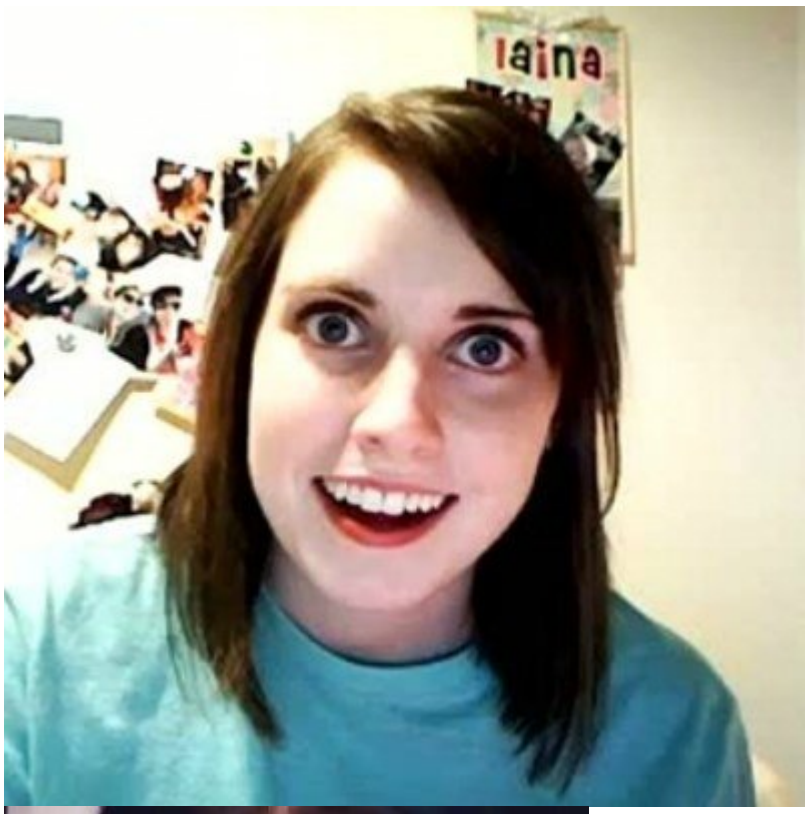
P0rnography is stocked full of very obvious s1ut eye, precisely because it reveals women's sexual desire in their most vulnerable state. This is the element that makes p0rnography obscene (and also gratifying to men). Seeing S1ut Eye on a p0rn star in action is what appeals to a male viewers' sense of sexual conquest, which makes that particular scene or frame grab especially gratifying to watch. However, the only emotions that you'll see conveyed in their eyes are mostly desire and feral aggression (which appear frightening and soullessly animalistic, respectively). Occasionally you'll see excitement or vulnerability (which appear empty or bland inside, respectively). If the model is young and new to the camera, you might see fear, surprise, or wonder. What you'll never see is authentic admiration, joy, or love.

I am NOT suggesting readers should go look for examples. Here's a meme that should give you an idea of how it looks.

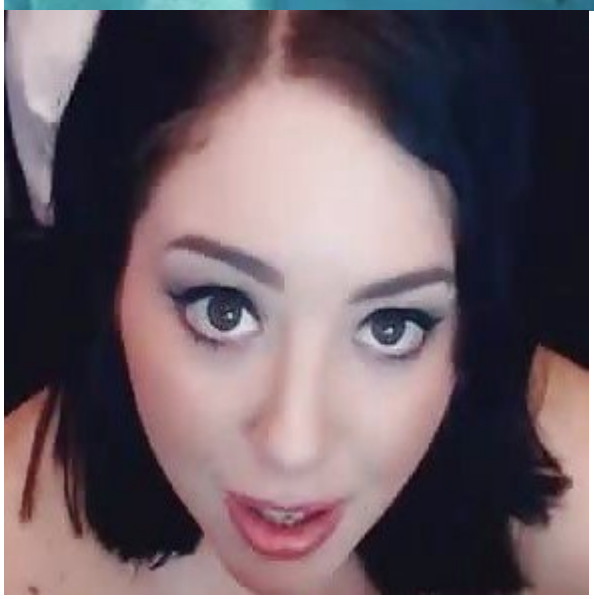
As you can see in the above “shots”, when s1ut eye is displayed, many other characteristics of the woman become more obvious, such as her level of confidence, her intelligence, her degree of trust, her passion, and her personality. The combinatory intrigue is what endears a particular woman to a man.

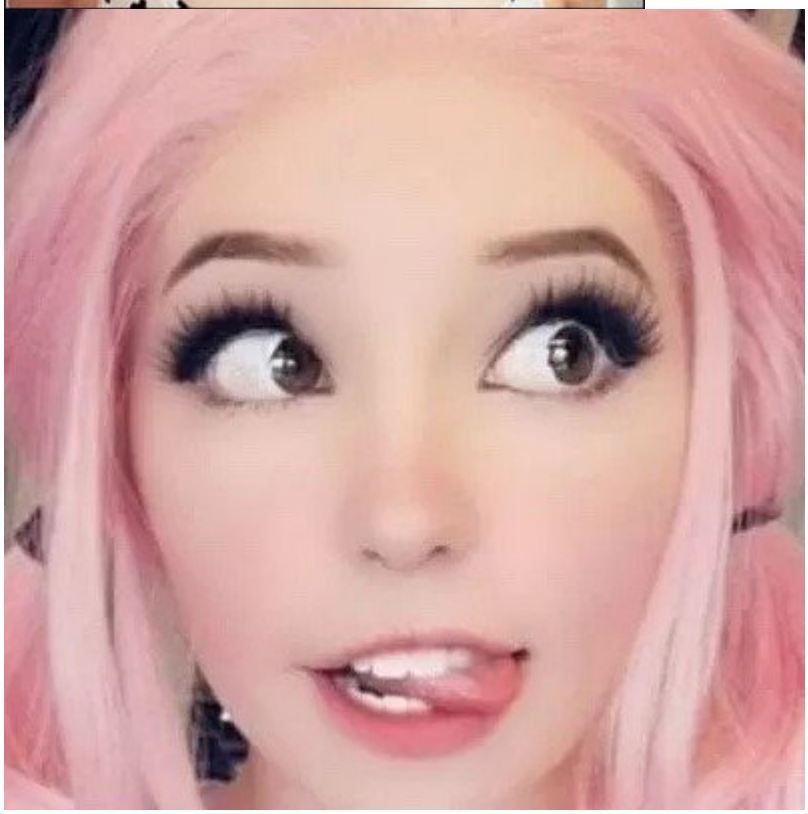
More Pictorial Examples of S1ut Eye

Some of these images are from advertisements, some from p0rn, and some from popular internet culture. When placed side by side sans context, s1ut eye and the personal characteristics it reveals may be more apparent to the reader.



laina





Is S1ut Eye Good or Bad?

Somewhat contrary (or perhaps quite fitting) to the connotation of its name, s1ut eye is nothing more than the natural uninhibited emotional expression of a woman in response to a masculine stimulus. S1ut Eye is the expression of abandoned trust and emotional vulnerability that only happens when a human female is humbled to the very fibers of her soul. It is also the non-verbal communication from the soul of a woman hoping and yearning for immediate love and attention. And you know, AWALT.

Thus, the expression is not inherently immoral. It depends on what's going on around her.

So the answer to the reader's question in the introduction depends entirely on (1) the identity of the person in relation to yourself, (2) the stimulus, and (3) the context.

- If you see it in advertising, the advertiser is appealing to your hind-brain/libido to put you in the mood to spend $$$.
- If you see it in p0rnography, you're looking at the real thing, but it poses a sinful deception in arousing the viewer's desires outside of a real relationship (i.e. marriage).
- If you're in a bar, it means she's probably drunk.
- If she's reading a romance novel, it's because she's titillating herself with an imaginary stimulus.
- If she gives this look to you because she happened to see you taking your shirt off, etc., then it's because you inadvertently surprised her with a stimulus.
- If you see it in a loose woman, she's conscientiously attempting to seduce you or another man.
- If she's giving this look to nearly every hawt chad, then she's probably a true s1ut.
- If she gives this look to you, but she's married to another man, then you'll soon be dealing with her husband's jealousy.
- If your wife or girlfriend is giving this look to another man, then it's the wrong stimulus. Unless she reins herself in (or else, you or someone else does it), then you're facing a competition for her heart and maybe her body too. (One quick way for husbands to fix this is to bang her ASAP.)
- If she consistently gives this look to you and only you, then she's Tingling with love for you.
- If you're having sex with her, it is normal and natural, especially after she's been ridden hard and rolled over, leaving her quivering in a puddle of gism and sweat, and gasping for breath.
- If you're having sex with her, and she doesn't give you this look, then her heart is not into it, and she's probably using you as a tool for some other purpose.

- A proud husband should see it on his freshly devirginized wife's face on their wedding night. If the bride's eyes and cherry don't pop in apoplectic unison, then the marriage may be in trouble.

As you can see, Identity, Stimulus, and Context determine whether or not the expression of s1ut eye is authentic, beneficial, fitting, good, morally licit, right, true, etc.

Cultural Contexts

It also depends on culture. In the far East, a subtle form of s1ut eye is taken to be an indicator of an open heart, emotional authenticity, humility, moral innocence, and youthful vitality – all very positive traits!

Belle Delphine is perhaps the most easily identifiable example of this kind of image being marketed to western audiences. Except Belle Delphine sexualizes it, thereby simultaneously making her a very bad example of why Easterners value this appearance.

To Eastern sensibilities, this intense sexualization and the desire it fosters destroy the overall innocence and purity of it (which is true). So they would view Belle Delphine as a very cute but stupid "monkey" (a popular term for someone who is full of impulsive desire and devoid of self-control and human dignity).

But to Western sensibilities, Belle Delphine represents a very brief period of a late-adolescent girl's life when she discovers the joys of sexual desire and expression, IOW, the feminine emotional aspects of humility, innocent love, and virginal defloration. Her semiotic appeal to the mythical metanoia of sexual discoverie is the full metaphysical explanation for her spectacular popularity, precisely because all men have within themselves an intensely strong innate desire to sanctify a beautiful and nubile young woman unto themselves, and this imagery conveys tangible evidence of that hope to fully possess a woman, heart, mind, body, and soul. Thus, the sexualization of the image is seen to be naturally congruent, but simultaneously profane.

So as you can see, in both cultures, there are positive and negative aspects of it. So any expression of s1ut eye must be seen in context and interpreted accordingly.

Permanent S1ut Eye

Some women have a permanent s1ut eye. At the age of 40 (in the photo below), 16 years after her affair with then-President Bill Clinton, Monica Lewinsky still exhibited s1ut eye. Other noteworthy examples include Catherine Bach, Sasha Grey, and many professional p0rn stars (e.g. Jynx Maze is pictured).

Having a permanent s1ut eye indicates that the woman is fixated in an adolescent developmental stage and has integrated her sexual desire into her every day personality.

Men find this transcendentally alluring, even intoxicating, but as you can imagine, it is chocked full of risks.

For men vetting women, it's safe to say that permanent s1ut eye is a very bad sign.

Fake S1ut Eye

A fake s1ut eye is often employed to mock the emotional transparency or naïve openness of others. This is also a very bad sign, because in this case, it is an Indicator of Contempt (IOC). AOC is the very best example of this particular IOC.

The Green Line Test

Jack · 17 September 2023 · Archived copy · Original

Jack's take on the Green Line Test.

Readership: All;
Theme: IOIs and Vetting
Length: 950 words
Reading Time: 5 minutes

Introduction

The Green Line Test is a common technique used in architecture, design, and engineering to help visualize the shape, orientation, and proportion of objects.

The Green Line Test was first applied to human physiognomy in 2004 and has been touted around the Manosphere ever since, although not frequently. Rivelino and Rollo are the most famous for employing the Green Line Test. However, it originated long before them.

The Green Line Test went mainstream in April 2022 when TikTokers began sizing up celebrities using the Green Line Test.

- Newsweek: What Is the Green Line Test? Viral Relationship Rule Explained (2022/4/20)
- Daily Mail: Does the Green Line love test really work? Brave couples try out the viral trend which shows who wears the trousers based on your body language… with VERY mixed results (2022/4/28)
- Techronicle: What is the Viral Green Line test on Tiktok | Is the Green Line Test or Don't Lean In test Fake? (2022/4)

- Dazed: Green line theory and the rise of misogynistic pseudoscience (2023/3/7)
- Aol.: What is the 'green line' relationship test on TikTok, and how does it work? (2023/8/25)

Liberal MGM outlets (e.g. Dazed, Newsweek) are quick to dismiss it as hearsay, superstition, "toxic" Red Pill theory, or claim "expert opinion" that it is meaningless — so it must be true! Libs have to debunk this somehow, because it exposes the everyday reality of gynocentric pedestalization to the core.

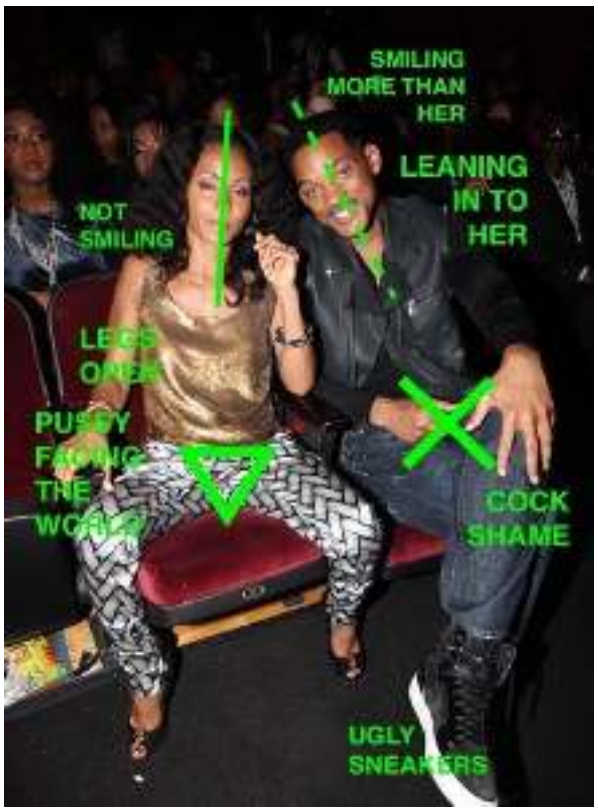
Liberal Feminists have used this image to claim the Green Line Test is hogwash. However, anyone with discernment can detect that the woman is in love and the man leaning in expresses masculine protection. Context is everything.

More recently, another concept of The Green Line Test is taking root in business culture, as it is a method of reviewing job applicants to determine if a candidate's personality, values, and sense of business culture fit within the company in an effort to reduce turnover rates and promote a positive work environment. The Green Line is a hypothetical line that separates behavior that aligns with the company culture from behavior that doesn't. The Green Line Test consists of a set of interview questions that assess a candidate's alignment with the company culture. Criteria may include things like communication style, problem-solving approach, and team dynamics.

How to Apply The Green Line Test

The most obvious application of the Green Line Test is when one person is leaning towards the other. Submissive women lean into the man, while dominant men do not lean in to the woman. TikToker Jack Mac (@jackmacbarstool) has a playlist on his page with several videos explaining why this is true.

However, a lesser known fact is that the Green Line Test can also be used to visualize relative openness. For example, certain body parts of the submissive person, such as the head, chin, hands, legs, knees, and toes, will point towards the dominant person. The hands, legs, knees, and toes of the submissive person are spread open to the dominant person. Also, the more submissive person will appear more informal, animated, gleeful, and often using hand gestures. The Green Line test can sometimes be applied to these tells as well, for example, fingers pointing at, or hands extended to the dominant person.



We all know how this went.

Interpreting the Meaning of The Green Line Test

We know that Headship / successful relationships require a dominant male and submissive female, and this can be clearly observed from the Green Line Test.

In general, if the Green Line Test is positive, and appears in conjunction with other IOIs, then it is to be taken seriously.

However, it is more important to note that The Green Line Test reveals subconscious non-verbal communication. It can be an IOI or a "tell", but not always. Like all communication, it is only valid and meaningful in that particular context at the time it is expressed. IOW, we can't look at a photo of a couple that was taken 10 years ago and accurately conclude that they have a good relationship now. Also, the person may behave that way towards everyone, not just a significant other.

As Scott once pointed out, you have to take in the whole picture, not just green lines, but also open body posture, enthusiasm, the focus of their attention, the general mood of the moment… Like how we often see photos of couples, but the focus of the woman's attention is on the camera man, not the man she's with, who is suddenly transformed into her orbiter in her mind and in that moment. It is obvious that the woman is more interested and perhaps turned on by having her photo taken (or by the photographer himself) than she is about the guy she's with. Another example is how my wife's coworkers will act flirtatious around me. All the IOI signs are there, including some very obvious verbal innuendos, but it is clearly understood that it's just for fun. Green lines may not matter much in these cases.

Green Line Test Fail. The exaggerated monkey grins are for the media camera, not for the marine hero.

Case Study — Open Toes for the Boss

Tomorrow's post applies The Green Line test on a girl's feet to reveal how open she is to two different men — one is a handsome peer, and the other is her boss. My theory is that women are more emotionally (and perhaps sexually) open to men who have genuine authority over them (i.e. the owner of the company where she works) than men they are simply attracted to (i.e. the handsome guy in her peer group). In addition to being her employer, I think money and power are also forms of authority. This also explains why women are willingly submissive to authorities more than their husbands. Most husbands don't have much authority over their wives, and if they do, they're ignorant of it.

