Spreading lies and misinformation at every opportunity is what feminists do, and Arquette is a feminist. The only surprise is that she didn't conclude her speech by making a plaintive cry about where all the good men had gone. Perhaps she's saving it for when she hands out the Best Supporting Actor award at the 2016 Oscars. No doubt, the talented-but-feminist Meryl Streep will be there to offer an embarrassment of inappropriately shrill support.

Rose McGowan attempted to rally support for feminism among gay men by opting for the infinitely more bizarre approach of hurling a barrage of all-too-familiar Code Black Shaming Language [5] at them: "Gay men are as misogynistic as straight men, if not more so," she said. "I have an indictment of the gay community right now, I'm actually really upset with them." With this one statement, McGowan reminded gay men that the accusation that they are 'as bad as straight men' – the most scathing insult in the entire feminist arsenal – is a fundamental tenet of feminist ideology. [6] Gay men are no better than straight men. Got it?

[image]
Rose McGowan: Gay men are just "people who have basically fought for the right to stand on top of a float wearing an orange speedo and take molly [MDMA]."
McGowan even threw in a comment about gay men being "delusional idiots" just in case her charge of misogyny wasn't enough to inspire gay men to rally around the feminist cause. Perhaps the most alarming of all was McGowan's claim that she has been a long-time supporter of gay men and their rights, thus offering an insight into the rather curious approach that feminists tend to adopt toward their supposed allies.

Predictably, the mainstream media defended McGowan by suggesting that she was only being criticized for her comments because she was a woman: "As a woman and a Hollywood actress, McGowan is seen as fair game for scrutiny." [7] Fortunately, this wheezy old feminist meme is not working as effectively as it used to, and many gay men indignantly dismissed it with the contempt it deserves. Some even took the opportunity to give feminism itself a dressing down in a manner which must have alarmed those who were hoping that McGowan's comments would succeed in whipping gay men back into line. One gay man observed that it was:

> .. not inaccurate to say that McGowan is using guilt and illogical appeals to our emotions in an attempt to chain gay men directly to our oppressors. Was that hyperbolic? Not in any way that even compares to what McGowan has said. Feminists are big on a story of oppression always being valid if someone feels oppressed, right? Well, I feel strongly that feminism has been oppressive to gay men, to all other men, to anyone with any masculine traits, and, in many ways, even to women (sometimes especially to women). Casual and accepted deference to feminism no longer works for me, and it shouldn't work for McGowan." [8]

A note to Rose McGowan: being informed by an alleged celebrity that, quite frankly, most gay men like me had never heard of, that she is "really upset" about our lack of enthusiasm for her bigoted, anti-male ideology that regards gay men as, at best, token lackeys who ought to be ashamed of our misogynistic 'rejection' of women, is not something that will interrupt my sleep any time soon. The fact that she assumes that it will, speaks more to her narcissism, her staggering sense of entitlement and the supremacist leanings of her chosen ideology than it does about the gay men she has publicly, and rather ironically, condemned as "delusional".

Public attacks like these have the benefit of alerting many gay men to the fact that feminism is one belligerent, foot-stomping Diva they would be well-advised to step as far away from as possible, and proceed to expose her true nature to the world at large. Feminism will just have to find some other BFF to fetch its morning lattes, because all except the most self-loathing gay man would choose to continue being its compliant doormat. Another more important benefit of such attacks is that they leave many gay men somewhat bewildered as to what exactly feminism has done for them. This is a rather important detail which feminists like McGowan and Arquette always leave suspiciously vague, if indeed, they ever get around to expanding on it at all.

[image]
From Everyday Feminism:
"The gay rights movement has won rights and recognition that largely serve the interests of white, wealthy cisgender gay men to the detriment of poor queers and queer people of color, and to the detriment of racial and economic justice more generally."

Like many gay men, the only thing I can discern that feminism has ever done for me is to commandeer my own human rights movement under the guise of a purported alliance, and using it as a vehicle to promote an anti-male hate movement hell-bent on undermining the rights and welfare of men and boys – a demographic that includes me – attempting to rope me into helping it to demonize my own masculine identity and, if that weren't enough, brainwashing the more suggestible of my gay brethren into accusing our straight brothers of being responsible for every problem and injustice the world has ever known.

By allowing themselves to be so publicly allied to such a blatantly corrupt and destructive ideology as feminism, the gay men of LGBT have sold themselves out. They have betrayed whatever egalitarian principles they may have once had by participating in organized feminism's relentless campaign to demonize, demoralize and criminalize straight men – especially those of the white, cis-gendered variety – in what has become a concerted global ritual of perpetual condemnation.

Call me a purist, but that is not something in which any credible human rights activist, organization or movement should be participating.

It is little wonder that as early as 1976, renowned gay rights activist, John Lauritson, was already lamenting the fact that feminists had bullied their way into the gay rights movement, effectively marginalizing the gay men within it, and turning the gay rights movement into what he called "the fag end of feminism." [9] John Lauriston ought to know because he was there when it happened. As a primary source for this phenomenon, it is imperative that his experiences and observations be presented in detail. Here is an excerpt from a speech he gave at the 4th Gay Academic Union Conference in the city of New York back in 1976:

> I remember a number of such [disruptions] in the early days of the Gay Liberation Front, in the fall of 1969. Women we had never seen before would come in and deliver tirades against the GLF men; they would say that not only were gay men more sexist or more male chauvinist than straight men, but men in GLF were among the worst of all. These charges were unfair and untrue [and] had a certain demoralizing effect. Some of the men felt that rather than acting against our oppressors… we should turn our attention inward to confront the enemy which was: Ourselves!"

At the first gay conference at Rutgers in 1970, the major panel on the last day was disrupted by a group of women who demanded that all proceedings come to a halt. They charged that the panel was "elitist" and "sexist" (although half of the panelists were women); their main ostensible grievance was that on a table in the hall, provided for leaflets and free literature, were copies of Gay newspaper, in which they had found a reproduction of a beautiful, lush, reclining female nude, painted in the style of classic romanticism. This, they charged, was designed to titillate men, and was degrading to women. Overlooked was the fact that the picture illustrated an article written by a lesbian.

The conference organizers were cruelly attacked, apparently for the sin of not having policed and censored the free literature table. It was a senseless, abusive, and thuggish disruption. For the most specious of reasons, a beautiful and mellow gay conference – one of the very first – had been turned into a nightmare.

One could go on and on. I imagine most of the people in this room [at the 4th Gay Academic Union Conference] have witnessed or read accounts of similar disruptions. There was the first international gay liberation conference in Edinburgh, where women discovered evidence of "sexism" and demanded that the conference change its focus from legislative reform to "confronting sexism".

Laws, they argued, only affected men, and therefore it was sexist to concentrate upon things like repealing sodomy statutes. A majority of the men went along with this demand, and that was the end of an internationally coordinated campaign to change the laws. It's amazing it should be considered trivial that after two millennia, homosexual men are still criminals.

A certain pattern emerges. The people in power do not like movements for social change. When such movements are in their infancy, they will try to destroy or divert them. When movements have grown large and viable, then they will try to render them innocuous through co-optation." [9]

Sounds familiar, doesn't it? Co-opting movements after they have already been set-up, organized and funded by others is a well-established feminist strategy. Feminists are parasites who are notorious for appropriating other people's issues and resources. [10] Neither are they shy about intimidating, labeling, censoring and threatening those who dare to object to their methods, their motives or the gaping logical, factual, ethical and moral flaws in their ideology. [11]

Lauritson's experiences will have a painfully familiar ring to the legendary domestic violence activist and researcher, Erin Pizzey, Editor at Large at A Voice for Men, because that is exactly what radical lesbian feminists did to the battered women's shelter movement that she established in Great Britain in 1971. This is how Erin Pizzey remembers the co-optation of the movement that she pioneered:

> I went to work in the Women's Liberation Work Shop in Newport Street, off Shaftesbury Avenue. I also attended the first women's conferences and I was struck by the hundreds and hundreds of women claiming to be radical militant lesbians. The first women's conferences were destroyed by violent fisticuffs between these women and most of us were very afraid of them. As far as I was concerned these women did not speak for my gay friends any more than the radical feminists spoke for all women in our country who were very happy at home with their husbands and their children.
>
> In reality, this was a very minor group of women who were only able to hurl abuse at heterosexual women and their families because they were white, middle class and had media jobs. Before very long they were employing each other and 'marginalizing' the men who tried to work alongside them. Men, intimidated by their brutal, violent behavior, moved on and out of many jobs. According to these women all women were victims of men's violent behavior, any attempt for men to fight back met with behind-scenes maneuvering and men LET IT HAPPEN." [12]

In fact, Ms Pizzey's evidence-based research was identified as such a threat to derailing what was to become one of feminism's most lucrative gravy trains – the Domestic Violence Industry – that they targeted her with terrorist threats that forced her to flee to The United States, and ensured that her findings could not be published in her own country for nearly a quarter of a century. [13] It deserves to be noted that, unlike gay men and her fellow domestic violence activists, Erin Pizzey fought back, and continues to do so well into her seventies – as a celebrated Men's Human Rights Activist.

Video game enthusiasts also fought back against an attempted ideological takeover by feminists, like Anita Sarkeesian, who aimed to impose strict feminist-approved standards and censorship upon their entire industry. [14] The only perceivable interest Sarkeesian seems to have ever had in video games are the opportunities they have provided for her to score the feminist trifecta of damseling for dollars, creating false threat narratives and supervising other people's pastimes.

This may explain why, despite failing to vanquish her Gamergate opponents, she still manages to look perpetually pleased with herself. Sarkeesian re-affirmed to feminists everywhere that posturing as perpetual victims continues to be extremely rewarding, even when they are openly denounced as a bunch of deceitful and avaricious busybodies. [15] Gamergate has inspired many by demonstrating that it is possible to unite in opposition to feminists who seek to impose their virulently crude and joyless ideology upon all aspects of life, even those as innocuous as personal hobbies.

It was a rude awakening for many feminists. Sadly, it wasn't rude enough to dissuade them from punishing the dissenting perspectives of The Honey Badgers, who dared to display a Gamergate poster in their booth at the 2015 Comic Expo in Calgary. [16]. The Honey Badgers included the graphic animation designer and prominent MHRA, Alison Tieman (a.k.a. Typhon Blue), and the celebrated anti-feminist videographer Karen Straughan (a.k.a. GirlWritesWhat).

Their ousting from the Comic Expo was, essentially, an intentionally brutal assault on Alison Tieman for daring to exercise her independent intellect and freedom of speech rights by expressing her well-supported rationale for rejecting feminism and its methods, despite being granted permission from the feminists in charge to do so. The lack of scruples displayed by the feminists in their treatment of Ms. Tieman and her associates only highlighted the validity of her position – and revealed that feminists could only respond to it by giving vent to their notoriously totalitarian instincts. The integrity of The Honey Badgers has also been an inspiration for many people hitherto fearful of incurring feminist displeasure.

It is interesting to note that Lauritson believes that one of the main reasons why feminists got away with co-opting the gay rights movement all those years ago, and have enjoyed virtual immunity from criticism for doing so, is because – like Erin Pizzey and her associates – most of the gay men were afraid of them. [9] In their defense, most men are afraid of feminists, and for good reason. Feminists routinely accuse men of misogyny for the most facile of reasons. These can include any alleged transgression from wearing a colourful shirt [17], pointing out the many positive attributes of men and masculinity [18], or simply organizing, supporting and participating in international conferences addressing men's issues. [19]

These accusations can destroy lives and careers, as Larry Summers discovered when he was forced to step down as president of Harvard University in 2005 for challenging feminist dogma by suggesting that men and women had innate differences. [20] "I just couldn't breathe because this kind of bias makes me physically ill," said strong, independent professor, Dr. Nancy Hopkins through her oxygen mask as she lay prostrate on what must be her very heavily-utilized fainting couch. "Let's not forget that people used to say that women couldn't drive an automobile," she added for no discernible reason. Feminist accusations of misogyny don't have to actually make any sense to achieve their desired results – they just have to be made.

> This is a 100% real motion at #nuswomen15 – could gay men please stop acting like black women pic.twitter.com/WOQNnS82Rj
>
> — Tim Stanley (@timothy_stanley) March 24, 2015

Feminists like to make examples of men like Larry Summers to serve as warnings to other men, and sometimes other women [16], simply because they can. It is an expression of tyrannical triumphalism of a powerful and well-connected political orthodoxy with the soul of an over-indulged child with a taste for retribution. Summers' fate was sealed when Hopkins stated that she found his comments "deeply concerning." [21] This is popular code-speak deployed by feminists to describe the thoughts and actions of any non-compliant person whom feminists would publicly hang from a butcher's hook if they thought they could possibly get away with it, which, metaphorically-speaking, is exactly what feminists did to Larry Summers.
For gay men, the most damaging result of the feminist takeover of the gay rights movement was the imposition of feminist theory onto how gay men should perceive and define themselves. It seems almost custom-designed to instill self-loathing and guilt. [22] In a nutshell, it is built on one achingly familiar reductionist feminist maxim: Lesbians Good, Gay Men Bad – very bad. I told you it was familiar. No-one has ever explained this fundamental feminist maxim with more damning eloquence than John Lauritson:

> According to this [feminist] ideology, lesbians are doubly oppressed – both as homosexuals and as women – where homosexual males are merely singly oppressed. Gay men still enjoy a "male privilege" because, according to a central dictum of radical feminism: ALL MEN BENEFIT FROM THE OPPRESSION OF ALL > WOMEN. So it would seem that gay men are not really so badly off, and perhaps it would be better if they did not devote their energies to repealing sodomy statutes and fighting discrimination, because these goals if realized would simply give them equality with straight men, thus objectively increasing the oppression of women. Instead, gay men should spend their time "dealing with sexism", which they acquired from having been born male and in learning how to "give up their male privilege".

>
> According to this ideology, the best thing that gay men can so is act as [the] "men's auxiliary" for women's liberation, taking their cues from feminists. And since men are the enemy, gay men should be willing to enlist as agents in the fight against males and against maleness." [9]

These are prophetic words indeed, especially in light of how the Canadian Association for Equality (CAFE) was treated by Gay Pride Toronto. [23] The feminists who obviously control this LGBT organization revoked CAFE's permission to march in the 2014 Toronto Pride parade the moment they got wind of the fact that CAFE is an organization focused on offering support to men in crisis.

Pride Toronto, an organization whose concerns supposedly include the rights and welfare of men who happen to be gay, bisexual and transgender, stood by silently and allowed feminists to do it. As gay men are no less likely to require support in times of crisis, there can be no more glaring evidence of feminists bullying gay men into acting against their own interests than this.

The gay men of Pride Toronto fell into lock-step formation behind the man-hating feminist bigots who obviously call the shots within their organization. Spinelessly acquiescing to feminist demands is nothing to be proud of, and exposes whatever claims its members like to make about standing for tolerance and equality as nothing more than a pretentious sham.

The fact that the organizers used CAFE's alleged but nonexistant affiliation with A Voice for Men – which they labeled as misogynistic on the grounds that it focuses on the rights and welfare of men and boys who are, get out the holy water, straight [24] – as their rationale for banning CAFE for all eternity from marching in their parade should have been shocking. Unfortunately, it wasn't.

As Lauritson chillingly predicted, feminists did indeed "enlist gay men as agents in the fight against males and maleness" – especially straight males. None of this has anything to do with gay rights, but everything to do with fulfilling feminist agendas which they have never been shy about expressing and promoting. It is always an added bonus for feminists if they can create division between men of different sexual orientations by manipulating us into adversarial positions and pitting us against each other. It works to everyone's advantage but our own.

One of the greatest threats to feminism is tolerance and understanding among men. It is even more of a perceived danger than tolerance and understanding between men and women. One of the reasons for feminists' rabidly negative response to A Voice for Men is that it provides opportunities for men to explore their shared experiences as men, creating a cohesive unity of purpose and mutual respect that feminists have always actively sought to undermine.

As Lauritson observed nearly forty years ago, feminists do not want gay men to achieve equality with straight men. Feminists prefer gay men, like women, to perceive themselves as perpetual victims, and to cast straight men as the villains who are responsible for everything they hate about their lives and the world they in which they live. Feminists even constructed an entire field of study called Queer Theory in order to provide gay men with their very own binary model of systemic oppression. Straight men get to be the bad guys all over again, only they are referred to as the 'Institution of Hetero-normativity' (no, really) rather than 'the Patriarchy'. There is no need to go too deeply into Queer Theory here – it's just feminism in a thong, only loopier. [22]

Perhaps the real purpose of creating Queer Theory was to divert the attention of gay men away from feminist rhetoric in the hope that they wouldn't notice the staggering homophobia of feminism's most prominent and influential theorists. When gay men identify as feminists, you can be certain that they have never read much feminist theory, because if they had, they would never embrace an ideology that relentlessly denigrates them in a manner that would make a placard-wielding Westboro Baptist homophobe cringe. [25]

The feminist take on gay men ranks as among the most offensive, deranged and spectacularly stupid of all feminist theories. The most important take-away for gay men who read it is that there is no counter-theory from prominent feminists that refutes any of the relentlessly hateful drivel that has been offered by the vanguards of feminism over the past five decades – and it is much too late to for them to attempt to do so now. They cannot hide it, deny it or justify why none of them have ever even tried to defend the gay men at whom they feel entitled to wag censorious fingers for failing to be sufficiently dutiful allies.

In Part 3 of Why Gay Men Don't Need Feminism, we shall examine what prominent and influential feminists really think about gay men. Suffice to say that it is not very complimentary, or a particularly big secret – except perhaps to the gay men of Gay Pride Toronto, who may want to rethink allowing feminists to continue poisoning their ranks, providing, of course, that they ever get around to reading it. Part 3 is appropriately entitled, Gay Bashing.

References:

[1] http://lgbt.wikia.com/wiki/Lavender_Menace
[2] http://thevarsity.ca/2015/06/27/cafe-banned-from-pride-toronto/
[3] http://www.usatoday.com/story/life/movies/2015/02/24/patricia-arquette-chided-on-backstage-oscar-remarks/23937935/
[4] http://thegrio.com/2015/02/23/patricia-arquette-blacks-gays-white-women/
[5] http://www.mgtow.com/shaming-tactics/
[6] http://www.independent.co.uk/news/people/rose-mcgowan-attacks-lgbt-community-for-failing-to-campaign-for-feminism-gay-men-are-more-misogynistic-than-straight-men-9841873.html
[7] http://www.independent.co.uk/voices/comment/rose-mcgowan-and-bret-easton-ellis-need-to-realise-that-there-is-no-such-thing-as-the-gay-community-9846171.html
[8] https://mansplainingcentral.wordpress.com/tag/homophobia/
[9] http://paganpressbooks.com/jpl/DTF.HTM
[10] http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/welcome-to-the-second-wave/
[11] http://human-stupidity.com/stupid-dogma/mens-rights-feminism/violence-feminists-threaten-mens-rights-conference-in-detroit
[12] http://www.fathersforlife.org/pizzey/how_women_were_taught_to_hate_men.htm
[13] http://triggeralert.blogspot.hk/2014/06/feminist-death-threats-anti-equality.html
[14] http://rationalwiki.org/wiki/Talk:Gamergate
[15] http://www.avoiceformen.com/featured/who-is-harassing-anita-sarkeesian/
[16] https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=tVTZdq0GjNE
[17] http://time.com/3589392/comet-shirt-storm/
[18] http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/stand-up-for-your-manhood-peter-lloyd-interview/
[19] http://socialistworker.org/2014/06/12/bigots-not-welcome-in-detroit
[20] http://www.theatlantic.com/magazine/archive/2005/02/why-feminist-careerists-neutered-larry-summers/303795/
[21] http://www.theatlantic.com/magazine/archive/2005/02/why-feminist-careerists-neutered-larry-summers/303795/
[22] http://www.critical-theory.com/what-the-fuck-is-queer-theory/
[23]

http://news.nationalpost.com/full-comment/barbara-kay-at-pride-toronto-militant-feminist-dogma-trumped-rights [24]
http://rabble.ca/blogs/bloggers/michael-laxer/2014/01/voice-mens-new-canadian-misogynist-campaign-cafe-and-ryerson-un [25] http://www.anomicobserver.com/homophobic-profits-westboro-baptist-church/

Brittney Cooper's never met a prominent Black man she didn't hate – and it's all Daddy's fault

Mumia Ali · 16 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

> "Happy now, bitch?"
> -Bunk Moreland, "The Wire"

With the feeding frenzy at a fevered pitch in the wake of the Associated Press publishing a 2005 civil court deposition giving an admission on the part of Bill Cosby that he purchased Quualudes, a controlled – and illegal – substance, and gave them to women he was intending to have sex with, I knew it would not be long before Brittney Cooper – the self-styled "Professor Crunk – would be along to extract her pound of flesh from Cosby's carcass. Her Thu, Jul 9, 2015 column at Salon.com, entitled "Black America's Bill Cosby nightmare: Why it's so painful to abandon the lies that he told" didn't disappoint. While the article itself reads like a sad lament of what could have been, Cooper's crocodile tears belies a seething hatred not just of one of Black America's leading lights for the past half-century, but of other prominent Black men as well.

Let's count the ways, shall we?

The High-Tech Lynching Of William H. Cosby

Of course, since Mr. Cosby is on the hotseat, we'll begin the accounting here. As mentioned above, this isn't the first time that Cooper has written an venom-drenched attack piece on him; back in the fall of last year, Cooper wrote a column once again at Salon called "We must abandon Bill Cosby: A broken trust with women, black America", where her principle argument then and now, is that "respectability politics" – a four-letter word as far as Cooper is concerned – is the root of all evil, in Cosby personified. Cooper believes that the politics of respectability has been an outright failure, a sham that protects Black male faces in high places, who do and say one thing in public, and act a quite different way in private – and therefore, it is better for all of us, that we throw out the Black patriarchal baby out with the white patriarchal bath water that infected it, and replace it with alternative notions and models of family life – one filled with gay and lesbian parents, and of course, single mothers. Given the sheer ferocity with which she writes and speaks about Cosby and other Black male figures, it's hard to get away from the idea that this is more than a sterile exercise in "social justice", and more an attempt to contend with inner demons.

And indeed, in the aforementioned article, Cooper comes clean with the source of her misandrinoir:

> "Frankly, I think it is high time that these violent crimes begin to cost men something. And that might mean that it has to cost those of us who love them something as well. I have shared in these pages before that I do not romanticize patriarchal families because I did not grow up in one. My father was a complicated, brilliant, hilarious and violent man, and my home life and childhood were infinitely better after he left our home. His leaving and his alcoholism cost me a father. But it saved me a mother."

Instead of examining the internal dynamics that are always at play between husband and wife (to say nothing of the role the latter just might have played in the grand drama), or considered, seriously, seeking much-needed therapy for the psychological scarring she incurred in what had to be a highly dysfunctional early home environment, Cooper, like so many Black feminists of the age, have taken to their perches in the mainstream media to act as their couches and their readers as their sounding boards. Meanwhile, Black men like Cosby, act as stand-ins for the Black daddy they either did not have or would not stand up to.

Throwing A Conscious Rapper Under The Bus

As noted above, the current bee in Cooper's bonnet with regard to Cosby is by no means unique; a little over two years ago, on the heels of another rape controversy – this time involving rapper Rick Ross – Cooper went out of her way to shoot down conscious rap fixture Talib Kweli with a bit of friendly fire instead:

> "Many folks have aptly broken down all that is wrong with Rick Ross' faux-pology, his misunderstanding of rape culture and consent, and what he and others in the culture owe to Black women.
>
> I am more interested in the quintessential case of #allyfail that was Talib Kweli's participation in this conversation. On Monday, in a conversation at Huffington Post Live with host Marc Lamont Hill, and guests Rosa Clemente, Jamilah Lemieux, and Rahiel Tesfamariam, Talib went in on Rosa for suggesting that she didn't consider Ross a part of Hip Hop culture.
>
> She argued that her view represented a radical edge of thinking about Hip Hop culture, which attempts to separate what she referred to as the "rap industrial complex" from the broader culture. She also fully acknowledged the extent to which folks would disagree with her perspective. I think her critique and perspective is a valid one, meaning that while I'm not sure if I agree, her argument is worthy of debate and dialogue.
>
> But what Talib offered wasn't dialogue. Instead, he attempted to dress Rosa down for even having such a perspective. And then he dictated to her what her perspective should be and told her that ultimately, it didn't matter what her view was, "Rick Ross and Wayne are a part of the culture whether you like it or not."
>
> Do women not get to draw boundaries? Do women not get a say in determining the cultural environs of hip hop?"

Certainly, Prof. Cooper – women like, oh say, Lauryn Hill, or MC Lyte; Nikki Minaj or Jean Grae, most definitely have a say in determining the cultural environs of Hip Hop.

But Black (and Latina) feminists like Rosa Clemente, or Jamilah Lemieux, or indeed yourself – who've never made so much as a demo or mixtape, let alone recorded albums, gone on tour or sold records? No – you really don't get to determine who is and who is not, a part of the Hip Hop-making machine. As Kweli rightly pointed out to Clemente, he may not like what Ross says or does, but he is a part of Hip Hop whether Clemente (or you) likes it or not – and – that Clemente's approach is fundamentally ill-suited to address the situation – that of getting Ross to see the light with regard to his "put a molly all in her champagne" lyrics in his song.

Just like that, Cooper turned on a dime and went from Rick Ross with his date rape-drenched single, to Kweli's cardinal sin of not towing the party line that is demanded of anyone who deigns themselves to be an "ally" of the Black feminist crowd (and in so doing, belies her current handwringing with regard to Cosby's alleged charges of rape and sexual assault); this, despite the fact that Kweli has literally spent a career crafting positive songs that depicted Black women especially, in a positive, uplifting light. Cooper could have simply disagreed with Kweli and kept the focus where it belonged – on Ross – but she chose to spend much of the rest of 2013 taking digs at Kweli via her social media (and especially Twitter) every chance she could get. Hey, not only is it good for ratings, Ross' rough-and-tumble thuggery falls right in line with the "ratchet politics" that Cooper espouses – and that Black women themselves truly desire, as comedian and astute social observer/critic Chris Rock noted in a standup comedy special a few years back.

No Good Deed Goes Unpunished: Barack Obama, 44th POTUS

Not to be outdone, the next Big Black Man on Cooper's hit list was none other that the President of the United States, Barack Obama himself. Writing once again from her perch at Salon, Cooper acknowledges that MBK, as it has become known, is a real and much-needed thing, despite her tepid feelings about it:

> "I am ambivalent about My Brother's Keeper. Yes, by almost every social measure, African-American men, and boys in particular, fall behind at alarming rates. They are suspended from school the most, incarcerated the most, have the highest rates of unemployment, commit disproportionate amounts of violent crime, and have > some of the lowest high school and college graduation rates. Frequently their encounters with law enforcement and white male authority figures end with black men dead."

Yet, she simply cannot help herself from once again, derailing the topic onto her own narrow self-interests:

> "According to the African American Policy Forum, black girls are suspended at a higher rate than all other girls and white and Latino boys. Sixty-seven percent of black girls reported feelings of sadness or hopelessness for more than two weeks straight compared to 31 percent of white girls and 40 percent of Latinas. Single black women have the lowest net wealth of any group, with research showing a median wealth of $100. Single black men by contrast have an average net wealth of $7,900 and single white women have an average net wealth of $41,500. Fifty-five percent of black women (and black men) have never been married, compared to 34 percent for white women.
>
> This situation is dire at every level. But perhaps the most troubling thing of all: The report indicates that while over 100 million philanthropic dollars have been spent in the last decade creating mentoring and educational initiatives for black and brown boys, less than a million dollars has been given to the study of black and brown girls!"

Here's the thing though, Prof. Cooper – as Roland Martin has so rightly noted, not only has President Obama saw to it that women and girls – which does indeed include Black women and girls – have a seat at the table to have their voices heard and their concerns addressed, with the creation of the White House Office of Women & Girls, only months into Obama's presidency – but Obama has been a staunch ally of women in general, most notably in the form of the very first bill he signed into law with the Lilly Ledbetter Fair Pay Act of 2009, and of course his signature legislative achievement with the passage of Obamacare, with its strong focus on womens' healthcare. Put this together with the fact that Black women also enjoy educational and career success that is at or near the tops of anyone in American life, along with longitudinal health studies like the Black Womens' Health Study out of Boston University (there is no Black male equivalent), and it becomes difficult how you, more than 1,000 Black women and yes, some 200 Black men, can see a fledgling, largely unfunded de facto charity that really won't be operational until after Obama leaves office anyway, is some kind of impediment to Black female wellbeing or that it crowds out the Black female experience.

Nevertheless, Cooper demands, toward the end of her spiel, "who will lift us?" – if you take a look at Cooper, to ask the question, is to answer it.

Brittney Cooper: The Imperfect Heroine?

That brings us to the present day, more than two years after Cooper's made her bones by going after any Black man with a name and who dares to Do The Right Thing – and with Cosby's brand going down in flames, with Kweli and Obama's own brands rather anemic in the wake of their Brittney Cooper-fueled kerfuffles, one simply has to ask: now that Cooper has gotten her pound of flesh from these Black men, who will step into the gap to take their places? Will it be Cooper herself?

I mean, will Cooper stump for HBCUs and raise tens of millions of dollars, like Cosby did? As a Howard U grad, she has directly benefitted from Cosby's tireless advocacy, hard work and largesse. Will Cooper become a dazzling rap star, doing what she feels Kweli has failed to do, showing him and the rest of the Hip Hop Patriarchy, how to do this, son? Perhaps Cooper will run for public office and join the state and/or federal legislatures, and craft laws that will be (even more) amenable to Black women and girls, proving that Obama was wrong, wrong, wrong about MBK?

The evidence, as best we have it, says "not likely." Despite garnering a lot of attention and hype over the past few years, Cooper hasn't lived up to anywhere near the buzz she's been able to generate. An associate professor in a fuzzy field ("Womens & Gender Studies; Africana Studies at Rutgers) who's been working on her first book since forever, Cooper's biggest claim to fame, outside of her penchant for running down any prominent Black man who dares to disagree with her or the Sistahood, has been to be a columnist at a decidedly left of center website, co-founder of a Black feminist blogsite and lower-tier media personality with infrequent appearances on left-leaning stations like MSNBC. Her scholarship in terms of output is weak at best (she's written more as a columnist at Salon than in her position as an academic in the Ebony Tower; compare her to Cornel West, Michael Eric Dyson, Thomas Sowell, Nell Painter, John Mcwhorter or Mary Pattillo) and unlike the late great Christopher Hitchens, has never engaged in any debates with well known and respected scholars, intellectuals and academics (Hitchens' debates with conservative Dinesh D'Souza, come to mind), live or taped. All of this, along with her insistence on a "dumbing deviancy down" ethos for one and all, suggests that the world without Cosby, Obama and Kweli, will be one that is that much worse off, especially if the likes of Brittney Cooper are at the helm.

Cosby, Obama and Kweli are in the twilight of their respective careers, and to be sure, none of them are perfect or saints. Nevertheless, each of them have left a legacy and a lifetime of real achievement and accomplishment that Cooper can only dream of.

Which is another reason as to why she hates on them so very much.

Recommended Reading: Brittney Cooper's Very Personal Political Problems

A male-centered approach to disability – Part 1: Supercrip

Peter Wright · 16 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

A male-centered approach to disability – Part 1
A male-centered approach to disability – Part 2
A male-centered approach to disability – Part 3

Throughout history men with disabilities have reached the heights of human achievement in personal and cultural terms, and they did so without the help of social justice warriors or modern reforms to laws, community access, or improved social attitudes toward disability.

Think of the presidents, artists, scientists, blade runners and the Everest-scaling amputees who reached for greatness, along with their less visible counterparts who went about their daily lives in less grandiose but nevertheless competent ways while living with a disability.

Disability always poses limitations on a person's physical or mental abilities, but the disability never encompasses the entire person – there remain competencies that deserve equal recognition in the mix.

Said differently a person is never completely disabled, just as there is no such thing as a person without a disability, however mild; eg. asthma, eczema, or gluten allergy can likewise interfere with daily functioning, forcing you to buy special creams and soaps or having to skip lunch with friends because you can't eat the food at that restaurant.

A study of high achievers illustrates the point of competency existing alongside disability. Franklin D. Roosevelt had post-polio paralysis, Ray Charles was blind, Christopher Reeve had a spinal injury, George Washington had dyslexia, Ludwig van Beethoven went deaf, Albert Einstein had Aspergers, Leonardo Da Vinci was epileptic, and the cosmologist Stephen Hawking has advanced motor neurone disease. Yet all of these men reached the top of their fields of interest.

Admiration of such men is today frowned upon by social justice warriors (SJWs) who believe the achievements misrepresent the common man with a disability and lead him to feel inferior by comparison. Referred to disparagingly as "supercrips" (super cripples), SJWs disparage high achievers as tall poppies who disrupt the level playing field, traitors who promote ableism instead of accepting their lot as sufferers without talents or abilities.

In a more reasonable use of the term, supercrip is sometimes employed as a reference to fanciful caricatures; eg. exaggerated claims about men on the autism spectrum as genius savants; or that the deaf have the sight of an eagle; or that the blind possess sonic radar abilities like dolphins or bats that help them move around the physical environment. There is no doubt, however, that the supercrip slur is also aimed at men with disabilities who genuinely achieved great things, but who are perceived as succeeding due to an unfair degree of male privilege.

Sound familiar? Most would have heard this criticism before, after 50 years of feminism's attempts to tear down every man who has had the drive and discipline to reach the top of his field. Even our disabled heroes are not spared by feminists who refer to them as 'privileged by patriarchy' and thus less handicapped than disabled women:

> "It will be argued in this paper that disability is a more severely handicapping condition for women than for men… [men] are relatively advantaged in that they can observe and may aspire to the advantaged place of males in today's society. Women with disabilities are perceived as inadequate to fulfill either the economically productive roles traditionally considered appropriate for males.
>
> "In research conducted by Mauer disabled females were more likely than disabled males to identify with a disabled storybook character; the disabled males were more likely to identify with the able-bodied character (1979). Disabled men may have a choice between a role of advantage (male) and a role of disadvantage (disability). Their decision is frequently a strategic identification with males.[1]

Feminist scholars refer to this as a 'double disadvantage' experienced by disabled women because they suffer from both disability and sexism, while their male counterparts are presumably being served up with caviar in their patriarchally privileged, gold-plated wheelchairs. Referring to the intersectional model, many feminists would go further and talk of multiple disadvantages such as triple, quadruple, or quintuple handicaps as would be the case for a black, transgendered, albino woman with a disability….. but I digress.

Indeed, a survey of feminist-inspired literature reveals a disturbing emphasis on what is lacking in comparison to what is good in the lives of disabled individuals, with that fixation coming at the expense of recognizing the multiple competencies or abilities that disabled individuals might possess. Moreover, the practice of gender stereotyping obscures the uniqueness of the individual, as underscored by sociologist Tom Shakespeare who states, "Disabled people's gender identity is more complex and more varied than this stereotypical view indicates. Some women feel liberated from social expectation as a result of impairment; some men feel doubly inferior."[2]

Sgt. Jerrod Fields, a U.S. Army World Class Athlete

The double-disadvantage meme has led to the widespread view that disabled men gain privilege at women's expense, an advantage apparently in need of restricting in order to give disabled women a head start. In order to bring women forward we are led to believe we must push men back and downplay their extraordinary achievements.

Ridding the world of tall poppies, however, results in having no one to look up to. It forces us to lower our vision to a mean-average of attainment where social justice warriors seem bent on placing us – including those with disabilities. Some of us may be content with day-to-day existing and are not interested in pushing our personal limits, but there are others who want more. By honoring the achievements of exceptional people we understand a greater range of possibility, and can set our goals as high as we choose.

References

[1] Michelle Fine, 'Disabled women: Sexism Without the Pedestal' Journal of Sociology and Social Welfare (1977)
[2] Tom Shakespeare, 'When is a man not a man? When he's disabled,' in Working with Men for Change, p.49 (1999)

Feature image of Stephen Hawking by Lwp Kommunikáció

Eddie Baller interviews Paul (video)

AVfM Video Source · 17 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Please sub to Eddie here.

Part 1

Part 2

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=E_rumW9Er6k

Why MRAs attack feminism

Karen Straughan (aka GirlWritesWhat) · 18 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Okay. I'm going to explain to you why MRAs attack feminism:

Back in the 1970s and 1980s, just as domestic violence was being brought to public awareness in the UK, there were two schools of thought.

1) DV is primarily a generational issue of learned violence with multiple contributing factors. Children grow up in violent households and learn that conflict resolution through violence is normal. Other contributing factors include but are not limited to alcohol and drug abuse, poverty, external stressors (such as losing a job), personality disorders and mental illness. Both men and women can be batterers, and are at roughly equal rates. This was the school of thought embraced by Erin Pizzey, a woman who grew up with two violent and abusive parents, and who went on to open the world's first battered women's shelter (Chiswick Women's Aid) in 1971. She formed her point of view both from her experiences with two violent parents, and her experiences in the shelter, where 60% of the women she helped were as violent as, or more violent than, the men they were fleeing, and who were often violent with other female residents and their children. Initial gender-neutral studies coming out in the late 1970s and early 1980s, and hundreds of much more thorough ones over the past 30 years, have confirmed her hypotheses.

2) DV is primarily a problem of patriarchal masculinity. Men are trained by culture norms to see women as sub-human subordinates, and to enforce male dominance over women and children through family violence and terrorization. This hypothesis of "patriarchal terrorism" is called "the Duluth Model", and at best, it represents the smallest minority of cases, with "matriarchal terrorism" being up to two times as prevalent, and "common couple violence" (typically reciprocal and temporary) representing roughly half of all cases. Strangely enough, it is the most widely used model in the world. It is the model that Refuge (the feminist charity that essentially hijacked Chiswick Women's Aid) uses. It's the model that is used to train law enforcement, social workers, guardians ad litem and judges. It is the model that the US Violence Against Women Act is based on, as well as DV legislation in the UK, Canada and pretty much every other Western country. It has informed nearly every public awareness campaign for 4 decades. It's fully entrenched in law and policy, to the point where at least half of all jurisdictions employ "predominant aggressor policies" that use gender profiling rather than fact finding in arrest procedures, and in the US, VAWA funding is denied to agencies that so much as allow couples counselling for marginal cases.

Model (2), the Duluth Model, is the feminist model. It is based entirely on "patriarchy theory" and feminist notions of gender power relations. It has been described as a "data-impervious paradigm" by researchers. It applies a single, ideologically poisoned "cure" to a multifaceted problem, "treating" people for diseases they don't have, while leaving their actual problems to fester.

Now, as an MRA, I would like to see male victims of domestic violence receive the same care and assistance that female victims do. I would like to see cases of common couple violence (remember, typically reciprocal and temporary) be treated through counselling, rather than enforced permanent family separation. I would like to see men with children have better options than 1) risk a kidnapping charge, 2) leave the kids alone with a violent woman, or 3) stay and swallow the abuse. I would like to see men who call police for help have a better chance of being helped than arrested, instead of the other way around like it is now.

So. You tell me. How do I make all these things happen without attacking feminism? You know, the ideology that applied "patriarchy theory" to domestic violence, came up with the Duluth Model, wrote it into law and policy, and jealously guard it from criticism? How do I convince lawmakers and bureaucrats and directors of agencies to abandon a model built upon the ideologies of feminism without ever mentioning feminism? Without ever uttering the words, "feminists got it wrong"?

Moreover, given the scads of evidence that DV is not significantly gendered, why SHOULD I avoid attacking feminism? In light of this evidence, feminism's clinging to Duluth is an unjustifiable slandering of men, masculinity and traditional norms.

I once gave an example in a video:

Society believes that black people were particularly prone to a certain kind of crime. Whether it is cultural or biological, this practice which only blacks engage in justifies treating them differently.

What happens when society finds out that blacks and whites commit this crime at roughly the same rates? That blackness and propensity for this crime are not connected in any way?

If society was feminists, and blacks were men, they would scream ever louder that blacks are the primary offenders and that other races almost never commit such crimes, that the crime itself stems from "toxic, hegemonic blackness", they would ignore the evidence, suppress the evidence, intimidate or shun researchers who produce the evidence, engage in threats of violence against researchers who publish the evidence, and continue their attempts to entrench their view of blackness being integral to said crime into legislation and policy.

When Erin Pizzey first began talking publicly about violent women and the true nature of domestic violence, she was protested by feminists. Picketed by feminists. Threatened by feminists. Her charity was subject to a hostile takeover by feminists. She had to have a police escort everywhere she went, and was instructed to have all her mail redirected to the bomb unit. When her family dog was shot, she fled the UK and lived in hiding in the US for 10 years.

All of that was the result of feminists practicing feminism, EoT. Pizzey was a heretic speaking inconvenient truths, the most inconvenient one being that women can be just as shitty, brutal, violent and abusive as men can within their family relationships.

What does it say about feminism's attitude toward men that the mere assertion that men are no more flawed than women are, that men are no more prone to sub-human, beastly behavior than women are, that men are NOT uniquely monstrous compared to women, could provoke a campaign of abuse and threats that left a philanthropic woman living in exile out of fear for her life, and those of her children and grandchildren? What does it say about feminist theories that terrorism, malfeasance and denial of evidence is required to protect and preserve them? What does it say about feminists that even when they are shown the evidence, they maintain their belief that the earth is 6000 years old, and redouble their commitment to write that belief into law and policy? Because, you know, if they acknowledged the evidence that the earth is not 6000 years old, they might have to question their belief in the rest of the scripture, and we can't have that, can we? If domestic violence isn't "patriarchal terrorism", then maybe the "patriarchy theory" they used to construct the model isn't all it's cracked up to be, right?

As far as I'm concerned, you can call yourself a feminist. No skin off my nose. But if you think that MRAs can make one ounce of difference for marginalized and victimized men without criticizing and dismantling feminism and its pet theories, I would implore you to point out an alternative.

How do we get Duluth out of our legislation and policy without saying, "feminists got it wrong"? How do we prove they got it wrong without pointing out how they've suppressed decades of evidence of female intimate partner violence, both by failing to acknowledge it in their own research, and intimidating and blacklisting researchers who do publish data on it? How do we keep that guy out of jail when he calls police without questioning the feminist assumptions upon which arrest policies have been formed? And how do we get our message out without antagonizing feminists when it is the message itself that antagonizes them?

You tell me, EoT. I can wait. We've already been waiting for 4 decades, after all.

I would guess that the "sunken cost fallacy", and "when in doubt, shout"-esque belief perseverance play huge roles in their desperation to cling to these models. Many feminists have made entire careers, pots of cash and became highly respected, high-status individuals developing and promoting "theories" that are essentially garbage. It's got to be difficult to consider that it's all based on bullshit. As well, these "theories" are internalized by adherents into an aspect of their personal ("I'm a feminist") identity as just and moral persons. Abandoning them must be very difficult.

And for people who believe they are doing the right thing, and who use their activism to bolster their sense of themselves as good, moral, just people, to acknowledge that they had it wrong all along is to acknowledge that they have, directly, or indirectly, perpetrated inconceivable harm on others. It is likely much more difficult for a doctor who has performed 1000s of circumcisions than it is for a lay person to accept evidence that the practice perpetrates a net harm, because such an admission necessarily means that he himself has perpetrated harm on 1000s of helpless babies. Perhaps it is psychologically easier to maintain the illusion that the practice is beneficial. It certainly must be easier to sleep at night believing you've spent decades helping babies rather than harming them. Just as it must make it easier for a feminist to sleep at night if she clings ever harder to her belief that only men abuse their partners when she is told men are more likely to be arrested than helped when they call police. To admit her belief is false is to admit that she has supported the arrests of innumerable innocent men, and the enabling of innumerable violent women.

Even for those (mostly younger) feminists who do not zealously guard the Duluth Model out of cognitive dissonance, their own sunken costs, or personal identity issues, and who can and do acknowledge the reality of the domestic violence problem… well, this is all fine and dandy, and ultimately, useless. Who cares what Joe feminist Sixpack or Jane feminist Appletini think? Duluth is entrenched. It's written into law, policy, training materials and public awareness efforts. Old school feminists, like those who booted Erin Pizzey from her charity and chased her out of her own country over ideological differences, have a stranglehold on what has become a multi-billion dollar, government funded industry.

Different laws and policies cannot be implemented without throwing out the old ones. Throwing out the old ones can't happen without effectively debunking the Duluth Model. If the Duluth Model is feminist theory, based on feminism's grand, unifying theory of "the patriarchy", then that means debunking feminist theory, in whole or in part. There's no way to do that without ever criticizing feminism.

Even if there were no feminists standing in our way, screaming "MISOGYNIST!" at anyone who questions Duluth, and blocking attempts to bring attention to the real nature of domestic violence, which there ARE… the crux of the matter is that Duluth is a feminist model, based on broader and more encompassing feminist theories that attempt to explain the nature of sexual relations in society in their entirety. There's simply no way to explain that Duluth is bunk without explaining WHY it's bunk, and there's no way to do that without subjecting feminist ideas to vigorous scrutiny and challenge.

What people like EoT are demanding is that Galileo should have promoted the heliocentric model without ever criticizing the deeply entrenched, state and church sanctioned belief that the sun revolves around the earth. Without ever saying, "the vatican has it wrong," or "this belief in a geocentric system is based on false, dogmatic thinking on the part of religious leaders" or "the church is wrong-headed and irresponsible in its doctrines and teachings."

Would you have asked that of him? To never say, "the vatican is full of shit when it comes to geocentrism" when promoting the truth of heliocentrism? How on earth do you think he was supposed to say, "my idea is correct" without ever uttering the words, "and their idea is wrong"?

The Fiamengo File – Episode 1 The Anti-Feminist

AVfM Video Source · 18 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Janice Fiamengo has been shouted down by feminists. Now she's fighting back.

I Rape

Anonymous Contributor · 19 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I'm searching for prey. I am a hunter by nature. And while consuming the young, the weak, the lost, is "wrong", it's a wrongness that fuels my desire. To know that if I were to be detected, I would be the one hunted, adds to my enjoyment. My true nature is known to no one but my fellow hunters. I make my victims thank me for feeding upon them. The ones that don't, I twist them with fear. They re-enter life different, shamed, deprived of the freedom to speak. They may never see me again, but I still control their every move and thought.

I am experienced. With each preparation, I breathlessly watch and wait. I observe a sea of potential victims every day. I have honed a sixth sense, a sexual radar. It wasn't always this way, in the years and months I spent developing my craft. But today, I see beneath my victims' exteriors. Inside crowded rooms, my prey is easy to identify. I watch from a distance and observe how they speak to others. I note every body movement, understanding its language with practiced fluency.

I prefer someone who appears sweet, clean, and virginal. I'm not usually interested in heavier or larger targets. I like small, short, or slim types, the ones who are looking for a little care. My favorite sort is the inexperienced bookworm. With the right preparation, my choice prey will smile into my face, and be consumed.

I can see what other people cannot. Every time, I notice something in the eyes. It triggers a sensation inside me within a micro-second. I feel a flutter deep inside of me when I glimpse their spirit. A gentle soul will make my pulse throb. I can sense a true child spirit, one which obeys mother, fears father. Better yet, one who grew up fatherless, like me. My mouth waters as I sense a pliant will, like a draft in the room. Might this one become frightened or fight back? That excites me more. Does it obey authority? When I sense a resolve that is weaker than mine, I'm attracted. I feel my fingers ache and tingle.

Sometimes I'm in the school lunch room, library, or walking the halls. Occasionally, I sit with a couple friends, and we furtively scan the room while talking about benign matters. When my friends and I prowl together, we know the secret rules to setting the trap – how to humiliate, to isolate, to become the only remaining lifeline to the rest of the pack. We work as a team. Each of us knows what to say and do around our collective target. Our teamwork is stealthy and intuitive. Tactics unfurl unspoken, but flawless, like a pack of lions. We are soundless mongrels, chasing down an invisible trail. We excel at our craft.

But mostly I hunt on my own. When I find my target, I wait. At the right moment I flash a smile. My social skills are unsurpassed. No one detects my hunger. I don't frighten my target or anyone else around. I remain pleasant and aloof. My attitude is one of benevolence. But I know how to send forth a laser beam of animal energy, straight into their loins.

I am a master of this game. No one has any idea that I'm a panther in heat. My prey doesn't even know that I am psychically caressing their flanks. Should they blush or appear vulnerable, my interest peaks and my heart races. That's when I feel the dark craving swell and deepen within my gut. It's a starvation, a growling for fresh meat, a bloodlust. Even among my friends, no one knows the extent of this hunger. I disguise it with a mask of friendship and, most of all, charm. This is the kind of challenge that I relish. Every vulnerable movement my prey makes, every weakness betrayed, I am further empowered. When they appear like a wounded fawn in a trap, I move in. I always know the next step to take.

This one I've been watching. I smile. Nervous eyes catch mine. I wait, and finally, when no one else is around, I move closer and speak. "Hi."

"Hello," he replies.

I let his uncertain movements and feelings fuel my appetite. I know he can feel my soul pressing up against his own, but he doesn't know what to make of it. My nerves quiver. "You know, you're one of the very best students in my class."

"Thank you, Mrs. Johnson. I like history," Eduardo says, as his shoulders curl forward.

I like his boyish ways. They're romantic. I am a 33 years old, more than 15 years older than him. "You're smart. Do you have a girlfriend?"

His eyes dart away, but I detect a furtive smile. I adore him, as I smile down and again meet his gaze. His chin drops to his chest, and his face flushes. "Not really."

My chest thrums. His shame is exposed. I feel sorrow and strength. His vulnerability and cautious trust tells me to take my time. He's inexperienced, but I'm sure he likes the attention. I hold my gaze at his crotch. Warmth spreads through my body. I look into his eyes and smile. "That's okay. You want one, don't you?"

I hold my breath. He's cute, and I feel myself liking him more and more each moment.

"Well, I think about that a lot." He smiles.

I exhale. "Ha ha ha. That's good, don't you think?" I wink at him. He melts. I thrive at this response. I own the power.

"Yeah."

"Anytime you need to talk, I'm here. We can talk about anything, okay?"

"Thanks."

"Visit if you have something on your mind."

I think my trap has sprung, and I feel him in my clutches.

"Okay, see you later," he says, leaving the room with a little wave.

The next week, he hangs around in the hall after school. I see him and beckon him over. My classroom is empty, and he enters without hesitation. "Eduardo! How was your day?"

"Good." I notice the leftover accent from a mother tongue learned from immigrant parents.

"Are you having problems?"

"Umm." He cocks his head to one side. A boy like this slips beneath many people's notice. His skin, the color of his hair, his clothes probably inherited from an older sibling or two, nothing escapes my notice. But no one else notices. No one is watching this boy.

"Why don't you close the door and come here. Did you want to talk?"

My stomach whirrs. Without any words, he shuts the door and moves closer to me. I scoot aside in case someone else should walk in. He stands close as I sit and look at him eye to eye.

I lay my hand on his thigh – a comfort, a seduction. "What is it? Can I help you?"

He bites his lip. "Well, I'm afraid of women."

A taboo! And so soon! I allow him to confide in me, to speak words unspoken to any other person. I learn the important details. His parents speak only Spanish, the old country language he is starting to forget. He can't ask for help from them in the language of his few peers here at school. But here, his race, his poverty, his sexual ignorance, all serve to drive him farther from his peers. He can't make a friend, let alone a girlfriend. I let myself fill a void. I let him need me.

After three such afternoon meetings, I am overwhelmed by his presence, his scent, which I would now know anywhere, so close.

“Maybe I can help teach you?”

Eduardo smiles. “But I’m 15.”

“Age is just a number.”

This maneuver takes planning and execution. But now that I am here, I am fully alive. I know other teachers do this, too. I know some of them by name. For every single male teacher loving a female student, there is another female making a man of her pupil. Today, I move my head over the top of his in our first deep embrace and slowly inhale his fragrance. Up close, I feel his naïve manliness. I’m entranced by my man-boy.

Within another week, I take full advantage of him in my locked classroom after school. This first time, I take the lead. I’m careful, strong but encouraging. Soon his neck tendons stiffen, veins bulge, and eyes turn unfocused. This expression when he climaxes is everything. It is all I need. I will remember it forever. The sensation of having conquered washes over me. It’s like the moments when I achieved my life’s greatest victories. This is as good or better than when I graduated from college, the day I got married, and when I gave birth to my own son.

This first time with Eduardo is far better. The tickling of secret sex lingers. It is beyond simple ecstatic emotion. It’s better than any adrenaline rush. I have never felt this with anyone else, even my husband. Is this love? A new sort of fresh adoration is coursing through my veins. Yes, I must be in love. Hereafter, we have sex as often as possible. He always lets me be the aggressor. But I teach him everything I know. And he has fallen in love with me.

We keep our romance cloaked from the outside world as the months pass. I fall deeper in love. Eduardo and I talk marriage. I’m considering leaving my husband and marrying Eduardo. I plan for him to be my one and only true love. Of course, I’ve been here before. And I’ve discarded the remains in favor of a new hunt. But today, I let myself forget that I always toy with my prey before I finish it off. I forget that this love is a room I’ve locked myself in for only a short time. Soon I will walk out again. And I’ll walk out alone.

And so it goes. There is a pandemic of predatory female teachers raping underage boys in our middle and high schools. There is also an epidemic of female guards sexually assaulting boys inside juvenile detention centers. Our society has no outrage for these atrocities, because they don’t fit our framework for what rape is. Adult females raping boys is looked at very differently than when adult males rape girls.

Most believe that boys are not harmed by female rape. This is just another lie. Rape of boys by female teachers makes us uncomfortable. Some would even grin and sweep this matter under the rug, congratulating a boy for a job well done. But this is a misunderstanding of the student-teacher relationship. As long as boys are left vulnerable to female education predation, these acts will go unreported and unpunished. And boy after boy will be scarred and stunted, victimized and alone just as he’s entering adulthood. This form of rape must be recognized and stifled, or it will only continue and grow.

A male-centered approach to disability – Part 2: Institutional gynocentrism

Peter Wright · 19 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

A male-centered approach to disability – Part 1
A male-centered approach to disability – Part 2
A male-centered approach to disability – Part 3

As with parenting and school education, the disability sector is overwhelmingly managed and staffed by women. They are the nurses, community support workers, personal care assistants, physiotherapists, guidance counselors and so on. That domination ensures women's views about gender govern the provision of services for most disabled men. Before discussing the problems created by this skewed situation, let's begin with a look at the rise of the disability rights movement.

Although disability issues received varying levels of attention throughout history, they became an international cause célèbre from 1960s, this on the tail of the black civil rights movement in America, and coinciding with the rise of second wave feminism. This generated nothing short of a revolution in awareness about the lives and needs of people with disabilities.

The disability rights movement helped to secure greater access to the social and physical environment, as well as opportunities for independent living, employment, education, and housing. It also promoted freedom from abuse, neglect, and other violations, and the establishment of civil rights legislation to secure these opportunities and rights.

So far so good. However in recent years the movement has suffered mission-creep into the arena of gender politics. We are now more likely to hear about domestic violence and sexual assault against disabled women, their wage discrimination and other forms of double-disadvantage, while contrasting them with the depravity, privilege, rapiness and violence-proneness of disabled men — a narrative fostering denial of vulnerabilities men may face along with a demonizing of men to boot.

It's a growing problem that needs to be stopped.

I'm not suggesting we should stop paying attention to issues like sexual assault and abuse against women, which absolutely must be addressed for this vulnerable demographic. But we needn't demonize men and boys as the default perpetrator class, nor discriminate against them which we do by refusing to recognize males as victims of abuse and by dismissing or silencing those who might speak about it.

I know dozens of disabled men who have suffered serious violence or sexual abuse who have been afraid to tell someone for fear of being disbelieved, blamed or ridiculed. Marginalizing the issues of disabled men in the service of a one-sided gendered approach ultimately undermines the good work of the disability rights movement during the last 50 years – it shifts the focus from a humanitarian movement to a largely sexist one from within its own culture.

The gynocentric approach is compounded by the fact that most workers in the sector are women, who understandably have a more empathic appreciation of women's concerns than men's. The existence of female bias in the disability sector can be stressed in the following way: many women possess an inadequate understanding of the experiences and concerns of men with disabilities.

Poorly educated female workers, ie. those providing most of the frontline services, tend to rely on male stereotypes to guide their understandings of clientele, imposing the usual boilerplate images of males as utilitarian, rough, insensitive, sport obsessed, sex-obsessed, and so on. That vision is devoid of deeper knowledge of men generally, is at variance to the individuality of males specifically, and it tends to dictate the tone of care.

At this point readers may feel I'm being a little hard on female disability workers, which is correct. More accurately I'm being hard on the current culture of disability services because of the growing gynocentric trend, and pointing to an area of potential improvement in service provision. To be fair, I have no hesitation in admitting the existence of excellent female disability workers who do understand men's issues and provide a very high quality of support, but these are more often the exception rather than the rule. This article however is attempting to show where disability services are failing in their duty of care for men, and the increasing gynocentric culture is, at least to my thinking, the area of greatest failure.

Having worked in the disability field for 30 years, I've had more opportunity than most to observe the provision of services to men. The following are six areas where gender stereotyping is failing men with disabilities.

1. Men do, women are
In a recent article I described how men are considered utilities or 'action men' expected to be of service to others.[1] The expectation is sadly no different for disabled men, and one of the first things female support workers often do is put him to work doing odd jobs and showing him how to be 'useful' to women and society. A woman with an identical disability will often get asked a different set of questions – like what do you want to do to have fun.

2. Male aggression or violence is an attempt to dominate
Both men and women with disabilities sometimes times find life frustrating and lash out in anger. Typically males are lectured about how their aggression upsets other people, causes damage to the wider world, and are instructed on how to control their anger – while the disabled woman who lashes out in the same manner is calmed and asked what or who is bothering her and perhaps how the world might be rearranged so that it doesn't upset her again. Disability support workers are less likely to consider the real distress or powerlessness that causes men to lash out.

3. Males are rarely victims of violence
Government media campaigns focusing solely on "violence against women" have encouraged the assumption that men are default perpetrators who don't suffer violence. The belief among support workers that disabled men are safe from violence has created an environment in which abused men are less likely to speak up and seek help… there is no encouragement to do otherwise. Despite the fact that U.S. Department of Justice has reported violence crimes against disabled men and women at roughly equal rates,[2] a Google search for information delivers the following disparity of awareness:

►"Violence against disabled women" = 4330 results.
►"Violence against disabled men" = 9 results.

4. Males are unlikely to suffer sexual abuse or rape
As with men in prisons who experience high levels of sexual assault, disabled males are four times more likely than nondisabled men to be sexually assaulted or raped.[3] The researchers of that study found that more than 5 percent of disabled men reported experiencing sexual assault during the past year, about equal to sexual assaults against disabled women.[3]

If 'rape culture' is based in social invisibility and voicelessness of a victim group, then disabled men are dealing with a legitimate rape culture – one entrenched by the people who receive a weekly pay-cheque to help lift that silence. Again a Google search speaks volumes:

►"Sexual violence against disabled women" = 1520 results.
►"Sexual violence against disabled men" = 0 results.

5. Men are less in need of assistance than women

Patriarchy makes climbing stairs in a wheelchair easy?

As addressed in part one, disabled men are deemed privileged by patriarchy while women with disabilities are considered doubly disadvantaged by the same. The gynocentric privileges historically afforded to women have not yet entered the discourse – such as being recipients of living expenses drawn from male labor, or receiving greater provision and protection generally. Gynocentric prioritization is further underlined in phrases like "damsel in distress," "ladies before gentlemen," "girls before boys" or "ladies first,", which are codes of chivalric and gentlemanly behavior that place disabled men in second place on the basis of their sex.

The stereotype of the cigar-smoking, brandy swilling patriarch, in combination with the custom of "ladies first," sees that men are at a disadvantage to women in the fight for limited disability services.

6. Male sexual needs are socially unacceptable

Men's sexual desires are gross and in need of suppressing or civilizing, so think some individuals charged with supporting men with disabilities. Cultural narratives characterizing male sexuality as dirty, violent and oppressive are clearly toxic to male self-image, however some among the mostly female workforce have adopted that negative mindset and with it created barriers to men's attempts to enjoy healthy sexual expression.

When a disabled man desires a woman, or masturbates, or perhaps decides to hire a prostitute – all natural behaviors – female support workers tend to be unsupportive, believing sexual desires must be tamed in the service of something more civilized such as nonsexual dating and romantic love.

I have observed female staff match-make male and female clientele — treating them like Barbie & Ken in a child's dolls house — while also instructing men in the arts of non-sexual chivalry, such as bringing gifts and flowers for a potential girlfriend or perhaps taking her to a romantic restaurant while the support worker plays hostess. While perhaps well meaning, my reading of such intervention is that it leaves out many aspects of male nature, especially male sexual needs, in favor of gynocentric themes which is ultimately an insult to the men in question.

. . .

These are just a few examples of biases men with disabilities face. Problems generated by gynocentrism and misandry within the disability sector (and beyond) are sometimes blatant and at other times subtle, but in either case they are mostly unrecognized and unquestioned by those on the front lines of service provision.

Men with disabilities receive little more empathy than their able-bodied counterparts – and in some respects they receive less. As with all men's issues, from health funding to prostate cancer, birth control options, or homelessness, men are going to have to speak up – in fact they are going to have to shout up. Those in power might not see men's pain, but they will hear men's anger.

This leads to the next article in this series where we will look at a new kind of man with a disability – he is the one who says "No" to gynocentrism and other forms of mistreatment, and acts decisively to shut them down.

References

[1] Peter Wright, Don't just do something, SIT THERE (June 2015)
[2] Harrell, E., Rand, M., Crime Against People with Disabilities, U.S. Department of Justice (2008)
[3] Mitra, Monika, Vera E. Mouradian, and Marci Diamond. Sexual Violence Victimization Against Men with Disabilities, American Journal of Preventive Medicine (2011)

Feature image: Cpl. Anthony McDaniel

U. S. Department of Defense begins work on 3D food printing

Paul Hamaker · 20 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The food replicator from the old 'Star Trek' television show is poised to become a reality for the military and for households. Mary Scerra, food technologist at the U. S. Army Natick Soldier Research, Development and Engineering Center in Natick, Massachusetts says that a portable three-dimensional food printer should be available to the U. S. Army by 2025 or 2030. The developments that led to this new device were detailed at the July 12, 2015, session of the Institute of Food Technologists in Chicago.

Three-dimensional printers cost about $1,000 now. The expectations are that price will decrease to a level that is affordable to most people within five years. At the same time, the ability to print different substances with a three-dimensional printer has increased. Functional body parts, composites, and machine parts are presently a short list of what three-dimensional printers can produce.

The printing of food that is not only made to order but tastes good will soon be a functional reality. PepsiCo has already produced plastic templates for potato chips. The major hurdle that three-dimensional printers have to overcome to produce food is speed. Printing organic material from chemical components has already been done.

The researchers envision a system that would allow a soldier to insert a program disc into a printer interface and produce a hot meal in a few minutes. Similarly, the same technology could do away with cooking in favor of printed food. One could imagine a kitchen in the near future that has no appliance except a printer.

Most of the unbelievable technology from 'Star Trek' has become a functioning reality. The food replicator is just a few decades away. The technology exists today to produce a voice recognition interface for a three-dimensional printer that would allow people to order a meal just by asking the printer for the food they want. Fast food companies may adopt printers in favor of machines and people.

This article is reposted with the author's permission from examiner.com.

Preaching to the Girls' Choir

Doug Mortimer · 20 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I don't play poker or any other card game (I even gave up on Solitaire, Go Fish, and Old Maid, which, come to think of it, is a terribly insensitive name nowadays), though I am impressed by the fact that an inexpensive deck of cards can provide so many hours of entertainment for so many people. But it takes time to learn a game and even more time to become proficient at it, and in the end…well, I have other things I'd rather do.

Even so, the recent upsurge in the popularity of poker hasn't escaped my attention. So when I came across a newspaper column with the title "Where are all the female poker players?" I thought it was worthy of my attention.

It's a good question. I remember my mother and grandmother playing Pinochle, Canasta, Bridge, and other card games. Since females tend to score better on rote memory tests, they should have an advantage in card games. So why don't more of them play poker?

If I had to guess, I'd say that women avoid poker because they are more risk-aversive than men. When they gamble, they tend to bet smaller amounts and to avoid long shots. I think they enjoy card-playing as a pastime or as a form of socializing, but it isn't a defining feature of their lives.

According to the column, the World Series of Poker requires a $10,000 fee to participate, so we are not talking mere amusement here but a major investment of time and money. Obviously, the men who buy into this contest constitute a very small percentage of the male population, though they constitute a larger percentage than their female counterparts.

The column, however, didn't offer even this much speculation as to why women eschew poker. The article was informative, not because of what it said, but because of what it showed in terms of gender and media bias.

The author of the article was Norman Chad, a sportswriter/sportscaster whom I had never heard of, but who would likely be well known to serious poker players, as he has been a color commentator for the World Series of Poker and the U.S. Poker Championships on ESPN.

Chad opens his column by stating that his first wife, a very good poker player, was the only female sitting in on his college poker sessions. He laments that females are still scarce. As he notes, "Poker has no gender barriers; you walk in, you buy chips, you sit down, you play cards. It's the closest thing to a true meritocracy in America."

All well and good. Is there a problem here? Women can play if they want to, but they choose not to. So what? Who cares? Can't help but note that the Norman Chad Poker League (see normanchad.com) has 21 members, including the eponymous founder. Not a female in the bunch. One of the guys is Asian, but there are no black men. The League is based in the Washington, D.C. area, so it wouldn't take much of an effort to reach out to local black men.

Well, few men of any race would object to their poker game being a male-only space (aside from strip poker), but I'm guessing they would not object to serious female players who demand no special treatment. Chad mentions that the World Series of Poker attracts 7,000 entrants and just 5 percent (or 350) were women. He wonders, "How many businesses out there thrive with just 5 percent of their customers being women?"

Well, video games, pornography, sports bars, and auto parts stores immediately come to mind. If women chose to totally boycott any of those enterprises, it would make little difference to those industries.

Chad then goes on to state that "When they [women] do play, they play well. (Why is this? Because women are smarter than men. Duh.)"

I had to read that over and over again to make sure I didn't misunderstand it. But sure enough, he's saying 95% of the elite poker players are men but they're dumber than the 5% of female elite poker players. Come again? Hey, I'm no math major but that just doesn't add up.

Well, it's way too easy to point out the double standard here, but let's go ahead and do it anyway. Imagine we are talking about nurses, and we asserted that 90% were female and 10% were male. Would it follow from that that "When men go into nursing, they do it well. (Why is this? Because men are smarter than women. Duh.)"

Well, you would never read something like this in your local newspaper. Even if someone were to write something to that effect, the editor would red-pencil it. Why? Not because it makes no sense but because it's blatant misogyny! Can't have that, can we? In the mass media, women's vanity may be stroked incessantly, but they can never be criticized.

Chad then goes on to name an assortment of outstanding female poker players over the years. "We just need more, lots more of these damsels. . . . So I'm pleading with the women of the world to come out of the boardroom and into the card room. (Actually, that's a whole other matter – women can't even get into the boardroom because, well, men won't let them.)"

Oh, the shame of it all! Curse you, glass ceiling! Not that corporate politics has anything to do with poker, but it does give Chad a chance to indulge in some gratuitous patriarchy-bashing.

Well, if Chad hadn't already endeared himself enough to distaff readers, he then exhorts women to flock to card rooms, even though he admitted there are no barriers to their doing so. Finally, he offers the clincher. "And, trust me gals, when you get to the poker room, the men sitting at the tables are often as stupid as we look."

Yep, he actually said that. Can you imagine someone encouraging more men to go into nursing by saying, "Trust me, fellas, when you get to the nursing station, the dames working at this place are often as stupid as they look."

I know, I know. No chance a statement like that would ever make it through mass media scrutiny. Yet Norman Chad's syndicated column sailed through the filters without a problem. I saw it in the Indianapolis Star, and it also appeared in the Washington Post.

Well, Mr. Chad has a right to free speech, and I wouldn't advocate censoring him, though censure might be appropriate. Considering his readership is probably as overwhelmingly male as the roster of elite poker players, it's hard to see why he felt compelled to attack his constituents.

Of course, there's always the possibility he's making a feeble attempt at humor. According to an article about Chad on the Deadspin web site, he used to be a standup comic. Chad displays a common flaw in a number of comedians: he thinks he's a lot funnier than he really is. Small wonder he gave up standup comedy.

If you want to read the whole article for yourself, you can go the Washington Post web site and see for yourself. If you want to, you can leave a comment.

Not that it will do any good. One hates to act like a pissy, prissy feminist, taking offense at every little thing. But sometimes little things can be as revelatory as big things. And little things do add up.

Men have already been dealt a bad hand in modern society; they certainly don't need a poker commentator/columnist – whose cushy job depends on a super-majority male following – trying to score pussy points in the mass media.

Message to White MHRAs

Jack Barnes · 20 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

In this world we live in there are many social “rules” one must abide by to be looked upon with favor by wider society. These rules aren’t written down. You are just expected to know them.

Rules like:

You never serve corn along side chitterlings.

You never smoke a joint at the WhiteHouse (unless you are the president or Willie Nelson).

You never question anything a Black woman says……ever……..period. Especially if you are white or male.

The MHRM is very diverse group of people. Diverse in opinions and beliefs as well as social demographics. I have yet to meet an Asian gay transgender disabled Wician MHRA, but I’m sure there is probably one around somewhere.

Black MHRAs are a growing demographic in our movement. I think they have always been with us. But now it seems they are starting to speak out a little more. Some have even decided to come out and use their real names which is awesome. I have had the good fortune to team up with a few of our ebony brothers and sisters and engage in some online activism. I learned a lot by these endeavors. I was exposed to things that I had just never thought of before.

Let me take this moment to say that I usually don’t think or write along racial lines. I see the problems that are faced by the Black community in this country. I also see that most of these problems seem to be internal not external. A corrupt and fraudulent civil rights movement, an epidemic of single mothers and culture that values Black men as little better than toilet paper just to name a few. But I usually try not to tell my neighbor how to clean up his back yard especially when there are a few weeds, empty beer cans and used rubbers in mine. But before we go any further, an analysis of the Black community as it pertains to this subject is necessary. Oh and I strongly dislike the term “African American.” If you were born in Africa then immigrated to this country fine, you are an African American. If you were born here you are an American, leave the hyphens to Vanna White on Wheel of Fortune.

Ok, now that’s out of the way, let’s get down to business.

To put it bluntly the own group bias, that is inherit to every demographic or group in society, is stronger in Blacks than in whites on the whole. Most whites don’t see any relationship or kinship with another person simply because they are white. We just don’t. Blacks on the other hand do. This bond or kinship is very important to individual Black people. Being Black is a big part of their individual identity. It’s tribalism in a more pure form than can be witnessed in any other demographic in this country. This is both good and bad. The unity is a source of great strength for the Black community. I believe it’s also their greatest weakness.

An example of this can be seen when any Black person disagreeing with President Obama or civil rights charlatan Al Sharpton. Said individual dissenting Black person will be jumped on like a deep fried Twinkie at a N.O.W. convention. It’s like how coyotes attack and devour an injured member of the pack, and just as vicious. The offending “coon” is divested of their Black person membership card and cast out of the tribe. This far more traumatic than one might think. As a white person I don’t have to worry about people trying to remove my white person card for disagreeing with George W. Bush or the leader of the KKK. Even if some faceless person on the internet tried to I would just laugh at them. But it isn’t the same for Black people. When an individual or group unknown Blacks removes a Black person’s membership card, it hurts. It hurts because of the sense of kinship and family all Black people share. The result of this is that you end up with a small group of disgusting individuals ruining the Black civil rights movement while the majority of Blacks stay silent out of fear.

Now add a helping and a half of gynocentrism to the mix.

I've got to hand it to Black women. They have convinced Black men to trade the whips and chains of enslavement by a few wealthy whites for the whips and chains of enslavement to all Black women. Not only that, these Black women openly flaunt their power and authority over Black men in the faces of Black men with gusto!

"We own you. You know that we own you. Don't you ever even think about getting the idea of call us out on it cause we will remove your Black person card if you do." And they will do just that. Black women won't hesitate to call out her Black simps on any Black man that shows the slightest sign of gettin uppity.

This brings us to the plight of Black male MHRAs. I don't think I have to tell you what happens when a Black man attempts to stand up for his rights as a man.

By now we all know the feminist playbook by heart.

"Whenever anyone attempts to call us out on our insane dribbling of hate and violence you should shame them into silence by any and all means necessary."

They call us rapists for pointing out that not all rapists are men and not all victims are women.

They call us wife beaters for pointing out that not all victims of domestic violence are women and not all perpetrators are men.

They call us pedophiles for pointing out the injustice in throwing a eighteen year old man in prison for having sex with his sixteen year old girlfriend.

They call us misogynists for labeling a thirty year old woman having sex with a thirteen year old boy rape instead of an affair.

They say we aren't real men for disagreeing with feminism.

They call us fags for disagreeing with a person if that person is a woman.

I could go on and on.

They label us these things in the hopes that society will dismiss us before even listening to what we have to say. Why? Cause it's the only way that they can maintain their privilege.

Now after all that back ground I come to the point of this article. Here is my message to white MHRAs.

If you see Black men as fellow men deserving of human rights then get used to be called a racist.

When I have watched Black MHRAs wade into the festered cesspool that is the Black feminist community, these "Queens", along with their Black male lapdogs would cast him out. When I came in to defend my fellow MHRA who happened to be Black I was labeled a racist. I personally don't care if someone calls me a racist. That just means they lost the argument. But I realized to my shock and horror that a great many white MHRAs would tuck tail and run at the first hint of a Black person labeling them with the scarlet "R".

Black MHRAs have a hard row to hoe. They are shunned by people they share close ties with. They are ostracized by their community and key part of their identity is removed. We must give them a new community and help them realize a new identity. Above all we must not leave him standing alone just cause somebody chooses to use "racist" instead of "rapist", "misogynist", "pedophile", "fag" or any other of their favorite shaming words. So get used to it. Hell take some pride in it!

"A feminist just called me a racist cause I said Black men are men and men deserve equal rights. Made my day!"

Men’s Rights Movement the Opera – ROTFLMAO (video)

AVfM Video Source · 20 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Have you noticed the way things are looking worse and worse for the long-time critics of the Men’s Rights Movement? Even people who know nothing about us and that we’ve never heard of are noticing the way feminists and our other critics just lie nonstop:

It really is disorienting being lied about daily, but after a while it becomes funny.

You might want to subscribe to Sytenatheist.

She Aint Honest

Mark Dent · 21 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

SHE AIN'T HONEST

There is a line in that magnificent film, One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest, which has stayed with me since the first time I heard it. Randle McMurphy, a new inpatient at the asylum, is called to the office of the administrator-Dr Spivey. He is there to discuss his progress and behaviour.

Dr Spivey says: "Do you like it here?"

McMurphy searches for the right words and after a long pause, replies:

"That fuckin' nurse…she ain't honest." He is referring to the woman who runs the ward he has been placed in.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=HUcDw8GKU4k

The scene begins at around 50:38

To this day, I get goosebumps when Nicholson speaks this line. It articulates so succinctly how I have felt about so many feminists of great repute. These women and men are called courageous, compassionate and inspirational.

Most of them would sit very comfortably alongside Nurse Ratched.

Like her, they have a talent for appearing sincere, caring and trustworthy. Few people would dare to question their integrity or what truly motivates them unless they are willing to be ostracised and branded.

As we have seen these past few decades, very few people are willing to point out the obvious fact- the emperor has no clothes. To do so can cost you your job, reputation and friends.

McMurphy felt the truth in his gut long before his head reached the same conclusion. "She plays a rigged game."

Clementine Ford is one such person.

She plays a rigged game and almost always wins. Last week she appeared on a National TV show called The Project, to discuss the terrible problem of misogynistic abuse in the world of Facebook and Twitter.

Ford presented herself as a brave woman trying to speak up for the rights of an oppressed minority. In carrying out this sacred mission she is subjected to a torrent of abuse.

The panel predictably allowed Clementine to speak of the online abuse of women and girls without interruption, for surely we all know that only females are subjected to abuse and only males abuse in the backwaters of the internet.

This woman sat there playing the victim, seemingly bewildered by the abuse which flows in her direction, and yet the hosts of The Project and many viewers would have been fully aware that this "victim" has meted out her own venomous abuse in her powerful and privileged position as a journalist in one of our biggest daily newspapers. When the conservative Prime Minister, Tony Abbott, was elected to lead our government, Ms Ford created t-shirts with the word Fuck Abbott emblazoned in bold letters across the front. The sale of these t-shirts was promoted by her paper, The Age.

You must bear in mind that this same woman had for months written copiously about the horrific abuse directed at our first female PM-abuse she claimed, came from a source of female hatred rather than the fact that Julia Gillard was possibly the most incompetent, dishonest politician to lead our country.

Was Ford sanctioned or sacked? Of course not! The t-shirts were worn proudly around university campuses and protest rallies by the very students who had been condemning any criticism of Gillard with a vitriolic fervour that bordered on manic.

Had a well known conservative journalist by the name of Andrew Bolt (a man Ford detests) produced Fuck Julia Gillard t-shirts and promoted them in his paper, the very universe would have imploded. I can assure you that Bolt, as powerful as he is, would have been banned from all forms of media and denounced by Ford and her cohorts as a vile, women hating devil.

Who holds the power in our society?

This Clementine Ford, is the same woman who proudly places the motto, We Bathe in Male Tears , at the head of her Face book Page. When this is raised, it is referred to as satire. Again, I don't believe a male journalist would retain his job if he had a Face Book page claiming he bathed in women's tears.

This is the woman who holds all men responsible for the crimes of a tiny minority and very carefully cherry picks examples of male violence to present on her page as proof of the inherent toxicity of the masculine species. Her abhorrence of violence never extends to the female variety. When eight children were butchered by a mother last year there was absolutely no reference to it on her page.

Like Nurse Ratched, she goads, pokes, taunts and humiliates males.

There are many men who feel the outrage we feel here at AVfM, but lack the ability to convey their anger and burning frustration at this daily baiting in a calm, coherent or articulate manner. They revert to the childish, age old practise of name calling in an attempt to push back against her vicious bigotry. They resort to unacceptable language and occasionally stupid threats. Yet even Ford concedes that most of this abuse comes from 14 and 15 year old schoolboys.

I have no doubt, Ford welcomes such abuse. It is what she craves, for like us, she knows it carries no threat, but it does provide her with more ammunition which she delights in using to prove her theory-males are toxic.

As a primary school teacher, I supervise the schoolyard during recess and lunch breaks every day. Almost every break, there is a conflict. Some involve physical abuse and bullying. During the 35 years I have been teaching I believe that in 90% of the incidents there has been mutual culpability in the abuse which took place.

The crying "victim" approaches and says they have been punched or verbally abused. Sometimes they say they have been excluded from a game and told to go away. We walk together until we locate the culprit and a conversation begins.

"What happened?" I ask.

The answer usually reveals that the victim had refused to follow the rules of the game, had initiated the verbal abuse or even begun the physical altercation and came off second best. Often I discover that the "perpetrator" was being teased and lashed out at the person. Is this acceptable behaviour? It is not, but it is certainly something I understand and presents a very different picture to the one painted by the crying child who claimed to be the victim.

Occasionally, it is a simple case of a nasty bully picking on an entirely innocent victim. This however is not a common occurrence.

So we return to Clementine and her claims. She has done exactly what so many children have done in the school yard. It is a dirty, disingenuous game. She has poked and poked at the bear and when he lashes out, with claws extended, she squeals in feigned shock.

It is so ironic that Ford constantly writes and speaks about our patriarchal society and the power men hold. This comes from a woman who has a voice on National television programs and in major daily newspaper. Ford is a woman who rubs shoulders with Police Commissioners and can openly promote the abuse of the most powerful person in the land without fear of retribution.

No man can speak out about the rights of men in any mainstream forum unless he is the token MRA brought into the studio to be mocked and torn apart by five feminist panellists. No-one actually listens to any person who attempts to speak on behalf of men. It is simply a blood sport to have the occasional man offered up as a sacrificial lamb on radio or television.

So where can men turn in order to feel they are being heard? They go online and finally they have an opportunity to express the disgust and justified rage they feel as they endure the endless, daily misandric bombardment in our mainstream media.

Ford has to drag up comments from anonymous trolls in the murky swamps of cyberspace in order to provide proof of misogyny. We are subjected to vicious lies, smears and accusations from journalists and politicians and even the Australian of the Year and not one person in the media has the courage to speak out against this bigotry. Then people have the temerity to wonder why there is a boiling rage "out there" in the community.

Who really has the power?

In a powerful scene in the final moments of One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest, McMurphy snaps when Ratched taunts a stuttering inmate and reduces him to a stammering wreck with her barbed tongue and veiled threat to humiliate him. This young man takes his life only moments after the wounding words of Nurse Ratched have torn him asunder.

When Randle McMurphy sees the lifeless body of a boy he had loved and nurtured back to a state of self respect and confidence, he launches himself at Ratched , places his two hands around her neck and attempts to squeeze the very life from her body.

Anyone walking in on such a scene would see it all so clearly. There, before you, is a highly respected, dedicated nurse, trying to do a difficult job, and one of the crazy, brutish inmates she cares for has brutally attacked her and is attempting to end her life.

He is just another violent, toxic male.

But the observer would be wrong. What we have is a powerful, controlling, manipulative woman, who delights in playing tortuous mind games with her vulnerable patients, being attacked by the one man who sees her abuse of power and cruelty and wants to put an end to it.

Do we condone such violence? Of course we do not. It is the wrong way to express your hurt, anger and frustration. But if we are going to move beyond the evil notion of masculine toxicity as the fundamental cause of all evil and decrease the number of violent incidents in the home then we must understand the factors which contribute to it.

Of course, McMurphy is taken away and reduced to a shell of the man he was. A lobotomy is regarded as the most suitable way to deal with this problematic patient.

And what becomes of Nurse Ratched? She recovers quickly from her assault and is very soon back on the ward, controlling the men who have been placed under her care.

No doubt she is as respected and admired as much as she ever was, much like the many feminists in Australia's media.

If you haven't seen this beautiful film, please take the time to watch it. If you have, please watch the uplifting final scene once again for a spiritual pick me up. It never fails. The tide will turn.

Riding the Testosterone Elevator

Doug Mortimer · 21 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Breathes there a man with eyes or ears so dead who has not yet seen or heard one of those "Low T" commercials or infomercials? Probably not. But what do you really know about testosterone, other than the fact that more is usually preferable?

The famed male hormone is responsible for secondary sex characteristics, libido and sexual function. Testosterone also affects energy levels, tissue growth, muscle mass, fat distribution, and stimulates blood flow. Also, it aids concentration and visuospatial abilities. The amount of testosterone produced in the testes is controlled by the hypothalamus and pituitary glands.

Like blood pressure, serum testosterone levels fluctuate. Also, like blood pressure, testosterone can be problematical as men age. "Normal" has a wide latitude: 300 ng/dl (nanograms per deciliter) to 1,200 ng/dl. Famously, the level is highest in the early morning hours when "morning glory" erections occur.

But there is more. Let us explore the variable nature of serum testosterone levels by turning to a book called Testosterone and Social Structure by Theodore D. Kemper (Rutgers University Press, 1990). Kemper studied testosterone levels in men and discovered – surprise, surprise! – that levels of serum testosterone are boosted when someone achieves triumph or dominance in one pursuit or another. It could happen after the attainment of a long-sought goal or besting an opponent in some sort of competition. Women, who have lower levels of testosterone (produced by the ovaries), may experience surges of their own as they take on male roles in an egalitarian society.

Sports, of course, are Exhibit A when it comes to testosterone boosting. We've seen any number of videos of triumphant athletes exulting in their victory. High fives, fist pumps, handshakes, dogpiles, and various other rituals are captured regularly on video. But there are far more spectators than athletes in this world. What about them?

Well, it turns out that spectators' testosterone levels are affected by how their team of choice performs. If the home team wins a thriller, the fan experiences a boost in serum testosterone. If the home team loses a thriller, the fan experiences a drop in serum testosterone.

When TV first became commonplace in the late 1940s, sports programming was limited. You might get the Game of the Week on Saturday afternoon or a limited number of telecasts of your local teams, college or pro.

Not so today. Is there a sports event, big league or big-time college, anywhere in the land that is not televised? Is there no limit to the amount of TV screens at a sports bar? Or how many sports bars the local market can bear? It is worth noting that many people can receive these same sports channels at home, but watching in the isolation of one's living room is not the same thing. Better to watch the big game in a group at a sports bar, thus simulating the crowd at the stadium, feeding off each other's enthusiasm, and revving up testosterone levels…unless the home team loses.

When Kemper's book came out, televised sports were relatively manageable. This was 11 years after the 1979 founding of ESPN. Now we have ESPN2, ESPN3, and by the time you read this, maybe ESPN4. There's the all-baseball MLB network, the all-football NFL network, the all-hockey NHL network, and the all-basketball NBA TV. There's even a Golf Channel, for God's sake! Can a curling channel be far behind?

Speaking of the media, let's not forget the perpetual chatter on sports talk radio or the mind-numbing proliferation of statistics and analysis pertaining to sports. One wonders why so much attention is paid to something that, when all is said and done, is so trivial.

Live attendance at pro sports venues waxes and wanes, but the overall trend is upward. Hard to explain, but even in dire economic times, tickets to sporting events are in big demand. For example, in Detroit – the municipal poster child for rust belt decline – the Tigers have drawn more than 3,000,000 fans four times from 2007 to 2014. They "bottomed out" at 2,461,237 in 2010. Given the inflated prices of tickets, parking, concessions, etc, it is hard to comprehend how so many denizens of the nation's most depressed metro area can afford to shell out big bucks for mere entertainment…unless it's more than mere entertainment.

When testosterone levels rise, according to Kemper, a man has "a sense that the world is fully responsive to oneself….The world is brought into harmony with one's self and one's needs or desires." In other words, it's like a drug! And people will pay whatever the market will bear for a reliable high.

Well, there is no shortage of antidepressant medications out there, so what makes testosterone different? If watching sports was just another form of do-it-yourself feel-goodism, it would not be worthy of attention, but the matter is more serious than that:

> My view is that males who experience testosterone surges in sufficient number . . . will be relatively contented with the existing social order. . . . Conversely, lacking sufficient surges of Testosterone, males are more likely to become restive and alienated from the institutions that undergird the social order and to become available for experiences that negate that order. . . and make one ripe for social change.[1]

So spectator sports are more than just a waste of time and money. Marx might call them the opiate of the masses; Aldous Huxley might call them soma. Spectator sports serve the state not only by enhancing alcohol tax revenues, but by keeping the dolts from revolting. Maybe that would explain why professional sports salaries have skyrocketed. The athletes are being paid not just for their athletic skills, but because they're helping to keep the pot from boiling over.

Kemper's book was written 25 years ago when video games were fewer in number and not as sophisticated. I'm not a gamer, but I've watched people play games, and the emotional response is very similar to that of people (athletes or spectators) heavily involved in a sporting contest.

Gaming is not as passive as watching sports on TV, but it is a form of virtual reality. Nobody, to my knowledge, has ever suffered post-traumatic stress syndrome after too much Mortal Kombat. Virtual or otherwise, if a competitor comes out on top after a hard-fought victory, the results can be positive, in terms of a testosterone surge.

As is the case with so many other phenomena, it's a matter of nature (a man's natural testosterone level) and nurture (how his testosterone level is manipulated, or how he manipulates his testosterone level) locked in a feedback loop, which Kemper refers to as the "socio-bio-social chain." In other words, social structure and biology are inextricably intertwined. Two men with equally active 'nads may end up with different serum testosterone levels depending on circumstances.

For example, a Viking living in Scandinavia (or sailing around the known world) 1,000 years ago may have had DNA similar to that of a contemporary man living in Sweden, but their testosterone levels are likely very different.

Of course, in Viking days, there was no virtual reality to boost testosterone. There may have been some sort of limited competitive sports during festivals, but there were no professional sports leagues. The life span was shorter but life was more physical, so testosterone could be boosted by exploring, plunder, pillage, rapine, looting, sailing, and other methods of exerting dominance over the environment. How much potential for dominance does a modern-day Swedish guy in a cubicle have?

Well, today that guy in the cubicle might come across MGTOW while surfing the web during his lunch break, but he has probably never heard of Theodore Kemper. Kemper's book, of course, was published before the rise of the internet. He did not predict the rise of MGTOW, but he did anticipate it:

> Given that this is an educated group [white collar males] with some insight into organizational processes, it poses a problem in the theory of politics. Why does this group not act in its own interests? Why does it not express its discontent in movements?[1]

Well, testosterone boosters like spectator sports and video games are two reasons. From what I read on MGTOW web sites, however, MGTOW men are frequently gamers but rarely sports fans.

If attendance at sporting events starts dwindling, if sports bars start closing their doors, you'll know that MGTOW has gone mainstream. And if gamers give up on gaming, then the men's movement, however you define it, could really pick up steam.

That wouldn't mean abandoning testosterone boosting. After all, shouldn't hard-fought victories in the social, political, and culture wars also boost testosterone? As a bonus, they might even reduce or eliminate tyranny in its various manifestations!

Rooting for your home team would never achieve that.

Reference

[1] Testosterone and Social Structure by Theodore D. Kemper (Rutgers University Press, 1990)

Why Men Can’t Say No to Women

Paul Elam · 21 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Paul discusses men and why they have so much trouble saying no to women.

Feature image by Soumyadeep Paul

Will killer robots act like men or women? It matters.

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 21 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

South Korea is poised on the brink of ultra-modern warfare, manufacturing and selling automated turret guns that fire 50 calibre bullets, capable of destroying targets up to 4 km away. Engineer Park Jungsuk, who works in the Robotic Surveillance Division of the gun manufacturer explains that the turret was originally designed to fire automatically, without any human intervention of any kind, '[b] ut all of our customers asked for safeguards to be implemented. Technologically it wasn't a problem for us. But they were concerned the gun might make a mistake.'

What Park describes are known as Lethal Autonomous Weapons Systems (LAWS), or robots that can make decisions about whom to kill or what to destroy independent of any human action. These machines are increasingly being used to replace human soldiers and to carry out dangerous work such as bomb disposal, opening doors and laying optical fibers in combat zones. While these autonomous drones have been used for years, to date, no country has acknowledged the use of completely autonomous, lethal robots that make decisions independently of human direction.

The Super aEgis II automated turret gun makes it clear that the technology to do so exists, but there is considerable concern that the gun 'might make a mistake'. The difficulty will be in programming the machines to make the correct decisions: the machine will need to be moral.

Feminist scholar Carol Gilligan, author of In A Different Voice: Women's Conceptions of Self and Morality posits that men and women take profoundly different approaches to morality. Women, she argues, make moral decisions contextually and what counts as a moral decision depends on the impact of that decision on those around her; hence, completely opposite courses of action can both be moral, depending on the context in which they occur. Men, by way of contrast, make moral decisions universally and what counts as a moral decision is whether that decision would be true in all similar cases, for all actors. Universal morality forms the basis of our justice system.

When it comes to the creation of LAWS, how the drone thinks, contextually (like a woman) or universally (like a man) will have a direct impact on how likely a drone is to 'make a mistake'. One of the great difficulties programmers at Google experience with self-driving cars is how they behave at four way stops. Actual drivers rarely follow the strict rules of the road, and cars must intuit what the local rules are for four way stops. It turns out that behaving aggressively is the correct strategy. It is tempting to think of the rules of the road as being universal, while the actual behavior is contextual, but in fact, the rules LAWS need to be concerned about are discovering the correct strategies and deploying them universally. If behaving aggressively at four way stops is the correct strategy for safely clearing the intersection, then it is the correct strategy for every four way stop. It is a universal strategy that responds to contextual differences.

Whether a drone learns to think contextually or universally, or some combination of both, it is virtually impossible that a drone will never mistakenly kill or destroy a friendly target. Universal morality is likely to reduce these accidents, as continuously changing contexts that permit actions to be both moral and immoral at the same time offer that much more opportunity to make mistakes.

Killer robots need to think like men.

[Ed. note: This post originally appeared at the Examiner and is reprinted here with permission]

Interview with Gregory Alan Elliott's son about Toronto Twitter trial

AVfM Video Source · 21 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Lauren Southern of TheRebel.media has an exclusive interview with Clayton Elliott. His father, Gregory Alan Elliott, is currently on trial in Toronto for "criminal harassment" — even though the police have testified that he didn't harass or threaten anyone!

So what happened? This is another instance of feminist SJWs (Social Justice Workers) using the internet and the legal system to silence anyone who disagrees with them, especially if those critics are male.

Clayton tells Lauren about the toll this trial has taken on his father and their family, financially and emotionally. A graphic designer, Elliott was fired from his job of 15 years and banned from using the internet.

Letting my husband sleep with other women makes me a better men's rights activist

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 22 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

As I write this, my children are asleep in their room, Robin Thicke is on the stereo, and my husband is out on a date with a woman named Pammy. It's his second date this week; his fourth this month so far. If it goes like the others, he'll come home in the middle of the night, crawl into bed beside me, and tell me all about how he and Pammy had sex. I won't explode with anger or seethe with resentment. I'll tell him it's a hot story and I'm glad he had fun. It's hot because he's excited, and I'm glad because I'm a men's rights activist.

Before my husband started sleeping with other women, I certainly considered myself a men's rights activist, but I really only understood it in the abstract. When I quit working to stay at home with the kids, I began to understand it on a whole new level. I am an employment-free housewife with zero obligations to provide for our family financially. Now that I understand the reality of that situation, I don't blame men for demanding more for themselves than the life of a wage-slave.

Still, as a woman, I could, if I wanted to, portray what I'm doing as "work," and thus claim for myself the prestige men traditionally derive from "work." Whenever I tell someone I stay home with the kids, they invariably say, "Hardest work in the world." They say this because the only way to account for a woman at home with the kids is to say what she's doing is hard work.

It wasn't until my husband mentioned one evening that he'd kissed another woman and liked it and wanted to do more than kiss next time that I realized how my status as a woman depended on a single fact: that my husband fucked only me.

He didn't present it as an issue of men's rights activism to me, but after much soul-searching about why the idea of my husband having sex with other women bothered me I came to a few conclusions: Monogamy meant I controlled his sexual expression, and, not to get all men's-studies major about it, gynocentrism essentially boils down to a woman's fear that a man with sexual agency is a man she can't control. We aren't afraid of their intellect or their spirit or their ability to give us children. We are afraid that when it comes time for sex, they won't choose us. This petty fear has led us as a culture to place judgments on the entire spectrum of male sexual expression: If a man likes sex, he's a pig and objectifies women; if he only likes sex with his wife or girlfriend, he's boring and whipped; if he doesn't like sex at all, he's a virgin and a neckbeard. Every option is a trap.

Men's rights activism always comes back to sex, even when we're talking about everything else. The point isn't that all men should be sexual adventurers. Celibacy is as valid an expression of sexuality as profligacy. The point is that it should be men who choose, not women — even the women they're married to. For my husband, the choice between honoring our vows and fulfilling his desires was a false choice, another trap. He knew how deep our love was, and knew that him wanting a variety of sexual experiences as we traveled through life together would not diminish or disrupt that love. It took me about six months — many long, intense conversations, and an ocean of red wine — before I knew it, too.

When my husband told me he wanted to open our marriage and take other lovers, he wasn't rejecting me, he was embracing himself. When I understood that, I finally became a men's rights activist.

That was two years ago, and today we've never been happier, more in tune, closer, tighter, stronger. Whatever power I surrendered, I don't miss. I wouldn't recommend it for everyone, but I tell everyone it works for us.

How does it feel? It feels great … mostly. Most of the time, it feels like a mature, responsible way to address our needs and desires within our loving, mutually supportive marriage. It feels very adult, especially because it depends on open, honest communication. We take great pride in all the talking we do. I meet a lot of people who say they'll never get married because they don't want to get divorced, and hearing it always makes me sad, because they are cutting themselves off from the possibility of the magic that happens when two people share their lives. People don't divorce because they can't stand sharing anymore; they divorce because they feel like they can't share enough. I never forget that my husband is a whole person unto himself, a complete and dynamic individual, and though we are together, we're not one. Too often people get trapped in the roles of husband and wife, and a gulf opens between what they think they should be and who they really are. Opening our marriage has allowed us to close that gap so that the person I call "husband" is the same person my husband sees in the mirror. Lying to each other begins with lying to yourself, and now we don't have to lie to anyone.

There are of course moments of jealousy, resentment, and insecurity. Recently, my husband went on a date and fell asleep at her apartment. I hadn't heard from him since 10 p.m., he still wasn't home at 6 a.m. My texts went unanswered and my calls went to voicemail. A tight knot of dread lodged in my stomach as I imagined all kinds of dire scenarios and realized that I not only didn't know where he was, I had no idea whom he was with. I pictured myself going to the police saying, "I think he's in Red Hook with a chick named Rachel. I don't know her last name, but I think she's a graphic designer?" I'm not sure there's actually a word for the unique blend of acute terror and unforgivable shame I felt that morning imagining that I'd lost my husband to Rachel, the maybe graphic designer. When he finally texted me at 7:30 a.m., relief coursed through me like morphine. He wrote, "fuckfuckfuckfuck Im soooooo sorry. Fell asleep." I replied, "Just glad you're ok, but next time, no radio silence. Remember: you're not alone."

What surprises most people is when I tell them it's not the sex-with-other-women that bothers me. The sex is the easy part, the fun part. It's what the sex connects to, stands for, reveals that can be difficult. I don't want him to fall in love with anyone else, and every time he goes on a date, I confront the possibility that he might. It happened at the beginning: The first person he dated after we opened up fell hard in love with him, and my husband, overwhelmed by his ardor, tried to love her back. Watching it happen, I was confused, angry, and terrified that he wanted to leave me. He assured me he didn't, and whatever feelings he had for her didn't lessen what he felt for me. Believing him then was the ultimate trust exercise. We survived because eventually I did believe him, and also because I learned to trust myself.

This has been the great challenge of my open marriage: to draw strength from vulnerability. Doing so requires supreme self-confidence. You must first really, truly love yourself; it is the foundation upon which all the other love is built. From everywhere comes the message that what I'm doing is for abused women, victims, doormats, pathetic women with internalized misogyny; that if I had money and status, I could keep my husband "in line"; that his self-discovery comes at the expense of my self-esteem. My open marriage has made heavy demands on my ability to silence the voice of doubt in my head, that gnawing feeling of worthlessness. But I find I can meet those demands, and that I am able to build my self-confidence out of nothing more than the basic dignity we all possess. I'm grateful to my husband for pushing us to take this leap, and whatever happens to us in the future I would do it all again. And when he comes home tonight and crawls into bed beside me with a hot story about his date with Pammy, he'll do it all again, too.

CAN YOU BELIEVE THIS SHIT?

Of course, I reversed the genders from the original article, but if this were some man, bullying his wife over time and plying her with alcohol until she finally agreed that she couldn't really be a men's rights activist or care about men unless she let him fuck other women, feminists would be up in arms, explaining all the ways this is abuse and the woman is completely beaten down dog with no agency or will left.

Read Milo Yiannapoulos', take on this – it's pretty hilarious:

> The logic is simple, if you think about it. Men are canny about cutting out the middleman whenever possible. If their wives are screwing them by consorting with other men, why not simplify everything by being screwed by men themselves? Think about what Sonmore has to show for his marriage today. A Starbucks gift card from his wife's latest boyfriend Paulo, with the message, "Please enjoy this latte while I enjoy your wife"?

> We're entering a brave new world where a small group of alpha straights share the most attractive women at will, while the rest of the male population hops over to my side of the pond, having bought into the tenets of modern feminism, which include daily testicular torture, ritual consumption of tampons, and a compulsory 5,000 lines of "Yes, You Can Be The Man Tonight, Honey" to be written in their own blood.
>
> Face it ladies, you blew it. Your abandonment of traditional marriage values like monogamy and taking care of your husband's domestic needs in order to embrace the quick and dirty pleasures of handsome strangers with Spanish names has created the coming wave of cuckolds that are barely a hair away from dropping to their knees for another dude.

So this is the end game feminists imagine? A bunch of pussy-whipped househusbands too frightened of their overlords to demand a bit of respect and monogamy? Any guy who buys into this deserves what he gets, just as any woman who thinks she has to let her husband fuck around on her deserves what she gets. Truly open marriages, embraced by both partners openly and enthusiastically is none of my business and I wish those people all the best.

This woman bullied her husband for months, made him economically dependent on her, plied him with alcohol and mentally manipulated him into thinking that the basic tenets of marriage were oppressing her. And it was his fault. He has not consented to this relationship, making all sex between them rape. It is coerced, therefore rape.

This is what an abusive wife looks like.

What a cunt.

Both of them.

[Ed notes: Feature image "Brown Nylon Bullwhip" by Pilgrim70 – Own work. Licensed under CC BY-SA 3.0 via Wikimedia Commons – the post originally appeared at JudgyBitch and is reprinted here with permission – article may be a hoax – see Robert Stacy McCain]

MRE's Nick Reading offers @mikerugnetta a cordial invitation

AVfM Video Source · 22 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

…well, after he figuratively bootstomps him into pwnage hell. This was not just a takedown of the seriously deluded Rugnetta's porous thinking, but one of the most eviscerating examinations of feminism around. Worth every minute of watching. PE

Is it possible to be more selfish and hateful than a feminist?

AVfM Video Source · 22 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

After watching the original video on this, we have to wonder what kind of narcissistic psychotic even considers calling themselves a feminist:

https://youtu.be/DFfS-oocw44

You may want to subscribe to Thorium.

Feminism, polyamory, and a broken man

Torrey Garcia · 23 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Some of you may have read this article on how man was taught feminism through a polyamorous relationship. As a man who is Poly and a member of the MRM this article disgusts me. It is abundantly clear to me that the woman/wife is an abuser. The tone of the article suggests to me that the husband was abused. This doesn't read like the men and women I know who have decided to make the leap from monogamous relationships into Poly. It read like some who was raped and is lying to themselves to make everything right again.

> As I write this, my children are asleep in their room, Loretta Lynn is on the stereo, and my wife is out on a date with a man named Paulo. It's her second date this week; her fourth this month so far. If it goes like the others, she'll come home in the middle of the night, crawl into bed beside me, and tell me all about how she and Paulo had sex. I won't explode with anger or seethe with resentment. I'll tell her it's a hot story and I'm glad she had fun. It's hot because she's excited, and I'm glad because I'm a feminist.[1]

Now without knowing the full dynamics of their relationship I can say as someone who is in poly this is generally considered rude or course. In the poly community though it really does depend on the dynamics involved, there are less rigid types of archetypes for relationships. Generally speaking while people in the poly community may know or even be friends with the people involved with their significant others, it is generally considered very rude to talk about what goes on in the bedroom with said significant others.

Jealously is human issue in polyamory that is routinely overcome by necessity but there is no need to throw fuel on a potential fire by talking about in detail how the sex went. Imagine it like this: Your best friend just landed his or her dream job. You're happy for you friend but then you friend starts to rub your face in how awesome their job is. Eventually you start to resent the friend or become jealous when initially you were happy for them. That same logic applies for poly partners.

> Before my wife started sleeping with other men, I certainly considered myself a feminist, but I really only understood it in the abstract. When I quit working to stay at home with the kids, I began to understand it on a whole new level. I am an economically dependent househusband coping with the withering drudgery of child-rearing. Now that I understand the reality of that situation, I don't blame women for demanding more for themselves than the life of the housewife.[1]

Polyamory has nothing to do with feminism. This is where I see the first hints that this man is lying to himself to make everything right again. Being poly isn't a litmus test for being the penultimate feminist. Feminism, however you feel about it, is not a justification to go poly. This doesn't make him more of a feminist or less of one. He is rationalizing because as I suspect his wife is abusing him or abused him to go Poly.

> Still, as a man, I could, if I wanted to, portray what I'm doing as "work," and thus claim for myself the prestige men traditionally derive from "work." Whenever I tell someone I stay home with the kids, they invariably say, "Hardest work in the world." They say this because the only way to account for a man at home with the kids is to say what he's doing is hard work. But there's a subtext in the compliment that makes it backhanded: We both know no one ever says it to a woman. Mothers care; fathers provide care. The difference is crucial. Despite my total withdrawal from the economy and the traditional sources of masculine identity, I can still argue I am a provider. I provide care.
>
> In this way, my masculine self-image was stretched but not broken. Diaper bag notwithstanding, I was still a Man. It wasn't until my wife mentioned one evening that she'd kissed another man and liked it and wanted to do more than kiss next time that I realized how my status as a Man depended on a single fact: that my wife fucked only me.[1]

Some of this is valid stuff we in the MRM have to fight against and some of it is poly specific that everyone man or woman has to deal with in poly relationships. The largest issues in poly for most people to get over is jealously which I addressed above and will address a little more below.

What is happening in the 'relationship' is that Michael is facing three distinct issues. One going poly, Two losing a large part of his traditional masculine identity and Three the lack freedom and independence that comes with being a stay at home parent. Some of this we do have to deal with if we want to leave traditionalism and gynocentrism in the dust. I am not saying the MRM should advocate for poly to be clear. But these are issues to be addressed from an MRM perspective.

> She didn't present it as an issue of feminism to me, but after much soul-searching about why the idea of my wife having sex with other men bothered me I came to a few conclusions: Monogamy meant I controlled her sexual expression, and, not to get all women's-studies major about it, patriarchal oppression essentially boils down to a man's fear that a woman with sexual agency is a woman he can't control. We aren't afraid of their intellect or their spirit or their ability to bear children. We are afraid that when it comes time for sex, they won't choose us. This petty fear has led us as a culture to place judgments on the entire spectrum of female sexual expression: If a woman likes sex, she's a whore and a slut; if she only likes sex with her husband or boyfriend, she's boring and lame; if she doesn't like sex at all, she's frigid and unfeeling. Every option is a trap.[1]

This is more of him trying to square poly and scapegoat feminism. (Never thought I would pen such sentence.) These are issues every one man or woman has had to deal with in Poly relationships. This has nothing to do with patriarchy or feminism but that going from Mono to Poly is a very strange transition and squaring that is hard for every one who does it. As someone in the community its very clear to me that he after reading this paragraph that he was pressured in an abusive way into it poly.

> That was two years ago, and today we've never been happier, more in tune, closer, tighter, stronger. Whatever power I surrendered, I don't miss. I wouldn't recommend it for everyone, but I tell everyone it works for us.[1]

Doublethink confirmed right here. Notice how he says WE not I. In a normal poly context this would be great but given the larger context of this piece I can't help but feel he is relying exclusively on compersion for his happiness which isn't happy. Compersion (seeing others happy or making others happy make you feel happy) is great, provided that isn't your only source of happiness. I get the feeling that at this point he has forgotten that he has every right to seek his own fulfillment and sublimated that in to his wife fulfillment.

> How does it feel? It feels great … mostly. Most of the time, it feels like a mature, responsible way to address our needs and desires within our loving, mutually supportive marriage. It feels very adult, especially because it depends on open, honest communication. We take great pride in all the talking we do.[1]

This would be great provided that was what was actually happening. That is how poly is supposed to work. I strongly believe that this is more him lying to himself. "Lying to each other begins with lying to yourself, and now we don't have to lie to anyone." – from later on in that same paragraph. I would suggest he take some of his own advice.

Now I have to address some thing I have been seeing in the manosphere about the article.

> Going out alone to hooking up with others was an easy transition. It does work both ways and, yes, I too enjoy sexual carte blanche. I just don't use mine as much as my wife uses hers. What's important is equality of opportunity, not outcome.[1]

This right here means he is not a cuckold. A cuckold is a man or woman who is in half open relationship with or without consent. By definition this man isn't a cuckold. That doesn't make this man any less of a possible abuse victim. The tone and demeanor of the article strongly signal to me that he was pushed into polyamory and it was something he would have rather not done. It read like some with stockholm syndrome describing their relationship with their abuser.

This one poly man's perspective on this piece.

Reference:

[1] What Open Marriage Taught One Man About Feminism

A new psychology for men

AVfM Video Source · 23 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Subscribe to An Ear for Men YouTube Channel

Visit An Ear for Men Website

Ape study shows anxiety and depression are inherited

Paul Hamaker · 24 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The expression of symptoms and the underlying chemical causes of anxiety and depression are inherited. Dr. Ned Kalin, chair of psychiatry at the University of Wisconsin at Madison School of Medicine and Public Health and colleagues are the first to prove that anxiety and depression are inherited. The study was reported in the July 6, 2015 edition of the journal Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences.

The researchers observed the behavior of 600 young rhesus monkeys from family groups that had a history of anxiety. Over 35 percent of the animals displayed excessive anxiety when confronted with a perceived threat. All of the behavior that represented anxiety could be related to family members that demonstrated the same behavior.

The researchers examined the brains of all the monkeys with functional magnetic resonance imaging and positron emission tomography. The anxiety behavior was found to be related to different regions of the brain located in the brain stem. The brain stem is considered the most primitive part of the brain. The amygdala, the limbic brain fear center; and the prefrontal cortex showed the highest levels of activity associated with anxiety.

The researchers note that the development of anxiety may have an evolutionary advantage for monkeys and humans in producing a higher state of awareness of threats.

The study is the first to definitely prove that anxiety and depression are inherited. The function of the brain structures associated with anxiety and depression were the key to problems with excessive anxiety and depression and not the size of the region of the brain. This discovery may lead to the genetic cause of excessive anxiety and depression in humans.

This article is reposted with the author's permission from examiner.com.

Gmail has officially rolled out their newest feature — undo send

Clarissa Wilson · 24 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

There are many active Gmail users online today since Gmail has become so popular. Now, according to Forbes, as of June 23 Gmail has officially rolled out their newest feature — undo send. This new feature can be used to get an email back after it's already been sent. At the last minute, you can 'undo send' and it will come back to you to fix whatever you did wrong. It is also handy should you send an angry email and then regret it.

You can enable this feature by clicking on the gear icon in Gmail and clicking on settings. Once you get to the general settings tab, scroll down until you see 'enable undo send' and click to make sure it is enabled. You can choose between 5, 10, 20 and 30 seconds of an 'undo send.' It is highly recommended to enable this feature with 30 seconds in mind so you will have enough time to undo your send before it goes out to the person it is meant for.

According to Engadget, if you had already enabled this feature in Gmail Labs, it will already be turned on for you. However, if not, you will have to enable it yourself but as you can see, it is pretty easy.

It is not yet available for the Gmail mobile app but Gmail says the feature will be available for the mobile app soon so stay tuned.

This article is reposted with the author's permission from examiner.com.

U.S. incarcerated boys report high rate of exploitation by female staff while in custody

Hannah Wallen · 24 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The Prison Rape Elimination Act of 2003 (P.L. 108-79) requires the Bureau of Justice Statistics (BJS) to develop national data collections on the incidence and prevalence of sexual violence within adult and juvenile correctional facilities. To fulfill that requirement, BJS statisticians have begun surveying incarcerated youth on their experiences of sexual violence while in custody.

Two reports made from these surveys are available on the BJS website: Sexual Victimization in Juvenile Facilities Reported by Youth, 2008-09 and Sexual Victimization in Juvenile Facilities Reported by Youth, 2012.

The two surveys produced similar results.

91% of adjudicated youth in both surveys were male. 9% were female.

Among youth in state juvenile facilities and large non-state facilities approximately 10.3% in 2008/9, and 7.7% in 2012 reported experiencing one or more incidents of sexual victimization by facility staff. This represented 58.3% of youth reporting sexual misconduct in the 2008/9 survey and 59.1% in the 2012 survey.

According to the reports, staff at the surveyed facilities was 42% female, 58% male in 2008/9 and 44% female, 56% male in 2012.

92% of respondents in 2008/9 and 89.1 in 2012 were males reporting sexual activity with female staff only, and another 2.5% in 2008/0 and 3% in 2012 said they had been victimized by both male and female.

Both reports indicated that black youth and were more likely to report being victimized by staff than any other ethnic group.

According to the 2008/9 report, the chance of a youth reporting sexual misconduct with staff doubled for those who had previously experienced sexual assault, and tripled for those whose previous assault had taken place at another juvenile facility.

88% of youth reporting staff misconduct in the 2008/9 report and 85.9% in 2012 reported more than one incident. The 2008/8 report states that 27% of this group reported more than 10 incidents. The 2012 report states that 20.4% reported 11 or more incidents. In both reports, approximately a third of youth reporting staff misconduct reported misconduct by more than one staff member.

78.9% of youth reporting staff misconduct in 2008/9 and 80.9% in 2012 said at least one incident occurred in a common area, such as a shower, recreation area, or closet.

In both surveys, nearly half of youth reporting staff misconduct said incidents took place between noon and 6:00 p.m., during daylight hours, though the majority (59% in 2008/9 and 53.5% in 2012) took place between 6:00 p.m. and midnight.

These surveys paint a pretty disgusting picture of the environment in America's juvenile detention facilities, with sexual exploitation of youth taking place in broad daylight in common areas where it ought to be easier to prevent. Adding regularly checked video surveillance to common areas (aside from bathing facilities) would have a protective effect, both for youth, and for staff who face potential accusations. Creating policy barring female authorities and mentors from engaging with male inmates without an assigned witness would be even more effective, considering that over 90% of reported staff misconduct involved female perpetrators. In fact, an even more certain solution could be eliminating female staff altogether from facilities housing male inmates.

While some might object, calling such a drastic measure gender discrimination, it isn't an unusual step to take. Male caregivers in facilities which house disabled women and girls are accustomed to being treated as suspect for the purpose of preventing sexual exploitation and some facilities do bar male employees from working alone with female patients or clients for the protection of both. Why should female employees at youth detention facilities be exempt from the same scrutiny and precautions, especially under the circumstances indicated by these Justice Bureau surveys? Do boys have less right to bodily autonomy and freedom from abuse?

The toll sexual exploitation can take on a boy does not receive the same consideration that is given when the victim is female. This is especially the case when the perpetrator is female. Many, sometimes including the boys themselves, wrongfully view the crime as harmless, or even a positive experience for the victim.

That misconception and the tolerance it has led to are extremely damaging, according to a review published in the Journal of the American Medical Association in 1998 by William C. Holmes, MD, MSCE and Gail B. Slap, MD, MS. "Sexual Abuse of Boys: Definition, Prevalence, Correlates, Sequelae, and Management." The review compared and reported on the findings of 166 studies. Holms & Slap noted that sexually exploited boys, including those who did not consider themselves victims, presented an increased rate of a broad range of issues indicating trauma.

Victims experienced greater difficulty controlling sexual feelings and were hypersexual. They were more likely to engage in high-risk sexual behaviors such as unprotected sex, prostitution, and promiscuity. They had an increased rate of sexually transmitted diseases and partner pregnancy. According to several of the reviewed studies they had double the rate of HIV infection.

The reviewers also found an increased rate of post traumatic stress disorder, anxiety disorders, borderline personality disorder, paranoia, dissociation, somatization, anger, aggressive behavior, and poor school performance, gender role confusion, and insecurity about intimate partner relationships, with both men and women. The reviewed reports showed varying degrees of increase in victimized boys' risk for drug and alcohol abuse, from double to as much as 44 times the risk, including an earlier start down that path.

The researchers reported that sexually abused boys experienced twice the rate of low self-esteem, behavioral problems, and antisocial personality disorder, are twice as likely to run away from home or have legal problems, and three times more likely to have bulimia. They were up to 5 times as likely to report sexually related problems, including sexual dysfunction. Victimized boys were four times as likely as others to experience major depression, and could be up to 14 times more likely to attempt suicide than nonabused males.

It's clear, then, that sexual exploitation is not a lesser issue when the victims are male. While they may be conditioned, for whatever reasons, to remain silent about their trauma, it can be seen in the havoc it wreaks on their emotional state, their mental health, their perception of others, and their choices.

What is not clear is the reason the youth are still made vulnerable to exploitation by staff. Perhaps there is less empathy for the incarcerated. How easily does one become callous toward an impoverished 15 year old kid in a bad situation? Is erasing "kid" from your mental label and replacing it with "juvenile delinquent" all it takes?

If so, that is a terrible mistake.

Never mind that labels like "delinquent" and "inmate" don't justify ignoring an individual's humanity. Forget, if you will, that we are not talking about numbers on a page of information, but the rape of flesh and blood kids who depend on the adults around them for care, nurturing, guidance, and protection. Perhaps those who are heartless enough to disconnect from the imperative to protect children from abuse simply because the child in question is a troubled boy can visit this issue with a little cold, mercenary calculation.

Harvard University and the U.S. Navy both found that a tendency toward sexual predation is not a common male behavior. Ideologues promoting the belief that it is treat these studies as evidence that men don't understand consent. However, what both of them actually show is that sexual predation by men is a rare behavior that most often presents in those who have developed an overall pattern of dysfunctional/criminal violence.

Multiple sources indicate that a history of sexual exploitation by females during youth is a significant risk factor for later perpetration of sex crimes by men. In addition to the studies mentioned in the linked article, the same connection is also reported here and here. The Holms and Slap review also noted that sexually abused males were 4.4 times more likely to have forced someone into sexual contact than nonabused males. Although these various sources contain a variety discussions on the characteristics of sex offenders and their implications, that risk factor is a common thread in all of them.

Not all sexually abused boys will grow up to become sex offenders. The majority of them don't, so sexual abuse during youth is far from a 100% certain predictor. However the data indicates that it is one influencing factor; a push in the wrong direction. Subjecting boys who are already at risk for developing dysfunctional, violent behavior patterns to sexual abuse is likely to increase the percentage of them who go on to commit sex crimes.

In those most at-risk cases, sexual exploitation of boys may be making youth facilities a training camp for future perpetrators. They are not only taught a lack of compassion by staff taking advantage of their subordinate position. They're taught to experience sexual intimacy through manipulation, as a form of abuse, or as a transactional exchange. They're given hands-on training in methods of predatory exploitation, with much of the reported abuse including grooming processes, pressure and intimidation, and/or quid-pro-quo arrangements. This curriculum from hell, regardless of whether it leads to future crimes or not, is guaranteed to have an impact.

It shouldn't take concern over how boys' behavior might be affected by abuse they suffer while incarcerated. These are some of America's most vulnerable kids. They're in corrective facilities because the systems children must depend on to help them grow and develop have at some point failed them. Many of them have been placed in detention facilities after being removed from impoverished, violent environments or situations of neglect. Many enter these facilities with mental health issues. In taking custody, the state is taking responsibility for succeeding where whatever failing points in that system could not. Allowing them to be abused by staff is an egregious human rights violation, an ethics failure, and a failure to uphold the responsibility that is accepted in the act of taking custody of a minor.

This should never happen. It is not that difficult to prevent.
It's time measures were taken to ensure that it stops.

Shock! A critic of the MHRM is lying! Again. (video)

AVfM Video Source · 24 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Steve Shives sure is dedicated to critiquing the MHRM. Too bad he needs lies, omissions and misrepresentations to do it. TL;DR takes him on.

Divorce under Communism (video)

AVfM Video Source · 24 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Our own Lucian Vâlsan, a connoisseur of Communism, has started a series in which he brings real-life stories from the days of Communism into English. In his third episode, he brings a story of a young male university student who married a narcissistic woman and became the victim of paternity fraud. The story focuses on how the regime handled his paternity dispute and his divorce proceedings.

Fair warning: Some of those said in the story may sadly sound very familiar to the realities in some present-day nations.

You can subscribe to Lucian's Freedom Alternative, here.

Mike Rugnetta, you got some ‘splaining to do..... (video)

AVfM Video Source · 25 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The wage gap is real? Is it now? Karen Straughan unpacks how Mike Rugnetta misleads his audience by juxtaposing facts and letting his audience draw erroneous conclusions.

Why men can’t say no to women – Part II

AVfM Video Source · 25 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Why do men find it so hard to say no to women? In this part-II of the series Paul Elam goes to the root of the problem.

Subscribe to An Ear for Men youtube channel

Visit An Ear for Men website

MGTOW, fathers, loss and the cycle of grieving

AVfM Video Source · 25 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The last thing we should be doing to loving fathers who've lost contact with children is saying "they did it to themselves" and that they are always accountable, indeed blameworthy for the result.

YouTuber and Man Going His Own Way Messenger Rising says, "Accountability is a word used in correctional programs for the rehabilitation of criminals or for the rehabilitation of substance abusers and addicts. Acceptance is letting go of denial, anger, bargaining and depression. Adding blame and guilt to a man's suffering is dangerous and could tip him over the edge. Needs to stop.

N.B. Kübler-Ross's grief cycle is a guide and should not be interpreted as a rigid process. The model has been challenged by many but still applies here as it's description of the five stages of grief are clearly evident in many men who've suffered the loss of their children. It has been adapted to suit the subject matter in the video. Improved or more insightful information would be very helpful to others and gratefully received."

https://youtu.be/BSToCqlL6Y0

Srebrenica

Arne Hoffmann · 26 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Note: This article is also available in Italian and Portuguese.

Translator's note: I first read about the unequal treatment of men and women by NGO's in conflict situations last summer in his book Not am Mann – Sexismus gegen Männer (Men in need – Sexism against men) and his book The following article is my translation of an article, published a few days ago by the German writer on men's issues Arne Hoffmann. I first read about the unequal treatment of men and women by NGO's in conflict situations last summer in his book Not am Mann – Sexismus gegen Männer (Men in need – Sexism against men) and his book Plädoyer für eine linke Männerpolitik (Plea for a left wing men's politics). It is not like I had not witnessed callous sexism against men before but that people were intentionally left to die by human rights organisations, i.e. the very groups of people who had devoted their lives to NOT shutting their eyes to human suffering but going into the places that others were fleeing from and helping those in need. The reality of those people who are the last hope for those in danger, leaving men back to die just because of the sex they were born with shook me to the core. It made me really sad for humanity. But then again I had met a person who was working in the UN, a young lecturer teaching a human rights seminar at the university, who had laughed her head off when I had replied to her question of which groups need human rights, with: "men". Back then she asked me which rights men are lacking and all I could think of was father's rights. Now, two years later, having done my research I would have a lot to tell her. But I am still astonished that with her research credentials she wouldn't know herself. I don't know if people do not want to know or are sincerely uninformed. For the general public the latter is certainly true. Which is why I wanted as many people as possible to be able to read the article that Arne Hoffmann published a few days ago on the gender aspects of the massacre in the Kosovo twenty years ago. – karenmcfly

These days, numerous media outlets are publishing articles on the 20th anniversary of the massacre of Srebenica. I have dealt with the gender political relevant aspects of this mass murder in my book Plädoyer für eine linke Männerpolitik (Plea for a left wing men's politics)

In June 1995 the Serbian army attacked the city Srebrenica, in the East of Bosnia-Herzegovina, and systematically slaughtered almost 8,000 men and older boys and thus became responsible for the worst massacre since the end of WW II. Two years before this massacre, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees had evacuated several thousand civilians from the besieged city.

Women, children and the elderly had been allowed to flee through the UN convoys; adult men from the civilian population had been left back in the city – despite the people in charge having been fully aware that, in such cases, it was almost always the male population murdered en masse. Men between the ages of 15 and 60, who had tried to hide among the throngs of refugees, were removed by the people in charge at the UNHCR, who refused to take responsibility for their protection.

Four years after the massacre, in 1999, the United Nations Security Council met in order to discuss the protection of the civilian population in war zones. While, once again primarily male, civilians were being massacred in the Kosovo, the delegates agreed that women and children have a special right to humanitarian support. A study by the human rights organization Human Rights Watch of 3,453 executions in the context of the Kosovo-conflict found that 92 per cent of all victims, whose sex was known, were male. Among other human rights violations, that largely and predominantly affected men, were capture and severe torture. This was also confirmed by reports on the human rights situation in the Kosovo by other organizations. An aid who had stayed back in the villages spoke of a "planet without men", a world of only women and children. The men had been displaced or murdered.

When the gendercide expert, Professor Adam Jones, contacted the president of the human rights center of the United Nations to share his worries about the men who were facing death during the Kosovo conflict, the reply he received consisted of three sentences from an assistant, who thanked Jones but explained that these kinds of questions were not part of the UN-mandate. The women were brought to safety but were visibly distressed about having to leave their men behind in a situation of certain death. “It was not easy to watch, women and children being led away from their menfolk”, Adam Jones cites the reaction of a Dutch member of the UN-peacekeeping forces in the Kosovo and adds: “This statement serves well to summarize the predominant attitude.” Sympathy was directed at the distressed women, not at the men awaiting impending mass murder. Eight months later the massacre of Srebrenica took place. One year later, the UN institution, that Jones had contacted, founded an international coalition for the protection of the human rights of women in situations of conflict.

The international relations expert, Paula Drummond, for her article “invisible men”, examined in particular the Gender-Mainstreaming-policies of the United Nations in the context of the genocide in the Congo, that cost the lives of such a high number of men that in some regions 80 per cent of survivors consist of women and children. The result of Drummond‘s analysis: foundation of the UN policies is the adoption of the so called Gender-Mainstreaming-principle, which, according to the official definition, should address the needs of both genders, but is de facto only applied to benefit women. Despite the United Nations witnessing, again and again, that gender specific violence was mainly directed against men and boys, e.g. in Ruanda and the former Yugoslavia, for them “Gender Politics” consists of protecting women and girls.

Drummond shows that when, for example, boys and men are forced through threat of death to rape their own family members, the UN will later only provide support to the raped women. If the en masse slaughter of men is at all included in a UN report, then it is only because the “resulting scarcity of men leads to more insecurity for households that consist of only adult women” – meaning that dead men impair the life of women. Contrary to all existing findings, it is emphasized again and again, that women and children were particularly at risk in the conflicts mentioned. Generally, the engagement with the conflict in the Congo is dominated by a feminist perspective, which Drummond views as short sighted, since the marginalization of male victims reinforces the cliché of women as vulnerable and continually in need of assistance.

If Gender Studies really was a legitimate academic discipline, these aspects would be among the central research and teaching tenets. Instead they are dominated by the concerns of one gender only. For scientists in other disciplines, Professor Adam Jones, for example, is seen as one of the global leading experts on the topic of genocide, yet from the perspective of Gender Studies he is obviously an ‘unciteworthy’ “old white man”.

This camp takes even more aggressive action against human rights activists who would like to see the suffering of men put on the political agenda as well. By the Ausputzern der Genderszene (Gender activists) such activists are vilified as “Rechte” (far right-wing), as they are apparently pursuing a victim ideology just like the National Socialists did (the actual one-sided feminist victim ideology is not being questioned in the Gender-camp). One should not even talk with these human rights activists, demands, among others, Thomas Gesterkamp, but instead draw a “Cordon Sanitaire” around them. Public broadcast journalists, such as Ralf Homann and Nina Marie Bust-Bartels, like to spread this hatred and don’t seem particularly interested in mass murder that is specifically committed against men.

Thus, the next massacre of this kind will be take place unhindered. Its foundation cannot only be found in other cultures, it is also deeply entrenched in Western society: It is the conviction that only the suffering of women counts and anyone who speaks about the suffering of men is turned into an untouchable and socially executed.

The mindset, that even the death of a great number of humans accounts to nothing and the winning of recognition for one’s own political camp means everything, is familiar to us from several ideologies, which both far left and far right intellectuals indulged in: National Socialism, Stalinism, Maoism and now Feminism and Gender. This mindset returns again and again but that should not keep us from doing all we can to finally overcome it, even if it means becoming ever more a target of hatred.

It is grotesque when, in the face of such hideousness, we are asked to stay emotionally detached and indifferent. Otherwise, one gets vilified as an “angry white man”, and thus declared not worthy of having an opinion. Then again, this mechanism only works in the mind of ideologues. Personally, I prefer anger in this context. It is by all means better than depression.

This article was originally published in German on "Genderama" and then on "Cuncti"

Feature image: Srebrenica massacre memorial gravestones, Wikipedia.

U.S. Navy Triples Maternity Leave for Women – Leaves Men Out

Michael Conzachi · 27 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The United States Navy has just increased maternity leave for female sailors and Marines from 6 weeks to 18 weeks. This applies to current active duty personnel and all incoming personnel in an effort to increase its ranks of women.

Naval Chief of Naval Personnel spokesman Commander Chris Servello said that the benefit will not extend to adoptive parents or new fathers.

Navy Secretary Ray Mabus said: "Meaningful maternity leave when it matters most is one of the best ways that we can support the women who serve our county. When the women in our Navy and Marine Corps answer the call to serve, they are making the difficult choice to be away from their children—sometimes for prolonged periods of time—so that they can do the demanding jobs that we ask them to do, with increased maternity leave, we can demonstrate the commitment of the Navy and Marine Corps to the women who are committed to serve."

The Navy has indicated that there will be no significant cost associated with this new policy, but commenters have other opinions. Apparently, there is no information as to who will fill in those spots when a female takes 18 weeks off to care for a newborn.

A number of news articles and press releases have been issued with many comments by readers. As the articles reveal, there are both positive comments and negative comments regarding this policy, but of course in common sense terms, this is in fact a discriminatory policy. While many tout the benefits of the time to nurture newborns by their mothers, there does not seem to be the same concern of the nurturing effects from fathers.

Many of the articles cite and claim that due to duty considerations, female military members suffer from time away from their newborns, and this policy will help to bridge that gap.

I guess it doesn't matter about the amount of time fathers have to be away from their children while on duty assignments away from their home bases or on deployment to combat areas. I guess none of the Marines who fought in Battle of Fallujah, of which nearly 100 died, were surveyed about this proposal.

Commentor JrocGnomeSayin states:

> "I didn't say women make the choice purely for the time off. I am however pointing out the inequality between men and women service members. This is just another push to keep women feminazis who already have it made even happier in the military."

Regardless of the apparent goal of retaining and recruiting more females in the Navy and Marines, we have yet another example of preferences and benefits that are afforded to females and not to males.

Perhaps a compromised proposal would have been more equal such as an increase in family leave time to be used equally by both parents, but that of course would have been viewed as misogynistic.

Landmark victory for due process at UC San Diego

Jonathan Taylor · 27 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

1. DOWNLOAD THE ORDER BY JUDGE PRESSMAN HERE. READ IT.
2. The lawsuits database has been updated. Check it out!

Sound the trumpets far and wide, and share this with your friends and neighbors.Vindication for the wrongly accused has been obtained in the recently-decided case Doe vs. Regents of the University of California-San Diego (UCSD). In this case you will see hard evidence of how this pit of vipers – otherwise known as the UCSD Student Life administration – railroaded a wrongly accused student through a judiciary process so twisted that it insults the very notion of justice.

This is not a settlement case; as one that has carried itself full-term it establishes a precedent for future cases. Furthermore, the Order by Judge Joel M. Pressman was granted in behalf of the wrongly accused in the name of due process, a phrase which resounds throughout his writing. That makes this a direct hit (albeit one of many that we will ultimately need) on the framework of higher education policy that we need to dismantle.

Background

This case involves John Doe (age 20) and Jane Roe (age 19). The Complaint argues that John Doe was "effectively expelled from UCSD for allegedly trying to touch Jane Roe in a manner that was unwanted in the morning of February 1, 2014."

Also, for "four and half months after the February 1, 2014 incident Jane Roe referred to her 24 encounter with Petitioner that weekend as 'rape.'" Somehow she was able to haveadmittedly consensual sex with her "rapist" later that same day and send him loving text messages – evidence later suppressed during the administrative hearing.

The Dean of Student Affairs Sherry L. Mallory is a notable "women's 'rights' advocate"; I trust we know what that is code for. According to the Complaint she is "co-chair of the NASPA Western Regional Conference, which advocates against rights for accused male students, including against the right to counsel, against the right to challenge adverse findings in court, and against the right to obtain monetary damages for false accusations."

John Doe was "tried" in a hearing that was basically a sham, and the panel's judgment ("findings") were entered against him by SCSD in December 2014. He then sought to appeal the case to have the school look at it again only for Dean of Student Affairs Sherry Mallory to punish him further for appealing. As mentioned in the Complaint:

> ..at each step where Petitioner disagreed with UCSD and exercised his right of appeal, UCSD substantially increased his sanctions, as if in retaliation and so as to discourage Petitioner and other similarly situated students from exercising their legal rights to appeal.

This is obscenely corrupt behavior on the part of Dean Mallory.

Attorneys Matthew Haberkorn and Mark Hathaway represented John Doe in this case.The legal Complaint against UC-San Diego was filed on April 2 of this year. Judge Pressman granted the Order on July 10 in behalf of John Doe. While John Doe's work with the attorneys in this case lasted ~8 months, this case went from Complaint filing to Order in three and a half months. Not bad.

The bogus hearing

Here are the members of the Administrative Panel (hereafter referred to as The Panel):

- Panel Chair – Ms. Rebecca Otten, Director of Strategic Partnerships/Housing Allocations
- Panelist – Mr. Jeffrey Hill, Assistant Director (The Village) of Residence life
- Panelist – Mr. Kris Nelson, Representative of the Graduate Student Association.

Look at their titles. “Strategic Partnerships and Housing Allocations”? “Representative of the Graduate Student Association”? And so forth. Does anyone seriously think these people, either individually or collectively, have the competence to hold a trial for sexual assault and determine guilt?

I will briefly list the key flaws of this sham hearing below; for a more thorough breakdown read the Order granted by Judge Pressman.

1. The case turned upon the word of the accuser alone.
2. Jane Roe “admitted that she voluntarily continued consensual sexual activity with Mr. Doe later that very same day.” This evidence was not considered by the Panel, which disregarded it entirely.
3. John Doe was denied the right to confront his accuser and was not allowed to ask her anything directly. When he sought to question or scrutinize Jane Doe’s accusations his questions were forwarded to the Panel Chair Rebecca Otten, who then determined which questions would be allowed to be asked of his accuser. In particular, Rebecca Otten “refused to ask [Jane Doe] questions 13 through 19, which concerned Ms. Roe’s text messages to Mr. Doe.” These texts revealed John Doe and Jane Roe’s relationship after the “rape.”
4. Not only did Panel Chair Rebecca Otten deny John Doe’s questions to be raised, she allowed the accuser to only halfway answer the questions he was actually allowed to raise.
5. The accuser was hidden behind a screen for the entire hearing so she could not be seen by the panel or John Doe. Judge Pressman noted that this is problematic, stating that it is important in any fact finding process to ascertain “demeanor and non-verbal communication [from the accuser] in order to properly evaluate credibility. This is especially true given that the panel made findings in this case from Ms. Roe’s testimony and her credibility.”
6. The Panel relied on the hearsay and testimony of people who weren’t even present at the hearing.
7. Even worse, after submitting hearsay as evidence The Panel denied John Doe the opportunity to question or refute the hearsay!
8. John Doe invoked his right to remain silent; however, the fact that he remained silent was noted by The Panel as suggestive of him being guilty. In any respectable court of law, remaining silent cannot be used to “prove” guilt.

There are so many personal fouls in this entire process at UCSD that it strains credulity to characterize the conduct of these administrators as mere negligence. The only difference between these administrators and ten thousand others is that this time they were caught.

There have been many other men tossed into the snake pit of an administrative hearing. Unfortunately, many of them did not find any semblance of justice. But the more we see cases like this, the more I have hope.

[Ed. note: this post originally appeared at A Voice for Male Students and is reprinted here with permission.]

Sexual grievance lobby recoils at app designed to protect innocent men

Pierce Harlan · 27 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Amelia McDonell-Parry had a hissy fit over the "We-Consent" app that aims "to encourage discussion about affirmative consent between mutual partners" by recording a 20 second video of consent being given/received.

First, McDonnell-Parry rolls her eyes over the fact that the creator of this app was a "dude." Because, presumably, "dudes" have nothing positive to contribute to the public discourse when it comes interactions between men and women. The only voices that count are those of Amelia McDonell-Parry and other members of the sexual grievance lobby.

Second, McDonell-Parry notes that these apps are "icky" (a grown-up term, no?) and unnecessary because they were "created in support of the false narrative which says that women lie about being raped all the time, and thus men need to be protected from bogus accusations. Nothing could be further from the truth." She insists that False rape accusations "are exceedingly rare."

Let's pause and review the facts as opposed to the sexual grievance lobby's talking points. (To quote McDonnell-Parry, let's cut the shit, dude.) Wanna use numbers, McDonnell-Parry? Okay, let's use numbers. Consider a survey that the sexual grievance industry relies on. Here's how it comes down: 15.6 of rape reports can reliably be classified as false, just 7.8 percent of rape reports can be classified as true. Or how about this–again, using surveys the sexual grievance lobby relies on: an economist proved their one-in-five stat is way too high. Not his opinion–he used their own numbers. Scary, isn't it? But, I mean, if you want to use numbers, we can use numbers, too.

Third, McDonnell-Parry tosses out what she, apparently, thinks is a rhetorical question. "Seriously, people, specifically DUDES, is it really so hard to know for sure if the person you're having sex with wants to be there?"

Okay, again, let's look at the facts. A new Washington Post and the Kaiser Family Foundation survey reveals that a full 44 percent of college women think that when a woman gives a guy a "nod in agreement," that isn't enough for consent. Only 51 percent–the barest of majorities–think "a nod in agreement" indicates consent. So, McDonnell-Parry, if 44 percent of all college women think their nod in agreement does not signal consent, then, yes, I'd say it really might be that hard to know for sure if she wants to "be there."

Further, feminist Brett Sokolow, the leader of the campus sexual grievance industry, last year wrote that "in a lot of these cases [involving accusations of sexual assault], the campus is holding the male accountable in spite of the evidence – or the lack thereof – because they think they are supposed to . . .." And: "We see complainants who genuinely believe they have been assaulted, despite overwhelming proof that it did not happen." Read it again–"overwhelming proof." Sokolow added that he sees "case-after-case" where "sincere victims . . . believe something has happened to them that evidence shows absolutely did not . . . ." He suggested mental health issues play an important factor in these false accusations. It's easy to have misunderstandings in the bedroom when one party concocts rape out of whole cloth.

Further, the National Institute of Justice has said that when it comes to rape surveys, some people don't give accurate survey answers, but it also noted the possibility that men and women may have different perceptions of the same incident. Of course, that doesn't matter to the sexual grievance lobby. The "yes means yes" movement thinks that "consent is to be determined from the perspective of the complainant." To hell with men's perceptions.

As for McDonnell-Parry's insistence that the new app is unnecessary in this era of affirmative consent, the co-author of California's affirmative consent bill in the state assembly, Bonnie Lowenthal, D-Long Beach, was asked how an innocent person is supposed to prove consent.She said this: "Your guess is as good as mine." Nice.

But McDonnell-Parry doesn't bother with any of those facts. Nevertheless, she is correct about this: the app cannot guard against someone changing her mind after she's given consent. Let's consider the reality: if a trier of fact sees a woman giving clear consent via this app, it's going to be pretty damn difficult to convict the guy of rape for something that happened later that night. Prosecutors likely won't even bother with cases like that–and, no, that's not necessarily a good thing. The goal here is not to "get away" with rape, it's to protect those who are legitimately innocent. The second worst enemy of the wrongly accused (after their accusers) are sociopaths who rape–they diminish the credibility of every guy accused of rape. It's in everyone's interest to get them off the streets.

On the flip side, if enough college kids started using this strange app, when a hapless college boy who failed to use it is wrongly accused of rape, the fact that he didn't use it might be cited as proof that there was no consent. That, too, is not a good thing.

I scarcely think I need to defend this blog's credentials when it comes to concern for the wrongly accused, but the new consent app strikes me as a barometer of a sad hook-up culture where drunken barnyard rutting has displaced the staid, time-honored rituals of courtship and delayed gratification. I wouldn't say the app is "icky," perhaps "distasteful" is more appropriate.

This app is a lot of things I don't like, but please don't try to tell me that misunderstandings in the bedroom are not a serious concern, or that the men of the hook-up culture have no need to worry about proving consent, because they do. So what's the solution? We need to come up with better ways to protect the innocent or else we're going to see more and more things like this app, as "icky" and as distasteful as they might be.

[Ed. note: this post originally appeared at Community of the Wrongly Accused and is reprinted here with permission.]

New study does not show that gamers are sexist

Lee Turner · 27 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

…but that does not prevent Caitlin Dewey of Washington Post from reporting it as such. On July 21, her article reprinted in the Sydney Morning Herald stated that;

> "Some male players, … who were less-skilled at the game, and performing worse relative their peers (sic) — made frequent, nasty comments to the female gamers. In other words, sexist dudes are literally losers."

The study in question is a joint effort between Universities of Miami and New South Wales, titled "Insights into Sexism: Male Status and Performance Moderates Female-Directed Hostile and Amicable Behaviour," and published in the online journal PLOS ONE. Its full text is available on their website and will take the inquisitive reader an hour or so to thread through. The last paragraph of its results section reads:

> "We found that the presence of sexist statements was not determined by differences in maximum skill achieved…, the number of deaths…. or the number of kills… relative to the experimental player."

In other words the study does not show that bad players are sexist, or that "hostile sexism" is a wide-spread phenomenon in online gaming. Yet Dewey and the author continue to talk about sexism throughout The Washington Post article. If one takes the time to read the study, they would see that it appears to reveal a correlation between the player's performance and skill level and the types of comments they received from other players, where the female avatar seemed to be subjected to greater criticism (which is distinct from sexism by the study's own terms) than the male. It is as if, the researches might have been looking for a specific outcome – blanket condemnation of the female avatar. There is an earlier study (2013) by Kuznekoff , using the same dataset, whose abstract reads, "…on average, the female voice received three times as many negative comments as the male voice or no voice. In addition, the female voice received more queries and more messages from other gamers than the male voice or no voice." The obvious question one might be asking here is, "Why did the female avatar receive more messages and is the number of negative messages simply proportional to the overall number received in comparison to the male avatar?" We have no evidence of the researchers' bias other than the text of the 2015 study. Its abstract begins with the words:

> "Gender inequality and sexist behaviour is prevalent in almost all workplaces and rampant in online environments."

In the introduction, they continue to state that:

> "…video games remain a bastion of sexual stereotypes and inequality for several reasons. First, men are often graphically depicted as aggressive and hypermasculine, while women are portrayed in an overly sexualized manner and are more often depicted as damsels in distress."

The language here sounds eerily similar to the discourse surrounding the recent #gamergate controversy.

The study data seems to show that lower-ranking players are more negative to the female avatar, while the higher-ranking one are more positive. Dewey reports that the researcher interprets this as evidence of low-status male players responding to an intrusion of women into a social hierarchy where they have more to lose than the incoming women or the higher-status players. Next, she quotes him to the effect that this is a reflection of a real life dynamic where, "sexism is a kind of Neanderthal defence mechanism for low-status, non-dominant men trying to maintain a shaky grip on their particular cave's supply of women." They go on to say that "the increase in hostility towards a woman by lower-status males may be an attempt to disregard a female's performance and suppress her disturbance on the hierarchy to retain their social rank." Aside from the obvious feminist bias, Kuznekoff's cavalier attitude to what Neanderthal society may have been like is a curious one for a scientist.

This study is unusually open for scrutiny, having published a part of its data set. On the surface, it offers scientific evidence that women are treated negatively in the almost exclusively male environment of online gaming (no females spoke during the trial indicating that either none were present or that none were willing to speak). The author's fanciful projection of his results onto real life can be set aside with the simple observation that people play games as a means of escape from the real world and to state that sexual competition take place as soon as a female appears in the midst of mostly male players is a big, big stretch. Nevertheless, the study is worth further attention.

The methodology is as follows; a number of simple, inoffensive phrases were recorded with a male and female voice and three new Xbox 360 accounts were set up to play Halo 3, resulting in entry-level players. As the games progressed, the player would broadcast the pre-recorded phrases in a male or female voice exclusively. The games were recorded on video and their dialogue, outcomes and player rankings were transcribed and analysed. The authors published the list of phrases used, some examples of the comments the avatars received and the data table containing the outcomes of the games and the associated number of negative and positive comments. This table contains a special column "Sexism" with a value of either yes or no to indicate which games were deemed to contain sexist commentary. There is also a "Game" column, containing a code that allows the entries to be sorted in chronological order. The experimental player's skill can be seen to rise from zero to 26.

The statistical analysis they presented in the study can be reproduced using this data, however the context of the commentary cannot be determined without seeing the videos. Without the video, we cannot verify if the negativity might have stemmed from inappropriate use of pre-recorded phrases, whose arsenal was limited (3-4 for each situation). Broadcasting, "That was a good game everyone" after a thrashing may not have produced a positive response. Also, could the human players tell if the avatar was using pre-recorded messages? If they could, did that affect their responses? How this might be a problem as far as the reality of the gaming experience encountered is concerned, can also be illustrated by looking at some of the instances of "hostile sexism," where the female avatar might receive 2 negative comments of which one or both were deemed as "sexist" but also receive 7 positive and 1 neutral from the same player in the same game (Player ID 178, Game F061709A).

Also absent from the table is the control group of games, where no voice was used – the players could not tell if the avatar was male or female. Had it been included, it would have provided a "background radiation" reading of the types of comments a player might expect with the gender cue removed. Furthermore, the number of comments made by the avatars is not recorded. This could have been significant. As the researchers note themselves, the female avatar received a lot more comments than the male. Was this a factor of how talkative the female avatar was? Finally, the Sexism criteria could arguably have been extended onto the male avatar for comments such as "You suck dick" (example as per the study's addendum), however this does not appear to have been attempted. Finally there is very limited discussion of the small sample size which may have distorted the results.

It is up to the researcher to ask such questions of themselves and their data, in lieu of which we shall do so here at AVfM.

82 Female and 81 male games were recorded with 82 individual teammates speaking to the female avatar and 65, speaking to the male avatar (roughly 5:4 proportion). The results can be summed up as follows:

[image]

Even though the win/loss ratio is about 5:3 for both male and female, we can see that, the female avatar received more than twice the negative comments than the male. But, they also received more comments of any type. Additionally, they played with higher-ranking players in both Team Slayer and overall game skill then the male. Looking at the deaths and kills – these too are much higher than in the male avatar games, indicating a different and more dynamic game experience. So, what the researchers assert can, arguably be evidenced by looking at the negative comments alone. But the other statistics suggest otherwise or even the opposite. These were team efforts and what we might be looking at is the result of team effort rather than individual performances.

Running a pivot table on type of comment vs game outcome reveals an interesting dynamic:

[image]

Setting aside that the players seem to be more willing to talk to the female avatar, the proportion of negative comments is slightly higher for women – 100:56 vs 100:53; i.e. when one divides the negative comments in games lost by the same in games won, a higher number is produced indicating that women receive proportionally more criticism when the game was lost as compared to men. However, players are much more supportive or neutral to the female avatar when the game is lost, to wit, 100:55 for women vs 100:34 for men, for positive comments. This statistic contradicts the researchers' original assertion that women are expected to encounter predominantly negative treatment in an all-male gaming environment. Could it be that the study's results are not a factor of sexism in gaming, but of player or team performance, that seems to be, gasp, positively modified by gender? Of the 11 instances of sexism in the comments, 9 occurred in games that were won, which as discussed earlier always occur together with positive and neutral comments. The researcher points out that the sample size containing "hostile sexism" is not sufficient to be useful in statistical analysis. Is it possible that this low "sexism" score made the researchers look at other ways to interpret the data?

When the female avatar's rising skill level through the course of the 82 games they play is plotted against the negative comments they receive, the following picture emerges:

[image]

A similar picture is observed for the male avatar:

[image]

In fact, nothing in the 2015 report suggests that the avatar's rising gaming skill was a consideration, despite there being a control group with no voice that could have controlled for non-gendered cues. Judging by the language used and sources cited, the researchers' sole focus was gender and not performance.

Confirmation of bias is all that one will find if that is all they look for. It is no small wonder that this study attracts the attention of a feminist ideologue such as Caitlin Dewey or any number of others.

In conclusion, it would be fair to address the argument that is sure to arise here: "The study does show that lower-ranking players are more negative to a female avatar that to a male one." To which the answer is – is it does show that, but does not show it is because the avatar is female. There are plenty of other variables in the study, some indicating that the female avatar is treated preferentially by the players. In fact, the only link between ill treatment and "hostile sexism" is deemed to be statistically insignificant and is discarded by the researchers themselves.

New Rule: Stop pretending to joke

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 27 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Bill Maher, a political comedian, jumped on the circumcision bandwagon to his dream world of pretty pink pleatless penises. I was half expecting him to follow his same line of thought with something like "more nose jobs for Jew babies," or a rousing monologue on the delicate flavor of a vagina once doused in acid, but it turns out the act concluded only with a jab at intactivists. We have some of the same choices as always:

1. Get offended
2. Laugh, agree, and move on
3. Laugh, disagree, and move on

I choose the third option because I don't take comedians seriously—which is what they say they want. Jokes don't offend me, but double standards, emotional manipulation, and unaccountable personalities sure do.

For that reason there is one thing I do take seriously about Bill Maher, and it's the same thing that I take seriously about John Oliver, Larry Wilmore, Lewis Black and many other political comedians: They want people to take them seriously right up until someone calls bullshit.

Have you ever seen comedians use comedy as an excuse to dodge responsibility for saying what they think while not joking, only to turn to their polarized audiences and act as if they're courageously honest in the face of scumbags like you for taking them so seriously? Because it was never about the comedian being serious during his political rants, nor was it about the audience taking the comedian's points seriously by agreeing loudly. No, only critics are serious, those free-speech-opposing overgrown children!

Thankfully, there have been times when political comedy giants point out the elephant in the room:

> [The jokes we do on The Daily Show] provide a little catharsis or perspective, but most of the stuff we complain about never changes. The point is don't you use our jokes as evidence that the thing you hate must be stopped cause I'm sure when we joke about shit you like, you're more than happy to agree.
>
> —Jon Stewart, in response to media backlash over his coverage of ObamaCare

Although Stewart and company are not neutral, they have talent. The problem is that political comedians equivocate on the nature of their humor depending on if fans are engaging them at the time. Bill Maher only affirms the beauty of the below procedure around applause, because men like us wanting their dicks to look more suckable, right?

The best way to challenge folks like Bill in this case is not to get offended, but to play the game. If the caterwauling studio audiences only laugh at jokes that trivialize what matters to their political opponents, then as far as I'm concerned, they can take what they dish out. Political comedians are often as manipulative, slimy and unaccountable as politicians, but they exist because of smug prigs who act like getting their opinions from Comedy Central and HBO is a qualification. Mock them back. Comedy needs jokes of all kinds, not monopolizing agendas masquerading as jokes.

Obviously, jokes on sensitive topics like rape, acid baths, circumcision and your mom are not serious because they are jokes. But if political comics and their fans take issue with certain kinds of humor on topics they find sacred, then they admit that they were only pretending to joke to hide an agenda. At that moment, political comedians will become funnier than ever, but not for reasons their fans want to hear.

This post originally appeared on Zen Men.

XoJane publishes obviously fake story

AVfM Video Source · 27 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Last year, XoJane published a laughable story about a "Date with an MRA" published by an anonymous person claiming to be a victim of his sexual assault. It's so cringe inducing and obviously fake it was hardly worth responding to when it came out, but, young people and those new to gender politics might not know about the daily lies told about MRAs even in "mainstream" publication like XoJane. But here, we'll let this young MRA speak for himself, and take it as read that this is our position until someone shows us real proof that this isn't a fake story.

Subscribe to MiniBagel here.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=I2weG5QoPMg

US leading the way in fatherlessness

Nikita Coulombe · 28 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original America leads the industrialized world in fatherlessness.

Right now, around 41 percent of children are born to single mothers.

For women under 30, who bear two-thirds of all children, that rate is 53 percent.

Many unmarried women are cohabiting with partners at the outset of their children's births, but those couplings disintegrate at twice the rate of marriages.

In total, about one-third of all children are raised in father-absent homes.

By some estimates, this means more kids are growing up with televisions in their bedroom than with both of their biological parents.

Boys are especially affected by this trend. Without positive and consistent male role models, society misses out on much of their constructive potential.

It's no coincidence 70 percent of male inmates did not grow up with both parents, for example.

Even for those with fathers, the average school-age boy spends just half an hour per week in one-on-one conversation with his father, according to David Walsh, founder of Mind Positive Parenting.

> "That compares with 44 hours a week in front of a television, video game screen, [and] Internet screen," he says. "I think that we are neglecting our boys tremendously. The result of that is our boys aren't spending time with mentors, with elders, who can really show them the path, show them the way of how it is that we're supposed to behave as healthy men."

Across the board, children with intact families have more advantages than their fatherless peers.

A report published by The Center for Disease Control and Prevention says children of married biological parents or adoptive parents are healthier, have fewer definite or severe emotional or behavioral difficulties and are less likely to grow up in poverty.

They also have more friends.

When Gen-Y children were surveyed in elementary school, those who were living with their fathers scored better on 21 of 27 social competence measures.

They were also more likely to excel and go further in school, performing better on eight out of nine academic measures.

The gap between rich and poor will keep getting worse as fatherlessness rises among those of lower socioeconomic status.

Children who grow up without fathers are more likely to become single mothers or absent dads, use drugs, have low academic achievement and are less likely to believe in marriage or have successful marriages.

The charts below illustrate this point:

Figure 5. Percent distribution of family structure for poor children under age 18: United States, 2001–2007

Figure 7. Percent distribution of family structure for not poor children under age 18: United States, 2001–2007

On average, a little over 3 million children in the US receive welfare benefits, known as Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF) or State Supplemental Program (SSP), each month during the fiscal year.

A recent report from Pew Research indicated 18 percent of American adults have received assistance from the Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program (SNAP), or "food stamps," at some point in their lives, and Democrats were twice as likely as Republicans to have used food stamps.

Women were about twice as likely as men, and black people were twice as likely as white people to have received food stamps.

People over 65 years old were the least likely age group to say they had received food stamps, while people with less education – a high school diploma or lower – were three times more likely than college graduates to have received those benefits.

Women who marry or maintain a home with the biological father of their children can face the reduction or loss of their benefits, according to the US Department of Health and Human Services:

> "Our main finding is that if a male has financial resources, TANF provides the greatest disincentive to form and/or maintain a biological family, and the least disincentive, if not an incentive, to form an unrelated cohabitor family. In a biological family, where the male is the father of all the children, he must be included in the unit and his resources counted.
>
> In an unrelated cohabitor family, where he is father of none of the children, he is not included and his resources are not counted. In addition, most states disregard unrelated cohabitor vendor and cash payments to the TANF recipient and her children."

In other words, the current structure of TANF actually promotes having nearly any man but the biological father heading the house.

Women are also about six times likelier to get sole custody of their children after separating from their fathers.

In some cases, men even go to jail for falling behind on child support payments.

In South Carolina, for example, about one out of seven inmates are imprisoned for this very reason, and 75 percent of them were unemployed or having trouble finding work.

How sending them to jail will help them, their families, or taxpayers is a mystery.

And. again, for children with fathers, dads are missing out on crucial bonding time.

Children who had frequent and positive interactions with their fathers, such as the father paying attention to the child's interests, offering encouragement and smiling, during the first year of their lives were calmer and better behaved than other children at age two.

This was especially true for boys.

Involved dads also reduce the chances of their infants experiencing cognitive delays, and fathers themselves feel more confident about their job skills, parenting skills and social relationships.

The US is an oddity among Western nations in not granting statutory paid maternity or paternity leave or providing childcare at a reasonable cost.

This creates a situation where women are forced to choose between work and family (to "lean in" or "lean out"), while men have no option but to "lean in" or just opt out altogether.

These trends paint a very disconnected picture, but that can change.

The government can step up by commissioning a White House Council on Boys and Men.

There is currently a White House Council on Girls and Women, but they have yet to support a similar platform for men, even though it has been proposed and endorsed by a number of experts.

Creating policies that support a father's right to be present in his children's lives during divorce and custody battle situations, eliminating perverse welfare incentives for parents to live apart, offering men paternity leave equal to maternity leave, providing childcare for both mothers and fathers and encouraging family members to visit inmates would also be steps in the right direction.

Sponsoring a nationwide male mentorship program to bring more positive male figures into children's lives would also help reverse these trends.

To be number one, America must strengthen its families, not lead the way in fatherlessness.

[Ed. note: This post originally appeared at Elite Daily and is reprinted here with the author's permission.]

Save our Sons and Oppose CASA (S.590)

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 28 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The National Coalition for Men (NCFM) Carolinas chapter caught wind of a new development regarding the Campus Accountability and Safety Act (CASA; S.590 / H.R. 1310), federal legislation that endangers the rights of male students: Panelists are assembling to discuss the future of your sons starting this Wednesday, July 29th at 9 AM EST.

NCFM has ten excellent reasons to oppose CASA, but those reasons have no teeth unless you voice them to your representatives, some of which are attending. This meeting is not being broadcast to the public, so there is no better time to remind the people who govern our lives that we are on to them.

You can find a list of panelists at the bottom of this article. Those of you who are aware of the debate on due process rights might recognize some of these names, and recall that they are not interested in protections for the accused.

If you want to promote due process and a functional judicial system, call the members of the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions (HELP) committee this Tuesday, between 9 AM and 4:30 PM EST and tell them to oppose CASA (S.590). You do not need to call everyone on this list, just focus on the ones for your state so that you approach the situation as a constituent.

Do not let the Bystander Effect win. It is up to you to stand up for the principle of "innocent until proven guilty." If you do not make the call, it will be easier for CASA to put your son at risk of expulsion and conviction based solely on hearsay. Do not stay silent. If you want change, then flood the lines, and do not back down.

Remember, contact the record for your state this TUESDAY, JULY 28th during EST business hours and tell them to oppose CASA (S.590).

Senate Office	State	Phone	Who to contact
Alexander, Lamar	TN	(202) 224-4944	Robert_Moran@help.senate.gov
Baldwin, Tammy	WI	(202) 224-5653	Brian_Moulton@baldwin.senate.gov
Bennet, Michael	CO	(202) 224-5852	Juliana_Herman@bennet.senate.gov
Burr, Richard	NC	(202) 224-3154	Chris_Toppings@burr.senate.gov
Casey, Robert	PA	(202) 224-6324	jared_soloman@casey.senate.gov
Cassidy, Bill	LA	(202) 224-5824	pranay_udutha@cassidy.senate.gov
Collins, Susan	ME	(202) 224-2523	Katie_Brown@collins.senate.gov
Enzi, Michael	WY	(202) 224-3424	kristin_chapman@help.senate.gov
Franken, Al	MN	(202) 224-5641	hannah_katch@franken.senate.gov
Hatch, Orrin	UT	(202) 224-5251	Katie_Neal@hatch.senate.gov
Isakson, Johnny	GA	(202) 224-3643	Brett_Layson@isakson.senate.gov
Kirk, Mark	IL	(202) 224-2854	brian_looser@kirk.senate.gov
Mikulski, Barbara	MD	(202) 224-4654	brent_palmer@mikulski.senate.gov
Murkowski, Lisa	AK	(202) 224-6665	karen_mccarthy@murkowski.senate.gov
Murphy, Christopher	CT	(202) 224-4041	russell_armstrong@murphy.senate.gov
Murray, Patty	WA	(202) 224-2621	Sarah_Bolton@help.senate.gov
Paul, Rand	KY	(202) 224-4343	natalie_burkhalter@paul.senate.gov
Roberts, Pat	KS	(202) 224-4774	joshua_yurek@roberts.senate.gov

Senate Office	State	Phone	Who to contact
Sanders, Bernie	VT	(202) 224-5141	david_cohen@sanders.senate.gov
Scott, Tim	SC	(202) 224-6121	daniel_bunn@scott.senate.gov
Warren, Elizabeth	MA	(202) 224-4543	julie_morgan@warren.senate.gov
Whitehouse, Sheldon	RI	(202) 224-2921	brenna_barber@whitehouse.senate.gov

Panel I Attendees

- Senator Claire McCaskill
- Senator Dean Heller
- Senator Kirsten Gillibrand
- Senator Kelly Ayotte

Panel II Attendees

- Janet Napolitano, President, University of California, Oakland, CA
- Dana Bolger, Co-Founder, Know Your IX, Washington, D.C.
- Dolores Stafford, President & CEO, D. Stafford & Associates, Rehoboth Beach, DE;
- Mollie Benz Flounlacker, Associate Vice President for Federal Relations, Association of American Universities, Washington, D.C.

This post originally appeared on Zen Men.

Price discrimination against men is fine. Against women, it's sexism.

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 28 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

A new study finds that auto insurance providers discriminate against women, charging them higher rates if they are single or newly widowed. James Lynch, an actuary with the Insurance Information Institute assured reporters from NBC News that insurance companies base their pricing models on hard data, accounting for a number of variables that have been proven to accurately predict the risk of any given driver getting in an accident. "Insurance companies don't pull these variables out of the hat," he said. "They look very closely to see what variables will reflect their likelihood to have accidents and adjust rates accordingly."

Unmoved by the argument, the Director of Insurance for the Consumer Federation of America, Robert Hunter, told NBC news that he found it 'difficult to make any direct correlation between driving risk and marital status', further stating that he felt the discriminatory pricing might 'violate actuarial standards'. According to Hunter, the insurance industry 'has been moving away from the traditional approach of basing premiums on known risk factors, such as the number of tickets a motorist has, and whether they have been involved in accidents. Instead, he said, there is more use of what he described as "spurious" data for which it can be difficult to show a real cause-and-effect.'

However, when the price discrimination is against men, particularly young men, the Insurance Information Institute is curiously unconcerned about spurious data. Spokesman Mike Barry explains that '[a]cross the board, you see young men paying more for insurance, which makes sense. Statistically, young men are riskier drivers, which means they are, on average, more expensive to insure.' 20 year old single men pay 24% more for auto insurance, than 20 year old married men, on the assumption that 'individuals—particularly young individuals—get more serious about being better drivers when they're married', according to Robert Hunter, the same man who claims that there is no relationship between risk and marital status when it comes to women.

An argument is often made by feminists that sexism against men is impossible, because men do not face culture-wide, institutional discrimination that affects their well-being, physically, socially or economically. The wide gender gap in criminal sentencing suggests men face powerful institutional forces that treat them differently solely on the basis of their gender, and the global under-funding of men's healthcare similarly suggests that men's physical well-being is rarely prioritized over the health and well-being of girls and women. Price discrimination in the auto insurance industry decried as sexism when it applies to women, provides evidence that men are economically harmed for no reason other than that they are men.

Sexism against men may be invisible to even those individuals charged with exploring the issues in a very explicit way, such as Robert Hunter, but that does not mean sexism against men does not exist. Single men considering an auto insurance policy need only compare their quotes to single women or married men to know that stereotypes about men are regularly engaged and used to punish men, even when the correlations used to justify those stereotypes are 'spurious' and may 'violate actuarial standards.' These accusations are only worthy of consideration when they affect women.

And that's what sexism looks like.

[Ed. note: This article originally appeared at the Examiner and is reprinted here with permission.]

Answering people who argue with nonexistent MRAs (video)

AVfM Video Source · 28 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Is it just us or is the number of young voices speaking out for civil and human rights for boys and men growing?

You can subscribe to Spinosauruskin here.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=dG5LDiPyTfQ&feature=youtu.be Scientology leader's father set to release tell all memoir debunking church

Linsey Bald · 28 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Ronald Miscavige Sr., the father of Scientology leader David Miscavige, has agreed to write an expected scathing tell-all chronicle about his son and his Church of Scientology beliefs and practices created by American author L. Ron Hubbard.

The book, to be published by St. Martin's Press, will be titled If He Dies, He Dies – an alleged snarky comment made by David when he was advised his father may be suffering from a heart ailment.

[image]
David Miscavige
Writes the Hollywood Reporter: "The title refers to a story in an April 8 Los Angeles Times article that revealed David Miscavige had put his father under surveillance because he had grown estranged from the church and his son. When one investigator saw Ron grab his chest in an apparent heart attack, he called his Scientology employers to see if he should intervene. David personally called him back and said, 'If he dies, he dies.'"

The 79-year-old Miscavige formally disassociated himself from the Church of Scientology back in 2012, and has since been reportedly estranged from his son David, 55.

Miscavige Sr. introduced his son to Scientology when he was a boy. In 1971 the family formally joined the church and eventually moved to the world headquarters in Saint Hill Manor, England.

Since Hubbard's death in 1986, David Miscavige has been the ecclesiastical leader of the Scientology religion.

The Los Angeles Times article revealed that Miscavige Jr. hired two investigators and paid them $10,000 per week to "spy" on his father for over a year. That will most certainly be discussed in the book, which is expected to touch on some of the same deconstructions as revealed in the 2015 HBO documentary film Going Clear: Scientology and the Prison of Belief.

Since word of the book deal broke, the notoriously litigious Church of Scientology released a statement, denying the incident that led to the book's official title, and stating that David has always cared for his father.

"Mr. Miscavige has always taken care of his father and continues to do so. Beyond that, as a matter of policy, neither the Church nor Mr. Miscavige comments on members of his family. The Church knows nothing beyond media reports about any purported book," Scientology spokesman Karen Pouw wrote.

As for the book title, Pouw wrote:

"As for the purported emergency incident involving an investigator and the second-hand account of an alleged conversation containing a despicably false quote, Mr. Miscavige's attorney, Michael Lee Hertzberg, is on record stating that Mr. Miscavige does not know the investigator, has never heard of the investigator, has never met the investigator, has never spoken to the investigator, never hired the investigator and never directed any investigations by him. So let me be clear: No such conversation with Mr. Miscavige ever took place and any claim that one did is provable bullt."

Since assuming a leadership role in the peculiar religion, David Miscavige successfully lobbied to make the Church of Scientology an exempt entity and a recognized religion – resulting in an enormous amassing of wealth.

Adds the Daily Mail: "This isn't the first time that Miscavige has been hit with a damning tell-all. In 2013, his niece Jenna Miscavige Hill wrote her own memoir of her time in the secretive religion called Beyond Belief. Miscavige's family life has been a source of great mystery for those outside the church. David's own wife, Shelly Miscavige, hasn't been seen in public since August 2007, with fears that she could be somewhere held against her will."

The tell-all book is set to be released sometime next spring.

This article is reposted with the author's permission from examiner.com.

"David Miscavige – Portrait" by Scientology Media – Flickr: David Miscavige – Portrait. Licensed under CC BY-SA 2.0 via Wikimedia Commons.

Cosby deposition shows he loves women and women love him–and the liberal media hates it!

Jonathan David Farley, D. Phil. · 29 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The media is breathlessly reporting that "Bill Cosby Admitted To Drugging Women In 2005 Deposition," the implication being that he gave women drugs without their knowledge to knock them unconscious and then have relations with them.

Only this isn't what the 2005 deposition says.

First, let's be clear: Cosby loves beautiful women, and they love him right back. Nothing wrong with that–unless you are the liberal media.

Question the source: the document was created by one of Bill Cosby's accusers. It makes far-from-objective statements like "[Bill Cosby's] testimony become [sic] more and more unbelievable" (page 20). We're talking about one woman–one–not "women" plural. Even though the entire media uses the word "women," on page 7, the witness–presumably, Bill Cosby–makes it clear he is referring to one "[w]oman, meaning T——, and not women." Few if any of the articles seem to point out this tiny detail.

Bill Cosby allegedly gave Quaaludes to a woman in 1976. Your friend, Google, says that Quaaludes became illegal in 1984. In the 1970's, Quaaludes were legal, and popular. In the 1970's, "'Luding out' where Quaaludes were taken with wine, became a popular college pastime."

The lawyers and witness appear to be discussing the same woman when the narrator of the deposition–evidently a lawyer for one of the accusers–reveals that that woman, when she was 19, "met defendant who had sex with her after giving her Quaaludes" (page 14). The narrator chooses not to give us that woman's exact quote–one can guess why–but the question is moot since the witness says, "That's her statement. I don't know."

Worse, the narrator herself concedes that the aforementioned woman's "statement was ambiguous about whether or not they continued to see each other or simply met again two years later"–you know, the way rape victims do.

It is here that the witness says, "She meets me back stage. I give her Quaaludes. We then have sex." This is the "admission." But even though the media is having a field day with this statement, it could mean that she asked for Quaaludes and then they had consensual relations. Does anyone question Kurt Cobain or Keith Richards? How about the Beatles? Would Elvis be in trouble today? Do Dr. Cosby's critics think that the expression "sex, drugs, and rock 'n' roll" refers to three activities done in totally separate venues?

What won't you find in the news reports about the deposition? That the aforementioned woman "states she spent a two-week period with Mr. Cosby at Lake Tahoe when she was 21" (page 16). Again, what rape victims do that? Oh, I forgot: there is no perfect mattress.

The anti-Cosby articles insist that none of the accusers are in it for the money, but the deposition reveals how false this is: The hostile lawyer asks, "Mr. Cosby, did you believe that T—— P—— would go to the press with her story when you sent her the money?"

The comedian comes out on page 20 when discussing a masseuse who claims she met Dr. Cosby when she was 25 but the hostile lawyer says, "27": "I don't understand what I'm supposed to say never happened. How do I know she was in a dream-like state? Isn't that introspective?"

Page 26 discusses another accuser. The hostile lawyer concedes that the accuser said she "ended a month long consensual affair with the entertainer," after which "he drugged her when she visited him before a performance in Denver." That's what the lawyer says. The article the lawyers are arguing over is by Nicole Egan of the Daily News. In what is apparently that article, the accuser recalls, "He [Cosby] was going to help us with our careers." The article continues, "She saw Cosby the following day and they began an affair, she said. Soon, she said she fell in love.

“About six months into the relationship [not one month; emphasis ours], he bought her a plane ticket to New York, and they shared a romantic night together, she said. The next morning, he handed her a $100 bill and sent her to the local deli for bagels and cream cheese.

“When she returned to his home, laden with bagels, he abruptly told her to pack her bags and move into a nearby hotel, she said. She still has no idea why.

“Puzzled and upset, she checked into the hotel…”

Yeah, dumped women have no reason whatsoever to be hostile toward Dr. Cosby.

In summary, at no point in the purported deposition transcript does Bill Cosby admit to drugging women in order to rape them. But a dying newspaper industry seeking easy clicks can hide behind the fig leaf of Fallwell v. Flynt—newspapers can basically lie about public figures with impunity—rather than present confirmed facts.

The old saying is still true: Hell hath no fury like a woman scorned.

Lafeyette victims are two women and some 'people'. Is this another misogynist who shot mostly men?

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 29 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

> Incoming meteor set to destroy entire planet! Women hit hardest!

Thanks to Nate for that headline. Seems like we have another shooter who, according to the media, acted out his devastating hatred of women by shooting a bunch of men, because nothing says "I hate women" quite like killing men, amirite? Elliot Rodger, redux.

John R. Houser, 59, walked into a theatre and started shooting people he didn't know and had no particular beef with that anyone can discover. He had nothing nice to say about feminism, but that's hardly unusual. He had even fewer nicer things to say about the government, which again, is hardly unusual. It's lines like this that give away the media's insistence that any act of violence or destruction against women is exceptionally bad, because they're women. Not because randomly shooting people is bad. Women are special. People often becomes a code word for 'the people who don't really matter' aka men.

[image]

[image]

As far as I can see, there is no comprehensive list of victims published yet, but the media's insistence that the other victims were people strongly suggests they were men, or at least overwhelmingly men. One report claims 6 of the victims were men.

[image]

None of that stops the media from declaring Houser a misogynist who hated women and shot them because they were women. Isn't that rich? The same media that declares women's lives more important because they're women (totally not sexist at all) decries the assumed sexism of the shooter, who in all likelihood shot more men than women. Those darn people getting in the way of bullets intended for women. It would be much easier to scream about misogyny if men would stop using their bodies to interrupt bits of steel moving at high velocity. Always showing off, those darn people.

Benevolent sexism. It's the word feminists use for men's possibly instinctual drive to protect women and treat them as if they are deserving of special attention. In the Aurora theatre shooting, men threw their bodies across the women they were with and died to save them. What a bunch of sexist pigs. True equality means the guys should have hit the deck and let the bullets fall where they may.

The attempt by left-wing, liberal, feminist media to link horrific tragedies like mass shootings to their axe-grinding machines, determined to foment hatred of men because they are men and paint women as innocent victims of a culture that fears and despises women is, quite frankly, getting a little boring. I expect some fucktard at Gawker or Salon will link the Lafayette shooting to #GamerGate by the end of the day, desperate to portray a group of men and women they hate in the worst possible light, and they'll be met with a giant shrug and sales of videos games will continue to soar as real world violence declines. Shootings like Lafayette are shocking, but the fact remains that violence in our culture has been dropping precipitously for decades and continues to do so. Seems like beating the shit out of all those hookers in GTA and slaughtering endless troops in COD has been, oh I don't know, a harmless fantasy that millions of people like to engage in? Kind of like 50 Shades of Grey is a fantasy?

[image]

The media can blah blah blah themselves to death over dead women and those other people things not really worth mentioning all they want. I might deconstruct their bullshit, but the part of this narrative that pisses me off is the lack of gratitude for men being men. There is no better example of feminists unadulterated, pure hatred for men that their willingness to describe the men who were shot as people while describing the shooter as a man. The men in the theatre, who are as innocent as the women, are not representative of men in general. Just some guys, watching some stupid chick flick with their girlfriends and wives and partners, eating popcorn and sharing the arm rest and just being human beings are not the symbol of men and masculinity – no, the psycho who opened fire in the theatre is the man. Man becomes a synonym for anger, violence, hate, bloodshed, danger, rage – exactly what feminists want us to believe is emblematic of men and masculinity. Men are dangerous, violent, hateful creatures who need to be caged and kept away from women who are never angry, violent, hateful, dangerous creatures themselves.

Most child abuse is carried out by mothers and the children of those mothers may have something to say about women, violence, and danger. Women may not walk into movie theatres and shoot random strangers very often, but that's likely pure cowardice. Evil women prefer their victims to be helpless. Children are always a favorite target. And you can bet your ass that if a woman walked into a theatre and shot mostly women and a few men, no one would claim that as a crime against men. It would be a crime against everyone.

Over and over again, from the Boston Marathon bombing to 9/11 to the German Airwings crash to the earthquake in Nepal, when the world goes to hell, the feminist media blames men and masculinity at the earliest opportunity, while actual men roll up their sleeves and rush to save the wounded, help the injured, restore calm and rebuild what was destroyed. Men will give their lives to save others, especially women. Women rarely do that. I doubt very much the response from men, the instinct to save others, to show courage and strength and bravery and decency is the product of socialization. It's beyond me how feminists can claim, on the one hand, that the patriarchy trains women to be selfless, to serve others, to be the classic Biblical 'helpmeets', and then explain a world in which men are the ones who are selfless, who serve others, who are there to help and to protect, even when it costs them their own lives. And that is the part that makes me absolutely quiver with rage.

It remains to be seen exactly what went down in the theatre in Lafeyette, but it will not surprise me in the slightest to hear that the people who were shot and injured were men, and a significant number of them were protecting women. The fact that the two dead people are women is likely a matter of terrible misfortune. It's 100% appropriate to grieve for the dead. They were completely innocent and did not deserve to die at the hands of a deranged killer. It is not appropriate to care about them more because they were women. They were human beings with lives and people who loved them and futures they were looking forward to. Every man in the theatre was a human being, too, with lives and futures and people who loved them. It's very likely the people who loved them were sitting right next to them. And the men took bullets to save them. The only words you need right now are these:

> Thank you.

We don't know why men are so willing to sacrifice themselves for those they love, and in an important way, it doesn't matter. They are. They do. The only appropriate response to that is gratitude.

Because men are human beings, too.

What other reason do you need?

Lots of love,

JB

Brawndo's got electrolytes (video)

AVfM Video Source · 29 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

All we know is, he's full of shit and Brawndo's got electrolytes. (We thought we would save him some time and supply him with his most frequent critics distilled to their essence.)
Actually TL;DR demolishes a study. If you want to see a masterful breakdown of another bullshit study reporting, this is like watching Bruce Lee.

Subscribe to TL;DR because patriarchy.

Hot on the web overflow

knightrunner · 29 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Hello everyone and good morning, evening or whatever it is wherever you are. As most of you know there is a section on the front page of AVfM dedicated to mainstream media articles called “hot on the web.” This section is there to give you a list of articles that deserve support or criticism from you, an online activist. It is very important that our voices be heard in the comment sections of these articles.

Lately we have been having a problem with space. There are just to many articles that need to be posted in the “hot on the web” section and not enough space to post them all. In the future there will be a link at the bottom of the “hot on the web” section which will send you to a longer list of articles. AVfM’s resident over worked and under appreciated tech wizard David King has this link on his lengthy to do list. He promised he would get right on it after he completes the fembot with beer dispensing breast for overlord Elam.

Thanks a bunch David.

Until David can get around to installing this link we will make do with what have. But on this rare occasion there is a lot going on the mainstream media. Men’s rights are being discussed in these publications while feminists scream louder about miss soggy knees. All of these articles deserve you commentary. Here is today’s list that is far to long for the “hot on the web” section.

No more campus sexual assault legislation, begs national group of college administrators http://www.washingtonexaminer.com/no-more-campus-sexual-assault-legislation-begs-national-group-of-college-administrators/article/2569112

Not a single advocate of due process will testify at Senate hearing on campus sexual assault.

http://www.thecollegefix.com/post/23529/

Senate to hold one-sided hearing on campus sexual assault

http://www.washingtonexaminer.com/senate-to-hold-one-sided-hearing-on-campus-sexual-assault/article/2569027

We’ve defended lots of campus sexual assault cases, so we know just how unfair they are http://www.washingtonpost.com/news/grade-point/wp/2015/07/24/weve-tried-lots-of-campus-sexual-assault-cases-so-we-know-just-how-unfair-they-are/?postshare=6831438014609212

The Effort To Stop Campus Rape Is Finally Starting To Focus On High Schools

http://m.huffpost.com/us/entry/55b26e28e4b0a13f9d185c4a

What the Trump and Cosby Allegations Reveal About Rape Culture

http://www.rollingstone.com/politics/news/what-the-trump-and-cosby-allegations-reveal-about-rape-culture-20150728#ixzz3hHWukKcO

11 Ways In Which Some Women Have Ruined Feminism For Everyone

http://m.mensxp.com/special-features/today/27032-11-ways-in-which-some-women-have-ruined-feminism-for-everyone.html

Ya know how women never lie about rape and stuff like that?

AVfM Video Source · 30 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=H24sLF3CkMo

My first cellphone contract

August Løvenskiolds · 30 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

After many years of resistance, I'm considering getting my first cell phone. Now, I'm neither Amish nor some sort of Luddite: I've been a computer programmer since the 1960's and, of course, I'm writing this on my PC/online. Cell phones are nearly universal now – I've seen more than one homeless guy using one – but I've always been wary of technology's side effects.

Sitting in crowded bars bars full of smart and interesting people – many of whom I know personally – I see a sea of folks who should be interacting with each other instead sitting alone glassy-eyed with their gazes glued to tiny screens, scrambling for electrical outlets to recharge them, and cursing when they can't get a signal.

I used a cell phone (borrowed from a friend) once in the last year when my car's battery died in an ice storm and I needed to call a cab to get home, so for the last few months I've been coming around to the idea that perhaps there is a certain personal safety factor in having a mobile telephone; the only other time I used a cellphone is when, a few years back, I found a half-naked woman passed out on the sidewalk at 3:30 in the morning and used one to call the police for help.

I'm keenly aware of how using external technology changes people; my keen innate sense of time suffered badly a few months after I started wearing a wristwatch, so I got rid of it and suffered for a few weeks until my internal brain clock came back online. I got rid of speed dial on my landline back in the 1980's when after another car mishap I tried to call my buddy Michael for a ride and the pay phone in the booth rejected "*6" as his phone number.

Although my family keeps insisting that I man up and get one, I'm still balking a bit at getting my first cell phone, though, after reading the user agreement contracts that come with these modern, demanding devices.

Deep in the details of these contracts one finds the following conditions and restrictions, many of them enforced by federal and local laws:

- Although I desired a brand new phone, it turns out that, under the terms of the contract, the cellphone might have had an indeterminate number of users before me that could be in the double digits or more and it is considered a bit unseemly for me to insist on a pristine model.
- Cellphone contracts are ongoing business agreements, which means that, if I sign one, it is expected to continue for the rest of my life.
- After an early learning "honeymoon" period, I'm only allowed to use the cellphone 2-3 times a week at most, and then, only if the cellphone is available.
- Higher use phones can be obtained by a select, wealthy few but they are prohibitively expensive and are very high maintenance affairs.
- Unapproved use of the phone can result in contract cancellation and even criminal charges, a clause known as "CC & CC." Don't be confused, though: these 4 C's are nothing like the cut/color/clarity/caret weight that men must consider when buying engagement diamond rings for a prospective wife.
- As the owner, I'm responsible for the safety and maintenance of the cellphone and any failure to exercise proper care over it can also result in cancellation and criminal charges (CC & CC) .
- The cellphone must be recharged 2-3 times or more per day, every day, regardless of how often I use it, and, if I neglect it, you guessed it, I can face CC & CC.
- The cellphone chassis must be covered appropriately whenever we are in public together. There are a dizzying array of covers and accessories that seem to change with every season and I am required to help with the shopping process and payment for these accouterments as directed by the cellphone itself, otherwise, CC & CC.

- The contract requires that the cellphone is the only phone I am allowed to use and I could face CC & CC if I should stray and use another phone, even if my need for one was dire.
- The cellphone camera is allowed to monitor my viewing of other, newer cellphones and can shut down the phone unless I avert my gaze and ignore hotter technology.
- Interestingly, the cellphone can be used by anyone the cellphone approves of and under the federal "Violence Against Cellphones Act" (VACA), I am liable for any damages that may result from my refusal to allow the cellphone to be used by others, even if the cellphone itself caused the dispute or explodes violently and unexpectedly out of my control.
- The access ports for the cellphone are not guaranteed to be functional at all and any dangerous software viruses transmitted by those ports are legally my responsibility.
- Financially, I'm responsible for the original cellphone even if it malfunctions and I have to get a new one – I could owe the malfunctioning cellphone up to half of my legally or imputed earnings, plus legal fees, even if I lose my job and have to take a new one with a smaller salary.
- At any time, if the cellphone opts to cancel the contract and move on to a more successful owner, I am still financially responsible for payment for any cellphone add-ons for up to 18 years, even if I never get to see them.

After reviewing these contracts and seeing how disappointed and unhappy other guys are with their cellphones, I think I'll go against my family's wishes and continue to refuse to get one.

Hell, in the grand scheme of things, cellphones are unnecessary to my happiness, and I can do without one, just like, as a MGTOW, I refuse to get married or even date women at all.

This article was inspired by a question posed to YouTube MGTOW Sandman. My thanks for the idea.

The Men's Liberation Front for Truth and Justice

Leonard Anderson · 30 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The following is an introduction to a newly formed university society; all newly formed societies are required by their host campuses to provide a basic run down of their reasons for being and current and or future activities.

The men's liberation front for truth and justice is a society centred around the need for combating the ever increasing spread of misinformation on so-called gendered and social issues. What this means is our members are engaging those that would try and use inflated or misrepresented statistics and data in a bid to further their own ends. This may seem like a conspiracy theory to some! But bear with me here, have you ever heard of this myth?

Women earn 77 cents for every dollar a man earns—for doing the same work.

And no, I'm not calling the gender pay gap a myth, just the statement above in its context. "The gender wage gap, the observed difference between wages paid to women and wages paid to men, has been a source of both political controversy and economic research throughout the past several decades. The gap is commonly measured as the ratio of the median earnings of women and the median earnings of men, which indicates the proportion of the median male earnings that the median female earnings represent. When the ratio is calculated for all men and women who are paid wages or salaries, or for all wage and salary earners who work full-time and year-round, the measure is often called the raw gender wage gap." Source: The Consad Report

Many would have you believe that the wage gap is merely the result of sexist attitudes plaguing our society. While I don't doubt there are still those attitudes looming! It is far from the only explanation to such gendered myths as the one above. Our group is also dedicated to activism as well; we have begun investigating an organisation that has taken it upon themselves, to represent a considerably large group of men fighting against domestic violence towards women by male perpetrators. As much as we find the fight against domestic violence admirable, it's their methods we find illegal and unethical! We have ample evidence to show that this organisation is working outside of the legal boundaries of a non-profit, laid down by the federal government. We also believe that their focus on the issue of domestic violence is one of selective outrage of a gendered nature, which only seems to be alienating those also very much affected by family violence, men, boys and the LBGT community included.If you are reading this! You may have some disconcerting questions and assumptions with our society.

Are we a male only group? No! Feel free to join whichever gender/sex you wish to identify with?

Are we a men's rights activists group? No! We don't fight for the rights of any gender/sex; instead we try and correct or expose those that would misrepresent issues pertaining to men, women and the LBGT community.

I'm sure many of you will have a million more questions to ask, as we don't engage in censorship! We believe you have the right to challenge any of our investigations, and we look forward to those questions and or criticisms. We also understand that our activities will draw negative attention from those not wishing to be criticized, to which I would say! You! And what you say! Are not above criticism!

The Men's Liberation Front for Truth and Justice

The making of gynocentric foot soldiers

Tom Golden · 31 July 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Psychologists have studied and argued about male sex roles for many years. They have done a decent job, with a few exceptions, of describing these roles. These include the independent, tough, competitive and unemotional types and many others. But they have missed possibly the most important aspect of these roles completely, and that is the connection of the male sex role with gynocentrism. Without gynocentrism the male role would simply not exist. It is an essential element in the male sex role and describing the traits that might make up such a role is very short sighted. They have failed miserably at identifying the underlying reason for the roles. On that point there is mostly silence. Take the example of the recent movie titled "The Mask." In this film male roles are villainized and seen as a problem that boys need to remove as if they can take off these roles like they might take off a mask. There is zero mention of why those roles have evolved as they have.

This article will start a discussion about the connection of male sex roles with gynocentrism and how our zest to push boys into male sex roles is actually a push to train them to be gynocentric foot soldiers.

I can remember in the 1950's when I was a little guy the common phrase used in my elementary school was "girls first." Whether it was a line to get ice cream, leaving a large school assembly, or just getting a drink from a water fountain. The standard chant was girls first. The girls got to go before us boys simply because they were girls. I can remember asking when the boys would get to go first and was rebuked and told to just wait my turn. What is the message to boys? Your needs are secondary. Your job is to sacrifice and let the girls go first, get used to it. Of course there was never a time when any teacher said "boys first." Boys first has a strange ring to it, doesn't it? The message was clear. As boys we needed to put our needs second and allow the girls to go first, simply because of their biological difference, they were girls. And if you complain about this unfair advantage you will be shamed and labelled as a troublemaker.

If you are going to be a gynocentric foot soldier you had better learn that your needs are never first. You will be facing many situations in the future where you will need to put women's needs ahead of your own. Get used to it. This is the beginning of basic training.

[image]

While the overt usage of the "girls first" or "ladies first" adage may be diminished I think that the idea is still prevalent. All one has to do is search google and see how many images sport the "ladies first" meme. This gives us the odd mix of "ladies first" alongside "we are all equal." Yet another bizarre twist in our misandrist culture.

Added into this crazy mix is the big boys don't cry message. Nearly every male in the US has heard this repeatedly. Much has been made about how this stops men from emoting in public and encourages them to avoid their tears. Men have been shamed for eons for not "dealing with their feelings." I think this obvious blue pill assessment is limited and misses the mark. If one ignores the gynocentric connection then one sees only a man avoiding emotions. But why? Why would a man want to avoid emotions? The first reason is that in a gynocentric world women's needs and feelings are important and men's are not. Think back to a little boy being told that big boys don't cry. What are they saying to him? They are saying that his needs and hurts are not as important as his sister's. When do young boys cry? They cry when they have needs that are not being met, or when they need attention to a hurt. The message is clear. When you are a boy and you are hurt or have needs, they are less important than your sister's. And if you dare complain about it you will just hear the same message once again, "big boys don't cry." Voicing your needs is seen as whining. If you are going to be a good gynocentric foot soldier, that is, be a good provider and protector of women you can't whine or cry.

But there is another piece of this mess that is rarely mentioned. By saying to a young boy that big boys don't cry you are not only telling him to STFU you are also alleviating yourself from any responsibility to tend to a boy's pain or to muster even a rudimentary degree of compassion. So the message to the boys is clear, your pain does not matter as much as our sister's and it matters so little that those who love you don't feel the need to offer you support or compassion. Deal with it. Be a man. Boys learn to handle it themselves because very few others will step forward and offer them a hand. But they also learn that others simply don't care about their pain. This is the basic training of a gynocentric foot soldier.

And then there is the mess that starts for boys in early childhood where they are told to never hit a girl and if they do they will face severe punishment. This rule is enforced, not only by the parents or authorities but also by the toughest boys. The girls catch wind of this and take advantage. Some start hitting the boys knowing the boys cannot hit back. But wait, the girls violence is ignored. No one lifts a finger. The boys already know that no one will likely listen and will turn away and shame them for complaining. Now they find out that violence is just one more area where their needs don't count. They also know that if they report a girl who hits them they will face a gauntlet that labels them a pussy. Boys learn to stay quiet about their needs, even safety needs. This is what a foot soldier is supposed to do. The girls learn that they can be damsels in distress and turn on the waterworks to get what they want. They also learn they can get away with violence against boys. The boys learn they face a very unfair system and they better stay quiet about it. If any of the boys speaks up and complains they regret it. They get punished for speaking up. Quiet, you just take care of yourself and take it like a man. Reminds me of our present day domestic violence system.

These three, girls first, never hit a girl, and big boys don't cry are the marching orders of the gynocentric foot soldiers. Each one informs the boy of his role. The gynocentric army is all about the safety and satisfaction of women through the sacrifice of men. It's pretty simple and has been functioning effectively for centuries. "Big boys don't cry" tells boys that their needs are simply not as important as the tears of women and girls they are destined to sacrifice for. "Girls first" tells the boys to get used to the idea of sacrificing their own wants and desires in order to help women and girls. "Never hit a girl" marks out who is the enemy (other men) and who is to be protected (women and girls). All of this goes on under the radar with most people simply being ignorant of what underlies these messages.

We can't blame the culture totally for this. I think there is compelling evidence that there are biological factors that are driving gynocentrism. If there were no biology involved do you think for a second that boys would do exactly what they are told? Hell no. Do boys follow just about any other dictum offered by parents or the culture at large? No. Do boys unquestioningly follow? Of course not, boys by nature are rebellious and very slow to do what is demanded of them. But do they follow through on these three things? Pretty much. Not only do they follow through they also patrol the males around them to be sure that they are also following through. This is more than just culture.

Boys are surrounded by these gynocentric messages. At home they will likely see their dads put his needs last and focus on what mom wants and rarely saying "no" to her. In the media they get more gynocentrism. Men saving women from harm and sacrificing their own safety, needs, their desires or even their lives in order to do so. Worse yet, if they are not saving women they are portrayed as stupid and incompetent which seems to be a gynocentric man's way of trying to make women feel better in comparison. Men are shown to be unable to make a simple decision without the help of a smart woman who can show him the way. Most men don't complain.

Our college campuses are overrun with gynocentrism. No one dares to cross the gynocentric party line of the women studies departments for fear of their job. Women first? Yes, maam.

In our legislators the boys see the same. Like automatons, our gynocentric male legislators do exactly the same thing. We have seen them focus on women's and girls needs, especially for the last 50 years and ignore the needs of men. Just like the boys were taught, just like the boys saw from their father, just like we see in the media. Now our legislators are acting out this same foot soldier pattern by enacting laws to help women and girls and completely ignore the needs of boys and men. Domestic violence laws like the Violence Against WOMEN Act, the rape shield laws, sexual harassment laws, workplace harassment, affirmative action for women and girls, title IX and on and on.

Boys and men are an afterthought.

Gynocentrism is bad enough but what happened In the past 50 years put a new sinister spin on the gynocentric foot soldiers Now it wasn't just girls first and big boys don't cry, now the new fabricated twist was that women and girls were oppressed, by men. Our young men make it to middle or high school after years of gynocentric training and now they must deal with a new monster, the lethal and incorrect mantra: Men oppressed women and women are victims. If they contradicted or questioned a party line about women and girls being victims or having special needs they would face overwhelming opposition. Much of that opposition would be from gynocentric soldiers protecting women.

So on top of the ideas that boys are here to protect, care for, and provide for women is the bizarre notion that the very people who had been providing and protecting them were now guilty somehow of being perennial abusers of women and girls. So now men and boys need to provide and protect women and also atone for some mythical oppression of those they have sacrificed for years. Really? Maybe put even more simply, it's like having a slave owner tell his slaves that they had oppressed him in the past and that their ancestors had oppressed him as well and they now need to make up for that with special treatment for him. Enough said.

Our boys face a routine and unacknowledged training to be gynocentric foot soldiers. The male sex role is based on placing the needs , safety, and desires of women and girls on a higher level than those of men. If we ignore this foundation we are sure to fail in serving men. From the childhood messages like big boys don't cry to viewing the vast majority of male role models who are serving the needs of women and neglecting their own wants and needs our boys rarely see a man choosing consciously and going his own way. This needs to change.

If we are really going to free men from their roles we will need to help them first with what has been drilled into them and is facilitated by their biology: putting women first. Instead of trying to teach boys to cry we need to teach boys that their needs are of importance. We will need to teach boys that it is not mandatory for them to provide and protect for others, that it is also okay for them to simply care for themselves. We need to help them see the value in their being, not just in their doing and we need to help them see that, in spite of what the culture and feminists might say, men are good. Then once they have the data, once they get the information and understand the gynocentric yoke, then and only then should we let them go whatever way they want. If they want to get married then so be it. If they want to move to the desert and be a hermit then so be it. Unlike the feminists who push women into certain roles and shame them for others, we need to bless the boys in their own choices whatever they might be.

Men are indeed good.

This article was first published at Men Are Good.

A male-centered approach to disability – Part 3: Self-respect

Peter Wright · 1 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

A male-centered approach to disability – Part 1
A male-centered approach to disability – Part 2
A male-centered approach to disability – Part 3

In part one of this series we looked at men with disabilities who achieved greatness. In part two we looked at an emerging culture of gynocentrism in the disability sector, along with the impoverished and at times hostile "support" extended to men in need of assistance. In this third and final part we look at a new kind of man with a disability – a man who says "No" to bigotry and other forms of mistreatment, and who gears his life toward the cultivation of self-respect.