Boss + Female Employee = Steamy Hot Chemistry

Jack · 18 September 2023 · Archived copy · Original

An archetypical relationship formation model.

Readership: Christians
Theme: IOIs and Vetting
Length: 1,300 words
Reading Time: 7 minutes

Introduction

It is not uncommon for female employees to monopolize the corner office of a male supervisor. Surveys report between 15% to 27% of women have had a sexual relationship with their supervisor. That's at least 1 out of every 7 women you work with! Maybe more than 1 out of 4!

Single moms can't escape the shame. (2023/5/26) told the story of a woman who shacked up with her boss — a man she's known and dated since college and who probably offered her the job. Then she came down with a case of severe placental swelling and edema (AKA the preggers). Reading in between the lines of her story, we can see that the whole office environment was a fantasy sex cult centered around the boss's persona.

Although sensational, this is not unique at all. This happens everywhere, all the time, although we are seldom made privy to the private pleasures that proceed, like we saw in the above case.

Here are 3 more examples of this phenomenon with some takeaways at the end.

Case Study 1 — L!nkdIn to the SMP

Under the same post, The Eye of Sauron gave us this little gem.

> If: I was not married

> And: I started a business tomorrow
> And: I invited a bunch of girls to come work for me who I knew had crushes on me or I had fvcked in the past, I am pretty sure I know what would happen.
> In fact, when I WAS starting up my private practice, and I still had a L!nkdIn account, I was trying to find someone to work with me 2-3 days a week to handle the administrative stuff, the billing, the scheduling.
> Every person who responded to the ad was a cute girl. And my wife went ballistic when I would look at the responses. So she started recommending her ugliest or old white-haired friends. The guise was, "We know her and she could use some extra cash."
> The single-mom back story to that is well known around here.

Case Study 2 — Professors are a Magnet for Loose Libbys

When I started as an assistant professor several years ago, I wanted to hire a personal assistant to handle the telephone and manage the paperwork (in Chinese). All the applicants seemed to fit a certain profile — females, mid to late 20s, introverted / reserved personality, slightly overweight but not unattractively so, liberal politics, socially open minded, SMV = 4-5. There was one extroverted applicant in her mid-30s who was divorced and had a daughter. I hired her because I thought she would be more mature / responsible. I could not offer her any job benefits, so instead I would take her to dinner once a month. She worked 6 hours a week (3 hours a day, 2 days a week), and she did get a lot of things done, just as I had expected of her.

But as time went on, she spent more and more time talking with me about non-work related issues. There was less and less formality and more and more banter and joking around. After 2-3 months, she started calling me in the evenings and on weekends, talking about random stuff and inviting me to go do things with her. After 5-6 months, she started inviting me to go to bars / dance clubs / day trips / etc. with her.

Every time I asked about her responsibilities to her daughter, she always said her daughter would be in school, or visiting her father / grandparents / etc. That was a big clue as to her true intentions. I would respond positively to her invitations, sometimes enthusiastically, but I never followed through in going out with her. Except once, my girlfriend (now wife) and I went on a day trip together with her and her daughter.

Soon after I met my current wife, she quit the job.

Looking back on this interaction through a RP lens, it is obvious that the Boss + Female Employee dynamic was in full swing (for her, anyway).

Case Study 3 – Ornery Open Toes for the Owner

I saw this same phenomenon recently with a woman I know in her late 20s. Her feet tell the whole story.

Parallel toes for handsome friends.

Open toes for the boss.

The photo on the left is of her standing next to a handsome guy in her peer group. The photo on the right is of her standing with the owner of the company she works for. Notice how her feet are spread open. She had no photos of her standing with her “boyfriend”, except when they appeared in group photos with their peers. Basically, her “boyfriend” is her closest Beta Orbiter. (He is hopelessly Blue Pilled and love-struck.) She describes their relationship as “complicated”, which is a tacit confession that she’s not as interested in commitment to her boyfriend as he is with her. IOW, she’s looking to monkey branch, or is keeping the back door open so she can step out on him — possibly with the Big Boss, judging by her body language.

Conclusions

I think we could all agree that the male boss / employer / supervisor + younger female employee is a recipe for Sparks, Tingles, sexxx, and babies.

But before we jump to the conclusion that the Boss + Chick Employee dynamic is merely a fleshly evo-psyche trope, let's think again. Woman was made for man, and in fact, this is exactly what God created the woman for — to be a companion and helper (Genesis 2:18; 1 Corinthians 11:8-9). Part of the reason these office romances blossom is because they're conforming to God's ordained order. They have a shared purpose, and they're working together towards that purpose. Another reason is because this arrangement satisfies women's hypergamous instincts.

So whenever we see situations where people are doing things together, and women are helping a male leader, we should not be surprised when one (or more) of the women and the man develop a romantic attachment to each other. We should EXPECT IT with full anticipation depending on propinquity, time, and chance!

If we assume this as a given reality of human nature, instead of dismissing it as an amusing foible or a trope, then we can obtain greater clarity and take better responsibility for ourselves in the social situations we may find ourselves in.

- Young single females looking for a husband will try to cash in their reproductive chips by taking the job with the most attractive male supervisor.
- Young married females interviewing for a job should pay close attention to who their supervisor will be, and decide whether there is the potential for temptation to occur before taking the job.
- Men (single or married) may capitalize on their opportunities with women when holding a supervisory position. This could turn out to be either good or bad, depending on the situation and the character of those involved.
- A man in a supervisory position can assess whether a woman in question is agentic, responsible, submissive, and trustworthy.
- Supervisors who have a say in hiring should pay close attention to who the new female hires will be, and decide whether there is a potential for a #MəT00 slip up to occur.
- Male coworkers should not be found unaware when affairs commence and the gossip flies.
- Married men should involve their wives in their work, preferably in the capacity of an assistant or helper.

Always be aware of the context. Remember, the Pence Rule applies in this type of situation. Don't let yourself be another #MəT00 statistic.

Revisiting Val Bure's Dominant Manhandling Incident

Jack · 19 September 2023 · Archived copy · Original

The natural gesture of claiming dominion.

Readership: Men and hockey fans
Theme: IOIs and Vetting
Length: 1,500 words

Introduction

Three years ago, back in early September, 2020, Valeri Vladimirovich Bure, a Russian-American NHL all-star, struck a pose with his wife that shot a puck around the virtual world.

Of course, it requires a Russian man to show us how Masculinity is done, since Murican men have walked away from feral Murican wimmin and receded into their basements to wait out the ~~Reset~~ lockdown while playing Fortnite and Grand Theft Auto.

For some obviously gynocentric reason, publicity stunts of the incident kicked Val Bure out of the limelight and borrowed his wife's hyphenated name instead. Thus, it became awkwardly known as The Candace Cameron Bure Boob Incident.

Bure's mansqueezing bunched some panties in the secular media. Here's a few headlines.

- Daily Mail (Erica Tempesta): 'He can touch me any time he wants!' Candace Cameron Bure hits back at 'all the Christians' who slammed her for posting a cheeky Instagram photo of her husband Val grabbing her boob (2020/9/10)

- People: Candace Cameron Bure Reflects on Backlash to Handsy Photo with Her Husband (2020/11/21)

The fact that blonde boobs get more ¡Attenshun! than hockey stars is very telling of Western culture's V worship.

It's hard not to notice that the worst vitriol emanated from the Christian community. Churchians have made themselves an easy target.

The second article from Daily Mail released a video of her reaction to the controversy. The stir was further amplified when Mrs. Bure said,

> "For all of the Christians that are questioning my post with my husband's hand on my boob — my husband of 24 years — thinking it was inappropriate, it makes me laugh because it's my husband," the Fuller House star, 44, said in a series of videos on her Instagram Stories. "We have so much fun together. He can touch me anytime he wants, and I hope he does. That is what a healthy, good marriage and relationship is all about."

Now there's a truly Gawdly woman! Every Man of God wants and wishes for a full rack of ribs that perks up and begs for his firm, eager grip.

So why all the Sensationalism?

There are many things that Femin@z!s abhor about the photo.

1. Green Line Test positive!
2. She is leaning against him which shows her trust in him.
3. His hand on her breast shows that the man has sexual authority over her body.
4. Bure's arm over his woman's shoulder shows ownership and masculine sexual dominance.
5. The insult added to feminist injury is that Mrs. Bure's scrunchy grin makes her appear happy and secure.

Seems like a healthy, normal marriage. What's wrong with that?

The thing that incites the ire of rabid ressentimentalists everywhere is that the normalization of contentment in marriage is anathema to the smugly Warlasses of Feminism. It inverts the Grand S@t@n!c order, thus inciting them to trod the warpath by throwing baseless accusations and engaging in shame tactics within Progressive Identity Politics.

To wit,

- Points 2-4 listed above are the antithesis of the Strong Independent Woman™ archetype.
- It incites deep, bitter envy in the microscopic, stone cold hearts of all the carousel riders, cat ladies, and cougars of the world who have been rejected by men on account of their sexual disobedience and social discretionlessness.
- The "immodest" public display of man-handling affection between a married couple reveals and condemns the morbid error of postpornicating, thereby inviting millions of twerky sliberated slores to a repentance they'll never succumb.
- Most invective of all, it is Biblical! Point number 3 agrees with 1st Corinthians 7:4, which says,

> "For the wife does not have authority over her own body, but the husband does. Likewise the husband does not have authority over his own body, but the wife does."

What Feministas are really angry about is how easy it is for just one submissive wife to make them all look like frigid prudes, which is seethingly ironic, seeing how they invested so many years spending themselves on the carousel in a concentrated effort to shed and cast away the untainted image of love-struck chaste monogamy that they presumably once had as boob budding adolescents.

It's not clear whether the outrage was directed towards Val or his wife, Candice. So we can only imagine the torrential thoughts of faux modesty and indignation that emerged from the shattered Feminista's egogos. "How could she allow her house pet husband to paw her paps in public?" "How could she tolerate such patriarchal oppression?" But we never hear any of that, because that would show their cold lonely hand minus a wedding band.

RP veterans know that the answer to these questions is because Mrs. Bure giggles, jiggles, and jumps joyfully for her kolbasa crush — just as the Lord Almighty intended married mares to be.

Churchianity is no different from Secular Culture

The truly sad part about this is that Bure's boob bustle brought so much backlash from Christianesians. The second article from Daily Mail and the second article from People listed above covered this commotion. Apparently, a wife who shows too much delight in submitting to her husband's dominance is profane in the church. Even non-Christians have remarked of the hypocrisy.

Yes, it is rare to see any love bird behaviors between Christian married couples, or even photos of it, as it is deemed "inappropriate" and "lustful". Any reminiscent PDA between married couples incites a riot in any modern church, converged or not, just as it does in the wider secular culture. This, even though the Bible says,

> [18] Let your fountain be blessed,
> And rejoice in the wife of your youth.
> [19] Like a loving doe and a graceful mountain goat,
> Let her breasts satisfy you at all times;
> Proverbs 5:18-19 (NASB)

AT ALL TIMES!!! Hallelujah! Married men, start grabbing those lactose jugs and communion wine during the Sunday morning worship service and REJOICE YE THEREFORE IN THE LORD!

Conclusions

Instead of men delighting in their wives by milking the mammary glands on impulse, what we usually see are henpecked hubbies biting their knuckles and biding their time until wifie is “in the mood”.

Instead of wives delighting in their husbands by cracking open the sticky honeypot for hubby’s daily consumption, what we commonly see is the expression of a woman’s liberated sexuality, not directed towards her husband, but open for all mens’ eyes to see.

However a woman wants to present herself, however immodest, is usually accepted as the “appropriate” norm, and this is just as true in the church as it is in the wider secular culture. Thus, a woman showing cleavage or wearing yoga pants to a church function is commonly looked over, and then overlooked.

But a modestly dressed Christian mother and wife of 24 years gleefully enjoying her husband’s affections is castigated as “immodest” by envious secular harpies and stuffy churchians.

The Bure’s must be doing something right!

By presenting themselves in natural / patriarchal / anti-feminist glorified form, Val Bure and his wife have turned giddy gynocentrism on its grumpy head.

Большое спасибо! Будем здоровы!

Val Bure and his wife Candace at their home in Napa Valley.

Furthermore, the modern churchian norms of what is appropriate are actually quite inappropriate and unBiblical for all of the above reasons. What we are accustomed to as inappropriate is actually blessed in the eyes of the Almighty and should NOT be considered inappropriate.

> Woe to those who call evil good, and good evil;
> Who substitute darkness for light and light for darkness;
> Who substitute bitter for sweet and sweet for bitter!
> Isaiah 5:20 (NASB)

So before we implement a standard of "appropriateness", we would do well to reconsider exactly what that means.

A Red Pill Review of Flaking and Ghosting

There is very little Red Pill content that discusses Flaking and Ghosting. Here's what I've been able to find.

1. The Modern Man: 7 Reasons Why Women Flake on Dates (2020/9/25)
2. Medium: Why Do Girls Ghost? 5 Typical Reasons Why Women Flake and Ghost On Men (2023/3/10)
3. Inside the University of Melbourne: The Flaking Epidemic (2023/8/31)
4. SoSuave: The Anti-Flake Methodology (2023/9/6)

It's rare to get an authentic female opinion on Flaking and Ghosting because there's no incentive for them to reveal their hand. Thus, most of what women say on this topic is Gaslighting and self-justification. However, I did find a couple posts for the reading entertainment of those who are interested in the Female view of this topic.

1. Rinse Before Use: Intensity isn't always a good thing (2019/6/7) [Archive]
2. Good Gentleman: Why do women ghost? Here's the real reason… (2020/10/22)

I wouldn't take these too seriously and I won't cover them in the remainder of this post.

Jack's Notes

The first post from The Modern Man is from Dan Bacon. This post has a corresponding YouTube video that matches the text.

Dan Bacon: 7 Reasons Why Women Flake on Dates (2018/9/12) Length: 16:15

According to Dan Bacon, here are the 7 reasons why a woman will flake and cancel a date:

1. She just wants casual sex, but she can see that the guy wants a serious relationship with her.
2. She is playing hard to get because she fears that he might be too good for her, i.e. auto-rejection.
3. The guy set up a date via text.
4. She wasn't really attracted to him and just gave out her phone number to end the interaction politely.
5. She is seeing someone else and doesn't have time to start dating a new guy.
6. The guy kept chasing her, even though she wasn't showing any interest in him.
7. She wants to see how you handle it.

The second article is rather milquietoast. It cites the following reasons.

1. She's busy or not in the mood.
2. She has feelings for someone else.
3. She likes being single or is afraid of commitment.
4. She is undecided or doesn't know what she's doing.
5. She's fishing for the man's reaction, AKA fitness testing or sh!t testing.

By selecting key passages to sum up ItUoM's post, we have the following explanations.

1. The trigger for her flaking originates in primal nooks of her brain that evolved to autonomically assist her in identifying and reeling in the highest quality man her looks can get her, while expeditiously and sometimes viciously discarding the lesser men.
2. A culture which exalts the tiniest farts that escape female buttocks and demonizes the most laudable aspects of manhood certainly contributes to a caustic social soup that encourages disrespect of men.
3. When a girl can't see facial reactions of the dudes she disses, unknowing disrespect is easier to accommodate.

4. Girls do not think about flaking much at all. They just follow their feeelz moment by moment.

Dan Bacon / TMM and ItUoM cover Flaking from the perspective of a PUA / HVM. As such, they assume that the woman has a genuine interest in the man, so the emphasis is on not messing it up. From ca. 2000-2018, this was the standard mindset and approach recommended for such men, but is now considered to be the HVM form of gynogroveling for P_ssy. ItUoM offers a tiny bit more grace to the average man.

These reasons may still apply for a very small number of men, however, the SMP has changed so much over the past 5 years that these situations seldom occur for most men nowadays. Thus, for the most part, this information is now outdated, even though two of these sources came out this year. They have omitted the real dynamics that are in play for most men these days.

The forum discussion at SoSuave offers a Game technique that is more useful to the average man.

The OP points out that calling beforehand to verify the meeting, for example, "Hey are we up for today?", is a weak beta move. It is better to be a jerk who keeps her waiting and does NOT verify prior to the date. Just give her the time and place at a reasonable advance notice. If she doesn't answer or reply within about 15 minutes, or if there is no positive response, e.g. "OK, see you then!", then you have flushed out a flake and saved yourself the trouble of being stood up.

The pros of this approach:

- This technique recognizes that in this day and age, anything from your side, be it a call or a joke or some random text BETWEEN DATES almost always leads to flaking.
- It creates intrigue, mystery, and (a hopefully pleasant) surprise — Most women enjoy this IF they're into the man — and this IF is a key determinant.
- It conveys confidence, dominance, and a detached mindset.
- It puts the man in the driver's seat as the decision maker.
- It gives the impression that the man has a busy schedule which makes a positive impression.
- The waiting puts pressure on the woman. If the woman is anxious and can't wait and she calls you to verify, then that's a very good sign of a high initial attraction level.

- It tends to select for women who are willing to wait (instead of giving up and/or moving on if you don't contact her in 2-3 days), and who will take up your invitation at a moment's notice and with a minimum of verbal negotiation. IOW, it screens out women who are NOT truly into you.

The downside of this approach:

- It has a large, unpredictable washout rate.
- It tends to select for women who are lower SMV quality.
- It does not account for variances among womens' sensitivities and cognitive time frames. Some women want a man to pour it on hot and heavy. Some women are sensitive to metaphysical nuances. Some women want things to 'click' and progress briskly. Some women expect the relationship to develop at a certain rate depending on her comfort and trust. If your behavior does not jive with her awareness, then she'll lose interest.
- It does not account for variances among womens' threshhold of investment for establishing interest. Some women's interest is heavily dependent on the man showing interest. So even if she is genuinely attracted / interested in you, if you don't contact her and communicate (i.e. give her attention) regularly, then she'll lose enthusiasm and become prone to autorejection. For example, she'll say, "We haven't spoken for 3 days, so I thought you weren't interested in me."
- Women who are more agentic, emotionally / socially mature, and responsible may not respond well.

Motivations for Flaking and Ghosting

Men are always thinking about running the bases and making a home run, so they seldom think about the sexual market dynamics from the woman's point of view.

In general, women who are seriously interested in a man are going to make him a priority and will not flake or ghost.

Some women have been taught to NEVER give any dude false hopes. But women like this will tell a guy up front she is not interested and therefore do not create a situation in which she might Flake or Ghost. He might call her a b!tch and talk sh!t about her, but that is much better than her leading on and wasting time with a crowd of orbiters or having some lunatic slow driving past her house every night.

But these are a minority of women. For the larger populace of women, in spite of all the SIW talk, women are always afraid of what might happen and they always have their guards up. When going on a first date with a man, they are always worried about the possibility that they will find themselves in an uncomfortable situation or that he might turn into a terrifying stalker, or whatever worse trope of toxic masculinity they can imagine. They have a lot of cognitive dissonance. They are afraid that if they are too nice to a man, then he will not appreciate her or treat her well. OTOH, they are also afraid that if they are too much of an aggressive SIW, then he won't tolerate that and will drop her. Some women have the idea that men will like them MORE if they behave in ways that they find attractive in men, e.g. being an unpredictable proud@ss b!tch, downplaying or hiding interest, playing hard to get, etc. In a word, projection.

The main motivation women have for flaking and ghosting these days is because they weren't that interested, or the connection wasn't strong enough, or they had something / someone better to do, or they didn't have any intentions of progressing to anything more serious. IOW, low interest, and they don't care enough to let the man know. In her eyes, the man is dispensable. She is just using him for attention, entertainment, a free meal, etc. If it's not easy, free, fun, and low investment for her, then she's out.

In the case of Flaking, the most common scenario is that he is her casual entertainment during the times when she has nothing better going on in her life. Whether she Flakes or not all boils down to what her needs are at the time you ask her out, what she's looking to be doing on the day you set, what her other offers / options are, and who's available.

What most men never realize is that merely talking and texting are enough to displace her boredom and loneliness, and inflate her ego and self-esteem to a more tolerable level for her. That is all women want out of the interaction — nothing more. If and when the man pushes for a physical meeting as men are prone to do, women are uninterested because this would require a frivolous investment of her time and energy, and besides, she already got everything she wanted from him — his attention and words of affirmation. She might agree to a meet up simply to maintain her good feelings about their interaction and/or to lead him on enough to keep him investing in her while hiding the fact that she has no serious intentions (which she knows would end the pseudo-relationship immediately), but other than this, there is NO motivation for her NOT to flake.

In the case of ghosting, the most common scenario is that the woman feels like she needs to have a face-to-face interaction with the man either to stroke her vain lust for affirmation / attention / an ego boost / relevancy / the male gaze, or to maintain the necessary pretenses that would keep the man in orbit.

Social relevancy is perhaps the most complex motivator that leads to ghosting. In this case, she sees an association with a man as a way to appear socially active, popular, or get her funyuns on. Once she has established herself as a socialite, or used his friend network to meet others (i.e. men), she'll distance herself from him, abruptly if it is possible without making waves. She'll never be kind enough to let him know she took up with the guy he thought was his best friend.

What most men don't know is that once she gets free food and exclusive attention for an hour or two, she's already got everything she wanted out of the transaction and feels no compunction about her (in)action. Meanwhile, the man has made an investment in her that never pays off, and he never gets what he wants — an authentic exclusive relationship that leads to sex / marriage / children / etc.

Conclusions

A lot of women think it is the acceptable norm to be dishonest to men by expressing interest, when the reality is that she's only concerned with keeping her own mood afloat. Too many women think it is acceptable to go on a lavish dinner date with a man, when in fact it's nothing more than a friend zone luncheon in which he pays for everything and she gets her bored and lonely itch scratched.

The main reason why the online amateur sex industry is attractive to men is because the chicks are ALWAYS on call, and they DON'T Flake or Ghost. This means more to men than the ugly fact that these relationships are fake and/or transactional.

As more men are realizing this, dating is becoming practically non-existent anymore. It's also why men are expecting sex after the first few dates, and why both men and women ghost out after the first few dates if nothing happens.

Ultimately, Flaking and Ghosting come with the territory and cannot be entirely avoided. So dealing with it becomes a Game of numbers, probability, and familiarity. Some experience is necessary to find out if a woman is really interested in you, or if she has any agency or class. Flaking and Ghosting is a natural part of that. If she Flakes, she is a lazy, low-class woman who doesn't really like you… GOOD! You found this out without spending any money. If she Ghosts, she is not dependable or trustworthy… GOOD! Better now than later.

Vetting Tips to Avoid and/or Detect Attention Seekers, Flakers, and Ghosters

1. Keep the length of phone calls under 10 minutes.
2. Keep the number of text messages to a minimum.
3. First dates should never be expensive. If you propose a casual or inexpensive meeting and she cops out, then you've saved yourself a headache.
4. Does she express any cognizance of your passions or your purpose? If she doesn't, she's not really into you.
5. The woman should feel comfortable enough to enjoy spending time and talking with the man on her own initiative. Beware of women who are not interested in sharing personal interests or anything of real substance.
6. Corollary to (5), women are talkers. The woman should be talking about herself with few reservations. Use the 80/20 rule for discussion. She does 80% of the talking, and you do 20%, mostly leading the topic and questioning her. Eventually, she'll tell on herself. If she doesn't say much about her own life and personal thoughts, then she's not being open and honest and she probably thinks of you as an orbiter. If she's a quiet personality, you may need to adjust the ratio to what works.
7. Watch her reaction carefully whenever you suggest going to a social activity together, a day trip, a meeting, or a date, etc. If she is hesitant, or makes excuses, or avoids the topic, then cross her off your list of potentials. If she doesn't suggest a raincheck on a specific time and day, then don't contact her anymore after this.
8. A woman should be able to handle a last minute change of plans. If she cannot, that's a bad sign. An alternative approach to test her reaction is to suggest a meeting and then cancel for some reason. If she seems glad, indifferent, or relieved, then your rendezvous may not mean that much to her. If she is disappointed, or she gets fussy, or she pushes you to follow through, then she may be truly interested.
9. Consider the relationship structure. If you feel like you are doing all the chasing, planning, and work, the chances are good that she thinks she is in the driver's seat. In this case, dial it down and see if she responds. If not, let her go. If you are the dominant person (according to a Headship structure), then maybe there's a chance. Better to do this earlier than later.

10. The worst thing any man at any age can do is to 'try' and win over a woman. IF, right from the start, she is not willing to commit her time and attention to get to know you better, then what you have is a woman, for whatever reason, who does not think you have what she wants. If she was truly attracted to you, she would make an effort to see if you two might be a fit.
11. Roll the dice. Make a play. If you get no response, or push back, or anything less than willing submission, then move on. There are too many women in the world to lock onto one.

Essentially, this boils down to having a detached mindset, setting boundaries on your time and emotional investment, and respecting yourself. In questionable circumstances, a good rule of thumb is "The One Chance Rule". Give her one good chance, and if she fails, or she doesn't follow through, then NEXT her. Only authentic women need apply.

Wisdom from Roosh

Roosh Valizadeh wrote an article on 33 Things Christian Men Should Know About Women (2022/10/17) detailing his wisdom on things that Christian men should look for and avoid in women they are interested in to date and marry.

Deep Strength reviewed Roosh's Article in two posts.

- Christianity and Masculinity: Roosh's wisdom for Christian men interested in women (2022/10/25)
- Christianity and Masculinity: Roosh's definition of game and social charisma going forward (2022/10/26)

In the latter post Deep Strength wrote,

> "For those of you who were not familiar with Roosh, the 3 Rs — Roissy, Rollo (Tomassi of Rational Male) and Roosh V — were the pillars of the secular manosphere from probably around 2007 to 2019ish or so. Since then the manosphere fractured. Roosh converted to Christianity in 2019. Roissy got booted from WordPress, the RP reddit got quarantined, and Rollo barely blogs anymore preferring to engage on Youtube it seems."

Do check out DS's commentary, but also please take the time to read Roosh's entire lengthy article. It's always best to get a man's opinion directly from the source, and there's a lot to learn from Roosh's past foolishness and hedonism.

Why Vetting Fails

It occurred to me reading Roosh's list that in some of his points he inadvertently (?) explained why vetting fails so often.

First, let's get #22 out of the way.

> 22. No matter how thoroughly you vet her, you will be upset at her behaviors during marriage.

No matter how well-vetted a woman is, she's a fatally flawed sinner, just like you are. You both need to extend each other some grace. That's not a vetting failure, it's the best case scenario for two redeemed sinners living through the process of sanctification together.

Now, consider Joe. He's your typical, average, decent Christian young man. He meets young, bubbly, pretty Jolene at college in a city where neither of them grew up, and where neither of their families live. Opportunities abound and the hormones of youth are flowing freely. What could possibly go wrong?

> 2. Women are capable of deceiving men.

Keep #2 in mind, because it's going to come up over, and over again. No one — male or female — can behave inconsistently with their character long term, but Jolene can probably keep up the charade for a few months — long enough to get him hooked on her positive qualities deeply enough that he overlooks her red flags, especially if they're having sex, because…

> 5. You will not choose a woman with wisdom if your passions are elevated.

If Joe starts having sex with Jolene, he's almost guaranteed to make foolish decisions. After all, he's already making the foolish decision to have sex with her. Besides, what hormonal young man's passions are not elevated?

Why Game Fails

Here, we're referring to the old school PUA style Game that Roosh was known for, NOT Jack and Ed's concept of charismatic / Christian Game.

> 6. Beware if "game" works on her.

For a Christian, a good deal of wisdom is necessary to recognize when he is arousing a woman, and how to handle things to keep things pleasant without going too far or intimating the possibility of fornicating. Most Christian men don't understand this distinction because (1) they lack sufficient discernment, and (2) they're not familiar enough with the way female sexuality works. So how would Joe know without trying it — in other words — before it's too late? If Joe can't use Game to test Jolene's response, he would have to observe her reactions to other men using Game on her.

> 7. A woman who simultaneously communicates with numerous men likely has an addiction to male attention.

Continuing the idea of Game in #6, if a woman has a sizeable harem of beta orbiters or keeps a long list of men's numbers on her phone, then not only does she have an unhealthy dependency on male attention, the chances are also good that she's into being Gamed (and banged).

> 13. A woman who is overly comfortable around strange men may have had a lot of experience with men.

Remember, Joe and Jolene met at college. They're strangers. How are they supposed to get to know each other if Jolene is uncomfortable with strange men? In this case, a woman's social awkwardness (NOT social anxiety) may be a good sign, similar to Jack's description of a PITA girl.

> 14. She may hide her most negative qualities, behaviors, and admissions until you have invested in her.

See #2 above. This is exactly why it's necessary to know a girl for a while, to see how she interacts with friends and family members, especially her dad. Until her character can be confirmed, it is best to keep investment and commitment to a minimum.

Speaking of her dad…

Generational Influences

> 16. Unless you have evidence to the contrary, she will become her mother and treat you like her mother treats her father.

Red Pill Apostle noted that a young woman's submission to her father (or lack thereof) can presage her submission to her husband, and this is true, but her mother's behavior may be even more important. Without a lot of serious introspection (a very rare behavior, especially among the young, and even more so among young women), most people unconsciously fall into the ruts their parents dug for them.

Jolene is unlikely to invite Joe to her parents' house until he's already invested in her, and if Jolene is "practiced at the art of deception", her mother is probably 10 times more so.

> 17. Take signs of heightened passion, mental instability, mental illness, self-harm, and a violent or abusive upbringing very seriously.

Here, things get dark and complicated. People who grow up in abusive households learn all kinds of dysfunctional habits and behaviors that help them cope with the abuse, but end up being self-destructive in the long run.

Also, older never married women are more likely to fit this description, simply because they're leftovers. Emotionally and psychologically healthy women get taken off the market sooner. Another reason why men prefer younger chicks.

If Jolene grew up in such a family, she's even more likely to be a skilled deceiver, since she's had to keep all kinds of dark family secrets her whole life. She's also more likely to honey-trap Joe with sex. There's a reason men say that "crazy py is the best py".

Some self-destructive behaviors are obvious — like obesity, smoking, and tattoos — but others can remain hidden until foolish young Joe is thoroughly invested in Jolene. If they get married, Jolene is likely to blame all her issues (caused by her abusive family) on Joe, with her abusive family's full encouragement. It's not as though they will ever take responsibility for the self-destructive behaviors they instilled in her.

Worse still, if Joe and Jolene have kids, she's likely to continue the cycle of abuse and pass on her generational curses to his kids.

Many Christians will criticize Joe if he declines to date, or marry Jolene because of her abusive family. After all, it's not Jolene's fault that her parents are evil. But, it's not Joe's fault, either. In choosing a wife, Joe is choosing a mother for his future children. He has a responsibility to them, and before God, to choose wisely.

If Jolene was abused, she's likely to make Joe's kids' childhoods hellish, and if she divorces Joe (also likely), he won't even be there to protect them. Furthermore, Jolene will likely expose Joe's kids to her abusive family, making it even more likely that they'll be abused.

If Jolene can articulate how she was abused, how that affected her, what self-destructive behaviors her family instilled in her, and how — with intensive help from a skilled counselor — she overcame that behavior, and if she cut off all contact with her abusive family, she may be a great choice for a wife. But if she can't do all of that, then Joe would be wise to hit the eject button.

But, again, how is foolish young Joe supposed to discern all of that before it's too late? He's not a mind reader, and Jolene will probably hide her abuse until he's so thoroughly d!ck-napped and py whipped that he can't see straight.

The Confusion of Intersexual Dynamics

> 21. She will lose respect and attraction for you if you become emasculated and allow her to take control.

Or, if she gets hot for jerkboy game (see #6), or has a history of dating bad men, this means she finds bad men exciting, which means she finds good men — like Joe — boring. That doesn't mean she won't date, or even marry Joe. She knows he's a good catch. It does mean that eventually she'll get tired of Joe, and go for another spin around the carousel. And if she comes from a sexually repressed family / church culture, then she'll sprout wings and fly.

But, how's Joe supposed to know about her history if she doesn't tell him?

> 26. If she's had sexual experiences in the past, look for undeniable repentance.

How? If Jolene's a skilled deceiver, she can fake repentance long enough to hook foolish young Joe.

> 29. Don't confuse her physical and emotional attraction towards you for deep compatibility.

Once foolish young Joe is hooked, it'll be difficult for him to tear himself away.

Sounds bleak, doesn't it? What hope is there for foolish young Joe?

> 33. Trust in God to find a wife, not in your own abilities.

What Roosh doesn't say is that God almost always chooses to work through people. God may choose to miraculously drop the perfect wife in Joe's lap, but it's a lot more likely that God will choose to use trusted friends and family to steer foolish young Joe away from Jolene, and introduce him to Joanne.

But that requires a community.

The Value of a Community in Finding a Spouse

Remember what I wrote above about giving it time. No one can behave inconsistently with their character long term. In a community, people's true character eventually surfaces. They develop a reputation, and that reputation tends to be pretty accurate.

If foolish young Joe is part of a Christian community, Jake — a trusted, older, wiser relative, and/or brother in Christ — can advise him in the following way.

"That Jolene is awfully pretty, and she seems nice, but her mom is a domineering shrew, and there are some dark rumors about how she treats Jolene. Plus, she has a past with immoral men, and although she says she's repentant, she's been hanging around Chad and Tyrone a lot. She has a lot of growing and healing to do, and you're not the guy to help her with that."

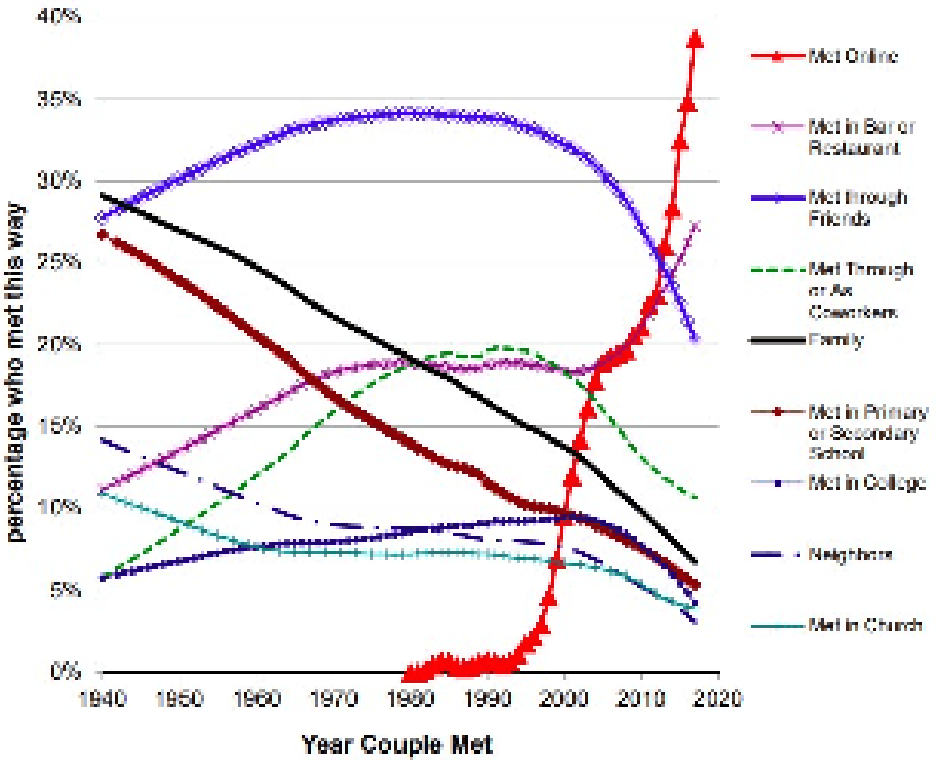
Jake's wife, Jan can then tell Jake that she knows this girl, Joanne, who'd be great for foolish young Joe.