To illustrate this new kind of man we will turn to the Greek myth of the goddess Hera and her disabled son Hephaestus – a son who has to challenge his mother's ableism and bigotry before he can take his rightful place in the Olympian society. In this myth Hephaestus plays a role not unlike the hero Perseus who must stop Medusa's hostilities before men can go about their lives again in safety and dignity.

The son of Hera and Zeus, Hephaestus was born parthenogenically – ie. from Hera alone and not from the result of a sex act with Zeus. We are told that she planed to give birth to a son after Zeus went and gave birth to Bright Eyed Athena who became a golden child of the gods. Hera was incensed that Zeus would give birth to Athena without her sexual aid, and her creation of Hephaestus was carried out in revenge. Hera's message was essentially "You give birth without me, well I can do that too!"

Some myths suggest her son was born disabled, and others say he became disabled after his mother (or father) threw him from Mt. Olympus whereupon he landed hard on the earth and damaged his legs. In any case the dominant legend is that Hera gave birth to him already disabled, for which she was mightily disgusted in his lack of perfection.

> Hera was angry and spoke thus among the assembled gods:
>
> "Hear from me, all gods and goddesses… my son Hephaestus whom I bore was weakly among all the blessed gods and shrivelled of foot, a shame and a disgrace to me in heaven, whom I myself took in my hands and cast out so that he fell in the great sea. But silver-shod Thetis the daughter of Nereus took and cared for him with her sisters: would that she had done other service to the blessed gods!"[1]

Zeus gestures to his daughter Athena, while Hera hurls her disabled son from Mt. Olympus circa 200-150 B.C.

Hera was ashamed of her son's disability, one which caused him to limp on both feet since the soles and heels were turned back to front and were not fitted for walking but only for a forward-rolling motion of the whole body.[4] This 'difference' made Hephaestus a fringe person on Olympus, and threatened to put his mother on the fringes too, so she hid the secret by throwing her son to what she assumed would be his death. Fortunately he was saved by some kindly goddesses who nurtured him back to health.

After his fall from the heavens Hephaestus grew up on a secluded island and there learned the art of blacksmithing. He devoted himself to the task with such discipline that his artisan skills became the finest in the world. Despite the pride he took in these achievements he would not forget the cruel treatment of Hera who dismissed him as ugly and lacking in usefulness. Like so many men today who wish to be seen as something other than utilities for women and society, Hephaestus remains angry;

> Hephaestus says: "Thetis saved me when I suffered much at the time of my great fall through the will of my own brazen-faced mother, who wanted to hide me for being lame. Then my soul would have taken much suffering had not Eurynome and Thetis caught me and held me… With them I worked nine years as a smith, and wrought many intricate things; pins that bend back, curved clasps, cups, necklaces, working there in the hollow of the cave, and the stream of Okeanos around us went on forever with its foam and its murmur." [2]

Classical sociologist Philip Slater suggests that Hera despises her son's masculinity and his disability, preferring instead to have a son of heroic proportions who could provide her with utility and glory. Hera's attitude provokes, in later myths, a kind of self-abasing buffoonery from Hephaestus that Slater interprets as "an appropriate response to his mother's narcissistic resentment of males–she cannot deflate him if he is already deflated–but it is therefore all the more inappropriate for dealing with her contrary desire for him to be a display piece and an agent for the expression of her masculine strivings. It is for this reason, after all, that she threw him down from Olympus."[3]

Like Hephaestus, many men with disabilities are angry. They realize that they are being doubly marginalized due to the curse of having a penis yet being unable, or perhaps unwilling, to perform as utilities for women and society – they know they are being negatively judged for it.

In her mythos Hera provides the quintessential example of gynocentric feminism, along with ableist and misandrist attitudes to boot. Her attitude represents much that is wrong with the disability sector today – an underlying bigotry that men must reject if they are to enjoy freedom, dignity and self-respect.

Challenging that bigotry is precisely what Hephaestus does. He gains redress against Hera for rejecting him by making her a magical golden throne which, when she sat on it, did not allow her to stand up. None of the other gods could release her and they begged Hephaestus to return to Olympus to let his mother go, but he refused, saying "I have no mother."[4]

The gods were impressed with his rebuke of Hera and agree accept him back into Olympian society as one of their own. This may be viewed as a positive reappraisal of his disability – Hephaestus possesses previously unrecognized skills, is sharp of mind, humbles Hera, and is accepted by the other Olympians. Here is a synopsis of the story thus far;

> After his abandonment, Thetis found him and took him to her underwater grotto and raised him as her own son.
>
> Hephaestus had a happy childhood with dolphins as his playmates and pearls as his toys. Late in his childhood, he found the remains of a fisherman's fire on the beach and became fascinated with an unextinguished coal, still red-hot and glowing.
>
> Hephaestus carefully shut this precious coal in a clamshell, took it back to his underwater grotto, and made a fire with it. On the first day after that, Hephaestus stared at this fire for hours on end. On the second day, he discovered that when he made the fire hotter with bellows, certain stones sweated iron, silver or gold. On the third day he beat the cooled metal into shapes: bracelets, chains, swords and shields. Hephaestus made pearl-> handled knives and spoons for his foster mother, and for himself he made a silver chariot with bridles so that seahorses could transport him quickly. He even made slave-girls of gold to wait on him and do his bidding.

>
> Later, Thetis left her underwater grotto to attend a dinner party on Mount Olympus wearing a beautiful necklace of silver and sapphires that Hephaestus had made for her. Hera admired the necklace and asked where she could get one. Thetis became flustered, causing Hera to become suspicious; and, at last, the queen god discovered the truth: the baby she had once rejected had grown into a talented blacksmith.
>
> Hera was furious and demanded that Hephaestus return home, a demand that he refused. However he did send Hera a beautifully constructed chair made of silver and gold, inlaid with mother-of-pearl. Hera was delighted with this gift but, as soon as she sat in it her weight triggered hidden springs and metal bands sprung forth to hold her fast. The more she shrieked and struggled the more firmly the mechanical throne gripped her; the chair was a cleverly designed trap.
>
> For three days Hera sat fuming, still trapped in Hephaestus's chair; she could not sleep, she could not stretch, she could not eat. It was Zeus who finally saved the day: he promised that if Hephaestus released Hera he would give him a wife, Aphrodite the goddess of love and beauty. Hephaestus agreed and married Aphrodite.[5]

After his mother rejects him for having a mobility impairment he becomes angry and he ensures that her mobility is impaired by trapping her in a throne. The gesture can be read as forcing Hera to experience a mobility challenge that she seemed utterly unable or unwilling to sympathize with.

Commenting on the story, disability advocate William Ebenstein states;

> In the Hephaestus myth we can discern a positive psychology of anger that is grounded in the experience of disability. The disabled deity refuses to play the role of the passive victim. Instead he is an active creator in forging his future place in society. Hephaestus' revenge is accomplished in such a clever and artful way that, in the end, it is enriching for the entire Olympian community.

> In Hephaestus we find a character who is motivated by his anger to confront a world that has discarded him. He stages what amounts to a non-violent demonstration, an act of civil disobedience that completely shuts down Olympus. His stubborn anger does not lead to acceptance, adjustment or passivity. On the contrary it lifts him up to reclaim his dignity and civil rights. The story depicts a community that must adjust to someone who has been stigmatized, segregated, and discriminated against. It is the disabled character himself who creates the humorous situation as an effective tool to confront his oppression and challenge the existing order.[6]

Hephaestus' anger energizes his expression of outrage in place of squashing it as a male character flaw. The problems he sees are in the world and Hephaestus takes action there, where it counts. His demonstration of outrage in response to an ugly world, or over acts of mistreatment, is mental health at its finest and similar expression needs to be encouraged and supported for all people with disabilities. In fact, speaking out of one's anger is a perfect example of what is intended by the disability-related term self-advocacy.

Like our mythical protagonist, the 'Hephaestus man' understands where the problem lies and will not have his concerns silenced.

Too often we see psychotherapists and rehabilitation counsellors engage in gender stereotyping, viewing positive anger as 'male aggression,' 'patriarchy,' or 'toxic masculinity' that in disabled and nondisabled men supposedly needs correcting. However killing the outrage is a misandric move, one that leads to a loss of personal agency in the world for men.

Thus far Hephaestus' story has been one of rejection and redress. However the story is far more than a one-dimensional recounting of an "angrycrip" who ends up exacting revenge against his tormentors. It involves the larger vision of forging self-respect, the beginnings of which were long stirring before he sought to challenge the ableist culture among the gods.

Following his story from beginning to end we see the goal of self-respect is something Hephaestus cultivates quite independently from the respect he has won from the gods.[7] After rejoining the Olympian hierarchy as dignified contributor – craftsman of the gods – he continues the inner work he started as a child when he located value in his own eyes, and not in the shallow eyes of others.

The key principle, one given in an incisive article by Paul Elam, is "self-respect isn't earned, it's taken."[8] When Hephaestus engages with the Olympian community, he doesn't need to wait around for their validation, he has already wrested it by his own self-assessment.

The Hephaestus man is the one who expresses his outrage at offensive behavior, and who chooses to cultivate self-respect. By respecting himself and demanding the same from others, Hephaestus demonstrates exactly what these things mean for men in today's world, disabled or not.

References

[1] Evelyn-White translation, Homeric Hymn to Pythian Apollo (1914)
[2] Richmond Lattimore translation, The Iliad by Homer (1951)
[3] Philip E. Slater, The Glory of Hera: Greek Mythology and The Greek Family (1968)
[4] Karl Kerenyi, The Gods of the Greeks, pp.155-158 (1951)
[5] Wikipedia, Greek myths of Hephaestus, (Roman name Vulcan changed to Hephaestus above)
[6] William Ebenstein, Toward an Archetypal Psychology of Disability Based on the Hephaestus Myth (2006)
[7] Murray Stein, Hephaistos: A pattern of introversion, in The Selected Works of Murray Stein (1973).
[8] Paul Elam, Self-respect isn't earned, it's taken (2015)

It’s not about the nail

AVfM Video Source · 1 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

“Don’t try to fix it. I just need you to listen.” Every man has heard these words. And they are the law of the land. No matter what.

Abortion extortion

AVfM Video Source · 3 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Whoever said women aren't as creative as men has never met these women finding new and uh, creative, ways to steal men's money.

Male Privilege Tax

AVfM Video Source · 3 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists support taxing men's income at a higher rate than women's to close the imaginary 'wage gap'. No news as to whether women working in STEM will pay the male rate, since they are preferred two to one as job applicants.

Kudos to Kleenex

AVfM Video Source · 3 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Seriously.

The backlash against the Safe Campus Act has begun

Pierce Harlan · 3 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The inevitable backlash to the Safe Campus Act came sooner than I expected–it started a few hours after the bill was introduced. What's jaw-dropping is that the backlashers aren't even bothering to hide their contempt for due process any more.

A woman named Sarah Merriman, identified by the Washington Post as a spokeswoman for SAFER Campus, has come out against the bill, which would provide badly needed due process protections for students accused of sexual assault. Ms. Merriman made it clear that she's not interested in hearing about due process rights for the accused at this time:

> We are not at a point to analyze "due process," when many survivors are publicly shamed on their campuses, when charges against assaulters can be dismissed out of hand by administrators, when an assaulter is allowed to sit across from a survivor and shout down their story.
>
> If we are to truly believe in due process for all, we must prioritize the needs of survivors first and foremost.

Why do people like Ms. Merriman harbor such fear and loathing of fair hearings? Insisting that the system is "broke" for accusers is not a valid justification for keeping it "broke" for the students accused. And there is no question the system doesn't work for the men accused. The leading champion for victims' rights on campus has openly admitted that "in a lot of these cases, the campus is holding the male accountable in spite of the evidence – or the lack thereof – because they think they are supposed to . . .." And: "We see complainants who genuinely believe they have been assaulted, despite overwhelming proof that it did not happen. . . ." The academy's hostility to due process has been roundly condemned by prominent legal scholars with no ax to grind and who skew progressive. A court recently ripped off the scab and revealed an ugly pus–students accused of sexual assault are being treated unfairly. That's not something dreamed up by conservatives or the "men's rights movement."

All of us can be concerned about injustice to both the victims of sexual violence and the victims of wrongful accusations of sexual violence without comprising our fidelity to either group. It's not all-or-nothing, it's not a zero sum game, and it's not always about them–meaning the gender zealots who dominate the public discourse on these issues. Sometimes, its about the innocents who are wrongly accused because, yes, sometimes accusers lie, and sometimes they are mistaken. Due process was invented to protect the innocent not the guilty, and that's why an accusation is never tantamount to a finding of guilt. Insisting on due process in rape cases is not "victim blaming" or misogyny because we cannot assume guilt based on what happened in unrelated cases. People of goodwill have grown weary of the sexual grievance lobby's Oppression Olympics and it's blithe dismissal of the wrongly accused. And the extremists' shrill insistence that the interests of one gender trump those of another evinces a childish and unschooled contempt for concepts that are foundational to our jurisprudence.

It is well to note that Ms. Merriman and her ilk do no favors for survivors of sexual violence by refusing to embrace fair processes for students accused of sexual violence. A system so obviously in need of repair undermines the public's confidence in the results it reaches. When it's widely, and correctly, believed that students accused of sexual violence aren't being treated fairly, triers of fact on disciplinary boards may become all the more wary about punishing even those who deserve to be punished, compounding the injustices. That's not good for anyone. The "round up the usual suspects" crowd has done more to harm victims of sexual assault than anyone (can you say "Duke Lacrosse"? "Hofstra"? "Brian Banks"? Jackie of Rolling Stone fame? Need more examples? Spend a few weeks reading through this blog–that's how long it will take you.)

It is time for all persons of goodwill to condemn comments like those made by Sarah Merriman. And all of us should urge our representatives to get behind this effort and to become a co-sponsor of it: http://www.house.gov/representatives/

[Ed. note: This post originally appeared at the Community for the Wrongly Accused and is reprinted here with permission.]

Black America's Crummy Mummy Problem

Mumia Ali · 3 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

"No wire hangers, ever!"
-Faye Dunaway/Joan Crawford, "Mommie Dearest"

The recent and untimely demise of 22-year old Bobbi Kristina Brown, sole daughter of pop music legend Whitney Houston and "teeny bopper" singer Bobby Brown, puts a cap on a month that has presented formidable evidence that contrary to the idea that what bedevils Black America along "family values" lines is the predominance of "deadbeat dads", the truth is that Black America has in fact, a Crummy Mummy problem.

How so, you may ask?

Well, to revisit the above, the late Bobbi Kristina Brown died in a way erriely reminiscent of her mom – effectively drowning in her bathtub with her system full of drugs. Houston's descent into a crack cocaine-fueled Hell is by now a matter of well documented record; but what isn't as openly acknowledged is the role her addiction played in the life and ultimate death, of her daughter. Houston retained custody of her after her divorce from Bobby Brown, and while he too struggled with drug addiction, it proved to be nowhere near as severe as Houston's and in any event, he didn't have custody of his daughter. Bobbi was with her mother through her highs and lows, literally. It's hard not to see how witnessing such things would not have a powerful impression on young Bobbi – the link between children and parents involving drug and alcohol addiction is well known. That Whitney possessed a fortune worth hundreds of millions of dollars, didn't mitigate the damage; indeed, by all accounts, it only poured gasoline onto the flames – thus, discrediting the argument pushed by some on the Black Left, that all that is needed is for a (Black) single mom to be successful, is a high income, be that subsidized by the government or be it earnings made by said (Black) single mom herself. Houston's life proves this not to be the case.

Only a few short weeks earlier in the same month of July, very sad news surfaced out of "Chiraq" (the Black sections of Chicago), that a 22 year old rapper named "Capo", who was an associate of Chief Keef, was gunned down by assailants; Capo literally died on cameraphone video, uploaded to YouTube for the world to see his bleeding out from bullet wounds to his chest and hip. As the killers made their getaway, they mowed over a year old baby boy in a stroller; like Capo, he too was pronounced dead a short time later at a nearby hospital. Sadly, this was not an abberation; young kids, Black boys in particular, often meet grisly ends in the poorest and Blackest sections of the American landscape; sections where the one common denominator, is the sheer prevelance of Baby Mama-led homes. As Janet Bloomfield powerfully notes in a recent article she wrote about new research showing that White women raise Black boys better than Black women do, the one consistent "product" Black women as a group, seem to crank out, are gangbangers, criminals, murderers and rapists:

> "Black boys raised by white women do just as well as white children raised by white women, controlling for variables like socioeconomic status, education, income, etc. And of course the big question is why? There are a couple of theories the researchers measuring this phenomenon posit: some are simple, and some are much more complex. Black boys raised by white mothers tend to have distinctively white, rather than Black speech patterns. Barack Obama anybody? He sure is articulate for a Black guy /snark/. Those speech patterns allow Black boys to avoid a wage penalty as men. White mothers have an entirely different approach to education, teachers and the school system, and are treated differently by the school system, no matter what race their children are. This clearly has an impact on the outcomes for children. White mothers are more likely to be married and raising children with a father present, which has all kinds of benefits for children."

Ms. Bloomfield of course, is referring to the fact that most kids in Black America are born out of wedlock – exceeding 70% and rising (with the current Black marital rate at around 27%). She continues:

> "Is it any wonder Black women resent and hate their sons? Is it any wonder they raise thugs and gangsters?

> Give those exact same boys to white women, who have been taught to a much, much lesser extent that they don't need no man, and those boys become accountants and neurosurgeons and teachers and HVAC technicians and entrepreneurs. Feminists try hard to make all women hate men and blame men for their own personal choices, but this message hasn't stuck as well with white women in general, because it wasn't backed up with widespread, institutional racism and discrimination that prevented white men from supporting their white wives and children."

Here Ms. Bloomfield asserts that a big reason as to how and why Black America has such a Crummy Mummy problem in our time, is directly due to the impact Feminism has had on Black women writ large – and the argument is hard to deny in light of the simple fact that abortion – a centerpiece of feminists for nearly the past half-century – has seen its greatest impact on Black women themselves. According to the website BlackGenocide.org, Black women have aborted more than 16 million(!) Black babies since the passage of Roe v. Wade. That's an estimated 35% population loss to Black Americans, folks. This, despite the fact that Planned Parenthood was founded by a noted eugenicist who had less than flattering views of Blacks in Ms. Margaret Sanger, that they were recently caught cold-busted on videotape discussing in coldly candid terms as to how to harvest body parts from aborted babies. And this is despite the fact that, a few years ago, right here in Philly, Black women were involved on both the patient and "caregiver" ends of the murderous Dr. Kermit Gosnell "house of horrors" scandal – where babies were brutally and heartlessly killed in ways I can't even recount here. Black women get abortions at a rate of five times that of other women in American life.

As YouTube personality and mens'/fathers' rights advocate Tommy Sotomayor tirelessly documents day in and day out on his numerous social media channels and his personal website, the worst stewards of children in American life, are Black women. The life outcomes on a plethora of measures – from infant mortality and birth weight (highest among Black boys under the care of Black moms), cognitive development and educational attainment (it is a fact that Black mothers speak fewer words to their children than White ones; this results in Black boys having the lowest highschool graduation rates of anyone in the nation), later success as adults (some 80% or more of prison inmates hail from Baby Mama-led homes), you name it, ranks very low anywhere Black women are in the lead of family formation. This, despite their own advancement in terms of education and income earnings. When we breakout the life outcomes for Black children along gender lines, we find that under Black baby mamas, Black boys fare markedly worse, as again Ms. Bloomfield makes clear in her excellent piece:

> "Black mothers raise girls who go on to educational, economic and employment achievements far more frequently than they raise boys who do the same. If it were a matter 'these women are just dumb', there shouldn't be any demonstrable difference between the outcomes of boys and girls, but there is. Black women hate men, and by extension, hate their sons. They resent them. And in all likelihood, they visit far more abuse, both physical and emotional, upon them, for reasons that have to do with structural, policy driven, government decisions that Black men sure as hell didn't vote for, approve of, or ask for."

Tru dat.

Given all of these facts, one has to wonder aloud as to how and why the powers that be are so oddly silent; why they seem so hellbent on going in after so-called "deadbeat dads", i.e., poor Black men who are dads. Draconian child support laws have proven not just onerous for so many lower income Black men to meet their obligations, they have also proven deadly, as we saw in the case of Walter Scott earlier this year, and which yours truly has written about. Yet, official government policy at the highest levels, has continued to focus solely on the role supposed "deadbeat dads" play in the fracture and failure of Black familial life – this, despite the fact that Black women enjoy a total monopoly on the reproductive and child-rearing process, aided and abetted by the American political and legal systems. Black men are given no say whatsoever in the former and are utterly undermined in the latter – yet, they continue to be hounded as if they are full participants in the life trajectories of their babies. Clearly, the evidence shows, that they are not.

Nor is this any great shock or surprise, at least not to serious students of history. Fifty years ago, all of this was observed and predicted, by the late academic, presidential staffer and later US Senator, Daniel Patrick Moynihan's (in)famous report:

> "Whereas the majority of white families are equalitarian, the largest percentage of Negro families are dominated by the wife."
>
> "The Negro wife…can easily become disgusted with her financially dependent husband, and her rejection of him further alienates the male from family life. Embittered by their experiences with men, many Negro mothers often act to perpetuate the mother-centered pattern by taking a greater interest in their daughters than their sons."
>
> "Historically, in the matriarchal Negro society, mothers made sure that if one of their children had a chance for higher education, the daughter was the one to pursue it."

This was precisely what Ms. Bloomfield observes in her recent article I've quoted from above and indeed this is the case. While there are cases where things go horrbily awry for Black girls in baby mama-led homes – the stats bear this out easily enough – when compared to Black boys, it is undeniable that they don't do anywhere near as terribly as the latter. Indeed, one can speculate as to the ultimate outcome a Bobby Brown, Jr. would have had in Whitney Houston's home-cum-drug den; would he have even made it to the ripe old age of 22?

Given all that we know about the daily bloodletting on the part of the products of Black single moms in America's Chiraqs and Little Mogadishus, to ask the question, is to answer it…

Recommended Further Reading: Toya Graham: Queen of the Baltimore riot baby mamas

Don't forget to checkout "Obsidian Radio", my daily podcast! Here's more on today's article: White Women Raise Black Boys Better Than Black Women, Part One

10 things women do that really turn men off

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 4 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Some deluded little bitch by the name of Emma Sarran wrote a column at Made Man, in which she helpfully spells out ten things men need to stop doing right now if they want to date her or, really, date any woman at all. With her cunty little tone, I doubt Sarah has a whole lot to worry about in terms of men wanting to date her. The image attached to her post pretty much says it all:

[image]

So I thought I'd do my part for ladies like Sarah, and point out ten things women need to stop doing now if they want to date a man. You're welcome, Sarah. Pay attention to that last one, would you?

Gals, do you ever have that moment when a new relationship goes bad (or fails to materialize in the first place) and you think to yourself, "What did I do wrong?"

Though I can't say for sure—let's be honest, women have a history of saying and doing some seriously stupid things—there are a few common female habits that send a strong, "Don't date me" signal.

Next time you're trying to snag a man, try curbing these 10 unattractive tendencies in the process.

10. Touching yourself in public

Listen, we get it. You do everything you can to take your natural self and create some fake person. You spackle yourself with cosmetics and apply highlighter and bronzer to give yourself the illusion of cheekbones you don't have and add extensions to your hair and paint your lips to look lush and you are obsessed with making sure your phoniness is perfect. But all this constant hair fluffing and checking your reflection and reapplying lipgloss can get a bit, well, gross. There is a mirror in the bathroom. Please use it, if you feel the overwhelming need to make sure your façade is in place. In the alternative, try just being yourself, and maybe hit the gym more often that the Lancome counter?

9. Being completely incapable of empathizing

Ugh, you women and your feelings, and lack thereof when it comes to anyone other than yourself. I'm no idiot; I know that most women will never be as sensitive, or as emotional, or as romantic towards men as men are towards women. Fine. But if you'd like to be in a successful relationship, ever, you need to learn to empathize. Whatever it is your man is upset about—an annoying coworker, a grumpy friend, an overwhelming to-do list—show him you understand, and you feel what he feels. Otherwise, you'll just come off as a shallow, superficial bitch.

8. Thinking "women's rights" are a thing

Almost any time a men's rights issue comes up in discussion, there's at least one privileged, clueless bitch who feels the need to stand up and idiotically ask about women's rights. Women have had all their legal rights for 40 years. Women have more legal rights than men. Western women are the most privileged, pampered adults that have ever lived. Sit down.

7. Finger-combing and shedding hair in public

I understand the occasional need to run your fingers through your hair; I'll admit even I'm forced to do so after running (I dunno, something about sweat building up from the workout? Someone feel free to explain it to me). But it's out of necessity, and I do it as subtly as possible—and you should, too. Meaning: not while you're walking to work, or out running errands, or on a date (seriously, if you're shedding hair on a date, you need to get your shit together), or pretty much anywhere that's highly visible and public. Yes, we get that you love your hair. We love your hair, too. The hairballs that build up on the couch after you've finished shedding, not so much. Ladies, meet comb. Comb meet ladies.

6. Reading S&M

This might be tough to hear, but, bondage porn is. not. cool. I'm not talking about the occasional fan fiction (who didn't succumb to the forces of Poldark or Harry Potter?). I'm talking about those weird, fantasy world (or relationship, or whatever it may be) books that invite you to imagine yourself a blushing ingénue with a billionaire boyfriend who apparently doesn't have a job , who spends his free time (which seems to be all his time) tying you up and whipping you like a dog. The books that take up all your time when you could be, I don't know, breathing in fresh air or building real relationships with real people. Just stop. Please.

5. Leaving the toilet seat down

I know, you're rolling your eyes. This is quite possibly the most cliché complaint about women, and the one you hear the most. But there's a reason for that. It's fucking annoying. Imagine having to lift the seat on your own toilet every time you go to pee. That's what we go through because of your entitled belief that you get to decide how the toilet works in other people's homes. You are not the arbiter of the toilet, and if it's not your toilet, then leave it the way you found it. And if you've left menstrual blood or products behind, clean up after yourself. Your mother doesn't live here. It's that simple.

4. Playing hot and cold with your feelings

What is it that causes you to pull out all the stops when you pursue a man, only to turn into the iceberg that sank the Titanic when he shows even the tiniest amount of reciprocal feelings? And then, of course, become a romantic puppy dog the second he gets over it and stops paying you any attention. If it's some sort of game your BFFs, or the "Bitch Bible," convinced you would work, just stop now. It doesn't. It makes you seem fickle, immature and evil.

3. Having disgusting nails (and hands)

Yes, nail polish is "girly." Chipped, peeling, stained nails are not. If you are going to abuse nail salon workers and have them pretty up your hands for what amounts to slave wages, then take care of them. Looking like you just peeled the face off a zombie with your nails is gross. Try to recall that painted nails are optional and your choice. The alternative is soap and water. Use them. Clean, healthy hands and nails are always attractive.

2. Acting like a baby when your boyfriend is sick

Seriously, what's the deal with that? Do you not understand that nobody is unbreakable (except Louis Zamperini, of course), and that if your boyfriend sustains some awful injury or has a real illness, he might need some help and support? But when you turn into a whining, heartless, selfish bitch who can't believe her life might be interrupted by someone else's cold, it's, well, annoying. Make him some fucking soup and stop being such a cold, selfish cunt. Not everything in the world revolves around you and your comfort. It makes you sound like a sociopath at best and a psychopath at worst. Like you're fucking …..

1. Crazy

No matter what, do not ever go full crazy. Never.

Writing shit like this, Emma? That's going full crazy. Get over yourself, you psycho little bitch. And get a cat. I'm not optimistic about your romantic future. You shouldn't be either.

Lots of love,

JB

The cost of pandering to women in college

AVfM Video Source · 4 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Women are going to college in unprecedented numbers, earning degrees in low-demand subjects that earn low pay and leaving the hard thinky STEM stuff to men. Funding these women comes with a price. Turd Flinging Monkey explains.

https://youtu.be/0xKDBNdlJjs

AVfM Classics: the myth of women's oppression

Paul Elam · 4 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Forty some odd years ago, feminists bellowed their way into mainstream attention, launching a major offensive on what they called a patriarchal system that had oppressed women for centuries. Painting women as downtrodden and powerless, they railed against men with the missionary zeal of abolitionists and with largely the same message. In short, women were slaves and men were their masters. They demanded liberation and have been making demands every since.

They did a magnificent job of pitching all this. That could be a testament to the inherent truth in their ideas. Or it might be something else, like the fact that they already had so much power that few were willing to question anything they said in the first place. You can put your money on the latter, because even a remotely objective examination of the facts leads to a far more reasonable conclusion. Women were never oppressed to begin with. Not even close.

I'm no historian, but I did attend some history classes before I finished middle school. So, by the time I was 13, I knew what oppression was. And lucky for me I was 13 in a time when people still knew what it wasn't.

Oppression has some pretty obvious tell tale signs. Like torture and death; like bullwhips and chains; gas chambers and death camps. Oppression is a roadmap of scars on the back of a field hand that was purchased at an auction. It is the rope that gets strung over a tree branch in broad daylight and used to choke the life out of someone convicted of being the wrong color.

It is an indelible stain on humanity, void of compassion, dehumanizing to both the oppressed and the oppressor. And the evidence of it is so offensive to modern sensibilities that we preserve proof of it as lessons for the coming generations.

Now, when we compare those things to the historical world of women, which was largely one of being protected and provided for, we get an entirely different picture. It is a portrait not of the oppressed, but of the privileged. And it begs a good many questions that need to be answered.

For instance, how many times in history did we have slaves with the first rights to a seat in the lifeboat? Which slave masters were compelled to go off to war to protect the lives of their slaves? How many oppressors tore their own bodies down with brutal labor so that they could provide food and shelter for those they oppressed?

Zero sounds like a good answer.

It also makes one wonder, or should, how many slave masters had to get on their knees before their prospective slaves, bearing gold and jewels to ask permission to be their master? How many slaves could say "no" and wait for a better deal?

How about another goose egg?

It's not coincidental that feminists pointed to marriage as an oppressive institution. Pointing at nothing and making a lot of noise has worked pretty well for them. And so, in a collective fit of neurotic activism they attacked the one institution that had served as the source of more support and protection for women than any other in history. They became obsessed with depicting a walk down the wedding isle as the path to oppression; each woman's personal Trail of Tears. You couldn't buy this kind of crazy if you were Bill Gates.

"Hey!" some feminists are shrieking by now, "What about voting rights? Women were not allowed to vote! That's oppression!" Well, no, it's not. And all we need to do is look at the history of voting in America to prove it.

In the beginning, almost no one could vote. It was a right reserved for a few older white males who owned land, which left almost all men and a lot of other people out of the picture. This doesn't say anything particularly special about women. So if this constituted oppression, then it meant that nearly everyone was oppressed. Maybe the early Americans didn't catch on to that one because they were too busy celebrating their new found freedom.

Anyway, as time passed, because men of good values wrote an amazing constitution, voting rights were expanded to other groups. First to the men who didn't own land, then later to other ethnic groups, then still later to (white) women. Further down the road, black women and men were finally guaranteed the vote in 1965. Even further down the road the voting age was lowered bringing another large group of people into the fold. And today we are debating the voting rights of illegal aliens. Formerly oppressed hamsters may be next.

And we should consider that there was something of a tradeoff for women regarding the vote. Like exclusion from combat and men compelled to turn over the fruit of their labors and to die for them at the drop of a hat. Perhaps it wasn't a fair tradeoff, mainly to the men. But proof of women's oppression? Comedians pay for material that isn't nearly this funny.

The same was true for owning land. Plenty of women weren't allowed to…for a while, anyway. It probably had something to do with the fact that it was men who had to have land on which to build women homes, or perhaps they figured that men who were expected to face bullets in order to protect that land might be better, more deserving keepers of it. Who knows what insanity plagued us before feminism restored us to reason?

Whatever the reasons, those rules weren't long lived. Besides, not being able to own land was pretty much softened by the fact that women could choose men to provide it for them through that oppressive institution of marriage, and the phallocentric, linear thinking alleged tyrants that they married.

I am old enough to remember well the older rules for men. Work hard and take care of your woman. Be prepared to lay down your life for her. Watch your mouth in the presence of a lady. Offer her your seat, even if she is a stranger. The same for opening doors and lighting smokes. Disrespect her and risk a beating. Touch her in the wrong way and you're a dead man.

This isn't the way oppressed people are treated. But we do have another word for those fortunate enough to benefit from these kinds of standards. Royalty. We didn't coin the term "princess" for women without a good reason.

With a few trivial exceptions, this has always been the gold standard for the treatment of women. The fact that this is beginning to change, that men are starting to put the brakes on doing a lot of things out of chivalry, is just another example of feminism shooting women in the foot. Accidents happen, especially self inflicted wounds, to people that play with guns when they don't know what they're doing.

Still, I have to hand it to feminists in their capacity to spin a wild yarn. Taking a privileged class of people and convincing the world that they were picked on was a masterful piece of skullduggery. But it was only successful because the mandate for men in western culture has always been to give women whatever they want without much question. Otherwise, the plethora of feminist ideas would have buckled under the oppressive weight of unchecked dishonesty.

Nonetheless, our unhealthy enabling of them set the stage for women to pass up men in every aspect of life. Women are now more educated than men and they also have most of the jobs. Nothing suggests this is going to do anything but favor women even more in the future. All that from an ideology that resides a house of cards that only remains standing because the wind itself has been scared out of blowing it down.

I would offer the feminists my kudos for shrewd work and a job well done, but winning a race is easy when you start with one foot already across the finish line, and everyone else pretends not to notice.

CASA and rape hysterics

Michael Conzachi · 4 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

As has been covered here and just about everywhere; on Wednesday, July 29, 2015 The Senate Health Education Labor & Pensions (HELP) Committee held a hearing in Washington DC to discuss the issue of sexual assaults on college campuses; primarily the Campus Accountability & Safety Act. The usual collection of sexual assault grievance hysterics testified before this committee.

Sexual assault, when it does happen, and after a fair and impartial investigation, those found guilty in a criminal court of law must be held accountable. No one is going to dispute that.

The witnesses included Senators' McCaskill, Gillibrand, Ayotte, and Dean Heller on one panel. The other panel consisted of University of California President Janet uh-uh-uh-uh (I lost count after about 100 uh's) Napolitano, Dana Bolger, Co-Founder, Know Your IX Washington, D.C., Dolores Stafford, Executive Director, National Association of Cleary Compliance Officers & Professionals, and Mollie Benz Flounlacker, Associate Vice President For Federal Relations, Association of American Universities, Washington , D.C.

There was NO ONE, I repeat, NO ONE testifying about the issue of due process or who represented students who had been falsely accused. There could not be a more biased panel of witnesses in the solar system, unless the Mars Rover discovered some form of life on Mars that had been sexually assaulted.

Mrs. McCaskill enhanced her testimony, claiming that she has met with all kinds of groups to learn more about the problem, including with families of those who have been accused. Really Senator? Who?

NONE of the witnesses mentioned the term due process, only a rare and conciliatory word; "fairness."

Senators Gillibrand, McCaskill and ranking member Patty Murray continually referred to accusers as "victims" or "survivors" and the accused as "accused," "alleged perpetrator" or "rapist."

Does anyone see the bias in those assertions?

Senators Murray and Elizabeth (I'm really a Native American) Warren regurgitated the nonsensical "1 in 5" statistic claiming it had come from the CDC. Despite being something like, a thousand studies and analyses and reviews of actual DOJ crime statistics and reviews of Cleary reports, the real number is something like 1 in 5,000; give or take.

I interviewed a recent female college graduate from a medium sized California University, with about 8 thousand students, who wished to remain anonymous. This recent female graduate was very active in school functions, and was considered a very popular student who knew nearly all of the female students and most of the male students. This female stated that in four years of attending this university, she had never heard of one female student being raped; officially or unofficially. Google searches and reviews of Cleary reports revealed the same.

I guess in this case, the school seems to have misplaced 1,000 sexual assault victims. Or maybe they didn't happen.

Delores Stafford suggested that the education process should begin in High School and should focus on men. Yeah, that will fix the problem; let's indoctrinate and humiliate male high school students that they are all rapists in waiting who must be re-educated and trained, like an organ grinder circus monkey; not to rape.

All panelists repeated ad nausea education, education, education, awareness, awareness, awareness. Really? We are, and have been in awareness overload for some time now. I can predict the Billion$$$ more being spent and a small army in the works.

One, of many parts of this that was scary was the fact that Senators' McCaskill and Ayotte were former sexual assault prosecutors. If they display this kind of bias as United States Senators, what do you think their attitudes were as prosecutors? Are there other Vladek Filler's out there who have been on the receiving end of McCaskill's and Ayotte's ideological driven prosecutorial misconduct?

Several of the witnesses stated that sexual assault "survivors" don't know who to turn to and don't know what to expect."

Here's a little hint; if you were raped, dial 9-1-1.

A question that must be asked is; how is it possible that a supposed somewhat intelligent college students who allegedly had to demonstrate a somewhat functioning level of intelligence to get into college, not figure out who to call or where to turn when they feel that they have been an actual victim of sexual assault? Does the process require some type of Mission Impossible directions from a self-destructing tape recorder on a mountain top in Nepal?

I checked the website of the University of California system, the school system that Mr., I mean Ms. (uh-uh-uh-uh) Napolitano is president and within 2 seconds and two clicks of a mouse, I had found a main page containing virtually every resource of information available to victims of sexual assault, harassment, dating or domestic violence and stalking, along with phone numbers for help of every college in the UC system, including how to make a report.

Tell me again how and why alleged victims do not know where to go if they were sexually assaulted?

Many of the witnesses harped on having a "confidential" advocate to support the alleged victims. There is no argument as to whether or not actual and true victims are in need of counseling; but what is meant by a "confidential" advocate; and what types of protections should they have.

If any alleged sexual assault victim discusses their case with anyone, other than a licensed professional who is bound by laws and rules of confidentiality; then that person is a potential witness. If they want that confidentiality, then the "confidential" advocate should and must be in one of those professions that insure confidentiality by law.

What if an alleged female victim tells her BFF that she made up the whole rape story, because "Joe" had dumped her and she was pissed, but she did in confidence? Unless that BFF is a medical, psychological, or legal professional protected by law, then that BFF can become a witness if the accused learns of this revelation.

Some of the witnesses kept referring the school process as a "disciplinary" process. Well, should there not be some type of offense to have been established before any "discipline" takes place. Talk about putting the cart in front of the horse. In the current version of CASA, there are severe limitations to the questioning of an accuser that focus on feelings rather than facts. College tribunals interpret questions by the accused to the accuser, and then translate those into the form of how the accuser is to be asked keeping in mind what the accuser felt rather than what actually occurred.

Possible Scenario:

Alleged Victim: "Well even though I had nothing to drink and the male had me sign a consent in triplicate that was notarized and witnessed by three lawyers, and he videotaped every stage of an encounter, once again having me place my initials next to each question such as; can I kiss you, can I feel your breast, can I remove your panties, and the other 147 questions and sub questions, and follow-up questions, and I sent him 84 text messages in the two weeks following the event telling him how great it was, and after I talked to 17 advocates and various workers at the woman's health center on campus for six months, I still feel as if I had been raped."

Panel: "Evidence Inadmissible; Guilty!!!

I am being facetious of course, but not really that far off from the truth.

Senator Alexander posed a question to the witnesses concerning the issue of due process for both the accuser and the accused and was met with silence for about six seconds, before uh-uh-uh-uh Ms. Napolitano chimed in that; that is something they are looking at right now. That response was probably due to the fact that a Superior Court judge in San Diego excoriated the University of California at San Diego for violating the due process rights of a male student, and expelling him. Maybe that's why Janet uh-uh-uh-uh Napolitano chimed in after a lengthy delay that she was “looking into that.” My; in the year 2015, a former attorney general is just now getting around to the issue of looking at due process; something that has been inscribed in law since 1776. Uh-uh-uh-uh Napolitano must have been sick that day they taught due process in law school.

There were only a few brief statements that had anything to do with fairness and nothing about the rising tide of false allegations. No one mentioned “mattress girl” or UVA and Rolling Stone, the Duke Lacrosse fiasco, or countless others across the country of college men being falsely accused.

Senator Sheldon Whitehouse also addressed due process and the use of law enforcement, reminding panelists that these campus adjudications can be used in future criminal court proceedings. He made a statement that I and many others have said from the beginning that it is imperative that law enforcement be brought into this process as soon as possible. He also mentioned; and he is correct, that anything that is learned or discovered in the college tribunal can be used in a subsequent criminal trial.

So there you have it. A Senate committee that is responsible for amending and sending this piece of legislation through for implementation and law only hearing one side of the equation.

No one is going to say that sexual assaults don’t happen on campuses, and no one is going to say that neither the college kangaroo proceedings nor law enforcement don’t screw up from time to time. But what we have here is the sexual grievance hysteria industry wants and demands a separate system of justice for alleged violations, with a separate system of rules with separate rules of evidence and decorum that virtually guarantees than any accusation results in sanction.

In their delusional world view of sex assault hysteria, an allegation equals a conviction. There’s no need for all this due process, the right to face your accuser and rule of law stuff.

They want a college version of a conviction; they want heads on a platter, and they are hell bent to achieve that goal by any means possible, even if it means they have to destroy hundreds if not thousands of young men in the process.

CASA is in complete contrast to the Constitution and to Due Process, and defies rule of law, and basic common sense; the same type of common sense that I would presume most college students and staff should have if they step foot on a college campus.

Am I missing something, or have I just stepped into the Twilight Zone of lunacy?

Men's Rights Movement the Opera

AVfM Video Source · 5 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Not quite like any other video about men's rights.

You can visit SyeTenAtheist's Youtube channel here.

Update: apparently this video was so good we managed to publish it twice. – Ed.

La défense de Roosh

Jonathan David Farley, D. Phil. · 6 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Montreal feminists are organizing to keep pick-up artist Daryush "Roosh V" Valizadeh out of Canada so he cannot continue his world speaking tour.

I attended Roosh's World Tour in Washington, D.C. At a last-minute-buyer's ticket fee of $60, I thought the price was well worth it—not just for the information, which I knew already—but for the comedy. As a former professional comedian, I know comedy: I wouldn't have paid $60 to see Chris Rock, one of my favorite acts, but Roosh V's speech was better.

While I no longer have a need to do what Roosh advises in his book Day Bang, which I have a signed copy of, I have a longing to do what Roosh does: help men become happy. Roosh is in that respect much like the Buddha or Dalai Lama.

I remember when happiness eluded me because I lacked the secret to getting a girlfriend. And even when I did figure out that secret, I still needed to learn how to date and keep girls I wanted. A resource like Roosh's website Return of Kings would have been a godsend in my twenties.

Far from promulgating "hate speech," Return of Kings tells men that if they want the highest-quality women, they have to improve themselves, whether it's through starting an internet business to become financially independent, lifting weights, or learning the wisdom of classical philosophers. By contrast, look at the cover of Cosmo: "Bikini, we're coming for you!"

Roosh does not regard himself as a pick-up artist, incidentally, but, to borrow one of Roosh's points, think about what a topsy-turvy world we live in where we have to defend the actions of men who want to attract women. Remember the expression "not that there's anything wrong with that"?

Anyone who brushes his or her teeth before going out on a date is employing "pick-up artist" techniques. In days of yore, men went out to slay dragons to impress a lady, and now they employ "clown game" to do the same.

There are of course pick-up artists who simply want to "slay" women, but any feminist who opposes men who do that is "slut-shaming." Further, the "go to" insult for feminists is that a male men's rights activist or pick-up artist is a virgin who can't get a date, so even the feminists value men based on their ability to attract women.

Roosh enables men to get what they want, and helps women get the men they want.

While it's true that Return of Kings does not put women on a pedestal, anyone who has tried his luck with young American women knows that the key to success is the Abundance Mentality: don't get hung up on any one woman and, ironically, you'll have more success when you meet that woman you really want.

Let me say a word about the chief charge against Roosh. While I have not read 100% of Roosh's writings, Roosh in his infamous essay supports the legalization of rape the way Swift supported the eating of babies. (That's Jonathan, Tumblrinas, not Taylor.) Feminists in their hermetically-sealed echo chamber—they banned me from their online forum attacking Roosh; one of them carried on a private conversation with me, but then blocked me when I tried to respond to her response to my response—base their campaign against Roosh on a lie.

As one commenter mentioned, it's not as if Roosh's lecture is one big rape riot. The rape riot occurs after the main talk.

In conclusion, pursuing women is not "dehumanizing" them. Men generally have little interest in having physical relations with non-humans. What feminism does is dehumanize men: feminists label a normal masculine drive "toxic."

Far from creating another Elliot Rodger—the murderer who joined a forum dedicated to hating pick-up artists and their ideas—Roosh's speech, books, and website may prevent one.

Roosh does life-saving work.

Air conditioning is a form of rape culture

August Løvenskiolds · 6 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The latest blast of hot air coming from feminists is their complaint that men are giving women not enough of it: the great feminist air conditioning debate of 2015 has supplanted the campus rape hoax debacle that crashed and burned in 2014 like the Hindenburg in 1937. According to feminists, men are unconsciously creating an ice ceiling to keep women out of cushy, safe indoor office jobs women prefer compared to swinging sledgehammers outside in the summer heat.

Honey, if you want warm, it is plenty warm in the kitchen while you bake me a pie. Cherry is my favorite. There's a love.

As is reflected by their (alleged) lower salaries, one reason women feel colder in the office is that they are doing less work than the men there – heat is a by-product of work and the harder you work, the more heat your body produces. Even man-hater Amanda Marcotte conceded that "According to a study published in Nature Climate Change, office thermostats are generally set to favor men's metabolic rates, which are faster than women's and produce heat more efficiently…"

This suggests, of course, the first way that women in office environments can feel warmer: simply work as hard as the men do, and the extra heat your body will produce will make you feel warmer. The extra productivity will help ease the supposed wage gap as well, as employers generally pay higher wages to more productive employees (men).

It is worth noting at this point the non sequitur in Marcotte's statement "produce heat more efficiently." Efficiency is a measure of work – an efficient engine, for example, produces more work, not more heat, than a less efficient one with the same amount of fuel (input energy). Using the term "efficiently" to describe higher male heat production is as jarring to the physicist's ear as would her saying "strong, handsome men rape more pleasingly" to a feminist's.

Of course, it is thin, attractive women in scant clothing that lose heat more readily than the normal morbidly obese feminist does, due to the high ratio of exposed skin (surface area) to the slight body mass of the waif.

Just as a spilled, spread-out glass of water on the floor evaporates more quickly than a full one, a thin, tall woman will radiate heat (cool off) faster than a squat, fat one of the same mass.

One way for thin women to compensate for this is to wear more insulating clothing (as men have long known) but the innate lack of women's agency and their poor grasp of scientific principles make it difficult for hapless women to dress as smartly as men do, and so I suppose it is up to us men to protect these poor girls from their childish ignorance of the dangers of the rapacious refrigeration technology, much in the same way that men putting the seat down protects dainty, ditzy broads from splashing their lady bits into toilet water.

Of course, by increasing the temperature of office environments, men would be hurting women in many ways.

First, it would not take long in a sweltering office for women to shed even more of their clothing, which would attract the male gaze in ways that most women enjoy and feminists find completely toxic and debilitating – and they would whine about incessantly.

Second, the work efficiency of offices would decline – men work less effectively in hotter environments and the decline in productivity would result in less money and fewer resources for women to extract from their male slaves. This would cause women to shed even more clothing in trying to attract more male attention in order for women to secure the dwindling amount of resources available, further debilitating feminists.

Third, hotter environments degrade male fertility – sperm production declines with heat, which will make it harder for women to use pregnancy to trap men into marriage and/or child support, the primary ways that women have used to escape poverty since the beginning of time.

Fourth, so of course, we would be reinforcing the cultural narrative that says that men are strong and smart, and women are weak and stupid.

Men, however, would find these languid and sultry offices more palpably pleasant, and I mean that most literally.

So turn up the heat, guys: the silly feminists think they want it, and who are we to refuse them, even if it is just a hot flash in the pan?

Stunning video about male victims of domestic violence (graphic)

AVfM Video Source · 7 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

A Current Affair in Australia, featuring AVfM writer Jasmin Newman, explores the issue of domestic violence against men. The video contains fairly graphic images of a man who was stabbed multiple times by his partner, as well as recorded footage of a woman shouting abuse at her partner, who has a bloodied face.

The video is the exclusive property of ACA, but can be viewed by clicking HERE.

Jeff Perera of White Ribbon Canada promotes violence

AVfM Video Source · 7 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Jeff Perera, community engagement manager of www.whiteribbon.ca thinks that serial abuser Miss Piggy is neato-keen! If you have anything to say about this state of affairs, please use #notallmuppets to do it.

Subscribe to Mens Rights Edmonton here.

And they call it puppy love

Doug Mortimer · 7 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

"The big mistake that men make is that when they turn 13 or 14 all of a sudden they believe they like women. Actually, they're just horny."
– Cartoonist Jules Feiffer

While waiting for a commuter train, I noticed a strange phenomenon on the platform. A teenage couple nearby had a curious relationship. As the girl wandered around the platform, the boy followed her step by step with a loopy expression on his face. Clearly this guy was hooked, figuratively speaking – and almost literally, as he appeared to be on an invisible leash. I wondered if this was the sort of situation that gave rise to the term "puppy love."

I couldn't help but flash back to my teenage years, even though my environment had inoculated me against such behavior.

At age 12, just as I was starting to notice girls, I was sent to an all-male prep school. In a way, I could see it coming. One of my elementary school teachers had my number: "What Douglas does, he does very well. He just doesn't do very much." Sorry, teach, but the school's agenda was not mine.

"Military school!" had been a recurring threat, though I was never sure if it was empty or not. I guess prep school was something of a compromise.

From day one in eighth grade (known as II Form in prep school lingo) through graduation, I didn't know any girls. Oh, I knew they still existed. Like Latvians, Lithuanians, and Laplanders, they were out there, but they were not part of my world. My world consisted of a long daily commute, chapel, classrooms, study hall, required sports, and lots of homework – even a summer reading list.

When I describe my environment as all-male, the term applies not just to the students but to the teachers (known as masters) and administration. The lone exception was in the front office where the headmaster had a thirtyish secretary, who looked way hotter than she was simply because she was the only person in the building without male genitalia.

I remember one particularly comic episode during an assembly when a group of exchange students from nearby schools came to make a presentation. A distinct murmur rippled through the audience when it was revealed that one of the students was a Swedish bombshell. When she stood up in front of an auditorium full of horny teenage boys and introduced herself as Miss Baad (pronounced "bod"), you can imagine the reaction.

Nevertheless, if it's academic achievement you value in an educational institution, single-sex schools rule. As a bonus, lack of opportunity to socialize with the opposite sex reduces the possibility of STDs and teenage pregnancies.

If the American peasants paying school taxes ever realized how superior single-sex education is to coeducation, they'd be beating down the doors at the next school board meeting and demanding it. Not that the courts would ever sanction it – and you know there would be a court challenge if a school district ever offered sex-segregated education. Remember what the Supreme Court said about separate but equal!

Of course, the argument for the status quo is that coed schooling is superior because the real world has both males and females and the educational institutions must reflect that. Since adolescence is when young people first start to socialize with the opposite sex in a meaningful way, junior high and high school are usually their first leks (arenas for mating behavior).

Developmental psychologists know that human beings have critical periods for learning certain behaviors. The Wikipedia definition of "critical period" is as good as any I've seen:

> A critical period is a maturational stage in the lifespan of an organism during which the nervous system is especially sensitive to certain environmental stimuli. If the organism for some reason does not receive the appropriate stimulus during this "critical period" to learn a given skill or trait, it may be difficult, ultimately less successful, or even impossible to develop some functions later in life.

Learning a language is a prime example of a critical period. That doesn't mean you can't learn another language later in life, but it won't be as easy. The same goes for opposite-sex relationships.

Junior high and high school are where most people learn to speak "dating." You can learn this "language" later in life (just check out all those dating advice books in the Self-Help section of your local Barnes & Noble), but you will be playing catch-up, and your decreasingly plastic brain won't absorb the material as easily.

So what happens when you discover you have a libido but you don't learn to speak dating during the critical period?

You learn to live with it.

Initially, this is a depressing prospect, but the payoff comes later. If you learn to do without during a time of your life when erections arise spontaneously (even in study hall!), you can easily do so when you get older. Also, as you grow older you look around at your more "advanced" peers who are married, married with children, single fathers, divorced, and/or remarried. These are men who gave in to their sexual desires. Almost without exception, their status is not enviable.

Your desires for food and water are worth heeding; if you deny them, you will die. But you can ignore your sex drive and survive. For the teenage boy who has been in serial relationships from high school forward, this is difficult. It's always more deflating to possess something and lose it than to never possess it at all.

For a number of reasons, I pretty much remained behind the curve, socially speaking, from college onwards. I eventually learned to speak dating but at a pidgin level. I dated sporadically and on rare occasions even had sex. But it wasn't a defining theme in my life. Clearly, it wasn't worth knocking myself out for.

Clint Eastwood was once quoted as saying, "Sex is a small part of life…99.9 percent of your life is spent doing other things." Granted, this comes from a guy who was a chick magnet even before he became a celebrity, but the point is worth pondering. Considering how little time is spent on sex, why is so much time and effort spent procuring it? The Clint Eastwoods of this world regularly have women offering themselves up. The non-Clint Eastwoods of this world have to go out and sell themselves to women. At what point does something become more trouble than it's worth?

Let's say you have a desire for your favorite local craft beer. So you go to the fridge and get one; at worst, you might have to make a trip to the market for a bomber, a six-pack, or a case, or go to the brewery itself for a growler refill. But suppose you find yourself in Europe where your favorite brew is not available. Oh, you can still get it – you can call home, find someone to buy a case for you, have it sent over, pay shipping costs, and maybe some sort of import tax, and then wait for it. Is the desire for your favorite brew strong enough to make it worth that extra effort and expense? If so, then you've really got it bad.

 In pondering that teenage boy on the train platform, I wonder what his future holds. Puppies, of course, are born with their eyes closed. Eventually, their eyes open, but the eyes of a man under the spell of puppy love may not open till it's too late. Does puppy love predispose a man to becoming a pussy hound?

Given the fact that sexual satisfaction is a bit like a drug high, you can see how much easier it is to get hooked when you're young and impressionable. After all, drug dealers don't hand out free samples to middle-aged adults. "Get 'em while they're young" is a longstanding maxim in the world of marketing.

Well, if you'd like to safeguard your son by enrolling him at an all-male school, you can forget about my alma mater. Seven years after I graduated (and almost two centuries after the school's founding), they started admitting girls. The Headmaster is now known as the Head of School. I guess anything with the word "master" in is too intimidating to females of tender years. Then again, they may be looking to the day when a female will be in charge and the term Headmaster won't fit. Checking the school web site, I noted that the Assistant Head of School was a woman reminiscent of the humorless principal (played by B-movie queen Mary Woronov) in Rock and Roll High School.

When I was an adolescent, an all-male educational environment was not anathema. In those pre-feminist days, even mothers could see the benefits.

But that was a long time ago in a galaxy far, far away.

Trailer for new weekly video series featuring Janice Fiamengo

Steve Brulé · 8 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

This video series will air every Thursday, featuring professor, and anti-feminist, Janice Fiamengo commenting on contemporary culture.

Janice Fiamengo is an outspoken critic of academic feminism, censorship and gender bias, and she is an ardent supporter of freedom of speech.

Janice is an English professor at the University of Ottawa, and this series captures her thoughts on contemporary culture, and the destructive influence of feminism.

Don’t mistake my nonviolence for pacifism

Paul Elam · 9 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

As feminism sinks into irrelevance its more dogmatic adherents have become increasingly violent. This is particularly true in Canada where feminists now have quite a track record of physical attacks and violent disruptions against anyone who disagrees with them. Their violence is supported and enabled by the Canadian government as well as the media.

All this is very concerning, especially since it is emanating from a country known for maintaining a peaceful society.

And now we have an even more contentious situation developing with PUA Roosh in that country. Since entering there he has been threatened repeatedly and assaulted by a woman throwing a drink on him. Twitter is alive right now with Canadian feminists urging people to do him further harm, even as far as to set him on fire.

Full disclosure here. To say I am not a fan of Roosh is an understatement. As I have said before, I see the man as a huckster, someone who manipulates men’s insecurities about women; a mere plaid jacket and cheap cigar away from running a used car sales lot. That, however, is not the important matter at hand.

The fact is that Roosh, and people like him, are well on their way to being placed in real physical danger from die hard feminists reacting to the curtain starting to fall on their sick ideology. When I say “people like him,” I am talking about anyone who dissents honestly from feminism. That includes me and a lot of other people in the MHRM who are braving the shift in social consciousness with our real faces and names out there.

In fact, we have been in the threat zone far longer than Roosh.

As the craziness intensifies, and it certainly will, feminists will become even more violent and dangerous. Individuals who disagree with them and say so publicly may need to take stock.

The MHRM is a nonviolent movement. AVFM is doggedly antiviolence. We ban people from this place for even hinting at violent retribution against feminists or their enablers. Those positions, however, should not be confused with the intention to meet physical attacks with turning the other cheek.

Being an advocate for nonviolent change does not mandate anyone to be a punching bag.

In the case of Roosh, a feminist threw a drink on him. Another feminist on Twitter suggested that people should pay attention to the fact that alcohol is combustible. It was retweeted and favorited several times.

> Apparently Roosh is running around Montreal right now covered in alcohol. I’d like to remind you all that alcohol is FLAMMABLE. #ThrowSmokes
>
> — Baenerys (@Auragasmic) August 9, 2015

So here is the proposition that is difficult. In the minds of most people self-defense is human right. I am also venturing a guess most people would believe that any response to violence should be proportional.

In other words the aim is to respond to violence with sufficient force to meet and stop the threat and no more. I agree with this approach. Someone slapping me does not give me the right to shoot them.

The problem in this scenario is that the decision on proportion is not quite that simple. Extreme feminists have become pathologically violent. So called moderate feminists, and even equity feminists have thus far remained mostly silent about it. In that they continue to feed and enable extremism while claiming they have no connection to it.

Here’s the deal. Given the current climate it becomes rationally questionable whether a feminist throwing a flammable liquid on me intends to ignite it. My personal option at this point would be to assume they would. Thus I would make my response proportional to someone trying to incinerate me. That means they would have to go down and at the very least be completely incapacitated, by any means necessary.

Personally, I think it would be a really bad idea to wait till you see them strike a match. It is now reasonable assume that this is what they are going to do.

This position does not come without some potential cost. First, if a feminist throws a drink on me and I respond by knocking them unconscious, I will likely be arrested. Of course, if I hit a female feminist who is aiming a flamethrower at me I will also go to jail, so the distinction is mox nicht.

The question for me is whether I will risk being immolated in order to not be arrested. I won't. And while each person has to make their own decision I don't suggest anyone roll the dice on these insane ideologues.

Much of this could be avoided, though. One option is for MRAs to throw in the towel and bow to violent ideologues. On Planet Earth, there is a better solution than that. It would be for feminists to start self-policing and rid themselves of violent advocates. Unfortunately there does not seem to be a place on Planet Earth where any feminists willing to confront the sickness in their movement exist.

In the end I am betting this time of crisis will not be long lived. The feminist narrative is increasingly being recognized for the joke that it is. The time will soon come when very few people will even admit to being a feminist, much less take the risk of assaulting people in its name.

Till that happens, though, I think feminists of all kinds should be aware that belonging to a nonviolent movement does not mean you are a pacifist.

As an MHRA I am willing to die for my beliefs. I only think it prudent to caution that I am equally willing to kill to protect myself.

Can Feminism Co-exist with the Rest of the World?

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 9 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The great line in the sand that we now must draw, is the line which separates feminist from non-feminist. It should be self-evident that not everybody on Earth shares the feminist way of understanding the human condition, and that is how we mark the boundary between these two sets of people.

In the last year or two, we have seen a dramatic surge in mainstream anti-feminism. Quite frankly, these new people are just as fed up with feminism as the old-timers have been for years. They feel that feminism has "jumped the shark", and they are getting more and more outspoken about their disenchantment.

Now, since we are talking to the feminists themselves (along with everybody else), we ought to pose a very basic question for their consideration:

"Feminist, what do you intend to DO about this?"

Seriously: what do you feminists intend to do about the present situation? People are getting fed up with you and they are mobilizing, with reinforcements arriving daily. Will you treat these developments with the seriousness they deserve? Or will you schluff it off, act like nothing is happening, and carry on with business as usual?

The present situation is new and different. We're not talking about the so-called "men's rights movement" any more — it goes far beyond that now. We're talking about a fundamental shift of perspective, and a whole new way of thinking to go along with it.

Let's be clear on one thing for starters: we're not a bit happy about the pernicious effect which feminist innovation has had upon men and boys. Let this be well understood. We know that men and boys are ground zero in feminist plans. That reality is never far from our thoughts.

But our thoughts go further, for we cannot ignore that men and women live in the same social ecosystem. Hence, the effect of feminist innovation does not stop with men. The web of cause and effect spreads in all directions, and if bad things happen to men, surely nothing good will follow for women. So by the end of the day, we are worried about the effect which feminism has upon EVERYBODY. Yes, the entire human community.

You feminists must understand that we outnumber you. That is why we call ourselves the non-feminist majority – because we've got the numbers! Furthermore, you are gravely mistaken if you think we are naught but empty space and empty minds, fit only to be filled with feminism. In fact we are a complex tapestry of life, ripe with meaning and mystery. Get that in your head, okay?

We have eyes — our OWN eyes, not yours! This means that we are SEEING you, in ways that you feminists cannot hope to see yourselves, and we've got some highly original opinions about what we see. We are everywhere, we are gazing into feminism's soul, and we are discussing what we are seeing there — whether you like it or not. That's right, the abyss is gazing into you now. How does that feel?

Don't tell us to "look in the dictionary" in order learn what feminism is. You can't put us off with that stale old stuff any more! We can see, plain as day, what feminism is — after all, we've had half a century to do this! The truth about feminism is not written on a book page but painted on the canvas of this world, in tall red letters impossible to miss. And no, we have not missed a bit of it.

So feminists, we put it to you one more time: What do you plan to do about this?

You are in trouble for a REASON. Your actions and policies, for many years, have brought you to this point, and more of the same will only dig you in deeper. Is that what you want?

We are not feminist, and we will never be feminist. Nothing can make that happen, and if you try to force feminism upon other people you will only make things worse for yourself.

Are you looking for advice? Well here it is, ready or not. Feminism must gaze into a mirror, long and hard, and learn to SEE itself — for the very first time ever!

Here, let us help. We've got the mirror, and if you just sit still, we shall be happy to hold it in front of your face. In fact, we've been doing that very thing for many years, but you feminists never knew this because you never wanted to know it.

Be aware that the mirror we hold in front of you does not reflect the face that worldly vanity and self-conceit might imagine. No, this is a magical mirror which blows that face away and exposes the naked soul behind it. Feminist, are you ready for such a thing? Are you ready to gaze upon your own naked soul?

We non-feminist men and women understand feminism better than feminism understands itself. You might say, that this is our secret weapon. And yet, ironically, it is no secret at all. Certainly, we have never tried to conceal it. We are happy to share what we know, and we shall propagate this knowledge ever and always.

So if there is any element of secrecy here, it is that feminism keeps this knowledge secret from itself, by a continual and strenuous exertion. Call it wilful ignorance. You cannot know what you WILL not know — for if the will is lacking, the way cannot be found.

Feminists, you might wonder why we address you in this manner. We have suggested, quite simply, that you've lost your way because you fail to know yourselves. Other people can see right through you, yet you persist in not knowing yourselves. For some reason, you prefer to fob that work off on other people.

That's a hazardous condition, don't you think so? It means that other people have got the edge over you, and will steadily advance upon you in the course of time, and gain the upper hand.

Feminists, let me put you straight with some real talk. If you want to stem the rising tide of anti-feminism, there is only one trick that will work. You must alter your behavior in such a way that you don't turn people against you. In other words, you must stop creating anti-feminists in the first place! Now, it is true that everybody is either a feminist or a non-feminist. But while an anti-feminist is still a non-feminist, the anti-feminist has a little something extra. Certain modifications, if you will.

And it's on you, the feminist, to see that those modifications never happen. Only YOU can prevent anti-feminism — it's your job, not theirs.

You want the tl;dr version? Fine, I'll let you have it in three words:

Listen and believe.

When non-feminist people try to tell you what feminism is doing wrong, you must listen to them, and believe them. You might think that these people "don't know what feminism really is", but I can assure you that they do. In fact they know better than you, what feminism really is. They know this because they know what you refuse to know.

So, sending non-feminist people to the dictionary for the fourteen billionth time won't work. (As if they've never heard that before!).

Calling non-feminist people terrible names like "sexist" or "misogynist" or "rape apologist" won't work — especially if those accusations are unfounded, which they typically are. It will only work if you are trying to create more anti-feminists — and for that purpose, it will work like a charm!

Propagating debunked or dubious ideas – such as "rape culture", or "male privilege", or "patriarchal terrorism", or the misleadingly-named "wage gap", won't work. Too many people don't believe that stuff any more, so you will turn those people against feminism because you are "repping" for feminism in a very shabby way.

Telling non-feminist women that they are stupid, ungrateful, internalized misogynists won't work. I guarantee that if you don't lay off those women, they will learn to curse you like a pack of bloody pirates. And the last thing feminism needs, is women cursing it like a pack of bloody pirates.

I could go on with these examples, but I'm sure you get the point. Let me repeat: When non-feminist people try to tell you what feminism is doing wrong, you must listen to them, and believe them. You might think that these people "don't know what feminism really is", but I can assure you that they do. In fact they know better than you, what feminism really is. They know this because they know what you refuse to know. You feminists seem to have an information deficit, but non-feminist people can supply that lack if only you let them.

One more time: listen and believe.

As a feminist, you'll never learn anything new about feminism if you don't listen to what non-feminist people say, and BELIEVE what they say. What makes you so dead certain that they don't know the truth about feminism? Who gave you the authority to pontificate about that? Seriously now — who gave you that authority?

All right, it's time to wrap this up. Feminism is not the world, okay? The WORLD is the world, and if feminism disappeared into a black hole tomorrow, the world would carry on with no regrets and be none the worse. Nor would life for women take any dramatic nosedive. It would stay pretty much the same, and any slight modification would in all probability be for the better.

So if you're a feminist and you want to keep your religion alive, you will need to make peace with the non-feminist sector. You can't afford to make enemies in that sector. You are not the only game in town any more, and it's time you modified your conduct accordingly.

So don't make enemies. In other words, don't make anti-feminists. If you plan to co-exist with the rest of us, learn to negotiate a balance of power, learn to respect our boundaries, and above all learn to respect our intelligence. When we try to tell you something, listen to what we are saying, and believe that we are serious in saying it. Believe that we mean it, because we surely do.

Listen and believe.

Accept, with a good grace, that the power to define feminism is no longer your monopoly. Accept, with a good grace, that non-feminist people possess the missing information in your understanding of feminism. Accept, with a good grace, that feminism's days of unbridled cultural colonization are over. Accept, with a good grace, that you will not sell feminism to people by harassing and insulting them. Accept, with a good grace, that some people will never embrace feminism, no matter how seductive your marketing plan might be. Accept, with a good grace, that non-feminist lives matter, and that non-feminist people have an inner life of their own which is precious to them.

Accept all these things, and many more, with a good grace. Then settle down, keep your feminism to yourself, and learn to coexist with your non-feminist neighbors. Is that even possible for you to do?

I guess we'll find out.

Of champs and chumps

Doug Mortimer · 10 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Spoilers ahead!

Had I seen the movie Southpaw a year ago, I would have thought it just another corny boxing movie, maybe one notch above a Rocky sequel. After having my consciousness raised (as they used to say in the 60s) by MGTOW, I look at it differently.

Southpaw is a boxer named Billy Hope (I told you it was a corny movie), a city boy who has battled his way out of Hell's Kitchen to an unbeaten record and a Light Heavyweight title. Hope is played by Jake Gyllenhaal, who had to build himself up physically to appear plausible as a boxer. By the same token, his previous role in last year's Nightcrawler involved a heavy weight loss so he would have a lean and hungry look. Movie critics love these chameleon-like transformations in actors. I guess it gives them something to talk about.

Billy Hope and his family are living large but his status is precarious. Ending up punch-drunk is a real possibility, and a lingering eye injury could result in blindness. While he earns the big bucks, his wife (Rachel McAdams), like every other suburban matron, spends the money. Hard to believe, given her polished good looks, but she too is a product of Hell's Kitchen and revels in the lifestyle her husband's willingness to dish out and accept physical punishment can provide.

During an impromptu rumble against a potential foe, a Colombian boxer who indulges in too much trash talking, Southpaw's wife is accidentally shot and killed by the boxer's brother.

Predictably, his wife's death devastates Southpaw. In his next fight, he attacks the referee and gets suspended. He turns to drugs and booze for solace with predictable results. His house and all his worldly goods are re-possessed and, after he crashes his car while driving under the influence and is found with a loaded gun, his daughter (Oona Laurence) is removed from his custody by CPS. Given the circumstances, this may be one time CPS got it right.

Having hit the ultimate mucky bottom, Billy picks himself off the canvas, metaphorically speaking, and starts out on the long road to redemption. He visits a seedy gym run by an old boxer (Forest Whitaker) and convinces him to become his trainer. After all, what's a boxing movie without a canny, wizened trainer?

At the same time, Billy's daughter has stonewalled him. When he goes to visit her, she refuses to see him or spends very little time with him. So he has not only lost his wife but his relationship with his daughter has been shattered.

Predictably, Billy regains his mojo, or most of it, and wonder of wonders, he manages to secure a match with his Colombian nemesis, who has supplanted him as the Light Heavyweight champ.

I hate to spoil it for you, but if you've seen enough movies, you can guess who wins the climactic fight. After almost two hours of manipulating the audience to root for Billy, you didn't expect an anticlimax, did you? Yes, Billy not only gets his title back, he regains custody of his daughter, who has forgiven him his trespasses.

The End, roll credits…so what's it really about? As postmodern English majors are wont to say, what's the subtext?

Billy Hope's worth as a man is based solely on his ability to make money – and he's quite good at it. The compound where he and his family live would do a Rockefeller proud, and it's all based on his ability to duke it out with other men.

Even though he is in peak physical condition, his body takes terrible abuse. His wife seems to love him, but one wonders if that would be the case if he were just a club fighter. Same goes for his daughter. Daddy's boxing career has got her all the goodies a kid could want. Once the goodies are taken away, she turns her back on daddy. Maybe Jesus loves Billy, but in this earthly realm, love is based on your utility. When you stop being useful, you stop being loved.

At no time does Billy ever mistreat his daughter, yet she puts him in the doghouse because he is no longer manning up. Sure, her mother/his wife is dead, but that's no reason to go off the rails. Get back in the ring, daddy. I'm tired of being poor! I don't care if you lose your eye, you've got another one. Now get out there and bring home the bacon.

Boxing is actually a superb metaphor for the place of the individual man in society. Like any social organization, each weight class is a different hierarchy. There is one alpha male champion and a host of betas (scrupulously ranked by pundits) underneath him. One day, a challenger may replace the alpha. And further down the line, the new champ may be upset by some upstart. The ultimate futility of it all never occurs to the participants. The cycle just keeps going and going. It is a rat race – admittedly, a high-profile rat race – but a rat race nonetheless.

The champ gets to wear a gaudy belt and make oodles of dough, while the names of the contenders are lost to history. The champ has the support of his family and his posse. But if he loses…he's on his own. The individual boxer has no colleagues; his fellow boxers are his competitors – much like one's "fellow" employees in a corporation.

At the same time, boxing is a metaphor for a man's ability to dish it out as well as take it in the workplace. Aggression and endurance are needed for him to tough it out and provide for his family. But when a family tragedy happens, how does a man respond? Does he go through the grieving process and go back to his old life, or does he go off in another direction?

Now I would never expect a guy like Billy Hope to hang up his gloves and start writing haiku. He's not the brightest guy in the arena and boxing is all he knows. So he goes back to beating up other men and allowing himself to be beaten by other men. Somehow, sitting atop the hierarchy blinds the champ from realizing that in the long run he is just as disposable as the foes he has vanquished.

In order to succeed at the box office, mainstream movies must underwrite mainstream ideas (though what's considered mainstream evolves over time), and for Billy Hope to go his own way would definitely be out of the mainstream. Billy, get back to the plantation…whoops, I mean get back into the ring…and start earning money! Your value is based strictly on how much you earn and that is based on your ability to beat up other men. Get with the program!

So Billy does his mainstream thing. He gets his life together, gets back in the ring, slugs his way to the top, and earns his daughter's love again. Yeah, that's right, Billy, sad to say it, but your daughter's love is contingent upon your ability to provide for her. You have no intrinsic value. As soon as the cash flow dries up, so does her love. You can wear that belt with pride and you can buy your daughter's affection, but in the long run, your achievements are nothing more than fodder for a sports trivia contest.

Movie audiences are obviously manipulated to root for Billy to get back on his feet, get back in the ring, and kick some Colombian butt. In that regard, the movie does deliver the goods, and that certainly isn't true of everything at your local multiplex.

Frankly, I was hoping Billy would have some sort of epiphany and go his own way. In an independent or a European movie, maybe he would. Not in a big budget American movie which wants to re-affirm men's traditional disposability and package it as a manly ideal.

Alone

AVfM Video Source · 12 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Messenger Rising makes a powerful statement about lonliness and being alone.

Srebrenica Remembered

James Schultz · 12 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Tucked away in the mountains of eastern Bosnia sitting on the Serbian border is a small town named Srebrenica. In 1991, Srebrenica had a population of about 35,000 people that sustained themselves through agriculture, mining, a steel factory and tourism that was drawn to its large spa. The picturesque features and natural beauty of this town are the kind one could expect to find on postcards, paintings and other forms of art. When I first Googled Srebrenica several of the images I found, if not for it's distinct European architecture almost reminded me for a flashing moment of a few place's I'd been to in New England as a child. Srebrenica was a beautiful small town indeed that many people called home.

We tend to think of ourselves in a modern sense as highly evolved beings with an elevated level of social awareness and consciousness. Reflections on the worst parts of our history are often accompanied with a false sense of security that suggests we are somehow more evolved and different today than our ancestors were.

In 1995 few of us who were in our teenage years in Western countries could relate in any way to the experiences of genocide survivors. Genocide was mostly to be found in books. They didn't happen during our lives in the developed world. They didn't happen near us. We didn't speak the same language as the people who committed these acts. We didn't speak the same language as those who suffered. Few if any of the cultural concepts involved in any way were things many of us would recognize. Genocide was a completely foreign concept to many of us including myself and while it remains so, to learn that teenagers in Sebrenica were starting to enjoy the same things I did like MTV put me one step closer towards seeing these survivors as people who were in some ways just like me.

In the spring of 1992, as part of the war in the Balkans, Serbian paramilitary forces killed approximately 2000 innocent people in the community of Zvornik on Bosnia's northern border. That same spring 2700 were killed in Foca while another 3000 were killed in Visegrad. 5200 more were killed in Prijedor and as of today, 96 mass graves have been located and exhumed in that community alone with many more still missing and unidentified.

According to the Bosnian Institute UK, from 1992 to 1995, 296 Villages and hamlets in the region surrounding Srebrenica were destroyed displacing 70,000 people, 3000 of which were systematically slaughtered and executed.

While women endured the horrors of this as well, and in a magnitude few in the west will ever know, we rarely acknowledge that the worst of the genocide was directed at the male population. Feminists will clamor to their keyboards to tell us that the suffering endured by men was at the hands of other men in an attempt to relegate this to an internal male problem to be used as further justification that the problem resides solely within masculinity, one that we can fix with a generous application of more feminism no doubt.

The problem with using an ideological feminist lens is that we cannot afford to be selective in identifying the factors that contribute to genocides like the massacre in Srebrenica nor can we afford to introduce principles and concepts such as patriarchy to the circumstances of a conflict that run counter to almost every major tenet of the theory. Just as surely as feminists will indemnify men alone and side step the role of Serbia's female leader, Biljana Plavisc who was one of the chief architects and unapologetic coordinators of this campaign of rape and murder in the earlier part of the Balkans conflict, women who had been voting in Serbian elections since 1946 will be spared the responsibility of what their elected officials did on their behalf. Willful ignorance of our history is on par with forgetting it altogether, which will "see us doomed to repeat it"(credited to numerous authors).

When the fighting began in 1992 Srebrenica found itself on one of the major fronts between Serbia and Bosnia and Herzegovina. In March of 1993, the UN Commander in Bosnia declared Srebrenica "under the protection of the UN" and Srebrenica was shortly thereafter declared a safe area in order to dissuade the Serbians from attacking.

In early 1995, the situation in and around the community of Srebrenica, despite being designated a UN "safe area" began to deteriorate as a result of fewer supplies making it into the town. The President of the Republic of Srpska, Radovan Karadzic, issued what was known as “Directive 7”. According to the International Criminal Tribunal on the Former Yugoslavia this was intended to achieve: “…the physical separation of Srebrenica from Žepa as soon as possible, preventing even communication between individuals in the two enclaves. Through planned and well-thought out combat operations, create an unbearable situation of total insecurity with no hope of further survival or life for the inhabitants of Srebrenica.” To this end, Serb forces enforced an embargo that restricted the provision of food, medical supplies and other essentials to the inhabitants of Srebrenica. In May of that year, the town’s Mayor would report that a number of people had died of starvation.

Although Srebrenica had already been the focus of other military actions as part of this campaign, July 6th would mark the beginning of the next phase of military offensive operations that were known as “Krivaja 95” which was designed to cleanse the town. Thousands of people would flee to nearby Potocari where a small UN contingent had remained although many would eventually flee for their own lives or surrender to Serb forces themselves.

Less than a week later on July 11th in the town of Srebrenica, with little resistance or condemnation from the international community, the leader of the Serb forces, Ratko Mladić would state victoriously that “We give this town to the Serb nation..The time has come to take revenge on the Muslims.” War had been ongoing for three years, there was no secret about what this could mean and what was coming next.

That night 10,000 men and boys who had remained in Srebrenica would decide that it was now time to flee the town on foot in a giant column that some estimate was somewhere between 12-15 kilometers long. It was believed that the best chances of survival were to be found to the north in the free territory of Tuzla which was a 70 mile trek away through dense forests and unforgiving terrain. The Serbian Army attacked the unarmed men of the column with gunfire and bombarded them with artillery sending them running for cover deeper into the forest.

As morning came, Serbian forces would pose as UN officers and use UN equipment to encourage the fleeing men to come out of hiding from the forests with promises that they would be treated with humanity as prisoners of war. Many men turned themselves over to the Serb Army where they would then be coerced into trying to persuade other members of their family and friends to do the same. In many cases it worked and many men surrendered, most of them were executed. Others would commit suicide to escape what they knew would be an even worse fate. Of the 10,000 people who left Srebrenica as part of the column, roughly 3000 would make it to safety. For those who did not, they were either killed as the Serbs pursued them, executed upon surrender or evacuated to the areas where the mass executions would take place.

Not all refugees joined the column bound for Tuzla. Earlier on July 11th, approximately 20,000-25,000 people proceeded to Potocari which was much closer than Tuzla and had one of the last remaining UN outposts. This consisted of mostly women and children, though some witnesses estimate there may have been approximately 1000 men among them. Several thousand people were able to crowd into the large UN facility while others took shelter in warehouses, factories, nearby fields or remained exposed in the open with no where to go. On July 12th, Serb soldiers in Potacari began to separate the men from the women. The UN managed to negotiate the release of refugees into Bozniak territory, though it was noted that few of these survivors were male. Many of the men and boys were being tortured and executed on the spot. Others would take control over their fate by committing suicide. When the men were finally being evacuated, it was not to their salvation, but to a series of locations that included fields, meadows, factories, warehouses and schools along a 35 mile stretch of the Drina River marking the border of Serbia and Bosnia. These were the same locations where the men captured from the column were also taken. It was here where hundreds of men would be executed and buried in graves, some of them still alive.

In order to conceal these crimes, Serbian forces buried the bodies in mass graves, but often dug them up again in order to change the locations. Using bulldozers and trucks, bodies were torn apart, dismembered and intermixed with others making it an incredible challenge identifying victims. In the case of a 23 year old man named Kadrija Music six of his bones were found dispersed across 5 different locations 32 km apart.

Today the grisly reminders of this tragedy remain alive and well as the area around Srebrenica is still an active crime scene with over a thousand people unaccounted for.

Bodies and bone fragments are still being discovered. Many survivors are still waiting for justice against those who committed this atrocity or the discovery of loved ones, mostly men and boys who died horrific deaths and are now buried in unknown mass graves throughout Bosnia.

Finding closure will never erase the pain experienced by the survivors of this tragedy. We can only hope that we continue to move towards a more civilized world where these atrocities are not tolerated. Clinging to false paradigms and convenient ideologies that see this as anything less than a human problem as we remember Srebrenica does nothing to move us in that direction.

Pleasure-seeking vs. relationships

Peter Wright · 13 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Pleasure-seeking as a philosophical enterprise has been around since at least the ancient Greek philosopher Epicurus, and was more fully elaborated in the writings of Sigmund Freud whose "pleasure principle" lays at the base of all psychoanalytic theory; "What decides the purpose of life," writes Freud, "is simply the programme of the pleasure principle."[1]

For Freud the human libido is a pleasure seeking force, and his popularization of this idea gave the project of global capitalism its internal rationale: every individual is an appetite ruthlessly seeking pleasure, a non-stop consumer. The majority of societies and economies around the world are now reliant on this principle in order to perpetuate themselves.

According to Freud, the pleasure principle is:

- backed by instinctual drive
- selfish
- ruthless
- narcissistic
- focused on the individual above relationships

After 100 years of promoting the importance of the pleasure principle, indeed over-promoting it, today we have become devotees at its shrine, promoting ideas like these:

- narcissism
- sense of entitlement
- pick up artistry
- rampant consumerism
- commodification of interpersonal relationships

How are we feeling about all that pleasure – are we enjoying it yet or are we sick of it? Do you want to dial up the hedonism some more, or do you want to join me in questioning the premise?

Despite capitalism's incestuous relationship with the pleasure-principle, a behavior it does more to perpetuate than merely serve, early psychoanalysts began to see problems with it. The problem was not with the idea that humans are pleasure seekers, but that the idea had been afforded far more importance in human behavior than it deserved – there were other more important factors to human being that had been given short shrift.

Like relationships.

Early psychoanalyst Ronald Fairbairn was amongst the first to write about the importance of relationships over pleasure seeking. In 1944 Fairbairn explained the impasse with Freud's theory as follows;

> In a previous paper (1941) I attempted to formulate a new version of the libido theory and to outline the general features which a systematic psychopathology based upon this re-formulation would appear to assume. The basic conception which I advanced on that occasion, and to which I still adhere, is to the effect that libido is primarily object-seeking (rather than pleasure-seeking, as in the classic theory), and that it is to disturbances in the object-relationships of the developing ego that we must look for the ultimate origin of all psychopathological conditions. This conception seems to me not only to be closer in accord with psychological facts and clinical data than that embodied in Freud's original libido theory, but also to represent a logical outcome of the present stage of psychoanalytical thought and a necessary step in the further development of psychoanalytical theory… [2]

This revolution in psychoanalytic thinking launched the school of Object Relations psychology, with the word 'Object' standing for real people we enter into relationships with. Object Relations psychology is based more on attachment theory than on the pleasure principle. In a nutshell this school, which superseded psychoanalysis, is described as:

> Object relations is based on the theory that the primary motivational factors in one's life are based on human relationships, rather than sexual or aggressive triggers. Object relations is a variation of psychoanalytic theory and diverges from Freud's belief that we are pleasure seeking beings; instead it suggests that humans seek relationships.[3]

Has the mental health industry caught up? Yes, I'm pleased to say that portions of the industry have not only caught up, they are driving the research on attachment forward. Other sections of the industry, however, especially those on the front line of offering services, continue to devote undue importance to pleasure-seeking through the advocacy of self-actualization and 'me and my wants.'

The problems of gynocentrism and treating of men as utilities will not be addressed until we look at how these things are used to generate pleasure. One reason we have stalled in relativizing the pleasure-principle and affirming the findings of attachment science, is that it's obviously not in the current society's interest to do so. To catch up and look in the mirror is to die – the whole goddam system collapses – our beliefs, our customs, our financial systems.

But look at it we must, both collectively and individually if we wish to promote mental health.

Do we really need more shopping, drugs, stimulation, sex and food? Frankly many men are done… they've had enough food and sex to last 20 lifetimes. They don't need more pick-up techniques, they don't need more research fads focusing on sexual drives a-la-Freud, and they certainly don't need to consume more – they've consumed quite enough, thank you.

If we insist on believing the pleasure principle is paramount, that it is our most pressing genetic imperative, along with the belief that "all men want is sex" that so many men find annoying, then our only escape is to follow a sick, nihilistic version of retreat from the world. How else to escape the call of pleasure? Our western culture's devotion to the pleasure principle leaves it stuck in its own insoluble loop, like a snake devouring itself and not realizing that the tail it is eating is its own.

I say western culture because there are whispers of an alternative in other cultures that, alas are also being corrupted for the newfangled focus on the pleasure principle that drives the mighty dollar. I have listened to people from various Asian countries – Cambodia, China, Thailand – who talk of valuing their relationships and families somewhat more than their own pleasure-seeking ambitions. Watch how they eat together, having several dishes of food on the table that they all share, not everyman for his own narcissistic pleasure. In some of those countries the individual has to wait until vehicles pass before he can cross the road, but in ours we have laws stating that cars must stop in obeisance to the almighty individual and his pleasures. I have also heard some Asians ask, perplexed, why women wear skimpy clothes in winter, not knowing that our cultures are all about inviting consumption and commodification of every person in order to feed each others' predatory pleasures.

None of this is to deny the pleasure principle and its powerful pull on men's lives. But pleasure quickly becomes hedonism without relationship to temper it, and it leads not to a meaningful life but to emptiness and nihilism where 'opting out' is the only response – a response that looks more like a sickness than a cure.

Now what does all this mean to the wellbeing of men? In short, everything. Getting these two vital aspects of human nature in balance is not only the secret to psychological health, but our lives may literally depend on it. Regaining that balance can start with paying more attention to our relationship needs and less to pleasure – more to the girl-next-door and less to the girl with the exaggerated cleavage, boob jobs, and love bombs.

Moreover, the problem does not stop at intimate adult relations, and applies to family as well. If every family member is chasing his or her own pleasures, they are more likely than ever to spin off in their own directions like atoms rapping in a void – there's no glue holding the unit together, no relationship – and custody battles, selfishness and estrangement are the inevitable result: Me and my pleasures first.

To be sure, regular relationships also afford experiences of pleasure or contentment, albeit of lower intensity than the pleasure-seeking described by Freud. Another distinguishing feature is that relationships don't involve the use of people in the same ruthless manner as does the pleasure principle – ie. not the same as we experience when devouring food or having sex. Relationship is more concerned with situating oneself in a context and gaining emotional satisfactions from that – from belonging, from being-with-others, as contrasted with using objects to satisfy appetite. A second distinguishing feature of intimate relationships is that the individual has concern for the objects of his attachment – whereas the pleasure-seeking appetite has no concern over its use of people nor its destruction of same.Jungian analyst Robert A. Johnson writes about the two impulses as two kinds of "love." He calls the pleasure-seeking impulse romantic love, and the relationship-seeking version human love. Here is his description of the two;

> Many years ago a wise friend gave me a name for human love. She called it "stirring-the-oatmeal" love. She was right: Within this phrase, if we will humble ourselves enough to look, is the very essence of what human love is, and it shows us the principal differences between human love and romance. Stirring the oatmeal is a humble act-not exciting or thrilling. But it symbolizes a relatedness that brings love down to earth. It represents a willingness to share ordinary human life, to find meaning in the simple, unromantic tasks: earning a living, living within a budget, putting out the garbage, feeding the baby in the middle of the night. To "stir the oatmeal" means to find the relatedness, the value, even the beauty, in simple and ordinary things, not to eternally demand a cosmic drama, an entertainment, or an extraordinary intensity in everything. Like the rice hulling of the Zen monks, the spinning wheel of Gandhi, the tent making of Saint Paul, it represents the discovery of the sacred in the midst of the humble and ordinary.
>
> Jung once said that feeling is a matter of the small. And in human love, we can see that it is true. The real relatedness between two people is experienced in the small tasks they do together: the quiet conversation when the day's upheavals are at rest, the soft word of understanding, the daily companionship, the encouragement offered in a difficult moment, the small gift when least expected, the spontaneous gesture of love. When a > couple are genuinely related to each other, they are willing to enter into the whole spectrum of human life together. They transform even the unexciting, difficult, and mundane things into a joyful and fulfilling component of life. By contrast, romantic love can only last so long as a couple are "high" on one another, so long as the money lasts and the entertainments are exciting. "Stirring the oatmeal" means that two people take their love off the airy level of exciting fantasy and convert it into earthy, practical immediacy. Love is content to do many things that ego is bored with. Love is willing to work with the other person's moods and unreasonableness.

>
> Love is willing to fix breakfast and balance the checkbook. Love is willing to do these "oatmeal" things of life because it is related to a person, not a projection. Human love sees another person as an individual and makes an individualized relationship to him or her.[4]

I attempted to outline the importance of relational attachments in a past article Sex and Attachment and another sketching a way to build relationships that avoid some of the predatory themes at the heart of Western gynocentrism, entitled Love and friendship. Hopefully these provide some discussion points, but more important is asking of the initial question: are we ready to interrogate the pleasure-principle as the foundation of our society?

References:

[1] Sigmund Freud, Civilization, Society and Religion (PFL 12) p. 263 (1991)
[2] Ronald Fairbairn, Psychoanalytic Studies of the Personality pp. 82-83 (1952)
[3] Object Relations, definition from GoodTherapy.org (August 2015)
[4] Robert A. Johnson, We: Understanding the Psychology of Romantic Love, p. 195 (1983)

Author's note: this article was revised on 30/08/15.

Karen Straughan responds to misandric claims by a Latter Day Saint

AVfM Video Source · 13 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Karen Straughan delivers a powerful reply to misandric assumptions from a Latter Day Saint.

Feature image of Salt Lake LDS temple by Jay Whitmire

Unique yeast evolutionary events made lager beer history

Paul Hamaker · 14 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The unique mutation of two extremely different strains of yeast at two separate times in history made lager beer possible. About 94 percent of the beer made and consumed in the world is lager. The unique evolutionary events that made beer better were discovered by Emily Clare Baker and a host of beer drinkers at Oxford University in Britain. The discovery was reported in the August 11, 2015 edition of the journal Molecular Biology and Evolution.

Saccharromyces cerevisiae and Saccharromyces eubayanus are the two yeast species that make lager beer possible. Storage is the key to the taste and was discovered by Bavarians around 1400. Yeast species were in essence domesticated to make beer. The researchers used a newly discovered wild strain of Saccharromyces eubayanus from Patagonia to decode the genetic history of the yeast that made beer potable and possible.

The Saaz and Frohberg lineages of yeast that were the first used to make lager were found to be nearly identical strains of Saccharromyces eubayanus and ales came from the yeast species Saccharromyces cerevisiae. The two species used to make the majority of beer have evolved to become the same species at least twice since lager has been made. The two species of yeast that are used to make lager and ale are 99.5 percent the same yeast based on mitochondrial DNA tests.

The beer making yeast has undergone further changes as a result of being used to make beer. The metabolism of both strains of yeast has become more attuned to producing fermentation and the metabolism of sugar. The geographical separation of the locations of the original yeasts that made lager and the care that brewers guarded their yeast with also argues for a unique evolutionary event that made beer making better at least twice.

This article is reposted with the author's permission from examiner.com.

Canada is a feminist theocracy

AVfM Video Source · 15 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The treatment of Roosh V by the feminist establishment in Canada is just the latest in a long stream of events in Canada's recent history, events which make the case that Canada may indeed be a feminist theocracy, according to Lucian Vâlsan.

Watch as our Multisite Operations Director takes a jab at the whole situation.

You can subscribe to Lucian's Freedom Alternative, here.

The femme friend zone

Doug Mortimer · 15 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Many years ago a woman came to work in my office. She was divorced, a couple of years younger than I, petite and vivacious, a bit of an airhead but very likable. I guess you could say she exemplified cultural hybrid vigor, as her dad was a Kentucky hillbilly and her mother was from France.

Then as now, I neither solicited nor expected positive female attention, but I got it from her. I didn't think about it at the time, but obviously her biological clock was winding down and I was eligible.

As things developed, we socialized at work and away from work, but it was strictly platonic. I had the feeling that ratcheting things up to a more serious status was an option, but something told me to hold back. From previous workplaces I had learned the potential pitfalls of dating co-workers. So I put this co-worker in the friend zone – though I didn't know that term at the time – and kept her there.

She had her good and bad points. One good point was she took good care of her father in his declining years. Her bad point was her continuous, mindless chitchat, a common enough female fault I characterize as blather-rinse-repeat syndrome.

The soft spot she had in her heart for abandoned animals was a mixed bag, as her compassion had reached a point where the animals were running her life. There was something of a consensus among our mutual acquaintances that she should have gotten married young and had a passel of children to keep her busy.

She revealed to me that she had once had an abortion and that it had haunted her (she was raised Catholic) ever since. She even had a name for the child and celebrated what she estimated would have been his birthday.

Eventually she changed jobs but we still got together occasionally. The co-worker dating taboo no longer applied, but I kept it platonic nonetheless. It just seemed right to me.

One day she told me she was getting married. I didn't know the prospective groom but I knew his mother, who had also worked at our office. The mother had always impressed me as a tramp, so I wondered how her son had turned out. After meeting him a few times, I had him pegged as something of a ne'er-do-well, a semi-employed, divorced man with two kids. My friend had likely given up on the idea of having her own children, so I think she liked the idea of having an instant family.

On a subsequent visit to her house, I noticed that her husband was absent. Seems they had split up. There'd been a domestic violence incident in which she was the aggressor. End of second marriage. Curiously, she remained friendly with his first wife, who had the custody of the children, to whom she was now a quasi-aunt.

But there was another suitor out there: the bus driver who picked her up every day for her morning commute. One thing led to another and the two of them got married. My guess is that she looked at him as her last chance for a husband and he looked at her as someone to take care of him in his declining years, as he had health problems.

My visits to their house were infrequent. For one thing, I wasn't crazy about dogs and cats jumping on me in tandem. For another, my friend and her hsuband were becoming a bit too religious for my taste.

I don't mind when people wish me "a blessed day" or say grace before dinner. And when people say they will pray for me, I say thank you. But it got so bad at my friend's house, I found myself checking my wristwatch to see if it was possible for five minutes to elapse without Jesus being introduced into the conversation. When it got to the point that the standard after-dinner entertainment consisted of DVDs of evangelists, I would feign a few yawns and take my leave.

Despite all the above, I liked my friend's husband. Physically, he was a rather sluggish individual thanks to being overweight and diabetic, but he was pretty well versed on the issues of the day so he could hold a conversation of some substance. So I still made occasional visits, but I found myself spending more time talking to him rather than her.

One visit to their house stands out above all others. I was having a conversation with the husband when she asked him to do something. I didn't hear what she said, as the remark was not addressed to me, and I was paying attention to what her husband was saying. We continued our conversation and she piped up again – something trivial pertaining to the curtains in the living room. But we continued our conversation until…

She suddenly lost it!

Shrieking at the top of her voice, she hurled every curse word in the book at her husband – and it basically boiled down to you're not paying attention to me! Didn't you hear what I said?

I can't find words sufficient to describe how profusely abusive she was. Let's just say there was a good reason they used women's names exclusively to identify hurricanes until the late 1970's. I'd seen my mother, my grandmother, and a cousin cut loose on occasion, but I'd never seen anything so extreme over anything so petty.

Ever the good Christian gentleman, her husband just sat there and took it, even though he must have been terribly embarrassed to be reduced to an invective receptacle in my presence. Apparently, he was turning the other cheek, though I wouldn't have blamed him if he made her turn the other cheek. At least, he should have told her to shut her yap.

It's always unsettling to witness these domestic spats when one is not part of the household. It's difficult to get back to being pleasant and sociable afterwards, sort of like going back to business as usual the day after the firebombing of Dresden.

Well, I've been to their home a few times since then, but I have never forgotten that outburst. I had seen her get emotional before but none of the previous readings on the Richter Scale was close to this episode. Naturally, I could imagine myself being in her husband's position. How would I have reacted? I don't know, but I gave myself a pat on the back for putting her in the friend zone years before. I can't always explain my decisions but I trust my judgment.

One day recently I got a voice mail from her. I called her up and found out her husband had passed away. He had worked three years beyond normal retirement age to provide more income for them and had enjoyed but one year of retirement.

Well, I haven't talked to her since the funeral. I'm sure I will see her again. She's not a bad cook, so I wouldn't mind going over for a meal now and then. And I wouldn't mind reciprocating in some way by taking her to a restaurant or a movie or whatever. But that's as far as it will go. In a sense, we're back where we started after three decades. I'm still eligible and she is still in my friend zone.

You can choose your friends but you can't control their behavior. That goes for males and females. My male friends also have their faults. I accept them as they are, so I can do no less towards females. Until they come up with lifelike robots that can be programmed to be ideal companions, that's just the way things are.

I'm not entirely sure what my friend's financial status is, but she may be in the market for resources. The death of her husband eliminates his monthly Social Security check. I have no idea if he left anything in the way of an estate, but he has kids from a previous marriage, so I suspect they are remembered in his will.

She knows my house is paid for, she knows I have no debts, and she knows I've been putting money away for 35 years, so I have resources. She may be on the lookout for a fourth husband. If so, she'll have to look elsewhere. I've seen her at her worst, so no matter her marital status or mine, I will keep her caged in my friend zone forever.

As it was in the beginning, is now and ever shall be, world without end.

Amen.

The Fiamengo File: Why I am an anti-feminist

AVfM Video Source · 16 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Slate: Straight women are terrorizing gay men in NYC

August Løvenskiolds · 16 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

According to an article in the online magazine Slate, gay bars in New York City are under siege from hordes of desperate straight women who are so starved for male attention that they are seeking it from men who, being gay, have no sexual interest in women at all. Gay men are noticing and a backlash is starting. From the opening paragraph of the Slate piece by a self-described drag queen:

> What's the purpose of a gay bar? For starters, they offer gay men… a hunting ground where they can chase people with similar desires. But perhaps more important [sic], gay bars also provide a haven from the heterosexual gaze. In small towns and big cities alike, these spaces allow queers to talk, flirt, and unwind without drawing sneers, slurs, curious stares, or even unwanted support—My son is gay, too! Gay bars are the one space that an LGBTQ person can enter without scanning the crowd for potential trouble. At least, that's the way it was until a sudden influx of straight partiers changed the terrain.

Now, I'm a supporter of gay men and gay marriage but even I can note the irony of this opening paragraph – it seems to echo the style of those traditionalist groups who oppose gay marriage:

> What's the purpose of a marriage? For starters, it offers fertile couples a hallowed ground where they can produce children and rear them with similar desires. But perhaps more importantly, marriage also provides a haven from the depraved gazes of those who frown on childbirth and childcare. In small towns and big cities alike, these spaces allow a couple to talk, flirt, and unwind without drawing sneers, slurs, curious stares, or even unwanted support—My son is married, too! Marriage is the one space that a committed couple can enter without scanning the crowd for potential trouble. At least, that's the way it was until a sudden influx of gay partiers changed the terrain.

It was long recognized by gay marriage advocates like Andrew Sullivan that the normalization of gay marriage would bring about the collapse of gay culture; married gay men would seek quiet suburbs and eschew decades of the decadent party scene that was the epicenter of gay life, which would contract to become a brief gateway for younger, uncoupled gay men instead of the vibrant, multi-generational locus it once was.

What Sullivan and others didn't expect was feminism alienating straight men and women from either other to the point where the only social contact a straight woman could have with a man at all was to seek out a gay one in the hope they could be turned into either sex partners or at least, the sycophantic admirers that their straight, friend-zoned male acquaintances used to be. In feminist speak, straight men are rapey, arrogant, cat-calling assholes and a woman should be terrified of every man she sees on the street – indeed, men are supposed to cross the street and not scare these fragile flowers by walking headlong past them.

Feminists have consistently invaded and dismantled male spaces from locker rooms to fraternities to businessmen's clubs, so it shouldn't be a shock that they are now taking on gay men's enclaves: gay men are both "safe" and "intersectional" in feminist rhetoric, which means the invasion of gay men's safe spaces will grow with a fervor unmatched by previous feminist incursions until every last gay enclave is shuttered. Feminists will destroy gay culture more thoroughly than the harshest mullahs could ever dream of.

Meanwhile, in a professional office settling, a man who dares to flirt or even just note a woman's provocative new outfit is putting himself at risk of termination for "harassment." A prudent office man averts his eyes and thinks "meh" when the office slut walks by with her tits exposed – behavior that feminists actively demand with their ongoing slutwalks and "free the nipple" campaigns.

These men have learned, many the hard way, not to trust their women coworkers with confidences, personal problems, admiring glances or even a bit of naughty gossip. Everything is potentially interpreted as a hostile environment now, and this feminist-enforced embargo of the sharing of feelings erodes the mental stability of a normal woman down to her well-groomed pubes, causing her to act out once she escapes to a gay bar:

> As a drag queen, I first noticed the lady invasion during a show this past winter in Hell's Kitchen, the current prime gayborhood in Manhattan. Wiggling through some faux-choreography with my co-hostess Monet X Change, I was startled by a sudden burst of screaming just beyond the stage lights. Then, swerving and stumbling, a romper-clad blonde woman crawled onto the stage. I assumed she'd leave when we ignored her bid to join the show, as such party girls used to do. But she stayed on, galvanized by wild cheers from her many girlfriends. She ignored verbal dismissals and the hisses of gay audience members. She ignored gentle pushes. Even when Miss Change (who stands about 6 feet, 2 inches in flats) picked the woman up bodily and tossed her away, she came jogging back. With the backing of her comrades, Miss Romper 2015 felt empowered to turn a gay haven into a straight jungle-gym.

The author of the Slate piece goes on to report that then last week, to my horror, I saw girls arrive arm-in-arm to one of those filthy dives where gay guys go to blow whomever in plain view. Not only are these naïve, boorish straight women that desperate for male company but they don't give fuck about those whom they trample to find it.

Now, as MGTOW like me continue to avoid marriage and other social contact with women, pressure on the tiny number of gay men to fill women's emotional and physical gaps will continue to grow exponentially. The inevitable breakdown of the gay male / feminist détente will weaken the trend a bit but t is already too late: even conservative and traditional single women are appearing in the fading gay club scene, so the end of those colorful icons of freedom and liberation will be fast, cruel, and final.

Someday soon, the only place for women to find men willing to discuss their issues will be the Men's Rights Movement, and interestingly, the smart women are already here.

Arash Dibazar & Paul Elam: Life changing motivational video for men

AVfM Video Source · 17 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

You can sub to Eddy here.

Feminist sex-worker calls out a RadFem troll (video)

AVfM Video Source · 17 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Feminist infighting is nothing new. But when one of them calls out a doxer, it's worth taking note. xxxild, and others, have been fighting for sex-worker rights for as long as I can remember; fighting the radical sex-negative portion of the feminist crap show, trying to get prostitution de-criminalized. I remember some epic pawnage of some really fucked up tumblrite twats. Here, xxxild acknowledges respectful attempts at dialogue with MRA's, and decries the smear campaign and doxing of Sargon of Akkad, done by Laughing Witch.

When sexism is a non-issue

AVfM Video Source · 17 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

A freshly LASIK'd Victor Zen returns from a long hiatus to explain what makes activism productive, and why sexism is not an issue without action to corroborate public complaints. Subscribe to Victor Zen for more commentary, activism updates and more.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=rV-F4OCsGUg

Video summary

Someone hates you. As an emotionally-secure adult, you don't care. It follows that adult men and women need not waste energy caring about sexism, which is just one form of hate spewed from wastes of energy. But, activism is necessary to counteract despotic forces where hate manifests and causes physical, calculable harm. Sexism is not the issue, the issue is the domineering will to implement sexism. The role of an activist is two-pronged: The reactive prong mitigates damage to victims of sexist actions and the proactive prong introduces checks and balances that slow bigots into gridlock, where the only escape is negotiation with accountable people. Ideologues cannot thrive in a well-maintained environment of this working.

Landmark case shines light on real campus rape 'epidemic': equating regret with rape

Pierce Harlan · 17 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

A landmark judicial decision was handed last week that will have important implications for college men wrongly accused of sexual assault. In Doe v. Washington & Lee Univ., 2015 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 102426 (W.D. Va. 2015), a federal judge appointed by Democratic President Bill Clinton ruled that when a college promotes the idea that a woman's post-intercourse regret is tantamount to rape, it manufactures a climate of gender discrimination against male students that can "railroad" (the court's word, not mine) the innocent who are wrongly accused of sex offenses. Read the decision here–and I summarize it in the next section below. The Doe v. W&L decision is among the most important events for wrongly accused college men in a long time because it shines a light on the root cause of the so-called campus rape "epidemic"–something this blog has called the "regret asymmetry" that separates the sexes. Women, more than men, regret casual sex, and it is these unsatisfying sexual unions caused by regret–not rape–that is the real sex problem on campus. Read about it here.

What is chilling is the allegation in the case by the accused male student that a college administrator openly promotes the idea that regret is tantamount to rape–an idea that is absurd, unjust, and hateful all at the same time. Sadly, this thinking appears to be gaining ground among college women (see below), and it needs to be stopped. It is time for a national conversation about the single most important issue when it comes to campus sexual assault, the "regret asymmetry" that separates young men and women.

Doe v. W&L

In the Doe v. W&L case, a W&L student, pseudonymously called "John Doe," sued W&L for,inter alia, violating Title IX (which forbids gender discrimination in colleges) in connection with his expulsion for alleged nonconsensual sexual intercourse with a W&L female student, pseudonymously called "Jane Doe." W&L filed a motion to dismiss, which the court granted in part and denied in part. All of the facts in the case are taken from Doe's complaint–whether they are accurate will need to be proven at trial. Doe's complaint averred that John and Jane met at a party then proceeded back to his room where Jane initiated sexual intimacy, and the two proceeded to have consensual sex. The next morning, he drove her home, and they exchanged phone numbers. Jane later told a friend she "had a good time." Thereafter, John and Jane became Facebook "friends," and John texted her, ". . . I felt like we had a pretty good connection," and she responded, "haha I thought we did as well."

Approximately one month after their initial encounter, they again had consensual sex. But then, Jane saw John at a party kissing another female and left upset. That summer, Jane went to work at a women's clinic that dealt with sexual assault issues. Seven months after the initial encounter, Jane visited a therapist, who said Jane's had "an evolution" about how she felt about the initial encounter.

Thereafter, Jane attended a presentation by W&L's Title IX Officer, Lauren Kozak, who introduced an Internet article the court would later label "gender biased" against males to alleged that "regret equals rape." Kozak said that "everyone, herself included, is starting to agree with" that.

Almost nine months after the encounter in question, Jane initiated an internal disciplinary investigation of John. Ms. Kozak interviewed John and refused to allow him to involve an attorney. A hearing was held, and, among other irregularities, Jane was not asked about inconsistencies in her various statements about the encounter. After the hearing, Rolling Stone published an article about a later-debunked gang rape at UVA. The next day, W&L found John responsible for sexual assault. John maintained the decision was prompted to avoid a backlash similar to the one felt by UVA from the Rolling Stone article.

In the lawsuit he filed, John alleged all manner of bias in W&L's handling of his case, including ignoring evidence that supported his position. The court held that John Doe alleged sufficient facts – including the Title IX coordinator's suggestion that regret is tantamount to rape – to plead a Title IX violation, and the court denied

W&L's motion to dismiss that claim. "Plaintiff's allegations, taken as true, suggest that W&L's disciplinary procedures . . . amount to 'a practice of railroading accused students,' and, if true, it amounts to gender bias.

Regret = Rape: The Sexual Grievance Industry's Latest Innovation

The loony purveyors of sexual grievances keep pushing the envelope to top their last inanity. Their latest and boldest effort is to equate regret with rape. The plaintiff in Doe v. W&L makes the chilling accusation that a college administrator openly equated regret with rape, and declared that this thinking is the wave of the future. Unfortunately for her, and her school, a federal judge has ruled that this sort of thinking can be gender discrimination against males.

Thankfully there are fair-minded jurists, because this sort of thinking already seems to be all the rage on campus. A college student recently wrote a jaw-dropping article about how she was"raped by rape culture." What does that mean? It means she clearly manifested her assent to have sex, but later claimed she secretly didn't want to have sex and only did so because the culture tells her she's supposed to.

And it isn't just isolated horror stories that suggest women think it's acceptable to say "yes" and later cry "rape" because of regret. In fact, we have evidence our daughters are being taught that a woman's "yes" can be transmogrified into a "no" after-the-fact if she regrets the encounter. A new Washington Post and Kaiser Family Foundation survey shows that almost half of all college women– full 44 percent–think that when a woman gives a guy a "nod in agreement," that isn't enough for consent. So if a guy proceeds to insert his penis in the woman's vagina after she nods "yes," he will be a rapist if she later decides she regretted the encounter. With all the tens of millions of dollars being spent on the "war on rape," almost half of all college women mistake consent for rape–and is it any wonder? Because this is what the sexual grievance industry teaches in waging the "war on rape," and too many of our daughters are buying it. We are raising a generation of nitwits.

But, you might protest, this wrong-headed thinking won't translate into policy. You would be wrong: they've already made it a punishable offense. When young men nag their dates for sex, and young women agree to have sex just to make them happy even though they secretly don't want to, they call it "sexual coercion," and innumerable colleges all across America have made it a punishable offense. Read that again: we are not talking women who have no reasonable alternative but to submit to sex, we are talking about women who freely choose to have sex for any number of reasons but later decide the male student ought to be punished for asking for it in the wrong way.

The "regret asymmetry" is at the heart of the campus rape "epidemic." But instead of working to reduce students' unsatisfying sexual encounters by educating them about this asymmetry, the sexual grievance industry wants to outright punish young men–and young men alone–whenever males and females act out the gender roles assigned to them by biology and the culture and women later decide the encounter was unsatisfying. "Consent" no longer means what the dictionary says it means–it has been co-opted by the sexual grievance industry and twisted and pounded beyond all recognition. Colleges are flooded not with rape victims, but with women groping for victimhood because their moral superiors–angry radical feminists–tell them to. Rape is never okay, but we're not talking about rape. Let us be blunt: we're talking about feminists teaching women that they have no responsibility even to tell the truth about whether they want to have sex. We're talking about a cry of "rape" being used to punish innocent young men simply because they can.

What To Do

We need to expose the inanity. We need to call them what they are–"hysterics, paranoids and boodlers"–and above all else, extremists. We need to explain to people that what they are promoting isn't a public policy, it's good old fashioned man-hating–a sort of gender get-evenism for millennials.

We need to divert all the resources being wasted on the "war on rape"–start with the the posters telling "men" as a class not to rape–and instead use them to teach our young people about the "regret asymmetry" that divides the sexes. We need to teach them that, alas, men and women are different, that young men have these things called "testicles" that give them an enhanced sex drive that (dare I say it?) makes men want to have sex more than women, and that men aren't hard-wired to be cautious about having sex the way women are since they can't pregnant. In short, we need to teach our young people all the things our parents taught us, and their parents taught them, because they're true.

And we need to teach our college administrators that regret is not tantamount to rape, and we need to fire the ones who teach that it is.

Finally, we need to teach college men to stop being so damn timid, to fight back, and to understand that an angry political lobby has a bulls-eye on their scrota for reasons having nothing to do with them.

How did we reach the point where insanity has become the norm when it comes to campus sex? We've reached that point because we've allowed gender zealots who subsist off tuition and tax dollars but who lack critical thinking skills to dominate the public discourse on these issues.

It's time to take back the night, for the wrongly accused, and to exile the extremists to the kids table where they belong.

[Ed. Note: this post originally appeared at Community of the Wrongly Accused and is reprinted here with permission.]

An open letter to Kay Hymowitz

Mumia Ali · 17 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Malone: [stopping at a post office] Well, here we are.
Ness: What are we doing here?
Malone: Liquor raid.
Ness: [looking at the police station across the street] Here?
Malone: Mr. Ness, everybody knows where the booze is. The problem isn't finding it, the problem is who wants to cross Capone.
-Sean Connery/Malone, "The Untouchables"

To public policy wonks, the name of one Ms. Kay Hymowitz is not at all unfamiliar; for what seems like ages(!), Ms. Hymowitz has been holding forth on public policy matters, particularly those centering on "family values"-related issues as they relate to "the Black family". Her book "Marriage and Caste in America: Separate and Unequal Families in a Post-Marital Age" is a case in point, as Hymowitz pulls all of her many columns and articles on the topic into one focused volume outlining just how dire the situation is the future of family formation in Black American life. Her more recent work, "Manning Up: How the Rise of Women Has Turned Men into Boys" once again coalesces Hymowitiz's numerous articles on the matter of a vastly changed social, political and economic landscape that sees an unprecented rise of (white) women and a corresponding malaise among (white) men. At the risk of coming off as impertinent, I think it's fair to say that Ms. Hymowitz has been around the block and knows the lay of the land, so to speak.

Her latest article "Did Mass Incarceration Destroy the Black Family?", which appeared in the Summer, 2015 issue of the Manhattan Institute's City Journal, then, comes across as rather odd for her oblique curiosity when it comes to how and why public policy scholars and sociologists – who, like her, have been observing, researching and studying the aforementioned matters for decades – are so very skittish to call a spade a spade:

> "As riots in Ferguson and Baltimore heated up this past winter and spring, so did denunciations of a criminal-justice system that has placed a disproportionate number of black men behind bars. One widely aired theory holds that not only are racial disparities and mass incarceration patently unjust on their own terms, but they also lead to chaos in poor urban families. Black men's absence "disrupts family formation, leading both to lower marriage rates and higher rates of childbirth outside marriage," pronounced a widely discussed New York Times article, "1.5 Million Missing Black Men." Hillary Clinton auditioned the theory in the first policy speech of her presidential campaign. "When we talk about one and a half million missing African-American men," she said at Columbia University in April, "we're talking about missing husbands, missing fathers, missing brothers."
>
> The missing-men theory of family breakdown has the virtue of being easy to grasp: men who are locked up are obviously not going to be either desirable husbands or engaged fathers. It also bypasses thorny and deadlocked debates about economics and culture. Still, it has a big problem: it's at odds with the facts."

Indeed it is, as Hymowitz shows-and-proves in several accompanying graphs of data charting the rise of the fall of Black familial life long before the crack war-fueled 80s ushered in Bill Clinton's historic (and now roundly condemned as infamous by the Loyal Left – oh, the irony) Omnibus Crime Bill of the 90s. Mass incarceration may present quite a few problems of its own, but being the causal agent of the breakdown of the Black family ain't gonna get it.

So, what is really behind the "multi-partner fertility", the plummenting marital rate and and all the familiar – and expected – social maladies that come with the obliteration of one of the most stable ethnic cohorts in American life for the better part of a century after the end of the nation's most bloody military conflicts? Not only do the public policy wonks know, but Hymowitz made the matter crystal clear herself, in a rare moment of public policy wonk bluntforce honesty, a decade ago in the same City Journal, aptly titled "The Black Family: 40 Years of Lies". Here's a bit from the highlight reel:

> "Over the next 15 years, the black family question actually became a growth industry inside academe, the foundations, and the government. But it wasn't the same family that had worried Moynihan and that in the real world continued to self-destruct at unprecedented rates. Scholars invented a fantasy family—strong and healthy, a poor man's Brady Bunch—whose function was not to reflect truth but to soothe injured black self-esteem and to bolster the emerging feminist critique of male privilege, bourgeois individualism, and the nuclear family. The literature of this period was so evasive, so implausible, so far removed from what was really unfolding in the ghetto, that if you didn't know better, you might conclude that people actually wanted to keep the black family separate and unequal…
>
> Other black pride–inspired scholars looked at female-headed families and declared them authentically African and therefore a good thing. In a related vein, Carol Stack published All Our Kin, a 1974 HEW-funded study of families in a midwestern ghetto with many multigenerational female households. In an implicit criticism of American individualism, Stack depicted "The Flats," as she dubbed her setting, as a vibrant and cooperative urban village, where mutual aid—including from sons, brothers, and uncles, who provided financial support and strong role models for children—created "a tenacious, active, lifelong network.""

And Hymowitz rightly notes the fact that it just wasn't cheap racial pandering and butthurt assuaging going on, but that (white) feminists were getting a piece of the action as well:

> "Feminists, similarly fixated on overturning the "oppressive ideal of the nuclear family," also welcomed this dubious scholarship. Convinced that marriage was the main arena of male privilege, feminists projected onto the struggling single mother an image of the "strong black woman" who had always had to work and who was "superior in terms of [her] ability to function healthily in the world," as Toni Morrison put it. The lucky black single mother could also enjoy more equal relationships with men than her miserably married white sisters.
>
> If black pride made it hard to grapple with the increasingly separate and unequal family, feminism made it impossible. Fretting about single-parent families was now not only racist but also sexist, an effort to deny women their independence, their sexuality, or both. As for the poverty of single mothers, that was simply more proof of patriarchal oppression. In 1978, University of Wisconsin researcher Diana Pearce introduced the useful term "feminization of poverty." But for her and her many allies, the problem was not the crumbling of the nuclear family; it was the lack of government support for single women and the failure of business to pay women their due."

Hymowitz summarizes her then-excellent column thusly:

> "So, have we reached the end of the Moynihan report saga? That would be vastly overstating matters. Remember: 70 percent of black children are still born to unmarried mothers. After all that ghetto dwellers have been through, why are so many people still unwilling to call this the calamity it is? Both NOW and the National Association of Social Workers continue to see marriage as a potential source of female oppression. The Children's Defense Fund still won't touch the subject. Hip-hop culture glamorizes ghetto life: " 'cause nowadays it's like a badge of honor/to be a baby mama" go the words to the current hit "Baby Mama," which young ghetto mothers view as their anthem. Seriously complicating the issue is the push for gay marriage, which dismissed the formula "children growing up with their own married parents" as a form of discrimination. And then there is the American penchant for to-each-his-own libertarianism. In opinion polls, a substantial majority of young people say that having a child outside of marriage is okay—though, judging from their behavior, they seem to mean that it's okay, not for them, but for other people. Middle- and upper-middle-class Americans act as if they know that marriage provides a structure that protects children's development. If only they were willing to admit it to their fellow citizens."

Look, everyone by now, knows the deal: Black America is a de facto matriarchy, rife with and created by state-sponsored – and funded(!!) – "programs" and shot-through with all the Clockwork Orange-type pandemonium that comes with it. It is a matter of documented fact seven ways to Sunday, that one of the single biggest wreckers of the Black family came from one of the country's most liberal presidents. Lyndon B. Johnson's "Great Society" initiative presided over the most profound and rapid change of the Black family not seen since chattel slavery itself, achieving in less than a half a century what a century of Jim Crow could not. Worse, these same programs have aided and abetted what would become cultural norms that I refer to as "Baby Mamaism" – the norms that support and nurture a kind of Hypergamy on Steroids in Black American life among its women, where Black women are encouraged to mate with the worst kinds of Black men, reproducing the kinds of people that keep Black America on a whole mired in the kinds of violence and social dysfunction that makes it so inhospitable that any Black person with anything going for them is getting outta Dodge going 90 MPH headed north. Meanwhile, the very same white academics, wonks, chattering classes and most importantly, "You Go, Girl!" feminists, wouldn't be caught dead being a Baby Mama, or having (multiple!) Baby Daddies – they were adhering to the time-honored life script that has made the Western world in general, and the American project in particular, the colossal success it is.

The reason why academics and the like do not openly say what we all by now know to be true, is due to its own "tangle of pathology" of self-serving interests, navel-gazing narcissism, left-wing ideology, fear of being a meanie and a kind of mob-bullying that can result in being shamed out of a high-paying job and polite society – to the point where stalwart conservatives like Charles Murray tip-toes through the proverbial tulips in the politically correct garden that is today's public opinion landscape. As Murray rightly observes in his excellent work "Coming Apart", the "new elite" that sets the tone for the rest of our society suffers from a profound lack of confidence in itself, which in turn fosters a kind of "ecumenical kindness" where, among other things, a rigid ideology of nonjudgementalism is the order of the day, not the search for truth, to say nothing of openly saying what is right and wrong behavior.

As a result, scores of Black Americans are paying the ultimate price for it.

Further recommended reading: Black America's Crummy Mummy Problem

Also: Don't forget to checkout my daily podcast, Obsidian Radio: The Voice of the Everyday Brotha, where I discuss in more detail today's column: On Ann Coulter & Baby Mamaism and Black Women & Planned Parenthood Are The Biggest Killers Of Black Folks! Part One

Decriminalizing sex work is good for women

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 18 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Amnesty International, the leading human rights group in the world, has recently announced that it supports the decriminalization of sex work. There is an important distinction to be made between making prostitution and related sex work legal and decriminalizing those activities. According to Donna M. Hughes, PhD, '[l]egalization would mean the regulation of prostitution with laws regarding where, when, and how prostitution could take place. Decriminalization eliminates all laws and prohibits the state and law-enforcement officials from intervening in any prostitution-related activities or transactions, unless other laws apply.' Under decriminalization, individuals would be free to carry out prostitution related services, while under legalization, the government would intervene to direct how and under what conditions such services may be provided, as is the case in Australia.

The decriminalization of prostitution would be good for women, on a number of different fronts.

Decriminalizing prostitution would lead to a boon in entrepreneurialism for women, particularly young women, who could command higher prices in a demand sensitive market. Escorts between the ages of 26 and 30 earn an average wage of $280/hr, and if they follow Sheryl Sandberg's exhortation to 'lean in', they can pull in an yearly income of $582,400, placing them in the top 20% of income earners in the US, roughly equivalent to households in which the head holds a Master's degree. Over the four year period of prime earning, escorts stand to earn $2.4M at current market rates. Decriminalization will likely result in an excess of supply, but that if is met with increasing demand as clients begin to realize they face no legal repercussions for professional services rendered, it's plausible the rates could go up, and not down.

High end prostitution has many related grooming and body maintenance costs, but is essentially skill-free. A pleasant escort who maintains conventional beauty standards is likely to realize her full income potential. Other industries as lucrative as prostitutiongenerally require advanced educations often involving sophisticated quantitative skills, pursuits women have little interest in. The decriminalization of prostitution would permit women who lack higher mathematical abilities to match the earnings of men, who currently dominate in these fields.

Partnered women who find themselves with a declining interest in sex will be able to outsource that aspect of their relationship, just as cooking, cleaning, childcare and other tedious duties are outsourced, generally to other women. Unlike cooking, cleaning and childcare, however, prostitutes are well paid for their services, which will help to assuage the guilt many women feel at the the low wages paid to other women to care for domestic responsibilities. Decriminalization of prostitution will not only free women up from an essential domestic duty, but will permit them to do so in a morally acceptable way, by compensating sex workers fairly.

Decriminalization of prostitution has been shown to lead to lower rates of rape and sexual assault over all, as men eschew dangerous hookups with women they do not necessarily know well, and turn to professional service providers who offer contractual, clearly spelled out services for a specified amount of time and compensation. The legal provision of sex services creates an environment in which both men and women are safer, by removing all 'blurred lines'.

Decriminalization of prostitution is the embodiment of the feminist mantra 'her body, her choice', and is long overdue in a society that recognizes women's fundamental right to determine the course of her own life, free from prurient interests that seek to control her actions and choices. Amnesty International supports women's rights to choose, leading to a safer, more productive, fair society for all.

[Ed. note: This article originally appeared at Examiner.com and is reprinted here with permission.]

NCFM Secretary Al Rava and the Unruh Act under attack for standing tall on equal rights

NCFM · 18 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

National Coalition of Men Secretary Al Rava, Esq. has been largely responsible for stopping discrimination against men in the strange state of California at great risk to his safety, health, and profession. Al has been subjected to threats, undue criticism and ridicule because of his unrelenting stand against the discrimination of men in public accommodations. I feel privileged to be a member of NCFM because of NCFM members like my friend Mr. Rava who is a true civil rights advocate and hero.

In California, the Unruh Act has for decades prevented discrimination in public accommodations based on ones sex, which is a good thing. One of our Board Members notes, "… the Unruh Act was big in the 70's, when all kinds of lawsuits were filed against dry cleaners, haircut places, etc. for businesses discriminating against women. Where was this outrage and name calling then against women's rights like there is here against Mr. Rava, the Unruh Act, and to some degree NCFM?"

Over the last 15 or so years, Mr. Rava, on behalf of many others, filed over 150 lawsuits against businesses wrongly discriminating against men and women. Several of the lawsuits resulted in landmark court decisions that clarified and or established related laws. Aside from those lawsuits, Mr. Rava on behalf on NCFM has sent many letters to California businesses or governmental agencies advising them that several California laws prohibit discriminatory treatment of men and women.

Typically, such businesses charged male consumers more than female consumers for the same goods or services, or excluded male consumers – all based solely on the consumers' sex. While there were a few repeat offenders, over time, all businesses sued or sent letters, stopped their illegal discrimination. Those who complain wrongly believe that discrimination based on gender is acceptable.

Though NCFM has never filed an Unruh Act lawsuit, under my signature as NCFM President and Mr. Rava's guidance, we have, sent cautionary letters to various businesses violating the law. To be clear, the letters were not threats but clearly intended to persuade the businesses to stop wrongfully discriminating against men by advising them that such behavior was illegal in California.We had great success with this approach.

We sent a letter sent All Nippon Airlines when it proposed women-only restrooms on their airplanes. We received a thank you letter and APA rescinded the proposal.

Another letter was sent to the Professional Golf Association (PGA) when it offered a women-only luncheon during a major golf tournament, which featured San Diego County District Attorney Bonnie Dumanis as the featured speaker. Ironically, Ms. Dumanis is the county's chief law enforcement officer. I received a phone call from a PGA attorney who seemed amused and appreciative. I keep forgetting to find his name and call him for a donation since we may have saved the PGA considerable aggravation. We saved Ms. Dumanis embarrassment too. The event became gender inclusive and to our knowledge, no other PGA event in California has since offered a women-only event during a PGA tournament.

Another letter went to the promoter of a women-only bicycle ride event, a letter that the promoters exploited. The promoters vilified us, garnered more recognition for their event, and caused childish threats against us. They were in no way publically appreciative for saving them from possible liability. Nevertheless, we have not heard of a later women-only bicycle ride in California.

To my knowledge, every business sued or sent a letter stopped the unlawful discrimination, which is a good thing. Not only that, like some of those mentioned above, they appreciated our intervention.

It is fascinating how some people defend those who break the law as if such people are victims instead of defending those that stop the illegal acts, especially when such people discriminate against an entire gender. More intriguing, are the ignorant that give nothing to the discussion except insults and name-calling.

Here, one very savvy and adroit, perhaps even conniving, disgruntled business owner, who was unlawfully discriminating against men, appears to have convinced a few reporters to promote her plight. Again, it is disquieting that these reporters are inclined to believe the disingenuous pleas of a law-breaker and not applaud those who caused her to stop her illegal activities.

Regardless, even reporters cannot report the truth if they don't know what it is. Here's one of several examples, from what I understand, it is reported that the promoter of the event claims she did not discriminate, that the plaintiffs were turned away because the event was sold out and there was no more room.

The truth is, the plaintiffs paid for admission in advance. They have the receipts to prove it. Pre-paid receipt in hand, each plaintiff was turned away at the entrance upon being specifically told it was a woman only event. The $20 pre-paid price of admission was refunded after the event, but not because of over-booking since the promoter was still selling tickets at the door for $25. Even if the event had been over-booked, the plaintiffs purchased tickets in advance. The over-booking issue appears to be fabricated to dodge responsibility for wrongdoing and transfer blame to the true victims, those discriminated against for no reason other than having a penis.

There is no question publicity generated by Unruh Act lawsuits and letters have contributed to stopping discrimination against men and women in California. This publicity too will help more businesses treat female and male consumers more equally. Consequently, we owe a word of thanks to whoever attempted to discredit Mr. Rava, the Unruh Act, and to a lesser degree NCFM. Whoever you are, you have become an indirect civil rights advocate, that's a good thing.

The links to articles below are from worse article to better, the first being the worse. I ask that you leave a civil comment at each website below. Unfortunately, as usual, such articles bring out the man-haters who know nothing about our issues, think all women are victims of something or other, and could care less whether men are treated less than third-class citizens are treated. Such ignorance is disheartening and becomes disgusting from those who suggest violence or resort to name-calling. The instigators have even started an online petition to change the Unruh Act, supposedly to make it Ok to discriminate against men. Amazing.

https://www.rawstory.com/2015/08/lawyer-who-attacked-anti-male-breast-cancer-event-sues-over-womens-business-conference/comments/#disqus

http://mic.com/articles/123758/3-men-s-rights-activists-sued-for-being-denied-entry-to-a-female-entrepeneurs-conference

http://money.cnn.com/2015/08/11/technology/mens-rights-activist-chic-ceo/index.html?iid=hp-stack-dom

NOTE: this article was first published on 8/12/2015. It has been revised, and may be revised several more times as this story develops or dies.

The Unruh Act is for everyone, not just women.

The Unruh Act and those who had the courage to use it are the primary reason many forms of wrongful discrimination in California no longer exist.

Why I despise Mass Media and love The Coz

B.R. Merrick · 18 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

It's over. I will be a little sadder for the rest of my life. My support of Bill Cosby hasn't waned; however, I see nothing but futility in any future discussion of what I now believe to be a lynching beyond parallel to the high-tech lynching of which Clarence Thomas spoke. I speak of a group shaming not unlike the fictional representation set forth in Arthur Miller's The Crucible, when girls who found themselves in disfavor to their community chose to turn on one of their own to save their skins:

Abigail: You will not! Begone! Begone, I say!

Danforth: What is it, child? But Abigail, pointing with fear, is now raising up her frightened eyes, her awed face, toward the ceiling – the girls are doing the same – and now Hawthorne, Hale, Putnam, Cheever, Herrick, and Danforth do the same. What's there? He lowers his eyes from the ceiling, and now he is frightened; there is real tension in his voice. Child! She is transfixed – with all the Girls, she is whimpering open-mouthed, agape at the ceiling. Girls! Why do you – ?

Mercy Lewis, pointing: It's on the beam! Behind the rafters!

Danforth, looking up: Where!

Abigail: Why – ? She gulps. Why do you come, yellow bird?

Proctor: Where's a bird? I see no bird!

Abigail, to the ceiling: My face? My face?

Proctor: Mr. Hale –

Danforth: Be quiet!

Proctor, to Hale: Do you see a bird?

Danforth: Be quiet!!

Abigail, to the ceiling, in a genuine conversation with the "bird," as though trying to talk it out of attacking her: But God made my face; you cannot want to tear my face. Envy is a deadly sin, Mary.

Mary Warren, on her feet with a spring, and horrified, pleading: Abby!

Abigail, unperturbed, continuing to the "bird": Oh, Mary, this is a black art to change your shape. No, I cannot, I cannot stop my mouth; it's God's work I do.

Mary Warren: Abby, I'm here!

Proctor, frantically: They're pretending, Mr. Danforth!

Abigail – now she takes a backward step, as though in fear the bird will swoop down momentarily: Oh, please, Mary! Don't come down.

Susanna Walcott: Her claws, she's stretching her claws!

Proctor: Lies, lies.

Abigail, backing further, eyes still fixed above: Mary, please don't hurt me!

Mary Warren, to Danforth: I'm not hurting her!

Danforth, to Mary Warren: Why does she see this vision?

Mary Warren: She sees nothin'!

Abigail, now staring full front as though hypnotized, and mimicking the exact tone of Mary Warren's cry: She sees nothin'!

Mary Warren, pleading: Abby, you mustn't!

Abigail and all the Girls*, all transfixed*: Abby, you mustn't!

Mary Warren, to all the Girls: I'm here, I'm here!

Girls: I'm here, I'm here!

Danforth, horrified: Mary Warren! Draw back your spirit out of them!

Mary Warren: Mr. Danforth!

Girls, cutting her off: Mr. Danforth!

Danforth: Have you compacted with the Devil? Have you?

Mary Warren: Never, never!

Girls: Never, never!

Danforth, growing hysterical: Why can they only repeat you?

Proctor: Give me a whip – I'll stop it!

Mary Warren: They're sporting. They – !

Girls: They're sporting!

Mary Warren, turning on them all hysterically and stamping her feet: Abby, stop it!

Girls, stamping their feet: Abby, stop it!

Mary Warren: Stop it!

Girls: Stop it!

Mary Warren, screaming it out at the top of her lungs, and raising her fists: Stop it!!

Girls, raising their fists: Stop it!!

I am speaking less here of the women who accuse Cosby, and speaking far more of the culture that raised me, and many of those who read my words. We are not nearly as far from the witch hunts of old Salem as you may think. The political Left that embraced and fomented feminism is not my concern, either. Having been nurtured as I was in the bosom of the Religious Right, the Left never concerned me very much.

One of the ideas bandied about by social and religious conservatives is that of teaching The Holy Bible in schools. The religious reasons are obvious. As one who is not in favor of formalized education for children, and one who is no longer religious, I cannot say that the absence of The Bible in schools is one of my concerns except for one firm conviction to which I still hold: Failure to understand The Bible is failure to understand America.

Salem was one of the first settlements of the Europeans from whom many of us sprang. These people came from England, where unending religious wars galvanized many men and women into theological beliefs set in stone. These people were Puritans. They came from the same stock as Calvinists, whose doctrine holds, in part and in profane terms, to the idea that Heaven is a type of lottery for ordinary men, with the saved already known by God. The desire for purity of doctrine led quite naturally to purity in all forms: a life of simple means, a toning down of celebrations, a reduction or elimination of consumption of alcohol, long hours of hard but productive labor, and last but certainly nowhere near least, strict rules governing sexual activity; all of this, just in case you were one of the lucky few.

This may be hard to believe in a day and age when Miley Cyrus can jill it on stage in front of thousands of fans, but the scars of this widespread and diverse belief system remain. In fact, Cyrus's twerks and tits are a direct product, a pendulum swing if you will, of Puritanical thought and practice. She is, after all, following the example of the far more successful, prolific, and long-lasting godmother of sexual rebellion, Madonna, whose life's work is based on trashing the lessons of Catholicism she has spent her entire career trying to dissolve.

Failure to understand the profound influence of our collective Puritanical and Calvinist roots ill-affects even immigrants from Catholic, Buddhist, Hindu, and Muslim countries. You've been philosophically warned, Cheng.

The realization that a man needs to have now, especially after the destruction of a comedy icon, is that sex with a woman can at any time and in numerous ways be directly influenced by the detritus left from the religious persecutions of old. The male reader would do well to remember that early feminists were like Susan B. Anthony, an unmarried woman of highly progressive ideals such as temperance, women's suffrage, and abolitionism. They were oftentimes products of Northeastern America, the seedbed of the modern Progressive movement. This movement bears a direct link to the Puritanical idea of saving humanity from itself. There would have been no 18th Amendment without Progressives, America's adorable little schoolmarms.

We forget much of this because World War II ensured that the budding American Empire would be the empire to win the war. A sudden shift from Depression-Era thrift to a Levittown home for every good GI begat the Baby Boomers, who quickly rendered themselves clueless with sex, drugs, and rock and roll. Enter Bill Cosby, followed by adoring fans of both sexes, the Playboy Mansion, the advent of Quaaludes, the double life, the public persona of the family man, and the adultery.

It's that last one that America sees the most, thanks to our collective roots. I know this because my generation is the first big divorce generation. Boomers and their sexual politics, complete with The Pill, pornography, Second Wave feminism, and no-fault divorce, rendered many of my Gen-Ex peers traumatized by dads moving out, and hated stepdads moving in. If you don't believe me, watch an incomparably beautiful film made largely by British Gen-Exers called Anna Karenina, from the Tolstoy novel. For all our openness to different forms of sexual expression, that's how many of us feel about adultery, one of the chief causes of divorce.

Few people from my generation are ever going to bother actually reading the transcript that has, I believe, sealed Cosby's fate. If they did, beyond the brilliant dissection it has already received from Mr. Farley at this website, they would see that it is actually a legal complaint about one of Cosby's lawyers interrupting too much. Cosby hardly says anything. Most of what is quoted from his deposition consists of dialogue that could have been ripped right out of Adam's Rib:

1. TROIANI [Plaintiff's attorney, to Cosby]: Can you answer that question?
2. O'CONNOR [Cosby's lawyer]: No. Wait.
3. TROIANI: You do not testify, Mr. O'Connor. That's enough of your testifying.
4. O'CONNOR: Young lady.
5. TROIANI: Thank you, but no.
6. O'CONNOR: What occurred here is Mr. Cosby has already —
7. TROIANI: Call me counselor or Ms. Troiani.
8. O'CONNOR: Ms. Troiani, he testified already that he —
9. TROIANI: Oh —
10. O'CONNOR: Let me finish.
11. TROIANI: He's going to testify, you're going to tell him what to say. I will not let you finish. Do you object to my question?
12. O'CONNOR: Yes.
13. TROIANI: Fine.

To quote John Calvin: God Almighty. A man sits in a chair with his freedom, his money, his name, his reputation, his marriage, his children's respect, and his career on the line. I'd want my lawyer to finish, too, even if I thought he was slime. All because she said.

A modern-day woman can go to Spring Break, get drunk, get laid in front of numerous other drunk women who can still stand while they watch and cheer the proceedings, and still cry rape. A black man can take it like a man and go to prison. All because she said.

But this isn't quite the same, because Cosby was not filmed. This is a cultural father figure, successfully married for decades and lecturing black Americans on getting their own affairs in order, who is cutting Quaaludes in half, getting his penis out, and paying young women to keep things quiet and go to college. If rape did in fact occur, we still don't have proof. The culture doesn't need any because the culture does not actually need to believe that Cosby is a rapist.

What we have instead is a hypocrite, and worse, a hypocrite in sexual matters who is also married and male. No amount of colorful sweaters and silly dance moves will hide the fact from a country so zig-zagged in its sexual mores that the actor was merely acting as if Claire Huxtable was the only woman in his bed. The payoffs and hush-ups of numerous affairs, compounded by the recreational use of drugs, will not deflate the hyperactive emotional reaction of the social and religious conservatives that take rather a dim view of such private behavior. In other words, I am convinced that even social and religious conservatives will not bother to change the discourse to anything other than rape.

Such weakness exposed is beneath contempt to these people. Here's one of the more revolting examples, from a socially and religiously conservative website I used to frequent called World Net Daily, written by the founder Joseph Farah, entitled "Free Clara Harris!" about a woman who murdered her cheating husband. I kid you not:

"But, as a woman spurned once, she was not naive. She checked with a private detective she had hired to watch her husband and learned he was not at the Houston restaurant having dinner with Bridges. Instead, the creep [sic] was at the very hotel at which Clara and David Harris had married on Valentine's Day 10 years earlier."

So Clara ran over his body again and again and again with his teenaged daughter in the car. This is the woman Farah praises in his article. This is what we do with adulterous men. After all, men can man up and take it. Men should bear responsibility. It will not matter to such minds that there is still no evidence of rape in the Cosby scandal. There is evidence of penis. Cosby, Harris, and I suppose John Wayne Bobbitt as well, all hold (or in Harris's case, held) the power to stop rape in their hands whenever they piss (or in Harris's case, pissed).

Unfortunately, Cosby will lose all but those closest to him, and probably even some of them. He enjoyed sex too much in the wrong way with the wrong people. We know that much from the deposition; and in a culture where millions still want to go after Roman Polanski's hide, in spite of the fact that he confessed, served his time in jail, and will die a victim of double jeopardy, that's all that's necessary. Go ahead and call the lecherous old pervert a rapist. Paying a single one of these women money was the final nail in the coffin of this man's career.

I no longer believe that the Sexual Revolution liberated men. Thanks to the influence of Puritanical beliefs about male sexual responsibility, compounded by Second and Third Wave feminism, the Sexual Revolution has only liberated women. The same can be said of our precipitous technological advancement, as well as any opening up of our political systems. Men are less liberated by all of these phenomena, because men still have to bear the majority of the weight of empire and civilization on their heftier shoulders.

Women are excused from the dirty work. When they complain about not being included in the dirty work, they are to be admitted. When they grow tired, they are to be excused again. Everyone should remember that even known false accuser Crystal Gail Mangum will be out of prison in mid-life after lying about rape, destroying three men and their families, and fatally stabbing Reginald Daye.

The Left will go on chanting The Vagina Monologues; the Right will go on condemning it. When a man whips it out the wrong way, the Left will cry, “Rape!” and the Right will join right in. To participate in this madness is to be a foolhardy man indeed.

There is no fast and easy sex with the opposite. There really never was. This is all the more reason to disregard the advice of the gaming community and lend a hand in building a little male space of your own.

There is something else going on here. Bill Cosby is not a Boomer. He is part of the last generation to experience what I call the small town. Zoning laws, mass schooling in increasingly large and centralized schools, the promise of suburbia, and entertainment provided by a Mass Media culture put an end to that. The result is that America has lost its sense of privacy.

A Boomer named James Bowman whom I’ve mentioned before writes quite a lot about the phenomenon of honor. As I see it, a woman’s honor has always been about her chastity and her fidelity to one man, probably based on a more instinctual level of awareness that the male provider would like to ensure that the children in his charge are actually his. A man’s honor, on the other hand, has always been about the man.

If this is true, then Cosby’s honor was more of a front, as is often the case. Honor, as Bowman points out, is less about the actual and more about the act. It is therefore amoral, neither objectively good nor evil.

In Puritanical America, therefore, a man’s honor is his word. He either follows through on his word or he has no honor. Cosby followed through on his word only to a certain extent. He got himself educated. He held down a family and helped to raise four children to adulthood. He kept his marriage intact. He encouraged other Americans, especially black Americans, to do the same.

Behind the façade, however, he whipped it out and had fun. He no doubt did so in part to deal with the stress of keeping up appearances, probably extending all the way back to the forties, when his parents and grandparents were heavily segregated in Small Town America. To a mind cultivated to think that honor is equal between the sexes, an unchaste man that acts honorably clean on television programs, during comedy routines, and in interviews is a man whose hypocrisy is unforgivable.

Imagine such an individual giving the interview that would rivet millions to their television screens: Yes, he would say, I had sex with lots of women. I enjoyed it immensely. I desperately hoped that these women would understand the strong desire I have to keep my family and career, so I gave them a little something extra to help them along and wished them well. But what they’re saying happened did not happen in the way that they said it did.

How successful would such an interview be, even if the millions of watchers actually believed him? Whether or not these women are telling the truth about having affairs with Cosby that ended when he drugged them unconscious so he could have sex with them one last time, his privacy and honor are completely destroyed, and a country that shames the likes of Hugh Grant and Eddie Murphy for soliciting street hookers (who betray women’s innate sense of honor in their profession) is simply never ever going to forget nor forgive.

Both men and women can endure public shame over sexual scandal. How many women endure this level of shaming at the expense of their property, liberty, or their own bodies compared to men? The late Robin Williams paid a woman to keep quiet about sex. Perhaps he was a rapist as well.

If you’re as disgusted with the zeitgeist as I am, you can do little else but watch as America reacts with heavily emotional upset every time a penis is seen, and quietly remind yourself as I do on a regular basis that empires cannot exist without first and foremost regulating the men, even as they blame them for anything and everything they can. The more upset your friends and neighbors become, the more the American Empire dies, while the rising Chinese Empire slowly usurps control of the world’s economy. Then you can wonder along with me how the Chinese government will blame the men for how they themselves mismanage human affairs.

I thoroughly enjoyed Cosby’s efforts for decades. I enjoyed his stand-up, his sitcoms, and his public persona. I couldn’t care less about his peccadilloes. I would be sadder still if it were all true, but mindful of the fact that a rape victim, whether male or female, who apparently goes back for more has about as much honor as the perpetrator, and a lot less of my empathy and interest. It's a sad state of affairs when a man's affairs are made equal to a crime, but I already knew that was our collective state before this one man was ruined. That will forever make me saddest of all.

Exposed! The Patriarchal plot to freeze women to death!

AVfM Video Source · 19 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The Patriarchy has a lot to answer for, but all other crimes pale in comparison to the nefarious plot to kill women with office air-conditioning. Well, maybe not kill them, but make them very uncomfortable. Janet Bloomfield and a few of her feminist friends explain the issue.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=wwi2y3XVnlg

I made the top 10 at Houston Press, barely. I have been cheated!

Paul Elam · 19 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I came home from lunch today to discover that I had made the pages of Houston's top "culture" rag, Houston Press.

I knew before reading it that the coverage was not going to be good. I have been reading the unambiguously leftwing publication semi-regularly for about 30 years. They even published some of my letters to the editor, though not the ones that cut too close to home for the hive-minded staff that run the show there.

They have some fairly interesting content sandwiched between ads for call girls and "private masseuses." Houston Press brings you the latest on wicked conservatives, cheap eats, music and "me love you long time."

Oh, and lies. They print lots and lots of lies. I never bothered much with writing about them because they are pretty much the affirmative action program for yellow journalism. They will lie about most anything or anyone, acting as the National Inquirer for wannabe hipsters and the lifestyle victimized.

The paragraph Jef Rouner wrote on me is a pretty good example:

> Paul Elam
>
> The founder of A Voice for Men and the de-facto head of the Men's Rights Movement, Paul Elam spends the majority of his time trying ineffectually to beat back gender equality and claiming that it is men, not women, who most often face sexism. Some of his more interesting and recent screeds include referring to the village-sized group of women accusing Bill Cosby of rape as "drug whoring star fuckers", offering men counseling sessions via Skype for $90 because of "feminist bias against men in modern psychotherapy", and starting a fake version of the White Ribbon Campaign as an attempt to subvert donations to the Canadian non-profit that addresses intimate partner violence. Elam makes no secret that his "movement" does not build shelters for male domestic violence victims, address underfunded men's health concerns, seek federally mandated paternity leave, or basically any other cause that might actually better men. Yelling on the Internet is literally the point of the whole thing."

Ok, so nothing new here. I will briefly debunk this short bit of pablum and get to my real beef with Jef. Well, after I stop to wonder if he dropped the second "f" to be edgy or maybe his parents were southern hippies and he has a sister named River Sky.

Jef Rouner. Yes, it is really him.

One, since Jef failed to cite a single source for my activities intended to “beat back gender equality,” he did little more than make a hollow accusation. I love the irony in this given that false accusations are one of the core items addressed on AVFM. Mind you, for the uninitiated, Jef provided no proof to his readers that I was invested in undermining women’s rights for a good reason. It doesn’t exist. He just made it up and ran with it like he was covering a gang rape story for Rolling Stone.

Next, concerning the words “drug whoring star fuckers,” in respect to Bill Cosby’s accusers, he omitted the fact that I wrote that in the form of a question. Sure enough, I am still wondering if Bill Cosby is a demon that slipped drugs to women and raped them, or if the cadre of women spanning decades who had simultaneous breakthroughs in memory, resolve and cash flow ills are really just a bunch of drug whoring star fuckers. It’s not as though drug whoring star fuckers are hard to find.

Unlike Jef’s apparent distaste for all things due process, I think it is better to ask questions than to make declarations before someone has their day in court.

Jef also states, as though he thinks it is some sort of “gotcha,” that:

> Elam makes no secret that his “movement” does not build shelters for male domestic violence victims, address underfunded men’s health concerns, seek federally mandated paternity leave, or basically any other cause that might actually better men.”

Oh how I hang my head at the shameful truth in this. We don’t build shelters. We also don’t build safe rooms for men where they can have peanut butter and jelly and watch puppy videos when a feminist comes to speak on campus. We don’t have “Lothario Walks” to draw attention to cultural narrative that only exists in our heads.

We also don’t design Formula 1 racers, map genomes or debate on whether Pluto is a planet. There are a great many things we don’t do because, well, we do other things.

If Jef had done what people in journalism used to call “investigation,” and “fact checking,” he would have seen (and immediately forgotten) that we have been long involved in calling out the underfunding of men’s health issues, promoting awareness of prostate cancer and fundraising for male birth control.

We also have been instrumental in individual advocacy for men who have been falsely accused and falsely convicted. Our work has resulted in the only prosecutor in the history of the State of Maine to have her law license suspended for prosecutorial misconduct.

Oh, and not that it would matter to Jef, we have reunited children and fathers who have been capriciously taken from each other. You know, all the things that come with just screaming at people on the internet.

Sorry to belabor the points but we have also impacted the cultural narrative enough that corrupt ideologues find us sufficiently threatening to their dog and pony $how that they enlist the support of the mainstream media in trying to take us down. Thankfully, those in the mainstream media are so stupid that they live in denial of the fact that they are the main source of our growth.

Truth alert! Jef got one right. He says I am "offering men counseling sessions via Skype for $90 because of "feminist bias against men in modern psychotherapy."

That I do, Jeffy. Or is it Jefy? Now, if you only knew anything about the very real bias to which I am referring. No bother, a little bird told me that within a few months the bias against men in the mental health community will be addressed in much more prominent places than The Press.

By people who know a hell of a lot more than Jef Rouner.

Now, to the White Ribbon matter. I know it was a completely honest oversight on Jef's part, but he left out some key elements that might have actually informed his readers of a few things, even at the cost of his frail and fact barren narrative.

- I acquired the domain for whiteribbon.org with complete legality and legitimacy.
- I transferred the domain to Erin Pizzey, the woman who founded the domestic shelter movement for women in 1971.
- Neither myself nor Erin Pizzey have taken a single penny from anyone in donations to the site. There is not even a donation button to be found there.
- The White Ribbon has a long, long history of being adopted by several movements and organizations over the past 150 years. It is not owned by anyone as a trademark in Canada and is thus fully legitimate terrain for us to help educate people on the facts about domestic violence. White Ribbon Canada is no more or less legit than Whiteribbon.org and we have no hard feelings that they are using the same name we do.
- Whiteribbon.org was set up to present the latest science and research on the problem of domestic violence, not to raise money or to spread a false narrative about the problem.
- Not one single civil action or criminal investigation has been pursued against myself, AVFM or Erin Pizzey. Seems kind of funny considering Jef's accusation would imply a clear cut case of fraud using the name of a legit Canadian organization. I've seen neither hide nor hair of Dudley Do-Right, not to mention the FBI.

And that is the end of my rebuttal to Jef's feat of squeezing so much fail and so much dishonesty into a single paragraph. I do believe this boy is ready for prime time.

My real beef with him is on another matter. I have seen dozens of low rent hacks like Jef publish stuff like this for quite a few years now. I owe each of them thanks for sending people to AVFM where the ones who can think critically will understand they have been lied to.

What pisses me off though, and I mean really pisses me off, is that out of 10 people who Jef thinks are embarrassments to Houston, I got stuck in the number 10 slot?

WHAT. THE. FUCK?

The way I see it, I should have been in the top three, easily. Being targeted as a source of civic embarrassment by

The Press, or any of the yellow clones who write for it, is precisely the badge of honor that I love to wear.

After all, The Press, all about dignity and civic pride, published a groundbreaking article on "The Ten Hottest Women on the Texas Sex Offenders List."

The Press also ran a story many years ago about a gay man who was laughed out of getting services for being a victim of domestic abuse. The story, which I cannot now locate, was written as though the writer had no inkling that the discrimination in that case was based on sex, not sexuality. They must have lost track of the letter I sent them on that one. It never got printed.

Finally, back in 2000, Brian Wallstin managed to find a woman who was abused in a family court. It was not a particularly special story. Karen Shrader, M.D., the supposed victim, was treated no differently than men have been treated in family courts for the past 50 years. The piece, "Absent a Mother," generated a lot of mail, including a letter from me which can be read here. Wallstin wrote this piece like he found a new source of discrimination against women. I feel pretty confident it got him a "good boy" and a pat on the head from the girls in the office. Still, using Dr. Shrader as the poster child for a very real problem with our courts was laughably foolish. All Wallstin did was inspire misguided chivalry – not awareness of the corruption in our family courts.

So there you have it. The publication that attacked me with lies is the same one that thinks the sex appeal of pedophiles is newsworthy, that gay men struggle for support in violent relationships because they are gay (like services for straight men are so abundant) and that the criminality of our family courts only matters when it happens to women.

That profile should have earned me a spot in the coveted top three. I hope you will let them know that in the comments before someone triggers their dissent meter and they lock them down. For pity sake, they put me several spots below Randy Freaking Quaid!

I am sending this article to The Press demanding that they change the order of annoying/embarrassing Houstonians and put me in near the top. After all, this is my subjective version of reality and when dealing with this particular publication, that is all that matters.

Hypermasculinity

Dr. Tanveer Ahmed · 19 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The reassertion of masculinity surrounds us and takes a multiplicity of forms. It is Newtonian, in that it's a direct and opposite response to feminism and the dilution of traditional male roles. In many instances the reassertion of masculinity is positive, for it is often an attempt to re-cast the male away from narrow categories of the emotionally distant provider. But in its hyper-masculine forms, where gender confusion contributes to overcompensation in the forms of violence, misogyny or homophobia, it underlies some of our most pressing social and political problems, including terrorism.

In my work, I see the gender confusion present in the form of pathology. There has been an extraordinary growth in male eating disorders in recent decades for example, from representing one in twenty of all eating disorders in the 1980s to now comprising one in five. The vast majority of these do not present for help and they usually take the form of manorexia, of boys and men taking supplements and working out to excess to sculpt an Adonis like physique.

I also see it in the form of violence, both within the home and in the community. However, throughout the Western world there has been a steady decrease in violent crime but recent increases in figures surrounding intimate partner violence. This is particularly pronounced in countries like Australia and is attributed to greater awareness from public campaigns. However the causes are consistently put down to male privilege and lack of gender equality, yet there have been extraordinary changes in every measure of gender relations, from educational outcomes, workforce participation and female income yet domestic violence rates appear not to have improved. How then can male violence towards women be attributed to gender inequality? I'd argue that at least an element of the lack of improvement is because of the clumsy reassertion of masculinity particularly in the more disadvantaged groups, such as the working class and newly arrived ethnic groups.

The trend is particularly interesting among males within ethnic groups. Financial Times journalist and former anthropologist, Gautam Malkani, wrote a book called "Londonstani" soon after the London bombings in 2005. He essentially records the behaviours and rituals of his old peer group in a relatively poor, immigrant neighbourhood of London. He studies the phenomenon of male youth from South Asian backgrounds often incorporating the symbols of hip hop fused with Bollywood sounds all packaged into a posture of aggressive oppositionality. He writes:

"The assertion of ethnic identity is sometimes better viewed as a proxy for the reassertion of masculinity."

These trends are particularly paramount in Australia through Lebanese youth, who have far greater rates of incarceration, affiliation with street gangs and bikie groups and are also over-represented amongst terrorism recruits to ISIS. They are amongst the largest minority groups within Australia and were implicated in the Australian race riots of 2005.

This holds a great deal of relevance when confronted with the problem of home grown terrorism in particular. While there is the obvious overlap with religious zealotry, a core feature of Western recruits to terrorist acts is identity disturbance, often caught between the traditional culture of their parents who are eager to distance their children from the social permissiveness of the West but which only results in many adolescents feeling a sense of traumatic unbelonging. The place they can assert their identity and, to some extent, their masculinity is within various versions of religious extremism. When mixed with the generational gap within ethnic groups and lack of healthy role models or structured rites of passage, the ingredients for over-compensatory acts through violence coated with missionary zeal are more pronounced.

Author Bonnie Mann asserts that "spectacular acts of violence are redemptive and thus required for an aggrieved or wounded masculinity," and professor David Plummer of Australia's Griffith University notes that counter-terrorism raids across the world have sometimes overlapped with gyms, steroids, strip club and weapons. He also cites the growth in pornography as part of the reassertion of masculine posturing.

Hypermasculinity is an emerging force within global, social trends and is most pronounced where gender relations have transformed dramatically. It can be harmless and possibly a transient phase within the realignment of gender relations, but it is also a contributor to some of the most difficult and pressing problems of our times. Dismissing or pathologising the behaviours through the prism of outdated gender theories is no longer useful and hurts us all in fostering meaningful solutions.

Science and censorship

Silvio Altarelli · 19 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

PLOS ONE censors a referee who defended science from feminist ideology.

> "The distortions of the truth by the radical feminists of our time will, someday, be seen as having been the greatest intellectual crime of the second half of the 20th century. Meanwhile, we still live under the aegis of that crime and to call attention to it is an act of great moral courage."
>
> Professor Howard S Schwartz, Oakland University, Michigan

Feminists supported their gender ideology and business with lies and scientific fraud: feminists painted men as authors of domestic violence in order to support false accusations; feminists want you to believe that women are discriminated in all possible ways etc etc etc

At the end, the scientific community is starting to appreciate that truth differs from feminist ideology: the world experts in the field of domestic violence claim that it is equally perpetrated by men and women and described in scientific publications the methods used by feminist to "conceal and distort evidence"; research performed with scientific methods "reveal 2:1 faculty preference for women on STEM tenure track", etc.

Recently, a referee was under attack for having pointed out faults in a publication that wanted to conclude that gender bias in academia is against women. The referee discusses how the fact that men achieve better results can be explained in alternative ways: men work more and in a more competitive way, women prefer to focus more on personal life… "such a small difference of average effort could easily be due to marginal gender differences of physiology and health". Nothing new: 20 years ago Warren Farrell described these factors in the book "The myth of male power".

The referee was attacked for having suggested the involvement of "one or two male biologists" in the research, "in order to serve as a possible check against interpretations that may sometimes be drifting too far away from empirical evidence into ideologically biased assumptions".

Clearly, the referee was trying to suggest that the authors of the rejected paper (Fiona Ingleby et al.) were too much driven by feminist ideology, and that a study on gender inequality is better performed by involving both men and women.

What a crime!

Ms. Fiona Ingleby played the victim card attacking the referee on Twitter, raising a media storm.

The standard shame tactic of Social Justice Warriors got the head of the referee: Damian Patterson of PLOS ONE announced that "We have formally removed the review from the record, and have sent the manuscript out to a new editor for re-review. We have also asked the Academic Editor who handled the manuscript to step down from the Editorial Board and we have removed the referee from our reviewer database".

This behaviour is questionable, both morally (PLOS ONE is ready to dispose of people who offer unpaid voluntary scientific advice in order to avoid trouble with feminists?) and scientifically (PLOS ONE abandons scientific integrity for political correctness?).

Hopefully the Editorial Body of PLOS ONE will wipe the shit from their underwear and follow the example of Nobel prize Richard Feynman who, when attacked by feminists, had the courage to stand up and give the right answer: "Don't bug me, man!".

Most of my childhood is now illegal

AVfM Video Source · 20 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Children these days get a lot less freedom than previous generations, says Lucian Vâlsan as he recounts some moments from his childhood that would today trigger severe legal action and hysterical reactions.

You can subscribe to Lucian's Freedom Alternative, here.

The “Mangina” monologues: How feminists teach men to hate themselves (re-edit)

AVfM Video Source · 20 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

This is an excellent video from Bane666Au published in 2013. Featured here as newer MRAs may not have come across it.

Shaun King demonstrates why the concept of 'cultural appropriation' is complete bullshit

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 22 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Whelp, we have another whitey dancing in blackface to win the hearts and minds of white folks, who otherwise would never be able to process an alternate point of view, amirite? Shaun King, a major provocateur in the #BlackLivesMatter movement, has been outed by Milo Yiannopoulos at Breitbart as a 100% white guy, faking his racial background to gain authority, and the right to define the experience of Black people in America. Gee, a white guy hungry for the authority to tell Black Americans what they think and feel? Nothing racist about that at all!

In actual fact, I don't think there is anything racist at all about a white person using their voice to help articulate the position of other people who are not white. It can be a huge advantage to have a white person advocating for issues that affect primarily people of color – I practice a version of this principle by being a woman advocating for men's rights, and the advantage accrues from the exact same mechanism that affords white people advocating for Black people moral authority: white people command a kind of respect that Black people don't, and women command a respect that men simply don't. In general, we understand that white people are automatically conferred with greater authority, and our word for this is 'racism'. In general, we absolutely refuse to acknowledge that women are the privileged gender, and that women's voices command authority over men's because we are living through the last dying moments of feminism, which insists the exact opposite is true. Women are oppressed by 'sexism', despite the fact that their voices are privileged over men's, especially when it comes to men's issues.

There are men who have been working in the MHRM for well over 40 years, down in the trenches every single day, doggedly insisting that they are human beings worthy of consideration and care, but they don't get invited to the Today Show or get profiled in Vice or get invited to debate other women about men's issues on the BBC.

I do.

Because I'm a woman. The cultural narrative in this regard is changing, albeit slowly. Yiannopoulos, who frequently writes on issues affecting men, is open about how his sexual orientation lends him a privilege to speak on men's issues and be heard, just as my gender does. The all-powerful cis-gendered straight white man is so powerful a gay reporter and a woman blogger are considered more legitimate authorities on cis-gendered, straight, white, male experience than the aforementioned. He's just a crying man-baby everyone should ignore. Patriarchy: you're doing it wrong.

The silencing of men and the related censorious concept of 'cultural appropriation' can be laid 100% at the feet of feminism, particularly radical, academic feminism. It all derives from a philosophical argument known as standpoint epistemology. Let's start with a few really simple definitions. Feminist theory always distills complex philosophical concepts into soundbites because they're easier to explain and to deploy, which are two of their main goals: disseminate and manipulate.

In very simple terms, ontology is what you know, and epistemology is how you know what you know. You know the sky is blue, you know it's blue by looking at it. That kind of thing. Here's where feminism inserts the manipulative aspect:

What I know: it's nice to be rich

How I know: depends on where I stand (standpoint epistemology). If I'm rich, I know it's nice to be rich because, well, I'm rich and my life is nice, ergo, it's nice to be rich. If I'm poor, I know that because I see rich people and they seem to be enjoying life in a way that I am not, ergo, it's nice to be rich.

Now feminists go one step further: rich people can never know the experiences of poor people because that doesn't fit Marxist feminist ideology, but poor people can know the experiences of rich people because that is the condition that will make Marxist, feminist ideology work, and nothing matters beyond making the ideology fit reality, no matter how much reality contradicts ideology.

I really enjoyed the first few seasons of Downton Abbey, mostly for the upstairs/downstairs interactions and how explicitly the show acknowledged that the lower and upper classes were utterly dependent on one another. Upper class comes with enormous luxury to be sure, but that is matched with psychotic levels of behavioral command and control. Lower class involves an enormous amount of physical labor, but far more personal freedom in terms of how people may act and behave outside the formal areas of the home. If I could go back in time, and had to choose, I would choose to be a high ranking member of the serving classes: Head Housekeeper, or Cook. Even the Head Laundress probably had a more enjoyable life, ultimately, than a Lady of the House under constant surveillance and subject to crazy levels of etiquette and 'proper' behavior.

No thanks.

Shows like Downton Abbey make it exceptionally clear that the upper and lower classes, who live so intimately with one another, can indeed understand the experiences of the other. Some are jealous, some are angry, some are defiant, some are relieved, all are completely aware of how the other half lives. Standpoint epistemology claims that because the lower classes are lower, they must of necessity exhibit a deference that leads them to a greater understanding of the upper class. This completely ignores the fact that the upper classes must also exhibit extreme deference to the lower classes, and understand that if the maid sees the ladies spitting on each other, that will make its way around the village and be fodder for a year's worth of gossip.

Another way of understanding this is to say carjackers must study the movements of owners of BMWs and Escalades very carefully to understand how and when they will most vulnerable to carjacking, giving them insights into how the rich act. But the owners of BMWs and Escalades are equally likely to study the habits of carjackers, to avoid getting carjacked, giving them equal insights into how thugs live! Neither has an ontological advantage over the other: they know what they know. Neither has an epistemological advantage, either: they know what they know by observing the other.

The most common way to claim the efficacy of standpoint epistemology is through what is known as cultural appropriation. Here's a story that will amuse many of you: after appearing in a video wearing two braids on either side of my head, someone sent me a message decrying my 'cultural appropriation'. Lol wut? What culture am I appropriating, pray tell? Swiss Dairy Maids? Two German grandparents, one Swedish grandparent, one Irish grandparent – I think I can slap on a leather bodice and grab a broadsword to go with my braids and be culturally fine, thanks.

The accusation of cultural appropriation was an effort to shut down whatever conversation I was attempting to generate on the basis that, because I do not share the culture, I have no meaningful comment to make on that culture. This is such a defiantly anti-intellectual bullshit, it boggles the imagination to think this is a legacy of academic feminism. Why should I be surprised though? An aggressively anti-intellectual ideology designed to censor, all while claiming moral high ground? Yep, sounds like feminism.

Unfortunately, feminists themselves get trapped in their own rigidity and refusal to engage with thought in any rigorous manner: if no one but a Black person can possibly comment meaningfully on Black issues, then ….

Introducing Shaun King.

Coming hard on the heels of Professor Blackface herself.

Hey remember Black Like Me? That book changed a million minds and it would be heartily dismissed as 'cultural appropriation' today. Journalist John Howard Griffin did more to advance Black rights than millions of Black activists put together. We can absolutely have a conversation about how absurd it is that it took a white man to shed a light on some nasty cultural realities, the same way we can have a conversation about how absurd it is that it takes a woman to shed light on some nasty cultural realities facing men, but the fact remains white people can and should speak out about racial issues that affect Black people negatively and disproportionately, and women can and should speak out about gender issues that affect men negatively and disproportionately.

Feminism and standpoint epistemology in particular, have turned Shaun King into a laughing stock. I don't necessarily agree with his points of view, but he has every right to express those points of view and face the court of public opinion. Instead, he's become a fraud, a liar and a charlatan, and he can thank his feminism for that, because feminism explicitly requires him to be a lying sack of shit to speak.

Honestly, I have little sympathy. If you don't have the balls (or ovaries) to face down a pack of screaming, willfully stupid harpies, you don't have the balls (or the ovaries) to enact real cultural change, and you are pissing in the wind.

We have enough people pissing in the wind, quite frankly.

Stand up and speak, by all means. But do it authentically. Do it honestly. Do it with integrity and intellectual courage.

Or sit down and shut up.

Who is your master, Shaun? If you allow feminism to dictate the color of your skin, you do indeed have a claim to a shared experience with Black people. They, too, have a history of bowing to white masters. But they never did so willingly. They never did so happily. They fought back. They fought to the death. They fought with the skin stripped off their backs. They fought.

You wanna be part of Black culture? Get on your feet, Shaun, turn to your oppressors and tell them to go to hell.

We in the anti-feminist and men's rights movement will show you how it's done.

Lots of love,

JB

NOW claims credit for healing the sick, raising the dead, and inventing the cappuccino

Brett Caton · 22 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

NOW claims credit for healing the sick, raising the dead, and inventing the cappuccino.

This is the most dishonest thing I have ever read. As others have said, Joseph Goebbels would be proud.

LGBT rights are women's and men's rights

Feminist have been no friend to gay and transsexual men. Sorry, I watched them applaud as gay men were arrested here in Australia. Seriously, do you know nothing of the history of feminism?? Transmen and women have been vilified as gender traitors and psuedo-women. They were banned from meetings.

From The New Yorker, August 4, 2014:

Robin Morgan, the keynote speaker, said:
I will not call a male "she"; thirty-two years of suffering in this androcentric society, and of surviving, have earned me the title "woman"; one walk down the street by a male transvestite, five minutes of his being hassled (which he may enjoy), and then he dares, he dares to think he understands our pain? No, in our mothers' names and in our own, we must not call him sister.

When feminist groups changed the norms of sexual behavior

In some parallel universe? In this one, medical scientists working on the pill and hippies who had nothing to do with feminism were responsible. Meanwhile, feminists argue that women who have sex with men are gender traitors, and have done since the 1960s. c.f. "The Feminist Initiative" for an example, or anything by Dworkin et al.

Feminism has fought against sexual violence, including sexual violence against men.

Oh yes, Mary P. Koss fought very hard to make sure women who raped men could be prosecuted… what's that? She did the opposite? Deliberately? How shocking! And feminists fought for immunity to rape charges in Israel and India? No! How can it be? It's not like the Duluth Model defines violence as masculine!

Oh wait, it does. And NOW is it's biggest fan.

Feminism fought for an end to gendered segregation at work and in school… boys and girls have equal access to education.

Absolute nonsense; it's fought hard to deny men the ability to teach at schools on the grounds they are all secret paedophiles (all the while ignoring the torrent of female teachers diddling their pupils).

Men used to teach school everywhere. Feminists pushed them out and now male teachers are becoming as rare as hen's teeth.

And feminists constantly call for quotas for women and scholarships for women, and male education plummets. Fewer and fewer men can get a degree now.

Feminists want men to do jobs, of course – the dirty, dangerous jobs – but nothing else. You'll never see a quota for women working in sewage, up power lines, down mine pits or clearing mine fields.

Men are useful apes to them – nothing more.

VAWA protects male victims of domestic violence

Rubbish. It does the opposite. Primary Aggressor laws mean that a man who calls for help had better have a recording of the violence against him or he will be the one arrested.

In Australia, thanks to VAWA exporting it's model world wide, women have a helpline to call for help from DV – and men get a line to confess they have hurt a woman. You need help? Go to hell, male scum.

Feminists have long fought for economic justice for both women and men

Rubbish. The Feminist Initiative fights for special male-only taxes, Feminists fight for tax exemptions to female only goods, they fight for scholarships for women and claim men are overpaid by as much as 30 cents in the dollar – despite the repeated testimony from economists to the contrary.

They have no interest in justice. Justice is paying men more because they work harder, they work longer hours, they do more dangerous jobs that result in a death rate an order of magnitude higher in the workplace.

Feminists don't think that's just; they want women to be paid the same but have cushy, safe jobs?

How will that work? They don't seem interested in pushing women into those nasty jobs.

NOW, I know you love lies – but do you have to be this obvious? Why not paint MRAs as being responsible for school shootings, or claim economists are part of the global conspiracy against you? Stick to fear and hate; it's what you are best at.

Click here for more information.

Jeff Sharlet used a pedophile to harrass sexual abuse victims

Dean Esmay · 24 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I have noticed that Professor Jeff Sharlet, who teaches Creative Writing at Dartmouth when he's not playing journalist for GQ magazine, is still regularly giving interviews to explain Men's Rights Activists to members of the press and talk show hosts—talk show hosts and supposed journalists who cannot be bothered to talk to any actual Men's Rights Activists.

Even though there are now countless people with real names and faces who are public figures as Men's Rights Activists, people very easily reached by their public phone numbers as well as multiple easily located public social media accounts, the press goes to Professor Jeff Sharlet and others who lie about and abuse MRAs instead.

Since Jeff Sharlet has accepted the mantle of MRA expert for the media, it's time the media and everybody else know who he is and what he actually does.

Sharlet originally wrote to Warren Farrell after speaking with Paul Elam regarding the International Conference on Men's Issues, claiming he wanted to do a better job of covering the men's movement than his contemporaries. In his words:

> Dear Dr. Farrell,
> I just got off the phone after a long and exciting conversation with Paul Elam. I'm a writer for GQ magazine, and I'll be flying out to Michigan to attend the conference and your Thursday workshop. I'm new to the story, but I hope to read as much of your work as I can before then, and the rest after the conference. This will be a substantive piece, probably around 5-7,000 words, and I'll have a long time to report. I'll be reading and following up with further interviews for at least a month or two. I'm hoping to go beyond the "controversy" stories some of my media colleagues are pursuing to present a real portrait of a movement built on very serious issues. GQ, I hope you'll agree, is a good forum for such a piece. We have nearly a million subscribers and a total audience of 6 million — most of them men, young men, especially, who are trying to think about what it means to be a man in modern society.
> I'm excited about this story as going right to the heart of that question. As I wrote Paul, some of the stories I'm proudest of are portraits of men finding ways to define their dignity and humanity against great odds. That's a situation every man experiences sometimes."

While there he bragged loudly that he was a huge supporter of the Men's Rights Movement even though none of us had ever heard of him before and couldn't figure out why he kept doing a really bad Tony Soprano imitation. Well, except that he nailed the unctuous aura. Jeff Sharlet, whose wife it turns out teaches Women's Studies, claimed to be a fan out to set the record straight about the MRM.

Soon after arrival at the International Conference on Men's Issues, self-declared MRA fan and expert Jeff Sharlet laughed in my face when I told him I was a child sex abuse survivor. I still remember his leer and his limp wet palm as I shook it, his moist cold fingers, the grin on his face when he asked what got me interested in Men's Rights, and his laugh–not even a nervous laugh, but a jovial one—when I told him I was sexually abused.

Sharlet may not remember his mocking and bullying toward me, because he mocked and insulted so many people at ICMI. He was a man on a mission. And, like many male survivors, I've learned not to flinch at people like him.

In Professor Sharlet's defense, he did seem to be trying to apologize a little to me after the event was over. He asked me if I could put him in contact with other male survivors—which is something I have done many times for members of the press as well as professional researchers.

I only give information on my fellow survivors if I can go to those survivors and say that I trust this reporter. So of course I was noncommittal; I would no more introduce a male survivor to this pseudo-macho bully than I would introduce them to a child rapist.

Which is by the way what Jeff Sharlet did to me—brought a child rapist into my house then asked me if I would support him in his quest to get another child rapist out of jail.

Can you get any lower than Jeff Sharlet's behavior while representing the formerly good name of GQ? I'm really not sure.

While I hate the phrase "triggering," let's just say that Jeff Sharlet now has the proud honor of knowing at least one survivor who's "triggered" at the mention of his name or face. And of knowing that multiple male survivors also know his name now, and use him as an example of why the dominant media culture, and feminists in particular, think boys and being raped and molested is funny. Especially if a woman does it, but even if a man does.

Sharlet was seen traveling around with and escorting a man whom no one at the conference knew, who later turned out to be a pedophile. He was having meals with a child molester, giving him rides, and worst of all, springing him on people attending the conference and asking them to support child molesters.

Confirmed Predator

Now I can only think of two plausible reasons Jeff Sharlet would be walking around with a child molester in tow at the ICMI: either Jeff supports pedophiles or he was using one to abuse and mock child abuse and rape survivors.

Ponder the irony: the most charitable interpretation of Jeff Sharlet's actions at the International Conference on Men's Issues in 2014 is that he supports child molesters.

There is of course no hard evidence that Jeff Sharlet himself is a pedophile or an enabler. If we take the route of Occam's razor, he's merely a yellow hack, representing GQ Magazine by carting a pedophile around a population of men who have been sexually abused so he could create a vile narrative for a hit piece on the victims.

There's other things to tell you about how Sharlet behaved while representing GQ. He tossed an insult at a female rape survivor because she suggested that male rape victims are no better or worse off than female survivors and that by treating female perpetrators as seriously as male perpetrators, it means all of us who are victims of sexual assault and abuse are in this together; it's not a man-vs-woman thing.

He mocked a female rape victim for saying that. Right in front of multiple witnesses.

As the icing on the cake, Sharlet used the pedophile as the first person profiled to explain to people what MRAs are really like in his story.

What's more unethical as a journalist, running around a conference full of male survivors, inserting a pedophile in their presence or using that pedophile in a major publication to represent actual victims who are trying to heal?

Forget journalism for a moment and ponder the question of which of the two choices paints a more clear picture of a human being with absolutely no moral compass.

It is hard to answer any of that but the even greater shame is that this is the guy being received by the mainstream media as an expert on the men's movement.

Jeff Sharlet looks and acts like the stereotype of deviant sexual predators most people would conjure up in their minds. Of course, in reality, sexual predators don't have a particular look. Like rapists and other deviants they come in all shapes, sizes, colors and sexes.

What is clear and has been demonstrated repeatedly by his actions, though, is that Jeff Sharlet is without a doubt a deviant and a predator. Perhaps not in his sexual proclivities but certainly in his capacity for Gentlemen's Quarterly magazine and as an "expert" on the men's movement.

If phony, abusive, petit bourgeois mandarins like Jeff Sharlet are going to use sexual predators to bring further harm to their victims, if they're going to laugh at and mock abuse victims, then their friends, loved ones, and professional colleagues need to hear about it.

Stay tuned. I will have more to say on this after talking to some of Jeff's students and gathering more information.

Rape Isn't a gender Issue

Bob Lewis · 24 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

This article by a new contributor is aimed at a broad audience. This could be a good candidate for introducing others to an important issue.

As what many consider a far left progressive, living in one of the most left leaning states in the United States, I always prided myself in my stance on equitable treatment of others. The main reason for this is that many on the far right, whose politics I oppose, base their political arguments on skewed or outright dishonest statistics or misrepresentation of facts…often a combination of both. It's a misnomer to consider these individuals as political conservatives, because they're far removed from the traditional conservative definition. While ad hominem, they are more accurately defined as bigots.

A prominent example would be Faux News.

As many of my core values align with third wave feminism, for the majority of my adult life I've considered myself a feminist, or at the very least, a strong supporter of feminist ideology. As a minority, I strongly identified with their message of equity and equal treatment.

However, over this last weekend, I discovered in my virtual travels online, feminists, many of them unwittingly, have been misrepresenting facts about one of their main grievances that is the lightning rods of the feminist movement…sexual assault. Their narrative has always been that large numbers of women are being sexually assaulted by men, who are hardly ever are sexually assaulted themselves, in large part, they believe, because of a patriarchal society that allows it. The takeaway has always been that sexual assault is almost exclusively a crime perpetrated by men against women.

Now before people start getting irrationally upset, sexual assault is something I strongly oppose and I've always believed that every allegation should be investigated in a timely and objective manner. I continuously take exception that many rape kits collected by law enforcement go unprocessed. This is a travesty of justice.

However, my concern is feminists misrepresenting rape statistics with gender biased studies to support their narrative…potentially from the very beginning. When a person conducts a study, their study is peer reviewed for methodology and objectivity. The problem here is that many of the sexual assault studies conducted by feminists and their supporters were also peer reviewed by other feminists and their supporters…creating a strong potential for confirmation bias and a kind of echo chamber.

Recently, more objective studies of sexual assault have been conducted which thoroughly debunk the feminist narrative that sexual assault is a crime almost exclusively committed by men against women.

In 2013, the National Crime Victimization Survey conducted by the United States Government Bureau of Justice Statistics (BJS) found 38% of all sexual assault victims were men. Further, Lara Stemple of the Human Rights Project at UCLA co-authored a paper called: "The Sexual Victimization of Men in America: New Data Challenge Old Assumptions," published in the April 17, 2014 edition of the American Journal of Public Health found when a more objective count of sexual assault victims was compiled, which included sexual assault in prisons and other correctional facilities (an area excluded by most feminists when studying rates of sexual assault and not counted in most general national statistics) found 1.270 million women and 1.267 men reported being sexually assaulted… both genders were sexually assaulted in equal numbers. Further, the BJS found that in regard to male victims of sexual assault, 46% reported their assailant was female. What's even more disturbing is regarding incarcerated juveniles sexually assaulted. In 89% of all reported cases, the victims were boys who reported the perpetrator as a female staff member.

The United States Center for Disease Control found that men are sexually assaulted at nearly the same rate as women. USAToday reports that 43% of high school and young college men reported they had an unwanted sexual experience and 95% of that number reported their assailant was a female acquaintance.

On top of all of this, there's the issue of false rape allegations. While the statistics are all over the map, ranging from 2% reported by feminists and 40% reported by men's rights activists (MRAs), a recent article by Dara Lind: "What we know about false Rape Allegations, " published on Vox.com, looked at a variety of studies and found women falsely report rape approximately 5.9% of the time. Which means of the 1.270 million women who reported being sexually assaulted, approximately 74,930 of these allegations were false. If 5.9% of females allegations of sexual assault are false, then based on Lara Stemple's paper, males are sexually assaulted in the United States more often than females.

While feminists are correct that sexual assault is drastically under reported in the United States…it's often elements in the feminist movement doing the under reporting.

By excluding large segments of male sexual assault victims and female rapists from their studies, feminists have created a false narrative allowing them to fraudulently receive government benefits and subsidies, while painting sexual assault as a crime exclusively perpetrated by men against women. Sexual assault in the United States is an important issue that needs attention, but it's not the gender battleground falsely created by feminists. By misrepresenting facts of sexual assault victimization through gender bias, feminists create serious credibility issues that may be fatal to their message of equality and potentially their movement.

Bane 666 video on Jeff Sharlet censored on YouTube now available here

AVfM Video Source · 25 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

In fashion typical to those who want no dissent to their opinions expressed anywhere, this video was removed from YouTube after a DMCA was filed. Assuming that those attempting to silence Bane 666 never heard of the Streisand Effect, they will now find their efforts rather counterproductive. The video will now get more views, and anyone thinking they can bully AVFM legally will get an education in that area as well.

That the video involves Jeff Sharlet getting constantly clocked on his oily head with bricks of logic is a big plus. The clueless idiot interviewing him is also quite entertaining. Please feel free to download this and place it on your blog, forum or YouTube. PE

Make some popcorn and then watch.

Science-based fraternity suspended for encouraging women in STEM fields

August Løvenskiolds · 25 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Another Virginia university fraternity is in trouble with feminists – but this time, it is not for false sexual assault claims brought against the frat, but rather, for being too welcoming to women students and their families.

The Sigma Nu chapter at Old Dominion University had created a multi-prong campaign to encourage new women students to join the so-called "STEM" fields of study (Science, Technology, Engineering & Mathematics) but the effort ran into trouble recently when feminists complained that signs directing and welcoming women were somehow oppressive to them.

Although an estimated 60% of college students are women, STEM fields are still dominated by men, who are often blamed by feminists for making these disciplines too daunting, demeaning and discriminatory for women to be attracted into them.

The wily men of the Sigma Nu (for "Science Nerds," the original, whimsical appellation adopted by the socially concerned founders of the frat) decided to combat this historical and hysterical revulsion to women in STEM by "changing the culture" associated with rigorous, logical hard-science studies. Their rebranding efforts began with a series of signs attached to their dedicated science research domicile:

The first sign, designed to reassure nervous parents that their daughters were welcome to STEM classes, touted the hearty camaraderie of the science students. "Rowdy and fun! Hope your baby girl is ready for a good time…" This message was obviously designed to show new women students (and their parents) that they would be happy and well-cared for in their company.

The second, more modest sign, clearly indicated with an arrow the welcoming and open educational path women should follow: "Freshman daughter drop-off."

The third sign, with a its politically inclusive, anti-ageist message, encouraged mothers to join their daughters if they wished: "Go ahead and drop off mom, too…", meaning the men were willing to take on women of all ages and experience in their efforts to spread science education.

Inside the front door I toured a state-of-the-art facility that will rewrite the rule book on how to encourage women in science to be healthy, safe, included and productive.

The facility uses the "paradigm" approach, first pioneered in the mid 1970's, where students are tossed into a challenging experimental environment where a series of real-life, practical projects are given to them. They are expected to explore their interests using their own preferred learning styles instead of the more traditional classroom lectures and/or ideological litmus tests that women STEM students in particular found so intimidating, unnerving and embarrassing. For example:

- A mandatory breast cancer screening room offers first hand techniques in catching this awful disease early; the comfortable sofas and tasty libations available are designed to put newcomers completely at ease, a trend in women's health centers elsewhere.
- An advanced sleep study lab tracks and hopes to expand upon recent discoveries that sleeping in the nude promotes deeper sleep, weight loss, and vaginal health, areas of concern for many women students.
- A well-stocked, working, student-led and run pharmacological dispensary is designed to give students practical skills in the synergies of both business and biochemical engineering.
- A biology lab practicum where students can explore the subtle tease of flirtation and consent in a closely monitored and peer-reviewed format, complete with live-streaming to other locations worldwide.

However, this futuristic, bleeding-edge concept is attracting some negative reviews, much like the Taliban and other radical Islamists violently attack the education of women and girls in countries like Afghanistan.

Like the Taliban, the national organization behind the creative Sigma Nu local condemned these efforts to co-mingle men and women college students as "derogatory and demeaning," adding it had "no place in our Fraternity or within any caring community, such as that of [Old Dominion University]."

Likewise, according to the BBC, the University President John R Broderick wrote "There is zero tolerance on this campus for sexual assault and sexual harassment…", clearly indicating his discomfort with welcoming women into co-educational STEM environments that study controversial topics experimentally.

Although this innovative integration of genders by the local Sigma Nu frat is truly visionary, it may have gone too far too fast for some, I look forward to the day when both men and women can join together on campus as true equals unrestrained by the restrictions enforced by both feminist and traditionalist fuddy-duddies, who seem to have no sense of humor at all.

Editor's note: For those who are unfamiliar with the author's style, it will be helpful to note that he often uses satire and hyperbole in his writings.

The single most humiliating moment in Jessica Valenti's public life

Paul Elam · 26 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

In November 2014, Brown University hosted a debate between two very different feminists, one of which was Jessica Valenti. Unfortunately for her, the other one was Wendy McElroy. As you are about to see, McElroy destroyed Valenti before she could take a sip of male tears or indeed utter a single word.

This was such a bad showing for Valenti (and a brilliant one for McElroy) that Valenti and her agent have, according to our sources, threatened legal actions against those publishing this video, including Wendy McElroy. It was removed from YouTube after a DMCA complaint, despite the fact that there is no evidence so far that Valenti has any claim to the copyright of the video, which was filmed by Brown University. Brown reportedly does not release contract details about their videos. That fact makes this a news story, which allows us under law to report on it and include the video.

One of the main problems other than lacking any credible rebuttal to McElroy's arguments was that Valenti invoked Emma Sulkowitz, aka Mattress Girl, as her primary example of "Rape Culture."

Almost immediately after the debate, Mattress Girl's rape story unraveled into the carnival act of obvious fraud it is today.

In watching this video it will become evident to you why Valenti desperately wants it vaporized. It is her worst ever nightmare of public comeuppance.

Unfortunately for Jessica, the video is assured to be available and spread in perpetuity right here at A Voice for Men.

Kudos to McElroy for an astounding performance and to the United States Constitution for freedom of the press.

Make popcorn and watch here.

The Biggest Question of All: are you a Feminist, or are you Not?

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 26 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

We all need to make up our minds. Every last one of us. We are, all of us, either one thing or the other: feminist, or not feminist. There is no middle ground. There are no shades of gray. There are no blurred lines. There is no fence to sit upon.

You are either a feminist, or you are not a feminist. Isn't that simple?

So, what does it mean in practice, to say that you are either a feminist or not a feminist? In practice, it means that you should take one second, at the very most, to make your decision. If I were to inquire, "are you a feminist?", you would respond either yes or no . . . . in a flash!

You ought not to vacillate. If you need to pause and think about it, then you might as well just call yourself a feminist until you finally get your head straight. The force which pulls you instinctively away from feminism ought to be so powerful that it operates instantaneously. It ought to be second nature.

Naturally, we'd rather you were not a feminist at all, but the important thing is to make your mind up. It is not nearly so bad to be a feminist, as to be a fence-sitter. To be a fence-sitter is to be woefully uninformed about the political situation. Your "middle ground" between feminist and non-feminist is a melting iceberg, a transitory condition that will not last. It is an illusion, a state of existential dithering, and to occupy such a position is to be a morally two-headed creature with no stable identity — or if you will, no GPS coordinates on the political map.

The middle ground illusion emerges from the notion that there is a "good" feminism and a "bad" feminism which can be teased apart from each other. That notion is erroneous. The truth is that if you did separate the (ideologically) good from the (ideologically) bad in feminism, you would effectively dismantle feminism altogether and it would no longer operate.

You cannot effectively discard the bad stuff in feminism, and save aside the good stuff in its own heap, and still call that heap feminism. Any so-called feminism extracted by this method would be redundant and superfluous because it would already be covered in a separately existing category — such as, for example, "egalitarianism" or "liberal humanism." The word feminism would serve no purpose any longer.

The "good" part of feminism is not feminism's defining core. It is the insulation but not the wire. It is a fig leaf or cover story, while "bad feminism" is the real juice, the real nitty-gritty. Any effort to direct attention away from the dark side of feminism amounts to passing the buck.

I would wrap it up tersely, thuswise: Whatever is is good about feminism is not original, and whatever is original is not good.

If you resort to the standard cop-out that "not all feminists are like that" (NAFALT), then you are practicing a slight variant of the same evasionary maneuver we have already talked about. You are trying to separate the "good" feminists from the "bad" feminists, but this fails for the same reason that we have sketched above. The good feminists are the "good cop", and the bad feminists are the "bad cop" — but they are both on the same team.

Furthermore you are dodging the question "what is feminism?" because you are actually addressing the question "who are feminists?" Hence, the argument is a deflection. In the end, you see, the real question is not "are all feminists like that?", but rather "is all FEMINISM like that?" This is not a trivial distinction.

So the illusion of middle ground between feminist and non-feminist, springs from an obfuscational distinction between "good" feminism (or feminists), and "bad" feminism (or feminists). The trajectory of counter-feminist analysis will make this obfuscation increasingly evident to the world at large, and the one correct understanding of feminism will emerge slowly into the light of public awarenness. As correct understanding emerges, the illusion of middle ground will become unsustainable and melt away, and many an existential crisis will be had.

In the meantime, I would like to pose a series of rhetorical questions that will situate the conversation and clarify the nature of feminism in general:

Do you think it is a good idea to drive a wedge down the middle of the human race and alienate men and women from each other?

Do you think it is a good idea, to insinuate that most of the world's problems flow from a male source?

Do you think it is a good idea to treat "woman-hating" as a moral felony, but treat "man-hating" as a social misdemeanor?

Do you think it is a good idea to encourage the growth of fatherless families?

Do you think it is a good idea to prop up your political agenda with false statistics?

Do you think it is a good idea to corrupt the criminal justice system with anti-male ideological bias?

Do you think it is a good idea to "empower" women with no clear limits and no stipulations about using that power responsibly?

Do you think it is a good idea to insult and slander women of conscience who disown feminism or say stiff things about it?

Finally, do you think it is a good idea to pretend that feminism bears no relation to any of the creepy things we have listed here?

All right. If your first impulse is to say "that's not what feminism really is!", then you had best declare yourself a feminist, and withdraw to the private enjoyment of your private understanding.

As you can see, the decision to call yourself feminist, or not call yourself feminist, is fraught with some very heavy moral underpinnings. It's a decision of serious consequence in either direction – one that accomodates no dithering, dilly-dallying, or shilly-shallying.

Come now, be a good gal, or a good gent, and hop down off that fence!

Are you feminist, or are you non-feminist? Please make your mind up, and please declare your standpoint frequently, in conversation, when disclosure is the appropriate thing to do.

As non-feminist men and women, the resolute nature of our opposition to feminism is the force-field which binds us together. Regrettably, we don't YET fully agree on what feminism IS. We have not YET reached target consensus. I repeat, not YET. But despite our differences, we are in FULL agreement that a show of solidarity will impress the gravitas of the occasion upon the other side. It will make them sit up a little bit straighter, and it will cause them to moderate their tone when they speak to us.

Yes. A popular front non-feminist coalition – that's the ticket!

So, are you a feminist? Or are you a non-feminist? That bedrock question is where it all begins.

Jagged Little Feminism: Hiding the raw hatred of men

August Løvenskiolds · 27 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists love hating men, and they also love denying that feminism involves hating men. Just use Google to search for the words "feminism is not about hating men" to get a taste of the ambivalence today's feminists feel about openly expressing their true contempt for men.

Now, deflection and deception of one's true emotional nature is a human staple that goes back thousands of years: even the ancient Egyptians used cosmetics to pretty up their faces, a practice women still use today even when feminists half-heartedly tell them that pleasing men with pretty faces is wrong. Women still encourage men to share their feelings – and women explode into anger and reject those men stupid enough to take women at their word about this.

Because the expressions of women's raw negative emotions are seen as a bit more acceptable than men's, women are more likely to let loose their rage in public (and especially in private). This emotional repression of the dark demons of the human soul persists to this day: a certain public sense of decorum (and a lot of public shaming) still restricts the public release of emotions in both men and women. Feminists term this decorum "patriarchal repression" but the truth is that women are the real arbiters of what emotional displays are allowed: for example, the open expressions of men's sexual desires are characterized by hypocritical feminists as "harassment" and "oppressive" even as feminists fight to "free the nipple" and demonize so-called "slut shaming."

Twenty years ago, singer/songwriter/guitarist Alanis Morissette released her wildly successful, monster album Jagged Little Pill to rave reviews from feminists – even today, twenty years later, the album is still regarded (and celebrated) as a bold feminist statement, according to young female musicians among others. Alanis was such an attractive icon of feminism that she was cast in the role of "God" in the slacker vs feminist movie Dogma in 1999.

I confess, I also loved the album, not because it was feminist, but rather because it tore the mask off of feminism's man-hate (misandry) in a way that was compelling and undeniable. I also loved it because Alanis's unthinking conflation/confusion of tragedy with irony in her song "Isn't it Ironic," which unintentionally (and humorously) painted feminism and feminists as not too bright overall.

Recently, nouveau feminist and shark-jumping singer Taylor Swift introduced a new generation of fans to Alanis: she performed a duet with her at the Staples Center in Los Angeles. The song they sang, "You Oughta Know" boils with both feminist anger and faux demure womanly regret at a man after he dumps his girlfriend, supposedly for an older, more mentally healthy lover:

But like a hungover college tart waking up and facing a walk of shame after a night of debauchery with a random guy, my devoted feminist canoodle pillow Amanda Marcotte, writing in Slate, has similar regrets about today's fainting-couch young feminists being exposed to the previously touted angry feminism of Morissette:

> Alanis Morissette was a singer who, in the mid-1990s, capitalized on a small but growing trend of "angry woman" rock acts, such as L7 and Hole, and made an absolute killing, selling 33 million copies of her album Jagged Little Pill worldwide. But while her predecessors wrote songs protesting sexual harassment and rape, Morissette's big hit protested guys who break up with you.