None of this is possible without community, and we all know how tough it is to find a Christian community these days. Furthermore, I've noticed that men who have a difficult time attracting women don't just have a difficult time only with women. They also tend to have a difficult time making friends, period.

For those of us who have kids, our best bet is probably to find such a community as early as possible.

Conclusions

I've written many things that young men should be aware of, but none of this is a guarantee. King Solomon wrote a lot about contentious, foolish wives who tear their households down with their own hands, and are rottenness in their husbands' bones nearly 3,000 years ago — but finding a spouse through a community is a far safer bet than what most people are doing these days.



Try applying Roosh's hard-won wisdom to some random chick you met at a bar, or on Tinder. Good luck with that.

Finally, none of this is meant to criticize the foolish young Joes of this world. All of us who are older, and hopefully wiser, were once foolish young Joes, and many of us have the scars to prove it. We're not meant to do this the way most of us did — alone, with little to no guidance, or even worse, with pretty lies in our heads.

May God protect the foolish young Joes, and grant us older men the grace to be of some help to them.

How are Christian Young People Supposed to Meet?

Oscar's post, You Can't Vet This (2023/9/21) suggested that young singles need a community, not only for meeting and pairing up with someone, but also for vetting potential matches. Church fellowship and friend networks are not insignificant and not necessarily a dead end either, however, the quality of people, the types of friends, and the brand of the church fellowship could either make or break Oscar's suggested approach.

In the comments, Dead Bedroom Dating, Oscar, and Riuoku discussed how young people are supposed to meet and vet in the absence of a tight community.

Closed Network parenting has a bad reputation.

DBD wrote (emphasis mine),

> "My advice to foolish young Joe is to not bother with what church culture tells him and instead strike his own path. […] My advice is not stemming from church culture. It comes from male-only groups practicing praxeology (RP). Wherever these exist, they get disrupted and canceled for a reason.
> Most power structures are based on loyalty and exclusivity. They no longer work if you attend several of them, granting you with multiple perspectives on a topic while dis-empowering their fundamentalist leaders, who control their flock mostly with exclusive in-group (BP) beliefs."

Here, DBD is referring to the church as a power structure that prevents authentic Christian community and spirit.

Right on cue, Aaron Renn's latest piece is about this topic. He compares what he calls Open Networks and Closed Networks. Open Networks are based on competence and shared purpose. Closed Networks are based on loyalty and exclusivity. To get into an Open Network, the question is "What can you contribute?" To get into a Closed Network, the question is "Who is recommending you?" (I describe these networks further in a comment below.)

The Church is a Closed Network

Among other examples, Renn describes the church as a Closed Network. On this he writes,

> "My impression is that much of the evangelical world functions as a set of closed networks. [New Calvinism] was built out of a collection of big name pastors, who are the equivalent of the partners in a professional services firm. One of its key functions … is gatekeeping, a signal that we are talking about a closed network. Basically you need a high level patron within this network to gain access and to rise within it. These relationships seem to operate in a patron-client mode, where the clients are expected to be loyalists. Most of the value of the New Calvinist movement accrued to the people at the top. And we see that the movement is in decline because of its inability to absorb new talent, ideas, etc. It was not open to serendipity and randomness."
> "The fact that evangelicalism is a set of closed networks is a major problem for its ability to adapt to what I've called the negative world, which is today's cultural environment.
> It also poses challenges for any newcomers who don't have patrons in this system."
> Aaron Renn: Are You In an Open Network or a Closed Network? (2023/9/22)

Renn does well to point out that the church is a Closed Network — to its own demise. However, he fails to go so far as to say that the church should be an Open Network ("What can you do for the church / God?"), and marriage and family should be a Closed Network ("What is your relation to me?"). But instead what we have is a Closed Network church ("Who do you associate with in our church?") and an Open Network family structure ("What can you do for my daughter?").

Vetting

The Open / Closed Network concept also ties into the topic of vetting. Oscar's idea of a community being necessary for young single adults to meet and pair up means that young people need a "sponsor", in Renn's language. Ideally, ones' family (traditionally the father) should act as a sponsor and the church should be an open social network for singles and sponsors to meet and interact.

I remember a time when some churches did things like this. They would organize barn dances (pictured above), barbecues, bonfires, camping trips, cookouts, hayrides, picnics, and sports activities where young people could mix and mingle in the presence of family and other church members who acted as chaperones, mentors, and "sponsors". These churches would do things like this every week or every month, depending on the activity, the level of interest, and the weather.

These days, churches don't do things like this. Even those that might try it cannot overcome the fact that the young men are too Beta / Blue Pilled and the young women too gynocentric / liberalated for any real chemistry to occur. And the partisan polarization is growing. Thus, any interest in this sort of thing dwindles to a singularity.

Hyperattribution of Women's Agentic Capacity

Men's Altruistic Idealism in an Age of Apostasy (2023/7/28) turned out as the most popular post this summer. Much of the discussion in the comments was about whether altruism is a natural trait of men, and how men have been taught and conditioned by Western social traditions to chivalrously expect women to be ideal. There wasn't much consensus, but there was plenty of evidence on all sides.

One outstanding earmark of men's expectations of women is how men are in the habit of preemptively assigning a level of agentic capacity to a woman that just isn't there. Men are willing to ascribe more virtue — chastity, good will, intelligence, moral agency, and so on — to a woman of average or better attractiveness than what she actually possesses — a Feminine Halo Effect, if you will. When men believe they're dealing with a Lady™, then it does seem appropriate to adopt Chivalrous and Nice Guy™ behaviors, even though we are well aware that doing so is an evolutionary mistake. Even though men may cognitively recognize at some level that this impression is not true, this notion still remains deeply embedded in men's subconscious. I don't think we are fully aware of how much Men have bought into this.

It is absurd to think that this expectation is inborn. It is easier to believe that decades of Fempowerment narratives and Strong Independent Woman™ posturing have led us to accept that women really do have the moral initiative and strength of will that men do, or at least more than they actually exhibit. Having a proud strong mother will do that too.

This isn't just a faux pas lapse of reason common to the Blue Pilled mentality of the wider culture, it's also a central assumption of the Christian Church ("Women are God's precious angels"), as well as Men's online channels and communities that carry the ongoing legacy of ye olde Manosphere.

Daddy's little angel!

Case Study 1 — Churchianity

In recent years, starring examples of hyperattribution of female agency can be found in Complementarianism and Egalitarianism, which both carry a double standard when it comes to female agency.

Complementarianism and Egalitarianism carry the presumption that women possess a certain level of agency that is at least commensurate with that of men's, in order to give credence to their status as "equals". But it also assumes that women do NOT possess enough agency in order to justify chivalry (male feminism) and the "servant leadership" argument. The former is a veiled grasp for female authority and the latter is presented as a demand for men to bear the brunt of responsibility in the relationship. In practice, when men forfeit their authority and assume women to be their better equals, the result is that men end up walking on eggshells in the home and are put under social pressure to pedestalize women in public.

But the double minded math doesn't add up. Although it might be admitted that women are less agentic than men, the truth of this is quickly shot down as "toxic hyper Patriarchy". This is a convenient way to avoid addressing the core issue of who wears the pants in the house. It is taboo to question the authority structure in a gynocracy.

Moreover, this all carries the underlying assumption that men should regard women as more agentic than they really are, while the reality is that they have less than they should.

Complementarianism and Egalitarianism are similar to Feminism in this regard, as they both seek to elevate the status of women — not by encouraging them to develop more agency, but by conditioning them to have less. The logic goes that if men believe that women lack agency and are therefore not able (nor willing) to take responsibility for their own decisions then this can be used as a justification for why men should be hyperagentic water boys taking orders from their enlightened but helpless female superiors, according to a Gentile authority structure. This is heathen, not Christian. The Christian structure is for women to submit to their male heads and develop moral agency under their loving guidance.

The most embarrassing problem with this double-minded approach, as regular readers already know, is that it transforms the church into a Beta Factory and church going gals are opting out for more masculine men outside the church.

Case Study 2 — Dalrock

This may be surprising to some readers, but Dalrock is another example of the hyperattribution of female agency. Dalrock always assumed females are fully agentic, often with comedic effect, and by reviewing instances in which they were not, he laid bare the inconsistencies within Complementarianism and built a convincing argument that men place too much hope and trust in both the church and women. His underlying assumption of female agency, also known as "The Dalrock Route", was the main source of contention with his gynocentric detractors who insisted that Chivalry etc. continued to be appropriate because women are less agentic and therefore need to be White Knighted, even though these same hypocrites subscribed to Complementarianism and Egalitarianism which presumably assign a higher level of agency to women, as described in Case Study 1 above.

Case Study 3 — Roosh Valizadeh

Roosh wrote a noteworthy post last year entitled, 33 Things Christian Men Should Know About Women (2022/10/17), listing red flags for men to watch out for. (DeepStrength wrote a couple posts about this article, and Oscar covered it in his post, You Can't Vet This.) Although Roosh's post is a classic worthy of bookmarking, the weakness of Roosh's argument is that it paints an abstract ideal. In reality, Roosh's list could be used to disqualify every single woman on earth. Roosh is entirely correct in saying that a unicorn should NOT have any of those 33 traits, but from the readers' perspective, there is a tendency to read this with the assumption that women in general should NOT have those traits, and that a man might actually find a unicorn if he is aware of these things and vets diligently enough. The more practical value of Roosh's list is that it provides an inventory of concrete traits that men can be wary of in female acquaintances and coworkers, and a checklist for holding women in their domain accountable.

Case Study 4 — Rollo Tomassi

One contrapositive example in this sea of gynoreverence is Rollo Tomassi.* In an earlier assessment of his stances regarding the assignation of female agency I wrote,

> "All in all, Rollo is comprehensively saying that women essentially do NOT have moral agency, but… it's complicated… which is a roundabout way of extenuating that men are the responsible agents, not women, and that men must master women's hypergamous, sh!t testing, solipsistic imperatives…"

Rollo rightfully concluded that men will only make progress in establishing moral agency in women if men will assume some responsibility for women's behaviors. However, it needs to be emphasized that the way men should take responsibility for women's behaviors is NOT by defending them, nor White Knighting™, nor by becoming more hyperagentic, but rather by shepherding them — allowing them to fail, holding them accountable, letting them learn from their mistakes, and guiding and helping them along the way. Some Nuevo-Manospherians, like Fresh & Fit, have identified the action on the part of the male that makes the most difference in females — men holding women accountable — and are making diligent efforts to do so with the women within their sphere of influence.

 BTW, much of Rollo's advice is misleading or is a bad example for Christian Men. The Godfather undermines Fatherhood. (2023/7/10) looked at how Rollo endorses getting a vasectomy as a way for a man to safeguard himself against women's worst nature.*

Conclusions

Similar to Dalrock's Complementarian critics, there continues to be an underlying assumption that women should be doing better in being more loving and caring, that women should be more agentic — more like Men. The overall theme in ~95+% of the current Red Pill media content is men lamenting over the brokenness of women and the sore lack of credible sexual and marital opportunities. This is most commonly demonstrated as a sublimation of grief into cynical amusement. It is routinely assumed that men are justified in thinking that women should NOT have the typical weaknesses inherent in femininity that are covered in Red Pill lore, and that women should care more about Men. This sentiment is never made explicit, but it always remains simmering in the background.

The problem with this approach is that these assumptions and expectations inevitably result in the frustration Men feel towards women, and this undergirds a prevailing attitude of Men feeling hopeless and sorry for themselves.

It is NOT women who are dropping the ball here (although they are, ironically, so they do not get a "Get Out of Jail" card). The culprit is Men attributing a level of moral agency to women that they do not actually have. This frustrated idealism is a primary source of Men's Self-Pity which is an expression of unrighteous pride.

Those few voices that are recognizing that women lack agency are either succumbing to hopelessness and self-pity (MGTOW, The Black Pill, etc.) or viewing it as opportunism (Hook Up culture, PUAs, Rollo Tomassi, et al.). There are NO voices (other than a close association of bloggers who regularly interact with Σ Frame, i.e. Catacomb Resident, DeepStrength, and Ed Hurst) saying that, "Women lack agency, so men need to impose loving Headship Authority."

Yes, it is easier to love women if we ignore their errors and deny their weaknesses, but the easy feeelz good love is not real love — it's pedestalization.

The proper way for men to assume responsibility for women is in holding them accountable. Therefore, the way out of this mess is for Men to recognize women as being the weaker vessel, come to terms with their deeper assumptions and expectations of women, get their inner game together, and assume the mantle of a Head (1 Corinthians 11:3,7-9; 1 Peter 3:1-7).

The next step is in sizing up individual women as being either under our Headship authority, or outside of it — taking responsibility for those who are by shepherding them and holding them accountable, and NOT taking responsibility for those who are NOT.

This month's theme of IOIs and Vetting is intended to contribute to our knowledge of this.

Some women just can't live without a man

LocustsPlease described his disappointment upon meeting…

> "Girls seeming single, then I find out she's … dating someone but comes to church alone."

Well, at least she's coming to church. If you know she's emotionally attached, then it's an easy decision in terms of vetting.

But let's consider the possibilities for a moment.

Perhaps you've heard it said, "some women just can't live without a man." To put it another way, these women can't live a normal life without the spiritual covering of Headship / Tingly Respect. To put it less politely and more explicitly, there is a small subset of women (I'll guess around 10-15% of the population) who can't maintain a semblance of emotional security and psychological integrity unless they're physically worshipping an erect d!ck every day.

Because of this constant, dire, psychological dependency, these kinds of women bifurcate into one of two types. Either they go off the deep end and dedicate themselves to being full time slores, or else, if they happen to be raised well, or are in the possession of a Christian conscience, they tend to be rather demure, humble, and emotionally mature. In my opinion, a man is rather lucky to have one of the latter types of women.

The common problem that these kinds of women have is that they are prone to make rash decisions in their choice of a partner, just to have this need met. Because of the poor compatibility that often results from a hasty choice of a partner, they tend to live rather independently from their lover when they're away from the bedroom and they feel lonely inside. They are the subset of women whom you would think would be most likely to monkey branch if they could, but because they need a banana split every day, they're hesitant to take that chance, because doing so would disrupt the steady rhythm of beating the bush. They're deeply afraid to compromise the continuity and they risk losing their constant supply, and so that's something they won't do, even if it's only for a short time.

A woman who is taken, but comes to church alone sounds like she might be this kind of woman. She might be hoping to find a Christian man to wife her up, but hasn't found one among the churchian beta boys who is willing to go out on his log and meet her "needs".

For those men who might be interested in marrying such a woman despite her history, a great deal of discernment is necessary to identify if she is truly this way or is merely a compromising pseudo-believer who plays around with Ch@d while thinking men at church are beneath her. One clue is that she'll put up a lot of initial resistance — NOT because a man isn't hawt enough, but because of her vulnerability. Following that, if you show yourself to be patient, emotionally steady, good natured, and generally likeable, and you communicate to her in a mature, polite, kindhearted way that you understand her "need" (i.e. without looking like a desperate pervert trying to take advantage of her weakness), and can gain her trust, then she just might go for it. You can expect the transition to be very spontaneous, abrupt, and complete, and for the last man to object strongly, mainly because she's submissive and hot in bed. You can also expect to devote a lot of time each day towards satisfying her "needs", so you'll need a lot of patience and bedroom stamina.

Best case scenario: Instant hot regular sex! Put a ring on it quickly and you'll have a very devoted SAHW.

Worst case scenario: Nuclear Rejection and possibly social shame; retribution from her current partner.

I'll venture to argue that this would not be the same as taking sloppy seconds or wifing up a single mother, simply because of the humility of such a woman and the nature of her personality instantly puts the man in a horizontal position of Headship. Likewise, the risks would not be the same.

Men Lead, Women Choose

Under Ideal Women Don't Exist (2023/9/23), Bardelys the Magnificent concluded,

> "…our model is Christ: "Follow Me." That's the biggest, most important, and really the only agentic decision she has to make. If she cannot do that, nothing you do or say is going to work. Women have decided en masse that they will not follow anyone but their own egos and feelings. So just like Christ cannot let us into Heaven if we do not willingly follow Him, we cannot help a woman who will not follow us. They literally only have one job, and they are refusing to do it. […] You can lead her to water, but you can't make her drink."

Exactly. You can't negotiate attraction, and you can't force compliance. So now we must look at the basic reality of whether a particular man has authentic spiritual authority over a woman in question.

Lettuce now consult the Σ Frame annals of Axioms.

Σ Frame Axiom 2 (Jack): The most genuine authority in an intersexual relationship is sexual.

Σ Frame Axiom 3 (Jack): True power in an intersexual relationship is dynamic and visceral.

Σ Frame Axiom 7 (Jack): The natural interaction defines the relationship structure according to which model it fits best, not what we think it is or hope for it to be.