In contrast to sex-negative feminists who hate both sex with men, and men's sexuality outright, Alanis was a sex-positive feminist who, nevertheless, showed that even feminists with supposedly positive sexual attitudes hated both themselves and men for their sexual choices. Marcotte desperately tries to gloss over this, comparing Alanis to "nice guys" who get angry when women subject them to what Warren Farrell termed "date fraud": the implicit promise of sex by a woman in return for, say, a man paying for dinner, after which the woman's promise is withdrawn:

> Long before the terms "nice guy syndrome" and "friend zone" were created to describe men who think they are entitled to have a relationship with someone just because they do nice things for them, Morissette tore up the charts with a song about a woman who thinks the same way. "Would she go down on you in a theater?" the narrator of "You Oughta Know" plaintively asks about the woman her ex chose instead. "And would she have your baby?" Begging and clumsy emotional blackmail isn't a good look on anyone, male or female.

Yes, whining like a jilted lover is not attractive, but neither are women who use deception and fraud to manipulate men. While men are not entitled to sex with women, men are entitled to feel angry and violated when women use the promise of a relationship to defraud men of their money, time and children – the same sort of anger Alanis sang about.

Of course, if the feminist demand for "equality" were actually honest, Marcotte might acknowledge that both men and women can feel a justified anger at being lied to. But because this type of equality is another feminist lie, all Marcotte can do is deflect the blame for it onto men, like all feminists do.

Men's human rights activism by default

Lionel Young · 28 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

A few years ago I had occasion to consult a local psychologist. During our first meeting, he flagged his main therapeutic strategy for, what it seems, all problems of a psychological nature and for every patient. His mainstay one cure for all ills was, and still is (to my knowledge), meditation.

During our increasingly frank exchange of views about meditation, he happened to mention that it has helped him to assist another male client to "stop beating his wife", to paraphrase the conversation.

I went away from this first session and thought for some time about this and the simple connection that this professional had adopted and the underlying assumed belief system.

I then went back to Paul Elam's presentation called "A Psychology Of Hate" and printed out a copy to take with me for our next session.

At the beginning of this encounter, I notified him that I required him to either read this, or allow me to read it to him then and there and to hear his response. I explained that I needed to have some impression of his response to it in order to engage with him with the necessary confidence for a theraupetic relationship to develop. Or, alternatively, to choose to not continue with therapy, as the case may be.

He asked me to read it out.

He started to smile during my words and when I finished, he said simply; "this would not survive scientific scrutiny", or words to that effect. I was a bit stunned and did not expect such a blunt rebuttal. I simply asked him if he would be receptive to some information that I could forward to him by email and to my surprise he said yes.

So I went home and did a quick bit of research for some information that would unequivocally qualify as "scientific" in the mind of any ideologue.

The first document I dug out of my files was the now famous, (or I hope that it is famous!), report by Murray Straus titled Thirty Years of Denying the Evidence on Gender Symmetry in Partner Violence: Implications for Prevention and Treatment.

I most likely read this first on the AVFM website. I sent a copy of this off to the psychologist. He replied courteously that he would take it with him on his summer break and read it then. He thanked me kindly for bothering to forward it to him.

Several weeks went by and I began to assume that I would not hear anymore from him, when I received a response. To my lasting astonishment, his email reply was most positive; to the extent that he admitted he had tears in his eyes while reading it and that he had already adjusted his treatment policy towards at least one male client. He thanked me profusely and I have no reason to doubt his complete sincerity in this regard. I was quite stunned to be honest.

After a bit of thought and acceptance, that which started as a diametrically opposite set of trenchantly held viewpoints had resolved into the beginning of a mutually shared position. Or to put it another way, the first step in such a resolution had happened.

This in turn had quite a positive effect on me and I felt a certain sense of pride that I was able to articulate my position regarding gender and the current zeitgeist, and present some compelling scientific evidence to support it. This in itself had a therapeutic effect on me; just being truly heard. One of my early life problems with my oppressive father, was not being heard. Or more to the point; never being heard.

Throughout my exchange with this psychologist we both conducted ourselves well; something we both can be proud of. I did choose not to continue consulting this fellow in a professional capacity, but I do bump into him socially on odd occasions. We remain on good terms which is gratifying.

I have a long history of being reactive in similar situations. Not always the diplomat. So it was a constructive exercise all round.

Activism by default?

Sexual feudalism: a history of the male sex role

Peter Wright · 29 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The gynocentric customs guiding relationships between the sexes originate in old Europe in the form of damsaling, chivalry and courtly-love. The tradition began in 12th century France and Germany and spread rapidly to all the principle courts of Europe. From there it filtered into popular culture, being transported eventually to the new world on the wings of colonial expansionism – to the Americas, India, Australia and so on.

Why is this history important to men? Because it's a history we continue to enact today, unconsciously, and its consequences for men have far reaching psychological implications.

In the medieval model men offered themselves as vassals to women who took on the status of overlords in sexual relations – this because women were widely viewed as men's moral superiors. As evinced by the first troubadours, men pledged homage and fealty to women who actively played the part of man's superior. This feudalistic formula, which I will tentatively label sexual feudalism, is attested by writers from the Middle Ages onward, including by Lucrezia Marinella who in 1600 AD recounted that women of even lower socioeconomic classes were treated as superiors by men who, she recounts, acted as servants or beasts born to serve them.

Many female and male writers stated this belief, including Modesta Pozzo who in 1590 wrote, "don't we see that men's rightful task is to go out to work and wear themselves out trying to accumulate wealth, as though they were our factors or stewards, so that we can remain at home like the lady of the house directing their work and enjoying the profit of their labors? That, if you like, is the reason why men are naturally stronger and more robust than us — they need to be, so they can put up with the hard labor they must endure in our service."

And there is much more to this model than men laboring for women's material benefit. It also includes a belief in women's corporeal, moral and spiritual superiority, of which we shall say more below.

Sexual feudalism

I came to the phrase sexual feudalism as a shorthand for the sex-relations model of gynocentrism, and have since discovered the phrase used occasionally in literature; here are a few examples carrying the same meaning:

Camille Paglia (1990):

> "…a sexual feudalism of master-slave relationships."

Marjolijn Februari (2011):

> "Actually it's arguing for a dictatorship, the dictatorship of the vagina, a kind of sexual feudalism which you wouldn't want our international relations to be governed by in the future… those women aren't the least concerned about war and peace as a matter of principle; all they're concerned about is securing their own interests."

Adam Kostakis (2011):

> "It would not be inappropriate to call such a system sexual feudalism, and every time I read a feminist article, this is the impression that I get: that they to construct a new aristocracy, comprised only of women, while men stand at the gate, till in the fields, fight in their armies, and grovel at their feet for starvation wages. All feminist innovation and legislation creates new rights for women and new duties for men; thus it tends towards the creation of a male underclass, the accomplishment of which will be the first step towards the extermination of men."
>
> "But what are the women's rights advocated today? The right to confiscate men's money, the right to commit > parental alienation, the right to commit paternity fraud, the right to equal pay for less work, the right to pay a lower tax rate, the right to mutilate men, the right to confiscate sperm, the right to murder children, the right to not be disagreed with, the right to reproductive choice and the right to make that choice for men as well. In an interesting legal paradox, some have advocated – with success – that women should have the right to not be punished for crimes at all. The eventual outcome of this is a kind of sexual feudalism, where women rule arbitrarily, and men are held in bondage, with fewer rights and far more obligations."

When did it start?

Below are compiled a series of authoritative quotes on the subject. Each points to evidence of the beginnings of sexual feudalism in early Europe, along with other contributing factors such as veneration of the Virgin Mary and its influence on women's status.

■ H.J. Chaytor, The Troubadours: "In the eleventh century the worship of the Virgin Mary became widely popular; the reverence bestowed upon the Virgin was extended to the female sex in general, and as a vassal owed obedience to his feudal overlord, so did he owe service and devotion to his lady… Thus there was a service of love as there was a service of vassalage, and the lover stood to his lady in a position analogous to that of the vassal to his overlord. He attained this position only by stages; "there are four stages in love: the first is that of aspirant (fegnedor), the second that of suppliant (precador), the third that of recognised suitor (entendedor) and the fourth that of accepted lover (drut)." The lover was formally installed as such by the lady, took an oath of fidelity to her and received a kiss to seal it, a ring or some other personal possession."

■ C.G. Crump, Legacy of the Middle Ages: "The Aristocracy and Church developed the doctrine of the superiority of women, that adoration which gathered round both the persons both of the Virgin in heaven and the lady upon earth, and which handed down to the modern world the ideal of chivalry. The cult of the Virgin and the cult of chivalry grew together, and continually reacted upon one another… The cult of the lady was the mundane counterpart of the cult of the Virgin and it was the invention of the medieval aristocracy. In chivalry the romantic worship of a woman was as necessary a quality of the perfect knight as was the worship of God… It is obvious that the theory which regarded the worship of a lady as next to that of God and conceived of her as the mainspring of brave deeds, a creature half romantic, half divine, must have done something to counterbalance the dogma of subjection. The process of placing women upon a pedestal had begun, and whatever we may think of the ultimate value of such an elevation (for few human beings are suited to the part of Stylites, whether ascetic or romantic) it was at least better than placing them, as the Fathers of the Church had inclined to do, in the bottomless pit."

■ C.S. Lewis, The Allegory of Love: "Everyone has heard of courtly love, and everyone knows it appeared quite suddenly at the end of the eleventh century at Languedoc. The sentiment, of course, is love, but love of a highly specialized sort, whose characteristics may be enumerated as Humility, Courtesy, and the Religion of Love. The lover is always abject. Obedience to his lady's lightest wish, however whimsical, and silent acquiescence in her rebukes, however unjust, are the only virtues he dares to claim. Here is a service of love closely modelled on the service which a feudal vassal owes to his lord. The lover is the lady's 'man'. He addresses her as midons, which etymologically represents not 'my lady' but 'my lord'. The whole attitude has been rightly described as 'a feudalisation of love'. This solemn amatory ritual is felt to be part and parcel of the courtly life."

■ Joan Kelly, Did Women have a Renaissance?: Medieval courtly love, closely bound to the dominant values of feudalism and the Church, allowed in a special way for the expression of sexual love by women… if courtly love were to define itself as a noble phenomenon, it had to attribute an essential freedom to the relation between lovers. Hence, it metaphorically extended the social relation of vassalage to the love relationship, a "conceit" that Maurice Valency rightly called "the shaping principle of the whole design" of courtly love… Thus, in Medieval romances, a parley typically followed a declaration of love until love freely proffered was freely returned. A kiss (like the kiss of homage) sealed the pledge, rings were exchanged, and the knight entered the love service of his lady. Representing love along the lines of vassalage had several liberating implications for aristocratic women. Most fundamental, ideas of homage and mutuality entered the notion of heterosexual relations along with the idea of freedom. As symbolized on shields and other illustrations that place the knight in the ritual attitude of commendation, kneeling before his lady with his hands folded between hers, homage signified male service, not domination or subordination of the lady, and it signified fidelity, constancy in that service."

■ Peter Makin, Provence and Pound: "William IX calls his lady midons, which I have translated as 'my Lord'. This midons is, as Pound said, 'inexplicable': it is used by the troubadours, of their ladies, and in the later troubadours we find it everywhere–Bernart de Ventadorn used it twenty-three times. Its etymology is (?mi-) dominus, 'my master, lord', but since it is used only of women – its pronoun is 'she' – glossarists have difficulty assigning it a gender. Though Mary Hackett has shown that it was not felt to mean on the primary level 'my quasi-feudal lord' by the troubadours who used it, these men knew their Latin and must have been aware of its origins and peculiarity; in fact it was clearly their collective emotions and expectations that drew what amounts to a metaphor from the area of lordship, just as it is the collective metaphor-making process that establishes 'baby' as a term for a girlfriend and that creates and transforms language constantly. In the same way, knowing that Dominus was the standard term for God, and that don, 'lord', was also used for God, they must also have felt some connection with religious adoration. William IX echoes the scriptures when he says

Every joy must bow down before her and every pride obey Midons…
No one can find a finer lady, nor eyes see, nor mouth speak of…
The incantatory fifth stanza of this song enumerates powers that were evoked every day in the Virgin and the saints. William IX is, metaphorically, his lady's feudal vassal as well as her worshipper. So that there are three structures in parallel: the feudal, the courtly-love, and the religious; the psychological structure of each followed that of the others, so that it was difficult to think of any of them without transferring the feelings that belonged to the others. The lady was to lover as God to man, and as feudal lord to vassal; and feudal lord to vassal was as God to man. Our socio-economically minded age would say that the forms of feudal society must have shaped relationships in the other two spheres, and it is as likely that aesthetics and ethics moulded economics and vice versa. Of course, courtly love was not 'religious' in the sense of being part of any Christian ethic; it was a religion in its psychology. The courtly lover did not think of his lady as the Church thought of her, but as the Church thought of God."

■ Irving Singer, Love: Courtly and Romatic: "Since the social structure of the Middle Ages was mainly feudal and hierarchical, men were expected to serve their lords while women were required to show fidelity. In courtly love this was transformed into meaning that the lover would serve his lady and that she would be faithful to him. Courtly love is often said to have placed women on a pedestal and to have made men into knights whose heroic lives would henceforth belong to elevated ladies. The idea arises from the fact that men frequently used the language of chivalry to express their servile relationship to whatever woman they loved, and sometimes they described her as a divinity toward which they might aspire but could never hope to equal… that he must prove himself worthy of her and so advance upward, step by step, toward a culminating union at her level; that everything noble and virtuous, everything that makes life worth living, proceeds from women, who are even described as the source of goodness itself. But though the lady now discourses with her lover, the men frequently cast themselves into the typical posture of fin'amors. On their knees, hands clasped, they beg the beloved to accept their love, their life, their service, and to do with them as she pleases."

■ Gerald A. Bond, A Handbook of the Troubadours "The extent of the penetration of feudal thought into the conception and expression of courtly love has been apparent to all modern investigators: the poet-lover portrays himself as a vassel (om), the lady is treated as a feudal lord and often addressed in masculine form (midons/sidons), and contracts (conven), reward (guizardon), and other aspects of loyal and humble service are constantly under discussion. In a profound sense, courtly love is quintessentially feudal (Riquer 77-96), for it imitates the primary hierarchical principles increasingly employed to control as well as to justify hegemonic desire in the second feudal age."

■ Sandra R Alfonsi, Masculine Submission in Troubadour Lyric "The troubadours lived and functioned within a society based on feudalism. Certain ones were themselves feudal lords; others were liegemen dependent on such lords for their sustinence. The troubadours who were members of the clergy were also actively involved in this feudal society. It is only natural that their literature reflect some traits of the age in which it was created. Scholars soon saw striking parallels between feudalistic practices and certain tenets of Courtly Love. The comparisons lie in certain resemblances shared by vassalage and the courtly "love service." Fundamental to both was the concept of obedience. As a vassal, the liegeman swore obedience to his lord. As a courtly lover, the poet chose a lady to whom he was required to swear obedience. Humility and obedience were two concepts familiar to medieval man, active components of his Weltanschauung. Critics, such as Erich Kohler, have found them exhibited in both the life and literature of that time.

The entire concept of love-service was patterned after the vassal's oath to serve his lord with loyalty, tenacity, and courage. These same virtues were demanded of the poet. Like the liegeman vis-a-vis his sovereign, the poet approached his lady with fear and respect. Submitted to her, obedient to her will, he awaited a fief or honor as did the vassal. His compensation took many forms: the pleasure of his lady's company in her chamber or in the garden; an avowal of her love; a secret meeting; a kiss or even le surplus, complete unity. Like the lord, the woman who was venerated and served was expected to reward her faithful and humble servant. Her failure to do so was considered a breach of "contract." Most critics who support the theory that the courtly-love-service was formed by assimilation to the feudal service inherent in vassalage, credit Guillaume IX with its creation. However, the universality of these parallels cannot be doubted:

> The posture of the true lover is so familiar that we have come to accept it as the hallmark. A seal attributed to Cononde Bethune represents it perfectly. This depicts in an oval cartouche, an armed knight on his knees before a lady. His body is shrouded in a mail hauberk. His head is completely concealed in his helmet. He wears spurs but no sword. The lady stands at arms length, chastely robed, her regular nonedescript features framed in long braids, presumably blonde, and between her outstretched palms the knight's hands are placed in the formal gesture of homage. Within the cartouche, in the space above the helmet of the kneeling knight is inscribed a single word: MERCI. [1]

The similarities between courtly service and vassalage are indeed striking. Although of a more refined character than an ordinary vassal, the poet-lover is portrayed as his lady's liegeman, involved in the ceremony of homage and pictured at the moment of the immixtio manuum. His reward for faithful service will doubtlessly include the osculum.

The influence of feudalism upon courtly love was, in my opinion, twofold: it provided the poets with a well-organized system of service after which they might pattern their own; it furnished them with a highly developed vocabulary centered around the service owed by a vassal to a lord. Feudalistic vocabulary was comprised of certain basic terminology indicative of the ties which legally bound a man to his lord in times of peace and war.

Sexual feudalism today

Despite occasional hand-wringing by the media about a decline in chivalric service to women, it appears to be alive and well. Not only are males continuing to go down on one knee to pop the question as dutiful vassals, but sexual feudalism remains a popular staple of romance novels, Disney movies, cinematic blockbusters such as Twilight, and in popular music like Taylor Swift's Love Story which celebrates courtly love. Men are still willing to die, work, provide for, adore, and pedestalize women, and women are only too happy to be treated to such a dignifying display.

The British politics of sexual apartheid

AVfM Video Source · 29 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Mainstream establishment parties in Britain appear to compete with each other on how much can they deliver in terms of resentment between men and women, thinks Lucian Vâlsan.

You can subscribe to Lucian's Freedom Alternative, here.

Call to action: The EU is out of its mind again

Lucian Vâlsan · 29 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

This article is also available in Spanish, Romanian and Swedish.

The European vacation is now done and the EU is back at what it's doing best: coming up with insidiously insane bills to shove down the throats of the peoples of Europe.

And they have not waited too long. Before the vacation, the bureaucrats in Brussels were debating what is now called "The Rodrigues Report" (named after Liliana Rodrigues, Portuguese MEP from the Socialist group) and it seemed at the time that the bill will fail (as countless others on similar issues have).

However, just this week, a final version of the bill also called "Empowering girls through Education in the EU" has been forwarded to be put to a vote during the September 7-10 plenary of the European Parliament.

What does the bill say and what it implies

As usual with EU bills, what it says in the title and what it actually implies are two entirely different things. Also, as per the EU tradition, the devil is in the details.

The full text that will sit on the table can be read here (in English).

Even without reading the text, the bill is entirely out of place since education is not (and never has been) under the competence of the European Commission. In plain English – Brussels, by its own rules, treaties and regulations, can have no say in how the nations in the EU run their educational systems.

In what is legalistically called "reasons exposure" the bill makes a plethora of downright false statements as well as misleading or completely irrelevant statements. For example, article Y states:

> whereas 17 % of adults worldwide, two-thirds (493 million) of them women, are unable to read or write;

That may indeed be true, but illiteracy is hardly a huge problem in the EU. The worst ranked country in the EU in terms of literacy is Portugal, with a literacy rate of "only" 95.4%. In other words, the EU does not have a continent-wide illiteracy problem worthy of being addressed by the hyper-bloated Brussels bureaucracy.

Article V is also an example of being out of touch with reality:

> whereas school-related gender-based violence (SRGBV) includes acts of sexual, physical and/or psychological violence inflicted on children because of gendered stereotypes and social norms; whereas SRGBV is a major barrier to access, participation and attainment;

The idea that girls are the victims of rampant "school-related gender-based violence" in Europe is completely out of touch with reality to such an extent that even the hypothesis that the Earth may be flat has more legitimacy.

The implication is that this supposed violence leads girls to abandon school in droves. Yet that is not happening at all. On the contrary – boys and men are significantly more likely to drop out from school[1]. In the last 13 years, the school abandonment rate for girls remained relatively constant while the school abandonment rate for boys kept on rising. Bulgaria, Croatia and Austria are the only countries where the number of boys and girls dropping out is relatively similar[2] (less than 1% difference). At the opposite end is exactly Portugal, Ms. Rodrigues's country of origin where the abandonment rate from boys is almost twice higher than the one for girls (27.1% for boys versus 14.3% for girls).

More to the point, educational experts in the UK[3] and Romania have noted for years that girls are getting more and more violent in school and routinely outpacing boys in violence initiation[4]. Similar reports have come from the US,

New Zeeland, South Korea and other places.

In this context, the premise of this bill is entirely ridiculous.

But what's really troublesome is the radical approach to the so-called problem. The bill comes with 57 "recommendations" which we will discuss in the September 4, AVFM Voice of Europe programme. For the purpose of this article, the most outrageous of them are by far the "recommendation" number 1, 10 and 13.

The first "recommendation" says:

> Calls on the Commission and the Member States to implement and improve measures to apply gender equality at all levels of the education system, and to fully integrate improving awareness of gender issues into teacher training, but also for all categories of school professionals, e.g. school doctors, nurses, psychologists, social workers and pedagogues, as well as to ensure the creation of mechanisms throughout the education system to facilitate the promotion, implementation, monitoring and evaluation of gender equality in educational institutions;

In plain English, non-feminist positions are to become forbidden in schools, hospitals and all the other taxpayer-funded services that currently exist in the unfortunate nations of the European Union.

"Recommendation" number 10 says:

> Asks the Commission to ensure that this recommendation be put to the national institutions responsible for implementing central, regional and local education policies, school management bodies and regional and local authorities;

In other words, any semblance of school autonomy is to be superseded by Brussels diktat in order to make sure that nobody avoids the feminist indoctrination that the socialist MEP has in the bag for everyone.

"Recommendation" number 13 says:

> Urges the Commission to initiate as soon as possible the procedure for EU accession to the Istanbul Convention; calls on the Member States to ratify the Convention, and also calls for the EU and the Member States to work together for gender equality in the Union's external relations; underlines the close links between gender stereotypes and bullying, cyberbullying and violence against women, and the need to fight these from an early age; stresses that the Istanbul Convention calls for signatories to include teaching materials on issues such as non-stereotyped gender roles, mutual respect, non-violent conflict resolution in interpersonal relationships, gender-based violence and the right to personal integrity, adapted to the evolving capacity of learners, in formal curricula and at all levels of education;

Translation: Everyone must adopt the utterly horrifying police-state mandated by the Istanbul Convention which has the potential to render private lives between men and women irrelevant – as the State gets absolute power over them.

The Istanbul Convention is a highly contentious topic as the government of Hungary publicly refused to even consider adopting it – even though at first the Budapest administration signed it and promised to adopt/ratify it.

The governments of Poland and Slovakia have pulled out from the process of adopting it (although they have not yet stated that they will sign out entirely) and the government of Czech Republic didn't even consider signing it, let alone ratifying it – the Prague administration rejecting the document outright.

In the countries where the Istanbul Convention is already in force, the voices against it are becoming stronger and stronger.

Given these realities, it is no surprise that the Eurocrats are trying yet again to push it by force on everyone else.

To learn more about the Istanbul Convention, read this article.

What can be done?

The vote is scheduled to take place on September 8, 2015. In other words, we have a little over one week to contact as many Members of the European Parliament (MEPs) as possible and urge them to vote against the "Rodrigues report".

To find the contact of your MEP, go here, choose the country, and a list will pop-up.

Unfortunately, not all MEPs have listed their contacts on the EU's portal. In those cases, you'd have to go an extra step and look for their contact in a third party place in your native tongue.

Citizens of the UK can go to this website which has centralized the contacts of all UK MEPs. When this article will appear in other languages in which AVFM is being published, the editors will make sure to offer resources for that particular area/country.

In order to avoid spamming the MEPs, it is recommended that you write them in your native tongue (and NOT in English, unless you're from an English-speaking territory, of course). Also, avoid sending the exact same e-mail multiple times. Be creative! The reasons to object to this bill are infinite and the campaign is much more likely to be successful if the objection doesn't come in bulk and spam-like format.

To help a bit more, I have compiled three models of letters to send to the MEPs, one a bit more pompous, one more colloquial and one for far-Left politicians. It is no secret that a significant proportion of MEPs aren't exactly the most sophisticated bunch. As a result, a more colloquial approach may be more successful in some cases.

Model #1:

Subject: Stop the European Parliament's Rodrigues Report

> Dear Member of European Parliament,
>
> As your elector(s), I/we would like to bring to your attention the important vote on the Rodrigues Report on 8 September in the plenary session.
>
> This report "Empowering girls through Education in the EU", infringes upon the European and International Treaties and Covenants by:
>
> 1. Violating the right of parents to be the first educators of their children. It is a direct intrusion in the private lives of parents, children, teachers and school-book editors, as this report does not make any attempt to respect the freedom of belief and conscience, guaranteed by the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union.
> 2. Violating of the Principle of Subsidiarity of the European Union, as "education" is not a competence of the EU, as defined by Article 5 of the Lisbon Treaty or the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union.
>
> More to the point, the premise of this bill is based on misleading data at best and outright falsehoods at worst. The bill for instance stresses on the supposed millions of illiterate women – yet those women don't reside in our country or in the EU for the most part. I/we do not want the EU bureaucracy to dictate at my son's PTA meetings because one girl in his class is still slow in reading at the age of 8.
>
> I/we think we can solve whatever educational problems may exist at local level far better than at the Commission level. I/we don't think it is extreme to say that the politicians in [insert remote country here] can understand and know better the situation in our country than we do ourselves.
>
> For all of the above reasons, we respectfully urge you to REJECT the Rodrigues Report.

> Sincerely,
>
> [Your Name]
>
> Citizen of [your country]

Model #2

Subject: Please vote against the Rodrigues Report on Thursday, September 8

> Dear Member of European Parliament,
>
> As an elector of yours, I/we would like to bring to your attention the important vote on the Rodrigues Report on 8 September in the plenary session.
>
> This report "Empowering girls through Education in the EU" has a nice sounding name but it is in fact addressing a problem that either does not really exist or it can be better addressed at a local level.
>
> In addition to being against the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, as "Education" is not under the competence of the EU, this report also infringes upon the freedom of conscience of the people in this country/constituency.
>
> I/we think it is better to have the debate on, for instance, sex education, gender equality or other topics at the local level, rather than have the EU simply dictate an agenda that may be contrary to the values of this country/constituency.
>
> Whilst gender equality is an important topic, I/we believe that the EU's involvement in this issue through this bill is misguided. More boys than girls drop out from school, yet this bill stresses that we should help the girls even more. Suffice to say that such approaches are out of touch with reality in our country/constituency to say the least.
>
> Please vote to keep us free from Brussels bureaucratic intervention in our schools.
>
> For the reasons stated above, I/we urge you to vote against the Rodrigues report on September 8!
>
> Sincerely [or "Best regards"],
>
> [Your name]
>
> Citizen of [your country] (alternatively you can use the constituency if your country elects MEPs on regional constituencies)

Model #3

Subject: Please vote against the Rodrigues Report on Thursday, September 8

> Dear Member of European Parliament,
>
> As an elector of yours, I/we would like to bring to your attention a few issues regarding the Rodrigues Report which you will be asked to vote on in the upcoming plenary session.
>
> This report called "Empowering girls through Education in the EU" or the "Rodrigues report" sounds quite good on paper, but I'm afraid it is completely out of scope, in addition to going too far.
>
> For starters, the EU's competence on Education, as per Articles 5 and 6 in the Lisbon Treaty, is limited. The EU has the right to attempt to improve access to education through programs facilitating the movement of students and pupils across Europe, but the EU does not have the right to determine the curricula in any Member State. As a result, this bill's request to the Commission to compel Member States to adopt a certain curricula in regards to gender politics is contrary to the EU's Functioning Treaty itself.
>
> Secondly, the bill stresses exclusively on girls' school abandonment which is an issue that is in fact affecting boys far more often than it does girls. I/we don't think our sons should be left behind in this fashion. More to > the point, the approach proposed by this bill is in direct violation of Article 20 (Equality before the law), Article 21 (Non-discrimination) and Article 23 (Equality between men and women) from the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union.

>
> Given that boys are far more affected by many of the issues addressed in the bill, I/we consider to be not only unfair but outright harmful to our sons to approach the issues in the fashion proposed by Ms. Rodriguez.
>
> Thirdly, the bill breaches the subsidiarity principle which is entrenched in EU policies precisely because the EU is a diverse place. Surely it's not extreme to say that a school from northern Finland, one from London and one from Naples are not identical in any way, shape or form.
>
> More to the point, even the Socialist Group of the European Parliament S&D recommended the rejection of portions of this bill under the grounds that it breaches the UN Declaration of Universal Rights. The recommendation was not taken appropriately into consideration by the FEMM committee and the bill put forth now is in a form that runs completely against the tradition of the European Union.
>
> For these reasons, I/we urge to take the S&D's recommendations into consideration and to vote against the Rodriguez Report on September 8.
>
> Sincerely [or "Best regards"],
>
> [Your name]
>
> Citizen of [your country]

Other suggestions

Obviously, the three models of letters put forth here are not definitive nor "the best" way to approach one or more MEPs.

The point of these three models is to show that it can be argued against this bill from multiple sides of the political spectrum.

Also, the examples given in the models are there for perspective. Feel free to use your own examples.

If you know a politician is more nationalistic, do not abstain from using historical examples or arguments that you know that particular politician may like.

As a general guideline (as observed in the models) – the idea is to hit the main talking points of the far-Left, the Left, the centre-Right (EPP) and the rest.

An EPP politician may be willing to hear more about subsidiarity (model #1), for instance, whilst an S&D politician is more likely to be interested in "preserving diversity". An ALDE politician is likely to want to hear a bit of both. The politicians on the far-Left (Nordic Green Left, et. al.) may be persuaded by arguments such as "we already have that at home – our model is better" (despite the public rhetoric, Scandinavian ideologues are very nationalistic).

Another group to pay attention to is ECR (Conservatives and Reformists). This group is likely to be persuaded by arguments similar to the ones in the second model as well by presenting national statistics (if you can find them for your country).

For the "extremist" groups such as the EFDD or ENF, things vary by individual. The ones hooked on international-socialist (communist) extremism (Syriza, et. al.) arguments such as "we have people starving, we can't afford luxurious nonsense like this" are likely to work. For the ones hooked on national-socialist (fascist) extremism (NPD, Front National, et. al.) arguments such as "these cocooned foreigners have no idea about our nation – why should we listen to them?" are the most likely to work.

Also, please do not dismiss the extremist groups and do contact them too – regardless of whether you like them or not. I need to remind you that Front National was the most popular party in the last European elections in France.

Since France is a large country, Front National has 23 seats in the European Parliament. In total, these formerly fringe groups represent over one quarter of the European Parliament. Given these realities, convincing these groups to vote against this bill is very important and necessary.

Can non-EU residents do anything?

If you do have a passport in a EU nation – then yes, you should also write to a few MEPs, even if you have not voted in the European elections or you moved outside the EU years ago.

If you do not have an EU passport, please do share this article (or its equivalents in other languages when they'll emerge on AVFM) to as many Europeans as possible and via as many social networks and websites as possible.

I will update this article with other models (if they appear in the comment section) as well as with the translations of this article when they get published in other languages on AVFM.

Let's get this done! This is a chance to defend liberty and say NO to feminism!

Sources:

[1] Report on equality between men and women, 2014, p. 5 – http://ec.europa.eu/justice/gender-equality/files/annual_reports/150304_annual_report_2014_web_en.pdf

[2] Europe 2020 Target: Early School Leavers from Education, p. 6 – http://ec.europa.eu/europe2020/pdf/themes/29_early_school_leaving.pdf

[3] Girls get violent, The Independent, published on May 2, 1996 – http://www.independent.co.uk/news/uk/girls-get-violent-1345290.html ; further analysis from 2008 – http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/uk_news/7401996.stm

[4] Fetele se bat mai mult decât băieţii la şcoală, Realitatea, published on June 7, 2012 – http://www.realitatea.net/fetele-se-bat-mai-mult-decat-baietii-la-scoala_950236.html

Losing All My Privilege (parody video)

AVfM Video Source · 31 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Proving that even the darkest, most painful subject can be made humorous, Felfop Returns turns a classic REM song into a bitterly funny song about losing his children.

How to get more women into STEM fields

August Løvenskiolds · 31 August 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Even though women dominate higher education – they are now about 60% of all college students – in some academic disciplines, particularly Science / Technology / Engineering / Mathematics – the so-called STEM fields – women make up only a small percentage of students. People on both sides of the feminist divide sometimes see this as a problem that perhaps should be addressed, but how to fix the problem – if it is indeed a problem – remains elusive. I have some ideas that I'll discuss in a moment, but first, some background.

Personally, I believe, in agreement with MRAs like Karen Straughan, that forcing or channeling women into STEM against their natures and/or desires is not a good thing – just let people do what they want to do – but as an academic exercise it is interesting to speculate on ways to get women into STEM, just as "#HeForShe" feminists try to trick men into supporting feminism by fraudulently asserting that feminists care about men's issues, too.

Are women even interested in studying science? It is well-established scientifically that, on the very first day of life, before social pressures or the mythical "patriarchy" kicks in, newborn girls prefer, on average, to look at faces while newborn boys prefer to look at physical mechanical objects. This suggests that, without some sort of artificial intervention, more girls will naturally gravitate to soft social studies, while more boys will prefer hard STEM fields. In fact, this clear gender dimorphism plays out on college campuses decade after decade.

The feminist record on solving the problem of increasing the proportion of women in STEM is, of course, quite poor, if not downright shitty and antagonistic:

- Feminist Sandra Harding sabotaged women's interest in science forever when she absurdly characterized famous physicist Sir Isaac Newton's foundational book Principia (full title: Philosophiæ Naturalis Principia Mathematica) as a "rape manual." What sane woman would be encouraged to study STEM after hearing that? (Ironically, far from being a rapist, it is believed that Newton died a virgin, perhaps because women avoided STEM in the 17th century much as they do today.)

- Feminist Luce Irigaray fatuously derided Albert Einstein's famous formula "E=mc2" as a "sexed equation," and by claiming that, she again signaled women that science is for men only.

- In a fireside chat with Karen Straughan and Alison Tieman, a feminist named Kevin Logan made a nebulous (and therefore, useless) suggestion to get women into STEM by "reducing traditional gender roles," which, given the innate, proven biological nature of subject preferences noted above, is about as useful as saying "more biological men should give birth to babies."

One can find a lot more examples of hostility to science among feminists but my point is that simply getting rid of feminism completely would seem to be a great way of eliminating the social barriers that feminists create to dissuade women from science. However, as a man blessed with the male agency that feminists lack, I think we can do even better than just eliminating feminism: we can use it to put women into STEM classes directly.

The safe and sane way to do this is to remove feminist courses like "women's (or gender) studies" from the social sciences and put them as a subcategory of STEM classes under the strict purview of college science departments, complete with a large number of science prerequisite classes.

What is a prerequisite? In college, in order to take an advanced class, one must master more basic classes first. These basic classes are usually listed as "prerequisites" for the advanced classes.

For example, before one is allowed to study Physical Chemistry, one must complete Basic Chemistry classes as well as some classes in Calculus (Mathematics). Likewise, if you don't know a lot of basic math, then it is pointless to take a class in Statistics. A course of Formal Logic is a great help when studying computer programming.

Requiring gender studies majors – who are mostly women now – to have a solid background in STEM classes like Logic, Calculus, Statistics, Biology, Evolution, Physics and more will help meet a lot of desirable goals.

- It will force, er, direct and empower young women into STEM classes where they might overcome feminist (and those purported societal) barriers and actually come to love science.
- It will bring a rigor to gender studies that is missing today and will perhaps attract more men into such classes, where at present feminist misandry and flawed reasoning work to keep men out.
- It will force a more accurate use of statistics into gender studies, undermining the ideologically driven misuse of bogus stats like “1 in 5 women are raped on campus,” the debunked “wage gap”, and so on.

Of course, feminists will never allow this to come to pass – it has far to much accountability and equality for them to stomach. The best feminist answers to getting women into STEM are “don’t be so rapey” and perhaps “increase the temperature – the science building is too chilly for chicks.” Even the suggestion to “make science more welcoming to women” ignores the nature of women to mistrust overly friendly overtures.

Even building a shoe outlet store in the middle of the science quad is a better answer than feminists will ever be able to come up with.

Women who kill

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 1 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

This article at Gawker has me fiercely pissed off! I am so fucking sick of hearing the tired, pathetic, profoundly sexist story about how women don't kill, women aren't mass murderers, women are such kind, gentle, loving spirits and it's the big bad patriarchy and all the mean men who are responsible for all the horror and violence in the world.

Go fuck yourself Gawker, and every shitty commenter who agreed that it's only men who lose their minds and carry out despicable acts of cowardice against other humans.

> 8 children stabbed to death.
>
> 6 newborns strangled.
>
> 5 children drowned in a bath.
>
> 4 children shot at point blank range.
>
> 3 children stabbed.
>
> 2 children with their skulls smashed in with rocks.
>
> Burned to death in a microwave.
>
> Mouth duct-taped shut, placed in a garbage bag and left in a dumpster to suffocate.
>
> Arms amputated, leading to fatal blood loss.

All killed by women. And not just any woman: mommy fucking dearest. The only real difference between men and women who commit mass murder is that women prefer victims who can't fight back. They prefer to stab, beat, shoot, burn, strangle, cut the throats of babies, toddlers and children. Often prompted by sheer cruelty, vindictiveness and selfishness.

So enough with this crap about men, toxic masculinity and patriarchy causing mass murder.

Here's the Gawker article, written for women.

WOMEN WHO KILL

From what I know about the woman who killed three of her four children on August 19th, she was angry because she felt her daughter deserved more attention than her sons. This woman reminds me of many other women who kill their children – the most common form of mass murder when women are the killers —off the top of my head I can think of at least five mass murders where the killer was stressed out, embarking on a sexual relationship with man not the father of her children, which her children were making difficult, frustrated by disabled children or simply because she wanted to hurt her husband. Ending the lives of*children* essentially because the women didn't feel like they were getting what they deserve. Entitlement.

Gynocentrism does all of us dirty in varying ways. This includes women. We live in a society that often does a piss-poor job at teaching women that children are not their own personal property and that women are not entitled by birth to a life of comfort and ease. It does an even worse job at teaching women how to handle adult responsibility. Even tiny moments of frustration are enough to create lethal conditions. And it is other people, often children, who bear the brunt of that.

I do not suggest, of course, that all women lack these skills, but I am suggesting that many do, and that it manifests itself in various, troublesome ways. It seems to me that we must do a better job of teaching our children, especially our daughters, that your ego does not own you and the world does not owe you. That a man has the right to not be interested. That you might get fired. That your ex-husband might meet someone else. That your ego may not only bruise but shatter, and you will be okay. That it is not anyone's job to protect it, only your job to make sure it is durable. Your job is to practice humility.

Of course, these deaths cannot in any way be blamed entirely on ego. People like Susan Smith, Andrea Yates, Brittany Pilkington, Allyson McConnell and Tania Clarence have other serious mental ailments besides outrageous entitlement. And I realize that this is a very binary heteronormative frame.

But that is the frame that many of us are trapped under. I think about the men who are treated as cash-machine dispensers by vindictive ex-wives, the men falsely accused of sexual assault and rape, kicked out of school based on false allegations, others who've been abused by partners for what are perceived to be even slight dismissals. I think about the number of arrests, assaults, and even murders that have happened because someone in stilettos felt quote unquote disrespected.

I think about how early in life men are conditioned to provide for women and protect them,even at the expense of their own lives, and how men are taught the importance of soothing, wrangling, and navigating the female ego. #HeForShe, not #WeForAll. And while that has its own downsides; it did arm me with some tools I'm glad I have now. I just wish it went both ways.

So yes, family law reform, reproductive rights for men, shared parenting and yes, treatment for women's mental illness. But this also bears addressing.

I focus on women specifically because it is women who are more likely to do things like Yates and McConnell did. Forget pedophiles or strangers on the street or random kidnappers. It's the bruised ego of women that's responsible for the overwhelming majority of child murders. It's women's sense of entitlement to a life of ease, in which children are their personal possessions, to be disposed of at will. Adulthood comes with responsibilities, and children are never accountable for the problems adults have. You never kill a child.

Let us not forget that while we're teaching our girls to be independent and strong, we must teach them this too.

[Ed. note: this post originally appeared at JudgBitch.com and is reprinted here with permission.]

Female Viagra may increase false rape accusations (video)

AVfM Video Source · 1 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

One of the side effects of the new female Viagra has some troubling implications. When combined with alcohol, it can cause women to pass out. Can anyone else see a problem here? If I take a drug that increases my sexual desire, have sex, but have no memory of it ….. what can go wrong?

Subscribe to tl;dr here.

Berkeley Lab study predicts autonomous taxis by 2030

Paul Hamaker · 1 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Jeffery Greenblatt and Samveg Saxena from Lawrence Berkeley National Laboratory reported the financial and environmental benefits of autonomous taxis in the July 6, 2015 edition of the journal Nature Climate Change. The researchers found that autonomous taxis presented several benefits that rivaled human driven taxis. The additional cost of an autonomous vehicle can be justified by the savings that autonomous cars can deliver.

Self-driving taxis can produce as much as an 82 percent reduction in carbon emission over hybrids driven by humans. The reduction in emissions is 90 percent versus gasoline powered automobiles driven by humans. The National Household Travel Survey data from the Federal Highway Administration shows that an average taxi is driven about 70,000 miles per year. The mileage and the savings in fuel justify the added cost of a self-driving fleet of taxis.

One of the benefits of autonomous taxis is fitting the right sized car to each passenger. The majority of taxis carry a single occupant. An automated scheduling system could match smaller cars to single passengers and increase fuel efficiency and reduce emissions. Ride-sharing could reduce fuel consumption by an additional 2.5 percent.

The near future may see the end of the cab business as it is known today. A single individual could potentially control a huge fleet of taxis in a large city. The majority of the remaining work for a taxi company would be vehicle maintenance. The uproar in some countries over Uber may be a herald of things to come in the near future. The U. S. Department of Labor reported that 233,000 people were employed as taxi drivers in the United States in 2012.

This article is reposted with the author's permission from examiner.com.

Featured photo courtesy of Uris from Wikipedia.

Jonathan David Farley's "Modest Proposal For Black Women" leaves out a crucial factor: CLASS

Paul Elam · 1 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

"With those hooker type wears hon you're, playin' yaself

With those skin tight jeans baby you're, playin' yaself

Everything all exposed you're, playin' yaself

You're, playin' yaself, you're, playin' yaself"

-Jeru Tha Damaja

Last week's excellent column appearing on the JudgyBitch website by Oxford mathematician Jonathan David Farley (henceforth referred to as JDF), "A Modest Proposal For Black Women", was just that, excellent. After decades of a fairly one-sided "conversation" obtaining on relationship issues in the Black community, i.e., being dominated by Black women, the past few years in particular has seen a groundswell of sentiment on the part of Black men, largely aided by the rapid and ever-expanding democratizing nature of the internet, making the case that while it may be true that a goodly portion of Black men have their fair share of foibles, Black women themselves, taken together as a group, leave quite a bit to be desired when it comes to dating and forming relationships and families. It's been a longtime coming for this grizzled veteran of the Manosphere, that sector of the internet that concerns itself with mens' issues.

JDF's presentation cites what are now a matter of documented facts and are pretty much beyond a matter of dispute (except to Black women themselves – which is a huge part of the problem!) and at this point, hardly needs recounting. However, Farely overlooks a very crucial factor in the breakdown of the Black family over the past half a century that has rarely gotten the facetime it has deserved – that of Class.

You see, JDF, being a highly formally educated white collar Black professional, is not at all that different from white folks who are cut from the same cloth. As a lifelong blue-collar tradesman who began his career right out of one of Philadelphia's worst public schools and has spent a lifetime out on the bricks of the inner city, what I have consistently noticed in both the Black and white "conversations" obtaining on dating and mating in American life, is that it tends to be myopically focused on the at least nominally middle class (and more often than not, the de facto elite upper middle class). This was the point I made in a previous article, "A Blue Collar Brotha Speaks (At Last!)", where I responded to a piece originally appearing in the Atlantic. When we discuss "relationships" and "dating", the conceit is that everyone is college educated, works in an office environment and meets each other via "social networking mixers" and rigidly class (read: race) stratified dating apps like Tinder. The only time guys like me get any "airtime" at all, it's to serve as a kind of cardboard cutout scapegoat for the forelorn educated Sistas, who couldn't land their Darius and are now nearing perpetual spinster territory, or as arid academic fodder for what ails the working and lower class sections of Black American life. No one cares to actually speak to us, or give us a platform from which to be heard; and the conceit is that Black women there, our putative "assortative mating equals" as it were, are perfectly fine just as they are.

They most assuredly are not.

It is now a well-documented fact that marriage has all but totally collapsed among the working class in American life overall; Charles Murray's excellent work, "Coming Apart: The State of White America, 1960-2010", which was largely informed by a white working class neighborhood here in Philly known as Fishtown, an area I know very well, bears out this fact. But the Black American working class along these lines, is markedly worse – indeed, the bulk and mass of the oft-quoted "72% of all Black babies born out of wedlock" hails from this and lower sections of Black America, while the majority of the increasingly shrinking minority of Black marriages taking place (currently around 27%, per the US Census) is barely hanging on, with birthrates lower than the aforementioned 72%. Other facts that JDF cites in his piece with regard to Black women, are painfully in evidence in abundance in working and lower class Black America: 60% of Baby Mamas have more than one Baby Daddy; half of all Black women have Herpes (to say nothing of other STDs); Black women as a group, have a net worth of $5 USD (which raises interesting questions about all the educated Sistas out there; hmm…); and yes, four out of five Black women are clinically obese. And this is just for starters – trust me, it gets a lot worse. For guys like me – hard, steady workers who keep their noses clean and play by the rules – the women available to us are nothing like the Sistas of yesteryear.

I've learned over my years of writing that people seem to resonate more with the personal narrative than the political polemic or academic argument, so please allow me to put it this way:

At the dawn of the 1970s, my dad – who was born in the deep south during the height of Jim Crow and out and out racial discrimination, who had served in the Marine Corps in the Korean War and completed his education there (GED) and on the G.I. Bill (vo-tech school) – met my mom one fine spring day here in Philly while on the way back home to NYC where he worked as a longshoreman after a weekend of hanging out with friends. She was on her way to work as a nurse at one of North Philly's hospitals, fresh out of high school herself. In what would today be called "street harassment", my dad bust a u-turn on Broad St., pulled over, got out and approached my mom, got the digits, came back to take her out later that week; a month later, they were married and three decades later had raised five children into productive adults. Their union finally ended with his death barely a week after my 30th birthday.

My mom was regarded by one and all as bright, earnest, fun-loving, bubbly and very attractive – a "thick" "redbone" with a mane of red hair to match, I was told by those who knew her in high school that she would have to beat off the suitors with the proverbial stick. My dad was 35 when he wed her; she was 19. Despite living in the shadow of Jim Crow and very real lingering racial discrimination in the world of the union trades, my dad was able to find himself a fertile, young, pretty wife with which to build a life and family with; something worth fighting for. As dinged as the American Promise was for his generation, it was still good enough to deliver the goods when and where it mattered.

Now, fast forward to today, read, the dawn of the 21st century – the ostensibly enlightened, "post-racial" era. What are the chances that his son could replicate his example and success? We know that blue collar wages have not only remained stagnant since then, they have gone backward – and the exact same thing has happened to the available mating pool of Black women for guys like me. Today, what is available are Baby Mamas, women who have serious mental health problems (25% of all American women currently on prescribed mental health drugs), divorcees who got burned bad by Mr. Big, morbidly obese, tatted out like lifers in the joint, have really bad attitude problems, have a high chance of being infected with STDs…the list is seemingly endless. We can quibble over the "causes" of the situation – the Great Society, Roe v. Wade, the Pill, the Sexual Revolution, White (and Black!) Flight, deindustrialization, globalization, downsizing, Second (and Third) Wave Feminism(TM), the Crack Wars – but the bottomline is this:

It's people like my parents – a blue collar tradesman-turned independent contractor and a career nurse – who are the bedrock foundation of the Black community. They are the people little boys like me saw everyday. They are the ones who make a community, a community – consisting of families, and not the free-fire, all-against-all war zones like "Chiraq" and "Little Mogadishu" that so many Black cities have become. Black men like my dad will be the ones leading periodical cleanups in the neighborhood; Black men like my dad will be the ones providing a consistent, day in, day out, example of what a productive citizen looks like; Black men like my dad will be the ones to keep boys from growing up into outlaws who terrorize their own people. In my time of participating in my community's town watch after singlehandedly dispatching a quartet of knuckleheads who attacked me and my (then) lady on Valentine's Day evening a few years back, I noticed that it wasn't the Jonathan David Farelys out there with me on patrol, confronting the knuckleheads on the corner. They often live quite a comfortable distance away from such areas and in any event, have more "important" things to do. What has existed only a few decades ago during my parents' lifetime, is now all but gone – and what is on "offer" in terms of potential mates for Black men like yours truly in the hood, is hardly an inducement to fight for the “community”.

Indeed, it’s a powerful incentive to flee.

That well-heeled Brothas like JDF have now taken to the internet to give voice to these concerns, only goes to show how this tangle of pathology has metastasized to the Talented Tenth classes – evidenced by Black women’s intense interest in and steady diet of “Scandal”, “Real Housewives of Atlanta” and the like.

But for yours truly, it’s an old story at this point.

And one that no one seems to care much about.

As Shahrazad Ali has pointed out a generation ago, the Black man has always been held up for public examination and scrutiny; President Barack Obama himself has been quite keen to upbraid Black men enmasse for their real and perceived shortcomings. However, as Ali also has observed, Black women as a group, have been very much a protected class. If there is to be any hope or chance of righting the sinking ship that is Black America, serious attention needs to be given to the areas of Class and of Black women themselves.

Don’t forget to checkout Obsidian Radio – my daily podcast on YouTube! Here’s one of my latest: “What The Brothas Want”

Part 1

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=cu9v2e1aocw

Part 2

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=kGnBnLjw4uI

Seven ways to reject feminists in your dating life

August Løvenskiolds · 1 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

We're in the last month of summer now in the Northern Hemisphere, and feminists are at long last crawling out of their mud huts where they've been estivating, hiding their pallid bloat from the male gaze and getting ready to go back to school to launch their next round of rape hoaxes. This summer, the best dull whine they could muster was on the oppressive nature of air conditioning.

As a warm up for the autumn man-trapping season, feminists are working on weaponizing dating, training hard for their chance to embarrass and shame unwary men for the crime of being men.

One feminist with the unlikely name of Linda Nowak (seriously? your name is "no whack"?) is using an Instagram account called "feminist tinder" to shame men for expressing doubts that feminists are worthy of dating at all. Another, named Lea Rose Emery, has a new article up at the feminist rag Bustle entitled "7 Ways To Inject Feminism Into Your Dating Life, Because It's About Damn Time."

Charming. Let's go out, okay?

In the spirit of gender equality that feminists purport is the core of feminism, I'd like to review Lea Rose's "7 Ways" to see if they are sexist, or, if men can use them in the same fashion that feminists do.

1. Don't Be Scared Of The F Word.

I agree. Lea Rose writes "Don't be ashamed, don't even hesitate to label yourself a feminist." Likewise, a man should not hesitate to ask if his date labels herself in this way. I imagine the conversation might go something like this:

Him: So, I noticed your black leggings, combat boots and your disdain for attractive clothing and makeup. How do you feel about feminism?

Her: You just want to fuck me, don't you? That is all you pigs care about. I am SO going to report you for harassment and rape once this date is over. Why can't you love me for ME?

At this point, you should stand up and without another word, walk out of the restaurant, never to return. Safety tip: reshaping your eyebrows will make it harder for her to pick you out of the inevitable police lineup that will follow.

Note: in her article, Lea Rose actually wrote "if you're like me and more comfortable in black leggings and combat boots, that's fine too."

2. Pay your half.

I agree. Men usually consume more calories than women generally, but it is unclear that feminists follow this pattern. More calories correlates somewhat to a higher bill for the man's portions, which means that for things to be equal, men may have to starve themselves from food just like feminists seek to starve men from sex. The solution is to get some drive-thru burgers on the way to pick her up and wolf them down before you arrive. This will make the feminist feel like a blimp as you pick at your scant food while she is stuffing her face. She'll still feel bad when she eats 80% of your food while only paying half the bill – if, of course, she pays anything at all, or feels guilt at all.

3. Dress For You, Not For Them.

I agree. Nothing shows more disrespect for your date than showing up filthy and ill-dressed. Men love to be seen in public with stylish, attractive women and I imagine that women hate going out with slovenly men as well – it paints those women as cheap and well, feminist.

4. Be Straightforward.

I agree. Tell your feminist date that you absolutely hate being defrauded by women who use dates to get free meals and talk therapy, then waste your time when they don't put out sexually. If you let her know that she is both expected to pay her share of both money and sex, you'll signify that you are a no-nonsense guy who won't put up with her tedious shit nor take "no" for an answer. Chicks dig that.

5. Plan A Date

I agree. Women hate both taking responsibility and being accountable, and feminists are no exception – they'll force a man to pay 18 years of child support and deny men abortion rights by claiming "it is my body" as if years of men's financial enslavement don't involve those men's bodies at all. Feminists demand men make things easy for them. You are the stage manager, she is the audience. Never forget that.

6. Choose The Position

I agree. Lea Rose writes:

> Just like with dating, you should be dictating what happens in the bedroom some of the time. That doesn't mean you should be on top with a whip every night if that's not your thing, it just means getting what you want. If that means being submissive, that's fine— feminists can be submissive, too! It just means you making sure you're getting what you want.

Lea Rose is saying that women are entitled to use men's bodies and sexuality however women want. Equality demands that men use women in the same way, doesn't it? But seriously, Lea Rose, shouldn't women have to ask for consent from men, too? Or are you too much a female supremacist to see that?

7. Be Picky

I agree – if she is too old (even at age 22), too fat, too hirsute, too mannish, too girlish, too poor, too angry, too ugly, too sexually incontinent, or whatever, don't even bother being civil to her. Riding a moped might be fun but you don't want your buddies to see you doing it. If setting impossible standards is okay for a feminist, it is okay for a man, too.

That's equality, right?

Because dating a feminist sounds like a nightmare to me, and you should make her go through exactly the same thing.

The truth behind the Unruh Civil Rights Act lawsuit against Chic CEO and attacks against NCFM Secretary Al Rava

NCFM · 2 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Publishers note: Sharpen your pens ladies and gents. This story is gaining traction. With over 700 comments on Yahoo News, many of them supportive of NCFM we urge you to go in and make your voice heard. Thank you. – AVFM Staff

NOTE: This article follows, clarifies, and expands on an earlier article about NCFM's position on no-men-allowed business seminars, conferences, and networking events. This subject continues to capture a lot of media attention. For example, news giant Yahoo News is working on a story about NCFM's stance on these single sex commercial undertakings. Interestingly, Yahoo News reporter Alyssa Bereznak has applied for NCFM membership. This article is still a work in progress as of this posting.

Stephanie Burns, Founder, Chic CEO, on April 16, 2014 offered a women-only business event in violation of California's Unruh Civil Rights Act, three men were denied access because of their sex (gender) and a lawsuit followed.

Some of what follows concerns a related YouTube video by Ms. Burns. The video was edited for inappropriate and litigious, if not false, statements and then reposted. The discussion below uses the reposted edited version.

This article concerns (1) statements by Ms. Burns in the edited version of the video (2) other claims (3) the petition to gut the Unruh Civil Rights Act (4) Al Rava, the principle civil rights attorney involved (5) NCFM and its involvement with the Unruh Civil Rights Act (6) the media (7) a few last thoughts.

STATEMENTS BY MS. BURNS IN THE EDITED VERSION OF THE VIDEO

1. Burns says Chic CEO "is a resource for female entrepreneurs. Anyone can use Chic CEO but we do focus on women." Ms. Burns impresses upon viewers that Chic CEO has male advisers, mentors, clients, men at their events, male speakers at their conferences, men in their brain trust, men are interviewed in over half of her podcasts, and she truly believes men are the next trend in female entrepreneurship. "Clearly, we don't discriminate against men… we had a networking mixer for women…"

Though NCFM is not involved with the lawsuit against Ms. Burns and Chic CEO, related news stories involved us. Thus, by comparison, anyone can use the resources of NCFM's web and social networking sites, though we focus on men's rights. Since 1977, in one capacity or another, NCFM has had women on its Board of Directors, on its Executive Board, Advisory Board, in chapters as chapter presidents, as mentors, speakers at conferences, outreach and education workers, and in many other capacities, including at least one founding member, and our national treasure(r) is named Deborah.

Clearly, Chic CEO discriminated against the men turned away at the door from the April 2014 networking mixer for women, regardless of whether Ms. Burns or Chic CEO are otherwise male friendly.

2. Burns says, the "men came uninvited, we were already over capacity, and I got that weird feeling in my stomach. So, I turned them away."

The men reserved spots at the event by prepaying in advance and received a confirmation email from Ms. Burns (see email receipt directly below). Ms. Burns knew the men were coming, she was "looking forward to seeing" them at the event, not only had they prepaid, their names were on the

Chic CEO just sent you a refund

Apr 17, 2014 17:21:09 PDT
Transaction ID: 1CA20910KA2940459

Dear Allan Candelore,

Chic CEO just sent you a full refund of $20.00 USD for your purchase.

If you have any questions about this refund, please contact Chic CEO.

The refund will go to your PayPal account.

To see all the transaction details, please log into your PayPal account. It may take a few moments for this transaction to appear in your account.

Merchant information
Chic CEO
hello@chic-ceo.com
http://www.chic-ceo.com

Note from merchant
None provided

Original transaction details

Description	Unit price	Qty	Amount
Event Attendance: Chic CEO San Diego SAVVY on Wed Apr 16, 2014, 6:00 PM at Solare Lounge Group: Chic CEO, Event: San Diego SAVVY on Wed Apr 16, 2014, 6:00 PM at Solare Lounge (#77)	$20.00 USD	1	$20.00 USD
		Total:	$20.00 USD
		Refund to PayPal Balance:	$20.00 USD

guest list. The men were clearly invited (see the next email below from Ms. Burns).

From: Stephanie Burns <stephanie@chic-ceo.com>
Date: Sun, Apr 13, 2014 at 6:53 PM
Subject: See you Wednesday!
To: [redacted]

Hey there ~

Wednesday evening is our April San Diego SAVVY (4/16/14) at Solare Lounge in Liberty Station! We've got some amazing women signed up to attend and this venue is beautiful. San Diego SAVVY is a fun, ladies-only, networking mixer to help you expand your network and meet like-minded women.

A complimentary drink and tray passed appetizers make this event a great way to kick off Spring!

When: April 16th 6-8 PM • Solare Lounge, 2820 Roosevelt Rd • San Diego, CA 92106

RSVP Here

Please let me know if you have any questions or if there are any specific introductions I can help with - looking forward to seeing you April 16th!!

Cheers,
Stephanie Burns
Founder, Chic CEO

The event was not overcapacity. Women were entering while the men were there. There are pictures of one of the men standing at the entrance as other woman were preparing to enter the event. One of the men while talking with and being turned away by Ms. Burns watched another woman enter the event, two other women were in line behind him while another women signed something at the check-in table. The two other men watched two women enter the event while talking with and being turned away by Ms. Burns.

Moreover, the “weird feeling” assertion calls into question the “over capacity” claim.

3. Burns says that whether it was legal or illegal to turn the men away she “will always be firm in that I was right” and she would make the same decision since her “loyalty” lies with the women who attended and need a “safe” and “comfortable” place to network.

Our loyalty and focus lies with all the citizens of California who deserve a safe place to live free of discrimination because of their sex (gender). The men would do it again since their loyalty is to the people of California and not a few people at a networking event that illegally discriminates against California’ citizens based on their sex (gender).

Ms. Burns’ insinuation that the men would have made the event less safe is ridiculous, insulting, purely speculative and sexist.

Whether allowing men to attend would make the women uncomfortable is similarly speculative and subjective. No one will know the truth since Ms. Burns turned the men away. However, the men felt uncomfortable by being shunned publicly in front of others for no real reason other than being men.

4. Based on the mens’ claims and similar lawsuits Ms. Burns said she does not believe the men were at the event to truly network.

Again, regardless of what she believes, Ms. Burns will never know whether the men were at the event to truly network because she refused to let them in. However, we do know that the men prepaid to attend the event, and they would have attended the event if not turned away by Ms. Burns.

5. She asserts, “Because Chic CEO helps women does not mean we hurt men.”

All Californians who truly believe in equality were hurt by turning the men away at the door, especially all Californian men. We know there are many well-meaning, decent, and caring people in the state, who have diligently fought for civil rights, who would be equally hurt had their sons, husbands, fathers, uncles, nephews, grandsons, and other men they cared about, been similarly discriminated against.

6. Burns says, “Men are a very big part of what we do and we need men to help us close the pay gap, end violence against us, and help us in our quest for equality.”

The pay gap and violence against “us” have nothing to do with the event but the issue of “equality” certainly does. Regardless, the plethora of real social science research (versus groundless “advocacy research”) firmly establishes that (1) men suffer substantially more violence than women and (2) only a minute amount of the pay gap may be due to sex discrimination. Those knowledgeable in the pay gap debate also understand that it works in favor of women in many high paying soft job occupations. Making such a statement, turning men away from the event, treating them like second-class citizens, is bizarrely hypocritical and without question unequal.

Additionally, women are a disproportionate majority in health, education, finance, social services, and other well-paying soft-job occupations. Women typically earn more than do men in social services, industrial engineering, art history, all other engineering disciplines, construction and business analytics, among other soft-job occupations. Surely, networking mixers to encourage more men to take part in those fields are needed, but not at the exclusion of women, which would be counterproductive, increase the divide between men and women, and is illegal in California, and rightly so.

7. Burns went on, “In no way shape or form does anyone in my company have an attitude of us versus them.”

This appears to be an unnecessary misdirectional insinuation. Neither do any of the three men, nor does Attorney Rava or NCFM have an attitude of us versus them, unless as it applies to those who indignantly demand special privilege for no good reason other than their sex (gender).

8. For some odd reason Ms. Burns takes a strong exception with the use of disabled Veterans in the complaint against her. She says, “…the term disabled Veterans does not apply to just men and it’s quite offensive in and of itself. There are many many disabled Veterans that are women and I hope these individuals never use that term to describe only men again."

We all are keenly aware many female Veterans are disabled; regrettably, some have also lost their lives. That said, the complaint deliberately has the term "disabled combat veterans from the Iraq and Afghanistan wars." The Pentagon had not approved women in combat roles during those wars, which in no way suggests that other military women in those conflicts were not injured or killed.

One of the complainants in this case is a disabled Veteran; two served in the military, and two of the three are Board Members of a Veteran's organization of which all three are founding members. In fact, another founding board member is a retired female Army Major. No Veterans are turned away from our programs, services, and events based on their sex (gender), a truth Ms. Burns and Chic CEO can never share.

If Ms. Burns served in the military, we thank her for her service, but not for turning away those who served, especially the disabled male Veteran (which was demeaning and stressful, triggered a PTSD episode, and was quite offensive in and of itself).

9. Burns says that she felt shocked, heartbroken and bullied by the lawsuit. She then again talked of the importance of men in fostering innovation, fixing our economy, and building a better business culture. "Men are really, really important for what we do."

Ms. Burns could have avoided being shocked, heartbroken and bullied had she let the men in. In fact, had she done so, there would be no need for any of this. Good things could have happened. All of us may have benefited. Chic CEO and organizations with which the men are involved could have developed working relationships. Allowing the men to take part could have moved us forward toward a better more inclusive business culture while creating other opportunities, including fostering innovation and maybe even fixing our economy. None of that happened, not because the invited prepaid men came to the event, but because Ms. Burns turned them away. The fact is, shunning the men detracted from the goals of Chic CEO as stated by Ms. Burns in her YouTube video (both and either of them).

- At the end of the video, Ms. Burns asks that listeners sign a petition to revise the Unruh Civil Rights Act because it "was designed to fight real discrimination and not to be exploited against minorities."

In reality, the Unruh Civil Rights Act applies to all Californians, and has since its inception. Turning the men away from the event was real discrimination. No minorities were exploited, though a minority owned business was held accountable for violating the law. Members of a protected class have no special license to discriminate against anyone similarly protected or not.

OTHER CLAIMS

1. In one or more related news articles, or elsewhere, Ms. Burns apparently claimed the men arrived late:

One of the men, who prepaid to reserve space, arrived early while the ticket sales table was being set up. The two other men who prepaid arrived shortly afterwards while other women were entering, signing in and or purchasing tickets ($25 at the door). There are time stamped photos taken when two of the men arrived (which was after the first man. We are not publishing the photos because of safety concerns).

2. In one or more related news articles, or elsewhere, Ms. Burns reportedly claimed the men were dressed inappropriately, if not shoddily.

The men came in the cloths they wear during their normal business day, as apparently did women attending the after work event. The men knew of no published dress code for the event. All of the men had attended many other similar events in similar attire and never been turned away. They knew of no reason to dress differently.

In sum, the men prepaid to reserve space for the event, they were invited, the event was not over capacity, and they were not late or inappropriately dressed. The men were specifically denied attendance because it was a women only event and because they are men.

THE PETITION

The landing page of the petition shows, "WOMEN VC Stand up and Stand Out," subtitle "PROTECT WOMEN ENTREPRENEAURS AND COMMUNITIES FROM "EQUALITY-SEEKERS."

Under "Timeline," there is an August 7 appeal that says exactly, "There are a lot of businesses running and supporting female-only goods and services. All of them may be attacked for discriminating men under Unruh Civil Rights Act. LET'S MAKE A CHANGE!"

Whoever wrote that surely meant to say selling goods and services only to women. Either way, we disagree. Most businesses do not discriminate against anyone, they are busy trying to make a profit selling their goods and services to whomever will buy them. There are tens of thousands of businesses in California, the sheer number of which makes the dramatic statement meaningless.

The petition says exactly, "Just recently, Stephanie Burns, CEO of Chic CEO, an online resource for female entrepreneurs — bringing how-to information, tools and community to women starting businesses, has finished up settling a lawsuit with men on violating their civil rights for not letting them enter the overbooked event for women entrepreneurs."

The petition accurately states the event was for women but incorrectly states the event was overbooked, as proven above. Julian L. Zegelman, at the law firm of Velton Zegelman P.C., is shown on the women.vc website as Women VC's attorney for this matter, but Mr. Zegelman told attorney Rava that was not true, that he is not Women VC's attorney for this matter. Clearly, issues exist with the creators of the website and petition.

As of 4:40 p.m., August 24, 2015 there were 96 comments on the petition page. Many supported the petition for reasons like "patriarchal bullying is infuriating to me, this kind of lawsuit is a waste of time, I'm outraged, it is important to stand up for what's right," and, my favorite, "People like Al Rava and Harry Crotch [sic] need to be stopped."

It is never a waste of time to stand up for what is right or to stand against outrageously bullying Me-ism. Well meaning people like Mr. Rava, I, and many others will not stop, we will stand tall for equal rights as long as we breathe. People, who support this petition, oppose equal treatment. In the bold capped letters at the top of the petition page, it says women and communities need protection from "EQUALITY SEEKERS." Unbelievable! Is the future you want, for you and your loved ones, one of inequality, separate but equal, men versus women?

Fortunately, many of the comments at the petition site offered supporting rationale for our position. Here are a few:

"Discrimination is wrong even if a women is discriminating against men. Burns turned away struggling male entrepreneurs because she said that only women need a women only place and don't feel safe to share if men are around. Feminist attorney Gloria Allred has made millions off of busting "Men's Only Clubs" now women have their own clubs and don't want to share success secrets with men. It is only fair and in the spirit of equality that gender should not be an issue anymore. Feminism has no place with equality, it is oppression of men and it causes divisiveness between genders," by Robert Collins.

How is "women-only networking" not discrimination? It seems these days feminists are all about gender supremacism rather than equality," by GS A "Seriously, ladies? I'm an older woman who fought for those rights back in the 60s and 70s, not so you could be apart but so you could be part of. Not so you could exclude men, but so you could be included. Not so you could have special rights, so you could have the same rights. Public forums are "PUBLIC", you can't exclude anyone, nor should you. If you're doing a good job and your events are over-subscribed, that's great. Hold it in a bigger venue or hold more of the them, don't break the same laws, we fought so hard to get for the benefit of all," by rstsummers.

"You don't get to change the equality laws just because you want to given women discriminatory support. The laws exist for a reason. To stop people like you, from putting one gender over another," by Susan Bridge.

"Equal access means a just and fair society where opportunity knows no boundaries," by Deanna Kosaraju.

"I am a Pi Beta Phi sister to Stephanie and fellow new entrepreneur with Secret Direct outside of being a professional occupational therapist and mother. I love working with both men and women, but there is something to be said for the sisterhood of creating equality between the sexes," by Rebecca Rieker.

ATTORNEY AL RAVA

National Coalition of Men Secretary Al Rava, Esq. has been largely responsible for stopping discrimination against men in the California at great risk to his safety, health, and profession. Al has been subjected to threats, undue criticism and ridicule because of his unrelenting stand against the discrimination of men in public accommodations. Mr. Rava is a true civil rights advocate and hero.

Over the last 15 or so years, Mr. Rava, on behalf of many others, filed over 150 lawsuits against businesses wrongly discriminating against men and women. Several of the lawsuits resulted in landmark court decisions that clarified and or established related laws. Aside from those lawsuits, Mr. Rava on behalf on NCFM has sent many letters to California businesses or governmental agencies advising them that several California laws prohibit discriminatory treatment of men and women.

Typically, such businesses charged male consumers more than female consumers for the same goods or services, or excluded male consumers – all based solely on the consumers' sex. While there were a few repeat offenders, over time, all the businesses sued or sent letters stopped their illegal discrimination. Those who complain wrongly believe that discrimination based on gender is acceptable.

To paraphrase Mr. Rava, his clients and other California attorneys, through their successful works with the California Legislature, the Governor, the California Department of Justice, Department of Fair Employment & Housing ("DFEH") and other California administrative agencies, and the California courts, have almost put an end to the proliferation of sex-based promotions and events by California businesses that charged consumers different prices for the same goods or services, or that excluded one sex or the other – all based solely on the consumer's sex, which was a huge undertaking and huge civil rights victory.

See, the press release by the Consumer Attorneys of California calling Mr. Rava's victory at the California Supreme Court in the landmark Unruh Civil Rights Act case of Angelucci v Supper Club 41 Cal 4th 160. "a significant civil rights victory." Angelucci held that women, people of color, members of the LGBT community, and other discrimination victims did not have to first confront the discriminating business and affirmatively assert their right to equal treatment in order to have standing to file an Unruh Civil Rights Act claim. Also is a Gaming Establishment Adisory Letter by former California Attorney General Jerry Brown about the illegality of no-men-allowed poker tournaments, and a DFEH brochure about the illegality of Ladies' Night promotions in California – both of which Mr. Rava was instrumental in getting published.

Mr. Rava also represented women in Unruh Civil Rights Act sex discrimination cases; for example, in a class action lawsuit pending in Los Angeles County Superior Court against a Tony Roma's restaurant for its recurring sex-based pricing promotion, as the complaint includes women and men as the putative class members.

NCFM AND THE UNRUH CIVIL RIGHTS ACT

In the original version of this article, I wrote that NCFM has never filed an Unruh Civil Rights Act lawsuit, which is incorrect. Marc Angelucci, another of our attorneys and NCFM Vice President, later explained that years ago NCFM was a plaintiff in at least one lawsuit, maybe two, though we ended up dismissing the lawsuits early on.

Regardless, NCFM has never filed an Unruh Civil Rights Act lawsuit under my signature as NCFM President. Although under my signature along with Mr. Rava's guidance, we have sent advisory letters to various businesses. They were not threats as has been suggested more than once. We had great success with this approach.

We sent a letter to All Nippon Airlines when it proposed women-only restrooms on their airplanes. We received a thank you letter and APA rescinded the proposal.

Another letter was sent to the Professional Golf Association (PGA) when it offered a women-only luncheon during a major golf tournament, which featured San Diego County District Attorney Bonnie Dumanis as the featured speaker. Ironically, Ms. Dumanis is the county's chief law enforcement officer. I received a phone call from a PGA attorney who seemed amused and appreciative. I keep forgetting to find his name and call him for a donation since we may have saved the PGA considerable aggravation. We saved Ms. Dumanis embarrassment too. The event became gender inclusive and to our knowledge, no other PGA event in California has since offered a women-only event during a PGA tournament.

Another letter went to the promoter of a women-only bicycle ride event, a letter that the promoters exploited. The promoters vilified us, garnered more recognition for their event, and caused childish threats against us. They were in no way publically appreciative for saving them from possible liability. Nevertheless, we have not heard of a later women-only bicycle ride in California.

Most recently, we sent a letter to the City of Glendale on publicly funded self-defense classes for women-only, wherein many people agreed with our position, including the Glendale News Press Editorial Board. The city begrudgingly offered a class for men. Both men and women are victims of violence, men more so than women, so both sexes benefit from such training.

To my knowledge, every business sued or sent a letter stopped the unlawful discrimination, which is a good thing. Not only that, many are appreciative.

Some have said that NCFM and its members have been involved with Unruh Civil Rights Act or other lawsuits against self-defense classes, free mammograms, or businesses offering gifts to women on "Mother's Day," which is false. Nor has there been a Unruh Civil Rights Act lawsuit against, or a letter directed at, anyone for providing free mammograms on Mother's Day or on any other day. To my knowledge, no member of NCFM has ever been involved in any related lawsuit.

One of our Board Members noted, "… the Unruh Civil Rights Act was big in the 70's, when all kinds of lawsuits were filed against dry cleaners, haircut places, etc. for businesses discriminating against women. Where was this outrage and name calling then against women's rights like there is here against Mr. Rava, the Unruh Civil Rights Act, and to some degree NCFM?"

THE MEDIA

Ms. Burns generated some sympathetic media attention resulting in a few articles primarily targeted at NCFM Secretary Al Rava. Reporters have thus far sympathized with Ms. Burns. Regardless, even good reporters cannot report the truth if they do not know what it is. Unfortunately, the misrepresentations explained above, ideology and advocacy journalism seem to have discolored the articles linked below.

The links to articles at the end of this article are from worse to better, the first worse being from rawstory.com. Unfortunately, such articles bring out anonymous man-hater commentators who know nothing about our issues, think all women are victims of something or other, and could care less whether men are poorly treated. Such ignorance is disheartening and turns unduly ugly by those resorting to violence or name-calling. At one point, Raw Story deleted comments by Allen Candelore, one of the plaintiffs! Mr. Candelore rigorously refuted many of the misandric comments with common sense, courtesy, facts and the truth. He was open to the fact he was a plaintiff and pointed out the article was misleading, which may be why his comments were deleted.

On August 24, 2015, Mr. Rava sent the Raw Story an email explaining that their article contained numerous false statements. Raw Story responded with, "We have taken this story offline for the time being until we can research your claims further." As of this typing, the URL garners "Page Not Found – The page you are looking for doesn't seem to exist."

FINAL THOUGHTS

It is absurd in this day and age – when women are self-defense trainers, police officers, Army Rangers, judges, US Senators, mayors, scientists, astronauts, corporate leaders and thrive in other demanding occupations – to believe men and women cannot be safe, comfortable and benefit from each other in business social networking mixers in broad daylight at an upscale restaurant. Holding one-sex-only events is against the best interests of the citizens of California, contrary to sound public policy and law, and is otherwise offensive.

Moreover, Attorney Rava and the three men through their lawsuit are the catalyst that brought awareness to Chic CEO Clients who should now know it is illegal in California for businesses to discriminate against persons because of their sex (gender).

It is truly unfortunate that one business owner who wrongly discriminated against men (and a few unaffected sympathetic followers) want to dismantle a law that protects all California citizens from undue discrimination. Reverting to entitlement driven Me-ism is not good business practice or sound public policy.

We strongly support anyone's right to petition the government for their grievances. In fact, NCFM was instrumental several years ago in changing California law to prevent paternity fraud. We spent much time over the past two years promoting paternity-fraud reform legislation in Washington too. Several of our members are deeply involved with discrimination against men and their right to redress on college campuses and in the military. For decades, we have been active with reform issues about child welfare and relationship violence. We have a pending appellate case against the Selective Service System for failure to require women to register.

The online petition is another irrational, emotion driven, divide and conquer giant step backwards. Allow me a little creative license please, be forewarned, some amongst us don't much like "EQUALITY-SEEKERS." As President of NCFM, I will do my utmost to continue seeking fair treatment for all of us. I trust you will too. As another of our Advisers just reminded me, "Equality should mean equal rights and opportunities for both genders but also equal responsibilities and consequences for breaking the law."

https://www.rawstory.com/2015/08/lawyer-who-attacked-anti-male-breast-cancer-event-sues-over-womens-business-conference/comments/#disqus

AVFM Note: The Raw Story article has been taken off line. Our sources indicate that they took it down after being challenged on the many falsehoods and inaccuracies printed therein. AVFM is suprised, not at lies from Raw Story, but at the fact that they backed down. More on this to come.

http://mic.com/articles/123758/3-men-s-rights-activists-sued-for-being-denied-entry-to-a-female-entrepeneurs-conference

http://money.cnn.com/2015/08/11/technology/mens-rights-activist-chic-ceo/index.html?iid=hp-stack-dom

NOTE: first published 8/12/2015. It has been revised, and may be revised several more times as this story develops or dies.

Note To Christelyn Karazin: If "Crummy Mummy" Don't Apply, Let It Fly

Paul Elam · 2 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

"If you're a bitch, you're probably not going to like us. If you're a ho, you probably don't like us. If you're not a ho or a bitch, don't be jumping to the defense of these despicable females. Just like I shouldn't be jumping to the defense of no punks or no cowards or no slimy son of a bitches that's men. I never understood why an upstanding lady would even think we're talking about her."
-Ice Cube

Even though it's been nearly six years since I embarked on my journey to be a mens' issues blogger, commentator and more recently Internet podcaster, I continue to be amazed and at turns, fascinated, by the level and degree of response my humble missives elicit from the varying sectors of the reading public. Who knew that my musings on the current events of the day would reach the eyeballs of "swirling expert", one Ms. Christelyn Karazin, of Beyond Black & White fame herself? Imagine my pleasant surprise to stumble on her Aug 7 response to my Aug 3 article that was published at both A Voice for Men and SotomayorTV.com, entitled "Black America's "Crummy Mummy" Problem". In her own article, called "Hey Single Black Moms, "White Women Raise Better Sons Than You Do.", Ms. Karazin laments:

> "Le sigh. I just don't know where to go with this, but just to once again remind you to get the phuck out of the dysfunctional sections of the black community committed to blaming black women for absolutely everything.
>
> An article came up on my timeline called, "Black America's Crummy Mummy Problem," published in a men's rights blog that celebrates, of all people, Tommy Sotomayor. While you might want to initially dismiss this article as tripe, note that this is a black man writing about how shitty black women are to an multiracial audience, thus further attempt to sully our collective reputation and scare off non-black men. Once again, the section of the community to has utter hatred and disdain for us is screaming from the rooftops that we are inherently inferior to white women. Who else is over it?!"

Not you apparently, Ms. Karazin – "Le sigh", indeed. For the record, Black women in America circa 2015 do not need yours truly's "help" to "sully" their reputations or "dissuade" non-Black men from messing with them – the facts speak for themselves. And trust me, they don't acquit Black women, as a group now, very well at all. That this so deeply vexes you to the point that you were moved to write about the matter on your own blog – a website that is supposedly devoted to Black women who are above the fracas of problems of everyday Black American life and wish to avail themselves of a better life (i.e., being with a White man), the question begs itself as to how and why you would be so bothered by anything any Black man had to say about any Black woman, let alone such ladies as yourself, right?

Right?

The truly fascinating thing about Karazin's rant in column form, is that she doesn't deny the facts I presented in my piece, which was itself based on yet another piece written by Ms. Janet Bloomfield and which shared the results of a recent study done on the question of how and why White moms did a better job of raising Black boys into productive, contributing and most importantly, law-abiding adults, than Black moms do. Karazin doesn't deny the fact that Black women have more abortions than any other racial or ethnic group of women in American life, regardless of SES, educational level, etc; she doesn't deny the fact that Black boys coming from Black mother-led homes have markedly lower levels of educational achievement (while also having much higher levels of school disciplinarian issues), which include a smaller vocabulary, lower cognitive development and higher levels of violence and antisocial behavior; and Karazin doesn't challenge the fact that the glaring common denominator of Black America's "Little Mogadishus" and "Chiraqs" are the overwhelming prevalence of Black Baby Mamas; nor does she deny my argument that much of this has been brought about as a direct result of machinations of ideological (White) feminism. No, she doesn't deny any of this – instead, she head-scratchingly poses the following gas-lighting question:

> "Wait a minute. If black women are getting all these abortions, how is that related to the assertion that black women do a terrible job raising their sons? I mean, if we're so bad, then why aren't these people glad we're not creating even MORE sons who hate our guts?"

Oh come now, Ms. Karazin – you cannot possibly be serious, right? Just scroll above to the facts I've laid out, it's all there. That Black boys lag so far behind other children in American life, points undeniably to very real problems in the ability of Black moms, especially (but by no means solely limited to) single ones, to effectively raise productive citizens. And, since you want to know, the reason why people like yours truly makes such a big deal out of the fact that Black women get so many abortions, is because of the cavalier approach so many them take toward human life itself, especially in light of what we now know about Planned Parenthood, to say nothing of the "House of Horrors" scandal involving murderous abortionist Dr. Kermit Gosnell right here in Philly a few years back (and which involved, on both sides, largely Black women).

But wait, there's more! Not to be outdone, Ms. Karazin then poses the next incredulous statement:

> "Unbelievable that black women are being blamed for gang violence, drug overdoses, high school drop out rates and moon spots while virtually no light at all is being shed on black man culpability. It is utterly insane."

No, what is unbelievably insane is how utterly clueless – or disengenuous – you truly are to even fix your mouth to say what you just did above. For nearly eight years straight, President Barack Obama has been banging the drum for Black male accountability on the "deadbeat daddy" front – lecturing, excoriating, relelentlessly, from his bully pulpit, from candidate to second term POTUS. He's finger-wagged at newly minted grads of Morehouse in a way that is hard to see him doing the same to the grads of Spelman. He's gone on record in addressing the perfidy of missing baby daddies in his State of the Union addresses. Nor is he alone: as Prof. Kathryn Edin has made clear in her work "Doing the Best I Can: Fatherhood in the Inner City", lawmakers have a particular penchant for gunning for deadbeat daddies:

> "Across the political spectrum, from conservatives like former U.S. education secretary William Bennett to President Barack Obama, unwed fatherhood is denounced as one of the leading social problems of our day. These men are irresponsible, so the story goes. They hit and then run—run away, selfishly flee, act like boys rather than men. According to these portrayals, such men are interested in sex, not fatherhood. When their female conquests come up pregnant, they quickly flee the scene, leaving the expectant mother holding the diaper bag. Unwed fathers, you see, simply don't care.
>
> About a decade before we began our exploration of the topic, the archetype of this "hit and run" unwed father made a dramatic media debut straight from the devastated streets of Newark, N.J., in a 1986 CBS special report, The Vanishing Family: Crisis in Black America. The program's host, Great Society liberal Bill Moyers, promised viewers a vivid glimpse into the lives of the real people behind the evermounting statistics chronicling family breakdown.
>
> But by far the most sensational aspect of the documentary—the segment referenced by almost every review, editorial, and commentary following the broadcast—was the footage of Timothy McSeed. As the camera zooms in on McSeed and Moyers on a Newark street corner, the voiceover reveals that McSeed has fathered six children by four different women. "I got strong sperm," he says, grinning into the camera. When Moyers asks why he doesn't use condoms, he scoffs, "Girls don't like them things." Yet Timothy says he doesn't worry about any pregnancies that might result. "If a girl, you know, she's having a baby, carryin' a baby, that's on her, you know? I'm not going to stop my pleasures."

Moyers then takes us back several weeks to the moment when Alice Johnson delivers Timothy's sixth child. McSeed dances around the delivery room with glee, fists raised in the air like a victorious prizefighter. "I'm the king!" he shouts repeatedly. Later, Timothy blithely admits to Moyers that he doesn't support any of his children. When pressed on this point, he shrugs, grins, and offers up the show's most quoted line: "Well, the majority of the mothers are on welfare, [so] what I'm not doing the government does."

The impact of The Vanishing Family was immediate and powerful, creating an almost instantaneous buzz in the editorial columns of leading newspapers. In the week after the broadcast, CBS News received hundreds of requests for tapes of the show, including three from U.S. senators. The California public schools created a logjam when they tried to order a copy for each of the 7,500 schools in their system. "It is the largest demand for a CBS News product we've ever had," marveled senior vice president David Fuchs.

The response to Timothy McSeed was particularly intense and visceral. An editorialist in the Washington Post could barely contain his outrage, writing, "One man Moyers talked to had six children by four different women. He recited his accomplishments with a grin you wanted to smash a fist into." William Raspberry's brother-in-law wrote the noted columnist that the day after viewing the program, he drove past a young black couple and found himself reacting with violent emotion. "I was looking at a problem, a threat, a catastrophe, a disease. Suspicion, disgust and contempt welled up within me." But it was George Will who reached the heights of outraged rhetoric in his syndicated column, declaring that "the Timothies are more of a menace to black progress than the Bull Connors ever were."

The Vanishing Family went on to win every major award in journalism. Those commenting publicly on the broadcast were nearly unanimous in their ready acceptance of Timothy as the archetype of unmarried fatherhood. Congressional action soon followed: In May 1986 Senator Bill Bradley proposed the famous Bradley Amendment, the first of several of "deadbeat dad" laws aimed at tightening the screws on unwed fathers who fell behind on their child support, even if nonpayment was due to unemployment or incarceration. Only a lone correspondent from Canada's Globe and Mail offered a rebuttal, fuming that Timothy "could have been cast by the Ku Klux Klan: you couldn't find a black American more perfectly calculated to arouse loathing, contempt and fear."

Bill Moyers's interest in the black family was not new. In 1965, two decades before The Vanishing Family was first broadcast, Daniel Patrick Moynihan, then assistant secretary of labor for President Lyndon Johnson, penned the now-infamous report, titled The Negro Family: The Case for National Action. Moynihan claimed that due to the sharp increase in out-of-wedlock childbearing—a condition affecting only a small fraction of white children but one in five African Americans at the time—the black family, particularly in America's inner cities, was nearing what he called "complete breakdown." Moynihan was labeled a racist for his views, and Moyers, then an assistant press secretary to the president, helped manage the controversy.

Now, a half century after the Moynihan report was written, and two-and-a-half decades since Moyer's award-winning broadcast, nearly three in ten American children live apart from their fathers. Divorce played a significant role in boosting these rates in the 1960s and 1970s, but by the mid-1980s, when Timothy McSeed shocked the nation, the change was being driven solely by increases in unwed parenthood. About four in every ten (41 percent) American children in 2008 were born outside of marriage, and, like Timothy's six children, they are disproportionately minority and poor. A higher portion of white fathers have kids outside of marriage (29 percent) than black fathers did in Moynihan's time, but rates among blacks and Hispanics have also grown dramatically—to 56 and 73 percent respectively. And the gap between unskilled Americans and the educated elite is especially wide. Here, the statistics are stunning: only about 6 percent of college-educated mothers' births are nonmarital versus 60 percent of those of high school dropouts.

In the wake of this dramatic increase in so-called fatherless families, public outrage has grown and policy makers have responded. In the 1960s and 1970s liberals worked to help supplement the incomes of single mothers, who were disproportionately poor, while conservatives balked, believing this would only reward those who put motherhood before marriage and would thus lead to more such families. Meanwhile, surly taxpayers > increasingly demanded answers as to why their hard-earned dollars were going to support what many saw as an immoral lifestyle choice and not an unavoidable hardship. This taxpayer sentiment fueled Ronald Reagan's efforts to sharply curtail welfare benefits in the 1980s and prompted Bill Clinton's promise to "end welfare as we know it," which he fulfilled in 1996.

>
> Scholars have responded to the trend by devoting a huge amount of attention to studying single-parent families, detailing the struggles of the parents and documenting the deleterious effects on the children. These studies have offered the American public a wealth of knowledge about the lives of the mothers and their progeny, yet they have told us next to nothing about the fathers of these children.
>
> The conventional wisdom spun by pundits and public intellectuals across the political spectrum blames the significant difficulties that so many children born to unwed parents face—poor performance in school, teen pregnancy and low school-completion rates, criminal behavior, and difficulty securing a steady job—on their fathers' failure to care. The question that first prompted our multiyear exploration into the lives of inner-city, unmarried fathers is whether this is, in fact, the case."

So, and in response to your "moon spot" (WTF?!?!?) reference above, the truth is out there, Ms. Karazin – but somehow I don't get the impression you really want to hear it.

Which brings us, finally, to the burning question: why do you care about what I – a blue collar, trade unionist, inner city dwelling Brotha – has to say about anything? By your argument, not only am I "damaged beyond repair", you are clearly a better class of person, who has succeeded in landing your White Prince Charming and is in the process of showing and proving to other Sistas how they can land their Mr. Charlie, too. What's it to you to be bothered about anything I or any other Brotha (read: Sotomayor) has to say about you or those like you? After all, by all accounts, you're a pretty good mom, right? So, what's the big deal? Why the need to go off the swirling reservation to write an article that has garnered, last time I checked, upwards of 300(!) comments? I'm NOT talking about you, or your readers, right? None of you are "Crummy Mummies" – right?

Right?

Of course, these are rhetorical questions I'm posing; I know why what I'm saying here bothers Karazin. As a brand ambassador for one of the country's largest "swirling" dating outfits, the idea of image is hugely important to her, and she's very well aware of the very real "public relations" problem Black women writ large have. Hey, I can dig it – so, since Ms. Karazin has demonstrated a keen interest in what I think, I'm gonna do her and all other aspiring Swirling Sistas out there a solid with the following advice:

Instead of trying to ape your White sisters by stamping your feet and going "Marsha, Marsha, Marsha!" in reaction to the facts, why not address said facts instead? How about focusing on being, you know, good mothers to your kids, especially your (Black) sons? How about actually, you know, having intense, 300-plus comment discussion threads, about how to be better moms? While "No Wedding, No Womb" was a good start, I think you would agree with me, Christelyn, that a lot more needs to be done to get Black women as a group back on track so they can be credible candidates for marriage to all the Seths, Joshuas and Bens out there just waiting on bended knee for great gals like you, right?

The truth often hurts, Chris – but if taken to heart, it can do wonders in helping one to improve. Who knows, maybe one day a Sista can raise the next President of the United States.

Right?

Don't forget to checkout Obsidian Radio, my daily podcast on YouTube! Here's more on what I had to say about Christelyn Karazin: Part 1 & Part 2

Breaking: Lauren Southern to invade a women's studies class

August Løvenskiolds · 3 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Libertarian iconoclast and blonde Canadian hottie Lauren Southern has just released a short video on YouTube documenting her efforts to go undercover and infiltrate a Women's Studies class at an unnamed (as yet) Canadian University. The video, entitled "SJW Starter Pack" shows her tossing out her cosmetics, removing and burning her bra, and, horrors, cutting her beautiful tresses into hideous feminist clown hair. (Gotta show solidarity and discourage that toxic male gaze.)

To keep up with all the drama as it develops, you can subscribe to Lauren's channel here.

If you've never heard of Lauren, she has a history of engaging feminist slutwalks in Vancouver and Edmonton. She slapped down her own Libertarian party when they tried to silence her anti-feminism and she has even interviewed a transwoman MRA, fracturing the bogus claim that MRAs are hostile to trans folk for being trans folk. (We're not; trans people, by their very existence, destroy the feminist contention that gender is socially constructed and meaningless rather than innate. They also prove that femininity and masculinity matter a lot – another feminist bugaboo.)

It is interesting to speculate what will happen to Lauren when she shows up to class. If she stays quiet, she'll likely be accused of menacing the women (but not the men, of course) in the class, and if she speaks out (as is more likely) she will instantly be accused of "hate speech" and "harassment," then charges will be filed against her with the university authorities.

What is interesting is that, if Lauren files charges first, even if she invents them out of whole cloth, she'll be protected from "retaliation" – the same charges filed by others against her. It is literally and figuratively a race to the campus authorities and the first one wins in such cases: if, say, you wanted to sexually harass someone on campus, accuse your target of some imagined slight first, and then, any action they try to take against you will be stopped cold as a forbidden "retaliation" affront.

Feminists are well versed in this tactic, which is why they jump to accuse first with the wildest, most outlandish rape hoaxes ever.

Anyway, stay tuned to Lauren's YouTube channel. She thinks she will be outed within seconds during her first class, which may result in some premature eject-ulation and other hostile acts against her, but it should be a great show however it goes down.

MGTOW: A worldwide boycott of marriage

Tim Patten · 4 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW) is a worldwide phenomenon, based on a philosophy of gaining control over a man's personal freedom and future. MGTOW is a lifestyle that frees men from patriarchal traditions regarding expectations for dating and marriage. It liberates men from a life of tiresome labor, waste of personal resources, and constant emotional exhaustion devoted to toxic mates, girlfriends or wives. For many years, these ideas were limited to individuals and small communities. But today, the Internet has allowed these precepts to become easily available, and millions of men around the world are finding their way on the road to sovereignty.

MGTOW is sometimes referred to as "Taking the Red Pill". Just as in The Matrix, the Red Pill enabled those who swallowed it to see the surprising reality behind conventional living and common sense. MGTOW is opening the eyes of ordinary men to a new, better set of possibilities after seeing the painful truth that men grow up in a hierarchical social order that imposes expectations and directives upon them. They are called to Man Up, which included taking on traditional work and marriage.[1] It is a system that sees men pour out their best energies for a woman, children, or the social organism, only to see himself become irrelevant and cast aside once his prime years are spent.[2]

MGTOW[3] is a growing global awareness that helps men avoid dangerous relationships within a Gynocentric society, which exalts women's physical and emotional needs over all others.[3] Oftentimes, individuals discover the MGTOW message after a conventional relationship turns poisonous and causes them anger or pain.

Some, but not all MGTOW men, ascribe to these ideals:

A. Liberation from the Matriarchal rulebook of dating[4]
B. Avoidance of risks in marriage,[5] and in its place value my own life on my terms
C. Rejection of role as sole provider,[6] protector,[7] or pack mule in relationships
D. Recognize financial reality[8] of relationships today, and in the future[9, 10]
E. Avoid costs of raising children; veto God's commandment to "go forth and multiply"
F. Defy societal male shaming techniques and slogans[11, 12, 13]

The MGTOW population raises awareness about its mission, and allows every man to develop his own individual set of rules, whatever works best for him. Each MGTOW member cannot be casually labeled. This would result in an inaccurate and unfair characterization of discrete MGTOW member's ideas, experience, knowledge, and unique background. MGTOW is a phenomenon that does not discriminate by age, ethnicity, political affiliation, or other irrelevant factors. There are millions across the world who value a life of individual acceptance and freedom.

This enlightened view of independence is mainly sustained by a brotherhood of men.

MGTOW History

MGTOW was inspired by Japanese Herbivores , or "grass eaters". These are men who avoid permanent marital and romantic relationships.[15] The earliest reference to the tenets of MGTOW as an organized lifestyle was from a western newspaper entry in 1835 and Herbivore men, the term itself, was first coined by Maki Fukasawa in an article published on Oct. 13, 2006. MGTOW became a buzzword in 2008 and 2009.[7, 8, 9, 10] MGTOW has spread throughout every major nation. Men are becoming increasingly aware of relationships' risks, such as emotional, physical abuse and financial enslavement, due to the strictures of modern society's gynocentric patriarchy.[16]

Around 2008, marital failures and relationship difficulties were being publicly shared on various social media sites, including YouTube. Anonymous men with pseudonyms like Stardusk, Sandman, and Barbarossa, were a few of the forward-thinking innovators of the MGTOW YouTube phenomenon. Their videos attracted interest, and their ideas quickly spread to others. Now YouTube has hundreds of videos offering a daily dose of the Red Pill.

MGTOW Education

Men have to seek out MGTOW education and community where they can find it. Without political movements or women's studies to teach men, these ideas aren't taught in schools, but it thrives on the Internet. It is a coalition of sharing that fuels connection and consciousness. Social media (Facebook, Reddit, YouTube, forums, etc.) allow the MGTOW population and interested parties to bond. Educated experiences and discoveries are distributed and refined. A central website devoted to this movement is www.MGTOW.com.

Common Myths

Men's Rights: Some people believe that MGTOW is an ideology that splintered off from Men's Rights Advocacy (MRA). Previously, MGTOW may have been introduced through MRA connections. However, today most individuals discover the message through MGTOW social media channels and networks. Millions have found the MGTOW lifestyle, and most are not advocates for men's rights.

Sexless: Some people claim MGTOW bans sex with women or it is a 'strike' that punishes women. A small group of MGTOW may be asexual, but most continue sexual relationships with women and have no interest in penalizing women.

Anti-Social: Others believe these men are hermits and want to move away from civilization. MGTOW are everywhere and live ordinary lives.

Hate: MGTOW is mistakenly considered a "rage against women" and "misogynistic." But these men are actually discovering freedom, fulfillment of dreams, sex, and love, as they dodge the proverbial bullets of a culture that attempt to reinforce traditional dating and marriage contrivances. These men love women. Some MGTOW have suffered financial, physical and emotional pain in relationships, marriages, and divorces, only to find MGTOW for emotional support. They are given a safe place to vent.

Wind Society Backwards: Some think MGTOW is used to take society backwards, creating a society of marital ownership and oppression of women. Instead, MGTOW is moving the male society forward and cultivating quality relationships between the sexes. It creates an alternative future for men of all types and ages, and is a liberating force for young men, revealing a livable path before young men have suffered the blows of traditional masculine roles.

Gay, Cry Baby, or Sissy: The overwhelming majority of the MGTOW population is not gay. They date and enjoy women, but avoid any living arrangement that might douse their life ambitions and liberty. These individuals are not crying over previous injury, but are gaining power over their destiny. Each MGTOW individual creates his own path.

Sources

[1] http://madamenoire.com/285117/do-men-feel-the-pressure-of-marriage-as-they-age/
[2] http://madamenoire.com/285117/do-men-feel-the-pressure-of-marriage-as-they-age/
[3] https://www.reddit.com/domain/gynocentrism.com/
[4] http://www.theguardian.com/money/2014/feb/11/millennials-feel-high-cost-dating-valentine
[5] https://dontmarry.wordpress.com/
[6] http://legacy.fordham.edu/campus_resources/enewsroom/archives/archive_2501.asp
[7] http://www.familyshare.com/parenting/mens-roles-in-a-family-as-provider-and-protector-honoring-and-serving-your-family
[8] http://money.cnn.com/2015/03/12/pf/planning-for-wedding-costs/
[9] http://money.cnn.com/2014/08/18/pf/child-cost/
[10] http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2014/08/18/cost-of-raising-a-child_n_5688179.html
[11] http://www.mgtow.com/shaming-tactics/

[12] http://ncfm.org/2014/11/news/discrimination-news/against-men-news/ncfm-supporter-timothy-patten-are-men-winning-the-battle-of-the-sexes/
[13] https://www.psychologytoday.com/blog/owning-pink/201408/women-please-stop-shaming-men
[14] http://www.slate.com/articles/news_and_politics/foreigners/2009/06/the_herbivores_dilemma.html
[15] https://rmaxgenactivepua.wordpress.com/2013/07/02/the-marriage-strike-hitting-women-hard/
[16] http://gynocentrism.com/

Shocker – woman makes false report to police

Michael Conzachi · 4 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Last Monday, 52 year old Fox Lake Illinois Police Lieutenant Charles Gliniewicz; a 30 year veteran was shot and killed in the line of duty. He was married and the father of four boys. As an honorably retired law enforcement professional, I am as saddened as anyone of the murder of Lieutenant Gliniewicz who was jokingly called "G.I. Joe" by his colleagues and friends.

His murder has shocked the close knit Fox Lake community and has launched a massive manhunt in the area, looking for three possible suspects described as only one black and two white males. Hundreds of officers; swat teams, K-9's and helicopters have swarmed the area since the murder, looking for the killers.

Late Wednesday night, 30 year old Kristin B. Kiefer of Vernon Hills called in a report to police that two men attempted to "carjack" her in the same area, which sent over 100 officers, three helicopters and eleven K9 units in the area in an intense search for the armed and dangerous suspects. The wooded area was saturated and combed for over five hours in vain.

The plus-sized Kiefer maintained her report was accurate and later admitted that she made it up because "she wanted attention from the family that employed her as a nanny." She also admitted that she was aware that a manhunt was under way in the same area making her claims more believable; at least initially.

WTF? Wanted to get attention from the family who employs her as a nanny???

Does this sound familiar? A woman making a false report to law enforcement about being a victim of a crime, this time an alleged car-jacking, but this time it involved suspected cop killers, and who wanted to get "attention?" Hmmmm? Sounds like a little Munchausen going on in that clouded little noggin of hers.

A woman making a false report to law enforcement spurring the deployment of over 100 law enforcement officers, K9's, helicopters, vehicles, equipment, weapons and an extremely high state of stress and tension at the cost of tens of thousands of dollars, and diverting resources and attention away from their original purpose of being in the area; tracking down cop killers.

Does this sound familiar yet? How many times have we read on these pages of the epidemic of false reports of restraining orders, domestic violence, and sexual assaults in the general population and on campus and in the military? While we constantly read these articles on these crimes, we sometimes forget of the costs of sending law enforcement officers out on a wild goose chase. We forget about all of the other professionals; including women who get drawn into these circus acts whose efforts have to diverted into a hoax.

No one has reported and no one knows how many of the officers at this scene and search for the suspects were women, but it can be realistically assumed that some of them were.

We forget about the waste of tax-payer resources for these wild goose chases and we also forget of the inherent dangers that could occur. Dangers to the searching officers, the terrain, the officers in helicopters, the dangers to the K9's and the potential dangers to members of the general public who may have been misidentified by the officers as being the suspected cop killers. Can you imagine if a black or white male, normal resident of the area was mistaken by law enforcement officers conducting that search, and what their reaction would have been? I can tell you from experience that it would have been a highly tense situation with a high likelihood that an innocent man could have been severely injured or killed by those officers who simply want to do their jobs, arrest the perpetrators, and go home alive.

The potential for tragedy was enormous and the wasted resources and time taken away from actually searching in the correct area for the suspects is also enormous. Another thing that needs to be considered is that this time delay may have allowed the suspects to get out of the area which further puts law enforcement officers and members of the general public at risk.

All because of the lie of one woman.

When women lie about being abused or raped, we condemn the lie as we should, but we sometimes forget about all of the resources that swing into action based on that lie.

This is another in a long list of examples where the lie of one woman has an impact on so many others, has drained valuable resources away from the actual problem and has drained the tax-payer coffers. Not only that but this woman's lie could have gotten somebody killed or seriously injured.

The obviously personality disordered Ms. Kiefer has been arrested and charged with filing a false police report and disorderly conduct. She could face prison time up to three years and may be held responsible for the tens of thousands of dollars of tax-payer resources that were wasted.

There has been no outcry of Kiefer's arrest and everyone would certainly agree that she should have been arrested and charged, and should be jailed and fined.

The irony is that when a woman makes a false report of abuse or sexual assault; wherever that occurred, professionals; men AND women swing into action and do their jobs to look for perpetrators, investigate crimes, secure, retain, and evaluate evidence and crime scenes, utilize forensic facilities, medical facilities, prepare crime broadcasts and notify the public and engage in a host of other activities to keep the public safe. But when it is done in these circumstances, the usual cadre of hysterics cries foul when a false accuser of domestic violence or rape is held accountable.

I ask; what the hell is the difference? Both waste resources, time, energy, money, and personnel, and no one is going to cry foul at the arrest of the bloated Ms. Kiefer, but if she reported being the victim of a rape and it was later determined to be false; and in this case by her own admission; if she had been arrested and charged with filing a false report of a rape, the screams of "FOUL" would be heard around the blog-o-sphere.

Maybe we shouldn't hold the walking-talking DSM-V, Ms. Kiefer responsible for reporting a false car-jacking because, you know; it would deter other women from falsely reporting being the victim of a car-jacking.

So the next time we read on these pages of another, in a seemingly endless stream of false reports of abuse or sexual assault, let's just think about all of those wasted resources that affect everybody; including women, and take away valuable resources and time away from real and true victims.

And let's hold false accusers accountable, no matter the crime. Let's not say it's ok for someone to be arrested and charged for this obvious false report, but not ok if the victim falsely claims to be the victim of abuse or rape. It's the same and the same resources were wasted.

Having said that, let's all give a thought and a prayer to Lieutenant Charles Gliniewicz and his family, friends and colleagues, and to all of the honest, ethical, and dedicated law enforcement officers, both men and women.

Sources:

http://www.cbsnews.com/news/illinois-manhunt-woman-lied-about-seeing-suspects-amid-hunt-for-cop-killers/http://patch.com/illinois/grayslake/overnight-manhunt-suspected-cop-killers-volo-stemmed-false-report-0

Dr. Suzanne B Monaghan admits to sexually mutilating children

AVfM Video Source · 6 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Why I Despise Mass Media and Love Chrissie Hynde

B.R. Merrick · 6 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I'm a mother, treat me like a mother
You want to suck on my breast, I'm so surprised you do
I'm the source and the force you owe your life to, brother
I'm a mother and I take like a mother [emphasis in the original, musically speaking]

- From "I'm a Mother" by Pretenders

Much of the rest of the song reads like fantasy feminism:

I understand time and it isn't on my side
But to service mankind I have to suffer his pride
Like a mother…

Little sacrifices, go straight to heaven
But hunting season's over, this is [so] the 20th century…

She prattles on about picking up dead bodies, keeping a gun, and even the never-ending pains of childbirth; but I like the song anyway. It sure would be nice if that's what feminism was about. It sure would be great if a sharp-edged individual attitude like the one Chrissie Hynde has expressed for decades as the life-force of Pretenders was actually rewarded and supported. What Hynde may very well discover now is that feminism functions largely on orthodoxy to certain standards surrounding sacred subjects such as sexual assault. (Thankfully, it does not function on alliteration.)

Hynde is a rarity among both male and female pop artists in general. You may not care for her genre or style, but like Kate Bush, Suzanne Vega, Laurie Anderson, PJ Harvey, and Björk; she's a musicienne with a musical conscience, whose artistry extends beyond music into philosophy, whatever that philosophy may be worth. That's something I respect.

I also respect Hynde for completely fucking up a cow with hurt feelings whose existence is sacred to men-shamers everywhere. In an interview with some lame website that demands subscription, Hynde made a remark that, in the assumed context, comes dangerously close to victim blaming:

"The Pretenders singer, 63, said she takes 'full responsibility' after she was sexually assaulted aged 21 in Ohio.

"'If I'm walking around in my underwear and I'm drunk. Who else's fault can it be?' Hynde told Krissi Murison [emphasis mine]."

I wouldn't go that far, especially if Hynde is not leaving out any details of what happened to her at 21. If the political Left has taught us anything at all, it's that words are important. Saying "fault" instead of "contributing factor" or even just "consequences" implies blame, motive, responsibility, or criminality. I wouldn't say it was Hynde's fault that she was raped, but rather that it was her naïveté along with her general attitude and dress (or lack of it) that led to an increasingly dangerous situation getting out of hand.

This is not what her denouncers are saying, however. They are bitching about Hynde "blaming the victim;" instead of praising a truly independently-minded woman for giving girls some good tips: Don't hang out with bikers. Don't walk around drunk in front of a bunch of strange men in your underwear. Doing so greatly increases your chances of giving the wrong signal to a bunch of strange drunk biker dudes with dicks.

Consequently, this is how one typical headline reads: "Singer says women can be blamed for rape." This is victim blaming, you see. Don't deny yourselves your stupidity, ladies, or you're blaming yourself. When wisdom equals blame, then victimology has won the discourse. These people actually want Hynde to say: "I have the right to walk around drunk in my underwear in front of a bunch of men who are known for their criminal behavior and demand their respect."

Do you understand yet how four black men on Panama Beach during Spring Break allegedly got the wrong idea? It doesn't matter what she's doing, even if she's down on your dick with lots of spit. If you took her too roughly, or she changed her mind, or the condom broke, or she gets to be on TV, or she's drunk, or she has to explain it to her boyfriend, or she's in a strange town in a dark alley, or you make lots of money, or she wears provocative clothing all day and night, or you're the wrong skin color, or she's in her underwear: you're blaming the victim.

Hynde deserves big, kissing kudos for being the exact opposite of what her accusers claim. She is being made out to be someone who blames herself, as if she has set up a little pity party, or as if this supposed act of self-blame and implied self-shame is somehow going to keep in the way of her success. Ha HAA ha!

And another big, kissing Ha HAA ha! to anyone who dismisses Brett Butler's amazing comeback from, quite literally, nothing. In an astounding video, Butler, formerly an astute standup comedienne-turned-TV star, blames the victim the entire time by opening up about her massive relapse at the height of her massive success. Maybe the Hynde-bashers could put down their rolling pins long enough to listen to someone who isn't talking about the dangers of making oneself into the perfect rape victim. Butler talks a great deal about how she had it all and holds herself alone accountable for the loss of it. She even quips about how it's like a bad country song.

If the truth-teller blaming would stop long enough, the Hynde-bashers might realize how beneficial it has been to Hynde's mind for her to have been able to ask herself after the assault: Something really awful just happened to my body. Where was I during this process (so it doesn't happen again)? You see, that is what a survivor thinks. That's why Hynde has lasted so long, and why I believe Butler will yet find a peaceful place in the entertainment industry. That's what survivors do. Time for blame later.

Feature image from Wikipedia Commons.

Señor MiniBagel interviews Paul

AVfM Video Source · 7 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

You can sub to him here.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=7-cfboUt5e8

Men's Mental Health Network launches, raising the bar on advocacy for men

Paul Elam · 7 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

For years we have documented the varying areas of life in which men and boys bear the brunt of discrimination and sexism. In our family courts, domestic violence services, law enforcement/criminal justice system, genital integrity, education and a host of other areas, men and boys are systematically short-changed.

The mental health industry is one of the most brutal and culpable forces concerning these issues. Countless social workers and psychologists turn a blind eye to the genital mutilation of boys and the science proving its detrimental effects on its victims. There are perhaps an even greater number of mental health professionals who knowingly and unknowingly operate under tainted research and a false narrative about domestic violence. These individuals often actively work to prevent male victims and their children from accessing services, either through malicious intent or willful ignorance.

A pernicious and destructive sexism pervades the mental health industry. It operates unchallenged behind a façade of false objectivity, false inclusiveness and false compassion. Sadly, the mental health industry is ignorant of even the most basic differences between men and women in the ways we process emotions. Men are often expected to emote like women. When they don't, they're judged as deficient.

These facts, and many, many more have created an unambiguous need for change in the helping professions.

The Men's Mental Health Network is the first major step toward making that happen.

Our Mission Statement and promise:

> The Men's Mental Health Network provides an alternative to the mainstream mental health profession which has grown increasingly sexist and indifferent to the problems faced by men and boys. We will apply our 100+ years of collective expertise in men's issues to develop and provide training material for other mental health professionals."

At launch, we will provide direct services in the areas of grief and loss, high-conflict relationships, addictions and men with disabilities.

This is only the beginning.

We are presently consulting with other mental health professionals who practice without disparaging assumptions about men and boys. These professionals understand the current aberrant shortcomings of the mental health field.

Upon thorough vetting, we will add these professionals to a public directory. The ultimate goal is to provide a comprehensive, international mental health network in which both online and offline services are available.

The importance of that is difficult to overstate. When people seek relief from the "helping" professions and are instead given political ideology, it is an abuse of their trust. There is a reason so many men roll their eyes at the mention of therapy and counseling. It is the same reason they are far less likely than women to reach out for help. Their suspicions are 100% justified.

They are telling us quite clearly that the mental health field must change, not the men. The Men's Mental Health Network is the first earnest attempt to answer them.

As the Men's Mental Health Network directory grows and solidifies, our next objective is to create and provide authorized continuing education and training for mental health professionals. It will be designed completely on evidence-based clinical need, not political correctness. We will target under-recognized and often ignored areas of study, such as misandry and gynocentrism. This training is intended to confront and scrutinize already faulty beliefs held by so many in the mental health field.

Additionally, we will adopt a very public role in challenging many mental health institutions and individuals by calling attention to sexist and harmful practices. We will not shy from nor let pass any entity or individual who is part of the problem.

Men and their problems have long been ignored, minimized and even ridiculed by the mainstream mental health industry. Today marks the beginning of corrective action. We start by building a network of professionals who don't view men as the default problem and have both comprehension of and compassion for their struggles.

We will turn that platform into a beacon of light that challenges the rampant discrimination against men in the mental health field and force an end to the empathy gap that now plagues men and boys at the most vulnerable moments in their lives.

Please visit the site and join our mailing list. Follow us on Twitter, Facebook, YouTube and Pinterest. If you want to offer further support, please make use of our donation button to help us reach our goals.

Signed,

Paul Elam,

Peter Wright,

Tom Golden LCSW and

Tara Palmatier, PsyD

Feminist resurrection

AVfM Video Source · 8 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Sinful not to sub to this guy.

A most cordial invitation

AVfM Video Source · 8 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

This 22 minute video by Men's Rights Edmonton is well worth watching as Nick Reading responds to Mike Rugnetta and covers several of the seminal events that have occurred in recent years.

Find more videos from Men's Rights Edmonton here.

Free Coyote Shivers

Suzanne McCarley · 8 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Haven't been there, haven't done that, but I got the T shirt.

This week brings a new and depressing chapter in the tale of Pauley Perrette's decade long campaign of harassment against musician Francis (Coyote) Shivers, the man who dared to divorce her lying, cheating ass. Having been wrongfully convicted of violating a fraudulently obtained restraining order, Mr. Shivers will begin serving a nine month jail sentence on Tuesday, September 8. Tuesday is also the release date for his new single "Don't Believe a Word," proceeds from which will go to his legal defense fund. Additionally, while incarcerated for a crime he did not commit, he plans to write a very interesting book.

The gloves are coming off, and not just at AVfM. Expect to see a great deal more of what Our Dear Pauley (along with her various minions and unsavory associates) would prefer to keep under wraps. We'll begin with music journalist Maryanne Cristiano-Mistretta's release announcement and interview with Coyote Shivers.

How paranoid YouTube sectarians attempted to hijack and redefine MGTOW

Dean Esmay · 9 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I was surprised to see Tim Patten's "MGTOW: A worldwide boycott of marriage" on the pages of A Voice for Men not long ago. Not that everything the article said was wrong, but it contains at least one gigantic whopper. I doubt Patten knows it's a whopper, because that lie has been repeated so many times by people pushing their own personal agendas. But it's still a lie, a damnable lie about Men Going Their Own Way, and it needs to be identified for what it is.

This lie about Men Going Their Own Way seems to have mostly been promulgated by self-serving women and men calling themselves "MGTOW" on YouTube—women and men who have in the last year or so regularly attacked the Men's Rights community with a seemingly endless array of paranoid conspiracy theories and abusive lies. Including the gigantic falsehood that Patten repeats: that somehow, MGTOW became an emergent phenomenon through YouTube. In Patten's telling this started around 2008, and it may have—on YouTube. But that's not where MGTOW started and it's not where it got its greatest strength either.

This bullshit mangling of history, giving the YouTube community way too much credit, marginalizes and dismisses the earlier Men Going Their Own Way, some of whom are still around. It also denies the ongoing work of MGTOW in all sorts of other places that aren't all that well-known on YouTube.

The phrase "Men Going Their Own Way," or variants such as "going his own way," or "go his own sweet way," is now hundreds of years old. Many of the original internet forums and sites where MRAs first promoted Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW) are gone now, but some are still here. The best place I've found so far in researching the earlier Men Going Their Own Way is on the venerable forums known as The Nice Guy. There you can find original discussions, circa 2005, among the then-current MGTOW philosophers and how they hashed out their beliefs. There you will also find the original road sign logo those men, some of them married, created. You'll find it here: http://www.the-niceguy.com/forum/index.php?showtopic=10353 (registration required to view).

Modern YouTube MGTOW Sectarians may object that this 10 year old thread is "social conservatism" and that the MGTOW community has "evolved" since then. This is bullshit on multiple levels, but it ultimately comes to this, Gentlemen (and Lady): you don't get to say how the "MGTOW community" evolved. You only get to say how you and your friends evolved. No one put you in charge to make that call for all Men Going Their Own Way, and I for one completely dispute that you have any such authority. In fact all I see out of you is ignorance and blind hubris. Especially when, so often, you clearly have no idea what you're talking about.

Furthermore, those spinning tales of the "MGTOW is YouTube based" frequently partake in even bigger lies. They often believe a conspiracy theory that goes like this: scheming MRAs somehow discovered that "men's rights" was going down in popularity but "Men Going Their Own Way" was growing, so Paul Elam suddenly decided he cared about MGTOW and got busy writing about it, but in an attempt to make it more mainstream and palatable, Paul Elam tried to tell MGTOW they can be married. But thankfully, alert and vigilant True MGTOW On YouTube exposed the dastardly plot and now all know the truth: Marriage and MGTOW never! Can't be done! Un-possible! Only that lying monster Paul Elam and his cult followers say different!

To be blunt, all that is an incredibly womanish lie; it's dense, multilayered, and carefully crafted so that every reasonable discussion of it can be torpedoed by changing the subject, shifting the goalposts, and other Rationalization Hamster moves. Those who defend this lie, this indefensible false allegation leveled at innocent men, are also guilty of marginalizing the work of other Men Going Their Own Way who are certainly not named Paul Elam, and some of whom can't even stand Paul Elam.

I honestly suspect that most of those promulgating this conspiracy narrative are the products of single mother homes, because they're such girlish brats so much of the time, and their narrative is such pathetic gossipy schoolgirl drama and backstabby lies.

Here's reality: Men's Rights sites such as Anti-Misandry, Nice Guys, A Voice for Men, and others, have a much larger audience than all the most prominent YouTube MGTOW combined—in fact you could add them all up and throw Girl Writes What and the Honeybadger Brigade on top of all the YouTube MGTOW, and you still wouldn't have as big an audience as A Voice for Men alone has, let alone the older and more venerable Men's Rights sites and forums. And these online forums and web sites have been pro-MGTOW continuously for 6 years in AVfM's case and 10 years or more in others.

In other words, a lot of people have been MGTOW a hell of a lot longer than the snotnosed punks on YouTube who moved in and declared themselves the experts.

Peter Wright, by the way, is a name the YouTube MGTOW are surprisingly quiet on, considering that he is the primary author of this book on MGTOW that many of the YouTubers unjustly maligned without reading it, or by suggesting that if they'd skimmed a few articles that were early draft chapters on AVfM, that means they read it. They didn't. Peter has been a Man Going His Own Way for well over a decade, much longer than Johnny-come-latelies like Bar Bar or Stardusk or Sandman or the snotnosed punk who calls himself "Mayor of MGTOWN" (let alone total lunatics like "MGTOW Mafia," "Sexy MGTOW," or the Dave Futrelle of the YouTube MGTOW Sectarians, "RazorBlade Kandy") and his book should be read by people who want to know what the authentic Men Going Their Own Way phenomenon has always looked like–and still does.

The paranoid YouTubers rarely or never mention Peter Wright, even though, ironically, his book (a book which most of them never bothered to read before viciously attacking it with bogus reviews) is the primary source for their paranoid and abusive conspiracy theories about Paul Elam trying to "hijack MGTOW" even though there's nothing objectionable to any sane person in that book.

It's pretty funny when a hijacker turns his gun on you and says, "Why are you hijacking us?" If there was ever a good example of DARVO, it's the idea that Peter Wright wrote a book to subvert MGTOW.

And how pathetic is it that those peddling the conspiracy theory about "hijacking" rarely even mention Peter Wright's name?

Now here is the truth about Men Going Their Own Way: from the very beginning, MGTOW have recognized that Men's Rights Activism in the political sphere—lobbying legislatures, staging protests and demonstrations, signing petitions, etc.—was going to take possibly decades to succeed. And, they've long recognized that the Men's Rights Movement might never succeed.

The fact that Men's Rights Activism might fail has been well-understood by MRAs for decades, which is why Men Going Their Own Way was promoted first by MRAs and why it's always been respected by MRAs.

After all, MRAs created the Men Going Their Own Way logo, promoted the name, the acronym and the philosophy. And MRAs always said that if a Man Going His Own Way did not want to be an activist, did not even believe in activism, that was fine too, because MRAs support men steering their own destinies completely independently of the Men's Rights Movement if they want to. No one's obligated to be an activist, after all.

The MGTOW project was, and is, both simple and profound: help individual men break the shackles of women's expectations, and also break the shackles of other men's expectations. In a misandrist, gynocentric culture that prioritizes the comfort and security of women, it's about helping men decide for themselves exactly what they want out of life, and helping them if possible to reach those personal goals, whatever they are, with realistic expectations and fully armed with as much information as possible about how society, and the law, actually works, rather than how they think it should work or wish it works.

Those personal goals might be to remain bachelors and to learn to be happy and self-fulfilled in the bachelor life. Some might date casually, or use sex workers. Others might forswear intimate relations with women entirely. Still other Men Going Their Own Way, having strong biological urges toward procreation and fatherhood and companionship, might pursue long-term relations with women.

In all cases, the goal of the wider community would be to help each individual Man Going His Own Way figure out how to reach his own personal goals: should he cohabit, or should he get the marriage license? Should he stay in his own state, province, or country or should he hightail it to places where fatherhood and family are still respected? Should he just call the whole thing off because women aren't worth it and he's both safer and happier being single? Those are all his choices, and nobody else's, and the only real rule would be never to shame a guy for making choices you wouldn't, so long as he isn't hurting or misleading anybody.

The point of all this was never to, under any circumstances, dictate to a man what his choice would be, even if some found his choice odd or questionable. The goal of movement MGTOW was to help individual men find themselves and find what they wanted, and help that individual man craft the best way to get it—for himself, in his own way.

Fast forward to the last few years, and what might be called the Militant MGTOW Sect began on YouTube and a few other places, such as Nacho Vidal's old MGTOW Forums. And in the last couple of years, these sectarians have suddenly decided that it is absolutely impossible for a man to be married and still a Man Going His Own Way.

This idea—that a married man may not be MGTOW—is a lie. It is an abusive lie that is sometimes harmful to the men who hear and believe it. It is also spitting straight into the face of those who first founded the Men Going Their Own Way movement on the internet, some of whom remain active to this day. It is a betrayal of MGTOW. It is a subversion and hijacking of it. It is a redefinition, and a toxic one. And it should not be allowed to stand.

Why should it not be allowed to stand? Why should we not just accept that the popular YouTube set have helped MGTOW "evolve" to its current state? First because the original MGTOW have yet to leave the stage. Second, because the YouTube Sectarians are misleading people, including themselves in some cases. And their advice is dangerous.

Yes dangerous. Not to society, but to themselves and their followers. They're a bunch of damned fools who are going to get themselves or their friends killed. And yes, I do mean that literally.

Now the fact is that in most cases, men in the English-speaking world (and a growing number of other countries) probably shouldn't get married, because the laws on marriage are generally not favorable to men. However, that is the general case; anyone who tells you there is no benefit to marriage in any man's case is lying to you.

Repeat: if you say that there is no benefit to marriage to men, you are a dangerously ill-informed fool who is likely to get yourself or others killed.

Repeat again: the man who tells you that there is no benefit or protection to the marriage license just might get you imprisoned or killed.

Yes, that includes your favorite YouTuber, no matter how many subscribers he or she has. And by the way, there's a good chance that your favorite YouTube "MGTOW" peddling the "MGTOW can definitionally never marry" bullshit is cohabiting full-time with a woman at this very moment. Have you tried asking him? You should, and then if he admits he is cohabiting full-time with a woman—some of the biggest names are cohabiting with women–ask him which legal sources he consulted before he reached his conclusion that cohabiting is safer than marriage.

Because here is another thing every Man Going His Own Way should know: regardless of the fact that marriage is generally a bad deal for men, cohabiting with a woman without a marriage license frequently, and indisputably, reduces your rights and renders you more vulnerable than if you got the state-approved piece of paper.

This is not a moral case for marriage. I will repeat my own observation that marriage in the United States and many other countries is quite obviously a contract of dubious value which frequently reduces men's rights and leads them to harm.

However, the outcomes to cohabiting without marriage are frequently worse, and if you doubt it you can not only talk to a lawyer, you can also talk to me or other MRAs who have dealt with sobbing, suicidal men whose lives are being destroyed by a woman they refused to marry because they thought avoiding the marriage license would make them safer, when it turned out that being unmarried was more legally hazardous to them.

A sane rational man might look at that and say "All right, so you're saying marriage is bad but cohabiting can be even worse. Why shouldn't I just avoid women entirely?"

Please don't make me repeat myself: this is why choosing to remain a bachelor is a perfectly honorable, sane, and rational choice. Which is what I already said.

But if you are talking to one of those who, like most men, needs physical intimacy, and if he's one of those men deeply wants children and family, you need to be helping that man either overcome those urges or, if he can't or won't overcome them, you need to be advising him to make a sane judgement based on all the legal information available to him on what his best moves to protect himself in case of disaster would be.

And if you're anything but an insane ideologue, you will admit that if the legal climate where he lives, in his particular life situation, makes him safer with the marriage license than he is without it, he should carefully consider this before making his final call.

Will all men benefit from a marriage license? Once again: no. In most cases, probably not. But the final call must be made not based on your opinion of how things should be, it must be based on a firm understanding of that individual man's circumstances and the relevant laws where he lives. And it will ultimately be up to him and his personal list of priorities to decide which way comes down most in his own favor. Which only he can say, and nobody else, not his parents or his teachers or society and certainly not his favorite YouTuber.

He needs to Go His Own Way, and decide for himself what he wants and how best to get it.

If you state that there is zero benefit to a marriage license, you are lying not just to yourself. You're lying to everybody who listens to you. So please, let this sink in for you:

It is possible to have an illegal, immoral contract which is in many ways stacked against you—which is nevertheless much better and safer than no contract at all. And that is legal reality, not Dean Esmay's opinion. Consult a lawyer if you doubt me. I'll even help you find one, if you're serious.

This cannot be emphasized enough so I'm going to repeat it until I'm convinced everybody's heard it: Cohabiting or reproducing with a woman frequently leaves you with fewer rights and protections than getting the marriage license would. That is not "advocacy of marriage." That is an indisputable, empirical reality.

Suggesting that this is an ideological stance I'm taking is like suggesting that it is Dean Esmay's ideological position that the Earth revolves around the Sun, whereas your ideology states that the Sun simply must go around the Earth.

Your opinion of how things should be does not necessarily match reality, gentlemen. And if you are telling men there is never any benefit to a marriage license, you are lying to those men and may get those men killed with your lie.

Many men come to either Men Going Their Own Way or the broader Men's Rights community due to a nasty divorce. This is unsurprising, since most people refuse to believe things are as bad as they are in Family Court until they experience it themselves. And believe me, Family Court is generally brutal to men, especially if they made the wrong choice in wife, or she is easily manipulated by a shark attorney or her manipulative family members or friends who hate you.

However, what this reality about marriage, which the YouTube upstarts won't tell you, is that no matter how bad you've heard it is, the unmarried man who cohabits, or even just dates without cohabiting, frequently has it worse legally. Sometimes, a lot worse.

If you, Mr. YouTube MGTOW Expert, are sleeping nightly next to a woman without a marriage license, the indisputable reality is that in many cases, depending on where you live, you have far fewer rights and far fewer protections than if you went ahead and got the license. Yes, even though the marriage license is arguably an illegal and immoral contract, even though marriage frequently screws up men's lives, cohabiting or even just dating women without marriage is, in some cases, even more likely to screw your life up.

Screwing your own life up just to match some vague principle looks an awful lot like encouraging men to dispose of themselves for the greater good to me. What's it look like to you?

Oh and by the way, if you drew up cohabitation agreements? Once again check with a lawyer, as in many jurisdictions no matter what you wrote down and how well-crafted and clever you think it is, a judge can take one look at your cohabitation agreement and flick it away like a filthy tissue dripping of snot, then proceed to give your children and pretty much everything you own to that woman who you, on principle, refused to get married to.

Whereas if you were married your lawyer might have been able to protect at least some of your assets, or at least your access to your kids.

Not reliably. Just more reliably than your proud "I will never get a marriage license" stance.

This reality—and it is reality, gentlemen, not Dean Esmay's opinion—does not mean Men Going Their Own Way should marry. No one ever said they should. Just that they could. If cohabitation and children was the goal those men set for themselves. The true MGTOW community would not shun those men; it would urge them to get the strongest possible legal and personal advice so that their eyes would be wide open about both the benefits and the pitfalls of whatever choice they made. Including, by the way, the pitfalls of choosing bachelorhood, which can, if you aren't careful, lead to despondency, isolation, depression, and more, especially if you are not cognizant that regular contact and compassion is a real human need in most men, and not just something you can shrug off blithely. If you choose permanent bachelorhood there are a ton of benefits, but if you're a rationalist you know that nothing is without its down side, and that you need to look at the down side and take prudent measures for your own mental and physical health.

In any case, if you doubt me on the indisputable, empirical reality that the marriage license frequently gives you more rights and protections than the unmarried, I suggest you ask a lawyer in your jurisdiction what protections a marriage license gives you over cohabiting with a woman, or what an accidental (or not so accidental) pregnancy means to the unmarried versus the married man. Odds are very good that in numerous cases, you have far more rights and protections, both as a matter of law and a matter of practicality, than you would if you refused the marriage contract.

I had an acquaintance who said he'd never get married. He committed suicide earlier this year. He hung himself one night and was found literally swinging from the rafters by his father the next morning. He wasn't being allowed to be a father to his daughter with a woman he never married, a woman who decided her new boyfriend would make a better dad than he did. After struggling with it, he seems to have eventually decided to just end it all, right at around the age of 25.

In reality if he'd married the girl he'd have had more access to his own child—the legal reality in the state I live in. And, being an otherwise poor man, he had no property to lose to his child's mother anyway. His only issue was his daughter, whom he was not allowed to see regularly or help rear in any significant way.

But let's not have the YouTube community talk about my late friend Nate, because his story is inconvenient to the "marriage is always poison to a man, no matter what" bullshit. Thinking like that got my friend Nate dead, and helped assure a little girl would never really know her real father.

How long before it gets one of your friends or followers dead too?

If you want to refuse that license as a matter of principle or to make a personal statement, fine. Just don't lie to men and tell them that's a safer choice than getting the marriage license. Because frequently, that's the opposite of the truth. And no, that is not Dean Esmay's opinion, that is a legal reality that any halfway competent attorney can explain to you in minutes.

If you say MGTOW “definitionally means you aren’t married” you have just exposed the fact that you don’t understand MGTOW, and furthermore, you just attacked wide swaths of the MGTOW community. Those who hew to the original philosophy are in no way obligated to recognize you as anything but another branch or school of thought of MGTOW—and we have every right to notice that what some of the YouTube “MGTOW” guys are advocating is likely to get more than a few men killed.

If you want to advocate lifelong bachelorhood, go ahead. It’s an honorable choice. It has many benefits, financial and emotional. Just don’t lie and claim that MGTOW definitionally means “no marriage, no exceptions” because many who first promoted MGTOW would never have agreed with you, in fact some of them were married with kids at the time and are still married with kids now.

And those guys, the real Men Going Their Own Way? They know as well as I do that sometimes, the marriage license is better than cohabiting, and that even if both sucks, one is worse for them than the other. And we’d all like to see that change. Or at least I think most sane guys would like it to change.

Either way, only one group has attempted to redefine MGTOW: the YouTube Sectarians, who abandoned all reason in order to assert, contrary to precedent and objective evidence, that MGTOW simply can’t marry. Sorry, that may be the best default advice, but it is far from the universal best advice.

I will likely not bother listening to or responding to any of the Youtube sectarians on this question, for most of them have proven to be unwilling to listen, feverishly still caught up in their Witch Hunt and their “MGTOW” tribalism. But I will probably have at least one more article that looks even more at the history of MGTOW and its philosophy, especially the claim that the original MGTOW was “social conservatism” or “tradconism.” No, it really wasn’t, though some elements of traditionalism were always there. But in the meantime, here’s some links for the open-minded to explore:

http://www.the-niceguy.com/forum/index.php?showtopic=24182

http://www.the-niceguy.com/forum/index.php?showtopic=10353

http://www.twitlonger.com/show/n_1sn8ri4

YouTube MGTOW sectarians have bullied their way into silencing all objections to false assertions that smear the character of every man who questions them. They’re going to have to get used to the fact that the wider community isn’t going to be letting them get away with that forever. They don’t speak for MGTOW as a whole. They never have.

Moving Against Feminism means Moving Toward Target Consensus

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 10 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

In a recent article on this website, I explained why it is important to draw a sharp line between feminism and non-feminism, and why this "bedrock binary" should be the foundation of political understanding that everything else is built upon:

What I didn't provide in that article, is a working description of what feminism really is, that would make the binary meaningful. In the present article, I would like to at least somewhat correct that deficiency.

Truly, feminism is a face with a thousand masks. It has walked around in so many disguises that even people who oppose it cannot always agree on WHAT they are opposing. This lack of non-feminist agreement about what feminism really is, may be termed "target confusion". It spawns indecision, floundering and flailing, and gives rise to the infamous "circular firing squad". All this makes opposition to feminism difficult and inefficient.

To remedy such headaches, we should make the core truth about feminism evident to a broad spectrum of non-feminist people. If these people can discourse about the same things in the same language rather than talking past each other, they can work in concert to bring about feminism's demise. They might still disagree on certain points, but at least their disagreements will be on the same page.

The sought-for common understanding of feminism is called "target consensus". It is called that because it provides an understood target of operations toward which all may direct their efforts. We of the activated non-feminist sector must make the transition from target confusion to target consensus, and bring the middle mass gradually up to speed.

Let's move toward target consensus, right now.

First, we ought to establish some general idea of what it means to not be feminist.

I think we can all agree that we have inspected feminism from the ground up, and that we have pondered its implications in the context of human history. Is not this so?

And clearly, having made our inspection, we must have concluded that feminism is not our preferred choice – otherwise we would have chosen it. That makes sense, wouldn't you say?

To be more precise, would you say that we have chosen not to be bound by feminism's theorizations, or by any extension of those theorizations? Certainly, that's what I would say, and I'm sure that many of you would say likewise.

I believe that we as non-feminist people occupy a critical standpoint independent of feminist understanding – and that is why we are not bound by feminist theorization. I believe we possess the authority to define feminism on our own terms by the light of independent study. I would assert, in principle, that feminism IS what we say it is, and that the power to define feminism is not a sole feminist privilege. How does that sound? Are you on board with that program?

So in light of all the foregoing, I would pledge to uphold non-feminist autonomy, and to secure non-feminist existence against feminist imposition in whatever form this may arise. Having so pledged, I invite others to so pledge, and I feel confident that many will do so.

Now that we have laid down the elements of non-feminist identity, we must next undertake the quest for target consensus from a set of core ideas we can roughly agree on. Our rough agreement is a target consensus already, and what comes after it is a larger journey of discovery where we flesh out the details. In the end, we reach the correct understanding of feminism – and there is only one. Until then, we balance the long game with the pragmatic needs of the political moment.

So to begin, we must agree that feminism is not merely a definition and not merely a set of ideas developed from a definition. It is a set of patterns and practices manifested in the objective world, independently of any feminist's imagination. We must concur upon this much, even if we concur upon nothing else.

That being said, we now propose a rough description which itemizes the key truth points our study has yielded. We call this the "seven points of understanding", and it is meant to reveal more specifically what we have in mind when we pronounce the word "feminism". Remember that a rough understanding is all we need at the present stage, and such understanding is what the following list provides. We can't spend thirty years quibbling and sorting things out. We need to get things rolling:

Seven Points of Understanding

1. Feminism is a complex social system with interacting parts. The complexity of this system camouflages the core nature of it.

2. Feminism is an aggressor force that cannot co-exist with the world at large.

3. Feminism, at its core, is anti-male. Lacking such a core, it would effectively cease to exist.

4. Feminism's driving purpose is to increase female power with no stipulated endpoint.

5. Lying and prevarication are foundational feminist behaviors.

6. Feminism will never stop until a non-feminist force intervenes to make it stop.

7. As non-feminist people, we agree that the word "feminism" signifies nothing virtuous or laudable.
   Very well. What we have shared here may compose the foundation for a tacit understanding amongst activated non-feminists. When such ones meet, they will be able to discourse meaningfully, and if they need to coordinate their operations they can do so with a shared reality map in view.

As abstainers from feminism, the force binding us together against feminism ought to outweigh any ideological or cultural differences that might drive us apart. It is imperative that we set aside such misunderstandings and form a loose but resilient coalition against a common adversary.

I say loose coalition, because you couldn't properly call it an organization or a movement. Mere abstention from feminism does not equate to a politically accountable demographic. We are only as tightly woven as we need to be, but no tighter. A wink or a nod, in most cases, will suffice.

Those who wish to form properly chartered groups or clubs within this broader web are always free to do so, and to speak for themselves in whatever collective voice they deem suitable. However, I would urge all such groups to post a COMMITMENT TO NON-VIOLENCE near the top of their various bulkhead statements. Make clear that you disavow those who use violence, or make threats of violence. Put this in such bold terms that nobody – friend, foe, or indifferent member of the public – could pretend to miss it.

Feminism should be non-violently blocked, defied, snubbed, thwarted, taunted, stood up to, and made to lose face in the public square. This will take feminism down a peg. . . and then another peg. There's nothing like being publicly shamed or shown up in front of the world, then trying to be your good old cocky self in front of that same world the next day. It's not easy.

So we need to target feminism with such action, and we need to make the effect of this pervasive throughout the culture – signal-boosted where appropriate.

In every non-violent way imaginable, we should make feminism feel the heat of our stern displeasure, and the pressure of our collective, accumulated NO – a veritable "wall of no."

The effect should percolate through every dimension of the cultural mindspace, condensing as a mist from the sky and seeping, as it were, from the cracks in the earth. It should be pervasive and subtle, as dark matter, yet flaring up visibly upon occasion.

Target consensus will make clear to us what we are working on, so that our separate task forces can vector in upon the task from their many directions, with optimal effect. Let us strive for target consensus.

The Map of Reality, also known as the Feminist/Non-feminist Cooperation Spiral

Help free Coyote Shivers

AVfM Video Source · 11 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Coyote Shivers tells he has been sent Jail as a result of false allegations by Pauley Perrette, and asks for support to clear his name.

#FREECOYOTESHIVERS

Young man fights sex offender stigma (video)

AVfM Video Source · 11 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

An obviously innocent man tells CNN–and CNN actually lets him.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=dxsB1nKMgpI&feature=youtu.be

Steven Pinker: sex, violence, and failure of enlightenment

Douglas Galbi · 11 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Harvard professor Steven Pinker is a superstar scholar and a champion of science and truth-seeking. His book, The Better Angels of our Nature: Why Violence has Declined, is an international best-seller. Mark Zuckerberg and Bill Gates, who each are probably more influential world-wide than any politician, lauded Pinker's book.[1] Pinker's book explains that prior to the eighteenth century, or perhaps prior to the past few decades, women had no rights, men held women as property, and men could rape and beat women with impunity. But much more work remains for men to do to protect women:

> At the top, a consensus has formed within the international {elite} community that violence against women is the most pressing human rights problem remaining in the world. [2]

Elite discourse tends to describe males throughout history, except for a few enlightened fellows speaking today, as brutally demonic in relation to women. Primate behavior in general doesn't support that peculiar view of humans. Neither does the broad historical mass of data on human behavior. Enlightenment values of reason and truth-seeking, at least among elites, are astonishingly absent in addressing sex and violence.

Recognizing enlightenment's failure with respect to sex and violence doesn't require special gifts of intellect or laborious scholarship. High-quality data freely available online makes clear that, in the U.S., four times more men than women die from violence. Much higher levels of violence in medieval Europe were even more disproportionately directed against men. Loss of men's lives through suicides, workplace fatalities, and battlefield casualties vastly outnumber the corresponding loss of women's lives. These gender inequalities in lives lost attract remarkably little public attention even in our time of intense concern about gender equality. Evolutionary psychologists might explain that, because of sex differences in reproductive potential, men's lives are socially less valued than women's lives. But Steven Pinker and most elite thinkers declare that women's lives have been socially devalued throughout most of history. To ordinary persons not thoroughly indoctrinated, that elite view is obviously, egregiously false.

Public discourse about sex and domestic violence is an appalling spectacle of bad reason. Pinker dismisses evidence of women and men perpetuating domestic violence in roughly equal measure against each other by directing attention to severe violence. That's misleading with respect to criminal punishment. Domestic violence laws now encompass acts that cause only minor or no physical injury. With respect to injuries severe enough to send a person to a hospital emergency department, men suffer about 40% of the incidence of such injuries. Nonetheless, domestic violence against men has largely been ignored. Men victims of domestic violence receive much inferior services to those available to women. In medieval Europe, domestic violence against women generated punishment of men, and domestic violence against men generated ridicule of men. In The Better Angels of Our Nature, Pinker wrote:

> The argument that women should not be assaulted by the men in their lives is irrefutable, and as Victor Hugo noted, "There is nothing more powerful than an idea whose time has come." [3]

That's hollow rhetoric. The argument that men shouldn't assault women largely hasn't been necessary to make. The corresponding argument that women shouldn't assault men mainly generates laughter and derision. Pinker's tagged-on quote from Victor Hugo adds only pretentious puffery to the intellectual debacle.

Rhetorical posing about domestic violence has probably increased violence. In the U.S. over the past three decades, new laws and policies targeting domestic violence against women have created a frequently invoked regime of emergency law. Those laws have been central to the rise of U.S. mass incarceration. In the U.S., an extraordinary number of persons per capita now live in highly violent places: jails and prisons.

Generating emotions from deep within, a woman claiming to be raped is a potent means for inciting violence against men. Being accused of raping a woman is enough to get a man lynched by a large mob. Leading newspaper now headline sensational statistics such as the claim that nearly a quarter of Asian-Pacific men admit to being rapists. Pinker describes rape as "one of the prime atrocities in the human repertoire."[4] Should nearly a quarter of Asian-Pacific men be executed or least incarcerated for many years? Or are those elite claims about rape incredible and hateful? Rape throughout history has generally been treated seriously and sanctioned more severely than other forms of interpersonal violence. Given the seriousness of rape claims, false accusations of rape have also, not surprisingly, been a matter of serious concern, except in recent years. Historically, men seducing women has been broadly criminalized. Today U.S. college campuses are experiencing a reign of terror about sexual assault. That reign of terror is teaching students contempt for truth and justice.

Pinker and other elites treat women raping men as not real rape. Pinker forthrightly declared in The Better Angels of Our Nature that "rapists are men."[5] Until 2013, the U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation defined rape such that only women could be raped. That reflects lengthy historical lack of concern about men being raped. Official crime victimization surveys such as the U.S. National Crime Victimization Survey now obscure the definition of rape in complicated administrative judgments. Leading rape surveys have redefined rape to increase greatly the number of reported rapes. Yet men being made to penetrate another person sexually remains excluded by definition from rape. If that form of sexual violence is counted as rape, incidents of women raping men would outnumber incidents of men raping women in the leading U.S. survey of sexual victimization. U.S. judges have uniformly upheld men being forced to pay child support to women who have raped them and had children by their acts of rape. Those celebrating our enlightened times selectively close their eyes to narratively unpropitious facts about rape.

Enlightenment reason's failures in addressing sex and violence undermine the broad social trust crucial to civilization. Ordinary people through experience and readily accessible facts can easily recognize elite lies about sex and violence. In discussing The Better Angels of Our Nature, Mark Zuckerberg wrote to Steven Pinker:

> One question I have is whether there is any data that suggests the internet has led to or will lead to a decrease in violence? Are there any things we should consider while developing internet services that could help further decrease violence?

Pinker responded:

> At a bird's-eye view, one would certainly expect technologies that enhance cosmopolitanism to reduce violence. They can expand our circle of empathy, by seeing the world through the eyes of other people; they can enhance the spread of good ideas and expose bad ideas; and they can empower separated people to act together. In the past, the rise of printing and literacy, and then TV ("the global village") seem to have led to greater tolerance, and forces against war and prejudice … But what none of us yet understands, I think, is how to prevent a new form of insularity – self-selected, mutually reinforcing ideologues finding each other on the Web and reinforcing their own conspiracy theories. I wish I was smarter and wiser on how to deal with this, and I hope that the geniuses at Facebook are thinking about this!

From the perspective of many ordinary persons considering women's rights, men's rights, rape, and domestic violence, Steven Pinker, Mark Zuckerberg, Bill Gates and other international elites are no better than mutually re-enforcing ideologues. Although commonly smeared as hate sites, marginal deliberative fora such as the Men's Rights Reddit and A Voice for Men are more inspiring examples of concern for truth and justice. If enlightened civilization ultimately rests on reason, truth, and justice, rather than status, power, and money, a new revolution of minds is desperately needed.

* * * * *

Notes:

[1] Zuckerberg, multi-billionaire founder and CEO of Facebook, selected The Better Angels of Our Nature to discuss in his 2015 Year of Books on his personal Facebook page. Zuckerberg described Pinker's book as a "timely book" that he "really enjoyed." Zuckerberg further noted, "A few people I trust have told me this is the best book they've ever read."

Bill Gates, multi-billionare founder and CEO of Microsoft and guiding mind of the influential Gates Foundation, in 2012 declared:

> People often ask me what is the best book I've read in the last year. Steven Pinker's The Better Angels of Our Nature: Why Violence Has Declined stands out as one of the most important books I've read – not just this year, but ever.
> I'm a dogged advocate for innovations that have brought us longer life spans, better nutrition and more freedom. But I'm also concerned about the things innovation can't always change, like how we look at justice and violence. Is there a positive trend there, and if so, what are the lessons? How can we make sure the trend continues? How can we broaden it – and maybe even speed it up?

The U.S. criminal justice system is widely regarded as being disastrously unjust. The Gates Foundation should address the grossly malfunctioning U.S. criminal justice system.

[2] Pinker (2011) p. 414. With respect to women's rights, Pinker states:

> it was also during that era, the age of Enlightenment {18th century}, that women's rights began to be acknowledged, pretty much for the first time in history.

Id. p. 399. Women throughout recorded history have long held key rights: rights to property and rights to custody of children. Roman women held in their own right large estates. Under English common law, women, but not men, were recognized to have a natural right to custody of children born out of wedlock.

Pinker reproduced claims from Wilson and Daly's influential, fallacious, and misandristic article:

> In their article, "The Man Who Mistook His Wife for a Chattel," Margo Wilson and Martin Daly have documented that traditional laws all over the world treat women as the property of their fathers and husbands. Property laws entitle owners to sell, exchange, and dispose of their property without encumbrance, and to expect the community to recognize their right to redress if the property is stolen or damaged by others.

Id. p. 197. On Wilson and Daly's rhetoric, see note [4] and associated text in my post on primatology. See also the Roman-era story of Perpetua, the story of Aseneth (probably fourth-century Syria), and Boccaccio's story of Madonna Filippa (fourteenth-century Italy). Consider as well bureaucratic management difficulties in a fourteenth-century French household.

Pinker quotes with approval the highly celebrated and deeply misandristic scholar Andrea Dworkin. She tendentiously declared, "a man wants what a woman has — sex." Id. p. 395. Do men not have sex? Do women not want sex? Pinker declares:

> The history of rape, then, is one in which the interests of women had been zeroed out in the implicit negotiations that shaped customs, moral codes, and laws.

Id. p. 398. Inconsistent with history reality, that ridiculous claim uncannily complements Pinker's zeroing out of men as victims of rape. For further sensational History Channel history, Pinker declares, "The oppression of women used to include laws that allowed husbands to rape, beat, and confine their wives." Id. p. 382. That seems to be a grotesquely distorted interpretation of laws of coverture.

[3] Id. p. 415. Pinker offers an ideological understanding of domestic violence:

> Domestic violence is the backstop of a set of tactics by which men control the freedom, especially the sexual freedom, of their partners.

Id. p. 407. Such tactics, according to Pinker, have included "chastity belts." Id. Maintaining belief in this domestic-violence ideology requires trivializing domestic violence against men and ignoring contemporary laws that deny men sexual freedom and impose on men forced financial fatherhood. To avoid any misunderstanding, Pinker explains that, with respect to domestic violence, "feminism has been very good for men." Id. p. 412.

[4] Id. p. 394. Apparently to emphasize that he is a good man, Pinker also declares that "rape is always an atrocity"; it is a "heinous crime against the woman." Id. p. 398. Parroting dominant, mythic, women-were-men's-property history, Pinker declares:

> Rape was seen as an offense not against the woman but against a man — the woman's father, her husband, or in the case of a slave, her owner. … Rape is the theft of a woman's virginity from her father, or her fidelity from her husband. … When medieval European governments began to nationalize criminal justice, rape shifted from a tort against a husband or father to a crime against the state, which ostensibly represented the interests of women and society but in practice tilted the scales well toward the side of the accused.

Id. p. 395. For reality-based understanding of rape, see, e.g. historical literature about rape claims, the story of the nun of Watton, the Arabic poem ""If only al-Barrāq had an eye to see,", and the criminalization of seduction.

[5] Id. p. 405. Pinker heads a section "Women's Rights and the Decline of Rape and Battering." That heading underscores Pinker's unsubstantiated belief that enlightenment reduced men's violence against women. That heading also underscores Pinker's need to ignore men victims of rape and domestic violence. If men victims of rape and domestic violence (battering) actually exist in numbers similar to those of women victims, that would imply the urgency of further enlightenment and men's rights. Celebration of current enlightenment and no concern for men's rights characterize Pinker's highly honored and best-selling book.

[image] Leonid Brezhnev, leader of the Soviet Union, at a Communist Party Congress in Berlin in 1967. Brezhnev presided over a period in Soviet history known at the Era of Stagnation (Zastoy). Detail from photo with source attribution: Bundesarchiv, Bild 183-F0418-0001-020 / Gahlbeck, Friedrich / CC-BY-SA.

Reference:

Pinker, Steven. 2011. The better angels of our nature: why violence has declined. New York: Viking.

Article licenced under Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0

Beauty, misogyny and the Charlotte Proudman drama

AVfM Video Source · 12 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Recently, female barrister Charlotte Proudman sparked a social media furore by accusing a fellow lawyer of “disgusting sexism” for simply complimenting her photo. Janet Bloomfield gives her thoughts on beauty and misogyny.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?t=1&v=pscPaTsiZaQ

Mike Buchanan interviewed on Sky News about Charlotte Proudman

AVfM Video Source · 13 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Mike Buchanan of Justice for Men and Boys was interviewed live on Sky News about the media furore stirred up by Charlotte Proudman, the whiny 27-year-old feminist barrister who decided to publicly shame a 57-year-old male lawyer (working for another firm) for doing something that no reasonable person – feminists are excluded, by definition – would find wrong.

A Voice for Male Students: finding its way into the classroom

Jonathan Taylor · 13 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

It is said that if you build it they will come, and I have been hard at work building up resources depicting the men's and boys' education issues for quite some time. We are starting to see some of the benefits, with over 40 media and academic interviews, references, and citations in a mere 20 months.

And now, one way or another, we are finding our way into the classroom. When I walled off the website recently to restructure it and launch AVFMS 2.0, for example, this is an email I received from a graduate student asking for access to my lawsuits database:

I am currently working on a research project involving rape cases for [REDACTED] University. I was using the database on a voice for male students to help me with this research. It is very unfortunate that the site will reopen in July. So I was wondering if it is possible to access this information earlier.

And as the site reopened I soon found one of our key graphs on higher ed graduation rates being used in an undergraduate course and featured on a library page at San Antonio College (see the screenshot below). Apparently it was submitted by an undergraduate student, which is excellent – that is exactly where we need awareness of this issue to grow. The earlier they start asking questions the better.

This wasn't the first time we've been featured on a library website, by the way; Southern Connecticut State University also listed us as a top resource for the Men's Movement. And of course we find our way onto universities in other ways, my keynote presentation at KSU about boys' education not the least among them.

Fun fact: after that conference I looked at my site statistics and noticed an increase of traffic coming from online teacher training modules. You have to be enrolled to access the online modules and see exactly what they are saying, but the fact that I was in such a space to begin with was a win regardless.

This kind of thing is only going to increase over time as we ramp up our research database and conference projects. Ideologues and naysayers can only try to suppress awareness of these issues for so long, and with this platform positioned to be the best online resource for men's and boys' education issues we will be a key part of expanding the dialogue.

To the more extreme professors and administrators who resist this expanding dialogue, I say this: you cannot stop me. I am on your turf, and I will win. I am here for the duration, and my reach will only increase with time. Say hello to my students; they are bringing my work to your classroom.

Below is the screenshot (the AVFMS graph is found about halfway down):

Scholars confirm gynocentrism, declare males a demonic species

Douglas Galbi · 13 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

A prize-winning anthropologist at a leading U.S. university has explored how to tame what he describes as "our demonic male species." In an important book, he and his co-author considered how to bring about a revolution in human social organization such as that imagined in Charlotte Perkin Gilman's 1915 novel, Herland. The setting for that novel is an isolated society in which, long ago, all the males had been fortuitously killed. The women subsequently engender only females through asexual reproduction. The anthropology professor and his co-author recognized the implausibility of perfectly implementing this move toward an ideal society:

> Like Gauguin and Melville and Mead, Charlotte Perkins Gilman eliminated male violence from her portrait of an ideal society simply by eliminating males; and we cannot perfectly paste this story's lesson onto an ordinary two-sex society.[1]

They recognized, however, that prisons could make an important contribution to this program:

> Persuading the more violent men to abandon hopes of fatherhood would doubtless keep prison builders happy and, in the end, probably engender revolution. But even if the most aggressive, potentially violent men could be persuaded to step aside for the sake of future generations, what about the women? [2]

Men are currently incarcerated for having consensual sex and not being able to make court-ordered monthly payments for the next eighteen years. Should efforts to incarcerate men be expanded further? Of course, the more important question is: what about the women?

Long-before tiresome recent books such as Are Men Necessary? and The End of Men and the Rise Women, a leading biological anthropologist wrote a scholarly book with a chapter entitled, "The Pros and Cons of Males." She briefly discussed Herland, which she described as a "marvelous 1915 utopian novel." She also described Valerie Solanas's SCUM Manifesto as providing a "refuge from and defense against" the belief that women are "devoid of political instincts."[3] The SCUM Manifesto has obvious importance to elite anthropology. The SCUM Manifesto declares:

> the male is an incomplete female, a walking abortion, aborted at the gene stage. To be male is to be deficient, emotionally limited; maleness is a deficiency disease and males are emotional cripples. [4]

The SCUM Manifesto describes "rational men":

> Rational men want to be squashed, stepped on, crushed and crunched, treated as the curs, the filth that they are, have their repulsiveness confirmed.

This work of elite anthropological scholarship lamented, "This doctrine of female inferiority has disfigured several ostensibly impartial realms, particularly the study of human evolution."[5] That's the same scholarly logic that drives sexist studies of sexism.

Scholars have now recognized that females play a central role in determining primate social organization. Some scholars once believed that the Industrial Revolution led to patriarchy. Under patriarchy theory, men deprived women of economic resources and confined them within the (single-family, suburban, dull, and dehumanizing) home. Other scholars, however, have traced the origins of patriarchy back to the beginning of agriculture. That's when men's plows first started penetrating the earth, and men began placing seeds into the fertile ground. In the evocative description of a highly regarded anthropologist, it was "The Plow: Death Knell for Women."[6] However, scholarly competition and innovation has pushed patriarchy even further back into evolutionary history:

> Human patriarchy has its beginnings in the forest ape social world, a system based on males' social dominance and coercion of females. We can speculate that it was elaborated subsequently, perhaps in the woodland ape era, perhaps much later, by the development of sexual attachments with the same essential dynamic as gorilla bonds.… Men, following the evolutionary logic that benefits those who make the laws, would create legal systems that so often defined adultery as a crime for women, not for men – a social world that makes men freer than women.[7]

Key to this intellectual development was directing attention to female-bonded primate groups:

> If FB {female-bonded} groups have evolved as modeled, they support the view that male strategies are ultimately a result of female distribution, i.e. males compete for access to given clumps of females in a system of "female defense polygyny" {references omitted}. Consequently the number of females per group and the number of males per female are considered to depend ultimately on the strategies of females [8]

Gynocentrism rapidly achieved dominance in scholarly deliberation in anthropology and primatology. As a scholar of primate social organization noted in a scholarly article published in 2002:

> For much of the last twenty years, females have occupied center stage in theoretical and empirical analyses of primate social organization. [9]

Women have dominated social life (gynocentrism) for as long as humanity has existed. For humans and other primates, males' strategies depend on female behavior. Sociality evolved in primates because it enhanced females' access to resources.[10] Consistent with general patterns of primate life, elite men and women today compete to establish social rules that most effectively transfer resources from men to women.

Notes:

[1] Wrangham & Peterson (1996) p. 238. Richard Wrangham is the Ruth B. Moore Professor of Biological Anthropology and Wing Chair at Harvard University. He won a MacArthur Fellowship in 1987. Wrangham and Peterson describe Timothy McVeigh as an "all-American male" and Arnold Schwarzenegger as offering a "comic book caricature of the demonic male physique and persona." They lament, "As men, we have probably inadvertently neglected issues that women writers would have raised." Id. pp. 247, 240, 242. Compared to eliminating all men, gynocentrism has the advantage of exploiting men's material productivity and using men to fight other men.

[2] Id. p. 239.

[3] Hrdy (1981) p. 11. In 2001, Hrdy won the W.W. Howell Prize for outstanding contribution to biological anthropology.

[4] Solanas (1968) p. 1. The subsequent quote is from id. p. 16. Shortly after writing the SCUM Manifesto, Solanas shot and critically wounded one man, shot but missed another man, and attempted to shoot a third man. For these acts, she served about three years in prison. While the SCUM Manifesto has an honored place in elite scholarship, masterpieces of literature like Boccaccio's Corbaccio are condemned to oblivion.

[5] Hrdy (1981) p. 11. Discussion of claims of female inferiority function as an aspect of gynocentrism.

[6] Fisher (1999) p. 173.

[7] Wrangham & Peterson (1996) pp. 241-2. Other ambitious scholars have successfully traced males' exploitation of females back to anisogamy. The small sperm contributes less weight to the embryo than does the large egg. This alleged exploitation started about 1.2 billion years ago when the first sexually reproducing organisms evolved. Knowledge, capability, and interest in denouncing such sexual exploitation developed about 50 years ago.

Patriarchy has long imposed grotesquely unjust paternity laws on men and treated men as disposable persons.

[8] Wrangham (1980) pp. 287-8.

[9] Silk (2002) p. 85, describing the influential model of Wrangham (1980).

[10] Id.

[image] pair of Gibbons. Thanks to MatthiasKabel and Wikipedia.

References:

Fisher, Helen E. 1999. The first sex: the natural talents of women and how they are changing the world. New York: Random House.

Hrdy, Sarah Blaffer. 1981. The woman that never evolved. Cambridge, Mass., Harvard University Press.

Silk, Joan B. 2002. “Females, Food, Family, and Friendship.” Evolutionary Anthropology 11: 85-87.

Solanas, Valerie. 1968. SCUM manifesto: Society for Cutting Up Men. New York: Olympia Press.

Wrangham, Richard W. 1980. “An ecological model of the evolution of female-bonded groups of primates.” Behaviour 75: 262-300.

Wrangham, Richard W. and Dale Peterson. 1996. Demonic males: apes and the origins of human violence. Boston, Houghton Mifflin.

Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License.

Message to women: Child custody & alienation (video)

AVfM Video Source · 14 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Jasmin Newman is part of a growing number of powerful voices on an important issue:

https://youtu.be/u17BuVGCRJQ

Suffragettes still can't save feminism

Hannah Wallen · 14 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

About a year ago, I had my fill of feminists trying to use the late 19th & early 20th century suffragette movement as means of guilt tripping nonfeminist women over our lack of support for their modern, man-hating and discriminatory law lobby. In response, I published a post titled Suffragettes Can't Save Feminism. In it, I described the voting rights environment under which western suffragettes acted and explained why, rather than a struggle to free women from a system of gendered oppression, their actions were nothing but another example of feminism's gendered approach to genderless issues. It is often passive-aggressively misconstrued by social justice ideologues as an argument that women shouldn't have voting rights. When read without bias, however, it is clearly not. People of the nations discussed in that post deserved a unified fight for equal voting rights for all citizens regardless of sex, race, or economic background, and the suffragettes' focus on gender denied them that fight.

Now, there's a trailer out for a movie set to be released the day before Halloween. Once again, it appears that feminists are demanding that we view human experiences through a sexist filter that shows women and only women as victims, and only victims… and men as both gods and devils. The narrative the film looks made to support is the same one feminists currently promote. It treats women's experiences and interests as more valid and more relevant than men's, while attributing greater responsibility for their welfare to men than to themselves. The only redeeming factor I can see is that it doesn't appear the film makers ignored suffragette violence.

Attack on Prime Minister Asquith 1913 [alt]
Attack on at King's banquet hall [alt]
Murder attempt on Magistrate Curtiss Bennett [alt]
Horse-whipping doctor [alt]
Bombing [alt]
Bombing attempt
Bombing & threat [alt]
Vandalism & bomb threat [alt]
Pankhurst bomb deal
Pankhurst describes suffragette arson and bombing

Even if the film acknowledges that violence, it appears to be mitigated by a portrayal designed to excuse it in the minds of the viewers, and a failure to also include upper class suffragette bigotry against minorities, the poor, and men.

Stanton
Suffragette White Supremacy
Did violence get women the vote?
Women as dictators? [alt]
Suffragette female supremacy [alt]

In order to create the impression the film is made to instill, the makers seem to have ignored the list of suffragettes and suffragists involved in various nations' movements in favor of creating a fictional character.

The film's protagonist, a British suffragette named "Maud," is described on suffragettemovie.com as one of a supposed majority of suffragettes who were, "working women who had seen peaceful protest achieve nothing" and were "radicalised and turning to violence as the only route to change" at great risk to themselves and their families. She is not to be mistaken for real-life American Suffrag*ist* Maud Wood Park, a college graduate and professional educator. Park's work with the College Equal Suffrage League and the League of Women Voters involved canvassing, distributing leaflets, and public speaking, all in the interest of influencing policy makers through public opinion and public support. She's known as a pioneer of this style, now described as a front door lobby to differentiate it from the often suspect direct-to-politicians approach which generally excludes the public from the process.

Nor should the film's character Maud be confused with American women's advocate, consumer advocate, educator and suffrag*ist* Maud Nathan, who researched the working conditions of women retail clerks and advocated for reform as president of the Consumers' League of New York. Unlike the working class character, Maud Nathan hailed from an elite family.

Why couldn't the makers of Suffragette, the film, find a real-life suffragette or even a group whose activism and experiences they could make the basis and center of their story? Were they emulating the method used by Erich Maria Remarque when writing All Quiet on the Western Front? It will be interesting to see when the film is released whether it will be an historically accurate portrayal of the suffragettes, or the manipulative sales pitch comprised of selective presentation, false framing, and emotional appeal at which its trailer hints.

What sort of rape hoaxer are you, feminist?

August Løvenskiolds · 14 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

If you are a feminist, you are a rape hoaxer even if you have not concocted a false sexual assault story about yourself, you are an accomplice: you have likely advocated that we believe someone else's rape lie, regurgitated distorted, bogus rape statistics like the "1 in 5" lie, or benefited from the legal fallout from rape hoaxes like the Roe v Wade Supreme Court ruling that legalized abortion in the United States. Yes, even feminists admit that Roe began as a rape claim made (and later retracted) for political gain.

[I should note at this point that AVFM takes no position on the controversy over legal abortion other than to insist that the legal rights of both men and women should be equally respected and enforced when it comes to reproductive rights and indeed, all legal rights and obligations. Any attempt to debate legal abortion in the comments will be deleted.]

As we enter the autumn campus rape hoax season on universities around the world, a review of the various types and motivations behind rape hoaxes and rape hoaxers will help us understand this feminist phenomenon and, it is to be hoped, lower the damage they cause to men, women, and society as a whole.

To feminists, rape hoaxes are a political ploy that functions like a well-made multitool: it can work like a screwdriver to screw men over, a pair of pliers to tear money out of men's wallets, a blade to cut off men's penises, or a wire cutter to sabotage communication lines in men's social, educational or professional relationships. Rape hoaxes bring attention to lonely feminists, validate the victim status they crave (for a little while, anyway, unless the hoax is detected) and inevitably undermine the general opinion of actual rape victims, creating a vicious cycle that feminists can exploit in perpetuity to the detriment of actual rape victims and innocent men.

As I write those words, it occurs to me that they might be seen as sexist, since certain genders may not be familiar with multitools or even tool use at all. For those folks, let's say rape hoaxes are as useful to feminists as an immigrant handyman, skilled at a variety of mundane tasks and repairs that feminists are too lazy, entitled or incompetent to consider performing themselves.

Last year saw a number of feminist rape hoaxes unravel on the public stage, including, most notably, Jackie Coakley's gang rape hoax at the University of Virginia as reported, and then, retracted by Rolling Stone magazine, and mattress mule Emma Sulkowicz's rape hoax at Columbia University which ended with a thud when Sulkowicz used it as a stepping stone to launch her NSFW artsy if ugly porn star career.

The collapse of the feminist rape hoaxes caused a panic in their ranks and then disaster for feminists: at first, the feminists insisted that we should "believe the victims" uncritically: not question their accounts at all. As the truth started to come out, the feminists pivoted slightly to the meme "there is no perfect victim" in an effort to gloss over the deep and fatal flaws in the hoaxers' rape stories while trying to maintain their greasy-fingered grip on the fading narrative.

Recently, feminist Amanda Marcotte revealed the next feminist jerky juke move: in a book review, Marcotte posited a distinction between the generic rape hoax targeted at no specific man (like this new alleged one) and the specific rape hoax targeted at a specific man as the alleged aggressor. Here is what Marcotte, writing about the book Asking For It by feminist Kate Harding:

> The typical false reporter, [Harding] explains, is not "an evil minx who wraps the entire justice system around her little finger, just to hurt some poor, innocent man." Instead, a false reporter will more likely claim a stranger rape, and because her story is more lurid and sympathetic that the "typical rape cases" involving alcohol and a victim who knows her assailant, the false reporter will end up getting more attention—and more sympathy—than the vast majority of reporters who tell the truth.

Stranger rapes are fairly rare, so Marcotte seems to feel no reservation about throwing women actually raped by strangers under the bus. Likewise, acquaintance rapes almost always have complicating factors (like the “victim” continuing to date or even marry the “rapist”) that Marcotte is quick to discount.

Marcotte, of course, goes on to describe one rape hoaxer (Coakley) as a “troubled young woman” and not the vile miscreant that she is. Marcotte also does not identify the false reporters as ardent, strident feminists (as both Coakley and Sulkowicz are).

Furthermore, Marcotte is implicitly trying to minimize the perceived damage rape hoaxes do by spreading the fictional perpetrator(s) over the whole of all men. Instead of leaving her burning bag of shit on your porch (and possibly burning down your house), Marcotte tosses her shit into the nearest water reservoir, potentially sickening everyone, and then claims, “see, it is not that bad when feminists do it to no man in particular.”

There are many reasons (sometimes combined) for women to make rape hoaxes:

- The jilted lover, taking revenge on the man who left her or cheated on her. There is evidence that Sulkowicz was such a case.
- The walk-of-shamers, using a bogus rape claim to cover their own lascivious behavior once it is discovered by a spouse, steady lover, parent, or other morally judgmental person.
- The wannabe lover who fabricates a rape to trigger sympathy in another man or woman she has (perhaps unrequited) romantic designs on. There is some evidence that Jackie Coakley was one of this type.
- The gold digger who uses a rape claim in a get-rich-quick scheme, as happened in the Brian Banks case.
- The academic/professional rival, who fabricates a rape to sabotage a rival in order achieve some sort of advancement.
- The misandrist/man-hater feminist who does it out of spite, or the desire for the coveted feminist victim status.
- The attention whore.

Janet Bloomfield has more information on why women lie about rape here.

On college campuses where men and masculinity are culturally demonized and feminists inflate rape claims to gigantic proportions, it is no surprise that the rape hoax has become a staple crop instead of the poisonous weed that it should be.

What the MHRM does for men, and why we hate feminists

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 15 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Updated to add: If you are need of legal services, email janet@avoiceformen.com and I will see if we have a lawyer we can recommend. Our network is not huge, at the moment, but it's growing, and it will continue to grow.

I've noticed a new tactic lately when feminists comment on men's rights issues. Feminist comments have followed a trajectory from wah, shut up you crybaby neckbeard virgins, men don't have any issues to okay fine, men have issues but it's your fault anyways because patriarchy and toxic masculinity to this new fine, men have issues but the MHRM and MRAs don't actually do anything and blame women for their problems.

Have you noticed this new strategy? I've seen it on YouTube, Facebook, Twitter, and in the comments sections of any site or blog that addresses men's issues.

The accusation has two components:

- MRAs and the MHRM don't do anything to help men
- MRAs blame women for men's problems

Let's start with the second accusation first: MRAs blame women for their problems. No, they don't. They blame feminists for very specific problems, and feminist is not a synonym for women. Very few women identify as feminists, and the number of women who claim the label is in precipitous decline. Why do MRAs blame feminists? Because feminists stand directly in the way of men's legal, social and moral equality. Feminists literally oppose equality, if it means they have to surrender privilege, and more importantly, access to men's money. Feminists demand to be treated like damsels in distress when it suits them, and then screech about equality, when men have the upper hand.

Feminism is not the only problem when it comes to issues facing men and boys, but it's a big one.

Now let's take on the second accusation: MRAs and MHRM don't do anything to help men and boys. Oh really?

Paternity fraud

We are appearing in front of State Supreme Courts to argue for men's right to be protected from being defrauded of 18 years of income to support children they did not father. State by state, we are systematically challenging women's legal right to defraud a man of his income, claiming support for children the man did not biologically father. We will not rest until every man is protected from paternity fraud.

Who opposes men's right to reject claims of support for children they did not father? Why, that would be feminists! According to feminists, a woman should have the legal right to fuck any thug she likes, then pass the financial responsibility for the resulting child off on some poor schmuck who has no idea his woman is a whore.

MRAs and the MHRM are actively protecting men from fraud.

False rape allegations

We are creating, maintaining and sharing databases to help men on college campuses falsely accused of rape and sexual assault, allowing men who are wrongfully accused, denied due process and sanctioned to access precedents to bolster their own law suits against the institutions that wrongly sanctioned them.

The database also allows men to see at a glance that they can win these cases, and we do everything we can to inspire confidence and encourage lawsuits. We have an informal network of lawyers that we continue to build, with the aspiration to provide a comprehensive list of qualified lawyers in every jurisdiction.

Who is behind laws that deny men accused of rape and sexual assault due process on college campuses? That would be feminists. Feminists dream of a world in which any woman canretroactively define any sexual encounter as rape in order to punish a man who failed to live up to her expectations, or who rejected her. She will not have to provide any proof of any kind, and he will not be allowed to defend himself. This nightmare world is already reality on many college campuses, a situation the best legal minds in the nation reject as madness, and men continue to mount expensive lawsuits holding colleges accountable for their implementation of feminist fascism. These laws will not last under a barrage of lawsuits, and we will continue to compile and share those suits as they mount.

MRAs and the MHRM help men wrongfully accused of rape and sexual assault on college campuses to access information that can help them win their own lawsuits.

Domestic Violence

We are creating, maintaining and sharing information to help men who are victims of domestic violence.

When Erin Pizzey founded the first domestic violence shelter in the UK, she understood that domestic violence is a problem that victimizes and is perpetuated by men and women alike, and that solving the issue requires a discussion of women's violence against men and children. Feminists were furious, shot her dog, and threatened to shoot her children and Erin herself. This has not stopped Erin, who owns and operates WhiteRibbon.org, a website that contains information and resources for men and children who are victims of domestic violence.

No, the MHRM has not built a DV shelter for men. The operating costs for the average DV shelter run between $3 and 4 million dollars per year. Feminists don't fund DV shelters, either. They access government money, through various channels that explicitly define men as perpetrators, never as victims, and that refuse to address women's violence against children. Feminists have a vested interest in making certain domestic violence continues unabated, and even increases, as their income and employment depends on continued violence.

MRAs and the MHRM help men and children who are victims of domestic violence by creating, maintaining and sharing information that recognizes women's violence, and refuses to define men as toxic based on nothing more than gender. We have run public awareness campaigns and continue to lobby government to fund shelters for men and children.

Here's a few more things MRAs are doing to help men….

- We are creating, maintaining and sharing information with the public and training other mental health professionals to help men dealing with addictions, disabilities, high conflict relationships and grief
- We are running psychology practices and publishing books to help men dealing with personality disordered women with whom they have or have had an intimate relationship

- We are running online clinical practices to help men dealing with loss and grief
- We are delivering symposiums, talks, conferences and gatherings aimed at helping men understand and reject the dominant feminist narrative that defines them as toxic, inferior and a problem to be solved
- We are challenging corrupt family court officials and having them removed from office
- We are creating public awareness campaigns to draw attention to the way fathers are marginalized in the lives of their children
- We are running for public office
- We are writing in prominent journals, newspapers, blogs and online magazines
- We are in the nation's research institutes, making videos and writing articles that challenge the dominant feminist narrative that define men as wrong and bad, simply because they are men

We are doing almost all of this on our own dime. It took organized feminism several decades to access billions of dollars in government funding to run programs that benefit women and girls, while ignoring or outright denying the issues facing boys and men. It will not take us decades because we live in an age of rapid communications.

Which brings us to the single most important thing MRAs and the MHRM does to help men and boys and the women and girls who care about all human beings: we are changing the cultural narrative. We are forcing open a space in the dialogue where women can express their support for men, where men can discuss their issues free from accusations of toxicity,oppression and privilege, and where feminism is revealed as the hateful, sexist, bigoted ideology it really is.

For a very long time, websites like A Voice for Men and The National Coalition for Men were lonely voices in a large crowd. Those voices have now been joined by a chorus of other voices, and the chorus grows bigger and louder and stronger every day.

Sing hallelujah. And hold onto your asses, feminists.

You're done.

Lots of love,

JB

[Ed. note: This post originally appeared at www.judgybitch.com and is reprinted here with permission.]

Tommy Sotomayor on why everyone should hate feminism

AVfM Video Source · 15 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Women are innocent, blushing, simple creatures, terrified in the face of men's crass, gross, hyper-sexualized efforts to steal their innocence from them. Men, you must help women!

Or maybe not. Tommy Sotomayor has a few thoughts.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=hMnTf-WrvDo

An annoucement about a CAFE event and the ideologues who don't want it to happen

Paul Elam · 15 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Publisher's note: Normally, as unaffiliated supporters of CAFE, we publish their announcements in the news or bulletin areas of this site. Today I am posting this as a featured article because circumstances around this event demand a higher profile and more discussion, as well as the effort to have more people attend the lecture by journalist Cathy Young.

In recent days some sort of threats were allegedly made against women generally, feminists generally and specifically against the gender studies department at the University of Toronto. There is currently no information available on who allegedly made these threats and I have been informed by reliable sources that the Toronto Police have looked into the matter and have concluded that any concerns about the matter are baseless. In short, they investigated the matter and found nothing to take seriously.

My personal impression is that if the Toronto Police Department does not find cause for concern in supposed threats that were aimed at young university women, then they likely have very good reason for that position.

The facts here are still very concerning, though not about personal risks to women. Nothing about these threats were of concern to authorities. No one knows the source of said threads. It cannot even be demonstrated that they did not come from opponents to the event as a false flag. Still, there are people already at work trying to convert this mole hill into a mountain of reasons why Cathy Young should not speak; why CAFE is a "misogynist" group and why men's advocates should have no place on college campuses in Canada.

For all this I urge people to remember that despite the great amount of progress we have made in raising awareness on men's issues, there are still many people in positions of great influence who are determined to silence those trying to help men and boys.

If you can attend the lecture by Cathy Young, please do. Also, for those who can, please donate to CAFE for the incredible work they are doing on behalf of men and boys.

As always, if you attend, please bring the same invaluable tools you have always brought to events like this; your intellect, your knowledge and your peaceful, thoughtful reactions to those who would demonize you and cast you as a threat. Thank you. PE

♦♦♦

MEDIA ADVISORY – FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

Men's Issues Group CAFE Condemns Threats Targeting Feminists and Women

Calls on U of T to Host Townhall Event Before Prominent Journalist Cathy Young Addresses "The Politics of Gender" next week

TORONTO, ONTARIO — (September 15, 2015) The Canadian Association for Equality (CAFE) and the U of T Men's Issues Awareness Society (UTMIAS) condemn in the strongest possible language threats of violence targeting feminists and women at the University of Toronto.

"We stand shoulder to shoulder with those who have been threatened," said CAFE Executive Director Justin Trottier. "It has been our long-stated belief that intimidation against those who hold opinions with which you disagree is an attack against all of us. Each person must feel safe to express themself without fear of intimidation or harassment."

Cathy Young, the well known journalist and "equity feminist," will speak at the University of Toronto on Thursday, September 24th and in Ottawa on Friday, September 25th, at the event "The Politics of Gender and Victimhood," planned weeks ago by the UTMIAS and sponsored by CAFE.

“Our events discuss suicide, fatherhood, men’s health and the need for inclusive public policies to support all victims of violence,” said Trottier. “We cannot allow intimidation to close down debate on critical gender issues. But it is the responsibility of those hosting dialogue to work to ensure the safety of all participants.”

Given recent threats, as well as the harassment by those protesting previous CAFE-sponsored event, there may be legitimate safety concerns on all sides. A safe walk service for any guest requesting it will be provided at the Cathy Young talks to and from the event to vehicles or the TTC.

CAFE has also contacted the University of Toronto administration and those groups targeted by online threats to recommend a public dialogue to discuss how we can confront intimidation that affects us all. “It is time for all those who put the well-being of people ahead of our commitment to ideology to come together and resolve this situation.”

CONTACT
Justin Trottier
Executive Director, Canadian Association for Equality
416-402-8856
jtrottier@equalitycanada.com

♦♦♦

Contact info for the event.

And a follow up annoncement from CAFE regarding the alleged threats.

MEDIA ADVISORY – FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

Men’s Issues Group CAFE Condemns Threats Targeting Feminists and Women

Calls on U of T to Host Townhall Event Before Prominent Journalist Cathy Young Addresses “The Politics of Gender” next week

TORONTO, ONTARIO — (September 15, 2015) The Canadian Association for Equality (CAFE) and the U of T Men’s Issues Awareness Society (UTMIAS) condemn in the strongest possible language threats of violence targeting feminists and women at the University of Toronto.

“We stand shoulder to shoulder with those who have been threatened,” said CAFE Executive Director Justin Trottier. “It has been our long-stated belief that intimidation against those who hold opinions with which you disagree is an attack against all of us. Each person must feel safe to express themself without fear of intimidation or harassment.”

Cathy Young, the well known journalist and “equity feminist,” will speak at the University of Toronto on Thursday, September 24th and in Ottawa on Friday, September 25th, at the event “The Politics of Gender and Victimhood,” planned weeks ago by the UTMIAS and sponsored by CAFE.

“Our events discuss suicide, fatherhood, men’s health and the need for inclusive public policies to support all victims of violence,” said Trottier. “We cannot allow intimidation to close down debate on critical gender issues. But it is the responsibility of those hosting dialogue to work to ensure the safety of all participants.”

Given recent threats, as well as the harassment by those protesting previous CAFE-sponsored event, there may be legitimate safety concerns on all sides. A safe walk service for any guest requesting it will be provided at the Cathy Young talks to and from the event to vehicles or the TTC.

CAFE has also contacted the University of Toronto administration and those groups targeted by online threats to recommend a public dialogue to discuss how we can confront intimidation that affects us all. “It is time for all those who put the well-being of people ahead of ideology to come together and resolve this situation.”

Dr. Lemon and monstrous male myths

Jonathan Taylor · 15 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I'd like to introduce you to my favorite article in The Chronicle of Higher Education. It is written by Dr. Christina Hoff-Sommers, and it critiques a law-school casebook called Lemon's Domestic Violence Law, which is "a collection of judicial opinions, statutes, and articles" about domestic violence. One particular section of this book offers criminology and law students a historical perspective on the legal foundation behind domestic-violence law. Here is an excerpt from that passage:

> The history of women's abuse began over 2,700 years ago in the year 753 BC. It was during the reign of Romulus of Rome that wife abuse was accepted and condoned under the Laws of Chastisement…the laws permitted a man to beat his wife with a rod or switch so long as its circumference was no greater than the girth of the base of the man's right thumb. The law became commonly know as 'The Rule of Thumb.' These laws established a tradition which was perpetuated in English Common Law in most of Europe.

In her article at The Chronicle, Dr. Hoff-Sommers points out one small problem with this story. Romulus of Rome never existed because he is a figure of Roman mythology. According to Roman mythology he was born from a union between the god Mars (you may know him by his Greek name Ares, the God of War) and a vestal virgin. He was abandoned as a child, and survived only by being breastfed by a wolf. And, so the legend goes, he went on to found Rome, and upon his death ascended into heaven, becoming a deity called Quirinus.

This is like opening up a 20th century world history textbook and reading a passage that says "World War Two was a war that spanned numerous continents and killed millions of people, until it was finally ended by the united efforts of Captain America, Spider Man, and the Incredible Hulk." It is on that level of absurdity.

In modern academia – at least in Dr. Lemon's classroom – Iron Age mythology is being taught as though it were scholarly fact. And students are paying thousands of dollars to "learn" it.

One more small problem: there was never a law regarding the so-called "rule of thumb" in the United States, nor – as Dr. Sommers notes – "has anyone ever been able to find such a law."

When confronted about her questionable claims regarding Romulus's "historic reign," Dr. Lemon, the author of this book, defended her statement by citing an ancient man named Plutarch. Who is Plutarch? He is a priest of the Greek pantheon – of Apollo specifically.

So yes – we can cite a priest of the Greek pantheon to prove the existence of a mythological figure in real life. And Paul Bunyan dug the grand canyon by dragging his ax behind him. This might be a children's story, but don't worry – I can cite sources to prove it.

My friend and former colleague, a man named Dr. Barnes, once told me that stupidity is not a state of being; no one is born stupid. On the contrary, stupidity is an attitude. In particular, an attitude by with people approach and ascertain evidence.

But who is Nancy Lemon, by the way? She is a law professor at Berkley. Here is her bio:

Nancy Lemon, a leading authority on domestic violence for more than 29 years, pioneered its study in law schools and is the author of Domestic Violence Law, the premiere textbook on the subject (West Group, 3d. Ed. 2009). "Premiere textbook."

Lemon has been teaching the Domestic Violence Seminar at Boalt -the first law school class of its kind- since 1988, and also directs the Domestic Violence Practicum. Lemon has specialized in domestic violence law as an advocate and practicing attorney…
Isn't that a scary thought – her being an attorney?

…working both with victims of domestic abuse…
"Victims" is of course feminist-speak for accusers.

…and police and public agencies charged with responding to domestic crime. As director of the Domestic Violence Unit of Alameda County's Legal Aid Society in 1981, Lemon trained attorneys and shelter workers along with Oakland police officers, and was instrumental in creating the Southern Alameda County Domestic Violence Law Project. Lemon subsequently served as coordinator of the Mid-Peninsula Support Network and was legal program director of Battered Women's Alternatives, now Stand Against Domestic Violence, in Contra Costa from 1983 to 1987. She has also worked as a staff attorney and volunteer coordinator for Alameda County's Family Violence Law Center.Lemon served on the board of the California Partnership to End Domestic Violence, as well as its predecessor, the California Alliance Against Domestic Violence (CAADV), where she helped draft and work toward the passage of many pieces of state legislation benefiting victims of domestic violence and their children. She currently consults and testifies as an expert witness on domestic violence in criminal prosecution, defense, family law, asylum, and tort cases.

She was an associate editor of Domestic Violence Report from 1995 to 2009, a national bimonthly journal (Civic Research Institute, NJ). Dr. Lemon holds a B.A. degree in Women's Studies, a major she co-founded, from the University of California, Santa Cruz, and earned a J.D. degree from Boalt Hall.

Surprise surprise – a degree in Women's Studies. I guess that's where all the magic began. Too bad the fantasy storytelling didn't end there.

When I enrolled in higher education I was a recently "converted" agnostic. In my desire to escape from the highly dogmatic nature of the church and my religious upbringing, I had stars in my eyes about academia and saw academia as a beacon of enlightenment where – above all else – the dispassionate analysis and the pursuit of objective truth are prized. Part and parcel of what some would a few decades ago have called "the idea of the university."

When I got on the other side of the teacher's desk, however, I discovered that far too often academia was the exact opposite of that; that instead it was a place to discuss ideas that were socially and politically fashionable, often to the detriment of the pursuit of knowledge and the truth.

It is incredibly dangerous to have people like Dr. Nancy Lemon teaching young impressionable minds the "truth" of the world. But this absurdity by Dr. Lemon is not an isolated incident in academia; it is a sign of the times.

Does anyone remember this little thing called the 2006 Duke lacrosse false rape case? You know, that case where a black stripper falsely accused three white men on the duke lacrosse team of raping her at a frat house?

Eighty-eight members of the faculty – which were (surprise surprise) from the humanities – speaking for 5 academic departments and 10 academic programs, signed their names to a statement in which they condemned the lacrosse players and took the side of the accuser, whose story was later proven false. Over 70% of the women's studies faculty were signatories.

What happened to their critical thinking skills? Isn't fostering such skills what a university is for? Well not quite, and as Nancy Lemon from Berkley and the Gang of 88 from Duke University prove, it tends to get worse the higher up in academia you go.

Many people in higher ed like to proclaim themselves as champions of equality and diversity. Nothing could be further from the truth. As we have seen time and time again, you can be as bigoted and as hateful as you want. You can spout sexist myths that denigrate an entire group of people. You can institute discrimination in policy and practice and rob people of their educational and occupational futures based on sex. So long as you do it against men and stamp the label of "feminist" on it.

And where are all of these so-called champions of equality and diversity? Ninety-nine percent of the time if they are not hiding underneath their desks, they are an active part of the problem.

Let's support men's issues groups – especially those in academia – that are changing the discussion in a more balanced way. Once this overrated ideology is removed from its deified status, perhaps then we can have an honest discussion about the state of men and women in the 21st century.

Here is the video:

https://youtube.com/watch?v=zPWZqChjfIE%3Ffeature%3Doembed%26wmode%3Dopaque

Three days in North Carolina

Paul Elam · 16 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Augoost Lowenhardtopronounce recently wrote an article on some of the food we served up at the men-only retreat in North Carolina. True to his words, the food was great! And there were more victuals than he mentioned in his write-up. Good old fashioned mac and cheese, chili, jalapeno cheddar cornbread, red beans and rice and other delights kept the spoons and forks working and the kitchen in a constant state of disaster.

Also, the libations available kept everyone in great spirits (pun intended).

I recently posted a two-minute video of many in the group having a raucous, rather juvenile moment. Ten thousand views and hundreds of down votes later, the comments to that video are full of deluded SJWs thinking that this was some sort of "gotcha" moment. I will be making another video in response to their sexist, homophobic, staggeringly hypocritical remarks. That should be up later tonight or tomorrow.

I also got some expected flak from a small handful of respected MHRAs for posting those two minutes. In my response, I will also point out why I think their concerns are miscalled.

Before doing any of that, however, I want to tell you about the retreat. Not in a two-minute video of guys cutting up but in what actually happened the remaining 4,078 minutes of the retreat.

First, there was the cooperation. During the entire event I never once heard someone say, "This (or that) needs to be done." What I heard over and over was "What can I do to help?" It was not a rhetorical question from people who just wanted to appear willing. These were men that rolled up their sleeves before even asking what they could do.

In the cool of one evening there was a poetry reading. There was a man who wept and talked about the pain he felt when he was demonized for loving his son and wanting time with him. There was an expert in plant life who explained our immediate environment in a way that lent new meaning to everything around us. There was a lawyer washing dishes by hand behind a very large group of men. He didn't even bother asking what he could do to help. He just found something that needed to be done and did it.

Another man noticed a weak railing on the lower deck and tied a number of red flags on it, then made sure everyone knew why they were there.

There was a man who woke up early every morning to make pancakes and coffee for everyone. Like everything else that happened there, no one asked him to do it.

There was a moment of recognition for two men who have sacrificed immeasurably to follow their values and to insist to a hostile world that men are human beings. No trophies. No longwinded speeches. Just the open expression of brotherly love for men who actually know what brotherhood is about.

There were men from the US, Canada, India and the UK, all connected. Not just by a common language, but a common cause.

There was a truck driver, an entrepreneur, a biologist, an attorney, writers and musicians, psychotherapists and counselors, a corporate mail room worker, a former college professor, a computer tech support provider, an engineer and others whose professions I do not know. There were Republicans and Democrats. There were Libertarians and the completely apolitical. There were Christians and Atheists. There were married men and MGTOWs. There were men in their 20s, 30s, 40s, 50s, and 60s. All of these people, these men, connected and shared in each other's strength, wisdom and respect.

Those of us awake at the ungodly hour of noon.

The point is that none of our so-called differences made any difference at all. From the moment we arrived till the last suitcase was removed, we were what so many SJWs claim to be — and who fail at it in spectacular fashion. We were a group of men whose differences were completely eclipsed by our shared dreams, hopes and ideas.

Did we exclude women? Yes we did. Will we do that again? Most definitely.

There will be other retreats in the future. Women will be invited to many of them. The women of AVFM and the MHRM are also welcome to their own retreats. We will be happy to support that.

The men at AVFM hold our fellow female activists in very high regard but we will never buckle under the weight of the foolish idea that there is anything wrong with male space. If the retreat proved anything, it proved before my very eyes that male space is not about division. It is about love and respect. Each and every man who joined us in North Carolina for that weekend walked and talked the very meaning of those words.

There was one other thing that filled that weekend. Beauty. The mountains around us were thick with foliage the color of emerald. High atop the mountain we had the view of clouds at eye level; fluffs of gentle whiteness against the azure of a flawless sky.

Kudzu blanketed parts of the landscape, including massive patches of trees and abandoned houses from times long past; living sculptures too beautiful for me to do them justice with mere words. In the same respect, I am limited in what I can convey about three magical days where the kinship between men took shape as its own work of art.

Cooking FAQs answered from the Men's Only Retreat MORNC 2015

August Løvenskiolds · 16 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I returned early this morning (9/14) from the Men's Only Retreat (MORNC 2015) held in the beautiful mountains of North Carolina. I'm filled with ideas for new articles but before I get into the heavier stuff, I wanted to acknowledge my gratitude for all the men who attended the retreat – it was a warm and inspiring time for me and I hope others had a similar experience. If it is at all possible I hope I get the chance to attend the next one.

The drive to North Carolina was harrowing – bad weather dogged us the way there but cleared up for the duration of the retreat. It took 3 tries to force the car up the steep gravel mountain road to the lodge – one less person in the car and we might not have had enough traction to complete the trip. The upside was the feeling of complete safety in the lodge = no feminist will ever have the guts to attempt to scale such a treacherous path. The temperature stayed steadily on the cool side, further microaggressing any potential feminist interlopers.

Most of us helped out with the cooking and cleanup as communal activities. I helped prepare some of the meals over the four days and I fielded a lot of questions about the food preparation. Here are a few of them and my answers:

How did you get the bacon to turn out so well?

Most people fry bacon in some sort of skillet, or microwave it on paper towels, but when preparing large amounts of bacon (about 10 pounds overall in this case), baking it in an oven is the best bet. I used 4 large sheet pans, each large enough to hold about 2/3 of a pound of bacon at a time. I placed the bacon slices side-by-side, and baked them at 400 degrees for 15 minutes or until the bacon was slightly browned with a dynamic mass of pinpoint bubbles on top of each slice.

Professional chefs recommend using parchment paper under the bacon but since we had none, I put it directly on the metal pans. It was a simple matter to use a metal spatula to loosen and remove the freshly baked pieces.

When using thicker cut bacon, one should increase the cooking time to 18 minutes. If you use a broiler pan instead of a sheet pan, cut the temperature down to 375 – the extra air circulation under the bacon can make it cook a bit too fast. Of course, oven performance can vary but the above guidelines are a solid starting point.

What was the recipe for the squash casserole?

I just made it up from scratch based on what we had available – normally I'd look for smaller squash – but if you want to try to reproduce it, here's what I did:

- 3 large zucchini
- 3 large summer (yellow) squash
- 1 large ripe (beefsteak or similar) tomato
- 2/3 stick salted butter
- 3 small cloves fresh garlic, smashed and minced
- 1 teaspoon Ms Dash Southwest Chipotle Spice Blend
- 1/4 cup Teriyaki Sauce (Kikkoman).
- Fresh ground black pepper

Slice the squash into thick, quarter-sized chucks. and place in a Pyrex baking dish.

Cut the tomato in half, then squeeze the halves over the sink to force out the seeds (which can turn bitter when baked). Remove and discard the stem scar, then cut the tomato into quarter-size chunks. Sprinkle the chunks over the squash. Cut the butter into slices and top the squash mixture. Sprinkle the rest of the ingredients over the dish and cover with heavy-duty aluminum foil. Bake at 375 degrees for about 30-40 minutes. Allow to cool for 5 minutes and serve.

What is the recipe for the pancakes?

I used the pancake recipe from food.com with the following modifications:

First, I used Jumbo Eggs, the largest we could find, in the hope that the outsized eggs had caused the maximum amount of pain to the chickens' vagina.

Sorry, of course I am kidding – chickens have cloacae, not vaginae.

I used a non-stick pan, so it was not necessary to grease it first.

I used salted butter instead of margarine. Professional chefs usually recommend using unsalted butter but I've never had a problem using the salted kind,

I couldn't find any measuring spoons, so I had to estimate the amounts of the minor ingredients.

Although I kept the pancakes basic, one can add vanilla, cinnamon, bananas, sweet potatoes, etc, for more variety.

What seasonings did you use in the pinto beans?

As the large pot with 24 servings of beans started to boil, I added one thinly sliced Jalapeno, fresh garlic, chopped fresh yellow onion (left over from the previous day's burgers), Ms Dash Southwest Chipotle Spice Blend, cumin powder, and a couple of splashes of Nakano rice vinegar; after the beans had simmered long enough to soften, I added salt and fresh ground pepper to taste. Adding salt too early toughens the beans, and the pepper to early can scorch it. I usually add bacon or ham when I prepare beans but since we had a couple of vegetarians attending I wanted to keep the vegetable dishes free from meat.

It was a great time, and more articles are forthcoming.

Thanks again, everyone.

"Hot cake" by I (Potesara) – Self-photographed. Licensed under CC BY-SA 2.5 via Wikimedia Commons – https://commons.wikimedia.org/wiki/File:Hot_cake.jpg#/media/File:Hot_cake.jpg

Jack Barnes interviews some reunion attendees

AVfM Video Source · 17 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

As always, Jack thinks to do the right thing. PE

Shoe0nHead: internalized misogyny

AVfM Video Source · 17 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Hush now woman, the patriarchy is real and it is inside of you.

Reddit feminists talk about gynocentrism

Peter Wright · 18 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The following Reddit discussion of the concept "gynocentrism" is one of the first to appear on social media among feminists. Seems they have figured out that the Men's Human Rights community have a coherent psychosocial theory under the heading gynocentrism, and that the growing reach of the term has become unavoidable. Feminists discuss its implications and, as you will see from the Reddit comments, some are getting with it, and some are rejecting it.

> [image] There was a comment in this thread that I found very interesting. It was in response to the question "what do MRAs attribute men's problems to?" It didn't receive any replies and I can't find a discussion specifically on the topic (although it does crop up here and there), so I'm highlighting it for comments here.
>
> > The more sophisticated among [the MRM] operate with a curious concept called "gynocentrism". Essentially, they view feminism as ONE of the possible manifestations of "gynocentrism" (intended largely as society's alleged prioritization of women over men, as an anthropological universal rooted in evo-psych) – and patriarchal societies as other possible manifestations of the same core phenomenon.
> >
> > The basic idea goes something like this: feminism does not have the potential to "rework" the core psycho-social dynamic between the sexes and it, arguably, never wanted to do so. It is a sort of "more of the same, but vested differently" movement that, rather than addressing men's issues as a part of an attempt to "rework" the system, has exacerbated them – and by design, exploiting society's preexisting (evo-psych etc.) preference for women and "male disposability" that is closely tied into it. The latter concept is derived from Farrell to my knowledge.
> >
> > So, they don't actually claim that "feminism" (in "" because what they describe is a caricature – whether of feminism intended typologically or of feminism narrow-sense as in Anglo/American feminist movement spanning over the last century) is the source of all evil, but rather alleged universals of human psychology that got encoded in law and created social dynamics such as to prefer women at the expense of men, and this never changes, so "feminism" is more of the old presented as something new – and in many ways worse than the old it came to replace.
> >
> > To refute this idea properly more than a forum-post space is needed (and I'm closing my account anyhow as soon as I finish the other post here – I won't delete those); suffice to say that I find it reductive at best, and seriously misleading at worst.
>
> [I would note that I disagree with the final concept in paragraph 2. I don't think it's necessary to suppose that feminism, as a movement, has deliberately, collaboratively exploited any societal preferences. Individual feminists, limited as we all are by our single viewpoint on life, may have unwittingly taken advantage of a societal preference for addressing issues with the wellbeing of women and this may have had a cumulative effect.]
>
> I found this a very interesting comment, partly because I'm not familiar with the concept and I've not seen a thorough description of a core theoretical concept of the MRM, but also because I think the concept of gynocentrism does have some explanatory power. Incorporating it into historical theory explains why women and men have been treated differently. Women, whose wellbeing is key to the survival of any society, have been placed at its centre, sometimes in a fairly literal sense i.e., being surrounded by a protective circle of disposable men, but also metaphorically within the stratifications of society i.e., women are protected from dirty, dangerous jobs at the bottom, but also kept away from overt, outward-facing positions of power that expose them to external and political danger. They have instead been placed (or just ended up) at the centre of everyday life with great deal of influence/power over the day-to-day workings of society.

> Importantly, the inclusion of gynocentrism explains the different treatment of men and women without having to resort to implausible degradations of the character of the majority of men throughout history as is required by misogyny-based explanations such as those summarised by “women have always been oppressed”, “society hates women” or “men have been raised to hate women”. This would make any movement that includes gynocentrism in its worldview much more attractive to men. Also note that gynocentrism isn’t a moral justification for the treating men and women differently, especially in modern western society, it is just an explanation for some consistent historical observations. Furthermore, including gynocentrism doesn’t deny the existence of misogynistic influences on society e.g., many religions have a deeply misogynistic message, so the two concepts can exist hand in hand.
>
> So, I’d be interested in your views on the concept of gynocentrism. As I noted, I’m not so interested in the MRM’s view on feminism in relation to gynocentrism (although all comments are welcome), but on your opinions of the concept of gynocentrism itself. Do you believe that it has any validity or explanatory power? Do you think that it is a more valid concept than “benevolent sexism”? Do you think that it is compatible with feminist theory? Do you think that incorporating it into a social movement would give that movement more validity or broaden its appeal?

The comments can be read here.

The case of Zach Jesse – can men's rights help women too?

Hank Miller · 18 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Commonly, people are told that organizations that advocate for men's rights are unnecessary because feminism, when done right, is pro-man as well as being pro-women. Since feminists are also looking out for men and advancing men's issues, we are told, men should rally behind these organizations and let women take charge of making the world a better place for men.

The fact that this claim is demonstrably false is likely no surprise to most readers of this site. When men and boys are consistently lagging further and further behind in education, systematically denied due process rights when accused of crimes, and disproportionately targeted by policies that punish boys for being boys, the claim that feminism is helping men rings hollow indeed.

What is less obvious, though much more interesting, is that the claim may be the exact inverse of the truth. In short, it may be the case that, in certain instances, advancing the cause of men's rights is the way to advance the cause of women as well.

Consider the recent case of Zach Jesse. To the best of my knowledge this case received very little publicity, but it perfectly illustrates the problems with the present spat of rape hysteria that has been inflicted on Americans.

Zach Jesse is a 30-year-old law-school graduate who pled guilty in 2004 to a charge of aggravated sexual battery against a fellow student at UVA (he was 18 when the incident took place). He served his sentence and entered University of Richmond law school in 2011. In his own words, he "meant to use it as a stepping stone to better myself and the community around me rather than a ball-and-chain."

A couple months ago, he made the Top 8 of a high-profile Magic: the Gathering event in Atlantic City. While he was playing in the Top 8, which was streamed on Twitch, a few prominent members of the Magic community unearthed the fact that Jesse was a sex offender and created a firestorm out of it (read Jesse's response to it here).

This culminated a couple weeks ago with Jesse receiving a lifetime ban from playing Magic: the Gathering from Wizards of the Coast, the manufacturer of Magic. His Magic Online account was also seized. The only statement Wizards of the Coast has made about the banning is this:

> We work hard to make sure all players feel welcomed, included and safe at our events so that they can have fun playing Magic. We don't generally comment on individuals or provide position statements in the abstract, but we take action to address player issues and community concerns when we feel it is necessary.

There has been a large, though mixed, public reaction to this happening. Some defend Wizards of the Coast's Actions, arguing that playing Magic is a privilege, not a right, and that Hasbro, Wizards' parent company, likely doesn't want a convicted sex offender as one of the public faces of a game marketed to children.

Others defend Jesse's cause, arguing that Wizards is out of line banning Jesse for an incident that happened over ten years ago and for which he has tried very hard to move past. Defenders also point out that at least one member of the Magic Hall of Fame was convicted of drug trafficking 15 years ago and has not received anything approaching this kind of treatment (in fact, by virtue of being in the Hall of Fame, he is automatically invited to all Magic Pro Tours and receives appearance fees from Wizards of the Coast for attending all sorts of Magic events).

Perhaps the most interesting comment on Jesse's case, though, came from a Magic Judge named Tasha Jamison:

> As a woman, as someone who has experienced domestic violence and sexual assault, one of the ideas that has held me back from reporting is the idea that 'reporting would ruin [the accused]'s life.' This makes me sick to the stomach because it reinforces that idea: here is a person who has served his time, who has complied with all requirements, who appears to me to be genuinely remorseful and committed to public service.

> … and he gets what is effectively a lifetime ban from the competitive Magic community when his prior conviction came to public attention due to his strong performance.
>
> Since he has a conviction, I hesitate to bring in the rhetoric of 'false rape claims,' but it's going to hover around anyway. It seems to me that this ban is something that gives credibility to the idea that women have the power to ruin men's lives through false rape claims, which reduces the credibility of anyone who accuses someone of sexual assault (even when the evidence is sufficient to satisfy a court of law), which in turn reduces the willingness of a victim to pursue any sort of formal action.

In essence, if you give women the power to ruin a man's life, some women will be hesitant to utilize that power, even if they otherwise ought to.

What we have seen from the erosion of due process is that many women will make use of false rape claims to 'punish' men in their lives or to avoid taking responsibility for a problematic sexual encounter. In fact, current policies often encourage this sort of behavior by failing to hold the accuser to account for false claims.

This topic has been explored in great depth on this and other sites dealing with this issue. What we also need to see, however, is that the policies eroding due process also hurt women by making them more hesitant to report when a rape actually does take place. In short, the erosion of due process rights both makes false accusations more likely and also makes it more likely that real offenses are not reported.

It seems obvious that feminism, in arguing that due process rights be denied to men accused of rape, is actually doing a disservice to the cause of women who want to see justice served on the issue of rape. If feminism is not only failing but proving counterproductive to the ends for which it was intended, then perhaps there needs to be a new approach to this issue, strengthening rather than weakening due process rights for accused individuals and calling everyone, women as well as men, to take responsibility for their actions rather than always seeking to place blame for bad circumstances at the feet of someone else.

AVFM: No more cowards, cunts or concern trolls

Paul Elam · 19 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Things are about to change at AVFM. Please forgive me as I try to explain it. It's a tad complicated. I hope that by the time you finish this piece you will grasp it well enough and that I will accomplish more than just confusing you.

Perhaps a better way to put it is that AVFM is taking another major, visible step forward toward the completion of our mission. We will see that evidenced by a drop in traffic to this site. Sound strange? Read on, brothers and sisters.

AVFM has been an enormous, inarguable success at throwing a wrench in the droning cultural narrative about sexual politics. Feminism is now a galactic level joke, and despite the fact that it still does serious damage to society, we have been freed to address the underlying problem — gynocentrism.

That is a critical move because everything we stand for, and everything we stand against is connected to gynocentrism in one way or another. Feminism, homophobia toward gay men, rigid, compulsory traditionalism, male disposability, male demonization, the drugging of our boys and the shaming of men as the mainstay of our cultural narrative are all about gynocentrism. Feminism is a great and easy target but not material that we can put in the crosshairs for the headshot.

Now that the world basically knows that feminists are lying, evil shitstains, it is even more important to show the world just how the stains got there.

This demands a move forward that is at once subtle and glaring.

Those changes are now made easier by the fact that people like Milo Y., Sargon, members of #gamergate, sites like Brietbart and a growing collection of others who have suddenly found religion and "discovered" the feculent realities of modern feminism are recognizing issues we have been addressing for six years. As our intellectual offspring they are making good hay of it on robust platforms. Perhaps in time they will catch up to our work again when they figure out a few things about gynocentrism.

In the meantime they can continue to walk through the doors we kicked in for them, whether they recognize it or not, doing a lot of good in the process.

Accordingly, we will be putting much more focus on gynocentrism vs feminism in the future (not that we will ever stop bashing feminists).

We will also be putting much more focus on inventive forms of activism rather than just informing the world of what it is now waking up to, thanks to AVFM.

That is where things get a little complicated. That is where I am about to piss a few people off. That is ok, though, because the people I will piss off don't matter in relation to our activist mission. They actually never have.

I estimate (very roughly) that there are about 300 actual MHRAs in the world, not including the very high numbers of activists in India. I also estimate (less roughly) that about a third of those 300 people are either on AVFM staff, write for us or are financial supporters. I also know a handful of people who actually cannot work on our staff and cannot afford to subscribe who nonetheless give moral and brotherly support that makes them as valuable as any working activist.

Here's the deal. We have thousands, sometimes tens of thousands of people every day come to this website. If 2%, or even 1% of them either subscribed or volunteered, we would be ten times as powerful and effective today than we are.

The sad fact is (and don't be offended if this does not apply to you), our comments and emails reflect a way too large population of slacktivists who whine about the free beer not being cold enough and who think that sanctimonious armchair quarterbacking of the service others provide makes them an MHRA.

It does not. They are just people who agree with the actual activists but prove it by droning on about how “we” should do things differently, like we are some sort of fucking juke box that does not require any coins.

Most of their suggestions tend to be around toning down and being a little less hostile, especially to feminists. They call it diplomacy. I call it gynocentric cowardice.

These clowns have been given free room and board at AVFM for far too long.

I am not prepared to share with you every near future decision we are going to make on how to handle this, but I can tell you for sure that at some point soon comment policy is getting an overhaul and indeed access to some, a good bit actually, of site content is going to be restricted to activists.

I can tell you unfettered content and participation will be extended to all activists and supporters, regardless of which organization they support. It does not have to be AVFM. Additionally, we will never forget that some men (and women) are just not in a position to help. Subscription scholarships will be abundant based on need.

The policy on that will be liberal, very fair and much more generous than many websites. Make no mistake, though, things are going to change. However we sort it out, people, gynocentric cowards who come here to tell us how “we” should be doing things better be damn sure that the word “we” actually includes them. If not, their armchair wisdom, along with their IP, will get shit-canned on the spot.

The same goes for feminist trolls and even feminists who aren’t trolls. Our forums are a great place for debate. AVFM mainsite is not. Its future purpose has one reason. Bring activists together and allow them to work in an environment as free as possible from deadweight.

Is this draconian? Yep. Does it risk the development of groupthink? Yep.

Those are not concerns, though, that are more important than the refinement of AVFM into a better tool of activism. Simply put, people who aren’t actually activists, even in the most minor of ways for men and boys, won’t be recognized as such and won’t have the latitude to operate here like they used to. Matter of fact, those of you who just jump in to conversations as though you are an activist when you are actually not, will have a better chance at being tolerated at Jezebel.com.

The time for AVFM giving a platform, even in comments, to spineless prigs, feminists and pearl clutching “MHRAs” who want to play nice with feminists, is about to come to a very abrupt end. To put it more clearly, this is now hostile ground for cowards, cunts and concern trolls — the living refuse of digested gynocentrism.

We will, however, have plenty of room for them in the forums, where there are some great people, some of whom are actually real activists. There are some great discussions there, and also a lot of pointless squawking by slactivists. Those sent there from here should feel at home.

Those who tend to inject partisan politics, religion or any other subject they deem more important than men and boys can go to the forums and find people to fight with there. We are happy to provide that to you on the house.

If that won’t suffice, go make your own forum. Air your complaints du jour at will on any topic you want. The only people we are interested in listening to on mainsite any more are those who can use the word “we” with credibility and a straight face. I will lay odds that 99% of them know who they are (and who isn’t).

AVFM is now a site by and for activists. Everyone else? Just K-Mart shoppers.

Getting rid of this deadweight will also be a needed burden reduction on mods and everyone else. It will also mean that we can all focus more easily on where we take AVFM in the last half of this decade.

This, like any other time the free beer dries up, will mean a drop in traffic. We don’t care. To repeat, AVFM used to live and breathe by Page Rank and Alexa. We worked by drawing in as many people as possible, regardless of who they were and we performed well at it. It was important to do well at it because we were the only place most people would ever hear this message. That has changed and we are going to adapt accordingly.

Now we are moving into a new mode, not caring so much about drawing in people but in drawing in activists. Talk is cheap, as they say. And as they also say, you get what you pay for.

As I implied earlier, this is one of the larger groups of activists in existence. No one known here to be an activist or a firm supporter has anything to worry about. Nor do people who want to drop in with occasional, positive support. The moment that anyone becomes a distractive whiner, concern troll, armchair quarterback or any other relatively useless life form, they will be given a link to the forums and their walking papers from mainsite.

I know, this sounds harsh. I am saying it harshly. Then again, this is not a place for pussies of either sex. The first pearl clutching, standing-on-a-chair-and-shrieking-at-a-mouse comment is likely to be, “But, but, but, you will be driving away future activists!”

No we won’t. We will be attracting future activists because activists will be the only people here with a real and respected presence. You don’t attract those with the spine and the intelligence to do this work by showcasing gutless wonders that would not miss a football game to lend a hand to men and boys.

I estimate by that same logic we will also be far less attractive to the do nothings who see this place as something they own without doing a fucking thing for the movement,

We have a huge amount to accomplish in the next five years. Even more than we did in the last five years. There will be no time, patience or tolerance for non-hackers.

As snotty as I have been in this writing I would like to close on one real positive. The non-slacking, actual activists here at AVFM have worked wonders and made going to this next level possible. That includes people like Dean Esmay, who, while no longer on staff, put back breaking work into our foundation and is still out there kicking ass.

I know we are going have more success in the future because of your good deeds. The same appreciation is extended to all of you who support us financially in any way. All of you have my word that we intend to provide you a web platform where you can make a real difference and where you don’t have to slog through the deadweight of a moronic peanut gallery to do it. All while, we will keep you entertained and informed.

More details to come folks. The activism coming from this site is about to get better than ever. We just need to trim off some deadweight so we can move forward.

Mike Buchanan's speech to Britain's leading anti-MGM charity

Mike Buchanan · 19 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I was honoured recently to be invited to give a presentation at the AGM of the country's best-known anti-MGM charity, 15 Square. Formerly NORM-UK, the organization was launched in 1995, so this was their 20th AGM.

It took place last Saturday, and it was a very interesting event. It was good to meet so many anti-MGM campaigners for the first time.

The gentleman who introduced me is the leader of the organization, David Smith. I thank both him and Richard Duncker, who did the video recording and editing. Richard leads another anti-MGM organization, Men Do Complain.

David King and Sage Gerard: AVFM's MHRAs of the Year, 2015

Paul Elam · 20 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

It has been a roller coaster of events over the First AVFM Reunion in North Carolina. I have been tied up administering emergency psychiatric care to the legions of social just-us warriors who were deeply traumatized by the two minutes of male raucousness I posted to YouTube.

Luckily, they are all so impressionable I was able to herd them into the Astrodome and chant about playful puppies till they were able to pull back from the precipice of a psychotic break. Say what you want about groupthink and shared delusions, they come in handy.

Down to business now, the good part.

One thing that happened at the reunion was a brief ceremony honoring two AVFMers as MHRAs of the Year.

Yes, we had two of them. And it was a very hard field to narrow down. Remember, in attendance were people like Dean Esmay, Jonathan Taylor, Anil Kumar, Tom Golden and others who have dedicated to this cause in too many ways to count. Naming anyone, or two for that matter, came with a feeling of regret for not recognizing the others. My only salvation was that this is not the only time this is going to happen.

This year, for 2015, I have selected Sage Gerard and David King as AVFM's MHRAs of the year.

Let's start with Sage. Sage is a brilliant young man (for a ginger), and possesses what I can only describe as a spine of titanium. Sage entered (with enthusiastic consent) AVFMs team as a writer, videographer and eventually a trusted technical assistant to David King.

From there he set about proving his metal. He started a conspicuously non-feminist men's issues group at Kennesaw State University (Zen Men, formerly KSUM). In the process he stood alone against an entire interdisciplinary studies department where the faculty was colluding to destroy his reputation, to have him arrested, to paint him as a threat to campus women.

I cannot say for certain that he never blinked but if he did I never saw it.

He proceeded, while under constant fire, to host a conference at the school. He enlisted a panel of speakers whom he knew would outrage the faculty and feminist elements in the student body and made it all happen despite overwhelming pressure to relent to the ideologues.

For effs sake, he took the stage by himself and launched a 25 minute rant toward his mother (whom he dearly loves) after she cracked from the intensity of the program and well, lost it a little bit. He was the spontaneous, fearless, glorious son-of-a-bitch that we all wish we could be.

Since then, he has stabilized Zen Men as an entity, developed assets and is engaged with others who are forming chapters at other schools.

That is not all of the reasons Sage was a logical candidate to be honored. The fact is that if I tried to list everything Sage has done for AVFM and for the MHRM as a whole, I would not have time to honor the other recipient. Still, I must go on to say that while all this was going on, Sage Gerard was organizing drives as a part of Zen Men, to feed and clothe homeless people.

With that, I want to express my deepest thanks to Sage and acknowledge that we are all indebted to you. You walked right into the vipers nest and poked them with a stick like you owned the place and they were the unwelcome visitors. Most importantly, you have started something direly needed by the world we live in. Thank you for being the future of justice for young men in college.

♦ ♦ ♦

The other recipient was David King. David wears a couple of hats around here. He is, of course, our CIO in charge of technical operations. He is also our acting CFO. He is our business manager and as such he has taken AVFM from a sole proprietorship to two LLCs. His meticulous (which if you look up in the dictionary you will find David's picture) attention to detail, investigating everything from American tax codes to operational agreements, accountancy and banking catapulted us from no organization to highly and efficiently organized.

Oh, and when he wasn't doing all that, or running the four servers we have in three countries, he spent weeks writing our accountancy software from scratch. Why? Because Quicken and other commercial options did not suit him.

As you might imagine, David's sometimes pedantic and detail rich mentality drives us all crazy here and there. Oh, well, I did some estimates on the skills and work David has brought to AVFM. It rings in, conservatively, at a quarter of a million dollars' worth of professional services.

David has never taken a single dime of AVFM revenue. No wait, we dipped in and bought him a vape to help him quit smoking about a year ago. Set us back about 90 bucks as I recall.

A more personal anecdote about David. Dean brought him to my attention quite some time ago. He contacted me kind of excited, said he had this guy who knew servers really well. I was like, servers? Uh, f no. No freaking way.

Dean continued to work on me for a while and I eventually dropped the use of the f bomb when saying no, and just said no way. Finally they wore me down and I handed over the keys so he could take a peek under the hood.

Obviously, since then I have come to know David a good bit better. We talk frequently, sometimes bump heads and even sometimes bump heads pretty hard.

Having had that experience I can say this. In every interaction I have had with David King I have never seen a hint of an unprincipled or dishonest man. He is a literal fountain of consistency when it comes to ethics and fair dealing. So help me, if I had million dollars (which I clearly don't) I would leave it with David, take a vacation and pick the money back up without counting it. He's that honest, and I am proud to call him my friend.

Finally, David deserves to be honored. My job is hard, crappy sometimes, but at least I am surrounded by people who know what I do and who pull for me; who inquire about my wellbeing; who order me to bed when they know I am not sleeping. David King slaves under a merciless taskmaster (his own commitment to this cause) and there is but a small handful of people who even have a clue of what he does. It is not an overstatement to say that what he has done for AVFM and for the MHRM is heroic.

Please join me in thanking Sage and David their work. It is so far above and beyond the call of duty that it casts a shadow on thousands of good men.

Why gay men don't need feminism – Part 3: Gay bashing andybob · 20 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Introduction

'Why Gay Men Don't Need Feminism' is a four-part series of articles adapted from a speech that was intended to be presented at the Second International Conference on Men's Issues in 2015 by the author, Matthew Lye (a.k.a. Andy Bob). The four parts are:

Part 1: Challenging Assumptions

Part 2: The Takeover

Part 3: Gay Bashing

Part 4: Brotherhood

As these articles are written from the perspective of a Men's Human Rights Activist (MHRA), they focus on the dysfunctional relationship between feminism and gay men. Feminism has had an entirely different relationship with lesbians which is irrelevant to this topic, and has been examined in detail elsewhere.

♦♦♦

All feminists, from influential academics to obscure, blog-publishing hysterics, have explicitly declared that all men belong to something called 'the patriarchy' which systemically advantages them as beneficiaries of unearned male privilege. This disturbingly reductionist belief is foundational to feminist ideology and demonstrates its profoundly ignorant understanding of how the world actually functions. It has also enabled feminists to rationalize their remarkable propensity towards freely expressing their often violence-infused fear, loathing and distrust of all men, [1] particularly those men who identify as feminists – men who don't seem to realize that it is possible, even preferable, to support women's rights without embracing feminism.

> One of the hardest parts of coming to grips with the depth and breadth of the patriarchy is recognizing that there are no exceptions. Maybe you didn't, personally, do anything wrong, but you were still born into a power structure that gave you unjust rewards…The fact is that even though you know better, and are truly a male feminist, you're still stuck being the bad guy." [2]

According to Kat Stoefell, all men are "stuck being the bad guy", even the obedient ones who identify as feminists and "know when to sit down, shut up, and listen." [2] Stoefell actually refers to her baseless and grotesque value judgement as a "fact" and refuses to acknowledge any exceptions. Even Jezebel, notorious cesspit of bilious misandry, and advocate of female-perpetrated domestic violence against men, [3] allowed that it was possible to be exempted from being labelled a patriarchal "bad guy".

The only catch is you have to be the late Curt Cobain, or a man who is equally hip, cool, rich, successful, handsome, famous – and dead. [4] Feminists' soft spot for 'bad boys', as distinct from "bad guys" (i.e.: men who aren't 'bad boys') is but one example of their unparalleled ability to rationalize absolutely anything – including their vagina tingles – to fit conveniently within the framework of their relentlessly honed and reiterated narratives.

What feminists are not able to do, is refrain from casting men as the default villains in their ideological pantomime. They cannot even throw out the welcome mat to potential male allies without soaking it with suspicion and contempt, as evidenced in this unintentionally hilarious quote from an article entitled, Feminists Reach Out to Men and Boys – Rules of Engagement by that most obsequious of gay male feminists, Michael Flood:

> We won't make much progress towards gender equality without men's support. Not because women are weak and can't do it on their own. Not because poor men have been left out and are now the victims. No, but because > men are the problem."[5]

'Men are the problem'. While informed egalitarians would concur that Michael Flood is correct in identifying himself as a problem, they would reject his contention that half of the world's population should also be denigrated in this manner. If ever orchestrated feminism had a familiar leitmotif that has recurred with tedious regularity throughout the decades, the woefully bigoted assertion that 'men are the problem' must surely be it.

Marilyn Frye

Prominent feminist theorists have always made a point of demonizing straight men as inherently dangerous problems that require urgent, government-funded solutions. However, many people may not be aware of the fact that feminists have been equally strident in their condemnation of gay men. These increasingly disobedient feminist allies are widely regarded by feminists as doubly problematic.

As men, gay men are accused of inhabiting some kind of tastefully appointed rainbow wing of 'the patriarchy' from which they benefit as recipients of those aforementioned unearned male privileges, making them 'part of the problem'. As gay men, they demonstrate their inherent misogyny by rejecting women and being more impervious to feminist shaming, approval and manipulation than straight men. This was certainly the position taken by Redstockings co-founder, Carol Hanisch, at the dawn of feminism's Second Wave. "Redstockings were also opposed to male homosexuality, which they saw as a deeply misogynist rejection of women." [6]

Most problematic of all, is the tendency for gay men to unashamedly celebrate and enjoy their male sexuality without adequate feminist supervision, or the need to acquire signed and witnessed declarations of enthusiastic consent. The very existence of the overwhelmingly sex-positive nature of mainstream gay male culture openly challenges the widely-held assumption among feminists that feminists alone hold a monopoly on the topic of male sexuality.

Instilling fear of male sexuality is one of the principal tactics employed by feminists to demonize men, and forms the basis of their attempts to persuade the world that it should be alert to a feminist-manufactured global crisis known as 'Rape Culture'. [7] Unapologetic gay male sexuality impedes those efforts and directly contradicts this essential tenet of feminist dogma – and feminists bitterly resent gay men for it.

Susan Brownmiller

It is indeed fortunate for researchers looking for insights into what feminists really think and how they really feel that feminists have the rather quaint belief that their multiple points of intersectionality [8] give them some kind of impunity from criticism whenever they feel compelled to share their invariably hateful and bizarre opinions with the world.

It is equally fortunate that the Internet has forever broken the seal on what used to be feminism's safe and comfortable echo chamber. It is no longer the challenge it used to be to demonstrate that the various attitudes that feminists have expressed about gay men are profoundly ignorant, and riddled with envy, contempt and ill-disguised revulsion. When reading what many feminists have to say about gay men, one can almost envision a group of gullible Amish teenagers huddled around a campfire swapping horror stories about what goes on in the steam room at their local YMCA. It is a sad indictment of modern academia that feminist dogma has ever been confused with valid scholarship.

In 1983, Distinguished Woman Philosopher of the Year, Marilyn Frye, [9] published the most influential of her collections of speeches and polemic, Politics of Reality: essays in feminist theory. Included is a chapter called Lesbian Feminism and the Gay Rights Movement: Another View of Male Supremacy, Another Separatism. [10] In this one epic bitch-fest, Frye manages to distil the anti-gay male rhetoric of the prominent feminists who preceded her, adds a number of convoluted addendums of her own, and provides something of a blueprint upon which future feminists have projected their own rationalizations and justifications for demonizing gay men. This is the principal reason why Frye's homophobic screed is required reading in many Women's/Queer Studies courses across the globe.

Frye contends that the gay male rights movement and gay male culture are "more congruent than discrepant" with what she calls 'the phallocracy' – her term for 'the patriarchy' – which, "is so hostile to women and to the woman-loving to which lesbians are committed." Frye lists six fundamental principles of 'the phallocracy':

> 1. The presumption of male citizenship.
> 2. Worship of the penis.
> 3. Male homoeroticism, or man-loving.
> 4. Contempt for women, or woman-hating.
> 5. Compulsory male heterosexuality.
> 6. The presumption of general phallic access.

Before exploring these principles, Frye makes the following observation which is prophetic in a way that she would never comprehend due to her crudely warped understanding of men of all sexual orientations: "As one explores the meaning of these principles and values, gay and straight male cultures begin to look so alike that it becomes something of a puzzle why straight men do not recognize their gay brothers…"

Kate Millett

Frye begins her muddled journey through her 'phallocratic principles' by expressing her confusion about the fact that gay men lay claim to 'male citizenship', declaring that it is more "logical" for them to challenge the presumption of this 'citizenship', and believes that, instead, gay men should proudly demand 'citizenship' as women. She is affronted by the notion of gay men self-identifying as men on the grounds that it results in gay men providing inadequate service to feminism – demonstrating that feminists have been rousing on gay men about their disloyalty for decades.

Frye laments that: "In so doing, they acquiesce in and support the reservation of full citizenship to males and thus align themselves with the political adversaries of feminism." Even more damning is her claim that, "gay men generally are in significant ways, perhaps in all important ways, only more loyal to masculinity and male-supremacy than other men." How naughty of them.

Frye contends that one of the main reasons why gay men prefer to identify as men is because, like all men, they are obsessed with what she calls "the magic of the penis", the mystical deity that all privileged members of 'phallocratic culture' worship. Baffled? Frye helpfully explains:

> It is a culture in which an identification of the penis with power, presence and creativity is found plausible – not the brain, the eyes, the mouth or the hand, but the penis. In that culture, any object or image which at all resembles or suggests the proportions of an erect penis will be imbued with or assumed to have special mythic, semantic, psychological or supernatural powers.
>
> If worship of the phallus is central to 'phallocratic culture', then gay men, by and large, are more like ardent priests than infidels, and the gay rights movement may be the fundamentalism of the global religion which is Patriarchy. In this matter, the congruence of gay male culture with straight male culture and the chasm between these and women's cultures are great indeed."

As the anointed ones in this 'phallocratic culture', Frye warns that gay men are to be regarded by women in general – and feminists in particular – with even deeper fear and suspicion than they regard straight men because:

> Women generally have good experiential reason to associate negative values and feelings with penises, since penises are connected to a great extent with their degradation, terror and pain…So far as living with the threat of rape permits, many women's attitudes toward penises tend to vacillate between indifference and contempt."

"Indifference" and "contempt" are the only two points between which heterosexual women's feelings and attitudes towards penises vacillate? This is hardly a surprising claim from someone who once declared that, "widespread heterosexuality among women is a highly artificial product of the patriarchy" and that, "most women have to be coerced into heterosexuality," [11] but it is not scholarship. It sounds more like the embarrassingly absurd ramblings of a bitter ideologue who spent too much time under the sun on Lesbos.

Like many feminists – Kate Millett springs to mind [12] – Frye cannot conceive of any relationship among men as anything other than an expression of a power dynamic with varying degrees of closeted perversion. She describes heterosexual male culture as "homoerotic" and derides all male attachments to other men as "man-loving" – going so far as to claim that most straight men are incapable of loving women because their love is reserved exclusively for other men.

> The people whom they admire, respect, adore, revere, honor, whom they imitate, idolize, and form profound attachments to, whom they are willing to teach and from whom they are willing to learn, and whose respect, admiration, recognition, honor, reverence and love they desire… those are, overwhelmingly, other men…From women they want devotion, service and sex."

This is a staggeringly hateful and insulting denigration of straight men. Dismissing straight men's capacity to love women is a blatant denial of their essential humanity. It echoes Shulumith Firestone's startling declaration in The Dialectic of Sex that "men can't love". [13] If Frye perceives men's ability to love other men as a manifestation of their penis-worshipping embrace of 'phallocentric culture', then one can only assume that she is going to direct her most virulent censure towards gay men – and indeed she does:

> Gay male culture is also homoerotic. There is almost nothing of it which suggests any extension of love to women, and all of the elements of passion and attachment, including all kinds of sensual pleasure and desire, are overtly involved in its male-male relations. Man-loving is, if anything, simply more transparent to the lovers and more complete for gay men than for straight men.
>
> If man-loving is the rule of phallocratic culture, as I think it is, and if, therefore, male homoeroticism is compulsory, then gay men should be numbered among the faithful, or the loyal and law-abiding citizens…"

Frye is echoing some of the ideas put forward by the aforementioned Kate Millett in her seminal work Sexual Politics [12]. Millett refers to 'phallocratic culture' as 'men's house culture', but is no less suspicious of the 'men's house institutions' in which all-male relationships flourish with the "throb of homosexual sentiment."

> The tone and ethos of men's house culture is sadistic, power-oriented, and latently homosexual, frequently narcissistic in its energy and motives. The men's house inference that the penis is a weapon, endlessly equated with other weapons is also clear."

Throughout her polemic, Millett conflates homosexuality with sadism and violence. She contends that the taboo imposed on the latent homosexuality inherent in 'men's house institutions' is inevitably channeled into violence, going so far as to cite the, "Nazi experience as an extreme case in point here." This is a particularly ignorant and offensive reference in view of the fact that the "Nazi experience" for thousands of gay men was to be herded into concentration camps before being gassed to death. [14] Millett may be offering her idea of a white flag to gay men by conceding that the, "negative and militaristic coloring of such men's house homosexuality is, of course, by no means the whole character of homosexual sensibility", but that white flag looks like a pink triangle to me, as it probably does to most gay men.

Sheila Jeffreys

Frye states categorically that, “woman-hating is an obvious corollary of man-loving.” Men’s Human Rights Activists (MHRAs) are frequently targeted by feminists with the accusation that their valid concerns for the rights and welfare of men and boys is irrefutable proof of what feminists wrongfully assume to be their hatred of women. [15]

Feminist activist, Amanda Levitt, invoked this familiar threat narrative to justify her participation in organizing one of the feminist protests against the 2014 International Conference on Men’s Issues in Detroit, U.S.A: “The protest really came out of the fact that what they say is not about men’s issues, it’s about violence against women, it’s about blaming feminism for issues that feminists in a lot of cases actually work [on].” [16]

Levitt maintained this threat narrative by posting an on-line letter to her fellow feminist activists warning that, “due to concerns for physical safety we have decided the best way to oppose the conference that is now going on in St. Clair Shores is to keep our distance.” [16] Other feminist activists, like Emma Howland-Bolton, exploited the threat narrative in order to justify advocating the use of violence to intimidate conference speakers and participants into silence. [17] She failed.

In many ways, Frye’s assumption of men’s inherent hatred of women is hardly surprising, as feminists have always regarded ‘woman-hating’ as one of the conquering tools of ‘the patriarchy/phallocracy’: “Contempt for women is such a common thing in this culture that it is sometimes hard to see.” Not for Frye. Through the feminist lens which distorts every feminist’s vision, Frye sees “contempt for women” everywhere – even in the discrimination that many gay men have endured. Frye interprets violence against gay men as a form of indirect violence against women, and claims that it is perpetrated by the very ‘phallocracy’ in which she accuses gay men of enthusiastically colluding as its most dutiful and civic-minded, penis-worshipping ‘citizens’. The following statement is nothing short of transparent victim-blaming at its most logically tortured:

> In the society at large, if it is known that a man is gay, he is subject to being pegged at the level of sexual status, personal authority and civil rights which are presumptive for women. This is, of course, really quite unfair, for most gay men are quite as fully men as any men: being gay is not at all inconsistent with being loyal to masculinity and committed to contempt for women. Some of the very things which lead straight people to doubt gay men’s manhood are, in fact, proofs of it.”

According to Frye, gay men are the most real of ‘real men’ due to the fact that they hate women even more than straight men hate women. Frye offers what she considers to be evidence of this by referencing what she calls, “the gay institution of the impersonation of women,” which she claims, “displays no love of or identification with women or the womanly.” Quite the contrary:

> What gay male affectation of femininity seems to me to be is a kind of serious sport in which men may exercise their power and control over the feminine, much as in other sports [in which] one exercises physical power and control over elements of the physical universe.”

Men ‘mocking’ women by donning women’s attire has long been a problem for the now mercifully retired Sheila Jeffreys. [18] When policy was being proposed to protect the rights of transgendered women in Australia, Jeffreys fretted that cis-gendered men wearing frocks would exploit these laws to fulfil their vouyeristic fetishes. She complained that, "transgender people will access women-only housing, toilets and prisons," [19] as though it were the ambition of Australian transgendered women, cross-dressers and drag queens to hang out in women's toilets and prisons in order to prey on unsuspecting cis-gendered women and girls.

> Under the right to gender identity, male-bodied persons, in many cases with penises intact, are likely to be permitted to enter women's toilets," she says in a submission to the Senate inquiry. "There are quite a surprising number of cases in which men wearing women's clothing have been arrested for … secret photographing of women using the toilets and showers, peeping at women from adjacent stalls … (and) luring children into women's toilets in order to assault them." [19]

In a conversation with Julie Bindel, [20] Jeffreys articulates her concern that gay male fashion designers are prone to expressing their 'woman-hating' through their collections and runway shows.

Jeffreys argues that many male fashion designers are "projecting their misogyny on to the bodies of women", and gives examples of collections featuring images based on sexual violence – Alexander McQueen's show for his masters [sic] degree was entitled Jack The Ripper, and depicted bloodied images of Victorian prostitutes. A later show in 1995, Highland Rape, featured staggering, half-naked, brutalised models. And John Galliano, in his 2003 collection for Christian Dior, Hard Core Romance, used the imagery of sadomasochism, putting his models in seven-inch heels and rubber suits "so tight they had to use copious amounts of talcum powder to fit into them". [21] Tasteless nonsense in the name of art perhaps, but only a militant, separatist feminist like Jeffreys would interpret these examples as evidence of gay men's desire to inflict sexual violence on malnourished runway waifs.

John Stoltenberg

Bindel also notes that in one of Jeffrey's books, Unpacking Queer Politics, she writes of her concern that gay male culture has had a detrimental effect on women, especially lesbians, by promoting sado-masochism as an expression of gay liberation, thus eroticizing the power differences inherent in heterosexual practices. Susan Brownmiller, the singularly destructive Second Wave feminist and notorious 'rape epidemic' hoaxer, conflates all sex between consenting gay men as a form of violent homosexual rape. In her most influential work, Against Our Will, Brownmiller simply cannot distinguish between the two. [22]

John Stoltenberg, [23] author of the appropriately titled books Refusing to Be a Man: Essays in Sex and Justice and The End of Manhood: A Book for Men of Conscience, as well as an article called Why talking about 'healthy masculinity' is like talking about 'healthy cancer', [24] is also convinced that heterosexual sex is an expression of sadistic male supremacy: "I also believe that male supremacy constructs male sexuality such that there is a literal eroticism of owning that accompanies both the private-property and the public-property views of women's bodies." [23]

As the man who carried the oafishly repellent Andrea Dworkin over the threshold, Stoltenberg doesn't need to convince anyone that he is an authority on masochism, but as a gay man, he has some gall holding forth on the sexual dynamics of heterosexual relationships. He is a still-living testament to the perils awaiting gay men who swallow feminist dogma while maintaining willful ignorance of its poisonous contents. John Lauritson rightly dismisses Stoltenberg as both a feminist and as an enemy to gay men everywhere:

> Stoltenberg attacks all of the goals of the gay liberation movement, claiming that if realized they would only give gay men equality with straight men; he puts forward the propositions that males concerned with "gender justice" should embrace "a total repudiation of masculinity" (including a repudiation of erections and pelvic thrusts during sex), and a total repudiation of male relationships…Stoltenberg deserves only our contempt when he dismisses the yearning men have for male affection by writing: "…all he was ever programmed to long for in relationship with men connects at its center to a process that keeps women oppressed." [25]

There it is again: the feminist claim that men are incapable of loving women.

Marilyn Frye would wholeheartedly agree with Stoltenberg. She yearns to be critical of gay men's alleged promotion of power differences in sexual relationships as an expression of their supposed dedication to male sexual supremacy, yet she becomes so obtuse and convoluted in her claims and conclusions that one wonders why she included "compulsory heterosexuality" as a principal of 'the phallocracy' in the first place.

Then again, Frye is a feminist. This means that she is never inhibited about making outrageous claims that don't even make sense to her. For example, Frye claims that straight men resent gay men for not engaging sexually with women, or what Frye calls, "not pulling [their] share of the load." In other words, straight men are annoyed with gay men for not subjugating women through sex as much as they should. Perhaps Frye's confusion would be alleviated by being enlightened about the realities of sexual competition among men. Straight men do not resent other men from removing themselves from that particular field of competition. In fact, they're generally very happy about it.

Frye, however, is not at all confused about what she calls, gay men's presumptive right to "general phallic access". In fact, she waxes hysterical about what she believes to be gay men's most damnable contribution to 'the phallocracy' in which they reign hedonistically supreme: gay men's insidiously arrogant belief that they are entitled to engage in unsupervised, consensual sex with whomever they choose. It is necessary to examine Frye's contention in some detail here because it encapsulates many of the fundamental gripes that numerous feminists today have in regard to gay men – especially their deep distrust of gay men's freely-expressed sexuality combined with their almost palpably envious response to it. Rose McGowan's snide swipe at gay men for believing in their "right to stand on top of a float wearing an orange speedo and take molly," [26] is infused with the same resentment which is so discernable throughout Frye's following diatribe:

> The proscription against male-male fucking is the lid on masculinity, the limiting principle which keeps masculinity from being simply an endless firestorm of undifferentiated self. As such, that proscription is necessarily always in tension with the rest of masculinity…As long as males are socialized constantly to masculinity, the spectre of their running amok is always present. The straight male's phobic reaction to male homosexuality can then be seen as a fear of an unrestricted, unlimited, ungoverned masculinity.
>
> To assuage this fear, what the rhetoric and ideology of the male gay rights movement has tried to do is to convince straight men that male-male ass-fucking and fellatio are…expressions of male bonding…What I want to note is just this: if it is the claim of gay men and their movement that male-male fucking is really a form of male bonding, an intensification and completion of the male homoeroticism which is basic to male-supremacy, then they themselves are arguing that their culture and practices are, after all, perfectly congruent with the > culture, practices and principles of male-supremacy.

>
> According to the general picture that has emerged here, male homosexuality is congruent with and a logical extension of straight male-supremacist culture. It seems that straight men just don't understand the congruency and are frightened by the "logical extension." In response, the male gay rights movement attempts to educate and encourage straight men to an appreciation of the normalcy and harmlessness of gay men. It does not challenge the principles of male-supremacist culture."

Is Frye attempting to warn straight men that gay men are out to persuade them that gay sex is 'normal' in an effort to infect them with 'gay', resulting in feminists being confronted with their ultimate nightmare: the "spectre" of unbridled masculine lust "running amok" in a world that would render women all but sexually irrelevant? If so, then she is engaging in the all-too-familiar feminist tactic of creating fear and suspicion among men of different sexual orientations in order to undermine their unified opposition to feminism. Here, Frye is trying instill straight men with fear of gay men.

Shulumith Firestone

Feminists know instinctively how to manipulate men, and gay men have proven to be especially vulnerable to this divide-and-conquer strategy. All feminists have needed to do is convince gay men that straight men are their enemies and that feminists will provide them with protection – feminists never tire of telling gay men that they must now reciprocate for this 'protection' by pledging their loyalty to feminism. The problem for feminists is that many gay men are now waking up to the fact that they've been scammed all along by ideological racketeers and starting to reassess their alliances. The only mystery is why it has taken gay men so long to realize that feminists have always despised them as much, sometimes even more, than their straight brothers – it's not as though feminists have been particularly secretive about this.

Frye evokes Orwell's O'Brien by demanding that all potential gay male allies, "must come to understand the values and principles of phallocratic culture and how his own life is interwoven with them, and must reject them and become disloyal to masculinity." Like John Stoltenberg, gay male allies can demonstrate their loyalty to feminism by refusing to be men. This would certainly be a key step in achieving the feminist utopia envisioned by Shulumith Firestone:

> The end goal of feminist revolution must be, unlike that of the first feminist movement, not just the elimination of male privilege but of the sex distinction itself: genital difference between human beings would no longer matter culturally." [27]

Firestone was predicting the 'end of men' long before Hanna Rosin was celebrating it. [28]

It has been more than thirty years since Marilyn Frye revealed her staggeringly ignorant and contemptuous condemnation of gay men as penis-worshipping colluders in her phantom anti-woman 'phallocracy'. Feminists have not only failed to refute any of Frye's warped and bigoted assertions in the intervening decades, they have actually developed them further into what has become a deafening cacophony of stern and reproachful lectures on gay men's 'failure' as worthy feminist allies. Here are but a few screeches from that whiny and entitled din:

> Gay men need to stop perpetrating misogyny and ally themselves to the feminist movement. And the first step to becoming a true ally is listening to women speak about the issues that are important to them, whether its wage equality, reproductive rights, access to birth control or anything else. We can start there." [29]
>
> So many of us are only familiar with the idea that male privilege being the province of straight men that we discount how gay men are able to exert dominance and control over women." [30]
>
> In order to combat misogyny, gay men should claim feminism as allies, but not in a queer-opting or mansplaining way." [31]
>
> Gay men are men. They rape women just like straight men etc." [32]

Azalia Banks claims not to realize that the word 'faggot' is a derogatory word for gay men: "And it was always just a man who hates women…you can be a straight faggot. Faggots are men who want to bring women down…control them…When I use the word 'faggot', it comes from a feminist point of view, not a homophobic point of view." [33]

Michael Flood

Yes, Azalia Banks; men, regardless of their sexual orientation, know all about your use of the word 'faggot. It's called gay-shaming – and it isn't acceptable just because you do it in the name of feminism, or that you do it to straight men too. Banks is actually proud of the fact that she does not discriminate between gay men and straight men when she engages in gay-bashing. Honestly, you just can't make this stuff up.

It was foolish of feminists to assume that gay men would "sit down, shut up and listen" [2] to this kind of offensive tripe forever. In March 2015, the influential gay men's magazine, The Advocate, published an article in which it issued an unequivocal rebuke to feminists for their endless censure of gay men for being remiss in their duty to feminism. It is clear that MHRAs aren't the only people who have paid close attention to the wisdom of John Lauritson:

> Furthermore, the "women have helped the gay movement" line of reasoning is as grandiose a generalization as the contention that gay men are misogynistic. Yes, many women have lent support, but in 1969 (the year of the landmark Stonewall riots), the radical feminist group the Redstockings was founded and claimed that male homosexuality was a blatant rejection of women and therefore completely objectionable. What's more, a 1976 book, Dangerous Trends in Feminism, goes into detail about the rampant criticism of the gay movement by certain feminists, adding that gays were too polite to reciprocate the attack." [34]

Gay men are starting to revolt against this tirade of feminist abuse and casting off the ideological yoke that feminists have used to train gay men to support their corrupt hate movement for far too long. Here is a response from a gay man who is obviously very familiar with the feminist orthodoxy on gay men which has been promoted by ideological vanguards like Marilyn Frye – and has concluded that he definitely doesn't need feminism:

> Feminism expects me to own up to "male privilege", then tells me I'm oppressed by the Patriarchy because I'm gay, then tells me that this oppression is really oppression of women because it's secondary > misogyny, and finally still expects me to be a feminist, because feminists are supposedly the reason I'm gradually gaining equality in this society. No. Feminists aren't the sole saviors of LGBT people. LGBT people themselves (along with straight allies) are the ones who deserve the credit for fighting for their own equality. Leave your totalitarian ideology out of it." [35]

Feminists cannot leave their "totalitarian ideology out of it" because feminism is a totalitarian ideology – an ideology that is built on the premise that all men are privileged by a so-called patriarchy/phallocracy in which all men collude for the primary purpose of oppressing women. Gay men don't need feminism for the same fundamental reasons straight men don't need it. Not only is it foolish to embrace an ideology built on faulty premises, but there is absolutely nothing to be gained from supporting a movement whose most influential thinkers have targeted you for nearly five decades as their enemy. Moreover, it is morally indefensible to support an ideology that promotes violence, bigotry, injustice and division. In this regard, women don't need feminism either – nobody does.

In the 4th and final part of Why Gay Men Don't Need Feminism, we will examine the many ways in which the Men's Human Rights Movement [MHRM] addresses issues relevant to the rights and welfare of all men and boys, regardless of their race, religion, nationality, ethnicity, age, ability or sexual orientation. It is aptly titled, Brotherhood, which is something which can never be achieved until gay men reject the hate-mongering ideology that feminism has always been, and proudly take their rightful place alongside their straight brothers with whom – as the vanguards of feminism have been telling them for years – they have far more in common than not.

References:

[1]https://hequal.wordpress.com/2015/04/01/kill-all-men-fk-men-die-cis-scum-says-lib-dem-executive-committe-member/

[2]http://nymag.com/thecut/2014/10/you-want-to-be-a-male-feminist-maybe-dont.html#

[3] http://jezebel.com/294383/have-you-ever-beat-up-a-boyfriend-cause-uh-we-have

[4] http://jezebel.com/5985693/what-do-we-want-from-male-feminists

[5]http://www.xyonline.net/content/feminism-needs-men-men-need-feminism

[6] http://www.digplanet.com/wiki/Redstockings

[7] http://www.wavaw.ca/what-is-rape-culture/

[8] http://psychology.wikia.com/wiki/Hierarchy_of_oppression

[9] http://www.philosophy.msu.edu/people/faculty/marilyn-frye/

[10] http://www.feminist-reprise.org/docs/fryegayrights.htm

[11] http://www.azquotes.com/author/42046-Marilyn_Frye

[12] https://www.marxists.org/subject/women/authors/millett-kate/theory.htm

[13]http://www.nytimes.com/2012/08/31/nyregion/shulamith-firestone-feminist-writer-dies-at-67.html?_r=0

[14] https://www.facebook.com/ThePinkTriangle

[15]http://msmagazine.com/blog/2014/06/06/protest-saturday-misogynistic-mra-conference-in-detroit/

[16] http://www.msnbc.com/msnbc/mens-rights-conference-feminism

[17]http://franklyrebekah.com/2014/06/09/detroit-to-no-longer-host-the-international- conference-on-mens-rights/

[18]http://www.leadershipforwomen.com.au/empowerment/leadership-gender-articles/issues-oriented-leadership/sheila-jeffreys

[19] http://www.sheilajeffreys.com/

[20]http://theothermccain.com/2015/09/06/guardian-columnist-julie-bindel-says-put-all-males-in-some-kind-of-camp/

[21]http://www.theguardian.com/world/2005/jul/02/gender.politicsphilosophyandsociety

[22]http://www.hrw.org/reports/2001/prison/report5.html

[23]http://www.feministcurrent.com/2013/09/09/john-stoltenberg-on-manhood-male-supremacy-and-men-as-feminist-allies/

[24]http://www.feministcurrent.com/2013/08/09/why-talking-about-healthy-masculinity-is-like-talking-about-healthy-cancer/

[25] http://paganpressbooks.com/jpl/DTF.HTM

[26]http://www.bilerico.com/2014/11/charmed_star_rose_mcgowan_gay_men_are_misogynists.php

[27] http://www.newyorker.com/magazine/2013/04/15/death-of-a-revolutionary

[28]http://www.nytimes.com/2012/09/16/books/review/the-end-of-men-by-hanna-rosin.html

[29]http://thetab.com/uk/cambridge/2015/04/01/feminisms-duty-gay-men-response-49779

[30]http://jezebel.com/the-myth-of-the-fag-hag-and-dirty-secrets-of-the-gay-ma-1506868402

[31]http://www.huffingtonpost.com/aaron-barksdale/more-gay-men-need-to-claim-feminism_b_8106446.html

[32] http://imgur.com/gallery/H75B00k

[33]http://www.feministcurrent.com/2015/02/19/azealia-banks-calls-out-the-misogyny-of-gay-men/

[34]http://www.advocate.com/michael-musto/2015/03/12/gay-men-can-t-take-criticism

[35] https://www.facebook.com/idontneedfeminismbecause/posts/820029058065082

Lauren Southern engages women's studies: Update 1

AVfM Video Source · 20 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Lauren Southern has her first video update about her infiltration of a Women's Studies class. AVFM's coverage of Lauren's infiltration began two weeks ago here.

Man and dog

Paul Elam · 20 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

These pictures made me feel.

Helping verbs

B.R. Merrick · 21 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I'm going to have to watch my language on this one. There are girls present.

I've said it before and I'll say it again: Words are important. Enemies of men know this, so men should know it as well. Semantics may be tiresome, but context, words, meanings, implications, and associations all play into the crap contained in this commercial:

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=VhB3l1gCz2E

Let's take a look at what the commercial claims in order to see if there's anything wrong with condensing crap into a 30-second spot:

- Girls replied in the affirmative when asked if they were ever told that they should not do something because they're girls.
- People think that girls have to be happy all the time.
- Be more traditional.
- Don't do anything too challenging.
- Stories teach girls that they can't really rescue anybody, that it's always the boys who do the rescuing.
- 72% of girls feel society limits them.
- Girls should be perfect.
- Weak (are or should be?)
- Girls aren't strong.
- During puberty, a girl's confidence plummets, making her more likely to accept limitations.

At this point in the commercial, not only have I lost interest, but a litany of limitations follows, things girls decided against doing supposedly because society tells them they're not supposed to, like playing a boy's musical instrument or playing sports, since sports are allegedly not encouraged among girls (except for field hockey, volleyball, tennis, swimming, diving, hiking, ping pong, jump rope, cycling, running, jogging, ice skating, skiing, water skiing, dance, and gymnastics, all of which are boring and only included in the Olympics due to traditionalist political pressure).

I emphasized the part about being more likely to accept limitations because it is so telling. It reveals exactly what is wrong with feminism and society at their core, and how it seeps into the heads of impressionable girls who are entertained, informed, and educated by empire. It's all wrong for girls in and of itself. By extension, not only is it also wrong for boys because boys' concerns are not addressed (it is, after all, a commercial for a mini-pad); but because it sets girls' minds against boys and a society that allegedly benefits males more. It reduces girls' thoughts of boys to, "How come I can't play?" It creates resentment when and where feelings are hurt.

I'm not sure I need any further evidence of the commercial's disturbing nature than the presence of Hanna Rosin asking girls to write their gripes on boxes so they can kick them over. What concerns me far more is what she represents, and her presence only confirms the nature of the issue at hand.

There is a vital, psychological, and emotional difference between accepting your limitations (genetics or place of birth) and being more likely to voluntarily accept limitations placed on you from without (bad weather, social stigma, false beliefs, or skewed perception). The commercial's statement about accepting limitations is clearly emphasizing the latter, to which I can only say, "Who gives a flying fig?" (How am I doing on the language? I know I said "crap" once, but I don't think anyone noticed.)

Firstly, I do not see a society telling girls that they can't. I went to school with girls for two decades, and we all took science, math, English, social studies, phys-ed, history, art, humanities, music, and foreign languages. Not once in two decades did I ever see evidence of a female student being told by either a male or female teacher, principal, guidance counselor, nurse, crossing guard or lunch lady that she couldn't really do science. Therefore, I demand proof from every girl standing there in that commercial and whining to the contrary.

Secondly, let's just pretend that Princessland exists, and that the ogres have stormed the castle where The Matriarchy were busy handing out test tubes, insisting on sandwiches with their beer. Not only does it only take a few minutes, but if this is all it takes to get you to quit trumpet, then you didn't really get a lot out of playing trumpet, Your Royal Highness. Unfortunately for your argument, Jackie was the best drummer in our high school, even being allowed the virtually unprecedented opportunity to play a solo at a school concert. Fortunately for my argument, if Jackie grew up in Princessland, then she clearly demonstrated a whole lot of nerve practicing an almost exclusively male instrument for hours every day for years and years while ogres were banging forks on tables demanding grog.

This commercial perpetuates a falsehood with a little prance. Everybody has to stop and pay attention. It's girls, after all.

What it doesn't address is the undeniably heavy influence of the following in any child's mind: government schooling, mass entertainment, Mass Media in general, and the corporate commercial environment available at your local just-down-the-street. To whom are all of these geared? Because if you want to talk influence, indoctrination, and social shaming, I'm all ears.

But feminism doesn't get to the root of girl's problems because the root embraced by feminism is the resentment of successful men: "The empire's fine, the stores are great, we've got the vote, we've got the same schoolrooms as the boys, and we've got smart, sassy women on TV. What we need is whatever… that guy has!" Still worse, their heavy hand in the above influences ensures that the poisonous nature of their perverted beliefs will have an effect on everyone who hears, whether or not they agree.

Their argument begins with a girl's hurt feelings, but the thought process shouldn't end there. Regardless, the commercial takes as a basis for its conclusion what each girl paints on a canvas that she doesn't realize has been painted for her: "If society tells you that you can't do something because females are incapable of doing that certain something (an oppressive phenomenon that has been confirmed as real for you by Ms. Rosin Rosinadanna), then accepting limitations is perfectly understandable, and the resultant sense of failure you feel is someone else's fault. This goes double if you're having your period."

Don't expect the gynocentric culture to do anything other than stop, stare, and go, "Aww." The minute a man shows that he can be nice to a woman or girl… aww. Guys can get hardcore tough with guys, up to and including breaking their bones in a game of professional football, but come pink ribbon time… aww.

Rosinadanna's no fool. She knows danged well if you put a girl in front of it, all the guys will stop, because it's a girl. What she's doing in this commercial is emotionally manipulating impressionable girls, many of whom will now go forward with various triggers in their brains that go off whenever they feel badly. She is also emotionally manipulating grown men, many of whom have daughters, and who may also be persuaded to think that the girls in this commercial have a legitimate complaint. Yes, it is actually possible to get a grown man, when listening to his own daughter, to be convinced that just because you don't see it or ever hear about it doesn't mean that the oppression of the female sex at the hands of the male sex does not continue as it has for millennia.

What has actually gone on for millennia is that men have built civilization with the concerns of women and children at the forefront of their minds. It has always been a mark of manhood to defer to the opposite sex and treat them as betters: open their doors, pull out their chairs, stand when they enter, stand when they leave, watch your language, call her Miss, Mrs. or Ms., don't stare outright at her boobs, and, since everyone knows that girls by nature are nicer than boys, why would she lie?

Men conditioned by the demands of civilization (build and maintain it, boy) and empire (now give your life for it, boy) are men who have been conditioned by cultural misandry, based as I have said before on two criteria:

1. Men are utilitarian.
2. Men are disposable.

Modern cultural misandry is actually far worse thanks to the ideas put forth in this commercial. Now, thanks to the influence of feminists crouching behind girls' hurt feelings, there are three criteria:

1. Men are utilitarian.
2. Men are disposable.
3. Men are culpable.

Wouldn't it be nice if this commercial were about girls' feelings that hadn't been manipulated and deceived out of them? Boys might actually learn something about girls that is useful. The only thing useful that they're going to learn from this commercial is that no matter how nice she is, and she may genuinely be nice in so very many other ways; if she spouts this dribble, it's in your best interest to walk in the opposite direction and keep walking.

The Always company has chosen to ally itself, however unintentionally, with hatred of men, and they did it largely through careful choice of helping verbs attached to the negative: cannot, should not, must not, never be. Semantics being what they are, one wonders what the commercial would be like, or how the worldview of these girls might change, if those helping verbs were replaced with the ones I could easily ascribe to behaviors and attitudes that are encouraged among boys: have to, must, better be, will whether you like it or not. Just see below for a comparison chart of the commercial's claims and what I see in the broader cultural context:

What girls are allegedly told:	What I allege boys are told:
Girls responded positively when asked if they were ever told that they should not do something because they're girls.	There are a whole hell of a lot of things you'd better learn how to do, and fast.
People think that girls have to be happy all the time.	People think that boys have to be everything down the rest of this list all the time.
Be more traditional.	Be more traditional, faggot [language is acceptable here as it does not pertain to girls].
Don't do anything too challenging.	You're not being challenged enough, queerbait [see above].
The stories teach girls that they can't really rescue anybody, that it's always the boys who do the rescuing.	It's always the boys who do the rescuing, with the assumption that they will demonstrate ability to give life and limb at a moment's notice.
72% of girls feel society limits them.	Society limits boys to the sorts of things populated on this list, or they're worthless. This is regardless of how they may feel.
Girls should be perfect.	As a reminder, boys should be everything on this list all the time.
Weak (are or should be?)	Weakness is unacceptable, are or should be.
Girls aren't strong.	Boys are strong. Real boys, anyway.
During puberty, a girl's confidence plummets, making her more likely to accept limitations.	During puberty, a boy's confidence plummets, making him more likely to kill himself.

A litany of things girls decided against doing, like playing a boy's musical instrument or playing sports, which are allegedly not encouraged among girls.	A litany of things boys decided against doing: like dancing ballet; playing a girl's musical instrument; being a proponent for, hobbyist of, or expert in anything too touchy-feely; doing any actually interesting and productive activity because it's girly; standing up for his sex; bonding sexually, romantically, or oftentimes even just emotionally with a friend who's a guy; getting married or having kids; taking females seriously; taking females on their terms; expressing any interest at all in school; expressing any interest at all in Corporate America; opening his mouth; or playing girl-centered sports like synchronized swimming (with all due respect to Martin Short), which are not encouraged among boys.
…and so on, etc.

Here's the thing, girls: You are bound to be told that you should not do something because _____. I have no doubt in my mind that even sometimes that may happen because you're a girl. For example: Once a month until your mid-50s your plans are going to change. Get used to that idea now. That's the only thing the Always brand is good for.

People expect a happy exterior all the time from everyone. Blank 'em. (You know… blank.)

Be more traditional when and where you want. You're going to have traditions foisted on you by virtue of society, so good luck navigating that mess. The same thing is happening to the boys you know, and it's bad news for them.

If you want to make it all about your sex and decide that it needs to be made into a political issue, then you're never going to get anywhere, and you will find as you grow older that there is a higher number of men who secretly resent you. How is Ms. Rosin really helping you?

Most people don't do anything too challenging. You wanna be most people?

The stories teach girls that they don't have to rescue anybody, that they should expect the boys to do the rescuing. If you're one of the 72% of girls who feel that society limits them, perhaps you'll rethink the Disney animated film Brave, about a princess who rejects the opportunity to choose a suitor in favor of saving her mother with her bow and arrow. There's a fine thing to inspire any girl.

Like the boys who have seen their sex represented as the sex continually having to fight their way out of danger, girls will eventually learn that the bravery showcased in fairy tales old and new has little to do with actual bravery, but merely serves as a metaphorical primer for the real thing. Someday, thanks in part to new fables like Brave, girls will learn, once they try to apply the lesson learned, that if it feels good while it's happening or if you enjoy doing it, then whatever you're doing can't be called brave. If it were as easy as kicking over a wall made of cardboard boxes, don't expect respect.

The irony is that this commercial was best summed up by a feminist-leaning sitcom back in the 80s. On an episode of "The Golden Girls," Dorothy (played by Bea Arthur) is unknowingly speaking to her ex-husband's bride-to-be just before the wedding, and hears directly from her concerning her own former marriage:

NEW WIFE: No one's like her. She's Superwoman. She was the perfect wife: cooked, cleaned, had two kids, got an education, has never looked better, and now she has a career.

DOROTHY: Oh, that wasn't a marriage, that's a commercial for a mini-pad.

This is why I write instead of public speaking. You're supposed to open with a joke, not end with one. Still, I blame everyone else.

The days of wine & roses are over: women must change their attitudes to dating

Paul Elam · 22 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

"They are not long, the days of wine and roses:

Out of a misty dream

Our path emerges for a while, then closes

Within a dream."

–Ernest Dowson

"With great power, comes great responsibility."

–Uncle Ben Parker, "The Amazing Spider-Man"

The past year in particular has seen a frenzied debate in the public square, impacting on mating in the United States: street harassment, "Yes Means Yes" laws, the supposed date rape epidemic on the college campus, just to name a few; and all of this comes at a time when marital rates overall in the country are at all-time lows, out of wedlock births are at all-time highs and there are singletons of both sexes than at any other time in American history. Much has been and will continue to be said and written about all of this; but what has been missing from the cacophony are some hard evidence that the tectonic plates that undergird human mating in America have been shifting at a seismic rate. Oh, to be sure, there have been scholars and pundits like Andrew Hacker, Kay Hymowitz, Hanna Rosin and Charles Murray, who've all given their takes on the matter; but it wasn't until "Date-onomics", written by journalist Jon Birger, that we have an incontrovertible guide to the relations between the sexes in the 21st century.

Date-onomics: How Dating Became a Lopsided Numbers Game … "Think Freakonomics and Moneyball if you run across Date-onomics, a by-the-numbers book on dating that argues advice-givers serving up tips for women on how to a find …
Read more…

I say that because Birger's book presents the hard truth that for the first time in American history, there are more white women attending and graduating from colleges and universities than white men – something that was foreshadowed in the Black American community for decades – and that this cries out for a reshuffling of the mating dance deck. Birger does give his suggestions as to what upwardly mobile, professional single women can do to improve their lovelorn lot; I leave it to my readers to puruse his proposals and weigh their relative merits for themselves. What I wish to suggest in this article however, is something that neither Birger, nor anyone else as far as I'm aware, has presented to American women to honestly grapple with.

Please allow me to explain.

If you're anything like me – a GenXer who knew nothing else but strong, career-minded women who were "doing it for themselves" and often reminding anyone within earshot that they didn't "need no man", you simply accepted the fact that said women, having the ability and means to care for themselves (and any kids in tow) and that they had as much say as any man in any domestic or relationship arrangement; gone were the days of supposed "one party" patriarchal rule, where the man ruled the roost with the proverbial iron fist. Relationships, which most certainly included marriage, were now to be seen as a true partnership, a coming together of equals, where the men were called upon (read: demanded) to take an equal share of the (indoors) housework and caring of children. At the same time, men were to check their sense of often unearned and unwarranted privilege in their approach to women, in their personal but as well in their social and working lives. And, all available evidence, sans any indeological slant that is, bears out the fact that the ladies have gotten exactly what they've wanted – from the highly educated and affluent to the rough hewn salt of the earth working classes, mens' attitudes about all of these matters have indeed changed greatly, from where they were only a half a century ago.

But what hasn't changed, are womens' attitudes. Women, even, most especially, the highly educated and accomplished, still cling to what can only rightly be called outmoded and antiquated notions about mating (and by extension, masculinity itself); and worse, they rigidly expect men to uphold these ossified norms of gender, while at the same time continuing to sup from all the bennies a 21st century life affords them. This is clearly in evidence in my neck of the woods in Black America, for example – "strong, independent" Black women clearly expect the (Black) man to make all the approaches, pay for all the dates and do all the things (Black) men did more than five decades ago – regardless of the fact that, according to the website blackdemographics.com, some 65% of Black women work in the professions verus roughly 45% of Black men, and that while Black men work in the blue collar sector to the tune of 34%, only 8% of Black women do – and despite the fact that it is not at all unusual to find Black women*who earn twice and sometimes even three times as much as many Black men.* Yes, it's true that there aren't enough college educated, white collar professional Black men to go around for the Black women who want them; but it's also true that many Black women of that cohort aren't willing to make some needed adjustments of their own in sync with the changed world in which we live. Birger's book chronicles this and other facets of mating in the Black community, and discusses what is now occuring in the white one.

Yet, when these kinds of discussions come up, like the one I recently participated in on the highly popular womens' only-dating coach Evan Marc Katz's website, all manner of flimsy and maudlin "reasons" are given for how and why the very same savvy, accomplished women should not make some changes in their own approach toward dating and mating. In another recent discussion on the popular website Hooking Up Smart on the topic of old school chivalry for example, "more reasons" were proffered that, if the reverse were uttered by any man, they'd be pilloried as misogynistic and ran out of town on a rail. Bromides about "women paying a higher cost for sex" (i.e., the naturalistic fallacy) are easily countered by the fact that due to massive and sweeping advances in medical technology, said "costs" have been substantially mitigated (Maternal deaths, a common occurrence here in the USA a mere century ago and the leading cause of death among American women, is extremely rare today; birth control and abortions are both widely available, medically safe and highly effective). There's this irrational idea that women can and should "have it all" – strong and independent when it suits them, coy and demure (read: passive) when it suits them – in other words, flexible "Plastic Woman", to use Hanna Rosin's phrase in her book "The End of Men" – while men remain stiff cardboard cutouts. Women reserve the right to be "flexible" for themselves; but want men to remain frozen in the amber of the past, when it comes to good ole fashioned "courtin'".

Not only is this view hypocritical, it is patently unfair, and, in light of Birger's excellent work, impractical. While the assumption is that men are simply falling down on the "Manning Up" job, no one has deigned to consider that, like women for the first time in American history, men have also been considering life outside the tightly prescribed social rules and norms that have had a chokehold on them for centuries. Perhaps there are men, like myself, who appreciated working with their hands in an active and dynamic environment instead of being holed up in classrooms and being a captive audience for odd, weird, ideological academics who drone on and on about stuff few outside of the academy care about? Perhaps there are men who actually enjoy women approaching them for once, instead of having to do all the heavy lifting of old fashioned courting? And perhaps there are men who like the idea that there are women out there who like them and enjoy their company independent of anything else, and don't see them merely as a means to a financial end? The very forces that have brought unprecented freedoms to all women in American life today have freed men up as well, to consider other ways of being. Perhaps men are not attending university and college as much as they did in the past, was because they don't have to – or want to.

And that raises a lot of very interesting questions for us all to consider moving forward – the most fundamental of which, being the following: that American women, now clearly surpassing men in terms of formal education and incomes, simply cannot also claim demure passivity in the mating dance. The time has come for women to put some skin in the mating game.

It's only fair.

Adapted from the aforementioned discussion at Evan Marc Katz's website, is my proposal to the ladies moving forward in our Brave New World of dating and mating:

1. Ladies, you have to choose which path works best for you – the egalitarian route, or the traditional one – and stick to it. No "switching lanes" when it suits you to do so. After all, none of you would be OK with men doing the same; much of the discussion obtaining along these lines earlier indicated in this article are a case in point (In online dating/relationship forums, websites, blogs and the like, discussions abound on the topic of "ethics in dating", which really means "ethics of MEN in dating"; rarely if ever is the discussion focused on the fairness/unfairness of the ladies in this regard). Indeed, the conceit lo these many years is that the only ones who had any room for improvements along these lines, are menfolk. As mentioned earlier, these concerns have been addressed, with empirical evidence to support the thesis. Now, it's your turn.

2. If you're a gal who's more egalitarian in your outlook; if you like the fact that you can go as far as your talent and ambition can take you; and if you like the independence that your mom and nana could only dream of; you must now bring that egalitarianism to bear in the mating realm as well. You now have to bear equal burdens for the courtship dance – meaning that you now must make concerted efforts to make some "first contact" approaches. You must also pickup the tab for some of those first dates, too. Yes, things can and will, from time to time, not go well – that you will get turned down, or even rudely rejected, by some of the men you've worked up the nerve to approach. And true, some of those dates you just shelled out for, won't work out so well.That, is the price of freedom, ladies – and freedom ain't free. The notion on the part of some feminists, arguing that it is the responsibility of men to make women approaching them "safe" (i.e., free from rejections, etc.), isn't empowering to women – it's in truth, quite patronizing, infantilizing and downright insulting to women. Contrary to urban legend, quite a few men very much welcome a lady making an approach, as well as not having to ante up for every single interaction with one. And, like women, men also can reject an approach if it's coming from the wrong gal. Such is life. Get over to it.

3. On the other hand, if you consider yourself an old-fashioned lass and like doing things the way mom and dad did it, fair enough – but not so fast. First, remember, mom and dad didn't roll around in the hookup hay; they waited until married, right? And, since you're of the view that the man has to approach and ante up for dates and so forth, you have to be brutally honest in answering the following question: what are you offering a man for his old-fashioned dating dollar? After all, while you may not be "that kind of girl", there are quite a few these days who are; you're trying to hold on to an idea of dating, relationships and marriage that has pretty much gone by the wayside. But since I for one am all for freedom of choice, I believe that you should have the right to this option. Just be clear that you have to give the fellas what they want: pretty, feminine and yes, submissive, to say nothing of what they think would make a good wife and mother. He who pays the piper calls the tune – and you can't be mad if what the fellas want may or may not be in line with what you think is an "old fashioned girl". If any of that bothers you, you should consider being an egalitarian – and Woman Up.

Birger rightly argues that the simple math and facts before us demand a change in how we do things. For the ladies, it means that such changes are long overdue.

Don't forget to checkout Obsidian Radio, my daily podcast heard on YouTube! Here's the latest: "Chopping Up Dateonomics" Part 1 & Part 2

YouTube video Chopping Up "Dateonomics", Pt. 1
YouTube video Chopping Up "Dateonomics", Pt. 2

Misogyny in the myth of patriarchy

Douglas Galbi · 22 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Le blasme des femmes (The culpability of women) is medieval vernacular literature of men's sexed protest. It's scarcely understood or tolerated today. Many persons now believe that men ruling in patriarchy have brutally oppressed their wives, mothers, daughters and all other women throughout history. Belief in patriarchy and men's brutality toward women has to explain away the literature of men's sexed protest. Why have some men cried out about the abuse, deceptions, and betrayals that they felt men suffer from women?

> A man cannot withstand her guile
> Once she has picked him for her wile;
> Her will to power will prevail,
> She vanquishes most any male.
> …
> Woman lives in constant anger,
> Do I even dare harangue her? [1]

Patriarchy myth-makers dismiss men's sexed protests as misogyny. While ruling over women, exploiting women, and controlling women as their own personal property, men complained bitterly about women simply because men hate women, according to the now dominant mythic view of men. Hate is a word for mobilizing social repression. Calling men's sexed protest misogyny socially justifies repressing it.

> A man who slanders women
> Is a man I must condemn,
> For a courtier whom one respects
> Would never malign the opposite sex. [2]

As master narratives, patriarchy and misogyny are social obfuscation. The lives of men and women have always been intimately intertwined in successfully reproducing societies. Those aren't plausible circumstances for absolute, hierarchical rule and hatred of the other. Men's sexed protest doesn't indicate misogyny. Patriarchy has no significance to most men. Men's sexed protest, and the social suppression of it, reflect men's social subordination and women's social dominance.

> I would tell it clearly,
> But all truths are not good to say. [3]

Today men are incarcerated for doing nothing more than having consensual sex and being too poor to fulfill their obligations of forced financial fatherhood. Through state-institutionalized undue influence, misrepresentations, and mis-service, forced financial fatherhood is imposed on many men without regard for the biological truth of paternity. Men face massive discrimination in child custody decisions, the criminalization of men's sexuality is ever-expanding, the vastly disproportionate violence against men attracts no public concern, and men continued to be sex-selected for disposal in military service. Why aren't more men protesting the privileges of women relative to men?

> Therefore each man ought to honor
> And value women above all. [4]

When men protest the sex-based injustices they suffer, gynocentric society generates quarrels about women, apologies for women, and defenses of women. Men's servitude to women is deeply entrenched in European culture. Men historically have tended to understand their worth as persons in terms of defending women and children, and in providing resources to women and children. Women are superior to men in social communication. Women are the decision-makers for a large majority of consumer spending. In many high-income countries, women also make up the majority of voters by a larger margin than that which commonly decides major elections. Myths of patriarchy and misogyny work to keep men in their socially subordinate place.

> There's no clerk so shrewd,
> Nor any other so worthy,
> Who would want to blame women
> Nor argue anything against them,
> Unless he be of base lineage.
> Because of this, they say nothing but good. [5]

Are women equally to blame for the evil done to men? The current dominant view is that the injustices done to men are all men's fault. Blame patriarchy for the highly disproportionate suicides of men. Blame patriarchy for the highly disproportionate incarceration of men. Blame "toxic masculinity" for men's suffering. But don't blame women. Say nothing but good about women.

> Sweet friend, be assured
> That he will be cursed by God
> Who, with evil and empty words,
> Speaks dishonor or contempt to women. [6]

Le blasme des femmes is necessary for true democratic equality.[7] Women and men, whose lives have always been intimately intertwined, are equally responsible for injustices against women and men.

Notes:

[1] Le blasme des femmes {The culpability of women} ll. 113-6, 142-3, from Anglo-Norman French trans. Fiero, Pfeffer & Allain (1989) pp. 127, 129. Le blasme des femmes appears to have been composed for oral recitation. Manuscripts of it exist with many variations. Fiero, Pfeffer & Allain (1989)'s version is based on the manuscript Cambridge, University Library, Gg I.i, f. 627r. Text dated 1272-1310. Id. pp. 15-6. Another version of Le blasme des femmes exists in the Harley 2253 Manuscript, Art. 77.

The Cambridge manuscript of Le blasme des femmes concludes with five lines of Latin verse. The last line:

> uxorem duxi quod semper postea luxi
> {Now, ever since I took a wife,
> Calamity has marred my life.}

Id. pp. 130-1. The concluding Latin verse has the leonine rhyme that Matheolus used in his seminal work of men's sexed protest.

Medieval literature of men's sexed protest was much less prominent and influential than medieval literature of courtly love. Courtly love literature abased men and pedestalized women.

[2] Le bien des fames {The good of women} ll. 1-4, from Francien French trans. Fiero, Pfeffer & Allain (1989) p. 107. Text dated 1272-1310. For the source text word courtois I've used "courtier" rather than "chap."

[3] La contenance des fames {The ways of women} ll. 170-1, from Francien French trans. Fiero, Pfeffer & Allain (1989) pp. 97, 104 (literal translation version). Text dated 1272-1310. The source text:

> Cleremont le deviseroie,
> Mais touz voirz ne sont bonds a dire.

Above I've added the explicit translation "but" for mais.

[4] Le dit des femmes {The song on women) ll. 65-6, MS Harley 2253, Art. 76, from Anglo-Norman French trans. Fein (2014).

[5] Le dit des femmes {The song on women) ll. 51-6, MS Harley 2253, Art. 76, from Anglo-Norman French trans. Fein (2014).

[6] ABC a femmes {ABC of Women} ll. 276-9, MS Harley 2253, Art. 8, from Anglo-Norman French trans. Fein (2014).

[7] Fiero, Pfeffer & Allain (1989) p. xi explains:

> The greater space given to the anti-female material in our discussions reflects the misogynic tradition that prevailed in medieval times and subtly persists into our own age. Since, according to Webster's dictionary definition, the word feminist refers to one who advocates the political, economic, and social equality of the sexes or generally defends the rights and interests of women, we have avoided the words pro-feminist and anti-feminist, preferring instead pro- and anti-female.

The subtle incoherence of Webster's alternate definitions of feminist seems to have eluded these scholars. The underlying social problem is far from subtle. On the term antifeminist, see my Matheolus post, note [7].

[image] Front page of Pravda (Moscow, USSR) newspaper, 18 November, 1940. It features a photo of Soviet Commissar M.B. Molotov and Adolf Hitler meeting in Berlin. Thanks to Wikimedia Commons.

References:

Fein, Susanna, ed. with David B. Raybin, and Jan M. Ziolkowski, trans. 2014. The complete Harley 2253 Manuscript (vol. 1, vol. 2, vol. 3). Medieval Institute Publications, Western Michigan University. Kalamazoo, Michigan.

Fiero, Gloria, Wendy Pfeffer, and Mathé Allain. 1989. Three medieval views of women: La contenance des fames, Le bien des fames, Le blasme des fames. New Haven, Conn: Yale University Press.

Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License

How MRAs and the MHRM help men

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 23 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Janet refutes more feminist lies.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=rTUpXUEEvqY

Janice Fiamengo on the University of Toronto feminist campus

AVfM Video Source · 24 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Shoe0nHead: shut up, and let me tell you why you need feminism

AVfM Video Source · 24 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Shoe0nHead delivers another fantastic video, and turns five!

The Muppets: Kermit swallows the red pill

August Løvenskiolds · 26 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists were outraged when the Muppets' character Kermit the Frog dumped his long-time love interest Miss Piggy for the younger, thinner, and prettier "Denise" (also depicted as a puppet pig). Miss Piggy, of course, is a feminist icon who recently received an award bestowed by Gloria Steinem. The premier of the new ABC prime time television series The Muppets reveals some of the back story to the infamous breakup, and it is much, much worse than even feminists could imagine.

Yes, it is absurd but comedy gold (I hope) that I am writing about this. Feminism is so infantilizing to women with their feminist hug boxes, feminist coloring books, and dedication to rejecting adult responsibilities that it is inevitable that a critic of feminism like me will get stuck inspecting their metaphorical filthy diapers, especially since so few feminists will actually experience changing diapers on real-life infants born despite their repeat customer discount cards at local abortion mills.

But, back to the show.

The Muppets is shot in a "mockumentary" style that draws heavily on shows like Modern Family, the delightfully anti-SJW (Social Justice Warrior) show that exploits stereotypes relentlessly to poke vicious fun at the convolutions of today's family experience, at the expense of SJW bullshit.

The premise of the show is a near perfect rip-off of the now defunct feminist show 30 Rock: Kermit takes over the role of creator/producer/head writer "Liz Lemon" (Tina Fey) while Miss Piggy takes over the role of the demanding diva (Jenna Maroney and/or Tracy Jordan, played by Jane Krakowski and/or Tracy Morgan) of her own late night mock variety TV show, Up Late with Miss Piggy.

Also like both 30 Rock and Modern Family, The Muppets pilot episode dwells on the love lives of the multiple protagonists. For example, Fozzie Bear, who plays the Warm-up Comic/Sidekick on the show, has a promising but fraught romance with the blonde half of the singing duo Garfunkel and Oates that is straight out of Romeo and Juliet – her parents hate him. There are several other liaisons going on but the Piggy-Kermit-Denise triangle is the true ham sammich of this show.

One reviewer at People described Kermit's new lover Denise this way:

> And, as everyone knows, Kermit has been given a new lady-pig. Her name is Denise, and so far she's too bland to be a Muppet, let alone a foil for the majestically throttled ego of Miss Piggy. She's too bland to even provoke a joke from Joan Rivers, if that great woman happened to be with us still.

Just noting that there is nothing "throttled" about Miss Piggy's narcissistic ego except, perhaps, my regret that she wasn't chosen for the roasting spit as a suckling.

"Bland," when used to describe Denise (a marketing exec on the show), is a feminist code word for "younger, hotter, domestically inclined, gentle, loving and non-abusive to her man." In sharp contrast to Piggy's near-constant screams, Denise has a buttery soft Southern Belle accent that would be perfectly at home in South Carolina.

Denise cooks for Kermit, and her eyes and skin tone suggest to me an Asian ancestry, sort of like the lovely YouTuber Kassy of the channel "End Feminism." In the character of Denise, ABC has taken the feminist notion of "intersectionality" and crammed it right back up feminism's bristled snout.

Rather than the emotional roller coaster of a man obsessed with the Manic Piggy Dream Sow, Kermit is now older and wiser. He prefers the quiet domestic affection of Denise. Kermit and Denise have committed the greatest feminist sin: they grew up and took responsibility for their own bliss instead of forever blaming their problems on the man of the mythical Patriarchy.

Miss Piggy's feminist cred is also shaken – losing Kermit has made her even crazier, if such a thing were possible, and her dependence on Kermit promises to be further maddening as he shoots her down week after week. Rather than hating men and loving her independence, Miss Piggy is addicted to one of them, and suffering a horrible withdrawal.

I half-expect to see Miss Piggy carrying a blue mattress around the set à la Emma Sulkowicz, the jilted rape hoaxer from Columbia University. With the sex ratio on college campuses approaching 2 straight women for every straight man, the desperation women students now experience over finding acceptable male company will continue to drive feminist neuroses into hyperdrive, just as the two pigs will go insane fighting over Kermit.

Kermit, we learn in a flashback, is sick of "everything" about the feminist Miss Piggy, including, presumably, her feminism. I expect this will take a few weeks to sink into the feminist consciousness (such as it is) and then explode out their backsides like an orgy of too-old takeout after a teary binge-eating session.

Call the waaaah-mbulance. The fallout will be sty-filling.

No, MGTOWs don't hate women

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 27 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I catch a lot of flak from some MGTOWs in the manosphere for being a stay at home wife and mother, because I'm a parasitic bitch incapable of love or feeling, exploiting my husband and giving him nothing in return and blah blah blah, but I feel compelled to defend MGTOWs against some unreasonable accusations lobbed at them by a usually fair, balanced reporter: Elizabeth Nolan Brown at Reason.com.

For certain, there are some in the MGTOW community who do hate women, and consider them downright evil, but those are a vocal minority, and just as a lot of radical, hateful feminism arose from the lived, painful experiences of women, so too, I think, does a lot of the more radical sentiments expressed by some MGTOWs arise from the lived, painful experiences of men. If we're going to define an entire movement by its radical element, feminism is over before it even starts. If feminists reject being defined by their most hateful, violent, disturbed adherents, then so too can any other social movement.

Nolan Brown starts out with a massive contradiction of her own philosophy:

> As evidence of claims that libertarianism holds little appeal for women, critics like to highlight limited-government cheerleading from groups or figures known for sexism, especially men's rights activists (MRAs) and their various offshoots (Gadsden flags in the Twitter profiles of #GamerGate fans are seen as very telling). While they're wrong that libertarian philosophy is somehow inherently hostile to women, it's hard not to notice that a lot of dudes who don't take well to women's autonomy are also drawn to viewpoints that might be described as crudely libertarian.

The key words there are autonomy and libertarian. Nolan Brown has this exactly backwards: it's not men who object to women's autonomy who feel a kinship with libertarianism, it's men who insist on women's autonomy. A huge function of big government is to redistribute the tax dollars of men to women, while freeing women from any reciprocal obligations, which are termed 'abuse' and 'oppression' by most feminists.

Libertarianism requires women to act as autonomous units within an autonomous community, with extremely limited interference from government. Everyone's well-being, safety and security depends on the relationships they are able to establish with other members of the community in which they live, a return to a historical norm. Women (and men's) freedom to make choices is not curtailed by a libertarian approach, it is expanded.

But, and here comes the sticking point, the freedom to make choices comes with the responsibility of accepting the consequences of those choices: Accountability. The word feminists hate more than any other, when it's applied to women. They expect, demand and will vote for politicians who enforce accountability from men, but the moment you try to apply the same standard to women, feminists cry foul. Accountability is at the heart of the MGTOW movement.

Nolan Brown engages some lazy, tired stereotypes about men, MRAs and MGTOWs in making her case, writing that 'while libertarian-leaning sentiment makes sense among the He Man Woman Hating club and your run-of-the-mill MRAs, there's nothing in libertarianism as a political philosophy that is inherently sexist or misogynistic.' Precisely why feminists tend to hate libertarianism, and MRAs lean towards it. Libertarianism doesn't engage with benevolent sexism aka chivalry. There is no 'women and children first' policy. In a libertarian world, it's not #HeForShe, but #WeForAll. While Nolan Brown acknowledges that the MHRM is right to target the government for unfair laws surrounding 'alimony, child support, custody battles, [and] campus sexual assault policies,' she completely missteps with regards to domestic violence laws, which she thinks are 'just fine as is'. No, ma'am, they're not, but that's a different article.

Nolan Brown makes the very logical point that '[d]isagreements over how best to help women, the economy, and all people in poverty do not mean libertarians hate women, the economy, and people in poverty,' but refuses to extend the same argument to MGTOWs: rejecting relationships with women based on risk factors arising from deeply unfair laws does not mean MGTOWs hate women, risk or the law as a principle. Accusing MGTOWs of hating women, risk and laws provides the foundation to shame them into compliance with women's needs, but it's not working very well.

MGTOWs reject women, because an entire generation of women have been reared under feminism, and their sense of entitlement to men's resources with no corollary obligations has been deeply ingrained in them. The sense that women are legitimately entitled to half of a man's assets, whether she contributed to them or not, simply because he entered into a legal contract of marriage with her, strikes many women as a foregone conclusion. Of course Tiger Wood's wife should get half of his earnings from playing golf because….well, just because.

MGTOWs reject this completely. It doesn't matter if his assets consist of an Xbox, a Keurig and a few skateboards, or a multi-billion company he built from scratch with his own ingenuity and effort. The idea that women are entitled to half of everything, without reference to what they contributed, is a violation of everything we understand as fair and just.

That might sound strange coming from a woman who has been economically dependent for most of her adult life, but while I will absolutely claim that my work has allowed my husband to earn more money than he might have if he had a working wife he had to balance competing interests with, the SAHM premium is not even close to being double his salary, so my claim to 50% of his assets is bullshit. At best, I can claim an 11% stake, because that appears to be the premium married men who live with their children and have a stay at home wife earn.

Because I knew before I got married that I wanted to raise children in a stable, happy, functioning relationship, and be at home full-time because I genuinely believe being raised by a loving parent is infinitely superior to being raised by the hired help, and because my husband made the same decision long before he met me, we are dedicated to keeping our family life and our marriage intact. Divorce is not an option. How many more couples would work to stay happily married if the women knew they would not be walking out with 50% of his assets and the children?

In a libertarian world, division of property and custody of children would be determined, not by a rote government formula, but by the private agreements of individuals, established before the couple moved in together or had children, whether married or not. Until such time, many men are simply refusing to bet half their stuff she won't cheat or him, get bored, or decide she 'isn't happy'. That doesn't mean they hate women, it means they'd rather not see half their labor fund a woman who has decided to trash the relationship that gives her the legal right to half his stuff.

It's risk management.

And it's not that MGTOWs fear taking risks. Men in general have a much higher tolerance for risk than women (interesting link that examines the relationship between risk tolerance and entrepreneurship), but's there's risk and then there's risk. Add children to the equation, and for many men, the risk is simply too great. When Rebecca Minnock made false allegations of abuse against Roger Williams, the father of their son, Ethan, and consistently interfered with Williams' ability to continue a loving relationship with Ethan, a judge stepped in and awarded full custody to the father. Minnock responded by kidnapping Ethan and going on the run, and she received a great deal of sympathy in the press, with headlines demanding that she be given full custody, regardless the emotional abuse she visited on her son and his father.

Rebecca Minnock: On-the-run mother should have full custody of son, say neighbours

Residents claim mother who fled with three-year-old boy in bitter custody battle should be handed him full time, rather than father Roger Williams

When women are torn out of the lives of their children, we respond with compassion, indignation and sympathy, no matter how abusive the mother. When men are torn out of the lives of their children, we simply don't care, even if there is not a shred of evidence the men, and the children, deserve to be subjected to such emotional trauma and pain.

Imagine for one second the reverse were true: any man, for any reason at all, could simply decide to end his relationship with a woman, take the children, she would maybe get to see them every other weekend, but she would be completely powerless to enforce such an order, if she managed to get it in the first place. Imagine that men had a powerful MRA lobby that actively and successfully opposed all efforts women made to ensure the legal standard of shared custody. If women simply refused to have children in that situation, would we call them losers? Women who couldn't maintain a relationship with a man? Would we laugh at them, mock them, demand they 'woman-up', no matter what the risks?

MGTOWs refuse to subject themselves, and children, to the possibility of such pain. Until the legal standard of equal custody is enshrined (and feminists will fight tooth and nail to make sure it never is), many more men are simply going to refuse the risk. Wanting to protect themselves and their potential children from abuse doesn't mean MGTOWs hate women and children: quite the opposite. It means they would rather forgo the joys of having children, take the loss themselves, rather than pass it on to the innocent.

MGTOWs understand that the principle weapon used against men is the court of law. It's government, voted in by women who intend to keep their power to exploit and control men, particularly through the family courts. MGTOWs who refuse to work more than they need for basic survival are refusing to fund the system that oppresses them. And yes, the system does oppress men. What word would you use to describe a family court system in which men had automatic custody of children, and could have women jailed for refusing to work and turn over their income to men to support the children they may not even be allowed to see? That is exactly the situation Afsana Lachaux finds herself in, and if you find yourself agreeing that such laws are outrageous, then you are in agreement with MGTOWs and most of the MHRM.

Some MGTOWs refuse all relationships with women, and some MGTOWs are married. What all MGTOWs have in common is that they refuse to silently condone a system that is stacked so unfairly against them. MGTOWs don't hate women, children or relationships. What they hate is a legal, cultural and social system that turns those things into poison. Some engage in the system for the scant protections it provides them, while actively trying to dismantle the more harmful aspects. Some refuse to engage in any way, shape, or form.

Hating a system that exploits, abuses and emotionally tortures men is not misogyny. Supporting a system that believes women are more 'nurturing' on the basis of their gender, treating women as incapable of supporting themselves, allowing women to garnish unearned resources from men on the basis that they need to be 'protected' and 'taken care of', treating women as essentially overgrown children who cannot be held accountable for their own choices?

That's misogyny.

Libertarians reject every single one of those arguments. So do MGTOWs.

And there is nothing sexist about either of those things.

Lots of love,

JB

Reprinted with permission from judgybitch.com. Original here.

A 12th-century tale of paternity fraud

Douglas Galbi · 27 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

In the twelfth-century French tale Richeut, the title character Richeut is a mistress of harlotry. Frustrated with her insufficient earnings from whoring, Richeut plots to get pregnant to extract more money from men. She drinks mandrake and hellebore and has sex with many men. She succeeds in getting pregnant.

Richeut then goes to one of her lovers, a priest. She cries, sighs, and complains. The priest comforts her:

> The gentleman {priest} puts his arms around her neck and kisses her softly. Richeut squirms out of his embrace, bursts into a torrent of tears, and speaks her threat: "Whether I tell you or I keep silent about it, I'm pregnant because of you." [1]

Men, who have very limited contraceptive options and no reproductive rights, dread unwanted claims of unplanned parenthood. Unplanned parenthood and state-imposed sex payments (called "child support") can destroy a man's life.

Men lack women's natural, true knowledge of who are their biological children. While the priest had sex with Richeut, neither he nor she knows which man contributed to the pregnancy. The priest says to Richeut:

> Richeut, I don't believe you; do you really believe it's mine? Certainly not.

She responds:

> I know full well that it is; may I lose everything, may I fall silent and be put to death, if I didn't solemnly swear that you put into me that thing which made me fat and pregnant. Don't think I'll dump it in some ditch or in a monastery, if you refuse to help me.

Rather than arising merely from the skill of particular, deceiving women, paternity fraud is now institutionalized in government and hospital procedures for establishing paternity. The priest foolishly acquiesces to Richeut's paternity claim:

> By my faith, Richeut, I promise you that if you desire anything of mine, I shall keep nothing that you might not have for yourself. Why would you blackmail me, or have the bishop bar me from saying Mass? Now, hide this pregnancy for as long as you can, and when the child is born, blame it on someone else. So help me God, I shall not fail you in this, not one jot.

Richeut then cries a little and tells the priest that she loves him. He then gives her money and goods and promises her more.

Richeut repeats her paternity fraud with the knight Lord Geezer. She aggressively confronts him:

> I am seething with anger when I see you. You pledged your faith to me and you lied. Any woman who puts her arms around you must be out of her mind. There's no one as stingy as you from here to Lincoln. What did I get from you once I gave you pleasure, the other day (alas!) in bed? A curse brought me to lie down flat under you! A pox on your root that shoots off and dries up! I was a young girl then, and now no one cares to love me. You have knocked me up, and I do not care to hide it. I'm angry with you! Look at my belly swelling up! It won't be long until I have a child. You've got to help me. So help me God, if you deny it's yours, it will be your ruin! I say it in earnest. No matter how fortified, all your castles shall be burned and reduced to ashes unless you acknowledge your offspring. I'll sooner burn or hang myself — I tell you no lie — than let you go free. I come from a good family! I have seven knights among my relatives. And I have friends that would slay their man in no time.

The knight foolishly accepts Richeut's claim that he caused her pregnancy. He gives her money and a kiss, and promises to send her meat, vegetables, and fine wine.

Richeut also repeats her paternity fraud with a townsman who didn't have a heir. He thinks he is biologically unable to have children. Richeut goes to him and asks to have a private conversation:

> They go into the room together and sit down on a bed. Sitting there, Richeut looks pensive, then says, "Sir, I came her because I was pushed by a desperate need. I'll be honest with you. I have a complaint to make, and you yourself are the cause. For the time is not long when I shall enter into labor. Sir, I'm incensed at you because you made me pregnant!"

At first the townsman, who thought himself to be sterile, stands up to Richeut:

> "I? You must be joking!"
> "This is no joke, sir, by Saint Thomas!"
> "Without doubt, Richeut, you told a lie."
> She cries and whines, and holds her hand to her face: "Sir, don't you recall the entire day that you played hanky-panky with me upstairs?"
> "Yes, Richeut, that much I know."
> "Without a doubt, dear sir, that is where I got this burden."
> "Shut up, Richeut, don't ever say it!"
> "May God confound me if I keep silent about it!"

The townsman's fantasy of having a male heir prevailed over his reason:

> "Richeut, I don't know — I may well be the father. Let him be mine. If it's a boy, without fault, he'll inherit > everything I own."

He gives Richeut much money and arranges to have her sent meat, wine, and bread.

Richeut herself benefits greatly from money she extracts for "child support." From pregnancy to long after the birth of her son Sampson, Richeut enjoys child support in the form of "meat, wine and claret, pepper sauce, fruit, cakes, pastries, and apples." Because she cannot bear Sampson's wailing, she hires another woman (a wet-nurse) to breast-feed him. Her lavish child-support income prompts her to raise her price as a whore. It also makes her an attractive marriage prospect for men seeking to avoid the burden of having to earn money for their family.

Richeut's child-support fraud devastates the men of the three estates. Richeut flatters the knight with tales of his manly and fearless son Sampson, who, she says, is just like him. She tells the trade-oriented townsman that Sampson "counts like an angel." She tells the priest that Sampson loves learning (priests were the leading scholars in the Middle Ages). Socially vulnerable and proud false fathers, the men of the three estates give all they have to Richeut for child support:

> Richeut has blackmailed the priest so much that he now has only a grayish coat on his shoulders. And he's wearing nothing under the wool! As for the townsman, she's after his banking business. And she has threatened, flattered, and begged the knight so much that he has pledged her everything, both land and fief.

Just as child support today isn't required to be spent supporting children and in fact supports mainly interested adults, "Richeut takes and spends lavishly on herself — for the boy {her child Sampson} doesn't spend money!" Her three lovers as a result live in poverty.

Richeut's son Sampson grows up to be sexually voracious and highly skilled in seduction. Because the priest, the knight, and the townsman are languishing in poverty and despair, Sampson rejects them.[2] Richeut raises her son herself. She teaches him Ovid's love lessons. She teaches him additional lessons on flirting and techniques for sexual intercourse. Sampson is a good student. He masters the "summa of lechery." In travels spanning from Ireland to India, Sampson has sex with thousands of women. The only person more skilled than he in sexual seduction is his mother.[3]

The story of Richeut has considerable gender symmetry. Richeut exploits and abuses men and women alike. Her son treats women much the same way that she treats men. The priest, the knight, and the townsman stand for the three estates of medieval society. Richeut demonstrates the three estates' stupidity locally. Sampson demonstrates the three estates' stupidity internationally.[4]

Richeut provides potent satire of paternity establishment and child support in today's high-income democracies. The outrageous deceptions that Richeut perpetrates are now institutionalized in laws and policies. Stories like Richeut are now summarily rejected from broad public discourse. They are labeled "offensive" and "anti-feminist" because they challenge deeply entrenched injustices against men.

Notes:

[1] Richeut l. 170-5, from Old French trans. Haddad (1991) p. 8. All subsequent quotes above are from id. Since Richeut is relatively short and the quotes follow the order of the text, further specific line numbers and pages are omitted. For an alternate English translation and the French text, Ker (1976). The French text of Lecompte (1913) is freely available online. The current best French text of Richeut is Vernay (1988). Richeut is thought to date from the last third of the twelfth century. Arlima offers a comprehensive bibliography for Richeut.

In its brutal satire and depiction of low duplicity, Richeut is thematically related to Trubert and Le Roman de Renard. Richeut has a woman servant / friend named Hersant. Richeut and Hersant are the names of the wives of the fox and the wolf, respectively, in Le Roman de Renard. Disparagement of prostitution in Richeut associates it with the sayings of Marcolf in Solomon and Marcolf.

[2] Sampson asks his mother who his father is:

> Tell me now, mother dear, which one of these three is my father?

Richeut responds:

> Dear son, I don't know. I have mated with each of the three, and with a thousand others. I am not ashamed to tell you. How can a woman that's been mounted by this kind of population be expected to keep count of her children? One doesn't know from whom she conceives nor when. Just go to the richest of the three. Take your pick.

Sampson responds, "Mother, I don't want any of them."

[3] On the relationship of Richeut and Sampson, Adkins (2003).

[4] In medieval estates satire, townsmen and peasants are commonly grouped together in the third estate. Mann (1973) considers medieval estates satire, but focuses on Chaucer and ignores Richeut. Richeut surely has more direct, current public importance than Chaucer's General Prologue to the Canterbury Tales.

[image] Nell Gwyn. Painting by Simon Verelst c. 1680. Nell Gwyn (1650 – 1687) was a comic actress and long-time mistress of Charles II. She regarded herself as a whore. Image thanks to Wikipedia Commons, and no thanks to the rapacious, reactionary U.K. National Portrait Gallery.

References:

Adkins, Carole Ann. 2003. "Beastly Mothers — Beastly Sons: Richeut." Reinardus: Yearbook of the International Reynard Society. 16: 3-17.

Haddad, Gabriel. 1991. "Richeut: A Translation." Comitatus: A Journal of Medieval and Renaissance Studies 22(1): 1-29.

Ker, Donald Eugene. 1976. The twelfth-century French poem of Richeut: a study in history, form and content. Ph.D. Thesis. Ohio State University.

Lecompte, Irville Charles. 1913. "Richeut, Old French poem of the twelfth century, with introduction, notes, and glossary." Pamphlet reprint of the article in The Romanic Review 4(3): 261-305.

Mann, Jill. 1973. Chaucer and medieval estates satire: the literature of social classes and the General Prologue to the Canterbury Tales. Cambridge, England: University Press.

Vernay, Philippe. 1988. Richeut. Berne, Switzerland: Editions Francke.

Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License.

Straight eye for the queer guy

AVfM Video Source · 27 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Radical Feminism is not the “Fringe” of Feminism!

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 28 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original Radical feminism is feminism’s rotten core and the source of feminism’s life. Without radical feminism, feminism at large would amount to little and scatter to the four winds.

That is the whole truth and nothing other. However, it is a truth that plenty of people won’t square up to. It is quite fashionable nowadays, especially in the wake of the Agent Orange scandal, to brush aside radical feminism as outdated and popularly disregarded. When people do this, they are trying to change the subject and reassert control of the conversation so as to remove the feminist project, at large, from the critical spotlight.

Radical feminism – by which I mean chiefly the man-hating kind – is a standard which sets the measure for feminism as a whole. All brands of feminism are either more or less relevant depending on how closely they approximate radical feminism.

Radical feminism is 100 proof, and a radical feminist takes her feminism neat. Others take theirs watered down – but it’s all the same drink.

People love to tell you that the radfems are “just fringe extremists” – as if we were standing in a field and the radfems were some tight little cluster, cut off in their own world on the perimeter. What the speaker fails to consider is that all feminism is on a continuum whose unifying principle is disaffection toward men and things male. That’s all it is, and if you study feminism objectively you can form no other conclusion.

There is no break, no gap, no discontinuity, between radical feminism and the rest of feminism. It is a moral plenum, fully packed. For every foul man-hater, there is a slightly less foul man-hater, then a slightly less foul one than that . . . and down the line it goes, shade by shade. For example, Amanda Marcotte is only half as bad as Mary Daly – but comparatively speaking, that’s still pretty damned bad! So is Mary Daly unacceptable while Amanda gets a pass? Where should we set the cutoff?

If we were to address the radical man-hating gangrene as a serious issue, we would morally amputate the phenomenon. But in order for THAT to happen, we would need to establish a moral threshhold, to effectively quantify how much systemic man-hating we can theoretically “live with”.

Anything above the cutoff might be denounced and ostracized, but there would still be a boundary of acceptability – and that is just the problem. The stench of misandry wouldn’t be quite so overpowering any more, but it would still be present, and permanent, and tolerated. And it would still taint feminism as a whole.

Eventually, we might feel obligated to repeat the whole process; to hack off more of the rotten end and set the cap a little lower. If we were moved to do this time and again, there would soon be precious little of feminism remaining.

That ought to teach us that the apologists and deflectionists are right: we oughtn’t be so fixated on the extremists. The rot extends clear through the feminist organism to some degree, and examples closer to home (of casual misandry or mere perverse ignorance) are never lacking. Every chance we get, we should point out the pervasive anti-male bias – be this subtle or brazen.

Anti-male bias – whether in the form of hating men, or looking the other way when evidence of man-hating crops up, or simply the prevalence of double standards which favor women – is recognizable as the core principle which makes feminism feminism. This principle, more than anything, binds the feminist project together, moves it forward, and explains the complex reality of its evolvement through time.

The feminist project seeks to expand the power of women with no limit, and anything like ethical regard for men and maleness would impose a formidable barrier to such expansion. Remove that ethical regard, and the frontier is wide open. Hence, so far as the feminist project is concerned, ethical regard for men and maleness has got to go – and what better why to shuck off ethical regard for anything, than to HATE it?

Since the world always contains X number of women who hate men. . .and even MEN who hate men, feminism's inner cadre always has a sufficient recruitment pool. Hate is a tremendous motivator, and we can hardly account for feminism's vitality on the theory that the real movers-and-shakers are only mildly annoyed with men.

In the end, if feminism did not harbor a kind of moral black hole of infinite disaffection toward men and maleness, it would quickly reach the limit of its possible development. . . . and begin to dissipate.

So once again, radical feminism – to wit, the man-hating kind – is the CORE of feminism. By contrast, it is the liberals, the moderates, the humanists, and the "fun" feminists who make up the fluffy fringe on feminism's perimeter. They are the useful idiots who serve mainly as camouflage and as ideological pack mules.

Those who say that radical feminism is marginal to feminism at large, are lying – either to you, or to themselves.

She ain't honest (Nurse Ratched)

Mark Dent · 29 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

There is a line in that magnificent film, One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest, which has stayed with me since the first time I heard it. Randle McMurphy, a new inpatient at the asylum, is called to the office of the administrator-Dr Spivey. He is there to discuss his progress and behaviour.
Dr Spivey says: "Do you like it here?"

McMurphy searches for the right words and after a long pause, replies:
"That fuckin' nurse…she ain't honest." He is referring to the woman who runs the ward he has been placed in.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=HUcDw8GKU4k

The scene begins at around 50:38

To this day, I get goosebumps when Nicholson speaks this line. It articulates so succinctly how I have felt about so many feminists of great repute. These women and men are called courageous, compassionate and inspirational. Most of them would sit very comfortably alongside Nurse Ratched.

Like her, they have a talent for appearing sincere, caring and trustworthy. Few people would dare to question their integrity or what truly motivates them unless they are willing to be ostracised and branded.

As we have seen these past few decades, very few people are willing to point out the obvious fact- the emperor has no clothes. To do so can cost you your job, reputation and friends.

McMurphy felt the truth in his gut long before his head reached the same conclusion. "She plays a rigged game."

Clementine Ford is one such person.

She plays a rigged game and almost always wins. A few months ago she appeared on a National TV show called The Project, to discuss the terrible problem of misogynistic abuse in the world of Facebook and Twitter.

Clementine Ford on The Project

Ford presented herself as a brave woman trying to speak up for the rights of an oppressed minority. In carrying out this sacred mission she is subjected to a torrent of abuse.

The panel predictably allowed Clementine to speak of the online abuse of women and girls without interruption, for surely we all know that only females are subjected to abuse and only males abuse in the backwaters of the internet.

Men are harassed more than women

Female bullying

This woman sat there playing the victim, seemingly bewildered by the abuse which flows in her direction, and yet the hosts of The Project and many viewers would have been fully aware that this "victim" has meted out her own venomous abuse in her powerful and privileged position as a journalist in one of our biggest daily newspapers. When the conservative Prime Minister, Tony Abbott, was elected to lead our government, Ms Ford created t-shirts with the word Fuck Abbott emblazoned in bold letters across the front. The sale of these t-shirts was promoted by her paper, The Age.

Fuck Tony Abbott t-shirts and other crimes against decency

Fuck Tony Abbott t-shirts

You must bear in mind that this same woman had for months written copiously about the horrific abuse directed at our first female PM-abuse she claimed, came from a source of female hatred rather than the fact that Julia Gillard was possibly the most incompetent, dishonest politician to lead our country.

Was Ford sanctioned or sacked? Of course not! The t-shirts were worn proudly around university campuses and protest rallies by the very students who had been condemning any criticism of Gillard with a vitriolic fervour that bordered on manic.

Had a well known conservative journalist by the name of Andrew Bolt (a man Ford detests) produced Fuck Julia Gillard t-shirts and promoted them in his paper, the very universe would have imploded. I can assure you that Bolt, as powerful as he is, would have been banned from all forms of media and denounced by Ford and her cohorts as a vile, women hating devil.

Who holds the power in our society?

This Clementine Ford, is the same woman who proudly places the motto, We Bathe in Male Tears , at the head of her Face book page. When this is raised, it is referred to as satire. Again, I don't believe a male journalist would retain his job if he had a Face Book page claiming he bathed in women's tears.

This is the woman who holds all men responsible for the crimes of a tiny minority and very carefully cherry picks examples of male violence to present on her page as proof of the inherent toxicity of the masculine species. Her abhorrence of violence never extends to the female variety. When eight children were butchered by a mother last year there was absolutely no reference to it on her page.

Like Nurse Ratched, she goads, pokes, taunts and humiliates males. There are many men who feel the outrage we feel here at AVfM, but lack the ability to convey their anger and burning frustration at this daily baiting in a calm, coherent or articulate manner. They revert to the childish, age old practise of name calling in an attempt to push back against her vicious bigotry. They resort to unacceptable language and occasionally stupid threats. Yet even Ford concedes that most of this abuse comes from 14 and 15 year old schoolboys.

I have no doubt, Ford welcomes such abuse. It is what she craves, for like us, she knows it carries no threat, but it does provide her with more ammunition which she delights in using to prove her theory – that males are toxic.

As a primary school teacher, I supervise the school yard during recess and lunch breaks every day. Almost every break, there is a conflict. Some involve physical abuse and bullying. During the 35 years I have been teaching I believe that in 90% of the incidents there has been mutual culpability in the abuse which took place.

The crying "victim" approaches and says they have been punched or verbally abused. Sometimes they say they have been excluded from a game and told to go away. We walk together until we locate the culprit and a conversation begins.

"What happened?" I ask.

The answer usually reveals that the victim had refused to follow the rules of the game, had initiated the verbal abuse or even begun the physical altercation and came off second best. Often I discover that the "perpetrator" was being teased and lashed out at the person. Is this acceptable behaviour? It is not, but it is certainly something I understand and presents a very different picture to the one painted by the crying child who claimed to be the victim.

Researcher says women initiation of Domestic Violence Predicts Risk to Women

Occasionally, it is a simple case of a nasty bully picking on an entirely innocent victim. This however is not a common occurrence.

So we return to Clementine and her claims. She has done exactly what so many children have done in the school yard. It is a dirty, disingenuous game. She has poked and poked at the bear and when he lashes out, with claws extended, she squeals in feigned shock.

It is so ironic that Ford constantly writes and speaks about our patriarchal society and the power men hold. This comes from a woman who has a voice on National television programs and in major daily newspaper. Ford is a woman who rubs shoulders with Police Commissioners and can openly promote the abuse of the most powerful person in the land without fear of retribution.

No man can speak out about the rights of men in any mainstream forum unless he is the token MRA brought into the studio to be mocked and torn apart by five feminist panellists. No-one actually listens to any person who attempts to speak on behalf of men. It is simply a blood sport to have the occasional man offered up as a sacrificial lamb on radio or television.

So where can men turn in order to feel they are being heard? They go online and finally they have an opportunity to express the disgust and justified rage they feel as they endure the endless, daily misandric bombardment in our mainstream media.

Ford has to drag up comments from anonymous trolls in the murky swamps of cyberspace in order to provide proof of misogyny. We are subjected to vicious lies, smears and accusations from journalists and politicians and even the Australian of the Year and not one person in the media has the courage to speak out against this bigotry. Then people have the temerity to wonder why there is a boiling rage “out there” in the community.

Who really has the power?

In a powerful scene in the final moments of One Flew Over the Cuckoo’s Nest, McMurphy snaps when Ratched taunts a stuttering inmate and reduces him to a stammering wreck with her barbed tongue and veiled threat to humiliate him. This young man takes his life only moments after the wounding words of Nurse Ratched have torn him asunder.

When Randle McMurphy sees the lifeless body of a boy he had loved and nurtured back to a state of self respect and confidence, he launches himself at Ratched , places his two hands around her neck and attempts to squeeze the very life from her body.

Anyone walking in on such a scene would see it all so clearly. There, before you, is a highly respected, dedicated nurse, trying to do a difficult job, and one of the crazy, brutish inmates she cares for has brutally attacked her and is attempting to end her life.

He is just another violent, toxic male.

But the observer would be wrong. What we have is a powerful, controlling, manipulative woman, who delights in playing tortuous mind games with her vulnerable patients, being attacked by the one man who sees her abuse of power and cruelty and wants to put an end to it.

Do we condone such violence? Of course we do not. It is the wrong way to express your hurt, anger and frustration. But if we are going to move beyond the evil notion of masculine toxicity as the fundamental cause of all evil and decrease the number of violent incidents in the home then we must understand the factors which contribute to it.

Of course, McMurphy is taken away and reduced to a shell of the man he was. A lobotomy is regarded as the most suitable way to deal with this problematic patient.

And what becomes of Nurse Ratched? She recovers quickly from her assault and is very soon back on the ward, controlling the men who have been placed under her care.

No doubt she is as respected and admired as much as she ever was, much like the many feminists in Australia’s media.

If you haven’t seen this beautiful film, please take the time to watch it. If you have, please watch the uplifting final scene once again for a spiritual pick me up. It never fails. The tide will turn.

October is the fifth annual Bash a Violent Bitch Month

Paul Elam · 30 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Publisher's note 2015: As you will see in the following piece, it is an annual repost going back several years. Each year I add a little to it to clarify and expand the intent of the OP. It causes some clutter, but it's fun.

This year, my addition is simple. It is a reminder that just being satire does not mean there are not very serious implications underneath the hyperbole. This is especially true with this piece.

The sad fact is that women are allowed to commit domestic violence with relative impunity in this culture. The problem is arguably worse today than it was when Jezebel.com made their disgusting post, bragging about beating men, which started this whole Bash a Violent Bitch affair.

Consequentially, behind the satire in this piece is a very serious message. Women, please listen to Whoopi Goldberg. If you don't want to be slapped, backhanded, punched in the mouth, decked or throttled keep your stinking hands off of other people. A man hitting you back after you have assaulted him does not make you a victim of domestic violence. It makes you a recipient of justice.

Deal with it.

Everyone has the right to defend themselves. Parents have a right to teach boys and girls to hit back against assaultive people of both sexes and the responsibility to stand behind them when they do.

No better medicine for a real life, physical bully than a bloody nose. That is not satire or hyperbole.

If you can't handle that, find another planet to live on. Maybe the United Nations will build one for you if you go there and whine loud enough. PE

♦ ♦ ♦

Pubisher's note 2013: This article, originally published on October 22, 2010, is a satirical response to a piece that appeared on the feminist site Jezebel ("Have you Ever Beat Up a Boyfriend? Because, Uh, We Have") and to common media "jokes" about women physically assaulting men and boys. It has been brought back to the front page with a tip of the hat to Ally Fogg, probably one of the most disingenuous hacks on the planet. Fogg's been discussing the "vile," violent Men's Human Rights Movement and he and his commenters are on a tear again, seeking attention through attacking AVFM in the comments to a recent article on the Justice 4 Men and Boys party (not affiliated with AVfM, although we are on friendly terms with founder Mike Buchanan) with selective out-of-context quotes, apparently in the hopes others are too stupid to know satire when they see it, even when it's painstakingly pointed out to them. The article is reposted as is, the only changes will be "Fogg Alerts" which we use to help Ally's numerous intellectually slow followers to know satire as it appears in front of their eyes. Those items which are not satire, but might be confused as such by the intellectually impaired, will also be identified in brackets.

For their advance edification, we provide this link to the following wiki page, which provides definitions of Horatian and Juvenalian satire. We do with the instruction this article is an example of satire of the Juvenalian variety. For those of Fogg's inclinations that don't know what a hyperlink is, I provide the following definition, with the caution that this is all the help I can offer. PE

Juvenalian satire, named after the Roman satirist Juvenal (late 1st century – early 2nd century CE), is more contemptuous and abrasive than the Horatian. Juvenalian satire addresses social evil through scorn, outrage, and savage ridicule. This form is often pessimistic, characterized by irony, sarcasm, moral indignation and personal invective, with less emphasis on humor. Strongly polarized political satire is often Juvenalian. Also see: Satires of Juvenal.

♦ ♦ ♦

It's domestic violence awareness month, folks. We are about to enter another [not satire] month long national circle jerk, the entire domestic violence industry masturbating to a frenzy of trumped up stats and sadistically titillating lies.

We will have flying spittle in the halls of congress and the United Nations; the antecedents of hysterical demands that we take on the worldwide cause of defending helpless women across the globe from their sorry lot in life as victims. We will have grown men donning themselves in drag couture and walking a mile in "her shoes," a sort of trendy, new age and humiliating self flagellation by men who want to atone for all bearers of the evil penis.

And we have a resurrected article from August of '07, from the women at Jezebel.com (tip of the hat to the illustrious Dr. Snark) demonstrating how unrepentantly violent they really are; how much they seem to enjoy it.

Senior writer Tracie Egan Morrissey penned the article, which addresses research findings reported in Psychiatric News that, "In fact, when it comes to nonreciprocal violence between intimate partners, women are more often the perpetrators."

Morrissey reacted to that oft ignored reality, after a query of her female readers for those who have beaten their boyfriends, with the following:

> "…well, let's just say it would be wise never to fuck with us."

And of course the comment section that follows the article backs up her pro abuse attitude toward men. It is replete with women regaling us with stories of how they [not satire] kicked, hit, smashed and bloodied their boyfriends for doing the sometimes annoying things that men do. One women reported that she punched her ex in the face for having the audacity to get another girlfriend after they broke up.

[Fogg Alert! Satire!] That's it. In the name of equality and fairness, I am proclaiming October to be Bash a Violent Bitch Month.

I'd like to make it the objective for the remainder of this month, and all the Octobers that follow, for men who are being attacked and physically abused by women – to beat the living shit out of them. I don't mean subdue them, or deliver an open handed pop on the face to get them to settle down. I mean literally to grab them by the hair and smack their face against the wall till the smugness of beating on someone because you know they won't fight back drains from their nose with a few million red corpuscles.

And then make them clean up the mess.[/Fogg Alert]

[not satire] You know, we used to have a name for people who only hit those that they knew wouldn't fight back.

Bullies.

And we all know that bullies are cowards. Put a hurting on one and they go find someone else to pick on every time. It's what cowards do.

[Stupid alert. For those too challenged to recognize satire, I spell it out for them]

Now, am I serious about this?

No.[/stupid alert] Not because it's wrong. It's not wrong. Every one should have the right to defend themselves. Hell, women are often excused from killing someone whom they allege has abused them. They can shoot them in their sleep and walk. Happens all the time. It'll even get you a spot on Oprah, and cuntists across the cunt-o-sphere will be lionizing you.

[not satire]In that light, every one of those women at Jezebel and millions of others across the western world are as deserving of a righteous ass kicking as any human being can be. But it isn't worth the time behind bars or the abuse of anger management training that men must endure if they are uppity enough to defend themselves from female attackers.

The better option is to kick her to the curb, figuratively speaking, and hopefully move on to some better choices. Besides, violence in self defense should be in some way commensurate with the violence of the attack.

I will say this, though. To all the men out there that decided to say "Damn the consequences," and fight back, you are heroes to the cause of equality; true feminists. And you are the honorary Kings of Bash a Violent Bitch Month. You are living proof of just how hollow "don't fuck with us," rings from the mouths of bullies and hypocrites.

In the spirit of feminists everywhere, you GO, boy!

For feminists and white knights.

Note: once again, for those who missed it, this article is a satirical response to this piece on Jezebel ("Have you Ever Beat Up a Boyfriend? Because, Uh, We Have") and to common media "jokes" about women physically assaulting men and boys. –Eds.

YOYO 19: One day a month, stop protecting women

August Løvenskiolds · 30 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The era of chivalry, of men protecting all women just because they are women, is coming to a close. In the time of growing gender equality women are no longer the loving partners of men, they are our competitors. One core principle of competition is that you don't give aid to your competitors unless you are forced to.

One barrier to gender equality is the strong instinct in men to protect the women around us even if it puts men's own lives in peril, and the strong instinct in women to seek a man's protection at the risk of the man's life. The human practices that come from these sexist instincts must come to a halt if we are serious about working towards gender equality in society.

Put simply, women who need men's protection are not, and never will be, worthy of equality with men. This weakness, left unaddressed, will always make women seem inferior and infantile no matter how much we try to pretend as if it doesn't.

To begin the process of weaning women off the lion shield of men's bodies and physical prowess, MRAs in India are advocating that on the 19th of each month, men withdraw from protecting women. As women are forced to adapt and learn to become responsible for their own safety and security absent the security men provide, more days will be added until finally, men and women will stand as equals when confronted by the dangers of the world.

I call this idea/proposal "YOYO 19" after the urban slang term that translates as "You're On Your Own," in this case, on the 19th of each month. "Yoyo" can also refer to a sort of untimely bowel movement, which I imagine feminists will have when their fearful reaction to this article takes hold.

It is the Spring of 1984. I'm on vacation, diving for sea shells about two hundred yards off the shore of South Padre Island. As I surface for a gulp of air, I hear a tiny cry for help – a short, heavy Hispanic woman is caught in a rip current and is being pulled out to sea. There is no one else around us.

Her face is barely and briefly visible above the waves and her efforts to swim against the current have failed. I drop my bag of shells (and the unopened can of Coors Light I had found in the warm gulf waters) and swim toward her; as I reach her the rip current takes me as well. I grab her right hand with my left and tell her not to worry, I've got her. Her grip is steady but weak.

Instead of fighting the rip current by trying to swim to shore, I swim parallel to shore and perpendicular to the current, dragging the woman behind me. I'm now crushing her hand in mine; the pain in her hand and shoulder must be horrible but she is too weak to protest.

Progress is slow at first and the shore begins to grow more distant as the rip current carries us away. After several minutes, the rip current declines and I begin to curve toward the shore. Twenty minutes later my toe touches the sea floor and the woman can now walk to land. I release her hand and she walks back to her family without even a word or glance in my direction. I never see her again.

Men's instinct to protect women is closely identified with chivalry in our culture but this instinct appears to be much older and more fundamental than that – before civilization, a man who failed to protect his baby mama and children would not have had genes that survived long. Chivalry extended this instinct to protect familiar women to the general protection of all women. Despite feminism's ambivalence toward men's protective instincts – radfems reject men entirely and Anita Sarkeesian rails against men learning to rescue damsels in distress in video games while "HeForShe" feminists seek to enlist men as protectors – those instincts endure for now, but for how much longer will men be willing to protect women if men get nothing out of it? Feminists feel entitled to men's general protection no matter how badly women treat men. This entitlement is about to come to a swift and screeching halt.

The general protection of men freed women from having obligations familial or sexual to one or more dedicated protector men, what feminists call patriarchy – the rule by fathers. In seeking equality, however, feminists overlooked the necessity of their learning to protect themselves in the world. Older school feminists like Susan Brownmiller, who played a prominent role in creating feminist rape farming, think the current feminist concerns that women protecting themselves is "victim-blaming" is unrealistic:

> Susan Brownmiller, who published the groundbreaking Against Our Will: Men, Women, and Rape in 1975, takes issue with the current conversation around sexual assault. She believes it's unrealistic for women to think they can drink like men and still be safe, and that women are responsible for keeping themselves out of dangerous situations….
>
> They have been tremendously influenced by the idea that "You can drink as much as you want because you are the equal of a guy," and it is not true. They don't accept the fact there are predators out there, and that all women have to take special precautions. They think they can drink as much as men, which is crazy because they can't drink as much as men. I find the position "Don't blame us, we're survivors" to be appalling.

Of course, in response, today's feminists are savaging Brownmiller as a "victim blamer" for suggesting that women should be held to the same standards as men.

To get an idea of the relative worth and necessity of men's protection, let's compare and contrast housework (that is stereotypically and optionally associated with women) to security services that women and society demand from men.

Feminists argue that women are uncompensated for the housework women do in domestic relationships and that men should shoulder more of the housework burden, even if men have lower standards of cleanliness and domestic order than women have. This demand for more male participation is usually made despite men's reluctance, passive-aggressive feigned incompetence, or even outright refusal. If men forced women into such service, feminists would be quick to call it abusive or even rape, yet feminists feel free to demand it of men anyway. That is what feminist entitlement looks like.

Desperate attempts have even been made to tie housework to the sexual interest and consent in women: phrases like "women would rather have unsatisfying sex in a clean house than hot sex in a dirty one" were once common and men are often told that they will have more frequent and satisfying sex with their partners if they help out more around the house. Studies published in scientific journals show that this is a lie: the more housework men do, the less sex they have. As expected, feminists like Sheryl "Lean In" Sandberg openly lie about these studies and assert just the opposite of what actual studies show.

What feminists ignore is that men are not compensated for the domestic security men are expected to provide for women, both in the home and in the nation. In the United States and some other countries, men – and NOT women – are legally required to register for selective service (the military draft) and be ready to go to war on a moment's notice. When a father departs the home for a long trip or upon death or divorce, a son is told "you are the man of the house now," meaning it is now the son's responsibility to keep the women of the household safe from the dangers of the world. I heard this phrase at age 16 when my father died – my grief and fear over my dad's passing were compounded by new responsibilities I never asked for. I had no time to grieve, I was "man of the house" however poorly I was equipped for the job.

It is March, 1992. My girlfriend and I are in Dallas at a Greenville Avenue restaurant eating dinner with Carol, one of my girlfriend's friends who is hobbled by a cast on her foot. Carol, slight and thin, is unsteady on her crutches so, after dinner, I am asked to carry her across a busy street.

As we cross the street a car screeches around the corner aimed right for us. I twist around, tossing Carol out of harm's way while the car draws near but the recoil leaves me directly in the car's path. The car stops suddenly, clipping my shins as I jump onto the hood. Carol and I are both bruised but alive. I never see nor speak to Carol again.

Providing security for women is a 24 hour / 7 days a week job that offers no money nor job satisfaction, but a lifelong stain of guilt or cowardice if the man should fail at his gender role and the women he is supposed to protect get injured. Men will march off to do bloody battle, cover their girlfriends' bodies with their own to protect them from bullets, and run up the staircases of burning, falling buildings to try to save women they don't even know rather than risk failing as protectors. MGTOW and MRAs who have liberated themselves from the onus of being involuntary security guards often catch hell for it even though we owe women nothing in any objective sense.

However onerous and exacting women make their job of cleaning, they have complete control over how much cleaning they do and a woman can at least pause for rest from the task every evening. She is rewarded with the sight of a beautiful home if she succeeds at it.

Men get no rest from, and no real nor psychological reward for their security job except the rare and often forgotten gratitude of their spouses and female relatives, but feminists are even trying to stamp this out: feminists now argue that "men shouldn't be thanked for doing the right thing" as if men were emotionless slaves fit only to have our feelings ground into emotional dust under their Birkenstocks. Men are forced to live with the daily terror that the expectation of their heroism can be turned against them, or stripped from them at any time.

The loss of women's open gratitude for men's security services can only have a corrosive effect on men's willingness to put ourselves at risk in the service of women's safety. There is a chilling phrase from psychology that describes this situation: "the behavior undergoes extinction." A pigeon can be trained to peck at a button to earn a food reward but when the food stops, eventually the behavior undergoes extinction – the pigeon pecks at the button no more.

The capsizing of the cruise ship Costa Concordia in January of 2012 proved that the extinction of men's protective instincts is already happening. One author even characterized the wealthy vacationing men who failed to put women and children first as "white trash."

Because the protection that men provide to women is largely invisible in everyday life and only becomes clear in disasters and other dire straits, it is perhaps unexpected and unfair to women that we withdraw our protection from women without serving notice to them.

So, here it is, ladies. Don't be stupid. Don't be a victim. From this day forward, on the 19th of each month, you will enjoy no protection from men at all. You're on your own – YOYO 19 – for 24 hours. You need to slim down, muscle up, and purchase weapons, Columbian-made Kevlar fashions and floatation devices if you want to survive the Purge. You can also buy a chastity belt on Amazon but hurry, there were only 4 left the last I checked.

It is the Spring of 2013. I'm in the bar late after talking to a tipsy, young and attractive feminist for a couple of hours. She says she's never met an MRA nor a MGTOW before and she is fascinated by my perspective on gender equality. She is also flirting outrageously while I'm playing it cool. Judging from her sidelong glances and racy talk, the sexual tension is clear.

2 AM – closing time – rolls around and it is time for me to walk home, 4 blocks away. The feminist is parked in the same general direction and she asks if she can walk with me. She takes my hand and we start walking. Three blocks later we reach the crossroads – her car is a full block up Commerce street; my apartment is a block down the perpendicular Crowdus.

Rather than go out of my way to walk her safely to her car, I release her hand, tell her to have a nice night, and turn towards home. She stands for a moment, slack jawed and sputtering. No man has ever violated chivalry and dismissed her so callously, nor rejected her when her sexual overtures were so clear. I don't look back. I hope I never see her again.

Are there some women still worthy of protection?

Women in my family have gone out of their way to protect me when I've been ill. Those women have earned my protection as equals.

There are a number of women MRAs who work tirelessly to protect men from both feminists and their gynocentric allies among traditionalists. Those women MRAs have also earned our protection as equals.

But the feminists who hate men, refuse to protect themselves from rape, make false accusations against men, demonize men's sexuality, compromise due process for accused men, and lie to our faces?

No fucking way. YOYO, baby. You're on your own. Get used to it.

This article grew out of discussions held at the Men's Only Retreat held in North Carolina in September 2015 – MORNC 15.

Why do good girls become feminists?

Rachael Lefler · 30 September 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The MRA or mere critic of feminism commonly hears some variation of “Not all feminists are like that”, or “NAFALT”, whenever they attack feminism or call it out on behavior and ideas that seem irrational, cultish, fascist, hysterical, exaggerating, petty, childish, spiteful, greedy, envious, or hateful. But just because it’s an overused, to the point of becoming a cliché, response whenever someone criticizes feminism, it’s nonetheless worth probing into. Why is it that not all feminists are “like that?” Why would a thoughtful, considerate woman join what is more and more every day showing its true colors as a misandrist hate group that is intolerant of opposing voices?

The Appeal of Any Movement

Like religions, political movements offer converts several things of great psychological benefit, including:

1. Friendship and social acceptance.
2. An easy explanation for why the world is the way that it is.
3. An easy way to blame their problems and frustrations on something other than themselves.
4. The chance to become more powerful as a group than they could be individually.

I would say most people join movements or religions they see as representing the thing they lack in themselves and their lives, but want and hope for most. People who want stability, family, and community might seek a traditional, organized religion; people who want tranquility, freedom to be themselves, and oneness with nature might seek more modern and less organized religions. It is the same with political movements. For example, people who want more pay and benefits might be attracted to socialist politics, while people who want more freedom to run their own company how they want will prefer libertarianism.

With women, basically you (obviously) have a mix of good and bad ones. We can call “good” those who are even-tempered, rational, pleasant, calm, kind, loving, nurturing, compassionate, patient, and civilized. The “bad” ones are greedy, moody, irrational, self-absorbed, vain, bitchy, gossipy, and psychopathic, being thoughtlessly hurtful. But, while it’s good to be a good woman, it’s also a bit painful. It means stifling your urges to harm others. It means listening to that annoying old man’s umpteenth complaint at the nursing home you work for, always with the same calm smile, when you’d rather “accidentally” give him too many sedatives next meal time. It’s hard because society doesn’t always reward niceness like it should. The nice guy sees hot women hooking up with psychopathic men, and the nice girl turns green with envy as nasty bitches get what they want in life, or so it often seems. Outspoken women, even the really mean and arrogant ones, get rewarded with money, men who do their bidding, career advancement, and positive social regard. Nice women, like nice guys, too often get the short end of the stick.

Enter: Feminism

What feminism tells nice women is a seductive message; that all our problems are caused by patriarchy, and that being nice is a sign of our oppression, and that the key to liberation is to stop giving a fuck about being nice and just be more assertive, crude, mean, and masculine.

Feminism tells us geeky, bottom-rung-of-society nice girls that all we have to do to be free is to stop being nice girls. When we feel overwhelmed or powerless, it tells us things we want to hear because they make us feel powerful. Suddenly, no act or thought of ours is too mundane or too trivial to have no greater political meaning. It becomes revolutionary to stop shaving our legs or to not wear makeup, as revolutionary as a hunger strike or a worker’s revolt. It makes us feel powerful, triumphant, big.

The Problem

The kind of illusory self-importance feminism offers us, however, is fragile. It’s all built upon lies, false statistics, illogical assumptions, illusions, and deceptions that distort reality. Therefore, when someone becomes a feminist, they have to, to a certain degree, shut out reality, discarding even the most well-proven facts, if they discredit or challenge feminism.

The more illusory, bullshit power feminism gives us, the more hostile we become to other points of view. I think that's why 20-something women, including me, are more likely than older women to be able to shake off feminist brainwashing attempts, because we don't really receive the benefits of power that more experienced professional victims get from their more distinguished careers in whining. That way, there is nothing good we have that is threatened by challenges to the feminist worldview.

Feminism is like a stack of turtles from Dr. Seuss' "Yurtle the Turtle"; the ones on the bottom gain from their liberation by not having to support anyone they don't agree with or don't like, but the ones at the top have to really crack the whip to keep those supporters under them, or they fall. In other words, they need us more than we need them.

Once we realize that being kind and believing in equal political rights for both genders does NOT mean that you have to support the crazies and the professional complainers, those people lose their power.

In other words, I think the "cool" feminists who aren't "like that" should take a good look at themselves, and answer: Do you really need feminism, or does feminism just need you?

Why Gay Men Don't Need Feminism – Part 4: Brotherhood

andybob · 1 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Introduction

'Why Gay Men Don't Need Feminism' is a four-part series of articles adapted from a speech that was intended to be presented at the Second International Conference on Men's Issues in 2015 by the author, Matthew Lye (a.k.a. Andy Bob). The four parts are:

Part 1: Challenging Assumptions

Part 2: The Takeover

Part 3: Gay Bashing

Part 4: Brotherhood

As these articles are written from the perspective of a Men's Human Rights Activist (MHRA), they focus on the dysfunctional relationship between feminism and gay men. Feminism has had an entirely different relationship with lesbians which is irrelevant to this topic, and has been examined in detail elsewhere.

♦ ♦ ♦

Demonizing individuals and organizations engaged in promoting the rights and welfare of men and boys is one of the key tactics employed by feminists to silence their dissenting voices, and to prevent men of all sexual orientations from uniting against them in the spirit of shared purpose and brotherhood. It is essential to expose how feminists do this, and examine some of the damage it has caused.

In June, 2015 Pride Toronto [1] announced that it had decided to uphold the ban it had placed the previous year [2] on an organization focused on assisting men in crisis called the Canadian Association for Equality (CAFE) [3] on marching in its annual parade, adding that CAFE would be permanently banned from all future Pride Toronto activities. Pride Toronto's dispute resolution arbitrator, Paul Bent, released a statement explaining the decision:

"I considered CAFE's response that inclusion, diversity and equality are values the organization shares with Pride versus the numerous complaints filed against CAFE's participation arguing that CAFE, as an organization and through its affiliation with men's rights groups, contravenes Pride Toronto's vision to, 'create a safe space to engage communities in the celebration of their sexuality." [4]

Bent did not explain how CAFE's participation in any of Pride Toronto's activities could possibly pose any kind of threat to the safety of the colourfully-attired gay men and women who like to parade themselves at such events. Nor did he offer any details of the alleged "numerous complaints" that led to CAFE's ousting. The online magazine, Vice, managed to track down the source of these complaints to a disgruntled Toronto feminist who operates under the pseudonym, Emma R: "It all began when she started a Facebook event urging people to speak up after realizing that there was a very real possibility CAFE could be permitted to march in this year's Pride parade." [4] Emma R proudly explains:

"I created the Facebook event right before I went to bed and when I woke up in the morning, over 1000 people had joined and confirmed that they they'd submitted complaints to Toronto Pride's executive director Mathieu Chantelois." [4]

It is worth noting that Pride Toronto's board of directors formalized the ban against CAFE only two weeks after Emma R's created her late-night Facebook event without offering a single shred of evidence to support complainants' assertions that CAFE posed a credible thread to parade participants. Predictably, Emma R did not offer any evidence either, only her feelings – and her feminist-driven desire to perpetuate false threat narratives about any organization concerned with the rights and welfare of men and boys: “My motivation for spearheading this was around comfort… So to have a group that has such a demonstrated history of making people feel uncomfortable, [it] is just asinine to me that they would want to take part.” [4] Emma R did not feel the need to explain why the idea of helping men in crisis made her feel “uncomfortable”.

Vice journalist, Neha Chandrachud, cites the fact that there are no “queer initiatives or programming” on CAFE’s website in order to support her doubts about “the sincerity of CAFE’s commitment to the LGBTQ community.” Like many critics of the Men’s Human Rights Movement [MHRM], Chandrachud does not grasp the concept that CAFE, like A Voice for Men, is not a gay rights organization, but an organization which concerns itself with issues such as suicide, mental health, domestic violence, fathers’ rights and chivalry justice, that can affect the rights and welfare of all men and boys.

As a committed feminist, [5] Chadrachud is keen to promote the fallacy that “queer advocacy and men’s rights are ideological opponents” in order to create division among men of different sexual orientations, and to disguise the fact that the only ideological opponents to men’s rights within and around LGBT organizations like Pride Toronto are feminists like herself and Emma R.

A major obstacle to these feminists is the existence of the many gay and bisexual men and women who actively support men’s human rights organizations like CAFE and A Voice for Men. Naturally, Chandrachud chose not to consult any of these people, many of whom would have been more than happy for an opportunity to explain why they identify as Men’s Human Rights Activists [MHRAs], support the goals of egalitarian organizations like CAFE and A Voice for Men and share their many evidence-based reasons why feminism should be repudiated as a bigoted and destructive ideology that actively undermines the rights and welfare of men and boys – a demographic that includes gay and bisexual men.

Some gay MHRAs, like this author, would have even provided her with photographic examples to what gay men should do when confronted with a feminist who is trying to convince him that he is a woman-rejecting member of ‘the patriarchy’ who benefits from unearned privilege which he uses to oppress women by promoting ‘rape culture’, maintaining wage gaps and making feminists ‘uncomfortable’ by challenging their manufactured statistics, exposing their corruption, debunking their false threat narratives and denouncing their anti-male hate-mongering:

Feminist: You're a privileged, penis-worshipping phallocrat who expresses your misogyny by rejecting women and sexually assaulting them in gay bars. Andybob: You're an idiot.

No, Chandrachud doesn't consult any gay MHRAs. She consults anti-MHRA feminist, Emma R, who, while acknowledging that "men have it really hard in a number of areas", takes the opportunity to demonize the MHRM through a variety of frequently-employed feminist methods, such as conflating 'feminism' with 'women' and claiming that MHRAs accuse feminists/women of not merely exacerbating men's problems, but creating them: "But I think that instead of addressing these problem, the men's rights movement is scapegoating feminism and scapegoating women as the cause of their problems." Conflating 'women' with 'feminists' conveniently ignores the fact that not all women are feminists and not all feminists are women, but it enables feminists to label any criticism of feminism as an attack on women. Feminists never tire of conjuring up misogyny that doesn't exist.

Emma R also uses the feminist method of reiterating a slight variation on Gloria Steinem's attempt to force an alliance between feminism and the gay rights movement when Steinem claimed that they were, "completely the same thing". [6] "The struggles of women and the queer community may not be exactly the same, but they overlap. Feminism is a queer issue." [4] Conflating 'feminism' with 'gay rights' implies that the MHRM's antithetical position to feminism is an indirect attack on gay rights. Feminists create these kinds of semantic contortions because it leaves so many potential critics fatigued and bewildered from the tedious effort required to unravel them.

Predictably, Emma R cannot resist invoking feminism's most potent tactic of manufacturing false threat narratives when she demonizes the MHRM by suggesting that it poses some kind of imminent danger to women and girls: "…the thing is that the men's rights movement isn't just about a crazy opinion, they're people with a demonstrated history of doxing women and perpetuating violence."

Like all totalitarian ideologies, feminism cannot withstand close scrutiny – it crumbles beneath the weight of its own logically fallacious hypocrisy and the faulty premises upon which it is built. No movement has threatened feminism's cultural and legal hegemony with a greater barrage of sustained, evidence-based criticism than the ever-expanding MHRM. Feminists are becoming increasingly alarmed by this criticism and have reacted the way totalitarians invariably do by attempting to silence it in a concerted campaign of demonization propaganda. They're not widely-referred to as 'feminazis' for nothing.

Falsely accusing individuals and organizations within the MHRM of threatening feminists with retributive violence and harassment taps into society's gynocentric instincts to protect women and revile those who seek to do them harm – which, according to feminists, includes making them feel 'uncomfortable' – by debunking their endless litany of lies and copious use of anti-male shaming language. [7]

These false threat accusations are made against critics of feminism, like the MHRM, with such alarming frequency that it is necessary to examine some of them in order to prompt gay male feminists into asking themselves why they have chosen to align with a movement that goes to such morally corrupt extremes to shut down discussions about issues that can devastatingly impact their own lives. Hopefully, gay men will think twice about marching cheek-by-jowl with these reprehensible frauds the next time they are roped in to assisting feminists in their efforts to shut down such discussions – as they attempted to do in 2014, just prior to the First International Conference on Men's Issues in Detroit, U.S.A.

Gay men helping their feminist "allies" to protest a conference addressing issues that negatively affect their own rights and welfare.

"The absolute last thing we need is a group coming in that is known for threatening women with rape, torture and murder, and for being rape apologists who make violent threats against courthouses and other official city buildings…On June 7 [2014], union workers, feminists, leaders in the LGBTQ community [and] queer activists…gathered at Detroit's Grand Circus Park. Protestors carrying signs that read, "Misogyny Kills," "Blame the System, Not the Victim,"…quickly spread across the park. The sponsorship of the event came from across the political spectrum, including Gay/Bi/Trans men's groups…" [8]

The only evidence of violence in the lead up to the conference was that promised by feminists and their sympathizers. The most egregious examples of this violence were the threats made to the original conference venue, Detroit's Doubletree Downtown Hilton, forcing conference organizers to change locations at the last minute. [9] Emma Howland-Bolton supported the call to violence by organizing protests that encouraged some of her followers to make grossly inappropriate comments, including: "Trigger warning – these people [MHRAs] make me trigger-happy." [10] Another opined that the best way to protest was to actually attend the conference and "storm it".

Howland-Bolton was rightly admonished by conference presenter, Jonathan Taylor, who suggested in an open letter on his website, A Voice for Male Students, that she adopt a more responsible approach to her protest activities. [11] Howland-Bolton responded by complaining to Ms Magazine's Anji Becker Stevens that Taylor was targeting her "in classic MRA fashion." [12] In an email to Becker Stevens, Howland-Bolton made it clear that she did not intend to take any responsibility for her actions by writing:

"When A Voice for Men started targeting me…I was flabbergasted…But I guess it's not surprising that they acted in such an irrational manner. Sexism is irrational. Misogyny is irrational. So a male supremacist hate group like A Voice for Men that embraces sexism and misogyny is also going to be irrational. You cannot connect to reality if your beliefs are predicated on the assumption that, simply by virtue of your gender, you are superior to another person."

Predictably, Becker Stevens sympathized with Howland-Bolton, even going so far as accuse A Voice for Men/Male Students of being, "hard at work harassing and threatening women," [12] and that Howland-Bolton's protest deserved to be , "held in as safe of spaces as possible – safe from both physical harm and emotional trauma." [12] Becker Stevens did not reveal whether or not she believed that conference participants, like Jonathan Taylor, were entitled to the same protection, but she did manage to strongly imply that the feminist threats to the original conference venue were fabricated by A Voice for Men founder, Paul Elam, despite irrefutable evidence to the contrary. [13] One feminist even dismissed the evidence as, "the kind of vicious tactics that AVfM has used to derail and trivialize the response to [its] own ideology." [14]

Neither of these feminists accepted Paul Elam's cordial invitation to, "Buy a ticket, come in and have a seat and let us help you earn your way out of ignorance," [15] preferring to tow the feminist line by coddling their imaginary fears about the MHRM and perpetuating feminism's imaginary threat narratives.

The manner in which feminist activists attempted to shut down Dr Warren Farrell's presentation addressing the issue of male suicide at the University of Toronto in 2012

[16] has been examined in detail elsewhere, [17] particularly the shrill antics of the aggressively appalling Chany Binx, who responded to hearing about the tragic increase in male suicide rates by warbling, 'Cry Me a River'. [18] Less well known is the fact that Binx responded to being called out on her callous and disruptive behavior by damseling as demurely as her abrasive demeanour would allow:

"Because I had the audacity to tell a dude to STFU [that 'dude' was Dan Perrins, a respected Canadian MHRA whose beloved brother committed suicide], [19] an MRA no less, I have since been the target of not only just online misogyny (as if that's a surprise) but cyberstalking, rape and death threats…" [20]

Feminists were quick to defend Binx for suffering such horrors as being compared to Pennywise the clown [21] and having total strangers indicate that they were sickened by her mockery of male suicide victims. Feminist playwright, Sabina England, was outraged that people were offended by Binx's lack of empathy: "The MRAs, they had their stupid little seminar interrupted. Awh, boo hoo. Obviously that is just SUCH a big deal." [22] England interpreted the widespread condemnation of Binx as, "a serious reminder that women are not safe anywhere." [22] These committed feminists exhibit the same level of empathy that all feminists have for men in pain.

A feminist takes a well-earned break from being empathetic to men in pain.

Feminist media pundits and academics are not above making false claims of violent harassment and abuse in the wake of being exposed to dissenting voices, as gay feminist critic Milos Yiannopoulos discovered after he unnerved Dr Emily Grossman with facts and logic in a televised debate in July, 2015: [23] "One of the most frustrating things about debating feminists and feminist academics is how readily they reach for words such as 'harassment', 'abuse' and 'safety' – particularly when they are losing the argument."

Yiannopoulos read a Tweet that Grossman had posted following the debate: "Absolutely reeling from the misogynistic backlash my debate has received. Hadn't quite realized the extent of #everydaysexism. Wow." By that point, Yiannopoulos had learned to be suspicious of feminist claims of online harassment. Comedienne, Kate Smuthwaite, had made similar claims after she lost her temper during a debate with Yiannopoulos: "FFS this is probably the worst online barrage of online misogyny I've ever faced…It's horrible". However, when pressed, Smuthwaite couldn't produce more than two examples of this "barrage".

Yiannopoulos and a fellow researcher decided to investigate Grossman's claims and found that, of the 567 Tweets Grossman had received, many were supportive, many challenged her debate performance, many were critical of her position, a few were slightly mean-spirited, but none were outright misogynistic or abusive: "Our conclusion was that her claims were unfounded." Yiannopoulos echoed the sentiments of many MHRAs by observing:

"To those of us watching feminists and feminist academics, it can be tough to escape the conclusion that they deploy the word 'misogyny' simply to indicate disagreement, and perhaps as a signal to white knights that they need backup because their arguments are failing." [23]

Feminists, like Anita Sarkeesian, [24] Danielle D'Etremont [25] and the Women's Studies Department at the University of Toronto [26] have all alleged, or at least implied, to have been victims of MHRA-perpetrated violence, harassment, cyberbullying, and even terrorism. Feminists make these allegations faster than the law enforcement officials who investigate them can dismiss them, which they invariably do, as lacking credibility. Police and FBI officials usually refrain from suggesting that feminists fabricate these threats themselves, which is what University of Wyoming 'rape culture' promoter, Meg Lankers-Simon was caught doing in May, 2013. [27]

Meg Lankers-Simon explains why men are the problem at the 'Take Back the Night Rally' she organized after threatening to rape herself.

It isn't enough for feminists to drag dimpled doe-eyed darlings, like Emma Watson, before U.N assemblies to urge men to stop caring about themselves and each other in order to focus exclusively on fulfilling feminist agendas. [28] Nor are they satisfied with identifying Isla Visa mass shooter, Elliot Rodger, as being either a MHRA – or like a MHRA – in article [29] after article [30] after article [31], despite the fact that he had no connection whatsoever to the MHRM, or made any reference at all to any of the issues addressed by the MHRM, even in his 140-page manifesto. Feminists may as well cite Daffy Duck or Pick-up Artist [PUA] guru, Roosh V, for all the relevance Rodger has to the MHRM. But cite him they do – every chance they get.

Feminists have now launched an international campaign to silence their critics by attempting to shut down MHR sites like A Voice for Men, and are using the U.N to help them. [33] Failed British Labour Party leader candidate, Yvette Cooper, has even characterized the growing antagonism towards feminist bigotry and corruption as bullying, online harassment and misogynistic abuse which is "increasingly masquerading as political activism" and, predictably, dangerous to women. She warns:

"Unless misogyny on the Internet is challenged, more women's voices will be silenced, and more women will be oppressed or feel prevented from speaking out just as if we've gone back to the Victorian age. We cannot let that happen." [34]

Yet again, a feminist is conflating 'women' with 'feminists' in order to create an illusion of rampant misogyny, perpetuate the myth that MHRAs yearn for a return to traditional gender roles – something which is anathema to the vast majority of MHRAs, especially those at A Voice for Men [35] – and to signal to those white knights previously mentioned by Milos Yianopoulos to come riding to the rescue.

It never occurs to Cooper that it is she who is trying to silence women's voices: women like Dr Tara Palmatier of A Shrink for Men, [36] erudite anti-feminist videographer Karen Straughan (a.k.a. GirlWritesWhat), [37] dedicated men's rights activists like Suzanne McCarley, [38] Jasmin Newman [39] and Hannah Wallen, a MHRA who pithily observed that:

"…feminists are claiming that their experience of having ideological beliefs about women's lives is a more valid description of us than our own experience of living them. They use that claim to treat any resistance to them as an attack, rather than a defense against a presumptuous violation of personal boundaries." [40]

These are just a few of the many women who care so much about the men and boys in their lives, and those who aren't, that they have added their eloquent voices to the MHRM, often at great personal risk from feminists who uniformly vilify them as gender traitors for daring to publicly reject bigoted feminist orthodoxy and insisting that men and boys deserve to have their issues addressed openly, honestly and compassionately. These are the women that feminists like Yvette Cooper want to silence.

More importantly, these women are welcomed into the MHRM, where they are greatly appreciated and respected. In stark contrast, feminist men are routinely shunned within the feminist movement – as James Ritchie discovered when he was removed from his elected position as Women's Officer at the University of Tasmania in Australia after the University of Tasmania's Women's Collective launched a petition which expressed its outrage that Ritchie was unaware of his proper place. Apparently, Ritchie made the mistake of taking Emma Watson's call for "male leadership in addressing women's issues" at face value. [41] Hopefully, he has learned his lesson, and is now suspicious of feminist claims made by waif-like actresses dressed in virginal white who once looked cute wearing pointy hats.

In fairness, not all feminists are entirely unsympathetic to men like James Ritchie:

A feminist offers proof to a skeptical world that she is not a man-hater.

At what point will gay men who identify as feminists begin wondering why feminists are so determined to demonize the MHRM and shut down any discussion by or about men that are not monitored and supervised by feminists? How many false threat narratives about the MHRM have to unravel like cheap suits under the slightest scrutiny in order for gay men who identify as feminists to put aside their listen-and-believe feminist indoctrination long enough to realize that feminists are not remotely interested in addressing issues that affect them as men? When will gay male feminists start asking themselves why feminists have gone to such deceitful extremes to frighten them away from a movement that actually does address their issues as men? These questions are impossible to answer with any certainty, but that point will probably be the moment when gay male feminists finally get sick of reading offensive tripe like this:

"He may be oppressed in some ways as a gay man, but he's still a man, and therefore a member of a group with the greatest social power, a member of a group which institutionally oppresses women. Gay men may be oppressed in some ways, but they also benefit from the structures which advantage men over women…So yes, gay men need feminism. But that means they have a duty to feminism- they have a duty to think about their own sexism, their own misogyny, their own perpetuation of harmful standards…And then they should come and help the feminist movement." [42]

To quote the late Dorothy Parker, "..it was at this point that Tonstant Weader fwowed up." [43] That's exactly what gay men need to do: 'fwow up' the feminist dogma that has always accused them of being as equally culpable as their straight brothers in an imaginary patriarchy that systemically privileges them and oppresses women, and has always demanded that they reject their male identities in order to fulfil their feminist duties as third-rate 'auxiliary women'. Gay male feminists need to purge themselves of their feminist indoctrination before they can re-evaluate their male identities, and acknowledge that the MHRM addresses issues that are relevant to them in a way that feminism does not, never has and never will.

To highlight this point, it is interesting to note that prominent male feminist, Jon Greenberg, prefers to post public apologies for what he imagines to be his male privileges rather than address any issues that are actually relevant to the rights and welfare of men and boys. [44] His top seven 'patriarchal benefits' are:

1) I have the privilege of a short morning routine

2) I have the privilege of a gender that confers authority

3) I have the privilege of easy bathroom access – even when there are no bathrooms

4) I have the privilege to show skin

5) I have the privilege to move about without fear of harassment, assault or rape

6) I have the privilege to enjoy the Internet without my gender being assaulted

7) I have the privilege of seeing myself widely and positively represented in the media

That's right: feminism has convinced Greenberg that men don't get harassed, raped, assaulted, cyber-bullied or ridiculed in the media – and that men should feel guilty about being able to urinate while standing up and remove their tank-tops at the beach. Anyone wondering if feminists responded to this by posting articles about the evils of 'mansplaining' ought to know the answer to that by now. [45]

In stark contrast to feminism, the MHRM isn't concerned about a man's sexuality any more than it is concerned about whatever points of 'intersectionality' he may or may not possess – though it certainly recognizes how these points might affect his experience as a man. The MHRM's principal concern is the range of issues which can, and frequently do, impact the lives of all men – issues which feminists routinely ignore, minimize, deny and even ridicule.

One such topic is male suicide. Dr Augustine J. Kposowa of the University of California discovered that in the United States, men were 4.8 times more likely to commit suicide than women, and that this rate more than doubled among men undergoing divorce or marital separation. [46] Experts have observed that men are far less likely to discuss the problems which cause the depression which often leads to suicide or to seek help from support services. [46] As male suicide is on the increase, gay male feminists should be pondering why University of Toronto feminists attempted to violently prevent Dr Warren Farrell from discussing some of those problems – one of which is the difficulty many gay teenaged boys have in accepting their sexuality; and to ostracize CAFE – one of whose goals is to provide support services for suicidal men and boys on university campuses throughout Canada – by staging protests designed to thwart its efforts.

Every independent (i.e.: non-feminist) study of domestic violence concludes that male victims of female-perpetrated domestic violence are far from being the statistically-negligible minority that feminists invariably claim them to be:

"According to a 2010 national survey by the Centers for Disease Control and U.S. Department of Justice, in the last 12 months more men than women were victims of intimate partner physical violence and over 40% of severe physical violence was directed at men…Despite this, few services are available to male victims of intimate partner violence…More research is needed on IPV against men, its impact on men and the domestic violence service response to male victims. Public education is needed on the extent of IPV against males, and services need to be provided for these victims." [47]

This study, by Bert H. Hoff of the University of Phoenix, recommends that, "State programs need to ensure that domestic violence services be provided to men across the state," and that, "Public education efforts…should be specifically addressed to women and girls as well as men and boys." [47] But this does not happen in Arizona, or, indeed, anywhere else. What does happen, is that feminist academics and activists demand that governments apply their 'Duluth Model' of domestic violence – a model which concludes that men cannot be victims of domestic violence because they belong to the oppressor class known as 'the patriarchy', the same binary paradigm in which women are the oppressed class and therefore, incapable of being perpetrators [48] – to all legislation and social policy, thus eliminating both the existence of male victims and the need to provide them with adequate support services in one fell swoop. This is certainly what happens in Australia. [49]

A feminist helps men by defining their rights for them.

Gay men who are victims of domestic violence receive no more sympathy or support than their male counterparts. [50] The only advice they are given, even from gay rights organizations like the StoneWall Society Webring, is to call domestic violence hotlines and hope for the best. [51] Perhaps this is when they will discover what Hoff meant when he said that one of the problems with the 'Duluth Model' is that it is "based on ideology, not science"; [52] or to put it in visual terms:

Suicide and domestic violence are just two of the many issues that gay men share with their straight brothers and are addressed by men's rights organizations like A Voice for Men and A Voice for Male Students. Other issues include, the boy crisis in education, [53] chivalry justice, [54] male genital integrity, [55] false rape allegations and the erosion of due process rights for men; [56] and, for those gay male feminists who think that the injustice of the family court system could never impact them, think again. [57]

These issues are explored in-depth at A Voice for Men, [58] which welcomes [59] anyone with a genuine concern for the rights and welfare of men and boys and who wants to offer suggestions about viable, non-violent solutions to the many problems currently confronting men and boys. That welcome is not extended to feminists who, as documented throughout this series of articles, are only interested in promoting their ideological dogma, fallacious myths about 'the patriarchy', feminist-manufactured statistics and their endless array of false threat narratives designed to hamper the efforts of activists who truly believe – as feminists decidedly do not – that men's and women's rights are equally important.

As they have made abundantly clear over the decades, feminists have delighted in exploiting the divide that has historically existed between men of different sexual orientations to ensure that they maintain the fear and loathing that prevents them from uniting in opposition against feminist ideology which seeks to undermine the rights and welfare of every man and boy. Feminists do not want gay men to perceive themselves as men first, as feminists undoubtedly do, but as a kind of underclass of default women, whom they expect to participate in feminism's ideological mission of demonizing straight men, and their 'toxic masculinity', as the cause of every one of the real and imagined problems confronting women and gay men – and punishing them by accordingly.

Gay male feminists who have been victimized by straight men have no right to hold MHRAs accountable for their experiences any more than feminists have the right to hold men accountable for the fact women were once restricted by assigned gender roles – which feminists presumptuously refer to as 'oppression' – while conveniently ignoring the fact that men, gay men included, were also restricted by the gender roles to which they were assigned.

Gay male feminists who harbour resentment against straight men need to be reminded that some straight men may also harbor some resentment about the fact that so many gay men have actively supported feminism – an ideology that has relentlessly targeted straight men for as long as many of them can remember. Mutual understanding and respect must cut both ways.

It is time to put resentments aside and unite in opposition with all men, and the women who love us, against an enemy which has always fed off our division. Feminism fears the day when men recognize each other's right to express their masculinities however they choose, whether it be attending Sunday Service with the wife and kids or shaking their orange speedos atop a bedazzled float. It is doubtful that many will want to continue expressing it as disposable utilities for ideologues who despise them.

For those gay male feminists who are still dithering about whether or not they need feminism, consider the role that one feminist has so kindly carved out in her movement, especially for you. If feminism has not yet made you 'fwow up', perhaps this will do the trick:

"I'm ready to see more gay men on the feminist front lines…I want to imagine that someday, when I am dying of breast cancer (or whatever it may be), a loving gay man will change my bedpan, not simply because it's his job, but because he's part of the sisterhood, because he's part of an honored tradition of queer and feminist care. I'll see you then my friend." [60]

Oh, no you won't – and never, ever refer to me as your 'friend'.

References:

[1] http://www.barbarakay.ca/articles/printView/899/hide

[2] http://equalitycanada.com/

[3]http://www.vice.com/en_ca/read/we-spoke-to-the-anonymous-activist-who-helped-ban-mras-from-toronto-pride

[4]http://www.vice.com/en_ca/read/mra-group-attacks-ontarios-anti-sexual-violence-campaign-with-an-idiotic-billboard-274

[5] http://www.pridetoronto.com/

[6]http://www.queerty.com/gloria-steinem-feminism-and-gay-rights-are-completely-the-same-thing-20120423

[7] http://www.mgtow.com/shaming-tactics/

[8] http://socialistworker.org/2014/06/12/bigots-not-welcome-in-detroit

[9]http://www.opposingviews.com/i/society/detroit-hotel-receives-death-threats-over-men-s-rights-conference

[10]http://www.avoiceformalestudents.com/wp-content/uploads/2014/05/Threat-violence-mens-issues-conference-detroit-michigan-emma-howland-bolton-facebook.png

[11]http://www.avoiceformalestudents.com/letter-to-emma-howland-bolton-regarding-threats-of-violence-and-death-by-protesters-under-her-organization-mason-elementary/

[12]http://msmagazine.com/blog/2014/06/06/protest-saturday-misogynistic-mra-conference-in-detroit/

[13]http://www.avoiceformen.com/a-voice-for-men/threats-of-violence-and-death-against-doubletree-hilton-in-detroit-over-mens-conference/

[14]http://fatbodypolitics.tumblr.com/post/89873668221/nomra-open-letter-to-boycott-the-mens-rights

[15]http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2014/05/29/mens-rights-conference_n_5405300.html

[16] https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=iARHCxAMAO0

[17]http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/to-the-university-of-toronto-students-union/

[18] https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=CvByTdMXlPM

[19]http://www.avoiceformen.com/men/mens-issues/suicide-the-problem-they-claim-to-be-working-on-but-arent/

[20] http://www.dailydot.com/news/feminist-blogger-in-hiding-mra-death-threats/

[21] http://uncyclopedia.wikia.com/wiki/Pennywise_the_Dancing_Clown

[22]http://theaetherealmeadow.tumblr.com/post/48137134716/it-blows-my-mind-how-people-are-accusing-the-red-haired?format=light

[23]http://www.breitbart.com/london/2015/06/11/why-do-feminists-cook-up-stories-aboutMilos -misogyny-when-they-lose-debates/

[24]http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/anonymous-feminist-provides-anita-sarkeesian-with-a-potential-new-source-of-revenue/

[25] http://thevarsity.ca/2014/03/31/queens-student-assaulted-after-receiving-threats/

[26]http://www.avoiceformen.com/allnews/cafes-cathy-young-event-changes-venue-as-panic-sweeps-university-of-toronto/

[27]http://www.avoiceformalestudents.com/feminist-meg-lanker-simons-famous-university-of-wyoming-rape-threat-hoaxer-accepts-plea-deal/

[28] http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/an-open-letter-to-emma-watson/

[29]http://www.dailykos.com/story/2014/05/24/1301671/-Elliot-Roger-Gunman-in-California-Mass-Shooting-was-influenced-by-the-Men-s-Rights-Movement

[30] http://www.gq.com/story/mens-rights-activism-the-red-pill

[31] http://www.alternet.org/gender/look-inside-infamous-mens-rights-movement

[32] http://www.rooshv.com/the-mens-rights-movement-is-dead

[33] https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Nud8h9jjS94&t=6

[34]http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-3249924/Sexist-online-trolls-putting-women-joining-Labour-warns-failed-leadership-candidate-Yvette-Cooper.html

[35]http://www.avoiceformen.com/men/mens-issues/traditional-women-and-their-white-knights/

[36]http://www.avoiceformen.com/a-voice-for-men/dr-tara-palmatier-avfm-mens-conference-detroit-2014/]

[37]https://video.search.yahoo.com/search/video;_ylt=A0SO8x98OwtWTZcAhS9XNyoA;_ylu=X3oDMTByNWU

4cGh1BGNvbG8DZ3ExBHBvcwMxBHZ0aWQDBHNlYwNzYw–?p=Girl+Writes+What&fr=yfp-t-502-sb

[38]http://www.avoiceformen.com/featured-writer/suzanne-mccarley/

[39]http://relatingtomen.com/blog/from-the-heart/

[40] http://breakingtheglasses.blogspot.hk/

[41]http://www.news.com.au/lifestyle/real-life/james-ritchie-resigns-as-womens-officer-at-tuu/story-fnq2o7dd-1227297386040?pg=1

[42]http://thetab.com/uk/cambridge/2015/04/01/feminisms-duty-gay-men-response-49779

[43] http://www.todayinliterature.com/stories.asp?Event_Date=10/20/1928

[44] http://gm.thebabbleout.online/x/c?c=436883&l=bf0405ac-206c-4b95-8a9c-0fc768fa0db4&r=9f1a4489-2fed-4611-a281-5f6d2e3b360a

[45] http://everydayfeminism.com/2014/12/the-problem-with-privilege-explaining/

[46] http://www.menstuff.org/issues/byissue/suicide.html#gay

[47] http://batteredmen.com/NISVS.htm

[48] http://www.theduluthmodel.org/

[49]http://www.aph.gov.au/About_Parliament/Parliamentary_Departments/Parliamentary_Library/pubs/BN/2011-2012/DVAustralia

[50] http://whiteribbon.org/

[51] http://www.rainbowdomesticviolence.itgo.com/

[52] http://www.batteredmen.com/batdulut.htm

[53]http://townhall.com/tipsheet/mattvespa/2015/03/27/the-weaker-sex-girls-are-outclassing-boys-in-education-n1977034

[54]http://unknownmisandry.blogspot.hk/2011/09/chivalry-justice-quotes-from-judges.html

[55]http://www.avoiceformen.com/male-genital-mutilation-2/a-brief-history-of-circumcision/

[56]http://www.avoiceformalestudents.com/avfms-mega-post-10-reasons-false-rape-accusations-are-common/

[57] http://www.redicecreations.com/article.php?id=22367

[58] http://www.avoiceformen.com/

[59] https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=5t_ANGdXt_M

[60]http://www.huffingtonpost.com/aaron-barksdale/more-gay-men-need-to-claim-feminism_b_8106446.html?utm_hp_ref=gay-voices

Proof that feminism is in serious trouble

David King · 2 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Note: This article is also available in Spanish.

Just a quick couple of comments about an article on Every Woman Weekly which, if you take it at face value†, demonstrates that feminism is in serious, serious trouble.

Ostensibly, it's an Agony Aunt-style piece in which "Ariana" despairs that her three year old son seems to be growing into a healthy, cis, presumptively hetero male kid, and what she can do about it. That's right, she wants to force her three year boy into being a girl, because fuck Patriarchy and cis, het shitlords and, well, because reason. (Hint: the word is "bigotry".)

Of course such people exist, but what is disturbing — again, if you take this at face value — is that the respondent supported and encouraged her in her objective to mess with her son's gender identity.

'strewth. It's as if nobody ever learned from history. If this were real, then the future path of this poor kid is pretty much mapped out by the tragic case of David Reimer who, along with his twin brother, was circumcised in 1966 aged eight months by cauterisation on account of phimosis (an abnormality of the foreskin which can, in some cases, interfere with urination and other normal biological functions).

Aside from the unusual method (for which there presumably was a good reason — infant foreskin can't usually be retracted), this case is one of those rare procedures done for legitimate medical reasons, as opposed to ritual or cultural ones. What happened next, though, was far from legitimate (or routine).

Perhaps because of the unusual method, the urologist badly botched the job well beyond repair and, after a bit of head-scratching, it was decided, sorry, recommended by an "expert" by the name of John Money to perform SRS (Sex Reassignment Surgery) immediately and raise David as a girl.

Money was a proponent of the now discredited theory of tabula rasa (lit. "blank slate") which says that an infant's brain is like a blank slate on which anything (up to and including gender identity) can be written, usually by social custom and that, therefore, so long as the boy was raised as a girl, she would not know any different from girls born female.

Of course, this is complete bosh and despite oestrogen injections at the appropriate times, Reimer knew, at puberty, that he was, in fact, male. Eventually, he got SRS to be reassigned back to his proper gender, but the damage was done. He suicided aged 38, having suffered severe depression amongst other serious psychiatric conditions for most of his life.

Reimer's case is proof positive of the falsehood of the radical feminist hypothesis that gender is socialised, and the same dynamic will play out if what is presented in that Every Woman Weekly article is not, in fact, satire.

And that's why feminism is in deep trouble; it's classic Poe's Law — nobody, not even the commentators on that site (most of whom presumably are regular readers of that publication) were certain whether the OP was legit or satire.

And if it's now so hard to tell the difference between genuine feminism (whatever that may be) and the sort of batshittery on display by "Ariana" (the mother) and Jane Agni (the author of the OP), then feminism has so long since jumped the shark that rational feminism (yes, I know) has faded from modern memory.

That such a piece could even be considered for publication is a huge warning flag for the degeneracy of modern feminist thought, whether or not it is satire. And if that weren't enough, even that paragon of feminist thought, Susan Brownmiller‡, recently commented that modern feminism has gone too far (specifically, in respect of campus rape culture hysteria).

Feminists, be worried. If you want your movement to survive, you need to get your house in order, pronto. Why are there not headlines on mainstream news sources about this craziness as much as there is about misogyny, genuine or imagined?

I think there are two answers to that, and the causes are both very likely incurable.

First, it is very difficult to speak out against feminist orthodoxy if you identify as feminist. Oh, some do, but usually with much acrimony and at great personal cost (just ask Christina Hoff Sommers). Feminist schisms do happen, but only after enough critical mass has built up, but otherwise most feminists are too afraid to commit 1984-style thoughtcrime and of the consequent ostracisation, loss of community or, if they're lucky, just "re-education". And I don't blame them (shows they have at least some sense of self-preservation).

Second, feminist philosophy is now a highly competitive subject, and distinction (and attention) are achieved by "out extreming" the extremists. In a world where women (at least in law) enjoy every right that men do (and some that men don't), there isn't a lot of room left for moderate voices, which means that everywhere from the public marketplace of ideas to the hallowed halls of feminist academic scholarship, only crazy can compete.

And the worst part (for feminists)? Even the rank and file public, who have no interest in gender issues and are not familiar with the subject, can see clearly the toxicity of modern feminism.

Feminism has had its day, and its influence on the public zeitgeist is waning. Some of what it achieved is good, and (hopefully) will be retained. Much of the damage it has done is likely irreversible, but I think soon will come the day that even politicians (who care only about votes) will no longer be able to ignore the absurdity of their demands.

But that influence is not dead yet. Until high-ranking, unelected feminist policy-makers are no longer able to inflict damage on society, we must soldier on. Then, we've got to figure out a way of cleaning up the mess and repairing gender relations without inflicting any further damage to the common man and woman.

Meeting injustice with injustice serves no useful purpose.

---

† The Bio for the author of the OP, Jane Agni, includes:

> She's currently at work on the follow up tentatively named "Sisters Of Shame: The Why In Womyn" . Jane M. Agni now writes full-time for National Report, giving her unique perspective on the latest world events.

The National Report is a satirical publication and, if the bio is accurate, that is a strong hint that the linked piece is satire. But would you have guessed that had I not pointed it it out (or had you not followed that up yourself)?

My guess that enough people would be left wondering, which proves my thesis: feminism has been pretty much fucked by its own extremists, hoisted by its own petard of irrational hatred. There's an object lesson for MHRAs right there: police our own, or end up like them.

‡ Correction: in the original version of this article, I said it was Gloria Steinem who'd commented that feminism had gone too far, but I couldn't find the reference so I didn't link it.

Turns out it was Susan Brownmiller, which would explain why I couldn't find it. The article has been corrected, with a link added to Brownmiller's interview. Thanks to August Løvenskiolds for picking up on that one. —DK

Violence Against Men and Boys Awareness Month

Uma Challa · 3 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

"Stop violence against women!" That is a slogan that we have heard, day in and day out, over the last thirty years and have agreed with, unquestioningly. By doing so, we have also embraced its underlying assumptions, that violence is a gender issue, that men have been historically inflicting violence on women, all men (and only men) are capable of violence and that violence against men (by women) does not exist.

More recently, the focus of the subject has been broadened to include boys. A social awareness platform called Vogue Empower even made a short film entitled "Start with the Boys" which says, "We have taught our boys not to cry. It's time we teach them not to make girls cry".

Echoing this politically correct stance, and underlining the agenda of her Ministry, Women and Child Development Minister, Ms. Maneka Gandhi, recently said, "All the violence is male generated. One of the ways to tackle this is at the school stage".

Ms. Gandhi proposed a program called "gender champions" in which "boys who have been particularly respectful and helpful to girls and deserve to be emulated" will be rewarded every year.

The powerful impact of these political and media generated messages is reflected in everyday conversations as well. To quote an example, a mother, who was worried about her 7 year old boy who would not talk to girls on his school bus, expressed her concern on Facebook, and received the following response from another boy's mother:

"Boys do need to do "feminine" things like cook, wear pink, dress up in florals, wear a skirt if only for protest against rapes….After all, a true man is someone who is in touch with his feminine side."

For a while now, even something as innocuous as the usage of "he/him" has been politicized enough to make everyone pause and reconsider the use of the masculine pronoun in a normal English sentence.

One might have believed that all of the above are genuine efforts aimed only at gender equality and protection of women, if not for the stark apathy shown towards men in distress. There has been a prolonged and uncomfortable silence in our culture about female violence against men and boys. Emboldened by this silence, the war against men and boys, and everything masculine, has now become full-blown, and too glaring to ignore.

Today, exploiting, abusing, insulting, kicking, punching and slapping males has not only become acceptable, but it is even considered laudable behavior on the part of women and girls. While the popular media showers titles such as "bravehearts", "youth icons" or "female role models" on these feisty women (like Rohtak sisters and Jasleen Kaur), State Governments have even announced cash awards to them. Ms. Gandhi herself has proposed prizes to girls who have been outstanding in their "bravery and attitude".

There are far too many examples and compelling (NCRB) data about female violence on men and boys, begging for the conspicuous silence of the society to be broken.

The idea behind observing "Violence Against Men and Boys Awareness Month" (#VAMBAM) in October 2015 is to break the silence and address female violence against men and boys, which is stoked by gender politics.

Let us treat men in distress with the same kind of compassion and support as women in distress. Let us recognize that ignoring violence by women, and denial of protection against the same amounts to promotion of violence against men and boys.

Let us allow boys and girls to naturally explore and discover ways to relate with the opposite sex. Let us recognize that imposing gender politics on children to modify the behavior of young males or shaming those who do not comply amounts to violence against boys as well.

All India Men's Welfare Association, All India Forgotten Women's Association, True Equity Network and Paritran Foundation have joined hands to observe VAMBAM in India. VAMBAM has also been endorsed internationally, as seen in this message by Ms. Diane Sears, who is the Director of In Search of Fatherhood ® International Fatherhood and Men's Issues Program:

October 2015 has been designated as INTERNATIONAL VIOLENCE AGAINST MEN AND BOYS AWARENESS Month. This initiative is the brainchild of Mrs. Uma Challa, a Gender Issues Thought Leader, humanitarian, author and India's Coordinator for International Men's Day. The USA International Men's Day Team endorses Mrs. Challa's initiative. Violence against Men and Boys creates a psychologically, emotionally, and spiritually toxic environment in our homes, our communities, and our world. INTERNATIONAL VIOLENCE AGAINST MEN AND BOYS AWARENESS Month — October 2015 — is a key "piece of the puzzle" to bringing healing to Men, Boys, our families, our communities, and our world and transforming our psychologically, emotionally, spiritually toxic and dysfunctional environment into a vibrant, loving, and nurturing oasis.

We urge all girls and women, boys and men everywhere to join us in this effort.

ABC's "Quantico": Most feminist show ever?

August Løvenskiolds · 3 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

A recent review in Forbes characterized as "feminist" ABC's new Sunday Night show Quantico, about a new class of FBI recruits. The article, by Emily Canal is entitled "Why 'Quantico' Might Be One Of The Most Feminist Shows On-Air This Fall."

"Begging the question" means "circular reasoning of the sort that A implies B, and B implies A." However, feminists and others unfamiliar with logic usually misuse the phrase to mean "teases us into asking the obvious question." So, in their own errant lingo women's way of talking, the title of the new show Begs the Question: is it, in fact, a feminist show, in that it depicts feminism in a way that is good for feminism?

In other words:

- Does the show expose the horrors of rape culture?
- Does the show demonize Christian religions while supporting Islam?
- Does the show treat men and families with utter contempt?
- Does the show cater to the Male Gaze, or engage in fat shaming?
- Does the show explicitly portray feminism in a positive light?
- Does the show promote gender equality or discuss dress codes?
- Does the show reflect intersectionality?
- Does the show expose the horrors of the patriarchy or male entitlement?
- Does the show depict gay men in a positive light?
- Does the show portray men as the sole perpetrators of domestic violence?
- Does the show portray women as honest and trustworthy, and that men should automatically believe women's claims?

Amazingly, all of these situations arise in the very first episode! However, not all of them tilt in favor of feminism. I'll be covering each in detail below, which means that, because I care about your viewing pleasure, I must now issue a SPOILER ALERT. The following account of the show reveals details and plot points that might spoil the show for some viewers.

The show depicts a complex series of events set six months apart, starting with an ongoing terrorist attack in New York City linked to a member of a just-graduated class of FBI recruits trained in Quantico, Virginia that started six months earlier. Additionally, there are other flashbacks to the recruits' earlier lives.

Alexandra Parrish (Priyanka Chopra) wakes up in the rubble of the terror attack and then is tasked with investigating her old classmates to find the terrorist, of whom there are many possibilities, including herself as the lead suspect or, perhaps, scapegoat. When the bullet-riddled body of her FBI superior Ryan Booth (Jake McLaughlin, a real life US Army vet), whom she had fucked before she knew of his affiliation, is discovered in her apartment, she is arrested but escapes with the help of the head of Quantico "Miranda Shaw" (Aunjanue Ellis), a black woman bristling for advancement.

Lets go point by point to see how feminist Quantico really is.

Does the show expose the horrors of rape culture?

The show realistically depicts that the FBI seeks Mormon (LDS) recruits (often because they are unlikely to be pot smokers) but unrealistically shows the recruit to be one who raped an underage Malawi girl while he was on his church mission, knocked her up, and tried to get her an illegal abortion, which killed her. The perfect feminist storm, it seems.

Of course, Mormon men go in pairs or large groups while on their missions and are kept so busy that it would be highly improbable (I think impossible) for a young missionary to pursue a sexual relationship with a woman, get her pregnant, find an illegal abortionist, set up an illegal abortion, and then cover up her death and his role in the whole affair in such a way that an FBI background check would be unaware of it.

The show has upset the real LDS community but ABC doesn't seem to care about that.

Of course, the show depicts no real US rape culture at all, so from a credibility or credulous feminist standpoint, it is a double failure.

The show does, however, depict a faux rape, which would count as a real rape from a feminist standpoint. Before Ryan and Alex fuck in his car, he buys her a drink on the plane where they meet. Since alcohol was involved, according to feminists, Alex was too drunk to consent, even though she was on top during the resulting intercourse. Complicating matters further, Ryan was deceiving Alex – he claimed to be a soldier, then an FBI recruit, when in reality he was an FBI agent, her technical superior, assigned to investigate her.

To feminists, sex by deception is rape (if the guy is deceptive; women lying and wearing makeup to get sex is cool with them) and sex with a superior is rape because the power imbalance makes it impossible for the inferior woman to give meaningful consent. Their hookup is now a triple faux rape: it is drunken, deceptive, and power imbalanced. Of course, the show glosses over all of this, ignoring the faux triple rape and feminist theory on rape.

Does the show demonize Christian religions while supporting Islam?

Although the Christian bona fides of Mormonism are controversial, LDS is derived from Christianity and uses Christian scripture as a part of their own, so yes, the show does take a swipe at Christians.

One of the recruits is an "ambidextrous" Islamic woman who wears the hijib in mirror-image ways. She has her own private quarters and she reacts angrily when a gay male recruit enters unexpectedly. She also appear to be a pair of identical twins with a nefarious purpose, maybe. The show goes out of their way to set her up as the fall girl(s), which to my thinking makes her unlikely to be the actual terrorist, especially in a feminist show that only shows minority women in a positive light.

While showing their hatred of Christians and love of Islam might make feminists smile inwardly, exposing these tropes openly has to set their vagina dentata on edge.

Does the show treat men and families with utter contempt?

Oh, hell yes.

Alex lies to her mother about joining the FBI. The blonde Southern Belle recruit lost her parents in 9/11. The head of Quantico accuses a man of mansplainin' when he dares to suggest that the "glass ceiling" is a relic of the past. After she fucks Ryan in his car, Alex refuses to tell him her name because he is both too nice and a liar (PUA). She also humiliates him in front of other men when he tries to respect her privacy by not revealing their hook-up. If there is a scene with both sexes in it (no trans folk in the show yet) you can bet the women will be shitting on the men.

This is a feminist fantasy that is also a nightmare for them when their man-hate is shown so openly in the media.

Does the show cater to the Male Gaze, or engage in fat shaming?

True to the myth of the male gaze, all the men and women are strikingly good-looking. No fatties allowed. No butch women nor side-shaves appear at all – at least, not from the neck up.

Does the show explicitly portray feminism in a positive light?

Although feminist related themes are everywhere, "feminism" and "feminist" do NOT explicitly appear in the pilot.

This is a huge fail, since feminists claim all “advancements” for women come from it and usually demand that all women MUST acknowledge the primacy of feminism in their lives.

Does the show promote gender equality or discuss dress codes?

The girly recruits giggle at the gender neutral uniforms as a blow for equality but ignore the feminist trope of calling for strict dress codes for men with no dress codes for women. This has to count as another feminist failure that further exposes their hypocrisy and man-hate.

Does the show reflect intersectionality?

Only for women, which appear to have diversity of origin (but not weight nor attractiveness). The men are almost all white while the women come from a lot of different countries regardless of the fact that the FBI only accepts US citizens as recruits. Of course, if the show intends to hammer men, it is important for them to only attack the right sort of men – the white ones.

Does the show expose the horrors of the patriarchy or male entitlement?

There is one explicitly “entitled” male recruit, Caleb, who is the son of two FBI agents. Only his family ties got him into Quantico; he is a hot mess. He fails at everything and triggers the Mormon recruit to go on a homicidal/suicidal rampage when Caleb tells the Mormon he knows his “secret.” Caleb is kicked out of the FBI, making him disgruntled enough – and well-connected enough – to be the real culprit in the terror attack. Although it won’t be revealed for a while, I’m betting on Caleb as the bad guy: white, male, entitled, and a loser.

Notice how the show conflates “entitled” with “unqualified” even though feminists, when pressed, deny this link (but with a wink). Exposing this trope is yet another feminist failure of the show.

Does the show depict gay men in a positive light?

Not really – when he walks into the Islamic twins’ room, the token gay male recruit is shown to be just another boorish man in feminists’ view. Yet another feminist fail.

Does the show portray men as the sole perpetrators of domestic violence?

No! Alex as a teenager murdered her father (and lies about it initially.) According to Alex, Alex’s mother physically attacks her father after he drunkenly waved a gun around, but since Alex is exposed as a killer and a repeat liar, maybe that is a lie as well.

Does the show portray women as honest and trustworthy, and that men should automatically believe women’s claims?

No – In addition to lying about her role in her father’s murder, Alex openly lies to her fuck buddy Ryan, and the Southern Belle fails a part of her lie detector test. Any depiction of women as liars violates a core feminist tenet: always believe the victim.

Although the show will be seen, at first, as a feminist triumph, I expect feminists will start trashing the show almost immediately and the trashing will snowball as the season progresses.

Which is too bad; the chicks on it are hot Hot HOT!

Meh.

Attila Vinczer leaves the men's movement, atop a dumpster float in a parade of shame

Paul Elam · 4 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The internet has provided the MHRM will growth opportunities like nothing else. It has also created an environment where inevitable clashes and disagreements go public. Sometimes that is because some people feel the need to leave the MHRM, or in particular AVFM on a parade float waving at the cameras.

Sad to say, here we go again.

Attila Vinczer, our erstwhile Canadian Activism Director, has decided to exit AVFM by sending some key people a letter that is basically full of lies and poor me victim chanting. I am attaching that letter here, unaltered for anyone who cares to read it.

I will refute the basic untruths with minimum investment, and try to sketch out what actually happened. Ironically, much of what is in Vinczer's letter will support precisely what I have to say.

As I said, here we go. I will take it one lie and misdirect at a time. Regarding the Toronto Symposium, Attila says:

> The head of AVFM promised to help raise funds, but that failed to happen.

Uh, actually the head of AVFM promised Attila that he would do what he could, but that things were very tight and any significant help would be unlikely. I also invited him to use the site as he saw fit to ask for support, which he did. It is not mine, nor AVFM's nor AVFM's readers fault that he failed to raise enough money. I have often failed to raise money for things I wanted. I never expected I got to blame people for not giving.

> Furthermore, my last attempt to discuss this matter had been denied by the head of AVFM after agreeing to speak with me.

A bit of truth to that, until you consider the multiple complaints I had received in the meantime about Attila failing to remunerate several people after two consecutive symposiums, complete with "the dog ate my homework" level of excuses for not paying.

One example of that was with me. Even after forgiving large portions of money that Attila owed me personally, and after countless broken promises of when I would be paid, Attila messaged me one day that he really had intended to pay me $2,000 that he owed me that his car got towed and it cost him $750.00, so I got nothing. Forgive me if I calculate wrong, but for some reason that came out to $1,250.00 he could have and should have paid me. I guess the dog ate that, too.

> I am no longer willing to remain silent, particularly with the incredulously wanton threats made against me, by those who at a time, I thought were my friends and allies.

The feeling is mutual, Attila. There are many people who have, out of a desire to give you every benefit of the doubt, remained silent in the face of your leaving them saddled with the expense of your ambitions. That is about to change.

> I have been accused of being a cheat, a liar, a thief, a con artist, dishonest in addition to being called a scum bag and coerced into doing things I was unable to do.

And I am sure that has nothing to do with dozens of broken promises, unpaid bills, manipulating people into covering your expenses knowing full well that if you did not make the money back that you could not reimburse.

I need to remind readers here that most of these people were NOT people of means. They were just activists. In other words, people that scrape by in the decidedly not profitable world of trying to help men and boys. Attila's disregard for their well-being is atrocious.

> So I am going to be brutally honest. There are several issues that need to be addressed.
>
> 2015 TorontoDV Symposium:
>
> I made a decision to cancel the event due to lack of funds raised including ticket sales. Sen.
>
> Anne Cools was the first person I emailed and she was deeply disappointed(sic). Another person who got wind of this at CAFÉ (sic), said I could not and should not cancel this important event and promised to raise $5,000.00 I needed. Based on that promise I went back on my decision, which I never do, and resurrected the event. This turned out to be only $1,500.00 and my troubles began.

Of course, Attila. It is CAFE's fault. Certainly you were not able to look at the previous years failure and make a sound decision to cancel before your "troubles began."

> Despite asking, I have yet to see a copy of the invoice for the flight AVFM arranged from London to Toronto to LA and eventually back to London.

This is false. Attila never asked. It would seem to make no difference since he paid nothing back at all to me or anyone else anyway. Keep in mind that Attila had no problem dumping this expense in my lap when I was right in the middle of planning our own conference at considerable expense.

I won't put financial documents online here with sensitive markers on them. And I won't take the time to redact them pointlessly, since Attila has already acknowledged he did not have the money to pay. I will put the reservation confirmations here. I assume most people can figure out that this kind of flight schedule, business class, does not stretch the imagination at $6,500.00. $1,700.00 of that was indeed paid by Al Martin. The rest came out of my pocket (Silly me forgave most of the balance in the name of unity), to which all parties not lying about matters can attest.

BTW, I am sending a link to this to Ms. Pizzey herself, who has not reported favorably on her dealings with Attila. I am sure we can look forward to her comment on this, to be added to this letter.

> The cost for having Marty Fiebert and his wife travel to Toronto was agreed to be $2,100.00 including lodging. This bill has not been covered and is being paid on Monday, October 5, 2015.

Gee, another promise to pay a two year old bill. Another fronted cheeseburger that will be gladly repaid on Tuesday. Problem is, that I have just been advised by Tanveer Ahmed that he did not get his money back from Attila even after being told it had been wired. I did not even know how to react to that since Attila has been in debt to me long before he stiffed Dr. Ahmed.

God this is all so sickening.

> The cost of Stephan Moulineux's hotel $450.00 bill was covered by him. He too will be reimbursed on Monday, October 5, 2015. Neither Stephan nor his assistant have never caused any fuss about this.

Lucky you, Attila. How convenient that they did not get uppity about being shafted along with everyone else. And good oh, they got another one of your now infamous promises.

I love the melodrama! Will Tanveer's mysteriously disappearing wire suddenly come through just the moment Attila was really, really about to pay Stefan for realsies!? Only the shadow knows!

Sorry folks, have to pass the buck (no pun intended) on the next part because it involves the money for silver that Al Martin got shafted on. Suffice it to say that he has not seen a dime after a string of broken promises. I am sure he will speak up if he wants to. Meanwhile I can promise you that Attila is not exactly on his favored list.

Are we starting to see a pattern here?

> The hotel attempted to charge my Visa card for about $1,000.00 several times causing it to be locked. I had no means and time to deal with that issue.

Damn your luck, Attila. You seem to be stricken by the worst of it, at least when there are others around to yank out the plastic and cover you. But that bad luck seems to follow you around for years, making it impossible to pay that back.

I think the worst of it is that it appears Attila Vinczer really thinks people are this stupid.

Take that back, ripping people off really is worse.

> Oddly, even after providing AVFM with 10 free tickets, not one AVFM person came to see him, not even protesters.

Now that really is desperate. I knew about half the people in attendance, which was four of them. Despite having tons of seating and stacks of tickets, almost no one attended. Meanwhile a CAFE event down the street was bustling. Make of that what you will.

> I had kept Suzy up to speed about my situation and asked her, before she left if she could help out with $1,000.00 on an emergency basis if needed.

At this point, the only thing I can see in this is that he knew he was in trouble and was lining up others people's money to pad the inevitable meltdown. Oh wait, I must have forgotten, this was all CAFE's fault. I think Suze McCarley should send Justin Trottier an invoice.

> My law firm informed me Friday morning that there were complications and closing was not going to take place Friday June, 3, 2015 as expected.

Bad news from law firms tends to follow cars being towed.

> However to my further shock, I was informed by third party that Paul, Suzy and Dean had left Toronto.

Well, sitting around in a hotel with a group of people who are wondering if it is actually, really paid for, and who are making the same stack of complaints as the last people unfortunate enough to do business with Attila Vinczer will make that happen. Indeed, I made a decision to leave and urged Dean and Suze to come with me. That choice was actually a second best to what I should have done, which was decide not to come in the first place.

> While others have received money from AVFM including remuneration, my department has been afforded not a single dime of the money that AVFM collects. Leaving me out of pocket for several thousand dollars.

What do you want, Attila, a cookie? Actually very, very little has ever been dispensed in remuneration to AVFM volunteers. That includes David King, who has produced volumes more than you without taking a dime. Monies that were paid out to anyone were paltry. And the operation has been a financial failure to me personally, because it was never about making money. That last bit of language sounded a bit like an attempt to document losses in the midst of writing about a men's movement in which you have left an unending string of broken promises and empty pockets.

Shame on you, Attila Vinczer.

> To call me a con artist and to embark on a path to knowingly, and willingly cause me, my family and particularly my children harm by cyber attacking me is criminally malicious. Those who still think I am a liar and dishonest should know, everything I have said, remarked and my entire interaction with AVFM has been digitally recorded. In my defence, I will not hesitate to make that public should the need arise to do so. Remember before you hit the publish button, in a battle both parties are injured.

Boy, did you ever pick the wrong person to threaten. I am itching to hit the publish button, complete with my opinion that my experience with you has left me with the certainty that you are a liar, a con artist and a dishonest scoundrel that has ripped off people over three countries and two continents.

Our risk mitigation is simple. Let you ride out of here on your exposed ass and make sure that your letter and this, the official AVFM response stays on the record. Protect other advocates from your thievery. Let you sit and rot in the filth of your own creation and never have anything to do with you again.