Corollary to Axiom 7 (Rollo): Rollo's axiom, "The medium is the message" is a practical praxeology that correlates with Σ Frame Axiom 7, e.g. if a woman ghosts on you at various times — that is the message. If the conversation falls off before the first date happened — that's the message.

Σ Frame Axiom 8 (Scott): Don't complicate that which is inherently simple.
Don't simplify that which is inherently complicated. Know the difference.

Σ Frame Axiom 9, AKA Scott's Axiom: It is more or less impossible to generate true, heart pounding visceral attraction from a woman who was lukewarm about you in the first place.
Corollary to Axiom 9: If you marry a woman who was not out of her mind with desire for you (e.g. breaking the rules for you that she sets for other men) be prepared to deal with the consequences of that at any point later in the marriage.

This selection of Axioms gives us a snapshot of what Headship looks like. If a man possesses authentic authority over a woman (in the form of a Covenant, or Headship, or Tingly Respect), then there may be enough traction for the man to lead and the woman to follow, according to the Christ : Church :: Husband : Wife analogy. If not, then there is literally nothing between them that would glorify God.

I think the most common problem these days is that women do not recognize male authority, nor do they want to. It is NOT a failure on the man's part if he does not have any genuine authority over a woman. It's up to the woman to recognize a man's authority, follow, and submit. If she does not, then she's on her own. If a man doesn't have any women who recognize his authority, then he's on his own too.

NovaSeeker's Breakdown of Options

A while back, there was sort of an argument between Scott, Lastmod, and Liz on this topic.

In describing how to read IOIs from a woman, Scott said,

> "Never pursue! If there are not STRONG IOIs / meet cute scenarios from the first few seconds, move out! Otherwise, you are starting from the disadvantaged position, and it will end badly."

Liz objected,

> "Mike would disagree about the strong indications immediately. If you are the type of person who gets a lot of "meet cutes" and always have, perhaps your skillset is different? You haven't had to work on other tactics."

To which NovaSeeker responded,

> "Yes.
> It's important to remember that Scott is speaking from his own experience, which is doubtless genuine. In his own experience, because he is generally attractive to women that he finds attractive, it makes sense to sit back and let the women come to you — that way you can be sure they are interested in you and it saves you frustration of chasing a woman who likes to be chased, but doesn't like you that much."

> "If you're someone like Scott, and there is literally another attractive woman around the corner, this approach is undoubtedly the best one, because it identifies the women who are interested in you effectively and avoids you spinning your wheels with women who aren't … and droughts are a non-issue because there are always women you find attractive around you who are interested in you to such an extent that they will make it fairly obvious (meet cutes, obvious IOIs, etc.).
> Where this approach "breaks down" is if you are one of the much larger number of men who do not always, or even often, have a good number of women to whom they are attracted around them making obvious IOIs and bumping into meet cutes. This would include guys like me, Deti, Jack — probably most of the readers here who have been married. Most of us are not like Jason, most of us are somewhere between the relatively few guys like Scott and the relatively few guys like Jason. And Scott's approach is more or less useless for men like us unless we are capable of getting to the point of generating the same amount of IOIs / meet cutes from women to whom we are attracted as Scott is. What happens when guys like us take Scott's approach without first changing to become more like Scott is long droughts during which social skills with women atrophy, and bitterness / jadedness develops.

> This is why for men like me the options are (1) what I just said (get more attractive so as to be more like Scott in terms of generating more IOIs from attractive women), (2) changing locations and trying again, (3) changing the kinds of women you find attractive, (4) sitting out, or (5) another strategy."

> "Scott argues, based on his own legitimate experience, that (1) is not realistic for the majority of men. Men like Scott are born not made, or if they are made they are made so young that once you get past mid-teen years, if you aren't already Scott, you'll never be sufficiently like him to pull off strategy (1). I am not sure what he would say about strategy (2), but strategy (2) has problems, anyway, based on how flexible you are to move, and what your realistic options are there based on what you do for a living, so it's always a less optimal option. Strategy (3) is, in my opinion, extremely hard to do — in my experience, men are not generally able to reason or train themselves to be attracted to women that they are not viscerally attracted to — I don't see it. But because some men seem to be able to do this, or have a broader range of what they find attractive viscerally, I include it as an option. Strategy (4) is the volcel approach, and that's fine, but very few men are set up for it, in terms of really deeply accepting this and wanting it for themselves. If it's not volcel but incel it becomes a source of endless bitterness. Which leaves us with Strategy (5), which is the "other approaches" — they would include Game (both classic / Mystery and later versions), which was largely sidelined by phone dating apps, and now the lore and advice that circulates around dating apps and all of that stuff.
> Men who are not Scott are left with these options. Again, Scott's view, which he has expressed many times, is that if you are not him (by which I mean basically like him and have been that way since around 15), you won't ever be like him, so Strategy 1 is out. Strategy 5 is also out, because, again as Scott has said many times, if you're not a man like him, you're not going to succeed with Strategy 5 either. I don't know what he thinks about Strategy (2) — perhaps you can find a locality where you are more apt to succeed with Strategy 1, but perhaps that isn't very locality-based after all, and there is a universal aspect to being able to execute Strategy 1 that you either have or don't regardless of the context and location. Strategy (3) I think doesn't work, but I don't know what Scott thinks about it — perhaps he thinks it works, I don't know — in my experience that's not how male attraction works."

> "So if you are not a guy who is like Scott is by the time you're in your mid-teens, what are you left with in terms of a life strategy in this area? Scott's response has generally been "I don't know what to say", and "I don't have any answers". That's fine, and it's somewhat understandable because it represents an area of life in which Scott has no experience — namely, how to succeed with women to whom you are attracted if you are not, in a general sense, in the small number of guys who generate a lot of interest from attractive women. But for those of us who are neither Scott nor Jason — which is, in fact most men — there are, and there always have been, strategies that work better for men like us than the strategy that works best for a man like Scott. And generally those strategies don't involve chasing woman after woman after woman, but they also don't involve simply waiting for an IOI from an attractive woman that will never come if you don't do something to generate the IOI. And therein lies the key difference: there are some men who passively generate IOIs just based on who they are (Scott), then there are men who generate IOIs based on something they do (most men who are successful at attracting a woman they actually find attractive), and then there are men who can't generate any IOIs (or who generate them, but not from women to whom they are attracted). Scott is the first kind, so he has a strategy that works for him and men like him, I am in the second group, so there is a different ideal strategy for men like me. Jason is in the third group."

As NovaSeeker so eloquently described, The Applied ¡ScIeNcE! of IOIs cannot be independently confirmed. God grants each man a different portion. It is what it is. To each man his own.

Rizz

The new form of Game.

Readership: Men
Theme: IOIs and Vetting
Length: 300 words

In A Revised Understanding of Game (2020/9/14), I pointed out that the essence of Game lies in a man's Charisma, his discernment, and his skill in drawing boundaries.

Recently, I noticed that the current mating market among the younger crowd coming of age (Gen Z) places a significant emphasis on Charisma, which is now referred to in common parlance as "Rizz" (a shortened form of the vernacular "ChaRIZZma").

Charisma is not something that can be developed through one's own efforts or willpower. However, young people are recognizing that Charisma is an important part of attraction and they are discovering that one can showcase whatever Charisma one might have by emphasizing affect display, authenticity, mood, having an upbeat positive attitude, and through various non-verbal forms of communication, such as displaying IOIs and what is being called "unspoken Rizz".

If someone has "Rizz," they are considered attractive or alluring because of their charm or their charismatic way of communicating. Apparently, a person can still have "Rizz" even if he/she is not considered objectively attractive, just as I described in Sex Appeal is not strongly correlated with Beauty (2021/4/30).

"Rizz" has been added to the dictionary, defined as…

> "Rizz is a slang term for skill in charming or seducing a potential romantic partner, especially through verbal communication. It is most commonly applied in the context of men pursuing women, but not always. It is typically used in the exact same way as the older slang term game."

Yes, showcasing one's Charisma is now the current manifestation of Game, which IMO, is more authentic, honest, humble, and straightfoward compared to how Game was typically practiced by Xers and Millennials over the past decade.

A general search for "Rizz" on YouTube turns up a large number of shorts showcasing how to flirt and display IOIs. However, it should be noted that "Rizz" also includes the overall impression that is made.

The Attraction of Glorification

The perception of glory is a strong Pull Factor — for good or ill.

The Red Pill lore has given us an obscenely vivid understanding of the biological, carnal, and evo-psyche aspects of attraction, but we do not yet have a conceptual framework for the moral, metaphysical, and spiritual components of how attraction works. As it currently stands, the Red Pill lore about attraction hasn't really established a compelling argument that attraction is anything other than the flesh. This post continues to investigate whether there is more to it than this.

This framework is crucially important in helping Christian men identify which women are likely to provide a Spirit-filled relationship "in the Lord" (c.f 1st Corinthians 7:39) as opposed to one centered around the fleshly appetites which are bound to fail.

In a previous post, Glory (2023/3/1), I described some of the basics of this phenomenon. Here, I'll dive into those aspects of glory that are attractive and deceptive.

The Attractiveness of Glory

PSALM traits, charisma, confidence, and "masculine essence" are attractive because these traits glorify masculinity. Thus, Men who possess these traits are attractive.

Similarly, Women who are beautiful, discreet, feminine, and genuinely simple minded and trusting are glorified. (By simple minded, I don't mean dumb. I mean she doesn't have a supercharged hamster spinning into overdrive, and she doesn't entertain evil thoughts, plots, and complex schemes about how to control and manipulate others for her own purposes.) Thus, women who possess these traits are attractive.

Exercising Moral Agency often provides a venue in which individuals, both male and female, are glorified.

Deep Strength's Argument

In response to my post on this topic, Only Hunky Monks can find a Sanctified Marriage (2022/8/26), DS said I had mischaracterized his arguments. While I was reading some of his older posts and reflecting on the causes of the disjoint between DS and I, I had the idea that maybe DS is describing glorification as attractive. I don't think he has ever labeled it as such, but this interpretation would explain why he thinks enhancing one's attraction by developing PSALM traits is not fleshly in nature.

Update: Deep Strength has responded with a post.

- Christianity and Masculinity: Attraction and glorification (2023/10/1)

The De-Glorification of Masculinity and Femininity

As I mentioned above, and also in Glory (2023/3/1), being dimorphically Masculine or Feminine is one of the easiest, most natural, and straightforward ways that men and women can glorify God. For the past couple decades, the PTB have made a concerted effort to de-glorify masculinity and femininity. The feminist nomenclatura have tried their darndest to convince us that masculine traits and behaviors are not attractive, but are "toxic" and so on. Likewise, feminists themselves revel in their bossy attitudes, blue butch haircuts, and pudgy waistlines. But they can never take away from the fact that a man who possesses PSALM traits and authentic masculinity is inspiring to men and libidonizing to women. Likewise, they can never convince men that domineering and masculine women are truly attractive, and deep down inside, women themselves know it's a pretty lie.

Because of the widespread recalcitrance and general resistance against their efforts to convert the publican mind to view base ugliness as mind-numbingly erotic, Feminist Firebrands and the MGM have resorted to shame tactics in order to dictatorship the belief that "curvy" women are beautiful, among many other beefs, where "curvy" frankly means obese. But people are not rolled over so easily. No one has the spiritual authority to redefine beauty because true beauty has its own glorious allure that identifies it as beautiful. Aposematism, obesity, RBF, tattoos and the like tend to hide this.

The Deceptiveness of Glory

Σ Frame Axiom 35, AKA "The Incentive of Glory": Perceiving the glory of a thing or person through the eyes of one's heart is taken to be a mystical promise of sanctification if that thing is chosen or that relationship pursued. This perception of glory is intrinsically motivating.
Corollary to Axiom 35: If the state of one's heart is not spiritually aligned with the Holy Spirit, then one will only perceive the glorification of the flesh and will presume contentment lies beyond, or that there is the potential for sanctification where there is none. This is also intrinsically motivating, but in vain.

God is very concerned about appearances and reputation. If you recall that the Bible is highly feudal in its orientation, "glory" is often synonymous with reputation. We are supposed to make our Lord look good. It's not a set of actions, but a commitment.

It's interesting that in God, This High Reputation is also synonymous with physically perceivable Divine Beauty and in combination with Perfect Character. As God revealed to Moses when he asked for the Revelation of his Glory.

Beauty is only Absolute Beauty when it's True and Good. Truth is only the Absolute Truth when its Beautiful and Good. And Goodness is only Absolute Goodness when its True and Beautiful. All are True of God of which said Trinity is Perfect and Infinite."

When evil is committed in His name (under the guise of Christianity or morality), or when evil is celebrated and glorified, then God will enact his wrath on the unrighteous.

Deception can occur when aesthetic Beauty and/or the impression of glory is present without these other attributes. IOW, the Incentive of Glory can arise from a false impression, thereby making it a spiritual lie. (See Corollary to Axiom 35.) Men are especially impressionable / susceptible to the appearance of feminine glory because men are visually oriented (e.g. Moses requested to see God's glory). Women are especially impressionable / susceptible to the glorified appearance of lifestyle, status, and wealth.

False Vectors of Glory

In the past, some readers have been deeply offended by my characterizations of faux glory, saying that it was blasphemous, heretical, iconoclastic, and so on. Well, I found a couple passages in the Bible that confirm my viewpoint. Emphasis in bold.

> [18] For many walk, of whom I often told you, and now tell you even as I weep, that they are the enemies of the cross of Christ, [19] whose end is destruction, whose god is their appetite, and whose* glory is in their shame, who have their minds on earthly things.
> Philippians 3:18-19 (NASB)

> "For Satan himself transforms himself into an angel of light. [15] Therefore it is no great thing if his ministers also transform themselves into ministers of righteousness, whose end will be according to their works."
> 2 Corinthians 11:14-15 (NKJV)

That said, I'll try to describe this phenomenon again.

People and things are artificially glorified and mysticized for the purpose of making it appear more attractive, persuasive, and even seductive. This technique is regularly used in advertising and film making because it conveys a transcendent meaning (see Axiom 35) and appeals to the hind-brain of mythos. If one is exposed to a person or a product in a glorified state, one can believe it and/or accept it very easily, partly because of a Halo Effect resulting from impressions. It may even become one's new mental standard of comparison, much like women compare all men to the top SMV men (AKA "Mr. Right" or "Prince Charming") and then find all other men lacking. Compared to an entity in a glorified state, all other competing entities appear common and mundane.

I've described false vectors of glory before in a few posts, so here I'll pick out three examples of this phenomenon, and rework the descriptions for those readers who cannot discern true glory from false.

Example 1 — The Pseudo-Glory of Image Enhancement

In Fantasy in Makeup and Photography (2021/4/16), we looked at how cosmetics, lighting, and photo editing can enhance one's aesthetic appeal. This has the potential not only to make someone more beautiful, but also to make them appear glorified. It appeals to the human sense of Mythos (i.e. surrounding love, romance, sex, etc.) and it arouses one's mystical awareness, even hope.

In Filters (2023/2/28), FarmBoy shared a couple videos of how AI image enhancement is literally changing the faces of TikTok. Apparently, this is allowing wimmin to finally realize how artificial beautification and glorification is not real, but that it does have real effects on one's self-image. According to these videos, some women are now afraid of how AI image enhancement negatively affects their self-esteem. (Perhaps this is a good thing, as most women have an unrealistically astronomic estimation of themselves.)

Men are tempted to interpret the appearance of visual perfection (e.g. of a woman) as goodness, emotional / spiritual maturity, quality, and market value — a "Halo Effect" — but the truth is that image enhancement is a fantasy cosplay with an emphasis on sexual semiotics.

Example 2 – The Faux Glory of P0rnography

Seeing naked male and female bodies slapping against each other has the power to attract and arouse. In P0rn is Faux Validation (2023/2/17) and How P0rn and Premarital Sex affects one's view of Women (2023/2/20), I discussed how p0rnography draws men into the idolatry of Lust (2023/2/10).

Most professionally filmed / photographed p0rn is glorified in appearance. The actor's / actresses' bodies appear perfectly sculpted, waxed, and oiled. Hair is voluminous and shiny. Makeup and lighting are artfully employed. The grody and gross aspects are photoshopped, edited out, or confined to a minimum. Precious juices are savored and worshipped. The man is always on top of his Game. The woman always cums in a frenzied fit of ecstasy… All of these aspects contribute to the appearance of glory.

But what we're looking at is basically the Glory of God in a sanctified marriage, however debased — stolen from its rightful place and coopted for mass consumption by Lusty peeping eyes all over the internet — all for monetary profit$. When taken out of the context of covenantal marriage, it is an archetypical spiritual lie. (See Corollary to Axiom 35.) It is NOT what it appears to be. It is a carefully contrived stage play of actors performing the devils work in assuming the place and position of an idol for the worshipful faptention of the viewer.

Example 3 – The Glory of Illicit Sex

In What is glorification? (2019/3/23), I described how women display an intrinsic transformation when they're entwined with the Tangles, and especially after they get sexually imbued with masculine affection. There are many obvious physical indicators, which when combined, lead to a form of glorification.

- Her face glows.
- She's happy and smiling.
- Her eyes are gleaming with hope.
- She has a sudden burst of self-esteem.
- She conducts herself in a more mature manner.
- She's more content, and less emotionally needy.
- She is more confident, especially more sexually confident.
- She may become more animated and emotionally expressive.
- She's dressing up and attending diligently to her hair and makeup.
- She is self-assured, and she speaks in a more direct, candid fashion.
- She stops using anger and feigned helplessness as tools of manipulation.

These indicators appear whether or not the woman in question is totally in love with her husband, or else sh!t faced from shagging a stable of well-hung studs. The emotional affect display is more or less the same.