Look at it this way, Attila. You have scored high. You have managed to garner the largest collection of high profile activists and thought leaders on men's issues and have most of them conclude that they cannot trust you any further than they can throw you.

The list here of people who have done business with you and found themselves left holding the bag because of your slimy way of doing business includes myself, Al Martin, Tanveer Ahmed, Stefan Molyneux, Erin Pizzey, Martin Fiebert and Suzanne McCarley.

The kicker is that you and I both know full well that list is PARTIAL.

Then you have to stupidity send out this letter, leaving me with no option but to answer any upcoming questions in advance.

Bad move from a bad apple. Have your attorneys send me a cease and desist so I can publish it with my two word response.

Now please, get out of this movement and go find something else to do that involves making your own money.

Woman's Hour: Feminists complain about feminist censorship

David King · 4 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Feminist groupthink is now so strong that it seems that feminists are complaining about censorship — by other feminists. Or, at the very least, that was the subject of an episode of BBC Radio 4's time-honoured programme, Woman's Hour, aired 10am BST Friday, October 2nd, 2015. From the show notes:

> Two speakers have pulled out of a feminist conference in protest after campaigner Jane Fae withdrew saying she was effectively being silenced because she had written about pornography. Is this evidence of increasing intolerance and efforts to actively censor views which might offend?

This episode was hosted by Woman's Hour's primary host Jenni Murray (who, I am given to understand, is a radical feminist with no love for the likes of Erin Pizzey, or anybody who doesn't toe the line on the gendered basis for DV). She introduced the programme with the following (square brackets indicate annotations by me):

> Now there've been a number of incidents over recent weeks which rather smack — of censorship. First the Iranian activist, Maryam Namazie, was told she was banned from speaking at Warwick University because of fears she might incite hatred against Muslim students. She'd been booked to talk about secularism; the ban against her has now been lifted. But then, this week, two speakers have pulled out of the Feminism in London conference to be held this month. Julie Bindel [a radical lesbian feminist] and Caroline Criado-Perez [she of the Women on banknotes fiasco (complete with twitter rape threats etc)] are protesting against the withdrawal from the conference of Jane Fae. She's a transgender campaigner who isn't in favour of pornography, but has expressed a view that it need not be regulated. She withdrew because she felt her views were not welcomed by some of the people who would attend the conference. So, are we facing a creeping intolerance of views which may offend?

I'm not going to offer a full transcript of the 13 minute 25 segment; you can listen to it (links below), but I will say that I find feminist complaints about censorship to ring hollow at best, and an indictment of modern feminism at worst. (And not the only one; on the same day this piece aired, I published a piece arguing that feminism is in deep trouble if it has become so extreme that genuine feminism can't readily be distinguished from satire.)

For the record, I (and AVfM) are fully in support of trans* people (who, after all, either were or now are men, and therefore deserve a voice at A Voice for Men) even if AVfM's focus is men's issues — all men, not just men like us — rather than GLBT issues, so the criticism that follows of Ms Fae's remarks is strictly directed at what she said, not who she is.

Ms Fae said that she was there to speak about speech, in particular, from a "Catharine McKinnonite" point of view (namely, that "[Fae doesn't] totally favour free speech") and > about safe spaces; I believe that one of the greatest threats, that one of the most unsafe spaces for women nowadays is on-line, and I think it's time we policed that more.

How ironic that Ms Fae should complain about being muzzled, silenced or, dare I say it, censored and, at the very least, made to feel unwelcome, when she, herself, wishes to police the thought and speech of other people (for which, read: you and I). And she should know better: the trans* community really do get a hard time of it on-line, and from many directions are often made unwelcome or, indeed, banned outright — for no reason other than being trans*.

Why, then, does Ms Fae think it's okay to police what others say on-line? Can it be "one rule for me and another rule for thee?"

Side note: Though MHRAs oft deride the now cliché and abused concept "safe space," it is an idea with merit. AVfM, after all, is a "safe space" for men (after a fashion, because we don't let feelings rule the roost). Likewise, trans* people and women deserve their own spaces with their own rules, but I can't help but think that the likes of Ms Fae want to regulate the speech of others on the basis that others' right to free speech ends where her feelings (and those of her colleagues) begin. Am I worrying about nothing? I surely hope so but, if not, then Ms Fae is not walking her talk.

She went on to say that

> It would have been grotesque for me to be on a platform, talking about the need for safe spaces whilst the question of me being unsafe [by virtue of being trans] was on the agenda.
>
> […]
>
> there is a sort of absolutism in politics today, and it happens in feminism, it happens within the trans community, it happens within the Greens, within the Corbynistas [reference to the ultra-socialist (even by British standards) newly elected leader of the UK Labour party and his hangers on], which is that you have to toe a party line, […] the most unsafe spaces for women, generally, are out in the street, in the home [despite Government statistics indicating that men are 64% more likely (2.3% over 1.4%) to be the victim of violent crime], on-line…

Well, she's right about the absolutism and the echo-chamber that is modern feminism, but in classic feminist double-think, she then goes on to argue that women need special protection (whatever form that may take) on the grounds of an ideologically driven presumption of women's vulnerability instead of, oh, I don't know, real data.

Ms Murray mentioned "no-platforming" and admitted that this is an expression that has become common, where you "stop someone appearing on a platform." Such expressions don't come about for no reason, which is about as much of a direct admission by your old-school, hard-line feminist that feminists do, indeed, deliberately set about silencing those who (according to them) ought not speak.

Hey, progress!

Later, Ms Criado-Perez gave, for the reason she stepped down from the conference, the following:

> I stepped down because I'm concerned about the same things that Jane has just articulated. I'm really concerned about ideological total[itarian]ism that we're seeing increasingly; this idea of "purity politics" which means that there is one.. dogma, and if you have ever stepped outside of that dogma, then you are tainted and you are impure and you cannot be allowed to speak, and your very presence, even if you're not talking about the things that don't toe the party line, your very presence can cause trauma in people.
>
> And I just think that this is a really really dangerous place to be; I mean, one of the things that's really struck me about the Warwick [University] incident was one of the things that they used against Maryam [Namazie] was the fact that blogs had been written about her, things had been said about her, so it wasn't even things that she'd said; we've now moved onto the idea of hearsay, and the idea of people objecting to you is itself proof that you are a problem.

Golly. Is this an actual feminist, admitting that hearsay, lies and objections by third parties are no basis on which to form an opinion of somebody or their ideas? Stop the press! Ms Criado-Perez is in danger of becoming an MRA! (in all but name and direction, anyway.)

Ladies, er, feminists, how does it feel to be on the receiving end of what you've been dishing out to men and MHRAs (examples: the Fiamengo, Farrell, Nathanson & Young lectures, and our own ICMI '14) since 1848?

I'll let that settle for a few moments. Now I'll repeat, as I so often do: The solution to bad speech is more speech, not censorship. Now, your own colleagues are telling you to wake up and up your game.

To continue, Ms Murray then asked how damaging Ms Criado-Perez thought all of this was for the feminist movement. Criado-Perez replied:

> I think it's incredibly damaging. […] we're getting increasingly a feminism where there are factions who cannot speak to each other, and the ridiculous thing is that, on the vast majority of issues, we agree with each other, and even where we don't agree with each other, I think we have a common purpose which is we're trying to make life better for women.
>
> We might just disagree how to do that, and the idea that because I disagree with how to, for example, make it safer for women who end up having to sell sex, if I disagree with how to deal with that compared to someone else, even though our common purpose is to make it safer, that that somehow will make someone unsafe. Another example, which I felt really paralleled what happened to Jane, was Kate Smurthwaite, the feminist commedienne, who was effectively "no-platformed" from Goldsmith's student union, again, she wasn't going to be talking about prostitution, she was going to be talking about free speech (ironically, rather like Jane) but because of her previously voiced support for the Nordic model of policing prostitution (which is criminalising buyers and decriminalising women [note 'buyers' vs 'women', as if 'buyers' are somehow less-than-human]), she was deemed "unsafe" […]
>
> It's just such a bizarre thing, and I think it has to come from this idea of an ideological total[itarian]ism that you can only be safe in a world where everybody 100% agrees with you.

Yes, Ms Criado-Perez, it is damaging, very damaging indeed, both for feminism and, more importantly, to women and society at large. I would like to think that your colleagues might learn something from this, but all experience would suggest that ideology comes first and only then, if there's any room left, is there time for civilised disagreement.

That last sentence is particularly telling: though she never made it explicit, something tells me that this latitude extends only to other feminists, not to those (like us) who have a completely different message and narrative to offer. That's hypocrisy, ladies, but feminists are no stranger to that.

There is a good deal more to this interview, which you can listen to below. One subject in particular that was touched on was this notion of 'no-platforming' other women, and the 'dishonesty' (their word) of pretending that that's not what was happening. There was an acknowledgement that this practice is bad and also of some guilty pretence that, really, something else is going on.

There was also some discussion of the importance of having a voice, and also of voices having been suppressed in the past and the anger that that engenders (though no particular solutions or commentary was passed on that anger, or how it might best be channelled and vented). Well, men have been denied any real voice for decades, if not centuries. Dare I say it, but it was not until A Voice for Men gained prominence that men finally found an avenue where their voices could be heard. To this day, we welcome article submissions from any man or woman who has something worthwhile to say about the condition and welfare of men and boys in the 21st Century — and we always will.

There was also (I think) a quite prescient observation about impassioned belief creating philosophical blinders, in which there can be only one truth (and, by extension, there being no room for anybody who disagrees with that truth). Though they agreed that we don't live in such a black-and-white world again, I somehow doubt they'd apply that agreement outside of their feminist colleagues.

Yes, ladies, there is much in the comparison between fundamentalism (of any sort) and much of modern feminist discourse. And yes, ladies, there is a time for you to stand back and listen to the lived experiences (your term) of men, as well as women.

Feminists, listen to your own, and quit the pretence that you own intersexual and gender relations dialogue. You don't monopolise it within your community, much less without.

Listen for yourself (original BBC link)

For those for whom that doesn't work, or who want to download the cutting of this specific segment, there is a version hosted on one of AVfM's own servers (posted on the basis of fair use for criticism and commentary). If you can, please use the above link in preference to the player below.

http://archive.avoiceformen.com/audio/Womans-Hour--20151002-1000-On-feminist-censorship-of-feminists.mp3

Addendum

From time to time, one or two MRAs are given to making weak remarks about the alleged censorship practised by AVfM. I want to make one, very strong observation about this:

If you get banned from Disqus comments or from the forums, that is AVfM saying, "We don't want what you just did here, in our house." But we would not stop you (even if we could) from saying what you like elsewhere on a platform you own or another more sympathetic to your views.

Please do not let the fact that, in our house, we set the rules, distract from the sort of censorship practised by feminists: they want to tell you want you may and mayn't do in your own house as well as their own.

Yes, there are a few topics that are forbidden on our pages, but they are few in number, and there is a very good reason behind each case.

Moderators, feel free to enforce the comment policy with regard to derailment at your pleasure.

Straight eye for the queer guy II

AVfM Video Source · 4 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Tanveer Ahmed at Ryerson University

AVfM Video Source · 5 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Paul's Domestic Violence Awareness Month thoughts for women

Paul Elam · 6 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Note: I know, men are victims, too. No need to remind me. This one is for the ladies. PE

Upon occasion, like right now, my body and mind are invaded by the Holy Spirit. Now, I am not referring to that in an evangelical sense, but it is the kind of moment that makes me want to preach some truth.

Today's truth is directed at women who have experienced violence in intimate relationships. Too many words? OK, it is directed at victims.

If that is you please buckle in. Also, let this be a trigger warning to Ostrich Rights Activists (OSTs with a tip of the fedora to Robert St. Estephe). OSTs, for those just learning the term, are men's "activists" that live in terror of saying or doing the wrong thing to the point that they don't do much of anything. I would say that they are victims of paralysis through analysis, but I really can't give them that much credit. The only things they are analyzing is their need to keep dirt off their hands and maintain mommy's approval. They tend to seek what they imagine is a "respectable" place among good decent white folk who can talk about men's issues and sneer at AVFM at the same time (when they are not asking us for stuff).

I should probably do another article on that rather than subject you to this digression but like I said the spirt is in control, not me.

So let's get down to business ladies. And let me state from the start, if you want the numbers behind what I am about to say, just go watch Hannah Wallen's latest video. She has it all there.

This writing will be guided by those numbers but is not aimed to bore you to death with them. The spirit is now directing me to just talk to you honestly, just like we were sitting here in my living room with Warren Haines playing some soft blues on the music box and the tantalizing promise of truth hanging in the air.

I will be addressing all the things that can put you on the business end of a right hook in a relationship, and exactly what you can do to put a stop to it. I admit in advance that what I have to say is what any self-respecting perpetual victim would call victim-blaming. The part that is hard to get around is that it is all true, which is decidedly inconvenient for the terminally victimized. They coined the term victim-blaming because accepting responsibility might solve their problems and then people would not need to pat them on the head and while they are putting a roof over it.

Holy Spirit says no-way-today-Jose to that one. Today we roll forward full speed with eyes wide open. Slackers will be left behind.

OK, here we go, starting with the least common type of victim. And we will start this one with solutions.

The answer for the smallest group of victims is to move. Run away. Find a shelter that takes women in spite of the patriarchy. It's not that hard. Move in with a friend. Take sword fighting or Kung Fu lessons. Better yet, Buy a Taser or, at the high end of solutions a Glock and learn how to use it. Do whatever you need to do to protect yourself and your kids if you have them.

Whatever you do, leave.

You women in this particular group, the smallest group of DV victims are the ones who got hooked up with real McCoy abusers. This small but persistently stupid portion of the male population is very real. Often they are too dumb to understand anything less than very simple equations like "No Means 9 millimeter."

After you manage to get rid of your current Chris Brown (I know, that is totally unfair to Mr. Brown but he is an idiot and that was the only alliteration I could think of), then you need to spend some time sorting out why you are sexually excited by dangerous men. It is not that you will be able to change it, but understanding where it comes from and where it takes you might help you make something other than really stupid decisions where it concerns men.

And let's face it, your man-picker is as functional as Obamacare. It puts you in a tough spot because as sure as you are hot for some guy — you can predict the jailhouse tats under his shirt sleeves, which are shorter than his rap sheet.

The guys who will treat you nice don't do a thing for you. Likely as not they would drive you right back into Mr. Smashmouth's arms for an ass-kicking just to relieve the boredom.

You may have to face the fact that you need to be alone till your looks start slipping and you are willing to settle for stable over steamy. If you mature enough before you get yourself killed, you might do it.

This brings us to our next group of victims, this time of a more ersatz variety. After we acknowledge the real, plausible victims of unidirectional, unprovoked abuse we have to talk to you ladies who wind up with a smacking after months or years of psychologically abusing and undermining a man who does not have the good sense to kick you to the curb. Too many words? OK, to you insufferable bitches.

That's right. Insufferable bitches on wheels. This is where we find the personality disorders, the emotional reasoners, the pyromaniacs that look at relationships and see piles of dry wood and matches. These are the kinds of women who are totally immune to reason, accountability and who would rather make their love life circle the drain than to try to solve a problem rationally.

They displace all their life's frustrations and failures, which are many, onto whoever is unfortunate enough to be yoked to them. They care about one thing and one thing only, control. And they will use shame, humiliation, family, the cops and anyone or anything else they can to acquire it.

They are so arrogant and abusive that they will frequently end up nursing a shiner because they have literally pushed someone over the edge into acting in ways he normally would not dream of.

These are the primary purveyors of the "never, ever, ever hit a woman" narrative, mainly because she knows full well that the beating she got was, if not deserved, inevitable. Then she takes the "abuse" she just suffered and parlays that into a reason to gain more control and power.

This is your more typical shelter refugee on the state dime.

Her solutions? There are none. Her best hope, if being abused is not actually something she wants, is to grow old ungracefully so that she attracts and ruins fewer men into the future.

Does she deserve an ass kicking? No. The man's best choice with particularly huffy brand of a bull in the romantic china shop is to just leave. Unfortunately he suffers the same deficit of common sense as does our woman in group one; the ones who tell doctors, "He'll change," as he stitches up the side of her face from the last beating

.

Is our insufferable bitch to get an ass-kicking? Oh hell yes. In all likelihood many of them. The only benefit any of those ass-kickings will serve is to give her stories to tell about the bastards who abused her when she is with her girlfriends or on a first date with the next man she is going to drive to violence.

So, ladies, if the bitch I am writing about is the bitch you see in the mirror, stock up on high-dollar foundation, Ray-Bans and carry on. This is your life.

That brings us to the last rung up on the victim ladder – the largest group of lady-victims. That would be you women who can't keep your filthy hands to yourselves and who act out physically in relationships. Too many words? OK, to you abusers.

Yep, the next group of women who end up crying their way into social services and shelters are women who initiate violence with men who sometimes decide to hit back. That is the number one way, statistically speaking, that women end up getting smacked down. When that happens, what's a girl to do, right? Call the police, see him carted off to jail for defending himself, then set about proving to the world that she has been traumatized by her uppity punching bag.

She also belongs to the never, ever, ever hit a woman club, even when the woman is beating the crap out of some poor slob. She is not likely to improve with therapy, support or facial reconstruction.

That puts all you need to know, ladies, in a very simple nutshell. You don't want to deal with a violence partner? Fine, don't sleep with abusers and don't be an abuser. It is just that simple even if it is not that easy.

Before the accusatory mantra of victim-blaming begins, let me say I know. I get it. Society is on a binge of anti-victim blaming so intense it is as though it was a side-effect of long-term methamphetamine abuse. It is a trend so powerful that ideologues wet their panties (and not in a good way) at the mere mention of any solutions that don't involve putting all the onus on men.

Thing is, all that is bullshit. If you want to solve problems you have to take stock in your role in them. Shallow sloganeering is a dangerous road to take when your safety is on the line. And in abusive relationships your safety is always on the line.

I also know that you can find literally hundreds of sources that will address this topic, almost all of them useless because they rely on the pathologically distorted feminist worldview; the most common model out there. This will likely produce more conflict than it solves.

If you want a better life with men, you are much better off working on yourself than them.

After all, it's Domestic Violence Awareness Month.

Get some real awareness.

AVFM fall membership drive

Paul Elam · 6 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Good evening gents and ladies.

Today is the first day of fall, which in Houston doesn't mean a lot weather-wise. In fiscal terms, however, it is an important day. We now begin with our fall membership drive which is where I am charged with the responsibility of convincing you why you should help pay for what you are otherwise getting for free.

And indeed, you do deserve to hear the reasons. First, though, I want to go over some of our history which will help us all focus on where we were and where we need to go.

For years, we operated off of donations and donation drives. Despite the fact that no one has ever done it before, you supported a web-based men's rights initiative unlike any other. We now have four servers in three countries, two LLCs that govern our operations, supportive attorneys, solid accountancy and a number of other things that matured us from a blog/sole proprietorship to a full publication/business entity with tight controls.

Oh yes, and we are now available in eight languages.

Personally, and I say this with no ill feelings, it has been a bit of personal hardship. Since we became LLCs back in February of this year, I have not taken a single dime of personal income from AVFM. I have not even been reimbursed for many expenses. It is not like the income I used to take was that much, but I have definitely felt the impact.

All the money from current subscriptions must go in to the LLCs for operational expenses. It will be that way for some time.

However, largely thanks to the indispensable business leadership of CIO and acting CFO David King, what money we do have is under control and paying basic expenses. Those expenses, which are considerable, no longer have to come directly out of my pocket, which is a great relief.

We do have some back bills to cover, primarily for attorneys and CPAs, but are confident that that will be resolved, as Mr. King would say, in the fullness of time.

Meanwhile, during this process, some of our content has slowed down, largely because I have been unavailable for those duties while we have been consumed with our business transition. Apologies for that. We won't let that stand much longer. With our accountancy software ready to be implemented and a few dozen other loose ends being tied up, I will be able to return to editing and aggressively pursuing more help for our already overburdened editorial staff.

Another one of the major time consumers has been the Men's Mental Health Network (M-Net) which is going to take a good bit more time to bring up to full speed. We are confident that M-Net will meet or exceed AVFM's impact on the cultural narrative by taking this fight directly into the mental health professions and into academe.

We can't afford to proceed doing the same things we did in the past. Those days were successful but they came at a large sacrifice. There are supporters, likely whose comments you read regularly, who gave till it literally hurt in order to help us get a leg up and land in this spot.

The rest of the money came from people who sometimes could not afford it, even on a much smaller scale. Growth that depends on people constantly bleeding is a poor business model, and not so hot in the moral department either. We needed and now have a better solution.

Our plan now is to further stabilize our operations and to make the website more activism centered. We will then drive forward using M-Net to rip the covers off gynocentrism in places that it should not be, which is anywhere in public life as far as we are concerned.

The primary target is the mental health industry which has become saturated with ideology and unvarnished hatred for men and boys. For this effort, we will be building a team of mental health professionals, academicians and other service providers into a unified front to start tearing down the walls and closing the shameless empathy gap.

It is impossible for me to overstress how much this effort relies on high numbers of affordable subscriptions on a regular basis vs blood and sacrifice from already strapped donors every three months.

To be very blunt about it, if you want to see a men's movement that actually strikes real blows against gynocentrism, you will have to be a small part of the force behind the punch. The entire AVFM staff is poised and ready to work our asses off for you and for all men and boys in order to make a difference but we can't do it alone.

Subscription packages can be in any conceivable amount from $5 monthly and up. Basically the price of a cup of Starbucks. Save yourself the embarrassment of saying "venti mocha cappuccino frappe with nonfat organic goat's milk and stevia" once a month and help us do damage to what Erin Pizzey rightly calls The Evil Empire.

You can consider other amounts according to your budget and how many fireworks you want to see us produce. There is also the option for one-time donations.

Gents and ladies, it is not my movement. It is not AVFM's movement. It is your movement.

The membership drive will last for two weeks, ending on October 7.

I think a couple of things are indisputable. AVFM, for all its imperfections and for all the ways we could improve it, is still a history-making website. It is also a history-making group of activists who have taken the discussion on men's issues, misandry and gynocentrism further than anyone else ever has in human history. I am aware that some very good people hate this website. Some of them hate the people who run it. I have no problem admitting that some of that criticism is deserved. Critique comes with the territory and no one is immune.

Still, A Voice for Men, crumbs and all, has overwhelmingly been an instrument for good.

And we are just getting started.

As people who know me will testify, I will be doing this until I'm no longer on this earth. Regardless of the level of support (or lack of it), I will be pursuing this mission and I will be asking you to help.

If it is within your means and you want to get behind this team, the best way you can do that is by becoming a subscribing member of AVFM today.

How to shut down gender studies departments

Marian Atodiresei · 6 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

This is an article written by several people who will remain anonymous (as the article will explain why). This is an article about the less-seen side of the activism, the side that gets things done away from the limelight.

Have you ever wondered what a better world we'd have if gender/women's studies departments would simply cease to exist? In the following lines, we will explain how you can be part of the solution.

But first things first.

Before considering using the method

This method has been used successfully on 14 universities in 4 European countries – two from Western Europe (France and Spain) and two in Eastern Europe (Poland and Romania). Hopefully Hungary will be added to the list next year.

To our knowledge, the first successful attempt to shut down a gender studies programme was in 2010, after it had failed in 2009.

Do not attempt to use this if you are a high profile MRA/anti-feminist. This is something that has the highest chances of working if there is no attention drawn to the attempt and it's done as covertly as possible.

The best success rate is when there are no more than 3 people (2 seems to be the golden number) per university trying to achieve this. The people involved need to look like they're in their 20s. Ideally, a young man and a young woman no older than 25 are the best candidates for doing this.

The people involved need to be able to relate to others. In other words, they need to be as normal as possible. No tattoos, not extreme looking, decent temper (low propensity towards shouting or losing one's temper) and, of course, proper knowledge in non-feminist discourse.

Other conditions: Impeccable knowledge about the way the legal university system works in the country you try this method, as well as impeccable knowledge about the university which you are targeting and its professors (particularly the feminist ideologues within that university).

The financial costs for such an action amount to no more than 50 euros (usually a lot less than that) but the time costs are quite high. It involves at least 3 weeks of work (4 to 7 hours/day) in the summer and another week of work in the autumn (will explain why is that the case soon enough).

One last thing that one needs to know is that the method has not been tested in an Anglosphere environment and we are unsure whether it would actually work. It may work, but we have serious doubts. So consider this method if you reside in continental Europe (anywhere from Moscow to Lisbon, really, because they all have Bologna now).

The actual work

The principle is extremely easy: just convince students to-be to chose another programme, anything except gender studies. The method however is what's innovative.

You see, most universities in continental Europe have a legal minimum of students for each department's first-year. This minimum is sometimes decided by a national law (such as in France) or by the university itself (such as in Hungary).

The university I targeted this summer and autumn had a minimum of 6 students. If the gender studies programme had failed to attract at least 6 students in the first year by September 25th – the programme would have been suspended for this university year. This would have meant that the programme would have only had 2nd year and 3rd year. This means less funding, smaller income for the ideologues and, of course, at least 6 youngsters saved from indoctrination.

This year I failed overall because from the 11 students that wanted to join, I only convinced 5 so the University started with a new batch of freshmen on gender studies by barely reaching the minimum of 6. I may have failed overall, but 5 students will have still been spared and that's no small victory either.

Many other universities in Europe though have lower minimums – usually 3 or 4. Because of this, activists are advised to pick their targets carefully. In other words, don't go at a huge university that routinely enrolls thousands or tens of thousands of students. In such a scenario, your chances of getting the gender studies enrolment under the legal minimum are slim. Smaller universities, preferably the ones with new gender studies departments where a success would also signal to the management that the topic is unpopular – these are the places to go.

Contrary to popular opinion, in our experience, most students aren't really committed to joining gender studies. Many of them don't even have a clear idea about what they're getting in to.

This fact doesn't make the actual act of convincing them easier – but it should provide an image that the mission is not an impossible one.

Now, there is no definitive way on how to convince students to make last-moment changes into their chosen programme as it all differs from culture to culture. Contrary to popular opinion, youngsters differ quite radically from country to country. What worked in Hungary and France did not work in Spain and so on.

However, there are a few tips and tricks that we gathered from our experiences. Here they are:

- the best thing is to be a student at that university (or an ex-student, or a student of an affiliate/partner university). In other words, to sound more credible. A youngster is very likely to listen to the experience of someone who's been through that university far more than the experience of someone who has not
- If you're going in a couple (a man and a woman) – the best approach is for young women to be talked to by the woman in your group and the young men to be talked to by the man in your group. Young men do tend to seek guidance from confident and more experienced men. A 25-27 year old confident man can wield quite a lot of authority over an 18-19 year old man if enough care is being exerted. With young women, it's sort-of a mixed bag. If you're facing a young woman with feminist tendencies, then the best choice is to have the female in your group talk to her. If you're facing a largely non-feminist woman, then it doesn't really matter who talks to her (at least in our experience)
- Don't sound like an activist. Ever. Contrary to popular opinion, most students (especially 18-19 year olds) don't really like activists. The best angle to take is the honest one: be yourself – a current/former student who knows what s/he's talking about when advising against gender studies.
- Don't have readily-available sources or materials. See the point above – don't sound like an activist. If the student questions some of the stuff, do vague quotations and make yourself available to further talks with the student. In other words, quote like this: "there was an article, I think on TIME Magazine where the gender pay gap was debunked, I don't remember exactly, but… (and start explaining the gender pay gap in laymen terms) and let me add you on (insert social media here) and I'll send you the link when I get home" and not like this: "there is study X, Y and Z by authors P, W and F who have debunked this comprehensively – here's a printed copy/link"
- Be friendly and make yourself available to become friends with the student. Even if you don't convince him/her now – you will likely still be able to do that a year later and seed dissent within the gender studies student body. Having a dissenter report back to you about what's going on inside the place is still a valuable asset.
- Adopt a "doctor" mentality as opposed to a "researcher" mentality. A doctor counts his/her success in the number of patients s/he saves. A researcher counts the success in the overall trends – regardless of a few deaths here and there. If you want to try this method – be a "doctor" and not a "researcher". Every student you convince will make a difference. This is as much of a battle for hearts and minds as it is a battle for cutting the funding of mad ideologues.

- Offer to take them to a coffee/beer/soda/whatever. Avoid having long conversations on the hallways of the University. During admissions periods, such discussions can't really be held on the hallways (because they're crowded). Also, you want to convince a kid to change his/her program of choice – s/he's going to need to sit down and process this.
- Focus on planting the seed of doubt, rather than actual convincing. Formulations such as "just think about it a bit more – there are still X days till the final day, so give it a thought" are highly effective because the human psyche usually reacts well when it's reassured that it's not under immediate pressure
- Use non-related arguments. This is something that differs from country to country. For instance, in Spain, feminists have a particularly nasty image these days so using a phrase such as "you don't wanna be that gender Stalinist that people rally against on the streets" works on some students. In Romania and Poland, arguments related to the economic usefulness of the degree are highly effective since most students are from a poor background and regard the university as a key to get out from poverty. In Romania, for instance, arguments such as "You're gonna study to be next Remus Cernea? One can be pathetic even without a degree" can work.
- Don't shy away from long conversations. Sometimes, the youngster may prolong the conversation quite a lot. Let that happen (again: doctor mentality). This summer I spent 9 hours (from 2PM to 11PM) with a young man and we ended up talking about everything from football to politics and from heavy metal to Japanese imperialism. He eventually signed up to a different program.
- Don't lie. I mean, sure, if you say to a student you're 24 and you're in fact 25, let's say that's not a particularly egregious lie. But as a rule, you should not lie at all. Be as honest and as open as possible. You have nothing to lose, but quite a lot to gain, mission-wise, by being honest.
- Don't sound or look desperate. Enough said.

As I said, there is no definitive way on how to do it – but hopefully the tips from our experience help you get an idea on how you could go about doing it. What's important is to be patient, calm and friendly (i.e. don't sound like an activist) – and you'll be fine.

We stated at the beginning of this article that this work involves at least 3 weeks of work (4 to 7 hours/day) in the summer and another week of work in the autumn. This is because universities tend to have two cycles of admission, in case not all the spots are filled in the regular cycle. And, if you've had some success in the first cycle (which is usually in mid-July), then clearly there will be a second cycle (which is usually in the last week of September) in attempt to at least reach the legal minimum.

Why this works in continental Europe

I can already hear the voice screaming "but isn't that harassment?" – and the answer is a resounding NO.

You see, in continental Europe, universities are far more open than the hermit kingdoms that are common in Britain or North America. And this is particularly true during admissions periods when the universities go out of their way to be as open as possible.

Nobody will bat an eye on the fact that there are two 25 year olds wandering around talking to students as you'll probably not be the only ones there. It is likely that you'll meet with some nostalgic former students who just go there to provide tips and tricks to the new to-be students (some countries actually have organizations of former students who specialize in providing tips and tricks to new students on how to navigate the bureaucracies and so on).

As a result, standing around the door where it says "Gender studies admissions" is quite unlikely to be noticed (unless you have the bad luck for that place to be set quite far from the compact groups of students, in which case, special challenges do emerge).

Universities in continental Europe tend to be highly bureaucratic. Virtually all operations (including and especially admissions) are done the classical way – with papers. The concept of online admissions is largely foreign (at least at the universities we've targeted so far). And this is a good thing. Because any inefficient bureaucracy can easily be subverted from the bottom up – as opposed to efficient bureaucracy which can easily be subverted from top down (where the feminists are experts).

Since the students routinely have to wait in queues and come back more than once to bring more papers – you have a lot of opportunities to interact with them and attempt to convince them to shift gears.

Aside from the bureaucracy, the universities in continental Europe are a lot more liberal (in the classical sense). You don't usually have noisy student unions or professors physically policing everyone. As such, the likelihood of drawing attention to yourselves is null, as long as you're friendly and polite. In Anglo-type universities, the likelihood in ending up in a headline somewhere is much higher – and that's not good.

Worst case scenario if you do end up drawing unnecessary attention to yourselves, you will be asked to leave by the (usually only one) security guard. In that case, you just leave and come back the next day.

On Anglo-type universities

To be fair, one of the reasons we did end up writing this is in the hope that some people will be able to adapt this model and apply it successfully in Britain, Canada, the US or other English-speaking nations.

We did not try this model on an Anglo-type university because we decided that the risks are too high. And they are too high for those of us who still struggle with the frenzy and the hysteria that seems to be emanated from the Anglo universities. I personally still struggle with the concept of a "student union" – quite frankly I don't understand why such a thing exists, let alone has so much power (including the power to censor). But I digress.

If there are ways to adapt this model and apply to small colleges and universities in the Anglosphere – that would be fantastic. Just think how triggered the feminists would be.

Some more relevant advice

Don't leave traces of communication. Coordination on acting should solely be done in person or using disposable communications (such as IRC chats or other such media). This kind of thing becomes more successful over time if nobody knows the exact details.

Don't brag. Telling your friends that you're involved is a very bad idea. Since this method is highly effective on smaller universities – bragging is likely to bring the word to the wrong people (the feminist professors whose funding you're ultimately affecting). This is a covert thankless job. It will not (and must not) make headlines.

Don't attempt to communicate with other groups. I don't even know the full name of my female partner that was with me this summer. Heck, I don't even know if her first name she gave me was real. What I do know is that she convinced 2 students and I convinced 3. That's it.

This modus operandi also spares you of having to work to make things look like being an uncoordinated operation. It just is largely uncoordinated by design.

A few words about "we"

I sometimes used "we" in this article referring to the people who have also contributed to this article.

Well, we are an informal group in 5 countries consisting of approximately 15 people. The longest discussion we had in 6 years was for writing this article because we felt we have enough experience to share to the world. I have no idea what the names of the rest of the group are. And I don't want to know. We also have no name as a group. We just meet up in a chat when admissions period commences and share a few stories on how to proceed. Then we all forget about each other till the next year.

We don't have each other on Facebook (or maybe we do, and we don't know) and we don't talk about this outside of the chat (well, except for this article).

I realize this all sounds conspiratorial – and that's because it is a conspiracy. We conspire to get gender studies departments shut down. We recently got good news from one of our members. They succeeded in applying this method for 4 years in a row and with 0 classes, the department was shut down by the University. That would be the second department our group has succeeded in completely shutting down.

A conservative estimate would put the number of students we actually convinced since 2009 at around 300. That may not seem a lot but think of how many we dissuaded indirectly. There are more students who didn't go for gender studies because the department no longer exists. And there are also students who chose something else when they found out that only 2 students had signed up. "I don't want to be in a classroom of just 3 people" is a very strong argument among the youth.

And then again – we adopted the doctor mentality. The fact that at least 300 people were spared of feminist indoctrination as a direct result of our actions is something we're proud of. But proud in silence because this is a thankless job that doesn't make headlines.

Conclusions

If you think you can use this model in your country, please do. Don't tell us. Just do it next time around.

If you think our model is bad – tell us ways to improve it in the comments. But don't just express disapproval for we are not looking for anyone's approval. We are looking to spread the knowledge about boots-on-the ground activism that actually harms the feminist machine and spares the taxpayers of some wasteful spending.

As said earlier, we are particularly interested in ways to apply it in the Anglo-type of universities which to us is largely uncharted territory.

One last thing: Don't try to contact us. You can't anyway. Some of us will respond in this comment section though.

For those who have read so far,

Thank you for your attention.

Melibee reversed women's incitement of violence against men

Douglas Galbi · 7 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

In the Canterbury Tales, Geoffrey Chaucer tells the ridiculous chivalric verse romance of Sir Thopas. Sir Thopas, a knight errant longing for the love of an elf queen, "for love and pleasure" prepared to battle the three-headed giant Sir Elephant. The Host stopped this nonsense and asked for a different story. Chaucer responded with the Tale of Melibee, an English version of Albertanus of Brescia's Latin work Liber consolationis et consilii. That work reversed women's incitement of men to do violence against men. Lessening women's promotion of violence against men is crucial to reducing violence.

Steve Pinker, a Sir Thopas of our time, credits feminization of civilization for contributing to the long-run historical decline in violence. Pinker declares "the most fundamental empirical generalization about violence" is that "it is mainly committed by men."[1] That's half right in a tendentiously biased way. Pinker approvingly observes:

> At the top, a consensus has formed within the international {elite} community that violence against women in the most pressing human rights problem remaining in the world.

That makes the gender bias obvious. In the U.S. today, four times more men than women die from violence. Around the world, violence overwhelmingly occurs against men. Whether a man's immediate killer was a man or a woman doesn't change the reality of the man being dead. Violence against men is much greater than violence against women and of much less social concern. Belief that the most pressing human rights problem today is violence against women is a modern version of ridiculous chivalric behavior.

Violence against men was much more prevalent in medieval Europe. Homicide per capita was roughly thirty times higher in medieval Europe than in high-income countries today. Because men are vastly disproportionately victims of homicide and casualties in war, medieval men's life expectancy was about nine years less than women's. Medieval men also experienced considerable non-fatal violence such as castration and vicious beatings.

Violence against men, along with all other evils, tends today to be blamed on men, or among the more sophisticated, blamed on patriarchy. But in the more liberal political circumstances of medieval Europe, thinkers had more respect for women's agency. Medieval literature of men's sexed protest emphatically declared that women promoted violence against men:

> She sets friends against one another,
> Turning brother against brother;
> She cleaves the father from the son,
> She robs the mother's nest of one.
> …
> Woman fosters strife and wars,
> And exiles men from ruined shores;
> Castles she burns, cities defeats,
> Destroys the towers and the keeps.
> Women's the reason tourneys are born,
> Woman's the reason swords are worn,
> Enmity she instigates,
> And combat she perpetuates;
> The schemes she quickly engineers
> Can drown a countryside in tears. [2]

Sefer Shaashuim, a Hebrew book from early-thirteenth-century Spain, described how women caused wars between families. In early-fifteenth-century Spain, the Archpriest of Talavera documented that women's tears can prompt violence against men. Across world cultures, the classical Arabic poetic laments known as marthiya provide perhaps the most pointed and poignant representation of women's role in inciting violence against men.

In contrast to literature describing women inciting violence against men, Albertanus of Brescia's Liber consolationis et consilii described a woman named Prudence acting as a peacemaker. Prudence's husband Melibee, a young, strong, and rich man, returned home to find that ancient foes had assaulted his wife and grievously injured their daughter. Albertanus made clear his work of gender reversal in depicting the initial interaction of Melibee and Prudence:

> But when Melibee returned to his home, he saw what happened and began to weep greatly and tear his hair and rend his clothes like a madman. His wife then began to say, so as to quiet him, that he had wept enough. But he continually cried more. And she, being disturbed a little, remembered the words of Ovid in The Remedy of Love, who said:
> Who'd stop a mother weeping, unless he's mad, > at her son's grave? That's not the place to admonish her.
> When tears are over, and the sorrowful spirit's done, > then grief can be given expression in words. [3]

When Melibee finally stopped weeping, he gathered around him "a huge multitude of men" and "showed his strong desire to carry out a vendetta."[4] Prudence didn't incite her husband and the other men to violence against men. Drawing upon classical wisdom, Prudence urged her husband to take time to carefully consider the best course of action.[5] Like the initially weepy Melibee and the philosophical Prudence, the rashly violent Melibee and the calm, peace-seeking Prudence reversed long-established gender stereotypes.

In writing his English version of Liber consolationis et consilii, Chaucer understood Albertanus's theoretical-didactic gender reversal. Immediately following the Tale of Melibee, Chaucer presented in the prologue to the Monk's Tale medieval folk wisdom on women and violence:

> When ended was my tale of Melibee,
> And of Prudence and her goodness,
> Our Host said, "On my faith,
> And by that precious body of Madrian,
> {I swear that} I had rather than have a barrel of ale
> That Goodelief, my wife, had heard this tale!
> For she is in no way of such patience
> As was this Melibeus' wife Prudence.
> By God's bones, when I beat my knaves,
> She brings me forth the great knobby clubs,
> And cries, 'Slay the dogs every one
> And break them, both back and every bone!'
> And if any neighbor of mine
> Will not in church bow to my wife,
> Or be so bold as to offend her,
> When she comes home she shakes her fists in my face,
> And cries, 'False coward, avenge thy wife!
> By God's bones, I will have thy knife,
> And thou shalt have my spinning staff and go spin!'
> From daybreak to nightfall right thus she will begin.

> ‘Alas,’ she says, ‘that ever I was created
> To wed a milksop, or a coward ape,
> That will be browbeaten by every body!
> Thou darest not defend thy wife’s right!’
> This is my life, unless I will fight;
> And out at door immediately I must hasten myself,
> Or else I am as good as lost, unless I
> Be like a wild lion, fool-hardy.
> I know well some day she will make me slay
> Some neighbor, and then be on the run;
> For I am perilous with knife in hand,
> Albeit that I dare not stand up to her,
> For she is strong in fighting, by my faith:
> That shall he find that does or says something amiss to her —
> But let us pass away from this matter.” [5]

Neither Albertanus’s Liber consolationis et consilii nor Chaucer’s Tale of Melibee can be adequately appreciated without recognizing women’s important role in inciting violence against men.

Medieval readers widely understood and valued Albertanus’s Liber consolationis et consilii. Judging from manuscripts and influence, Liber consolationis et consilii was among the most popular medieval works. Renaut de Louhans translated Liber consolationis et consilii into French about 1337. He did so apparently to promote peace in war-torn Burgundy. In the fourteenth century. Liber consolationis et consilii and its many vernacular translations became recognized as “an edifying treatise for women.”[6] The need for such edification is scarcely appreciated today.

Violence has always been highly disproportionately violence against men. International elites today seem to be benighted within ridiculous chivalric romances like that of Chaucer’s Sir Thopas. Even worse, many of them seem to have the character of Shakespeare’s Malvolio.[7] They deserve to be mocked.

Reducing violence, which worldwide is predominately violence against men, depends on both women and men. Women should stop inciting men to violence against men. Men should stand up to women’s social power and start valuing men’s lives more highly.

Notes:

[1] Pinker (2011) p. 684. On feminization, id. pp. 684-9. The subsequent quote is from id., p. 414. On women’s responsibility for violence against men, Pinker states that women “frequently egg their men into battle.” But he declares, “over the long sweep of history, women have been, and will be, a pacifying force.” Id. pp. 526-7. Over the long sweep of history, the evidence for that claim is very weak.

[2] Le Blasme des Fames ll. 41-44, 53-62, from Old French trans. Fiero, Pfeffer & Allain (1989) pp. 123, 125. The text is probably from the late-thirteenth century. In the Lancelot romance of the Vulgate cycle, Bors carries the white banner of the Lady of Hungerford Castle into battle and joyfully returns with it stained red with the blood of her enemies.

[3] Albertanus of Brescia, Liber consolationis et consilii Ch. 1, from Latin my translation. The quote from Ovid’s Remedia Amoris ll. 127-130 is from A.S. Kline’s translation. Melibee is an English form of the Latin name Melibeus.

Albertanus wrote Liber consolationis et consilii in 1246. He dedicated that work to his son John. Albertanus had at least three sons. He probably didn’t want to see his sons die early, violent deaths.

Arabic literature could have reached Brescia from Sicily or Spain. Albertanus was familiar with the work of the Spanish Jewish convert Petrus Alfonsi (lived c. 1026-1110). Albertanus referred to Petrus Alfonsi 17 times in Liber consolationis et consilii (16 references to Disciplina Clericalis, 1 reference to Dialogus). Petrus Alfonsi was well-versed in Arabic literature.

Prudence tends to be seen as a recasting of Boethius's Lady Philosophy. While there are some parallels, Liber consolationis et consilii has only one direct citation from Boethius's Consolation of Philosophy. The motivation for Prudence much more probably came from immediate experience and the contemporary literature of men's sexed protest. That literature is well-represented in Petrus Alfonsi's Disciplina Clericalis.

Although Albertanus wrote in Latin, he was a layman. He worked as a judge, a notary, and a professional legal counselor (causidici). He was also the author of at least three treatises and five sermons. A primary concern in his writings is to "find means to resolve both public and private disputes in accordance with legal principles rather than knives, swords, spears, clubs, and rocks." Powell (1992) p. 31. In his Genovese sermon of 1243, Albertanus declared:

> The sweetest of legal precepts are these: to live honorably, to do no harm to another, to give to each his own. … Nothing, however, is more unsuitable than to be feared. As a matter of fact, men clearly hate the person they fear because everyone seeks the destruction of the person he fears.

Nuccio, Brannan & Felice (2004) pp. 13-14.

[4] Liber consolationis et consilii, from Latin trans. Powell (1992) pp. 80-1. Wars and vendettas were common within tumultuous, factious northern Italy early in the thirteenth century. In 1238, the army of Emperor Frederick II successfully besieged Brescia. Albertanus, whom the Brescians had put in command of a fortress at Gavardo, was taken prisoner of war.

[5] Prudence successfully led the hostile parties of men to repentance, forgiveness, and a "kiss of peace." Powell (1992) p. 86. Powell declares:

> Prudence, the wife of Melibeus, is more than the personification of an abstract virtue: she stands for the female principle.

Id. p. 116. Mann (1991), p. 98, similarly describes patience as a "womanly quality" and declares:

> Melibee submits himself to his wife and to patience in one and the same process; his patience must match hers. In assigning this tale to himself, Chaucer identifies himself with the values it embodies, and with the centrality of women's role.

These interpretations ignore Liber consolationis et consilii's gender reversal and implicitly blame men for violence against men. Prudence, like great women writers of the Middle Ages, had more loving appreciation for men.

Prudence herself opposed gender stereotyping. In her response to Melibee's argument that "women are wicked and no good one may be found" and therefore he shouldn't listen to Prudence's counsel, Prudence responded:

> I reply (with due respect to you) that you ought not to despise women in such general terms … there are a great many good women.

Liber consolationis et consilii, Ch. 3 & Ch. 4.2, from Latin trans. Blamires, Pratt & Marx (1992) pp. 237-8. For an alternate approach to affirming "not all women are like that" (NAWALT), see the story of the farmer, his wife, and the fish in the field in Sindibad.

[5] Chaucer, The Monk's Prologue ll. 1889-1923, close modern English translation from Benson (2002). The wife's name Goodelief literally means “good dear one.”

[6] From the thirteenth to the sixteenth century, Albertanus’s Latin writings were translated into Italian, French, English, German, Spanish, Dutch, and Czech. They survive in hundreds of Latin and vernacular manuscripts. Many printed editions were produced in the fifteenth and early-sixteenth centuries. Powell (1992) pp. 5, 121.

Renaut de Louhans (Renaud de Louens) was a Dominican friar. Renaut’s French translation of Albertanus’s Liber consolationis et consilii was “more a paraphrase and a somewhat shortened version.” On Renaut’s translation, id. p. 124-5. Chaucer’s Tale of Melibee is a very close translation of Renaut’s French version, but in minor differences “draws more attention to the limits of human knowledge, to the difficulty of interpreting.” Grace (2004) p. 396. Le Ménagier de Paris (The Parisian Householder), compiled about 1392-94, includes at sec. 1.9 Renaut’s French translation of Liber consolationis et consilii. Le Ménagier de Paris apparently drew upon a slightly different text than that which Chaucer used. Greco & Rose (2009) p. 41. Greco & Rose, apparently oblivious to the literary context, irascibly interpret the text:

> Since every man want to “rule as lord” in his home, the narrator demonstrates that the prudent wife must subdue her anger or grief in order to reform her husband’s foolish and dangerous impulses which would destroy the peace of that home.

Id. p. 147. The literature of men’s sexed protest provides considerable insight into that interpretation.

The description of Liber consolationis et consilii becoming “an edifying treatise for women” is from Mario Roques, cited in Powell (1992) p. 125.

[7] Apparently seeking to flatter international elites and dominant interests in academia and media, Pinker declares, “We are all feminists now” and “rapists are men.” Ignoring forced financial fatherhood, he emphasizes the importance of “women’s control over their own reproduction.” Pinker (2011) pp. 404, 405, 688.

[image] Man killing another man while women watch and applaud. Illustration from Codex Manesse, Zurich, between 1305 and 1315. UB Heidelberg, Cod. Pal. germ. 848, fol. 321v. Thanks to University of Hiedelberg and Wikimedia Commons.

References:

Benson, Larry, trans. 2002. Geoffrey Chaucer. The Monk’s Prologue and Tale. The Geoffrey Chaucer Page, Harvard University.

Blamires, Alcuin, Karen Pratt, and C. William Marx. 1992. Men Impugned, Woman Defamed and Woman Defended: an anthology of medieval texts. Oxford: Clarendon Press.

Fiero, Gloria, Wendy Pfeffer, and Mathé Allain. 1989. Three medieval views of women: La contenance des fames, Le bien des fames, Le blasme des fames. New Haven, Conn: Yale University Press.

Grace, Dominick. 2004. “Telling Differences: Chaucer’s Tale of Melibee and Renaud de Louens’ Livre de Mellibee et Prudence.” Philological Quarterly. 83 (4): 367-400.

Greco, Gina L., and Christine M. Rose, ed. and trans. 2009. The good wife’s guide; Le ménagier de Paris: a medieval household book. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.

Mann, Jill. 1991. Geoffrey Chaucer. Atlantic Highlands, NJ: Humanities Press International. Republished in 2002 as Feminizing Chaucer. Woodbridge, Suffolk, UK: D.S. Brewer.

Nuccio, Oscar, Patrick T. Brannan, and Flavio Felice. 2004. “Genovese Sermon: Albertanus of Brescia.” Journal of Markets & Morality 7(2): 599-638.

Pinker, Steven. 2011. The better angels of our nature: why violence has declined. New York: Viking.

Powell, James M. 1992. Albertanus of Brescia: the pursuit of happiness in the early thirteenth century. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.

Feature image by Paul Kitchener

Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License

Victim blaming: The whine of Tinkerbell

August Løvenskiolds · 8 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The next time you hear a feminist woman complain that efforts to teach women to protect themselves from rape are "victim blaming," feel free to yell at her "oh, sorry, Tinkerbell, but it is time for you go grow up and take responsibility for your own safety."

"Victim blaming," unbelievably, is the charge feminists level at anyone – even one of their own, like Susan Brownmiller, who suggests that women should take reasonable, effective precautions to protect themselves from sexual predators.

When the potential victims of rape deliberately eschew taking even the simplest of safety precautions – not getting blindly drunk, preferring the wearing of clothes to nakedness, avoiding known dangerous areas, going out with friends instead of alone, and so on, it is natural to wonder what is going on in their minds that is compromising their judgment, including asking ourselves, are they adult enough mentally to be making adult decisions at all?

Adults take precautions against danger and look out for others too immature to understand the danger. Adults bucket children into car safety seats and teach kids to use seatbelts when they outgrow safety seats. Risk management is a marker of adulthood – one cannot protect against all mishaps but one can take reasonable steps to reduce risk.

A recent study showed that teaching college women to protect themselves lowered the rape rate by 50%. In the light of these results it seems that feminists are correctly viewed as criminally negligent when it comes to rape prevention – indeed, they are rightly viewed as rape accomplices in the same way that an insider criminal who knowingly leaves a money safe deliberately unlocked should be held equally criminally responsible for any ensuing theft.

These anti-prevention feminists are a rapist's best friend and a partner in their crimes. They are the pimps of rape, throwing the women who trust them into harm's way without a second thought about those women's safety. They deserve to be ostracized from society, if not imprisoned. If it weren't for those feminists, half of all rapes would stop. Half!

But no, feminists would rather blame all men for rape than task reasonable precautions.

A feminist who rejects risk management is a shitty person, a horrible friend, a wretched protector, and a useless waste of resources. Such a person is best viewed as totally incompetent – unfit for parenthood, corporate management, elective office, or any position of trust or authority.

Why "Tinkerbell?"

In the children's story "Peter Pan", Peter wants to be the perpetual boy and never grow up to shoulder adult responsibilities. Unlike the earlier waves of feminism that worked towards "empowering" women to full adult responsibilities, current feminist practice seeks to create permanent protected status for women and the complete rejection of adult attitudes.

The scientific name for the persistence of child-like physical traits into adulthood is "neoteny" but this term usually only covers appearance: oversized eyes, wrinkle-free skin, and so on. The term "Peter Pan syndrome" is usually used for men who avoid adult commitments, most commonly marriage.

For women, I've seen the terms "Female Peter Pan" and "Princess Pan" used for women who shirk adult responsibilities. I prefer the term "Tinkerbell syndrome," named after Peter's diminutive fairy girlfriend who was fully capable of becoming human-sized but preferred staying small. (Yes, there is a "Wendy syndrome" but it refers to women who use mothering behavior on adult men.)

How does the Tinkerbell syndrome relate to the "victim blaming?"

Consider the problem of automobile accidents. Accidents happen on the road all the time despite driver training and safety measures built into cars. When humans are infants too young to understand the danger, we adults strap them into safety seats to help protect them from injury in the case of car crashes. As the children grow up, eventually we teach them how to use seat belts. Later, children become adults and learn to protect themselves by buckling themselves into car seats and not drinking nor texting while driving: we take responsibility for measures designed to protect us. We become adults and accept responsibility.

Like car crashes, sexual assaults still happen despite efforts to stop them. Criminals still sneak into the country and continue their criminal ways. Single mothers still abuse their sons and neglect to teach them not to rape – indeed, many rapists learn the behavior from their sexually abusive female family members. Instead of setting examples of adult men's duties in regards to women, fathers are kicked out of kids lives.

Meanwhile, aging feminists like Jessica Valenti eventually and inevitably feel the sting of time robbing them of their youth and attractiveness. It is no surprise that they cling to the shards of their broken youth in any way they can. In a recent column, Valenti mused that > Being on the subways and streets of New York while female used to mean walking through a veritable gauntlet of harassment and catcalls. But lately, a curious thing has happened – my world is a much quieter place. The comments and lascivious stares from men have faded away the older I've gotten, leaving an understandable sense of relief. But alongside that is a slightly embarrassing feeling of insecurity that, with every year that goes by, I become more and more invisible to men…

>
> It was miserable. But still, as much as I wish it didn't, the thought of not being worth men's notice bothers me. To my great shame, I assume I must look particularly good on the rarer days that I do get catcalled.

In addition to misusing "gauntlet" (a common error: older grammarians teach that one "throws down the gauntlet, and runs the gantlet"), Valenti's waning fuckability is twisting her adult judgment: instead of seizing the adult responsibility of teaching younger women to protect themselves, she rejects the wisdom of crone feminists like Brownmiller and Chrissie Hynde in favor of the daft feminism of the younger, coloring book feminist coven.

Grow up, Tinkerbell. How will you feel if your daughter is assaulted, and you could've stopped it?

Warm thanks and FTSU

Paul Elam · 9 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

A sincere thank you note to all AVFM supporters, especially the ones who came on board as subscribers during this membership drive.

I was hoping for a minimum of 10-12 new subscribers during this two week drive. We accomplished that within the first four days and got many more before it was over.

We also got some generous one time donations.

It is no secret that the 2015 will go into the records as a restructuring year for AVFM. We have been forced to pull the belt very tight and squeeze pennies till Abe Lincoln begged for another trip to Ford's Theater.

Production is down, thus traffic is down. Activism is in a holding pattern.

For now.

The very good news is that you good people have helped us stabilize. We will soon be able to do really neat things, like pay the very generous and patient Marc Randazza our back legal bills among other things.

What will come out of this is an AVFM that is leaner, meaner and works smarter vs harder. I estimate (realistically) by spring we will have our house more or less in fully operational order.

If fortune favors us and we continue to pick up more subscribers in the next two drives, we will be in very good shape and no longer sweating bullets. That is good, because you can't use the kind of bullets we have been sweating to shoot the wolf at the door.

The idea here is to become smaller (less focus on click bait) with more sting, the former being much easier to accomplish than the latter.

That being said I am also announcing that the Men's Mental Health Network (MMHN) will be delayed for an indeterminate time. It turns out that the particulars of putting it together correctly (which would take a book to explain) are much more expensive and time consuming than any of us imagine.

It is on the shelf for now, but not being mothballed. It is an important project that we intend to follow through with. The foundation for MMHN is there. The walls and roof are going to require more than we can afford until we have an adequate subscriber base.

I will also take this time to announce that AVFM will, in the much nearer future, engage in something less ambitious financially but perhaps having just a great an impact that we anticipate from MMHN.

The idea for the next project came from Judgy Bitch, though she will have no knowledge of it till she reads this.

It started with a seed she planted in my head while I was watching her in a debate with a feminist on one of TJ's YouTube programs.

She was asked what rights did women have that men do not. She quipped, in typical JB fashion, "How about the right to not be sexually mutilated at birth?"

I did more than a fist pump when she said that. Internally it was the beginning of a shift of my thinking about avenues we can travel to change the narrative, help men and boys directly and come out with a good dose of FTSU in a place that really needs it.

I can almost feel the other C-Level managers cringe right now as I lay out a the plan, but two things predispose me to lay it out here anyway.

One, we need help from the rank and file to do it. And two, I am a big fan of Vince Lombardi, who said something to the effect that "Execution is everything." You can hand your play book over to the opposing team a week before the big game, and if you execute there is nothing they can do to stop you.

We are going to execute like bosses.

Neonatal cutting on boys is now empirically proven to be nothing but barbaric and destructive. It is an issue that even a good many feminists (not that we want to work with them) are also invested in. Since a fair number of intactivists happen to be gay men the practice also crosses over into that demographic.

Oh yes, did I mention is was cruel and barbaric?

Sorry, I just did not want to lend the impression that pleasing certain groups was being placed over the mission.

I have spent time in recent months investigating this and believe that neonatal cutting is perfectly ripe for successful attack. I also believe (which Janet drove home for me) that it is probably the gateway into much more effective activism for men and boys.

Please allow this meme I placed on the AVFM Facebook page to explain.

The question is how do we do it?

To me, that is simple. We take a lesson from register-her.com.

In my recent investigations I have been shocked to find what a big business neonatal cutting has become. Not just the money for the "procedure" but for harvesting foreskins and selling them at a very pretty price.

The stem cells they bear are used to make facial cream, a disgusting reality that many of you already know.

It is a corrupt industry, one that has medical and religious practitioners invested heavily in its continuation despite the volumes of research now available demonstrating that it should be immediately abandoned except for true medical necessity.

It is time to call them out, one by one, in full public view and to expose them for what they do and why. This will also provide us a valuable opportunity to reach expecting parents with facts and perspective that the child mutilation profiteers have no interest in telling them. Indeed, they have every reason not to.

We have acquired childmutilators.com, and will be using that domain in a way loosely modeled after register-her. The major difference is that the targeted demographic, expecting parents, won't be getting the bombast of register-her visitors. What they will get will be a finely tuned package of information designed to help them reconsider the often rote and unconscious choice to have their baby boy's genitals cut.

The fireworks will be here, when we publish a headline with an announcement that a doctor or rabbi has been placed on a directory at childmutilators.com. Yes, rabbis too. Whatevs. We have been called much worse than anti-Semites, and we will certainly be targeted with that false allegation when we start. Bottom line is that if you are sexually mutilating baby boys, you won't be spared inclusion. The AMA won't save you, and neither will your god.

If you cut on boys, you better hope your name is John Smith or something else that will get buried in Google returns.

I discussed this plan in detail recently with Steve Brule in an interview. I have made similar announcements on Facebook and I have done some considerable outreach to key intactivists who are interested in an alliance.

Our needs to start are simple. We need a WordPress child theme built and a decent logo. The preferred way to get those things is through volunteerism that we can depend on.

I was already contacted about the logo after my interview with Steve and we have it working. We will be using the tagline "Think before you cut." In fact, we will be pounding incessantly on those four words.

So, you are saying that a medically unnecessary procedure that kills 100 baby boys a year in America alone, results in 100's more botched cases that leave boys disfigured and sexless for life, that removes 1/3 of penile skin containing over 10,000 erogenous nerve endings (2,000 more than the average whole clitoris) is NOT a men's issue?

You are a men's advocate who does not consider lack of genital integrity revitalized in America by a rich Seventh Day Adventist because he wanted boys to stop masturbating to be a concern?

1. You are circumcised.

2. Please circumcise your denial and your depraved indifference.

Thanks. ~ The Management

A snarky but honest response fom Facebook.

The tough part of the upstart is the WordPress development. Developing a theme properly can get pricey, and with all respect to WordPress developers there is a lot of untrustworthy and/or incompetent people out there.

The best option is for a serious MHRA with equally serious development skills to step forward and dedicate a the labor to help build the site, START TO FINISH.

Another option is to pay a developer we can trust to do it but that will take more time. Either way, it is going to happen and it is going to be done correctly.

We won't launch this until it has the appearance and functionality to impress visitors.

I also understand there is a certain British MHRA of noted reputation who is very keen to take on an anti-mutilation campaign in the UK. There is possible synergy there. Don't ask who he is, but he reads regularly and is welcome to chime in in the comments.

So, after having thanked you all for the brilliant response to the subscription rally, I am putting it out there again.

This is your movement. AVFM is your platform to get things done. If you would like to be a part of making this happen, please contact me at paul@avoiceformen.com.

I would love to chat with you, especially those with WordPress skills and the willingness to follow through with commitments. If there are any potential financial backers for this plan who are willing to be on standby should we have to go the paid route, I would love to hear from you, too.

I realize that this mission change will test the reasoning of some AVFM supporters, especially those who may be religious. I respectully suggest you speak with Shrek about this as he is quite the expert on scripture as it relates to this particular matter.

I also want to assure all that AVFM will continue with addressing all matters within its mission statement. This, after all, is in there, too, and it is an area that has been neglected far too long.

Thanks for reading through this long one, and thanks again for supporting AVFM.

Announcing The New Sex Ed

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 10 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Imagine a special woman in your life calling the police to tell them that you hit her, raped her, or that you did not care for your children. Imagine her saying these things even though none of it is true. Not only are such claims devastating to hear, they can ruin your life if you are a man.

Brian Banks. Joshua Strange. Caleb Warner. Reade Seligmann. Collin Finnerty. David Evans. You may not know these names, but they belong to men who are the world to their families, friends and partners. Those worlds collapsed one by one as each man, accused of rape, fought a system that denied him due process while the public screamed for his head. These men had one thing in common: They were all innocent.

To add insult to injury, some of the women who lie to put men in jeopardy did so for reasons like having an excuse for being late to class, for cheating on her boyfriend, or in the case of the video below, for trying to cover up details surrounding a car accident.

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Qgt6L9KlieE

Thankfully law enforcement officers sometimes file charges against false accusers, but a fleeting whim can still put your son in prison on college campuses, which use dangerously low standards of evidence for criminal accusations.

We need your help to ensure that the innocent never burn with the guilty in the fight against sexual assault. We need you to reach out to young men, educate them on the risks of sexual contact under constant legal review on campus, and put them in contact with the people who actually care about their futures.

The New Sex Ed

The New Sex Ed is a presentation that answers several vital questions:

- What does a false accusation of sexual assault do to a man?
- What laws are in play? (We cover S.590, the Campus SAVE Act and the April 4th directive)
- What can I do if I or people I know get falsely accused?
- How do we take power away from false allegations in the first place?

We cannot stop false allegations, but we can equip young men to handle them. We are raising funds for this event to pay for refreshments, venue fees, a speaker's honorarium and custom condoms that remind the wearer that while they can prevent sexually transmitted infections, they must also work to prevent sexually transmitted investigations.

Like our last event Male Students in Peril, donations to The New Sex Ed go towards improving a base implementation. The more you help, the bigger your impact. The lower budget events consists of myself delivering a presentation. A larger budget means that we can and will ask a prolific victim of a false rape allegation to visit KSU personally and tell his story on camera.

If you cannot attend the event yourself, you don't have to miss out. We will publish a recording of the lecture. Our fundraiser ends on October 18th, after which we will announce our game plan with the raised funds. The event starts this November 6th at 8:00 PM EST, in the Kennesaw Campus Leadership Room ST205.

[image]

When you arrive on the Kennesaw campus, look for this building. It's hard to miss because it's right next to the visitor's parking lot. Go inside and look for room ST205, which is to the left of the Card Services Office. If you are having trouble finding it, just ask a passerby.

We’re counting on you to make this event a success. Please consider parting with a day’s coffee by clicking here.

Your contributions go toward supporting young men and reminding them that they are worth the world to so many. If you wish to take part in other ways, tweet with the hashtag #TheNewSexEd to discuss the event on Twitter and share this campaign.

As always, thank you for making this possible.

This post originally appeared on Zen Men.

$270 raised so far. Click here to contribute.

Attila Vinczer's used cars

Paul Elam · 10 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

This Skype conversation took place between Paul Elam and Attila Vinczer on July 16, 2015

For backstory on this matter, please see the following two pages.

To date, Attila has not paid back a dime.

If you need back story here it is.

http://www.avoiceformen.com/a-voice-for-men/attila-vinczer-leaves-the-mens-movement-atop-a-dumpster-float-in-a-parade-of-shame/

Also

http://www.avoiceformen.com/allbulletins/attila-vinczer-sinks-to-new-low-though-we-hardly-think-it-is-new/

Ladies and gentlemen, this is what a sociopath looks like.

Addendum: Someone approached me on Twitter, a man named Dante Hamilton, with whom I was previously unfamiliar. He offered to make a transcript of this for the record. "Sure," I said. "Never happen," I thought. Then a few hours ago the following hits my inbox.

Lesson. Don't judge a Tweet by it's cover.

Thank you, Mr. Hamilton.

Transcript:

Attila: Hey Paul, how are you?

Paul: I'm good, how are you doing today, bud?

Attila: Not too bad. Wallowing in all kinds of mud, and shit, and everything.

Paul: Yeah, I can imagine.

Attila: Anyways, I understand that Tanveer had contacted you, but I also understand the concerns that you have and they're my concerns as well

Paul. Okay.

Attila: So, I… the only thing I can rely on and.. I hope that at least you can respect that I don't lie, I don't bullshit, I don't fuck around. The situation that had arisen on the third of June. I was to have been funded, I was to get a $52,000 dollar check. It didn't happen. Not because of anything that I knew, or that that would go wrong, or that I did wrong… So hindsight being 20/20, I would not have allowed this event to go forward, knowing that that money was not going to come. You know, I was- I was okay with the money coming the day of, but it didn't. So anyways, and as it turns out it came on the 6th of July, but it came… I was $40,000 short, and I don't want to get into the whys and the hows… I've had to clear off some incredible things with Tanveer New Market, I got hit with extraordinary costs, legal costs. One lawyer took an extra ten grand, just one lawyer. So, I was short, and an order came in through the business, so I thought, you know what, I'm just going to somehow massage this together so I can cover off my obligations. So, here I am. I'm making deliveries on the 26th; should be a Monday. I'm gonna be paid, and I will deal with a fair chunk of my debt, but I've had to go back to a mortgage broker because I'm short. I need money, and that money was not just for the domestic violence stuff. I've had a construction site that needs to move ahead. So, I've gone back to him this week. He has to look. I need that $50 grand. I suspect it's gonna take two to three weeks, and at that point I just want to clear the slate. I don't want to hear anybody talking about being cheated, ripped off, scammed, whatever. I have no personal [skin?] in this game, I don't… there's not a single bit of personal advantage. If anything, there's a disadvantage, as can be seen now. And I'm very, very sorry that it turned out as it has, because, y'know, I don't mind going into battles, but not these kinds of battles. The hell would I- would I knowingly do this.

Paul: Well let me say a couple things, Attila. Again, one thing that, I mean… I don't know how much of it you're seeing, or is registering-

Attila: Just, just one thing-

Paul: Let me finish here. I understand that owing Tanveer four thousand dollars is not money that went into your pot. I understand that the money that you owe me is not money that you- that went into your pot. That's not what I'm thinking about this, but the bottom line right now is that it really doesn't matter what I think, and I'm going to tell you why. 'Cause what is circulating now, and I think it's still stoppable, if- with the right cards being played, is that we have on record, and I don't mean "on record" like we're keeping a file, but I mean what has come up is people like Marty Fiebert complaining, Erin Pizzey complaining, Tanveer complaining, Al Martin complaining. All of these people, through the [scope] going back to the first conference complaining about feeling cheated. And it gets to a point, if there's enough people doing that, Attila, it won't matter what your intent was. It won't matter what problems befell your luck.

Attila: I agree!

Paul: It will just matter that people are gonna start talking about this, and your reputation is gonna get crushed out of it.

Attila: Right, I agree. I'm completely cognizant of that.

Paul: Okay.

Attila: Completely.

Paul: So-

Attila: You're right, it won't matter what happened or how it happened, or how, y'know… I had a heart attack; none of that would matter. The only thing that would matter is people are going to say these negative things, and that's all that's gonna stick.

Paul: Yeah, and the way to avoid that, Attila, is by contacting people with information that's reliable on when you can take care of these things and then following through with them. That's the only thing that can pull you out of this. But so far, what I know, and I believe it's been with best intent; you've told people one thing after another and then not followed through. And it's-

Attila: Yes-

Paul: And it's killing you.

Attila: Yes, you're absolutely right. And I evaluate my situation, I look at what I'm [anticipating], and I make what looks to me as reasonable commitments, reasonable obligations, confirmation, and I'm having some bad luck.

Paul: Okay.

Attila: Okay.

Paul: Let me ask you this; is there a possibility that you can return the unsold silver to Al?

Attila: That's a possibility.

Paul: Okay.

Attila: See, that kind of good faith registers with people too.

[Silence]

Attila: I was even going to, I mean, ideally? The plan was I thought we would sell 100 units, without any trouble. And it didn't happen.

Paul: Yup. I know.

Attila: So… But I don't know what he's going to do with 100 blanks.

Paul: Well, at least they're worth their weight in silver.

Attila: Yeah, but you know what? That should- that would need to be turned back into buillion, so that you could actually… Gold is one thing, but silver is another. So that he could actually, I mean, I would sell it myself. If it was gold, I could get rid of it just like that. But I've got a guy, it's [Universal Coin] that I deal with, he's going to actually contact somebody in the United States who may be interested in buying 100 of the… I mean, I know it's got AVFM, A Voice For Men, on it, but the interest in the Kennedy quote on the back. So I'm going to play that out, see if I can sell it, but it won't be at $6 a piece; it's gonna be at about $20 a piece, which is four dollars less than what I owe Al per ounce, because back then it was $24 an ounce, now it's only $16.

Paul: Right. I know it's dropped-

Attila: So I've taken a hit, an $8 hit on that too. So, nothing has been in my favor. And to add more trouble to my plate, we've? been hit with an extraordinary 3-year audit on our charity and I don't know when this wind blew in, I don't know who… Somebody had to have filed the complaint, and I don't know [whether it] was because of the Senator, because they were audited heavily. I saw the email she showed me, with our charity name on it, and they were questioning why she would would come to an event that was hosted by a charity. So I don't know if it's from there, or from somebody like [White Ribbon]. I don't know, but I've gotta produce three years of absolute, like not even… It's not a minor audit, it's everything.

Paul: That sucks.

Attila: So, you know, my plate is really, really full. So, you know what, I have to step back for a couple of days. I just needed to shut things down so I could reboot my mind, so that I could deal with all this. But anyways, the checks will be written. The question I have for you is I understand to make a payment plan, and I'm fine with that, but in order to be fair with that, I would have to make a list of all the creditors, the amounts and proportionate to what money is owed. If I have $1000 to distribute, let's say, I would have to proportionately give the right percentage to each creditor.

Paul: Okay. The only topic that I'm concerned about here were the names named in the message that I sent you. Because that's the message, you know, you're part of this community, you're a valued activist, and things are boiling up, and whether you realize it or not, Attila, I'm working to try to have your ass covered by now, harder than you know about.

Attila: You know what, and I implicitly respect that, and, you know, I quietly do that when people attack you. I have no hesitation to fend whatever people say, to fend that off. So I really appreciate that, and, Paul, I just… I just gotta clear my conscience here, I just need to be clear, that I have no ill intent. I have no desire to hurt or harm anyone, and this shit is weighing heavily on my mind.

Paul: I believe you, I believe you. That's not the issue, Attila, and this is what I'm trying to get you to listen to, is that regardless of your intent, people have been harmed.

Attila: I agree-

Paul: And the thing is, that this thing, if it isn't handled soon, is going to blow up, and here's the position it puts me in; here's what I'm going to face. If Tanveer says fuck it, I'm going public, or whatever, people are going to turn and, because of our affiliation, they're going to hook it to me and AVFM. And then I'll be frank with you, that part of my motive here… The biggest part of it is that I care about you and I want this thing to go away. But part of my motive here is, Attila, that this stuff is [dirty], whether you had any ill intent or not, it's dirty and it's gonna splash all over all of us. Not just you.

Attila: Okay. Let me ask you this. I need to… Because I'm looking at a three-week period, to where I could write all the checks, 100%, and be done with this. I need to ask you. Do you think I should make a proposal to all of the creditors or do you think that I should pick off certain, more heated people, or more dangerous or… how do I say this… more critical people first?

Paul: Well, in terms of the meltdown that I'm trying to avoid, I think you should address the people in the letter, I think you should wait until you have a date that is written in fucking concrete that you will be able to make restitution or begin a restitution plan. I mean, I'm not trying to be cold, but the other people you owe money to are not of concern to me. At all. That is- that's not my concern. My concern is about the men's movement, it's about AVFM's reputation, it's about your reputation. So what I would suggest is that you contact each of those entities, of course exclude me because you've already apologized, and I don't need one, but that you contact these people, apologize, but don't do it until you have a date that you know you can follow through. Because the next promise you make that doesn't get delivered, it's going to blow up in your face-

Attila: Okay-

Paul: And there won't be any stopping it.

Attila: I have to consider… And I understand what you said here, but I have to consider that I need to… If this takes three, four, five days, people are gonna look at me, particularly Tanveer, who's been brutal with me; actually, I don't know how the hell this guy's a physician?, with some of the stuff he's written to me-

Paul: C'mon, Attila, don't play victim to this. This guy spent $4k out-of-pocket, he was told he'd be reimbursed, and he got left holding the bag. Please don't play victim to this. This is, whether you want to take it or not, and I'm not angry at you, but this is your creation. This guy is a smart, passionate man with a lot of smarts, and I have no doubt he's a good physician, but attacking him because he's angry at you for being stiffed out of $4 grand, man, that doesn't look good on you.

Attila: Fair enough. I hope that I can speak with you openly-

Paul: You always can, and I always will with you.

Attila: Okay, so, the communication that I had with him, it derailed, brutally, and-

Paul: He's angry!

Attila: Okay. Alright. So how do I deal with this angry man? What do I say to him?

Paul: What you do, and this is something I've told to many people in my life that were angry at me, is that your anger with me aside, here's what I'm going to do. If you want to continue to be brutal with me, fine; whatever you want to do, I understand why you're angry, but here is what's going to happen. And just disregard his anger; don't be offended at people being angry at you over this, Attila. People have a right to their anger.

Attila: Okay-

Paul: And he may have come out with it too much, I don't know, but the basic reason he's angry is sound. Just ignore that and take care of the problem, and his anger will go away.

Attila: Okay. Alright. I just… I've been struggling with how to deal with this guy. I mean, normally-

Paul: A $4k check.

Attila: I know, and it's a $4100 check, not just-

Paul: Okay, well, what he wrote me was for $4100 then. That's how you deal with his anger. You don't need to struggle with his emotions, you need to struggle with the debt.

Attila: Okay. So, I'm just gonna ask you, just dealing with what is going to explode more, and trying to cool that first. If I dealt with Tanveer, I somehow need to gather that- his volatility is the most severe.

Paul: I wouldn't say so. Right now I would say Al's is.

Attila: Okay.

Paul: I would say it's an equal problem. I don't- I've never done anything retributive in my life to anything over a financial debt, and I'm not gonna start now, but I can tell you this; and this is, read it like you want to, you said we would talk honestly, this is what I'm doing.

Attila: Yes, yes-

Paul: The last person on Earth I would want angry at me, because of the reaching capability he has, is Al Martin, and he is angry.

Attila: Okay, so are you telling me, if I'm hearing this right, that I should prioritize Al?

Paul: I think you should prioritize the debt that has come up in relation to your events. I mean, I can't- I don't have a magic formula. I know this is just between me, and Al, and Tanveer, it's almost ten grand.

Attila: I know, I know.

Paul: And I don't have a way to sort that out for you. All I know is that's what's owed. That I'm trying to keep this from boiling over, and I'm actually spending more time trying to settle people down than I care to be right now.

Attila: I'm sorry that it's consuming your time.

Paul: But that's okay, but the only solution to this is going to be to be, as quickly as is realistic, Attila, you have to tell people when they're going to be paid back, and it has to stick.

Attila: I realize that.

Paul: And that's the simplest, only answer in this whole deal.

Attila: Okay, I guess that I'm- just so that I'm not going at this all on my own, would it be fair, or do you think that it would be a good approach to contact Al and Tanveer and [name], and just explain to them- see, I'd try to explain it to Tanveer, but it just blew up on me.

Paul: And that's what- listen, brother, I'm trying to tell you something that you're not getting. That's why he blew up. People that feel stiffed, people that are owed money, don't want to hear about, "Well I've got this mortgage broker this, and I've got this business deal that". They want to hear the date and the amount.

Attila: Okay-

Paul: And they want it to stick.

Attila: Okay, so here's my challenge. I need to get confirmation, and I'm talking to you, and I hope that I can speak openly. My challenge is, I need to get my commitment from my mortgage broker on a specific closing date so that I can say okay, this is the date that I- that this will happen, and I may even add a week to it to be on the safe side, because I would rather under promise than over deliver.

Paul: If there is any chance, like I mean a lightning bolt chance, that something could go wrong with that deal, I would not contact people with that information.

Attila: But I-

Paul: If I had to, I would wait until I had the check in my hand, and then contact people and say, “I have the money, it’s on the way right now.”

Attila: But I can’t ignore Tanveer, he’s emailing me every day.

Paul: Let me talk to Tanveer, and I can probably get that to, if anything, slow down.

Attila: I don’t mind him sending me these emails, but I mean I read them and I try to interpret them, and-

Paul: And okay, I’ll get a better answer for you then, and you know how you answer [Tim Vier]? You say, how many times have you told Tanveer he would get the money and not been able to follow through?

Attila: Twice.

Paul: Okay. Write him back, apologize again, and say: ” Tanveer, look. I’ve told you twice when I was going to pay you back, and stuff happened and I was not able to follow through. I feel terrible about that, and I know you’re angry and at the risk of making you even angrier, I’m working on this hard but I’m not going to give you a date until I have a check in my hand because I don’t want to lead you to believe something when it could go wrong.” And then let him live with that. I will talk to Tanveer. I believe fully that I can get his commitment to not go public.

Attila: Okay. And I think that that is a solid way of dealing with it, so that I don’t want, you know, to try to estimate a concrete date when I don’t have the check in my hand.

Paul: Yes. Just tell him you’re doing the best you can, that this is weighing heavily on your mind, that you feel awful that you told him twice and were not able to follow through and that you weren’t going to set yourself or him up for that again. End of story. And then let him be angry if he has to be angry. I mean, that’s fine; people are allowed to be angry over this stuff. But your goal here should not be to make everybody feel all hunky-dory and peaceful and it’s all cool. Your goal should be to own the debt and take care of it, and nothing else. And then those that I believe are decent enough human beings will see in that that you did follow through with your word, and that will restore your credibility. But if you give somebody else one more story about how this went wrong, or that went wrong, or my car got towed, it all starts sounding like “the dog ate my homework”. And people don’t buy it, even when it’s true.

Attila: Fair enough. I, you know, people that I care about, that are close to me, I just- I am explicitly open, and my fucking car did get towed.

Paul: Yeah, I know, and you don’t- let me- we’re talking openly. You owed me $2k. You wrote and said, “I was going to pay you but my car got towed. It cost $750.” The first thing that entered my mind was, what about the $1,250 that was left over after that? Why didn’t I even see $10 of it? So you gotta understand how people react to this stuff, Attila, and sometimes I don’t think you do.

Attila: You know what? No, I’m glad that you mentioned that, and I do understand that.

Paul: So, that’s my suggestion. Tell people you’re working on it, tell people that you’re not going to make any more promises about when because you haven’t been able to follow through, but that you’re working on it and the only other deadline you’re gonna set is that you’re gonna notify them as soon as the money is in your hand to send out, so there won’t be any doubt. And if people- I would respond a lot more favorably to that than to somebody writing me and giving me their reasons why they didn’t pay me on time, by far. I would rather hear that somebody’s coming up honestly and saying “Look, things have been fucked up, I’m not going to make any more promises and break them. I’m tired of breaking my word. So here’s the deal, I’m working my ass off on this, as soon as I have the money, you’re gonna hear from me.” And that’s all people want to hear, Attila; they get offended when they hear “I had this problem, and that problem, and this problem, and that problem”; it’s a big turn-off to somebody who feels stiffed.

Attila: Okay. You know what, looking at it from that perspective, and I guess it’s been a long time since, and I have been stiffed-

Paul: I bet you have.

Attila: I have. Hundreds of thousands of dollars. And you know what, you're right. Like my own brother. You know, knowing that he was off to the racetrack, racing cars, when I turned him onto auto racing, and knowing that I gave him $130 grand, and he didn't bother to call me and say "Hey, brother, here's the keys, here's the helmet, go for a fucking drive". And that bugged me, because that essentially, I looked at that vehicle as, "I paid for that".

Paul: Well, in that case, you did.

Attila: I know I did. It's been a while since I looked at it from that perspective, and I appreciate you bringing it to light for me. So, yeah. I understand.

Paul: Okay, man. Look, I've gotta run. I'm glad you wanted to talk about this, I gave you the best advice I could, and I'm doing all I can to keep this from becoming worse than it is.

Attila: Hey, listen. I very much respect you having my back; it means a lot to me, and I'm not gonna let you down on it. I know you're going out on somewhat of a limb, you're spinning your wheels on this, so I just need to be clear that I'm not going to let you down on this.

Paul: Okay. And then you will forgive me for saying, show me the money.

Attila: [laughs]

Paul: Because here's the deal; I mean this on a personal level, Attila; we've changed business models, we have ended fundraisers, I am financially in horrible shape. I mean, worse than I'm even willing to tell you.

Attila: I believe it. I believe it, and you know what? What I'd like to do, because I'm in no position to talk about my troubles now, but when this is all settled and done with, then I'd like to sit down with you, have a beer, and you know what, just shoot the shit. Because some of this stuff that I've gone through in the last couple of years is remarkable.

Paul: Yep. I hear you. And I would like to do the same thing, but I'm gonna run now. I've got stuff to do, but thanks for talking to me, and I will follow through; I will talk to just the people that are involved in this, and ask for their forebearance for a while.

Attila: Okay. I'm not gonna write anything today, I just need to get a good night's sleep, but tomorrow I will write to each and every one of these people.

Paul: Good. And yes, get a good night's sleep first. Rest up on it, man.

Attila: [Unintelligible] brother, thank you very much for your help.

Paul: Take care, Attila. Bye bye.

Attila: Bye.

A call to arms

Mike Buchanan · 11 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

On 26 September 2015 Mike Buchanan gave a well-received presentation to 20+ MRAs in Oxford. Four were already members of his party, but more joined up after this talk, and/or offered to attend an anti-MGM rally, and/or put themselves forward as potential candidates for the 2020 general election. A productive day. The rest of this blog post consists of his presentation.

Good morning. I'm Mike Buchanan, leader of the political party Justice for Men & Boys (and the women who love them) – J4MB. We're an anti-feminist party because the only form of feminism of the slightest consequence in the UK over the past 30+ years has been radical feminism, a gender supremacy ideology driven by misandry (the hatred of men). I'm also the person behind a number of blogs:

Campaign for Merit in Business

The Anti-Feminism League

The Alternative Sexism Project

I've written nine books since 2008, four of them largely concerned with gender-related matters. The first was The Marriage Delusion: the fraud of the rings? – a review of the institution of marriage, which might explain the title and content of my final blog:

Men Shouldn't Marry

My last book FEMINISM: the ugly truth was published in 2012.

In this talk, when I refer to men's rights, please take that to include boys' rights too, depending on the context. I'll be using a few acronyms. In case anyone isn't familiar with them:

MRAs – Men's Rights Advocates, or Men's Rights Activists. They can, of course, be either men or women.
MRM – Men's Rights Movement
MGM – Male Genital Mutilation
FGM – Female Genital Mutilation

I've been deeply interested in gender politics for the past six years or so – far fewer years than many people here – but I've worked full-time in the area over those years, whether writing books or engaged in other activities. My talk will focus on the political struggle for men's rights, so I'll start with a few words about J4MB, the political party we launched over two and a half years ago. It remains the only political party in the English-speaking world fighting for the human rights of men and boys on many fronts.

While we believe there's considerable merit in challenging feminism as an ideology, we don't believe it can be destroyed as an ideology. We are, however, convinced it can be thwarted politically, and that's where our focus lies.

Since we launched the party in 2013 we've had over 100 appearances on mainstream radio and television – almost all of them are on our YouTube channel – and countless articles have been written about us. This is more mainstream media exposure than all other men's rights organizations have achieved collectively, and globally, over the past 40 years, although A Voice for Men, an American website, is by some distance the most-visited and most influential men's human rights advocacy website in the world. The J4MB website typically gets over 1,000 visitors a day.

I'd like to recommend the websites of two people who are with us today. The first is William Collins, whose website is, to my mind, the gold standard for concise, information-rich pieces relating to individual men's rights issues. We link to his pieces all the time. Then there's <name redacted>, who posts material under the pseudonym MrShadowfax42. He recently posted a priceless video of Adolf Hitler doubting his own insanity after being confronted with remarks made by Julie Bindel, a radical feminist.

I'd also like to recommend the website of Herbert Purdy, who unfortunately can't be with us today. His website is essential reading for anyone wishing to understand feminism, and its consequences.

When we launched J4MB I was confident it would be difficult to raise money. Men's rights organizations have a chequered history of being chronically under-funded. I was also sure it wouldn't be difficult to find people willing to stand as candidates at general elections.

I was wrong on both counts, as it happens. We had two or three donations on launch day, including £100 from a man in London who'd been following my earlier campaigns, but had never made a donation to them, nor made himself known to me. The party has been financially solvent from that day to this, and I'd like to thank <name redacted>, the Party Treasurer, for all his hard work.

We've had a shortage of suitable MRAs willing to stand as candidates, which I believe is a symptom of a wider problem of men's non-engagement at a practical and political level. I'll be talking about that shortly.

A few words on our strategy, which has evolved since the general election in May. We're now committed to challenging only the political party or parties in power at the time, because only they have the power to reduce or end the assaults on men's human rights. At the last general election we fielded two candidates, Ray Barry of Real Fathers for Justice and myself. At the 2020 general election we plan to field candidates in the seats which were the top 20 Tory marginal in 2015. We already have income streams in place to fund the £500 deposits of all 20 candidates in 2020, and I'm pleased to say 10 of those deposits are being funded by four party members who are here today. We want to pose a credible threat that if we get enough votes, or even deter enough people from voting Conservative, their prospects of re-election will be substantially reduced. I believe that's a very achievable objective.

I'd like to turn to the notion that MRAs are engaged in a culture war or gender war. There's a popular belief among MRAs that we're engaged in a war against feminism as an ideology, and feminists as individuals. But are we? I don't think we are, in any meaningful sense, and to explain that I'll do something I've never done in a talk before, which is to quote a radical feminist at length.

Two months ago the website The Conservative Woman published a piece I'd written about impending legislation which will require large firms to publish their 'gender pay gaps'. There are two radfems who regularly appear in the comments streams of many of the site's pieces, and the same was true here.

One was 'Fabian Solutions', who we and others refer to as Fabian Delusions. We had the usual terse exchange of comments, then she wrote the comments I'm about to read out. They closely echo what anti-feminist commentators such as Herbert Purdy have long been saying about the corruption and manipulation of institutions by feminists and progressives. This is what she wrote:

> You still don't get it, do you? You're trying to fight the culture war, but you don't realize you've already lost it and we progressives have won. I don't often say this to people, but I'm so certain of our absolute victory there's nothing to be lost from revealing a few things to you.
>
> The "Culture Wars" reached public attention in the 1960s, although the philosophical roots of the struggle had been fought for decades earlier. However, the 60s and 70s were the last period when the conservative movement still had a realistic chance to turn the tide, in Britain and the US.
>
> However, your key error was to fail to understand the bigger picture. You concentrated on the superficialities, like explicit pop lyrics and sex on TV, without realizing that the real underlying battle was taking place behind the scenes in the media, academia and political structures of the land. That is where we Feminists and progressives concentrated our efforts, with the long-term in mind.
>
> By the 1980s and 1990s, the effects of this were gradually being seen, as the pre-war generation retired and the baby boomer generation, which we had been able to reach out to with our radical ideas, began to take over > positions of influence. Social conservatism was still widespread, in the shape of Margaret Thatcher and Mary Whitehouse, but the tide was in our favour.

>
> By the 2000s, the progressive baby boomer generation was in charge and before long, virtually every former bastion of social conservatism was under our control. Even the Daily Telegraph and the military have fallen. The ease with which gay marriage was passed is proof of how powerful we progressives had become and how completely we now dominate every institution.
>
> I don't mean to sound triumphalist, but I actually feel excited about the next 50 years. With the reactionary and regressive force of social conservatism now expunged, the generation now at school will be the first one to live their lives with virtually no conservative influence whatsoever – with no prejudice about gay marriage, who are used to mothers working and earning more than men. The possibilities are endless.

It pains me to say this, but while she was triumphalist, she was broadly telling the truth. The institutional roots of the assaults on men's rights were being established at least 50 years ago. That said, I think she was being disingenuous in one important regard. While she presents this as a coalition of feminists and other 'progressives' against social conservatism, their real enemy was men and boys as a class. The culture war was a GENDER war, with many men on the side of the progressives and feminists.

Because the assaults on men's and boys' human rights are only getting worse, it's tempting to think that a gender war is still continuing. To my mind, though, a more useful way to think of it, is that these people won the war decades ago. Ever since then, they've been increasing the frequency and intensity of their assaults over the disadvantaged class – men and boys.

So if the gender war was lost decades ago, how might we describe the vast majority of MRAs? I think a military metaphor is appropriate here. The vast majority of MRAs are like the Japanese soldiers who survived in the jungles on Pacific islands after the end of World War 2, sometimes for decades.

> It's time for MRAs to accept the gender war was won by feminists long ago, to declare a new war, and fight it.

The idea that MRAs are currently fighting a war is a myth, let me turn to a second one. Decade after decade goes by in which MRAs devote their time and energy to contesting lying feminist narratives on the gender pay gap, domestic violence, fathers' access to children, FGM, and so much more. There's an underlying conviction that the use of facts and rational arguments are going to turn the tide. I've personally spent much of the past six years employing facts and rational arguments against feminist narratives.

Let's see how that approach has worked out in one key area. It's been known for decades that the number of male victims of domestic violence is comparable with the number of female victims. While most domestic violence has a degree of reciprocity, it's known that when the violence is one way, the abuser is more likely to be a woman than a man – and the highest rates of domestic violence are found among lesbian couples.

Decade after decade, campaigners for more support for male victims of domestic violence, and those men's children, have fought for much more support for those people, I'm sorry to say with little success. They employ facts and rational arguments, but the Home Office and other public bodies are riddled with professional feminists shaping agendas and policies, so virtually all support continues to go to female victims and their children.

I know of no examples from anywhere in the world, where facts and rational arguments have ended or even reduced states' assaults on the human rights of men. Not one. I like to use the metaphor of a speeding train representing the state's disadvantaging of men and boys, with train drivers representing politicians. The train needs to be stopped, clearly, but what are the vast majority of MRAs doing, metaphorically speaking? They're throwing tennis balls at the train, thinking that eventually, when they've thrown enough balls, the train will stop. It won't.

This is not to minimize the importance of facts and rational arguments. They're the bedrock from which we need to fight a new gender war, but they're not the weapons which will ultimately deliver victory.

Staying with the metaphor of a speeding train, J4MB's goal is clear. We plan to lay a damned great concrete slab on the rails, and give fair warning to train drivers – politicians – what lies ahead.

The new war for men's rights we must fight is a political war, because only politicians have the power to end the state's assaults on the human rights of men. We had in our recent general election manifesto 20 areas where the human rights of men and boys are assaulted by the actions and inactions of the state. I'll quickly take you through a selection of 10 of the areas:

1. Male Genital Mutilation, MGM – it's been illegal since at least 1861, over 150 years ago. It breaches numerous articles of UN and EU conventions. If anyone should doubt these assertions, I would refer them to a presentation given by James Chegwidden, a barrister, in 2013. MGM causes great damage to the physical and mental health of huge numbers of men globally, and none of the claimed benefits stand up to serious scrutiny. MGM will be our #1 campaigning issue for the foreseeable future. William Collins's piece on MGM is outstanding.

2. Fathers' access to children following family breakdowns. An area the general public understands and has sympathy with.

3. Education – Nicky Morgan, our Education Secretary, is also the Minister for Women & Equalities, and we know from an FOI request that her department has not the slightest interest in the gender gap in educational attainment, which has been around since the replacement of O Levels by GCSEs in the 1987/88 academic year, as William Collins explained in a blog piece. The introduction of continuous assessment in the GCSEs allowed teachers' pro-female bias to translate into higher marks for girls than boys, for the first time.

4. Employment. There are plenty of taxpayer-funded initiatives to encourage women into historically male-typical fields of work – £30 million on engineering alone – but none to encourage men into female-typical fields. All this despite the fact the male unemployment rate has been higher than the female unemployment rate for many years.

5. Domestic violence – there's virtually no support for male victims of domestic violence, and their children. The Home Office and other agencies are riddled with professional feminists from radical feminist organizations such as Women's Aid and Refuge.

6. Suicide – the leading cause of death of men under 50, in all age groups. The male suicide rate is now 3.5 times higher than the female suicide rate, that differential has more than doubled in 30 years. The government takes not the slightest interest in the matter.

7. Criminal justice system – 80,000 of the 84,000 people in prison today are men. We know from a piece by William Collins that if men were treated as leniently as women in sentencing terms, around 67,000 of the 80,000 men in prison today wouldn't be there. We raised this in a FOI request to Michael Gove, Justice Secretary, and the Ministry of Justice didn't even pretend to have the slightest interest in the matter.

8. Paternity fraud – a crime under the Fraud Act 2006, but the Crown never prosecutes, even when it knows the names and addresses of women seeking to commit the fraud, for example when the Child Support Agency (CSA) targets a man for child maintenance, he demands a paternity test, and is found not to be the father. Following a FOI request to the CSA, they admitted they'd learned of more than 500 new cases of attempted paternity fraud every year, for many years. God knows how many men simply assume they're the fathers of the children in question, when they're not. It must run into thousands of men every year taking on the financial burden of providing for children even though they aren't those children's biological fathers. Very often, for good measure, they'll be denied access to those children too.

9. Lack of anonymity for suspected sexual offenders. Overwhelming a problem for men, rather than women, of course. The criminal justice system rarely takes an interest in female sex offenders, unless they can be associated with male sex offenders, so the women can themselves be presented as victims. Sometimes, even then, they're not held accountable. We recently published a piece about a man who was frequently sexually abused by his father and his stepmother 30-40 years ago, usually in the context of threesomes, when he was between 7 and 14 years of age. His father later served a 7-year prison sentence. His stepmother admitted the offences in formal police interviews at the time, but she's never been charged.

10. Healthcare provision. As many men die from prostate cancer as women die from breast cancer. £350 million is spent every year on national screening programmes for female-specific cancers. There are no screening programmes for male-specific cancers.

I've only given you a few lines on each of the 10 areas, and we have another 10 areas in our manifesto, but it hopefully gives a sense of the HUGE forces stacked against men and boys. Politicians are against us, so are public bodies, the mainstream media, and even charities don't hold the government to account on men's issues. In seeking an end to MGM we're challenging the traditions of two major world religions, Judaism and Islam.

Let's turn to the response of MRAs to all these assaults. Where do MRAs devote their time and energy? The vast majority, it seems to me and others, do little or nothing other than online. But there's now so much material on men's rights on the internet, and so many MRAs engaged on matters like commenting online on mainstream media articles, that we've clearly hit the point of diminishing returns. I'd say we hit that point at least two years ago.

What very few MRAs are doing is engaging with the real world, in which the assaults on men's and boys' rights continue to worsen. And of those MRAs who DO engage with the real world, very few are involved in the political battle. All too often these real-world MRAs are single-issue people, lone wolves. In the wilderness lone wolves starve, but too many of these men simply won't make the effort to collaborate with others working on the same issues, let along different issues.

Let's return to the metaphor of a political war for men's rights, and let's consider people with an active interest in men's rights as constituting an army. Over 99% of the people in the men's rights army limit themselves to online activities, often anonymously. They're mostly engaged in challenging feminist narratives, challenging individual feminists, or outlining men's rights narratives. In line with the military metaphor, they're working in the Propaganda department. Let me repeat the point, because it's critical:

> Over 99% of the people working in the men's rights army are working in the Propaganda department.

Put another way, fewer than 1% of the people in the men's rights army are either fighting on the front line of the political war, or actively supporting those fighting on the front line. I ask you, how is that war going to go? Now, what would happen if even a small proportion of the people working in the Propaganda department started to fight on the front line, or actively supported those fighting there? It would surely change EVERYTHING. As an example, we could then hold street demonstrations at which we could expect THOUSANDS – maybe tens of thousands – of men and women to turn up. The mainstream media couldn't ignore that, even if it wanted to.

How would Britain look if we won our political battles, and the state's assaults on men's human rights ended? It would be a country in which male babies, infants, and children, no longer had their genitals mutilated because of the religion of their parents. Boys wouldn't be disadvantaged by the education system. Fathers would be assured of seeing their children after family breakdowns. Male victims of domestic violence – along with their children – would get the support they deserve. Men would be treated the same as women when it came to prison sentencing. Men would no longer be the victims of paternity fraud. There would, of course, be many other manifestations of living in a country which wasn't hostile to males from cradle to grave.

If you share this vision of a Britain in which the state doesn't assault men's and boys' human rights, I'd like to ask three things of you today:

> 1. If you're not already a party member, I would urge you to become one. It costs from only £5 a month, 16 pence per day.
>
> 2. Join us in a protest outside the Conservative party conference venue next Sunday, 4 October, and if you can manage it, the day after as well. We'll be supporting Patrick Smyth and others from Men Do Complain, an anti-MGM organization. These men have been putting themselves out there for years, and they REALLY deserve our support. If transport is a problem for you, email me, and I'll see if we get some car sharing going.
>
> 3. Consider becoming a candidate for J4MB at the 2020 general election. We've published our strategy for that election on our website. As I've already said, funding streams for all 20 candidates' £500 deposits are in place. We'll do all we can to support you with respect to literature costs, with respect to practical support and advice, and more.

Thank you.

Don’t try to be respectful to hypocritical bigots (video)

AVfM Video Source · 12 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

As more and more people become part of the Men’s Human Rights Movement, more and more come to the recognition that there is no point in trying to work with feminists, because feminism is bigotry and feminists are bigots. But we’ll let Felfop Returns explain it:

Good news for AVFM and the peanut gallery

Paul Elam · 13 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

A wise man once said, “Never respond to your critics.” Apparently wiser than me because it seems that I have spent so much time responding to critics that it has contributed to a lot of burnout which my activism (not to mention my ass) can ill afford.

Another wise man once said, “The lazy and inept are sadly burdened with a million unfulfilled ambitions.” OK, dammit, that was me but you got to admit it ain’t half bad.

Today, I have officially resigned from responding to peanut gallery activists (PGAs) who want to inform my leadership, tell me how AVFM “ought” to be run and especially those with an unending stream of things that others should be doing because they will not invest their effort, time, money or reputation in furthering their own ideas.

I have just finished about 36 hours of ignoring each and every PGA commenter I have encountered and for the first time in a week I copped a solid night’s sleep.

This is not a coincidence. I occasionally learn from history so I intend to follow through with that on what I will call a lifestyle basis. I will no longer answer critics or field questions from the Peanut Gallery. In fact, other than to support my peers I will be pretty much disappearing from responsive comments across the internet.

What I will do, in the very near future is establish a suggestion box open to AVFM subscribers. Those submitting those forms will get direct, personal answers.

If I see a non-subscribing PGA point worth considering or one I have not already answered a hundred time before, I will write an article or bulletin on it for the site.

That change will leave a bit of a gap (namely owed to the fact that there is at least .008 percent of PGA comments stumble accidently into articulating sound ideas, there is a need for someone to actually speak with them. There is also a need for someone to correct some of the crapola that PGAs are so prone to spew, so that no one sees their train wreck level of PGA conjecture go unanswered.

With this in mind, I have asked Suzanne McCarley to act as spokesperson for the AVfM Education, LLC CEO office. She has accepted. What this means is that when PGAs come to the comments with their brilliant ideas du jour on how we can “really” serve the men’s movement, Suz will be my eyes, ears, mouth and fingers.

Let me give you an example of why I trust her with this position (setting aside the fact that she has been a dogged, hard-working AVFM volunteer for years). The following PGA diatribe comes from a recent bulletin regarding one of our bombastic departures from AVFM.

M.G. How • 8 hours ago

> I’m looking at Paul’s response article (the other one, not this one) along with Attila’s post. I’m not going to comment on the articles but instead I’m going to make a few suggestions.
>
> 1. A person doesn’t pull this kind of stunt without vitriolic provocation, which I’m very inclined to think came from AVFM’s end (Paul’s article’s records are less recent than Attila’s). Paul, Attila’s suggestion of letting someone else be the CEO/lead is good advice, regardless of the situation. Stop using an LLC. Fully incorporate AVFM. Set up shares. Make yourself a majority shareholder. Have writers on a contract basis. Let other people be ‘CEO’ to prevent burnout. You’ve clearly been suffering from burnout for the last year or so.
>
> If you want to avoid taxation for the activism activities, set-up a separate non-profit for the activists. That way their blunders aren’t yours. Get the non-profit a charity number for tax exemptions. Do business through the non-profit to get services at lower-than-usual prices. Have the non-profit hire the incorporation for social> media outreach of events and consultations. Thus a much cleaner divide of liability, responsibility, and ownership.

>
> 2. AVFM should not try to set-up conferences or symposiums on their own. Instead look at supporting organizations for help, and try to associate with a conference under someone else's direction. New Male Studies comes to mind. Get someone from the academic circles to direct the conference. The conferences might end up being located in Australia and New Zealand instead of the States or Canada, but the operating budget will be lower. Another option would be giving Father's-Rights / Shared-Parenting organizations a conference to give workshops (maybe get their lawyers to set-up the incorporation in return for ownership / shares and a medium to have advert-articles to raise awareness through).
>
> Or even just set-up workshops in Education / Teachers conferences.
>
> 3. AVFM should stop pursuing Attila on social media (which I see this article is sort of saying). Your pursuit is only going to affect Attila's future job prospects, potentially affect his child custody agreement (likely why he's so provoked), and open AVFM to legal and reputation complications. Settle the issue in court. If it's indeed a private issue not including AVFM, then let the individuals settle it in court. As far as I can tell, all of these claims are bullocks until someone sends a letter from their lawyer.
> 4. Please get a CRO or Risk Manager for AVFM. You guys need one to keep yourselves honest with one another, and also to deal with safety concerns at MHRM events.
>
> Cheers,

Personally, had I responded to this, it would have been after reading half of it, rolling my eyes and inviting M.G. How to have very rough sex with himself. I had planned to ignore it.

To my (not so big) surprise, Suz responded to him in much better fashion than I would have. Take a look at Suz's calm, deliberateness and knowledge of both me and AVFM in her response.

> driversuz Mod M.G. How • 8 hours ago

> 1. We have been researching the options for years now, and the LLC gives us the most flexibility, control and freedom.

> 2. While nothing is set in stone, that's probably the general direction we are heading.

> 3. We did not pursue Mr. V; it was absolutely necessary for us to respond to his pursuit of us. His own actions are what will affect his future; that's the way it's supposed to be.

> 4. AVfM's management team is a CRO. You have no idea what goes in to the decisions Paul makes. If you knew you'd be impressed, and likely dumbfounded. With his team-building skills and management instincts, if Paul's life ambition was to be wealthy, he'd be among the richest men on this planet. Surely you don't think AVfM has survived this long, under tremendous pressure from all sides, by happenstance?

> 5. Are you volunteering your money, time and expertise? If you're any good we can use your assistance. Or > you could just start your own organization and implement your ideas there.

So it boils down to some simple math. I have an organization to run. I have a huge anti-circumcision project to launch. I am also writing a novel. With an asset like Suz McCarley willing to take over these kinds of inquiries I will get a lot more done in other areas feeling absolute confidence in her abilities to speak for me in these situations. I look forward to the time that I can forget about comments everywhere.

All this being said, mind you, AVFM staff are not PGAs. They will maintain in direct contact with me through the standard internal channels already established. The same for others from outside agencies and the press. Suz's new position as AVFM's Executive Liaison means that she will monitor comments across the internet and answer in my stead, freeing me up for other work. She will be able to link back to this bulletin as needed to help people understand.

Oh, and the "Suz didn't tell me what I wanted to hear so I am writing you emails will be answered only with a link to this bulletin, followed by hitting the trash button in my email options. There will be no splitting.

For anyone having ill feelings about this, I remind you that some time ago that AVFM management was determined to make the site more user friendly for known activists and supporters, less friendly (read hostile) to PGAs and their whiney cousins.

True AVFM supporters we all in favor of that and I anticipate they will feel this same about this move, too.

Thanks for reading and supporting. If there are any questions, Suz will answer them.

Mathematics of Feminism: Women as a class

August Løvenskiolds · 13 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Feminism can be perplexing to many because the terms feminists use can be ill-defined, and feminists use language in imprecise, confused even contradictory ways. Terms like "women as a class," when compared to just saying "women," can be really tricky.

For example, consider the recent "listicle" (list / article portmanteau) by trans-exclusive radical feminist Meghan Murphy, a Canadian ginger. According to Murphy, she has identified "nine actual things that really do make you a better feminist than everybody else:"

In point number 1 of her listicle, Murphy posited the gender stereotype that "Being a women," and not being a man, makes a person a better feminist:

> Being a women is central to being a feminist because feminism is a movement that is by and for women.

Yet, in her very next point 2, Murphy asserts that gender stereotypes (like "women make better feminists") are BAD – so bad that using them disqualifies one as a feminist.

> If you think that objectifying women or street harassment or male entitlement or gender stereotypes or sexualizing violence against women is good and ok, you aren't a feminist. [Emphasis added.]

One can only conclude that, by her own standards, Murphy is not a feminist.

One might claim that my precision in using Murphy's own statements is overly intellectual and that we should appreciate Murphy's passion and not criticize her obvious screw up. Unfortunately for Murphy, her point 3 is cutting out this anti-intellectualist bullshit:

> OMG you guys! Thinking is not a bad thing. Of course you don't need a degree to do feminism, sheesh. But, by the same token, all this "Fuck yer ivory tower ideology fuck theory fuck yeah" stuff is counterproductive and ignorant.

Poor dear. Not only is she not a feminist by her own standards but she demands that we use her standards in a rigorous way to frame her ideology and define feminism!

> There is no activism without ideology. Ideology is the body of ideas that frames a political movement. We need that, otherwise how the fuck do we know what we're doing?

Not only is Murphy not feminist at all, but she doesn't know what she is doing.

"Women as a class"

To qualify and quantify how "women" and feminism are related, Murphy uses a variety of terms from mathematics to describe collections of individual women, including:

- "women are the group of humans who are oppressed under patriarchy, as a class," (Notice that if "patriarchy hurts men," as feminists claim sometimes, then men are women!)
- "Empowerment, in the context of feminism, means social empowerment for a group of marginalized people (in this case, women)."
- "posing nude and feeling sexy in a fashion or porn magazine might feel good for the individual doing it (they will receive positive reinforcement, feel attractive, profit financially, etc.) but does not constitute > "empowerment" as it does not lift up women as a class."

What is "women as a class"? The term "women" itself is a collective term that includes all human females (sometimes as adults, but not always), so Murphy's repeated references to "women as a class" is either a sloppy redundancy or indicative of some other factor that Murphy does not define. This other factor might well be the Marxist-inspired idea of a "class struggle" but even then we are left to wonder how a "class of women" is distinctly different from just "women".

Murphy further argued that feminism is not about helping individual women or even subsets (groups of individuals identified as "woman") but rather advancing (lifting) women as a class. If we are to help "women as a class" rather than just help women individually, we need to know what exactly this "class of women" is!

In my work as an MRA I seek to bring legal equality to all people and so I don't often have to distinguish between women and men in any formal way – I have an instinct of the differences in men and women, I care about both men and women, but not "men as a class" nor "women as a class" exclusively. Degenderizing laws is enough for me:

- All people, not just men, should be subject to the military draft (or equally free from it);
- "Selective Service" shouldn't be "selective" at all; if it exists and is forced on men as a class, it should be forced on women as a class as well.
- Forced circumcision should be eliminated for everyone, not just "women as a class".
- All parents should have parental rights that do not depend on one's gender or class.
- Laws that excuse people from parental obligations (abortion, adoption, child surrender, child financial support, and so on) should be the same regardless of gender or class.
- Exposing one's chest in public should be equally legal, or illegal, for everyone.

While MRAs seek legal gender equality and thus do not need to care about splitting genders into classes, feminists purport to support gender equality but are keenly insistent that only women "as a class", but not men, deserve equality.

Now, what is a class, in a formal sense?

A class is a set (collection) of things (in this case, people) who can be uniquely defined by a property that all its members share. It follows that, if we can define "women as a class," we mean ALL women who have the "woman property" and NOT one woman alone, nor some smaller set of women, nor the "not women" – men.

Now, what property makes a person a woman? Is this woman-property found in genetics, body type, brain type, mental image, or is it malleable and subject to individual whim? To be unique and unambiguous, a women class property must define all women and only women.

We might think we know what a woman is, but our instincts for this woman-property can fall apart when examined in detail.

In genetics, a human woman is distinguished from a man in that a woman has a double-X chromosome (denoted XX) and a man has a pair of chromosomes (denoted XY). Is this genotype unique enough to be a "woman property" that defines "woman as a class" for feminists?

Unfortunately, it is not: some people have chromosomal abnormalities but are still referred to as women, such as, people with Turner Syndrome, who have only a lone X chromosome (genotype XO, where "O" indicates one chromosome is missing or damaged) and are usually referred to as women even though they might also be viewed, logically, as "men" who are missing the Y chromosome (which would be also genotype XO).

One may also have three chromosomes (XXY), Klinefelter's syndrome. These people are usually referred to as men even though they could be viewed as XX women with an extra Y chromosome.

As a practical matter, the woman-property is usually conferred at birth based on "phenotype": the way the body is constructed. The woman phenotype has a vagina and no penis nor testicles; the male phenotype has a penis and testicles and no vagina. Unfortunately, this property is also imperfect as a woman-property; in genetic XY men with androgen insensitivity syndrome, some people called women are born with a vagina and no penis but they have men's genetics and internal testicles instead of ovaries.

A variety of intersexual conditions exist in human society members and this means that our notion of the usual man or woman binary is imperfect and therefore, suspect. Some people will "identify" with a gender that is in contradiction to their genotype, phenotype, or both.

In addition, some people will try to transition from one gender identification to another. These "trans" people are a huge, ongoing and unsolvable problem for feminists seeking to define "women as a class." They are no problem for MRAs like me who work for equal rights for all people regardless of gender.

Feminists who reject intersexuals or trans woman as members of "women as a class" are known as "Trans Exclusive Radical Feminists," or TERFs for short. Although there are people who claim to be trans inclusive radical feminists (TIRFs) they are not as common as TERFs and are often frozen out of radical feminist discourse. Radical feminists often use as standard the woman property called "women born women" – women who appeared to have a vagina at birth, and still imagine themselves to be women throughout their lives.

Of course, one could just ask a feminist what his or her idea of a unique woman-property is but feminists dismiss such questions with the angry rejoinder that it is not their job to educate you (even though it is the job of an ideologue to explain their ideology clearly).

To be a feminist, or support feminism, one must work to improve the lives of "women as a class" (woman born women). Dictionary definitions that equate feminists with gender equality are flawed in that they do not reflect the feminist preoccupation with supporting women ONLY – woman as a class – and they do not give reliable definitions of women as a class.

Even feminist Emma Watson's famous UN speech – that suggested feminism was also to help men achieve gender equality – was a bait-and-switch lie: both the phrase "he for she" and the one-sided pledge of her movement make it clear that men's issues are not relevant to feminist work.

Indeed, if you work to advance yourself as a woman, or your woman friends, or the women of your country, or even women in your hemisphere, you are NOT a feminist because feminists only support women as a class – or so Meghan Murphy claims.

Consider alleged feminist victories like women's suffrage and legal abortion. A lot of women opposed women's suffrage because at the time suffrage was linked to the military draft and few, if any, women want to be drafted against their will. Since suffrage did not help these women, it did not help women as a class. Likewise, legal abortion does not help women-identified fetuses in the womb; it kills them. Again, this feminist "triumph" was not feminist at all because it did not help women as a class.

Is there anything that will both bring gender equality AND help lift "women as a class"? If gender is fluid – as some feminists claim – shouldn't feminists actively work to lift women by lifting men?

I invite feminists to propose a change that will both bring gender equality AND help lift "women as a class." But don't be surprised if they have it dead wrong – as usual.

After completing the above article, I learned that Playboy Magazine, which pioneered the regular publication of nude, beautiful images of women, will stop showing nudity. Despite feminists' opposition to pornography, the attractiveness of women's bodies is a titanic source of power for women as a class. Additionally, the rise of Playboy helped trigger 2nd wave feminism – Playboy supported equal rights for women for decades.

If feminists were serious about empowering women, they would be storming the gates of the Playboy mansion, demanding the resurrection of the centerfold Playmate of the Month.

Seeking equality – Is feminism a help or a hindrance?

Yasmine Grey · 14 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Publisher's note: Most AVFM readers will find nothing especially new in this article by Yasmine Grey. It is nonetheless remarkable in that it was originally published in an online magazine for teen readers, the Teen Gazette.

We all know that hateful feminist ideologues are now targeting children and teens with their caustic message. It is much appreciated to see that Grey has fired some balanced counter-theory in to the mix. PE

Feminism is the foremost movement in our society claiming to seek equality. We've heard actors[1] and actresses[2] come out as feminists; we've seen politicians wearing 'this is what a feminist looks like' t-shirts[3]; we've seen Emma Watson get up and speak at the UN about how feminism just seeks equality at the launch of #HeForShe[4].

But for all its popularity, is feminism actually making us more equal? Do feminists really seek equality? Polls of the public show that nearly everybody favours equality of the sexes, but only a minority – less than a fifth – identify themselves as feminists[5]. So it seems there's more to our perception of feminism than the mere definition would imply. Let's take a look at some of the areas where feminism departs from its stated goal of seeking equality.

Consider violence. The issue of violence against women has been prominent in the media for years, with daily articles across the globe addressing the topic[6]. It can be broken down into many areas – domestic violence, sexual violence, street violence, FGM – and feminists claim primacy in the fight against all of them. But reducing violence against women specifically can only be part of a fight for equality if women are at particular risk of violence. Let's break it down.

The term 'domestic violence' is often used to denote a subsection of violence against women, the definition of which is legally informed by the feminist-created Duluth model in most countries[7]. This model considers violence a consequence of patriarchy, directed always at women, by men. But this doesn't hold up to the statistics. Most domestic violence is reciprocal, with both partners hurting each other. When the violence is unilateral, it is women who are aggressing 70% of the time[8]. Let me put it clearly: women abuse their partners more than men do, at least in the west (a fact that holds true for homosexual couples too[9]). Given this, is focusing solely on female victims likely to end domestic violence? Is the Duluth model likely to be useful for the police and courts when the theory doesn't match up to reality?

Sexual violence is again considered to be a realm where women are the victims of men, and feminists campaign to stop rape via the education of boys and young men, teaching them about consent and 'male entitlement'. But the evidence for this approach is built on fatally faulty assumptions. Women are only the primary victims of rape when rape is defined as non-consensual penetration of the victim, as it is in many legal jurisdictions. When we instead consider the layman's use of the word rape to mean someone who is made to have sex that they didn't consent to (thus including cases where a woman forces a man to penetrate her), the balance shifts. In the USA, the rates of rape by this definition are nearly identical, with 1,270,000 women experiencing attempted or completed rape every year, and 1,267,000 men being 'made to penetrate' in the same time span[10]. That's less than a 1% difference in the rate of rape of men and women in America. And in the rest of the world? Well, among a large international study of heterosexual couples, 2.8% of men and 2.2% of women reported being forced to have sex with their partner[11]. Is ignorance about consent and patriarchal entitlement to women's bodies causing women to rape men? Or is the feminist model wrong, once again?

Genital cutting of girls is illegal in most countries[12], and feminists rightly campaign to stop female genital mutilation happening anywhere in the world, as it violates their right to bodily integrity. But girls are not the only ones getting cut. Boys frequently experience genital cutting, and male circumcision of underage boys is not outlawed anywhere in the world. This hardly needs explanation: in an equal society, cutting infants' genitals should be equally legal or illegal. The feminist rhetoric of 'my body, my choice' should apply to men just as much as women, and it is shameful that many feminists refuse to condemn male genital mutilation as they do FGM.

In fact, it is worth noting that violence in general – in homes, in the street, and most especially in war[13] – is directed mainly at men. Women famously fear walking alone more than men do, despite being around half as likely as a man to be the victim of a violent crime at the hands of a stranger (or non-stranger, for that matter)[14]. Why encourage this fear? Feminist campaigns such as 'take back the night' ignore the fact that women are not in particular danger. Would it not be more productive to warn men of the dangers they face, and treat violence as everybody's problem, not just women's?

Moving on from outright brutality, there are other, softer issues. 'We need more women in STEM' is another feminist call which is over simplified. It is true that women tend not to study or work in 'nerdy' fields. However, the feminist claim that this is due to sexism and that it should be fixed with aggressive promotion of girls into STEM subjects, quotas in higher education, or female-biased hiring policies needs closer scrutiny. For one thing, school education currently favours girls hugely, with girls outperforming boys in every subject, all around the world[15]. For the first time, boys are performing poorly, and in fact even young boys now believe themselves to be less intelligent than girls, with corresponding impacts on their grades[16]. This trend continues on into higher education as well, with more women attending university worldwide[17]. So why are women still less common in STEM? Put bluntly, it's because they don't like the subjects as much. There's an interesting trend where more developed, 'equal' countries exhibit greater gendering in choice of university subjects and careers.[18]

Feminists have succeeded in convincing people we need more women in STEM, to the point that there's now a 2-to-1 hiring bias in favour of women in such fields in the west[19]. And still, in the freest countries on earth, with cash incentives in place, women are choosing not to go into STEM. Is it perhaps time we considered whether the disparity is down to something other than oppression, and start putting our resources towards the broader issue of male underachievement in education generally?

There certainly are issues facing women in some countries, and these need addressing in the name of equality. However, women's issues are far from the only issues, and western feminism's focus on ladies alone has leeched energy and funding away from finding actual equality. By diverting attention to issues which don't exist, or are sometimes the opposite of what is claimed, feminism is no longer fighting for equality in many of the areas we assume it is. Far from redressing a balance, it may even be tipping the scales to leave men and boys behind. As lovers of equality, we should consider very carefully the messages we're given, and take care not to be pulled in by a feminist narrative which appears to have an underlying bias towards seeing only those problems which affect women.

References:

1 http://www.ellentv.com/2014/01/09/joseph-gordon-levitt-on-being-a-feminist/

2 http://www.wonderlandmagazine.com/2015/02/kristen-stewart-cover-story/

3 http://www.telegraph.co.uk/news/politics/11203718/Feminist-t-shirts-worn-by-Ed-Miliband-and-Nick-Clegg-allegedly-made-by-women-in-poverty.html

4 https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=v6XTx2Rg04g

5 http://www.vox.com/2015/4/8/8372417/feminist-gender-equality-poll

6 https://www.google.co.uk/webhp?sourceid=chrome-instant&ion=1&espv=2&ie=UTF-8#q=violence+against+women&tbm=nws

7 https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Duluth_model

8 http://ajph.aphapublications.org/doi/abs/10.2105/AJPH.2005.079020

9 http://www.cdc.gov/ViolencePrevention/pdf/NISVS_SOfindings.pdf

10 http://www.cdc.gov/ViolencePrevention/pdf/NISVS_Report2010-a.pdf

11 http://pubpages.unh.edu/~mas2/ID45-PR45.pdf

12 http://www.ebmcdn.net/prb/html/prb-fgmc-012909/index.html

13 http://www.telegraph.co.uk/men/thinking-man/10752232/Our-attitude-to-violence-against-men-is-out-of-date.html

14 http://www.bjs.gov/content/pub/pdf/cv03.pdf

15 http://www.telegraph.co.uk/education/11364130/Girls-do-better-than-boys-at-school-despite-inequality.html

16 http://onlinelibrary.wiley.com/doi/10.1111/cdev.12079/abstract

17 http://www.uis.unesco.org/Education/Documents/unesco-world-atlas-gender-education-2012.pdf

18 https://youtu.be/l3JuaIg99X0

19 http://www.pnas.org/content/112/17/5360.abstract

Why if you don't want kids, don't have sex is a terrible argument

Greg Santos · 14 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

It seems that whenever people bring up the term 'reproductive rights', the spotlight shifts onto women's reproductive rights, and men's are ignored. For example, when I debated Kevin Logan on whether women are still disadvantaged in modern society. Of course, he gave generic answers, nothing I hadn't heard several times before, "Wage Gap," "Rape Culture", and more generic feminist responses. It seemed that the overall opinion of viewers was that I was victorious in the debate, as even a few of Kevin Logan's subscriber's pointed out how almost all of his 'debate' on Rape Culture was a long list of concessions.

In all fairness to Kevin, although I disagreed with him on several points, he for the most part made sense. His arguments, though in my opinion incorrect, were based off of statistical errors or misunderstandings rather than off of prejudice and misandry. He didn't seem to have any issues of self-hatred, and seemed to genuinely believe what he was saying, which is more than can be said for many male feminists.

However, there was one issue that really struck a nerve with me, and is continuing to make my brain fizz out from the stupidity of the opposing argument. That is, of course, the aforementioned reproductive rights.

In the video, Kevin states that women are being oppressed because people are trying to take away their reproductive rights in countries like Poland, Ireland, and the United States. While it is true that there are people trying to take away reproductive rights, it isn't oppressive to women.

Yes, not being able to get an abortion sucks. I support the right for women to get an abortion, and I support the free distribution of birth control to those who can't afford it. However, the fact that women aren't receiving these services isn't a case of sex based oppression, for the simple reason that men aren't receiving these benefits either.

Whenever I bring up men's reproductive rights, there's always a misunderstanding that I want fathers to be able to force the mother to get an abortion. This is simply not the case. There are plenty of legal alternatives that could create a similar alternative to abortion. For example, a legal Paternal Surrender, in which if the father requests an abortion and the mother refuses, he can fill out the paperwork to make the child not officially his. Sounds reasonable, right?

Well, when you bring up the idea of Paternal Surrender, also known as a Paper Abortion, you will receive looks of disgust, as if you're the worst possible human on the planet for even suggesting that fathers should have the same reproductive rights that mothers have.

The left and the right will collectively gasp at this suggestion. After all, rights are for humans, and men aren't humans, right?

The neo-conservative morons will give some rambling sentence about how "deadbeat dads are going to destroy family values" or some other synonymous buzzword. Meanwhile, the left will shit out something about how men having the same rights as women is "misogynistic" because…reasons.

However, the most infuriating argument you will hear will be a bipartisan one.

"If you don't want kids, you shouldn't have sex."

This argument, which led to the tremendous failure known as "abstinence only education." The argument of abstinence as birth control is a ridiculous denial of human nature, believing that you can socialize humans out of wanting to fuck through corny "educational films from the early 90s.

Of course, there's also the infuriating double standard regarding the gender of the unwilling parent. If a man feels he isn't prepared to be a father and chooses to not have a kid, he's a deadbeat, a cast-out of society, a drain on the system, and the parent at fault for any problems that the child will face growing up with a single parent. Modern society has this strange idea that "deadbeat dads" are off living the good life, smoking pot on some

Caribbean beach surrounded by expensive prostitutes and sipping luxury rum from a coconut, while the mother slaves away trying to support her kid all by herself, however, this couldn't be lessA John Hopkin's University study found that Low-Income fathers, the majority of child support payers, pay for the child, on average, as much as the mother does. The difference? Fathers tend to provide this money through food, clothes, and gifts, rather than through direct cash deposits. There's one myth expelled.

For one, most of them aren't off having fun and pretending their kids don't exist.

A 2001 Urban Institute study found that of the 7 million fathers who didn't pay child support each year, 2.5 million simply didn't have enough money to pay for the child support payments in addition to necessary living expenses (i.e. food, utilities, rent, etc.) While that is already a large percentage of child support payers who simply can't afford the bill, the number has likely grown in recent years. In 2001, when the study was created, the poverty rate was 12.2%. More recently, 15% of Americans are impoverished despite the fact that the definition of poverty was much more conservatively used in 2010 than in 2001.

There's two myths dispelled.

So, what should you take from that data? So called deadbeat dads are often as impoverished as the mother's are, and can't afford to raise children or pay for another to raise children. Why is it that when fathers demand the equal ability to raise their kids, the argument is considered so ludicrous by both the liberals and conservatives.

The simple answer is, the idea of men being given the same rights as women is considered ludicrous. The idea that women shouldn't be given preferential treatment just because of how they were born is considered ludicrous. The idea that men are human beings who need to take care of themselves and don't live to serve the needs of others is considered ludicrous.

Criminalizing seduction: the crime of men seducing women

Douglas Galbi · 14 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The vastly disproportionate incarceration of men relative to women results in part from anti-men sex discrimination in the administration of criminal justice. Anti-men sex bias is also built into criminal law itself. A stark example is criminalizing men seducing women. Criminalizing seduction hasn't criminalized women seducing men. Moreover, men historically have been highly disproportionately burdened with the role of soliciting amorous relationships. Even if seduction law were facially gender-neutral, criminalizing seduction would have a greatly disparate impact on men. Initiatives to criminalize "rape by deception" function similarly to laws criminalizing seduction.[1] In a society that truly values equal justice under law, men seducing women shouldn't be a crime.

Since late in the nineteenth century, men seducing women has been a crime in jurisdictions covering almost all the U.S. population. While statutory and case law varies, the crime of seduction has been generally understood as:

> the act of a male person in having intercourse with a woman of chaste character under the promise of marriage, or by the use of enticement or persuasion. [2]

Seduction typically has been a felony offense. Some criminal codes criminalized seduction more broadly. The Michigan criminal code currently states:

> Any man who shall seduce and debauch any unmarried woman shall be guilty of a felony, punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not more than 5 years or by fine of not more than 2,500 dollars; but no prosecution shall be commenced under this section after 1 year from the time of committing the offense. [3]

Between 2002 and 2008, more than 30 men were convicted in Michigan for this felony crime of seduction.

Only men can be guilty of the crime of seduction. Women's sexual allure and seductive power is pervasively presented in popular media. Nonetheless, the crime of seduction is explicitly limited to men seducing women. Legal scholars, even within our current culture of intense concern about gender, tend to take for granted sex discrimination in considering seduction and rape. Anti-men gender bias in defining crimes of seduction and rape probably reflects in part gender stereotyping from the vast over-representation of men among incarcerated persons. That anti-men gender bias is also consistent with the devaluation of damages to men from forced financial fatherhood that can arise from seduction and rape.

Criminalizing men seducing women has centered on men seducing women with promises of marriage. In the crime of seduction, the element "promise to marry" is merely seductive speech. Issues of due consideration, meeting of minds, legally relevant intent, and formal contracting don't figure in courts considering men's seductive promises to marry. A man might verbally promise to marry in the heat of passionate embrace. That's much different from a promise to marry in a formal engagement ceremony. A man might promise to marry and then change his mind. Yet under laws criminalizing men seducing women, only the man's expressed promise to marry is significant. The criminalization of seduction under "promise to marry" is criminalization of men's seductive speech, not criminalization of men breaking a legally cognizable commitment to marry.

The criminalization of men seducing women has in some jurisdictions encompassed a broad range of men's sexual expression. In a 1904 case before the Supreme Court of Washington, a man was accused of seducing a woman of age twenty-one. The man had been visiting the woman twice a week at her father's house. After about eight months of such courtship, the man proposed marriage, and the woman accepted. They agreed to a marriage date two years in the future. Immediately after the marriage had been set, the man solicited sex from the woman. She refused for a week or two. The man told her that if she got pregnant, he would marry her right away. They then frequently had consensual sex. About four months later, the woman recognized that she was pregnant. She told the man to marry her immediately. He refused. He then was charged with seduction. The Washington statute stated:

> If any person seduce and debauch any unmarried woman of previously chaste character, he shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary not more than five years, or by fine not exceeding one thousand dollars and imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding one year. If before judgment upon an indictment the defendant marry the woman thus seduced, it is a bar to any further prosecution for the offense. [4]

The question before the Supreme Court was whether the man had seduced the woman to whom he was engaged. The Court reasoned:

> The word 'seduce,' in this statute, is used in its ordinary legal meaning, and implies the use of arts, persuasion, or wiles to overcome the resistance of the female who is not disposed of her own volition to step aside from the path of virtue. No doubt, the most common method of enticing an unmarried, virtuous woman from rectitude is by promises of marriage; but there are other arts, wiles, and promises which may be made, and which may be acted upon by a virtuous woman. If our statute had intended to limit seduction only to those cases where there was a promise of marriage, it would have said so, as has been done in other states. Not having said so, we must conclude that any seductive arts or promises, where the female involuntarily and reluctantly yields thereto, are sufficient {for finding a man having committed the crime of seduction}. [5]

The Court thus upheld convicting the man for seduction. Under the Court's definition of the crime of seduction, a large share of men have, at some point in their lives, been guilty of the felony crime of seduction.

Seduction law in action underscores the anti-men gender bias in criminal law. Seduction statutes specify men as offenders and women as victims. Requirements in statutes that women be "of chaste character" have little significance to actual judicial rulings. Requirements for corroborating testimony are eviscerated in practice.[6] The claim "he promised to marry me" essentially serves as a potent legal weapon for women. A woman could easily summon criminal punishment upon a man with whom she had sex and who wouldn't marry her. "Shotgun marriage" isn't a hillbilly institution; men have commonly been forced into marriage by criminal law. More recent laws force financial fatherhood on men, with the threat of imprisonment even in the absence of counsel. Those laws reflect the same structure of gynocentrism.

In response to criminally charging a man with seducing a woman, marriage between them served as an alternative to incarceration in shackling the man's bodily self-possession. In the U.S. about 1965, thirty-seven states encompassing 83% of the U.S. population had explicit statutory law criminalizing a man seducing a woman (the crime of seduction). Marriage was a recognized legal defense in thirty-one of those states.[7] The Court of Appeals of Kentucky in 1894 explained Kentucky's seduction statute:

> It seeks to provide for the woman and her issue, if any. It cares not for the man, except to punish him; and the punishment prescribed is to force him to keep his promise, rather than go to the penitentiary. [8]

Some seduction statutes explicitly stated that the charge of seduction was merely suspended pending the man serving a given number of years of marriage. In Georgia, a man charged with seducing a woman had to serve five years of marriage before his seduction charge would be dismissed. In addition, he was required to post a bond for the financial support of his wife and any children.[9] Reviewing a seduction case, the Harvard Law Review in 1903 declared:

> Even as a matter of policy, however, it seems questionable whether the subsequent marriage should be treated as an absolute defense {to the crime of a man seducing a woman}; for the end desired would seem to be more effectively reached by merely refraining from the prosecution in cases where the defendant was willing in good faith to fulfill his marital obligations, still reserving the power to prosecute where, as in the principal case, the defendant has gone through the form of marriage merely to escape responsibility. [10]

In the shadow of the law, many men undoubtedly married women to avoid a charge of seduction and a potential felony sentence to incarceration.

Crimes of seduction and "rape by deception" support dominant public practices of bodily dispossessing men. The most prevalent, state-institutionalized practices of bodily dispossession are compulsory military service and incarceration. Conscription and related practices, e.g. U.S. Selective Service registration, explicitly target men for bodily dispossession. Criminal justice around the world highly disproportionately incarcerates men. Under the currently dominant understanding of rape, highly authoritative, scientific surveys indicate that more women rape men than men rape women. Men being seduced by women and men being raped by women are nonetheless largely matters of laughter, scorn, and denial. The definitions of crimes reflect deeply entrenched anti-men bias in public concern about bodily self-possession.[11]

Notes:

[1] Anglo-American common law historically hasn't criminalized rape by deception, with two exceptions. A man impersonating a woman's husband in order to have consensual sex with her has been legally defined as rape. A doctor having sex with a woman by claiming that sex to be a medical treatment has also been legally defined as rape. Rubenfeld (2013) pp. 1395-7.

Legal scholars and criminalization activists have for decades been pushing to expand criminalization of rape by deception. In recent years, U.S. colleges and universities have been enacting new sex regulations that greatly expand the definition of sex crimes. Id. Consider the symbolic violence against men in this statement in a scholarly article published in 2005:

> The belief that male aggression and female passivity in the sex act comprise moments of seduction instead of coercion is one of several rape myths that effectively equates consent with its opposite.

That sentence ends with a footnote citing a statement in a 1995 scholarly article:

> It may not be that rape is forced seduction but that seduction is a subtler form of rape.

Donovan (2005) p. 63, with footnote quoting a scholarly article published in 1995.

[2] Humble (1921) pp. 144-5. In 1962, the Proposed Official Draft of the Model Penal Code declared:

> A male who has intercourse with a female not his wife … is guilty of an offense if … the other person is a female who is induced to participate by a promise of marriage which the actor does not mean to perform.

Quoted in Wadlington (1967) p. 192. Anti-men sex discrimination has long characterized both the definition of rape and adjudication of rape claims.

[3] Michigan Penal Code § 750.532. College sex crime tribunals don't typically impose a time limit on allegations. In response to a two-year-old complaint of non-consensual sexual contact, Brandeis University placed the accused student on "emergency suspension," tarred him with a guilty finding in a travesty of fair process, and on that finding issued him a "Disciplinary Warning" that became part of his academic record.

[4] Washington Criminal Code, Section 7066, 2 Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St., cited in State v. O'Hare (1904), 68 L.R.A. 107, 36 Wash. 516, 79 P. 39.

[5] State v. O'Hare (1904), 68 L.R.A. 107. The Supreme Court of Iowa declared that to seduce (in the context of criminalizing men seducing women) means "to draw away from the path of rectitude and duty in any manner, by flattery, promises, bribes, or otherwise." The Supreme Court declared that allegation of specific seductive acts isn't necessary to support a charge of seduction against a man. Brown v. Kingsley, 38 Iowa 220 (1874). The Supreme Court of Iowa subsequently found that a man obtaining sex by means of "caresses and flatteries" had thereby committed the crime of seduction. Hawn v. Banghart, 39 N.W. 251, 14 Am.St.Rep. 261 (1888). The judicial intent seems to have been to punish a man for sex likely to be subject to popular disapproval.

Blackstone noted that Roman law criminalized a man consensually eloping with a woman. The man faced the penalty of death for that crime. The woman who consensually eloped with the man wasn't subject to criminal charges. With a wryness that eludes modern misandristic legal scholarship, Blackstone observed:

> our English law does not entertain quite such sublime ideas of the honour of either sex as to lay the blame of a mutual fault upon one of the transgressors only; and therefore makes it a necessary ingredient in the crime of rape that it must be against the woman's will.

Blackstone (1769 / 1908) Bk. 4, Ch. 15, Sec. III. Blackstone under-estimated modern ideology for criminalizing men. Under the U.S. Mann Act of 1910 ("White-Slave Traffic Act"), men were criminalized for consensually eloping with women across state lines. For modern misandristic legal scholarship promoting greater criminalization and incarceration of men, see e.g. Coughlin (1998) and VanderVelde (1996).

[6] CLM (1882) pp. 336-43, Humble (1921) p. 152.

[7] See the table of U.S. state seduction laws ca. 1965 (Excel version), based on Wadlington (1967) p. 189, n. 38; p. 193, n. 66. Marriage as defense provisions covered 89% of the population in states with laws criminalizing seduction.

In most jurisdictions, the man offering to marry the woman wasn't sufficient to suspend criminal prosecution of him. The woman's decision of whether to accept the man's offer of marriage determined whether the state would suspend criminal prosecution of the man. See ruling and discussion of authoritative views in the Supreme Court of Mississippi's decision Williams v. State, 92 Miss. 70, 45 So. 146, 15 Am.Ann.Cas. 1026 (1908).

[8] Commonwealth v. Wright, 16 Ky.L.Rptr. 251 (1894).

[9] Humble (1921) p. 149. Under the seduction law in Arkansas, marriage suspends prosecution for seduction, but the seduction charge may be revived if the marriage breaks up after any period of years. Id. p. 150. Cf. Deuteronomy 22:28. The Oklahoma seduction law specifies a penitentiary sentence not to exceed five years for a man convicted of seducing a woman. The law also specifies:

> the penalty for abandonment or intolerable cruelty which causes the wife to leave within two years after a marriage which took place between the parties pending a seduction charge may vary from two to twenty years of penitentiary confinement.

Wadlington (1967) p. 195, n. 82, citing Okla. Stat. Ann. tit. 21, § 1120 (1958).

[10] HLR (1903) p. 63. On marriage as punishment, Murray (2012). As is typical of current legal scholarship, Murray ignores the acute anti-men bias in criminal punishment.

[11] Rubenfeld (2013) puts forward self-possession as the formal legal logic of rape law. Rubenfeld seems oblivious to the anti-men bias in violating self-possession. But Rubenfeld does seem to recognize the potential danger of encroaching upon normative beliefs that now strictly discipline elite discourse.

[image] Shata Prison. Thanks to Ori and Wikipedia.

References:

Blackstone, William, ed. by George Sharswood. 1769 / 1908. Commentaries on the laws of England. Philadelphia: J.B. Lippincott & Co.

CLM. 1882. "Seduction as a Crime." Criminal Law Magazine 3(3): 331-47.

Coughlin, Anne M. 1998. “Sex and Guilt.” Virginia Law Review. 84 (1): 1-46.

Donovan, Brian. 2005. “Gender Inequality and Criminal Seduction: Prosecuting Sexual Coercion in the Early-20th Century.” Law & Social Inquiry. 30 (1): 61-88.

HLR. 1903. “Recent Cases.” Harvard Law Review. 17(1): 55-64.

Humble, H. W. 1921. “Seduction as a Crime.” Columbia Law Review. 21 (2): 144-154.

Murray, Melissa. 2012. “Marriage as Punishment.” Columbia Law Review. 112 (1): 1-65.

Rubenfeld Jed. 2013. “The riddle of rape-by-deception and the myth of sexual autonomy.” Yale Law Journal. 122 (6): 1372-1443.

VanderVelde, Lea. 1996. “The Legal Ways of Seduction.” Stanford Law Review. 48 (4): 817-901.

Wadlington, Walter. 1967. “Shotgun Marriage by Operation of Law.” Georgia Law Review 1: 183-204.

Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License.

The Feminator

AVfM Video Source · 15 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Originally designed to protect, the feminator's version of equality could end civilization as we know it. Will all men be slaughtered, or simply become slaves?
https://youtu.be/vzUAm7HL-64

Sounds nothing like humanism: The feminist serial rapist

August Løvenskiolds · 16 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

A recent article at the Humanism.com website attempted (without much success, considering the comments to the article) to link Men's Rights Activists to mass shootings and other bad behavior. The absurd article, entitled Sounds Nothing Like Humanism: MRAs and Mass Shootings by feminist Merrill "Mendacious" Miller (who serves as an official at the website), is the usual feminist hodge-podge of her "feelings," faulty statistics, and outright lies about the Men's Rights Movement.

There is a lot to refute in her screed against men but let's look at just a few of that liar's statements to see how reliable she is.

> There is evidence that some of the perpetrators of recent mass shootings in the US were motivated, at least in part, by the stud and "tough guy" images of masculinity upheld by men's rights activists.

Mendacious Miller's understanding of causality is somewhat weak. There is actually more evidence that all perpetrators of recent mass shootings in the US were influenced by breathing oxygen and humanist values, which means all oxygen breathing humanists should be banned, of course. We do know, for example, that when mass shooters are denied oxygen and humanism, their shooting sprees end.

In addition, while the MRM might uphold "the stud and 'tough guy' images of masculinity" (I've never heard that before, but I suppose it is possible) we also uphold the masculine images of gay men, sensitive men, thoughtful men, nurturing men, gregarious men, trans men, loner men, funny men, poor men, rich men, men of all races, and men of all religions (or no religion at all). Masculinity is not toxic, it is not intrinsically bad nor good any more than femininity. I do wonder, though, what Mendacious Miller thinks of women who act with the same confident sexuality and toughness as the "stud and tough guys" she demonizes so readily.

Is the demonization of men, men's sexuality, and masculinity a Humanist trait, Ms. Medacious Miller? I ask because as a humanist official who works for humanism.com, you sure do make it sound as if it is your official policy. I would recommend that humanism.com reconsider your continued service to them in light of the horrible anti-men message you are associating with humanism.

Oh, and in case you're wondering, Ms Mendacious, the MRM has no problem with confident, tough women – indeed, they are among our élite advocates and activists. We treasure them.

But let's get back to Mendacious Miller's article.

> Just last week, a high school student in Idaho threatened to "kill all the girls" at his school because the cheerleaders wouldn't send him nude pictures…[omitted]…That Rodger and Mercer would go to such lengths as to kill others in an attempt to prove themselves men reveals the disturbing definitions of masculinity perpetuated by our wider culture and amplified by the MRA community.

I can't help but wonder if Mendacious Miller links violent lyrics in rap music to crime. I mean, that would be sort of racist, right? It is no less sexist to link common images of masculinity to shootings.

But let's assume for a moment that Mendacious Miller's linkage is valid. Who is more culpable for these shooting rampages – MRAs who discuss and affirm various abstract images of masculinity, or Humanists who demonize masculinity? By Mendacious Miller's own faulty "link" reasoning, the women who declined the shooters' sexual advances would be the direct, proximal cause of the rampages. Of course, neither those women nor MRAs are responsible for the shootings – the shooters are – but Mendacious Miller's brutal quest to hurt the rights of men knows no such sober reasoning.

What is more likely to diffuse men's anger – assuring their rights, or increasingly repressing them? Those feminists who torture men and restrict men's human rights look awfully stupid when a few tortured men lash out in anger. It is amazing to me that so few men do – the strength and restraint of their masculinity seems like a good character trait in this light.

Let's apply Mendacious Miller's reasoning to another case, that of Oxford feminist Annie Teriba, a recent confessed serial rapist. Rewriting Mendacious Miller's shitty, ill-reasoned prose to cover this case:

> Just last week, a college student and feminist activist at Oxford admitted to raping a series of other students at her school because those students would not agree to have consensual sex with her…[omitted]…That Annie Teriba would go to such lengths as to rape others in an attempt to prove herself a woman reveals the disturbing definitions of femininity perpetuated by our wider culture and amplified by the feminist community.

Although the shooters were not MRAs and had no links to the men's movement, rapist Annie Teriba was an active feminist involved in fighting "rape culture":

> Teriba was well-known in student activism circles and had spoken publicly about the need to tackle rape culture at Oxford, even writing a think piece on the issue for a university feminist blog called Bad Housekeeping. She wrote: "We are at a turning point. Unless something gives, we run the risk of reaching a point at which society can never solve the issue of sexual violence."

By Mendacious Miller's reasoning, feminism is now directly linked to serial rapists, quite more so than the tenuous link she fails to prove about MRAs and violence. By her shitty logic, this means that humanists should disavow feminism and feminists who claim to be humanist. The case here is unassailable and stronger than Miller's indictment of MRAs – the shooters were not proven, admitted MRAs but here, the rapist was a proven, admitted feminist. Feminists claim that rape is worse than murder, which literally makes the case against Mendacious Miller bulletproof by her own logic.

If it turns out that rapist Annie Teriba was studly and tough, or wanted to be, does that mean women should avoid acting like men? Of course not, it means that people should stop shooting people and committing rape.

Clearly, humanists and humanism.com need to dump Merrill Mendacious Miller. She sounds nothing like humanism, and certainly is not like humanist Meryl Streep.

If Mendacious Miller wants to repudiate her wretched article and return to humanism, I suggest Mendacious Miller prove her humanist activist bona fides: register for the military draft like all U.S. men are forced to by law – but not women, yet.

The Media's coverage of online abuse of women vs men

Yuval Levental · 17 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

> @wikileaks A vulnerable white woman always comes in handy when the government wants people to stop thinking and obey
> — Dr. Peter Hague (@petehague) September 25, 2015.

Recently, I heard that feminists such as Anita Sarkeesian, Zoe Quinn, and Randi Harper were invited to a panel about abuse hosted by Google Ideas, which is "supposedly" a think tank for promoting democracy. Google Ideas even used "kafkatrapping" by claiming that the responses to their tweet justified the panel, yet provided no evidence. Julian Assange of WikiLeaks wrote an essay saying that Google Ideas was an imperialist initiative in disguise.

My point is, looking at the picture, it seems that most of the participants were women. However, there is one man I have heard of whose story has never been told in the media, but I have heard about his abuse for years. His name is Christian Weston Chandler, and he is an autistic man in this thirties in the state of Virginia who still lives with his parents. Ever since around 2007, he has been the target of much online abuse. He was discovered when an employer at a cards store that he frequented posted about him online, and people have been looking for personal information about him ever since. The Sonichu website is an entire website about his life. To be sure, he says and does a lot of inappropriate things, but a lot of the trolling that he faces is unjustified. He has been manipulated online by many people looking to bully him into submission.

Some examples include getting him to send his personal possessions, pretending to be love interests, and blackmailing him with stolen information. "Blanca Weiss" was a trio of trolls who tricked Chris-Chan into sending them a prized possession of his, the "Sonichu Medallion" by pretending to be romantically interested in him. This medallion was created out of an anime character that he invented, called Sonichu. They uploaded a video of the medallion's destruction to Youtube. Jack Thaddeus was the name of a troll that hacked Christian's PSN information, and blackmailed him for it into humping his PS3 on live video. Needless to say, he did not return the information. Many other trolls, such as "BlueSpike", who pretended to be a girl named Julie, pretended to fall in love with him online and used it to make a mockery of him through chat logs.

At his level of Autism, he has difficulty distinguishing between what is appropriate and inappropriate, so he has often been tricked into sending personal information to people that request it by email. One thing that he revealed was that he tried to attract women using a cardboard sign listing the characteristics that he was looking for in a woman, and even sent a picture of the sign. He also revealed information about his childhood, his high school, and his years at community college. He has made many videos online, where he acts strangely and rants about random topics, and instead of finding help for him, they belittle him.

It is inappropriate to mock someone like him in this kind of mental state. Instead, he should be referred to appropriate mental health care. Yet it seems at this point, there is no advocacy group covering for him. Rather, many people online basically justify it by calling out inappropriate things he says and does. Unfortunately, the media focuses only on a small group of able-bodied feminists that exaggerate their victimhood, and ignores people in his living conditions.

Bigotry is not a one-way street

David King · 18 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

One commentator recently complained, twice (on two different articles), that the world is not a trans-inclusive safe space. He (or she, though for the purposes of this article I will assume the generic 'he') added:*

> I tried everything I could to make the world a better place but your hatred and bigotry wont allow it. I can find it in my heart to love why cant you.

Another requested that I turn my reply to that person into an article, so here is an adapted version of it.

Let me tell social justice warriors about bigotry.

The primary characteristic of bigotry is narrow-mindedness. That narrow-mindedness is the foundation of the aggressive, chosen ignorance that fuels all bigotry. Bigots are either unwilling to consider alternative points of view, or seek to impose their perspective on everybody else — and these are the worst kind of bigot. They cannot stand the fact that others can have a valid, well-thought out and legitimate perspective that they themselves do not share, and seek to "correct" others and bring them into line. In contrast, most bigots who keep their views to themselves inflict limited damage on those around them.

"Social justice" warriors are amongst the very worst of the latter kind, because they do so from behind a veneer of inclusivity and defence of those with little or no voice in society which, on its own, is an admirable endeavour. C. S. Lewis said it best:

> Of all tyrannies, a tyranny sincerely exercised for the good of its victims may be the most oppressive. It would be better to live under robber barons than under omnipotent moral busybodies. The robber baron's cruelty may sometimes sleep, his cupidity may at some point be satiated; but those who torment us for our own good will torment us without end for they do so with the approval of their own conscience.

SJWs are anything but inclusive, as the recent ejection of Lauren Southern and Milo Yiannopoulos from the LA Amber Rose Slutwalk (a woman and a gay man), and the ejection of CAFE from the Toronto Pride event demonstrate. Those SJWs are liars: they say they want diversity, when their actions prove they want uniformity of thought. That is not inclusive; that is hatefulness and bigotry.

And why are they this way? Because they attempt to force the world to fit within ideologically-defined preconceptions and prejudices, and any truth that doesn't fit within that preconception is either ignored or distorted until it does fit — instead of seeing what is actually in front of them and dealing with differences (of opinion) in an adult and mature manner.

As a rule, SJWs daren't expose themselves to anything that might cause such cognitive dissonance, which is why they prefer to tell each other and believe lies about organisations and people (such as AVfM, Southern, Yiannopoulos, Farrel, Fiamengo, to name but a few) instead of finding out for themselves what (for example) AVfM (and we're easy to find and talk to!) really stand for, because to do so would require that they begin to think for themselves when they're otherwise accustomed to allowing others to do their thinking for them.

A few, such as the character to whom I wrote this in reply, do engage with us, but they do so from their moral high-horse, certain that they know who and what we are. In other words, they talk at us and don't listen, rather than talk with us to find out what we do agree on and whether the differences (on what we don't) are all that significant. After all, diversity isn't just a buzzword, it actually means something.

A prime example is this matter of GLBT issues. I have recently said, multiple times and in several places, that trans* people are welcome at AVfM, and Paul's series "Straight eye for the queer guy" does the same in respect of gay men (bi- included, though never explicitly addressed — yet).

Where we differ, however, is that SJW thought sees GLBT people defined primarily in terms of their sexuality (and, we suspect, in terms of their utility to SJW causes), which is a kind of objectification (and, frankly, abuse) in itself.

We prefer to see people in terms of their humanity. Our primary mission is to serve all men, not just men like us, and so we don't give a damn what a person's sexuality or gender identity is: if they are a man or care about men's issues, then they are our target audience and we want them to have a voice here. True; we don't cater to women's issues, but that's because women's issues are well outside our mission and are very well served elsewhere.

But this guy insisted that we're hateful bigots! How can this be? It's because he wasn't, and never has been, listening to what he was being told because constructive discussion is the very last thing he came here for. People like him are as bad as proselytising missionaries.

Perhaps, therefore, there is more love in our hearts than he is willing to acknowledge.

Relevant side note: I remember an interview with Bill Clinton in which he said something to the effect that the difference between ideology and principle is that people of principle can be negotiated with and will change their point of view to fit the facts rather than try to change the facts to fit their point of view. Ideologues, on the other hand, come to the table with their minds already made up, and no amount of evidence will make the slightest bit of difference. He, of course, was referring to partisan politics, but the observation holds true across a number of subject areas.

This commentator hinted at the subject of safe spaces, a subject recently addressed in the comments on my recent article about feminist censorship of feminists. The matter was pretty much been hashed out there, but in summary:

The world is not and never will be entirely safe, and wishing it were otherwise is futile and childish. Nobody has the right not to be offended, and nobody is so special or any more fragile than anybody else that they deserve more protection from the jerks, idiots and bigots of the world.

This means, if one accepts that minorities are oft vulnerable, that one must also accept that individuals who may belong to majority demographics also can be vulnerable. Yes, I'm saying that cis, het, able-bodied white men can feel hurt, be vulnerable and every bit in need of somebody to speak in defence of them because they are human first and share the same frailties as all humans do. JFK said it best:

> For in the final analysis, our most basic common link is that we all inhabit this small planet. We all breathe the same air. We all cherish our children's futures. And we are all mortal.

Powerful stuff, especially the bit about mortality considering the context in which it was said (the aftermath of the Cuban missile crisis).

None of this means that one should not attempt to educate the public about the challenges faced by minorities and the vulnerable, but it's important to be realistic and not insist on the absurd and unreasonable expectation that the world at large can ever be "safe".

Besides, it is grossly insulting to the agency of adults who happen to be minorities to be told that they need special protection, because it implies that they are weak and dependent for their welfare on others, especially when those others are probably more interested in power than the welfare of those who need help.

It also does not mean that there should not be private communities with their own rules, ie "safe spaces" because everybody needs respite from time to time. Indeed, AVfM is one such place.

But it is a grave mistake to even think that the whole world should be like that. To quote Jake Sully (from the film Avatar), "Sooner or later, you always have to wake up" and face the world as it is, not as you would wish it to be.

Pardon the religious reference here (the essence behind it is what's important), but the Serenity Prayer nicely encapsulates the mature response to a harsh, uncaring and indifferent world:

> [Deus] grant me the serenity to accept the things I cannot change; > courage to change the things I can;
> and wisdom to know the difference.

When it comes to Paul, you don't know Jack

Stacey A · 19 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

After a few days of debate and a few hours of arguing, I have been given the go ahead to post this article, or letter, or whatever you would like to call it. This is the first and most likely the last time I will do this. I never wanted to be a part of all this insanity and this post does not represent a change of heart on that subject.

I have been watching my life partner, Paul Elam, doing what I know he has done for most of his life: working to give a voice to the voiceless. Far too often I have seen him rewarded for that work with a knife in his back. Not just by those who want those voices to remain silent but by people who claimed to be his allies – even people who claimed to be his "family." I am more than sick of it.

For the sake of getting everything on the table, I am not an MRA. I do not want to be an MRA. I sympathize with most of the issues I have read on A Voice for Men but for whatever you care to make of it, I have never felt compelled to turn that sympathy into activism. That said, I support my partner in what he chooses to do with his life, whether I agree with it or not.

As someone who has spent the last 13+ years living under the same roof with Paul, I hope I can bring some perspective on him as a man (he would get huffy and insist I say "human being" but this is not his writing).

I am going to upset some people with what I have to say. Not being like Paul, that actually bothers me a lot. I don't take pleasure in offending people, even the really scummy ones. I also admit to the obvious bias in my point of view. I love Paul, and that is why after six years of watching him build and run AVFM, I feel the need to speak my mind.

I want to tell you about the Paul that I know, knowing (and not caring) that those who hate him will rationalize their way into dismissing what I have to say. I also know that the people who care for him will not need to hear this but hopefully may enjoy hearing about a more personal side of the man from someone who actually knows him better than anyone else.

I have no intention of letting the following string of anecdotes define him. He has more faults than most of you will ever know. I am going to tell you what I have witnessed in him and I am also going to tell you about what I have witnessed from others.

First, here's one anecdote that exemplifies more about Paul in real life then what you might believe if you made the mistake of taking his critics seriously.

I learned something valuable about Paul's instincts and his nature on a whale watching tour we took not long after meeting. The boat we were on suddenly rocked and an older woman was thrown to the floor. While everyone else in our group grabbed poles and rails to hold themselves steady, Paul was up and moving. He maneuvered quickly between several people while the boat was sill rocking to reach the woman and helped her back to her seat, making sure she was not injured and calming her in the process. Make of it what you will, while everyone on that boat was understandably taking care of themselves, Paul saw someone in distress and moved to render aid without hesitation.

This, of course, proves little to nothing about who Paul is as a human being except that I see his tendency to act in similar fashion with anyone he encounters in distress. He does not care whether the person he is trying to help is a man or woman, black or white or part of any other group. In fact, you would be surprised to know what a kind and compassionate person he is. It breaks my heart to read so many cruel words describing him when in reality, they couldn't be further from the truth.

Perhaps part of it is understandable. The persona Paul puts on to provoke people is not consistent with the Paul I see interact with the real world every day. I also suppose that when you rattle the cages of evil fools you should expect evil, foolish responses.

I understand where all this comes from, at least from his opponents. What I do not understand is how some people he has befriended and protected have acted so slimy. I don't say this because I assume the best in Paul at all times, I say this because I have been an eyewitness to all of it.

I sit within a few feet of Paul every day as he works tirelessly, constantly putting the movement ahead of his own financial security and physical health. I have stayed up very late hours myself worrying about his lack of sleep because he never seems to find time to get enough rest. I live with the fear every day that the burden he chooses to carry is going to kill him.

In a strange way, the worst has already happened. Despite the fact that we are not legally married, I already feel like a men's rights widow.

I have read some of the more inglorious coverage of Paul in the press, all of it coming from people of the lowest moral character imaginable. One example of that was the dragging of Paul's alleged daughter into a story in Buzzfeed. I was honestly a bit frustrated by Paul's lack of defending himself against Adam Serwer's lies. I was there the whole time Paul tried to have a relationship with "Bonnie" so I know what lies she told or that were told by Adam Serwer on her behalf.

There were a thousand things about "Bonnie" that Paul could have said and refused to, including her longstanding troubles with Children's Protective Services, who took a very dim view of her parenting. I knew about the constant drug screens they required of her and everyone in her home. When I read the allegations from her that he had physically abused her children, I was livid. It was never Paul who posed a threat to those two beautiful boys. It was their mother and she knows it. So does CPS.

She and her brother made a game of getting on the Ricki Lake show, fabricating a false story for the TV program in exchange for free first class air fare to the show and the food and perks that came with it. So you see, "Bonnie" already had a history of lying to the media to collect a few coins and Paul did not bring it up. That was his choice, and I know why he made it but I do not want to leave it unsaid.

For six years, I watched Paul work hard to try to develop a relationship with "Bonnie." He often did this at the expense of his normal home time as a long distance truck driver. Once, when "Bonnie" had her artwork featured at a grand opening at the Dallas Area Transit Center, Paul was there with her, spending all night sitting with her in her car talking as they awaited the opening. He treated her this way regularly, often in the face of her indifference. All the while, she was taking his money to pay her bills. Paul didn't publish any of this because he had no desire to hurt her, even when she was hurting him in any way she could.

I have seen Paul in a number of other situations that he does not talk about with others, like the time he got a letter in the mail from a man containing three one dollar bills and a note apologizing for not giving more due to being strapped by child support and living in his car. He may have mentioned that on the site at some point. I am not sure. Still, no one but me saw the tears streaming down his face while he read the note.

I have seen similar tears from him over the loss of our dog, Rocky, who passed away in April 2013 and from which Paul has never fully recovered. No one would believe what a sensitive, fragile man he can be. All the more reason why I am so troubled by the hateful things I read about him regularly. If people only realized just how wrong they are. Paul certainly has a hard edge but it is just to get attention for his cause. If there was another way, I'm sure he would prefer it because the negative attention he receives is not something he enjoys.

He can be hurt as much as anyone.

There has been much said about the money Paul has allegedly made capitalizing on the men's movement. None of the critics have a clue how broke he is. And they have no clue as to the wonder, and yes, sometimes frustration I feel when I see his determination and work ethic go literally unfazed by his constant financial woes.

I see how hard the AVFM staff works and I see the moral support of many who comment on this website. I am thankful Paul has those people behind him because what I mainly see is him working himself to death in large part for a population of men who treat themselves more like lemmings than human beings.

No offense, but I don't so much see a men's movement as I see a small group of men and women beating their heads against the wall for people who won't be bothered to lift a finger in their own defense. I don't say that to imply that it is not doing any good. It is doing a lot of good but in spite of the people who are being helped, not because of them.

In the end, it does not matter what I think. I get it. Paul will be an MRA until we have to put him in a box. Perhaps, if you have any compassion at all, you will take my anger about all this in stride. The years that this movement is surely taking off his life will not only rob him of time on this earth, it will take away time that I would like to spend with him.

Being an MRA is who he is and mostly all he thinks about. I have seen more than my share of trashy people (with a few exceptions) exit AVFM. I have even seen them steal on their way out. What is sadly ironic is that I cannot think of a single exception where Paul did not work as hard as he could to salvage the reputations of those people and make the parting amicable. For this and for many other reasons, I just don't see how he does it.

I don't expect anything I say to change a single mind so I guess I am lucky that it is my only objective to just put my thoughts on the record. Paul Elam is not Superman or super human. He is not a saint by any means but he is also not anything like his worst critics love to imagine.

He is honest and principled and anyone who claims otherwise is lying. I have directly witnessed his side of the story throughout every attack on his character. His role in all of them may have been less than perfect but not sleazy or unprincipled. I'm shocked to see how much of this he has had to deal with in others who claim to be a part of this movement.

There now, I have had my say.

The Red Pill Movie: You Choose

Paul Elam · 20 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

As I am sure most of you know, film director Cassie Jaye is a week into a 30 day Kickstarter. She is trying to raise the $97k she needs to finish work on the film, The Red Pill. ‘

Watching this happen has put me in somewhat of a quandary for a couple of reasons. One, I can’t endorse a movie I have not seen, nor can I assure anyone that the actual outcome of the film will be anything like the quite moving and unprecedented 8 minutes of extended preview she has already provided. To be even more frank I don’t care if Ms Jaye’s film is not particularly complementary toward us: a film that is equal-handed would be a vast improvement on past so-called “coverage” of the MHRM by the main stream media.

What matters most is having the conversation, and opening the public’s minds to the possibility that MHRAs, and men in general, are not the monsters we are so often made out to be. Personally, I take “equal-handed” is all we have ever needed. In the “us vs them” game, “us” wins this hands down.

Also, I am wary of this movie taking a credibility hit because those who don’t want to see it made will surely start the attacks on the project as a “puppet for MHRAs” should it start looking like she will raise the money.

Of course, I can tell you that is not true. Fact is, at this point I can’t say with any real conviction that I think we are going to not be subjected to a lot of the same old hollow attacks in this movie, should it be finished and released.

What I can tell you is that when Cassie Jaye says in her fundraising video that she is trying to produce a movie that fairly puts all views on the table about gender politics, I believe her. And I believe that this movie is possibly the last chance we will see in a long time for an objective and balanced view of our movement and of modern feminism from an award winning filmmaker.

For those who may be concerned that I suffer any lapse in memory, I assure you I have not lost sight of the mainstream media agents who have lined up around the corner for the past several years, all of them with sugar and spice façades. All of them claiming to want to educate people about the MHRM, only to turn around and repurpose all that supposed fairness into the most vicious and libelous of attacks.

I still think Ms. Jaye has the promise of being something other than a fraud and a liar. I think she may just be a documentarian with a spine and some character who may have been truly moved to look beyond the agitprop during months of meeting face to face with actual activists.

For that reason, I think this is a project worth your support if you have it to give. She has raised a little over 13k as of this writing, leaving quite a way to go in three short weeks.

If you want to help, you can do so here.

Clinician Zander Keig has lived as both a man and a woman. Guess who had the privilege?

A Voice for Men · 21 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

We don’t usually like to put videos/podcasts in the highest featured position on the site. This one is worth it.

Mike Buchanan and a feminist university student debate sexual consent

Mike Buchanan · 21 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

This discussion on a prime-time BBC radio programme was prompted by a story about George Lawlor, a politics and sociology student at Warwick University. Lawlor rightly objected to being invited onto a class about sexual consent.

I was interviewed by Nicky Campbell, along with Leah Phillips, a PhD student at the University. From her university profile page:

> My research focuses on our cultural concern with the adolescent female body, and that body's presentation and construction in popular media and culture.

At J4MB we regularly cite the following articles from AVfM:

Janet Bloomfield: 13 reasons women lie about being raped

Jonathan Taylor: 10 reasons false rape allegations are common

Hannah Wallen: 6 dangerous rape myths

More than a quarter of sexual offences against adults of the opposite sex are committed by women, yet in 2013 only one in every 146 people charged with sexual offences in the UK was a woman. Details are in the section on sexual abuse are in our election manifesto, pp.31-37. It includes a link to an American study showing that a majority of incarcerated (male) rapists were sexually abused when they were children, by women, sometimes their own mothers.

Convicted female sex offenders are also treated far more leniently than men, usually receiving only a suspended sentence – i.e. no punishment – even when their victims are children. In a recent case – reported here – a 21-year-old babysitter, Jade Hatt, received a suspended sentence despite having had sex with an 11-year-old boy. From a newspaper report:

> The judge gave Hatt a suspended sentence on the grounds that she was 'immature' while her victim was unusually mature, which 'narrows the arithmetic age gap'.

A catalog of AVfM articles on the Shivers/Perrette case

Suzanne McCarley · 22 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The following is a chronological list of articles we have published on Pauley Perrette's ongoing and egregious abuse of the Restraining Order process in California, with her primary victim being her ex husband Francis (Coyote) Shivers. Perrette has been using the legal system, her wealth and influence, and the support of the massive Hollywood PR machine, to stalk and harass Mr. Shivers for a decade now, and he is serving jail time for a crime that never happened. We think it's vitally important for these articles to be gathered and linked on a single page for easy reference. We at A Voice for Men are not in the habit of giving out legal advice, but these articles are filled with examples of actions and processes that might manage or mitigate the effects of false accusations; they also comprise an eye opening object lesson in the kind of sleazy underhanded tricks that the falsely accused can expect, not only from their accusers, but from the accusers' predatory allies within the system.

The story is a nightmare, and Coyote Shivers is living it. So is his family. Due to the celebrity status of several parties in this case, it can appear lurid and exaggerated, but this script is being played out in courtrooms and lawyers' offices all over the place.

This list will be updated with articles published after the first week of October 2015.

Being imprisoned for a crime he didn't commit, Mr. Shivers was unavailable for comment.

2013

March 25, 2013
http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/false-rape-culture/pauley-perrette-francis-shivers-and-yellow-media/

March 25, 2013 http://www.avoiceformen.com/misandry/star-crazy-the-dark-side-of-pauley-perrette/

March 26, 2013
http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/family-courts/pauley-want-a-restraining-order-characteristics-of-false-accusers/

March 30, 2013
http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/government-tyranny/shivers-and-justice-remanded-by-judge-solorzano/

April 13, 2013
http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/government-tyranny/restraining-order-terrorism-we-have-arrived/

April 14, 2013 http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/activism/time-to-end-restraining-order-terrorism/

April 22, 2013
http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/government-tyranny/restraining-order-terrorism-the-continuing-saga/

May 2, 2013
http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/family-courts/restraining-order-terrorism-the-circus-continues/

May 17, 2013 http://www.avoiceformen.com/restraining-order-terrorism/perrette-setting-up-shivers-again/

June 2, 2013 http://www.avoiceformen.com/restraining-order-terrorism/shivers-vs-the-restraining-order-mafia/

September 22, 2013
http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/activism/criminal-charges-for-pauley-perrette-crew-forthcoming/

September 24, 2013
http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/domestic-violence-industry/pauley-perrette-schmoozes-the-police/

October 16, 2013
http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/family-courts/pauleyp-ncis-pauley-perrettes-pals-daniel-luis-rivas/

November 25, 2013
http://www.avoiceformen.com/restraining-order-terrorism/criminal-charges-requested-for-lawyers-of-ncis-lab-rat-abbey-scuito-pauley-perrette/

December 1, 2013
http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/domestic-violence-industry/meet-john-nazarian-the-king-of-scumbags/

December 18, 2013 http://www.avoiceformen.com/allbulletins/pauley-perrette-twitter-bitch/

2014

January 15, 2014
http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/family-courts/someone-please-give-john-nazarian-a-plaid-jacket-a-straw-hat-and-a-cigar/

January 17, 2014
http://www.avoiceformen.com/hangouts/avfm-monday-roundup-anti-male-hysteria-from-nazarian-to-obama/

January 26, 2014 http://www.avoiceformen.com/allnews/controversial-nazarian-videos-removed-from-youtube/

January 28, 2014
http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/family-courts/john-nazarian-tries-to-change-the-subject/

February 11, 2014 http://www.avoiceformen.com/a-voice-for-men/john-j-nazarian-threatens-lawsuit/

February 11, 2014
http://www.avoiceformen.com/allbulletins/hissy-fits-predicted-in-the-perrette-camp-and-the-l-a-courts/

February 16, 2014 http://www.avoiceformen.com/allbulletins/nazarian-video-with-commentary/

March 21, 2014
http://www.avoiceformen.com/allbulletins/l-a-prosecutor-elizabeth-gertz-boarding-the-crazy-train/

April 28, 2014
http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/government-tyranny/what-are-kangaroo-court-judge-kathryn-solarzano-elizabeth-gertz-trying-to-hide/

May 6, 2014 http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/freecoyoteshivers-update-pauleyp-mayradiasgomes/

May 28, 2014
http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/government-tyranny/pauleyp-co-conspirator-johnjnazarian-under-investigation-avfm-asks-for-restraining-order-freecoyoteshivers-boycottncis/

August 26, 2014
http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/ncis-pauleyp-perrettes-has-public-meltdown-as-restraining-order-abuse-case-heats-up/

September 18, 2014
http://www.avoiceformen.com/restraining-order-terrorism/pauley-perrette-busted-with-leaked-911-call-then-goes-apeshit-on-whistleblower/

September 22, 2014
http://www.avoiceformen.com/restraining-order-terrorism/dont-touch-that-dial-a-busy-week-for-pauley-perrette/

September 23, 2014 http://www.avoiceformen.com/updates/tweetfest-live-chat-with-ncis-cast/

September 24, 2014
http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/domestic-violence-industry/pauley-perrette-schmoozes-the-police/

September 25, 2014
http://www.avoiceformen.com/restraining-order-terrorism/two-major-publications-now-covering-pauley-perrettes-court-hearing/

October 28, 2014
http://www.avoiceformen.com/restraining-order-terrorism/avfm-demands-apology-from-pauley-perrette-for-comparing-her-divorce-to-the-holocaust/

2015

January 15, 2015
http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/happy-new-year-from-americas-most-infamous-stalker-pauley-perrette-of-ncis/

February 4, 2015 http://www.avoiceformen.com/allnews/pauley-perrette-video-deposition/

September 8, 2015 http://www.avoiceformen.com/restraining-order-terrorism/free-coyote-shivers/

November 17, 2015 http://www.avoiceformen.com/just-plain-crazy/did-karma-just-bitch-slap-pauley-perrette/

2016

January 28, 2016
http://www.avoiceformen.com/restraining-order-terrorism/shivers-is-free-but-perrette-is-on-the-prowl/

February 12, 2106 https://www.avoiceformen.com/featured/star-crazy-star-pauley-perrette-accuses-yet-another-homeless-man-of-attacking-her/

June 1, 2106 https://www.avoiceformen.com/restraining-order-terrorism/karma-is-a-bitch-francis-coyote-shivers-now-an-elected-los-angeles-city-official/

Global survey of circumcision harm presentation of findings

AVfM Video Source · 22 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Tim Hammond talks about the negative side of circumcision on infants who go on to become adult men, among other things. Hard to watch but important.

https://youtu.be/v_ht2CRTdbo

Bullied to Death: Chris Mackney's Kafka-esque Divorce Chapter 5 Preview

Michael Volpe · 23 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

> A parent has a fundamental right to make decisions concerning the upbringing, education, and care of the parent's child.

Virginia statute on parental rights

The Restraining Order

The divorce officially started in May 2008; before that the jockeying began. Chris hired Sean Kelly as his divorce attorney while Dina hired Mark Carlin of Ain & Bank, considered one of the premiere divorce firms in the area.

Using the old adage "possession is nine tenth of the law" Dina pressured Chris into leaving their family home thereby possessing two key items: home and kids.

In April 2008, Carlin sent Chris a letter demanding child support, alimony, half his retirement, and that he leave the home. Here's part of the letter.

Dina continues to seek an amicable resolution of the matters between you.

Toward that end, and subject to full financial disclosure by you, Dina proposes that she retain the home; her business; all other assets in her sole name; and one half of the value of all your retirement, savings/investment, and other accounts as of December 31, 2007. The contents of the home will be divided fairly between you. Child support will be paid to Dina in accordance with the Virginia child support guidelines. Dina will be seeking spousal support, but we are not in a position to make any proposal until we receive your financial disclosure…Once we receive all of your financials, we can promptly move toward a final separation agreement.

There are pressing substantive matters that require your immediate attention. You need to address the enormous tension in the household. A major contributor to that tension is your failure to contribute economically to the ongoing needs of your family. I understand that your contributions are limited to paying relatively small household bills and that you have failed to consistently make even those modest payments. As a result, cable and telephone services were cut off and a discontinuance notice of gas service was received.
…
The tension in the household can be reduced if you move from (the home). The property is in Dina's sole name, and she pays the entire mortgage. She asks that you remove your belongings by Friday April 18.

Initially, Chris wouldn't leave the home, "fearful that he would be seen as abandoning the children. Further, he could not afford such a move, and, as a result, he did not comply with the request," according to a psychological evaluation.

When pressure alone didn't work, Dina Mackney did what millions of people- mostly women- do in American divorces: she got a restraining order.
Chris Mackney had no criminal record, no history of domestic violence, and there were no photos or other physical evidence suggesting he was an abuser. Still, on May 23, 2008, Dina Mackney filed a motion for protection against <br?Chris Mackney, arguing she feared for her life and needed him removed from the house. She documented three incidents including her version of the fight from January 19, 2008.

> This began from an argument about his continuing to text and on-line date with other women on the internet. He then took (while I was sleeping) my studio (jewelry) keys. He wouldn't give them back so I took his. An argument ensued and ended with physical pushing and his throwing and destroying thousands of dollars of jewelry around my studio. He threw trays at me and all around the room.

Dina's Innuendos: The Drug Issue

Question number twelve of the protective order asked: "Does the respondent have a drug or alcohol problem. If so, please describe the kind and frequency of drug abuse?"

Dina Mackney replied, "He may have a drug problem," and nothing else.

Dina Mackney was asked a two part question and didn't answer the second part, requiring specificity: a glaring red flag.

This was not the only time that Dina Mackney accused her ex-husband of having a drug addiction, she made a similar accusation in Samenow's report, and that made Mark Duda especially angry.

"It is character assassination," Duda said. During the years he saw Mackney regularly, Mackney went out, he drank, and smoked marijuana on occasion, but it was socially and rarely drank to get drunk. His drinking, Duda told me, was no worse than the average single successful person and suggesting Chris Mackney had a drug or alcohol problem means nearly all successful people in their twenties and thirties have drug problems.

While Mackney did smoke marijuana on a few occasions, he stopped before they got married and only smoked when hanging out with Dina's sister and her rock star husband Warren Haynes: once every few months. Rich Ware told me Mackney picked it up again toward the end of his life as a method of self-medication, but that was long after these accusations were made.

Furthermore, during the marriage after Dina complained that he'd gotten too inebriated on one occasion, Chris stopped drinking entirely.

Nevertheless, the protective order was granted the same day it was filed and twelve days later there was a "settlement agreement" permanently removing Chris Mackney from his home. Mackney could not afford an apartment; he moved in temporarily with Rich Ware and released Sean Kelly as his attorney.

Chris Mackney Discovers the Murder

On June 23, 2008, Chris Mackney, while searching for Pete Scamardo's middle name (Thomas) on the internet found an article about Sam Degelia, Jr's. murder with a reference to Scamardo. He fired off an email to his wife that day with the subject: Do I need to be worried?

In 1974, Charles Harrelson was convicted in the July 1968 killing of Hearne grain dealer Sam Degelia Jr., who was shot in the head south of McAllen. Pete Scamardo, Degelia's business partner, was convicted of paying Harrelson $2,000 to kill Degelia so he could collect insurance money, according to a September 1970 article that appeared in The Monitor.

http://www.themonitor.com/onset?id=1032&template=article.html

Dina didn't deny knowing about the murder when she responded dismissively.
I already know about this and you have no idea about the details and at this point it is none of your business.

But Dina fired Ain & Bank the VERY NEXT DAY and immediately hired Cottrell, Fletcher, Schinstock, Bartol, &

Cottrell led by Jim Cottrell who boasts, “He’s not the type to settle so have your wallets open.”

A few weeks later, Dina tried to entrap Chris into blackmailing her. She called him and secretly recording the phone conversation asking: “What will it take for you to stop talking about my father?”

Mackney responded that he didn’t want money but his share of the equity in the house (there was about $500,000 in total equity)

“That recorded conversation was taken to the police as evidence of blackmail but the police did not see it that way,” according to a psychological evaluation describing the incident.

Because the article Mackney read only mentioned Scamardo in passing, he initially didn’t make too much of the murder but this incident piqued his interest; he soon made a FOIA request for the Texas Ranger investigative file into Degelia’s murder which he received in October 2008. Once he understood the seedy details of the murder, things clicked: the Scamardo’s were all psychopaths and he became obsessed with the murder and psychopathy.

Chris Mackney believed the switch to Cottrell and most legal strategies going forward were devised not by Dina but her father. The first line item on Cottrell’s bill was a fifteen minute phone call to Pete Scamardo, suggesting Cottrell thought the same thing.

Dina Gets Horny: Emails Chris

Dina then sent Chris an email inviting him to a hotel for sex on July 7, 2008.

Mackney turned the email into a hyperlink but that hyperlink was destroyed as part of the copyright purge and is one of the few documents I couldn’t retrieve. Jill Peterson Mitchell saw a copy of the email and Rich Ware remembers that day.

Rich Ware, with whom Mackney was still staying, remembered the two of them exchanging text messages that day and Dina showed up in her car outside Ware’s residence.

“I told him not to get sucked back in,” Ware told me and Mackney thought better of the sexual encounter. Fathers’ divorce attorney David Pisarra, when he had me on his podcast, noted this is often a ploy by the woman to then say the order was violated or to draw a man into the room and suggest he attacked her. While that’s speculative in Dina Mackney’s case- since it never materialized- Pisarra is right in the larger sense.

It was during this period Dr. Guy Van Syckle was appointed as parenting coordinator, a nebulous title with broad powers to intervene and direct a divorce. He wasn’t entirely one sided saying at one hearing that Chris Mackney was “under tremendous stress” as a result of the divorce but generally sided with Dina. Van Syckle didn’t respond to my email for comment.

Dina’s Innuendos: Chris Owns a Gun

For years, Chris Mackney legally owned a shotgun without incident. Still, in her protective order, Dina made Mackney’s free exercise of the 2nd amendment an issue: “Chris has become increasingly irrational and physical especially since we began talking about divorce. I simply cannot feel ok in a house when a heated argument inevitably becomes physical. He keeps a gun in the house and (I) don’t want my kids or myself exposed to continued hostility which I feel could harm me.”

That wasn't the only time in her application that guns became an issue: "Chris and I got into another argument in which he got generally enraged and sounding angry. He had just shown his gun to me and I was afraid. I called the police."

The police declined to file a report or charges. Chris Mackney reached out to the National Rifle Association (NRA) for help, but the NRA ignored him.

In October 2008, Dina escalated the accusations, claiming during a hearing for a subsequent protective order Chris pointed a handgun at her.

"He cocked the gun once at me in a fight and aimed it. He pulled it out from the mattress. I hid it." Dina said in Dr. Samenow's report.

But Chris owned a shotgun not a handgun, a contradiction he pointed out at this hearing, and it would be quite difficult to hide a shotgun in a mattress. The timing of this allegation is inexplicable. In May, she filed a restraining order against Chris, he moved out in June, she asked him to a hotel for sex in July, and in October she accused him of pointing a handgun at her. When did this purported incident occur and why wait until this hearing to first mention it?

Dina Mackney subsequently claimed this incident occurred in 2005, but this would mean it occurred during their marriage. She conveniently waited until a protective order hearing to first reveal it and somehow forgot about it when she first filed for a protective order. None of these contradictions and discrepancies became an issue and Dina was granted protective orders repeatedly, including this one.

Chris Mackney hired Robert Surovell as his new divorce attorney soon after to reach a settlement as soon as possible, a doomed strategy since Cottrell was paid NOT TO SETTLE.
Cottrell's Legal Bullying Strategy…

Rich Ware told me in Cottrell Pete Scamardo found someone like Percy Foreman: 1) both are known and respected in their fields 2) both think the best defense is a good offense and 3) both have no problem putting the victims on trial to advance their client's interests.

Cottrell's aggressive style is summarized in a court filing for another divorce: "the plaintiff and defendant engaged in extensive litigation, including numerous discovery disputes, pendent lite matters, a plea in bar, motions for declaratory judgment, sanctions motions, the filings of amended complaints and counterclaims, and other matters. Multiple hearings, including several evidentiary hearings, have been conducted to resolve pending disputes."

"This sort of thing happens rather often in custody situation, the person who controls the money is able to prevail irrespective of the facts," Dr. Michael Stone, a noted forensic psychologist said, "because they hire attorneys who are vigorous quality and also to go and make one motion and counter motion in order to exhaust the resources of the other party."

"It was orchestrated by attorneys who were paid not to settle and insisted on litigating every single issue without discussion." Mackney said in his suicide note. "It was all done to increase the stress and pressure. I saw behind the mask and the facade and I needed to be eliminated, just like Sam Degelia needed to be eliminated for discovering Pete Scamardo was trafficking heroin. The plan was to have attorneys negatively interpret anything I say or do and then litigate every issue. I needed to be portrayed as the source of conflict, so the legal and financial pressure could be applied."

One example of the legal bullying is this email to Cottrell on October 30, 2008.

I have no money for an attorney to challenge you in court; I do not wish to fight Mrs. Mackney or her family.

You have subpoenaed work for information that I have expressed numerous times, I will voluntarily provide. This is harassment and unnecessary. Mrs. Mackney is not acting in good faith.

What does Mrs. Mackney want to end this madness? I truly believe she is acting in the best interest of her father and not her children.

…Financed by Pete Scamardo

Over the next five years, Dina Mackney spent over $1 million in legal fees, an amount affordable only to her father. Chris Mackney was in court for 54 hearings and dealt with exponentially more written motions, letters, affidavits, and other legal documents.

On May 13, 2009, Dina Mackney claimed in a deposition her parents hadn't been paying her legal expenses until recently.

"Are your parents paying your legal expenses?" Surovell asked her.

"No. I paid for much of the legal expenses. They have helped me recently because I have run out of money." Dina responded.

Her attorneys failed to provide copies of their invoices to Surovell for this hearing despite a subpoena.

"I'll take the blame for that, Rob. That was inadvertent. She provided it. We have — it's not that she's not paying us." Cottrell interjected.

By the time Mackney received the invoices the case had largely been decided but they showed Pete Scamardo made seven payments over the first year of Cottrell's services with the first payment on June 25, 2008: the day after Cottrell was hired. Dina Mackney was never held accountable for her faulty testimony.

DATE	AMOUNT	CHECK #
June 25th, 2008	$15,000	5976
Nov. 18th, 2008	$4,811	6531
Feb. 4th 2009	$15,000	6136
Feb. 24th 2009	$12,205	6153
March 18th, 2009	$9,719	6167
April 9th, 2009	$909	6180
April 10th, 2009	$15,000	6181
TOTAL $72,643.95

(A part of a blog post showing checks paid from CDC to Cottrell for Dina Mackney's representation)

In an email on November 14, 2008, Mackney first suggested to Surovell that he was being bullied to death, "Did Mr. Cottrell give you any indication that there may be a settlement available or do you see them taking this to court? These people are going to bully me until eternity."

Legal Bully Cottrell Refuses to Settle

Dina's initial settlement demands- as described in a November 16, 2008, email Surovell sent to Chris Mackney- were: 1) sole custody to Dina with visitation for Chris 2) full marital assets to Dina and 3) $6,000 monthly in child support payment. Surovell assured Mackney there would be a more equitable agreement.

On December 10, 2008, Surovell made his initial settlement offer.

"In fact, this is a walk away deal. All that we ask for is $120,000 out of the house and a reasonable custodial access schedule. We retain the services of Dr. Van Syckle, who I am confident can manage the Mackneys into a reasonable manner of sharing that responsibility." Surovell said in the letter. "In candor, if Chris spends the kind of time that he proposes to spend with the children, it will be not only to the benefit of the children and Chris, but to Dina's as well. The children now spend a fair amount of time with daycare providers and I'm sure they would do just as well with doting parents."

Jim Cottrell ignored the settlement offer and demanded more information twelve days later.

Before we can adequately respond to Mr. Mackney's proposal we need to have more complete information on Mr. Mackney's income and resources. Specifically, we have discussed and Mr. Mackney has discussed with his wife that he has been expecting to close a substantial sale this month. We need verification regarding that sale and how much Mr. Mackney is going to receive in compensation.

Regarding Mr. Mackney's proposal for child custody and visitation, Ms. Mackney does not agree with your proposal, however she would agree to an order with the following terms:

Ms. Mackney shall have sole legal custody of their children. She will keep Mr. Mackney informed regarding the children's school and health. At this time, Mr. Mackney is simply not prepared or qualified to share in legal custody…Mr. Mackney's malicious conduct has to stop."

Along with the letter, Cottrell filed an Affidavit and Petition For Rule to Show Cause in which he spelled out the so-called malicious acts: one nasty email, allegedly "verbally assaulting" (yelling really loudly) at his wife in front of their children, and making "outrageous and malicious statements about the wife and her family" (calling his father-in-law a murderer and saying Dina suffered a traumatic brain jury).

For the next six months, this was the dynamic: Surovell attempted to settle with a man paid not to settle until Chris Mackney ran out of money.

Dina Frustrates Chris's Parental Time

"Further creating tension for him was the fact that in that month (June 2008) his wife began restricting his visits with his children, a plan he now sees as deliberately aimed at creating frustration for him," according to a psychological evaluation.

"My wife has once again waited until the last minute and has ruined all my holiday plans for me and my children. This has happened over Halloween, Thanksgiving, and now Christmas." Mackney emailed Surovell.

Chris Mackney then filed a formal complaint with the Juvenile and Domestic Relations (JDR) Court of Fairfax County on October 7, 2008: "Over the last several weeks, my wife has denied me visitation with my children. Additionally, she has not facilitated communication with my children. I have left voicemails for my children which are not returned and dozens of emails and voicemails to see and speak to my children."

Cottrell moved this complaint to family court where it died.

In the complaint Mackney made what Cottrell considered disparaging remarks. "I am also very concerned about the mental health of my wife and her family. My wife had a severe head injury and has consistently shown bad faith and poor judgment since our decision to divorce. Her father is a convicted murderer and admitted drug trafficker and her sister is a habitual and long term drug user. Both of whom are left unsupervised with the children."

Though Dina played up her head injury in their lawsuit, she denied it had any lasting effect during the divorce, arguing the accusation disparaged her.

Over time Cottrell secured court orders forbidding Mackney from disparaging his ex-wife and her family, repeating allegations about Pete Scamardo, and eventually even orders to stop emailing his ex-wife.
On October 21, 2008, things boiled over; Chris Mackney picked up Ruby unannounced after school.

"The Potomac School just called in a panic," Dina emailed Chris urgently later that day. "You cannot just snatch a kid out without telling anyone or without signing her out."

"The bus radioed to the lower school that Ruby was not on the bus and yet Ruby's teacher said she left to get on the bus as usual."

"I was not aware of the protocol," Chris Mackney responded about ninety minutes later, "because you have not bothered to share any of Ruby's information with me."

Samenow's Bait and Switch

A father's rights group first recommended Dr. Stanton Samenow to Chris Mackney to do a psychological evaluation; Dina quickly made the idea hers because unbeknownst to Chris Mackney Samenow and Cottrell's law firm had a longstanding working relationship. Mackney and Samenow first spoke on October 20, 2008; on January 23, 2009, Chris and Dina Mackney settled on a temporary arrangement called a Pendente lite, meaning "awaiting the litigation" in Latin; Dr. Samenow was introduced into the divorce as part of this Pendente lite which also set visitation times.

Initially, Chris Mackney had standard non-custodial time: alternate weekends after school on Friday until Sunday at 5PM and every Wednesday after school until 6:45PM. Chris Mackney's parenting times were still frustrated by Dina's interference. Furthermore, a disastrous commercial real estate market along with crippling divorce costs caused Chris financial hardship forcing him to cancel other dates because he couldn't afford them.

Dr. Stanton Samenow is the author of several books including Inside the Criminal Mind, The Myth of out of Character Crime, and In the Best Interest of the Child. He's testified as an expert in criminal and civil trials thousands of times, most notably as an expert for the prosecution in the trial of Lee Boyd Malvo, the protégé of the Beltway Sniper, John Muhammad. He received mainstream attention when his 1977 study The Criminal Personality written with Dr. Samuel Yochelson was referenced in the penultimate episode of The Sopranos entitled Blue Comet. When Dr. Melfi's mentor and therapist Dr. Elliot Kupferberg played by Peter Bogdanovich realized that Tony Soprano was a sociopath, he confronted Dr. Melfi at a dinner party full of psychologists.

"So I googled any new stuff on sociopathic personalities. Apparently, the talking cure actually helps them become better criminals." Dr. Kupferberg said in the episode. "It was fascinating. The study was by Yochelson and Samenow. Studies turn around every few years. This other, I think it was Robert Hare, suggested that sociopaths actually quite glibly engage on key issues, like mother, family. I seem to remember that from residency."

It was this study- Dr. Melfi obsessively read the study later in the episode- which convinced Dr. Melfi to dump Tony Soprano.

The Toronto Star praised Samenow's work when reviewing the episode.

"The seminal mid-'70s work, conducted by Americans Stanton Samenow and the late Samuel Yochelson, suggested that criminals who undergo therapy actually learned to better manipulate others and that they are more likely to reoffend than those who do not go through therapy."

In his evaluation, Dr. Samenow said the Pendente lite tasked him with "performing a psychological evaluation and assessment of the parties and the minor children in order to make recommendations to the Court and the parties regarding what custodial arrangements would best suit the parties and the children."

This is psychological sleight of hand; he claimed to a psychological evaluation while describing a custody evaluation. A custody and psychological evaluation are distinct, and exactly as they sound; a psychological evaluation measures the psychological profile of the parents, and a custody evaluation provides a report on the best custody arrangement. In a psychological evaluation interviewing the children is not allowed and the evaluator is not allowed to make custody recommendations.

Mackney wanted Dr. Samenow to do a psychological evaluation because he believed Dina was a psychopath and a psychological evaluation would reveal it; a custody evaluation was a different matter. Dr. Samenow was tasked with doing a psychological evaluation but wound up doing a custody evaluation. In a subsequent hearing, Jim Cottrell said they were "the same thing", and they were "the same thing" in the same way an oil change is the same thing as a tune up. Chris Mackney made several complaints- the APA, ACFEI, the Virginia Board of Psychology, and others- that this amounted to fraud, but none of these bodies did anything.

Mackney's Spiral Continues

In March 2009, at a pre-trial custody hearing, Mackney's child support was set at $2,813 per month, based on his 2007 income of about $250,000. It would be bumped up by three dollars soon after and kept there the remainder of his life, long after his income could not support that amount. Mackney made next to nothing starting in the fall 2009.

"I honestly need some relief Mr. Bartol. I cannot pay the $2816 per month. I have not been able to pay it because I no longer work at the #1 real estate services company in the world and the real estate market is not as robust as it was in 2007." Mackney said in an email to Cottrell's law partner, Kyle Bartol, in January 2013, one of several desperate emails begging to reduce his child support.

In June 2009, Robert Surovell quit in frustration; he cited an inability to reach a deal, Cottrell's lack of cooperation, and because Chris could no longer afford to pay him.

This tragic case isn't getting any better. When I got into this case I sent you a proposal. It was a reasonable proposal. I've never received a response to it. Instead I have had motion after motion after motion trying to drag whatever you can out of Chris Mackney – his gun, his participation in a second experience with a mental health professional, money which he doesn't have, cessation of his drumbeat about his father-in-law's criminal background…Now you're trying to get him fired. That's exactly what is going to happen if you keep screwing around with his employer…You even asked for alimony for a wife who has been supported by her parents all the way through the age of forty-two. I mean no disrespect toward Dina. She is actually an interesting and industrious woman who has had remarkable success with her creativity designing and selling jewelry, but we all know that Chris has never supported her.

…

Now, my casual discovery that Mr. Scamardo's company seems to have had his daughter on the payroll in earlier years at a time when she wasn't rendering any services for them, appearing to deduct what would have otherwise been gifts and not deductible, raises some interesting questions which depositions and further discovery might elaborate.

Surovell was prescient on one point; Cottrell's legal bullying cost Mackney at least one job, CB Richard Ellis. Mackney was fired after Cottrell demanded the company be held in contempt for not producing Mackney's supervisor for a deposition.

Surovell didn't respond to an email for comment.

After letting Surovell go, Mackney was out of money and for most of the remainder of his life navigated the divorce pro se: representing himself.

When this happened Rich Ware advised him to withdraw entirely from the divorce, move to a country with no extradition treaty for back due child support if necessary. Terry Hindermann offered Mackney similar advice but he told me Mackney's competitive nature kept him fighting.

Samenow's Evaluation Bullies Chris

On August 3, 2009, Samenow delivered his custody evaluation blaming Chris Mackney for nearly everything. Samenow accused Chris Mackney of being "narcissistic", a "pathological liar", suggested that Dina feared his temper, referred to her "alleged" head injury, downplayed the murder calling it "the incident from the 1960's" which was "irrelevant" to custody.

Initially, Samenow and Van Syckle lobbied for supervised visitation for Mackney before settling on sole custody to Dina with Chris seeing his children about 5% of the time: four hours every other Wednesday and 10:00AM-7:30PM every other Saturday, and never over-night.

Samenow's son, Jason, is currently a weather editor for The Washington Post; when I suggested this might be why the paper passed on Chris's story, the paper's court reporter, Tom Jackman, said: "What does the guy who writes weather stories have to do with any of this? We aren't asking him if it's ok to cover anything on the news side. And he has zero influence on that. Dr. Samenow is who he is and you're taking him on. Have at it. If The Post wanted to take him on, we would. The weather guy would not get a say."

Chris Mackney Calls Pete Scamardo a Psychopath

"I have given you facts that if viewed with an open mind would lead a psychological professional to certainly CONSIDER THE POSSIBILITY that he could be a psychopath." Mackney said to Dr. Samenow in an email from December 9, 2009. "I also gave you the name John Sobecki to speak to about Mr. Scamardo's behavior. You did not contact him and you did not mention him in the report."
(Sobecki is a business colleague of Scamardo's; Samenow declined to interview him for the evaluation.)

Dr. Samenow immediately forwarded the email to Dina Mackney's attorneys and the pressure continued to ratchet up. This so-called independent expert routinely shared emails Chris sent him with Dina's side but never shared anything Dina sent him with Chris.

Chris Mackney's Custodial Rights Are Terminated

In September 2009, following his mother's death, Chris Mackney inherited approximately $156,000 and hired attorney James Watson to help prepare for a hearing in November 2009. Watson didn't respond to my email and I'm not sure how long he represented Mackney but it was short; Mackney was out of money again by the spring 2010.

With Samenow's report as leverage, Dina Mackney argued for sole custody and all marital assets at the hearing which Watson advised Mackney to accept, but Dina Mackney wanted even more.

At that hearing, Dina Mackney argued to cut off all contact between Chris Mackney and his children, despite no evidence to justify such drastic action.

Judge Bellows called the request "extraordinary" but found Chris Mackney violated a previous court order to stop sending harassing emails, suspended all visitations for three months, and invited a third shrink into the proceedings by requiring Mackney to receive a psychological evaluation.

This new evaluation, done by Dr. William Zuckerman, cost Mackney thousands more he didn't really have. In addition to interviewing Mackney and Samenow, Dr. Zuckerman also interviewed Dr. Colleen Blanchfield and Dr. Guy Van Syckle producing an objective report concluding Mackney was a frustrated litigant and a danger to no one: "At the same time, his narrative was consistent with the sense of him feeling overwhelmed, overmatched, not in control, and frustrated, along with some suggestive of depressive qualities…he presented material in a clear and organized fashion, reflecting no serious cognitive psychopathology."

Dr. Zuckerman then testified that there was no reason Chris Mackney shouldn't see his kids and Samenow, the so-called independent expert, testified for Dina Mackney. On direct examination, Samenow regurgitated Dina Mackney's version of events of the infamous fight from January 19, 2008; during his cross-examination, Mackney produced his ripped shirt and Samenow admitted Mackney had shown him this shirt in their sessions, unable to explain how the ripped shirt squared with his testimony on direct examination. Chris Mackney had a victory, albeit a short lived one.

"So after 6 months of being kept from my children by Judge Bellows, I was to have overnights again with my children for the first time in over a year, over Easter weekend," Mackney said in a blog post, but Dina Mackney filed a motion to stop overnight visits.

During this time, Mackney had moved into an apartment and was ordered to fax over a copy of the lease and a receipt for first payment to Dina's lawyers. Mackney didn't write down the instructions and only faxed a copy of the lease. On April 1, Chris Mackney's Kafkaesque nightmare climaxed when this was used as the reason to remove overnight visits.

"Judge Bellows was told that I was going from memory and that the fax of the lease communicated all the information requested." Mackney said in a blog post of what happened next. "When I objected to the fact that he was taking away visitation because I failed to send a copy of the receipt, which had nothing to do with my children, I became very frustrated and upset. So then Judge Bellows then took away all visitation, simply because I forgot to send a copy of a receipt in a fax."

In June 2010, Judge Bellows made it permanent by issuing a final order forbidding Chris Mackney from ever seeing or speaking on the phone with his children which he never did for the rest of his life.
http://www.amazon.com/dp/B0149ERBBI

Feminism: Mission Accomplished!

Catreece Macleod · 24 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I'd kept hearing that there were things like women being paid 77 cents for every dollar a man makes, or how rape culture permeates our social consciousness, or how domestic violence against women was so common that we shouldn't even consider looking out for children.

And then I read this post:

The word "Flattering" is the #1 enemy of feminism today.

Oh, such a relief. We've won! We've WON! Every injustice and problem in the world facing women today has been solved except for trivial crap like manspreading, microaggressions, and mere words like "bossy" and "flattering" to the point that "flattering", of all things, is now the single greatest threat to women the world over!

Can you see the tears welling up in my eyes? Tears of joy? We've done it! We can literally disband feminism entirely at this point! We can finally go home. Or, well, I mean to the kitchen to eat ice cream instead of making sammiches, since we're at home blogging about stuff anyway instead of working. You know what I mean.

Seriously though, it's really uplifting to hear that the term "flattering" is the #1 enemy of feminism today. I didn't want to believe it at first, so I did some digging around, and sure enough, the wage gap has been debunked hundreds of times, and even in the original study which was cited as the source of such, it said flat out that women's choices were easily able to explain it away. Ha ha, so silly, such impetuousness in our youth like five minutes ago believing that. Heck, Warren Farrel, only man ever elected three times to the Board of the National Organization for Women in NYC, went through the whole thing quite amazingly in his book "Why Men Earn More," so really, who better to speak about this? Now we can embrace women's agency and life choices, how we're smart enough to know money is probably the least important aspect of choosing a job and how foolish those men are for ignoring everything from health benefits to commutes to risk of physical harm, or psychological harm due to isolation and such. Seriously, we're free of the wage gap, and that fills my heart with joy.

Even more than that, I checked up the latest statistics: I can WALK OUTSIDE AT NIGHT! SWEET! According to the Bureau of Justice Statistics in the USA, white women have less than 5% of the chance of being mugged than black men do! We've triumphed yet again!

Even rape culture has been torn down. The most recent FBI study in Texas found that by including men in rape statistics, not even men who were forced to penetrate, but just men by the same standard as women, they now comprise about 62% of all rapes in the state. If we included guys who were forced to penetrate a woman, or who had sex while intoxicated or who were pressured into such, men would comprise over 80% of all rapes! And this is TEXAS! Possibly the single most uber-conservative state there is! If women are the least likely to get raped there of all places, then we've freaking nailed it! We've yet again achieved a safer world for women!

Oh man, I am getting stoked! I mean, oh woman. Something like that. Anyway!

Domestic violence against women is about half that as domestic violence against men if you ignore those horrible people who hit each other, isn't that great? Women are HALF as likely to be the victims of domestic violence! Chalk up yet another one for feminism! We're on a freaking roll today!

Yep, after doing the research, it looks like you're right. It turns out the word "flattering" really is the #1 enemy of feminism today. I bet if we just blog about it for awhile and demand they remove it from the dictionary it'll probably go away, so fortunately that's not much effort.

I'll just get my manslave to write it up for me while I gorge myself on ice cream. Catch you girls later for the victory party!

Oh, and P.S.: And I'll tell you, I am SO glad we got rid of that awful fat shaming already. I'mma wallow like a pig in this chocolate ice cream. Yum! A well deserved and just dessert!

The feminist war on fun and human nature

AVfM Video Source · 24 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists are at war with fun (particularly anything that's fun for men) and with human nature itself, says our own Lucian Vâlsan. And he's not exaggerating – he comes up with mainstream feminist examples to back up his allegations. Definitely worth a watch.

You can subscribe to Lucian's Freedom Alternative, here.

Need for Men’s Rights: Amit Deshpande TEDxJuhu

AVfM Video Source · 24 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Just survive somehow: A guide for college men

August Løvenskiolds · 25 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The extreme feminist hostility to men on campus makes college a minefield for everyone, students, faculty and administration alike.

For men who choose college the stakes are enormous: most are taking on decades of student loan debt and so they need to get the best possible educations and employment credentials from the experience. On the other hand, we need men's rights advocates and activists on campus to push back hard against the feminist hysteria that is destroying both the college experience and the lives of too many men. Becoming an MRA can be dangerous for students as the MRA label makes you a target for feminists and feminists hold institutional power on almost all campuses.

I often struggle with what to tell men caught in this situation – protect yourself, or take the risk of fighting for your rights as an MRA?

Both my parents worked at a small college so I grew up in that environment – as a toddler my daycare was my dad's physical chemistry class. I managed to dodge the authoritarian, anti-male aspects of my college education while both having a lot of fun and organizing a protest against the infringement of free speech. But it took a recent episode of a television show to crystallize my thinking on the tension between the risks of activism and dangers of feminism: Just Survive Somehow.

Episode 602 of The Walking Dead, which aired 10/18/2015 on the AMC network, was entitled "JSS." At the end of the episode we learn "JSS" means Just Survive Somehow – the three-word goodbye note left behind by a young woman character named Enid, age 15. Enid makes the decision to leave an embattled community because she decides she is safer on her own. (This season of The Walking Dead has been excellent – I highly recommend it.)

If men or women are willing to take up the challenge of becoming campus activists for men's rights, I am grateful and happy to ally with them. If they decide to Just Survive Somehow, that's also an excellent choice. Sometimes these choices become one in the same. In either case, in navigating the minefield of campus feminists, it is helpful to have a map, and that is what this article is about.

Having sex with women on campus these days should be avoided in order to minimize the risk that she will file a rape hoax against you, but even that is no guarantee: the UVA rape hoax was triggered in a bid by Jackie Coakley to get romantic sympathy from a man who had friend-zoned her. At Brown University, a rape hoax was triggered when a guy failed to talk to a woman at a party. The Columbia "mattress girl" rape hoax began when Paul drifted away from Emma Sulkowicz. And, of course, the great feminist triumph Roe V. Wade began as a rape hoax concocted for political purposes and the hoax was only dropped when it failed to advance those political ends.

The feminist pressures placed on heterosexual women in college turn them all into hot messes. A normal het woman in college is facing a rigged numbers game: there are only 2 men for every 3 women. Remove the gay men from the dating pool and the numbers move closer to 2 women for each man. In addition to being doomed numerically, the feminists have powerful sexual competition – nonfeminist women are at the peak age (around age 20) of their sexual attractiveness, plus, they watching their weight, styling their long tresses, shaving their body hair, wearing makeup, dressing in sexy clothing, appreciating men for being masculine, and smiling at men's advances – all activities that are strongly discouraged for feminist women lest they "appeal to the male gaze." Feminists trying to compete against such women must feel as frustrated and pointless as a team trying to play baseball without bats or gloves.

Deciding to wear makeup or seek men's approval are huge crimes against feminism. One feminist put it this way:

> The obvious threats to feminism today are the same as they have always been, the main ones being the existence of patriarchy and the backlash from that system when it hits out against any challenges to its > continuation. However, there are more insidious and less obvious threats. These dangers hide in plain sight, and come partly in the form of a version of feminism known as "choice feminism"….

>
> Instead, there are choices about what amount of makeup to wear, whether to go "natural" or try mascara that makes your eyelashes look like false eyelashes, or what diet drink to buy, or whether or not to make the first move with a man – or other such modern and edgy decisions of the sort which face the feisty, sassy, pull-no-punches liberated woman of today. Excuse me while I am sick.

In addition to their incompetence and unwillingness to pretend to physical attractiveness, feminists are emotionally compromised by their cultivated hatred of men and sex – feminist women are conflicted by a sex drive that needs men, which stands in opposition to their distrust of even those men who stupidly claim to be feminists, thinking that this will make feminists like them.

But let's say, hypothetically, that despite her neuroses, red clown hair, side shave, and 60 pounds of extra weight in all the wrong places, a feminist student manages to lure a drunk guy into her bed by begging for a pity fuck. Men are good-natured souls and they also understand that it is dangerous to say no to a feminist, and especially bad to refuse to fuck them.

By cultivating the aura of unattractiveness, the feminist has sabotaged the man's sex drive, and the alcohol won't help him get and keep an erection. The feminist's vibrator addiction will set an impossible standard for the sexual performance of the drunk guy, and while he slurs out the litany of affirmative consent demands in the vain hope of dodging a rape hoax, his boner is wasting away in the pleasure-killing condom. Because she eschews porn as abusive to women (who love showing off their skills in porn, and are paid more handsomely than men for it), the feminist has no clue how to get the guy hard.

Of course he is not going to call her back nor talk to her at a future party. She was the worst lay of his life and there is zero chance it will get better. Attempting to teach a feminist how to fuck is impossible – at best, she will dismiss you as a mansplainer. at worst, she will attack you with a knife.

When this freshly, barely fucked feminist goes crying to her friends, OF COURSE they will demand she charge the drunk guy with rape – how DARE he disrespect her like that!

A New Defense

In a fraught situation like this, the first student to file a campus complaint usually wins because the rules are strongly slanted in the complainer's favor. You should review the campus sexual discrimination complaint rules carefully. Under many of them, the first to complain has a variety of protections that the second to complain (respondent) does not. For example, the first complainer can use drunkenness as a factor in his/her favor, but the respondent cannot use drunkenness as a defense, even if the complainer was sober. The complainer can go where he/she likes, but the responder may be forced to avoid the complainer and is not allowed to talk about the case, since this might be seen as retaliation against the complainer. The complainer may be assigned a counsel, but the respondent is forbidden one.

Your best defense against feminists is the preëmptive strike – learn the rules thoroughly, get copies of the forms you need to file and be ready to file them at (or even before) the first hint of trouble.

- If a feminist flirts with you, pretend to be flattered until you can file a harassment claim against her. Your failure to file first opens the door for her to file first, and in that case, you are doomed.
- If you wake up with a feminist in your bed, sprint to the aptly named student affairs office and file a complaint.

Now, some may well claim that even if you file first, the campus authorities will disregard this because you are a man. If you are careful to follow all the rules, this would be great news for you and financial suicide for the college: it is a Title IX violation that can cost them their federal funding, usually millions of dollars. Play this right, and college administrators/insurance carriers will run after you, pelting you with cash, to try to stop you from pursuing your solid legal case against them.

At this point, the feminist will have forced you to act like an MRA. Accept the title, or deny it – it matters not to us.

We know what you've become. You survived, somehow.

Paul responds to Skep Torr on Laughing Witch

Paul Elam · 25 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Medieval life expectancy: gender difference through history

Douglas Galbi · 26 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

In England, homicides per capita fell roughly by a factor of thirty from the fourteenth-century to the late twentieth century.[1] This progress of civilization wasn't associated with a secular reduction in gender inequality in life expectancy. Elite men's life expectancy in medieval England was perhaps nine years less than elite women's. Men achieved near equality with women in life expectancy in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. But men's lifespan shortfall subsequently grew to about five years in late-twentieth-century England. These facts of gender difference in life expectancy are largely unknown. Reducing gender inequality that disfavors men has never been of public concern. Whether that anti-men bias continues may determine the future of civilization.

Violence against men in late medieval England made men's life expectancy much less than women's. The best available data are for the legitimate offspring of British kings, queens, dukes, and duchesses. For such persons born from 1330 to 1479, men's and women's expected additional years of life at age twenty were 21.7 years and 31.1 years, respectively. Men at age twenty thus expected to have 9.4 less additional years of life than women had. The share of violent deaths to all deaths for men ages 15 and older was 46%. If men dying from violence are excluded from the life-expectancy calculation, men and women at age twenty had nearly the same expected additional years of life.[2] Violence against men in medieval England explains why men expected to have much shorter lives than women did.

Men probably had much shorter life expectancy than women did across late medieval Europe. The sparse available evidence indicates that the male/female ratio of homicide victims was 13, 7, and 3, in the thirteenth-to-sixteenth centuries, the seventeenth century, and the eighteenth century, respectively.[3] The leading scholar of long-term historical trends in homicide observed:

> Generally, the shift toward lower homicide rates appears to have been primarily — but not exclusively — a drop in male-to-male violent encounters. [4]

Violence has always been vastly disproportionately directed against men.[5] Homicidal violence was high enough in medieval Europe to be a considerable factor in life expectancy. These facts imply that medieval European men had a considerable life-expectancy shortfall relative to women.[6]

During the European Age of Enlightenment of the seventeenth and eighteenth century, women and men apparently had nearly equal lifespans. Life expectancy calculated from English parish registers indicates that males had roughly a half-year advantage in life expectancy on average across the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.[7] The experience of the Age of Enlightenment makes clear that there is nothing natural or inevitable about men suffering relatively short life expectancy. Use of reason in pursuing social reform can promote gender equality in the most fundamental dimension: gender equality in life expectancy.

The growth of men's life expectancy shortfall from the early nineteenth century to the late twentieth century probably reflects men's historically disproportionate burden of financially supporting families. In England, excluding decades of world wars, men's life expectancy shortfall peaked at 6.2 years in the 1970s.[8] In the U.S., men's life expectancy shortfall peaked at 7.7 years about 1970. Subsequent movement toward gender equality in life expectancy is plausibly associated with women's greater participation in the paid labor force, particularly in highly stressful jobs previously associated with men.

Much work remains to be done to achieve gender equality in life expectancy. Men continue to face enormous gender discrimination in family court decisions. Men continue to be deprived of equal opportunities with women to withdraw temporarily or permanently from the paid workforce and be financially supported by their partners or spouses. The effects of gender inequality can be measured ultimately in life. In England and the U.S., men currently fall about four years short in life expectancy relative to women. The long shadow of medieval chivalry remains in devaluing men's lives to this day.[9]

Notes:

[1] Eisner (2003) p. 96, Fig. 3:

Cf. Pinker (2011) p. 61, Fig. 3-2, "Source: Graph from Eisner, 2003."

[2] Hollingsworth (1957) pp. 10, 8. Life expectancy at birth was 24.0 years for males and 32.9 years for females. The full time-series data are available in the life-expectancy gender trend worksheet.

In documenting medieval English mortality, Clark (2007), Table 6.2 p. 122, has an imprecise population description ("English aristocrats") and an incorrect source citation. Table 6.2's data on life expectancy at birth are for British kings, queens, dukes, and duchesses. Its source is Hollingsworth (1957) p. 8. The data on "fraction of deaths from violence" appears to be an estimate for male deaths from violence relative to all male deaths, rather than the directly reported figures for the male violent death share for deaths after age 15. Clark's estimates appear to be made by using the survivors per 100 males born at age 5 and 20 (64 and 54, respectively), id. p. 11, to estimate 57 survivors at age 15. Assuming all violent deaths occurred after age 15 gives Clark's Table 6.2 violent death share estimates. Pinker (2011) p. 81, Fig. 3-7, is a line graph of Clark's death share estimates, described as for "English male aristocrats."

[3 Eisner (2003) p. 118, Table 5.

[4] Id. p. 119.

[5] Deuteronomy 20:12-15 describes a general commandment to massacre all the men, but take the women and children as spoils. A mass grave at Schöneck-Kilianstädten (Germany) from about 7000 years ago clearly indicates a massacre of at least nine men ages 20 to 40, no women of those ages, and eleven children ages seven or under. That demographic distribution strongly suggests that women ages 20 to 40 were present, but abducted rather than killed. Meyer et al. (2015). Demographic data from human groups at Sredny Stog and Novodanylovka about 7000 years ago indicate that life expectancy at birth was 7.8 years longer for females than for males. Estimated life expectancy at birth was for females, 43.6 years; for males, 35.8 years.

[6] Prospects of survival apparently favored aristocratic women relative to aristocratic men in tenth and eleventh century Saxony. Violence against men is a plausible explanation. Leyser (1975) pp. 56-7. Leading medieval biologist Albertus Magnus in his Cologne lectures in 1258 declared that, in exception to an Aristotelian generality, women then outlived men. See Albertus Magnus, Quaestiones super libris de animalibus, Bk. 15, quaestio 8. Herlihy (1975), pp. 11-2, found Albertus's view consistent with other medieval evidence from the thirteenth to fifteenth centuries. For a detailed, somewhat tendentious review of Albertus's claim, Biller (2000) pp. 286-95. Here are links to Albertus's works available online.

Among first marriages in the elite Nesle family in northern France, 1100 to 1300, wives outlived husbands nearly two to one. Hadju (1980) p. 129. The implications of that statistic for gender differences in life expectancy depends on gender differences in age at first marriage. Among person born in British ducal families from 1330 to 1470, men at first marriage were 5.3 years older than women at first marriage. Hollingsworth (1957) p. 14. In the Nesle family data, the average length of widowhood was 19.5 years and 35% of widows remarried. Those facts suggest that widows' former husbands were dying quite young.

[7] Wrigley (1997) Figure 6.21, Table 6.27, pp. 307-8. These calculations included only married persons. Childbirth created some additional mortality risk for women. If unmarried persons were included, then perhaps women would have had a slight life expectancy advantage. For the data, see the life expectancy gender trend worksheet.

[8] Based on national vital statistics for England and Wales. Estimates compiled in the Human Mortality Database. See the life expectancy gender trend worksheet for details.

[9] Chivalry can take subtle forms. Consider the UK Longevity Science Advisory Panel's conclusions on gender inequality in life expectancy:

> The gender gap in human lifespan is profoundly affected by societal and behavioural factors and movement towards greater parity in lifestyle between men and women is a major factor in the recent reduction in gender gap in life expectancy. Nevertheless there is such a significant range of genetic, endocrine, cell and molecular biology differences between men and women with impacts on longevity that we are led to the conclusion that a gender difference in longevity will persist. At age 65 this is probably of the order of 1-2 years.
> Finally we believe that raw data exists which could be analysed to eliminate social and environmental factors and provide a more accurate estimate of the underlying gender gap in longevity. We plan to explore this possibility in the near future.

Pattison et al. (2012) p. 44. Humans have never and can not exist apart from "social and environmental factors." The "underlying gender gap in longevity" is a meaningless concept. Achieving gender equality in the fundamental human capability of being alive is clearly feasible. The remaining important question is whether gender equality is truly a constitutional public value.

[image] Knights killing other knights while women watch and applaud. Illustration from Codex Manesse, Zurich, created between 1305 and 1315. UB Heidelberg, Cod. Pal. germ. 848, fol. 17r. Thanks to University of Hiedelberg and Wikimedia Commons.

References:

Biller, Peter. 2000. The measure of multitude: population in medieval thought. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Clark, Gregory. 2007. A farewell to alms: a brief economic history of the world. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Eisner, Manuel. 2003. "Long-Term Historical Trends in Violent Crime." Crime and Justice. 30: 83-142.

Hajdu, Robert. 1980. "The Position of Noblewomen in the Pays Des Coutumes, 1100-1300." Journal of Family History. 5 (2): 122-144.

Herlihy, David. 1975. "Life Expectancies for Women in Medieval Society." Pp. 1-22 in Rosmarie Thee Morewedge, ed. 1975. The role of women in the Middle Ages: papers of the sixth annual conference of the Center for Medieval and Early Renaissance Studies, State University of New York at Binghamton 6-7 May 1972. Albany, N.Y.: State University of New York Press.

Hollingsworth, T. H. 1957. "A Demographic Study of the British Ducal Families." Population Studies. 11 (1): 4.

Leyser, Karl. 1979. Rule and conflict in an early medieval society: Ottonian Saxony. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.

Meyer, Christian, Christian Lohr, Detlef Gronenborn, and Kurt W. Alt. 2015. "The massacre mass grave of Schöneck-Kilianstädten reveals new insights into collective violence in Early Neolithic Central Europe." PNAS (Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences, US). Published online before print August 17, 2015, doi: 10.1073/pnas.1504365112 The online supplement includes the demographic data on the bodies in the grave.

Pattison, John, Klim McPHerson, Colin Blakemore, Steven Haberman. 2012. Life expectancy: Past and future variations by gender in England & Wales. LSAP paper 2. Longevity Science Advisory Panel.

Pinker, Steven. 2011. The better angels of our nature: why violence has declined. New York: Viking.

Wrigley, E.A. 1997. English population history from family reconstitution, 1580-1837. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License.

Lucian Vâlsan on slacktivists and concern trolls

AVfM Video Source · 26 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Our own Lucian Vâlsan has gotten tired of those who keep on insisting that all of us should just passively take whatever toss is being thrown at us by feminists and Social Justice Worriers (sic!). He goes on to remind us that this is exactly what kept the M(H)RM behind for many decades. Definitely worth a watch.

You can subscribe to Lucian's Freedom Alternative, here.

The Red Pill meets goals

Paul Elam · 27 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

As those of you following Cassie Jaye's Kickstarter for her movie The Red Pill know, she has reached her goal of $97,000 as of earlier today. I'd like to extend my congratulations to her and my best wishes for her efforts to reach her stretch goal so she can produce an even higher quality movie.

Even though the victory goes to Ms. Jaye, I have the need to offer up some thanks.

For the past six years AVFM has had mud kicked in its face by a corrupt, left-wing media. Bottom feeders like Adam Serwer, Jeff Sharlet and Mariah Blake have performed endless unscrupulous acts, directly lying to their readers in order to attack AVFM, this movement and me personally.

Their work was not just to harm me, or to damage a website but to make sure if they could that the message we carry never found its way to the larger public. Their intent was and is to paint an indelible stain on all of us so hideous that we would never be taken seriously by enough people to matter.

They have failed, and I can now predict that they have failed miserably.

Cassie Jaye, a young but highly accomplished filmmaker engaged me two and half years ago because she wanted to make a movie about the MHRM. We entered a tenuous relationship, neither of us fully trusting the other, near all of that mistrust attributable to the hacks mentioned above and others of their ilk. I am indeed not sure that either of us will ever fully get over that.

What I believe though, is that Cassie Jaye is a filmmaker with integrity. She takes on controversial subjects and allows the lens to bring them into focus in the minds of her audience. I believe that this is what Cassie Jaye will do with this movie. If the extended trailer was any indication of it, I will be proven right beyond doubt.

I also know for a fact that she has suffered for her convictions. If she hadn't, no fundraiser would have been needed for her, a feminist Cannes winner for Best Documentary.

Enough of that for now. I want to offer some thanks. To Milo Yiannopoulos for smashing the ball over the fence with yesterday's piece on the project and its funding troubles, creating frenetic participation in the drive. Thanks also to Mike Cernovich for coming in at precisely the right moment to offer 10k in matching funds — assuring that the goal would be met. Thanks must also go to the 10k donors, the 5k donors, the 5 dollar donors and everyone in between.

And of course, thanks to Cassie Jaye of Jaye Bird productions for delivering to the world exactly what it needs to hear – all sides of the story. From where we sit around here, that was all that was ever needed.

I note that many of these people, maybe most of them, are people that have had issues or concerns about us at one time or another. Whatever reservations they had about the Men's Human Rights Movement they set them aside for the principle of a fair hearing for people with ideas.

All those donors, over a thousand of them, saw the same trailer that you did. There was no mistaking its message, and they coughed up hard earned money to help allow us to be heard.

We owe a debt of gratitude to all of them.

Now sit back and watch this again. Enjoy it for a moment, because distribution on this thing is bound to be one hell of a ride and we will be following all of it.

Translating feminist-speak into Christian terminology

August Løvenskiolds · 27 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Feminism is increasingly infiltrating Christianity to the quiet dismay of a lot of believers I know in my personal life. My Christian friends accept that I am more a student of religious faith than a practitioner of any religion. I should also note that, although I am too skeptical to take the "leap of faith" necessary to be a Christian, I have no animosity to religion itself, but I do oppose certain religious practices for cause – involuntary circumcision, for example.

I should also note that A Voice for Men is a secular site, and my discussion of Christianity is not intended to promote nor detract from that faith. I'll leave the translation of feminism into other faiths to those who are better versed in those faiths than me.

The feminist infiltration of Christianity has gone on for a long time. My former intellectual sparring buddy, Lutheran pastor, and late Catholic priest Richard John Neuhaus put it this way in 1990:

> Elizabeth Achtemeier, professor of Bible at Union Theological Seminary, Virginia, has flatly asserted that radical feminist theology is "another religion." Some may think that judgment excessive. After all, there are many women who think of themselves as feminists and are also determined to be orthodox Christians. Here the distinction between feminist and radical feminist comes into play. Women (and men) who say they are feminists often mean to say no more than that they think women should be treated more fairly than they have been treated in the past. They want the views, influences, and experiences of women to be taken more fully into account. They want women to have a greater opportunity to participate in all activities where gender differences are not pertinent. No sensible person can argue against feminism so defined. But such feminism has little or nothing to do with feminist theology today.
>
> There is a world of difference between feminism as fairness and feminism as ideology. Feminist theology, almost by definition, reflects the second kind of feminism. Unfortunately, ideological feminism frequently succeeds in infiltrating feminism as fairness. One reason for that is that women who feel frustrated in their quest for fairness are susceptible to the suggestion that unfairness is "systemic," is built into the very structure of Christianity. That suggestion, indeed that dogma, is the keystone of feminist theology. Feminist theology may be expressed in "moderate" or "radical" forms, but the enterprise itself is inherently radical.

Nothing has changed in the 25 years since Father Neuhaus wrote that: newb "choice" feminists still deny that they are the cannon fodder for the man-hating radfems even though radical feminism would be more disreputable than the Ku Klux Klan without them.

Still in doubt? Imagine how radical feminism would be received without naïve, hot young celebrities like Beyonce and Emma "#HeForShe" Watson in their corner.

For the thesis that feminism is a religion to succeed as a metaphor, one must draw a number of parallels between feminism and religion so that one can become a working model for the other. A successful metaphor between two classes (in this case, feminists and believers) allows us to generalize strategies for dealing with the classes: a factor that helps/hurts one should help/hurt the other, if the metaphor has power. There is no correct nor incorrect metaphor – a metaphor is either useful, or not.

For example, consider the idea that "things expand when they are heated." This is true of most materials; metals, glass, most gasses, and so on, but it fails for ice (which melts into a smaller volume of water) and room temperature rubber (which contracts under heat, behavior that is the basis for "shrink wrap").

So, with the warning that metaphors can be imperfect, lets translate feminist jargon into Christianity.

"Problematic" –

To feminists, “problematic” means “sin” or “sinful”: it is a transgression against women in the same fashion as “sin” is a transgression against God (or the laws of God). This leads us naturally to the next translation:

“Women as a class” –

To feminists, “women as a class” are God – perfect, pure, all-powerful beings whose judgement is not to be questioned. Someone who doubts a woman’s word has its own special term:

“Misogynist” –

This term translates as “atheist,” or “skeptic.” Such a person is inherently untrustworthy and is frozen out of all discussions of faith regardless of the objective, verifiable truth of what he says.

“Radical feminist” or “radfem” –

This term translates as “fundamentalist” – usually a long term, erudite believer who is more concerned with protecting the faith from apostasy than expanding the faith by soft-peddling the harsher requirements of dogma. Tends to be overly concerned with dogma, according to others. The more extreme the radical feminist/fundamentalist, the smaller the admitted class of true believers, which can often shrink down to just one person, the radfem/fundamentalist herself/himself.

“Moderate” feminist –

This is an evangelical who is more concerned with expanding the faith than with a strict adherence to dogma. Radfems and moderates, like fundamentalists and evangelicals, are often confused in the minds and media of the outside world and have the same internal conflicts that the outside world tends to overlook and/or misunderstand. For example, radfems reject an individual woman’s “empowerment” in the same way that a fundamentalist might eschew “good works” as a key to salvation.

“Educate yourself” –

This is the same as “Read the bible” – a dismissive phrase used to redirect a questioner/seeker away from open verbal inquiry into a contentious issue of faith.

“Choice” feminist –

This translates as “convert” – a new believer in feminism who embodies the liberating aspects of the faith without grasping or internalizing the changes in behavior demanded by holy scripture.

“Patriarchy” (“Men as a class”) –

This translates as “evil,” Devils,” or “Hell on Earth”. This is the doctrine that the Earth is fallen from grace and in control of Satan.

“Male Privilege” –

This is the feminist version of “original sin”: all men (men only) are tainted with male privilege:

> One of the hardest parts of coming to grips with the depth and breadth of the patriarchy is recognizing that there are no exceptions. Maybe you didn’t, personally, do anything wrong, but you were still born into a power structure that gave you unjust rewards. The system — whether it’s the patriarchy or white supremacy or capitalism — does not offer special exemptions for individuals with good intentions. And that should make you mad: The fact is that even though you know better, and are truly a male feminist, you’re still stuck being the bad guy. You can’t opt out of the privileges you inherited at birth. Or, as my (male) feminist friend once put it, “I’m not one of the good ones and neither are you and neither is anyone, FYI.”

“Smash the Patriarchy” –

The feminist version of “go and sin no more.” In other words, feel bad, do nothing, and enjoy nothing of this world.

“Intersectionality” –

This is a weird amalgam of missionary work to foreign lands/inner cities and “the nobility of the savage” – the idea that those who have yet to hear the gospel are less guilty of sin because they don’t know any better Feminists believe that certain classes of people are less sinful (“God’s chosen people”) and more credible than they are (until proven otherwise).

“White feminism” –

These are the High Church Episcopalians of feminism – upper class, and absorbed in upper class problems. Enough said.

“Slut walks” –

These are the feminist version of camp meetings of evangelicals – raw, emotion-laden appeals for converts.

“Inclusivity” –

This is like ecumenical efforts designed to bring various sects together for common cause. Such efforts are short-lived and usually dissolve into partisan warfare.

“The male gaze” –

This is the pervasive evil that permeates society and leads to sin. Feminists try to subvert the male gaze by dressing outlandishly to attract the male gaze, and then assailing as horrible those men who gaze at them in horror.

“Microaggression” –

A small affront (venial sin) to the faith. For example, saying “happy holidays” is a microaggression against people who say “Merry Christmas” and saying “Merry Christmas” is a microaggression against atheists and Jews. For a feminist, a man saying “Good morning” to a woman is a microaggression because he did not ask her permission before speaking – indeed, even asking permission, holding open a door, or looking at a woman with the “male gaze” is a microaggression.

“Sexual harasser” –

A man who asks for permission or consent to court (date) a woman.

“Male entitlement” –

The idea that men are allowed to ask for consent to date a woman.

“Sexually empowered woman” –

A woman who asks a man on a date. The idea of asking a man for permission or consent is completely alien to feminism – women are entitled to do whatever they want regardless of consent or the marital status of either the man or woman.

“Homosexual”

A man who refuses a woman’s request for sexual intercourse. A woman who refuses a man’s request for sexual intercourse is “a victim of verbal domestic violence.”

“Internalized misogyny” –

A disorder of a non-virgin woman; the state of a woman, both mentally and physically, who agrees to sexual intercourse with any man, including her husband. In general it is used for any woman who likes, loves, defends, or appreciates men – for example, a faithful, loving wife and mother is said to suffer from “internalized misogyny.”

“Listen and believe” and “Believe the victim” –

This is the “leap of faith” – the willingness to accept faith in God absent objective proof of God. For feminists, any claim of rape, abuse or harassment made by a woman, no matter how outlandish or objectively false, must be believed without question, sort of like accepting as literally true a story about a talking snake without ears or vocal chords.

“The sisterhood” –

This is the feminist version of the magisterium (teaching authority).

“Male feminists” –

Monks, especially the self-flagellating sort. Male feminist leaders are rarer than female priests and even more strongly discouraged.

“Gender studies” (also, “women’s studies”).

This is an amalgam of catechism classes, Sunday school, worship, and even volunteer work. The closest parallel in Christianity is called “church.”

“Abortion clinic” –

This is similar to a baptismal, except that during the processes performed there, the child’s soul is sent to heaven with no delay, avoiding the pitfalls of being corrupted by further physical contact with women.

“Mansplaining” –

This is a term feminists use when they are familiar with the content of a sermon and annoyed that a man is reiterating it instead of fawning over them.

After 27 or so examples, I think I’ve established enough parallels to show that we can treat feminism as a religion. I invite others to submit their own example in the comments, and indeed,

Have a Blessed Day.

Cassie Jaye is funded. Now let's deal with the troll pledges.

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 28 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

One of the unfortunate aspects of Kickstarter is something known as a 'troll pledge', a tactic haters can deploy in an attempt to ruin a Kickstarter. Someone pledges an amount (the bigger, the better), and then, 25 hrs before the campaign ends, withdraws their pledge, giving the Kickstarter no time to make up the difference. Even worse, someone can pledge an amount, using a credit card, (again, the bigger, the better), and then cancel the credit card, meaning the Kickstarter has to pay the fees on that pledge, but is then left with no way to collect the pledge.

Does Cassie have troll pledges? Almost certainly. There are a whole lot of people who do not want to see Cassie make this film, and troll pledging is one of the things they can do to interfere with her funding drive.

There are two things we can do to mitigate against the troll pledges. One is to overfund Cassie's kickstarter, which is already happening!

Cassie has upgraded her funding to $114K, which will allow her to host official theatrical screenings, which means the film qualifies for consideration in the Oscar race. That would be amazing! She is currently at $106K, and counting. If we can get her Kickstarter up to $125K or even better, she will be able to host those screenings, and absorb the losses from troll pledges.

> UPDATE: STRETCH GOAL: $114,000
>
> If you've been following our Kickstarter campaign's journey, then you may be aware that we went from 27% funded (and looking like it would fail) to SURPASSING OUR GOAL IN ONE DAY!
>
> We are so grateful to all of the backers who have stood up for freedom of speech, and now, because of you, we will be able to COMPLETE this film! But why stop at the bare minimum? Why not take this film as far as it can go and force mainstream media to take notice? We now have a STRETCH GOAL of $114,000 so that we can host a bi-coastal theatrical screening and officially qualify this film for the Academy Awards! LET'S DO THIS!

The second thing we can do is collect a second pot of money that trolls can't touch, which is what I am trying to do with my Put Milo's Name in Lights! GoFundMe project. No one strategy is better than another. All the money I collect will go from my paypal account into hers, with no trolly hands in the pot at all.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=tX2khCOS8iY

Cassie will be on Milo's livestream today at 6PM EST, and she will be joining me and the Ralph Retort on our Halloween Killstream on Saturday, at 6PM EST. She has a solid round of media appearances booked for the next 14 days, to hit her stretch goal of $114K.

This is an exciting time, but until the money is in the bank, it's all just chickens, waiting to hatch.

Let's make Cassie's dream come true, because she's telling a story we care about, and because Cassie's dreams just might be our dreams, too.

[Ed. Note: This article originally appeared at www.judgybitch.com and is reprinted here with permission.]

It's time to think before you cut

Paul Elam · 28 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

And if you perform circumcisions, you may want to think about it carefully.

How is it, do you suppose, that we can ever seriously talk about men's and boy's advocacy if we do not first and foremost advocate for the most vulnerable and defenseless among us? If you think you know where this is leading you are probably right.

Twenty percent of men across the world, about 650 million, entered life in blinding, excruciating pain as they were sexually mutilated in the name of tradition, religion or a cosmetic choice of their parents; so that the child would look more like his father.

Too many baby boys die from this "procedure," others are the victims of botched jobs leaving them disfigured and sexually disabled for life. To be even more frank, using the term "botched" is actually a misnomer because it is saying that what happened was a botched mutilation, which makes no real sense.

This is what reliable science shows: circumcision is nothing more than a euphemism for a cruel, barbaric and scientifically unsupported practice that is just too profitable for the medical establishment to leave alone and too entrenched in religious practice to challenge.

Would you want his genitals cut if you had to hold the blade?

Worse, with the development of genetic technology, foreskins have become a profitable business. Selling for upwards of $400 each, doctors and clinics are now being paid twice for making the cut. Once for the mutilation itself and again for the organ they amputate (NSFW) from baby boys so it can be used for stem cell research and high-end beauty cream.

This, all of this, must stop. And from this day forward we are going to dedicate a very significant amount of our resources to making that happen.

On behalf of AVfM Education, LLC, it is my pleasure to announce the launch of neonatalcutting.org (NNC), a website that will add a new dimension to the fight to end a culture of mutilation perpetrated for profit on infant boys across the world.

Our experience in men's activism informs us that while there are many approaches to trying to solve these problems, we need to do more than talk. A world so deaf to the pain of men that it can disregard the screams of baby boys demands it. We need to act. We must act. The way to act now is to call the perpetrators of this horrific problem to the carpet for their deeds; to shine the light on them in the most public of ways and to refuse to relent till they refuse to mutilate children.

What they need and what they deserve is a perpetual perp walk.

In about a week you will start seeing a constant parade of one child mutilator after another placed on the front page of this website. It will include all of their practice information, contact information and other important details. We will be telling you what they tell parents about the effects of neonatal cutting vs the actual effects of the mutilation (which are always two very different things). We will tell you, when verified, whether they are selling foreskins to be made into vanity products or other wares.

Simultaneously, we will place them on a directory at NNC, also known as childmutilators.com, where they will remain as long as they are mutilating children.

The purpose of this is simple. We want expectant parents who research on pediatricians and others who perform this "procedure" to learn what they are getting themselves and their child into. We want to educate parents on the facts about neonatal cutting and to motivate them to reconsider whether it is a healthy choice for their sons. And we want to arm them with the information they will never hear from the medical establishment that profits from harming their children.

We now have the reach on search engines to make that happen with dramatic results. In many cases, the returns on our listing of a physician will show in the results before that physician's practice.

We expect resistance and we expect legal threats. As always, we will defy all attempts to abridge our freedom of speech and press rights.

As you have before, you will see all cease and desist letters we receive posted to this website with our very brief response.

Now, and in the days ahead, we will be calling on advocates for the genital integrity of all human beings to assist in these efforts. We have already been offered the moral support from a very familiar face. Founder of the first political party for men and boys and the women who love them (J4MB), Mike Buchanan, made contact with me when he saw our preliminary announcement on the coming of this effort. He had the following to say.

> The #1 campaigning issue of my political party is the ending of non-therapeutic circumcision of male minors (male genital mutilation, MGM) in the United Kingdom, where the procedure is unquestionably illegal, yet the criminal justice system fails to bring prosecutions. MGM causes a great deal of suffering to male minors, and in turn men – sometimes leading to death, whether due to complications resulting from the procedure, or later suicide. The purpose of MGM is to reduce the sexual pleasure of men following puberty, and for that reason alone it should be banned for male minors.
>
> We stand shoulder-to-shoulder with AVFM and other men's rights advocates internationally in demanding an end to MGM – NOW. For decades campaigners have believed that rational arguments would bring MGM to an end, and they've been disappointed. It's time to go on the offensive, and start to publicly name and shame the individuals who carry out MGM, whether for personal gain, religious or cultural convictions, or any other reasons.

With thanks to Mike from J4MB, I invite you now to visit neonatalcutting.org. Please look around the site. Look at the current research page and view the videos. Feel free to email in suggestions to me personally. If you are so inclined, visit the donation button to support the expense, time and effort that is going into this important project.

Also, please follow our Twitter account and Like our FaceBook page.

AVFM is seriously dedicated to this mission, now and into the future. If you believe our baby boys deserve a pass from the knife as they come into life, please find a way to help.

CBS's "Supergirl": In your face with antifeminism

August Løvenskiolds · 28 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Explicitly, thematically and in subtext, the pilot episode of the CBS network's primetime show Supergirl aims to drive a kryptonite dagger into the heart of feminism. And then, twist the blade.

While another new CBS show, Limitless, is quite subtle about portraying men's family relationships in a respectful and caring light, and dismisses feminist innovations like sexual harassment training as meaningless business annoyances, Supergirl has a big "fuck you" to feminists in almost every scene.

The positive vision of men in Limitless makes you feel better about being a man, regardless of what your flaws are – I like it a lot in a quiet way. If you are an MRA familiar with the work of Karen Straughan (GirlWritesWhat) or any other FeMRA Supergirl will have you cheering.

It starts with the name: teenager Kara Zor-El (played as an adult by Melissa Benoist), the cousin of Superman, was sent to Earth to be a caregiver to him as an infant. Supergirl cares for children! It is, in fact, her only mission objective.

Although she insists her first name is pronounced like Car-Eh, her boss Cat Grant (played with Thatcher-esque snark by actress Calista Flockhart) pronounces it "Care-ah," as if to underline the caring, traditionally feminine nature of Supergirl.

When Cat coins the name "Supergirl" for the new hero in "National City" (leaving Metropolis to Superman), Kara objects that the term "girl" is anti-feminist, Cat turns in a cold rage to give her the dressing-down of her life:

> Cat: Didn't you say she was a hero? I'm the hero. I stuck a label on the side of this girl, I branded her. She will forever be linked to Catco, to the Tribune, to me. And what do you think is so bad about "Girl"? Huh? I'm a girl. And your boss, and powerful, and rich, and hot and smart. So if you perceive "Supergirl" as anything less than excellent, isn't the real problem you? And if you're so smart, Kara, could you please give me one reason why I shouldn't fire you? [Emphasis added].

Label, brand, girl, boss, problem[atic]: somewhere, anti-feminist Maggie The Thatch is smiling. Cat got to the CEO chair without smashing any patriarchy or glass ceiling; she claims the title of strong GIRL and gives zero credit to feminism – she even stomps all over their code words. You go, grrl!

Indeed, Kara has lived in a feminist "safe space" since she arrived on Earth far too late to nursemaid Kal-El. The pilot opens with her decision to grow up, take responsibility, and explode out of her safe space and engage the world as an adult – something feminists are loath to do.

In an interview with Stephen Colbert, actress Melissa Benoist claimed that Supergirl was feminist because she was "for everyone." Only the most newb, naïve feminists actually believe that: feminism is about advancing women as a class, not helping men get equality with women. Feminists eschew helping men or even individual women. Kara is depicted as boy-crazy and obsessed with clothes and dating apps. As a superhero she will help anyone in trouble, not just women. Feminists have to be screaming with agony at what a girl she is.

When it comes to her superhero costume, Kara rejects the skin-baring outfit of feminist icon Wonder Woman so beloved by feminist slut-walkers. After several misfires she hits the balance point between radfem dowdy and 3rd wave slutty, implicitly rejecting identifying with either group.

The only sop to Social Justice Warriors at all is the character of Jimmy Olsen, who has left his Norwegian ancestry behind and is now "James Olsen," (Mehcad Brooks) token black dude. I suppose I should object that Olsen has appropriated African-American culture – or did an African-American character appropriate a name from Norwegian culture? – but the character is played as such a strong, smart, and solid male image that I like the character regardless of all that other crap. Of course, changing a major character's skin color is an SJW trap: you're racist if you don't have any African-Americans in the cast, but if you include African-Americans, you've committed the crime of cultural appropriation, and you're still racist. Since you lose either way, it is better to stop trying to please SJWs and just tell them to GTFO.

There is one clearly feminist character: the leader of the bad guy Kryptonians opposed to Supergirl is a woman who craves power and hates families – she thinks nothing about killing her own blood relatives if they get in her way. It is hard to get any more feminist than that without having a standing open appointment at an abortion clinic.

It is hard to project the future of this show – will they fall into a feminist morass and die like the original Supergirl with Helen Slater did 30 years ago? (Helen Slater plays Supergirl's adoptive mom in the new show – one more caregiver anti-feminist).

The pilot closes with one last costume adjustment – Supergirl's cape is fashioned from Superman's baby blanket. Once more, Superman saves the day – as a baby.

Use that for a chew toy, feminists.

A sociological survey revealed the grass to be green

Lucian Vâlsan · 29 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

This article first appeared on AVFM Romania.

At the end of the last week, the gutless faceless sociologists that the media quotes with authority have released what they call a "sociological survey" regarding how do women feel discriminated against at the workplace in north-western Romania, says Actual de Cluj.

The great frustration of all "progressive" ideologues is that Romanians in general tend to be quite aware of the basic facts of life and they are less likely than other peoples of Europe to rush into sacrificing their families, their relationships and their social structures on the altar of forced equality of outcome.

The absolute majority of Romanians know, either from direct experience, or from their parents, that the progressive equality tends to end in rationed bread and forced admissions in a mental hospital in case of wrongthink.

And this lately survey serves to show, yet again, that in spite of the feminist agitprop, Romanian women continue to insist in crediting common sense and their native tendencies and reject the ideological pressures of this day and age. And this aspect drives ideologues nuts.

For instance, the team of sociologists who conducted this survey declares that they are profoundly "surprised" by the fact that women consistently prefer to have a male boss and not a female boss.

The fact that they are surprised shows that either the team of sociologists that conducted this survey is filled with sinister incompetents, or is filled with ideologues who aren't terribly interested in the facts, but rather in building a narrative that would allow them to manipulate the public. In all fairness, both of these are perfectly possible.

The answers provided by the Romanian women in the survey are almost word-for-word consistent with the answers provided by American women, British women, Swedish women or Spanish women in similar surveys. In any country in which similar studies have been made, the inescapable fact that most women prefer a male boss and not a female boss has been revealed without exceptions.

Moreover, the reasons given by Romanian women for this preference are almost identical to the ones given by British women. For instance, from a survey conducted in 2010 in Great Britain, which revealed similar tendencies in that country, we learn that:

> Two thirds of employees agree they would rather work for a man than a woman.
> Female bosses were accused of being moody and incapable of leaving their personal lives at home.
> A third of those polled claimed women in charge are 'loose cannons' – ready to stab colleagues in the back at any time, and who constantly feel threatened by other people in positions of authority.
>
> By contrast, both male and female workers believe male bosses were less likely to get involved in office politics, were easier to reason with and rarely suffered from mood swings.
>
> Men are also said to be more straight-talking than women and rarely talk about others behind their backs, it emerged.

The esteemed sociologists, led by Alina Bîrsan, sociologist at Encore Research SRL (LLC), who conducted this survey in northern Transylvania explained for the paper the reasons given by the female interviewees for their preference:

> All female respondents, regardless of their level of education, would rather prefer working for a man than a woman. They say that such an arrangement is more appropriate since men represent the institution better on > the outside, they manage conflicts in the workplace better, they don't try to micromanage everything and they don't waste time by involving themselves in all the components of a process. [Women in the survey] also said that male bosses tend to have a much more relaxed attitude than a woman and that women bosses tend to be a lot more demanding for the subordinates.

So, they're more straight talking (and thus solve conflicts better), don't get themselves into petty gossip (more relaxed attitude) and are not obsessed with control (no micromanagement). One would say that the Romanian women had a consultation session with the British women before filling out the questionnaire.

More to the point, the revelations of this survey are perfectly congruent with a more comprehensive study made several years ago by Gallup România[1]. In 2003, the study called Women's access on the labour market made by Gallup Romania revealed that:

> In almost all [studied] groups the difficulty of working with female collectives was mentioned. Gossip, envy and lack of support are problems that frequently emerge in female-dominated collectives. […] At the same time, most female respondents stated that they prefer working in male-dominated collectives, arguing that one can always count on help and respect among men. One of the participants from Satu Mare summed up the argument by saying: "Only among men can a woman feel like a lady".

Didn't Alina Bîrsan and her taxpayer-subsidized sociologist team know these aspects? If not, then maybe they should consider starting a career in hamburger flipping – because in their current field they have already proven their limits. If they knew these aspects, why were they surprised? Were they sort of hoping that in the meantime the women in this country have mentally regressed to such an extent that they'd now swallow the feminist fairy tales?

The question from above is not exactly a rhetorical one since Bîrsan provides a hint in her answers that she might have hoped that Romanian women swallowed at least a bit from the feminist kool-aid that is being subsidized with tens of millions of euros for propaganda annually. Alina Bîrsan explains for Actual de Cluj:

> Moreover, many women do not want to be bosses, "because they say that family comes first and one can't perform best in both".
>
> How did we get to the point where women prefer their bosses to be always men and, more importantly, not to even aspire to be bosses? The causes are profound, says Bîrsan and she explains: "it's a reproduction of the familial environment; that's how we grew up – with the man leading the family and that's what we expect in the workplace. And women say they feel safer that way" – says the sociologist. "[The women] are very comfortable with this arrangement. They seem to draw positive feelings by being in this position. For now, unfortunately, it seems that women prefer to be secondary; they don't mind working more but they do mind being at the forefront" (emphasis ours)

That unfortunately seems to suggest that the team of sociologists is at the very least trying to explain the facts away through an ideological perspective. This tendency is also revealed by the fact that women's preferences for male bosses and rejection of female bosses is described as "misogyny" instead of a more neutral (and much more correct) description such as the fact that this preference is the result of past experiences.

The argument that "that's how we grew up" is also dubious at the very least once we put these responses into an international context. The social context in Great Britain is now totally different than the one in Romania. In the UK, divorce is sky high, the family court system works on a Kafka-esque model and huge areas of that country are essentially man-deserts, as Erin Pizzey calls them. And yet, British women have the same preferences with Romanian women when it comes to bosses.

When one finds such congruences on completely different groups that come from completely different social contexts, any researcher worth his salt has to wonder whether this may be the result not of a social construction, but rather biology. But these questions are now outside of the Overton window of the social sciences in the Academe – where the ideology of social constructivism is now the official dogma.

Let's be crystal clear on this one: no-one says that nice female bosses don't exist. A significant proportion of individuals can bring up one, or maybe even two pleasant experiences with female bosses. However, by and large, the experience with female bosses – both for women and for men – tend to be negative and generally worse than one's experiences with male bosses. And the reasons for this state of affairs are diverse and go beyond the usual "social construct" claptrap.

Romanian women tend to be adult

In total contradiction with the multilaterally-progressive sociologists, Romanian women tend to put their families first and they tend to be perfectly aware of the feminine nature and tendencies and take them as they are (as opposed to ignoring them or, even worse, shout out loud that they don't exist).

For what sociologists call "gender roles" – Romanian women tend to apply the correct term: nature. And Romanian women seem to tend to know better than the ideologues that messing around at a fundamental level with your own natural inclinations tends to end badly.

Whilst in other countries women have allowed themselves to be manipulated by the ideology that promises that you can "have it all," Romanian women aren't even trying to bother listening to the ideological fairy tales. One of the reasons for this is that almost all Romanian women can ask their parents what happened the last time when the ideological fairy tale of absolute equality of outcome was put into practice.

In other words, Romanian women tend to be adult. And there's nothing wrong with that. Unless you're a sociologist, in which case you would treat any trace of normality and common sense as inherently bad and oppressive; and as something that must be deconstructed ASAP in the good tradition of the dialectics.

Reference:

[1] V. Marinescu; V. Pricopie – Accesul Femeilor pe Piața Muncii, The Gallup Organization Romania, 2003, p. 43

Did David Futrelle threaten Cassie Jaye?

Jack Barnes · 30 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

David Futrelle, publisher of the online supermarket tabloid We Hunted the Mammoth, appears to be suffering from enough stress to wilt a buttercup.

You can visit his website yourself for his open letter to Cassie Jaye, as we are not linking to him. Be sure to wear something that does not clash with yellow.

The Red Pill, filmmaker Cassie Jaye's documentary on the MHRM and gender politics, appears to challenge his worldview, thus the crying and stained diapers. Some backstory on his tantrum will explain.

With two successful (and objective) documentaries under her belt, Jaye has been working on the third, this one about the Men's Human Rights Movement. As a feminist with solid film creds she should have been able to secure plenty of funding for the project. This was not the case. The reason, according to Cassie, is that the people who normally back such projects — film schools and universities – wanted the "creative control" required to turn her film into a hit piece on the MHRM.

She wouldn't allow it.

Apparently, Jaye did not get the memo that her work required passing a litmus test issued by people like David Futrelle, and now Futrelle is sending his flying monkeys of feminist journalism to descend upon her like a swarm of Dworkinian locusts.

Unfortunately, a lot of other people did get that memo and Cassie Jaye's funding was cut off as surely as if it lived with Lorena Bobbitt. Every door she approached in the feminist dominated establishment was locked and bolted. Even some of her friends turned on her.

With no funding to be had and seeing her film and her livelihood in danger she did the only thing she could do. She turned to one of the last places in western culture not under complete feminist control – the internet. She started a Kickstarter to fund the project.

The fundraiser sat for approximately two weeks with a little more $20,000 of its $97,000 goal. Many in the MHRM personally donated small amounts of money to Cassie's fundraiser without any certainty, other than her reputation, that she would be true to her word and produce a fair and balanced film. The result was what you would expect and the project was in trouble. Then a small miracle happened.
Milo Yiannopoulos found Cassie's fund raiser and decided to write about it.

The fundraiser immediately went viral. In less than two days, Jaye's fundraiser burst through the finish line like David Futrelle through the doors of Kentucky Fried Chicken.

When he was done with that last box of chicken tenders, he started typing – allegedly after wiping the grease from his fingers and chin with a napkin.

First David starts off by congratulating Cassie on her successful fund raiser. Then, of course, he launches directly into a diatribe of sour grapes commentary about the fact that she succeeded.

> "But I'm not sure that the person I should be congratulating is you. Last night Paul Elam of A Voice for Men – the central subject of your film – was doing his own victory lap online. And no wonder, because he seems to be the real victor here……. In a post on his site that managed to be giddy and vindictive at once, he offered his congratulations to you, then, well, to himself. "Even though the victory goes to Ms. Jaye," he wrote, in an awkward attempt at modesty, "I have the need to offer up some thanks."
>
> And then he spelled out why he thinks your "victory" is really a victory for him.
>
> For the past six years AVFM has had mud kicked in its face by a corrupt, left-wing media. Bottom feeders like

> Adam Serwer, Jeff Sharlet and Mariah Blake have performed endless unscrupulous acts, directly lying to their readers in order to attack AVFM, this movement and me personally.
>
> Their work was not just to harm me, or to damage a website but to make sure if they could that the message we carry never found its way to the larger public. Their intent was and is to paint an indelible stain on all of us so hideous that we would never be taken seriously by enough people to matter.
>
> They have failed, and I can now predict that they have failed miserably.
>
> In other words, Paul Elam thinks he and his friends in what he ludicrously calls the "Men's Human Rights Movement" have bought and paid for a feature-length advertisement for them."

First, anyone looking at the history of the KickStarter knows this is a lie. Relying on feminists, Futrelle's ilk, the film got squat for backing because it was not a feature-length advertisement for them. Relying on MHRAs it got some, but woefully incomplete backing because most MHRAs have grown distrustful of the media and because so many are financially strapped from experiences that may well be highlighted in the film.

It was not until Breitbart, a non MHRA publication, ran an article by Milo Yiannopoulis, also not an MHRA, that the film drew the interest of a wide spectrum of people concerned with freedom of speech and freedom of artistic expression. In fact, one of the $10,000 donors ran a piece online saying he donated the money in spite of the fact that he did not much care for MHRAs; that he did not do it for them.

Put that in your bucket of drumsticks, Futrelle.

Paul's quote is from a man who is thankful that someone may be actually going to report on the MHRM honestly and predicts that if the film is honest and fair it will vindicate the men's movement as a whole. How does any sane, rational person get "Paul thinks he has bought an advertisement" out of the quote David published in his article?

Never mind folks, it is a question that answers itself with the use of the word "rational."

> And it's not hard to see why Elam – and the other manospherians who've rallied around your film in recent days — think this. After all, they are the ones who have rescued your film from oblivion by pouring tens of thousands of dollars into your Kickstarter.

We wonder, aside from the fact that this has already been debunked, if David suggesting that Cassie is a person who went without funding through normal channels because she stood her ground on her creative control, would then yield that control to a bunch of strangers on the internet? Is he implying that Cassie, a person who wouldn't allow a film with her name on it to be turned into a hit piece, is allowing her a film with her name on it to be turned into propaganda?

Someone correct us if we're wrong but isn't the fundraiser open to anyone who wants to contribute be they feminist, MHRAs or neither? Isn't the fundraiser still taking pledges from people be they feminists, MHRAs or neither?

David (unfortunately) continues:

> In the interview, posted on Monday, you complained that "I won't be getting support from feminists. They want a hit piece and I won't do that."….You also complained about an intern on your film who, you said, "had a lot of crying attacks and emotional experiences. She claimed everything I was showing her was triggering her.
>
> A young feminist "triggered" and crying. This is red meat to the Breitbart crowd, and I have to assume you knew this when you told Milo this story.
>
> To an outside observer like me, this shameful pandering looks a lot like a Hail Mary play on your part. Having failed to convince most potential funders of the film that you would present anything close to an accurate picture of the Men's Rights movement, you told Breitbart what its readers – and the broader manosphere – wanted to hear.

Shameless pandering? Well, when someone is wanting us to give them our hard earned money we have a few questions, like why they need it and why they couldn't get funding through normal channels just to start. Cassie was just answering the questions she was asked, David. We're sorry her answers were not what you wanted to hear nor what you wanted the mostly non-feminist public to hear. Did you expect her to leave out that feminists refused to fund her film? Wouldn't that have been dishonest?

The disingenuous bloviation continues:

> Accepting money from these people would seem to be a pretty clear violation of the principles you set forth in your own Kickstarter video, in which you declared that in order to keep this film non-partisan, and respectfully show all sides to this debate, we won't accept funding from organizations that inevitably have biased agendas…..You are making a film about Men's Rights Activists, funded to the tune of tens of thousands of dollars by Men's Rights Activists. You are making a film about A Voice for Men funded in part by A Voice for Men.

Except, of course, that AVFM did not donate to the Kickstarter but don't let that stop you from saying something stupid and obviously false.

> I felt uneasy about your project from the start, concerned that you had been pulled in by the soothing but misleading rhetoric that MRAs spout when they are trying to sound more respectable than they really are, rather than on what MRAs actually say and do when the cameras are off of them.
>
> But I knew you had a good reputation as a filmmaker, and heard good things from several feminists who knew you better than I did. So I held my tongue and tried my best to give you the benefit of the doubt, even when you posted clips from your film that portrayed AVFMers as heroic underdogs rather than the misogynists and malicious harassers that they really are.
>
> When I wrote you a little over a week ago with some of my concerns, you assured me in the phone call that followed that the clips you had posted were only part of the story, that you were well aware that the MRAs you had interviewed were on their best behavior when talking to you, and that the real story of the Men's Rights movement is far less rosy-hued. Against my better judgement, I continued to hold on to some kind of hope that you would live up to your reputation in the end.
>
> And now, frankly, I feel like I've been played.

Hell when that happens to a playa, innet?

More seriously, you feel you have been played? You seriously wrote that with a straight face? Ahh, the feelings card, when you get to say you feel something happened without being challenged on whether it did or not because, you know, feelz. We're not trying to hurt you any more than you already feel like you have been hurt, David. We bet you could get some pro bono support if you asked real nicely.

We were both interviewed by Cassie, which will undoubtedly will be in the film. According to David, however, she didn't get to see the real us. We use our real names on YouTube, Twitter, Facebook and here on AVFM. Does David think that Cassie is too stupid to use Google? Does he think that she made a film about the MHRM without reading AVFM?

Or does he want Cassie Jaye to invest three years of her life in making a movie about what he personally feels is underneath the mask he feels like we are wearing?

So far we have seen David Futrelle make implications, assumptions, assertions and accusation which he has no evidence whatsoever to support. Why would he attack Cassie like this? Mainly because she is not an obedient woman.

And he intends that she ultimately do what she is told:

> I suspect you are doing far more damage to your reputation than you even know….I suspect, sadly, that you will ultimately learn this lesson yourself, the hard way.

Here is what we call a threatoid. It's not an actual threat. It's more like he's saying "you know if you were smart you would do what feminists tell you to do. Otherwise you might get hurt. No telling what could happen. Look at what happened to poor Erin Pizzey. Look at what happened to Neil Lynden; to Matt Taylor. Not to mention Paul and other MRAs. It would be a shame to see something like that happen to you."

It is as clearly a threat as it is in the stereotypical mafia movie where the mobsters says, "Nice family. Be a shame if something happened to them."

Seasoned MHRAs might have been wondering why we took the time to write a serious article about what superficially appears to be an online episode of Jerry Springer. The answer is simple. Feminists weren't able to kill the film by denying her funding so they must find other ways to stop it. As we have seen before they will do anything to silence anyone who disagrees with them — even one of their own.

Oh that's right, I forgot to mention Cassie Jaye is a feminist.

They have ruined lives and careers before. Cassie will be no different. They have threatened to kill people in order to silence them.

David is saying 'Cassie Jaye, this is your last warning.'

We have seen the power David holds when it comes to informing the opinion of the mainstream media. Most notable example is the Elliot Rodger tragedy. Rodger will be forever known as an MHRA. Not because he was one of us but because David told everyone he was. The mainstream media took their talking (read lying) points from David and they all reported that Rodger was an MHRA as if it were fact.

Now David has set his sights on Cassie Jaye. The mainstream media will probably follow his lead. They will more than likely attack her credibility with not one shred of evidence to back up their claims. Their goal is poison the well by labeling the film as MHRM propaganda before anyone ever sees it. If this happens there is a good chance Cassie's career will be destroyed. All because she claimed she was going to be fair and tell both sides of the story.

Something tells us that would give David Futrelle one of the rare moments he ever has of actual satisfaction.

David Futrelle following through with the threat he didn't make

Paul Elam · 31 October 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Propagandist David Futrelle went on a binge of feigned outrage that Jack Barnes and I suggested he was threatening Cassie Jaye's career and her reputation.

"[O]ne of A Voice for Men's most energetic attack dogs (Jack Barnes), popped into my Twitter mentions with a link to an AVFM post accusing me of … threatening Cassie Jaye, director of the upcoming documentary The Red Pill, in the open letter I wrote to her the other day," he sniffed from his blog, as though he was shocked and offended that anyone interpreted his threats as threats. That was yesterday.

And today he started following through with his promise to punish her for being an uppity female filmmaker who doesn't know she's supposed to surrender creative control of her projects to her betters.

What is he afraid of? Is it that if we allow her artistic freedom she will end up wanting to think for herself all the time? Even worse, might she end up talking straight about the brand of fire alarm feminism that crucifies anyone with a dissenting opinion?

How much are feminists willing to do to silence her? How many people are they willing to harm? By the looks of Futrelle's latest attempt to blog-flog a free-thinking heretic, there are no limits.

He now questions whether or not Cassie Jaye's film awards are authentic, specifically the one from a Cannes Festival. Bringing this up requires a brief digression.

In my writings that described Cassie Jaye's career, I made reference a few times to her Best Documentary Award from the Cannes Film Festival. And that is true, she won Best Documentary Film at Cannes Independent Film Festival, as reported in the International Business Times.

What I did not know at the time was that I was confusing this title with that of Festival de Cannes, the more prestigious and widely recognized standard for "independent" films.

What I did not know about film festivals at the time was, shall we say, considerable. In fact, I am sure I never heard the term "Festival de Cannes" until last night. I just saw Cannes winner on an internet page and went with what seemed obvious to this neophyte. My bad, with apologies to Ms. Jaye who never represented herself as a Festival de Cannes winner to me, nor have I seen any such claim posted online from her or anyone else.

In fact, I never said she won Festival de Cannes. I said Cannes, and I did think it was the big one – out of ignorance, not deception.

That brings us to the allegation (let's call it what it is) from Futrelle, that the Cannes International Film Festival was a "fake" award. Sure, it's fake, David. And the Golden Globes are fake because they are not the Oscars. The American Music Awards are fake because they are not the Grammys. I'd go on, but I don't want David to die from eye-rolling his way around facts.

At the 2010 Cannes Independent Film Festival (CIFF), over 40 feature Indie films along with 90 shorts from around the world participated. Are those filmmakers frauds, too? Do the countless hours of work and love they pour into their projects also get reduced to a smirk from a professional liar with a hateful vendetta?

This is where David Futrelle proves himself ignorant (as I was) of the filmmaking world. By attacking CIFF as a "fake" film festival, he takes aim at the very heart of independent filmmaking and puts a cheap smear on all of them.

Indeed, as I have recently learned, while larger festivals like Sundance, et al, do have independent categories, most of the films you see there have some form of Hollywood backing. Truly independent festivals are the ones hosting films produced on blood, sweat, and tears by passionate creators doing what they do for the love of it. They are low budget projects offered by those with dreams of carrying their work to a wider audience; by proving their capabilities with sacrifice on a shoestring budget.

Frauds, all of them, says David Futrelle. Scam artists and charlatans.

As much as I would love to think that Futrelle actually thinks this way, I really don't. It is far, far worse than that. David Futrelle doesn't really think these determined artists are fakes. Nor does he think the places they congregate to compare notes and compete are less than authentic. He is just willing to throw them all under the bus because Cassie Jaye made a movie he fears will resonate with viewers. He is willing to stain the name of every real independent filmmaker and festival out there so he can target one woman who would not do what he wanted her to do. To put it more succinctly, he is a disgusting human being, the very worst kind.

Others of his ilk are about to join him.

Soon there will be write-ups from other elements of the feminist media. They will echo Futrelle's talking points to the letter. They will attack Cassie as not being a serious filmmaker. They will attack the awards she has won, casually tossing sewage on her and anyone else like her with a camera and a dream. They will spit on the heart of creative ambition then pat each other on the back for a job well done. All in the name of a sisterhood that is now hallmarked by crushing the voices of women who dare to think for themselves.

It is coming soon, to a social justice platform near you.

When it happens, there is something I would like to ask you to do. When they tell you she is not a real filmmaker, that she is a rank amateur; a hack seeking to give hate groups a platform, please watch this video. Make note of the production value; the quality of the work, the editing and the impact she was able to deliver in 8 minutes. Watch it a couple of times and ask yourself if this possibly explains why they are so afraid of her and want to run her down before this thing goes live.

Then toss some more money into her tip jar. Help her reach whatever goal she needs to reach and give these goddam bullies a bloody nose.

Dr. Sheldon A Wise added to genital cutting directory after death of infant boy

Paul Elam · 1 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Dr Sheldon A Wise, a pediatrician and assistant professor at the University of Toronto Medical School, has been placed on a directory that lists practitioners who perform dangerous and unnecessary genital cutting on infants.

The directory is hosted at neonatalcutting.org, an advocacy group that educates expectant parents on the possible dangers and questionable benefits of neonatal cutting.

Sheldon becomes the first to be listed on this registry after it was discovered that one of his patients died by exsanguination after he reportedly "encouraged" the parents, who were not considering the procedure, to allow him to do the cutting.

http://www.huffingtonpost.ca/2015/10/26/newborn-circumcised-death_n_8388260.html

There has been further controversy over the case since the child's death resulted in no consequences for Sheldon, and has been largely handled behind closed doors, out of public view. A review of media coverage did not find mainstream articles mentioning Dr. Sheldon by name.

His practice information is currently listed as:

Dr. Sheldon A Wise

Division: Paediatric Medicine, General Paediatrics Section

Assistant Professor, Department of Paediatrics, University of Toronto

Telephone: (416) 635-5581

3910 Bathurst Street Suite 103

Downsview, Ontario M3H 3N8

Expectant parents and others are encouraged to visit neonatalcutting.org to find medical research as well as personal and professional testimony about the practice of neonatal cutting before they make a decision to subject their newborn boys to the risk.

REF:

DEPARTMENT OF PAEDIATRICS

Faculty of Medicine / University of Toronto

Home | Site Map | Log In Search

Faculty

ABOUT US | FACULTY | DIVISIONS | CLINICAL | RESEARCH | UNDERGRADUATE | POSTGRADUATE | CONTINUING EDUCATION

WISE

» DEPARTMENT OF PAEDIATRICS » FACULTY » WISE

Dr. Sheldon A. Wise

Division: Paediatric Medicine, General Paediatrics Section

Title/Position:
Assistant Professor, Department of Paediatrics, University of Toronto

Degrees & Designations: MD
E-mail address:
Telephone: (416) 635-5581

Mailing Address:
3910 Bathurst Street
Suite 103
Downsview, Ontario
M3H 3N8

International Men's Day, 19 November – join us in protesting against Male Genital Mutilation in Parliament Square, London

Mike Buchanan · 2 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

[image]

[image]

Three weeks ago J4MB supporters travelled to the Conservative party conference in Manchester, and over two days we supported the anti-MGM organization Men Do Complain (MDC). We handed out 2,000 leaflets – the design is here – and we engaged in a huge number of cordial discussions, many with circumcised men, including Jews and Muslims. A short video of our work is here, the first image above was taken on the second day.

We'll be supporting MDC again on International Men's Day, in Parliament Square, London, on 19 November (provisionally, from 12:00 – 16:00). I plan to be among those wearing white attire with red marks, similar to the attire worn by MDC supporters at a protest in Belgrave Square, the second of the images above.

I invite you to join us on 19 November in protesting against MGM, please email me mike@j4mb.org.uk to let me know if you can make it. Some T-shirts will be available, and if you can don white attire, all the better (red paint will be available). The key objective is to make ourselves (and in turn our messages on MGM) visible, and to again distribute large numbers of leaflets.

The leaflets will be similar to those we handed out in Manchester. They will point people to important materials such as the evidence that MGM is illegal in the UK and breaches Articles of UN and EU conventions, as well as videos including the findings of the 2012 Global Survey on Circumcision Harm and Child Circumcision: an Elephant in the Hospital.

For the first time, we'll by using large J4MB placards at the London protest. We're still working on the design, but one option being considered is this.

I look forward to you joining us for this important protest. We'll be issuing a press release a week before the event, in a bid to maximise media coverage. The more anti-MGM protesters we have at the event, the more impact we'll have. It really is as simple as that. Please be there, if you possibly can. Thank you.

How to review an allegedly feminist film

August Løvenskiolds · 3 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Now that the production of Cassie Jaye's movie The Red Pill has been fully funded, the questions are continuing: will this documentary be a feminist film? It was filmed by a feminist, and it is concerned with equal rights. That makes it feminist, right? Although feminist support is fleeing from the film, some in the MGTOW/ red pill community still fret that because she is a feminist, Cassie is insincere; one YouTube commentator insisted that "she has no humanity to appeal to."

When evaluating entertainment, I've concluded that every show is feminist. And, just as strongly, every show is anti-feminist. How is this apparent contradiction even possible? The answer, of course, is that these conclusions are a reflection of the contradictory nature of feminism itself: an ideology concerned with equality that hates the idea that men should have legal rights equal to women.

As a critic who reviews entertainment from a Men's Rights (and MGTOW) perspective, I'm often concerned with evaluating the bona fides of a purported feminist show. My problem is that because feminism is vast, incoherent, and an often contradictory movement full of logical traps, the same trope in a show can be argued either way.

Feminists themselves give little help to evaluating the feminist nature of a show beyond the Bechdel test: this test states that, for a show to be considered feminist, two named female characters must discuss something other than a man or men. This standard, of course, is both tongue-in-cheek and ironic in that it disqualifies almost all of feminism from being feminist, since feminists talk exclusively about men and how they hate how the patriarchy (all men) treat them.

The Bechdel test leads to some other ludicrous results: for example, the movie Gone Girl passes the feminist test although it is men who are the only real victims in the film – the woman lead character fakes one thing after another, painting the men in her life as abusers so she can abuse and even kill them without her suffering the legal consequences for her crimes.

There is one other popular feminist idea of film critique but as far as I can tell it has never been formalized into a test like Bechdel. It is called the "male gaze" focus: camera shots that objectify women characters by lingering on attractive female bodies (or, sometimes, other things that excite or please men, such as explosions, decapitation, car chases, and so on.) The "male gaze" has never been formalized into a test because only a film about pets wearing funny hats could pass it, and indeed, women also look at women's bodies but for less charitable reasons than sexual desire: a man might look at a sexy woman and think "nice" while a woman would think "she thinks she can wear that."

When there are no standards that can be tested objectively, feminists are unrestrained from asserting, often erroneously, that a show is feminist. Such claims are a form of tactical feminist triumphalism: a show is touted as feminist in order to buoy rank and file feminist morale as well as bootstrap feminist social power by trying to manufacture fake victories that scare people into giving feminists more tangible victories. My recent review of Supergirl was an attempt to puncture this feminist triumphalism: of course Supergirl had a few themes that might be construed as feminist – all shows do – but it explicitly adopted the anti-feminist term "girl" and explicitly outed itself as anti-feminist!

Let's look at some examples to see if we can tell, using feminist's own assertions and practices, what makes a show "feminist" in the eyes of feminists.

First, let's construct a hypothetical show called, say, "Angels in Feminism." The show depicts feminists defending a convicted lesbian pedophile in Florida, assaulting churchmen in South America, scheming up the rape hoax that became Roe V Wade (which legalized abortion in the US), plotting to protest a new form of male-focused birth control, marching and reading bad poetry in a slut walk, disparaging trans women in England, protesting and pulling fire alarms at men's issues meetings, and verbally mauling each other over what the larger world sees as minutia.

The show would be 100 percent accurate and 100 percent of the screen time would depict feminists in action.

Here's the question: is "Angels in Feminism" a feminist show? Feminists, of course, would not only say "no," they would girlcott the show, attack the producers, and throw used tampons and dead fetuses at show-goers. When questioned about the reasons for their protest, they would then scream "read the dictionary" and other non-sequiturs as they always do when asked what feminism really is.

"Angel's in Feminism" is an illustration of what we can call the "Big Red" problem: the real world, accurate depictions of feminists are necessarily anti-feminist because the tactics and behavior of feminists is awful. A show can be chock full of feminists and not be feminist at all unless feminists are depicted in a positive, sympathetic way. We'll call this the "Big Red" test, after that lovely but cantankerous feminist Chanty Binx.

Unfortunately, a positive, sympathetic view of feminists is not enough to establish a show's feminism.

Let's construct another hypothetical show called "Angel Empowerment." A tiny female computer expert is brutally raped. Once she recovers, her life is treated in a positive and sympathetic way: she takes stock of her situation and hatches a plan of revenge, not only on her own rapist but on any man who hurts women. Her plans, though their execution is harrowing, succeed wildly and beyond her dreams: not only does she humiliate her attacker in a unique and creative way, but she brings another man, a murderer of a woman, to justice and along the way she becomes one of the wealthiest, most powerful women on the planet.

Again, we can ask: is "Angel Empowerment" a feminist film? Not according to feminist Jessica Valenti: the rape scene disqualifies it. The feminist mind is so traumatized by the depiction of a fictional rape that nothing that follows counts toward making the film feminist. Indeed, any conflict faced by a woman character at all shakes the feminist credibility of a show. Of course, all drama (including melodrama) involves some sort of conflict, so again we are back to dogs wearing funny hats as one of the few genres of film that might pass as feminist.

By the way, the hypothetical plot of "Angel Empowerment" is identical to the plot of the actual movie The Girl With The Dragon Tattoo, the English remake of the Swedish film Män som hatar kvinnor, "Men Who Hate Women." I've discussed the movie with feminists in real life and they all dismiss the rape scene as gratuitous, even though it is not; it is central to the lead character's motivation. Almost everyone can recognize this movie as a feminist fantasy, except, of course, feminists.

The movie illustrates what we can call the Pearl Clutching Problem: any show with a disquieting theme is anti-feminist despite any other themes, tropes or dialogue in the film – women are so fragile that any emotional disturbance linked to gender disqualifies a show as feminist. A single microaggression can damn a man in real life, so we can assume that the depiction of aggression against even sympathetic women will make a film fail the Pearl Clutching Test, even if the aggression is avenged.

The Pearl Clutching Problem/Pearl Clutching test is an illustration of my general reviewing process: anything that feminists find "problematic" (sinful against women) can be spun into a test to assess a show's purported feminism.

This gives us an enormous palette to paint shows as feminist/anti-feminist based on objective evidence:

- Does a show depict masculinity in a positive way? If it does, it fails the "Toxic Masculinity" test. Any show depicting men working effectively and ethically would fail this test. This one trips up feminists all the time: the Cat-calling video 10 Hours of Walking in NYC as a Woman, published 1 year ago and with over 41 million views, passed the Toxic Masculinity test as the perfect feminist film until some critic pointed out the obvious racism in the film, turning it into a titanic feminist fail.
- Does the show depict fathers as deeply involved and invested in the lives of their families? If it does, it fails the "Deadbeat dad" test.
- Even a show praising women's achievements or even feminist "victories" would fail the "Perpetual victim" test: the feminist practice that, in order to perpetuate female supremacy (longer lifespans, voting majorities, educational dominance, men's disposability, etc.), all women's successes must be downplayed, ignored and > dismissed lest people wake up to the fact that there is no significant feminist issue of legitimate concern in the first world anymore.

One can imagine a nearly endless series of such tests: each taking a feminist principle and stripping it bare.

At last, the point of criticizing a show's alleged feminist character should be clear: exposing it exposes the deeply horrible nature of feminists and their antagonism towards their supposed goal of gender equality and the freedoms of both men and women.

All truth, it seems, harms feminists and their lies, as Cassie Jaye may show in her forthcoming film.

Everything you need to know about The Red Pill documentary

AVfM Video Source · 3 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Someone got a drumstick slapped right out of their lying mouth. PE

Panphobia, violence against women, and the modern lynch mob

Greg Santos · 4 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The following is the first unedited chapter of my upcoming book*, Equality for Some, how NeoProgressives are Killing Progressivism.* I hope you enjoy the first chapter, and I hope you will enjoy the entire book upon its publishing.

Japanese Subways have recently added women only carts, proving that "Separate but Equal" is making a comeback.

Nobody is entitled to any feeling, including the perception of being safe. You may have the right to be safe, but whether or not you recognize that safety is not a right.

An argument that unfortunately still needs to be had today is whether feeling safe should be considered a human right. We see an unfortunately number of individuals citing this fallacious statement as though the issue has been decided decades prior, despite the theoretical holes which are obvious to anyone with a fully active frontal lobe.

Recently, news website NewStatesman.com published an article titled The right to feel safe: Women should be able to use public transport without fear.

While a refutation of an opinion piece may seem an unusual way to begin the opening chapter of a book regarding a refutation of neo progressive talking points, the article in question echoed much of the flawed reasoning and fallacy ridden arguments as other proponents of a "right to feel safe."

The self-defeating nature of the argument is made evident quickly when you point out the subjective nature of it. Rights, as a concept, are supposed to be objective in their entirety. The ideological structure of equal rights movements of the past and present is that all rights, specifically legal rights are legislated and executed to the same standards for all citizens. With subjective feelings such as safety, the same action that would be considered a violation of one individual's right to feeling safe may be considered a commonplace action by another. There would be simply no way to enforce the notion of a "right to feel safe" without making serious infractions upon other civil liberties.

Some will make the claim that "Violence against women" is at epidemic levels and that their lack of comfort is a reasonable response to the high risk of violence. However, that claim is philosophically inconsistent and a straight up farce when examined statistically.

When a claim is made that a specific demographic is subject to a certain epidemic is facing a stream of violence, it implies that they're facing an amount of violence far greater than that to the alternative. If someone talks about the epidemic of "Violence against women" it implies that the majority of violence is perpetrated against women, or that violence against women is somehow worse than that against men. However, the prior statement isn't true, as men are the majority of victims for almost every type of violent crime. According to a National Institute of Health Statistic, men represent 77% of those killed by homicide. According to KilledbyPolice.net, men, whether black, white, asian, or mestizo, were the vast majority of those shot by police while unarmed. Even crimes traditionally viewed through a lens of female victimhood show near-parity of the gender of victims. Intimate partner violence, a crime typically seen as male violence towards women, is a crime that victimizes men a shocking 53% of the time, according to the CDC.

Not only is violence against men more common than violence against women, it is also more likely to be punished lightly or ignored entirely. Wives convicted of killing spouses 14% less likely to receive a prison sentence than husbands convicted of killing spouses, according to The Bureau of Justice. A Harvard University study exposed that people convicted of Vehicular Homicides, the length of the sentence is 53% longer for those who killed a woman rather than a man. This trend continues across every violent crime with statistics available for it.

That leaves only one reason for this prioritization of the protection of women, misandry and devaluation of male life. The outdated tradition of viewing women's lives from a funhouse lens to amplify their prioritization over men

Despite women being at a lower risk of victimization, and men receiving greater punishment when attacking women, it seems that the gap is not wide enough for some. For today's neo-progressives, equal treatment under the law is not just considered a non-priority, it is something to be actively fought against.

This is not progress. This is not moving society forward, this is regressing back to the era of Jim Crow, where the mere accusation against a black man would be considered evidence enough to string him from a tree, assuming that the accuser was a white woman. The sole difference? All men are at risk now.

Warm Thanks and FTSU

Syd Jones (aka Shrek6) · 5 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Please note: AVfM does not publish articles taking a position on religious matters. This article references religious texts and discusses religious practices. While it is clear that the author holds particular religious views, AVfM continues to have no official position on religious matters. –Ed.

Dear Paul,

First, thank you for putting your article up "It's time to think before you cut" and telling the world that the matter of sexually mutilating baby boys or any male for that matter, is now part of the FTSU campaign, which should tell the world that you and your membership place this issue at the top of the tree. It seems all abuse of men stems from that one act in society and I cannot agree with you more on that one sentiment.

I am equally pleased you decided to put together neonatalcutting.org (NNC) to provide valuable information to parents and put a public face to these mutilators, abusers of children and those who support them. This is something I advocated in another article you guys released recently and I am so please to see you now taking the bit between the teeth and running with this.

The following information should put to bed any questions as to the legitimacy of, or rather illegitimacy of using religion as a reason to mutilate boys/men genitally.

Some facts about me:

First of all, I have to admit publicly to the guilt of being one of those who has mutilated baby boys. By my permission I have been a perpetrator of this abuse on three of my sons. A forth had a deformity at birth and unfortunately corrective surgery dictated the removal of the foreskin to fix the problem.

However, my other three sons were on me and to this very day I suffer the shame and guilt for harming my boys the way I have and will take that to my grave.

In reparation for this crime, I have been educating all my children (boys and girl) on the hugely negative aspects of this barbaric practice and admonishing them to never repeat my sins on their sons.

The second point I wish to make is the one of my beliefs and Faith: I am an Orthodox 'True Catholic of the Council of Trent' who lives his life obedient to the current true pope, Pope Gregory XVIII.

I have in my possession a copy of the only accepted True Bible from the Council of Trent, which is The Original and True Rheims New Testament of Anno Domini 1582 and The Original and True Douay Old Testament of Anno Domini 1610. This is the only text that has existed since St. Jerome collated the final formulation of texts in AD 405.

The following link is the only proof I can offer for the text, I have to type the whole thing out because of my limited internet brain power has me unable to supply your readers with a copy of the text to look at: The REAL Douay-Rheims Bible Site.

I have one request of all your readers both believers and non-believers. It makes no difference whether you believe in God or not, the fact is, the text below is an historical and factual account of something that actually occurred and it cannot be debated to the contrary when no other opposing (public) record exists to prove otherwise.

There is no requirement to believe in this Faith, all you need to do is approach the text below with the mindset of reading from a history book. It is unfortunately or fortunately depending on which way you look at it, the ONLY written record of that meeting that exists today (publicly) that can be trusted with any kind of certainty.

Brothers, I submit to you a copy of the momentous decision made by this council, including the events leading up to it and to the acceptance of that decision:

First or second council of Jerusalem. There could have been one prior to this, when St. Peter sent Saul (Paul) and Barnabas forth to witness to the Gentiles and to be the Church's emissaries to the Gentiles. As they encountered not only Jews, but schismatic Christians who still held fast to Jewish tradition (a bit like 'blue pill men'), plus also men who would be converted but who followed Jewish tradition, fought with Paul and Barnabas over them inducting "unclean" or "'un-circumcised' men into the Faith without authority from the Brothers (Apostles) in Jerusalem. So they were basically forced to return to Jerusalem to seek council and permission or authority which could not be questioned again by anyone.

This was indeed a council and it changed a particular law that was held for thousands of years by the Jews.

The text following this point is typed word for word, directly from the True Rheims New Testament chapter 15 of The Acts of the Apostles:

-

The Acts of the Apostles

-

Chapter 15

And certain coming down from Jewry, taught the brethren: That unless you be circumcised according to the manner of Moses, you cannot be saved.

2. No little sedition therefore being risen to Paul and Barnabas against them, they appointed that Paul and Barnabas should go up, and certain others of 'the rest,' to the Apostles and priests unto Jerusalem, upon this question.

3. They therefore being brought on their way by the Church, passed through Phoenice and Samaria, reporting the conversion of the Gentiles: and they made great joy to all the brethren.

4. And when they were come to Jerusalem they were received of the Church and of the Apostles and Ancients, declaring whatsoever God had done with them.

5. And there arose certain of the heresy of the Pharisees that believed, saying, That they must be circumcised, commanded also to keep the law of Moses.

6. And the Apostles and Ancients assembled to consider this word.

7. And when there was made a great disputation, Peter rising up said to them, Men brethren, you know that of old days God among us chose, that by my mouth the Gentiles should hear the world of the Gospel, and believe.

8. And God which knoweth the hearts, gave testimony, giving unto them the Holy Ghost as well as to us.

9. And hath put no difference between us and them, by faith purifying their hearts.

10. Now therefore why tempt you God, to put a yoke upon the necks of the disciples, which neither our fathers nor we have been able to bear?

11. But by the grace of our Lord JESUS CHRIST we believe to be saved, in like manner as they also.

12. And all the multitude held their peace: and they heard Barnabas and Paul telling what great signs and wonders God had done among the Gentiles by them.

13. And after they held their peace, James answered, saying, Men brethren, hear me.

14. Simon hath told how God first visited to take the Gentiles a people to his name.

15. And to this accord the words of the prophets, as it was written:
16. After these things I will return, and will re-edify the tabernacle of David, which was fallen, and the ruins thereof I will re-edify, and set it up:
17. That the residue of men may seek after the Lord, and all nations upon whom my name is invocated, saith the Lord that doeth these things.
18. To our Lord was his own work known from the beginning of the world.
19. For the which cause I judge, that they which of the Gentiles are converted to God, are not to be disputed.
20. But to write unto them that they refrain themselves from the contaminations of Idols, and fornications, and strangled things, and blood.
21. For Moses of old times hath in every city them that preach him in the synagogues, where he is read every Sabbath.
22. Then it pleased the Apostles and Ancients with the whole Church, to choose men out of them, and to send them to Antioch with Paul and Barnabas, Judas, who was surnamed Barsabas, and Silas, chief men among the brethren.
23. Writing by their hands.
    The Apostles and Ancients, the brethren, to the brethren of the Gentiles that are at Antioch and in Syria and Cilicia, greeting.
24. Because we have heard that certain going forth from us, have troubled you with words, subverting your souls, to whom we gave no commandment:
25. It hath pleased us being gathered in one, to choose out men and to send them unto you with our dearest Barnabas and Paul.
26. Men that have given their lives for the name of our Lord JESUS CHRIST:
27. We have sent therefore Judas and Silas, who themselves also will in words report unto you the same things.
28. For it hath seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us, to lay no further burden upon you then these necessary things:
29. That you abstain from the things immolated to idols, and blood, and that which is strangled, and fornication, from the which things keeping yourselves, you shall do well. Fare ye well.
30. They therefore dismissed went down to Antioch: and gathering the multitude, delivered the epistle.

I will leave the text at that point, because the rest is simply continued dialog on the matter, and of course the message was received with jubilation and relief among the Gentiles.

From that point in our history, circumcision has been a practice among religious zealots and schismatics, and also including the Jews, which has been totally unnecessary. When Muslims came along, they adopted many of the old Jewish practices and have held firm ever since the Quran was formulated and tradition handed down through the generations.

As for any modern day religion, whether it purports to be Christian or not, to continue with the practice of circumcision is not only barbaric in nature, it is utterly and defiantly radical and completely unnecessary, with ZERO theological substance with which to give this brutal practice any legitimacy.

The Boy Crisis: A sobering look at the state of our boys

AVfM Video Source · 5 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

AVFM's recently intensified efforts to address the issue of the genital mutilation of boys seems to have coincided with some recent good work by the very familiar Dr. Warren Farrell. The TedX talk that he presents here is a fantastic appeal to see under the veneer of socially conditioned indifference to the pain of our boys. It is one of his most clear descriptions ever of the problem and how to overcome it that I've seen.

I have a couple of very good reasons to ask you to watch this video, like it and share it on other social media platforms. If it gets enough views and enough likes it becomes a contender for a standard Ted Talk where it will get a great deal more attention.

Also, in a recent conversation with Warren, he and I discussed the project at neonatalcutting.org and he is enthused about the project. We have decided that in the near future another menu item will be put there where we will present this following talk by Warren and some of his other materials on boys and the boy crises.

It figures that as long as we have concerned, expectant parents on the site that we take the opportunity to help them further humanize their sons. It's a good mix.

In the meantime, please spread this video around to all your social network corners. Thanks. PE

Dr. Timothy C Gompf implicated in mutilation for profit practice

AVFM · 6 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Timothy C. Gompf, MD, becomes the second medical provider to be listed in conjunction with the mutilation of children for profit at neonatalcutting.org.

Title: MD

Specialties: Pediatric Hospitalist

Address

1324 Lakeland Hills Boulevard
Lakeland, FL 33805

Lakeland Regional Medical Center

Non-Urgent Appointment Request Form

Appointments
863-680-7000

Education
University of South Florida, College of Medicine, Tampa, FL, M.D.; Residency and Chief Residency, Pediatrics

Professional Activities & Memberships
American Board of Pediatrics Certification
Assistant Medical Director, Children's Medical Services, Tampa Bay Region

Joined Watson Clinic LLP
July 1, 1996

Facebook

https://www.facebook.com/docgompf001

Linkedin:

https://www.linkedin.com/pub/timothy-c-gompf-md/14/3ab/315

Backstory item:

https://www.15square.org.uk/james-loewen-on-timothy-c-gompf/

Extensive previous internet exposure:

https://www.google.com/search?q=Timothy+C+Gompf&oq=Timothy+C+Gompf&aqs=chrome..69i57j69i60l2.685j0j4&sourceid=chrome&es_sm=93&ie=UTF-8#q=Timothy+C+Gompf+circumcision&start=20

Relevant video:

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=COcB5KJmfag

If you are an expectant parent and have questions about the physical and psychological well-being of your baby boy, please visit neonatalcutting.org.

How not to facilitate discussion

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 6 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

For three years I ran an unofficial chapter of Socrates Café, a philosophical discussion group that sometimes touches on controversial subjects. My job was mostly keeping the atheists from strangling the Christians, and telling the one lazy-eyed guy that no one cares about his impromptu movie rants in the middle of a discussion on Indian literature.

The leadership challenge is keeping opposing interests on the same topic. We could say that diverse groups produce better ideas, but a moderator knows there is such a thing as too different. Put a Shaolin Monk, a Shiite, a Zionist, a radical feminist, Donald Trump and Al Sharpton in one room and, as a moderator, ask them about the best way to run a police force. If you survive the experience, please tell me how you did it.

My role taught me that free speech and productive speech are different things. The paradox is that sometimes you have to shut down some speech to keep the discussion alive. This means explaining to defensive motormouths how their rambling makes it harder for other people to speak, without creating a scene that makes members feel excluded.

I learned that I can't control anyone, but I can control the environment such that the ideas, not people, fight and evolve. Anyone watching politics understands how difficult it is to create and sustain these environments against ideological pressures. If I failed to prevent a few from dominating the discussion, the many would leave, creating the echo chamber tuned to the loudest mouths.

I wasn't perfect at the job, but I learned a lot about what it means to be an effective moderator, and about how my approach to the group changes their attitude and willingness to learn from one another.

♦ ♦ ♦

I was a guest of honor in a local Atlanta discussion group called the ATL Metro Area Controversial Topics Discussion Group, run by a man named Steve. The topic was "Has Feminism gone the way of the Dinosaur?" and the format was nearly identical to that of my Socrates Café chapter. I saw Steve as warm, welcoming and flattering, but he surprised me recently.

On October 16th I get the below email that he addressed to all members. I decided that my reply to this email is best made public so that people seeking a hangout space can make an informed decision about the extent of their participation.

Steve via meetup.com Oct 16 (4 days ago) to Controversial-, me

During the last week, I sent out a note recommending to selected recent attendees encouraging them to leave positive group feedback.

NONE have done so.

I've spent the better part of 2 years trying to make something out of this group and yes it takes effort and preparation.

You think this group is your "intellectual welfare?" If so, you're mistaken.

As a member, your MINIMAL adult group responsibilities have been.

1. Show up to match your RSVP

2. UnRSVP when you can't make it

2. Act civilly.

4. Leave a group comment so the group can grow.

All those who were sent a message and who have not left a comment by Sunday at midnight will effectively be banned from the group.

I don't care what you think of me personally. I've taken up a responsibility that includes increasing group membership.

If you're incapable of leaving a positive 2 sentences (NONE about how wonderful I am) then you don't deserve to be part of the group.

And leaving comments on the group page?

Suicide by (former) member.

Hi Steve,

I understand that you have your rules and can run your group however you wish. Naturally, I have my boundaries, and if I do not like how you run your group I can pack up and leave, which I did. While you do not have to hear me out, I hope that you at least take a few minutes to read this to understand my perspective, not only as a member, but as a former moderator and an event organizer. I speak in the spirit of constructive criticism, not to conduct an opinionated attack on you as a person.

Your members are curious, studious and hungry for good conversation. They can easily feed their minds by making friends and posting an ad, which means you have to compete to provide better content and a warmer presence.

> You think this group is your "intellectual welfare?" If so, you're mistaken.

> As a member, your MINIMAL adult group responsibilities have been.
>
> 1. Show up to match your RSVP
>
> 2. UnRSVP when you can't make it
>
> 2. Act civilly.
>
> 4. Leave a group comment so the group can grow.

If developing the intellectual welfare of members is not the purpose of a discussion group, then what is?

The third item is a reasonable adult responsibility. The others, while understandably helpful to you as an organizer, are not guaranteed. You simply have to suck up the fact that people just won't follow up sometimes. That's life. Pouting about it will not change the fact that people can talk, think and have a good time somewhere else.

> I've spent the better part of 2 years trying to make something out of this group and yes it takes effort and preparation.

If you spent 2 years trying to start a restaurant, that does not mean your restaurant deserves good reviews on Yelp. I remember when I was there that you asked for a required donation (a.k.a. fee) from everyone in the meeting I attended. Are the members paying you to do marketing work for you?

> All those who were sent a message and who have not left a comment by Sunday at midnight will effectively be banned from the group.

I know that you did not send me a message mandating a review, but I've already removed myself so the point is moot.

> I don't care what you think of me personally. I've taken up a responsibility that includes increasing group membership.

Which you do by removing people who don't follow your orders? This contradicts what you've said in your list:

> As a member, your MINIMAL adult group responsibilities have been. […] 4. Leave a group comment so the group can grow.

So who is responsible for growing your group? You, or your members? You cannot force people to grow your group under threat of banishment and then take credit for it as if their work is an expression of your responsibility. To me, that is bullying, if not extortion.

> If you're incapable of leaving a positive 2 sentences (NONE about how wonderful I am) then you don't deserve to be part of the group. […] And leaving comments on the group page? Suicide by (former) member.

This attitude is exactly why I opted for a public response somewhere outside of the group. What happens to someone who has a negative comment about the group? Is it "suicide?"

This hurts the credibility of positive reviews for your group for me. Your email makes it look like that the only people who say good things did so because they were threatened, and the bad ones are deleted for all I know.

I think that you have a lot to learn about how to respectfully steward people, Steve. I never poked my Socrates Café members on the shoulder and said "Hey, say something nice about this group or you can't come back." There's no reason for that, because there exist more ethical alternatives.

If any of my advice means anything to you, then remember that the people who show up are by nature supporting you, and making further demands on them will not work forever. Anyone else could compete with your group with a Craigslist ad and a table reservation. As an organizer seeking growth, you do not want to make these alternatives attractive.

Thank you for including me in a past discussion on feminism and men's rights, and for your compliments at the close of the event. I enjoyed being your guest, but I do not feel comfortable returning under the circumstances established by your email. I know that I can find—and host—groups with less imposing policies. I wish you the best of luck.

For those of you in the ATL Discussion Group curious about participating or hosting a new group with fewer policies and a more relaxed atmosphere, please feel free to contact me. I'll be happy to assist in group development.

Men are dogs: important truth in disparaging men

Douglas Galbi · 6 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Declaring that men are dogs is a common sort of disparagement of men today. Such disparagement has a long history. It's typically associated with condemning men's strong, independent sexuality. For example, the late-twelfth-century Latin text De amore (On love) declares:

> Even after they have reflected long on a woman or have enjoyed her rewards, as soon as they see another they long for her embraces, becoming forgetful of and ungrateful for the services obtained from their former lover. Such men as these wish to indulge their lust with every woman they see. Their love is like that of a shameless dog, or rather they are, I think, to be compared with donkeys, for they are affected solely by that natural urge which puts men on a level with the rest of the animal kingdom. [1]

Thinkers throughout history have declared that "reason" distinguishes humans from all other animals.[2] Many animals have a large, complex repertoire of behaviors. They pursue easily understandable interests (food, security, reproduction) in ways that rapidly adapt to specific circumstances. Do animals reason? Describing the distinctiveness of (human) reason has been a highly successful job-creation scheme for philosophers. In today's common-sense reality of human-created artifacts (intricately cooked meals, movies, airplanes, spaceships, etc.), humans are obviously very special animals.

Although very special animals, humans are animals. Lack of appreciation for that reality has been pervasive in elite thought throughout history. For example, De amore declares:

> Who could doubt that he who chose the consolation of the upper part is to be preferred to him who chose the lower? So far as the consolations of the lower part is concerned, we are in no sense separated from the brute animals, nature herself having joined us to them in this respect. But the consolations of the upper part have been granted particularly to human nature and denied to all other animals by nature herself. So he who chose the lower part should be rejected from love as unworthy, like a dog, and the one who chose the upper part should be accepted, as embracing his nature. [3]

Humans can forgo sexual activity. Humans can also fast for a time, eat limited portions of healthful food, or gorge themselves on junk food and become grotesquely obese. None of these facts change the reality of human nature. Separating a man's head from his genitals destroys his life. Much more terrible than men being dogs are men's dismembered, bleeding body parts.

* * * * *

Read more:

- appreciation for men's sexuality in Hildegard's Causae et curae
- men's desire in the Life of Saint Pelagia
- criminalizing seduction: the crime of men seducing women

Notes:

[1] Andreas Capellanus, De amore 1.5.7-8, from Latin trans. Walsh (1982) p. 41. Reference to a dog as a man's best friend occurs in twelfth-century Latin literature. Understanding of a dog as man's best friend seems unrelated to the claim that men are dogs. At least in medieval European understanding, referring to men as dogs would be less disparaging than referring to men as cats. Any symbolic relation between dog and Doug is purely coincidental.

[2] Aristotle was particularly influential in developing understanding of humans as the rational animal. See, e.g. De anima III, Nicomachean Ethics I.13.

[3] De amore 1.6.536-7, trans. Walsh (1982) p. 201.

[image] Dog. Thanks to Soggydan Benenovitch for sharing his photo.

Reference:

Walsh, P.G., trans. 1982. Andreas Capellanus on love {De amore}. London: Duckworth.

Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License.

Leave my family out of this David Futrelle

Jack Barnes · 8 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Most of you are aware of the current feminist bitch fit being pitched by David Futrelle. He started out by threatening the director of an upcoming documentary on the Men's Human Rights Movement. Paul Elam and I wrote a response article calling out these threats. David fired back with an article calling Paul and myself liars.

On the heels of that article, David wrote a third article making good on the threats from his first article. Paul then wrote a solo article calling David out for following through with the threats that David says he didn't make.

During all this a new Twitter account was created, quite reasonably assumed to be one of David Futrelle's cult followers. This Twitter account contained my name and an image of my family.

Click to enlarge

There were five tweets posted by this account. The first gave out my home address and home phone number. Another tweet mentioned my daughter by name. Still another tweet demanded that I apologize to David for lying about him or more of my family's private information would be leaked to the public.

I waited until now to inform you all of this, that is, until I could get home and see to my family's safety and security. All of my family and friends will be notified via this article as to what has occurred. AVFM family and friends, say hello to my blood kin and non AVFM friends.

Since I live in a state with more guns than people, where a side arm is as common as a cell phone and where it is legal for 10yr olds to hunt with high powered rifles and without adult supervision, I'd say my family is now safer than the president.

At this time I would like to take a moment to thank all of you who have supported me through this. Believe it or not there were several feminists who hate my guts who condemned this doxxing of my family and worked to get the offending account shut down. A special thank you goes out to them as well.

Click to enlarge

I watched an old movie once, the name of which I cannot recall, about the civil war. One scene in that movie showed two soldiers, one Confederate and one Union, who happened upon each other while out alone. One soldier had some tobacco while the other had coffee. They shared each with the other. Nothing much was said. Then they turned and went their separate ways. It was a display of humanity in the middle of dehumanizing hell. That's kind of the way I feel about those feminists sticking up for my family. Thank you all again.

Now, there was one person who has remain eerily silent about all this. That person is David Futrelle. Seems odd since all of this doxxing was done to avenge him. There is not a peep from Futrelle about this on his site or on social media anywhere that I could find. As a parent I know my kid is up to no good when she is quiet. Wonder if the same goes for adults (assuming the word applies)?

Futrelle has spent years painting a threat narrative around the MHRM. He does so by twisting statements made by MHRAs to fit his narrative. He takes articles calling out feminists for their bigotry and violence and uses them to convince his followers that we hate women. He uses articles expressing the idea that men should be able to defend themselves from a violent attack by a woman as examples that we want the unprovoked beating of women to be made legal. He takes articles calling out kangaroo courts on college campuses as evidence that we want the rape of women to be legal. He takes our comments about mass shootings, for example, 'this is what happens when society ignores men's mental health and when society chooses to ignore the pain and suffering of men' and uses them as examples to convince his readers that we want to see women killed.

David isn't dumb. He is a very smart liar. He leads his audience up to the edge and encourages them to drink the cool-aid. Drink it they do. He uses them to pad his pockets by working them into a fearful frenzy with hyperbole, half truths and outright lies.

It is a strategy that won't play forever.

David once had a lot of sway with the MSM. That influence appears to be waning. The ABC 20/20 debacle was the turning point. Researchers at that 'news' organization used Futrelle as their only source and ran with it. Only to be made out to be fools, when the truth came to light. As a result of this most Main Stream Media publications shy away from Futrelle like he had fresh track marks.

So far, all of his efforts to mount a media attack on Cassie Jaye have resulted in one, impotent hit piece from a low level publication.

David Futrelle's once strong connections to the MSM were never a real threat to us. In fact it was the reverse. Every time the MSM posted a hit piece on the MHRM, more and more men and women wanting to see the "den of misogyny" would stop by this and other websites to take a look. Many of them figured out that the MSM had lied to them and became supporters. Futrelle has actually been a big help to the MHRM.

But times have changed. The MSM attacks on AVFM have dropped. Now many formerly hostile outlets are publishing articles making the same arguments that MHRA's have been making for years. Sensing an end to the feminist narrative and thus the end of his gravy train of cult followers, David has dialed up the fear mongering to create even more hysteria in order to keep the dollars, pounds, francs, deutschmarks and rubles flowing in.

I call his followers 'cult members' because that is exactly what they are. They are no different than a religious cult. They believe their prophet without question. As history shows us, cults usually become more violent and more dangerous as they near their end. That is what is happening now. For years Futrelle has been little more than nuisance and most often a source of amusement. That has now changed.

A close friend of mine recently commented that terrorists are stupid. I replied that the ones who strap bombs to their chests are stupid. But the leader is smart. He fills the minds of fools with his rhetoric and sends them off on suicide missions for his cause while he sits safely at home.

Now Futrelle sits safely behind his computer with what he thinks is complete deniability while his followers place innocent people including children in harm's way for his cause. Futrelle doesn't command these people like a terrorist mastermind. He just lights the fuse and lets the rest happen. He has remained silent about what happened to my family. He has pretended like it didn't happen. He thinks he has deniability. He doesn't.

Right now every single MHRA, their family and friends are in danger. The cultists believe what David has told them. They believe that if we are successful, then women will be enslaved, raped and slaughtered en mass.

Yes, they actually believe that shit.

Click to enlarge

I recently witnessed a conversation between two feminists stating that Cassie Jaye put herself in mortal danger by sitting in the same room with Paul Elam. They talked about how, in the trailer for her documentary, she was sitting on a couch close to Paul with her legs under her and her shoes off. They talked about how dangerous that was and how she should have been ready to run at a moment's notice.

While these are the same people who condemned the person who doxxed me, I was shocked at the fact they actually believe that Paul is a monster. I thought it was all just rhetoric designed to poison the well. I was wrong.

This level of indoctrination and hysteria can only lead the most extreme followers of Futrelle to believe that any and all action is justified and collateral damage is acceptable. How do I know this? This sort of thing has played out in history many times before and has always followed the same pattern. Plus, unlike David's fictitious threat narratives that he applies to the MHRM, we now have an example of Futrelle's followers endangering the lives of innocent people to serve Futrelle's interests. Remember that this little prick who doxxed my family didn't demand that I apologize to feminism. He demanded that I apologize to Futrelle.

And on that note, here is the apology that was demanded under threat of releasing more private information.

Click to enlarge

David as I said earlier, you have created a completely unwarranted climate of fear around the MHRM for the sole purpose of padding your pockets and to destroy a movement that triggers your misogynistic need to appease women rather than treat them as fully capable adults. What has resulted, as was inevitable, is that one of your cult members has drunk the cool-aid and now feels that any action against MHRAs is justifiable including endangering the safety and well-being of innocent people such as my family. I hold you personally responsible for this occurring.

I consider the doxxing of my wife and daughter and the doxxing of me to be two separate issues. The doxxing of me has done one thing and one thing only. It's has royally pissed me off. You think Paul Elam has been a thorn in your side? Ha! Paul is the guru of FTSU but I'm a junkyard dog with no owner and no collar. He, as a public figure of the MHRM, has a reputation to think about. I don't.

Didn't anyone ever tell you that you shouldn't piss off a redheaded country boy from the backwoods of Tennessee? I promise you David that for the rest of your life there will be nights you cry yourself to sleep in anger and frustration over me. I'm simply going to keep doing what I've been doing; but I'm going to do more of it and do it better. I'm going to destroy the ideology of feminism. I'm going to burn it to the ground. I'm going make chili out of the ashes; then shit all over on Andea D'workins fucking grave. All the while making sure that you are aware of it all.

There is the apology that little snake wanted for you – Futrelle. I hope you like it.

Follow the money: 3 reasons why #GamerGateMovie will be made

AVfM Video Source · 9 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

When it comes to promoting ideologies, it's always worth looking at the incentives behind them, as well as who stands to benefit financially.
Lucian Vâlsan did just that and the conclusions are quite chilling.

You can subscribe to Lucian's Freedom Alternative, here.

Confronted by Evidence

Steve Carter · 10 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Once, I nearly got lynched in a sociology class.

We were discussing domestic violence (because that is, ultimately, the point of most sociology classes run by women in general and feminists in particular). After much throwing around of angry bromides and accusations against men for the wretched crime of their existence, someone invoked the "no excuse for domestic violence" cliché, which was then echoed and repeated by nearly all present.

I was a youth mentor between 1989 and 2014, and was familiar both with the statistics and culture of domestic violence in the US. So I threw in the fact that, according to official reports from the Dept of Health & Human Services, women in general and mothers in particular were responsible for about 2/3 of violent child abuse.

Naturally, "it's not the same thing!" They began to venture all kinds of reasons why we needed to "understand what was happening first" before "rushing to judgment" on female abusers. They began to rationalize, and after a couple of them I began to write them on the whiteboard:

- the child was being disobedient and needed discipline
- the definition of "abuse" is too broad and easily misinterpreted
- sometimes kids are just egging you on
- you don't know, you weren't there!
- kids lie because they know CPS will act on unfounded claims

…and so forth.

Then I pointed out that ALL OF THOSE could just as easily be used to justify a man slapping a woman around:

- the woman was being disobedient and needed discipline
- the definition of "abuse" is too broad and easily misinterpreted
- sometimes a woman is just egging him on
- you don't know, you weren't there!
- women lie because they know police and social agencies will act on unfounded claims

…and so forth.

The women got REALLY quiet… then exploded like Vesuvius. There was talk of having me kicked out of the class, and I was labeled all manner of horrible things. But I stood my ground, since the facts were on my side and–unlike Duke or U of VA–could be readily produced and objectively assessed.

Happily nothing came of it other than a lot of ugly looks and various snide comments about my undisguised "misogyny" (which is Feminist for "he who wants to protect children, even from women"). But what an excellent demonstration of Michael Crichton's statement about a role-reversal scenario being a powerful instrument for determining where our rules and ethics REALLY lie.

The premise behind their objection to man/woman violence was that it's unfair for a big person to hit a small person. This is true. But the premise falls apart under simple observation: there is nothing more out-of-control than a person who knows that her actions will not reap any real consequences. In this, women own a two-way advantage. A woman accusing a man of abuse will be assisted without concern to the man's side of the story, as demonstrated in microcosm by the episode in the Sociology class. But a woman accused of abusing a child will be allowed to defend herself–often in the judgment of other women of similar background and sympathetic leaning–before any corrective or disciplinary action comes around. Further, she will enjoy (and I do not use that word lightly) the assistance and defense of other parties who lean forward to her defense without solicitation. And this is partly what informs the 2/3 majority in violent child abuse: a woman knows she will be the sympathetic party, and acts accordingly.

And this–I must add here–is merely what they DO report. There's a glut of violence committed by women that's either ignored, denied, excused, rationalized, or blame-shifted by women or sympathetic male social workers, teachers, and others in positions of authority. And woe to the man who reports it as violence, for he shall be cast out for "misogyny" by those protecting the woman.

Paul: On cultural change and violence

AVfM Video Source · 10 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

You will be seeing these placed in the sidebar pretty frequently henceforth. Best way not to miss them is to sub to my channel.

Dr. Randomercam Interviews David Futrelle

Paul Elam · 11 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The interview you thought you'd never see!

Is this where I mention that he's not really talking to Futrelle?

More from DoctorRandomercam.

‘Crazy ex-girlfriend’: The desperation for a feminist victory

August Løvenskiolds · 11 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I really didn’t want to review the new CW television show Crazy Ex-Girlfriend. The title is self-evidently anti-feminist and the entire premise of the show sounded unpleasant to me: First, it is a musical romantic comedy. Ick. My apologies to my stereotypical gay pals but musical rom-coms make me want to blame those Canadian Uncle Fuckers for loosing Satan on Earth. You know what I mean.

Second, years ago I was stalked by a crazy ex in an omnipresent Honda. She got my then new girlfriend fired from her job; I was happy to return the favor, after which crazy finally stopped messing with me. A lot of men find the MRM after a bad experience like mine and I was in no rush to rehash that.

Third, the scrappy CW Network has a lot of kooky, off-the-wall shows that appeal to nerdy guys, and I was willing to grant them one misfire.

But then; this mouth-breather misandrist named Samantha Allen at The Daily Beast wrote a bullshit review, “‘Crazy Ex-Girlfriend’ Is Smart, Sexy, Unapologetic Feminist TV,” that desperately tried to frame “Crazy” as a worthy feminist show despite it being a direct parody of everything feminist.

I have no choice: this “Balrog” shall not pass unchallenged.

Who is Samantha Allen? We featured one of her man-hating blog posts last November 7th here at AVFM:

> What misandry means to me
>
> I’m a misandrist. that means I hate men. I’m not a cute misandrist, I don’t have a fridge magnet that says, “boys are stupid, throw rocks at them.” My loathing cannot be contained by a fridge magnet.
>
> I am not an equality feminist. I don’t believe that an asymmetrical world will be cured by polite obsequence to male-dominated systems. I am not a liberal humanist. I don’t believe that I need to stand up for men when they’ve been standing on top of everyone else….

What a difference a year makes: Once a proud man-hating feminist, Samantha has been gut-punched repeatedly as feminist rape hoaxes like Jackie Coakley’s wad of lies at Rolling Stone have blown feminism to bits. Samantha is now a tamed shrew so desperate for any bit of credibility for feminism she will try to find it in an unabashedly ANTI-feminist show called Crazy Ex-Girlfriend, a suitable designation for feminist rape hoaxers Coakley and Emma Sulkowicz alike.

But, on to the show.

The story opens with “Rebecca Bunch” (Rachel Bloom) at age 16 saying her chatty monologue goodbyes to her first summer love, an emotional tampon and hymen-buster named “Josh Chan” who is obviously annoyed with her and is relieved to be making his escape. Josh is of some indeterminate background that might be Chinese or Hispanic = how intersectional! Fast forward to 2015: Rebecca, a Harvard/Yale graduate, is a high-powered attorney who is about to be promoted to Junior Partner at a prestigious NY firm that is as cold and inhumane as any workplace governed by feminist-inspired harassment abatement rules that clobber all normal human social interaction.

But, wow, there is a problem: she hates her feminist fantasy; she is lonely and desperately unhappy – so unhappy that when she sees an ad that asks “when was the last time you were truly happy?” her body literally stops her brain from functioning. So unhappy that babies are talking to her from billboards. Yes, her biological clock just pinged – it is spinster o’clock!

A chance meeting with now muscular Josh on the street, complete with her cat-calling him, gives her personal life a sliver of hope until she learns that Josh is moving to West Covina, California to escape the big city rat race. Yes, Josh is Going His Own Way!

What is a girl to do? Dump her job, her promotion, her feminist pretension and her clothing and start singing. The first musical number starts on the streets of NYC, moves to a stripper bar in West Covina, and ends in a strip mall. The symbolic transition of feminist to dick grabber to wannabe wife happens all in a single musical flourish. This is feminism?

Uh, no.

As it happens, Rebecca's feminism was propped up by a feedbag full of blue pills that allowed her to function as a feminist Borg drone lawyer while muting her femininity. She gleefully spills half a dozen bottles of pills down the drain, determined to rediscover the lusty, spontaneous woman who feminism taught her was repressing her with internalized misogyny. Tossing the pills is another indicator that she is baby-crazy – can't take that shit while preggers.

But there is another problem – Josh has a girlfriend – so Rebecca tries to hook up with his friend, a bartender named Greg – whom she lured into Josh's bedroom on the off-chance that Josh will catch them in the act and have his jealousy triggered.

Is there anything feminist in this show that is treated sympathetically? Rebecca does agree to help with her boss's divorce, but the hitch is that she's trying to help him get custody of his daughter, something feminists, despite all their equality bluster, never, ever support in real life.

The one purportedly feminist themed song, The Sexy Gettin' Ready Song, depicts Rebecca waxing her crotch and ramming herself into some flesh-colored camel-toe Spanx as she preps for her hookup. A black male feminist rapper regards her collection of beauty products with horror as somehow "patriarchal bullshit" when the girl is voluntarily doing it to herself. Later, he phones his backup dancers to apologize for throwing money and jobs at them. The girls look at their phones as if this crazy male feminist is the craziest one of all.

Ah, poor reviewer Samantha Allen. You were once such a proud man-hater. Enjoy your feast of ashes, loser.

A friendly message to Sargon of Akkad

AVfM Video Source · 12 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

It is important to note here that since posting this to YouTube, Sargon has commented on it there and acknowledged that his statement was in error. Good person in that man. PE

International Conference on Men's Issues, London, 8-10 July, 2016.

Mike Buchanan · 13 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

These are exciting times for people concerned by the relentless attacks on the human rights of men and boys around the world. Following the success of the first International Conference on Men's Issues, hosted by A Voice for Men in Detroit in 2014, it's time for another gathering.

The British political party Justice for Men and Boys (and the women who love them) – J4MB – is pleased to announce it will host the International Conference on Men's Issues 2016, in London, 8-10 July. It will do so in association with A Voice for Men, the American website which is by a considerable distance the most-visited and most influential website in the world advocating for men's human rights.

J4MB approached a long list of potential speakers, all well-known as advocates for men's human rights. All agreed to our invitations, without hesitation. The conference will be a rare opportunity for you to listen to, and meet, many of the figures you may until now have only seen online. The speakers, and the provisional titles of their talks, are given below.

Keynote speaker

Erin Pizzey Domestic violence campaigner – 'Intergenerational Family Violence v. The Big Lie.'

In 1971, Erin Pizzey founded the very first battered women's shelter in the world, in Chiswick, London. She had no idea what would be coming her way for her troubles, including death threats, bomb threats, and multiple incidents of stalking. In her book Prone to Violence (1982) she showed how misguided we are in dealing with Intimate Partner Violence (IPV). She has been refuting lies about IPV for 40+ years, and runs WhiteRibbon.org.

Other speakers, in surname alphabetical order

Paul Apreda — Families Need Fathers (Both Parents Matter) Cymru – 'The State's War on Fathers'

Paul Apreda is the National Manager of the charity FNF Both Parents Matter Cymru. The charity provides practical and emotional support to parents with child contact problems in Wales, and undertakes research on issues impacting on men.

—

Janet Bloomfield – 'How Feminism Infantilizes Women'

Janet Bloomfield is a Canadian anti-feminist writer and blogger. She was one of the first female anti-feminist bloggers, using the pseudonym 'JudgyBitch'. She was one of the original contributors to Women Against Feminism. She has explained why feminism is the major ideology standing in the way of legal equality between men and women.

—

Mike Buchanan Party leader, J4MB – 'The Political War on Men and Boys'

Mike Buchanan is a British anti-feminist author and men's rights advocate. His last book was Feminism: the ugly truth. He launched J4MB in 2013. It remains the only political party in the English-speaking world campaigning for the human rights of men and boys on many fronts. He also runs Campaign for Merit in Business.

—

Paul Elam Founder and publisher, A Voice for Men – 'Gynocentrism: the Root of Feminism'

Paul Elam is an American, and the most well-known men's human rights advocate in the world. A former mental health professional, he launched A Voice for Men (AVfM) in 2009. AVfM has long been the most-visited and most influential website in the world advocating for men's human rights.

—

Dean Esmay, National Coalition for Men (NCFM) — 'MGTOW and the new Renaissance'

Dean is a world-renowned activist and expert on intimate partner violence, child abuse, sexual abuse, public policy and MGTOW. He is a contributor to many publications, former Managing Editor of A Voice for Men, and is currently with The National Coalition for Men.

—

Janice Fiamengo Professor, Department of English, Ottawa University – 'How Feminism is Destroying Higher Education'

Janice Fiamengo is a strident Canadian supporter of free speech, and an advocate for gender fairness. She is producing a series of anti-feminist videos called The Fiamengo File.

—

Sage Gerard Collegiate Activism Director, AVfM Operations LLC – 'How to Bring Men's Rights to Campus'

Sage Gerard is an internationally-recognized advocate for men's rights student organizations, and an authoritative contact for students trying to resist hostile universities. Sage founded Zen Men to counteract gender ideology in education systems.

—

Tim Hammond – 'Exploring the Aftermath of Male Circumcision: Findings from the 2012 Global Survey of Infant Circumcision'

Tim Hammond is an American independent researcher and human rights advocate. He has conducted two surveys into the long-term adverse effects of infant circumcision (Male Genital Mutilation) on men's health.

—

Anil Kumar Save Indian Family Foundation – 'Organizational Models that made the difference: Success stories in India'

Anil Kumar was the founder of India's first ever men's community centres, in New Delhi and Bangalore. He has testified twice in front of Parliamentary inquiries, seeking to protect innocent men and women from the impact of false allegations against men. His community centre website is www.confidareindia.com. SIFF's NGO (charitable trust) website is www.saveindianfamily.org

—

Herbert Purdy– ‘Feminism: Their Angry Creed’

Herbert Purdy is a British author, commentator, and blogger on feminism and its effect on society. He stands implacably opposed to all it represents, and believes it is time people woke up to its danger.

—

Karen Straughan – ‘Toxic Femininity’

Karen Straughan (GirlWritesWhat) is a Canadian anti-feminist who has been writing and video blogging on gender issues since 2010. Her widely-admired videos have raised the consciousness about gender issues and feminism of huge numbers of people, and she has been described as the #1 Recruiting Sergeant for the Men’s Human Rights Movement.

—

European News Director, AVFM Operations, LLC – ‘The Status of Men in Continental Europe: Ideology, Legislation, and Activism’

Lucian Valsan is a Romanian libertarian-conservative, polyglot, and staunch non-feminist. He runs the YouTube channel Freedom Alternative.

—

Milo Yiannopoulos – ‘How to Beat Feminists in Debates’

Milo Yiannopoulos is a British journalist and entrepreneur. He founded The Kernel, an online tabloid magazine about technology, which he sold to Daily Dot Media in 2014. He was involved in the Gamergate controversy, criticizing the politicization of video game culture. He is an Associate Editor for Breitbart.com, a United States-based news and opinion website.

/lkmaslknmsdfal’ksndf;alkndf;laknfdl’asknfa’lkdnfl’aknfa’lsdknfa’lknds’laknfda’lskfna’lfdknaa’lkfa’lkdfna’klnas’flak nf
Tickets for the three-day conference will cost £265.00, and there will be a four-month easy payment option, at no extra charge. An Early Bird Discount price of £225 will be available for a short time.

It’s important, of course, that we’re assured of sufficient delegates to make this conference financially viable. To give us a clear sense of the minimum delegate numbers we might expect, we are asking people planning to attend, to pay a pre-registration fee of £22.00 no later than 22:00 GMT on Sunday 6 December. You can do so through this link, using PayPal or credit/debit cards. Please email me (mike@j4mb.org.uk) if you experience any difficulty making a payment.

IMPORTANT: Please do not send anything more than the £22.00 pre-registration fee at this stage, and do not book flights or accommodation until we officially announce the conference will be going ahead.

Pre-registration fees will be non-refundable, if the conference proceeds as planned.

In the event that a conference on the scale envisaged proves to be unviable, or a smaller conference planned, pre-registration fees will be refunded in full upon request, or credited against the conference ticket price.

A decision will be taken w/c 7 December on whether:

- the conference will proceed as planned
- a smaller conference will be undertaken
- the event will be cancelled

Pre-registration fee refunds that are required will be processed no later than 31 December 2015.

Conference tickets will be on sale from w/c 7 December. Only people who have paid pre-registration fees will be eligible to buy tickets before the end of December, and the £22 pre-registration fee will be deducted from ticket prices. From 1 January, tickets will be made available to the general public.

If you want to be very sure of attending the conference, pre-register, and pay for your ticket before the end of December.

Paying the pre-registration fee alone will not guarantee you a ticket. If you seek to buy a ticket after 1 January, and tickets are no longer available, your pre-registration fee will be refunded in full.

J4MB is taking full responsibility for the financial aspects of the conference. Any surplus from the event will be placed in the J4MB 'war chest' which covers our campaign-related expenses, including those associated with our 2020 general election strategy. Nobody connected with J4MB draws personal income from donations, party membership subscriptions, conference ticket sales, or any other revenue streams.

Our strategy is to challenge the party (or parties) in power, because only they can stop the state's attacks on the human rights of men and boys. Under David Cameron's leadership since 2010, the Conservative party has been at least as pro-feminist / anti-male as the Labour administrations of 1997-2010, and in some areas even worse.

We are really looking forward to meeting you all at the London conference, and seeing old friends from across the world, as well as making new ones.

Why not combine the event with a longer trip to London? Maybe a long weekend if you are travelling locally, or a wonderful holiday in the UK – or possibly beyond – if you're travelling from further afield. A visitor's guide to London is here. July is undoubtedly the best month of the year for weather in the UK, being generally sunny and dry, and tourist numbers are lower than in August.

Whatever the weather, you can be sure of a warm welcome at the conference. And for those on tight budget, we're investigating the availability and cost of student accommodation in London, near our preferred conference venues. We look forward to meeting you and, together, taking the next decisive step forward for the human rights of men and boys (and the women who love them). We are confident this event will in time be seen as another landmark in the struggle for justice for men and boys, in line with the 2014 Detroit conference.

Mike Buchanan, Party Leader
Justice for Men & Boys (and the women who love them)
Kemp House
152 City Road
London, EC1V 2NX

P.S. A few words on the depth of capability behind the conference. I worked as a consultant and Head of Procurement for the Conservative Party from 2006-2008, developing a highly successful commercial model for its conferences which, with 12,000+ delegates every year, have long been the biggest multi-day conference events in Europe. Using my experience, expertise, and contacts, we can expect this conference to run smoothly on all fronts.

P.P.S. For people who may not be well versed in men's issues, the key issues include:

Circumcision of male minors (Male Genital Mutilation) – the procedure is unquestionably illegal in the UK, but Theresa May MP, Home Secretary, declined to answer our FOI request, which asked why the police are not prosecuting the practitioners. MGM also breaches numerous Articles of European Union and United Nations conventions.

Educational attainment – males have been falling behind females throughout the education system for many years. Women are given financial assistance denied to men, e.g. at Brunel University, only women doing MSc courses in Engineering are given an additional £22,750.

Employment – anti-male discrimination in recruitment and promotion.

Domestic violence – male victims are denied support. Virtually all refuge places are allocated to women and children.

Fathers – denied access to their children following family breakdowns.

Armed Forces veterans – denied adequate support for dealing with mental health issues, including Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder.

Homelessness – almost 90% of street homeless are men.

Suicide – the male:female suicide rate ratio has increased from 1.7:1 to 3.5:1 in 30 years.

Prison sentencing – five out of six men in British prisons wouldn't be there, if men were sentenced as leniently as women for the same crimes.

Paternity fraud – the Crown never prosecutes women committing this crime, even when it has proof of their guilt from paternity tests.

Anonymity for suspected sex offenders – men's lives are ruined by false rape allegations. The men's accusers enjoy anonymity, while the men don't.

Divorce – financially crippling settlements still demanded from men.

Healthcare provision – two national screening programmes for female-specific cancers, none for male-specific cancers, although as many men die from prostate cancer, as women die from breast cancer.

Political representation – all-women shortlists, women preferenced for ministerial positions. Jess Phillips (a Labour MP) blocked the application of Philip Davies (a Conservative MP) for a debate on men's issues on International Men's Day, November 19. Happily, the debate is going to go ahead, anyway.

State intervention in director appointments – the government continues to bully FTSE companies into appointing more female directors, although longitudinal studies show a causal link between increasing female representation on corporate boards, and financial decline. Mike Buchanan presented that evidence to House of Commons and House of Lords inquiries in 2012.

Public understanding of these issues, and the roles feminists play in most of them, is growing by the day. If you wish to learn more about these men's issues (and others) a good starting point may be our 2015 general election manifesto, which covered 20 areas where the human rights of men and boys are assaulted by the actions and inactions of the state. In the UK, the human rights of women and girls specifically are assaulted by the state in no areas.

The J4MB YouTube library is here. It includes 100+ radio and television appearances by Mike Buchanan since the launch of J4MB in 2013.

The Real Social Construct

Doug Mortimer · 13 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Imagine you are a young woman doing research on primate behavior somewhere in Africa. You're watching some species of apes engaging in characteristic behavior. The alpha male is lording it over the troop and the females are submitting to him.

Tsk, tsk, typical male chauvinist, thinks the young primatologist. But would she make this sort of observation in her report? Of course not. The species she's studying is known to be hierarchical. They have no illusions about gender equality. In fact, they have no concept of it. It would be unprofessional to insert such an anthropomorphic observation into her field notes.

Now suppose another young woman is studying some tribe in a remote corner of the globe. She witnesses men doing their manly deeds…hunting, lolling in hammocks, dancing around the campfire while dressed as some sort of spirit animal, telling fart jokes, or whatever, and the women doing their womanly deeds…cooking, sewing, weaving, swatting their children, or whatever.

Tsk, tsk, typical gender role stereotyping, thinks the young cultural anthropologist. But would she make this sort of observation in her report? Of course not. That would be imposing her modern western values on a non-western tribal culture. She would never sanction such a rigid division of labor in her society, but to criticize the tribe's culture might imply imperialism, eurocentrism, maybe even (gasp!) white privilege. It would be pointless, as well as unprofessional, to criticize them for sexism, since they have no concept of same.

Now let's consider a gender studies professor observing and describing sex roles in a large organization in a modern western country. It is highly unlikely that she would collect the data and report it without including editorial comment highly critical of the slightest hint of discrimination. That's because prominent among contemporary memes and themes is the notion that gender roles are a mere social construct predicated on the gender one was "assigned" at birth.

Well, I don't deny the reality of social constructs, but I think they should be identified properly. After all, those baby apes grew up into male and female adult apes without anyone placing them into male and female categories. People in that primitive tribal culture survived for centuries – and continue to survive – despite rampant sexism.

Speaking of sexism, there was a time, not long ago in historical terms, when it was not considered a problem. Despite the slow but steady emancipation of women over the last couple of centuries, the word sexism was not invented till 1965, according to the finallyfemninism 101 blog.

Believe it or not, youngsters, there was a time when the employment ads in the classified section of your local paper contained the categories "Male Help Wanted" or "Female Help Wanted." If you had objected to this on the basis of sexism in 1964, you would have been greeted with a puzzled look. Sexism? What's that? Why, it's a social construct that hasn't been invented yet, but mark my words! Soon it will be all the rage!

Actually, sexism is a corollary of an overarching social construct that has been around for centuries. That social construct is equality. You can say it started with the Enlightenment, the American Revolution, the French Revolution, or communism. You might discern a rudimentary form of it in the early years of Christianity.

Equality is an abstract quantitative concept, as simply expressed as 2 + 2 = 4, or 1 oz. of gold = (fill in with today's exchange rate pertaining to your local currency). What does that have to do with the organization of society? Given the complexity of the human genome, how could the notion of equality ever be taken seriously?

Yet the drumbeat goes on: Equality good! Inequality bad! We're all on board with that, right? Sounds simple enough. Ah, but what about those devilish details. That's when we encounter Procrustean attempts to define (or worse, enforce) egalitarianism by asserting 2 + 2 = 5…or 6…or 7…or whatever we say it does.

For example, let's explore equality in the marriage market, where the average 35-year-old man is blessed with more options than the average 35-year-old woman. If you wanted to express this in the form of an equation, it might look something like this: ♂ x 35 ≠ ♀ x 35.

For feminists, what makes this inequality particularly vexing is the lack of a remedy. They can lobby every legislative body on the planet to no avail. They can lecture men about the virtues of older (if not necessarily more mature) women, they can nag the mainstream media to soft-pedal the young hotties and start featuring women approaching the wall, but there is no instrument they can wield to compel men to get with the program.

Now I wouldn't be surprised to find out that somewhere out there a coven of feminists in a think tank is feverishly working on a solution to this inequality. Unfortunately for them, short of mass executions of females under the age of 35, inequality must remain the rule. Read it and weep…or gnash your teeth, if you prefer. If it makes you feel better, you can change the unequal sign to equal in the above-referenced equation, turn it into a bumper sticker, and distribute it by the millions. But it won't change the reality of inequality.

Nothing exemplifies the equality versus inequality debate better than the never-ending controversy concerning gender equity in paychecks. According to feminists, if men collectively earn more money than women collectively, that's prima facie inequality! The non-feminist response is that when one considers hours worked, seniority, market pay scales for the type of work performed, and other factors, men and women are paid equally. Both sides employ statistics to prove their case.

Now the important thing here is not which side has the better argument, but the fact that both sides feel the need to appeal to equality. In fact, no other basis is acceptable. Advocating for your self-interest or the best interests of your tribe is unseemly. In order to win over hearts and minds you must genuflect to the great god equality. When it turns out that you and/or your tribe derive more goodies from your campaign for equality…surely, that's just a coincidence.

To gain legitimacy, even a "conservative" debater must preface his remarks with something along the lines of "I believe in equality of opportunity but not of outcome," or "I believe a man and woman doing equal work should receive equal pay, but…" At some level, equality must be invoked because it is virtually synonymous with virtue, even when inequality makes more sense.

For example, in days of old, but within my lifetime, it was customary to pay married men more than single women (and men) because they were supporting families. Married men were considered more stable – and hence more desirable as employees – than single men. Married men needed steady work but they also needed to earn more because they weren't supporting just themselves. If they were happy with their paychecks, they were less likely to job hop. So it made economic sense to keep the married man – a known commodity – happy and on the job rather than have him walk off the job in search of a few extra bucks elsewhere, thus forcing the employer to go to the trouble of auditioning a host of job candidates – unknown commodities – to find a suitable replacement.

Such a policy, no matter how sensible, would never fly today because you just can't wrap equality around it. Of course, if you debate a progressive on the merits of inequality in this or any other situation, sooner or later the phrase "double standard" (almost as popular as "sexist") will crop up. Yet what's left unsaid is even more important.

Your progressive opponent will never stop to ask you if you believe in equality; it is tacitly assumed that any enlightened citizen of a modern western country believes in equality. And assuming you believe in equality, then how can you believe in (fill in example of alleged inequality)?

If you want to pull the rug out from under such a debate, just announce that you do not believe in equality. It does not exist in nature; it is unnatural. It is an abstraction. It is a social construct.

I suspect that most people will be taken aback by such a statement, since equality's tentacles have a stranglehold on sociopolitical discourse. You will probably be grilled on what you do believe in. What are you anyway? A fascist? A fundamentalist? A Republican?

Well, I don't think it's necessary to pitch your tent in any of those camps, or any other camp, just because you have decamped from the social construct of equality. Having done so, you are not obligated to measure everything (often by dubious or arbitrary methods) to determine if A really does equal B and to cry foul when it doesn't. You are not prejudiced in favor of equality.

Equality and prejudice have opposing connotations. Equality implies a lack of bias; prejudice the presence of same. Equality is a warm and fuzzy chimera, the Casper the Friendly Ghost of social constructs. Prejudice evokes Ku Klux Klansmen, anti-semites, xenophobes, homophobes, and misogynists. Prejudice positively reeks of intolerance.

Yet egalitarianism is a form of prejudice, as it colors the way one views the world. Customs – even the most longstanding – as well as contemporary social policy are vetted (in other words, pre-judged) according to whether they pass egalitarian muster. Unless you are a member of some isolated non-white tribe, as discussed at the outset of this article, you do not get a pass.

Yet it makes as much sense to apply the social construct of equality to a modern society as it does to a traditional tribal society or a troop of apes. But nothing would raise eyebrows faster at a cocktail party than the assertion that equality is bunk.

So the next time someone cries out that women are under-represented in STEM, paid less than men, or victimized by the patriarchy, just say "So what?"

You might get tired of saying that over and over; if so, try these phrases:

"Things are tough all over."

"It is what it is."

"How 'bout that!"

And my personal favorite: "Ask me if I care."

You will probably be accused of insensitivity, a quasi-crime as grievous as inequality. But it's better to be an insensitive individual than a microbe in an insensate collective. In the face of a dysfunctional consensus regarding equality, a thickening of the carapace is inevitable.

The Beauty of Men

Mark Dent · 16 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

So many of the most touching, joy filled moments of my life have been experienced in my encounters with men.

My father , who was a passionate lover of literature, history, music and above all his children, was the first man to open my eyes to the beauty, terror and magic to be found in life. Dad would tell us stories in which we played the starring roles. You cannot imagine the thrill we experienced when we heard our names spoken as we bravely faced monsters or rescued our siblings from danger.

Dad hugged and kissed us with ferocious love. When he arrived home from work each night there was a stampede as five ecstatic children rushed to the front door to greet him. Again, Dad's magic was in play as he greeted each one of us with our special nicknames and a tickle on the tummy or affectionate rub of the neck.

I still recall the rush of warmth which flowed through my body each and every time this ritual took place.

It was easy to love my dad. He made us feel special. Dad told us tales of terror and inspired my love of history with his endless passion for great men of the past. He made me think about the raw courage of great warriors or the inspired genius of Mozart and Beethoven. He read the classic Matthew Arnold poem, Sohrab and Rustum to my brothers and I each night and although we were only young boys of primary school age, we grasped enough of the poem to appreciate the tragic ending… A father unknowingly kills his only beloved son in mortal combat, and discovers too late, that the man dying on the ground at his feet is the son he has longed to find.

I remember to this day, the quiver of emotion in my dad's voice as he read this heartrending scene and though much of the text was beyond me, I saw how deeply it moved my father…and I have never forgotten.

*****

He spoke; but Rustum gazed, and gazed, and stood

Speechless; and then he utter'd one sharp cry:

O boy—thy father!—and his voice choked there.

And then a dark cloud pass'd before his eyes,

And his head swam, and he sank down to earth.

But Sohrab crawl'd to where he lay, and cast

His arms about his neck, and kiss'd his lips,

And with fond faltering fingers stroked his cheeks,

Trying to call him back to life; and life

Came back to Rustum, and he oped his eyes,

And they stood wide with horror; and he seized

In both his hands the dust which lay around,

And threw it on his head, and smirch'd his hair,—

His hair, and face, and beard, and glittering arms;

And strong convulsive groanings shook his breast,

And his sobs choked him; and he clutch'd his sword,

To draw it, and for ever let life out.

But Sohrab saw his thoughts, and held his hands

And with a soothing voice he spake, and said:—

"Father, forbear! for I but meet to-day

The doom which at my birth was written down

In Heaven, and thou art Heaven's unconscious hand.

*****

As I reflect upon my childhood, I believe more than anything else, it was my dad's passion for films which carried a recurrent theme and our exposure to them which first awakened me to the many wonderful qualities possessed by men.

These films reinforced the message that most men are strong and good. The Yearling, starring Gregory Peck tore my heart out, but it taught me a lesson I reflect upon to this day. When a young fawn, adopted as a pet by the only child of a poor family, continues to destroy the family's desperately needed crops, the family has no choice but to shoot the fawn. The young boy, Jody, has to carry out this deed himself as his father is bedridden with torn back muscles. Jody carries out the execution but his heart is filled with rage and hatred for his parents who he believes have betrayed him and his beloved yearling, Flag.

After running away and going without food or shelter for three days, Jody finds his way home and when he is reunited with his adoring dad, Penny, he receives a little wisdom from his father.

'..Ever' man wants life to be a fine thing, and a easy. 'Tis fine, boy, powerful fine, but 'tain't easy. Life knocks a man down and he gits up and it knocks him down agin. I've been uneasy all my life…I've wanted life to be easy for you. Easier'n 'twas for me. A man's heart aches, seein' his young uns face the world. Knowin' they got to get their guts tore out, the way his was tore. I wanted to spare you, long as I could. I wanted you to frolic with your yearlin'. I knowed the lonesomeness he eased for you. But ever' man's lonesome. What's he to do then? What's he to do when he gits knocked down? Why, take it for his share and go on.

The classic Dicken's novel, A Tale of Two Cities was adapted to film on more than one occasion. The Ronald Colman version stands as the most powerfully moving of them all.

I saw a man offer up his own life so the woman he loved more than life itself could find happiness in the arms of another man. In the moments before his own death he comforted a frightened young girl, and helped her to face her last moments on earth. As he stood before the guillotine awaiting his execution, his final thoughts etched themselves in my heart:

"It is a far, far better thing that I do, than I have ever done; it is a far, far better rest that I go to than I have ever known."

When dad introduced me to the film, Goodbye, Mr Chips I was not to know how deeply it would influence the direction of my life and the career I chose to pursue.

Mr Chips forged deep, lasting friendships with the students he taught. He became a true educator when he dropped his defenses and showed his humanity to the boys in his care. When I became a teacher I never forgot the lessons I learned when my dad first introduced me to dear Mr Chips.

Throughout my career in education my guiding principle was nothing simpler than to love the children in my care and not be afraid to bring them into my life or reveal my own fear and vulnerability. Many years earlier, as a boy, I learned that we can only build deep, lasting relationships by doing just that. I did, and still do and have been able to forge my own precious friendships with many of the kids I have taught. All this has come to pass in a way that makes my life seem magical.

We watched Luke Jackson (Paul Newman) defy an oppressive, unjust system in Cool Hand Luke and win the hearts and minds of his fellow prisoners with his courage and charisma. One scene which touched me deeply was when Luke was informed that his mum had died. This "cool hand" grieves his loss by strumming his banjo and singing his mum's favorite song. I saw a strong man shed tears of grief without losing the respect of his hardened, criminal peers. As a boy these lessons were carved into my heart.

I was mesmerized by the power of one man, who, armed with nothing but a sharp mind and moral courage, was able to sway a jury which had been convinced of the guilt of a young man and were willing to see him die.

The most powerful moment came at the end of the film. The character played by Henry Fonda walked over to the man who had opposed, abused, belittled and antagonized him throughout the long night as they debated the case they had witnessed. When this broken jury member revealed the true motivations behind his rage, Henry Fonda reached out with an act of such quiet tenderness that even as a boy it struck home so powerfully I never forgot it. Watch from the 1:17 mark for this simple gesture that says so much. For me it encapsulates the quiet, almost unnoticed gestures men so often perform, gestures which carry deep love, tenderness and compassion.

I experienced such gestures on many occasions when I was battling bone cancer. My mates would come and sit quietly by my bed, unsure about what to say or do. When the time to leave arrived, they would shake my hand and hold it firmly and meaningfully for far longer than a normal handshake required. It filled me with such warmth, as everything they felt and wanted to say was expressed in that passionate grip of my hand.

One evening my rugged brick laying brother in law came to visit with my sister. He stood in the background throughout the visit. When the time to depart arrived, he walked to my bedside, still not having uttered a word, bent down and kissed my forehead.

Another man, who I had only got to know because he was a parent of a boy I taught, came to me well after visiting hours were over and sat beside my bed in silence. I had a fever and he simply placed a cool, wet cloth on my forehead. When it became hot he rose and placed it in cold water before returning it to my burning face.

I have not seen this man in over 25 years, but I will never forget the love he showed me on that long, dark night.

We watched Atticus Finch defend a black man against a false rape accusation. He did so with such courage and dignity and showed such tenderness and love for his children even in his darkest, most fearful moments.

Captains Courageous broke my heart yet again. The courage and incredible love and tenderness shown by Manuel (Spencer Tracy), the rough fisherman, to the young, spoiled rich boy rescued from the sea, caused a huge transformation to take place in the young man. Manuel became yet another role model for me to try to emulate in my own small way.

And that simple song Manuel sings as he plays his hurdy gurdy is unforgettable.

One Saturday night dad sat me down alongside him on the couch and suggested I watch a film that was about to start. It was called The Man Who Would Be King. The two main characters, Daniel Dravot(Sean Connery) and Peachy Carnehan(Michael Caine) could best be referred to as lovable rogues. In the final moments of the film, when the two best friends are facing death, you see men at their finest. I saw two noble, dignified mates who stood side by side and looked their mortality in the face without regret or recriminations.

These glorious films seeped into my blood and bones along with the literature and music dad drowned us in.

I loved men. I believed in their innate goodness. I was not disappointed once I left the bosom of my family and ventured out into the world.

My life is littered with countless moments of the most exquisite tenderness and compassion in my encounters with men.

Don't be mistaken. I have been married to the most beautiful human being I have encountered. Her name is Maggie and she is my soulmate. I have a daughter and a son and both are a source of endless joy in my life. I loved my mum with all my heart and we had a close relationship. I have many close female friends……but the men. There is something in them which has the capacity to move me in a manner that I find hard to explain.

Why should I try?

I simply love the many men in my life.

I have written many simple poems about my dad over the years. Here is one to finish my small tribute to him and all of the beautiful men in my life..

*****

My Father

He carried me in his arms late at night

When I cried in pain or felt afraid

He soothed me with tender words

And gentle movement

He washed me in the bath

And then dried me vigorously

-never forgetting the gaps between my toes

He told me stories of great people,

Brave men who died for love

Or a simple idea

He scared me with terrifying stories of axemen

And long, dark corridors

He introduced me to the world of music

And planted a deep seed of love

By showing me

A young boy and his deer,

A king and his dream

And a little girl who finally understood

That there is no place like home

He welcomed me into a game which became a part

Of my heartbeat-and we shed tears of joy and anguish

Over many years as we followed our beloved Collingwood

We shared all the emotion the men in black and white brought us

And we retold and relived the countless moments witnessed

Year after year- with passion

We argued

I was hurt

I was sick

He stroked my face

He squeezed my hand and kissed my forehead

He wheeled me in my chair

I said, “I love you, dad”

He said

“I love you too, son.”

*****

Progress report on ICMI16

Mike Buchanan · 17 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

We're experiencing a good demand for pre-registrations for ICMI16, and I would remind you that it's important people pay the pre-registration fees of £22, to provide a stronger steer on likely delegate numbers. This will enable us to select an appropriately-sized venue. More details can be found in the event announcement.

We've noticed some slight misunderstanding about the various payment options for conference tickets. Early Bird Discount tickets will cost £225, otherwise the normal delegate fee of £265 will apply up to and including payment at the door during the conference. Other than Early Bird Discounts, the ticket cost can be made easier by paying in four instalments with no premium.

We decided to offer this method of easy payment after listening to feedback from friends after the Detroit conference in 2014, and knowing the ticket price is always an important factor in people's minds. This leads me to an explanation of how we decided on the ticket prices, which is directly related to an initial estimate of delegate numbers, based on the numbers at the ICMI14 conference in Detroit.

The quality venues in the locations we wish to hold the conference, able to accommodate that number of people, will cost in the region of £30,000 – some of them a lot more – to which will have to be added our covering some or all of the travel, accommodation, and subsistence costs for some of the speakers, the cost of A/V hire, registration, and other services during the entire three days, including of course, security for our delegates.

We thought long and hard about the pricing of tickets, and used a very sharp pencil to keep them as affordable to as many as possible. However, the financial analysis forced us to conclude that if we charged a lower price, we couldn't make the project work. Conference venue hire costs rise sharply in proportion to delegate numbers, so apart from a lower ticket price making it impossible to cover the costs, really large delegate numbers, encouraged by a lower price, would force us to relocate to a bigger, more expensive venue, and send the project into a spiral of loss.

ICMI16 will be a three-day conference. It had to be like that to make it worthwhile for those people who will be travelling from across the world to attend, and with ticket prices from £75 per day, admission to ICMI16 is comparable to the average cost of most conferences. I hope anyone who is perhaps tentative about booking at present will see it as excellent value for the chance to meet and make international connections with others of a like mind – and, of course to meet and befriend the stellar lineup of speakers who are probably already so familiar already that they seem like friends to most of us. Without exception, all of them accepted our invitation to speak with enthusiasm.

I know that the Detroit ICMI14 cemented those who attended into a bond of friendship and mutual understanding, and I know London 2016 will do the same, and more! It will be a wonderful get-together for all of us concerned about men's and boys' issues across the world. Certainly, I can't wait to see old friends again and to making new ones, and I believe everyone who attends will look back on it and remember its value, not its cost.

We must make this conference pay its way, and if there is a surplus, that will go into the J4MB 'war chest' to fund our campaigning, not least that relating to the 2020 general election here in the UK, where we plan to field 20 candidates, challenging the Conservative party in its most marginal constituencies.

In the last two weeks we've seen a major breakthrough for men's and boys' human rights in the British Parliament, after a particularly vicious radical feminist MP, Jess Phillips, who had blocked an application by Philip Davies MP for a debate on men's issues on International Men's Day, was over-ruled by her committee. The debate will go ahead on Thursday, 19 November. We'll be protesting against MGM in Parliament Square that day.

Come and join us at ICMI16 in London, be inspired, enjoy the fellowship, and together we'll make a difference.

Dr. Yong Kim invokes god to sell his infant mutilation services

Paul Elam · 17 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Yong Sik Kim M.D. in Houston Texas does not encourage parents to have their son's genitals mutilated because of any medical necessity, but because God says so.

On the front page of his website, he prominently invokes Old Testament scripture to induced parents toward the cut, as follows:

You have to dig further into the site to find any medical information about his work. What is there is nearly as unimpressive as his use of religion to promote a medical procedure.

In the FAQs he has on his profile page, there is a great deal of incomplete and misleading information.

Examples:

Q: Who needs a circumcision?

There are risks and benefits involved in the surgery. Circumcision is not mandatory for every male as it has both benefits and risks, but people with common complications such as infection, scarring, or phimosis are recommended to get the treatment."

Dr. Yong Kim

In other words, he is painting an unrealistic picture for his patients parents that fits his desire to make money. Medically necessary neonatal cutting is exceedingly rare. In Finland, for instance the rate of circumcision for all males is 1 in 16,667. There is no medical literature available anywhere that demonstrates that routine neonatal cutting is medically necessary, thus Dr. Kim's appeal to religious authority over medical science.

He also provides information on the risks of NNC that cross the line into being misleading. From his FAQ;

Q: What are the risks associated with this procedure?

Bleeding, pain, and infection are the most common. Injury to the tube that carries urine from the bladder is possible though rare. Scarring could cause discomfort with intercourse for a few month, but this usually passes."

For some reason, Dr. Kim leaves out some other noted risks. Death, permanent sexual disfigurement, alexithymia, midlife sexual dysfunction, interference with breast feeding and parent-child bonding.

Dr. Kim describes himself as a well-trained physician and board certified who performs a variety of medical and surgical procedures. He does not describe himself for what he really is, a profiteer using the religious beliefs of his patients to pressure them into sexually mutilating their children.

Here is hereby placed on the registry of child mutilators childmutilators.com, where he will remain until he stops mutilating baby boys for a living.

If you are an expectant parent considering the amputation of your son's foreskin, please visit neonatalcutting.com and read the research that you will never know about from the likes of Dr. Kim and others of his ilk.

Dr. Kim's practice information:

- 8830 Long Point Rd #105
  Houston, TX 77055
- Phone: 713-932-0240
- Fax: 713-932-0252
- Email: info@greenhealthclinic.com
- www.houstoncircumcision.com
- www.greenhealthclinic.com
- Office hours
  Mon 8:30 – 5:00
  Tue 8:30 – 5:00
  Wed 8:30- 5:00
  Thur 8:30 – 1:00
  Fri 8:30 – 1:00
  Sat 8:30 – 1:00

Did Karma just bitch-slap Pauley Perrette?

Suzanne McCarley · 17 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

…Or is this yet another of Perrette's lies, scapegoating yet another convenient man? Charles C. Johnson of GotNews.com reports, with a slightly different approach than that of the Hollywood Press Machine. Go read it.

http://gotnews.com/breaking-ncis-actress-pauley-perrette-falsely-accusing-a-homeless-man/

> Forty-five year old David Merck was arrested in Hollywood on Thursday, and charged with felony battery, due to accusations made by NCIS actress Pauley Perrette.
>
> The actress tweeted about the alleged attack, stating that "she almost died" after she was "jumped by a very psychotic homeless man" while walking from her home to a new space she bought across the street.

Perrette, no doubt with the back of her hand pressed to her forehead, has reported ever so dramatically to Twitter, the press, and oh yeah, the police, that she was assaulted in the street near her home. Johnson raises some issues with her story, and I have a few of my own, not the least of which is that he inquires:

"Where are the cuts, scrapes and bruises?" She should be black and blue, and swollen like a puffer fish, but instead she has a slightly red nose? In her interview on KTLA5, she looks somewhat hungover, but not as if she'd been repeatedly punched in the face by a man. http://ktla.com/2015/11/13/ncis-actress-pauley-perrette-describes-being-viciously-assaulted-near-hollywood-hills-home-man-arrested/ (Don't you just love how the news crew filmed her neighborhood in the scary dark of night, though the Alleged Attack occurred around 5:oo pm?)

A few more points come to mind. Is there video evidence of the alleged attacker in the vicinity? I wonder how many security cameras are in that neighborhood. I wonder if any of them will be found to have mysteriously malfunctioned around the time of the "attack" – the way they might have mysteriously malfunctioned at a certain restaurant around the time Perrette claims that her ex husband Coyote Shivers violated her restraining order against him. Such coincidences do happen. And if by chance there is footage of the alleged attacker, perhaps fleeing the scene, I'd like to see it and I'd like to see if the "murder in his eyes" might have been captured on video as he ran away.

Is "murder in his eyes" a forensics term she picked up from her job acting like a smart scientific character? I wonder if video will show a man simply wandering around, or making eye contact, and maybe saying something like, "Hey! I know you from TV!" If an inveterate liar like Perrette wasn't feeling very magnanimous that day, why would she not report such an encounter as an assault? Perhaps since the last man she falsely accused is now locked away in jail, she needed someone else at which to point a crooked finger?

By the way, the "homeless, mentally ill" man does have a name – David Merck. And guess what? For some reason I don't think we will see any great social rally to raise awareness of men's mental health OR homelessness issues. We will see Pauley on her fainting couch and nursing a reddish blemish on her nose with her window cracked open for the paparazzi.

If he has a history of violence as implied by police, perhaps he should have been in jail already. Or perhaps he might have been better off if he were in a shelter with some attention to his mental health issues.

That is a very big if in this world.

Back to the duplicitous Perrette, what of her claim that she was lying on the sidewalk in shock? The man who walked past her said she "was disheveled, seemed disoriented and appeared to be homeless."

http://www.foxla.com/news/local-news/48382485-story

Collapsing in shock might be a reaction for an ordinary woman – if she were not some Star Crazy just lying about why she was lying there. Perrette, who has allegedly endured ten years of harassment after a divorce that was supposedly like the Holocaust, might be a little more resilient. She might, through years of domestic combat seasoning, have acted a bit more coolly. Of course, “acting,” in this case, could have a lot more influence on what really happened.

She sure was composed when she talked to the press, as opposed to the porcelain princess of a victim she claims was nearly killed on the street. Her tweets were downright giddy. Makes me wonder if an episode like this can be found in her Star Crazy notes.

So, what’s the end game here? Why might she be scapegoating yet another innocent man in yet another bid for public sympathy? Or at the very least milking a real crime for all its worth? Is this the last season of NCIS, and is she in need of a new gig? Are the producers of the show getting sick of her shit (just imagine working with her for over a decade!) and planning to kill off Abby?

Maybe she’s bored; now that she has finally succeeded in putting her ex in jail, and can no longer pretend to be afraid of him. A new bogeyman? This girl’s gotta have a stalker of some sort, ya know. Some people can’t breathe without drama.

Or maybe her boyfriend/fiance/pseudo-husband (whatever he is this week) Thomas has had enough of living with Crazy, and is dumping her ass. She can’t use her worn out playbook on him; he knows “where the bodies are buried.” Indeed, he wielded a knight’s shovel, so to speak. Heaven knows that’s a guy who could credibly claim Battered Spouse Syndrome for his part in her crimes.

Could Perrette have merely been drunk or high that afternoon, staggering around and falling to the sidewalk in a chemically induced haze? Remember, the witness said she looked “disoriented” and “homeless.” Some guy sees her like that in public – what if he recognized her??? What’s a narcissist to do? How about pinning it on that real homeless dude she always sees around, the one she can describe to a “T” to the cops.

Then again, it could be that the Alleged Attack happened just as Perrette claimed. It is possible that after a lifetime of portraying herself as a victim, some random stranger, who should have been living in the jail cell now occupied by Coyote Shivers, walked up to her and punched her lights out. Such an encounter with Karma would most certainly be enough to send that narcissistic Louisiana swamp donkey into a state of very deep shock.

Being imprisoned for a crime he didn’t commit, Coyote Shivers was of course unavailable for comment.

Hannah Wallen's response to "The Men's Rights Movement" by Brave the World

AVfM Video Source · 17 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Naming and shaming doctors and rabbis who mutilate babies

Paul Elam · 18 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

An IMD celebration with a caution

Paul Elam · 19 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Daily Telegraph deletes otherwise inoffensive comments?

David King · 19 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Update: The Daily Telegraph has disabled access to the comments on the article in question from their front page. I have updated the links in this article to provide access to the original comment as required.

On Monday, I wrote an (admittedly too long) comment on the Daily Telegraph in reply to this comment by "Carrie" (whose Disqus profile, surprise, surprise, is private). "Carrie"'s comment contained the standard feminist lies about the supposed bigotry of AVfM and our readership (ie, you, dear Reader!) and conflation between AVfM and other sites such as RoK. Unless these lies are confronted, lies become truth and truth becomes lies — so, I did my best.

By some remarkable coïncidence, "Carrie" managed to reply to my comment — twice (#1 and #2) — and then, mysteriously, my comment got flagged and then deleted. (No, please don't flag them; that is feminist-level lameness. And plus, it'd break the links in this article.)

I'm not going to speculate who flagged it, but I confess some surprise considering my comment didn't appear to violate any of the Telegraph's guidelines and was pretty civilised and equanimous, and didn't use any potentially bad words that "Carrie" didn't use.

Perhaps the Telegraph didn't like the fact that I represented AVfM's perspective. Perhaps they objected to the length of it. Perhaps they delete flagged comments without critical thought. I sincerely hope that this is not indicative of a turn for the worse in what is nominally a respectable conservative† newspaper's moderation policy.

Nevertheless, the comment is gone from the public and we shall never know why because (unlike AVfM) the Telegraph has a policy never to enter into discussion over individual moderation decisions — so I reproduce it here for posterity's sake.

† Which has no bearing whatsoever on anything other than that conservative news sources are presumed to be less tolerant of feminist foolery than liberal sources. In no way do I endorse or repudiate the Telegraph or conservative media in general.

In reply to this comment by "Carrie"; needless to say, "Carrie" never indicated that she'd read my comment all the way to the end as requested, which was also pretty evident in her replies (as linked above). The following is the unedited version of my original comment as posted:

I can't stand RoK because they are just as you describe in your last paragraph. I can't stand PUAs either, for much the same reason. And there's a unhealthy dollop of misogyny in the MGTOW community too, which I also can't stand. (ETA: I can't stand the misogyny. MGTOW, as a philosophy, is a perfectly fine thing, so long as it is not used as an excuse to denigrate women or other men for their choices.)

But to talk of any of them in the same sentence as AVfM as if they even remotely share similar perspectives with AVfM is as absurd as suggesting that moderate and liberal feminists like Christina Hoff Sommers and Cassie Jaye share anything much in common with TERFs (trans-exclusive radical feminists, for readers not involved in gender politics) like Cathy Brennan and Julie Bindel.

I know quite a lot about AVfM, because I happen to be a member of its executive management. Bigotry, including against gay people, trans* people, people of colour, women (and men for that matter) is quite verboten under AVfM's comment policy. I should know, because I wrote it. Shaming language of men (and women, come to that) is also likely to attract mod action.

That mod policy is enforced by a team of moderators led by a woman who, like me, is also a member of AVfM executive management.

I can't stand the word 'mangina', either, and we discourage its use, though we generally won't ban anybody for that reason alone.

Some who comment at AVfM may also read and maybe comment at RoK — I wouldn't know the degree of overlap, and I can't imagine how you think you do — but that, on its own, doesn't make them as bigoted as RoK is as a whole.

Oh, I know for a fact that some of our commentators disagree with homosexuality and transsexuality or otherwise hold some views with which you and I would strongly disagree, but they don't trot it out at AVfM because they wouldn't last long if they did. But that's okay, because we don't insist that everybody thinks precisely the same way we do, partly because we value diversity of opinion and partly because we recognise that we're not defined by our commentariat but, instead, by our policies and the articles we publish.

Otherwise, we're a relatively tolerant bunch (much moreso than the majority of feminists, anyway) with readers and contributors from across the whole political spectrum so naturally, we're going to have some disagreements.

Periodically, we do get the odd misogynist or PUA show up, but they usually get banned pretty quickly because they can't abide by our mod policy. We leave their posts up, though, not least so that others can see the reason for their ban (which is publicly announced by our mod tool).

As for doxing, AVfM does not and never has done that — with one exception, the Agent Orange files, which linked the hateful utterances of a handful of radical feminists' with their true identities and occupations (which included childcare and legal practice, if memory serves).

No, register-her,com (which was never properly an AVfM project anyway) didn't dox anybody; it did publish the names, photographs and addresses women who were convicted by due process of certain crimes and whose details were therefore already a matter of public record — much like s€x offender registries, which that site was originally intended to emulate and parody.

It turns out that, in the main, it's feminists who do more doxing and online harassment than anybody else. For reasons that should be obvious, I won't be linking examples (even if the DT accepted links in comments, which don't know that it does). But I can point to what feminists did to Janet Bloomfield on Twitter. And by harassment, I mean a two-month long campaign to get her (a woman, mark you) permanently excluded from Twitter. How do we know? Because the feminist in question crowed about it on twitter afterwards. And it was a feminist who got a past member of staff fired from his day job by phoning his workplace and telling them that their employee was a misogynist.

AVfM has never done this, except in rare and egregious cases such as that of the corrupt assistant prosecutor Mary Kellett in Maine — although we didn't go phoning up her boss, we just exposed her corruption online and eventually the people of Maine voted her out.

And you will never find AVfM, any of its staff and or regular commentators who say that othered men are "trash" to be "exterminated". I don't know who you were talking to, but for sure it wasn't any of us.

We're proud of our openly gay and trans* contributors and commentators, particularly AndyBob who is articulate, well-read and an extremely good writer to boot. Nobody has to declare their misogyny first, indeed, anybody who does will get banned in fairly short order.

We don't, however, focus on their minority identity status in the way that feminists do. We see them as men and women, first, who care about gender equality and want to do something to ease the injustices men and boys face. That's equality — treating people the same regardless of their demographic membership.

As to real-world activism, we do what we can within the limits of our resources. Since you don't appear to be familiar with him, Earl Silverman started a battered men's shelter in Canada with his own money because no federal or provincial government would help him despite the plethora of data that show men are about as often the victims of DV as women are and despite the Canadian Charter. He tried legal action to force the government to comply, but that failed, too.

When his money ran out, he had to close the shelter and ended up committing suicide. Though there was a letter, it was never released so we can only guess at why — but it's a fair bet that he was exhausted fighting an indifferent or overtly hostile system and simply didn't have the strength to go on.

AVfM did hold a conference last year at which a third of the speakers were women and at least a fifth were black. No, that's not completely representative of the public at large by proportion, but we select on merit rather than identity quotas. We intended to hold another this year, but it turned out to be too expensive given the additional security requirements — which were only needed because of feminist interference last year. But Mike Buchanan is holding an independent conference next year under the same banner here in the UK, which'll be exciting.

We collaborated in a counter-campaign "don't be that girl" to combat the deeply sexist and dishonest "don't be that guy" campaign launched by Canadian feminists.

Real-world activism requires money, which few men who are aware of the issues have, usually because they have first-hand experience of them. If governments and charitable foundations won't help, what else do you (realistically) expect us to do?

So: explain to me exactly where and how your assertions of bigotry, racism, sexism, homophobia and transphobia are justified in respect of AVfM? We are one of the most prominent publications in men's issues on the Internet and though we don't represent "the manosphere" (a term which we generally don't identify with anyway), and we are none of the things you say we are.

To refer to your other reply, when was the last time (other than this exchange) that you bothered to talk to a member of AVfM staff, or to a representative of the organisation?

Indeed, I do wonder whether you'll read past the point where I told you of my affiliation. If you reply, please say whether you got to this point having read the whole of the foregoing. I'll be interested to see what you have to say.

Pretty dreadful stuff, no?

Gary Costanza named Director of anti-MGM Activism for AVFM

Paul Elam · 20 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

It is with great pleasure I get to announce a new member of team AVFM. Gary Costanza has accepted the position as Director of anti-MGM Activism for A Voice for Men, as well as becoming the lead administrator of neonatalcutting.com (NNC).

His initial job description is already in place. Gary will be responsible for gathering practice information on child genital mutilators and listing them on the directory at NNC.

He will also be posting each new addition to the directory as an article at AVFM mainsite.

In addition to those duties, Gary will be recruiting help with making the directory as comprehensive as possible. We are pledged to spare no doctor, rabbi or anyone else sexually mutilating infants for any reason.

I have great confidence in Gary Costanza to do an excellent job. He is a passionate MHRA who suits up and shows up for MHRA events like ICMI and Male Students in Peril. I am certain he will take the bull by the horns and own this position.

We will have his name and AVFM email posted to the masthead soon and he will be posting his own announcement here on mainsite in the very near future.

Please join me and the rest of AVFM management in welcoming Gary to his new and very important position.

Collective amnesia regarding violence by women / call for reform

Robert St. Estephe · 20 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

This article focuses on female serial killers yet its real subject is the fear of thinking honestly about violence by women.

1. Monster Love

Scott Bonn, a PhD criminologist who published a book in 2014 titled Why We Love Serial Killers: The Curious Appeal of the World's Most Savage Killers. The book's subject is the public fascination with this particular type of criminal. This is how the professor announces his topic:

"In many ways, serial killers are for adults what monster movies are for children — that is, scary fun!" He follows by noting that this it is not simple clean fun, but rather comes at a certain cost: a feeling of guilt: "Research … reveals that many people who are fascinated with serial killers refer to it as a guilty pleasure," we learn. [1]

Fair enough.

Bonn's book discusses, almost exclusively, the phenomenon of fascination with male serial killers. When he devotes a sliver of attention to the females, though, he he gets it all wrong. Reading about and watching movies about male serial killers is "scary fun," for lots of people. But there is no "love" for the female of the species – no subculture of devotees and collectors devoted to them as there clearly is with the males.

The male serial killer is the perfect monster, society's archetype of evil. The female serial killer is a monster society would rather pretend does not exist (Countess Bathory and Aileen Wuornos being the two exceptions). [2] The female version cannot provide "scary fun." Thinking about the idea – about female psychopaths – is just too scary in today's culture. We have, in the West, been conditioned by decades of ideological indoctrination to avoid so much as thinking clearly about feminine monstrosity, let along talking about it.

2. Guns and Arsenic

In his book, Bonn trots out big ideas such as "societal notions" and "paternalism" in describing the one and only FSK that a large number of Americans have heard of: Aileen Wuornos:

"Until Wuornos, the mass media almost always depicted a serial perpetrator as a deranged man due to the erroneous and paternalistic societal notion that women could not commit such crimes. Unlike the obscure and rarely discussed Black Widow killers throughout history, Wuornos became a modern-day celebrity monster and popular culture icon because she defied stereotypes and did not kill demurely as a woman 'should.'" [3] We learn from another source that "Bonn believes that is a key reason for her fame" is simply that she "murdered with a gun." [4]

Bonn is stuck in stereotypes. He is parroting present-day politically correct notions that are not based in historical fact. The "societal notion that women could not commit such crimes" is a historically recent invention. It is a product of false claims of feminist propagandists and is reinforced by intrinsic (biological) male chivalry. Before the 1960s the idea that female serial killers were relatively common was in itself common knowledge.

Look at the period 1871 to 1873 and you will see eight cases in the US [5]. The public was quite aware of that there were "female fiends" dotting the landscape (along with the male ones).

Take a look at the crop from the year 1925. You will find eight US cases in this year alone [6]. Professor Bonn and the other criminologists who specialize in the study of serial killers are not even aware that most of these cases even exist. This widely published 1925 newspaper illustration show just how aware of female serial killers the public actually was before the current era of forgetting, the era of political correctness taboos.

May 1, 1925 : Nationally syndicated article discussing three concurrent female serial killer cases

As far as guns are concerned we can count quite a few FSKs of the "shoot 'em up variety." [7]

When criticizing stereotypes, Bonn and his colleagues might want to give a hard stare at the pairing of pictures below. First, here's a still from the movie-version of the 2003 film Monster, showing actress Charlize Theron playing Aileen Wuornos [8].

Actress Charlize Theoron as Aileen Wornos in the 2003 film, Monster.

Compare it to this 1924 representation of Winona Green (later known as Winnie Olah Freeman), a young woman who was, at that date, already a double murderess, yet to become a full-fledged serial murderess that was her destiny. [9]

Nice parallel, wouldn't you say? The "societal notion" back in 1924 was that women could be violent monsters. There was no fear of frankly depicting and discussing the topic of female aggression and violence by women. The demureness, the taboo, the various forms of censorship backed by disinformation about violence by women took hold beginning in in the 1970s.

Gun-wielding Winona shot to death her mother-in-law and father-in-law in 1924 and had plotted to kill her husband. After serving time she went on to murder two more men, in 1946 and 1953. Winnie was what you might call a really cheeky type of sociopath. Listen to what she had to say for herself in 1924:

"Who ever heard of a woman being electrocuted or hanged in Arkansas?" she demands whenever the death penalty is mentioned to her. Furthermore she is not remorseful. "I'm not sorry for my deeds, she repeats again and again. "I planned both murders, thinking them all out thoroughly in advance. Now that I have admitted everything, I am willing to meet whatever fate awaits me." [10]

Winnie served some time, escaped, was recaptured, got released, and went on to murder: again and again.

Aileen Wuornos was not, as is commonly averred, a Lesbian Avenger Wonder Woman carrying out the battle against the "patriarchy," but merely an ordinary bandit. There have been plenty of female serial killer bandits in the past and they continue to crop up. [11]

One of the pervasive stereotypes of female serial killers is that poison, a method used by a large share of female serial killers, is a gentler sort of killing method. This assumption is plain wrong. As Harold Schechter observes: “The truth is that, compared to the lingering agonies suffered by the average poisoning victim, the deaths meted out by male serial killers like “Jack the Ripper, “Son of Sam,” or the Boston Strangler – the swift executions by knife blade, bullet or garotte – seem positively humane.” (The Ripper’s grotesque mutilations were executed upon the corpse, not as acts of torture.). [12]

Beyond guns and poison as methods used by female serial killers include hatchets, axes, arson, ligament, strangulation, drowning, battery with blunt objects (hoe, drum sticks, hammer, iron bar) [13]

Here’s another pictorial stab at Bonn’s assumptions about past “societal notions.”

Prolific and wildly savage serial killer Lizzie Halliday (incarcerated from 1893 to her death in 1918). These artists’ conceptions of Halliday’s final murder date from 1906. [14]

These illustrations have been utterly forgotten for 109 years.

3. Collective Amnesia

Wuornos was not only not America's first female serial killer, but was more like the 275th and she was, according to my current count, the 13th to be executed in this country. [15]

The experts have determined that "female serial killers are rare" (in comparison with their male counterparts). The experts, represented, for example, by 135 participants from 10 countries in the FBI's 2008 international conference on "Serial Murder," [16] base their claims on incomplete research (without ever stopping to wonder whether historical research is even slightly systematic, let alone as complete as can be reasonably managed). [17]

The "official" number of historical US female serial killer cases (up to the last few years) is often used is 62. The most commonly cited estimate of the ratio of male to female serial killers is 1:6. My own list of US cases from the period 1829-2008 includes 330. [18] We might as just how rare are these criminals when there are 5 times as many as the experts say there are?

The longest roster of female serial killers (internationally) I have seen totals 140. My own list, based on research in archival newspapers primarily, now numbers more than 900. [19]

Why such extreme disparity? What on earth is going on here?

Patricia Pearson's brilliant and hard-hitting book, a 1997 exposé on violence-by-women, When She was Bad: Violent Women and the Myth of Innocence. [20] Pearson makes a crucial and precisely accurate observation regarding the hullabaloo in 1990 over the Wuornos case and the attendant false claim that she was America's "first female serial killer." Pearson pointed out the falsehood of the claim and stated that this forgetful fantasy was an indication of what she called "collective amnesia." This is a profoundly important observation.

Bonn's book, coming eighteen years later than Pearson's, with its paternalism-blaming explanation of this society-wide unwillingness to face up to the hard facts of the female of the species – regarding: female aggression, female sadism, physical violence initiated by women (not to mention extreme indirect violence) – is, in its self-censored gaping lacunae, itself an instance of chivalry-based denial. Bonn's is a chivalry dipped in feminist dogma, a nanny-monitored, a mommy-supervised, maternalistic condescending nod to the thought police of "critical gender theory," if you will.

Why we Love Serial Killers is a most telling and blatant symptom of collective amnesia.

4. Sexual Violence

The perfect monster is, as we know, a violent sex pervert, and is therefore (of course) a male. But the fact is that there have indeed been female serial killers who fit this mold. Jane Toppan [21], the prolific serial killer nurse caught in 1901 got orgasms from lying in the death-bed of her victims embracing them as they expired. Martha Grinder [22], a Pittsburgh serial killer executed in 1866, had a decided necrophiliac streak. And she loved to watch the agonies of her dying victims.

A Mexican case, publicized in the US reveals the worst kind of monstrosity, worthy of any male monster. In the 1890s Mexico City, Guadalupe Martinez de Bejarano lured orphan girls and tortured them. “The girl would be enslaved and subjected to torture with a markedly sexual nature. Guadalupe especially enjoyed forcing the girls to sit naked on a burning brazier; she would strip them and hang them from the ceiling by the wrists and flog them with a cattle whip.” One victim “was made to endure every cruelty and privation which the malignity of ingenious fiend could suggest or inspire. Hunger, exposure, blows, burns, scalds, pin thrusts, cuts and every other atrocity that can be inflicted without causing instant death, was the daily lot of this unfortunate girl.” In the end each victim would be starved to death. [23]

There are other female serial killer examples of sexually excitement in the act of killing. like arch-pervert of them all Countess Bathory [24]. Then there’s Anna Zwanziger of Bavaria whose “admitted motive was sheer malevolent pleasure – at her trial in 1828, she confessed that the sight of her victims’ death agonies threw her into a transport of ecstasy.” [25] France’s amazingly prolific Helene Jegado, arrested in 1851 who “appeared to have been actuated by a thirst for destruction, and to have taken pleasure in witnessing the agonies of her victims.” [26] There’s Australia’s Martha Rendell (1909) [27] who got her kicks from killing kids, and France’s killer nurse, Antoinette Sierri (1926) and what were called her “orgies” of death [28], among many other habitually lethal ladies of yore who got a very special thrill out of witnessing the death throes of humans. We can only guess at the specific nature of the pleasure so many other female serial killers on record through the centuries who admitted the delight they felt as they murdered, and murdered and murdered again. Among them are certainly more covert sexual sadists.

I won’t even go into the human-sacrificing female serial killing cultists (Voodoo, etc.), the baby-eating kidnappers (yes, real-life ogresses), the sundry other female cannibal serial killers, nor the professional child care providers who burned babies alive. You can look them all up. [29]

So much for the female being a kinder, gentler, seldom sex-driven and far-rarer-than-the-male sort of serial killer. But wait, the rabbit hole goes even deeper.

5. Girl Secrets

“I like hurting people,” was the stunning confession made by British girl, barely 11-years-old who murdered two boys in 1968 and had attempted to strangle others only to be interrupted in the act. Mary Bell’s case is famous – as an anomaly. This child was indeed a serial killer despite the fact that her efforts – serial efforts – were sometimes interfered with. [30]

But what if this “unique” case were not unique after all. My research has turned up over twenty cases like it. One involves an Irish girl named Mary Maher, who in 1906 on three separate occasions murdered three sisters, making each death seem an accident or a “natural death,” and then tried to yet another sister, but sensing the grown-ups were finally on to her game and that she was in big trouble, she committed suicide – at the age of 11! [31]

Among the serial killer girls (and would-be serial killer girls) from the United States that turned up in my research on historical female serial killers are these four from the late 1800s:

In 1872 a 16-year-old nurse girl in St. Louis, Missouri, named Martha Whetstone killed four children, including her own sister, in a space of four months. [32] In 1874 Henrietta Weibel of New York City, 15-years-old (or 13 according to one source) murdered one child and attempted another. She confessed she had an uncontrollable mania for setting fires and burning babies. [33]

1892 was a bumper year for such cases. In June a 6-year old girl in Atoka, Kentucky whose family name was Bottoms planned the murder of her 18-month-old sister long in advance and succeeded in doing the deed and delighted in the result. After being caught this precocious tyke expressed the burning desire to kill more babies in the future. [34] In July, Ella Holdridge, of Tonawanda, New York, age 14, made a number of attempts to murder other children who were saved by medical intervention, finally succeeded. Her motivation was her passion for attending funerals. When a lull in burials came about, offering Ella no opportunities to enjoy her favorite form of amusement, she solved the problem by poisoning children. She remarked with respect to the corpse of the one she did kill that her victim “made the prettiest corpse ever put under New York soil.” [35] In 1892 a girl named Annabell of Fairfield County, South Carolina, at the age of 11 murdered a baby. Three years later in June 1895, she murdered and dismembered another, then tortured a 6-year-old boy in an effort to force him to confess to the crime she had committed. [36]

Thirty years later on, precocious Alsa Thompson, the “Baby Borgia,” in 1925, at the age of seven [yes, that’s 7!], confessed to poisoning eleven persons, stating with her twin baby sisters who died, and a caretaker lady she didn’t like. [37]

The girl’s separated parents had temporarily placed her in a Hollywood, California family, which saw Alsa wielding a razor against her baby sister and the foster family’s daughter. She admitting to poisoning two canaries and a cat. She said she put ant poison in the coffee and in the pork chops and sulfuric acid in the stewed peaches on various occasions. Illnesses ensued. The case made headlines. Alsa was quoted answering her official questioners – alienists (psychiatrists) and a social worker – asking about her motives saying such things as:

“I like to see them die, that’s all.” [38]

Similar cases of little girls as serial killers, some of them quite prolific have been discovered in in Australia, England, Germany, and France. For example, German Ida Schnell, caught in 1906 at the tender age of 13, serially murdered at least eight babies. I found these reports by doing ambitious systematic keyword-searching of old newspapers, not in the professional literature on forensic psychology and criminology. In 1894 a 14-year-old nurder girl in Novgorod, Russia, confessed to murdering seventeen babies "because they bothered her, and she disliked the trouble of attending to them." [39]

6. Taboo-Busting

These "killer kid" cases, along with many other cases involving solitary homicides on the part of young girls that my research has uncovered (yet which have been completely overlooked by scholars) need to be no longer ignored by researchers on violence and aggression. There is much work to do and the experts need to get on it. Pronto.

Camille Paglia, once famously quipped: "There is no female Mozart because there is no female Jack the Ripper." [40] Yes there is, Camille; and not just one.

When Lizzie Halliday was captured in 1893, some writers speculated that since Halliday had traveled to England, she might have been the "Ripper." [41]

Most people do not realize that "Jack" did not perform his gruesome acts on his living victims, but cut them up after death. Not so with Tamara Samsonova, serial killer, serial dismemberer, captured in St. Petersburg, Russia, on July 27, 2015, who admitted cutting away at her final victim, whom she had drugged, while the elderly woman was still living. [42]

It is an established, well-documented fact that feminist ideologues have deliberately distorted systematically and on a large scale, the academic scholarship on violence between the sexes. Dr. Murray A. Straus, a sociologist who specializes in the study of domestic violence, has identified seven distinct methods of academic and intellectual sabotage and coercive censorship practiced by feminists in academia. [43] His exposure of scientific gate-keeping goes fair in explaining our collective amnesia about violence by women.

The bizarre fairy-tale notion that females do not initiate violence (but only act violently in response to male-initiated violence) held by marxian feminist ideologues is long-discredited, yet it still has wide currency today among feminists, both elite and common.

As a result of "this investment in a model of gender-based oppression," the National Organization of Women and associated "Gender Bias Task Forces" helped create VAWA (the Violence Against Women Act), which was less of a practical response to real crime in real-life situations than it was an effort to construct a violence-free utopia (and a massive bureaucracy providing a huge number of jobs for feminist ideologues), based on the bizarre belief that women are "inherently non-violent." [44] It took a lot of coordinated trickery and widespread intimidation of academic scholars to suppress the fact that domestic violence is characterized by gender symmetry, as Dr. Straus has definitively proven. [45]

There have, it turns out, been many female serial killers who have mutilated their victims, my research reveals. And another recently apprehended Russian "hacker" of humans, Elena Lobacheva, aged 25, captured February 15, 2015, who got an orgasmic thrill out of thrusting her knife, dozens of times, into the twelve men she slew. [46]

The entire subject of female aggression needs a re-evaluation by social scientists in order to discard the deliberate distortions created by ideologues. This "audit" is needed and needed now. The taboo against thinking "incorrect" thoughts about female aggression must be broken. The silence of the lambs must be broken. Scholars need to stop being cowards, terrified to speak out about the facts that the thought police of repressive political correctness forbid to be disseminated. My recommendation for the experts on violence and "gender" in their effort to initiate crucially necessary reform is to start with an in-depth study and of historical cases of violent female children, starting with Serial Killer Girls.

Dear experts: a good time to start is (in my humble opinion) today.

Don't be afraid. They're just little girls, you know; "sugar and spice and everything nice," and that sort of thing.

###

NOTES:

- Feature image: detail from title page: Anonymous, Narrative and Confessions of Lucretia P. Cannon (1841), New York. Cannon was America's earliest known FSK (there is no credible evidence that Lavinia Fisher was a serial killer, despite the legend). The image shows Cannon burning to death a 5-year-old.

[1] Scott Bonn, Why We Love Serial Killers: The Curious Appeal of the World's Most Savage Killers, New York: 2014, Skyhorse; Quote: Scott A. Bonn Ph.D. "Here's Why We Love Serial Killers: Examining Our Curious Fascination with "Celebrity Monsters." Psychology Today, Sep 22, 2014

[2] Wuornos was celebrated by radical feminists who liked to see her as an avenger ion the "war between the sexes." Elizabeth Bathory, the early 17th century "Blood Countess" is the archetypal evil woman, inspiring the name of a Death Metal band, novels, numerous films, plays and other artistic productions.

[3] Quote: [Scott A. Bonn Ph.D. "Why Some Women Kill Again and Again. Female killers are rarely driven by sexual sadism like men." Psychology Today, Jan 12, 2015]

[4] quote from: Julie Beck, "The Grisly, All-American Appeal of Serial Killers, The Atlantic, Oct 21, 2014.

[5] 1871-1873: 1871 – Catherine Batchelor – Lockport, Indiana; 1871 – Lydia Sherman – New Brunswick, New Jersey; New Haven & Danby, Ct.; 1871 – Elizabeth Wharton – Baltimore, Maryland; 1872 – Charlotte Lamb – Trimbelle, Wisconsin; 1872 – Emily Lloyd – Leesburg, Virginia; 1872 – Martha Whetstone – St. Louis, Missouri; 1873 – Kate & Katie Bender ("Bloody Benders") – Cherry Vale, Kansas; 1873 – Sarah Earhardt – Germantown, Ohio; see: Female Serial Killers of 19th Century America

http://unknownmisandry.blogspot.com/2012/02/female-serial-killers-of-19th-century.html

[6] 1925 female serial killers in the USA: Anna Cunningham – Chicago, Illinois; Helen Geisen-Volk – New York, New York; Pearl Jackson – Birmingham, Alabama; Julia Shepherd – Chicago, Illinois; Della Sorenson – Dannenborg, Nebraska; Birdie Strome – Springfield, Ohio; Alsa Thompson – Hollywood, California; Martha Wise – Valley City, Ohio.

[7] See: "Female Serial Killers and Guns" http://unknownmisandry.blogspot.com/2015/09/female-serial-killers-and-guns.html

[8] Monster, 2003, directed by Patty Jenkins Charlize Theron playing Wuornos, Academy Award for Best Actress.

[9] Winona Green (Winnie Ola Freeman) – "Outlaw Blood Made This Choir-Girl A Demon! – Alienists See in Her Self- Confessed Slaying of Two Relatives a 'Throwback' to Weird ' Indian Tribal Vengeance," syndicated, Springfield Republican (Mo.), Dec. 28, 1924, (p. ?). See: Winnie Ola Freeman (Winona Green), "The Cat Woman": Arkansas Serial Killer – 1954

http://unknownmisandry.blogspot.com/2014/10/winnie-ola-freeman-winona-green-cat.html

[10] Winona Green (Winnie Ola Freeman), quote: ["Girl Who Killed Two Thinks Her Sex Will Save Her From Death," syndicated (NEA), Nov. 1, 1924, p. 1]

[11] Maria Oliviero; Inessa Tarverdiyeva; see: “Female Serial Killer Bandits” http://unknownmisandry.blogspot.com/2013/05/female-serial-killer-bandits.html

[12] poison deaths – Harold Schechter, The Serial Killer Files, Ballantine, 2003, p. 31

[13] Female Serial Killers: Weapons, Poisons & Methods

http://unknownmisandry.blogspot.com/2014/11/female-serial-killers-weapons-poisons.html

[14] Halliday images: 1) 2) “Screaming she sank …” Ada Evening News (Indian Territory, Ok.), Nov. 5, 1906, syndicated, found in other papers as well; “She Began Stabbing …” The Bryant Democrat (Ohio), Nov. 2, 1906, p. 6, syndicated, found in other papers as well.

[15] The Dirty Dozen: 12 Female Serial Killers Executed in the USA – 1816-2002 http://unknownmisandry.blogspot.com/2013/05/the-dirty-dozen-12-female-serial.html

Female Serial Killers Executed

http://unknownmisandry.blogspot.com/2013/03/female-serial-killers-executed.html

[16] FBI conference: Aug. 29 – Sep. 2, 2005 in San Antonio, Texas; report: Robert J. Morton, editor, Serial Murder: Multi-Disciplinary Perspectives for Investigators, National Center for the Analysis of Violent Crime, U. S. Department of Justice, Federal Bureau of Investigation, 2008, (corporate author), National Ctr for the Analysis of Violent Crime (NCAVC) United States of America;

https://www.fbi.gov/stats-services/publications/serial-murder

For a critique of the FBI report, see: Robert St. Estepohe, “Monsters Too Scary for Words,” Sep. 7, 2915, Female Serial Killer Index (blog), http://female-serial-killers-index.blogspot.com/2015/08/monsters-too-scary-for-words.html

[17] “Rarity” statistics, ratio pf male to female at 1:6 – Eric W. Hickey, Serial Murderers and Their Victims, (Wadsworth), 1991; 6th edn. 2015

[18] US cases; 330 cases 1829-2008; see: Female Serial Killers of the USA

http://unknownmisandry.blogspot.com/2015/06/female-serial-killers-of-usa.html

[19] the longest roster of FSKs: Peter Vronsky, Female Serial Killers: How and Why Women Become Monsters, 2007, Berkley Books, N.Y.; see: Index: FSKs

[20] Patricia Pearson, When She was Bad: Violent Women and the Myth of Innocence, Viking, 1997.

[21] Jane Toppan: see the superb book on the case by Harold Schechter, Fatal: The Poisonous Life of a Serial Killer, 2003, Pocket Star Books.

“Jane Toppan, Massachusetts Serial Killer Nurse – 1901”

http://unknownmisandry.blogspot.com/2011/09/jane-toppan-massachusetts-serial-killer.html

[22] Martha Grinder – “Martha Grinder, Pittsburg Serial Killer Executed in 1866”

http://unknownmisandry.blogspot.com/2011/09/martha-grinder-pittsburg-serial-killer.html

[“Martha Grinder, Arch Murderess Of Pittsburg – Women Who Poisoned Men, Woman and Children for Pleasure of Witnessing Their Dying Torments, Hanged – Monomaniac Carried Death In Her Pocket,” The Pittsburgh Press (Pa.), Nov. 15, 1910, p. 5]

[23] “BejaranGuadalupe Martinez de Bejarano, Sadistic Sexual Female Serial Killer of Girls – 1892”

http://unknownmisandry.blogspot.com/2013/01/guadalupe-martinez-de-bejarano-sadistic.html

[Wikipedia in Spanish; newspaper: [‘A Female Fiend. – Remarkable Career of a Mexican Woman Who Loved Young Girls. – Every Form of Torment Visited Upon Helpless Orphans. – The Widow Bejarano and Her Strange Passion – Tortures Young Girls Just For the Fun if the Thing – Her Sons Partake of Her Cruel Spirit – A Celebrated Case.’ St. Louis Dispatch (Mo.), Apr. 24, 1892, p. 25]

[24] Bathory – “The Blood Countess,” Hungarian Serial Killer & Sadist Elizabeth Báthory – 1610

http://unknownmisandry.blogspot.com/2011/09/blood-countess-hungarian-serial-killer.html

[25] Anna Zwanziger – Harold Schechter, The A to Z Encyclopedia of Serial Killers, Ballantine, New York, 1996, p. 122.

“Anna Zwanziger (Nannette Schoenleben), German Serial Killer – 1809”

http://unknownmisandry.blogspot.com/2011/09/anna-zwanziger-german-serial-killer.html

[26] “Hélène Jégado, French Serial Killer – 1851”

http://unknownmisandry.blogspot.com/2011/09/helene-jegado-french-serial-killer-1851.html

[27] “Martha Rendell, Australian Serial Killer Step-Mother – 1909” http://unknownmisandry.blogspot.com/2011/09/ruth-rendell-australian-serial-killer.html

[28] “Antoinette Sierri, French Serial Killer Nurse – 1925” (the nale is often, erroneously, spelled “Scieri and “Scierri”)

http://unknownmisandry.blogspot.com/2011/09/antoinette-scierri-italian-serial.html

[“Poisoned Her Patients – The Guillotine Now Awaits Antoinette, the French Nurse, Who Couldn’t Resist Mixing Arsenic in the Medicines as She Hurried 30 Victims to Their Graves,” The American Weekly (San Antonio Light) (Tx.), Jun. 6, 1926, p. 7] [“Poisoned Victims to Watch Them Squirm,” Prescott Evening Courier (Az.), May 29, 1925, p. 1]

[29] Ogresses – “Ogresses: Female Serial Killers of the Children of Others” http://unknownmisandry.blogspot.com/2012/11/ogresses-female-serial-killers-of.html

Cannibals – “Cannibal Murderesses”

http://unknownmisandry.blogspot.com/2012/10/cannibal-murderesses.html

Occult – “Occult Female Serial Killers”

http://unknownmisandry.blogspot.com/2012/04/occult-female-serial-killers.html

Baby Burners – “The Baby Burners: Female Serial Killers Who Burned Babies Alive”

http://unknownmisandry.blogspot.com/2015/09/the-baby-burners-female-serial-killers.html

[30] “Mary Bell, 11-Year-Old Serial Killer, England – 1968”

http://unknownmisandry.blogspot.com/2011/09/mary-bell-11-year-old-serial-killer.html

[31] “Mary Maher, 11-Year Old Irish Serial Killer – 1906”

http://unknownmisandry.blogspot.com/2015/04/mary-maher-11-year-old-irish-serial.html

[“11-Year-Old Murderess. – Irish Child Kills Three Of Her Sisters. – Sensational Revelations.” Evening News (Sydney, Australia), Jan. 10, 1907, p. 2]

[32] Martha Whetstone – “Martha Whetstone, 16-Year-Old Serial Killer – Missouri, 1872” http://unknownmisandry.blogspot.com/2014/10/martha-whetstone-16-year-old-serial.html

["Mysterious Fatality. – The Singular Deaths of Four Children – An Unlucky Nurse Girl." (from: St. Louis Times), Wilmington Journal (North Carolina), Aug. 2, 1872, p. 2]

["A Fatal Nurse Girl." The New York Times (N. Y.), Jul. 29, 1872, p. 4]

[33] "Henrietta Weibel, aged 15, "The Baby Burner" – New York, 1874"

http://unknownmisandry.blogspot.com/2014/02/henrietta-weibel-aged-15-baby-burner.html

["A Young Murderess," The Singleton Argus and Upper Hunter General Advocate (NSW, Australia), Sep. 30, 1874, p. 3] ["Henrietta Weibel, The Child Burner." (reprinted from, New York Sun, Aug. 3), The Evening Star (Washington, D. C.), Aug. 4, 1874, p. 1] ["The Baby Burner. – The Heartless Domestic, Henrietta Weibel. – A Strange Story of Precocious Iniquity. – An Attempt to Burn Her Next Door Neighbor's Child." New York Herald (N.Y.), Aug. 5, 1874, p. 4] ["A Fiendish Girl. – A Child of Thirteen with a Mania for Baby Burning – The Mother's Testimony – An Interview With the Youthful Prisoner." (from New York Herald), The Atlanta Constitution (Ga.), Aug. 5, 1874, p. 2]

[34] Bottoms – ["Another Demon – Kentucky Produces a Veritable Female Jesse Pomeroy, – Who Chuckled With Glee After Murdering Her Baby Sister. – She Says She Is Glad She Killed the Infant, and Wants a Chance to Butcher Some More – Community Horror-Stricken Over the Deed." Public Ledger (Maysville, Ky.), Jun. 24, 1892, p. 3]

[35] "Ella Holdridge, Funeral-Loving Teenage Serial Killer from Tonawanda, New York – 1892"

http://unknownmisandry.blogspot.com/2013/07/ella-holdridge-funeral-loving-teenage.html

["She Murdered For Fun. – The Morbid Passion of A Child Leads Her to Crime." The Philadelphia Record (Pa.), Jul. 21, 1892, p. 7] ["A Pair of Juvenile Fiends." The Tuapeka Times (Lawrence, New Zealand), Nov. 2, 1892, p. 5] ["They Looked Nice Dead. – Little Girl Near Buffalo Liked Funerals. – For This Reason She Gave Seven-Year-Old Louisa Stermer Poison. – She Was Not Suspected Till Many Children Were at Death's Door." The Boston Daily Globe (Ma.), Jul. 20, 1892, p. 4] ["Young Borgia. – She Had a Morbid Desire to Attend Funerals. – To Gratify Her Whim She Poisons Her Playmates. – She Feeds Them on Rough on Rats and When One of Them Resisted She Rammed the Deadly Stuff Down Her Throat – Horrible Crime." Daily Public Ledger (Maysville, Ky.), Jul. 20, 1892, p. 3]

[36] Annabell of Fairfield County, South Carolina. – ["Negro Girl's Crimes." The Topeka Daily Capital (Ka.), Jul. 21, 1895, p. 1]

[37] "Alsa Thompson, the "Baby Borgia" – Los Angeles: 1925"

http://unknownmisandry.blogspot.com/2014/11/alsa-thompson-baby-borgia-los-angeles.html

[38] Alsa Thompson quote: "Child Admits Killing Twins – Seven Year Old Girl Said to Have Confessed to Poisoning Sisters," The Oregon Statesman (Portland, Or.), Feb. 4, 1925, p. 1; R. St. E. note: Not too many days after the story first broke, making national front page news, however, the papers carried the story of how little Alsa had recanted her confessions. My close examination of all the reports leads me to believe, and against my original opinion, that the evidence strongly points to guilt (at least, at a bare minimum, with regard to the razor attacks and poisonings not resulting in human death) and that the recantation stories seem to be mere official expediency. After all, what can the cops and the alienists reasonably do with a 7-year-old murderess except to try to make her get better?