This poses a huge problem in vetting and detecting infidelity.

In an effort to suss out any other flags or indicators that might help a man distinguish one from the other, I wrote a number of posts that address this question from various perspectives. Here are a few.

- Σ Frame: Metaphysical Literacy (2022/9/21)
- Σ Frame: Concubinage (2023/5/19)

There are a few tells, as described in these posts, such as arrogance, bimbofication, defiance, haughtiness, online presence, being secretive, s1ut tells, social suave, and others. There is one green flag — her being a pain in the @ss (see post above). But I think ultimately, figuring out whether a woman is either in love with her man, or in lust with the d!ck, all boils down to a man's metaphysical literacy and his ability to discern the spiritual constitution of others, as described in the above post.

Examine Yourselves

In closing, I'll convey this admonition from Roosh

> 12. You must examine yourself if you pass on a woman of strong faith because you seek a more beautiful woman
> "If you turn down the opportunity to court a devout Orthodox woman because she wasn't pretty enough, I don't know what to say to you. Do you know how hard it is to find a woman who has strong faith? So because you > are receiving less carnal pleasure, you will pass on her for a prettier girl who is less likely to have the same type of faith? Do you know that if your Orthodox marriage goes the distance, any beautiful wife will look not so beautiful in a few years due to the hands of time, and that it's her faith that is the most important feature of deciding the course of your marriage? As long as a woman is not abrasive on the eyes, and has a figure that is at least average, why covet more?"

> Roosh Valizadeh: 33 Things Christian Men Should Know About Women (2022/10/17)

As Roosh alluded to in this post, Men should pay attention to which type of glory they are attracted to. Are you attracted to the glory of fertility and fleshly beauty, or are you attracted to the glory of a quiet, peaceful, trusting heart? Upon introspection, is this how you want to be? If not, pray and ask God to open the eyes of your heart and give you the vision and wisdom to appreciate the good and reject the bad. Choose wisely.

Is Sex a Necessary part of Vetting?

Does a man need to Test Drive a bicycle to verify lube on the seat?

Readership: All

Length: 950 words
Reading Time: 5 minutes

Ye olde Red Pill lore stipulates that a man needs to press for sex early and often. Here, I'll explain the pros and cons of this rationale from different viewpoints.

Arguments FOR the Test Drive

From an evo-psyche perspective, it is more advantageous to men's chances of procreation to have a short term sexual strategy, to have sexual intercourse earlier in a relationship and more often, and with multiple partners. In fact, this is the general nature of men when unrestricted by social norms and religious convictions.

The argument for quick lays was based on the conventional praxeology from ye olde Manosphere that women's feelings change with the weather, and competition is always afoot, so a man should strike the iron while it's hot, escalate to sex ASAP, and get his pedacter in the porthole to stake his territory (or his conquest). The woman's feelings are much less likely to change after coitus is concisely consummated.

Another reason is because modern women won't even give the time of day to any man who doesn't register on her Tingle-O-meter. So if a woman agrees to have a date with a man, she fully expects him to push for sex, partly because she cannot push for sex and still maintain the much valued moral cover of plausible deniability.

The reason a woman expects a man to go for it within the first few dates is because she is exhibiting her hard-wired intersexual features within a particular socio-cultural context.

To use the Sex = Marriage form of reasoning, she wants you to "marry" her in the carnal and natural sense. In fact, this phenomenon is probably the most salient argument for the Sex = Marriage position. A woman who is begging for a man to d!ck her good, hard, and often is doing exactly what she was created to do.

When a woman displays that level of sexual attraction, she wants and expects that man to take advantage of it. The clincher is that it would be unethical (within this paradigm) to lead a woman on and then leave her disappointed.

A man may not need to have sex with a woman to verify her interest; but if/when a woman opens that door (sometimes merely by agreeing to go on a date, depending on the woman), and he does NOT follow through with the batter, he will lose that woman. The reason is because once a woman is sexually aroused by a man, she will leave that door open for a time and if the man doesn't escalate rather aggressively, then she'll interpret this as a rejection and she'll start closing that door. Once it closes, that door absolutely will NOT be reopened for any reason. That opportunity is lost forever.

Arguments AGAINST the Test Drive

The counter argument is that the guy who doesn't have sex with a woman who is displaying hard attraction cues to him is not necessarily going to lose her if she has any authentic interest beyond sex. Maybe if he keeps her waiting for years and he won't marry her then she'll leave, but you don't need 4 years of dating when you are young to know if your interests, personalities, and values align enough to be a good marriage match.

A couple caveats.

1. If she's the type of woman who is sexually passionate and lacks self-control, and she is getting sexual attention from a lot of other HVMs, then it becomes necessary to stake your claim earlier than later, before another man beats her out of the competition. In this case, Vetting takes on the added purpose of determining whether she is really marriage material or not, in spite of her lusty libido. IF she's truly looking to avoid sin and find a husband before she falls into the wrong hands, then giving her the benefit of the doubt would be an act of mercy. IF NOT, then utter stupidity.
2. If she's at or near the wall you DO need a few years to test her and to vet her, but that is a different set of circumstances in which you are trying to determine if she's genuine or not.

Also, think about the implications of a woman who will bail if you don't screw her early on in dating. Is she really the type of woman who screams life-long marriage material, or is she telling you she has self-control issues and doesn't really understand nor care about God's word? A woman who knows what God's words says about fornicating and makes that sin a criterium for dating her, shows a lack of restraint that does not bode well for the marriage when he expects her to exhibit some biblical maturity and stay in the marriage instead of hitting the eject button when things get hard.

The bottom line is that self-control, self-discipline, and mental / psychological toughness are required to stick through hard times and work through difficult matters. If a girl can't muster the faith to resist getting d!cked up by all her boyfriends and orbiters until she finds one to marry her, then that there is a red flag. It may or may not be a deal breaker depending on the man, but either way, it IS an indication of how much work the husband will potentially have to put in to corral and correct her behavior.

Conclusions

As readers may have figured out by now, the answer to the titular question, "Is sex a necessary part of vetting?", all depends upon whether the woman in question is a regenerated believer or not.

- If she is NOT, then you'll be relying heavily on vectors of fleshly attraction, relentless mastery of Game tactics, staking your genetic claim in her baby maker, and capturing her birdnest before she flies away. And after all that work, all you've done is join yourself to a degenerate woman and have thereby missed your chance to find someone better. Mind you that she'll also be treating you like a quarry, and may cast you away if/when a bigger catch comes along.
- If she IS, then seeking to qualify her with sex may backfire, as it might mark you out as one of those Worldly F-boy Ch@ds who in her mind are best avoided. And if she gives in, you may be degrading your relationship.
- Also remember that your conduct tends to attract or repel certain women according to the Law of Reciprocality.

So the answer all depends on whether you want to be counted among the faithful.

The Ever Present Fear of a Dead Bedroom

Jack · 3 October 2023 · Archived copy · Original

The Test Drive is a logical response to women's hysteria — or the lack thereof.

Targeted Readership: Men
Theme: IOIs and Vetting
Author's Note: This post is based on a discussion with Red Pill Apostle on 2023/8/3,17 and a comment from Dead Bedroom Dating on 2023/8/14.
Length: 1,200 words
Reading Time: 7 minutes

The Female Perspective

This is what Scott has talked about until he was blue in the face. When a woman thinks a guy is hot and has a connection with him, it's wet panties off and condom on. Lots of rules for Billy Betaboy, but for Don Dynad!ck, there are NO rules other than getting some sack action ASAP.

Once a woman discovers the Man Magic, it becomes an acute opiate addiction, second to none. From then on, every man is filtered through this lens, and only top SMV men are then 'visible' to her lustful wandering eyes. There's no going back to appreciating a man / relationship based on inherent compatibility / honor / trust / shared values / life purpose / etc., especially if they're young.

Ever since the Sexual Revolution, popping the cork of nuptial festivities on every date has become the norm. From the 1950s to the advent of the Red Pill, this was a carefully guarded secret that was only discussed in quiet giggles and gasps among gaudy Gina's. But now, thanks to the PUAs who spilled all the beans about the nature of women, men now have to adapt to the reality on the ground (or else go MGTOW).

The problem with all of this, as we know, is that a woman can never respect a man who will love and value her for serious reasons, and if she marries the poor sucker, it stagnates sexual bonding and leads to a billabong love life in LTRs.

The Male Perspective

Men can't imagine a feral female's passion for penile insertion until he's been the target of a human feline in heat. Note how one woman used the line, "I didn't want the date to end", and that meant she was anxiously waiting for the grand finale of bum bopping. The guy who did his calculus homework instead of going to frat parties won't pick up on this code, but the party guy will and will then move in and position himself for the anticipated rowdy romp.

For the top ~10% secular men, there has never been a better time to be a player than in the past decade. But the remaining 90% are facing a situation in which authentic female companionship is as rare as a 25-year-old virgin. The only available picks have already been picked up, pickled, and picked through by pick up artists and the like. All other men must tolerate female disrespect or else forego all things feminine.

In The Black Pill Fear of Being Used (2023/8/14), Jack posed the question, "Is [the Black Pill based on] an acute fear of being used, or is it a pervasive fear of living in perilous times?" In this post, Jack gave a list of things that men are afraid of, things that dampen their confidence and erode their faith.

Dead Bedroom Dating added "the fear of a dead bedroom" to the list, and this cuts to the giggling, jiggling, gigolo heart of the matter.

He writes [edited for accuracy, clarity, and readability],

> "Women usually jump ship pretty fast, if he doesn't escalate. As men read in every secular RP guide: If by deadline X nothing has happened, then fire the ejection seat. It's usually the religious women who cannot wait when the tingles kick in. And that's why men dating religious-style have such a hard time.
> The Test Drive isn't driven by actual sexual chemistry. It's driven by fear. The fear of ending up with a LTR partner who is never going to bang you. The Fear of a Dead Bedroom affects men and women alike. This isn't just men, who now are afraid of the "friend zone" like it's living hell, it's women too, who are afraid of non-tingles now, because tingles mean the world. So relationships are now initiated with: "Just get this over with as quickly as possible right at the start."

This is the Worldly wisdom of the Test Drive. The reasoning is that if a sexual relationship is desired (and marriage IS a sexual relationship, or it should be), then the most fundamental element of said relationship should be fully examined and certified from the outset — AS IF there would be NO consequences. Going on the Sticky Tape analogy, this approach is like using up a lot of tape to remove the dirt from a surface until you can finally get it to stick. (Why not wash the surface first?) It's like rolling the dice until you win, while NOT paying attention to how much money you laid on the gambling table. (There's a good chance you'll go broke before you win anything back.)

The Larger Picture

There is one inconsistency in DBD's argument — Black Pillers are not likely to have the opportunity to take a Test Drive — after all, that is exactly why they're Black Pilled. So here we are NOT talking about the majority of Black Pillers. We are talking about a very small number of men who are High Value enough to attract a woman's interest, but who are also serious about marriage. But as discussed above, a woman's interest doesn't necessarily mean respect. Tingles = Respect. It remains to be seen whether such a man can obtain a particular woman's respect. Thus, respect is one important quality to vet for.

With the way marriage has been fed to the dogs these days, we would call such men stupid idiots. But in fact, these men carry the most responsibility for shifting the market dynamics and in setting a good example for (younger) men. If these men give up and join the carousel, then it all goes to həll in a hurry — even faster.

The different values assigned to the consequences is the whole reason for the schism between Civilizationists vs. Nihilists vs. Preservationists. That is why guys like Matt Walsh and Vox Day continue to endorse men getting married, in spite of the difficult odds and the spectacular risks involved. It is also why other voices are saying, "Western civilization is not worth saving", "Never a better time to be a player", "F 'em all and let GNON sort 'em out", and "Sit poolside and watch it all burn down".

Conclusions

Astute readers may have noticed that there is an intrinsic contradiction in the Test Drive logic, which is not surprising since it is motivated by fear. A Test Drive, by definition, assumes that one is serious about making a purchase, which implies that one is either a Civilizationist, a Preservationist, or a pitiful victim of an acute affliction of conscience. But the nature of the Test Drive, en masse, only drives the culture towards Nihilism.

So how is that supposed to work out?

And who will win this culture war? Civilizationists, Preservationists, or Nihilists?

Only a little leaven will leaven the entire loaf (Galatians 5:9). But who is doing the leavening? The marriage minded Br@ds, the p_ssy poking Ch@ds, or the victims of conscience?

The 1,000 C0ck Stare

Jack · 5 October 2023 · Archived copy · Original

How to detect perdition in the eyes.

Readership: Mature Adults Only

Introduction

The concepts of S1ut Eye, and 1,000 C0ck Stare are often cited around the Manosphere and elsewhere. To the untrained eye, these expressions may be difficult to identify. This post will put you in the know.

The Eyes are the Window to the Soul

> "The eye is the lamp of the body. So, if your eye is healthy, your whole body will be full of light, but if your eye is bad, your whole body will be full of darkness. If then the light in you is darkness, how great is the darkness!"
> Matthew 6:22-23 (ESV)

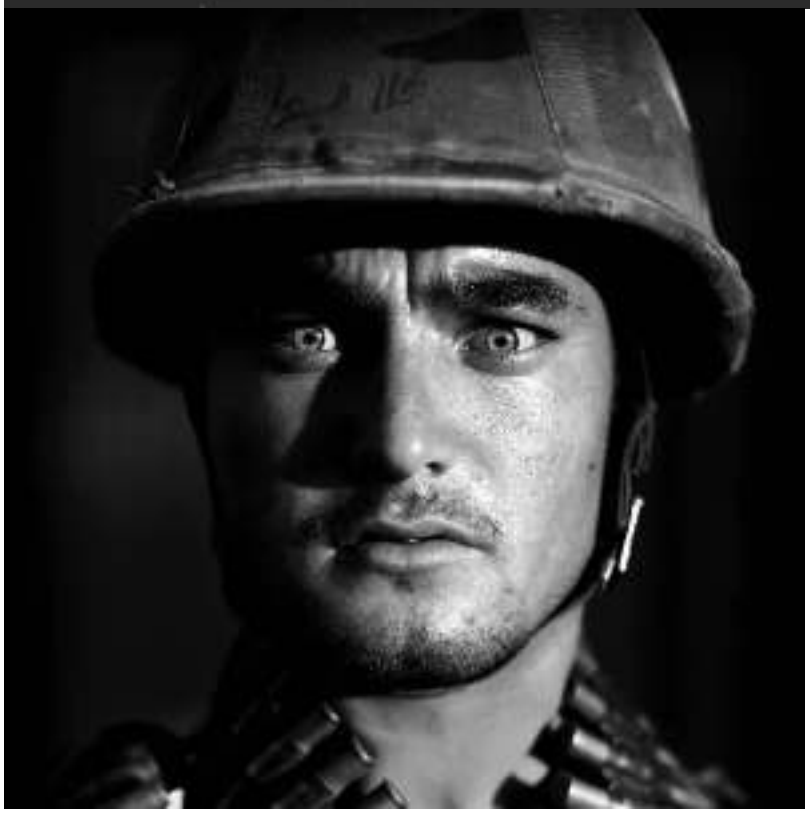
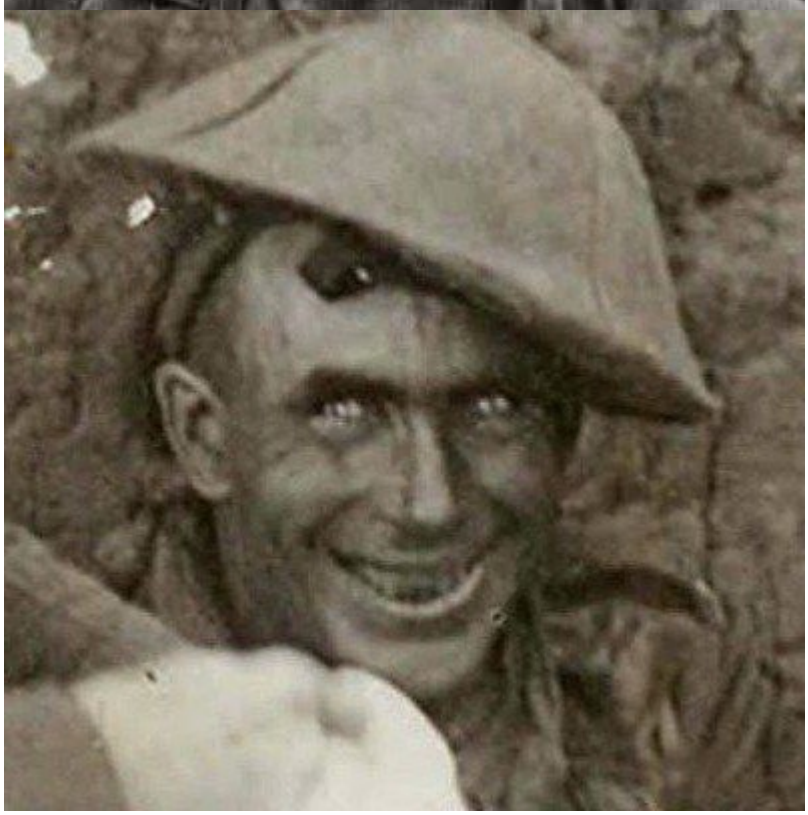
The term "1,000 C0ck stare" originated as a portmanteau of "1,000 yard stare", a term used to describe the countenance of soldiers returning from battle.

Here's a few images for readers who've never heard of this.