[39] "Serial Killer Girls" – includes over 20 cases.

http://unknownmisandry.blogspot.com/2012/10/serial-killer-girls.html

[40] Camille Paglia, Sexual Personae: Art and Decadence from Nefertiti to Emily Dickinson, (1990), p. 247.

[41] ["Suspected of Whitechapel Crimes." The Huntington Weekly Herald (In.), Dec. 29, 1893, p. 7]

[42] “Tamara Samsonova, Russian Serial Killer Who Dismembered Her Victims – 2015”

http://unknownmisandry.blogspot.com/2015/07/tamara-samsonova-russian-serial-killer.html

[43] Murray A. Straus, “Processes Explaining the Concealment and Distortion of Evidence on Gender Symmetry in Partner Violence,” European Journal on Criminal Policy, published online 14 July 2007). Method 1. Suppress Evidence; Method 2. Avoid Obtaining Data Inconsistent with the Patriarchal Dominance Theory; Method 3. Cite Only Studies That Show Male Perpetration; Method 4. Conclude That Results Support Feminist Beliefs When They Do Not; Method 5. Create “Evidence” by Citation; Method 6. Obstruct Publication of Articles and Obstruct Funding Research That Might, Contradict the Idea that Male Dominance Is the Cause of PV; Method 7. Harass, Threaten, and Penalize Researchers Who Produce Evidence That Contradicts Feminist Beliefs.

http://pubpages.unh.edu/~mas2/V74-gender-symmetry-with-gramham-Kevan-Method%208-.pdf

[44] “inherently non-violent” – “In response to the construction of ‘the lesbian’ as abnormal and deviant, many Western lesbian-feminists in the 1970s (and some continuing in the 1980s and 1990s) (largely middle-class and white, although not exclusively) constructed notions of ‘lesbian utopia’, based on the assumption that women are inherently non-violent, caring and gentle, and that all lesbian relationships are based on an equal sharing of power. While this was not a monolithic or stable discourse (Ross, 1995), it has continued to influence the conceptualization and formation of lesbian identities and relationships as the polar opposite to the pathological construction (Taylor & Chandler, 1995; Ristock, 1997). The lesbian utopia discourse constructed a ‘normal’ lesbian as a strong woman engaged in healthy, stable, conflict-free, woman-loving-woman relationships. This has the effect of masking power relations and violence between women and works to keep systems of domination intact by reproducing the binary constrict of the normal/abnormal. As a result of this investment in a model of gender-based oppression and the construct of lesbian utopia, many women feel that they will not be believed when they disclose or report same-sex abuse. …’ [p. 12, Cindy Hoimes, ‘The Politics Of Naming The Violence: Examining Constructions Of ‘Lesbian Abuse’ In Community-Based Educational Discourses,’ Masters thesis, Sociology, University of Toronto, Ontario, 2000]

[45] Murray Straus, PhD, “Thirty Years of Denying the Evidence on Gender Symmetry in Partner Violence: Implications for Prevention and Treatment,” Partner Abuse Journal, June 2010.

http://pubpages.unh.edu/~mas2/V71-Straus_Thirty-Years-Denying-Evidence-PV_10.pdf [46] “Elena Lobacheva, Sexual Sadist Serial Killer – Russia 2015” http://unknownmisandry.blogspot.com/2015/02/elena-lobacheva-sexual-sadist-serial.html

Gynocentrism vs Values

AVfM Video Source · 21 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Sub to An Ear for Men YouTube HERE.

New Track from Jared White

Jared White · 23 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

It's been too long but Jared White is back with a new track . In a partnership request from Groundwork from the Metaphysics of MGTOW, Jared lays down some challenges and life lessons for young men with an unapologetic flow that Socrates himself would bob his head to. Give his new work a listen and don't forget to like, favorite, and subscribe and support another advocate against anti-male bigotry.

Track available for download at: embracefreedom.bandcamp.com

Featured Image: Attribution 4.0 International

Dr. Harvey S. Marchbein placed on directory of childhood sexual mutilators

Gary Costanza · 23 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Harvey S. Marchbein is Director of “Circumcision” at North Shore University Hospital on Long Island, NY. Dr. Marchbein makes religious – not medical – appeals in order to profit from cosmetic surgery performed on infant boys that results in their sexual mutilation.

He’s been placed on the directory of child mutilators at neonatalcutting.org.

For more information on the adverse effects of neonatal cutting please visit this page.

If you are an expectant parent we urge you to examine that information before you make a choice that will affect your son’s life.

AVfM Reference Wiki

Robert Brockway · 23 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

ICMI16 – why you need to pre-register by 6 December (only £22.00)

Mike Buchanan · 23 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

We're delighted with the number of people who have already pre-registered for ICMI16, but it's clear from conversations with people, that many are unaware that if they don't pre-register, they might not be able to attend the conference.

A link to the conference announcement is here. You can pre-register (it costs only £22.00) here, using PayPal or credit/debit cards, before the deadline of 22:00 GMT, 6 December. Please email me (mike@j4mb.org.uk) if you experience any difficulty making a payment.

We plan to book a venue with a capacity slightly above the number of people who pre-register, so if you want to be sure of attending ICMI16, you need to pre-register.

Key points:

1. The pre-registration fee will be refunded in full if the conference is cancelled, or a substantially smaller conference planned. The fee will be deductible from all ticket prices including the Early Bird Discount (£225.00), and the full ticket price (£265.00).

2. Pre-registration places you under no legal obligation to buy a ticket for ICMI16.

3. Only those who have pre-registered by the deadline will be assured of a place at ICMI16, and only then if they have booked and taken up one of the three payment options for their conference ticket by 22:00 GMT 31 December. The £265.00 ticket option can be paid in four monthly instalments at no extra cost.

4. We are planning to make this a ticketed event, and don't plan to sell tickets during the conference.

5. Surplus tickets will go on sale on 1 January.

6. It is important that you do not book travel or accommodation until a final decision has been made that the conference will proceed, and announced on this website.

I urge you to pre-register as soon as possible, to ensure your place at the conference, and to guarantee its financial viability. Thank you.

A final point. Some people have expressed concern at the cost of accommodation in London. In the coming few months we'll be investigating options for lower cost accommodation, e.g. student accommodation, or hotels further out from central London with good transport connections (including minibuses), and publishing details on this website.

Best wishes,

Mike Buchanan

Female Choice and Feminism – Part 1

Jan Deichmohle · 23 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

In this 2 part series, Jan Deichmohle adds his biosocial perspective to the ongoing nature/nurture conversation.

1. Abstract

This article shows that the female sex is biologically dominant. Sexual selection, procreation and a bias in perception of the sexes contribute to this dominance. Female dominance has been increased by all the "feminist waves." The balance of society which had once unconsciously favoured women throughout history while also valuing men has been completely overthrown.

2. Introduction

Female choice being a determinant factor in the evolutionary cycle has severe consequences. It can create new species, and determine the course of evolution. It creates and forms the differences between the sexes[1], as well as social structures like the family and culture. Charles Darwin and the Darwinian theory of evolution (circa 1858) laid the foundation of our understanding of natural selection and sexual selection. Recent studies on the subject have underscored its relevance and importance. See, for instance, Volume 1 "Culture and Sex[2]."

"… sexual selection deals with variations between individuals, male and female, of the same species"

(Erika Lorraine Milam, "Looking for a Few Good Males, Female Choice" in Evolutionary Biology, pub 2010, p. 13)

> «We assume that plumage dimorphism is a response to sexual selection and we assume that the males of plumage-dimorphic species experience stronger sexual selection pressures than males of monomorphic species. On Oahu, the extinction rate for dimorphic species, 59%, is significantly greater than for monomorphic species, 23%. On Tahiti, only 7% of the introduced dimorphic species have persisted compared to 22% for the introduced monomorphic species. …
>
> Thus, the hypothesis that response to sexual selection increases the risk of extinction is supported for passerids and for the data set as a whole.» (Sexual Selection and the Risk of Extinction of Introduced Birds on Oceanic Islands, Denson K. McLain, Michael P. Moulton and Todd P. Redfearn, 1995)

The influence of biological female choice can push species into biological and cultural dead ends. These evolutionary tiger traps can lead to species extinction. For example, one specie of deer in the "Ice Age" was compelled to grow ever larger antlers in order to gain access to females. Eventually the species was unable to cope with the changes in the environment and consequently died out.[3]

"To sum up, the intensity of sexual selection in larger species in deer family put them in risk of extinction" (Saloume Bazyan, Sexual selection and extinction in deer, Uppsala Universitet, 2013)

The problem isn't differences of the sexes. Different traits of the sexes cooperate and complete each other. They are useful within a culture. The problem is the pressure of sexual selection on men, becoming a driving force replacing natural adaption. This need not depend on the looks or sex differences; those traits were used to measure the degree of sexual selection. An even better method might be to determine the percentage of males, who could not procreate. The higher it is, the stronger the pressure of sexual selection.

> «Fernandes and colleagues observed a possible result when studying fossil ostracods. … The researchers found a clear trend: Species, whose males had a lot of efforts for their features, got extinct 10 times as fast as other species. Sexual selection was pushing them into a dead end.»[1] (Neue Zürcher Zeitung 2018)
>
> «These findings have led to the prediction that local extinction rates should be higher for speciespopulations with intense sexual selection. … we found that sexual selection increased risks of local extinction (dichromatic birds had on average a 23% higher local extinction rate than monochromatic species).» (Sexual selection affects local extinction and turnover in bird communities, Paul F. Doherty, Jr., Gabriele Sorci, et al; 5858–5862 PNAS May 13, 2003)

'Sexual selection' is a huge and complex subject so in this paper the reader is referred to Annex A where it is dealt with in greater detail.

Sexual selection and the certainty of motherhood give females easier access to procreation and make the female sex biologically dominant. Because children are the future, they get special protection and perception at an instinctive level, which then extends to females, who can be mothers. An innately favourable perception of women is the result. (For a discussion of female dominance in more detail and more evidence see Volume 1, "Kultur und Geschlecht", English: "Culture and Sex")

"This male-polarised/female-centering pattern is behind why males are regarded as advantaged and females disadvantaged… A pervasive misperception to the detriment of males would be expected to stem from the need to 'police' (to use the term as employed in biology) males to ensure they do not try to subvert the extent of sexual access they have by virtue of their ranking"

(The Origin of the Sexual Divide in the Genetic Filter Function: Male Disadvantage and Why It Is not Perceived, Steve Moxon, NEW MALE STUDIES: AN INTERNATIONAL JOURNAL ~ ISSN 1839-7816 ~ VOL. 1, ISSUE 3, 2012, PP. 96-124, © 2012 AUSTRALIAN INSTITUTE OF MALE HEALTH AND STUDIES.)

Males are regarded with a bias which becomes more prominent the lower his rank, and the less they should procreate because of their low rank.[4] Mothers breast feeding babies have a direct special bond with the child and influence its mental development. All of this adds to the biological dominance of women. Let us look at the consequences.

In the animal-human continuum inter-sexual selection by the female of the specie can exclude the male from a fulfilled and contented life. The drives of procreation and the survival of genes are an inherent biological imperative. It has been strikingly laid bare that this holds among our own species – human beings.

Whatever the dreams or lifetime ambitions of a man might be – be it a specific beloved woman, establishing a world based on love and then to live within it, or a world of social and free love between the sexes – whatever that life's dream may have been, it is often made impossible and their aspiration become destroyed by female choice, based on the power of sexual selection, which extends ever deeper into the realm of social life.

The male of almost all species must carry by far the greater burden of evolution. It is not the case that both women and men carry "fit" or "attractive" genes to procreate, resulting in only the "fit" or "attractive" genes prospering and surviving. No, virtually all fertile females procreate regardless of whether or not they carry "fit" or "attractive" genes; whereas only a proportion of males with genes regarded as attractive may procreate. A proportion of males pass the filtering process of sexual selection by carrying "attractive" genes. Most women who themselves carry “less-liked” or unattractive genes nevertheless still exclude men having the same less unattractive gene from procreation. Barred from access to a fulfilled love life, these men have their dreams of life destroyed by the discriminating choices made.

The “unattractive” genes however do not disappear quickly. “Unattractive” genes can be passed from a woman to a child down a long chain of generations. However, whenever the “unattractive” gene is passed to her son, he may well be discriminated against later in life, whereas if the “unattractive” gene is passed to a daughter, she will later in life most likely be able to still procreate. Were both women and men to face the same strict sexual selection rules, then those less unattractive genes would virtually disappear after one generation, speeding up evolution considerably. Or else, if neither of them would face sexual selection, then natural selection would steer a course towards a better adaption to the environment. In the current situation, the pressure to develop “attractive” genes may actually be higher than the pressure to develop “fit” genes.

Sobering as these statements are, they are nonetheless scientific facts, proven by genetic research.

“… The distribution of men’s mate value has a greater variance and more of a positive skew than the corresponding distribution for women. Females limit the reproductive success of males, and men compete with other men for access to women. ..Men have evolved to act as ‘filters’ for genetic material (Atmar 1991, Moxon 2008). ..By stretching men out in a dominance hierarchy, genetic material that enhances the lineage is retained, whilst deleterious genetic material is eliminated from the lineage. ..There is no dominance relationship (or competition) between men and women.”

Evolution by Martin Sewell, 31 March 2014, University of Cambridge

Examination of the graph[5] below reveals that over the last 60,000 years, between four and five times as many women than men have procreated and left their genes within the human gene pool. We can safely assume, that the vast majority of women have procreated, whereas, at most, one man in four or five has procreated.

This is consistent with the biological fact of female choice, as stated by Darwin and confirmed by recent evolutionary biology. It is also consistent with feminist claims that women, given they have the choice, will select only 20 percent of men, while not wanting the other 80 percent. (see Volume 1 “Culture and Sex,” „Kultur und Geschlecht”)

An exception may have been the most recent few millennia, where human culture and what we now take to be “traditional” monogamous marriage may have resulted in a short period of less imbalance, while the underlying balance nevertheless still favoured women. There have been times of a huge imbalance, for instance, 8,000 years ago, when 17 times as many women procreated as men (see graphs below).

Figure 1: World reproductive population (in 000s) over the millenia

Left: Male population Right: Female population

Four to five times as many women than men reproduced during the 60,000 years covered by the above graphs. The vertical (or Y) axis measures reproductive population in thousands, and the horizontal (or X) axis measures changes over thousands of years. NB. Please note: the vertical scale on the left differs from that on the right. Source: Monika Karmin et al. / Genome Research, Francie Deep, Mar 17, 2015, “8,000 Years Ago, 17 Women Reproduced for Every One Man”

Culture never “discriminated against women;” instead it was necessary for measures to be taken to reduce the degree of inhuman discrimination against men. That there was no oppression of women, but always an oppression of most men, has since been proven by science. Genetics is able to trace these specific facts back for more than 60,000 years, delivering exact proofs, while the feminist view is based on subjective perceptions, partisanship and myths, according to their own sources (see Volume 2 of “The Two Sexes”). Martin van Creveld has researched all the years of human history that can be covered in “The Privileged Sex.” The result was that women were always privileged.

In every culture throughout history women have been privileged and yet it was men who had to carry the burden to provide for the privileged status of women. Men were put into dangerous situations, including fighting for the protection of others and undertaking dangerous jobs or working anti-social hours, consistent with the “male filter” role of males. The life of women was much more protected, whereas men were expected to risk their lives for the benefit of others.

Whilst on the one hand, procreation was an almost certain option for healthy women, on the other hand a majority of men were denied procreation and thereby access, as genetics have proven (see graph below). This meant, a majority of men were effectively living a life of oppression. Therefore, claims of “discrimination against women” are as wholely contrary to the truth as they are wholely subjective. And yet regrettably all ‘feminist waves’ have built on this initial misconception and have actually exacerbated this elemental inequality.

The above figure 1 proves to what extent the burden of selection is mainly carried by men.

Under the pressure of inter-sexual selection (and in competition with other males) men must be successful in the eyes of women, sometimes according to unfathomable and often quickly changing fashions and patterns of female choice. The pace of change is especially rapid among humans: Some sources state the rate of change today is faster than at the time we split off from apes. Yesterday's latest must-have fashions are today seen as a ridiculous and worthless aberations. Whoever is unfortunate to fall behind fashion, will be sifted out, discriminated against, and excluded. Fickle fashion decrees that what enthralled us yesterday, may be rejected and detested today.

With the power[6] to decide whose genes live on and whose will die out firmly in the hands of women, the genetic pressure on men is huge. Men adapt much quicker than women because of this evolutionary pressure; they are the experimental laboratory (sometimes referred to as the "genetic filter") of nature.

"male organisms evolve faster than their female counterparts" – 'Live Science,' Jeanna Bryner, Managing Editor, Nov 19th 2007.

It is undisputed that this faster change in males is linked to the pressure of sexual selection.

"The researchers suggest this … allows males to respond at the drop of a hat to the pressures of sexual selection." – 'Live Science,' Jeanna Bryner, Managing Editor, Nov 19th 2007.

To enable fast adaption to the higher selection pressures men face, the array of variance between men is larger. Men are more likely to be found at the fringes of the statistical distribution. The male mutation rate is higher than the female. Both the very fit and the very unfit, the genius and the idiot, are more likely to be male than female.

"These have finally provided consistent results. Both Feingold (1992b) and Hedges and Novell (1995) have reported that … test score variances of males were generally larger than those of females. Feingold found that males were more variable than females on tests of quantitative reasoning, spatial visualisation, spelling, and general knowledge." – John Archer & Barbara Lloyd, Sex and Gender, p. 187

A higher variance and mutation rate means that we would expect more variety of features. This enables some men to become "pop stars" of female choice discriminating against a majority of men.

While a large variance enhances the chance of some men fitting in to the newer demands by sexual selection, others fail completely. Statistically, women are more likely found in the middle, the average, whereas men are more often found at the fringes.

This also results from the aforementioned biological fact, that men carry the burden of evolution.[7] (see also Annex A, "Sexual Selection") The one-sided sexual selection is unjust and contradicting the idea of equality. Feminism has declared war on all 'facts of life' that it does not like, and has tried (and at times has succeeded) in eradicating them, while protecting all their favoured 'facts of life' as sacrosanct, and further strengthening their perspective. There is neither balance nor justice in such a process.

Female choice steers evolution away from 'adaption to environment' by natural selection. If we assume a situation without sexual selection by either sex, natural selection would enhance adaptation to fitness and environment.

Female choice is the most momentous, the most consequential of all choices. Men are not given this kind of choice by nature. Even in other domains men have never had a comparably momentous or consequential set of choices. Male-specific attributes are therefore needed if men are to avoid being discriminated against, and even more to have a secondary choice of their own among those women who already selected him by their female primary choice.

To avoid discrimination or to have a secondary choice, men need good reputation, and a sufficient degree of power and wealth. Male domains are also required, for the males as well as for the sake of female choice: females need and 'police'[8] the male hierarchy, because it is important for their choice.

(Selection – as we use the term here – doesn't mean there's a relationship or love. It means that she is willing to accept an approach by all the men she selected. Usually it is the male who is supposed to approach the female, but it is the female selection process which actually dictates whether his approach is allowed or not. Our misperception is to believe the active male would make the decision, whereas it has been clearly observed by scientists, that among humans the passive female makes the decision. A groupie might select virtually all the famous male rock stars and is open to accepting virtually all approaches made by these rock stars – see the "boy group" example below.)

These same qualities and structures men need to avoid being rejected by female choice, they also need to avoid the innate bias in perception against males of low rank. The perception bias has the same reason: The lower their rank, the less access to procreation males should have. Low rank males are supposed not to procreate. Were we to perceive them favourably and with sympathy, they could ask for help and love and thus thwart the whole system of evolution. Therefore, evolution created a protection mechanism, a biased perception resulting in biased treatment. Women and children are preferred by perception to protect and support the future of the tribe. To avoid an unfair perception, men need a positive 'edge' in the form of high rank and reputation. Becoming aware of this usually unconscious mechanism also helps in the overcoming of it and achieving a more balanced perception.

Some femininst literature sources put the figure of men who are winners of female choice at 20% (see Volume 1 and also the figure shown above, which both support that number). Only those winners in the "sexual selection stakes / race" have a fair access to the gene pool by their secondary choice. The remaining male population (the majority of males) face access limited on a sliding scale from mediocre to very poor or none at all.

Because there are many more heterosexual women than men matching their high and discriminating demands, there are often large numbers of male losers whose life is constricted and afflicted, but also some winners, which more women want, than there a men that they want.

The losers are shown in figure 1 above, the winners will be discussed below, see the "boy group" example.

Such pressures (deriving from inter-sexual selection and resulting competition for rank) inevitably then become 'social' pressure, resulting in high male suicide rates, as figure 2 below for Canada (by age) illustrates. The increase over the age range from 10 years old to 30 years old is also typical of the US and UK.

Figure 2: Suicide Rates By Age and Sex in Canada 1998

Age-specific suicide rates, by sex, Canada, 1998 Source: Canadian Vital Statistics Database (Health Rep 2002;13(2))
Stewart et al. BMC Women's Health 2004 4(Suppl 1): S19 doi:10.1186/1472-6874-4-S1-S19

". . . From the data available (and shown here in graphs) the 'critical years' begin at 11 and end at 19 years of age. Throughout this period boys are undergoing many internal developmental and hormonal changes to their bodies and are having to adapt to new roles expected of them by society This is particularly true of the 11-14 year old category when boys are passing through various biological stages of adolescence that may radically alter their behaviour or responses from just a few years earlier. There is not one clear single event such as menstruation as for females

The next critical phase, whilst still linked to the changes just mentioned, is at around 15 and 16 years of age and may be related to stress induced by exam pressure.This could be compounded by peer pressure as girls begin to figure more largely in boy's priorities. Exam failure or even fear of exam failure can be the trigger for hasty action by some young people. Getting or keeping a job can have a similar effect. Failure to get a job interview can lead to self-doubt and worth loss of self-esteem. The momentum is still upward when A levels and university hove into view at age 18 and 19."

From the viewpoint of biology, the underlying pressures are 1. female choice (inter-sexual selection), 2. the social pressure of peer group, education and exams, or work, which are all forms of intra-sexual selection within the male dominance hierarchy. The rise in suicides of men during puberty and adulthood is consistent with the view presented in this article.

Figure 3: Suicides of young men (1996) (England & Wales only)

3. Applying the Biological Facts to Society

When we examine the phenomenon of “boy bands” for example, the first and most revealing model is probably ‘The Beatles.’

The members of the band were drawn from a pool of average adolescents, same-aged, pimply boys from the local neighbourhood. The average boy may be inexperienced and clumsy, and without their fame or skills, he will most likely be pre-destined to be discriminated against, mocked or even treated unkindly. There are millions of this kind of average young male. The first Beatles movie “A Hard Day’s Night” shows a scene, where a woman scoffs at a Beatle greeting her, because she didn’t recognize him (as a celebrity, and now a high-ranked male that Beatle-mania bestowed) in the old clothes he was wearing to avoid publicity, (after having been chased by screaming girls shortly before).

At the same time, teenage girls were quite prepared, for example, to overrun police barriers, cordoned off areas, cause traffic jams whenever the “Fab Four” (the Beatles) arrived in their town for a concert, just to be near their idols; their heroes. Concurrently the ‘phenomenon of the groupie’ associated with various rock bands began to emerge at this time. Both are a form of strong sexual selection.[9]

By contrast, the average boy from the neighbourhood was still perceived as clumsy due to his lack of experience, lack of fame, talent or rank, and thus finds himself discriminated against. Because there are many more “girls and boys from the neighbourhood” than there are Beatles, the selected few men (of the band) now have a (social) secondary choice among the women who already selected them.

Many teenage girls might fantasise that her favourite, or otherwise any member in the band she adores, would chose her among all the other screaming girls – and she would often long to sleep with him. So even male pop stars who epitomise the exercise of power and wealth are in fact still selected by female choice. As previously stated, it is a fact of biology that male power and dominance is an exclusively male issue which is sorted out only between men, not between men and women. There is no male dominance over females in biology. Feminists misunderstood such facts of life and interpreted them the wrong way around. Destroying male power does not result in more ‘equality,’ but in sharply increased imbalance instead.[10] The feminist cultural revolution spread across society was based on the misunderstanding of the most basic and important facts of life.

For more details and proofs, see for instance Volume 1[11], “Culture and Sex” – this book also proves the importance of cultural complementing structures between the sexes, a topic probably even more misunderstood and important than the topic of this paper.

Former members of the Beatles have told of women, who were proud of having conceived as the result of a "groupie encounter" with a Beatle, and to have then given birth to a "little Beatle" as her child. (some of them didn't ask for money)

In former times a similar attitude prevailed with sexual liasions with monarchs, for instance, 'August the Strong' of Sachsen is reported to have fathered 100 children. Often, the attraction of young women is directed towards those that exhibit negative celebrity status, those famed for anti-social behaviour; even incarcerated famous male murderers are overwhelmed by female fan post and are favoured by some getting married while behind bars, even when awaiting execution. What does this mean for the human gene pool, and who is responsable for it?

Meanwhile, our typical boy from the neighbourhood has considerable problems. If he tries to talk about being rejected, he faces denigration. The matter will be portrayed as "adolescent problems[12].".

But is is not only boys that face discrimination, and the denigration, should they try to talk about it. Young men and mature men face the same barriers. So both problems have nothing to do with "adolescence." Both problems know no age barrier, since men of all ages encounter discrimination by sexual selection and tendencious perception, which extends to social life in general, even to areas of life not linked to the evolutionary origin of this prejudice. One among several reasons is, that women and children are permitted to complain, whereas men may not. Once again, the evolutionary sense of this taboo is to stop low-ranked males (as the clumsy adolescent still is) from getting "undue access" by complaining and begging for what sexual selection by rank denies him.[13] Yet the resulting prejudice in perception and access extends to social life in general.

Female choice harms not only the majority of males (by excluding and thereby unnecessarily turning them into losers), but also creates a secondary choice of the small group of male winners, resulting in a secondary competition among women. Even though this results in giving a social secondary choice to a few male winners (at the expense of a majority of losers), the biological power of primary choice is female and contributes to making the female sex dominant.

Even though it may at first glance appear paradoxical to the reader, strong female choice creates stiff competition between women for the few males which the females select. It results in women doing a lot to feel attractive and to outshine their female competitors.

Often, people do not even realise the biological machinery at work. Women frequently state, they would face difficulties finding a good man themselves, and that they would find it hard to get the man they wanted ('Mr. Right'). Our perception obscures the biological facts. Women's competition for men only results from having previously discriminated against a large majority of men. Unthinkingly, we completely misunderstand the situation if we don't keep the biological facts in mind: Primary choice is female only and givcn by biology. Men don't have a primary choice given by biology and face heavy competition in male hierarchies to attain the required rank caused by the pressure of female choice.[14] However, if women discriminate too much, a few male winners will have a social secondary choice, and women face a secondary competition within their own ranks.

A scientific study links this secondary competition to the spread of female discontent with their own body, and eating disorders. (see Volume 1) Because many women are competing for a few selected men, they try to outdo each other by having a more 'perfect body' than other women and tend to be dissatisfied with their own body (the so-called 'body image' dilemma). Trying to be slim which is currently in fashion circles, they are more prone to eating disorders and psychological ill health problems. In traditional cultures such discontent and psychological disorders are rare, because those traditional cultures reduce the pressure of female choice on both sexes. Marriage and relationships are not left to only inter-sexual selection in such cultures, thereby reducing its pressures.

Hence female power of choice by inter-sexual selection harms most men; (and in the process) also the selecting women themselves, the society and the gene pool, in which genes and characteristics of murderers and anti-social thugs are spread, because their carriers are preferred by some women.

Female choice is the core of all sexual discrimination; it is 750 millions of years old – in fact, it is as old as the existence of both sexes. Sexual discrimination has always been done by women, for biological reasons (even if we are not aware of it).

What "feminist waves" subjectively assumed, inspired by feelings[15], was absurd nonsense contradicting the biological "facts of life." Woman do discriminate, since they are females and are forever searching for their Prince; whereas men are much less "picky" for biological reasons. Men can get excluded from access – (from family, sexual fulfilment, and even socially in many ways by their rank) – and have to work or struggle for that access, but not women. (As a proverb tells: "Men marry down, but women marry up.") —- to be continued next week —-

Source, Thanks And Further Readings

Robert Whiston has given some help in translating this article to English.

The above is an excerpt from my upcoming book which currently has the working title "Censored," Volume 4 of "The Two Sexes." („Zensiert", Band 4 der Reihe „Die beiden Geschlechter") The important facts and fundamental premise are laid out in Volume 1, "Culture and Sex. Feminism: Big Mistake – Severe Consequences" („Kultur und Geschlecht", Band 1 der Reihe „Die beiden Geschlechter") and Volume 2, entitled "Refutation of Feminist Ideolgy: The War On Men, Nature and Culture" of a series headed "The Two Sexes." („Ideologiekritik am Feminismus: Krieg gegen Mann, Natur und Kultur", Band 2 der Reihe „Die beiden Geschlechter")

A more detailed view on the impact of current feminism on cultures is given in Volume 3, „Die Genderung der Welt: Wie Feminismus weltweit Kulturen zerstört". ("Gender-Mainstreaming the World: How Feminism Destroys the Cultures of the World")

Apart from the topic of selection which this article dealt with, there are other important topics to be dealt with, where feminism has created lots of damage to human life, culture and society. Traditional culture, a common trait of all hominides, is based on the sexes complementing each other, a differentiation of labour, and an exchange of work, work results and responsibilities. Exchange itself (i.e. interaction) may be more important than what is exchanged. More than just of practical benefit, this mutual care is also symbolic and important for the development of feelings, responsibility and bonds in general, and it is the basis for cultural structures which are as important as (and comparable to) language. This is proven and explained in Volume 1 of "The Two Sexes."

Annex A

Evolution is a biological process driven by selection. Research into evolutionary biology demonstrates the male sex serves as a filter for "deleterious genes". In contrast, almost all the females of a specie procreate under normal conditions, or could procreate wihen they want to. The exceptions are fatal diseases or infertility caused by genes. Males on the other hand are 'filtered' in many ways. The child born by a mother is always hers. Fatherhood is not certain.

Males are put into (find themsleves in) a single sex hierarchy of dominance which serves as basis for female choice. Males are required to obtain a high rank to gain access to females for procreation. This holds as true for humans as it does for those other animals closely related to our specie. Males who do not have superior, ie bad genes, are likely to fail in competition with other males and be excluded from procreation.

Males have to toil and to seek to achieve success. Whereas a culture, or even a sub-culture may create a large variety of different scales of dominance, the rigid system of male hierarchical dominance is always present. Females are not subjected to such a hierarchy (NB. Dominance is strictly only between men. The feminist concept of male dominance over women is a fallacy, and by biology is proven to be a false premise. Neither for animals, nor for humans, does a dominance of men over women exist. It's a false perception contradicting facts of biology.)

Competition between men is called “intra-sexual selection”. Men alone carry this additional burden of intra-sexual selection before competing for females. Women do not have such a hierarchy, nor are they ever part of the male. Biological mechanisms punish men competeting with women by destroying their status and reputation.

If, as is done today, men are mixed with women in the workplace then work tends to cease to be a means of determining male status and dominance. Thwarted this innate competition strictly limited between men will seek out different areas to express itself. The consequence is that not success at work, but success at some lesser important activity will determine who can procreate or not. This will results in poorer selection standards because ‘selection of the fittest’ has been debased and instead society conforms to some random fashion. It also discourages boys and men to learn and study.

Men are exposed to dangerous situations and may die in the process. That is “natural selection” in action. Women are not meant to be put into such situations. As they are never part of the male hierarchy of dominance, they don’t compete for male status. They’re not requested do dangerous work or fight in wars. Clearly, therefore, men carry more of the burden of natural selection than do women.

The third selection of the evolution process is called “inter-sexual selection”. It is the domain of female choice and female dominance already mentioned. However, once again, the burden is actually carried by men. We will see that an overly restrictive female selection can ironically create a secondary competition between women for the few selected males, and a secondary choice of few selected males at the cost of the majority. This overacting doesn’t contradict our statement; instead, it supports the argument.

References

1«Sexual Selection and the Evolution of Human Sex Differences

Chapter 7 Developmental Sex Differences

Is sexual selection related to differences in the physical, social, and psychological development of boys and girls? The goal of this chapter is to address this question by examining the pattern of sex differences across a variety of domains and by relating these sex differences to adult sex differences in the nature of intrasexual competition, parental investment, and so on. Developmental sex differences in the pattern of physical development, infancy, play patterns, social development, and parenting influences are described in the respective sections below. The pattern that emerges across these sections is consistent with the view that many developmental sex differences are indeed related to sexual selection and involve a largely self-directed preparation for engaging in the reproductive activities described in Chapter 4 and Chapter 5.» (Male, Female; The Evolution of Human Sex Differences by David C. Geary)

2 Jan Deichmohle, “Kultur und Geschlecht”, Band 1 der Reihe „Die beiden Geschlechter” English: “Culture and Sex,” series “The Two Sexes”

3 Theoretical models, such as a Fisherian runaway process, suggest that evolution of preference and preferred phenotypes may drive each other in ever increasing speed. Though there are different models debated, this is a possible scenario. Even without a runaway process, there is a risk, for instance when the environment changes and the prefered phenotypes (antlers) become an obstacle. Sexual selection is the most likely explanation of the extinction of several species.

4 Would we perceive low-ranked males with more empathy, they could get more access to procreation than they are supposed to get (in the view of evolution). Those who are not supposed to get access to procreation matter less for the tribe, even socially, and face social discrimination as well, by men and women. Even their death has less importance to the tribe, as their genes won’t live on anyway. This may be the basis for injustice, if we don’t realize and thereby overcome the bias. Those low ranked males do the work and take risks without getting reward.

5 see Figure 1: World reproductive population

6 We may not be aware of it. Matters of rank and selection often happen unconsciously.

7 Apart from the pressure of sexual selection, genetical reasons add to the burden. Men have one X and one Y chromosome, exposing any defect in it, whereas in females, the second X chromosome may cover the effect of a defect. Furthermore:

“In many plant and animal taxa mutation rates are higher in males than in females.” (Evolutionary Ecology (2006) 20: 159–172,
Springer 2006, CHRISTIAN SOM1,2 and HEINZ-ULRICH REYER, Research article.

8 As Steve Moxon noted, a majority of males having a lower rank has rather an interest of overthrowing the male hierarchy, because it is of disadvantage for them. Or else, if they can’t overthrow it to reach the top area themselves, they try to cheat and act as higher-ranked than they really are. Both high-ranked males and females co-operate in keeping the hierarchy order stable. According to Moxon, females have even more of an interest in policing the male hierarchy orders than males, because they depend on it for sexual selection.

9 Groupie (or gruppie) – a young woman who regularly follows a pop group or other celebrity, especially in the hope of having a sexual relationship with them. Some have followed many a or any famous group. In contrast, a fan just likes the music.

10 We established a biological dominance by the female. The dominance is based on at least the following: Sexual selection, giving birth to children, inborn bias of perception favouring women (potential mothers), and another innate bias discriminating men (who should not easily procreate). Given the biological dominance of women, men need male powers to reach equilibrance. Natural behaviour and traditional culture provided some balance, though women were always privileged. These social male powers are much more fragile than inborn female dominance. That’s why men have to work hard to achieve it, and revolutions, or feminism, could overthrow them. That many assumed male dominance in the past is a misconception. Male power is a staging, a show, and a necessary one. In spite of all praise of “male power” you may find in past eras, this was just a surface needed to counterbalance female dominance. It was not real dominance, excluded by biology. Rather, it is a show, and this show is needed for balance.

11 „Kultur und Gechlecht” (“Culture and Sex”), Volume 1 of „Die beiden Geschlechter” (“The Two Sexes”)

12 Derogatory remarks and the general denigration of such problems have been documented in my other book series „Die Wahlmacht der Frau” (“The Power of Female Choice”). Not only the men get denigrated, even the problems themselves, because society doesn’t want to become aware of the problems and excludes them from consciousness.

13 There are two opposed remedies for this situation: The one is to easen access to lift the pressure. The traditional is safer, more solid and effective: Both sexes, boys and girls alike, are requested to grow up responsibly within their sex groups, which have a structural bond by complementing and exchange (a kind of barter on a symbolic level). There are cultural mutual responsibilities, „structures of complementing”. Such structures create bonds. They are binding forces opposing exclusion, which can result from selection. (see „Kultur und Geschlecht” for a discussion.)

14 Feminist complaints about male competition got cause and consequence the wrong way around, too. It is women who need to change and discriminate men less, if they want less competition of men.

15 By basing their view on feelings and subjectivity, feminists were hit by the evolutionary “bias of perception” trap.

PART 2

Dr. Aaron Witz placed on genital mutilation directory

Gary Costanza · 24 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

From his website: “Dr. Aaron M. Witz is a board-certified pediatrician. He received his medical degree from the University of Washington and completed his residency at the Mayo Clinic. Dr. Witz has been skillfully trained by pediatric urologists and surgeons proficient in this specialized procedure.”

“Dr. Witz has previously worked as a pediatrician in the emergency room at Seattle Children’s Hospital. He also spent 10 years as a pediatric hospitalist at Swedish Medical Center in Seattle, Washington, taking care of babies and children in the emergency room, intensive care unit, and pediatric inpatient ward. Special projects included improving pediatric pain assessment and management.”

A search of Dr. Witz’s website revealed no information about risks or negative side effects of the neonatal cutting he provides.

Since Dr. Witz provides no visible information about the risks to your child, you can read that here at childmutilators.com.

His practice information follows:

2835 82nd Avenue SE, Suite 200
Mercer Island, WA 98040
(206) 232-0963

If you are an expectant parent, and are considering neonatal cutting on your son, please visit neonatal cutting.org before making that choice final.

Rose Medical Center in Denver discriminates against girls

Gary Costanza · 25 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

From their website:

> Well known as a Denver institution and a 9th Avenue landmark for more than 60 years, Rose Medical Center has earned a reputation as Denver's "Baby Hospital" while becoming a leader in comprehensive women's services, internal medicine, endoscopy, heart and vascular care, orthopedics and total joint replacement, bariatric surgery, sports medicine and aesthetic surgery.
>
> With origins in Jewish teachings, traditions and community, Rose's founders built the hospital to "serve the need of every creed."
>
> By offering a high level of expertise and service across all disciplines, Rose has truly become a destination hospital, attracting patients from throughout Colorado and around the world.

Also, for a facility that only mutilates male children, they have an interesting discrimination policy:

Nondiscrimination Policy

> As a recipient of Federal financial assistance, Rose Medical Center does not exclude, deny benefits to, or otherwise discriminate against any person on the basis of race, color, religion, sex. national origin, disability, or age in admission to, access to, treatment in, participation in, or receipt of the services and benefits under any of its programs and activities, or in the employment therein, whether carried out by Rose Medical Center directly or through a contractor or any other entity with which Rose Medical Center arranges to carry out its programs and activities.

A search of the site found no evidence that Rose Medical Center informs parents of the many risks and side effects that come with neonatal cutting. For actual research see this page.

Rose Medical Center
4567 E. 9th Ave.
Denver, CO 80220

Telephone: (303) 320-2121

If you are a parent considering neonatal cutting on your son, please think before you cut. Visit neonatalcutting.org for the facts.

AVfM Reference Wiki

Robert Brockway · 25 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Wife of Bath, criminal justice

Douglas Galbi · 25 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

In the Wife of Bath's Prologue within Geoffrey Chaucer's fourteenth-century Canterbury Tales, Alisoun accused her husband Jankyn of murdering her. Actual murder victims never make such accusations. Alisoun concocted her accusation of murder to strike back at Jankyn and make him subordinate to her. In the subsequent Wife of Bath's Tale, women court leaders suspended punishing a man for rape in order to promote men's subordination to women. The Wife of Bath's Prologue and Tale present criminal justice as a pretext for promoting men's subordination to women.

Alisoun initiated domestic violence against her husband Jankyn. Living within gynocentric society, Jankyn found a measure of humor and enjoyment in reading literature of men's sexed protest, including the venerable classics Theophrastus's Golden Book on Marriage and Valerius's letter to his friend Rufinus. Alisoun responded violently to Jankyn's peaceful reading:

> And when I saw he would never cease
> Reading on this cursed book all night,
> All suddenly have I plucked three leaves
> Out of his book, right as he read, and also
> I with my fist so hit him on the cheek
> That in our fire he fell down backwards. [1]

Jankyn got back up and hit her back. She fell down and then claimed that he, a battered spouse, murdered her. When Jankyn came to kiss her and apologize, she struck him again. In medieval Europe, men were punished as perpetrators of domestic violence and as victims of domestic violence. Peace came to their household not through criminal justice, but by the husband making himself subordinate to his wife. Alisoun explained:

> We made an agreement between our two selves.

> He gave me all the control in my hand,
> To have the governance of house and land,
> And of his tongue, and of his hand also;
> And made him burn his book immediately right then.
> And when I had gotten unto me,
> By mastery, all the sovereignty,
> And that he said, 'My own true wife,
> Do as you please the rest of all thy life;
> Guard thy honor, and guard also my reputation' —
> After that day we never had an argument. [2]

Alisoun's sovereignty over Jankyn encompassed what he said, what he did, and even what he read. Political structures of oppression seldom reach that extent of personal domination.

In the Wife of Bath's Tale, public and personal support for women's domination of men allowed a knight to escape punishment under law for rape. While out hunting, the knight saw a maiden walking. While most men, like most male primates, don't rape, this knight raped that maiden. Rape of women has been considered a serious crime throughout recorded history. The Wife of Bath reported that the knight was condemned to death for raping the maiden. However, the queen and other courtly ladies intervened. They were delegated authority to decide whether the knight would be executed.

The queen declared that the knight's punishment would be remitted if he declared satisfactorily what women most desire. The queen gave the knight up to twelve months to declare publicly what women most desire. The knight desperately searched for the saving answer. What women want has always been a vigorous topic of public discussion in gynocentric society. The knight heard many different answers. He despaired of finding the saving one. Finally, an ugly woman offered to solve the riddle for the knight if he would do whatever she requested of him. The knight agreed. The ugly woman whispered the answer to him.

The knight successfully declared publicly what women want. The queen's ad hoc court of justice publicly assembled:

> Very many a noble wife, and many a maid,
> And many a widow, because they are wise,
> The queen herself sitting as a justice,
> Are assembled, to hear his answer;
> And afterward this knight was commanded to appear.
> Silence was commanded to every person,
> And that the knight should tell in open court
> What thing that worldly women love best.

Before that court, the knight courageously declared to the queen:

> "My liege lady, without exception," he said,
> "Women desire to have sovereignty
> As well over her husband as her love,
> And to be in mastery above him.
> This is your greatest desire, though you kill me.
> Do as you please; I am here subject to your will."

The women sitting in judgment of him universally acclaimed the knight's answer. In response to his public recognition of women's interest in dominating men, the women exercised their dominance by freeing him from the death penalty for raping a woman.

The knight, however, was still beholden to the women who had provided the answer that saved him. She, the "loathly lady," was low-born, ugly, old, and poor. She ordered the knight to marry her. The knight was horrified at that request. But he had given his word. Empathy and generosity can save women from oppressive terms of ill-considered agreements. Men are much less likely to benefit from such favor. The knight was forced to wed and sleep with the loathly lady. In short, under today's understanding, he was raped.

Men's lack of good life choices is sustained through men's subordination to women and romantic fantasies. In despair at not having fulfilling alternatives for living his life, the knight repressed his desires, nullified his independent thinking, and surrendered his rational agency to his wife, the loathly lady:

> "My lady and my love, and wife so dear,
> I put me in your wise governance;
> Choose yourself which may be most pleasure
> And most honor to you and me also.

The loathly lady carefully confirmed her husband's total subordination to her:

> "Then have I gotten mastery of you," she said,
> "Since I may choose and govern as I please?"
> "Yes, certainly, wife," he said, "I consider it best."

Then, in the fairy tale of all fairy tales, the wife turned into a beautiful young woman. Men today internalize this fairy tale with the common saying, "happy wife, happy life."[3]

The injustices of criminal justice are in part a problem of imagination. Few today can even imagine asking the question, "what do men most desire?" A satisfactory answer is not that men are dogs. Most men don't desire sovereignty or mastery over others, be those others women or men. Most men surely desire not to be treated as criminally suspect persons, and to receive due process and equal justice under law. A good beginning to answering the question "what do men most desire?" is to face the highly disproportionate number of men prisoners and ask why they are imprisoned.

Notes:

[1] Geoffrey Chaucer, The Wife of Bath's Prologue and Tale, ll. 788-93, modernized English from Benson (2008). Subsequent quotes, unless otherwise noted, are from id., ll. 812-22, 1026-30, 1037-42, 1230-33, 1236-38.

[2] Mann (2002), p. ix, expresses concern that since 1992, "this reluctance to credit Chaucer with a 'real sympathy' with women has persisted and intensified." Mann earnestly pondered whether Chaucer wrote "without incurring the charge of antifeminism." Id. p. 25. For scholars today, the charge of antifeminism is as serious as the charge of murder, at least if the victim is a woman. Chaucer probably wrote for noble ladies. See note [14] and related text in my post on the Griseldas of Boccaccio, Petrarch, and Chaucer.

[3] McTaggert (2012) p. 61, n. 3, observes:

> Suffice it to say that Chaucer scholarship remains undecided about whether the Wife's text makes a case for feminism or not.

Such Chaucer scholarship should simply declare its worthlessness and shift to the more important task of appreciating Boccaccio's Corbaccio.

[image] Wife of Bath illumination from the Ellesmere Chaucer, f. 72r (probably first or second decade of the fifteenth century). MS EL 26 C 9 in Huntington Library, San Marino, California.

References:

Benson, Larry, trans. 2008. Geoffrey Chaucer. The Wife of Bath's Prologue and Tale. The Geoffrey Chaucer Page, Harvard University.

Mann, Jill. 2002. Feminizing Chaucer. Woodbridge, Suffolk, UK: D.S. Brewer.

McTaggart, Anne. 2012. "What Women Want?: Mimesis and Gender in Chaucer's Wife of Bath's Prologue and Tale." Contagion: Journal of Violence, Mimesis, and Culture. 19 (1): 41-67.

Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License.

5 practical ways to deal with Feminists

AVfM Video Source · 25 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

After putting up a guide on how to deal with Social Justice Warriors, Lucian Vâlsan now details time-tested strategies on how to deal with the actual Feminist ideologues behind the SJWs.

Definitely worth a watch for the amount of good ol' FTSU present in this guide.

You can subscribe to Lucian's Freedom Alternative, here.

International Men's Day – anti-MGM protest in Parliament Square, London

Mike Buchanan · 26 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

[Video here.]

On International Men's Day we supported the fine people of the anti-MGM organization Men Do Complain (MDC) in protesting against MGM in Parliament Square, London. Just a few yards away, Philip Davies MP was engaged in the first ever debate on men's issues in parliament, specifically in Westminster Hall – a less prestigious venue for a debate than the chamber of the House of Commons, which for many years has been used for debates on International Women's Day.

Davies's 43-minute-long introduction to the debate is here. Predictably, he was the target of feminist MPs seeking to control the direction of his talk, and to waste valuable time with trivia e.g. making a pedantic point about the term 'committing suicide', whilst demonstrating no concern for male suicide victims. A link to the full debate is the penultinate link in that video description.

Our thanks to MDC's Richard Duncker for the filming and editing, and to his colleague Patrick Smyth, who is interviewed here. Our thanks to supporters of MDC and J4MB – many of whom had travelled a considerable distance, some at substantial personal cost – for spending four hours on a cold wet afternoon engaging constructively with large numbers of people (including Jews and Muslims) and handing out many hundreds of leaflets. By any standard the protest was a resounding success, and we look forward to future protests being ever bigger and better.

Inner-Directed Men, Other-Directed Women

Doug Mortimer · 26 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Trying to publish a book about contemporary society is a risky proposition, as conditions change so quickly that the book may be obsolete before it is published. Nevertheless, every now and then a book comes along that not only provides a snapshot of a society at a certain point in time but also illuminates the past and points the way to the future. Such a book was The Lonely Crowd; a Study of the Changing American Character, by David Riesman (with Nathan Glazer and Reuel Denney). The book came out in 1950 but remains relevant today, and though it does not deal with the gender war, if offers many insights into the rise of feminism.

In essence, the thesis of Riesman's book was simple. He divided societies into three types:

1) The Traditional Society has not been the norm in western society (aside from ethnic enclaves such as Hasidic Jews and the Amish), arguably, since the Renaissance, though it has been the norm throughout most of recorded history. Now it exists mainly in the Third World, where birth and death rates are high. In essence, people in such a society follow the rules that have always existed in their society. No social engineering needed. Our society ain't broke, so why fix it? If it was good enough for our ancestors, it's good enough for us. Falling away from traditions invites shunning and shaming by one's peers. Obviously, even in a Traditional Society, things do change over time, albeit slowly and perhaps imperceptibly to those who belong to it.

2) The ethos of the Inner-Directed Society coalesced during the industrial revolution, a time of rapidly growing populations. According to Riesman, this inner-directedness "is implanted early in life by the elders and directed toward centralized but nonetheless inescapably destined goals." (Think Protestant Work Ethic.) Riesman compares the inner-directed man to a gyroscope that, once set in motion, remains in motion. Such a man is productive, goal-oriented, and capable of going it alone when necessary. The inner-directed man doesn't really care about what his peers think, so he cannot be shamed (thought he might be disappointed in himself if he fails to live up to his own expectations). He may act "conservative," but he is not dependent on traditions. Indeed, his mission in life may be to bring about change on a Promethean scale. A number of inventors (e.g., Nikola Tesla, Alexander Graham Bell, Thomas Edison, the Wright Brothers) were inner-directed types. So were the captains of industry (e.g., Andrew Carnegie, Henry Ford, Harvey Firestone) and the railroad builders (e.g., Charles Crocker, Henry Flagler, Jay Gould, Edward Harriman, Mark Hopkins, Collis Huntington, Leland Stanford).

3) In contrast with the inner-directed man, the other-directed man is far more interested in the opinions of his peers, than the values of his elders. He may not have a gyroscope, but he has "radar" that picks up on what other people are thinking, feeling, and doing. He not only picks up signals from other people, he seeks approval from them; his lifestyle is more important than his work; what he does is not as important as what he consumes. All but predicting the rise of social media, Riesman observed that other-directed people are "capable of a rapid if sometimes superficial intimacy with and response to everyone." The other-directed man may be more flexible than the traditional or inner-directed man, but he also suffers more from anxiety because the sands are always shifting and he's never sure of his footing. For that reason, the members of an other-directed society are much easier to manipulate than those of the traditional or inner-directed societies. The Other-Directed Society is marked by material abundance and population decline.

Well, as you might have surmised from the title of this article, MGTOW men would be most at home in an inner-directed society, while the contemporary other-directed society is almost custom-designed to accommodate the nature of women.

It's not an all-or-nothing proposition, however. Even in the most other-directed societies there are pockets of inner-directed types, largely male, who just didn't get the memo. On the other hand, female other-directedness is always present, even as an undercurrent in the traditional or inner-directed society.

Over the last 150 years, technology has opened the gates wide to accommodate the female herd instinct. The telephone literally gave voice to women (hence the old joke about the three dominant forms of communication: telegraph, telephone and tell a woman). Email, texting, and social media amplified that voice.

Before Alexander Graham Bell, communications were face-to-face, which greatly limited female influence. Aside from newspapers and public speaking (both the province of the privileged few), there were relatively few ways to influence people. Think how long it used to take to spread gossip over backyard fences as opposed to merely sending out a single message on Twitter today.

Imagine how frustrated women must have been by the difficulty of simply keeping in touch. While many legends have sprung up about the toughness of pioneer women, it is often overlooked that many of them cracked up from the isolation of frontier living. (A recent Tommy Lee Jones movie, The Homesman, is a rare western dealing with this topic.)

Those hardscrabble days are long gone, however. Perhaps the development of other-directedness was an inevitable outgrowth of the technological progress spawned by inner-directed inventors. One could make the case that other-directedness took root in the 1920s with increased affluence and the rise of advertising. By the 1930s, affluence was just a pleasant memory, and during World War II, consumer goods were rationed, but postwar affluence gave the other-directed society a high-dose booster shot.

The dark side of other-directedness is envy. People look around and perceive that others have something they don't…a TV with a bigger screen, a nicer house, a better car. They see people no better than they are (at least so they think) supposedly doing better than they are. Hence a sense of entitlement; hence, among other phenomena, feminism. The notion that men might have something women don't is anathema in an other-directed society.

Riesman did not predict the rise of feminism, but it should be obvious that the other-directed society he described in 1950 prepared the seedbed for the second and third waves of feminism. As inner-directedness trends towards other-directedness, the emphasis shifts from production to consumption. As focus shifted from production to consumption, the power shifted to women. Today consumer spending is clearly the province of women, give or take 70% of the total, depending on your source. So, aside from higher levels of debt, what hath female other-directedness wrought?

Other-directedness is in synch with the female herd. There are no ultimate rights and wrongs, only what the collective deems in or out of fashion. Morals, manners, and customs are not derived from authority or from some internal moral compass, but are like a weathervane, always subject to the winds of social change. In other words, an other-directed society is an amoral society. Consensus and teamwork (come to think of it, you could probably make a pretty good case that the popularity of team sports is an inevitable development in an other-directed society) is more important than your inner voice or the chorus of tradition. Responding to persuasion is the preferred means of compliance, but if you don't respond to persuasion…"step out of line, the men come and take you away," as surely as they would in any society (and as Buffalo Springfield sang in "For What It's Worth," released in 1967).

The other-directed society grew along with social sciences and the rise of public opinion polls which have become more sophisticated over time. Such polls are often touted as scientific, but one might have reservations about that claim. Numbers, of course, are every bit as malleable as words, and in an other-directed society, they can be employed to persuade people to go in any number of directions.

Supposedly, public opinion polls were developed to assist politicians and corporations in determining what the public wants. Now the individual is likely to consult such polls to determine whether his opinions place him in the mainstream, a tributary, or a backwater. Falling too far away from the mainstream indicates maladjustment, a serious psychological flaw in an other-directed society. Contemporary parents often lament peer pressure on their children but worry even more if their children aren't well-adjusted.

In 2015, a MGTOW man could certainly be perceived as being maladjusted. He fits the jocular definition of a right-wing extremist: someone who has the same values his parents had. He won't change…he won't "grow." By standing in the same place, however, he goes against the flow, offering pushback, albeit minuscule, against otherdirectedness. Like a pebble in a stream, he is of little consequence, but a critical mass of pebbles – even if they are not acting in concert – can divert the stream. And if the number of pebbles gets large enough, something like a dam can result.

Now I'm not going out on a limb and predict that MGTOW spells doom for the other-directed society, though it is obviously a burr under the saddle of the establishment. A trend towards inner-directedness would place MGTOW men in the curious position of being both retro and advance guard. I don't think that's likely, though I do believe other-directedness is in its end stage. I suspect that our age of abundance, which fuels other-directedness, will collapse due to increasing levels of debt, decreasing birth rates, or both.

So what comes next? If MGTOW doesn't lead us back to inner-directedness, how about a postmodern Mad Max meltdown and the reign of neo-warlords? Either route would lead away from feminism.

However it goes down in the future, social scientists will be scrutinizing the zeitgiest for clues. Even as I write, there may be a budding David Riesman out there, agog with anticipation about the next big thing, sociologically speaking, and poised at his keyboard to provide explication and perspective.

I may not live to see it (I was born the year Riesman's book came out), but I can't help but be curious about what happens next.

Photo by Grumpy Old Man

Dad, have you ever loved me?

AVfM Video Source · 26 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Spoken in Thai language with English subtitles, this video shows what our sons and daughters are too often taught to forget by misandric society – the love and sacrifices of fathers.

The Fiamengo File Episode 10

Steve Brulé · 27 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Prof. Fiamengo discusses an article by Michael Kimmel and dissects his interpretation of what it means to be a man today. Men are the problem!

Say Goodbye to Crazy now in paperback at Amazon for the holidays

Paul Elam · 27 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Since the release of Say Goodbye to Crazy, there have been regular requests for the book to be available in paperback. Santa Claus has heard those requests and answered just in time for holiday shopping.

This year you can curl up by the fire in your newly quiet and Crazyless home, sip some eggnog and read through the pages with a smile on your face.

Here's what people who've read Say Goodbye to Crazy have to say:

Jared Sanchez writes, "Yes it happens to some awesome guys...This book is written primarily for the new partner of a guy out of an abusive relationship. Ignore those references, and still read this even if you haven't left crazy.. I moved out and this gave me a definitive direction to go…This isn't a magic fix or a total win. But when you've hit bottom there's nowhere to go but up and forward. The concepts are a bit brutal. And you really have to redefine what a win is…Supplement this book with a professional counselor or some sort of support system. The book goes over questions to ask your prospective therapist. Or talk to someone you trust…I would recommend this book and share it with family members and friends. It's a very valuable tool."

Liam Hood writes, "Highly recommended. This book saved my sanity, not to mention my new relationship. Dealing with Crazy in a more strategic way per suggestions in this book are (mostly) working like a charm. We finally said "NO" to Crazy!! Big thank you to the authors."

JB1975 writes, "Helpful, well-written advice from two people that get it. Excellent book from two people that I admire greatly. Dr. T and Paul provide practical, real-world advice for anyone who has a Crazy in their lives and wants to be proactive in getting rid of them and keeping them gone. It is so refreshing and helpful to read both this book and follow their site and know that there are at least two people out there who do not buy into modern day society's narrative that you have to put up with someone's emotional abuse because of _____ (insert Crazy's excuse of the day here). While this book is written for wives dealing with their husband's ex-wives, anyone who has (or has had) someone like this in their lives will benefit from reading it."

Johnny Galt writes, "Life changing for those caught up in the drama. Unless you have had this type of crazy person described in this book in your life you can't really appreciate the magnitude of their abuse. This book gives real clear practical advice dealing with these people. Let's you know what you're up against with these type of people, the bias of the courts, and the bias of the psychology profession and gives a blueprint of how best to make your way through to the other side to sanity. I wish I had this book years ago. People who follow the advice of this book will save themselves years of anguish"

Scharnhorst writes, "It's easy to read and understand…The book can help you break or weaken the connections that keep you attached to "Crazy." The book is well organized, crisp, and sardonic. It's easy to read and understand. The authors convey an intimate level of knowledge of the subject. The "Takeaways" at the end of each chapter are great!"

Pamela Stogner writes, "Excellent and applicable information. Hope is restored after reading this book! I recommend it for anyone who has a Crazy in your life and you want to say goodbye to Crazy!"

Renee writes, "Great advice and tactics for real situations.Great advice and tactics for real situations. I've read many books about personality disorders trying to figure out how to best handle a crazy ex – this is succinct, relevant and you can put the scenarios into action just as soon as you read them."

Tim Hewston writes, "Life saving. This book is not written for me, it is written for my second wife on how to survive my ex-wife, Crazy. However, I am the one reading it, as my second wife, a social worker of over 20 years, is even more hardline than Dr. Tara Palmatier and Paul Elam. After six months of watching me trying to negotiate a peaceful settlement and continue my relationship with my children, she simply told my ex-wife, 'You will never talk with Tim again and never email him. This stops!' Dr. T and Paul Elam's advice is exceptional and everybody who is involved with Crazy, or has ever been involved with Crazy, should listen to it, then follow it…"

Amazon customer writes, "Best investment for yourself and you will not be disappointment. Being the 2nd wife, this was spot on in my situation. It helped me to really understand how to deal with this hard topic. Thank you for giving me clarity in knowing it's not just me and crazy is CRAZY, period. I'm taking a leap off the crazy train knowing its the right and only thing to do. Thank you for giving this topic light. If you are a 2nd wife dealing with these problems—buy the book. Best investment for yourself and you will not be disappointment. I would give it 10 stars if I could!"

Lou writes, "I highly recommend it! Thank you so much for sharing your knowledge and insight, Dr. Tara Palmatier and Paul Elam! My husband and I have had enough of Crazy in our lives. This book portrays the reality and it is the best tool a couple can have in order to find support and valuable information about Crazy. It provides an excellent account of the manipulative tactics Crazy uses in order to get away with her craziness. This is the only book on the topic that really validated my (and my husband's) experience. It gave us straight to the point advice on how to deal with (and ultimately get rid of) a Crazy and evil ex wife. I highly recommend it to anyone who has a Crazy in their lives. Additionally, I recommend it to lawyers and therapists. It's a must read! I can't thank you enough, Dr. Tara and Paul Elam!"

Cheri Laughrey writes, "AMAZING BOOK. One of the best books I have ever read. I recommend this book to anyone that has an imposing ex spouse in their life! AMAZING!!!"

These are just some of the 5-star reviews Say Goodbye to Crazy has received thus far and counting.

Make saying goodbye to Crazy your New Year's resolution and get started working on it now!

Say Goodbye to Crazy now available in paperback on Amazon.com. Buy it HERE.

Female Choice and Feminism – Part 2

Jan Deichmohle · 27 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

In this 2nd part of the series, Jan Deichmohle continues his biosocial perspective to the ongoing nature/nurture conversation.

The first part of the article has proven female dominance given by biology. We discussed the consequences for human life and especially males, some of them drastic. Four to five times as many women as men procreated in the past 60,000 years. A large majority of men were oppressed, whereas women never were. Both males and females suffer if female choice gets too strong.

The roots of female dominance can be traced in three steps:

First, sexual selection is a powerful force of evolution. Genes are selected or discarded mostly through the "male filter." To protect the system of evolution, there's an inborn bias against men, the stronger the bias, the lower their rank. Otherwise, men could complain when losing and thereby gain undue access, thwarting the system of evolution. To protect the evolutionary system of discriminating against many men, this bias, in the form of a wrong perception, has been established.

To protect children and the future generation, an innate preference is given to children and women, who are mothers giving birth in the view of evolution. Both these innate tendencies are mostly unconscious and protected against becoming conscious. Thus it is difficult to make it conscious, yet it is important to do so, to make the bias in perception less effective, or, if possible, ineffective.

Second, all cultures privileged women. Western civilization has added negative stereotypes about men and positive stereotypes about women. Their origins go back to the medieval ages or even further. (Medieval courtly love was already a submission to women in an astonishing degree.) Already at the time of Hobbes (1568 – 1679) stereotypes denigrating men can be found in writings by Hobbes and others. These tendencies became more and more prevalent in western societies.

Third, feminism exaggerated such tendencies in a militant way and added new forms of denigration. It turned such prejudice and false perception into an ideology, a system and world view and into campaigns which did in fact disenfranchise, not enfranchise. They increased privilege instead of reducing it or giving it up.

Both the second and third steps made use of the unconscious bias of human perception.

This second part of the article, will have a look at the historical roots and consequences in daily life.

Already in olden times, matriarchal societies increased the imbalance, to the disadvantage of men and children. The more absent were the fathers, the more detrimental for children.

> Followed consistently across several generations, a matrilocal rule of marriage results in the co-residence of a continuous line of mothers, sisters, and daughters. Husbands become the outsiders; it is they who feel isolated and who must cope with a united front of members of the opposite sex who have been living together all their lives. Where matrilocality prevails, therefore, women tend to take control of the entire domestic sphere of life. Husbands become more like visitors than permanent residents and divorce is frequent

(Marvin Harris, Our Kind: Who We Are, http://www.amazon.com/Our-Kind-Where-Came-Going/dp/0060919906)

Matrilineal family structures and matriarchy have the tendency of down grading men to the point where they are perceived as effectively being little more than a guest in their own home. Feminists and feminist legislation have excluded men and especially fathers in numerous ways, whereas women are and always have been, because of their fertility, placed by nature and by society at the core of family structures and family life regardless of which of the world cultures is examined.

Feminists have wrongly perceived and wrongly interpreted the facts of life with a consistent bias and error in all of their assumptions.(1) Biologically, the female is dominant, and women are privileged. Man is thus disadvantaged by duties, exploited by work and burdens for the sake and benefit of others. These include: burdens and duties including male military draft, duties to provide and earn, restrictions and obligations in behaviour towards women. Men are oppressed by the power of female choice and biased perception of matters concerning the sexes. This biased perception is to some extent an inborn characteristic, as evolutionary psychology has discovered. The higher the pressure of inter-sexual selection, the more men need to compete in male hierarchies.

Today's differences between men and women do not stem from some imaginary "patriarchal" confection of invented oppression which in reality never existed – save in feminist theoretical polemics. Instead, those differences are the result of sexual selection by females during the evolution of humans as well as animals. The same power of selection created the basis for family, the division of labour between the sexes, the universal basis of cultures worldwide, which were in the interest of females throughout all ages. All of these have been wrongly ascribed to men's alleged power when nothing could be further from the truth. (see Volume 1)

Dominance by female choice destroys life's dreams. The literary series "Female Choice"(2) describes a young man dreaming of a world of reliable love for everybody, or "free love" for everyone, a philosophy of love – only to be discriminated, excluded and then ridiculed. His life dream was accordingly crushed. Never would he be able to live as he once dreamt – never could he live as he had desired from his earliest youth. His ship of philosophical love flounders on the submerged reefs of female choice, which rejected him. He has to endure the sniggering, the ridicule, mocking, and laughter, followed only by contempt.

For evolutionary reasons (the Darwinian imperative), there is no pity or sympathizing with male losers; they will attract only blame, be considered as an "uncouth lout" or as an "awful chauvinist." This serves only to underline the additional feminist indoctrination that has percolated into the many levels of our society.

What howls of scorn greet any man who dares to complain about these inhuman facts epitomized by the sole privilege of the female to dominate lives through the power of selection. What toxicity of venom is unleashed in the emotional battering of the male victim of discrimination. When females talk about the discrimination they've experienced everyone has to listen, even if their perception of having been discriminated is based on the inborn bias (distorting their perception) and ideological assumptions, which are objectively wrong. But when males talk about real discrimination experienced, what a torrent of fascist-like invective is released. This is, in part, documented in the book "No!" (effectively censored by it not being published and it being ignored since the 1980s, despite a written publishing contract, which was then cancelled). The book "No!"(3) documents the ingloriously abusive reply of the publisher Blaulicht – a reply attempting to morally destroy the author who dared describe what a victim of discrimination faces. This overt abuse in public is symptomatic of many forms of the fashionable spite exacted on men by the whole of society.(4)

In what is a "intellectually aberration" some men agree with feminists in their proposition of misandry(5); these men combine with feminists to discriminate against men: In our time, Warren Farrell first started out as a director of NOW before he realized his error and their true nature.(6)

> He believed that the first step in social progress was to lift persons of lower social status to equal economic opportunity. Only then would evolution through sexual selection be able to act effectively. It may be taken as certain, therefore, that when women are economically and socially free, numbers of the worst men among all classes who now readily obtain wives will be almost universally rejected… we shall set free a power of selection

- Wallace(7), a close colleague of Darwin, according to: Erika Lorraine Milam, "Looking for a Few Good Males, Female Choice in Evolutionary Biology," p. 21 – 22.

Wallace shows the common contempt for men and glorification of women, which is typical for our civilization.

Men are viewed as possibly “diseased,” “weak,” “idle” or “selfish;” women select and discriminate among them.

> Wallace hoped, some women would choose to remain single rather than settle for a “diseased,” “weak,” “idle,” or “selfish” husband. .. Wallace hoped, female choice, acting through marriage selection, would eventually become an even greater force of evolutionary change

- according to: Erika Lorraine Milam, “Looking for a Few Good Males, Female Choice in Evolutionary Biology,” chapter “Wallace, Divine Intelligence, and the Problem of Choice”

The view and argument is obviously strongly prejudiced and inacceptable. Men are perceived in a denigrating way. The plan is to subject only men to a discriminating selection, not women.

> First-wave feminists easily appropriated such theories of mate choice

(Erika Lorraine Milam, Looking for a Few Good Males, Female Choice in Evolutionary Biology)

First-wave feminists adopted and used the concept of “mate choice.”

Female choice (e.g. based on fashion) often leads to the making of poor (selection) decisions, resulting in the poor school educational attainments of today’s young men, who quickly learn what girls want. In their age, finding acceptance has a high priority.

Often, female choice does not prefer “good” men. Instead, often inconsequential “qualities” based more on transitory fads and fashions are preferred. To the extent that even gangster types, those exhibiting anti-social behaviour and fashionable fops, are considered as “less boring” and therefore more desirable than those men who prefer to study and work.

As a result these young men face a binary choice; they have the choice, it would appear, of either embracing education and learning (and face being ignored and discriminated by girls), or take pathways preferred by many young women.

In the quote below, taken from “Tyrants of Matriarchy” (pub. 2015), some of these winners of female choice are even called “thugs” and “morons.”

> If a guy wants a girl-friend he has to ‘play the game’ and pander to the reflexive female preference for thugs and morons. The alternative is found in the life of James Holmes: he followed the ‘intellectual’ path and experienced only involuntary celibacy for his pains. It doesn’t take much smarts to see that dysfunctional female mate-preference is the primary cause of male educational failure in the Anglosphere.

- Stephen Jarosek, „Tyrants of Matriarchy,” 2015.

Female choice can be dysfunctional and harmful for society.

> I will examine the evolution of sexual selection … This refutes the intuitive notion that selection will necessarily favor mating preferences for male genotypes that are superior under natural selection (e.g., Trivers, 1972; Zahavi, 1975). There are in fact situations where if a mutant that decreases male viability appears, it will rapidly sweep through the population to fixation despite the presence of a stronger mating preference for a more viable alternative male phenotype.

(Mark Kirkpatrick, EVOLUTION, International Journal Of Organic Evolution, Vol. 36, 1982 , p.2)

Such a harmful selection is observable today (see above: Jarosek, 2015). Together with feminist dominated mis-education, it condemns generations of young men to a life of trouble and away from the good path.

Female choice has already been increased by first-wave-feminists, and by further waves since. Instead of being abolished, female choice was radicalized – consider for instance the demand of campus feminists, that at every step of a sexual encounter men should ask for consent and receive it before moving on.(8) A feminist sense of justice – if not moral justice – should have kicked in and revolted against the unjust dominance of the female. Yes, it should have – but it didn't! On the contrary, all feminist waves have further exaggerated female dominance of choice in the pivotal areas of life. As a result, the balance already weighted in favour of women, collapses completely, as documented in Volume 2.

> … women are going, sooner or later, to come to certain definite conclusions; and that from those conclusions will come a woman-made codex of sex morality on which the women of the future will act … and on which they will require men to act.

– "The Revolt of Modern Youth," by Ben Lindsey, 1925.

Volume 2 of "The Two Sexes" documents the consequences of the first feminist waves for the then growing generation of uprooted uprooted youth, which would search substitute ideologies.

> Still another thing is evident. This active and aggressive inquiring attitude of mind on the part of girls has of late years become general rather than exceptional. Also, it is more and more unconcealed. The reason is that social and economic conditions have placed these girls more on a level with men. Many of them, when they leave school, take positions in which they make more money than the boys they go with. The result is that many a youth finds himself subject to rather contemptuous inspection by the young woman of his choice. To many persons this cold sophistication on the part of our girls is shocking.

(Lindsey op.cit., 1925)

Contemporary debates at the time of each successive feminist wave were all based on wrong perceptions. Our intuition assumes there would be male choice, while female (primary) choice is fact of biology. Likewise, paternity of a new-born is assumed, whereas motherhood is certain.(9) Another term for it is the 'female veto.' Feminism assumed 'oppression' of women, whereas in fact women were highly privileged and it was men who were and even more are 'the oppressed.'(10)

Society's perception of matters concerning the sexes is biologically biased, preferring women, who could be mothers, resulting in better treatment and more protection. Men are perceived in a more negative way, and the lower their rank the more negative becomes that perception. This, too, is a fact of evolutionary biology.

For centuries, biased perception has resulted in biased views and skewed debates. Around 1800, misandry was already widespread among academic authors and became the defining spirit of the age. At the end of the 18th century, men from other eras or cultures, even men in their natural state, were already associated with negative stereotypes including tyranny, whereas women were viewed in an idolized way.

> Iselin shows the wild man always from his worst side. He is deceitful, inconstant, gullible, rakish, cowardly, idly, as long he's not conducting a war. He has no feeling for the "beautiful," has a "mind of destruction" and a tendency to booze and to be superstitious. (Iselin 1768, 244, 260, 204) … The woman is perceived as the antithesis of the sensual-tyrannical man, as shining light in the dark domain of instincts. Women have advantages: "It is also true, that among all peoples women become ready to reasonable occupations earlier than men do…. She observes the state and condition of things much easier and more curious then men, and keeps them in kind better, and compares them faster. They are more ready to deduct general concepts from their perception." (Iselin 1768, 259) These ideas are based on conventional psychological assumptions of its time. Iselin referred to authorities like Sulzer, Mendelssohn and Baumgarten.

[Christoph Kucklick, Das unmoralische Geschlecht, p. 44 – 45, “The Immoral Sex”(11)]

European intellectuals of that era agreed on such assumptions – it is not country-dependent. This problem is much older than feminist waves (including 19th century first wave) and its roots can be traced back even more centuries than just to 1800. See Kucklick “The Immoral Sex” („Das unmoralische Geschlecht”), or for instance, Volume 2 of “The Two Sexes” („Die beiden Geschlechter”).

The opposite of feminist claims that women would have been perceived badly and men favoured is true in past ages as well.

> Descriptions of this kind appear around 1800 stereotype in very different contexts. It has been rightly described as “enlightenment consensus,” that the man of natural state and most of the following eras, was tyrannical, enslaving women brutally. (Tomaselli 1985 p. 121) It’s striking that theoretical differences hardly make a difference: whether french sensualism, german history of mankind, scottish empirism, transcendental philosophy or social economics – in this regard the thought of the era converges… In the 19th century this view on history became canonical and was included into lexica.

(12) (Kucklick, “Das unmoralische Geschlecht”, p. 50 – 51)

Innate bias, increased by civilization and strengthened even further by feminist ideology, is clearly influential in the book by Lindsey and is seen as having a large influence on the youth of 1925 which he described in this way:

> They [60 school girls] where not asking what boys should do. It was plain that they would decide all that for the boys so soon as they had decided on the proper courses for themselves.

(Lindsey, op.cit., 1925)

The book describes a situation resulting from the first feminist wave.

> that the girls’ part in such questions is the more dramatic and interesting, it is also a fact, that the boy, relatively, doesn’t count.

(Lindsey, op.cit., 1925)

Those males who aren’t even considered any more by girls and young women, lose most and suffer most.

Female choice is by far the most powerful choice available to humanity. Nevertheless, this does not stop feminists aggressively demanding more and greater choice for exclusively women under the mantra: “Our body, our lives!”

Men do not have such a choice. Sexual access, procreation or abortions are decided by women alone. Men have no vote; they are dependent on female decisions, without having any voice in the process themselves. Men neither have a moral right for love, nor for procreation, nor having the children they father with them, nor a right in any decision about abortion (in cases where they don’t want to be father). Absent fathers are a resulting problem of society often leading to subsequent troubled childhoods and individuals for future generations to grapple with.

Because of these inherently biased perceptions, we are not even aware of how much unnecessary human misery is caused by feminist ideology and its precursors. There is no empathy for the male and especially the male loser, instead, there is denigration and even detestation.

> Among indigenous people, it’s general that women are desired more. This is the basis of sexual competition and selection. A Maori-proverb tells: “As beautiful a man may be, he is not desired; as common a woman may be, the man will desire her.” … By transfering procreation to an institution based on economic capability of man, procreation was made a matter of social calculation and stopped being a form of selective breeding.

(Grete Meisel-Heß, “The Secual Crisis,” 1908, original title: „Die sexuelle Krise”)

First-wave-feminism criticized marriage for not focusing strongly enough on selective breeding with the male! Blatantly increasing the pressure of sexual selection it implicitly demanded on men, it lacked any commensurate pressure on fertile women, so the imbalance was increased. This would render more men becoming ‘unwanted’ and excluded from procreation, from sexual fulfillment and from feeling the warmth of plain love, and effectively disenfranchised them. Feminism opposed marriage for restoring some semblance of equilibrium to female dominance. Exaggerating rather than curtailing the already existing female dominance was, and still is, their true goal.

> The basis of the medieval ideal of knighthood, of courtly love, was the principle of voluntary submission of the stronger sex under the weaker. … That men provide for the females is already common among higher developed animals. … Under any condition, whatever change may occure to the forms of sexual life, this viewpoint must be kept, especially regarding the women’s movement. The ideal of knighthood developed this principles to its highest form… The knighthood of old times turned into the galantery of today. And the modern gentleman is the epigone of the knight of old times. Indeed, he observes the forms and fomulars of the medieval knightly service … though often only, where the society controls it.

(Grete Meisel-Heß, „Die sexuelle Krise”, 1908, English: “The Sexual Crisis”)

She implicitly demands more control by society to force men to give even more privilege and dominance to women than they already had. She wants more privilege and dominance than women already possessed, due to a partly congenital biased perception, aggravated by strong prejudice of our civilization quoted above.

> As told in an essay by Hermann [5], Earl Johann IV. of Habsburg was rejected by his bride, Herzland of Rappoltstein, “after he had held half a year of probation cohabitation with her, because she accused him of being unmanly” – These trials of fitness were historically needed in the development of inheritance laws to ensure succession. Also they seem justified for reasons of racial hygiene and individual reasons.

(op.cit., The Sexual Crisis, 1908)

Once again, selective breeding is propagated by selecting some men and discriminating other men. The motives backing this view are darker than they appear at first sight. They arise out of culture of race, ‘hygiene’ and the Eugenics movement of the early 20th century which latterly gave rise to racism and fascism.

Authors from this era of first-wave-feminism considered it to be self-evident that women were endangered and victims; that men should provide for them and submit to them as the stronger sex. They considered it self-evident, that there should be no breeding selection of women, but that it should be exclusively reserved for the male of the human species. Sexual selection, the domain of female dominance, was not only considered a female right – no equality offered at all in such matters – but it was intentionally increased and aggravated! An improvement of the “race” was sought by selecting only the strongest and most able men, discriminating against all other men, while doing nothing similar to women.

Also, feminist literature wasn’t about creating wealth, rather about redistributing, taking it away from men, who mostly worked to achieve it, so they can be accepted, have a family and share it with woman and family anyway. Redistributions of feminists had a contrary intention.

4 Summary

When the first feminist wave started, there was for decades a massive resistance, not by men as one might suppose, but by the majority of women. Instinctively they realized that something was wrong when pushing at the equilibrium of the sexes and that something important might collapse. Although at the time the biological ‘fallout’ and scientific cross connections were not clearly visible, and their arguments and goals were rather obscure, they nevertheless felt the onset of some kind of catastrophe – which was the underlying reason for their initially stiff resistance.

Once a vociferous, radical minority had eroded the resistance of the majority, no available levers could stop the unremitting process coming to its inexorable conclusion. Subsequent waves of feminism swept across the tinder dry landscape like a wildfire – blazing and razing all before it. Throughout all of society there was no serious unified resistance.

The equilibrium, built up over millennia, was completely overthrown to the point that resistance was no longer viable. The whole of civilization, had been put onto a slippery slope and then pushed with alacrity into the abyss. Whoever tried to resist, was simply run over in the stampede.

NB:
Please note, that no claim has been made, that the arguments, programme or goals of opponents of first wave feminism would have been correct or according today's scientific standards; instead, it is proven, that in their era the equilibrium of society and between the sexes was overthrown and destroyed. Already the first feminist wave damaged society, culture and life, increased the disequilibrium of the sexes, enlarged female dominance, expanded domains of female dominance systematically, destroyed male counterweights and made opposition against later feminist waves almost impossible.

Source, Thanks And Further Readings

Robert Whiston has given some help in translating this article to English.

The above is an excerpt from my upcoming book which currently has the working title "Censored," Volume 4 of "The Two Sexes." ("Zensiert", Band 4 der Reihe "Die beiden Geschlechter") The important facts and fundamental premise are laid out in Volume 1, "Culture and Sex: Feminism's Big Mistakes and its Severe Consequences." ("Kultur und Geschlecht", Band 1 der Reihe "Die beiden Geschlechter") and Volume 2, entitled "Refutation of Feminist Ideolgy: The War Against Men, Nature and Culture" of a series headed "The Two Sexes." ("Ideologiekritik am Feminismus: Krieg gegen Mann, Natur und Kultur", Band 2 der Reihe Die beiden Geschlechter")
A more detailed view on the impact of current feminism on cultures is given in Volume 3, „Die Genderung der Welt: Wie Feminismus weltweit Kulturen zerstört". ("Gender-Mainstreaming the World: How Feminism Destroys the Cultures of the World")

Apart from the topic of selection which this article dealt with, there are other important topics to be dealt with, where feminism has created lots of damage to human life, culture and society. Traditional culture, a common trait of all hominides, is based on the sexes complementing each other, a differentiation of labour, and an exchange of work, work results and responsibilities. Exchange itself (i.e. interaction) may be more important than what is exchanged. More than just of practical benefit, this mutual care is also symbolic and important for the development of feelings, responsibility and bonds in general, and it is the basis for cultural structures which are as important as (and comparable to) language. This is proven and explained in Volume 1 of "The Two Sexes."

References

1. See Volume 1 and 2 of "The Two Sexes" („Die beiden Geschlechter") by Jan Deichmohle, and "The Privileged Sex" by Martin van Creveld.
   To paraphrase American researcher and author Warren Farrell; 'feminists were the only side to turn up for an undeclared war' – no wonder they won the first rounds! So obviously, with no rebuttal prepared, their apparent logic to explain the then situation appeared superior.
2. Jan Deichmohle, Buchserie "Die Wahlmacht der Frauen" (documentary fiction series "Female Choice")
3. Jan Deichmohle, „Nein!", Band 1 der Reihe „Die Wahlmacht der Frau", English: "No!"
4. Similarly Donald Dutton's 1986 Canadian study was delayed more than 10 years because it showed too clearly that women were more aggressive than men in terms of DV; and John Haskey (ONS) paper on single mothers was delayed for political reasons for several months.

5. A dislike of, or contempt for, or an ingrained prejudice against men (i.e. the male sex).
6. The National Organization for Women, founded 1966
7. Wallace, Alfred Russel (1823-1913), English naturalist wrote a famous article, 'On the Tendency of Varieties to Depart Indefinitely From the Original Type' (1858)
8. That's subjecting men to a dictatorial female power of subjectively interpreting any harmless and well-intended move as a crime, even to re-interpret it as a crime in the future, whenever she feels like it. This is the end of justice based on objective facts and thereby the end of justice itself.
9. The Roman jurist, Gaius, observed "Maternity is a fact, paternity is a matter of opinion."
10. The "5 P's". Boys learn they must Perform, Pursue, Protect, Prefer and Pay if they are to earn equality and the respect of a girls' love. "Myth of Male Power : Why Men are the Disposable Sex" by Warren Farrell, p.166 (pub 1993). (http://www.warrenfarrell.org/TheBook/). See also books by George Gilder, Daniel Amneus etc.
11. "Der wilde Mann zeigt sich bei Iselin stets von seiner schlechtesten Seite. Er ist falsch, unbeständig, leichtgläubig, verwegen, feige, träge, zumindest, wenn er nicht gerade Krieg führt. Er ist „unfühlbar" gegen alles Schöne, hat einen „Geist der Zerstörung" und einen Hang zum Trinken und zum Aberglauben. (Iselin 1768, 244, 260, 204) … Sie tritt gleichsam als Gegenpol zum sinnlich-tyrannischen Mann auf, als Lichtgestalt im dunklen Reich der Triebe. Denn Frauen haben „Vorzüge":
„Indessen ist es auch richtig, daß bey allen Völkern die Weibspersonen eher zu vernünftigen Beschäftigungen reif werden, als die Männer… Sie beobachtet so gar die Beschaffenheiten und die Verhältnisse der Dinge viel leichter und viel begieriger; ihr Gedächtniß behält dieselben viel besser auf; sie vergleichen dieselben viel geschwinder, und sie ziehen mit einer weit größeren Fertigkeit allgemeine Begriffe aus ihren Wahrnehmungen." (Iselin 1768, 259)
Hinter dieser Vorstellung steckten konventionelle psychologische Annahmen der Zeit. Iselin berief sich explizit auf Autoritäten wie Sulzer, Mendelssohn und Baumgarten." (Christoph Kucklick, Das unmoralische Geschlecht, S. 44 – 45)
12. "Schilderungen wie diese traten um 1800 stereotyp in den unterschiedlichsten Kontexten auf. Daß der tyrannische Mann die Frau im Naturzustand und in den meisten folgenden Epochen der Geschichte brutal versklavt – diese Auffassung ist mit Recht als „Enlightenment consensus" bezeichnet worden. (Tomaselli 1985 S. 121) Es fällt dabei auf, daß theoretische Ausgangsdifferenzen kaum einen Unterschied machen [denglisch, richtiger: ergeben]: ob französischer Sensualismus, deutsche Menschheitsgeschichte, schottischer Empirismus, Transzendentalphilosophie oder Sozialökonomie – in diesem Punkt konvergierte das Denken der Zeit… Im 19. Jahrhundert erhielt diese Sicht auf die Geschichte Eingang in Lexika und wurde kanonisch." (Kucklick, S. 50 – 51)

White Ribbon Australia presumes guilty before proven innocent

Lee Turner · 28 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

In what seems like yet another scandal linked to Australian football, a retired Bulldogs player and White Ribbon Australia ambassador, Hazem El Masri has been charged for the alleged assault of his young wife Douah El-Cherif on October 19, 2015. The charge followed an altercation between the two at El Masri's Bankstown home in Sydney, NSW, where El-Sharif has been living on what has been reported to be a temporary basis. So far, this story sounds familiar, except that there is a statement made by El Masri's former wife Arwa Abousamra that has been widely reported on in the media, defending his conduct and questioning the validity of the allegations. Not all is as it seems which made this writer look into the matter further.

White Ribbon Australia is a feminist collective that advocates for the demonization of men as the sole perpetrators of domestic violence and collects millions of dollars in funding that do not seem to go towards anything other than salary for its members. The problem is that the classic image of a woman cowering in the corner as her husband is about to strike her represents a small fraction of the reality of domestic violence, ignoring all male victims and all other issues such as coercive control, paternity fraud, verbal and emotional abuse and the very context in which violence occurs in – drugs, crime, of which domestic violence is often a symptom.

Predictably, WRA declared that El Masri is stood down as their ambassador on October 20. The Bulldogs and the NRL did the same.

El Masri is Lebanese, having migrated to Australia in the 80's with his parents. He had had a successful football career and retired around 2009. He is a devout Muslim and was a married to Abousamra for 13 years until 2014 when he reportedly left her. They had 3 children together. Soon afterwards he married a second time, to the woman he allegedly assaulted on October 19. His latest marriage was not going well. The couple were separated and living away from their waterfront apartment in the south of Sydney – he with his parents and she at a duplex in the suburb of Bankstown in Sydney's west, which he owned.

On the night of Monday, October 19, he met her there in order to get the keys back. An argument broke out during which, El-Cherif called 000 emergency and either said nothing or screamed, depending on which news report one reads. The operator somehow contacted her mother, who in turn contacted El-Charif, advising that the police were concerned for her wellbeing and wanted to speak to her. El Masri meanwhile had recorded the incident on his phone. In the recording, El-Charif explains to her mother that the 000 call was a "prank." El-Charif's mother compelled her daughter to go to the police and explain herself or face a fine, which she proceeded to do. El Masri also went to the station, but by 4am that night, he was facing a domestic violence charge and bail, with a court appearance set for later in the week. It is alleged that he assaulted his wife twice, once occasioning actual body harm and resulting in a mark on her forehead.

On Wednesday, El-Charif filed an Apprehended Violence Order (which prevents the plaintiff from approaching or contacting the claimant). In his court appearance, El Masri pled "not guilty" and his solicitor argued that El-Charif had a history of making false allegations for which he was willing to provide witness statements from up to 20 persons. There appears to have been a heated exchange with the judge, who rebuked the solicitor and upheld the AVO, but revoked bail and set a court appearance on the matter for February 1, 2016.

All this being said, it is fairly clear that El Masri is most likely not a wife beater. Two questions remain: what happened at the Bankstown home and later that night at the police station. It seems that both parties wished to clear the matter up, but the man ended up being charged with domestic violence regardless. If it is at all a consolation, the media does not seem to be interested in crucifying him. The judicial system however has been set in motion and he will have this hanging over his head all summer.

I should not have to point out the irony of the hysteria fostered by White Ribbon having consumed one of their "own," but I just did. Don't join feminist causes, gentlemen. They are in the business saying the opposite of the truth. If you want to be a positive role model to men, start Men's Shed. This is the only initiative of its kind, that I am currently aware of that does something positive for men and boys.

As usual, the media focus has moved away from the story now, but this writer will be following this up in February for AVfM readers.

AVfM Reference Wiki

Robert Brockway · 28 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Alan Adler placed on genital mutilation directory

Gary Costanza · 30 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Adler's biography at mountsinai.org:

Dr. Adler is currently an assistant clinical professor in the Obstetrics & Gynecology Department at Mount Sinai Medical Center. He is a fellow of the American Board of Obstetrics & Gynecology. Dr. Adler is the founding member of New York Obstetrics & Gynecology, P.C. and has been in private practice since 1993.

Dr. Adler received his undergraduate degree Magna Cum Laude from New York University, and was inducted into the national honor society Phi Beta Kappa. Dr. Adler received his medical degree from New York University Medical School where he was inducted into the national medical honor society Alpha Omega Alpha, and graduated as Valedictorian of his class. He completed his residency in Obstetrics and Gynecology at Mount Sinai Medical Center.

Under "Treatments and Procedures, Newborn Circumcision" at mountsinai.org:

> Definition
> Circumcision is the surgical removal of the foreskin. The foreskin is a flap of skin that covers the tip of the penis.

Is an eyelid just "a flap of skin" too? How about the hood of the clitoris?

Although the site lists possible complications, it doesn't mention DEATH as a "complication."

Further on, this gem:

> Your baby may be given a pacifier to suck on. The pacifier will have some sugar water on it. This has been shown to decrease pain in infants.

Sugar water evidently not being enough, anesthesia is mentioned and this description of the procedure:

> The baby will need to be very still during the circumcision. The baby may be carefully restrained on an infant board or someone will hold the baby. The anesthesia will be applied.
> Once the area is numb the procedure will begin.

How this is determined is unknown. It continues:

> The foreskin will be pulled away from the penis. Some parts of the foreskin may still be attached to the penis. The doctor will sweep these attachments away. The extra foreskin will then be cut away. It can be removed with a scalpel or special clamp.
> Stitches may be needed. They will be used to sew the remaining bit of foreskin into place.

I'd hate to be the one holding the baby – or doing the 'pulling' and 'sweeping.'

Since Dr. Adler has incomplete information about the risks to your child, you can read that here at childmutilators.com.

His practice information follows:

New York Obstetrics & Gynecology, PC
103 East 84th Street
New York, NY 10028
Tel: 212-535-9607
Fax: 212-628-8530

AVfM Reference Wiki

Robert Brockway · 30 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Moving forward with anti-MGM activism

Gary Costanza · 30 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I'd like to say hello and thank Paul and AVFM for the opportunity to serve as the Director of anti-MGM (Male Genital Mutilation) Activism here and to administrate the new website, neonatalcutting.org (NNC).

The idea of reaching expectant parents and assisting even one of them to make the decision to not mutilate their son is nothing less than inspiring. It's the best opportunity ever to help make a difference in the lives of infant boys.

As Director of anti-MGM (Male Genital Mutilation) Activism I invite you visit the site and to share the information we've collected on known genital mutilators. Social media buttons are provided for each offender.

I also encourage you to seek out and identify the doctors and clinics that proudly profit from the mutilation and pass them along to me (my email address is in the masthead). I'm also seeking volunteers who are willing to write up posts themselves for the site, allowing for many more and varied postings.

Most of you know the gist of this issue but for those on the fence or unaware of the controversy let me lay out the basics.

The foreskin (prepuce) is an organ with many thousands of nerve endings. Its purpose, aside from sexual pleasure, is to protect the head of the penis (glans), which is an internal organ at birth.

The routine amputation of this organ is not medically justified and results in what we now know to be negative consequences that range from loss of sexual sensitivity to death. As a 1.2 billion dollar annual industry[1] strongly rooted in some religious traditions, it is a practice that would otherwise be criminalized. This make things very difficult to contend with.

The way we have chosen to do that at AVFM is to directly out the practitioners and profiteers. Similarly, we make direct outreach to expectant parents with convincing research and testimonials before they subject their sons to the mutilating cut.

Genital integrity is a human rights issue and many organizations and governments recognize that infant genital mutilation is barbaric, cruel, and worst of all, performed on a non-consenting child.

While female genital mutilation is rightly outlawed in the modern world, MGM is still practiced and even encouraged by the modern medical establishment. Why this glaring hole in medical ethics?

First, misandry is a governing factor. Our cultural tendency to be blind to the pain and suffering of males is visited even on infant boys. This opens the door for the profit motive (the cut and sales of foreskins), ignorance, routine habit, and religion.

Circumcision advocates have defended their mutilations using unsound studies and rationales to deflect criticism from an act that scars and deforms each and every victim.

We do not hold an opinion on adults who elect this procedure with informed consent, though we doubt that very many would make that choice. We do, however, take a firm, irrevocable stand on the idea that infants are to be protected from the barbarism of the choice being taken from them by physicians, clergy or their parents.

Most of the world isn't so barbaric, leaving both male and female infants genitally intact. But to have 'doctors' in the modern world doing this routinely to newborn boys is shocking and revolting.

We hold doctors to the spirit of the Hippocratic Corpus, "First, do no harm." Our efforts underway at AVFM and NNC are a reflection of the fact that the western medical establishment has abandoned this credo in the name of money. We will not spare any of them the public scrutiny they so richly deserve.

[1] The 1.2 billion in estimated revenue does not include revenue from foreskin sales or the 1-2 billion estimated revenue in baby penis-based aftermarket products, including vanity items for women.

Angels save Gawain from marriage

Douglas Galbi · 30 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Sometimes your friends really aren't looking out for your best interests. Especially if they're married, and they're urging you to marry. De coniuge non ducenda, a Latin work of men's sex protest written between 1225 and 1250, tells how three angels saved Gawain from marriage.

The married men who were Gawain's friends didn't act like angels. They instead sought company to the end of their miserable days. Gawain easily could have joined them:

> And all these made wild,
> By women that they used.
> Though I be now beguiled,
> I think I might be excused. [1]

Gawain explained:

> I once had planned to take a wife
> (To follow others' wretched life),
> A tender, juicy, winsome maid —
> By her alone my heart was swayed.
>
> Some friends advised me on the spot
> To run and tie the nuptial knot
> ("The married life's the way for you!"),
> To join me in their woeful crew.
>
> My hasty wedding they did press
> To cheer their gloom by my distress,
> But through three angels all was well:
> God snatched me from the gates of hell. [2]

Gawain's vigorous, celebrated knightly life could have ended with a lament like that of Matheolus in a Latin work of the late-thirteenth century:

> Just as I, though sad, am less disturbed in marriage
> Because my fellow husbands provide solace in their misery.
> Oh, single life! Be sad that single life ends in sadness
> Increased only because it is allowed to end. [3]

What made all the difference was the appearance of three angels. Just as three angels appeared to Abraham at Mamre, so too three angels came to Gawain at Mamre.[4] Is anything too wonderful for the Lord?

One angel was Peter of Corbeil, elevated to archbishop of Sens in 1200. Courtly poets described abstractly men's love servitude to women. Peter of Corbeil described the life of the ordinary, married working man:

> Who takes a wife a millstone ties > around his neck until he dies.
> The wife commands, the man obeys;
> He once was free, but slave he stays.
>
> His work piles up in rows and rows;

> Where one job ends, another grows.
> The man's an ass pricked on by spur
> To feed the brats produced by her. [5]

Patriarchy is a hateful fiction beguiling foolish students. Husbands have long lacked equal opportunities with wives to withdraw from paid work. The angel Peter proclaims, "Let Gawain shun the married life!"

The second angel was Lawrence. He was probably the poet Lawrence, prior of Durham, who died in 1154. Lawrence explained how biological inequality in parental knowledge works to oppress men:

> So rancour grips the married male
> Who keeps a wife who's up for sale.
> He names as heir another's brat
> And feeds what someone else begat.
>
> Thus bitter grief and shame begin —
> The child that's been conceived in sin.
> Its mother knows its bastard line,
> The foolish husband says, "It's mine."

Under English common law, a child born within a marriage is indisputably presumed to be the husband's responsibility. Thus a New York court in 1975 ruled that a prisoner was the father of four children his wife had while he was securely locked away from her in prison. The angel Lawrence proclaims, "Let Gawain therefore wife eschew!"

The third angel was John Chrysostom. Known in the ancient world as the golden-mouthed, with God's grace he spoke harsh truth to men:

> A married man's a slave for sure,
> His flesh and spirit pain endure —
> Like ox from market homeward led
> To work the plough until he's dead.
>
> Who takes a wife accepts a yoke;
> Not knowing pain, with pain he'll choke.
> Who takes a wife, himself is caught
> And to eternal serfdom brought.
> …
> A wife's demands are always met;
> If not, she'll quarrel, rage and fret.
> The noise defeats the patient spouse;
> He yields to her and quits the house.

Is it any wonder that men's lifespan is on average shorter than women's? Some say that's because men prefer to die than remain married. In truth, the matter hasn't been seriously investigated. International authorities don't care about gender inequality in lifespan that shortchanges men. The angel John advises, "If wise, then marriage you'll forbear!"

Marriage is a foolish game in which a wife is entitled to swing a legal axe at her husband's neck. There is no equal exchange under gynocentric law. When the axe strikes the husband's neck, his head will be severed from his body. It will never re-attach. Gawain had magic that Merlin lacked. But magic didn't save Gawain's neck. Against the selfish advice of his married friends, the Holy Trinity of angels Peter, Lawrence, and John interceded on Gawain's behalf. Give thanks and glory to them!

Read more:

- Heloise wholly innocent of disastrous marriage with Abelard
- Bernard of Cluny's De Contemptu Mundi trivialized men's sexed protests
- Andreas Capellanus's De amore dialogically manipulated men's sexed protest

[1] Sir Gawain and the Green Knight ll. 2425-9, close translation from Middle English by Benson (2012) p. 179. Like the bookish scholar, the knight Gawain learned from experience of the superior wiles of women. The verse romance Sir Gawain and the Green Knight was probably written in the latter half of the fourteenth century. Surviving only in one manuscript (British Library MS Cotton Nero A.x.), it's written in an English dialect associated with Cheshire (northwestern England). On Gawain's relation to the literature of men's sexed protest, Dove (1972).

[2] De coniuge non ducenda I2-I4, from Latin trans. Rigg (1986) pp. 67-9. A Latin text is freely available online in Wright (1841) pp. 77-85. De coniuge non ducenda survives in 55 Latin manuscripts. Considerable variation among manuscripts suggests transmission through scribal memory. Rigg's text is based mainly on the manuscript Cambridge, Corpus Christi College MS 450, dating from about 1310. Rigg chose it to represent the best-known and earliest form of the work. Id. pp. 1, 61. Like Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, De coniuge non ducenda encompasses realistic descriptions of mundane, non-bookish activities.

A French version of De coniuge non ducenda exists in the Harley 2253 manuscript as Article 83, De Mal Mariage (Against Marriage). Fein (2014). The Harley version, which is less sophisticated than Andreas Capellenus's De amore, inserts qualifiers limiting claims to "bad women" and "bad marriages." Another French version, Douce 210, lacks those qualifiers. Dove (2000) p. 341. There's also a Middle English version of De coniurge non ducenda attributed to John Lydgate and entitled Payne and Sorowe of Evyll Maryage. Salisbury (2002).

De coniuge non ducenda is part of the Latin tradition of men's sex protest that encompasses Juvenal's Satire 6, Jerome's Golden Book on Marriage attributed to Theophrastus, Walter Map's Dissuasio Valerii ad Rufinum, and Lamentationes Matheoluli. Rigg (1986), pp. 101-2, outlines parallels between De coniuge non ducenda and Lamentationes Matheoluli. He argues that the former, written in the second quarter of the thirteenth century, influenced the the latter, written about 1290.

[3] Lamentationes Matheoluli ll. 326-9, my translation from the Latin text of Van Hamel (1892) vol. 1, p. 23:

> Sicut ego, tristis, minus hinc conturbor in istis;
> Ut socios habeant solacia sunt miserorum.
> Ve solis! doleant, quia solis puncta dolorum
> Augmentatur eo quod eam soli paciuntur.

[4] On the three angels appearing to Abraham at Mamre, Genesis 18:1-15.

[5] De coniuge non ducenda P2-P3, trans. Rigg (1986) p. 73. The subsequent quotes are from id. pp. 79-99. Kuczynski (2000) reports:

> one nineteenth-century reader of De conjuge non ducenda (no. 83), one of Harley's antifeminist diatribes, spoke for many when he scrawled above the title of the Latin text in a book at the Tulane University Library, "A brutal piece of Monkish foulness, worse than any Classical smittishness. Luther is here justified."

Id. p. 141. Rigg (1986), in contrast, observes that De coniuge {conjuge} non ducenda is "a cheerful poem and not very serious." The poem's assertions:

> stress not the obstacles that marriage poses to the scholar or cleric but the disadvantages for the ordinary working man. … the context is an ordinary working man's household, beset above all by financial worries.

Id. preface, p. 4. Men's burdens historically have tended to be disparaged and depreciated.

[image] Wife of Bercilak de Hautedesert attempts to seduce Gawain in bed. Illumination detail from f. 125/129 recto from British Library MS Cotton Nero A.x, the only surviving manuscript of Sir Gawain and the Green Knight. Thanks to the Cotton Nero A.x. Project.

References:

Benson, Larry Dean, trans. 2012. Sir Gawain and the Green Knight: a close verse translation. Morgantown: West Virginia University Press.

Dove, Mary. 1972. "Gawain and the Blasme des Femmes Tradition." Medium Aevum 41: 20-26.

Dove, Mary. 2000. "Evading textual intimacy: the French secular verse." Pp. 329 – 349 in Fein, Susanna Greer. 2000. Studies in the Harley manuscript: the scribes, contents, and social contexts of British Library MS Harley 2253. Kalamazoo, Mich: Published for TEAMS in association with the University of Rochester by Medieval Institute Publications, Western Michigan University.

Fein, Susanna, ed. with David B. Raybin, and Jan M. Ziolkowski, trans. 2014. The complete Harley 2253 Manuscript (vol. 1, vol. 2, vol. 3). Medieval Institute Publications, Western Michigan University. Kalamazoo, Michigan.

Kuczynski, Michael P. 2000. "An 'electric stream': the religious contents." Pp. 123-161 in Fein, Susanna Greer. 2000. Studies in the Harley manuscript.

Rigg, A. G. 1986. Gawain on marriage: the textual tradition of the De coniuge non ducenda with critical edition and translation. Toronto, Ont., Canada: Pontifical Institute of Mediaeval Studies.

Salisbury, Eve. 2002. The trials and joys of marriage. Kalamazoo, Mich: Published for TEAMS in association with the University of Rochester by Medieval Institute Publications, Western Michigan University.

Van Hamel, Anton Gerard, ed. 1892. Mathéolus, Jean Le Fèvre. Les lamentations de Mathéolus et le livre de leesce de Jehan Le Fèvre, de Ressons: poèmes français du XIVe siècle. Paris: Bouillon.

Wright, Thomas, ed. 1841. The Latin poems commonly attributed to Walter Mapes. London: Printed for the Camden Society, by J.B. Nichols and Son.

Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License.

My Psychotic Neighbor

AVfM Video Source · 30 November 2015 · Archived copy · Original

MrRepzion having a rant about his neighbor and his psychotic wife and the disparities between married men and women.

Dr. Fahimeh Sasan placed on genital mutilators directory

Gary Costanza · 1 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Sasan's biographical information at mountsinai.org:

ASSISTANT PROFESSOR Obstetrics, Gynecology and Reproductive Science Education: DO, Texas College of Osteopathic Med.
Residency, OB-GYN
Mount Sinai Hospital

Under "Treatments and Procedures, Newborn Circumcision" at mountsinai.org:

> Definition:
> Circumcision is the surgical removal of the foreskin. The foreskin is a flap of skin that covers the tip of the penis.

Is an eyelid just "a flap of skin" too? How about the clitoral hood?
Although the site lists possible complications, it doesn't mention DEATH as a "complication."

Further on, this gem:

> Your baby may be given a pacifier to suck on. The pacifier will have some sugar water on it. This has been shown to decrease pain in infants.

Sugar water evidently not being enough, anesthesia is mentioned and this description of the procedure:

> The baby will need to be very still during the circumcision. The baby may be carefully restrained on an infant board or someone will hold the baby. The anesthesia will be applied.
> Once the area is numb the procedure will begin.

How this is determined is unknown. It continues:

> The foreskin will be pulled away from the penis. Some parts of the foreskin may still be attached to the penis. The doctor will sweep these attachments away. The extra foreskin will then be cut away. It can be removed with a scalpel or special clamp.
> Stitches may be needed. They will be used to sew the remaining bit of foreskin into place.

I'd hate to be the one holding the baby – or doing the 'pulling' and 'sweeping.'

No mention of her circumcision skills on this episode of "Today," although she does calm the fears of consenting adult patients (infant boys, not so much).

Since Dr. Sasan has incomplete information about the risks to your child, you can read that here at childmutilators.com

Her practice information follows:

New Office
5 East 98th Street
2nd Floor
New York, NY 10029
Tel: 212-241-9393
Fax: 212-423-1238

I support Bahar Mustafa

Dennis Michaels · 1 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Recently Bahar Mustafa of #KillAllWhiteMen fame was in the news again via Breitbart news. Breitbart Journalist Oliver Lane reports that Bahar has "allegedly sent American blogger and radio personality Pamela Geller a degrading gang-rape e-mail telling her she 'deserves to be raped in every hole by hordes of muslims'. Her email address was sent from a public form so there is a question whether the message was sent by Bahar herself, but it is consistent with her bullying behavior.

Bahar is certainly is not popular within the halls of the MHRM but one of AVFM's contributors Dennis Michaels makes his case as to why he supports Bahar Mustafa.

AFVM Editorial Staff

So, the lovely lady that miraculously still serves as welfare, ~~white guilt~~ and diversity officer at Goldsmiths, University of London was charged for her alleged hate speech in #killallwhitemen hashtag. To be more specific, charges of sending a threatening letter or communication or sending by public communication network an offensive, indecent, obscene or menacing message. Some news sources also incorrectly reported that she was arrested, when, in fact, she was issued a summons. Someone who is familiar with the domestic violence meat grinder could be forgiven for not knowing that charges don't always equal arrest.

The public erupted mostly in support of Bahar Mustafa, falling into two camps. There are those who supported her freedom of speech because they support her. And then there are those who understand S. G. Tallentyre's maxim (often misattributed to Voltaire) "I disapprove of what you say, but I will defend to the death your right to say it." For the former camp many of their victories ring hollow. I think Brendan O'Niell of Spiked said it best:

They aren't defending freedom of speech; they're defending friends' speech. And today's various, distinct, disconnected calls to 'let my friend speak!' could actually damage rather that boost that most pressing cause of the 21st century: the fight for the right of everyone – literally everyone – to say, sing, write, depict and think whatever they like.

There is no shortage of bigots who believe that Bahar Mustafa should not have been charged, because hate speech laws don't work both ways. They exist only to punish the white heterosexual cis-gendered ~~scum~~ male, not to protect their manfeelz. Suzanna Moore of The Guardian didn't hesitate to rally behind Bahar Mustafa and in defence of ~~some~~ free speech.

"The issue is of free speech and how this is being undermined by this safe-space policy adopted by student unions. Superficially it is about being welcoming, inclusive and stopping far right, explicitly racist, speakers."

Evidently, far left, explicitly racist speakers are ok with her. And yes, let's get this out of the way: Bahar Mustafa absolutely is a racist.

She first became a news item after a BME (Black and Minority Ethnic) event she organized explicitly banned "white and/or male" attendees. Now, there is an argument to be made that minorities can have their own groups without being explicitly racist. But it is not the argument she made. Instead she responded that the very accusation of racism or sexism conceptually cannot be applied to her, because she is a woman of (very little) color.

"I, an ethnic minority woman, cannot be racist or sexist towards white men, because racism and sexism describe structures of privilege based on race and gender. Therefore, woman of colour and minority genders cannot be racist or sexist, since we do not stand to benefit from such a system."

Better to remain silent and be thought a fool than to speak and to remove all doubt. If Bahar intended to lay to rest the question whether she is racist and sexist, this statement achieved that goal splendidly.

But now, onto the second camp of Bahar's supporters. Some, like Breitbart's Milo Yiannopoulos and aforementioned Brendan O'Niell, had shown that they understand what freedom of speech is. To believe in freedom of speech means precisely to believe in freedom of speech for the views you despise. They will get no argument from me on that point. However, they neglected to ask another, a far more uncomfortable question. Should we also defend freedom of speech of those who do not believe in freedom of speech? Should we defend freedom of speech of those who will not reciprocate and stab you in the back at the first opportunity?

Bahar Mustafa herself recently appeared in London Thinks event – a panel discussion on safe spaces and free speech. Needless to say, she wasn't there to represent supporters of free speech.

What makes the timing of the charges against her so interesting is that it comes within weeks of two prominent feminist forays into censorship. First, Google Ideas invites a biggest bunch of online bullies and harassers they can find for suggestions on combatting online bullying and harassment. Then, two of those bullies, Anita Sarkeesian and Zoe Quinn have their voices heard at the United Nations to tell everyone how they are voiceless, and also, how women need protection from the evil words that lurk on the internet. Either the timing of the charges is a cosmic coincidence, or someone at Scotland Yard is a closet MRA with a great sense of humour.

This bring me to my main point. I'm not even completely sold on the idea that real hate speech should be criminalized. And to make things worse, the tern 'hate speech' is tossed around way too frivolously by the fainting couch brigades. Sending by public communication network an offensive, indecent, obscene or menacing message shouldn't be a crime. Yet, under current British laws it is. I am against this law being used against Bahar Mustafa, because I am against it being used against anyone. This woman should not be charged, because Malicious Communications Act, 1988 should not exist, or at least heavily rewritten to remove criminal penalties for hurting people's feelings. Those who rally for Bahar Mustafa, but not against this law are hypocrites of the highest order. By supporting them, we risk combining the worst of two worlds: hate speech for ~~disagreeing~~ harassing a feminist and a free pass for unapologetic misandrist. The regressive, censorious pearl clutchers had missed yet another chance to recoil in horror at the monster they created. While #ISupportBaharMustafa, do not think for a second that I stand side by side with people who have selective appreciation for freedom of speech.

Bahar Mustafa has a degree in gender studies and media. In other words, she was defrauded of her tuition fees and did not receive an education. London's finest is about to pick up the slack and teach her an important lesson on the value of free speech.

Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License.

Dr. Jian Jenny Tang placed on genital mutilators directory

Gary Costanza · 2 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Tang's biography at mountsinai.org:

Education
MD, University of Wisconsin
Residency, Obstetrics and Gynec
Montefiore Medical Group

"Dr. Jian Jenny Tang was born and raised in Shanghai, China and moved to the United States in 1988 with her family to pursue a higher education. She graduated Magna Cum Laude from the University of Wisconsin with a Bachelor of Science in Chemistry and Biochemistry. She then obtained her Medical Degree from the University of Wisconsin Medical School in Madison where she graduated top of her class. She completed her residency at Albert Einstein College of Medicine in 2002. Dr. Tang received plenty of recognition and awards and was on the Dean's Honor List on many occasions throughout college and medical school. She was awarded by her medical students for excellence in teaching. She also has been voted one of America's top obstetricians and gynecologists yearly since 2006 by the Consumer's Research Council of America.

Dr. Tang has over 15 years experience in general obstetrics and gynecology and has delivered over 3,000 babies. She is skilled in diagnosing and providing basic treatment for patients with infertility issues. She also has a strong interest in minimally invasive gynecologic procedures. Dr. Tang is an advocate for her patients by balancing modern western medicine and holistic eastern medicine."

Under "Treatments and Procedures, Newborn Circumcision" at mountsinai.org:

> Definition:
> Circumcision is the surgical removal of the foreskin. The foreskin is a flap of skin that covers the tip of the penis.

Is an eyelid just "a flap of skin" too? How about the clitoral hood?

Although the site lists possible complications, it doesn't mention DEATH as a "complication."

Further on, this gem:

> Your baby may be given a pacifier to suck on. The pacifier will have some sugar water on it. This has been shown to decrease pain in infants.

Sugar water evidently not being enough, anesthesia is mentioned and this description of the procedure:

> The baby will need to be very still during the circumcision. The baby may be carefully restrained on an infant board or someone will hold the baby. The anesthesia will be applied.
> Once the area is numb the procedure will begin. The foreskin will be pulled away from the penis. Some parts > of the foreskin may still be attached to the penis. The doctor will sweep these attachments away. The extra foreskin will then be cut away. It can be removed with a scalpel or special clamp.

> Stitches may be needed. They will be used to sew the remaining bit of foreskin into place.

I'd hate to be the one holding the baby – or doing the 'pulling' and 'sweeping.'

Since Dr. Tang has incomplete information about the risks to your child, you can read that here at childmutilators.com

If you are an expectant parent and are considering neonatal cutting on your son, please visit neonatalcutting.org before making that choice final.

Her practice information follows:

Obstetrics/Gynecology Faculty Practice Associates
5 East 98th Street
2nd Floor
New York, NY 10029

Tel: 212-241-9393

This holiday season you can support abused men

Act for AVfM · 2 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I am happy to post this to AVFM with my support and endorsement. PE

"As a man, it's very difficult to say you've been beaten up. It seems like you're the big brute and she's the daffodil, but sometimes it's not like that."

So read the words of an unknown "gardener" named Dave as quoted in a two-and-a-half-year-old post on The Independent, which informs us of the uncomfortable reality of female-on-male domestic abuse. The article goes on to about the Mankind Initiative, a UK-based domestic abuse charity aimed at giving hope to such men. One could find that and go "Oh good, at least someone is addressing the problem!"

Except that as of right now, the Mankind Initiative tells us on their own website that they only have funding until January of 2016.

The Mankind Initiative receives no government funding for it's activities on behalf of male victims. Those include:

- A helpline for male victims that takes 1,600 calls a year from victims as well as concerned friends, family members and colleagues.
- This helpline actively works to help victims "and their children escape from the suffering they face at home."
- Providing support, education and training for related agencies and volunteers.
- Giving a voice to male victims through research, public awareness campaigns, government consultations, and supporting concerned students, academia & public officials.

According to the Mankind Initiative's own statistics:

> 8.5% of women and 4.5% of men were estimated to have experienced domestic abuse in 2013/14, equivalent to an estimated 1.39 million female victims and 737,000 male victims. For every three victims of domestic abuse, two will be female, one will be male.

Needless to say, any number of victims of domestic violence is too much.

Please remember and support the Mankind Initiative's quest for funding their vital services this Holiday season. Whether you celebrate those holidays or not, some other father or his children might get to have their own holiday made a little brighter this year.

Main site: http://new.mankind.org.uk/support-us

Mydonate Page: https://mydonate.bt.com/charities/mankindinitiative

Yours in the interest of Men & Boys,

Kevin Wayne

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=oYU43wZgY_c&feature=youtu.be

Did Reki Kawahara predict #GamerGate???

Clint Carpentier · 2 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Sword Art Online, is not related to #gamergate, it was written or published online in 2002 (under a pen name) and the anime began in 2012. But it's well worth entertaining the notion that it was a prophecy. For those that it will matter to, it's not Funimation, so enjoy without guilt.

My oldest daughter and I have thrown anime at each other for a few years now. Some of which I refuse to watch, simply because of the large number of episodes and ongoing nature, at which point, the plot is usually lost, Fairy Tail being one such anime that I can't bring myself to start; others are because I can only find the dubbed version, dubbed just plain sucks donkey balls. But if it's something I can binge on for a weekend, I'll take her up on the challenge, and we laugh, and we cry, and we fist bump, life goes on.

Sword Art Online (SAO) is one anime I was reluctant to start because it was about a game. But I came around and I am infinitely glad I did. Heads up, you're going to encounter spoilers; I can't do anything about that, the story has two seasons with two parts each; one movie so far, another planned, and talk of a third season (more if you read the manga.) That in and of itself, explains my stance.

Aincrad

MMO's have upped their game by introducing Virtual Reality. 1000 beta testers have given Sword Art Online rave reviews. On the grand opening, 10,000 players enter Starting City. Among them, the beta testers with brand new accounts so everyone starts on an equal footing. Everything is fine until people start trying to log out. The Game Master finally calls all the players back to starting location and explains that this isn't a glitch.

To leave the game the players have two options; end the game, or die trying. The NerveGear (NVG) VR helmet is equipped with an electromagnetic pulse which will fry the player's brain if the character dies, or some one outside removes it; the GM follows this statement up by showing news feeds of the real world panic involving the NVG, already many players are dead. Shit just got real for these players, many of whom, aren't even actual gamers, or adults for that matter.

Kirito, one of the beta testers realizes the gravity of the situation, knows the strengths and limitations of the game, and hatches an initial plan to make his survival possible. He also understands the futility of thinking ending the game will happen anytime soon; he was one of the few who figured out the system and got as far as floor 8 (there are 100). That took him a month of dedicated effort and trial & error. By the time they find the floor boss, two thousand players have died and the beta testers aren't trusted, because most of them did exactly what Kirito did, they had fled Starting City and proceeded to level up. When the first floor boss is killed Kirito makes a decision, if some one needs to be blamed and hated upon, he will take that burden upon himself lock stock and barrel so that the other beta testers can get on with doing what's ultimately important, building solid guilds to win the game; for this crime, he takes the label "Beater" (beta cheater), one of a handful of players who can claim that title and the only one anyone actually knows. Beater serves as a dual purpose for him, as he is often found scouting the "Front Line" and assessing the situation before the front line combatants move forward. Among the many things he does, he never fails to join the party gathered for a "Boss Kill".

Asuna is not a gamer, she is the obedient daughter of a wealthy driven family; the NVG isn't even hers, her older brother had to leave town for business so she tried it for the sole purpose of finding out if there was more to life… yeah… shit. She starts out driven to get back home; as she puts it "every day we're here, we lose a day out there!" To which Kirito informs her "yeah, but today we're here, and it's actually not a bad day." She spends the entirety of the series learning that there is more important things in life, than striving for a monetary standard she did not set herself.

People being people without any guiding influence or legal authority, the players shake down into various in-game lifestyles and the only rules enforced are those within guilds upon their members. The only over-all Law mentioned is that of murder. Duels (player vs player) are permissible, but you're not allowed to bring an opponent to 0hp. This of course does not stop people from being people, and two notable orange guilds are mentioned in the game "Titan's Hand" and "Laughing Coffin", orange referring the crystal above everyone's head denoting what they are, green for player, orange for player killer (usually game monsters), red for bosses. I didn't catch the crystal for NPC's, but quest givers have an exclamation mark. The only authority to keep this law enforced are the players at or close to the front line.

Fairy Dance

Kirito has completed the game and nearly 6000 players are released back to the real world, after two years. The VR company has long since gone bankrupt paying damaged for lives lost along the way; but the NVG product was bought out and sustained by someone else. Over all, things are fine except it's discovered that 300 players have yet to come offline, Kirito's in-game wife Asuna being one of them. Kirito has PTSD, as do many of the front line players who chose combat over a sedentary in-game lifestyle (though many of these aided the combatants in other ways). A special school is being created for students who survived SAO, for many reasons, not least of which are neural observation and trauma management. And a special investigation department had been created specifically for VR crimes; despite this, organizing RL for the 6000 coming offline at once, allowed the 300 to slip through the cracks.

An image of Asuna is brought to Kirito's attention, an image from another VRMMORPG. Stripped of the power she had in SAO and literally caged like a bird, she is a prisoner in her own mind. While the VR crimes unit works out the RL side of things, Kirito takes it upon himself to don his online VR investigator's cap once again and plugs the NVG in to get to the bottom of things. The result leads to a crippling body blow to "Full Dive" VRMMO companies, but SAO's designer leaves Kirito one last parting gift, to do with as he pleases; he calls it "The Seed".

Phantom Bullet

Six months have passed and the SAO youth are settling into their RL routines. Kirito's posse are still full-diving, but not through any company framework. The Seed has infected the internet and anyone with VR equipment can access it; anyone with enough computing power can use the seed to create their own world, and in no time, the VRMMO's are interconnecting to each other in a web that rivals the internet itself.

Gun Gale Online is one such world. It's… very American; it was designed by an American, the server is based in America, "shoot'm all, let the AI sort it out". Hell, you can make real money in this game, making "Made in America" mean something again. Ok ok ok, it's what the rest of the world thinks of America, thank John Wayne. Add a couple of unexplained RL deaths related to this VRMMO and the VRCU investigator brings in Kirito for questioning; when they agree that VR death can't lead to RL death, Kirito agrees to investigate online, something is amiss, and neither of them can let it slide.

Kirito's habit of using a random canned body, lands him in a very rare and very androgynous body type. Hilarity ensues as he swaps between the genders as the need dictates, allowing him to choose his battles more easily. The amusement is tempered by a meeting with the character related to the deaths he's there to investigate, things take a turn for the worse as Kirito realizes this player is a member of the Laughing Coffin guild from SAO.

This part of the series deals mainly with trauma, both RL (Kirito's partner Sinon) and VR (Kirito's actions in SAO), and in Sinon's case, when RL trauma manifests itself in VR, where she thought she could be safe from it.

Kirito works out that the deaths have to be at least a two man operation, one in VR to show his power, the other in RL creating a drug induced heart failure. However, it dawns on him during a major competition and he can't just logout until a winner is has been declared, which means only one player left alive and the murderer is one of the contestants.

Mother's Rosario

Here we get to see Asuna's RL home life. While she takes her friend's rich girl jokes in stride, she is increasingly more dependent on school and VR to cope with it. Her mother has other ideas for her though, which involve neither, nor her VR husband, Kirito. She finds new friends and discovers that the SAO survivors aren't the only deep divers, not all deep divers were a mistake. She learns from friends, how they prioritize in various states of life and screws up the courage to face her biggest challenge yet, standing up to her mother.

Kirito's main (and not insubstantial) contribution to this part is programming VR to interact with RL; in it's most basic sense, he's creating skype for VR entities to connect to RL. While his reasons are innocent enough, I can't help but think of the implications of such technology; dating NPC's being one, but depending on what the NPC's are programmed to do, they would make sufficient teachers, possibly moral guides, or even bad influences.

I suppose the only thing left to do, is to tell you where to go. Well, you know exactly where to go, you cis-het misogynist white male shitlords!!! But on the way, check here and here.

Attribution-ShareAlike 2.0 Generic

“Stang riding” as punishment for male victims of intimate partner violence

Peter Wright · 2 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Stang riding, alternatively referred to as stanging, charivari, or riding the skimmington is a centuries-old practice intended to shame male victims of intimate partner violence by parading them through town on a wooden platform while enduring mockery and ridicule by onlookers. Essentially a vigilante justice action, the practice ceased by the earlier part of last century, or rather has been supplanted by more subtle forms of shaming male victims; ie. telling them to “man up” or by insinuating that a man must have done something wrong to “cause” his female partner to act violently.

From old newspaper reports in England we get stated evidence of the desire to shame those who rode the stang:

> Stang riding – It has been asserted by an old writer that “Shame produceth reformation, where punishment faileth.” [1]
>
> “Riding the stang” was one of the few old customs still remaining by which the people of a particular place took the law into their own hands as an assumed right. It was formerly the tendency of the law that for minor offenses the culprits should be punished by some process that appealed to their sense of shame, such as that of the stocks or ducking stool, the pillory and so forth, and “riding the stang” was a popular way of acting on the same principle. [2]

Stang riding was employed for married men and women transgressing social norms, including the norm that a man should defend himself when his wife perpetrated physical violence against him – i.e. If the man failed to defend himself he was forced to ride the stang, as described in the following English newspaper articles from the 1800s:

> Stang Riding, or Riding the Skimmington, a mode of punishing certain delinquencies, or of ridiculing a man who allows his wife to beat him, [is] still followed in some parts of the country. It consists of making him ride a wooden horse in procession, with the accompaniment of much noise.[3]

> Stanging, or riding the stang, was a name by which a mode of punishment, at one time very popular, especially in the north of England, was known. It was resorted to in cases where, through the frailty or fault of either party, conjugal felicity had been violated. Sometimes the punishment was occasioned by a rustic swain having allowed his termagant wife to beat him; and this form of the custom has given rise to the slang word “stangey,” ie. a person under petticoat government.[4]

> In several parts of this country there was an old custom… believed to be of Saxon origin, prevailing, which was called Riding Stang. It occurred when a woman was known to have beaten her husband, and the mode of procedure was as follows:- the neighbours being assembled together, two men get into a cart and are drawn about by other men, when they beat an old tin can with a stick, a number of nonsensical lines are repeated, and the assembled multitude shout; and all this must be done in four neighbouring townships before the Stang Riding can be completed. Two men of the names Bent and Muddyman sometime ago came to reside at Hyde from a Stang Riding district, where they had not long been, before Bent got married, and Muddyman promised that when he [ie. Bent] allowed his wife to thrash him, he would give him the benefit of a Stang Ride. It was not long before Muddyman’s anticipations that Bent’s wife would thrash him were realized, and not forgetting his > promise, a muster was made, and the ceremony was commenced on the evening of the 27th of July, when the plaintiff and Muddyman got into a cart, with a stick and a saucepan, with which they contrived to make some music, and the plaintiff repeated the following lines:-

>
> Ran, dan, dan,
> This you mun know by the sound of our can,
> One of our neighbours has beat her good man;
> Not for eating or drinking or feeding on souse,
> But for spending two-pence in a neighbour's house;
> If he'll be a good fellow and do so no more,
> We won't never sound our can at no neighbour's door.
>
> Muddyman, who was in the cart, and held one of the musical instruments, then made the following beautiful response:-
>
> Tink of a kettle—tank of a pan,
> This brassy-faced woman has beaten her man,
> Neither with sword, dagger or knife,
> But with an old shuttle she'd like to have taken his life.
>
> …The can was then again tinkled, and the shout having been set up, the cart was drawn to the townships of Godley and Haughton, the crowd accompanying it, where the same ceremony was performed, and the cavalcade returned in perfectly good order, through Hyde, toward another township, it being necessary that they should visit four.[5]

> The stang is of Saxon origin, and is practiced in Lancashire, Cumberland, and Westmoreland, for the purpose of exposing a kind of gynocracy, or, the wife wearing the gallskins. When it is known (which it generally is) that the wife falls out with her spouse, and beats him right well, the people of the town or village produce a ladder, and instantly repair to his house, where one of the partly is powdered with flour–face blackened–cocked hat placed upon his cranium–white sheet thrown over his shoulders–is seated astride the ladder–with his back where his face should be–they hoist him upon men's shoulders–and in his hands he carries and long brush, tongs, and poker. A sort of mock proclamation is then made in doggerel verse at the door of all the ale-houses in the parish, or wapentake, as follows:
>
> It is neither for your sake nor my sake
> That I ride the stang;
> But it is for Nancy Thomson,
> Who did her husband hang.
> But if I hear tell that she doth rebel,
> Or him complain, with fife and drum
> Then we will come,
> And ride the stang again.
> With a ran tan tang,
> And a ran tan tan tang," &c.[6]

Notice the man in the latter example is forced to carry a "long brush, tongs, and poker," household objects usually attended by women, perhaps as an attempt to feminize and portray him as unmanly. One is reminded here of the centuries old Henpecked Club which held annual street processions of battered men carrying women's household utensils, which symbolized their humility and humiliation.

Stanging as a method of shaming abused men took many forms, differing from town to town and from incident to incident. However one thing these rituals had in common was the attempt to shame male victims of domestic violence. While this history is readily available in newspaper and other archives, today's historians of sociology have avoided any publishing or commentary on the material, hence this article to raise awareness of what we might aptly refer to as his-tory.

Sources:

[1] Chester Chronicle – Friday 28 May, 1813
[2] Cork Examiner – Monday 28 August, 1865
[3] Salisbury and Winchester Journal – Saturday 27 September, 1856
[4] Kent and Sussex Courier – Friday 13 August, 1880
[5] Chester Chronicle – Friday 27 April, 1827
[6] Lancashire Mirror – 18 January, 1829

See also:

–Riding the Donkey Backwards: Men as the Unacceptable Victims of Marital Violence
–Fire-poker princesses: a snapshot of female violence in nineteenth-century England
–The Henpecked Club – a 200 year fellowship of abused husbands
–A random selection of nineteenth century newspaper articles referencing stanging

What can I do for my country? Obama makes it simple – just die

AVfM Video Source · 2 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

ICMI16 update: New speakers, an MC, and why you need to pre-register by 22:00 GMT Sunday, 6 December

Mike Buchanan · 3 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

We have already announced many of the confirmed speakers at ICMI16, in addition to Erin Pizzey, who'll be giving the keynote speech, 'Intergenerational family violence v the big lie'. In surname alphabetical order:

1. Paul Apreda, Families Need Fathers (Both Parents Matter) Cymru – 'The state's assaults on fathers'
2. Janet Bloomfield (Judgy Bitch) – 'How feminism infantilizes women'
3. Mike Buchanan, party leader, J4MB – 'The political war on men and boys'
4. Paul Elam, Founder and publisher, A Voice for Men – 'Gynocentrism – the root of feminism'
5. Dean Esmay, National Coalition for Men (NCFM) – 'Men Going Their Own Way, and the new Renaissance'
6. Janice Fiamengo, Professor, Department of English, Ottawa University – 'How Feminism is Destroying Higher Education'
7. Sage Gerard, Collegiate Activism Director, AVfM Operations LLC – 'How to bring men's rights to campus'
8. Tim Hammond, independent researcher – 'Exploring the aftermath of male circumcision: Findings from the 2012 Global Survey of Infant Circumcision'
9. Anil Kumar, Save Indian Family Foundation – 'Organizational models that made the difference: Success stories in India'
10. Herbert Purdy, anti-feminist blogger – 'Their Angry Creed' (the title of his forthcoming book)
11. Karen Straughan (GirlWritesWhat) – 'Toxic Femininity'
12. Lucian Valsan, European News Director, AVfM Operations LLC – 'The status of men in continental Europe: ideology, legislation and activism'
13. Milo Yiannopoulos, Associate Editor, Breitbart.com – 'How to beat feminists in debates'

I am delighted to announce the MC and four more speakers at ICMI… drum roll, please…

Master of Ceremonies – Terrence Popp, Redonkulas, surely the funniest war hero on the planet. We can expect the conference to run with military precision, and have some laughs at the same time. New speakers:

1. Greg Canning, Australian doctor and MHRA – 'The health gender gap'
2. Martin Daubney, a British writer on gender issues – talk title TBA.
3. Guttorm Grundt, Norwegian MHRA – 'Discrimination against men and fathers in Norway, and MannForum's strategy and actions for gender equality in practice'
4. Josh O'Brien, 19-year-old politics student and vlogger – talk title TBA
5. Thomas Walter, German MHRA, member of MANNdat – talk title TBA

Also at the conference, but not speaking, will be the popular 18-year-old British student vlogger David Sherratt, Spinosaurus Kin, as well as Carl Benjamin, the man behind the Sargon of Akkad website.

With Erin Pizzey, that's 19 speakers at ICMI16. If you want to be sure of attending ICMI16, you'll need to pre-register, and the dealine for doing so is 22:00 GMT on Sunday, three days' time. You won't be making a legal commitment to later buy a ticket (£225 – £265, less the pre-registration fee), and we'll make a full refund if:

- the conference is cancelled
- the scope of the conference is markedly smaller than currently envisaged

As someone who's pre-registered, you'll have a few weeks to pay for your full ticket (or pay the first of four monthly instalments, at no additional cost), before the general public is given the chance to buy tickets. We're planning to book a venue that will hold not many more people than have pre-registered, because venue costs rise sharply with delegate numbers. The potential strategy of booking larger venues in the hope of attracting many more additional delegates is too risky. In plain English:

> If you want to be sure of attending ICMI16, you have only three days left to pre-register.

You can pre-register (£22) here.

I must repeat again that you should not make any travel or accommodation commitments until and unless we announce that the conference is definitely going ahead, which will be after we've signed a contract with a venue. For one thing, it may be that the dates of the conference will change, although we'll do all in our power to minimise the risk of that happening.

Once we've settled on the venue, we'll be embarking on research to track down affordable local accommodation, to keep your bills down.

I hope to meet many of you at the conference. It's going to be something special…

Ask Anne Claude: Advice for the Red Pill reader

Anne Claude · 3 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Hello my lovelies.

I've been a long time fan of AVFM as well as a teacher; with my recent suspension from answering questions on Quora, and the departure of Emily "Dear Prudence" Yoffe from Slate in favor of a younger model, I feel like it is time for me to bring my counselling efforts to the fore in a place where feminism does not hold sway. You can still ask me to answer questions on Quora but I may not be allowed to answer there, so AVFM permitting, I'll try to answer them here in future columns if I can.

Oh, and the limericks? Just skip over them if you find them annoying. I still write them because they capture a playfulness and risqué vibe that feminists wish to destroy in society so that ladies nary take offence.

Let's get to it, then.

Dear Anne Claude –

Do women tend to find receiving sympathy more emotionally soothing than men do, and if so, what is the reason for this? I've noticed that it seems to be more common for women to bring up the topic of how they were mistreated in the past and had a lot of disturbing stuff happen to them. I wonder if this is because they have more trouble getting over it, or because they thrive off of the sympathy they receive in a way that men usually don't.

Signed, Hugs from Quora

Dear Hugs,

I feel that both men and women can find sympathy to be soothing but men face gendered social approbation in situations where sympathy is offered to them that simply does not happen to women. Women find emotional support when they display weakness, and men find contempt when they admit to weakness. This double standard makes it seem that women embrace victimhood while men seek to get past it as soon as possible.

This leads to an impossible choice: to bring about gender equality, should we toughen up women, or soften men?

For example, consider shelters for victims of domestic violence. 99% of domestic violence shelters cater to women only and reject men as clients, even though both men and women experience domestic violence is roughly equal amounts. This exclusion of male victims from support is because men are expected to "man up" to adversity, whereas a "damsel in distress" gets first priority from both men and women. Feminists openly laugh at the idea that men can be victims of women, and because feminists hold all men responsible for "patriarchy," they carry a strong and invincible contempt for men and believe that men deserve whatever misfortune befalls them.

Even on those rare occasions when feminists speak to men's issues, as Emma Watson did in her "HeForShe" speech to the United Nations, no promise is made to men that their issues will be addressed. Indeed, both the "HeForShe" label and their on-line pledge promise to fight only for women's issues, and ignore men's completely.

A ddffy young witch out of Hogwarts,
Tried getting her hands on some men's shorts,
"I'll give blokes a mention
And pretend to attention,
When they pledge, I'll have them to extort!"

Dear Anne Claude –

What do feminists think is the cause of the high divorce rate?

Signed, Responsible Adult from Quora

Dear RAQ,

All feminists (99.9% or more) believe that "patriarchy" (rule of the fathers) is the cause of all the negative things in the world, so, if the feminist in question sees divorce as a bad thing, the odds are close to one hundred percent that she will blame "patriarchy" as a proxy for blaming men – in this case, for divorce, despite the fact that 2/3 of the people who file for divorce are women. Blaming the "patriarchy" in this case is a political ploy to deflect criticism from the ways that feminism has created skyrocketing levels of divorce since the rise of the 2nd wave feminism in the 1960s.

Under the myth of the patriarchy, women are never responsible for anything, or indeed, for any part of the civilization that men built for us. How could we be held responsible (or get any credit) for building society? We can't be because we were too oppressed by men to help! Feminists systematically sanitize history of all references to women's contributions because acknowledging the importance of women's and men's partnerships interferes with the feminist narrative that all women have been oppressed by men (patriarchy) throughout all time.

Because feminists recognize that male-female partnerships like marriage spoil their narrative, not all feminists see divorce as a bad thing. Feminists place women's conveniences ahead of the welfare of both children and husbands, so the fanciful joys of "freeing" a woman from marriage via divorce or spinsterhood take priority over the well-established deleterious effect divorce has on husbands' lives and children's futures. Our prisons are crammed full of people who were raised by single mothers but since most of these prisoners are minority men, it is acceptable to dispose of their lives so that women are allowed to shirk parental and marital responsibilities that used to be a marker of adulthood. You can see an example of this feminist attitude in the YouTube video "10 Hours of Walking in NYC as a Woman," in which feminists portrayed their contempt for minority men who dare to greet them in public.

Feminist Meghan Murphy wrote in xoJane that: It seems that if women were truly "embracing feminism," they'd reject such an unnecessary tradition [marriage] so firmly rooted in sexist practices and ideas. While you can't guarantee commitment or "till death do us part," you can guarantee is that marriage, over time, has harmed women more than it's helped them.

Murphy's claim that a lifetime of financial and emotional support between husbands and wives is somehow harmful to women is one that I find doubtful at best, especially considering that women live longer and happier lives than men, but her notion does explain why feminists are so blasé about divorce rates.

Of course, feminism is itself the reason why you can't guarantee commitment – "women's liberation" from their own freely-given wedding vows and "no fault" divorce laws make it legally painless for women to ignore their pledges of sexual fidelity and yet still harvest their husbands' money through alimony, spousal support, and child support payments that are more likely to fund a "girl's night out" than put food in the kids' bellies.

For such feminists, divorce is like the pain of an ear-piercing that, while momentarily unpleasant, lets you wear all sorts of stylish earrings that you can change as often as you change sexual hookups, all the while laughing at the poor patriarch you duped, who still has to send you a monthly check even though you are giving him nothing in return.

This is why about 80% of women reject "feminist" as a label – we are keenly aware of how feminism makes us look bad by denying women the right and responsibility to make and keep adult commitments, while feminists are stocking "safe spaces" for women with coloring books.

There once was a lady of Letters,
Who got rid of all of man's fetters,
"I spend all my time,

In coloring and rhyme,
While ex-hubby works hard for his betters!"

On Family Court induced separation and parental alienation: My answers to The Daily Surge reporter's questions.

Gary Trieste · 3 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I was recently interviewed by a reporter from the Daily Surge investigating my custody case, and all of the illegal abuses I have suffered from the local Ulster County, NY CPS and family court system for exposing their corruption to the world.

My interview was accompanied by many documents and videos that I handed over to the reporter, but the question and answer portion is illuminating, and it went as follows:

—

DS: How does it make you feel to be separated from your daughter like this?

It is horrible. I have had to compartmentalize my normal daily operating existence, since I have to deal with people in my day-to-day life.

I have to put my continuing angst, outrage and sadness aside to operate normally.

It was VERY hard at the beginning, but now after all these years, it is much like reaching the fifth stage of grief and I am reaching some kind of closure in recognizing my child was taken away from me, I will never get back the childhood growth time she went through as her parent and mentor and friend. We are almost strangers now, as I only see her ~ once a month for 40 minutes. She is now 12 years old, and I last had any real father/child relationship with her when she was 7 years old.

Our relationship and attachment was rendered asunder for NO REASON. The senselessness and the destruction of a father and daughter's relationship make it all the more irksome.

Essentially the government, mostly instantiated in the form of an authoritarian family court judge, has taken sides and empowered my daughter's mother to simply do what she wants without a trial or due process — and that is to remove me from our daughter's life. This is done at the point of a gun, because if I were to try to see or contact my daughter, I would be arrested by the police and sanctioned by the court with fines, imprisonment and complete loss of custody and contact of my child. The trial has been going on for three years under these conditions.

The sense of loss is very real and the uselessness and capriciousness of such a government action against an innocent citizen, totally callous to the pain and suffering it has caused, strikes deep to very meaning of life and living as a human being.

DS: Why do you think these officials treat you like a second class citizen?

This is a multifaceted answer to a single question . . .

First, it is because I am father in family court, the mother is the unofficially favored litigant in family court.

So with my first step made in family court I was already swimming upstream just to stay in place.

Without saying it, I was presumed to be wrong and I was on the defensive even when there was nothing to defend against. Just presumptively pigeonholed as suspect and at the ready to be dealt with for whatever was made up along the way.

All the reasons, history and facts that were easily proved showing I was a good dad were put into a provisional light and were treated as if it was possible, but actually dismissible as a matter of course.

On the contrary, all things that were alleged against me but not proven or even provable were taken as presumptively true.

This was the official attitude and approach from all the workers and agencies across the board: family court, guardian ad litem (in NY Attorney for the Child), county mental health dept, CPS, assigned evaluators, etc.

By the time whatever was resolved as true or not came about, there had been months of being treated that way as if true, upon the presumptions and allegations alone. That has an inertia of treatment and attitude that doesn't stop, even when the official inquiry does.

Finally, I think the reason why they were harsher in treating me than usual, is that I would not take on the role they had predestined for me, I would not kowtow to their assembly line process of treating fathers as second class litigants.

I had taken the position of presumptive equality and of full knowledge of what my federal parenting rights were, as well as other presumptive civil rights.

I refused to hire attorneys and went pro se (self-represented), and litigated like a zealous advocate for my side, using all the tools that the law provides, which also irked them as it took them out of their comfort zone. They were not used to dealing with contingencies of the law that were in place but rarely used by the local clan of attorneys.

I also sensed they felt that money I saved going pro se, was being deprived of their local bar guild.

They did not expect this level of advocacy and didn't expect a pro se litigant to know much — they were used to manipulating pro se litigants by exploiting their ignorance, and got a thrill when they could undermine a pro se's efforts with technical procedural defects, yet they would repeatedly give a pass to the same or more fundamental defects made by the local attorneys.

I might add that I had legal background in paralegal practice and my legal submissions were always top-rate, whereas the other attorneys had sloppy, inconsistent and often systemically defective motions and practices (breaking court rules and standards, etc). But again, they would cite me for errors that did not exist and allow the other attorneys to violate the rules.

Basically I made them think, actually work and revisit what they were fundamentally there for. That made them uncomfortable.

And of course, later when they dealt with me more aggressively for things that were not even within their authority to question, I similarly responded as aggressively back; e.g. suing them in federal court, invoking my legal rights, exposing their actions to the world.

And that above all I believe is why they are treating me most harshly and literally punishing me by removing my daughter from me.

They do not care about a child not having a father, which is completely secondary to their concerns.

DS: How does the system benefit from separating you from your daughter?

Retribution against a recalcitrant citizen who will not follow their edicts, irrespective of whether they are wrong or not, is their primary concern; to make an example so that nobody will be encouraged to maintain their rights or independent authority.

Also the state gets equal matching funds from the federal government, for every child support payment that is made within the state. It behooves them to give custody, on the average, to the parent that will receive the most child support from the other parent. This is generally the financially poorer parent and generally the mother.

I also believe that although the tender year's doctrine (the presumption that a mother should have custody of young children) has been eliminated from our laws, the mindset and policy actions of the administrators of the system still mostly follow that presumption.

DS: When was the last time you saw her? Please send or resend last visitation order.

I most recently saw my daughter yesterday (~ in Oct 2015), for 40 minutes, at a fee cost of $150.

I can share with you some videos I recently posted to YouTube that shows what my fantastic little girl is actually like. It is clear that my daughter is neither retarded, autistic nor psychotic as she is being represented in court, and everywhere else:

This one was in 2011:

And this one was more recently in 2013:

It is also clear that she does not fear me, and actually wants far more time with me to do things outside of their fishbowl.

I say these things because that is the official stance her mother is taking in custody court, in order to try to win custody.

The fact that I disagree with all of those things is being used to show that I am delusional as to the mental health of our daughter.

And yet it is clear that she is none of those things.

I might add, what was also interesting, was that I shared with her there several campaign flyers relating to my currently running for Town Justice of Woodstock, and she looked at me with wonder in her eyes, like a revelation had occurred.

She said, “But Daddy, how can you become a judge when they won’t even let me see you, and they say you are a bad man who shouldn’t be alone with me? A judge is never like that!”

I told her that all those things they said to her about me being bad, or dangerous to her was nonsense and that it was just something they were doing to take us away from each other.

It was clear that she was just beginning to see the true light of what was happening, and all the lies she had been told about me.

DS: How has this custody affected your life, stability, and livelihood?

I cannot go to festivals or most events because I think of my daughter and the times we are missing together.

I cannot go to the places we used to frequent together and fun together at, because I am reminded of her and her non-presence.

I have lost clients who became aware of allegations against me, even though later completely disproved.

I spend about 25% of my time litigating or thinking about litigation, as I still am going pro se in a number of related cases against the county (I am now represented by counsel in the family court trial).

I am still in custody trial litigation, which started in July 2013 and is scheduled into March 2016.

There is a speedy trial law in NY on custody trials that mandates that no custody trial is to go beyond 90 days, but they have made mine last three years so far with no provisions made for any substantive contact with my daughter all this time. That is argument #3 in the appellate brief I have attached.

There is no way I can get granted custody when the court itself has skewed the facts of the case — no contact with the child is a significant factor in determining final custody.

DS: If you wanted to publicly tell your daughter something, what would it be?

I am restrained currently from all contact with her. I would be in violation of a court order subject to contempt. I can go to jail for just hugging my daughter, or even telling her I love her.

However, if I did not have that restraint, I would tell her that I love her and that all the things they have told her about me are untrue, that the conditions we see each other under for the last are not indicative of any danger from me.

I would also would like her to know and see all the things I done, said, written, litigated, created groups for and exposed corruption of, and campaigned unceasingly in order to get her back into my life and mine into her life.

I would very much like to tell her that her attorney is misrepresenting her wishes in court and is advocating the exact opposite of what she wants.

(This is malpractice I might add, and there may be lawsuit for that if I can ever let her know what is going on)

I want her to know that we should not be apart and that it just wrong for us to have been separated for years like this.

DS: Give me a direct reaction to the video of the case worker chastising you over a Coke, and how did she use that against you in court?

Do you mean a reaction by them, or by me?

As far as their reaction, the timeline was such that I had released the video about two years after it happened, because I was in litigation fighting their charges of emotional neglect against me, which I eventually won. I did not want to complicate those proceedings with the inflammatory occurrences taking place in that video until it was over.

However, when it was first released there was some uproar, and an attempt was made to get it removed from YouTube, as a violation of privacy of the social workers, and then a violation of my daughter's HIPAA privacy, then some other various excuses. However YouTube did not remove it.

The video has been referenced numerous times now against me in my custody trial proceedings as a basis to deny me custody and to denigrate me as a parent, on a claim of showcasing our custody proceedings and as a demonstration of how I care more about activism than I do about parenting and any other number of some such nonsense.

It continues to be a thorn in their side and I truly believe that because I have shown the world what corruption they have done and how they operate, a phone call was made directing judicial decision makers in my case that in no way to allow me custody or visitation, and to punish me for revealing their behavior.

Feminists want emotional computers

AVfM Video Source · 3 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

… and the taxpayers are paying for this!

With a mixture of satire and reporting, Lucian Vâlsan covers this mind-boggling story.

You can subscribe to Lucian's Freedom Alternative, here.

The New Sex Ed

AVfM Video Source · 3 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Zen Men @ KSU continues its work with a lecture by Sage Gerard tackling false rape allegations.

Please subscribe to Victor Zen for more videos and activism.

Dr. Aaron Jesin placed on genital mutilators directory

Gary Costanza · 4 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Aaron Jesin of The Jesin Circumcision Clinic is a family physician and Mohel who does ritual orthodox and non-ritual circumcision. His biography at drjesin.com:

"About Dr. Aaron Jesin:
Mohel since 1978.
Performed over 10,000 circumcisions.
Studied under Rabbi Dr. Yehuda Eliezri and Dr. Isidore Cass.
Certified byVaad HaRabbonim of Toronto by Rabbi Gedalya Felder zt'l.

Received Hon. Bachelor of Science from University of Toronto in 1973
Graduate of University of Western Ontario medical school 1977
Rotating internship St. Joseph's Hospital, London , Ontario 1977/78
Year I medical resident University of Western Ontario 1978/79
General Practice since 1979"

Click on the happy (circumcised?) baby to get this greeting:

> Welcome to The Jesin Circumcision Clinic
> For those who have made a conscious decision in favour of circumcision, whether based on cultural, ethnic, religious or medical grounds, this Clinic offers an efficient and sensitive procedure to circumcise your male infants and newborns.

Unfortunately, the baby isn't one of "those who have made a conscious decision." Routine circumcision – genital mutilation, actually – of babies, male or female, is unethical without consent. Of the infant, that is.

The rest of the information on his website is overwhelmingly pro-circumcision, with only a hint of risk at "Circumcision Aftercare" where "bleeding" and "infection" is mentioned one time each.

Under "Why Circumcise" we read "The religions of Islam and Judaism require circumcision," and that "Medical considerations are numerous" such as prevention of penile cancer, urinary tract infections, and transmission of STDs, all of which have been debunked or are irrelevant (see 'soap and water,' 'condoms,' and 'very rare cancer').

"Circumcision Protocol" lists these items:

> 1. The circumcision is easier on the baby the younger they are. As the child ages, their physiology, anatomy and neurology also matures. In order to entice parents to bring in their newborn earlier, our clinic has a fluctuating price incentive for the procedure. The best rate is given for a newborn up to 4 weeks of age. The cost rises each 4 weeks thereafter.

It may be easier on the doctor, but there is no evidence that it is any easier on the infant, and on the contrary there is evidence that this surgery on newborns results in a greater sensitivity to pain in adulthood.

> 2. To distract the baby during the actual circumcision, we ask parents to bring along a pacifier and a small container of sugar water (made by boiling water and saturating with sugar). By offering the pacifier dipped into the sugary solution, the hungry baby will often suck happily on the pacifier oblivious to the procedure as it is being performed.

This is a 'feel-good' gimmick that mostly works to alleviate guilt for parents and circumcisers, not pain in babies getting mutilated. No source listed for the efficacy of sugar-water coated pacifiers as an anesthetic.

> 3. Parents will be given the choice of arriving 1 hour and 10 minutes before the scheduled procedure, in which case we will supply and put on EMLA or another local analgesic cream that should reduce pain during the procedure. Otherwise, the parents can purchase and put on the analgesic cream on the penile area themselves. The cream should be applied one hour before the procedure. Our office will explain where it is applied (below the shaft of the penis on the belly side) and it is then covered with plastic wrap to prevent absorption into the diaper and enhance absorption into the skin.

So, a stranger fondling your boys penis is a bad thing that should land the offender in jail and on a sex offender list, but if the stranger is a doctor and that person also mutilates that penis, that's a good thing, despite no medical justification and that it cures no disease and treats no abnormality.

The medicirc.org link to more info doesn't work, but under "Medical Benefits of Circumcision" are wildly pro-circumcision, radical, mostly non-sourced, and very old posts relating to just a handful of pro-circ advocates. Just one example:

> Uncircumcised Men Harbor More Bacteria
> A recent study of immigrant MEN to Israel showed the uncircumcised men harbor more bacteria in the intact foreskin, including more microbes for sexually transmitted diseases, including the AIDS virus.
> There were higher amounts of urinary tract infection bacteria in 17 percent of men with foreskins and 4 percent of circumcised men. That 17 to 4% seems to be pretty standard for all sorts of bacteria on the end of penises – so those women when suffer from various infections had best have their male sex partners treated, or better yet, married or not, made to use a condom unless they're trying to get pregnant and then make sure he sees a doctor REGULARLY.
> Contrary to the brainwashing women have gotten regarding the "purity" of men's peni and their sperm – ignoring the fact that men handle their penises with dirty hands because few men wipe or wash their hands BEFORE and spread hand to penis infection/dirt to their precious reason for living. They seldom wash > afterwards either.

> It is fact that the peni is often the transmitters of bacteria that can cause women great harm and even death in unprotected sex.

No source listed for "men handle their penises with dirty hands because few men wipe or wash their hands BEFORE and spread hand to penis infection/dirt to their precious reason for living." Is that a scientific term? Hopefully something got lost in the translation.

Under "Mohel Humour" there's this not-so-humorous (but telling) entry:

> Q: What is the technical term for an uncircumcised Jew who is more than 8 days old?
> A: A girl.

See Dr. Jesin on "Mensch Life TV" in 2011 discussing "The Circumcision War" where he states:

…'babies have free choice, but we must skew that free choice'…

…'female genital mutilation is mutilation and wrong, but male genital mutilation is just circumcision'…

…'why let people have all these choices?'…

Dr. Jesin has been dogged by controversy over his continued ritual circumcisions which involve using the mouth (or mouth with tube which Jesin claims to use now exclusively) to suck the blood off the mutilated penis, a practice that has harmed infants, sometimes fatally, by infecting them with herpes. Performing this surgery in a non-medical setting as he does, even with the tube, has extraordinary risks for infection with herpes and other diseases. He strongly believes that religion requires this mutilation. He also tries to paint intactivists as anti-semitic and attempts to discredit them and their motives. Here's a recent story about the controversy, here's another, and here's some interesting correspondence between intactivists, the public, and the Canadian medical establishment.

Since Dr. Jesin has incomplete information about the risks to your child, you can research that here at neonatalcutting.org.

His practice information follows:

4256 Bathurst St. Suite 203
Toronto, Ont. M3H 5Y8
Telephone: (416) 635-5012

What's a Mother to Do?

Doug Mortimer · 4 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I gave up on my local newspaper a long time ago. The column inches have shrunk even as the price of the daily paper has crept up to $1.50 daily and $3.00 Sunday. The local fishwrap now costs more than a fish taco at Long John Silver's. I say go with the fish taco.

My avoidance of the local press is also a matter of principle, as paying for mainstream news is tantamount to sleeping – well, maybe catnapping – with the enemy. On the other hand, when someone leaves behind a free Sunday paper for me to browse through while I'm eating lunch…well, if I'm in the mood, I might deign to scan the contents.

A recent lunchtime perusal of the "free press" revealed a syndicated story by one Shirley Leung, a scribbler for the Boston Globe. Her article was entitled "Let's Be Honest About the Double Standard for Working Moms." By all means, let's be honest. Wouldn't have it any other way, Shirley baby.

Leung recounts the story of a 34-year-old lawyer who went back to work four days after giving birth even though her firm had a three-month maternity leave policy.

Then the author offers another example, namely Marissa Mayer, Yahoo CEO, who returned to work a few weeks after giving birth and asserted she would be doing the same after her next pregnancy, involving twins by the way.

Speaking of twins, we are also offered the example of a former Massachusetts governor, Jane Swift, who gave birth to twins one month after taking office in 2001.

Then there is the story of another beleaguered lawyer, a 39-year-old partner at a Boston firm. She had three months of leave coming to her after giving birth to her third child, but she decided to go back to work after 10 days. Her husband wasn't happy about it for obvious reasons. Her female colleagues didn't approve because they thought it sent a message to younger female lawyers that they were slackers if they took their full maternity leave. Worst of all, her sister – and you know how powerful sisterhood is – criticized her decision.

Egad, what a burden to bear! I don't know how the poor dear can stand it. After all, everyone knows how shy, sensitive and unassertive those Boston law firm partners are.

Finally, Leung provides the clincher, yet another marriage in Boston (can't use the term "Boston marriage" since that's a euphemism for a lesbian couple) involving one Bettina Hein, founder and CEO of Pixabilitiy, who went back to work just three weeks after giving birth yet continued to nurse her son for 14 months!

Now Bettina Hein wasn't charging back and forth from the office to her home to nurse the kid, or risking carpal tunnel syndrome by churning away on a breast pump. You see, "The nanny often takes the kids into the office….[Hein] had a nursery added to her office at Yahoo."

What a simple yet elegant solution! Can't understand why secretaries, receptionists, and all the other female factotums in her office don't follow that advice when they have babies.

Let's pause and review what we've learned to this point.

These women wanted high-powered careers.

Check. They asked for it, they got it.

These women wanted to be mothers.

Check. They asked for it, they got it.

These women wanted maternity leave built into corporate policy.

Check. They asked for it, they got it.

So what's the problem?

Well, it seems some people don't approve of the decisions these women have made. Some people think they're short-shrifting their children; other people think they're short-shrifting their jobs. In other words, people are being judgmental! Of course that happens only to strong, independent women and rarely to their lesser sisters – and never to men!

As Shirley Leung says, "Let's all be honest about what this is: a double standard by any measure. . .. New fathers routinely return to work immediately after the birth of their children, but women who choose to do the same catch flak."

Well, I suspect few men would give a damn about a choice made by some other man's wife. But there are a number of reasons why women might look askance at these decisions made by alpha females. I'm guessing it's largely because most women want to bond with that little bundle of protoplasm they've been carrying around for nine months and they can't help but wonder about a woman who feels otherwise. That female herd instinct tends to work against mavericks.

Then there's the whole nursing thing. Many feminists assert that men suck, but even they would have to admit that men do not give suck. Sticking a male nipple in an infant's mouth is not likely to result in pacification. Said infant would likely react like a wildcatter who realizes he's been working a dry hole.

Frankly, I could care less if the above women go full-time mom, hire a baby-sitter, drop the kid at a day-care center, dump the kid at grandma's place, or give it up for adoption. I would draw the line at infanticide, but that's just me being judgmental.

Even for the Boston elite, life is filled with dilemmas. They have far more options than their less affluent peers, but the poor darlings can't find anyone to give them a pat on the back.

It takes a lot of hubris to expect everyone to support you in whatever decision you make. Remember that old maxim about it being a woman's prerogative to change her mind? Gotta make sure the response is always "You go, girl." Change your mind, go in the opposite direction, "You go, girl." Go up, go down, go left, go right, go north, go south, go east, go west. The only acceptable response is, "You go, girl."

Now if you're a man and you not only had the freedom to do as you chose and you had your choice subsidized by your employer and the state, wouldn't that be enough? Would you really give a damn whether or not anyone else supported your decision? It's like winning a contest where the prize is a chauffeur-driven limousine ferrying you and a guest to the most expensive restaurant in town for a couple of free meals and then bitching because the deal doesn't cover the tip.

Leung asserts, "A little less judgment and a little more support would go a long way." With this one assertion, she shows what a waste of time it is to attempt to satisfy women. Even with the gynocentrism express highballing it through every metropolis and whistlestop of society, the mantra remains, "We have a long way to go." But the timetable doesn't reveal a final destination. It's a runaway train!

Even if we could banish judgmentalism, the Boston blue bloods would find some other peccadillo to complain about. I can't help but recall my late mother's customary response to my childish complaints: "What do you want? An egg in your beer?"

At any rate, sure glad I didn't pay $3.00 for that newspaper. Articles like Shirley Leung's remind me of why I gave up on the press. I detest whining even when it's in print and I can turn the page.

The article does offer confirmation of the oft-made observation that feminism is largely the province of the well-to-do. As F. Scott Fitzgerald remarked, the rich are different, though few would respond with vive la différence.

But I do feel their pain to some extent. How could I remain indifferent to the plight of high-powered women forced to interview candidates for nannies?

Good help is so hard to find.

Amnesty International Betrays Their Own Cause

AVfM Video Source · 4 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Amnesty international betrays their cause with Mike Buchanan and J4MB with their summary rejection of a venue for men's rights. Paul discusses the failure of Amnesty International and these latest revelations.

Help Paul reach 18k subs for Christmas! Sub here.

ICMI16, London – do you want to be sure of attending? Then you'll need to pre-register (£22) in the next 24 hours

Mike Buchanan · 5 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

We're delighted with the number of people who have pre-registered for ICMI16, many in the past couple of days. There are now less than 24 hours to go before the deadline of 22:00 GMT tomorrow, and this will be our final reminder.

A link to the conference announcement is here. You can pre-register (it costs only £22.00) here, using PayPal or credit/debit cards. Please email me (mike@j4mb.org.uk) if you experience any difficulty making a payment.

We plan to book a venue with a capacity slightly above the number of people who pre-register, so if you want to be sure of attending ICMI16, you need to pre-register.

Key points:

1. The fee will be refunded in full if the conference is cancelled, or a substantially smaller conference planned. The fee will be deductible from all ticket prices including the Early Bird Discount (£225.00), and the full ticket price (£265.00). The fee will not be refunded if the conference goes ahead broadly as planned.

2. Pre-registration places you under no legal obligation to buy a ticket for ICMI16.

3. Depending on the size of the venue, which is itself dependent on the number of pre-registrations, only those who have pre-registered by the deadline will be assured of a place at ICMI16, and only if they have booked and taken up one of the three payment options for their conference ticket by 22:00 GMT 31 December. One payment option is to pay for your ticket in four successive monthly instalments, starting in December. This option is not available for Early Bird Discount tickets.

4. We are planning to make this a ticketed event, and don't plan to sell tickets during the conference.

5. Any surplus tickets will go on sale to the general public on 1 January.

6. It is important that you do not book travel or accommodation until a final decision has been made that the conference will proceed, and the venue and conference dates announced on this website.

A final point. Some people have expressed concern at the cost of accommodation in London. In the coming few months we'll be investigating options for lower cost accommodation near the final chosen venue, e.g. student accommodation, or hotels further out from central London with good transport connections (including minibuses), and publishing details on this website.

Best wishes,

Mike Buchanan

Dr. Zuhair Zarifa of London, England placed on genital mutilators directory

Gary Costanza · 5 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

From Dr. Zarifa's website circumcisions.co.uk:

"Male Circumcision for All Ages

Many parents want their sons to be circumcised for health & hygiene, personal, social, cultural and religious reasons. Adult men also frequently perceive there are hygienic and sexual advantages to circumcision and choose to undergo the procedure for these reasons, often at the request of their wife or partner. The need to be circumcised can also arise when entering into another faith where it is obligatory.

Unfortunately, male circumcision is not available on the National Health Service unless there are pressing medical problems with the foreskin. Even then, the waiting lists can be very long, with consequent difficulty of discretely arranging time off work or school.

Dr. Zarifa, a qualified community-based surgeon, and a Fellow of The Royal College of Surgeons, is very experienced in this procedure. He understands patients' concerns and offers the operation in a modern treatment room which has full air conditioning and sterilising routines for equipment and instruments."

That's all the biographical information we get on Dr. Zarifa, which is puzzling. Maybe just an oversight?

As to a religion or partner that's asking/requiring someone to amputate a part of their body – I'd say to reevaluate that partner or religion.

There are no known "sexual advantages" to circumcision so why mention that 'men frequently perceive' this as an advantage?

On the contrary, infant circumcision – genital mutilation – always results in scarring and bleeding, with many complications possible, including death.

Glad to see the NHS doesn't pay for this unethical ELECTIVE surgery, however Dr. Zarifa, despite saying he "understands patients' concerns," forgets the most important patient, the infant, who gets no say.

In Dr. Zarifa's leaflet under "Babies" we read:

> If you want your son to be circumcised it is best to do it as early in his life as possible. An infant circumcision is simpler, usually requires no stitching and heals very quickly with proper care.
>
> Circumcising a baby boy also has the advantage that he has no fear in anticipation nor memory of it afterwards. As he grows up with a circumcised penis it will seem natural to him and he will never need to face the procedure or make the adjustment of having it suddenly looking and feeling different as happens with a later operation.

So, better to sneak up on the baby early, hoping the psychological trauma will be forgotten or buried. Forget that sex ed stuff, that's for girls, let's fool boys into thinking their circumcised penis is the normal one. Or how about we leave the penis intact, like normal.

This under “Boys:”

> After making an appointment for your son’s circumcision and a short time before he attends, you need to explain to him what will happen, why it is being done and that afterwards his penis will look and feel strange.
>
> Avoid communicating any personal anxieties but try to be positive and encouraging in what you tell him. Much will depend on your son’s age, but keep your explanation simple and, especially if your son is very young, do not use alarming words like ‘cut’. It is enough to say something like; ‘his skin will be pushed back’ or ‘fixed’ so the tip of his penis is exposed and gets washed every time he has a bath. Do explain why it will be better for him to be like that.

Why lie to your child if he won’t accept it because it’s not medically necessary? Not ethical. And do tell us “why it will be better for him to be like that.”

Under “Men” there is “Re-do circumcision:”

> Custom House Surgery has also been able to assist those who have been circumcised earlier in life and are unhappy with the result. Re-do circumcisions are often performed to remove excess foreskin left from a previous operation.
>
> Those seeking a re-do circumcision may find their earlier surgery limits Dr Zarifa’s scope for remedial work. Ambitions may not be attainable simply because there is insufficient remaining tissue from the previous circumcision.

Seems a re-do circumcision is a complication of the first circumcision. No circumcision, no re-do circumcision.

Speaking of complications, Dr. Zarifa has no information on his website regarding risks or complications of neonatal circumcision. See the research here at neonatalcutting.org.

His practice information follows:

Custom House Surgery
16 Freemasons Road
Custom House, London E16 3NA
Telephone 020 7474 7684
Fax 020 7511 8980

The Fiamengo File, Episode 13

Steve Brulé · 5 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

“Can we be honest about equality?” Janice Fiamingo discusses the topic of women in the military with an intellectual honesty seldom seen in Feminist circles.

Amnesty International isn't concerned about the human rights of men and boys

Mike Buchanan · 5 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The deadline for pre-registering for the 2016 International Conference on Men's Issues is 22:00 GMT on Sunday, 6 December – just four days away. You can pre-register here, to be sure of the opportunity to attend the conference (by later paying for a ticket, £225 – £265, less the pre-registration fee, before the end of December). It costs just £22.00 to pre-register, and you won't be making a commitment to later buy a conference ticket.

If you need a compelling reason to attend the conference, this should be it. Amnesty International, the leading campaigning organization in the world for human rights, is concerned about the human rights of women and girls, but not the human rights of men and boys.

We're still in the process of researching venues for the conference, and one venue that appeared perfect is the Human Rights Action Centre, run by Amnesty International. I sent an enquiry, asking for the booking terms, and received the following response:

> Hi Mike,
>
> Our Terms and Conditions are a part of the booking form.
>
> Unfortunately, the Justice for Men and Boys' message seems incompatible with our very public campaigns specifically for women's human rights here. As you will see from our terms and conditions, we are not able to accommodate any organisation that goes against AIUK's ethos.
>
> As such, we will not be able to accommodate your event at the Human Rights Action Centre and wish you all the best with your venue search.
>
> Kind regards,
>
> <name redacted>

I replied:

> Thank you, but your rejection of J4MB as a potential client is based on a profound misunderstanding.
>
> We are not against women's human rights, but we are for the human rights of men and boys.
>
> In the UK, men's and boys' human rights are assaulted by the actions and inactions of the state (in 20 areas at least, our manifesto is attached) while those of women and girls specifically are assaulted in NONE.
>
> In rejecting J4MB as a client, you are saying AIUK doesn't care about the human rights of half the population of the UK. How would that look, if the press got hold of the story? I would ask you to reconsider the matter, and I repeat my request to view the facilities on Wednesday, and if all is as I hope, to sign the booking form and pay the deposit there and then.
>
> Might I ask, was this your personal decision, or the decision of someone higher up the organization? If the latter, could I please have his/her contact details. Thank you.

I left a message for the lady to call me, and heard nothing. I wrote again:

> I should appreciate it if you have the courtesy of responding to the email I sent yesterday – the one with our election manifesto attached – and calling me. I hope you do so shortly, or one of your colleagues does.
>
> We've taken legal advice on your position, and we're informed it is clearly illegal under the Equality Act 2010. The Act requires equal treatment in access to employment as well as private and public services, regardless of the protected characteristics of age, disability, gender reassignment, marriage and civil partnership, race, > religion or belief, sex, and sexual orientation.

>
> I repeat my request for a meeting with you or colleagues tomorrow afternoon or early evening, and an inspection of your Auditorium and other facilities with a view to possibly placing a deposit for our conference in July next year. Could you please email me a proforma invoice with that in mind? We are looking for the following availability for at least the Auditorium and Conference room, and possibly one or two Action rooms.
>
> Thursday 7 July – evening
>
> Friday 8 July – all day
>
> Saturday 9 July – all day
>
> Sunday – all day
>
> We wish only to resolve this amicably and professionally, and we hope you're of a similar mind. Thank you.

She replied:

> Dear Mike,
>
> Apologies for the delay in getting back to you but I have been (and am still) working a conference and have limited access to my inbox.
>
> Unfortunately, we will not be able to accommodate your organisation within the Human Rights Action Centre.
>
> I must clarify that this is not because you campaign for the rights of men but because your organisation is explicitly anti-feminist whereas Amnesty International UK is explicitly a pro-feminist organisation.
>
> The building and all the work we do is paid for by our members and we have to be accountable to them. Our members would not approve of an anti-feminist organisation making use of our facilities for their own purposes.
>
> We wish you all the best with your venue search and we consider this matter to be at an end.
>
> Kind regards,
>
> <name redacted>

Seven deal breakers with women

AVfM Video Source · 6 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Equality: The draft should be equal too!

Rachael Lefler · 7 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Now, I know it's been in the news a lot lately, but I oppose compulsory military service for anyone. The state does not own people's bodies or their labor, the draft is, in my opinion, involuntary servitude and against the 13th amendment as such. The only reason it persists is that there is an assumption that is probably central to human nature that men are obligated to protect women and children at cost to themselves. This belief is found in most cultures and seems almost inescapable.

But if a draft is necessary for the survival of the country, I firmly believe that men and women should be drafted equally. Now that women have gained combat roles, there was talk in Congress about moving to make women also required to register with selective service (an Orwellian term if there ever were one, since the people being drafted didn't select shit!) I believed in this principle even back in high school, when I called myself a feminist. I believed that men and women together had to do their part to defend this country. And I'm glad that many people do and have.

Interestingly, I'm not seeing a lot of support for "equality" in terms of equal responsibility, from feminists. Surprise, surprise. Current feminism treats women like infants, saying that we deserve to be catered to round the clock every time we throw a tantrum, never have to clean up our own messes, and that we are fragile enough to need protections that men do not get. It's saying that it's a crying shame that women in country's they've never heard of, in towns they can't pronounce, oceans away, are practicing female genital cutting since its part of their culture, while turning a blind eye to the male genital cutting that is a part of this culture. And now, it's saying that women should get the honor of serving in combat roles in the armed forces, without the burden of women having to register for the draft the same as men. Once again we see the pattern of feminists focusing solely on women and ignoring men. If the draft is unfair, it's unfair to both sexes. If the draft is a necessary evil, it is also that to both sexes. Aren't you the ones claiming your movement is all for the equal rights of the sexes? What are you fighting for if not that?

One thing I've heard from a feminist (but I'm not sure exactly how common this sentiment is among feminists in general) is that women don't have enough political representation, and therefore, women don't have the say in the decision to go to war that men do. This is a very twisted way of thinking about the draft.

First of all, genitals do not make someone a representative of everyone else who happens to have the same kind of thing going on between their legs. Michelle Bachmann, Sarah Palin, and Hillary Clinton don't represent me or my political beliefs just because they happen to have vaginae, and to think so is just idiotic.

Second, even if there are not an equal number of men and women in Congress and there has not been a female President yet, that doesn't mean women in this country do not have any political voice. It's one person = one vote, so women as well as men voted for these politicians that are in power (and you all did such a wonderful job, I might add). Women also have even more power than men in terms of political protests; fewer people listen to, or give money for, social "activism" online and off that is by and for men than that which is by and for women. Women use their bodies to sell everything, including political opinions. They catch more attention when they play the victim. Nobody gives a damn when a man or group of men does that. They also make up a slight majority of voters, if you take into account that women are a slight majority in this country and that they live longer on average than men. This may not make a big difference, but if men were the majority of the voting public, it would be seen as "more proof of the patriarchy" and feminists would likely go on and on like a bunch of children acting like it must all be part of some evil plot to undermine all women.

But anyway, if you want to shut down opposition to your movement by saying "What, how can you be opposed to what we're doing, being a feminist just means you support equality!", but you do not support equality of the draft, you are seriously delusional. For all the times I've been told some variation of the lie "if you believe in women's equality with men, congratulations, you're already a feminist!", I have yet to see it be backed up by feminists supporting equality if that equality ever comes out to mean women getting shit on just as much as men. They're never going to en masse support “equality” of the number of men vs. women doing difficult, dangerous, degrading and outdoor jobs, including military service.

But they will continue to bitch about women at the top and their representation in the highest paid and most prestigious jobs, and they will fight for women to be allowed to obtain such jobs with rewritten rules that fix the game in their favor when applying for them. This isn’t equality, this is proof that what they’re really after is money, power, and prestige that they didn’t fucking earn. But maybe when we see an equal number of 18 year-old girls as 18 year-old boys getting their limbs blown off and coming home with the real kind of PTSD, we’ll not treat our armed forces so disrespectfully by plunging them into pointless wars that only serve the people who manufacture bullets. Maybe if more of our soldiers dying are female, people will start to actually fucking care about them.

RussianDeadPool has a hissy fit over accurate analogy…

Clint Carpentier · 7 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Brian Martinez at HoneyBadgerRadio interviewed TheSkeptic Feminist crew, in an overall laid back conversation. Of course, Brian is no journalist, but he certainly armed himself with super-padded spongy kid gloves for the occasion. Now, you can watch the whole interchange here but I'm gonna focus mainly on one issue.

However, before that, I'm gonna throw a cheap potshot. RussianDeadPool says his grandmother was a war hero, I won't argue this – even though he didn't provide a name for verification – because in times of major wars, Communist Russian had no bones about conscripting women to combat roles (Regiment 588 being one of them). However, everyone in the discussion had agreed that Russia had very stringent gender roles. RDP then said, "once they were done with her, they sent her back to the kitchen." He then followed it up, practically in the same breath, "she worked in a factory, lifting heavy beams; so I don't believe gender roles…" OMFG, I honestly don't know how to respond to this contradictory disconnect. Was it Russia or not? Was it societal or not? Make up your mind RDP.

So… the real topic at hand.

Brian made a reference to Feminism's unquestionable societal status being on par with the Catholicism. At this point, RDP lost his shit. How DARE Brian compare Feminism to an institutional group of child rapists; how dare he???!!!

Yeah, how dare he.

You know, at least the Catholic institution attempts to ignore the problem of having rapists among their leadership. The Feminist institution however, is persistent in it's attempt to change laws so as to accommodate rapists but only if said rapists are vagina owners.

Mary Koss – changed the definition of rape, so that only men could be rapists, and only women could be victims. IF perchance a man was raped, it is only because a MAN raped him; and of course, he just needs to 'man up" and "get over it."

Eve Ensler – writes about a lesbian encounter, acknowledging the possibility of a female rapist, but says, "if it was rape, it was a good rape."

Adele Mercier – argues that boys in juvenile halls can't be raped by their female guards, but rather, are having consensual sexual relations.

Due to the prevalence of female rapists whose victims are underage, Feminists are pushing to change the definition of Statutory Rape, to accommodate these vagina owning pedophiles. And the media rarely presents female rapists for what they are, choosing instead to present them as affairs, illicit romances, "age knows no bounds in love."

If you want a discussion on the definition of Statutory Rape, I am willing to entertain the notion; but ONLY… if the changes affect both genders in the same manner, that is, "equal in the eyes of the law." To do otherwise, is unjust, and feeds into discrimination.

Can the institution of Feminism be compared to Catholicism?

You're damned right it can. Not only does it ignore it's own rapists, it enables them, accommodates them, changes laws for them; and then turns around and changes the definition of rape to make any interaction between a man and a woman into rape, and actively obliterates due-process for the accused men. Have you not heard about stare rape, or catcalling? Feminism doesn't even care about actual rape victims (even when those victims – of men – are female); Feminism, just wants to own the dialogue on it.

I dare you, RussianDeadPool, to take the following list to the leading feminist branch of your choice, and investigate what they are doing about it.

#EndViolenceAgainstWomen – the fascist bigots who lie about violence & "protecting women"

Dean Esmay · 7 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Is there any level of dishonesty or bullying that feminists and their male Purse Dog allies won't stoop to? No, of course there isn't. They just need one or two examples of someone going over the top toward a feminist –in this case someone saying he hopes a bigot gets shot–will happily get people fired from their jobs, SWAT them, call employers to get them fired, get them falsely imprisoned, call in bomb and death threats, and more. But nobody cares what feminists actually do to hurt people, they care that some feminist somewhere heard mean words that offended her.

Over at Australia's ABC.net they are celebrating a secret group of fascist thugs. Noticeably, there is not a single instance of violence against women (or men) anywhere documented by ABC or by anyone in this group pretending to protect women while they demonize and harass men (and women) who think they're full of shit.

Indeed, the #endviolenceagainstwomen crew knows full well that they're lying. You need only read them to see that the only people acting like harassing bullies are they themselves. There has been no violence towards women for them to respond to; they are only responding to rude comments, and even when they give examples it's clear that those examples are taken out of any context that would explain what caused them to receive rude remarks.

So let's be clear: feminists lie about violence against women for power, and in order to be sadistic. Whenever a feminist says 'violence against women" what she means is 'anyone who ever offended me as a woman,' and further, by 'ending' the offense, what they mean is 'silencing dissent and mocking."

Here are some recent examples of the #EndViolenceAgainstWomen fascists attempting to get men hurt for saying rude things:

Tweet
Miri B
@USArmy is he really who who want representing you?
#endviolencesagainstwomen
twitter.com/sarahjacobs22/...

mobile.twitter.com
Tweet
Sarah Jacobs
Nick Blankenship has open fb profile bit.ly/1lyYsCG and works for @USArmy
#endviolencesagainstwomen
pic.twitter.com/WkJztCHYjW

So let's be clear what this is really about: finding anyone who criticized feminism, or criticized a feminist, and used rude language, in order to get them banned, fired from their jobs, and more.

The fact that the ABC would so uncritically accept the word of these censoring, bullying thugs practicing fascist censorship in the name of "ending violence" is disappointing but not surprising. It appears that in this day and age all you have to do is claim you're protecting women, and this gives you license to hurt anyone in any way you want.

We say feminism is a violent, bullying, censoring, female-privileging supremacist hate movement for a reason; because the very act of offending a feminist is enough, in their view, to destroy you.

If ever proof was needed that the #EndViolenceAgainstWomen hashtag, it would be this response I got from feminists on the tag trying to justify their witch hunt for non-existent threats. I asked for an example of the "violence against women" they want to end, and was given this by a defender of feminist bullying, harassment, and censorship:

Yes ladies and gentlemen, that's right: saying "go kill yourself" is the worst example anyone can think of other than one guy saying "I hope you get shot."

If we ever needed proof that feminism is intellectually and morally bankrupt, and that it lies endlessly about phony epidemics of "violence against women," we need look no further than the credulous reporting of the #EndViolenceAgainstWomen hashtag and those running it, advocating censorship and harassment in the name of "ending" violence that does not exist.

Rabbi Michael Henesch of Washington D.C.

Gary Costanza · 8 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

From Rabbi Henesch's website mysonsbris.com:

"Rabbi Michael Henesch is a certified Mohel who has been sharing his unique ability of blending education and ceremony with families since 1985. He is a second generation Mohel following in the footsteps of his father-in-law, of blessed memory, Reverend Frederick Goldberg, who practiced for over 55 years in the Washington D.C. area. Rabbi Henesch primarily serves Washington, D.C., New York, Virginia and Maryland. He is available nationwide and has performed services overseas as well.
Rabbi Henesch was formally certified as a Mohel in Jerusalem by Rabbi Yitzchok Lang and interned at Hadassah and Laniado-Sanz Medical Center in Israel. He is a practicing Mohel at both Sinai Hospital and Johns Hopkins Hospital in Baltimore as well as hospitals in Columbia, Washington D.C., Virginia and New York. He is associated with the major urology groups in the area and is referred to patients by leading pediatricians and obstetricians whose own children and grandchildren he has been privileged to serve. As a Rabbi, he has lectured on the medical and religious aspects of ritual circumcision throughout the country for Jews of all denominations and has made himself available as a resource to countless families in areas of Jewish life and tradition."

And then, this greeting:

> My Sons Bris – A Happy Beginning
>
> It is my desire that this presentation serve as an aid to new parents by giving a brief overview of the meaning and importance of this timeless Jewish experience. It is, however, not meant as a substitute for the many questions that frequently arise. I encourage and invite inquiries so that your sons Bris will truly be a most meaningful and joyous happy beginning.

It sounds so inviting, however the genital cutting involved is unethical and medically unnecessary. There is an alternative, Brit Shalom, that performs the same function but doesn't require surgery. I don't believe either is required, as a child of a Jewish mother is Jewish – no ritual needed.

Under "Dear Parents:"

> The Brit Milah ceremony is a beautiful, religious life-cycle event, which is celebrated publicly amid family and friends on the baby's eighth day of life. It is dignified, meaningful and spiritual. Everyone present will witness a beautiful milestone in the life of the baby and family. Naming the baby is part of the ceremony.
>
> Since mother and child are eight days post-partum and it is a very sensitive time physically and emotionally for both, it is advisable to discuss the scope of the Bris in advance with your family. Unlike a Bar Mitzvah or wedding, there is not a lot of time to plan for a Bris. However, I have observed over the years that everybody > manages to come together; everybody is happy. The baby is the celebration.

>
> It is my role to be more than just an artisan of ancient practice, but a facilitator for new parents who actually help them pull it all together. The recognition that this baby is not only a reflection of your love for each other but is also another proud link in the history of your respective families is conveyed. It is important for me to assure parents that they are making the right decision; that this is an act of love. Someday your son will understand what this day means and will turn to you and thank you for making this important decision so early in his life.

Saying things like "everybody is happy" and "the baby is the celebration" sidesteps the fact that the baby is not happy getting mutilated – no baby is – and is forced to undergo permanent amputation of part of his penis, live with various complications of it, and all in the name of a religion he may not ascribe to. Presumptive at best, deadly and barbaric at worst.

We don't perform other "ancient practices" such as animal or virgin sacrifice, blood letting, or slavery, realizing it's harm and dubious benefits. Can't this "act of love" be less bloody and mutilating? You better hope "your son will understand" because many men are outraged that someone – loved ones with support from 'civil society' – caused them pain and permanent mutilation.

Here are "Frequently Asked Questions:"

> How much pain does a baby feel?
> This is the most important and most frequently asked question of me. One that I do not take lightly as a Mohel, who is judged every day by the sounds the baby makes both during and after the circumcision. The "success" of a Mohel is generally judged in three areas: 1. The baby's comfort during and after the circumcision; 2. The ceremony; and 3. The Pediatrician's evaluation of the circumcision.
>
> Many studies have been performed to try to ascertain how much pain the baby feels. These studies however reflect the clinical experience of hospital circumcisions, not those performed by a Mohel. The Mohel is a specialist, an expert at his profession. An active Mohel will possess much more experience than most doctors. A doctor will strap the baby down on a molded plastic bodyboard placed on a table, use a very painful clamp and the procedure may take up to twenty minutes or longer, depending on the ability of the individual doing the circumcision.
>
> The approach I use is to place the baby on a pillow and not strap him down. The instrument I use to perform the circumcision is not the same instrument used by a doctor. It is much more efficient with better results. Most importantly, a procedure should never take more than 30 seconds.
>
> There are topical creams, ointments and penile blocks that are available, but all of them have some drawbacks on a newborn. As a Mohel with the technical expertise to perform adult circumcisions, as well as infants, I have utilized these approaches at various times. There is also a variety of non-pharmacological interventions that may be used very effectively, alone or in conjunction with the other approaches for treatment of procedural pain in neonates. It is my goal to provide the most effective pain management for your baby. I am familiar with most of the studies undertaken to determine the safety and effectiveness of interventions to relieve pain associated with neonatal circumcision. I would be happy to discuss each approach with you.

He's not a doctor and we have no idea what medical training he has, if any. He "practices" this surgery at numerous hospitals and private residences (with varying levels of sterility), able to do this because of a religious exemption for male genital mutilation (circumcision). There is no such exemption for FGM (female genital mutilation), with most countries banning it as barbaric and unethical.

Since Rabbi Henesch makes no mention AT ALL of the many possible risks and complications he may cause, you can research that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Rabbi Henesch's contact information follows:

Rabbi Michael Henesch
Certified Mohel
Phone: 1-877-990-BRIS
Email: mhenesch@gmail.com

AVfM Reference Wiki

Robert Brockway · 8 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Need For Men's Rights, India

Amit Deshpande · 8 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Vaastav Foundation President, Amit Deshpande shares why there is a need for men's rights in India. TEDxJuhu event in Juhu, Mumbai – India.

The topic was 'Need for Men's Rights'

If you like this presentation, please leave a review of this video on the TEDx Talk website as well as on YouTube.

- Amit Deshpande
  @antidespondent
  President,
  Vaastav Foundation

Republicans and Democrats, both Gynocrats

Peter Wright & Paul Elam · 8 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

> All parties, all sorts and conditions of politicians, from the fashionable and Conservative west-end philanthropist to the Radical working-men's clubbite, seem (or seemed until lately) to have come to an unanimous conclusion on one point – to wit, that the female sex is grievously groaning under the weight of male oppression." – E. Belfort Bax, (1907)[1]

♦ ♦ ♦

Our two party political system increasingly reveals itself to be a staged battle, inspiring about the same credibility as professional wrestling. Democrats and Republicans allegedly square off on either side of a deep philosophical divide and battle for the hearts and minds of the American people. It is family values vs progressive ideals, religious edicts vs personal autonomy, secure borders vs open inclusion and multiculturalism vs national identity.

It is actually dozens of seemingly opposing ideals, impassioned voters on either side of the fence, setting off increasing media fireworks as we get closer to completing each election cycle.

Yet, as we see right before our eyes, our political practices and policies play vastly different than campaign issues would make it appear. The servants we elect wage the same wars, maintain the same extralegal prisons, bail out the same corrupt Wall Street players, cater to the same corporate interests and infringe equally on our Constitutional protections.

What we have pre-election is the Great American Psychodrama; a Dog and Pony Show that distracts us from the post-election reality that an agenda more powerful than Dem vs Pub is actually calling the shots on our governance.

We have a one party system. Republicrats vs Republicrats; a political mafia who sends front men out to "represent" respective sides of a philosophical battle that exists only in the minds of voters.

It allows politicians to run on platforms like "hope" and "change," with their biggest challenge being the maintaining of a straight face.

This is the perfect environment for modern sexual politics as well.

This is hardly a surprise to most men's advocates. Many are already aware that there are two different brands of politicians in today's world when it comes to gender issues: Knights and Troubadours. Just like Dems and Pubs, they ostensibly appear to be on opposing teams. That façade falls apart quickly, though, when you realize they answer to the same master; they are simple stage props used interchangeably by the same production company.

They are owned and operated by Gynocentrism, Inc. Their marching are women first and most often women only. They appear on the surface to be at odds but chivalry is the glue that binds them together. Everything they say and do comes back to women first every time.

Let's take a look at their approach to perpetuating gynocentric privilege for women through different styles of chivalry.

In the chivalric tradition knights are viewed as damsel savers. They are the protectors of womankind and the hero of ladies. We first saw them emerge all the way back to medieval politics where, for instance, Jean II Le Maingre – marshal of France and a knight renowned for his military skill – instituted The "Enterprise of the Green Shield with the White Lady," a chivalric order that gathered a team of knights to defend women's honor from male brutality. Inspired by the ideal of courtly love, the stated purpose of the order was to guard and defend the honor, estate, goods, reputation, fame and praise of all ladies.

Left: St. George slays dragon Right: George Bush pledges to rescue women from slavery

Alternatively, the troubadour politician has long been a permanent fixture in western politics, and has his roots in chivalric knighthood. He is the singer of sooth songs to female voters. He's the one who proudly waxes that women can do anything men can do, and do it better, and do it in heels.

This aristocratic crooner emerged in the troubadour revolution of France and Germany. But unlike the chivalric knights who aggressively rescues damsels, the troubadour makes stock and trade of awaiting counsel from his female superiors.

Medieval literature is rich with stories of such men seeking direction from women, the latter having an endless list of tasks for the troubadour to fulfill before his gynocentric credentials are confirmed. A famous example is Ulrich von Liechtenstein, a German troubadour (minnesinger) who wrote the autobiographical manual "The Servicing of Ladies." Von Liechtenstein's modus operandi, like that of all troubadours, was to put himself before a lady and ask to be directed.

Left: Troubador supplicates a female audience with sweet songs Right: President Obama

And then to strut around like a banty rooster, high on his own achievements and hopeful for a pat on the head or even access to the holy of holies.

Has anything changed? Nope. We still see the smugly sacrificing heroics of the alleged right and the sycophancy of the alleged left. We see both as they posture themselves as the advocates for all womankind, throwing men and boys directly into the meat grinder of feminist governance with open abandon.

The knightly politician of today likewise offers to protect women from harm and insult, the benevolent patriarch.

The more sensitive, troubadour-like politician of today offers his to support all female issues and alleviates all female discomforts on instruction from women. He's an archetypical feminist, SJW and sycophant.

The bottom line? What we live in today is essentially a gynarchy, defined as a political system governed by women or heavily in the interest of women. Some will protest that we don't live in a gynarchy because most of the political leaders are male, but that would be a superficial conclusion. In her book What's Right With Feminism Cassandra Langer gives a concise definition that accounts for the proxy role of male leaders: "Gynarchy refers to government by women, or women-centered government."[2]

Gynarchy refers to any government advocating female interests, including any establishment of laws and bureaucracies that mostly benefit women, regardless of whether the advocates in question are male or female. Said differently the political system that women govern may actually be staffed by male servants called prime ministers, presidents, or politicians who work on behalf of the of women.[3]

We can hear the protesters already: But surely the United States has always been governed by and for the dominant patriarchal powers?

No, not according to some early observers.

One of them was cultural critic Max O'Rell who in 1903 observed;

> "The government of the American people is not a Republic, it is not a monarchy: it is a gynarchy, a government by the women for the women, a sort of occult power behind the scenes that rules the country." [4]

What O'Rell saw in 1903 was that both sides of politics were serving as liegemen to the female populace – and nothing else.

The solution to this is simple and far from easy. All we need is a healthy percentage of the population, say one or two percent, to look past FOX NEWS and CNN programmed thinking; to look past their own biological impulse to save those who don't need saving and to engage in a pragmatic, rational examination of modern sexual politics.

We need them to see that the so-called candidates they are so bitterly either defending or attacking are just the same whores wearing different clothing.

Mind you, this is not about right vs left, which is a much more tangible and credible divide.

In American elections there is no right and left, just the pandering to Americans acting like robots with emotion chips that have gone on the fritz.

Whether it is with Lilly Ledbetter, VAWA or any other legislation enjoying round bipartisan support, what Americans have is a single option two party system that gives voters the opportunity to feel warm and fuzzy as they destroy their sons while chanting "You GO Girl"

All it will take is a tenacious, indefatigable minority of people who will simply not allow the lies and the injustice to pass unchallenged.

References:

[1] E. Belfort Bax, The "Monstrous Regiment" of Womanhood (1907)
[2] Cassandra Langer, What's Right With Feminism, iUniverse, (2001)
[3] Alison Tieman provides a historical example of slave leadership in her video When Slaves Ruled.
[4] The Philadelphia Record, quoting Max O'Rell's 1903 comments on American women

Further reading:

–Elizabeth Poole Sandford, Female Power, Influence, and Privileges (1835)
–Max O'Rell, Petticoat Government in the USA, (1896)
–Max O'Rell, The gentle art of ruling a husband, Chapter VIII in Her Royal Highness, Woman (1903)
–Historical references to gynocentric culture in America
–Warren Farrell on female political power in the United States, from Myth of Male Power (1993)

–Dean Esmay, How do Men's Rights Activists align politically? (Jan, 2015)

Patriarchy tales: My father's story

AVfM Video Source · 8 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Stacey King, a Bulgarian woman, has begun asking men to tell their stories–and then because men get mocked when they tell their own stories of abuse, she tells their story for them, hoping that hearing a woman tell the story will make people listen. Here's one man's tale, told by a woman who cares:

"Just an old man with a sad story."

You may want to subscribe to Stacy's channel https://www.youtube.com/channel/UCs2dvCTVxaP1IUulr8p8UDA.

Dr. Peter Bell of Castle Hill, NSW, Australia placed on genital mutilators directory

Gary Costanza · 9 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

From his website drpeterbell.com:

"Dr Peter Bell is an experienced specialist obstetrician and gynaecologist providing an extensive range of services in obstetrics, gynaecology and minimally invasive laparoscopic (keyhole) surgery.

He is a Visiting Medical Officer at Westmead hospital. His private hospital appointments include The Norwest Private Hospital, and Westmead Private Hospital. Previously he was appointed at the Sydney Adventist Hospital (The SAN) but relinquished that appointment because sydney traffic did not allow timely attendance in an emergency.

Dr Bell studied medicine at Sydney University and graduated with first class honours. Additionally, he has an honours science degree and a certificate in Nuclear Medicine technology."

Under "Information, Circumcision…"

> Circumcision, yes or no. It is an emotive issue. Overall, the pros and cons are about equal.
>
> My view is that it is not wrong to perform a newborn male circumcision, nor is it wrong not to perform a circumcision. There are however times when circumcision cannot be performed (when it is contraindicated).
>
> If you have decided to proceed, then please note the following;
>
> ▶ Male newborn circumcisions only. Only for newborns who are three weeks of age or younger.
>
> ▶ There is a cost to you.
>
> ▶ Up to 3 weeks of age MAXIMUM. The earlier the procedure is done the less pain and the fewer the complications.
>
> ▶ Circumcisions are only performed once a week on a Monday morning only.

The pros and cons are not equal, as this is a permanent amputation of part of the penis for which there is no informed consent. The doctor should take care of pregnant women and take mondays off.

It continues:

> Arguments FOR Circumcision
> Decreases the incidence of urinary tract infections (UTI). In un-circumcised infants there is a 10-12 times increase in the risk of UTI. If a child has a UTI in the first year of life there is a higher risk of kidney failure, meningitis, bone marrow infection, and even death.
>
> Decreased incidence of phimosis (inability to retract a tight foreskin), balanitis (inflammation of penis), and paraphimosis (constriction of the penis by a tight foreskin). Up to 18% of boys may develop one of these problems by 8 years of age. The chance of these problems occurring in circumcised boys is virtually nil.

> In Africa the risk of catching HIV is less, but this may or may not be true in Australia.
>
> Decrease incidence of problems with erections at puberty
>
> Decrease in urological problems and infections in older men
>
> Elimination of the risk of penile cancer in later life if circumcision is performed in the newborn period. However, penile cancer is extremely rare in uncircumcised males in the Western world (about 1 in 100,000).
>
> Possibly a decreased incidence of Sexually Transmitted diseases (Gonorrhoea, Syphilis, Genital Herpes or warts).
>
> It should be noted that the risk of operative complications increase if the procedure is performed in later life rather than the newborn period.
>
> A percentage of males who are uncircumcised undergo circumcision in later life.
>
> Arguments AGAINST Circumcision
> Complications may include;
> Pain during the procedure and shortly after > Haemorrhage (Bleeding). About 1:1,000 risk.
> Infection
> Retained plastibell (the bell would need to be cut off. Anaesthetic not required).
>
> As for any wound or cut, other much less common (very rare) complications may occur,. They are;
> Meatal stenosis (tightening of the urethral tube)
> Avascular necrosis (death of tissue because of poor blood supply)
> Concealed penis (penis buried in the body because of adhesions/short penis/obesity)
> Cosmetic Disfigurement
> Surgical Hypospadias (abnormally placed urethral opening)
> Fibrous adhesions
> Urethro-cutaneous Fistula (urine comes out at an abnormal location)
> Cysts of the glans penis (the glans is the head of the penis)
> Fibrotic phimosis after inadequate surgery (ie. Too much foreskin left and this skin tightens up and restricts the penis).
> Lymphoedema or elephantiasis (very rare fluid build up in the skin)
> Laceration of the penis or scrotum
> Asymmetric removal of foreskin (that is, the cosmetic appearance is not to the liking of the parents)

No source listed for the UTI information. The “bleeding” statistic is wrong as circumcision always results in bleeding.

Looking at the risks vs. benefits listed above I’d have to say leave the baby intact.

“Circumcision,- FAQ” tells us:

> Cost and payment. The cost of the procedure is $500 and is to be paid in full using Cash or Credit Card at the time of the procedure. Medicare will pay approximately $100 meaning you will be out of pocket about $400.
>
> Deposit. There are a limited number of practitioners able to perform circumcision. Those patients who book the procedure and then cancel disadvantage other patients who have been informed that a booking is unavailable. For that reason, we require a NON REFUNDABLE booking fee of $200, paid by credit card at the time of booking, which will be deducted from the circumcision charge if you do proceed.
>
> Can we observe the procedure? Because your baby deserves our full attention during the procedure, parents are NOT permitted to observe the procedure.

$500 is a lot of money for unnecessary surgery, and not being allowed to witness it just confirms the shocking nature of the mutilation.

Under “Disclaimer” there’s this:

> Without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing paragraph, we do not warrant or represent that the medical information on this website:
>
> (a) will be constantly available, or available at all; or > (b) is complete, true, accurate, up to date or non-misleading.
> (c) Professional assistance
> (d) You must not rely on the information on this website as an alternative to medical advice from your doctor or other professional healthcare provider.

Dr. Bell fails to mention other risks, including death, so you’ll find more info here at neonatalcutting.org.

His practice information follows:

142 Tuckwell Rd
Castle Hill
NSW, Australia

Telephone: ☎ +61 2 9894-0040
Fax: +61 2 8212-5955
E-mail: ✉ office@drpeterbell.com

Pick up artists suck and game doesn't really matter

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 9 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Featured Image by kainr on Flickr, used under license (Creative Commons Attribution 2.0 Generic/CC BY 2.0).

Video Script

Pick-Up Artist (PUA) techniques are fad diets backed by circumstantial testimony. Your mileage will vary until you form healthy habits that never needed branding in the first place. Weight lost from the 3 day diet won't stay lost, and having a one-night stand thanks to the Mystery Method won't make you feel secure with who you are.

If there was an algorithm to seduction, no PUA could sell any books, DVDs or workshop tickets. We would pirate the secret to free pussy more times than a Game of Thrones cut where Peter Dinklage was on PCP and always had that crossbow [spoiler alert]. But thanks to the excellent sales skills of entrepreneurial PUAs like Roosh, you can hardly think about seduction without thinking of esoteric nomenclature and a callous pursuit for pussy that makes Californication look Victorian:

> There are several components of good game practice that make love less likely to develop. I've taught men to…
>
> - Adopt a model of abundance whereby you treat each girl as disposable and replaceable
> - Adopt the mentality that all women are selfish and extractive, and that you must get your sexual pleasure from them as quickly as possible
> - View women solely as sexual depositories that can not aid the lives of men
> - Be willing to walk away from any woman, a mindset that aims to help you not develop emotional attachments
>
> —Roosh, "The Elephant In The Room"

I've learned a lot about relationships and self-care. Although I agree that emotional attachment can turn unhealthy, I think that a shared emotional connection is a basic human need. I have my fun, but I don't use game to have sex because I don't need it. This statement would probably annoy PUAs if they view game an integral part of a man's interactions with women. But from what I see from the way PUAs treat seduction, game is something you have or don't have. I don't claim to have it, but I'm not missing out on anything either.

I read materials PUAs often recommend, but I realized that nothing topped brutally-honest mentors, friends, and a healthy tolerance for failure to hone my social skills. I'm still a geeky guy that sounds like Spencer Reid from Criminal Minds, but I do okay because I practice.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=hQAPcSj0ZC0&feature=youtu.be

There is a science to seduction, just like there is a science to good health. But in both of these arenas, beware those who brand the science to sell stuff to the impatient. Dismissing all advice just because it comes from PUAs would be throwing the baby out with the bathwater, but if you have to buy a DVD, attend a workshop or read books about how to be attractive, then the materials wouldn't help you anyway.

I've never committed to anything that says things like "Be yourself, but not like that." I don't need anyone's permission to enjoy life and the company I keep. I certainly don't take advice from Type-A bloggers with unverifiable sexual qualifications who always have the same dumbass sales pitch:

> I was an albino with the complexion of desert herpes. Women hated me so much that my head was always > soaked with mojitos and tears. Now I can't go to my private jet without getting my dick stuck in my Italian blowjob maids. Buy my book, and even worthless faggots like you can do the deed with double D's.

This is like watching an episode of Cribs, except the house only allegedly belongs to the star, and everything is sticky.

Successful seducers start with personal initiative. Neil Strauss wrote his feature-length testimonial for Game™ after hanging around some swinging dicks, but I'm not convinced that he really needed the help since his personality was already conducive to personal development.

You could argue that if I wanted to learn how to work on cars, I should talk to people that work on cars. But women aren't cars, and social skills are not learned from advice. You could talk to singers and bury your face into a manual for the human larynx, but that's not enough to deliver an aria that would make Thomas Gibson weep into a hankie.

To be fair to PUAs, being openly heterosexual and attempting to seduce women is not misogynistic, as some critics claim. Men are worth something, and heterosexuality is totally okay. There is also nothing wrong with a man refusing to define his worth according to what women think of him. If we don't support a self-loving man, then we will create a generation of obsequious codependents that are only technically men. Where I draw the line with PUAs is with their aggressive, communal branding efforts and need to sell fads to insecure men.

Have you ever noticed that Objectivists act like they own logic, reason and ethics? The PUA community acts the same way about seduction. They took the topic over with their own glossary. It's not "self-esteem" anymore, it's "inner game." It's not "touch," it's "kino."

I don't need to groom "Splinter Artisans" to rebrand woodworking. Woodworking requires no brand loyalty because it is only a skill. Seduction is the same way.

I'm a hormonal non-monogamist (which is a euphemism for "I'm 24"), and I have an amazing woman in my life. I still hook-up because, well, I like sex and variety. We found a mutually healthy bond that fortifies emotional health in spite of this sexual openness. I didn't need game to end up in this situation. In fact, once I started taking much better care of myself, she showed up.

If you are a young man looking for love, turn off the computer and think about your life and how you relate to others. If you don't feel a terrifying void growing in your gut, you aren't doing it right. Starting from this lonely moment of existential dread, understand that you will suck at seducing women. I know I did my share of cringey propositions and poorly calculated moves. But I got laid, mellowed out and did better over time. It's okay to fail. In fact, it's required.

I'm not going to document my methods, and I'm definitely not putting them up for sale. What works for me came from developing my own style, which I cannot guarantee would work for someone else. Talk to strangers to learn who you are, because the way people react—either negatively or positively—has a way of making you finally look for your own approval. But don't talk to strangers, particularly PUAs, about what you need to do to be attractive. The problem is giving people power over your worth. You don't want to give women that power, but you don't want to give it to PUAs either. That's not avoiding the problem, it's moving it elsewhere. Despite the sales pitch, a pick up artist doesn't give a single fuck if you do well in life or get laid unless you give them credit for progress that could only ever be your own.

A call to Action – Domestic violence and the demonisation of men

Greg Canning · 9 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Commentators arguing for a more inclusive approach, acknowledging all victims and seeking to understand the root causes of family violence outside ideological echo chamber of the Duluth gendered paradigm are few.

One such commentator is Australian Psychologist, Sex Therapist and Commentator Bettina Arndt. Her recent article Domestic violence and the demonization of men published in the Weekend Australian newspaper has received widespread support from the public and men's groups but the usual condemnation and vitriol from feminist groups. The article is well worth reading.

That the public narrative around family and domestic violence is controlled and distorted by feminist ideologues is well know to those with an awareness of men's issues. Yet the general public via the well-funded DV industry continue to be battered with and largely believe, portrayals of a false dichotomy of violent male abusers and helpless female victims.

Where lip service is occasionally paid to the existence of male victims and female perpetrators is it always with the supposed caveat that the proportions are so tiny as to be insignificant in dealing with the problem. An assertion contradicted by common sense and a rapidly growing catalogue of scholarly and scientific evidence, indicating that men account for at least one third of victims and most frequently partner violence is reciprocal.

The rhetoric is repeated Ad nauseam by those at the highest levels of Australian social and political life, including all of Australia's revolving door prime ministers.

It's not surprising because the Australian government's response to family and domestic violence has been encapsulated since 2010 as "The National Plan to Reduce Violence against Women and their Children." That children are considered as possessions of women by the use of the possessive pronoun "their" in the title, is intentional and is also reflected in the government approach to policy relating to family breakdown, family law and child support.

Most recently Malcolm Turnbull's in his fist media interview as prime minister had this to say:

"The issue of domestic violence, or family violence, as it's often called, which is just violence against women, as the way I prefer to describe it, is an enormous one.

"It has been overlooked to some extent, it has been ignored for far too long, and we must have zero tolerance for it. I think a growing level of awareness is vital. Real men don't hit women, and we've got to be very determined to eradicate it."

I doubt Turnbull is actually ignorant enough to not understand the distinction between these terms, so his statement is assumed to be a deliberate conflation of "violence against women" with domestic and family violence. The later terms are inclusive of all forms of violence occurring in domestic situations or between family members, including child abuse, elder abuse, sibling abuse, same sex partner abuse and others but these other aspects of violence rarely rate a mention.

One of the key players in perpetrating the false gender narrative and by extension increasing the divide between men and women is the notorious White Ribbon campaign described as "Australia's campaign to prevent men's violence against women" (lesbian partner violence and victims of female perpetrators of child abuse be dammed.) Ironically the groups rhetoric argues that achieving gender equality is critical to reducing violence, but fails to recognise that ignoring men and their children as victims is indeed gender discrimination.

Bettina is now asking for help in combatting the false narrative (details here – Domestic violence and White Ribbon day – help change the debate.) Would you be prepared to make contact with White Ribbon ambassadors in you area or workplace? If so, you could encourage them to look beyond the indoctrination they receive via the White Ribbon campaign, to take a look at the evidence for themselves, and encourage them to be more inclusive in their advocacy to reduce all forms of family violence. It is particularly important to try and break the intergenerational propagation of violence and to combat the high level of gender symmetrical dating and partner violence in young people.

The more voices that are added to the groundswell of support for a gender inclusive approach to family violence the closer we come to the tipping point and the possibility of making real progress in achieving the goal of safety at home for everyone.

Take up you pen, pick up the phone or attend one of the many upcoming white ribbon day functions and take a stand to stop violence against everyone.

Modern Educayshun

AVfM Video Source · 9 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Excellent satire illustrating the "potential dangers" of our increasingly reactionary culture of Political Correctness on our college campuses and in the media.

If you like Neel Kolhatkar's work his YT channel can be found here.

Glorification of men's love abjection

Douglas Galbi · 10 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Since late in the nineteenth century, learned scholars have intensely and earnestly deliberated various historical and technical issues associated with medieval European poésie lyrique and amour courtois. This deliberation, though courteous, has been heated and pointed. Scholarly reputations have risen and fallen in the verbal battles. Just as in war generally, almost all the persons fighting in this field of medieval scholarship have been men. Consistent with the gynocentrism typical of primates, all the leading men have glorified men's love abjection and men's love servitude to women.

Narrow historical and technical disputes about amour courtois have obscured broad scholarly endorsement of men's love abjection and men's love servitude to women. Claims about medieval European poésie lyrique have been qualified to amour courtois. The latter, however, has been identified as an anachronistic term. Fin d'amor has thus among scholars become a more reputable term for amour courtois. Being French, amour courtois is more stylish than "courtly love." Both terms are etymologically related to being classy. Embracing the spirit of democratic equality, an elite medieval scholar coined the term "courtly experience." That term emphasizes that amour courtois is a universal impulse:

> I hold that here is a gentilezza {courtesy} which is not confined to any court or privileged class, but springs from an inherent virtù {manly excellence}; that the feelings of courtoisie are elemental, not the product of a particular chivalric nurture. In the poets' terms, they allow even the most vilain {common} to be gentil {noble}. [1]

"Courtly experience" expressed in poetry can be a way of looking at life even for peasants rolling in the hay:

> The courtly experience is the sensibility that gives birth to poetry that is courtois, to poetry of amour courtois. Such poetry may be either popular or courtly, according to the circumstances of its composition. The unity of popular and courtly love-poetry is manifest in the courtly experience, which finds expression in both. [2]

Gynocentrism is typical of primates. It hence encompasses both popular and courtly love poetry. Amour courtois has been described as "un secteur du coeur, un des aspects éternels de l'homme" {a part of the heart, one of the eternal aspects of man}.[3] Stated more literally, gynocentrism is a prevalent aspect of human societies.

The stark, oppressive anti-men gender inequality at the core of amour courtois has often been obscured. In 1896, an eminent European medievalist defined la poésie courtoise {courtly love poetry}:

> What distinguishes it is conceiving of love as a cult directed toward an instance of excellence and based, like Christian love, on the infinite disproportion between merit and desire; like a necessary school of honor that makes the lover worthy and transforms commoners into nobles; like a voluntary servitude that has an ennobling power and that consists in the dignity and beauty of passionate suffering. [4]

That definition completely ignores the starkly different positions of men and women in amour courtois. The monumental work Medieval Latin and the Rise of European Love-Lyric, published in 1965, expanded upon that definition:

> 'le culte d'un objet excellent' {cult directed toward an instance of excellence}: such an attitude of the poet towards his beloved is the foundation of the courtly experience. From this arises the 'infinite disproportion' between lover and loved one. Yet the entire love-worship of the beloved is based on the feeling that by loving such disproportion may be lessened, the infinite gulf bridged, and a way toward union, however difficult and arduous, begun. … It is what leads to such expressions as: she whom I love is peerless throughout the world; one moment with her is worth Paradise to me; I would gladly go to Hell if she were there; her beauty is radiant as the sun; she mirrors the divine light in the world; she moves among other women like a goddess; she is worshipped by saints and angels; she herself is an angel, a goddess; she is the lover's remedy; she is his salvation. … winning such a love is infinitely arduous, and would be impossible were it not for the lady's grace. The value of the way is intimately related to its difficulty; therefore the lady should not take pity too easily. In any case, the lover must orient himself to an absolute love, if necessary a love unto death. [5]

In 1936, an influential medievalist declared the anti-men gender inequality of amour courtois more openly and more realistically:

> Every one has heard of courtly love, and every one knows that it appears quite suddenly at the end of the eleventh century in Languedoc. … The lover is always abject. Obedience to his lady's lightest wish, however whimsical, and silent acquiescence in her rebukes, however unjust, are the only virtues he dares to claim. There is a service of love closely modelled on the service which a feudal vassal owes to his lord. The lover is the lady's 'man'. He addresses her as midons, which etymologically represents not 'my lady' but 'my lord'. The whole attitude has been rightly described as 'a feudalisation of love'. [6]

The scholar rightly identified an "unmistakable continuity" in this idea of love from the Middle Ages right through to the present. Men's love servitude to women also existed in the Roman Empire in love elegy, in the relation to between caliphs and slave girls in the early Islamic world, and probably in most human societies throughout history.[7]

Scholars have only described and interpreted amour courtois while glorifying it. The scholarly imperative should be to abolish it. Writing in 1936, an influential medievalist observed:

> Even our code of etiquette, with its rule that women always have precedence, is a legacy from courtly love [8]

He, however, lamented that courtly love isn't more prevalent:

> The popular erotic literature of our own day tends rather to sheikhs and 'Salvage Men' and marriage by capture, while that which is in favour with our intellectuals recommends either frank animalism or the free companionship of the sexes. [9]

In Theft of History, published in 2006, the chapter "Stolen Love: European Claims to the Emotions" takes amour courtois to farce:

> the associated claim that love is uniquely European has also had a number of political implications being bound up not only with the development of capitalism but also being used in the service of imperialism. There is a palace in Mérida in Yucatan, the decoration of which portrays helmeted and armoured conquistadores towering over vanquished savages, with an inscription that proclaims the conquering power of love. That emotion, fraternal rather than sexual, had been claimed by the imperialist conquerors from Europe. Love literally conquers all in the hands of the invading military. [10]

Claiming amour courtois for a time or place is no substitute for meaningful ethical judgment. Amour courtois, which has at its core the subordination of men to women, isn't humane. Amour courtois remains far too prevalent in societies around the world. Medieval European literature, wrongly understood as the source of amour courtois, provides important resources for overcoming it. Everyone needs to be educated through careful study of Lamentationes Matheoluli, Vita Aesopi, Solomon and Marcolf, Old French fabliaux, medieval women's love poetry, and especially Boccaccio.

Notes:

[1] Dronke (1965) p. 3. Id., p. 7, refers to "the way of acquiring the virtù that she embodies." That feminine usage of virtù reflects Dronke's blurring of stark sex differences in amour courtois.

[2] Id. p. 3. Id, n. 1, explains:

> I speak of the courtly experience rather than, say, the courtly manner or fashion because, beyond manners and fashions, it can entail a whole way of looking at life.

Dronke doesn't speak about how looking at life through amour courtois differs in domination and subordination between women and men.

[3] Marrou (1947) p. 89, cited in Dronke (1965) pp. ix, 46.

[4] Bédier (1896) p. 172, cited in Dronke (1965) p. 4, my translation from French. The original French text:

> Ce qui lui est propre, c'est d'avoir conçu l'amour comme un culte qui s'adresse à un objet excellent et se fonde, comme l'amour chrétien, sur l'infinie disproportion du mérite au désir ; — comme une école nécessaire d'honneur, qui fait valoir l'amant et transforme les vilains en courtois ; — comme un servage volontaire qui recèle un pouvoir ennoblissant, et fait consister dans la souffrance la dignité et la beauté de la passion.

Bédier was disputing the views of his contemporary scholars Alfred Jeanroy and Gaston Paris. All are influential figures in scholarship on amour courtois. C.S. Lewis characterized amour courtois as Humility, Courtesy, Adultery, and the Religion of Love. Lewis (1936) p. 2. The three characteristics other than adultery exist together in some medieval love poetry. That has spurred marginal disputes about amour courtois.

[5] Dronke (1965) pp. 4-5, 7. In his elaboration on Bédier's definition, Dronke treats gender difference as merely a grammatical formalism. Gender difference emerges only when Dronke moves to "such expressions as." The subordinate, abject lover is the man (he) and the dominant, paragon of excellence is the woman (she).

[6] Lewis (1936) p. 2. The reference to "unmistakeable continuity" is id. p. 3. Id. pp. 11, 12 calls amour courtois a "new sentiment" and a "new feeling" that originated in the love poetry of the late-eleventh-century Provençal troubadours. Donke, in contrast, declares nothing new and no geographic origin for amour courtois. Dronke also regards amour courtois as not particularly associated with feudal, chivalric society. Dronke (1965) p. ix. His depiction of amour courtois is nonetheless consistent with servant / lord feudal relations.

[7] Dronke (1965), Ch. I, documents the courtly experience of amour courtois in ancient Egyptian literary love songs; medieval Byzantium popular love songs; Rusthaveli's The Man in the Panther's Skin, written in Georgian about 1200; in the pre-Islamic Arabic poetry of Jamil and Buthaynah, the early Islamic poetry of ibn al-Ahnaf, and the eleventh-century Persian romance Wis and Ramin; love poetry of Mozarabic Spain; refrains of medieval France and Germany; tenth-century Icelandic skaldic poetry; and medieval love poetry in the Greek-Italian dialect of Calabria.

[8] Id. pp. 3-4. Scholars have provided rationalizations for denying and reversing men's manifest subordination in courtly love. The collapse of reason is now pervasive in medieval scholarship:

> As is now generally recognized, the rhetoric of courtly love is a social discourse of coercive power, asserting the courtier's dominance over both the female love-object and men of lesser status.

Garrison (2015) p. 323. Anti-men gender bigotry is now similarly interpreted as promoting gender equality. Moreover, as the Costa Condordia disaster made clear, men continue to be denied equal opportunity to get off sinking ships.

[9] Id. p. 1. The term "salvage" apparently is an archaic form of "savage."

[10] Goody (2006) p. 285. These are the concluding sentences of the chapter. The non-gendered reference to military action underscores lack of concern for men's lives.

[image] Knight serving woman in amour courtois. Oil on canvas. Edmund Leighton, English, 1901. Thanks to Wikimedia Commons.

References:

Bédier, Joseph. 1896. "Les fêtes de mai et les commencemens de la poésie lyrique au moyen âge." Revue des Deux Mondes 135: 146-72.

Dronke, Peter. 1965. Medieval Latin and the rise of European love-lyric. Vol I. Oxford: Clarendon Press.

Garrison, Jennifer. 2015. "Chaucer's Troilus and Criseyde and the Danger of Masculine Interiority." The Chaucer Review. 49 (3): 320-343.

Goody, Jack. 2006. The theft of history. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Lewis, C. S. 1936. The allegory of love; a study in medieval tradition. Oxford: The Clarendon Press.

Marrou, Henri-Irénée. 1947. "Au dossier de l'amour courtois." Revue du Moyen Age Latin 3: 81-89.

Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License.

Mayo Clinic placed on genital mutilators directory

Gary Costanza · 10 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

From Mayo Clinic President John H. Noseworthy, M.D. at mayoclinic.org:

"Mission and values
Mayo Clinic's mission is to inspire hope and contribute to health and well-being by providing the best care to every patient through integrated clinical practice, education and research. Our primary value is "The needs of the patient come first."

Circumcision – Definition

Circumcision is the surgical removal of the skin covering the tip of the penis. Circumcision is fairly common for newborn boys in certain parts of the world, including the United States. Circumcision after the newborn period is possible, but it's a more complex procedure.

For some families, circumcision is a religious ritual. Circumcision can also be a matter of family tradition, personal hygiene or preventive health care. For others, however, circumcision seems unnecessary or disfiguring. After circumcision, it isn't generally possible to re-create the appearance of an uncircumcised penis."

Mayo has failed it's mission when it performs permanent genital mutilation on unconsenting infants as they satisfy the needs of parents and others AND NOT THE ACTUAL PATIENT.

More information:

> Penis before and after circumcision

Before circumcision, the foreskin covers the tip of the penis (glans). After circumcision, the tip of the penis is exposed.

Using cartoonish illustrations and passive language such as this gloss over the brutal cutting and crushing involved in circumcision.

Under "Why it's done:"

> Circumcision is a religious or cultural ritual for many Jewish and Islamic families, as well as certain aboriginal tribes in Africa and Australia. Circumcision can also be a matter of family tradition, personal hygiene or preventive health care. Sometimes there's a medical need for circumcision, such as when the foreskin is too tight to be pulled back (retracted) over the glans. In other cases, particularly in certain parts of Africa, circumcision is recommended for older boys or men to reduce the risk of certain sexually transmitted infections.
>
> The American Academy of Pediatrics (AAP) says the benefits of circumcision outweigh the risks. However, the AAP doesn't recommend routine circumcision for all male newborns. The AAP leaves the circumcision decision up to parents — and supports use of anesthetics for infants who have the procedure.
>
> Circumcision might have various health benefits, including:
>
> Easier hygiene. Circumcision makes it simpler to wash the penis. Washing beneath the foreskin of an uncircumcised penis is generally easy, however.
> Decreased risk of urinary tract infections. The overall risk of urinary tract infections in males is low, but these infections are more common in uncircumcised males. Severe infections early in life can lead to kidney problems later on.
> Decreased risk of sexually transmitted infections. Circumcised men might have a lower risk of certain sexually transmitted infections, including HIV. Still, safe sexual practices remain essential.
> Prevention of penile problems. Occasionally, the foreskin on an uncircumcised penis can be difficult or impossible to retract (phimosis). This can lead to inflammation of the foreskin or head of the penis.
> Decreased risk of penile cancer. Although cancer of the penis is rare, it's less common in circumcised men. In > addition, cervical cancer is less common in the female sexual partners of circumcised men.

None of these 'reasons' come anywhere close to justifying circumcision for newborn babies. "Easier hygiene?" Ridiculous – use soap! "Prevention of penile problems?" Cutting the penis CAUSES penile problems!

Under "Risks:"

> The most common complications associated with circumcision are bleeding and infection. Side effects related to anesthesia are possible as well.
>
> Rarely, circumcision might result in foreskin problems. For example:
>
> The foreskin might be cut too short or too long
> The foreskin might fail to heal properly
> The remaining foreskin might reattach to the end of the penis, requiring minor surgical repair

The listed risks are incomplete and don't convey the real risks of this surgery, including death. For more information about risks see here at neonatalcutting.org.

Mayo Clinic practice information:

13400 E. Shea Blvd.
Scottsdale, AZ 85259

General number 480-301-8000

4500 San Pablo Road
Jacksonville, FL 32224

General number 904-953-2000

200 First St. SW
Rochester, MN 55905

General number 507-284-2511

Why What Happened at Mizzou Signifies a Threat to American Values

Rachael Lefler · 10 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Featured Image by Max Goldberg on Flickr, used under license (Creative Commons Attribution 2.0 Generic/CC BY 2.0).

I can hear already the most common objection to my writing an article on the University of Missouri student protests: What does it have to do with men? Surely these are a bunch of isolated fanatics who really won't have any influence outside of their little safe spaces?

But the problem is, much like feminists/women, these activists, without producing a shred of evidence, were able to get people in influential positions in their college to step down from those positions. While they feign weakness and victim-hood to get what they want, these activists ARE getting what they want, much more often than not. And that should scare anyone, male or female. (But especially men, because this is not only tied with feminism, but parallels what is also happening with feminists, women, and accusations of wrongdoing so commonly being taken by the media and even by law courts as evidence in and of itself, which denies men due process systematically.)

What happened at Mizzou is really just one blister on a sick body of American youth that is infected with them. The signs of the disease are present there, and at many colleges throughout the country:

Activists coming from entitled and privileged backgrounds get the nerve to "call out" other people for being privileged.

They demand, not equality, but special treatment.

They do not protest peacefully, but angrily, against people who did no wrong.

Instead of seeing the media as an ally that can help them get their message out to the world, they attempt to block reporters from documenting their behavior, even if it is taking place in a public space.

They think their Visine tears can be used in the place of evidence of wrongdoing against them.

But the sad, sad, thing is, they're right. They can use tears and angry shouting and protests as evidence by itself. At least, they can use these things to embarrass people into stepping down from positions of authority when they've earned those positions fairly and did nothing to merit the loss of them, other than happen to be in charge when a bunch of ignorant students decided that not getting exactly everything they asked for, plus some groveling, was proof that society and people in power were racist and/or sexist against them. And even when they got the groveling and some of the things they asked for, they weren't happy. Because "social justice" activists aren't happy until they can make someone else suffer.

What I hate about this movement is that it is in opposition to the previous Civil Rights movement for black equality of the 1960's. Legal and social equality of the races was not won in this country without a long and in some places bitter fight. But it was eventually won, in legislation, in court cases, in practice. Segregation ended, and no one who advocates it today would ever be taken seriously.

That is, unless they happen to be black, favoring segregation, and calling it something else, like a "safe space." One injustice that you make up cannot and should not be allowed in an attempt to make up for past injustices that worked the other way around. To oppose 1940's-style segregation would not be to say "let's give blacks the superior separate spaces" but to say," all humans are equal, regardless of race or color, and have as much right to share in public spaces as anyone else."

And, this flies in the face of another fact about race that these black separatists refuse to acknowledge by wishing to create separate "black spaces" for (the new PC term) "students of color": Race is far from concrete, or black-and-white. I took multi-cultural studies in high school, and one of the things driven home to me by that course was that definitions of race vary tremendously from culture to culture and era to era. This is of especial concern to mixed-race students, who may or may not feel like they belong in a “black space,” or who might feel pressured or excluded if they happen to look more white than black (creating a feeling of separation, identity crisis, and appearance-focus that does not need to be there, and does not serve such students’ needs). It’s also true that “of color” or “minority” does not only mean black, these terms seem to be used to apply only to giving special privileges to black students, but not necessarily to other students who are also a member of a racial minority.

All this does is fan the flames of tension and division that are tearing this country apart. All it does is give fuel for real anti-black bigotry to occur in the future, further causing hateful outbursts which could continue to ruin the lives of innocent people.

There are real parallels in this to the struggle against feminism. Feminism used to be about how women were strong and equal to men, now it’s saying women are superior to men, but somehow still fragile enough to warrant giving us a weak, kiddie-like “content warning” lest we might read something online that offends our delicate female sensibilities.

This country should continue to be a beacon of democratic principles for the rest of the world. This means that nobody should be treated differently because of their race or sex under the law. I also want, in the spirit of the Bill of Rights, to make a stand for due process, freedom of speech, and freedom of the press, which I feel are all currently under attack from these kinds of ignorant mob-mentality-having student protest groups. They are an embarrassment to this country and to the millennial generation of which I am a part. They make a mockery out of the right of the people to peaceably assemble, and use it as a smokescreen, behind which they instead trample the rights of others.

This goes beyond the petty bickering of the gender wars and gets to the heart of the real political issues of this country, asking; is this the future of America that you really want, fellow college students?

Men and child abuse

Dean Esmay · 10 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

What does child abuse frequently look like from a male perspective? Dean Esmay and Stacy King discuss.

Dean's channel is here, and Stacy's is here. We suggest you subscribe to both.

Clementine Ford is a Fraud

Lee Turner · 11 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

"Clementine Ford is a freelance writer, broadcaster and public speaker based in Melbourne. She writes on feminism, pop culture and social issues." So reads her profile on the Australian Broadcasting Corporation's website.

On December 1st, major Australian news outlets reported that Ford has been receiving a torrent of abuse online for earlier reporting a man to his employer for making sexist comments to her and racist jokes elsewhere. The man's employment was terminated as a result and a secret Facebook community was set up by other women "in support" of Ford. Their aim: to report other men with the aim of causing harm to their reputation and livelihood.

There is no question that the original man's comment was inappropriate and that he should not have advertised his place of employment before commenting. However, it does not justify Ford's actions resulting in his dismissal, seeing that he was not representing his employer when he spoke, as well as the fact that plenty of other, less drastic measures were available to her, such as the Facebook block function or police mediation. Two wrongs do not make a right.

And so, the time is nigh for the all-seeing eye atop the angry lighthouse in the bowels of MRA Mordor, to shine its withering light onto this woman's work and tell the world that it is her – Ford, that should be fired from her job as a columnist. She is a bad reporter, who cites fraudulent sources, does not do her own research, quotes out of context and suffers from borderline potty-mouth evident in the emergence of excretory themes in almost every article she commits to the public realm.

Behold.
A lesson for men's rights activists on real oppression, June 19, 2014. In this article, Ford covers the International Conference on Men's Issues, held in Detroit that year. She muses on why the Men's Human Rights movement cannot be trusted to discuss men's rights and why she believes they are wrong, nay, evil misogynists. This article is a jumble of ignorance masquerading as informed opinion, but it is when Ford attempts to cite statistics to support what she is saying that we find outright fraud. She writes;

> …only 3 per cent of those accused of rape will ever be convicted" and links this website as her source.

This writer was at first confused as the site quotes a different figure – 2%. Then I looked up the link as it was around the date of Ford's article. Does @Neil Gaiman knows he's featured here (on RAINN, not AVfM)? If not, Neil, I'm sorry, I loved "American Gods" and I think you are one of the best contemporary English writers. You might want to talk to your agent about this though…

The figure in question has changed, due to an update in source, and more on that later. But all the figures here have been revised down, most significantly the first one, despite citing the same study. How is this possible? Did RAINN misread the study? Also, what is this Justice Department and how is it different to the Department of Justice?

It turns out that this study does not appear to exist. The closest to it, that I can find is a paper titled "Criminal Victimization 2011", on p8 of which one can find the following table:

TABLE 8
Percent and percent change of victimizations reported to the police, by type of crime, 2002, 2010, and 2011

Type of crime	Percent reported			Percent change
	2002	2010	2011	2002–2011*	2010–2011*
Violent crime	51%	51%	49%	-3%	-4%
Rape/sexual assault	55	49	27	-51†	-45†
Robbery	68	58	66	-2	15
Assault	49	50	48	-1	-4
Aggravated assault	66	60	67	1	11
Simple assault	44	48	43	-3	-10
Domestic violence[b]	59	67	60	--	-10
Intimate partner violence[c]	58	66	60	4	-10
Violent crime involving injury	62	65	61	-2	-7
Serious violent crime[d]	65%	57%	61%	-5%	7%
Serious domestic violence[b]	77	64	58	-24†	-9
Serious intimate partner violence[c]	73	54	59	-19‡	11
Serious violent crime involving weapons	69	55	67	-3	21†
Serious violent crime involving injury	71	63	66	-8	3
Property crime	39%	39%	37%	-5%	-6%†
Burglary	57	56	52	-10†	-12†
Motor vehicle theft	84	83	83	-1	--
Theft	32	32	30	-4	-4

†Significant at 95%
‡Significant at 90%
--Less than 0.5%
*Calculated based on unrounded estimates.
[b]Includes victimization committed by intimate partners (current or former spouses, boyfriends, or girlfriends) and family members.
[c]Includes victimization committed by current or former spouses, boyfriends, or girlfriends.
[d]Includes rape or sexual assault, robbery, and aggravated assault.
Source: Bureau of Justice Statistics, National Crime Victimization Survey, 2002, 2010, and 2011.

The figure most pertinent to the final one appears to be the one for 2010 – a 49% report rate for "rape/sexual assault."

Next, we look at the final score – the reported 2% or 3% of total convictions of reported rape. The later study titled "Felony Defendants in Large Urban Counties, 2009 – Statistical Tables" (note the year – 2009, the closest to the reporting figure for 2010 above) allows one to re-construct the chain of statistics for prosecution of rape allegations. These are poignantly known as "attrition rates" in other literature. 49% reported to police * 48% that proceed to trial * 68% conviction rate * 89% of whom are jailed results in 14% of all rape accusations resulting in a conviction. Not two or three per cent. I hope the reader will forgive me if I neglect to look up the June 20, 2014 source, seeing that RAINN appears to be pulling figures out of thin air and Ford does not bother to check their sources or to look up comparable statistics on her own.

The Australian Law Reform Commission's 2010 paper titled "Family Violence – A National Legal Response (ALRC Report 114)" sheds some light on this matter for Ford's home country. Its Section 26 offers a glimpse of the situation somewhat erratically broken down by state and age of victim, but very usefully for the same basic time-period as the American reports cited above. All the crucial elements are present – trial and prosecution with reporting figures available from Section 24 of the same paper.

Therefore, the Australian figures from around 2007 are as follows: 30% reported to police * ~17% (between 15-19%) proceeded to trial * 61.3% were found to be or pleaded guilty. This document can deliver the desired 3% figure, if one chooses a lower conviction estimate, which in that fluctuates between 20-80%. And if one looks at the 2005 PSS study (p21) , the reporting rate is even lower – 19%, resulting in a 2% conviction figure.

I strongly doubt that Ford meant to quote the ALRC but referenced RAINN with its "Justice Department" statistics instead. Even if that was the case, this article has been online for more than a year and no-one appears to have spotted the error or bothered to inform the publisher or the readers and print a correction of American statistics as relevant to an American men's rights convention – the article's subject, or analyse and reference Australian statistics instead. A measure that would have "paid off", had it been attempted – they happen to coincide with Ford's 3% claim. Coincidence naturally not being evidence, but I digress.

Rape is a serious issue. The least helpful way of discussing it is by means of false statistics. Behind each percentile is a person, let us not forget that.

Ford's piece is notable for one other major gaffe – the most quote-mined quote by Paul Elam, justifying whomever is so inclined to accuse him of being a "rape apologist." It originates from this article dating from 2010, which has long since sported a disclaimer, advising the reader to thoroughly consider its context. This is a slanderous, uninformed claim, unworthy of an ABC reporter.

Likewise, the infantile, crass language that Ford inserts into almost all her articles appears here in paragraph 4. It is the literary equivalent of drawing a penis on one's school desk, something that this woman has not been able to outgrow in her thirty or more years of existence. As she puts it in her short biography – now removed, but still available through reference by ABC and preserved by the Google archive;

> Please give her a job and/or some kind of paid work as she is now 30 years old, and her father no longer finds it cute when she asks him for money."

Yes please, somewhere in the private sector, and away from keyboard.

Clementine Ford is a fraud and should be fired from her job as a columnist for the ABC or any other publication for which she writes.

Dr. Neil Pollock of Vancouver, BC, Canada placed on genital mutilators directory

Gary Costanza · 11 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Pollock and another happy patient

From Dr. Pollock's website circumcisionvancouver.com:

"Dr. Pollock limits his practice to only two surgical procedures. Infant circumcision is one of these procedures. (No-Scalpel No-Needle Vasectomy is the other). For these two procedures, Dr. Pollock is one of the busiest and most well known physicians in North America. 20 years ago, before beginning to perform these procedures, Dr. Pollock traveled to many cities in North America researching first hand what he believed to be all the best techniques used by the most experienced doctors. After carefully studying their most effective strategies, Dr. Pollock put together his own approach to these surgeries, combining the most effective elements of what he learned. He then further refined the entire process creating what has become known today as "The Pollock Technique" for infant circumcision.

As a father of three, Dr.Pollock knows that the safety and comfort of your son is the number one priority. As of October 2012, Dr. Pollock has safely performed well over 35,000 infant circumcisions – making him one of the most experienced circumcision physicians in North America. Currently he performs approximately 2500 annually at his two private offices. Dr. Pollock is a frequent guest lecturer at local hospitals and conferences His research into developing a safe quick and virtually pain free approach to circumcision has been published internationally."

So, many thousands of infants' genitals were surgically altered by this man against their will, (although he gets a 'consent form' signed) and he still smiles? It seems all the adults involved in the lectures and conferences didn't bother to consult the actual patient – the infant – who I'm sure didn't – and wouldn't – consent.

It continues:

> Each year, there are over a million circumcisions performed in North America. Newborn circumcision when performed properly, is quick and safe. Some studies show that it may produce small benefits. These medical benefits accrue from infancy through old age. Parents should also be aware that there are physicians who question the significance of these medical benefits, as well as the practice of circumcision.
>
> It is Dr. Pollock's position (as well as the position of the Canadian Pediatric society) that;
>
> "When parents are making a decision about circumcision they should be advised of the present state of medical knowledge about its benefits and harms. Their decision may ultimately be based on personal, religious or cultural factors."

One million circumcisions a year is shocking because there are no medical benefits that justify routine infant circumcision and no evidence that these accrue "through old age." Ethically, despite what Dr. Pollock's position is, parents do not have the right to consent to permanent surgery for their infant because of "personal" or any other "factors."

Under "Parents Guide to Circumcision:"

> For detailed information about the medical benefits and risks of circumcision, please go to http://www.medicirc.org a website written by world renowned pediatrician- Dr.Edgar Schoen of San Francisco California, USA.
>
> This link has been prepared for families who wish to have their sons circumcised at the Pollock Clinics and would like information on our process from beginning to end.
>
> For more information regarding Infant circumcision, please visit The College of Physicians and Surgeons of BC.They offer a guide for physicians regarding routine infant male circumcision in light of evidence-based medicine and contemporary principles in ethics, law and human rights.

The link for Dr. Schoen doesn't work but a search of him reveals a strongly pro-circumcision ideologue that sees no grey area. The other link also gives no information.

Continuing:

> Why do parents choose to circumcise their sons?
>
> Current evidence indicates that the health benefits of newborn male circumcision outweigh the risks. American Academy of Pediatrics – policy statement for support of male circumcision
> It reduces the risk of urinary tract infection.
> It reduces the risk of penile infection also called balanoposthitis.
> It eliminates the need to do it later in life when up to 6% of boys will require a circumcision because of various problems. (When it is done later in life, it is a more costly, difficult, and riskier procedure requiring a general anesthetic, and it is more painful).
> It reduces the risk of getting some sexually transmitted diseases including Human Papilloma Virus (HPV), Herpes (HSV-2) and AIDS (HIV).
> It reduces the risk of penile cancer and cervical cancer in partners.
> Circumcised men have less risk of sexual dysfunction later in life.
>
> Why do parents choose not to circumcise their sons?
>
> They are concerned that they may be doing a procedure on an otherwise healthy baby that may cause pain or complications.
> They wonder whether their child will wish that he had not been circumcised at a later time.
> They are unsure of the medical reasons in favor of a circumcision.

Seems like someone is trying to sell something, and they are – your son's genital integrity, and many times, his actual foreskin. These supposed benefits have been debunked, while circumcision's risks and many complications, including death, are glossed over.

Then we read about "The Pollock Technique:"

> Dr. Pollock has developed "The Pollock Technique" for circumcision. This technique is known for its quickness (30 seconds) and safety. Dr. Pollock has considered even the smallest details including increasing room temperature and playing soothing music. To keep your son comfortable both during and after the procedure, Dr. Pollock uses several pain control methods including Tylenol, sugar filled gauze pacifiers soaked > with sweet juice for additional comfort and a topical freezing cream. In addition to ensure the most comfort for your son, Dr.Pollock has developed and uses a local anesthetic technique that is a combination block of both short and long acting anesthetic. This method provides comfort and coverage for both the procedure and for several hours after. All this ensures that your son will feel little or no pain at all.

Don't know how speed of circumcision is any better or safer (maybe better for the doctor at $445 a pop). And there's no way of knowing if your son feels "little or no pain at all."

Under "Frequently Asked Questions:"

> Q: There is a piece of skin still attached to the head of the penis, or you can't see the entire head of the penis.
>
> A: If you are concerned, come back to have the baby examined.
>
> Q: Does it hurt when the baby urinates?
>
> A: It may hurt a little the first day, but after a day it should not be painful.
>
> Q: What complications are possible from circumcision?
>
> A: Complications are rare. Occasionally, there can be bleeding from the circumcision many hours after the procedure. This is treated by putting some pressure with a gauze on the penis for 2-3 minutes to close the oozing blood vessel. (This will be demonstrated to you by our staff). Very rarely, more serious bleeding can occur which may require a visit to the hospital. Infection is also a possible complication. It is extremely rare and can be associated with redness, pus, and a foul smell from the circumcision. It is treated by putting Polysporin five times a day on the penis which usually resolves any infection with one or two days. Suboptimal cosmetic result is another possible but very infrequent complication.
>
> Q: Are more serious complications possible i.e trauma to the penis?
>
> A: Yes, they are possible; however, to date, this has never occurred with Dr.Pollocks patients.
>
> Q: Will it hurt my baby?
>
> A: Dr. Pollock has published a study that shows his pain control process is highly effective. Many babies can sleep right through the entire under 30 second procedure. Most babies experience little or no pain at all.

All these complications and more accompany this surgery, while intact baby boys go home happily bonded with Mom, pain free, and with a trauma-free greeting from the world.

Dr. Pollock requires parents of infants sign a "Circumcision Consent" form where is listed various risks of circumcision as well as this:

> We understand that according to the College of Physicians and Surgeons of British Columbia Infant Male Circumcision Manual (June 2004) the current medical consensus is that infant male circumcision is not a recommended routine therapeutic procedure.
>
> We understand that we are making a consent by proxy for our infant for a non-therapeutic procedure. By signing this form we have given our consent to this procedure as parents of this child.

See why the doctor requires this circumcision consent form? IT'S UNNECESSARY and risky.

This consent form would only be valid if the infant signs it, and anyone signing it for him allowing 'consent' to unnecessary mutilation is really taking away the baby's consent.

For more information about the risks of circumcision see research at neonatalcutting.org.

See a video of Dr. Pollock's circumcision technique here.

See Dr. Pollock rub elbows with Sean Penn and Charlize Theron while teaching how to mutilate genitals faster and safer.

His practice information follows:

Main booking line: (604) 717-6200
407-625 Fifth Avenue,
New Westminster, BC

1101-805 West Broadway
Vancouver, BC (near Vancouver General Hospital)

drneil@pollockclinics.com

Tyger Takes On… Mike Buchanan, Ray Barry, and Josh O'Brien

Mike Buchanan · 11 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Recently BBC3 broadcast another episode in their relentlessly anti-male series on gender-related matters. The presenter of Tyger Takes On… Am I Sexist? was 19-year-old Tyger Drew-Honey, once an actor in the sitcom Outnumbered. Tyger is famous in part for being the son of the legendary British actor and porn producer Ben Dover and Linzi Drew, a former topless model and porn actress.

The film crew recorded footage over a three- to four-hour-long period on a very cold afternoon outside Nottingham University on 27 February, about ten weeks before the general election. As the film crew was about to wrap up for the day, three or four angry young men and an angry young women appeared, were hostile towards us, and one hurled some very soiled cat litter over the windscreen of our van. I captured a short piece of video footage of the culprit skulking away.

Tyger presents the cat litter incident as if it had taken place shortly after we started campaigning – suggesting antagonism towards our protest from the outset – when it happened at the very end (as the golden early evening light will confirm). My suspicion is that at least some of the people who confronted us weren't students, including the genius on the bicycle. Or maybe he was a Gender Studies student.

I was later interviewed by Tyger in a hotel, over a period of maybe 30 minutes. Not one second of that interview made it into the final programme.

The film crew must have recorded plenty of footage showing us in a good light, engaging positively with passers-by. 18-year-old Josh O'Brien was particularly effective, and the extract from his interview with Tyger was selected so as not to disrupt the programme's feminist narratives. The BBC edited out virtually all of the footage which would have presented us fairly, along with the footage which would have shown feminists and manginas in a poor light. But they cynically included a few seconds of Ray Barry picking up some of the soiled cat litter, and poked fun at him over the matter. Shame on the BBC. What a vile anti-male organization it is, and it's only getting worse year after year.

The programme turned out to be precisely what we had always expected it would be, just the latest in a relentless string of BBC feminist propaganda pieces.

Female privilege, antifeminism

AVfM Video Source · 11 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

As we discovered in speaking with a trans male, there is an emerging dialogue from those who have lived on both sides of the gender fence that leans toward a more sane narrative about sex and power.

You can subscribe to Blair White's channel here. PE

Fiamengo File 12

Janice Fiamengo · 12 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Do Women Want Equality? Janice Fiamengo calls out Feminist bias and deconstructs this question in detail.

Dr. Jack Chang of Vancouver, BC, Canada placed on genital mutilators directory

Gary Costanza · 13 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Chang works with Dr. Neil Pollock. From his website circumcisionvancouver.com:

"Dr. Pollock limits his practice to only two surgical procedures. Infant circumcision is one of these procedures. (No-Scalpel No-Needle Vasectomy is the other). For these two procedures, Dr. Pollock is one of the busiest and most well known physicians in North America. 20 years ago, before beginning to perform these procedures, Dr. Pollock traveled to many cities in North America researching first hand what he believed to be all the best techniques used by the most experienced doctors. After carefully studying their most effective strategies, Dr. Pollock put together his own approach to these surgeries, combining the most effective elements of what he learned. He then further refined the entire process creating what has become known today as "The Pollock Technique" for infant circumcision.

As a father of three, Dr.Pollock knows that the safety and comfort of your son is the number one priority. As of October 2012, Dr. Pollock has safely performed well over 35,000 infant circumcisions – making him one of the most experienced circumcision physicians in North America. Currently he performs approximately 2500 annually at his two private offices. Dr. Pollock is a frequent guest lecturer at local hospitals and conferences His research into developing a safe quick and virtually pain free approach to circumcision has been published internationally."

Then we read about "The Pollock Technique:"

> Dr. Pollock has developed "The Pollock Technique" for circumcision. This technique is known for its quickness (30 seconds) and safety. Dr. Pollock has considered even the smallest details including increasing room temperature and playing soothing music. To keep your son comfortable both during and after the procedure, Dr. Pollock uses several pain control methods including Tylenol, sugar filled gauze pacifiers soaked with sweet juice for additional comfort and a topical freezing cream. In addition to ensure the most comfort for your son, Dr.Pollock has developed and uses a local anesthetic technique that is a combination block of both short and long acting anesthetic. This method provides comfort and coverage for both the procedure and for several hours after. All this ensures that your son will feel little or no pain at all.

Don't know how speed of circumcision is any better or safer (maybe better for the doctor at $445 a pop). And there's no way of knowing if your son feels "little or no pain at all."

Under "Frequently Asked Questions:"

> Q: There is a piece of skin still attached to the head of the penis, or you can't see the entire head of the penis.

> A: If you are concerned, come back to have the baby examined.
>
> Q: Does it hurt when the baby urinates?
>
> A: It may hurt a little the first day, but after a day it should not be painful.
>
> Q: What complications are possible from circumcision?
>
> A: Complications are rare. Occasionally, there can be bleeding from the circumcision many hours after the procedure. This is treated by putting some pressure with a gauze on the penis for 2-3 minutes to close the oozing blood vessel. (This will be demonstrated to you by our staff). Very rarely, more serious bleeding can occur which may require a visit to the hospital. Infection is also a possible complication. It is extremely rare and can be associated with redness, pus, and a foul smell from the circumcision. It is treated by putting Polysporin five times a day on the penis which usually resolves any infection with one or two days. Suboptimal cosmetic result is another possible but very infrequent complication.
>
> Q: Are more serious complications possible i.e trauma to the penis?
>
> A: Yes, they are possible; however, to date, this has never occurred with Dr.Pollocks patients.
>
> Q: Will it hurt my baby?
>
> A: Dr. Pollock has published a study that shows his pain control process is highly effective. Many babies can sleep right through the entire under 30 second procedure. Most babies experience little or no pain at all.

All these complications and more accompany this surgery, while intact baby boys go home happily bonded with Mom, pain free, and with a trauma-free greeting from the world.

Dr. Chang requires parents of infants sign a "Circumcision Consent" form where is listed various risks of circumcision as well as this:

> We understand that according to the College of Physicians and Surgeons of British Columbia Infant Male Circumcision Manual (June 2004) the current medical consensus is that infant male circumcision is not a recommended routine therapeutic procedure.
>
> We understand that we are making a consent by proxy for our infant for a non-therapeutic procedure. By signing this form we have given our consent to this procedure as parents of this child.

See why the doctor requires this circumcision consent form? IT'S UNNECESSARY and risky.

This consent form would only be valid if the infant signs it, and anyone signing it for him allowing 'consent' to unnecessary mutilation is really taking away the baby's consent.

For more information about the risks of circumcision see research.

See a video of Dr. Pollock's circumcision technique here.

See Dr. Pollock rub elbows with Sean Penn and Charlize Theron while teaching how to mutilate genitals faster and safer.

His practice information follows:

Main booking line: (604) 717-6200
407-625 Fifth Avenue,
New Westminster, BC

1101-805 West Broadway
Vancouver, BC

War on victims of female perpetrators goes back to college

Hannah Wallen · 14 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

For decades now, feminists have been promoting a male-demonizing narrative on sexual violence using statistics produced by deliberately biased research methods. Legislated changes based on that bias, dictating how American institutions of higher education approach allegations of sexual misconduct on campus, have sparked widespread controversy and reawakened existing criticism of that narrative and the research on which it is based.

The hysteria which is so prevalent today was kicked off in the 1980s with a race among feminist researchers to come up with the method that would produce statistics showing the highest prevalence of male on female rape. As I pointed out in an article in February of 2014 titled Who defines rape, that effort was exposed in The Toledo Blade in 1993, when inflated statistics were being used to lobby congress to replace the gender neutral Family Violence Prevention and Services Act of 1984 with the gender discriminatory, due-process-attacking, research bias funding Violence Against Women act.

The statistics which today are presented as rape culture gospel were hotly debated among feminists in academia in the early 90s. Skeptics criticized claims that sexual violence against women was common, pervasive, and tolerated in society (in other words, the start of modern rape culture theory.) It was pointed out that while feminist researchers' claims about the prevalence of rape ranged from 1 in 50 to an alarming 1 in 3, U.S. Justice department statistics had steadily remained close to 1 in 820 for the previous 20 years, and the FBI's tabulation of reported cases to local police showed a rate of 1 in 1300.

Militant feminists ardently sought evidence to prove their beliefs, with more concern for its support than its validity. Researchers were pressured to produce statistics showing increasingly high rates of rape and other sexual violence. Margaret Gordon (University of Washington) told the Blade's writers "There was some pressure – at least I felt pressure – to have rape be as prevalent as possible. I'm a pretty strong feminist, but one of the things I was fighting was that the really avid feminists were trying to get me to say that things were worse than they really are."

To achieve that goal, feminist researchers tinkered with definitions and survey methods, avoiding the pesky issue of many women refusing to define and categorize their experiences based on feminist dogma. The most successful of these charlatans was then Kent State University professor Mary P. Koss, whose career received a major boost when Ms. Magazine co-founder Gloria Steinem took an interest in promoting her work.

Steinem sponsored a national survey based on Koss's campus questionnaire, which used a roundabout method to slap the label "rape" on experiences 73% of her respondents didn't consider rape. In fact, 42% of them went on to have sex again with their alleged perpetrators.

Criticism of Koss's survey method is not limited to the fact that it defines women's experiences differently than the women themselves do. It also used vague wording designed to avoid limiting yes answers to times when women felt genuinely out of control of their situations, substituting the phrase "when you didn't want to," which could be interpreted to include "when you didn't plan to," or "when it wasn't your idea," or even "when you weren't into it but made the choice for other reasons" where "against your will" would have gotten more accurate responses.

The survey only targeted women, ignoring the possibility that the same experiences could happen to men and boys. These flaws, combined with questions defining intoxicated sex as rape without specifying incapacitation, and treating workplace sex as if women never use it to advance themselves, severely undermined the credibility of Koss's survey.

With Ms. Magazine's support behind her and congressmen using her work to promote a legislative attack on due process, Koss ignored her critics, instead choosing to market her bias to other feminist researchers. Her June, 1993 paper Detecting the Scope of Rape, a review of prevalence research methods, advocated ignoring women's self-interpretation of their experiences when that interpretation would be at odds with the feminist narrative on sexual violence. The excuse that direct questions garner inaccurate results was undermined by her brief, otherwise ignored mention of research showing that when the questions are accompanied by concrete definitions, misinterpretation is not a problem. This paper also revealed another significant prejudice in the design of Koss's research: She did not believe that her standards for consent and criminality should go both ways.

Koss explained her belief that intercourse forced on a male victim by a female perpetrator should not be considered rape, even when the victim does interpret his experience that way. According to page 206 of her paper, "Although consideration of male victims is within the scope of the legal statutes, it is important to restrict the term rape to instances where male victims were penetrated by offenders. It is inappropriate to consider as a rape victim a man who engages in unwanted sexual intercourse with a woman."

Koss believes that men's experience of sexual violence is less than that of women, and less impacting on them than women's experience is on them.

Check out what she has to say at 7:20 in this interview:
[soundcloud url="https://api.soundcloud.com/tracks/205139836″ params="color=ff5500&auto_play=false&hide_related=false&show_comments=true&show_user=true&show_reposts=false" width="100%" height="166″ iframe="true" /]

This, despite the fact that research exists which shows that while men are less likely to describe the impact of their experiences, that impact is clearly visible to anyone who cares enough to look beyond their speech. I referenced that research in an article on sexual misconduct by female staff at American juvenile detention facilities.

That's the Mary P. Koss Formula for Obtaining Sensational Statistics: Overly broad criteria for labeling an experience rape, vague wording designed to widen the net for "yes" answers to questions using those broad definitions, and the use of interpretation to maximize the statistics for female victims of male perpetrators and minimize the experiences of and statistics for all victims of female perpetrators, especially males, often using failure to widely report part of a given survey's results. Criticism is generally met with thought terminating cliches; accusations of sexism and rape apology, shaming, and threats of ostracism, because who could defend such blatant skulduggery?

Since the 1980s when Ms. Magazine sponsored Koss's first national survey and then promoted the results with sensationalist reporting, despite heavy criticism of their flaws, these biases have shaped establishment research used to promote every feminist-led approach to sexual violence; the "rape culture" narrative itself is based on them.

Campus campaigns from Take Back the Night to Teach Men Not to Rape have all relied on victim statistics skewed by non-consensual mislabeling of female experiences in hysteria's favor, and perpetrator statistics skewed by non-consensual mislabeling of male experiences to hide female perpetration. This deliberately biased methodology has been picked up by government agencies and used in research such as the CDC's National Intimate Partner and Sexual Violence survey and research promoted by the World Health Organization and United Nations.

This bias has been used to lobby for legislation, as well. The Campus SaVE act which has led to a storm of lawsuits against campus administrations for wrongful expulsion and other forms of discrimination, was pushed through by legislators confronted with hysteria-inducing claims based on statistics from Koss-influenced research.

Now, academic feminists are faced with a series of very public false accusation scandals, along with a resurgence of criticism of their narrative, its supporting research, and the "awareness" campaigns and lobbing that have been based on it.

They could take time to reexamine their methodology and its impact on campus legal, academic, and social environments. They could choose to modernize their approach by correcting the biases in their research methods to avoid exaggeration and include all victims and all perpetrators. Or they could dig their heels in, double down on the lies, and try to hammer their narrative past their critics using bigger, more authoritative, and more frequent repetition.

That last option seems to be their chosen path, at least according to a report recently released by The Association of American Universities, which cites Koss repeatedly as a source for past research on which methodology is based and contains biases that are consistent with Koss's work.

The report's description of the survey's methodology states that it used questions which avoided the labels researchers intended to apply to respondents' answers, instead substituting descriptions of specific types of behaviors and tactics the researchers felt constituted assault and sexual misconduct. Rape was defined as penetration, per Koss's stipulations, thereby excluding victims who were forced to penetrate instead of being penetrated, resulting in exclusion of victims of female perpetrators, especially those who were male. Having defined rape to avoid obtaining yes answers indicating male victimization by female perpetrators, the researchers largely de-emphasized male victims in their report.

"Promised rewards" was included in the criteria for labeling intercourse or sexual contact "coerced" and therefore "non-consensual." Additionally, examples given to help students understand the researchers' definition for coercive threats included "threatening to post damaging information about you online." Failure to obtain "affirmative consent" was also included in the criteria for labeling an incident "non-consensual." The affirmative consent standard, aka Yes Means Yes, considers consent invalid if it is not explicit, meaning coyness, shyness, or lack of experience can make a consensual encounter fit this standard's criteria for rape. Descriptions of the standard state that consent can be nonverbal while wider discussions on the topic undermine that caveat by eliminating the potential for anything short of verbal statement to be trusted as an indicator of consent.

None of these fit the legal definition for rape, which does not stipulate that consent is negated by a potential reward for sex or that it must be explicit, or spoken.

The report also contains the admission, in describing respondents' explanations for choosing not to report incidents labeled sexual misconduct, that "the dominant reason was that it was not considered serious enough," meaning that once again researchers are defining respondents' experiences differently than the respondents themselves did.

The study further inflates numbers by lumping attempted, but not completed incidents labeled sexual misconduct in with completed incidents.

This research repeats all of the same elements of bias and misdirection for which previous feminist researchers have been strongly criticized. Its continued the use of methodology with known, widely discussed flaws cannot be considered accidental. It indicates a belief among feminists that a lie repeated often enough actually does become the truth; they seem to believe they can prove their beliefs valid by manipulating information using the academic equivalent of a cup-and-ball carnival game.

Feminist researchers have demonstrated that expanding the definition of a survey's terms widens its net for yes answers. They've shown that excluding from a term's definition the description of a specific group's common experiences can mostly eliminate that group from a survey's results. They've revealed that a willingness to take a hypocritical approach to their respondents' self-determination makes it easier to fit data from surveying them into a narrative.

What has all of that proved? Bias prevents it from making any solid point about the prevalence of sexual violence on university campuses, but it does show a huge gap between feminism's narrative and the experiences of the general public.

It cannot confirm a gender prevalence in perpetration, but the manipulation of rape's definition shows a clear bigotry against victims of female perpetrators, particularly if those victims are male.

The false framing doesn't validate feminism's narrative on sexual violence, but it does demonstrate great disdain for the right and ability of the average citizen, including victims, to form an informed, independent opinion on the topic.

The fact that they cannot investigate the topic without doing this only indicates that honest research can't prove feminism's rape culture narrative valid. If it could, they'd be employing it and inviting public scrutiny of their methodology instead of relying on a combination of sophistry, repetition, and bullying. The only question left is, how long can feminist researchers continue to be taken seriously while presenting research using Mary Koss's discredited methods?

Originally published at http://honeybadgerbrigade.com/

A second alternative to Paper Abortion

Hopeland Cash · 14 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Featured Image by Daquella manera on Flickr, used under license (Creative Commons Attribution 2.0 Generic/CC BY 2.0).

In a previous article I discussed the issue of Paper Abortions: A legal procedure for men to opt-out of all parental rights and responsibilities post-conception, just as women can do via abortion (and other means). Currently men lack any such option so I proposed a method to achieve equality: Instead of giving men rights to paper abortions (not popular) or taking away women's rights to abortions (not happening) we could enforce equal parental responsibility by requiring abortive mothers to adopt a child, undertaking full parental responsibilities just as men are required to do without having to bear a child.

Now, that article was tongue-in-cheek satire meant to point out the inequality in reproductive rights between men and women and the absurd unfairness of how fatherhood is forced on men. All in jest, yes, but still an interesting thought experiment I think. Really it could be applied to almost any area of men's issues: If men can't be given more rights, and women can't have their rights reduced, how can we finagle things to be more equally-unfair?

For today I'll stay on the topic of paper abortions mainly because I believe it will be one of the major battle grounds of the future of the MHRM and will one day prove to be a victory with radical repercussions. For conversation's sake I'd like to propose a second alternative to paper abortions, one that is a bit less satirical, maybe just a little more realistic, and that fits in much more smoothly with our existing legal system. The core force is money. Isn't it always? In our current legal climate men have few-to-no enforceable parental rights. There is no guarantee of shared parenting, no law against paternity fraud and, as I might have mentioned, no way to opt-out of fatherhood after conception. However, men bear a sometimes-crippling parental responsibility in the form of child support. I propose simply that we apply the same rules to women who have abortions. In effect let's make every abortive mother a non-custodial father.

Consider this scenario: When a woman has an abortion she becomes the "mother" of a non-existent, amorphous "child entity" in the care of the state. Just as if she were the non-custodial parent of a real child, the woman is required to pay child support for the child she conceived. This money would go directly into the foster care/orphanage/child welfare agencies, funding state care of children without guardians. She has no actual child in care but her funds go to support the children that are there. The end result would be the same as if the woman had lost all custody: she has no access to the child (since it doesn't exist) and is required to support it (though there is no singular "it", just the child welfare system which would distribute received funds as needed).

This ties in beautifully with our existing family law system, leveraging child support enforcement agencies to ensure compliance. This approach would not force parenthood on anyone and, as we are often reminded of, being required to support a child whom you never see is not a violation of a person's rights so the women would not be being wronged in any way. Instead if they conceive a child they are legally obliged to provide 18 years of financial support. With men this money goes to the mother of their child. With women it would go to state to care for the collective of parentless children. It actually makes plenty of sense because the state already collects "child support" from men to reimburse state agencies for welfare provided to their children and baby-mommas. Every abortive mother gets to become a proud baby-daddy to every foster child and orphan in her country.

This system would be relatively simple and safe compared to my suggested mandated-adoption and other concepts. Child support agencies already exist in every state with systems for determining and collecting payment. It also works well with abstract-children since child support is generally based on the payer's ability to pay rather than any actual needs of the child, so it doesn't matter if the child doesn't exist. When a woman has an abortion she goes right into a registry and in due course receives a child support order based on her real and imputed income. This makes it good for the economy too: child support is based on how much you are capable of earning so all those women with women's studies/communication/basket weaving degrees will have to get a job that pays according to their determined ability.

Or face jail. Let's not forget that. People can be imprisoned for failure to pay child support (along with various other draconian measures). These abortive mothers would be under the same requirements: pay or go to jail. And payments keep piling up while behind bars, even for a child she didn't want (since she aborted it) and whom she never sees (since it isn't real).

But that's equality. This is the reality that non-custodial fathers face so let's apply the same rules to abortive(non-custodial) mothers. Unlike men they will still have their choice — give birth and have 80%+ chance of keeping custody or abort and pay — but it would help tremendously to equalize the playing field. If women faced the same inescapable bind of responsibilities as men I think the world would be a very different place. I'm not being regressive: I support abortion rights, but more equality is needed. There is nothing a man can do to escape his parental responsibilities even if he never wanted to be a father, so let's not force women to bear children against their will but by all means we should hold them to the same financial standards as men. Conception is enough to trigger a man's responsibilities so the same should hold true for women. Compared to mandated-adoption this would be more egalitarian: even now men aren't forced to "parent", only to pay, so if we're equalizing reproductive rights we should follow the same model.

It would be beneficial in multiple ways. As mentioned it would be good for the economy: Every abortive mother would be required to earn to her ability, creating job opportunities and increasing taxable income. More importantly it would create a huge influx of funding to the child welfare/foster care system, bringing much needed money to countless parentless children and the more a woman earns the more she pays. As we've been taught, all children need from one parent is money, so it should be sufficient from these women as well. For 18 years they will have to pay every month to support a child they didn't want, all because of a simple mistake, a failure of birth control or the deception of their partner. There will be little recourse when they need to reduce payment and they will have to shoulder this burden even when they try to build a family of their own.

But they made their choice. They engaged in sex with the risk of conceiving and that's just what happened. Now they'll have to step up and lean in.

Or we could just give men paper abortions. But that'd be too radical.

Sometime in the future

AVfM Video Source · 14 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Another great video from Neel Kolhatkar.

If you like Neel Kolhatkar's work his YT channel can be found here.

White female privilege and the domination of men.

Tim Patten · 14 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

It's a fact. It's official. Man is no longer ruler of planet Earth. Men lost that privilege way back in the Nineties. What do you mean, you never noticed? Okay, so I'll admit men's transition from the pinnacle of power was a subtle one. But if you'd have been paying attention, you could have caught a couple of tell-tale signs.

Equal rights, Feminism, Women's and Gender Studies were just a few of the more obvious markers.

There we were, the most sophisticated, intelligent beings ever evolved. Expert hunters, brilliant problem-solvers. Providers and builders, engineers and scientists, soldiers and priests. We shaped the world we live in. We were the Masters of our own Destiny.

And then somewhere along the line, everything changed.

Sometime around 1990, human males were tipped from their throne and replaced by their female counterparts. And if you need it a little more specific; White Women.

Supported by Patriarchal Governments the world over, the rot set in and the natural degeneration spread like a pandemic. Today, women are at the helm of society, industry and politics. And the attack is being led by Privileged White Women.

Not convinced?

Then let's take a look at the growing White Female Privilege Checklist for 2016:

In today's Modern Patriarchal Society a Privileged White Woman

1. Will rightly expect to be treated more leniently by the courts than any man committing the same crime.i

2. Can choose to abort her unborn child, or farm it out for adoption while the child's father is completely omitted from the decision.ii

3. Reaps the benefits of affirmative action schemes which allow her access to cheap business loans and female-friendly fellowship programs and grants that give her an unfair advantage over her male competitors.iii

4. May make false accusations of sexual abuse and most likely get away with the claim, while the man suffers social shame and risks imprisonment and labeling as a sex offender.iv
5. Will enjoy the physical, emotional and financial support and the offer of free legal advice from female-safe Crisis Centers. Comparable support networks for men who suffer abuse at the hands of women simply do not exist.v
6. Is allowed to sit or be close to unrelated children and minors in parks and other public spaces while a man who does the same risks falling under the suspicion of pedophilia, and the assumption they are possibly dangerous sexual predators.vi
7. May call 911 with unfounded claims of physical violence and sexual assault by men and expect the police to blithely believe her claims. Her meager accusation is enough to get the man thrown in jail while her claim is investigated. In cross-gender crimes, it is invariably the man who appears to be guilty until proven innocent.vii
8. Will probably never see the inside of jail or prison. Unlike 1 in 3 black and brown males.viii
9. Belongs or belonged to the 60% female majority on campuses across the US and as such is protected by the organizations created solely to provide safe havens, form policies and offer consultations that support her social and psychological requirements. Support groups which deal with 'male issues' are still in the infant stages.ix
10. On any college campus, women who file a sexual assault claim are assumed innocent while men must prove their innocence. Men are punished without proof.x
11. Will generally not have to fear any consequences for physically abusing her male partner in public. She may hit, slap and scold him while he is socially bound to accept her actions without retaliation.xi
12. Can rely on help from passers-by if she's assaulted in public. Privileged White Women enjoy many socially-acceptable safeguards that simply do not apply to her male counterpart.xii xiii
13. Will regularly play the 'weaker sex' card at work. She will ask men to lift heavy objects or to reach to high shelves. Generally speaking, men are more than happy to help. But if one of those men ask that same woman to bring him a cup of coffee, he risks her bringing a charge of sexual harassment against him that could lose him his job.
14. Controls 85% of America's spending power and is the coveted target of massive marketing attention. Privileged White Women are the Holy Grail of the modern advertising machine. Men, on the other hand, are often the butt of advertising jokes that pinpoint his lack of intelligence or masculinity.xiv
15. 58% of America's workforce are women.xv
16. Has a 70% chance or more of getting hired for a job as a man, even in STEM.xvi xvii
17. In her twenties she will earn more than men her age.xviii
18. Is protected by labor laws that ensure a fair wage and appropriate work conditions.
19. Can, if she gives birth, demand maternity leave for her husband or same sex partner.
20. Stands a better chance of opening her own business. Over ten million women in The United States own and operate their own companies and get affirmative action assistance.xix
21. Will use misandry as a weapon. She will form bonds with her 'sisters' and encourage the slander of the male character amidst wild accusations of man's oppression of women. xx
22. Has a far greater chance of becoming a Fortune 500 CEO than she did ten years ago. Her appointment may cost the company dearly, but the pressures of today's patriarchal society dictate that even the largest and most powerful organizations bend with the storm of female occupation.

23. Implements her superior procedural and policy skills to attain positions of power in large companies.xxi
24. Can be confident that when she smiles sweetly and flicks her hair, male co-workers will drop everything to do her bidding.
25. Will expect and usually demand the man picks up the check on a date.xxii
26. Does not have to fear recriminations against her gender in the unlikely event she is dismissed from her job.
27. Is far less likely to become the victim of violence or murder, regardless of ethnicity.xxiii
28. Will very rarely have her femininity questioned if she chooses not to have children or wear 'girly' makeup or clothes.
29. Be considered 'normal' if she decides to become one of the 10 million single moms in the US. For a woman to raise a child or children on her own is considered 'normal'. A single dad however, will generally be regarded as a failed husband or a widow.
30. Will face less public and media scrutiny if she decides to run for political office. Even that of the President of the United States.
31. If she's Canadian, can fully expect to join the privileged group of women who occupy 50% of the top political posts in the country.
32. Will have received enormous encouragement as a child to strive for any dream or goal she may have.
33. Has grown up in an environment that glorifies feminization and scolds or punishes boys for not being as well behaved as their opposite gender.xxiv xxv
34. Can turn on the TV and continuously see her 'sisters' well respected and proportionally represented in the News.xxvi
35. Controls 85% of America's household budgets.xxvi
36. Will have a far more varied choice of clothing, hair styles and makeup than men. She will be able to adapt her look to fit her every emotion. From glamorous film diva to Plain Jane.
37. Usually gets child custody in a divorce. Also financial support from government monies to support herself and her offspring.xxviii
38. After divorce will freely date other men or partners after a divorce with an eye to finding a new 'provider' for her family.xxix
39. Can, if she chooses, negotiate a division of labor with her partner in marriage and file for a no-fault divorce if at any time, she becomes dissatisfied.xxx
40. Will enjoy the natural attention bestowed upon her by men. She can expect to be treated like a QUEEN.xxxi xxxii Her wedding day is HER DAY!xxxiii
41. Will never be expected to lift heavy objects or perform any kind of difficult or dangerous task if there is an able bodied male close by.xxxiv xxxv
42. Does not need to recognize her female privileges, nor accept criticism thereof. She will consider her White Woman Privilege a birth right, instilled in her from her mother and grandmother and any of her other female relatives and friends. As boys growing up under the watchful eye of their patriarchal mothers, men can expect a completely different treatment.xxxvi

The age of the Privileged White Woman is upon us

But it is not too late. People are supporting men's groups, men's gender issues on college campuses and Red Pill groups such as the NCFM with donations. Organizations like Men Going Their Own Way are springing up everywhere. More and more adult males are breaking free of their invisible chains and seeking their destiny in a new world where women no longer control and manipulate them at will. You too can join the movement. Be a Man again!

References:

i http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2012/09/11/men-women-prison-sentence-length-gender-gap_n_1874742.html
ii http://www.washingtonwomenforchoice.com/iii http://nwlc.org/resources/affirmative-action-and-what-it-means-women/iv http://www.wsj.com/articles/alan-m-dershowitz-a-nightmare-of-false-accusation-that-could-happen-to-you-1421280860
v http://wrcnepa.org/
vi http://abcnews.go.com/GMA/story?id=3527035
vii http://www.avvo.com/legal-guides/ugc/false-complaints-of-domestic-violence-dv viii http://www.huffingtonpost.com/2013/10/04/racial-disparities-criminal-justice_n_4045144.html ix http://www.forbes.com/sites/ccap/2014/12/29/the-disappearing-male-on-college-campuses/x http://www.foxnews.com/us/2015/06/20/accused-is-guilty-campus-rape-tribunals-punish-without-proof-say-critics/xi http://jezebel.com/5173723/the-double-standard-is-women-hitting-men-ever-okay xii http://abcnewspapers.com/2015/09/09/elderly-woman-saved-from-burning-oak-grove-home/xiii http://citifmonline.com/2015/08/25/amanfrom-robberies-woman-saved-from-being-raped-by-robbers/xiv http://she-conomy.com/facts-on-women xv https://www.washingtonpost.com/news/morning-mix/wp/2015/04/14/study-finds-surprisingly-that-women-are-favored-for-jobs-in-stem/xvi https://www.washingtonpost.com/news/morning-mix/wp/2015/04/14/study-finds-surprisingly-that-women-are-favored-for-jobs-in-stem/xvii http://www.rsc.org/chemistryworld/2015/04/women-twice-likely-be-hired-men-academic-posts xviii http://www.theguardian.com/money/2015/aug/29/women-in-20s-earn-more-men-same-age-study-finds xix https://www.sba.gov/content/women-owned-businesses xx http://time.com/3101429/misandry-misandrist-feminist-womenagainstfeminism/xxi https://www.washingtonpost.com/posteverything/wp/2015/03/11/why-there-are-so-many-female-managers-but-so-few-ceos/xxii http://www.theatlantic.com/business/archive/2014/09/why-do-men-keep-paying-for-the-first-date/380387/xxiii http://www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/pubmed/1635092 xxiv https://playersjourney.wordpress.com/2013/10/08/dont-scold-women/xxv http://www.childresearch.net/data/school/1998_01.html
xxvi http://www.telegraph.co.uk/men/relationships/11357703/The-Lords-are-wrong-women-are-not-under-represented-in-the-media.html

xxvii http://she-conomy.com/facts-on-women xxviii
http://www.divorcenet.com/resources/divorce/for-men/divorce-for-men-why-women-get-child-custody-over-80-time xxix
http://www.eharmony.com/dating-advice/dating/5-reasons-divorced-women-get-married-quicker/#.Vl38unarQb0 xxx http://www.nolo.com/legal-encyclopedia/no-fault-divorce-vs-fault-divorce-faq-29080.html xxxi https://blackandmarriedwithkids.com/2014/03/heres-how-to-treat-your-wife-like-a-queen/#.Vl39NHarQb0 xxxii http://www.ehow.com/how_4451449_treat-woman-like-queen.html xxxiii http://www.brides.com/blogs/aisle-say/2015/10/what-every-mom-thinks-at-daughters-wedding.html xxxiv http://liftbigeatbig.com/10-reasons-why-heavy-lifting-is-terrible-for-women/xxxv http://www.bls.gov/cps/demographics.htm
xxxvi http://whatmenthinkofwomen.blogspot.com/2011/05/why-cant-women-handle-criticism.html

Dr. Mahboob Shafii of the Birmingham Circumcision Clinic, England placed on genital mutilators directory

Gary Costanza · 14 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

From the Birmingham Circumcision Clinic website circumcisionbham.co.uk:

"Birmingham Circumcision Clinic is one of the largest circumcision service providers in the UK and Europe. We carry out circumcisions on babies, children of all ages and adults.

The Circumcision Clinic is part of a major award winning health care provider with more than 200 staff members and nine sites throughout Birmingham and the West Midlands. We attract patients from all over the country, some travelling from as far as Scotland, Ireland, Wales and even Europe."

Dr. Mahboob Shafii's bio:

> I'm a general practitioner with a specialist interest in dermatology based at Laurie Pike Health Centre. I am also the lead clinician at the Birmingham Circumcision Clinic.
> I studied medicine at Cardiff University and then carried out my general practice training in Birmingham, working at Selly Oak Hospital, Queen Elizabeth Psychiatric Hospital, Birmingham Children's Hospital and Birmingham Women's Hospital. I joined the Modality Partnership in 2007 and have worked with the team to develop the dermatology service and also set up one of the largest circumcision services in the UK. Outside of work, I help to run a scout group.

Something is wrong when a facility called "The Circumcision Clinic" is part of "a major award winning health care provider. Modality Medical Services Ltd. evidently grants female infants genital integrity and autonomy, boys, not so much. Maybe this dermatologist and GP doesn't know the foreskin is part of the penis and that removing it is genital mutilation. Outside of work he does good works – but inside he mutilates infants without their consent.

Under "Our Fees:"

> Restraint and Refund Policy
> The Birmingham Circumcision Clinic operates a very strict restraining policy. For clarity we have explained the policy below. Please take your time to read and understand the policy and then judge whether your child will allow for the procedure to go ahead.
>
> Once the anaesthetic has been injected, only children aged two years and under will be restrained during the procedure. However where children of this age group show signs of distress or resistance and the doctor feels it would be too harmful to continue, the circumcision will not be carried out.
>
> For children above the age of two years, we will not allow any form of restraint, either by the doctor or parents. After the anaesthetic has been administered, if your child refuses to lie still on the operating bed, it will be dangerous to carry out the circumcision and the procedure will be cancelled.
>
> The Birmingham Circumcision Clinic is an award winning clinic, that has an excellent reputation and while the majority of procedures go ahead with no problems, in certain cases children do get extremely distressed and the procedure has had to be cancelled.

The fee for a newborn baby to be circumcised is a measly 125 pounds – blood money at a discount. Has the doctor no shame? Permanent mutilation for a few pounds?

At least the doctor has some heart, as 'if children aged two and under show signs of distress or resistance and the doctor feels it would be too harmful to continue, the circumcision will not be carried out.'

More common sense here, avoiding total chaos and psychological damage: "For children above the age of two years, we will not allow any form of restraint, either by the doctor or parents. After the anaesthetic has been administered, if your child refuses to lie still on the operating bed, it will be dangerous to carry out the circumcision and the procedure will be cancelled."

Under "Your Complete Guide to the Circumcision Service at Birmingham Circumcision Clinic:"

> What type of anaesthetic is used and will my child feel any pain?
> Before the circumcision, the penis is made numb by injecting a medicine around the base of the penis. This is called a local anaesthetic and ensures that there is no pain during the circumcision procedure. After the injection, the doctor will wait a few minutes for the anaesthetic to take effect, test the foreskin, and only when he is certain that the child is unable to feel localised pain, he will begin the circumcision. The type of anaesthetic we use can last for up to six hours.

I'd like to hear how he's certain that "the child is unable to feel localised pain" but no method of determining this is offered. Does he ask "does this hurt?"

> Will my child cry?
> Every baby and child is different. We have had babies and children who have not cried for the injection and have remained quiet during the entire circumcision procedure. Other babies and children start crying as soon as they are undressed and put on the bed.
>
> One way to calm and settle babies and very young children is to give them a bottle of sugary water to drink during the injection and the circumcision procedure. We strongly advise this for all babies, infants and toddlers, even if they are breast-fed.

I think the bottle of sugar water is to make the adults feel better, not the infant. Sort of like 'here kid, bite the bullet.'

> What method of circumcision is used for babies, infants and toddlers?
>
> For the overwhelming majority of babies, infants and toddlers, we use the Plastibell circumcision technique.
>
> The Plastibell is a clear plastic ring with a handle and a deep groove running around it. This was invented in America in 1950 and is now one of the most popular circumcision methods used in the UK, USA, Australia, and New Zealand.
>
> After administering the local anaesthesic, the penis and foreskin are separated by gentle pushing. Then a cut is made from the top of the foreskin allowing it to be pushed back and the Plastibell to be placed in position.
>
> The appropriate sized Plastibell is chosen and placed over the head of the penis. It is then covered over by the foreskin. A ligature is tied firmly around the foreskin in order to hold the skin against a groove in the Plastibell. Then the excess skin is carefully trimmed off. Finally, the handle of the plastibell is broken off at the end of the procedure. The entire circumcision procedure takes 10 to 15 minutes. The ring falls off within 10 days, leaving a small wound that will heal over the following weeks. No stitches are required.

The foreskin is an integral part of the penis and is firmly attached at birth. It's not "excess skin;" most doctors and others doing this cutting don't know the function of the foreskin.

> Formal Surgical Circumcision Techniques
>
> The largest sized Plasibell that is available is 1.7cm in diameter. Thus in a very small percentage of babies, infants and toddlers the Plastibell method may not be suitable and one of the formal surgical circumcision teachniques may need to be used. The doctor will discuss this with you if the procedure becomes necessary.

> The three formal surgical techniques are:
>
> Forceps Guided Circumcision
> Sleeve Resection Circumcision
> Dorsal Slit Circumcision
> All three of the above circumcision methods require stitching after the foreskin is removed. We use dissolvable stitches. This means that the stitches will automatically dissolve over a period of two to six weeks and do not need to be removed.
>
> What method of circumcision is used for children aged 2 and under 16 years old?
> For a small percentage of children aged 2 and above, the Plastibell method (details above) may still be suitable. However for the vast majority of older children our preferred and safest method is to use one of the formal surgical circumcision techniques as outlined above.
>
> The formal circumcision techniques require the use of a scalpel to remove the foreskin, bipolar forceps to control any bleeding and then the cut edges are stitched with absorbable sutures. The area is then cleaned and a dressing applied. The entire process can take approximately 45 minutes.

You'd think with procedures like "sleeve resection" and "dorsal slit" we'd be given risk information. Maybe here under "Blog -> What You Need to Know about Having your Baby Circumcised:"

> Circumcision is when the loose skin, known as the foreskin or prepuce, which covers the end of your baby's penis is surgically removed. The foreskin covers and protects the top part of the penis and contains nerves, blood vessels, and a tiny amount of muscle. In the circumcision practice, babies are counted as those under the age of three months. A circumcision on babies or children under the age of five is rarely for medical reasons, and is usually carried out as a family decision, for social and cultural reasons, or as part of Islamic or Judaic religious traditions.

Well, the foreskin DID 'cover and protect' the penis and USED TO 'contain nerves and blood vessels' until the doctor cut it off and tossed it away like garbage.

Saying that circumcision is "usually carried out as a family decision" is actually adults forcing THEIR irreversible decision on an unconsenting infant.

> Carrying out the procedure
>
> The World Health Organisation guidelines state that a baby must weigh more than 2.5kg in order for the circumcision to be carried out. It is safe for your newborn boy to undergo the procedure at any stage taking his weight into consideration, however, it's advisable that if your baby is premature, you should wait until he is older to take into account how early he was when calculating his readiness.
>
> For newborn babies, your surgeon is likely to use a local anaesthetic to numb the area. This will be either via an injection at the base of the baby's penis, or the application of a cream, around an hour before the procedure. The procedure itself is considered to be minor surgery and won't take long – there is no need for you or your baby to stay overnight at the clinic or hospital. If your baby is being circumcised for non-medical reasons, both parents must give their consent.
>
> How to prepare
>
> There aren't many special preparations you'll have to make before the operation, though we'd advise that you change your baby's nappy and keep a clean one ready to change him into after the surgery is complete.
>
> We'd also recommend that you give him a bottle of sugary water to drink during the injection and the circumcision procedure, as this is a good way to help calm and settle babies or very young children. Although parents may feel more at ease staying in the operating room during the entire circumcision procedure, it can be > a stressful time for parents and you may feel more comfortable waiting outside until it has been carried out.

‘Parents may feel more comfortable waiting outside until the circumcision has been carried out.’ Why, so they think it’s the “minor surgery” he says it is?

Since Dr. Shafii gives no information about the risks of circumcision, see that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Shafii’s practice information follows:

Birmingham Circumcision Clinic
Laurie Pike Health Centre
2 Fentham Road, Aston
Birmingham
B6 6BB
Tel: 0121 250 0386
Fax: 0121 523 6163
circumcision.bham@nhs.net

Paul interviews Blaire White, trans woman, MHRA

A Voice for Men · 15 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Paul wants 18,000 subs to his YouTube channel for Christmas. Currently needs just 79 to get there.

Subscribe here.

Not just a western problem

AVfM Video Source · 15 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

This news articles from several years ago shows that the problems facing men are not just a western phenomenon. Many viewers will identify with the problems men in Hong Kong are facing.

How Republicans can win in 2016

AVfM Video Source · 15 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

If you don't sub to Paul's channel on YouTube, you are probably a communist.

Republicans can win the 2016 presidential election with some fundamental changes to their strategy.

> It's no secret that Hillary is coming next year. And of course her campaign, above all others, will make the election about sex, or if you prefer the liberal misnomer, gender.

The War on Women rhetoric will ramp up, and it will again be a winning strategy for Democrats if Republicans respond to it as stupidly as they did the in the last election.

To get the corrective action going, we need to start with some basics, including some training for republicans on what conservativism is vs what you seem to think it is.

First, leave your traditional values, chivalry and religion in the closet where it belongs. No, seriously, shut up about that shit.

You see, pushing for small, unobtrusive government when you don't want nationalized healthcare or nationalized anything else is great. It is a true conservative value. So there is no point in shooting yourself and everyone else in the foot by wailing about keeping government out of our lives, except when you want state functionaries to enforce your moral or religious values on everyone else.

Shut up about gay marriage. In fact, if you understand the least little bit about conservatism the only question you should be asking about marriage is why we allow the government to license it in the first place. It is a private matter, not a public one. Gay people have a right to keep the government out of their private lives, too. They also vote. Think about it. You can practice true conservatism and add to your rank and file simply by not being a hypocrite and by recognizing that in ignoring the corrupt family courts you have done a lot more damage to marriage than gays could ever hope to accomplish.

Do you know what Title IV-D is? Of course you don't. You have been too busy being sanctimonious about gays intruding on your sacred institution that lost its sacredness the moment Ronald Reagan signed no fault divorce into law in California.

Next, end the War on Drugs and quit getting bent out of shape if people get high. Quit acting like you saw Reefer Madness one too many times and drop the paranoid concern that someone, somewhere might be toking up and enjoying it. It's a private choice, so quit acting like a martini sipping, hypocritical fascist and pull your head out. Lead the way on ending cannabis prohibition – using the conservative ideals of people like William F Buckley – and you will bleed votes from the left.

Ditch the likes of Tammy Bruce (and at least a dozen other pundits). She's poison to conservative America. I called into her show once when she was discussing medical marijuana. She was actually mocking cancer patients seeking relief with cannabis. Why? Because she thought they might enjoy the buzz during chemotherapy.

Is that your conservative values at play? Is that government out of our lives? Should you perhaps do a double check on the meaning of small government?

Now we come to a big one. Where it concerns sexual politics, trying learning what you are actually talking about and speaking to it with conviction. Personally, I have come to rely on the "binders full of women" style inept responses of Republicans for entertainment value, but it is a shit strategy to counter the heavily gendered attacks from Democrats.

Democrats, especially the likes of Clinton, will drive their campaign strategies on fraudulent talking points. The phony 1 in 5 rape statistic, the phony wage gap, phony rape culture, phony patriarchy, the phony war on women and the like.

It is time you started a dialogue with the great numbers of women who don't want to be portrayed as helpless victims and needy toddlers that Democrats make them to be. They are out there in droves, and they are starting to speak up. It is fair to assume that they don't know you even realize they exist.

That brings us to one of the most critical changes that Republicans need to make if they ever hope to do anything but fail again. Instead of dodging these issues, and coming up with weak, obsequious pleas for people to understand that "Republicans love women, too," start calling out the lies for what they are. Use mostly Republican women to do it if you have to. Most of all, find your balls and take a direct, informed stand on the issues.

Don't retreat. When they call you a misogynist or a traitor to women, mock and laugh at them.

Do republicans stop and wonder for a moment why someone like Donald Trump, a former Clinton supporter, is thrashing them so badly in the polls? Do they wonder why not a single professional Republican politician can even come close to his popularity?

The answer is simple. Republicans lost their balls. The embarrassing lack of gumption in Republican candidates is a glaring neon sign that says weakness.

People don't trust weak leaders. That is not conjecture. Research bears it out. Raymond Cattell, a pioneer in the field of personality assessment, developed the Leadership Potential equation in 1954. According to his research some of the top traits of strong leaders are as follows:

Emotional stability. Good leaders must be able to tolerate frustration and stress. Overall, they must be well-adjusted and have the psychological maturity to deal with anything they are required to face.

Does that sound like your average Republican, who might engage in tough rhetoric when it comes to terrorism, but folds like a cheap suit when facing feminist lies.

Dominance. Leaders are often times competitive and decisive and usually enjoy overcoming obstacles. Overall, they are assertive in their thinking style as well as their attitude in dealing with others.

There's Donald Trump. There is his lead. Half of what he says might be bullshit, but at least he says that bullshit with conviction. It is resonating with voters.

Social boldness. Leaders tend to be spontaneous risk-takers. They are usually socially aggressive and generally thick-skinned. Overall, they are responsive to others and tend to be high in emotional stamina.

At the risk of being redundant, there is Trump again. Bear in mind that Trump has been accused repeatedly of misogyny due to things he has said. Now go look at his poll numbers again. It doesn't matter. What will kill you politically is not saying controversial things, but in being milquetoast and cowardly.

Tough-mindedness. Good leaders are practical, logical, and to-the-point. They tend to be low in sentimental attachments and comfortable with criticism. They are usually insensitive to hardship and overall, are very poised.

How poised did Mitt Romney look standing there talking about binders of women? How poised does any Republican look when confronted with sexually political bullshit? And no, thanking your mother and talking about how much you love your wife is not a poised reaction to gendered talking points from Democrats. It is a weak deflection, proving you can't handle the topic.

Finally, if you can't muster the spine to do anything else, for god's sake, pry yourself out of the Reagan 80s and bring yourself into the age of the internet. Democrats are killing you with social media. There are narrative changing philosophical wars being raged entirely online and Republicans are still talking through tin cans and string.

Did you know that one of the most popular conservative voices in America is a gay dude who is more flaming than napalm? Mind you he won't be your cup of tea in all cases because he seems to be an actual vs fake conservative, but he is still a great lesson for you if you will pull the stick out of your behind and get willing to learn something.

Take a look at the writings of Robert Stacy McCain, who actually understands and confronts the false narrative that keeps costing you elections.

Christina Hoff Sommers with the American Enterprise Institute is another good example. Even though she remains destructively attached to the label of "feminist" (which explains why she still buys into some feminist lies) she is at least tuned in to what is happening in the real world of everyday people.

The bottom line is this, Republicans. In running against Hillary, you are running against feminism. So far, where it concerns feminism, you have been cowards and supplicants. Your only hope here is to take a stand on feminism, to fully join the growing, vocal anti-feminist, pro-freedom movement.

In doing so, you will siphon votes from Democrats, inspire a more vocal base and start showing the fortitude that actually comes with leadership skills.

If you fail to do that, you might as well all resign and line up to vote for more lunatics running the asylum.

There she is, Miss America – Warts and All

Doug Mortimer · 15 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

I think I was in my early 40s when I came across an astounding photo in an old family album. There was my mother in a two-piece bathing suit, albeit modest by today's standards, and holding a trophy. In 1938, she had won some sort of beauty contest at a beach resort on the Jersey shore. My mom a babe? Who knew?

A little voice in my head said that directing my middle-aged male gaze at my mother was too creepy, so I turned the page. But I couldn't stop thinking about that picture. My mom was 30 when I was born, so my earliest images of her were considerably more mature than the hottie in the old snapshot. Upon further reflection, I remembered old Miss America telecasts and how important they were in our household.

My grandmother was born in Atlantic City and my mother spent her summers there, so the Miss America pageant, typically held the weekend following Labor Day in Atlantic City, was a big deal. To her dying day, my grandmother considered Atlantic City "The Playground of the World," even though the world had moved on to Las Vegas, Acapulco, Miami Beach, and other sybaritic destinations. The Miss America Pageant, which began in 1921, was perhaps the signature event of Atlantic City.

Every year, my mother and grandmother religiously watched the proceedings, occasionally joined by a neighbor or friend. I don't remember where the menfolk were at this time. I don't know if their absence was due to lack of interest or simply the realization that any sort of hubba-hubba/va-va-voom/hoo-hah response to the swimsuit competition would have been inappropriate.

I could have cared less till around 1963 when my hormones started kicking in. As a child, I had heard numerous comments about the various physical attributes of females…great gams…nice ass…man, she could poke your eyes out with those knockers, etc. I was aware that various movie stars, such as Marilyn Monroe and Jayne Mansfield, were female icons, and I had seen any number of animated cartoons with scenes involving males responding to eyeball candy (director Tex Avery was the clear leader in this regard, though Bob Clampett was a strong second).

When I was six years old, a Broadway musical called The Most Happy Fella introduced a song called Standing on the Corner (Watching All the Girls Go by). It became a popular ditty in the late 1950s and was covered by a number of artists. So I had some vague understanding that looking at women was something that men did and it was perfectly acceptable behavior but I didn't understand why it was such a big deal. I didn't really get it till I hit puberty…or should I say, it hit me. Ah, now I see what you guys are talking about!

So at the age of 13, I injected myself into the annual viewing of the Miss America pageant at our house. I certainly didn't care who won. Whether it was the "home team," Miss Pennsylvania, or one of the 49 "visiting teams" was of no importance. I was just there for the parade of pulchritude.

That may sound pathetic, but in those days, young men had few choices. I vividly remember my first glimpse of Playboy at a friend's house when I was 12. "My father says it's good for me to have this," he told me. His father was a psychiatrist. I'm not sure if mom had any say in the matter, or if she was even informed of it.

I was living in a less enlightened household and choices were limited. I was partial to the women's underwear ads in the Sears catalog. Don't let anyone tell you that granny panties aren't sexy. In days of old, they were the norm. Some of my peers, obviously budding multiculturalists, fancied National Geographic. I suspect a lot of the collections of this publication one encounters at garage sales today were begun by adolescent males mesmerized by all that toplessness, or topfreeness, as it would be called today.

So in 1963, the chance to ogle 50 hot babes on TV, albeit in black and white, was a rare opportunity – and it could be done in plain sight, even though there were adult women in the same room!

Well, I kept my mouth shut, but the adult females in the room were outspoken. In my admittedly callow consciousness, all the contestants looked like knockouts; not so to my mother and grandmother. During the competition, their critical thinking skills got quite a workout:

“Her neck’s too long.”

“I don’t like her hair.”

“Her eyes are too far apart.”

“Too scrawny.”

“Look at the size of those feet.”

“Get a load of those thighs.”

“I think she’s already getting crow’s feet.”

“Are those falsies?”

“Her mouth is bigger than Martha Raye’s.”

“I can’t believe the schnozz on that one.”

Name any part of the female anatomy other than the big V, and my mother and grandmother had something to say about it. And when it came time for the talent competition, they made Simon Cowell look like Dale Carnegie.

Well, such behavior was a puzzler to me. At that time, I didn’t know my mom was a former beauty queen, but looking back now, it is ironic that she was so hypercritical. Geez, mom, couldn’t you – of all people – cut those poor girls some slack? My report cards never received such thorough scrutiny.

More than half a century later, however, those comments now provide me insight into the female psyche.

As a child, I’d witnessed any number of face-to-face interactions with my mother and her friends, and they never ragged on each other. Every new hairdo elicited comments such as “I love what you’ve done with your hair.” Never was heard a discouraging word. How could the hairdressers get it right 100% of the time? Didn’t they ever screw up?

Remember the old joke about men greeting each other after a long absence and insulting one another…but not meaning it, and women greeting each other after a long absence and complimenting one another…but not meaning it.

H.L. Mencken once said, “When women kiss it always reminds one of prize-fighters shaking hands.” He also defined misogynist as “a man who hates women as much as women hate one another.” Not a bad rejoinder if someone ever accuses you of being a misogynist. As a corollary, he also said, “On one issue, at least, men and women agree: they both distrust women.”

Such quotes certainly clash with the much-vaunted female herd instinct. There is strength in numbers when it comes to political ideologies, and since feminists “don’t need no man,” banding together amplifies their voices. Normal females, however, compete for the best available male, from high school till menopause (and, according to a recent article in an AARP publication, sometimes even as late as the nursing home).

So dissing the competition’s attributes is a form of female trash talk. And it persists long after the woman has captured a man. I think mature women correctly perceive younger women – even the ones they see on television or in other media – as a virtual threat to abscond with their men. So they have to pick them apart just to inflate their own egos. As women age, every glance into the mirror reveals a slow leak in desirability, and even the most overinflated female ego must eventually acknowledge that reality.

I don’t know if Mencken ever had anything to say about the Miss America pageant, but he did once nominate evangelist Aimee Semple McPherson for the contest. His distaste for holy rollers was legendary, so perhaps by linking Miss America with her, he was also getting in a dig at beauty contests.

Mencken and the Miss America Pageant were both riding high in the 1920s, but time has not been kind to them. During the late 60s and early 70s, the Miss America pageant was squarely in the crosshairs of the women's liberation movement and demonstrations on the boardwalk in front of the Atlantic City Convention Center were commonplace.

By 1980, Bert Parks, who had hosted the pageant for 25 years and was almost synonymous with it, retired. But the pageant staggered on, now competing with Miss USA, Miss Universe, Mrs. America, and probably other pageants I don't know about.

From 2005 to 2013, the Miss America pageant was held in Las Vegas, where it remained until 2014, when it returned to Atlantic City. I don't know that I would interpret that as a return to traditionalism.

The current Miss America is Miss New York, one Kira Kazantsev. Her pet charity is a domestic violence program called "Love Shouldn't Hurt." A close reading of the text on the web site doesn't turn up any recognition of battered men. Why am I not surprised?

Well, if my mom and grandma were still around, I'd sic them on Ms. Kazantsev. I think they'd rip her a new vagina. This time around, I would find the spectacle much more amusing.

Dr. Bob Reddoch of Ontario, Canada placed on genital mutilators directory

Gary Costanza · 16 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Bob Reddoch

"About Dr. Reddoch" from his website circumcisionontario.com:

"Dr. Bob Reddoch is a well known and respected emergency department physician and educator in eastern Ontario for over 20 years.
Dr. Reddoch now limits his clinic practice to only two surgical procedures. Circumcision is one of these procedures. (No-Scalpel No-Needle Vasectomy is the other). Dr. Reddoch underwent extensive training with Dr. Neil Pollock, one of North America's foremost authorities on these two procedures. Dr Pollock's research into developing a safe, quick and virtually pain free approach to circumcision has been published internationally."

Under "Parent's Guide To Circumcision" there's this:

> Each year, there are over a million circumcisions performed in North America. Newborn circumcision, when performed properly, is quick and safe. The medical benefits accrue from infancy through old age.

Then these glowing reviews:

> Why do so many doctors recommend the Reddoch Clinics' technique for patients choosing circumcision?
>
> • Dr. Reddoch uses the Pollock Technique, a quick and virtually painless procedure pioneered by Dr. Neil Pollock in Vancouver, BC and safely performed on over 35,000 infants in the last two decades. For a video demonstration of Dr. Pollock's circumcision technique, click here.
>
> • Our procedure takes only 30-60 seconds (10 times quicker than most hospital circumcisions).
>
> • We use extensive pain control methods including Tylenol, a sugar solution (to reduce pain perception), a topical freezing cream, and a local anesthetic injection (both short- and long-acting).
>
> • There are extremely low complication rates.
>
> • For your peace of mind, Dr. Reddoch is available 24 hours a day on his personal cell phone. All families are given his contact information if any concerns should arise so they can reach the doctor directly at any hour.
>
> • We do not charge any hospital administration fees.
>
> Why do parents choose to circumcise their sons?
>
> Research shows that:
>
> • It reduces the risk of urinary tract infection.

> • It reduces the risk of penile infection also called balanoposthitis.
>
> • It eliminates the need to do it later in life when up to 6% of boys will require a circumcision because of various problems. (When it is done later in life, it is a more costly, difficult, and riskier procedure requiring a general anesthetic, and it is more painful).
>
> • It reduces the risk of getting some sexually transmitted diseases including Human Papilloma Virus (HPV) and AIDS (HIV).
>
> • It reduces the risk of penile cancer and cervical cancer in partners.
>
> • Circumcised men have less risk of sexual dysfunction later in life.
>
> Why do parents choose not to circumcise their sons?
>
> • They are concerned that they may be doing a procedure on an otherwise healthy baby that may cause pain or complications.
>
> • They wonder whether their child will wish that he had not been circumcised at a later time.
>
> • They are unsure of the medical reasons in favor of a circumcision.

All of the supposed "research" above has been debunked and is no reason to mutilate an infant without their consent. You can call this practice a 'cutting mill' that makes a tidy profit by mutilating infants assembly line style.

Under "Complications:"

> Circumcision is associated with few and infrequent complications, although with any surgical procedure there are occasional problems. For example, bleeding. In almost all cases bleeding is controlled by direct pressure.
>
> Even though complications are rare, do not hesitate to consult Dr. Reddoch if you have any questions about the appearance of the penis. Remember, early treatment (if any is needed) is always best.

Dr. Reddoch's website then goes on to list certain complications. A sampling:

> Bleeding: …You treat active bleeding from the penis the same as you would for the tip of a finger…
>
> Concealed Penis: …When the length of the penile shaft is no greater than its diameter or when there is a good amount of pubic fat, the penis will tend to retract inward. This is normal…
>
> Infection: …Although rare, there have been reported cases of infection. Common signs of infection include: a pus like discharge, a foul smell, excessive swelling or redness, local warmth, a fever, or a rash anywhere in the area of the penis…
>
> Sticking Bandage: …There will be a long gauze strip (1/2×8 inches) wrapped around your son's penis. This strip may fall off within the first 24 hours. If it falls off early, do not worry, this is normal, just leave it off…

Under "Keep in mind the following things:"

> If your child has any medical problems or significant jaundice, discuss this with Dr. Reddoch before giving him more Tylenol.

Very laudable to give this warning, as acetaminophen poisoning is a danger, yet would not be needed if not for this genital mutilation. How many infants killed this way are counted as poisoned and not attributed to circumcision?

Then there's this misleading information:

> Frequency of complications: The frequency of complications after circumcision varies with the skill and experience of the physician amongst other factors. Studies have shown the following complication rates for > this procedure:

>
> | Complication: | Rate: |
> | --- | --- |
> | 1. Significant post-operation bleeding requiring medical attention of any kind | 1/400 |
> | 2. Phimosis or narrowing of the shaft skin opening over the head of the penis requiring medical intervention | 1/500 |
> | 3. Buried or trapped penis; ie. Penis gets partially buried in the abdomen and requires medical intervention | 1/800 |
> | 4. Infection requiring antibiotics | 1/1000 |
> | 5. Meatal Stenosis – Narrowing of the urethra requiring medical intervention | 1/1000 |
> | 6. Suboptimal cosmetic result | 1/500 |
> | 7. Trauma to the head of the penis | none |
> | 8. More serious complications including death | none |

Not mentioned is that these numbers are for the practice, not the general public. I say the practice because this chart, as was this list of complications, was taken verbatim from the website of Dr. Neil Pollock whose "method" Reddoch endorses.

It's there that we see the disclaimer for 7. and 8. "Has never occurred in our practice." Parents looking at this might think there have been no deaths from circumcision, which is NOT true.
Finally, this chilling item from their "Infant Circumcision Manual:

> Our Mission "To uphold the highest international standards of male health care in circumcision, while treating our patients with compassion, dignity and respect"

For more information about risks see here at neonatalcutting.org

His practice information follows:

820 McConnell Avenue
Suite 108
Cornwall, ON K6H 4M4
tel: 613-933-9997
fax: 1-866-343-3944

2430 Bank Street (at Hunt Club)
Unit 1
Ottawa, ON K1V 0T7

Women in Combat

Michael Conzachi · 16 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Last week, U.S. Defense Secretary Ash Carter issued a landmark announcement that beginning in 2016, all combat jobs in all U.S. Armed Forces Branches will be available to women. This includes all special operation forces such as Army Green Berets and Navy Seals.

This decision may now have a blow back effect as military and political leaders are now coming to grips with the fact that women may now be forced to comply with registering with the Selective Service System; meaning that for the first time in our nation's history, women could be subject to the draft.

Although the draft no longer exists; at least right now, we cannot say that it would not be reinstated given the current state of terrorism in the world today; a level of terrorism that involves barbarism at an epic level; something that hasn't been seen since the Middle Ages.

The 1981 U.S. Supreme Court case of Rostker vs. Goldberg, officially excluded women from the draft on the premise that women were prohibited from ground combat operations.

A few days after the Defense Department announced that all combat jobs will be open to women, a three-member panel with the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit heard arguments in a 2013 lawsuit filed by the National Coalition for Men and James Lesmeister.

Deciphering the legal speak, essentially, the arguments proposed by Plaintiff's Attorney Marc Angelucci, NCFM, including President Harry Crouch and member Fred Sottile were that excluding women from having to register, was that it was discriminatory.

The prior 1981 Supreme Court Decision and the argument and position of this three-member panel, seems to suggest that the discriminatory argument is moot, since the policy change by the DOD.

This case appears to be headed back to the district court for further argument. What this also appears to be, is the courts will hand off the decision back to Congress; a shuffling of the decision to put this decision back into the hands of the legislature. Everyone pointing their fingers saying "it's not my job, you decide," "no no no it's not my job, you decide." The typical hand wringing that we typically see in today's government that occurs at all levels and with both parties.

The shrill lobby who jumped up and down like circus monkeys screaming and demanding that all military combat jobs are open to women, will now start jumping up and down like circus monkeys complaining that they didn't really mean that women will now have to actually register for the draft, and if they don't, they will be subject to the same penalties and possible prosecution as men if they fail to do so.

The typical delusional uber-feminist speak, "we demand, we demand, we demand, combat jobs." "Oops; well, we didn't really mean that we would have to register for the draft, and be subject to the same penalties as men if we fail to do so, we just want equality, equality, equality."

Those demands now also seem to be moot. We shall now see how the delay tactics, irrational arguments, spin and legal actions will be to prevent young women from having to register, by the shrill equality cottage industry.

Huh? WTF? Am I suddenly on a different planet? Can someone please translate this convoluted, upside down, sideways up, Jefferson Airplane window pane acid logic to me?

It appears, that despite the studies, testing, and protests by large numbers of high ranking military officials, some Pentagon officials who have not fallen in line with the politically correct socialization of the military, and most combat operators who state that women simply do not have the physical strength nor the warrior, "Sheep Dog" mind set to do this dangerous arduous job, and to voluntarily and willingly place themselves in harm's way; to protect the Sheep from the Wolf.

In seemingly the only display of testicular fortitude opposing this monstrously stupid social engineering decision, came from the Marine Corps Marine Corps Commandant, General Joe Dunford who requested that the Marine Corps be exempt from the change as careful studies and a lengthy exploratory training and testing program shows "integrated units" with men and women don't perform as well as all-male units. He also wanted an exception to maintain elite units known as force reconnaissance as male-only.

According to the study and program conducted by the Marine Corps, which has yet to be released, women were slower, in an exercise testing an integrated unit's ability to remove casualties from the battlefield. The slower performance and need to use additional troops led to more casualties. Those tests concluded the slowness exposed the entire unit to more danger.

"A greater reliance on two-man carrying methods removes another Marine from providing local security during the movement," the report said. "Integrated crews performed noticeably slower during the execution of this subtask." Other tests showed that women had poorer performance in hikes, gorge crossings, cliff ascents and shooting accuracy.

In a recent 2014 study of more than 7,600 special operations personnel by the Rand Corporation, echoed the same sentiment of General Dunford; essentially stating in one collective voice that allowing women in combat roles, especially in special operations units will be disastrous, will cause men to leave the service and will cost lives. The survey also allowed for written comments.

One special operations respondent to the survey stated this.

"I could list hundreds of reasons why women cannot do the job that a Green Beret is required to do, but as I only have 1,000 characters, I will choose the one that I think is the most important." "I weigh 225 pounds, and 280 pounds in full kit, as did most of the members of my ODA (a 12-man Army Green Beret unit). I expect every person on my team to be able to drag any member of my team out of a firefight. A 130-pound female could not do it; I don't care how much time she spends in the gym. Do we expect wounded men to bleed out because a female soldier could not drag him to cover?"

Another special operations respondent stated the following, intermingled with a host of expletives.

“No one wants this. Do us a favor and listen to what we are saying for a change. Can Washington really afford to take that risk so politicians can brag to the public that they brought gender equality to SOF?” “Expletive, Expletive, Expletive!”

An Army soldier in an elite unit who has won unit physical fitness awards, who trains in mixed martial arts, and who is a former football player, spoke on condition of anonymity;

I’m 6’5” in stocking feet; nearly 6’7” in boots and helmet and dressed in full “battle-rattle” of nearly 100 pounds, I am well over 320 pounds, about the same as an NFL lineman. At that weight and in combat conditions with bullets flying and sh*t blowing up everywhere, even UFC former champ Rhonda Rousey wouldn’t be able to pull me out of the line of fire if I went down, and she may get killed trying.”

The request for the exception from the Marine Corps drew the ire of Navy Secretary Ray Mabus who called into question the testing methods, motives, and mind set of the Marine Corps personnel conducting their study. It appears that Secretary Mabus’ cancerous feminist and hallucinogenic thought process, prevented him from seeing and understanding the obvious, that virtually every test, study, survey, argument and proof that women simply do not possess the physical attributes, and emotional, and critical thinking skills that are necessary for ground combat operations; he is going to force it anyway.

Since the release of findings of the Marine Corps study, Mabus has publicly criticized it, saying the Marines in charge were biased against the idea of women in combat, and the women who participated may not have been the best the Corps had to offer.

That decision; without a microgram of a doubt, will cost lives.

California Congressman Duncan Hunter (R), a former Marine officer and Iraq veteran issued a statement saying Mabus’ recent public comments were an insult to the service.

“Secretary Mabus is quickly proving that he’s a political hack who cares more about doing the White House’s bidding than the combat effectiveness of the Marine Corps. Mabus is not only insulting the Marine Corps as an institution, but he’s essentially telling Marines that their experience and judgment doesn’t matter.”

Cheerleaders and supports of the women in combat mantra insist that physical and training standards are not and have not been lowered to accommodate females. That is about as truthful and accurate as what comes out of the southbound end of a steer; BULLSHIT!

There are now numerous stories; including People magazine, and whistleblowers who have all said that the three recent graduates of the U.S. Army's elite Ranger School were in fact afforded special considerations. The three who did graduate along with another dozen or so that failed were allowed to preview certain courses and aspects of Ranger School months before they actually had to perform them, were allowed to recycle or permitted numerous "do-overs" out of the view of other trainees and only with selected staff, were provided special trainers and nutritionists months in advance, and suddenly and mysteriously, their Ranger School training and injury records were mistakenly shredded when they were requested by a congressman who became aware of the special treatment and compromised standards.

Oklahoma Congressman Steve Russell (R); himself a retired Army Lieutenant Colonel and graduate of Ranger School had demanded all training records of the women who had graduate from the Secretary of the Army, when tips started pouring into his office.

Among the documents Russell requested were patrol grade sheets, spot reports, phase evaluation reports, sick call reports with all to include the Ranger Instructor comments for each and every phase to include every recycled phase and class. Also requested were each female candidates recycle history and dates for each phase.

Here is a post from Congressman Russell's Facebook page.

https://www.facebook.com/reprussell/posts/1150222141672632

His request went unfulfilled and was met with a request for his own records from a group of West Point affiliated women, led by Sue Fulton; herself a former Army officer and West Point graduate, and Janet uh-uh-uh-uh-uh Reno bloated look-a-like. Fulton tweeted out a demand to Russell; presumably between bites of an In-and-Out Double-Double; to see his Ranger School records.

> Let's see YOUR #RangerSchool records, Congressman. @WestPointWomen @gaylelemmon #RLTW pic.twitter.com/6A7qXW2JEE
>
> — Sue Fulton (@suefulton) September 24, 2015

That's like a three toed sloth asking for the running times of a greyhound.

In conclusion; what we have is a staggering and epic level of factual evidence that every scientific study, survey, comments and opinions of some military leaders; and most importantly the common sense wishes of those in the foxholes; the "ground-pounders;" the ones who will be directly affected and who may die, and basic common friggin sense, that women simply do not possess the inherent warrior and physical qualities for combat operations.

Military women have served in deployment areas, some have encountered combat conditions, and yes some have been injured and killed. No one is going to detract from, or fail to honor the sacrifice that some women have made. Are there some women who are physically and mentally tougher than men? Sure there are, but we don't put all military males in direct combat units either.

Military morale has tanked in the past seven years with the current policies in place, the unclear and dangerous rules of engagement that are getting military members killed, the persecution of military males based on dubious sexual assault allegations that would not reach the front door of a civilian prosecutor, and now this decision has and will continue to drive qualified men and some women out of military service.

I can imagine Defense Secretary Carter delivering his message in typical "Forest Gump" southern drawl along with his Flex-o-Lite ping-pong paddle is his back pocket saying, "I'm not a smart man, but I know what equality is."

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=iEwO26Dr5k8

With all of the coddling and babying of women in our criminal and family courts, our college campuses with the claims that women are so fragile that if they are in the same zip code as a bottle of alcohol, and they have their hand touched by a male student, and that is tantamount that they have been raped, then just what in the hell does anyone in their right mind want women in direct military combat units in combat conditions.

I wonder if a female Soldier or Marine who is on the front lines and gets shot at by ISIS, if that would constitute grounds for getting a restraining order against the terrorist. What if the terrorist shouts out to the female combatant uncomfortable words, would the U.N. or the Geneva Convention rules have to be re-written to mandate trigger warnings? What if female combatants are taken POW, will the enemy be required to provide “safe spaces” for female POW’s, sanitary conditions?

Ooooooooooh,,, I get it now,,, yeah, let’s only put women on the front lines, and when the terrorists shoot at them or threaten to cut their heads off with dull knives, they can petition for restraining orders. Yeah, that’s the ticket, we’ll defeat the enemy by restraining order. Gee,,, I apologize for my lack of forward and progressive thinking. My bad.

As a result of this shrill feminist social engineering delusional demand, and now mandated Department of Defense policy, perhaps the equality mantra will be tempered once millions of 18 – 25-year-old females will be forced by law, to line up around the corner from each and every Selective Service office across the country, or when they start coming home with missing limbs or in boxes in mass numbers.

You don’t hook up a covered wagon to a sheep, not even if you put a Rambo mask on it, you hook it up to a horse. Is that not clear?

I have made some facetious comments for entertainment purposes but to those in positions of political, military, and Pentagon decision making I say, “Jesus Herbert Christ folks, wake up and think!”

This is not an issue of equality, it’s an issue of ability.

References:

http://ncfm.org/2015/12/action/ncfm-vp-marc-angelucci-successfully-argues-ncfm-case-against-male-only-selective-service-system-in-ninth-circuit-court-of-appeals/

https://www.washingtonpost.com/news/checkpoint/wp/2015/12/07/pentagon-opening-combat-jobs-to-women-alters-factual-backdrop-in-keeping-them-out-of-the-draft/http://www.stripes.com/news/us/opening-combat-jobs-to-women-alters-1981-supreme-court-ruling-on-draft-1.382654

https://www.washingtonpost.com/news/checkpoint/wp/2015/12/09/federal-appeals-court-considers-is-it-discrimination-for-only-men-to-register-for-the-draft/http://www.wsj.com/articles/marines-commandant-argues-against-women-in-all-combat-jobs-1442613875

http://www.military.com/daily-news/2015/12/11/us-special-operators-say-no-to-women-in-special-operations-jobs.html?ESRC=dod_151211.nl

http://www.marinecorpstimes.com/story/military/2015/09/11/secnav-criticizes-marines-infantry-study-interview/72059308/

http://www.marinecorpstimes.com/story/military/capitol-hill/2015/09/15/congressman-secnav-insulting-marines-women-combat/72336286/

http://www.people.com/article/female-ranger-school-graduation-planned-advance http://www.armytimes.com/story/military/capitol-hill/2015/09/24/west-point-women-seek-congressmans-ranger-school-record/72735678/

https://www.facebook.com/reprussell/posts/1150222141672632

https://twitter.com/suefulton/status/647072993722679296?ref_src=twsrc%5Etfw

AVfM Reference Wiki

Robert Brockway · 16 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Huff Po, stop the nonsense!

AVfM Video Source · 17 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Huffington Post made a video about 48 things that allegedly women hear in a lifetime and men just don't. Lucian Vâlsan took them all point by point, only to (unsurprisingly) find that most of those 48 were complete nonsense, and from those that were sex-specific, many of them are compliments anyway.

Definitely worth a watch for its harsh reality check.

You can subscribe to Lucian's Freedom Alternative, here.

Toward a Deeper Understanding of What Feminism Is

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 17 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

In an earlier article, I spoke of something called non-feminist target consensus, and why we should move toward such consensus if we would effectively move against feminism in massed formation:

In that article, I posted a numbered list called the "Seven Points of Understanding". The list was meant to suggest a working agreement on what "feminism" really is. It was composed loosely because it was meant to channel our thoughts in a loosely calculated direction, as the first stage in a deeper convergence of understanding.

Granted, many people will never get to that deeper convergence. They will only skim through the seven points, nod their general agreement and give no further thought to it.

So be it. We can live with that. (Have we got any choice?)

But for those who mean to go further, I offer the following as a kind of second-degree initiation. Does that sound like a plan? All right, let's converge upon it.

For a start, let's mothball the conspiracy theories. Powerful interest groups may have given feminism a leg up, but they never invented it. Most seemingly conspiratorial patterns are better explained by what I call moral confluence – the tendency for like-minded humans to form spontaneous systems of cooperation. "Birds of a feather flock together", as folk wisdom informs us, and we need no conspiracy theory to account for this. In principle, it is nothing more mysterious than two people walking side by side on the same road and falling into step with each other.

Mind you, we don't rule out bonafide conspiratorial projects in the general mix – of varying sizes, with varying actors, changing through time. But we don't saddle ourselves with over-arching conspiracy narratives, nor do we bother with smaller ones unless easy evidence makes them "too good to ignore."

Next, we should agree that feminism was never extruded into the world from start to finish as a seamless connection of ideas – it was, and is, a patchwork rife with contradictions. It did not grow from a point source, but from a range of sources: organically, holistically, and morphogenetically. After that, moral confluence took over.

Feminism is more than just ideology. It is a set of practices in the objective world, and the ramifications of those practices. Effectively, feminism is a moral confluence manifested as a social super organism. It has fuzzy boundaries, but you can map it by the light of two cardinal principles, and in order to see how feminism operates you must bear those principles in mind. Once you've got that sorted out, everything settles into place.

Firstly: feminism is the project to increase the power of women both individually and collectively, and this project is a zero sum, infinite game with no clearly stated upper limit or endpoint.

Secondly: feminism is held together and boosted along its trajectory by a bottomless disaffection toward all things male. Despite what the average feminist will tell you, feminism is very much indeed "about hating men".

These two principles illuminate each other. Furthermore, they cycle in and out of each other in a chicken-and-egg dynamic: it is not clear which comes first, so it is hard to know where to start explaining.

However, let's start with the first principle because it's easier that way. After all, nearly any feminist will give you a hairy argument if you insist that feminism is about hating men, but I doubt you'll find a feminist anywhere who would argue that feminism is not about empowering women.

So to increase the power of women, as to increase the power of anything, demands a rationale. Feminism rationalizes its project by suggesting that women need more power because they haven't got enough in the first place.

That being said, the question becomes "how much power for women is enough?" How must we quantify this? How must we configure this? If feminism can furnish no answer here, we must suppose that none can be had, and that the feminist project is to empower women infinitely.

We have seen no official statement which says “accomplish the following, and feminism will disband itself.” Furthermore, if there is any such document on earth, we insist that we have no duty to hunt for it. On the contrary, we insist that feminism’s supporters bear the onus to make this information clear to non-feminist men and women, in a manner that is widely known and unmistakable. We await that day.

Very well. Feminism is literally nothing if not the project to increase the power of women. It must be this if it is anything at all, and whatever you might add to this it remains this at the very least. That is a consensus nearly all would share, a crossroad of understanding that puts everybody on the same map.

Now, to increase the power of women could only mean to grow it by comparison to some other power. After all, we can hardly quantify this if we fail to establish a baseline measurement.

So let us think further: would not the feminist project be meaningless if female power didn’t grow specifically by comparison to MALE power? If both men’s and women’s power grew by comparison to some third power, it would be undifferentiated HUMAN power which had augmented itself, yes? But in that case, the limiting term “women” would be inappropriate and misleading. Nor would the term “feminism” be applicable.

So we conclude that the core of the feminist project is to grow female power by comparison to male power in particular, and for want of contrary evidence we also conclude that this project has no proposed endpoint.

Such being given, it follows that women’s power would sooner or later surpass men’s, issuing in a state of female supremacy. Only a non-feminist intervention could block that outcome.

We may define female supremacy as a condition where the governing power in most areas of life is either directly or indirectly a female power. We are entitled to wonder if that would be a good thing, or a bad thing.

Our answer rides upon the question of moral constraint. Absolute power would be arbitrary power, and being absolute, would corrupt absolutely – meaning that no morality would constrain it. True female supremacy could be nothing short of absolute power unconstrained by morality. Anything less would only be a stage along the road to supremacy, but not quite supremacy itself.

In the final tally, any limit to the growth of female power would limit women’s power to treat men arbitrarily. This in turn would be a moral constraint because arbitrary power is nothing if not the power to disregard morality. So the feminist project would stall out if it was bound by the requirement to treat men morally, and this would set a limit on how far the project could extend itself.

If one were determined to push the feminist project forward at all cost one would need either to abandon all pretense of morality, or to make oneself the master of such pretense.

In passing, we should note that feminists love to rattle on about something called “equality”, yet their notion of equality, for some reason, does not involve abrogating any historical perquisites that women have enjoyed. So, putting it simply, the feminist campaign for so-called equality is a drive to maximize female advantage. This comes to the same thing as increasing female power with no limit.

Now let us consider the second cardinal principle. The project to increase women’s power does not positively require disaffection toward men in order to get started, but without it, the project would face a practical limit. However, if you sweep that limit aside, you can pave the road of depredation as far as any lack of scruples might carry you. This is where disaffection toward men comes in handy, and the project to increase female power hits no glass ceiling of any kind.

We conclude that “feminism” minus anti-male feeling would be self-limiting, would lack vitality, and would eventually fizzle out.

Let us reiterate the two cardinal principles: that feminism is a drive to increase female power with no clearly stated endpoint, and that feminism is impelled by a bottomless disaffection toward all things male. Taken together, these principles compose a revelatory lens, and one may pan that lens across the range of conditions. You can put this to work in your own analysis.

Nowadays there is a great controversy in the activated non-feminist sector – on the one side, the strict anti-feminists who wish to engage feminism narrowly and politically, and on the other, those who say "never mind feminism, attack gynocentric traditionalism!"

However, we find it generally pointless to differentiate feminism from so-called traditionalism because we see those things on a continuum. We prefer to take a unified field approach in our quest for understanding.

Yes, we recognize that "gynocentrism" was a feature of traditional (or so-called "patriarchal") culture long before modern feminism came along. But we also see that feminism and traditional culture are like Siamese twins, with gynocentrism as a connective tissue binding them together.

Gynocentrism advantages women over men, and for that reason is fundamentally anti-male. Feminism did not invent gynocentrism, but capitalized on it as it does upon any established anti-male tendency. Anything hateful of maleness, or harmful to it, or merely tilted against it in some way, finds a place in the feminist project.

We have a saying: "Every anti-male stream feeds the feminist river." Even as the Mississippi pulls its waters from across the continent, so too feminism draws from a far-flung cultural watershed. One way or another, all of it supplements the feministical operations complex (for short, the FEMPLEX).

This metaphor of the watershed hints at the workings of feminism as a social super organism, and puts us in a shared space of heuristic understanding. The full reach of feminism spreads well beyond any conventional understanding of the term. For that reason, the ongoing anti-male evolution in society, over time, is the signature pattern which gives away the feminist game. Plenty of social indicators are trending in an anti-male direction, and that is how we know "where it's at".

It should be clear, to all who are politically awake, that the world is becoming a more poisonous place in which to be male. We say this not in the spirit of "men's rights", but rather to spotlight a dangerous condition which ought to concern everybody. After all, injustice toward half the human race is bound to have negative consequences right way across the social ecology.

We should add that a lot of feminists show a pattern of moral confluence in creating, sustaining, or rationalizing these anti-male tendencies. When you point this out, a typical response is the infamous NAFALT: "Not All Feminists Are Like That."

There are many variations on the NAFALT response, yet it is unclear why any of it should be deemed a compelling argument, or what it even pretends to argue in the first place. The sentiment itself is vacuous and trite, for you may pick any kind of feminist you please and it will generally be true that "not all feminists are like that." So why do they use this line of talk so commonly?

The answer is that they want to get feminism off the hook by changing the subject. They are deflecting attention away from the feminists who are indeed "like that"– and the fact that such feminists really do exist, and really do play a powerful role in shaping the world.

Yes, the anti-male factor is feminism's most potent driver because it gives the feminist project a wide open frontier of development. The proverbial man-hating feminists represent feminism's core truth because, frankly, they are what makes feminism exist in the first place. They are not a bug; they are a feature. Lacking their restless energy and continual innovation, feminism would sputter and roll to a stop like a car running out of gas.

The only way to rationalize the endless growth of female power is to gin up never-ending excuses to take away male power – and if you hate men in the first place, your innovation along that line will be morally unencumbered. Accordingly, those who raise questions about the ethical treatment of men or about women's moral accountability in general, are death to the feminist project because they sabotage the one force which can fuel that project's growth into the indefinite future.

The NAFALT excuse ultimately fails not only because it is intellectually vacuous, but because it misses the point. For in the end, the question is not whether all feminists are a certain way, but whether all feminism is a certain way.

More precisely, all feminists – irrespective of individual difference – are implicated in the feminist project. That is what makes them feminist in the first place. Verily, all feminists are “like that” as regards their participation in feminism. This is the point which ought to command our interest.

The less repellent feminists have the option to put those discreditable ones under siege, and isolate them, and starve them of moral support. Yes, they could choose to do this, but instead they choose the opposite tack: they urge you to IGNORE such feminists, and if possible, forget about their existence altogether.

Thus, the feminist who puts you off with NAFALT rhetoric is squatting on your mental real estate by imposing a trivial distraction – and by that I mean a distraction from what is significant, essential, or urgent. This feminist would have you occupy your thoughts with matters that can only throw you off the scent. In this way, the core truths and defining operations of the feminist project will escape detection.

In conclusion: it can be laborious to parse out the finer filaments of understanding, but the reward can be worth it. The burden, be it known, falls as much upon the writer as upon the reader. That said, I trust that any reader who has gotten to the end of this article, in the same plodding footsteps which the writer took first, has been sufficiently compensated for the journey.

Response to CARE Norway's #deardaddy video

AVfM Video Source · 18 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Courtly love ideology leaves bitter men with only fantasies

Douglas Galbi · 18 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

In medieval Latin love lyrics, courtly lovers yearn for carnal love. They praise women's bodily beauty, they beg for love and pitifully lament being rejected, and they plaintively foretell their death through lovesickness. Medieval clerics, white knights, and courtiers are standard-bearers of courtly love. They display ignorance, dogma, and fantasy that endures to our day as an alternative to the empirical science of seduction.

> For long now I have shown myself > to be a devoted soldier of Love, > as whose bidding I rushed headlong > to commit foolish, daring deed, > loving at great hazard
> one who never casts a kindly eye on me.
>
> If I now entirely ceased,
> I would serve myself well,
> But only the inferior man > flees the clamor of battle.
> Let it be, as I will!
> Carelessly I offer my life to fortune's hazards.
>
> She must know of my soul's greatness, > greater than my bodily form, > for I climb the loftiest bough > seeking for fruit on the tree > and claiming: guile > has no place in a lover who knows no fear.[1]

Soldiers of love are men who believe in the ideology of courtly love. They are men such as Ulrich von Liechtenstein, Suero de Quinones, and Nitin Nohria. Living in fantasies, they are generally not successful in love with women. They commonly became bitter men who hate themselves and other men. They tend to marry as beta-provider hubbies. They face a high risk of sexless marriage and being cuckolded. You don't want your son, if you have one, to become that kind of man.

In the Middle Ages, just as in our current Dark Age, a few transgressive poets challenged the benighted scholars, gynocentric apparatchiks, and sophistic social-climbers who construct and re-enforce the ideology of courtly love. Drawing upon the full resources of classical, biblical, and contemporary culture, these poets offered a messianic secret. Their secret is accessible only to those who read medieval Latin poetry knowingly.

> If I were to speak with angelic and human tongues,
> I could not describe the prize, no worthless one.
> By that I am rightly set above all Christians, > while unbelieving rivals envy me.
>
> Sing, my tongue, therefore of causes and effects!
> Yet keep the lady's name cloaked, > so that it isn't spread widely among the people, > and the secret is kept apart and hidden from the masses.
>
> {Si linguis angelicis loquar et humanis, > non valeret exprimi palma, nec inanis, > per quam recte preferor cunctis Christianis, > tamen invidentibus emulis profanis.
>
> Pange, lingua, igitur causas et causatum!
> nomen tamen domine serva palliatum, > ut non sit in populo illud divulgatum, > quod secretum gentibus extat et celatum.} [2]

The medieval Latin poem Si linguis angelicis, written in a Latin meter associated with satire, subtly mocks the delusions of courtly love. The lover's case history begins with plausible circumstances of despair:

> In a beautiful, flowering bush I stood, > turning around in my heart this: "What should I do?"
> I hesitate to plant seeds in infertile soil.
> Loving the flower of the world, behold, I am in despair."
>
> {In virgultu florido stabam et ameno, > vertens hec in pectore: “quid facturus ero?

> dubito, quod semina in harena sero;
> mundi florem diligens ecce iam despero.} [3]

This stanza thoroughly mixes sexual and biblical imagery: Standing erect in a beautiful bush, God from a burning bush instructing Moses, sexual intercourse not propitious for creating descendants as numerous as the sand on the seashore, and the microcosm-macrocosm flower of the world / vulva of God. Life is wonderfully complex. The question in despair for every man conscious of his human nature: “what should I do?”

In the context of deeply rooted social hostility toward men’s sexuality, men increasingly are choosing to do nothing. As an alternative to life in the flesh, historically much more prevalent than pornography has been fantasies of courtly love:

> I saw a blossoming flower, saw the flower of flowers, > saw a May rose more beautiful than all others, > saw a shining star brighter than the rest,
> by which I passed into the experience of love.
>
> {Vidi florem floridum, vidi florum florem, > vidi rosam Madii cunctis pulchriorem, > vidi stellam splendidam, cunctis clariorem, > per quam ego degeram sentiens amorem.}

The experience of courtly love centers on other-worldly idealization of the beloved woman. The deluded lover, feeling ineffable joy from this imaginary woman, rushes to her and greets her on bended knee:

> Hail, most beautiful one, precious jewel!
> Hail, glory of virgins, maiden glorious,
> hail, light of lights, hail, rose of the world,
> A Blanchefleur and a Helen, a noble Venus!
>
> {Ave, formosissima, gemma pretiosa, > ave, decus virginum, virgo gloriosa, > ave, lumen luminum, ave, mundi rosa,
> Blanziflour et Helena, Venus generosa!} [4]

Yes, even in medieval times, most women would regard this guy as creepy. She doesn’t even know him. He had seen her at a summer feast, fully five or six years ago. Since then, he has been suffering grievously from lovesickness. He has never spoken to her, but he thinks of her:

> Drink, food, and sleep have deserted me,
> By medicine I am unable to be healed.
> …
> These privations and many more have I endured,
> No consolations fortify against my cares, > except repeatedly in the darkness of night
> I am with you in forms shaped by the imagination.
>
> {Fugit a me bibere, cibus et dormire, > medicinam nequeo malis invenire.
> …
> Has et plures numero pertuli iacturas, > nec ullum solacium munit meas curas, > ni quod sepe sepius per noctes obscuras > per imaginarias tecum sum figuras.}

Offering a fantastic alternative to the folklore motif "man gets sex without paying for it," the imaginary woman declares:

> So tell me, young sir, what you have in mind;
> do you ask for silver, so as to enrich yourself, > or for precious stones to adorn yourself?
> For if it be possible, I will give you whatever you seek.
>
> {Dicas ergo, iuvenis, quod in mente geris;
> an argentum postulas, per quod tu diteris, > pretioso lapide an quod tu orneris?
> nam si esse poterit, dabo quidquid queris.}

Imagine — while he was secretly pining for her, she was also secretly in love with him! Even better, she wants to give him expensive gifts. Needless to say, real life five or six years after seeing a beautiful woman, but not speaking to her, isn't like this. Continuing more realistically, the man dallies further verbally. Recognizing that he needs additional, explicit instruction, as many students do after being terrified in mandatory affirmative-consent classes, the loving woman declares:

> Whatever you want to do, such I cannot foreknow, > however to your entreaties I desire to consent.
> Therefore, what I have, sedulously investigate, > undertaking, if you can find it, whatever you seek.
>
> {Quicquid velis, talia nequeo prescire;
> tuis tamen precibus opto consentire.
> ergo, quicquid habeo, sedulus inquire, > sumens si quod appetis, potes invenire.}

She speaks like a true scholastic. She even offers a hint of now-fashionable gender ambiguity. The lover throws his arms around her neck and kisses her a thousand times. As Ovid said after hugging his mistress Corinna's lovely, naked body, who doesn't know what then ensued?[5] Men bitter with the failures of courtly love will find pleasure in this fantasy. They must not lose heart, but have stronger hope that repeated failures of courtly love indicate forthcoming success.[6] Can anyone doubt that triumph in courtly love comes from fantasy, not empirical science?

Medieval Latin poetry shows a still more excellent way. With guile, amused mastery, and fear for his holiness, a man can aspire to be like God to the woman he wants to love:

> Game, he may game, you all game! In your jesting now listen, > the sweet joys of the present life soothe and make merry:
> the player roles the dice, > the student by his embraces > would delude women.
>
> Love must be sung in sweet melodies;
> It should not be held back in the shackles of grave homilies.
> A little maiden should pledge her hand,
> she flowering like a rose, > overcome by pious words.

>
> She should say “yes!” readily, not refusing when asked,
> Not inquiring of the aforesaid man’s standing.
> She should do what is asked;
> what is neglected to be requested, > the lauded young woman should provide.
>
> {Lude, ludat, ludite! iocantes nunc audite, > quos presentis gaudia demulcent leta vite:
> histrio tesseribus;
> clericus amplexibus
> deludat mulieres.
>
> Amor est iam suavibus canendus melodiis, > qui non tardet gravibus detentus homiliis.
> spondeat puellula
> florens quasi rosula, > verbis devicta piis.
>
> Dicat “ita!” facile, nil deneget rogata, > non viri notitiam rimetur prenotata.
> faciat, quod petitur;
> quod prece negligitur, > prestet virgo laudata.} [7]

The Virgin Mary said yes to the mysterious words of the angel Gabriel. About two millennia later, the Mystery Method has been extensively field-tested. Among all possible outrages — and medieval Latin provided now inconceivably broad latitude for outrageous words — the greatest of these is love.

Notes:

[1] Carmina Burana 166 (Iam dudum Amoris militem), from Latin my English translation, with borrowings from the English translations of Marshall (2014) p. 205 and Walsh (1993) p. 187. In the final Latin line, Walsh replaces non from the manuscript with nunc and translates the last two lines thus:

> claiming that in a lover who knows no fear there is now a role for native talent.

Perhaps climbing trees is a “native talent,” but that makes little poetic sense in context. For the original manuscript text, Walsh provides the alternate translation:

> in a lover who knows no fear, there is no place for the crafty approach.

Id. pp. 187-8. My translation is similar, but makes more clear that the relevant craft is social ingenuity (ingenio): guile.

The phrase amoris militem (soldier of Love) “sounds the keynote of the poem; this is to be the proclamation of the courtly lover.” Id. p. 187. Ovid explored that theme, but with much more insight and sophistication.

[2] Carmina Burana 77 (Si linguis angelicis loquar et humanis) st. 1-2, from Latin my English translation, with borrowings from the English translations of Marshall (2014) p. 101-5 and Walsh (1993) pp. 65-8. Here’s a complete Latin text of the poem from Biblotheca Augustana. Above I provide the Latin text from id. pp. 62-65.

That Latin text has some small differences from Bibliotheca Augustana's Latin text. All the subsequent quotes above, except the final one, are similarly from Si linguis angelicis, stanzas 3, 6, 8, 20 (ll. 1-2) & 21, 26, and 28. This poem has survived only in the Carmina Burana manuscript (Bavarian State Library, Munich, clm 4660/4660a).

The opening line of Si linguis angelicis cites 1 Corinthians 13:1. The next three lines are boastful and arrogant. Cf. 1 Corinthians 13:4. Robertson (1976/1980) p. 141 insightfully notes:

> the assertion of that self-esteem after the suggestion of charity in the first line is more than a little ridiculous and hence humorous. I do not mean that it produced loud laughter, but I am confident that it did produce a smile.

The reference in the second line to the prize (palma) plausibly derives from Apocalypse 7:9. Id.

The second stanza's first two words Pange, lingua evoke the crucifixion hymn of Venantius Fortunatus. Fortunatus wrote that hymn for the presentation of a cross relic to Queen Radegund at Poitiers in 570. It subsequently was commonly used in the Christian liturgy for Good Friday. Robertson provides a learned exegesis of the phrase causas et causatum:

> The rare participle causatus (from causo rather than the usual Classical causor) used substantially occurs prominently in only one familiar {sic} work: the translation of Aristotle's Posterior Analytics by Boethius. It appears in 1.7 toward the close in the clause "cum non ex causatis sciat causis," which forms part of an argument to show that demonstrative principles appropriate to one discipline cannot be used for demonstration in another discipline unless the axioms of the two are the same, or unless one discipline can be thought of as being logically subordinate to the other.

Without being able to draw upon insights from the subsequently developed body of seduction field reports, Robertson makes a false distinction:

> Divinity and seduction do not have the same axioms, since it is an axiom of Divinity that fornication is forbidden. For the same reason Divinity cannot be subordinated to seduction. The two are incompatible, and our lover is speaking foolishly.

Id. p. 142. On the messianic secret, Mark 8:29-30 and Romans 16:25-6. On men's love for women in relation to crucifixion, Ephesians 5:25. The issue of divinity and seduction is further elaborated in the discussion of Lude, ludat, ludite! above.

The satire on courtly love in Si linguis angelicis hasn't been recognized within Latin literary scholarship that largely celebrates man-oppressing courtly love. Considering Si linguis angelicis, Dronke declares:

> The poet makes constant liturgical allusions — yet these are not in any way parodistic or blasphemous: they are not to establish an incongruity but to overcome one.

Dronke (1965) p. 318. The poem is written in a "goliardic" meter. That form is commonly associated with "satirical or jocular purposes." Walsh (1993) p. 69. The poem has technical similarities with the immediately preceding poem in the Carmina Burana, Dum caupona verterem. Id. pp. 59-60. Dum caupona verterem is about a man of distinction who spent three months in a brothel having sex with Venus. He left as a pauper with fantastic memories. In contrast to Dronke's and Walsh's views, both poems seem to me to ridicule men's ignorance and folly in love.

[3] The phrase in harena more literally means "in sand." Cf. Mark 4:5-6. Ovid, Heroides 5.115 associates sowing seed in sand with prophecy of death. The context is Paris leaving Oenone for Helen. Walsh (1993) p. 70, which notes that reference, observes "the crudity of this double entendre is lightened by the literary reminiscence." Male sexual function isn't crude; it's natural, beautiful, and in some instances fruitful. In context, the reference to sand evokes barrenness. The reminiscence of Helen and the Trojan War adds a dark note of brutal violence against men.

[4] The first three lines of the above stanza evoke Marian hymns. The fourth line refers to a secular romance and traditional Roman myth. Walsh (1992) p. 197 observes:

> The identification of the loved one with Helen, who is cited as an exemplum of peerless beauty without animadversion to morals, should not have troubled Dronke, since it is a prominent feature in other lyrics and is recommended in the rhetorical handbooks.

Robertson offers broader insight:

> Although it is true that in the twelfth century after it became commonplace to see the bride in the Canticle as Mary, the attractiveness of her physical attributes was sometimes indicated in very frank terms, and love for her was often expressed in what is today startling imagery, no one would seriously have sought to combine the Blessed Virgin, Blanchefleur, Helen and Venus in the same person. To deny that the effect of this line is humorous seems to me to be insensitive. Whatever we may think of Blanchefleur, Helen had an unsavory reputation in the twelfth century; and it would hardly have been possible for a girl to be a "virgo gloriosa," which Helen certainly was not, and a "Venus generosa" at the same time.

Robertson (1976/1980) p. 145. Being humorous doesn't exclude the serious purpose of challenging the dominant ideology of courtly love.

Medieval writers fearlessly combined sacred and profane themes. Carmina Burana 215 (Lugeamus omnes in Decio) uses the form of the Mass as a disparaging liturgy against the god of dice. The mid-fifteenth-century Middle English poem Kyrie, so kyrie rewrites Jankyn's subordination to Alisoun. The Arundel Lyrics is a wide-ranging collection that evokes the extraordinary mixture of the Incarnation. Boncompagno da Signa (c. 1170- c. 1240) in his Rhetorica novissima declared:

> A certain man who had had carnal knowledge of a nun said: "I did not defile the divine bed, but since the Lord had favored me in his words, I wished to raise his horn." Moreover, a nun could say to her lover: "Thy rod and thy staff, they comfort me."

From Latin trans. Huot (1997) p. 67. Cf. on Boncompagno, Dronke (1965) p. 318. Luke 2:23 offered possibilities for celebrating the sacredness of men's sexuality. For relevant discussion, Huot (1997) p. 67.

[5] Ovid, Amores 1.5-23-24.

[6] Cf. the last two stanzas of Si linguis angelicis. Those stanzas offer platitudinous inspiration for courtly lovers:

> So let every lover be mindful of me. He must not lose heart, though at that point his lot is bitter. For certainly some day will dawn upon him at which he will later triumph over his troubles.
>
> Indeed it is from bitterness that pleasant joys are sprung; the greatest gains are not won without toils. Those who seek sweet honey often feel the sting, so those whose lot is more bitter should maintain the stronger hope.

Trans. Walsh (1993) p. 68. A later hand inserted amara (bitternesses) to make the first line of the final stanza to be in part "it is from bitterness that bitternesses are sprung." With some dissent, modern scholars have tended to amend amara to grata (pleasant joys). Id. p. 73.

Interpretations of Si linguis angelicis have varied considerably within common respect for courtly love. Walsh declared:

> The poem is serious insofar as the poet enthusiastically associates himself with the courtly experience, but the theme is handled wittily as a literary mode rather than with deep emotional involvement. In short, the composition is a stylized exercise

Id. p. 68. Robertson didn't take the poem seriously. He speculated its "original purpose may have been to serve as a grammatical exercise for students." Robertson (1976/1980), p. 150. Dronke read the fantasy of courtly love in Si linguis angelicis to cover seriously amour courtois generally:

> 'Si linguis angelics' draws together some of the poetically most notable attitudes of the twelfth-century courtois love-lyric. … In many ways I am tempted to see this poem almost as an emblem of the twelfth- and thirteenth-century European poetry of amour courtois.

Dronke (1965) p. 330. The above quote is part of the concluding paragraph for the whole interpretive volume of Dronke's learned and influential work on medieval Latin love lyric.

Scholars haven't recognized the seriousness of the parodic critique of courtly love in Si linguis angelicis. Courtly love ideology has deep psychological roots among elite men. Walsh's view of twelfth-century clerics probably applies more accurately to many leading modern scholars of medieval literature: their understanding of seduction is "filled in imagination by love encounters with the pen rather than by personal approaches to ladies in real life." Walsh (1992) p. 203. The modern empirical science of seduction and online documentary field reports enable much better appreciation for extraordinary medieval Latin love poetry.

[7] Carmina Burana 172 (Lude, ludat, ludite!), from Latin my English translation, with borrowings from the English translations of Marshall (2014) p. 210. Flowering like a rose, interpreted as blushing, suggests an erotic aspect of pious words. Marshall, id., entitles the poem Magicians of Love. Mystery, the eponym of the Mystery Method, seduced women under the persona of a magician.

Dronke declares:

> All mankind {humanity} is one in love, all aspects of love are linked. This is the basic assumption of a poem such as 'Si linguis angelicus'. It is grounded in a unity of experience which can affirm divine love and every nuance of human love without setting up dichotomies: all are involved together in the 'Rota Veneris'.

Dronke (1965) p. 318. Those abstract assertions, which have little connection to the text of Si linguis angelicus, can be given considerable textual and practical meaning with respect to Lude, ludat, ludite!

[image] Knight knocked off his horse. From Kottenkamp, Franz, and Friedrich Martin von Reibisch. 1842. Der Rittersaal, eine Geschichte des Ritterthums, seines Enstehens und Fortgangs, seiner Gebräuche und Sitten. Stuttgart: Carl Hoffmann. Thanks to Wikimedia Commons.

References:

Dronke, Peter. 1965. Medieval Latin and the rise of European love-lyric. Vol. 1 — Problems and interpretations. Oxford: Clarendon Press.

Huot, Sylvia. 1997. Allegorical play in the Old French motet: the sacred and the profane in thirteenth-century polyphony. Stanford, Calif: Stanford University Press.

Marshall, Tariq. 2014. The Carmina Burana: Songs from Benediktbeuren: a full and faithfull translation with critical annotations. 3rd edition. Los Angeles: Marshall Memorial Press.

Robertson, D. W. 1976/1980. "Two Poems from the Carmina Burana." American Benedictine Review 27 (1): 36-59, reprinted pp. 131-50 in Robertson, D. W. 1980. Essays in medieval culture. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press (cited to pages in 1980 reprint).

Walsh, Patrick Gerard. 1992. “Amor Clericalis.” Ch. 12 (pp. 189-203) in Woodman, Anthony. J., and Jonathon G. F. Powell, eds. Author and audience in Latin literature. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press.

Walsh, Patrick Gerard. 1993. Love lyrics from the Carmina Burana. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License.

The Reality of Feminism

AVfM Video Source · 19 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Feature image by David Shankbone

1857: Conference on Men's Rights proposed

Peter Wright · 19 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

The following essay entitled Men's Rights by Mr. Todd proposes a men's rights conference be held in response to the women's convention. The author's compassion and advocacy for men is testament to the skewed gender wars being waged in the 1800s – PW

* * *

MEN'S RIGHTS. — TODD.

1. You are aware that the ladies, dear souls, have just been holding a most important Convention, at which they had resolutions, speeches, addresses, and appeals, in abundance, but no prayers. There were eloquence, wit, sharp and pointed rebuke, and thrilling disclosures of unsuspected facts, — all on the subject of Woman's Rights.

2. There was a Rev. Miss, besides doctoresses and the like; and they seemed to unite in one deep lamentation over the wrongs, oppressions, and slavery of woman in these United States. I read the newspapers containing full reports of this convention, and rubbed my eyes, trying to get them wide open; for I had hitherto supposed that the ladies of this country were held in high esteem, and were treated so tenderly that they had no wish to complain.

3. Alas! alas! I find they are bowed down and trampled upon; and there is not one drop of misery in the most galling slavery, which our ladies have not tasted; —not one word in the recital of the wrongs of Egyptian bondage,[1] that cannot apply to them. So they tell us!

4. Well, I sat and thought it over, till my soul was moved; and with sorrow I thought what a cruel creature I had been, all my life, to my wife, daughters, and sisters! To be sure, I have always given my poor earnings into my wife's hands to spend for the family; because I knew she could do it better than I; and I have given my daughters the best education possible, and far better than I had.

5. But what then? Are they not oppressed? Don't they have to use a side-saddle, while I don't? Don't they have to carry a muff, and sit under the buffalo, in a cold day, while I have the privilege of driving? When the snow is deep, don't they have to wait till I can dig paths?

6. Ah me! and is there nothing to be said on the other side? Suppose we carry the war into the enemy's camp a little, and speak of our sufferings and grievances. Can we not excite sympathy if we speak of our unredressed wrongs?

7. Now I propose to call a Man's Convention in some important place, say Matildatown, and to have a meeting of the greatest and best, the wisest and the boldest, and see if we can not emancipate ourselves from this thralldom.

8. What do I propose? that a question! Why, sir, I would have a cavalcade of butchers as long as Maiden Lane;[2] and I would let them tell how they had been compelled to do the dirty, disagreeable work of killing calves and pigs, sheep and oxen, and then dressing and cutting and carrying them to the door, and feeling very thankful if dear woman would just come out to the cart, and point, with her jeweled finger, at the piece she would like for the table!

9. I would have a long line of coal-diggers come up from the deep mines where they live, two miles from daylight, and never see the bright heavens but once a week; and they should come with their little lamps in their caps, and all covered with coal-dust! No, they would not come; they couldn't be spared long enough.

10. But they should send up their story of wrong and oppression, and tell the Convention that no woman ever came there with pickax and blasting-powder. What heart in the assembly, especially what female heart, could remain unmoved when the voice came from those dreary subterranean caverns! and when the buried cried out against the wrongs imposed on my sex!

11. There are, it is said, three millions of men constantly on the deep, as sailors, standing at the helm, working the pump, climbing the shrouds, wet and cold in the storm, clinging to the wreck, going down to watery graves,—and for what? Why, that our dear ones may have their silks, their shawls, their laces, their china, and their perfumes!

12. It is estimated that fifty thousand men, every year, are buried in the mighty deep. O woman, woman! What do you mean? Why are you not hanging on the swinging yards, climbing the mast, and facing these hardships and dangers? I do protest against the slavery to which you have sunk my kind!

13. And the Convention should be electrified by the eloquence of men who fill_our streets; who bear burdens; who carry all the brick and mortar to build the fine houses; who are obliged to handle pork and tobacco, train-oil and sugar, molasses and codfish; who are all day long confined in dusty, close counting-rooms, and exhausting life and strength- over blotted account-books; who, in lonely church-yards, must dig graves, and work with no company save the moldering dead!

14. Are we not compelled, early and late, to do the hardest, vilest, filthiest work that human beings ever performed? What a story of wrong could we not tell? When I come to your great city, I can't get a seat in the cars till the ladies are provided for, and that, too, next the window!

15. I can't get a seat at the table, in the hotel or in the steam-boat, till the ladies are seated at the head of the table, where, I understand, the greatest de1icacies are placed; and if any body has to wait for the second table, and eat fragments, it is not a lady. If a gentleman has a seat in the cars, and a lady comes in and wants it, though he were the king him self, he must give it up cheerfully.

16. Ah! and who feeds the iron horse and makes the cars go? Who lights the street-lamps, brushes boots, colors your hats, and pounds down the stones in the street? O men, men poor men! my soul yearns over you, and longs for your deliverance!

17. Do you not see that it's the women who keep you down to these ignoble toils, and who snuff out the very light of your existence? Do you not see that, if they would only come and help us, and lift off our burden, we might be free?

18. I used to think — foolish me! — I used to think that the Bible made us to be the protectors of women, and that thus the strong were to bear the infirmities of the weak, and that we could not fulfill the designs of Providence without doing all this hard drudgery, and exempting our feebler sisters from it. But since their famous Convention I have learned differently.

19. I knew it was disagreeable to be surgeons, and to amputate arms and legs, and cut out tumors, and sew up wounds; but I had no idea that the ladies were longing, to cut and saw too.

20. I knew that our lawyers were a kind of civil police to keep the community quiet, and aided, as a chimney, to carry off the smoke of society; but I had no idea that our ladies were grieved that they were not chimneys too! In short, I see things in a new and strange light; and I am all awake for having a Men's Rights Convention.

Notes:

[1] Egyptian bondage, a bondage the most rigorous and unreasonable, which was inflicted upon the Israelites for several centuries by the hard-hearted kings of Egypt
[2] Maiden Lane, the name of a street in the city of New York.

Source: The Progressive Fourth Reader, for Public and Private Schools. pp. 97-100, (published in 1857 by Bazin & Ellsworth)

Dr. Jay Buenafe of Manitoba, Canada placed on genital mutilators directory

Gary Costanza · 19 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

From Dr. Buenafe's website circumcisionmanitoba.ca:

"Dr. Jay Buenafe is a well-known and respected physician in Manitoba with over 8 years of practice in Family Medicine.

Dr. Jay has expanded his practice to include circumcision for men at all stages of life from infancy to children to teen to adult. He has studied and trained with Dr. Neil Pollock, a pioneer and foremost authority in North America on this procedure, to provide families & men with a trusted circumcision doctor in Winnipeg and the Manitoba area."

Actually, this physician performs just two procedures, vasectomy and circumcision, with circumcision making up the majority of his income. On the home page are these cheerful proclamations:

> A thirty second procedure with excellent cosmetic result.
>
> A one-time gift to your son that lasts a lifetime.

So, risky, elective, and "cosmetic" surgery on non-consenting infants done in thirty seconds is a "gift." Well, he's right that it's a lifetime "gift" – that the infant is unfortunately stuck with.

Under "The Process:"

> All the following steps are taken to ensure your son has minimal discomfort during the procedure. Your son is given ¾ th ml or 1 ml of Tempra (Infants Tylenol, 80 milligram/milliliter concentration) at home ½ hours before the procedure. Then in our office, he will have a topical anesthetic cream applied that numbs the penile skin. Next he is given an injection called a dorsal penile ring block into soft tissue alongside the penis. The anesthetic cream has numbed the skin already so the injection is of little bother to him at this point. After 10 minutes the penis is "Frozen" and the circumcision is done. During the circumcision, he will receive sugar pacifiers to suck on, which will reduce his pain perceptions. The circumcision takes only 30 to 60 seconds with this technique, although the preparations described above requires you to be with him for one hour in our office.

Dr. Buenafe seems proud that he circumcises in 30 seconds – although I wouldn't consider speed a positive thing. From intactwiki.org:

"Buenafe peddles the Mogen technique (as the "Pollock technique" on his website), but what he may not tell parents is that the Mogen clamp has been notorious for glans amputations, even among experienced conductors of circumcision. Mogen went out of business after losing a 10.8 million dollar law suit, after a mohel severed the end of a baby's glans using one of their clamps. Mogen claimed that injury was impossible with its use."

Under "FAQs:"

> What complications are possible from circumcision?
>
> Complications are rare. Occasionally there can be bleeding from the circumcision many hours after the procedure. This is treated by putting some pressure with a gauze on the penis for three minutes to close the oozing blood vessel. (This will be demonstrated to you by our staff), very rarely more serious bleeding can occur which may require a visit to the hospital. Infection is also a possible complication. It is extremely rare and can be associated with redness and puss and a foul smell from the circumcision. It is treated by putting polysporin 5 times a day on the penis which usually resolves any infection within 1-2 days.
> Are more serious complications possible?
>
> Yes, they are possible, however, to date there have never been any serious complications at our offices.
> Will it hurt my baby?
>
> Many babies can sleep right through the entire procedure. We find that most babies will experience little or no pain at all.

Complications are NOT rare, as ALL circumcisions result in bleeding, scarring, and amputation of part of the penis. Since no serious complications are listed, you can find that here.

The doctor has no way of knowing that most babies "experience little or no pain at all."

Under "Parent's Guide to Circumcision:"

> Why do so many doctors recommend the Buenafe Clinic for patients choosing circumcision?
> The procedure is done in under 30 seconds. (10 times quicker than most hospital circumcisions)
> Extensive pain control methods are used, including Tylenol, a sugar solution (to reduce pain perceptions), a topical freezing cream, and a local anesthetic injection
> Low complication rates
> No hospital administration fees are charged
> Set up is done quickly in the clinic
>
> Why do parents choose to circumcise their sons?
>
> Research shows that:
> It reduces the risk of urinary tract infection.
> It reduces the risk of penile infection also called balanoposthitis.
> It eliminates the need to do it later in life when up to 6% of boys will require a circumcision because of various problems. (When it is done later in life, it is a more costly, difficult, and riskier procedure requiring a general anesthetic, and it is more painful).
> It reduces the risk of getting some sexually transmitted diseases including Human Papilloma Virus (HPV) and AIDS (HIV).
> It reduces the risk of penile cancer and cervical cancer in partners.
> Circumcised men have less risk of sexual dysfunction later in life.
>
> Why do parents choose not to circumcise their sons?
> They do not want to cause pain or complications to an otherwise healthy baby
> They are concerned that their child may wish later on that he had not been circumcised
> They are unaware of the medical reasons in favor of a circumcision.

These supposed benefits of circumcision have no basis in truth – see that here.

Continuing:

> For detailed information about the medical benefits and risks of circumcision, please go to www.medicirc.org a website written by world renowned pediatrician- Dr.Edgar Schoen of San Francisco California, USA.

Dr. Schoen is a wildly pro-circumcision advocate that has been debunked many times, however the link given doesn't work.

Under "Complications" we see recycled listings taken verbatim from other circumcision doctors in Canada, namely Dr. Bob Reddoch and Dr. Neil Pollack. The stated frequency of these complications are also for one of these practices, but we don't know which one. Other information, such as "Before and After the Circumcision" seems also to have been taken from these other doctor's websites, Reddoch's "Before" and "After" and Pollock's "Before" and "After," added in a hodgepodge manner, and not sourced.

Is the information on Dr. Buenafe's website accurate and specific to his practice, or was it just cut and pasted from Reddoch or Pollock? Why are these doctors listing frequency of complications for an unknown practice? This should raise red flags as to the accuracy of any of this information.

"Circumcision in the Media" lists pro-circumcision articles that are dubious or flat-out lies.

Since Dr. Buenafe's website has incomplete information about risks, see that here at neonatalcutting.org

Watch Dr. Buenafe's Circumcision Video.

Dr. Buenafe's practice information follows:

Buenafe Clinic
930 Jefferson Avenue, Suite 203
Winnipeg, Manitoba, R2P 1W1TEL: 204.697.9013
FAX: 204.697.9017

drjay@circumcisionmanitoba.ca
www.circumcisionmanitoba.ca

Dr. Jay Buenafe's cell (204) 997-9782.

Find him on Facebook and Twitter.

> Dr. Jay Buenafe of Manitoba, Canada placed on genital mutilators directory
> https://t.co/Hx5g1f1VpJ > #childmutilators pic.twitter.com/BmARfTNpeE
>
> — Paul Elam (@AVoiceForMen) December 20, 2015

ICMI16 – update

Mike Buchanan · 19 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

We had expected to make an announcement on the ICMI16 venue and dates w/c 7 December, but that proved impossible. Negotiations with suitable venues were protracted, and in the last few days we've been negotiating with two venues. In both cases financial viability was assured, given the level of interest shown by pre-registrations, but the venues were inflexible on some key contract terms, so we couldn't proceed.

Our search continues, in parallel with a venue finding service for which we are not paying (the company gets its income from commissions paid by venues). I remain optimistic that we'll sign a contract before long, hopefully before the end of January. In the meantime, our advice remains the same:

> Do not book travel or accommodation before we're certain ICMI16 will proceed, and we've announced the venue and dates.

One striking feature of our venue search so far has been that there are suitable venues in London which are marketed poorly, if at all. One key requirement for a venue is that it must have an auditorium capable of holding at least 250 people, ideally with tiered seating, for good audience visibility.

We are not seeking venues in hotels or academic institutions.

If you know of any potentially suitable venues in London, please email me details (mike@j4mb.org.uk). Thank you.

Arguing with Feminists

AVfM Video Source · 21 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Boye D. Adeboye of London, England placed on genital mutilators directory

Gary Costanza · 21 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

From Dr. Adeboye's website circumcisioncentre.com:

"Welcome to Dr B's Circumcision Clinic
Dr B's Circumcision Clinic is a dedicated male circumcision centre and one of UK's top and largest circumcision service provider.
Dr Boye D. Adeboye (Dr B) has over 17 years experience of medical practice. He is a member of the British Royal College of GP and American Academy of Family Practitioners.
Dr B is the medical director of Bloom Clinic, a private medical and cosmetic clinic providing a range of medical and cosmetic services.
As a circumcision specialist, Dr B's Circumcision Clinic is a dedicated special service of Bloom Clinic.

Dr B started offering private male circumcision in 2009 and has successfully carried out over 2000 male circumcisions in all age groups.

Having chosen to be a circumcision surgeon, Dr B collaborates with other circumcision specialists both in the UK and internationally to ensure delivery of a high quality service."

Dr. B is a family practitioner who has chosen to be a "circumcision specialist." Why? Because it's a quick and profitable procedure with no liability and a patient that can't resist or complain.

Under "Infant baby circumcision – 0 to 12 months:"

> We use the Plastibell ring for circumcision in infants. The Plastibell technique is one of the commonest methods used in babies all over the world. It was invented in 1950, millions of baby circumcision has been done with Plastibell and it continues to be a popular infant circumcision procedure.
> About Plastibell circumcision
> After local anaesthetic, the Plastibell ring is placed between the foreskin and the head of the penis. A string from outside is used to keep the ring in place.
> The foreskin is removed with no need for stitching. The ring detaches by itself within 10 days.

Don't think any infant would consider any circumcision "procedure" as "popular."

> Frequently Asked Questions

> Is there any preparation before the procedure?
> No. You do not need any special preparation before the procedure. Please bring along your baby's feed and nappies as you would be in the clinic for about 1 to 1.5 hours.
> Circumcision aftercare
> You will continue your normal routine like bathing, nappy and cleaning.
> In addition, we recommend applying Vaseline, Sudocrem or olive oil.
> Do I need a follow-up appointment?
> Usually no. The ring will detach by itself within 10 days and healing takes place without need to see us. However, in a small minority of babies (about 1 in 25 from our experience), there may be need to see you again to remove the ring.
> Our service has been thoroughly planned to ensure good result and satisfaction and we have a robust, pro-active 24/7 support and after care that tracks your healing after circumcision in our clinic.

Apparently the Dr. doesn't see the need for information about the risks and complications of circumcision.

Here are some "Testimonials:"

> I am not usually the type that write reviews but I knew this was one I must recommend for anyone wanting his son circumcised. Initially, I was very apprehensive about having my son circumcised being that I am married to an English man whose culture doesn't believe in circumcision. It was a tough decision but I knew that it was important if only for hygiene reasons. After a long thorough researching of clinics I decided to go with Dr B at Bloom Clinic in Milton Keynes travelling all the way from Birmingham. Firstly, I was amazed by the intimate atmosphere. The professionalism displayed by the staff, the process was carefully explained and we weren't rushed to making decision. Refreshment was offered at all time and we were constantly being looked after. What I'm most happy about is the aftercare I received from Dr B which was indeed priceless. Being scared I was constantly emailing pictures of the procedure for progress update and I was reassured at each stage and the result was amazing. Brilliant service. I definitely recommend this clinic anytime!
> Mrs Pointer
> Birmingham

So, we're mutilating infants for 'cultural' reasons? A 'tough decision' for who? Not for the infant WHO HAD NO DECISION. The surgery was important for 'hygiene' reasons – isn't soap and water used for the hygiene of other body parts as well as female genitals?

> I had my son circumcised in USA and was going to have him redone as I was not happy with the result. My brother in UK told me to come for holidays in England and have it done at Bloom Clinic where my nephews were circumcised. I can only say this was the best advice. My wife and I are very pleased with the service and result of the redo
> Nigel
> Maryland, USA

One complication of circumcision is the need for correcting the mutilation with more mutilation. See this under "Re-do circumcision:"

> Re-do circumcisions (also called remedial circumcision) are often carried out because the foreskin has not been adequately removed at the initial (primary) circumcision. Other reasons for re-do circumcision may be dissatisfaction with scar from the first circumcision.
>
> We undertake redo circumcision in our clinic but every case is different and we therefore assess on individual basis as sometimes it may be necessary to do other procedures in addition to the re-do itself.

Then, under "Sedation:"

> We offer mild sedation to toddlers and young children because our experience has shown that this makes them very relaxed and takes away parental anxiety too.
> Please note that sedation is not the same as general anaesthesia. Our conscious sedation mean your child is still awake but relaxed and drowsy. With general anaesthesia the child is not awake and not breathing by himself; we do not offer general anaesthesia for circumcision as we have excellent result from our local anaesthesia which is much safer.
> Sedation is not available for infants as they are too young and it is not usually necessary for older boys and adults.
> It can be given as optional to an older child or adult and attracts additional fee.

Obviously, anaesthesia in children and infants can be very risky, yet this doctor promotes various forms of it in his zeal for 'hygienic' genitals.

Here are "Simple ways to avoid circumcision complications:"

> A 2-week old baby (Baby O) was recently brought to our clinic for opinion on his circumcision. Baby O was circumcised at 11 days old (3 days before coming to our clinic) by a mobile practitioner who was introduced to the family as a nurse who provides 'circumcision at home'.
>
> On examining Baby O, he has a degloving injury which means to much skin has been removed which makes the edges it impossible for the edges of the circumcision to close and was now exposing raw flesh. This is one of circumcision complications. The parents of Baby O were advised of the situation and told the remedy was to be referred to hospital and have it repaired under general anaesthesia. Also, a skin graft may be required to cover for the excessive skin that was removed.
>
> One thing we noted was that the practitioner had not left the parents with any after care instructions or contact details, the only contact detail the parents of Baby O had was the mobile number used in engaging her services. Unfortunately, when they called the practitioner, she lived miles away and requested payment to purchase a ticket to come to review the child.
>
> This case once again stresses the need for due diligence before booking your son's circumcision. It must be noted that nurses are not licensed to carry out circumcision in the UK. Also, although doctors can carry out this procedure, not all private clinics are registered with the Care Quality Commission to carry out circumcision.

So, a complication that left 'too much skin removed' is blamed on a nurse with a mobile practice. This and other complications happen to infants every day, the actual frequency unknown because no data is collected about these 'practices.'

Then, "Where to circumcise your baby:"

> One question we regularly get asked in our clinic is if we offer circumcision for newborn babies at home. This is because male circumcision was historically performed at home by lay men before the existence of medicine. Stories still abound in modern times about how circumcision is being carried out in some parts of the world by the 'village barber' or in some cases, the village traditional healer.

> Where then is best to get your son circumcised? We believe every parent needs to consider the following when choosing where to circumcise their male babies:
>
> 1. If it were you, would you rather have an operation, even as simple as skin tag removal at home? Many parents consider it 'natural' that they should have their operation in a clinic or hospital but do not seem to see their son's circumcision also as an operation.
>
> 2. Psychological aftermath. We have seen many parents who are permanently traumatised by remembering their son's circumcision on their dining table especially when things have gone wrong.
>
> 3. Is there an appropriate back-up? Male infant circumcision is quite easy, but a 'home theatre' s not a substitute for proper clinic settings and does not have the facilities to deal with complications, should any arise. This is why Dr B's Circumcision Clinic does not offer a home circumcision service as it is impossible to carry all our equipments around.
>
> 4. Infection control. In this day and age, single-use sterile instruments should be the standard for circumcision but a recent incident involving a mobile circumcision provider showed a tendency to simply wiping the instrument with antiseptic or disinfection by boiling. This should not be acceptable in this modern age.
>
> Deciding to circumcise your baby can be a tough decision to make and it is important that you do not have any regret or guilt afterwards. Getting your son's circumcision right starts with the right decision about where to get the circumcision done.

Yes, it is an "operation" on a newborn with all the risks and complications. Want to avoid that and the "psychological aftermath?" Then spare the baby this risk of pain, complications, and death by leaving him intact – as we do with infant girls.

Since Dr. Adeboye has no information about the risks of circumcision, you can find that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Adeboye's practice information follows:

Milton Keynes:
Bloom Clinic
Turpyn Court
Woughton on the Green
Milton Keynes MK6 3BW

London:
Dr Boye Adeboye
10 Harley Street
London
W1G 9PF

Tel: 0333 7000 330
Email: info@bloomclinic.co.uk

> Dr. Boye D. Adeboye of London placed on genital mutilators directory > https://t.co/CC0aCEtYPa > #childmutilators pic.twitter.com/58e26M7Q1Q
>
> — Paul Elam (@AVoiceForMen) December 22, 2015

Fiamengo File 8

Steve Brulé · 21 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Feminism wants men on University Campus, or is it simply another ruse to fool men into thinking Feminism is the answer to all their ills. Dr Fiamengo explores the truth behind Feminism on college campuses.

Yet again a man was falsely accused

AVfM Video Source · 22 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

He's free now but his family paid a terrible price.

See more videos from InTheNameOfJustice here.

Dr. Pierre Crouse of Alberta, Canada placed on genital mutilators directory

Gary Costanza · 22 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

From Dr. Crouse's website circumcisioncalgary.com:

"About Dr. Crouse

Vasectomies and Circumcisions are the main focus of Dr. Crouse's practice. He does approximately 2,500 procedures annually, making him one of the main providers of these procedures in the province of Alberta.

Dr. Crouse obtained:

Medical degree in 1982 in South Africa.
Post graduate Diploma in Anesthesia 1990.
LMCC 1993 (Licentiate Med. Council of Canada)

With his surgical and anesthesia background he is convinced that the Mogen circumcision technique with 4 steps pain control protocol is the most effective and painless method available."

If you define "most effective" as the quickest and easiest way to mutilate and "painless" as no pain…for the doctor.

Under "Parent's Guide to Circumcision:"

> Why this technique?
>
> Our procedure takes less than 1 minute. (many times faster than most hospital circumcisions)
> We use extensive pain control methods including Tylenol, a sugar solution (to reduce pain perception), topical freezing and a local anesthetic injection.
> Excellent cosmetic result.
>
> Methods of circumcision used by other doctors:
>
> The Gomco clamp – This is the most common technique used by physicians. It requires much longer to perform and involves much more tissue handling.
> The Plastibell – with this technique the baby must go home with a small plastic device tied to his penis that allows the foreskin to desiccate over subsequent days. This is also a more lengthy procedure to perform.

"Excellent cosmetic result"… so, this mutilation is done for COSMETIC REASONS? As there are no other reasons given, this "result" is excellent to who? Not to the infant being cut!

Again, why the emphasis on speed? More money to be made? It's certainly not for safety's sake.

Under "FAQs:"

> Q: What complications are possible from circumcision?

> A: Complications are rare. Occasionally, there can be bleeding from the circumcision many hours after the procedure. This is treated by putting some pressure with gauze on the penis for 2-3 minutes to close the oozing blood vessel. Very rarely, more serious bleeding can occur which may require a visit to the hospital. Infection is also a possible complication. It is extremely rare and can be associated with redness, pus, and a foul smell from the circumcision. It is treated by putting Polysporin on the penis five times a day which usually resolves any infection in one or two days. more information >>
>
> Q: Will it hurt my baby?
>
> A: Every effort is used to make this procedure as painless possible for the baby. Many babies can sleep through the entire procedure that takes less than 1 minute. Most babies experience little or no pain at all.

Complications are NOT rare, and 100% of the time circumcision results in bleeding, scarring, and amputation of part of the penis. Also, there is no way of knowing that "most babies experience little or no pain at all."

Under "Complications" we see:

> Frequency of complications:
>
> Significant post-operation bleeding requiring medical attention of any kind 1/400.
> Phimosis or narrowing of the shaft skin opening over the head of the penis requiring medical intervention 1/500.
> Buried or trapped penis ie. penis gets partially buried in the abdomen and requires medical intervention 1/800.
> Infection requiring antibiotics 1/1000.
> Meatal stenosis- Narrowing of the urethra requiring medical intervention.
> Trauma to the head of the penis

These numbers are meaningless and incomplete, as death is not listed and he provides no sources to check out.

See intactwiki.org for more information about Dr. Crouse and his ties to Dr. Neil Pollock (including virtually identical websites), the history of the Mogen clamp, and the subsequent bankruptcy of its manufacturer.

See Dr. Crouse explain how "personal choice" is important, yet he gives none to his patients: Watch video here.

Since risk and complication information is incomplete, see that here at neonatalcutting.org.

Dr. Crouse's practice information follows:

Intramed Medical Centre
Tel. 403 255 6196
403 255 1166
3223 17th Ave. SW, Calgary, AB. T3E 7R8

Claim fake victories: The feminist meltdown of 2015

August Løvenskiolds · 22 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

Now that we've survived the Fall Semester Campus Rape Hoax Season of '15 with no major incidents, feminists are wrapping up their disappointing year with the usual mishmash of claimed triumphs, faked victories, and cultural appropriation of the advancements of others. Writing in the HuffPo, writer Alanna Vagianos, Women's Editor, put her listicle 35 Inspiring Feminist Moments From 2015 on full walk-of-shame display. The only problem with her article is that it had almost no feminist content in it at all, and what it did have was hardly inspiring.

The content of Feminism, according to their ad nauseam dictionary recitation (repeated in Moments #8 and #30 of the Huffpo travesty), is usually stated as the promotion of gender equality for women as a class. So, let's review the 35 "Inspiring Feminist Moments" to see if their character is more genuinely gender equality-based, or just feminist spam. I'll be combining several of the moments to save space and because they fail the "feminist" and "inspiring" tests in similar ways. I'll also be duplicating those that clearly hit multiple failures.

Group 1: "Feminist" Moments that failed for the cultural appropriation of racial minority triumphs. There were a number of achievements by black women over white women in the last year, and good for them, but what is NOT so good is the attempt by feminists to claim these achievements as their own, somehow. Feminist efforts to usurp black women's achievements come off like disgraced Paula Deen claiming credit for inventing soul food – if she had even claimed that. While inspiring to black women in their quest for recognition, these moments are clearly not designed to promote all women as a class, nor promote gender equality. Racial equality, yes, but gender equality? Hardly. Thanks to feminists, these achievements were diluted and co-opted by a bunch of white feminist assholes for their own exploitation:

Moment 1: Viola Davis Became The First Black Woman To Win An Emmy For Outstanding Lead Actress In A Drama Series

Moment 4: Misty Copeland Became The First Black Female Principal Dancer In American Ballet Theater History

Moment 6: Amandla Stenberg Called Out How Black Women's Bodies Are Treated

Moment 12: Gabourey Sidibe Shut Down Fat Shamers Like A Boss

Moment 19: The #SayHerName Campaign Highlighted The Value Of Black Women Within The #BlackLivesMatter Movement Okay, this last one did have a slight gender equality component within the racial issue, but this does not mean white feminists get to usurp it without facing charges of appropriation. .

Group 2: "Feminist" Moments that failed gender equality by actually promoting the separation of genders. When it comes to racial equality, "separate but equal" segregation is a failed relic of the 1950's, but in gender equality it is still inspiring feminists, somehow. When you are promoting the idea that gender is irrelevant and woman and men should be treated the same in society, it is probably NOT inspiring to be reminded by feminists that women are so physically deficient compared to men that, for women to exist in things like competitive sports at all, they need their own gender-segregated sports teams and competitions. Yet, somehow, feminists claim to find inspiration in girls-only sporting events and even gender segregation as personal and government policy. Uh, huh, whatever you say, ladies.

I did enjoy watching the US Women's Soccer team paste the mighty Japanese ladies' team in the finals, but I enjoyed it for patriotic, home team reasons, and not because goalkeeper Hope Solo likes to cause domestic violence. Solo's weak performance was rescued by the high-scoring efforts of her superior teammates.

Moments in this class include:

Moment 2: The U.S. Women's Soccer Team Reminded Everyone That Playing Like A Girl Is Awesome. If it is so awesome, why do you need to compete with men at all, in anything? Where's the lust for gender equality?

Moment 17: Serena Williams Flawlessly Shut Down A Reporter Who Asked Her Why She Wasn't Smiling. A winning female athlete appears to be unhappy. She snaps at a male sports reporter who asks her about her being upset, just as he would question an agitated male athlete. Being annoyed is inspiring to feminists? That explains a lot. Can we be inspired enough to kick female reporters out of men's locker rooms now?

Moment 22: Amber Rose Led A Slutwalk To Combat Slut-Shaming. Rose called for more "safe spaces" for women. Creating "safe spaces" for women sounds a lot like gender segregation to me. Does this mean men can have the gender equality of having their own safe spaces, too? How would THAT be gender-equal or inspiring?

Moment 25. A 109-Year-Old Woman Said Her Secret To A Long Life Was Avoiding Men. More feminist gender segregation. If we can only get rid of women, maybe men can be inspired to live longer lives, too?

Group 3. Moments that failed for miscellaneous absurd assumptions.

Moment 3: Caitlyn Jenner Introduced Her Authentic Self On The Cover Of Vanity Fair. Oh, so it is inspiring that the woman of the year was born a man, and thinks the hardest part of being a woman is figuring out what to wear? Not exactly the inspiration for the feminist narrative, girls.

Moment 5. Jennifer Lawrence Wrote A Passionate Essay About The Wage Gap. The feminist wage gap myth has even been refuted by feminists. Instead of writing about it passionately, perhaps we can be inspired to write about it accurately? Maybe THAT would be more inspiring by proving that girls can do math and science, too!

Moment 12 Gabourey Sidibe Shut Down Fat Shamers Like A Boss Not being mean to fat folks is an issue of manners and social conditioning, to be sure, but it has nothing to do with gender equality. Anyone can be fat, and anyone can shame people for that, equally across genders. Stuffing fat into the definition of feminism is cute in a Rubenesque sort of way, but it is by no stretch of the imagination an inspiration for the meat on the bones of gender equality.

Moment 23 We Finally Got Some Serious Lady Superheroes Both of whom are fictional. Just like the definition of feminism.

Moment 24 Kiran Gandhi Free Bled When She Ran A Marathon To Fight Period Shaming. "Free bleeding" was a movement started by anti-feminists in an attempt to troll feminists, and feminists are STILL falling for it. And, ick.

Moment 29 Patricia Arquette Made A Powerful Plea For Wage Equality During Her Oscar Acceptance Speech. See Moment 5 above.

Moment 30 Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau Explained The Importance Of Gender Equality In Just Three Words Unfortunately, the words were not "Ending Pussy Passes."

Moment 32 Science Disproved The Myth That Women And Men Have Different Brains. Actually the "different brains" theory is the basis for transsexuality. This inspires a deep wedge between feminists and the trans community, which widens the existing gap created by ultra-feminine trans women challenging "gender norms as social constructs" feminist nonsense.

Moment 10 Hillary Clinton Announced Her Run For President. As inspiring as the second moon landing, I guess.

Moment 34 Monica Lewinsky Took Back Her Narrative In A Powerful TED Talk. Trying to wreck a married man, and blowing your way to power is inspiring. Sure it is, right, Hillary?

Group 4. Moments that failed the feminist equality test by gratuitously shitting or bleeding on men. I mean, it seems self-evident to me that wanting equality to men is rather uninspiring if you think men are shitty. Are feminists just too stupid to figure out that if they were to see men as great, then it would be inspiring to women to be counted in the company of men? Instead, the following feminist moments shit/bled on men just for the cruelty of it:

Moment 7 Adele Destroyed The Male Gaze On The Cover Of Rolling Stone (Because Men are Bad, and we still want to be like them.)

Moment 8 Matt McGorry Summed Up Why Everyone Should Be Feminists [sic] (Because you are an asshole if you are not.)

Moment 9 New York Magazine Featured 35 Of Bill Cosby's Accusers In A Stirring Cover Story (Because Men are Bad, and we still want to be like them.)

Moment 11: Amy Schumer Perfectly Captured Misogyny In Action With Her "12 Angry Men" Parody (Because Men are Bad blah blah blah).

Moment 18 Senator Claire McCaskill Kindly Encouraged Men To "Shut The Hell Up"

Moment 24 Kiran Gandhi Free Bled When She Ran A Marathon To Fight Period Shaming

Moment 25. A 109-Year-Old Woman Said Her Secret To A Long Life Was Avoiding Men.

Group 5. Moments that failed the feminist equality test by promoting female-only privileges like abortion, reproductive rights, and the right to forced female sexual satisfaction. Reproductive rights are critical and in a gender-equal society, both men and women should have them equally. That's right, men deserve them too, because equality. Yet, feminism only promotes those rights for women. That is NOT equality. Moments in this group include:

Moment 13. Gloria Steinem Dedicated Her Book To The Doctor That Performed Her Illegal Abortion In 1957

Moment 16. Feminist Activists Created #ShoutYourAbortion To Challenge The Stigma That Surrounds Reproductive Health. Except, of course, feminists WANT men to be stigmatized for wanting the same rights women have.

Moment 18 Senator Claire McCaskill Kindly Encouraged Men To "Shut The Hell Up" when it comes to equal reproductive rights.

Moment 20 A Women's Health Clinic Attempted To "De-Medicalize" Abortions By Creating A Spa-Like Abortion Clinic

Moment 24 Kiran Gandhi Free Bled When She Ran A Marathon To Fight Period Shaming

Moment 27 Nicki Minaj Demanded An Orgasm Like The Boss She Is. A woman demands the right to rape men until the woman has orgasms. Not exactly inspirational when you think about it. Swap genders, and it is kind of rapey if a man does the same thing after paying for the date.

Moment 28 "UnREAL" Depicted The Unvarnished Reality Of Female Masturbation. Showing mundane female masturbation is inspiring what – boring sex? I'd aim higher both for, and during, individual sexual performance depictions. How inspiring – dull female sex.

Moment 31 "Scandal" Featured A Scene Where Olivia Pope Got An Abortion Without Shame

Group 6. Actual, inspiring, gender-equality moments of 2015.

Moment 14 The Supreme Court Legalized Same-Sex Marriage In All 50 States I'm inspired that feminists will no longer be able to piggyback on gay men's hard work any longer.

Moment 15 Two Officers Became The First Women To Graduate From The U.S. Army's Ranger School. Selective service is whispering about requiring women to sign up. Feminists will be screaming.

Moment 21 Target Announced They Are Phasing Out Gender-Based Signs In Stores. Finding yourself in the men's restroom in Target will no doubt be inspiring to a lot of women feminists, in an unnerving, triggering sort of way. (Yes, I know that toilet signs are not what Target is changing).
Moment 35 The U.S. Military Opened All Combat Roles To Women Future images of dead, blown-apart female soldiers should inspire a lot of women to do really bad things to feminists. The US military was inspired to pick April Fools' Day, 2016, as the start of this policy. No fooling.

Title IX abuse in university athletic programs

Hannah Wallen · 23 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

If asked, most feminists will tell you that feminist activism is not an attack on masculinity or the human rights of men and boys. Many of them will quote from Jezebel.com writing full of claims about all of the harm feminists don't want to do to men (in the midst of a post admitting that man-hating is "a thing,") and blaming any discrimination men face on the phantom concept of "patriarchy."

Many examples can be found to show that the article and its claims are false. The twisting of Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972 is one that speaks loud and clear, and women's advocates defend its discriminatory use the same way: by passing the buck and shifting blame. When confronted with evidence that it isn't Title IX's quota system which ensures female participation, women's advocates respond with excuses, rhetoric, and unsupported complaints about money, and attempt to shout down anyone who disagrees.

Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972 was passed in order to amend previous acts affecting the public education system to bar educational institutions from discriminating against students or student applicants on the basis of sex.

The amendment was originally proposed as a measure to end discriminatory quotas that limited female college admissions. It stipulates that "No person in the United States shall, on the basis of sex, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any education program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance." According to TitleIX.info's history page, the law covers 10 key areas in education: Access to Higher Education, Career Education, Education for Pregnant and Parenting Students, Employment, Learning Environment, Math and Science, Athletics, Sexual Harassment, Standardized Testing, and Technology.

So how did it end up being used as it is today?

For that, we have to look to policy set up by the Department of Education, not the law itself.

Section 431(d)(1) of the General Education Provisions Act allows Education Department policies to become regulations by a kind of default process. Policy is transmitted to Congress 60 days after its creation. If Congress does not disapprove within 45 days after that, it becomes regulation. By this process, the department has slowly twisted the law's original application from a means to ensure equal access to education into an attack on athletic programs and from a position against discriminatory limitations to a position enforcing them.

In 1979, the department issued an interpretation of Title IX that measured compliance in educational institutions using a three-part test. Schools could demonstrate compliance by any one of the three means.

(1) The number of male and female athletes is substantially proportionate to their respective enrolments; or

(2) The institution has a history and continuing practice of expanding participation opportunities responsive to the developing interests and abilities of the underrepresented sex; or

(3) The institution is fully and effectively accommodating the interests and abilities of the underrepresented sex.

The second and third tests are problematic for obvious reasons. A history of expansion is easy to show, but continuing practice is necessarily limited. An institution attempting to expand participation opportunities will eventually run out of sports to add or funding to spend on new programs. Further, the institution's attempts to expand will be limited by the interests of the group itself.

Accommodating the interests and abilities of the underrepresented sex sounds good, but how does one quantify those factors? Women's groups disapproved of a 2005 attempt. To date, no functional method for this has been deemed universally acceptable, and administrators are left to consider attempts to use this standard as a measure of compliance a gamble at best.

Administrators for educational institutions have found the first test easiest to meet, by eliminating women's status as "underrepresented." The policy is written with the presumption that an unequal outcome is always due to inequality of opportunity, and educational institutions have been consistently targeted on that basis. Because of this, the policy has become a strict quota system. If 57% of a university's students are male and 43% are female, then 57% of that university's athletes can be male but 43% must be female. If fewer female students take an interest in sports so that only 30% of the university's athletes are female, Education Department policy requires the university to take measures as described in the three-prong test to correct the imbalance.

This leaves administrators with a hard choice. The expectation is that when faced with scrutiny of their athletic program by the state, complaints, or legal action by women's groups, they will recruit more female students to participate in sports and fund more female athletic programs than female students take interest in on their own. However, the practical application of the policy has not necessarily resulted in such expansion of opportunities for female athletes but instead in universities limiting male participation and even eliminating male athletic teams to meet the goal of having their participation percentages match their population percentages. That has become the standard method among post-secondary educational institutions. Male athletic teams are being subjected to participation caps or eliminated altogether to ensure that schools aren't penalized for failing to comply with Title IX.

Feminists have claimed that complaints about this are unwarranted and that universities are maintaining large football programs, which do not garner female interest and have no approved female counterpart, instead of promoting women's teams. However, at many schools, football programs keep alumni engaged in the continuing activities of the institution and attract both students and donors. Rather than robbing women's programs of needed funding, they break even or even bring in a profit. This helps to provide the funds needed to finance other athletic team programs, including women's programs, yet men's program cuts still occur in these schools. The cutting trend also occurs in the absence of a football team. While some women's advocates blame football, others have attempted to stack the deck by defining the term athletic to exclude athletic activity in which more women than men take an interest, further skewing the statistics on which the quota system is measured. All things considered, blaming football is a red herring at best and at worst another feminist attack on male interests.

Despite evidence contradicting their reasoning, women's advocacy in regard to Title IX continues to support the quota system, keeping universities in the position of making the decision to cut when they cannot otherwise comply. As a result, men's teams continue to be targeted. Positions on various teams including wrestling, gymnastics, and track and field are being eliminated by school administrations to avoid being denied funding because they cannot increase female athletic engagement enough to equal male interest in competitive sports. Now, building on the momentum of previous efforts, proponents of the quota system are working to expand its application into high school sports.

Feminists use the claim that interscholastic athletics used to be a boys club that excluded women as an excuse for defending quotas, yet prevailing trends demonstrate that quotas aren't helping to open opportunities for women. They're instead being used to eliminate opportunities for men. This is not providing a benefit to anyone. It isn't increasing opportunities for athletic participation among female students. It is reducing opportunities for male students when female interest is not as high. It is accepted not because it is helping but because with the genders reversed the public does not recognize it for what it is: exactly the type of discriminatory policy that the law was originally written to eliminate.

Besting Milo's anti-feminist reboot of "The Twelve Days of Christmas"

August Løvenskiolds · 24 December 2015 · Archived copy · Original

What is the best gift you can give to a feminist? Give her the outrage she craves.

I love Milo Yiannopoulos. The iconoclastic "Big Milo," a self-described and self-denigrating "terrible gay man" has become the bane of feminists and the darling of anti-PC forces on the electronic pages of Breitbart.com. The talented, cutting genius usually has the pen of a marksman and the tongue of a serpent when it comes to giving feminists the lashing they so richly deserve.

But it is with sadness that I note that his Christmas offering, a feminist parody reboot of the song The Twelve Days of Christmas, fell short of his usually lofty standards. Under Milo's sharp exterior beats a sympathetic heart; the gentle sentiment of Christmas, coupled with a gay man's natural reluctance to tackle the vagina headlong, undermined his usual delightful viciousness. First, he replaced the "partridge in a pear tree" with "a mocha and a handful of biscotti." I'm sorry, Milo, but you can do better. Then, "two turtle doves" became "two twitter bans." Again, not bad, but, too tame for Milo's usual standards. Hell, "two titty bans" has more bite to it.

Don't get me wrong – his original idea was inspired, and his effort was good, but I'm willing to take the chance to try to go even darker down this coal mine. Wish me luck, and doffed fedoras to Milo for going there first. For once, I prefer something more penetrating that one can sing with an open throat.

On the first day of Christmas, feministas gave to me, a parted ridge below her paired teats. Feminists prize outrage even above orgasm as the most pleasurable of feelings, so pissing them off by objectifying them is the gift that keeps them in grievance. But we are just getting started. Original: "a partridge in a pear tree."