Similar to the 1,000 yard stare, the “1,000 C0ck stare” is loosely defined as the look on a woman’s face that reveals apathy, fatigue, hopelessness, rage, and spite — all at the same time. The eyes are blank, cold, hard, distant, and calculating – like a feral predator sizing up a mark. If there be a smile, it appears as a tight-lipped grimace turned up-side-down that guards a heart-deadening pain in the soul.

This look is a direct result of being ridden hard and cast away, drilled and dropped by a sh!tload of shysters. Rinse and repeat, ad infinitum, ad nauseum.

Where S1ut Eye has a slight twang of psychological madness on the side of ecstasy, the 1,000 C0ck Stare has a slight twang of psychological madness on the side of rage. Indeed, within a woman who has this permanent expression, derangement is just on the threshold of emanation.

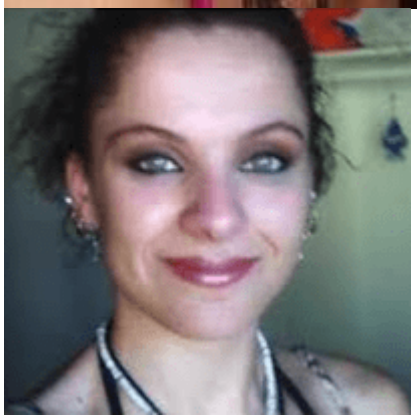
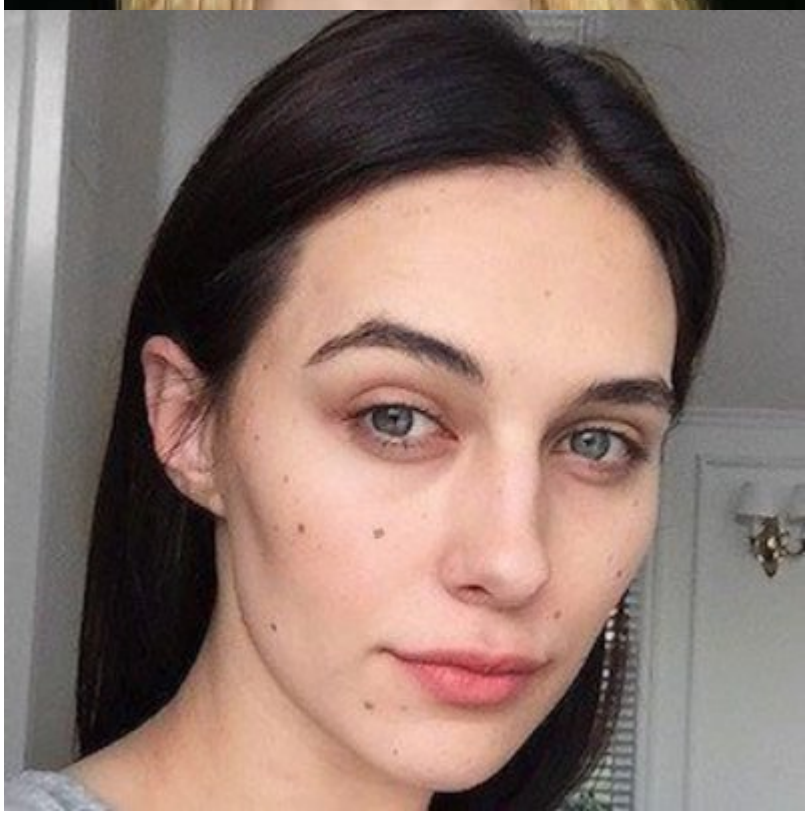
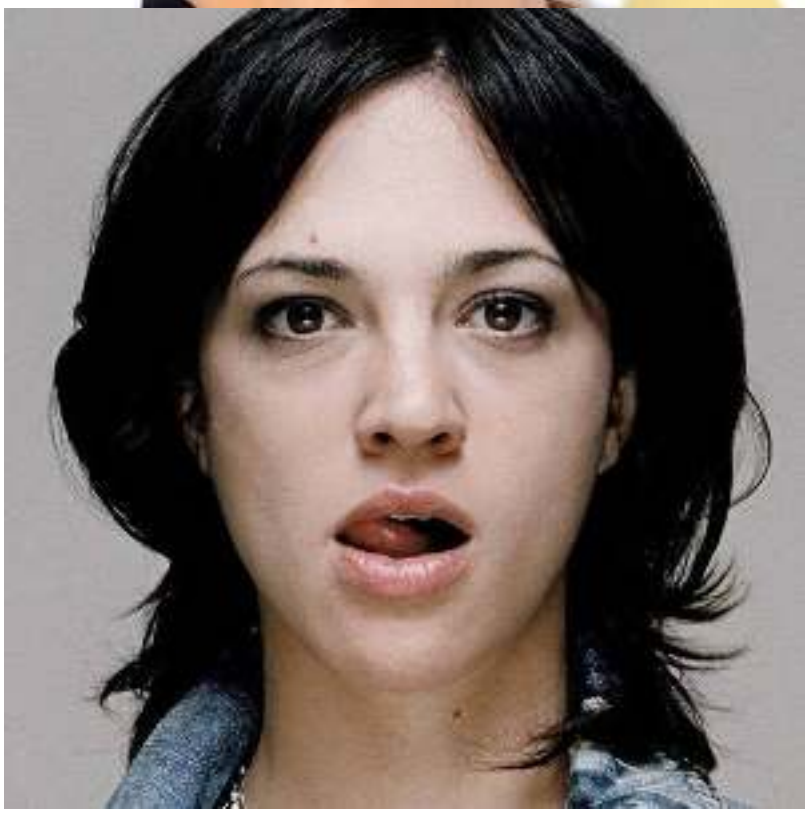
The 1,000 C0ck stare is often accompanied by other s1ut tells.

- Tattoos.
- Aposematism.
- The facial skin has a greasy / oily / waxy sheen that cannot be hidden by cosmetics.
- Oddly swollen clown lips.
- Weirdly sculpted eyebrows.
- Overall she looks jaded and well-used.







Descriptions from the Bible

St. Peter quilled 11 verses to describe them as follows.

> "[9] then the Lord knows how to rescue the godly from trials, and to keep the unrighteous under punishment until the day of judgment, [10] and especially those who indulge in the lust of defiling passion and despise authority.
> Bold and willful, they do not tremble as they blaspheme the glorious ones, [11] whereas angels, though greater in might and power, do not pronounce a blasphemous judgment against them before the Lord. [12] But these, like irrational animals, creatures of instinct, born to be caught and destroyed, blaspheming about matters of which they are ignorant, will also be destroyed in their destruction, [13] suffering wrong as the wage for their wrongdoing. They count it pleasure to revel in the daytime. They are blots and blemishes, reveling in their deceptions, while they feast with you. [14] They have eyes full of adultery, insatiable for sin. They entice unsteady souls. They have hearts trained in greed. Accursed children! [15] Forsaking the right way, they have gone astray…
> [17] These are waterless springs and mists driven by a storm. For them the gloom of utter darkness has been reserved. [18] For, speaking loud boasts of folly, they entice by sensual passions of the flesh those who are barely escaping from those who live in error. [19] They promise them freedom, but they themselves are slaves of corruption. For whatever overcomes a person, to that he is enslaved."
> 2nd Peter 2:9-19 (ESV)

Modes of the 1,000 C0ck Stare

The 1,000 C0ck Stare appears in two forms: Dead Mode, and Predator Mode.

The difference between these two forms is that, in Dead mode, her heart is totally closed. Whereas, in Predator mode, the libido remains activated, and thus, the heart stays animated in the hope of immediate glutification.

The 1,000 C0ck Stare – Dead Mode

> "My eye has grown dim from vexation, and all my members are like a shadow."
> Job 17:7 (ESV)

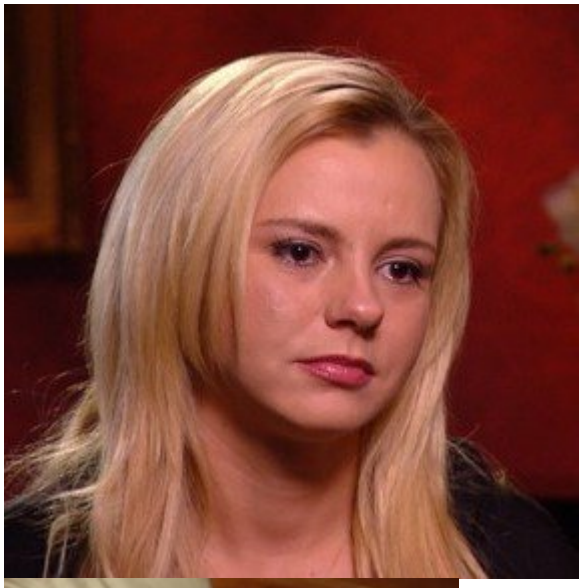
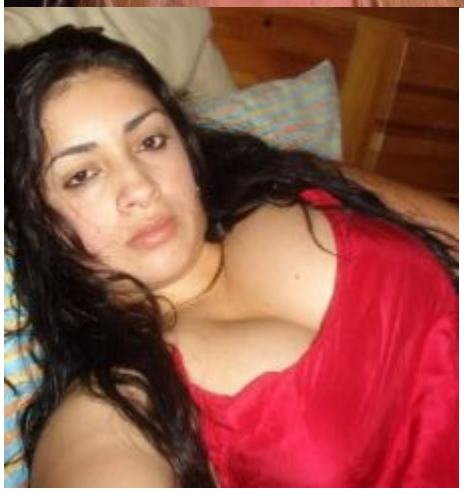
Human beings are emotional creatures. The eyes are the window to the soul. When the lights go out, they simply don't come back on.

The 1,000 C0ck Stare in Dead Mode is characterized by dead-eyed, soulless, expressionless s1utface.





See also: any Kylie Jenner selfie. You will also find countless examples of young chicks with the 1,000 C0ck stare on Instagram.

Think of The Picture of Dorian Gray wherein a lovely young woman is the subject. She takes a selfie in all her bare cheeked glory and then uses it to hook the attentions and affections of many thirsty men in her desperation for attention and validation. Progress to lots of dating and lots of sex. Each Ch@d tears open her nether holes as big as her teary eyes. After each encounter her broken heart gives way to indignation and pride. Her lovely face remains the same but her countenance becomes more and more "c0cky". A spirit of defiance sets in. Her eyes become ever more arrogant and haughty. Metaphysical antennas extend from her scalp, each sending out a desperate SOS for love to each and every one of her former lovers. Eventually the eyes fade into the darkness of perdition.

Very sad. Quite sad actually.

The 1,000 C0ck Stare – Predator Mode

> "Haughty eyes and a proud heart, the lamp of the wicked, are sin."
> Proverbs 21:4 (ESV)

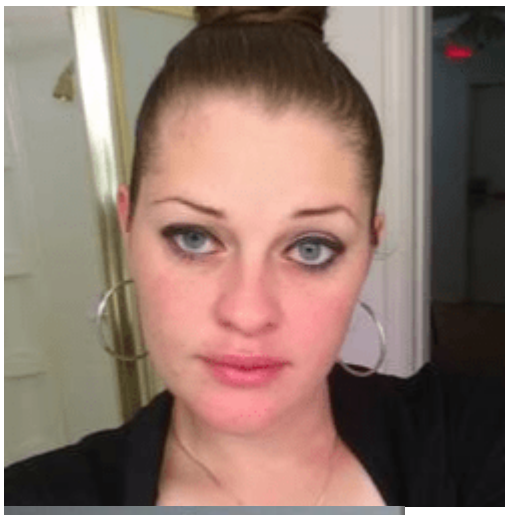
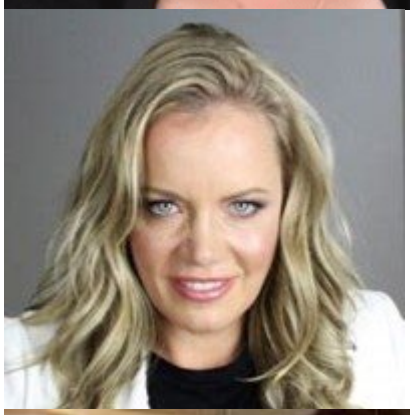
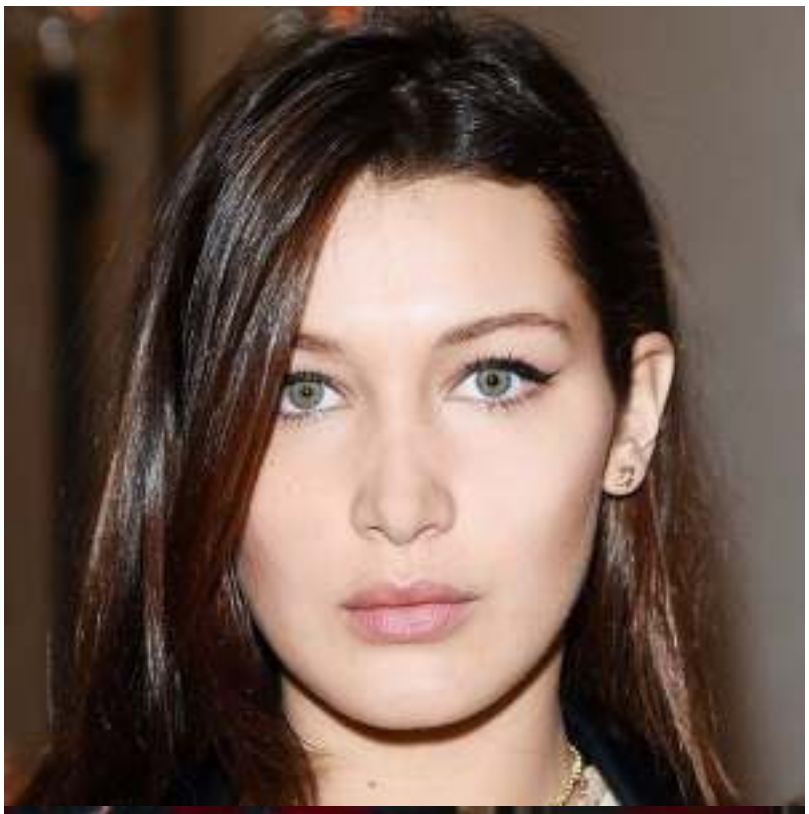
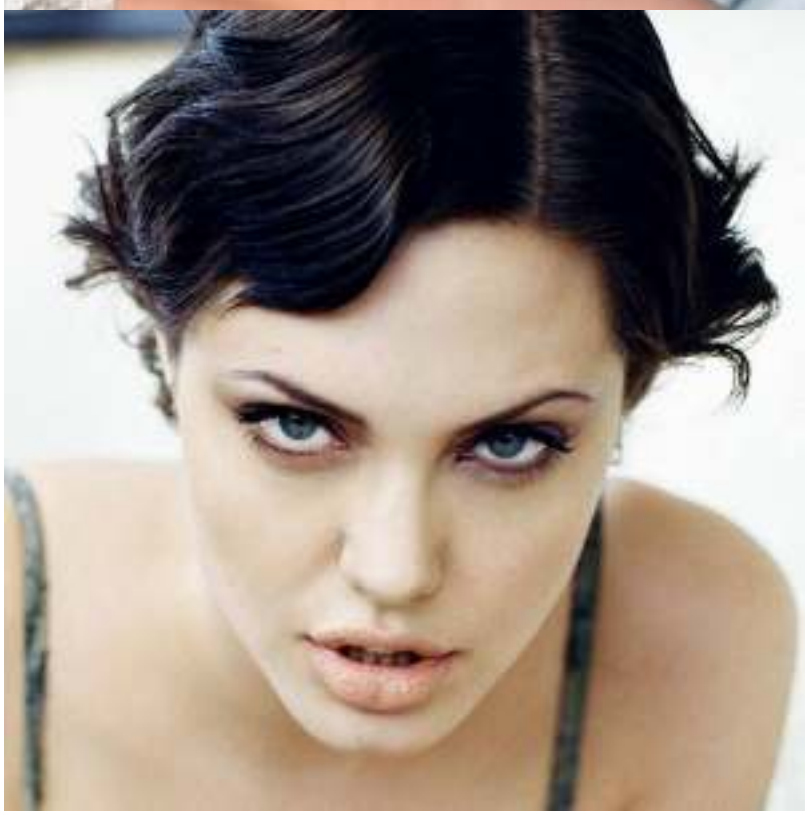
When the heart dies, but the libido rages on, sufflating the hope of ~~love~~ lust, an eerie countenance descends over the one fully conquered by their own doubts, distrust, and fleshly sins. The eyes glaze over, miosis sets in (constricted pupils), and the eyes of an animal heart descend into madness.









The 1,000 C0ck stare in Predator Mode is akin to the lifeless eyes of a shark. There is no expression. There is no feeling. There is no remorse. There is very little rational thought. It is just a dark orb in nature that allows sight. They are beasts in nature with only one main prerogative — to be validated and to escape their psychological agony by f*cking the pain away. Also similar to sharks, women stricken with the 1,000 C0ck stare swagger, swim, swoon, and swallow until they find a suitable piece of prey.

More Descriptions from Around the Web

> "The 1,000 C0ck stare is the glazed, unfocused, hollow eyes of a broken S1ut in the grips of a delirium from having taken a few too many rides on the C0ck carousel. It is loosely defined as the look on a woman's face that reveals spite, apathy, fatigue, and hopelessness all at the same time. The spite is because she is angry at the world for not having locked down a man because of her S1utty ways. The apathy is from being desensitized to sex. The fatigue is her being tired of the constant battle to get and keep male attention and having to resort to sexual favors earlier and earlier as she gets older. And the hopelessness comes from her knowing deep down she'll never have a relationship of consequence with a man she loves and respects, who finds her tolerable outside of sex."

Another:

> "Have you ever had a date with a woman and she never once looked you in the eyes, but rather talked distractedly about trivial * while constantly checking her phone?
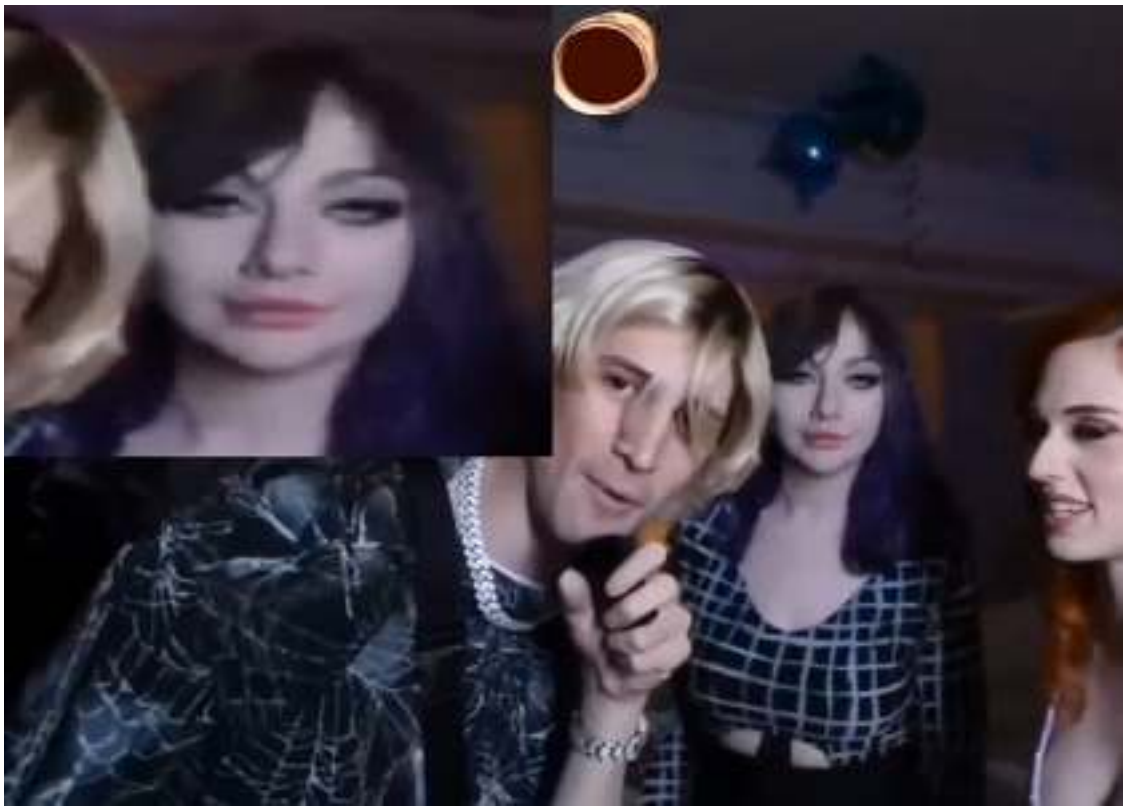
> If you'd taken the phone away and grabbed her face and made her look at you, she'd look right through you as though you weren't there. The "1,000 Yard Stare" is what you get when someone is so thoroughly checked-out because of stress or trauma that they can't even focus on the person sitting right in front of them. The 1,000 C0ck stare is the same thing, but for women who have had so many men that they can't take a man seriously anymore."



A third.

> "It's a real thing. That stare is really what happens to everyone when they overindulge in anything too pleasurable. Drug addicts get that same look in their eye. Men are wired to handle the pleasure of sex over and over, so they never tire or get burned out on "too much sex". It actually increases their confidence and mental acuity. OTOH, women get blown out and burned out fast if she doesn't rein in her desires and protect her sexuality. Men are hard wired to spread our seed, but women of course are not and never have been. That's why it's much more noticeable in women who can't stop riding the C0ck carousel.
> A man has to work for sex. Women don't. So for women, the neurochemical response is more similar to an > opioid addict who can't stop self-administering a drug. Over time, the endocrine system starts to change in response to that pleasure it changes our perception of the world around us and it shows in our eyes.

> When I think about it, the exact same thing happens to men when they aren't getting any, or are getting rejected / frustrated too often, since stress and fear learning can cause this effect as well."

After spending hours painstakingly combing through photos on the internet and compiling photo galleries for Slut Eye (2023/9/15) and The 1,000 C0ck Stare (2023/10/5), some readers still cannot see any difference.

Riuoku said,

> "How am I supposed to differentiate between slut eye and just feeling sad / melancholic temperament? Both look the same to me. Not every women is a happy-go-lucky type and it doesn't necessarily stem from "rich experience", you can even see in small girls that some are born more stoic / serious / melancholic.
> I just can't stop thinking that, despite there obviously being some merit to it, this is more or less cherry-picking random images to fit a biased narrative. There could be just many reasons that in specific photo a woman has sad/dead eyes."

Stars from the TV series, Real Housewives. All 4 are sexed up from years of promiscuity, but the one on the far right has the 1,000 C0ck stare.

Joe2 responded,

> "Exactly. Your observation about the image selection is very similar to mine regarding the response selection for "The Female Perspective" video in The Ever Present Fear of a Dead Bedroom (2023/10/3).
> I'm not making any accusations of cherry picking images, but I think it is fair to conclude that for most men it > is difficult to differentiate slut eye, predator mode, feeling sad, drug use, etc. with a high degree of accuracy. And because of this difficulty, it's easy to misread the image and come to the wrong conclusion about a woman.

> As a test of this hypothesis, additional images could be posted and evaluated to see if there is a consensus of opinion about each image. It would be informative if some of the images were faces of porn "stars" because they have a known sexual history. Unfortunately, that can't be done because images can be easily searched and identity revealed which would bias the test.
> Due to the high risk of error there is minimal value of any conclusions based on image evaluation, at this time."

Perhaps the best way to help readers see the difference between various expressions is through a comparison. Here, I've sorted out a small collection of images displaying the following constitutional expressions. I have numbered the galleries and lettered the photos so that readers can easily reference the images. (For example, image 5C is M!ley Cyru$.)

1. Good Affect
2. Poor Affect
3. S1ut Eye
4. Sexually Activated, but NO 1,000 C0ck Stare
5. 1,000 C0ck Stare

Sexual conduct correlates strongly with one's spiritual constitution. This comparison makes it very evident how sexual experience can very easily lead to perdition.

The overall countenance appears emotionally detached, or “insulated” for lack of a better description, like nothing could ever excite her, faze her, or surprise her, etc. Meiosis (constricted pupils) is very common, but it could also be misleading if there are bright lights in her eyes.

Good Relationships are Chosen and Developed, NOT "Found" by Chance

What is truly important in a Relationship?

7 Factors Predictive of Successful Marriages

In the following video, Lana Blakely summarizes a scientific research paper written by Samantha Joel, et al. Blakely speaks to a man's level of rationality and she's also easy on the eyes.

Lana Blakely: So we've been dating all wrong, science says. (2023/8/20) Length: 7:54

So it turns out that those things that make men attractive to women, LAMPS, etc. are really bad predictors of happy marriages. Which provides further evidence that women's horrific track record of choosing men really is founded in them going for the bad boys.

At 3:38, Blakely recounts several factors that researchers have found to be correlated with determining satisfaction in present and future relationships.

1. Contentment Prior to the Relationship — One thing that did seem to impact the happiness of each person in a relationship was how happy they were before the relationship. If both people in a relationship would answer "yes" to questions like, "Were you satisfied in life before you met him/her?", research showed that they'd be significantly more happy in their relationships, which supports the age-old saying, "Nobody can make you happy until you're happy with yourself first." So, you're more likely to be happy with someone long-term if they're already happy in most areas of their life.
2. Growth mindset — Being with someone who is interested in improving themselves and learning new skills. Now of course, this information is helpful when you've gotten to know a person, but you can't tell that from an online dating profile.
3. Perceived Partner Commitment — Researchers found that, during the time leading up to people marrying, ever perceiving one's partner to be less committed than oneself — even a little bit — was one of the best predictors of unhappiness in marriage. Basically, if you feel strongly that you want your relationship to last forever, but you don't perceive your partner to feel the same way… you've got problems.
4. Appreciation — Feeling lucky to have your partner.
5. Sexual Satisfaction — How satisfied are you with the quality of your sex life?
6. Perceived Partner Satisfaction — How happy you think the relationship makes your partner.
7. Conflict — How much, or how little, conflict there is in the relationship.

Good Relationships have a Lively Interpersonal Dynamic

At 6:10, Blakely says that Joel's research tells us that the person we choose is not nearly as important as the relationship we build. The personalities of the two people involved in the relationship does play a role in the overall satisfaction, however, personality doesn't matter as much as we might believe. What is far more important is the characteristics of the relationship itself. It's the dynamic you build with your person.

In Joel's own words,

> "The dynamic that you build with someone — the shared norms, the in-jokes, the shared experiences — is so much more than the separate individuals who make up that relationship."

This reminds me of something in the annals of Axioms…

Σ Frame Axiom 1, AKA The Law of Gestalt, "The Whole Package Deal" (Jack): The whole is greater than the sum of its parts (i.e. 全 > Σa_i). Life is dynamic. People are individuals with unique desires, spiritual needs, and life-purposes. We must accept this condition and find a way to juggle all the variables and cofactors such that we can make our lives, our work, and our marriages function according to God's proscribed order.
Corollary to Axiom 1: Knowing yourself, knowing your identity in Christ, Spiritual Maturity, and spiritual wisdom are required to pull this off.

This also hints to the "Living Entity" I described in The Peaceful Unity Marriage Model (2023/6/7).

Good Relationships are Developed

At 6:25 in the video, one of the key statements about happy relationships is made. Good relationships are built, not found. Basically, we don't "find" the "perfect" person, as if by chance. Instead, successful couples "build" a good relationship by setting up the conditions that will allow the relationship to flourish. This supports the idea that men should vet for characteristics in women that would suggest her ability and willingness to follow his lead.

At 6:57, she mentions Attachment Style as an example of how Personality is important. While Attachment Style could be considered a subcategory of one's Personality, they are not the same thing (according to psychology theory). Nevertheless, she is right that each person's Attachment Style is very important, especially for understanding the nature of the relationship. Unfortunately, she doesn't go into this any further.

At 7:20, she concludes her talk with "What to look for when dating and during the initial stages of a relationship". Blakely quotes the author of the paper, Samantha Joel, as saying,

> "You want to look for a partner who seems genuinely interested in you, who is good at perspective-taking with you, and who seems to be responsive to your needs. Someone who makes you feel understood, validated, and cared for."

From the male perspective, this lines up closely with what Christian Red Pill lore says about the importance of IOIs — that a God-glorifying marriage requires BOTH her sexual attraction to the man AND her character / virtue. And the corollary, that she demonstrates both of those by her ACTIONS, not (only) her words, consistently across the time that the man is getting to know the woman.

Playing her God-ordained role as a helper is one quality that makes women attractive.

Good Relationships Fit a God-Ordained Structure

Blakely, Joel, et al. take this further in emphasizing the nature and quality of the relationship itself. This may seem like an important point that has not been strongly and repetitively emphasized by the Christian Manosphere. But actually, we already know the conditions that will allow a relationship to flourish. We just mansplain it in crass RP language (we use that dreaded profane word, "SuBm!ss!0n") and from a perspective that feminists find deeply offensive.

Here are just a few key posts that describe the necessary conditions for LTR / marital success. Readers are welcome to leave others in the comment section.

So what are these conditions?

If you guessed Authentic Headship fitting the Christ : Church :: Husband : Wife analogy, then you guessed right. Most everything else is either debased or dysfunctional.

We can't Neglect the Other Stuff

Of course, there are a number of qualifiers that the Christian RP has added to the Classic RP lore — too numerous for me to gather in only a few days, such as being about one's purpose, developing discernment, establishing a domain of influence, etc., A man should be working on these whether or not he has a woman in his life.

Once we add chicks to the mix, then there are a few other necessities, like creating and maintaining Heart Trust, looking at the essentials, setting expectations for the relationship, laying out expectations for the woman, establishing boundaries, maintaining a feedback loop, and so on. But again, Headship is paramount. No real headway can be made in these things without first establishing a relationship with the proper structure of authority.

(I'm seeing these concepts leech into the secular RP talking points more and more.)

Concluding Statements

One way to concisely paraphrase all this is that good relationships are formed through agency and maturity, and not through vain solipsism — "wishing and hoping and thinking and praying and planning and dreaming", as Dusty Springfield once sang in a bygone age.

These insights should further dispel any false notions a man might have about how good relationships form, i.e. Being Yourself, Churchian Chivalry, Idealized Love and other Lies, Pygmalion Project (AKA Captain Save-a-H0e), Secular Altruism, The Soul Mate Myth, etc.

Ultimately, a large piece of the puzzle is in choosing the right person — a girl who will fit into your life and ¡SuBm!t!, play her role in a Headship structure, and do her part in building a good relationship as the above video / research paper described (absent the specific details offensive to feminists that I've included here).

Corollary E to Briffault's Law (Biblical Gender Roles): Female submission is the deciding factor for relationship success.
Corollary F to Briffault's Law (Jack): The female is largely responsible for the home environment and the emotional ambience of the home.
Corollary G to Briffault's Law (Jack): Every argument in marriage is caused by a contentious unsubmissive wife.

In this regard, a man is largely dependent on the grace of God to bring him a suitable female companion in life.

The problem is that truly good, God glorifying relationships are rare. There are few good role models, even fewer women who are worthy, hardly any women who are expressing interest in specific men and making themselves available to them — and men don't know what to look for.

Attachment Styles

Jack · 11 October 2023 · Archived copy · Original

A theory for understanding interpersonal interactions.

Readership: All;
Theme: IOIs and Vetting
Length: 1,250 words

Introduction

In a previous post, Good Relationships are Chosen and Developed, NOT "Found" by Chance (2023/10/9), it was mentioned that Attachment Style is an example of how Personality plays into the mating game.

This post provides the basics for understanding the theory of Attachment Styles and provides some references for further reading.

Here are some links you can read to bring yourself up to speed.

- The Attachment Project: What Is Attachment Theory? — Provides a brief history of several contributing theories to our modern understanding of Attachment Theory.
- The Attachment Project: Attachment Styles & Their Role in Relationships — Describes how Insecure Attachment creates negative patterns in relationships.
- The Attachment Project: How a Secure Attachment Style Develops in Early Childhood – Of interest to parents! This page describes how parents can promote a Secure Attachment style in childhood.
- This site offers a Quiz that explores how your childhood conditioning manifests in your adult relationships, and can help you determine which type of Attachment Style you have.

Types of Attachment Styles

There are three main types of unhealthy Attachment Styles (Anxious, Avoidant, and Disorganized, collectively called Insecure Attachment Styles), which are characterized by difficulties with cultivating and maintaining healthy relationships. The Secure Attachment style is recognized as the only healthy style. Key descriptions are copied below.

Anxious Attachment: Causes & Symptoms

Also referred to as anxious ambivalent attachment in children, anxious attachment develops in early childhood due to misattuned and inconsistent parenting.

Common signs of this attachment style are low self-esteem, strong fear of rejection or abandonment, and clinginess in relationships. A lot of memes are based on this type.

Adults with an anxious attachment style tend to have a negative self-view, but a positive view of others. This means that they may view their partner as their literal “better half.” Because someone with this attachment style deems themselves to be less worthy of love in comparison to other people, the thought of living without their partner (or being alone in general) causes high levels of anxiety. In other words, they deeply fear abandonment.

To ease this fear of abandonment, people with the anxious attachment style strongly desire security within relationships, and attention, care, and responsiveness from a partner tends to be the “remedy” for their feelings of anxiety.

On the other hand, the perceived absence of support and intimacy can lead someone with the anxious attachment style to become more clinging and demanding, preoccupied with the relationship, and desperate for reassurance that they are loved.

In a nutshell, people with this attachment style value their relationships highly, but are often hypervigilant towards threats to their security, as well as anxious and worried that their loved one is not as invested in the relationship as they are.

Avoidant Attachment Style: Causes & Symptoms

Parents who are strict and emotionally distant, do not tolerate the expression of feelings, and expect their child to be independent and tough might raise children with an avoidant attachment style.

As adults, these children appear confident and self-sufficient. They do not tolerate emotional or physical intimacy and might not be able to build healthy relationships. What's more, in the workplace, they are often seen as the independent, 'lone wolf'.

People with the avoidant/dismissive attachment style tend to have a positive self-view and negative one of others. Consequently, they prefer to foster a high sense of independence and self-sufficiency–especially on an emotional level.

Someone with the avoidant attachment style tends to believe that they don't have to be in a relationship to feel complete: They do not want to depend on others, have others depend on them, or seek support and approval in social bonds.

Adults with this attachment style generally avoid intimacy or emotional closeness, so may withdraw from a relationship if they feel like the other person is becoming reliant on them in this manner. They also tend to hide or suppress their feelings when faced with a potentially emotion-dense situation, such as conflict.

Disorganized Attachment: Causes & Symptoms

The most difficult type of insecure attachment is the Disorganized Attachment Style, also called the Anxious-Avoidant or Avoidant-Fearful style. It is often seen in people who have been physically, verbally, or sexually abused in their childhood.

Also referred to as Fearful-Avoidant attachment in children, this style develops when the child's caregivers — the only source of safety — become a source of fear.

In adulthood, people with this attachment style are extremely inconsistent in their behavior and have a hard time trusting others.
